Felicity Rhiaon

21 BBY – 20 ABY

She gave her life for love.

“Mom,” Rey whispered, ghosting her fingers across the etchings.

Luke wrapped an arm around Rey’s shoulders and pulled her in tight, “She had a difficult life, but she loved us so much.”

Rey didn’t know if she wanted to smile or cry, “Where’s she actually buried?”

He sighed, “Nowhere. When the First Order killed her, they destroyed her body before I could salvage it. She does have a grave on the planet you were born, but I figured we should have a memorial for her here for the days we need her most.”

“And to remind us that it’s final?”

Luke looked at his daughter, surprised by her wisdom, “You’re an amazing young woman, My Rey of Light. I miss your mother so much, but I take comfort in knowing there’s so much of her in you. As long as you live, her spirit will never die.”

“Thanks, Dad, but let’s agree never to take this to a weird place. I may be like Mom, but that doesn’t mean I can completely replace her in everything.”

Luke shook his head. Even with no one else around the influence her, Rey somehow still managed to tease him about incest.

“You know, I sure can never say I’ll ever miss your mother’s sass with you shooting your mouth off like that,” he ruffled her hair.

“What can I say?” Rey grinned a clone of her father’s. “It’s in my blood.”

Luke laughed and kissed her forehead.

Rey rested her head against her father’s chest and sighed. Her eyes roamed over the image of her mother’s grave as she tried to conjure up memories of the woman who bore her.

“Dad?” Rey asked.

“Yes, Sweetheart?”
“How did you and Mom meet?”

Luke sighed; he wanted to tell her that story of the meeting on Yavin IV, but there were far too many identifying details involved in it.

“I can’t tell you that,” Luke confessed. “Not yet, but I promise I will someday. I promise I’ll tell you everything.”

“I know you will,” Rey snuggled up in his arms. “I just wish I knew more about how you two fell in love. Why I ended up being born. What made her so special.”

Luke smiled, snapshots of his memories flashing in his mind, “Someday I’ll tell you all of it… Well… maybe not all of it. I think you don’t want the story of our wedding night or your conception. Although the conception is a good story.”

Rey scrunched her face in disgust, “Ew, Dad! No!”

“I didn’t mean a play by play! More how your mother figured out she was pregnant. Look, you’ll understand when you’re older.”

“I’d rather not.”

Luke just chuckled.

“So… are there any non-gross stories you can tell me?”

“You were neighbors?”

“For over a year and a half. It started when I was apartment hunting, and we decided to go to lunch together with a… mutual friend who was helping me find the perfect apartment…”

They spoke for hours, Luke telling his daughter every possible story of her mother he could think of that wouldn’t endanger her. References to Han, Leia, and the rest were veiled as best as possible, but Rey caught on enough that Luke and Felicity had a very close set male and female friends that she jokingly asked if she should call them First Quom and First Aletha.

Luke told her stories until the sun had long set. Stories of Luke and Felicity attending the wedding of Riz’s daughter and Gunner’s son. Of that oh so awkward dinner they shared with Garvan Rhiaon – Alaric’s older brother – that ended with Felicity declaring to him that disappointing Garvan was the greatest accomplishment of her life. Stories of Rey’s first steps to Han and how Felicity subsequently tried to smother him with his own vest. Of Rey spending time in Felicity’s office colouring pictures and trying to make them look as good as Mommy’s. Of the lullabies she would sing Rey to sleep with, and the times she crawled into bed with a sick Rey and nursed her back to health, holding her the way Alaric always had refused to do when she got sick as a child because he couldn’t afford to get sick and miss work. What was a credit to Rey from one day of work compared to the invaluable memories she would carry of the feeling of her mother’s arms around her, comforting her in her most desperate times?

After a while, when the sun had gone down, Luke and Rey moved back into the walker. He continued to tell her the stories of Felicity as she etched another day into the wall.

“Dad?” Rey asked as he watched her carve the tally onto the wall. “Mom didn’t know her mom,
“Not really,” Luke admitted. “Not enough to miss her the way you miss yours.”

Rey looked down, “And she had a bad relationship with her dad, right?”

“That’s right.”

“Do you think somebody’s waiting for her? In the afterlife?”

Luke smiled, “I know there is.”

“I meant more than just friends. Mashra says the bond of family runs deeper than any friendship.”

“I wasn’t speaking of a friend, though she does- Did have plenty of those waiting. There was someone else.”

“Who? If she didn’t have family who cared about her-”

“She had someone who cared about her,” Luke interrupted. “Who loved her, and raised her, and protected her as fiercely as I do you.”

“Who’s that?” Rey asked.

“His name was Brendan Rhiaon. He was Felicity’s older brother and he meant the world to her.”

“Brother? Does that mean I have an actual uncle?”

Luke considered his answer, his mind flashing to Han for a moment, “You have a far bigger family than you know, Rey.”

“Uncle Brendan… What happened to him? Did I meet him?”

“No, he died about twenty years before you were born. As for what happened to him, well…”

Rey raised a coy eyebrow, “Let me guess… That’s a story I can’t tell you at this time, Rey, but I promise that one day I will reveal the truth, and that I’m hiding this solely for your own safety.”

Luke mirrored the looked on her face, “That’s it, sarcasm has to be genetic because I certainly didn’t teach you to be that sassy.”

She smiled, “I’ll do my best to honour Mom’s memory and let her sarcasm live on.”

Luke just laughed.

It had to be nearly one in the morning when Rey finally fell asleep. Curled up in her hammock, clutching her Luke and Felicity dolls, Luke watched her sleep. He watched how her face was scrunched up adorably, her chest rise and fall with steady breaths, how she slept on her side like her mother, how her hair would fall in her face the same way.

He looked down at his wedding ring. He missed Felicity so much… and yet he couldn’t deny that something new had blossomed in his heart for Aletha.

“Love me forever, Luke…” Felicity’s words echoed in his head from the first night they had made love. “But don’t let our love shut you off. I will love you beyond my dying days, and I know you will love me too. But don’t be afraid to move on… if you find another who can keep your heart full until we meet again, take that chance."

Luke smiled at the wedding ring. He knew in his heart that someday he would see her again… and he knew that she would want this for him.

He glanced back at his bed – a small furnished cot with an old storage crate next to it as a bedside table. It was on that bedside table he put the ring every night, and it was also where he kept the Holo of Felicity.

Luke walked over and sat on his bed. Slowly he stripped off his boots and shirt, and after taking a quick glance to make sure Rey was sleeping – living in an AT-AT afforded the pair very little modesty – he changed into a pair of sleep pants.

He switched on the Holo of Felicity, and studied it for a moment. He let himself take in her beautiful form as the image snuggled their daughter. Then he took a deep breath and untied the cord that held Felicity’s wedding and engagement rings around his neck. He placed the rings on the bedside table.

And then he slid off his wedding ring.

He held it in his palm for a moment. It felt heavier than he thought it should. Luke clasped his fingers around it, and looked up at the Holo of Felicity.

“I love you,” he whispered to her image.

Then he flicked it off.

He crossed the room and kissed Rey’s sleeping forehead. Then he returned to his bed, finished his nightly routine, and got into it, ready for sleep to take him to the dream that haunted him.

It was time to finish this.

He had the dream as usual of Felicity locked in a cell. She looked as happy as ever to see him, and she was stronger, each visit making her appear it little by little more.

“Luke!” Felicity exclaimed, running to take her rightful place in his arms.

But that night he did not move to embrace her.

Sensing something was wrong, Felicity stopped in her tracks, a frown on her face.

“Luke?” she asked in confusion. His face looked so serious.

“I love you, Felicity,” he said. “I want you to know that.”

“Oh course I know that. Luke, please listen to me. You have to come to Tonides and save me. There’s still a chance. Please, Luke. You know I wouldn’t ask if I could do it myself. You have to come get me. You still can!”

“I wish that was true,” Luke’s voice hitched. A tear was starting in one of his eyes. “I wish I could just go to Tonides, and you would be there. That you, Rey, and I could be a family again… but I know the truth, and I accept it now. You’re never coming back.”

“No, that’s not true. Luke, please just listen to me!”
He shook his head, “You once told me not to waste my life mourning you. So I will respect your request and let myself live the fullest life I could have… Even if it’s in as isolated a place as this.”

“No, Luke, please,” Felicity begged. She crossed the room in two sets and grasped his hands. She looked up into his eyes, desperation shining in her own. “Don’t give up on me! Don’t let go! We can be together again, you, me, and Rey. You just… Please don’t let me go.”

A pained smile crossed his face. He lifted his natural hand and gently stroked his cheek, brushing his fingers through her dirty, matted, shortly sheared hair.

“And that’s how I know this isn’t really you,” Luke said softly. “Because I know that you wouldn’t want me to waste my life on regrets… The way you did.”

Shock and terror filled the eyes of the ghost that haunted his dreams.

He leaned forward and kissed her forehead.

“Felicity Rhiaon,” Luke whispered, “it has been an absolute honour to be your husband. I have upheld my vow to you to stay yours until death did us part.”

He felt the ring clasped in his hand as it had been in the world not belonging to dreams. His wedding ring dug into his palm as Felicity’s held her hands over his. Slowly he shifted his hands, slipping the ring into hers and releasing her hand.

Felicity frowned, looking down at her balled fist. His false hand still clasped her hand, connecting then one final time. He squeezed her hand reassuringly and watched as she opened her fist to see his wedding band sitting in her palm.

Her head snapped up in shock, her face turning white, and her throat going dry and voiceless.

“Now I return it to you,” Luke whispered. “I upheld my vow for ten years… and I would have gladly held it for ten thousand.”

Felicity’s mouth started to quiver.

He bent down and kissed her hand that was still clasped with his own.

“I love you, Felicity Rhiaon,” Luke declared. “I have since the day you first smirked at me on Yavin IV, and will continue to love you until I draw my dying breath… But it’s time for me to live again, the way you showed me how to live. To laugh. To love. I will hold you as dear in my heart as the daughter born of our love. Yes, one day we will all be together again… but not in this life.”

Felicity shook her head, “No, Luke-”

“Goodbye, Felicity Rhiaon… I will always love you.”

He took a step back from her.

“Please, Luke!” she begged. “Don’t do this! Don’t let me go!”

He released her hand.
And then she was gone.

CRASH!

Luke shot up in bed at the noise. He groaned and rubbed his eyes when he saw Rey do the same.

“What was that?” Rey yawned as she looked around the walker in confusion.

He mirrored her action, and his eyes set on the source of the noise. As usual, while having a Force Vision in his sleep, he had begun to kick. His foot had caught his bedside crate and knocked it clean over.

“You want a hand flipping it upright?” Rey offered.

“No, Sweetheart. It’s late. I’ll fix it in the morning. Just go back to sleep.”

“Are you sure?”

“I’m sure,” Luke laid down in his cot and readjusted his blankets. “Besides, Aletha would have my head if she knew you weren’t getting enough sleep. She’s obsessed with the idea of you growing up to be a healthy, well-adjusted, normal young woman.”

“Sounds like a boring life.”

“Night, Daddy.”

He smiled; she had recognized how badly he needed comfort that night. Even the simple term of Daddy meant the world to him that night.

“Thank you,” he said.

Rey smiled in the dark, “Anytime.”

It wasn’t until the morning that Luke realized the damage he had done. He had flipped the storage crate upright and returned the items to the top.

He hadn’t put on his wedding ring that morning, even though his finger felt oddly naked without it. Luke wrestled a while over what to do with it before deciding he would put it on the string he wore around his neck with Felicity’s rings. Maybe it wasn’t totally moving on to always wear them, but with the shady characters around Jakku, Luke wasn’t comfortable with leaving something of such high value anywhere but on his physical person.

Luke went to reach for his wedding ring, when he noticed it.

It was gone.

“Rey?” Luke frowned as she got ready for the day. “Have you seen my ring?”

She shrugged, in the middle of retying her hair buns, “Last time I saw it, it was on your finger. Is it missing?”
“Yeah,” Luke bent down to examine the sand around his crate. He frantically digged around the area. “I put it on the crate last night when I went to bed. It must have been knocked over. Where is it?”

Rey bent down and joined his digging. At first, the missing ring was a minor nuisance, but when an hour had passed and it was still nowhere to be found, Luke started to panic.

“I don’t think we’re going out scavenging today,” Rey said as she helped her father paw through the sand.

They tore the walker apart, literally from its head to its toes. But as much as they dug, there was no sign of glinting gold band.

“I’m sorry, Dad,” Rey said finally around three o’clock in the afternoon. “We’ve gone through what feels like every grain of sand. It’s nowhere to be found. The desert has probably claimed it. A Scavenger’s going to find it a hundred years from now after a bad sandstorm, but us… maybe it’s not meant to be. I… I think it’s lost. You’re never going to get it back. Maybe you should just accept it.”

Luke smiled and glanced towards the turned off Holo of Felicity.

“Yeah… Maybe I should.”

“Food delivery!” Aletha’s voice rang out in the walker several hours later.

Luke and Rey looked up in surprise to see Quom and Aletha entering the walker bearing packets of rations.

“What are you two doing here?” Luke asked.

“Don’t you listen?” Quom frowned. “Doc literally just told you. We’re bringing food.”

“Why?” Rey asked.

“Doc, I thought you taught this girl better biology.”

Aletha shook her head, “You guys didn’t come into town today, so we wanted to make sure you had something to eat.”

“Thanks,” Luke smiled, pulling up an old workbench, and a repurposed pilot seat to their beat-up dinner table. “We haven’t had dinner yet, so it’s appreciated. But don’t you worry about us, I keep the walker stocked with enough rations to feed two people three full portions a day for three weeks.”

Quom gave a low whistle, “I’m definitely spending the next X’us’R’iia here.”

“Let’s get those rations cooking,” Aletha grinned. “I’m starving.”

“Doc, we live on Jakku under the tyranny of Unkar Plutt,” Quom said dryly. “We’re always starving.”

Aletha rolled her eyes.

“Rey, do you think you could cook them for us?” Luke asked. “I wanted to talk to Aletha alone for a few minutes.”

“Sure,” Rey grabbed the packets and started the well-rehearsed routine of preparing rations.
Luke turned to Aletha, “Do you mind going for a walk?”

Quom looked awkwardly between the pair, “I’ll, uh… Stay here and make sure Rey doesn’t burn down the walker.”

Luke offered Aletha his arm, “Shall we?”

She took it, “We shall.”

“So, where are we going?” Aletha asked as Luke led her away from the walker.

“I want to show something,” Luke brought her down the path that would soon become well tread. He took her to the grave he had made for Felicity, “I did this last night.”

Aletha stared at it, not quite sure what to say, “Luke…”

He looked away from her and let go of her arm, “I wanted to fight this, how I feel about you. I thought after Felicity no woman could ever turn my head. Yet there it turned. You entered my life in one of the darkest phases of my life… and you brought light to it. You understood what I needed and when I needed it. I live for the days when I can help you, make you smile, even just… see your face. I love Felicity Rhiaon… but I’m in love with you too. This love doesn’t make mine for her any cheaper, nor does my love for her cheapen my love for you. It’s not the exact same love, and it’s not pieces of my heart divided between the two of you. I love both of you, and I think I could be genuinely happy with you.”

Aletha sighed, “I’m in love with you too, Luke, and I accept that you love us both… but I won’t share you. If we’re in a relationship it’s can’t be Felicity this and Felicity that. I would never ask you to forget her… Just to move on. If you want to be with me: be with me.”

“I understand that.”

“That’s why I won’t let anything happen until you have let her go… No matter how long it takes.”

Luke smiled, “You know, when you told me that the day before yesterday, I thought I could never do it. That I would need some grand sign to indicate that it was time to move on… And then this morning I lost my wedding ring.”

Aletha blinked, “You what?”

“Aletha, I have spent the past few days remembering everything about Felicity and closing the book on that chapter of my life. I have been gathering myself to move on from her so that I could be ready to give you all of me.” Luke looked down at the ground, “Last night, when I took off my wedding ring for bed, I didn’t plan on putting it back on in the morning. I was going to string it around my neck with Felicity’s rings. But I knocked over my bedside crate and lost the ring in the sand. It’s nowhere to be found. So if I need a sign, I think losing my wedding ring is a pretty good one.”

“You’re right, it is.” Aletha glanced over at the grave, “Did this go up before or after losing the ring?”

“I see.”
“She’s dead, Aletha. I’ve accepted it, and I’ve let her go.”

He took a step forward, arms outstretched to embrace her, but Aletha put a hand on his chest to stop him from closing their distance.

“Wait,” she said.

Luke scowled.

Aletha took a deep breath and gathered her courage, “I believe what you say. I know you wouldn’t make a grave for her if you didn’t have the strength to let her go. To make it so final.”

Luke decided never to tell her about Felicity’s grave on Rornian.

“But we’re not ready yet,” Aletha said. “Not for this. I know you’ve moved on, but you’re not ready to jump into another relationship. Trust me, I’ve been there. I’ve been the rebound, and I never want to be that again.”

“And that’s why I want you to wait. Take some time and get used to the idea of her being gone. Take the time to collect yourself, and I’ll take the time I need to do the same. I don’t want us to be together until we’re both ready to fully give ourselves to the other.”

He reached out with his left hand and clasped her hand in his own. Their fingers intertwined, and Aletha felt the absence of his wedding ring.

“But I promise you,” Luke leaned in so close to his lips that Aletha could feel his breath tickling her, “we will be together.”

The night of his tenth anniversary was the last time Luke dreamed of Felicity locked in a cell, begging him to come save her.

Now his dreams were filled with Aletha.

Chapter End Notes

ANNOUNCEMENT: For those who have been worried about the pace of this story, I have some news that might be really good for you, or really bad for me. I needed to challenge myself to get this story going, so I have made a very serious wager with my best friend. If I do not get this story to the TFA portion (Chapter 44) by December 15, 2017, I do not get to go see The Last Jedi on opening night.

…I have a bad feeling about this.

Coming Up Next Chapter…
X’us’R’iia

When a X’us’R’iia – the Teedo term for a very bad sandstorm – hits Jakku, Luke is forced to camp out with Aletha. As Aletha reveals the story of her past, Luke struggles with the fact he’s trapped in a tent for five days with a woman he has unresolved sexual tension with.
The Unwanted Ones

Chapter Summary

Chapter Notes

Trigger Warning: Mentions of sexual abuse appear in this chapter. If this content is triggering, skip from the paragraph beginning with “In the work camps,” and go to the one starting with “Why’s your tattoo placed there?”

See the end of the chapter for more notes

The Long Way Home

Chapter Thirty-One

The Unwanted Ones

AGE TEN

Luke Skywalker, Rey Rhiaon Skywalker, Quom Tinadar, and Ivano Troade sat outside of Doctor Aletha Kymeri’s tent. It was the middle of the night, Jakku’s two moons shining in the blackness. They sat outside on the ground, fighting off the seductive call of slumber as they anxiously waited.

When Mashra was rushed into Aletha’s tent earlier that day, they made sure to say their goodbyes. No matter how much Aletha insisted that Mashra would be just fine, the group knew it wasn’t true; not this time. The looming shadow of death hung in the air, and as they were forced out of Aletha’s tent, they all knew to take one last look at Mashra, for it would be their final one.
But there was one person who refused to believe that Mashra was going to die, and it was the doctor operating frantically on her.

“Just hold on, Mashra,” Aletha urged as an old medical vitals projector blared warning noises behind her.

BLEEP! BLEEP! BLEEP!

“Doctor,” Mashra groaned as Aletha started her on a new course of drugs administrated through an oxygen mask. Her anesthesia – or at least what passed for anesthesia on Jakku, had long worn off, and she was trying not to look down at her cut open chest.

“It’ll be okay, Mashra,” Aletha desperately assured her. “I swear to you, you’ll be alright.”

BLEEP! BLEEP! BLEEP!

“Doctor Kymeri, please-”

“Just trust me, Mashra. You’ll be fine. You’ll be okay. I’m going to fix you.”

She would. She had to.

…She couldn’t let it happen again. Not what happened last time.

---

Six Years Before the Battle of Yavin…

“Just hold on,” nineteen-year-old Aletha urged the Aqualish as an old medical vitals projector blared warning noises behind her.

BLEEP! BLEEP! BLEEP!

“Doctor,” the Aqualish groaned as Aletha started her on a new course of drugs administrated through an oxygen mask. Her anesthesia – or at least what passed for anesthesia on a recently firebombed Imperial Medical Hospital, had long worn off, and she was trying not to look down at her cut open chest.

“It’ll be okay,” Aletha desperately assured the Aqualish. “I swear to you, you’ll be alright.”

BLEEP! BLEEP! BLEEP!

The supervising Doctor, Doctor Hampton rolled his eyes, “Doctor, please-”

“Just trust me, Honey. You’ll be fine. You’ll be okay. I’m going to fix you.”

“Doctor,” Hampton grabbed Aletha’s arm. “We have tried every course of treatment, but do not have a limitless medical supply anymore. This woman has a fatal lung disease. If she doesn’t die now, she’ll die in a month. We have to let her go.”

BLEEP! BLEEP! BLEEP!

“No, I can fix her!” Aletha insisted.

“I’m ordering you not to,” Hampton said coolly.

BLEEP! BLEEP! BLEEP!
Aletha looked around the room at the dozen or so nurses and med students staring at the two doctors. How she played this game today would affect the career she had in the Imperial Medical Corps for the rest of her career.

“Nurse, get me 49 CC of ambidexdrine,” Aletha ordered, shoving past Hampton. “Now Tysel, grab me the 72 Hyrex clamp. Enric, I need you to-”

BLEEP! BL-

The beeping stopped. All heads whipped around to see Hampton holding the unplugged cord of the life support machine keeping the Aqualish alive.

“Time of death: 4:02 pm,” the nurse next to the Aqualish declared.

Aletha’s head was ringing.

“You- You killed her!” she declared.

“She was a waste of our resources,” Hampton replied coolly. “If you want to be a doctor, you have to make tough decisions like this.”

“I swore an oath against this exact thing! Do no harm.”

“I think you’ll find the Imperial Army Medical Corps has a very different set of standards.”

Aletha narrowed her eyes, “When the General hears what you did to me, she’ll-”

“I’ll do what?”

All eyes swung to the door where the imposing General Alecta Anthea stood. Tall, blonde, athletic, pale skin, and blue eyes that felt as cold as ice, she was the kind of woman who could step on and kill a child’s beloved pet, then keep walking without every sparing a glance back for the creature stupid enough to get in her way, or its heartbroken master.

Her cold eyes were locked on Aletha with a terrifying glare.

“Let me just explain,” Aletha said when they arrived in Alecta’s office.

“You will speak when you are spoken to,” General Alecta pushed past her and took a seat at her desk.

“But-”

“Silence.”

As the General started to do some paperwork, Aletha waited impatiently. She stood with a ramrod posture and fidgeting hands clasped behind her back. She watched the clock slowly tick by as the General didn’t even acknowledge her, too busy flipping through files in silence.

The General’s office was more sterile than an operating room. Silver and chrome fixtures everywhere, not a speck of dust dare lay on any surface. On the walls were the usual Imperial issue propaganda and posters about employee rights and numbers to report fraud. It was a laughable display, in the Imperial Military, you had no rights, and the only thing people were reported for was rebellion.

Which was why she was now standing in the office of the fearsome General Alecta Anthea.

There were two Holos on the desk of the General – the only personal touches in the entire office. The first was a picture of her family: a similar looking pair of blonde haired, blue eyed, pale skinned couple with their five blonde haired, blue eyed, pale skinned daughters. It was easy to tell which one was Alecta. The teenager looked as sour-faced today as she had when the picture was taken. Scowling and eyeing the youngest girl clinging happily off her father’s neck, hoping her glare would stop said sister from knocking into her and mussing up her perfectly pressed Imperial Cadet uniform.

The other Holo was of her shaking hands with Grand Moff Tarkin. The Holo was there to display to all how highly ranked she was that she got to consort with important people like Tarkin. Never mind that it was only for a brief three minutes at the last Imperial Ball, and he hadn’t even bothered to ask her name.

For forty-five minutes, General Alecta made Aletha stand there and sweat. Aletha knew better than to try her luck to question her. Last officer that had done that, General Alecta had punched in the face right in front of everyone. Aletha really didn’t want to go home that night and explain that black eye to her sister Adrinna – the head of the house since Father’s passing last year.

Calmly, General Alecta set down her stylus and looked up at Aletha.

“What in the Galaxy did you think you were doing?” General Alecta asked coldly, her military polish shining through.

“Alecta-”

General Alecta’s glare was sharp.

“General,” Aletha corrected. “Please, you have to understand, Doctor Hampton killed that woman.”

“Her lungs killed her,” General Alecta said shortly. “Doctor Hampton was conserving precious resources. In case you have forgotten, we recently lost many supplies because of the Rebellion’s firebombing.”

“Radicals firebombed the hospital. Not the Rebellion.”

“They are one in the same. Or are you telling me you’re an Alliance Sympathizer?”

Aletha looked down, “Of course not.”

General Alecta coldly stared at the meek girl for a long time.

“This is the way things are run here, Aletha. If you don’t like it, leave.”

“You’d like that,” Aletha muttered.

General Alecta shot her a look, “Who do you think you are to talk to me like that? To call me out in a conflict with your superior like that?”

“I just thought-”

“I know what you thought. How dare you do that? To expect to call on me, to throw around my name like you have some power with it. You have no idea what I have been through to get to the position I am in today. To lie, to cheat, to steal, to do whatever it takes to achieve a position that the Empire does not want women to be in. I have fought for years to be one of the only female Generals in the entire military, and then some child comes onto my base and thinks she can cling to my coattails."

“I have fought hard too,” Aletha objected. “I’m one of the youngest doctors in the Imperial Medical Corps.”

“Oh please,” General Alecta laughed cruelly. “You were in the fast track program! A doctorate in a year? You are barely qualified to administer a band-aid! You know what they call people like you? The children that get all gung ho to be doctors and then fast track to join the Corps to do battlefield medical work? …Cannon fodder. That’s what you are. What you chose to be. An expendable life in the military that’ll wrap up a few wounds, and be an adequate meat shield during blaster fire. If you stay in this career, you’ll be-”

“Dead in a year,” Aletha finished. “A sacrifice, taking the blast that would otherwise hit a valuable soldier that actually can do something for the Empire. Yes, I know the speech. You’ve given it plenty of times. And I know what you’re going to say next, that I should have just stayed home with Daddy where I belong. Well, I’m not going to do that. I’m here to fight for the right thing.”

General Alecta glared at her, “Then let me make one thing clear: I did not ask for you to be here. I do not want you here. So, if you’re going to stay here, then grow up and realize that the Imperial Military is a messy place with a lot of darkness, and rules you won’t agree with.”

“And if I refuse to abide by those rules?”

“I will turn you in for treason so fast your head will spin. So, shape up, and stop embarrassing me. If I ever hear you use my name again… You will regret it. Understood?”

Aletha bowed her head, “Understood.”

“Now get out of my office.”

Aletha turned and walked towards the door.

“Oh, and Aletha?” General Alecta’s voice stopped her in her tracks.

Aletha stopped and turned back to the desk. General Alecta’s head was down, focusing on some paperwork.

“Adrinna’s making a roast for dinner tonight,” Alecta said casually, not looking up. “Don’t be late.”

Aletha gave a small grin, “It’s your night to do the dishes.”

“Don’t remind me. When is that husband of hers going to fix the freaking dishwasher? He promised to fix it three months ago.”

“The real question is when is Adrinna going to stop trusting Timor to fix things?”

“Indeed.”

Alecta looked up from her desk, and the women’s eyes met for a minute.

“It’s always nice to see you at work, Sister,” Aletha said.

“Aletha Anthea, you are a terrible liar,” Alecta replied. She nodded to the door, “Now get the hell out of my office before I decide to give you a black eye to maintain my reputation. I am not explaining that to Adrinna.”

And with a small nod, Aletha left her sister’s office.

It was her usual stop to escape to when she needed a moment alone. On the far side of the hospital there was an over extended roof above the window to one of the janitor’s closets. There was a thicket of trees surrounding the pavement that ran the perimeter of the building, and it perfectly blocked all views of the area. It was the only place in the building where Aletha could be alone.

It was also the only place no one could see her cry.

God, what was she doing here? Alecta was right, she was no real doctor. She was no real soldier; that was Alecta. Alecta would come home after the war with a box full of medals… and Aletha would just come home in a box.

What was there even to fight for? This Empire? This place of oppression and death. Would she become like Hampton and play God, deciding how lived and died based solely on resources? This wasn’t the life she wanted. This wasn’t the life she promised Father she would live.

Maybe she should just be like Adrinna, marry, have some children, and live the life of a homemaker. Or be like Athena and get a menial operations job. Or if she was so eager to travel and help people, be a teacher like Anissa and go from Imperial Academy to Imperial Academy.

What was the point in healing people if the Empire was just going to send them back to their deaths? Did her work even matter? …Did she?

Aletha was startled by the sound of the window latch. She turned just in time to see a man in a janitor’s jumpsuit crawling out the window.

He had sand toned skin, thin brown eyes, and messy straight black hair. He had the grace of a feline as he jumped down from the window, landing easily on his feet in a move that if Aletha imitated would probably result in a shattered ankle. The first three buttons of his jumpsuit were lazily unclasped, and a silver necklace with some symbols from his homeworld hung from his neck. A cigarette was clutched between his yellow stained teeth, and he looked so proud of himself as he turned away from his successful escape.

He turned from the window, chuckling to himself, raising a lighter to his cigarette.

“Uh, Doctor,” the Janitor startled. “I was just, uh…”

She raised an eyebrow, and her irises flicked to the cigarette he couldn’t deny was in his mouth.

“Uh…” the Janitor thought hard as he pulled the cigarette out of his mouth. “… Want one?”

“You’re asking a doctor if they want a cigarette?” Aletha repeated slowly.

“Alright, dumb idea,” the Janitor conceded, twiddling the stick between in his middle and forefinger. “What are you doing out here?”

“I could ask you the same thing.”

“I think what I’m doing is obvious,” he shrugged. He lifted the cigarette back to lips, “Do you mind if I…?”
Aletha sighed, and crossed her arms, “I suppose not.”

“Well… let me know,” he said awkwardly, lighting it. The Janitor took a long drag and exhaled in relief, “Also, let me know if the smoke is bothering you. Your eyes are looking pretty… puffy.”

Aletha was thankful he didn’t explicitly point out that she had been crying.

“Thanks,” Aletha looked away.

“Oh, and do me a favor and don’t tell my boss I snuck out for a cigarette.”

“Sure. Whatever.”

For a long time they stood in silence. The Janitor tried his best not to blow smoke in her face, while Aletha politely tried not to cough whenever the breeze would bring it right to her.

“So…” the Janitor said after a while. “Why were you crying?”

Aletha wiped her eyes, “You can tell?”

“I’ve always had a sixth sense of sort. What happened?”

“Doctor Hampton pulled the plug on one of my patients.”

“Oh, that bastard? I swear he’d pull the plug on all the patients if the General gave him half a chance. She’d do it too. Pardon my language, but she’s one sadistic bitch.”

Aletha laughed, “I know. She’s my sister.”

“My condolences.” The Janitor grinned, “I’m assuming that based on your tone, you’re not upset with me calling her a bitch.”

“Not at all. Our sister Athena does it on a regular basis. Funny part, Athena’s her favorite sister.”

“How many do you have?”

“I’m the youngest of five girls.”

“I guess your parents really wanted a boy.”

“Something like that,” Aletha shrugged.

The Janitor regarded her for a moment, “Must be hard to work with your sister.”

“Especially since she doesn’t want me here.”

“Do you want to be here?”

Aletha paused.

“What?” the Janitor asked.

“Nothing,” Aletha shook her head.

“Come on, tell me. I’m not going to turn you in for treason.”

“I’m not a traitor!” Aletha exclaimed. “I just… Sometimes I think there’s gotta be something… more out there. You know what I mean?”

“Doc... You have no idea,” the Janitor grinned. He lifted his lighter, “You sure you don’t want one?”

That was when Aletha noticed the symbol etched onto the lighter; a symbol she would later learn to be called a starbird. It was back in the days before the starbird became a known Rebel symbol. Back then it was only known between Rebels as a way to identify themselves to each other.

“I’ll still pass,” Aletha said kindly.

“Well, I should be getting back.” The Janitor’s cigarette was nearly smoked through. He throw the butt on the ground and smushed it with his boot. “It was nice meeting you. Maybe we can talk again some time?”

“Maybe,” Aletha smiled.

The Janitor turned and gripped the elevated ledge of the windowsill.

Aletha rolled her eyes at the display, “You know there’s a door a few yards away?”

“Come on, Doc,” the Janitor pulled himself through the window. Surprisingly, he landed perfectly on his feet. He rebuttoned his jumpsuit and grinned at Aletha, “Gotta live on the edge sometimes. I’ll see you around, Doc.”

“Hey, wait!” Aletha called.

The Janitor paused, “Yeah?”

“What’s your name?”

The Janitor smiled, “Tell me yours first.”

“Aletha Anthea.”

“Well, Doctor Anthea, people around here call me Cynan, but you? ...Call me, Obik.”

That was the day the Rebellion started to recruit Doctor Aletha Anthea.

---

BLEEP! BLEEP! BLEEP!

The beeping of the machines brought Aletha back to the present.

“Alright, hold on Mashra,” Aletha said as the Aqualish’s breaths got ragged. She turned to her medicine cabinet, “I just have to get-”

She stopped. She was completely out of ambidexdrine.

“No,” Aletha whispered. “No!”

She frantically started ripping open drawers, trying to find something — anything — to save Mashra’s life.

“Doctor,” Mashra moaned.
“I’m going to save you! I’m going to save you!”

Mashra caught Aletha’s hand.

“Aletha. Stop.”

Aletha’s eyes met Mashra’s, and her gaze told Aletha everything.

“No,” Aletha whispered.

“It’s time,” Mashra was resigned to her fate. “Aletha, please. I’ve been in so much pain, and it only gets worse.”

“But I can save you.”

“To live what kind of life? This? Scavenging, starving, waiting for my next coughing fit? Aletha, please… Let me go.”

“But I can do it. I can save you,” Aletha’s voice shook. Tears were gathering in her eyes.

Mashra smiled and closed her hands over Aletha’s, “I know you can, but this is my choice… Please, Aletha, let me die with dignity.”

Aletha sobbed, and then gave a slow nod, “Is there anything I can do to make you more comfortable?”

“Stay with me?”

Aletha knelt down, and shifted her hands so they were over top Mashra.

“Until the end.”

Five minutes later, on the other side of the tent, Luke’s eyes snapped open. Rey was asleep, leaning against his leg – he himself caught between sleeping and awaking – when he felt the shift in the Force.

Blurrily, he looked to his right where Quom was leaning against him and snoring. He nudged Quom, and the Vrogem woke with a groan.

He stopped when he saw Luke’s face.

“She’s gone isn’t she?” Quom sobered.

Luke nodded, “Mashra’s one with the Force.”

They buried Mashra next to Felicity’s grave. It was a small ceremony, only Luke, Rey, Aletha, Quom, and Ivano. Aletha delivered the eulogy, expressing profound sadness for the loss of Mashra and speaking about how Mashra affected their lives.

Luke lowered her body into the grave, Quom made the headstone – another sheet of scrap metal with her name carved upon it – Ivano buried her, and Rey set atop the grave a small bundle of spinebarrels she had picked.
Then Ivano, Quom, and Aletha returned to town to partake in the most unsettling part of death on Jakku: splitting up the deceased’s possessions among themselves. And in a town full of scavengers and petty doctors, sometimes that argument got violent. To prevent her things getting stolen while they were burying her, the group had actually concealed Mashra’s death from the citizens of Niima Outpost – Aletha fed the town some story about Mashra recovering in her tent, and Luke paid Zuvio to have one of his men watch the tent.

Luke and Rey stayed at their walker. Quom and Aletha promised to procure a few trifles for them, but Luke just wanted the extremely vulnerable and heartbroken Rey to be with him and away from all of that ugliness.

Rey didn’t cry as much over death anymore. She had lost so many people in her young life – Felicity, Alyla, Reine, Obik, Gavyn, Zena, Tyla, the rest of the Jedi Order, Mashra, and countless friendly scavengers on Jakku. Frankly, by age ten she was starting to numb to the feeling.

Still, Rey cried heavily over Mashra, breaking down and begging her father to explain why it had to happen and why people had to suffer terrible long-term illnesses like Mashra did. Five years after losing Felicity, Luke had developed no better explanations than the ones he had relayed back then.

Five nights after Mashra’s death, Luke came into the walker after meeting Quom for pickup. Quom had been bringing Luke and Rey small projects to tinker on as well as replenishment of food and water.

He found Rey sitting on his cot, Dosmit Raeh’s helmet on her head, and drawing in her future survival guide with the set of charcoal pencils Aletha had procured as a birthday present for her three months ago.

“Hungry, Sweetheart?” Luke snuck a kiss under the helmet onto her forehead.

Rey shrugged, her concentration on the paper.

He glanced down at the drawing, and the smile froze on his face. Taking up the entire page was an extremely detailed picture of Mashra. She looked calm, her hands folded, and her posture gentle. In the corner, written in capital letters was her name, and underneath was a heartbreaking caption in brackets.

Luke sat down on the cot behind her. He wrapped a single arm around her, and pulled her backwards into his embrace to hug her close.

“I miss her too, Sweetheart,” he whispered.

And Luke held her that night as Rey cried herself to sleep.

In the morning, Aletha’s speeder was parked outside the walker. Luke found her standing at Mashra’s grave, staring blankly with tears in her eyes.

“Morning,” he greeted, coming to a stop at her side.

“Morning,” Aletha said quietly.

“Have you eaten?”

“Think nothing of it. You can come any time.”

They stood in silence for a while.

“I should have saved her,” Aletha whispered.

Luke glanced at Felicity’s grave, “I know how you feel.”

“I could have done it. She could still be alive right now if I just tried a little harder.”

“Mashra asked you to let her die, Aletha. You made sure she was comfortable up to her final moment.”

“I still shouldn’t have done it,” Aletha shook her head. “You know I was originally part of the Imperial Medical Corps?”

“Really?”

“I did the fast track program, so I ended up operating on people without even the level of expertise of a nurse… How many people did I kill because of my incompetence?”

“Aletha-”

“I wanted a life more than this. To not have to choose between preserving resources and preserving lives. My sister was right, I’m nothing better than cannon fodder.”

“Aletha stop,” Luke said. He grabbed her hands and turned her to face him, “You are an amazing woman. An amazing doctor. You’re no cannon fodder. Trust me, I was a commanding officer. I know what cannon fodder looks like.”

Aletha smiled, “That’s a little cynical.”

Luke shrugged, “With a wife like mine, it rubs off on you after a while.”

She laughed, and Luke couldn’t help but crack a smile. He loved her smile; that smile as warm as the sun of Jakku. He found himself reaching out and brushing a lock of hair out of her face. He heard how her breath hitched slightly.

“Luke,” she whispered back, staring into his eyes. She dared not even blink and ruin the connection held between their gazes.

“Aletha Kymeri, you are one of the most amazing women I have met in my life,” Luke’s hand stroked the soft line of her jaw. “And, that’s saying a lot.”

“And you Luke Erso, are one of the most amazing men I have met in my life… Though that’s not exactly saying much in my case.

Luke laughed, and that warm smile of hers widened.

“I practice speeches in my head before I say them,” Luke grinned. “Besides… it’s easy to talk to someone you love.”
Aletha’s breath stopped, “Luke-”

“Aletha,” he whispered back.

He took his chance. Luke leaned forward and captured her lips in his own. She startled at first, but soon she was kissing him back.

It was strange to kiss a woman who wasn’t Felicity… or looked exactly like Felicity. He didn’t have to bend his head down to match her height. Her hands didn’t automatically fist in his hair like Felicity loved to do. Instead she gripped his hips, pulling his whole body in closer to her. Her lips moved against him different… but in a good way.

She was all warm, and soft, and everything just felt… good. The charge of passion riddled his body once more, and he felt that physical connection of love he had so missed.

No, Aletha was not Felicity, but that was okay.

Eventually, she tore away from him.

“Aletha,” he took a step forward, but she stopped him with a finger on his lips.

“No, stop.”

He frowned, “What’s wrong?”

“I… I’m sorry. I shouldn’t have let that happen. Especially not… here,” Aletha looked to Felicity’s grave.

Luke sighed, “Aletha, please… I’ve moved on. Okay? I took the time I need to mourn her, move on, figure who I am without, and now… Now I want to be with you. Okay? I’ve moved on. I promise.”

“I know you have… but I haven’t.” Aletha looked away from him, “I’m… going to say good morning to Rey. Are you coming?”

“Give me a moment.”

Aletha nodded and returned to the walker.

Luke sighed and glanced over at Felicity’s grave.

“I should have got Han to do it,” he said to the grave, “Or at least Quom. He’s close enough to being the Jakku version of Han… albeit a little less talented at throwing a punch.”

He smiled and rested his hand on his wife’s grave.

“I miss you.”

Luke took another deep breath, and then headed for the walker, ready to pretend like nothing had happened.

AGE ELEVEN
The only real place on the Pilgrim’s Road is Old Meru’s, a shack with a few tables and chairs and a coolth reservoir that went dry before I was born. The cool air’s long gone, but there’s still shade and a trough for happabores.

Old Meru is mostly cybernetic parts, and when they cut her up they discarded her ability to make conversation.

- Rey’s Survival Guide

“MG! We’re heading out in a few minutes!” Quom’s voice called.

Rey’s head shot up. She was sitting on a rickety chair at one of Meru’s table, busy sketching the tented pitstop along Pilgrim’s road.

Quom had taken her on an overnight trip to one of the Sacred Villages. He had developed a contract with a few of the villages so they would contact him anytime they needed a mechanic. It had been Luke’s idea to enterprise… but that might have been to get Quom more projects as ever since his partnership with Luke Skywalker, Quom had gotten a little lazy. He now made up any excuse to make Rey and Luke go out scavenging instead of himself.

“Speeder all fixed?” Rey asked as Quom loaded the trunk with his tool kit.

“Almost.” Quom looked down at a pair of legs sticking out from under the speeder, “How’s it going kid?”

“Oil’s all changed, Mister Tinadar,” a voice answered. The legs began to crawl, and soon a young boy emerged from underneath the speeder.

He appeared to be only a few years older than Rey – two she would later learn. Rey smelled him before she saw him. He had olive toned skin that was covered in oil and grease. His short black hair was dirty and matted. Clearly the boy hadn’t bathed in months, if not years. But he had a nice grin and he was very tall. His hands were rough, and his eyes were a brilliant green that made Rey do a double take. She had never seen something so vibrantly green that she genuinely didn’t know green could be that bright.

“Thanks again, Kid,” Quom said. “The gas line is hard for me to fix. I’m not great at the delicate work with these great big paws of mine, and Kymeri would have my ass if she knew I’d been letting MG huff gas without a mask on.”

“Well, thankfully Meru doesn’t actually care what happens to me,” the boy laughed. “In fact, she said to me last week that if I lost an arm, she’d just slap a cybernetic one on me. Gotta get her money’s worth out me, she said.”

Quom frowned, “Wait… did she buy you?”
The boy awkwardly scratched his neck, “Sort of… Uh, I was working as a… servant of sorts to one of the leaders of the Sacred Villages, and she paid him fifty portions to transfer my service to her, and repay the inconvenience of losing my services.”

Quom stared at the boy, “So, you’re a slave?”

“Pretty much. I mean, I think I can go, but I’m not chancing things with Meru. Last time someone messed with her, she came out of the shack with a… very large gun and, well… you can imagine.”

“That sucks, Kid. Any way you can convince Meru to let you go?”

“Not without a miracle, and there’s no miracles on Jakku.”

Quom glanced back at Rey, “You’d be surprised.”

The boy shrugged, “Honestly, there’s not much to complain about. Sure, Meru works me hard, but I have a place to sleep and food to eat. Speaking of, the work will be half a portion.”

“Coming right up.” Quom turned away, “Rey, pack your stuff up and bring me my bag.”

Wanting to hurry, Rey scooped everything up in her arms and tried to repack her bag as she walked. Unfortunately, as Quom paid the boy, Rey dropped her book on the ground.

“Here, I got it,” the boy bent down.

“No, it’s okay,” Rey quickly scooped up her journal, but a loose page fell out.

“Happy-Bore Medicated Dewormer (Slurry Formulation.)” The boy read the pamphlet as he put into his bag the half portion Quom paid him. “The best happenore is a happy-bore!”

Rey snatched it away from him, “That’s mine.”

“Must come in useful.”

“It’s just a thing I’m collecting.”

“Animal care pamphlets?”

Rey glared at him, shoving the pamphlet back into her book. She didn’t recognize the genuine interest behind the boy’s voice.
“What is it then?” the boy asked.

“That’s Rey’s Survival Guide,” Quom interjected. He grasped her shoulders proudly, “My little scavenger knows everything there is to know about surviving in this desert. Thanks to me of course.”

“Oh, I’m sure Dad and Aletha will be thrilled to hear that when I get home,” Rey grinned. “And it’s not a survival guide. Just a drawing book, and a place to put scraps I find. Like that postcard from Bespin… that freaked Dad out for some reason. All it said was a generically printed Wish You Were Here. He doesn’t like Bespin, does he?”

“Probably had a traumatic incident there,” Quom shrugged.

“Well, if you like things like that, why don’t you take this?” The boy dug a scrap of paper out of his bag and handed it to Rey.

“The Jakku travel advisory? Thanks,” Rey grinned. “Hey, Quom. Listen to this. Message to spacers approaching Jakku: Captains are advised not to approach Jakku or attempt a landing there. Then they list five whole reasons not to come here including that the planet has extreme temperatures and terrain, services are minimal to nonexistent, there’s the whole ship graveyard, law enforcement doesn’t exist, and commerce is run controlled by criminal enterprises. It’s good advice.”

“It is that, my MG,” Quom chuckled.

“Thank you,” Rey said to the boy.

“You’re welcome,” he replied. He held out his hand to shake, “Name’s Teng Malar.”

“Rey Erso,” she shook his hand.

“Yeah. How do you know about him?”

“Only person Meru can stand. Something about how only people with cybernetic limbs understand her pain. How’d he get the false hand, anyway?”

“I actually have no idea.”

Teng scowled, “You don’t have to tell me if you don’t want to.”

“No, I genuinely don’t know,” Rey insisted. “We’ve got some sort of weird, secret past. Erso isn’t even my real last name. He won’t tell me what the real name is.”

“Well, I can’t say I have much, but at least I can say I know my name.”

Rey laughed, “Well, I won’t brag. What kind of name is Malar anyway? You sound like a duck.”

“It’s Nubian, thank you very much. At least it’s not some plain old, generic Coruscanti name like Erso.”

Rey frowned, “Is Erso Coruscanti?”

“I have no idea. I just needed a comeback.”

Rey laughed again.

“Alright, well, Rey, we should get going,” Quom squinted over her shoulder in the distance. “The weather’s not looking too great. I want to get the shelter by nightfall.”

“Alright, Quom.” Rey looked at Teng, “It was nice meeting you.”

“Come see me again sometime.”

“I’ll try.”

“Rey, go tell Meru we’re heading out, and pay her for the water and supplies.”

“Sure thing.” Rey headed off.

“Nice girl,” Teng said watching her leave. Suddenly Quom yanked his arm, forcing Teng smack into his chest, “Hey, what?”

“I’ll say this once,” Quom’s voice was slow. “Rey is only eleven… and the last person who messed with her, her dad cut off that guy’s arm.”

Teng stared at the Vrogem in utter confusion, “What are you talking about?”

Quom released, “Have a good day, Kid.”

Then Quom walked away.

Teng rubbed his arm, and watched Quom and Rey warily, “Meru was right. It’s a bad idea to try to make friends on Jakku.”

Dinner is the same thing every night: survival rations. The only variety is whether I get Imperial rations or the New Republic kind. Both are pretty much the same – the New Republic rations taste a bit better but the Imperial stuff is less likely to be stale after all these years.
Luke took a deep breath, and knocked on the tent peg.

“Come in!” Aletha’s voice called.

He ducked underneath the white sheet advertising the Doctor’s completely free availability.

“Hey, Luke,” Aletha smiled when she spotted him. She was busy scrubbing down her medical cot that had a blood stain on it that Luke was fairly certain wasn’t there that morning.

“Sheet’s white, isn’t it?”

“So, you won’t leave my face to be marred by steelpecker scars?”

“Well, never say never,” Aletha scrubbed at the bloodstain.

“That new boy, Strunk sliced his leg up pretty good this morning. Be walking with a limp for a week.”

“What is a boy that young doing scavenging?”

“He’s only a few years older than Rey, and you’ve got her doing a lot worse.”

“Yeah, but I’m pretty good at keeping her out of danger.”

Aletha smiled and shrugged. Luke couldn’t help but think that if Felicity had been in her place, there probably would have been a dark joke uttered concerning Jarex or Felicity’s own death.

“It just breaks my heart to see another kid show up on Jakku,” Aletha sighed. “I don’t know how they get here, or why they do, but every now and then you look up, and there’s a teenager who has doomed themselves to a life on Jakku.”

“Scary thing is that Rey is turning twelve next month, which means in a little over a year, we’ll be looking up and Rey will be that teenager.”

“I can barely believe it. It seems like just yesterday she was small enough that Quom could lift her up. And now she’s lifting him.”

“Has he been getting her to do that again? I told him to stop.”

“Well, your daughter is freakishly strong.”

Luke gave a mysterious grin, “Gets it from me.”

Aletha just shook her head, “So, what brings you around, Luke?”

“Well, Rey and Quom won’t be returning home until tomorrow, so I’m alone again for another night, and I was thinking… Would you like to have dinner with me?”

Aletha shrugged, “I’m always up for a meal with you. You want to help me do inventory and we’ll share a portion packet?”

Aletha froze, “A what?”

He sighed, “Aletha, please, we’ve been doing this little song and dance for so long. We know how we feel about each other. For goodness sakes’ it’s been almost two years since I kissed you.”

“It hasn’t been two years.”

“Mashra passed three months after Rey’s tenth birthday. She’s turning twelve next month.”

“Wow,” Aletha blinked in shock. “It has been two years.”

“Aletha, please,” Luke took a step forward. “I’ve been in love with you for years. You’ve known that fact for nearly three of those years. You know what I was doing with Felicity three years on? Planning our wedding… Well, actually that was basically four years on, but that’s beside the point.”

“Luke-”

“I love you, Aletha… but I barely know a thing about you. Your family, your history, why you came to Jakku.”

“And I know just as little about you, what with the whole mysterious past.”

“You know a lot more than you give me credit. You know I grew up on Tatooine, you know I was in the Rebellion as a pilot and commanding officer, you know my father is the reason I have a cybernetic hand, you know I have a younger twin sister… I don’t even know what your last name is.”

Aletha frowned, “It’s Kymeri.”

“The one before that. Your maiden name.”

“And I don’t know yours… Real surname that is.”

“Actually, I technically maiden name. I combined my name with my wife’s when we got married, so part of my legal surname is actually Rhiaon.”

“How modern of you,” Aletha said. “That still doesn’t mean I know the other part.”

“But you know the reason I don’t tell you is that it would put a significant target on your back,” Luke pointed out. “I don’t know why you conceal your surname.”

Aletha looked away, “It’s stupid.”

“I’m sure the reason isn’t stupid at all,” Luke insisted.

“No, the reason I don’t tell you it is that it’s a stupid last name.”

“I’m sure it’s a wonderful last name. Please, Aletha… Let me know one thing.”

She sighed, “Fine, my maiden name is Anthea.”

“Anthea? That’s a beautiful name.”

“Yeah, it’s a stupid last name,” Aletha said. “I actually used to joke with Antar that the biggest reason I married him was to take his surname.”

“Could be worse. I have a sister named Athena Anthea… Well, had. She died many years ago.”

“I’m sorry.”

“It’s okay. We weren’t close.”

“Still.”

Aletha sighed.

“Well, see now,” Luke grinned. He gave Aletha a small, playful shove, “Was that so hard?”

“I guess not,” Aletha look away from him again.

Luke closed his eyes, “What’s wrong?”

“I’m just…”

“Not ready for this?” Luke supplied the usual answer.

“Scared,” she confessed. “The last time I tried something like this, it didn’t end well.”

Aletha smiled, but shook her head, “No, you don’t, but I understand where you’re coming from.”

She turned back and started to clean her hands in a small basin. Luke took a deep breath, then came up behind her. She gasped as his hands settled on her hips, and his breath from his bowed head was tickling her neck.

He took the gamble. Luke leaned down and pressed his lips to hers. He felt her pull back initially, but just as he was about to respect her boundaries and move away, Aletha’s hand gently grabbed the back of his neck and pulled him to her. Her lips took charge, hungrily consuming his taste like it was the sweetest she had ever tasted.

Luke pushed her back, pinning her against the cabinet that held the water basin and most of the basic medical supplies. He really hoped that there weren’t any sharp objects within reach. Then again, getting stabbed didn’t sound so bad if it meant continuing to kiss this amazing woman. It had been far too long since he had felt a lover’s touch. He didn’t realize how much he had missed it.

“Luke,” Aletha moaned kissing along his jaw with the right tenderness that he couldn’t hold back a soft growl.

“Yes, just like that,” Luke moaned, flipping her around. Slowly his gripped her hips and lifted her onto the flattop of the cabinet.

They froze at the sound.

“Is that your comm?” Aletha asked, awkwardly propped upon the table now that the sexual tension had dissipated. Good Lord, were her legs clinging to his hips?

Luke glanced down at his wrist comm, “Oh, I am so going to kill Quom.”

Uncomfortably the two split apart and hastily fixed their appearance.

“Hey, Luke,” Quom’s voice answered. “Sorry, did I catch you two at a bad time?”

Luke glanced back at Aletha. She blushed and looked down at the ground.

“Just letting you know that the weather was looking bad, so Rey and I headed out earlier than planned. We might be back by tonight.”

“The weather was bad and you thought the best option was to not stay in safety, but rather go straight into said bad weather?”

“Luke, we both know I’m not the brains of this group.”

“Remind me again why I let you take my child on overnight trips alone?”

“Gives you an opportunity to make time with the Doc?”

Luke looked at Aletha again.

“He has a point,” she shrugged.

Luke groaned, “Alright, Quom. I’ll expect you and Rey at the walker tonight. I’ll bring dinner for all of us.”

“You can’t do that,” Aletha objected.

“Why not?”

She smiled, “Because we’re having dinner tonight.”

Luke let his trademark goofy grin split his face, “Really?”

“Well, you better give me dinner after that little display.”

“Luke, what’s going on?” Quom’s voice interrupted. “You took your finger off the button, and I can’t hear you.”

“You think that might have been an intentional choice?” Luke queried.

“Nah, Buddy. You love me.”

Luke rolled his eyes, “How did I end up with him as one of my best friends?”
“I think it had something to do with Rey and kicks to the face,” Aletha answered. “So, you want to give me an hour to clean up and change, and we’ll have dinner?”

He smiled warmly at her, “I’ll bring us the finest rations on all of Jakku.”

Aletha giggled. Her laugh wasn’t anything like Felicity’s, far more girlish and innocent.

But he didn’t love it any less.

---

Luke had done what he could to fix himself up for his date. Dates on Jakku were an odd thing, after all. He had paid for twenty minutes at the wash up place to clean his face, hair, and beard – boy did he miss his old conditioner. Then he had changed into the extra set of clothes he kept at Quom’s in case a sandstorm stranded him overnight. Finally, he had gone to Plutt’s and asked for the best ration packets he had to offer. Because of the occasion, the cost of the rations had been double the usual as these were the freshest type.

He was surprised to see that Aletha had put up the red sheet for the occasion. It was the one that signified that she was with someone already and it would take a while so it was best to come back later. The red sheet made even people with emergencies pause and reconsider if they needed to bother Aletha. And after the Roke fiasco that almost ended in the destruction of Jakku, people took her sheets very seriously.

“Aletha?” Luke called, worried for a moment that she might be attending to a patient.

When she pulled back the red sheet, Luke’s jaw nearly dropped. It appeared he hadn’t been the only one to buy time at the wash up place. Her skin and hair were fresh and clean and only covered in half as much sand as usual.

But her outfit did things to Luke that had not be done in a while. Her bottoms were the usual nicer looking leggings that Aletha always wore; these ones in particular a dark beige. She had her nearly worn through to the sole black flats. The crown of her grey blonde hair was braided and pulled back, the rest of her hair falling down her bare shoulders.

And her top… it was crisp and white. The kind that was sleeveless and backless, and only held up by tying two ends of fabric around her neck. Luke also couldn’t help but notice that her bare back showed no sign of a bra to support her ample breasts.

… Oh, he was in trouble tonight.

“Like what you see?” Aletha smiled, but her face had a slight embarrassed flush.

“Aletha,” Luke shook his head in disbelief, “I had no idea you owned that top, but I am certainly happy you do.”

She laughed, “Come on in.”

As she turned around to led him into the tent, Luke was surprised by something on her back.

“Do you have a tattoo?”

Aletha froze, “Uh… Yeah.”

“Wow,” Luke laughed. “I did not expect you to be the kind of woman who had a starbird tattoo on her lower back.”
“Well… it’s a camp tattoo.”

Luke’s heart dropped. No Rebel needed an explanation as to what a “camp tattoo” was. It was said that something like one out of every four Rebels had ended up in an Imperial work camp at some point in the war.

In the work camps, Rebels were beaten, starved, and nearly worked to death. All were tattooed with a starbird on the left wrist to identify the person as a Rebel.

Felicity’s tattoo had been a camp tattoo, though her location had been chosen in a way to humiliate both her and Alaric Rhiaon who had tried to hide Felicity from capture by the Imperials. She had turned herself in, loudly proclaiming who her father was as she would rather be in a work camp than home with Alaric.

But there was something even more sinister the camps were known for.

“I wasn’t…” Aletha hesitated over her words, “touched. They didn’t really do that to the women. Sure, we got groped from time to time, and I don’t doubt that there weren’t cases of women being violated, but it was primarily the men who were assaulted. It was all about the power dynamic.”

“I know,” Luke said stiffly. “I know men who were… in the camps.”

Luke could probably name two dozen of his friends who had ended up in the camps at some point. All of them had a varying willingness to talk about what happened. Diego Nalto made it no secret what was done to him. Kes Dameron declined to answer questions, but implied something had happened. Han heavily refuted the suggestion that something had happened to him. Hobbie point blank refused to talk about it.

“Why’s your tattoo placed there?” Luke asked as they started to prepare their dinner.

“I was a doctor, so they used me as an Imperial Medic,” Aletha answered. “They hid my branding so Imperials didn’t know they were being fixed by a traitor. What about you? You have any tattoos?”

“No. I’m not fond of needles.”

“How not fond?” Aletha had a knowing look in her eye.

Luke blushed, “I may have been asked to leave a clinic one time when trying to get bloodwork done because I was, and I quote a danger to the staff.”

Aletha burst out laughing, “You’re joking.”

“No, I legitimately cried when Rey was vaccinated as a baby.”

“Oh, so Rey’s got all her shots?”

“All the ones a five-year-old could get.”

“That’s perfect. You know, I’ve been thinking about her health lately, and worrying about her immune system. Growing up in an environment like this, she’s not going to have built up the best defenses, plus she needs to get her shots. The problem is money for those shots.”

“I’ll pay for whatever you need to keep Rey healthy. Just name it.”

And so they talked for hours, sharing their dinner and each other’s company.
“It’s getting late,” Aletha sighed long after the last crumbs of their portions had been consumed.

“I suppose you’re right,” Luke groaned. “I should be getting back to the walker. But I’ve had a great time tonight.”

She smiled, “I have too.”

This time it was Aletha who initiated the kiss. It was sweeter, more innocent kiss; a kiss goodnight.

“You know, you’re a really good kisser, Luke,” Aletha grinned when they had broken apart.

“I may have been told such things in the past,” Luke smirked.

She swatted at his chest and he laughed, catching her hand.

“Oh, you’re going to have to make that up to me,” he had something dark flash in his eyes.

“With pleasure,” she pulled him in for another kiss.

_Beep. Beep. Beep._

“Ok,” Aletha broke away from Luke as his comm went off, “that’s it. Next time I see Quom, I’m kicking him in the face.”

“Can you do that?”

“Of course. That sort of thing bonds you for life.”

Luke laughed as he hit the answer button on his comm.

“Rey and I just got to the walker.”

“Oh, good, I’m just heading home.”

“No, Luke! Stay where you are! There’s a really bad sandstorm brewing. I can’t make it to town, and you won’t be able to make it to the walker.”

“Are you sure?”

“Luke, I’m pretty sure it’s going to be a X’us’R’iia.”

---

[O]ne of the storms that last for days, the ones the Teedos call X’us’R’iia, or “the breath of god.”

---

- Rey’s Survival Guide

“Alright, Quom, bunker down,” Luke ordered. “There should be enough food and water there to last you for a few weeks. The winds are going to block our comm lines, so we won’t be able to speak for several days. Rey, are you going to be okay alone with Quom for a few days?”
“He hasn’t managed to kill me yet,” Rey answered. “I have some faith in him.”

“Never say things like that, MG,” Quom chided. “With your family’s luck, you probably just jinxed it.”

“Then make sure my grave reads I Guess Quom Was Right for Once.”

“Hey, let’s not get carried away,” Aletha cut in on her own comm. “Besides, we all know that his grave is going to read Luke Told Me Not to Do It.”

“Hey!”

“I’ll keep Luke with me during the storm. Just focus on the two of you being safe, okay?”

“Yes, Ma’am,” the two said in unison.

Aletha raised an eyebrow; her message clear. She and Luke were about to get a lot of time alone together.

“Alright, we’re going to end the transmission before it starts to cut out,” Quom announced. “See you in a few days.”

“See you in a few days,” Aletha replied.

“I love you, Rey,” Luke said.

“Love you too, Dad,” Rey answered.

“Be safe.”

“I’m always safe.”

Luke smirked, “Well… Not always. You wouldn’t be my daughter if you were.”

“I’ll see you later, Daddy,” Rey laughed.

Luke grinned, recognizing the intimacy of the word, “See you later, Sweetheart.”

“Alright then,” Aletha said as the comms switched off. “Let’s get to work. I’ll get the water, you get the food. How much will we need?”

“I always grab two weeks’ worth for each person.”

“That sounds like a lot.”

“After Rey and Felicity’s trek in the desert, I’m paranoid over being overprepared with food and water.”

“Fair enough,” Aletha conceded. “Two weeks it is. But come on, Erso, sandstorms are usually three days max. How long do you think this X’us’R’iia could last?”

And so began the longest X’us’R’iia Luke would experience on Jakku.

Five days long.
I totally ended up splitting this chapter in half because the wordcount was going to be huge if I didn’t. So, no coming up next chapter, and no riddle.

Obligatory PSA due to chapter content: Don’t smoke, kids. It’s not cool, it’ll mess up your health, and it’ll probably led to a lifetime addiction and a terrible death. Frankly the only reason I have Obik be a former smoker is for a yet unwritten scene in Felicity’s backstory where they meet and I needed him to be sort of casual and inconspicuous when he collects Felicity for the Rebellion. So, he comes up next to her and starts smoking, and gradually reveals himself to her (also exactly like he does with Aletha, so you can see what Obik’s recruitment method was.)
Luke and Aletha are trapped in a tent for five days... what could possibly happen?

Writing tip for fellow authors out there: Do not name three sisters Aletha, Alecta, and Athena. It may sound fine saying it out loud, but typing out who is who and not making the names blend together is hell.

Exciting news: I have recently discovered you can add pictures on AO3, so I will be slowly adding various pictures from the actual book of Rey’s Survival Guide so you can see what I’m describing. Tell me what you think of it, and I might add more pictures for other sections.

Deep in the heart of Jakku, there is a patch of sand. It is much like any ordinary patch, flat, yellow, and stretches on endlessly into the horizon.

All the sands of Jakku have shifted at some point or another, but there are patches that can remain still for decades. Untouched and unexplored, these patches faithfully keep secure their secrets underneath.

This is one of those patches.

For years upon years, not a grain from this patch has been shifted. Sandstorms have come and gone, and not one has touched this virgin patch of sand.

The winds around the area started to pick up, and in the distance the sand started to swirl. But this patch stood firm, unyielding to the weather. But the storm came nearer and nearer every moment, and the storm become ever more violent. It would be a terrible storm that lasted for days, a X’us’R’iiia for the record books.

And for the first time in seventeen years… the sand began to shift.
Like a lot of people on Jakku, Meru doesn’t talk about how she got here, and I don’t ask. Come to think of it, that’s a good second lesson for Jakku.

DON’T ASK.

- Rey’s Survival Guide

When Luke woke in the morning, he found that the sandstorm was still blowing.

“So, I guess this date ended up going on for a lot longer than we expected,” Luke said as he and Aletha sat on their cots, eating their breakfast portions the next morning.

“Makes me regret choosing to wear this top now that I can’t change out of it,” Aletha laughed. “This is certainly not meant for sleeping in.”

“Well, you can change if you want. I promise I won’t look.”

“I’m sure I’ll survive for a few days. It’s not like I’m going to be getting this all that dirty.”

“It’s a desert; somehow, some way you will get dirty,” Luke chuckled. He glanced over at the secured tent flap for a few minutes, watching it vibrant from the winds as they howled the background. “You know, I’ve always found the sound of a sandstorm to be quite soothing. They lulled me to sleep as a child, and ever since they’ve been very relaxing as long as I’m safely inside from them.”

“That’s sweet,” Aletha smiled. “Did your sister feel the same way?”

Luke shifted awkwardly, “Actually… we grew up apart. My mother died in childbirth, my father… is a story for another day, and we were adopted by separate people. In a twist of fate, we ended up meeting somewhat by chance, and were actually friends for years before we even discovered we were siblings.”

“Oh, that’s sweet.”

“Well, not exactly.”

“What do you mean?”

“I may have been in sort of a non-competitive love triangle with my best friend over her.”

Aletha’s jaw dropped, “You’re kidding.”

“Nope, and I lost that triangle before the big revelation. The upside is that my sister ended up marrying my best friend.”

“And the downside?”

“…My sister once kissed me to make my best friend jealous.”

Aletha laughed, “And I thought my family was messed up.”

Aletha was silent, taking a moment to debate what she wanted to tell Luke.
“Look,” Luke sighed, “I know I haven’t been very forthcoming with my history, but I want to know yours. It doesn’t have to be everything, just a few questions. Why do you always say you’re not good with kids? Where is your family? Where did you come from? What happened with Antar? Whose… Mistress were you? Why did you decide to live on Jakku? I don’t need everything, but… just something to understand who you are.”

She closed her eyes, “It’s not a happy story, Luke.”

“Nor is mine,” Luke pointed mine. “My journey to living on Jakku involves my home burning down twice, my father cutting off my arm, getting a false report that my daughter had died, me deciding to be a coward and abandon everything, and my wife getting brutally murdered. Trust me, if anyone can understand a tragic backstory, it’s me.”

“You really want to know?”

“Yes.”

Aletha sighed, “Alright… the reason I chose to live on Jakku is because I can’t go home.”

Luke frowned, “Is that it? You just can’t return home so you decided to live on Jakku? Why not some other planet that’s more civilized? Coruscant is a perfect planet to disappear on.”

“I can’t go home because my sister has sworn to hunt me down and kill me.”

That shut Luke up.

“My family wasn’t a good one. At least not to me,” Aletha confessed. “They were very pro-Imperial, and when I joined the Rebellion, I betrayed them all. If I go to a civilized planet, my sister will find me and kill me.”

“I don’t understand,” Luke shook his head. “You joined the Rebellion, so your sister is going to track you down and murder you? I think Athena’s taking things too far.”

“Not Athena. Alecta,” she corrected. “Athena is dead, Luke. I told you that. And actually, it’s because of Athena’s death that Alecta wants to kill me.”

“Why? Did you make a medical mistake during surgery or something?”

“I fought in the Rebellion… and the Rebellion destroyed the Death Star.”

Luke’s eyes widened.

“Athena was working in a low-level security position on the Death Star,” Aletha explained. “She died when Skywalker blew it up.”

“I’m sorry, Aletha.”

“It’s not your fault.”

Luke almost replied that it was. He wanted so much to tell her that he was in fact Skywalker, but he couldn’t let Aletha know his identity. The second she learned who he was, the First Order would put a target on her head. He was already guiltily over the one on Quom, but he wouldn’t let what happened to Felicity to happen to Aletha.

“My sister Alecta was the closest one to Athena,” Aletha continued. “So when Athena died, Alecta swore revenge on the three people she blames for my sister’s death: Luke Skywalker for killing her, myself for betraying the family, and Rogue One for being the catalyst to everything… and also shooting Athena in the arm during her team’s escape. Actually, one of the reasons I like Rogue One so much is that I felt a bit of kindship in her after my family turned on me. And in all fairness to Alecta, we were all already reeling from Anissa’s death a few months before.”

“I’m the youngest of five girls. Adrinna, Alecta, Athena, Anissa, and Aletha. My mother’s name was Andromeda and my father was Andreas.”

Luke gave a low whistle, “And I thought my family had a lot of A names.”

“Oh, it gets better, we’re all pale skinned, blonde haired, and have blue eyes. I’m surprised I didn’t end up with someone who looks like that.”

Luke just stared at her.

“…Right,” Aletha scratched the back of her neck.

“If it makes you feel better, all the women in my family look alike… I mean literally. My wife looks as much like my mother as my sister. How I ended up with my father’s blonde hair and blue eyes is truly a miracle. Though how he had those features is a literal miracle. His mother had brown hair and brown eyes like literally all women in the family.”

“His father probably had blonde hair and blue eyes then.”

Luke decided not to mention that his parental grandfather was the literal Force.

“I’m sorry about your sisters,” Luke returned the subject to its original topic. “How did… the other one die?”

Aletha smiled at his awkward attempt, “Her name was Anissa. She was working as a teacher on Onderon, and the Rebellion and the Imperial had a skirmish. Anissa and her husband were just innocent bystanders but were killed while trying to get out to safety. It was probably a stray blaster bolt, but it’s impossible to know which side fired it. Alecta – the one who wants to kill me – was a General in the Imperial Army, so she refuses to admit that the Empire could be to blame.”

“What happened to her after the war? Imperial Generals didn’t have an easy life.”

Aletha looked away.

“What is it?” Luke could sense something was wrong.

“It doesn’t matter,” she dismissed.

“Tell me,” he insisted.

Aletha took a deep breath, “Please don’t freak out about this, okay? My sister Adrinna did maintain some contact with me throughout the years. She even knows where I am now. We were never close, but she certainly doesn’t want Alecta to kill me. Adrinna was the one who told me of Alecta’s plan to find and kill me.”

“And?”

She took another breath, “After the war, Alecta got herself caught up with a pro-Imperial organization under a very persuasive leader. She’s been able to bank on her history with the Empire and worked her way up into a powerful position.”

Luke frowned. He had a bad feeling about this.

“Aletha,” he said slowly. “What happened to your sister?”

She looked him right in the eye, “My sister is a Captain in the First Order.”

It felt like the floor disappeared from out underneath him.

“I don’t know what she calls herself these days, but I know she’s a Captain,” Aletha answered quickly. “I’m sorry I didn’t tell you sooner. I know you have some business with them, believe me, I do. But I didn’t want to drag you down further into it with my own mess.”

“Aletha-”

“I understand the severity of the situation. I was terrified when they came to Jakku looking for Rey and Felicity. Every Stormtrooper I saw, I feared that I was dealing with my own sister, come to kill me. I might have even crossed paths with her. There was that Phasma that was intent on getting answers from me.”

“Aletha, stop,” Luke grabbed her shoulders. “Take a deep breath. This isn’t that big a deal, okay? The First Order doesn’t know that you and I are connected. As for Phasma, we have no reason to think she’s Alecta. And if Phasma is your sister, we’ll deal with it, okay? Just relax.”

It took a few minutes for Aletha to settle, but Luke stayed there with reassuring words and his hands steadying her as they worked through it together.

“Maybe we should change the subject,” Luke suggested when she was okay. “What about your parents? What do they think about all of this?”

“They died years ago,” Aletha looked away. “Mom died when I was ten, and Dad when I was eighteen. Cancer got both of them. Adrinna stepped in to take Mom’s place after her passing, so she’s never really been my older sister so much as a pseudo-mother. Never mind that in addition to raising Anissa and I – Alecta and Athena were teenagers at the time – that Adrinna ended up having three kids of her own to take care of. Athena had two, but her husband was a drunk, and when he tried to get violent with her one night, Alecta showed up on their doorstep and literally threw him out onto the street. Adrinna ended up raising Athena’s two, as well as Anissa’s one.”

“Aunt Aletha.”

“Six times over, but I’ve never met Anissa’s son,” Aletha said. “My sisters, their families, and I all lived with our father in a rather large house. This meant that often I got stuck babysitting the children whether I wanted to or not.”

“Hence why you claim not to be good with them,” Luke grinned. “You don’t want to get stuck with babysitting.”

“I don’t say this lightly, but I love Rey more than any member of my family, and adore watching her for you. But yes, I use the excuse as a defence mechanism.”

“So, what made you turn to the Rebellion? You didn’t like your family?”
“They were generally indifferent to me. I was an unplanned – and somewhat unwanted – child. Anissa and Adrianna were the nicest, but Alecta was always annoyed that I was even breathing. Dad loved me, but he struggled to have our large family. Money was always tight because Adrianna was a homemaker, Anissa and her husband were in school for years, Athena couldn’t find a good paying good, Adrianna’s husband was a failed inventor, and Dad’s job had been replaced by droids. Alecta was the only one really bringing in money.”

“Trust me, I get living by every scrap of money you can find,” Luke said. “It’s how I grew up.”

“When we lost Mom, I got interested in medicine, wanting to heal people who suffered like her,” Aletha continued. “Dad was encouraging, but I knew we wouldn’t have money for med school. When he was diagnosed with cancer, my sisters encouraged me to drop out of school and stay home to help take care of my father and the children. Anissa and her husband left to go take jobs on Onderon to free up household costs. Anissa hated teaching children, hoping to someday get an Academy teaching position. Adrianna had to get a job to cover the cost of Dad’s medical treatments, and they couldn’t afford proper childcare, nor to continue to send me to school. Dad was against the idea of me dropping out of school, but after Alecta had a conversation with me about the situation, I felt for my own safety I would have to do what she wanted.”

“So you dropped out of school?”

“Sort of. I got materials for homeschooling and worked my butt off to get my diploma while staying home with Dad and the kids. He was supportive and did his best to help me. He died a month after I graduated.”

“I’m sorry,” Luke said.

“It was his final request to me to ignore the other girls and pursue my medical license,” Aletha said. “I did my research and found out that if I used my connection to Alecta, who had become a General at that point, I could do the Imperial fast track program and become a military doctor in a year, serving under my sister’s command. To my sister’s fury I did exactly that.”

“You worked with the sister who wanted to murder you?”

“She didn’t vow to kill me until after the Battle of Yavin,” Aletha corrected. “But that didn’t mean she didn’t make it hard for me to work for her. So hard that when I stumbled upon a chance meeting with Obik Kenu, I became an easy target for him to recruit.”

“How did you meet Obik?”

“He had gone undercover as a janitor in my hospital to recruit people who had been injured in battle and skirmishes, and might hold a grudge against the Empire. Three months after meeting Obik, I packed a bag and left with him to join the Rebellion.”

“What year was that?”

“6 BBY,” Aletha answered. “When did you join?”

“Joined because of the Death Star?”

Luke smirked. “Something like that. So… when did Antar come into the picture? Did you meet him right away?”
“A year later.”

“How did you meet? Was he injured in battle and he fell in love with the beautiful doctor that nursed him back to health?”

“Doctor?” Aletha laughed. “Luke, I was in the fast track program, I wasn’t a real doctor yet. The Alliance made fast tackers study for an additional three years with classes, a personal mentor, and hands on experience before they called us doctors. Until then we were referred to as Medic, but I did impress the Alliance and was upgraded six months earlier than usual. Though that’s because of how hard my mentor pushed me.”

“Who was your mentor?” Luke asked.

“I was assigned to a doctor named Jedek Haru as my mentor.”

“Wait, Jedek?” Luke startled, recalling the name. “As in your most frequent supplier, who likes Rey, and won’t stop talking about his own kids?”

“He’s a friend from my Rebel days.”

“So, where does Antar come into the picture?”

“Like I said, it was about a year into my involvement with the Rebellion. Jedek and I were in the medical office. We were waiting on standby to deal with the next patient who came in, when Major Ryoo Naberrie – the Rebel Alliance’s Head Analyst – entered the room.”

“Hey!” Ryoo whistled at the chatting doctors. “You two busy?”

“No, Ma’am,” Jedek reported as he and Aletha scrambled to stand and salute her. “Just waiting for the next patient.”

“Forget the formalities. Grab two intake kits and come with me.”

Aletha and Jedek didn’t hesitate to follow her.

To Aletha’s surprise, when they arrived in the docking bay, Nils Arlos, Head of the Recruitment Department, was waiting for them.

“Major Arlos!” Ryoo called.

“Major Naberrie,” Nils nodded to her. “I’m honoured. I would have thought they would send someone of less calibre to deal with this.”

“Are you kidding? Don’t you understand the severity of the situation? This involves Organa’s girl. She’s our highest priority asset at the moment. Without her, Citadel is just a distant dream.”

“Kenu acted as he thought appropriate in this situation. And I understand the importance of Operation Citadel.”

“I don’t think you do,” Ryoo snapped. “This project is so top secret, I don’t even have the clearance to know what it’s all about, and I headed the Brendan investigation!”

Aletha and Jedek exchanged a confused look.

“You have any idea what they’re talking about?” Jedek whispered.
“Not a one,” Aletha shook her head.

“INCOMING VESSEL,” blared over the speakers. “PREPARE FOR LANDING.”

“Look, Obik can explain himself to you soon enough,” Nils gestured to the transport that was incoming.

“Oh, I’ll make sure he does,” Ryoo glared. “As well as Organa’s girl. How stupid could a person be?”

“I think it’s quite brave and a little cunning. Almost something your aunt would have done.”

Ryoo rolled her eyes, “Fine, then I’ll invite her to have dinner with my grandparents one day. Until then, we’re going to treat this as it truly is: a very stupid risk.”

“But a risk that paid out.”

Ryoo rolled her eyes.

“Uh, Majors?” Jedek spoke up. “What are Medic Anthea and I doing here?”

Nils glanced back at the pair, “I know you two. You’re both Kenu picks, aren’t you?”

“Yes, Sir,” Aletha nodded.

“Alright, here’s what you need to know,” Nils said, “Kenu’s latest Batch got boarded by a pair of Stormtroopers. They were identified as Rebels, but before they could all be arrested, one of the recruits managed to talk the Stormtroopers not into only letting them go, but joining us. Hence why Major Nabberie is here.”

“We need to collect as much information about these two as possible,” Ryoo continued. “They could very well be spies. Do you know protocol for dealing with possible enemies?”

“Yes, Ma’am,” they answered in unison.

“Good.”

Obik Kenu looked like he knew he was in trouble when he saw Nils and Major Nabberie enter the ship, but he continued on with his final recruitment duties nonetheless.

“And so, in closing we thank you for joining in the most important battle we will ever have to fight.” Obik looked around the crowd of about twenty new recruits of different ages and species, “Ladies, Gentlemen, and other Genders… Welcome to the Rebellion.”

The crowd clapped and a few even cheered. But Obik winced when he heard Ryoo Nabberie’s loud, cold, slow clap that went on far longer than any applause.

“Major Nabberie,” Obik winced. “Ladies, Gentlemen, and other Genders, this is our Head Analyst, Ryoo Nabberie – yes, Nabberie as in Padmé Amidala’s niece. Also with her is Nils Arlos – Head of Recruitment, and two our excellent medics, Aletha Anthea and Jedek Haru.”

“Oh, you remember us,” Aletha blurted out, flattered.

“I will never forget that icy stare Major Nabberie gave me for the outburst,” Aletha chuckled.
“Ryoo Naberrie was a force to reckon with in the Rebellion,” Luke grinned, remembering the day he had first met his cousin while filling out entry paperwork after the Battle of Yavin. “She scared the crap out of me when I met her.”

“Me too,” Aletha laughed. “Scariest woman I had ever met, and my sister, Alecta is a sadist.”

“So, what happened with Obik?”

“Major Naberrie had the same question.”

“Major Naberrie, I assure you that I followed all the proper protocols,” Obik insisted. “All ships get boarded every now and then.”

“But they don’t get identified as Rebels,” Ryoo said coolly.

“How did it happen?” Nils asked. “You had all the proper identification. Have they changed something in the IDs? If so, I’m going to need to order a mass recall on our Recruitment Officers until they get up to date IDs.”

“The IDs were fine,” Obik gritted his teeth. “But we ran into complications when one of recruits was recognized.”

Nils frowned, “Who?”

Obik raised an eyebrow.

“Oh,” Nils swallowed, his eyes searching for the culprit. “Has she been compromised?”

“Her father has informed the Empire she’s defected,” Obik reported. “There was a military bulletin released. Every Stormtrooper in the Galaxy is looking for her now.”

“We’re going to have to deal with this immediately,” Ryoo said. She too looked around the crowd, “Which one of you is Organa’s girl?”

“Uh... That would be me,” the girl who would one day become Rogue One nervously stepped forward.

Luke swore his heart skipped a beat.

“Rogue One?” he blurted out. “Do you remember her?”

Aletha frowned, “Uh, sort of. Why?”

Luke tried to think of a lie, “Well... she’s a bit of a hero to you. And Rey. I just wondered if you remembered what she looked like.”

“Sadly, I don’t remember much. Only a little.”

“Tell me.”

“She was... very small.”

Luke couldn’t withhold his laugh. Felicity would have been furious to hear that that was the first thing people remembered about her.
You know… he couldn’t help but wonder if had Aletha and Felicity met, if they would have been friends. It seemed the only thing they had in common was massive sibling issues, a hell of an aim with a blaster, and their choice in men.

Still, Luke liked to think that maybe they could have been friends.

“Small… and young,” Aletha liked the smile on Luke’s face, thinking it was solely about her comment. “She had dark hair – though I couldn’t tell you for the life of me if it was black, brunette, or auburn. Uh… she wasn’t very athletic. Posh, in fact. Polished and quite weak looking. Almost like a porcelain doll you would put on display and never actually play with.”

Luke tried not the wince at the description. Aletha had no idea of the emotional abuse Felicity had suffered at the hands of her father that made her into that porcelain doll. Of course, Luke recognized that Aletha’s tale had taken place immediately after Felicity she escaped Alaric’s grip, so she wouldn’t be the kick ass woman Luke later fell in love with.

And yet he knew that if he had met her all the way back then, he would have loved her all the same.

“But I think the word that described her most in that moment,” Aletha paused, “…was scared.”

“I’m... uh…” Rogue One glanced briefly at Obik. “I’m the one the Organas sent. I was Leia’s assistant for a few years. I’ve met your sister, actually. Lovely woman, Pooja.”

“You? You’re Organa’s girl?” Major Naberrie fixed Rogue One with an impressed look that would have even made Darth Vader shrink back.

Luke couldn’t help but think that Vader would have shrunk back because he knew Ryoo had the exact same angry glare as his mother… And he knew that because it was the exact same one Leia had used to keep Han Solo in line for years.

“Yes, Ma’am,” Rogue One nodded.

Ryoo looked back at Nils, “Well… I guess considering my aunt was Queen and stopped an invasion even younger, I can’t really criticize this one.”

“Major Naberrie, why don’t I with her and Obik, and we all have a little chat about recruitment protocol?” Nils suggested.

“I can consent to that,” Ryoo nodded. “Besides, it’s those two I’m interested in.”

Ryoo jerked her head towards two young men. They no longer wore the white armour of Stormtroopers, but their underclothes, boots, and gloves were undeniably Imperial issue.

“Come forward,” Ryoo ordered the young men.

The pair looked at each other, and then in perfect unison took a step forward.

“Let’s make one thing clear and simple,” Ryoo folded her arms behind her back and drew herself up to full height. “I do not trust either you. You joined us in very suspect circumstances and are very likely spies the Empire moved to plant within us. So I will be forthcomin in telling you that if you do prove to be moles, I will not hesitate to kill you, and I will sleep just fine afterwards. Well, not fine, my husband snores, but that’s none of your concern. Am I clear?”
“Yes, Ma’am,” the pair said together.

Luke remembered Ryoo giving him and Han the exact same speech – Jagrav snoring comment and all – and receiving the same terrified response. In fact, as they left Ryoo’s office after their induction interview, Han had declared that if he had owed Ryoo money instead of Jabba, he sure as hell would have paid her back ages ago.

“Alright then,” Ryoo continued. “Now as I don’t trust you-”

“Major Naberrie, I assure you I want nothing but to fight to bright down this awful Empire,” one of the Stormtroopers – a mustachioed man – said.

Ryoo glared, “Assurances get you nothing. Only action proves intent. And you will speak only when spoken to.”

“Yes, Ma’am,” the mustachioed man.

“Since you are so eager to talk,” Ryoo went on, “I am going to ask each of you in turn to answer five simple questions. I don’t care about anything more than the answers to these five questions, so no extra flattery. It won’t do you any good.”

“And what are the questions?” the mustachioed man asked.

Ryoo’s look was deadly.

“Apologies,” the mustachioed man bowed his head.

“The questions are as follows: Your full name, your age, your planet of origin, length of service in the Imperial Military – academy years do not count – and why you chose to listen to a little girl and join the Rebellion. And your answer better be good. Since you, boy seem to be quite the chatterbox, you get to speak first. GO.”

“Biggs Darklighter,” the man answered hurriedly. He had dark hair, tanned skin, and seemed to exude confidence. “Nineteen years old, born, bred, and raised on Tatooine. It’s a desert planet in the Outer Rim where-”

“I’m familiar with Tatooine,” Ryoo cut him off. “My uncle was from there.”

Luke blinked. He knew that his Aunt Sola had discovered the truth about Anakin and Padmé’s relationship shortly after Padmé’s death, and that she had shared it with the family, but he had no idea Ryoo so openly referred to Anakin as her uncle… even if she refused to namedrop him.

Also his head nearly exploded at the thought of his almost girlfriend, his late wife, his cousin, his childhood best friend, and his second Jedi student all being in the same room. Sure one in three Rebels knew each other, but that was admittedly a fairly unbelievable cocktail.

It was almost as if whatever being wrote the fate of the world was addicted to making everything connect to him.

“Right,” Biggs nodded. “Uh, I’ve served in the Imperial Military for two months – I’m fresh out of the Academy. This was my first assignment. And the reason I joined is that I’ve lived under both the oppression and indifference of the Empire, and I’m willing to die to ensure the people I love live in peace and comfort.”

Luke suddenly felt very guilty about living in an AT-AT walker in the middle of a desert planet. At least it was a different planet.

…Under worse conditions.

Blast it, Biggs!

Ryoo looked at Biggs for a long time; no expression on her face.

“Doctor Haru,” Ryoo finally ordered Jedek, “give our new recruit a full medical evaluation. We’ll discuss further arrangements when your background check comes through.”

“Yes, Ma’am,” Biggs nodded, eying Jedek warily as he pulled various threatening looking instruments out of his induction kit. The poor man had no idea what the procedure for unexpected defectors was while background checks were being processed.

“And you,” Ryoo turned to the other man. “Speak.”

The man nodded, “Yes, Ma’am. My name is Antar Kymeri.”

Aletha smiled to herself at the memory, “The first thing I remember about seeing Antar for the first time was how handsome he was. He was tall with black cropped hair, almost buzzed to his skull. His skin was the colour of rosewood, deep and dark with a slight tone of red. His eyes were grey and always a little hard. His body was bulky, well-muscled, his hands large, and his stern lips plump and… delicious.”

Luke raised an eyebrow.

“Hey, I had to listen to this stuff about Felicity for four years,” Aletha smirked. “You can listen to my lovers’ ramblings over Antar.”

“Go on,” Ryoo instructed Antar.

“I am twenty-three years old,” Antar said, “I have served in the Imperial Military for four years, in the Airforce mind you. Darklighter and I are not simple foot soldiers.”

“I told you no extra comments, and you skipped where you came from.”

“I’m from Faclov.”

The temperature in the room dropped.

“I assume I don’t need to cite my reason for joining,” Antar said coolly.
Ryoo crossed her arms, “Who did you lose?”

“My fiancée and her parents. They were shopping at Antilles Fine Imports for things for our wedding when the bombs went off. They got hit the worst because they were nearest the biggest one targeting that Brandon boy.”

“Brendan,” Rogue One interrupted softly. When all eyes turned on her, she bowed her head shyly. “His name is… was Brendan.”

“Brendan,” Antar nodded at her.

“Allright,” Ryoo nodded. “Medic Anthea will examine you.”

“You two stay here with the doctors,” Nils ordered. He looked to Rogue One, “Everyone go with Obik, except for you, Miss. I want to have a word with you.”

“Yes, Sir,” Rogue One nodded.

“Hello there,” Antar said as Aletha approached him and the crowd dispersed.

“Hello,” Aletha smiled for the first time at the man who would become her husband.

“Medic Anthea is it?” Antar asked. “Anthea’s a pretty name.”

“Actually it’s my surname. My first name is Aletha.”

“Even more beautiful.”

Aletha raised an eyebrow, “It’s not advised to hit on a medic who is examining you.”

“Forgive me, Miss but my fiancée was just brutally murdered a few months ago. I’m not flirting, I’m just friendly.”

“As long as you don’t get handsy, I’ll be fine. Roll up your sleeve. I need to check your pulse.”

Antar obediently rolled up his sleeve exposing his muscly and slightly hairy arm.

“So…” Aletha said as she mentally counted his pulse, “what was her name?”

“Vina Dervito,” Antar answered with a bittersweet smile.

“Pretty?”

“Most beautiful woman I’ve ever laid my eyes on.”

Aletha chuckled, “I’m sorry you’re stuck seeing me.”

“Well, not as beautiful to me as her, but certainly not hard on the eyes.”

Aletha fell silent.

Her eyes were lowered and a deep sadness shined in them, “I never could forget what he said that day. Vina was the absolute love of his life… and as hard as I tried, I was never as beautiful or brave or smart or better – not even better, but never simply even equal to her.”
Luke reached forward and clasped her hand, “I’m sure he did think you were better with something.”

“I know what it’s like to be second best, Luke. It’s what I’ve always been. With my family. With Antar… with you.”

He reached forward and lifted her chin, forcing Aletha to look into his eyes.

“You are never second best to me,” Luke promised. “You have your virtues and faults, but so did Felicity. The way I feel about her would never compromise the way I feel about you.”

Aletha let herself smile a little, “I feel like that wouldn’t be true if she was alive.”

“I examined him in the ship while Jedek did Darklighter. Antar spent the whole time telling me about Vina. They were childhood best friends, literally growing up next door to each other. When they were thirteen, they decided to date each other for practice at that sort of thing, and they just never stopped practising. When Antar was sixteen, his parents died in a speeder accident, and he was taken in by her family. Vina was studying to be a teacher, and they were going to get married in eight months, and have children two years after that. She was shopping for her wedding veil when the bombing happened. Antar didn’t learn about the bombing until three weeks later, being out on deployment at the time. He didn’t get death confirmation until two months after the bombing, and hadn’t been able to get home yet to deal with everything, so some of Vina’s relatives dealt with funeral arrangements and such.”

“Well, I’m truly sorry for your loss,” Aletha told him. “The bombing affected so many people.”

“Sometimes I think I’m lucky I avoided the bombing, but other days… maybe I should have been there.”

“You think you could have protected her?”

“No, I should have gone up in a blaze of glory. When I die, I want my death to mean something… because, I’ve lost everything.”

“Hence the defection,” Aletha nodded. “Trust me, I’ve been there. I’ve burnt my bridges to the ground. Roll up your sleeve.”

“What are you doing?” Antar obeyed, but warily eyed the syringe she was prepping.

“Just a small shot we give to all incoming recruitments. Prevent infections and such. Hold still?”

Antar made no fuss as she injected him.

“Perfect,” Aletha disposed of the syringe. “Antar?”

“Yes?”

“I would like to apologize.”

“For what?”

“Lying to you,” Aletha answered. “That needle isn’t a vaccination… it’s a very powerful tranquilizer.”
“What?” Biggs exclaimed as Jedek finished injecting him.

“Oh, she’s right,” Jedek nodded. “We’re knocking you guys right out.”

“Why?”

“We can’t have you running around our base until your background checks are completed,” Aletha said. She looked at Antar, “You might want to sit down. These tranqs hit hard and fast.”

Antar shook his head, “No, I don’t believe you. You’re joking right?”

“Why would I joke about that?”

“Come on, you’re just messing with me. I’m not gonna-”

Antar hit the ground face first.

The pair looked at him casually, and then turned their gazes on Biggs.

“I’ll sit down,” Biggs said.

Teng Malar sat in the corner of Old Meru’s tent, shivering. A thin blanket was wrapped around his shoulders as he huddled in a ball trying to keep warm.

He struggled to keep his mind off the growl in his stomach. He hadn’t gotten any dinner from Meru that night. She had insisted they save their portions and ration them very strictly, which meant no dinner.

Of course, he had seen her consume half a portion when she thought he was taking a nap. But Meru was not someone to argue with.

He was so cold, not just from the winds, but from his starvation. The boy was little more than skin and bones, and probably about three inches shorter than he ought to be. At this point, the shivering was second nature to him, as was the growl in his stomach. Teng didn’t remember the last time he had had a full meal.

Struggling to push the thought from his mind, he wracked his brain to think of something more pleasant.

Rey’s smile had been pleasant.

Then again, he wasn’t sure if she had actually smiled at him or he was just imagining it. Either way, he was sure her smile would be lovely.

Teng wished he could have been able to convince her to show him her drawing book. He, himself loved to draw and would have liked to discussed techniques. Teng had seen her sitting at the table using her charcoal pencils. He admired how concentrated she had been.

Smiling to himself, Teng rummaged through his things and found paper and a pencil. On the top of the page he wrote SHIPS OF THE GRAVEYARD. The Y in graveyard was a little bit backwards, but he hadn’t gotten the best education.
He settled down with his blanket and supplies and started sketching the various shipwrecks in the desert. Next time he saw Rey Erso, he’d quiz her on the types, and maybe even get her to label them. Maybe her writing looked nicer than his. He only hoped she liked the picture.

![Sketch of ships in the desert with labels for different types of ships]

Teng didn’t know it, but years later, Rey would tape that picture into her guide, Teng’s title standing proud on the page, and her own penmanship labeling the types of ships.

It was one of many pictures Teng drew that ended up in her Guide.

Luke couldn’t sleep that night as he laid on Aletha’s extra medical cot. He was so nervous about Rey and Quom. They had made it to the walker, right? Oh, he couldn’t remember.

Glancing at Aletha, he was surprised to find her tossing and turning in her own cot.

“You okay?” he asked.

Aletha sighed and settled on her side to face him, “Not really. I hate sandstorms. I’m always worried that something bad is going to happen. I hate being alone, vulnerable, and trapped.”

“Well, you are trapped but you’re certainly not alone.” Luke smirked, “Vulnerable is debatable.”

Aletha grinned, “Should I be on guard for the unrespectable intentions of a fugitive scavenger on the run from the First Order with a mysterious past?”
“Maybe you should.” Luke teased, “People who get involved with my family typically meet very unfortunate fates.”

“Well, I can’t imagine my situation getting a whole lot worse.”

“Shh! The Galaxy might hear and take that as a challenge.”

“Well, my lips are sealed,” Aletha pressed a finger to her lips. “Don’t want to jinx it.”

Luke just chuckled.

They sat in a comfortable silence for a while.

“You know, it’s rather cold in here,” Aletha said slyly.

“No.”

“Did… Did you want mine?”

“No. That won’t be enough.”

Luke was confused.

“I think the only proper way to do this will be through body heat,” Aletha declared.

Luke raised a brow, “Body heat?”

“It doesn’t need to be much. Maybe we push our cots together and lay back to back?”

“It’s worth a shot.”

So, they did just that.

Luke’s heart raced as he laid close to a woman – who wasn’t his daughter – for the first time since the final night he had made love to Felicity on Rornian.

But that didn’t seem to be enough for Aletha.

“I don’t know,” Aletha shifted. “I’m still pretty cold. I think maybe resting front to front would be the best way to stay warm.”

“Well, you are the doctor,” Luke nervously shifted onto his other side. His breathing got heavier as he found himself face to face with Aletha. “Comfortable?”

“Very,” she smiled. “This isn’t too awkward for you, is it?”

“No… Well, maybe a little, but I’ll be fine.”

“Good. Just let me know if you don’t find this comfortable.”

But it seemed that both Luke and Aletha found the position very comfortable. By the time they woke the next morning, all four of their arms had magically ended up wrapped around the other’s body.

And neither seemed to mind.
The wind blew hard on the virgin patch of desert. The sands that had been secured for almost two decades were violently throw apart by the wind.

Harder and harder, the sand was torn apart, forcing the desert to peel back its layers to what lie beneath. It would be hard to see among the flurry of blinding sand, but if you squinted at just the right spot, you would see something starting to emerge from the sand…

“So, when did you and Antar get together?” Luke asked.

After the story of her meeting with Antar, Aletha had spent the rest of the day trying to get more answers about Luke’s own mysterious past. She hadn’t gotten a lot of success, but found him to be quite open on the topics of Rey, Felicity, and his unnamed sister. He of course refused to tell him the name of his sister because apparently, she would figure out who he was… somehow.

“It took a while,” Aletha admitted. “Like he said, he had just lost his fiancée so he wasn’t looking for romance. In fact, when we first met again he was actually looking for an apology. So the next morning, he tracked me down at breakfast and demanded one in front of the whole table of my colleagues.”

“What did you do?”

“Usually I would have just bowed my head and meekly offered one, but… I don’t know. There was something about the way he did it that triggered something in me. I think it was because it reminded me of how Alecta used to chastise me in front of her soldiers. The next thing I knew I had grabbed Antar by the arm and dragged him off to yell at him.”

“Who do you think you are?” Aletha exclaimed.

“Excuse me?” Antar raised his eyebrows. The Medic had dragged him into an empty corridor so they had some semblance of privacy.

“Look, I get it, you’re mad about me drugging you but I was just following orders.”

“Nonsensical orders. They handcuffed me to a hospital bed for three hours!”

“Because you joined under extremely suspect circumstances and we needed to make sure you weren’t a spy who was going to betray us to the Empire.”

“Why would I do that? I hate the Empire; they took everything from me!”

“You think, you’re the only with that sob story?” Aletha shot. “They just murdered a girl’s brother, filmed it, showed it to her, filmed her reaction, and then pinned it on us. They’ve burned down home, slaughtered innocents, taken away basic rights. We get it, the Empire is bad, hence why we’re here to fight against it. We are not your enemies, and if you continue to walk around with some martyr complex, no one’s going to cover your back in battle.”

“I’m not a martyr, but they made the woman I love into one.”

“And if you walk back into the cafeteria, you’ll find another two dozen people with the same story. You want to die? Go off and do so, I won’t stop you. But if you want to honour her memory and fight for the future she should have been able to live, then you need to shape up. We’re an Alliance, not a free for all.”

“I remember the way Antar looked at me after that speech,” Aletha grinned fondly at the memory. “There was this slight smile that crept across his face. Next thing I knew, I was having breakfast with him, alone in a corner table when most everyone had finished. He told me about his first terrifying hours in the Rebellion until Ryoo Naberrie finally declared him okay to join the Rebellion. It took the other guy who joined him another hour to get clearance because apparently men from Tatooine got automatically flagged in the system for some reason.”

Luke withheld a smirk. It was discovered shortly after Luke joined the Rebellion that Bail Organa himself had put in that flag system to tip him off should the son of Anakin Skywalker ever attempt to join the Alliance without Bail and Obi-Wan’s knowledge. It had given Ryoo so much of a headache to sort it all out that Luke wasn’t “officially” a member of the Alliance until four whole months after destroying the Death Star.

“True to his declaration, Antar and his companion were both pilots,” Aletha continued. “The other guy got some spot in Red Squadron while Antar was assigned to the Tierfon Yellow Aces.”

“As in Dosmit Raeh, the owner of Rey’s helmet,” Aletha grinned. “How do you think I knew her? She was Antar’s commanding officer, and quite the strict woman.”

“Very no nonsense,” Antar reported as he and Aletha lingered over their breakfasts. “Woman was a little scary.”

Aletha had been assigned the late shift – though thankfully not the night shift – so she could enjoy a long meal. Antar could also as he was not yet in a set routine in the Alliance and wasn’t expected anywhere for a while.

“Dosmit does have a bit of a reputation,” Aletha chuckled. “Last time she dislocated her arm, she wouldn’t let the Med team fix it. Just popped it right back in place.”

“Last time? How many times has she dislocated her arm?”

“Antar, if you’re going to be a pilot, you probably shouldn’t get too attached to having all your limbs… No pun intended.”

He shook his head, “Are all the women in this Rebellion tough as nails? First Naberrie, then Raeh, and I’ve heard things about my physical combat trainer, some woman named Rain-”

“Reine Agim,” Aletha corrected. “And yes, she’s pretty tough as well. Word of advice, don’t be the arrogant guy that thinks because his pair of instructors are a woman and a blind man – by the way, Ji-Dan Hayato is the sweetest man you’ll ever meet, but can beat you up so hard – that he is better
“at fighter than them. They will take you down, and then they will laugh about it.”

“So, I guess it’s true then. All the women in the Rebellion are tough as nails.”

“Well, not everyone. I’m not.”

Antar grinned, “Like I said, all the women.”

Aletha couldn’t stop her blush.

“We became friends soon enough,” Aletha told Luke. “You know as a pilot that you lot didn’t stay stationed in one area for very long, but I saw Antar from time to time over the years. Whenever we saw each other we would share meals and downtime, telling each other all about our pasts. His favorite topic was Vina, telling me all about her likes, dislikes, how she looked, how she spoke, what she did, what her dreams had been, all the memories they made, and how much he loved her. Vina was his one true love, and nothing would ever change that.”

“So how did you end up marrying him?” Luke frowned.

Aletha sighed, “About two years into his joining, Antar decided that he was ready to put himself out there again and start dating. It had been so long, and he was vulnerable, so he wasn’t sure how to do it. He wanted a nice way to transition back into the dating scene. Antar suggested that we practiced dating by going out with each other as I never really had had a relationship and didn’t know how to do the whole dating thing either.”

“Practice dating?”

“You can see where this is going. It was on our third date that he kissed me. Afterwards, he smiled at me and said, just for practice. On our next date, I kissed him and said the same thing. We had several dates, each time finding new things to practice, and then on our tenth date…”

Antar slammed Aletha against the wall of her sleeping quarters. His lips were on hers, her legs were around his waist, and their hands were fumbling at the hems of each other’s clothes.

“Are you sure your roommate isn’t going to interrupt?” Antar asked, his lips roaming up and down her neck. The next day she would have to awkwardly explain the hickey to Dosmit Raeh when he overslept his morning drills.

As well as the ones Aletha left on him.

“Jedek was deployed this morning. Wait, Antar.” Aletha reluctantly pulled away, “Wait.”

“What is it?” he frowned.

She took a deep breath, “Are we- Are we still practising?”

Antar grinned, “No… but there is something I’m out practice with. Want to refresh my memory?”

Aletha grinned, “I’d love to.”

“Two bouts of foreplay, one discussion about protection, and three orgasms between us later, Antar told me for the first time that he loved me,” Aletha smiled at the memory.

“So it was happily ever after for the two of you after that?” Luke asked. “You know, up until his death?”

Aletha’s smile fell, “No… It wasn’t.”

“As much as he loved me – and he did love me – Antar could never get over Vina. I gave him all of me, but I could always feel him draw back a little. It wasn’t uncommon for him to mention that he wondered what Vina would have thought of me. Whether she’d be happy about him moving on. I accepted it all, thinking it was just hard to let go but that one day he would. I tried my best to be everything he wanted, but I always fell short of the mark. But silly me thought I could be that for him. I thought I could be enough…”

Aletha loved the sound of Antar’s snoring while he slept next to her. It was the middle of the night, and he had fallen asleep holding her tenderly. She couldn’t sleep, so she watched his chest rise and fall with steady breaths.

“I love you, Antar,” Aletha whispered, lightly stroking his cheek. “You make me feel so alive.”

Antar had the habit of talking in his sleep when he was in deep slumber, so she wasn’t surprised when he answered her.

“Not as alive as you make me feel,” Antar mumbled. “You are my everything, My Darling.”

“I’ve never been as happy as this.”

“There is no sorrow in this world when you’re around. You are my reason to live and fight.”

“Oh, Antar… I love you so much.”

“I love you too, Vina.”

“I could feel my heart break,” Aletha struggled to fight back her tears. “I know it was just an utterance in a deep slumber, so I shook it off and didn’t tell him what happened… But then two weeks later, he accidentally called me Vina. It was while we were doing up the laundry that needed to be collected. He just said, don’t forget my flight suit, Vina. It broke my heart again. He was horrified and immediately apologized, so I brushed it off.”

She paused.

“And then it happened again… and again… and again. Soon enough it became a habit, and though he would apologize and promise that he loved and wasn’t thinking about her, it would continue to happen. The day I decided to stop correcting him, I realized that I wasn’t his girlfriend, I was his Mistress. And I would never be anything but his second best.”

And so, Luke held her that night as she cried over the hurt that had never gone away.

Day Three
It was emerging slowly from the sand, the monstrous structure of twisted metal. It was battered from the impact of hitting the ground, scratched from the corrosion of the sand particles shifting over it for years, and scorched from a fire long ago put out.

The sand covering it blew far away over the desert, returning the machine to the earth above. Little by little, pieces emerged until the monstrous metal transformed into a familiar ship.

It was a ship.

“I did stand up for myself to him,” Aletha told Luke the next day. “I put up with our issues for two years until I finally had had enough. I told him that I wasn’t Vina, I never would be Vina, and I didn’t want to be her. So if he wanted just a girl who could pretend to be her, then he needed to find someone new.”

“But I don’t want you to be her!” Antar exclaimed. “I only want you!”

He was aware of the dozens of eyes on them. Aletha had decided the best time to confront him was while he had been in the middle of tuning up his X-Wing in front of everyone else in the hanger.

“And I only want you,” Aletha retorted. “But you won’t give me that!”

“You have me.”

“But not all of you! If we’re going to be together, I need all of you to be with me, not just part.”

“Aletha,” Antar shook his head. “I love you, I truly do… But part of me will always belong to Vina.”

It took Aletha everything she had not to cry.

“No, Antar,” she shook her head. “You can have all of me, or none of me… And I won’t accept anything less.”

Antar sighed, “Aletha-”

“Kymeri!” a voice called.

The pair turned to see Dosmit Raeh in full flight suit marching towards them.

“Suit up, Kymeri!” Dosmit ordered. “We’re being deployed.”

“Yes, Captain,” Antar nodded. He turned back to Aletha, “We’ll talk more when I get back.”

She shook her head, “No, Antar. This is over.”

“But Aletha-”

“Goodbye Antar Kymeri.”

As she marched away, she didn’t look back.
“Good for you, Aletha,” Jedek said as he, Aletha, and a few other doctors tended to those who had been injured in the battle Antar had been summoned for. “I mean, I like the guy, but I think you deserve better.”

“I just wish I could have made things work,” Aletha sighed. “I love him so much.”

“Doctor Anthea!” a voice called.

Aletha once more found herself turning to view Dosmit Raeh calling for her. Her long, curly hair looked particularly wild that day, and her face was stern and sullen.

“May I have a moment?” Dosmit asked respectfully. “It’s about Antar.”

“I don’t want to talk about him,” Aletha dismissed.

“Doctor Anthea, I insist. Let’s go somewhere private and-”

“Whatever you have to say, you can say it to me here.”

Dosmit’s eyes narrowed, “Fine. Aletha Anthea, I regret to inform that Antar Kymeri was shot down during battle. We have yet to recover his body, but he is presumed to be killed in action. I’m sorry for your loss. Have a nice day.”

Dosmit turned on her heel and left.

“I broke down right there in the middle of the medical center,” Aletha told Luke. “Jedek held me as I cried until the commander released me from service for the night. I spent the next three nights utterly devastated. How could he have been killed? It hurt so much, and it was even worse to know that our last exchange had been a fight.”

Luke narrowed his eyes, “This isn’t his death, right? You hadn’t married him yet.”

“No, this isn’t the story of Antar’s death. This is the story of how he lost his arm. He was shot down in battle and knocked out for about a day. When he woke, he was injured but not dead. His communications had been destroyed in the crash, and his arm was pinned in the machinery. He fought to survive for two days, unable to escape his trapped arm. Three days after the battle, Antar made the hardest decision in his life: in order to escape and get back to me, he cut off his own arm. By the time he was returned to the Alliance, he had passed out from blood loss, and his amputation was infected. I remember the shock and horror when he was wheeled into my medical center. They dismissed me from treating him due to my personal interest in the matter, but I didn’t leave his bedside for a week.”

“I am so sorry,” Aletha sobbed at his bedside clutching him tightly. His new false arm was cold and hard, but she was just so happy to be back in his arms. “I’m sorry for fighting with you.”

“No, it’s okay,” Antar kissed along her shoulders, clutching her like a lifeline. “I’m so sorry for making you feel so unwanted. I love you, Aletha. I truly do, and I’m sorry that I’ve made you think otherwise.”

“I know you love me, it’s just—”

“I understand. I’ve been horrible about all of this. Vina’s gone, and you’re my future.”

“Oh, Antar.”

He pulled away from her, “Do you know what I was thinking when I was trapped in that wreck?”

Aletha shook her head.

“I thought of you. Your love kept me alive. As I laid there, all I could think was that I had to get back to you, to make things right. I promised myself that if I escaped this, I was going to fix things with you, be a better man. You kept me alive, Aletha. I love you.”

Tears filled her eyes, “I love you too, Antar.”

He pulled her in for a passionate kiss. She cried as she felt a wave of joy, love, and relief pass over her.

“Oh, Antar,” she sighed when they had broken apart. “What do we do now?”

Antar grinned, “I think the answer is very clear, My Dear.”

Aletha smiled, entwining her hand with his, “Yes... I think it is.”

“I married him.”

What do I do when I’m home? Mostly, I refurbish gear at my workbench – it costs too much to make extensive repairs at Unkar’s washing tables in Niima

- Rey’s Survival Guide

“And... there!” Rey declared as she stepped away from the wall. “Another day, another scratch. Hey, toss me a water bottle, Quom, I’m thirsty.”

“Head’s up, MG,” Quom threw the cannister as he tinkered with an old broken flights comm system.

Rey took a very measured drink and resealed the bottle.

“You know you can have more, right?” Quom lifted an eyebrow.

“Not right now. We need to save it.”

“We’ve got seven others.”

“Quom! We need to take special care that we have enough food and water to last the trip.”
He blinked, “What trip?”

Rey frowned, startled by her own words, “I… Don’t know. There’s no trip. I meant sandstorm.”

He stared at her for a long while.

“Young mom said that to you, didn’t she?” Quom figured it out. “When you did your trek.”

“Maybe?” Rey sadly shrugged and sat on her hammock. She fiddled with her Felicity doll, which had been sitting on her pillow, “I don’t really remember the walk. Just something about digging holes and being half-brave.”

“What? You don’t remember your mom almost shooting me?”

“No, but I think I remember her offering to make out with you in exchange for one of Plutt’s pills.”

“Yeah,” Quom laughed awkwardly. “Make out with me. That’s… definitely what she offered. Hey, by the way, don’t ever tell your dad about that.”

“I’m eleven, not stupid.”

“I guess. And I guess the reason you and your dad are so paranoid about rationing food and water is because of the whole dying from heat stroke thing.”

“It’s not an experience I would recommend.”

“How would you know? You can’t remember it.”

Rey threw her pilot doll at the laughing Quom.

“So,” Quom said slyly as he sat aside the doll, “is that also why you still do the scratches and keep your hair the way your mom did it?”

Rey looked away, “I don’t know what you’re talking about.”

“MG, I once bit a guy in the neck to protect you. I’ve earned the right to have you not lie to me.”

She sighed, “Alright, I know what you’re talking about, but that’s not why I do it.”

“Why do you do it, then?”

“I don’t want to talk about it.”

“Rey.”

“…Fine. But you have to swear to me that what I’m about to say you’ll keep a secret.”

“I promise.”

“Don’t promise. Swear to me!” Rey’s voice was desperate. “Not even Dad or Aletha can know. Swear it, Quom.”

“Alright, I swear it,” Quom said. “Now what’s the big secret?”

Rey took a deep breath, “Quom, the reason I keep doing the scratches on the wall, and keep my hair the same is that… I think my mom’s still alive.”
His jaw dropped, “WHAT?”

“I know it’s crazy-”

“It’s beyond crazy. Rey, I’m sorry to be the bearer of bad news but your mom is absolutely dead.”

“Is she? Dad said they never got to bury Mom’s body, right?”

“…Yes,” Quom did not like where this conversation was going.

“And Dad didn’t get to see her die, right?”

“Well… he wasn’t there.” Quom was fairly certain Luke hadn’t told Rey about the recording Luke had of Felicity’s death.

“Right,” Rey smiled. “Well, a while back I was thinking about that, and I realized that, it doesn’t quite add up.”

“It adds up a lot more than you know.”

“No, it doesn’t!” Rey insisted.

“Yes, it does!” Quom snapped. “Look you’re really young and maybe your Dad hasn’t told you the full story yet, but when he does you’re going to realise that your mom – as sad as it may be – could not have possibly escaped from her death. I’m sorry, but it’s true.”

Rey glared at him, “Well, I don’t believe it’s true, and until I one hundred percent do believe that, I’m not taking out these hair buns.”

Quom sighed sadly.

“I’m going to go study a few schematics,” Rey got to her feet. She snatched her data reader from the storage crate she used as a bedside table, and grabbed the small pouch that held all the data chips she and Luke had recovered over the years.

“I’m sorry, Rey. But you have to accept the truth!”

“Not until I see it with my own eyes.”

As Rey stomped away deeper into the walker, Quom groaned and looked down at the doll of Luke propped next to him.

“Well, I tried my best,” he told the Luke doll. He patted it on the head, “Good luck dealing with the rest of that.”

The Luke doll said nothing.

Day Four

In the climax of the storm it was impossible to see anything, but there was no turning back for the hidden ship. It would be returned to the surface fully by the completion of the X’us’R’iia.
Nose and tip and tail emerged. There was no denying what type of ship had been hidden all those years in the sand.

A Rebellion X-Wing.

“I think the winds are starting to die down,” Luke declared while they finished dinner that night. He frowned when he saw Aletha smirking at him, “What?”

“You got ration in your beard,” Aletha laughed.

“Oh, sorry,” he reached.

“No, I’ll get it.”

Aletha took his plate from him and set it on the ground, beside their combined cots. They had continued to sleep in each other’s arms every night. She reached up and very slowly dragged a thumb across his lip. Aletha had removed the offending beard stain, but still she kept her hand in place.

“Got it?” Luke asked quietly, too afraid to move.

“Yes,” Aletha whispered.

It wasn’t clear which one of them was the one leaning forward – it could have been both – but moments later their lips were mere millimetres away from touching. At the last second, Luke decided to take a bold risk, and he stroked his fingers up Aletha’s bare back.

Sadly that seemed to shake her out of her reverie.

“We shouldn’t,” Aletha pulled back.

She moved to stand but Luke pulled her back down.

“We should,” Luke continued to stroke up her spine.

How strange it was to do this gesture and not feel the rough scar of his father’s destruction. Aletha’s back felt almost strange to him, but it was soft and warm, and he wanted to touch so much more.

That was when Aletha’s eyes fell on the chain around his neck, “You still carry her rings around?”

Damn it.

Luke pulled back from her, “Only because I’m worried about safekeeping them from thieves.”

“Thieves like Quom?” Aletha grinned.

“You know, I honestly don’t think he even knew what to do with them when he blackmailed them from Felicity. He was probably just really surprised his little act worked. Imagine what would have happened if Felicity knew what Quom was really like.”

“I probably would have to patch up more than Rey’s heatstroke.”

“Oh, he’d be dead. I love Felicity, but she was the kind of woman that if she was armed with a blaster, you know it was going to be fired by the end of the day.” Luke paused, “I’m sorry if wearing her rings makes you uncomfortable.”

“It’s okay.” Aletha leaned over to a locked cabinet that sat next to her cot. She unlocked it, opened the top drawer, and pulled out a small bronze ring set with a single minuscule pearl, “This is my wedding ring. Not very fancy, but we were fighting in a war. I was lucky to get this.”

“It’s lovely,” Luke took off his chain that held Felicity’s rings. He set it on top the cabinet, “I won’t pretend that my wedding day wasn’t one of the happiest days of my life. Rivalled only by the actual best day of my life: when Rey was born.”

“It’s literally the happiest day of my life,” Aletha smiled and set her ring down next to Felicity’s. “We eloped a few days after Antar was released from the hospital and we took a few weeks off for a honeymoon. We literally just went to another Rebel base and stayed in our room for a week. We were so happy after his accident. When I thought I could have lost him, I was more forgiving of his transgressions.”

“So, he continued to give you the same problems?”

“Surprisingly enough, marrying Antar didn’t fix our problems, and in fact might have made them worse,” Aletha sadly continued her story. “He tried; I swear he did, but… it wasn’t enough. I still was only second best to Vina. I put up with it for the rest of the war. Yavin happened two years later, and after that we found ourselves apart a lot. Every time he went in battle, I held my breath, but he fought and come home to me. Sometimes he won, sometimes he lost, but he would always come home to me.”

Luke felt very bittersweet about the story. He wondered vaguely what would have happened if he had met Aletha during the war. Would they have gotten together? What if they had? What if they had gotten together before he met Felicity? Would they have lived happily ever after? What would have happened if he met Felicity after meeting Aletha? He mentally sighed; lifetimes were wasted on what ifs. Nothing could change the fact that he, Felicity, and Aletha had all spent the war lonely.

Well, actually Felicity had been with Pax for the last year, but things had not ended with happily ever after.

“You’re thinking about her,” Aletha murmured.

“I’m sorry,” Luke said. “You have my full attention.”

“Promise?”

Luke opened the cabinet drawer, pushed in both Felicity’s and Aletha’s rings, and closed the cabinet.

“Antar didn’t bring up Vina anymore after our wedding,” Aletha continued as his other hand stroked up and down her back. “Never mentioned her name in front of me, but still, I knew he had moved on. Every time we touched or kiss, a part of him still held back. I wasn’t asking for much. I didn’t need him to forget Vina, just for him to love me. But he couldn’t do both. After Endor we started to make plans for what we would do after the war. We discussed places to live, and the children we wanted to have. I… I had had an early term miscarriage a few months after the Battle of Hoth. We weren’t planning on the pregnancy, but still it broke my heart.”
Luke winced. He still remembered how hard Leia had cried after the miscarriage the wrecked her reproductive system so badly that it ensured Ben would be an only child.

“We agreed that we wanted to have children immediately after the war. One day we were discussing baby names. I told him that I would absolutely not name my children names that all started and ended with the same letter. Not another Alecta/Aletha/Athena muddle. I would also not name them anything starting with a Ky. No stupid Athena Anthea situation.”

Aletha paused.

“Then he told me what he wanted to name our firstborn daughter… Vina.”

Luke’s hand froze on her back.

“I lost it on him. It was the fight to end all fights. I understand he intent behind wanting to name his daughter that, but it was like a dam inside of me had blown. I had had enough, and it was time for the ultimatum.”

“’It’s me or her!’ Aletha yelled, her voice reverberating off the walls of their sleeping quarters.

“Oh, come on, Aletha. You’re being completely unreasonable!’”

“You’ve pushed me to it!” she shoved him.

Antar stumbled back a step, “For goodness sake, Vina is dead! Why are you so threatened by her?”

“Because it’s always Vina this and Vina that!” Aletha screamed. “I know that if she was standing here today and you had to pick between the two of us, there wouldn’t even be a hesitation. I am not a consolation prize!”

Antar said nothing. He just stared at her.

That enraged Aletha further.

“Say something!” she screeched. “Tell me that I’m not a consolation prize! That I’m not second best! That you would pick me!”

Antar closed his eyes. He looked mad at himself, but he still said those four cruel words.

“I can’t say that.” Antar had tears in his eyes, “I’m so sorry, Aletha, but I can’t say I would pick you.”

Aletha froze in stunned shock. There is was, the thing she had been fearing for year. He had so bluntly admitted it.

She slapped him as hard as she could.

“You God damn coward!” she screamed at him. “For years I have fought for this relationship. I have been so much time and effort and love into making this work. And you’ve done nothing but spouted off fancy apologies at the right intervals. But you never change. Do you even love me?”

“I do, Aletha,” Antar objected. “I swear I do! It’s just…”
"Just what?"

He took a deep breath, "I love her more."

She wanted to hit him again, but instead she broke down crying.

"I can't do this anymore, Antar," Aletha sobbed unconsolably. "I can't keep pretending. If you want to love me, you have to love me. I can't keep getting my heart broken."

"I never meant to hurt you," Antar’s answer was honest. "I never meant for this to play out the way it did."

"But it did, Antar... I don’t think we’re meant to be. I think we should separate, and maybe consider getting a divorce."

He was silent for a long time, "...You’re right."

Aletha reeled, "You- What?"

"This isn’t working anymore, and I don’t want you to continue to get hurt. So if that’s what you want, I’m do it."

"No," Aletha whispered in horror. "No, I was bluffing. I don’t that."

"Then we won’t, but if you want to leave, I’m not going to stop you."

"No. No! No!" Aletha shoved him again, "Damn it, Antar! Don’t do this! Don’t just concede defeat. Fight for me. Please, Antar. Fight for this. Fight for us. Fight for me, please!"

But he just shook his head.

Aletha slapped him even harder than last time.

"You’re a coward, Antar Kymeri. Loving you was the biggest mistake of my life."

"He didn’t stop me as he left,” Aletha sobbed as she told the story. “I don’t understand it, Luke. Why wasn’t I worth the fight? Why have I never been worth the fight?”

"You are. You absolutely are,” Luke pulled her into his arms and held her tight as she sobbed into his chest.

"Nobody’s ever fought for me. Not Adrinna against Alecta’s vow to kill me. Not Dad against my sisters forcing me to drop out of school. Not Antar to save our marriage. No one has wanted to fight for me."

"That’s wrong,” Luke pulled away from her. He held her shoulders and looked her in the eye, “That is dead wrong. I’ve fought for you, so has Quom, so has Felicity, so has Ivano, so has Rey, so even has Dirk. Remember when Roke tried to kill you and how many people were ready to shoot him for it? Remember when Felicity saved you from Phasma? Remember when Rey chose a life of loneliness so that Plutt and his thugs wouldn’t hurt you? You have people who love you, protect you, and willingly fight for you... And I’ve been fighting for you for years. To love you, to be with you. I want to be with you, Aletha. Completely. I’ll love Felicity forever, but you’ll never come second to a ghost. I’m ready to move on with you. I’ll fight for you."

She kissed him. She threw her arms around him and kissed his desperately, passionately. Luke groaned as he returned the kiss with the same vigor. His hands roamed over the bare skin of her back, drifting closer to the edges of the fabric to the places concealed. They pushed further and further to the sides, and then his hands were over her fabric clad breasts.

Aletha pushed him away.

Luke panted, alarm in his eyes, “Aletha. I’m sorry. I shouldn’t have-”

She placed a finger over his lips and shook her head. Her frowned and she removed her hand. Aletha took a deep breath, reached back, and untied the knot of fabric at the base of her neck. The fabric fell forward, exposing her bare chest, and a minute later it was unceremonious pulled over her head and thrown on the floor.

Luke stared at her; shocked by her boldness. He tried to keep his eyes on hers, but it had been so long since he had seen a woman’s naked chest, and Aletha was certainly very gifted in the area.

“Aletha,” he whispered at a loss for further words.

He struggled not to move his hand to explore further. Luke just looked her in the eyes and saw the raw mix of desire and genuine love. There would be no turning if he did this… and he wanted to do this.

“I love you, Aletha Kymeri,” he declared.

She smiled, “I love you too, Luke Erso.”

He grinned and shoved her back on the cot. She squeaked and giggled as he pulled off his tunic and crawled on top her. Her hands roamed over his still muscled torso as he kicked of his boots and kissed along her neck.

So came a flurry of hands and lips and tongues and teeth. Clothing was cast to the floor, and skin was touched in places that had been for years. Each exploration was a spark of electricity in their veins, accented by moans and laughter. Things got hotter, harder, and wetter.

And then bliss.

---

Day Five

---

“Can we officially say we’re together now?” Luke asked as he laced up his boots.

“I suppose,” Aletha was frowning in a small looking glass, trying to figure out how in the middle of a desert she was supposed to conceal a hickey on her shoulder… and a bite mark on her thigh. “Besides, if we don’t, Quom’s going to figure it out anyway. I still don’t know how he learned about our first kiss. Neither of us told him.”

“I’m pretty sure he just smelled it on me.” Luke finished tying his boot and just grinned, “Wow, I can’t believe that for the first time in sixteen years, I’ve slept with someone who isn’t Felicity Rhiaon… And I did it three times.”
“Unfortunately, I only got twice,” Aletha grinned. “Little quick to draw the last time.”

“It’s been seven years, Aletha. You’re lucky they weren’t all quick draw. Besides I got you two others using other methods.”

“I may start calling you silver-tongued.”

“Please don’t. Quom will figure it out, and I’ll never hear the end of it.”

Luke smiled. Suddenly grabbed Aletha, wrapping his arms around her, and playfully pulling him into his lap.

“What are you doing, Mister Erso?” Aletha giggled as Luke kissed up her neck.

“Getting some little last minute touching in,” Luke nibbled at her earlobe. “With the X’us’R’iia over, we’re not going to have as easy a venue to do this anymore.”

“May I remind you that Quom and Rey are waiting for us at the walker to bring more rations and check we’re all okay?”

“I heard the comm message too.”

Aletha smiled, but she pulled away from him, “Luke… I can’t do this.”

He frowned, “What?”

“I’m not calling us off, but… I need you to hear the rest of my story.”

Luke sighed, and shifted her out of his lap. He took her hands in his, and nodded for her to continue.

“Antar decided to fight for me after that argument,” Aletha said. “I had slept in the room of some colleagues that night and when I returned to our quarters to change for shift, he was waiting for me.”

“I’m so sorry, Aletha,” Antar cried as they sat on the bed together. “I have treated you so horribly. You are an amazing woman, and I do love you dearly. You were my ray of hope after losing everything from Faclov, and you’ve been the best thing in my life throughout this entire war. I do want a future with you, I want a marriage with you. I love you… and I need to move on. Last night, I, uh… I went to the mental health team and talked to an advisor. They agreed that I should see a therapist to work this all out. I’m willing to fight for this… I’m ready to fight for you, and give you all of me.”

“He had said things like that before, but this was the first time he implemented a plan to make things better. I could see a light at the end of the tunnel, but I wasn’t sure. I kissed him to see what would happen… for the first time, no part of him drew back from me. I knew that for this time, it was real.”

“Okay,” Aletha agreed. “One last chance. But I swear, if you do it one more time, if you regress… I’m gone.”

“Agreed,” Antar nodded, tears still shining in his eyes, but a smile on his face. He reached up and brushed a lock of hair out of her face, “I love you, Aletha.”

“I love you too, Antar.”

“And we just sat there holding each other,” Aletha smiled. “We knew that we finally were going to live happily ever after.”

There was a beat. Her grin fell and her eyes filled with sadness.

Luke closed his eyes, sensing the pain about to come, “What happened?”

“Oi! Kymeri!” Dosmit Raeh barged into the room.

Antar and Aletha quickly pulled apart.

“Captain,” Antar rose and saluted, awkwardly trying to wipe away his tears.

“Oh good, you two are clothed,” Dosmit shot a look at Aletha like she shouldn’t be in her own quarters alone with her own husband. “Suit up, Kymeri. The Tierfon Yellow Aces have been assigned the Battle of Jakku. Just think about it. We’re going to fight the final battle of the war. That’ll be something to tell the grandkids. You have thirty minutes to be on your X-Wing. Get a move on.”

Antar nodded, “Yes, Captain.”

“I was proud of him,” Aletha had on a bittersweet smile. “I sent him off to battle with a kiss, a declaration of love, and a vision of living happily ever after.”

Tears filled her eyes.

“That’s not what happened,” Aletha choked out. “When the battle ended, and the Tierfon Yellow Aces returned, I was waiting in the hanger for them. I looked around at the ships eagerly, ready to run into my husband’s arms and start our life together… but his ship didn’t return. Fear filled my heart… and then I saw a Pilot Commander walking towards me with the small silver box every Rebel knows.”

Luke grimaced. The small silver box held the black starbird medal given to families of Rebels killed in battle.

“I don’t know what he said to me,” Aletha continued. “All I heard was a ringing in my ears, the name Antar Kymeri, and I’m sorry for your loss. His tone was sympathetic, but somewhat robotic from having said it so many times. He pressed Antar’s medal into my grip, said another sorry, and left me alone. I had never felt so alone before that moment standing in that hanger with no family, no real friends, and no husband. There was no one to console me, and all I remember is screaming loudly, falling to my knees and crying my heart out alone on that cold floor.”

“At least… alone at first.”

Aletha was screaming so loudly, she was fairly certain that starships a galaxy away heard her. Antar was dead. Her beloved husband was dead. No, this couldn’t be possible, they were finally going to work things out. They were going to get a home and have children.

How could he be dead?

A pair of arms wrapped around her, and suddenly a man pulled her up into his embrace.

“I’m so sorry,” the man whispered, holding her tightly. “I’m so sorry for your loss.”

“I have no idea who that man was,” Aletha said. “All I remember is that he was in a pilot’s uniform. He just saw me crying, and decided to come over and comfort me. He pulled me into his arms and held me. He left me sob and scream, and even hit him a little as I worked through the death of my husband. We exchanged no names, asked no questions, just shared a moment of pure human connection. When I was done crying, I thanked him, he told me it was his honour, then he left and I never saw him again. Sometimes I sit up at night and wonder who that man was, but I’ve long ago realized it doesn’t matter.”

Luke wished he could say it had been him to share that beloved moment with Aletha, but alas, the day after the Battle of Jakku, Luke wasn’t on the Rebel Base. He was on his way back, flying in the Millennium Falcon, being told by Han and Leia that surprise, he was going to be an uncle.

Aletha took a deep breath, “You’ve asked me why I came to Jakku, so here is the answer. I came as part of the recovery team, hoping that Antar had had another miracle and survived his crash. A group of about fifty Rebels came to Jakku to do recovery. About a dozen pilots straggled in, but none were Antar. Still I waited… Weeks went by, and soon they turned to months. Long after it was possible for Antar to still be alive, I waited for him. It was three months later that I accept the truth, and decided it was time to go home. Of course, I had no home at the time. I had commed Adrinna, and that’s when she told me of Alecta’s vow. We’ve talked a few times since then, but she’s no trusted ally. I was going to go home with Jedek and stay with him and his wife until I got things settled. Jedek had joined the recovery team, and stayed on with me for the three months. We were the last ones on Jakku when we decided to leave.”

“So why did you stay?”

Aletha smiled, “Throughout my time on Jakku, I had been treated very well by an Aqualish named Mashra. When Jedek and I were packing up to leave, Mashra dropped in the middle of the street with a coughing fit. Jedek and I sprung into action and saved her life. I discovered that she had the same lung disease as a patient I had in the Imperial Army, who my supervisor pulled the plug on, even though I could have saved her. When I had fixed Mashra, Ivano Troade cam eup to me asking if I could fix a wound and he would pay me. Then came Varé, Binz, Quom, and even Roke. I felt like it was a sign, a call from something bigger. Jedek agreed to return on a regular basis to bring me medical supplies, and I stayed on Jakku. I decided to stay on Jakku to save lives… I decided to stay for Mashra. And so ends the tale of my tragic backstory, Luke Erso. Any questions?”

“Just one,” Luke replied. “Why were you so hesitant to be with me after our kiss? You knew I was ready… why weren’t you?”
Aletha sighed, “Because I’m a lot like you, Luke. I felt that I needed to wait for the sign.”

Aletha smiled and wrapped her arms around his neck, “To find his body. Antar’s body has never been recovered, hence why I always inquire if you and Quom found an X-Wing. I thought if I found Antar, I could move on… but I realize that I don’t need a sign. I don’t need to bury his body… I just need you.”

He brushed a lock of hair out of her face, “And I need you.”

Then they kissed the sweetest kiss Aletha had ever tasted.

The storm had finally settled. It had been a dramatic one that changed the lives of many forever. There would be no turning back from the consequences to come… and there was no reburying the X-Wing hidden so many years in the sand.

Deep in the heart of Jakku, there is a patch of sand. It is much like any ordinary patch, flat, yellow, and stretches on endlessly into the horizon. But now that sand had given up the secret it held concealed for twenty-three years.

The X-Wing was Rebellion-era, a relic of the Battle of Jakku. Shot down brutally in the battle, the yellow ship and its pilot had met their destruction on the planet of Jakku.

Still strapped into the cockpit was the pilot who had given his life for the Alliance, and the freedom of all. His body was now no more than a skeleton that would soon crumble to dust. His jumpsuit sagged around the brittle bones, and his helmet was strapped upon the cranium.

He was like so many others who died in that desert, bones to be shoved aside for the equipment he horded, but there was something about him that made this particular body special.

A patch on his jumpsuit reading his codename of Yellow-4… and a helmet that bore the name Kymeri.

Chapter End Notes

To all the people horrified by the plotline of Rey thinking Felicity is alive, I just want to say that you forced my hand. People keep thinking that I somehow managed to save Felicity even though I explicitly showed her getting shot in the head, and had Ben kick her corpse. Let me say this point blank: Ben is not lying about Felicity being dead. Felicity was in fact shot. You know how much I love her, and I will admit that writing that scene of her getting shot was one of the hardest scenes I’ve ever had to write, but Ben did not lie.

You know, this is going to make more sense when I reveal what Ben did to her body. Stupid dramatic reveals I have to wait to unveil only at the point in which it is narratively appropriate.

Question: Do you guys want an extended dirty version of the Luke/Aletha love scene? I have thoughts for it, but I’ll only do it if there’s interest. (She says totally not having cut it out because she just wanted to finish this damn chapter.)
Chapter Summary

Quom torments Teng, Luke makes Dad jokes, oh, and Aletha buries her husband.

Chapter Notes

Important Announcement: For those who are unaware, Teng Malar is actually a canon character. He appears in a single line in Rey’s Survival Guide and I thought it would be interesting to take the tidbit and build a whole story about him and his relationship to Rey. For those reading on AO3, you see that romance is the endgame, and I thought it would be interesting to make their relationship a romantic one.

However, I strongly urge you not to go researching the character. Like I said, there’s only a single fact about him known, and realize that it must be something pretty significant for me to build a whole plotline around. If you do know that information about Teng, I ask you not to mention it in any comments or reviews that are seen publicly. Please don’t spoil this for anyone else.

Thank you.

See the end of the chapter for more notes.

The Long Way Home

Chapter Thirty-Three

Skeletons in the Desert

AGE TWELVE

If I need welding, I see a manumitted power droid named AMPS. AMPS doesn’t eat rations, of course, but he’ll weld in exchange for a recharge, spare gas canisters, metals he finds interesting, or a good joke. I spend a lot of time driving across the Goazon trying to think of jokes AMPS will decide are worth a trade.

- Rey’s Survival Guide
“Well, the Imperials obviously weren’t convinced, so they asked for his… reporting number I think,” Rey couldn’t recall the minor detail. “Solo naturally didn’t have a number, so he just shot the comm system and said boring conversation anyway.”

AMPS gave an electronic chortle, and Rey smiled proudly at making the droid laugh.

“Impressive, Miss Erso. I will weld for you,” AMPS grabbed her few objects and started to work. His voice had a static sort of buzz to it from years of disrepair, “It is a delightful story, Miss Erso. Did you make that one up yourself?”

“No, it’s a real story. I think the Wookiees that were here a few years ago told it to me. They told me most of my Solo stories, though Doctor Ally had a few too.” Rey paused, “Actually… the weird thing is I swear I remember hearing the story in a man’s voice. Not Dad’s, someone… gruffer? I’m probably just imagining things.”

It had been a long time since Rey ceased to remember not only that Han Solo himself had told her the story, but that Han Solo had been involved in her life at all. Uncle Quom was the only uncle she remembered at that point.

She was halfway to the day her past would come crashing back into her present.

She stuck up her hand and waved over the group of Luke, Quom, and Aletha who were searching for her. Rey hadn’t seen Doctor Ally at all that day, and Quom had been busy with Dad messing around with Quom’s speeder that morning.

“Excuse me, Miss,” Luke grinned as the group reached Rey. “But have you seen my daughter anywhere?”

Rey rolled her eyes, “Daadd, I’m right here.”

“What? You?” Luke pretended to be startled. “No, that’s not possible. Last time I checked, my daughter was only the length of my forearm. And look at you. You’re all grown up.”

“Well, not all grown up,” Rey grinned. “I’m hoping to get a little taller than this.”

Quom smirked, “Yeah, considering your parents, I won’t put money on that, MG.”

Rey giggled.

Luke just shook his head, “Believe it or not, I have met a fully-grown woman who was even shorter than Felicity.”

He decided not to add that the woman was his twin sister, Leia.

“If you lot are done with your banter, I believe I am missing a hug from my favorite girl.” Aletha pulled Rey into a snuggly embrace, “Happy birthday, Sunshine. I can’t believe you’re already twelve.”

“Seems just like yesterday that we were gathered around that tiny cake singing you happy birthday,” Quom reminisced. “Now that I think of it, why did we decide lighting a candle in the desert was a good idea?”

Quom shrugged.

“Miss Erso, your welding is complete,” AMPS announced.

“Thank you,” Rey nodded at the droid.

“I enjoyed the laugh. Have a pleasant day,” AMPS waddled away.

“So, what are we doing today?” Rey turned back to her family.

“Well, Quom and I have a delivery that we thought you might want to accompany us on,” Luke smiled. “We’re heading to Old Meru’s. Wanna come?”

“Of course!” Rey rummaged for her notebook in her shoulder bag that Luke had given her that very morning as her birthday present.

What she didn’t know is that Luke hadn’t scavenged it, but rather arranged it to be purchased by Jedeck from a store on Coruscant that Luke and Felicity had used to buy equipment for the Resistance. The bag could go through Hell and back and it would be fine. He wanted her to have some gear on her at all times in case of a sudden need to depart Jakku.

“Just let me sharpen my pencils and we can head to see Meru,” Rey said excitedly.

The grown ups exchanged a look.

“Right,” Quom said in a drawn-out voice. “Meru is who you want to see.”

“Actually, can I come with you guys?” Aletha asked. “I would like to meet this Teng boy I’ve heard Quom rant about so much.”

“Of course,” Luke nodded. “It’ll be great to finally see how much of a no-good troublemaker with dishonorable intentions he truly is.”

Rey rolled her eyes, “Quom, stop it! I don’t like Teng like that.”

“You only think that now, but give it a few years-”

“I’m twelve! Boys are icky! Stop ruining my friendship with the only person my age around here. Do you know how boring it is to be with adults all the time?”

That shut the group up.

“Sorry, Rey,” Quom looked sheepish. “I didn’t think of it like that.”

“It’s okay,” Rey sighed, “I just wish I could have more friends my age.”

“Well, there is that Devi girl that came in a few days ago,” Aletha suggested. “Maybe her?”

“No, she gives me an uneasy feeling. Kind of the same one... he did.”

They no longer uttered the name of the man who had abused Rey once upon a time. There were still times she woke up in a panic, convinced he was coming for her. And every now and then, a sudden movement would make Rey flinch. It broke their hearts to know she might never escape the grasp that horrid man had on her.

“I’m sure Teng is a lovely boy,” Luke put a comforting hand on Rey’s shoulder. “And I’m sure you’re just friends. You’ve only known him a month, after all.”

“Exactly!” Rey exclaimed. “Dad, haven’t you ever become really close friends with a member of the opposite sex in a short amount of time, and had a really strong friendship with them after said short period of time?”

Rey’s smile fell, “Oh. Then uh… Um…”

She glanced around the marketplace, casting about for answers before her eyes fell on Aletha.

“It’s like you and Aletha!” Rey grinned. “Just really close friendship. Nothing romantic at all.”

Luke and Aletha glanced stiffly at each other.

“Yeah…” she laughed awkwardly. “Friends.”

Quom raised an eyebrow.

Luke wouldn’t meet his gaze.

“MG, why don’t you go sharpen your pencils?” Quom suggested. “Your Dad and I will load up the speeder.”

“Okay,” Rey raced off.

They all waited until she was gone.

“You seriously haven’t told her yet?” Quom shook his head in disbelief.

“Oh, you have no idea how complicated it is.” Quom still hadn’t spilled Rey’s little mother secret. “But you’ve already been making out with the Doc for a month, and you haven’t told Rey.”

“We haven’t just been making out,” Aletha blushed.

Quom grinned, “Don’t worry, Luke told me what happened in the tent. Not a big surprise. You know the saying, if you’re alone with a pretty girl during a X’us’R’iia, you’re about to get lucky.”

“That’s not a saying.”

“It should be.”

“So because you say it is, that makes it one?”

Quom stared at Aletha, “I’m sorry, did you just meet me?”

Aletha rolled her eyes, “Seven years ago I took one kick to the face, and now this is my life.”

“Would you rather the life of loneliness you had before?”

She said nothing.

“I thought not.”
Luke shook his head, “I really made a mistake staying on Jakku.”

“So, when are you going to tell Rey about the two of you?” Quom asked.

“I don’t know,” Luke sighed. “We’ve just started a relationship and we need to see if this is going to work before we involve in it.”

“He’s right,” Aletha agreed. “I don’t want to get her hopes up about mothers or any of that, and then break her heart.”

Quom grimaced, “Believe me, Doc, whether you want it or not… this whole mother situation can’t end in anything but heartbreak.”

“I know. The only question is,” she looked at Luke, “whose heart will it be?”

Teng looked so excited when he saw the speeder pull up with Rey. He was dirty, thin from starvation, and his clothing was ragged – oddly he was wearing a long sleeved blue shirt under the hot Jakku sun – but his smile was as brilliant as his green eyes.

“Rey!” he exclaimed as she clamored out of the speeder. “What are you doing here?”

“He’s right,” Aletha agreed. “I don’t want to get her hopes up about mothers or any of that, and then break her heart.”

Quom grimaced, “Believe me, Doc, whether you want it or not… this whole mother situation can’t end in anything but heartbreak.”

“I know. The only question is,” she looked at Luke, “whose heart will it be?”

Teng looked so excited when he saw the speeder pull up with Rey. He was dirty, thin from starvation, and his clothing was ragged – oddly he was wearing a long sleeved blue shirt under the hot Jakku sun – but his smile was as brilliant as his green eyes.

“Rey!” he exclaimed as she clamored out of the speeder. “What are you doing here?”

“Hey Teng,” she smiled as the adults worked unloading the speeder. “Dad and Quom had a delivery for Meru, and I tagged along.”

“Well, I’m glad you came. Happy birthday.”

“You remembered?”

He blushed and shrugged, “It wasn’t a far off date when you told me it. Not that hard to remember.”

“Well, thank you. Your birthday is next month, right?”

“I’ll be fourteen,” Teng nodded.

“That seems so grown up,” Rey marveled. “You, uh… probably don’t want to hang out with a kid like me when you’re fourteen.”

“Well, my other option is Meru, so I think we’ll be good.”

“You’re sure?”

“I promise, Rey, if the choice comes down to you or Meru, I’ll pick you every time,” Teng winked.

Rey didn’t know why she was suddenly blushing.

“MG! Stop consorting with that ruffian!” Quom called.

Teng froze like a steelpecker had just spotted him, and Rey suddenly wanted the ground to swallow her whole.

“Lay off him, Quom,” Luke chided as he approached the children. “Rey, would you like to introduce your friend?”

“Dad, this is Teng Malar,” Rey said. “Teng, this is my father. He’s less embarrassing than Quom.”

“But not entirely unembarrassing,” Luke grinned as he shook Teng’s hand. “It is in my job description of father.”

“If you make a Dad joke, I’m walking home,” Rey warned.

Luke couldn’t resist the challenge, “Just don’t forget to put it on a leash.”

Rey spun on her heel and started marching in the vague direction of the walker.

Aletha caught her shoulder and turned Rey back around, “Settle down you two. Hello, Teng. I’m Aletha Kymeri. I’ve heard a lot about you from Quom. I assume none of it is true.”

“Well, maybe not none of it,” Teng grinned at Rey as he shook Aletha’s hand. “Wait, Kymeri as in Doctor Kymeri?”

She looked surprised, “You’ve heard of me?”

“Little bit from Meru. She says you’re kinda badass. I heard you shot a woman in the knee.”

“Protecting Rey,” Aletha slung an arm over Rey’s shoulder.

“That’s so cool!” Teng exclaimed. “And you faced down Roke, letting him be forever mauled.”

“Do not mess with the only doctor in Niima Outpost.”

“But steelpeckers. Dang, those things give me the creeps.”

“With good reason,” Rey nodded.

“Wow, Doctor,” Teng shook his head in disbelief, “you have got to be the most badass person I have ever met.”

Oddly enough, Luke felt uncomfortable at the proclamation.

“Well, you know,” he cut in awkwardly, “I’ve done a few things in my day.”

“Oh really?” Quom lifted a teasing eyebrow. “What could you have possibly done that’s badass? You’re not exactly the kind of person who hung around Rogue One or Han Solo.”

Luke glared at Quom.

“He’s got a point, Dad. I mean, sure you punched out… Jarex,” the word was hard for Rey to utter, “but really, what’s so badass about you? The most I’ve ever seen you do is a one-armed handstand.”

“You can still do those?” Aletha frowned. It had been a few years since she had seen him attempt one.

“While balancing a storage crate on my foot at the same time,” Luke griped.

“Using which arm?” Teng asked.

“The natural one, thank you very much,” Luke tried not to be mad at the boy. “You know, I am more impressive than you think I am.”

“I’ll believe it when I see it,” Rey smirked.

“Just you wait,” Quom grinned remembering the day he witnessed Luke Skywalker in action with a lightsaber and the Force. “He puts on one hell of a show.”
“So, uh…” Teng looked around at the group, “these are the people who raised you, Rey?”

Rey laughed, “There’s certainly never a dull moment.”

“I can imagine.” Teng suddenly perked, “Oh, wait right here. I have something for you.”

He soon returned with what would be considered on any other planet, a pathetic offering. Some pathetic looking spinebarrel blooms in some piece of what looked like tubing or pipe, transformed into a cup.

“For your collection,” Teng explained, feeling the eyes of the adults on him.

---

I collect flowers – spinebarrel blooms and nightblossoms – and display them to remind myself that there’s beauty everywhere if you look hard enough, even on Jakku.

- Rey’s Survival Guide

---

“Thank you so much, Teng,” Rey clutched her birthday present against her chest. “Hey, I brought my drawing book. You have anymore pictures you made?”

“No, but I’ve got a few I’m working on,” Teng shyly fidgeted with his pant pocket. “Meru should be busy with your family if you want to maybe hang around a draw a little with me?”

“I guess I didn’t sharpen my pencils for no reason,” Rey grinned. She grabbed his arm, “Come on.”

“Ow!” Teng suddenly screamed and pulled his arm away.

“What’s wrong?” Aletha frowned.

“Nothing,” he refused to meet her eye as he cradled his arm.

But Aletha, full on in doctor mode, would have none of it. She marched over to Teng, grabbed his arm, rolled up his shirt sleeve, and began inspecting it.

“How long have you had this cut?” Aletha asked, staring at the very nasty wound he had been concealing with his clothing.

“Couple weeks,” Teng admitted. “It’s… not healing well.”

“I can see that. Is it painful?”

“Uh huh. Is something wrong with it?”

“I think it might be infected.”

Teng winced, “How can you be sure?”

“Shouldn’t be this red, and there’s fluid draining. I think I see a little puss too. Did you cut this on metal?”

“Yeah.”
“Was it rusty?”

“Might have been,” Teng shrugged. “We ran out of bandages, so I’ve been covering it with my sleeves.”

“Yeah, this is definitely infected,” Aletha said. She rolled down his sleeve, “Come on, I’ll patch you up.”

Teng pulled his arm away from her, “That’s okay, I… I can’t pay you.”

Aletha sighed and glanced back at Luke and Quom. The adults tried not to let their sadness infect the mood.

“It’s okay,” Aletha told Teng. “This one’s on me.”

“Are you sure?” Teng looked at Rey for confirmation that Aletha would be so generous.

“I give some treatments out for free time to time.” Aletha teased, “Besides, I don’t want anything to set in. Amputations are not on my freebie list.”

The blood drained out of Teng’s face, “Amputations?”

“Come on, Teng,” Rey playfully shoved him, “don’t you want a fake arm?”

“I’ll take the freebie,” Teng said quickly.

Aletha grinned, “Well, you know, this might be infected enough that I might end up having to amputate anyway. You might want to start saving up just in case.”

Teng looked terrified at the prospect. The group shared knowing grins between each other. They really had to stop teasing the boy.

Luke shrugged, “Usually an arm and a leg.”

“Ok, I will leave you here,” Quom threatened.

“We’re not going to amputate, Teng,” Aletha promised. “Just having a little fun with you.”

“Really?” Teng looked nervously at Rey.

“It’s what we do,” Rey laughed. “Don’t be nervous; it’s a good sign.”

“It means we like you,” Luke input. “You seem like a good kid, and I’ll glad my daughter has a friend her age.”

“Actually, I’m two years older than her,” Teng admitted.

“Funny,” Luke grinned. “My wife was two years older than me.”

Teng lost the blood from his face again.

“Just ignore the boys,” Aletha advised, putting a hand on Teng’s back to nudge him towards Old Meru’s tent. “They’re idiots.”

“Nah, it’s true,” Quom admitted.

Luke shook his head.

Aletha laughed and looked to the children, “Let’s get you two inside.”

“Come on, Teng,” Rey grabbed his hand and pulled him forward. “Doctor Ally will fix you, and then we can have lunch and draw.”

“I’m not eating any of your food portions this time. I don’t care what you say.”

“Well, it’s my birthday and I don’t want my best friend to starve, so yes you will.”

Teng looked surprised, “I’m your best friend?”

“It’s either you or Quom,” Rey said flatly.

“Rey,” Teng’s modest smile felt warmer than Jakku’s sun, “I’m so… happy to be your best friend. You know, you’re mine too. Thank you, Rey.”

She smiled back at him, and let her fingers close tighter around her hand, “Anytime.”

Suddenly Teng’s smile dropped, “I’m still not eating your portion.”

“Are too,” Rey said stubbornly as they clamoured towards the tent still holding hands.

“Are not.”

“Are too.”

“Are not.”

“Are too.”

Their voices became muffled as Aletha and the children entered the tent.

Luke just stared after them in utter shock.

“Oh my God,” he proclaimed.

“I know,” Quom chuckled.

“She said anytime to his thank you.”

“I know.”

“You were right. Rey… likes a boy.”

“I know,” Quom exclaimed. “Geez, I am right about things sometimes.”

“Rey likes a boy,” Luke repeated slowly, shaking his head. “I am so not ready for this.”

“Well, I think we’ll be safe for a while. Teng seems like the kind of kid who’ll wait until Rey makes the first move. How long do you think that’ll be?”
Luke raised an eyebrow, “Quom, Rey is the daughter of myself and Felicity Rhiaon. If Teng is waiting for her to make the first move, he is screwed.”

“I like Teng,” Aletha declared as Luke drove them back to Niima Outpost several hours later. “He seems like a nice boy.”

“He is,” Rey agreed. She was sitting in the backseat next to Quom with her flower on her lap. “I can’t believe he got me a present.”

“They’re beautiful flowers,” Aletha looked back at Rey. She was sitting in the front passenger seat next to Luke. “You take good care of those.”

“You’ll show me how, right Doctor Ally?”

“Of course.”

Rey’s flower collection was a project she had started with Aletha. One day, Aletha had told Rey that the thing she missed most about civilization was seeing all the diverse types of flowers across the worlds. Jakku didn’t have many flowers, but Aletha and Rey were determined to collect and tend to all the different types it did.

“Doctor Ally, how many kinds of flowers are there on Jakku?” Rey asked.

“Eight,” Aletha replied. “Sorry, Sunshine. There’s not a lot here. We’ve found all eight.”

“Are you sure? I thought I saw another flower once on Jakku… Or maybe I’m just remembering something else.”

“I… can’t describe it,” Rey sighed. “I’ll draw a picture for you sometime.”

“I look forward to it,” Luke smiled. “Teng was very thoughtful with his gift. I do like the boy.”

“I just can’t believe that Meru let his arm get that bad,” Aletha sighed. “You know, we joked, but a few more days and I probably would have had to amputate. I’ll definitely checking up on him.”

“Well, I’ll go with you,” Quom volunteered. “I can’t believe how little Meru cares for him. She starves him, she doesn’t help him with injuries, and did you see the state of his clothing?”

“It’s nothing new on Jakku, Quom,” Aletha reminded. “Not everyone is like you and I.”

“It just,” Quom glanced down at Rey, “reminds me of that day I found her with the sunburn.”

“I remember her arms,” Aletha shook her head. “I’m amazed you don’t have long-term effects from that.”

“Or any of your ordeal,” Quom agreed. “Though you’ll probably get messed up psychologically from it in a few years.”

“To be honest, I don’t remember much of it,” Rey shyly admitted. “I don’t think I remember anything before Jakku.”
Luke slammed on the breaks.

The trio exclaimed and moaned as they shot forward and then their seatbelts slammed them back against their seats.

“Luke, what are you doing?” Quom exclaimed.

“Oh, my head hurts,” Rey groaned.

“Why did we stop?” Aletha asked.

But to everyone’s surprise, that wasn’t Luke’s intention. Instead he got out of the driver’s seat, walked around to the other side, and climbed into the passenger seat Aletha had vacated.

“Rey, come here,” Luke ordered as he buckled in.

She started to walk around the speeder to Luke’s seat.

“No, Rey, sit here,” Luke patted the driver’s seat.

Aletha’s jaw dropped.

“Really, Dad?” Rey’s eyes lit up.

“Come on, Birthday Girl,” Luke grinned. “I’ve got a promise to fulfill. You may have forgotten it, and which ship I promised to do it on, but I’m delivering on my promise nonetheless.”

Rey scrambled up into seat excitedly. Luke smiled as he watched her settle behind the control. When she was three, he had promised that one day when she was old enough, he would teach her to fly. The plan had been to start her on his X-Wing, which was sit a possibility as his X-Wing still was hidden in the Qyhsh Caves, regularly maintained by Luke and Quom. But that would raise too many questions.

And he certainly couldn’t fulfill the promise to then have himself, Chewie, and Han teach her to fly the Millennium Falcon as they had taught Ben. Of course, Luke had no idea that very soon, the idea of teaching Rey to fly the Millennium Falcon wouldn’t be out of reach.

“Luke Erso!” Aletha chastised as Rey buckled into the driver’s seat. “You are absolutely not teaching that child to drive.”

He looked at her, “Aletha, I learned to drive at seven, my father professionally raced pods and won at nine. As far as I’m concerned, I should have taught Rey this a minimum of two years ago. You ready, Sweetheart?”

“I’ve been ready for years!” Rey was literally bouncing with excitement.

“Enough, Doc,” Quom placed a hand on her shoulder. He was holding Rey’s plant with his other hand, “Don’t make him play the Dad card. If he made her, he can break her.”
Aletha scowled at him, “Thank God you don’t actually have kids.”

“You wound me, Doctor. You wound me.”

“Okay, the first thing we do when we get in a vehicle is what?” Luke asked.

“Seatbelt,” Rey answered confidently.

“Exactly,” Luke grinned. “So, what you do next is adjust the seat to fit you. Most speeder have controls to move the seat back, forth, up, and down. On this one, it’s these here.”

For a while they played around with the controls, Luke teaching her about each and every one. He named them, explained their function, as well as how they worked in a system as a whole. Since Rey had been scavenging and working in Quom and Luke’s shop for so long, she caught on very quickly, and even already knew quite a bit.

“This speeder is an automatic, so we’ll start with this one,” Luke said. “Quom’s is a manual, which means it has a clutch. I’ll got over the difference with you next time we’re in his speeder and teach you that. So, in an automatic, you have two pedals: acceleration on the right, and the break on the left. The break is usually larger than the acceleration. Do you feel them?”

“Uh huh,” Rey nodded. “Can I press them?”

“Not yet. In fact, never have your foot on both pedals at the same time; only the one you are currently using. Now let’s talk mirrors.”

It must have been an hour of instruction – much to Aletha and Quom’s annoyance as they sat bored in the hot sun – before Luke finally declared it was time for Rey to give it a try.

“A little,” Rey admitted. “Are you sure I can do this?”

He smiled at her, “I have full confidence in you.”

“What if I mess up? What if I hurt us?”

“I’ve got you, Rey. I won’t let anything happen, I promise. Now, come on, let’s drive.”

Rey grinned, “I bet I’m going to be a better driver than you.”

“Challenge accepted.”

Rey dutifully made sure the area was clear. Quom and Aletha had gotten well out of the way.

Rey’s hands were shaking.

“Deep breath. We’re not doing anything until you’re calm. Never drive when you can’t control your body. Just relax, you can do this. I believe in you, Rey.”
Her foot came off the pedal and she gasped as the speeder began to move forward slowly.

“Daddy!”

Rey took a deep breath, and her hands stopped shaking.

“Good,” Luke nodded. He too took a deep breath, readying himself for the first moment his daughter ever drove, “Now, you’re going to keep an eye on your speed, but make sure you are watching where you’re driving.”

“How do I do that?”

“Practice. That’s why we’re in the middle of nowhere with nothing to run into. Now, very slowly you’re going to press lightly on the acceleration. We’re going to go to the one that says 30. That’s 30 kilometers an hour. If you feel uncomfortable, you can go slower, but tell me. If you’re good, we can go faster. Ok?”

Rey nodded.

“When you hit 30, take your foot off the acceleration, and hover it over the break in case you need to slow down. Are you ready?”

Rey grinned, “I’m ready.”

There was nothing quite like the joy that coursed through Rey as she pressed down that pedal for the first time. She was driving, she was really driving!

“I’m doing it! I’m doing it!” Rey exclaimed as the speeder moved forward.

She did it almost perfectly on the very first try.

As Luke instructed her to accelerate again, this time going faster, he couldn’t be prouder of his daughter. The natural talent of her lineage boiled in her blood. She was born to drive…and she was born to fly. It was too soon to add a third dimension into her piloting, but someday he would teach her to traverse the skies.

She did so well. Rey listened intently, and followed her father’s instructions dutifully. She didn’t always get it right; he had to correct her a few times to go hand over hand while turning, and she forgot to switch gears into reverse when practising backing up. But there was no doubt about it, Rey was a born natural.

Anakin Skywalker, Brendan Rhiaon, and Han Solo would have been so proud had they seen it. Maybe her Grandfather did see it; Luke honestly wouldn’t be surprised if he turned back and saw a Force Ghost grinning in the backseat. Maybe Brendan too was watching them somehow from the afterlife, cheering Rey on, and teasing Felicity about her own lack of skills. Of course, Felicity would be bursting with pride and reminding Brendan the reason her driving skills sucked when that he was supposed to teach her, but then went and got himself blown up.

But Han Solo couldn’t possibly witness this might. He should have, but Luke had made a selfish choice that robbed Han of that experience. He would have been so impressed, and so proud of her. There was no doubt in Luke’s mind that Rey would become one of the select few Han allowed to touch his precious Falcon.

He would see it one day, Luke vowed. He couldn’t imagine a life where Rey never met her uncle again… he couldn’t imagine a life where Luke never met his best friend again.

He missed Han so much. And Leia, and Chewie, and Artoo and Threepio and Lando and Wedge and Diego and… Reine.

He missed Reine and Obik and Gavyn and Zena and Tyla and Alyla and all the people who had been slaughtered on that rainy battlefield. He missed the people he had lost in the war. Uncle Owen, Aunt Beru, Biggs, Dak, and he missed Shara and Grandma Jobal. He missed his Granddad, Ruwee having passed away a year before the Burning of Rornian.

He missed his casual friends: Kes and Poe, BB-8, and Kalonia, Lor San Tekka, Nils Arlos, Dex, Malla, Waroo, Ryoo, Jagrav, their daughter Padmé, Pooja, her wife Erisha, Aunt Sola, Uncle Darred.

And Ben… he missed Ben. Luke didn’t care what he called himself now, and he didn’t care that the last time he saw Ben, he had wrapped his hands around his own nephew’s throat.

It seemed impossible to think it had been seven years since he walked away from everything. Rey had lived a life longer on Jakku than off it. She knew very little else but this shabby little world.

But the one person he missed most of all was the woman who was willing to give her life so Rey could safely live even this pathetic existence. He missed Felicity so much.

Rey slowed down the speeder, and moved it into park.

She smiled at him, “I just wanted to say… thank you, Daddy, for teaching me this.”

“It’s no problem. I rather enjoyed it.”

“Me too, I finally get why you like driving so much.” Her eyes flicked down momentarily, “Dad, I just want you to know, there is no one else in the entire Galaxy I’m happy to share this moment with.”

He smiled and stroked her hair, “You’re right, I’m glad it was just you and me. Happy Birthday, my Rey of Light.”

And they embraced as the sun set in the distance.

“There!” Rey exclaimed, a week later.

Luke looked up at Rey from the schematic he was studying on his data reader. The reader was old and banged up, and Luke had had to refurbish it multiple times, but he refused to let it die on him.

Rey scrambled out of her hammock, and shoved a page in his face. He had to hold up a hand to signal her to give him so space as she was practically crawling in his lap. Luke still enjoyed holding Rey in his lap from time to time, but at twelve years old, she was on the edge of outgrowing his available lap space.

“The flower I remember,” Rey took a step back and offered him the page. “The one from last week? Do you know what it is?”

Luke took the drawing from her. It took him a few minutes before he remembered what kind Rey had drawn.

“A morning glory,” Luke struggled not to let sadness enter his voice. “Do you know why you remember this?”

“Not really,” Rey shrugged.

“Try. Think back, and remember. Why do you know this flower?”

“I… I don’t know.”

Rey took a deep breath and closed her eyes. Luke could feel the Force gently moving around her, trying to guide her memories and senses. He knew it was dangerous to get her too familiar with the Force, but at the same time, he knew how important it was to try and train her. Even a little bit of subconscious prep would benefit her massively in the long run. After all, one day the lull would end, and Rey would need to be able to tap into her powers to protect herself.

…Of course, that was only if he decided he wanted to train her.

But that was a struggle for another day.

“I remember… a woman,” Rey said, her eyes still closed.

Luke gave a small smile, “What does she look like?”

“I don’t know… dark hair… a warm smile… and scars.” She opened her eyes, “Is it Mom?”

“No. The woman you are remembering was named Alyla.”

“So, I’ve known two people called Ally?”

Luke chuckled, “You never really called her Ally. Aletha’s the only one you’ve done that with.”

“Alyla… Alyla…” Rey frowned. “Why does that name make me… sad?”

Luke sighed, “Oh, Rey… Alyla’s story isn’t a happy one. For a while it looked like it would at least have a happy ending, but it wasn’t meant to be. She had a heartbreaking death; one she absolutely did not deserve and should never have happened. Her childhood was even worse, worse than the one I’m giving you—”

“My childhood isn’t bad!”

“But it could be a lot better. It should be.”

“I don’t care,” Rey crossed her arms stubbornly. “I have you, Daddy, and that’s all I need.”
“Oh, Sweetheart,” he was sucker for her words. Luke pulled her into his lap, embracing her with a tight hug, “You truly are the only thing I need in my life.”

“I love you, Daddy.”

“I love you too, My Rey of Light.”

As they held each other tenderly a battle raged in Rey’s mind. If there ever was a time to tell her father her suspicions about her mother’s survival, this would be it.

“Daddy?”

How happy would her words make Dad? Thinking Mom was dead had been a terrible toll on her father, and knowing they could be reunited, together again?

The worse words Rey had ever heard in her life slammed to the forefront of her mind.

---

Rey’s eyes went wide.

“No!” Rey exclaimed. “No! You’re lying! Mommy said she’d come back! She’s coming back, Daddy!”

“Sweetheart…I’m so sorry,” Luke raised his hand to stroke Rey’s face. “But Mommy’s gone.”

Rey swatted his hand away, “STOP LYING, DADDY!”

“Rey,” Luke struggled to keep his voice calm for her, “I’m not lying. Mommy’s not coming back.”

---

Dad would never believe her about Mom.

“It’s nothing,” Rey eased out of her father’s embrace. “I just… miss Mom.”

She glanced over at the wall where she kept her mother’s tally going. Rey would go on pretending her blissful ignorance of her mother’s true situation.

But someday she would show them all.

Someday Mommy would return.

---

The Graveyard’s full of bodies, from Feressee’s Point to the Spike. Some of those big Imperial ships had populations a lot larger than all of Jakku, which means a lot of bones.

- Rey’s Survival Guide
“Quom, if you give me another arm bone and tell me you’re giving me a hand, I will leave you here,” Luke warned.

Quom looked down at the skeletal hand in his grasp, thought for a moment, then tossed it aside. “Hand jokes are played out with you anyway,” Quom went back to digging in the ship remnants.

They were scavenging in a site that had been uncovered by the X’us’R’ia. It was two ships, a B-Wing and a TIE Fighter that had crashed into each other, become interlocked, and crashed in the desert together. The ships and bodies were an absolute disaster, and frankly not worth their time.

“We should give up on this one,” Rey declared. “It’s be fully picked over, and I’m getting scratched up by all this rusty metal. Can’t we get find somewhere else?”

Luke sighed, “Fine. You’re right, this is done. Let’s load up the speeder, Quom.”

“Where should we go?” Quom asked when they had finished loading what little they had found. “Why doesn’t Rey pick?” Luke grinned at her, “You want to drive us to our next location?”

“Really?” Rey squealed.

She didn’t need to be asked twice, “This is so awesome! Where should I take us?”

“It’s completely up to you,” Luke climbed into the seat beside her.

“I hear the Western Reaches have gotten a good portion uncovered after the X’us’R’ia,” Quom suggested.

“But where?” Rey asked. It was the first time she had been asked to pick a spot. Sure she had given suggestions before, but never had the power of the final say. “How do I figure out where to go?”

Luke smiled, an idea occurring, “Why don’t you… look inside yourself?”

Quom raised an eyebrow, catching Luke’s drift.

“What do you mean?” Rey was obvious to the implication.

“Reach out, feel,” Luke said. “There’s something inside of you that’ll help to guide. Listen for that little… it’s not a voice but a feeling. An instinct.”

“Dad… that’s complete gibberish.”

“Just try it,” Luke was getting a little sick of her snark.

Rey loudly exhaled, making a show of her irritation, “Fine.”

So she did as her father told. Rey didn’t understand how she knew exactly what to do. Somehow this… reaching into her seemed familiar. She knew the right breathing pattern, and she knew the feeling of sinking into her own core.

There was something around her. Lightness and Dark, somehow familiar. It moved all around her, binding and penetrating the Galaxy and the contents within.

Then a different light… lilac. It filled her and felt so… familiar. How did she know this?

“Dad?” Rey tried to keep the fear out of her voice. “What’s going on?”

Where he stood, Rey felt another colour. A sky blue that her soul yearned for it, gravitating toward it like a planet pulled to a star.

She registered another colour, this one she thought she had felt before, but it wasn’t as familiar. Where Quom stood, a rusty grey colour occupied him.

“I do,” Rey frowned. “But what do I do with it?”

“Use it to find a direction to go in.”

“But how?”

“Here, this might be easier. Close your eyes and listen to my voice.”

Rey closed her eyes. All around her the familiar feelings became stronger, more intimate, more within her grasp.”

“Breathe,” Luke’s voice was soothing. “Just… breathe.”

Rey focused on nothing but her cleansing breaths. Somehow this all felt second nature to her.

Something independent of her conscious self reached forward into Force around her.

“What do you see?” Luke whispered, trying to keep the excitement out of his voice. He couldn’t believe that Rey still knew how to do it. He would have to be careful he didn’t push too far, or else a rush of unpleasant memories might set upon her.

“Something… distant,” Rey whispered back. “I see… a ship, not far from here. We need to go there.”

Whatever this thing was, it was screaming at her, pulling her to this ship. This… force around her wanted her to find it.

“But I need my eyes closed,” Rey frowned as she opened them. “I can’t see the ship while they’re open.”

“Then close your eyes and drive.”

Rey closed her eyes and reached for the parking break.

“Stop! Everybody stop!” Quom shouted.

Rey’s eyes flew open and her connection with severed.

“Luke, I’m happy that you got Rey to do… whatever you want to call this, but absolutely not.”

“Oh great, did Aletha get to you with her whole Rey isn’t old enough to drive spiel?”

“No, but your kid or not, there’s no way letting a twelve-year-old drive with her eyes closed will end in anything but disaster.”

Luke opened his mouth to refute Quom, but paused when he realized Quom was right.

“Alright, point taken. Switch seats with me, Rey. I’ll drive, you navigate.”

“But Dad—”

“No buts. I will not let another member of my family lose a limb.”

Rey frowned, “Does that happen a lot?”

“There’s about a 70% chance you’re going to someday get your arm cut off.”

“Great,” she groaned.

I don’t really notice the bones anymore – there are simply too many of them. These days I only think about them when I come across a body that’s more or less intact.

- Rey’s Survival Guide

“It’s an X-Wing!” Rey exclaimed as they pulled up to the battered ship. “I can’t believe it.”

“MG, we’ve hit the jackpot,” Quom grinned as they got out of the speeder.

“And it looks fairly intact,” Luke examined the X-Wing.

He always worried he might recognize a ship belonging to a friend from the war. He had known several who died in the Battle of Jakku, but he didn’t recognize the ship in front of him. The ship was rusty, and the paint had faded, though Luke could make out it used to be yellow.

“I think it’s Tierfon Yellow Aces Squad,” Luke ran his hand across the ship. “This looks like it was completely untouched.”

“Look, an R4 unit!” Rey pointed to a droid that had been completely scorched. “I wonder if it’s still operational? Could we keep it if it is, Dad?”

“Maybe,” Luke answered. He wasn’t the kind of person to abandon a droid, but if Artoo found out he had been hanging around with another droid on Jakku, Artoo would kill said droid.

He wondered how Artoo was doing.

“Alright, let’s split up,” Quom said. “Luke, you check out the droid, I’ll take the cargo bay, and Rey you check out the cockpit. This thing hasn’t been touched, so we’ll be stripping it for a few days.”
Remember, don’t tell anyone about until it’s a chassis of sand.”

Rey froze, an unwilling memory surfaced.

“Who told?” Jarex snapped.

Rey swallowed hard; if she stayed silent, the others might get hurt and that wasn’t fair to them.

“I did,” Rey said in a quiet voice, taking a step forward.

Jarex looked surprised, “You told?”

“Uh huh,” Rey nodded. She tried to keep her voice light, “I’m really sorry. I thought we were done and I only mentioned it in passing. It won’t happen again, I prom-”

Pain exploded in her face as a set of knuckles smashed into her nose and cheek.

“I’m sorry,” Tears streamed down Rey’s face, her heart thudding wildly in her chest. Blood dripped out of her nose, but she was too afraid to wipe it away. “I’m sorry! I didn’t mean to!”

“Rey?”

A hand fell on her shoulder, and Rey panicked. Without thinking, she turned and swung, closing her eyes tight in anticipation of another blow.

“Rey! No! Stop!” Luke exclaimed, leaning back from her flailing limbs. Using his Force powered reflexes, she grabbed her wrists and held them firmly in place, forcing her to stop swinging. “It’s okay, Rey. I’m here. You’re safe.”

She calmed when her brain registered that she was in her father’s arms.

“I’m sorry, Daddy,” Rey sobbed, tears dripping down her cheeks. She could have sworn she felt the blood dripping from her nose, but it was just snot. “I’m sorry.”

Rey sniffed, “Promise?”

“If he does, your Uncle will take off the other arm,” Quom winked at Rey.

It took a few minutes before she was settled, and Quom made a mental note of the triggering phrasing he had used so he wouldn’t repeat it. Soon enough, they were straight back to work, ready to discover why the Force had drawn Rey to this ship.

“Up you go,” Luke pulled Rey from her footing on the wing to the top of the ship. “You look at the cockpit, and I’ll take the droid.”

“How’s he look?” Rey gave two quick knocks on the cockpit glass as Luke pried open the dome of the R4.
“I think this one is pretty fired,” Luke inspected the droid. “Most of his innards are melted together. It’ll be better to just scavenge the parts.”

“Pity,” Rey started to lift the glass.

“Rey Erso, what do you think you are doing?” Quom exclaimed.

She frowned, “What?”

“You didn’t knock.”

“Yeah, I did,” Rey frowned.

“Not properly,” Quom shot.

She knew well enough to always knock before opening a part of a ship. Steelpeckers liked to roost in old machinery, and you did not want to crack open a nest. The scavengers had learn though that if you knocked in a certain way that sounded like a steelpecker searching for nesting grounds, a steelpecker would knock back to warn that the area was claimed.

“Come on, Rey,” Quom scowled at her, “three long knocks. Not two short ones. You don’t want to end up like Roke.”

Rey sighed, “Fine.”

She gave three long knocks.

There was no reply.

“See,” Rey said.

“Rey, don’t give Quom attitude,” Luke warned. “He’s just watching out for your safety.”

“Sorry, Quom,” Rey sighed. “Alright, let’s see this cockpit.”

Luke leaned over and helped her pull it open.

Rey gasped at the sight.

It was a full body in the sense that it had all its bones. The skin, hair, and eyes were long gone, with the rest of the organic material. He was now no more than a skeleton that would soon crumble to dust. His jumpsuit sagged around the brittle bones, and his helmet was strapped upon the cranium.

“You okay?” Luke looked at her. It wasn’t the first body she had seen, but he still didn’t like the idea of her seeing it.

“Yeah,” Rey swallowed. “Just… hard sometimes. You know, when you can tell it was a real person.”

“Yeah, it is,” he rested a hand on her shoulder. “Do you want me to move it?”

“No, let him be for now.”

“Sure. Why don’t you test the computer systems and I’ll help Quom start checking the wings?”

“Ok,” Rey nodded.
Luke scaled over to the wings where Quom was checking the laser generators. It was funny to think that once upon a time, Luke worked hard to maintain those kinds of ships, and now he was taking them apart.

“Targeting computer still works,” Rey declared. She tried to avoid the body as she unfastened the pull-down system. “Dad, do you think this was the same kind of system that Skywalker used to destroy the Death Star?”

“I guarantee it’s the same,” Luke chuckled. “Check the flight computer next when you’re finished with that.”

“Got it,” Rey declared.

“Toss it down.”

Rey leaned out the cockpit and dropped the targeting computer to the ground. She was oddly talented in dropping things great distances and not having them break. Her dad must have been worried or jealous over the ability. Whenever she dropped something, he would always weirdly reach out his arm and lower it in tandem to the ground.

Quom muttered, “Do you have to obvious about it, Luke?”

“Saves us time from constantly climbing up and down,” Luke muttered back.

“Just saying, makes MG look a little dumb for not noticing.”

“Well, she got my awareness DNA, not her mother’s… even then Felicity could be oblivious quite often.”

“Flight computer works!” Rey called. “Oh, and the memory drive is intact.”

Rey did her best to navigate the computer, though she didn’t have the passcode to get through to a lot of the information. What she didn’t know is that all Rebel Pilot Commanders had a master passcode programmed into all flight computers, that gave various levels of access based on the Commander’s own internal rank within the Command team.

And she also had no idea that her father’s passcode as Commander of Rogue Squadron, just so happened to be the highest-ranking Commander code. Then Rey was busy elsewhere, Luke would do his own investigations into the equipment.

“I’ve got a transponder ID,” Rey announced. “You’re right, Dad, this guy was part of the Tierfon Yellow Aces. He’s Yellow-4.”

Luke frowned. Why did that sound familiar?

“We’ll come help you with that shortly, MG,” Quom promised. “In the meanwhile, check behind his seat and check the trunking to the generator.”

“Also see if the power convertors are intact.” Luke caught Quom’s look, “Not a word from you. There’s literally power convertors behind the seat.”

“I love that we’re at the point I don’t even need to make jokes with you. Just send you a knowing look.”
In the cockpit, Rey was struggling with getting behind the seat. It wasn’t an extremely small space, it’s just that she didn’t feel too keen on the idea of clamouring over a skeleton to get to power convertors.

“Hey, Dad?” she called. “Do you think you could come move this body now? It’s giving me the creeps.”

“Sure thi- Oops!”

Rey dropped the screwdriver she had been using to unbolt the power convertors. It fell on the skeleton’s right arm and bounced off. But the strange part was the metallic clang it made when it hit the arm.

“That’s weird,” Rey muttered.

Steeling herself, she carefully lifted his right arm and rolled back the sleeve. To her absolute shock, he had a prosthetic arm.

Her curiosity was peaked. She knew that many pilots lost various limbs in the war, but there was something about this skeleton. Why had she been so drawn to it. She had to investigate.

The next odd thing she noticed about him was the glove of his left hand. Outside the glove, slid on the ring finger was a ring made of twisted bronze. The design looked somewhat familiar, but she couldn’t place from where.

What was odd about the ring was the fact it was outside the glove. In battle, pilots wore not accessories for their own safety. Married pilots were permitted to wear their wedding rings, as long as it was inside the glove.

The glove was stained with bloody smears. Looking at the other glove, Rey found that the palm was shredded and blood had soaked into the fabric. It took a minute before it clicked in Rey’s mind; when the pilot had been shot down, he must have taken off his glove, and… put his ring outside? Maybe as a way to identify himself?

Weird.

Everything else about him seemed normal for a crash victim. There weren’t any impressive markings on his helmet noting his participation in any battle of note. There was a black symbol of a starbird and the letter Forn, the symbol that he had joined the Rebellion because of the Bombing of Faclov. His kill count was average, but nothing to brag about.

Then she came to the name on his helmet.

She didn’t recognize it… but she had the feeling she should. The thing about Rey growing up on Jakku was that although Luke, Aletha, and Quom did their best, she wasn’t the most literate. Most of what she read were schematics, portion preparation instructions, various warning labels, and the teaching program Jarex had given Luke. The program unfortunately peaked at the third grade, so she had outgrown it a few years back. Aletha had been trying to get her to read medical texts, but Rey found them boring.

Rey could read on a basic level, but her writing wasn’t the greatest. It wasn’t until five years later when she wrote her guide that she improved her writing abilities.
So when she saw the name on the helmet, she didn’t recognize it, having only seen it written down a few times. And yet she knew it was familiar to her somehow.

“Hey, Dad?” Rey asked, “Do you recognize this pilot’s name?”

Luke frowned as he reached the top of the ship, “What name is it?”

She squinted at the letters, “Uh…”

“Sound it out.”

“Kay… Mar, or maybe Mer like Her… Eye? Kay Mer Eye?”

“Krill Yirt Mern Esk Resh Isk,” she spelled out.

Luke nearly fell off the ship.

“Did you just say K-Y-M-E-R-I?”

“Yeah. Do you know it?”

His mouth went dry. His stomach churned as he slowly walked over to the cockpit and looked down at the pilot within. Bronze ring, metal arm, a helmet reading Kymeri…

She scowled.

“Quom, stop scavenging this ship,” he didn’t even look at his friend. Luke couldn’t tear his eyes away from the body.

Quom was not happy about the command, “What? Why?”

Luke took a deep breath, “Because this is the ship of Antar Kymeri.”

Aletha was in the middle of reading a medical text when she heard Luke’s speeder pull up. Instantly her smile brightened, and she set aside her reading material. Taking a glance in her small looking glass on a cabinet, Aletha fixing up her appearance before going out to greet Luke.

He didn’t look as happy to see her.

“Hey, there stranger,” Aletha grinned as Luke stood at his speeder, not moving to approach her. “Back early for any particular reason?”

Luke glanced behind him into the speeder, “I needed to see you.”

She smirked flirtatiously, “Oh really? Quom and Rey don’t appear to be with you… Though I do recall all of you going out in this speeder. Did you just leave them in the middle of the desert?”

“They’re, um… we found a ship to work on.”

“So they’re busy.” Aletha sauntered over and wrapped her arms around Luke’s neck, “Good. I’ve needing a little… quality time.”

She pulled him onto a passionate kiss, hoping to spark something more. To her surprise, Luke gently pushed her off him.

“Aletha, wait,” Luke couldn’t meet her eye. “We can’t right now.”

“What’s going on?” Aletha frowned.

Luke bowed his head, “You know that question you always ask me when I scavenge?”

She nodded.

Luke took a deep breath, and lifted a helmet out of the speeder.

“What question?”

“Aletha, ask me again.”

Aletha tried not to cry as they drove to the site in complete silence. Twenty-three years of waiting, wondering, hoping… and finally she would have the body of her husband.

Antar had not been the perfect husband; in fact, she probably shouldn’t have bothered him to begin with, but she had loved him so deeply. She remembered the way he made her laugh, how he showed off to her during flight simulations, the flowers he brought her, the way he held her, the way he had fought to come home to her. She had loved him with an unmanageable depth, and she knew that feelings for Vina aside, he truly did love her too.

She glanced at Luke in the driver’s seat. His eyes were fixed on the horizon as he piloted them. Aletha loved this man just as much as she had Antar. Luke understood her in a way no one else could. Their shared knowledge of losing a spouse had brought them together, and their love for Rey had bound them for life. Even if things ended up not working out superficially, they would love each other forever.

Luke was not the great love of her life, and nor was Antar. Their hearts had belonged to the lucky women, Felicity and Vina. Though, Aletha supposed they weren’t lucky. Though they got to share a life with the wonderful men Aletha loved, they had died brutal deaths for it. Vina for going out to shop for her wedding to Antar, and Felicity for… well, Aletha didn’t know why, but she did know it was because of Luke.

She did not hate either woman. She certainly had no fond affection for Vina, more being indifferent these days to the woman. Aletha could bring herself to care for the woman that her own woman always yearned for. She couldn’t bear to give kindness to the woman who held her husband’s heart captive. Aletha Anthea was a petty person, and so while she refused to hate Vina, she would always dislike her.

Felicity Rhiaon was a different story. Three brief interactions the women had had, but they left a profound effect on Aletha. Now that she thought about, Aletha realized that Luke probably only knew about two of them. The first time they met when Felicity proved so desperate to protect her child, and so mad at Luke when he failed to receive her comm call. And the last time, when Aletha had taken a beating to protect Felicity, only to be rescued by her. There had been another meeting, shortly after their first, when Felicity brought Rey for a follow up check up after Felicity had discovered during the CPR to save Rey’s life, she had accidentally fractured one of Rey’s ribs.
Better than a dead child, Aletha had told her.

In those brief moments, she had learned why Luke would love this woman so much. Brave, loving, selfless, what was there not to love? Of course, she didn’t know Felicity well enough to know her fault, and those weren’t exactly the type of things widowers tended to extol about. But those brief encounters ensured that Felicity left a lasting impression on Aletha. Try as she might, Aletha could never hate Felicity Rhiaon for taking Luke’s love.

So it was a good thing that Luke had learned how to not prioritize his love for Felicity over his love for her.

“For what?” he still didn’t turn to her.

“Finding him.”

“Well, technically it was Rey.”

She smiled, “Then I’ll thank Rey.”

Luke was barely holding it together for her. He too had the mass of conflicting emotions over Aletha’s love for another man. Besides, there was another thing in the situation that was bothering him, and stirring up emotions he had long ago thought defeated.

“Is there any possibility you might recover Felicity’s body someday?” Aletha gently asked.

“No,” he shook his head. “It was very violently destroyed using a very intention technique. The First Order’s last shoot of gloating over killing my wife.”

Aletha sighed, “I’m sorry.”

“Don’t be. This isn’t about me, it’s about you finally getting closure with Antar. I’m really sorry about all of this, Aletha. You don’t deserve it.”

“No, but I’m responsible for the choices I made that brought me here. That’s all we can ask.”

“And what of the choices that brought me here?”

She reached over and clasped his hand, “Luke… I can’t speak for destiny or fate or any of that, but I do know that if it all had to happen, I am glad it happened to bring us together.”

He looked over at her and smiled, “I love you, Aletha Kymeri.”

“I love you, Luke Erso.”

They smiled at each other. Neither surname truly belonged to the other, yet here on Jakku, Aletha Kymeri and Luke Erso existed. They lived, and laughed, and loved each other. Even if it was just a lull in their lives, nothing could take this moment away from them.

And in that moment, Aletha knew that it was to right time to find Antar’s body. Antar Kymeri had been a chapter in her life that Aletha needed, but he was not her happily ever after. Luke Erso could be that happily ever after.

…but, part of her still wondered what it felt like to be someone’s first choice.
But she supposed it was simply something she would never know.

Aletha’s heart dropped when the X-Wing came into view. Quom and Rey were patiently waiting for their arrival, and next to them was something covered with a sheet.

Luke parked the speeder a little way from the X-Wing.

“We’re here,” he announced.

“I know,” Althea nodded, gathering her courage.

Luke reached over and took her hand, “Are you ready?”

She looked at him and gave a sad smile, “…Yes.”

Quom and Rey quickly stood when they saw Luke and Aletha. Quom opened his mouth to speak, but Rey tugged on his cloak and solemnly shook her head.

Luke said nothing when they reached the body. He led Aletha over to sheet, nodded at her, then released her hand and backed away.

Aletha took a deep breath and bent down. She needed a few minutes to steel herself. Her eyes ran over the sheet, trying to make out the shape of the body underneath. Closest to her was a hand. Cautiously, she reached underneath and drew out the body’s left hand.

Upon the pilot’s ring finger was Antar Kymeri’s wedding band.

Tears filled her eyes as she accepted the reality of the situation. This was her husband… and he was truly dead.

So she pulled back the sheet, and finally let herself cry.

Most of the people aboard the ships died the second they hit the ground – a fall from orbit will do that. Sounds bad, but they were the lucky ones.

- Rey’s Survival Guide

“His life support system shorted out,” Quom declared, rooting around the X-Wing as Aletha examined her husband’s body down on the sand.

“Based on his positioning and injuries, I think he knocked himself out badly,” she struggled not to burst back into hysteria front of the others. Later that night, her pillow would be filled with a great many tears.

“He would have been unconscious when the system died,” Luke grimly said. He stood several respectful feet away from Aletha and her husband’s body.

“Is that how he died?” Rey asked, a part of her hesitant that it might be an inappropriate question.
Aletha turned over the body and felt her hand up his spine, “Fractures and breaks in several places. If he had survived he would have been paralyzed very badly. His neck is broken, though I’m not sure if it was fatal… And there’s a fracture on his cranium. His brain would have filled with a lot of blood, and if he survived, he probably would have had mental difficulties… I think. I never did a lot of brain stuff in my medical studies. I don’t know what killed him, the impact, the spine, the neck, or the brain. It was a good thing he was unconscious, if he were awake, he would have died a very painful death. He might have even been conscious near the end, but with these injuries, he wouldn’t have been able to get himself out of the cockpit. Running out of air would have been a blessing. I don’t know what killed him, but he suffered.”

“That’s horrible,” Rey felt like she was about to throw up. She had seen so many bodies in the Graveyard and so many horrific deaths, but hearing Aletha describe the unbearable end her husband met stirred something in her. This time felt personal.

“It’s the risk of a pilot,” Luke sighed. “I remember whenever I got fresh blood in my squad, I told them the same thing. There’s not going to be glory in this. You will take lives and you will see your friends die. If you do die, it is not with dignity. It’s painful and brutal, and most times long enough to think about the ones you’re leaving behind. If you want to be a pilot, then you have to be prepared to die.”

Rey stared at the body of Antar Kymeri. A simple man who had fought so that people like her could know freedom. Sure, Jakku wasn’t the greatest place in the Galaxy, but because of Antar, she would never have to know what it felt like to live under the Empire.

“Thank you,” Rey whispered to him. “Thank you so much.”

I took the pilot’s helmet, sidearm, and comlink, along with his ejector’s seat’s gyros and magnetic couplings – all that stuff’s valuable in Niima, and it wasn’t going to do him any good. Then I buried him, still in his uniform.

- Rey’s Survival Guide

They buried him next to Mashra. It didn’t seem right to put him beside Felicity’s grave; there needed to be some sort of buffer between the graves of Luke’s spouse and Aletha’s.

Aletha gave Rey Antar’s helmet, she gave Luke his sidearm, and Quom received the comlink. She kept her husband’s wedding ring and kept it in her tent with his death medal and her wedding ring.

“Antar was a catalyst,” Aletha delivered the eulogy. “If he had never boarded Obik’s ship, Rogue One would never have convinced him to join the Rebellion, and she never would have become a Recruiter. If she wasn’t a Recruiter, she wouldn’t have gotten that offer from her father, and never would have then stolen the Death Star plans. If the plans weren’t stolen, Princess Leia wouldn’t have received them, Luke Skywalker wouldn’t have destroyed the Death Star, and the war would never have been won. Antar Kymeri was the reason we won the war, and he was the love of my life. Perhaps when I did he will be simply a love of my life, but the fact stands that I loved him, and it was an honour to be his wife. Thank you, Antar for giving me something worth fighting for… and for giving your life so we may know peace.”

Aletha stayed at Antar’s grave long past his burial. Luke, Quom, and Rey returned to the walker to give her some space. The sun was setting when Quom announced he had to leave, and Luke told him to go on without Aletha. He could always drive her home later, and worse came to worse, she stayed the night with him and Rey.

"Aletha?" Luke gently called as he approached her, still standing vigil at the grave.

"I just can’t believe I’ve really buried his body," Aletha’s voice was barely a whisper. "All these years, and now he’s here."

"I’ll tell you when I know myself.” Aletha stared forlornly at the grave, “I wished for this for so long, and now that it’s here, this seems so… final.”

"I know, I felt the same way about Felicity’s grave.”

"Do you think they’re happy we’re together?"

"I think Felicity would like you.”

Aletha smiled, “She did, enough to save my life. As for Antar… I think he might feel self-conscious about you. He always did say I deserved better, and I think if he knew I ended up with you, he would think you were the better.”

"What we have doesn’t invalidate what we had with them.”

"I know that, and I think that’s why I keep holding back from you.” Aletha turned and wrapped her arms around his neck, “But I asked for a sign, I asked to find his body to know it was time for me to move on… And today I found his body.”

Luke wrapped his arms around her waist, “So what does that mean?”

She grinned, “I’m all in, Luke Erso. Are you ready?”

“Absolutely.”

And they fell into a passionate kiss in front of the graves of the ones they would always love.

For one moment it seemed like for the first time in years, something was finally going right.

Rey played with her Luke and Felicity dolls in the walker. Dad was taking forever to go talk to Doctor Ally. She felt so sad about what had happened, but the sun was setting and it was dangerous for Dad to drive Doctor Ally home.

Sighing, she set her dolls down and left the walker to join them at the graves. But when she caught sight of the graves, she came to a dead halt.

Dad was making out with Aletha… in front of her own mother’s grave.

No. No, it couldn’t be. This was impossible. Dad and Aletha were friends, good friends and nothing more. Why were they kissing? And in front of Mom? How Dad do this? No, she refused to believe it.
Rey blinked her eyes hard, trying to clear the image from her vision, but the only thing that changed was it getting more blurred with tears.

How long had this been going on? Days? Weeks? Years? The whole time Rey had known Aletha? A horrifying thought occurred to Rey. What if the reason that they had stayed on Jakku was that Dad and Aletha had been messing around since the day Dad found her alive. Had they been here all this time for Aletha?

Horrifying thoughts filled her mind of Aletha plotting to steal her father away. That was it, she must have manipulated everything to lead to this moment where she entrapped for father for… What? Money? Maybe? Sort of? Something?

Did she really think Aletha that nefarious?

Rey couldn’t stand the sight. She ran back to the walker and inside she collapsed to her knees in tears. Why? Why? Mom was alive and Dad was cheating on her. He was having an affair, and hiding it from her.

Then she saw her dolls. Laying eyes on her father’s toy figure filled Rey with a dark rage she had never know. She picked up the doll and threw it as hard as she could against the opposite wall. She left out a bloodcurdling shriek of rage letting herself fill unknowingly with Darkness.

The ration cooker exploded.

Luke broke away from Aletha, sensing a burst of Dark Side in the Force.

“Did you hear that?” he looked around startled.

Aletha frowned and shook her head.

He looked at the walker and whispered, “Rey.”

Luke ran for it.

Rey fell backwards in fear from the explosion. She stared at the smoking ration cooker in horror and confusion. How did it break, and so violently? She couldn’t shake the sick feeling inside of her that somehow she was responsible.

“Rey?” she heard her father called.

Her eyes widened. She scrambled backwards, and grabbed her mother’s doll. Rey ran for her hammock, jumped in, and pulled on the covers just as Luke entered the walker.

“Rey!” he called, looking around. “Are you alright?”

She pretended to be asleep.

He exhaled in relief as he saw Rey was safe in her bed.

He used a hand on her back to usher Aletha out of the walker, but before he stepped a foot outside, he smelled smoke. Luke turned back and took in the scene in front of him, noticing what he hadn’t while worried solely on Rey’s safety.

The ration cooker was completely destroyed. The pilot doll was lying across the room, against the wall. And Rey was in her hammock, tightly gripping her Felicity doll, watching him through half closed eyes.

“You saw,” he said simply.

A tear rolled down Rey’s cheek as she nodded.

“Rey,” he whispered, at a loss of what to say. This wasn’t how she was supposed to find out, “Rey, I’m so sorry.”

“It’s okay, Dad,” she rolled onto her other side. “I’m fine.”

Luke sighed, knowing how false her words were. He could feel the truth in the Force and the intensity of her true emotions. While he thought Rey would be surprised at the thought of him dating Aletha, he never expected her to be mad. This mad.

How mad Ben had been over Felicity.

Luke had a bad feeling about this.

Chapter End Notes

Coming Up Next Chapter…
Second Best
While Luke struggles to get Rey to accept his relationship with Aletha, Aletha struggles to accept she’ll always be second best to Felicity.

Fun Fact, I don’t know how to drive. I never learned, so if there’s any inaccuracies to driving in this chapter, blame the how to drive articles I googled for this chapter.
The Terrible Twelves

Chapter Summary

Rey makes Aletha's life a living hell, Teng has a medical emergency, and Quom gets Luke laid.

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

The Long Way Home

Chapter Thirty-Four

The Terrible Twelves

“Come on, Rey, hurry up.”

“I’m going as fast I can.”

“She’s going to notice.”

“Stop worrying, Teng. You’re exaggerating the magnitude of the situation.”

“Hey, I live with her, I think I know a bit about her reaction to things.”

“There,” Rey declared as she completed the final stroke of her pencil. “All done.”

“Sweet,” Teng leaned over her shoulder to view the small drawings she made in her book. “Which of Meru’s tattoos did you get?”

Rey stared at the picture, “… I have no idea. I mean I recognize the ships, but I don’t understand why she would have them.”

Meru didn’t like people staring at her with all her cybernetic parts, and would throw out anyone she caught staring at the tattoos on her flesh arm. That was why Rey could only copy them down when Meru wasn’t looking. Teng had been a reluctant lookout, she knew he’d do it. Teng never said no to her.

The tattoos Rey had managed to copy down was the symbol of three staffs crossed together, and the image of an Imperial Star Destroyer fighting four TIE fighters… or at least they appeared to be fighting.

The speculation of the meaning behind Meru’s tattoos had sustained many hours of conversation between Rey and Teng. Of course, they were under hushed whispers, and they were on the constant lookout for Meru, but they were a popular topic whenever Rey hung out with Teng.

…And Rey had been hanging out with Teng a lot lately.

“You still avoiding your Dad?” Teng asked.
Rey sighed, “No, I gave up on that a few months ago. It’s hard to give the silent treatment to someone you live with.”

“And yet you’ve managed to go four months without speaking to Aletha.”

“That’s different. I can’t be as mad at Dad as I am at her.”

“Why?”

Rey frowned as she tried to think of an answer.

“Guess your resentment of Aletha dating your dad being greater than your anger at your father for dating her is kinda unfounded,” Teng said casually, trying not to appear smug.

She scowled at him, “Shut up with your stupid logic. I’m twelve. I wanna be mad.”

“Ok. As long as we’re on the same page.”

Rey sighed, “Teng, am I being ridiculous about this?”

“Yeah.” He caught her look, “Oh sorry, was that the wrong answer?”

She smacked his arm with her drawing book, “You’re supposed to agree with me.”

“Ok. I’m sorry. No need to hit me for making a mistake.”

Rey’s face went white.

---

Pain exploded across her cheek as Jarex’s fist slammed into her face.

“I’m sorry,” Tears streamed down Rey’s face, her heart thudding wildly in her chest. “I’m sorry! I didn’t mean to!”

---

“I’m sorry,” Rey said in a panic. “I’m sorry, Teng, I shouldn’t have- I’m sorry.”

Teng frowned, “Hey, it’s okay. I’m fine. It’s was just a bit of teasing among friends. Are you okay? You zoned out there for a second.”

Rey sighed, “No, I’m not okay.”

“What’s wrong?”

“It’s nothing,” Rey looked away.

“That’s not nothing,” Teng shook his head. He repeated more firmly, “What’s wrong?”

“It’s just… it brings back memories.”

“Of what?”

So Rey told Teng all about Jarex Zolhar and how he used to knock her around. Though Teng’s face was sorrowful as she told the story, fury was flashing in his eyes.
“What a monster,” Teng declared when she had finished.

“I try not to let it affect me,” Rey nervously rubbed her arm, unable to meet his eyes.

“I know what that’s like.”

Rey gave him a curious look.

“The pirates that left me on this planet used to knock me around too,” Teng admitted. He paused for a second, blinking as he tried to catch his bearings.

“You got left here?” Rey almost ended her sentence with the word too. There was some sort of sick glee in finding someone with the same traumatic experience as her.

“You may not think it, Rey, but frankly you’re lucky you don’t remember your past. I wish I could forget mine.”

“Teng?” Rey frowned as he started to sway. The sun was beating down pretty hot that day, “Hey, do you need something to drink? …Teng?”

Suddenly he grabbed the table with both hands; his grip upon it was the only thing holding him upright. His eyes were glazed and distant as his breathing became more frantic.

“Teng?” Rey’s voice was more frantic. She could sense something was wrong. “Hey, talk to me! Teng, you’re scaring me. Teng!”

That was the last thing Teng heard before he hit the ground.

“He’ll be alright, right Dad?” Rey asked as she, Luke, Quom, and Meru waited outside the tent for Aletha to finish with Teng.

“I’m sure he will be,” Luke patted Rey’s shoulder reassuringly.

Quom had been the one to bring Rey to Old Meru’s in the first place, working that day to fix up an engine that was giving Meru problems. He had taken Rey with him to see Teng and prevent there from being another day of awkward and angry bickering between Luke, Rey, and Aletha. Sometimes he just couldn’t stand being the awkward third wheel… or fourth wheel in this case, even though having four wheels completely defeated the metaphor. Though technically wheelbarrows had three wheels, and they worked just fine. And who even used wheels these days with all the speeder technology.

Ok, he seriously needed to get out of the heat.

When Teng had passed out, he immediately called for Aletha to come help. Both Rey and Meru had objected: Rey because of her bitterness towards Aletha, and Meru because she didn’t want to pay a doctor to fix her indentured servant. It was only when Luke agreed to pay for Teng’s treatments himself that Meru stopped complaining about the profit loss Teng was causing.

Finally, after about an hour, Aletha emerged from the tent.

“Well?” Rey demanded, shooting to her feet.

“He’ll be fine,” Aletha smiled, secretly glad that Rey was actually conversing with her for the first time since Antar’s burial four months ago. “Teng just passed out from hunger with the extreme heat magnifying the situation. When was the last time he ate?”

“No clue,” Meru shrugged. “I give him portion packets when he completes work. I don’t track when he cooks them. But he has been getting a lot less packages lately.”

“Why’s that?” Luke eyed Meru sternly. Even though Teng wasn’t his child, Luke’s Papa Bear instincts were perking up.

“Because he’s been wasting all his time with her lately,” Meru jerked a thumb behind her at Rey. “He completes less projects, so he gets less food.”

“But you have to feed him!” Rey exclaimed. “You’re his caretaker!”

Luke placed a hand on her shoulder to ease her back.

Meru glared at Rey in a way that indicated she’d be doing a lot more than glaring if her father wasn’t around.

“I’m his employer, not his mother,” Meru snarled. “I paid for him to help me out around here, not keep as a pet. And believe me, I’m starting to regret that decision.”

Rey opened her mouth to argue, but Luke sternly pushed her behind him. The gesture was gentle but firm. Meru was not someone for Rey to argue with.

“Let’s go check on Teng, Rey,” Luke ordered. “Aletha, is he safe to see?”

“He’s stable now,” Aletha stepped forward and wrapped her arm around Luke.

Rey glared at the sight.

“Come on, Rey,” Luke nodded down at her. “Let’s check on Teng.”

“Okay, Daddy.”

Rey roughly pushed between Luke and Aletha, intentionally shoving them apart. As Aletha stumbled from the force, Rey entered the tent without even a glance back.

Aletha grabbed his arm, “Leave it.”

“But-”

Luke glanced warily at Quom. The Vrogem’s eyes were fixed on the tent, and his face was distant. But when he realized Luke was staring at him for guidance, Quom offered a simple shrug.

“Alright,” Luke sighed, wrapping his arm around Aletha’s waist. “But I will speak to her when we get home.”

“Deal,” Aletha agreed. “Now, let’s check on Teng.”

“In a minute,” his voice sounded a little distant.

Luke nodded and disappeared with Aletha inside the tent.

Quom stood there and just stared at Meru; his brow furrowed ever so slightly. It was a long time before he spoke.

“Were you serious about what you said?” Quom asked. “Are you regretting buying the boy?”

“He’s been nothing but a profit loss to me,” Meru replied. “If he gets in trouble like this one more time, I’ll be forced to sell him.”

Quom sighed as Meru stomped away so matter of fact. She might as well start searching for a buyer, because there was no way Teng wasn’t going to get himself in major trouble again. Not when he had a Skywalker for his best friend.

…Even if it was a miniature Skywalker.

“I’m not apologizing to Aletha,” Rey refused as she returned with Luke and Quom to their mechanic tent.

They had dropped off Aletha when they returned to Niima Outpost. She had some medical business to attend to, so she wouldn’t join them for the rest of the day. Luke and Aletha had parted with a tender kiss, which Rey had made loud gagging noises to, leading to Luke’s lecture on not only the inappropriateness of that action, but the earlier shoving incident.

“Yes, you are,” Luke said sternly. “Aletha has done nothing wrong. If you have anything again our relationship, you bring it up with me.”

“Fine,” Rey folded her arms, “I don’t like you dating Aletha.”

“Well, I hear your objection, but you don’t really get a say in it. Aletha treats you with uttermost respect and affection. You don’t get to veto her without just cause, and there is not just cause in this situation.”

“Yes, there is.”

“How?”

“I don’t know, there just is!”

“Rey could you please be reasonable for two minutes while we have this conversation?” Luke rubbed his temples.

“Luke Erso, you are arguing with a twelve-year-old,” Quom pointed out. “Are you really surprised that a child is being a little childish.”

“Yeah!” Rey grinned. Then his words registered, “Wait. No!”

“Too late, you agree with me,” Quom gave her a toothy grin.

Rey rolled her eyes, “I’m not apologizing to Aletha.”
“Yes, you will, and you will be sincere about it,” Luke admonished. “You’ll have a chance tonight at dinner.”

Rey frowned, “What do you mean?”

“Aletha is joining us for dinner tonight,” Luke said. “I think it’s time we sit down and work this out.”

“I’m not having dinner with her!”

“Yes, you are, so shape up because I expect you on your best behaviour tonight.”

“I wanna go home now. Without Aletha.”

“Tough, we’re staying in town and having dinner with her here. Now go too the bathing situation and clean yourself up. Tell them to credit me a bath for you.”

“No!” Rey refused. “Take me home now.”

The sternest look Rey had ever seen from her father entered his eyes.

“Rey Rhiaon Erso,” Luke gritted his teeth, “you will march over to the bathing situation now.”

But the fire of Anakin Skywalker and Felicity Rhiaon burned in her blood.

“Fine, I’ll drive myself home then,” Rey stomped toward the speeder.

Luke grabbed her by the shoulder and turned her back around, “No, you won’t. We have to get over this, Rey, so we’re all going to have dinner tonight like we used to do.”

Rey tried not to gulp in fear; when Dad got a look like that in his eye, used the name Rhiaon, and put a hand on her, she knew she was in deep trouble.

Her father never laid a hand on her the way Jarex had, but Luke was not above literally using a firm hand when she got insubordinate. It was how he had been raised by Uncle Owen, you don’t hit a kid, but if you had to physically hold one back, then so be it.

Felicity had actually not approved of this method of discipline. She was more for a stern word and removal of privileges the way her father had dealt with her, but to a far less extreme.

It was interesting, seeing how when Felicity got into fights with Luke at the beginning of their relationship, Felicity had no qualms about getting physical with him. Nothing that would get the police called, but a slap, smacking his natural arm or chest, shoving him back from her, or other such small actions.

When she returned home from her treatment of Postpartum Depression, she and Luke had gone through couples counselling to address the problems in their relationship that had led to the circumstances around the Incident They Didn’t Speak of. In those sessions, Luke and Felicity had come to the agreement that due to Rey’s Force Sensitivity, if Rey ever got to a level where Luke genuinely feared she was close to giving in to the Dark Side or injuring herself, he would be allowed to physically stop Rey from going off on her own. He was also allowed to use it under the same circumstances to remove her from a situation to deescalate things. Of course, getting physical was only once all other resources had been exhausted, but there were times Luke had to step in.

“Enough, Rey,” Luke warned her. His grip on her arm was firm, but not violent or painful. Whenever he was forced into the action of grabbing her, he always was very cognisant of how he was touching her.

She looked to Quom for support, “But-”

“He’s right,” Quom agreed. “This is the best way to resolve this conflict, MG.”

“Thank you,” Luke smiled. “See Rey, even Quom thinks it’s a good idea for us all to have dinner together.”

Rey scowled, “You can’t make me.”

“Sweetheart, I am your father,” Luke said simply as he released her shoulder, “until the day you turn nineteen, I can make you do anything I want. And tonight, I’m going to make you sit down and have a nice dinner with myself, Aletha, and Quom.”

“Wait, what?” Quom blurted out. “I’m coming to the awkward dinner where you three are probably just going to sit there and glare at each other?”

“Whether you like it or not,” Luke grinned. “Aletha will be here in an hour.”

“Is it too late to rescind my agreement that having this dinner was a good idea?”

“Yes, yes it is.”

“Damn it.”

Dinner was just as awkward as Quom suspected. The four of them each sat on one side of the square table, perfectly distanced apart. Rey had refused to sit beside Aletha, so they sat facing each other head on, Rey glaring the whole time. Quom was across from Luke, giving him an equally poisonous glare, furious that he had been dragged down into the whole mess.

The tent was filled with absolute vocal silence, the only noise in their ears being the scraping of utensils against their plates. They wolfed down the bland Imperial portions as quickly as possible, everyone looking like they were ready to bolt from the table the second their plate was clean.

Reminded too much of the awkward, silent dinners she had grown up with, Aletha made a stab at engaging the group in pleasant conversation.

“It’s so nice to finally sit down with all four of us and share a meal together once again, do you think?” she smiled around at the group.

No one said a word, but Rey glared very harder. Aletha swallowed. Rey was making her worry about getting stabbed with a dinner knife as much as Alecta once did… Actually, Alecta would always sit across from Aletha at dinner too, glaring that terrifying glare.

She seriously didn’t know how she ever made it out of adolescence without Alecta smothering her in her sleep.

Aletha tried again, “How are your driving lessons going, Rey?”

Intrigued, Rey raised an eyebrow, “I thought you didn’t like me driving?”

“Well, not when you’re so young, but I’ve accepted that I have no say in the matter. That is a decision for your parents to make, specifically your father. After all, I’m not your mother.”

Rey grinned, “You’re right. You’re not my mother.”

Aletha winced, and Luke sighed, pinching the bridge of his nose.

“Well, you walked right into that one, Doc,” Quom chuckled.

“I’m not trying to be your mother, Rey.” Aletha tried to defend herself. “Yet you’re acting like I’ve dyed my hair brown, taken lessons in sarcasm, and started nagging you to take your vitamins.”

“You have been nagging me to take my vitamins.”

“I’ve been doing that since you were five years old, there’s precedent!” Aletha gritted her teeth, “You’re welcome for getting you those vitamins, by the way.”

“I’ve never asked for them!” Rey snapped. “You don’t need to get them for me.”

“Yes, I do. I’m not going to let you grow up unhealthy. We may be on Jakku, but I’m going to do everything in my power to ensure you grow up right.”

“That’s not your responsibility!”

“Whether you like it or not, yes it is.”

“You’re not my mother!” Rey screamed.

“Enough!” Luke exclaimed. “Rey, she is not trying to be your mother. Aletha, you don’t need to yell at her. Now can we all just simmer down and have a nice meal together like the family we once pretended to be.”

Aletha looked at him with pity, but she couldn’t take it. It was too much like her home life and too much like Antar to handle.

“I’m sorry, Luke,” Aletha stood up, “but I can’t deal with this anymore tonight.”

“No, Aletha,” he caught her hand to stop her.

She just shook her head, “I’ll see you tomorrow, Luke.”

Aletha pulled her hand out of his grip, and exited the tent.

Rey threw down her fork and got to her feet, “I’m done too. I’ll be waiting in the speeder to go home.”

And Rey exited the tent too.

“So... that went well,” Quom said.

Luke sighed, staring out the tent flap after the girls, “I don’t know what I’m going to do. I love them both, but I don’t want to choose between them. If I pick Aletha, I alienate Rey, but if I pick Rey, I cut off Aletha and treat her the same way Antar did, like she’s some second rate love interest.”

“But isn’t she?” Quom asked, collecting the dinner plates.

“No, Aletha is just as important to me as Felicity was,” Luke stood to help. “Sure, we don’t have a child together, but she’s an important part of my life and I love her dearly. I’d die for her.”

“Luke, in all fairness, you would die for pretty much anyone.”

“Much better,” Quom nodded as they packed away the dishes.

Luke sighed, “I just… can’t believe I’m in the middle of this again.”

Quom frowned, “Again?”

“This is how the feud between Ben and Felicity started. Ben would never admit to me what the trigger had been, but one day he just turned on her. It happened overnight, one day being actually really fond of her and excited whenever she was around. Then all of a sudden, he hated her.”

“Was this when you started dating her?”

“Months before then, before we even started showing signs of being seriously attracted to each other.”

Quom opened his mouth.

“I’ve checked with Han and Leia,” Luke interrupted. “They agree that things weren’t serious yet with us. Sure, it was after I learned she had a boyfriend, and I had tried to ask her out, but it wasn’t full on, apparent to everyone love yet. As far as Ben knew, Felicity and I were just good friends. Next thing I know he starts in on her being very hostile, protective, and did whatever was in his power to cut Felicity out of my life.”

“Was it because of Snoke?”

“Maybe, maybe not. But I know Snoke certainly fed on that anger and hatred, and it led Ben down a path that turned him into what he is today.”

“Yeah, but what happened with those two was different. Aletha’s not reacting aggressively like Felicity did.”

Luke raised an eyebrow.

“Before tonight,” Quom amended. “Besides, you know Doc doesn’t mean it. She’s just frustrated with the situation. Felicity did mean the actions she took against Ben. And besides, Rey doesn’t have Snoke in her head.”

“But there is Dark Side in her soul,” Luke pointed out. “It’s in all of us, but with how strong my family is with the Force, the danger increases exponentially. There’s a Darkness in Rey, one that could corrupt her if left unchecked. She has to learn to tame these impulses.”

“And become a Jedi like her father before her?” Quom smirked.

Luke gave a bittersweet smile, “She’s not ready for it, Quom.”

“She isn’t? Or are you the one not ready?”

Luke didn’t have an answer for that.

“She needs to learn the truth someday,” Quom said.
“Someday, not today,” Luke insisted. “The sooner she knows, the sooner it’s likely to get out, and the sooner the First Order comes after us. She’s not strong enough yet to face the First Order. She’s not strong enough to face Snoke.”

“Then make her strong. Teach her to use the Force.”

“No, I can’t without revealing who I am.”

“Then what happens if the First Order shows up tomorrow?”

“Quom-”

“No, I’m serious!” Quom objected. “It’s highly unlikely you’re going to control when the… what did the ghosts call it? The lull? You’re not going to control when that ends. If Rey doesn’t learn to defend herself from the Dark Side soon, she’s going to be in danger, and not just from the First Order.”

Luke stared at him, “You’re afraid you’re going hurt her.”

Quom looked away, “You know what the Dark Side does to me. I can’t control myself, I would even attack you.”

“You’re not going to hurt her, Quom,” Luke said kindly but firmly. “I won’t let that happen.”

“You need to teach her, Luke, for all of our sakes. A surge of anger from her has already destroyed a ration cooker, what next? We’re scavenging a site, she gets mad at you and suddenly the wing of a ship collapses on you? Yes, she needs protection, not only from the First Order, not only from me, but from herself. You don’t want this feud to end like Ben and Felicity’s? Teach her better than you taught Ben, or else this is going to end with another blaster bolt to the temple.”

Luke sighed and looked down, “But I can’t teach her to be a Jedi without revealing what I am. Who I am.”

Quom smiled, “Then don’t.”

Luke frowned, “What do you mean?”

“Don’t teach her to be a Jedi… Teach her to be one hell of a scavenger.”

Luke grinned, “You, My Friend, are a genius.”

Quom shrugged, “I try. So what did you think about that Teng boy?”

Luke frowned, “Good kid, why?”

“Meru’s not happy about her investment. She’s thinking of… trying to reclaim the money she tied up in the venture.”

“For Rey’s sake, I hope not. That boy has been a blessing these past four months.”

“As much as I don’t like her spending time with the ruffian, I will admit he’s been good for her,” Quom admitted. “Just hopefully he doesn’t get too good for her. And I don’t mean in the out of her league way. I mean the he’s doing things that-”

“Yes, I understand what you meant,” Luke interrupted. “Have you told Rey about Meru’s interest in divesting herself of her asset?”
“No, I think it’ll be better for you to tell her.”

“Good luck with that, Rey and I are barely on speaking terms these days.”

Quom exhaled loudly, wrestling with himself over the knowledge he had been hiding from Luke since the X’us’R’iia. If only Luke understood Rey’s mindset, he might know how to handle Rey’s rejection of Aletha. But Quom had sworn to Rey not to tell Luke, and with everything going on, Rey needed a consistent ally. He couldn’t betray her without destroying her in the process, so he kept her secret safe.

But still… that didn’t mean he couldn’t encourage Luke to uncover the truth.

“I know, it’s just—”

“No, seriously, you have to sit down and have a serious heart to heart with that girl. She’s… going through some things right now, and not just puberty stuff. Rey… She’s got a… There’s something she really needs to tell you.”

Luke frowned, “What’s going on?”

“I promised not to tell, and she really needs someone on her side right now,” Quom answered. “I can’t tell you, but… there’s something big going on right now.”

“Is someone hurting her?”

“It’s not another Jarex situation,” Quom assured. “But the things she went through when she was young are starting to catch up with her. She needs her Dad.”

Luke nodded, “I respect your decision to hold such loyalty towards Rey’s wellbeing, so I won’t pry further. Force knows that there were plenty of things I admitted secretly to Biggs that I couldn’t tell Uncle Owen while growing up. I’ll try to talk to her tonight.”

Quom hesitated, “Maybe give her a night to simmer down. Trust me, Luke, this isn’t going to be an easy conversation.”

Luke nodded. He smiled and placed a hand on Quom’s shoulder. He didn’t need to express in words how grateful he was to have a friend with him on Jakku like Quom. Some days he missed Han’s friendship, and Quom was able to offer a close substitute.

But not a full one. Oh how he wished he had at least had the courage to leave Han and Leia with even a note, any sort of explanation of why he left… and why he now stayed away.

He only hoped they would find it inside themselves to forgive him.

“You should get going,” Quom urged. “It’s going to be dark soon, and you know better than anyone how dangerous the desert gets at night.”

“Nah, thank you. Life has gotten so much more interesting ever since a Skywalker got involved. I’ll see you tomorrow, Luke.”

“Have a good night.”
Quom sighed again once Luke had exited the tent. Faintly her could hear the voice of Rey and roar of the engine on Luke’s speeder. Soon enough his friends were gone, and once again Quom was left to spend another cold night alone.

He envied the duo; even while fighting, Luke and Rey always had someone to sleep by their side. Quom had never really cared about being alone until Rey Rhiaon Skywalker entered his life. She, Luke, and Aletha had ruined him forever, now he didn’t like being alone. Now he wished there was someone to wake up to in the morning. A lover, a child, a friend, it didn’t matter. He just wished there was someone there.

Then again, Quom didn’t always envy Luke and Rey. He certainly didn’t envy their forthcoming conversation. It would be one of the hardest of Luke’s life, and Quom wondered if the Jedi would have the courage to admit to Rey what had truly happened to her mother.

How could someone have possibly survived that?

The woman who called herself Captain Phasma stood on the balcony with her hands clasped behind her back. On either side of her were the four other highest-ranking Captains in the First Order.

It was selection day, the day the Captains would pick their units from this year’s batch of sixteen-year-olds, the age in which the First Order declared they were ready to be full time soldiers.

“The unit three from the right, four rows in looks promising,” Captain Roan said.

“I’ve got my eye on four left, six in,” said Captain Sigma.

The five Captains stood out from the sea of gleaming white Stormtroopers, but they looked relatively identical to each other when standing together. They had the same sort of weapons and capes on their mantle. There were three women and two men, all in an armor of different hue and metal than the average soldier.

Captain Roan had a red suit of some metal Phasma didn’t know what planet it came from, nor really cared to find out. He was a pompous ass who went through soldiers faster than batteries in his voice modulator.

Captain Tyche literally burned through batteries in his voice modulator fast. He loved the sound of his own voice, and his troops tended to hear his approach long before they caught a glimpse of his black armor.

Chapter Sigma was a perfectionist. Her sky-blue suit was so shiny, Phasma could see her reflection in it. Sigma didn’t necessarily have the most skilled soldiers, but by the Gods were their movements flawless. You couldn’t get a battle droid to reload and fire as mechanically as Sigma’s troops.

Captain Electra made Phasma’s skin crawl. Electra was the head of interrogation aka the torture unit. Her suit was made of brass, which was a secret joke among the other Captains, but there was a sickly green hue to it that made one as uneasy as the woman herself. True to her name, Electra’s specialty was using electrical shock to obtain information, and the woman always liked to start her sessions at 100% voltage.

But Phasma had the highest rank of the five, and no one dared question her. Not after what had happened to Felicity Rhiaon.
“Who do you have your eye on?” Sigma asked Phasma.

“Oh, you know, Phasma,” a mechanical but male voice called.

The Captains turned to see a masked Kylo Ren and General Hux striding towards them.

“Phasma never chooses until she sees them up close,” Kylo grinned behind his mask.

“Master Ren,” Phasma bowed stiffly.

“Now, Ren,” Electra chuckled, “I don’t think any of us truly know who Phasma is.”

“Captain,” Hux warned.

“Come now,” Electra goaded, “unmask yourself and let us see the real woman beneath.”

“That will be enough, Captain,” Hux ordered with a glare.

Electra’s smile was evident beneath her faceless mask.

“You never answered the question, though,” Hux turned to Phasma. “Do you have your eye on any troop this year?”

Phasma cocked her head to the side, “Is there something special about this batch?”

Hux smiled, “We’ll see.”

Phasma glanced over at Kylo Ren, “What I think is immaterial. Master Ren always gets first pick.”

“OFFICERS ON THE FLOOR!” a training commander down below bellowed. “ATTENTION!”

In perfect unison all two hundred soldiers salute and stood to attention.

“Shall we?” Hux gestured to the staircase.

It was the same procedure as every year. A row of soldiers containing three units would step forward. Hux, Kylo, and the five Captains would walk the line, scrutinizing the cadets, and then one would lay claim to each unit before them. Kylo had first dibs, then Hux, then Phasma, Electra, Tyche, Sigma, and Roan. Once selected, the cadets would present their left wrist to logging assignments – a Stormtrooper was tattooed with their number on their left wrist at age ten. Finally their new Captain would present each sixteen-year-old with a shiny new blaster. A child no more, the Cadets were soldiers to die for the cause.

Things were going fine until one group stepped forward. The unit in the middle had four boys in it, and as they stepped forward, one of the boys slipped on the freshly waxed floor. He flailed as he fell to the group, desperately trying to grab one of his brothers for support. He grabbed the arm of a redhead, and accidentally yanked him down with him.

The room laughed until Hux raised his hand to signal silence. The redhead boy who had been pulled down shoved the boy who had slipped.

“Nice going, 2003,” the redhead snarled.

“Leave him, Nines,” the boy next to him snapped. The boy had brown skin, black hair, and brown eyes. He grabbed the fallen boy and helped pull him up.
“Don’t defend him,” the fourth boy said. “Seriously with a stunt like that, we should just start calling you Slip.”

Slip’s shoulders drooped.

“Attention!” Electra snapped.

The boys immediately shot back into formation.

Kylo would always observe the cadets first, walking the line of them reaching into the Force to see if any of them stood out.

“How many Knights of Ren does he need to replace this year?” Roan muttered.

Sigma answered, “Three. The boy goes through soldiers faster than you.”

“Silence,” Electra hissed at them.

Kylo walked the line with his head held high and arms folded neatly behind his because. He didn’t even glance at the unblinking teenagers as they waited to hear their fate. There wasn’t nothing remarkable about this lot. Not a signal one stood-

Kylo stopped in his tracks.

Wait a minute.

Following the tug in the Force, Kylo backtracked a few steps and turned to face the unit containing Slip and Nines.

“Which of you is the unit leader?” Kylo demanded.

The boys looked at each other in confusion.

“Master Ren,” Phasma interjected, “we don’t assign leaders at this stage.”

Kylo sighed, “Then which one of you has the highest test scores?”

One of the boys stepped forward.

It was the same that had helped up Slip.

Kylo studied the boy’s face with interest. None of the cadets were ever fully Force Sensitive – those children always went directly to Snoke – but some had… potential.

And this boy had great potential.

“Number,” Kylo snapped.

The boy obediently held out his arm and pulled back his sleeve.

Kylo’s heart froze.

“FN-2187,” the boy declared.

Silence fell upon the group of Officers. Sigma, Tyche, and Roan looked at each other, hoping one of the others had an answer. Hux exchanged a nervous glance with Electra.

Phasma looked like she had been slapped. Without a word, she stepped forward and joined Kylo’s side. She stared into the boy’s face in disbelief. Her heart was pounding in her ears as she took in the sight of a face she never thought she’d see again. She remembered so vividly the day the boy became important in her life. The day Phasma tore him out of the arms of Felicity Rhiaon.

“You’re FN-2187?” Phasma said.

FN-2187 tried not to scowl, “Yes, Captain.”

“You’re so… young,” Kylo whispered. “Sixteen and ready for combat?”

He had never really thought about the ages of the cadets before, and yet as he stared at the boy, he was reminded of how many years it had been since Felicity Rhiaon had entered his uncle’s life and ruined everything.

Had it really been that long ago?

Phasma looked at the young man at her side, “You were his age when you took your first life.”

“That’s right, Ren,” Hux nodded. “These cadets usually don’t actually see action for another few years, but they do it afar with blasters. Meanwhile you were this young and stained your hands with the blood of Alyla Kene.”

Ben Solo clenched his fist.

Captain Electra gave something that was too evil to be a giggle, “Tell me Master Ren, when you ran Kenobi’s blade through her, did the Jedi Bitch scream?”

For a moment, Ben Solo’s hand twitched to his lightsaber. He was ready to ignite it and swing it through Electra to see if the Brass Bitch screamed. But he refrained because he knew what he was supposed to think: he wasn’t supposed to defend the honour of some good for nothing Jedi who had tried to stop him from pursuing the path of goodness and join the First Order.

Even if that good for nothing Jedi was the kindest, gentlest, most loving soul he had ever met. No, he wasn’t supposed to feel sympathy for her, not even as he recalled the heartbreaking look on her face of sorrow, disbelief, and non-understanding as Obi-Wan Kenobi blade sunk through her chest.

“Why?” had been Alyla Kene’s last whispered word.

Seven years later, Ben Solo didn’t have an answer.

Phasma placed a hand on his shoulder. Ben looked up at Phasma and she nodded at him. Kylo took a deep breath and nodded back.

“He’s mine,” Phasma declared, bringing them back on track. “I want FN-2187.”

“Now wait a minute,” Electra stepped forward, “I have had my eye on this one for a while. He has some of the highest test scores we have ever seen.”

“And you’re going to waste him on interrogation?” Phasma laughed. “I think not.”

“Master Ren, please, you can’t let her have him. I’ll make him into the finest torturer the First Order has ever seen.”
“And I will make him into a General fit for Darth Vader’s own command.”

Electra glared at Phasma from behind her mask. Everyone knew if you wanted something from Kylo Ren, namedropping Darth Vader was a guarantee. Especially if one was Kylo Ren’s favorite Stormtrooper Captain. Ren and Phasma had been almost inseparable for the past three years.

Sure enough, Kylo looked to Phasma and said, “His troop is yours, Captain Phasma.”

“Thank you, Ren,” Phasma bowed her head.

“But I want him added to my saber classes. He has… great potential and I want to nurture it.”

“I’ll be sure to take it into consideration while making his schedule.”

Electra objected, “But Master Ren-”

“Phasma has seniority, Electra,” Kylo said sharply.

Behind her mask, the woman smirked at Electra, “Better luck next time, Electra.”

As Phasma went to step back, Electra grabbed her arm and yanked Phasma in close.

“You have no right to that boy,” Electra hissed.

“Oh really?” Phasma smirked. “You really want to challenge me on this? Here? Now? In front of everyone? Go ahead, challenge me, but I guarantee that if you do it… you’re the only one who’ll end up looking like a fool.”

“Withdraw, Electra,” Hux coolly ordered.

Electra glared and released Phasma, “This isn’t over.”

“I know. It wouldn’t be fun if it was.”

It took all of Electra’s restraint not to yank the chrome helmet from her smug face.

Phasma did the traditional presenting of the squad their face weapons, but when she handed FN-2187 his weapon, she didn’t let it go.

“I’ll be keeping my eye on you, FN-2187,” Phasma promised. “Just remember, no matter what happens, no matter what you’re forced to do, or whatever trial comes your way… never forget who you truly are.”

FN-2187 frowned but nodded, “Yes, Captain.”

Phasma released his weapon and stepped away, “FN Squad, you are dismissed.”

The four boys marched out of the room in confused silence. When they entered the holding area with the other assigned cadets, they stared at each other as if one of them had an answer for the strange interaction.

“What just happened?” Nines asked.

Zeroes – the boy who had named Slip – frowned, “I have no idea.”

The boys stood in continued silence.
“Are you guys actually going to call me Slip now?”

“Yep,” Zeroes and Nines answered together.

FN-2187 scowled.

“Stop scowling,” Luke chided as Rey glared across the market at Aletha.

They were waiting in line with all the other scavengers to make their trade with Plutt. Aletha was busy attending to the wound of Ivano – he had sliced his arm earlier that day. As they moved closer to the head of the line, Rey would not stop giving her the evil eye. Luke could have even sworn she wasn’t blinking.

Luke sighed and muttered, “Any advice, Father?”

But Anakin Skywalker made no reply. Luke had been hearing significantly less from his father these days, and whenever he could ask why, Anakin would simply answer that he was busy with something else. Then he would usually tell Luke that Felicity sends her love, as if Luke would actually believe that Felicity Rhiaon would send him a message via Darth Vader. Seriously, couldn’t his father think of a better diversion if he wanted Luke to stop asking questions?

“We really need to work through this Aletha situation, Rey,” Luke turned his attention back to his daughter.

“I’m not having dinner again with her tonight,” Rey said stubbornly.

Quom was standing in line behind them, “You two make any progress last night?”

“No,” they answered in unison.

He frowned, “Just thought I’d ask.”

“Erso,” the gruff voice of Unkar Plutt called up Luke next to the window.

Luke and Rey stepped forward, unloading their haul for him.

“Well, these are some beautiful pieces here.” Plutt chuckled as his eyes flicked up to Rey, “But certainly not the most beautiful thing you own, Erso.”

Luke’s eyes narrowed, and Rey took a step back. Her stomach churned as his beady eyes took her in, something the Blobfish had been doing more lately.

“It’s always a pleasure when I get to see you, Sweetheart,” Plutt grinned. “You really should accompany your father to see me more often, My Girl.”

Luke protectively placed a hand on Rey’s shoulder, “Rey, go stand back with Quom.”

Rey nodded and raced back to Quom’s awaiting embrace. She tried not to shudder as Quom wrapped his free arm around her and glared at Plutt.

“She’s growing into a very lovely woman, Erso,” Plutt grinned. “Looking more like her mother everyday.”
“I would be very careful of what you say about my daughter,” Luke warned. He knew exactly what Plutt had thought of Felicity, and it angered him to imagine that Plutt might start thinking those same things about Rey. “Let’s just get down to trading, shall we?”

Rey watched as her father negotiated with Plutt. The way he had looked at her had made her skin crawl, and she almost vomited at his usage of the terms “Sweetheart” and “My Girl.” Sweetheart was the name her parents tenderly called her, and My Girl belonged to Quom on occasion, sometimes saying that MG stood for both Miracle Girl and My Girl. Now Plutt had tainted those precious words. No one was allowed to call her that, no one but Quom and her father.

Luke was aware of Rey’s eyes on their interaction. He tried to keep a calm head for her sake, but he got that same ugly feeling in his stomach he had gotten the day he had seen Jabba the Hutt force Leia into… that outfit. He had hated seeing it on her as her friend, but was horrified by it as her brother.

Rey was only twelve, why did he have to deal with this now? Between Teng and Plutt, why were people checking out his little girl? He was so not looking forward to her teenaged years… though age twelve was proving difficult already.

As he negotiated with Plutt, Luke couldn’t help but recall Quom’s suggestion of teaching Rey the Force without actually explicitly teaching it. With Rey’s focused attention on the interaction, this might be a good opportunity to do so.

“Two portions,” Plutt finally offered for the haul.

“Two. Final offer, Erso.”

Luke glanced back, making sure Rey’s full attention was on the scene.

It was.

Luke looked Plutt straight in the eye and firmly said, “You will give me three portions.”

Plutt shook his head, “Two, Erso.”

“You will give me three portions,” Luke repeated in the same tone, but this time he very casually waved his hand. It looked like a gesture anyone who spoke with their hands did, but Luke did it for a very different reason.

The way Plutt’s eyes glazed over was indiscernible to anyone but Luke, and his voice was slightly monotonized as he said, “I will give you three portions.”

The crowd buzzed with confusion as Plutt handed over the portions. Out of the corner of his eye, Luke could see Roke glaring at him. But Roke was too well paid to reveal Luke’s secret identity and the fact that they had all just witnessed a Jedi Mind Trick. Luke just grinned at Roke and nodded as he collected his portions and returned to Rey.

“That was so cool!” Rey exclaimed as Quom stepped up to do his own trade in. “How did you do that?”

Luke chuckled and ruffled her hair, “I’m very persuasive. A casual gesture, a firm tone, and focusing your mind on making it happen, you can do that to anyone with a weak enough mind.”

“Can you show me?”
“We’ll practice it.”

“Thank you!” Rey suddenly hugged him.

Luke stumbled back slightly at the impact. He blinked, confused for a moment. It was the first time she had hugged him since the night the ration cooker exploded. Then Luke smiled, and he wrapped his arms around her, savouring the moment.

“You know, you’re getting tall,” Luke grinned. “Soon you’ll be towering over me.”

“I don’t think so,” Rey pulled away. She was smiling, “But maybe I’ll get close.”

“Maybe you will.”

Suddenly Rey’s grin fell as her eyes locked over his shoulder. Luke turned and saw the source of the disruption: Aletha watching them with a large smile.

Luke sighed, “Rey—”

“Half a portion!” Quom exclaimed as he stormed back to them. “What a swindler! I swear, Luke, I’m getting you to do my trades from now on. Half a portion, are you kidding me? I’ll starve on that.”

“As I’ve said countless times,” Luke replied, “you’re welcome to some of our portion credits.”

“And as I’ve said countless times, I’ll pass.” Quom noticed Rey’s glare at Aletha, “Hey, MG, I was thinking. If you’re getting so mad at your dad, maybe you two need some time apart.”

“Why doesn’t Rey spend the night with me?” Quom suggested. “I’ve got that extra cot. Maybe you two need a little room to breathe.”

“Could I stay over tonight?” she asked.

Quom grinned, “We’ll have the finest slumber party you’ve ever been too.”

“I’ve never been to a slumber party.”

“Exactly!”

Luke shook his head.

“Hey, Dad?” Rey asked, “Can I go hang out with Dirk for a while? I want to show him those computer chips we found.”

“Well, more the language program one,” Rey corrected. “I don’t think he can handle the flight sim, and the cookbook will just make him hungry. Besides, I can’t risk letting anyone knock my high score off on the flight sim.”

Luke chuckled, “The only one you should worry about doing that is me.”

“Exactly why I won’t let you play with it,” Rey grinned.
He kissed her forehead, “Off you go, but don’t stay too late. We need you in the shop today. That oxygen filtration system isn’t going to fix itself.”

“Oh, Teng had some suggestions for that. He’s really handy, you know.”

“I bet he’s handsy too,” Quom muttered.

Luke swatted at him and they watched Rey run off to find Dirk.

“I really don’t like her going off on her own,” Luke sighed.

“She’ll be fine,” Quom assured him.

“And if she isn’t?”

“You cut off the guy’s hand. We’ve done this before, Luke.”

He sighed.

“By the way,” Quom leaned in conspiratorially. “You’re welcome.”

“For what?”

Quom grinned, “Come on, you know. Rey’s spending the night with me, so you’re all alone free to sleep wherever you desire. But I heard it might be cold tonight so you might want to find something, or someone to warm you up.”

Luke just looked at him in disbelief, “Quom-”

“Go get laid, Luke,” Quom grinned. “But make sure you’re safe about it. You really can’t keep your past hidden from a girl if you get her pregnant.”

Luke playfully punched his shoulder, and Quom just laughed.

Rey was getting ready for bed with Quom when there was a knock on the tent peg.

“Come in,” Quom called.

“Hey,” Aletha ducked into the tent. “I just wanted to come over and say goodnight.”

“Dad already has gone home,” Rey glared at her.

Aletha and Quom tried not to look at each other. Luke certainly had bid Rey goodbye and left the tent, but they both knew that the walker wasn’t the place he had headed afterward.

“Oh, I actually came to say goodnight to you,” Aletha smiled at Rey.

She rolled her eyes and turned away, “Whatever.”

Aletha sighed and looked to Quom, “Could you give us a few minutes?”

“Just because I’m a Doctor doesn’t mean I want to hear about that sort of thing, Quom.”
“Doc, we live on Jakku. When nature calls, we dig a hole. During sandstorms we designate a corner of our abodes, and look away when someone needs to use it. You really want to start pretending we have dignity about our bodily functions? Hell, you’ve been excessively open about your menstrual cycles to Luke and I.”

“It’s to set a welcoming environment for Rey to feel comfortable when she gets hers, and so she knows she can come to me with questions about it.”

Rey shuddered, “If I have a pleasant conversation with you Doctor Kymeri, will you please stop talking about my future reproductive functions?”

Aletha tried not to wince at the title Doctor Kymeri. Ever since Rey had discovered about her relationship with Luke, Rey had refused to continue to call her Ally. The affectionate name had been taken away as punishment for her relationship, and Aletha had been consigned back to the name of the man Rey thought Aletha should only be romantically involved with.

“Well,” Quom looked between the girls, “good luck with this one, Doc.”

He was quick to make his exit.

Rey and Aletha stared at each other in cold silence for what felt like an eternity.

Aletha was the one to break the ice, “We need to talk, Rey.”

“No, we don’t,” Rey crossed her arms.

“Yes, we do,” Aletha insisted. “Please Rey, I’m tired of all this fighting. I don’t want you to be mad at me.”

“But I am mad.”

“Then tell me how to make it better.”

Rey was silent.

Aletha sighed and sat down on Quom’s cot. The one Rey was using was spaced about a metre away.

“I love you, Rey,” Aletha opened with. “I truly do. You have been an utter blessing in my life. Before you, I lived a miserable life barely existing. You gave me a reason to live, to laugh, to love.”

Rey sat down on her cot to face Aletha, “If you love me, why are you doing this?”

“Because I love your father.”

Rey looked away in pain.

“I do love him,” Aletha repeated, “and he loves me.”

“He loves my mother,” Rey gritted her teeth.

“Yes, he does, very much, but that doesn’t mean he can’t love me. Just because he loves me, doesn’t mean his love for your mother is lessened. I know my place in his heart, I’m his second best. I know that if she magically was alive and standing in front of him, and he was told to pick between us, I know he would pick her.”

“What if she is alive? If she came back, what would you do?”
Aletha cocked her head but answered the question, “I would stand aside. I promise.”

It wasn’t enough for Rey, “No! No! Dad is supposed to be with Mom and you’re supposed to be with Antar. That’s how it’s supposed to be! That’s when everyone is happiest!”

Aletha laughed, “Sunshine, I love Antar, but our relationship is far more complicated than you know. The love between myself and Antar is nowhere the same level that your parents’ story was.”

Rey narrowed her eyes, “She’s still his wife. They promised to love each other forever.”

“And they do, but your mother told your father that if she ever passed away first, she wanted him to be happy with someone else afterwards.”

“You’re lying. She never said that.”

“It’s what your father claims.”

“Then he’s lying.”

“Why would he lie about that?”

“To justify having an affair,” Rey answered.

Aletha sighed, “Rey, I would never agree to be someone’s mistress. I am disgusted by infidelity and absolutely would never consent to be involved with an affair.”

“But Mom-”

“She’s gone, Rey. She’s not coming back.”

Rey twisted her hands, “She promised she would.”

Aletha’s heart broke, “Oh my Sunshine-”

“Don’t call me that!” Rey snapped. “Don’t you pity me, you’re the one who’s wrecking everything.”

“Rey, I give up! I love your father, your father loves me, and I’ve been respectful of you.”

“Respectful? Learning about you two by walking in on you making out isn’t respectful.”

“The only reason you found out like that was we were trying to be respectful and see if the relationship would work before involving you in it.”

“Is that the story you tell yourself?!”

“Oh, what do you want from me, Rey?” Aletha exclaimed.

“I want the truth,” Rey snapped.

“About what?”

“All of it. How did that happen? When did it happen? Have you been planning this from the start?”

Aletha’s brows knitted together, “Rey, I swear there was no plot. It happened, I didn’t scheme anything.”

“Then tell how it happened. When did it all start?”
Aletha sighed, “After your father made his initial agreement with Plutt, I went to retrieve him, do you remember that?”

Rey nodded.

“We shared a moment, relating to each other over our deceased spouses, and he broke down in front of me. He was terrified over how he was going to tell you that your mother had been killed. I comforted him with a hug and a few kind words, nothing more.”

“Did you ask him to stay on Jakku?”

“Yes, but not for my sake. He didn’t know where to go with you, and he was being pursued by the First Order. I suggested he stay to collect himself for a few days because he was still adjusting to the idea of you being alive.”

Rey frowned, “He thought I was dead?”

Aletha nodded, “Luke choosing to stay here had nothing to do with me beyond my suggestion. After that we were nothing more than friends, but slowly the relationship developed into more. When after we saved you from Jarex, I realized I have fallen in love with him, but I didn’t say anything out of respect for you, him, and your mother. I confessed my feelings after he confessed his own a few years later. I asked him to take some time to collect himself and let go of Felicity, and that’s why he made her grave. Still, I wouldn’t be with him until he was truly ready.”

“When was he ready?”

“We shared a kiss a few days after Mashra died, but I still refused to let things continue from there. It wasn’t until the latest X’us’R’iia when we got trapped in a tent for five days alone that we worked through everything… I will also admit that there was a few moments of… physical intimacy during that storm.”

Rey frowned at the thought of Luke and Aletha making out during the sandstorm. She didn’t even imagine what had truly happened that night. It was impossible for Rey to even conceive of her father being sexual… at all. Not just with her mother, but even with her mother. Oh, she knew how it happened, but she just liked to pretend there was a stork involved or something.

“We got together after the X’us’R’iia and like I said, we kept it a secret to make sure it worked before involving you. I promise you that that’s exactly how it all went down.”

“Exactly?”

“Exactly.”

Rey sniffed and wiped her nose on the back of her sleeve, “What do you want with my dad?”

“What do you mean?” Aletha frowned.

“Is it just fun? Do you want to get marry? What’s the endgame?”

“I don’t know… Maybe someday marriage if things go that way, but this is just more than a fling.”

Rey started to cry.

“Oh, Sunshine.” Aletha got down on one knee to look the little girl in the eye and clasped her shoulders. “I love you, and I swear to you that that love has meaning to me. I love you more than anyone else I have ever known; more than your father, more than Antar, more than my own family. I have risked life and limb for you because you matter more than the world to me… but your father matters to me too. I do love Luke. I promise you that, and I promise our relationship blossomed from friendship, not manipulation. I didn’t mean to fall in love with your father, I didn’t want to fall in love with him, but I did and I don’t regret it. I’m not asking to be your mother or to replace Felicity in any way. This doesn’t overwrite the love shared between your mother and father, nor the love I have for you, but I swear that you mean so much more to me than romance with Luke ever could. I love you, Rey, and I would do anything for you.”

Rey raised her eyes to meet Aletha’s; a few tears shone out bravely, “Then answer me this: if I asked you to end things with my father… would you do it?”

Aletha paused for a minute to think about it, “…Yes. If that’s what it took to repair our relationship, I would end things with your father.”

“Really?”

“Say the word and it’s over.”

Somehow that didn’t bring comfort to Rey, “I… No.”

“No?” Aletha frowned, trying not to look too surprised. “You... want me to be with your father?”

“No! Well… I don’t know. I just want things back the way they were.”

“Things can never return to what they once were, but I am willing to work this out between us. Please Rey, tell me what I can do to fix this.”

Rey looked away, “I don’t know.”

Aletha dared to reach out and lift her chin, “Well, let me know when you do, because frankly… I miss you, Rey.”

Aletha was only met with silence. Conceding defeat, she sighed, got back to her feet, and with one last longing look, swiftly exited the tent.

It wasn’t until Aletha was long gone that Rey whispered her response.

“I miss you too.”

“You actually offered to break up with me?” Luke repeated in disbelief. He was sitting bootless and shirtless on the pushed together cots of Aletha’s tent, watching her as she prepared to join him for bed.

“I’ll do it too,” Aletha undid her hair from the messy bun, and tried her best to brush out the dust and sand from her greying hair. “Rey is the most important thing in my life.”

“As in mine,” Luke nodded. “But you have to know where to draw the line.”

“We should have told her immediately once we started up, and maybe even sooner. I just wish that she could understand I’m not trying to replace her mother.”

“It just doesn’t make sense. You’re almost nothing like Felicity, it’s not like I’m trying to substitute in a clone.” He muttered to himself, “If I wanted that, I would have gone for Sienna.”

Aletha raised a brow, “Who’s Sienna?”

“A name you weren’t supposed to hear.”

“Another story for when your mysterious past is revealed?”

“No, that’s a story I’m never telling anyone, and you would do best to forget it.”

Aletha smiled and set down her brush, “So, am I really nothing like Felicity?”

He grabbed Aletha and playfully pulled her down onto the bed with him. Pinning her as she giggled, Luke’s hands caressed up her bare leg. Her leggings had already been discarded for the day, leaving Aletha to only be covered by a rather short skirt, and what Luke suspected to be nothing else underneath.

“There is one thing you have in common.” Luke began to kiss up her calf, setting all her senses aflame, “A predilection for a certain oration of mine.”

Aletha moaned, weaving her hands into him hair to guide his mouth higher.

“That’s because you’re so talented at it, Mister Erso.” Aletha gave a sharp gasp as his mouth hit her sweet spot, “Luke!”

He grinned up at her mischievously, “I suppose if Rey does call in on your breakup offer, I’m going to have to get my fill of you until then. Starting with you getting rid of that shirt.”

Aletha pulled her top off without a second thought, and Luke’s hands were instantly on her breasts, “What about my skirt?”

Luke raised an eyebrow, and unbuckled his belt, “For now? …Leave it on.”

Rey lay awake in bed the next morning. Quom was snoring next to her, lost in the world of dreams, but Rey’s sleep had been uneasy.

Had Aletha’s words been true? Was this love between her father and Aletha just something that had happened against their wills? Would her mother really approve of the situation?

Was her mother really dead?

She wished the answers could all just be a flat no. It would just be so much easier to hate Aletha, paint her as the villain, and pretend this wasn’t a grey situation.

But it was, and even if Aletha had lied to her about all of it, there was one thing that Rey couldn’t deny was true. She knew that Aletha loved her. Aletha had been the closest thing Rey had to a mother for years, and her heart ached as she tried to cut Aletha from it. Whether Rey liked it or not, Aletha was forever a part of her… and she loved her almost as much as the mother who had walked out of her life without a glance back.

Rey sighed and pushed off the blanket on her cot. She glanced over at Quom to make sure he was still asleep before sneaking out of the tent.

She couldn’t be mad at Aletha forever, Rey thought as she made her way through the silent town. The sun was barely peeking over the horizon, and only scavengers like Ivano Troade, who got up ridiculously early each morning were awake.

Her father and Aletha should never have been secretive about their relationship. Maybe if they had informed her while it was developing that this was a possibility, Rey could have accepted it easier. She loved them both, and she didn’t want to be mad at them. Rey was ready to forgive them. First Aletha in her tent, and later her father when he came into town.

And so, ready to mend bridges, she pulled back Aletha’s tent flap.

The sight within struck her cold like a slap across the face.

Lying on the cot with Aletha was her father. But not just her father sleeping next to Aletha, her clearly nude beneath the blanket father sleeping with an equally nude Aletha, the pair only covered modestly by a thin blanket while their clothing was scattered all over the floor. Even worse, her father was asleep on top of Aletha, one hand buried in her hair, the other cupping her breast, and Aletha’s legs were wrapped around his hips.

There was no pretending you didn’t know what Luke and Aletha had been up to the previous night. The only way the sight could have been worse was if they were awake and Rey had caught them mid-thrust.

“Dad?” Rey shrieked loud enough to be heard three tents over.

“What?” Luke startled awake, sitting up straight. “Rey?”

Unfortunately, sitting up straight brought the blanket up with him, pulling the it off Aletha, baring her chest to Rey and making things oh so much worse.

“Oh my god,” Aletha’s eyes were wide with horror, as she pulled the blanket up to cover herself.

But Rey had already seen the hickey on Aletha’s chest.

Tears filled her eyes, and unable to stand the sight, Rey turned and ran.

Neither Luke nor Aletha followed her – not immediately anyway – as they had to dress first, so it gave Rey a head start. People were starting to fill the street, so Rey could disappear in the crowd. She pushed through the marketplace, trying to run as far and as fast away from the scene as possible.

The image made her feel physically nauseous. Growing up on Jakku, Rey lived around enough gruff characters to have learned the signs of sex at an early age. Dad had always promised her that he would never ever succumb to the cheap hookups that occurred in Jakku; meaningless one night stands. He had sworn to her that because he had loved her mother so much, he would never have sex again unless he found a woman he loved as much as Felicity.

That thought made her even sicker… or perhaps it was the stress of the situation. Either way, behind the tent of some merchant she didn’t recognize, Rey fell to her hands and knees and emptied the contents of her stomach in the sand.

She stayed there, crying in the puddle of her own vomit. How could this happen? How could Dad do this? How could Aletha? How could they betray her mother? Didn’t they understand? No, no one understood the passion Rey held to the notion of her mother being alive. She had to be. She just had No one could ever find out why Rey needed it to be true.

Rey wailed in the sand, not caring who saw. Her heart hurt so much. How could Aletha have done this? Betrayed her, seduced her father, and stolen him away from her mother? Aletha had made an adulterer out of Luke, and she had taken advantage of the fact Rey needed some space from him to do it.

Aletha Kymeri was an evil woman. Devious and a liar. She had planned it all from the start; hadn’t she? Yes, the feelings had started after Dad’s deal with Plutt, when it was revealed Dad had money. Aletha had been plotting this ever since she found out that her father had money. Aletha had never cared about her, only used her as an ends to the means.

Rey didn’t know where these thoughts were coming from, but she could feel something Dark around her. The thoughts weren’t logical, and deep down she knew they weren’t true, but it was so hard to fight against them. In fact, it felt good to give in to the Darkness in her mind.

Yes, give in to it, something in her soul said. Give in to your anger. Give in to your hate. Hurt her the way she has hurt you. Make her feel your pain. Get your revenge.

Rey’s face hardened, spurred on by the words inside her soul. The voice in her soul was right; she had to make Aletha pay. She had to make Aletha hurt just as much as she had hurt Rey.

And she knew exactly how to do it…

“Ivano?”

The scavenger looked up in surprise at Rey Erso running towards him and his speeder he was in the process of loading.

“Hey, Rey,” Ivano nodded at her, and threw his toolbox in the trunk.

“Good, you haven’t left,” Rey skidded to a stop in front of him. “Are you heading out to the Graveyard?”

“On my way now.”

“Would you mind giving me a ride to Old Meru’s?”

Ivano frowned, noticing the red puffiness of her eyes and the small sniffles she was trying to disguise, “A ride? Why don’t you ask your Dad or Quom?”

“They’re both already gone out for the day, and I was supposed to go to Old Meru’s to deal with some business for Dad. Unfortunately, you know how Dad and Quom can get. Quom thought Dad had me, and Dad thought Quom did, and I ended up here alone. Please, can you take me? I’ll pay you a portion.”

Crying twelve-year-old or not, Ivano wasn’t about to pass up a free portion.

He swung open the passenger door, “Hop in.”
By the time they reached Old Meru’s, Rey’s tears had ceased. Her sorrow had mutated into not just anger, but pure rage. The dark feeling of hate was intoxicating, and letting herself give in to Darkness made her feel strong. With rage in her heart, Rey was powerful, and she craved the taste of more.

Teng looked confused when Rey pulled up with Ivano Troade. It was an odd little sight to see Rey bribing the scavenger, instructing him not to tell anyone about the ride as “that’s the way my Dad wants it. His deal with Meru is a secret for now.” As Ivano drove away, Teng felt something dangerous about the situation, though he couldn’t figure out what.

“Is Meru here?” Rey marched right up to Teng.

“No, she’s off picking up rations in town,” he answered.

“Been gone long?”

“Roke picked her up for the trade about an hour ago. Why?”

“Because I need you to drive me to my scavenging site today.”

Teng frowned, “Couldn’t your father bring you?”

“He won’t take me there himself,” Rey dismissed. “Please, Teng, it’s important I do this.”

Teng sighed. He knew if he agreed to this and ran off with Rey and took her to the forbidden site, he could get in a lot of trouble. Not just with Luke, but Meru as well.

But still… how could he possibly say no to Rey Erso?

“Get in,” Teng conceded, climbing into the driver’s seat of Meru’s speeder.

“Thank you so much,” Rey grinned, clamouring into the passenger side.

“You are going to get me in a lot of trouble, you know that?”

“Yep.”

Teng shook his head, “So where are we going?”

Rey grinned with a genuine look of wickedness – not mischievousness but cruelty – in her eyes.

“We’re going to scavenge an X-Wing.”

Chapter End Notes

Coming Up Next Chapter…

Second Best
Luke draws the line when Rey scavenges Antar’s ship, but Teng finds that he’s the one to truly pay the price.
Second Best

Chapter Summary

Luke draws the line with Rey, Quom is just done with all this drama, and Rey and Teng discuss the merits of eating soup on Jakku.

Chapter Notes

So, last chapter I totally forgot to insert an important line that sets up later how Finn actually knows how to use a lightsaber. It’s a small line from Kylo Ren, but important as it comes back up later when Finn escapes with Poe. I’ve gone back and inserted it in the last chapter, but for those who haven’t the line, here it is:

Sure enough, Kylo looked to Phasma and said, “His troop is yours, Captain Phasma.”

“Thank you, Ren,” Phasma bowed her head.

“But I want him added to my saber classes. He has… great potential and I want to nurture it.”

“I’ll be sure to take it into consideration while making his schedule.”

Electra objected, “But Master Ren-”

“Phasma has seniority, Electra,” Kylo said sharply.

Credit to crazyman844 for parts of, and the general spirit of Luke’s description of Aletha in this chapter.

See the end of the chapter for more notes.

The Long Way Home

Chapter Thirty-Five

Second Best

This X-wing has been sitting here for as long as I can remember.

- Rey’s Survival Guide
After discovering Antar’s body, Luke, Quom, Aletha, and Rey all agreed that scavenging his ship would be off-limits. Rey knew this well as the group would actively keep it hidden from others. She wasn’t sure how they managed to do it, but it was a mix of mistaken instructions, distractions, threats, and secretly a few mind tricks on Luke’s part.

Rey had eagerly agreed to keeping the secret, wanting to respect Aletha. So when she walked in on the sight of her father having had sex with Aletha, Rey knew just what to do.

She wanted to hurt Aletha. Badly. She wanted to make Aletha feel the same pain her mother would when she discovered Luke’s affair.

“Rey, are you sure this is a good idea?” Teng asked nervously as they worked on salvaging the deflector shield projectors power couplings. “Aletha won’t be happy.”

“Good,” Rey grunted as they lowered their prize into the pile on the ground below.

She had been making quick work of the ship, stripping it as fast as possible. Indeed, it seemed like she was working faster. Every time she hauled something, her pulls were stronger. Every time she climbed up the ship, her jumps were higher. She basked in the feeling of this Darkness bathing in her soul. It made her feel powerful, and she craved more.

Teng on the other hand didn’t like the change. Oh he couldn’t put his finger on what happened, but there was something different about Rey. Every sudden movement made him flinch, and once he could have even sworn that her eye colour had changed. It had just been a moment, the briefest flash of yellow, but he waved it off, blaming the heat of the sun to cause delusions. Maybe Rey was just overheated.

…Or more likely something had happened between herself and Aletha to deepen that feud and Rey was unhealthily repressing expression of emotion making her bitter, angry, and more dangerous, prone to allowing her emotions to take over a make a mistake.

But he was just a lowly mechanic, and not even a very good one at that. What did he know?

Either way, he would be there for her however she needed it.

“Water break?” Teng offered.

Rey sighed and nodded. The sun was burning quite hot today.

Grabbing a pair of water flasks, they settled in the shade against the ship and took a break.

“We’ll have a profitable haul today,” Teng tried to make conversation.

“The Blobfish will have a heart attack,” Rey wiped her brow and splashed some water on her hand which she patted on the back of her neck. “Do you think he’ll even have that many portions?”

“Considering he feeds the entire town on a daily basis, I don’t think it’ll be too much a hardship.” Teng eyed Rey, “Man, I really gotta start following your example and start tying up my hair. This heat is killing me.”

“Your hair is getting pretty long,” Rey didn’t know why she reached out to run a hand through it. “If you want, Dirk’s surprisingly good at cutting hair.”

“No offense, but I don’t really trust him with scissors.” He caught her angry look, “At least not ones he wants to use on my body.”
“He’s not a joke, Teng. Just because he’s not… mentally… He’s got some neurological deficiency, but he’s not an idiot. Dirk is just biologically different.”

“Sorry, I didn’t mean to-”

“Whatever,” Rey looked away.

Teng grabbed her hand, “Hey, no. Come on, Rey. I didn’t mean it like that. You’re right, Dirk does… require assistance is some areas, but he’s not just a pawn for our entertainment. He’s a really good guy, and he’s lucky to have you as a friend. As am I.”

Rey gave a small smile, “Even if I get you in trouble sometimes?”

“Starlight, you have gotten my head on the chopping block today, and I go to my execution with a head held high.”

Rey laughed, “Starlight?”

“It’s what Dad used to call Mom,” Teng shrugged. “She was his Starlight, and he was her Moonshine.”

“Why did you call me it?”

“It’s just the term of affection I associate men using for women. What about you? What did your parents call each other?”

“I don’t remember for certain, but I think it was Sweetheart.”

“For both of them?”

“And me,” Rey said. She struggled to uncover the memories of her life before Jakku, “They didn’t really like using pet names for some reason. But I think maybe Dad used to call Mom… Miss Rhiaon? I think? And sometimes she would call Dad… I don’t remember the name. She would call him our real surname, his surname. Then sometimes Mister in front of that? …No, not Mister, something close to that. I can’t remember right now.”

“I get it,” Teng nodded, “I can’t remember much from my younger years either.”

“Before Jakku?”

“I remember before Jakku. I only got here a few years ago when I was twelve.”

“Where were you before that?” Rey asked. “You once mentioned something about pirates?”

Teng laughed, “It’s a long story.”

“I’ve got time.”

“Maybe some other time.”

Rey huffed.

Teng couldn’t stop his smile.

“So what’s the story with the hair?” Teng ran his own hand through her hair. “Three buns is a little odd.”
Rey shrugged, “My mom did it like that, but I don’t know why. I keep it in memory of her so that she…”

Teng frowned, “So that she what?”

“Nothing.”

“Come on, Rey, you can tell me anything.”

“Not this. No one can know this… No one but Quom.”

He raised an eyebrow, “You really think Quom Tinadar is better at keeping secrets than me? The man- Er, the Vrogem can’t even hide his distain for me. Honestly I think he dreams of pushing me into a steelpecker colony.”

“He’s not trying to keep that a secret though. And besides,” Rey bumped her hip against his, “I’d never let him do it.”

Teng grinned, “So come on, what’s up?”

Rey bit her lip, “Okay, but you have to promise not to tell.”

“Cross my heart,” he made the motion over his chest.

She took a deep breath, “The reason I keep my hair like this, as well as my clothes is that… I think my mom’s alive.”

Teng raised an eyebrow. He didn’t trust himself with any bolder expression of the mass oh crap what do I do, be her friend, support her, talk her out of this, I regret asking questions, oh God, oh God, be cool Malar, be cool, oh God what do I do bubbling inside him.

“Oh,” he said.

Rey raised her own eyebrow back, “Oh?”

“What do you want me to say to that?”

She frowned, “That you believe me.”

“Rey, until about four months ago, I thought Aletha was your mother. Sure you don’t have blonde hair and blue eyes like Luke and Aletha but genetics are weird sometimes.”

“Aletha is not my mother!” Rey snapped. “My mother is Felicity Rhiaon! No other.”

“I know that. Geeze Rey, you don’t need to be so dramatic.”

“I think I’m entitled to being this mad.”

“How? You’re acting like you walked in on your father having sex with her.”

Rey looked at him.

Teng’s face went white, “Oh my God, did you-”

“They weren’t in the process but it was very clear what had happened.”

“Rey, I’m so sorry.”
“I just don’t understand how he could do this to Mom. I thought he loved her.”

Teng sighed, “Rey, I don’t know the circumstances of her alleged death, so I can’t say one way or another if she is or not, but do you really think she’s alive?”

“Her body was never found.”

“That’s not what I asked. Do you think she’s actually alive?”

“No, Rey,” Teng cut her off. “Answer the question. This whole Aletha thing, is it really because you honestly think your father is cheating on your mother?”

Rey was silent for a very long time.

“We should get back to work, Teng,” she shoved her water flask in his hands and got to her feet.

Teng sighed as he watched Rey collect her satchel and climb back on the ship. His movements were slow as he put away their flasks and got back to work.

There was definitely something more going on.

The only question was what?

“I can’t find her anywhere!” Aletha exclaimed as she raced up to Luke in the market.

“No one’s seen anything either,” Luke shook his head. “Oh, Aletha, we messed up, didn’t we?”

“I should have just sent you home last night,” Aletha sighed. “You know, I really thought we were about to make progress.”

“I’m just worried that this is going to lead Rey down a very dark path. Oh, Rey, where are you?”

The only reason Luke was staying so calm was that he didn’t sense Rey was in danger, and it wasn’t exactly the first time she had gone missing. Rey had the tendency to go join another scavenging group for the day whenever she got mad at Luke. As long as she showed up back in Niima by sundown, Luke wouldn’t panic. Sure, he gave her a harsh talking to when it happened, but he wasn’t going to start tearing the Galaxy apart to find her.

The pair turned, still clutching each other’s arms as they faced their friend.

“Quom?” Aletha asked.

“Guys,” he skidded to a stop. He was breathless and panicked, “I woke up and Rey was gone. I am so sorry.”

“It’s okay,” Luke raised his hand to shush his friend. “This is our fault.”

“Rey walked in on us this morning,” Aletha informed Quom.

Quom winced, “When you say walked in, what exactly-”

“We were post-coital, but it was clear what happened,” Luke answered. “Rey ran away and now we can’t find her.”

“She’s not answering her comm either,” Aletha added.

Quom spat some Huttese swears and said, “Oh kriffing hell, this is bad. Really bad.”

“No, you don’t know.” Quom sighed, “Luke, there’s something I need to tell you about Rey…”

“So, what exactly do you want from Aletha?” Teng asked.

Rey looked up from the power convertors she had pulled from the ship, “What do you mean?”

“What do you want? What’s going to make this better?”

“I don’t know.”

“Think about it. Will scavenging her husband’s ship make things better? Will talking it out? Will breaking up with your father? What do you want, Rey?”

Rey sighed; what did she want? Well, she wanted Aletha to hurt. Yes, that’s what she wanted, she wanted to cause Aletha pain. The pain of betrayal, mental… emotional…

Physical.

She wanted to give Aletha physical pain. Rey wanted to slap her, to hit her, to punch her, to kick her. No she wanted more. To bite her? No, even more than that. She wanted blood, she wanted tears, she wanted the harlot to be so disfigured that Luke Erso never gave Aletha a second look. Yes, let her father be lost in memories of her mother’s beauty like her brown hair, and hazel eyes and… petite stature, and…

Well, it didn’t matter, just as long as Luke focused on Felicity. Just as long as Aletha felt pain, brutal, agonising pain. She wanted Aletha to suffer, to lose an arm or get stabbed, or even… even set on fire and burn.

Rey’s own thoughts scared her, but she allowed them to usher forward. Something inside of her fed on the pain and filled her with something terrifying yet seductive.

She imagined a million different injuries. Aletha electrocuted on wiring in the Graveyard or slitting open her throat on jagged metal in the dark. Inhaling dangerous gas that Quom always warned Rey about. Getting torn to shreds by steepleckers from an improper knocking, or Roke finally getting revenge and tearing her to shreds himself.

“Rey?” Teng called. “Can you pass me a Harris wrench?”

He was perched on the top right wing of the ship checking out the laser generator. The port wing laser cannons had both snapped off in the crash, but maybe there was something left to salvage from the wings.

“Standard Harris or powered?” Rey asked as she dug through her satchel.

“Standard if you’re not using it,” Teng answered knowing she only had the one standard. “I’ll grab one of the powered if not.”

Rey shoved aside her two powered Harris wrenches and found the standard, “Coming right up.”

She stood on the main body of the ship, reaching out to him with the wrench. It wasn’t a good idea to have two people on these old wings as the rusted metal couldn’t bear the weight.

Rey was only half paying attention as Teng reached for the wrench. She didn’t look at him, rather eyeing the front of the ship and planning her attack to free the communications antenna. When Teng grabbed the tool, Rey moved off to start working on it as Teng carefully balanced the length of the wing.

“It’s trashed,” Teng declared after a few minutes.

“Pity,” Rey was pondering the different ways to hurt Aletha as she freed the antenna. Maybe Aletha would get lost in a sandstorm and die that way. Or wander in the desert and die of thirst. “The antenna needs a little repairing, but this’ll fetch a nice price.”

“That’s good. I think the wing in general is a lost cause.”

“Get underneath the ship and check out the repulsorlifts,” Rey suggested. Maybe Aletha could be poisoned? Would that work on a doctor? Aletha might catch the signs and know an antidote.

“Making my way down,” Teng carefully walked along the wing.

Plus her dad would know it was her. If she was going to hurt Aletha it would have to look like an accident. Some blunt force trauma, something crushing her. A piece of ship falling on her. But what could Rey loosen? The only thing she could take apart quickly enough would have to be a small, precarious appendage.

The Dark Side boiled in her blood, filling her with a strength and confidence she had never known. Even her father didn’t seem a threat to Rey in that moment.

Rey eyed the wing Teng was scaling, and smirked. Oh if only she could get Aletha underneath that wing. How she would love to make the wing snap off and crush Alet-

Teng screamed as the wing suddenly snapped off the ship.

Another big hazard is injuries. It’s dark inside the dead ships, and you can run into jagged metal that will slice you open or step on hull plating that’s turned brittle and is the only thing between you and a hundred-meter drop.

- Rey’s Survival Guide

“TENG!” Rey shrieked as he fell off the wing and hurtled towards the ground.

Something in her reached out for him, not physically but instinctively trying to grab him and cushion his fall. The Darkness seemed to flood out of her in an instant, a bright warmth forcing her body. Maybe it was just her imagination, but when Teng hit the ground – which he did before the wing, which physics told her wasn’t possible – it sounded less thuddy than it should have.
But that didn’t mean there wasn’t a thud. That didn’t mean there was a crash and a crunch as the wing fell on top of him. And that didn’t mean there wasn’t one of the most bone chilling screams Rey had ever heard.

“Teng!” Rey cried again as she scaled down the grappling line secured on the ship.

She raced towards Teng, who was moaning and crying in the wreckage, unable to move. The Light that had flooded in her body continued to pump through it as her thoughts were focused only on one thing: save Teng. She dropped to her knees and ripped off the wreckage that pinned him to the ground. There was pieces Rey sworn she shouldn’t have been able to move, but the Light inside of her seemed to give her the strength. It almost felt like it was lessening the load.

“Teng! Teng!” Rey exclaimed as she freed him.

He was bloody and in pain, unable to answer with more than a series of moans and tears.

“Oh God, no Teng,” Rey’s eyes pricked with tears as she observed her broken friend.

“Rey,” he croaked.

“It’s okay, Teng. I can fix you. I can fix this.”

She checked over Teng’s body, mentally cataloguing each wound. A cut here, a broken arm there, a shattered leg even. She did what she could with her meager medical kit, but it soon became clear that this was beyond her medical knowledge. Which only meant one thing.

“I think I need to take you to see Aletha.”

As Rey got Teng slowly to the speeder and helped lay him down across the backseat she could only think one thing:

I’m a twelve-year-old, about to drive a speeder to Niima Outpost, stolen from the most dangerous and terrifying person on Jakku. I’ll have to take a boy I injured – because deep down I know somehow I was responsible for the wing breaking even if I can’t explain it – on a site that not only am I not allowed to be at, but I went specifically to because it’s the X-Wing of my dad’s girlfriend’s dead husband, and I have to face the woman I just caught my dad having sex with.

Not gonna lie, a very small part of Rey kinda wished Teng would just die because it would be so much easier to just bury a body in the desert than face Aletha, Meru, and her father.

“Don’t forget our haul,” Teng groaned as he laid across the backseat. He too was partially hoping for death because it would be a lot less painful than having to deal with Meru.

Rey shook her head, “We should leave it and head out now. I don’t want things to get much worse.”

“It’s at least an hour drive to Niima, if things are going to worsen there’s nothing we can do to stop it. At least load up our haul so we can make this worth the consequences.”

“Teng, can we just go to one of the Sacred Villages, lie about our names, get you fixed, and then bribe our way onto a merchant ship and run away from Jakku?”

He paused to seriously think about it, “…Maybe.”

Soon enough Rey had the speeder loaded, and she climbed into the driver’s seat. Taking a deep breath, Rey mentally prepared herself to face the confrontation forthcoming.
“Let’s do this,” Rey whispered and slammed her foot down on the acceleration.

And as she drove carefully towards Niima Outpost, totally not ready to face her father or Meru’s wrath, she dug deep into long forgotten memories, trying to come up with a fake name to flee the planet with Teng. Somewhere in the back of her mind came a name that she didn’t know the origins of, but like the sound of.

Kira Dameron had a nice ring to it.

“My father is going to kill me,” Rey declared as Niima Outpost appeared as a dot on the horizon. “He’ll kill me and bury me next to my mother.”

“Hey now, I thought we were operating on the Mom’s not actually dead theory,” Teng teased.

Rey couldn’t help but smile, “You know, if you’re capable of making wisecracks, I’m not going to be too concerned that I permanently maimed you.”

“Then you owe me a nice nursing back to health. Knelt at my bedside and feeding me soup and everything.”

“You want to have soup on Jakku?”

“Fine, give me bread or something. Just as long as I get to wake from my sickly stupor to the vision of your lovely face.”

Rey blushed, “Lovely?”

“A scientific observation of things the neurons in my brain find aesthetically pleasing. You are only twelve, and I am no child lover.”

“Don’t worry, I still think boys are icky.”

“As long as we have it settled.”

Rey laughed, “So anyway, since I am about to die, maybe you could be a darling and tell me that long story you promised.”

“Darling?”

“It’s just the term of affection I associate women using for men. Now come on, the story, Moonshine.”

Teng sighed, “Anything for you, Starlight.”

He paused to think about how much he wanted to tell Rey.

“It’s sort of an odd story how I ended up here,” Teng confessed. “When my parents were young they sort of… got involved with a cult.”

Rey’s jaw dropped, “A cult?”

“It was the time of the Empire, and to a lot of people anything sounded better than Imperial life. Cults all over the Galaxy thrived with people just wanting to escape. My family was from Naboo, which was basically Imperial Headquarters. They were seduced by a cult, left everything behind, and joined it. After the war was over, they started to realize the situation they were in, and when I was born they decided to escape. But cults aren’t an easy thing to escape, and Dad got killed. Mom managed to get us out with the help of someone on Naboo, and a gang of pirates got us away. The problem was that Mom didn’t trust the pirates, so she only gave them small pieces of our escape route giving them the next when we reached each destination. She wouldn’t tell me anything for fear the pirates would try to hurt me for the answer, so I only knew the name of the woman she knew back on Naboo.”

“So why are you here and not on Naboo?”

“The pirates got in a skirmish with the First Order on the way, and Mom was killed. The pirates didn’t know where to take me to get their reward – they had been paid only a third of the fee upfront – so they decided to keep me to work off their debt. I was ten when Mom died. When I was twelve, the pirates decided they didn’t want me anymore, so we landed on Jakku in one of the Sacred Villages.”

Rey cringed, “Which village?”

“Not Tuanul, unfortunately,” Teng answered.

In Niima some say the villagers are pacifists, but that’s not true. You could ask the bandits who raided the Sacred Villages – except they never came back. You’ll find their bones hanging in cages in Kelvin Ravine as warnings.

- Rey’s Survival Guide

“I wish it had been Tuanul,” Teng sighed. “I might have had a nicer life and not ended up with Meru.”

“What did happen?” Rey asked.

“One night, I went to sleep with the rest of the pirate crew. When I woke up, they were gone and the Village Leader claimed that I had been sold by the pirates to be his servant. It wasn’t as bad as living with the pirates, but I’m not exactly keen on going into details. Let’s just say that when the Village Leader sold me to Meru, I was very happy… until about a month of living with her.”

“You seem so happy for someone who has gone through so much horror.”

“I wasn’t happy for many years. Sad, alone, angry, always crying, always just wanting this to be the day I never woke up from sleep. I would wake up and think, maybe today’s the day I finally get to die. You never know when death is coming after all, and there’s no point in living when there’s nothing to live for… and then something happened that gave me a reason to be happy.”

“What was that?”

Teng smiled, though Rey couldn’t see it, “A ray of light walked into my life, and she’s been brightening my days ever since.”

Rey’s face turned bright red as she found herself at a complete and utter loss of how to respond.

“Teng, I-”

Teng shushed her, “It’s okay. I don’t need you to respond, I’m just so glad that I finally have someone special in my life. I’m blessed to have a friend like you.”
“I’ve got contacts in the Sacred Villages,” Quom said. “Maybe we should send a message to them to see if Rey tried to run away to one of them.”

“And I’ll talk with the ship merchants,” Aletha suggested. She frowned as she saw Luke staring into the crowds of the scavengers returning from their daily hauls, forlornly scanning the crowd for his daughter. Aletha gripped his arm and turned his head to look at her, “Hey, we’ll find her.”

“What happens when we do?” Luke sighed, “I just can’t believe she thinks Felicity is alive.”

“I think you need to sit her down and explain as much about Felicity’s death as possible to her.”

Quom and Luke exchanged a look.

“That… uh, might be difficult, Doc,” Quom said awkwardly. Other than Chewbacca, he was the only soul Luke had ever told about the full circumstances of Felicity’s death. “I don’t think Luke can really properly explain what happened so that there was no body. Not without a hell of a lot of context.”

Luke’s eyes suddenly lit up, “Meru!”

He dashed away from the group towards Meru who was emerging from Plutt’s negotiation building with Roke and Dirk.

“What is it, Erso?” Roke snarled.

Roke’s arms were covered in steelpecker scars, so Luke was able to recognize him behind the mask and voice modulator… Plus he was the only one who was constantly glaring at Aletha.

“Meru, have you seen Rey today?” Luke asked as Quom and Aletha caught up with the group.

“No,” Meru answered shortly, heaving a bag of rations over her shoulder.

“Is something wrong with Rey?” Dirk’s voice was worried. “Where is she?”

“I’m sure she’s fine, Dirk,” Aletha assured him. “Please, Meru, was she maybe with Teng today?”

“I left the boy alone when they picked me up today. Now if you’ll excuse me, I should be getting back.”

Luke, Aletha, and Quom pursued Meru with continued questions as Roke and Dirk led her through the market. Meru had nearly gotten into Roke’s speeder, when suddenly, Ivano Troade’s voice rang out.

“Doctor!”

Everyone turned to see Ivano cradling a very bloody arm.

“Ivano, what happened?” Aletha exclaimed, rushing to his side to tend to his arm.

“Hey, Doctor, I don’t mean to interrupt,” Ivano let her deal with his arm. “I sliced my arm open good on a-”

His eyes fell on Meru and Luke, and he stopped.

“What are you doing here?”

Meru and Luke exchanged a look.

“I thought you two were doing your business at Meru’s tent,” Ivano answered.

Luke shrugged, “I didn’t have any business with you.”

“Weird, but makes sense,” Ivano said as Aletha started wrapping up his arm with supplies from the medical satchel always over her shoulder. “I did think sending your daughter to deal with Meru was a little odd.”

“My daughter?”

“Yeah, Rey. She said you and Tinadar forgot her here and needed a ride to Meru’s to deal with business for you.”

“Yeah,” Ivano frowned. “I dropped her off at Meru’s a few hours ago.”

Luke whipped around to face Meru, “Do you have any way to contact Teng?”

“Of course, she ran off to spend time with the boy,” Quom rolled his eyes. “I swear, if he lays one hand on her, I’m pitching him into a steelpecker colony.”

Roke cracked his knuckles, “Did I just hear a joke about steelpecker mauling?”

Quom raised an eyebrow, “What makes you think I’m joking?”

“I’m comm him,” Meru pulled back her sleeve to get at her wrist comm. “He knows that girl isn’t allowed to be alone with him. She’s a troublemaker that one.”

Luke opened his mouth to object, but he caught the look on Aletha’s face, and he shut his mouth. Considering the trouble Rey had made today, the label wasn’t exactly incorrect.

“The boy’s not answering,” Meru declared after a few minutes of attempts. It had been long enough for Aletha to finish patching up Ivano, and long enough for a pronounced vein to start throbbing in Meru’s forehead. “The boy isn’t there.”

“Are you sure?” Quom asked.

“The boy knows to pick up if I call, and I’m betting the girl would too. I’m telling you, Rey and Teng are not there.”

The group shared nervous looks – except Roke, who didn’t give a damn and was just waiting to give Meru a ride home.

“If Rey isn’t at Meru’s,” Aletha looked at Luke.

“Then where is she?” he finished.

That was the moment Rey pulled up in the marketplace.

“REY!” half a dozen voices exclaimed.

Rey was rather indifferent to the horde of people who ran up to her. She merely unloaded her haul from the speeder and marched directly up to the concession stand window of Unkar Plutt. There was a queue formed, but Roke was rather entertained by the sight of Rey Erso pissing off so many people – especially Aletha Kymeri over the past few months – so he blocked the other scavengers from intervening and let her go straight up to the window, ready to watch the drama unfold.

“Rey, where have you been?” Luke demanded.

“Scavenging,” Rey hauled her pieces up with a thud.

“Well, My Girl,” Plutt grinned lecherously, also pleased with seeing Luke Skywalker so mad, “what do you have for me today? I’m feeling quite generous in my portions today if only to make your dad mad.”

Rey glared at her father and announced her haul, “Communications antenna from an X-Wing, electromagnetic gyros from an X-Wing, targeting computer from an X-Wing, reactant injector-dorsal. Sorry it’s cracked, but it’s not worth repairing. Oh, and it’s from an X-Wing.”

On and on, Rey listed each item, emphasizing at the end that each piece had come from an X-Wing. At first Luke’s eyes went wide as he realized that every piece had been from an X-Wing but soon that shock turned to anger. His jaw locked as he glared down in silence at his daughter, fighting to suppress the Dark Side raging inside of him.

To his left, he heard a faint growl.

“Quom, please leave the area,” Luke muttered. “I can’t guarantee things aren’t about to get… dramatic.”

“Sure, Luke,” Quom understood the meaning. He looked over at Meru, “Hey, isn’t that your speeder Rey drove in?”

Meru glared, “It is. Tell me girl, why do you have my speeder?”

“I had Teng borrow it from you to get me to my scavenging site,” Rey answered.

“And what site was that, Rey?” Luke gritted his teeth.
She met his eyes, “An X-Wing.”

“What X-Wing?”

Rey grinned and turned back to Plutt, “What’s my total haul today?”

Plutt slid over a moderate pile of packets, “37 portions. Congratulations, that’s the largest profit anyone’s made in a while.”

Rey began sliding the portions from the counter into her bag, when Luke’s hand stopped her arm.

“Rey,” he said slowly, trying to temper his rage, “what X-Wing did you scavenge?”

She looked him right in the eyes, “Yellow-4.”

Luke tried his hardest not to react, instead copying Rey’s actions as she turned to look at Aletha. Aletha had winced and was trying to suppress her own emotions while Rey observed her, but it didn’t take a Force Sensitive to sense her pain.

With a single movement, Luke shoved all the portions in Rey’s bag and said, “We are going home right now.”

He grabbed her arm and started marching her to his speeder when Meru called out.

“Wait a minute, I’m not done with you,” Meru shouted.

Luke and Rey came to a stop.

“Meru, I apologize that Rey stole your speeder,” Luke said calmly. “I will replace the used gas.”

“You better, but that’s not what I meant.”

Luke frowned, “What did you mean?”

Meru narrowed her eyes at Rey, “If you had Teng steal my speeder… where is Teng?”

“Rey?” Teng groaned from the backseat of Meru’s speeder where he was lying out of sight. “Have you finished dramatically making a point to your father yet? I really need medical help.”

“Oh my goodness!” Aletha exclaimed as she, Dirk, Meru, and Quom raced to the speeder. “What happened?”

“The wing of the X-Wing fell on me,” Teng groaned as Dirk lifted him out of the seat. “Please tell me this’ll be another freebie, Doctor Kymeri. I don’t think I can afford this medical bill.”

“Neither can I,” Meru glared at Teng. “Shattered bones, bloody cuts, probably some raptured organs. Are you kidding me with this bill?”

“We’ll talk about payment later,” Aletha snapped. “Dirk, help me get him to my tent.”

“Yes, Doctor,” Dirk nodded, and they raced towards Aletha’s tent.

Rey watched them go, trying to mask her concern, “Do you think… Will Teng be okay, Dad?”

“I’m sure he’ll be fine.” Luke looked down at her, “You on the other hand is still up for debate.”

Rey swallowed.

Rey obediently marched to her doom.

“Well, that was fun.” Roke looked to Meru, “You still need a ride now that your speeder’s here?”

“I’ll be fine. Same time next week?”

“Same time next week.”

Roke marched off and after an awkward beat of silence, Ivano finally went to join the line to the concession stand. It was just Meru and Quom left.

“I can’t believe that boy,” Meru shook her head. “I warned him. I swear I told him what would happen if he pulled another stunt, and now look at what’s happened. Well, I am a woman who follows through on her threats, mark my words.”

Quom sighed, “I’ll mark them alright.”

The only time Rey had ever seen her father this angry was during the Jarex incident. Luke did not say one word to her the entire drive home. It wasn’t until they had parked next to the walker than he sternly ordered her to get out and get in the walker.

He immediately set to work. Grabbing a large bag, he started gathering everything Rey used as a form of entertainment. Her dolls, her drawing equipment – he took her satchel right off her shoulder – schematics, Dosmit Raeh’s helmet, her datapad and the assorted chips of language programs, recipes, and even the flight simulator. The only thing Luke left were her plants, and that was only because he didn’t want to kill them.

Rey followed her father silently as he gathered up her possessions, throwing them somewhat carelessly into the bag. When they were all collected, he brought them outside, and locked them in the trunk of his speeder.

Luke slammed the trunk shut loudly and dramatically. Rey gulped as he fixed her with a deathly glare.

“Rey Rhiaon Erso,” Luke said slowly, “you are in the biggest trouble of your life.”

“Bigger than the time the First Order tried to kill me?” Rey grinned, trying to lighten the mood with humour.

The look on Luke’s face told her it wasn’t the time for jokes.

“Sorry,” she muttered.

“Sorry for what?” Luke snapped. “For the joke? For injuring Teng? For lying to Ivano? For running off on your own without permission? For terrifying Quom when he woke up with you gone this morning? For hurting Aletha? For scavenging a dangerous site without supervision? For scavenging Antar’s ship? Please tell me what you’re sorry for because you Rey Erso have messed up big time.”

Rey lowered her head.

But Rey said nothing. Instead she stood there trying to contain the tears gathering in her eyes, resolutely refusing to look up at her father. She couldn’t bear the pain and anger in his expression that she had caused him. Rey and Luke had had their disagreements before, but she had never disappointed him like this.

“Fine, don’t speak,” Luke turned away from her. “But you will listen to me.”

He too couldn’t bear to see that expression on Rey’s face, but he couldn’t back down. She had intentionally disobeyed him. She had outright betrayed Aletha, and daughter of Luke Skywalker and Rogue One or not, he would not stand for such a display of rebellion.

“You will be receiving a massive punishment for this, Rey,” Luke warned. “If I could leave you on your own, you would be grounded, but this little incident displays to me that you are not mature enough for the responsibility to be left on your own. For the next two weeks you will never be unsupervised. I will always be in your company, and if I have to stand a foot away while you go to the washroom, I will.”

“What’s a washroom?” Rey interrupted, her voice sounding a mix of genuine curiosity and bitter snark.

Luke’s eyes narrowed as he decided to dub her words mockery, “During those two weeks you will not have access to any of the items I have confiscated. You will also not be permitted to scavenge, drive, cook, barter, or fix anything in the shop.”

“But Dad-”

“But nothing,” Luke snapped. “I don’t have a lot of privileges to revoke from you, so an incident of this magnitude means I have to do this.”

“What am I supposed to do? Sit still for two weeks and watch you scavenge, tinker, and cook?”

“Perhaps this will teach you the importance of obedience. Aletha issue aside, you put yourself in a dangerous situation today and injured Teng in the process.”

“I didn’t break the wing!” Rey exclaimed. “It was an accident!”

Luke raised an eyebrow, struggling to bite back any Force related comments, “I’m sure it was, but the fact remains that an accident occurred because of your disobedience.”

“So I have to undergo psychological torture?”

Luke fought the urge to roll his eyes. Uncle Owen was right, teenagers were so dramatic. He could only imagine the stuff he had put Owen through at Rey’s age.

“You may earn privileges back with good behaviour,” Luke said. “And you won’t be disallowed from doing anything.”

“You’re right, there’s plenty to do with everything taken away from me,” Rey snarked. “I might take up meditation.”

“You honestly should,” Luke advised. “You’re going to need in the years to come. Might as well start practising.”

Rey openly rolled her eyes at him.

She scoffed, “Young Lady? Yeah right, you don’t treat me like an adult.”

“Because you are not an adult. You’re not even a teenager. You are a child. My child, and I get to make the calls right now. You have to earn the privilege of me treating you more maturely by acting more maturely. Today you acted immaturity, hence the punishment.”

Rey crossed her arms and looked away from him. Luke took her silence as a moment to take a deep breath and collect himself. It was honestly a little bit funny that she was getting pushed closer to the Dark Side by his twelve-year-old daughter’s antics than the combined effort of Vader and Palpatine.

And he thought dealing with her temper tantrums at three was difficult… Then again he had also had Felicity, Poe, and Ben’s help dealing with those. Here he was on his own.

“You have no one to blame for this but yourself, Rey,” Luke said. “However, I am a decent person, so I will give you the opportunity to make this all go away.”

Rey frowned and turned back to look at him, “What? How?”

“By having an honest conversation. Let’s just put it all out in the open and talk about this. Can you agree to that?”

Her face paled, “Talk? Talk about what?”

Luke raised an eyebrow, “Well, I’m sure there’s something for us to discuss. Maybe not explicitly Aletha related, but related.”

Rey focused on biting her lip to stop her jaw from dropping. Quom had told Luke her secret. He was so mad, but she would yell at Quom later. Right now, she couldn’t bear to give her father the satisfaction of this conversation.

“Nope, nothing to talk about,” she lied.

Luke scowled, “Really?”

“Really.”

“You’re sure there’s nothing to discuss? Nothing at all?”

“Well, we could yell at each other about Aletha some more if you wanted, but I don’t think that’s going to get us anywhere.”

“Indeed.”

Father and daughter stared at each other with arms crossed in a battle of who was going to break.

“Well,” Rey finally declared, “if there’s nothing to talk about, I’m going to head inside and make some dinner… Unless I’m not allowed to do that?”

Rey nodded and with maybe a little too much skip in her step, pranced inside.

The second she was gone, Luke groaned loudly, dropping his head into his hands.
“Relax, Luke,” something warm tapped his shoulder. Luke looked up to find Anakin Skywalker’s ghostly visage patting him. “Don’t let the stress get to you too much. She is a child after all.”

“A stubborn child,” Luke muttered, ensuring to keep his voice low enough that Rey wouldn’t overhear and start asking questions.

“That’s what you get for having a child that is half Rhiaon,” Anakin replied. “Alaric Rhiaon may have been a disposable underling that was an Empire fanatic and a pushover when it came to convincing him that what he’s doing is for the good of the Empire, but he was a stubborn man when it came down to it. The whole exhaust port flaw was from him swearing up and down that Drayson had done the calculations right and was trustworthy. Of course, that proved to be his literal downfall as Drayson was a spy, and I got ripped into by the Emperor for that.”

Luke couldn’t help but laugh.

“What?” Anakin asked. “You find the Emperor getting mad at me so humorous?”

“No. Just memories,” Luke shook his head. “I remember Nakari telling me that the Emperor did that to you.”

“Nakari?”

“My first girlfriend. It was a conversation that also included me awkwardly discussing my romantic feelings for Leia and how out of my league she was… and also whether or not you had ever eaten cake.”

“Excuse me?”

“No, I’m serious, this was an actual conversation I had with her. Cake equals happiness,” Luke confessed. “…You have had cake, right?”

Anakin stared at his son for a long moment, “Yes, Luke. I have eaten cake.”

“So…” Anakin eyed his son, “why did that memory make you chuckle like that? Is the concept of me having cake that funny?”

Luke bit his lip and cleared his throat, “It’s not something you probably want to hear as my father. Let’s just say that what happened after the conversation was quite memorable.”

“So, cake was your lead in line to-”

“Don’t judge me. I was a nineteen-year-old virgin. Anything would get me going.”

“Hey, no judgement on my part. I was that age when I first-”

“As much as I love hearing about Mother, I feel like I should skip this story.”

Anakin shrugged, “Well, if it makes you feel better, the first time we kissed was proceeded with a rant involving my hatred of sand.”

“I was destined to live a minimum of 75% of my life in the desert, wasn’t I?”

“Sorry, Son. And hey, you once flirted with Felicity over the topic of sand… I was so proud of you.”
Luke sighed, “So, what are you doing here?”

“Can’t I drop in on my son occasionally?” Anakin asked.

“Usually not without motive.”

Anakin shook his head, “Fine… I think you’re going a little hard on Rey.”

“Excuse me?”

“This is being far more dramatic than it needs to be. Just call things off with Aletha, and it will be a lot less heartache all around.”

Luke fixed his father with a glare, “Thank you for the advice, but I think I’ll pass.”

“Son-”

“No!” Luke snapped. He held up his prosthetic, “You think I’m going to take parenting advice from the man who did this to his son?”

“You act as if Jedi cutting off arms doesn’t happen on a regular basis.”

“Father!”

“Sorry,” Anakin held up his hands in defense. “You know you sound just like your mother when you use that tone?”

“The mother you strangled which is why I’m also not taking relationship advice from you?”

“Oh great, what next? Are you going to bring up the slaughter of the Tusken Raiders too?”

“Fine!” Anakin huffed. “I’ll go visit her instead. I may annoy the hell out of her, but at least she doesn’t tell me to go away!”

And with that, Anakin was gone.

Luke sighed and wished mercy on Leia, Padmé, Ahsoka, or whichever poor soul in the world of the living or the dead he had just unleashed a sullen Anakin Skywalker on.

That night, neither Luke nor Rey could fall easily to sleep. They tossed and turned in the pitch black of night, staring up at the ceiling, a thousand unspoken words racing through their minds.

It was Rey who broke the silence.

“I’m sorry, Daddy,” Rey’s quiet voice sounded so loud in the stillness of the tension and the silence.

He sighed in his cot. His back was turned to her as he considered her words, her actions, and the sadness of her tone. Luke wanted nothing more than to take her into his arms and forgive her for everything… but he couldn’t.

Luke rolled over to face Rey in her hammock, “Don’t tell me sorry until you actually are.”
He turned his back to her and let himself fall asleep.

Rey curled up in her hammock, clutching the blanket her mother made so many years ago, wishing she could hug the doll of her mother that had been taken away. With tears in her eyes and Teng’s words ringing in her head, Rey tried to fall asleep.

But all she could think of was Teng right? Did she truly believe that her mother was alive? Rey touched her hair buns and sobbed.

Her heart knew the truth.

It was two of the longest weeks of Rey’s life. Boredom dragged on as she followed her father around in silence everyday. She actually took up her father on the suggestion to meditate, which Luke helpfully offered tips and corrections to her techniques. Sometimes she swore she could see things, far away things or long forgotten things. She dared not admit it to her father. It was bad enough he thought her insubordinate, she didn’t need him to think her crazy too.

Because she was saddled with her father, her encounters with Aletha were increased to her chagrin. Aletha tried her best to mend bridges with Rey, but Rey continued to give her the cold shoulder.

The only time Rey deigned to acknowledge Aletha was when she brought updates on Teng’s health. He luckily was going to pull through, though the healing was slow-going. Meru was of course, furious with Teng and Rey, so Rey had been temporarily banned from Old Meru’s. Luke wasn’t exactly bringing her there in the first place; that was more her thing with Quom.

Unfortunately, the Quom situation had become a whole other issue.

After two weeks, Luke did as promised and returned her items. Rey was back to tinkering and drawing to her relief.

It was bittersweet though. She used to eagerly show him her drawings, which he would praise to the high heavens. When she fixed stuff, Luke would beam with pride and teach her new techniques to better herself. Tinkering was their true source of bonding; tinkering and having long, honest talks about life, love, and as much of their past that Luke could answer. Rey loved those late-night talks as they laid in bed, trying to fall asleep as they discussed the wonders of the universe.

Nowadays, they barely spoke a word.

“You’re staying the night with Quom.”

Rey looked up from the broken shifter she had been working on in the corner of Quom’s tent.

“I’m sorry?” she frowned.

Luke was packing up his bag. Once again, Quom was nowhere to be found, but he knew the Vrogem would be returning soon. They had agreed upon it via the comm earlier that morning.

“You’re staying the night with Quom,” he repeated, refusing to look up at Rey.

“Why?”
“Because I’m spending the night with Aletha.”

Rey winced.

Luke saw it out of the corner of his eye and sighed, “I made a mistake in hiding this all, so I’ve decided to be open. You don’t need to know what I’m doing with her-”

“I’m pretty sure I can guess,” Rey grimaced.

“The point is that I’m not going to hide this anymore. I love your mother, but I’m with Aletha now. If you don’t like it, tough.”

Rey scowled, “You used to be nicer to me.”

“I’m your parent, not your friend,” Luke quoted the phrase Uncle Owen had used on him so many times.

Honestly, the older Rey got, the more Luke understood why his uncle was the way he was. The thought was terrifying. Next thing Luke knew, he would be yelling at Rey for stealing a speeder with her best friend and driving it out in the middle of the desert to a dangerous and forbidden area.

… Wait a minute.

“I’m not staying with Quom tonight,” Rey crossed her arms. “I’m staying with you.”

Luke raised an eyebrow, “Well Rey, I’m spending the night with Aletha, and we’re going to do things that I’m pretty sure I would get arrested even on Jakku if we did them in front of you. So, no; you are not staying with me tonight.”

Rey pulled a face, “Ew, Dad! I don’t want to hear that!”

“You want me to treat you like an adult, then I’ll talk to you like one.”

“I don’t want to picture that! It’s bad enough I already have the image of you and Aletha…” Rey shuddered. “Can we just pretend that’s a thing you don’t do, haven’t done, and never will do?”

Luke raised an eyebrow, “I have explained to you the biological process that led to your existence, right?”

“I will actually pay you not to draw the diagrams again.”

“Are you still mad that I used a Death Star analogy and quote ‘ruined the Battle of Yavin’ for you?”

“If I agree to stay with Quom tonight will you stop talking about this?”

“Deal,” Luke agreed. “You know, I think you’ll be happy spending the night with Quom. It’s been a while since any of us got to spend time with him.”

It was true; Quom appeared to have washed his furry hands of the whole Luke/Rey/Aletha situation. For the past three and a half weeks he had gotten up at sunrise to go scavenge on his own and came back at sunset to trade for portions after Luke and Rey had left town for the night. Seemingly overnight he would work on repairing his pieces, focusing on making as high a profit as possible.

True, Luke, Aletha, and Rey did see Quom from time to time, but it was clear he wasn’t interested in being around anymore. Not until the three of them had cleared up their situation and Quom wasn’t at risk of being affected by the Dark Side anymore.
“But we do need to have these conversations, Rey,” Luke said. “You’re on the cusp of puberty and I would like you to have some general idea of what’s going on with you.”

“If I wake up bleeding profusely, you will be the first one to know, Dad,” Rey replied dryly.

Luke looked at her seriously, “Rey, I am open to answering any questions you may have, but please, if you think there’s something serious, or I don’t have an answer to, or you just don’t feel comfortable asking me… I want you to go to Aletha.”

“Absolutely not.”

“Rey-”

“She’s not my mother!”

“I’m not telling you to do it because she’s your mother. I’m saying it because she’s a woman and she’s a doctor. She’s far more knowledgeable about this than me. For goodness sake’s, I would never say she’s your mother.”

“Could have fooled me,” Rey muttered.

Luke’s eyes narrowed, “Do you actually think that?”

Rey winced, “Sorry Dad, I didn’t mean-”

“No, look at me,” Luke ordered. “Do you honestly think I could forget your mother?”

She turned away, “I dunno… Maybe?”

“How could you think that’s possible?”

“It is though, possible to forget her.”

“No, it’s not.” Luke sighed and rubbed his forehead, “Look, Rey, let’s just say it, I know that you think your mother is alive.”

“Last time I trust Quom with a secret,” Rey muttered, remembering the shouting match she had gotten into with him the day after Teng’s accident.

“Rey, I’m sorry if I have done anything to encourage this delusion… but your mother’s dead. I truly wish she wasn’t, but there is no denying that fact.”

“Then where’s her body?” Rey snapped.

“Yes, it does! You want me to believe you? Then tell me what happened!”

“No! You are too young to know. Not now… maybe not ever.”

“I have a right to know!”

“This isn’t up for discussion, Rey,” Luke said coldly.

“It’s never up for discussion!” she screamed. “Why won’t you ever talk about it? Where we’re from? Why we came here? Why did she leave me behind? Why did you?”
Luke took a step backwards, “Excuse me?”

Tears were blurring Rey’s vision. Her head ached but she could have sworn she saw something odd in the distance. Rain and trees? No, it wasn’t possible.

“Aletha told me that you thought I was dead when you came here,” Rey said. “Why weren’t you with us when Mom left? What were we running from?”

“Rey, I promise you will get answers when it’s the right time.”

“I’m sick of waiting for the right time! Why can’t I know now?”

“Because I’m not ready!” Luke yelled.

Silence filled the tent at Luke’s confession. Rey started at her father with heartbreak and confusion.

“You’re going to be ashamed of me, Rey,” Luke let his tears fall. “I was a coward.”

“What do you mean?” Rey whispered.

Luke dropped his forehead into his hand, “We have a family, Rey. A family I left behind.”

She didn’t know what to say.

“We have family, friends, a home… to a degree. When the First Order came for us, they burned down our home in an attempt to kill your mother and to slight me… but they wanted to take you for themselves.”

“Why?”

“I can’t tell you,” Luke answered. “But they would have used you against me, and turned you into a mindless weapon. Your mother and I wouldn’t let that happen, so I told your mother to take you and run while I held them off. That’s why we got separated, and that’s why your mother died. They found her and they took her. She told them you were dead, and they passed the same information on to me. Then they killed her, and I lost it. I broke down, and in a panic, I walked away from everything. No one knows we’re here, and I only found you by accident.”

“By accident?”

“I came to bury you, Rey… Not to save you.”

She looked away so he couldn’t see the tears in her eyes.

“Your mother made the ultimate sacrifice, the one we always promised we would never make, but prayed to the Force that we would never need to. Your mother died for you, for us. So we could live and love and be happy… But I could never be happy, not fully. Not without her. I love Aletha, it’s true, but your mother…”

Luke covered his face with both hands and sobbed.

“How could I forget her, Rey?” Luke broke down. Eyes squeezed shut, he lost himself to memories of Felicity Rhiaon, “How could I ever forget Felicity? The way she laughed? The way she smiled? The tone of voice, the sass of her snark? How could I forget that look on her face when her eyes sparked playfully and the right corner of her mouth turned up slightly in a smirk? How could I forget that soft brown hair, those large hazel eyes, that smooth pale skin? How could I forget that petite stature, how when she stood close in my embrace my chin rested atop her head? How her hands fit
Rey winced. “The way she held you as a babe? Those lullabies she sang? Those toys she sewed for you? How could I forgot that smile she reserved solely for you filled with a love warmer and deeper than even the one she held for me? How could I forget the way she loved me? Felicity Rhiaon was the most amazing woman I could have ever loved. I remember every detail about her… only a monster could forget her.”

He let himself cry for a few minutes. While he struggled to gather himself, not a peep came from his daughter. Rey’s strength in the face of such sorrow was amazing, and it gave Luke the strength to pull himself together for her sake. Luke took a deep breath, lowered his hands, and opened his eyes.

Rey was gone.

He knew not to follow.

Rey didn’t know how she knew where to drive. She just hit the gas and followed the pull inside of her that led her to the random patch of sand in the middle of the desert where Quom was working. It was something in her soul that gravitated to the dim, rusty grey light that seemed to inhabit the air where Quom stood.

He frowned at her, “Rey?”

No other words needed to be said. Rey just launched herself into his arms, and Quom held her as she cried.

A while later Rey and Quom were seated in the middle of the wreck of an upturned B-Wing. They shared a cannister of water as Rey’s sorrow began to cease. There was always something oddly comforting about cannisters of water to Rey. They always made her feel brave… or at least half brave.

“You can’t keep doing this, Rey,” Quom said.

Rey was curled up in herself, hugging her knees as she sipped from the cannister, “I just can’t stand the thought of the two of them together.”

Quom frowned, “No, I mean stealing speeders. MG, you are twelve years old. You really shouldn’t be driving a lot in general, much less committing grand theft auto.”

She sighed, “I’ve made a mess of things, haven’t I?”

“Eh,” he shrugged. “You’re a kid; it’s all part of the growing up process. I highly doubt those two didn’t make dumb decisions like that. They ended up on Jakku, after all.”
“And willingly made you their friend.”

Quom gave a throaty laugh and smiled. Rey grinned at the sound; she had missed the sound of his laughter so much. It had been so long since they had had a genuine moment of humor. Rey bit her lip at the thought. Her guilt getting the better of her, she looked down at the ground in shame.

“So…” Quom watched her, “tell me the truth… are you really upset at Aletha for dating your father?”

“No, I’m not mad at her,” Rey admitted.

“Then what’s going on? Why is this whole situation so hard for you?”

“It’s nothing.”

“You’re fighting with your father, stopped talking to Aletha almost five months ago, and Teng got badly injured. I may not like the kid, but I wouldn’t wish on him what happened. That’s not nothing, Rey. So tell me what’s going on.”

Rey buried her face in her legs, trying to shield her tears from Quom. She gripped the water cannister tightly to draw strength from it, but it wasn’t enough.

“Hey,” he placed a arm around her shoulders and pulled her to lean against him in a hug. “Come on, MG. Tell me what’s going on.”

“I can’t tell you.”

“You can tell me anything.”

“Not this.” Rey quietly sobbed into her legs, “I’m so ashamed.”

“MG, there is nothing you could ever say or do that would make me stop loving and supporting you. You could kill Ivano Troade with a shovel and I’d still stand behind you… You’re my kit, Rey. I may not be your father, but you are my litter of one, and you are more than enough trouble and heartache to last a dozen Vrogem pups. So please, tell me what’s going on.”

It was his proclamation that she was his kit that did it for Rey. The next thing she knew, she had broken down and sobbed out the whole sordid story, much like how her father had confessed his Jedi past to Quom several years earlier.

It wasn’t hard to understand why those words had triggered the confession. At the conclusion of the story he pulled her into his tight embrace and held her as she cried.

“It’s okay, MG,” he whispered into her ear as she buried herself in his warm, comforting fur. It had been so long since that day he had almost left her to die, and he would never let something like that hurt her again. “It’s okay, MG, I’ve got you.”

“I’m so sorry, Quom,” Rey wailed. “I’m so sorry.”

“It’s not your fault at all, so don’t you dare blame yourself.”

“I just don’t know how to fix things.”

Quom sighed and reluctantly pulled away. He wiped the tears from her reddened cheeks as her breath hitched with sobs. Quom placed his hands on her shoulders and looked Rey directly in her blurry, tear-filled eyes.
“Yes, you do,” Quom whispered. “…It’s time to tell your father the truth.”

Rey sniffed, “But I’m scared. What if he-”

“The man cut off Jarex’s arm to protect you… Don’t you dare think for a second that he’s going to respond with anything but the same tears, hugs, and words of comfort. This is about more than Luke and Aletha, and he needs to know that.”

Rey closed her eyes and took a deep, pained breath, “Do I have to tell him right now?”

Quom smiled and rubbed her shoulder, “Take a few a days if you need to, MG, but things aren’t going to get better until you talk to him. So promise me you’ll talk to him as soon as possible.”

“I promise,” Rey nodded. Then after a moment, she gave a small smile, “Hey, at least there’s nothing else that could go wrong from all of this, right?”

Quom laughed, “Oh Rey, My Girl… You’ve just doomed us all.”

There is no such thing as the sound of an awkward silence, but there certainly is a weight to it. And that night on Jakku, Luke and Aletha felt it bear down on them with the full force of a Death Star.

They stared up at the ceiling of Aletha’s tent unable to think of what to say to break the frigid cold ice clinging to the room. The cots were pushed together and they lay bare upon them, covered only by a thin blanket.

“So…” Aletha said.

“Don’t worry, it happens to all guys sooner or later. Especially when they get older and are under a lot of stress. If you think it’s going to be a problem, I know a pill-”

“I’m sure it was,” Aletha smiled and turned on her side to face him. She lazily brushed her fingers in random patterns across his chest, “So, what happened?”

Luke sighed and played with her hair, “I just… I started thinking about things I shouldn’t.”

“What kind of things?”

His eyes said it all.

“Oh,” Aletha rolled away from him.

“I promised that I would never make love to you while thinking of Felicity,” Luke said. “I had to stop myself when she came to mind.”

“Why did she come to mind? Was I doing something-”

“No, it’s Rey. We had a huge fight today and she accused me of forgetting Felicity. My mind has been fighting against the accusation all day, so it slipped into my mind, and… Like I said, I promised not to make love to you while thinking of her, so when my mind went to her I stopped things.”
“You stopped things because of that? Because if you asked me it certainly felt like you were just… unable to maintain interest.”

Luke looked at Aletha, “I’m not particularly turned on by making love to one woman while thinking of another.”

Sienna Ternan notwithstanding, but that was a whole other thing altogether.

“Well, I’m not going to get mad at you for stopping things because of that,” Aletha sighed. “I just wish I was enough for you.”

Luke frowned, “You are more than enough for me.”

“Luke, please don’t do this, don’t be another Antar. I know you love me, but I also know that if she was standing here in front of you alive and you had pick between the two of us, there may be a little hesitation, but you would pick her.”

He sighed, “Alright, if you want me to say it, I will. If you both were alive and available, and I was asked to pick one over the other… yes, I would pick Felicity.”

Aletha winced.

Luke cupped her cheek and forced her to face him, “But what a choice to make. I am truly blessed to have found such amazing women to share my love with. In different ways from Felicity, you are everything I have ever looked for. I used to tease Felicity that I could have never brought her home to my Aunt and Uncle, but you I would in a heartbeat. You’re kind, gentle, intelligent, but still have a little steel beneath you. You are gorgeous in that sort of fair skinned maiden almost princess out of a storybook way. If Felicity was my opposite, you are my mirror image, and I am so happy I get to share the rest of my life with you.”

Aletha blinked, “The rest of your life?”

Luke realized the error of his words, “It’s not a proposal.”

“Of course,” she nodded. “But if it were… It wouldn’t exactly be a yes but… I am open to the possibility.”

Luke blinked, “You are?”

“Uh huh. Are you?”

He smiled, “Yes, I’m open to the possibility.”

They shared a grin.

“Let’s not commit to anything now,” Luke said, “but it’s nice to know where we want things you head.”

“Potentially,” Aletha corrected. “But yes, if I find that kind of love again, the love I had with Antar, I’m open to marrying again.”

“And I’m open to remarriage after Felicity.”

“Even if I’m just your second best?”

“You are no just anything. You are the woman I love, Aletha Kymeri, not a consolation prize. And I promise you this, no matter what happens, no matter what issues the First Order or my past may cause us, the heart of the man I was belonged to Felicity Rhiaon… but the heart of the man who calls himself Luke Erso will always be yours.”

Aletha pulled him into a kiss.

“I love you,” she whispered when they broke apart.

“I love you too,” Luke chuckled. His hands started to playfully drift down her body, “Now, I believe I owe you an orgasm.”

“I believe you do,” Aletha giggled as Luke pulled down the blanket and shifted his body over hers.

Aletha moaned as Luke kissed and licked along her neck while his mechanical hand gripped her hip and the other stroked sensually up her thigh. He grinned as he found a streak of her natural wetness still on her thigh from when her body had gotten itself ready for his penetration. The thought made him a little hard again, and Luke vaguely wondered if he’d have to get himself another condom.

His lips trailed down her neck, beneath her collarbone, between her breasts, and then circled back to lavish their attention on her nipples.

Aletha’s breasts were more well endowed than Felicity, and her nipples were larger too. In fact, Luke found the women’s bodies to be quite different – Felicity had larger hips, Aletha’s legs were longer, Felicity was more muscular and flexible than Aletha, but Aletha could last longer. Even their techniques and likes were very different: Felicity could handle multiple orgasms easier, Aletha understood male anatomy and erogenous zones a lot better, Felicity enjoyed getting on her knees and giving Luke oral sex, Aletha easily got off from fingering, Felicity liked to be on the bottom, and Aletha liked to be on the top. There were similarities between them though: both liked a little spanking, both were down for him giving them oral sex pretty much literally at any time – the man truly was talented in cunnilingus – both cried out his name as they orgasmed.

It was different enough that Luke didn’t often have to worry about his mind drifting to Felicity during sex, but familiar enough that Luke was able to let loose and bask in the ecstasy of sexual pleasure.

Luke lavished his attention on Aletha’s breasts, making her moan and coo in a way that was absolutely preparing himself to give the act of intercourse another go. Between her thighs, Luke’s fingertips swirled in the lubrication of her still wet and wanting pussy.

Insanely turned back on, Luke pushed two fingers into her. Aletha moaned, throwing her head back onto her thin, flat pillow, as Luke pumped his fingers steadily into her while his thumb attended to her tender clit.

But as enjoyable as it was while Luke pleasured her… Aletha’s mind couldn’t help but wonder what it would feel like to be someone’s first choice.

Diego Nalto observed the blur of frantic activity in the hallway of the Resistance Base. As the Second in Command of the Resistance, it fell to him to deal with the chaotic situation, and indeed his comlink had been going off like crazy for the past few hours. His finger had become very well acquainted with the mute button; there was something he had to deal with that was far more important than any Resistance business.
“Move!” a gruff voice came down the hallway.

A scruffy old smuggler was racing down the hallway, literally shoving people out of the way as he bolted towards the medical wing. Han Solo was a man unashamed to say he would race to his injured wife’s bedside.

“Nalto!” Han shouted.

Diego nodded politely as Han reached him, “You got my message then?”

Han glared at him, “No, I was in neighbourhood. What do you think? How’s Leia? Is she okay?”

“She’s out of surgery now,” Diego explained as they strode down the hallway together. A few people came up to Diego, trying to get his attention, but he waved them all off. “Doctor Kalonia says she’s stable, but… Leia’s not well.”

“How not well?”

“She’ll live but there could be lifelong side effects, some of which the General will really not enjoy.”

“Kriffing hell. How many were injured?”

“Fifty-two, but most of them are minor injuries, not like the General’s. Leia was the closest to the detonators.”

Han shook his head, “What kind of sadist uses poisonous gas on their enemies?”

“Intel says they’re a favorite of the First Order’s Head of Interrogation,” Diego answered. “Captain Electra honestly gives Phasma a run for her money.”

Han grabbed Diego’s arm and pulled him to a halt.

With a hardness to his face, Han looked Diego straight in the eyes and said, “Nobody is worse than Phasma. Not after what happened to Fliss.”

Diego held Han’s gaze, “With all due respect, Captain Solo… it wasn’t Phasma who put the bolt through her temple.”

Stricken by the words, Han released Diego’s arm. A sadness he was fighting to supress was in his eyes.

Han looked around the hall, afraid someone was listening, “Was Ben involved in this?”

Diego sighed, “…We have reason to believe he’s the one who attacked her.”

Han winced and looked away quite suddenly. Diego could have sworn he heard the gasp of a sob.

“Where is she?” Han’s voice was shaky as he fought against the emotions bubbling in his chest: sorrow, anger, and above all, shame.

“This way,” Diego hit a button on the wall to open the door of the Medical Wing.

It was absolutely full of people. Victims were being tended to by doctors, nurses, Medics, Med-Droids, and anyone who was free to lend a hand. Diego had to shoe off a good dozen people, all clamouring for his attention now that Leia was out of commission. It was a blessing when Threepio found them, a statement not often made.
“Oh, Commander Nalto! Captain Solo! This way!” Threepio urged them towards a curtained off bed in the corner. “Hurry please.”

Muttering a quick thanks to Threepio – displaying how seriously Han was taking the situation that he was willing to audibly thank Threepio – Han pushed the droid aside as he reached the curtain. He pulled it open and he was met with a heartbreaking sight: Leia hooked up to a myriad of medical equipment and her face was covered with a breathing mask.

She still looked like the most beautiful woman in the galaxy to him, greying hair, wrinkles, breathing mask, and all.

“Han?” Leia croaked, her voice barely audible behind her mask.

“I’m here, Sweetheart,” Han clasped her hands, and fell to his knees to look her in the eyes. He smirked, “Broke half a dozen Galactic laws to get here this fast, but I’m here.”

Diego Nalto smiled and stepped away to leave the couple their privacy. With Solo delivered to his wife, it was time for Diego to step into his leadership role.

Starting by dealing with the boy a few metres away.

“Dameron!” Diego grabbed Poe by the shoulder and dragged him up from the patient who he was assisting Doctor Kalonia with. It was nothing she couldn’t do without a helper, so Diego felt justified in dragging off Poe.

BB-8, however, seemed to disagree.

SQUEE! SQUAW! SKOIW!

BB-8 squawked and chirped angrily at Nalto, ramming over and over into his leg to drive Diego off his attack of his master.

“Easy, Buddy. I’m okay,” Poe assured BB-8, calling off the attack. “Commander Nalto, I can explain.”

“What were you thinking?” Diego scolded. “You should have called the retreat the second you spotted those First Order ships. I thought they covered don’t intentionally engage an ambush trap on your first day of being in the Resistance.”

“I wanted to retreat, Commander, but once she sensed him I couldn’t deter her. General Organa insisted on continuing ahead and I can’t disobey her orders.”

Diego sighed, “I suppose not, but to let her go alone-”

“I’m sorry, she separated from us during the scuffle. You know she did it intentionally. If anyone had tagged along, you know it would have ended with us trying to kill Kylo Ren.”

“You could have stopped them.”

Poe’s eyes hardened, “I would have helped them.”

Diego frowned.

“I have no sympathy left for that boy,” Poe said coldly. “Not after spending so much time with Rey. She didn’t deserve to die, and I will see that he’s punished for her death… as well as Felicity’s.”
Diego sighed; how could he possibly chastise Poe for the very same feelings he kept in his heart?

“They will be avenged, Poe,” Diego promised. “But it can’t be at the risk of losing General Organa.”

“Forgive me, Sir, I just thought…”

Diego frowned, “Yes?”

Poe sighed, “Maybe if she could turn back Kylo… Luke might come home.”

Diego groaned. How had he not seen it before?

Poe shook his head, “I was the last person who spoke to him—”

“Kalonia was the last person to speak with him before he disappeared, and Tekka was the last person to hear from him.”

“But I was the last person he spoke to before he made the decision to leave. Maybe I did something or said something—”

“Enough,” Diego grabbed Poe’s shoulder. “Listen to me, Dameron. Skywalker leaving had nothing to do with you. After what he went through, it’s no surprise he broke down. Losing Fliss and Rey, and what happened to Temple Village… I saw those bodies, Poe. I collected them. I know the horrors he witnessed that night, the things he blamed himself for. I was the one who brought the idea of Fliss and Rey hiding on Jakku to his attention. But I know I can’t sit around and blame myself for it. I will carry the burden forever, but I can’t put the rest of this Resistance at risk due to my guilt.”

Poe sighed, “I just don’t know how we’re going to win this war without him.”

Diego shook his head.

“I have been fighting long before Luke Skywalker ever joined the Rebellion, and I will fight long after he is gone. You must too, we all must fight for there is always hope.” Diego looked over at Han by Leia’s side, “We fight for them. For that. For love. That’s the only thing one can truly fight for, and love will always win.”

Poe smiled as he watched the husband and wife, “You know, the General is never as happy as when Captain Solo is around. It must be nice to have someone to love like that.”

Diego’s stomach churned, trying to suppress the regrets of his loveless life, “Yeah… it must be.”

Meru has one flesh-and-blood arm, covered with military tattoos. Don’t get caught looking, though—she’ll throw you out for being curious. She doesn’t like people being curious. Or being anything else.

- Rey’s Survival Guide

Luke and Rey were surprised when Meru pulled up to the speeder with Teng in the backseat three days later. It was nearly sunset and they had long ago completed their meals, settling into another night of ignoring each other until one of them snapped and they started yelling at each other until bedtime. Rey had yet to tell her father her secret, though she had been gathering the courage to do so that night. Unfortunately, Teng’s arrival had cut off any chance of doing so.

“Five minutes,” Meru glared as Teng got out of speeder. “Not a second more.”

“Yes, Ma’am,” Teng nodded. He tried not to grunt as he climbed out of the speeder with great difficulty. Teng nearly winced when he caught sight of Luke and Rey, “Mister Erso, Rey, I’m sorry for interrupting.”

“It’s no problem,” Luke waved. “Rey and I were just having another night of not speaking to each other. Would you like to come in, Meru?”

“I’ll wait out here,” Meru’s tone could barely pass for polite.

Luke nodded and ushered the children into the walker.

“No, Sir, I just came by to speak with yourself and your daughter,” Teng hung his head as he finished limping inside. He was covered in bandages and bruises, but he could stand upright at least. “Starting with apologizing for being disobedient and taking Rey to that X-Wing. I knew it was wrong and I did it anyway.”

“You are forgiven,” Luke replied. “Besides, I think you’ve more than paid your dues. How is the healing going?”

“I’m in a lot better shape, but it will be a long time before I’m back to normal.”

Rey winced; these past few weeks had been terrible. She had hurt Teng very badly with her recklessness, and the consequences had been great. Divided from her father more than the time she had been hiding Jarex abusing her. Untrusting of Quom and now he had been spending all of his time working just so he could avoid facing Luke and Rey. Missing Aletha dearly and wanting to embrace her the way she once had, but too afraid of betraying her mother to do so. Separated from Teng, the one person she knew would stand by her side through thick and thin as he recovered from the injuries she had caused him. And now she was feeling the physical effects of the situation: cranky, crampy, and her head pounding with a headache.

The consequences of her actions had been so hard to bear, but now she was over the hill and things were starting to settle back to normal. Even if she wasn’t on speaking terms with Aletha and her own father, at least she finally had Teng back.

But Rey was just about to realize truly what the consequences of her X-Wing stunt had been.

“Would you like to sit?” Luke gestured to his cot.

“No, thank you, Sir,” Teng smiled politely.

“Well, Rey and I will be glad to see you back to normal soon enough.”

Teng looked down at the ground, fidgeting with his own hands, “Unfortunately, you won’t be able to see me when I’m back to normal.”

Rey and Luke frowned, both resisting the urge to share a confused look.
“What do you mean?” Rey asked.

Teng took a deep, shaky breath and looked at directly at her.

“I’ve been sold, Rey,” Teng said with tears in his eyes. “I’m leaving tomorrow.”

Chapter End Notes

Coming Up Next Chapter…

The Price of Growing Older
When puberty brings a significant change to Rey, she finally confesses her dark secret. Meanwhile Luke races against the clock to save Teng from his new owner.

And for everyone freaking out about the Leia storyline, I promise we will come back to it, and trust me, it turns out to have a ridiculous reason for me to make up said storyline.
The Price of Growing Older

Chapter Summary

Rey gets her first period, Luke tries to save Teng, and to no one's surprise, I manage to shove in another Felicity flashback.

Chapter Notes

So, because I’ve had to split a few chapters in half due to bulk of content, my friend and I have re-evaluated our bet. Instead of getting to TFA before TLJ (because the only way to do that in the next thirty days is to literally quit my job to write fic, we’re still twelve chapters away) I just have to write at least ten chapters from the start of our bet. I’ve already written six, so this is going to work out just fine.

In other words, don’t expect TFA to start until probably January at the earliest.

Now back to fretting over how much the events of TLJ will screw over my fic.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

The Long Way Home

Chapter Thirty-Six

The Price of Growing Older

Some live here because it was where they were born, and it’s all they’ve ever known.

- Rey’s Survival Guide

“We have to save Teng!”

“Rey, settle down and go to sleep,” Luke ordered as he lie in his cot, pulling the blankets over his body.

“But Dad!” she objected from her hammock.

“But nothing. We have to leave this for the morning. There’s nothing we can do about it tonight. Go to sleep, and we’ll figure this out in the morning.”

Rey grumbled but fussed about in her sheets and settled for bed. Sleep would not come to her, her head with a pounding ache, and cramping in her abdomen. Something more than a stomach ache, her body must have been punishing her for her misbehaving the last few weeks… or maybe months.

“Dad?”

Luke groaned, having been a moment away from surrendering to slumber.

“Sorry,” Rey scratched at a pimple on her face. Her skin had started developing them over the last year, but in the past week she had had a large flare up of them on her cheeks and jawline.

“It’s okay,” Luke shifted into a more comfortable position. “What is it?”

“What can we do to save Teng?”

Luke groaned but thought about her question, “I suppose I’ll just have to go to Meru and pay her double for Teng or something. I don’t know what we’re going to do with him after, but that should hold off the buyer.”

“Who is the buyer?”

“I have no idea, but I’ll try to find out. Hopefully it’s someone local.”

“Who knows not to mess with you?”

“Exactly.”

Rey smiled, “Thanks Dad.”

Luke grinned back in the darkness, sensing her smile, “It’s no problem. That’s the sort of thing you do for a friend.”

“He’s not exactly your friend.”

“No, but you’re right, you need someone your age to spend time with. Teng is a nice boy, and you don’t have many other options.”

“Just that Devi girl and Strunk guy. Honestly, they give me a bad vibe.”

“Same here. Strunk seems a little… Dirkish-”

“You mean simple?” Rey teased.

“Exactly,” Luke nodded. “It’s the Devi girl you can’t trust. Promise me you won’t trust her further than you can throw her.”

“I don’t know. I bet I could throw her pretty far.”

Luke chuckled, “Alright, then don’t trust her further than she casts a shadow.”

“Deal.” Rey thought about his words, “You know, I think I kinda like that phrase. Can we make that be a thing?”

“Will you stop talking and let me go to sleep?”
“Deal.”

“Then it’s a thing.”

The next morning, Rey was woken by the throb in her abdomen. She groaned and wrapped an arm around her body as she sat up in her hammock. It had gotten so much worse overnight. It was like a stabbing pain in her gut… No lower than her gut, sort of somewhere around her pelvis.

Something wet slid down her legs.

Oh no. Had she been so stressed out by the Teng situation that she wet the bed? It had been years since that happened. How could she have done it now?

What would her father say?

Rey glanced over at Luke. He was sound asleep, breathing heavily, and his feet gently kicking under the blanket. He weirdly did that sometimes, though Rey couldn’t figure out why.

Carefully, Rey slid out of bed and slipped on her shoes. She would head outside, check herself over, and if she had wet the bed, she would come back in and clean it all up before her father woke… somehow.

She was too embarrassed to look at her hammock as she snuck outside. If she had, she would have been in for a huge shock.

Rey did end up getting said shock when she went outside.

Behind and a little way away from the walker was their designated washroom area. It wasn’t the most dignified thing to deal with bodily fluids while living on Jakku. Squatting in sand was awkward, and burying solids was meant not only as a courtesy to your fellow desert dwellers, but also the age-old game all species liked to play “let’s pretend no one ever defecates.”

Rey pulled down her leggings and readied herself to deal with the embarrassment of cleaning her urine stained clothing when her heart froze. Her leggings and underwear weren’t stained with urine.

They were stained with blood.

Rey’s heart thudded in her chest a mile a minute. There was blood. She was bleeding. It was staining her thighs and her groin- No. Coming from her groin.

It wasn’t normal blood either, not bright red and spurtting until it clotted. It was dark red, thick and sticky. It flowed almost imperceptibly. When Rey wiped herself – if there was one luxury Luke was not going to stand letting his daughter grow up without, it was toilet paper – the blood wiped away with it, but more blood flowed from her, taking its place.

Rey’s head raced with concern. Okay, she knew what this probably was. Headaches, cramps, hormonal acne, being very cranky. This was probably her first period.

…but what if it wasn’t? What if something was massively wrong and she was slowly bleeding to death? What if something terrible was happening and she was about to get blood out of every orifice of her body? What if her uterus had been ripped in two? What if her entire reproductive system was about to fall out of her? What if she had cancer?
What was cancer again? She remembered Aletha mentioning it before.

No, she had to focus. She had to figure out what was going on and then… do something.

But what?

Oh, she should have paid far more attention when Aletha was teaching her biology.

Ok, she needed to make a plan. Step one: Tell Dad.

…Should she tell her father? After all, he was a man. He might have general knowledge about periods, but could he answer all the questions she had about it? Could he tell the difference between a period and something else? Most importantly, could she really look her father in the eye and say “Dad, I’m bleeding profusely from my private area.”

She definitely knew the answer to number three.

Oh God, what was she supposed to do? Why, oh why did she not pay attention more to Aletha when she was talking about-

Wait, Aletha! That was it! That was the answer. She could talk to Aletha about…

Oh no…Well, this going to be a very awkward day. And that wasn’t even considering they had to go save Teng. Could Rey still go do that?

There was one thing that was clear: she had to wake up her father and then she would figure this all out.

“Dad. Dad,” Rey shook her father.

Luke groaned and opened his eyes, “Rey? What’s going on?”

Rey looked very nervous for some reason, “Dad, we, uh… I have to go to Niima Outpost right now. We have to go.”

“Why?”

“I, uh… I need to see Aletha.”

Luke narrowed his eyes, unwilling to summon the energy to sit up, “Why? What are you going to do to her?”

“Nothing,” Rey blushed, “I just have to see her. I… I hurt myself.”

That made Luke sit up.

“What? Where?” he grabbed her arm and started to examine her.

Rey pulled away, “Don’t get excited, it’s just my… legs.”

“Did you cut yourself?”

“Uh… sort of.”
“Let me take a look.”

“Uh, no, it’s… kinda high up.”

“Uh…” Rey bit her lip and looked at the ground. “Higher.”

He didn’t get it until Rey awkwardly glanced back at her hammock. There was a small spot of blood on the fabric… and her legs were very firmly clenched together.

He found the little pouch Aletha had given him a few years back, and handed it to Rey.

“Here,” he said. “There’s some special painkillers that focus on relieving… thigh cramps.”

“And this?” Rey frowned as she pulled out a small white bundle.

“A bandage of sorts,” Luke wished he didn’t have to use euphemisms. He was comfortable talking openly about periods, but Rey didn’t appear to be, so he respected her decision. “Line the… section of clothing that comes into contact with the source of the blood. That should soak it up for a while. There’s several of those in that pouch. You’re going to need more than one before it finishes. Do you… have any questions for me about it?”

“I’d kind of like to talk to Aletha about it.”

“Of course, as a woman and doctor she does know quite a bit more about… thigh cuts.”

“Thanks,” Rey blushed. “Dad, what about Teng? We have to go get him.”

“How about this?” Luke offered. “I’ll drop you off with Aletha, and I’ll go handle this whole Teng business.”

“Promise you’ll save him?”

“I’ll bring him home. Now go… line your clothing. I’ll start the speeder.”

“Excuse me, Doctor?” Luke smiled as he entered Aletha’s tent, “but am I interrupting something?”

“Of course not, Mister Erso,” Aletha grinned, automatically crossing the room to wrap her arms around his neck and greet him with a kiss. “This is my favorite part of the morning.”

“Ahem!”

That was when Aletha noticed Rey had followed in behind.

“Right,” Aletha quickly pulled away from Luke, “What can I do for you two?”

Luke looked back at his daughter, “Why don’t you tell her?”

“I, uh… I need some medical help,” Rey awkwardly looked at the ground and rubbed her arm.
“Come on over,” Aletha prepped the medical cot. “What seems to be the issue?”

“Rey’s been bleeding,” Luke replied.

“Oh goodness,” Aletha said in worry.

Luke grinned, “From her thighs.”

“Oh goodness,” Aletha gave him a knowing smile. “How long has this been going on?”

“I woke up with it this morning,” Rey confessed.

“Well, why don’t you come over here and we’ll check things out?”

Rey looked back at Luke, “You can go now, Dad.”

Luke raised an eyebrow, “Are you sure?”

“Leave us girls to deal with it,” Aletha chuckled at him. “I’ll let you know if there’s any issues.”

“But you two are in the middle of a fight,” Luke reminded. “Can I leave you both alone?”

“I’m sure Rey won’t kill me when your back is turned.” Aletha’s voice was humorous, but after a moment her face fell. Concern edged her voice, “Right, Rey?”

Rey shrugged, “Maybe we can call a truce. You promise everything’s going to be okay with Teng, Dad?”

“I promise,” Luke vowed. “Call me if you need me. I’ll be back in a few hours.”

“Bye Dad.”

“Bye Darling,” Aletha called at the same time.

Rey glared at her as Luke exited the tent.

“Alright, first thing’s first, let me put up my sheet,” Aletha got up, ignoring Rey’s hostility.

Rey frowned at Aletha’s actions, “The black sheet? Is it that serious?”

“Sunshine, you are the most important thing in my life. If you came in with a papercut, I would still put up the black sheet. Now, come on, have a seat on the cot. What’s going on with Teng?”

“He’s been sold,” Rey reluctantly came over and sat on the cot. “Dad’s going to try to save him before Meru sends him away today.”

“Well, don’t you worry for a second,” Aletha pulled on a pair of rubber gloves. “Your dad is an expert in that area. I promise you that tomorrow night, Teng’s going to be all safe and sound. Now, let’s talk about you. Where exactly is this cut?”

Rey bit her lip, “Aletha?”

“Yes, Sunshine?”

“…It’s not actually a cut.”

Aletha smiled warmly, “I know, Sunshine. Is it menarche?”
“Huh?”

“Your first period,” Aletha corrected.

“I think so,” Rey blushed.

“Hey,” Aletha lifted up her chin, “come on. You know there’s nothing to be embarrassed about. I’ve been openly talking about my own for years to make you more comfortable with the topic.”

“I know, it’s just… you know, still a little awkward.”

“Well, you can talk to me about anything.”

Rey looked away, “Not everything.”

Aletha guided Rey’s head back to face her again, “But definitely about this. So, let’s talk about it.”

Rey gathered her courage, “Okay.”

“Have you been getting discharge the last few months?”

“Discharge?”

“Have you been finding stains in your underwear? Sort of a clear and sticky liquid that comes from your genitals?”

Rey blushed, “Maybe.”

“Hey, no blushes, okay? This is perfectly natural.”

“Are you sure?” Rey let the panic start to seep into her voice. “What if something is really wrong? What if I’m dying? What if I have cancer?”

“This isn’t exactly the sign of cancer,” Aletha said kindly. “But hey, it could be. Would you like me check you out?”

Rey hesitated.

“I’m your doctor, Rey,” Aletha reminded. “I’ll be a total professional, and besides, it’s nothing I haven’t seen on myself.”

Rey blushed, “Okay… What do I do?”

“Take off your leggings and underwear and climb onto the cot,” Aletha instructed. She helped Rey move into position, “Did your father give you my package?”

“Yes. Thank you for that.”

“It’s absolutely no problem. Make sure you change out those pads every few hours. They’re biodegradable, so you can safely bury them when you’re done with them. Lay back and scoot all the way to the edge of the cot.”

Rey did as instructed.

“Good,” Aletha put a blanket over Rey’s legs to give the girl a sense of modesty. “Now spread your legs and relax. This won’t hurt at all.”
It took a few minutes for Rey to gather her courage, but she followed Aletha’s orders. The Doctor was very respectful to Rey as she examined her, but Rey still squirmed in discomfort, not from pain but sheer awkwardness.

A part of her that had to have come from Felicity Rhiaon couldn’t help but think that Aletha had definitely seen her father in the same level of nudity. The thought made her shudder.

“Definitely your period,” Aletha finally declared. “Nothing at all to be worried about. No death, no cancer, just the natural cycle of fertility most females endure.”

“And everything’s normal?” Rey asked.

“As far as I can see. It did happen a bit sooner than I expected, but not out of the realm of normality. Plenty of girls starts at age eleven, twelve, heck some even start at nine and ten. You’re perfectly fine.”

“Thank you, Aletha.”

“No problem at all,” Aletha pulled off her gloves and threw them away. “I’ll admit, it’s a little nice to interact with you like this again. It’s been a while since you came to me with your problems. I’ve certainly missed it… Not you having problems, but rather you coming to me with them.”

“I’ve missed them too,” Rey confessed. “But still, this is a little awkward.”

“Would it make you more comfortable if you were wearing underwear?”

“So much better.”

“Let’s get you dressed, Sunshine.”

As Rey dressed, Aletha explained to her all she needed to know about caring for herself while having a period. How to clean herself, protect her clothing, symptoms of things going wrong, symptoms of things going right, the different look of discharge throughout her cycle, and a million other questions Luke really never would have known the answer to.

“I’m glad I have you around to explain this stuff,” Rey confessed once she was dressed again. “Sometimes it can get a little awkward dealing with it around so many boys.”

“Between Luke, Quom, Dirk, Ivano, and Teng, it is pretty testosterone filled in these parts,” Aletha chuckled. She smiled and let her voice be serious, “I’m happy to be there for you, Rey. Whatever you need, just ask.”

Rey looked away, “It’s not your job.”

“You’re right, it’s not. But I’m happy to do it. With your mother not around…” Aletha cut off Rey before she could say something, “I’m not trying to replace her. Okay? You don’t need another mother, and I don’t want to take her place. Your father doesn’t want me to take her place, okay? We would never let you to forget her.”

Rey broke down crying.

“Oh Sunshine,” Aletha grabbed Rey into her arms. “No, please don’t cry.”

“I can’t stop it,” Rey wailed. “I’m a horrible person, Aletha.”

“You’re not a horrible person. You were just uncomfortable about my relationship with your father.”
“No, that’s not it at all! I don’t care that you’re dating my dad. In fact… I love that you’re dating my dad. I like the idea of you being my mom.”

Aletha was overwhelmed by Rey’s confession, “You do?”

“Uh huh.”

“…Why?”

“Because… Because…”

Rey couldn’t say the words.

Aletha released Rey and dropped to her knees so she was looking Rey straight in the eyes. Rey had grown so much taller from the time Aletha first met her that now when she made the gesture, she ended up staring at Rey’s throat.

“Sunshine… Rey. Please tell me what’s going on,” Aletha begged.

Rey took a shuddering breath, and then admitted her deepest, darkest secret.

“I… I don’t remember my mother!”

It was like a pail of freezing cold water had been thrown in Aletha’s face.

“What?” Aletha exclaimed.

Rey sobbed, “I don’t remember my mom… I can’t remember anything before Jakku. I- I don’t even remember meeting you and Quom.”

Aletha stared at Rey in open mouthed horror for a long minute. Then instantly she pulled Rey into her arms and held her as the girl cried.

“It’s okay, Sunshine,” Aletha lovingly stroked Rey’s hair. “Are you… Are you sure about this? You don’t remember her at all? You know so many stories about her.”

“Stories, yes,” Rey sniffed, “but just stories. I know her no more than I know Han Solo. When I think about her, she just a faceless blur, and her voice is muffled and distant. I don’t know her laugh, I don’t know her smile, I don’t remember her. The only thing I know is a distant woman’s voice telling me- promising me that she would come back for me. Oh God, I’m a terrible person.”

“No, Rey, no.” Aletha sighed; how had she not foreseen this? “It’s perfectly normal for you to forget your early childhood. Five is about the cut-off age, and you lost her when you were five.”

“I’m scared Aletha. I’m scared that I’ve forgotten her entirely. That’s why I’m so against you being with dad, of replacing my mother… because you are the only mother I know.”

Aletha held Rey for a long time, whispering words of kindness as the girl cried in her arms. It was evitable with the timing and the fact that Aletha was the only constant female influence in Rey’s life. To Rey, who else could fill the title of mother but Aletha?

“It’s okay, Sunshine,” Aletha cooed when Rey had started to settle down. “It’s okay.”

Rey gathered herself and pulled out of Aletha’s grasp. She wiped her nose on her sleeve, but her eyes were still so wet and puffy.
“I’m the worst daughter in the world,” she declared.

Aletha cupped her cheek, “You are no such thing.”

“Yes, I am. I forgot my mother, and I’ve been treating my dad so horribly.”

“You’re scared, it’s understandable. When Luke finds out—”

“No, he can’t know! Please don’t tell him.”

Aletha gave Rey a kind look, “I will not withhold this from your father, Rey. He needs to know about this.”

Rey sniffed, “I’m so scared.”

“He’s not going to be angry. If anything, it’ll just make him scared.”

“That’s what I’m afraid of.”

Aletha sighed, “Rey… I don’t know what to say.”

“Tell me she wouldn’t be mad,” Rey begged. “Tell me Mom would say it’s okay for me to feel like this.”

Aletha opened her mouth to tell Rey that she couldn’t say any such thing, having not known Felicity Rhiaon well enough. But she paused when an old memory surfaced.

“Rey?” Aletha asked. “Do I know why I call you Sunshine?”

She shook her head.

“It’s because of the second time I met your mother. It was about a week after our first meeting. Do you remember that?”

Rey shook her head.

Aletha smiled, “Then let me tell you the story…”

It had been a week since you and your mother came to Jakku. I was busy fussing with inventory or something when I heard a knock on my tent peg.

“Come in,” I called.

A woman ducked into my tent, holding the hand of a little girl. The two of you looked so similar: ratty brown hair; tired hazel eyes; sunburnt, pale, dirty skin; and pained looks on your faces. You had an arm wrapped gently around your ribcage, and your mother’s worried eyes didn’t leave you for a moment.

“Good afternoon, Doctor,” your mother pleasantly greeted me, even though she wouldn’t look at me. “Mind if we bug you for a moment?”

It took me a few minutes before I recognized the two of you.

“Of course,” I smiled and gestured toward my medical cot. “Please come in and have a seat.
“Fidelity was it?”

“Felicity,” she corrected as she led you over to the cot and had you sit.

“What seems to be the problem, Felicity?”

“It’s Rey here. Her ribs have been hurting the past few days, and this morning we found a bruise on her ribcage. I’m worried she broke something.”

“When would the break have occurred?”

“I don’t know. We’ve been careful since our last visit, so it must have happened during out trek.”

“Well, if it is a break, you probably would have had more signs closer to the moment of injury, but I’ll take a look. Mind if she lifts her shirt?”

You looked up at your mother for permission with such uncertainty.

“It’s okay, Sweetheart,” your mother stroked your hair. “Remember, this is the nice lady who took care of you last week. Doctor… Chimera?”

“Kymeri,” I corrected.

Your mother got a strange look on her face, “Kymeri? I think I knew a Kymeri… Oh this is going to bug me until I figure it out. It’ll come to me.”

“You can call me Aletha, if you would like, Rey,” I told you. I winked, “Or Ally if that’s your preference.”

You got this incredibly heartbroken look on your face in an instant.

“Ally?” tears filled your eyes.

“It’s okay, Sweetheart,” Felicity wrapped an arm around you and tried to soothe you. She looked at me and explained, “We had a friend who recently died that Rey called Ally.”

“How about you just call me Doctor Kymeri, Sweetheart?” I smiled at you.

Your mother bit her lip, “Uh… Doctor? Do you mind maybe not calling Rey, Sweetheart? I’ve sort of got a thing about it.”

I blinked in shock and confusion, “Oh, uh, sure. Is it all pet names or just Sweetheart?”

“Just Sweetheart.”

“Well, how about Sunshine?” I offered. I leaned in to your mother and explained, “I like to be a little affectionate with children because it makes them less scared and more comfortable. Desert medicine can get quite frightening.”

“Sunshine is fine,” Felicity said.

So I had you lift up your shirt and set about examining you. A few minutes I came to the conclusion that one of your ribs had cracked. I had some cream with bacta that could fix bones by spreading over your wounded area, but it was a painful process to endure. I got your mother’s permission to administer you a low level aesthetic and next thing we knew you were out like a light.
“There,” I declared when I had finished applying the cream. “Give it an hour and Rey should be all healed.”

“Thank you,” Felicity looked away. I could see she was holding back some tears.

“Hey,” I gently touched her arm, “are you okay?”

With watery eyes, your mother shot me a look like I was the stupidest person in the world. “Really? I’m stranded in the desert with my five-year-old daughter, my idiot of a husband is too damn wrapped up in the theatrics of his ridiculous family drama to think clearly for one minute and leave a single damn comm open, I’m depending on Unkar Plutt to provide for me, the First Order is hunting me down, I just spent a week walking through the desert with very little food and water, my daughter technically died, and you’re asking if I’m okay. What do you think the answer is going to be?”

“Sorry, I get it.”

Your mother raised an eyebrow, “I really don’t think you do.”

“Part of it at least,” I shrugged. “My sister’s a Captain in the First Order and has vowed to hunt me down.”

Felicity squinted at me, “You’re not Phasma’s sister are you?”

“I have no idea who Phasma is.”

“Good.”

Your mother and I sat in silence for a few minutes.

“So, you’re a Rebel vet?” I decided to make conversation.

Felicity looked down at her starbird tattoo in surprise – she had one on her right arm.

“Uh, yeah,” she said. “Recruitment.”

“Medical,” I turned around and showed her my camp tattoo.

“Whose Batch?”

“I’m a Kenu girl.”

“Small world,” I laughed. “Hey, can I ask you something?”

“Is it going to be something obvious again?” she dryly replied.

I smirked, “Don’t tempt me.”

Your mother let herself laugh.

“I was just wondering why you didn’t want me to call Rey Sweetheart?” I asked.

Your mother’s face fell, “It’s a bit of a painful story.”

I waited until she was ready.
“The term is special to me. It’s what my husband and I call each other.” Felicity sighed and stroked your cheek as you slept, “When Rey was born, I had quite a bad case of Postpartum Depression.”

Postpartum Depression is complicated, and we’ll go over it later, Rey, but for now just know that it means your mother had a hormonal imbalance and got really sad and detached after you were born. It’s not your fault at all, but it’s something that happens to a sizable number of women.

“I’m so sorry,” I told your mother.

Felicity swallowed, “It was the darkest time of my life. I wouldn’t even let my husband name her until she was three months old. Until then I just called her it. I… did something bad, and my husband and I decided I should go to a treatment facility where I could get mental health help. She was five months old before I could call her anything, and I settled on the term Sweetheart. It would because I use the term for my husband who was the person I loved most in the Galaxy at the time – Rey has now overtaken him. By calling her Sweetheart I was putting her on the same level as my love for Luke. Since then, the term Sweetheart has been quite precious to me.”

“I’m sorry you had to go through that.”

“And now here I am all over again being a terrible mother.”

I frowned, “What do you mean?”

“Look at this! Look at what I’ve done! My daughter is hungry and tired, her ribs are cracked and she almost died!”

“Stop it, you are not a terrible mother.”

“Yes, I am. I let her go hungry and thirsty and-”

“You let her live!” I exclaimed. “Give me your hand.”

Your mother frowned but obeyed. I took her hands and placed them over your chest, crossed one over the other in the formation you take when you perform CPR. The bruise was the perfect shape of her hands.

“I did this,” Felicity whispered in horror. “I cracked my daughter’s ribs.”

“By saving her life.” I looked her straight in the eyes, “You performed the bravest, most selfless act a mother can do for their child. You gave her her life back. You used your bare hands to physically restart her heart. You gave her the very air from your lungs. That is the action of a great mother.”

But still your mother would not rally, “She’s still in great danger.”

“Then she has one hell of a Mama Nexu to protect her,” I smiled at your mother. “Honestly, you are one of the most amazing women I’ve ever encountered. Not many could have survived the desert trek, and even less could do it with a child and have you both survive.”

“I fear what’s to come though,” Felicity confessed. “If Luke doesn’t come soon… If the First Order gets here before him… I’m scared of the thought of what I might have to do. I’m terrified of what I might be capable of… Of the sacrifice I might have to make for her.”

It seemed a weight had been dropped upon the room.

“What happens to Rey if I make that sacrifice?” she whispered.
Something stirred down inside of me, and I took her hand.

“I’ll protect her for you,” I promised. “If anything happens, I’ll have her back.”

“You don’t need to do that.”

“Yes, I do.” I smiled, “We Rebels have to stick together.”

She smiled at me, and then turned to look at you. Her smile fell slowly from her face. Your mother’s eyes filled with tears, and she didn’t dare look away from you.

“I hope she forgets this,” Felicity whispered. “I hope that five years from now she doesn’t remember any of this.”

“She will,” I said.

Felicity looked up in shock, “Are you sure?”

“I’m positive… because I won’t let her forget how brave and selfless a mother she has,” I promised. “No matter what happens, to you, to me, to her, I swear to you, I’ll make sure she knows the kind of woman you are.”

She smiled at me, “If something does happen to me, I’d be happy to have someone like you watching over her. A girl needs someone to watch over her.”

“Yeah,” Felicity whispered.

Our eyes locked on each other, an unspoken parallel and promise to not only protect you, but to watch out for each other passing between us.

“I’ll watch over her, Felicity,” I vowed. “And I won’t let her forget you, I promise.”

Felicity smiled and grabbed my hand, “And I won’t let her forget the kind Doctor who was there for us when I couldn’t be… I promise.”

Aletha smiled at Rey, “Nothing else needed to be said between us that day. Sure, we made a little small talk as we waited for your treatment to finish. When it did, you thanked me and waved goodbye.”

Rey’s eyes filled with tears again as she knew what was to come next.

“The next time I saw your mother, she saved me from Phasma,” Aletha looked down in guilt. “I let her sacrifice herself for you, and when Quom brought you to me with that terrible sunburn, I vowed to uphold my promise. That’s all I’ve been trying to do, Rey. To be there like your mother wanted someone to be there for you… Falling in love with your father wasn’t part of that plan.”

Rey smiled, the tears shining in her eyes, “I think she would be okay with it.”

“Really?” Aletha grinned.

“I have no idea,” Rey confessed. Then she smiled and grabbed Aletha’s hand exactly as her mother had done seven years ago, “But I’m okay with it. I’m never going to call you Mom, but I want you to know that you have been my second mother. And I’ll never forget the kind Doctor who was there for us when I couldn’t be… I promise.”

Aletha pulled Rey into a tender hug, and in that moment they both knew that things were finally going to be alright.

There’s an ironclad rule of surviving as a scavenger:

All salvage is worthless until you’ve been paid for it.

- Rey’s Survival Guide

Luke pulled up to Meru’s with a trunk full of portions and an unwillingness to take no for an answer.

“I’m interested in taking Teng off your hands,” Luke climbed out of the speeder.

“Sorry, Erso, but I’ve already found myself a buyer.”

“I’m willing to offer you double what you were paid.”

“I can’t do that.”

“Triple.”

“Let me rephrase that,” Meru said. “I would love to accept the offer, but the buyer picked up Teng an hour ago.”

“Damn it,” Luke muttered. “Alright, where is he?”

“Hell if I know,” Meru shrugged. “Probably put the boy to work first thing.”

“Who did you sell Teng to?”

“Sorry, but I’m under strict orders not to tell you.”

“He knew you would come for the boy,” Meru explained. “He didn’t want you to buy Teng. Said he wanted to do that himself, and not having you get in the way. Almost held the boy back to see what you would give me, but decided the whole fee upfront was better.”

Luke winced. While he had withdrawn a large amount from Plutt, Meru was right, he hadn’t pulled the entire fee.

“Is there anything I can do to get Teng?”

“You’ll have to take it up with his new owner.”

“And you won’t tell me who that owner is?”
“Exactly.” Meru gave him a toothy grin, “Good luck, Erso.”

Luke sighed and rubbed his temples.

What was he going to tell Rey?

“I’m so sorry about Teng, Rey,” Luke said that night as they cleaned up their supper dishes in the walker. The rosy light of dusk filtered through the cracks of the walker, signifying the impending bedtime.

“I just can’t believe he’s gone,” Rey sadly set down the plates in a banged up metal box they used to collect dishware until it was time to do a wash.

“We’ll find him. I’m not giving up that easily. Someone has to know where he went. We’ll get him back, I promise you.”

“Thank you.”

Luke sat on his cot and watched Rey for a while. She grabbed her guide and laid down in her hammock as she started drawing something. He sighed and looked over at his storage crate bedside table. Two discs seemed almost to glow as they begged for his attention.

“Rey?” Luke didn’t look at her when he spoke.

“Yeah, Dad?”

“Come here for a minute,” Luke patted the cot, moving aside his blanket to make room for her.

Rey obediently put her guide away and joined her father. When she was seated beside him, Luke wrapped an arm around her and grabbed the top Holo.

“I’m so sorry that you don’t remember your mother,” Luke whispered.

Rey looked away, “I’m sorry I forgot.”

“You don’t need to apologize. There’s nothing to forgive.”

She sighed, “I know, but… I just wish I could picture her.”

“Maybe you can.”

Rey frowned.

Luke flicked on the Holo, the one that had been salvaged from their home on Rornian and was the only real token Luke had taken from their past life.

“This is you when you were three years old with your mother,” Luke said as Rey gaped at the picture.

“She’s so beautiful,” Rey stared in amazement at the Holo of the woman.

She looked so familiar. That hair, those eyes, that nose, the smile… This was her mother.

“Yes, she was,” Luke smiled at the Holo. He would have reached out to touch it if he didn’t know
She… she doesn’t look anything like Aletha.”

Luke looked at his daughter kindly, “I promised you that I wasn’t trying to replace her. My love for Aletha is separate from my love for your mother.”

“I know.”

For a long time they stared at the picture in silence.

“So why was it so hard for you to tell me the truth about what was going on with your mother?” Luke finally asked. “Why do this whole charade of saying you don’t think she’s dead?”

“Because part of me does think she might be alive.”

“Is it so much to ask?” Rey queried. “To know what happened?”

“I’ve told you what happened.”

“Not all of it.”

“Rey, I can’t tell you all of it. Not yet.”

“I understand that, it’s just…” Rey sighed. “It just doesn’t feel real.”

Luke closed his eyes. What could he possibly say or do to fix this for Rey?

And then it hit him.

“Rey?” Luke said carefully. “What if I could make it real for you?”

She frowned, “How?”

Luke sighed and swapped out the Felicity and Rey Holo for the other on his bedside crate.

“This is the footage of your mother’s death,” he held up the disc. “They gave it to me to show me what happened to her. They told me I had seven days to come get her. I showed up in less than one, but they had murdered her before I could get there. This Holo contains the answer to not only how your mother died, but why there was no body for me to bury.”

He placed the disc in Rey’s hand.

“I will show it to you if you want.”

Rey’s jaw dropped, “You- You what?”

“You can watch it,” Luke said. “But only if you’re truly ready. Only if you need to. The choice is yours, Rey.”

She thought about it for a long time.

“I want to watch it.”

Luke studied Rey carefully, “Are you absolutely sure you want me to show you this? It’s going to make you very upset, and honestly, I think this is a pretty bad parenting decision on my part.”

Rey gathered her strength and nodded, “Yes Daddy, I want to see it.”

Luke sighed. He wrapped an arm around Rey and pulled her into his lap for a tight hug. She was so much bigger now; sitting in his lap had been something she long ago had outgrown. But they needed that intimacy for this horrible moment.

He knew he probably shouldn’t be doing this, showing Rey her mother getting murdered. But in the same strange way that Luke knew he needed to have been electrocuted to save his father, he knew Rey needed to go through this pain to become stronger.

“Are you ready?” he whispered.

Rey swallowed and nodded, “Yes.”

Luke took a deep breath and hit play.

He wouldn’t put Rey through all of it. She didn’t need to hear Felicity beg Ben for her life, Rey just needed to see the moment it ended.

For a moment, Rey got to see the image of her mother in a way she never should have to: beaten, bloody, hair sheered, crying, bound, gagged, and fighting for her life. They watched the blaster get lifted to Felicity’s temple, and Rey flinched at the blast that set Felicity Rhiaon limply to the ground.

Rey balled her fists, fighting not to break down as the tears started to come. Luke just squeezed her tightly and kissed her cheek.

“It’s okay,” he whispered in her ear, holding her preciously.

“Is she dead?” an oddly familiar voice asked on the Holo.

The owner of the voice wasn’t visible, the shot instead focused on Felicity’s unmoving body.

“Check for yourself,” another man instructed, though Rey didn’t know his voice.

Rey’s vision was blurred with tears, so she couldn’t make out the details of the black-haired boy who approached her mother. She felt Darkness stir inside her soul as the boy kicked her mother’s limp corpse, but something reached out for her. A familiar feeling, something that felt sky blue if she had to name a colour. The sky blue enveloped her soul like her father’s arms enveloped her body, comforting and calming her as she went through the ordeal of her mother’s horrific shooting.

“Turn it off if it’s getting to be too much,” Luke urged.

Rey shook her head, “No. I… I think I can handle it.”

Luke sighed, nodded, and kissed her once more before turning his attention back to the Holo. It was now playing the part where Kylo unsuccessfully searched for a pulse.
“Nothing,” Kylo declared mutely, drawing his hands back to stare at Felicity in shock. “Felicity Rhiaon... is really dead.”

The camera stayed on Kylo as he struggled with his mass of emotions. Shock, horror, and maybe even a trace of guilt passed over his face.

Hux laughed in the background, “Well now, are you finally satisfied, Ren?”

Kylo’s face scrunched together in a hard scowl.

“No,” Kylo whispered.

Suddenly he lifted Felicity’s body as he rose to his feet.

“What are you doing?” Hux exclaimed, clearly thrown off by the sudden change of plan.

“Taking her to the place she truly belongs,” Kylo answered, striding towards the door as his aunt flopped bonelessly in his cradle hold. “The-”

The Holo shut off.

Luke frowned as he stared at Rey’s hand on the Holo’s power switch.

“I don’t need to see the rest.” Rey bit her lip and drew her hand back, “At least... not now.”

Luke let himself smile a little, “You’re very mature for your age.”

“No, I’m not. I’m twelve and like doing dumb things,” Rey let herself smirk a little.

“Well, twelve is the age of stupidity. Enjoy it while you can still relatively get away with things.”

“I have two weeks of psychological torture proving I can’t get away with as much.”

“Call it psychological torture one more time and you’ll get another week of it.”

“Love you, Daddy.”

Rey smiled, enjoying hearing the sound of her father’s laughter for the first time in a while.

“Dad? I’m sorry I’ve been such a brat.”

“I forgive you,” Luke hugged her again. “And I want you to know that no matter what stupid things you do in the future, I will always love you, and I will always forgive you... I just hope you can find it in your heart to forgive me.”

Rey closed her hand over her father’s mechanical one, “There’s nothing to forgive... Ever. I don’t care if you’re secretly Han Solo himself. Although that would be disappointing.”

Luke laughed, “I promise, I’m not Han Solo.”

Rey looked down at the Holo, and a hand ran through her hair, “Dad?”

“Yes, Sweetheart?”

“Would you be okay if I kept my hair and clothes the same?”

“I know she’s dead,” Rey assured him. She gave a forlorn look to the Holo, “I can accept that now, but I still want to keep them in honour of her memory… Plus they’re very good for desert living.”

Luke smiled, “You can keep your hair and clothing however you want, as long as it doesn’t compromise your safety. Did you also want to continue the count?”

Rey nodded.

“Alright then, but you have to promise that you are no longer going to give myself and Aletha a hard time.”

“Promise.” Rey paused, “Well… I promise to not give you a hard time about dating. Everything else is on the table. Quom didn’t train me up for nothing.”

“Maybe we should hold off on telling him that we’ve resolved our issues. You and Quom spending too much time together is a very bad combination.”

Rey winked, “Yeah, and we enjoy every moment of misery we give you and Aletha… You know, truth be told, I think the two of you are kind of cute.”

Luke laughed, “Yeah… we kind of are.”

And for the first time in months, they didn’t fall asleep in a cold, distant silence.

“Are we really going to save Teng, Dad?” Rey asked as she, Luke, and Aletha strode through Niima Outpost the next day.

“I promise, Rey.” Luke’s face was set with determination. “We won’t stop until we get him back.”

“How are we going to even find him?” Aletha asked, finding comfort in Luke’s arm wrapped firmly around her waist.

Aletha bit her lip and glanced uncertainly down. Rey smiled at her, and gave Aletha a small thumbs up. Aletha exhaled in relief. It was a load off to finally have Rey’s approval.

“Quom knows some people in the Sacred Villages,” Luke answered. “If that doesn’t turn up anything, I’ll press Plutt to see if there’s anything he can do.”

“Dad?” Rey frowned as they reached Quom’s tent. “What if Quom doesn’t want to help us?”

“Why wouldn’t he help?” Aletha asked.

“He hates Teng. Thinks he’s no good and thinks we’d be better off if Teng just went away.”
Luke sighed, “Well, that may be true, but he loves you. If making you happy means saving Teng, then Quom will do it in a heartbeat.”

Rey hesitated as Luke unhooked his arm from Aletha’s waist and ducked into the tent.

“Hey,” Aletha hugged Rey’s shoulders. “It’s going to be okay.”

Rey smiled and hugged her back, “Thank you, Aletha.”

The doctor smiled at hearing the name, “Anytime.”

They ducked into the tent together and found Luke in conversation with Quom, who was busy working on his speeder.

“Yes, Luke, I have contacts in all the Sacred Villages. What’s this all about? OW!” Quom stubbed his toe on his toolbox, which was sitting right at his feet. “Hey! I told you not to move the toolbox!”

Luke frowned, “I didn’t touch it.”

“Not you,” Quom waved off.

Aletha and Luke exchanged a look. It wasn’t entirely uncommon for Quom to talk to himself… or complete nonsense.

“Please, Quom, can you call up your contacts?” Rey begged. “This is really important!”

“Okay, fine, MG. Anything for you. What am I telling th- OW!” Quom gave a low growl and shoved the toolbox aside. He bent down and yelled under the speeder, “What did I just say about the toolbox?”

To everyone’s surprise, Teng Malar rolled out on the scooter from underneath the speeder.

“Hey, there’s a lot of carbon scoring under here,” Teng objected. “I need the toolbox within arm’s reach so I can-”

“TENG!”

Suddenly Teng was tackled to the ground with a hug from Rey.

“You’re okay!” Rey exclaimed, tearing up a little.

“I’m alright, Rey,” Teng chuckled, reluctantly hugging her back, desperately trying to ignore the amused gazes of the adults.

It was her father’s chuckle that made Rey realize her inappropriate position.

“Sorry,” she blushed, pulling away. Teng helped her stand up, and Rey asked, “What are you doing here?”

Teng awkwardly glanced over at Quom, “Uh… Turns out Quom was the one who bought me from Meru.”

All eyes turned on Quom, and the Vrogem looked away in embarrassment.

“That’s why you’ve been working so hard these past few weeks,” Luke realized. “Not to avoid us… to buy him.”
Quom shrugged, “I didn’t want MG to go running off and having an adventure trying to find him. Besides, someone’s gotta keep an eye on this rapscallion before he wrecks serious havoc. It’s my… civic duty.”

Rey ran over to Quom and threw her arms around him in a tight hug. Quom chuckled and returned the embrace.

Over her shoulder, Quom shared a look with Luke. There was no need to ask why Quom hadn’t asked Luke to pay for Teng himself. Quom would never dare voice the answer, and Luke didn’t need to hear it spoken.

“Thank you so much,” Rey whispered to Quom.

“Anything for you, Miracle Girl,” Quom grinned, holding her tight. He caught Teng’s eyes as he held Rey, “It was my pleasure.”

Teng’s face went a little red.

Aletha laughed happily at the sight and wrapped her arms around Luke’s waist. He instantly returned the gesture, unabashedly pulling her in close in the open gaze of Rey.

“I guess that means you three have figured things out?” Quom asked.

“I told them the truth,” Rey admitted. “So, what’s going to happen to Teng now?”

“He’ll stay with me,” Quom answered. “I’ve got the extra cot. We can get a sleeping bag for the nights you want to stay with us… Teng of course gets the sleeping bag when you’re around.”

Teng frowned, “Why are you glaring at me? Of course she would get it.”

“She better get it,” Quom warned. “Otherwise you sleep with one eye open.”

“Doctor Kymeri, can I come live with you instead? I’m scared he’s going to kill me in my sleep.”

“Sorry, Teng, but he did buy you. But Quom, no killing Teng.”

“But Doc-”

“No buts,” Aletha fixed him with a stern look.

“Oh man,” Quom grumbled. “You got lucky, kid.”

Teng looked anxiously between Quom and Aletha, “Are they always like this?”

“The four of us in general as a matter of fact,” Rey replied. She grinned at him, “Welcome to the family.”

Teng gave a less than enthusiastic smile.

“Yay,” he said weakly, lamely pumping his fist.

Luke laughed at the group in front of him. Sure, they were no Han Solo or Leia Organa, but he was truly content with the strange little family he made on Jakku. He missed his legal family dearly and looked forward to the day that he got to see them again, but until that day came he had this family.

And this family was more than enough. If the past wanted to stay hidden for now, so be it.
What more could he ask for?

Lando Calrissian woke up, upside down. More specifically, he woke up lying upside over the back of the couch in his living room. His body ached from the uncomfortable position, his head pounding from the excess of alcohol the previous night. But as his blurry vision cleared up, Lando found that there were much worse positions he could have woken up in.

Han Solo was lying facedown on the coffee table.

“Okay,” Han groaned as the men pushed themselves off the furniture. “We are definitely too old to be doing this sort of thing anymore.”

“Remember the days when we could drink twice the amount of alcohol as we did last night and wake up without even a hangover?” Lando checked to make sure his mourner's armband - a black piece of fabric with a blue morning glory embroidered on it, tied around his upper right arm - was still on him. He then pulled a face as he put a hand on his back. “I don’t think spines are meant to be bent this way.”

“Fliss was right. She always used to say that I didn’t go on benders often, but when I did I went hard. Then again she once literally ended up in the hospital with a head injury from her bender.”

“Alyla used to just say she didn’t mind the occasional bender as long as she was the only woman I was waking up next to,” Lando smiled. “Then again, usually she was the one to wake up on the coffee table. That girl could really put them back. I think the day I first saw how well she could drink was the day I decided that this girl was special and I needed to hold onto her… Well, that and about three dozen other reasons.”

“Oh great,” Han groaned. “I get an early morning dose of guilt over being a huge screw up of a father and having a kid who runs around killing family and friends.”

“Let’s get off the topic before we both decide we need another drink,” Lando headed towards the kitchen. He paused briefly to smile at the vase of freshly cut blue morning glories that always sat on his dining table. “Cup of caf?”

“Make it two,” Han settled down on the couch.

“Oh, I forgot to ask yesterday. How’s Leia doing?”

“Recovery’s going very well. She’ll be back to yelling at me in no time.”

“And they still think Ben did it?”

“Well he murdered your girlfriend and his five-year-old cousin. It’s not out of the realm of possibility.”

Lando was silent.

Han sighed, “I’m sorry. I shouldn’t have-”

“It’s okay,” Lando said as he carried a tray with cups and a pot of caf to the coffee table. He set the tray down and slumped down on the couch, a little less brightness in his eyes, “It’s the truth. Ben killed Alyla and Rey. There’s nothing that can change that.”
“I’m sorry.”

“It’s not your fault.”

“Yeah, it is.” Han rubbed his temples, “God, this headache is killing me. How much did we drink?”

“A lot,” Lando answered. “I swear, I’m going to outlaw gambling here on Cloud City if I’m put through another night like last night.”

“I just can’t believe that Ducain guy actually thought I could get drunk enough to lose the Millennium Falcon in a hand of Sabacc.”

“Well, that’s how I lost it to you.”

“Yeah, but I’m smarter than you.”

Lando raised an eyebrow.

“At Sabacc at least,” Han chugged his caf.

“I just feel bad for poor Chewbacca,” Lando took a drink. “He got pretty knocked back for a Wookiee.”

“I’m just thankful he’s down in the hanger guarding the Falcon. I don’t trust that Ducain.” Finishing his cup of caf, Han scrunched his nose, “Hey do you mind if I borrow some clothes? These are getting pretty ripe.”

“Now, Han, what kind of man just helps himself to his friend’s clothing?”

Han raised an eyebrow in perfect imitation of Lando, “I have at least five eyewitness statements testifying that you wore my clothing immediately after freezing me in carbonite.”

“Bedroom’s three doors down on the right,” Lando stuck a thumb toward the hallway.

Han got up and started to walk around the couch. He had a teasing look on his face, and opened his mouth to speak, but whatever wiry joke he wanted to utter was cut off when he suddenly tripped over a giant, furry mass on the floor.

“Chewie!” Han exclaimed.

“Rowr,” Chewie moaned weakly, his hangover affecting him as badly as his friends.

“Hey Chewie,” Lando grinned as Han helped the Wookiee to his feet.

“Oh my god,” Han gasped. “Chewie what are you doing here?”

Ra grr ro row.

“Yeah, I figured as much, I mean why are you here?”

“Han, ease off him,” Lando chuckled. “Wookiee hangovers must be killer.”

“Lando!” Han snapped. “If Chewie is here, who is watching the Millennium Falcon?”

There was a silent beat as the horror dawned on them, and then all three made a mad dash to the door. They looked ridiculous and undignified as they bolted through the halls of Cloud City, but none of them cared. All that mattered was that their fear hadn’t come true.

But when they reached the now empty hanger that had contained the Millennium Falcon the previous night, and learned twenty minutes later from Lobot that Ducain and his crew had disappeared from the city, it appeared that it was true.

“Oh my god,” Han stared at the empty hanger with wide eyed horror, “I lost the Millennium Falcon.”

The hanger was utterly silent.

And then Lando burst into laughter.

“Oh Han,” he slung an arm over Han’s shoulders. “I am so being there when you tell Leia.”

Chapter End Notes

Coming Up Next Chapter…

One Man’s Trash

Luke doesn’t know what to do when the Millennium Falcon shows up on Jakku, and Rey decides to build a speeder.
One Man's Trash

Chapter Summary

Niima Outpost gets a new form of entertainment, Rey gets a vision, and Luke has a panic attack.

Chapter Notes

Special thank you to miranda88 who suggested I make Finn’s colour be aquamarine and Teng’s be maroon. I’m actually going to switch them so Teng is aquamarine to go with the blue/green motif I’m looking to establish, and Finn is maroon because the other members of the First Order are reds (Hux is blood orange and Phasma is scarlet.) Enjoy your reward of naming Teng’s parents. Ronhar and Saché Malar are wonderful names.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

The Long Way Home

Chapter Thirty-Seven

One Man’s Trash

AGE THIRTEEN

There isn’t much to Niima besides the Blobfish’s concession stand, particularly if you don’t have credits. There’s the bazaar where you can buy guns and black-market stuff, and a couple of launch bays that pass for a spaceport. But nothing anyone leading a normal life would want.

- Rey’s Survival Guide

It was a truth that all residents of Niima Outpost had to admit at some point or another: Niima Outpost was a boring place. Everyone had the same day: wake up, scavenger, barter with Plutt, eat, sleep, repeat. Nothing exciting ever happened on Jakku, and news of the world tended to show up several years late. The story of the Burning of Rornian had only just reached Niima Outpost, and the conclusion of the story with the reported “fate” of Luke Skywalker’s wife and daughter were still years away. In fact, as far as Niima Outpost was concerned, Luke Skywalker’s wife and child were still on the run.

So when Unkar Plutt purchased a new retinue of weaponry, his thugs decided to make their own entertainment.
The crowd winced as the staff cracked against Vance Thurinos’s skull, and Roke sent the alien to the ground cold.

“Winner – Roke,” Kerlos Slarga announced, holding up Roke’s arm.

There was a polite round of clapping as Vance was dragged out of the fighting circle. Aletha was waiting at the side of the new wooden structure with her medical bag and a cot at the ready.

“That was a nasty takedown,” Rey said as she assisted Aletha in treating Vance.

“Well, this whole fighting ring thing is a nasty business,” Aletha had Rey hold Vance’s head steady as she rolled the bandages around it. “I’ve heard much worse happens in Zygerria, and not just in the pits themselves.”

“Look at Roke,” Rey said in disgust as the thug fought a new contender.

Kael Merquise wasn’t one of Plutt’s thugs, but rather a fellow scavenger. While the thugs fought each other for bragging rights and to show off their talents to the residents (aka remind them what happens when you mess with Plutt,) the rest of Niima Outpost was allowed to fight the thugs for reward. Everyone who wanted to watch the matches had to pay half a portion, and if a regular person beat a thug, they would win the daily pay of portions. If more than one resident won against a thug, the winnings would be split… however such an occurrence had yet to happen. Residents could also fight each other and the winner would get a prize of five portions per victory.

“I would love to just take that staff from him,” Rey glared at Roke as he swung the quarterstaff across Kael’s shins.

Aletha grinned, “I would pay good money to see that. Someone needs to put Roke in his place.”

“You have already,” Rey looked at his steelpecker scarred arms. “And anyway, you don’t pay to watch these. They pay you to be on standby.”

“As much as I hate these wretched things, I do admit they keep me in business. Thanks for helping me out today.”

“No problem. Anytime we can get Quom to get off his lazy butt and go scavenge is a good day.”

“I resent that statement!”

Rey and Aletha looked up to see Luke and Quom returning from their bartering with Plutt.

“You two back already?” Aletha asked as Luke hugged Rey. “Mustn’t been a very big haul.”

“I think you underestimate my abilities,” he greeted her with a kiss. “And Quom, Rey’s right, you are getting lazy. It was bad enough when I first got here, once we started Rey on scavenging you got worse, and now that you have Teng working for us you’ve been terrible.”

“Why go out personally when I’ve got a guy instead with a keen sense of jackpot loads, a girl with the agility of a vulptex, and a boy to do all the fixing and polishing? Personally, I think I excel in the management field.”

“Where is Teng?” Rey asked as one of the thug carried off Vance under Aletha’s watchful eye.

“Off checking out the new ship merchants,” Quom replied. “I think the boy has quite the silver tongue.”
Rey raised an eyebrow.

“Don’t test that theory.”

She rolled her eyes, “Come on, Uncle Quom! Just because he’s a boy my age doesn’t mean I’m going to make out with him. I have more standards than that.”

They would be making out within two years.

“What have you girls been up to today?” Luke asked. His arm was wrapped around Aletha’s waist.

“Fighting ring all day?”

“Actually we went out hunting this morning,” Aletha smiled.

“Shot some steelpeckers that were bothering Karica’s bloggins,” Aletha reported.

“Just got back?” Quom asked.

Karica was the first of the Sacred Villages, about an hour’s drive from Niima Outpost.

“Few hours ago,” Aletha shrugged. “Bobbajo gave me a good price for the steelpeckers, and then we came here.”

Bloggins are avians with eyestalks and long tails. Their eyestalks let them see predators coming from far away, but this doesn’t do much good because they might be the dumbest creatures in the galaxy. Their reaction to trouble is to panic, run around in circles squawking, and then they try to fly (which they aren’t very good at).

The Sacred Villagers raise bloggins for meat, feathers, and oil. And if you’re in Niima, Bobbajo the Crittermonger will have some trussed for sale on his back.

- Rey’s Survival Guide

“Is he still telling that ridiculous story that his creatures are responsible for the destruction of the first Death Star?” Luke scowled.

Luke crossed his arms, “It’s the ones that do that bother me.”

“Don’t worry, Dad,” Rey laughed. “We know it was Skywalker who destroyed the Death Star. No needed to get weirdly offended… Well, Skywalker and Han Solo.”

He groaned, “Why do you always make Luke stories about Han?”

“Because Han Solo is so much cooler than Luke Skywalker.”

A chuckle at his side made Luke glare at Quom, “Stop enjoying this.”
“Never.”

“If it makes you feel better,” Rey added, “Aletha’s cooler than both of them.”

“Oh, thanks Sunshine,” Aletha hugged Rey. “But I’m not cooler than Han Solo or Luke Skywalker.”

“Of course you are,” Rey said. “They may have done some awesome things, but you taught me to shoot your sniper rifle this morning. Makes you so much cooler than some story.”

“The girl needs to defend herself, Luke,” Aletha stood by her decision.

“I’m sorry, but you gave me hell after teaching my own daughter own to drive, and then you turn around and teach someone who is not technically your own child how to fire a weapon?”

“That’s precisely why I taught her. If you deem her old enough to control a large machine that can cause massive destruction, surely she can handle a small, contained one.”

“You really can get petty, can’t you?”

“It’s been five years since the Roke incident, and you’re figuring it out now?”

Rey laughed and looked back at the fighting ring. Haken Ruo was fighting Thalo Tame.

“Hey, where did Roke go?” she asked.

“GUYS! GUYS!”

Teng Malar’s voice shouted across the market seconds before he emerged racing through the crowd.

“Guys! Guys!” Teng skidded to a stop, his eyes lit up in more excitement than they had ever seen. He grabbed Quom’s arm and started to try and pull him forward, “Come on, you’ve gotta see this!”

“Whoa, steady boy,” Quom pulled his arm out of Teng’s grasp. “Settle down, son.”

“Yeah, Teng, what’s going on?” Rey asked with a frown.

“Guys, this ship!” Teng panted. “You gotta see the state of this ship!”

“I don’t know what it’s called, but it’s new in the yard. Come on, you gotta see it. Quick before someone else approaches the Captain with an offer of work.”

“You’ve made a contact with the Captain?” Quom was surprised. Usually Teng didn’t take such initiative without direct orders from Quom.

“Well… no,” Teng admitted. “But come on, this ship needs major work. It looks like absolute garbage. We could really rake it in on this.”

Luke and Quom exchanged a look.

“Oh, come on,” Quom decided. “Let’s give it a shot.”
Without a word, Teng grabbed Rey’s hand, and the two teens took off with a pair of grinning and runs. The adults traded amused grins.

“So, are we going to do a pool on this?” Aletha asked as the group casually strolled towards Niima Outpost’s ‘landing port.’ “Because at this rate, there’s no way those two aren’t hooking up in a few years.”

“I say one,” Aletha said.

“I say next week,” Quom groaned.

Romance was the furthest thing from Rey’s mind as she raced through Niima Outpost holding Teng Malar’s hand. She laughed with Teng, feeling perfectly comfortable and at ease with him as they pushed through the town.

Rey didn’t much like people grabbing her hand without permission – it was something she remembered Jarex doing a lot – and Teng hadn’t liked it either. He said it reminded him of the way his mother would always grab his hand and pull him behind her protectively when dealing with the pirates.

It was an incident while scavenging that had started them with the hand holding. Teng had been on a shaky ledge when it started to break. Terrified of another X-Wing incident, Rey grabbed Teng’s hand and yanked him to safety. They had an awkward moment in which they agreed due to personal comfort levels not to do such a thing again. A few weeks, Teng instinctively grabbed Rey’s hand and yanked her behind a rock ledge when they were divebombed by a steelpecker. After that, they had an unspoken agreement that they trusted each other enough to grab each other’s hands without asking prior consent.

She didn’t know it at the time, but as silly as it was, Rey would forever associate the juvenile act of hand holding as something very intimate… and her love for Teng.

“Just wait until you see this thing, Rey,” Teng said. “It’s just indescribably awful. Like… like the Quom’s speeder of spaceships.”

“Oh, now you’re building it up too much,” she grinned.

Teng pulled her to a stop, “Trust me, I’m not.”

He pointed behind Rey, and when she turned, her jaw dropped.

“What a piece of garbage!” Rey exclaimed as she set eyes on the Corellian freighter.

She couldn’t believe the ship before her. It was atrocious. It was ugly. It was poorly put together. It was modified to hell and back. It was trash. It was-

…It was familiar.

No, that couldn’t be possible. If she had seen a ship like this before, she would remember it.

But she did remember it.
No, she was being silly. She didn’t know this ship. How could she? And even if she did know a ship remotely like this, what were the actual odds that it would have ended up with her on Jakku?

Unless it belonged to someone looking for her.

“Have you seen the crew?” Rey asked.

“Uh, no,” Teng frowned. He thought she would have had a bigger reaction to the ship than staring blankly at it.

“Can we get closer to it?”

He stared at her oddly, “I guess.”

She released Teng’s hand and started walking towards it. Rey didn’t blink or take in her surroundings as she moved towards the ship, drawn like a mohar to a flame.

Meanwhile, Luke was busy arguing with Aletha as they trailed with Quom behind the teenagers, completely obvious to what was going on.

“I’m not going to apologize for teaching Rey to shoot,” Aletha exclaimed.

“You had no right to do that without my permission,” Luke snapped. He was walking in front of Aletha, facing backwards as they fought. Uncle Owen always told him to look a person in the eye if you were going to argue with them. A little thing like motility wasn’t going to stop Luke from being a gentleman. “She’s my daughter, Aletha. I get to make those decisions.”

“Oh, would you stop flip flopping with your opinion? I know I’m not her mother, but it feels like every day you keep redefining my role with her. How can you give me full permission to talk to her about things like the mechanics of sexual intercourse and the horrors of war, and have her assist in surgeries, and have Quom get her to scavenge ships and fix dangerous ships, and do all of that without running it by you, but then turn around and get mad at me for teaching her to protect herself?”

“She’s still too young to need to learn fighting and weaponry.”

“Rey is thirteen years old, Luke. She’s not a little girl. Jakku isn’t like civilized planets, no one’s going to be giving her a break anymore. Most people don’t even know about the Jarex thing these days. People die and leave here all the time. It’s not the same group of people that were here eight years ago. Pretty soon she’s going to have to defend herself, and I’m going to make sure she can do so. Quom back me up on this.”

“Hell no. I’m not getting in the middle of this.”

“Fine,” Luke said. “Since it’s apparently so confusing, let me state it for the record: I don’t want anyone but me teaching her how to use a weapon without my permission. Understood?”

“Fine,” Aletha narrowed her eyes. “But that doesn’t solve the issue.”

“There is no issue.”

“Oh, there’s the ship,” Quom said casually. He crossed his arms, “Wow, Teng was right. That is trash.”
Luke and Aletha just stared at each other.

“I know you’re hiding from the First Order, Luke. We both know that you can’t do it forever.”

“I know it’s not going to be forever, but it’s not going to be today.”

“You can’t control that. What if it does happen today? What if your past comes crashing back into your life here and now? Wow that ship is garbage.”

Luke rolled his eyes, “My past isn’t going to come crashing back into my life today.”

He turned around and his jaw dropped.

Sitting in front of him was the freaking Millennium Falcon itself.

Luke’s eyes were wide and his face pale. He was frozen in place, utterly petrified by shock and terror. Even if his brain was barely unable to process the sight before him, he was able to speak. That is, he was able to mutter something under his breath in Huttese that is too vulgar to write down.

The Millennium Falcon was here. Holy crap. What was the Millennium Falcon doing on Jakku? How did it get here? Did Han and Chewie bring it here? Had his secret somehow gotten out? Maybe Jarex blabbed and Han found out, and he came racing here to get Rey and Luke and beat the hell out of his idiot renegade brother-in-law for breaking Leia’s heart.

He couldn’t handle it; he couldn’t face Han. Not here and now. Oh, no, no, no, no Luke was screwed. Rey’s survival couldn’t be public knowledge, not yet. She was still so young. But Han would never keep that sort of secret from Leia, and Luke could never ask such a thing.

When his mind finally caught up to the situation, his instincts kicked in. He reached out into the Force and searched for that familiar yellow-gold Signature Han Solo carried. Luke looked for any familiar Signature. Chewbacca’s golden-brown. Leia’s navy blue. Lando’s black.

Luke sensed no one familiar. All he felt were his sky blue, Rey’s lilac, Teng’s aquamarine, Aletha’s crisp white, Quom’s rusty grey, and a multitude of other unfamiliar colours. But that didn’t mean his family wasn’t around. Maybe Leia was here and blocking their colours from Luke. Maybe she sensed the familiar lilac and figured out-

Rey!

Luke’s eyes set on his daughter walking towards the Falcon, and he shot into action.

“Rey!” he yelled, racing forward.

Luke reached her in seconds, before anyone could realize what was going on. He grabbed Rey’s arm, jolting her out of the mini trance upon her, and yanked her back away from the Falcon.

“Rey, we have to go *now! Luke’s voice was utterly panicked.

“Dad?” she blinked. “What’s-”

“No time to explain. We have to leave now.”

“Leave where? The walker?”

“Maybe the walker? Maybe Jakku altogether. I’ll figure it out later. We just have to go.”
“Luke, what is going on?” Aletha exclaimed as she, Quom, and Teng raced up to them.

Quom glared at Teng, “What’d you do?”

“Nothing,” Teng was as confused as the rest.

“Dad, why are we leaving?” Rey pulled her arm out of his grasp. “Is it because of the ship?”

“Luke?” Quom grabbed his arm and pulled him in close. He whispered in his ear, “Seriously, what’s with all the fuss? This a you know what thing?”

Luke took a deep breath and muttered back, “Quom, that’s the Millennium Falcon.”

Quom burst out laughing.

Luke shoved him away, “You’re not helping!”

“I’m not trying to help. Oh boy, this’ll be entertaining!”

“What will be entertaining?” Aletha looked between them. “Luke, seriously, what is going on?”

He sighed and gazed at Aletha. He wanted to confess everything to her, make her understand the severity of the situation. Make her understand why he had to take Rey and leave. Ask her to come with them so he didn’t have to leave a piece of his heart with her.

But he couldn’t do it.

“I’m sorry.” Luke looked at Rey, “Come on, we have to go. I’ll… explain everything. I promise.”

Tears and disbelief were in Aletha’s eyes, “But Luke-”

“I love you,” he whispered. Luke pulled her in for one last kiss. “We’ll see each other again.”

Quom placed a hand on Aletha’s shoulder to hold her back. He would have the burden to explain things to her once Luke was gone.

Teng watched helplessly as Rey was pulled away from him. Her teary and confused eyes didn’t leave his own. She put all her energy into locking the image of those vibrant green orbs in her mind one last time. Rey wouldn’t let herself forget him; not like her mother.

Luke was collecting this thoughts, trying to make a game plan of what to do next and how to explain things to Rey when he literally smacked into Unkar Plutt.

Luke blinked, “Your ship?”

“Dad, what’s going on?” Rey asked.

“Give me a minute. What do you mean your ship? Do you mean-”

“That hunk of junk that’s really not worth our time?” Roke finished. His quarterstaff was casually hanging from his shoulder.
“Oh, it’s worth our time,” Plutt chuckled. “I’m sure it’s very valuable to some people.”

Luke narrowed his eyes.

“So that thing is your ship?” Rey said. “Why is Dad freaking out about it?”

“No idea,” Plutt answered.

Dirk scowled, “But Boss, isn’t it because it’s-”

Roke punched him in the stomach.

“Hey, don’t you touch him!” Rey launched herself forward, only to be suddenly pulled back by Teng.

“Easy there,” Teng restrained her. “That’s a battle you’re not going to win.”

“I bet I could,” Rey growled.

Roke chuckled, “Anytime you want to fight, Princess, I’m up for it. I don’t give a damn who your dad is.”

“Luke,” Aletha called as she and Quom caught up to them. “What is going on?”

“Now there’s another woman I want to face off with.” Roke grinned and stroked his quarterstaff. Vance Thurinos’s blood still glistened at the end of it. “What do you say, Kymeri? Let’s go a round in the ring.”

Aletha narrowed her eyes, “I’ve survived on Jakku by not being stupid. Now, seriously, what’s going on?”

Luke was silent as all eyes fell on him.

It seemed he had only one choice.

“I…” He couldn’t believe what he was about to say, “I used to work on that ship.”

Aletha and the kids looked at each other in surprised, as Quom and the goons peered at Luke in interest at his chosen words. Technically it was true… from a certain point of view.

He swore he heard Obi-Wan Kenobi laughing at him.

“You worked on that ship,” Rey repeated.

“Apparently not very well,” Teng muttered.

She elbowed him.

“Ow!”

“Your friend? Nah, word is that he’s been looking for this for almost a year now. See, I stole it from the Irving Boys, who stole it from Ducain, who stole it from your friend, H-”

“I get it. So, he’s not here then?”

“Your past is safe for a while longer yet, but you can guarantee he’ll be looking for it.”

“If he arrives, I’ll deal with it appropriately.”

“Appropriately?” Plutt laughed. “Seemed like you thought the best way to deal with it was to frantically run off, bumbling nonsensical explanations.”

“So this friend is really an enemy?” Aletha asked.

He turned and looked guilty at her, “No, not at all. I just… I feared what it meant if he found me. Life has been so peaceful on Jakku, and we’ve finally settled into some weird sort of normality. I’m worried that something’s going to happen that will change everything.”

“Who’s this friend, Dad?” Rey asked.

Luke sighed, “That’s a story for another day, but he was my best friend during the war… Actually, he’s the best friend I’ve ever had.”

Quom loudly cleared his throat.

“Really?” Quom shot. “You’re just going to stand there and say he’s your best friend? Fine. Screw you, Aletha’s my best friend now.”

Luke groaned. Why did he feel like five years from now Han and Quom would have a best friend off? He had to stop hanging around such insane people.

“So to be clear, nobody who owned this ship or was associated with this ship during the time I spent on it, is currently on Jakku?” Luke asked Plutt.

“Correct,” Plutt nodded.

Luke glanced back at the ship. Deep down, part of him yearned to race onto it and relish in the memories of the ship that had once been his home. But he knew for the sake of Rey he would have to stay away.

“Alright then,” Luke said. “If you promise not to drag me into this mess, I’ll stay away from your ship.”

Plutt and Roke exchanged a look.

“That’s not exactly going to work.”

“What do you mean?”

“I’ve got a bit of a… proposition for you, Erso.”

“The answer is no,” Luke replied immediately. He grabbed the arms of Rey and Aletha, “Come on, let’s go.”

“Hear me out, Luke,” Plutt exclaimed. “I just want you to check over the ship. Make sure there’s nothing or no one hiding in any secret compartments that I might overlook. You must know the ship inside out.”

“It’s not happening. Come on, everyone.”

“I’ll pay you!” Plutt offered.

“Not happening,” Luke just marched forward, guiding Rey and Aletha as Quom and Teng followed behind.

“Three portions a day!”

“For a year!”

Rey hesitated, but Quom nudged her forward.

“For each of the five of you.”

The group stopped in their tracks.

“Excuse me?” Aletha turned back slowly.

“All five of you get three portions a day for a year,” Plutt promised. “All I want is one day of Erso checking out the ship.”

Luke felt the eyes of the others on them. He knew none of them would ask, but the offer was tempting to them. While Luke and Rey ate three portions a day on a regular basis, Aletha, Quom, and Teng did not. Sure, they certainly ate a lot better than they had before Luke’s influence. Quom’s fur was thicker and shinier, Aletha’s ribs no longer stuck out, and in the past year, Teng had gained five inches of height, thirty pounds, and a good set of muscle. But they still went to bed hungry. A year of food could mean the world to them.

Could he really say no?

“Be here bright and early tomorrow morning,” Plutt said. “We’ll be waiting.”

“Then if you’ll excuse us, we have work to do,” Luke led the group away.

“Thank you, Luke,” Aletha said quietly as Rey raced forward with Teng to discuss what all had occurred. “You didn’t have to do that.”

“For you, of course I did,” Luke wrapped his arms around her waist and kissed her forehead.

She glanced back at Quom who was giving them a respectable distance, “Does Quom know something I don’t?”
“I may have been forced into a situation several years ago where I had to explain part of my past to him because he saw something he shouldn’t have. He actually thought I should tell you too, but I told him no, out of fear of your safety.”

“The less I know, the better?”

“Exactly.” He watched her, “Does that bother you?”

“A little,” she confessed, “but I know it’s not malicious and it really doesn’t matter. I don’t care who or what you were before Jakku. All I know is that I love the man called Luke Erso, not whatever you were before.”

“And I love the woman called Doctor Aletha Kymeri. Not Medic Aletha Anthea.”

She smiled at him coyly, “You know, if you have to be in town bright and early tomorrow, there’s really no point in you going to the walker tonight.”

Luke raised an eyebrow, “I thought we ran out of protection two weeks ago. Did Jedek Haru’s latest restock include more.”

“Hey Quom?” Luke called.

“Yeah?” he answered.

“Can you take Rey tonight?”

Quom grinned, “Attaboy.”

Luke rolled his eyes.

Rey shuddered, not needing an explanation, “I miss the days of euphemisms.”

Teng laughed, taking a bit of joy in Rey’s reddening face, “Someone’s getting lucky tonight.”

“Shut up!” she elbowed him.

Teng just laughed.

Plutt watched with narrowed eyes as the group left.

“You know Skywalker’s not going to tell you anything about the ship,” Roke said.

“And that’s why we’ll be watching him very closely,” Plutt replied. “He’s bound to say or do something that we can exploit.”

“Oh, so if he’s quick to bypass something—”

“That’s where something’s hidden.”

“I don’t know. Skywalker seems a little too smart for that. How do we know he’s not just going to steal the ship from us?”

“Which is why we’re not telling him that we found the Imperial tracking device they got bugged with back on the Death Star. If he hasn’t found it in twenty-eight years, he’s not going to find it
Dirk frowned but stayed silent. His gut was telling him this wasn’t a nice thing to do, but he vaguely understood the importance of the Millennium Falcon to Rey. She was a nice girl and didn’t deserve to have the First Order take her like her Mom. So if keeping his mouth shut was going to keep her safe, then his mouth would stay shut.

…Plus he really didn’t want to get punched by Roke again.

“Oh God, Luke, yes, just a little more,” Aletha urged as he slammed between her legs. “Oh, Baby, I’m almost there.”

Luke grunted as he buried his face in her ample breasts. Aletha wasn’t a dirty talker like Felicity, rather giving herself over to loud moans, groans, and sighs of ecstasy as he made love to her. But Aletha would tell him when she was getting close to orgasm, and that was something he excelled at.

Making love to Aletha Kymeri was one of the most pleasurable things Luke Skywalker experienced in his life. While he would occasionally muse over the difference in techniques between Aletha and Felicity, he dare not ever compare the pleasures. It really didn’t matter to him which of the two he found more enjoyable, they were too different to make a judgement, and Felicity did have several years practice advantage over Aletha… though Aletha’s medical degree did aid her in being able to find and hit all the sweet spots more efficiently than Felicity. Then again, Felicity had no shame over being quite the tease.

It was much easier if Luke just never made a final call on the issue. Besides, there was no way making said call would end in anything but hurting one of the women he loved.

Instead he just enjoyed the partner he was with at that point in time. He loved the way Aletha lost herself to passion, digging her nails into his shoulders, scratching his back, slamming her hips against his, and biting at his neck. She really was a nexu in heat.

It was probably his Jedi training alone that gave Luke the patience to hold off until his partners had reached their pleasure. But when Aletha reached her peak that hot summer night, Luke was relieved to release himself inside of her.

“I swear that gets better every time,” Aletha panted as Luke withdrew from her and dealt with the condom.

“That’s because it does,” Luke settled back into the bed – their usual method of pushing Aletha’s cot and the medical cot together – with her. He held her and kissed her as they basked in the afterglow.

“You know, I’m really glad that I found you here. I don’t know if I could have made it these past eight years without you.”

“Definitely would have killed Quom if I hadn’t been here.”

“And Roke and Plutt and Jarex and a good number of people who wanted to mess with my daughter.”

“So, speaking of Quom, I’ve gotta ask, why does he get to know about your past, and I don’t?”

Luke sighed, “Aletha, the only reason he knows is that he ended up in the wrong time and place. If I had my way, he wouldn’t know.”
“But he does, so why don’t I get that honour? And don’t give me that whole it’s for your own protection. I’m being actively hunted by the First Order myself.”

“I… I just don’t want to lose you.” Luke stroked her arm as he let himself get lost in old memories, “My mother died minutes after I was born, and my father was indirectly responsible for it. My Aunt and Uncle raised me, and were violently murdered when I was nineteen. My childhood best friend was shot down in battle by my father. The first partner I ever loved was killed before I could tell her how I felt. My father turned out to not only be alive, but an Imperial. He saved my life, but gave his in the process. Both my mentors died before I was ready to lose them. My wife was violently murdered by someone I love. Everything I worked for, for twenty years was taken from me. And the moment I heard that my little girl had died was the worst moment of my life. I couldn’t cope with it all, and that’s how I ended up here. If I lost you-”

“You won’t,” Aletha promised. “I’m not going anywhere, I promise.”

“What about the day the First Order finds one of us? What happens then? Do we stay and fight together, or does one of us bow out to protect the other?”

“…I don’t know. Truthfully, I’m not much for plans. Life has never given me the pleasure of letting me fulfill them. But I do know this, no matter what happens, I will always love you. Even if you turn out to be Han Solo himself… except for the fact he’s married. I don’t mess around with married men unless a late wife is involved.”

“Trust me, you’re not my mistress. I would rather die than have an affair.”

“Good, because if I do find out that I’ve been your mistress, I may have to kill you.” Aletha frowned, “Actually scratch that. If your wife is alive, I’m getting the hell as far away from you as possible. That woman terrifies me.”

“Don’t worry, she would kill me on your behalf… Very slowly and painfully too.” He kissed her forehead and got out of bed, “I’m going to go get some water. You want some?”

“Not to drink, but I could use a wipe down,” Aletha watched him dress. “I am absolutely drenched in sweat, and a lot of it is not even my own.”

“I like to get in a good workout every now and then,” Luke grinned and kissed her. “I’ll be right back.”

Luke grabbed a pair of canteens and headed for the well. It was the pitch black of night, and no one in Niima Outpost was outside. They were all either sound asleep or off scavenging.

He was in a pretty good mood as he filled the canteens at the town well. Luke glanced at the Millennium Falcon in the distant. He shook his head. He couldn’t believe it; what were the actual odds that the Millennium Falcon showed up on Jakku of all places? How did Han even lose it? A part of him worried that he might have lost it because Han had been killed, but Luke dismissed the idea. He would have sensed it if Han died. Once upon a time he might have believed otherwise because of what happened to Felicity and Rey, but their deaths had been explained by Rey not actually dying, and Felicity’s ysalamir serum.

He did wonder why the serum needed two parts though.

Luke shook the thought away. He was no chemist.

He splashed some water on his face, and rubbed it on his sweaty back. He looked down at his reflection in the water. Dirty, hairy, and ragged; if Han had been on the ship, would he have even recognized Luke?

He wondered what Han, Leia, Chewie, and Lando looked like now. Luke knew what Artoo and Threepio looked like; no one ever dared changing their plating. He let his mind drift to his other friends: Diego, Wedge, Kalonia. What did Poe look like? All grown up now. Poe was now older than Luke was at the Battle of Endor. Now there was a scary thought.

What did Ben look like?

Luke quickly pushed it away. He didn’t care what Kylo Ren looked like; the boy he loved had died along with Alyla, Reine, and Felicity. Along with the man they once called Luke Skywalker.

The past was gone, and so was that life. No point in worrying about it anymore.

He sensed someone moving not far from him. Luke looked up and was surprised to see the figure creeping onto the Millennium Falcon. It was Rey.

Luke hesitated; his gut told him to go after her, but his heart knew better. The Force was calling Rey to the ship of her past, and he understood her need to go explore. She was a teenaged Skywalker, and that was not a thing easily contained.

He smiled as his daughter climbed the loading ramp and disappeared into the ship. She would find safety in the walls of a ship she once called a second home. It was in that ship she had taken her first steps, and perhaps it was in that ship she took her first steps into the mystery that was her past.

Luke capped the canteens, and returned to Aletha’s bed.

Rey stared at the ship in wonder. Neither Quom nor Teng had noticed her sneak out, both surrendered to slumber and making the exact same high-pitched snore. She knew she shouldn’t be out alone, and certainly not breaking onto one of Unkar Plutt’s ships, but she couldn’t help herself. She knew this ship.

Had Dad taken her on this ship before? She swore she could hear a toddler’s distant giggle.

Rey took in the sight of the ship with wide eyes. The rusty hallway, the ratty and overmodified cockpit, a ladder leading up and down she vaguely understood to lead to guns, a hollow floor with cracks that she somehow knew to lift up into smuggling compartments. She knew it all.

If you had told Rey the name of this ship – which Rey actually hadn’t bothered to look at, she now realized – she figured she couldn’t tell you a thing about it. But setting her eyes on this familiar space, somehow she knew every inch of its interior.

She walked further into the ship until she came upon the lounge area. A semi-circle of seats surrounded a Holotable.

Rey frowned and ran her fingers along the perimeter. A chunk of the rim had been torn off. Not just cracked, but like a strong set of fingers had ripped it. That was wrong, she knew for some reason. There wasn’t supposed to be a piece missing.

“Good girl, Rey,” a familiar voice suddenly laughed.

She looked up and her heart stopped beating.
Her father was sitting at the table.

No, not her father – well, yes, her father – but he was younger. Rey couldn’t tell how much younger, but his hair was fully blonde and he had no beard. And he was so clean. He wore a black getup that easy showcased how athletic he was. His expression was unburdened, carefree for once, and completely happy. A black glove was on his right hand, a wedding ring on his left, and a little girl on his lap.

Rey didn’t recognize herself at first. She was too clean, too happy, chubby even a little. Her hair was down, and she wore a dress of all things. Rey couldn’t remember ever wearing a dress. She was bouncing eagerly on her father’s lap as they watched the Holotable before them.

They were playing a game on it, and sat across them was their opponent. His back was to her, so all Rey could see was greying brown hair, a cream coloured shirt, and a black vest.

“She must of cheated,” the opponent declared.

“She’s four years old,” chided the younger Luke Erso. He looked at the little girl in his lap, “Your uncle is just a sore loser, isn’t he?”

Little Rey giggled.

“Uncle?” Older Rey whispered.

“Fine, if she didn’t cheat, then you did, Kid,” Uncle said.

Dad rolled his eyes, “Or maybe I’m just a better player than you? I’ve had more practice. You rarely leave the cockpit for a game.”

“Kid, the only reason I’m back here right now is I’ve got a great co-pilot. If he wasn’t here, either you or I would be in that cockpit right now.”

“We do have another person on board.”

“The day I let Felicity Rhiaon fly my ship is the day this family checks me into the nuthouse. Now, admit it, you’re cheating.”

“You just hate admitting you’re losing to a four-year-old. Now, Rey, how are we going to beat your uncle next?”

Little Rey giggled.

Older Rey stumbled back, and suddenly the scene was gone.

What in the Galaxy had been that? Was she dreaming? It made some sense; if she was actually asleep back in Quom’s tent, it would explain why the ship seemed so familiar down to the last detail.

But she pinched herself and didn’t stir.

Rey was awake.

The vision had been real. Was that some sort of long lost memory? Her heart told her that yes, that was what her father had looked like once upon a time, but had she really been aboard this ship with him? Did she really have an uncle?

“Listen to me, Rey,” a woman’s voice filled her mind. They were familiar words, almost like something from long ago. "You listen to me. Our family is going to come back for you. You do not go with anyone but our family. Do you understand?"

Rey didn’t understand. She didn’t understand why this ship seemed so familiar. Why it seemed to call for her… or maybe she did.

Maybe, as crazy as it sounded, somehow, someway… this ship was family.

A valuable thing scavengers overlook is information.

- Rey’s Survival Guide

The sun was just barely starting to rise when Luke led Roke, Plutt, Dirk, Vance, and Kerlos to the Millennium Falcon. It looked so wrong to see the ship on Jakku, and yet the sight still made him smile. The ships held so many memories, and they all started to rush back to Luke.

Luke remembered the first time he saw the Millennium Falcon. After all the boasting Han had done, Luke expected it to be a glorious sight out of a storybook from its beauty and speed.

The result was far less than expected.

“What a piece of junk!” he exclaimed.

Obi-Wan looked over at him and smiled a little. He very much shared Luke’s sentiment, even if he would never voice it.

Han meanwhile looked like Luke had just insulted his firstborn son.

“She’ll make point five past lightspeed. She may not look like much, but she’s got it where it counts, Kid. I’ve made a lot of special modifications myself.”

Out of his peripheral, Luke saw Obi-Wan roll his eyes. He had to hold back a grin because although Luke could see Han Solo was some smooth-talking scoundrel without the goods to backup him claims, he wasn’t sure how dangerous the man was yet.

Although seriously, this ship was a pile of trash.

“But we’re a little rushed, so if you’ll just get on board we’ll get out of here,” Han pat a hand on Luke’s back and urged him forward as he smiled at Obi-Wan.

“Can you believe this, Ben?” Luke muttered as they walked up the ramp. “Who does this guy think he is? He’s so smug and overly confident. A slimeball. What kind of person would want to hang around a guy like that?”

“Actually,” Obi-Wan glanced back at Han with a smile, “he reminds me a lot of your father.”

Luke fixed his eyes on the ship and took a deep breath.

The Millennium Falcon it was garbage then, and it was garbage now. But still, it was home.

“Let’s do this,” Luke said.

---

Chills tingled down his spine as he set foot on the Millennium Falcon for the first time in eight years. The last time he had been on the ship had been landing on Rornian to start the cleanup process that triggered Luke’s mental breakdown.

The ship was a little dirtier than last time, a little more banged up, and a little more modified, but by the Gods was it the same ship. It looked the mostly same: the same halls and mechanics Luke could traverse blindfolded. It sounded the same: worrying bangs and hums that always meant no good. It seemed the same: dirt, rust, and a suspicious burning that Han had declared years ago to give up on tried to locate. If it hadn’t blown up yet, Han figured it wasn’t going to blow up at all.

Luke never liked that statement, especially when Rey was aboard the ship.

As he looked around the familiar hallway while thinking of his daughter, Luke smiled. A memory tugged to the forefront of his mind of a very important event in Rey’s life that had occurred in that very hallway.

---

“Come on, Sweetheart. Come to Mommy,” Felicity was crouched on the floor in the hallway of the Millennium Falcon.

Luke was at the other end with Rey, helping her as she stood unsteadily to catch her if she fell. They were trying to get Rey to take her first steps.

“Come on, Sweetheart,” Felicity urged. “You can do it.”

“Walk to mommy, Rey,” Luke urged

“Would you two give it up?” Han chuckled as he came up next to Felicity. “If Rey hasn’t done it in the last two hours, I highly doubt she’ll randomly do it now.”

“Hey, you got your own kid in the cockpit to critique, Loud Mouth Solo. Leave this one to us,” Felicity said.

“Actually, Chewie is currently critiquing him in the co-pilot’s seat.”

Luke lifted his eyebrows, “Have you switched to Manual control?”

“Yep,” Han grinned proudly. “The boy flies just like his old man.”

The ship suddenly jerked roughly, and Luke’s lightning fast reflexes caught Rey before she fell.
"Sorry!" Ben’s voice called from the cockpit.

He reached into the Force to comfort her but already found Ben’s forest green light trying to soothe Rey. Sure enough, within a minute, Rey’s tears had dried.

“Good girl,” Felicity smiled warmly, having just righted herself. She reached out her arms, “Now, come on. Walk to Mommy.”

“Cut the girl a break,” Han rolled his eyes. “It’s not that important that you see her walk today.”

Felicity narrowed her eyes, “Solo, considering I have spent a significant portion of her life away in a mental health facility and missed most of her firsts, yes. Yes, it is important to see this.”

“Give it up, Fliss,” Han knelt down beside her and assumed the identical open-armed stance. “It’s not as easy as bending down and saying, Come here, Sweetheart. Come walk to Uncle Han.”

Rey waddled the three steps straight into his arms.

“Oh my goodness!” Luke cried as the very shocked Han picked up his niece. He took Rey from Han and showered her with hugs, kisses, and praise, “That’s my girl! Good job! I’m so proud of you!”

Felicity just stared at Han in frozen shock.

“Hey, whadya know?” Han grinned. “I guess it is that easy.”

Felicity smiled, but it did not reach her eyes. In fact, there was a rather psychotic look in them as she stared unblinkingly at him, rising to her feet.

“You got her to walk,” her voice was too pleasant as she stepped forward. She casually grabbed the shoulder of his vest and fiddled with it, “Weeks I’ve been trying to get her to walk and she just one waddles right up to you.”

“Luck of the draw, I guess. You okay, Fliss?” Han frowned as she started to pull the vest over his face. His eyes went wide when she started to press down. “Hey careful, Fliss. Can’t breathe when you do that… Fliss? Fliss? Hey knock it off! Fliss, stop it, you’re smothering me! Luke! Call her off, Kid! Call her off!”

Luke laughed to himself. Felicity had always loved to play around with Han like that… Or at least he hoped Felicity had merely been playing.

Honestly, he couldn’t tell.

“Let’s get down to it, Skywalker,” Plutt boomed looking a little lost being outside his concession stand for once. “Where are the smuggling hatches?”

Luke sighed, hoping Han wouldn’t be too upset with him for doing this, but he had to for his family.

“Down here,” Luke crouched to the floor and showed them the lines on the floor from the lids.

Luke shook his head and got to his feet. He knew they wouldn’t find anything of value to Luke
Luke knew better by now than to ask Han, Chewie, and Lando what were in the cargo boxes they were loading into the smuggling hatches; he just hauled them.

“Good, we should be go to go to Rodia without any problems,” Han declared as they sealed the hatches.

Luke raised an eyebrow, “So everything’s going to go wrong?”

“Almost immediately.”

Luke shook his head.

“You wanna come see how this all goes south, Lando?” Han asked.

“I’d love too, but I’ve got a lovely, young Jedi waiting for me. You can just drop me on Rornian with Luke.”

“How you got a woman to move in with you is beyond me.”

“I’m not sure who was more upset with the move: Ben or Felicity.” Luke paused, “I’ll go with Felicity.”

“Good choice,” Han nodded. “But still, I just can’t wrap my head around Lando Calrissian in love.”

Lando scratched the back of his neck, “Well, we don’t really like to put a label on it.”

“You still haven’t said I love you?” Luke asked. “I remember having a conversation with Alyla before Rey was born, and that was over five years ago.”

“Some things don’t need to be send. I don’t need to tell her, and she doesn’t need to tell me.”

“A girl like that’s gonna want commitment,” Han pointed out.

“Well, with the whole slavery and on the run past she’s had, she’s going to at least want stability. You’ve been living together most of the time, but not always is going to work?”

“It’s working for you and Leia,” Lando pointed out.

“Yeah, but we’ve got a kid and a Luke to tie us together.”

Lando fell silent.

“Well, we don’t have a Luke to tie us together, but… there’s something I need to tell you guys. Alyla and I are getting a kid.”

Whatever Han’s reaction to the statement was, Luke couldn’t see it because there was a sudden roar and a blur of golden-brown fur. The next thing he knew, Lando was airborne in Chewbacca’s arms there. Han never kept things hidden unless he, Chewie, Lando, or Luke was around to protect it.
“Alright, Buddy,” Lando squirmed in Chewie’s grasp. “Let me down. Thank you for being happy, but this isn’t gonna happen for Alyla and I, if one of us is dead.”

“You’re getting a kid?” Han exclaimed. “Who is giving you a kid? Are you stealing one?”

“We’re adopting,” Lando said once Chewie had him back on the ground. “Began working with an agency and it’s looking good.”

“Congratulations,” Luke smiled. “Are you two thinking about raising it on Rornian or Bespin?”

“Depends. Alyla is interested in finding a Force Sensitive kid, and if so, it’ll be Rornian. But a Non-Sensitive will probably stay on Bespin.”

“Boy or girl?” Han asked.

“We’ll see which is a better fit, but honestly I’m kinda hoping for a boy. Actually, we were wondering if you guys might write us a letter of recommendation?”

“Really? Like all of us?”

“We need three letters, so we were thinking Zena and Gavyn, and then you and Leia, and you and Fliss. What do you think?”

“I’ll talk to Leia, but it’ll probably be yes from us too.” Han shook his head, “I just can’t believe it. Lando Calrissian, settled down with the girl and kid.”

“No more unlikely than Han Solo in the same situation,” Luke grinned at his brother-in-law.

“I know,” Lando grinned. “Honestly it feels like for the first time in my life I’m finally going to get a happy ending.”

“Oi, Skywalker!” Plutt shoved Luke. “Help me with this control panel.”

Luke winced as another memory pulled at his mind. He couldn’t bare to relive it, but as he turned around to inspect the control panel on the wall, the memory forced its way to the forefront of his mind.

He heard the sobs before he was even fully in the ship. Luke’s all black outfit weighed heavily on him as his mind replayed Zena’s eulogy for her sister-in-law.

Everyone else was congregated at Skywalker residence, but what Lando disappeared, Luke offered to be the one to find him.

Luke found him slumped on the floor of the Millennium Falcon, his back to the wall next to the control panel. His eyes were red and puffy, but they were dry, no longer having anymore fluid his body to let tears form.

He was staring at a small blue morning glory he was hanging onto with both hands. It had to have been one of the ones and neatly arranged in Alyla’s hair before Gavyn and Lando lit her pyre. The woman who had once been so full of life was now a pile of ash buried in a shallow grave.

Luke didn’t say anything, just sat down next to his friend, and put a comforting hand on Lando’s shoulder.

“It shouldn’t have been her,” Lando’s voice struggle to overcome a sob. “It shouldn’t have been Alyla.”

Luke rubbed Lando’s shoulder, but remained silent.

“I should have told her, Luke,” Lando whispered. “Why did I never say I love you?”

And Lando to let himself be lost to tears.

“Clear, Boss!” Roke announced as he and the goons climbed out of the hatches and replaced the tops. “It’s clean.”

“Disappointing but expected,” Plutt replied. “Kerlos, come help me with this control panel. I think some of this wiring is mixed up.”

Kerlos rolled up his sleeves, “I’ll see what I can do, Boss.”

“You,” Roke grabbed Luke’s shoulder and shoved him towards a ladder on the wall leading to areas above and below. “These gunners’ ports?”

“Check them out with me.”

“You want to go up and I’ll go down?”

Roke laughed, “You’re insane if you think I’m leaving you alone on this ship. Now start climbing.”

“This here is the gunner’s port,” Han announced. “Considering the little trouble we had during takeoff, I’m assuming these will come in handy. You know how to shoot, Kid?”

Luke jumped off the ladder, landing on the ground somewhat ungracefully. “Sure. I bullseye womprats in my T-16 at home all the time.”

“I have no idea what that means.” Han caught sight of Obi-Wan climbing down the ladder to join them, “Oh, don’t worry. You don’t have to come down.”

“Nonsense,” Obi-Wan reached the floor. Unlike Luke, he did it rather elegantly. “I have to know where the weapons are.”

“Well, I just don’t want you getting stuck down here.”

Obi-Wan narrowed his eyes slightly. “I assure you I am not so frail that I cannot get back up a ladder, Captain Solo. It’s for all of our safeties that I can help on the guns should we run into Han raised his eyebrows, “You on the guns? Listen, I am sure you’ve experience some things back in your day, but—”

“I fought in all three years of the Clone Wars. I know my way around the gunner’s port.” Obi-Wan settled down in the chair and turned it on like it was something he did every day. “Standard controls?”

“Yeah,” Han looked impressed as Obi-Wan tested it out.

“Well, a little primitive and not as immediately response as I’d like, but it’ll do.”

“Wow, were you a pilot too, Ben?” Luke asked.

“Oh no, that was far more your father’s area of expertise, though he did drag me on many adventures with him.”

“Can tell me any?”

“Perhaps some other time. There was an incident on Iago that is interesting, but it’ll raise more questions than it answers. So, is there anything for entertainment around here, Captain Solo?”

Hans crashes neck, “Uh… Not really. There’s a dejarik if you want to play.”

“Perhaps some other time,” Obi-Wan smiled kindly.

Suddenly there was a beeping above them where Threepio, Artoo, and Chewbacca were gathered.

“Artoo said he knows how to play and would be up for it,” Threepio translated.

“Oh no, I’m not playing a droid,” Han refused. “That’s basically cheating.”

Roar roar grr.

“Really, Chewie?”

Grr.

“Chewie says he’ll play the droid.”

“How marvelous!” Threepio exclaimed.

“Well, I think I might have a blast remote around here somewhere.”

“That will do wonderfully.” Obi-Wan touched the viewscreen of the gun and sighed. No doubt he was losing himself once more to memories of Anakin Skywalker. “Come, Luke. It’s time to leave this behind.”
“Well, that was a bust,” Roke declared as they climbed back up to the main part of the ship.

“At least the guns are still working,” Luke pointed out.

“Stop trying to find the bright side in everything.”

“Leave my girlfriend alone and you have a deal.”

“Kaybatta,” Roke muttered.

“I remind you once more that Huttese is my native language and I can understand exactly what you called me… Oh, and kaybatta is the feminine version. Technically I would be a koybotto.”

“Trelana na torla.”

“Leave my mother out of this.”

“Find anything?” Roke asked the others.

“A bust so far,” Vance took a step back when Roke got too close. He was still sporting a nice head bandage from the fight yesterday. “You?”

“Nothing,” Roke snarled. “If we don’t find something soon—”

“Hey, guys! I found something!” Dirk exclaimed.

“What is it?” Plutt pushed his way through the men excitedly. His smiled fell when he set his eyes on Dirk’s discovery, “You found a closet.”

Vance slapped his forehead, and then winced at irritating his head injury.

“Were you dropped as a child?” Kerlos asked.

Dirk frowned, “But what if there’s supplies?”

“There’s not going to be supplies,” Roke rolled his eyes. He looked to Plutt, “ Seriously, why do we keep him around?”

“You should see him throw a punch,” Plutt answered.

Dirk looked helplessly around at the group, “But what if—”

“Enough, you useless idiot!” Roke snapped. “There is going to be nothing—”

Luke hit the open button and revealed the walk-in storage closet was lightly filled with basic supplies and food. The goons swarmed the closet like ants on a hill.

He clapped his shoulder and muttered so only Dirk could hear, “That’s friends are for.”

“Han Solo, you let us out of this closet!”

“Loud Mouth Solo, I will kick your ass if you don’t let us out right now!”
Luke could hear Han’s chuckle from the other side of the door, “Not until you two make up.”

“Han, we do not need you intervening in our relationship,” Luke pounded on the closet door.

“Your relationship? Kid, you two wouldn’t have a relationship if it wasn’t for me.”

“That doesn’t mean we need constant intervention,” Felicity yelled. “What are you going to do next? Propose on Luke’s behalf? Tell him I’m been pregnant?”

Luke’s eyes widened.

“Not pregnant,” Felicity said quickly.

He gave a sigh of relief.

“I’m sick of all this fighting,” Han said. “You two need to work through this problem civilly.” Oh Luke raised an eyebrow, “really? You’re complaining about me not calmly talking through my relationship problems with Felicity? After eleven years of putting up with you and Leia, now you’re complaining?”

“After eleven years of doing things like that, I can safely say there’s better ways of solving problems. Now, I’m going to leave for twenty minutes and when I come back, you better have made some progress. And don’t think about lying and pretending things are better. After eleven years, I can tell when the Kid is lying.”

“Han! Han!” Luke yelled after him, but Han was gone. He slammed his mechanical fist against the door, denting it slightly, “Damn it.”

“Don’t just punch the door,” Felicity snapped. “Use your lightsaber and get us out of here.”

“I may have given it to Leia when she asked to see it for a few minutes,” Luke said sheepishly.

Felicity glared at him, “I hate it when those two work together. Nothing good ever comes from it.”

“Ben?”

“I stand by my statement.”

Luke sighed and leaned against the door, “So, I guess we have no choice but to talk this out.”

“I guess so,” Felicity said sadly.

She crossed the small space to the opposite wall and sat on the floor, her back against the wall, knees tucked her chest, and arms wrapped around them.

Luke joined her.

“I just don’t understand why you refuse to learn to fly ships,” he began.

“And I don’t understand why it’s so important to you that I do,” Felicity countered.

“Because piloting is something so important in my life. My father was a pilot, Han’s a pilot, my sister’s a pilot, I was a pilot in the Rebellion, most of my friends are pilots… It’s just hard for me to be with someone who is so anti-pilot.”

“I’m not anti-pilot, I just don’t want to be one. And what does it matter I don’t have all the same interests as you? I don’t complain that you won’t talk Nubian architecture with me.”

“No, that’s when you use Uncle Darred for.”

“I don’t need to be a pilot, Luke,” Felicity said softly. “Can’t you accept that?”

“… No, I can’t,” Luke admitted. “Piloting is an extremely important life skill. You can’t live without it.”

“Says the man who couldn’t do laundry until he was thirty.”

“Says the woman who couldn’t cook until she was over thirty.”

“Says the man who couldn’t cook until he was twenty-five. Oh yeah, I talked to Leia. Turns out you were lying when you said your aunt taught you to cook.”

“I wasn’t lying that she taught me… It just wasn’t edible until I was twenty-five. I didn’t have much opportunity to practice until the war was over.”

“Whatever helps you sleep at night, Skywalker,” Felicity laughed and clapped his knee. She rubbed it and sighed, “Why is it so hard for you accept this?”

Luke sighed, “What if we had children, Felicity?”

She frowned.

“I live the very dangerous life, and sooner or later my children will be involved in it. What if we get a situation where the only way to save the child is for you to take that child away on a ship?”

“What? And leave you behind?”

“Not forever, but temporarily.”

“Luke-”

“I do not ever want to risk my child.”

Felicity sighed, “I get it, Luke, but it’s just not that easy.”

“Then how can we make it easier?” Luke clasped her hand, “Come on, tell me why you won’t learn to fly a ship.”

“… Because I promised Brendan and I wouldn’t.”

Felicity hung her head guiltily and picked at a loose thread on her pants.

“He made me say the words to him,” she fought against her tears. She felt Luke’s arm wrap around her, and let herself all into his embrace. “We always planned on him teaching me to fly. The last time I saw him, I said I might have to get someone else to teach me since he was always off on tours of duty. He said, don’t you dare! I am the only person who is allowed to teach you to fly, and you know it. I objected, but he cut me off. I’m serious, Fliss, promise me that you’ll never learn to fly a ship unless I'm the one teaching you. I rolled my eyes and called him a drama queen, but he insisted. Say it, Felicity. He urged me. I want to hear the words come from your mouth. So I did; I told him, I swear on my very life itself, that I'll never learn to fly a ship unless you're the one teaching me. Then he kissed me on the forehead, said I love you, Little Sis, I hugged him and said, I love you, Big Bro, and that was the last time I ever saw him.”

“And that’s why Bail Organa let you join the Rebellion without knowing how to fly.”

“I’ve seen other people do it: Leia, Diego, even Biggs even tried to teach me, but… I can’t. That was the last conversation I had with my brother. I swear on my very life itself, that I'll never learn to fly a ship unless you're the one teaching me. That was my final promise to him.”

“The last time I spoke to my aunt and uncle, I fought with them.” Luke kissed Felicity’s forehead. As he stroked her hair, he fought back his own tears, “If I could take it back, return to that moment and know that was our final one, I would have told them everything. How much I love them, how grateful I was to have them in my life, tell them to forgive them for their secrets, and lies, and all the things they never told me… if I could tell them what they meant to me, I would. Them, Biggs, Nakari—”

“Obi-Wan?”

“Nah. I talk with Obi-Wan on a regular basis. We worked things out long ago. We’re good.”

Felicity laughed.

Luke smiled at her, “You can’t punish yourself for breaking a promise you made to a dead man. Do you think Brendan would really want you to never learn to fly?”

“No,” she admitted. She let herself grin, “In fact he would be horrified at the thought of me thirty-two and unable to fly. Make fun of me mercilessly… Well that, and sleeping with our father’s killer on a regular basis.”

“Han does that enough for both of us.”

“Yeah, he does. You know, he reminds me a lot like Brendan, and so do you. At times it’s like if we stuck the two of you in a blender, we’d get Brendan.”

“Actually I think you would get a mess and murder charges.”

“And they call me the sassy one,” Felicity swatted at Luke.

He caught her hands and kissed them, “So, come on. When you say? You want to learn to fly a ship?”

She smiled and stroked his cheek, “Oh, Luke… no.”

His smile dropped.

“But I will make you a promise.” She kissed his puzzled scowl, “When we have children, I’ll learn. Just promise that if I do have to escape somewhere with our kids, you’ll come get us.”

“Deal,” he kissed her. “Wow, five minutes and it’s all fixed… And now what?”

“Han is not coming back for fifteen minutes.” Felicity played with the flap of his tunic, “I wonder what we could get up to in fifteen minutes?”
Luke gently pushed on her back, Felicity giggling as he kissed his way down her neck.

“In fifteen minutes, I might be able to do it twice.”

Fifteen minutes later, Han really regretted opening the closet door.

It was the first time they made love on the Millennium Falcon, but it certainly wasn’t the last. After Han made a big fuss over them ‘defiling his precious ship’ Felicity had made it her mission to ‘defile’ every part of the ship.

And Luke was only too happy to oblige.

He tried not to let Plutt and all of his goons see his smile as Luke remembered all the places he and Felicity had defiled. All seven of the bunks on the Falcon, multiple tables, a few times on the Holotable, those two very interesting times in the gunners’ ports – movable chairs led to some great things – that one time Felicity inexplicably decided to pull him down into smuggling compartment. But Luke’s favorite time of all had to have been that time Felicity worked him over the good as he sat in Han’s captain chair while Han had a nap in the other room.

Han would kill him if he ever found out about that one.

“The closet’s clear,” Luke declared, withholding a grin when the goons exited the closet with their arms full busy stockpiling their treasures.

But Roke was eyeing him suspiciously, “Something funny about this closet?”

Luke stroked the dented door, “Just memories.”

The AT-AT’s my home, but my speeder’s even more important to my survival. I built it myself, from parts I found in the Graveyard and in junk piles in Niima, along with a few things I got in trade from the Teedos.

- Rey’s Survival Guide

“It was the weirdest thing, Teng!” Rey told him as they worked on Quom’s speeder together. “I swear it had to have been a memory.”

“Are you sure we just didn’t eat some funny rations last night?” Teng was hard to hear as he held a screwdriver between his teeth. “I did dream that Quom and I tap danced for the Emperor.”

“Okay, you are so telling me that dream when we’re done discussing this.”

“We were actually pretty good. Hand me the bonding tape?”

Rey chucked it to him.

“Thanks,” Teng caught it with one hand, his other busy with a flashlight. “So did you tell your dad
“No. He would get weird?”

“Is it possible for you to have an uncle?”

“Actually, yes. I do have at least one. Uh… Brendan. Mom’s brother, but he died before my parents even met.”

“What about your dad? Does he have family?”

“He did mention last year something about leaving family behind,” Rey recalled. “It would make sense why he freaked out so much over the ship. Imagine if your brother or brother-in-law just randomly showed up on Jakku.”

“Aright, I think I got it,” Teng slammed shut the hood of the speeder. “Start her up.”

Rey climbed into the driver’s seat and turned on the engine. There was a triumphant roar of successful operation… and then a bang, grunt, crackle of electricity, and all the systems died instantly.

“Damn,” Teng banged his fist against the hood of the speeder.

“Guess we can’t go scavenging today,” Rey sighed, crawling out of the speeder. “This is so unfair! Why do we have to be stuck in town all day?”

“Because Quom’s using your dad’s speeder to do business in Tuanul, Luke is working with Plutt, Aletha’s ringside, and this thing is dead.”

“I hate being dependent on their speeders. Dad’s runs like a God put it together, but this thing is someday got to explode and kill nineteen people.”

“Meanwhile we’re stuck fiddling with engines and power couplings like a pair of chumps while the others scavenge the good stuff. There was a sandstorm yesterday morning, do you know how much stuff must be uncovered, and we’re stuck here.”

“I just wish we had our own speeder,” Rey slumped to the ground, arms crossed and back against the speeder. That was when she noticed Teng staring at her with wide eyes, “What?”

“You’re a genius.”

“What do you mean?”

“Let’s build a speeder!”

“Are you serious?”

“Dead serious!” Teng’s voice was filled with excitement. “We know how machines are put together, between the two of us we could probably make a speeder.”

“Teng are you crazy?” Rey got to her feet. “Do you know how much time and material it would take? It would probably end up being worse than this thing.”

As if on cue, Quom’s speeder sputtered a pathetic belch of smoke.

“I highly doubt that.” Teng took her hands in his, “Come on, Rey. I believe you can do it. Don’t you
Maybe it was the novelty of the idea. Maybe it was the excitement buzzing inside the two of them. Or maybe it was just the way those expression green eyes – greens as the plants on planets of life – stared into hers.

Whatever the reason, Rey found herself saying, “There is that pair of turbo engines in that cargo-hauler two kilometres south of here. We could attach them to those amplifier intakes over in the Imperial gunship four kilometers north-west.”

“And the afterburners we have in storage from that crashed racing swoop inexplicably in the middle of the desert.”

“Then we just bolt on a bunch of X-Wing repulsorlifts, and bingo, we should be in business.”

“Rey Erso, let’s build a speeder.”

Plutt and the goons were busy evaluating the haul from the closet, and Luke saw his chance. He wanted this moment to himself. Luke pulled up his hood in case one of the goons followed so his could conceal his reaction from them.

With slow but determined steps, Luke walked into the cockpit. His hands shook and his heart raced. It looked exactly as he had left it behind. He stopped at the doorway of the cockpit and just savored the sight of the moment. How many times had he sat in all four of those chairs? Fought with Leia over whether he or she had the role of co-pilot when Chewie wasn’t around – Leia automatically got dibs, Han had declared after their marriage.

Taking a deep breath, his eyes locked on the captain’s chair, Luke flipped on the cockpit. A whirring start up sound filled the room, and Luke’s head jerked to the right towards the source of the noise, for a second. He then faced to his left, and completing a full arc turned his head from left to right, took in the full sight of the cockpit.

He couldn’t believe he was back in the cockpit of the Millennium Falcon. It seemed like he would never return to this place, but then again, there was a time when Luke never thought he’d been that far from it.

There was a time when the world was a much different place.

It wasn’t the first time Luke held Ben, but it was his first time alone with him. Ben was two months old. Han and Leia had agreed to take him to Rornian to meet the other Jedi students... All three of them. Of course, Reine, Obik, and Shar’vida, would be joined by Davarl and Brinna in the next few months, but it was a nice visit nonetheless.

They were on their way to Rornian, making the trip overnight. Ben had constantly woken the other passengers with his crying. Luke could see how much at their wit’s end Han and Leia were getting, so when Ben was crying without needing feeding or changing, Luke had offered to step in.

“You two get some sleep,” Luke told Han and Leia. “I’ll watch him for a while.”
“No, Luke, it’s all right, just go back to sleep,” Leia insisted.

“Leia, you look terrible; the two of you need a break. I’ll take him, and it will be fine.”

She narrowed her eyes, “You know what? I’m too tired to get you for that you look terrible comment. I’ll swat you upside the head or something in the morning.”

“I expect nothing less,” Luke chuckled as he accepted the baby Ben from Leia.

“Thanks, Kid,” Han said as he wrapped an arm around Leia, and led them out of the cockpit. “Let me know if my baby gives you any problems.”

“Ben and I will be fine. I promise.”

“… I meant the Falcon.”

Leia wasn’t too tired to swat Han upside the head.

Luke laughed, kissed Leia’s cheek, and watched as the couple exited, Han patting him on the arm as he did so.

Silence filled the cockpit and Luke looked down at his nephew.

Ben wriggled in his arms.

“That means I’m your mother’s brother. It’s actually kind of a new development. Well… the being aware of it portion. I only found out about a year ago, but I was best friends with your parents for four years before that… Wow, I’ve been friends with them for five years. Time really does fly.”

Ben stared at him.

“You know, I don’t know much about having a nephew, but I do know lots about having an uncle. I was raised by mine.”

“And before you start asking questions, no your mother wasn’t raised by our uncle. But that’s a long story for another day.”

Ben’s eyelids started to droop.

“I miss my uncle,” Luke confessed. “I put Anakin and Obi-Wan on a pedestal, but it was Uncle Owen who made me the man I am today. Him and your father.”

“I’m going to be that for you,” Luke vowed. “I’m going to teach you to be a good man. To show you how to overcome the darkness in this world.”
Ben had fallen asleep in his arms.

“I’ll protect you, Ben,” Luke held his nephew lovingly. “I’ll protect you from the Dark Side and show you how to be a Jedi like my father before me.”

Luke could feel Ben’s Force Signature, a deep forest green enveloping the sky blue of his signature. Somewhere, a black as dark as midnight reached for Ben, but he took refuge in the safety of his uncle’s arms.

“And I promise to always be there for you,” Luke whispered. “No matter what you say or do, I will always love you. Light Side, Dark Side, or anything in between… I’ll never give up on you. I promise.”

It was a promise Luke couldn’t keep; not after Ben had broken his trust and done that horrible thing to Felicity. He hurt the woman Luke loved simply because Luke loved her.

A petty fight that got too far out of hand.

“Good, it’s working,” Plutt suddenly said. Luke hadn’t noticed when the alien had joined him.

“Vance, get in here and inspect this thing. Skywalker, you’re with Roke and I.”

Roke roughly shoved him forward, but fed up with his mistreatment, Luke grabbed Roke’s arm and using an unexpected show of strength threw the nearly three-hundred-pound alien against the wall. He slammed into at and fell to the ground in a daze.

Everyone stopped what they were doing to stare at Luke in shock.

“Do not underestimate me,” Luke warned. He looked around the ship, “All of you.”

Dirk gulped.

Luke walked over to Roke and offered his hand. Roke looked over at Plutt uncertainly, a spark of fear in his eyes.

Plutt looked dumbstruck, but gave him a hesitant nod.

“Touch me again and you’ll get much worse,” Luke whispered. “And if you touch my girls, I’ll make what I did to Jarex Zolhar look like child’s play. And Teng is to be considered under my protection these days too. Am I understood?”

Roke nodded, but his gaze hardened, and his hand clenched, trying to crush Luke’s.

“Then we have an agreement,” Luke released Roke. “Now, the rest of the ship.”

When they entered the lounge area, Dirk and Plutt were waiting for them.

“Now I bet this brings back a lot of memories, doesn’t it Skywalker?” Plutt asked.

Luke placed a hand on the Holotable and smiled when he noticed the rim was still broken. He rested his mechanical fingers over the hole, and they fit perfectly.

It wasn’t unusual to find Princess Leia Organa staring off into the distance sadly. It was unusual to see a haunted look ghost over her eyes. It wasn’t unusual for Leia to turn away and tell you there was nothing wrong when that clearly wasn’t true.

It was another thing altogether to catch her full-on crying. But that was how Luke found her that night on the Falcon. Han was asleep in the bunks, Threepio and Artoo were powered down, Chewbacca was in the cockpit, and Luke had been in the fresher.

Leia was seated at the Holotable, crying quietly.

Luke didn’t know what to do. At the time, he had only known her a few months and wasn’t sure of the kind of reaction she would want. He stared at her for a few minutes, hoping she would not look up and notice him. Then he decided to comfort her the way she had comforted him in the same position.

He found a blanket carelessly tossed to the side and walked up to the Holotable. Luke placed it over Leia’s shoulders, and she startled. She looked up, saw it was him and smiled. He sat down next to her, wrapping an arm over her shoulders as she wiped away her tears.

“You shouldn’t see me cry,” Leia said softly.

“Crying is natural,” Luke replied. “Especially for someone who has been through as much as you.”

“Don’t you mean as much as us?”

“Leia, I lost my family, but you lost your entire planet. I have no idea what that feels like.”

“I can’t even begin to describe it. You know it gets better everyday, not easier but you get used to the pain.”

“I know what you mean. That ache will never go away, but somehow it becomes a part of you, or at least I assume so. This is the first time I’ve lost someone. What about you?”

“I lost my mother when I was a young girl,” Leia answered.

“I’m sorry,” Luke said. “Were you a lot like her?”

“More so my father, but I do take after my mother in some ways.”

“That would be a miracle. I’m actually adopted.”

“Really? I had no idea.”

“It’s not a big secret, but it’s really not a secret. We were different ethnicities after all.”

“Do you know what happened to your parents? Your real parents?”

Leia shrugged, “No clue. You?”
“I know Vader killed my father,” Luke clenched his fists. “As for my mother, I don’t know. Maybe she’s alive? Maybe I have another family out there. That would be nice to find.”

“It would, wouldn’t it? You know, when I was younger I used to pretend Padmé Amidala was my mother. People used to say that her nieces look like me. It makes me smile anytime I see Pooja or Ryoo Nabberie.”

“Wait, Ryoo Nabberie is Padmé Amidala’s niece? Are you serious? That woman scares the crap out of me.”

“Then don’t bring up Amidala’s vote of no confidence to her. She literally once punched a guy for it.”

He looked over at Leia and grinned to himself. His arm slung around her shoulder, he rubbed her arm and ever so slightly pulled her closer into his embrace. It was the furthest he had ever been with a woman.

“So what brought on the tears?” Luke would do anything to fix them.

Leia laughed, “It’s, uh… it’s my birthday in a few days, and it’s the first one I’m having without my father.”

“I’m sorry. I know how you feel, my birthday’s coming up in a few days too.”

Leia looked at him.

“You don’t think-”

“When’s yours?” Leia asked.

“The twenty-fourth.”

“You’re kidding. Luke, you don’t need to lie about your birthday to impress me.”

“I’m serious, it’s the twenty-fourth. Is it really yours too?”

“This is the weirdest thing,” Leia shook her head.

“At least it’s not weird enough that we’re the exact same age. You’re turning, what? Eighteen? Nineteen?”

“Twenty.”

“…Are you serious? That’s how old I’m turning!”

Leia burst out laughing, “I don’t believe this. What are the odds that you and I would have the same birthdate?”

As it later turned out, the odds were pretty good.

The table buzzed and suddenly the top was filled with the blue images of very familiar creatures.

Luke grinned at him, “You know how to play?”

“No,” he looked away bashfully.

Luke patted his shoulder, “Perhaps I’ll teach you.”

“Don’t be giving him ideas,” Plutt warned as he and the other goons ransacked the lounge. They found odds and ends, but none of it had belonged to Han and their family. “You’re not going to be on this ship after this.”

He chuckled lightly, “Of course not.”

Plutt narrowed his eyes, “I mean it. You and your girl stays off.”

Luke’s brows lifted fractionally; he didn’t expect Plutt to know about Rey’s little escapade. Of course, that didn’t mean Plutt was going to stop him or Rey from exploring this ship, that in the situation technically belonged to them.

“Skywalker,” Plutt threatened.

Luke held up his hands, “I understand. Shall we continue on?”

“Show me the bunks.”

He led them down the corridor that contained the living quarters. There was a bunk in the lounge area, a custom built one large enough to contain a Wookiee, but otherwise there was two bunk rooms each containing three bunks.

Between the bunkrooms was a head with a toilet and very crappy shower. Luke wondered if Han had ever gotten around to fixing it. He remembered the day that Leia and Felicity got tired of the shower that randomly switched between freezing cold and boiling hot and had the pressure of hail on Kamino. They had declared that if the boys wouldn’t fix it, they would try it themselves.

The event did make it a little better – the hot water was a little less skin peeling – but mainly resulted in the establishment of a new family rule: Don’t let Felicity mess with plumbing. The floor of the ship was soggy for two months.

“So which one’s yours?” Dirk asked in a hushed voice. It wasn’t good for him if he let Plutt see him too friendly with the Skywalkers.

“Not really any in particular,” Luke answered quietly. “We played musical bunks for a while, but after Rey came around it sort of settled that Felicity, Rey, and I would be in the first room, and then Han, Leia, and Ben were in the second – these bunks aren’t double wide, so two people can’t share one bed.”

“Why’d you get the first room?”

Luke didn’t like to ever use his physical strength on the people he loved, but as Felicity hysterically screamed and hit his chest in front of the other members of the Resistance, Luke had no choice but to physically drag her away to the bunkroom where she wouldn’t disturb the infants they had saved from the First Order.

“We have to go back!” Felicity screamed. “Luke, we have to go back!”

He pulled her by the wrist into the bunkroom, admittedly tossing her a little bit, and quickly slammed the door shut.

Hysteria turned to wrath in a second.

“You coward!” she screeched in his face, banging her fists against his chest. “Let me out of here!”

“No,” Luke said firmly as he stood in front of the door, blocking her path. “Felicity, I’m sorry but you have to calm down.”

“Calm down? Calm down? If we don’t go back, we sentence that baby to death!”

“There’s nothing more we can do right now.”

“We have to go back.”

“We can’t.”

“Get out of my way you son of a bitch!”

Luke knew she didn’t mean her words, “I won’t move.”

Their eyes met, and something in the calm blue pools of his irises changed those teary hazel ones.

He made the gamble to pull her into his embrace. She could have hit him, push his away, screamed out him, even shot him with the blaster she had thankfully forgotten was on her belt. Instead the risk paid off. Felicity threw her arms around him, gripping him tightly like her lifeline and sobbed into his chest.

She wailed hysterically, the kind of sobs that used your full chest. Every sob broke Luke’s heart, but he held fast and held her tight. When Felicity started to lose the strength to stand, he let her sink them to the floor. On their knees they held each other and Felicity cried. She buried her face in his neck, and he stroked her hair whispering words of comfort.

By the time of the incident, Luke had already admitted to himself that he was in love with her. But as he held her, listening to her sobs over failing FN-2187, that was the moment Luke promised himself to spend the rest of his life stopping Felicity from experiencing this level of heartbreak ever again.

And with such a display of devotion towards a stranger’s baby, that was the moment he knew she would become the mother of his child.

“This was the room where I decided to spend the rest of my life with her,” Luke answered.
Dirk smiled sadly and placed a hand on his shoulder, “She was a nice woman. Liked to punch things, but kind to me. Like Rey.”

“Yeah,” Luke fought back a tear, “she’s a lot like her mother. The best of me and the best of her combined.”

Dirk paused for a long moment, “She… She didn’t deserve to die.”

“No, she didn’t.” He smiled at Dirk, “Thanks.”

“Skywalker!” Plutt barked.

“Boss is calling,” Dirk looked down shyly. “I’ll look over the room and you go to him.”

“Sounds like a plan.”

Dirk paused again.

“If I find anything, I won’t let him know,” Dirk whispered.

Luke blinked but then grinned wider, “You’re a good guy, Dirk. Pretty smart too. Don’t let anyone tell you otherwise.”

“Hold still,” Teng instructed.

“Come on, Teng, I look ridiculous,” Rey laughed, her voice muffled by all her wrappings.

Teng and Rey had finished their tasks for the day, and decided to take a drawing break. He was drawing her wrapped up in all her sun gear, scarves around her face, googles on, head covered, and satchel crossed over her body.

“You look fully geared up for protection from the sun,” Teng waved off. “Now hold still, I just have a few more lines.”

Rey rolled her eyes, which Teng couldn’t see behind her coverings, but held still. It was ten minutes – and three pounds of sweat – later that Teng declared he was done.

“What do you think?” Teng asked as she sketched down a caption in the book.

“It looks wonderful,” Rey said, writing down the words Me-geared up for maximum protection.

“Really?”

“Really. You perfectly captured how stiff and awkward I was.”

“Oh, I’ll get you for that!”

She squealed as Teng playfully pulled her into his lap and started to tickle her.

“Teng! Stop it!” Rey giggled as he attacked her mercilessly. “No, not my sides, you know how ticklish those are!”

“Not until you say I’m a good artist.”
“Never!”

She managed to push him to the floor, but he pulled her down with him. For several minutes they rouged, tickled, played until they were lying on their backs out of breath.

“Okay,” Rey panted. “You win. You’re a pretty good artist.”

“Thanks,” Teng grinned. “You’re not so bad yourself.”

“Lunch?”

“Absolutely.”

“I’ll go grab some water for the bread.” Rey lifted herself up and kissed Teng’s cheek, “I’ll be right back.”

She didn’t notice as she left Quom and Teng’s tent how Teng stared after her in frozen shock. When she was gone, Teng sat up, eyes wide and jaw dropped.

Carefully he reached up and touched the spot she had kissed.

It was a simple gesture, and one he knew didn’t really have a meaning behind it. He had seen her kiss the same sort of kiss of the cheek to Luke, Quom, and Aletha on a regular basis.

But still… it was so soft and lovely. The kiss had been gentle and nice. Something burned within him, yearning to feel those chapped lips against his skin once more.

He stared at the tent flap, beyond which Rey had disappeared. His hand still pressed to his ever so damp cheek where her lips had been, longing so hard for more.

“Uh oh.”

“I didn’t know this place had a galley,” Vance said as they raided the cupboard on the Millennium Falcon. “Never heard of it in all the stories.”

“It’s a relatively new addition,” Luke replied. “Han added it just after the war as a wedding present for my sister.”

“A wedding present?” Roke scoffed. “That is the craziest thing I have ever heard.”

“Oh, this is Han Solo we’re talking about,” Luke chuckled. “That doesn’t even break the top 100 craziest things he’s ever said.”

“Construction is just starting, but if I play this right, I’ll be done converting the space into a galley in about three months,” Han showed off the area to Luke.

“Translation, it’ll probably be about 12-18 months before it’s done,” Leia said.

“Hey!”
“Don’t you hey me. There are parts of this ship being held together by duct tape, and you know it.”

“So, what do you think?” Leia asked her brother.

“I think it’s about time,” Luke observed the area with crossed arms. “Which means this is suspicious. Why are you adding a galley?”

Han nervously eyed Leia, “I just thought since Princess here’s going to be spending more time on the Falcon, I ought to give her a nice little luxury. Gotta impressed the father-in-law somehow.”

“Han, Leia has been frequently on the ship for four years. That can’t be the reason.” Luke narrowed his eyes, “What are you hiding?”

“Well... it’s not exactly a regular gift,” Han admitted. “It’s a... It’s a...”

“If you can’t say it, I can,” Leia offered.

“Nah, I can do this.” Han took a deep breath, “It's a wedding present. Luke, we’re getting married.”

Han grinned brightly down at Leia as he wrapped his arm around her waist. He looked so eager as they waited for Luke’s reaction.

Luke stared at them, “You’re... Getting married?”

“Yes, we are,” Leia looked so happy as she smiled at Han and leaned into his embrace.

That was not the answer they were expecting.

“Wow, thanks, Kid,” Han scowled.

“Thought you might be a lot more excited,” Leia said.

“Don’t get me wrong, I am. Congratulations and all that, but... It doesn’t make sense.”

“I love her and she loves me,” Han said. “Sure, that in itself doesn’t make sense but it’s a valid reason to marry.”

“Not for you, and not this quickly.”

“We’ve known each other over four years,” Leia pointed out.

“Yeah, but you’ve only been together one and honestly not even that long. Han spent most of that year in carbonite. It’s been tops five months and now you’re getting married? Something’s not adding up. Sure, you two are impulsive, but not that impulsive. What’s going on?”

Han and Leia shared a very long look. She nodded at him, and Han gulped.

“You’re right, Kid, something’s going on.” Han took another deep breath, “You know how a year ago you had no family, and now you have a father and sister... Well you’re about to get another family member.”

Leia gathered her courage and confessed, “I’m pregnant.”

His eyes shot wide. Had... Had he heard that correctly? Han and Leia were having a baby? No, that couldn’t be right. Could it?

Luke looked at Han. He had the guiltiest, most terrified expression that Luke had ever seen on him. It made sense; Luke and Han hadn’t spent a whole lot of time together since Hoth. Since the Tauntaun incident Han had sort of won his best friend’s crush away from him, impregnated her, and now was going to marry her. All without a single conversation with Luke about it.

Secret twin revelation aside, it was kind of a shitty move on Han’s part.

“Well, it certainly makes more sense now,” Luke blurted out. “And you two are... happy about this?”

The pair of them scowled.

“We would be happier if our numbskull best friend wasn’t making a big deal out of it,” Han said.

“But it is a big deal,” Luke pointed out. “Look, I’m happy if this is what you two want. My best friend and my sister getting married and having a baby; it’s like a dream come true. But are you sure this is what you want?”

“I may not be a decent guy, but I am honourable enough to know if you knock up a girl, you marry her,” Han countered.

Leia turned her glare on him, “I don’t need you defending my honour, so if that’s the only reason you’re doing this-”

“Of course, it’s not. Look at what you’re doing, Kid. You’re wrecking this thing.”

“Han. Leia. Please listen to me. If this is what you want to do, I will absolutely stand by it... but I want to make sure you want this. Leia, you’re twenty-three. Are you really ready to be married and have a child? I’m gung-ho about commitment and even I don’t want that for another three or four years.”

Or eleven, but whatever.

“It is scary Luke, but we’ve faced a lot worse,” Leia said wrapping her arms around Han’s broad left one. “Father always did say my mind was ten years older than my body.”

“But you don’t always have to be ten years older. If you don’t want this... there are alternatives.”

Luke didn’t like bringing it up, but someone had to.

Han and Leia looked at each other.

“Actually, we did discuss the alternative,” Leia confessed. Her grip tightened on Han’s arm.

Luke startled, “You... you did?”

“We actually bet the result of Jakku on it,” Han sighed. “We didn’t- Don’t want to juggle a kid and fighting a war. So, if we lost the Battle of Jakku and the war continued, we agreed not to proceed with this. And if we won, we figured let’s give it a shot. We may be in over our heads but at least Luke and Chewie have our backs.”

“And we won, so here we are,” Leia said, struggling to contain her emotions.

Leia blinked, and Luke saw the tears forming that she fought to hold back. Han seemed to see them too because he pulled her tighter into his embrace. He shifted the left arm that Leia clutched so that his palm rested against her stomach underneath which was his child.

Luke stared at the palm and the stomach. Han and Leia were going to have a baby. They had created a child. It was ridiculous, it was unplanned, it was outrageous, it was… it was exactly what Luke would expect from those two.

Han and Leia were going to have a baby. Their family – an actual bound by blood family, not the family by heart they had been for four years but a family legally recognized by the law family – was going to grow.

Luke reached into the Force to see if he could sense the baby. The question of Force Sensitivity would be raised at a later time, but for now it was simply about the boy who would later be named Ben. Luke searched the Force, but he couldn’t sense anything more yet but the yellow gold and navy blue colours of Han and Leia.

And screaming in the Force that was the distress of that navy blue. Luke was shocked when he took in the quietly crying face of his sister. She was always the brave one, the strong one, so to see her so scared and vulnerable broke his heart.

“And you have our backs?” Leia whispered, scared of the answer.

And he pulled them both into a tearful, but quickly joyful hug.

“I’m going to be an Uncle!” Luke exclaimed as he took a turn just holding Leia and resting a hand on her belly to feel his nephew. He then pulled Han into a hug, “You’re going to be my brother.”

“I’ve always been your brother, Kid,” Han punched him in the arm as they pulled apart. “We’ll just have paperwork proving it.”

Shaking his head, Luke laughed and pulled Han and Leia into another hug. Soon their conversation devolved into plans of the future, of where they would all live, of whether the baby was a boy or girl – oddly enough Leia was the only one of them to end up being right with their guess of boy as Luke and Han both thought it would be a girl – of names, and who to call first with the happy news.

The war was over and it seemed like this baby would lead them onto the path of living happily ever after.

Luke sighed; if only he had known how wrong they had been.

Catching Luke’s look, Plutt offered, “Want to go check out the other bunk room?”

He nodded, “Sounds like a good idea.”
To put it plainly, Luke was very giddy the morning of the medal ceremony. Though inwardly he mourned Biggs, he was on such a high from destroying the Death Star.

“You saw the shot, right?” Luke was practically bouncing as he and Han prepped for the ceremony. Luke had spent the night on the Falcon, the Rebellion not actually having a room yet for Luke. “You saw me fire it?”

“Of course, I did.” Han rolled his eyes as he laid out his outfit for the ceremony. “Didn’t just wander off after I shot Vader.”

“Do you think he’s dead? How amazing would that be?”

“Wow, you’re morbid.”

“He killed my father.”

“He’s killed a good many fathers.”

An awkward expression crossed Han’s face, “Uh… Not sure. I never knew my family.”

Luke’s face fell. Though he was poor farmboy, at least he could say he had a family growing up. He didn’t know how to handle the idea of someone growing up without one.

“I’m sorry,” Luke settled on. “I’m sure they would be proud of you killing Vader.”

“Vader’s not dead, Kid. Sorry to burst your bubble, but he’s probably off on some Imperial ship right now, sulking and vowing revenge.” Han looked down at the clothing on his bed proudly, “What do you think? Fancy enough to get a medal?”

Luke regarded the black shirt, brown pants, and gold jacket, “Very nice. What about me? You think I should do this or the pilot’s outfit?”

Han frowned at the white outfit had been wearing the past few days, “Uh, don’t you have anything else other than the desert pyjamas?”

Luke reddened, “They’re not pyjamas.”

“Whatever they are, they’re way too casual. You have anything else?”

“I got the poncho.”

“No, you don’t. Leia burned it.”

Luke chuckled, “She didn’t burn it.”

Han arched a brow.

Luke paled, “She burned my poncho?”

“Said it was for the good of humanity or something. Almost got her hands on my vest too, but I put a stop to that.”
“But not my poncho?”

“Just drop it, Kid. Pick something else.”

Luke looked away, “I, uh… I don’t have anything else.”

Han scowled, “What did the old man not let you pack any clothes before you ran off to have an adventure?”

“No. Um, well the Empire was looking for the droids, and my aunt and uncle – the people who raised me, Dad was killed by Vader and my mother’s a question mark – had purchased the droids… The Empire burned down my home and murdered my aunt and uncle. I quite literally only have the clothes on my back.”

Han stared at Luke with a white face and slack-jawed shock.

Luke couldn’t meet his eyes.

Suddenly, Han’s arms were around Luke in a tight hug. Luke blinked in surprised, and opened his mouth to speak. He thought better of it, then smiled and patted Han’s shoulder, happy and thankful to take the comfort.

Han cleared his throat when he pulled away, “Don’t- Don’t tell Her Highness about that. Don’t want anyone getting the wrong idea about me… In the guy who likes hugging people type of way, not the, well you know, other way it could be taken. I’m not into… Not that there’s anything wrong with it if you are-”

“Are you implying I look like a-”

“No, of course not.” Han paused, “Are you?”

“Sort of,” Luke confessed. “It’s hard to explain. I know I am attracted to both men and women, but I don’t actually have any experience to back up those claims.”

“Gay, straight, or anything in-between, I’ll back you up anyway,” Han promised. “Just no pedophilia, bestiality, or incest.”

“Deal.”

Han then looked at his clothing laid out on the bunk, “Luke?”

“Yeah, Han?”

“Take my outfit.”

“What?”

“You’re the hero today, you deserve it. It’s a little too small for me anyways.”

“Han, I can’t take them from you. What would you wear?”

“Don’t worry about it,” Han waved off. “I’ll just… wear this.”

Luke regarded his scruffy attire, “That?”

“It’s what people will expect,” Han shrugged as Luke tried on the jacket. “I’ll just… shine my boots and do up the top button of my shirt. I’m sure Princess will understand. Besides, the jacket really looks good on you. Keep it.”

Luke grinned, the golden jacket fitting him perfectly. Then he pulled Han into a hug.

“Thanks Han,” Luke held him tightly. “I knew there was more to you than meets the eye.”

“Someone’s gotta keep a kid like you outta trouble.” Han considered his next words, “You might not have family anymore, Kid, but I promise... You got me. Promise.”

It was a promise Han would keep for the rest of his life.

“Alright, the ship is looking good, but there’s just one more spot to check out,” Plutt declared as they walked down the hall. “The roof. Show us where the hatch is. Kerlos, you and Vance will go up there.”

“Yes, Sir,” Kerlos replied.

Luke led them back through the lounge area and down the hall, right to the exit hatch.

“Careful,” he instructed as the pair opened the hatch. “The lift sometimes gets stuck.”

“I’m sure it’ll be fine,” Vance waved off.

And as he watched the pair go up the lift, Luke couldn’t help but remember a time it had broken.

He remembered the odd sight that night of Leia Organa sitting on the roof of the Millennium Falcon. It was the day after they arrived back to the Rebel Fleet, and they had spent said day explaining their three-month long absences, Luke’s AWOL adventure, introducing who the hell this Lando Calrissian man was, reporting what had happened to Captain Solo – during which the Alliance decided to promote him to General for his actions in protecting the Princess and the location of the fleet – and also dealing with that pesky situation of the fact Luke Skywalker had shown up missing a hand.

Luke shuddered as he remembered the horror-stricken looks of Wedge, Diego, Zev, and the rest of Rogue Squadron at the sight.

Arrangements were being made for Luke to be fitted with a replacement, and for now he walked around with a splint and a large cast on his right arm shaped to make it look like he still had a hand. There was no point in letting everyone know what happened until Luke’s injuries had been fully taken care of.

Luke knew he didn’t need an invitation to join Leia, but he still respectfully entered the Falcon and went through to the location of the roof hatch to join her. He called her name up at her to let her know of his presence, but Leia had always had a knack for sensing him anyway.

Some days Luke wondered if Leia had her own secret Jedi father.

“Mind if I join you?” Luke asked as Leia looked down at him through the hatch.

“It’s actually broken. You know, like everything on this ship, the lift had to break too.”
“How did you get up?”

“I climbed.”

“I could too.”

“Luke, don’t, you can’t possibly get up here with your hand… in its condition,” Leia ended awkwardly.

He glanced down at his splint in a little bit of shame.

“Not that there’s anything wrong with it,” Leia said quickly. “There are plenty of Rebels walking around with this and much worse.”

“I know. Apparently tomorrow they’re sending a one-armed pilot from the Tierfon Yellow Aces to give me a pep talk. Let me join you, Leia.”

“You can’t get up here, Luke.”

He grinned at the challenge, “Back up.”

Leia frowned, but obeyed. Luke couldn’t resist showing off what he had learned on Jakku and made an impressive jump up through the hatch and onto the roof.

“That’s amazing,” Leia grinned as she grabbed Luke’s (non-maimed) arm to steady him. “Is that what you learned on Dagobah?”

“Among other things,” Luke settled to sit beside her. They sat in silence for a while, thinking about the man to whom the ship below them belonged. “We’ll get him back, Leia.”

She was sitting with her knees to her chest and there was a glimmer of tears in her eyes.

“Luke…” Leia forced herself to say. “There’s something I have to tell you. While we were escaping Vader, Han and I… Something happened.”

He didn’t need her to say any more.

Leia nodded, looking almost ashamed of herself.

Luke swallowed hard, forcing back his bubble of emotions, and nodded.

“I understand,” he looked away from her.

“This wasn’t how I planned for it to go, Luke,” Leia explained. “One moment we were bickering and then the next… There was a kiss and I ran away. Then I cornered him, yelled at him to figure out what was going on with us, and we were together.”

Leia pulled her legs tighter to her chest.

“Before Vader froze him in carbonite, I told Han I loved him,” Leia confessed.

Luke bit his lip, “Did he tell you he loves you too?”

“No,” Leia let herself have a single chuckle. With a grin on her face, she told Luke, “I said ‘I love
Luke couldn’t help but laugh. “That sounds like Han alright.”

They let the silence linger once more.

“Are you okay?” Leia asked delicately.

“I’ll be fine,” Luke couldn’t bare to look at her. “I’m just surprised. I mean… Han.”

Leia sighed, “I shouldn’t want this. I don’t want this. The rational part of me is screaming at my heart, shouting what am I thinking. But the heart is no slave to logic, and as insane as it sounds, I am in love with Han Solo.”

Luke nodded slowly, “Alright. If that’s how you feel then I’m happy for you. My two best friends in the entire Galaxy falling in love. What more could I ask for?”

“Don’t apologize for feeling the way you do… But I just have one question.”

“What that?”

Luke took a deep breath and looked Leia straight in the eyes.

“Did I ever have a chance?” he asked boldly.

It took Leia a long time to answer.

“No.”

Luke looked away from her, “I see.”

Leia reached out and took his remaining hand, “I do love you, Luke… but not the way I love them. You mean so much more to me than just a friend, but deep down I know that this could never be anything romantic. You’re not my friend, not my lover… honestly, if I had to give it a name, deep down I’ve always felt like you were the brother I never had.”

Luke couldn’t help but burst out laughing, “The brother you never had? Are you trying to make this the most painful and stereotypical let down as possible. What next? It’s not you, it’s me?”

She grinned at him, “Of course not. Clearly I was going to go with there’s someone out there who is going to love you more than I ever could.”

“Well, if you happen to know where I can find said person, I would love to go meet them.”

“I’m sure I could set you up. Let’s see,” Leia thought hard for a minute, and then her face fell. “Huh.”

“What?”

“I literally cannot think of anyone.”

“You’re joking.”

“No. Not a single name comes to mind. Do I have any female friends?” Leia scowled. “…Wait, you date both men and women right?”

“Right.”

“Might have a guy for you then.”

Luke laughed and shook his head.

“Be the daughter of Anakin Skywalker?” Leia teased. “I’d be honoured.”

Luke’s eyes widened as he remembered Vader’s confession.

“What is it?” Leia always could sense when something was wrong with him.

She grinned, “And we’ll do it together.”

“Promise.”

Luke sighed as he looked around the ship. So many memories, so many people he had loved and lost. A life was shared upon this ship by their odd little family. In ways, the ship was exactly like their family: cobbled together by odds and ends and things that really shouldn’t go together, constantly breaking down, falling apart, and being put back together in unexpected ways. Absolute garbage to the outsider, but the best thing in the world to those who knew it personally.

“We got some haul but not much,” Plutt announced when they were finished.

But Luke knew there was something special in his peripheral. Something he would never reveal to Plutt and his goons. Something he prayed was still there.

“Looks like we’re done here,” Plutt declared.

Luke smiled; he knew he wasn’t.

My custom speeder. There’s nothing like it in the whole galaxy.

I made this fancy schematic like it came out of a factory.

- Rey’s Survival Guide

“There, done!” Rey proudly showed the picture to Teng three weeks later.

“It looks perfect,” Teng grinned as they eat dinner with the others. “Now to just find all the parts.”
“You two are really building a speeder?” Aletha smiled. “I’m impressed. Imagine if you can pull it off.”

“I’m sure they’ll do just fine,” Luke laughed. “Now the only thing left is if I’m up to letting Rey go off on her own with a speeder. We all know how that ended last time.”

“I still walk a little funny,” Teng said.

Rey blushed.

“Speaking of,” Aletha said, “if you two need anything at all, by all means go take it from Antar’s ship.”

The clattering of cutlery stopped.

“What?” Aletha frowned as four sets of eyes stared at her in utter shock.

“You’re telling us to go strip Antar’s ship?” Rey slowly repeated.

Teng was horrified, “I don’t want another forty-seven stitches.”

“No problem, Sunshine.”

“Exercise caution, but yeah, go ahead,” Aletha consented.

“Why?” Quom asked.

“Well, it’s not like it’s doing anything,” Aletha said. “Look, Antar’s dead and buried, and a good portion of it’s already scavenged-”

“Sorry,” Rey muttered.

“Might as well use the rest,” Aletha finished. “I think it’s what Antar would have wanted.”

Rey smiled, “Thank you.”

“No problem, Sunshine.”

“That’s very kind of you,” Luke smiled at Aletha and clasped her hand. He leaned in and whispered, “Would he really want that?”

“Oh, who knows? But I don’t really care. Love the man, but really didn’t know him that well.”

Luke shook his head and then pulled her to her feet, “I think we’re going to retire for the night.”

Quom and Teng gave a wolf whistle in perfect harmony, and Rey smacked both upside the head.

“It was a bad idea letting these two live together,” Luke said.

Aletha nodded, “Agreed.”

Luke found Rey sneaking off to the Falcon in the middle of the night that same way she had done every day she spent the night in Niima Outpost. Quom had no idea of Rey’s midnight adventures, though Luke mildly suspected Teng knew.

Usually Luke would let her go off on her own, but this night he decided to follow.
Luke had been holding off from returning to the Falcon until he was certain Plutt wasn’t guarding it. Since weeks had gone by with Rey making frequent visits, he knew he was in the clear.

The lights were on when Luke boarded the ship. He reached out and sensed her presence in the cockpit. It made him smile to know she couldn’t resist it. But he wasn’t ready to join her; his objective was something else.

Quietly he crept through the hallways, careful not to make a sound. He came to a panel of the wall, and with perfect practice removed it to find a secret closet. Luke grinned as he saw the contents within; he had hit the jackpot.

Clothing, weapons, even a few Holos, this closet was the proof of belonging to the Skywalker family. Luke eagerly dug through the closet to see what he could find. A shirt from Han, a skirt from Leia, a vest from Felicity, a pair of pants belonging to Luke. Ben’s gloves, five-year-old Rey’s shoes, an extra ammo belt for Chewie, some extra metal paneling for Artoo and Threepio in case of emergency. Han’s medal for the Battle of Yavin, Leia’s weapon belt from the war, some extra parts Luke used to repair his lightsaber. A Holo of Han and Leia’s wedding, a Holo of Luke and Felicity’s. A Holo of Lando and Alyla. One of Chewie, Malla, and Waroo. One of Artoo and Threepio with Threepio looking magnificent. Ben, Poe, and Rey hanging out by the lake on Rornian. Ammunition, maps, charts, and intel for the Resistance.

But one item made Luke’s heart stop.

With shaking hands, he withdrew a NN-14 Imperial issue blaster: the one that he once belonged to Brendan Rhiaon.

They had found it the day after the Burning of Rornian, discarded by Luke’s X-Wing. The gas cartridge was used up, so Felicity had no chance but the drop and fire her brother’s precious blaster.

To Luke’s surprise, it had been fixed and polished. It was in much better condition than the day Luke had thrown it against the wall in Felicity’s office.

Han had kept Felicity’s precious blaster in perfect condition.

Luke smiled and replaced it gently in the hidden closet. He was glad to see it was safe.

Before he was to replace the hidden panel, Luke looked down at the inside of it. Carved onto the metal were words:

---

RULES OF THE MILLENNIUM FALCON – Enforced as of 15 ABY

1. Do not question the Captain. He knows what he’s doing… most of the time.
2. If you are married to the Captain, you may question the Captain. Because she’s gonna do it anyway, so we may as well codify it.
3. No food or drink in the cockpit at anytime.
4. You get hair in the control panel, you clean it up, Chewie.
5. Felicity Rhiaon does not pilot this ship unless everyone else on board is dead, comatose, or unrevivable. Even then, seriously consider the amount of damage that would be done by a crash landing vs Fliss’ piloting.
6. Don’t complain about the shower.
7. Don’t complain about the hyperdrive breaking.
8. Don’t complain about the smell.
9. Don’t complain.
10. Reine Agim may only gamble against droids.
11. Felicity Rhiaon is not allowed to touch the plumbing.
12. Ben Solo may not use the blast remote without supervision.
13. If you break something, you’re the one fixing it.
14. Resign yourself to the fact that this ship will break down at the worst possible time.
15. Stop adding rules to this panel without my permission, Leia.

Luke laughed and slowly replaced the panel back on the wall. He was so grateful to see that some items from his former life had survived the chain of stealing. Perhaps someday he might be able to return the items to their rightful owners.

His heart sunk as he thought of the NN-14.

Not everything could return to their owners.

Rey was sitting in the captain’s chair, absorbed in the workings of this insanity called a cockpit when a voice spooked her.

“What in the galaxy do you think you’re doing?”

She bit her lip.

“Do I know this ship?”

Rey looked away in shame. She felt her father’s hand on her shoulder as crossed the room and sat in the co-pilot’s seat.

“There’s hair on the control panel,” Rey picked at a long golden-brown strand.

“Yes, there is,” Luke chuckled, running his hand across the controls.

“They’re very long. They kind of look almost like… Wookiee hair.”

“You’re a smart girl. They are Wookiee hairs.”

“That’s how I met Wookiees before Jakku, right?” Rey guessed.

“Yes, it is.” Luke closed his hand over hers, “Don’t go putting the pieces all together yet. I’m not ready for you to know the truth of our past.”

“I’ll try not to muddle over it too much, but I make no promises.”

They sat in silence for a long time.

“Dad?”

“Yes, Sweetheart?”

“Did this belong to my uncle?”

Luke’s head snapped to his left, “Excuse me?”

“I sort of came here a few weeks ago and I saw something,” Rey admitted. “It felt like a dream but it was real. I probably sound crazy.”

“No, not at all,” Luke assured her. He swallowed hard, trying to think of how to proceed, “What did you see?”

“Us… with a man. I was very little and sitting in your lap. We were playing at the Holotable when a man whose back was to me, so I couldn’t see his face. But you called him my Uncle… did this belonged to my uncle?”

Luke stared at her for a long time.

“Yes,” he finally admitted. “It belongs to your uncle, but please, Rey, I beg you, don’t push too far with this. We’re not ready. You’re not ready. I’m not ready.”

“I know,” Rey looked away. “I just want to know so much.”

“You will find out, but you’re still so young. One day you will learn everything. It’s going to happen a lot sooner than I’d like, I guarantee you that, but I swear to you, I’ll tell you everything.”

“Okay… Dad?”

“Yes, Rey?”

“Do you see visions too?”

“Yes.”

Rey looked at her father, “Are we normal?”

Luke grinned, “Not in the slightest. But it’s okay, normal is boring.”

“I’m scared of these visions.”

“Have you had any others?”

“I don’t think so.”

“Let me know, and I’ll help guide you through them. Perhaps we should start getting you to seriously meditate; it helps control them. But Rey, I need you to promise me one thing.”

“What’s that?” she asked.
“I made the same mistake I’m about to warn you about, so I know what I’m talking about.” He looked down at his false hand, “Because I didn’t heed this advice, I lost my hand, and I’m going to be very upset if you lose one too.”

“I will be upset to.”

“Good. Rey, I need you to know that sometimes what you see in these visions, aren’t real. They won’t come to pass, and don’t need to. I want you to promise that every time you see something, you will stop and seriously evaluate them. Don’t just throw yourself headfirst in saving someone because of a false vision. Promise me you’ll think about them first, Rey.”

“If it means saving my hand?” Rey smiled and clasped her father’s false appendage, “Of course I’ll promise.”

Luke pulled her in for a tight hug.

“This is so weird, Dad,” Rey said as she pulled apart from him. “We can really see the future?”

“Sort of. It’s always in motion, and sometimes it’s not the future, but rather the past or something going on elsewhere in the galaxy, and like I said, sometimes it’s a lie. Be very careful on trusting them.”

“I’ll tell you about every one I get.”

“Good.” Luke glanced at the control panel, “Oh, what is this? This wasn’t here three weeks ago. Why would Plutt do that?”

“What?” Rey frowned.

“This,” Luke pointed to a small part on the panel. “Unkar Plutt put a compressor on the ignition line.”

“Well, that has to be a mistake.”

“Why’s that?” Luke always liked to get Rey to explain what was wrong with a machine to test her knowledge and see if she could figure out how to fix things.

“It puts too much stress on the hyperdrive,” Rey answered.

“Good girl. And where would on go to disable the compressor?”

“Here!” Rey stood, pulled down something and pointed at the correct piece. She saw her father’s proud smile. “What?”

“You wanna learn to fly a ship?” he asked.

“What, this one?”

“We wouldn’t go anywhere today, but you want to learn the controls?”

“Absolutely!” Rey raced back to the pilot’s chair and eagerly strapped herself in. “What do we do first?”

So Luke spent the rest of his night teaching his daughter how to fly the Millennium Falcon and making his long wanted dream come true.
Chapter End Notes

Coming Up Next Chapter…

Taking a Stand

When an unexpected comm call comes to Jakku, Aletha has to make a difficult choice, and Teng finds he’s got it bad for Rey.
Taking a Stand

Chapter Summary

Aletha makes a difficult decision, Roke trolls Luke, and Teng chooses the worst moment to be shirtless.

Chapter Notes

Warning for anyone who doesn’t like underage content, the next several chapters do frankly discuss two teenagers desiring, imagining, and participating in an increasingly physical and sexual relationship. Said teenagers are two years apart, and most of the physical stuff takes place when Rey is 16/17 and Teng is 18/19, but please know that things are going to happen in the upcoming chapters. I’m going to go literally less hardcore with them due to their ages than I do with Luke, but there will be AO3 versions involving them.

See the end of the chapter for more notes.

The Long Way Home

Chapter Thirty-Eight

Taking a Stand

AGE FOURTEEN

Before you came to Jakku, I bet you thought it was small and unimportant. And you were right.

- Rey’s Survival Guide

The walker was practically abandoned during Rey’s fourteenth year of life. Luke’s cot had been permanently moved into Quom and Teng’s tent for Rey, while Luke spent every night with Aletha. They didn’t always make love, but Luke enjoyed sleeping with Aletha in his arms. It wasn’t unusual for a resident of Niima Outpost to come into Aletha’s tent with an injury and find Luke Erso sleeping at her side.

It was a lazy morning, one where Aletha begged Luke to get up and go scavenging so he could come home to her sooner, but somehow they just couldn’t get out of bed.

“Come on, tell me,” Aletha urged, lying on her side.
She and Luke were covered by the blankets, wearing only sleep pants, and Aletha wearing a simple tank top with hers. Her golden and grey hair was down, spilling over her shoulders in a positively lovely image as her hands roamed playfully over Luke’s muscular form.

“I’m not telling you,” Luke chuckled before sneaking a line of kisses along her collarbone.

“Why not?”

“Because what good will come out of it?”

“Did you tell Felicity?”

Something heavy clung to the air. Though Aletha’s voice had been easygoing, her words had an unintentional coldness to them.

“I’m sorry,” Aletha looked down shyly. “I didn’t mean- It’s not a jealousy thing. I’m just curious.”

He kissed her shoulder, “I know what you meant. I suppose I can regale you with the list. Just please don’t judge me for the length of it. I’ve never been the greatest at relationships, and screwed up a lot of good things.”

“Or picked the wrong lover?”

“You have no idea how bad some of my decisions were.”

“Well, since I brought it up, how about I go first?”

“Honestly Aletha, I’m not sure I want to hear the list of your romances.”

“Too bad because I’m telling,” Aletha grinned.

Luke sighed, but a small grin was on his lips, “Alright. Tell me the list.”

“Well, I was a loner when I was a teenager – Alecta made sure of that – so my first romance wasn’t until I was in Med School. His name was Cander Burkan; he was the most handsome and popular student in the program. I never thought he’d even look my way, but, um… he ended up being my first in pretty much all departments. Those he didn’t achieve were fulfilled by you and Antar.”

Luke couldn’t help but give her a wicked grin.

“You are certainly a surprising man, Luke Erso,” Aletha chuckled.

“So was Cander instantly swept off his feet by your beauty?”

The smile on Aletha’s face fell, “No. He – like most of my stories – is not a happy tale.”

Luke winced, fearful of hearing once more than someone had hurt Aletha so badly. Recognizing what was to come, she took his hand and held it tight.

“We were partners on a project,” Aletha told the tale. “We were studying in my dorm. Anatomy… Things became hands on. I thought it meant something, but I ended up being nothing more than a tale to regal his friends with. I became something of a joke in my program as the silly girl who thought Cander Burkan liked her, and it followed me into the military. We were assigned to the same Medic Unit, and he would brag about conquering General Anthea’s little sister. I would hear the snickers in the hall about Burkan taking my virginity.”

“It was humiliating… and then Alecta found out. He wasn’t a problem after that.”

“What happened?”

“She beat him so badly that he was permanently confined to a wheelchair. Broke his spine, ribs, punctured organs. She showed him why the other officers feared her.”

Luke’s mind flashed to the image of Phasma beating a bound and gagged Felicity Rhiaon. The woman was truly someone to fear.

“But she didn’t do it for me,” Aletha whispered. “She didn’t care that he hurt me. Alecta just wanted people to stop insulting her with the whole business. She told me that if I ever made a mess like that again she would have no qualms over killing me and whatever boyfriend I dragged down with me. She acted like I had dated someone as bad in her eyes as Luke Skywalker.”

Luke shifted uncomfortably, “And after that?”

“Didn’t get involved with anyone until the Rebellion. I had a short relationship with a man from my Batch named Arslan Orden. He was a pilot and we met after he got shot in the arm.”

“Another pilot with an arm injury. You have an odd type.”

“Guilty.”

“How did it end?”

“Like a lot of Rebellion relationships; he was killed in battle. I met Antar a few months later. In the years before we got together, I had two one-night stands, one with a mechanic named Zek Deccol, and the other with a pilot named Cyan Roeder. Antar was after that.”

“Couple,” Aletha admitted. “There was a merchant named Tomax L’hnmar who reintroduced me to passion, but it eventually fizzled out. We parted on good terms, and later he had a falling out with Plutt, so he stopped coming to Jakku. I had a one-night stand with Varon Qorbin a year later, and then Bando Piorgil about three years after that. Then… no one but you. That’s where my list ends.”

“Not bad. Definitely shorter than mine.”

“Oh really? Do tell.”

“Disclaimer, I haven’t slept with everyone I’m about to name… but I have most of them,” Luke confesed.

“My man got around in his youth, did he?” Aletha teased.

“We were in a war. We thought we could die any day. Things happen.”

“Alright, who was first?”

“Growing up I had a crush on my best friend-”

“What’s her name?” Aletha asked.

“Why? Do I know him?”

“Yes.”

Aletha blinked, “Oh.”

Luke chuckled, “But my first romance was Nakari Kelen.”

“Like Kelen Biolabs?”

“The owner’s daughter. She was beautiful, hot tempered, and a terrible cook. She called compliments sugar and asked me to give it to her quite a bit. Hell of a sniper too—”

“So your type is snipers then?” Aletha glanced at her rifle in the corner.

“Not quite. Sure, two of my top three have been snipers, but it’s not a requirement to my heart,” Luke answered. “She did do one thing that made me uncomfortable, and that was shooting again someone she had shot dead to make sure they were. I understand the logic, but it always seemed a little cold blooded. Nakari Kelen was my first love.”

“She died before you told her,” Aletha remembered.

“Yes… It was months before I dated again. This time a pretty little analyst name Kara Raan. She was also killed in battle. If I had to rank the people I loved, she would be my number five.”

“Oh? And what is this top five ranking? Obviously Felicity was number one, but the others?”

“I’ll tell you when I’m done. My next girlfriend was Tadia Bendix. We dated for a few months and then I told her that I was also attracted to men, and she took off.”

“I’m sorry she did that to you.”

“I’m sorry Cander treated you worse.”

“Who was after Tadia?”

“Riyan Terius,” Luke smiled. “First man I loved. He showed me things I never thought I could feel. Dated him for a few months under two years and honestly, I thought I might end up with him… until Darth Vader murdered him.”

Aletha put a hand on his arm, “I’m so sorry.”

“I loved him so much. After that, after losing so many lovers, I stopped doing relationships. Oh, I tried. I managed two months with Kiandra Sode, and one with Hosh Hune, but after that it was a series of one night stands. Daska Tarven, Leo Forto, Jemmila Hibliss, Isabeau Marr, Crevan Sekel. It wasn’t until the war ended that I met Beka Alavai and I started dating again. I was very fond of Beka, but she couldn’t live the life I was pursing,” Luke shook his head at the memory. The uncertainty of his life as a Jedi proved too much for Beka. “Ellona Katarn was after her, but we fell out of love after about five months. Dayana Terek was three years. I almost proposed too, but a… friend of mine disapproved.”

It was years before Tyla Kinall had admitted to Luke she had threatened to kill Dayana if she didn’t leave him. Luke was furious when he found out, but by then he was happily with Felicity, and Dayana was married with a few children, so there wasn’t much cause for reconciliation.
“Next was Satana Puto, who cheated on me and my sister almost murdered her for it. Tej’al Soduntis was fun, but he wasn’t the one for me. Then a series of men and women who lasted at most two months, and honestly I can’t even remember their names. One day I woke up and found that I was almost thirty and still alone.”

Aletha raised an eyebrow, “Cue Felicity?”

Luke grinned, “Yes, but… not romantically at first. It wasn’t until almost a year later that we started to date. I mean, I tried asking her out at one point, but it turned out she was dating someone else, so I ended up dating Doctor Calla Jastara… The biggest mistake of my life.”

“What happened?”

“She ended up being insane. Accused me of incest and polygamy, accused me of cheating on her, tried to burn down my office when I broke up with her, and then took out a hit on my sister via the Hutt Clan when she learned I was dating Felicity. Thank goodness Felicity came next, because after that I was done with the whole dating thing and probably would have settled down with anyone.”

Aletha laughed, “Not that Felicity apparently didn’t have her own version of insanity.”

“Yes, she did,” Luke grinned. “That brings us to the end of the list: Felicity and then you.”

Aletha lifted a brow, “Oh really?”

“Really.”

“Then where does Sienna come into play?”

Luke paled, “You weren’t supposed to remember that.”

He sighed, “She was a woman I met on the night of Felicity’s birthday, after Felicity had been killed. I was very vulnerable that night and we were both so drunk… There was nothing more than a kiss, but we did almost sleep together.”

“Luke… I’m so sorry.”

“Oh, you haven’t even heard the worst part yet.”

“What could be worse than that?”

He hesitated, “Sienna… looked almost exactly like Felicity.”

“I know. I’m awful. I should never have… I don’t know what to say. Felicity would murder me if she ever found out what I did. I just… I missed her so much.”

“And that’s why you break things off with me if your mind goes to Felicity.”

“Exactly. Aletha, please, promise me you’ll never tell a soul about what I did. I’m so ashamed.”

Aletha lifted herself up to kiss Luke’s forehead.

“Your secret is safe with me.” She stroked his cheek, “Now… what about this list? Your top five?”
“You sure you want to hear it?”

“Is Sienna on it?”

“Absolutely not.”

“Then go for it.”

“The top five loves of my life are as follows—”

“Felicity is number one,” Aletha started.

“Fine, yes, Felicity is number one, but calm down, we’ll get there.” Luke shook his head at her, “Alright, so number five: Kara Raan. Number four: Riyan Terius. Number three: Nakari Kelen.”

“Yes, Felicity is my number one, but you… you’re second place. I’m sorry I can’t give you more.”

She closed her eyes. Aletha hadn’t expected to overtake Felicity, but it still was bittersweet to hear Luke so resolutely call her his second best. She wished so desperately to hear a man call her his be all, end all, first pick of the draft. But Aletha knew the truth; she was nothing more than a silver contender.

Luke’s hands were upon her teary cheek, “I do love you. Please don’t think I don’t.”

“My grandfather always told me that you get three great loves of your life: your first love, your last love, and your true love. Some people are lucky to have only one or two people for the positions, but I’ve had three amazing women in those roles. Nakari Kelen is my first love, Felicity is my true love, but I swear to you Aletha, you will be the last woman I ever fall in love with. I swear to you: my heart is your forever, and if you’ll have me, I will spend my life with you until the end of our days.”

Aletha couldn’t help but smile, “You can’t promise that.”

“I just did.”

“Oh really? Well, what if Felicity magically comes back from the dead? Then what are you going to do? Be with me? Or be with her?”

Luke thought about it.

“Is polygamy an option?”

He was answered with a squeal and a pillow to the face.

“Well, someone had a late morning.”

Luke and Aletha couldn’t stop their blushes as Quom and Rey found them exiting her tent after the pair had already returned from scavenging.

“Shut up, Quom,” Aletha muttered as she hugged Rey good morning.
“Trust me, we could be seeing a lot worse,” Rey teased. “Aletha can you help me this afternoon?”

“What’s up?”

“My clothes are getting pretty tight,” Rey tugged at the tunic that was starting to ride up. “I need some help finding a vendor to sell me some new ones.”

“Why don’t you use Melara?” Luke nodded at Aletha’s neighboring clothing vendor, who at the words new clothes had started to frantically wave at Rey.

“Well, it’s uh,” Rey looked at the ground. “More of a girl thing. Things in the chest area are starting to chafe.”

“We can definitely take care of that, Rey,” Aletha smiled. “In fact, I’ve already been sussing out where I can get your first bra.”

“You know,” Quom said, “I didn’t vote for this let’s be open about puberty policy you lot instated.”

Aletha glared at him, “I know. You sent poor Teng to me utterly ashamed of himself when he had his issue two nights ago.”

“Hey, I changed his sheets for him!” Quom objected. “I just didn’t want to start answering questions about his wet dreams.”

Rey blushed. She didn’t want to know this about her best friend either.

“It’s a perfectly natural thing that happens to boys his age,” Aletha said.

“Not Vrogem,” Quom crossed his arms.

“Vrogem are weird, Uncle Quom,” Rey shot.

“No, not Vrogem,” Luke said. “Just Quom.”

“I’m one of a kind,” he grinned.

“Thank goodness,” Rey muttered.

“Alright, I’ll take Rey today. Luke why don’t you go have a man to man chat with Teng to counteract the damage Quom caused. And Rey you help me tie Quom to a tent pole to prevent him from causing anymore trouble.”

“Hey!”

“Careful, Aletha,” Rey grinned. “We don’t want to set the precedent of that option.”

“MG, you are fourteen years old now. Old enough for me to start getting revenge,” Quom warned.

“Do you just threaten my daughter?” Luke asked in a very even tone.

Quom gulped; while he knew Luke was probably just messing with him, part of him wasn’t 100 percent sure and afraid of mauling via Jedi.

“What if I just tied myself to the tent pole?” Quom offered.

“Come on, Sunshine,” Aletha slung an arm around Luke’s waist as she smiled at Rey. “Let’s go find you a good clothing vendor.”

The group started walking down the dusty street, casually chatting about current events. Rey was delivering her latest report on progress with her speeder when they passed the Niima Outpost Comm Station. They didn’t notice Roke exiting the station, looking wildly around the street, and his eyes set on the group.

“Hey! Get over here!” Roke yelled.

The group didn’t particularly care to be yelled at by Roke, so they assumed it wasn’t about them and continued on ignoring him.

“Oi!” Roke barked. “Kymeri! Tinadar! Ersos! Stop!”

“Damn,” Aletha muttered as they slowed to a halt.

“What is it, Roke?” Luke turned to face Roke, who was walking up to them.

“And please be quick about it so we don’t have to waste too much time with you.”

“And to think people think the two of you are a pair of innocent balls of sunshine,” Roke snarled. “I hate playing messenger boy, but there’s a call for you.”

Rey frowned, “A call?”

“From who?” Quom asked.

“Excuse me?” he whispered. “Sister?”

“At least she claims to be so,” Roke grinned. “I did notice a family resemblance.”

Luke’s heart was pounding in his ears. Leia was calling him? How did she know where to find him? Was it because of the Falcon? Did she know about Rey? Did the First Order? He couldn’t believe it. He wouldn’t believe it!

“It can’t be,” Luke breathed heavily. “How did she find us?”

Roke shrugged, “Don’t know and don’t actually care. Now can someone go talk to her, or are we just going to leave her hanging on the line? Plutt wants that line clear ASAP. We’ve got vendors calling in today, so hurry up!”

Luke just stood froze at a loss of what to do while Quom and Aletha watched him with uncertainty.

No one noticed Rey silent in the corner until she said, “Dad?”

Luke’s head whipped to the right. Fear filled his eyes.

“Rey,” he whispered. “Rey, I…”
But Luke didn’t have the words.

Thankfully, Rey did.

“You have a sister?” Rey’s words weren’t truly a question, just a disbelieving statement of fact.

Luke opened and closed his mouth a few times. He settled on a nod.

“You have a sister,” Rey repeated, chewing over the concept in her mind. Tiny threads were tying pieces of a mystery together, trying to put together a clearer picture of her past. “This sister... Is she married to one of my uncles?”

He was glad Rey was taking the lead on this. She was starting to be old enough to understand the situation, but not fully yet.

“Uncle Brendan or Uncle Freighter?”

“Uncle Freighter,” Luke answered with the term they had started to refer to Han by. Of course, Rey didn’t know that Han was Han, but she knew that she had an uncle who owned that junky Corellian freighter.

“Is that sister one of blood or is Uncle Freighter the blood relative, and she related by marriage?”

“She’s my younger sister, and he married into the family via her,” Luke explained. “You share no blood with him.”

“Can I…” Rey bit her lip. “Can I know her name?”

Luke closed his eyes, “No.”

Rey tried to hide her pain as she looked away, “I see.”

Aletha untangled herself from Luke’s embrace, and pulled Rey into a hug.

Luke watched his beloved comfort his daughter, and smiled a little at the sight. He turned to Quom, who was watching the scene with an uncharacteristic severity. The Vrogem’s eyes met Luke’s, and Quom nodded.

He knew Quom was right.

“I’ll go talk to her,” Luke announced. “We’ll all talk and figure this out afterwards. I promise.”

“I believe you,” Rey said.

Luke smiled and nodded once more.

He had taken two steps away from the group when Roke called out to him.

“What are you doing?” Roke asked.

Luke frowned, “Going to talk to my sister?”

Roke gave a very loud and very planned out laugh, “Oh, I’m sorry, did you think I meant your sister? It’s Kymeri’s.”
“What?” Aletha exclaimed.

“Your sister Adrinna is on the line,” Roke grinned. “I’m sorry for the confusion.”

Four pairs of glaring eyeballs disagreed with his sincerity.

“I suppose I should go talk to her,” Aletha awkwardly untangled herself from the very confused Rey.

“Hurry up, would you?” Roke snapped at her. “I’ve got places to go.”

“I know where you can go,” Quom muttered.

Roke just laughed, patted Quom on the shoulder, and strolled off. Quom burned holes in the back of Roke’s head as he walked away.

“Go, talk to your sister,” Luke instructed. “We’ll see you at the shop later.”

Aletha kissed his cheek and then scampered off into the Comm station.

Luke sighed, “Alright, Rey, I have to go talk to Plutt about Roke. I’m paying him way too much to have this sort of thing pulled on me. Why don’t you go see if Ivano scrounged up those parts for your speeder he promised, and we’ll have a nice long talk about this whole sister thing later?”

“Sounds good.”

He watched her for a minute, “Are you mad at me?”

Rey shrugged, “I don’t know. I don’t think so, but maybe I’m a little… disappointed? I don’t know what to think.”

Luke reached out and grabbed her hand, “Just please remember that any information I hold back is simply for your own good.”

“But why can’t I know the names of my aunt and uncle? What, would I recognize them?”

“Yes,” he said simply.

Rey blinked, “Oh.”

Silence filled the air for a long stretch.

Luke sighed, walked over to Rey, and lifted her chin, “I promise you… it will all make sense someday. Please, just trust me.”

“I do.” She gripped his hand, “I always will.”

The hugged tightly, and when they drew back, they both were smiling.

“Run along,” Luke smiled. “Go have fun working on your speeder. We’ll talk later.”

“I love you, Dad.”

“I love you too, Sweetheart.”

And with that, Rey was gone.

Luke sighed as he watched her go, “Well, this is a real fine mess I’ve gotten myself into, right
“Quom?”

There was no answer.

“Quom?” Luke frowned and turned to look at his friend.

The Vrogem was stalking away angrily in the other direction.

“Where are you going?” Luke called after him.

“To cut Roke’s breaks.”

For some reason, Luke didn’t feel the need to stop him.

Don’t miss the repulsorlifts – I scavenged a bunch of those for my speeder.

-Rey’s Survival Guide

“Teng?” Rey called as she entered Quom’s tent. She looked around the workshop, “Where are you?”

“Under here,” an olive-skinned arm stuck out from under the bulky, red work-in-progress.

Rey grinned and set down her satchel, “How’s our baby?”

“Exhaust pipe is rusted, so I’ve been having to give her a little underbelly work. I’ve almost got it.”

“Good. I was able to scrape up some good parts with Dad this morning. I also got those parts from Ivano that he offered us. Oh, Teng, just wait until you hear what happened at the Comm Station today. Operation Uncle Unravel just got very interesting.”

“I’m all ears. Unless your dad is around?”

“Nah. He’s got some business to attend to. Quom back yet?”

“Briefly. He popped his head in, and then left mumbling something about Roke’s speeder.”

“Then hurry up, will you? I need someone to help unload the trunk of Dad’s speeder.”

“Alright, Alright. I’m coming.”

And then Teng rolled out from under the machine.

Rey had never appreciated exactly how athletic and muscular Teng had become in recent years. Not until he stood before her completely shirtless in the hot Jakku sun…as the sweat glistened down his body.

“Oh, um…” Rey struggled for words.

Teng scowled in confusion. Then he noticed where Rey’s eyes were directed, and he looked down at himself.

“Sorry,” Teng blushed. “It’s pretty hot out, so I just thought I’d strip down some layers.”
“Right,” Rey said, her eyes for some reason glued on Teng’s chest. “Have you been working out?”

“Yeah, your dad has been teaching me a few things. Said he needed a workout buddy to keep him in shape.”

“Well, it’s certainly going well for you.”

Rey didn’t know why she was biting her lip. Teng just looked so… She had no idea. All Rey knew is that for some reason she wanted to make it illegal for Teng to ever put on a shirt again.

Teng on the other hand, did know what Rey was feeling. There was a hunger in her eyes and a blush to her cheeks. It was the same that rose on him every time Rey bent over in front of him, her outgrown clothing riding up to expose some midriff, or perhaps the occasional time when the neckline of her tunic allowed him a further down peek than he should be allowed to have.

If he were a braver, bolder man, he would grab her by the waist and pull her into a passionate kiss then and there. But he was not a particularly brave man, just a boy enamored with one Rey Erso, and would follow her to the ends of the universe if she asked him. Anything to make her as happy as she made him.

“Did you want me to put back on my shirt?” Teng offered.

“No,” Rey said quickly. She was surprised at her own answer, and tried to fumble an excuse, “I wouldn’t want you to be uncomfortable.”

“Neither do I want you. Hence the offer.”

“I- I’m fine, Teng,” Rey smiled. “We are friends after all.”

“Right,” he nodded. “Friends.”

Teng didn’t dare admit what he had come to realize in the past year: that he would do anything to be more than just a friend to her. But he didn’t want to risk ruining the friendship they did have with any unfounded declarations. For all he knew, Rey Erso had no interest in him romantically or physically whatsoever.

…Though the way she was biting her bottom lip was promising.

“So, how’s our baby?” Rey approached the speeder to examine it.

“She’s doing well,” Teng reported, proudly running a hand over the new red paintjob. “Still got a list as long as my arm of parts to get her, but we’re on track.”

“Glad to hear it.” Rey frowned as Teng rubbed the space between his shoulder and neck, “Your shoulder still hurting?”

“Yeah. Aletha said I strained my trapezius muscle – the part between the neck and shoulder. Or at least I think that’s what she called it.”

“Is it bad?”

“No. She said I should be good if I lay off scavenging for a week, try to put a cool cloth on it if I could manage getting ice or cold water, and to just massage it a little if it hurts a lot. She’s got me on some painkillers for a couple days.”

“Is it hurting a lot now?”
“Yeah, but I can handle it,” Teng assured her. “Let’s go unload your dad’s speeder.”

“Absolutely not!” Rey refused. “I’m not having you do heavy lifting with a busted shoulder.”

“You need help unloading.”

“And you need that trapeze massaged.”

“Trapezius.”

“Whatever,” Rey shook her head. “It needs to be done, Teng.”

“Then give me a minute to rub it, or do you want to massage it for me?” Teng sarcastically asked.

“Alright.”

Teng was thrown off the mark when a second later Rey was rubbing his bare shoulder, her body only inches from his own.

“Rey,” Teng was startled. He could feel her hot breath on his chest as she stood facing him, concentrated on her massage.

“You’re very tense,” she said. “Is something stressing you out?”

Her hands were magic on her bare skin, and she was standing so close he had front row tickets to the inappropriate cleavage show.

“Maybe a little,” Teng’s voice was a pitch higher than before his voice had dropped two years ago.

She continued to rub his shoulder so calmly and easily as if she were sorting screws and bolts. Teng struggled not to let her in on how much he was enjoying it, though a few moans did escape his throat.

He couldn’t tear his eyes from her lips. They were small, pink, and chapped. Those lips that would stretch into such a perfect smile, would help her form amazingly intelligent and witty words. Those lips that had a tiny impression of tooth marks left on the bottom one, a hint at her shared desire.

“Rey,” Teng whispered.

Her hands stilled, and she looked up at him, “Yes?”

Teng wasn’t a bold man, but he was a brave one. He knew he would only have one shot at this, and it was a great gamble. If things went wrong, he could lose his best friend.

But if things went right… he had to take the chance.

Very slowly, Teng started to lean forward to kiss those beautiful lips.

“There!” Quom exclaimed suddenly bursting into the tent.

Teng ripped himself back before Rey or Quom could realize what he had just attempted.

“Quom?” Rey said.

“I showed him, MG,” Quom said proudly as he deposited his satchel on a workbench. “Let’s see if Roke messes with me after that.”
“You know he’ll still do it,” Rey replied.

“Yeah, but at least he’ll now think twice.”

Quom turned and finally took in the sight of Rey Rhiaon Skywalker standing inches apart from Teng Malar, with her hands on his shirtless, muscular body.

“Oh…” he scowled. “Have I been transported five years into the past, because I’m pretty sure I’ve already walked in on something like this once.”

“Hey guys?” Luke then ducked into the tent. “Why isn’t the speeder unloaded yet? I thought Rey was going to-“

Luke froze when he caught sight of his daughter and Teng.

“Dad!” Rey blushed and took a step away from Teng. “Sorry, Teng’s shoulder was hurting and I was just helping check it out.”

Luke and Quom exchanged a look.

“Alright then,” Luke dare not press the issue further. “Has Aletha come back yet?”

“No yet,” Rey answered.

“Dang.” He sighed, “I wonder what this is all about?”

“What, what’s all about?” Teng asked.

Rey answered, “Well, Aletha-“

She came into his embrace, his arms wrapping around her waist as she placed her hands on his chest, “Luke, I have to talk to you. Privately. Now!”

“Of course.”

As Luke attempted to herd Aletha towards the exit, she stopped and looked at Rey.

“Rey, I want you to go to the walker right now,” Aletha ordered.

She frowned, “What?”

“I want you to go to the walker, and stay there… And make sure you’re armed.”

Aletha took a deep breath, “It’s Phasma. She’s coming here.”

“I’ll take her to the walker,” Quom immediately grabbed his and Rey’s satchels. “Come on, Rey.”

“Uncle Quom, what’s going on?” Rey looked frantically around the room. She didn’t understand what was happening, but she could sense something was wrong. “Who’s Phasma?”

“Everything will be explained later,” Luke promised. “Quom, make sure you and Rey are armed. If they come-”

“I won’t let them get her,” Quom vowed.

“Should I come with you two?” Teng asked, equally confused by the situation.

“No. The less you’re involved, the safer you are,” Luke answered.

“Rey, go start my speeder,” Quom ordered. “I’ll get us armed.”

“Come on, Luke,” Aletha tugged on his arm. “We need to talk.”

“Of course.” He took a moment to hug Rey and kiss her forehead, “I love you, Sweetheart.”

“I love you too, Daddy.”

And with that, Luke, Aletha, and Rey exited the tent.

“Come on, Teng. You may not be coming with us, but you can help me prep and load the weapons.” Quom stopped as he once again took in the state of Teng’s appearance, “Why are you shirtless?”

“It’s hot out,” Teng shrugged.

“Oh come on, put on a shirt,” Quom picked up Teng’s, which was lying on the floor. “What, were you born in a barn?”

Teng frowned, “Actually, yeah. I was.”

Quom blinked, silent for a moment.

“Huh.”

Silence filled the tent.

“Oh, put on a damn shirt,” Quom threw the shirt at him.

But to quote Mashra, nobody will pay you if you’re dead.

- Rey’s Survival Guide

“Aletha, what is going on?” Luke demanded as they entered her tent. “Phasma’s coming?”

“My sister, Alecta,” Aletha set about putting up the black sheet. “You said that was her First Order name, right?”

“Yeah.”

“Well, she’s found me. She’s found me, Luke!”

“How?”

Aletha sighed, “Adrinna said that Alecta was looking at the case file for your wife’s capture, and my name was written down. She mustn’t have recognized me when she beat me, but the Stormtroopers would have gotten my name for her report later.”

Luke ran a hand through his hair, “I can’t believe this. Does she know about Rey and I?”

“I don’t think so, but we can’t discount the possibility.”

“How long do we have to act?”

“I don’t know. Adrinna said Alecta would come for me when she could get away from the First Order for a while. Luke, if she comes for me, she’ll kill me.”

He didn’t know what to do, “Couldn’t Adrinna talk her out of it?”

Aletha looked away in shame, “She told me she wouldn’t. Said she has six children and two grandchildren to think about. To protect from Alecta. If she turns against Alecta, she puts them all at risk, and she said…”

She didn’t finish her sentence.

Aletha took a deep breath and remembered Adrinna’s terrible words, “She said I wasn’t worth it. That I deserved it for my involvement with Athena’s death.”

“You had nothing to do with the Death Star.”

“I know! I told her that, but… but she doesn’t care. She said I betrayed the family, and she wasn’t willing to stick her neck out any further than giving me a head’s up. I don’t know what your relationship with your sister is like, Luke… but I know it’s nothing like mine.”

Luke sighed and held her hands, “What are we going to do?”

“I don’t know,” Aletha looked away from him. She squeezed his hands tightly, “But there is another issue that we’re not discussing.”

“If Phasma comes here… she’ll find Rey and I.”

“I can’t let that happen.”

“Neither can I.”

“Then what do we do? Can we… Can we go somewhere? Take Rey, Quom, and Teng and flee somewhere safe?”

Luke thought about Ahch-to, “I do know one place, but…”
“But what?” Aletha asked.

“It was the place I originally planned to go before coming to Jakku. I’ve left a map with a friend, and explicitly told him that I was going there. If they find that out, they’ll come right for us.”

“We’ll make sure to keep an ear out for First Order movements towards the planet.”

“That won’t work. It’s a lost system with no forms of technology or civilization. The only thing really there are porgs.”

“Porgs?”

“Sort of birdlike rodents I guess you would describe them,” Luke explained. “I only know of this place because Felicity and I went on our honeymoon there. Actually, Felicity tried to steal a porg. Stuck it in her bag, and lied that she didn’t know what I was talking about.”

Aletha couldn’t help but laugh, “So this planet is out of the question then?”

“It would seem so.”

“Then where do we go. We can’t stay here.”

“This was the safest place to keep Rey. Trust me, I’ve thought about this a lot. The most obvious place that it would be the least obvious, and the least obvious that it would be the least obvious.”

“But Alecta is coming here for me,” Aletha said.

“Do you know how long we have?” Luke asked.

“Could be months, or it could be hours. Depends on when she can get away.”

Luke sighed, “What are we going to do? I can’t leave Jakku, but we can’t stay if Phasma’s coming.”

And then Aletha thought of the idea that would forever change their lives.

“What if we go somewhere where there was dozens of people able to protect us?”

Luke frowned, “What are you talking about?”

“What if we don’t retreat? Stop playing defense and start an offensive attack? What if we met them head on. Said here we are, here is Rey, we’ll fight you for her.”

Luke had a bad feeling about this, “Do you mean-”

“Let’s join the Resistance.”

Silence clung to the room as horror filled Luke’s body.

“Aletha,” he whispered. “No, we can’t. I can’t.”

“You have to!” she insisted. “For Rey. Listen, there’s dozens of people in the Resistance who would be able to protect her. If we hide her behind layers of safety and soldiers-”

“I had nearly fifty people protecting her when she was five. They burned down my home, slaughtered all of them, and murdered my wife.”

Aletha fell silent. It was the first time Luke had told her straightforward what had happened to bring him to Jakku. He always had used vague terms when discussing his past, but now... Now she could understand the horror.

"Don’t you understand?" Luke whispered. "Until she’s strong enough to protect herself, Jakku is the safest place to be. To be hidden with me where no one knows about it. Not even my own family. I cannot bring Rey to the Resistance. If I do that, I might as well just stay here and wait for Phasma to find us."

Aletha swallowed hard, “But Luke... if I stay, they’ll find her.”

“And if I go, they’ll find her too.”

“Then what do we do? I can’t stay and you can’t go, so what are we-”

And the answer came to them. The horrible, heartbreaking answer that neither wanted to voice.

“No,” Aletha whispered. “No, I won’t let you go.”

“I don’t want this either,” Luke said. “I love you so much. Just the thought of watching you walk away from me... But then I think about Felicity. Of what they did to her. I won’t let that happen again. I won’t lose you.”

“Luke, please,” she begged. “Come with me to the Resistance. We can fight Phasma, we can raise Rey, we can... we can get married.”

An hour ago, if Aletha had raised the issue of marriage to him, Luke’s answer would have undoubtedly been yes. But now with the chips down, there was only one word for Luke to say.

“No.”

Aletha winced.

Luke closed his eyes and bowed his head, struggling to fight back the tears. He dropped her hands and fought to gather the courage to do this. To love her so much that he could leave her.

“I love you so much, Aletha,” he whispered. A tear rolled down his cheek, “But Rey is the most important thing to me in the entire galaxy. Nothing comes before her, and I won’t risk losing her again. I’ve felt that pain. I’ve been told she was dead. I won’t let myself go through that again. I’m sorry, but where Rey is involved, you come second.”

The words felt like a dagger to her heart, “Luke-”

“And I won’t lose you the way I lost Felicity. I won’t let that happen to you. I’m sorry, Aletha.”

“I understand,” she whispered.

“I’m sorry, Aletha... but I can’t go.”

“And I can’t stay. I love her too, Luke. Know that.”

“I do.”

A long silence filled the tent.

“I’ll call Jedek to come pick me up,” Aletha declared. She wiped the tears from her eyes but her voice shook and her nose ran fast, “He always said I could stay with him when I wanted to leave Jakku… I just never thought I would take up that offer.”

“And I never imagined this is how things would end.”

“Is it the end?” she dared to ask. “Are we… finished?”

He stared at her, “I… I don’t know.”

So they just held each other and cried.

Not knowing the fate that lay before them, Luke and Aletha made love that night. Tender and passionate, a final plea not to give into the fate that appeared before them.

Luke undressed Aletha and laid her on the cot. She panted heavily, moaning his name as he spread her legs and kissed his way up her thighs. He spent some time tasting her wet quim and tonguing her clit.

Aletha’s hips jerked up involuntarily as he pleasured her. Her small hands – which had been made rough by desert living – buried into his hair and pulled him closer to her. His beard scratched her thighs as his lips delved through her pubic hair. Shaving was a luxury no one could afford on Jakku, no matter where the hair was placed.

When her moans turned more throaty, Luke knew it was time to move on.

He pulled back, much to the disappointment of Aletha, who whimpered at the sudden loss of sensation. Luke kissed her breasts, and sensually glided his tongue over and around her pink nipples. His hand was low, slowly dragging up her thighs and around her sensitive folds. Aletha moaned at the contact of his thumb on her clit, but his touch was gone too soon.

She gasped as he sunk a finger into her.

He thrust in and out of her a few times, curling his middle finger inside of her making her even more wet for him. When he felt her ready, Luke added a second finger, and soon enough a third.

Aletha groaned in time with his thrusts, her hips jerking forward to meet them. She buried her head in his neck as she rode his fingers to orgasm.

“Luke!”

He bit down on her nipple when she came.

“Please don’t ask me to give this up,” Aletha moaned as Luke pulled off his shirt in front of her.

She dropped to her knees in front of him and did as she was told.

Luke ran a hand through her grey-blonde hair. To him there were few things more erotic than the clinking sound of a belt being undone before sex. Aletha made quick work of his clothes, and moved out of the way when he kicked his pants and underwear to the side.

She spent a little while teasing him. Running her fingertips over the thin skin of his hardening shaft, tracing the veins. She cupped his balls expertly, and Luke once again was thankful for her medical knowledge of male anatomy. Frankly, there had been a few things Aletha showed him over the years that Felicity had never even coming close to guessing.

Then Aletha’s lips were on him and he was in her wet mouth. Luke couldn’t help himself; he pulled her by the hair a little closer and made small thrusts into her mouth. When he saw she wasn’t using their signals to slow down or stop, Luke let himself give in to pleasure.

Aletha Kymeri was an amazing woman, and not just because she gave one hell of a blowjob. She was kind, and brave, and beautiful. She wasn’t as sardonic as the people Luke usually found himself surrounded by, but she wasn’t a pushover. Her pettiness may have annoyed him occasionally, but he was proud of the way she stood up her herself. Aletha Kymeri was a woman who demanded she be taken seriously.

But she had a heart made a cracked glass. How many times had it been shattered by someone she tried to love? And yet here Luke was about to break that heart once more. Sure, Aletha woke every morning with a smile, but he saw the sadness in her eyes.

How could he ever let her go?

She looked up at him with full eyes and she knew what he wanted. Aletha rose to her feet and tangled in his embrace. They held each other, warmed by the heat between their bare bodies.

Aletha pulled away, and Luke laid down on the cot. She found a condom and rolled it down his length. His hands caressed her sides as she climbed on top of him. She grasped his shaft and slid it along the length of her slit, lubricating the condom to enter her.

She looked at him with heartbreak in her gaze, “I love you too, Luke Erso. I love you so much.”

Aletha lowered herself upon him. Luke savoured the gasp she made as he filled her tight cunt. She planted her hands on his chest, and his went to her hips. He helped guide her as Aletha worked herself up and down his cock.

The tent was filled with low moans and the wet slapping of flesh. Her nails dug into his chest as she gripped harder, and his hands soon found her wildly bouncing breasts.

“I love you, Luke,” Aletha said breathlessly as rocked back and forth with increasing difficulty.

Luke sat up and kissed her passionately. She moaned as he shifted their legs into better position: his favorite position. Into the position of both of them sitting up and holding each other to kiss, caress and cuddle. The position Luke always called the ultimate lovemaking position, and indeed the position that he had once used to express his love so deeply, he had used it to create a child.

Neither knew when they started to cry, nor who was the one to shed the first tear. They just held each other and made love. Luke didn’t perceive when he climaxed, nor even if Aletha achieved her own orgasm. All he knew was that after a significant passage of time, his cock was soft and out of her, his condom was full, and he was holding Aletha as they cried in each other’s arms.

“I love you too, Aletha Kymeri,” Luke cried, his head buried in her neck.
She took a shaky breath, “We can’t be together, can we?”

He sighed, “You will always have my heart, Aletha.”

“I know, and you’ll have mine, but…but sometimes love just isn’t enough.”

Luke couldn’t sleep that night. Quom was staying with Rey, poor Teng was all alone, and Aletha was by his side.

He watched Aletha’s chest slowly rise and fall with gentle breath. Blonde and grey hair splayed about, face scrunch up, and head resting on her hand – she complained every morning about it being asleep, but did nothing to change her sleep patterns. Aletha Kymeri looked so beautiful as she slept.

Luke rolled over and stared at the ceiling of the tent. Why did this have to happen? He was so happy with Aletha. After everything they had been through, they deserved to be together. Why were they forced into this separation? Was this the Force’s plan from the start? To have her love him and then leave him?

Words his father said once came back to him, “Things will just get complicated and I think you’ll regret it.”

Was this what Anakin Skywalker had meant? Had he known all along that Aletha would be forced to leave him, and Anakin was just trying to protect his son’s heart from being broken?

But Anakin was wrong. Luke didn’t regret loving Aletha, just as he didn’t regret Nakari, Felicity, or any other great love of his life. Grandfather Ruwee always said a person got three great loves, and it seemed that Nakari, Felicity, and Aletha would be those for him.

He would do anything to have any one of those women back. To live happily ever after with him, but it seemed the only woman who would see Luke Skywalker’s happily ever after would be Rey Rhiaon Skywalker.

Luke half wondered if Nakari Kelen would even like Rey.

He really had to get some sleep, so Luke decided to do the thing that always managed to get him down for the night. Luke meditated. And soon enough he found himself lost to the meditation. He didn’t know if it was a dream, or a vision, or something else entirely, but whatever it was, Luke lost himself to another world.

In front of him was a tree; a beautiful tree, strong and proud. The tree was in the middle of a pool of water. Somewhere the sun was setting. The tree had three branches in total, and from each branch hung a single leaf.

Each leaf looked different. The one from the highest branch was small, spiky, and amber hued.

The middle branch had the largest leaf. It was slim, long, and narrowed to a point at the top. Its hue was of crimson.
The lowest leaf was round, smooth, and pure white.

A gentle breeze blew through the air, shaking the leaves. Luke knew the leaves were precious, so he reached out to still them. But he was too late; the breeze blew too hard, and the amber leaf began to fall towards the pool of water.

“Nice, isn’t she?”

A voice he hadn’t heard in years sung on the air. Luke turned towards the source and found a scene from the past playing out as real as if actors were standing there performing it for him.

“That’s the Desert Jewel,” Nakari Kelen told the young Luke Skywalker standing before them. They were in front of the ship Luke would come to find so familiar. “You fly her safely, now.”

Nakari was a tall woman with dark skin and a cascade of tightly curled ringlets framing a narrow face. She gave Luke a friendly smile and he smiled back.

“Is she yours?” he asked.

“Yep! Well, I guess I should say she’s my father’s. But both his ship and his daughter are at the disposal of the Alliance now. Just got here last week.” She extended a hand. “Nakari Kelen. Glad to meet you.”

“Kelen?” Luke said, taking her hand and shaking it. She had a strong grip, and he tilted his head to the side as he connected her name and the ship’s to a memory. “Any relation to the Kelen Biolabs on Pasher?”

Her eyes widened.

“Yes! Fayet Kelen is my father. Are you from Pasher?”

“No, I’m from Tatooine.”

“Ah, another desert planet. So you understand all about my fascination with ships and how they can take me far away from home.”

“Yeah, I understand that very well. I’m Luke Skywalker.”

“Oh, I know who you are,” she said, finally letting her hand slip from his. “They told me you’d be taking my ship out for some kind of spooky mission, but no one told me you hailed from Tatooine.”

“Ha. It’s not really spooky. Kind of a boring business trip, in fact, but this looks like it will prevent any Imperials from thinking I’m with the Alliance.”

“I should hope so. My baby’s classy and elegant and ill disposed to rebellion.”

“Hey, speaking of ill disposed, mind if I ask you something?”

Nakari nodded once, inviting Luke to proceed.

“I’ve always wondered why your dad chose Pasher for his biolabs. You’d think a jungle planet would be better suited simply because there’s more actual biology there.”
She shrugged.

“He started small and local. The poison and glands of sandstone scorpions and spine spiders turned out to have medical applications.” She chucked her chin at the Desert Jewel. “Very profitable applications.”

“I’ll say.”

“What did you do on Tatooine?”

“Moisture farming. Spectacularly dull. Some weeks were so boring that I actually looked forward to going into Tosche Station to pick up some … power converters. Huh!”

“What?”

“I just remembered I never did pick up my last shipment. Wonder if they’re still there.”

Luke felt the need to turn and behind him he found another scene. He and Nakari were sitting in the cockpit of the Desert Jewel, just having escaped some Imperial trouble.

Nakari closed her eyes, clenched her fingers on the armrests of the copilot’s seat, and took a deep breath. When she exhaled, she relaxed, tension draining out of her shoulders and fingers, and she opened her eyes and looked at Luke.

“I’m sorry for yelling, Luke. You obviously knew what you were doing, and I wasn’t helping.”

“Don’t worry about it,” he said. “People tend to yell in combat. It’s high stress. Was that your first time being chased like that?”

Nakari nodded, her lips pressed tightly together.

“If we’d been in the Harvester, you’d have had cause to be worried,” he told her. “But you made a good decision to spend all your credits on those engines. A fancy bunkroom wouldn’t have saved us.”

“Thanks.” She took another deep breath and then made an effort to smile. “You know, we never did get to finish our earlier conversation.”

“We didn’t?” he asked.

“No, we were interrupted.”

She unbuckled herself and moved close to him. Her right hand raised to his left cheek and Luke flinched minutely, wondering if he had crossed a line with his staring earlier and now he was going to pay for it, but something else happened. She rested her hand lightly there, and then she planted a soft kiss on his right cheek.

Nakari murmured in his ear, “I was going to say I don’t mind if you’re obvious. But since I think you missed all my subtle hints, this is me being obvious.”
“Oh,” was all Luke could manage to say, overwhelmed by surprise.

Nakari didn’t remove her hand from his face, but she reared back to look him in the eye, her expression incredulous.

“That’s all you have to say? ‘Oh’?”

Luke made a completely unnecessary throat-clearing noise and said, “I liked that thing you did a few seconds ago where you kissed me. I think you should do it again.”

Nakari smiled and gave him a kiss that was more than a peck on the cheek.

Luke turned again and found a fond memory of a day they spent in a hotel room.

“Attaboy,” she said, encouraging him. “You bring me the sugar now. Go on.”

It took Luke a moment to realize she was speaking metaphorically, but he was glad he caught himself before he moved to search for a sugar packet in the hotel room.

“Right. Sugar. Well, you are so …” Luke struggled to think.

“I’m so what, Luke? Don’t stop now.”

“So ... how do people do this? Everything I can think of to say sounds trite and insincere in my head.”

“Don’t worry. You just earned all these sincerity points with the too-much-honesty thing. That’s not saying you shouldn’t strive to be original; I’m just saying that if you blurt out something I’ve heard before, I might believe you.”

“Ah, but no pressure, right?”

She winked, “Right.”

“Well, actually, that’s something I really admire about you. No pressure.”

Nakari narrowed her eyes, “You sure this is sugar?”

“Definitely. I guess this is a roundabout compliment, but I’m going for originality.”

“All right, dazzle me.”

“Well, I don’t feel the crushing weight of your expectations,” Luke explained. “I mean you had them—you just shared them with me—but I never would have known unless you said something. And believe me, that’s refreshing. Important.”

Nakari prodded him to clarify, “Important how?”

He struggled to find the right words.

“Ever since the Battle of Yavin, I feel sometimes that people expect me to top it and wonder why I haven’t yet. What I feel from you is encouragement to top it—which is very different—and rare.”

The other person who habitually encouraged him was Leia, but Luke thought it best not to elaborate on that.

Nakari leaned back in her chair, “Whoa. I’m not encouraging you to top the Death Star thing.”

“I know—that probably didn’t come out right,” Luke said. “Let me try again. The secret about the Battle of Yavin was that I succeeded because of the Force, so to me, topping what I did there doesn’t mean a bigger explosion or killing more stormtroopers. It means taking another step along the path to becoming a Jedi. And I’ve made more progress in the Force since I met you than any other time after I lost Ben. I actually have hope that I can learn to use it now and it’s because of your encouragement … So, you see, you’re …”

He flailed for some kind of original phrasing and nothing came to mind. Panicked that he would clam up and let loose another awkward silence into the world, he finished up with a simple fact:

“… You’re good for me.”

Nakari waited a few beats to make sure he was finished.

“Hmm. That was some pretty complex sugar,” she said, her mouth teasing up to the left, “but you wrapped it and put a neat little bow on it at the end.”

She leaned forward again, pushed her plate out of the way, and propped an elbow on the table, resting her cheek against her good hand. It had been injured on the crazy mission they were in the middle of. Her half smile bloomed into a wide one.

Luke felt giddy and exhausted at the same time, the way you feel after a narrow escape from death. He was glad she didn’t seem intent on fanning the flames of jealousy. Luke didn’t doubt for a second that she still thought of Leia as competition, but at least for the moment she was content to let it slide. And Luke had better not push my luck any further. Having negotiated one minefield successfully, he’d be a fool to step back in and dance around.

Reaching across the table to snag her plate, Luke placed it on top of his own and rose to clear away dinner.

“You know what?” he said, as he moved to the kitchenette. “If I could go back to see that old Luke—the one right after the Battle of Yavin with a medal around his neck, still riding high after sinking proton torpedoes down an exhaust port that must be history’s greatest design flaw—I don’t think I’d be angry with the way he felt back then. But I’d tell him it wasn’t always going to be that easy. Because the Empire’s obviously still out there. A huge victory for us was only an inconvenience for them. They still kill and enslave people—well, I don’t need to remind you of that. We’re hiding in the Outer Rim like the vermin the Empire says we are, and running missions like this one where we don’t know if it will make a difference or not, or if anything we do really matters.”

When he turned to look at her she had a crease between her eyes and was regarding him intensely.

“We are the thorn that pricks the Emperor’s finger when he looks at the galaxy as his personal garden. And you know who he punishes every time we get away with something? Vader.”

“Because pooodoo rolls downhill and Vader’s not at the top. He passes it on to everyone beneath him, for sure, but he gets it first every time the Emperor is displeased. And the fact that we are still out here displeases him plenty, I bet.”

“You want Vader to get what’s coming to him, eh?”

“Sure. I mean, it’s not all I want. But I wouldn’t pass up a chance to take a shot at him if the opportunity presented itself. He took my mom from me and betrayed your dad. Don’t you want him dead?”

“I want him defeated.”

“Dead qualifies as defeated,” Nakari pointed out.

“Yeah, but I guess I’d like to know how he became the thing that he is so I would know what not to do. You can’t get answers from a dead man.”

“Hold on. You think you could turn all evil like that? You think you have that inside you?”

“No, no, that’s not what I meant. Ben said he’d been seduced by the dark side of the Force, almost like he didn’t have a choice. I need to know more.”

Nakari’s voice deepened along with the crease between her eyes, “He chose to send my mother to the spice mines and let her die there, Luke. It wasn’t some metaphysical dark side that made him do it. He chose to do that, just like everything else he’s chosen to do. He’s not helpless. He’s responsible.”

Seeing his mistake, Luke hastened to reassure her, “Yes, he is, absolutely. I’m not saying I agree with Ben—I simply don’t know what he meant. There are mysteries about the Force to which Vader might know the answers.”

“True, but you couldn’t trust anything he said anyway, so why talk?”

“Like it or not, he’s one of the few people remaining in the galaxy who can even discuss it with me.”

Nakari blinked, “So what are you saying? You want him to teach you?”

“No, of course not. I just think I could learn something from him.”

She made a noise like steam escaping a pressure valve, “I don’t think you’d like anything you learned. He’s not going to make you happy.”

“No, I suppose not.”

“Vader probably doesn’t even know what happiness is. You know what? I bet he’s never had a slice of cake.”

The abrupt change of subject startled Luke.

“Absolutely. You want to ask him something when he’s defeated, ask him that.” Her voice changed this time, not to imitate her father as she had done many times on their trip but to imitate Luke. “‘Lord Vader! Have you ever had any cake? Answer me!’”
She sounded strange and kind of nasal.

“Hey, I don’t sound like that, do I?” Luke frowned.

“Don’t get distracted! We’re discussing Vader’s dessert preferences. If he says yes, he’s had cake, then he was human at one point and remembers what it was to be happy, and you can continue to talk because there’s some common ground there. But if he says no, he’s hopeless. Chuck him out the air lock and end his misery.”

They started laughing, and even though it wasn’t that funny, they laughed until their stomachs hurt and tears streamed from the corners of our eyes. When you laugh at something that scares you, it’s not so scary anymore, which is probably the reason Vader had Nakari’s mother sent to the spice mines. He wanted to be feared and couldn’t bear to be mocked.

Luke never told Nakari, but he thought those stolen moments with her in a Kupohan hotel were so much better than cake.

She bit her lip, “You know what’s even better than cake?”

Luke smiled as he remembered what happened immediately after that conversation. It appeared that was where the Force was leading him for the next image he saw was of his younger self in bed with her, tangled in the sheets.

“Nakari!” a breathless grunt filled the air.

Luke was on top of Nakari, and their clothes were scattered on the floor. He was panting, his head buried in her neck as he comprehended the feeling of finishing inside of a woman for the first time in his life.

Nakari, thankfully looked very satisfied.

“Now that’s what I call sugar,” Nakari chuckled.

“That was…” Luke struggled for words. “Well, now I understand what all the fuss over sex is about. That was incredible.”

“Thanks.”

“Was it good for you?”

“…Wasn’t bad for a virgin.”

Luke frowned, “It wasn’t good?”

“I didn’t say that.” She playfully ran her fingers over the well-defined muscles of his shoulders, “It was good, but your technique needs a little refinement. You just need some more experience, preferably by the hands of a woman and not yourself.”
“Well, I am willing and eager to obtain more experience,” Luke kissed down her neck.

Luke pouted and withdrew his assault of pleasure. He rolled off Nakari and laid back on the bed. She surprised him when she climbed on top of him.

“But while we wait, why don’t I show you another way to give a woman sugar?”

It was an hour later when they had made love a second time that Luke realized he was in love with Nakari Kelen. But considering the time and place, he decided it would be better to wait until a later, more inappropriate time to tell her.

After all, they would have all the time in the world to say it.

Luke winced as he knew what was to come next.

He, Nakari, Artoo, and Drusil – the alien they were on a mission to rescue – had finished discussing their plan to get past the bounty hunters to safety.

Luke and Nakari both took a couple of steps in different directions, thinking only of the mission. But then they stopped, thinking of each other, turned back, and froze.

Both of them waited for the other to speak first, and each made one or two halting starts, simultaneously, which caused them to stop and wait for the other to continue, and the awkwardness escalated with every fraction of a second—not to mention the terror.

Luke was mortified that whatever he said next would be precisely the wrong thing—either too much or too little, just wholly inappropriate and not what she wanted to hear. Nakari must have been feeling something similar, and he wanted to say she didn’t need to worry, she could say anything to him, but even that would probably be wrong.

“What is happening?” Drusil asked. “I am unfamiliar with this kind of human behavior. Have you lost the power of speech?”

“No,” Nakari said, and she closed the distance between herself and Luke in three long strides. Her head darted forward, lips kissing his briefly, and then our gazes met. “Be safe, Luke.”

It was a very safe thing to say compared to all the other phrases he had been considering, so he nodded with some relief and replied, “You, too.”

“That was astoundingly straightforward,” Drusil commented, her confusion clear. “What was the difficulty that prevented you from expressing such commonplace wishes?”

Thank goodness neither Quom Tinadar nor C-3PO were witness to such a moment in Luke’s life.

The Givin’s words evoked embarrassed smiles from Luke and Nakari, but Luke was grateful to Drusil for saying them anyway.

Nakari’s eyes spoke volumes to him, and Luke hoped his communicated as much to her.
What he said, however, was, "No time to explain."

He broke eye contact with Nakari to witness the landing of the first of the bounty hunters on the beach.

“We have to go,” Luke said. Thinking of the extensive catalog offered by Utheel Outfitters on Rodia, as well as many other such businesses throughout the galaxy, Luke gave some final instructions, “Artoo, make sure you’re scanning in the infrared and other channels besides the visual and let Nakari know if you see something she doesn’t. These bounty hunters are sure to have some tricks in their arsenal.”

Artoo acknowledged with a short electronic burp, and his dome rotated to face the lagoon.

They truly did part after that.

It was the last time Luke would speak to Nakari.

A final, heartbreaking scene played out before Luke. The scene of a battle in the jungle that would end poorly for Nakari Kelen.

Giving up on trying to blast the bounty hunter since all Luke hit were trees, Luke aimed at the trees instead—ones that might fall on the bounty hunter and cause him to quit firing grenades long enough for Luke to do more lasting damage.

Drusil helped, and several of them began to topple around the bounty hunter, but he managed to fire two more grenades before scrambling out of the way, finally affected by our fusillade.

Desperate, Luke stretched out with the Force, trying to locate those grenades and divert their path at least a little bit, but I couldn’t find them or feel them. He felt Nakari’s presence, though, - an amber hued signature – and the Aqualish running for cover, and also the last bounty hunter, a reptilian Trandoshan, crouching in the ferns close to the lagoon and taking in the scene.

Luke was able to sense all this just as the grenades boomed and shook the ground below them and a cry of pain, cut short, was accompanied by Artoo’s wail, and then there was a sharp, empty space in the Force where Nakari had been a moment earlier.

It was a blow to the gut, realizing what that sudden absence meant. He hadn’t seen it happen with his eyes, but Luke had felt Nakari’s life snuffed out through the Force.

The amber leaf hit the surface of the pond and dissolved. As the water rippled, changing the pool forever, the leaf was gone.

Gone like Nakari.

The wind began to stir again, and Luke looked up to see the crimson leaf rip from the branch. Luke raced forward to catch it from falling and leaving him.
His fingers closed upon it when he felt a hand on his and he was pulled away from the scene by another familiar laugh.

A younger Luke was pulled across the dancefloor by Felicity Rhiaon as they danced together at the wedding of Koran – Gunner’s son – and Ayessa – Riz’s daughter.

“You’re not a bad dancer, Master Skywalker,” Felicity smiled as they moved to the beat of a reasonably up-tempo song.

“You dance nicely as well, Miss Rhiaon,” Luke laughed as he watched Diego Nalto dance with Gunner’s widow. “Nalto chose an interesting dance partner.”

Felicity glanced back, “Oh, just a promise we made.”

Luke’s expression signalled her to explain further.

“Before we left for Operation Citadel, the five of us made the other promise to fulfill one wish should we not survive,” Felicity elaborated. “Gunner wanted his wife to never dance alone at a wedding, so Diego attends weddings with her. Ji-Dan wanted a memorial in a Jedi Temple should the Jedi ever arise, if you happen to be looking for a new architectural feature on Rornian. Riz wanted the survivors to visit his daughter at least once a year, and tell her stories of him so she’d never forget her father. Diego and I have done such.”

“What about Diego?”

“He wanted his X-Wing to go to someone worthy.”

“The X-Wing the Council ended up giving me?” Luke asked.

“Yes,” Felicity grinned.

“Alright, what about you? What did you want?”

Felicity bit her lip, “To spread my ashes with Brendan’s on a happy planet. That way we’d be together again in death.”

Luke stared at her, “Wow... you really are morbid, aren’t you? Have you thought about maybe trying a therapy session?”

She swatted at him, but Luke used the chorus change as reason to twirl her away.

“I was just suggesting,” he chuckled, pulling her back into dancing position.

“You keep those suggestions for your girlfriend. If Calla doesn’t end up needing therapy of some sort, I will eat my shoe.”

“You know, she wasn’t that mad over me attending this wedding with you.”

“She’s going to dump you in less than a month, I guarantee it.”

Luke shook his head and twirled her again.

“You know, this wedding is a little depressing,” Felicity admitted. “I mean Riz’s daughter got married before me. There must seriously be something wrong with me.”

“I’m sure you’ll find someone,” Luke said. “Someone loads better than Drystan or this Pax guy you wanted to avoid.”

“Pax is a lovely man, just wasn’t the man for me. I wonder if I’ll ever find the man for me though.”

“Well, until you do, you’ll always have me to dance with at weddings. I promise.”

Luke watched his younger self spin Felicity again and when the spin was completed, they were in different clothing and the scene was now set in the Meditation Gardens of Rornian.

“This seems familiar,” Felicity laughed as she danced with Luke a few months later at Reine and Obik’s wedding.

“I did promise to be available to dance with you at weddings,” Luke grinned. “Just didn’t quite expect that I would end up being the man you were looking for.”

“Trust me, I don’t expect this either… Though if I remember correctly, Calla did. Tell me, Master Skywalker, how long after she accused you of being in love with me did you realize you were in love with me?”

“I’m pleading the fifth.”

Felicity laughed as he spun her again. When the spin was complete, he pulled her into particularly tight.

“I am glad of how things worked out, though,” Felicity said. Her eyes were dark and her voice sultry.

“Luke?”

“Yeah?”

“Would you kiss me already?”

“Your wish is my command.”

And he pulled her in for a passionate kiss… in fact maybe a little too passionate. It had been days since their make out session on Lando’s ship and their desire grew with every physicality. Luke kissed her like he didn’t care if anyone was looking, and with the moan Felicity gave, it was clear that she didn’t care if they were looking.

“Hey! Cut it out you two!” Lando called as he and Alyla danced a little way away from them.

“Yeah, Luke, there’s children around,” Alyla teased. “Let’s keep this PG, alright?”

Luke shook his head, “Okay, you know you’re going overboard when Lando Calrissian says it’s too much.”

“Well, why don’t we go sneak away for some private time?” Felicity pressed herself against him.

“I would love too,” Luke couldn’t help but admire that dress that would get him in trouble later that night. “But people would notice if we disappeared.”

“Not necessarily. We could go when people are distracted. Maybe when the cake is cut?”

Luke couldn’t wait until it was cake time.

Felicity pulled apart, letting the sexual tension dissipate.

“Spin me again, Luke.”

He spun her again and once more their clothing and setting changed. Now it was a scene inside the old Rebel Base on Yavin IV, and the pair of them wore their wedding attire.

“That is a beautiful dress, Mrs. Skywalker,” Luke grinned.

“And you look very handsome yourself Mr. Rhiaon.”

Luke shuddered, “I sound like your father.”

“And I like Darth Vader’s wife.”

“Pact never to call each other those names again?”

“It’s a deal Mr. Rhiaon Skywalker.”

“I like the sound of that Mrs. Rhiaon Skywalker.”

Sadly, the song came to an end.

“Alright, it’s my turn to dance with the groom,” Leia declared as she approached the pair with Ben.

“Oh, you come to steal my husband?” Felicity grinned. “I love saying that. My husband.”

“I love it almost as much as saying my wife,” Luke smiled back. He paused, “And also that fact that for once this didn’t lead to an incest joke.”

“I would pay so much money for people to stop bringing up Hoth,” Leia admitted. “Come on, I want to dance with my brother.”

“Alright, I’m sure I can spare a minute,” Luke agreed. “Is Han available to take my place and dance with my beautiful wife?”

“I think I’m going to be sick,” Ben rolled his eyes.

“No, he and Lando are starting up a pool on when you two are going to have a child,” Leia answered.
Luke scowled, “I don’t believe this!”

“Reine and Obik went off on their own for a little while,” Leia reported. “They said something about cake and revenge for what you two did at their wedding?”

Suddenly neither Luke nor Felicity found they could look Leia in the eye.

She narrowed her eyes, “Do I want to know?”

“Absolutely not,” Felicity answered. “Alright, you two dance, and Ben, how about you and I have this next dance?”

Ben scoffed, “Honestly? I’d rather be punched in the face.”

“I can arrange that.”

They turned to see thirteen-year-old Poe Dameron approaching them with a grin. Kes was following closely behind.

Luke and Felicity greeted them fondly with hugs, thanks, and the receiving of congratulations. At some point Ben managed to slink off.

“Looks like you’re down a dance partner,” Poe said when he noticed. “You wanna dance with me, Felicity?”

“I would be honoured,” Felicity laughed, taking his hand.

“Make sure you bring her back to me,” Luke joked.

“I make no promises Master Skywalker,” Poe grinned. He waggled his eyebrows at Felicity, “What do you say? The offer to run away together still stands.”

“You know I’ve got you on retainer,” Felicity ruffled his hair. “Come on. Let’s dance.”

Luke watched Poe lead his wife away.

Then Poe’s voice came again: this time deeper and more somber.

“Is it true what they’re saying about Felicity? She’s gone too?”

A devastated Luke nodded as he lowered his head, trying not to let Poe see his tears. He was in Felicity’s office on Rornian, slowly going through the clean up process after the massacre.

BB-8 watching from the corner made a sad noise.

Poe sighed and dropped his own head, “I’m sorry. She was a good friend to me and my family. If you need anything at all.”

“I know,” Luke gave Poe a smile, but Poe could see the pain and falseness behind it. “Thank you.”

“Wait, can you give this to Leia?” Luke handed Poe the data chip with the Temple blueprints.

“You too, Poe.”

He was all alone.

The crimson leaf hit the surface of the pond and dissolved. As the water rippled, changing the pool forever, the leaf was gone.

Gone like Felicity.

The breeze picked up one last time, and Luke raced with every ounce of his energy to catch the final leaf. Sure enough, the white leaf broke off the branch and started to fall.

“Rey, why don’t you properly introduce me to your friends?” Luke asked as the scene formed into one from Niima Outpost many years ago.

“Okay, Daddy!” Rey said excitedly. “Mister Quom, Doctor Aletha, this is Daddy.”

“Daddy, these are my friends,” Rey introduced. “The nice lady is Doctor Aletha Kymeri. She and her husband fought in the Rebellion, and her husband, a pilot named Antar was in a crash and cut off his arm and got a mechanical one like you. But he’s dead now.”

Luke raised a brow as Aletha stifled a laugh.

“Don’t you love how blunt children are?” Aletha grinned at the horrified Luke.

Luke blinked and suddenly his younger version was standing outside of Unkar Plutt’s business building with Alethea.

“The First Order didn’t capture Felicity,” Aletha insisted. “She turned herself in. Remember your wife’s apprehension for what it was: the bravest, most selfless act I have ever seen a mother do for their child.”

Luke grinned. After the hell Felicity had gone through with her postpartum depression and the lingering fears it had left behind in her, Luke knew that Aletha’s declaration would have meant the world to Felicity.

“She truly was the most… amazing woman I have ever had the pleasure of meeting,” Luke felt the lump forming in his throat. “It was the greatest honour in my life to be selected to be her husband and the father of her child.”

Luke looked back to the ground and fought the tears threatening to fall. Aletha gave Luke a sad smile. She touched Luke’s arm and a sob escaped from his throat.

“She’s dead, isn’t she?” Aletha asked softly.

Luke looked at her with wet, red eyes and nodded, “It’s my fault. She’s gone, and it’s all my fault!”

Luke clutched onto Aletha and sobbed harder than he had dared to in months. He rested his head on the junction of her neck and shoulder and wailed in a heart-wrenching display. It was the first time he had truly focused on the loss of Felicity without alcohol or Rey being a factor. He had lost his soulmate, and he needed to experience the physical catharsis of letting it all out.

But Aletha didn’t care as she held Luke in her arms. It wasn’t like the other hugs Luke had gotten during his breakdowns about Felicity. It wasn’t Leia or Han holding him; struggling and failing to hold back their own tears. Aletha just held him, eyes dry, stroking his hair and alternated between telling him it was okay and making a soothing shushing noise.

“It’s alright. I understand,” Aletha used her best bedside manner tone. “I lost my husband several years ago.”

“She wasn’t supposed to die,” Luke sobbed. “She was supposed to come back and we’d be together again.”

“I know. It was the same thing with Antar. He was supposed to go out, make his final stand against the Empire, and then we would live happily ever after. He wasn’t supposed to be shot down on these pathetic heap of a planet,” Aletha glared at the very ground of Jakku.

“How am I supposed to tell Rey that her mother is dead?” Luke asked, slowly pulling himself away.

“I wasn’t expecting to find Rey, and now not only do I have to figure out what to do next, but I have to tell her the worst news of her life.”

“Well, I’m not great with kids or mourning, so I can’t really help you with that, but I will say this. Just remember that no matter how terrible this news you have to share is, this could have gone a lot worse. You could have lost both of them, or worse, what if you spent the next fifteen or twenty years thinking you had lost Rey and she grew up alone on Jakku?”

Luke shuddered at the thought. He could imagine it, being a bearded hermit on Ahch-to until one day the Millennium Falcon arrived on and he found himself face to face with his grown daughter he didn’t raise, her frame thin from starvation and loneliness.

That sounded horrible.
“Besides,” Aletha went on, “if that little girl has a tenth of the strength her mother had, she’ll be fine.”

Luke smiled, “Yes, she will be. I just have to be open and honest with her. Nothing from ‘a certain point of view.’ Just the full truth... But I still have no clue what to do next.”

“Why don’t you stay here on Jakku for a little while and figure things out?” Aletha suggested.

Luke was surprised, “Stay here?”

“Quom and I will help you with Rey any way you want, and apparently, the place Rey is staying is pretty safe and stable for Jakku. You could do worse.”

Luke hesitated at the thought of living for any amount of time on Jakku, “I suppose a few days couldn’t hurt, and it would give her a sense of normalcy which she probably hasn’t had in a while.”

Aletha just grinned at him.

“Oh alright,” Luke conceded. “We’ll stay for a little while.”

Luke saw the scene shift to one outside of Aletha’s tent.

“What’s going on, Aletha?” Luke asked as the tent flap closed behind them. “What’s that mark?”

“Luke,” Aletha carefully placed a hand on his forearm like she had done so many times before. It had become a gesture of comfort and support between the two. “That shape... is an indentation mark.”

Luke scowled, “I don’t understand. What does it mean?”

Aletha took a deep breath, “It means that... Luke, somebody hit your child.”

Luke’s eyes went wide as horror washed over him like being dunked in a lake of ice cold water. It was his worst fear... someone was abusing his child.

“No,” Luke clenched his fist. He was shaking. “This can’t be.”

“I’m so sorry, Luke,” Aletha rubbed his arm.

“How can you be certain? What is an indentation mark and why does it make you say this?”

“An indentation mark is a mark left behind when someone is hit with an object. If Quom smacked you hard enough with a wrench, the mark would take the shape of said wrench.”

“And the Imperial mark?”

Aletha cocked her head to the side, “A very small mark, wouldn’t you say? Almost the size of... I don’t know... a ring?”

“My guess is that he back handed her while wearing his ring,” Aletha observed. “And I would also guess that this isn’t the first time he’s hit Rey.”

“How did I not see it?” Luke put his head into his hands. A few rogue tears slid down his cheeks as he let out a strangled sob. “How could I let this happen?”

Determination setting on her face, Aletha gently, but firmly pulled Luke’s hands down and lifted his chin so he was forced to look her in the eyes.

“You listen to me, and you listen carefully,” Aletha had her authoritative tone on. “This is not your fault.”

“Isn’t it?” Luke shot aggressively, yet not angrily. “I left her alone with him. Force... why didn’t she tell me? Can I not be trusted to protect her? Of course, I can’t. I let this happen. Why would Rey ever trust me after that?”

“Stop it!” Aletha ordered. “This is not your fault! This is a classic case of abuse, Luke. He probably has scared her into silence. After all, who’s more terrifying to a child? A brute who hits her? Or a man who likes to talk things out and gives unlimited second chances?”

No one on Jakku feared Luke Erso, or even knew what he was capable of.

But that was about to change.

The scene was then one of Aletha and Luke standing at Mashra’s grave.

Aletha laughed, and Luke couldn’t help but crack a smile. He loved her smile; that smile as warm as the sun of Jakku. He found himself reaching out and brushing a lock of hair out of her face. He heard how her breath hitched slightly.

“Luke,” she whispered back, staring into his eyes. She dared not even blink and ruin the connection held between their gazes.

“Aletha Kymeri, you are one of the most amazing women I have met in my life,” Luke’s hand stroked the soft line of her jaw. “And, that’s saying a lot.”

“And you Luke Erso, are one of the most amazing men I have met in my life... Though that’s not exactly saying much in my case.

Luke laughed, and that warm smile of hers widened.

“I practice speeches in my head before I say them,” Luke grinned. “Besides... it’s easy to talk to someone you love.”
Aletha’s breath stopped, “Luke-”

“Aletha,” he whispered back.

He took his chance. Luke leaned forward and captured her lips in his own. She startled at first, but soon she was kissing him back.

A year later they were entwined in the blankets in Aletha’s tent. She lay atop him, collapsed and panting from having finally consummated their growing passion.

“Oh my god, Luke,” Aletha moaned. “I should have done that years ago.”

“Yes, you should have,” Luke grinned.

Suddenly, he flipped her on her back, and positioned himself over her.

He ghosted his lips over hers and his hand started drifting down Aletha’s body, “But the good news is that we’re only getting started.”

Aletha shrieked with pleasure as Luke’s hand hit its mark.

Then a final scene, one from hours before.

“I love you too, Aletha Kymeri,” Luke cried, his head buried in her neck.

She took a shaky breath, “We can’t be together, can we?”

He sighed, “You will always have my heart, Aletha.”

“I know, and you’ll have mine, but…but sometimes love just isn’t enough.”

The white leaf slipped through his fingers and the stem dipped into the pool.

Suddenly a burst of wind blew it away from the pool and the tree. Hearing Aletha’s laugh in the distance, Luke chased after it.

Soon enough he found himself in a room filled with desks. It looked familiar, but Luke couldn’t place it.

He stood in the doorway watching Aletha. She was pressed gently against one of the desks, her arms wrapped around the neck of a man Luke couldn’t identify. Aletha was smiling and savoring the mystery man’s embrace.
She looked happier than Luke had ever seen her.

“They look good together, don’t they?”

Luke looked up in shock to find Felicity standing next to him. She was smiling at him, and somehow she looked different, though Luke couldn’t put his finger on it.

Felicity clasped his hand and cuddled into his side, “Almost as attractive as us. Almost. I refuse to admit he makes a cuter couple than I do.”

Luke laughed but couldn’t take his eyes off Aletha. He had never made her smile like that.

Felicity watched him carefully, “You love her… don’t you.”

“Not as much as I love you.”

“But you still love her.”

“Yes.” He looked her, “Are you mad?”

“Maybe a little jealous,” Felicity admitted, “but I understand. And I’m okay with it. I know what she means to you, and I know what I mean too. One doesn’t negate the other.”

“Is she happy with him?”

“We both know the answer to that.”

Luke sighed, “I just wish I could have made her that happy.”

Felicity rested her hand against his shoulder, “It’s okay, Luke. At the end of the day, we all realized where we belonged. You with me… and him with her.”

Aletha did look so happy with him.

Luke knew he had made the right decision in letting her go.

He looked at Felicity, and wrapped his arm around her waist, “I’ve missed you so much.”

Felicity smiled, “I missed you too.”

And they shared a tender kiss.

That was when Luke woke up. The vision cleared from his mind like a dream, but the imagine of Aletha with the other man stayed. He knew what that vision meant: someone out there a man was waiting for Aletha. He would be the one who got to live happily ever after with her.

But what about him? What about Luke’s happily ever after?

He looked over at Aletha sleeping peacefully next to him. Luke stroked her hair out of her face, and he understood. Like Jakku, she would not be a permanent fixture in his life. As wonderful as this love he shared with Aletha was… she was nothing more than a lull.
Luke kissed her forehead and accepted his fate.

In the morning they made their decision: when Jedek came next week to take Aletha away, that would be the end of their romance. Luke dare not tell her of his vision, but Aletha could see something in his eyes that made her okay with the choice.

“Don’t wait for me,” Luke urged. “Find someone who will love you the way Antar and I could never manage.”

They also decided that until their final day together, there was no harm in continuing their relationship just one more week. One more week of kissing, holding each other, and making love.

It was the goodbye they never got with Felicity, Nakari, nor Antar.

But they would have this one.

“You can’t go! No, I won’t let you!” Rey screamed.

“Rey, calm down, please,” Aletha urged as they explained their plan of action to Rey and Quom in the walker.

“You can’t leave!” Rey sobbed. She threw her arms around Aletha’s neck, “Please don’t leave me.”

Aletha cast a helpless look back at Quom and Luke.

“We’ll give you two a moment,” Luke said sadly. He patted the sullen Quom on the shoulder, “Come on.”

“Just a moment,” Quom said.

Luke exited the walker.

Quom waited a moment, and then dug in his bag. He pulled out a small object.

“Here, Doc,” he offered it to her. “This might help.”

Aletha smiled when she recognized it, “Thank you.”

Quom opened his mouth to say something, but thought the better of it and exited the walker.

For a long time, Aletha held Rey as she cried in her arms. Rey begged, screamed, and sobbed, doing all she could to get the woman she called mother in her heart to stay.

“I can’t, Sunshine,” Aletha cried on Rey’s shoulder. “If I could, I would stay in a heartbeat, but I can’t, Rey. I have to keep you safe.”

“But why? Why do you have to go?” Rey sobbed. “I don’t want you to go. I need you!”

“I need you too. You are truly a ray of light. Before you came into my life, living on Jakku was unbearable. You changed me, Sunshine, and so I have to return the favor and keep you safe.”

“But I don’t want you to go. I want you with me.”

“And I want you with me, but sometimes it’s just the hand you’re dealt with.”
Aletha held Rey for a while longer.

“I’m so sorry, Rey,” she whispered. “I know that this is sort of what happened with your mother. I don’t want you to relive it, but I don’t have a choice.”

“It’s just not fair,” Rey buried her face in Aletha’s neck.

Aletha took a deep breath and pulled back. She lifted Rey’s chin and looked her straight in the eyes.

“Rey, part of growing up is learning that sometimes the right choice, isn’t the desirable one,” Aletha said. “I know you understand that. You understand that I have to leave.”

With teary eyes, Rey nodded, “I know… I’m just afraid. Will we ever see each other again?”

“I don’t know,” Aletha confessed. “And I won’t promise you something I’m unsure of… but I will promise that I will do everything in my power to see you again. I truly hope we’re together again someday. I love you so much, Rey.”

She hesitated, “I love you too… Mom.”

Aletha winced, and gave something that could equally be a laugh or a cry, “Oh, don’t you start that. I can’t handle that.”

“I know. But it needed to be said. I’m going to miss you so much. Who am I supposed to talk girl things with now?”

Aletha stroked the side of Rey’s face and then handed her the object Quom had given her.

“What’s this?” Rey asked.

“Antar’s comm. The one we got off his body,” Aletha explained. “This would have gotten him in a lot of trouble if the Alliance found out he had it.”

“Why?”

“It’s a two-way comm. I have the other. This comm will connect to mine wherever you are in the galaxy. No one can hack into it, and it only goes to and from these two comms. Antar would have gotten in trouble for having it because Imperial spies among the Rebels often used them to communicate with the Empire. I want you to have this, so whenever you need to talk to me, you can.”

“Really?”

“I promise,” Aletha smiled. “Day or night, if you need to talk to me about anything at all, you use that comm. I swear to you, I will always pick up… Unless I’m in the middle of a surgery, and then I’ll call you back. No matter what you need to talk about – be it puberty, boys, frustrations with your dad, or a dream about a tapdancing Quom – I’ll be there to lend an ear.”

Rey threw her arms around Aletha, and held her tight.

“I love you, Mom.”

“I love you too, Sunshine.”
I have to stay, but they don’t. So it’s always a relief to see those strange ships lift off again.

- Rey’s Survival Guide

The day Aletha left came far too quickly for their little makeshift family. A few of the villagers had come to say goodbye to Aletha, and Roke made sure to tell her that their feud wasn’t over.

“I wouldn’t have it any other way,” Aletha grinned.

Roke just rolled his eyes and stormed off.

“Alright,” Aletha turned to look at her family as Jedek picked up her bag. “I guess this is goodbye.”

They were all trying not to cry.

None of them were succeeding.

“Are you also joining the Resistance, Jedek?” Teng asked the former Rebel.

He scoffed, “Nope.”

Rey frowned, “Why not?”

“What’s the point?” he asked. “If Luke Skywalker thinks it’s not worth fighting them, then what good is it to think the rest of us could beat them?”

Quom and Luke exchanged a look.

“I don’t think that’s why he went into hiding,” Quom said.

“Well, I’m not risking my family on your hunch, Tinadar,” Jedek replied.

He grinned at Luke, “Alright then, you have my word, Erso. The day I hear that Luke Skywalker has returned, I’ll join the Resistance.”

Jedek took Aletha’s bags and boarded his ship.

Aletha watched him go, and then decided to start her goodbye.

“Come here, Teng,” Aletha pulled him into a hug. “I am so proud of you, young man. You’ve grown into a fine young man.”

“Thanks, Aletha,” he smiled. “I still think you’re pretty badass.”

“I hope to prove you right. Oh, and Teng?” Aletha glanced at Rey. She leaned in and whispered to Teng, “Good luck with Rey. I’m rooting for you kids.”

Teng blushed, but hugged her one final time.
Aletha then turned to Quom.

He threw himself into their hug.

“We don’t need to say anything, okay?” Quom sobbed. “We’ll see each other again. This isn’t goodbye. I’m sure of it. I won’t let it be.”

“I believe that,” Aletha laughed. “I can’t wait to see what insane stunt you pull to full through on that.”

Quom laughed and they held each other for a while.

“Aletha?” he whispered.

“Yeah?”

“…Don’t,” the vulnerable side of Quom reared its rare head, “don’t forget me, okay?”

“Quom,” Aletha grinned, “how could I ever forget you. Come on, we took kicks to the face together. We’re bonded for life.”

“Promise?”

“Promise?”

It was Rey’s turn next. They had the same hugs and goodbyes, a vow of love and a wish for good luck. As they pulled apart, Rey finding the strength to let go, Aletha whispered in her eye.

“Day or night, you call me, okay?”

“I will,” Rey smiled. She stood with her arms still around Aletha, “This isn’t like when Mom left. You’re not letting me down.”

“Be strong my Rey of Sunshine,” Aletha clapped her shoulder. “You’re going to be an amazing young woman.”

Then Aletha turned to Luke.

Nothing needed to be said. They had had their final goodbye that morning, so all they shared as a final hug.

“I love you,” Aletha whispered.

Aletha smiled, “Any time.”

And as his heart broke, Luke let her go.

Aletha took a deep breath and looked around, “I love all of you. Never forget that. Goodbye. I hope we see each other again.”

“May the Force be with you,” Quom said.

She smiled and turned to enter the ship.

Quom’s words unsettled something in Luke.
“Wait!” Luke exclaimed when Jedek reached to close the door.

He surprised everyone by running up the ramp and grabbing Aletha.

“Aletha,” Luke pulled her away from the door, out of sight of everyone.

“Yes?” she looked at him with such hopeful eyes.

“Aletha,” Luke sighed, “I’m sorry, but this isn’t some last minute change of heart. I’m not about to declare my love for you and beg you to stay with me or offer to come with you. I love you, but we’ve made our decision here.”

Aletha looked down, “Yes, we have.”

He stroked away the tear that fell down her cheek, “I need you to promise me something.”

“What’s that?”

“Please… If you ever figure out who I truly am, I beg you please keep it a secret.”

“Luke?”

“You don’t understand now, and I pray you never will but it’ll all make sense one day. Please, Aletha, swear to me that if you figure it out, you’ll keep Rey and I safe from the First Order.”

She cupped his cheek and looked deep into his eyes, “Of course I will.”

“Thank you.” Luke sighed, “I’ve said it before and I’ll say it again, I was lucky enough to get three amazing women to love in my life. Nakari Kelen was my first love, Felicity Rhiaon was my true love, but you, Aletha Kymeri, I swear you’ll be the last woman I ever love.”

“I love you, Aletha Kymeri.”

They shared their final kiss, and then Luke let her go.

Aletha paused at the door, watched Luke rejoin their family, and waved. Then the ship’s door closed, and a few minutes later, Aletha’s ship was in the air, and she left Jakku.

Rey burst into tears the moment the ship was out of sight, and to everyone’s surprise, it was into Teng’s arms she threw herself.

“Probably thought you were going through a lot right now,” Quom murmured, trying to hold it all together. He hesitated, “We’ll see her again, right Luke?”

Luke shook his head, “I honestly don’t know.”

There was only one thing Luke was certain of: Aletha Kymeri would be his final love.

…but he would not be hers.

---

Two Months Later…
“Remind me again why you lot do this?” Kylo Ren asked as he sat in the mess hall of the juvenile Starkiller Base.

The leaders of the First Order would sit at the head of the hall at a long, elegant table on a raised platform. They never ate, just all five Captains sat there in full armor and helmet, staring down the other soldiers. Kylo had joined them that day, donning his own mask.

“Intimidation technique,” Captain Roan answered. “Never give them a moment where they think they aren’t being watched.”

“Plus there’s the bonus of them not seeing when you eat, so they never see a moment of humanity,” Captain Sigma added. “As far as any of them know, we could honestly be droids.”

“Somehow I don’t feel very honored with the fact that we have to eat in our rooms every night,” Captain Tyche said. “Getting crumbs in my bed isn’t something found in a good benefits package.”

“Are you questioning the Supreme Leader’s judgement?” Captain Phasma asked coolly.

All masked eyes turned on Tyche.

“Of course not,” he said quickly.

“I thought not,” Phasma said.

Kylo smirked behind his own helmet. He wished he had the ability to shut down complaints as easily as that. Phasma just had a presence about her; one that had taken an interesting turn the past few years.

“Don’t let them ever see you without a mask, Kylo,” Phasma advised. “My mask is my survival. Make it yours.”

“Well, I don’t think unmasking is that big a deal,” Captain Electra said. “Come now, Phasma. You take off your mask and I’ll take off mine. Let everyone see your true self.”

“Not a chance,” Phasma replied half-distracted. She was trying to pretend she hadn’t spotted FN-2187 in the crowd.

He had grown so much.

“Captains!”

The table stood at attention as General Hux joined them.

“Be seated,” Hux dismissed them. “We have a bit of a situation. We just received a very interesting message. It’s addressed ‘To the Woman Who Once Called Herself General Alecta Anthea.’”

The Captains muttered among themselves but fell silent when the woman who was once Alecta raised her hand.

“Who is it from?” Alecta asked, her voice elegant through the electronic modifier.

“Your sister.”

“Adrinna?”
“Aletha.”

Alecta frowned, “Aletha? She contacted me?”

“How would she have even gotten our contact information?” Tyche asked.

He shut up when Phasma turned her gaze on him.

“Sorry,” Tyche muttered.

“Better,” Alecta said. “What’s the message say? You can play it for the table.”

Hux withdrew a disc from his pocket and pressed a button. Soon the blue image of Aletha Kymeri stood in miniature atop their table.

“Alecta, you were never one much for many words, so I will keep this short,” Aletha said, staring straight ahead, even though Alecta was actually seated a little to the left. “I know you want to kill me, and I know you’ve found me on Jakku. I know that you plan to come to Jakku to end my life when you have the ability to get away, so I’m informing you that I have left the planet of Jakku. I will be joining the Resistance, and fight to take down this First Order organization you have gotten yourself involved in. I never wanted things to get this bad, but you’ve given me no choice. You want war? Then there’s only one thing to say to you, sister: bring it on.”

And that was the end of Aletha’s message.

“So that’s your sister?” Sigma asked. “You two have the same fire, Alecta.”

“She is no sister of mine, and you will call me by my proper title. Alecta Anthea died with the Empire. I bear my new name with pride.”

“My apologies,” Sigma bowed her head.

“Do we have to worry about this Aletha?” Kylo asked.

“Intel has very little to report on her,” Hux answered. “Not much to her other than she’s a doctor and a pretty good sniper.”

“There’s a combination you don’t see often,” Roan said.

“Then what’s the concern with this message?” Electra asked.

“The concern is the contents,” Hux said. “I was not informed that any of you were planning on making a side trip to Jakku for assassination purposes.”

“All side trips are confined to our allotted time off,” Phasma removed. “It wouldn’t be breaking any rules.”

“Oh, I’m sure you’ve studied those rules thoroughly,” Hux glared at Phasma. “But let me make myself very clear: none of you will be making any side trips. Not Phasma. Not Electra. Not any of you Captains. You only go where I order you to.”

“And me,” Kylo shot to his feet, interrupting. “You go where I tell you to as well.”

Hux openly rolled his eyes at Kylo, “Yes, Ren. We all know how much of the Supreme Leader’s lapdog you are.”
“Now if only you were as intimidating as you believe yourself to be,” Electra bolded said.

Kylo narrowed his eyes at her, but deep down it tore at his insecurities. He had tried so hard to be frightening, and yet here he was being put in his place by the actual most terrifying person in the First Order.

He felt a gloved hand on his shoulder.

“Don’t you listen to her,” Phasma said, gently patting his shoulder. “We all know how much of a venomous bitch Electra can be.”

“If that is what you wish to label me,” Electra chuckled. “But just you wait; one day my venom will get you.”

“I look forward to overcoming it. Though I don’t think that would take much effort.”

Electra glared at Phasma from behind her mask.

“Captains,” Hux scolded, “I would like to return to the point of side trips. You will never be making one of your own arrangement. Is that understood?”

“Yes, Sir,” all five Captains answered in unison.

Hux narrowed his eyes at Phasma, “I’m not sure about you, so I want to hear it from your lips. Swear to me, PH-5177. Swear to me that no matter what happens – whether it be the work of Aletha Kymeri, Leia Organa, or even Luke Skywalker himself – you will never return to Jakku unauthorized and alone.”

“I swear it, General Hux,” Phasma vowed. “I will not attempt to go to Jakku without authorization.”

Hux didn’t see the fingers crossed behind her back.

“Hand me the Harris wrench?”

“Sure,” Teng tossed it to her.

He watched as Rey caught it and diligently went back to work.

They were alone in the tent, working on Rey’s speeder. Luke and Quom were out scavenging and wouldn’t be back for hours.

It was a suffocatingly hot day. Rey was bent over her speeder, fiddling with the engine, covered in sweat. She was panting, her newly developed breasts heaving in the heat. From sweat, her clothes stuck to her slender but athletic form. Not a negative sign of puberty on her, no pimples, no unruly hair, no teenaged awkwardness of any kind. Rey Erso was utterly irresistible.

And Teng couldn’t resist anymore.

“Rey?”

She turned around and his lips were on hers. His kiss was hot and hungry, and Rey moaned as her arms wrapped around his neck.
“I’ve wanted this for so long,” Teng’s voice was husky.

“Me too,” Rey panted. “I’ve thought of it so many times.”

And then his lips were back on hers, and his hands were on her body. Roaming, caressing, exploring. He pressed her against the speeder, and his lips started to trail down her neck.

“Oh yes, Teng, please,” Rey encouraged, cupping his head against her body as he got lower and lower towards her breast.

One of his rough hands fiddled with the hem of her shirt, and she moaned as it slid up, underneath her shirt. Up her soft sides, her stomach, and ribcage and then enclosed over her brea-

Rey gasped as her eyes shot opened. The walker was pitch dark, and it was probably about two in the morning. Her body was hot and tingly as she gripped the blankets in her hammock, desperately trying to hold onto the forbidden images of her dream.

Her father’s voice startled her, “Rey? Are you alright?”

She swallowed, her mind reeling from the images she had conjured.

“Oh, yes. I’m okay,” Rey lied.

Luke frowned at her in the darkness, sensing her distress, “Bad dream?”

“Oh no,” she whispered. “A very good one.”

He just scowled, staring at his daughter for a very long time, debating whether or not to pry.

“Alright,” Luke laid down, settling back to sleep. “But if you need anything-”

“I’m fine,” Rey said quickly.

She stared up at the roof of the walker tensely, gripping the edges of her blankets, waiting for the soft snores of her father to signal she had gotten away with it. It took too long for them to come, but came they did.

Rey let out a breath of relief. She tried to settle back to sleep, but her mind was racing to remember her dream, trying to make sense of it.

What had that all been about?

Chapter End Notes

Coming Up Next Chapter…

The Burdens of Independence
Rey completes her speeder and finds independence is a lot tougher than it sounds. Meanwhile, Luke gets a blast from the past when he’s recognized in the market.
Credit of the Nakari flashbacks (with the exception of the end of the cake one and the whole virginity one which I wrote) goes to Kevin Hearne from Heir to the Jedi. Flashbacks have been edited a little because the book is in first person and I write in third.

First of all, to anyone worried, this is not the last we’re going to see of Aletha. She will now be part of the Resistance and we’ll keep tabs on her, but at this point she’s no longer a main character for the moment. In fact, we’re going to see a lot of her in the next few chapters, but I will state it for the record: Aletha and Luke are not endgame. This is the conclusion of their romance. Will they meet again? Time will tell, but it’s time for Aletha to move on to someone else. I hope you’ll come to enjoy the new romance. Her future partner has even been foreshadowed a few times already. I wonder if anyone (other than the two people I’ve already told) can guess who that is.

…I’m going to get thirty emails guessing Poe, aren’t I?

And yay! This is the last chapter posted before the release of The Last Jedi. For two years I’ve been writing this story, and I’m happy to have had you along for the ride. I’m sorry we haven’t gotten to TFA yet, but hey, as I plan to continue this story with the events of TLJ, it allows me room to adjust to fit that.

Honestly, I’m going to try not to change really anything from my current plans, but I might have to. I’ll admit to anything I do have to change, but the thing I’m worried about is a big event that happens later in this story. Depending on what happens during TLJ, I may end up bringing it forward to the next chapter. I really, really, really do not want to do it, but we’ll see if TLJ has to force my hand. (Okay, you know you’ve been writing Star Wars fan fiction too long when you automatically capitalize the word Force.)

Word of warning, for the next chapter the bottom author’s note will contain a spoiler for TLJ, and that will be whether or not Rey is Luke’s daughter. I’m either going to angrily rant, or smugly gloat depending on the result. I literally pray to God it’s the latter. So, if you haven’t seen TLJ by the time the next chapter is posted, skip the bottom author’s note.
Chapter Summary

Rey finishes her speeder, Luke encounters an old foe, and Aletha meets her biggest fan.

Chapter Notes

New rule, guys! Don’t put TLJ spoilers in your reviews until at least a month has passed since it’s released. Special thanks to the person who decided they were going to be “helpful” and intentionally told me the result of Rey’s parentage before I saw the movie, so I wouldn’t stress about it.

Truth be told, your intention had the exact opposite effect. Please don’t do such a thing in the future, thank you.

Thoughts on The Last Jedi and how it affects my story are included at the bottom of the chapter.

Although, I will say this, literally for pretty much no reason at all because of that movie I am now shipping Poe/Kaydel (Billie Lourd’s character) so that’s going to be a thing in this story. I really like the idea of Poe just having this girlfriend in the background, and I think it’ll be something fun to add to the story.

Also the whole plot Kaydel has in this chapter literally came out of nowhere. Seriously, it popped into my head and spun out of control, so sorry if it feels so random, because frankly it is. But hey, let’s give this storyline a shot. Who cares if the galaxy gets a little smaller? I like connecting characters and it’s my fic. Worst case scenario we just have some more background on the character.

See the end of the chapter for more notes.
Get the best tools you can, learn to use them, and maintain them properly.

- Rey’s Survival Guide

When Rey turned fifteen years old, Luke was surprised to find that Jakku did have a set of laws. A very small set, mostly things like no murder, no rape, no unlawful imprisonment. Most laws weren’t even enforced, but there was a set of them.

From his own experience with planetizing Rornian, and the knowledge he had gained from Felicity’s previous line of work, Luke figured that it was so no government – whether it be Imperial or Republic – could come in and instate the standard set of baseline laws then.

Luke wasn’t fond of the idea of Jakku’s pre-emptive laws, but understood it. However, there was one law that made him very nervous.

“Rey is legally an adult on Jakku?” Luke stared at Quom in horror.

“No, he was fourteen. And besides, slavery and age of majority are two separate issues.”

“Yeah, we still haven’t dealt with the fact that you technically own Teng as your slave.”

“When he starts paying me rent, I’ll give him his freedom. Until then, tough.”

Luke put his head in his hands, “You act as if slavery is your thirty-year-old son still living in your basement.”

“Hey, he had a chance to move out but he didn’t take it.”

Having the same thought, Luke and Quom turned to look at the tent that once belonged to Aletha Kymeri. These days it was occupied by a group of newcomer scavengers who had no idea their home had been the centerpiece for so many important events of an odd little family’s lives.

“I can’t believe it’s been six months since she left,” Luke sighed heavily. “Feels like just yesterday I was waking up at her side.”

“Hey.” Quom set down his tools and placed a hand on Luke’s shoulder, “You guys made the right decision. If the First Order found out about Rey-”

“I know. It’s just hard.”

Quom gave a small smile, “Yeah. It’s for me too. She was the first friend I ever had on Jakku, and I’ve been here a very long time.”

“She changed our lives.”

“In the best way possible.”
Luke sighed, “I just wonder what she’s doing right now.”

Doctor Aletha Kymeri was nervous as she stepped into the command centre of the Resistance Base on D’Qar. She was wearing a brand new Resistance uniform, and her old Rebellion medic bag was slung over her shoulder. It had been a hard six months, first getting herself recertified as a Doctor – it was a marvel how much medicine had advanced since the end of the war – and then actually getting herself to the Resistance. Not to mention readjusting to civilization after so many years of Jakku. But she had done it and she had made a show of it. She put in her application for the Resistance in the most convoluted manner, going through every piece of paperwork, ensuring that the First Order would be tipped off to her whereabouts.

It had been a hassle, but it was worth it to protect Rey and Luke.

She missed them so much. Quom and Teng too. For years they had been her family and now she had no one. Standing in the command centre, she was alone in the Galaxy. It was time to start over once more, to let go of Jakku, to let go of her sisters, to let go of Antar… to let go of Luke.

“Don’t wait for me,” he had urged. “Find someone who will love you the way Antar and I could never manage.”

It was time to move on from the past.

Well… not entirely. She was in a base filled with several former Rebels; she was bound to run into a familiar face at some point. Unfortunately, her only lead at the moment was Nils Arlos, who she had discovered during her application process to have taken up Head of Recruitment. It made sense; Nils Arlos was so good at talking people into things, he probably could have convinced Palpatine to destroy the Death Star.

But it was not Arlos that Aletha was looking for; it was another face from her past. Albeit, not a familiar face, one she had only seen once before and couldn’t pick out from a crowd…Which was proving to be a bad thing as she literally scanned the crowds of people in the room, looking for her.

Who would have thought figuring out which one was General Leia Organa would be such a difficult task?

Chrep beep che.

Aletha startled at the cheerful chirping. She looked down and found an orange and white droid staring up at her. The model was one of which she had never seen: a large ball with a smaller affixed on top. The head wasn’t upright, rather the droid was leaning backwards at an angle, staring up with a giant black eye in what Aletha could have sworn was a look of curiosity.

Beep bop?

“Uh… Hello,” Aletha smiled politely at the droid.

Bip.

Aletha and the droid stared at each other.

After a few moments, the droid’s head swung slightly to the side, and then after a few more moments returned to its original position. He sat up slightly, though was still leaning back, gazing up at her.
Boip boop boo?

Aletha just bit her lip. It had been years since she had had to interact with a droid, and frankly she didn’t know what to do.

The droid seemed to get the hint, because its head moved to the upright position. He rolled forward the few inches between them – Aletha was amazed to see the head stay in position as the lower ball rolled – and he bumped gently into Aletha, prodding her before rolling back and repeating his inquiry.

Boip boop boo?

“Uh, I’m sorry,” Aletha tightly gripped the strap of her medical bag. “I don’t understand binary.”

The droid rolled back an inch and looked at her for a moment. He then turned his head and let out a very loud squeal, like the ones Rey used to make to get her father’s attention when she was five and he wasn’t paying attention.

Sure enough, a man’s head shot up and looked at the droid. He exhaled part in humour and part in annoyance. He appeared to excuse himself from his conversation, and walked towards his droid.

“Allright, alright, BB, I’m coming,” the young man came to a stop in front of them. “What’s up, Buddy?”

The droid launched into a series of beeps, bops, and squeals, his head moving animatedly between the young man and Aletha. The droid rolled towards her a few times during his storytelling, and the young man observed it all with a smile.

“Is that all, Buddy?” the young man laughed when the droid finished.

Yip.

The young man chuckled, “He wants to know your name.”

“My name?” Aletha blinked.

“BB-8 here doesn’t recognize you, so he came over to check you over and find out who you are. New recruit?”

“Of a sort. I’m a Rebel veteran.”

“Oh, well then, welcome back. Judging by the medical armband and the number of wing rank patches you have on your arm, I must say you’ll be very helpful. We could always use more doctors around here, Doctor…?”

“Kymeri,” she provided. “Aletha Kymeri.”

“Poe Dameron,” he offered his hand. “Commander of Black Squadron.”

“Dameron?” Aletha shook it. “I know that name. Where have I… You’re Kes and Shara’s boy, aren’t you?”

He looked surprised, “Uh, yeah. You knew them?”

“Briefly. I did a few of your mother’s checkups when she was pregnant with you… Wow, there’s nothing to make you feel old than to meet the grown-up child you did pre-natal checkups for. How “How old are you, if you don’t mind me asking?”

“Twenty-eight.”

“Yep, I am old.”

“Well, you certainly don’t look it,” Poe winked. “So, what are you doing in the Command Centre?”

“Oh, I just arrived. I was told to get my uniform and check in with General Organa, so here I am,” Aletha gestured to her uniform. “Do you know which one- I mean where the General is?”

Poe grinned, “This way, Doctor.”

He brought Aletha toward the center of the room where a group of officers were discussing battle strategies.

“I’m telling you, engaging them on the ground gives us far better odds than in aerial combat,” a bearded officer said.

A man in a pilot’s uniform disagreed, “We have some of the finest pilots in the Galaxy among our ranks. Nothing the First Order has is even on par with our boys.”

“And girls,” an older woman in a purple vest with an air of power about her shot the pilot a hard look. “We have many fine young women piloting for us as well, Captain Gisk.”

“Don’t mind Vash, General,” Poe interjected. “He comes from Tanoor, and we all know what they think about females there.”

“Then he’d do well to remember that we are not on Tanoor,” the woman’s gaze didn’t move from Vash Gisk. “I will not tolerate sexism, no matter how casual the avenue. And I think you’ll find that most soldiers on this base won’t stand for it either. A fair majority of our members joined in the name of Shara Bey, Fliss, or my brother’s daughter.”

“A good number joined because of Alyla Kene too,” added a man Aletha recognized. His eyes lit up with he saw her, “Speaking of strong women, look who we have here. Welcome back, Medic Anthea.”

“Hello Commander Arlos,” Aletha smiled at Nils. “I’m surprised you remember me.”

“How could I forget? You were the best at drugging suspicious intakes.”

“Strangest accolade I’ve ever been given, but hey, I’ll take it. And it’s not Medic Anthea anymore.”

“Commander Dameron?” the other woman looked to Poe, who was observing the scene patiently. “Who is this you’ve brought us?”

“General Organa,” Poe gestured to the woman and then Aletha, “may I introduce you to Doctor Aletha Kymeri?”

“It’s a pleasure,” Leia Organa offered her hand.

“Pleasure’s all mine,” Aletha nervously shook the General’s hand.

She couldn’t help but wonder what Rey would make of Aletha shaking the hand of one of her heroes. Rey would definitely freak out if Han Solo was anywhere nearby, and considering that Leia was wearing a wedding ring, that was a possibility.
“We’re blessed to have this one, General,” Nils said. “Aletha Kymeri was one of the finest medics and snipers in the Alliance. Kenu handpicked her himself.”

Aletha’s blushed, “He exaggerates.”

Leia smiled, “Don’t worry, I know Arlos well enough by now to know when he’s getting a little too hyperbolic… Though I’d wager there is more than a kernel of truth to his claims.”

“Maybe a little,” Aletha admitted.

“Kymeri, huh?” Leia thought about the name. “Any relation to Antar Kymeri?”

The question took her by surprise.

“His war widow, unfortunately,” Aletha admitted.

“My condolences.”

“Thank you. Did you know him?”

“I knew of him,” Leia corrected. “My sister-in-law liked to tell the story of how she recruited him.”

“Oh yes, the sixteen-year-old Fliss manages to talk two Stormtroopers into joining the Rebellion story,” Nils laughed. “I haven’t heard that one in ages.”

“And yet, I could still recite it in my sleep,” Leia laughed. “I take it that this is your first day with us, Doctor Kymeri.”

“Officially, but I’ve been in the process for months,” Aletha answered.

“Yes, she’s been giving me a proper headache over her admission,” Nils playfully scolded her.

Aletha looked away awkwardly.

Nils sensed his error and added more seriously, “Though, considering the circumstances of your family, I do not blame you.”

Leia frowned, “Circumstances?”

Nils bent down and whispered in Leia’s ear. It was a horrifying thirty seconds as Aletha watched the look on Leia’s face as she realized the sister of Captain Phasma was standing in front of her. Aletha was just thankful that Nils Arlos had given her the privacy of hiding it from the others in the room.

“Oh, that does make sense then,” Leia admitted when she was properly informed.

Aletha looked away, “General, if I make you uncomfortable-”

“I am the last person to judge anyone over a blood relation,” Leia’s voice was kindly yet firm. “My birth father was the second-in-command of the Empire after all.”

“And your son the second-in-command of the First Order,” Vash Gisk muttered.

A dozen sets of horrified eyes turned on Vash. The looks seemed to work because he quickly tried to backtrack.

“General-” he started.
“You’re dismissed, Captain Gisk,” Poe cut him off. “Leave the General right now.”

“Commander Dameron—”

“Dismissed,” he said firmly. “Go.”

Vash looked around the group, then grumbled and stormed off to another section of the room to review the latest scouting reports.

“I, um… I’m aware of the identity of Kylo Ren,” Aletha admitted.

Leia gave a half-hearted smile, “It’s hard not to be. If you don’t mind me asking, why are you only now joining the Resistance?”

“Well, my sister has vowed to kill me, and when she learned where I was, I figured there was safety in numbers. As for why I waited so long, honestly, it was quite easy not to pay attention to the First Order where I was living.”

“Where were you living?”

“Jakku.”

The group went perfectly silent.

And Aletha had no idea why.

“Is something wrong?” she timidly asked.

No one dare speak up in Leia’s stead.

Leia thought about her words hard, “Jakku… doesn’t have many happy memories for me.”

“Have you been there?” Aletha obliviously asked.

“No, but… my sister-in-law and niece were there for a brief time.”

“What are their names? Maybe I know them. I’ve been living on Jakku since the end of the war. We probably crossed paths.”

“I highly doubt it.”

The conversation was too painful to watch. Poe Dameron was so happy when he heard an accented voice call out his name, and he could excuse himself and BB-8.

“Perfect timing, Commander Nalto,” Poe approached Diego, who had just entered the command center. “I have never been happier to have to read through reconnaissance paperwork than today.”

Diego frowned at the stiff looking group of leaders. None of them were saying a word as an unfamiliar blonde kept pushing Leia for some explanation, but instead received very clipped answers.

“What’s going on over there?” Diego asked.

“New doctor,” Poe explained. “She’s been living on Jakku and apparently didn’t get the memo about what happened to Rey and Fliss. Thinks she can bond with Leia over the fact that her sister-in-law and niece were once on Jakku. It’s so painful to watch.”
Diego cringed, his heart aching as he remembered once more the incidents that led to the deaths of Rey and Felicity Rhiaon Skywalker. Just hearing that the Doctor was bringing it up pained Diego; he could only imagine how much worse it was for Leia.

“Stay here,” Diego ordered Poe.

“Gladly,” Poe replied.

Diego looked down at the datapad in his hands, and got his idea. He marched straight up to the group as the Doctor continued to pry for answers.

“I’ve seen quite a few children on Jakku over the years, General,” Aletha said. “I’m sure that at some point-”

“General Organa!” Diego interrupted. He stepped between Leia and Aletha and held out his datapad, “Latest intel is in. Your hunch was right; the First Order is tailing my squadron. We should switch from Rogue to Black as our mainstay for a while. Reconnaissance and my proposed plan are all in this outline.”

“Thank you, Commander Nalto,” Leia nodded. She gave her best political smile to Aletha, “Pardon me for a moment, Doctor Kymeri.”

“Of course,” Aletha nodded, suppressing her frown. She had finally caught onto the fact something was wrong, but she didn’t know what.

Leia excused herself for a moment – as well as most of the officers, who were so happy to get away from the situation. But Diego stayed standing in front of Aletha, his back to her, almost as if guarding Leia from her.

“Word of advice, Doctor,” Diego said in a low voice. He had leaned backwards to be closer to Aletha, but did not turn to look at her, “Never mention Jakku to General Organa.”

Aletha let herself frown, “Did… did something happen? I’m sorry, Jakku really is behind the times when it comes to world news. We only heard about the Temple Village slaughter about a year ago.”

“We tend to refer to that as the Burning of Rornian,” Diego corrected. “And yes, something very bad happened.”

“What was that?”

Diego debated or not whether to answer. The Burning of Rornian and subsequent murders of Rey and Felicity – while the exact details of Rey’s death was known, all in the Resistance insisted on referring to it as a murder – had been a very painful series of events for many people, himself included. But could he really snub her because she was simply out of the loop?

“Her sister-in-law and niece were murdered on Jakku by the First Order,” Diego declared.

Aletha gasped, “Oh my goodness! I had no idea. If I had known, I never would have asked General Organa-”

“It’s alright. I’m sure she understands the context of your error. But like I said, it’s a sore spot that no one around here likes much to discuss. Especially when it comes to Fliss’ daughter. That poor little girl deserved so much better.”
Of course, perhaps if Diego had revealed the actual story to Aletha at that time of how Rey allegedly died in the desert, Felicity was kidnapped by the First Order, and then shot in the head a few days later, Aletha might have put things together then and there. Perhaps the entire story of the Galaxy would have been different, but words are a tricky thing and should always be carefully chosen.

Intentional or not, there is always great damage done when something is presented simply from a certain point of view.

“How old was she?” Aletha asked. “The little girl?”

Diego sighed, “I… I don’t remember. I think she was six, or maybe seven. She was barely more than a toddler.”

“But why? Why would they go after her?”

“Snoke wanted the daughter of Luke Skywalker to corrupt the way he corrupted Ben Solo.”

“And her mother?”

“Do you know who Leia’s sister-in-law is?” Diego asked.

“Sort of,” Aletha replied. “I know that she was Rogue One, but I’ve never been informed of her actual name. I assume her surname was Skywalker in the later part of life.”

“Partly. She took her husband’s name, but also retained her own. Fliss wasn’t fond of the connection either had individually, so thought maybe putting them together was the lesser of two evils. Although she seriously considered combining them into Rhiwalker at one point. But as Rogue One, she pissed off a lot of people, especially officers in the First Order, and with her personality it was only a matter of time before her mouth got her into trouble she couldn’t escape. She was a strong woman… but not an invincible one.”

“You knew her?”

Diego couldn’t help but turn to face her and grin, “I’m Rogue Two.”

Aletha blinked in shock, though she wasn’t sure if it was because she was standing in front of the only other survivor of Operation Citadel… or because he was rather handsome.

“Commander Nalto,” Leia returned to the pair. “I’ve given it a preliminary glance, and I think we should be able to give your plan the go-ahead. There’s still a few things I need to discuss with the other Squadrons first.”

“Of course,” Diego grinned. “Can’t just start ordering around Dameron’s lot without his go-ahead… Not that I really need it as Head of our Air Force, but I don’t particularly enjoy his droid ramming into my leg whenever we disagree.”

“Tell the other leaders to meet me by the Council Table in about thirty minutes. I first have to escort Doctor Kymeri to the Medical Center and introduce her to Doctor Kalonia.”

“Oh, you don’t have to do that,” Aletha dismissed.

“It’s an honour we grant to those Rebels who chose to return to the fight,” Leia said. “It’s no trouble at all.”

“General, if you’re occupied, why don’t I escort Doctor Kymeri?” Diego offered. “Until I get your go-ahead, I’m simply on standby for orders.”

Leia looked between Aletha and Diego, her brow raised so slightly that it wasn’t noticeable to the pair. She didn’t need the Force to sense what was starting to brew in front of her.

“Very well, then,” Leia agreed. “Send Doctor Kalonia my regards. Meredyth will have all of Doctor Kymeri’s final paperwork and information. You two should head over at once so Doctor Kymeri can settle in as quickly as possible. War waits for no one.”

“Yes, General,” Diego bowed his head. He turned and offered his arm to Aletha, “Shall we?”

Aletha smiled and accepted his arm, “We shall.”

“Cafeteria is just down that hallway,” Diego pointed to a corridor as they passed it. “Quarters are to the left of this intersection. As a doctor, you’ll be getting the nicest quarters, which are also right next to the Medical Center. Kalonia should show you the way to your assignment. Doctors also don’t get roommates, so you lucked out on that one.”

“Oh, roommates aren’t that bad,” Aletha said. “Honestly, I like having someone I know will be around. I don’t know anyone but Nils Arlos around here.”

“Well, you know Dameron, the General, and I already, so that’s a start.”

“Indeed. So are you truly Rogue Two?” Aletha asked.

“In the flesh. Have the war wound to prove it,” Diego held up his arm and rolled back his sleeve to reveal the long, ugly scar left by a lightsaber. “Got this from Vader himself. Lucky he didn’t just take it off altogether.”

“Lucky indeed.” Aletha reached for his arm, “May I?”

“Of course.”

They stopped walking so that Aletha could examine it.

“This may sound morbid, but this is impressive work,” Aletha admitted. “Vader knew exactly what he was doing when delivering this. You’re still functional enough to fly?”

“Have spasms sometimes, but otherwise I’m fine,” Diego answered. He caught her look, “Alright, my motor skills may not be as great as they once were, my nervous system is a little messed up, my reflexes aren’t as quick – though nowhere near grounding levels – and the sensation of touch is a little lower, but I’ve lived a good life with this.”

“Well, your spouse must be happy that you managed to survive.”

“Unfortunately there is no such figure in my life.”

“Really? I would have expected since you helped take down the Death Star that might have counted for something.”

“Was married to the job for many years, then woke up one day and found that I had forgotten to pursue romance.” Diego rolled up his sleeve, “Of course, it’s never too late, but after you hit your fifties the dating pool narrows quite a bit.”
“Believe me, I understand. I’m fifty-five next year.”

Diego smiled at her, “Wouldn’t think it from looking at you.”

Aletha blushed, “Living on Jakku, you get a lot of sunshine. I think that’s the only reason I haven’t gone totally grey yet.”

“Hair dye is my secret, but I’ll deny it if you tell anyone.”

Aletha laughed, “Only if you tell me the secrets to such a convincing dye job. Do you do your facial hair too?”

“It’s a time-consuming process,” Diego started them off towards the Medical Center again. “So, living on Jakku?”

“I wouldn’t recommend it. Not the nicest place.”

“Oh, I know. I lived there for about a month.”

“Really? When?”

“When Fliss and I stole the Death Star plans, we hid out on Jakku for a month until we could get in contact with the Alliance. Worked for Unkar Plutt, packaging rations.”

Aletha stopped in her tracks and grinned at him, “Oh, I’m sorry. We can’t keep talking. I can’t be friends with an associate of Unkar Plutt.”

“Friendship, really?” Diego laughed and casually nudged her forward as if they had been playing around for years. “Is that what you’re after?”

“Would you be scared if I said yes?”

Diego looked at her and realized her voice was only half joking.

“Would you be scared if I said I was okay with that?” Diego asked.

Aletha smiled gently, “No.”

“Neither would I. I get what it’s like to be alone. Everyone should have a least one friend. It breaks my heart to hear when a person has none.”

She bit her lip, her mind going to those she left behind on Jakku, “I do have friends. A few people on Jakku I would gladly give my life for.”

“Why are they not here with you?”

“I left them to protect them from my sister and the First Order,” Aletha answered. “It would destroy me if I caused them harm. So I made the decision to keep them safe and leave them behind, no matter how much it hurt me.”

He placed a hand on her arm, “It takes a very strong person to do that. I’m sure they’re grateful for your sacrifice.”

“I know. I just wish I wasn’t alone here.”

“You’re not. I promise.”
That was the moment Diego Nalto realized how beautiful Aletha Kymeri was.

“Sorry,” he quickly removed his hand from her arm.

Aletha would be lying if she said she wanted him to.

“So did you enjoy your time on Jakku?” Diego said as they continued to walk down the hallway.

“Parts of it,” Aletha admitted. “I had a romance for a few years, but sadly things didn’t work out.”

“Is that why you left?”

“No, it was the psychopathic sister. It’s probably a good thing I left, though. I ended up getting in a feud with Unkar Plutt’s right hand man.”

“Now this is a story I have to hear.”

So Aletha told him the story of Roke and the steelpecker scars. She kept Luke’s identity vague, and left Rey out of the tale entirely. Diego didn’t notice; he was too busy enjoying her story.

“You really headbutted him?” Diego laughed.

“My head colliding with his face made the most satisfying smack,” Aletha grinned. “You think that’s a good story, I should tell you about the time I shot a woman in the knee.”

“Oh, I am definitely hearing that story.”

Diego held out an arm to halt Aletha. They were standing in front of a large set of doors with the words MEDICAL CENTER bolted to the wall above.

“Here we are,” Diego announced.

“So I see,” Aletha said. “Thank you, Commander Nalto for showing me the way.”

“It’s no problem. And call me Diego.”

“It’s a pleasure, Aletha.”

Diego looked at the doors and felt something ache inside him. He didn’t want her to go into that room; he wanted her to stay and talk with him for a few more minutes.

Aletha would never admit to him she felt the same way.

“I should go,” she reluctantly said.

“Of course,” Diego nodded. “Uh, Doctor Meredyth Kalonia is who you’ll report to. She’ll take care of the rest.”

“Thank you, Diego. It’s been a pleasure. Maybe I’ll see you around.”

“I’m sure our paths will cross again.”

Aletha smiled, but made no further response. When the silence lingered long enough, she nodded at Diego, then started towards the doors.
“Wait, Aletha,” Diego found himself saying not of his own volition.

“Yes,” she paused, her hand hovering over the door button.

“Um…” Diego thought for something, anything to justify his objection. “I was just wondering… what did you miss the most on Jakku?”

Aletha thought about her answer, “Flowers.”

Diego lifted a brow, “Flowers? Not food, better shelter, clothes, or water?”

“Food, shelter, clothes, and water are the basics of life. If you can survive, you’ll find them in some form. Flowers are the beauty of the galaxy, and beauty is guaranteed nowhere. Beauty is enjoyment, and enjoyment is not only the reason we push ourselves to survive, but why we fight to protect our lives. There was only a handful of flowers on Jakku, as drab and dry as the rest of the planet. I used to help collect flowers for a little girl on Jakku. They always make me think of happy times. Even if the world is full of darkness, at least we still have flowers.”

He stared at Aletha for a long time, and then smiled.

“You’re really something, Aletha Kymeri.”

Aletha blushed once more, “I’m nothing special.”

“I find that very hard to believe.”

She said nothing further, just smiled, and entered the Medical Center.

Five minutes later, Diego was still grinning at the door.

When Doctor Meredyth Kalonia showed Aletha to her quarters, Aletha found a surprise sitting on her bedside table. A vase of sundrops – D’Qar’s most famous flower – and a handwritten note.

Welcome back to the fight, Aletha. I hope we prove to be better than Jakku.

- Diego

Aletha really hoped she saw him again.

Once I built my speeder, I had my independence. Not real independence, of course. There’s no such thing on Jakku – Unkar controls everything. But while I’m here I can go where I want, when I want.

- Rey’s Survival Guide

The group was tense as they stood around the ominous red machine, all of their hopes, dreams, and fears placed upon it.
It’s now or never, Rey,” Luke told his daughter.

Rey wrung her hands nervously, “What if we did something wrong? What if I connected the wrong thing, or put too much power into it, or too little? What if once I turn it on, it blows up? Or what if-”

“Oh what if you did this perfectly and you actually managed to build your own speeder?” Luke cut off. “Come on, Sweetheart. We both know you’ve done this.”

“Yeah, Starlight,” Teng said, “we’ve triple checked everything. It’s going to work.”

“It would take a miracle for me to have made my own speeder using the junk of the Graveyard,” Rey dismissed. “And there’s no miracles on Jakku.”

“Yes, there are,” Quom refuted. “Now get on up there, Miracle Girl.”

Teng put a hand on Rey’s shoulder and looked her in the eye, “Come on, Rey. You can do this.”

She smiled at the encouraging expressions of the men in her life, “Alright. I’ll do it.”

The trio cheered as Rey climbed atop her speeder.

She smiled and pulled them down. Rey gathered her courage and took a deep breath.

“Come on, Baby,” Rey whispered, stroking the ratty, red metal. “Don’t fail me now.”

Then she started the ignition.

Nothing blew up.

“I did it!” Rey exclaimed. “I did it! I built a functioning speeder. I DID IT!”

The group cheered and celebrating, giving pats on the back, shoulders, and even a few hugs – Quom’s hug of Luke lingered for an awkward too long time – as Rey raced around the desert on her speeder.

“She’s perfect!” Rey declared when she turned it off, satisfied with her tests. She jumped straight into the arms of her father, “I did it!”

Luke stumbled back by the sudden force, “Oof! Yeah, you did, but careful with me, Rey.”

“Sorry Dad,” she grinned pulling back. She turned to pull Quom into a hug, “But I just can’t believe it.”

“I knew you could do it, MG,” Quom laughed. “Aletha would be so proud of you.”

Rey looked down sadly, “I just wish she could see.”

“You’ll show her one day,” Teng promised.

She pulled Teng into a hug that startled him, but he was all too happy to accept.

“Thank you, Teng,” Rey whispered, holding him close. He was so warm and sturdy; she always felt protected in his arms, “I could never have done this without you.”

“It’s my pleasure,” Teng replied. She was so soft and fit so perfectly in his arms. He held her tight, relishing the feeling of her body against his. Teng murmured under his breath, “Believe me. It’s my pleasure.”

It was probably a good three minutes of hugging before the pair remembered they had an audience.

“Sorry,” Rey exclaimed as they pulled apart and tried to avoid the amused gazes of Quom and Luke. “Sort of lost track of things there.”

“I promise, Sir,” Teng held up his hands defensively, “I didn’t mean for that to go on so long.”

“Honestly we didn’t do anything because we just wanted to see how long it took before you remembered us.” Quom narrowed his eyes at Teng, “Now if you rapscallion would remember where to keep your hands—”

“It was a hug, Quom!” Rey exclaimed.

Her protests weren’t out of annoyance though. Her vigor was from the fact that over the past several months, Rey couldn’t shake those forbidden dreams of Teng’s hands on her body that made her wake up feeling all tingly. It couldn’t have meant anything, though. Teng was just the only boy she really knew. Of course her brain would put him in those dreams; there were just no other candidates.

Why she felt the urge to let her hands wander her body after those dreams was a whole matter altogether.

Puberty truly was a bitch when your father slept a foot away from your bed.

“One day it’s hugs, the next we’re having a quickie wedding to cover up a mistake,” Quom warned. “You mark my words.”

“It’s my purpose in life,” Quom said proudly.

Rey rolled her eyes.

“Well, since this speeder experiment is such a success, why don’t we do something to celebrate?” Luke suggested.

“Like what?” Teng asked.

“How about you two be the ones who scavenge today?”

“Wait, what?” Rey exclaimed. “Like… alone?”

“Quom and I will watch the shop,” Luke said. “I trust the two of you to be responsible. If you need anything just call our comms.”

“You’re serious?” Rey grinned. “I can go scavenging alone?”

“Take Teng with you. Safety in numbers and all that, but yeah. I trust you, and according to the actually existing laws of Jakku we apparently have, you are an adult. Go on. Have some fun and bring back a nice haul. Just no dropping X-Wing wings on Teng, and if someone tries to beat you up, you tell me immediately. I want to expedite the hand chopping off process this time.”
Rey threw her arms around her father, hugging him tightly, “Thank you so much, Daddy!”

Luke laughed and held her tight, “Anytime.”

So Teng and Rey gathered their tools and loaded up the speeder.

“Good luck,” Luke called as Rey climbed into the driver’s seat.

“Uh, Rey?” Teng frowned. “It occurs to me that this speeder is a one seater. The only place I can sit is directly behind you, and that doesn’t seem very safe.”

Rey grinned wickedly, “Then hold onto me tight.”

Teng was only too happy to obey.

“Bye! Have fun!” Quom called as he and Luke waved, the speeder disappearing into the horizon. The image of Teng’s arms wrapped around Rey’s waist, and body pressed so close to hers on the back of the speeder burned into his mind. He leaned over to Luke and said through his teeth, “What are the odds those two are making out by the end of the day?”

“If they don’t run into any distractions?” Luke answered, “One hundred percent.”

“This is so cool!” Rey exclaimed as they worked on A-Wing that had been uncovered in the latest sandstorm. “We actually built a speeder, and now we’re scavenging by ourselves. I just can’t believe it.”

“We make a good team, Rey,” Teng replied as he busied himself sniping broken wires to free some mechanics in decent shape.

“We make a great team. Honestly, finding you at the road stop was one of the best things to ever happen to me.”

“Yeah… same on my end.” Teng let the silence linger for a minute. Then he looked down, gathered his courage, and made a decision, “Rey? I wanted to talk to you about-”

Her head snapped toward the horizon, “What’s that?”

Teng scowled. It was a few minutes before the other speeder came into view, but in the meanwhile Teng knew to trust her instincts.

“We’ve got company,” Teng rose to his feet.

“There’s no need to worry,” Rey’s voice was uncertain as they packed their tool kits. “We’re just kids. They’re not going to give us trouble, right?”

But they both knew the truth: they weren’t kids anymore. They were alone and weaponless; a dangerous combination on Jakku. The best plan of action was to just get the hell out of there as fast as possible. They quickly tried to pack up their things, but they were fitting a generator into the netting on the side of the speeder when the other one arrived.

“Good morning,” a scavenger named Toras Kern greeted with a lecherous grin at Rey. “What’s a pretty girl like you doing out here in the middle of the graveyard?”
Teng took a step between Rey and Toras as the other scavenger’s crew got out of their speeder.

Toras’ group was a rather new one, never having heard the stories about Luke Erso and why not to cross Luke’s children. But Teng and Rey had heard stories about Toras and his crew. They didn’t like those stories one bit.

“We were just leaving,” Rey said stiffly. She turned back to the speeder, but found one of Toras’ crew blocking her way to the driver’s seat.

“Stay a bit,” Toras got out of the speeder. “There’s enough A-Wing here for us all.”

“We’ll find somewhere else,” Teng said.

“You don’t like to share, boy?”

Teng’s fist balled as Toras’ eyes turned to Rey.

“No. I don’t,” Teng answered firmly.

“That’s too bad,” Toras chuckled. “You’ve got a real beauty there. You sure I can’t get a cut?”

Disgust filled Rey’s face, “If you think I’m going to do anything with you—”

“The generator, Darling,” Toras cut her off. “But if you’re offering—”

“She’s not,” Teng interrupted.

Rey fixed Teng with a glare, “I can defend myself.”

“We can talk about this later, Rey,” Teng whispered. “Please, don’t fight with me. Not here and now. We need to be a team.”

His words were able to calm her; Rey knew what Teng was getting after. Teng respected Rey enough to let her stand up for herself, but understood the situation a lot better. Having dealt with the pirates for many years, he understood the power dynamics of scoundrels. If Toras was going to act like Rey was a nexu in heat to be claimed and tamed, the best way to keep both herself and Teng safe was to let Teng challenge that claim and make one of his own.

It would also be a bit of a lie for Rey to say that she didn’t like the idea of Teng acting like he was her mate… you know, a little bit.

“Are you just going to stand there and take that, Darling?” Toras chuckled. He walked towards her, and Teng took another step, intentionally blocking her from him. “Come on, Darling. You’re a grown up. You going to let this boy walk all over you?”

“I trust Teng with my life,” Rey said evenly. “You? I don’t trust further than you cast a shadow… and it’s high noon.”

“Indeed it is.” Toras sighed, “I didn’t want to do this, but you’ve forced my hand.”

“Teng!” Rey screamed as two of Toras’ crew grabbed him.

He tried to fight and kick, but they were too strong for him. But even worse was when they played the Rey card.

“Keep fighting, and I’ll unpretty her pretty little face,” Toras threatened.
Teng instantly stopped fighting.

“Good,” Toras grinned. “Now how about we be civil? You give me that generator and the rest of your haul, and... why don’t you toss in one of those tool kits too, actually make it both. In exchange, we’ll let your boyfriend go.”

“He’s not my boyfriend.”

“Rey, this really isn’t the time!” Teng objected.

“I’m not giving you anything, Toras,” Rey refused. “Now let him go, or I’ll...”

Toras raised an eyebrow, “You’ll do what? What can a pretty little girl like you do against my guys?”

“I’ll make you pay for this,” Rey growled.

“I’m sure you will,” Toras chuckled. He placed a hand on her shoulder, “Of course... we could always come to a different agreement.”

His hand drifted from her shoulder, down her arm, and over to cup her-

Rey smashed her fist into his face as hard as she could.

“You schutta!” Toras howled, clutching his face.

She moved to help Teng, but Toras grabbed her by the hair. Rey screamed as he yanked her backwards and threw her onto the ground.

“Rey!” Teng exclaimed, struggling against the two holding him back.

She cried out as Toras kicked her in the face. Tears rolled down her face as her thumb throbbed and the blows landed all over her body. Rey tried to roll over and crawl her way to safety, but Toras just pulled her back and let the agony continue.

And then he said it.

“This is your own fault! If only you cooperated!”

In a moment, it wasn’t Toras hurting her anymore. It was Jarex Zolhar tormenting her like the helpless child she was. She stopped fighting and tried not to cry. Rey knew that tears made Jarex even madder. More tears meant more punches. She couldn’t cry.

“Let her go!” Teng screamed, desperately trying to fight the others off. He was horrified at the way Rey had shut down, her face blank, accepting the blows like she deserved them. “Get off me you sons of a bitch!”

But Teng wasn’t strong enough to face them, Rey knew. Just like she wasn’t strong. She had never been strong, and she never would be.

“That’s a lie, Rey,” a woman’s voice said.

Rey frowned. The voice was familiar but she couldn’t see any women around.

“You’re strong, Rey,” the woman said. “You can fight this.”
Then Rey saw her. Standing over Toras’ shoulder was a woman she knew. Kind eyes, standing tall, dark skin that looked like a permanent tan, covered head to toe in scars, and curly black hair, with a single blue morning glory tucked behind her ear.

She was beautiful… and she was terrifying.

The woman’s eyes locked with Rey, and she knew the terror would not be for her. This woman would never hurt Rey.

Rey was the only one who seemed to have noticed the woman. She tried to turn her body towards the woman, and strangely when Toras shifted, his leg went through the woman’s.

“Fight, Rey,” the woman urged. “You can do it.”

Rey struggled for words, “H- How?”

Teng frowned, “Rey? Who are you talking to?”

The Force was a Jedi’s tool. How could it help her?

“The Force is in all of us,” the woman answered the unvoiced question. “It helps us all, and it will help you. Trust in it… and trust in me.”

Rey took a deep breath and nodded.

“Now,” the woman guided. “Kick.”

She did as she was told.

Her foot collided perfectly with Toras’ face.

“Again.”

He reared back and Rey got his chest. The wind knocked out of him, Toras collapsed back.

“Again.”

She got him in the groin that time. It seemed to make the woman smile mischievously.

“Push.”

Rey got all of his bodyweight off her, and was able to break free.

The woman continued to guide Rey as she managed to get Teng away from the others. By no means did Rey defeat them, but the woman helped Rey and Teng buy themselves some time.

“Run,” the woman ordered. “Go home now.”

Rey did as she was told. She and Teng scrambled to the speeder and took off as quickly as possible. The woman disappeared without a word when the other scavengers were out of sight, and Rey struggled to explain to Teng what had happened.

A mercy granted, he didn’t question her on it. Teng had the habit of believing Rey when it came to her visions and other such odd things, so he was totally okay with believing in a random scarred
Rey and Teng were fixing each other up in Quom’s tent when Luke walked in with Quom. Luke stopped dead at the sight of the pair bloodied, bruised, and clearly beaten.

“Whose hand am I cutting off this time?” he simply asked.

“Dad,” Rey sighed. “Don’t, please. I don’t want this to turn into a thing.”

“Oh, it’s turning into a thing,” Quom said.

“I’m not telling you!”

“Teng?” Quom asked.

“Toras Kern.”

“Teng!” Rey snapped.

“What?” he shot her a look. “I’m sorry if I didn’t enjoy us getting our asses kicked.”

“Don’t go after him, Dad,” Rey warned.

Luke crossed his arms, “Why shouldn’t I?”

“Because revenge is the path to the Dark Side,” Obi-Wan answered.

“He wasn’t asking you,” Anakin cut in.

Luke resisted rolling his eyes. What even was his life that the ghosts of his dead father and mentor had a running commentary of his life?

“Because…” Rey started.

Luke raised an eyebrow.

She sent a helpless look to Quom and Teng, her message clear.

“Why don’t we give them a few moments?” Quom suggested.

Teng nodded and got up. He paused to look down at Rey. Their eyes met, and he smiled at her, patting her on the shoulder. Rey smiled back, and it made Teng’s even larger. Then he exited the tent.

“What’s going on, Rey?” Luke asked.

She sighed, “What happens when I’m alone again? If I keep running to my Daddy to save me, what’s going to happen when you’re not around to do it?”
“Then I’ll just always be with you when you’re scavenging,” Luke said.

“And when I’m not scavenging? There’s still going to be other people, and I can’t live my life with you always by my side. I’m sorry, Dad, but I just can’t!” Rey started to cry.

“Hey, hey, hey,” Luke knelt down in front of her and grasped her hands. “It’s going to be okay. I promise.”

“How? I’m not a child anymore. People don’t care about me now.”

“That’s not true. You have people who care about you, and the ones who do are the only ones on this planet that matter to us. Quom, Teng, me, Dirk even. You’re not alone.”

Rey wiped her nose, “But… I’m scared, Dad. People keeping staring at me. The Blobfish keeps saying how much I look like Mom, and we both know what he thought of her… I’m not a child anymore and I’m afraid of what that means. What people – men especially – will want from me. What if I get in a situation I can’t overcome? I’ve been the victim before, and I can’t keep sending mothers away to protect me or having you cut off people’s hands. Because I’m still the victim then; I still get hurt. I don’t want to get hurt anymore… I don’t want him to control me.”

And then Luke understood, “You thought of Jarex today.”

“It’s silly; I barely remember what the man looks like, but I remember what he did. I remember how afraid he made me, afraid of even being honest with you. I can’t protect myself, instead I rely on you and Teng and visions of oddly familiar women.”

Luke frowned, “Did you have another vision today?”

“It’s how I escaped today,” Rey answered. “I saw a woman I knew, but she wasn’t really there.”

“Tell me about her.”

So Rey did, and it didn’t take a lot for Luke to know who Rey had seen.

“Do I know that woman?” Rey asked.

Luke sighed, “Yes… her name was Alyla Kene.”

“Alyla? Like the morning glory woman with the sad story?”

“It’s probably why she appeared to you with a morning glory in her hair. It’s strange, I’ve never seen her myself. I didn’t know she was able to… never mind.”

“Something for when I’m older?”

“Maybe not that much older. This will be an odd question, but did Alyla have a blue outline?”

Rey scowled, “No.”

“Interesting,” Luke said. “I’m not sure that this is the same as usual.”

“As usual? Dad, do you see dead people?”

“Sometimes.”

“…Oh.”
Silence filled the tent.

“It’ll make more sense when you’re older,” Luke said.

She raised an eyebrow, “I find that hard to believe.”

“Trust me, there’s days I do too.”

“So, who do you see? Mom?”

“I wish, but sadly no. Your mother isn’t one of the people who can visit me,” Luke explained.

“Who does?” Rey asked.

“My father and my two mentors.”

“Your father?”

“He makes frequent appearances. More so when you were younger, but he’s here for us.”

“Could I see him?”

“Perhaps one day,” Luke replied. “I’d like for you to meet him.”

Rey smiled, “I’d like that too.”

She had never thought about her lack of grandparents before, but the idea of meeting one filled her with an excitement and yearning she didn’t know she had.

“Was Alyla your mentor?” Rey asked.

“No, our relationship was different,” Luke answered.

“Different like Aletha different?”

“Never even crossed our minds. I mean, sure, Alyla is absolutely one of the most beautiful women I have ever had the pleasure of meeting, but there was nothing romantic between us. She was actually involved with a friend of mine. But Alyla and I were just very good friends… Actually she sort of is the reason you exist.”

“Really? How?”

“Never mind. Forget I said that.” Luke said quickly, regretting his words.

“Tell me, Dad!” Rey urged.

Luke hesitated, “Alright, but you asked so don’t blame me if you’re traumatized. One night I had a conversation with Alyla about, you know, the future and children and families and all that. It was a nice conversation, a touching moment.”

“And?”

“Well, it provoked a sort of nostalgic, looking forward to the future feeling inside of me, and…”

“Yes?”

“I went upstairs, found your mother, and conceived you.”
Rey was silent.

“Regret asking the question?” Luke said.

“Yep.”

“So, why did I see Alyla today?” Rey asked. “Why did she help me?”

He sighed, “I think it has to do with her history. She went through some terrible things in her life, and I think she didn’t want you to endure them either.”

“What happened to her? Or is that a story for another day?”

Luke thought about it, “I think you’re old enough to know this.”

So Luke told her about the tragic history of Alyla Kene. Of her life as a slave, what was done to her, and how she had mutilated herself to exit the abuse. Rey listened to the story with silent horror on her face.

The story wasn’t complete. Luke still censored the Jedi aspects, and he himself didn’t know all the details, but he shared what he could.

“So that’s why I think she helped you today,” Luke concluded. “I couldn’t bare for anything like that to happen to you, and neither could she.”

Rey was quiet, trying not to let her fear take a hold of her, “There’s a real evil in this world, isn’t there, Dad?”

He looked her in the eyes, “Yes, but we stand and fight everyday to protect the good from the evil. Darkness is strong, but the Light will always win. I swear it.”

“But how do I stop the Dark? How can I ever overcome it?”

“By starting at the beginning. Come on, stand up.”

“Why?”

“Because I’m going to teach you to fight.”

“Really?” Rey’s eyes lit up.

“Really,” Luke grinned, pulling Rey to her feet. He placed his hands on either of her shoulders, “Let’s start with this. Pretend I’m pinning you against a wall. How are you going to escape?”

“Uh… Wriggle out of your grasp?”

“Try it.”

Rey jerked her shoulders, trying to throw him off, but Luke was far stronger.

She considered her options, “Well, I could always kick you in a very unagreeable spot for men to be kicked.”

“Really? You want me to kick you in the groin?”

“Don’t want you too, but if that’s going to free you, go for it.”

Rey smirked and swung her foot forward, for the briefest moment, balanced on one leg. In a second, Luke hooked his own leg around her grounded one and jerked it forward. Rey fell to the ground before her other foot had made contact. She was on her back, and immediately her father was on the ground with her, his body over hers as he gently, but firmly pinned her to the floor.

“And now you’re in a much worse position,” Luke explained. “A kick to the groin – while a dirty move – can have a time and place. This was not one of them.”

“Clearly,” Rey nodded, praying no one walked in at that moment, or else they would have a very awkward scene to explain.

Luke got off her and helped Rey back to her feet, “Let’s switch positions. You hold my shoulders, and I’ll show you how to get out of it.”

Rey grasped her father’s strong shoulders, “So what would you do?”

“When fighting, the thing you most pay attention to is where is your opponent’s strength? And where’s the weakest? In this position, the strength is the grip on your shoulders. If you can break that grip, your opponent loses the upper hand.”

“How do I break it?”

“See the empty space between your arms? I’m going to put my own hands up into that space,” Luke did the actions as he explained them. “See how now it’s your arm, my two arms, and then your other arm?”

“Uh huh.”

“I’m going to continue to bring my hands up, and then I’m going to circle them downwards in the opposite directions, down onto your arms.” Luke demonstrated and when his arms hit Rey’s, they were forced off his shoulders, breaking the grip. “And that’s how you escape. Make sure it’s a fluid movement, but it’s very simple and effective. Now, give it a try on me.”

And so with that lesson, Luke Skywalker began to teach his daughter how to fight.

But he would only be one of her teachers in the days to come.

The sniper classes for the incoming Resistance recruits were always something of an event in the Resistance. All recruits had to go through a few weeks of the basics – hand to hand combat, blaster, thermal detonators, survival techniques, ship basics, and so on – but the sniper class was special. It wasn’t just because Diego Nalto – the Resistance’s best sniper – taught them, but because Kes Dameron would visit the Base to be the other instructor.

Which always meant that Poe Dameron was going to act as undignified as possible that day.

“Dad!” Poe exclaimed, racing across the landing yard.
BB-8 was nothing more than a blur of orange and white beeping as he spun frantically behind his master, happy to see Kes as well.

Kes chuckled, shouldering the sniper rifle he was inspecting from the set he and Diego would take out into the jungle with their team that day. Diego Nalto also grinned at the sight of Leia’s prodigy looking so ridiculous.

“Dad!” Poe jumped on his father in a hug. “You’re here!”

“Yes, I am.” Kes looked down at BB-8, who was pressed against his leg and making what sounded like a purring noise, “Hello, BB. You taking good care of my boy?”

BB-8 launched into a long spiel of how he was keeping Poe in line as much as possible. More importantly, he told Kes of all the wrongdoings in Poe, BB-8 couldn’t manage to correct and he required Kes’ assistance on.

“Oh, really?” Kes raised an eyebrow at his son.

Bip.

“Is this true, Poe?”

“Alright, I’ll concede to articles 1-14,” Poe answered. “15 and 17 are completely false, can you really blame me for 18-23, and in defense of number 16, it isn’t that many girls.”

“Good boy, BB,” Kes patted him on the head. “I’ll see to it you get an oil bath tonight.”

BB-8 squealed in delight.

Poe eyed him half-sternly, “Traitor.”

Bee bee bew chee.

“Are you here for long, Dad?” Poe asked.

“Only really have business for today, but I can stick around a few extra days if you want your old man around.”

“You bring any koyo melons?”

“Wouldn’t come see you without them.”

“Stay as long as you want, Dad.”

Kes laughed and clapped his son on the shoulder.

He was a burly man; tall and thick. The kind you would expect to be a wrestler or a bodyguard. Most people weren’t surprised to learn Kes owned and operated a ranch.

But Kes was more than a simple rancher. A former Rebel, Kes had a well-decorated military history. A solider in many big name battles, including work in the Battle of Endor, which resulted in Han Solo writing his first letter of recommendation. Kes had once endured one of the longest recorded stints in an Imperial work camp. It was fourteen months before his wife, Shara Bey led the charge to free the Rebels in his camp.

His most active timed in the Alliance had been the nine months Shara was pregnant with their son.
Kes had vowed to pull as much double duty as possible to make up for the absence of Shara. The Alliance was only too happy to take Kes up on that offer.

Of course, that plan wasn’t pre-set. In fact, the idea to have Poe to begin with was not a conscious choice. Poe was what the Rebels liked to call a “MisCalc” or Miscalculation. Birth control in the Rebellion was hard to come by, so many depended on calculating the safest days of a woman’s cycle to have sex. Accidental pregnancies were typically the result of a miscalculation, hence the name.

Kes Dameron didn’t really look like his son. His skin was darker, his black hair was buzzed short to his skull, he had facial hair, and he was the kind of man who wore a lot of shirts without sleeves. Kes was a true man of the ground, and his son belonged to the skies.

But still the men were inseparable.

“Are you coming out with us?” Kes asked Poe.

“No, I’ve got drills to run with Black Squadron,” Poe replied. “But we’ve got a presentation to the General later day. Will you come?”

“I’ll be there.”

“Oh, recruits, fall in!” Diego ordered, his voice projecting across the yard. “Grab a rifle and fall in line!”

Poe excused himself and BB-8 as Kes and Diego got to work. A dozen bright eyed youths formed a line in front of the men, each holding with shiny new rifle. It was the older woman at the end of the line, holding an ancient looking rifle that caught Diego’s notice.

“Doctor Kymeri,” he nodded to the familiar blonde.

“Hello, Commander Nalto,” she smiled at him.

Diego opened his mouth to correct her to use his given name, but then realized she was doing it for the sake of the other recruits.

“Lieutenant Dameron,” Aletha looked to Kes. “Been a while.”

“I’m sorry, have we met?” Kes asked.

“I did a few checkups for Shara when she was pregnant with Poe.”

“Oh, Aletha,” Kes remembered. “Right, I remember you. Shara said you were the one doctor who didn’t have cold hands during ultrasounds.”

“I keep getting the strangest accolades around here,” Aletha laughed.

“Doctor Kymeri, would you please take a rifle so we may begin our lesson?” Diego requested.

“Actually, Commander, I was wondering if I may use my own weapon?” She patted the rifle affectionately, “This girl and I have seen a lot of action. I can’t go abandoning her now.”

“Alright, but we’re bringing an extra just in case. That is a very old blaster, and I don’t trust it to be stable.”
“Thousands of steelpeckers would disagree with you.”

Diego couldn’t help but smile.

“Allright, recruits, why don’t we get to it?” Kes said. “For those of you who are unaware, my name is Kes Dameron. I fought in the Rebellion, including in the Battle of Endor as the strike team on Endor under General Han Solo. And for those of you wondering, yes that is Dameron as in Poe Dameron. Whoever didn’t see our little display before, I’ll inform you that Poe is my son, but that will not affect my instruction of you. However if I overhear any comments disparaging my son, you will face me.”

Aletha was the only one who wasn’t too nervous to chuckle.

“As for myself, I am Commander Diego Nalto, Head of Flight, and Second-in-Command of the Resistance,” Diego said. “I can get you in even more trouble than Kes. My credentials are many: countless Rebellion battles, flew as Red Five for years until giving up my title to Luke Skywalker, who is a close friend. Flew in his Rogue Squadron as Rogue One. Participated in Operation Citadel – the operation that stole the Death Star plans – as Rogue Two, and am the only surviving member of the original Rogue Squadron. Rest in peace, Fliss, Riz, Ji-Dan, and Gunner. And I also hold the record for longest stint in an Imperial war camp and still lived to tell the tale. After three years in a work camp, I can pretty much put up with anything, but don’t try my patience.”

Kes added, “I am also Kes Dameron as in the husband of Shara Bey, the woman who was unfortunately killed by the First Order, and in whose name the Resistance was formed. Captain Phasma took my wife’s life, but from that tragedy was born something great.”

The rest of the men’s words were drowned out in Aletha’s mind. Shara Bey had been killed by Phasma? Her sister was responsible for the creation of the Resistance? Oh God, how could she stand just feet away from Kes knowing what her sister had done to him?

Aletha resolved to talk with Kes later.

“Any questions?” Kes asked when they came to the end of their speech.

“Yeah, I got one,” a young man raised his hand. He pointed at Aletha, “What’s the other instructor’s name?”

“Oh, I’m not an instructor,” Aletha answered.

“This is Doctor Aletha Kymeri,” Diego said. “She is a new recruit. As you know, all recruits must undergo a basic set of training before they can enter active duty. She arrived two weeks ago, and will be one of our students today.”

The young man scowled, “Really? Her?”

Diego narrowed his eyes.

The young man leaned over to his friend beside him, “We must really be hurting for recruits if they’re digging up dinosaurs like her.”

“Doctor Kymeri is a Rebel veteran,” Kes said shortly. “She’s been fighting since she was, how old were you again?”

“Nineteen,” Aletha answered smugly. “I’ve been fighting against Empires and First Order since seven years before Commander Poe Dameron was born. I’m sure that accounts for something.”
The group murmured among themselves, clearly not convinced of Aletha’s worth.

“We’re not here to question the abilities of fellow recruits,” Diego said, staring down the troublemaker who started it. “We are here to test them.”

“I look forward to witnessing the test results,” the young man laughed. He said to his friend, “Can you imagine Grandma firing a sniper rifle?”

“Everyone gather your things and move out,” Diego ordered.

As Aletha hoisted her rifle over her shoulder, she felt someone grab her arm.

“Did you really once shoot a woman in the knee?” Diego asked in a low voice.

Aletha smiled, “I’m very skilled with a sniper rifle, Commander Nalto.”

“Good. Show them.”

They shared a wicked grin.

“So you finally started teaching Rey how to fight?” Quom said as he and Luke walked through the market.

“Over the past few weeks,” Luke replied. They barely took in the faces of the other scavengers as they passed them. “It’s going good, but she’s not picking it up as quickly as I’d like.”

“Luke, she may have it in her blood to be athletically inclined, but she’s not born knowing how to throw a punch.”

“I know. She sprained her thumb punching Toras. Turns out she doesn’t curl it in while punching. We’ve since corrected it.”

They passed by a strange, new alien. Neither Luke nor Quom noticed how the alien did a double take at the sight of Luke.

“Marcus!” the alien yelled.

“Well, it’s a good thing you’re teaching Rey all this,” Quom said. “Rey’s fifteen now; she’s not a little girl anymore, and people are starting to take notice. Stuff like the Toras incident is only going to start happening more.”

“I know,” Luke scowled. “Plutt’s eyes are starting to linger too long on her for my liking. If I have to hear that lecherous chuckle as he tells me how much she looks like her mother one more time, I’m going to do something that will get me into a lot of trouble.”

“Marcus!” the alien called again.

“You know, Teng told me that before Toras beat up Rey, he made a pass at her?” Quom said.

“I know,” Luke’s fist tightened. “She said he tried to grope her too. Sprained her thumb punching him for it, which started the fight.”
“That’s my girl,” Quom chuckled.

“MARCUS!”

“You know, Luke,” Quom said slyly, “maybe you and I ought to visit Toras today and settle this little matt—”

“SKYWALKER!”

They stopped dead in their tracks.

Luke whispered, eyes filled with horror, “Did someone just say—”

“Yep,” Quom answered.

Someone knew who he was. What was Luke supposed to do? Was it the First Order? He so desperately wanted to turn and look, but answering the alien would out him even further.

His friend dutifully fulfilled his instructions. If anyone were to look at Quom and Luke, they would think the pair was just as confused as the rest of the market.

Then Luke’s eyes landed on a solution.

“Dirk,” he whispered.

Luke and Quom very casually walked up to Dirk, who was supervising the line to the concession stand.

“I don’t know, but you’re going to help me find out,” Luke answered. “You’re going to find whoever it is that just called out… that name, and bring them to our tent. If Rey or Teng are in there, remove the kids from our tent. Quom and I are going to join the concession line and return to the tent afterwards. Understand?”

“Yes, Sir,” Dirk saluted and took off to set his plan in action.

“I don’t get it, Luke,” Quom muttered as they joined the line. “Who the hell knows you’re here?”

“I have no idea.”

“I don’t blame you for what happened to Shara,” Diego overheard Kes say as they trekked to the sniper range deep in the forest.

Diego turned to see Kes walking along with Aletha, a serious look on his face.

“But my sister killed your wife,” Aletha said. “You’re not uncomfortable with my presence?”

“Not unless you’re secretly a First Order mole,” Kes teased. He patted Aletha’s shoulder, “It’s okay, Aletha. The actions of your sister are not the actions of yourself. I will never blame someone for actions of another person.”
“Thank you, Kes. That means a lot to me.”

Kes nodded, then picked up speed to check on the recruits at the front of the pack. He nodded at Diego as he passed, and Diego decreased his speed to hang back and watch the others.

As they followed the well-worn path to the training field, Diego noticed a small purple flower growing at the side of the road. Glancing back at Aletha, he stopped, bent down and plunked it.

“Have you seen one of these yet?” Diego offered her the flower as she reached him.

Aletha looked startled but smiled.

“No. Thank you,” she took the flower and tucked it into her belt. The tiny purple petals were nearly drowned out in the myriad of brown. “What’s it called?”

“Tilla, if I remember correctly.”

“Sounds pretty.”

“Pretty flower, pretty name.”

Aletha rubbed the back of her neck, “I got your other flowers. Thank you for those.”

“The sundrops? Just a welcome gift,” Diego tried to wave off.

“I meant the other ones. The ones you sent to my room the other day. The Yavinese lilies.”

“Well, I just did a mission on my home planet and thought I’d give you a token.”

“It’s appreciated. So you come from Yavin IV?” Aletha asked. “I wouldn’t have thought with the accent.”

“Yavin II,” Diego said. “Different moon, different accent. Honestly the common ground among the moons are the language.”

“I don’t think I’ve heard Yavinese in years.”

“Stand by Poe Dameron when he’s trying to fix a broken X-Wing, and you’ll hear plenty. The only downside is it’s usually just curse words.”

“Are you implying my delicate little ears can’t take the vulgarity of Yavinese swears?”

“If you ask me, I’d say either you’re the type who doesn’t swear at all, or swears worse than a Bothan,” Diego joked.

Aletha grinned, “I lean more towards the Bothans.”

“Good. So do I, but I think I have a far more creative set of swears than you.”

“I’m war doctor who operated most of her life on Jakku. I’ve been sworn at in almost every language. Try me.”

“I just might.”

Aletha couldn’t help but think that the weather suddenly picked up a few degrees.

From the way he tugged at his collar, Diego agreed.
“So, your sister is Captain Phasma?” he asked.

The weather went back to normal.

“Yes, she is,” Aletha took a small step to the side. “Alecta Anthea, bane of my existence. I’m sorry if it makes you uncomfortable.”

“Only if it doesn’t make you uncomfortable that I’ve sworn to kill her,” Diego answered simply.

“Really? Why?”

“You sound oddly nonchalant over me threatening to murder your sister.”

“I lost sympathy for her the day she swore to kill me. Why do you want to kill her?”

“She killed Fliss.”

“Rogue One?”

“My best friend,” Diego said. “I hold Phasma personally responsible for the death of Fliss and her daughter. I will make her pay.”

“I’m so sorry,” Aletha replied. “I never thought her plan for vengeance would include a child.”

“What plan?”

“Alecta has sworn revenge over the death of our sister Athena, who died on the Death Star. She swore to kill the three people she blames for it: me, Rogue One, and Luke Skywalker.”

“So it follows she would kill the daughter of Luke Skywalker and Rogue One.”

“It would seem so,” Aletha said.

“Aletha,” Diego grabbed her hand, stopping her. “I’m sorry for the part I played in your sister’s death.”

“I don’t blame you,” Aletha assured him. “We did what we had to do to protect the Galaxy. There were going to be causalities… but thank you for the apology.”

“It’s no trouble.” Something then clicked in Diego’s mind, “Wait, your maiden name is Anthea? Aletha Anthea?”

“Shut up,” she blushed.

Diego couldn’t stop laughing, “No, but really? Your surname was Anthea? Alecta Anthea? Aletha Anthea? Athena Anthea?”

“Oh, it gets worse. I also had two other sisters named Adrinna and Anissa. Sadly, Anissa also died during the war, but Adrinna took her husband’s name of Connix.”

He frowned, “Adrinna Connix?”

“Yep. Why do you know her?”

“No, but… I must be thinking of the wrong person.”

Aletha stared at him, but chose not to pry.
“Oh God, look at that,” Diego nodded up the path. “We’ve lagged so far behind. We should catch up.”

“I don’t know,” Aletha teased. “I’m just so ancient, I don’t know how I could ever make it.”

“Aletha, we need to go show that young recruit exactly who he’s toying with. I’ll carry you the rest of the way if I have to.”

She almost took him up on that offer.

Then there’s Sarco – he’s not one of Unkar’s but a bounty hunter or something. I don’t mess with him. There’s a rumor he killed a squad of stormtroopers on a jungle planet once. Don’t know if that’s true, but he’s certainly mean enough.

- Rey’s Survival Guide

The alien was sitting on a workbench, arms crossed when Quom and Luke returned to the tent.

“Well, well,” the alien said, his voice electronically distorted by his faceless mask, “if it isn’t Korl Marcus. Or should I call you Luke Skywalker this time?”

It took Luke a few minutes to place him, “Sarco Plank. Never thought I’d see you again.”

“Didn’t think you would see anything after our little encounter.”

“Oh, yes I remember. You threw a grenade at me and tried to blind me.”

“And yet you still managed to fight, Nobody’s Padawan. Managed to make a name for yourself, something more than Nobody’s Padawan. Of course, the latest intel informs me that your own Padawans are now Nobodies.”

Quom looked between the pair, completely lost, “Ok, what’s going on? How do you two know each other?”

So Luke quickly told Quom the story of the time he journeyed to a Jedi Temple on the planet Devaron, made friends with Farnay, and hired Plank to be his guide to the Temple. On the trip, Plank figured out that Luke was a fledgling Jedi and dubbed him “Nobody’s Padawan.” At the Temple, Luke learned how to better his lightsaber skills, but was attacked by a gang of Stormtroopers. Plank and Luke defeated them together, but Plank betrayed Luke, wanting to loot the Temple, but had been unable to get inside without a Jedi’s help. Then Luke and Plank battled – during which he temporarily blinded Luke – Plank threatened to kill Farnay and enslave Luke, but Luke defeated him and rescued Farnay. Unfortunately he sensed Plank was still alive, but their battle would be one to fight another day.

And apparently today was that day.

“Ok, seriously Luke,” Quom asked, “have you ever just had a normal Tuesday? Why does everything have to be an adventure with you?”

“You cost me a lot that day, Marcus,” Sarco growled.

“That temple was sacred. Not something to be looted and left abandoned.”

“Then tell me this, Nobody's Padawan, why did you build your Temple on Rornian? Didn’t you do exactly as I described? Looted it for what benefited you and then abandoned it?”

“I don’t need to justify anything to you,” Luke snapped.

“No, but you fear me,” Sarco chuckled.

“I don’t fear you.”

“Yes, you do. If you didn’t, you would have walked right up to me in the market. I couldn’t believe my eyes, the infamous Luke Skywalker just walking down the street of the new planet I settled on. You’ve been gone for years. There’s rewards for revealing your whereabouts, and your sister isn’t the only one offering them. You don’t want anyone to know you’re here.”

Luke glanced at Quom.

“You’re right,” Luke said. “That’s the reason I’m afraid.”

Sarco stared at him for a long while, “…No. It isn’t. I can see it in your face, Marcus. What is it you’re hiding?”

Too quickly.

“Oh, there’s something, and I’ll figure it out,” Sarco chuckled.

Luke dropped his voice low, “You’ll never figure it out.”

So naturally that was the moment Rey and Teng walked in.

“I didn’t even know the speeder could go that fast!” Rey laughed, oblivious to the situation.

“Just because it goes that fast doesn’t mean you should drive that fast.” Teng spat on the ground, “I’ve got so many bugs in my mouth. Ugh, and how’s my hair? It must look an awful mess.”

“No it doesn’t.” Rey lunged at him and playfully messed up his hair, “But now it does!”

“Oh, I’ll get you for that!”

Rey shrieked, starting forward, but Teng caught her arm and pulled her back into his embrace. They laughed as they jokingly rough housed, their bodies pressing close.

Quom cleared his throat.

“Uncle Quom!” Rey exclaimed, springing apart from the blushing Teng. “We were just—”

Then she noticed the other alien in the tent.

“Dad, what’s going on?” Rey asked.

Luke winced; the jig was up.

“Rey, please leave the tent,” he ordered.

She frowned, “But Dad-”

Rey looked back at Teng in confusion.

“Come on,” Teng took her arm and led her out of the time. “Let’s give him some privacy.”

Sarco had the tact not to start speaking again until the teens were well away.

“Well, well,” he laughed, “the daughter of Luke Skywalker lives. I’m sure the First Order would be most interested in hearing this.”

If Sarco was someone like Jarex or Plutt, Luke would have had no problem throwing Sarco around and asserting his dominance. But he knew Sarco better than that; Sarco was a legitimate threat and one he might lose to. Rey had to be his concern here, so Luke had to be smarter about the situation.

“What do you want from me?” Luke asked. “What’s it going to cost to buy your silence?”

Sarco thought about it; he was too smart to pass up a business opportunity like this. Money was the only thing that mattered in his world, and Luke Skywalker had a lot of it.

“I’ve heard you have a deal with Plutt,” Sarco said.

“I want half.”

“I can’t give you half.”

“So your daughter’s safety is worth less than three stale Imperial rations?”

Luke glowered at him, “Fine, you can have half. I’ll drop it off everyday at your tent. Tell me where you’re living.”

“We can go there right now. Oh Marcus, you really have no backbone do you. You’re just as helpless as you were all those years ago.”

“Are you really going to let him push you around like that, Luke?” Quom frowned.

“I don’t have a choice,” Luke answered. “Where Rey’s safety is concerned, there is no compromise. But let me make my conditions clear, Plank. You will tell no one we are here. You’ll tell no one that Rey is alive. You will not increase your fee for your silence, and if you ever cross me, I’ll make you regret it.”

Luke smiled, “You’re wrong. You know who I used to be. When we met, I was young, naïve, and untrained. I assure you, I am none of those things anymore, and if you ever lay a hand on my daughter, it’ll be the last thing you ever do.”
Sarco smiled behind his mask, “Agreed.”

“And that is how you prime and set your blaster rifle,” Diego finished his demonstration. “Now who wants to try it? What about you, Hot Shot?”

The man who had disparaged Aletha smirked, “Why don’t you ask Grandma to do it? That would be fun to watch.”

A few of the recruits snickered and Diego’s eyes met Aletha’s.

“Doctor Kymeri?” Diego asked.

Aletha nodded.

She came to the front of the group to stand by Kes and Diego, who were the ones holding all the ammo.

“You need special ammo for that weapon?” Kes asked.

“Standard power cells and gas cartridge. Thank you, Gentlemen,” Aletha accepted her supplies.

Diego didn’t let go of the power cell.

He leaned in and whispered, “Give him hell.”

Aletha grinned, “Yes, Commander.”

They took a step apart, and as Aletha readied herself, Kes raised an eyebrow at Diego.

“What?” Diego frowned.

“Nothing,” Kes smiled. He set his stopwatch, “We’ll be timing all of you. Anything more than twenty seconds is unacceptable. You get points docked for making excessive noise. Doctor, are you ready?”

“Ready.”

“Begin.”

Her movements were perfect and silent, and she was set, prepped, and crouched on the ground, ready to knock her mark in 13.4 seconds.

“Impressive,” Diego gave her a small round of applause. “Doctor you may get up. Can anyone beat that?”

An hour later, no one had managed to.

“Alright, now that everyone has had a chance to practise setting their rifles, we’re going to practice shooting,” Diego led them at the treeline.

There was a meadow full of sundrop flowers, surrounded by trees. On their end, there was half a dozen trees with rope ladders leading up to a lookout platform. Across the meadow were various targets set in the branches.
“You’ll take turns climbing the platforms and taking your shots,” Kes instructed. “You may shoot whichever target you want, but we will be assessing not only what you hit and what you didn’t, but also which you tried for. We don’t half-ass anything in the Resistance.”

“And if anyone hits that target,” Diego pointed to a tiny speck way off that he had pointed out, they would have all mistook for an acorn, “I will have them join myself at dinner sitting at the table with all the Heads of Department. That means Nils Arlos, Head of Recruitment; myself, Head of Flight; Meredyth Kalonia, Head of Medical; Statura, Head of Ground Teams; Akbar, Head of Tactics; and Taslin Brance, Head of Communications. This is a golden opportunity to make connections and could build your career.”

“We will also be judging you on your ability to be silent. A sniper gets one shot, so make it count. Everyone pick a tree and let’s get started.”

The recruits jostled about, but Diego’s attention was on the one he called Hot Shot.

“You may begin,” Diego announced. “Go up, empty your cartridge, and then come down and let the next person take their turn. So who’s brave enough to be first. Hot Shot?”

“With pleasure,” Hot Shot grinned.

Kes and Diego shared a look, taking their attention away from the others. It seemed all eyes were turned on the showdown as they didn’t hear anyone climbing the trees around them.

“Show me what you’ve got, Hot Shot,” Diego challenged.

Hot Shot holstered his blaster and began to climb. His slipped and he caught his balance, but not before his rifle jostled and smacked against his back.

“Dead,” Diego called. “You have to be silent. But keep going.”

Hot Shot scaled the tree, his ladder rattling, but Diego and Kes watched the boy. Reaching the top, Hot Shot pulled himself onto the platform and landed with a soft thud.

“Dead,” Kes called this time. “Again, you have to be silent. But go on and load your blaster.”

Hot Shot did so, making a great deal of noise.

Diego and Kes smiled at each other.

“Dead,” they called together.

“Come on, man,” Kes yelled up to him. “Show us that there’s something behind your boasting.”

“Take your shots,” Diego ordered. “Maybe you can at least hit a target from afar.”

Desperate to impress the pair, Hot Shot unloaded all five of the blasts the rifles were to be loaded with at the nearest target.

All five missed.

“Unbelievable,” Diego scoffed. “Take this as a lesson all of you, words are meaningless without action behind them. I could call myself the Emperor, but that wouldn't make me it. But then again, maybe I should temper my expectations. I don’t think any of you could climb up the tree, set your blaster, and hit the target all five times without making a noise.”
Everyone looked around wildly to see the source of the blasts. It was Diego who spotted Aletha Kymeri on the lookout platform in the tree to his left, holding a smoking blaster rifle.

““You said we can start,” Aletha shrugged as everyone stared up at her in shock.

“When the hell did she get up there?” someone muttered behind Diego.

But Diego couldn’t stop smiling at her.

It was a smile Aletha shared.

“How’d I do, Commander Nalto?” Aletha called down to him.

Diego unclipped his quadnocs from his belt and observed the targets in the distance. His heart fell as he failed to find a blast mark on a single target… Until he looked at the furthest target.

It was marked by five perfect blasts.

“I believe, Doctor Kymeri,” Diego replied, “that I will be taking you to dinner tonight.”

“I’ll wear my finest uniform, Commander.” Aletha looked over at Hot Shot and shouldered her rifle, “Don’t worry, Hot Shot, I’m sure Grandma can give you a few pointers.”

Hot Shot gulped.

Kes chuckled and leaned over to Diego, “What do you think about that?”

“Honestly?” Diego lowered his quadnocs and looked at Kes, “I think I’m a little turned on.”

A few hours later, Aletha was working her shift in the Medic Center. Diego and Kes were there as well. Diego was supervising the treatment of one of the sniper students who had been accidentally shot in the foot by another student, who was profusely apologizing at his bedside so much it was starting to get annoying.

Kes was in the Medic Center because of Poe. Poe had decided he wanted to show off his piloting skills to his father during the presentation, took too hard a turn on a spin, and smashed his head into the dashboard. He claimed he was okay, but BB-8 tattled to Kes about what had happened. Kes told his son in no uncertain terms that if he didn’t walk right to the Medic Center and get himself checked for a concession, that Kes would drag Poe there himself.

He was strong enough to back up that threat, so Poe practically ran to the Medic Center. Twenty-eight years old or not, Poe Dameron could still be bossed around by his father.
As Aletha went through the various patients, she couldn’t help but notice that Diego was watching her. It wasn’t the kind of watching that he would glance away and pretend he wasn’t doing it when caught. Diego would continue to stare at her, and smiled when their eyes met.

For some reason, Aletha couldn’t help but blush.

But his vigil ended when a young blonde haired, blue eyed woman entered the room. She must have been in her very early twenties, and she made a beeline for Diego. They spoke for a few minutes, not that Aletha was paying much attention to them. She did notice however that the pair kept pointing to her.

After about three minutes of discussion, the young woman took a deep breath and approached Aletha.

“Doctor Kymeri?” the young woman asked.

“Hello,” Aletha smiled. “Are you my next patient?”

“Uh… not exactly. Do you have a moment to talk?”

Aletha glanced down at her datapad for the list of currently waiting patients, “Well, there’s nothing major on my roster. I suppose I can spare a few minutes. What can I help you with?”

“Ok, this is going to sound crazy, but do you know someone named Adrinna Anthea?”

Aletha stiffened, “I’ve crossed paths with her. Yes.”

“It was more than just that though, right? You’re her sister. Aletha Anthea?”

This conversation was making her uneasy.

“How do you know that?” Aletha demanded, though her voice was reserved.

“It is your name then?” the girl’s eyes were alight with hope.

“I haven’t been Aletha Anthea in years, and I have no intention of resuming life as her. So how do you know this and what do you want from me?”

The woman blushed, “I’m sorry. I didn’t mean to be so bold. I’ve just pictured this in my head so many times, and now that I’m living it out, I’m not sure what to do.”

“Pictured what?”

“Meeting you! I’ve been looking for you for years!”

Aletha frowned, “Who are you?”

“Sorry, let me start over.”

The young woman took a deep breath and extended her hand. Aletha regarded it warily, but deigned to shake it.

“Aletha Anthea, I’m happy to finally meet you. My name is Kaydel Ko Connix.”

Aletha stopped shaking, “…Kaydel Connix?”
“My father is Timor Connix and my mother is Adrinna Connix née Anthea… You’re my aunt.”

She just stared at the girl.

Kaydel smiled weakly at the awkward silence, “Uh… surprise?”

“How old are you?” Aletha whispered.

“Twenty-one.”

“Impossible. Look, I don’t know what game you’re playing, but Kaydel Connix is thirty-five years old.”

“The first one would have been.”

“First one?” Aletha scowled.

Kaydel bit her lip, “Um, Kaydel died a few years before I was born. My mother was devastated and decided to get pregnant again. When I was born a girl, they decided to name me after her, but threw a Ko in there to differentiate. I am the daughter of Timor Connix and Adrinna Anthea. I can prove it. Ask me anything. Your parents were Andreas and Andromeda Anthea. Your sisters were Adrinna, Alecta, Athena, Anissa, and then yourself, Aletha. You’re fifty-four years old, and were born on Mallarex on the third day of the eighth month in their calendar.”

Aletha honestly didn’t know what to say. But she couldn’t deny the girl’s words; the more she looked at the young woman in front of her, the more she recognized the features of her sister and her parents in the girl. This girl had to be who she claimed to be. Who else could know so much about Aletha’s family unprompted?

“I don’t believe this,” Aletha shook her head. “You’re my niece.”

“I can do a blood test if you want,” Kaydel offered.

“Maybe. I don’t know. This is a lot to process.”

“I’m sorry for throwing it all on you. I’ve just so badly wanted to meet you.”

She had a niece. Aletha couldn’t believe it. Well, yes she could believe it. She was well aware of the four nieces she had (or five as it now would seem.) But her nieces were little girls who didn’t really like her. Now she was staring at a full grown young woman who actually seemed interested in her.

“Why do you want to meet me?” Aletha asked.

“Because you’re the Rebel,” Kaydel grinned. “You’re the one who stood up to this family, said this situation with the Empire is wrong, and then fought to change the Galaxy.”

Aletha sighed, “That’s not quite why I left.”

“It’s why I left,” Kaydel said.

“What do you mean?”

“I left home to join the Resistance. Mom told me I was out of the family if I did it, but I knew I had to. So I decided to join and maybe find you, the one person in the family who gets it.”

Aletha did get it. How many years had she wished for someone in the family to not only see her point of view, but share it? Not since her father died had anyone sided with Aletha. Alecta had made sure of that isolation.

Alecta, she remembered with horror. Aletha had been forced to leave Rey behind to protect her from Alecta, and now here another girl was putting herself in the path of Alecta’s fury.

She couldn’t let that happen.

“Kaydel, stop! Listen to me. Do you know where I’ve been the past two decades? On Jakku sleeping in a tent because your other aunt has vowed to kill me, and if given the opportunity, she will.”

“She’s made the same vow against me,” Kaydel said.

Silent horror filled Aletha’s face.

“Wh- What?” she managed to blurt out after a few minutes. “Alecta wants to kill you?”

“And that’s why I have to fight,” Kaydel said evenly. “I met Aunt Alecta one time in my life, and after ten minutes with her, I realized that that woman and all who think like her must be stopped at all costs. After that, I found out about you from Katha – my older sister.”

“I remember her.”

“Right. Well, Mom actually hid your existence from me, but once I started showing signs of rebellion, Katha told me about you to warn me off from rebellion… Ended up doing the opposite, and I became a little obsessed with you for a while.”

Aletha blushed.

“When I turned eighteen, I set out from home to join the Resistance and find you,” Kaydel continued. “My search for you wasn’t fruitful, but my involvement with the Resistance was. Unfortunately, Alecta found out, and now she’s sworn to kill me.”

“But how do you know that?” Aletha asked. “If you haven’t seen her in that time-”

“She sent a message to the Resistance demanding I be turned over to her as my rightful guardian. General Organa basically told her to go to hell, and then took me under her wing.” Kaydel took a deep breath, “Look, I understand that this all is a lot to throw on a person who is a stranger, but I needed to meet you. You can take me or leave me; it’s your choice and I respect it. But if you wanted some semblance of family around here, just know you’ve got a niece hanging around.”

Aletha took a while to consider Kaydel’s words… and then smiled.

“Did Adrinna really name you Kaydel Ko?”

Kaydel grinned, “We have as insufferable names as you and your sisters did. Kaydel, Katha, Keth – the only boy among us if you don’t count Athena and Anissa’s boys – Kyra, and Kaydel Ko.”

“And Connix as a surname too. You poor thing.”

The women stood there, staring at each other, and smiling.

Then Aletha pulled her niece into a tight hug and let out a joyous laugh.

“I’ll take any part of you you’re offering, My Darling,” Aletha held her close.
“I’m happy to hear that, Doctor Kymeri.”

“Call me Aletha, Auntie, Aunt, or whatever you want. No honorifics here, Darling.”

“How about Aunt Ally?”

Aletha’s heart lurched as she remembered Rey calling her that once upon a time, but she agreed to the name.

The women stood there holding each other for a while; laughing and relishing the feeling of having their own flesh and blood by their side once more. Sure, the best families were the ones a person chooses for themselves, but there was still something warm and comforting when blood got along.

“How did you find me?” Aletha asked after a while. They had already made plans to share dinner that night and learn all they could about each other.

“Commander Nalto,” Kaydel nodded towards Diego. “You mentioned to him my mother’s name, he put two and two together, and approached me. He said you seemed like you would want a loving niece in your life.”

Aletha’s eyes went to Diego, who had watched the entire scene. He was smiling at the sight of aunt and niece in a loving embrace. His eyes met hers, and something oddly tender entered his gaze. She couldn’t believe what he had done for her.

“Thank you,” she mouthed to him.

Diego nodded.

Aletha turned her attention back to her niece, but Diego’s focus didn’t wane. He just folded his arms and watched the tender moment with an enormous grin.

There was a chuckle behind him.

“What?” Diego didn’t deign to look back at Kes.

“I know that look,” Kes grinned at Diego’s expression. “You sir, are in a lot of trouble.”

Diego just smiled, “Yeah, I think I am.”

Chapter End Notes

Coming Up Next Chapter…

Something in the Air
As the situation with Rey intensifies and Aletha finds herself on a battlefield for the first time in years, Teng and Diego discover that the mating game is the same whether you’re seventeen or fifty-seven.

Spoilers for The Last Jedi:

How do I describe my reaction? In a word: disappointed. First I was sad, then I was angry, then numb, and now I’m just resigned to disappointment.
You know the truth; Luke is dead, Rey is a nobody, and Reylo will probably be endgame. Lucasfilm wasted all of our time with this fucking mystery.

But I’m not mad, not anymore. I’m glad I had this theory because from it I’ve had this story. A story that I adore and a story that I am proud to have written. And I will continue this story, the story that should have been told of a father and daughter torn apart by the jealous rage of his nephew, and the struggle they endure to be a family while the daughter of the son and the son of the daughter battle it out for the Skywalker legacy.

Will episode 8 be included in this story? Absolutely. I’ve already been working out how to do it, and I think I have some great ideas to fix the mess that is The Last Jedi. I will warn you though that the outcome of that story will be very different.

Oh by the way, I’m not fucking killing off Luke. That was bullshit, and I’m furious. Though the double sun visual was beautiful… Holy shit, it really just hit me that Luke Skywalker is dead. And what? The man who puts his family and friends before himself first never got to really find love beyond – currently the only canon love interest he has is – Nakari Kelen? I hate that thought.

Nobody is taking Felicity Rhiaon from me though. I worried about a competing love interest, and now I can safely say I view Felicity as Luke Skywalker’s soulmate… but then again I created her specifically to be so.

So long story short, I will continue with this fic. I hope you can enjoy it even if it’s totally, massively, non-canon.

Because honestly fuck Episode 8; that was such a slap in the face.

Like it better than Rogue One though.
Something in the Air

Chapter Summary

Aletha gets a medal, Teng asks Quom for dating advice, and Luke uncovers a startling mystery.

Chapter Notes

Wow, I guess people are really starving for Rey Skywalker stuff. There’s been such an influx of reviews, favorites, and follows, so I want to just say welcome to all the new readers. Since there have been a few new people asking, I would like to say for the record that I update chapters once I finish writing them. There’s no specific day I do it, or guarantee of at least once a week. Recently, I was very good with doing it at least once a week, but then holiday stuff happened, and I’ve been so completely exhausted that I haven’t had the mental energy to write. So, to answer the frequent question, I update when I update.

And for those wondering when we’ll finally get to TFA, I’d like to announce that we are in the homestretch. There should be two more chapters left of this story arc (where Rey learns to fight) and then there will be only 2.5 story arcs before we get to TFA. It’ll be about two chapters involving the story that takes place in Rey’s portion of the novel Before the Awakening. A chapter involving Aletha discovering something I think we all want her to figure out. Then three chapters surrounding the events that set The Force Awakens into motion. So roughly eight chapters left before we get there.

Finally, the reason I took so long with this chapter is that I took a break to outline the entire TLJ portion of this story, and I’m really excited. I have some really great stuff planned, including continuing some Star Wars traditions Rian Johnson didn’t put in (I do not count BB-8 as being the one to say I have a bad feeling about this), as well as some twists on the traditions (there’s something that happens in every middle movie of the trilogy that Johnson didn’t do, but not only will I do that, but then have the character it happens to do something a character’s never done afterwards), and doing something truly epic with the Force we have never seen before. I hope you guys enjoy, because this is going to be amazing, and I’m starting to set up some of it now.

Plus, I’m giving BB-9E the respect he deserves. I love that little ball of hate, and no lie, I am literally wearing a BB-9E t-shirt while writing this chapter.

For those interested, according to the current outline, there will be at least 141 chapters of this story… No pressure on me at all.

Also, for the battle scene in this chapter, I highly recommend listening to ‘Enter Lord Vader’ from the Revenge of the Sith soundtrack. For the… Leia scene – you’ll know which one – I highly recommend listening to ‘Luke and Leia’ from the Return of the Jedi soundtrack. And for the final scene I recommend ‘The Scavenger’ from the Force Awakens soundtrack.
The Long Way Home

Chapter Forty

Something in the Air

My speeder’s not easy to pilot. It’s top heavy and if you’re not careful, it’ll roll. That’s fine with me – I know what I’m doing, and if anyone steals my baby they won’t get far.

- Rey’s Survival Guide

Rey could dodge the fist that flew towards her face, but she couldn’t avoid the knee that slammed into her stomach.

She moaned and hit the ground, incapacitated as she heard the pair of scavengers laugh at her misery. Rey couldn’t move to stop them as they scampered past her and hopped on the driver’s seat of her beloved speeder. She was helpless as the scavengers made off from the TIE fighter with not only the speeder, but her daily haul.

Groaning, Rey forced herself to her feet and ran after the pair. They were just one of many scavengers who had decided Rey Erso was now fair game to beat and steal from. Toras Kern had set a dangerous precedent, and despite her father’s fighting lessons, Rey was struggling to stand her ground.

The pair were laughing at Rey’s pathetic attempt of literally giving them chase and not paying any attention to their surroundings. If they had they would have noticed the speeder starting to tip. And they also would have noticed the speeder parked next to the Y-Wing they were fast approaching.

Rey grinned as her baby flipped over, throwing her attackers off. As she ran towards the Y-Wing and her speeder continued on, it disappeared behind the ship. For a minute, she could have sworn she heard the engine cut, but that was impossible. Who could get it to stop so quickly? No one could have jumped on and killed the engine so fast. They would have to have something like Jedi powers and use the Force to turn it off.

It probably just ran out of gas.

The pair of scavengers looked furious as they lifted themselves off the ground. They spat a few insults at her in Huttese and readied themselves to charge at her. They would make her pay for this.

A boot slammed into the back of the first scavenger, pinning him to the ground. Before the second even realized what had happened, a metal fist slammed into his face.

Rey skidded to a halt as the men looked up at Luke Erso in surprise.

“I didn’t realize I had to cut off a hand every ten years to prove the lengths I’ll go to protect my daughter,” Luke shook his head, almost looking genuinely disappointed in the men.
They tried to fight him off, but Luke Erso was too skilled for them to defeat. Rey watched her father with a smile as he expertly dispatched the duo. He was truly amazing when he fought. Perfectly timed kicks, punches, and impossible to know dodges. It was like something was guiding him.

She almost felt ashamed of herself as she slowly approached the scene. Why couldn’t she fight the way her father did? The rational part of her reminded her that her father had almost fifty years of experience over her. But still, how could Dad defend himself so well, and yet she always failed?

“Because he has given in to the Force that lives inside of him,” a woman’s voice said.

Rey frowned and turned around in surprise. Standing before her was a woman in a dark purple tunic, black pants, grey knee-high boots, a blue morning glory in her hair, and a strange cylinder clipped on her belt.

“Alyla Kene?” Rey whispered.

“Hello, Rey,” Alyla smiled. “It’s been a very long time.”

“I’m sorry, but I… I don’t remember you.”

“I didn’t expect you would. Not for some time yet. I’m here to help you, to guide you, and encourage you.”

“Encourage me to do what?”

“To draw on the strength inside of you,” Alyla answered. “Though hopefully it will go better than it did with your cousin. That really did not end well for me.”

Rey blinked, “I have a cousin?”

Alyla looked over Rey’s shoulder and frowned, “I must go.”

“No, wait please!”

“You are strong, Rey,” Alyla placed a hand on Rey’s shoulder. “Draw on that strength, and do not give in to fear.”

“Alyla!”

Luke gave the pair of scavengers one last punch, and one told the other to make a break for it. Luke smiled as he watched the two scamper off, and then looked up at Rey.

His heart dropped when he saw a decidedly not glowing blue Alyla Kene standing next to his daughter.

She looked up like she had heard him, and smiled across the sandy dune. Before Luke could do anything, Alyla disappeared.

“Rey?” Luke called, racing up to her.

“Are you okay, Dad?”

“Yeah, I’m fine. What just-”
“You saw her too? Alyla?”

Luke blinked, “Yes. So we both saw her… and she wasn’t glowing blue?”

Rey frowned, “Does that mean something?”

“Maybe… or maybe it’s just a shared vision.”

“She felt pretty real to me.”

“What do you mean?”

“She put a hand on my shoulder,” Rey said.

Luke scowled, “And it… was solid? Not just a warmth?”

“Yeah, it was solid. Should it have not been?”

“No. It shouldn’t.”

Rey let the silence linger as she bit her lip, “Dad… She said I had a cousin.”

Luke stumbled a step back, “She what?”

“Well, yes, but… why is she telling you that?”

Rey wrung her hands together, “Is something wrong?”

“Yes, I just… I don’t know what.” Luke took a minute to think things over, and then returned his attention to his daughter, “Are you okay? Those two put up a pretty good fight.”

“I’m fine.”

Luke smiled and stroked her cheek, “I’m proud of you. You’re getting to be a very good fighter.”

Rey sighed, “It doesn’t feel like it.”

He pulled her forward to kiss her forehead, his beard tickling her skin. She leaned forward, wrapping her arms around him and dissolving into his loving embrace.

They stood there for a while, holding each other. It may have been a strange and dangerous life they lived, but at least they had this: love. They had each other.

But still… Luke couldn’t help but wonder about Alyla Kene.

Rey’s lips on Teng’s were like heaven. So soft and sweet, like some sort of dessert. Or at least Teng thought that was what dessert was like. It had been over a decade since he had the pleasure of having dessert. But it didn’t matter, he had Rey Erso and that was the best taste in the galaxy.

“Oh Teng,” Rey moaned, her hands running over his sturdy body.

“Rey,” Teng murmured in reverence.
She was beneath him, basking in the pleasure they exchanged. His hips were between her legs, one of which was coiled around him. Rey moaned as they pressed their bodies against each other, and Teng buried his head in the crook of her soft, swanlike neck.

“Rey,” Teng moaned again.

Slowly she began to grind up against him, and he-

“I said, pass the screwdriver!” Quom exclaimed.

Teng slammed his head up on the speeder in shock.

“Okay, that hurt,” Teng rubbed his forehead as he rolled out from under the speeder.

Teng wiped his oily hands on a rag, and began digging through the toolbox.

“You know, I see you under speeders and machinery so often, I wonder if you’re part samalizard.” Quom frowned when his quip got no response. “Hey!”

Teng sputtered as Quom’s balled up polishing rag hit him in the face.

“You okay?” Quom asked.

“Yeah, I’m fine,” Teng tossed the polishing rag aside and handed Quom the screwdriver.

“Then where was your head a few seconds ago? Somewhere better than here in my shop?”

“Yeah… somewhere a lot better.”

Quom raised an eyebrow, but said nothing as he went back to work. Teng watched Quom nervously as the Vrogem uncharacteristically dropped the subject. He was apparently too occupied with his work to let his mind go to other things.

Teng’s mind, however, was not.

Gathering his courage, Teng sighed and asked, “Quom?”

“Yeah?”

“How do get a girl to like you?”

Quom instantly stopped his busywork, “A girl?”

Teng winced, regretting his question.

“What girl?” Quom asked.

“No one.”

“Rey?”
“No! It’s… Demi! That Demi girl!”

“You mean Devi?”

Teng reddened, “Uh… yeah. Devi.”

Quom just looked at him, “So, Rey?”

He sighed, admitting defeat, “Ok, fine. Yeah. I like Rey.”

“Well, it’s about time! I’ve been waiting for this for ages!”

“Shh! Keep your voice down! Luke and Rey could be back any moment.”

“Then this was a very bad time for you to bring up this topic of conversation.”

Teng sighed, “Yeah, it was. I just… I don’t know how to make her like me. Like like me like me.”

“What are you, ten?”

“Quom, please!”

Quom set down his tools, “Alright, I may not be an expert in romance, but I’ve been around long enough to see the signs. I’ll teach you to court a girl the best way! The Vrogem way!”

Teng had a bad feeling about this.

“First thing is appearance,” Quom looked over Teng. “You got to make your fur… or hair in your case nice and poufy. Ladies love a male with a thick, shiny coat. And bright colours! We have to dress you in colors so bright, you can guide a ship to the ground for a safe landing. And jewelry! Put on as many bobbles and trinkets as possible! You should be jingling as you walk down the street!”

Teng just stared at Quom, “I’m going to regret asking you this, aren’t I?”

“Yeah, probably.”

Teng sighed.

The other scavengers don’t mess with my ride. One reason is because Unkar’s told them not to – not because he likes me but because I bring in the most valuable stuff.

- Rey’s Survival Guide

“One portion,” Plutt slid the packet over to Rey.

She scowled at him, “No way. That haul has to be worth at least three portions. You’re ripping me off!”

“Are you new here?” Roke muttered from the side where he was supervising the line.

Rey glared at him.
“One portion is my final offer,” Plutt refused. “Unless you want to withdraw some from your father’s fund?”

“No,” Rey knew she wasn’t supposed to do that without her father’s permission. It was so he could keep track of their credit better.

But the mention of her father brought an idea to her mind. Why didn’t she try doing that negotiation trick her dad had been teaching her? How did it go again? A firm tone? A casual gesture? Someone weak-minded? She might just be able to pull it off.

“You will give me three portions,” Rey imitated her father as best she could.

Plutt and Roke shared an amused look.

“No,” Plutt said simply.

Rey tried it again, waving her hand harder this time and concentrating on his face intently, “You will give me three portions.”

“No, I won’t,” Plutt repeated.

“The Boss has spoken. Now knock it off or I’ll knock you off,” Roke threatened, fingering his quarterstaff slung across his shoulder.

“You wouldn’t touch me,” Rey smirked. “Not with my dad around.”

Roke matched her grin, “Well, good news, Little Girl, Daddy isn’t around. You think I’m afraid of hitting some pompous fifteen-year-old girl? Try me. I dare you.”

Rey suddenly wished her father was with her in that moment rather than back at Quom’s tent.

“Now, now,” Plutt said. “Perhaps there is some way you can earn a few extra portions.”

She didn’t like the way he was looking at her. That lecherous grin as his eyes drifted down her body. Rey gave a small shudder and crossed her arms over her chest.

“I’m not doing that,” she said firmly.

Plutt asked, “Doing what?”

“Whatever it is you want.”

He chuckled, “You know, you’ve grown into quite the beauty, Rey. Are you sure there’s nothing you’re willing to offer?”

She didn’t want to have to play this card, but felt like she wouldn’t be safe if she didn’t, “I will scream for my father.”

“Oh, I’m not asking for much… How about a smile? You look quite beautiful when you smile.”

Rey put on her biggest scowling grimace/glare possible, “No.”

Plutt dropped some portion packets on the counter with a thud, “Five portions for one smile.”

She stared at the packets hungrily. Five whole portions for a tiny little action. What was the harm in a facial expression?
But it was more than a facial expression; it was a dangerous door to open. One day a smile, the next, what, a hug? Maybe a kiss on the cheek a week later, and one on the lips a while after… All leading up to something unthinkable.

Yet, portions were important. For some reason, her father had been paying Sarco Plank half of their daily portions, so they were a little short on them. Not to mention Teng and Quom needed all the help they could get.

“Come now,” Plutt goaded. “Just one little smile.”

Was her dignity worth making sure her family was fed?

Rey very slowly lifted the corners of her mouth into a smile.

Plutt slid over the portion packets, “That’s My Girl.”

She shuddered, her face instantly dropping as she slid the portions into her bag. Rey could hear Roke and Plutt laughing as she scurried away. In need of comfort, she went to the only place she could be alone and feel safe.

Though someone else lived there now, Rey dropped her bag to the ground, sat against the tent of Aletha Kymeri, and cried.

“He asked you for dating advice?” Luke was absolutely gobsmacked as he walked through the market with Quom. They were casually looking for Rey, she not yet having come back from bartering with Plutt, but hadn’t been at the concession stand. “Why would he ask you for dating advice?”

“Because I’m pretty sure he didn’t want to walk up to you and say ‘your daughter turns me on. Teach me to seduce her.’”

Luke glared at Quom, “Teng is definitely after more than just sating his lust. He cares for Rey on a deeper level.”

“True, but he’s also a seventeen-year-old boy. Lust is certainly a factor in the equation.”

“Why am I having this conversation about my daughter?”

Quom shrugged, “You started it.”

“And I’m finishing it,” Luke said shortly. He looked around at the passersby warily, “I don’t want people getting the wrong idea.”

Quom winced, “So, you’ve heard the whispers too? Damn, I was hoping you could avoid that.”

“Why don’t people understand that a father can be close to his daughter without them being that close?”

“Don’t let them bug you. We both know it’s not true. Besides, it’s not like there aren’t similar rumours about me and Rey.”

“I just pray that Rey never overhears these-”
“REY!” Quom exclaimed, pulling Luke to a halt.

She was walking down the street, her eyes red and wet, and trying to avoid anyone’s gaze.

“Hey, Quom,” she gave a loud sniff and she wiped her eyes. “Dad.”

“Nothing,” she looked away.

“Rey.”

“I don’t want to talk about it. Besides, it’s nothing more than the usual.”

“That’s not very encouraging,” Luke pointed out. He gently reached out and grabbed her arm, “Please talk to me.”

“I can’t,” Rey struggled to say. She caught her father’s look, “Not because anyone’s threatening me, and it’s just... I can’t talk about this to you.”

“You can come to me with anything,” he gently reminded.

“I know, but I don’t want to discuss this with you.”

Quom traded a look with Rey, “What about someone else? Could you talk about it with another person?”

Rey smiled, understanding his meaning, “Yeah. I think there’s someone I can discuss it with.”

“I just felt so cheap,” Rey said. She sat with her knees to her chest, gripping the comm tightly as she sat in the sand a little from the walker. “I never thought a smile could be so terrible.”

“I’m so sorry you had to go through that, Sunshine,” Aletha Kymeri’s voice chirped through the comm. “You should never feel like you have to do something like that to get yourself more food. You know your father provides not only for you, but Quom and Teng as well. You don’t think he would actually let them starve?”

“I know, it’s just hard,” Rey sighed. “I wish you were still here to help me through this.”

“I am here. Just not physically, but have I failed to answer your comm even once yet?”

Rey smiled, “No.”

“You’re a strong young woman, Rey. Don’t let anyone think otherwise. It’s a sad fact of human nature that we’re predisposed to put others down to make us feel superior. Heck, I even met some resistance when I joined this... Resistance. Not sure it qualifies as irony, but it was a little funny.”

“How did you overcome it?”

“I used the help of my sniper and a few friends to put the boy in his place,” Aletha chuckled, remembering the day of her sniper lessons.

Rey frowned, “You didn’t do it all by yourself?”
“Don’t ever be afraid to ask for help, Sunshine, nor to accept it. Humans are social creatures. You need to stick together to protect each other.”

“But you didn’t stick together with us,” Rey muttered.

There was a long silence from the other end of the comm.

“I’m sorry,” Rey regretted her words.

“I left to protect you, Rey,” Aletha said. “I didn’t want to leave, but your safety was compromised. I couldn’t put you in danger.”

“I know. I just… miss you.”

“I miss you too. All of you.”

“Even Dad?”

Aletha paused again, “To a degree, but Rey… that whole thing is over now. Even if we do meet again, I doubt your father and I will get back together. And I’m okay with that.”

“Why? Have you met someone new?” Rey teased. Her grin fell to a frown when Aletha was silent, “Oh my god, have you?”

“No,” answered Aletha. “I’m not dating anyone, but there is a man who makes me smile. Nothing more has happened between us.”

“Yet?”

“… yet.” Aletha sighed, “Does your father still not know we’re communicating?”

“Quom and I agreed we would respect my privacy. I really need our chats to just be between the two of us.”

“Same. Though Kaydel walked in on the tail end of our last conversation, so she might think something is up.”

“How are things going with you two?” Rey asked. “I still can’t believe you found your niece.”

“Kaydel is a lovely girl, but I feel a little overwhelmed sometimes. Our relationship isn’t like the one I have with you. Kaydel doesn’t need a parent, so I’m trying to figure out how to be her cool aunt and not mother her too much.”

“I’d kind of like to meet her,” Rey admitted. “There aren’t a lot of girls around here. It would be neat to actually talk with a girl around my age.”

“I’ll see what I can do,” Aletha chuckled a little. Her voice then turned more serious, “Rey? There’s something I have to tell you. Tomorrow… I’m being sent out to battle.”

“What?” Rey exclaimed.

“As a medical team. There’s a certain area where we’ll set up our camp, and I’ll treat those wounded on the battlefield. I may be asked to do a little sniping, but I’m not going to be part of the team that retrieves the injured. I should be safe.”

“But what if you aren’t? What if they storm your camp?”
“It’s against the Reasonable Wartime Measures Act to assault an opponent’s medical camp. They could be tried with war crimes if they overstepped the bounds of the RWMA.”

“Like that’s going to stop the First Order,” Rey sneered. She closed her eyes and bit her lip, “Please be safe, Aletha.”

“I’ll do my best.”

Rey glanced towards the walker, “I should get going. It’s almost dinnertime.”

“Same here,” Aletha said. “I’m going to have an early morning.”

“Comm me when you’re back safely.”

“I will. I promise.”

Rey hesitated, “Aletha?”

“Yes, Sunshine?”

“May the Force be with you.”

Aletha laughed, “And with you too, Sunshine.”

And then Aletha’s comm flicked out.

If there was one thing Aletha forgot about battle, it was how loud it was. The deafening exchange of blasts, explosions, and shouts rung in her ears. It probably didn’t help that her earpiece comm was never silent.

It was a foggy, unpleasant place the First Order and the Resistance had decided to battle. Dark clouds covered the sun, making the planet Valra’s temperature plummet. Hard snow crunched under Aletha’s boots as she rushed a load of supplies to Doctor Kalonia in the medical tent upon the mountain ridge.

“Thanks,” Kalonia didn’t look up from her patient as Aletha dumped the supplies on a work table. “How’s it going down below?”

“We should send another team down to collect the wounded. The First Order fired another round of grenades,” Aletha reported, taking the free moment to reload the sniper rifle she carried on her back.

“We could hear the explosions up here,” Evan Tharel, a nurse shook his head.

“We’re not going to be able to collect anyone else until we get some cover,” Kalonia said. “Kymeri, take Tharel up the mountain and clear us some space for a team to run.”

“With pleasure,” Aletha grabbed some extra ammo. She grinned at Evan, “Ready to roll, Hot Shot?”

Evan grinned, “Lead the way, Grandma.”
“Just like we practised, Evan,” Aletha said as they lay flat on the ground peering through their scopes, ready to fire. “Rogue Squadron is almost here. You want to impress Commander Nalto with how much you’ve improved, right?”

“Aletha, if Commander Nalto takes notice of our sniping, it’s not me he’s going to be focused on.” She couldn’t help but blush. “Shut up.”

“Word on the base is he brings you flowers from every planet he visits.”

“I said shut up.”

“Alright collection team,” Kalonia’s voice crackled over the comm, “move out!”

A barrage of fire hailed upon the team from the First Order, but Aletha and Evan provided cover from above, carefully picking off the First Order troops.

“Maintain your fire,” ordered the voice of Statura, who was directing the battle back at the D’Qar base. “Air support has almost arrived. Black Leader? Rogue Leader? What are your ETAs?”

“Five more minutes and we’ll be with you,” Wedge Antilles – Rogue Leader – answered.

“And we’re right behind you guys,” Poe Dameron – Black Leader – added. “You ready to remind us what you’re made of, Wedge?”

“Challenge accepted, Black Leader,” Wedge replied with a chuckle.

Wedge had recently returned to the Resistance after taking a nearly two years leave when his husband, Ceren had been diagnosed with a terminal illness. It had been finally determined that Ceren was not going to be better and had less than a year to live.

In his absence, Diego had taken up command of Rogue Squadron and the air force. Wedge had returned after Ceren begged him to because he knew how much Wedge loved piloting. Diego had stepped down from command of Rogue Squadron with Wedge’s return, but maintained control of the air force in case Ceren took a turn for a worse and Wedge had to make a quick exit again.

“Black Squadron, you advance upon the First Order craft, and keep them away from our people,” Wedge ordered. “Rogue Squadron, we’ll clear the perimeter. Most of the trouble is coming from the First Order snipers, so I want to light up that mountain side.”

Kalonia’s voice entered the conversation, “Rogue Leader, please be advised that we have personnel on the mountain. Doctor Kymeri has a defensive sniping position.”

Aletha couldn’t even pretend she didn’t see Evan smirking at her.

“We’re located at 4 knock 16,” she answered using the Resistance’s location code. It was a version of latitude and longitude to conceal their location from the First Order in case the comm line got hacked.

“Noted, Doctor,” Diego answered perhaps a little too formally.

“Careful, boys,” Poe teased. “Don’t hit the doctor or Nalto will give you hell to pay.”

“Cut the chatter, Black Leader,” Wedge snapped. “Though, he’s not exactly wrong. Don’t hit our “Aletha,” Diego said, “you used the word ‘we.’ Who else is there with you?”

“Evan Tharel.”

“Really?” Diego chuckled. “You brought Hot Shot with you?”

“He’s gotten so much better over the past four months.”

“Only because you insisted on taking him under your wing to give him private sniper lessons.”

“Rogue One!” Wedge snapped, using Diego’s callsign. “You may be Head of Flight, but I’m still your commanding officer on this squad.”

“Explain to me again how that works?” Poe asked.

“Quiet, Dameron,” Wedge ordered. “That means the cut the chit chat order also applies to you, Nalto. Flirt with the doctor on your own time.”

Aletha’s face was so red, she was pretty sure she was giving away their location.

“Wedge! I was not- She’s not- We’re just-” Diego sputtered. He stopped, ceding there was no way out of this, and said, “Cutting the chatter, Rogue Leader. Kymeri, has the First Order located your position yet?”

A blast just barely missed her shoulder.

“They just did,” she answered, adjusting her shots towards the First Order sniping team that had settled on the next ridge. “Enemy red eyes at mark 8 knock 4. Appears to have 12 cygnets.”

“Engaging the red eyes,” Diego replied.

An X-Wing broke off from the horde that had just arrived. The ship swirled and twirled impressively as it skimmed along the mountain range, firing upon the First Order snipers. Within a few minutes, the hail of sniping blasts stopped raining upon Aletha and Evan.

“Nice shooting, Rogue One,” Zev Senesca chuckled over the comm.

“Medical snipers, report your status,” Statura requested.

“A little crispy but nothing we can’t shake off,” Aletha reported. “Our location is compromised though. It might be best if we disengage before the First Order can set up another team.”

“Agreed,” Statura said. “According to the ground team, they need a few more doctors down there. Get your things and get going.”

“Yes, Sir.”

“Be careful, Aletha,” Diego said.

Aletha couldn’t help but smile, “I will. I promise.”

“Okay, he’s good to move now,” Aletha told the retrieval team as they lifted the soldier onto a stretcher. “Just make sure you maintain pressure!”

She watched as the team left with the man, assuring him everything would be okay. Aletha wiped her forehead, smearing the soldier’s blood across it. There was no dignity in cleanliness on a battlefield.

“All right!” Aletha called out. “Who’s next?”

She was directed to a female pilot who had been thrown from her ship. The young woman had a round face with high cheekbones. Her hair was covered completely by her yellow cap, and she was clutching a necklace with a golden pendant shaped like a comma.

“Hello,” Aletha greeted with a smile. She always liked to keep a chirper attitude on the battlefield so her patients wouldn’t panic and go into shock. “My name is Doctor Aletha Kymeri. What’s your name?”

“Paige,” the woman groaned in pain as Aletha assessed her. “Paige Tico.”

“It’s nice to meet you, Paige. You want to tell me what happened?”

“My ship got shot down. I was thrown. My partner’s dead, but I… I survived. Oh, god it hurts!”

“Just relax,” Aletha urged. “You’ve got some nasty injuries, but nothing to lose your head over.”

“Promise? I can’t die. Please, I can’t. My sister, Rose-”

“Will be at your bedside tomorrow, I promise. She with the Resistance?”

“Yeah,” Paige laughed. “I told her not too. She’s only fifteen, but she wouldn’t leave me. Works in maintenance, but is destined for so much more… That is if she didn’t get star struck all the time. Thought she was going to lose her mind the first time we saw General Organa. Asked me to get an autograph.”

“I have a special girl like that,” Aletha smiled thinking of Rey as she worked on Paige’s injuries. “That’s a pretty necklace.”

“Rose has a matching one. They fit together, that way we’re always united. The love of a sister is a powerful thing, don’t you think?”

“Oh, I wouldn’t know. My sisters hated me, and one has vowed to kill me. It’s a long story. But if there is strength in the love between you and your sister, draw on that to pull yourself through.”

“I won’t make it?”

Aletha knotted a final bandage, “You will now.”

Paige smiled.

“Bring her up to the camp!” Aletha ordered a nearby duo with a stretcher. “Tell Kalonia to start her on 3 cc on malanoix.”

“Yes, Ma’am!” one of the medical team saluted.

Aletha squeezed Paige’s hand, “It’s nice meeting you, Paige. I’ll see you around.”

“Thank you, Doctor.”
“Tell your sister to keep you out of trouble, okay?” Aletha called as they carried Paige away. “I don’t want to see you as my patient again.”

It took her some effort, but as Paige was carried away, she smiled and waved goodbye. Aletha returned the gesture.

She stopped for a moment to think, and then pressed a button on her comm, “Commander Nalto?”

It took a moment for Diego to reply, “Aletha? Is everything okay?”

“Yeah, I was just wondering… I know it’s sort of against protocol, but do you think you could get someone to tell Rose Tico in maintenance that her sister will be okay?”

“Aletha, we’re in the middle of a battle. I can’t really-”

“Please? Just this one favor?”

Diego sighed, “Alright, fine. How can I say no to you? I’ll see what I can do. How are you doing?”

“I’m fine. I just-”

A blast barely missed her head.

“We’re under attack!” someone yelled as a hail of blasts rained upon them.

The First Order has broken through their frontline and was storming towards where the injured were being dragged. It wasn’t the actual medical camp, which was located up on the mountain, so it technically wasn’t against the RWMA. But it was a dirty move.

“Rogue Squadron!” Wedge ordered. “Avert your attention to the medical teams. Protect our doctors! Black Squadron, hold our line. Kymeri, report.”

Aletha was a little dazed, trying to take cover from the blasts. It took her a few moments before she realized why Wedge Antilles had asked her to report.

The Resistance chain of command was heavily based on the former Rebel Alliance chain of command. A person retained their previous wartime status if they joined the Resistance, and Rebel vets were given command preference over new recruits due to their experience.

Aletha had learned that due to the majority of medical work being done by droids, and a lot of former Rebel medical vets having high paying jobs these days, the only Rebel veterans in the Medical department were she and Kalonia. Due to Kalonia’s longer work with the Resistance, as well as being the former doctor for the New Jedi Order, Kalonia was in charge of the department. However, since Kalonia was up on the mountain, when it came to command of the medical team down below, Aletha was actually the next in line.

Aletha swallowed hard: she had no idea how to be a commanding officer.

“Kymeri, report!” Wedge snapped.

Like it or not, she was about to learn on the job.

“Twenty-seven injured soldiers still needing to be taken up to the camp,” Aletha reported, her voice sounding infinitely more confident than she felt. “We’ve got First Order troops firing on us from both the west and the east, and-”
Aletha froze.

Standing in the advancing troops, in gleaming chrome armor was Captain Phasma.

Aletha uttered a very vulgar Huttese curse.

“Excuse me?” Wedge had spent enough time with Luke Skywalker to recognize exactly what that meant.

“Phasma,” Aletha whispered. “She’s here.”

The comm line went silent for a moment.

“Phasma?” Poe Dameron said in shock.

“Chrome Dome is here?” Snap Wexley asked.

“How far from you is she?” Wedge inquired.

“About…” Aletha bit her lip as she calculated the distance, “Two hundred metres?”

“Anyone have a clear shot?” Diego demanded.

“Negative,” Poe said. “She’s got five enemy fighters overhead. It’d be suicide to go in for her, and she’s too far to get a clear shot from our current position.”

A silence ensued over the comm as everyone held their breath, praying that they weren’t about to hear those three horrible words.

“I’m going in,” Diego declared.

“Nalto, no!” Wedge snapped. “You’ll only get yourself killed.”

“We have to take her down! For Luke! For Fliss! For…” Diego couldn’t utter Rey’s name. He never had been able to since that devastating comm call he received from Leia Organa, reporting the death of Luke and Felicity’s little girl. “She needs to pay for what she did!”

“Nalto, stand down! That is an order!”

To Aletha’s horror she saw Diego’s ship turn towards Phasma and accelerate.

“No!” Aletha shouted.

“Nalto!” Poe exclaimed.

“Damn it!” Wedge yelled.

The rest of the pilots chorused similar exclamations as Diego sped at top speed towards the gleaming chrome armor. He barely took in the two TIE fighters zoning in on him. He barely took in Wedge Antilles and Poe Dameron breaking from their positions to go after him. He barely took in Aletha’s plea over the comm for him to stop.

All he could think about was the chrome suited Stormtrooper and how fast he could make her die.

The TIE fighters were on his tail, firing rapidly at him. Diego dodged and swerved their blasts but stayed his path. Another TIE fighter whipped around, blocking his path to the front. It was too late to adjust course. He would slam into it, but Phasma was in range. He had ten seconds to turn his guns on Phasma and take her to hell with him.

Ten.
He lowered his guns.

Nine.
He primed them.

Eight.
They were ready to fire.

Seven.

“Diego, please don’t!” Aletha yelled over his comm.

Six.
Diego locked his targeting system on Phasma.

Five.
He thought of Felicity.

Four.
He thought of Rey.

Three.

“This is for you, Fliss.”

Two.
Diego pressed the button.

On-
An X-Wing slammed into his side, knocking him off course, and sending his blasts leagues away from Phasma.

Aletha could only watch the scene in horror as one of their pilots smashed into Diego. No one could react fast enough to change what happened next. The five ships – two Resistance X-Wings and three First Order TIE Fighters – crashed into each other in a brilliant, explosive ball of flame.

Rey, Quom, and Teng froze at his sudden collapse. They had been loading up their speeders with the haul they had scavenged from a TIE fighter when Luke had suddenly grabbed at his chest and fell to his knees.

“Dad!” Rey exclaimed, dropping to her knees beside him. She had a hand on his back, and fear in her eyes, “Are you okay?”

“I’m fine, Rey,” Luke took deep breaths, trying to hide his true emotion from her. “Just got a little lightheaded. Teng, would you mind grabbing me some water?”

Teng quickly obeyed, getting a cannister from his satchel.

Quom knelt down and whispered some words of comfort to Rey. When Teng brought the cannister, Quom accepted it.

He gave Rey a few kind words and talked her into giving Luke some room. She nodded, stood, and backed up. Teng touched her arm, and she joined his side, the pair wrapping an arm around each other’s waist.

“What’s going on?” Quom whispered to Luke as he helped him drink.

“DIEGO!” Aletha screamed as the ships hit the ground in a sickening, scattered crunch of blood, fire, and twisted metal.

She didn’t even realize she had started to run towards the ship until she was far from her defensive position. First Order Stormtroopers fired at her but she ducked, and weaved, and dodged, her mind focused on one thing alone.

She had to get to Diego.

“Resistance scum!” a Stormtrooper suddenly appeared before her.

Aletha couldn’t pull out her rifle fast enough, and even if she had, sniping rifles weren’t the best close range weapons.

A blast hit the Stormtrooper in the chest and he fell down dead.

Aletha looked behind her to see Evan Tharel reloading his rifle, leading a team of five other medics.

“Leg it, Grandma!” Evan called. “Or can you not keep up with us whippersnappers?”

Aletha grinned and ran as fast as she could.

She could smell the blood before she smelled the smoke. There was no sound besides the crackling of burning equipment. Her years on Jakku taught her what to avoid on a burning ship, and she navigated the wrecks expertly.

“Diego!” she called desperately, but to no avail. That was when she saw the wreckage of a very familiar ship, “Diego!”

She raced to his ship, praying to every deity she had ever heard of that Diego would be okay. The glass of his cockpit was darkened out by smoke, and a sickening smear of blood.

“No! Diego!” Aletha screamed, trying to pry open the glass. “Please be okay. Please be alive!”
The glass finally lifted and she coughed, blinded and suffocated by the cloud of smoke. When it cleared, her eyes watered, though it may have not been from the smoke. Diego was lying perfectly still, bleeding profusely from the head, and he wasn’t breathing.

“No!” Aletha cried out. She shook his shoulder, “Diego, please wake up. Diego, look at me! Look at me!”

But Diego didn’t even flinch.

Aletha muttered a swear and got to work. She hadn’t been able to carry both rifle ammunition and respiratory equipment in her bag, so she left the equipment back at the camp. Aletha would have to do it the old-fashioned way.

She tilted his head, and sealing her mouth to his, she began a set of rescue breaths.

Aletha tried not to think about how his lips felt against hers. Mouth to mouth respiration wasn’t a make out session, but his lips were soft and smooth, a counter to the scratch of his scruffy, yet maintained facial hair. She could barely pay proper attention to the way his chest responded to the new air. Aletha just wanted more than anything for those eyelids to flutter open and reveal the dark brown pools that sparked with both severity and lightheartedness.

His recovery was decidedly less dignified as he coughed violently into her mouth, and involuntarily shoved her backwards.

“Thank the Force,” Aletha exclaimed as Diego hunched over, trying to catch his breath. She rubbed his back, “There we go, Diego. Deep breaths.”

“You… you saved me,” Diego panted. “Thank you. Though that wasn’t exactly the way I wanted-Uh… never mind.”

“What?”

“Nothing.”

Diego didn’t dare admit he was going to say Though that wasn’t exactly the way I wanted to first put my lips to yours.

As he caught his breath, Aletha bandaged his still bleeding head.

“Anything else hurt?” she asked.

Diego tried moving his body, “My… uh, legs are- Oh fuc-”

“You’re still on comm,” Aletha grinned, covering his mouth. “We can compare swear words later.”

“You are an angel,” Diego said when she removed her hands to work on his legs.

“Because I don't let you swear?”

“Among other reasons,” Diego watched her in admiration.

An expert in battlefield medicine, the gentlest and sweetest bedside manner, fearless enough to charge headfirst into a warzone to save him, beautiful even when covered in sweat and blood – Diego always had a sort of weird attraction to a battle worn woman – a natural sniper that could maybe even rival him, and the owner of the softest, sweetest lips he had ever tasted.
Kes Dameron was right; he was in a lot of trouble.

He was definitely falling in love with this woman.

“Shattered,” Aletha declared. “Your legs… You’re not going to be able to crawl out of here. I’ll get the team—”

“I’ll be fine,” Diego insisted. “I can walk.”

Aletha looked at him like he was insane, “You absolutely cannot walk on those legs. You’re going to need hours of bacta to fix this. I’m surprised you’re not screaming in pain.”

“Adrenaline probably. Aletha, who hit me?”

“It was one of our pilots.”

“But who? Are they okay?”

That was when the announcement buzzed through all the chatter on the comm.

The entire comm went silent.

Commander Wedge Antilles, the man who had taken down two Death Stars, who had been a highly respected military officer in the Rebellion, Republic, and Resistance, who had stood up with Luke Skywalker at his wedding, and gave everything he had to build a brighter future.

Wedge Antilles was dead.

For a very long time, there was silence. No one could manage to say a word. A lot of the Resistance had grown up listening to stories of his bravery. He had mentored and fought alongside so many. He had made the ultimate sacrifice for one of his men.

It was General Leia Organa who spoke, “He is one with the Force now. He died just how he wanted to: a hero. Let us never forget him.”

“Rest in peace, Wedge Antilles,” Poe Dameron said.

Every Resistance solider repeated it, “Rest in peace, Wedge Antilles.”

“Okay, boys, change of plans,” Poe took command. “We gotta roll with the punches. Any status on Nalto?”

“I’m alive, boys,” Diego sighed bitterly. Wedge Antilles had died to save his life. “I’m alive.”

“Guess that makes you Rogue Leader,” Zev awkwardly pointed out.

“Not for this battle,” Diego groaned as Aletha did her best to fix his legs with the equipment she had on hand. “My ship is not doing well.”

“Recoverable?” Poe asked.

“She’ll need to be towed, but I can fix her. Zev, you take command of Rogue Squadron. I’ll join the ground team.”
“Negative,” Aletha said into her comm, eyeing him sternly. “Commander Nalto can barely walk. We need a med team over here ASAP.”

“We’re just getting Commander Antilles out of his ship,” Evan replied. “We’ll be with you shortly.”

“Alright, we’ll see you back at the base, Nalto,” Zev said.

“Aletha, I’m fine,” Diego scowled at her.

“No, you are not,” Aletha snipped. “I’m the doctor, and I say you are not.”

“I think I know my own body. I’ll be fine. I’ve gone through much worse.”

Aletha sighed and glanced at her medical bag, “Can I at least give you something for the pain?”

“Now we’re in business,” Diego grinned. He obediently let her give him the shot, “How long until it kicks in?”

“It’s a delayed serum made for the battlefield so you don’t go out of it right away. About ten minutes?”

“That’s a very long time.”

Aletha shrugged, “It does the job I need it too.”

A blast suddenly hit the ship.

“Get down,” Diego pulled her down into his lap. Instinctually he pulled her head into his chest, shielding her face as his other arm wrapped around her waist, “It’s okay. I got you.”

Aletha gave a sigh of relief and relaxed into his embrace, “Thank you.”

“It’s my pleasure.” Diego groaned as his right hand started to spasm, “Damn it, not now.”

“What’s wrong?” Aletha asked as he pulled his arms off of her to rub his shaking arm.

“I have life long consequences from my lightsaber wound. I get tremors every so often. The med droids told me that Vader damaged my nervous system. They did their best to patch it up but…”

“Let me see.”

Diego held out his arm to Aletha. She gently took it. After examining it for a minute, she began to stroke very deliberate spots on his arm. Diego frowned as his tremors calmed and ceased.

“That’s… amazing,” he said.

“When you practice medicine on a place like Jakku you need to learn ways to fix injuries without medicine. I’ve learned a lot of chiropractic practice and acupuncture and such to treat injuries. I can show you later how to do this.”

“I would love it. I can’t tell you how many times I’ve had a tremor, broken what I was holding, and accidentally…”

Diego didn’t need to finish his sentence. The myriad of scars on his arm told Aletha all his stories.

“I… use plastic cups a lot these days,” Diego confessed in shame. “I don’t trust glass anymore.”
“Nor would I,” Aletha said. “I’ve seen a lot worse, though.”

“Woman typically don’t like seeing my arm. It’s so…”

“Doesn’t bother me. In fact, you’re far from the only pilot I’ve met with a messed-up arm. And I married one of them.”

“Really?”

“Yeah, I apparently have a very weird type. Rebel vet pilots with messed up arms. Go figure.”

Aletha couldn’t meet his eye as he smiled warmly down on her.

“Well, I’ve got a weird type too,” Diego confessed. “Snipers covered in blood and ash. When I can tell they’ve been kicking ass in battle… Let’s just say that it does things to me it really shouldn’t do.”

Aletha blushed but pressed herself closer to him.

Another blast hit the ship.

“We could die here,” Aletha whispered.

Diego dared to stroke her cheek, “We could.”

“Are you afraid?”

“I’m not afraid of death. You?”

“I’m only afraid of dying with regrets. I have none. What of you?”

He looked down at her. How easy would it be to kiss her right now?

“No,” Diego lied, staring into her eyes. “None at all.”

Silence passed between them.

“Aletha,” he murmured.

“Diego,” she whispered.

A blast suddenly hit her in the arm.

“Aletha!” Diego exclaimed as she screamed in pain.

She gritted her teeth, holding her arm tightly, “Oh, hell no!”

Aletha grabbed her rifle, adrenaline balming her pain, and whipped around. She fired at the First Order soldiers, picking one off with every shot in a frenzy.

“Would it be inappropriate to say that I’m finding this very hot?” Diego asked.

Aletha grinned, “Yes… but I don’t mind.”

Diego chuckled. Where had this girl been all his life?

“I’m out of ammo!” Aletha declared after a couple minutes. “Is there any more in my bag?”
Diego dug through her satchel, which was hard as it was still slung over her shoulder, “No. You’re out.”

“Keepuna!” Aletha exclaimed.

“Actually, you can’t shoot, you’re out of ammo,” Diego teased. “Get it, because keepuna means shoot?”

She shoved him playfully, “This isn’t the time to show off your language skills. Do we have anything else?”

“Just my sidearm,” Diego nodded to a blaster strapped to his leg. “Won’t do much for long range, but…”

His eyes went wide.

Aletha frowned and turned to follow his eyeline. Her heart dropped at the sight before them.

Captain Phasma marched towards their ship, only about one hundred metres away.

“Permission to curse even though my comm is still on?” Diego asked.

“Granted.”

Phasma was marching through the battlefield elegantly, shooting only when necessary. Her objective was not to kill Resistance officers but see if she could find a familiar face among the snow and ash.

Her troop had been the one ordered to check out the crash that had killed three of their TIE fighter pilots. It was odd, considering that Captain Tyche was in charge of the air force, but she figured the reason she had been assigned to it was that some crazy X-Wing had tried shooting her down. Phasma was very interested in seeing what idiot would try to make the mistake of shooting her of all people. If only they understood the position she held. If only they all knew the truth.

She was about one hundred metres from the ship when a hail of blasts was fired at the troops. A lone sniper was trying to take them down, and admittedly, the sniper was succeeding. Phasma ordered a halt, knowing that the sniper would only have so much ammo, and it was best to just wait until they used it up.

Sure enough, the sniper had completely discharged all their ammo within minutes. Phasma was just about to order her troops to march again when two heads popped up from the cockpit. A black-haired, brown-eyed, tan-skinned man, and a blonde-haired, blue-eyed, pale-skinned woman. It took a minute for the recognition to strike her, but when it did, it felt like she had been hit by lightning.

She couldn’t believe it. She was laying eyes on… Only a hundred metres away was… It really was…

Phasma didn’t think, she only broke into the fastest run of her life.

Aletha swallowed as she saw Phasma charge forward like something possessed.
Okay, there was no need to panic. It didn’t have to mean that her sister was about to brutally murder her and the man Aletha couldn’t yet admit she was falling in love with.

Clearly Alecta was a sensible woman. One didn’t get into a position of power without a sense of fairness. Surely she could just get her sister to stop, put down her weapon, and just talk to-

Oh, screw it.

Aletha grabbed the blaster strapped to Diego’s thigh and started shooting at Phasma.

Phasma narrowed her eyes beneath her mask at the blonde woman. Was she really doing this? Trying to actually shoot her, and when she was so close?

No, she wouldn’t believe it, and she certainly wasn’t going to let it happen. Not when she was so close.

After all these years she would finally be reunited with her sister.

Aletha gritted her teeth and focused on the chrome suited Stormtrooper racing towards her. She could remember the metallic glove smashing into her face, and the taste of blood. The way the Stormtroopers has destroyed her tent on Jakku. She remembered the painful accusations from Adrinna of being responsible for their sisters’ deaths, and the threat Alecta had made. She remembered that way Alecta had made her feel: sad, unwanted, worthless. How she had put her down in front of soldiers and family alike. The woman who had made her life a living hell.

She would not let Alecta take her life.

One last round was in the blaster, and Aletha aimed it with purpose.

The final bolt hit Captain Phasma right in the knee.

Phasma went down, slipping on the snow and stumbling to the ground. She clutched her knee in pain, but fought through the sting and pushed herself back to her feet. Phasma had taken one unsteady step forward when one of her own soldiers yanked her back.

“We’ll get you to medical, Captain!” the Stormtrooper exclaimed proudly as he pulled back from the ship.

“No! No!” Phasma screamed. “Let me go this instant! You have to let me go! Release me, soldier!”

But the Stormtrooper knew the value of his captain and struggled to drag her back to safety. Surely when the dust had settled and Phasma was in her right mind, she would thank him.

“Now’s our chance! Go!” Aletha exclaimed.
She and Diego scrambled out of the cockpit right as the medical and mechanic team arrived.

Aletha hit the ground first and was met with the leader of the mechanics, who was instructing his team to hook up the X-Wing so they could tow it to a safe place to repair it.

Diego set down seconds after her, and everyone knew the exact moment he did. When Diego’s injured legs hit the ground, he let out a bloodcurdling scream and string of Yavinese swears that would make even R2-D2 blush.

“Told you, you couldn’t walk,” Aletha teased as she helped Diego to his feet. “Come on, we’ll get you a stretcher.”

“I told you, I’m fine,” Diego groaned, leaning his weight against her.

“You don’t need to make a show of your manly strength to me, Diego.”

“I’m not doing that.”

Aletha raised an eyebrow.

“If you stop lying to me, I’ll admit one of my own falsehoods.”

Diego froze thinking of her vow of no regrets, “What falsehood?”

“Admit your lie first.”

He sighed, “Alright, I’m in immense pain right now. When is that painkiller going to kick in?”

“Any moment. Just be patient.”

“I’ll try,” Diego groaned. “Now what was your lie?”

Aletha smiled and put her hand on his chest, “My lie was…”

Diego’s breath caught, “Yes?”

“That wasn’t a painkiller. That was a slow acting sedative.”

He frowned, “Wait, what?”

That was the moment he passed out in her arms.

Aletha just tittered at the unconscious pilot in her grasp, “You should have just let me get you a stretcher.”

“No! No!” Phasma screamed as the soldier pulled her back. “Let me go! This is my chance!”

“Captain! You’re injured!” the Stormtrooper exclaimed.

She tore out of his arms and smashed a metallic fist into his face. The Stormtrooper dropped with a moan, clutching his bloody face.
Phasma turned back to the battlefield, and her heart dropped. The blonde doctor and black-haired pilot were gone, retreated into the safety of their medical camp. Fury enflamed her heart. Even the First Order respected the sanctity of a medical camp. There was no way she could get in there without removing her armor and exposing herself as vulnerable to the fire of the enemy.

She had lost her chance.

“No!” Phasma screamed.

The sound drew attention, and the Resistance troops turned their fire to one of the main figureheads of the First Order.

Phasma narrowed her eyes; if only they knew the truth. Of who they were dealing with, of the connections she had, and what she was capable of.

Without a second thought, Phasma yanked up the soldier who stole her opportunity of that long-awaited reunion. She held him in front of her, literally using him as a shield to take the blasts meant to kill her. He was dead long before the fire ceased.

She dropped him to the ground, and looked down on him with disgust. Any normal human would have guilt over such a careless and indifferent murder she had committed. But she didn’t care; in fact, she wished she could do it all over again. He had taken it from her, that moment she had dreamed of so many times. She was disgusted with him and had half the urge to spit at his feet.

Any shred of humanity she had had left had been stolen when they took the girl she loved from her. Her flesh and blood, the best part of her, the only thing that had ever mattered in her life. They had taken her from Phasma, and if she had to kill every person on this battlefield, then By the Gods, she would make them pay.

What she didn’t notice was the small, black BB unit recording her every move.

I was still very young when I realized that I knew how to scavenge and survive on Jakku better than any of them. They needed me, but I didn’t need them. So I struck out on my own.

- Rey’s Survival Guide

“You sure you don’t want me to join you?” Teng asked.

“No, I want a little time to myself,” Rey said. “I think watching today’s fights will be entertaining enough.”

Teng hesitated and put a hand on her shoulder, “You heard Quom. Luke’s going to be okay. He just needs to rest.”

“I know. Let me know when Quom gets back from dropping Dad off at the walker.”

“As long as you stay by the fighting ring.” He leaned in conspiratorially, “No sneaking onto your uncle’s freighter.”

“But it’s been so long. With Aletha gone I don’t have an excuse to stay in town.”
“Don’t do it in daylight, Rey. We don’t want you getting on the wrong side of the Blobfish.”

“Better than his right side,” Rey shuddered remembering the smile she had given the previous day.

Teng looked like he wanted to say something, but thought better of it. He just nodded and left to go back to the tent to tinker and bang his head against the wall over not being man enough to tell Rey how he truly felt about her.

A well balanced day.

Rey went to the fighting ring and paid her portion to watch. Roke was once again taking on Vance. No one had ever defeated Roke in the ring yet, and he had gone through all the goons except Dirk who didn’t fight, but just watched.

She was enjoying the spectacle before her when she felt a hand grab her where it shouldn’t.

“Don’t touch me!” Rey exclaimed, whipping around and slapping the unfamiliar alien.

The crowd around her chuckled, but the scene didn’t draw much attention.

The alien rubbed his face and laughed, trying to play it off like a game, “What’s the matter Sweetheart? Just having a little fun.”

Rey slapped him again, “Don’t ever call me Sweetheart!”

“Then what would you like to call me?”

“Preferably nothing at all.”

“You’re a feisty one. I like them feisty. How much you cost, Baby?”

Fury flashed in her eyes, and Rey was seriously considering trying to break his neck when a girl stepped between them.

“Leave her alone, Onark,” Devi ordered. She was a girl about Rey’s age, shorter than her, and her hair was short, shaved on both sides. “She’s not that kind, and you know you’re not good for it anyway.”

Onark grumbled and stormed off.

“Thanks,” Rey muttered, though not actually that grateful.

If Devi picked up on it, she didn’t mention it, “You’re welcome. We girls have to stick together.”

They stood and watched the fight for a while. Rey kept glancing at Devi, trying to figure out her purpose.

Devi finally said, “I hear you’re getting pretty good at combat, Rey.”

And there it was: motive.

“What of it?” Rey asked stiffly.

“I was thinking that I wanted to enter the fight and try to win some portions. The only problem is there aren’t a lot of people in town I could take. Except for you.”
“You want to beat me up in a public venue?”

“Not what I was going for. I was thinking we enter the fight, put on a little show, one of us wins, and we split the profit. You get five portions, so the winner gets three and the loser gets two. That way we both come out on top. If you even wanted, Strunk could fight your boyfriend and then both pairs get five portions.”

“Wait, my boyfriend?”

“Teng,” Devi said. “He can fight, right?”

“Yeah, but,” Rey blinked, “he’s not my boyfriend.”

Rey glanced over at the fighting ring where Roke was violently smashing his staff into Vance’s face. She winced. Then she looked over at Devi and remembered her father’s words.

“Don’t trust that girl further than she casts a shadow.”

It was noon.

“I’ll pass,” Rey said simply.

Devi didn’t look disheartened, “Alright. For now it’s a no, but keep it in mind. The offer’s always good, and besides, what better way to show this town what we girls are made of?”

Rey tried to push the words from her mind as Devi walked away. But still… she had to admit that Devi did have a point.

Maybe the fighting ring did have its merits.

When Diego Nalto woke up in his Medical Center bed, Aletha Kymeri was standing at the foot with arms crossed and a very unhappy look.

“You almost killed yourself,” she said.

He frowned at her, “You drugged me.”

He frowned at her, “You drugged me.”

“You weren’t cooperating. I took matters into my own hands.”

“What about Phasma? Is she-”

“Still alive, and so are you. Wedge Antilles was the unlucky one.”

“And the battle?”

“We won,” Aletha said. “Just finished getting the wounded back to base an hour ago. You’ve been out all morning.”

Diego sighed, “I’m sorry I compromised the mission.”

“Don’t tell me. Tell General Organa. She asked to be informed when you woke up. I’ve already hit the call button.”
“Oh good, if there’s one thing I love, it’s getting yelled at by Princess Leia Organa. This will be fun.”

“It’s your own fault,” Aletha said. “You’re lucky to be alive.”

“All credit goes to you,” Diego couldn’t meet her eyes. “I shouldn’t have gone after Phasma. If I just stayed on task, Wedge wouldn’t have gone after me and he might still be alive.”

“He made his own choice. It’s not your fault he died.”

“Oh, I know.”

Aletha blinked, “You- You do?”

“I learned a long time ago not to dwell in the past. There’s too much pain to cry over, and the people who gave their lives for me did it so I could live. Not wait for death.”

She considered the question before asking it, “Do you think that’s why he decided to die?”

Diego raised an eyebrow.

“I heard about his husband’s condition. Less than a year?”

“Something like that. I wouldn’t be surprised if that was one of his reasons. When he told me about Ceren’s diagnosis, Wedge said that he didn’t want to end up like Luke.”

“Luke Skywalker? What happened to him? People don’t talk about it, and I’m almost afraid to ask questions.”

“Then why ask me?”

“Because you’re the only one who has been open about the situation. He left everyone, right?”

Diego sighed, “It’s terrible what Luke did, but I don’t blame him. To lose so much, so quickly, and in such a horrifying manner. It wasn’t just losing his wife, but his daughter, and knowing there was nothing he could have done to save her. The moment she told Fliss to take their child and run, he signed that little girl’s death sentence. She was such a sweet little girl.”

Aletha winced, “So when you saw Phasma, the one responsible for her death—”

“How could I not go after her? Wedge understood, and that’s why he saved me. He couldn’t let himself fall like Luke did. I bet he remembered that night as clearly as I do.”

“What night?”

“The night Rornian burned.”

“You were there?”

“Wedge and I collected the bodies,” Diego said. “It was such a horrifying sight. I think I remember Obik Kenu the most.”

Aletha’s breath hitched, “Obik? You… you found him?”

“He was in the bedroom of Fliss’ daughter. Their home was set ablaze, and Obik… he was crispy. The temple was also set on fire, so he wasn’t the only one who burned. I think Tyla Kinall’s death was the saddest. Wedge found her at the bottom of the hill that Fliss’ house sat on. She was burnt, bloody, had broken bones, and chunks of wood embedded in her limbs. And to top it off, she was shot in the head. Can you imagine surviving all that, just to be shot by a monster?"

“So, Obik burned to death. My god. That man didn’t deserve that end.”

“Nor the one he actually got.”

Aletha frowned.

“Due to the circumstances, autopsies were ordered for all of the slaughtered Jedi. Obik’s post-mortem revealed he burned after he died.”

“Then how was he killed?”

Diego closed his eyes, struggling to push the horrifying sight he saw that day from his mind. “Diego?” Aletha asked coming around to his side, but she wasn’t sure she wanted an answer. “He was beheaded.”

Aletha nearly threw up, “Oh god! No!”

Diego grabbed her hand, “I’m sorry. I know he was a friend.”

“Acquaintance more like. Our relationship was mainly crossing paths during suspicious intakes, and me nagging him to quit smoking. Wonder if he ever did?”

“He did,” Diego chuckled. “Luke wouldn’t give him a lightsaber until he did. Also married Reine Agim like he always wanted.”

“I’m glad to hear that. They have any kids?”

“Not to my knowledge. I think I heard Reine had some problems that prevented it. I don’t know. We weren’t close.”

“And what about you?” Aletha asked. “Any Diego Juniors running around?”

“No. What about you? Any kids?”

“I was pregnant once, but it didn’t make it past first term,” Aletha had no idea why she was telling him something so intimate. “Otherwise, no biological children. I did serve as a kind of stepmother to my ex-boyfriend’s daughter. Sweet girl. Heartbroken when I left, but sacrifices sometimes have to be made.”

“I hear that.”

“Did you want children?”

“Not really. I mean, I don’t hate them, and I’m not intentionally childless, but I don’t regret not having them,” Diego answered.

“Same with me,” Aletha said. “My one pregnancy was a MisCalc, but I don’t mourn not having kids. Part of me thinks I missed out on something, but I am okay with never having had my own child.”
“Frankly, being a parent sounds exhausting.”

“I fully agree. I’d rather be the fun aunt who helps rebel against their parents.”

“Well, you seem to be doing a good job of that,” Diego pointed behind Aletha, and she turned to see Kaydel. “Looks like you’ve got company.”

“Aunt Ally?” Kaydel’s eyes lit up when she saw Aletha. She ran to her aunt and pulled her into a tight hug, “You’re okay!”

“I’m fine, Darling,” Aletha laughed, holding Kaydel tightly. “I’m okay.”

“How’s your arm?”

“Evan fixed it all up.”

“Looks like Hot Shot really does have something behind him,” Diego chuckled. “That was some great leadership he showed today.”

“Well don’t tell him, it’ll go to his head,” Aletha laughed. “Kay, you remember Commander Nalto?”

“Of course,” Kaydel smiled at him. “How are you feeling, Commander?”

“As best as I can hope in the circumstances. You’re in Communications, right?”

“Right. Doing nothing too special at the moment, but Brance says I have promise.”

“Well, I suppose I’ll be joining you for the next little while,” Diego said. “I’m certain that General Organa will be grounding me for my little stunt.”

“You bet I will.”

The group turned to see Leia Organa marching towards them with Threepio, BB-8, Poe Dameron, Zev Senesca, and Taslin Brance following behind her.

“What were you thinking?” Leia demanded.

“Kill Phasma?” Diego shrugged. “I’m sorry, General. I shouldn’t have disobeyed orders. I just can’t stand the thought of her going unpunished.”

“And you think I can? I understand you had a close relationship with Fliss, but she was my sister-in-law, and her daughter was my niece. You think I don’t remember the moment I watched that footage of her torture and confession of what happen to her daughter? You think I don’t remember that horrible walk from my office to the Millennium Falcon to tell my brother that his toddler daughter was dead? You think I don’t remember the moment my husband told me that our own son had murdered Fliss?”

Aletha frowned. Hadn’t Diego said Phasma killed Fliss?

“You think I don’t remember the morning that I found Luke was gone, unable to handle what had happened to his family? Or that day we found him frozen in shock surrounded by the dead bodies of his students? I understand why you charged her, but I don’t understand why you disobeyed orders. That is the best thing about you, you stick to the rules no matter what. Don’t let your hubris be your downfall, Nalto.”

Diego bowed his head, “Understood, General.”
“Doctor Kymeri?” Leia turned to Aletha. “How long until his injuries heal?”

“He should be on his feet today, but I recommend taking him out of action for at least a week.”

“Very well. Commander Brance,” Leia turned to the Head of Communications, “Commander Nalto will be serving on your team for the duration of his grounding. He will be grounded for three weeks. Commander Senesca, you will be in charge of the Air Force and Rogue Squadron until then.”

“Three weeks?” Diego objected.

“One for your injuries, and two for your stupidity,” Leia said. “We lost a good man today. I’m not angry at you because he chose to do it… but this all could have been avoided, Diego.”

Diego bowed his head, “I understand. Has his husband been informed?”

“Yes, Ceren has. We’ll be sending Wedge’s body home to Yavin IV tonight.”

“How was he told?”

Poe answered for Leia, “We messaged my father, who told him in person. Ceren asked for Wedge to be returned home for proper burial. Thought it fitting he be buried in the shadow of the Death Star.”

“Good. Ceren was told in person,” Diego took a deep breath. “What about everyone else?”

“Rogue Squadron heard it over the comm,” Zev said. “We’re currently contacting the rest of the squad who aren’t currently serving with us. Ceren should take care of the rest.”

All eyes turned to Leia.

She sighed, “I’m certain my brother already knows. As Threepio said, he was a close friend. Surely Luke felt it in the Force… beyond that, it’s out of our hands. We will be having a memorial service for Wedge tonight. I would like all of you to attend. Zev, Diego, you were close to Wedge. If either of you would like to say anything-”

“I’ll think of something,” Diego promised.

“So will I,” Zev nodded.

“Alright then.” Leia took a deep breath, “Come on, there’s much to be done. We did just win a battle after all.”

“You’re right, General,” Brance said respectfully. “May I?”

“Of course,” Leia nodded and gestured for him to take his leave. She turned her gaze back to Aletha, “Doctor Kymeri, before I go, I would like to present you with something.”

All eyes turned to BB-8 as he produced a small box from his body. Aletha frowned as Poe bent down to take it, and then passed it to Leia.

“I’m impressed by your fearlessness of charging headfirst into the battle after Diego,” Leia said. She opened the box, and presented Aletha with a small medal in the shape of a silver falcon’s head, “For your actions I would like to present you with the Han Solo Medal of Ingenuity.”
A suspicious chuckle arose from the group.

“General,” Diego groaned. “Did you really have to give her one of those?”

“She earned it, Diego,” Leia chortled.

“The Han Solo Medal of Ingenuity is a bit of a gag medal,” Poe explained.

“What do you mean?”

“My husband,” Leia started, “is a very… unique person. Drives me crazy, but don’t think I don’t love that man. After him, as well as my brother and his wife, putting me through so many insane things, I decided to create this so-called award. It’s presented to someone who does something so insanely stupid that there’s no way in hell they should succeed, yet somehow they make it work. For example, escaping the Death Star by charging headfirst into a troop of Stormtroopers, screaming and blasting at them, and yet somehow making it back to Luke and I in one piece. Or in your case, charging headfirst onto a battlefield with only a sniper rifle to go save the life of a pilot who is as good as dead, and then fending off Captain Phasma herself with a pistol. You truly deserve this medal, Doctor Kymeri.”

Aletha couldn’t help but blush as Leia pinned the medal to her uniform.

“You know, it reminds me of something my sister-in-law once did,” Leia said in a low voice so only Aletha could hear. “Several months pregnant she managed to singlehandedly break herself out of a First Order prison and outrun a legion of Stormtroopers… I miss my sister very much. I love seeing sparks of her in other people.”

Aletha smiled, “Thank you, General.”

Leia placed a hand on her arm and watched Aletha for a minute. Then without a word, she turned and exited. The others followed, but BB-8 blocked Poe from leaving.

“Hey, what’s up, buddy?” Poe asked. He hadn’t noticed the way BB-8 had been analysing Kaydel the whole time.

Bop beep chirp.

“This isn’t nothing.”

Cheep chip bee.

“Acting casual is nowhere in your programming.”

Kaydel laughed.

“Hey, don’t let him fool you,” Poe said. “He may be cute, but he is devious.”

“I’m sure he is, Commander Dameron,” Kaydel smiled. She offered Poe her hand, “Lieutenant Kaydel Ko Connix.”

“That’s an unfortunate name,” Poe shook her hand.

“You should hear the rest of us. Aunt Ally’s maiden name is Aletha Anthea.”
“Please stop telling people that,” Aletha said. “Half the reason I married Antar Kymeri was for the surname.”

“She’s your niece?” Poe asked.

“Long lost niece I didn’t even know I had until Commander Nalto introduced us. Kaydel and I are apparently the Rebels of the family.”

“Well, I can certainly see the resemblance between you two lovely ladies,” Poe took a appreciative look over Kaydel.

Kaydel couldn’t help but blush.

“Flatterer,” Aletha scolded playfully.

“You should have seen the way I used to work Mrs. Skywalker. Pretty sure I was about a year away from convincing her to run away with me.” He looked Kaydel over significantly, “I wonder if I could beat that time?”

Kaydel grinned, “We in Communications are always looking for efficiency.”

Diego scowled, half wondering how Poe Dameron could charm a woman to be smitten in about three seconds.

“Thank you, Poe,” Diego said.

“Huh?” Poe snapped out of his musings over Kaydel. He dropped her hand, “For what?”

“Having Kes tell Ceren in person.”

“Oh, it’s nothing.”

“It is something,” Diego insisted. “I’ve seen families get informed in very terrible ways. Don’t ever do that to your troops. I’ll never do it to mine.”

“I promise, Sir,” Poe bowed his head.

“Um, Aunt Ally, are you almost done?” Kaydel asked. “I was thinking we could go grab some lunch.”

“Oh, you haven’t eaten yet, Kay?” Aletha asked.

“I wanted to wait for you.”

“Sorry Darling, I think it’s going to be a while yet before I’m free. How about lunch tomorrow?”

“Alright, but don’t be late.”

“Wouldn’t dream of it,” Aletha chuckled.

BB-8 rammed into Poe’s legs.

“Oh! What?”

Beep beep beep.

“That was absolutely not an accident! What is your problem?”
BB-8 rolled back and stared at his master. Did he seriously have to spell it out for Poe?

Fine.

Beep beep beep beep.

BB-8 nodded to Poe.

Beep beep beep boo.

He nodded to Kaydel.

Beep beep beep bop. Bo beep beep bo.

“Oh!” Poe’s eyes went wide.

Diego snorted, understanding Binary, but Aletha only had a vague idea what had been said.

“Hey, Kaydel,” Poe said slyly, “if you haven’t had lunch yet, I could always join you. I just got back and there’s nothing like a battlefield to make you work up an appetite.”

“Uh, sure,” Kaydel smiled. “Sorry, I’m a little surprised. I don’t really get handsome pilots asking me out.”

“My gain then.” He offered his arm, “Shall we?”

“You go on, I just want to talk to my aunt for a second.”

“I’ll get us a good seat,” Poe winked and exited the Medical Center.

Kaydel couldn’t stop grinning after him. The second he was gone, she crouched down and patted BB-8 on the head.

“Thanks,” she said. “I don’t think I could have done that without you. And thank you for calling me pretty. It really made my day.”

BB-8 rolled back in shock.

Beep bop che beep?

“I’m in Communications,” Kaydel laughed. “Of course I speak droid.”

Aletha was honestly surprised Kaydel didn’t skip out of the room as BB-8 followed her.

“Wow,” she simply said, staring after her niece.

“Yeah,” Diego said in equal shock. “I don’t think I’ve ever had something go that smoothly with a girl. Damn Damerons making us all look bad.”

“Well, I’m sure you have your own charms,” Aletha laughed. “Now, I’m not on call tonight, but if you need anything-”

“No, you get your sleep. Don’t you worry about me.”

“Those statements are mutually exclusive, Diego.”

“I suppose they are.” He then remembered something, “Hey, were my clothes changed?”
“Shirt, yes. Pants, no. Why?”

Diego dug a small, very flattened red flower out of his pant pocket, “For you.”

Aletha shook her head in disbelief, “Diego—”

“I told you I’d bring you flowers from every planet I visited. I’m a man of my word.”

“Yes, you are,” she sat on the bed and took his hand. “Are you going to be okay?”

“Physically, yes, but… I hate when I’m grounded. Piloting is the only thing I’m good at.”

“I’m sure that isn’t true. I think you could do anything that you wanted.” Aletha stroked his arm, gathering her courage, “Diego, when we were in the cockpit, I lied to you.”

“Yes, I know. It was a sedative, not a painkiller.”

“I didn’t mean that.”

Diego frowned.

Aletha took a deep breath, “I lied about dying with no regrets. I do have one.”

“And what’s that?” he leaned forward.

He brushed a hand along her cheek, and Aletha shuddered. His lips were so close to hers.

“Doctor Kymeri!” someone called. “We need you over here!”

“Of course,” Aletha answered. She smiled at Diego, stroking his arm one last time, “I suppose you’ll have to find out.”

And then she left him. He reached for her as she did, but she was too far out of his grasp. Diego sighed, falling back against the bed with a thud.

Yep. It was official. He was definitely in love with Aletha Kymeri.

Luke sat on a sand dune, staring out at the setting sun. He had been fighting it all day, but he couldn’t fight any longer. He had to know who was gone.

And there was only one person who could tell him.

Luke took a deep breath, focused all of his energy on the action, and reached out in the Force. He reached far, so far, further than he supposed he had ever reached before. The action was exhausting, but he knew where to reach.

D’Qar.

There were many familiar Signatures: Diego Nalto, Poe Dameron, Meredyth Kalonia, many of his Rogue Squadron, and even to his surprise, he could have sworn he felt Aletha’s presence among the Resistance.

That brought a smile to his face. She had indeed made it there.
But Aletha was not the one he was looking for; no it was another woman who he searched for. Someone much closer to him.

“She was not the one he was looking for; no it was another woman who he searched for. Someone much closer to him.

General Leia Organa was standing before the assembly giving her eulogy for Wedge Antilles.

“I remember the first time I met Wedge,” she said with a smile. “It was shortly before the Battle of Yavin. My brother had just wiped his high score right off the board, and Wedge wanted to know who this random kid I had picked up off a backwater planet was. Surely he must be an Imperial spy with years of training. And I just looked at him and said, Wedge—”

“Leia,” Luke called out to her. “Leia, do you hear me?”

Leia’s face froze.

“Luke,” she whispered, forgetting where she was as she heard her brother’s voice for the first time in… how many years had it been? Ten?

With one simple name, Leia sent the Resistance members a chatter. Poe Dameron and Meredyth Kalonia shared a wide-eyed look. Diego Nalto went perfectly stiff, and Threepio cried, “Oh Goodness!”

Leia just held up a hand to silence everyone, and closed her eyes to concentrate.

Luke let out a breath of relief at his sister’s voice, “Oh, Leia. I have so missed you.”

“I miss you too. I miss you so much,” Leia admitted. “Please, Luke. Come home. Come back to me. We can figure this out together. With Han too.”

He wished he could tell her everything, here and now. About Rey. About Jakku. Even about the Millennium Falcon being right there with him.

But he couldn’t. He couldn’t put Rey in that position.

“Please, Luke,” Leia fought back tears. She really wished she didn’t have an audience to this, “I forgive you. We all forgive you. Han might hit you upside the head for running away, but we’ll take you back with open arms.”

Leia heard him sigh, “I can’t. Not right now, but… someday, I promise.”

“If this is because of what Ben did to Fel—”
“It’s not about Felicity. Not anymore.”

Leia frowned.

Luke took a deep breath, fighting back the urge to tell her about Rey.

“That’s not why I’m calling to you, Leia,” Luke continued. “I… I think we both know why I’m calling to you now. I know what happened. I felt the disturbance in the Force.”

Leia sighed, “I’m so sorry, Luke.”

“Who is it?”

“It’s Wedge.”

It was a blow to the gut.

“He died a hero.”

“How?”

“Saving the life of a friend. It’s okay Luke… he wanted this.”

It took a while for Luke to calm down, but Leia waited for him.

The assembly on D’Qar waited on edge as they heard only a single side of the conversation. No one dared to ask Leia questions or to pass a message on to Luke. In fact, no one even dared to speak. Snap Wexley made the mistake of coughing, and he was met with so many glares he seriously considered leaving the Resistance altogether out of humiliation.

After several minutes of silence, Leia opened her eyes and looked around at the assembly.

“I know my eulogy has not been finished yet, but there is another who desires to speak,” Leia announced. “My brother, Luke Skywalker, wishes to say a few words.”

Not a sound was made.

Leia took a deep breath and closed her eyes again.

Luke took a deep breath and gathered himself.
What could he possibly say about Wedge Antilles? Someone so brave and dear to him? Someone who had been there for him through thick and thin. From the first battle to the last.

Well, Luke supposed. That was a start.

“What can I possibly say about Wedge Antilles?” Leia repeated, her eyes squeezed shut. “Someone so brave and dear to me and so many others? Someone who had been there for me through thick and thin. From the first battle to the last.”

“Wedge Antilles was a great man.”

“Wedge Antilles was a great man.”

“One of the best friends I’ve ever had.”

“One of the best friends I’ve ever had.”

“A friend and confidante.”

“A friend and confidante.”

“He stood by my side on my wedding day, and I stood at his on his own.”

“He stood by my side on my wedding day, and I stood at his on his own.”

“He cherished my daughter, supported my friends, and one time put my wife into the hospital from a drunken game of truth or dare that we probably shouldn’t have been playing at age thirty.”

“He cherished my daughter, supported my friends, and one time put my wife into the hospital from a drunken game of truth or dare that we probably shouldn’t have been playing at age thirty.”

The crowd laughed at that.

On and on the speech went, Leia repeating Luke’s words. It was moving speech for how on the spot it was, but the words were clearly from the heart, and Leia did her utmost to convey the proper emotion.

Finally after sometime, Luke came to the end of his speech.

“Rest in Peace, Wedge Antilles,” Leia concluded the eulogy. “Now you are one with the Force, and so you are now a part of it, and a part of me. So truly, I say, may the Force be you all, and may it be with me.”

“I’m finished now, Leia,” Luke told her.

“Thank you, Luke for your speech.”

“Goodbye, Leia. We’ll see each other again.”

“Wait, Luke, please stay and just talk to-” Leia stopped as she sensed it in the Force. She struggled to fight back tears as she quietly declared, “He’s… He’s gone now.”

Leia couldn’t bring herself to finish her own eulogy so passed the floor along to Diego Nalto next.
Doctor Aletha Kymeri helped Diego up to the stage, and sensing the General’s need for comfort, took her hand and kindly led her down the platform and off to the side for a little privacy.

“I understand,” Aletha replied gently. She stroked Leia’s arm, “If you need anything-”

“I need my family back,” Leia couldn’t stop her words. “All of them. Han. Luke. Ben. Fliss. Re… What’s the point in even uttering her name? I’m not getting them any more than Han will ever get back the Falcon.”

Aletha smiled, unclipped the medal from her lapel and pressed it into Leia’s hands.

“You will someday get them back. All of them. I don’t know how, and I don’t know when… but you’ll get them back General. I promise.”

Leia looked down at the medal in her hands.

“And when you do,” Aletha said, “give yourself the Han Solo Medal of Ingenuity. Because if there’s anyone who can do something so insanely stupid that there’s no way in hell they should succeed, yet somehow they make it work… it’s you.”

A new hope sparked in her chest that had long been quelled.

Leia smiled, “You’re right… I can.”

There was no way she could get back Rey or Felicity from death, and she hadn’t actually lost Han, Chewie, or Threepio in the first place. But there were three members of her family that were MIA that she still had hope for.

Luke had promised her to come home, and Artoo would naturally wake when he returned, but Ben… He was a challenge, but not one Leia Organa herself couldn’t overcome.

Somehow, someway, she would get her son back.

Even if it meant trading her life for his.

Luke cried long after he broke his connection to Leia. He couldn’t believe that Wedge Antilles was truly gone. Luke had never even said a proper goodbye, and he now never would.

He felt the hand on his shoulder, but he didn’t look up. Luke was glad Rey was silent because he had no idea how to explain it to her. It must have been a good ten minutes of Luke crying with a hand on his shoulder before he could gather himself to face Rey.

But when he looked up, it wasn’t Rey’s hand on his shoulder.

“Don’t let grief consume you, Master Skywalker,” Alyla Kene smiled down at him. “Wedge Antilles is now one with the Force.”

His mind was still open, reaching for Force Signatures, so before he could control himself, he found it: the horrifying thing he had no way to explain.
Alyla Kene’s magenta Signature, now nothing more than a speck, had returned to the world of the living… and it was tightly bound in Ben Solo’s dark forest green.

Luke didn’t have time to ask questions, because the second he touched it with his own presence, Alyla and her signature completely disappeared.

He was left reeling, confused at what it meant, but one thing was clear to him.

Alyla Kene wasn’t alive anymore.

…but she certainly wasn’t dead.

---

Here’s another rule: Don’t talk about salvage.

* - Rey’s Survival Guide

---

It was plain to Teng that the group knew he could hear every word they were saying. In fact, it seemed like Toras Kern and his lackeys had picked this wash table specifically because Teng was seated there.

Still, Teng just tried to ignore them as Luke had urged, tuning out the group as they crudely joked among themselves.

“I mean, I know Erso is only fifteen but in another year or two, I’m telling you that girl will be begging for a piece of me,” Toras said loudly.

Teng glanced up and glared at him. Toras’ eyes met his, and Toras grinned at Teng. He had the boy’s attention as he clearly so wanted.

Eyes down. Focus on work. Don’t listen to them.

Over and over, in his mind, Teng repeated the mantra Luke had give him.

“She really is a sweet little thing,” Toras continued. “And very flexible I hear.”

Eyes down. Focus on work. Don’t listen to them.

“I bet a girl like that has really good stamina too.”

Eyes down. Focus on work. Don’t listen to them.

“Of course, a girl who looks like that can’t possibly be pure. I bet she’s an expert by now.”

Eyes down. Focus on work. Don’t listen to them. Don’t listen to them!

“Malar here’s probably the one who got first honours.”

Teng gritted his teeth.

“Come on, Kid. Is she as sweet as she looks?”
Eyes down. Focus on work. Don’t listen to them. Don’t picture punching him in the face.

Toras gave a throaty laugh, “Oh I bet she is. I bet she would do anything you wanted.”

Eyes down. Focus on work. Don’t listen to them. Okay picturing punching him in the throat is fine. Just don’t say anything.

“I bet she wants it so bad. Has to be wanting if she’s running around in clothes as tight as hers.”

“Shut the hell up,” Teng snarled.

Toras laughed, “Oh, look, he’s got something to say. You know he said he didn’t like to share her, but I bet she likes being shared. I heard she spent a lot of nights with you and that Vrogem.”

Teng threw everything into his satchel and shot up from the table.

“Come on, boy, where are you going? To take a turn with little Miss Erso if Tinadar lets you have a chance?”

“Vrogem aren’t biologically compatible with humans, you idiot,” Teng called as he stormed away.

“No, I guess Tinadar doesn’t take his turn, but you know who probably does? Luke.”

Teng stopped dead in his tracks.

“Ooh, struck a nerve,” Toras grinned at his friends. “The Ersos are rather close, aren’t they? Almost sinfully one would say.”

“Shut up,” Teng gripped the strap of his satchel tightly, the only thing anchoring him to the spot.

Deep breaths. He just had to ignore them.

Eyes down. Focus on work. Don’t listen to them.

“Oh, I bet she loves it,” Toras taunted. “I bet she and Luke just love their precious Daddy daughter-”

Teng tackled Toras to the ground. In a mad frenzy he punched the man over and over. Blood was staining his knuckles as he hit Toras dozens of times. Toras gave pathetic cries for help, but Teng’s free hand closed over his throat. Teng started to squeeze, and slowly Toras’ face faded blue as he gasped for air.

No one had seen this side of Teng before. No one on Jakku at least, but the pirates had taught him well. Loathe he was to admit it, Teng had taken a life before and he was hellbent on ending the one of Toras Kern.

Strong arms wrapped around Teng’s body and wrenched him away.

“No!” Teng kicked and clawed at his assailant, forcing the man to throw Teng back away from him.

“Teng! Stop!” Luke demanded as Teng realized who had pulled him off.

“No! He has to pay!” Teng exclaimed. He rushed forward to throw himself at Toras again, but Quom blocked his path.

“Oh no, you do!” Quom stood guard between Teng and Toras.

“But he said—”

Even though he had been in the losing position, Toras still had the gall to taunt Teng.

“Oh come on!” Toras egged as his friends helped him to his feet. “Face me like a real man!”

Teng tried to rush forward, but Luke grabbed his arm and hauled him back.

“Be the bigger person, Teng,” he said. “I know you can do it.”

Teng looked Luke right in the eye, “But he was saying that you were… You and Rey were…”

He didn’t need to say anymore. Quom winced as Luke’s face turned a unique shade of pale green.

“I… I don’t care,” Luke struggled to say. “We know the truth. I would never… do that to my daughter. You know that. Don’t let them get to you, especially with a load of blatant lies.”

“Don’t listen to him!” Toras yelled at Teng. “Show me you’re a real man and face me like one.”

Teng didn’t break eye contact with Luke.

Teng nodded and stepped forward, away from Toras.

Toras was not happy about that.

“Come back here!” Toras called. “Face me! Face me!”

None of the three even glanced back at him.

“Alright then,” Toras was giving up. “I guess you’ll all just go back to your tent to take turns with the girl! Wouldn’t blame you, she’s delectable little thing.”

Teng faltered, but Luke had a hand on his back and just urged him forward.

“Yeah, well, between you and me… I probably would have done the same. Thanks for letting me be the sensible one.”

Teng laughed.

“That was a good punch,” Luke complimented. “Where did you learn that?”

“The pirates. They always thought – AHH!”

Pain exploded in Teng’s leg as a blaster bolt hit his retreating form.

Luke whipped around in an instant, his right hand pulling out his blaster, and his left instinctively reaching behind himself to the lightsaber tucked in his belt.

But it wasn’t necessary. A loud growl ripped through the market, and a blur of black tackled Toras.
The scavenger gave a bloodcurdling scream, and the blur of activity settled into a horrifying image.

Quom Tinadar pinning Toras Kern to the ground. He was on all fours like a feral animal, his eyes pitch black like he had no irises, nor any soul. And his sharp fangs were buried into the flesh of Toras’ neck.

Luke exclaimed, racing forward, “Quom! No!”

He had never seen Quom like this, so feral. This was his friend who had his fangs buried in the neck of Toras Kern. Testing his suspicions, Luke reached into the Force and found that Quom’s usual rusty grey Signature was completely black.

This wasn’t Quom Tinadar, his friend. This was a Vrogem possessed by the Dark Side.

But it didn’t make sense. Luke wasn’t channeling the Dark Side, and there was no one else around who could channel such levels. Why was this happening?

“Quom!” Luke grabbed his shoulder.

The Vrogem ripped around, snapping his bloodstained teeth at Luke’s hand. If his reflexes had been a second later, Luke would be the owner of two mechanical limbs.

As Toras held his bloody neck, putting pressure on the wound, Quom’s eyes met Luke. There was no light in the deep darkness of black, but something changed in them. Quom sniffed the air, locking on Luke’s scent. Luke carefully started to back up, but Quom stalked him on all fours, growling viciously. He could smell the Light Side that consumed Luke.

The second he landed the step, Quom lunged at Luke. Instinctually, Luke struck at Quom, using a blast of the Force to send him flying back. Thankfully Quom had been close enough that it just looked like Luke had elbowed Quom in the face.

Instantly, Quom shot to his four limbs. Luke looked back at Teng, and Quom let out a terrifying snarl. He was nothing more than a blur as he shot towards Teng.

“No!” Luke cried out, racing to protect Teng. But he skidded to a stop in shock when he saw what Quom did.

Quom turned his back to Teng and advanced on Luke, drawing him away from the boy. He wasn’t attacking Teng… he was protecting him.

And then Luke understood. The Dark Side wasn’t coming from Luke; it was coming from Quom. It had been triggered because someone had attacked his kit.

Luke knew what it would take to defuse the situation, so when Constable Zuvio’s men arrived, he ordered them to stay back.

“I can do this,” he said. “No one has to get hurt.”

The men looked at each other uncertainly, but withdrew.

Luke turned his attention to Teng, “Don’t move. You’ll be okay. He won’t hurt you, but for everyone’s safety, don’t move.”

Teng swallowed hard, fear in his eyes.

“And you,” Luke turned to Toras, “get out of here while you still can. And if I ever see you near Teng or Rey again, I’ll let Quom finish the job.”

Toras nodded and he and his friends scampered away as quickly as possible.

Now Luke’s attention could fully be on Quom.

“Hey, look at me,” he said gently to his friend. “I’m not going to hurt you, and I’m not going to hurt Teng.”

Quom snarled as Luke took a step forward.

“I’m your friend. You know me, Quom. You know I’m not going to hurt him.”

Quom’s growling remained.

He reached into the Force to touch Quom’s Signature. He harnessed the Light in himself and poured it into Quom’s Signature, guiding memories of happiness and love Quom shared with Luke, Aletha, Rey, and Teng into Quom’s mind.

Slowly, Quom started to relax and the whites of his and grey irises started to return.

“You know me,” Luke repeated. “You know me, Quom.”

Quom looked up at him and whimpered.

“No one is going to hurt, Teng. I promise.”

Quom looked back at Teng, and then to Luke.

Luke took another careful step forward. Quom gave another loud whimper and submissively dropped to the ground, burying his face in the sand. Luke took his time with each step, and soon he was right next to Quom, watching him. Quom was taking deep, shaky breaths into the sand.

He hesitated, and then put a hand on Quom’s back.

And Quom knew he was safe.

“So… that was odd,” Teng declared as they patched each other up in Quom and Teng’s tent. “What happened?”

“Why?”

“You’re my kit. No one messes with my kit.”

“You…” Teng was shocked. “But I thought you hated me.”

Quom shrugged, “What can I say? You grew on me. You hurt Rey, though, and I’m still tearing you to shreds.”

“After today, I believe you.”

“Why don’t we just agree to forget this whole thing?” Luke suggested.

“I can’t,” Teng said. “What did you even do there? That was amazing. Is it part of the powers you and Rey have?”

“I thought I told her not to tell you about that.”

“Sorry,” Teng sheepishly smiled. “But what was that? That was amazing. Almost like a… Like a…”

“Like a Jedi?” Quom smirked.

“Quom!” Luke scolded, horrified he would say it so bluntly.

Teng looked between them, “What’s a Jedi?”

“What’s a- Are you serious?” Quom exclaimed. “You don’t know what a Jedi is?”

Teng scowled. “What part of raised by a cult, lived with pirates, and then sold into slavery do you people not understand? My education isn’t the best! I didn’t know multiplication until three months ago!”

“Ok, I am mandating that we have to get this boy a proper education,” Quom ordered Luke. “I want him to be able to spell his name before the year is over.”

“I can spell my name!” Teng paused, “How many Leths does Malar have in it?”

“I can spell my name.”

Luke just shook his head.

At that moment, the tent flap was dramatically thrown open. When Rey stormed into Quom and Teng’s tent, it was clear from her face that she was furious.

“Hey, Rey,” Teng said carefully, smiling widely but fear shining in his eyes.

“Is Quom okay?” Rey demanded.

“I’m fine,” Quom answered.

“Good.” She glared at Teng, “I’m going to kill you.”

“We’ll give you two some privacy,” Luke said, packing up the first aid kit he had been using to fix up Teng.
Teng looked up helplessly at the men, “But-”

Quom just patted him on the shoulder and exited with Luke.

Accepting his fate, Teng took a deep breath and looked up at Rey. She looked like she was trying to see if she could choke him with her mind…and he could have sworn his throat felt a little tight.

“Rey. I, uh…” Teng had no idea what to say.

“What were you thinking?” she demanded. “You know what? No. Don’t answer that; it’s clear you weren’t thinking.”

“I’m sorry, Rey,” he looked down in shame. “It’s just he was saying such awful things about you. I couldn’t help myself.”

“Well, because of you, now no one in this town thinks I can protect myself. Instead they think I have to call on my attack dogs. Literally in the case of Quom! I get enough of that with Dad and Uncle Quom; I don’t need it from you!”

“If you heard the things he was saying-”

“You think I haven’t? You think I can safely walk through this market without someone commenting on my body, or propositioning me, or saying things to me that no fifteen-year-old should have to hear? By the Force, don’t you get it?”

Teng scowled, “Get what?”

“You’re a man!” Rey exclaimed. “Your biology grants you the privilege to not be questioned on your strength, or harassed for your looks!”

“You think men don’t have to go through that same thing?”

“Of course they do, but it’s not to the degree that women do! There’s a reason why when my mother was fighting to keep us alive she offered herself as payment to Quom.”

“Excuse me?”

“Yeah, don’t tell my dad,” Rey quickly added. “People aren’t going to stop ogling me, Teng. People aren’t going to stop harassing me.”

“So what am I supposed to do?” Teng shot. “Ignore it? Get used to it? Let it happen? It’s not like I’m telling you to sit still little woman while the men deal with it.”

“I know you’re not.”

“Then what do you want me to do?”

“I… I…” Rey stuttered. “I don’t know. I just…”

“Just what?”

“I just don’t want you to think I’m weak!”

“Weak?” Teng’s jaw dropped. “I believe I would think you’re weak? You? The most amazing and badass woman I have ever met?”
“Don’t butter me up with lies, Teng.”

“I’m not. Don’t you get it? Don’t you understand how amazing you are to me? Are you perfect? No, of course not, but in my eyes…”

Rey’s face relaxed. Her heart felt like it was beating a mile a minute in her chest, “You think I’m perfect?”

“In all the ways that truly count,” Teng confessed. “I know you have faults, but I don’t care. You’re my everything, Rey. The reason my life now has meaning. I can’t just sit there and listen to them say such crude things about you because of the way I feel. And I don’t want you to think that I don’t feel them, or that I wouldn’t stand by you united, or I wouldn’t do everything in my power to protect you… the way you’ve protected me.”

Rey bit her lip, her fury gone, and her heart in her hand, exposed and ready to take a risk.

“And…” Rey swallowed. “How do you feel about me?”

Teng sighed, “The truth be told, Rey… I like you.”

“Like me? Like ‘like me’ like me?”

“Yes. I’m very attracted to you. Your mind, your soul, your heart, your spirit… your body.”

Rey blushed.

“I would do anything you asked of me, Rey,” Teng confessed. “If you wanted me to go to the ends of the universe, I would. If you asked me to pluck a star from the sky, I’d burn my hands doing it. You’re my Starshine, Rey. I’m sorry if this ruins our friendship, but I had to tell you… I understand if you don’t feel the same way, but I needed to say it.”

Silence filled the room as Rey stared at Teng in shock, overwhelmed by the words she never thought he’d actually say to her.

It was a weight off Teng’s chest, but the silence from Rey terrified him. Clearly he had just made a total fool of himself, and probably ruined their friendship in the process.

Teng bowed his head, unable to look her in the eye, “I should go.”

He turned to leave Rey, no doubt in his mind that she didn’t reciprocate his feelings and now probably wanted to end their friendship. Who had he been kidding? How could he ever think that Rey Erso wanted him?

“Teng?”

Her voice stopped him in his tracks.

Rey took a deep breath and walked around to Teng’s front. They stared at each other, Teng’s brow creased as he tried to figure out what was going on. He struggled not to give in to the hope budding in his chest.

She looked into his eyes; such vibrant pools of green. It seemed so impossible for something to be that fresh, that lively. All she had known was greys, browns, and tans. On Jakku, nothing grew. It was a planet of dust, death, and solitude.

But something had grown; something that Rey couldn’t name. Or at least something she never dared Something more to life, something that had awoken when she found Teng on that roadside four years ago.

Something so much different that Quom, Aletha, Dirk, or anyone else had made her feel.

“Teng,” Rey whispered, looking up into those refreshing eyes. Those eyes that proved to her that there was a world out there somewhere of life and growth beyond this dust ball. Somehow he had brought a little piece of that world to her.

“Rey,” he whispered.

She placed a hand on his cheek. It felt coarse and prickly from the beginnings of his five o’clock shadow. His lips were chapped, but they parted ever so slightly. Teng bent his head down fractionally, a subtle attempt to be close to her. His breath was upon Rey’s skin – slow and hot against her newly crested flush – and his brilliant green eyes hungrily stared at her lips.

Gathering her courage, Rey lifted herself up on her toes and pressed her lips to his.

Their lips were rough and awkward, neither knowing quite what to do in this act. But a surge of adolescent hormones told their bodies that this was good, and a pounding in their hearts told their souls this was right.

Emboldened by the taste of Rey Erso’s lips, Teng wrapped his arms around her waist and pulled Rey tight against him. She made a small, surprised noise, but wrapped her arms around his neck. Rey melted against his touch.

They kissed for as long as their lungs let them hold out, and perhaps a moment or two longer than that. When they pulled apart for air, they were panting. They stared at each other, shocked at what had just happened.

Then Rey smiled, and so did Teng. They started laughing, their grins creasing across their faces flushed not from heat.

“Wow,” Teng said.

“Yeah,” Rey couldn’t wipe the smile off her face. “That was… I liked that.”

“I did too. It was so much better than I’ve ever imagined.”

Rey looked down liked she hadn’t just been making out with the boy in front of her, “You’ve thought about kissing me?”

“Uh… yeah,” Teng admitted. “Quite a lot actually.”

“Me too. Kissing you, that is.”

They just stood there grinning, not quite sure of what to do next, but now that it was all in the open, there was no pressure to know that answer.

“So…” Teng said.

“Yeah,” Rey laughed.

“What does this mean? You know, for us? Are we… together now?”

“I think so.”
“Oh… good.”

They stood there just grinning like goofy teenagers in love.

“Teng?” Rey said. “Could we try that kissing thing again?”

“Hell, yes.”

She shrieked happily as he suddenly pulled her into his arms. In a moment their lips were upon each other, and they were lost in their passionate embrace.

And as Rey would look back on that memory in the years to come, she would always remember that as one of the happiest moments of her life.

Chapter End Notes

Coming Up Next Chapter…

Survival of the Fittest
An encounter with Kylo Ren brings Aletha and Diego closer together. Rey learns from an unlikely source how to defend herself.

You know, I didn’t start this chapter with the plan to kill off Wedge. It just sort of… happened. Whatever, he didn’t actually have a role in the story after this, and his absence would have been notable. I just couldn’t think of a plot that would suit him, and then this idea popped up, so RIP Wedge Antilles. You will be missed…but not enough for me to do anything about it.

Just do be warned, this story will be containing several character deaths. Not Game of Thrones level of killing, but definitely Prequel Trilogy levels of significant characters dying. This will involve not only OCs dying, but canon characters of both major and minor character status. Literally the only people I will promise to make it out of at least TLJ territory is Luke and Rey because this is a story about their relationship. And there will be some significant characters dying off. I don’t kill characters without purpose, but I do kill characters.

Serious question time: I’ve really been thinking a lot about how I’m going to portray the physical relationship between Rey and Teng when it comes to sex. Yes, naughty things will happen between them, and if I had my way, I would just go all out like I did with Luke and Felicity. There’s just one problem.

Rey is fifteen.

I am not writing porn involving anyone under the age of eighteen. However, a lot of the significant physical stuff happens between them under that age. Now, I’ve decided to push back the really major stuff to ages 16 and 17, but it’s still awkward to think about. So I wanted to get feedback from you guys as to how far do you want things to be displayed with them. Do you want a full scene with clear labels, maybe a scene that’s a might vague and a little clinical at times (what I’m leaning towards), fade to black, just implication, or something else? Please let me know.
Midnight Musings

Chapter Summary

Rey seeks girl talk, Diego makes a life-altering taunt, and Poe gets laid.

Chapter Notes

Note: I’ve edited out the mention of Rey wanting to do something for Luke’s fifty birthday, because it contradicts something that happens during TFA that I wrote which I really like and don’t want to cut.

I’ve listened to all the feedback about Rey and Teng’s physical relationship, and it was mostly saying that people would rather have things be a little more vague. However there was a vocal group saying they didn’t care if the characters were 16 (the age of consent in most places) and that was actually the reason why I made Jakku’s age of majority be 15 because of that very thing. I think I’ve decided to be more vague on fanfictiondotnet, and then on ao3 have a more adult version, however definitely not to the level I’ve done with older couples. I really do want to go through the awkward motions of the first time, so I think this way will be best for those who don’t want to read that.

But be warned, I do have more adult plans for other characters including two couples in this chapter, one of which is some Kaydel/Poe stuff. Speaking of, really, no one had any love for matchmaker BB-8? You guys suck! (Just kidding.)

Funny little thing I thought I’d share with you all considering how many jokes I make about Luke’s hand. This year for vacation I’ve decided to go to Seattle (so March 17-27 is either going to have several updates or none at all) and I’m going to go the Museum of Pop Culture where they have a lot of movie and tv memorabilia on display, including some things from Star Wars. Lo and behold, what have I discovered to be housed in the MoPop? Luke Skywalker’s severed hand.

Also, I split this chapter because what was supposed to be Act 1 was taking up the entire chapter. Hence why this one is called Midnight Musings instead of Survival of the Fittest.

See the end of the chapter for more notes.
“Teng and I are dating!”

Aletha was not too ashamed to admit she squealed upon hearing that news.

“Oh my goodness, Sunshine! I am so proud!” Aletha said excitedly into the comm.

It was evening time, not long after dinner. Aletha was sitting on her bed in her room, casually parsing some medical texts as she commed with Rey. A vase of blue Devoorian roses sat on her desk, given to her by Diego after his last mission. Kaydel was supposed to stop by later after her first official date with Poe, so the girl chat was well-timed.

“How long has it been?” Aletha asked.

“Since last night,” Rey’s glee was as bright as if she were standing in front of Aletha with a grin.

“Well, tell me everything! Who made the first move? What prompted it? How did it happen? Did Quom finally try to kill Teng for it?”

“Actually the weirdest thing happened with Quom that led to all of this. So that gross Toras Kern guy and his friends decided to annoy Teng while at the washing table. They were saying some… rather awful things about me and-”

At that moment, the door to Aletha’s room slid open.

“Aunt Ally, I just had the most wonderful date of my life!” Kaydel exclaimed, barging into the room. “Oh, I just have to tell you all about it.”

Kaydel didn’t register Aletha’s frozen horror as she hopped onto the bed to have some carefree girl talk with her aunt like they had shared so many times before.

It was so commonplace between the two that that was the reason Kaydel had the code to Aletha’s room and didn’t feel the need to knock. Honestly, if Aletha wasn’t spending her nights off-duty chatting with Rey, she spent them chatting with Kaydel, sometimes while doing her niece’s hair.

Understanding the need for discretion of Rey’s very existence, Aletha had always tried to keep her mentions of Rey very vague, limited, and never mentioning a name. There was a reason Luke Erso had decided keeping Rey on Jakku was the safest course of action, and so Aletha would uphold her vow of not telling anyone about them. It was for this reason Aletha had carefully coordinated that Kaydel’s nights with her so they never happened the same time as her chats with Rey.

Until tonight, when the inevitable collision happened.

Of course, Aletha wasn’t the only one being vague and discrete about the situation. However, the other side of the story wasn’t intentional. Aletha had yet to hear the name of Luke and Fliss Skywalker’s daughter uttered. She had mentioned it to Doctor Kalonia once, who explained that it was a sort of unspoken rule to keep the name unspoken. There was some sort of significant meaning to the name that became very painful after her death.

No one in good conscience could ever talk about how Luke Skywalker and Felicity Rhiaon’s literal Rey of light and hope had been snuffed out.

Don’t get me wrong, the name was spoken, but it was in hushed voices by loved ones of the Skywalker family, and Aletha had not gained the prestige of hearing Rey’s name spoken.

Yet.
But Kaydel had just accidentally gotten the prestige of hearing Rey’s voice spoken.

“Aunt Ally?” Kaydel frowned, finally taking in the expression on Aletha’s face.

“And it was so romantic, Aletha,” Rey concluded her story, oblivious to what was happening in the background of the other end of the comm. “I can’t believe it happened to me. I mean sure, I wouldn’t have picked that whole Quom tries tearing out a guy’s throat part, but.”

Kaydel looked at the comm, “Aunt Ally, who’s that?”

Aletha’s eyes widened in fear, “Uh…”

“Aletha?” Rey’s voice sounded on the comm as she clued into the situation. “Is someone there with you?”

Aletha just stared in horror at her niece and the comm; her worlds colliding uncontrollably. Aletha’s first instinct was to shut off the comm and pretend to Kaydel nothing had happened, then later explaining things to Rey. But Aletha didn’t want to panic Rey with the sudden cut line, and Aletha was fairly certain Kaydel was too smart to pull that on.

What in the galaxy was she supposed to do?

And then she realized the answer with horror: the only way to protect Rey in this situation… was to tell Kaydel the truth.

Uh, yeah, Sunshine. I’m still here,” Aletha answered into the comm. “Sorry, my niece, Kaydel just entered the room. Remember? I told you about her?”

“Oh… yeah,” Rey’s voice sounded a little shy. “Hi Kaydel.”

“Hello,” Kaydel looked at the comm in concern. The comm was a single press version, so Aletha didn’t have to hold a button down for Kaydel to answer, which was why Rey could hear Kaydel’s interruption in the first place. “Who is this?”

“My name’s Kira,” Rey lied about her name just as her father had taught her to when confronted with a stranger she wasn’t certain of. She knew Aletha would recognize the code name and play along with her. “I’m a friend of Aletha’s.”

“From Jakku,” Aletha said. “She’s the daughter of that guy I used to date.”

Kaydel raised a brow, “The one-armed pilot? Oh wait… Sorry with you I have to be specific. The one-armed pilot from Jakku?”

“That’s right,” Aletha nodded. “Uh, Kira sometimes contacts me with questions and for a little girl talk. She doesn’t have any other women to do that with on Jakku, so I lend an ear.”

“You still talk with your ex?”

“Just his daughter.”

“Dad doesn’t know she talks to me… At least I think he doesn’t. I don’t know. Dad’s weird sometimes. He pulls out so many insane abilities that I swear he could probably lift a boulder with his mind if he wanted to.”
"I would believe it," Aletha agreed.

Kaydel stared at her aunt and the comm, unsure of what to make of the situation.

"You know, I can leave if you want," Kaydel awkwardly offered. "Come back later when you two are… done?"

"Well, I mean…" Aletha bit her lip, "if you girls want, no one has to leave."

"What do you mean?"

"Yeah, what are you saying?"

"Well, Kira, you were saying a couple months ago that you’d maybe like to meet Kay." She explained to Kaydel, "I’ve mentioned you quite a lot to her."

"And yet, I haven’t heard a word about Kira yet," Kaydel said politely, a little uncomfortable with the whole situation.

"Oh, don’t worry, my whole past is some huge secret," Rey said casually. "Even I’m not allowed to know it."

"Really?"

"Yeah, top secret First Order conspiracy. Only on a need-to-know basis, and apparently I don’t need to know."

"And yet Quom does," Aletha shook her head.

"Wait, what? Quom knows?"

"Yep."

"Okay, now I’m mad at Dad. Quom, really?"

Kaydel frowned, "Who’s Quom?"

"Friend of ours from Jakku," Aletha answered. "I got some good stories about him. Remind me to tell you later."

"Sure…" Kaydel got the same awkward and antsy look of her face that Aletha had had when Kaydel first burst into the room.

But Aletha’s frown hardened, "Kay, we’re serious about this whole top-secret thing. Promise me you won’t tell anyone about Kira."

"Sure, I guess. Does that mean I’m not allowed to ask any questions then?"

"I’m open to questions. It’s kind of weird that someone would even have questions for me. Life on Jakku is relatively boring… if you don’t count the time I dropped an X-Wing on my boyfriend."

"Don’t ask about that one," Aletha advised.

"Okay," Kaydel was glad to change the subject. "So, Kira, how long have you lived on Jakku?"

"For most of my life. Got here when I was five I think. Again, don’t have all the details. Aletha has “Really?” Kaydel looked at Aletha.

“Stop digging,” Aletha said firmly. “I’m only telling you so much.”

“Fair enough,” Kaydel let herself smile. “Alright then, Kira would you mind if I asked, I don’t know… how old you are?”

“I’ll be sixteen in a few months.”

“Sixteen, huh,” Kaydel nodded working out the situation in her mind. “And your best source of girl talk is with a woman who is fif-”

“Say my age and you’re banned from late night talks with me forever, Kay,” Aletha threatened, pointing towards the door.

Kaydel grinned, “Sorry, Aunt Ally. I’m just curious why Kira turns to you? There can’t really be no one her age around, can there? Or even remotely close.”

“The closest girl is Devi who is a year older, and she just challenged me to duel her in the Fighting Ring.”

“She what?” Aletha exclaimed.

“What’s the Fighting Ring?” Kaydel asked.

“People fight each other in front of an audience to win a prize. It’s a good way to make money.”

“Re- Kira!” Aletha caught herself before speaking Rey’s name. “You are absolutely not going to fight Devi in the Ring!”

“I didn’t tell her yes! …Yet. I don’t know. It’s good money. Maybe I should give it a shot. Might fix this harassment issue I’ve been having.”

“Young lady, you are not doing it, and that’s final!”

Rey laughed, “Aletha, how are you going to stop from the Resistance?”

“Easy. I’ll call your father, and he’ll do it for me,” Aletha countered.

Kaydel looked to the comm, “Would that work?”

“She makes one call to the comm station, and I’m undergoing another month of psychological torture.”

“It’s what she calls her father’s punishments,” Aletha explained. “Not actual psychological torture.”

“Could have fooled me. And come on, Aletha, you can’t pretend it isn’t a viable idea to put a stop to this harassment.”

“What harassment?” Kaydel asked.

“The men in Jakku are starting to realize Kira’s all grown up and got the body to prove it,” Aletha grimaced.
“Oh, I remember that age,” Kaydel laughed. “Some the idiot neighbor boy from next door decided to spy on my bedroom from a tree in his yard, and my brother, Keth broke the thirteen-year-old’s jaw.”

Aletha frowned, “Wouldn’t Keth have been in his early thirties when that happened?”

“What’s your point?”

“Remind me never to cross your family,” Rey shuddered.

Aletha grinned, “They’d have to go through me first, Sunshine. And we both know I shot a woman in the knee once for you.”

Kaydel raised an eyebrow, “What’s this story?”

“Tell you later,” Aletha promised knowing that Rey probably didn’t want her abuse brought up at the moment. “But that’s why Kira and I have been talking a lot lately. She’s had to put up with a lot recently and needs someone with experience to lend an ear… I mean not that I have a lot of experience with this. Not a lot of people have given me a second look in their life.”

“I don’t know,” Kaydel grinned, her eyes going to the roses on the table, “I think Commander Nalto’s been taking a lot of second looks. Third and fourth ones too. Didn’t Diego bring you those flowers?”

“Kaydel-”

“Is Diego the special admirer she’s trying to hide from me?” Rey asked. “Has anything happened with them? I’m morbidly fascinated in Aletha’s love life when it doesn’t involve my father.”

“Oh things have happened,” Kaydel grinned evilly.

“Nothing has happened!” Aletha exclaimed wondering how she had gotten these two to team up against her.

“You charged into an active battlefield to save his life!”

“Aletha did what now?”

And so Aletha lost control of the conversation, it turning to fend off two young women’s teasing and prying into her love life.

Talking with Kaydel and Aletha became almost a nightly routine for Rey. They discussed boys, family, puberty, education, stories of battles and adventures, and subjects Rey didn’t have the pleasure of participating with in real life. She looked hearing Kaydel and Aletha tell her all about hair, makeup, fashion, and other such feminine luxuries Rey hoped to enjoy someday. Aletha made sure Rey didn’t take on such subjects with the idea that one used such items to impress men, but rather to express their creativity and to make one feel good, but at the same time know that she still could look and feel good without them.

But that didn’t mean that men didn’t star in a lot of their conversations. Teng, Poe, and Diego were frequent subjects of conversation. Aletha kept insisting that nothing was going on with Diego, while Kaydel provided facts to the contrary. Rey and Kaydel would gush about their boys, and loved regaling the rest with how their suitors proposed said suits.
Rey got a huge laugh out of Kaydel’s story of Poe not being able to think of a way to officially declare his affections for Kaydel – even though they had already been out on about seven lunch dates over the past two months. It seemed even Dameron’s got flustered. He had been saying all of this to Jessika Pava – a pilot in his squad – as well as some rather embarrassing in hindsight things about how beautiful and charming he found Kaydel and how a girl had never made him feel so confident yet self-conscious at the same time. All this rather embarrassing lovesick display you’d find in a thirteen-year-old, much less a man pushing thirty, unaware that BB-8 was recording the entire thing.

BB-8 had apparently decided that this girl was to be his master’s mate, and so just rolled himself over to Communications and played the recording to Kaydel… The very embarrassed Kaydel who had been in a meeting with her boss and an amused General Leia Organa.

People in Communications were still yelling across the mess hall excerpts from Poe’s declaration of affection. Poe to his credit just leaned in to the whole mess and made the speech into a running joke the Resistance would never forget. It did take him nearly a week for him to work up the courage to face Kaydel afterwards, and word around the base was he put BB-8 into low power mode for a day to teach him a lesson.

It was Leia Organa who requested he not use low power mode as a method of punishment on his droid. Poe instantly reverted BB-8 to normal mode when he saw Leia glance forlornly toward the corner R2-D2 was tucked into.

“Who knows?” Kaydel laughed along with Aletha and Rey at the story a few weeks after ‘meeting’ Rey. “Maybe Commander Nalto will give you his own speech when he gets back. Or send his droid to do it… Then again he doesn’t actually own his own droid.”

“Your Poe will never live that speech down, will he?” Rey asked.

“No, and if you ever meet him, don’t you let him either.”

Aletha’s stomach shifted at the idea of Rey and Poe meeting.

Rey, however, didn’t see the harm in joking about it, “I’ll be sure to ask him if my eyes sparkle like shining pools of water lit by the fullest moon.”

A few years later, Rey would, and Poe would be horrified.

“So, where is this famous Commander Nalto?” Rey asked. “Do I get to meet him soon?”

“No, thank goodness,” she added the last part to herself. “Diego- I mean Commander Nalto – stop looking at me like that Kay – is away on a mission. I think he’s wanted to soak up as much time in the air as possible after that three-week suspension.”

“You should have heard him in the Communications Center for those three weeks,” Kaydel grimaced. “He kept saying that if he was ever grounded permanently, just save us all some time, take him out back and shoot him. We’d be happier all around.”

“I did hear him. General Organa specifically request I come talk some sense into him before she slapped it into him.”

“I’m pretty sure it was a bluff. General Organa doesn’t slap people without very good reason.”

“Wait, General Organa? Aletha, you met Princess Leia!”
“She would slap you if you called her Princess, though,” Kaydel added.

“Yes, I’m working with Leia Organa,” Aletha said. “Also my direct boss is the former doctor of the New Jedi Order. Worked with Luke Skywalker and Rogue One themselves.”

“Have you seen Han Solo?”

“No, but I’ll keep an eye open.”

“Fan of Solo’s?” Kaydel asked in amusement.

“He’s my hero,” Rey confessed. “Aletha, if you do meet him, could you get me his autograph?”

“I feel like he would either adore that or hate that, so we’ll see, but I’ll try,” Aletha promised. “I just still can’t believe the General called me down of all people to get Diego under control.”

“You can’t be that surprised,” Kaydel laughed. “Even if you refuse to admit you’re totally in love with him, it’s obvious he’s in love with you.”

“He is not.”

“He is so. In fact, I bet you anything he’s thinking about you right now.”

---

Aletha Kymeri was the absolute last thing on Diego Nalto’s mind in that moment. What was on his mind were the men lined up on either side of him, all forced to their knees and hands bound behind their back, faces bloody and beaten, with many sporting electrical burns and stab marks from the half-taser half-knife Electra was using on them.

And he was especially focused on how if Ben Solo didn’t move so he and his mask were more than an inch from his face, Diego was going to choke the little brat with his bare hands.

He was not explaining that one to Leia upon return to the base. Diego wondered if they made a “sorry I murdered your psychopathic son because he doesn’t understand the concept of personal space” greeting card.

“Diego Nalto,” Kylo Ren chuckled from behind his mask. He was crouched in front of Diego, his head cocked to the side slightly, “Yours was not a face I thought I would ever see again.”

Diego did not break eye contact, “Ben Solo, if you do not back out of my breathing area in the next three seconds, you won’t be seeing anything ever again.”

A jolt of electricity shot through his back and he let out a scream as his body succumbed to the pain. When he started to fall forward, a metallic glove pulled him upright.

“You will address Master Ren with respect, as well by his proper name,” the mechanical voice of Captain Electra seethed into his ear.

Diego screamed as another shock of electricity bit into his thigh. He looked down to see a black BB unit sitting at his side with a metal appendage sticking out.

“Go work, BB-9E,” Electra nodded to her droid.

_Bwa ba bwee._
Diego could only describe the black droid’s sounds as exactly what he thought BB-8’s evil twin would sound like.

Maybe this was BB-8’s evil twin.

“So what now?” Diego demanded. “You’re going to kill us? I am the second-in-command of the Resistance, after all.”

“No,” Kylo rose to his feet. “We will be releasing you. I want you to bring a message to General Organa. Tell her to give up this silly fight, lay down your arms, and join the First Order in our mission to bring peace to the Galaxy.”

“Somehow I don’t think she’ll go for it. AH!” Diego glared at the droid who had just shocked him at an even higher voltage, “You’re a sadistic little thing, aren’t you?”

Bwa bah bwah.

“Make her understand, Nalto,” Kylo demanded. “With her bloodline, with her lineage, with the power that runs through her veins, she could have a place with me to stand beside the Supreme Leader and serve him well.”

“Kid, you know as well as I do that your mother has always been a leader, not a follower. It’s sad to say her son does not have the same ambitions.”

“I have ambitions!” Kylo snarled.

“Composure, Master Ren,” Captain Electra scolded. “I can’t keep Phasma around all the time to keep you in line.”

“Silence!” Kylo snapped.

“So Phasma isn’t here?” Diego asked. “Good. I think things would be very difficult all around if she were here in front of me right now.”

Electra gave an electronic laugh, “Oh, I’m sure that if Phasma were in front of you right now you’d be over the moons to see her.”

“Captain, the only woman I wish to see right now is the woman I’m in love with. She’s in the Resistance. Amazing woman. As beautiful as a Goddess and a million times more intelligent than me. Soft spoken and kind, but there’s a fire that smoulders beneath the surface. Hell of a shot too. Meeting Doctor Aletha Kymeri was one of the best things to ever happened to- SON OF A BITCH!”

Diego screamed out as Electra coursed the full voltage of electricity through his body that her equipment could handle. It took Kylo Ren far too long to call Electra off, but when he did the pain was so much for Diego, he instantly fell face first onto the cold tile of the large grey room the First Order was holding their prisoners.

“Look at him cry,” Electra chuckled as Diego let out a very small whimper of pain. “And to think this is who the Resistance has in charge. Are you sure I can’t kill him? I would take a lot of pleasure in ending his life.”

Kylo stared at Diego. Feeling Ren’s eyes, Diego lifted himself and met his gaze. For a long time they stared at each other in a battle of wills seeing who would break first and look away submissively. They fought to see who was the stronger of the two and would maintain the gaze.
It would be Kylo who looked away.

The Resistance soldiers let out a breath of relief.

Kylo added, “After you execute half of them.”

“No!” Diego cried out desperately.

There was nothing to be done. In a second, a flurry of blasts filled the room. Half the Resistance soldiers hit the tiles with a sickening thwack and never moved again.

“We’re done here,” Kylo declared.

Electra stood and signalled the Stormtroopers to withdraw, her little BB-9E following obediently after her.

Lying on the floor next to his dead friends, Diego’s blood boiled, the anger building inside of him. He watched Kylo Ren stalking away, fury filling his heart. He wanted to hurt Kylo; not just momentarily, but dig down deep into the most tender and exposed of wounds and hurt him to his core.

And Diego knew just how to do it.

“You will never be like Darth Vader.”

Diego’s words stopped Kylo Ren dead in his tracks.

“Excuse me?” Ren whispered, his back to Diego but not moving an inch from the doorway.

“I said,” Diego slowly got to his feet, “you will never be like Darth Vader! I would know, I’ve met Darth Vader. I’ve fought Darth Vader! I’ve seen him kill and I’ve seen him rule, and I can safely say that you walking around in the cheap knockoff Vader mask, playing dress up and pretend in your grandfather’s clothes… you will never be like Darth Vader.”

A terrifying silence filled the room. No one dared to make a sound or movement, all watching Kylo Ren with absolute fear. Still Diego Nalto stood there, challenging him, unafraid of what would come next.

“You are wrong, Diego Nalto,” Kylo finally said.

He whipped around with sudden gusto, a hand outstretched, and Diego was thrown back into the wall by the Force. The wind was knocked out of him when his back made contact, and pain riddled his body. Kylo pinned Diego to the wall and used the Force shift to Diego’s right arm so the lightsaber scar was facing outwards.

Kylo crossed the room in only a few steps, and ignited his lightsaber. He could see the fear in Diego Nalto’s eyes when he reached him, having trapped the man like an animal.

“I will finish what my grandfather started,” Kylo declared. He raised his crackling lightsaber above Diego, “Beginning with this.”

And he swung down.
Diego Nalto’s screams filled the room as he was wheeled into the Medical Center.

“I need the operating room prepped stat!” Kalonia ordered as she and Leia ran alongside the gurney. “You’ll be okay Commander Nalto. The painkillers should kick in any moment.”

Diego couldn’t manage any other sounds but pained moans as he clutched his mutilated arm.

Leia’s voice was calm and commanding, but there was a twinge of fear in her eyes, “Nalto, please, what happened?”

“Ben,” was the only word he could manage.

Leia winced, yet there was no surprise to the statement.

“Oh, lightsaber wounds, I know how to deal with those,” Kalonia said. She warily glanced down at Diego’s arm, “Though I haven’t seen such a mess like this one. Usually people with lightsabers just lop the thing off. This is something new.”

“Will the arm have to be removed?” Leia asked.

Diego wanted to throw up. Leia’s question was something out of a nightmare; this whole situation was. A flurry of blood and death and confusion and fear. And pain. Above all pain.

He looked around the room, scanning for the someone who would calm him. The someone he so desperately wanted to see. The one he knew he could true and would make him feel safe as the doctors discussed life altering medical decisions without his input.

Where was Aletha?

“Diego!”

His head snapped instinctively towards the sound of her horrified scream. Diego couldn’t help but smile when she raced to his side, literally pushing Evan Tharel out of the way to get to him.

“Oh my god, Diego!” Aletha exclaimed as she reached him. “What happened?”

She looked so afraid as Kalonia explained the situation, punctuating it with medical babble Diego didn’t understand. But her presence at his side made Diego breathe easy again. He was safe. If Aletha was here, he was safe.

“Is there anyway we can avoid amputation?” Aletha asked, oblivious to the look Leia Organa was giving her.

“Believe it or not, I think it’s a possibility,” Kalonia said. “We’re getting him into surgery ASAP. I think it’s best we put him under for the procedure. General Organa, do you have someone to step into command?”

“I’m sure we can manage to scrounge up someone,” Leia answered. “I would like you to perform the procedure. You are our expert on lightsaber injuries.”

“Of course. Shall we delay our proceedings? Or will you be taking someone with you in my place?”

“Due to the possible complications of this injury, I would prefer you to stay on base with Diego to monitor his recovery. I’ll have to take another doctor with me, but I have an idea on who to bring.”
Aletha frowned as Leia looked at her. What were she and Kalonia talking about?

“Very well,” Doctor Kalonia said. “Diego, before I put you under, I have to ask you a few questions about your arm. Can you move it?”

“Only a little and I have immense pain when I do,” Diego groaned.

“Can you bend your fingers and your joints?”

He winced as he tried, “Joints a little. Fingers no.”

“How is the sensation of touch?” Aletha clasped his hand. Her face fell when she saw his flinch.

“The motion of that action hurt but… I can’t feel a thing. I have no sensation of touch whatsoever.”

Aletha struggled to fight back tears. She was a doctor. She saw this sort of thing all the time. Why did she want to cry?

“Can you fix it?” Diego asked, his voice desperate but soft.

“Yes,” Aletha promised without thinking. “I’ll fix you.”

“Please, fix me…” Carefully he reached out and caressed her cheek, pain riddled across his face as he did it. But he spoke her name like a prayer as his stroked the skin that should feel so soft beneath his fingers, “Aletha, there were things I still wanted to feel.”

She said nothing to him, their eyes locked together with emotions that need not be spoken.

“Doctor Kymeri,” Leia suddenly interrupted. “Please remove yourself from this surgery.”

Leia’s words went through Aletha like a jolt. It was only then she recognized the highly inappropriate nature of her actions with Diego, her patient.

“Forgive me, General Organa,” Aletha moved Diego’s hand from her face. “I am not compromised. I can perform this surgery.”

“Doctor Kymeri,” Leia said politely, “do not mistake an order for a request. Remove yourself from this surgery, and remove yourself from the Medical Centre. Immediately.”

Aletha looked down at Diego and his helpless eyes, pleading her to stay. But then she saw the look on Kalonia’s face – kind but encouraging her to obey – and the authoritarian look on General Organa’s face.

“Yes, General,” Aletha bowed her head.

She touched Diego’s arm one last time and then retreated. Kalonia instantly whisked Diego off to surgery, and Aletha fought back tears as she marched towards the exit.

“I’m sorry I had to pull rank,” said Leia.

Aletha didn’t even realize until that moment that the General had been following her, “Is there something I can help you with?”

“Something of great importance. Come. Let’s go to your quarters to discuss it privately.”
“Pack a bag,” Leia ordered when they entered Aletha’s room. “Quickly. Bring all you’ll need for the next two months, but keep it light.”

“General?” Aletha frowned, grabbing a bag she always kept semi-packed for sudden missions.

“I was going to bring Kalonia on this mission with me, but since I need her here with Diego, the burden falls to you. What I am about to tell you is top secret. Not even most of the Commanding officers are aware of this. Commander Nalto knows of this plan, as does my third-in-command, Vice Admiral Amilyn Holdo. Have you met her?”

“I don’t think so.”

“She has purple hair. You would know it if you met her. I believe Diego likes to refer to her as that condensing stepmother that thinks she needs to parent you by setting you up to fail so she can teach you a lesson.”

“No, but he has mentioned a, uh… purple-haired bitch.”

Leia sighed, “That would be her.”

Aletha raised an eyebrow.

“Amilyn had a very intense feud with my sister-in-law, and Diego tended to side with Fliss when it came to her various rivalries,” Leia explained. “I think Fliss’ feud with Amilyn was her worst after the one with Ben. Then again her one with Amilyn actually resulted in criminal charges at one point, but thankfully my brother talked Amilyn into dropping them. But that’s a long and rather personal story.”

“With all due respect, General Organa,” Aletha said, packing her things in a hurry, “it sounds like your sister-in-law had a lot of rivalries.”

“Oh she did. Fliss could either be your fiercest ally or your worst nightmare. Poor Luke faced both ends of that deal on a regular basis. I was genuinely surprised to see them go the distance.”

“Especially to the degree that Master Skywalker would… you know, do what he did after her death.”

Leia sighed, “I believe it was my niece’s death that mostly motivated that, but he went through a lot in a very short period of time.”

“General Organa, I’m truly sorry about what happened to your niece.”

“Thank you. I would give anything to talk to her just one more time.” Leia picked up a silver commlink off Aletha’s bedside table and handed it to Aletha, “Don’t forget this.”

“Thanks,” Aletha smiled, accepting the commlink she used to communicate with Rey. “So what’s going on?”

“Diego and I decided we needed an emergency base to escape to if the First Order is really giving us problems. We found an old, uncharted Rebel base that is badly in need of repair. I am taking a group of high commanding Rebel vets to this base to fix it up so that if we ever need it we can use it. Since Kalonia is busy, you as the only other Rebel Medic vet need to take her place. I need you to help work with the old medical equipment and get it running into something workable. It’ll be a lot of sort of scavenging work and repair. You think you can do that?"

“General, I spent two decades on Jakku. Scavenging is easy. Where are we going?”

“It’s called Crait,” Leia said. “And like I said, it’ll be for two months. Just so you know, that commlink I gave you… you can’t use it.”

Aletha frowned, “Why not?”

“There will be no communications to or from Crait while we’re there. This is top secret, not even most of the High Council knows where I’m going or why. I only gave you the comm because I don’t want that sort of thing just left behind in case we’re raided by the First Order and they have to evacuate.”

“But… Commander Nalto-”

“We’ll have to wait until we return to hear what happened to him.” Leia saw the look on Aletha’s face, “Will you be alright?”

“Uh, yeah,” Aletha struggled to fight back tears.

What if something happened? What if he needed her? …Or what if she needed him?

“I’m finished packing, General,” Aletha declared. She grabbed her bag, “Are we moving out right n-”

As she moved forward, she knocked the bag off her bed onto the floor. The zipper was undone, so her possessions spilled all over the floor. Aletha cursed and dropped to her knees. Erratically she packed the bag, throwing items in as she fought against her tears.

Diego’s injuries and helpless face burned in her mind. She couldn’t leave him. Not now, not like this, not for two whole months where she didn’t know if he’d be okay.

Aletha didn’t realize she had broken down crying until she felt Leia’s arms wrap around her. The General was knelt on the floor next to her, holding her while she wept.

“I’m sorry,” Aletha sobbed. “I’m so sorry.”

“Shh, it’s alright.” Leia repeated words she carried in her heart, “Crying is natural. Especially for someone who has been through as much as you.”

“But Diego… We’re not even-”

“He’ll be okay,” Leia insisted. “It’s just his arm.”

“What if they have to cut it off?”

“Well, from what I’ve heard from Kaydel, I don’t think that’ll be a problem with you,” Leia smiled.

Aletha laughed at that.

After the threat from Alecta Anthea, Leia had kept a close eye on Kaydel and felt a strong connection to the girl. There were even some people who had mistaken Kaydel for Leia’s daughter a few times. It didn’t help that Kaydel did bear a striking resemblance to Leia and had recently adopted a version of Leia’s infamous Death Star hairstyle.
“Diego will be okay,” Leia assured her. “He’s always been a fighter, and now… Now he truly has something to fight for.”

Aletha smiled, “Really?”

“He’ll be back bringing you flowers before the week is over.”

“Promise?”

“Promise. Might want to get someone to tend to them while you’re gone, or you’ll come back to a maze of dead bouquets in this room. Diego Nalto does not have a green thumb whatsoever.”

Aletha laughed, “No, he doesn’t. You know, I’m surprised he didn’t bring me any from this trip.”

Leia grinned.

“What?”

“Poe Dameron found a bouquet in Nalto’s cargo hold. I think he and Kaydel are trying to make them look as uncrushed as possible before bringing them to you.”

“Is that the excuse the kids are using these days?” Aletha grinned. “I remember the code Antar and I used for running off to make out was doing the supply closet inventory.”

Leia laughed, “Han and I used to call it checking the hyperdrive.”

Aletha chuckled, mentally cataloguing it to later tell Rey.

Leia smiled and patted Aletha on the shoulder, “Come on. Our transport should be ready soon.”

“Alright,” Aletha nodded, zipping up her bag and getting to her feet. “I just wish that I didn’t have to wonder about Diego’s condition.”

Leia thought about it for a minute, “I suppose one transmission from Kalonia to Crait wouldn’t hurt.”

“Thank you so much.”

“Anytime,” Leia’s mind went to the phrase her brother held so precious.

Aletha frowned, but shook it off. What possible connection could Leia Organa have to Luke Erso?

As the women exited the room, they casually chatted about Kaydel. Neither of the pair noticed that a small silver comm was left lying on the floor.

“Aunt Ally?” Kaydel frowned as she looked around her aunt’s room in confusion. “Aunt Ally are you in the fresher?”

Kaydel set Diego’s bouquet in the vase on the table – it was the same vase that he had put her first flowers in. Kaydel then stuck her head in the small en suite fresher. As a doctor, Aletha got the privilege of her own tiny toilet, sink, and shower, though she had to punch in a code to activate the water of the shower, and it would only run for ten minutes every other night.

Unable to find Aletha, Kaydel frowned. Where could Aletha have gone?
Kaydel headed towards the door to check the Medical Centre. The Medical Centre was not her first stop as Kaydel had heard from Poe, who had heard from Jessika, who had heard from Snap, who had heard from Bastian, who heard from Ello, who had been in the Medical Centre as one of the injured hostages, that Aletha had been kicked out by General Organa.

She was almost at the door when she felt her foot land on something. Kaydel backed up instead, careful not to put pressure on it and break whatever possession of her aunt’s she was stepping on.

Kaydel recognized the silver commlink instantly. What was Kira’s comm doing on the floor?

Without a second thought, Kaydel picked it up and placed it in her pocket, intending to give it to Aletha, who she knew never liked to be far from it.

“Doctor Kymeri?” Kaydel knew to address her aunt formally while in the Medical Centre. “Doctor Kymeri, are you here?”

She wasn’t, but there was someone Kaydel was happy to see.

“Poe,” Kaydel grinned, approaching the pilot who was talking with someone lying in a hospital bed.

“Hey Babe,” Poe’s whole face lit up as he saw Kaydel. Without a second thought, he pulled her in for a kiss on the forehead.

“Don’t mind me,” a thickly accented voice came from the bed. “Just in the middle of important Resistance chain of command business.”

“Sorry, Commander Nalto,” Poe bowed his head. “Was there anything else you needed to tell me?”

“No. I just don’t appreciate being interrupted.”

“My apologies, Commander,” Kaydel smiled at Diego. “I was just wondering if either of you had seen my aunt?”

Diego frowned, “Aletha’s missing?”

“Aletha’s fine,” Kalonia announced, joining the group. “Sorry, Kaydel, but she was called away on a sudden mission. It’s a long-term, top secret mission. She wasn’t allowed to say her goodbyes to anyone, not even family.”

“What mission?” Diego asked.

“The one General Organa was going to take me on until I had to deal with your injuries.”

“Makes sense. Aletha is the only other Rebel.” Diego sighed, “Am I to take command then?”

“When you’re better. Vice Admiral Holdo is coming in to cover for you until then.”

Poe and Diego groaned in unison.

“Hey, I don’t like her either, but she is third in charge,” Kalonia said.

“Only because Felicity Rhiaon is dead,” Diego shot. “Purple haired bitch must have loved that news.”
Kaydel frowned at the group, “I’m sorry, what’s going on? Who’s Holdo and why do we hate her?”

“Uh, well you know how I told you that Felicity Rhiaon Skywalker was a very aggressive person?” Poe reminded.

Kaydel nodded, “She liked punching people in the throat.”

“She liked threatening to punch them in the throat,” Poe corrected. “Well, Holdo… is the reason we took those threats seriously.”

“What happened?”

“Holdo and Fliss never got along,” Diego said, “but after an incident between Fliss and her child while Fliss was suffering from postpartum depression, Holdo’s stance on Fliss got worse.”

Poe said, “After Fliss returned from treatment at a mental health facility for her depression, Holdo didn’t want her anywhere near the kidnapped children rescue missions, which was what Fliss was in charge of. When Fliss went on leave from the Resistance for her pregnancy, Holdo took it over. General Organa had to play peacemaker between the women over their argument, and Fliss backed down, accepting that with a new infant at home, she wouldn’t have time to do that sort of mission.”

Diego glowered, “But that wasn’t enough for Holdo.”

Kalonia sighed, “At a fundraising event for the Resistance on Coruscant, the women had a few too many to drink. Fliss confronted Holdo over the matter, and Holdo made a few disparaging remarks about Felicity’s fitness to be a mother, and…”

“Fliss attacked her,” Diego said bluntly. “If Luke hadn’t been there, I’m fairly certain that Fliss would have been facing murder charges. But Holdo was furious, and the police were called. Fliss got arrested, and Holdo wanted to have charges pressed for assault and battery.”

“Unfortunately, this had huge consequences for Felicity,” Kalonia continued. “After the… incident we don’t speak of that involved Felicity almost harming her daughter, Child Protective Services paid the Skywalker family a visit over their daughter being in a potentially dangerous environment. Since Felicity was going to a mental health facility and under my direct supervision when she returned to Rornian, they decided to give Luke and Felicity a warning. If either of them stepped one foot out of line, their daughter would be taken from their home.”

“The assault charges ended up qualifying as stepping out of line,” there was no humor in Poe’s voice. “The family told Holdo what continuing to press charges would mean for them, but Holdo refused to withdraw her statement. She believed Fliss to be an unfit mother, and thought the child better off elsewhere.”

“Thankfully Luke and Felicity had a lot of support from their family,” Kalonia said. “Han and Leia were prepared to take the girl, so was Luke’s maternal family, and even Felicity’s maternal family offered to take the girl… though that might have just been them seizing the opportunity to raise a member of their family under the way of life they perceived to be their version of right.”

“It took Luke going to Holdo’s apartment and literally begging her not to let him lose his daughter that got Holdo to back down,” Diego concluded. “The charges were dropped, the CPS allowed Luke and Fliss to retain custody as long as she took an anger management course, Holdo got a restraining order from Fliss, and since then, Fliss and I always referred to Holdo as the purple haired bitch.”

Kaydel stared at the group, “You know, the Skywalker family sounds like they would only be fun if you watched them from afar.”

“It’s true,” Diego held up his mangled – but better – arm, “get too close and this thing happens.”

“Will you be okay?” Kaydel asked.

Diego and Kalonia exchanged a look.

“There’s… complications,” Kalonia answered. “Now why don’t you and Commander Dameron go off and let me get some work done on Diego?”

“Yes, Ma’am,” Poe nodded. He offered his arm to Kaydel, “Shall we?”

“Lead the way,” Kaydel nodded.

Diego sighed as he watched the two walk off, chatting happily and enjoying each other’s presence.

“You know, Commander Nalto, I can’t have you violating Resistance rules while in my hospital,” Kalonia chuckled as she performed some tests on his arm.

“What do you mean?” he asked.

“Doctors are not allowed to be involved with their patients, and yet you were feeling my doctor up right in front of the General.”

“I wasn’t feeling her up! I was…” Diego sighed, “I don’t know what I was doing.”

“Well, whatever it was, it was working. Come on, it’s clear what’s going on between you two.”

“I know, it’s just…”

“What?”

“She just finished a long-term relationship. Whatever this thing is between us, I don’t want it to just be a rebound.”

“From what I understand,” Kalonia wrote something on her chart, “that long-term relationship ended almost a year ago.”

“But it was why I took things slow,” Diego said. “I was going to try to progress things when I returned, but there was this arm injury and now she’s gone. I can’t believe she just left without saying a word to me. Without letting me say anything to her.”

Kalonia smiled, “You wanted to tell her goodbye?”

“No… I wanted to tell her something else entirely.”

“I still can’t believe she didn’t even say goodbye,” Kaydel sighed as Poe walked her to her room that night.

“The life of a soldier, you never know when you’re going to be called up,” Poe said, kissing her cheek. “Or come home in a box.”

Kaydel shuddered, “Don’t say things like that. The thought of losing you or Aletha like that makes my stomach turn.”

“Losing me like that?” Poe grinned. “Oh, have I broken through to that boyfriend level?”

“Since when have I said you were my boyfriend? All you know is that you’re at the level of I hope this guy doesn’t die.”

“I’m flattered you care about me to that level. But I also know that we’re at the level of we’re totally going to make out on your bed if your roommate isn’t in, and I’m probably not going to be wearing a shirt while doing so.”

Kaydel punched in the code to her room, and the door slid open.

“Oh look,” Poe grinned, “your roommate isn’t in.”

She shook her head, “Get on the bed.”

Poe didn’t need to be told twice.

“How long until Paige gets here?” Poe asked, pulling his shirt over his head and tossing it aside.

“She’s with her sister, so we have some time,” Kaydel knelt next to the bed as Poe sat down. She looked up at him when she heard his chuckle, “What?”

“Sorry just you in that position is making me… think about things I’ve been wanting to do for a while now.”

“We don’t have time for that!” she playfully smacked his knee. Kaydel started rummaging under her bed, “Besides, we’ve talked about this. With us both having roommates, it’s more been a logistical issue than a preference one.”

“So, you’d be up for it?”

“Only if you returned the favor.”

“I’d gladly return the favor for however long and in whatever way you wanted,” Poe chuckled. He saw her shirt ride up a little as she was bent over. Poe ran a hand across the exposed flesh, “What are you doing under your bed?”

“Trying to find it. Here it is!” Kaydel pulled out a box from under the bed. She sat next to Poe and gave it to him, “I know it’s not a special occasion or anything, but I got you a present.”

“Kay, you didn’t have to.”

“I know, but I saw it and thought it would look great on you. Don’t make me feel weird about giving my boyfriend a gift.”

“Alright, but only because you admitted I’ve hit boyfriend level.” Poe opened the box to find a beautiful garment of brown leather inside. He lifted it up to admire it, “A jacket?”

“I thought it would look good on you,” Kaydel shrugged. “Try it on? Please?”

“Alright, but it’s going to look funny without a shirt on underneath.” Poe slipped on the jacket that would soon become his signature and admired himself in the mirror, “Dang this does look good.”

“What can I say?” she got up behind him and wrapped her arms around his torso. “I have great taste.”

“I know. You picked me to be your boyfriend.”

She swatted at him and he caught her hand, laughing. Kaydel shook her head and held him tight as they stared at their entwined embrace in the mirror.

“It looks good,” Kaydel brushed her hand across his hard abs, the jacket splayed open to display his well-sculpted body. His skin was so warm beneath her touch.

“Yeah, the jacket does,” Poe agreed.

“Not the jacket… Us.”

He smiled and kissed her head, “You’re so beautiful. I’m lucky to have you.”

“Because I’m pretty?”

“Because you’re amazing. Your passion, your kindness, your humour, your taste in clothing. And when you’re in action in the communication centre… I just want you so badly.”

“And what about you, Commander Dameron? Your charm, your courage, your leadership skills, your forwardness, your unfairly attractive bare torso with muscles in just all the right places. I wouldn’t change a thing about you.”

“I’d change something about you.”

“Oh?” Kaydel’s tone was dangerous.

“Your hair,” Poe laughed, kissing her scowling lips. “I’ve never seen it down.”

“I don’t like it down.”

“Why’s that?” He frowned when she said nothing, “Kay?”

Kaydel took a deep breath, “Did I ever tell you that I’m an aunt?”

“No.”

“Katha, Keth, and Kaydel – the first one – all have children. Kaydel had two boys, Deek and Dacken, who hate me.”

“Deek and Dacken? That’s it, I’m going to send your family a book of baby names. You people have to stop it with the alliteration.”

Kaydel was glad of a moment to laugh, knowing the story to come.

“So, what does that have to do with your hair?” Poe turned Kaydel around so he was the one with arms wrapped around her. He nuzzled her neck, “They jealous of it?”

“No, they’re not jealous of me,” Kaydel sighed. “But they hate me. They’re older than me, and hate me because I was named after their dead mother and feel like I’m trying to replace her. Swore to get rid of me any way they could.”

“Okay, seriously, what is with your family trying to murder each other? You’re worse than the Skywalkers.”
“It’s sad that that’s true.”

“What happened with your nephews?” Poe asked. “They dye your hair in your sleep? Cut it? Pull it out?”

Kaydel took a deep breath, “One night when I slept… they lit it on fire.”

Poe froze.

“That’s why I keep it up now,” Kaydel quietly added. “I loved having my hair down but after that…”

She was caught off-guard by a passionate, and somewhat painfully crushing kiss.

“I’m not going to let anyone hurt you again,” Poe vowed desperately as he held the little bit dazed Kaydel in his tight embrace. “I won’t let anyone touch you again.”

“Poe,” Kaydel panted as he pushed her down on the bed.

His hands were on her and so was his hot mouth. At some point his jacket ended up on the floor, and her legs around his hips.

Kaydel moaned as he pressed her down into the mattress, his body solid and protective. It felt so wonderful to be in his arms, to have his body on her like this. But she wanted more; so much more.

And more was what she got.

She gasped when he pressed it against her, that hard lump against her thigh.

“Yes, please, Poe,” Kaydel begged.

Moving his lips to her neck, Poe shifted his hips so his erection was against her most sensitive spot. Kaydel moaned and panted, urging him on as he ground against the dampening apex between her legs. With her pleased moans, he moved faster trying to find just the right spot to make her lose herself to pleasure.

And with a sharp gasp, he knew he had found it.

“Right there,” Kaydel panted, holding his head to her neck as her hips moved up to grind with him. “Oh just right there.”

“You’re making me so hard,” Poe’s hand slid underneath her shirt to stroke her spine. She shivered at his touch, “I don’t want the fabric to be between us.”

“I don’t either, but Paige could walk in any moment. Just please don’t stop. I think I’m going to…”

Something gleamed in his eyes, “Challenge accepted.”

There were no sounds in the room but impassioned moans, fevered grunts, the smack of sloppy kisses, and the brush of friction between fabric. Kaydel’s hands were locked on Poe’s hips, directing his movements against her, while his played under her shirt, pawing at her brasserie clad breasts.

“Can I take it off?” Poe whispered into her ear.

“Only if you leave my shirt on,” Kaydel moaned as he brushed against her clit. “If Paige walks in-”
“Stop talking about your roommate.”

“Right.”

Their lips were back on each other’s, Kaydel burying a hand in Poe’s hair as he fumbled with the clasp of her bra. He had gotten the first hook unlatched when her breath started to hitch frantically.

“Poe, I’m almost… I’m going to-”

The door slid open and a pair of giggles filled the room. Kaydel and Poe made a mad scramble to pull apart, but the sight of them on the bed made Paige and Rose Tico stop in their tracks with wide, horrified eyes.

“Evening, Ladies,” Poe grinned innocently, grabbing his jacket off the floor and holding it over himself in an attempt to hide his erection. He had to think of something unsexy and quick.

General Organa’s stern gaze. Ben Solo’s haughty smirk. His father in a bath towel.

Oh, there we go.

“Hello, Commander Dameron,” Paige grinned knowingly at Kaydel. “Molesting my roommate again?”

Rose just looked horrified at the scene.

“I wasn’t molesting her.” Poe smirked, “Quite the opposite in fact. Kay was most agreeable with my actions.”

He was promptly hit in the face with his shirt.

“I should go,” Rose awkwardly tried not to look at Poe as he got himself dressed.

“I’m see you in the morning,” Paige gave her sister a hug.

Kaydel smiled at her, “Good night, Rose.”

“Good night, Kaydel,” Rose said.

Poe grinned at her, “Good night, Rose.”

Rose’s eyes widened, she gave a high-pitched squeak, and ran out the room.

Poe just laughed, “I’ll get her to speak to me one day.”

“Good luck with that,” Paige started to rifle through her dresser drawers for pyjamas. “She thinks of you on the level of General Organa and that lot, so she gets star struck.”

“I’m working on it. No one can resist the charms of Poe Dameron.”

“Speaking of, Kaydel, can you take your boyfriend and his charms into the hallway? I would like to get some sleep tonight.”

“We’ll go say good night.”
“So,” Poe said as the door slid behind them, “that was a lot of fun.”

“Yeah it was,” Kaydel wrapped her arms around his neck and pressed her body against his. “I’m sorry we got interrupted.”

Suddenly picturing Kes Dameron in a bath towel wasn’t cutting it for Poe.

“Seems like you’re sorry too,” Kaydel grinned as she felt the return of his erection.

“I’m going to have a lot to tell BB-8 tonight, that’s for sure,” Poe replied stiffly. He couldn’t start this up again, her body against his and all the feelings that brought with it. If he got cut off again tonight, it might just kill him.

“Not Snap?” Kaydel asked.

“No, Snap went with General Organa on the super secret mission. I have no roommate tonight.”

Kaydel’s eyes lit up, “You have no roommate tonight?”

It clicked in his mind a second later.

With a burst of energy, Kaydel opened the door to her room and shouted at Paige, “Don’t wait up for me!”

Before Paige could say a word, Poe slammed the close door button, grabbed Kaydel’s hand, and they took off running down the hall.

They stumbled into Poe Dameron and Snap Wexley’s room in a frantic embrace of lips and limbs. Poe barely had the sense to close the door behind him as they started pawing at each other’s clothes.

BEEP BEE BEE BOP BOWH!

The angry beeping knocked them to their senses as BB-8 rolled up to them squawking loudly.

“BB, shush!” Poe ordered.

Boo boip bee bew!

“I know, but I don’t care. Give us some privacy, okay?”

Boo bew bohw beep!

“Excuse me? You were the one who made it his mission to get us together. Apparently she checked all the boxes of your relationship match analytics, which by the way, I do not remember programming in you.”

Bep booip be.

“I doubt that’s in the defaults.”

Bee bee bop!

“We’re going to revisit the definitions of respectful to women and acceptable things to do in a relationship in your programming tomorrow.”
“BB-8, just get out here for tonight. Go bug Threepio, or something.”

BB-8 let out a loud raspberry and beeped angrily at Poe as he opened the door and exited the room.

“Yeah, you were going to tell my father anyway!” Poe shouted after his droid before closing the door. He shook his head and turned back to Kaydel, “Sorry about him, Babe.”

“Don’t worry,” she grinned, walking up to him. Kaydel wrapped her arms around his neck and gently kissed his lips. “I think it’s charming the way you two are such close friends. Not many people treat droids like equals and sentient beings. It’s sweet.”

“Not as sweet as you.” Poe enjoyed the taste of her lips once more. Their breath was hot and their embrace close. “Are you sure you want to do this? We’ve barely been officially going out for a month. If you don’t want to make love yet-”

“Make love to me Poe Dameron.”

That was all the signal he needed. He pulled her in close to him, savoring the delicious taste and feel of her lips against his. That soft, smooth skin against the coarseness of his own. They way her hands grasped and embraced him, guiding him to mutual pleasure.

He loved the way her body responded to him. Her skin flushed, her breathing erratic, her heart beating like a drum.

As their kisses became more frantic, so did their hands. Kaydel pushed his jacket off his shoulders. Poe unbuckled her large waist belt and threw it across the room. Kaydel yanked his shirt over his head, her hands running over his broad chest. Poe ripped open the little decorative mustard coloured half shirt thing Kaydel had to wear over her uniform shirt that Poe had never understood. They stumbled against each other as they tried to take off their boots and socks without detaching lips.

It didn’t work.

“Careful! Steady!” Kaydel laughed as Poe stumbled forward, shaking his boot off. He had managed to pin her against his work desk. “You okay?”

“I’m good now,” Poe laughed as he steadied himself. He took a moment to catch his breath and admire Kaydel’s dishevelled state, “Well, I know it’s not the bed, but this position has its promises.”

“Oh really?” Kaydel grinned, her hands massaging his tense shoulders. “Aren’t all your important work items and Holos of personal significance on this desk?”

He smirked, pulled Kaydel forward and dramatically shoved everything off the desk with a flourish.

She just stared at the pile on the floor, “You’re going to regret that in the morning, aren’t you?”

“Already regretting it now,” Poe admitted. “Oh well.”

Kaydel squealed as he pushed her back against the desk. She moved to sit on it, but he stopped her.

“I want you standing,” he had a wicked gleam in his eye.

Poe ground himself against her, and Kaydel felt herself getting wet and aroused against his erection. In ecstasy, she rubbed her small breasts against his chest, her nipples hardening against his touch.
“Can I take your shirt off this time?” Poe’s words were nearly muffled by her lips on his.

She drew back and smiled, “The real question is why haven’t you yet?”

Kaydel barely had the time to lift her arms before Poe was pulling the shirt over her head.

“Oh God, you’re beautiful,” Poe took in an eyeful of smooth, pale skin. It took all of his restraint not to rip off the very simple black bra she was wearing.

Kaydel flushed, the redness spreading down her chest, “You really think so?”

“I want my lips and hands all over you, and I don’t know where to start.”

She grinned, “Maybe start with the neck and work your way down?”

“Sounds like a plan, Lieutenant.”

Kaydel arched her neck as his lips found it. His breath tickled her ear with heat, and his jaw scratched her with short hairs in need of a shave. Down and down he moved. When he was at her collarbone, Kaydel leaned down and kissed his hair. It was slightly greasy, in need of a wash, but she knew better than to mention to Poe Dameron that something was wrong with his hair.

He smelled of sweat and motor oil. Kaydel kind of wished she had let him take a moment to squirt himself with the bottle of cologne she could see on top of his dresser with all his hair products and hygiene items. For a man who had greasy hair and smelled like sweat and motor oil, Poe Dameron had an astounding collection of hygiene items.

Kaydel was brought back to his touch when she felt Poe fiddling with the clasp of her bra.

“I can perform some of the most complicated aerial maneuvers ever invented. Why can I not unclasp this bra?” Poe grumbled.

She stayed his hand, “Here. Let me.”

It popped open in a second.

“I loosened it for you,” Poe insisted.

“Of course you did.” Kaydel looked down at her bra and bit her lip, “Poe, if I had known this was where tonight was leading, I would have worn underwear more alluring.”

“Kaydel, to be blunt, I don’t care what underwear you have on. It’s what’s underneath that I’m interested in.”

She swatted at him, but he made a well-timed duck.

“Maybe I don’t take it off,” she said.

“Does this encourage you?” he ground his erection against her.

“Oh fuck!” she gasped.

Poe pulled back, “Wow, I think that’s the first time I’ve heard you swear… It’s kind of hot.”

“Why do you think I like hanging around you when you’re fixing your X-Wing and swearing up a storm? Cursing and Yavinese. Two things from your mouth that turn me on.”
“Oh really? Take off that bra and I’ll speak all the Yavinese you want, Mi Amor.”

Slowly, Kaydel pulled down the straps and pulled off her bra. Kaydel had always been very sensitive about her breasts, barely more than an A cup. But when she saw the desire in Poe Dameron’s eyes as he first looked upon those small, but perky breasts, she felt like an absolute Goddess.

“Quiero besar todas las partes de tu cuerpo,” he declared in Yavinese.

Then his mouth was on her breast. Kaydel gasped as he went to work, sucking and licking. She wasn’t overly aroused by breast stimulation, but Poe Dameron knew how to get his job done. Her hand buried in his hair again, urging and guiding him as he licked long, flat strokes along one breast, then down into the valley and up to the other, repeating the action several times.

Kaydel groaned and panted as he lavished her. He spoke in his native tongue, letting his accent slip out every once and a while. Being a communications officer, Kaydel had some grasp of Yavinese, so she could generally understand what was being said and how to reply.

“So siento rico,” Poe said as she raked her nails across his shoulders. He urged her, “Un poco más fuerte.”

“¿Te gusta?” Kaydel asked as he circled her nipple with his tongue.

“Si, Mi Amor. It feels really good. But what about you? Am I making you feel good?”

“Me estás poniendo muy caliente,” she answered in Yavinese as he sucked her nipple, his hand thumbing the other. “Quiero resgar apagado toda su ropa. Quiero hacerte el amor toda la noche.”

Poe stared at her, “Damn. I didn’t know you knew that kind of Yavinese. What the hell does Threepio cover in basic training?”

“Actually I asked Commander Nalto if he could teach me a few things to say to you,” Kaydel confessed. “He wrote them on a slip of paper, refused to look me in the eye as he handed it to me, and then made me swear I’d never tell Aletha he taught me this.”

“I owe Diego Nalto a thank you.”

“Poe?”

“Yeah.”

“Quítate los pantalones y follame.”

“I owe Diego Nalto a huge thank you.” He stopped her hands when they went to his belt, “No, Darling. Not yet. There’s something else we’re going to do first.”

“And what’s that?” Kaydel tried to breathe normally as he started to unfasten her pants.

Her pants opened but still upon her, Poe looked Kaydel in the eyes, “Now, for the record, you do want to proceed with sexual activity? You consent to me performing acts of a sexual nature upon you, and you’ll inform me at any point if you withdraw said consent?”

“Yes, absolutely.”

“Okay, and for the record I am consenting to sexual intercourse with you, and will inform you if I withdraw said consent. Now, let’s talk protection. I’m not looking for any MisCalcs at this time in my life. You on anything?"

“I have an IUD. What about you?”

“Your aunt made sure I was fully supplied in case something like this happened. She insisted on it… Brought a large box to me of it the morning after our first official date and threatened to castrate me if I ever touched you sans protection. I think she’ll do it too.”

“Oh good,” Kaydel blushed. “That’s not embarrassing at all. So we’ve got protection and consent. I think it’s time.”

He kissed her passionately to seal their agreement. As she wrapped herself in his embrace, Poe’s hand stroked between her thighs. She moaned as he caressed her damp clothed mound.

“You’re wet,” he smiled to himself. “Did I do that?”

“You mean did constantly grinding against me turn me on?” Kaydel said. “What do you think?”

“The only question is how wet?”

She cried out when he slipped his hand down her pants, beneath her underwear to her bare, wet pussy.

“Oh,” Poe chuckled, swirling his fingers around her folds. “Very wet. You want me inside of you bad.”

“Not if it means you’ll stop touching me like this.”

“Good. That was the plan.” He couldn’t help but smile to himself when he withdrew his hand and she whimpered. He brought his fingers to her mouth, “Suck.”

“Why?”

“A little extra lubrication. Now suck.”

She took it as a challenge. Kaydel stared Poe straight in the eyes as she sucked his fingers and licked like as if it were a different appendage of his.

“That’s enough,” Poe declared after a lot longer than necessary. His cock had hardened even more at the visual and feeling of her mouth on his fingers, craving that mouth elsewhere. “Keep that up and I’m not going to have the ability to do anything to you before having you do something to me. But I must say, if that’s a preview of what’s to come for me, I’m a lucky man. Now let’s get to work on getting you to cum for me.”

He shifted her pants down a little more for better access, but did not remove them entirely. Poe had always been turned on by keeping some clothing on his partners, the ability to just create and watch their pleasure without focusing on the bared goods.

Poe slid his hand down her pants and began to stroke her. His caresses were strong but not painful. He used her natural lubrication and her salvia on his fingers to ease the movements.

At first, he kept on her panties, playing with her lips and brushing against her clit through the cotton barrier. He watched her face and listened to her cries to pleasure. When those moans reached a sharp pitch, her eyes squeezed shut, and her hips started to jerk up against his hand, Poe pulled aside her panties and openly stroked her flushed, wet pussy.

“Yes, please,” Kaydel groaned as he toyed with her clit. “Oh, don’t stop.”

“Sorry, Babe,” Poe’s hand drifted down to fondle her gushing opening. He dipped the tip of his middle finger ever so briefly into her passage, and then stroked back up to her clit. “But I had something else in mind for you.”

“Do what you want. I just want to cum on your hand… your large, skilled hands and those thick fingers that are making me so wet.”

“I hope it’s not just my hand you cum on,” Poe dipped his middle finger deeper into her and Kaydel gasped. “I’ve got something larger, thicker, and harder to make you cum.”

“Oh Poe, yes,” Kaydel felt herself get even wetter at his words. “I want you to fill me with your cock. Please give it to me.”

“Sorry, Babe, you’re not ready yet. You’re very tight and I’m not sure I would fit just yet.” He bent down and sucked her nipple, “But don’t worry. I know a way to make it fit.”

Kaydel cried out in pleasure when he sunk his middle finger all the way into her pussy.

“Yes, Poe! Yes!” Kaydel moaned as he pumped his finger frantically in and out of her. She was so wet and aroused, Poe found little resistance to pumping her quim. His mouth was on her breast, kissing, biting, and straight up slobbering on her nipples as he tasted her hungrily. A wet squishing sound filled the room as he pumped her faster, Kaydel’s breaths panting in harmony with his thrusts.

Poe slipped in another finger and smiled to himself when the action made her shriek.

“Yes, Poe. Please!” she thrust her hips up to meet his fingers. Her body so hot and primal as he had her pinned against the desk, the presence of her pants putting more pressure on his movements and on her clit.

When Poe’s other hand reached down to stroke her clit, it was too much. She let out a loud shriek and came hard, her legs clamping down on his hands to keep the pleasure on her as her muscles convulsed.

“Fuck,” Poe said, his voice dark as he watched Kaydel finish her orgasm. “Quiero come tu chocho.”

Before Kaydel could realize what was happening, Poe had yanked her pants and underwear to the floor. She gasped as she felt a wet pleasure on her cunt, and looked down to see Poe on his knees, lapping up her juices.

It was so pleasurable… too pleasurable after having just cum.

“No, no, stop,” Kaydel pushed him away.

Poe looked concerned, “I’m so sorry. Did I do something-”

“You did something very good,” Kaydel struggled to catch her breath, realizing she was naked and on complete display to him. How she was not on that floor with him, tearing off his clothing with her teeth was a mystery to her. “But I’m too sensitive. Not right after orgasm… but damn, Dameron you really know how… what do you say in Yavinese? Comer la coño.”
“Well, how about while you calm down, we see how well you can… what do you say in Yavinese? Metértela en la boca y mamar.”

Kaydel frowned at him, “What?”

“Blowjob.”

“Oh, sure. Stand up and I’ll take off your pants.”

Poe grinned, stumbling to rise to his feet. He was barely balanced when he had Kaydel’s arms around his neck and naked body pressed against him.

They kissed for a while, Poe running his hands all over her soft, bare skin. Their kisses were sloppily, tongues dancing together as she ran his rough palms down her spine. Kaydel gave him light sighs and moans that filled his heart with something warm. She pressed her body against him, complete and utter trust in him to care and pleasure said body.

There was something almost pure in the faith she had in him.

Her hands drifted down and unfastened his belt.

“You know,” she said with a coy smile, “I don’t think there’s any sound sexier than the clink of a belt being unfastened. There’s just something about it that gets me wet and ready.”

“Kay, Babe,” he stroked underneath her chin, “didn’t we agree to put your mouth to better use than talking?”

She playfully smacked his chest, but unzipped his fly. His cock was already struggling to escape their clothed confines before she had even unbuttoned him.

“You weren’t kidding about being hard,” Kaydel said very businesslike as she worked on ridding him of his pants, carefully avoiding his throbbing cock. “You know I didn’t picture you as a briefs kind of man. Thought you’d be all about boxers.”

“It’s easier to wear in a flight suit,” Poe admitted, his hands palming her ass. He was trying to be respectful, but his hips were attempting a mutiny as they made small jerks forward to press his hard, hot staff against her oh so soft skin. “Kay, please.”

“Patience Poe,” she teased him. “What you think I’m going to just start playing without getting you undressed?”

Kaydel stroked a fingertip quickly across the head poking out of his briefs. Poe gave a strangled cry, and his hands tightened their grip on her ass, trying to pull her against him.

“Uh uh,” Kaydel pushed away. “You touch me with that thing bare, and my aunt will have your head on a platter.”

“Kaydel, please, I need you to touch me. I don’t care how. I need you.”

“You that eager for sex?”

“No… I need you.”

It made her pause and a lovely smile stretch across her face, “Me? Like only me?”

“Only you,” he nodded.
“So if there was another girl in the room offering all I refused-”

“I want you. Everything else is incidental.”

Kaydel wasn’t entirely convinced, “So if I said no blowjobs ever?”

“If it’s part of the package, then I’ll give them up.”

“What about sex under the covers with all the lights off?”

“I’d learn to appreciate the sensation of touch over all others,” Poe countered. “What sense is more important in sex after all?”

“What about if I said missionary position only?” Kaydel shot.

“Face to face in the most intimate of positions? Sign me up.”

“What if I took a vow of chastity?”

“Okay, let’s not get carried away.”

Kaydel laughed and leaned into his strong, caring embrace.

“I want you, Kaydel,” Poe held her close. “I know things haven’t been going on for very long with us, but I’m excited to see what comes next… Especially if it involves you on your knees, sucking me off.”

“Alright, I think I’ve been torturing you long enough.” Kaydel directed Poe to the bed nearest to them and placed pressure on his shoulders, “Have a seat and get those pants off for me. Where’s the condoms?”

“My sock drawer,” Poe dropped onto the bed and worked his pants and underwear off. “Top right dresser drawer. Not the left. That’s Snap’s.”

“Well, we don’t want to defile any of Snap’s things, do we?” Kaydel found the box and removed two foil packets. As she walked back to the bed, she saw Poe Dameron waiting and ready from her, completely on display, “Wow.”

“Think you can work with this?” Poe stroked his cock to get it hard enough to put on the condom.

“Shouldn’t be a problem,” Kaydel knelt down and placed the condoms on the bed. She started to unwrap one of them, “I’m just a little surprised. I’ve never seen a guy shaved before. You really are all about maintaining your body.”

“I thought it better than my partner always spitting out pubic hair. There, that should be hard enough for the condom. Do you want me to put it on?”

“I can do it.” She kept eye contact with Poe as she unrolled the condom on his twitching shaft. “Good thing she went with the lubricated kind. Condoms admittedly aren’t ideal for blowjobs, but until I have paperwork declaring you aren’t going to give me an STI, latex is our friend. Now here’s hoping it’s not the disgusting tasting stuff.”

“Well, why don’t you give it a taste?” Poe winked, “Just to be sure.”

She coyly gave a tiny lick of his tip.
Poe grunted at all too brief action, “So?”

“I think it’s okay.”

“Well, why don’t you make sure? Give it a long lick to be certain it has a good taste.”

Kaydel smiled and licked the full length of the underside of his cock. Poe threw his head back, burying a hand in her pinned up blonde waves.

“Yep,” she wriggled her eyebrows, “tasty.”

“You’re going to kill me, Kay.”

“Then give me that cock, Poe.”

Poe gently but firmly pulled her head forward onto his shaft. She immediately went to work lapping at his cock. The plastic sheath separating them made Kaydel crave the taste of his silky skin, but safety was important. At least it was a rather thin condom, probably of the variety that boasted that it felt like nothing was even there.

“You’re so long,” Kaydel cooed as she licked him eagerly.

Her fingers gently toyed with his swollen testicles, which did have a small covering of black hair on them. She ran her tongue across them, playing between them and back to his shaft.

“Suck the head,” Poe groaned, trying not to just fall back on the bed and enjoy.

She did as she was told, and it let something almost animalistic rumble from Poe’s throat.

“Fuck, you’re so good at this,” he gently pulled her head forward to engulf more of his shaft. “How far can you take me?”

Kaydel pulled back to catch her breath, “Let’s find out.”

Slowly he guided her head as she bobbed back and forth on his cock. His hips jerked to take control, but she put her hands on his hips to restrain him. Poe worked her mouth further down onto him, more and more until she choked.

“Alright,” Kaydel coughed, Poe rubbing her back as she took a few deep breaths. “That’s how far.”

“You alright?” he toyed gently with one of her nipples.

She moaned at the soft caress, “Yes.”

“You want to get back to work?”

Kaydel grinned at him, “Yes, Commander, Sir.”

“I’m not your Commander,” Poe chuckled and moaned she started bobbing up and down on his cock, her tits bouncing along with the rhythm. “If I was your Commander, I’d have you on your knees doing this to me while I was filling out paperwork.”

“I feel like General Organa would view that as an inappropriate and wasteful use of resources.”

“Do not talk about General Organa or any of my authority figures while my cock is in your mouth.”
“Yes, Commander.”

The sloppy sound of a cock getting sucked reverberated off the walls. Poe casually pawed at her breasts as she licked and sucked and fucked him with her mouth. His hands would drift to her sides, then across her back, and up her spine. He toyed with the short hairs on her neck, and then his hand slid up but into her hair to guide her closer to his cock.

“You’re really good at this,” Poe groaned, her tongue messily coating the condom in a layer of saliva for better lubrication. “I don’t want to know why.”

“Because I love blowjobs,” Kaydel grunted as she tongued the head of his cock. She could see beneath the condom, the precum pearling out of his slit. “I love just getting on my knees, sucking a hard, thick, long cock, and bringing a man – especially one of authority – to his most base and primal senses. To just watch a man lose control to my mouth…”

“Touch your pussy,” he ordered.

“What?”

“I want you to fondle yourself as you suck my fat, hard cock. Play with those little folds, and that hard nub, and make yourself wet with your sweet juices.”

“Why?”

“Because I’m going to shove my big, hard cock into you very soon, and I want you ready to take me.”

Poe’s words turned Kaydel on like no other. She doubled her efforts to bob and suck on his cock while she reached down and played with her pussy.

“No,” Poe snapped with he saw her slide a finger inside her begging canal. “The one who gets to put anything into you tonight is me. My tongue, my fingers, my cock. You don’t get to finger fuck yourself. Now play with your breasts.”

Kaydel obeyed. Her hands were covered in salvia and her feminine juices, leaving shiny trails across her breasts.

“Fuck, I want to taste you,” Poe stayed her head for a moment to lick the glistening juices from her breasts.

She moaned, weaving a hand through his hair, and directed him to all the wet spots on her chest. When she was clean, Poe licked her all over once more to make sure of it. Then he gently bit down on her nipples, placing tender kisses after immediately to balm the pain.

“You make my breasts feel so good,” Kaydel cooed.

“It’s not hard. These are the most beautiful breasts I have ever tasted. So soft and sweet-”

“But they’re so small.”

“All part of the package, Babe,” Poe grinned. “I mean, sure, would I like to be able to slide my cock between them? Maybe. But I can live without. Besides, everyone knows it’s the nipples that are the best part of the breast, and these… so brown, so hard, so long. Fuck, I could run my tongue over these all day.”
“So, you wouldn’t want anything different on me?”

“Not a damn thing. Well… maybe the ability to let me continue tasting you after an orgasm. And well…”

“What?”

Poe moved his hands to her shoulder and looked her in the eyes to show her how serious he was, “I want to take your hair down.”

Kaydel hesitated, reaching up to touch her hair.

Poe caught her hand, “Please… I know why you don’t like it down but please, I won’t let anything happen to you. Can you please trust me with this and let me see that-”

“Beautiful river of golden honey?” Kaydel smirked.

“Damn it, BB-8. Did he really have to record that speech?”

Kaydel laughed, and Poe smiled at her. They stared into each other’s eyes, smiling at each other. She reached out and stroked his cheek.

“Okay.”

Poe blinked, “Really?”

“I trust you.”

Kaydel reached up and started unfastening her hair. One by one, ties and pins that held up her hair came out, and small strands started falling down her shoulders. Poe helped, mesmerized as each golden wave fell upon her milky shoulders.

When it all was down, Poe was surprised to see just how much Kaydel looked like her aunt. It was no secret that despite her age, Aletha was perceived around the Resistance to have a sort of ethereal beauty, the kind found in religious paintings of Goddesses. It was probably her age and the fact that Diego Nalto most likely had the ability and willpower to snap a rival’s neck, that he was Aletha’s only suitor.

Kaydel had the same hair, long, golden waves that creased down her shoulders and fell down her back. Soft and wispy. Poe couldn’t help but run his fingers through it.

“This was a bad idea,” Poe whispered.

She frowned slightly, “Why?”

“I don’t know if I can ever stand to see you with your hair up now.”

Kaydel just smiled and rose to her feet. She climbed into his lap, arms wrapping around his neck, lips pressed sweetly against his as her breasts pushed into his chest and his cock rested against her thigh.

“You are an absolutely amazing woman, Kaydel Ko Connix,” Poe whispered against her lips. “Stupid name and all.”

“You name has the word damn in it. You wanna start this?” Kaydel laughed. She leaned forward and pressed her forehead to his. “Poe?”
“Yes?”

“Make love to me.”

He nodded, his throat feeling dry, “Lay on the bed.”

With slow movements, Kaydel climbed out of his lap and laid down on the bed. Poe didn’t watch her, too busy removing the old condom and replacing it. When he turned back, he was met with a breathtaking sight. Kaydel laid out on the bed, golden haired fanned all around, her chest moving up and down with steady breaths, her legs spread for him, her tender sex wet and flushed, and her brown eyes locked on his with utmost trust.

He crawled atop her, kissing her tenderly as he positioned her legs around either of his hips. Her quim was pressed against his erection, and her pelvis made small thrusts to rub against him, both to give them pleasure, as well as to further lubricate the condom for their impending coupling.

“Are you sure about this?” Poe whispered, his eyes not breaking from those deep brown pools.

She gripped his shoulders and nodded, “Yes.”

“Okay… Out of curiosity, you’re not a virgin, right?”

“No,” she smiled. “I’ve done this before. You don’t have to ease me into this.”

“Good.” He kissed her. “Because Babe… I’m about to rock your world.”

Kaydel laughed as he reached down and positioned himself at her entrance. He kissed her once more, deeply, passionately, and full of the initial stirrings he was feeling in his heart. The ones he had yet to admit to her.

And then he pushed inside of her.

“Poe!” Kaydel cried out as his slid his entire length into her in one go.

“Hey, one try,” Poe grinned. “That’s a good sign.”

“Shut up and fuck me.”

Poe did as he was told.

A duet of moans, gasps, and groans filled the room as Poe Dameron thrust eagerly in and out of Kaydel Ko Connix. Her legs were spread wide for him, and she clung onto his shoulders to keep up with the increasingly passionate pace.

His mouth was hard against hers in a suffocating kiss as he slid deep into her tight wetness. One of his hands gripped the headboard as an anchor to drive himself hard, but not brutally. The other was dancing along her soft belly and liked to peak down at her clit.

“Oh, Poe,” Kaydel moaned, her eyes lulling backwards as she enjoyed the feeling of him moving in and out of her, stretching her, his balls slapping against her. “Oh my god, that feels so good. Don’t stop, please don’t stop.”

“It feels good,” Poe bent his head down to nibble at her collarbone. “I’m not hurting you or too big or thick?”

Poe didn’t actually believe himself to be overly big, maybe even average if he had to wager, but he loved his partners telling him he had a big, thick cock as he rammed it into them.

“No, it feels fantastic,” Kaydel groaned, her breasts bouncing with his thrusts. “I feel so full with you inside of me.”

“It’s made for you, Babe,” Poe licked up her neck and kissed under her jaw. “Yeah, I bet it was. Made right to fit this beautiful pussy. You’re so tight, Babe. Moan for me.”

Kaydel’s moans pitched across the walls, serenaded by a frantic wet slapping, and the squeak of the bedsprings.

“Yeah, kiss my chest, Kay,” Poe groaned as her mouth explored his biceps.

He would admit during a much later sexual encounter that he really liked the way she sucked his nipples. The sensation made him seek out her own hard tips, the pair suckled each other as Kaydel’s hands gripped his ass, urging him in closer.

“You want me deeper?” Poe’s hot breath tickled her ear. “Get on your hands and knees.”

She eagerly turned over once he had withdrawn, and Kaydel presented herself to him like a nexu in heat. Kaydel put a pillow underneath her to support her position, and Poe grabbed the headboard for purchase. He lined himself up and slammed into her. A frantic squelching filled the room as he gripped her hip and humped her like a barghest stud taking his bitch.

Poe and Kaydel cried out in such pleasure that he was fairly certain that his neighbors on all sides – one of which was Admiral Akbar he realized with horror – were going to give him an earful of lectures in the morning about noise complaints and respect for your fellow soldiers.

Of course, he didn’t give a shit about anything in that moment but fucking Kaydel Ko Connix until she screamed his name loud enough that Luke Skywalker – wherever the hell he was – heard it.

“Talk to me, Kay,” Poe smugly urged Kaydel – whose face was buried in her pillow, absolutely lost to pleasure. “Does it feel good? Does my cock feel good inside of you, slamming in and out so hard?”

“Poe Dameron,” Kaydel weakly lifted her head from the pillow, “shut the fuck up, and fuck me.”

He went hard and fast, her pussy so wet and willing for such abuse. The pleasure was just so good, Poe wanted to cum then and there, but he was a gentleman and would wait for Kaydel. But as the time stretched on and she showed no sign of orgasm, Poe started to get tired.

“Kay, Babe, I don’t know how much longer I can last,” his thrusts started to taper off.

Kaydel scoffed teasingly, “Men are so weak. Fine, I’ll finish the job. Sit in the middle of the bed.”

He withdrew, and they shifted around the bed. Kaydel crawled into his lap again, this time carefully positioning her weight against his and lowering down onto his shaft.

“Now,” Kaydel ordered as she wrapped her arms around his neck, “kiss my breasts and fondle my clit. That should get us there.”

The tables turned, Poe obediently followed Kaydel’s instructions, savoring her gasps as his mouth, fingers, and cock pleased her most sensitive spots. It only took a few more minutes before Kaydel felt the beginning twinges of her orgasm.
“I’m about to cum!” she exclaimed, gripping him tightly and getting as much of him as possible. “Poe, I’m… I’m…”

“Say my name,” he urged finding the strength to slam up into her. “Say my name when you cum.”

“POE!” Kaydel screeched.

The second she started to climax, Poe shoved her down onto the bed and slammed himself into her. Poe let himself go, climaxing as Kaydel climaxed. He emptied himself inside of her violently, his hand gripping the headboard again as he pressed himself deep inside her.

When their orgasms abated, they were left panting. After a moment, Poe kissed Kaydel, rolled off, and laid down beside her. He removed the condom, kissed her again, tied it up, and threw it in the trash. Poe then grabbed a box of tissues from the bedside table and offered them to Kaydel for her to clean up.

Everything mopped up, tied off, cleaned up, and disposed of, they laid on the bed together, taking in what they had just done. Poe and Kaydel stared up at the ceiling in a little bit in shock. They were breathing heavily, and Poe couldn’t wipe the proud and satisfied smirk off his face.

“Wow,” said Kaydel simply, the smell of Poe’s musk clinging to her bare body.

She grinned, “Good… because I think I love you too.”

Suddenly Poe burst out laughing.

“What?” Kaydel frowned, suddenly feeling a little self-conscious. Had he not truly enjoyed their lovemaking? Had he been fooling her this whole time and now was going to turn on her after hearing her confession of love?

But Poe’s laughter was for nothing of that sort.

“It’s nothing,” he rolled back on top of her and kissed the worries away. “I just realized… this is Snap’s bed.”

The bedsprings squeaked and the moans sounded rhythmically to the pace of his thrusts. They sounded fake, Kylo Ren bitterly thought. Of course they were fake; the women who visited his bed merely put on a show for him. Everyone knew that it didn’t matter if they enjoyed it, or even if he enjoyed it. As long as he ejaculated, Snoke was happy.

The only upside to the visits was that no First Order officers would bother him for a good thirty minutes.

And sex, Kylo supposed. He guessed even getting sex this way wasn’t so terrible.

Frankly, at this point the whole mess bored him. Since he was nineteen, Snoke had been badgering Kylo to produce an heir and carry on the Skywalker bloodline. Every month, the potential mothers would be waiting in Kylo’s bed ready to do their duty. If Kylo liked a particular mother, he would call for them more often. But he rarely called for supplemental visits.

The Supreme Leader mandated that Kylo use the female Knights of Ren as his vessels to conceive.
They were strong with the Force and would obey Snoke’s command to go to Kylo’s bed. Female Knights of Ren were either fanatics who adored the Supreme Leader and jumped at the chance to be the mother of the next Skywalker Heir, or else they were displeased but consented to their duty without giving Kylo fight… or eye contact.

Kylo hated visits with those women.

There was only one woman who ever fought Kylo on the act, and that was Nera Ren. She made it clear to him that she was not going to couple with Kylo. They conspired against Snoke; the two of them would go into Kylo’s bedroom for half an hour and secretly play Sabacc while Nera made a series of overly false moans and declarations of his sexual prowess while Kylo desperately tried not to burst out laughing.

It was a nice little arrangement, a break from all the pressure… until her “mysterious death” two years ago. Women didn’t last long in the Knights of Ren, not while Tara Ren – Kylo’s second-in-command – was determined to be the mother of his child. Kylo could never prove she was behind the mysterious deaths of all the other female Knights of Ren; Tara was far too cunning to be found out.

Kylo wouldn’t want to prove it anyway. Tara was tall, dark, beautiful, cunning, a great warrior, and also the woman who took his virginity. Two years older than him, Tara had been granted the honour of the first shot at motherhood. Tara would visit Kylo’s bed multiple times a month, sometimes even pulling him into empty rooms or closets for an impromptu attempt. He knew her desire for him was all an act, but truth be told, Kylo had a crush on her. She was beautiful, knew just the right things to say to seduce him, and he liked the attention he got. If she wanted sex, Kylo was willing to give it to her.

But Tara was not the woman in his bed that night. Actually, he had forgotten the name of the newest Knight of Ren. All he knew about her was that she was lithe, strong in the Force, had long copper hair splayed on the sheets, and forest eyes he was desperately trying to avoid.

And that she was nineteen – old enough to be bred as if she was nothing more than a mare to Snoke.

To her credit the girl was trying to make an effort with their coupling. Moans, roaming hands, enthusiastic foreplay, moving her hips in what she probably thought was a pleasurable way for him. Of course, it was the girl’s first visit. She didn’t yet understand how it went in Kylo Ren’s bed; only Tara Ren got the pleasure of effort from him.

Still… he had to commend her on her optimism.

Kylo decided to grace her with honour of eye contact. He looked down and found the girl’s eyes squeezed shut. In pain? Pleasure? He couldn’t tell, but he doubted the latter.

He sighed, trying not to let it be too loud. At least the girl was making an effort; it was more than he could say. Besides, it wasn’t like it didn’t feel kind of good to have his cock sliding in and out of a wet and willing woman.

Deciding to reward her for her efforts, Kylo lowered his lips to her breasts. Good nursing breasts, Kylo thought; not too big, not too small, and she did have what Snoke would call excellent birthing hips. It made sense; this newest recruit was from Snoke’s personal stock of Force Sensitives rather than the almost Force Sensitive children they pulled out of the Stormtrooper classes. Snoke had picked her out himself, and probably thought her a good match after eight years of Kylo failing to provide an heir.
He glanced over at the clock on the wall and remembered the stack of paperwork he had to do. It was time to put both of the Knights of Ren out of their misery. Kylo bit her nipple hard, and his cock stiffened at her gasp of pain and what he could have sworn was a hint of pleasure. Spurred by his dominance over her, Kylo gave a few more rough pumps. He closed his eyes briefly to picture maybe Tara being there with him, raking his nails hard down her hips, and then ejaculated into the girl.

She looked surprised when he pulled out of her and rolled to the other side of the bed.

“Your pleasure is not the goal of these encounters,” Kylo told her bluntly. “Maybe if you impress me I might consider it some other time.”

“Of course,” the girl blushed, unsure of what field he desired to be impressed in.

“Here,” he pushed the blankets aside and got out of the bed. Tara was the only one he coupled with above the covers. Kylo pulled on a black night robe, and procured a cloth for her. He tossed it on the bed, “If you need to clean up a little. But not too much. We don’t want to defeat the purpose of this encounter.”

“Yes, Sir,” the girl quietly said, reaching beneath the covers with the cloth.

And then the awkward silence that Kylo always hated during these encounters. He wished the women didn’t come to his bed, that way he could just leave them as quickly as possible. But no, he had to wait until she dressed and returned to her own room.

“So,” Kylo made an attempt at small talk as she cleaned herself. He kept his back firmly to the girl, “That wasn’t terrible.”

The girl frowned, “Thank you, Sir?”

“Master Kylo to you,” he corrected. “I have people call me Master Ren, but as you are Master Ren yourself, you must call me Master Kylo.”

“Yes, Master Kylo. Did I please you, Master?”

He paused as he was pulling on his boot, “I’ve had worse.”

Kylo sensed that may not have been the right thing to say.

“You need more practice,” Kylo elaborated, using the Force to summon his other boot. “It takes a while to get used to a new partner. We’ll work on it.”

“Anytime you wish, Master,” the girl said.

He winced, “Try not to use the word anytime around me. It reminds me of… someone.”

The girl frowned, but did not press for answers.

Kylo sighed and turned to face her, “I suppose I should ask you your name.”

“Sasa Ren,” she answered, placing the now soiled cloth on the bed stand.

“And your trueborn name?”

“Sassa. Just an extra senth. No surname. Collected by the Supreme Leader as an infant. And yours?”
Kylo didn’t know whether to be amused or angry, “You don’t know?”

“I know the Solo part,” Sasa answered. “Not the given name.”

“Because I was named after a traitor. Jedi scum. I don’t wish to defile my tongue with that crude name.”

“As you wish, Master.”

Kylo had to admit that her calling him ‘Master’ was sending an odd twinge through his body. None of his lovers had ever referred to him as simply ‘Master’ – Tara would dig the eyeballs out of his sockets if he ever told her to – and he had to admit, he rather liked it.

“Keep calling me, Master,” Kylo ordered. “You may call me Master Kylo everywhere else, but in my bed, I am your Master.”

That brought a mischievous grin to her face that sent more twinges through his body. If he hadn’t just finished cumming, they would have hardened his cock.

“As you wish, My Master,” Sasa cooed.

She laid back on the bed and pushed off the covers so he could see the entirety of her naked body sprawled and enticing. A hand drifted to her breast, and long, manicured fingers started playing with the nipple he bit. If Kylo wasn’t going to pleasure her, apparently she was going to do it herself.

“May I ask you a question?” Sasa’s other hand slipped down to caress her thigh.

“Depends on the question,” Kylo swallowed as her finger stroked up her wet sex to her clit. Her finger glided so easily through the lubrication of her wet arousal and his essence oozing out of her sore passage.

She avoided touching the nub that would pleasure her so, instead swirled around her glistening folds, “How often will I be called for this duty?”

“At least once a month. More if I desire it.” He’d be damned if he said he wasn’t desiring it right now as she fondled herself so boldly in his bed in front of him. “Though, you aren’t exactly first on the roster if I get an urge.”

Something sparked in those deep green eyes, “Tara is, right?”

He scowled, “Where did you hear that?”

“The male Knights of Ren had a few things to tell me about all of this.”

“Oh really?” He knelt down on the bed. Sasa smiled mischievously as he reached out and placed a hand on her thigh. She was so soft. “What else are they saying?”

Sasa arched her back slightly, raising her breasts invitingly to his mouth, “Tara kills the other women who try to conceive with you.”

“It’s never been proven,” Kylo bent and took her nipple in his mouth. “What else?”

She moaned, her fingers increasing their tempo across her pussy lips, “That she would kill anyone who carried your child.”

“You would be protected should you conceive,” Kylo assured.
“That Tara is incapable of carrying a child since after eight years there’s been nothing from her.”

“She will cut your throat if you say such things to her face.”

He grasped her wrist as she attempted to slide one of her long fingers into herself. Kylo pulled her hand from her cunt, and she whimpered at the sudden loss of sensation. He gave her a hard, forbidding look and bit her nipple cruelly again.

With a soft moan, there was no denying she enjoyed the abuse.

“Unless I will it, you must never interfere with your womb after I have given you my essence,” Kylo admonished. Slowly he used his grip on her wrist to place her hand back on her desperate pussy. His middle finger forced hers forward, and he pressed it down onto her throbbing clit. “Not a drop must be spilled. Now, play with your clit and tell me what else they’ve been gossiping about my bedmates.”

Sasa shuddered as he guided her finger across her clit, keeping his hand on hers as they mutually pleasured her through one finger, “That you’ve been known to call more than one female Knight into your bed at the same time.”

“It happens,” Kylo admitted, suckling at her breast, this time more tenderly. He loved flicking his tongue over her small, pink nipples. “I recommend that you just enjoy the experience.”

“They also said that I wouldn’t enjoy coupling with you.”

Kylo raised an eyebrow, his fingers stopping their movements, “Were they right?”

Sasa’s eyes darkened, “That wasn’t terrible.”

A small grin crossed his face as she parroted his words from earlier.

“You have a sharp tongue, Sasa,” Kylo said.

“I would love to see how sharp your tongue is.”

Kylo considered it for a moment, “Lay back.”

“What?”

“Lay back.”

“But Master, you said a drop must not be spilled,” Sasa gently challenged. But from the buzz of arousal clinging in the Force around her, Kylo knew she didn’t mean her words.

“Then it’s a good thing that I am ready again to bless you with another chance to conceive. Now lay back and spread your legs,” he ordered. “Or do you not want to be satisfied yourself?”

She hesitated, surprised that he had taken her up on her innuendo. Then she understood; he was calling her bluff to test her. Would she be some limp sack of bones he did to as he pleased? Would she take control and put him under her heel like Tara? Or would she be the balance, obey his every order, but was unafraid to push him and be rewarded for her efforts?

“I’m ready for you,” Sasa spread her legs and smiled.

He knelt down between her legs and got to work, his hot mouth sucking and lapping her tender sex. If Snoke knew what Kylo was doing, he would be furious. Not a drop of Kylo’s essence was allowed to be wasted, and here he was eating it right out of her.

“Oh, Kylo,” Sasa moaned, her hand buried in his hair.

He couldn’t help but think that that moan actually sounded real.

Using the Force, Kylo knew exactly what spot to hit in which order. It didn’t take Sasa long before she was cumming on his mouth.

“Thank you, Master,” Sansa panted, he emerged from between her legs.

“We’re not finished yet,” Kylo pushed her onto her side, bending her knee and lifting her leg. He grunted as he tried to find a position where he could hold up her leg, but still stroke himself to make his cock hard enough to enter her. Kylo couldn’t find one, so he ordered her, “Stroke me.”

She nodded, dragged her palm across her pussy for lubrication, and wrapped her fist around him. Sasa’s strokes were awkward, and he had to direct her to ease up on her grip.

It was her first time touching him like that. In fact, this whole set of play was a bit of an adventure. Their first coupling had gone the same way all of Kylo’s couplings went with anyone who was not Tara. The woman would arrive to find him already sitting naked on the bed. She would undress for him, and he would sit on the bed stroking himself to the image of her naked body. When he was ready, he would have her lay on the bed, and he would finger her with the dollop of lube. Kylo would quickly decide she was ready, put some more lube on his staff, and then mount her. He would have sex with her with very little touching and never any kissing on the lips until he ejaculated. Then they would awkwardly go about their own business.

But Sasa was taking things a way only Tara ever made them go.

“Put me inside of you,” Kylo ordered.

“Yes, Master.”

He gave a grunt that was part animalistic and part pathetic when she guided his cock inside of her. Kylo instantly went to work, thrusting inside of her frantically, biting and scratching her back and shoulders.

Sasa moaned but her breath hitched in a little bit of pain every now and then. She was loving the duet of pain and pleasure he was giving her, but decided she still needed a little revenge. Sasa grabbed a fistful of hair and yanked hard, her teeth baring down into his lip sharp enough that Kylo felt the coppery taste of blood.

He came immediately.

“That was wonderful,” Sasa moaned as he rolled away from her.

“It’s not an every time occurrence,” Kylo warned, reaching for the cloth. “Don’t set an expectation. I don’t usually couple with a vessel more than once during a visit.”

“Then why did you take me again?”

Kylo gave her a small smirk as his hand closed on the cloth, “Because you wasted the first attempt. Needed to leave you with some sort of hope.

That was when he noticed the blood on the cloth.
“Did I hurt you?” he looked over at her. He remembered the way his attacks on her body had riled her up. “Non-consensually?”

“Oh, no,” Sasa blushed. “That’s not why there’s blood.”

He scowled and then it clicked, “Were you a virgin?”

“Yes, Master Kylo. It’s an honour though, to be deflowered by someone as powerful, and if I may say, handsome as you.”

Kylo just stared at her. The girl had shown no sign; sure her moves weren’t the greatest but nothing to suggest it was her first time, and he hadn’t felt a barrier… and at least he thought he hadn’t. Sometime when he started his coupling there was a little resistance because there wasn’t enough lube and she was too dry for him. He had just thought that’s why the first couple of thrusts their first round had been difficult.

“Why didn’t you tell me?” he demanded.

Sasa sat up, unashamed of herself, “I didn’t think it was important. Is it?”

“Well no, but…”

“But?”

He couldn’t meet her eye, “I would have made it… better.”

Sasa dared to touch his cheek. Kylo stared at her in absolute shock as she brought her face close to his.

“There is only one way to make this better, Master,” Sasa said gently. “You’ve kissed all parts of my body… except my lips.”

Before Kylo knew what was happening, she was leaning in to kiss him. He was about to pull back when their lips touched, and… And…

Oh.

This was nice. Soft and sweet, her lips hesitant against his, but… nice.

When she pulled back, a trace of fear was in her eyes.

“Was that okay?” Sasa asked.

Kylo lost all ability to form words.

“Uh…” he barely choked out. “I’ve had worse.”

But truth be told… he hadn’t ever had better. The only one who had really kissed him before had been Tara, and that was a lot different than Tara’s.

His words made her smile, “Thank you, Master Kylo. I hope you seek me out again soon.”

“We’ll uh… we still train together. You know. Knights of Ren and all. We’ve got stuff scheduled tomorrow. I’m teaching my lightsaber class, and testing FN-2187, and…”

Why the hell was he babbling like an idiot?
“I’m going to go take a shower,” Kylo stood from the bed. He had the urge to grab his helmet so she wouldn’t see his flustered face. “You may leave once you are dressed.”

“As you wish, Master,” Sasa replied.

He reached the door to his private fresher when he stopped. Kylo turned back to see the pretty, naked girl in his bed looking at him like he wasn’t an evil master of the Dark Side.

“I’ll call on you again,” Kylo said. “Before a month has passed.”

“As you wish,” Sasa bowed her head.

He stared at her for a minute, then looked over at the curtained off corner, concealing a pedestal with a Sith’s helmet (because who wanted to have sex in the same room as their dead grandfather’s charred Sith Lord helmet?)

Kylo looked back at Sasa with interest, “You’ll make a good vessel for my heir.”

Weirdly enough, Sasa was flattered.

At first nobody took me seriously. But I had help, even though I didn’t want it – Unkar Plutt told the others to leave me alone and sent his thugs to make the other scroungers back off.

- Rey’s Survival Guide

Rey knew what she was supposed to be doing. She was supposed to be checking this area of the Star Destroyer for valuable haul while Luke and Quom were a little ways away down another corridor.

She was not supposed to be lying on the sand, making out with her shirtless boyfriend atop her, his hands roaming wildly.

“Teng!” Rey breathlessly moaned her hands memorizing the muscles in his back.

Her pale arms were a striking contrast to his dusky olive skin. The lowest of her hair buns had been undone, leaving a splash of brunette to fan out among the sand. As his chapped lips and the beginnings of a scruff of facial hair found her neck, she let out a delighted moan. One of Rey’s hands slid up his body and buried itself in his ever growing longer black hair.

“Rey,” Teng panted, trailing small kisses along her neck, and gently nipping her collarbone. “Rey, you feel so good. You just make me feel like… Like…”

“We can wait if you need to think of an adjective,” Quom’s voice said.

“I’d be happy to hear the end of that sentence,” Luke added dryly.

“Dad!” Rey exclaimed, pushing Teng off.

“Quom!” Teng exclaimed, grabbing his shirt.

“Rey. Teng,” Luke nodded at the duo casually as they scrambled to dress themselves. “I thought we asked you two to explore the body of the ship. Not each other’s bodies.”

“Yeah, just because we’re okay with the two of you dating, doesn’t mean we approve of this sort of thing,” Quom added.

“Not while we’re trying to get work done anyway,” Luke said.

“I’m sorry, Sir,” Teng nodded. “I’ll go check the north passage. Rey you want to go south?”

“Meet back here in an hour.”

They scurried off in opposite directions, embarrassed, yet both totally thinking it had been worth it.

“First love,” Luke chuckled, resting an arm on Quom’s shoulder. “You remember when you were that young and in love?”

Quom blinked, “No. I didn’t get my first girlfriend until I was twenty.”

Rey winced as Roke knocked out another opponent in the Fighting Ring.

“Not yet,” Teng sighed. “And he’s been through every single goon Plutt has… today alone.”

“Yeah, if we wanted to start an uprising against the Blobfish, today’s the day,” Quom said as they watched Roke’s opponent get dragged out of the ring. He glanced towards the sun and shrugged, “Eh. Too hot.”

“I’d love to see someone knock him out,” Rey grumbled. “I swear, Aletha was the only thing keeping his ego in check and now she’s gone, he’s insufferable.”

“Hey, Luke, why don’t you fight him?” Quom suggested. “I bet that would be a good show.”

Luke glared at Quom, “Yeah… Too good a show.”

“Oh,” Quom understood.

“I think it’d be fun,” Teng said. “You’re a good fighter, but nothing ground-breaking. Enough to take Roke, but not on the level of a Jedi.”

“Sweetheart,” Rey patted his arm, “just because you learned what that word means, doesn’t mean you have to use it in every sentence.”

“I don’t use it in every sentence.”

“You woke up this morning and said your dreams were as vivid as a Jedi’s,” Quom reminded. “You then used Jedi in a sentence sixteen times today. Teng, boy, I love you, but knock it off before I smother you in your sleep.”

“Quom, don’t kill Teng,” Luke ordered. “And Teng, for the record, Jedi have dreams just like everyone else. It’s Force Visions that get complicated.”
“Alright, who’s next?” Roke called to the crowd. “Who wants to take me on and win the prize?”

Rey rolled her eyes.

“Come on, there’s got to be one of you lot who thinks they can beat me.” Roke smirked, “What about you, Erso? Want to go a round?”

“And embarrass you in front of a crowd of people?” Luke said simply. “Perhaps some other day.”

“Tinadar?”

“I’m going to try to keep my biting people in the throats to once a month. Check back in a few weeks.”

Roke grinned at the younger pair, “What about you two? Think you can take on me?”

“No,” Teng said bluntly. “I’m not an idiot. I can take Toras Kern, but I sure as hell am not going to take on the Blobfish’s big fish.”

Rey chuckled.

Roke narrowed his eyes at her, “What about you, Girl? You’ve been mouthing off a lot lately. Show me what you’re made of.”

Luke gripped her eyes, “Absolutely not.”

She glowered at her father as the crowd chuckled, “Let go of me, Dad.”

“Rey,” he chastised.

“How am I supposed to get any respect around here if you three won’t let me fight my own battles?”

“Roke is not someone to prove your point with.”

“Come on, Princess,” Roke jeered. “Let’s go a round.”

“Leave her alone!” a voice called across the ring.

A simmering fury set upon Roke’s face as he turned to face the person who dare challenge him, “Something to say, Dirk?”

Usually that look on Roke’s face would send Dirk scurrying for cover, but not this time.

“Leave her alone,” Dirk firmly repeated.

Roke blinked, unable to process what was happening before him. Dirk of all people was challenging him? The thought literally made him laugh.

“Leave her alone?” Roke chuckled. “What, am I messing with someone under your protection?”

“Yes.”

Rey scowled. In all her years on Jakku, not once had she seen Dirk challenge anyone, not seriously anyway. Dirk was a wall of muscle, but honestly, one never used. If Plutt needed someone to throw a punch, Roke was his go-to. If he could fight, no one in Niima had ever seen any evidence of it.

“Well, then,” Roke leaned casually on his staff, “why don’t you show me what you’ve got?”
Something fearful and panicked flashed in Dirk’s eyes.

He looked to the ground, “I can’t.”

“Come on, Big Guy,” Roke laughed. “Let’s go a round.”

“Leave him alone,” Rey shouted.

Roke looked back to her and grinned, “Alright then, if you two want to keep running your mouths, how about a little deal? Either Dirk comes and fights me like a man, or I drag Princess her by the hair into the ring and fight her myself.”

Luke’s eyes narrowed, and a growl came from Quom that made everyone take a step away from him.

“Don’t do this, Roke,” Luke warned. “If you touch my daughter-”

“You’ll do what?” Roke challenged. “See, here’s the thing Erso, I don’t think you’re going to do anything to me. At least not much. Concealing your true identity is far more important than a scavenger’s squabble. You may kick my ass, but you’re not going to make me pay. Besides, how is she ever going to learn on her own how to fight?”

“Let me do this, Dad,” Rey insisted. “I can prove myself to this town-”

“Then fight me yourself,” Roke said.

Luke took a deep breath, “No.”

Roke just shook his head, “And they call you a hero.”

“Because I know when not to fight,” Luke replied. “Come on, Everyone. Let’s go back to the shop.”

Luke and Quom started to make their way through the crowd, but suddenly Teng’s voice called out.

“Rey, no!”

They whipped back around to see Rey climbing into the fighting ring.

“Rey, stop!” Luke ordered, racing forward.

She had closed her hand upon a staff from the weapon rack the fighters were allowed to use for matches when someone grabbed her shoulder.

“Go to your father,” Dirk sternly ordered. “I’m doing this.”

Rey opened her mouth to object, but the serious look in his eyes made her stop. She nodded, gave him the staff, and exited the ring to meet her very unhappy father.

Dirk took a deep breath and turned to face Roke.

“So you’re actually fighting me,” Roke laughed. “That’s a first. I’ve been here over a decade, and I don’t think I’ve ever seen you fight.”
“Boss didn’t want me to.”

“Nah, I suppose it’s all about image with you. All muscle but no brains. I’m surprised you have the mental faculties to be protective of someone.”

Dirk narrowed his eyes, “You don’t touch her.”

“Maybe not today, but let’s see what you get. I bet this will be easy; too easy. Why don’t we play this fair and you take the first shot?”

“Are you sure about that?”

“Be my guest.”

The pair stood before each other, staffs ready to clash, eyes locked tightly. Kerlos Slarga – recovering from his own injuries after fighting Roke – made the usual announcements. When he told the pair to ready themselves, Dirk gave a small head bow and gestured to Roke with his fore, middle, and ring fingers pointed out and fitted neatly together.

Luke frowned. Where had he seen that gesture before?

Kerlos looked between the pair, “Annnndddd…. GO!”

Rey blinked and missed everything. It was one blurry but fluid motion. Dirk’s staff cracked against Roke’s skull, hip, and then took out his knees. In two seconds, he landed three perfect hits.

And he was only getting started.

The crowd watched in stunned silence as Dirk savagely but efficiently took Roke down. There was no time to reaction, nor defend himself. Roke was just scrambling to dodge blow after blow. It was dramatic the way Dirk fought, and something mechanical.

And it Luke, it was also very familiar. But where had he seen it before? It was a person for sure, but as much as he wanted to say it was a man, half of his mind insisted it was a woman.

The match was very short, maybe five minutes tops. The next thing anyone really knew was that Roke was unconscious on the ground, and Dirk was standing awkwardly over him.

Dirk looked shyly over Rey for approval, “Did I win?”

The entire crowd burst into applause.

Dirk smiled as he took in the adoring crowd. He especially loved the way Rey was jumping up and down and hollering. A few people even started to chant his name when Kerlos proudly declared Dirk the winner. No one had ever taken down Roke physically before, only Aletha had managed to beat him through cunning. It filled the people of Niima Outpost with joy to see the towel bully finally defeated.

Looking around the ring at the cheering crowd, Dirk let the adoration get to him. Luke clapped loudly as Dirk held up a fist in victory. Then Dirk gave a bow, stretching his arms out to the sides with each hand having his fore, middle, and ring fingers pointed out and fitted neatly together.

Luke stopped clapping. He knew where he had seen that gesture before. Not only that gesture, but the one he had made to Roke before the match, and the fighting style he had used during the match.

He had seen them whenever Alyla and Gavyn Kene fought, a remnant from the slave days.
Dirk had been a slave in the Zygerria Fighting Pits.

Luke felt a hand on his shoulder, and he turned to see Alyla Kene standing next to him.

“It is as you believe,” Alyla said softly. “Dirk was one of us.”

And then she walked away.

“Alyla!” Luke called out, chasing after her as she disappeared behind a tent.

Teng and Quom frowned at each other as Luke took off.

Rey shrugged, “Just chasing after a ghost.”

Teng opened his mouth and then closed it, “Oh.”

“Just another day with the Erso insanity,” Quom patted Teng on the shoulder.

________________________

She had disappeared behind the group of tents where Quom’s workshop was. When Luke arrived among the row, he saw her duck into the workshop. Maybe if he ran fast enough he could reach her before she disappeared.

Luke threw open the tent flap and came to a screeching halt. Sitting there on a work bench was the last person he thought he’d see.

“Ben?”

To be clear, it was not Ben Solo. Rather it was a very young-looking Obi-Wan Kenobi glowing blue with longer ginger hair and beard.

Luke glanced behind himself, looking for whom, he wasn’t certain. He stepped into the tent and joined Obi-Wan on the bench.

“I’m sure you have many questions,” Obi-Wan began.

“Several.”

“I will try to answer what I can, but I am not here to reveal all to you. There are some parts of this that you will need to learn at a later time, some parts which Alyla must explain to you herself, and some parts which no one yet has the answers to. But I will try, Luke.”

The corner of Luke’s mouth lifted, “No certain points of view?”

Obi-Wan smiled, “Not this time. Now, which question presses most on your mind?”

As a man nearly fifty, Luke hoped he had gained decorum and self-control with age. Yet he found himself blurting out the first and most ridiculous question in his head.
“Why do you look young?”

Obi-Wan laughed, “You have your father to thank for that. I decided that if he got to go around visiting people in his prime, so do I. It just… took a while for me to figure out how to alter my appearance. I always did say your father was a natural with Force Abilities.”

“Admittedly this family is also very vain with their appearances.”

“Yes, that too. You should see Padmé. I do not understand how one can be in the netherworld of the Force and yet still has more outfits in a month than I had in a lifetime.”

Luke paused, waiting for the voice of Anakin Skywalker to mock his old mentor’s wardrobe, yet nothing came.

“Where is my father?” Luke asked.

“Anakin is… unhappy with these developments,” Obi-Wan answered. “He thought it best to direct his attentions elsewhere as to not reveal anything he shouldn’t.”

“Is Alyla where he’s been spending all his time over the past few years?”

Obi-Wan shifted awkwardly, “…Among other things.”

Luke sighed, “Even when you come to give me answers you’ve always managed to be vague.”

“There are things you cannot always share with those you care about. You’re going through with the same situation with your daughter.”

“Honestly, I’m surprised she hasn’t figured it all out yet. I mean, she knows I have a sister, whose name she would know, a brother-in-law, again who she would know, that owned a Corellian freighter where a Wookiee was employed. That we have visions and do something that is quite clearly a mind trick. I have a mechanical hand, lived on a desert planet, and am named Luke. People fear me, and we have money. She has a cousin, she knows the names Brendan and Felicity Rhiaon… seriously, how has she not put it together yet?”

“The Force will not allow her to uncover the truth until the time is right. Just like how you could not truly sense that Leia was your sister until I told you about your twin.”

“So the Force is basically waiting for my go-ahead before my daughter’s mind puts together something that at this point should be a very simple mystery?”

“There are downsides to being so strong with the Force,” Obi-Wan said. “Such as this. The Force can have quite the hold over your mind. If the Force doesn’t want her to figure it out until the lull is over, then Rey unfortunately will not learn it until then.”

“That’s… actually kind of a relief,” Luke admitted. “I’m glad she won’t find out until I tell her myself.”

Obi-Wan was silent.

“The future is still in motion, but there is a chance that she might not exactly hear it from you.”

“Excuse me?”
“Honestly, there are about seven different ways this could go. It’ll be interesting to see which one plays out.”

“Oh good. That weight’s back on.” Luke sighed, “Alright, I suppose we should focus on what you came here to discuss. What is going on with Alyla?”

“I’m afraid you’ll have to be more specific.”

“Is she a ghost like you?”

“No, not like I am. Nor like what Qui-Gon Jinn became. This is something different altogether… and I wouldn’t quite call her a ghost.”

“Perhaps a phantom. There but not quite… it’s very complicated.”

“Did you seriously just come here to tell me that you can’t actually answer my questions and I should let this go until the Force wishes it and just deal with this phantom menace?”

“I am quite happy you ended up with your mother’s intelligence.”

“Obi-Wan,” Luke sighed, “I can’t just let this go. Not when she’s talking to Rey and telling her about Ben.”

“Master Yoda and I have already spoken to her about the need for restraint. She will not be revealing anymore personal history of Rey or Ben to each other.”

“Each other? Does she visit Ben?”

“It’s…”

Luke raised an eyebrow, “Complicated?”

“You’ve seen what remains of her Signature,” Obi-Wan said. “She’s… bound to him.”

“Why does she visit Rey and I, then?”

“I believe she’s made an arrangement with Ben Solo.”

Luke’s eyes widened, “He knows of us?”

“No,” Obi-Wan assured. “As far as Ben Solo knows, Luke Skywalker is on Ahch-to, Leia Organa is on Hosnian Prime, Han Solo is who knows where, and both Rey and Felicity Rhiaon Skywalker are dead.”

“Wait, you just discussed someone’s living status.”

“In the context of another’s point of view, yes.”

“Then in Ben’s point of view, is Alyla one with the Force?”

“I cannot answer that,” Obi-Wan shook his head.

“Come on, Obi-Wan. Is she dead or not?”

“You know I cannot reveal the current living status of another person.”
“Oh, please,” Luke rolled his eyes. “Do I have to go throw myself off a Star Destroyer to be on the bridge between life and death to get some actual answers?”

“Luke, if I could discuss the living status of a person, you and I would be having a very different conversation right now.”

“Ben, please-”

“Enough,” Obi-Wan said calmly but firmly. “This is not your story, Luke. This isn’t even Rey’s. In time you will learn the truth, but you are just a footnote here. Leave it alone, and one day the Force will reveal all.”

And with that, Obi-Wan Kenobi disappeared.

Luke sighed, “Well… That was kind of pointless.”

“I still can’t believe it,” Rey and Teng were busy congratulating Dirk as Quom went off to go find Luke. “That was amazing. Where did you learn to fight like that?”

“It’s a… long story,” Dirk shifted uncomfortably as two scavengers fought each other in the ring behind them.

“Well, I tell you what, if I fought like that no one would mess with me.”

“I could teach you,” Dirk offered.

“Really?” Rey asked.

“If you want. You’d be good with a staff.”

“She is very nimble,” Teng nodded.

Rey frowned, “Is that an innuendo?”

“Honestly I don’t know. The furthest we’ve gone is clothed minor groping.”

“Yeah, because you said you wouldn’t do anything more until I was sixteen and a ‘more reasonable age’ or something like that.”

“You can wait two months, then you can have all the non-minor groping you want… Please, God don’t let your father be standing right behind me.”

“No, you’re safe,” Dirk said. He pointed behind Teng, “But there is someone else.”

Rey frowned and turned to see Devi and Strunk approaching them.

“Oh good,” Teng slung an arm around Rey’s waist, “your favorite person.”

“Rey!” Devi waved, racing up to her. “Wasn’t that amazing?”

“Dirk was wonderful,” Rey stiffly answered. “Hello Strunk.”

“Hey,” Strunk nodded.
Devi grinned as she looked between Rey and Teng, “What’s this? Didn’t you insist to me that Malar wasn’t your boyfriend?”

“At the time, the report was true,” Rey replied. “Developments have happened since then.”

“I’d say. Atta boy, Malar,” Devi winked. “Guess I can’t get my claws in you anymore.”

Teng had to hold back a laugh as Rey suddenly wrapped her arms around him possessively like he was a toy Devi was about to snatch away.

“Just cut to the chase, Devi,” Rey held Teng tight.

“I’m really surprised about today,” Devi said. “I thought you didn’t want to fight in the ring, and yet there you were about to fight Roke. Does that mean you’ve thought about my offer?”

Teng frowned, “What offer?”

Before Rey could stop her, Devi launched into an explanation of her fighting ring proposal.

“Wow, that’s… admittedly a good idea,” Teng said. He looked down at Rey, “You wanna take her up on it?”

“No! …Yes. Maybe? I don’t know. Today was just a heat of the moment thing, but if I could get people around here to take me seriously on my own merits… But I don’t want to drag you in on anything you don’t want.”

Teng shrugged, “I’m game. Strunk, you wanna go a round?”

“Sure,” Strunk nodded. “I get portions for it, right?”

Devi patted his arm, “We’ll talk about it later.”

“If you wanna do it, Rey, I can help you,” Dirk offered. “We could start those lessons as soon as you want.”

Devi bit her lip, “You’re going to teach her?”

Rey narrowed her eyes, “Is that a problem?”

“No,” Devi said quickly. The gears were turning in her mind, recalculating plans of action. “That would be fine.”

Rey had a bad feeling about this.

“So, do we have a deal?” Devi asked.

Rey looked over to see where Roke had been dragged to get his wounds tended to. She had come so close to showing this town what she was made of, and yet what had happened? Another man had once again stepped in to save her. She had to put a stop to this. Rey had been working so hard to get her fighting skills up, and if Dirk helped her perfect it, she just might have a chance.

But still, she knew she couldn’t trust Devi, and she remembered the way Luke and Aletha had both reacted to the idea of her in the fighting ring. Maybe this wasn’t such a good idea.

Yet it was a tempting one.
“Can I give you an answer tomorrow?” Rey asked.
Devi’s face lit up, “Of course. Take all the time you need. Want to talk to your father first?”
“No… I had someone else in mind.”

Kaydel woke to find the blankets over her and Poe smiling down at her.
“Good morning,” Poe murmured.

“Morning,” Kaydel blinked, trying to get her bearings. As her mind took in the mess of clothing on the floor, flashes of pleasure from the previous night entered her mind. She was laying in Poe’s bed, both still naked under the sheets and tangled in the other’s warm and soft embrace. “Were you watching me sleep?”

“I woke up a few minutes ago and didn’t want to wake you.”

“It’s still creepy, Poe.” Kaydel sat up and smoothed down her hair, “What time is it?”

“It’s morning. Don’t worry, neither of us have shift yet,” he placed a set of three kisses upon her bare shoulder. “You look just as beautiful in daylight as moonlight.”

“Aren’t you charming this morning?”

“I’m Poe Dameron. I’m always charming,” he sat up and pulled her into his arms.

“Charming, really?” Kaydel wrapped her arms around his neck. “Because last night there were certainly a lot of moments I would have used the term vulgar over charming.”

“And the vulgarities that came out of your mouth were quite astounding. You kiss your mother with that mouth?”

“No, but I kiss you,” Kaydel leaned forward and pulled him into a kiss. Their tongues danced as Kaydel wove her hands in Poe’s hair, pulling him in closer for more of that delicious taste of his lips. She murmured against his lips as they broke for air, “How much longer do we have until the point where we would miss breakfast?”

“About thirty minutes,” Poe slipped a hand beneath the blanket, and stroked her thigh. He tried not to shudder as Kaydel gently rubbed her bare breasts against his chest.

“Thirty minutes, huh? I bet we could manage something in twenty.”

Poe chuckled, “Well, you lot in Communications are always looking for efficiency.”

He wasted no time in bringing her lips to his once more and claiming her mouth with his tongue. Kaydel moaned as Poe slowly pushed her back on the bed, peppering kisses from her lips to her jawbone, neck, collar, and down the tops of her breasts.

Kaydel’s breath hitched as his mouth moved lower down her chest until he was just about to take her nipple between his lips. He drew a tongue over her sensitive nub, and Kaydel lifted her back to offer her chest more to him.

The door slid open and an elegant woman with bright purple hair waltzed right into the room without
“What the hell?” Poe exclaimed as he and Kaydel scrambled for composure. There was nothing they could do about their clothing all over the room – to his horror, Poe realized he had accidentally flung Kaydel’s bra over the bedside lamp – but thankfully they were covered by the blankets and could protect some level of modesty.

“You must be Commander Poe Dameron,” the woman said pleasantly, completely unaffected and unashamed of having walked in on such an intimate moment.

“Yeah, I am,” Poe snapped at her. He pulled up the blankets to shield Kaydel a little more, “Who are you, and what the hell do you think you’re doing? These quarters are private!”

“I’m Vice Admiral Amilyn Holdo,” the woman introduced. “I’m your commanding officer until Commander Nalto recovers. I know it’s a little early to get the day started, but I always like to run things a little tighter and little more on schedule than General Organa. I know she has Commanders report to her between nine and ten, but I expect all Commanders to be cognisant enough to report at exactly nine. Since it was 9:20, and you are now acting Head of Air Force, I thought it prudent to come find you and discuss the latest reports. As acting head, I have the master code to sleeping quarter doors and let myself in.”

Poe just stared at her in utter amazement, “Forgive me. No one informed me that we weren’t running on the same schedule as everyday where I report in at 10:30, regardless of if I’m acting in Commander Nalto’s position or not. I will report in at 9 am tomorrow if you wish, but you can’t just go barging into my sleeping quarters uninvited. I could be busy with… exactly this situation.”

“Yes, on that subject,” Holdo eyed Kaydel, “what is your name, rank, department, and position?”

Kaydel blinked, horrified that she was being interrogated by the Resistance’s Third-in-Commander, while naked in bed with a commanding officer.

“Speak up, Dear, we don’t have all day,” Holdo urged.

“Lieutenant Kaydel Ko Connix, Junior Controller, Communications under Taslin Brance.”

“Oh good, not a pilot then,” Holdo said pleasantly.

“What can I say?” Poe chuckled. “I like my adventures in the sky, but my bed and women on the ground.”

The deathly look Kaydel gave him in response made Poe think she wouldn’t be joining him in said bed for a very long while.

“Commander Dameron,” Holdo smiled, “not to overstep my bounds, but I advise you reconsider this arrangement. I’m not certain if this is a committed relationship or a one night stand, but sleeping with your subordinates – regardless of the department – is never a good idea. You don’t want things to get messy or abuse your position of power.”

Poe narrowed his eyes, “You’re saying I can’t have consensual sex with my fiancée?”

Kaydel’s eyes widened.

“Oh?” Holdo asked. “She’s your fiancée? I suppose it’s not a problem then.”

“No, she’s not my fiancée,” Poe said. “But why would that make a difference? You said committed relationships aren’t a good idea. Throw marriage into the mix and somehow that makes it okay?”

“I don’t mean to meddle.”

“Then don’t,” he cut off coldly.

Holdo’s eyebrows knitted together; she bristled at being challenged, “Commander Dameron, I am your commanding officer. You can’t speak to me like that.”

“And you can’t barge into my room, tell me you’ve switched the reporting schedule without telling me, lecturing me about tardiness according to your standards and not the ones to which I have been previously been held to, and then criticize my relationship with the woman I love, and then tell me I shouldn’t make love to my own girlfriend who is not my subordinate in any respect. Kaydel does not report to me, nor work in my department. Are you going to go around to every couple in this organization and tell them they have to split up? I’m sure General Organa and her husband, Captain Solo would love to hear that.”

“No, I’m not going to tell married couples to split up.” Holdo shot. “But I was going to have a chat with a few interdepartmental couples about how unwise it would be to pursue a relationship. My first couple was actually going to involve Commander Nalto. Apparently he’s been flirting with a nurse.”

“Oh.” Holdo smiled at Kaydel the false political one she saved for people she did not like. “That explains a few things.”

Clearly she wasn’t taking a liking to Poe and Kaydel.

Which was good, because both would be absolutely comfortable to say they did not like her.

“Well, Commander,” Poe tried to keep the bitterness from his voice, “if you would like to discuss the paperwork with me, I’d be happy to report to you. Allow me to make myself presentable, and I’m come straight to you.”

“Alright, but don’t take too long,” Holdo said. “I’ve heard how long you can take to perfect your appearance. Remember, war is no place for vanity.”

“Of course,” Poe grinned at her. “I’m sure you were glad to be naturally born with eyeshadow and purple hair.”

Holdo scowled at him, “Twenty minutes, Dameron. I’ll be waiting.”

“Yes, Ma’am,” Poe saluted as she stormed out of the room. When the door locked, he sighed and hit the pillow.

“Poe?”

“Yeah, Babe?”

“Can we start calling her the purple-haired bitch too?”

“You read my mind.”
Kaydel couldn’t stop smiling as she and Poe exited the room and said goodbye. They must have kissed a thousand times before, yet his lips always tasted so good.

Too good.

“Are you wearing lip balm?” Kaydel frowned.

“You would not believe how chapped my lips get in atmosphere,” Poe explained. “We got drills later.”

“But flavored lip balm?”

“If this relationship is going to work, you’ve got to understand I have no notions of masculinity restricting me from indulging in skincare, haircare, and other such things. I actually put on makeup when I know I’m going to be photographed.”

Kaydel smirked and fixed his collar, “You know, I got bored a couple weeks ago with Aunt Ally. We decided to look up the meanings of the names in our family to see if we could at least justify some of our names. Weirdly enough Aletha means truth and Alecta means honesty.”

“How is this relevant?”

“Because I looked up your name,” she ghosted her lips over his, gripping his shirt lightly. “Dameron means Lord or Master, very fitting for a commanding officer. But Poe… means peacock.”

Poe chuckled, “Oh no.”

“You, Commander Dameron are quite the peacock,” she gave him a peck on the lips. “No, go, my peacock, and try not to peck out Vice Admiral Holdo’s eyes.”

“I make no promises,” Poe gave her one last kiss before setting on his way. He was surprised when Kaydel set him off with a light swat on the butt. Poe shook his head, “I love you.”

“I love you too,” Kaydel called.

He waved right before disappearing around the corner, and she sighed in contentment.

“Someone’s doing the walk of shame,” Jessika Pava chuckled as she walked down the hallway.

“More a strut of pride,” Kaydel grinned. The pair weren’t friends, but they were friendly enough.

“Hey, I gotta ask,” Jessika eyed the hallway Poe had disappeared down. “For all his egotism… he any good?”

“Jess… I think he may have ruined me for other men.”

Kaydel was walking down the hallway alone, planning on changing before getting something to eat and reporting in for the day. She was lost in thoughts of love and memories of the previous night. She wished that Aletha was here to discuss it with her, but at least she had Paige to talk to, provided Rose wasn’t also in the room. The girl wouldn’t stop the conversation, but she would blush up a storm in the corner, making Kaydel want to stop for another time.

Rose was a nice girl, but she had some growing up to do.
Who could Kaydel really talk to about this is Paige were unavailable?

A beeping suddenly came from her pocket.

Kaydel frowned and dug a silver comm from her pant pocket. It was Kira’s comm. She had completely forgotten that she found it in Aletha’s room yesterday. Must have fallen out of her bag.

Taking a quick look around that no one was present, Kaydel pressed the talk button, “Hello?”

“Kaydel?” Kira asked from the other end.

“Morning,” Kaydel smiled. “Or whatever time of day it is for you.”

“It’s the afternoon. Why are you answering Aletha’s comm?”

“Oh, Kira, I’m so sorry,” Kaydel winced. “Aletha’s not here right now. Yesterday, she got called away on a super important mission for two months. I found the comm in her room, on the floor and meant to give it to her, but she was gone by them. I think she dropped it. I know she wouldn’t abandon this on purpose.”

“Could you send it to her?”

“Sorry, Kira. No communications in or out. You’ll have to go without her for two months.”

“Oh… that’s too bad.”

Kaydel frowned, “But hey, if you need someone to talk to, I could always lend an ear. How about I keep the comm on me until Aunt Ally gets back?”

“Could you?” Kira asked. “That would be great! This whole talking with females thing is the only thing keeping me sane at the moment, I swear.”

“Anytime you want… well, except if I’m getting lucky. Then you can wait.”

“How about we cross that bridge when you and Poe actually get at it?” Kira teased.

“Actually as of last night, I got it… a few times actually.”

“Really? Tell me everything. Or at least what you’re comfortable with.”

“Will do, but first let’s deal with you. Why’d you call?”

“Oh, Devi made me the fight offer again, and I think I might want to take it,” Kira said. She then explained all the new developments to Kaydel, and asked, “What do you think? I know Aletha was against me fighting, but if Dirk trains me, I might have a shot.”

“You might,” Kaydel thought about it. “The problem is Devi. Sounds like the girl is up to something, and do you really want to start getting in the rink with other scavengers? It sounds like a good way to make enemies. Plus, if I tell you to go for it, my aunt will strangle me.”

“She won’t strangle you… She’ll drug you, lie about it, and then reveal the truth when it’s a moment too late.”

“Aunt Ally does drug people a lot. I should probably report that… but then she’ll drug me. You know, my family doesn’t handle conflict well.”
“Neither does mine. I think that might be how I ended up on Jakku.” Kira sighed, “I just wish I could get an outside opinion on how this sounds. Someone who doesn’t know about gangster dynamics and can just tell me at face value if it’s a good idea to fight Devi.”

“You mean someone whose opinion isn’t affected by the knowledge their aunt would kill them and/or drug them if they told you yes?”

“Exactly.”

“Actually…” Kaydel glanced down the hallway. “I have an idea.”

“I say kick her ass.”

“Jessika!”

“Don’t you Jessika me, Paige. It’s the only way to assert her dominance.”

“Please there’s the whole keep your enemies close aspect,” Kaydel agreed. “If Devi is going to pull something, at least you’ll be expecting it.”

Jessika looked to the girl on her left, “What do you think, Rose?”

“Honestly, I don’t know,” Rose admitted. “I was just in the room when you two came in.”

Rose and Paige Tico had been very surprised when Kaydel suddenly entered her and Paige’s room, dragging in Jessika Pava, and demanding their opinions of fighting matches on Jakku.

Even weirder was the voice coming from the small silver comm the four girls were seated around on Kaydel’s bed.

“Well, if you were in my position,” asked the voice on the comm, “what would you do?”

Rose sighed, “What’s her name again?”

“Kira,” Kaydel supplied.

She nodded, “Kira… I think I’d do it.”

Paige blinked in surprise, “You would?

“You wouldn’t?”

“Of course not.”

“What did Mom and Dad teach us?” Rose said. “Never stand idly by and let someone take advantage of the people and places around you. Stand up for yourself and stand up for others.”

“Yeah, that’s why we’re in the Resistance, Rose,” Paige replied. “I don’t think they meant duels on Jakku. Besides, violence should always be the last resort. Honestly, if I had my way, violence wouldn’t be used at all.”

Jessika scowled, “Paige, you’re on the bomb squad.”

“I said if I had my way, not that I was actually a pacifist.”
Then you’re all agreed?” Kira asked. “I should take up Dirk’s offer and fight Devi?”

“Show of hands for those agreed?” Jessika directed.

She and Rose raised their hands.

“Those opposed?”

Paige raised her hand.

“And those for it but voting against in fear their aunt will tranq them if not?”

Kaydel raised her hand.

“There you have it,” Jessika smiled at the comm.

There was a long silence from Kira.

“You... you guys know I can’t see you, right?”

“Oh,” Jessika deflated. “Rose and I are yes, Paige is no, and Kaydel fears tranqs.”

“Then I guess I’m doing it,” Kira chuckled. “You know, I really appreciate this. I think I’ve never literally spoken to these many girls my age. It’s nice.”

“Well anytime you need a council of girl, let me know,” Kaydel said.

“Kira’s Council,” Paige laughed. “I like that. Kaydel’s right, anytime you need some big sisters or whatnot, I’m game.”

“Same,” Rose nodded. “It’s nice to meet a girl actually my age... even if you’re just a voice on a comm.”

“It’s agreed then,” Jessika declared. “We’re Kira’s Council. Now, let’s discuss the fact that a certain Lieutenant Connix is wearing the same uniform as yesterday.”

“Oh, let’s hear it,” Paige chuckled. “How was Poe?”

Rose shifted, “Do I... Do I have to stay for this?”

“Do you believe that sex belongs solely within the confines of marriage?” Jessika asked.

“No.”

“Do you believe that sex should never be discussed outside the people who did it?”

“No.”

“Are you just embarrassed that it involves someone with the status of Poe Dameron?” Kaydel asked.

“Yes.”

“Then you have to stay.” Paige patted her sister on the knee, “It’s the only way to get you to lighten up. Now... let’s talk foreplay. What did he choose, how long did he do it, and was he good? And keep in mind that if he treated you poorly, I’m going to kick his ass.”

“Based on the smile she had coming out of his room, I think he treated her very well,” Jessika smirked. “She told me he ruined her for other men.”

“I gotta hear this,” Paige grinned.

Kaydel played coy, “Oh, I don’t know… maybe I shouldn’t.”

“Come on, Kaydel,” Kira laughed. “Spill.”

So, that day “Kira’s Council” formed; a group of four young women in the Resistance happy to give advice and girl talk of any nature to a voice on a comm. Their voice, their Kira, their secret little scavenger on Jakku that no one in the Resistance knew they talked to on a regular basis. A voice they had no clue belonged to the long thought dead Rey Rhiaon Skywalker.

And when General Leia Organa found out four years later that they had secretly been communicating with her “dead” niece… she was pissed.

“Hey Dirk?”

He smiled when he saw Rey approaching him in the market the next day, “Hi, Rey. What’s up?”

“I just finished talking to Devi,” she said. “Teng and I are taking up her offer and will fight them in the ring on the day of my sixteenth birthday. Will two months be sufficient to train with you?”

Dirk grinned, “Let’s get started.”

Chapter End Notes

Coming Up Next Chapter…

Survival of the Fittest
The big day of the fight arrives, and Rey is not at all surprised when Devi screws her over. Kaydel is shocked by her aunt’s reaction when Aletha returns and discovers Kira’s Council.

Yes, for those who figured it out, I have made Yavinese just be Spanish. Sorry if there’s any errors, I’m just pulling phrases from websites.

And don’t ask where the sudden Kylo Ren smut came from… I have no freaking clue.
Survival of the Fittest

Chapter Summary

Diego considers his career options, Devi screws over Rey, and Kira’s Council plots mutiny.

Chapter Notes

So, a while back I picked up the book Poe Dameron Flight Log which is a counterpart to Rey’s Survival Guide. I’ve decided I’m also going to start pulling quotes from it now that Poe has become a central character. I promise not to add 17 more chapters of information I find in the book. Note, in quotes I will refer to it as Poe Dameron’s Flight Log instead of Poe Dameron Flight Log because it sounds better.

I will not be purchasing Cobalt Squadron because I know I would end up adding in 17 more chapters with information about Paige and Rose.

I saw TLJ again finally. I definitely like it better the second time, but I’m glad to see that the plotlines I decided on will make the story truly epic. I’ve mixed around some events, added meanings to others, put in new characters in some places, and put in some new storylines. It’s going to be amazing.

Dirty version on AO3.

TRIGGER WARNING: In this chapter Dirk does give a brief speech about slaves getting sexually abused. If you find this sort of thing triggering, please skip the first scene after the words AGE SIXTEEN.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

The Long Way Home

Chapter Forty-Two

Survival of the Fittest

Commander Dameron’s inspired efforts in this operation reflect his incomparable devotion to the principles of the Resistance and freedom-loving individuals across the galaxy. In this regard, the Resistance recognizes Commander Dameron with the Rieekan Ribbon for Bravery in Battle.

1. O. Statura
“My life is amazing.” Poe declared.

It was nearly midnight. His uniform was hung up in the closet with his brand-new ribbon proudly attached. His blankets were pushed on the floor, lying beside the clothing hastily discarded between the bed and the door. And wrapped around his naked body was the equally bare and breathtaking form of Kaydel Ko Connix.

“Great career with the promise of advancement, the best droid a guy could ask for, my mentors are my heroes, my squadron are fun people who generally obey my every command, my dad is the best dad a man could ask for, and I’ve found the girl of my dreams,” he sighed in contentment, playing with a lock of Kaydel’s golden hair. She had gotten into the habit of letting her hair down while they made love, and Poe loved running his fingers through her soft tresses. “What more could one ask for?”

“Not much,” Kaydel listened to the steady beating of his heart. “But I suppose there are a few things more you could have in life.”

“Kay, for the last time, I know it turns you on, but I am not doing that.”

“Don’t worry,” Kaydel laughed. “I gave up that fight two months ago. No, I meant more that… don’t you think there’s someone missing in your life?”

His happy moment crumbled inside, “Yeah, there is… I wish you could have met her.”

“My mom.” Poe looked down at her, “That’s who you meant, right?”

“No,” Kaydel sat up, angry at herself for not being more careful with her words. “I didn’t mean that.”

“It’s true though, she should be here.”

“She should, but her sacrifice is the reason this all happened. The reason we happened. If she didn’t die, there wouldn’t have been a Resistance, and who knows if we would have met?”

“We would have met,” Poe answered confidently. “The Force brought us together, and if I know one thing, it’s that when the Force decides to put people together, it won’t stop trying until they’re together.”

“What are you saying?” Kaydel ghosted her fingers over his chest. “That… we’re soulmates or something?”

“I know I love you more than I’ve ever loved someone before. It might be too soon to stamp soulmates on this, though. After all, we’ve only been going out for…”

Poe scowled.

Kaydel’s fingers stopped, “Did you forget how long we’ve been going out?”
“Uh… my life before you is nothing more than a distant dream?”

Her eyes bore into him.

“Sorry.”

“Four months, Poe,” Kaydel said. “We’ve been dating for four months.”

“Officially, yes,” he sat up. “But in my defense we were sort of unofficially dating for at least two month before that.”

“Alright, I’ll give you that.”

“So what were you meaning?”

“Hmm?”

“About someone missing?” Poe reminded.

“Oh, I was just thinking…” Kaydel considered her words. “Poe, do you have a best friend?”

“Yeah. BB-8.”

“Other than your droid?”

“Well… I don’t know. I haven’t really thought about it. Maybe… maybe Snap or Jessika. Although you’ve taken over Jessika lately.”

“That’s exactly what I mean,” Kaydel said. “I’m frequently spending time with Paige and Rose and Kira and Jessika, and you’ve got… a droid. Something literally programmed to like you and do what you want.”

“BB units have protocol that if they’re mistreated by masters, they stop obeying them.”

“Poe… Come on. Who are the people you spend time with? Who are your friends?”

He thought about it for a long time, “I guess if I had to pick, my closest friends are Snap, you, BB-8, General Organa, and my father.”

“And that’s the problem.” Kaydel sighed, “Your subordinate, your girlfriend, your droid, your boss, and your parent. Do you have anyone who is just… your friend? Someone who has your back without any other motivation whether it be professional, computer directive, or non-platonic love?”

“I… I never really thought about it,” Poe confessed. “I don’t… I don’t think so. It’s hard to make friends around here because I’m the son of the woman who died for the Resistance to form, and I’m also the boss of a lot of people. You can’t just set aside rank when you live on a military base.”

“I know, but I just want you to have someone.”

“Well, until then, maybe I can at least have you.”

“Alright, but I’m not doing guy talk with you,” Kaydel teased. “It’s sort of hard to objectively discuss things like your girlfriend’s skill in bed when you’re talking to said girlfriend.”

“Is that what you girls talk about?” Poe laughed. “My sexual prowess?”
“If it makes you feel better, the girls are really impressed. I think Kira’s been taking notes for when she and her boyfriend get down to it.”

Poe shook his head, chuckling. Then he stopped. Kira, the name registered in his mind. Kaydel had said it just a few minutes earlier, but his brain didn’t process it until just now.

“Who’s Kira?” Poe asked. “Are you talking to your sister?”

“What? Kyra? No,” Kaydel replied. “No, this is Kira with an isk instead of a yirt. She’s a girl on Jakku that Aunt Ally talks to. She’s going to be sixteen in a few days, and there’s no other girls on Jakku her age, so I have the girls talk to her about girl things. Kira’s Council we call ourselves.”

“That’s sweet, but how did this start?”

“Aunt Ally has a comm and Kira has the other. I’ve spoken to Kira a few times with Aunt Ally through her comm. On her way to her mission, Aunt Ally dropped the comm and I found it. Kira needed some advice, so I rounded up Jessika, Paige, and Rose, and the rest is history. But this is a secret, okay? Don’t go around telling people.”

“Why?” Poe asked.

“I’m not quite sure,” Kaydel shrugged. “Something to do with Kira. I don’t have all the details, but she’s in hiding from bounty hunters or something I figure.”

“What kind of trouble can a sixteen-year-old get into that would get bounty hunters after her?” His heart froze as he remembered the actions one sixteen-year-old boy had taken that destroyed the Galaxy, “Never mind.”

Kaydel placed a kiss on his cheek, “Thought about Rey again?”

“I just can never shake the feeling that somehow I played a part in Ben… Kylo doing what he did. Maybe if I hadn’t antagonized him so much that summer-”

“Stop,” she put a finger to his lips. “It’s not your fault.”

“I know it’s not, I just wish I could pretend it was. General Organa hurts so much over everything that happened.”

“It’s not your job to be her replacement son.”

“Says the one trying to bring in a replacement mother,” Poe teased.

“My mother threw me out of the house, and Aletha welcomed me with open arms despite knowing the risks,” Kaydel retorted. “I’m not going to call her mom, but she’s been far more a mom to me in the past nine months than my mother ever was. For goodness sake’s, my mother reused my dead sister’s name for me.”

“What are you talking about? Kaydel Ko is so much more different than Kaydel,” Poe teased.

“Ugh, don’t you start,” Kaydel rolled her eyes. “My sister Katha refuses to call me anything but Ko, and Keth loves to torment me by calling me Koko.”

“Koko,” Poe laughed. “Oh, I’m stealing that.”

“Whatever you say, Peacock.”
“Hey, I am very proud of the way I take care of myself.” Poe shifted his body over hers, “And if I remember correctly, so were you earlier tonight.”

“I guess I was,” Kaydel laughed, placing her hands on his shoulders as he shifted her legs apart, and placed his legs on either side of her hips. “I do have a very attractive boyfriend, don’t I?”

“I’m the one with the beauty in my bed.” Poe reached down and started to rub the head of his shaft across her lower lips, exciting them both.

Kaydel gasped as he hit her clit, “You do? Do you?”

Her nails tightened, digging into his shoulders. Kaydel’s slick desire was smeared along his quickly hardening cock.

“And what would you do to that beauty?”

Poe bent down and kissed her neck, “You’re sure that Doctor Kalonia said we’re both clean, and that we’re in the clear and we can forgo condoms?”

“If not, then the sex we had earlier was a big mistake.” Kaydel moaned and made gently thrusts up with her hips to rub her sex eagerly against his teasing cock. “My IUD will hold up. Please, Poe… Te deseo.”

“Fuck. You know I can’t resist it when you speak Yavinese,” Poe lowered his lips to her breast.

“Nor can I resist when you speak it,” she wove her fingers through his hair and cradled his mouth against her breast.

“Then hagamos el amor, Mi Amor.”

And he pushed inside of her.

“It was very hot,” Kaydel recounted the story to her friends the next night. “I don’t know what it is exactly, but there’s just something about him that would just make any girl succumb to his, uh… pleasures.”

There was a knowing chuckle from a pair of sisters and a voice on a comm, but Jessika Pava just frowned.

“I don’t know, Kay,” Jessika said, “I’m a lesbian, so it would take a lot to get me to succumb.”

“How are things going with Tallie, by the way?” Paige asked.

“Tallie?” Rose nibbled on some fruit from a large plate of snacks resting on the small table between Kaydel and Paige’s beds.

Rose gasped, “Is that even allowed?”

“No clue,” Kaydel grinned, “but I would love to see the love on Holdo’s face when she found out.”

“She still giving you and Poe trouble?” Kira asked from the comm.
“I cannot wait General Organa returns in the morning,” Kaydel said. “She and Poe are about two minutes away from tearing out each other’s throats. But I will be sad that Snap comes back.”

“Poe seemed pretty unhappy too,” Jessika teased. “You know, it’s nice that the girl I’m sharing my room with happens to also be the one I want alone time with.”

“Okay, I have to ask,” Paige said, “Tallie is only eighteen. When exactly did you two start up with all that?”

“What, you think people can’t do things until they’re eighteen?” Kira objected.

Paige stared straight at Jessika, “Yes, when their girlfriend is twenty-three.”

“Tallie is turning nineteen next week,” Jessika snapped. “And we’ve only been together for a couple of months. I wasn’t grooming her or anything. In fact, she approached me.”

“You’re lucky, Jess,” Kaydel sighed as she bit into a cube of cheese. “I’m going to miss having an empty room with Poe.”

Kira said, “I remember what that’s like. I was so disappointed when Dad and Quom found the X-Wing Teng and I were making out in, and wouldn’t let us got there alone anymore.”

“Ok, Kira, but it was also the X-Wing of Aletha’s dead husband,” Paige reminded. “It was kind of creepy.”

“Poe’s X-Wing,” Kaydel mused. “Now there’s a possibility.”

Rose scowled.

“If you have sex with Poe in his X-Wing, I tell my supervisor and he gets Poe’s ship blacklisted from the maintenance roster,” Rose threatened, sitting on Paige’s bed eating a cracker. She eyed the comm, “You know, Kira, I feel bad that we’re all snacking on this end and you’ve been eating nothing but rations for ten years.”

“What can you do?” Kira casually dismissed. “You know, I think I’ve literally never had fruit.”

Rose blinked, “That’s it, when you join us at the Resistance someday – which you totally are if I have to come find you myself, so don’t argue which me on that – I’m giving you a pear and a hug.”

“Deal,” Kira laughed. She wouldn’t admit which item she wanted more.

Kaydel shook her head, “You know, maybe it’s a good idea that Poe and I take a bit of a break from all the… physicality.”

“You mean all the sex?” Paige grinned.

“Fine, yes, all the sex.” Kaydel stretched out her legs, nearly kicking the comm off her bed, “With his room free and Holdo driving us nuts, Poe and I have been at it so much my… legs hurt.”

Jessika and Paige shared a gleeful look while Rose tried to hide a giggle behind her hands, and Kira openly laughed.

“Kaydel,” Jessika looked like she was about to cry from hilarity, “are you saying that your legs are stiff from spreading them too much?”

The girls couldn’t hold it back anymore, and all five burst into hysterical laughter. Kaydel’s face was a deep crimson, but still she laughed. However, she chucked a pillow at Jessika’s head for good measure.

“Well, you know what they say about Yavinese men,” Kaydel grinned wickedly. “Poe’s stamina is astounding. Plus he’s still pissed at Holdo for walking in on us and insulting me. Whenever he has the opportunity to clearly pull me away in front of her for some type of sex, by God does he take it.”

“You’re not exactly refusing it, Key,” Jessika teased.

“You don’t even know the half of it,” Paige grinned. “Tell them the desk story.”

“Oh God, not the desk story.”

“If you don’t tell them, I will.”

“I’m not telling it!”

“Paige?” Kira prompted.

“So one day Holdo comes into Communications-”

“Alright, fine!” Kaydel interrupted. She took a deep breath, “So one day Holdo comes into Communications, and she is mad. You see, Poe had done a mission and I worked coordination. Originally, it was supposed to be Commander Nalto, but he had a medical complication with his injury and Kalonia had to pull him in for another surgery.”

Jessika winced, “Geeze, how many surgeries is Nalto up to now? Seven?”

“I think nine,” Paige said. “You’ve heard what they’re saying about his position, right?”

“Girls, this isn’t the time,” Rose interrupted.

“Oh no, they can continue,” Kaydel offered.

“So one day Holdo comes into Communications absolutely raging about conflict of interest and broken promises, and how Poe stepped way out of line with this. Brance tries to explain the situation and how I was the only one available to run coordination at the time, but Holdo is having none of it. To make it worse, Poe was visiting my workstation at the time and we may have been in the middle of a stolen kiss or two.”

“Didn’t Nalto ban Poe from visiting you at your work station because he was,” Paige used air quotes, “proving to be too much a distraction?”

“That’s not… Shut up,” Kaydel replied. “So Holdo is mad, going on and on and not listening to explanations or even apologies. Poe was willing to concede that in that situation, he should have handed off command to the next in line if I was the only one available. But Holdo won’t hear it. Of course, this is making both of us mad, and I start getting defensive over Holdo saying that I apparently can’t be impartial enough to coordinate communications when my boyfriend is involved.”

“So I understand the story better, what exactly does that involve?” Kira asked.

“Basically I connect the comms from the base to the pilots, as well as between the pilots themselves,” Kaydel explained. “I monitor the integrity of the line connections, reroute and add in lines that are requested. So if Poe wanted to speak to the Bomb squad, I would connect the Bomber Commander in on the conversation. I also monitor that there are no enemies hacking into the lines, and monitor conversations for any signs of disobedience, mutiny, or violation of Resistance rules. I do not in anyway determine the actions of the flight crews, nor does Poe have any say in my position.”

“But what about the monitoring of the conversations?” Rose asked. “Would that be a place you could be biased?”

“That was Holdo’s sticking point,” Kaydel said. “What she refused to hear was that we had another, more junior officer doing the monitoring of the communication content. I was just the only one who could run the rest. It wasn’t good enough for Holdo, and she just goes on about how she called this, and it was a blatant show of disrespect to her considering our previous conflict. Poe at this point was getting riled up, and my focus turns to just getting him under control and not killing her. Then Holdo says something like I’m not going to stand around and let some insubordinate flyboy blatantly disrespect me, so he can disregard the rules and give benefits to his sidepiece of the week. I don’t care how good in bed she is Dameron. Keep it out of the workplace.”

The other girls gasped.

“Poe lost it,” Kaydel said dramatically. “Suddenly, I’m literally holding him back with the help of Brance as Poe is screaming until he is red in the face. He and Holdo are raging at each other, accusing each other of disloyalty, inability to lead, and even the word treason gets thrown around. Everything in the Communications Center comes to a stop as everyone watches the two of them nearly coming to blows. We get pilots, security officers, members of the High Council, everyone we can think of to break the two of them apart. Someone even almost called Kes Dameron at one point.”

“Kes Dameron?” Kira asked.

“Poe’s father,” Kaydel answered. “Since Holdo is third-in-command, and absolutely believes she has earned the position, she refuses to listen to anyone and disengage, insisting that she is in charge here and Dameron should be demoted and even arrested. I hear this beeping and look over in the corner of the room. Nine BB units have formed a barricade around BB-8 to stop him from going in and attacking Holdo to defend Poe.”

“Oh, okay, seriously, how have I not heard this story?” Jessika asked.

“You were away on a mission,” Paige answered. “Rose was off on a supply run herself.”

“How the hell is the Resistance still in one piece and Poe not only still in-charge, but recently just got a ribbon for his heroics?” Jessika shook her head.

“Why do you think they sent Poe off on that mission?” Paige grinned. “They were getting him away from Holdo.”

“But how did things end?” Rose questioned, a little excited by the story.

Kaydel laughed, “They had to pull rank on Holdo, and literally get Diego Nalto out of his hospital bed, recovering from surgery to come into the room and call Holdo and Poe off. Nalto gets them to calm down. He takes Holdo back to his office to have a conversation about all of this, and Poe gets taken off duty for the rest of the day to think about what he did.”

Paige chuckled, “And he thought about it all right.”

“What do you two do?” Kira asked knowingly.

“Well, Diego was actually kind of sweet about the whole thing to me,” Kaydel said. “He found me at dinner, took me aside, and we had a little chat. We agreed that the way things went weren’t exactly appropriate, and we’d take precautions in the future to avoid such incidents. He then told me that what Holdo said about me was not appropriate, and he wouldn’t let her, or anyone else treat me like that again. Diego said that since Aletha was gone, he would watch out for me, and that even when she got back, he was going to protect me.”

“Of course he is,” Rose laughed. “He’s going to be your uncle someday.”

“They’re not even dating,” Kaydel shook her head, but a smile was plastered on her face.

“You,” Kira said.

“Face it, Kay,” Paige said, “it’s only a matter of time.”

“Hey, Commander Nalto has always been very nice to me.”

“Yeah, but Poe hasn’t. Tell them what he did.”

“It was consensual,” Kaydel objected. She couldn’t wipe the mischievous smirk off her face, “But no, Poe wasn’t very nice that night… especially to Holdo. You see, he wanted some small form of revenge, but he wanted it in a way that Holdo wouldn’t know. That way whenever he looked at Holdo, he could remember and smirk. When she would ask him what the smirk was about, he’d say, nothing.”

“So?” Jessika pushed, getting impatient.

“So,” Kaydel gathered her courage to admit what happened, “Poe called in a few favors. He got a pill from Evan Tharel to help with… a certain form of endurance so he could last for a long time. Then he called in a buddy to cut the security feed to Holdo’s office, and had BB-8 as a lookout. And then Poe and I… broke into Holdo’s office and had sex on her desk.”

The girls gasped.

“For three hours,” Kaydel laughed hysterically, clutching a pillow to her chest. “We were running out of ideas of what to do.”

“I don’t believe this,” Kira said.

“I do,” Jessika said flatly. “If you told me that Poe Dameron broke into someone’s office and had revenge sex, I’d buy it.”

Rose frowned, “Didn’t she actually just say it?”

Jessika shrugged.

“So what happened?” Kira asked. “Did you two stay there all night? I didn’t even think a guy could go that long.”

“Hence the pill,” Kaydel answered. “And no… things sort of went off-script.”

Paige giggled, knowing what came next.

“What happened?” Jessika demanded.

Kaydel bit her lip, “We broke her chair.”
Rose gasped, “You didn’t!”

“She did,” Kaydel’s face had gone red. “Poe was really turned on by the whole revenge thing. Like almost to a frightening degree, and while I was more than okay for things to go that hard and rough… He went a little too hard at one point and I ended up on the floor with broken chair pieces.”

“What did you do next?” Kira asked.

“We handled it like any two mature adults would,” Kaydel said simply.

Jessika raised an eyebrow. “Got dressed, got the hell out of there, and denied any knowledge when confronted for answers?”

“Yep.” Kaydel shook her head, “Poe apologized to me for it, but I wasn’t all that unhappy. I knew that he just really hated Holdo and wanted to find a way to get back at her.”

“Well, in all fairness, Kay,” Paige said, “you hate Holdo too.”

“We all do,” Rose dared to say.

All the girls grinned at that.

“I’ve never met her and I don’t like her,” Kira agreed.

“She really is a bitch,” Jessika said. “I don’t care if she is some sort of war hero, I’ll never bow to her so-called form of leadership. I say that if, the Gods forbid, something major happens to General Organa and Commander Nalto, and Holdo is put in permanent command, we just mutiny.”

“Jessika!” Paige scolded. “Even saying that could get you arrested.”

“It’s true though, I don’t want her in charge.”

“Who would be in line after her?” Rose asked.

Kaydel answered, “It’ll depend on the circumstances, but I think Poe would actually be next in line.”

“All in favor of committing mutiny to put Poe Dameron in charge?” Jessika said.

Everyone raised their hands, even the reluctant Paige.

“So it is passed,” Jessika declared.

“What in the Seven Corellian Hells is going on here?”

All heads turned to see a completely confused, tired, and somewhat mortified Aletha Kymeri standing in the doorway.

She stared at the girls, “I go away for two months, and when I come back you’re planning a mutiny?”

“Aunt Ally!” Kaydel exclaimed, racing to the door to capture her aunt in a hug.

“It’s just a joke, Aletha,” Kira said.

Aletha frowned, “Who said that?”
“It’s just Kira,” Rose pointed to the comm.

Aletha’s heart stopped.

“Kaydel,” she whispered, “what is going on right now? Is that my comm? Is that… other people talking to Kira?”

At the look of horrified fury on Aletha’s face, Kaydel’s stomach dropped.

“Well,” she said nervously, “yeah.”

“No, I got it from your room—”

“You stole it?”

“No! You dropped it on your floor and I almost stepped on it when I was dropping off Commander Nalto’s flowers for you.” Kaydel paused, “Crap, I forgot to water those. Sorry about the dead bouquet.”

“Dead flowers are not the issue here, Kaydel!” Aletha snapped. “What is going on? Why are there people talking to Kira? How did they find out?”

“When I found the comm I put it in my pocket to give to you, but I couldn’t find you,” Kaydel explained. “When I learned you had left, I sort of forgot about the comm. The next morning, it went off in my pocket, and it was Kira wanting to talk to you. Since you weren’t here, I offered to lend an ear.”

Aletha frowned, “Why was it still in your pocket the next morning?”

“Because she banged Dameron that night and was wearing the same uniform the next day,” Jessika grinned.

“Jess!” Kaydel snapped.

Kaydel blushed, “Thanks.”

“Two, he treat you well?”

“Very well… and every time since. You know what they say about Yavinese men.”

“Or she will soon enough,” Paige whispered to Rose.

Aletha’s icy glare broke them into a fit of giggles.

“Stop that,” Aletha said shortly, a twinge of pink rising to her cheeks as she desperately pushed thoughts of Diego from her mind. “Third thing, you two are being safe, right?”

“Used protection until our screens came back clear,” Kaydel nodded. “We’re clean, monogamous, and shouldn’t have to worry about any MisCals.”

“Good. Fourth…” Aletha exploded, “How the hell does this lead to these girls, who I don’t even think I know, learning about Kira?”
“Well, actually, we’ve met,” Paige raised her hand. “You patched me up at the Battle of Valra. This is my sister, Rose that I told you about.”

“Hi,” Rose waved awkwardly.

“Hello, Dear,” Aletha sighed and gave Rose a small smile. She looked to Jessika, “And you are?”

“Hello, Jessika,” Aletha shook her head. “You better have a good reason for this, Kaydel. I am beyond mad right now. You know what I wanted to do tonight? Get something to eat, take a shower, see my niece, stalk what I could of Diego Nalto’s medical file – wipe that smirk off your face, Kaydel Ko Connix – and then get a good night’s sleep in a soft bed, because you can’t imagine my sleeping conditions for the past two months. Instead I have to deal with this. Now how the hell do they know about Kira?”

“It’s my fault, Aletha,” Rey spoke up from the comm. “I needed some advice, and wanted a second opinion other than Kaydel’s, so she rounded up some friends to provide feedback. I liked talking to girls my age, so I asked Kaydel to let me talk with her and them on a regular basis.”

“We’re Kira’s Council,” Rose tried to be helpful. She was not.

“A regular basis?” Aletha practically growled. “You’ve been letting a group of strangers talk to Kira on a regular basis?”

“Aunt Ally,” Kaydel took a step back. She had never seen Aletha this angry.

“Girls, could you please leave the room?” Aletha’s eyes didn’t stray from Kaydel. “I need to speak to my niece alone.”

Rose frowned, “But it’s Paige’s room too.”

“Come on,” Paige urged Rose up from the bed.

Aletha watched carefully as the trio exited the room. Kaydel could feel the tension grow with every footstep.

“You know they’re going to listen outside the door?” Kaydel said.

“Good,” Aletha replied. “I’ll want to speak to them after this.”

The happabores would be well cared for, with as much clean water as they wanted to drink, fodder to eat, and a cool pen out of the sun.

Sounds like a good life.

- Rey’s Survival Guide
“Aletha, should I go too?” Rey asked.

“Oh, no, we’re having a talk, young lady,” Aletha answered coolly. “I’m at you dropping an X-Wing on Teng levels of pissed off right now. Kaydel, how could you do this? What was the one thing I asked you to do about Kira? The only thing I have truly of you?”

Kaydel blanched as she remembered Aletha’s simple request, “You asked me… not to tell anyone about Kira.”

“Then why am I dealing with this situation?” Aletha folded her arms.

“Aletha,” Rey said nervously, “so I understand the context because I haven’t been fully informed of your relationship history with Kaydel, how bad is this situation? On a scale from Jarex kidnapping me to that time Quom accidentally shot you in the foot?”

Kaydel raised an eyebrow, “I have so many questions, but I’m legitimately afraid Aletha might kill me right now.”

“Kira…” Aletha answered, “we’re at Roke violating the black sheet rule level.”

“E chuta,” Rey whispered.

“Language!” Aletha scolded. She turned her attention back to Kaydel, “Kaydel… I’m not going to kill you. That would be very hard to explain, and I’m not cleaning up that mess.”

Kaydel gave a small flinch. She wasn’t sure whether or not she was supposed to laugh, but the idea of a family member hurting her wasn’t something she found funny.

Aletha’s eyes softened at the flinch, “Darling… Our family is screwed up. Between Alecta’s vendetta, Adrinna throwing us to the dogs, and what Deek and Dacken did to you simply because you have their mother’s name… we’ve got issues. And I’m fully aware that Adrinna’s beliefs of disciple were by no means sparing the rod. So, I want you to know that I will never lay a hand on you. This in-fighting and abuse has to stop. But that means I need to be able to trust you.”

Kaydel looked down in shame, her hand subconsciously pulling back her hair.

“Darling,” Aletha made a step forward and took Kaydel’s hands, “I love you. I am so happy that you found me. I want to be there for you more than anything… but I also promised that I would be there for Kira. I’ve known this girl since she was a scared five-year-old with the worst sunburn I had ever seen. I’ve literally shed blood for her, given her the food off my plate, and the clothes off my back for her. I love her like she was my own daughter. I left Jakku where I had a family and people who loved me, simply so that this girl could be safe. The fact that I brought you into the fold of that life shows how much I love and trust you.”

“I know,” Kaydel struggled not to cry. “I’m sorry.”

“I need to know that you won’t betray me.”

“I never meant to! I just forgot that you asked and thought I was doing what was best for Kira.”

“You can’t forget things like that, though. Kaydel, we’re in a war. This type of thing could literally cost lives. If I brought this forward to your commanding officer, the fact you couldn’t withhold confidential intel and protect an ally’s identity, not only could you be stripped of your rank, but you might be thrown out of the Resistance.”
“No, Aunt Ally, please don’t,” Kaydel begged.

“I won’t,” Aletha assured her. “And not just because I need to hide this to protect Kira. I forgive you this, Kaydel. But I need you to swear to me that you will never pull something like this again. If I say hush, you hush. You need to be more responsible. Listen to commands, pay attention to the subtle things… Not screw your boyfriend on a Vice Admiral’s desk because you’re mad at them.”

“…You heard that part, did you?”

“Yeah, I’ll be having a chat with this Holdo in the morning. No one messes with my niece.”

“Thanks, Aunt Ally,” Kaydel smiled. “Oh, and ask her what happened the morning after you left… and what she said about you.”

“You’ve piqued my interest, Kaydel,” Aletha said. “But Kaydel… I need you to keep this whole business a secret. Get the girls to be quiet, and no more Kira’s Council.”

“Aunt Ally!”

“No, Aletha please!” Rey cried out. “Please don’t cut them off.”

“Kira, you know that we have gone to incredible lengths to keep you safe,” Aletha said. “I made your father a promise to keep your identity secret and safe. Tapping down on this will contain the leak of information.”

“No, please!” Rey sobbed. “Aletha, I need my friends. You know how… boring and lonely it is on this planet. I don’t have a best friend anymore, he’s my boyfriend now. The dynamic has changed. And I only put up with Dad being mysterious and Quom pulling his antics for so long. Talking with these girls… it makes me feel normal. It makes me think there’s hope of some life beyond this dusty desert. I can’t live in the fantasy of Rebel heroes and harsh reality of a dangerous life of scavenging.”

Aletha closed her eyes, fighting back tears.

“I’m hungry, Aletha,” Rey wept. “I’m so hungry. I want something more than polystarch and vegmeat. At nights I freeze beneath a worn-out survival blanket, and in the day I sweat under a sweltering, unforgiving sun, my throat parched for water that there’s never enough of. I have thoughts and ideas I can’t share with the others, questions I need answers to – nothing major but just small things like are my breasts supposed to get sore around my period or is the thing my boyfriend likes weird? But when I talk to them… it all goes away. I’m a normal girl, sitting on a normal bed, feeling a normal temperature, wearing normal clothes, living a normal life, with normal levels of food and water, snacking on fruit and cheese and crackers just because I’m bored.”

Kaydel glanced at the platter of snacks on the table and felt guilty.

“Fruit, Aletha… I don’t even know what that tastes like. But for one stolen hour every night, I get to be that normal girl. I get to pretend. They’re my friends, Aletha. They truly are. Kaydel helps me with boys and hair. Paige is the big sister who frets too much but for your own good. Rose is almost exactly my age and we’re going through the same beats of boys and puberty but can still talk shop. And Jess is no nonsense, go out there and stand up for yourself, Kira, and talks about flying with me. They’re my friends, Aletha. I need them… please don’t take them from me.”

Aletha took a deep breath and locked eyes with Kaydel.

“Can they be trusted?” Aletha asked.
Kaydel nodded, “With our lives.”

Aletha sighed, “Alright. Girls? I know you’re listening at the door. Everyone get in here!”

There was a bit of a commotion on the other side of the door, scrambling to take position. It was an awkward re-entry into the room, a mix of pretending not to have been listening, apologizing for listening, and commenting on what they had listened to.

Aletha didn’t need to instruct them to do it, somehow the girls ended up standing in front of her in a straight line, hands folded behind their backs, standing at perfect attention.

“To be blunt, if I could control it, I would never have allowed this situation to happen,” Aletha started. “That said, it did happen, and something good has appeared to have come from this. I’m not going to stop this… Council. I won’t force friendship apart, but if this truly is friendship, I need you girls to honour that relationship. Kira’s situation is a precarious one. I don’t understand it fully myself. Maybe she’s part of a royal family that defied the First Order and they decided to kill them for it. Maybe she’s a child from the Stormtrooper program, whose parents rescued her and are hiding her from recapture. Hell, maybe she’s the long-lost daughter of Han Solo. I don’t know. What I do know is that the First Order killed her mother, and her father will do anything to stop the First Order from taking her away. By insisting upon keeping this Council, you make a vow to support this endeavour. To conceal her identity and draw people away from finding her. Anyone who isn’t prepared to fight to protect her, let me know now.”

The girls didn’t even flinch.

“Good,” Aletha smiled. “I want all of you to swear to me here and now that you will protect Kira, you will tell no one of her, and you will consider her need for safety in any action you take regarding her. Will you promise this?”

Four voices made positive and confident replies.

“Doctor Kymeri?” Rose asked. “Could this get us in trouble? Maybe with General Organa?”

Aletha gave a sly smile, “Perhaps. But I promise you girls, if this does end up blowing up in our faces, I’ll stand by you and protect you. If General Organa has a problem with this, I’ll take the blame.”

“No,” Jessika shook her head. “We stand together. Always.”

“Always,” Paige nodded.

“Always,” Rose and Kaydel agreed.

“Always,” Rey said.

Aletha smiled, “Alright… always. Now I do have one question… do I get to be part of Kira’s Council?”

Kaydel laughed, “You’re already in.”

“Good,” Aletha wrapped an arm around Kaydel’s shoulders and hugged her.

“Just be warned,” Jessika grinned, “Poe Dameron’s sexual prowess is a frequent topic of conversation.”
“Hey, I’m not her mom,” Aletha chuckled. “I’m her cool aunt. You can talk about that stuff with your cool aunt, right?”

“Please don’t make this weird,” Kaydel begged.

Aletha laughed.

“Hey, Aletha,” Rey said, “nothing’s happen yet, but I was kind of hoping to discuss future stuff I did with Teng. You’re not going to tell Dad or Quom, right?”

“Sunshine, I would never tell your father anything you wanted to keep private,” Aletha answered. “You know that. We had this conversation after the uh… masturbation conversation?”

“Well, that’s out there,” Paige said.

“I’m a doctor, if you girls want to talk about sex we’re going all out,” Aletha said bluntly. “Stop blushing, Kira. No one can see you.”

“How do you know I’m blushing?”

“I’ve known you since you were five. You were blushing, Kira.”

The girls laughed.

“What about Quom?” Rey asked. “You’re not going to tell him anything?”

“I won’t have to. I swear to God, Vrogems must be able to smell it on humans. Your father and I would walk into his tent and he’d know everything. And I mean… everything.”

The room was silent.

“This kind of got uncomfortable,” Kaydel said.

“You started it with the banging Poe discussion,” Jessika pointed out.

“And yet, I have no regrets.” Kaydel paused, “Hey, Aletha, if you’re back does that mean that Snap is back too? Cause if not, I might have time to sneak in a quick-”

“We all arrived about an hour ago,” Aletha laughed. “We ended up finding a shorter route back. We actually ran into Poe, and he was… disappointed at having a roommate again. I think he had the same plans for you. He was actually the one who told me you were in your room and I should say hi. You know, I really like that boy. He been treating you well?”

“They’re in love,” Rey teased. “They already said it and everything.”

“Really?” Aletha sat down on the bed and helped herself to some fruit. “When did you two decide to say it, and what prompted it?”

The girls took it as a sign to climb back on the beds and resume their girl talk.

“Um, it was the night you left,” Kaydel asked.

Aletha raised an eyebrow, “Really? Didn’t one of you ladies say something else happened that night between them?”

“We didn’t say I love you because of sex!” Kaydel exclaimed. She paused, “Okay, we said it right after we had sex, but that’s not why. It was a very close and intimate night. I told him the story of what the boys did to my hair, and just the way he responded to it, with such care and devotion to me… and when I realized I was able to trust him enough to literally let my hair down, I knew I loved him. I wasn’t sure if I could tell him, maybe he didn’t love me too. But we made love, and afterward he said, ‘damn Kaydel, I think I love you.’ I knew I could tell him back.”

Aletha smiled and placed a hand on Kaydel’s shoulder, “You really love that boy, don’t you?”

“I do. I love him more than I’ve ever loved someone. His charm, his passion, his kindness, his devotion, his optimism, the way he’s dedicated to BB-8, I could trust him with anything.” Suddenly the lovesick smile fell off Kaydel’s face, “Uh oh.”

“What?” Paige asked.

Kaydel looked at Aletha in horror, “I just remembered… I sort of told Poe about Kira.”

Aletha sighed, “E chuta.”

“I swear to you Doctor, I won’t tell a soul,” Poe promised the next day in the cafeteria. He sat across from Aletha, and had his arm wrapped around Kaydel’s shoulders as the three of them ate breakfast.

“Good, because if you do, I will kill you,” Aletha threatened. “Do you have any idea how many things can accidentally go wrong during a surgery? Don’t think I’m kidding around.”

“No less than I think you would legitimately castrate me if I got Kay pregnant or give her an STI,” Poe shuddered. “I won’t do either, by the way. Well, the latter for sure. The whole having kids thing might be a conversation for later in the relationship.”

“Get it out of the way as quickly as possible,” an unexpected voice came from behind. It was very odd to see someone as legendary as Leia Organa standing in the middle of a cafeteria, holding a breakfast tray, grinning at them with the normal level of comradery as any soldier. “Han and I were slow on that one and ended up having it when there was already a child on the way.”

A painful awkwardness clung to the false smiles projected at her.

“Oh, don’t look at me like that,” Leia admonished. “Let’s not hide the truth. My son is second-in-command of the First Order, my husband is a smuggler who is almost never home, my birth father was a Sith, my real father was blown up, my sister-in-law was brutally murdered by my son, my toddler niece died a horrible death, and my brother is a hermit on a hidden Jedi planet. Did I miss anyone?”

“R2-D2 is in permanent low-power mode?” Poe suggested.

“Ah, knew I missed one,” Leia smiled. “May I join you?”

“Aletha scooted over to make room.

“Thank you, Doctor Kymeri,” Leia took a seat. “I must say, it’s so good to be back here.”

“I know, real base, real bed, real food,” Aletha laughed. “Felt like I was on Jakku all over again.”

“Where exactly were you, if I may ask, General?” Poe smiled.
“Now, now, Commander Dameron,” a voice tsked. “It’s a need to know basis, and you don’t need to know.”

Poe’s smile fell off his face, “Vice Admiral Holdo… I was hoping you had left already.”

“I see you two got along while I was gone,” Leia chuckled.

“Oh, not in the least,” Poe said bluntly.

“I’m surprised, Leia,” Holdo sat down with invitation. Apparently she was going to have breakfast with them, “This is the one you and Nalto have been grooming for a leadership position?”

“It’s a work-in-progress,” Leia replied.

She gave a small smile when she saw Poe brighten at Holdo’s words. Her heart warmed at the way Kaydel rubbed his shoulder in a show of affectionate support. Poe and Kaydel together always made Leia’s heart lift a little. Both were destined for great things, and she had taken both under her wing. Poe and Kaydel filled a small part of the hole left in her by the loss of Ben, Luke, Rey, and Felicity. Leia was truly glad to see the pair not only found each other, but that their relationship appeared to have the kind of strength to go the distance.

Most people would laugh at the idea of a couple knowing so quickly they were meant to be, but that sort of thing had always been easy for Leia to spot. It had taken herself five months before she realized she was screwed and destined to fall in love with Han Solo. Seven months was all it took for Leia to realize Luke and Felicity were meant to be – and those two hadn’t even realized they liked each other romantically yet. And it took about twelve minutes for Leia to realize Lando Calrissian had met his match in Alyla Kene.

As she watched Poe and Kaydel from across the table, Leia knew it was time to place her bets.

“I’m glad to see the two of you going strong,” Leia told them.

They looked surprised at the declaration.

“Thank you, General,” Kaydel looked down at the table with a blush, fiddling with her hair.

“We’re glad of it too. It’s hard work with the crazy lives we live, but we believe in what we have is a wonderful thing,” Poe grinned. His eyes narrowed at Holdo, and the smile dropped off his face, “Unlike some people.”

“Yes, Dameron, you’ve made your thoughts clear, as have I,” Holdo replied. “Can we drop this?”

“You’re the one who keeps bringing it back up!” Poe exclaimed.

Kaydel grasped his arm, “Poe, settle down.”

“He’s been like this the whole time,” Holdo shook her head, trying to make her contempt clear to Leia. “Typical flyboy.”

“Oh, that’s it,” Poe slammed his fist on the table. “Since Commander Nalto has only been on partial duty, I have been unable to do this until now. But now that the General has returned, I can proceed.”

“Great,” Kaydel groaned, rubbing her face in exasperation.

Aletha reached across the table and rubbed her arm.
Poe flashed Holdo a charming smile. “General Organa, I would like to formally lodge a compliant against Vice Admiral Holdo for misconduct.”

Leia raised an eyebrow, “Is that so?”

Holdo rolled her eyes, “Oh boy.”

Poe put on his most formal tone as possible, “General Organa, as you know, I am currently engaged in a romantic relationship with Lieutenant Kaydel Ko Connix. Upon the night you departed for your latest mission, since my roommate, Temmin "Snap" Wexley was away on the same mission, I invited Lieutenant Connix to spend the night in my room… with me.”

Kaydel slumped down in her seat, wishing the ground would swallow her up.

Leia smirked, “I expected as much. Continue.”

Poe then proceeded to regale them with the tale of his first meeting with Holdo, censoring down exactly what they had been doing upon Holdo’s intrusion. Kaydel was as bright as a tomato as Poe so easily told the person in charge of the entire Resistance of their sexual excursion. She kept glancing at her comm, silently willing it to call her away on duty. Kaydel wasn’t ashamed she was having sex with Poe Dameron – in fact, she was quite proud – but she didn’t need Leia freaking Organa to hear the details.

“And she’s been making snide comments about my relationship with Lieutenant Connix ever since,” Poe finished. “She’s even accused me of giving Lieutenant Connix special privileges in exchange for sexual favors.”

“I did no such thing!” Holdo objected.

Leia held up her hand before another fight broke out, “That one I did hear about. Apparently, you two had a yelling match so loud you roused poor Nalto out of his hospital bed.”

Aletha tried to not react to Diego’s name.

“Well then,” Leia sighed and pushed her breakfast tray away. She eyed her eggs sadly, having wanted a few more bites before duty came calling. “Since I can’t have you two at each other’s throats all the time, we’re going to settle this once and for all. Amilyn, why don’t you, me, and Poe go discuss this in your office?”

“Could we do it in yours, Leia?” Holdo asked. “Somebody broke my desk chair.”

Kaydel and Poe avoided eye contact.

“Very well, I’ll be right behind you,” Leia nodded.

Holdo bowed her head with a smile, and then set off for Leia’s office.

Poe was in the middle of giving Kaydel a quick kiss and getting out of his seat when Leia smacked him upside the head.

“I have the Force, Numbskull,” Leia reminded as Poe sulked and rubbed his head. “You leave Holdo’s office alone. Both of you.”

Kaydel looked down, her face flushing again, “Yes, Ma’am.”

“My office, Dameron,” Leia ordered pointing towards the door. “March.”
Poe didn’t need to be told twice.

Kaydel’s comm started beeping and she looked down at it.

“Oh, of course now Brance calls me. Bye Aunt Ally. General,” Kaydel nodded to the women and then pressed a button on the in-ear piece she always wore. She headed to the door, all business, “Talk to me, Brance.”

“That’ll be fun to deal with,” Aletha chuckled. A dishwashing droid joined them at the table, and she handed over her plate to it, “The antics of children are always amusing.”

“It’s nothing I haven’t seen before,” Leia helped stack the plates for the droid. “My husband, sister-in-law, and brother put me through the ringer. After those three fools, I can handle anything.”

Aletha’s smile fell as Leia sighed sadly.

“I’m sorry about what happened to them,” Aletha reached out and clasped Leia’s hand.

Aletha blushed, looking not unlike Kaydel, “I think someone as grand as Luke Skywalker wouldn’t give me a second glance.”

“Luke is a man, not a God. Don’t ever think of him as one, and if you’re having trouble, I have tons of embarrassing stories about him to knock that image down a peg. You know he once got stuck in a window for three hours?”

“You’re kidding.”

“He was leaning out the window to yell something to Han down below when it fell down on him. Luke was about twenty at the time and really into the lifting things with the Force phase of Jedi training. He would not let me pull up the window, insisting he could do it himself with the Force. Blamed me making him nervous when he couldn’t manage. And every time I tried to put my foot down and just do it whether he liked it or not, whenever I got near he would make these little kicks at me. If there is one thing I will give my brother, the man knows how to kick you so you feel you are going to die from it.”

“My brother is an… interesting man,” Leia laughed. “Alright, I’ve got to go deal with Holdo and Poe, and you’ve got your patient waiting for you.”

“Patient?” Aletha frowned. “I thought I had the day off?”

“There was an accident involving a shipment of thermal detonators, and Kalonia’s swamped. She thought you wouldn’t mind subbing in on one appointment. The details should have been transmitted to your datapad.”

“General, with all due respect,” Aletha pulled her datapad out of her bag, “I really don’t think I want to-”

Her eyes fell on the patient’s name.

“Well, I guess one patient isn’t the end of the world,” Aletha tried to sound casual.
Leia laughed, “Give Diego my best.”

“Well, look what the nexu dragged in,” Aletha grinned as she saw Diego seated on the med-bay bed.

His entire face lit up when he saw her, “Aletha!”

He wanted to run to her. He wanted to sprint across the room, take her into his arms, spin her around, and see if her lips tasted as good as they had that day upon the battlefield.

But there was a time and place for such things, and when she was acting as his doctor was not one of them.

“I’m glad to see you’re back,” Diego grinned as Aletha approached the bed. “I almost feel naked without a flower to offer you.”

“You know, I almost brought one back to you, but flowers don’t grow on Crait. Salt planet, you know.”

“Try not to discuss it with anyone,” Diego advised. “Remember, Crait is confidential.”

“I know when discretion is required,” Aletha said.

Like when that devastatingly charming and handsome man she had been missing every night and wanted nothing more than to throw her arms around and cry that he had survived Kylo Ren’s attack was seated before her as her patient.

Stupid doctor/patient rules.

“How have you been, Diego?” Aletha asked.

“Much better now that you’re back.”

“You flatter me.”

“Good. I intended too.” Diego grinned, “You know, you blush just like your niece?”

“Oh?” Aletha teased, “Have you been making Kaydel blush a lot? Should I be telling Poe Dameron he has a rival suitor?”

“Maybe if Kaydel was thirty years older and had a medical degree.”

Aletha gaped at him. Sure, she and Diego had been doing their back and forth flirtation for months, but he had never been so blatant before.

“Oddly specific type,” Aletha swallowed. “Of course, I don’t know anyone who matches that description. I think I’m the only blonde in the department and I don’t technically have a real degree.”

Diego shrugged, “I could lower my standards.”

Okay, now they were really getting into dangerous territory, and Aletha had a job to do.

“I’m here about your arm,” Aletha went back to business. “Doctor Kalonia’s been called away, so I’ll be tending to this appointment. Now, Kalonia’s notes say all the testing has been done, and all the available surgeries, so… by the Gods. Have you been through eleven surgeries in two months?”

“What can I say?” Diego shrugged, his head low to his shoulders. He was clearly uncomfortable with the question, “Ben Solo really knows how to make an unfixable mess.”

“Oh, Diego,” Aletha wanted nothing more than to wrap her arms around him. She had forgotten how broad his shoulders were. He was wearing a tattered brown leather jacket that Aletha could have sworn was Alliance issue.

“I’ve regained the ability to move my fingers and joints. My sense of touch is restored. Pretty much everything is back to normal… but my hand hasn’t stopped shaking for two months, and my reflexes…”

Aletha winced. She knew what loss of reflexes meant to a pilot.

Diego took a deep breath, “I know what this appointment is about. I know what you’re going to tell me. We’ve tried so many ways to fix it, but my hand… it’s never going back to the way it was. Ben was right; he finished what Vader started. I’ve gotten myself ready for this. Just say it, Aletha.”

Why did she have to be the one to say it?

“There is still hope, Diego,” she wanted to sit down on that bed next to him and steady his perpetually shaking hand. “Kalonia has one option left to try.”

“I know, amputation,” the word was like poison on Diego’s tongue.

“It’s not so bad, I’ve known many a man with a prosthetic arm. They look just as real as flesh, have the same motility, and sure, maybe there is a battery to recharge. Actually, my ex-boyfriend once had the battery burn out in his arm before he could change it out with the other set. That was a funny story. My friend, Quom—”

“I’m not going to cut off a perfectly healthy arm, Aletha,” Diego said shortly.

Aletha met his eyes, “But it’s not perfectly healthy. Diego, do you understand what happens if you don’t get this surgery? You’ll never fly again. Not in battle. You will be permanently grounded. I know that’s not what you want.”

“You’re right, I don’t, but amputating my arm for the chance to fly?”

“You said it yourself, Diego. Flying means so much to you that if you ever were permanently grounded you’d rather we just take you out back and shoot you because flying is all you have.”

Diego sighed, looking down at the ever-shaking limb he so desperately wanted to control.

“What are the chances amputation will fix me?” Diego asked.

“It’s mostly an issue with the nervous system, so there may be some issue with getting a new arm. I’m sure Kalonia didn’t estimate very high odds of—”

Aletha stopped as she saw the number on the datapad.

“That can’t be right.” She frantically scrolled through all of the notes and calculations. Her heart fell when she saw Kalonia had done the math right, “There’s a thirty-two percent chance of success.”

Diego looked devastated, “So the probability of failure is—”
“Sixty-eight percent,” Aletha winced. She allowed herself to sit on the bed and place a palm over his shaky hand, “Diego if I had known, I wouldn’t have made such a fuss. But if you really want to continue flying, I recommend the surgery, risk of failure aside. This is your only chance of getting back in a cockpit.”

Diego thought about it for a very long time.

“Forty years,” he whispered. “I’ve been flying for over forty years. Since I was fifteen years old. I’ve made my life, my military career out of what these hands could do… It was all I had.”

Aletha’s breath caught as he turned to lock her eyes; such deep, pleading, loving eyes that felt like they bore into her very soul.

He hesitated, then brought up that shaking hand to her face the way he had done on that gurney.

“Just as soft as I imagined,” he breathed, stroking her cheek and never moving his eyes from hers.

Aletha felt herself shudder, “Diego… please.”

He sighed and removed his hand.

“I’m not going to do the surgery,” he declared.

“But Diego,” she started.

“This was a sign from the Force,” Diego cut her off. “I’ve become reckless. My mind is too focused on the thought of vengeance, and I’m making poor decisions. This injury didn’t have to happen. Wedge Antilles didn’t have to die. Those were consequences of my rash decisions. I won’t let there be further ones.”

“But flying.”

“It was all I had… It’s not now.”

Aletha couldn’t help but smile. She felt Diego’s shaking fingers sneakily entwine with hers.

“I will report to General Organa straightway and tell her that I am stepping down from the Air Force,” Diego decided. “I think it’s time for the new generation to be in charge of the fight. Poe Dameron should make a fine replacement.”

“Kaydel will be thrilled.”

“I’m not writing her anymore Yavinese phrases.”

Aletha frowned, “What Yavinese phrases?”

“Nothing,” Diego said too quickly. He cleared his throat, “The General will move me permanently into Communications. Brance won’t be happy I’m taking over his position, but he’ll understand as second-in-command of the Resistance, it is my right to take the role of Head of Communications. As a warning, Aletha, my first act as Head of Communications may be banning Dameron from the floor. When he’s visiting Kaydel, you have to pry them apart with a crowbar to get any work done.”

Aletha chuckled, “Well, you know what they say about Yavinese men.”

Diego grinned, “Oh, I do. The real question is, do you know?”
Aletha blushed.

“Are we done here?” Diego asked.

“If you’re refusing surgery, then yes,” Aletha stood up and typed the new information into a nearby computer.

Diego watched her very carefully. He enjoyed their little song and dance and had truly missed it in the past two months. Every encounter left him wanting just a little more, and his craving had grown great over the months.

What would he give to be able to have that beautiful, intelligent woman all to himself?

Oh, screw it! He was fifty-eight. He didn’t have time for this teenaged will they won’t they crap.

“You know, it’s unfortunate that you’re my doctor,” Diego said.

Aletha frowned and turned to face him, “That’s not the best review for a doctor to get. Might I inquire why you don’t like me being your doctor?”

“Because the Resistance has a rule that I can’t ask out my doctor,” he answered boldly.

And there it was; finally, the clear declaration of affection they had been dancing around for months. He wanted her, and she wanted him. The only thing standing in their way was a pesky sentence in a rulebook.

“Well,” Aletha bit her lip, “you know… Kalonia is actually your personal doctor. I’m just filling in today. So, hypothetically once this appointment has ended, I’m not your doctor anymore.”

Diego grinned, “Hypothetically, if I asked you out would you be interested?”

“Hypothetically I might be.”

“I’ve got duties today, but tomorrow I’ll be off. When are you hypothetically off tomorrow?”

“Hypothetically, I have the early morning shift, so I’ll be off around noon.”

“Then I’ll hypothetically meet you on the path to the sniping meadow at one.”

“I’ll be there,” Aletha beamed. “…Hypothetically.”

Diego chuckled, got out of the bed, and marched across the room, out the door with the confidence of a man who had just shot Darth Vader out of the sky.

He was about three steps down the hallway when he came to a stop. Quickly, he backtracked and stuck his head back into the Medical Center.

“To be clear,” Diego said uncertainly to Aletha, who had been changing the sheets for the next patient. He looked very nervous as their eyes met, “We are going out tomorrow?”

Aletha just laughed.
“Everybody stop squealing!” Jessika exclaimed as the girls gathered around the comm that night. “Or at least give me some aspirin!”

The news of Aletha and Diego’s date had elicited squeals so loud the local wildlife was lifting their heads.

“Sorry, Jess,” Kaydel laughed. “We’re just so excited.”

“Yeah, it’s about time,” Rose joked. It was a wonder what the past two months of regular girl talk had done to her confidence.

“But Kaydel’s right, we’re sorry, Jess,” Rey said on the comm. “No, wait. Not sorry. N’eparavu takisit. How was my pronunciation, Kaydel?”

“Almost flawless. Good job.”

“Oh?” Aletha raised an eyebrow. “What’s this?”

“I found someone who shares my love of languages,” Rey answered excitedly. “Kaydel’s been teaching me Mando’a. That was sorry in it.”

“Cheaper than an actual birthday present,” Kaydel shrugged.

“That’s right, your birthday is tomorrow, isn’t it, Kira?” Paige asked.

“Oh, the big day,” Jessika teased. “You ready?”

“I think so. I’m really nervous.”

“Turning sixteen is a pretty big deal,” Aletha chuckled. No one had been kind enough to fill her in on what Rey was doing on her sixteenth birthday. “I can’t believe it, though. It’s the first birthday of yours in ten years that I won’t be there for. I remember the first one we celebrated. It wasn’t your actual birthday because we missed the real day.”

“Oh right,” Rey laughed. “Quom got offended at the thought of a Vrogem singing and refused to do so. You got that cheap little cake thing, and everyone got teary eyed when I decided to share. To this day, that is the best thing I’ve tasted.”

“That just makes me sad,” Aletha said. “I wish I could get you a real cake.”

“Well, why don’t we?” Rose suggested.

All eyes turned on her in surprise.

“What? Get her a cake?” Jessika asked.

“Yeah!” Rose grinned. “Maybe some other stuff? Dig up some Holos of Han Solo from the archive, give her some fruit, crackers, cheese, maybe actual meat. Maybe… a nice hair brush and googles and some military grade adventuring boots. I don’t know.”

“Like a care package?” Kaydel asked.
“For a birthday present. She always says she wants to join in on the stuff we take for granted. Why don’t we treat her for once?”

“I like it,” Paige said. “Maybe some nail polish or lipstick. A little luxury in the desert. Teng might be happy about those.”

“Lipstick melts in the desert, better go with a tinted lip gloss,” Aletha advised. “This is a great idea. Might be hard for Kira to explain where she got it all, but she could always say I sent it.”

“You like the idea?” Rose was eager.

“I love it!” Aletha looked to the comm, “Kira, what do you think?”

“I can’t believe what I’m hearing. Fruit, nail polish, Holos of Han Solo. It sounds amazing.”

“Then we’ll do it,” Kaydel declared. “I don’t think I could get you any koyo melons though. Poe might actually break up with me if I stole from his stash.”

Paige frowned, “Doesn’t he live on an actual koyo melon orchard?”

Kaydel shrugged, “It’s not like he gets weekly shipments from his father.”

“Yeah, they’re bi-weekly,” Jessika said. “Geeze, Paige. Aletha do you have a way to get this all to Kira?”

“I have some contacts,” Aletha nodded. “This is exciting. I always wanted you to get a real birthday gift.”

“I’m especially looking forward to the nail polish. I have a feeling it’s going to freak out Quom and induce a why is this a thing rant.”

“Oh, I wish I could see that,” Aletha lamented. “I wish I could see you.”

“I wish I could see you too… All of you.”

“Why don’t you?” Rose asked. “Let’s take a Holo of us and send it to Kira. Then she can put faces to the voices. We could do it right now.”

“We’re in our pyjamas, Rose,” Paige reminded.

“Yeah, and if she were actually with us in person, she’d be seeing us like this anyway. Come on, when else is the perfect time?”

“Anyone have an empty Holo disc chip?” Jessika asked.

“I do, but nothing to take the Holo with. Oh, wait a second.” Kaydel scrambled to her nightstand and flicked on a comlink, “Poe? Are you sleeping?”

“I’m up,” Poe’s voice crackled back. “What’s going on? Did Paige fall asleep and you wanted me to come over and fool around while she’s out? Hey, did she ever find out about that time?”

“No,” Paige said loudly. “But she did now.”

Poe chuckled nervously, “Hey Paige. Nice night, right?”

Paige crossed her arms and fixed the bright red Kaydel with a glare, “Poe Dameron, you and Kaydel are animals.”

“I have no complaints about that,” Poe chuckled. “So what’s up, Kay? What are you guys doing right now?”

“We’ve got the girls over for our chat with Kira,” Kaydel answered.

“Oh.” Poe paused. “Hi, Kira.”

“Hello, Poe,” Rey answered awkwardly. “Congratulations on the ribbon.”

“Uh, thanks,” Poe sounded surprised. “How did you-”

“Kay mentioned it. It’s nothing.”

Aletha looked between the comms, very nervous at where this was going, “So why did you comm Poe?”

“Right,” Kaydel remembered. “Can we borrow BB-8 to take a picture?”

There was a long silence.

“You know,” Poe said, “I want to ask questions, but I fear your aunt, so I’m going to send along BB-8 and leave it at that.”

“Good boy,” Aletha laughed.

“Thanks, Poe,” Kaydel grinned. “I’ll send BB-8 right back when we’re done.”

“Anything for you, Babe… Except that one thing.”

The girls looked at her.

“I’m not explaining that one,” Kaydel refused. She looked back at the comm, “Sweet dreams, Peacock.”

“Sweet dreams, Koko.”

“I hate you.”

“No, you don’t.”

“Yeah, you’re right, I don’t. Good night.”

“I’ll see you in the morning.”

BB-8 arrived soon enough, and he provided to be a little bit of a snobby ball of mechanics when it came to photographing things. He needed the positioning to be perfect, the lighting just right, the angle at just the proper-

“Take the damn picture, Droid or Poe’s getting you back in pieces!” Jessika yelled after half an hour of BB-8’s adjustments.

BB-8 looked to Kaydel, who he recognized to be his Master in this situation as his true Master’s chosen mate.

Beep bop beep bee bep!

Kaydel smiled kindly at BB-8, “I’m sure you’re taking it because you want to and not because of Jessika.”

Beep boop bip.

“Yes, I’ll stop repeating everything you say.”

Beep beep beep!

“Sorry.”

“Alright,” Aletha pulled Kaydel in close, “everyone say D’Qar is a much better place to live than Jakku.”

The girls laughed, tripping over their words to repeat Aletha’s saying.

BB-8 got a wonderful Holo out of it. Aletha and Kaydel were on Kaydel’s bed, arms wrapped around each other. Rose and Paige were similarly hugging each other on Paige’s bed. Jessika was knelt on the floor between the beds, Kaydel’s hand on her shoulder and clasping Paige’s lowered hand. She held up Rey’s silver comm to act as if Rey was there among them in body as well as spirit.

“Thanks, BB-8, it looks great,” Aletha patted BB-8 on the head. “Tell Poe I said thank you.”

Bip beep.

“Wait, BB-8, before you go…” Kaydel pulled something out of her nightstand – a small chip – and gave it to him. She told BB-8 in a low voice, “Give that to Poe. It’s, uh… something to get him through long trips away from me. Tell him if he looks at it in front of anyone, I’ll kill him. Oh, and if we ever break up, he better destroy it. Got it?”

BB-8 flicked his lighter in a thumbs up.

“Good boy,” Kaydel patted him on the head and sent BB-8 on his way. “Tell Poe thanks, and I love him.”

Boop bep boo!

BB-8 closed the door behind him.

Kaydel turned back to see the others staring at her in amusement.

“I’m going to pretend I didn’t hear that,” Aletha said.

“Like I said,” Paige chuckled, “animals the both of you.”

“In my defense, Paige, have you seen my boyfriend?”

“No,” Rey answered. “He sounds hot, though.”

“I’m sure Teng would be happy to hear that,” Rose teased.

“That can be our little secret.”
“Oh stop looking at me like that all of you!” Kaydel chastised. “I’m a grown woman and can make my own choices. If I want to give my boyfriend a picture like that, I will. For goodness sakes’, Kira’s fighting in a gladiatorial match tomorrow, and we egged her on to do that.”

“Wait, what?” Aletha exclaimed.

“Oh, did we not tell you?” Jessika asked. “Kira’s going to kick that Devi girl’s ass. Someone named Dirk has been training her.”

“You’re training with Dirk? Do you want to get killed?”

“Just let me explain, Aletha.”

“I’m all ears, Sunshine. This better be good.”

So Rey explained, but unfortunately it was not good.

“No,” Aletha refused. “You’re not fighting tomorrow.”

“Yes, I am. You can’t stop me.”

“Yes, I can. You fight tomorrow, I’ll call your father. Right now.”

Rey chuckled, “You can’t do that.”

“Why not?”

“It’s night time here. Dad and I are miles from the comm station, and he’s going scavenging tomorrow. After that, I’ll just have Teng keep him away from the comm station while I fight Devi. You won’t reach him in time.”

Aletha chuckled darkly, “Oh, is that how you want to play it, Sunshine? Three words for you little girl. Bring. It. On.”

AGE SIXTEEN

“Again,” Dirk ordered.

The staff was a flurry of swings and blocks as Rey parried once more with Dirk as she had done dozen of times a day for the past two months. At first the staff had been heavy and cumbersome, but her muscles adjusted, her grip tightened, and her moves became powerful and fluid.

True, she was still but an amateur, but something flowed inside of her. A strength and power that boiled in her blood. Dirk dictated her moves during warm up and practise, but when they fought each other it was this force inside her that guided her actions. The world became colours around her and her soul was one with the energy of the world.

Or maybe she was hallucinating from the heat.

“Match!” Dirk declared when Rey had subdued him, knocking him to the ground.

He went easy on her, and she knew it, but his words still brought a smile to her face. Rey offered him her hand, and Dirk gratefully accepted the help up.
“So, how did I do?” Rey asked as Dirk brushed the sand off his clothing. They had been duelling about a mile out from Niima Outpost so that Devi wouldn’t see Rey’s moves and plan accordingly.

“You’ll beat that girl no problem,” Dirk grinned. He squeezed her hand, which was still clasped with his. “You’ve even got the callused hands to prove it.”

Rey laughed, “I’ve had calluses since I was seven, Dirk.”

“Yeah, but now they’re fighter’s calluses. Speaking of, I got you something.”

“Oh, Dirk, you didn’t have to.”

“It’s your birthday, of course I do.” He pulled out of his pocket a pair of brown leather gloves. They were ratty and had holes in some of the finger tips, “For you. To protect your hands.”

“Dirk,” Rey smiled taking them from him. “Thank you.”

“I’m sorry they’re not nicer,” Dirk said bashfully. “But Boss doesn’t give me much of a cut. I don’t pull my weight, he says. Don’t like to fight and I’m not smart. Waste of money he says.”

“You’re not a waste of anything.” Rey frowned, “But what do you mean a waste of money? Does he… own you?”

“Kinda. Used to before slavery became illegal on Zygerria. Here the laws are unclear, like how your boyfriend belonged to Meru.”

Rey leaned on her staff, intrigued, “You’re from Zygerria?”

“A slave from the Fighting Pits,” Dirk confessed shyly. He looked to the ground and fiddled with the stuffed acklay in his pocket. It was ratty and leaking sand, but it still brought him great comfort. They do bad things to the slaves in the Pits. It’s why I don’t like to fight. Reminds me of the days I was forced to fight people who didn’t stand a chance. It was horrible for the losers of the matches, taking a brutal beating and then facing their Master’s wrath… but they did bad things to the winners too.”

“What kind of bad things?” Rey was almost too afraid to ask.

“They called it renting. You could rent an attractive looking winner for an hour. Do… terrible things to them. I even heard that relatives sometimes got rented together: brothers and sisters, sometimes cousins… sometimes parents and children. They had to watch, but sometimes… sometimes they were forced to do something worse.”

Rey wanted to throw up, “That’s horrifying. Did you-”

“Don’t think so. I don’t know who my family is. Or where I came from. Used to, but that was before Master…”

“Before what?”

Dirk took a shaky breath, “I’m not… I’m not handsome, but I’m strong. The real money in the Pits was the renting. I can win fight, but no one wanted to rent me. So Master – not Plutt – put a lot of money into training me up. He thought if I became really, really strong I could be a… what’s the word? Novel? Nobility?”

“Novelty?”
“Yeah, that. But no matter how strong I got… I was just too ugly.”

Rey sighed. He was covered in wrappings as all of Plutt’s goons were, but she remembered what he looked like. She was uncertain what species Dirk was: he looked a lot like a human, but a strange green ting to his skin, abnormally sharp teeth, and what looked like two torsos atop each other before his waistline declared a half-breed at best. His back was hunched, his eyes too large, his nose was like mottled clay. Dirk also had very strange hair, thick, matted black patches interspersed with this white hair balding patches made the hair look something of a quilt. There were also many terrible scars on his body, the most prominent being across his forehead.

“But Master had an idea,” Dirk continued. “He liked reading about science experiments and got the idea that he could make me think of only fighting and I would get better. So he knocked me out, opened up my head, and cut up my brain.”

Rey shuddered.

“They did a slice her, cut out a part there, my did really bad things to me. I don’t remember much of my life cause of it. I couldn’t remember how to read or write, and after the surgery… it took months before I could walk or talk or fed myself. And I hurt a lot.”

“Oh, Dirk,” Rey placed a hand on his arm.

His voice shook, “He did a bad thing, Rey. Master was mad that it didn’t work, so he decided to just sell me off. Plutt sometimes went to Zygerria to buy cheap slaves and snapped me up. I think he felt sorry for me, because he treated me better, and helped me get back to being somewhat normal… but my memories haven’t come back, and it’s hard to learn stuff. I know I’m stupid, Rey, but before… I don’t think I was dumb. Not a smart man, not a handsome man… but something better than this.”

“Dirk, I am so sorry,” Rey fought back tears. “They shouldn’t have done that to you. Why does Roke and the others treat you so horribly?”

“Only Boss and Roke know. That’s how I like it to stay. The other don’t know, but Roke… you know he don’t care. He always needs someone to laugh at.” Dirk took a deep breath, “You know what’s the worst part?”

“What?”

“I do have some memories… fuzzy ones. Ones of a little brown-haired girl. I remember the day the slavers took me. I don’t remember where or when it was, but I remember the little girl. I protected her. I protected a little girl with brown hair.”

Rey understood what he wouldn’t say, that that was why he had taken care of another little girl with brown hair all those years ago. Why he had stood up for her and taught her to fight.

The tears free flowing from her eyes, Rey threw her arms around Dirk and pulled him in for a tight hug.

“I’ll protect you, Rey,” Dirk promised, holding her snug like his lifeline to something normal. “I protect you like I protected my sister.”

It was nearly an hour later when Teng pulled up in Quom’s speeder. He found the two still embracing.

“Rey? Dirk?” Teng asked, hesitant at his interruption of the moment. “It’s time.”
Dirk pulled away from Rey, “You ready to kick some butt?”

Rey grinned, “Let’s do this.”

“You’re seriously letting Rey and Teng go off on their own… alone today?” Quom shook his head as he and Luke pulled up into town in Luke’s speeder. The trunk was packed with their daily haul.

“It’s her sixteenth birthday and she wants to celebrate with her boyfriend,” Luke answered, shutting off the ignition. “I trust them not to do anything they shouldn’t.”

“You trust them?”

“Alright, I trust Teng.”

“That’s more like it,” Quom chuckled, opening the trunk. “So what are we going to be up to today? Didn’t you tell Rey that we were going to be scavenging until almost sundown?”

“Well, she sounded a little too excited about that, so I figured I better stay in town in case she gets up to trouble. Maybe we could work on your speeder?”

“Honestly, at this point I’m seriously considering asking Rey just to build me one.”

“In the interest of public safety, I encourage you to pursue that train of thought,” Luke chuckled.

“You know, I still don’t trust leaving Teng and Rey alone today.”

“Come on, Quom, what trouble could they possibly get up to?”

“Hey Tinadar!” Ivano Troade caught their attention. “The guys at the comm station are looking for you. Apparently you got a call.”

Quom frowned, “Who in the Galaxy would call me?”

“Aunt Ally, please don’t do this,” Kaydel begged as Aletha placed the call to Jakku. “Kira needs to fight.”

“Enough Kaydel,” Aletha ordered coolly. “You don’t understand Jakku like I do, and that Devi girl is up to no good. I guarantee you that Kira’s not going to end up fairly fighting Devi today. Poe back me up.”

“Sorry, Doctor Kymeri, but gotta side with my Sweetheart in matters such as these,” Poe watched the aunt and niece place a private comm in Diego Nalto’s office. He stood in the doorway with arms crossed and a frown on his face, “That reminds me, Kay, why am I even here?”

Kaydel answered, “Aunt Ally asked Nalto to use his personal comm, but he was busy with drills. He couldn’t just give us the door code as we don’t have the proper security clearance. You were the only person available with the code to his office that wasn’t Holdo, and she would ask too many questions.”

“And I would ask none?” Poe shot.
Kaydel grinned, “You make the perfect watchdog, My Peacock.”

“Alright but you owe me for this.”

“Well, Aunt Ally’s room will be free during their date.”

“I will spray you two with water, so help me God,” Aletha threatened.

“Yes, Ma’am,” Poe nodded, but winked at Kaydel when Aletha’s back was turned. “So are you calling Kira’s father?”

“No, a mutual friend.” Aletha answered. “I would rather her father not know we’re communicating, and if I called Kira’s father, I would have to explain how I came by my information about Kira. Poe, do you mind watching the hall so that no one will come in?”

“Yes, Doctor.”

He kissed Kaydel on the cheek and exited the room.

“For the last time, Aunt Ally,” Kaydel pleaded, “let Kira do this on her own.”

“Someday you’ll understand, Kay,” Aletha sighed. “Let’s just hope Quom does right now.”

“Doc?” a familiar voice crackled over the comm.

It made Aletha smile, “Hey Quom. We gotta talk.”

“Deep breath, Rey,” Teng instructed as they stood at the edge of the ring, waiting for the day’s fights to start. He cupped her cheek tenderly, “Are you sure you want to do this? This is the last chance to back out.”

“I’m ready,” she declared. “I’m going to show them what I’ve got.”

“I know you will,” he grinned. “Kick her butt, Starlight.”

“And you take down Strunk like there’s no tomorrow, Moonshine.”

Teng pulled her in for a kiss: a hot, passionate kiss. His hand fistng through her hair to crush her lips to his, his arms locked around her waist pulling her tight to his sturdy body. Rey wanted to melt there in his embrace.

They pulled apart panting.

“Wow,” Rey gasped. “That was… That gets better every time.”

“Yeah, it does,” Teng stroked her cheek.

Rey bit her lip, debating whether or not to utter her next words.

“I know we’ve had some worries, Teng. I am a little young, even on Jakku.” Rey coyly traced a finger across his chest, “But we did have an agreement about my age… When I turned sixteen, what with you being seventeen a few more months and then after that, eighteen doesn’t seem too bad. After all the age of consent is sixteen, so I would thinking-”
“I am more than happy to uphold our groping agreement, Rey,” Teng grinned. “And whatever else you would like.”

“Good.” Rey wrapped her arms around his neck, “I just… I have things that I want to do. Experiences I want to enjoy… and I want you to be the one I… do them with.”

Teng cleared his throat, “Well, you know all I really strive for in this universe is making you happy. Seriously, I have no life beyond making you smile, so if that will make you smile-”

“I hope there will be smiles from you too.”

“Oh, I guarantee there will be smiles on my end.”

“Good,” she stroked the sides of his face, the pads of her fingers pricking against the short hairs of his face which he hadn’t shaved that morning. “Because I was thinking if you won your match, I would give you a little reward of my own.”

Teng swallowed thickly, “And what exactly is that reward?”

Rey lifted up to whispered something in his ear that made his eyes go wide, his mouth dry, and his cock hard. She pulled back to observe the effect her words had on his. He stared at her gobsmacked as she smiled coyly at him.

He could barely manage a sentence, “All of that?”

“Unless you have any objections?” Rey toyed with him.

“Well, I suppose it is your birthday,” he answered magnanimously.

She pulled him in for another playful but passionate kiss. Teng’s fervour was more ravenous this time, pulling her against him as if he wanted to crush her into dust. She shuddered as she felt his erection press against her thigh. Every inch of her body screamed out for her hips to roll against that hardness.

“Whoa, let’s keep the R rating here for violence and gore,” Devi’s words broke them apart.

“Devi,” Teng cleared his throat, pushing Rey in front of him to block his erection from Devi’s view. He really needed to settle down.

“Teng,” Devi grinned. She nodded to the other girl, “Rey.”

“I was just wishing him luck,” Rey hastily said.

“I’m almost too afraid to ask what a goodbye looks like,” Devi teased.

Rey couldn’t believe she was blushing. She wished her girl friends were here to support her. Jessika would know what to say to put Devi in her place.

“Are you ready for the fight?” Devi asked.

“I’ve been ready for weeks,” Rey declared. “You paid up?”

“No turning back. You?”

“We’re in. No way out of the fight.” Rey looked around the crowd, “Hey, where’s Strunk?”
“Oh, you didn’t hear?” Devi answered in a tone that no one was surprised to hear.

Rey’s heart fell in an instant. She knew Devi was bound to pull something, and here it was. Since all three of them were paid up, there was literally no turning back. In the Fighting Ring, if you paid, you fought. End of story. If you changed your mind, you would literally be dragged back into the ring and pummeled by your opponent. Devi had made sure Rey couldn’t back out until she pulled her gambit.

The only question was what was it?

“Poor Strunk had a fall yesterday and broke his collarbone,” Devi pitched her story. She pointed into the crowd at Strunk who was wearing a contraption of bandages that didn’t exactly look like they would help heal a collarbone. “He can’t possibly fight, so it looks like Teng doesn’t have an opponent.”

“You schutta,” Rey shook her head in disbelief. “You planned this all along.”

Devi shrugged, “Now why would I do that? I’m still going to fight.”

“Hey Roke!” Rey turned to face the ring where the Goons of the day were talking. Roke always fought, so it was easy to guess who she could address. “How many fighters today?”

Roke grinned, “Three and three. We’ll have to draw lots.”

Rey narrowed her eyes at Devi, “Of course we will.”

There is was: the answer. Usually the way it worked was that if a volunteer didn’t directly challenge a goon, the volunteers would be paired off to fight each other and the goons would be paired to fight each other, ignoring the volunteers altogether (unless it was one of those days Roke decided he just wanted to fight everyone in town.) When there was an uneven number of goons and volunteers fighting, they would draw lots and one goon would fight one volunteer.

That was Devi’s gambit. With an uneven number, there were three possible results Devi could encounter.

One – Devi fought Rey. It was her original plan, so other than pissing off Rey, there wasn’t a whole lot of harm in it. The only downside is that if Rey won, she wouldn’t share her winnings with Devi anymore.

Two – Devi fought a Goon. She knew she could probably take some of the goons, so it was a risky play but possibly beneficial. If she had to fight someone like Roke, then she could easily throw the fight. The bonus to the situation was that Rey and Teng would have to fight each other, and then it became a test of which lover was willing to harm the other. If you signed up for the Ring, you had to give your opponent a fair fight. Teng was unlikely to try putting his all into harming Rey, and Rey would never let him throw the fight. Rey and Teng would both lose no matter the outcome.

Three – Devi fought Teng. She thought she could take the boy, and then Rey would be forced to fight a goon. There was no way Rey could win against a goon.

It hadn’t been her plan to pull this trickery when she first challenged Rey, but once Dirk had demonstrated his abilities and started to train Rey, Devi knew her best bet was to gamble this way.

“I don’t believe you,” Rey was surprisingly calm towards Devi. Perhaps it was months of expecting a cheap trick that kept Rey in check. “I thought this was our way of showing the town what we were made of. To earn its respect.”
“We live on Jakku, Rey,” Devi shook her head. “There’s only one rule here: survival of the fittest. It’s just good business.”

“Indeed it is,” Rey said coolly.

Teng looked between the girls, but didn’t know what to say, “I, uh-”

“Oi, you three!” Roke barked. “Get over here. Time to draw lots.”

“Coming,” Devi called. She smiled pleasantly at the pair, “Shall we?”

Teng glared at Devi.

Rey raised an eyebrow, “You know if I draw you, I going to kick the poodoo out of you?”

“You can try,” Devi shrugged.

“Come on,” Teng nodded towards the awaiting goons.

Devi started forward, but Rey caught Teng’s arm.

“What is it?” Teng asked.

“I’ve changed my mind,” she answered.

“About what? The fight?”

“Your reward. I’ve decided that if you win your match, I’m also going to…” Rey whispered something in his ear that literally made his jaw drop.

“Okay, I might kill a man for that,” Teng declared.

Rey looped her arm around his, “I’m glad to hear it.”

“MOVE! MOVE!” Luke yelled as he and Quom raced towards the Fighting Ring.

Quom shouted, “EVERYONE GET OUT OF OUR WAY! OUR CRAZY TEENAGERS ARE BEING IDIOTS!”

Surprisingly that didn’t make anyone move. In fact, Luke could have sworn he heard someone mutter Damn Ersos and their theatrics.

He was getting way too much of a reputation in this town.

They reached the Fighting Ring right as the contestants were about to draw lots. Rey was sizing up the goons when she heard her father shout out her name.

“Rey Rhiaon Erso!”

Her head snapped to the side and she saw her father and Quom looking furious.

“Damn it, Aletha,” Rey muttered.

Teng just squeezed her hand reassuringly.
Luke started forward to duck into the ring when Sarco Plank of all people blocked his path.

Plank chuckled, “Roke paid me a heafty sum to keep you from interfering with business. He thought you and Tinadar might try to ruin things, and I’m the only one in town who can give you a fair fight.”

“That’s not happening.”

“I will sic my Vrogem on you.”

“Hey!” Quom objected. “I am not some Hothead attack dog!”

“So if he doesn’t get out of my way and as a result Teng gets his skull bashed in?”

“I didn’t say I don’t have my limits.”

Luke rolled his eyes.

“He is almost as amusing as the golden droid you owned,” Sarco says. “Though I’m struggling to figure out which was more annoying.”

“You leave Threepio out of this… and the correct answer is Threepio.” Luke narrowed his eyes, “Get out of my way, Plank. If you force my hand, I will attack you.”

Plank shook his head, “You won’t do any such thing. I’ve got the upper hand here.”

“How so?”

“Because if you do one thing to annoy me, I shout out in front of this entire town that you are Luke Skywalker.”

Quom frowned, “Really?”

“I am not risking the exposure of my identity because teenagers want to be teenagers,” Luke said simply. “Plus we can always go talk to them when they’re in the waiting area for their fights. Oh, and Plank? For the record, my legal name is Luke Rhiaon Skywalker.”

Plank smiled, though they couldn’t see it behind his mask, “And no one in this town, or pretty much the Galaxy actually cares, Nobody’s Padawan.”

Quom couldn’t help but shrug, “He’s got a point, Luke.”

“Nobody asked you, Quom.”

“Love you too, Buddy.”

“Wow,” Teng watched the scene from afar. “What in the Galaxy could Plank possibly say too stop those two from charging over here and dragging us out of the Ring?”
“Probably the same sort of blackmail that makes Dad pay him three portions a day,” Rey replied. “I’m glad though. It delays their murder of us for a little while at least.”

“Ladies and Gentlemen!” Kerlos declared to the crowd. “You all now how it works. I have two bags here, each with three coloured stones inside. My associates will draw at random from the bag in my left hand. Two will draw yellow stones, and the other a red stone. Our brave volunteers will draw at random from the other bag. Two will draw blue stones, and the other a red stone. Each person will fight the one who has the matching stone. No switching or backing out. None of you leave this ring until your match is over. Contestants, let’s draw!”

“So which kid do you think is going to draw the red stone?” Quom asked Luke.

Luke shot Quom a look, “Quom, Rey is a Skywalker. Of course, she is going to draw the red stone.”

“Well, if you’re so sure you’re going to draw the red stone because of the Curse of being an Erso,” Teng repeated Rey’s words, “who do you think will get the other one?”

Rey raised an eyebrow and simply pointed to the evitable opponent.

“Contestants, reveal your stones!” Kerlos ordered.

Quom and Luke winced as they saw the completely expected conclusion.

“Just for once could things not go horribly wrong for my family?” Luke groaned.

“But I can dream, Quom. No one can stop me from dreaming.”

“Ladies and Gentlemen,” Kerlos announced, “Rey Erso has drawn the red stone and will face off in the Ring against Roke!”

“Teng… I think I should have listened to Paige.”

“What do you two think you’re doing?” Luke demanded once he and Quom were able to get over to the area where the contestants awaited their matches.

Rey grinned innocently, “Enjoying the fight?”

Luke narrowed his eyes.

“Sorry,” she muttered.

“What were you two thinking?” Luke demanded. “This is dangerous!”

“In all fairness, we were screwed over from our original plan,” Teng pointed out.

“Teng,” Quom glared at his charge, “have I taught you nothing? This is Jakku. Of course you were going to get screwed over. Honestly. Trust no one outside this group, and even then keep reasonable suspicion over our sketchier members.”

Everyone stared at Quom, confused and too afraid to ask who he was referring to.
“I’ll just move on from that,” Luke said. “Rey, please… why would you do this?”

“I wanted to prove myself to this town,” Rey answered.

“You don’t have to do it like this.”

“Yes, I do! I push and I push, and I try to stand my ground but as long as the three of you are around, I don’t get my chance to show what I’m capable of.”

“Have you ever thought that might be the whole point?” Luke asked.

She frowned, “What do you mean?”

“Rey, I could easily come into this ring everyday, fight, win, and make sure no one ever even looked at us the wrong way again. But I can’t, Rey. We can’t. We have to keep our heads down, not draw attention to ourselves.”

Rey scoffed, “And what? Let people push me around? Let them harass me? Attack me? Grope me?”

Luke lowered his eyes, “Has anyone-”

“Yes,” she said bluntly. “It’s usually visiting merchants who don’t know about you guys. I get grabbed, pinched, occasionally pulled aside by someone stronger than me. I’ve always managed to get free before anything really happened, but still it happens all over again. I can’t keep being the little girl who can’t protect herself or has to run to Daddy, Uncle Quom, or her lover.”

Quom raised a brow at Teng, and the boy blushed worse than a sunburn.

“Besides,” Rey folded her arms, “I’ve paid up. I have to fight now. There’s no way out.”

“I’ll take your place,” Luke said.

“Dad, no!”

“Rey, this isn’t up for debate.”

“You’re right, it isn’t. I’m going to fight and you can’t stop me.”

“Sweetheart, I am your father,” Luke repeated his words from years ago, “until the day you turn nineteen, I can make you do anything I want.”

“No, you can’t!” Rey exclaimed. “I’m sixteen now.”

“That doesn’t make you an adult.”

“I know it doesn’t. I’m not an adult! I’m not done puberty, I still play with my dolls sometimes, and I don’t know how taxes work.”

“In all fairness, I don’t understand taxes either,” Luke admitted.

Rey sighed, “But I’m not a child either. I can throw a punch, I barter on my own, I have breasts, and I want to do sexual things with my boyfriend.”

“Somebody kill me, please,” Teng begged.

“I got you, Buddy,” Quom said.
Rey took a deep breath, “I’m not a child, Dad, and I’m not an adult. I’m sixteen, old enough to hold my own. I’m not the length of your forearm, and I don’t call you Daddy anymore. But I still need you, I still love you, and I don’t want you to go anywhere.”

“I know. And I know this is a mistake, but sometimes a person needs to make a mistake.”

Luke smiled and remembered what he said long ago.

_Sometimes you have to let a kid hurt themselves in order to learn the concept of danger._

“I know, Sweetheart,” Luke sighed, rubbing her hands under his palms. “And I know you need independence, but I don’t want to see you go off and fight people in a spectator sport. Is this really the only way you believe you can prove to everyone what you’re capable of?”

“It is,” Rey squeezed her father’s hands. “But with this whole growing up thing, I need you to have my back, Dad. Not stand in my way.”

Luke took a deep breath and accepted what he had to do.

“Okay,” he agreed.

Rey’s eyes lit up, “Really?”

“Yes. Go kick Roke’s butt as best you can.”

“Thank you, Daddy!” Rey threw her arms around him.

Luke smiled and held his little girl tight. He struggled to fight back the fear in his heart as her stroked her hair. He kissed the crown of her head.

“I trust you, Rey,” he whispered. “But if it looks like it’s too much for you for even a moment, I’m jumping in there to protect you.”

“That’s all I want from you,” Rey smiled, savoring her father’s embrace. “Just a chance to fight by myself before you go all Daddy Nexu on me. Just don’t cut off Roke’s hand, okay?”

“I make no such promise.”

“Malar! We’re up!” Devi called as the pair of goons exited the ring after their match. She was making a few practise swings of her shortened shock stick, her weapon of choice for the match.

“Mind if I borrow your daughter for a moment, Mr. Erso?” Teng asked.

“She’s all yours,” Luke chuckled, releasing Rey. He smacked Quom when the Vrogem started making gagging noises at the kiss, “Stop that.”

Teng was breathless when they broke apart, “Wow. That was a good kiss.”

“Not bad yourself,” Rey winked. She glanced towards Devi in the ring, “You ready?”

“I’ll make her pay for what she did,” Teng promised. “Now, which of Plutt’s weapons should I pick? Axe? Mace? I prefer something shorter against her. Shorter and sharper.”

“Her,” Rey pulled her own knife off her belt. It was a carved blade she made from a droid arm
“Take mine.”

“Really?”

“Make sure you bring it back in one piece. Well… the knife and yourself.”

“Hey, if I’m getting the reward you offered, you don’t need to worry about that.”

“Nothing,” Rey and Teng said immediately in unison.

“I don’t even want to know,” Quom shuddered.

“Malar!” Kerlos yelled. “Come on, you’re up!”

“Coming!” Teng called. “Wish me luck, guys.”

“Go show them what you’re made of, Son,” Quom patted him on the shoulder.

He frowned, “Are you going to tell me to go easy on her because she’s a girl?”

Luke grinned, “No. I was going to say I don’t believe in double standards when men fight women. Kick her butt, Teng. Make me proud.”

And he did.

Then there’s the threat of other scavengers. I have a reputation in Niima Outpost for being willing to use my staff, which keeps most of the riffraff from bothering me.

- Rey’s Survival Guide

“That was impressive, Teng,” Luke laughed when the match was over. He was fairly certain the boy wasn’t listening, too busy kissing Rey to pay attention to her father.

“What can I say?” Quom chuckled, clapping Luke on the shoulder. “He’s a chip off the old block.”

“Quom, until a year ago, you kind of hated the boy.”

“I’m not a perfect being, Luke.”

“Understatement of the century.”

“Oh you want to go, Erso? I have many examples of you being far from perfect.”

“Bring it on, Tinadar.”

Quom and Luke frowned at each other, the same thought hitting them.
“Usually Aletha would have interceded by now,” Luke said.

“Yeah.” Quom sighed, “I miss her.”

Talking to her on the comm had both made his heart soar and break. Quom wished she was a fixture in his life still. He would give anything to see her smile and shake her head at his antics once more.

“Alright, Erso, you’re up!” Kerlos called.

“Good luck out there, Rey,” Dirk brought to her one of the staffs the contestants were allowed to borrow. “This is a little heavier than the one you’ve been training with, but you should be okay.”

Rey smiled as she accepted the staff, “You think I can win?”

Horror filled Dirk’s face, “Oh no. It’d be a miracle to beat Roke. Just be quick and try to tire him out. Also avoid headshots.”

“Oh good, because she didn’t know to avoid those already,” Teng smirked.

“Teng!” Rey snapped. “What have I said about disparaging Dirk?”

“Sorry, Dear.”

Luke and Quom looked at each other.

“When did they become an old married couple?” Quom asked.

“About the time you two did,” Dirk said nicely.

Luke frowned, “Quom and I are not-”

But he couldn’t even finish the sentence.

Quom patted Luke on the arm, “Don’t let Dirk bother you, Mrs. Tinadar.”

“Cut that out, or I’ll start calling you Mrs. Erso, and you know this town will pick that up like no tomorrow.”

“Would make the whole Luke/Felicity/Aletha love triangle even weirder.”

“There’s no way that could get weirder.”

He had no idea how weird it would get.

“It’s true though,” Dirk said. “It would take a miracle to beat Roke.”

“Well, good thing he’s about to fight the Miracle Girl,” Quom slung an arm around Rey’s shoulders. Considering how much taller she was than him, it pulled Rey down to an awkward and uncomfortable angle. “You go kick his butt, MG.”

“Thanks, Quom,” Rey smiled, but it was a nervous sort of smile. She looked to her father next, “Can I do this, Dad?”

Luke rubbed her shoulders, “I believe in you. If not the ability to win, at least the ability to fight. You’re not just my daughter, Rey. You’re the daughter of Felicity Rhiaon, and if there was one thing she was known for… other than sarcasm and intentionally screwing with people, it was that if she wasn’t going to succeed, she was going to at least have people remember she went down fighting. Drawn on your strength, Rey. I know you have it as sure as you stand before me.”

“But how do I draw on it?”

Breathe, and reach out to the strength inside,” Luke smiled. “Just remember every lesson you’ve been taught on fighting, and you’ll be fine.”

Rey nodded, and with one last kiss on the forehead from her father, she entered the ring.

“Breathe. Just breathe,” Luke’s words echoed in her mind as clearly as if he were whispering them in her ear. “Close your eyes and breathe.”

As she settled before Roke, she obeyed. Kerlos’ announcements were drowned out, and so was the roar of the crowd. The inhalation and exhalation of her lungs filled her senses as loud as a drum banging inside of her.

The world was black but warm as she listened to her father’s voice.

“Breathe. Just breathe.”

She had never taken such clear and satisfying breathes as something more than air filled her body. Rey felt it buzzing from the tips of her fingers to the soles of her feet to the top of her head. Something warm, strong, and… lilac coloured.

“Breathe. Just breathe.”

A sky blue colour accompanied the words, drawing a hold on her. He filled her, comforted her, and offered up its own strength.

Then another colour reached out to her.

“Breathe. Just breathe.”

The voice was feminine, and the colour magenta, but bound with a twinge of forest green. Her soul screamed to stay away from the green, but something tied her to it. She knew that green, and her strength – at least part of it – came from the same place as the strength of the green.

“Remember every lesson you’ve been taught on fighting,” the magenta repeated Luke’s words.

Something tugged in her mind, bringing forth memories of Luke, Dirk, Aletha, and Quom. But there was more, something else calling for her.

There was another face.

“Breathe. Just breathe,” the sky blue instructed. “Now reach out.”

Rey did. She grasped onto the other face – no, faces. She pulled them to her.

“What do you see?” the sky blue whispered.

Rey opened her eyes.

But she found she hadn’t truly opened them. Though she was staring eyes wide open, the image before her was wrong. The world was silent and black, and all that existed in the universe was Roke and Rey standing with staffs at the ready in this blackness.
What was she supposed to do?

“Remember every lesson you’ve been taught on fighting,” a voice said. Female but different from the voice of the magenta voice.

From behind Roke, a woman stepped forward. She had black hair, brown skin, and seven slashes across her face. Rey knew the woman, but her name escaped Rey’s memory.

But it does not escape ours.

“Remember what I taught you, Rey,” Reine Agim smiled at the teenager. “Your very first lesson of fighting. What did I teach you?”

Rey found she couldn’t speak, not because she didn’t know what to say but that her mouth wouldn’t work.

As if she sensed the dilemma, Reine nodded, “Open a fight with a strong stance. Look fearsome and stand solid. Fights are all about footwork. Strong footwork gives you a fighting chance.”

Rey nodded.

“But it’s not all about footwork,” another voice, this one male said. A tall man with narrow grey eyes, and parchment coloured skin stepped forward. Obik Kenu said, “Analyze your opponent. Find his weakness and exploit it.”

“But it’s not all analytics,” came another man. Tan skin, black hair, and too handsome for his own good, Gavyn Kene grinned at Rey, “Strength is required to defeat your opponent. Strong moves, Rey. Strong moves.”

“But what’s strength without passion?” a woman life. She had pale skin, blue eyes, and ice blonde hair. Tyla Kinall had a smirk on her face, “You gotta have some fire behind your fight. And you come from very fiery stock, Rey.”

“And don’t forget speed,” a grey woman with catlike features appeared. Zena Halcorr had her usual nonsense look on her face, “Quick moves. Tire out your opponent. He can’t move fast. You can.”

“But above all, do it with grace.” Rey did know this voice. Alyla Kene stepped from the shadows and smiled at Rey, “Bring it all together with fluidity and grace.”

Rey found she could finally speak, “Will you help me?”

“Help you?” Roke roared with laughter.

Rey blinked finding herself back on the familiar terrain of Jakku. Yet the vision still bled in the back of her mind, stuck somewhere between the two realities.

“We’re here for you, Rey,” Alyla promised, but her form was nowhere to be seen. “Just listen to us, listen to yourself, and listen to the Force.”

“Alyla we talked about this,” the voice of Obi-Wan Kenobi groaned.

Luke frowned. He hadn’t heard Alyla say anything. Had Rey? She did have a strange look in her eye and had weirdly asked Roke for help.

Something was going on.
“Opponents get ready,” Kerlos ordered.

“Now, be nice to your opponent, Rey,” Gavyn said. “Give him a bow.”

Rey smiled at Roke and made the bow Dirk had taught her.

“Make the first move, Rey,” Reine ordered.

“A strike at the head,” Zena elaborated.

“Annnnddd… GO!”

Rey swung straight for his head. It took Roke by surprise but he managed to dodge and swing at her himself.

“Block!” Obik said.

Her staff clattered against the impending force of Roke’s.

Rey threw her full weight into throwing himself forward. Roke again was surprised and stumbled back.

“Now go for the knees,” Tyla’s smirk could almost be heard.

She fought, obeying the phantoms. Sometimes the vision bled over and she can see her mentors. Usually it was when they were demonstrating a move Rey didn’t quite understand. But when their encouragement and instruction – as well as unknowingly drawing on the Force – Rey was a sight to be seen.

The odd thing though was that Alyla’s voice had ceased to speak.

“Wow, she’s good,” Quom observed the scene in amazement.

Luke closed his eyes and reached out to Rey’s mind. As it was preoccupied with the fight, she didn’t have the defenses to block him and he slipped in easily. Immediately he saw the world of darkness where his students were guiding Rey.

Quom whispered, “What is it? Force Ghosts?”

“No, not ghosts,” Luke shook his head. “Rey’s experiencing purely a vision. Except for… There’s something different with Alyla. Something drawing on her.”

“But what?”

Rey’s cry of pain brought his attention back to the match. Roke had slammed his staff against her fingers, and in her pain had wretched away her weapon. He tossed it aside, out of the ring. The crowd booed. Once a weapon was out of the ring, the contestant could not fetch it or a new one. Rey was on her own against Roke and his staff.
“The answer is simple, isn’t it?” Tyla asked. “Take his staff.”

Rey narrowed her eyes and grinned. She liked that idea.

She had been knocked to the ground by Roke, so she started to stand up. As she did her arm knocked into something, but it happened so quick she thought she simply imagined it. It wasn’t until she was thrown backwards by Roke again that her back definitely touched something.

“What the?” a man’s voice different from the other grumbled.

Rey didn’t have time to dwell, too busy with her fight to pay attention.

But Luke was paying attention. He didn’t sense Rey feeling anything, but something was happening. The forest green Signature surrounding Alyla’s was flaring stronger.

Rey was trapped in Roke’s hold, his arms holding her still as she grasped onto his staff trying to wretch it from his grip and escape from him. She struggled, all the voices yelling different options and Rey didn’t know who to listen to.

Then something slammed into her back. Rey twisted in Roke’s grasp, ready to figure out what he was doing that caused such an odd sensation. Her heart stopped when she saw what was behind her.

It wasn’t Roke. It was another man.

He was tall, so very tall. He had pale skin and dyed black hair, and dark clothing. He was probably in his late twenties, and he burned with the forest green colour that called to her.

She knew him.

But how?

“Rey!” Zena called out.

The man was gone, and Roke was back in his place. That didn’t stop her heart from pounding a mile a minute.

Zena proceeded as if she didn’t know anything was wrong, “Grab his arm over with yours and twist until he drops his weapon.”

Though her mind was reeling, Rey did as she was told. Roke cried out as he tried to resist the attack, but he dropped the staff and was forced to let go of Rey. She dove to the ground and grabbed the staff. She turned back up, thrusting his own weapon towards him, making contact with his lunging face but the victory was hollow.

When she looked back up, her mind was in another place. They were in a shiny metal and chrome training room, and Alyla Kene was standing next to the boy Rey had seen before. But this time he was looking down at her. She could see his long face and dark familiar eyes. Rey could see that she knew this man.

And worse yet, he could see her.

The man frowned, his face a mixture of shock and confusion, “Rey?”

Luke’s mind moved with Rey and saw the same room. He observed with horror, his nephew, Kylo Ren staring down at the living form of Luke’s daughter.
Horror filled Luke’s heart, and panic flooded his veins. Stretching out from Alyla Kene’s form, there was a magenta thread tied to Rey’s lilac Signature, and several others wound together to form a thick rope connected to Ben Solo. It was through Alyla their Signatures were bonded, and Luke knew that this connection was happening in real time.

In the briefest moment of pure instinct, to protect his child, Luke attacked the bond. But to do so was to attack Alyla. He made his choice; he threw the felt power of his Force abilities into Alyla breaking the thread from Rey and banishing the vision from her mind. Luke pulled back, and both Alyla and Ben were gone.

And Rey had no idea what had happened.

Rey did as her father instructed and then fought once more.

All of her instructors were there still, except for Alyla. The vision she had of the strange, familiar man, was separate from her vision of guidance. She listened to them, following their every moment and throwing in some of her own.

“Hit.”

“Block.”

“Kick.”

“Swing.”

“Head.”

“Knees.”

“Swing.”

“Block.”

Then of her own accord, when Roke was in the right position, Rey cracked the staff across his head with her full strength and then some she didn’t have.

Roke hit the ground, knocked out cold.

The crowd fell silent.

“Whoa,” Quom whispered.

“Is he dead?” someone asked nearby.

Rey gripped Roke’s staff tightly as Kerlos slipped into the ring to check on Roke.

“He’s out,” Kerlos declared in amazement. “Ladies and Gentlemen, I can’t believe I’m about to say this, but… Rey Erso wins!”

A loud cheer came from the crowd, mostly lead by Quom and Dirk as Teng ducked into the ring to rush to Rey’s side. She squealed as he picked her up and spun her around in victory. Wolf whistles sounded every which way when Teng set her down and pulled her into a passionate kissed.
“Congratulations, Miss Erso,” Kerlos came back up to her when they had dragged Roke off. He offered her five portion packets, “Your winnings. I can take the staff and give it back to Roke for you.”

“Oh right,” Rey released Teng and accepted the portions.

She was about to hand over the staff when she looked down at it. Pride filled her. She had just defeated Roke. She, Rey Erso, fought and won against Unkar Plutt’s top goon. Aletha was going to be so proud. And not only that, she had managed to wrangle away the weapon that had brought misery to so many.

“Actually…” Rey grinned. She looked up at Kerlos and slung the bloggin-leather and wool strap of the staff over her shoulder, “You can tell Roke that this staff is mine now.”

And that was how she got her staff and showed Niima Outpost that no one messes with Rey Rhiaon Skywalker.

In all the celebration and applause there was one man who was deathly silent. Luke stood motionless in the crowd with absolute terror in his eyes. He reeled as he processed what had just happened.

His sobriety was not unnoticed by his best friend.

“Yeah, I’m okay,” Luke lied, not wanting to drag Quom into the mess. “Just the stress of everything. I’m glad Rey is okay. We should figure out a way to celebrate. It is her birthday after all.”

Quom just stared at his friend.

“No,” he declared after a while. “You’re lying to me. What’s going on?”

“Nothing.”

“Don’t, Luke. I know when you’re lying. Something happened when you pressed onto Alyla’s presence. Something that scared you. Something that broke the connection. What did you find?”

Luke took a deep breath and made sure no one was listening.

“Fine. When I pushed into Alyla’s presence, I found someone else also there. Someone else saw this fight.”

“Who?”

“… I think Ben saw Rey.”

Chapter End Notes

Coming Up Next Chapter…
Secrets of the Past
Rey gets on the wrong side of Sarco Plank, Aletha learns something shocking about Diego, Poe gets a promotion, Kaydel meets Kes Dameron and learns an odd fact about her boyfriend, Holdo asks Lando a reckless question, and Kylo Ren has a secret that will change everything.

Just a head’s up about the next chapter, the timeline is a little wonky. There are three sort of major storylines that occur on Rey’s sixteenth birthday: Rey’s fight with Roke, Aletha and Diego’s date, and Kylo interacting with Tara and Sasa. Since the chapter was running a little long, I decided to move the Aletha and Kylo storylines to the next chapter. The beginning of the next chapter starts before the segment on Jakku that occurs after the header of AGE SIXTEEN. So don’t get confused that we’ve jumped back in time.

Chapter Question: I’ve been having Poe call Kaydel “Babe” because that feels like the right thing for him to call her. However, when writing Kaydel calling Poe something like that publicly (she’s not going to call him Peacock in front of Holdo,) I’ve been drawing a blank. What should she call him? Darling? Babe? Sweetheart? Dear? Love? I’m leaning a little towards Honey, but I want to make that into a thing Holdo calls him when she’s being condescending… or at least more condescending than usual. Any suggestions would be great.
The crackle echoed through the room as their lightsabers locked. Even with a mask on, Kylo Ren’s hatred was clear to FN-2187.

FN-2187 let himself think for a microsecond, then spun around and slashed at Kylo’s knees. Kylo jumped back and FN-2187 took advantage of the action. He slammed his body forward into Kylo – whose saber was tilted to the side. FN-2187 put his full weight into the move and sent Kylo to the floor. FN-2187 only barely caught himself from falling with Kylo.

Victory in sight, FN-2187 swung the red saber down at Kylo, only to suddenly go flying backwards into the wall. He hit it with a sickening crash, and his body inflamed with pain.

Like some sort of jungle cat, Kylo put one hand on the floor and launched himself forward into a giant leap that shouldn’t have been humanly possible. Landing perfectly upright on his feet, Kylo stood before FN-2187, whose helmet was slightly askew. Kylo glowered at the boy and slowly brought the tip of his lightsaber merely an inch from FN-2187’s throat.
FN-2187 tried not to scream as the heat burned into his neck. As the crimson blade crackled, threatening death, FN-2187’s heart beat like a drum and he dared not breathe too loudly. His saber was across the room, out of his grasp. There was no escape from the menace in the mask; FN-2187 was nothing more than his prey.

“Match!” Cern Ren declared.

Kylo Ren extinguished his saber and clipped it to his belt.

The shiny metal and chrome training room filled with quiet mutters as the other forty-nine members of Kylo Ren’s Beginner Lightsaber Class discussed FN-2187’s impressive match.

Kylo never gave the group any feedback from their matches. Just taught them, tested them, and if you couldn’t keep up, you were out of the program.

And that was nothing compared to what Tara Ren did to the failures in the Expert Class.

But there was one thing Kylo would do when he was impressed by a match. It was considered almost impossible to get and the highest honour if you did. When a Stormtrooper saw it happen to a comrade, they would never see their fellow officer in the class again. Achieving this honour got you an automatic upgrade into Wln Ren’s Advanced Class.

The room fell silent when Kylo extended a gloved hand to help FN-2187 to his feet.

FN-2187 blinked. Was he really seeing this? Had Kylo Ren really offered to help him up?

He took Kylo’s hand and was pulled to his feet. Kylo didn’t release FN-2187, instead holding his hand tightly and staring at the Stormtrooper for a long time.

Then he released FN-2187’s hand and went across the room to speak with Cern.

Standing in the corner of the room, Sasa Ren watched the scene with interest. She had vaguely heard the story of FN-2187, if not the full details. She curiously observed the prodigy, trying to figure out the measure of the man.

FN-2187 had far over proven his worth in combat. He regularly tested in the top 1% of the cadets, and he was a natural born leader. Still, something held him back, and if you were to ask around what, the answer would be Phasma. She recognized something inside of FN-2187 and held him back from advancement. The only question was what was holding him back?

Sasa was attempting to probe the borders of his mind when she felt a resistance. She wasn’t entirely surprised – everyone in the saber classes had strong Force potential – but she was surprised at the power of it.

It was easy to see why Kylo was so interested in him… personal reasons aside.

Then she felt the subtle tug on her mind from a forest green Signature, and she caught Kylo’s faint nod.

“Cadets, you are dismissed!” Sasa declared to the crowd.

A few snickers sounded. Sasa didn’t have the same fearsome presence as the other Knights of Ren. While not petite, she was lithe and beautiful, always showing off her assets. Her voice was soft and soothing, and she always held herself submissively and demure. Everyone knew her purpose in the Knights of Ren was not to be warrior or a General, but one simple thing: a bride and mother for Kylo
Ren.

Snoke had become frustrated with Kylo’s disenchantment of producing an heir, and sensed Tara’s true intentions over the situation: a mere platform for power. He needed to find a true match for Kylo: a vessel to extend the power of his apprentice, a way to reward his student, and a way to control him as Snoke was finding it a struggle as of late. Kylo had been too sensitive to his affections for Leia Organa; he had been feuding with Hux and Electra; and then there was the whole mess with Alyla Kene that had gone very against Snoke’s plans.

Enter Sasa Ren, the perfect way to bring Kylo to heel.

Her clothing and appearance were distinctly feminine. Soft flowing fabrics of charcoal grey and as well put together as Padmé Amidala or Leia Organa. Leggings paired always with either long tunics or even dresses. Her copper hair always looking perfectly styled, never in the same way two days in a row. Her nails manicured and the Supreme demanded she always wear makeup and perfume. Tara Ren made fun of her horribly for it, but the idea was to seduce Kylo, not made with the battlefield in mind.

Snoke was very deliberate in his selection of Sasa. She had been modelled to invoke the idea of Padmé Amidala. True, she did not resemble her physically, but that would have been too obvious even for Ben Solo. Kylo idolized his grandfather, so when he thought himself the new Vader, what did he picture beside him but his very own Padmé Amidala. Or rather, a better version of Padmé Amidala – every bit as passionate, stylish, and beautiful as Padmé, and a strong advisor but one submissive to the whims of her husband. Even her name, Sasa – meaning Princess – was chosen to emulate the role he had in mind for Kylo’s consort.

And of course, there were other benefits to Sasa that made her a good consort for Kylo in Snoke’s opinion. Certain strengths that played off Kylo better than Tara’s abilities. Plus Sasa had been rigorously tested to ensure she was very fertile and could easily carry Kylo’s child.

Sasa herself was unaware of Snoke’s plans to manipulate Kylo through her, but she had been raised entirely under the control of Snoke. He had been modeling her according to his designs ever since the death of the last Skywalker Heir, and merely let Kylo entertain himself with Tara until the time came. By the time she had reached the age of twenty some weeks ago, Sasa Ren’s second nature was exactly what Snoke had designed it to be.

But as much as one can design and shape and living thing, a human is not one that can be fully controlled. Pairing Kylo and Sasa was a very dangerous gamble for Snoke, and one that could prove to be his downfall.

And yet, none of this mattered, because the Stormtroopers in Kylo’s Beginner Lightsaber Class thought her as no more than a joke.

Kylo’s head snapped directly to the perpetrators of the laughter.

“RH-4689 and BK-9362,” Kylo said coolly. “You are dismissed from this class.”

“But, Sir-”

“OUT!” Kylo barked. “All of you! Cern, see RH and BK are disciplined.”

Kylo was the only Knight of Ren who wore a helmet, so everyone could see the bone chilling grin that split Cern’s face.

“With pleasure,” Cern grabbed the two Stormtroopers’ shoulders and led them out of the room.
No one would be surprised if RH-4689 and BK-9362 were never seen again.

Slowly the Cadets began exiting the room, talking quietly among themselves. FN-2187 replaced his training saber – honestly a glorified flashlight as it didn’t act like a blade but rather sent a small shock when it made impact with something – upon the wall and turned towards the door.

“Not you,” Kylo ordered, not even looking at FN-2187. “You stay.”

FN-2187 couldn’t suppress the grin behind his helmet.

“Congratulations,” MK-6093 patted FN-2187 on the shoulder as he passed by.

“Thanks,” FN-2187 nodded to the Stormtrooper sometimes known as Marks. He and FN-2187 were somewhat friendly, their squads working together often. They were both natural born leaders, and Phasma had nearly as much praise for Marks as she did FN-2187.

“Sasa, come,” Kylo ordered as the room emptied. He outstretched his hand for her.

She nodded, quickly crossing to him and taking it. Kylo casually pulled her in close so their bodies were almost pressing against each other as they spoke in hushed tones. FN-2187 watched curiously at the comfortable intimacy between the pair. They were not above exchanging gentle touches on the arm or Kylo’s chest. FN-2187 could have sworn he even saw Kylo briefly play with a strand of her hair. Their hands remained tightly clasped as they whispered to each other.

At one point, Kylo seemed to get worked up over something. His voice rose, and his head turned towards FN-2187, Kylo gesturing towards the Stormtrooper. With a startling amount of comfort and calmness, Sasa reached up to Kylo’s cheek and eased his head back to look her in the eyes. Kylo unconsciously tilted his head down, almost pressing his forehead to Sasa’s. Her hands stayed where they were for the rest of the conversation, squeezing his own and gently stroking his cheek.

If it wasn’t already public knowledge in the First Order that Kylo Ren was sleeping with his female Knights, FN-2187 absolutely would have figured out they were lovers.

As weird as it sounded, FN-2187 was a little… jealous. He wished there was someone he could be that close with. Stormtroopers weren’t forbidden from relationships among themselves, but FN-2187 had yet to find himself any prospects.

He had to admit that Kylo and Sasa Ren looked nice together.

Abruptly they broke apart, and Kylo snapped at FN-2187, pointing next to them. FN-2187 recognized the sign calling him over.

“I want to talk to you,” Kylo said.

“Yes, Sir,” FN-2187 saluted.

Kylo stood with his hands behind his back, looking quite imposing. Sasa stood to his side and a few steps back, clearly acting as his wingman.

“You did well today,” Kylo began.

“How long have you been in my Beginner Class?”

“Since I was sixteen.”
“And you are now?”

“Twenty."

“Huh.” Kylo looked back at Sasa, “Same age as my lover.”

That statement made FN-2187 uncomfortable on multiple levels, but he was fairly certain that was the point.

“Do you know why you’re in my class?” Kylo asked.

“Stormtroopers who test high on the necessary skills are chosen to-”

“No. Do you know why you are in my class?”

FN-2187 lowered his head, “No, Sir. I did not think I had a reason beyond the norm.”

“There are multiple reasons I chose you,” Kylo said, “but the most important reason I chose you is this. Sasa?”

Sasa went over to the computer, and FN-2187 was shown a projection of a graph.

“What do you know of Midichlorians?” Kylo asked.

“Nothing, Sir,” FN-2187 answered.

“Midichlorians are a measurement used to determine a person’s Force potential.” Kylo nodded to Sasa, and she made a red line appear in the middle of the graph, “That line is what separates the Sensitives from the Non-Sensitives. If you test above that line, you are taken to the Supreme Leader personally and trained with him. Such as the case with Sasa.”

A dot appeared on the graph labeled Sasa. It wasn’t too high above the line.

“My own measurement is here,” Kylo signalled to Sasa, and a dot labelled Kylo appeared near the top of the screen.

“Are you saying that I’m above the line?” FN-2187 asked.

“No,” Kylo answered. “You are here.”

A dot labeled FN-2187 appeared just barely underneath the line.

“You are not Force Sensitive,” Kylo said. “Not traditionally, anyway. But there is another line.”

A green line appeared about two inches under the red line.

“This zone,” Kylo gestured to the space between the lines, “is what we call Force Potentials. If you fall in this zone, you may learn certain powers. Maybe not master them, but learn them to some degree. You, FN-2187 measure just barely underneath Force Sensitive, just barely ineligible. You will never be the Master of the Knights Ren, but you can learn to use the Force about as well as Sasa here.”

FN-2187 blinked, “You… You want to teach me the Force?”

“I have a personal interest in seeing you in a position at my side,” Kylo said. “And you’ve proven yourself over these past few years. I will be advancing you to a higher class of saber skills, and we will begin training you in the ways of the Force. Not me personally, I don’t have time for that, but the Knights of Ren will help your progress. Sasa I find has a very…”

He smirked at her.

“Delicate touch,” Kylo ended suggestively.

FN-2187 seriously wondered if Kylo Ren was getting off on making overt sexual moves towards Sasa in front of him.

“Thank you, Sir,” FN-2187 bowed his head, hoping this wouldn’t end with him being ordered to witness the conception of Kylo Ren’s heir. “I am honoured to be added to the Advanced Class.”

“Forget the Advanced Class,” Kylo waved off. “I’m sending you straight to the Expert Class.”

“The Expert Class?” FN-2187’s eyes went wide, and he was thankful the look on his face was obscured by his helmet.

Kylo smirked, “Tara will whip you into shape in no time.”

“But, Sir-”

“Silence.”

“Master,” Sasa interceded. “I think he’s worried about the fact that those who are in the Expert Class are the ones you select new Knights of Ren from. The boy may be skilled, but he is not ready for that honour yet.”

“He won’t be selected within the year,” Kylo assured her. “But I have every intention of making you one of my Knights, and one of the best ones at that. Probably only rivalled by Tara. Apologies, Sasa.”

“I know my saber skills aren’t the reason I was selected.”

Kylo raised an eyebrow, “Depends on the saber.”

Okay, FN-2187 was certain Kylo was getting off on this.

“I’ve even already picked out his name,” Kylo said.

“You have?” FN-2187 asked.

“Yes. You shall be Fyrn Ren,” Kylo declared. “Now, you are dismissed. If your next assignment’s instructor asks why you’re late, tell them I held you back. If your next instructor is Captain Phasma… say it was Hux.”

Sasa raised an eyebrow.

Kylo shrugged, “That woman can, has, and likes to kick my ass.”

“Fair enough.”

FN-2187 looked between the two, a little bit confused, “Ok. Uh… Thank you, Sir. Ma’am. I won’t let you down.”

“I kill you if you do,” Kylo threatened. “Don’t betray me, FN-2187.”
“Never, Sir,” FN-2187 promised.

It was a promise he would not keep.

“Fyrn Ren?” Sasa shook her head when FN-2187 had left. “Are you serious? The first and last letters of Felicity Rhiaon’s name?”

“What can I say?” Kylo chuckled. “I love pissing that woman off, even beyond the grave.”

“You’re terrible, Master.”

“That is my aim. I was thinking about practising my sparring. Wish to join me?”

“Oh, no, I have a meeting with Hux. I’m going to need all of my strength if I’m going to be able to resist for an hour not throwing him out a window.”

“Why do you think I delegate my meetings to the Knights?” Kylo grinned. “Are you sure you don’t want to practice? A little one-on-one time might do you good.”

“Has Tara been complaining about me again?” Sasa asked.

Due to Sasa’s lack of skills with a saber, Snoke had dictated that she join Tara Ren’s Expert Class. The other Knight was unimpressed about teaching her cohort, fiercely believe she should not be a Knight until she was fully ready, and Tara was not quiet about those feelings.

“Endlessly,” Kylo sighed. “Has quite the variety of insults about you and your incompetence. I’ve seen what you do. It’s not all that bad. A lot of it could be improved if you worked on your stance and footwork.”

“What’s wrong with my stance?”

“Here, let me show you.”

Kylo unclipped his saber from his belt and pressed it into her hands. Sasa had her own, but he was more comfortable with his own, and liked the image of her gripping it.

“Hold it like this,” Kylo took off his gloves, dropping them to the floor, and guided her hands to the proper spots. He stood behind her, Sasa’s back pressed firmly to his chest, his body dwarfing hers. She fit very nicely in the nook between his arms. “Now, feet apart… Little more.”

His foot nudged her legs, guiding them apart. Sasa’s breath started picking up speed.

“Breathe, just breathe,” Kylo whispered in her ear. His mind reached in the Force, calling forth memories of what his former mentors had taught to him. “Close your eyes and breathe.”

Sasa’s eyes slipped shut.

Her body was so soft against his, prone and trusting as he stood so close.

"Breathe. Just breathe."

His hands slid up her bare arms. Something electric passed through him as skin slid against skin unimpeded. Kylo didn’t notice when he started holding his breath.
"Breathe. Just breathe," the voice of Alyla Kene whispered to Ben. He startled for a moment and looked around for her. Kylo was surprised she wasn’t there, but her voice was. “Remember every lesson you've been taught on fighting.”

“I’m going to tell you the most important things about fighting,” Kylo whispered his Sasa’s ear. He caught a whiff of some floral perfume dancing on her neck. He was going to have interesting thoughts whenever he smelled flowers in the next little while. “Breathe. Just breathe. Now reach out.”

Kylo could feel a piece of magenta reaching out for something in the Force. His forest green that entrapped drew it back to its rightful place. With him.

No, why was Alyla doing this right now? He was kind of busy.

“Kylo? Sasa whispered, drawing back his attention. Her eyes were shut, but he felt a cerise presence reaching out in the Force.

“What do you see?” his breath was hot on her ear.

“Power. Great power.”

“Harness it.” His hands drifted down her sides to her hips and then caressed towards the middle, “Bring it in, and settle it in your core.”

He was drawing her back against him, excitement and arousal burning in their blood.

“Draw on that power by drawing on your core,” Kylo instructed.

“But how?” Sasa’s eyes fluttered open. Those forest green orbs were drawn like a magnet to his lips. “Show me.”

He felt the words flow from the Force.

"Remember every lesson you've been taught on fighting," Kylo said. “Remember what I taught you, Sasa. Your very first lesson of fighting. What did I teach you?”

“Tell me.”

"Open a fight with a strong stance. Look fearsome and stand solid. Fights are all about footwork. Strong footwork gives you a fighting chance."

Sasa straightened her back and settled her feet confidently.

"But it's not all about footwork," Kylo continued. "Analyze your opponent. Find his weakness and exploit it."

Her leg shifted, brushing against his thigh for a moment before settling back into position. Kylo did always have rather sensitive thighs. And the burgeoning hardness against her back supported that claim strongly.

"But it's not all analytics," Kylo shuddered. "Strength is required to defeat your opponent. Strong moves, Sasa. Strong moves."

She boldly rolled her hips back against him.

Kylo groaned, "But what's strength without passion? You gotta have some fire behind your fight.”
His fingers reached up and played with a lock of her copper hair, “And you come from very fiery stock, Sasa.”

“What do I do with that fire?” Sasa bit her lip.

"Don't forget speed," Kylo swallowed. "Quick moves. Tire out your opponent. He can't move fast. You can."

She had spun around in an instant, her body pressed against his and his lightsaber clattering to the floor.

"But above all, do it with grace,” Kylo panted as she gripped his shoulders. His arms were locked around her waist, pulling her as close against his body as possible. "Bring it all together with fluidity and grace."

She pulled his head down and his lips were on hers without hesitation.

It was passionate and hungry, lighting their blood aflame and yearning from more like a delicious poison was drawn from the other’s lips. In the Force Darkness and Light mixed wildly, pushing and pulling the pair towards the brink of destruction. They hadn’t shared a kiss out of the confines of their coupling since Sasa’s request their first time. But was they stand there desperately taking in the other’s taste, lips, and tongue, both knew in their hearts that this wouldn’t be the last kiss.

"Will you help me?" a voice asked in the Force.

Kylo broke apart from Sasa rather suddenly.

“What did you just say?” he questioned.

Sasa frowned, confused by the sudden loss of his lips, “Uh… nothing. I didn’t say anything.”

He scowled, “But if you didn’t, then who…”

His eyes went wide, and his head shot to the side. Standing on the other side of the room was the ghostly form of Alyla Kene with a disappointed look on her face.

“Oh, come on,” Kylo exclaimed. “Not now. I’m busy.”

“Sorry, how dare I be so discourteous to the man who murdered me?” Alyla shook her head.

“For the last time, I’m sorry! It was an accident, and I did try to save you.”

“I know, that’s how we got in this mess.”

“Kylo?” Sasa’s voice sounded small. He had honestly forgotten about her for the moment, “Who is that?”

“Oh, sorry.” Kylo gestured to Alyla, “Sasa, this is Alyla Kene, my former Jedi mentor. Alyla, this is Sasa, my… well, it’s kind of complicated.”

“If there’s anything I understand, it’s a complicated relationship,” Alyla’s mind went to Lando. “Both of you are consenting, Ben?”

“Yes!” Kylo exclaimed. “And stop calling me, Ben!”

“So that’s your first name.” Sasa paused, “Wait, Jedi? Aren’t they dead?”
“It’s, uh… complicated,” Kylo answered. “I sort of killed her, then saved her, then she died, and now she’s my own personal ghost, but I sometimes let her go off and do her own thing. Speaking of, is that what you want right now? I feel you trying to yank free. Are you trying to secure yourself to someone else?”

“Perhaps,” Alyla shrugged. “It’s complicated.”

Kylo groaned and opened his mouth to reply when he felt something elbow him in the ribs, “Ow! Sasa, did you just hit me?”

“I haven’t touched you.”

“Not with anything but her lips.”

“Quiet, Alyla,” Kylo ordered. Something hit his back, “What the?”

“Kylo?” Sasa touched his arms.

“Alyla, what is going on?”

If it was possible for a sort of ghost to do, Alyla paled slightly, “Wait, can you feel… Uh oh.”

“What?”

“Nothing,” Alyla answered him too quickly.

Kylo reached out into the Force, gripping their bonds pieces of Signature tightly. He poured strength into it to see if he could reach in further and discover what was going on.

Then he felt it, another colour probing their bonded Signature. A familiar colour, one the Kylo knew, but he couldn’t determine it yet. Oh, what was it? It felt so familiar. It was… It was…

It was sky blue.

Kylo’s eyes shot wide, “Are you connecting to Uncle Luke?”

Alyla swallowed, “Uh… maybe a little?”

Fear pounded in his temples. The last time he had seen his uncle, Luke had wrapped his hands around Kylo’s throat and squeezed to kill. The only reason he was alive right now was because of Chewbacca. He felt it come flooding back, that terror that filled him with his own uncle attempted to murder him.

Kylo stumbled a step back and he slammed into something hard. Not from the back but rather his front. Dazed, Kylo blinked and gathered his bearings, letting his vision settle. His heart stopped when he saw what was in front of him.

It wasn’t Alyla or Sasa. It was another woman.

She was thin, so very thin. She had pale skin and brown hair tied up in three buns, and light clothing. She was probably in his late teens, and he burned with purple sort of colour that called to him.

He knew her.
But how?

“Kylo!” Sasa called out.

The girl was gone, and Sasa was back in her place. That didn't stop his heart from pounding a mile a minute.

Sasa proceeded as if she didn't know anything was wrong, “I’m talking to you. What is up with the ghost? Am I supposed to be seeing her?”

Though his mind was reeling, Kylo answered, “Uh, yes. You're Force Sensitive so you can see her. It’s really complicated, and I’m sort of occupied.”

“With what?”

When Kylo looked back up, his mind was in another place. They were in a dusty desert fenced off ring, and Alyla Kene was standing next to the girl Kylo had seen before. But this time she was looking up at him. He could see her round face and familiar hazel eyes. Kylo could see that he knew this girl.

And then it clicked in his mind; the girl appeared to be about sixteen and her Signature was lilac.

Kylo frowned, his face a mixture of shock and confusion, "Rey?"

It was his cousin, he was on Jakku.

…This was the manifestation of his guilt, seeing what his precious cousin should have grown to be. Of course, that’s what it was, he realized. It was her sixteenth birthday. He and Luke were having a shared vision through Alyla of what could have been.

Rey was beautiful… and way too much like her mother.

This wasn’t a vision, it was a nightmare.

For a second, he hesitated, and then he reached out for the lilac Signature. For what, he wasn’t certain, but he had to connect to her. Her Signature called out to him.

In the briefest moment of pure instinct, something sky blue – Luke, Kylo knew – slammed into Alyla and Kylo’s bond. Kylo understood; Uncle Luke didn’t want Kylo laying eyes upon his precious stolen daughter. But to do so was to attack Alyla. Somewhere out in the world, Luke had made his choice; he threw the full power of his Force abilities into Alyla breaking the thread from her and Kylo and banishing the ghost from the room. Kylo pulled back, and both Alyla and Rey were gone.

“I have no idea,” Sasa declared.

“…Ok then.”

She nervously glanced at Kylo, “Look, I know this is bad timing, but we were kind of in the middle of something.”

He couldn’t believe what he was hearing, “Are you serious right now?”

“Look, it’s either have sex with you on the training room floor or go to a meeting with Hux. I know which I’d prefer.”
Kylo seriously considered it.

“No, I- I can’t,” Kylo shook his head. “I’m sorry, but I need to go clear my mind.”

And with that, he raced out of the training room, leaving behind a very confused Sasa Ren.

“Did I just get cockblocked by a ghost?”

---

You’ll run into people on Jakku who say they were there when the ships fell out of the sky. They’re either lying or crazy. The Battle of Jakku was before there was a Niima Outpost or much of anything else on this miserable planet. So unless you’ve gained magical powers and are talking to a ripper-raptor or a nightwatcher worm, they probably weren’t there.

- Rey’s Survival Guide

---

“Can I open my eyes yet?”

“Not quite yet.”

“Diego, we met on the path to the sniping range. I know where we’re having our date. You don’t need to cover my eyes as you lead me there.”

“It’ll be worth it, I promise.” Diego brought her to a stop at the edge of the meadow and removed his hands from her face, “Alright, open your eyes.”

As Aletha expected, they were at the meadow of the sniping range – thankfully no one was around shooting – but what she didn’t expect was that all the sundrops were in glorious full bloom. It was breathtaking, all the yellows and the oranges gleaming in the sunlight.

On the far side of the meadow by one of the trees, Aletha spotted a blanket laid out and picnic perfectly set up for them. A pair of battered old Rebellion era sniping rifles were propped against the tree.

“You left your gun just outside where anyone could find it?” Aletha frowned. “And is that my rifle?”

“I thought we could do some shooting after lunch if you were up for it,” Diego clasped her hand with his left. “I figured no one was going to steal a pair of forty-year-old weapons when we’ve got a rack of younger ones back at base. Kaydel helped obtain your rifle for me.”

“I really have to change the code on my door,” Aletha chuckled. “That girl keeps breaking into my room. I’m surprised I haven’t walked in on her and Poe going at it on my bed yet.”

“I wouldn’t be surprised if you did.” Diego offered his arm, “Shall we?”

“We shall,” she wrapped her arm around his. As Diego led her through the meadow, Aletha admired the scenic picture before her, “How long ago was this set up?”

“About an hour. Your girls were very eager to help, adamant that I give you a proper date. Dameron, I kid you not, offered to be my hype man.”
“Your what?”

“He offered to come to me before I met up with you and hype me up for the date. Making sure I was charming and excited or something. I had to remind him that she had drills to run,” Diego shook his head. “I don’t know what goes on in his head sometimes. It’s a good thing he’s dating Connix; she’s very good at keeping him in line.”

“And who keeps you in line?”

Reaching the blanket, Diego brought her to a stop with a grin, “I was hoping you.”

“We Anthea women have a talent for commanding a certain presence,” Aletha touched his muscular arm. Her fingertips stroked the cracked leather of his jacket. He was certainly very strong.

“Must be how you managed to capture my attention in an instant.” His fingers brushed her hip, “You’re quite the thief. I don’t think I’ve managed to get them back since.”

“Well, that explains a few significant idiotic moves you’ve made over the past few months. Are you usually this reckless?”

“No,” his breath was hot against her lips. “But what can I say? You just… do something to me.”

She definitely was going to do something if they didn’t stop this right now. Unfortunately for her, Diego proved to be a master tease and suddenly stepped away from her.

Diego bent down and rummaged through the picnic basket, “If you’re done for the day with your medical duties, might I interest you in a glass of wine?”

“Of course,” Aletha settled on the blanket. She smoothed out her skirt, feeling a little self-conscious about her outfit. It was a simple long white skirt, and she was wearing the same top she had the first time she had made love with Luke. She didn’t really have any clothes beyond her uniforms and Jakku attire that was now inappropriate for the moderate climate. “I didn’t know we had wine at the Resistance.”

“We usually don’t,” Diego began to prepare the wine with quite a flourish. “I had to pull a few strings.”

Aletha watched Diego with an amused smile, “You’re making a show of that, aren’t you? Are you an expert decanter?”

“I occasionally worked for the intelligence department of the Alliance,” Diego explained. “A few undercover missions here and there. It’s why they picked me for Operation Citadel. And one time, I went undercover for eight months as a sommelier for the Coruscanti elite. Served the Emperor himself a few times. It’s a skill I decided to expand upon after the war. As a significant military figure, I was forced to so many high-class events that it was nice having knowledge about something the upper crust found interesting.”

“Oh poor little pilot having to wine and dine the elite after the war. I was just on Jakku practising frontier medicine. Absolutely incomparable.”

“True,” Diego said. “It is incomparable, and I admire you so much for it. It takes an amazing person to sacrifice their prime years simply to help people.”

Aletha sighed, “I wish that’s why I did it, but… truth be told it’s because I didn’t have anywhere else to go. Nothing to do.”
Diego reached out her hand, “You do now, and I’ve never seen Kaydel as happy as she’s been these past few months. Admittedly Dameron probably is playing a large part, but it’s amazing what you’ve done with your life.”

“You barely know a thing about my life, Diego.”

“Then tell me about it.”

“What do you want to know?”

Diego smiled, “Everything.”

Jessika was happy to see Tallie waiting on the landing strip with Kaydel and a few others when Black Squadron’s drills were done for the day.

“Alright, good job everyone,” Poe told the group as they passed off their ships to maintenance. “Let’s break for lunch and then we’re going to meet in Conference Room Besh to go over the new formations. Seventy minutes. Don’t be late.”

“Please, if anyone’s going to be late, it’s because of you two going at it,” Jessika chuckled as Poe and Kaydel met in an embrace.

Beep bop boop.

BB-8 agreed with Jessika and projected the image of a timer counting down from seventy minutes.

“Alright, put it away, Buddy,” Poe’s face got a little red as Kaydel laughed.

“Hey,” Tallie came up to Jessika as she was handing her helmet off.

“Hey,” Jessika grinned.

She moved to pull Tallie in for a kiss, but Tallie stepped back and just clasped her hands. Jessika frowned, “What is it?”

“Come on, Jess,” Tallie squeezed her girlfriend’s hands. “Not here.”

“Why not? Those two seem just fine with an audience,” Jessika gestured to Poe and Kaydel who were rather unabashed about their making out.

Rose Tico was trying to get to Poe’s ship, and kept exchanging annoyed looks with BB-8, “I’ve got work to do, guys!”

Tallie smiled, “Is Poe Dameron really a good reference for appropriate levels of PDA?”

“Considering some people call that acronym Poe Dameron Audacity, I suppose not.” Jessika grinned and moved her hands to Tallie’s hips, gently pulling her forward, “Come on, Talissan. Just one kiss?”

Tallie made a show of thinking about it, “Oh, alright. Just one.”

Sharing a smile, Jessika and Tallie moved in to share one of those soft, sensual kisses.
“General coming!” Snap shouted.

About seven couples sprang apart in an instant.

“Oh come on,” Leia shook her head as she traversed the landing strip, Threepio, Zev Senesca, Holdo, Akbar, and Statura following close behind. “I’ve been around pilots for years, I know what you people were doing. And you two.”

Kaydel flushed as she and Poe were picked out the crowd.

“You two do that sort of thing behind closed doors, or I’m getting you shock collars,” Leia threatened. “I’m here to announce that Black Squadron’s duties are dismissed for the day.”

The group muttered to each other in confusion.

“Why is that, General?” Poe asked.

“Because this morning, Commander Diego Nalto handed in his resignation from the Head of Air Force,” Leia answered. “So, you and I are going to have a little chat about the direction of the department.”

“Me?”

“Yes, you. Congratulations, Poe. You’re moving up in the world.”

As Poe’s face lit up, BB-8 started beeping wildly in excitement, and Kaydel’s arms wrapped around his torso. The only thing that made such an announcement truly perfect for Poe was that they were there to share it with them.

“Okay, that’s enough about me,” Aletha finally declared after what had to be a good forty minutes of interrogation. She was sitting upright, but her legs were lounging across the blanket, sometimes playing footsie with Diego’s long and surprisingly bulky shins. “Now it’s your turn. Tell me your tragic backstory.”

“Alright, but I warn you, it’s about as stereotypically tragic as any other Rebel,” he very carefully was stroking the exposed skin of her back. Diego concentrated on her reactions, ready to disengage if she spooked. A thumb stroked across her camp tattoo, “You might find a few familiar elements.”

“Oh, the more tragic, the better,” Aletha teased. “Now come on, spill. Why’d you join?”

“Parents murdered by the Empire.”

“You know it’s really sad that we live in a world where that is a cliché. So what’s the story?”

“Honestly… I’m uncertain,” Diego sighed, reclining against the tree trunk. “I was fifteen when it happened. I came home one day to find my parents executed and Imperials waiting for me. I think Padre got involved in circulating pro-Rebellion propaganda. Next thing I knew, I was grabbed by Imperial officers and sent to a work camp.”

“So, you weren’t even a Rebel?”

“That path was chosen for me… my parents weren’t even members of the Alliance.”
“What were their names?”

“Mateo and Sofía Nalto,” Diego answered. “Madre was beautiful, and Padre a lucky man. Very lean, very unargumentative, not the kind of man who would win a fight. I would have been like him if it hadn’t been sent the to work camp.”

“How long were you there?” Aletha remembered Diego mentioning at some point he held the record for Rebel who spent the longest time in a work camp and survived. Usually if you were there past six months, you were never coming home. Eight months was a miracle, and ten months was the longest she had ever heard.

“Three years.”

Aletha went deadly silent.

Diego sighed, “It is not a pleasant story. I barely made it out, and when I hit about the two-year mark, I wasn’t sure I wanted to. Kes actually led the raid where I was freed. He himself was barely twenty and risking it all to free his brothers and sisters in arms. The mission was where he met Shara, her being part of the evacuation pilots. I remember when Shara, Obik, and I returned from a four-month undercover mission and heard that Kes had been captured in one of the camps. We called in the cavalry for that one and didn’t even wait for High Command’s permission before our teams were off. That was actually the first time I ran into Fliss and Riz, but it was brief and of no note to me until a few years later we got assigned Operation Citadel.”

“I heard about that one,” Aletha said. “That was the largest camp liberated, right?”

“Correct. It was so satisfying to know I had saved people from the hell I went through.”

Aletha considered her next question carefully, “When you say the hell you went through-”

“I was sexually assaulted,” Diego said bluntly. “It happened for three years. You would be surprised how many Imperial officers got their kicks from dominating young boys. I wasn’t the only teenager there, but by the time my liberation happened, I was the only one who made it out alive. People do not like to discuss sexual assault done to men, so I am very open about what happened to me.”

“I’m so sorry that happened to you.”

“I’ve used my experiences as a force for change. I’ve worked with many sexual assault organizations, help raising funds, supporting fellow victims, and giving speeches.”

“But still, that must have really affected you.”

“It still does,” Diego admitted. His eyes never moved from her, “It took a very long time before I was open to having relationships, sexual and otherwise. I was very reserved for years and closed myself off to the world. It was actually why I hated Fliss at first. When we met, she joked about my attitude being like I had a stick lodged up my…”

Aletha winced.

“I never called her out on it,” Diego said. “Not even years later when we were friends and she would joke about my old attitude. I knew it would horrify her if she realized what she had said. It would do no good, only make both of us hurt, so I kept my mouth shut.”

“I’m so sorry,” Aletha touched his shoulder. “I wish that didn’t happen to you.”
“It seems we both had rough introductions to sexuality then.”

“Don’t even pretend like what happened to me even compares to the horror you faced. If you don’t mind me asking… do you have any issues because of what happened?”

“Not physiological ones,” Diego admitted. “But I have… dislikes. Perhaps this is a conversation better had when we’re closer to committing such acts.”

Aletha raised an eyebrow teasingly, “Oh? Do you intend on committing such acts on me?”

“To be perfectly honest,” Diego said bluntly, “if you let me do it, I would push you on your back right here and now and have my way with you.”

It was a risky gamble, one that would either pay off or send her running for the hills. Considering the way she shuddered at his words and the goosebumps that raised on her arms, Diego felt it paid off.

“Well,” Aletha cleared her throat, “that’s not going to happen for a multitude of reasons.”

“I can’t think of one,” Diego kidded. He knew very well that it was too early, but that didn’t mean he couldn’t play.

“For starters, I’ve never have sex without condoms. So unless you have some hiding in that picnic basket, it’s not happening.”

“Wait, wait. Never? Weren’t you married? Heck, didn’t you get pregnant at one point?”

“Condom broke,” Aletha answered. “As a Doctor I am way too freaked out about STIs and pregnancy. Even in monogamous relationships, I’m not willing to gamble.”

“I suppose I can’t scold you for that.”

“Not if you want a second date.”

“So, my decency in not assuming to bring condoms on a picnic first date is the only thing holding us back?”

“Of course not.” Aletha shook her head, “Diego, we still don’t know so much about each other. I want to know you, to get close to you. I’ve never had a relationship like… Oh, this is going to sound so sad, but like Kaydel and Poe.”

“You’re envious of your niece’s four-month long relationship?”

“They seem to know everything about each other. I want that. I’ve never had that. I barely knew a thing about Antar, and my last relationship…” Aletha respected Luke’s request to hide his identity by never uttering even the name Luke. “He was pretty open about his past, but he had lots of secrets and didn’t want to trust me with them.”

“Sounds terrible.”

“I know he has good reasons, but I just wish I knew what they were. It’s part of the reason we broke up, he wouldn’t let me understand why he had to stay on Jakku, so when the threat of Alecta grew, I left him.”

“I don’t want secrets,” Diego said. “I do not intend on keeping secrets from you.”

“And what if I had things I couldn’t tell you?”
“Do they affect me at all?”

“No.”

“Do they affect our potential relationship?”

“No.”

“Are they decisions you personally made, or is it a secret you have been entrusted with?”

“Entrusted with,” Aletha answered.

“Then it doesn’t matter to me,” Diego professed. “If there’s anything you need to withhold from me for the sake of someone else, and it does not affect us, then by all means. As long as you promise honesty and full disclosure should a secret be forced to light.”

“Promise?”

“Promise,” Diego kissed her hand. “Now, what is it you wish to know about me? I’m an open book.”

“I don’t know,” Aletha blushed. “I’ve already learned quite a bit from our flirting before today. Marriage, kids, career, family, all the big bullet points.”

“Well, if I have any mystery, feel free to ask.”

Aletha thought about it, “Actually, there is one. What is with you and notifying people in person that their loved ones have died in battle?”

Diego was surprised she remembered that, “I’ve seen some terrible ways of learning it, so I vowed not to let the families of the people I’ve been left in charge of but told inappropriately.”

“What were the terrible ways? As a doctor, I have to tell bad news like that a lot, so any advice on avoiding those would be great.”

“I don’t think you’d manage the ways I’ve seen.”

“Tell me.”

“Alright,” Diego shrugged. “The first example is obviously how I learned my parents had died. I came home to their bodies and a legion of Stormtroopers.”

“Yeah, can’t pull off that one.”

“Another was how I was forced to tell Ji-Dan’s son that his father was dead. Fliss and I had gotten into contact with the Alliance, and they already knew things had gone wrong. Since there was so much to say, the High Council asked to go with the traditional report of statuses. Unfortunately, Ji-Dan’s son was in the room, so as I went down the list, he had to hear the Council ask Status of Rogue Three and my reply of Killed in Action.”

“That’s horrible.”

“He got off easy compared to Riz Drayson’s parents,” Diego said. “Apparently Alaric – Fliss’ father – had Riz’s body sent to his parents. I think he was guilty over killing the boy.”

“I can see why you would be passionate after those experiences,” Aletha shook her head. “Is there anything worse?”

“Not worse, but I do have a fourth brutal story,” Diego replied. “A story of what was supposed to be a proper telling, gone very wrong.”

“Do tell.”

“It involves a war widow,” Diego began. “She was a Rebel and her husband was a pilot. After the battle, we all returned to the Alliance, and as I was getting out of my ship, I saw a woman looking around for her husband. She’s alone in the middle of the hanger, ready to celebrate the end of the war and a new future.”

Something microscopic passed over Aletha’s face, “What battle?”

“Battle of Jakku. She was looking around eagerly, but she couldn’t spot the ship she was seeking. Then she saw the Pilot Commander walking towards her with the small silver box every Rebel knows. I watched from afar as he spoke to her. I couldn’t hear what he said, and I don’t think she heard either. Her face was so white, her eyes wet, and I don’t think she realized she was trembling. She was just all alone among the surviving Yellow Squad.”

Her eyes widened.

“It was inappropriate to do it right there in the middle of the hanger,” Diego said disgusted. “He should have taken her aside to somewhere private. Let her sit down and have dignity to mourn. She should have had someone by her side to comfort and support her. Once the Commander was done, he just gave her the box, and left her all alone.”

She scowled, confusion riddled over her face. Was she hearing this right?

“I remember her scream,” Diego closed his eyes. “That harrowing, desperate scream of grief. There, in front of everyone, she dropped to her knees and wept on that cold floor. I just… couldn’t help myself.”

Aletha couldn’t breathe.

“I ran forward and dropped to my knees behind her. I locked my arms around her and pulled her upright into my embrace.” Diego shook his head, eyes still shut, lost in the memory, “It was so… ridiculous. I didn’t know this woman, and yet there I was holding her during one of the worst moments of her life. I just… didn’t want her to be alone.”

She swallowed hard, words caught in her throat.

“I never asked for her name-”

“And you never told her yours,” Aletha finished.

Diego’s eyes shot open. He finally could see the shock but understanding that filled her face. How could she possibly know that? Unless…

“Names didn’t matter,” Diego said quietly. “It wasn’t about that to him.”

Aletha’s mouth felt so dry, “Instead he just held her and told her he was sorry for her loss.”

“She wept on his chest… even hit him a little.”

“But he took it in stride.”
“They just knelt on that cold floor together–”

“Sharing a simple moment of pure human connection.”

The memory replayed in their minds, but this time the other figure was clear. They knew that the widow was Aletha, and that kind pilot was Diego.

_Aletha was screaming so loudly, she was fairly certain that starships a galaxy away heard her._

_Diego fell to his knees behind her. His arms wrapped around the golden-haired beauty, and he pulled Aletha up into his embrace._

_She clutched at him tightly, tears streaming down her face as she cried out the name of Antar._

_I'm so sorry,_ Diego whispered that that accent so familiar, holding her tightly. _I'm so sorry for your loss._

Diego took a deep breath, “When she was done crying, she thanked him.”

“He said it was his honour,” Aletha whispered. “And then he departed.”

His hands were shaking, and it wasn’t from his injury, “Never to see her again.”

“Until years later when he saved her from asking stupid questions to General Organa about Jakku.”

“It was you… You were the one I held that day.”

“I never forgot you,” Aletha confessed, tears shining in her eyes. “I never forgot that selfless pilot who comforted me when no one else would. Diego, we…”

“I don’t know what to say.” Diego stroked her cheek, “I don’t believe this.”

“It’s impossible.”

“It’s… destiny.”

Aletha blushed, “Now there’s a bold claim.”

“No, it isn’t,” Diego declared. “On the Yavinese moons, we have a saying: if the Force decides to bring two people together, it will make them cross paths as many times as it takes to get them together.”

“So the Force brought us together twenty-seven years ago.”

“And now it’s taking a second try.” Diego shifted forward onto his knees and placed his hands around her waist on the skin of her exposed back, “Let us not squander the opportunity.”

“Let’s not… But there is one more mystery about you I wonder,” Aletha sighed. His rough hands on her bare skin felt so good.

Diego whispered, “What’s that?”

“When are you going to kiss me?”
He didn’t use words to answer her.

Kylo Ren stormed to his room that night in utter turmoil. He couldn’t shake that image of Rey from his mind. She felt so real, but it was impossible. Rey Skywalker was dead! She had to be!

He opened the door to his room and stopped dead in his tracks when he saw what was inside.

“Good Evening, Master,” Sasa smiled at him, seated on his bed.

“Uh… good evening,” Kylo looked behind himself, though wasn’t sure what he was looking for.
“Did I forget about something? Isn’t your designated night next week?”

And didn’t the girls usually come to his room when he requested rather than enter of their own accord? And on that note, how had she even gotten into the room?

“Yes, it is,” Sasa bowed her head, cheeks a little pink. “Forgive me, Master, but I sensed your mental turmoil and thought I would come see if I could do anything for you.”

“Is this about the ghost? I can explain.”

“Perhaps some other time. I had something else in mind to take care of you.”

Kylo hesitated, “With all due respect, I’m not really in the mood-”

“I meant spiritually.” Sasa paused, “Although the Supreme Leader has made it very clear that if you do have such physical desires, I am to take care of them.”

“What?” Kylo’s eyes went wide. “No, no, no. That’s not… I may do some bad things, but I’m not going to force you into that. If you say no, then the answer is no. Have you wanted to say no but went along with things?”

“Every encounter we’ve had so far has been consensual. I promise.”

“Good,” Kylo let out a breath of relief.

“Will you accept the offer?” Sasa asked.

Kylo frowned, “I thought we just established I’m not up for sex right now.”

“Not sex,” Sasa tried to be tranquil but exasperation bled through her voice. “Spiritual help. Would you like to be rebalanced?”

“What do you mean?”

“Rebalancing. Would you like to do a rebalance to settle your mind?”

“I… I don’t follow,” Kylo scowled. “What rebalancing?”

Sasa blinked, “Has… the Supreme Leader not yet taught you it?”

“No,” Kylo balled his fists tightly. He tried not to get angry at the thought that this random girl had been shown a power he had not.

Sensing his anger, Sasa thought it best to defuse the situation.
“Perhaps the Supreme Leader wished for me to be the one to teach you. A method to draw us closer. Come,” Sasa reached out her hand and patted the mattress with her other, “join me.”

Eyeing her suspiciously, Kylo grasped her hand and allowed Sasa to direct him onto the bed. They sat on the edge, side-by-side. She did not release his hand, rather also taking a hold of the other. He met her eyes, cautious but curious at the lesson before him.

“Rebalancing,” Sasa began, “is a mental ability used to stabilize the emotions of two disturbed Force users. The Dark Side is a powerful tool, as is the Light, but sometimes you can have too much of an emotion. Too much joy is just as blinding as too much hate. Both sustain you, but they can also cloud your judgement and burn you out. Rebalancing is the tool you must use to keep yourself in control; to keep us both in control.”

“If it’s such a powerful tool, why wouldn’t the Supreme Leader teach me this sooner?”

“You must have two Force Sensitives with strong mental abilities to perform this. You’ve asked me on our nights together multiple times why the Supreme Leader would choose someone with such weak physical abilities as a Knight of Ren. It’s true, I cannot jump or push or block as well as Tara, but that’s not what the Force is truly about. You know the truth; the Force opens our minds to something even greater beyond our physical strength.”

Kylo couldn’t help but give a sly smile, “And that’s why he chose you for me. Not the beauty or the submission, all of that can be shaped however he desires in any woman… But raw strength of mind…”

“Just as you have. Yes, you are physically strong,” Sasa drifted a hand down his bicep.

His breath caught at the touch. It was different from Tara’s, not a manipulative power play but more a gesture of worship. Both touches had the same goal, to please him, seduce him, and win him over to her whims, but the end goals were opposite. Tara intended to take Kylo under her control, but Sasa intended to offer herself up to his. Much like the battle between Dark and Light, the two women were contending between his call to subservience and dominance.

Her hand slid up his arm, along his shoulder, across the side of his neck, and her fingertips came to a rest at his temple.

“But your true strength, the strength of your bloodline is what comes from this very handsome head.”

Kylo stroked a hand up along her jaw and settled at her temple, “Show me.”

She smiled gently, “Claim the answer yourself.”

He closed his eyes and with his hand still upon her face, he reached into the Force, seeking her presence. Kylo found her Signature easily, a not especially strong cerise, but the closer he pushed to the cerise, the more power overwhelmed his senses. He could feel her reaching for his forest green, drawing him in closer and guiding him to her mind.

“Do you feel it?” Sasa whispered. “Do you feel my strength?”

“Yes, I do.” Kylo opened his eyes and studied her, “You’re stronger than I thought.”

“Any fool with a touch of the Force in their blood can move an object or block a blaster bolt, but the power of controlling another’s mind… that is something truly special. You are strong of mind, Kylo. I am strong of mind.”
“Our child will be unstoppable.”

Sasa smiled, “All as the Supreme Leader as foreseen… but only if you let me in.”

Kylo winced and looked away, “I can’t forsake, Tara.”

“You fear her.”

“No!” Kylo knew that wasn’t entirely true. “But Tara and I have a history. She is my second-in-command, she is strong where I am weak. Her physical Force Abilities are matched only by the Supreme Leader. She understands the politics of the First Order, and she has the soldiers’ respect.”

“And I do not,” Sasa said simply. “To them, I am a pretty little girl, simply around to warm your bed. But I can be so much more.”

“Sasa-”

“Where is it you truly struggle? Your mind. Is it not important you have someone who can help you when you have turmoil? Or would you rather someone who pushes and kicks while you wept in the corner?”

Kylo yanked his hands out of her grasp, but Sasa pulled them back. Her grip was soft but firm; not painful but communicating that he was not going to be released.

Sasa took a deep breath, “Put it all out of your mind. I am not here tonight to demand a decision. The Force will make it for you when it chooses to bless either Tara or myself with your child.”

“You know, things might get complicated if you both get pregnant at the same time.”

“Well, it is your family after all,” Sasa teased.

Kylo couldn’t help but smile.

“So,” he dragged a thumb over her hand, shifting his into a more comfortable entwinement, “what is rebalancing?”

“We grasp hands like so and allow the Force to flow between us, settling our minds until we are once more at peace,” Sasa explained. “You bring whatever is weakening you to the forefront of your mind, and I bring a tumultuous memory to my mind. They will bring a surge of Dark Side into our souls – conversely, we can also do it with Light Side. The thing about your memories, is that I do not have any attachment to them, and you do not have any attachment to mine. We reach out to the other’s memory and siphon off the excess of Darkness while offering up our ambivalence.”

“So not ridding each other of Darkness, but rather… regulating it?”

Sasa grinned, “Now you’ve got it. Would you like to give it a try?”

“It’s worth a shot. Do you have a memory to regulate?”

“I do.”

“What is it?”

“What’s yours?”

Kylo looked away, “I killed my five-year-old cousin. Today I had a vision of what she would look like now, had she lived... She was supposed to live. The grandchildren of Anakin Skywalker were meant to be unstoppable, and yet... I stopped her.

“That does sound distressing,” Sasa shifted closer to him. She pretended not to hear how ragged his breaths had gotten. “My turmoil is my parents.”

“Your parents?”

“I was collected by the Supreme Leader as an infant. Using the Force I have a very vague memory of my parents. I know it’s hard to believe, having been so young—”

“I believe it. My mother has one such memory of her mother, who passed mere minutes after giving birth.”

“The Supreme Leader said that my parents were very important, very wise,” Sasa said. “I want to know more. Surely, I most come from very high and noble stock to have been selected to unite with your bloodline.”

Kylo frowned, “How old were you when the Supreme Leader chose you for me?”

“I was nine and you were sixteen.”

“That’s a little... strange but given my grandfather picked out a fourteen-year-old when he was nine, not too wrong. And we only met when you were nineteen, so I guess that’s okay.”

“Seven years isn’t all the much. Come, let’s try rebalancing.”

Kylo smiled and gripped her hands, “Let’s do it.”

He followed her instructions carefully and was surprised to find how easy rebalancing came to him... Or perhaps it was her mind that was so natural a home to him. Kylo showed her the memory of Rey, and at once Sasa got to work regulating his memory.

“It won’t work unless you regulate me too,” Sasa reminded. “This is an open circuit. We need each other to be truly balanced.”

Kylo took a deep breath and reached into her mind.

It was a mess of dark blurry shapes. He could barely make out the images of three people: two women and a man. One of the women held an infant, which puzzled Kylo. If it was Sasa’s memory, how could she see herself?

“It’s a high honour,” said the woman not holding the baby.

“Come on, it’s a good deal. The right thing to do,” said the man.

A smell clung to him, but Kylo couldn’t put his finger on it.

“She’ll be looked after, right?” asked the woman holding the baby.

“She’ll be treated like a princess,” answered the other. “She has a great destiny before her. If she stays with you, she won’t achieve it.”
“Come on, Hon,” the man urged. “How could we turn this down?”

How was memory painful to Sasa? Was it the separation from her parents? The fear of the unknown? Whatever the cause, he felt the Darkness throb in the Force. Following Sasa’s movements, he drained her of the Darkness.

They sat with eyes closed and hands clasped, drawing ever closer, both mentally and physically. By the time the calm had swept over Kylo, and he was opening his eyes, they were sitting so close, their knees were actually against each other.

Oddly, neither felt the need to draw back.

“Wow,” Kylo blinked, feeling a calm over him he hadn’t in years. “That was… quite something.”

“A valuable tool?” Sasa smiled, shifting forward so his knees were nestled between her thighs, though not actually touching him.

“A very valuable one,” his hands found the small of her back and pulled her forward so she was kneeling and straddling his lap. Kylo couldn’t stop staring at her lips. “Being in your mind was… intoxicating.”

“How intoxicating?”

Kylo leaned forward.

The image of Rey cracked through his mind like a bolt of lightning. He drew back, but did not release Sasa.

“What is it?” Sasa frowned as Kylo clutched his head. “Are you not rebalanced?”

“I am rebalanced but… I still can’t get the image out of my head. My mind is fixated on the vision, and Alyla, and Uncle Luke, and nothing else. I don’t know how to ease my mind.”

“I can take your mind off all of this.”

Kylo laughed, “I highly doubt that.”

Sasa grinned.

Twenty-Seven Minutes Later…

They laid under the sheets, nude and panting, Kylo a little stunned and Sasa with that same Cheshire grin on her face.

“I stand corrected,” Kylo declared.

“I guess you were in the mood after all,” Sasa sounded very proud of herself. “You’re not thinking of those horrible visions anymore?”

“All I can think of right now is how good you’ve gotten at this since our first time.”
“I’ve had a very good teacher,” Sasa chuckled and rolled over to lay on his chest.

Kylo grinned and wrapped his arm around her, “How good?”

She looked up into his eyes and ran his fingers across his hairless chest. Kylo wasn’t the most cut, but he was strong and freakishly broad. His skin was smooth and sensitive. He shuddered at her very touch, but in fair turnabout, so did she.

“The best,” Sasa whispered.

Kylo stared into her shining eyes, as deep a forest green as his Force Signature – another subtle piece of manipulation for Snoke. He reached out and stroked her cheek, his hand as tender as he wished he had been their first time.

Something inside of him was an fire; not the same destructive blaze Tara caused that always fizzled out quickly. Sasa was an ember in his soul, a quiet simmer sometimes, but ever burning and at no danger of quelling.

He reached forward and before he knew what he was doing, he was kissing her. Sasa startled against the sudden action, but quickly melted into his touch. His hands were pulling her taste in closer like he was trying to devour every inch of pleasure she could provide. And Sasa was only too happy to prove.

When they broke apart, they were stunned.

“I…” Ben was at a loss for words. “I’m… sorry.”

“No, it’s… quite alright,” Sasa swallowed hard. She tried to stuff down these strange new feelings delighting in her body. She looked down submissively, “I’ll take my leave now.”

Kylo grabbed her arm as she started to move, “No, wait!”

She froze, looking back at him in confusion.

“St- Stay,” he could barely manage the word.

Sasa smiled gently, “Really?”

He scrambled for an excuse, “I might… need you. The visions. They might return. I could use the mental rebalance. Stay with me tonight.”

She reached out and stroked his cheek, “As you wish, Master.”

He seriously considered kissing her again, but released the idea when she pulled the blankets back over top them and snuggled into his embrace. Though they were both nude, the action felt very non-sexual, a different sort of feeling filling them up inside.

Kylo reached out with the Force to the room control panel to shut off the lights. He smiled as Sasa relaxed in his arms. She was so warm and soft. Tara was cold and distant, always leaving him quickly after they were finished, even if Kylo wanted more. But Sasa fit in his arms perfectly, and she loved resting her head on his chest as if it were a pillow.

It was kinda of peaceful to have her in his arms.

“Sasa?”
“Yes, Kylo?”

“This is just for tonight,” Kylo warned. “Don’t get used to sleeping in my bed with me.”

“I won’t, Master. I promise.”

---

_One Month Later…_

It was almost hilarious to see Phasma storming down the hallway grumbling to herself angrily. Everyone knew that this was one of her most hated duties, but she was probably the only person who could successfully complete the task and do it without mockery or maiming. Though she loath to admit it, Phasma had grown somewhat fonder of Kylo Ren over the past few years and she liked being able to add a personal, human touch to their relationship every now and then.

But for the love of the Gods, Ben Solo was twenty-seven years old. What the hell was she doing acting as his personal alarm clock to get him out of bed?

“Kylo!” Phasma yelled, barging into his room unannounced and uninvited like she owned the Star Destroyer and every room aboard the _Finalizer_. “For the love of the Gods, get your lazy ass out of bed. You have a meeting with Snoke in thirty minutes, and I will drag you out of bed by the ankle and present you to him in your pyjamas if I have to.”

Phasma stopped dead when she saw that Kylo wasn’t alone.

“What’s going on?” Sasa Ren groaned. She was cuddled up to Kylo, his arms wrapped protectively around her, the two clearly bare beneath his thick black blankets.

And if the bare shoulders didn’t give away their nudity under the sheet, the fact Kylo’s underwear was less than a metre from Phasma’s foot certainly did. She shuddered and took a step back.

“It’s nothing, Sasa,” Kylo rubbed his face. “I must have overslept my alarm.”

Sasa couldn’t help but give him a mischievous grin, “Well, I did tire you out quite a bit last night.”

Kylo chuckled and stroked her cheek, “You seem to be getting quite proficient at that.”

He leaned in to kiss her.

“Stop that!” Phasma snapped. Her glare was evident behind her mask, “Snoke in twenty-eight minutes, Kylo. Move it!”

Kylo narrowed his eyes, “Captain Phasma, you will do well to remember to speak to your superiors in a-”

“Oh, cut the crap, Kylo!” Phasma rolled her eyes. “We have no pretense of formality anymore. I can say whatever I want to you, and you let me. Even Sasa knows that.”

He looked to his lover, “Did you know?”

“Quir Ren told me my first day,” Sasa admitted. Her copper curls were spilling down her pale skin in a very enticing way.

“I’m glad he died last week then.” Kylo wanted to reach out and tangle his fingers in those curls, then slowly drag his fingertips down that soft spine.

“Twenty-six minutes,” Phasma reminded. “I say this with all due respect, Kylo, but move your ass.”

“Alright, I’m getting up,” Kylo started to shove away the blanket.

“Stop,” Phasma held up her hand. “Are you wearing pants right now?”

Kylo grinned back at Sasa, “We found them inconvenient last night.”

“If I didn’t have to take off my helmet to do it, I’d be throwing up right now,” Phasma said flatly. With far too much routine in the motion than she ever wanted with Ben Solo, Phasma located some clothes from his closet and threw them to Kylo, “Here. Put that on. I think me seeing you naked would be legitimately traumatizing.”

Sasa bit her lip and smirked, “Clearly you haven’t seen him naked.”

Phasma gagged, “I actually did throw up a little bit that time.”

Kylo glared at her, but Sasa’s hands massaging his strong shoulders fanned his ego enough not to retaliate.

“Twenty-two minutes, Kylo!” Phasma snapped. “We gotta move, now.”

“She’s right,” Sasa used the Force to summon her clothing. She began to dress, “I have to meet Cern for training in fifteen minutes.”

“Watch your back with him,” Kylo advised. “I think he helps Tara bump off female Knights of Ren. I don’t want you going anywhere right now.”

“Good because I overheard something in the mess hall that I really want to try with you sometime.”

“You know, maybe we have enough time to-”

“Twenty minutes, and I am standing right here you ingrate, so pants, shirt, boots, and move!”

Kylo sighed and Sasa rubbed his arm.

“Don’t leave the Supreme Leader waiting,” Sasa bade.

He was still pretty slow getting dressed, but soon enough Phasma had him halfway out the door.

“Lunch,” Kylo stopped at the doorframe causing Sasa to bump into him at the abrupt stop. He turned to face her, oblivious to what had happened, “You’re having lunch with me today. Forward me your schedule and I’ll set the time.”

“Yes, Master,” Sasa smiled.

Kylo hesitated, and then he impulsively leaned forward and planted a kiss on her lips. His unshaved face scratched her skin, but Sasa didn’t mind.

Phasma raised an eyebrow behind her mask.

“Alright,” Kylo turned back to Phasma, putting on his mask, “let’s go meet with the Supreme Leader.”
“So,” Phasma said as they marched down the hallway. As they passed, soldiers sprung to attention and saluted, “Waking up with Sasa… again.”

“The Supreme Leader is determined to see the next generation arise,” Kylo answered, but smirked behind his helmet. “I am simply performing my duty to ensure that happens.”

“Oh poor you, what a hard duty indeed.”

“Is that jealousy I detect in your voice, Captain?” Kylo teased.

It was a pleasure to see him deflate a little at that.

“Look Kylo, what you do with those women, I don’t really care,” Phasma said. “As long as they’re consenting, if they want to sleep with you that’s their business. I may think that’s a poor life choice, but it’s their mistake to make.”

“My, someone’s bitchy this morning. Did I piss you off during the wrong time of month?”

He felt the fist smash into his face quicker than he could sense it. If her glove wasn’t littered with metal, making the punch hurt like hell, Kylo might have been impressed by the speed.

“Don’t ever ask a woman that,” Phasma snarled. “You’re in the First Order High Command, not a middle school locker room. And for the record, no it’s not PMS, and never PMS with me. Menopause is a real bitch, Kylo, and I can regale you with the details if you’re so interested in my reproductive system.”

“I’ll pass,” Kylo said quickly.

“Good,” Phasma said. “As for Sasa, I meant more that she’s spending the night in your bed. Literally. She’s sleeping with you in your bed. What’s that all about? I thought the women were supposed to leave after you… blessed them with the opportunity to carry your seed. By the Gods, I’m not having breakfast this morning.”

“Sasa… helps me.”

“Too many details, Kylo.”

“Not that way. Mentally,” Kylo confessed. “Her mental powers are strong and help balance me. It can be soothing, so after we couple, I ask her to stay. It’s really not that big a deal.”

“I suppose that not the worrying part,” Phasma admitted. “It’s how often she’s visiting you that is a problem.”

“I don’t see how.”

“That’s the third time this week, Kylo. Tara’s starting to notice, and we both know what happens when Tara notices there’s a threat to her position.”

“I suppose I’ll have to reason with her.”

Phasma raised an eyebrow, “Oh? So you’ve really taken a liking to this one. You didn’t even attempt to reason on behalf of Nera, and you weren’t even sleeping with her.”

“Do you think Snoke knew?”

“Definitely. He probably was behind Nera’s death because of it. Shame. Kind of liked that one. Didn’t put up with your drama.”

“Neither do you.”

“Okay, seriously are you hitting on me, because absolutely not.”

“No,” Kylo sighed. “Besides I see you almost like…”

“Well, not a mother. Honestly, I’m fine with the one I have, even if she’s misguided. I will get her to see the right side.”

“Yeah, good like with that one. So, what am I to you?”

“My bitchy aunt?” Kylo chuckled. “Kind of what I would hope Felicity Rhiaon would have been like.”

“All right, I am treating you too nicely if that’s how you see me. I’ll try to be more of a hard ass.”

Kylo chuckled and they walked a long time in silence.

“So,” Phasma side eyed Kylo, “what’s going on that you need mental balance? Have you stopped drinking my sleeping cordials?”

“No, and I thank you for making them for me. They really do knock me right out,” Kylo confessed. He didn’t acknowledge that his mind was so overwhelmed by the weight of his sins he had taken to drinking Phasma’s sleeping cordial every night for several years now. “I just had a vision last month that is messing with my mind.”

“What vision?”

“Of Rey Skywalker alive.”

Phasma stopped in her tracks, “Excuse me?”

Kylo halted, “It was Rey Skywalker, sixteen-years-old and… alive. It felt so real-”

“It isn’t.”

“Excuse me?”

“It isn’t real,” Phasma insisted. “Come on, the First Order searched all of Jakku. You saw in Felicity’s memory that Rey Rhiaon Skywalker died from heatstroke. You saw her dig the hole. This vision is false, perhaps… perhaps a test. Or maybe Sasa is projecting it to you in order to bring you closer to her.”

Kylo frowned, “That… does make sense timing wise.”

“Put it from your mind, Kylo. Entertaining this notion will lead you nowhere good. Accept the truth and move on. I failed to get Rey off Jakku alive. End of story. Understood?”
“Understood,” Kylo nodded. He sighed, “I just… it felt so real.”

“Listen to me very carefully, Kylo,” Phasma said slowly. “Rey Rhiaon Skywalker is dead.”

Rey Rhiaon Skywalker had never felt more alive. He swung her staff magnificently, taking down the pair of rival scavengers in an impressive show of force. She was graceful and powerful. No one could defeat her, not since she had beaten Roke in the Ring. Now people didn’t quake at the name Luke Erso, they quaked at the name Rey Erso.

“Let’s get out of here!” one of scavengers said to their buddy as they scrambled to their feet.

“And don’t come back!” Rey called after them as they ran back out from the twisted metal into the hot desert. “This is my ship now! And don’t you forget it!”

She was still laughing when she looked back and saw Teng watched her uncomfortably.

“What?” Rey leaned casually against her staff. “Does the sight of me kicking butt get you excited?”

Teng had his arms crossed and his face scrunched a little, “Not… this time.”

Rey frowned, sensing something was off, “What? What’s going on?”

“You don’t think that was a little… much?”

“No. Why would it be?”

“You beat up two guys who were peacefully scavenging a part of the ship we weren’t even working on, and then called dibs on the whole ship.”

“Yeah.” Rey shook her head in confusion, “What’s wrong with that? It’s standard practice.”

“Rey… this is a Super Star Destroyer. You can’t call dibs on a Super Star Destroyer.”

“And who’s going to challenge me?” Rey grinned, crossing over to him. She ran a playful hand across his chest, “I’m the talk of the town. No one can beat me.”

Teng just looked at her, “No one has beaten you. That doesn’t mean someone can’t. Keep playing games like this, and you’ll give someone a reason to do it.”

Rey winced, and Teng instantly regretted it. He knew what this power kick meant for Rey; it was more than having proven herself to all the lusty dullards of Niima Outpost. She could fight back now, she could defend herself… she can save herself the way she hadn’t been able to from Jarex.

Teng sighed, and slung an arm around her shoulders, pulling her in for a quick kiss, “Come on, you Narglatch. I think I saw some fuel injectors in pretty good condition somewhere around here.”

But as Teng led Rey away, he couldn’t help but feel something unsettled in his stomach.

Chapter End Notes
Ok, not the best line to end on, but there wasn’t a really dramatic spot to split this time.

And yes, I’m sort of transferring the whole Rey Nobody/clinging to parents thing to Sasa. It’s going to work much better in this version with her.
Secrets of the Past

Chapter Summary

Tara Ren is not impressed with Sasa's relationship with Kylo, Aletha and Diego take their relationship to the next level, and seventeen-year-old Poe found a weird way to waste taxpayer money.

Chapter Notes

TRIGGER WARNING: In the Alyla section, rape, sexual abuse, self-harm, and suicide ideation are discussed.

I know I said I wouldn’t do this, but since these several chapters just juggle so many stories and so many characters at the same time, I have decided to split this chapter again. So, I’m sorry I promised Luke and Rey stuff in this chapter, but that entire storyline is going to be its own chapter in the next one. There’s literally going to be nothing but Jakku stuff. This does however mean that the Resistance storyline gets wrapped up for a while. The focus will be going back to Jakku for a while with some secondary focus on the First Order. Thank you for your understanding. I just was staring at 25k for this chapter and was still not done, so knew I had to split it.

After a lot of thought, I have decided to go back through my outline and majorly cut up some chapters. As we move closer to TFA, more characters are coming into play and things are starting to clash and pay off. A bunch of things are about to get set up that really affect how TFA goes, particularly character motivations on the side of the First Order.

I have realized that my chapter lengths have become unmanageable for me. It’s just getting very hard on me because I’m literally sitting for two days straight at my computer and still not finishing chapters. I feel like a hamster running on a wheel, writing more and more but never getting anywhere.

So, I have decided for the sake of myself that I will be adding in four more chapter splits and try to keep them under 20k. If I keep at it like how I currently am, I might run myself into the ground and quit, which I have no intention of, but I’ve been down this road before where I take too much on. For everyone’s sake, I will be transitioning back into something easier on myself.

See the end of the chapter for more notes.
FN-2187 didn’t have a lot of time to get an impression of the Expert Saber Class taught by Tara Ren before he was getting yelled at.

“Everyone do your warm-ups!” Tara strode into the room with very little patience for pleasantries. “I should not have to ask.”

FN-2187 wasn’t sure what he was supposed to do. In the Beginner Class it was easy to fake it until you figured things out as you were one of fifty classmates. It was impossible in the Expert Class as only ten people were in the class at any given time.

He was sure in the Advanced Class of twenty people, you got used to it, but FN-2187 haven’t been given any time to develop such habits. In the month since his advancement, Kylo had been giving him private sessions to teach him the skills he was supposed to learn in the Advanced Class before FN-2187 attended his first Expert Class. If FN-2187 had to admit it, he would tell you that he had gotten very good against Kylo’s personal fighting style.

FN-2187 tried to discretely look around to see what everyone was doing when he noticed something. He knew in the Expert Class that all the Knights of Ren attended, in addition to the ten students. He also knew that currently one of the Knights of Ren was one of the students. But as he looked around he only saw six Knights of Ren and nine students.

Kylo and Sasa Ren were missing.

FN-2187 was about to grab one of the practice sabers from the wall when he heard someone call his name. He turned to see Tara Ren unlocking a few boxes that Cern Ren was taking from the supply closet. She was waving him over.

“Yes, Ma’am?” FN-2187 approached quickly but not too eagerly. He didn’t want to look uncontrolled in front of her.

Tara Ren stood above average height, but not what would be considered a tall woman. She was quite pale, very muscular, had piercing grey eyes, thin lips, high cheekbones, and the straightest, blackest hair FN-2187 had ever seen.

Her nails were also particularly sharp, and unlike Sasa Ren, they weren’t painted. If she wore makeup, FN-2187 couldn’t tell to what extent, but he would guess maybe a little mascara, very sharp black eye liner, and some sort of pale lip product.

She wore all black, but rather than the dresses of Sasa Ren, she wore pants, a tank top, and some sort of sturdy hiking boot. FN-2187 assumed she had more layers of clothing for the actual battlefield.

Tara had very little curve to her body, her small chest and hips working in better harmony to her athletic form than Sasa’s pronounced curves could. She also stood with a posture so straight that FN-2187 didn’t realize humans could stand that way.

FN-2187 had never seen another female Knight of Ren other than Sasa and Tara, but it was clear the type could be whittled down to deadly beauty. There was certainly no mistaking one woman from the other, but they both exuded the same confidence and danger.

Kylo Ren was lucky to have either on his arm; let alone both.
FN-2187 however, did not consider himself lucky for getting to have Tara Ren turn those sharp, judging eyes on him.

“I have very little patience for explanations and questions in my class,” Tara said shortly. “By the time you reach the Expert Class you should be an actual expert. I will not make concessions for your circumstances. Am I clear?”

“Yes, Ma’am,” FN-2187 saluted.

“No saluting in this class, and take off that ridiculous outfit. You’re not training to be a Stormtrooper here. You’re training to be a Knight of Ren. You need the mobility. Armor off.”

FN-2187 didn’t like the way everyone watched him strip down to his underclothes. Phasma’s instructions of never let anyone see beneath your mask pounded in his head. He would have to learn how to make a mask with his bare face.

“Good,” Tara was not subtle in examining his body. “Not bad. Sturdy, muscular, good bone structure, even a little handsome.”

He couldn’t stop the red twinge that warmed his cheeks.

“Stop that!” Tara snapped. “I’ll slap any blush right off your face. Let me make it very clear, because we’ve had issues in the past with potential Knights. You know Sasa Ren?”

FN-2187 nodded.

“And you see me?”

FN-2187 nodded.

“Do you think us beautiful?”

He was going to stick to nodding until forced to speak.

“Are you attracted to either of us?”

FN-2187 tried with all of his might not to blush.

“Would you like to touch either of us?”

FN-2187 so desperately didn’t want to nod to that.

“Then let me make myself clear,” Tara said slowly, “the female Knights of Ren… are not for you. The only person who gets to touch us is Kylo Ren. Your bloodline is worthless. To be saddled with his child is the highest honour. To be saddled with yours is a disgrace. If you touch any female Knights of Ren, the sentence is a very swift and very painful death. Understood?”

FN-2187 nodded.

“Good.” Tara took a silver tube out of one of the unlocked boxes and handed it to him, “Here.”

FN-2187 frowned, “Ma’am?”

“We don’t use those children’s toys in this class,” Tara explained. “We use the real deal. That weapon you are holding is a very dangerous one. You can kill someone with it. You can maim or dismember. This is a weapon; treat it as one. Understand its power.”
“I do,” FN-2187 bowed his head.

“No… I don’t think you do,” Tara smirked. “I need you to hold very still for a minute.”

“Ma’am?”

“Hold still,” she repeated. “I do this to every single person who joins my class. You are not special, and this is not a threat. You must not move. If you do, you will die. Am I understood?”

“Yes, Ma’am.”

“Good. Do not move.”

FN-2187’s eye shot wide when Tara ignited the saber on her belt and pointed it barely an inch from his throat.

“Don’t move,” Tara ordered as he started to breathe heavily. “Don’t move, I won’t hurt you. I just have to show you. Demonstrate how dangerous this weapon is.”

FN-2187’s body was betraying him. He couldn’t stop shaking and panting as the tip of her blade scorched the skin of his throat.

“You feel that heat?” Tara whispered. “You feel that burning your skin? That is how powerful this weapon is. I don’t even need to touch you to injure you. Imagine it, FN-2187. Imagine it getting closer and closer, hotter and hotter. Imagine the blade biting into your skin and your screams echoing all around as this burns and cuts and numbs you all at once. See how close this blade is to your throat? Isn’t it so simple? How little effort it would take from me to end your life right now. Twitch but an inch, you’re dead without even a drop of blood spilt. See how confidently I hold this? How controlled I am? How I understand the weight of this weapon? Do you understand now?”

“Yes, Ma’am,” FN-2187 tried to keep his voice under control. “I do.”

He let out an enormous breath of relief when she flicked the saber off.

“Where is Kylo?” she called as if she hadn’t been seconds away from murdering a student.

It took all of FN-2187’s strength not to pass out on the floor.

“Doxl? Berd?” Tara approached two other Knights of Ren. “Where is Kylo?”

“I don’t know,” Doxl answered. “Last I heard he had a conference call with Snoke. But that was before lunch.”

“And what of Sasa?” she asked.

“Had a meeting with Hux.” Berd grinned at Doxl, “You know, if they’re both missing that means they’re probably-”

Tara’s lightsaber was at his throat.

“You want to end that sentence?” she asked coolly.

“Not particularly,” Berd held up his hands in surrender.

Tara sighed and extinguished her saber, “Cern! Wiln! I’m going to go find Kylo. You start running drills. Give FN-2187 no quarter!”
“Yes, Tara!” Cern grinned at FN-2187.

FN-2187 swallowed hard.

“Come on, Kylo, where are you?” Tara hit the call button on her comm when she got outside, but Kylo didn’t answer.

Sighing, Tara started to reach out into the Force to find him when she heard a woman’s giggle carry down the hall.

“Come on, Kylo. Not now. We’re already late!”

“Just a few more minutes.”

Tara pressed herself against the wall into the shadows when the figures of Sasa and Kylo Ren came into view.

They looked… ridiculous. They were laughing and dishevelled and was Kylo playfully chasing Sasa? She was only an arm’s length away from him, both lightly running as Kylo tried to hook an arm around her waist.

Sasa squealed as he managed to get a hold of her and pulled him into her embrace. Grins were plastered on their faces and they were laughing as Sasa feigned trying to escape his grasp. She squirmed and giggled as Kylo planted kisses all over her neck.

When Sasa made a move that almost got her free, Kylo gently pushed her against the wall. The pretense of a fight dropped, Sasa wrapped her arms around his neck and leaned forward to kiss him. Kylo gave something of a mix of a moan, growl, and chuckle as he pinned her against the wall and greedily took in the taste of her lips.

The two made out shamelessly against in an empty hallway, unaware of the woman watching them in disgust.

Tara uncaringly crushed the commlink in her hand until it was bits of wire and metal.

What the hell was going on? Did those two have no respect? No dignity? What if a Stormtrooper saw? Kylo Ren needed to be a masked, fearsome leader with no heart. Not the kind of guy people found groping his girlfriend in a broom closet.

But that wasn’t the disturbing part. It was how much he was enjoying it.

The way he touched Sasa… it was something Tara hadn’t seen before. There had been plenty female Knights of Ren who turned his head and took his attentions before. But those had always been just about lust, desire, the end goal. Those hadn’t been of any concern before.

But this… this was genuine affection. Kylo wasn’t about to pull down Sasa’s panties and have her right there in the hallway. He was just kissing her… because he wanted to. There was something in their eyes, they way they didn’t break contact and stared deeply into each other. His hands caressed his shoulders and neck, buried themselves in her long, copper hair. They weren’t groping her breasts or sliding down her hips or up her skirt.

Kylo had an actual connection to Sasa beyond lust.
Tara gritted her teeth. This wasn’t how it was supposed to go. This wasn’t supposed to happen. This was against the plan. The plan they had had for eleven years…

FIRST MEETING

They met a few days after the Burning of Rornian. She was practising her saber skills in the training room when she heard his voice for the first time.

“Not bad.”

Tara turned to see an unmasked Kylo Ren standing at the door with arms folded.

“You have very good sparring form,” he said to her.

Tara extinguished her lightsaber, “I have to be to teach the Expert Saber Class. Or have you come to take that from me?”

Kylo put up his hands innocently, “I merely wanted to see the woman who was so good that the Supreme Leader put her in such an honourable position.”

“I am good,” Tara answered simply. “Used to kick Cade Ren’s ass all the time. I promise you, if I had been at the Burning of Rornian it wouldn’t have been a slaughter. Not for the Knights of Ren anyway.”

“You aspire to the Knighthood?”

Tara pointed to a patch on her uniform, “I’m one of the Blessed. Of course, I have aspiration to the Knighthood. Only thing that held me back was my age. Cade didn’t want the liability of underaged teenagers. As soon as I turned eighteen, I was first in line for a spot… until you came along. Word is that the Supreme Leader forced him to seek you out when the last spot freed up.”

Kylo’s eyes darkened, “Are you questioning my abilities?”

“Of course not. It’s an honour to have the grandson of Darth Vader among our ranks. Your blood alone ensures you worthy of a spot… To lead the Knights, however—”

“So you question my leadership. I earned my title of Master! I was the only one left standing after the massacre!”

“Yes, it’s so very easy to advance through ranks when your uncle clears the competition. Is it true he killed Cade?”

“It is.”

Tara shook her head, “I’m not surprised. Cade was skilled, but his passion clouded his judgement. Taking on Luke Skywalker by himself? Insanity.”

“You think Skywalker that skilled?” Kylo scoffed.

“I know he is,” Tara answered simply. “He was trained by Jedi Masters, has years of experience, and subdued Darth Vader. Don’t underestimate your enemies. That’s what Cade did. Now, admittedly that type of arrogant leadership would be fine as long as you had a second-in-command to reel you in and bring you back to reality. But Baku? He was a hype man, plain and simple. Not one of those so-called Knights kept him in line.”
Kylo stared at her for a long time, and then came a small smile, “Perhaps you’re right. Maybe if you were around, Cade wouldn’t have gotten all his men killed. I’ll take a lesson from that when choosing my team.”

“Any idea when you will be choosing from the Blessed?” Tara asked.

“Not until we’ve found Rhiaon and the daughter of Skywalker.”

“Well, then let me be the first to say, I’m glad to throw my name in the ring.” Tara was one of the highest ranking Blessed – the group of Force Sensitives Snoke trained in secret. “I excel at keeping the heads of pompous, self-important officers on their shoulders and in their place. You should see the number I can do on Hux.”

“Now, that I would like to see,” Kylo chuckled. “Of course, there is the question of your fighting abilities. Practising sparring forms is one thing, but actual fighting… That’s a whole other game.”

Tara grinned and ignited her saber, “Then would you like to play?”

Kylo raised an eyebrow, “What’s your name?”

“Tara. Short for nothing. Simply lucked out in already having the standard four letter Knight of Ren name.”

“Tara,” he tested the name. “And where do you come from, Tara?”

“Oh, well it’s this big dramatic story of it doesn’t go damn matter. I’m here and I’m ready to win.”

“Well, then,” Kylo unclipped his saber and ignited it, “let’s play.”

That was the first time Tara met Kylo Ren.

…and it was also the first time she kicked his ass.

---

FIRST IMPRESSED

“I still stay she’s hiding on Tatooine!” Captain Roan slammed his fist on the table. “There are dozens of cities and settlements. She could easily hide there for a long time.”

“She is not an idiot, Roan.” Hux rolled his eyes. “Rhiaon would not hide on somewhere as obvious as Tatooine. I say we send another team to Valra and pay the Andromias family a visit.”

Phasma shook her head, “With all due respect, Rhiaon would more likely go to her parental family than her maternal one.”

“But the only one alive on the Rhiaon side is Garvan Rhiaon,” Hux frowned. “And she would never contact Garvan.”

“I believe that is precisely the point, General Hux,” Electra said politely.

“Well, if you were to ask me, I think she just punched in a random coordinate and is hiding on a planet to which she has no connection,” Sigma input.

Seated at the table of squabbling high command, Kylo Ren was rubbing his temples, trying to fight off a headache. The First Order had as little an idea where Felicity and Rey Rhiaon Skywalker had gone as Luke Skywalker and his family did.
He glanced up across the table and found Tara giving him a sympathetic smile. A few of the high ranking Blessed had been invited to the meeting so Kylo could evaluate them in a tactical setting. The pressure was not on yet for Kylo to make his selections, but the competition certainly had begun.

“Master Ren,” Tyche said, “back me up on this.”

Kylo groaned, “Only an idiot would think that Felicity Rhiaon would go to Faclov. She gets panic attacks from loud bangs sometimes. But sure, go to the place where they literally found her brother’s arm hanging in a tree. Does anyone have any idea useful beyond this inane game of hide and seek?”

Tara rose her hand.

“Go ahead,” Kylo allowed.

“The question here is not where did Rhiaon go,” Tara said. “The question is how to draw her out, specifically how would Skywalker draw her out? We all know the nauseating depth of their bond. They’re not about to go their separate ways.”

“Especially since Felicity cannot handle Rey Skywalker’s powers on her own,” Phasma added.

“A comm,” Phasma said.

“Correct,” Tara replied. “Kylo, do they have any private comms between them?”

“No, but they do have a code. Physical signs to each other, but I wouldn’t put it past them to have a verbal one as well.”

“But if they would simply comm each other,” Sigma asked, “why haven’t they yet?”

“We’ve been jamming them,” Hux answered. “Blocking out their lines with false tips and hacking into message boxes so that they secretly wouldn’t clear out. If Rhiaon did try to call Luke Skywalker, Han Solo, or Leia Organa, it’s very unlikely she would be able to get through or leave a message.”

“Good, so from there what are Rhiaon’s options?” Tara directed.

“Call someone else,” Kylo simply said.

Tara pointed to him, “Good. But she wouldn’t call a friend, it’s too simple.”

“We’re watching their lines as well,” Electra added knowingly.

“So what lines aren’t we watching?” Hux asked.

“We can expand the list,” Tyche suggested.

“We have to think outside of the box,” Tara shook her head. “Think like Rhiaon thinking like us.”

She was met with half a dozen frowns.

“What would Rhiaon think we would do?” Phasma clarified. “What wouldn’t we go after? A line that would be hard for us to hack?”

“A governmental line,” Kylo said. “She’s got many contacts in there.”
“Should we check the Emissary department?” Hux asked.

Kylo shook his head, “She knows we hacked that one. It would be someone secure, but close to her.”

“Mothma?” Electra suggested.

“No,” Kylo rejected. “Rhiaon doesn’t trust easily. She has a fondness for Mothma, but when it comes to her life and that of her child, there’s a very limited-”

Kylo stopped, his eyes meeting Tara’s across the table.

Tara understood, “Organa’s office.”

“Of course,” Hux said. “Secure but family. What information do we have on Organa at the moment?”

“She’s taken leave and left things in control of her assistant,” Sigma checked a report, “Jaina Fel.”

“That’ll make things hard,” Kylo said. “Jaina may not be formidable, but she’s meticulous. If even one message disappears, she’ll know.”

“How long until we can tap into the line?” Hux asked.

Sigma answered, “It’ll be tricky, but we can probably do it in-”

“No,” Kylo interrupted. “We can’t do this remotely. If the Senate finds out one line has been tapped, they’ll lockdown everything. One wrong move and we’re screwed.”

“Then what do we do?” Phasma inquired.

“We have to get someone in there and personally check,” Tara answered.

“But the security is some of the best in the galaxy,” Roan said. “Who could even get it?”

Kylo and Tara’s eyes met.

Tara grinned, “What do you think, Master Ren? Think you could get in?”

“I know a few tricks about the building,” Kylo smirked.

“Absolutely not,” Phasma shook her head. “Your face is everywhere right now. If you got caught-”

“Him getting caught is why he’s the perfect choice,” Tara chuckled. “Think you could conjure a few crocodile tears?”

“My mother is soft-hearted and Jaina a fool,” Kylo laughed. “A few tears, a couple lies about being pressganged into the First Order, maybe even make Jaina think I see her as a sister.”

“You should also make them think you fear Snoke,” Tara suggested. “That you want to be free of him but can’t get him out of your mind. Make it dramatic. Hurt yourself a little.”

“I’ll second that idea,” Hux said too quickly.

Kylo glared at him.

“Then we have a plan,” Phasma declared.
“Yep,” Kylo nodded. “We’re going to Hosnian Prime.”

FIRST AGREEMENT

“Jakku, really?” Tara asked as he walked down the hallway towards mess with Kylo. “Any idea why?”

“It’s where she and Nalto hid after Operation Citadel,” Kylo explained. “Phasma is on her way with a squadron right now.”

“Upset that the Supreme Leader didn’t allow you to go?”

“I don’t dare question the judgement of the Supreme Leader.”

“A little questioning is healthy every now and then.” Tara reminded, “Remember. That’s what makes a good second-in-command.”

“I suppose, but he’s right about this,” Kylo said. “Rhiaon and I facing each other during the extraction wouldn’t end well. Besides, I need to focus on selecting my Knights of Ren. I’ve got five slots to fill and no idea who to fill them with.”

“Six slots. There’s six slots, Master Ren.”

Kylo pulled them to a stop, “Not anymore.”

Tara arched a brow.

“You’ve proved yourself in combat and now in tactics. I need someone by my side to guide me better than Baku guided Cade. If you still have aspirations of Knighthood, I am happy to grant you it.”

“I would be honoured, Master Ren,” Tara smiled. “Would I be called Tara, or something new?”

“Tara Ren rolls off the tongue well.” Suddenly he grabbed her wrist and pulled her in close to him, “But let me make myself clear: I am the Master of the Knights of Ren. I am in charge. I make the final call. Is that understood?”

Tara chuckled darkly, “Kylo, I have no intention in taking your title. Second-in-command is where I aspire. All the power, but without the messy complication of taking the blame when you’re in charge. All the benefit, without the drawbacks. But let me make myself clear.”

She twisted her arm out of his grip, grasped his hand, and dug her nails into his wrist.

“I am your second-in-command,” Tara growled. “You do not set me aside for anyone. Not even Rey Skywalker. And if you ever betray me, I’ll make your dreams to be like Grandfather Vader come true and cut off your god damn hand.”

Kylo wrenched his arm out of her grip, but her nails dragged down his wrist, leaving long white lines. They stood there, staring at each other, something heavy and bold in the air. Kylo’s wrist throbbed from the scratches, but if Tara was sensing the emotions in the Force right… he wasn’t complaining.

“I very much believe in a you scratch my back, I’ll scratch yours policy,” Tara grinned darkly.

Kylo swallowed hard and for a split second the image of her nails dragging down his bare back flashed through the Force.

Hormonal teenaged boys were so predictable.

“Do we have a deal?” Tara asked.

He smiled and extended his hand, “Deal.”

They shook on it.

As they let each other’s hand go, Tara reached up and twirled a lock of Kylo’s hair. He couldn’t detect the intentional way she was making his heart beat ever so slightly faster.

“You know,” she said carefully, “you should keep dying your hair. It looks really good black. Handsome even.”

The idiot actually smiled at that.

---

FIRST COMFORT

She found him curled up in the corner of some abandoned hallway, knees clutched to his chest and hyperventilating. The news had traveled quickly around the Tonides Base.

“I heard the Rhiaon bitch is dead,” Tara stood several feet away, just watching him. “Thought you would be prouder. Celebrating the victory. Maybe even popping a bottle of champagne with Hux and setting aside your differences for just a moment. Then again, you’re sixteen. You probably shouldn’t be drinking.”

Kylo said nothing, shaking as he rocked back and forth, and his eyes elsewhere.

Tara sighed and came to sit next to him. She placed a hand on his knee and rubbed it gently.

“Oh, calm down,” Tara’s voice was softer than it had ever been before or since. “It’s not that bad.”

“Rey is dead,” Kylo’s voice was full of the trembling sorrow he wouldn’t let fall from his eyes. “She… she died hot, tired, thirsty, hungry, and wanting her dad. And now… now she’s buried under hot sun and baking sand for all of eternity.”

“The true Skywalker nightmare.”

“This isn’t funny!” Kylo snapped. “When Uncle Luke finds out what happened… What I did to Felicity… Oh god, I can’t believe I did that. All I could think was how to make the situation worse. What would it take to make me feel better, to make it as poetic as possible?”

“I still can’t believe you actually did it. That was cold… and very admirable.”

“Uncle Luke is going to kill me. Then when he’s done, he’ll give what’s left to my mother, and then… well, my father would get what remained, but after my mom, there’s not going to be anything left. Bail Organa will have had a more tangible corpse to bury than what will be left of me. And Luke’s on his way now. Oh God. What do I do? What do I do? What do I-”

Tara slapped him.

Holding his face, looking very dazed, Kylo stared at her in shock and fear.
“Pull yourself together,” she growled.

“You hit me!” Kylo wanted to sound fearsome but came across as nothing more than childish.

“I’m sorry,” Tara resisted the urge to roll her eyes. “But this isn’t what a Knight of Ren does, let alone a Master. Get a hold of yourself!”

Kylo just stared at her, something worrisome spreading over his face. When he slid a few scoots away from her, Tara knew she had messed up.

Tara sighed, “I’m sorry. Truly. I’m not good with comforting sorrow. I shouldn’t have hit you.”

“That’s, um, okay,” Kylo said quickly.

Tara replaced her hand on his leg and back to stroke his thigh. The shudder he made was how Tara learned of his sensitivity in that area.

“I’m a little overwhelmed right now,” Tara lied. She followed it up with a truth, “In Snoke’s training, pain is used a tool to discipline softness. Like how punching a tree trunk over and over will make your fist tough and less susceptible to pain. I just don’t know how to deal with this sort of… emotion.”

Kylo relaxed, “It’s alright. My father is quite emotionally stunted. I’ve had a lot of experience in terrible comforting styles. Sure, never hit me, but I dreaded the times my mother would go away for her work and leave me alone with my father.”

“I pity that you endured Han Solo as a father.”

“I pity myself.”

“About a great many things, I suspect.”

Kylo couldn’t help but smile at that, “Insubordination.”

“Keeping your ass in line,” Tara bumped against him playfully.

“And I’m thankful.” Kylo sighed, “What am I going to do when Uncle Luke gets here?”

Tara lifted his chin and made Kylo look her in the eye, “You’re going to do one very simple thing. You look Luke Skywalker in the eye, you tell him that worthless schutta wife of his is dead… And you laugh in his face.”

FIRST MANIPULATION

“He can’t just be gone!” Kylo exclaimed.

Cern Ren and Tara Ren exchanged a look, unphased by their Master’s temper tantrum.

“I don’t know what to tell you, Sir,” Cern said. “Skywalker has disappeared. Rumours say he went to find the first Jedi Temple-”

“And where is that?” Kylo snarled.

Cern raised an eyebrow, “If people knew, he wouldn’t need to find it.”
He barely dodged the water glass Kylo threw at his head. Tara sighed as it smashed against the wall and glass littered the floor.

“I suggest you go try to find it then, Cern,” Tara said politely. She shot him a look to get the hell out as quickly as possible.

“By your leave,” Cern bowed his head, and took her unspoken advice.

Kylo let out something that sounded like an animal growl and dropped down hard into his desk chair.

“Okay, if I can’t kill people in my Expert Class, you can’t throw things at the Knights,” Tara said, sitting down in the chair across.

“Who are you to direct me?” Kylo snapped.

“Your second-in-command,” Tara shot back instantly. “You wanted me to keep your ass in line, so I’m keeping it there. Cern is doing his job.”

“Cern is an idiot!”

“Actually, he’s one of the few in command who isn’t. It’s like you and Hux are constantly in some sort of pissing contest over who can infuriate the Supreme Leader more.”

“We lost Luke Skywalker!”

“And you think that’s a defeat?” Tara scoffed. “We broke Luke Skywalker. We destroyed him. We made him crawl into a hole like a disgusting rodent. We won. There is no one standing in our way. What? You think your mother can take us down? The one who doesn’t give a damn about her powers and never trained them? All of the power is ours! Light Side is dead! The Force is dead! Let’s take advantage of that fact.”

“The Force isn’t dead. Merely… hibernating. It will awaken someday.”

“Then we prepare for that day.” She reached across and took his hands in hers, “You’re one of a kind, Kylo Ren. You’re in charge now. Give us your orders. There’s nothing in your way. Not even Snoke.”

Kylo frowned, “Those are dangerous words.”

“I’m simply saying that Snoke won’t be around forever. When that day comes, you’ll need someone at your side… I’m glad to throw my name in the ring.”

He swallowed, something new starting to grow in the air.

Tara smiled and reached out to stroke his cheek. Then, to his surprise, she kissed him.

“Master Ren, please excuse me,” Captain Alecta Anthea suddenly entered the room, “but we have reports of-”

She stopped when she saw the pair disengaging from a kiss.

“Forgive me,” Alecta bowed her head. “I didn’t realize-”

“It’s alright,” Tara smiled when Kylo didn’t respond. He was far too dazed to speak. “What is it?”
“We have reports of some Force Sensitive children that need to be collected,” Alecta informed. “I was hoping you might spare a Knight or two, Master Kylo.”

“Uh,” Kylo blinked, trying to gather his mind from the current situation and not that lovely kiss. “Right. Knights. You can, uh… You can take…”

Tara glanced at Alecta, “I can go.”

“Right,” Kylo nodded a little too eagerly. “You can take Kara. Tara. Go on. I have work to do.”

“Of course,” Tara grinned. She looked to Alecta, “Shall we?”

“What was that about?” Alecta asked as they walked down the hallway from Kylo Ren’s office. “You know the boy isn’t even seventeen, right?”

Tara shrugged, “I’m eighteen. I fail to see the problem.”

“So, you have affections for Kylo Ren. I think I’m going to have to inform the Supreme Leader about this.”

“Oh, please, that petulant child?” Tara laughed. “I’d much prefer a real man to Kylo. Wouldn’t you?”

“I’m not a sexual being. Asexual, I believe the term is.”

“Really? I would have thought you would want a child you can groom to carry your legacy.”

“God knows that the Anthea family has provided the world with more children than it needs. Just met my youngest niece, and I have never met an eleven-year-old more insufferable. Ugh, she’ll probably end up being like my youngest sister, and the world does not need another Aletha. But I don’t understand. Ben Solo is where you want to lay your cards?”

“A few of them,” Tara grinned. “Maybe a few elsewhere. That’s the thing about men, they’re so easy to manipulate. Especially First Order ones. They’re all so power hungry and wanting to prove themselves that when a pretty girl offers them attention—”

“You keep them under your thumb,” Alecta finished. “Trust me, I know all about it. You don’t climb rank in the Imperial Military as a woman without making a few… sacrifices.”

“I tell you, Captain, get close to one of those idiots in charge around here, and you can do whatever you want.”

“You know… I might just do that.”

FIRST TIME

“Have you made your choice yet?” Tara asked one day while she sparred with the almost nineteen-year-old Kylo Ren.

“No,” he grunted, swinging his blade down. He frowned when she blocked his blade, “The Supreme Leader says I have until my birthday. Two weeks isn’t that much pressure, right?”
“Huh, two weeks to find the girl to take your virginity. Sounds like a fairy tale.”

“This isn’t funny.”

“It is to me.”

“Tara!” Kylo exclaimed.

She sighed, “Alright, fine, it’s a big deal.”

“It’s a huge deal. This is me choosing the mother of my child. My consort. My-”

“Forever second-in-command.”

Kylo paused, “It’s not like that.”

“Oh, yes, it is,” Tara extinguished her saber. “Whoever is the mother of your child will be your right hand for the rest of your life.”

He turned off his own blade, “Tara, I promise your position is not compromised.”

“Yes, it is… but it doesn’t have to be.”

“What do you mean?”

“Pick me.”

Kylo frowned, “You? You’re interested?”

“Are you joking? Being the mother of the heir to the Skywalker legacy is one of the highest honours one could achieve. I’d take it far more seriously than the Rhiaon, Amidala, or Organa bitch.”

She felt something invisible slam into her.

“Don’t insult my mother,” Kylo growled.

Something more powerful slammed into Kylo sending him stumbling a few steps.

“And don’t use the Force against me,” Tara warned.

Kylo put up his hands in surrender, and she returned the gesture.

“Come now,” Tara slowly walked towards him. There was a sway in her step, “Think about it. What do you need in a mother? Someone beautiful; which I am.”

“Arrogant much?”

“Don’t think I haven’t noticed you staring at me for three years. And that’s another point in my favor; you need someone as arrogant as you. As strong, as powerful, as endeared by the Supreme Leader. And you need someone who is loyal to you unconditionally. I can be that… I can be what you want.”

Kylo didn’t know what to say, “I… I don’t believe this. Are you saying you’re in love with me?”

That made her laugh, “Love is not part of this deal, Kylo. I am everything you need. Who cares if love isn’t part of it? Did love save Felicity Rhiaon? Did love save Padmé Amidala? Did love save Alyla Kene?”
Kylo swallowed.

She was standing directly in front of him. Her hands were on his shoulders, very deliberate in every gesture. There was something missing in her words, but still they made his heart pound and his blood boil.

“You think about that kiss, don’t you?” Tara whispered. “The one I gave you years ago.”

“Yes,” he whispered, looking down into her burning grey eyes.

“You want to feel it again, don’t you?”

“Yes.”

“Then pick me, and taste it again.”

So he did.

That was the night she made him a man.

---

FIRST FIGHT

“If I have to get chewed out by the Supreme Leader one more time about this issue-”

“Gee, and here I was wondering why Kylo asked you to leave the meeting,” Cern said dryly as they sparred.

Tara swung her saber at his neck and just barely missed cutting open his throat.

“I’m just sick of it,” Tara growled. “Who cares if I’m not pregnant after a year? Do you really want a nineteen-year-old Skywalker to have a baby anyway?”

“No, that is a smart move,” Cern grunted as their blade clashed. “You know, this is probably a bad situation in which to do it, but can I ask you a serious question?”

“Fine,” Tara sighed. “But you piss me off and I decapitate you.”

“I believe it.”

Cern had been the first Knight to join after Tara, and throughout the years they had built a comfortable rapport. It was the reason Cern could ask a serious question without Tara actually cutting off his head… which she had actually done once to a Knight of Ren and would later do to four others. Not at the same time.

Okay, two at the same time. But she had warned them.

“You’re not… preventing it, right?” Cern carefully asked. He blocked her blade from his neck, “I mean just to delay it a few years. Come on, I know you. You want to lock him down as quickly as possible, but having a kid with him at nineteen isn’t what you want. You’re not waiting a few years before you let it happen?”

“No,” Tara answered honestly, “because I’m not fool enough to believe that Snoke will allow us to raise our own child. I won’t have to worry about our child for a very many years, and even then Snoke will probably have it primarily taught by Kylo over me. I’m a means to an end, and as long as I get my end of the rewards, then so be it. I’m not interested in diapers and screaming babies anyway.”

“I think that’s a very realistic view. You know, Kylo probably doesn’t realize any of that.”

“I’m not sleeping with the son of Han Solo for his intelligence. Speaking of men being idiots, are you still pursuing Dyna?”

“Trying,” Cern spoke of the newest Knight of Ren. “She’s really interested in Kylo, though.”

“Well, that’s not happening. I promise you.”

“He ordered you to do what?” Tara screeched.

“Tara, let me explain,” Kylo barely got the words out before he got slapped. “This wasn’t my choice! It’s an order!”

“Oh, and what a hard order it is,” Tara spat. “Poor me, I have to have sex with my new female employee.”

“The Supreme Leader wants as best a chance as possible at producing an heir. It’s not just Dyna. Any female Knight of Ren from now on has… has to…”

“Has to fuck you?” Tara ended crudely. “Damn it, Kylo. We had a deal!”

“It’s not going to change,” he promised. “You will always be my second-in-command. And you said it yourself. This isn’t about love. Unless…”

“Get that hopeful look out of your eye. No, my feelings towards you haven’t changed.”

“And neither have mine,” Kylo said quietly.

Oh fuck, what had she gotten herself into?

“Look,” Tara took a deep breath. She had to get this back under control, “I don’t love you, but I… I do care about you. Dyna doesn’t know you. Doesn’t see the real you. I do. I know what you want and need, and I can give that to you. No one else can.”

“What I need is an heir,” Kylo said slowly. “So far, you haven’t given me one.”

“And what am I supposed to do about that? You know I’ve been trying everything to help us. We’ve both been examined several times. We should be able to have a child easily, but…”

“But it never happens.”

Tara sighed, “What if this is a test? What if the Force wants you to recognize who the true mother of your child should be?”

“And what if the Supreme Leader is testing my loyalty? I have to follow his orders.”

Tara knew when to admit defeat. She would never be able to overcome Kylo’s loyalty to Snoke.

“Fine,” she conceded. “What exactly were his orders?”

“I must couple with every female Knight of Ren at least once a month.”
“Fine, once a month. But I get once a week. If I have to compete with that airhead, then we’re stacking the deck in my favor. Do we have a deal?”

“Deal.”

They shook on it.

FIRST ASSASSINATION

Dyna Ren was insufferable. By God did she love hanging off Kylo’s arm and flirting with him endlessly. It was shameful to do in front of the Stormtroopers, and just flat out annoying.

“You know, I get her going for the guy in charge,,” Cern muttered to Tara one day. “But did she really have to reject me publicly and then flaunt her so-called relationship with him in front of me and the soldiers?”

“Ben Solo loves his ego stroked,” Tara said coldly. “But at the end of the day, he knows what he really wants is someone to keep his ass in line.”

“Just wait. Word is we’re getting another woman as the newest Knight. Once Kylo is enamored with his new toy, Dyna will be forgotten.”

“And you’ll be there to pick up the pieces.”

“What can I say? I’m a man who knows an opportunity when he sees it,” Cern chuckled.

But that opportunity wasn’t meant to be.

“You’re just jealous,” Dyna scoffed at Tara. “Because Kylo doesn’t care about you anymore.”

“Funny, that’s not what he had while having sex with me last night,” Tara shot back. “Face it, you’re the shiny new toy. An easy fuck. His attention won’t last, and then his focus returns to me. I always have been and always be his right hand.”

“You’re a dried-up womb,” Dyna shot. “A year you fucked him and not so much as a late period. Face it, Honey, you’re going to be a bitter old spinster, and I’ll bless him with a dozen sons. And when I do have our first child, I’ll have him be rid of you.”

Tara stared at her for a very long time.

Then she made her decision.

“Well, good luck with a dozen labours,” Tara said coolly. “You might want to ask Alecta Anthea about raising large families. I know she’s got a few horror stories. Now, if you’ll excuse me, I have something to attend to.”

Alecta Anthea was surprised to find Tara Ren at her door so late at night.

“You said you did things to climb the ranks,” Tara got to the point. “You ever get caught?”

Alecta crossed her arms and leaned against the doorframe, “My idiot Rebel sister still doesn’t know the miscarriage she had during the war was me managing to pull strings and get a aborifact patch on “Well, I’m not looking for a miscarriage. I’m looking for a murder.”

“Now that,” Alecta grinned, “is something I can help you with.”

FIRST SANCTIFICATION

“It’s unfortunate what happened to Dyna,” Tara told Kylo as they sparred a few days after Dyna’s cremation. “Poisoning is such an awful way to go.”

“Indeed, it is,” Kylo spun around and swung. He hissed in pain as Tara’s saber bit into his arm.

“How many times do I have to tell you to stop with the fucking spinning? Going to lose an arm one day.”

“I thought that was a life goal,” Kylo grinned.

“Look, I know you get off on pain, but you get dismembered, and I’m not fucking you until you get a new limb.”

“Fair enough.”

Their sabers locked and they fought, pressing their weight forward, trying to make the other stumble back.

“So… anybody figure out who poisoned Dyna?” Tara asked casually.

“No. But it would have to be someone very cunning to pull it off.”

Tara almost thanked him for the flattery.

“Remind me, where were you when it happened?” Kylo asked.

Tara raised an eyebrow, “You suggesting something?”

“If you’re innocent, there’s nothing to worry about.”

“I was with Hux and Phasma all day. You can ask them.”

“I have. I just… it’s overall suspicious.”

“Break your heart, your girlfriend is dead?”

“Truthfully,” Kylo confessed, “no. She was an idiot and annoying. Not even that good in bed. She’s not… a great loss.”

Tara cocked her head to the side, “So, will there be an extensive investigation?”

“…No. I’ve ordered the investigation closed. No point in wasting resources on someone who is unlikely to be found. I just hope it doesn’t happen again.”

“And if it were to happen again?”
“Well… if they’re as annoying as Dyna, I don’t think I’d be bothered.”

Tara smiled.

_FIRST MISTAKE_

“I suppose I can move some things around,” Tara sighed, going through the lists of soldiers in the saber classes. “Are you sure that FN-2187 is ready for the Expert Class?”

“Positive,” Kylo answered. “I don’t care what his test result was. We should have been training him as a Blessed from the start.”

“His midichlorians aren’t high enough.”

“He is seventeen short.”

“But still seventeen.” Tara sighed, “Though, he is far more impressive then that Sasa.”

Kylo rolled his eyes, “Leave her out of this.”

“She’s pathetic. I don’t care if her breasts are big; she never should have been chosen as a Knight of Ren.”

“That was out of my control.”

“Yes, but you’re certainly not objecting to it now. Heard from Cern that things got pretty steamy after class yesterday.”

“I was helping her with her saber skills.”

“Oh, I’m sure you were.”

“Lightsaber,” Kylo snapped. “Just stances and footwork.”

“So you didn’t kiss her?”

Kylo was silent.

Tara shook her head, “You just give it up to anyone. You have fun screwing her on the training room floor?”

“Nothing more happened in the training room. We got… interrupted by Alyla,” Kylo admitted awkwardly.

“For once, I am thankful you have a weird ghost thing following you around. What’s even up with that?”

“We’re getting off topic.”

“Right, we’re discussing the problem of Sasa. You know it reflects poorly on us if I have her in the Expert Class and she’s performing at the bottom. That girl is not strong in the Force.”

“Not physically, but she’s powerfully mentally,” Kylo objected.
“Mmm, mentally… And how good does she taste between her thighs?”

“Tara!”

“Oh forgive me, did I cross a line?” Tara seethed. “Am I wrong about that so-called mentally powerful tart who can barely move a pebble with the Force?”

“She is strong mentally,” Kylo said sternly. “She… showed me last night.”

Her eyes burned into his skin, “Showed you… And what exactly is she showing you?”

“It’s called rebalancing, and it’s very helpful to me. I need that. I need someone to help keep-”

“Your head on your shoulders,” Tara finished coldly.

Kylo sighed, “Your position is not compromised.”

“It better not be. Or else I might have to intervene.”

“And if I don’t want you to intervene?”

Tara raised an eyebrow, “Then prove to me she isn’t a problem.”

Kylo met her gaze, “Fine. I’ll show you. But give her a chance.”

“She’s not the one who’s getting a chance here. Don’t screw this up, Kylo. We both know how dangerous I am.”

“Is that a threat?”

“Merely a statement of facts.” Tara crossed the room, heading towards the exit, “I have a report to get to Snoke tonight, so I won’t be able to join you as planned. I’ll come to you tomorrow night.”

“Actually, tomorrow I was going to have Sasa join me.”

Tara stopped in her tracks and turned to him with a scowl. She studied his nervous face. There was a worry in his eyes, but still they were strong and commanding.

Was he testing her?

“Fine,” she finally said. “But you’re on thin ice. Don’t make me worry about this.”

“I won’t.”

Tara was worried. How could she not be as she watched that little redhead with her hands and lips all over Kylo?

“You know we have actual things to do today!” she rudely interrupted.

The pair sprung apart in an instant, looking genuinely shocked at her presence. Tara scoffed at that. Two Force Sensitives and neither knew she was standing right there.

“You’re cold,” she said coldly before they could make excuses.
“I’m the Master of Ren,” Kylo offered as he smoothed out his clothing. The idiot didn’t realize he had Sasa’s lipstick on her face. “I can’t be late.”

“No, but she can.” Tara narrowed her eyes at Sasa, “You want to fuck Kylo, do it on your own time. I’ve got a class to run. Inside, now.”

“Yes, Tara,” Sasa bowed her head. She nodded to Kylo, “Master.”

She scurried quickly into the training room trying to smooth down her hair.

The second she was gone, Tara hit Kylo in the stomach.

“Ow! Tara! What are you doing?”

“Keeping your head on your shoulders,” Tara growled. “Someone around here needs to. Honestly, ever since she came around you’ve become pathetic.”

“Don’t speak to me that way,” Kylo snapped.

“And don’t forget our agreement,” Tara shot back. “I get it: she’s young, she’s lithe, she’s new. You want to stick your cock in her. I don’t give a shit. Just remember the promise you made. I am your number two. I am the mother of your child. I am loyal to you above all else. That girl is none of those things. If Snoke orders her to cut your throat, she’ll do it. I’ll only cut your throat if you betray me. Do not betray me, Kylo.”

“I never have. I never will. I keep my promises. I’m no Felicity Rhiaon.”

“Then don’t act like her. Don’t come in cocky and confident and lay your bets on some girl who makes your heart pound faster. You want to end up with a bolt in your brain too? Passion fades, Kylo. And when that’s gone, you see the people who are still standing at your side. And I have always been at your side.”

Kylo lifted an eyebrow, “Only because anyone who stood a chance mysteriously always dies. I am not responsible for that.”

“And yet you never condemn it,” Tara grinned. She grabbed his arm, nail piercing through his sleeve, “Come. We’ve wasted enough time. I’ll deal with you later.”

“Deal with me?”

Tara grinned and dug her nails in deeper, “It’s my night, isn’t it?”

Kylo chuckled suggestively. He couldn’t wait to feel those nails dragging down his bare back.

---

“We’re fighting in pairs today,” Tara announced, leading Kylo in by the arm.

When she released it, he casually slung it around her waist, hanging his wrist over her hip. He did not pull her in closer, but his claim of possession was clear. Tara delighted in seeing Sasa’s confused frown. The girl may have had Kylo tongue down her throat mere moments ago, but the pull of a single string and Kylo was her puppet instantly.

No amount of bodily curves or eye shadow could train Kylo out of that so quickly.
“The most important thing about fighting as a Knight of Ren is that we all must move as a perfect, cohesive unit,” Tara announced. “Master Kylo?”

The pair of them unclipped their lightsabers and ignited them. In the corner, Cern flicked on half a dozen blast remotes which surrounded the pair and started firing.

In perfect unison, Tara and Kylo blocked and slashed, defending both of them from the blasts. Not a word exchange between them, but they moved in perfect harmony. If Tara went left, Kylo went right. If Tara went up, Kylo went down. If their backs were to either other, Tara would take a step back and Kylo would move forward at the same time without a glance at her.

“They’re perfect together,” Sasa whispered.

“They do look amazing,” FN-2187 whispered back.

Sasa smiled nervously at him. She never liked when she saw Tara and Kylo together, but she was happy that someone in the class actually wanted to talk to her.

The last of the remotes beaten, Kylo and Tara ignited their lightsabers and clipped them back on their belts in perfect harmony.

“And that’s how you do it,” Kylo grinned arrogantly. “Now we’re not expecting you to be as good as us.”

“We’ve build that sort of harmony after eleven years of working together,” Tara continued. “But we’re going to train you to read the signs as such teamwork. Focus on instinct, focus on how your teammate moves, where they’re looking, what they’re focusing on. The most important thing to remember though, is when you’re in a team setting, you are only as strong as the weakest link.”

“Now pair up,” Kylo ordered. “Each team of two will face two of us. Tara will pair with both myself and Cern to even out the numbers.”

“Move quickly!” Tara barked.

Having paired a dozen times before, the class went for their usual partner. FN-2187 looked around awkwardly, trying to figure out who was left to be stuck with me.

“First day?”

He turned to see Sasa Ren smiling at me.

“Yeah,” FN-2187 admittedly a little shyly. “First time holding a saber too.”

“Tara point it at your neck?”

“Most terrifying moment of my life.”

“Good. Trust your gut. The woman will slit anyone’s throat in this room with no hesitation.”

“Except Master Kylo.”

Sasa looked over her shoulder to make sure Tara wasn’t watching. Tara was busy talking to Kylo and made no notice of the girl. Sasa turned back and gave FN-2187 a small smile.

“If you say so,” Sasa winked.
FN-2187 couldn’t help but grin at that.

“Need a partner?” Sasa offered.

“Kylo has very high hopes for you. Captain Phasma too. I want to see what we can make you into. Don’t worry,” Sasa touched his arm, “I have a very gentle touch.”

FN-2187’s eyes widened. Was Kylo Ren’s girlfriend flirting with him?

“Have you found a partner?” Kylo Ren was of course standing behind him at that moment.

“Oh, yes, Sir,” FN-2187 spun around abruptly. He felt like Kylo’s eyes were boring actual holes into his skull. “Sasa here offered-”

“Master Sasa,” Kylo corrected coldly. “And I’m interested in what exactly she was offering.”

“Oh stop it you,” Sasa chuckled like the situation was nothing at all. “You literally sleep with another woman on a regular basis, but I can’t touch another man’s arm? Oh, 2187, this man is terrible. Don’t you think?”

FN-2187 swallowed hard, “I would rather not answer that Master Sasa.”

“Hey, ignore him,” Sasa made a playful swat at Kylo. “Call me Sasa.”

Kylo bent his head down and whispered in her ear, “What do you think you’re doing?”

“Making you jealous,” Sasa answered simply.

“And why would you do such a thing?”

She arched a brow at him and answered in a low enough voice that FN-2187 couldn’t hear, “Because immediately after you fingered me to climax in a supply closet, you came into class all over Tara. Fair is fair, Kylo.”

Kylo cleared his throat and said lowly, “Well, yes, it is. But just remember what I taught you about your stance.”

Sasa gasped as his hands locked around her waist and slammed her hard back against his pelvis.

“Center your power in your core,” he growled in her ear. He rolled her hips back against him and she could feel him getting hard.

“Sasa!” Tara snapped. “You and your partner are up! Move!”

Kylo released her, and Sasa stumbled forward a little. Thankfully FN-2187 caught her before she fell.

“Thanks,” Sasa gasped, a little dazed from what just happened. Kylo was already sauntering away like it was nothing at all. “Sorry you had to see that.”

“Oh no, it’s okay,” FN-2187 said awkwardly. “The second-in-command of the entire First Order just ground against you because you touched my arm. No bad deal.”

Sasa couldn’t stop her blush.
“Had fun?” Tara said coldly as Kylo joined her side.

“Did it make you mad?” he asked.

“Kylo, I don’t give a shit who works you up,” Tara replied. “I’m the one who gets to work you down later.”

Cern moaned, “Why wasn’t my grandfather Darth Vader?”

He kept looking at her. Tara pretended she didn’t notice, but she noticed alright. As Tara was trying to fight the Stormtroopers with Kylo, his eyes kept going to Sasa talking in the corner with FN-2187.

It was disgusting. It was infuriating. It was insulting.

That schutta was undermining every single move of hers, and Kylo was just letting it happen. She was late for class. Hell, Sasa had to be in the class in the first place. She was making out with Kylo like some horny teenager, risking his perception of authority. Then she was intentionally baiting him with jealousy so he groped her in front of the entire class. And now she was stealing his attention in the middle of a training session.

Tara was right; Sasa was nothing more than a little snake come to usurp her. She should have seen it the moment Sasa sunk her claws in Kylo’s chosen prodigy.

No, Tara tried to keep Kylo’s attention as he glanced away once more, leaving her to fend for herself against the two Stormtroopers. Focus on me, Tara willed him. Focus on me.

But his eyes flicked to Sasa, who was grinning that she had caught his gaze. Kylo was so unfocused that he barely dodged a slash RT-2854 made at his knee. He stumbled backwards right into Tara, nearly knocking her into the blade of PQ-9443.

Tara slashed at PQ-9443’s chest, forcing him to jump back, but she was beyond pissed. In a final attempt to get him back on track, Tara pushed gently into his mind to send the image.

She stopped cold when she saw the thought in his mind.

Hands and lips, sighs and moans, thighs and breasts, forest green eyes and copper hair. He was thinking about his body entangled with Sasa’s as he made love to her passionately.

But that wasn’t the thought that made their stop.

It was the thought of Sasa with arms wrapped around him as he held a child with brown eyes and copper hair.

Their child.

Rage exploded inside of Sasa. All the anger and hatred she could muster was poured into the Dark Side, and she swung his saber hard.

The decapitated heads of RT-2854 and PQ-9443 hit the floor with a wet thud.

The entire room went silent. All eyes were on Tara Ren, panting hard, eyes flashing, and gripping her lightsaber tightly.

FN-2187 took a step in front of Sasa.

Then Kylo switched his lightsaber off.
Damn it, Tara!” he exclaimed. “How many times do I have to tell you to stop killing the recruits! This is the third time this month.”

Tara pivoted hard and pointed her saber at his throat. Instantly the Knights of Ren ignited their sabers ready to move and defend their leader. Kylo’s hand gripped the hilt of his saber, but he didn’t move just yet.

“How dare you?” Tara growled. She lowered her saber before anyone attacked, “You come in here late and focused and undermine everything I have fought so hard for. You make concessions for weaklings and need your ego stroked like a petulant child. You make inappropriate scenes with students and pit me against other women like we’re nothing but your personal harem. I am a Knight of Ren! I have fought for this title and I have earned it! I was chosen by Cade Ren himself, and you were forced in like a mother insisting you have to take your little brother with you when you go out with your friends. You flaunt your powerful bloodline, but you don’t do a damn thing with it. You want to be known as the grandson of Darth Vader. Then be the grandson of Darth Vader. You know what he did when a woman compromised his power? He strangled the bitch.”

Kylo lit his saber and had it at her throat in an instant, but her blade locked with it and pointed at his throat.

“Do not insult Padmé Amidala,” Kylo seethed.

“I will if I have to get my point across,” Tara growled. She pointed at Sasa, “That girl is dragging you down. Dragging all of us down. We put her out in combat with the rest of us and she will get us all killed, I guarantee it.”

“That’s not true.”

“Oh, but it is.” Tara turned to face Sasa, “You want to know why she’s so weak with her physical attacks? You want to know the dark truth? Because she draws on the Light Side, like a god damn Jedi.”

The Stormtroopers muttered among themselves, but Sasa was unmoved.

“And that is why the Supreme Leader desires me for Kylo’s mate over you,” Sasa smiled at Tara. “Yes, I draw on the Light Side, and yes, I draw on the Dark. Do you know why? Because I am a Knight of Ren, not a Sith. Not a Jedi. A Knight of Ren. Both are beneficial tools, so is are the mental powers where I am strong and you are weak.”

“You think I’m weak?” Tara pointed her saber at Sasa.

FN-2187 gripped his lightsaber hilt.

Kylo Ren noticed.

“Mentally,” Sasa replied. “Sure, you are doubtless strong physically, but once you are tired out there’s nothing left behind that flash and bolster.”

“You talk a lot, little girl,” Tara said, “but why don’t you prove yourself? Show me that you can be a valuable member of this team. Show me why the Supreme Leader picked you.”

“Sasa, you don’t have to do this,” Kylo said.

She held up a hand, “It’s okay. I’ll do it, but on one condition.”
“What’s that?”

“Winner gets Kylo tonight.”

Cern chuckled a little too loudly.

“Shut up,” Kylo told him.

Tara smiled, “Deal. Cern, you’re with me. Kylo with Sasa. Let’s see how good a team you two truly are.”

It wasn’t a fair fight. All FN-2187 could do was cringe as he watched Tara and Cern drive Sasa back hard. Kylo tried to help her out, but he had to focus on the attacks towards him as well as her, pulling double duty. For the two supposedly mentally strong Sensitives, they weren’t able to read each other well. They constantly bumped and crashed into each other, and once Sasa even accidently tripped Kylo sending him to the ground.

Sasa fought desperately trying to draw on the strength inside, as Tara was something possessed. Blow after blow crashed down hard on her lightsaber. If they weren’t made of light, the blade surely would have been broken in half.

This had been her gamble, her one shot at proving to everyone in the room that she was worthy of the title of Knight of Ren. Yet here she was failing and dragging Kylo down with her.

Sasa tried to jerk out of the way, but as she turned, Tara’s blade caught her ankle. She screamed and fell to the floor.

“Sasa!” Kylo yelled. Without thinking, he Force Pushed Tara and Cern away from her, sending them stumbling back. He dropped to his knees and check over her wound and comfort her, “Are you alright?”

“Pathetic,” Tara spat. “Look at you. Look at both of you.”

“I’m fine,” Sasa gently pushed Kylo away. “I’ll be fine.”

“I told you she wasn’t worthy,” Tara said. “I told you she’d drag us down.”

“Tara,” Kylo rose to his feet, “back down. Now. That’s an order.”

“But don’t you see, Kylo?” Tara continued. “She’s worthless. There’s not a single, notable thing about her that proves to anyone that she deserves to be a Knight of-”

That was when the lightning hit her. A blast of electric blue shot through her system and knocked her to the floor screaming. It was just a single shock, not a very powerful one at that, but enough to make everyone stare at the wielder in stunned silence.

Sasa panted, lowering her hand, “Sorry, Tara. Did the Supreme Leader not teach you that one?”

Tara lunged forward, ready to rip out her throat. Sasa pushed herself to her feet to do the same.

They instantly froze in spot.

Kylo held his arms out at the women, straining to keep them in place, “Everyone out! Now!”

No one needed to be told twice. When they were all gone, Kylo dropped his arms and the women hit the floor hard.
“Now that was pathetic,” Kylo spat. “What the hell were you two thinking?”

Sasa glared at Tara, “She wanted to know why the Supreme Leader chose me. I’m the only Blessed who has managed to conjure Force Lightning. You think me so inclined to the Light Side? You don’t know me. You don’t know how cold my soul can be. Only those completely who can completely devoid themselves of compassion can summon it. Can you, Tara?”

Tara said nothing.

“You don’t want to see me give into Darkness,” Sasa shook her head. “You don’t want to see the horrors inside of me.”

Kylo glanced down uncertainly at Tara. Neither knew quite what to say to that.

“And you?” Kylo’s throat was surprisingly dry. “What were you thinking, Tara?”

Tara pushed herself to her feet, “I was keeping your ass in line. The same thing I’ve done for eleven years. But it seems like that doesn’t matter to you, you ungrateful koybotto. You’re just interested in the newest, pretty thing. So fine. Have her in your bed tonight, because after today I sure as hell am not getting in it anytime soon.”

Kylo glanced nervously down at Sasa, “Well… uh, I guess, are you free tonight?”

With the looks on the women’s faces at him actually instantly turning around and saying that, Kylo was honestly surprised neither tried to claw his eyes out.

Sasa then glanced over at Tara and smiled, “Why, yes, Kylo. I am absolutely free tonight.”

Tara glared at her, “Well, enjoy yourself then, Sasa… while you can.”

Then she turned on her heel and stormed out of the room, ready to find Alecta Anthea and plot another murder.

“I should probably stick pretty close to you for the next while,” Sasa stared after Tara.

“Don’t eat anything without someone taste testing it first,” Kylo suggested. “See if you can get Hux to be your Guinea pig.”

“Well, I should got get my ankle checked out,” Sasa unsteadily get to her feet. Kylo helped her up.

“Are lightsaber wounds serious?”

He glanced at Sasa’s ankle, “Nah, you should be good by tomorrow. Just get a med droid to wrap it up and you’ll be fine. Do you want me to send Max to your room?”

Sasa frowned, “Max?”

“My medic droid. MX-1418. I call him Max.”

“Oh, sure.”

Kylo hesitated, “Just as a warning, Max is a bit of a… character. He uh… well I think you’ll like him. Just don’t tell anyone what he calls me.”

Sasa stared at him for a moment, but then thought it might be better to find out the answers to his cryptic questions firsthand.
“I’ll see you tonight,” Sasa kissed him on the cheek. “Usual time?”

“Sure.”

“Good. I’ll put on something… nice.”

Kylo bit his lip. He was always in for a lot of fun whenever Sasa decided to wear something nice.

But still, something about the lightning Sasa had used unsettled. He remembered Uncle Luke telling him how excruciatingly painful it felt. How could Sasa manage to conjure something so Dark… And what else was she capable of?

“Sasa,” he called as she was about to exit the training room.

She stopped and looked at him.

“The lightning,” Kylo asked, “…would you use it on me?”

Sasa just shrugged, “Don’t give me a reason to.”

And then she was gone.

Honestly, Kylo didn’t even know what to say.

Cern Ren, who had been merely hanging out on the other side of the doorway and spying, decided to come back into the training room.

“What?” Kylo barked.

“I just wanted to say that I take it back,” Cern leaned against the door. “I do not want to be the grandson of Darth Vader.”

Kylo sighed.

INTERCEPTED FIRST ORDER CASE FILE

MOST WANTED

NAME: Poe Dameron

SPECIES: Human

GENDER: Male

HOMEWORLD: Yavin 4

BACKGROUND: The New Republic Defense Fleet regarded Rapier Squadron Commander Poe Dameron as one of its ace pilots, yet also considered him a bit of a “loose cannon” due to his outspoken political beliefs.

Disappointed by the New Republic’s lack of urgency in confronting the First Order, Dameron left the NRDF to join the Resistance. He now commands an elite starfighter unit under the call sign “Black Leader,” and also engages in solo espionage missions that Resistance leaders deem highest priority.
“And so it is with great pleasure that we pass on the title of Head of Air Force to one of the greatest pilots of this generation, and the son of the woman who began this all, Commander Poe Dameron,” Leia announced to the assembly.

As Diego Nalto pinned the crest onto Poe’s uniform, everyone clapped, Kaydel and Aletha the hardest in the front row while Kes Dameron tried to control the wildly bleeping and rolling BB-8 losing his mind with pride not far off.

“Congratulations,” Diego told Poe in a low voice. “You truly deserve this. Your mother would be so proud.”

“Thank you, Sir,” Poe replied, unable to stop smiling.

Diego shook his head, “No more, Sir with me. We’re equals now… Well, actually, no we’re not. Forget that. I’m still Sir.”

“Yes, Sir,” Poe laughed as Diego stepped back.

He lifted his hand to give the former Head of Air Force one last salute. All around, every pilot lifted their hand to do the same.

Diego hesitated and glanced to Aletha in the crowd. She knew that worry on his face, how he so desperately wanted to his arm to stop shaking for just a moment. Aletha smiled at his gently and gave an encouraging nod. They had been through this a dozen time that day, Diego fighting his fight of this moment. It was okay to draw attention to the injury. There was no need to be ashamed.

Lifting his trembling hand, Diego made a clumsy and slow salute. The pilots finished theirs and the assembly clapped again. Diego and Poe were then directed off the stage to where their Anthea girls were waiting.

“You did great,” Aletha held his trembling arm as Leia began to speak.

“You both did,” Kaydel lifted up on her toes to kiss Poe. “I’m so proud of you.”

“I think we should both be pretty proud,” Poe hooked an arm around Kaydel’s waist. “Nalto and I certainly have the prettiest dates.”

“I’ll proudly take that,” Diego chuckled. “Kaydel, you look almost as breathtaking as your aunt.”

“Almost?” Kaydel teased.

“Well, it’s a good effort, but look at my Darling,” Diego gestured to Aletha. “Not even the stars could compare to her beauty.”
Kaydel leaned in to her aunt, “How can it be that your boyfriend goes around saying things like that to you, and you still haven’t let him get laid?”

Aletha blushed and swatting the laughing Kaydel away.

“Although, I do say Lieutenant Connix,” Diego grinned, “you do look stunning tonight.”

“So,” Kaydel asked, “are we just never going to discuss how my extremely similar aunt and I basically ended up with the exact same charming, impulsive, passionate, hot-headed Yavinese pilot?”

“That’s the plan,” Diego answered

“Sounds good to me,” Poe shrugged.

Kaydel sighed.

“Hey,” someone next to them said, “do you mind keeping it down?”

“Sorry,” Aletha apologized and they turned their attention back to Leia’s speech.

Leia was explaining how they were going to restructure the Flight department under Poe’s leadership. All squadrons would be dissolved in favor of a more unified approach. Poe would be the only one who held a permanent title of Black Leader, named in honour of his ship, Black One. There would be two main flight squadrons on the D’Qar base: Blue – the primary line of defense, and Red – focusing on support. Pilots would be assigned a callsign based on the mission. So during one flight they might be Blue Three, but another they could be Red Seven.

The title of Rogue Squadron was also going into semi-retirement. Since most of Rogue Squadron were getting to be too old or too busy to fly for the Resistance, Leia and Diego decided to put the name on hiatus until another generation wanted to pick up the gauntlet.

“We will also permanently retire the callsign, Rogue One,” Leia announced. “The title of Rogue One has been held by two of our boldest, bravest, and most beloved Rebellion veterans. We honour our heroes, Commander Diego Nalto, and Lieutenant General Fel-”

The microphone chose that moment to let out a loud squeal of feedback.

“-aon Skywalker,” Leia finished. She considered repeating Felicity’s name, but decided to just continue on with the speech, “They dedicated their lives to fighting for justice and freedom. Tragically, one paid the ultimate price for this fight, and the other has fought until he is incapable to continue serving in a physical capacity. For these sacrifices, we forever give the name of Rogue One to these true heroes.”

Catching sight of an old friend in the crowd, Aletha leaned over to her niece.

“Hey, Kaydel,” Aletha whispered. “I hear tonight’s a big night.”

“Yes, Aunt Ally,” Kaydel blushed. “I know you and Diego plan to finally-”

“No that!” Aletha looked to make sure Diego wasn’t listening. He had a very suspicious smile for someone who apparently didn’t hear. “I meant for you. Kes Dameron’s here.”

“Yeah, he is,” Kaydel glanced at Poe. He had a similar grin to Diego’s. “Poe’s introducing us tonight. I’m kind of nervous. Do you have any advance?”
“Well, I’ve never actually met a boyfriend’s father before; they’ve all been dead. But I have met Kes, and he’s a good man. Think of him as a slightly less charming, and significantly more serious Poe. Just don’t take him too seriously. Kes does like to have his fun.”

“Speaking of people you should meet,” Diego nudged Aletha and pointed to someone in the crowd. “There’s someone who you might find fun to meet.”

“Doctor Aletha Kymeri, meet Lando Calrissian,” Diego introduced at the reception.

“This is Diego’s girlfriend and our newest doctor on staff,” Leia – who had been speaking with Lando – explained as Lando and Aletha shook hands. “Aletha is a Rebel veteran.”

“It’s an honour to meet you,” Lando kissed her hand. “Now, Diego, I didn’t figure you a man with such eloquent tastes.”

“Hey, back down, she’s mine,” Diego warned.

“Stop it,” Aletha swatted Diego. “The honour is all mine, General Calrissian.”

“Don’t you worry,” Lando said. “I lost my heart to another many years ago. You know, Leia, if I had know you had such beautiful women walking around this base, I would come by for more than just the parties.”

“Lando’s involvement with the Resistance is generally financial support,” Leia explained.

“Hey, running Cloud City isn’t a part-time job.”

“You know, General Calrissian, I’ve actually met you before,” Aletha said. “During the war, I fixed you up… You hit on me while I was doing so.”

“Wait, what?” Diego scowled.

“Then how is it that I did not take a creature as lovely as you to dinner with me?” Lando asked.

“Because you hit on me while my now late husband was literally standing in the same room,” Aletha grinned.

Lando’s smile froze, “Yeah, that would do it. My apologies.”

“It’s ok,” Aletha waved off. “It’s a fun story for me now. So you come to the Resistance for the parties.”

“Yes. Unfortunately, there are far too few of them. But there is always one thing I can guarantee at them. I always see the Resistance officer who parties the best.” Lando waved over someone, “Come on over.”

To Aletha’s surprise, Lando was talking about Amilyn Holdo.

“Amilyn, My Dear,” Lando hugged her and gave her a kiss on the cheek. “How are you? How’s the Ninka?”

“Ship’s doing great,” Holdo replied. “Your people worked wonders on her.”
“Repairs and security are our foremost promise for ships on Cloud City,” Lando said.

“Okay, sometimes things slip through the crack,” Lando dismissed. “Han still not found it?”

“I think Chewie’s given up at this point,” Leia shrugged. “But it’ll be back. Like a horrible rash you can’t get rid of.”

“Isn’t that the truth,” Lando chuckled. “So, Amilyn. How have you been?”

“Great ever since I get off D’Qar,” Holdo answered. “I had to hold down the fort for a few months, and there was this pilot that drove me up the wall.”

“Amilyn, please don’t insult Poe Dameron at his own promotion ceremony,” Leia requested politely.

“Who’s insulting my son?”

“Kes!” Diego’s face lit up. He hugged the man who had joined their group, “It’s good to see you.”

“Good to see you,” Kes smiled. “Sorry about your arm.”

“Eh, it’s my own fault,” Diego dismissed. “You remember my girlfriend, Aletha?”

“How could I forget?” Kes hugged Aletha. He then punched Diego in the arm, “Told you you were in trouble.”

“Oh, and it’s a trouble I hope never to be rid of,” Diego chuckled.

“Speaking of trouble,” Kes said, “anyone seen my son? I’m supposed to be meeting his girlfriend tonight.”

“Poe’s just right over there,” Leia pointed towards Poe and Kaydel talking with Snap Wexley. “I’m surprised he’s introducing you to Kaydel tonight. That’s a big step.”

“I’m still not buying that relationship,” Holdo shook her head. “I think he might be carrying it on just to spite me.”

Kes smiled too sweetly at her, “You must be Amilyn Holdo.”

“Whatsoever Poe told you about her is a lie,” Leia interrupted.

“Well… mostly,” Diego muttered.

Holdo glared at him.

“So, can anyone tell me about this Kaydel girl?” Kes asked. “I want to scope her out before I meet her.”

“Well, she’s Aletha’s niece,” Diego nodded to his girlfriend. “I’ve worked with her a lot. Very lovely girl.”

“Kind but spirited,” Leia smiled. “She adores Poe, but also keeps him in line.”

“Good,” Kes said. “That sounds good. I was hoping to find out a little about her from someone other than Poe. Take away the rose-tinted glass and get some actual information about her.”
“Coddle him much, Kes?” Lando chuckled.

“He’s my only child,” Kes replied. “A parent can be very wary when they hear about their son getting involved with some strange girl you have no idea about.”

“Oh, I know all about that,” Leia took a very large drink from her champagne.

Lando leaned over to Aletha, “You should hear some things that come out of the First Order about hers.”

Leia glared at him, “For the last time, Lando, my son does not have a harem.”

Lando said nothing to that.

“So… Kaydel,” Kes brought the conversation back. “Is she good for Poe?”

“Kes, I’ve literally never seen your son happier,” Diego said.

“That’s good,” Kes said. “I still don’t know though…”

“Hey, if you want more intel, I’ll gladly go collect some,” Lando offered. “Go turn on the Calrissian charm. See if she stays true.”

Kes raised an eyebrow, “Is it wrong I really want to see that.”

“Ladies and Gentlemen!” Lando announced, grabbing another glass of champagne from a passing waiter. “I’m going in. Amilyn? Shall we?”

“Why not?” Holdo sighed. She didn’t like Poe Dameron and Kaydel Ko Connix but damn it did she love to party with Lando.

Leia frowned as the pair made towards Poe and Kaydel, “I’m going to go… stop him.”

“That sounds good,” Aletha said.

Quickly Leia departed.

“Well,” Kes said, “I think I’m going to talk to some other friends, and then I’m going to dive in. Wish me luck.”

“Good luck, Kes,” Diego laughed.

“Go easy on her,” Aletha called after his retreating form. She turned back to Diego, “Well, look at us all alone.”

“Huh,” he placed his hands on her hips. “It looks like we are. I wonder what we could get up to tonight?”

“Well, I have a few ideas.”

“Are you sure you want to do this tonight, Aletha?”

“I’m ready. I want to make love to you, Diego Nalto because… I love you.”

Diego smiled, “I love you too. Thank you. Thank you for being there for me tonight.”

She lifted up and kissed his lips.
“Anytime,” she whispered.

Diego frowned a little.

Huh. Did she just say…

Oh, it was probably nothing.

“And they’ve been fighting ever since,” Leia finished the story of Poe and Holdo’s first meeting for Lando.

Lando chuckled, “That’s certainly a bold move to barge into someone’s room like that.”

“At least we weren’t doing worse,” Kaydel couldn’t believe they were actually discussing this.

“But since then, Vice Admiral Holdo seems to have a vendetta against our relationship,” Poe narrowed his eyes.

“Why?” Lando frowned. “They’re in different departments, and it’s by no means the first case we’ve had. Didn’t a pilot just marry someone from maintenance last month? I remember sending a gift.”

“That reminds me, they wanted me to tell you that thank you notes are going to be a little bit delayed,” Leia said. “Apparently we’ve been running so many missions with his X-Wing squad that they haven’t had the time to get together and write them.”

“War waits for no one, not even thank you notes,” Lando chuckled, sipping at some champagne.

“So, Amilyn, what is so wrong about these two kids being together? They seem to be a pretty good fit.”

“Thank you, General Calrissian,” Poe nodded, wrapping an arm around Kaydel’s waist. He wondered how he and Kaydel even ended up having a conversation with Holdo in the first place.

“And I second that query. Why are you so against us?”

Holdo sighed, “You want the truth?”

“If you can manage it.”

“Poe,” Leia warned.

“Sorry, General.”

“Fine.” Holdo took a deep breath, “Besides the fact the two of you make it your mission to antagonise me at every turn, I’m mostly against it because I very much dislike large age differences. It feels like someone is taking advantage of the other. Maybe an older man poaching a naïve young girl. Maybe some pretty young thing going after a man’s money. But anything past three years difference, I don’t approve.”

Poe frowned, “You don’t like us because I’m seven years older than her?”

“Don’t you think you should be dating girls your own age? Not a twenty-two-year-old?”

“I got involved with Han when I was twenty-two,” Leia cut in. “And Han’s ten years older than me. True, we didn’t really get off the ground until a year later. Thank you very much for that, Lando.”
“Twenty-eight years later, and I’m still apologizing for carbonite. Unbelievable.”

“But the point still stands,” Leia finished.

Holdo smiled at her friend, “Well, in all fairness, Leia, your relationship with your husband is… special. Not really one to aspire to.”

“Well, with all the relationships I’ve seen that do fit the idea of what people aspire to, between my brother, my real parents, my birth parents, and countless friends – two of which are even here tonight – either one or both parents end up getting murdered, so I think Han and I are doing something right.”

“Hey, don’t jinx it,” Lando joked, trying to push the image of Alyla’s murder out of his mind. “You know Han going to end up getting himself killed at some point.”

“Undoubtedly, but we’ve certainly made it far longer than most relationships I know,” Leia said. “Small doses do wonders for love. Once you start feeling like you’re going to kill the other person, take a break.”

“Well, if that’s what you and Han do, I’m amazed you spend more than a day together,” Lando joked. “How long was the last run?”

“Four months. Actually we should actually be coming up on another run pretty soon,” Leia sipped at a glass of wine sounding as casual as if discussing something as simple as trade taxation rates. “Age differences do work.”

“Yes, but there’s many cases where they don’t,” Holdo insisted. “Take General Calrissian for example. He had a young girl on his arm for years, and that ended in disaster. How much younger was Alyla again?”

The group went dead silent.

Holdo scowled, “Was that not her name? Alyla Kene?”

Lando cleared his throat, “Uh, yeah that was her name. She was fourteen years younger than me.”

“See,” Holdo said. “The girl spends years leading Calrissian on – funny how she never seemed interested in marriage or solid commitment – but gladly accepted whatever expensive gifts you lavished on her. Exchanged, what? A little sex in return. Then she just disappeared, leaving you high and dry and broken hearted.”

Everyone just stared at her in open mouthed shock.

“What?” Holdo frowned. “Wasn’t that what happened?”

“Something like that,” Lando looked deeply wounded, but managed to hold himself together. He downed the last of his drink and glanced around the room. “I’m going to go talk to Nubb. It’s been ages since I’ve seen him. Hey, Nien! Long time, Buddy!”

“Wow,” was all Poe could say as Lando went off to see his friend.

“Yeah,” Kaydel shook her head in disbelief.

Leia had a hand on her face, “Amilyn…”

“What?” Holdo exclaimed. “Why are you all looking at me like that? Wasn’t Alyla Kene just after his money and then ran off with another man without a word?"

“Alyla Kene was murdered,” Leia said. “By my son… while she and Lando were in the process of adopting a child. And she never married Lando because she was a former slave and didn’t want another legal document out there stating she was legally tied to another person.”

“Oh my goodness,” Holdo gasped. “I had no idea. I just heard she was gone and that no one wanted to discuss the details, so I assumed… I have to go apologize to him.”

Leia caught her arm, “Maybe wait until tomorrow. I think you’ve done enough for tonight.”

“Leia, I am truly sorry. I didn’t mean-”

“I know you didn’t, but for the love of the Force, why am I having another conversation with you like this? First this whole Poe and Kaydel thing, then insulting my own marriage, and now insulting Alyla? …I think we need to go have a discussion. In my office.”

“Of course,” Holdo nodded. She looked to Poe and Kaydel, “Good night, Lieutenant Connix. Commander Dameron, congratulations. I hope you two have a pleasant enough evening.”

Poe smirked, “Well, I’m going to introduce Kaydel to my father, because things are truly that serious with us, and then we’re going to go back to my new quarters and make love over and over, all night long. I love the way girls younger than me react in bed. It should be a pretty good night.”

He enjoyed the look of shock on Holdo’s face and the glower on Leia’s far too much.

“Good night, Ladies,” Poe nodded.

“Night, Dameron. Try to have some dignity,” Leia warned. “It reflects badly on myself and Nalto if our new Head of Air Force doesn’t know when to shut up.”

“Duly noted, General,” he grinned.

Leia looked to Kaydel, “Lieutenant Connix, I trust you’ll deal with Commander Dameron appropriately?”

“Of course, General,” Kaydel smiled and bowed her head.

When Leia and Holdo departed, Kaydel smacked Poe upside the head.

“Ow!”

“Really, Poe?” Kaydel scolded. “You couldn’t have handled that with a little more decorum?”

“You know, you hit a lot like the General,” Poe rubbed his head.

“Poe!”

“Sorry,” he mumbled. “I’m sorry, Babe, but she riles me up.”

“Yeah, I got that when we broke her desk chair,” Kaydel rolled her eyes. “I’m starting to think the only person who can actually keep you in line is Jessika.”

“In my defense, that girl scares me a little.”

“Good. I have a secret weapon. Honestly, Poe, that was so embarrassing.”
“Hey, I didn’t call a murdered woman a gold digger.”

“That was awful,” Kaydel shuddered. “I don’t think you could possibly top that with something even more embarrassing and awful.”

“Then on that note, I think it’s time you meet my father,” Poe chuckled. “Although, I have to warn you, if you don’t get his stamp of approval, I may break up with you.”

“Alright, but I’m warning you, if he’s even more charming and handsome than his son, I may break up with you. Come on, Peacock. Think you could call me Mommy?”

“After the things I’ve done to you, I don’t think it’d be legal.”

Kaydel laughed, and Poe led her in search of his father.

Paige Tico bit her lip as she watched Evan Tharel flirting with some redhead.

“I see you staring,” Rose said from her side.

“Staring?” Paige asked innocently. “Staring at what?”

“Evan Tharel. You haven’t moved your eyes from him all night. Look if you like him, just go talk to him.”

“Oh, I couldn’t.”

“Yes, you can. And you will. Here, just take a deep breath, drink something, calm your nerves, and go get him.”

Paige took a deep breath, “Ok. Okay. I’ll do it. But… Oh where did I put my glass of water?”

“Take a sip of my drink,” Rose passed her the glass.

Paige took a drink and instantly spat it out.

“Rose!” Paige coughed, the surprise of unwelcome alcohol hitting her system. “You’re way too young to be drinking this!”

Rose grinned, “Who’s going to stop me? You?”

Paige sighed, “Give me that.”

She downed the rest quickly, and Rose laughed.

“Alright,” Paige crackled her knuckles and rolled her shoulders, stretching out like she was about to run a marathon. “Let’s to this.”

Rose held up her half moon pendant, “May luck be on your side.”

Paige raised her necklace in a cheers gesture, “May it help me.”

And she marched towards Evan Tharel.

Rose laughed and grabbed another glass of champagne from a passing waiter.
“Oh, I so have to tell Kira about this,” Rose grinning, told the droid who happened to be passing her at that moment.

C-3PO had no idea who Kira was.

They found Kes Dameron in the corner of the room, having a full-on conversation with BB-8.

“Yeah, the crop is good this year, but Drexin is still trying to con me out of a good price.”

Bop quip boo.

“Hey, hey, watch the language. Oh, and did you search this databases for me? I’m still trying to battle the jerk bugs in the west orchard. I can’t find something that will get rid of them without destroying the fruit of the trees.”

Bip bee beep.

“Good idea. I’ll try that. So, how’s Poe doing? Behaving himself?”

Bwah beep boop boo!

“He used you as a lookout to do what?”

Bee bow beep bop.

“You little traitor,” Poe exclaimed.

Beep bip!

BB-8 spun around in shock to see his Master. He rolled forward to Poe and began to speak quickly.

Bip boop bop beep.

“No, no, no,” Poe shook his head. “Don’t pretend you weren’t ratting me out to my father. I heard you.”

Bwah bip.

“Little too late for sorry, the damage has been done,” Poe shook his head. “Dad, I can explain-”

“Stop!” Kes held up his hand. “I don’t actually want an explanation.”

Poe frowned, “Really?”

Kes just looked at his son, “Do you want me to discuss my sex life?”

“Hell no,” Poe knew his father had been celibate since his mother’s death.

“Likewise, I, your father, do not want to hear the details of yours.”

“That sounds logical enough,” Kaydel admitted.

“Besides,” Kes gave his son a teasing grin, “if what BB-8 has been telling me about you two is correct, then going over that topic will take all night.”
“Dad!” Poe’s jaw dropped.

“We don’t just…” Kaydel stammered, blushing a little that the very first thing her boyfriend’s father ever discussed with her was how frequently she was banging his son. “Oh God. This is horrifying.”

“Okay, knock it off, Dad,” Poe glared at Kes. “I’m sorry, Babe. Dad and I are very casual and candid, and he loves teasing me. It just means he likes the person he’s making fun of.”

“Does that mean you like me?” Kaydel asked nervously.

“Why don’t you find out?” Kes smiled warmly. “Now, Poe, stop being rude and properly introduce your girlfriend to me.”

“Yes, Dad,” Poe shook his head. “Kay, this is my father, Kes Dameron. Dad, this is Kaydel Ko Connix.”

“It’s a pleasure to meet you, Sir,” Kaydel shook his hand.

“Pleasure’s all mine, Dear,” Kes replied. “My boy been treating you well?”

She couldn’t help the mischievous grin that split her face as she glanced at Poe.

“Only when I want him to,” she answered coyly.

Poe’s eyebrows shot higher than she thought they could go. But thankfully, Kes just laughed at the innuendo.

“You’ve got some snap to you, don’t you?” Kes chuckled. “Poe always has liked a girl with a sharp wit. Points there to you.”

“Are you assigning points to see if I add up to be eligible for the Kes Dameron seal of approval?”

“Don’t knock the Kes Dameron seal of approval. Gets you discounts at select restaurants.”

BB-8 looked up at Poe.

_Bee beep bop?_

“No, Buddy, they’re just joking,” Poe explained. “There’s no discount.”

“Well, I hope I can rack up the points high,” Kaydel casually clung onto Poe’s strong arm. His palm automatically rested on her hip, “I rather enjoy my time with your son, and I know how much your opinion means to him. I would hate for this to come to an end because of this.”

“You are off to a good start,” Kes said, briefly giving his son a gentle punch in the arm, which Poe knew was for giving Kaydel the impression he would dump her if Kes didn’t approve. “A good, firm handshake like yours is triple point digits alone.”

“Her handshaking skills were the thing that made me ask her out,” Poe grinned.

“Oh? Not any of the ten thousand other assets of hers you go on and on about?” Kes smiled at Kaydel, “I can’t get this boy to shut up about you. Every call, it’s all _Kaydel said this_ and _Kaydel did that_, and always with the biggest grin on his face. The boy is mad about you.”

Kaydel squeezed Poe’s arm and leaned against him, “I’m mad about him too, Sir.”
“Oh, stop calling me Sir. You can call me Kes. Sir makes me feel old.”

“Really?” Poe lifted his eyebrow. “Not that you have a son who is pushing thirty?”

“If you want to act old, Poe, I am absolutely willing to start nagging you for grandchildren.”

Poe’s eyes shot wide. His face reddened as he glanced nervously at Kaydel and sputtered out a nonsensical reply.

But Kaydel wasn’t perturbed by it at all.

“I guess I have a lot to live up to if he’s been talking me up,” Kaydel said.

“Well, you’re certainly as pretty as he claims,” Kes winced.

“Hey, back off, Dad. She’s mine.”

“Don’t worry, Poe, she’s not my type,” Kes laughed. “His mother is really the opposite of you. Tall, dark, curvy. No offense.”

“None taken. Though I would like to reach higher shelves.”

“But she’s got the same fire as Mom,” Poe said proudly.

“Good, you need someone to keep you in line,” Kes joked.

Bop boo bwah bee!

“Don’t worry, Bud, I know you do your best,” Kes patted BB-8 on the head. “What about you? What do you think about this Kaydel Ko Connix?”

BB-8 immediately launched into a long series of beeps, whistles, and excited body wiggles. He was only to proud to proclaim how much he liked her and how perfect she was for Poe, and how it was all thanks to him.

“I do owe you one, Buddy,” Poe chuckled when BB-8 finished. “You bashing me in the leg was one of the best things to ever happen to me.”

Boop boop bee?

“No, that doesn’t mean you can do it more often,” Poe replied.

Beep bop boo.

BB-8 replied sadly, his head sinking forward.

“Oh, it’s alright,” Kaydel chuckled. “I’m sure he’ll give you more than enough cause sooner or later.”

“Hey,” Poe frowned. “Don’t you two team up on me.”

“Too late,” Kaydel grinned, “I may know everything about you, but I trust BB-8 more.”

“Wow, you two move fast,” Kes shook his head. “What? Five months in and you already think you know everything about him?”

“Well, not everything, but the juicy stuff at least.”
“I admire your optimism, Kaydel,” Kes said.

“No, it’s true,” Poe input. “I have no secrets from Kaydel. Any embarrassing fact or story you can throw at her, I’ve already told.”

“So you took the fun from my meet the son’s girlfriend night, did you?”

“Exactly why I did it.”

“No,” Kes shook his head, “I don’t believe it. You didn’t tell her everything.”

Kaydel arched a single, perfectly groomed eyebrow, “Try me.”

Kes grinned at Poe, “Challenge accepted.”

Poe frowned, “Have a bad feeling about this.”

“Who was the first girl to break Poe’s heart?” Kes quizzed.

“Myra Alondra,” Kaydel shot back instantly.

“Why did she break his heart?”

“She had a crush on you and dated Poe to get closer to you.”

“First time Poe went to the Med Office at the Academy, and why?”

“Two weeks into his first year. Seniors hazing freshmen. Poe ended up glued to his steering mechanism.”

“What did he have an irrational fear of until he was fourteen?”

“Staplers.”

“What happens to Poe whenever it starts to rain?”

“He starts smelling burning toast and no one – several doctors included – can figure out why, but at this point you’re too afraid to ask.”

“How did he find out Jessika Pava was a lesbian?”

“He asked her out while she was on a date with a woman.”

“What was his first word?”

“A rather vulgar Yavinese swear he overheard you yell when you got your arm caught in a sliding door.”

“What present did I promise for his 18th birthday?”

“His first tattoo. The symbol of his mother’s squadron on his shoulder.”

“What was his actual first tattoo?”

“His squad got him drunk on his birthday and he got a tramp stamp of BB-8. Still has it, actually. Looks nice.”
Beep bop bee.

BB-8 sounded too proud.

Kes narrowed his eyes and thought for a long while. Then his eyes lit up, and he got a grin that Poe knew meant no good.

“False tooth,” Kes said slowly.

Poe’s eyes shot wide.

Kaydel frowned, “False tooth? I don’t think I know that one.”

Kes chuckled and placed a hand on her back, “Oh, Honey, grab yourself a drink and maybe take a seat. I’ve got a good one for you.”

“Dad,” Poe said nervously as Kes waved over a waitress and got the three of them new flutes of champagne. “She- She really doesn’t need to hear this one.”

“Poe, I am your father. It is my responsibility to embarrass you to your girlfriend. I will break out the baby pictures if I need to.”

“Oh, I bet you look adorable,” Kaydel laughed, patting Poe on the arm.

“Also bathtub videos.”

“Tell her the tooth story!” Poe exclaimed.

Kes grinned, “I love being a father. Alright, so here’s the story of Poe’s false tooth.”

“Hold on a second!” Poe grabbed a glass of champagne from a passing waiter. He downed it in one and slammed it back on the tray before the waiter had even finished passing. “Okay, I’m good… Oh, I shouldn’t have done that.”

Kaydel laughed, giving Poe a quick hug as he rubbed his head, “Go on, Kes.”

“Alright, so you know how Poe is really into maintaining his appearance?” Kes asked.

“I’m familiar with Peacock’s habits.”

“Peacock,” Kes laughed. “I’m stealing that. But what I was saying is that there is a reason Poe is so particular about his appearance.”

Kaydel grinned, “Oh this is going to be good. I just thought he was a pretty boy.”

“No, Poe’s always been a pretty boy. I swear to God, the first thing he did out of the womb was check his hair.”

“I’m going to need more champagne.”

“So, here’s the false tooth story. When Poe turned sixteen, he joined the New Republic Defence Force. Being underage, he wasn’t a combat member yet. It’s was something more like a glorified part-time job. Poe, no matter how talented he was, was not supposed to fly in combat. Unfortunately, three very unfortunate things happened to him: one, he is an extremely talented flying. Always has been, and I swear he had better moves at sixteen than I saw on thirty-year-olds during the war.”
“Why can I already guess where this is going?” Kaydel sighed.

“Two,” Kes continued, “his instructors were… ultimately they ended up demonstrating poor judgement in valuing talent over requirements. Now I get breaking and bending the rules sometimes. I was in the Rebellion after all. But when you’re dealing with teenagers, you have to give very little leeway to them. That is because of item number three: Poe was a sixteen-year-old boy… and sixteen-year-old boys are idiots. They’re hormonal, they’re impulsive, and they’re at the age where they think they’re the most mature and intelligent person in the world but are actually really stupid and don’t understand how the world actually operates.”

“So, what stupid thing did Poe do?”

“For the record, I do not blame my son for what happened. This was the fault of his instructors. There were two officers – the ones he interacted with the most – who recognized his talents. They wanted him in combat immediately, but there was the pesky little age restriction in their way. Now they couldn’t just go to the heads of the Academy and the NRDF because at the time, Wedge Antilles and Diego Nalto sat on the board. If they got even a whiff of the officers wanting to put my son, the son of Shara Bey into combat against the First Order before the age of eighteen, that would have been shut down so fast and they probably would be suspended a semester for suggesting it. So the officers decided to put Poe into combat, but in secret.”

Kaydel frowned, “How is that even possible?”

“They made up a fake profile of a cadet that they would put on manifests whenever they sent out Poe.”

“But,” she looked to Poe, “why didn’t you say anything?”

Poe looked sheepish, “Here comes the stupid teenager part.”

“His instructors managed to convince him to go along with it,” Kes said.

She stared at Poe, “How?”

He sighed, “Basically they convinced me that if I secretly was going out and doing these missions, that when I turned eighteen, we would come out and announce all of my accomplishments, and I would immediately be promoted to a high rank rather than an entry level one.”

“But… why would they reveal that they had been sending someone underage into the battlefield?”

“That’s the part I didn’t think through. I just thought it was a fun secret and something Dad would be proud of.”

“Naturally, I was not,” Kes said. “He didn’t even tell BB-8… though students weren’t allowed to have their droids with them at all times at the academy so he had ways to hide it.”

“Why would you hide it from BB-8?” Kaydel frowned.

“Dad’s been using BB-8 as a way to spy on me from day one.”

“It’s not spying if you’re aware of the surveillance.”

Kaydel stifled a giggle.

Kes smiled.
“So, where does the false tooth come into play?” Kaydel asked, leaning casually against Poe.

Kes noticed the way Poe’s arm unconsciously wrapped around her waist.

“Well, sooner or later, even the best pilot will have an accident in combat,” Poe explained. “And when I was seventeen, I got hit and went down hard. Like… a horrible sort of crash. Blood and smoke and fire.”

“It’s literally a miracle that Poe is alive,” Kes said. “Wedge Antilles was in the battle and landed to check him out. He said that when he found Poe in the cockpit, his face was just… raw, beaten, meat. Like the kind a butcher with throw out. His hair had partially burned off. He broke so many teeth, and dozens of bones. The doctors were amazed that all the injuries were physical. He should have been paralyzed and had mental difficulties after that kind of crash. I thank the Force everyday because I know the only reason he survived was through the grace of the Force. The doctors said that if Wedge had intervened even two minutes later, he’d be dead. Plain and simple, my son would have been dead.”

Kaydel gasped. She sunk back into his embrace and turned her face to rest against his chest. Her heart trembled at the thought of not having this warm, firm body holding her. She couldn’t bare the thought of Poe being taken before she ever got to meet him, let alone call him her own.

Poe stroked her arm and placed a kiss on the top of her head.

“I’m okay, Babe,” he whispered. “I’m okay.”

BB-8 and Kes exchanged a look.

“I’m fine,” Kaydel hated how her voice shook. “Really, I’m okay. Continue the story.”

“Well, since to was Wedge who found him, the instructors ended up in a lot more trouble and a lot faster than they might have been had someone else went down for Poe. To be clear about how badly injured Poe was, Wedge and Ceren lived very close to us, so Wedge could probably have picked Poe out of a line quicker than he could have Luke Skywalker. Poe was so horribly mangled, that Wedge did not recognized him until he looked at Poe’s dog tags.”

Kaydel shuddered.

“To say Wedge was furious is like saying Darth Vader had a little bit of a temper. He immediately called Diego and reported what happened. Those two moved so quickly with their investigation and punishment that when Diego called me twenty-three minutes after Wedge saw Poe’s dog tags, the pair of instructors were already found, terminated, and had warrants for their arrest being petitioned.”

“Their arrest?”

“They ended up being charged with a few things like child endangerment, delinquency of a minor, conspiracy, and some sort of fraud for making up a false cadet,” Poe explained. “They were also dishonourably discharged from the military. One of them tried to actually join the Resistance last year, and Diego told him in no uncertain terms that if they did not leave D’Qar immediately, Diego was going to end up doing something that would get himself criminal charges.”

“Needless to say BB-8 and I were on my way to Hosnian Prime within thirty minutes,” Kes said. “I will never forget the sight of Poe in his hospital bed. He had finished one surgery and was about to head in for another surgery. Wedge and Diego gave me a personal apology for the situation and were ready to support us throughout the entire process. Han and Leia let me stay at their apartment through the whole thing. Admittedly, Han wasn’t really around, so I think Leia just didn’t want to be alone with Threepio all the time. Be- her son was living on Rornian with Luke and his family at the time, so the apartment was pretty quiet… well, as quiet as C-3PO can be.”

In unison all their heads turned towards C-3PO conversing with R2-D2 in the corner as if the other droid wasn’t still in low power mode. It wasn’t an unusual sight at all, as Threepio insisted Artoo could still hear him and really, he just had to keep his friend up-to-date with new developments. Artoo would be so lost when he woke up if Threepio didn’t. They could hear the golden droid’s voice all the way across the room.

“So, false tooth?” Kaydel asked.

“Right,” Kes cleared his throat. “Naturally, I sued the New Republic. We came to a… very nice settlement.”

“How do you think we can afford me being full-time with the Resistance?” Poe grinned.

“But in addition to the monetary pay out, as this whole thing was a PR disaster for the New Republic they decided to pay all of Poe’s medical bills,” Kes explained. “Which was good because Poe went through… how many surgeries?”

“Fifty-four surgeries and bacta immersions equalling about 217 hours,” Poe answered. “And that’s not even mentioning the physical therapy and time it took for my hair to grow back. I had so much plastic surgery, you might as well slap a Made in Dandoran label on me. Ow! Kay! What was that for?”

Kaydel patted the spot on his arm where she had punched him, “Sorry, Poe. I was just expediting the process of you getting punched when I tell Jessika about that comment later.”

“Fine,” Poe grumbled. “But only because she hits harder.”

Kes chuckled, “This girl is something, Poe.”

“There’s a lot less domestic abuse usually,” he replied.

“So, false tooth?” Kaydel asked.

“We’re just getting to that,” Kes said. “Since the New Republic was paying the bills, Poe was allowed to select basically whatever treatments he wanted at whatever cost. If he wanted the good anesthesia, he got the good anesthesia. Private luxury hospital room? No problem. Went to his head a little bit, I certainly had to reign him in a few times. And one place I probably should have paid more attention to was the dental work, because Poe made one of the most ridiculous choices I have ever seen. Poe’s teeth generally just needed a little surgery to fix them up, but one of his back right molars got completely knocked out. So, Poe goes through the catalogue and finds the most expensive and ludicrous replacement tooth I have ever heard of. Like, seriously, I do not understand why this technology exists.”

Kaydel glanced at Poe, “…What technology?”

His scratched his neck, “I sort of… have a Holo projector in my tooth.”

Kaydel stared at him.

“I’m sorry. You what?”

“Poe has a Holo projector in his mouth,” Kes repeated. “One of his back right molars can easily be popped out of mouth. It’s hollowed out, and inside is a tiny Holo projector that can store and project three small images. My son literally walks around carrying pictures of myself, my wife, and his droid… in his mouth.”

Kaydel just stared at Poe, “…Why?”

“Look, it’s for if I ever get taken prisoner!” Poe exclaimed. “When you get captured, they take everything off your person. They take personal Holos, they take dog tags, they take everything. I chose it because I want to know that if I’m in a situation where I’m stripped of everything, I can still have a safe image of my loved ones to comfort me. Because seriously, who is going to check my tooth?”

“And that, Dear Kaydel, is the most insane thing about my son,” Kes said. “He carries pictures of his family in his tooth.”

There was a very long silence from Kaydel.

“That…” she looked stunned, “has got to be the absolute… sweetest thing I have ever heard.”

Poe blinked, “I’m sorry what?”

A large grin split her face, “It’s just your loved ones mean so much to you that you’d go to an insane length to make sure you always have a small part of them with you. I love it!”

Poe and Kes said nothing.

“Wow,” Poe whispered. “I did not expect that reaction.”

“Me neither,” Kes agreed.

Beep beep boop.

Kes, Poe, and BB-8 stared at her in silence for a very long time.

After a while, unnerved by the silence, Kaydel bit her lip, “So, do I get the Kes Dameron stamp of approval?”

“Honey…” Kes answered, “I think I like you better than Poe.”

“Kay! Kay!” Jessika suddenly ran up. “Hey, Kay can I talk to you?”

“Uh, kind of busy, Jess,” Kaydel nodded to Kes. “You know Poe’s father, right?”

“Sure,” Jessika nodded. “Nice to see you, Kes.”

“Pleasure is all mine,” Kes smiled. “You needed Kaydel?”

“Yeah, Kay’s roommate, Paige is trying to flirt, and I think I need back up on it,” Paige explained. “I don’t understand the whole attraction to the male sex thing. No offense to you two.”

“None taken,” Poe said.

Jessika continued, “I’d ask Rose, but she’s clueless about that sort of thing. Meanwhile Aletha seems to have disappeared, as well as Commander Nalto.”

“Attaboy,” Kes chuckled.
“So, can I steal Kaydel from you guys?” Jessika asked. “To be clear, I’m asking as a courtesy. I’m taking her with me regardless of what you say.”

“Alright,” Poe agreed. “But I want her back. We’ve got… ahem plans later.”

“Paige wasn’t expecting Kaydel to come back to their room tonight,” Jessika smirked. “Shall we, Kay?”

“I think we have to,” Kaydel answered. “Paige couldn’t flirt her way out of a paper bag. It was nice meeting you, Kes. Maybe we can have dinner sometime, just the three of us.”

BEEP BOP BEEP BEEP!

“Four of us. Sorry BB-8.”

Boop.

“Name the place and I’ll be there,” Kes smiled. “I like this one, Poe. You should keep her for a while. Have a good evening, girls.”

“Have a good night,” Kaydel grabbed Jessika’s hand and they took off.

“Quite a girl you found yourself, Poe,” Kes said.

“So, you really like her?” Poe asked eagerly. “You approve of Kaydel?”

“Son, if you don’t marry that girl, I’m adopting her,” Kes declared.

Poe chuckled, watching Kaydel across the room with her friends, “Dad? …Challenge accepted.”

---

“Here we are,” Diego declared as he led Aletha into his private quarters. “What do you think?”

There were uniforms hung neatly in the closet, Holos sitting on the dresser, and most importantly a large bed with freshly changed sheets.

“I think I had one too many glasses of champagne if I ended up in your room tonight,” Aletha chuckled.

Diego grinned, something heady in his eyes, “Well, you might as well make yourself comfortable then. Your room is pretty far away. You could get ravished by a despicable man in your condition.”

“Then I should stay here and sober up a little,” Aletha sat down on the bed. She knew she hadn’t actually drunk to a level of impairment. “I’ll be safe here with you. Your intentions are honourable, are they not?”

Diego pressed a button on the room control panel, dimming the lights, “If you say so.”

With a wicked spark in his eye, Diego joined her on the bed’s edge. Their hands and lips were on each other in an instant, the tension of their yet to be consummated relationship driving them wild. Diego ravaged Aletha like a man on the brink of madness. Tongue driving into her mouth, lips on her neck, teeth on her collarbone, hands on hair and hips and thighs.

Aletha moaned in ecstasy as his tongue claimed her mouth. Her nails dug into his shoulders as one hand gripped it tightly while the other fumbled with his tunic belt. His hand was on her breast, openly thumbing the nipple he had made erect beneath his touch, and the other was on her thigh, slowly drifting up until it-

She gasped as Diego stroked the thin, wet fabric concealing her tender and readying sex.

“How does that feel?” his breath as hot in her ear.

“Please don’t stop,” Aletha begged.

“You know what’s been in my mind all night? The only thing I could think of was peeling this dress off of you and worshipping every inch of your body. I want you, Aletha. I can’t… I can’t wait another day. I want to make love to you, right here, right now. I think I might die if I don’t.”

Aletha moaned as his lips suckled her neck. She had never had a man want her this desperately before.

“Then I think you’re a little over dressed,” Aletha unbuckled his belt and threw it across the room. She made quick work of his shirt, Diego only too eager to help it off. The second that Diego’s shirt hit the ground he pushed her back onto the bed.

Diego continued to be a man of little patience for taking things slow. His thumbs had already hooked her underwear and were dragging them down as his lips were gliding up her thighs. She barely registered the moment her panties hit the floor because his lips were already on her tender sex.

Aletha actually shrieked when his tongue hit her clit. She panted, unable to make sense of anything but her dress pushed up her waist, Diego Nalto’s hot breath, and expert cunnilingus skills driving her to pleasure. Her thighs contracted, holding his mouth to her and her head lulled back as that wet, wide tongue lapped roughly at her clit.

But the pleasure didn’t end there; the second he had gotten her wet enough, a thick finger plunged into her without much fanfare. It was too much for her, that tongue licking her clit and his middle finger pumping in and out of her. There was something about the passion, the fervor, the desperation of their desire.

It was the quickest orgasm Aletha had ever had.

When the aftershocks subsided, they didn’t move. For a while they just stayed in position – Aletha boneless on the bed, Diego giving small kisses to her thighs, and his middle finger buried deep into her glistening sex.

She whimpered when he slowly withdrew that finger from her. Arousal flashed in her eyes as she saw her wet desire coating his digit. Catching her eye, Diego used his mouth to clean her off his finger.

“You taste amazing,” Diego told her.

Aletha panted but gave him the best sultry smile she could manage, “I wonder how you do?”

Diego chuckled, “I guess it’s my turn.”

He bent down, and Aletha wrapped her arms around him as they shared a passionate kiss. He lifted her ever so slightly so his hands could work the zipper of her dress.
“Please, Diego,” Aletha begged as he slid the zipper down.

Naturally, that was the moment Leia Organa knocked on the door.

“Diego?” Leia called. “Diego, open the door.”

He looked down at Aletha.

“Let’s pretend we’re not here,” he whispered. “Maybe she’ll go away.”

Sounded like a good plan to Aletha, and she pulled Diego down for another kiss.

“Diego, I know you’re in there,” Leia said. “I will open this door if I have to. I know Aletha’s in there with you, so please, make it better for all of us and just open the door.”

He sighed, “Fine. Give us a second.”

Aletha was surprised to find to find out how many languages Diego could grumble in as they redressed. He didn’t even smooth down his hair as he marched to the door.

“What?” Diego demanded, not caring he was speaking to his commanding officer.

“Look, I’m sorry to bother you two, but you snuck away too soon,” Leia informed him. “We still need to get some photos of you and Poe for the press.”

“Can’t it wait for tomorrow?”

“The reporters have their deadlines. If it makes you feel better, Poe had a similar reaction when I hunted him down in his room before this. Although to your credit, he and Kaydel didn’t stop and I actually had to open the door on them. Turns out when Kaydel blushes, it goes everywhere.”

Aletha shuddered, “I didn’t need to know that about my niece.”

“Sorry, Aletha,” Leia said kindly. “I’m very happy to see you don’t have your niece’s views on exhibitionism though.”

“Please, the last thing I want is a member of the freaking Skywalker family seeing me naked.”

“Come on, Diego, we have to get those pictures,” Leia said.

Diego sighed, “How long will it take?”

“Twenty minutes at the most.”

“Fine.” He turned to Aletha, “Would you mind waiting here, or-”

“I can wait,” Aletha nodded. “I’ll just freshen up in the fresher, set the mood of the room, snoop through your personal items. The usual.”

“Snoop away, My Dear. I have nothing to hide. Shall we, General?”

Aletha actually had no intention of snooping but after primping in the fresher, lighting a few candles she found in his nightstand, and ten minutes of trying out different seductive poses on the bed for him to return to, Aletha got bored.

She was surprised to see how many Holos Diego kept in his room. Aletha had seen his office, and it was barren of personal touch. But in his room? If there was a flat surface, there was a Holo.

Aletha browsed through them casually, flipping ones on at random, reading the labels he had put on all of them, and studying them carefully.

First Resistance Mission – 10 ABY: Solo, Skywalker, Fliss, Kes, Antilles, Agim, Chewbacca, and myself.

That Holo was posed in the lounge area of some ship – the Millennium Falcon if Aletha remembered the details of the story just right. Diego and Kes were sitting in the corner cleaning weapons. Two women – one who Aletha remembered as Reine Agim from the Rebellion, and a somewhat familiar brunette – were sitting at a dejark table. A man Aletha figured most be Han Solo was standing behind the brunette giving her pointers while Chewbacca was laughing with Reine, who was clearly winning. Seated on some storage crates were Wedge Antilles talking to Luke Skywalker. Not that Aletha would have been able to tell it was Luke through anything but process of elimination. His back was completely to the camera.

Mateo, Sofía, and Diego – 21 BBY

A very young Diego stood under a tree with his parents; Sofía looking a beauty and Mateo every bit the man his son had described.

Rogue Boys – 0 ABY: Riz, Gunner, Ji-Dan, and myself (Fliss makes me say for the record she took this Holo and that’s why she’s not in it.)

Diego stood at a conference table deep in conversation with a man twice as large as him. A lanky goggled man was discretely tinkering on something in the corner. He shocked himself a little, looked around quickly, and went back to work. It was only the blind man resting his weight on a staff that was staring straight at the camera and waving.

Rogue Flight Squadron on Hoth – 3 ABY: See manifest. I don’t have enough space on the side of this disc to list them all.

About twenty men in orange flight jumpsuits modified for snow conditions stood in a line with their helmets on their hips. They were all laughing at someone’s joke – Wedge Antilles from the look of it. Diego was easy to spot, and Aletha had to admit he didn’t look the greatest in orange. He was standing next to Luke Skywalker whose shaking head was in his hands, blocking his face. Clearly the joke was at his expense.

Faced with another obscured image of Luke Skywalker, that was when Aletha remembered Kaydel telling her that pictures of Skywalker generally weren’t kept around base. They would either make everyone mad or sad, so it was an unspoken rule to hide images of him.

The next image she didn’t have the chance to read the label on, because the second she flicked it on, she gasped and dropped it to the floor.

It was Diego in his military dress uniform with his arm around a woman in a wedding dress.

Aletha’s stomach dropped and she started to hyperventilate. She felt like she was about to throw up. Diego with a woman in a wedding dress. Why was Diego with a woman in a wedding dress?

Now, the rational part of Aletha would have realized that the woman wearing said wedding dress was the same woman in the first Holo talking to Han Solo. It also would have made her pick up the Holo and read the label to see that it was Diego with Fliss on her wedding day.
But rational Aletha had left the building after the third glass of champagne.

As tears splashed down her face, Aletha was consumed with memories of Luke and Antar telling her that she wasn’t enough. That they loved her but would always the woman who came before her. Second best. Second best. She would always be the second.

She couldn’t do it again.

She \textit{wouldn’t} do it again.

She couldn’t bear it… not with Diego.

When Diego returned to the room five minutes later, he expected to find a very sensual image of Aletha Kymeri on his bed wanting and waiting for him.

He did not expect to find her sobbing hysterically clutching one of his personal Holo.

“My love,” he closed the door and raced to her side. Diego took her into his arms, “What is wrong?”

“Don’t you dare!” Aletha used all her might to push him away. “Don’t you dare touch me! You lied to me! You’re despicable!”

Diego was seriously confused, “What? No… Okay, maybe I don’t like flowers all that much, but-”

“I know you were married!” she threw the Holo at him. “I found the picture! Why did you lie to me? Why did you tell me there was never anyone else?”

Diego just stared at her.

“I can’t do it,” Aletha sobbed into his hand, mascara running down her face. “I can’t. Not again. Never again. I can’t do it.”

Ok, seriously. What the hell was going on?

Slowly, as Aletha wept on the bed next to him, Diego bent down and picked up the Holo. He flicked it on, honestly expecting to find he had somehow been married at some point and just forgot about it.

When he saw the image it all made sense.

“Uh… Aletha? That’s Fliss.”

Aletha sniffed, “Wh- What?”

“Fliss,” Diego repeated. “That is Fliss on her wedding day to Luke Skywalker. I walked her down the aisle. That’s why we took this picture together. I’ve \textit{never} been married. Not even close.”

It took a while for Aletha to gather herself, but she honestly couldn’t say she had ever been more relieved in her laugh.

“Oh, Diego, I feel so stupid,” Aletha laughed, wiping away her tears. “I’m sorry. I didn’t mean… That was stupid of me. Oh, let’s just forget this and get back to things. Where were we?”

She leaned forward to kiss him, and Diego put out a hand to stop her.

“Aletha,” he said stiffly. “What is going on?”
“What do you mean?”

“You just had a panic attack at the thought of me being married… Why?”

Aletha took a deep breath, “It’s just ex-boyfriend stuff.”

“What kind of ex-boyfriend stuff?”

“It doesn’t matter.”

“Yes, it does,” Diego insisted. “Now, tell me, or you’re not getting any of this.”

Aletha laughed as he gestured to his body. It broke the ice, and Diego chuckled along with her.

“My Darling,” he wiped a tear from her cheek. “Please. I love you… Please, tell me.”

“Oh, alright,” Aletha took a deep breath.

So, she told him the stories of Antar and Luke. She avoided names, perhaps not to subtly, but Diego didn’t question her on it. He listened, patiently, silently, and respecting her need to no interruptions. His face had minimal but sympathetic and pained reactions. At some point their hands twined together and during especially rough parts he would squeeze hers.

“I’ve never been a first choice, Diego,” Aletha came to the end of the story. “I’ve never had someone who wanted me above all others. Then I met you, and I found someone who was to me like the other women were to them. I found my first choice above all. And then to see that picture and think that there was someone else you could love more than me… I couldn’t do it. Not this time. I need you to want me as much as I want you. I’ve never wanted someone this much. Never loved someone this deeply. It broke my heart.”

Diego didn’t say anything for a long time. Her words weighed on his mind as he processed what heartache this woman, the love of his life had been through. He knew that when he did speak, it had to be something grandiose.

“In my language,” Diego started, “we have a word. Querida. It’s a word we use like Darling or Sweetheart.”

Aletha sniffed and looked at him, a little bit confused.

“Querida comes from the verb querer, which is to want or to desire,” Diego explained. “Essentially, Querida means ‘most wanted one.’ Aletha, I have never felt the way I do about you for anyone before. True, I have known love, or at least some shadow of it. But you… you are my beginning, my end, the sun in my sky, and the breath in my lungs. You are my most wanted one. Never before and never again will I feel about someone the way I do you. You, Aletha Kymeri, will always be my Querida.”

Aletha started to cry again, but this time not from sorrow.

Diego stroked her tear away, “Just tell me how to prove it to you.”

She kissed him.

No other words were exchanged. Just lips, hands, sighs and moans.

She pulled the shirt from over his head and unbuckled the belt from his waist. He pushed her on the bed and tugged that dress from her body. His pants were soon to follow, and after that their undergarments.

It was soft and sweet, yet still passionate. Hands and mouths explored and claimed the other skin in their own. His hands were heavenly on her body, and she even found some pleasure in the slight shaking.

He didn’t argue with her when she insisted they use a condom even though both hadn’t had sex in years and Aletha was post-menopausal. Diego just enjoyed the sensation and sucked on her breast as he guided her hand to roll the latex down his aching shaft.

Diego laid her down on the bed and must have spent an eternity kissing every inch of her skin. His soft lips contrasted the scratch of his facial hair and it make her shudder as it scratched her thighs. Just when she thought is was about to melt into nothingness on his bedsheets, Diego’s lips reclaimed hers. His warm, sturdy body was over hers, and he guided her legs over his hips.

And then… he was inside of her, and Aletha felt like she had never truly lived until that moment.

Under the blanket, Aletha and Diego laid in each other’s arms, breathless, satisfied, and in complete emotional ecstasy.

“Wow,” Diego chuckled, his hands lazily drifting over her bare skin. “That felt even better than your cheek.”

Aletha rolled over to lay on her stomach and brush her fingers through his chest hair, “What is with the Resistance and their weird accolades for me?”

“You’re one of a kind, Aletha Anthea,” his eyes shined with tenderness and love. “Don’t you forget it.”

She lifted herself up and kissed his lips. When they broke apart smiling, she rested her head on his chest. As he kissed his shoulder, Aletha sighed in contentment.

“So this is what it feels like,” Aletha said softly.

“What what feels like?” Diego asked.

“To be someone’s first choice.”

“Oh, Querida, you are not my first choice.” He lifted her chin to look her in the eyes, “You are my only choice.”

Not too far down the hall, Poe Dameron and Kaydel Ko Connix were lingering in bed in a similar embrace.

“Ok, my father really can’t adopt you after we did that,” Poe declared, a little dazed from their lovemaking. “Damn that was good.”

“Yeah, I could not do that with my brother,” Kaydel chuckled. “I guess if we’re doing the meet the family thing, he’s next on the list.”
“What, meeting Keth?” Poe frowned at the mention of her brother.

“No, Deek and Dacken,” she rolled her eyes.

“Alright, but I’m punching them for the hair thing.”

“I get why you’re so sensitive about that story. Why didn’t you tell me about your accident?”

Poe shifted uncomfortably, “I just… don’t want things to change between us. I’m seriously in love with you, and I don’t want to lose you.”

“Why would you lose me?”

“Come on, what are two of my best qualities? My piloting skills and my looks. I feared that the story might change how you view those qualities on me. Maybe think I’m not as good a pilot or that my looks were only from my surgeries and I’m actually ugly.”

“Poe Dameron!” Kaydel sat up. “Do you honestly think I’m so shallow that I’m only with you because of your looks? You being incredibly attractive is just a bonus. If anything happened to you that changed your appearance, I’d stay. No, I don’t think you’re ugly, and if you were, that wouldn’t matter. I love you for who you are, not how you look.”

He smirked, “Is that permission to let myself go? Huh? Stop working out, gain a bunch of weight, never shave, stop showering, never even brush my hair?”

“Okay, let’s not get carried away,” Kaydel teased. “You stop showering, you stop seeing me naked.”

“Deal.” Poe’s smile faltered, “What about the pilot thing?”

“Grown men took advantage of the ego of a seventeen-year-old boy. If I find who did that to you, I’m going to beat them up.”

“You’re going beat them up? All five foot one and 110 pounds of you?”

“107 thank you very much. And I’ll certainly try.”

“You get em, Babe,” Poe kissed her cheek. “But piloting-”

“Really? Nothing would change?” he asked dryly. “In sanitation?”

“Okay, I’d make you take more showers but otherwise, no. I’d still love you.”

“I love you too,” Poe ran his fingers through her hair. “So what’s this about meeting your brother? I thought Aletha was the only family member you were in contact with?”

“Keth didn’t agree with Mom throwing me out, so he took me in for a while,” Kaydel explained. “I stayed with him and his family for a few months – not that either of us told Mom – and he’s actually the one who financially supports me. His act of rebellion without pissing off Mom. Anthea women are scary when you piss them off.”

“I know, I’ve met Aletha and Alecta. If anything happens with our relationship – which I absolutely never would intentionally hurt you – I might just fake my death to escape Aletha’s wrath.”
“Not to mention she’s now got Commander Nalto wrapped around her finger.”

“Funny, I think he’d be wrapped around something else tonight.”

Kaydel slapped his chest as Poe laughed loudly.

They settled back down, just enjoying each other’s company for a while as they thought to themselves about the events of that night.

“I wasn’t lying to your dad,” Kaydel admitted, frankly a little out of nowhere. “I really think the tooth thing is sweet.”

Poe shrugged, “With Holos in dog tags there’s always the risk of them getting taken from you during capture. I want to know that if I’m stranded somewhere in a desperate situation, I can still have a small comfort and look at my loved ones. Give myself a little extra strength to get through the night when all hope is lost.”

“I don’t want you to ever be in that situation. I want you to be safe in my arms.”

“I want that too, but General Organa won’t let me bring you as my carry-on luggage. Plus I don’t think my hatch is the most comfortable place.”

Kaydel grinned, “I guess I’d just have to sit on your lap.”

“That would be one hell of a ride.”

“Oh, I’ve had better,” Kaydel teased.

Poe chuckled, remembering that night in Holdo’s office, “You certainly have.”

Kaydel considered her next words, “Poe?”

“Yeah, Babe?”

“Could I… Could I see it? Your false tooth?”

Poe looked surprised, “You wanna see my fake tooth?”

“I’d like to see the pictures,” Kaydel clarified. “Can I?”

He hesitated, “Alright, but to warn you, my dad may not have exactly known what pictures are in my tooth now.”

“They’re different?”

“The BB-8 one is the same, but I don’t have single ones of my parents.”

“Then what do you have?”

“Promise not to freak out?” Poe said quickly.

Kaydel narrowed her eyes suspiciously, “Alright.”

Poe sat up and took a deep breath. He reached into his mouth, and with a bit of a grunt, he yanked out on of his back teeth. It was kind of a weird image if Kaydel was being honest. Poe held out the tooth, and Kaydel was surprised that there was a bit of blood on it.
“There are tiny hooks that grasp onto small implants I have in my gums,” Poe explained, flipping it over pointing to four hooks the size of a pin head. He pointed to a button on the inside of the hollow tooth, “This is the Holo projector. Really advanced tech. Inside the button is the projector, you can see the lens on the middle of the button. It’s got a small transponder that sends signals between another one programmed inside of BB-8. I use him to update the photos, but it will still work if I’m apart from him. I just can’t change the photos without him.”

“That’s fascinating,” Kaydel examined the tooth with interest. “Could you tweak some stuff and make it a comm?”

Poe chuckled, “I wish. That would be helpful. You want to see the photos?”

“Absolutely.”

He pressed the button, and Kaydel was kind of amazed his large fingers could handle a button that small. A tiny blue projection lit up from the button, and they were viewing a rather magnificent Holo of BB-8.

“Little buddy won’t let me put anyone first but him,” Poe grinned. “I guess after that time he saved me from pirates, I do kind of owe him.”

“I love that story,” Kaydel laughed. “And I love that droid.”

“I do too. He’s the best friend I could ever ask for and one hell of a wingman. In combat and in love. He picked you out, after all. So far that’s been a remarkable success.”

“It’s got the Kes Dameron stamp of approval on it. That counts for something.”

“Discounts on restaurants for sure.”

“So, what’s the next picture?”

He clicked the button and Kaydel found herself staring at a picture of a young Poe with his parents.

“This was taken shortly before Mom died,” Poe said a little sadly. “I really miss her. We were such a happy family. Dad did his best to hold things together after Mom, but there was always something missing.”

Kaydel bit her lip as she stared at the picture, “You all look so happy… That’s what a family is supposed to be like. You won’t find pictures like that of my family.”

He touched her shoulder, “Yes, you will.”

“How do you know?”

“Because BB-8 and I are going to start taking pictures of you and Aletha for you. I’m sure those ones will be happy.”

“You are the sweetest man alive,” Kaydel kissed him.

“Nah, not the sweetest… but certainly in the running.”

She swatted him again, “Next picture.”

“Alright, but uh… don’t get mad.”
He pressed the button, and Kaydel was shocked to see a picture of her. It was a simple Holo, hair down and laughing, but it was her. Poe had replaced two separate pictures of his parents with a single just to make room for a picture of her.

“You… carry a picture of me around in your tooth?” Kaydel stared at it dumbfounded.

“I’m sorry, I know I should have asked,” he said quickly, “I just didn’t know how to ask. You don’t think it’s weird, do you?”

She looked at him, “Poe Dameron, it’s one of the weirdest things I’ve seen in my life… and I love it.”

“Really?”

“Really,” she grinned. “I can’t believe a picture of me brings you that much comfort. Do you put all your girlfriends in your teeth? …Is that really a sentence I just said?”

“Actually, you’re the first one. I’ve never changed the pictures before.”

Kaydel blinked, “Are you serious?”

“Absolutely. I’ve never changed the pictures before, and I don’t intend to change them again.”

“But Poe… what if we don’t…”

She couldn’t finish the sentence.

Poe looked her in the eye and simply asked, “What if we do? I’d love to be able to freak out my grandkids in forty years, just pop out my tooth, and say this is what your grandmother looked at twenty-two.”

Kaydel blushed, “You want grandkids?”

“Marriage, kids, grandkids, house with a backyard and white picket fence after the war. A happy little life, but not too mundane. Don’t want things to get boring. What about you?”

“That all sounds wonderful,” she admitted. “I’d love to have all of that.”

Poe watched her, “And what about… having it together?”

Kaydel took a deep breath, “I… I would like that. Someday.”

“Someday,” Poe nodded. “Doesn’t have to be today but… we’re in it to win it.”

She smiled, “We’re in it to win it.”

Unable to wipe the grin from his face, Poe pulled her in for a joyous kiss.

Kaydel abruptly broke apart from him.

“If you propose to me in a public setting, I will slap you,” she threatened.

“Alright,” he laughed. “We know where we stand.”

“The girls are going to flip when I tell them,” Kaydel chuckled.

“Not as hard as my dad. Actually, let’s not tell him for a while. He’ll literally start bugging us for grandchildren tomorrow.”

“Geeze, he’d have to give me nine months at least. And I’m not having kids at twenty-two in the middle of the war.”

“Agreed. We don’t need two generations of MisCalcs. Oh, and for the record, I know your family has a tradition, but we’re not having five kids.”

“And we’re not giving them alliterative names,” Kaydel shuddered. “Can you imagine that? Dara Dameron? Devan Dameron? Dilan Dameron?”

“Actually, I kind of like the sound of- OW! I was joking, Kay!”

And so they spent the rest of the night discussing the future they would love to have together.

After all, some people did get their happily ever after.

But some people did not.

Lando sighed as he entered the room Leia had offered him to stay the night. He tried not the let the bitter sting of Holdo’s words dampen the mood, but things had taken a turn that night for him after the subject of Alyla had been breeched. It was true, their odd relationship had had its distractors from its age difference and unconventionality, but after her murder, no one had dared bring up Alyla in a negative light to him.

Weirdly, it was almost refreshing to get that familiar scolding. For a moment he could almost pretend she was alive again.

The reception was like so many of the fancy dinners he had attended before – Cloud City sure knew how to live it up, and such receptions happened at least once a month. Lando would call up Alyla and casually ask if she was interested in accompanying him. He would always try not to sound too eager, but he was fairly certain Alyla knew how badly he wanted her to join him. They had an easy chemistry together, and it was always positively a delight when he attended a dinner with the most beautiful Jedi on his arm. She would always turn up in Cloud City looking elegant and absolutely gorgeous.

There was no denying Alyla’s beauty; her body was as if sculpted by a master artist and he had always joked to her that one day he literally was going to get a statue of her made so generations to come could remember her beauty. Her self-inflicted scars did not detract from that beauty, at least not to Lando. In fact, they read as a testament of her courage in Lando’s eyes. The story of her scars was a dark one, and thankfully not one Alyla needed Lando to explain too much.

Their relationship had started that day Luke invited them to watch Drystan’s podrace in his apartment. While Luke and Felicity were bonding over her dead brother, Lando and Alyla had gone to the grocery store to pick up some things for dinner.

While Alyla enjoyed the novelty of seeing a grocery store for the first time, Lando had gently prodded her for further answers about her past on Zygerria. Alyla was surprisingly open to him about it, which he later learned she did because she was a very open advocate of destigmatizing the victimizing and secrecy of sexual abuse. Lando later would help her and Diego Nalto run many charity fundraisers with an organization – The Alliance Against Sexual Victim Secrecy, which Lando still worked with extensively and donated to even to that very day – who fought against such things, the two using their experiences as a way for the organization to outreach with stories of abuse and the shame placed upon the victims.

Lando listened respectfully as Alyla told him her history in that grocery store. He knew what happened in the Fighting Pits on Zygerria, having previous done non-slave trade business on Zygerria. In fact, he had once unknowingly served as a go-between Zena Halcorr and Luke Skywalker as she anonymously selling Jedi artifacts she purchased with her family wealth to Luke for his Order. Lando had never participated in the business of the Fighting Pits, but he was well-informed what happened after the fighting was over for the day. How the winners – particularly the attractive ones – got “rented out” for a high fee.

Alyla did not hide her history of abuse from Lando, how she was one of the most requested slaves to be rented. How she and Gavyn were drugged with ysalamir based products so they couldn’t use their Force Abilities to fight back. How she would be forced to “entertain” at least four men – or sometimes women – a night. How one time she had once been “rented” twelve times in one night. How if she decided to throw a match because she couldn’t stand to be “rented” by another man that night, that she and Gavyn would be beaten within an inch of their life.

The choice was the same every night: beaten or rented. As Force Sensitives, Gavyn and Alyla rarely unintentionally lost a match, so it would always come down to their choice. Gavyn wasn’t “rented” as often as Alyla, but it did happen. The worse nights were when a couple would “rent” both twins, and the brother and sister had to watch what happened to each other.

Years later, Alyla confessed the horrifying story to Lando about the event that led to Alyla’s body being riddled with scars. How one night after a line was crossed when a couple rented she and Gavyn, Alyla had finally had enough. She decided the abuse needed to end, so she stole a knife to bring that termination. Originally, her plan was just to end her own life and be free of the pain of this world, but she changed her mind deciding to continue on for Gavyn’s sake. But the abuse still needed to stop, so she decided to make herself not be beautiful anymore. She dragged the knife across every inch of exposed skin on her body, scarring herself, and trying to make herself ugly.

Gavyn had been the one to find Alyla, unconscious and bleeding on the floor. Their owner had been furious and decided to punish Alyla by breaking both of Gavyn’s legs. But the plan had worked, and people stopped “renting” Alyla as often.

The “renting” had come to a full stop about a year later when one of the Halcorr family slaves tried to force himself on Alyla. She fought back and he ended up beating her so badly that she couldn’t fight in the Pits for a month. The rules of the Pits were that if one family’s slave damaged another family’s property – aka slave – the families must switch slaves to compensate the earnings lost by the damaged property being unable to fight. Alyla was given to Zena Halcorr, and after Gavyn made a fuss and refused to fight anymore, their owner sold Gavyn to Zena. And thus began the story of Zena’s conversion to the Light Side and Anti-Slavery movement; how Zena and the Kenes started rescuing Force Sensitive slaves; and Zena and Gavyn’s eventual romance and marriage.

But that was not something Lando was focused upon that night.

The thing that had always amazed Lando about Alyla is that even though she had seen the darkest parts of humanity, she still managed to be an optimist and see the best in people. Perhaps that’s why she was so drawn to mentoring Ben, and perhaps why she had been so drawn to Lando. She could see past that smooth talker scoundrel image Lando hid behind and see the real Lando Calrissian inside. The fun, generous, responsible, business man who loved to indulge his fine tastes.

And Alyla had been his finest taste of all.
At first it was a simple invitation. Alyla wanted to see the world, so Lando offered to have her be his plus one to a reception at Cloud City. She arrived a few days early, and he acted as her tour guide around the city. There was something so special about getting to see his home and world from brand new eyes, seeing her take delight in the most mundane things. A decorative fountain, getting a suite all to herself, getting to eat whatever and how much of it she wanted, seeing new species of aliens, and even hearing elevator music brought so much joy to her.

He let her pick out whatever she desired from the various shops and vendors, loving the way her eyes lit up as she found something she thought beautiful or wonderful. Alyla was modest about her purchases, not wanting to take advantage of his generosity, but Lando insisted. If he saw her eye something, but then insist no, that’s too much, you couldn’t, he could and would. Ultimately dresses proved her downfall, and Alyla, delighted by the bright colours, pretty designs, and luxurious fabrics, ended up returning to Rornian with two trunks full.

A flower vendor had caught her eye the day of the reception. Lando had watched in pleasure as she spent a full hour talking to the flower man, asking all sorts of questions about the different types he had, the origins of the flowers, and the meanings behind them. After hearing the story of the morning glory – the one owned by the vendor a wonderful purple-blue colour – blooming in the morning but dying at night, Alyla became somber and attached to the little bloom before her. Lando had tried to buy the flower for her, but the vendor, touched by Alyla’s passion for botany, had given it to her free of charge.

That night when he arrived at her suite to pick her up for the reception, Alyla looked stunning. A long midnight blue dress with a swishing skirt and a bit of sparkle, a simple glimmering necklace – Alyla refused to let him buy her actual diamond jewelry until they were well into their relationship – and that little morning glory tucked behind her ear. In hindsight, Lando knew that moment she smiled at him looking so excited and thankful for the opportunity was the moment he had fallen for her.

She was an absolute delight at the reception, taking to high society like a fish to the water. Alyla knew how to charm anyone at the drop of a hat – unfortunately something she had developed in her slave days as a survival technique. The other guests were fascinated at meeting a real-life Jedi – Luke had been the only Jedi to attend events on Cloud City, and he usually avoided appearance because without fail someone just had to bring up that this was where his hand got cut off. Alyla was even allowed to openly carry her lightsaber and enjoyed making a display of showing off her skills when a crowd had begged her to.

The only thing she held back from was that she lied when asked the origin of her scars. To this day people on Cloud City believed it was from Alyla fighting in the Pits. Alyla also wouldn’t dance with anyone but Lando. He couldn’t complain though, Alyla was a marvellous dancer. She never knew the official steps, but Lando swore up at down that she turned to the Force to guide her through waltzes, tangos, and everything in between.

Alyla didn’t dance with others because she was reluctant to trust strange men with physical activities. She didn’t withdraw from men, but she did flinch at their touch sometimes. If an action seemed too intimate, she would immediately retreat from the situation. She would not let Lando put an arm around her waist, but she loved to cling to his arm. Alyla felt protected by having a grip on someone she knew had her back, but it still allowed the freedom to escape if she desired it.

That night when Lando brought her back to her suite, Alyla gathered her courage and kissed him on the cheek. She passed it off as a thank you, but years later he learned that she had never kissed someone on the kiss other than Gavyn after they escaped the Fighting Pits.
Lando wanted to show Alyla the botanical gardens where they grew morning glories, but Alyla had to leave the first thing the next morning. She asked if she could come see them some other time, and she hadn’t even finished her sentence before he was saying yes.

Luke had been the one to pick up Alyla. When he saw the two of them together, Luke got a look that was way too knowing for a man who was in the middle of not realizing he was in love with his best female friend.

Lando was reluctant to ask Alyla to return to Cloud City once more. He didn’t know why, confused about the feelings the young Jedi had stirred inside of him. Lando feared that it had been some sort of magic about the city and situation and perhaps this hadn’t been as special as he thought. Besides, he was fourteen years older than her and had a certain reputation. Surely she didn’t want such things with him.

But he was starting to admit he wanted them with her.

When people around Cloud City started asking after that lovely young Jedi and when they would be able to see her again, Lando gathered the courage to comm her and ask for another visit. Alyla was busy with Jedi business and had to turn down the invitation, but the two started talking on the comm on a regular basis.

That was when Reine Agim started her pool.

A few weeks later, they ran into each other when they both were visiting Han and Leia at the same time – Alyla accompanying Luke. It had been Lando who suggested to Alyla that she take a further interest in Ben as he had started acting up since Luke’s attentions were drifting to Felicity. While Alyla and Ben were friendly enough before, it had been during that visit where Alyla officially took Ben under her wing… Literally. She had actually announced to Han, Luke, Leia, and Lando that she was going to take Ben under her wing. Ben had been so confused.

When Lando got the invitation to Reine and Obik wedding – and no, to this day he still wasn’t sure why they invited him – Lando had decided if Alyla couldn’t come to the morning glories, he would bring them to her. Alyla was delighted with the flowers, and together they decided to plant them in the Meditation Gardens. So Lando Calrissian, a man of pomp and circumstance, got down on his hands and knees in the dirt with a lovely young Jedi, and planted flowers.

He still remembered the way she had stroked a smudge of dirt from his cheek, softly and slowly, their first bit of intimate contact. It lit a fire inside of him, and Lando knew he wanted more. Throughout the visit as they spent far more time than they probably should have together, Lando looked for any excuse to touch her. A hand on her back to steady her as they hang decorations for the wedding. Pressing quickly against her as he passed by in a crowded room. Pulling a loose thread from her clothing or smoothing out bunched up fabric. And he received all the same types of hesitant touches from her too.

Judging that Alyla was interested in him, at the wedding when no one was paying attention, Lando decided to try to kiss her.

That was the wrong move.

Alyla spurted out some scared nonsense and made a quick retreat from him for the night. She avoided him for the rest of the visit, and their regular comm calls came to an end. Lando felt horrible about the whole thing and tried to talk with her about it, but Alyla gave him radio silence.

After a month of their silence, Lando confessed to Luke what had happened, and Luke told him that he already knew. Alyla had spoken to Luke several times for guidance on the situation, which Lando understood as Luke was her mentor but at the same time asking Luke Skywalker for romantic advice was like asking Han Solo to fix your toaster. Sure, he knew a little bit about the theory and had somewhat successful experience in related things, but there were probably better people to ask.

Luke explained to Lando – with Alyla’s permission as she had anticipated Lando talking to Luke at some point so gave her consent – that her history had made her very wary of pursuing a romantic relationship and wasn’t sure she wanted to go ahead with this. Luke advised Lando to wait it out, and if Alyla wanted to be with Lando, to let her come to him on her own terms.

That wait it out theory was probably why Luke himself didn’t end up married until he was thirty-three.

Eventually Alyla did reach out to Lando. Apparently, Ben had sensed her inner turmoil about the situation and talked Alyla into giving it a shot with Lando. The origin of Alyla’s nickname of Killer for Ben was because he allegedly made a killer argument for dating Lando, though Ben denied it vehemently and insisted it was just that he was so awesome at fighting.

Naturally, Alyla calling Ben “Killer” had taken a horrible turn in recent years.

Lando had been in the habit of sending Alyla invitations to various events on Cloud City in hopes she would at least talk to him again. One day, she accepted the invitation to a formal business dinner, and when she arrived on Cloud City they talked it all through. Lando accepted her reservations and they agreed to take things slow. After the dinner, Lando walked her to her suite, and then came something he would never forget.

“Lando?”

“Yes, Alyla?”

She hesitated, “…close your eyes.”

He obeyed and the next thing he knew there were a pair of soft, but hesitant lips upon his. Lando was startled, so he made no move to return the kiss. When he eyes flew open, her lips were gone from his and she was staring at him nervously.

“Alyla-” he started.

“Slowly,” she simply said.

Lando smiled and nodded, “Slowly.”

The next day, Lobot couldn’t figure out why Lando couldn’t stop whistling happily during all of his meetings.

And so their story went, Alyla and Lando attending events together, Lando lavishing praise upon Alyla. They moved together in perfect harmony, like a never-ending dance. She had fire and spirit, but beauty and kindness. Charm but penetrating eyes that could see one to their core. And she never gave up on someone, not even at their lowest point.
Their nights together were their secret. The next time, Alyla let him return the kiss. Three times later she let him put his hand on her cheek to bring her in closer and savor the taste of those beautiful lips. Two times later her hands woven into his hair. The time after that his hands found her hair. Four times later they began an adventure of tongues.

Three times after that, Alyla invited him into the room. They moved slowly in the comfort and safety of that suite that became Alyla’s. She straddled his lap as they kissed and caressed. One day she began to rock against his lap, and a new level of intimacy was reached.

In no time, grinding became the norm, and Lando became well acquainted with the feeling of wetness between her legs rocking against his begging erection. Shirtless sessions were frequent, first Lando while Alyla explored with hands and later lips, but soon Alyla was shrugging off the shoulders of her dresses.

They explored each other, slowly breaking down barriers and experiencing new forms of pleasure together. Nine months after that first kiss, Alyla and Lando made love. It was nerve-racking and imperfect but they came out with no regrets.

He had loved her so much, but they never said it. About a year after their first kiss, Lando tried to say so, but she stopped him. She would always shushed him before he spoke those powerful words. Many times he thought she was going to say it to him, but she always stopped herself. He didn’t need it uttered, though. He saw it in her eyes.

At Luke and Felicity’s wedding, she explained it to him. She was traumatized by her time as a slave, so she was afraid to utter the word. The conversation was spurred by a joke from Lando about how as a groomsman and bridesmaid, they were going to walk down the aisle together.

“This is the only time that’s ever happening,” Alyla said, fear in her voice but confidence in her face. “I don’t ever want to get married.”

Lando raised an eyebrow, “Oh, really? I just thought-”

“You assume every girl wants a wedding?”

“Not until I met your sister-in-law. If Zena Halcorr wanted a wedding, I thought anyone would. Besides, you love a good party, a pretty dress, and a dashing Calrissian.”

Alyla smiled that sweet little grin she got when bashful, “I do lo-enjoy all three of those things.”

Lando sighed.

“But marriage… I can’t do that. I can’t ever be in a position where there’s a legal document demanding I stay attached to another person. I’m not saying that marriage is slavery-”

“You really should make this as a toast later tonight. Luke and Fliss will be thrilled.”

“Lando, please.”

He smiled at her.

“I don’t want to ever get married… but I do want to be with you. It’s just if I’m with you, I want it to be of my own accord. So, if you think that marriage is so important and you have to have it, then maybe I should let you find that."

Lando was very quiet for a long time, taking it all in. Then he made his choice. He smiled and lifted her chin.

“My Darling,” he wiped away a lone tear with his thumb, “who do you think you’re talking to? I’m Lando Calrissian. You say, I don’t want to get married. I say, oh thank God.”

Alyla laughed.

“Just promise me that you’re not going anywhere,” Lando said tenderly. “I love… spending time with you.”

Alyla nodded, “I love… spending time with you too. I’m not going anywhere.”

“Neither am I. Now… do you think it’s unlucky for a groomsman to kiss a bridesmaid before the groom kisses the bride?”

“We’ll just have to test that theory, won’t we?”

“Indeed, we will.”

Turns out it was bad luck, because they got walked in on by her brother a minute later. Enduring Gavyn Kene’s annoyed looks that rest of the day was worth it though.

And so their relationship continued. They moved at a snail’s pace, but when called out, they were more than happy to be a pair of snails.

The only problem with their relationship was they tended to avoid major discussions. He later learned than Alyla wasn’t certain he was exclusive to her until the night Rey Rhiaon Skywalker was conceived (how Alyla knew the timing of that, Lando was too afraid to ask.) It was shortly before Rey’s birth that Alyla had told Lando the horrifying reason she inflicted her scars. The secret so repulsive and desperate that the only people who were ever told had been Zena Halcorr and himself.

Lando was the one who brought up the idea of the adoption. Alyla had been reluctant at first, fearing Ben’s reaction. So, Lando had the idea that the three of them would sit down and discuss the idea. Ultimately, Ben wasn’t thrilled with it, but he gave them his blessing. His only request was for it to be Force Sensitive, which Lando had never told anyone, but he and Alyla had agreed they were going to find one.

And they had decided to find themselves a son.

The memory cut Lando deep. Out there, somewhere was a disadvantaged, Force Sensitive boy who never got the parents he deserved. Lando had truly tried to continue the adoption. He had spent a year meeting with children, Leia secretly accompanying him, but Lando just couldn’t see it through. Not without Alyla.

Still, Lando knew out there somewhere was his and Alyla’s son. And maybe one day Lando have the courage to find him.

But it wouldn’t be today.

He remembered the last time he saw her. They were in Cloud City, waking up in bed together. She woke him with a kiss and told him her goodbyes. Lando did their usual routine of playfully trying to convince her to stay with him a little while longer, but Alyla had to go. They spoke of their next meeting, how they were going to go pick out their son. Lando asked her to pass on a hello to everyone at Temple Village, and they promised to call each other every night.

Alyla was at the doorway when she said something he never thought he’d hear.

“I love you.”

Lando sat up straight, “What?”

“I love you,” Alyla repeated, a small smile on her face. “I’m ready to say it. I love you, Lando Calrissian.”

He had never heard more beautiful words in his life.

“Alyla, I… I lov-”

“Shh,” she climbed back on the bed and put a finger to his lips. “I’m ready to say it, but I’m not ready to hear it.”

He gently moved her finger from his mouth and kissed the back of her hand, “Alright. But when will you be ready to hear it?”

Alyla stroked his cheek, “The next time we see each other, I’ll be ready. But I want it face to face.”

“Alright, I promise. The next time we see each other, I’ll say it, but you have to hurry back now. Promise?”

“Promise,” she leaned forward and gave him the last kiss they would ever share. “I love you, Lando Calrissian. We’ll see each other soon.”

“I’ll be counting the seconds, My Darling.”

There was a holo of Alyla on Lando’s dresser. He carried it everywhere, holding it as precious as the mourner’s armband he wore every day. It was Alyla smiling, a blue morning glory tucked behind her ear and eyes filled with such life.

Lando gripped the dresser as he fought back a shaky sob.

He remembered the night Han called. Lando was waiting for his nightly comm from Alyla and was getting a little annoyed with how late she was.

He had called her home earlier, but there was no answer. Getting worried, Lando called Gavyn’s house to see if Alyla was visiting her brother. Alyla’s niece, Miri answered the call, and Lando was surprised to find she was babysitting Rey, who was playing in the background. Miri said there was some emergency Council thing at Reine’s house but wouldn’t answer questions when Lando pressed for more details. Miri promised that Alyla would call as soon as possible, but it might not be until the morning. When Lando asked if Alyla was in any danger, Miri wouldn’t give him a straight answer.
That was when Miri had whispered to him that it's something to do with Ben.

His heart dropped at those words. Alyla had kept him abreast of the difficulties Ben Solo was going through. Lando had experienced some first hand. He had made Ben a promise that if he ever got himself in trouble and needed non-judgemental help – like he was underage drinking and got stranded – Lando would help, no questions asked, and not tell Han and Leia.

They still didn’t know to the night of Poe Dameron’s promotion ceremony that Lando had bailed Ben out of jail and paid off various criminal charges four times before he ran away to the First Order.

And a few times since.

Lando was so relieved when he heard the beeping of the comm, that he didn’t glance at the name of the caller before he answered it.

---

“Alyla. Darling, you’ve kept me up all night,” Lando said in a hurry, not even bothering to switch to visual, “and not in the good way. Think I gotta come up with a way for you to make it up to me. Anyway, the adoption agency called me today. They said that we-”

“Lando?” came the voice of Han Solo, more anxious and fragile than he had heard before.

Lando frowned, “Han?”

“Yeah… Uh. I… I gotta tell you something. Something important.”

“Can it wait? I’m waiting to hear from Alyla.”

There was a terrifying silence.

“Buddy… Alyla’s not going to call.”

Lando could have sworn he physically felt his heart break.

“What- What do you mean?” Lando’s voice shook. “Why isn’t she going to call?”

“Lando… I think you should sit down.”

---

He stared at the image of Alyla Kene with glassy eyes. She was so full of life, so kind, so trusting. Alyla Kene had every right in the world to live a life of bitterness and anger. Instead she chose one of love and warmth.

She didn’t deserve to die.

---

“Gavyn hasn’t left her side at all,” Leia said as she led Lando up the stairs of Alyla’s home to the bedroom where Alyla… was. “Never gets out of the chair. We have to bring him food, and don’t ask me how he’s managing to use the fresher. I swear, his avoidance of a shower had gone on so long, I think Zena literally sponged him off yesterday.”
“I’m very grateful that they chose to wait,” Lando’s throat felt like it was about to close up.

“Of course they waited. Gavyn only ever gives… gave you a hard time when he got bored or you two did something that he didn’t like seeing.”

They came to a stop in front of the bedroom door. Han was waiting in front of it.

“Hey,” Han said softly.

“Hey,” Lando nodded to him. He opened his mouth to say more but nothing came out.

Han sighed and clasped Lando’s shoulder, “Buddy… I’m really sorry about Alyla. I wish I could have done something.”

“Han,” Leia simply said.

He nodded.

Lando took a deep breath, “I’m sorry about Ben. Any… word on him?”

“I… I don’t even want to think about him right now. We’ll deal with that later. Much later. When he stops being an idiot.”

“Don’t call him an idiot,” Leia snapped. “He’s our son. We need to find him and bring him home.”

“Bring him home? So he can kill someone else? He did this, Leia! If he can do this to Alyla, none of us are safe. Not you. Not me. Certainly not Fliss. And what about Rey? What if he goes after her?”

“Stop!” Leia said firmly. “We’re not doing this again. Not now.”

Han opened his mouth to argue but sighed when he caught sight of Lando.

“Alright.” Han turned and raised his fist to knock when the door slid open to reveal Luke, “How did you… Ugh, I’ll never get used to you sensing things.”

“Arguing about Ben again,” Leia answered.

“Literally nothing could have stopped me,” Lando replied. “Is she… in there?”

“Sure, just, uh… give me a minute.”

“I think I’m going to cut out here,” Han said to Luke. “Things are getting heavy, and I need to focus on something actually good in this world. Where’s Rey? I think I need to hug her for a while.”

“At home with Felicity and Threepio,” Luke answered. “It’s probably about time Felicity tags out from Threepio or I’m going to come home to a pile of golden mechanics. Can you tell her I’m going to stop by and check on Reine before I come home?”

“You got it.” Han looked to Lando, “Chewie’s downstairs if you need anything. Did you want me to
“I think I’ll be fine without you,” Lando smiled. “Go on. Tell the girls and Threepio I said hi.”

Han clapped Lando on the shoulder and left.

“Alright,” Lando took a deep breath. “It’s time.”

He remembered the way his heart lurched when he saw Alyla’s body. Her eyes were closed, and someone had changed her from the bloody clothes of her murder. It’s often said that a dead person simply looks like they’re sleeping, but Lando didn’t agree. She was too still, too pale, too limp.

Lando Calrissian never planned to settle down and fall for one woman, and yet how he found himself staring at the love of his life, lying dead on the bed where they had first made love.

Gavyn was sitting in a chair next to her, looking absolutely terrible. Zena was standing behind him solemnly, her hands firmly on his shoulders. Miri was nowhere to be found, and Lando would later hear that she was in the kitchen, crying in Chewbacca’s arms.

Lando stood in the doorway just staring, not knowing how to possibly ever deal with the scene before him. This wasn’t supposed to happen. They were supposed to be picking out their son, and painting his bedroom, and working out college funds, and reading parenting books.

He was supposed to tell her that he loved her.

Gavyn surprised everyone when he announced he was going to go take a shower. Making excuses about comm calls and making lunch, everyone made the unspoken agreement to give Lando a few minutes alone with her.

As Gavyn came to the doorway, he stopped for a moment and placed a hand on Lando’s shoulder. Lando understood: Gavyn hadn’t left Alyla’s side because he had been guarding her for Lando. He loved his sister dearly, but he knew that there were two important men in her life. Gavyn wanted to make sure the other got the same respect he had.

Lando sat in Gavyn’s chair for a long time just staring at her. Several minutes passed before he clasped her hand in his. It was so cold and limp. The tears mutinied against his senses and dared to stream as he lifted the back of her hand to his lips.

What would he give to hear her laugh once more? See her smile? She had such a lovely smile.

Lando reached into his breast pocket and pulled out a small blue morning glory, gifted to him by the same vendor – not utterly heartbroken at that lovely girl’s death – who had first introduced them to her. With the gentlest touch of his life, Lando placed it behind her ear.

“Well, it seems you were truly the morning glory, My Darling,” Lando fought a losing battle to his sobs. “You deserved so much better than the life you got… so much better than me.”

Silence clung to the room as one of his tears splashed onto her cheek.

“I made you a promise,” Lando whispered. “I’d do it face to face the next time we saw each other.
I’d finally say it to you… Alyla Kene, I love you. I have since the day we met, and I think I’m going to love you until the day I die. You changed me, made me a better man. Thank you.”

He squeezed her hand.

“If you could speak to me now, I know what you’d say. What you would want from me. I promise I’ll do it. For you, I will. I will forgive Ben Solo for taking you away… and I will do whatever it takes to bring him back to the Light Side. I won’t give up on him. I promise. If you can hear me, I promise.”

Lando bent down and gave her on final kiss, knowing he’d regret it if he didn’t.

“I love you, Alyla Kene.”

And for a moment, Lando could have sworn he heard her whisper, “I love you, Lando Calrissian.”

Lando sighed, fighting back his tears.

“I love you, Alyla Kene,” he whispered as he did every night. He knew somewhere out there she was listening to him, and he would make damn sure not a day passed where she didn’t hear the words he never told her in life.

That night he dreamed of Alyla Kene safely wrapped up in his arms once more, sharing those utterances of love they never voiced. It was a dream so warm, so gentle, so perfect that it couldn’t have been anything but.

But if a Force Sensitive had walked into the room that night, they would have told Lando it wasn’t a dream at all.

Sky blue eyes burned with hate above him and those strong hands crushed his throat like a vice.

“No, Uncle, please!” Ben Solo begged as Luke Skywalker held him down.

Rage, murder, and revenge filled Luke’s heart, and Ben felt fear. He tried to fight Luke off, but his uncle was just too strong. Ben gasped desperately, the little air that managed to flow in and out of his lungs coursing in rough gasps. Tears pricked in the corners of his eyes as he begged his uncle for mercy.

“Please, Uncle. It’s me! You promised never to hurt me!” Ben sobbed. “Uncle Luke!”

A cold voice laughed on the air, and Felicity Rhiaon was standing behind Luke, laughing at Ben.

“Well, what did you expect?” Felicity taunted. Utter glee filled her soul as she watched her husband murdering his nephew. “After what you did? You think you were going to get away with it? You think he’d still love you? That your parents would love you? Your father hates you. Always was ashamed of you. He’s happy and better off without you.”

“Please,” Ben begged her, “call him off.”

Felicity’s laughter was hysterical, “Why would I do that? I begged you for mercy, and you showed... me none. Why should you get the courtesy you denied me?"

“Please, Uncle Luke. Please stop. I’m sorry.”

“No.”

“You killed Alyla.”

“No.”

“You killed me!”

“No! No!” Ben screamed as his uncle’s hands tightened against his windpipe. He wept as the world faded to black. “No! No! No!”

“No!” Kylo screamed, shooting upright in bed.

“Kylo?” Sasa moaned blearily at his side. She was half asleep but roused by the strength of his panic, “What’s going on?”

“It’s nothing,” Kylo gasped, trying to regulate his breathing. Luke’s hands were gone, his lungs were unimpeded. He was safe. He was safe.

“Kylo?”

“It’s okay…I’m okay,” Kylo answered in a soothing tone when he could breathe normally again. He stroked Sasa’s cheek tenderly, smiling slightly at the sight of her. He was safe with her. Though she was not fully conscious, her mind reached for his instinctually in the Force to calm him, which it did at the very touch of her cerise Signature. “It was just a nightmare. Go back to sleep.”

“Do you want me to rebalance you?”

“You at my side is enough to rebalance me. Go back to sleep.”

“Are you sure?” Sasa asked.

“Sleep,” he bent down and kissed her lips. He whispered against them, “Sleep and dream of me.”

She smiled at him, “I always do.”

Then she settled back down for sleep.

Kylo sighed; if only he could settle so easily. Though Sasa soothed him, there was nothing that could fully quell the fear in his heart as he remembered the way his uncle’s hands had wrapped around his throat. There was only one thing that could possibly get him back to sleep.

“Phasma?” Kylo called into a comm.

It was a while before Phasma replied, “What, Kylo? Are we under attack or about to be?”

“No, everything’s calm right now.”
“Then what do you want? I’m sleeping.”

“I need more of the sleeping cordial.”

He heard a heavy sigh on the other end, “Is Sasa in bed with you?”

Kylo glanced at the copper haired beauty curled next to him, “Yes.”

“You better be wearing pants when I get there.”

“Do you have any idea what time it is?” Phasma demanded sleepily but still threateningly. Apparently even Stormtroopers enjoyed their beauty sleep. It was two in the morning, but she was still in full armor, even though she was just delivering the cordial. She offered the bottle to him, “Here you go. I had to make a quick one dose batch for tonight, but I’ll have your full bottle ready in the morning. You know, when it’s a reasonable time to make things like this.”

“Give it,” Kylo had no time for pleasantries. He grabbed the bottle and chugged it in one good. Though it did make him drowsy, the images wouldn’t leave his mind.

“Well?” Phasma asked. “If you fall asleep right here, I’m leaving you on the floor.”

“It’s no good.” Kylo clutched at his head, “I can’t forget his face.”

“I wish I could forget it. He was so angry, so powerful. He wanted me dead, and it just makes me feel weak. I need something that makes me feel strong, that cuts down Luke Skywalker, that-”

Kylo’s eyes brightened.

“I need to see it,” Kylo exclaimed. “I need to see the footage of Felicity Rhiaon’s death.”

Phasma stared at him, her expression unreadable behind the mask and very muted in the Force. She had learned a long time ago how to conceal her feelings moderately from the Force Sensitives around her.

She then glanced over at the altar in the corner of the room. Darth Vader’s charred helmet, Alyla Kene’s lightsaber, and a vial of Felicity Rhiaon’s bloodied hair sat on a blanket of ashes.

“Fine,” Phasma sighed, pulling out the HoloDisc she was requested to bring to Kylo so often she just permanently kept it upon her weapons belt.

They watched it together, the exact same footage that had been given to Luke Skywalker to torture himself with. Kylo and Phasma watched the shock on Felicity face, the way she begged for her life, the way she had refused to give up the truth about her child while faced with death (not that Kylo had any idea about that.)

They watched the blast go off, the way her body hit the face, the kicks Kylo had made at her body, and what he had done to her afterwards.

“This hurt him badly,” Kylo said as they replayed the footage a second time.

“Yes, it did,” Phasma whispered. “So badly that he did something I never thought Luke Skywalker would ever do… give up and run away. He’s not a coward. I don’t understand why he left, not when there was still something to fight for.”

“It just hurt him too much. Too much, too fast. But it’s better this way. Right? Better he’s off in hiding.”

“No, it’s not good at all.”

“Why not?”

“Because then we have to live with the torture of wondering when he’ll come back.”

Kylo paused the footage as the gloved hand lifted the blaster to Felicity Rhiaon temple.

“When it happened…” Kylo began. “When she died, what did you feel? Victory?”

“Victory?” Phasma repeated, her voice serious. “No, I didn't feel victory when she died. I always thought I would. For years I believed that the moment she died would bring me peace and satisfaction. Instead it only brought me fear.”

“Fear?”

“Of the reckoning that would follow. Of what the world would bring me when they learned what happened. Of what Luke Skywalker would do when he learned the truth.”

“No one can ever know the truth about what happened that day,” said Kylo, his hands shaking with fear. “Swear it to me, Phasma.”

“I have your back, Kylo. It would be the end of both of us – of this bond we have – if the truth were to be revealed.”

“If Uncle Luke found out… If my mother did…” Kylo shook his head. “No one can ever know I lied about that day. They can never know that you were really the one who killed Felicity Rhiaon.”

Chapter End Notes

Coming Up Next Chapter…

A Father’s Love
Rey’s pride over her staff skills have gotten her over confident, and Teng is worried. Luke finds he has to step in when she crosses the line with Sarco Plank.

So the BB-8 saved Poe from pirates thing is a reference to a fic I adore. It’s called Strong Loyalty Subprogram by wordslinging on AO3. I just imagine this happening at some point in my story, and asked the author if I could have permission to make it canon in my work (full disclosure, they never replied.) Give it a read. It’s a delightful story.

Anyone who is wondering if Tara’s mysterious backstory will end up being a big thing… No. It’s not. That whole exchange was just me being meta about how not every character needs a big, dramatic backstory.

You know, in the chapter where I explained like five dramatic backstories.
Also, no I’m not saying at any point in the story what happened to make Alyla scar herself. If you really want to know, I have left clues. Just pay attention to what Dirk said last chapter, and you should be able to figure it out.
A Father's Love

Chapter Summary

Teng loses his shirt at the worst time, Rey finds herself in a duel she can't win, and Aletha gives overboard with her care package.

Chapter Notes

So, I lied. I bought Bomber Command. Haven’t added anything new because of it, but I may go through the book and pull quotes from it later.

Credit for the Threepio and Jessika scenes in this chapter go to Jason Fry. They are literally copy and pasted from The Weapon of a Jedi and tweaked only a little bit as a bit of a framing device for something in this chapter. Sorry for breaking the promise of only featuring Jakku in this chapter. Also, I edited out the fact Threepio has his red arm in the book as that has yet to happen in this fic.

Dedicated to R2_D2106 who actually has written wonderful fan fiction of my fan fiction. Quom’s fleet line is from that fic, and the character of Lyra is a nod to it.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

The Long Way Home

Chapter Forty-Five

A Father’s Love

Or That Time Aletha Went Really Overboard with the Concept of a Care Package

I’m writing this to pass the time – and to pass on what I’ve learned so you have a chance to survive too.

- Rey’s Survival Guide

“Ok, I understand a care package, but this? This is a care shipment!” Luke groaned as he, Teng, Rey, and Quom struggled to drag the two enormous wooden crates into the workshop.

“Well, you know, Doc,” Quom grunted as he pushed the crate with Teng. “She likes to go overboard.”

“It’s why you two made such a good couple,” Rey teased.

Luke shook his head, “Quit sass ing and keep shoving.”

There was a myriad of grunts and groans, but when the crates were inside fully, there was a giant exhalation of relief as three humans and a Vrogem collapsed on the sandy ground.

“There!” Quom gasped, panting like a dog, his tongue hanging out of his mouth. “I am never moving anything heavy again. Isn’t that why I bought Teng?”

Teng shook his head, “Thanks, Quom.”

“No problem, Pup,” he patted Teng on the arm. “That Lyra girl was nice, though. Didn’t know why you wanted me to stay away from her, Luke.”

“Because I don’t trust you near anyone new without supervision,” Luke replied. “…Or just being unsupervised in general.”

“I’ll back you up on that one,” Rey laughed. “I’m just surprised that Jedek sent his daughter to deliver it rather than himself.”

“Maybe he was busy,” Luke shrugged, got up and searched for a crowbar.

“You know, I love how your birthday present shows up on my birthday,” Teng eyed Rey. “You’d think Aletha would at least send me something too.”

“Oh, stop whining, we can share,” Rey rolled her eyes. She leaned over to Quom, “Honestly, he’s been like this all morning.”

Teng was still a little disturbed by the Super Star Destroyer incident from that morning, but he hadn’t mentioned it to Luke and Quom, too occupied with just how freaking heavy the crates had been and trying to pretend like he and Rey didn’t know Aletha was going to send a present.

“He has?” Luke raised an eyebrow as he pried open the crates.

“She’s been…” Teng eyed his girlfriend. “Difficult.”

Luke understood, “Rey, were you beating up other scavengers again?”

“No!”

Luke raised an eyebrow.

“…Maybe,” Rey weakly confessed.

“She called dibs on the Super Star Destroyer,” Teng ratted out.

“Teng!”

“Sorry, Honey, but you gotta stop with all of this.”

Rey shrugged, “If all three of us work together.”

“Three?” Teng questioned.

“I’ve given up on Quom at this point.”

“Fair enough.”

“Sweetheart,” Luke tried not to sound exasperated, “scavengers have been stripping that ship since long before you were born and will continue to do so long after you’re dead. We cannot strip that whole ship.”

“I don’t see what she’s doing wrong,” Quom said.

“You can’t see what’s wrong with claiming the entire Star Destroyer?”

“It’s the biggest item in the desert.”

“That’s my exact point, Quom.”

“It’s a power play, Luke!” Quom exclaimed. “No one thinks she would actually be able to call dibs on the full thing, but by staking her claim, she’s cementing herself as the most powerful person in town.”

Luke groaned, “And that opens a whole new set of problems.”

“Look, she’s doing exactly what I taught her. When you encounter a strange scavenger, claim the spot, threaten them, and establish your dominance quickly. Make yourself seem as dangerous and unscrupulous as possible, and maybe tell a few lies to get things going. It’s how I ended up with you lot after all.”

“Yeah, but that didn’t go according to your plan anyway,” Luke reminded. “You barged in on Felicity, only to instantly back down the second she pointed a blaster at your face. You threatened to leave a child to die, even though, judging from the fact you spent two months of portions to save Teng, you absolutely never would do it. Then you proceeded to give away far more in trade than what my wife’s wedding rings were actually worth, and in fact you knew that they were worthless on Jakku because what can anyone do with a ring around here? You gave all of that out of guilt, and then you ended up apologizing and returning said rings. Not to mention you lied about Plutt having something called a cool down pill, which was actually a pill you found in the survival kit of an X-Wing that helped a person adjust to a sudden extreme environment. The pill just made Rey adapt to Jakku’s climate; it didn’t do a thing about her heat stroke. Getting a drink of water and some ice packs did.”

“That explains so many things,” Rey said.

“Alright, then I’m out of this argument,” Quom declared. “MG, you’re on your own.”

“Damn, didn’t think that through.” Rey frowned at Luke, “Aren’t you going to scold me for using bad language?”

Luke shrugged, “You’re sixteen, old enough to decide if you want to curse. Besides, I would be a fool to stop a Rhiaon from cursing. I literally couldn’t get your mother to wait until you were twenty-four hours old before she swore in front of you. What I am going to scold you for is calling dibs on the Star Destroyer, or rather more specifically for constantly getting in fights.”
“Ok, that’s not fair! You taught me to fight.”

Teng frowned, “Isn’t the syntax on that a little off?”

Yoda gave his mischievous laugh in the Force, “Know what of grammar the cult-born boy does?”

It took all of Luke’s strength not to respond to Yoda, “It’s just… something I was told, Teng. But it still applies.”

Rey huffed, “But tell me why-”

“No,” Luke cut off, reminded once more that she truly was his daughter. “Enough. There is no justification to claiming a Star Destroyer. You want to claim Antar’s X-Wing? Be my guest. No Star Destroyers! …This is not a lecture I ever thought I’d give.”

Rey narrowed her eyes and crossed her arms.

“You can’t stop me,” she said sternly.

Luke gave an involuntary shudder. That was the exact pose and tone of voice Felicity would use when he had done something to colossally piss her off. It was the kind of pose she had used during their arguments about Tyla being an Inquisitor and Ben as a potential danger to Rey.

If there was one thing Alaric Rhiaon had truly passed on to his daughter, it was that terrifying pose that had kept his children in line for the first sixteen years of his daughter’s life.

And Luke thought taking after the Skywalkers was bad enough.

“No. You’re right,” Luke struggled not to cow to a glare from his sixteen-year-old daughter. He may be her father, but damn, he and that stare had a history. “But I can guide and mentor you into taking the right path.”

“The right path,” Rey scoffed. “Oh, please, that’s a lot coming from a pacifist. Face it, Dad, you never even so much as throw a punch. Can you even fight? Like actually winning in combat sort of thing?”

Teng and Quom exchanged a look, and in perfect harmony took a step back from the father and daughter.

Luke raised an eyebrow, and then slowly gave her his own narrowed-eyed and arm-crossed glare. Rey may have got Alaric Rhiaon’s stern and disappointed look, but damn it, he had been graced with Padmé Amidala’s and he would use that to his advantage. He could get Obi-Wan Freaking Kenobi to cow to that look.

He could also Anakin Skywalker to submit to it in an instant, but that was for vastly different reasons. In fact, the only person who it didn’t work on was Leia, and that was only because she could do it, and do it better.

She didn’t back down, “Yes. Face it, Dad. I’ve never seen you take on someone like that and win.”

“That you remember, and believe me, you should be thankful that you don’t. You don’t want to know what I’m capable of, Rey. I would never ever use it against you, but that doesn’t mean you should take me for granted. I saved you from Jarex Zolhar after all.”

The name dropped in her stomach like lead, “J- Jarex?”

“He’s missing a hand if you remember. True, I did face off with that gang with the help of Quom and Aletha, but what happened to Jarex… that was all me. I have great power, Rey, and so do you. It’s our responsibility to use it for the good of others, not our own selfish reasons. With great power comes great responsibility.”

Quom frowned, “You know, I feel like that phrase belongs somewhere else.”

“But I am being responsible,” Rey insisted. “I’m not baiting someone into a fight simply to fight them.”

“Are you sure?” Luke questioned, his tone even. “That’s not your true motivation?”

“Yes!” Rey insisted. “I just don’t want people bothering me; nothing more.”

“Fine. Then how about this?” Luke offered, “I drop the subject on the condition you stop claiming the Star Destroyer as your territory. And you do not ever use your skills to attack someone. Only to defend yourself or if need be, Teng.”

“No problem,” he replied.

“That’s it?” Rey asked.

Luke nodded, “That’s all you have to do.”

“Fine, deal.” Rey shook her father’s hand, “But no more comments from you on the subject.”

“I’m a man of my word, but Rey, please remember that if you do ever get yourself into trouble… if a situation gets out of hand, please just comm me. I will come, and I will protect you.”

“You don’t need to protect me.”

“I’m your father, of course I do. You can take care of yourself, but I will always be there to pick up any slack. Any time, any place, no matter what. Even if you defy me, or do something you shouldn’t have, my first priority is taking care of you.”

“And that’s why you won’t answer questions about our past?” Rey teased.

Luke grinned, “You’re a big girl now, Rey. I might be open to more questions now.”

“Really?” her eyes lit up.

“But later,” he patted her hand. “For now, let’s see what in the Galaxy Aletha sent you.”

“I think it is the Galaxy,” Quom eyed the nearest crate. “These boxes are big enough to hold it.”

“And none of you knew she was sending this?” Luke asked suspiciously.

“Nope,” all three said in perfect harmony.

He knew they were lying, but Luke decided not to press the issue.
“Alright, Rey, since it is your present, why don’t you unpack these… crates,” Luke eyed the way the boxes nearly came to his waist, “and show us what you got.”

“Oh,” Rey approached the crates and looked inside. “Wow.”

It was… not what Rey had been expecting. She thought the girls were going to send her a little box with a few things, but that was not what was before her. No, she was looking at two giant crates crammed full with dozens of smaller bags and boxes. This apparently was what happened when Aletha Kymeri, Kaydel Ko Connix, Jessika Pava, Rose and Paige Tico, and Poe Dameron (Kaydel mentioned the project to him and he insisted on helping) worked together.

She now understood what Jessika meant last night when she said if Kira couldn’t come to civilization, then they were going to bring it to her.

Thankfully Rey didn’t have to be overwhelmed on where to start because there was an envelope at the top of one of the crates which read OPEN ME FIRST.

Rey grabbed the envelop and teared it open to find a few pages stapled together and Aletha’s familiar writing filling them. She read aloud what it said.

To my Jakku Family,

My lovely and sorely missed Rey, Luke, Quom, and Teng,

First off, I would like to say, I love you all, I miss you so much, I think about each of you every day, and I can’t wait until I get to see you again. I fight for all of you, and I do not regret my decision to leave. I truly am making a difference in the universe, and I wake every morning with a smile on my face.

The group smiled at Aletha’s words, and Rey couldn’t help but grin wider than them all. She had to resist making a joke that she knew the reason Aletha was smiling when she woke up was that a certain Diego Nalto was waking up in bed with her.

I know the Force will reunite us, or at least I pray it has that mercy.

Secondly, I will say this: Luke, do not panic. I am literally writing the names on this letter immediately before handing it off to Jedek. Your secret is still safe.

Luke couldn’t help but laugh at that.

I know you’re going to be surprised about the gift I have sent, and I know I went a little overboard. I wanted this to be a gift for all four of you, and I wanted the supplies to last you a few years. But please, do not ask how much this all cost or how I paid for it. It was a mix of donated products, my own personal funds, and some other sources I will keep close to my chest.

Rey grinned. It was also known as Kaydel Ko Connix, Rose and Paige Tico, Poe Dameron, Jessika Pava, and if her suspicions were correct, Diego, Evan, and Tallie had chipped in a little bit.

I have included a list of everything contained in these crates, and an explanation for a few of these. And I don’t want to hear anything about price or going overboard. Tough. I know what kind of life you people live on Jakku, so while I go to sleep on a nice mattress – or as nice as a military base gets – and under soft blankets, I can at least throw you a few bottles of hand lotion as recompense for hammocks, cots, and I swear to God, Quom, you better not be making Teng sleep on the ground.

“Yep,” Quom chuckled, “that’s our Doc, alright.”
Finally, before you start digging in – okay, I can’t guarantee Quom hasn’t already started snooping, but I know Luke raised Rey and Teng right – let me say one thing.

Everyone turned to look at Quom.

He put down a box he had been inspecting.

The purple box directly under this letter is for Rey’s eyes only. Sorry Boys, but we girls have to keep a secret every now and then. If Rey wants to share the contents, she may… though I doubt you boys would have use for bottle of menstrual cramp relievers.

“You would be surprised,” Quom said seriously.

Teng had lived with him long enough to know not to ask.

So, Rey, please open this away from Quom and your father. If you do, I wash my hands of the consequences.

Luke raised an eyebrow, but Rey just shrugged, avoiding his eyes.

Enjoy this, all of you.

And happy birthday, Rey and Teng. I wish I could be there to tell you in person,

With the full depth of love my heart is capable of,

Doctor Aletha Kymeri née Anthea

Rey handed off the letter to her father and pulled out the purple wooden box, “I’ll open this later.”

“Anything I should be concerned about?” Luke asked gently.

“No,” Rey grinned. She winked, “But Teng should.”

Teng seemed to get an instant sunburn.

“Alright, let’s see what’s in this sucker,” Rey set aside the purple box. She looked between the crates which were packed with a myriad of smaller boxes and bags. “What should I open first?”

“The letter says black carry bag.” Luke squinted at the letter, “She also says to consume immediately as these are very perishable. Consume?”

“Black carry bag,” Rey reached for it. She gasped and drew her hand back, “It’s cold!”

Luke winced. When he was young he had promised himself that his children would never be so unfamiliar with the concept of cold things, and yet here he was.

Rey eagerly pulled the black carry bag – a rather nice square thing with insulation, a zipper, and a long sturdy strap – out of the crate. She unzipped it and gasped.

“Woah,” Teng’s jaw dropped. “Is that-”

“Real food,” Quom marvelled. “It’s been so long since I’ve seen it.”

Various clear containers were covered in melting ice packs. Food that very few people in that tent recognized, but the smell of it… and the colours….
“Anyone else extremely hungry right now?” Teng asked.

“I’ll grab the plates.” Quom hurried away.

“Start up the ration cooker,” Luke advised. “Some of this will need to be heated. Oh, Aletha Kymeri, you never cease to amaze me.”

“Dad, what is this all?” Rey asked as everyone worked to set the table and unpack the carry bag.

“Well, it’s food,” Luke glanced at the letter. “Aletha says that there’s more food in boxes 1-3. Teng, grab them, will you?”

“Yes, Sir,” Teng began to dig through the crates, sorting the boxes in numerical order.

“Ration cooker is ready,” Quom announced. “What are we cooking?”

“Alright, the first thing is,” Luke looked at the list and froze. “Oh my god.”

“What?” Rey asked.

Luke glanced at Quom and read the letter, “I hope you guys don’t think some of my choices are weird. I discussed this care package with General Leia Organa – who really loved the idea, so you’ll see some touches from her throughout the box – and she gave me some ideas of food to send you guys. She based it on things she remembered her brother, Luke Skywalker, consuming on the desert planet of Tatooine, thinking food would hold up similarly on Jakku.”

Quom chuckled, “Well, how about that?”

“That is so cool,” Rey grinned. “We’re going to be eating like Luke Skywalker!”

“Think you can perform such a feat, Mister Erso?” Quom winked at Luke.

It took all of Luke’s will-power not to throw something at Quom.

Luke scowled as Quom laughed hysterically, “Don’t make me strangle you, Quom.”

“The Jedi Grandmaster,” Rey explained. “He’s off on some great quest to bring balance to the Galaxy. Facing his greatest challenge yet.”

Luke had to admit that raising a teenager on Jakku with Quom Tinadar was significantly harder than facing the Emperor and resisting the Dark Side.

“Neat,” Teng simply replied. He got into his seat, “So what are we eating?”

“Well in that container,” Luke pointed at one as he scanned the list, “that’s deep fried gorg. It’s a Tatooine street food. A small amphibian creature sometimes called a chuba – no I don’t know why it has the same name as the Huttese word for you, languages are weird. Don’t worry about the amphibian thing; it tastes great.”

Teng frowned, “It says all of that in the letter?”

“Parts of it,” Luke held the letter close to his body.
“Dad?”

“Yes, Rey?”

“What’s street food?”

“Food sold at a vendor like the shops in the marketplace,” Luke explained, his heart hurting a little that Rey didn’t know that you could just walk up to a shop and buy food. Plutt’s monopoly had really messed with her worldview.

“That’s amazing,” Rey watched intently as Quom began to heat up the deep fried gorg on the ration cooker. It wouldn’t do an amazing job, but something was better than nothing. “What else is there?”

“The biggest container,” Luke pointed at it, “is a roast nuna. It’s cut up already, but Aletha says it’s a whole one.”

“Nuna,” Teng grinned. “I remember nuna. It’s from Naboo, right?”

“Among other places.” Luke looked at the list and his jaw almost dropped, “Whoa.”

“What?” Rey asked.

“Um,” Luke struggled how to cover his amazement at the next item. He couldn’t believe Aletha had put in that of all things, “I was just thinking how hard it will be to heat up this next item. The thing in the little bowl is a recipe from a very high-end restaurant on Coruscant. Roast leek soup.”

Rey peeked at the letter and gasped, “Aletha says that this was something Rogue One adored!”

Luke chuckled, memories flitting through his mind, “Yeah. It was… Apparently.”

Quom raised an eyebrow, and Luke waved him off.

“Let’s see what else there is.” Luke shook his head, if the soup hadn’t already tipped him off, then this next item proved Aletha had truly consulted Leia on this care package, “She sent cake.”

“For our birthdays,” Rey grinned at Teng. “What kind of cake? There are different kinds, right?”

“Yes, there are,” Luke smiled at the four containers, each holding a slice of very familiar cake. It was the exact cake he would have on his own birthday every year before his life on Jakku. “This is Sic-six-layer cake made from a place on Coruscant called Dex’s Diner. Apparently a favorite restaurant of Leia Organa’s.”

“I’ve heard of Dex’s Diner,” Teng piped up, surprising everyone. He saw the looks he was getting, “What? Even pirates have to eat. They said it was good.”

“Anything else perishable?” Quom asked.

“A few more things,” Luke answered. “The small box is cheese made of Narglatch milk, the thermos is filled with blue milk – now that brings back memories – and Box 1 back by the crate is filled with… What the? What does that mean?”

“What?” Rey asked in a panic. Was her secret out somehow?

“Listen to this.” Luke read the letter, “Box 1 is filled with koyo melons. Freshly picked and packed, they come from the Dameron ranch. The Dameron ranch is operated by Kes Dameron, a war veteran I am acquainted with. His son, Poe Dameron, has become a pleasure to work with – most of Everyone stared at Luke, too afraid to ask for clarification in fear they would tip him off to their secret communication with Aletha.

Luke wanted to tell them all that he knew Kes and Poe Dameron and was amazed to receive fruit from their ranch, but instead he settled on, “What niece?”

“Oh,” Rey cleared her throat, deciding she had the best chance at covering for them, “didn’t you talk to Lyra? She said that Aletha apparently found one of her nieces was working in the Resistance and they’ve reconnected. Aletha consulted her a little on the care package apparently.”

“Well, that’s uh,” Luke cleared his throat in the exact same manner, deciding it was best to move on from the point. “That’s nice. Teng, why don’t you open Box 2?”

Teng frowned, “Aren’t we going to eat?”

“It’ll be a while, Pup,” Quom answered. “Let’s unpack everything and by the time we’re done that the food should be ready.”

So, they unpacked the next crate of food products with Luke reading out what they were.

Aletha had sent a box of energy bars that were standard in the Rebellion that Luke had fond memories of, three cans of fruit (Jogan Fruit, Thorn Pear, and Durang Fruit), a can opener, a few packs of Bantha jerky, what Rey recognized by the brand name to be Rose’s favorite saltine crackers, and a few bags of trail mix that Luke was quick to push away.

“Sorry for the kind I sent you,” Rey read the letter, “but trail mix goes surprisingly quick in the Resistance. The Resistance likes to theme them around planets as a way of letting people have a small comfort of home. Poe’s droid, BB-8 has literally gotten into fights over the Yavinese variation. The only kind left I was able to get you guys was the Dagobah themed one. Apparently, Han Solo had it made as a gag for Luke Skywalker during one mission, but after the Food Director learned how much nutrition and energy was packed in it, she demanded it become a permanent variation. Now the teams fight over who gets stuck with that kind, but hey, I figured it had to be better than a decade of polystarch. It has Galla seeds, Sohli bark, and dehydrated mushroom spores.”

It was as terrible as Luke remembered. He’d take ten years of stale expired rations on Jakku over those awful two months of eating the food of Dagobah any time.

Box 3 was more food, and Luke was actually quite excited over what was in it.

“Drink mixes?” Rey frowned at the packages. “What does that mean?”

“You mix these packages of powder into water to make a different tasting drink,” Luke explained. “Usually you use hot water.”

Rey frowned at a package, “Hot chocolate?”

Luke’s eyes widened, “Hot chocolate?”

“Yeah, some weird brown thing if the picture is right,” Rey squinted at the packet. “It looks like mud. Sounds terrible.”

Luke cleared his throat, “Yeah, it probably is. Why don’t I just take it off your hands?”
“Take it all,” Rey pushed the box into her father’s hands.

Luke grinned. Sometimes he was a bad father, and he was okay with that.

“Ugh,” Teng made a face as he inspected another package, “instant caf. Can we just toss this?”

Rey frowned, “Oh, but I’ve always wanted to try caf.”

“Starlight, I love you too much to let you drink that,” Teng said simply.

She froze, “You what?”

Luke and Quom exchanged a look.

“What?” Teng blinked, clearly missing something.

She watched him with a careful smile, “You said… you love me.”

Teng’s face regained its sunburn, “Oh! Uh, yeah, well… ahem I uh… I do.”

He could not believe this was the situation in which he first told her that. Digging through crates, Luke and Quom staring at them, while Teng warned her about the dangers of instant caf. Usually this sort of thing would send Teng trudging back home to slam his head against a tent peg over and over calling himself an idiot, but he was already home.

Would it be rude to ask everyone to leave?

Luke smiled kindly and patted Teng on the shoulder, “Why don’t you two discuss this later?”

“Sounds good to me,” Teng said quickly. “Rey?”

She hesitated, “Oh, alright. But we will talk.”

“Promise,” Teng smiled.

“Well, you continue to prove to be no fun,” Quom declared, glaring at Luke. He was inspecting a tin of powder, “That is this?”

Teng frowned, “Looks like something the pirates would smuggle. Probably illegal and possibly hallucinogenic. If you use it, don’t expect me to take care of you while you’re under the influence. Or, you know… hit me for not doing so.”

“The more you tell me about your life, Pup, the more I want to hug you.”

“Please don’t. You actually cracked one of my ribs with the power of one of your sympathetic hugs.” Teng glanced at Rey, “He hugs hard.”

“Believe me, I know,” Rey laughed, pressing a kiss to his cheek. She then checked the letter, “Let’s see… Oh, this is interesting. She says it’s a Vrogem drink powder called Uzaka used to calm and regulate the mind after an episode of darkness… whatever that means.”

“I’ll take that,” Luke snatched it from Quom. “I have a feeling I’ll need to medicate you one of these days.”

Teng muttered, “He probably already needs medication of some sort. Ow! Rey! What was that for?”
“Same rules I have with Dirk I apply to any mental health joke. Do not make fun of mental illness.”

“Sorry, Dear,” Teng rubbed his side.

Quom grinned at Luke, “Those two make a good couple. They keep each other in line… even if she does occasionally use violence to do so.”

“Eh, worked for Felicity and I,” Luke shrugged, and they unpacked the rest of the third box.

The box included three kinds of tea bags – hearthwood, tezirett, and yarum, which was a seed from Dagobah that actually tasted really good. Aletha also had sent some bottles of Chadian and Ubese dressing – the most common flavorings in the galaxy, something used like salt and pepper were on the Yavin moons. There were various packets of spices that Aletha hoped would make rations taste better, and some sauces, one of which Rey knew to be an extremely potent hot sauce that Jessika Pava used on everything, and the taste of which had once made Poe Dameron cry. And he was from Yavin IV, moon of spicy food.

Box 4 was a small one, and it clearly was dedicated to Rey. It had a few bottles of the promised nail polish – blue, red, lilac, metallic silver, and a clear top coat that made her nails look glossy. There were also the lip glosses: one clear and two tinted ones – red and pink. Three retractable pencils of eyeliner – black, brown, and silver for fun – and a few tubes of black mascara that Aletha swore up and down could withstand the desert because she had actually sometimes used the same brand while living on Jakku.

She also had sent two small bottles of fragrance: the kind of perfume that Kaydel wore which would guarantee a Poe Dameron attached to her neck, and the kind of cologne Poe used that he was passing along to Teng.

“Told you she would send you stuff too,” Rey grinned as Teng curiously sniffed at the cologne.

“But even better, Rey got Quom’s expected reaction to the nail polish.”

“What is that?” Quom grabbed the bottle of red nail polish. “Paint for your nails? Why is this a thing? What would you need this for? Nails are claws! They should be sharp tools to aid you in scavenging and fighting! The only time they should be red is if they are covered in blood!”

“Then I’m glad what’s in this next box,” Teng lifted up a bottle of hand sanitizer.

The next eight boxes were jam packed with a frankly ridiculous number of medical supplies, including five giant bottles of hand sanitizer.

“Well, what did you expect from, Doc?” Quom said. “Oh, breath mints.”

“Keep them,” Teng said quickly. “Please… I beg you.”

Quom swatted at him.

The next box was a joint present for Rey and Teng. Three thick blank notebooks – Aletha sent an uneven number because Rey already owned the one from Quom – a translation guide, a mechanic manual, and a book about the art of Naboo. Luke flipped through it and discovered his mother’s ex-boyfriend Paulo had a few pieces in it, which did not make Force Ghost Anakin happy, but made Force Ghost Obi-Wan laugh at Anakin’s reaction.
Aletha also had sent a few teaching manuals, math workbooks, classic novels, history books, and science texts.

“These two children have a poor enough education,” Luke read the letter. “Let’s change that, shall we? Also, use on Quom if you need to, Luke.”

“Hey!” Quom objected.

“Alright, fair enough.”

In the box, she had also sent a few boxes of pencils, a package of erasers, two boxes of coloured pencils, two pencil sharpeners, a package of nice black ink art pens, and a deck of Sabacc cards.

The next few boxes were dedicated to hygiene items, and it was clear that she wasn’t just treating the teenagers this time.

Luke and Quom, for men who are surprisingly into their appearances, particularly their hair, you are dusty, dirty, hermits. We’re fixing that. So, I turned to the experts about grooming and appearance in the Resistance: Leia Organa and Poe Dameron.

This was the part where Aletha’s explanation about wanting to take care of all of them for several years came into play. She sent four toothbrushes, seven tubes of toothpaste, three hair brushes, a special hairbrush for Quom’s fur, ten boxes of floss, a few packages of new hair ties for Rey, nail clippers, a nail file/emery board, a beard trimmer, ten packages of washing detergent, two bottles of dish soap, three bottles of the body wash Kaydel liked to use, six bottles of the body wash Poe used, ten bottles of a shampoo/conditioner made for Wookiees, twenty bottles of lotion, fifteen sticks of deodorant for the humans, a few packages of razors, three bottles of shaving cream… and one tube of chapstick.

No one ever actually finishes a chapstick.

But what surprised Luke most of all were the ten bottles of shampoo and ten bottles of conditioner that Aletha sent.

Of all the things in this care package, this was probably the most expensive. This is really good stuff, so use it wisely because I’m not sending you any more. The shampoo and conditioner I sent was recommended to me by Leia Organa. This is the stuff that she, Luke Skywalker, and Poe Dameron use on their hair. This is the best of the best… so don’t let Quom touch it. I sent him the good stuff for fully hairy species. Don’t waste an entire bottle on just washing him.

“It smells really good,” Rey declared holding the bottle close. “Like really good. Almost something… comforting.”

“It does, doesn’t it?” Luke smiled sadly.

Aletha was right, this was the stuff Luke had used back in his old life. He had started using it because Rey loved the shampoo Aunt Leia would use on her when she stayed with her aunt. It made Aunt Leia’s hair so shiny and soft and smell so good. Luke remembered coming into Leia’s apartment one night to find Rey had fallen asleep on the couch in Leia’s arms, just loving the scent of her aunt’s hair.
Luke gave the shampoo a small sniff, and Leia’s warmth flooded his soul as her scent filled his nostrils. He missed her so much.

“If you guys are done sniffing things, the food is almost ready,” Quom declared. “Let’s hurry this up.”

“Right, Teng, next box,” Luke ordered.

The next box was clothing. Four sets of goggles, four sets of military grade adventuring boots – how she got their sizes perfect, Luke had no clue – some proper work gloves for Teng, seven scarves for the delighted Quom, three black right hand gloves for Luke, several packages of socks, and several packages of underwear which was quickly passed to the correct people without much eye contact.

There was one thing in the box that surprised Teng: a pair of leather wrist cuffs.

When I mentioned to Poe that Teng was turning eighteen and that no coming-of-age thing was planned, he insisted we send him these wrist cuffs. On the Yavinese moons, eighteen is the age of majority, and it’s tradition to give a gift of something made from Runyip leather. Poe himself has a jacket made of it, and I must say that when he wears it, Kaydel can barely keep her hands off of him. I think it’s actually Kes’ old jacket as it has a faded red Starbird patch on the shoulder.

Actually, the whole coming-of-age aspect is the reason for Rey’s gift here. On my home planet of Mallarex, sixteen is the age of majority. When you turn sixteen, you receive a bracelet such as this, wound with five bronze coloured cords. The five cords represent five mythical sisters that supposedly bring luck and protection to women everywhere. It’s said on my planet that having five daughters is the most ideal set of children.

And yes, I do see the irony in the fact that I am one of five sisters, and our relationship has developed into death, disorder, and disowning.

“Well, now that she points it out, it loses all its fun,” Quom pouted.

“Alright, there’s not much left,” Luke declared looking around the disaster of the tent. The ground was absolutely covered in products and empty boxes. “Just two left. Well, three if you count Rey’s private box.”

“The letter says the next box is for Teng,” Rey said. “It’s his birthday present from Aletha. Told you she’d get you something.”

Teng opened the box and was impressed, “Whoa. She got me a utility belt.”

“A nice one from the looks of it,” Luke appraised the belt sitting on some green fabric. “Good sized pockets, nice leather, and the buckle is secure.”

“You know a lot about utility belts?” Teng teased.

Luke grinned, “I’ve had a few in my day. My first had a grappling hook. Came in surprisingly handy.”

“Looks like this one does too,” Teng started to lift the belt out of the box when he felt something odd underneath the green fabric, “Is there something else in the box?”

Rey scanned the letter and gasped, “Why don’t you take a look?”

Teng lifted out the utility belt and pulled aside the green fabric. His jaw dropped when he saw what was sitting underneath.

Rey read out the letter, “As you are now an adult on most planets, I thought it was time you had your weapon. A real weapon. A new weapon. I bought you your very own blaster. Along with a few power cells and extra gas cartridges, you’ll find a brand-new DL-44 blaster. This comes highly recommended from several Resistance soldiers, especially General Leia Organa. Apparently, the DL-44 model is exclusively what Han Solo carries. They’re great to modify and customize, and last time she counted, Organa claims that Solo has owned at least twelve of these over the years. Take care of it, Teng, and use it to take care of the others.”

“I guess I have to get better at shooting,” Teng checked over simple but sturdy black blaster.

Luke shook his head at the sight of it; it certainly brought back a lot of memories. That was the same kind of blaster that Han had taught him to shoot on. Or rather, spent months correcting Luke’s technique on.

And then Luke’s heart fell.

It was also the same model Han had given Ben for his tenth birthday.

Luke wondered if Ben still carried the weapon – there had been no trace of it in his room when he ran away. If so, how many lives had Ben Solo taken using it? Worse yet, how many of his mother’s soldiers had he used it on?

There were some questions Luke never wanted an answer to.

“Alright, food is almost ready,” Quom declared. “Let’s open that final box and dig in to all of this.”

“Ok, final box,” Rey opened it. “Oh my god. I don’t believe it.”

She pulled a glossy photo out of the box, and scrawled across a corner in black ink and a familiar handwriting were the words:

To Aletha’s Ray of Sunshine.

May the Force Be with You.

General Leia Organa, Princess of Alderaan.

“She got me Leia Organa’s autograph!” Rey exclaimed excitedly.

Luke just stared at the photo in shock. Leia didn’t like signing autographs; she always thought it undercut her accomplishments to just be some poster girl. She especially hated signing anything as the Princess of Alderaan for the same reasons.

Han hated them too and probably wouldn’t have even given Ben one. Luke tolerated autographs, but Lando, Chewie, and Felicity adored giving them. Lando because he loved the attention, Chewie because he loved making people smile, and Felicity because she so rarely got people who knew to ask.

Felicity did refuse to sign them as Felicity Rhiaon Skywalker. You either got Felicity Rhiaon or you got nothing. She would not let her notoriety be based on the fact she was married to Luke, and insisted the Rhiaon part got as much respect as the Skywalker name. Felicity would even correct people like Phasma and Hux whenever they called herself and Rey “Skywalker” and not “Rhiaon Skywalker.” Not that either of them had ever picked up on that habit.
“That’s not all that’s in this box,” Teng pulled out a disc-shaped machine. “Is this a Holo projector?”

“Let me check the letter,” Rey looked around where to set the photo down.

Rey handed the photo to her father without a second thought.

Luke tried to make his hands stop shaking as he held the picture of his sister. His twin sister full of confidence and a bittersweet love for the antics of their ridiculous family.

It seemed to be a stock image, one sent out to the media with announcements involving her. Her hair was different, up in a Alderiaan twist as demanded by royal tradition. But at the base of her skull was a small bun, no doubt a small tribute to her supposedly late sister-in-law and niece.

Luke’s heart broke when he saw the ring prominently displayed on the ring finger of her right hand. Another Alderiaan tradition: a mourning ring, and its placement on her ring finger symbolizing a child lost. Two stones were set with twisted gold symbolizing two lost children: her two lost sons. Ben, who was corrupted and twisted, and the baby, Jacen, she had miscarried.

Jacen, the reason Han Solo had pulled away from Ben. Han couldn’t handle the guilt of lavishing a lot of attention on one son when he knew he never even got the opportunity to spend time with his other. They didn’t really speak of Jacen in the family, but the wound his death left had never fully healed.

Luke fought back a tear as he looked down at the picture. Leia looked no nonsense in her photo, but still looked approachable. And good… his sister looked good.

Making sure Rey wasn’t watching, Luke stroked two of his natural fingers across Leia’s visage. He remembered their brief connection after Wedge died. He remembered her plea to stay and talk with her. Luke missed her so much. He wished he could just tell her the truth, but Rey had to be protected.

And then he reminded himself that every day that passed was another that brought him closer to their reunion… and he would see her again. He was sure of it.

“Here we go,” Rey broke Luke from his thoughts. “Aletha’s explanation. Teng, are there little computer chips in that box?”

“Uh yeah,” Teng counted them, “twelve. What are they?”

Rey read out the letter.

_This last gift I send is one of memories. I have included a small but sturdy Holo projector that can also take Holos. I’ve included three blank chips that will hold one image each. Please use them so we can always remember this odd little family on Jakku._

_The rest of the Holos I will explain now. Please, pop them in and look at them as I detail them._

They followed Aletha’s instructions, and every image brought Luke both joy and sorrow.

_The images are as follows:_

_A snapshot of the human medical team: Myself, Doctor Meredyth Kalonia, and Nurse Evan Tharel. Kalonia is a Rebel veteran, and she was the doctor for the Jedi Order before it fell. Evan, I call Hot_ Shot and he calls me Grandma. We had a bit of a generational clash when we met, but we soon became friends. Fairly good with a sniper rifle now, all thanks to me. He’s got a bright future ahead of him.

“She looks good,” Quom whispered as they stared at the picture of Aletha.

Rey grinned as he took in the image of Paige Tico’s crush. Tall, lanky, dirty blonde hair that bordered on brown. Nice enough if you were into that sort of man.

Next is a picture I’m told was actually taken by Luke Skywalker. It’s of Han Solo, shortly after the Battle of Yavin, and Solo was helping Skywalker tune up his X-Wing. According to General Organa, Solo did more harm than help.

Luke had to resist a chuckle. He remembered that day so well.

This is a picture of Chewbacca. Apparently, it was only taken last year. It’s hard to tell ages with Wookiees, but I think he looks good.

Luke smiled. Same old Chewie. He wondered if Chewie was keeping Han in line.

Lando Calrissian at a recent reception. He’s hung up his blaster for a while, busy running Cloud City. He does come down and pitch in every now and then, but Calrissian keeps his distance for reasons unknown to me.

Luke winced when he saw that Lando was still wearing his mourner’s armband. Whatever was going on with Alyla Kene, Luke wouldn’t be moved to tell Lando about it unless he had all the facts. No need to hurt Lando further.

This is Leia at the same event. She looked just as lovely as you would expect. I think she was really proud of Diego and Poe for what they did.

Luke frowned. What had happened to Poe Dameron and Diego Nalto?

Speaking of, this is Poe Dameron and Diego Nalto. Kaydel was so proud of Poe that night. He has a lot to live up to as Head of the Air Force. Diego’s not thrilled about having to step down due to his injury, but at least he can continue to serve.

Luke’s heart dropped. Diego had been injured? Was it his arm? Why hadn’t he sensed it? He and Diego weren’t the closest, but he would have at least thought… Luke just wished he could know more.

And Poe the Head of the Air Force? Luke almost thought the boy too young, but he was picturing him as an eighteen-year-old. Heck, he still saw Poe as sixteen sometimes. But the man was something like twenty-nine now, and Luke had seen much younger was such power. Heck, he had been much younger with that power before.

This is a candid image Poe managed to snag the other day. It’s Kaydel talking to Leia and C-3PO. Leia adores Kay almost as much as me (though I think Poe’s got us both beat in that category.) She’s got a bright future ahead of her. I’m so glad I get to see it.

“So, that’s the niece,” Quom said. “She really looks like Doc.”

Luke frowned, “And weirdly enough, a lot like Leia.”
Finally, this is a photo that was taken not long after I arrived. It’s everyone in the Resistance who fought in the Rebellion. I’ll list as many as I know. There’s me, Leia, Kalonia, Diego, Threepio, R2-D2, Admiral Akbar, Nils Arlos, Kes Dameron, Wedge Antilles, Zev Senesca, Nien Numb, and I don’t actually know the rest. Sorry.

So many familiar faces, Luke smiled. He missed them but was glad they chose to continue the fight. He vaguely wondered why Artoo was powered down in the photo but pushed it from his mind. Luke would see them again someday.

His eyes fell on the image of Wedge Antilles.

Well… not all of them.

That final image viewed, Rey read out the final part of the letter.

I hope you all enjoy the gifts I have given you. Make them last, and think of me. I hope we all see each other someday, and I hope this provides at least a marginally better life than the one you all lead.

May the Force Be with You, and My Eternal Love,

Doctor Aletha Kymeri

P.S. Please don’t get robbed.

Everyone laughed at the comment.

“She’s right,” Luke said. “We should divvy this out, pack it up, and hide it.”

“We can do that later, for now, let’s eat,” Quom pulled up a chair.

No one could argue with that.

Chatter filled the tent as they took their seats and started dishing out the food. Comments were made on what looked and smelled good and bad. Luke tried convincing Teng that deep fried gorg was actually good, Quom tried to hide the nuna only to be stopped by Rey, Teng tried to no avail to sweet talk his girlfriend into giving him her helping of the roast leek soup, and Rey chastised Luke for hogging all of the blue milk when Quom dared her to eat a spoonful of hot sauce.

“Hey, Dad?” Rey whispered as Teng and Quom bickered over whether or not Vrogem had to eat vegetables. Sometimes it was hard to tell who was raising who.

“Quom, set a good example and eat them,” Luke said sternly. He leaned over to Rey, “Yes, Sweetheart?”

“Would you mind if I stayed overnight here tonight?” She looked down shyly, “I want to make sure Teng has a happy birthday.”

Luke chuckled, “Don’t do anything I wouldn’t.”

“Considering what I’ve walked in on you and Aletha doing, that’s a pretty low bar.”

“I know it’s going to be easier to give in than to try to stop you two from running around. Besides, Quom already told me what you two did on your birthday.”

Rey’s face was redder than the time she got third degree sunburn.
When they had everything set to eat and were about to dig in, Rey suddenly jumped out of her chair.

“Wait,” Rey raced over to the Holo projector. “We should take a picture of this. The four of us happy and actually going to get real food.”

“I think that’s an excellent idea,” Luke agreed.

Rey set it all up and returned to her seat. She had set the projector on a timer and propped it against a well-positioned toolbox. She sat next to her father, the pair hugging and smiling. Teng sat across from Rey and reached out to clasp her hand lovingly. At the very last second, Quom yanked Teng in a playful headlock, and the photo captured Holo their laughing faces and playfully fight, though Teng never let go of Rey’s hand.

They would cherish that Holo far more than they ever expected.

“Teng? Teng?” a voice whispered.

He groaned in his cot, the warmth of his blankets nearly lulling him to sleep, “For the last time, I don’t care if you itch, Quom. I am not checking you for fleas before bed more than once a week. You asked two nights ago. Bugger off for five days.”

Rey’s head suddenly popped up from where she was sleeping on the ground next to him. It was her own offering to take the ground as it was Teng’s birthday. Besides, she wasn’t planning on being on the ground for long.

“Actually, I was talking to you,” she grinned at him, elbows resting on the cot as Teng sat up.

“Well, I’m happy to check you for fleas any time,” Teng grinned. “You look like you need a good thorough pat down.”

“That’s exactly what I had in mind.”

“Get up here.”

Rey let out a small squeal as Teng pulled her up into his arms.

“Quiet,” Teng scolded softly as he positioned her over his reclining form. “Careful. Quom might hear.”

“Quom’s asleep,” Rey kissed his neck in the way that drove him wild. “Don’t you hear the snores?”

Teng wouldn’t be surprised if the people three tents down heard the snores.

“Quom can weirdly snore and have cognisant conversations at the same time,” Teng explained as he helped Rey unbutton his shirt.

“Oh, I thought he stopped that,” Rey pulled it over his head.

Their lips locked passionately, hands roaming over each other’s bodies. Moans and soft sighs filled the tent as they tangled together trying to be close, but not fall off the cot in the process.

“That feels so good,” Rey moaned as Teng kissed the exposed skin of her chest, getting lower and lower to her cleavage. The gauze wrap that criss-crossed her body had been thrown to the floor.

“I want more,” Teng whispered. He toyed with the hem of her white tunic, “Can I take it off?”

“Yes,” she grinned.

He kissed her forcefully and started to pull the tunic up.

“Rey keeps her shirt on or you sleep outside, Teng,” Quom said at the same time he let out a loud snore.

They scowled at each other.

“There goes that fun,” Teng slumped back on the cot. “Sorry.”

Rey glanced towards the tent flap, “Actually… I have an idea.”

“We shouldn’t be here,” Teng looked around the lounge room of the Millennium Falcon as if someone was about jump out from the shadows.

“No one watches this ship,” Rey rolled her eyes. Her gauze was back in Quom’s tent with Teng’s shirt. “I’ve been here a thousand times. No one cares.”

“Yeah. It’s hard to care about this ship.”

Rey eyed the purple box Teng was carrying, “You know, I could have brought that myself.”

“Mom didn’t teach me much, but she taught me to be a gentleman and to never join cults.”

“Well, then, would you do me the courtesy of putting the box on the table?”

Teng grinned.

Rey yelped as Teng dropped the box on the ground and hoisted her up to sit on the dejarik table. His lips and hands were on her in an instant, pulling off her tunic with little fanfare.

“Teng,” Rey beamed as his hands ran up her bare skin and across her somewhat muscular stomach. “What happened to being a gentleman?”

“Screw it; it’s my birthday. I want my present.”

Rey moaned as his lips recaptured hers. She pressed his body against his, reveling in the feeling of skin against skin as his tongue played in her mouth. He was so warm and solid.

“Oh, Teng,” Rey gasped when they broke for air. “Teng, I love you.”

Teng grinned, “Really?”

“Really,” she smiled back, her hands resting on his shoulders, her knees gripping his hips and he stood before her seated form. “I’ve been in love with you for a long time. I don’t even know when I fell in love with you. Maybe it was when you told me that you were being sold. Maybe it’s when you told me about your family. Maybe it’s when you tried to talk me through my problems with Aletha. Or maybe I’ve always been in love with you. Maybe I fell in love the second you handed me that happy-bore pamphlet. I don’t know when I knew it, but I know that this is real. This is what my father felt for my mother. What he felt for Aletha.”

“I knew when I realized I was in love with you,” Teng smiled. “It’s when I passed out from hunger. When I woke up, all I could think about was you and how long until you would be at my side. Rey… literally, the only thing I want in my life is your happiness. I know that this isn’t really the best way to live my life, but when you live the life I have, there’s not much more to it. Whatever it takes, whether it’s something I do, or even the thought of stepping back and you living life without me, what makes you happy makes me happy.”

“Don’t you dare leave me, Teng Malar.” She bowed her forehead to his, “You make me happy, Teng. I never thought I could be this happy.”

“I don’t know what I did to deserve you.”

“I’m a pretty poor prize to be honest.”

“Then I will gladly enjoy my consolation prize.”

“You cad,” Rey playfully smacked his chest. “Now, come on, let’s open up my box. I have a feeling that we’ll find something handy in that box.”

Teng groaned, but helped her off the table and they put the crate on top. Inside they found a few items and another envelope, this one Aletha had labeled Kira.

---

Dear Kira,

The girls – and Poe – wanted to send you a few extra items, but we needed to keep it under wraps from your father. We’ve included in this box a solid four-year supply of tampons, pads, and panty liners so you’ll be covered. There’s also some feminine wipes for the messier days and a few bottles of menstrual cramps reliever.

The girls also sent a few gifts. Jess and the Ticos wanted you to have tokens from their homeworlds like Kay and I gave you a bracelet.

Rose and Paige sent the necklace. It’s simple enough that you can just tuck it under your clothing. The sun pendant has a very small bit of Haysian gold in it.

Jessika sent you the Dandoran teardrop earrings. Don’t worry, that clear stone is not a diamond. It’s a mineral called luyrian. It’s not a cheap material, but it’s not on the level of diamonds. And yes… Jessika had bought them before I could inform her your ears aren’t pierced. Hang on to them for now, Kira. Don’t you dare let anyone on Jakku pierce your ears.

We also sent a few more Holo chips. There’s the one BB-8 took that night we thought of the care package. There’s also one of Rogue Squadron, as well as Diego with Rogue One, whose name I have learned to be Fliss. We also put in a picture of Rose and Paige, one of Tallie and Jessika, and one of Kaydel and Poe.

And Poe wants it to be known that he thinks they look damn good in that photo. I don’t know if I can handle these two much longer. I may have to break them up.

The final item, well… all I can say is you’re welcome. Let me know when you need more, and I’ll send Jedek on another run.

Be careful, be safe, and be protected. We’ll see each other again someday. I promise.

And Teng, if you’re reading this, I want you to know that if you get Kira pregnant, I will kill you, and then if Kira chooses to have the baby, I’ll kill her once she had given birth to it. Don’t be idiots and screw up your life over a moment of fun… no matter how fun it is.

Sending you our love,

Aletha Kymeri

Kaydel Ko Connix

Poe Dameron (P.S. It’s a lot of fun.)

Jessika Pava

Paige Tico

Rose Tico (Sorry, I couldn’t find any pears.)

Rey grinned and pulled the final gift out of the box. There were a few boxes of them, and Rey was grateful.

“Aletha is so thoughtful,” Rey held up the box of condoms.

“Truly wonderful,” Teng chuckled. “Though judging by the number of these she sent, I’m nervous about the kind of stamina she thinks I have.”

“I’m sure we can make good use of all of them. After all, you don’t just use them for the main event.”

Rey set the box down, and looked away, biting her lip.

Teng clasped her hand, “What is it?”

“I’m not ready,” Rey confessed. “I want to do things, but… sex. Making love. I’m not ready.”

“Ok,” Teng nodded. “I respect that. Just… let me know when you are. And let me know what you are ready for. We’ve already done a few things, but if you want more-”

“I do. I just… don’t know what.”

Teng smiled and kissed her hand.

“Well then,” he grabbed the box of condoms and led her to the bunk against the wall, “let’s find out.”

And they did.
“Is anyone watching?” Teng whispered as they hid beside the door to the ramp, peeking their heads out to see if the coast was clear.

“I don’t think so,” Rey squinted as the sun shone brightly in the sky. It was barely even morning anymore, probably more near noon. “I can’t believe we overslept.”

“I can’t believe I left my shirt back at the workshop.”

“Well, I am enjoying the view,” Rey grinned as she glanced at the shirtless Teng, holding up the purple box to his chest to black himself in some pitiful attempt at modesty.

“Rey, this isn’t funny.”

“It is to me.”

“You need to stop hanging out with Quom.”

“Yeah, but I need to figure out how to get rid of him in the first place,” Rey joked. “He’s harder to get rid of than a steelpecker who sees you as prey.”

“Come on, Rey this is serious,” Teng said. “If we get busted sneaking around on this ship, we’re going to be in a lot of trouble. And since I don’t have a shirt on, it’s going to be a lot harder to stay unnoticed.”

“Alright. How about I go first, and then you follow in a few minutes? If anyone questions you being shirtless, just say it was hot out and you took it off to work.”

“Well, I can’t think of a better plan. Let’s give it a try.”

Rey snuck out when the coast seemed clear. She raced across the shipyard and then slunk from tent to tent, trying not to be seen. Eventually, she reached the town well, and casually splashed some water on her face to wipe away the non-existent sweat and dust from her “scavenging” that morning. She was rubbing the water on her neck, when Teng came slowly strolling up to her, whistling.

“Oh, hello my dearest Rey,” Teng said far too loud and far too stiffly. “However are you doing upon this fine Jakku morning?”

Rey shook her head; he was such a terrible actor.

“I’m fine, Teng,” she fought back a giggle.

“Wonderous. I have been out scavenging all morning in an effort to return home early to spend the rest of the day with you as I have not seen you at all this entire day. No, Sir. You have been completely absent from my side all this sun risen day. And if you’re wondering about my lack of shirt, I was scavenging in the Star Destroyer and took my shirt off because it was too hot. I was high up and accidentally dropped my shirt, and later could not find it, forcing me to return home sans shirt. I do not have a sunburn as my skin has built up a tolerance to the sun’s rays, and I believe the science would check out if you looked that up, but please do not for I am not lying. Also, I found this purple box in the Star Destroyer, and it contains my recovered items for the day. This box absolutely does not contain any of your possessions as I have not seen you at all today as previously established. Not one bit. Shall we share a passionate embrace to mark the reunion of our parting for one whole night?”

Nyx Terrin, who was letting her happabore drink from the well, just stared at the pair, “Everyone saw you two sneak off Plutt’s freighter five minutes ago.”
“Damn it!” Teng exclaimed.

“Well, it’s not like you’re a very good actor,” Rey giggled as Nyx led away her happabore.

“I thought it was convincing,” Teng refuted.

“It was not,” a different voice replied.

They both stiffened, and as they turned to face Sarco Plank, Teng took a step protectively in front of Rey.

“What do you want?” Rey cut to the chase.

Sarco was a man with little patience for small talk, “I’ve come to collect my daily portions.”

“Take it up with my father. You know I’m not involved in that.”

“I get three portions a day. I don’t care which one of you gives it to me.”

“Well, I do,” Rey snapped. “How do I know you haven’t already collected from my father and are now trying to get an extra three.”

Sarco sounded amused, “You don’t trust me?”

“No.”

“Good.”

Teng looked between the pair, “We don’t have any portions on us anyways, Plank.”

Sarco gave a low chuckle, “Why don’t you let your girlfriend do that talking, boy? She’s the one here who actually poses a threat.”

Rey scowled. Sarco Plank thought her a threat? Why? Had her reputation really gotten that out of hand?

“Teng’s right, Plank,” Rey said. “We don’t have portions on us.”

“Well then, what about that box?”

The pair of teenagers frowned and glanced at the purple box in Teng’s arms.

“What’s in it?” Sarco asked.

“Why would we tell you?” Teng asked.

“Because I asked,” Sarco leaned casually upon his weapon. He carried a staff like Rey, but clear tubes on either end worked with wires inside to deliver an electrical shock to his victim. “And because I saw those large crates your little band of heroes were hauling into that pitiful workshop yesterday. Not scavengings from the Graveyard, that was delivered by a pilot. You’ve got something of value. Now tell me, what was delivered?”

Rey narrowed her eyes. Aletha’s post script warning not to get robbed wasn’t a joke. Receiving that kind of haul brought scrupulous figures out of the woodwork, and returning home to find your tent ransacked wasn’t unlikely.
She was unarmed – her staff left back in Quom’s tent – so she couldn’t fight her way out of this. Not against Plank. If she had her staff, she could probably take him. For now she had to figure out a way to get out of there in one piece. If she had to resort to fisticuffs, then so be it.

Though she doubted her father’s advice to always go for nose first would work in this case.

Rey glanced at Teng, hoping to become inspired with a plan.

And she was.

_Maybe I fell in love the second you handed me that happy-bore pamphlet._

“Happabores,” Rey said. “We’re getting into the happabore trading business. That was feedstuff and harnesses we received yesterday.”

Behind his full face mask, Sarco raised an eyebrow, “Happabores? Really?”

“Really. Don’t you trust me?”

“No.”

“Good,” Rey smirked.

Sarco studied her for a long time, and then chuckled, “Well, your father does know a thing or two about happabores. Let him know if he needs any advice, he knows he can come to me. I was the one who first introduced him to the creatures. I might drop by later and… check you have all the proper supplies.”

“I’ll let him know,” Rey didn’t let it show that his words had surprised her. “Have a good day, Plank. Come on, Teng.”

He followed her like the faithful little puppy he was.

“Your dad and Plank raised happabores together?” Teng muttered to her.

“I doubt it,” she answered. “Something happened between those two, the only question is what?”

“You know, it’s pretty late in the morning,” Teng said when they arrived at the tent. “Maybe Quom and Luke have already gone out scavenging.”

“Maybe,” Rey pulled the tent flap open.

Luke and Quom were waiting with arms crossed and identical scowls.

“Or maybe not,” Rey added awkwardly as she and Teng faced their doom.

“Good morning,” Luke said simply, his expression unchanging.

“Morning, Daddy,” Rey replied sweetly.

“Morning, Mister Erso,” Teng grinned nervously. “Quom.”

“Missing something?” Quom held up Teng’s shirt.
“You too, Rey?” Luke held up her gauze.

Rey glanced at Teng, “Before we die, I just want to tell you once more that I love you.”

He clasped her hand, “Maybe won’t be too painful.”

“Do you have any idea what time it is?” Luke asked. “Look, I understand sneaking off for a little privacy, but we’ve been worried sick. It’s one thing for you two to spend alone time, it’s another when you leave your comms behind.”

“And your shirt,” Quom added.

“We’ve been waiting all morning for you two,” Luke finished.

Rey scowled, “Wait. Have you two literally been standing in that exact spot and pose for hours just so when we walked in you two would have a dramatic pose?”

Luke and Quom looked at each other nervously.

“You guys are weird,” Teng said.

“I have to be,” Luke said. “I somehow made him my current best friend.”

“All time best friend,” Quom corrected.

“We are not having this discussion again.”

“Dad, we’re sorry, we really didn’t mean to make you worry,” Rey said.

“I know,” Luke sighed, “but come on, Rey. Please see this from my perspective. Every time you’ve disappeared, something terrifying and dangerous happens. One time I thought you were dead, another you had been kidnapped by a child abuser, another time you almost killed Teng. Anytime I wake up and find I have no idea where you are, I am terrified. You can have your freedom – heck, I don’t much mind that you two probably did things last night I shouldn’t approve of – but please, just make sure you have your comms.”

His eyes turned to Teng.

“And your shirt,” Luke added. “I have to say, though, those core workouts we’ve been doing are very beneficial.”

Teng chuckled, “Oh, come on, he’s not checking me out. He’s straight.”

“No, he’s not. He’s bi.”

“Oh.”

Luke held up his hand, “Don’t worry, I’m not into someone that much younger than me. Besides, you’re not sarcastic enough for me. Once you hit Quom levels and stop dating Rey, then maybe we’ll talk.”

“Quom, can I have my shirt back now?” Teng asked quickly.

He grinned, “Where would be the fun in that?”
“Quom!” Rey snapped.

“Alright, but on one condition,” Quom said. “Tell me, could anything you two did last night result in pregnancy?”

“Not to my knowledge,” she replied.

“Are you certain?”

“Positive,” Teng agreed.

Quom paused, studying them for the moment, and then loudly sniffed the air.

“Nope,” Quom reported to Luke. “They’re not lying. Can’t get pregnant from any of those things… Well, maybe the last one, but Teng wiped his hands first, so you should be good.”

Rey would have been very happy to die in that moment as her father’s eyes widened and he shuddered at the mental image of his daughter… well, doing what she did.

Teng wasn’t doing much better.

“Can you all please leave the tent so I can smack my head against the tent pole?” he asked.

Quom chuckled, patted him on the shoulder, and handed him his shirt.

“So,” Luke asked as Teng and Rey redressed and fixed their appearances, “where were you two this morning?”

“We snuck into an empty tent,” Rey lied. “We just overslept.”

“Sweetheart, if you think I don’t know you and Teng sneak out to your uncle’s freighter on a regular basis, I’ve got some bad news for you. Don’t lie to me, Rey.”

“Sorry, Dad. You’re right; we were on the freighter.”

“Since you two came back so late, we’re going to have to stick near Niima if we want to get back before sundown,” Luke said. “Quom will stay back, and I’ll come out with you two. We should hit near that A-Wing we found last week.”

“Sounds good to me,” Teng replied. “I can use my new utility belt.”

“We can all use our new things,” Luke started to pack his bag.

His words made Rey pause, “Dad?”

“Yes, Sweetheart?”

“When Teng and I were coming back here, we ran into Sarco Plank and he started asking questions.”

Rey told her of their encounter. When she finished, Luke had a very troubled expression on his face. He glanced at Quom who was equally as solemn.

“I think we need to change our plans,” Luke said. “I’m going to stay back at the tent with Quom in case Plank tries to raid our supplies. You go with Teng to scavenge today. Don’t worry about how much you bring back, we have plenty of food from Aletha. Take your weapon, both of you. If there’s even the slightest sign of trouble call me immediately.”

“Yes, Sir,” Teng nodded, retrieving his new blaster from the crates.

“Yes, Dad,” Rey slung her staff on her back.

Luke crossed the tent and pulled Rey in for a tight hug.

“Be safe, my Rey of Light,” he said gently, pressing a kiss to the top of her head. “And may the Force be with you.”

“And with you, Daddy,” she whispered.

He smiled, stroking her cheek as he lifted her chin, “It always is.”

A lot can go wrong on foot in the desert.

- Rey’s Survival Guide

“Black market animal smugglers,” Teng’s voice echoed through the ship. It was no Star Destroyer, but it was a tall thing, having three levels, the furthest being a long, painful drop down.

“Teng, I’m really not in the mood to play what’s my Dad’s secret today,” Rey sighed as she rappelled down from the top level to the middle where Teng was waiting for her.

He helped her settle back to the ground and unburdened her of her salvage.

“Sorry, but it would explain the happabores,” Teng said as they started to inspect the gear in better light. The top level was almost completely pitch black. It was a miracle that Rey could find anything up there. “How do you think Luke and Sarco met?”

“Teng, I don’t want to talk about it,” Rey snapped.

She turned to walk away from him when he grabbed her arm to stop her. She nearly slapped him for it, but she stopped herself when she saw the concern in his eyes.

“What’s wrong?” he asked gently.

Rey sighed, “I’m just nervous. Something feels wrong.”

“Is there anything I can do about it? Did I aggravate you somehow?”

“No, it’s… this whole Sarco Plank thing makes me feel uneasy. I don’t know what danger there is in my past, but I do know that there’s something about him that threatens our safety here. I didn’t mean to take it out on you.”

“It’s okay.”
“No, it isn’t,” Rey snapped. She paused and took a deep breath, collecting herself, “There’s just... there’s something inside of me, Teng, and when I get mad or nervous or sad, it fills me. It’s powerful and intoxicating. I want to let it take over, be my strength, but I can’t. I know I shouldn’t... It scares me, Teng.”

“Hey,” he pulled her in close, hands wrapping around her hips. He reached up and touched her cheek and Rey gave a sigh of relief, eyes slipping shut as his presence comforted her. Teng was her lifeline as she fought against the fear in her heart. “I’m here, Rey. I promise. I’ll help you. I’ll protect you. I promise. I will always protect you.”

She buried her face in his chest, “Don’t let me go.”

“Never.”

It was a peaceful moment, Rey and Teng just standing there, holding each other. If the world could stop for just a moment, forever to be captured and held in more than just Rey’s heart, she would have picked that moment.

Then something tugged in the back of her mind.

“What is it?” Teng frowned when Rey suddenly pushed him away.

She readied her staff, “Someone’s here.”

His arrival was projected with the sound of his footsteps, too quiet for Rey to have heard when she pushed Teng away, but ever increasing with each passing moment. Teng scrambled to ready his blaster, but he was too nervous and too embarrassed to admit he wasn’t quite sure how to set the model.

“I know how it is,” Rey whispered as a shadow began to emerge from the day hallway of the ship. “It’s Plank.”

Sure enough, Rey was true about the shadow’s identity, and they found themselves alone with Sarco Plank.

“I knew if I said I would stop by the tent, that your father would hang back,” Sarco chuckled. “He may be formidable, but Marcus is so predictable.”

Rey held her staff defensively across her body, “What do you want, Plank?”

“The truth, Little One,” he answered. “You’re going to tell me what you received yesterday and from whom. And then you’re going to give it to me.”

Her grip tightened on the staff, “And why would I do that?”

“Because one call from me, and the First Order is here to kill your father, take you away, and put a bolt through the boy’s temple like they did your mother.”

The Darkness flared inside Rey, but this time she wasn’t upset to let it fill her.

“That’s not happening,” she growled. “I’m not going to give you anything. And if you touch even a hair on Teng’s head—”

“I’m not afraid of you, Youngling,” Sarco cut off. He drew his staff from his back and assumed the same defensive position as Rey, “You may be a threat, but a negligible one. You’ll be easy enough
“Then go ahead and try,” Rey challenged. “I’m not weak. I’m the strongest, fastest, best fighter on Jakku. I can defeat you no problem.”

“What are you suggesting?”

“You what our things? You’re going to have to fight me for them. And I will defeat you. I know I can.”

Sarco flicked a button on his staff, and the ends crackled with a charge of electricity, “The Padawan’s daughter, as bold and arrogant as her pitiful father. And where did that pride lead him?
You say I have to fight to take what I want from you? Then so be it. Care for a duel, Youngling?”

Rey felt her anger rising. Sarco had proposed the one thing she wanted most—a chance to show off her new skills and show the arrogant alien what a mistake he’d made. She exhaled slowly, staff held at her waist, as Sarco spun his own in a blur of deadly purple.

“Let’s dance, Plank,” she seethed. “Teng and I will have you beaten before high noon.”

Teng swallowed as he watched the scene before him. He did not have Rey’s confidence, and he didn’t believe this was going to end well at all. Despite the two of them being strong and having proven themselves in battle, Sarco Plank was something different altogether. They couldn’t defeat him themselves.

But there was someone who could.

“Where, Rey’s claimed another ship?” Quom chuckled as they cleaned up the workshop. They were between jobs at the moment, waiting for Rey and Teng to bring their next project. “You’ve got to be careful, Luke Erso. One day she may have a fleet.”

Luke kneaded his forehead and groaned at the thought.

Quom laughed.

Before Luke could reply, his comm started to beep. Frowning, he pulled it out and saw the words
LINE TWO – Teng lighting up the screen.

“Luke,” Teng whispered into his comm. “We need your help.”

He didn’t need to Force to sense something was very wrong.

Jessika Pava couldn’t stop staring at her X-wing fighter. She pushed her black hair out of her eyes and sighed, forcing herself to turn around so she could no longer see the compact, deadly starfighter where it sat on its landing gear in the center of the hangar. Her fellow pilots knew she wanted nothing more than to get back into space as Blue Three.

But Jessika was on droid duty that week. Her job was to inventory the base’s astromechs and make sure they were ready for duty—programming updated, flight instruments tested and confirmed as operational. It wasn’t the worst job in the squadron—assisting the maintenance techs with a fuel-system cleanout was much dirtier—but Jessika was sure it was the most boring.

Worst of all, Tallie was off on some mission. Jessika never really did fret about whether or not her girlfriend would return home safe from her missions alive and well. In general, Jessika just never bothered with such thoughts one way or another. But she did miss waking up in Tallie’s warm and soft embrace. Honestly, the fact their room had two beds was just wasteful.

Her datapad beeped for her attention, and she looked down at it with a sigh, then at the cone-headed R4 unit rolling by on its three stubby legs. The droid was painted in a green-and-white checkerboard pattern, probably the work of a bored tech with time to kill.

Now that she thought about it, weren’t Rose Tico’s hands mysteriously covered in green and white paint last week?

“You there, droid,” the young pilot called out. “Need you to hold up a sec for operations check.”

The astromech whistled mournfully, no happier than Jessika about the need for an inspection. But it came to a stop and popped open a panel on its dome to expose a diagnostics port. Jessika aimed her datapad at the port and the pad blinked, beginning to exchange data with the droid’s systems. She sat down cross-legged on the hangar deck and resigned herself to wait.

“Excuse me, but might I be of assistance?” a voice asked brightly.

Jessika looked up into the expressionless face of a protocol droid with a gold finish. It was an older model—practically an antique—with dozens of dings and dents.

“I don’t think so, but thanks,” Jessika said. “It’s droid duty—the diagnostics program pretty much runs itself.”

“But not terribly efficiently,” said the droid, sounding disappointed. “But where are my manners? I am See-Threepio, human-cyborg relations, at your service, Miss…?”

“It is an honor to meet you, Miss Pava,” Threepio said.

“Call me Blue Three,” Jessika had vaguely recognized the name of General Organa’s protocol droid and knew the last thing she would want is him remembering her name… Not that it was easy to make a droid forget something.

“Oh. As you wish, Miss—I mean, Blue Three. As I said, perhaps I could be of assistance. I just installed a very exciting new Tranlang database and am fluent in nearly seven million forms of communication—including, of course, the relatively primitive languages spoken by astromechs and diagnostics readers.”

The R4 unit squawked indignantly at Threepio.

“Insult you?” Threepio said, drawing back in surprise. “I did nothing of the sort, you hypersensitive little dustbin. Your method of communication is primitive—I was merely stating a fact. Why, you don’t even have a proper vocabulator.”

The R4 unit honked and swiveled its dome to stare at the protocol droid with its single electronic eye.
“Don’t move,” Jessika said. “You’ll break the data link and then—”

Her datapad beeped plaintively.

“Now we have to start all over,” she sighed.

The astromech hooted accusingly at Threepio.

“My fault?” Threepio replied. “Don’t be ridiculous. She told you not to move. Blue Three, might I suggest—”

“You know what, See-Threepio? I’ve got this. It’s a simple procedure, really. I’m sure you have many more important things to do.”

“You would think so, given that my specialties include communications and protocol,” Threepio said. “But it so happens I have completed all my tasks for the day. And I’m afraid that when I pressed Commander Nalto for further duties he told me to, um… Oh dear, get out of his communication center before he switched me into low power mode and chucked me under a tarp next to my friend.”

“Sounds like the Commander,” Jessika chuckled. She couldn’t wait to hear from Kaydel that night what Threepio had done to annoy Diego so much.

“He is rather abrasive at times,” Threepio’s head drooped a little in disapproval. “I was going to suggest that this R4 unit might benefit from a memory wipe. When they start taking offense at every helpful suggestion, it’s often a sign of flux in the motivator cortex.”

The R4 unit blew an electronic raspberry at Threepio, but this time remained still while the diagnostic program ran. Jessika rolled her eyes as the golden droid continued to chatter away.

“Why, I often told Master Luke that Artoo’s behavior would have been improved by a memory wipe. His eccentricities have been more than I can bear for decades now. One time we were on a diplomatic mission to Circarpous when—”

She had never really paid attention to General Organa or her retinue. She never even gave thought to the droid that sat in the corner of the communication center. Jessika always figured that General Organa’s protocol droid must have been something she purchased after the war. Why would someone need a protocol droid during one?

But at the mention of Luke Skywalker, Jessika lit up as much as Kira did when discussing Han Solo. Luke Skywalker was her childhood hero, and she had joined the Resistance to be like him. Secretly she hoped to one day even meet him.

“Do I know Luke Skywalker?” Jessika asked incredulously, scrambling to her feet. “Of course I know him! Well, I mean, I’ve never met him, but everybody knows Luke Skywalker. He defeated the Emperor, and they say he’s the best star pilot in the galaxy.”

“You’d have to ask Artoo about that. That might be difficult with the low power mode situation he’s experiencing, but he’ll break out if it sooner or later. Though I must warn you that Artoo has, shall we say, an inflated view of his own accomplishments. I myself find space travel most unpleasant—”
“Wait, do you mean R2-D2?” Jessika asked in amazement. “The astromech that assisted Skywalker when he destroyed the first Death Star?”

Holy crap, was the droid they kept under a tarp in the communication center really the R2-D2? Jessika had half a nerve to march into there and give Kaydel and Diego a piece of her mind. How dare they just shove the R2-D2 in a dusty corner! He should be in a place of honour and freshly polished each morning.

Threepio cocked his golden head slightly.

“Well, yes,” he said. “Artoo and I have been eyewitnesses to many momentous events during the Galactic Civil War, though he was usually off squabbling with a computer while I was performing some vital diplomatic service. With regards to the Death Star, Artoo was inoperative at the critical moment. So not even he can try to take credit for the outcome of that mission.”

The datapad beeped, indicating the diagnostics program had finished running. Jessika ignored it.

“Tell me about the Death Star mission,” she said. “How did Skywalker wind up destroying it?”

“It would be my pleasure, Blue Three,” Threepio said. “Though that adventure began in rather dreadful fashion for me. We had crash-landed on Tatooine, with Artoo pursuing a secret mission for the Alliance in his typical stubborn manner. If not for my advice, he might still be wandering that dreadful Dune Sea—”

“On second thought, why don’t you tell me that one later?” Jessika asked hastily, sensing this version was shaping up to be mostly about Threepio. “Tell me a different story about your master—one that hasn’t been told a million times already.”

The R4 unit chirped inquiringly at her, and she patted its dome absently.

“Your programs are up to date—report to the droid pool,” she said, turning back to Threepio. She added as an afterthought, “Tell Rose that Jessika says hi.”

The droid beeped affirmatively.

“There are so many stories,” Threepio mused. “Where to begin? I know—Artoo and I were present when Master Luke first used a lightsaber in battle, not long after the Battle of Yavin.”

“Tell me about that one,” Jessika said.

“Very well,” Threepio said. “It all began above the planet Giju, with a mission for Red Squadron. …”

Their staffs clashed as violently as they did frantically. Rey’s arms ached as she batted off attack after attack, desperately trying not buckle to Sarco’s conquest. Her lungs were straining with pants and her body dripped with sweat, but still she did not back down.

Teng wasn’t in sight anymore, and that terrified her. Sarco has draw her away to a large gash in the ship where the gun of a ship had blasted the side clean off. When she first clashed with Sarco, Teng joined her in the fight using his blaster the best he could. But Sarco made quick work of Teng; one blow to the head with the end of his staff, and with a sickening crackle of electricity, Teng was out cold on the ground.
Rey never even got the chance to check if he was breathing.

Sarco drove her back, closer and closer to the exposed part of the ship and a horrifying doom. She could she just how high up they were; her speeder was a mere dot below. One stumble backwards from that height and she’d be dead before she even hit the ground.

Rey looked back to her opponent. She didn’t like the way his mask blocked his face; she couldn’t read his expressions and plan accordingly. He was not much for banter as they clashed. Sarco knew his goal: drive her off the ship so when he killed her it could look like an accident.

Would her father believe that story?

Fear gripped her heart. Luke and Teng’s warning about cockiness flitted through her mind. She had been vain about her abilities, and now there was a very good chance she would die for that arrogance.

She couldn’t remember a time she wanted her father desperately.

Rey didn’t recognize what she was doing, unaware of the strength of her abilities. She didn’t know that Luke heard it when she thought the words Help me, Daddy. I’m scared.

A bash to the knee made her stumble, and she almost fell out of the ship. She was close enough to the border of the hole that she managed to grip the jagged metal of the ship. Rey screamed as it pierced her skin, blood staining her hand and tears her cheeks as she was forced to cling ever tighter onto the blade like material, simply so she wouldn’t fall.

Her staff was in one hand. She struggled to hold it from the weight and the way her body shook from fear, exhaustion, adrenaline, and pain. Sarco recognized her weakness and went for her hand. Over and over he bashed his staff down on the fingers clutching her staff. Rey screamed and held onto it as long as she physically could.

Then her hand betrayed her. With a whimper of pain, and the blood from her knuckles staining Sarco’s staff, she dropped her own. It fell out of the ship, down, down onto sand below. It was so far down she didn’t even hear the thud of impact.

She began to hyperventilate. Her fingers dug into the jagged metal of the wall even more. She could have sworn she felt metal hit bone. Exhausted, scared, alone, and weaponless, Rey couldn’t deny it anymore: she was about to die.

Sarco grabbed her shirt the threat of what one shove could do dangling in the air, “Shall I do it here? Or take you back to Niima Outpost so your worthless father can watch?”

That was when the tears began to fall.

“Please,” Rey begged. “Don’t let him see.”

“Very well,” his hand tightened its grip on the fabric of the shirt.

Rey shut her eyes, cried as she waited for death.

“Shhh, it’s okay, Sweetheart,” a woman’s soothing and familiar voice sung on the air. “Please don’t cry. Mommy doesn’t like when you cry.”

Rey’s heart skipped a beat. Was it a dream or was her mother actually calling to her? Perhaps her mother was here to escort her to the next plane of existence.
“I’m scared, Mommy,” Rey sobbed but only let the words play in her mind.

“Mommy’s going to protect you,” the memory of Felicity that Rey had forgotten, promised her. “But she gets needs you to be brave.”

“How?” Rey whimpered, again keeping the words in her mind where Sarco couldn’t reach them.

“You are strong, Rey,” Alyla’s words echoed in Rey’s ears. “Draw on that strength, and do not give in to fear.”

“Let it in, Rey,” she didn’t recognize the voice of Anakin Skywalker, but her grandfather’s words filled her with strength. “Let it take over.”

Slowly, comforted and strengthened by the words of those who loved her, Rey did as they said. She stopped crying, she breathed, she drew on her strength, she barred the fear from her mind.

And she let the Force in.

He pushed her.

Something instinctual lashed out, like a rope that tied her to the ship and stopped her fall. No matter how hard he pushed, Sarco couldn’t get Rey to fall backwards. She drew on the Force and defended herself as powerfully as a Jedi like the daughter of Luke Skywalker she was.

Then she got herself out of her predicament in a way only the daughter of Felicity Rhiaon could.

She kicked him as hard as she possibly could… right in the control panel.

Sarco hit the ground as hard as Darth Vader had. Taking her chance, Rey sprung forward and grabbed at Sarco’s dropped staff. But when her hand closed over it, the blood pouring her hand – adrenaline being the only thing stopping it from shrieking in pain – made it slip out of her grasp.

Then his foot met her face, and Rey was on her back. The adrenaline failed her, and the pain and fatigue pinned her to the ground. She couldn’t move. She couldn’t stop him as he got to his feet, grabbed his electrostaff and aimed for her head.

“You’re just like your father,” Sarco sneered. “Pretending to be something you’re not. I would have loved to collect the reward the First Order would offer for you, but you’re too troublesome for me to bother. I’m going to kill you now. Five seconds’ contact and your heart will stop. At least you’ll be with your mother.”

He swung it hard down on her head.

Only for an emerald blade to block him mere inches from her face.

In unison, Rey and Sarco looked up in shock. Both had missed his entrance, but there was no denying his presence. Not a phantom or a vision or a projection, standing there before them in flesh and blood.

“Leave…leave her alone,” Luke Skywalker seethed, his lightsaber protecting his daughter from death with the strength of the Force, but more so the strength of a father’s love.

Sarco beheld the man standing over his precious daughter, looking more animal than human. Almost as feral as Quom Tinadar had the day Toras Kern had threatened his pup.
“Well, it’s about time, Marcus,” Sarco chuckled. “I’ve been waiting for this.”

Rey was stunned, disbelieving of what she was seeing. That strange cylinder her father always carried around was projecting a beam of emerald light that was lightly burning her face from the proximity but protecting her. Her father was immoveable.

That which had filled her with such strength was now flooded with sky blue. She felt loved. She felt safe. She felt protected.

She felt very confused.

Luke’s eyes burned with anger, but not with the Dark Side. He didn’t draw on the hatred he felt for Sarco, but rather the love he had for his daughter. It filled him with strength of the Light Side of the Force.

He shoved Sarco back and firmly planted himself in front of Rey.

“Dad?” she tried to get to her feet.

“Stay down,” Luke ordered, not turning to look to her. He was focused on setting his footwork and grip on his saber. “You’ll be safe.”

Rey trusted her father.

“I’m surprised, Marcus,” Sarco said. “I would have thought you would have used your blaster before that weapon. Different one from before. Wasn’t it blue last time?”

“I got a new one,” Luke answered. “And my blaster seemed inefficient for saving my daughter before you bashed her skull in. But don’t worry, you know I can do better damage with this.”

“Of course you would go for that weapon. You couldn’t stand to do a fair fight. At least your daughter was honourable enough to go staff against staff.”

Luke simply held out his hand, and like it was nothing, Rey’s staff flew up through the air into his hand.

“I can fight with this if you’d prefer,” Luke spared a brief self-indulgent glance back to see Rey’s reaction. He really wished he had a camera to record the shock on her face.

Sarco considered Luke’s offer and then shook his head, “I want to see what you can do with that ancient thing now. You say you’re trained now. Prove it.”

“I told you. I warned you that if you ever touched my daughter, I would kill you. You had a chance to stop this. My daughter is the most important thing in my life, and I will kill to protect her.”

“You’re a determined one, Marcus,” he said. “But it’s a little too late for that Force of yours. Enough foolishness—time to end this.”

Luke’s eyes darkened, “Yes, it is.”

And then his blade clashed with Sarco’s staff in a furious and breathtaking display.

“Teng! Teng!” Quom shouted, frantically searching for his pup. He had split off from Luke when Luke sensed Rey and Teng weren’t together. “Teng! Where are you? Talk to me! TENG!”

His heart stopped when he saw Teng’s unmoving body.

“TENG!” he screamed with only the terror of a parent.

He raced to Teng’s side and dropped to his paws. A few touches and Quom confirmed it: Teng wasn’t breathing.

Fear flooded his heart and tears pricked his eyes.

“No, no, no, no!” Quom exclaimed, shaking Teng. “Wake up. You gotta breathe, Pup. Come on, Rey needs you… I need you. I need you, Pup.”

He didn’t know what to do.

And then the Force blessed him with a memory.

“If you try one more time to stop me from resuscitating my daughter, I will kill you,” Felicity coolly threatened.

Resuscitation. How did it go again? Quom’s paws shook has her tried to find the right spot to press down. Was he pressing hard enough as he pumped down on Teng’s chest. How many pumps? How many breaths? How hard was he supposed to breathe?

Quom didn’t have to worry for long. As he began his second set of compressions, a loud gasp filled the ship and Teng began to breathe again.

The Vrogem burst into a flood of tears he had not wept this hard since the day he returned to find his home destroyed. But this time it was tears of joy as he pulled his precious pup into a rib cracking embrace.

Teng struggled to collect his bearings as the mass of fur and tears engulfed him. When the staff had cracked against his skull and the darkness took him, he thought he would open his eyes to his father and mother.

As he gathered himself, Teng couldn’t help but give a cheek splitting grin. He hadn’t opened his eyes to a mother… but he had opened them to a father. His hairy, embarrassing, weirdo of a father, whose title he would never speak aloud.

But Quom didn’t need to hear Teng say it.

“Don’t you ever do that again to me, Pup,” Quom begged. “Do you hear me? Don’t you dare leave me.”

“I won’t,” Teng promised, hugging his Vrogem father as tightly as he was held. “I swear, I won’t.”

There was nothing quite like the protection one felt being held in the arms of a father, and in the safety of a father’s love.

Rey would never again say her father was a pacifist. She could only lie there in stunned silence as saber crashed against electrostaff. It made a lot of sense now why Luke never fought in the ring. Talent like this would not go unnoticed, and talent like this clearly read there was a reason Luke didn’t want to be noticed.

He was amazing.

It wasn’t as easy as it looked for Luke. For starters, it had been over a decade since Luke had a proper duel, and his moves from a technical standpoint were slow and rusty. Of course, Luke had been practicing in secret over the years to keep his skills up – he would go off and do that when Rey had her secret comm chats with Aletha she didn’t know he knew about. But clearly fighting invisible opponents weren’t going to cut it. If her were to be prepared to face the First Order someday soon, he was going to need to find himself a blast remote.

Secondly, every time his blade clashed against the staff it sent a small shock up his arm. After his exposure to Palpatine’s Force Lightning, he had become very sensitive to electrical based attacks.

It did help though that there were three Force Ghosts shouting in his ears.

“Go for the face! Hit him hard!” Anakin whooped with pride when Luke did just that, “Yeah! That’s my boy!”

And Yoda was… well, Yoda.

“For the knees you must go.” Yoda gave his mischievous chuckle when Luke sliced open Sarco’s knee cap.

Luke sighed, and muttered to them, “Remind me why you lot couldn’t do this when I was battling someone important like say, Vader?”

“I feel my answer to that doesn’t need to be said,” Anakin chuckled.

“We had to let you learn and grow on your own,” Obi-Wan answered. “Now that you are a Master in your own right, we can offer you advice.”

Luke frowned as he forced Sarco to stumble back, “But why are you helping me now? In this fight of all fights?”

“Bored, we are,” Yoda simply answered. “Entertaining is not always, the netherworld of the Force.”

Luke sighed, “You people are ridiculous.”

The electrostaff just narrowly missed his head, and Luke was drawn back into the fight.

The bottom of Sarco’s staff curved up towards Luke’s head, but Luke drew down on the staff, batting it away. Luke swung straight down again, but Sarco held the staff horizontal to deflect three powerful hits before he flipped the staff around to swing once more at Luke’s head. Luke naturally parried it away and then swerved down towards Sarco’s torso dropping to one knee.

The alien barely blocked that shot.

Knelt down Luke blocked a series of shots that pelted down on him. Over and over, drove down falling into a hard pattern of down, down, down.

Sarco’s arms were up, exposing his belly when Luke swung his belt into his torso. He gasped, the blade slicing into him, but not all the way through. Luke pulled back out, and with a bit of a dramatic twist, spun back up to his feet and swung his saber clean through Sarco’s neck.

His decapitated head landed at the feet of the very surprised Quom and Teng who had just arrived.

“Oh Luke, you shouldn’t have,” Quom said. “I didn’t get you anything.”

Luke genuinely didn’t know if he was joking.

“Rey!” Teng exclaimed, clearly not taking in the fact Luke was holding a lightsaber.

“Teng!” Rey could breathe in relief as he raced towards her, living and breathing. He dropped to his kissed and they kissed fiercely, clinging to each other tightly. “You’re okay.”

“Of course I am,” Teng wiped a tear from her cheek. “I’m not done with you yet.”

She smiled and kissed him again.

“Hey Buddy,” Quom came up to Luke and patted him on the shoulder. “You okay?”

“Nothing I can’t sleep off,” Luke’s saber was still ignited, hanging limply by his side. He looked at Sarco Plank’s headless body with an ache in his heart, “I didn’t want to kill him.”

“Hey,” Quom rubbed his shoulder, “you were protecting your daughter. You gave him a chance to back down. It’s not your fault.”

“I suppose.” Luke looked over at Rey, whose hand was being fussed over by Teng, “Are you two okay?”

They looked up at him in silence and shock. Their stunned wide-eyed gazes flicked from his face to Sarco’s body, to his head in the corner, to the emerald lightsaber humming in Luke’s grasp, and then back to Luke’s awkward expression. He had as little idea of what to say as they did.

“Whoa,” Teng said, the situation finally setting in. “Is that a lightsaber?”

But she said nothing.

Rey stared at her father with new eyes; the eyes of a child, filled with wonderment and glory.

Standing before her in victory was not a man, but much rather a myth. A hero of legend. Not tall, but strong and powerful, gifted with the ability to do things beyond her wildest dreams.

His hair was greying and his face wrinkled, but a fearlessness was set in those wrinkles, and an emerald blade in his grip glowed bright.

This man was a warrior.

This man was a hero.

This man was a legend.

This man was a…

“A Jedi,” Rey whispered, looking upon her father with revere. “You’re a Jedi.”
Luke sighed and extinguished his saber, “Rey… I think we need to talk.”

Jessika Pava’s comlink chimed for the third time in the previous five minutes.

“Hold on a sec, Threepio,” she said with a scowl, activating the device. “Yes? It’s Pava. What’s that? All right—I’m on my way. Be there in a minute.”

She shut off her comlink and shrugged at Threepio.

“Afraid I’m needed in the command center.”

“I understand, Blue Three.”

She smiled. Maybe the droid wasn’t as bad as everyone made him out to be. Truth be told, he was an excellent storyteller, and the way he could do sound effects made it so much better.

“Call me Jessika. Before I go, I want to hear how you got off Devaron. The Empire found Skywalker’s Y-wing, after all. So how did you get away?”

“That is a tale,” Threepio said. “When we returned to Tikaroo—”

“I’m afraid I only have time for the short version, Threepio. The very short version.”

“Oh,” Threepio said, sounding disappointed. “Well, Miss Pava, Master Luke reclaimed his starfighter—which had been repaired quite capably by Kivas, I must say. On the way to space he dropped several bombs at the base of the spire, cutting off the paths into the jungle. I’m pleased to say that meant the end of those dreadful hunts.”

“And the alien? The one they called the Scavenger?”

“Just recalling that awful creature puts me at risk of a short circuit,” Threepio said. “Master Luke claimed he was alive. My sensors detected no trace of him, but he was quite insistent.”

Jessika’s comlink was chiming again.

“Stang! I said in a minute, didn’t I?”

“You did,” Threepio said. “And it has been one minute and two seconds exactly.”

“Right. I have to go. But…just tell me about Farnay. Did you ever see her again?”

“Oh, yes,” Threepio said. “Artoo and I were delighted to be reacquainted with Farnay when Master Luke kept his promise and returned to Devaron. He did so with Jedi Masters Reine Agim and Obik Kenu. She’d grown into quite a capable young woman. It would be my pleasure to tell you that story, Miss Pava. Master Kenu ended up making quite a fool of himself when he concocted a scheme worthy of Captain Solo in order to convince Master Agim to court him. But there goes your comlink again, the beastly thing. So, I suppose that tale will have to wait…”

“So, this is where you’ve been,” a voice came from behind. Jessika turned to see Poe Dameron smirking at her, “Why didn’t you tell me you got stuck with Threepio? It’s the quickest SOS we respond to. Even General Organa would step out of a meeting to help someone stuck with Threepio.”
“Commander Dameron!” Threepio objected. “The Princess highly values my contributions!”

“I’m sure she does,” Poe said politely.

Jessika crossed her arms, “How did you know I was here?”

“Droid told Rose who told Paige who told Kaydel who told me.”

“And why were you with Kaydel? Isn’t she on duty right now?”

“Yep, but Nalto isn’t,” Poe grinned.

“That’s it,” Jessika declared. “I’m going to have Rose program Peazy to keep you two apart.”

“Hey, don’t turn Peazy on Kay,” Poe frowned. PZ-4CO was the droid Kaydel worked with, and she rather liked Poe. They had a good thing going there. “Why are you even talking to Threepio, Jess?”

“She was asking me to share stories about Master Luke with her, Commander Dameron,” Threepio replied. “I told her of the Scavenger on Devaron.”

“Admittedly that is a good story, but Luke Skywalker? Seriously?” Poe raised an eyebrow.

Jessika punched his arm, “Shut up, he’s my hero. I didn’t know that Threepio knew him, or that the infamous R2-D2 is currently under a tarp in the communication center.”

“How did you not know that? You really do keep to yourself too much, you know?”

“Better than you galivanting all over the place. Look, I just wanted to hear a few stories about Skywalker.”

“Well, why didn’t you ask me? He’s a family friend.”

“Really?”

“Yeah. I spent the whole summer with him one time. Come on, Stang is waiting. I’ll tell you all about it on our way there.”

Threepio felt some odd process run a course through his system as he watched Jessika Pava and Poe Dameron go off speaking about that summer.

He really did miss Master Luke.

Nobody really spoke as Luke and Quom drove the kids back to the walker. But if they had, what really could be said? Their brains were running so frantically trying to process the shocking revelation that there probably was a burning smell coming out of their ears. Teng was lucky to have the distraction of bandaging Rey’s hand for a little while to take his mind off things. You know, about five minutes until it returned to the conundrum of Holy Crap My Girlfriend’s Father is a Jedi.

When Luke parked the speeder, nobody made a move to get out. Instead they got sat in silence for a very, very long time.

“It’s safer to discuss this out here,” Luke finally spoke. He popped open his door and began to climb out, “Come. There’s a lot to speak of.”
He led them to a sandy hill not too far from the walker. If someone screamed, you would be able to hear it from the AT-AT. It was the opposite direction of the graves, so there was no distraction there. When they arrived, Luke gestured to the ground, and all three sat down.

Luke continued to stand. He slowly walked down the hill and settled next to two rogue sprouts of some plant that had the nerve to thrive in the desert.

“Time it is for the truth to be revealed,” Yoda agreed.

“Just careful how you phrase things,” Anakin advised. “Being too blunt causes as many problems as being too vague.”

“Know that feeling, I do,” Yoda laughed his little mischievous laugh.

“Just don’t make my mistake, Luke,” Obi-Wan had regret in his voice. “Don’t tell her anything from a certain point of view.”

Taking a deep breath, Luke turned to face the group.

“I, um…” Luke cleared his throat, “I’m not sure where to start this.”

“How you know Sarco Plank might be a good idea,” Teng suggested, glancing to Rey sitting next to him.

Rey was just staring blankly at her father with wide eyes and an open mouth.

“That’s a good idea,” Luke nodded. He took another deep breath, “Alright, let’s just get this out of the way. I am a Jedi.”

He looked at Rey, waiting for her reaction.

She just stared at him, “Neat.”

“Alright,” Luke wouldn’t push her. “When I was nineteen years old, I had a vision of a Jedi Temple. At that time, all of the temples had been destroyed and I was searching for a way to develop my powers. My mentor had been killed, and I felt very lost. It’s a long story how I got there and why, but I found the temple on the planet Devaron. It’s actually the first place I saw happabores, which is why Plank mentioned them earlier today.”

“Right,” he nodded.

Teng frowned at Quom, “Why are you not surprised? I thought you would be ranting and raving about all of this.”

“Luke being a Jedi? I’ve known about that for years.”

“You what?” Rey exclaimed. “Since when?”

“Your dad used his lightsaber to cut off Jarex’s hand,” Quom explained. “He didn’t know I was there. He made it very clear to Jarex that he was a Jedi and used that to get Jarex and his posse to leave Jakku. When Luke saw he had done this in front of me, he explained everything and swore me to secrecy. And I mean everything. I know what happened to your mom’s body. And before you
“Well, it certainly explains why those two had to split up,” Teng said. “Her sister finding her is bad enough. Finding her with a Jedi would be horrifying.”

Luke held up his hand to signal Teng to slow down, “True, but we’ll get there. So, I needed to go to this Temple, but none of the guides around the town would take me because it was too dangerous. I think they also thought it was hunted. Can’t remember; it’s been a few decades. But I found someone to take me, or rather, he found me.”

“Sarco Plank,” Rey supplied.

“And he ended up on Jakku. Shocking,” Quom said.

“I told Sarco that my name was Korl Marcus and he agreed to take me to the temple. As it turned out, only Jedi could get into the temple, and he had been trying to for years.”

“Is he a Jedi?” Rey asked. “Er… Was?”

Luke laughed, “No. Not even close. He took me to the temple, and I was able to learn some things about lightsaber fighting. Unfortunately, long story short, I ended up battling a group of Stormtroopers, and Sarco came in and helped me defeat them.”

“So, the story about him killing Stormtroopers on a jungle planet is true?” Rey asked.

“Yes… but not the way he told it. I’ll tell you the full story some other time. After we beat the Imperials, Sarco turned on me. He planned to loot the Jedi Temple, and I wouldn’t stand for it. He also wanted to hurt a girl who was with me and steal some droids. He threatened to sell me into slavery and we battled. At one point, he temporarily blinded me, but it just drove me to tap stronger into the Force. I defeated him but didn’t kill him, and he got away. I put him out of my mind, figuring that was the last I’d see of him.”

“Until he shouted out your father’s name in the marketplace almost year ago,” Quom said.

“As you saw earlier, Sarco is- was a serious threat,” Luke had to remember the man was now dead. “I thought it wiser to pay him off than to fight him. We made our agreement, but I told him he wasn’t to touch you. He broke his promise today, forcing me to fight and kill him. Killing is my last resort, but I will do it.”

“Evidently,” Rey eyed her father nervously. “So… you have the Force?”

“That’s correct,” Luke nodded. He knew her next question, “You do too, Rey. You are extremely strong with the Force.”

“Oh,” she nodded. Her eyes wouldn’t move from him, and she barely blinked. The idea of her possibly also being something like a Jedi had been buzzing in her brain ever since she saw that emerald saber, so when she finally got the confirmation, it was a very numb reaction. “Stronger than you?”

“Uh…no,” Luke said politely. “But the connection between us is very strong. Remember how I told you the story of your conception was interesting?”

“I genuinely tried to forget that.”
“It’s interesting because I’ve literally sensed you from the exact moment of your conception. I’m sorry that this is graphic, but the second sperm met egg, there you were in the Force.”

“Okay. I’m going to go jump into some quicksand.”

“Rey,” Luke shook his head, a small smile on his face.

“Come on, Dad,” Rey smiled back. “I didn’t need to hear that part. Especially not in front of Teng.”

Teng shrugged but said nothing.

“Sorry, Sweetheart,” Luke chuckled, “but embarrassing your kid in front of their significant other is parenting 101.”

“Oh really?” Quom perked up. “Because I’ve got some things about Teng-”

“So, you’re a Jedi!” Teng loudly interrupted, trying to save himself. Getting embarrassed by a parent was humiliating. Getting embarrassed by Quom Tinadar was downright cruel. “Is that why you and Rey get visions?”

“So, when I saw my uncle?” Rey asked.

“Vision from the Force.”

“And the people I saw while fighting Roke, they were visions?”

“They were my fellow Jedi. You knew them, and they reached out to help guide you.”

Rey swallowed. She dare not ask about the tall man who had known her name because she hadn’t actually told her father about that.

“What about Alyla Kene?” Rey asked.

“Oh, I don’t know what’s going on there,” Luke admitted. “Apparently, she’s a ghost, but not really? I’m still trying to get answers.”

“From your father?”

“I don’t believe this,” Rey marveled. “You’re a Jedi. You can do Jedi things. The barter with Plutt, that’s a mind trick?”

“Yes.”

“And you hold out your hand when I drop things to lower them with the Force?”

“Correct.”

“And you can sense people, and read emotions, jump high, and break a long fall, and-”

Rey froze, blood draining out of his face as her eyes went wide and jaw dropped.

“The X-Wing,” Rey whispered. She looked at Teng, “I actually dropped the X-Wing on you.”
“No, come on,” Teng rubbed her knee, “you didn’t make the wing break.”

“But I did!” Rey exclaimed. “I was mad at Aletha and thinking about what it would be like to hurt her.”

Luke raised an eyebrow but said nothing.

“I thought about the wing breaking, and it did.” Rey looked to Luke in fear, “Did I do it?”

He nodded sadly, “Why do you think I was so angry?”

Rey gasped. Teng’s hands were on her shoulders, trying to calm her as she began to hyperventilate.

“Oh my god,” tears pricked her eyes, “I can’t believe I did that. I’m so sorry.”

“It’s okay,” Teng assured her. “It’s okay. I’m fine.”

Then Rey felt something. There was something reaching for her mind, calm, comforting, and sky blue.

She frowned at her father, “Are you… Are you doing that?”

So, she did.

The blue filled her body, warming her, consoling her, relaxing her. It felt so wonderful, and so familiar.

“Do you see that colour?” Luke asked gently.

“Yes,” Rey answered, taking a deep breath. “Sky blue.”

“Correct. That is what we call my Force Signature. Every person has a different colour. Do you see any others?”

Rey shook her head.

“That’s alright. We’ll work on it.”

“We will?” she asked.

“Now that you are aware of your power, it will begin to grow again,” Luke explained. “That’s why I kept you in the dark all these years. Since you forgot your powers, they’ve simmered under the surface, keeping you from detection. If your power is going to grow, you must learn how to use it properly. Safely.”

“And you promise you’ll help guide me?”

“I’ll be there every step of the way,” Luke promised.

Rey pondered it over in silence. There was just so much to take in, and yet so much she still didn’t understand.

“Is this why we live on Jakku?” she asked. “Because we’re Jedi.”

“It’s a very complicated situation,” Luke answered.
“Then tell me. How did we get here? Why? Who are you?”

Luke could breathe a little easier knowing she still didn’t figure out they were Skywalkers.

“You were born on a planet called Rornian, in the town of Temple Village,” Luke began. “You were the first one born there, so your arrival was joyous in the town.”

“Were my aunt and uncle there? Did mom have Force powers? Did my aunt, uncle, and cousin?”

“It’s called being Force Sensitive. Your aunt and cousin were, but your uncle and mother were not. Your aunt and uncle were in the waiting room when you were born. I remember when your aunt came to see you for the first time. Before she entered the room, she reached for you in the Force. You drew away at first, but because she was my twin, you recognized her connection to me and embraced her. She loved you so much… they all did.”

“So, what happened?” Rey asked nervously.

“When you were five years old,” Luke answered, “the student of Alyla Kene turned on the Jedi. A situation was handled poorly, Alyla ended up dead, the student fled from Temple Village, and he joined the First Order. A few months later, he came back with a group of other Force Sensitives who turned on Luke Skywalker when he announced he was marrying a Non-Force Sensitive.”

“Yes… they were. Skywalker was gone away on business when Alyla’s student returned. They… they burned down the Village and killed almost everyone.”

Rey frowned, “But we escaped.”

“Yes, but in the process, we were separated. Your mother took you and went to a place no one would think of. By the time I found out that you and your mother were on Jakku, the First Order had found you. Your mother sacrificed herself to draw them away from you, and she lied, saying that you were dead. Her performance was so good that even I believed her. I made the mistake of not verifying the claim. I went to go save your mother, but they tricked me, and she was killed before I was even told where she was. Losing everything, especially you and your mother devastated me. I went into hiding. I came to Jakku to find your body and bury you, but I was amazed to find you alive. I chose to stay here and protect you. We stopped talking about our past, and eventually you just forgot about it. And that’s how we got here.”

“But… why?” Rey asked. “Why did the First Order come to Jakku for me? Did they want to kill me?”

“They wanted to exploit your powers. Take you from me, turn you to the Dark Side, and make you a mindless agent of evil. I wouldn’t let that happen. I won’t let that happen.”

“What happened to my aunt and cousin? Were they killed?”

“Your aunt is… a story for another time,” Luke swallowed. “But I will say that my sister, try as I might to get rid of her, never will leave me.”

“And what about my cousin?”

“He…” Luke knew what he could do. It would be so easy to lie, to frame it as a certain point of view. But Rey needed to know the truth, “He was one of the students who turned against Skywalker. He’s serving Snoke in the First Order right now.”
Teng was suddenly regretting dating into this mess. He glanced at Rey.

Eh. It was worth it.

“He is?” Rey whispered, not noticing Teng.

Rey’s eyes narrowed, something clicking in her mind, “Huh.”

Luke frowned, not expecting that reaction, “What?”

“I understand.”

“What do you mean?”

“I know who you are.”

“You do?” Quom blurted out. He looked at Teng, “Is it that obvious?”

Teng shrugged, “I haven’t figured it out.”

Luke spoke quickly, trying to maintain control, “Rey, I can explain-”

“You’re Alyla’s brother.”

Everyone was silent.

“I’m sorry, what?” Quom said.

Rey grinned so wide it looked like it hurt her cheeks, “He’s Gavyn Kene.”

“He’s roughly the same age as Alyla,” Rey explained, “he has a twin sister that is complicated, but he can’t get rid of. Alyla’s student was obviously her son who burned down Temple Village and serves in the First Order. Dad told me during his telling of Alyla’s story that she had a relationship with a close friend of his, and one of his best friends was Dad’s brother-in-law and owned that freighter.”

Well, technically Lando did once own the Millennium Falcon, Luke conceded. He was just too much in shock to say anything.

“You’ve said to me in the past that Alyla Kene had a niece,” Rey continued. “You clearly know too much about Obik Kenu – a Jedi – and his demise. Your mentor was killed when you were a teenager, just like Alyla. There was a girl with you when you faced Sarco. Clearly that was Alyla. You were friends first with mom, which would make sense that you wouldn’t date your master from the get go.”

Hold on, did she think he used to be a slave in the Zygerrian Fighting Pits?

“You told me that long scar on your back was from an incident on Zygerria where you got whipped by some slavers.”
Oh crap, he had forgot about that.

“And you said that Alyla’s brother was a rather good pilot and loved restoring ships. His ship was his pride and joy. Come on, Dad. I’ve seen the way you handle ships, and I’ve seen you on the Flight Sim. You are Gavyn Kene!” Rey declared. “You must have taken the name Luke as a reference to Luke Skywalker, because who would believe Skywalker would walk around with his real first name? You’re Gavyn Kene!”

Luke just stared at his daughter.

This was a turn he had not expected nor wanted.

“Rey, listen,” Luke took a deep breath.

“No, no,” Rey shook her head. “Don’t say it, Dad. You don’t need to say anything. I don’t need to hear it. I know the truth. Come on, Teng. Let’s go say good night. I’m going to need to sleep nice and long tonight. Jedi training starts tomorrow. Right, Dad?”

“Oh… sure,” Luke was still too stunned to respond with anything else.

In the corner of his eye, Quom was turning purple and shaking from holding back his reaction so hard.

“You can’t tell anyone about this,” Luke warned. “No one can know you’re Force Sensitive. They can’t know the truth about us or the First Order might find you.”

“I promise. Come on, Teng,” Rey got to her feet, pulling Teng up with her. “Oh, I’m so excited about all of this. In fact, you might say I’m Kene.”

Oh God, what had Luke done?

“Rey Rhiaon Kene,” she tested out the name. Rey frowned, “No offense, Dad, but that is an awful name when you say it out loud.”

“Let’s go!” Rey pulled Teng away.

Luke just stared straight away in confusion and regret until he was staring at nothing but empty sand.

Then Quom burst out laughing.

“By the Force, she was so close!” Quom laughed hysterically, doubling over. His long, hearty guffaws elongated into literal howls.

It was too much for Luke, and he too burst into laughter.

“She thinks I’m Gavyn Kene,” his face was red as he marveled at his daughter’s guess. “She came so close to the truth, and then just way over shot it. Oh… for goodness’ sake, how does she reconcile my supposed slavery with my time served in the Rebellion?”

“Oh, Luke, she is truly your daughter.”

“You know what the worst part of that all is?” Luke shook his head. “Rey has seen Alyla. No blue tinge to her at all; she knows what Alyla looks like.”
“And?”

“I am blonde-haired, blue-eyed, and pale-skinned. Alyla is a raven-headed, dark-eyed, Yavinese woman. We don’t even look like we would be third cousins, let alone twins.”

“Hey, are you insulting your fictional parents’ mixed-race relationship?”

“It’s okay. Apparently I’m half-Yavinese. I can say things like that. Oh, this is just perfect. I can’t correct her without having her figure out who I really am, but I just know this is going to blow up in my face in a few years.”

“And I just hope I get to be there to see it.” Quom stood up and brushed the sand from his fur, “Alright, I’m going to go interrupt Rey and Teng’s goodbye before he gets her pregnant.”

“That’s unlikely,” Luke replied. “We both know that Aletha’s secret Rey box had condoms in it.”

“Of course, what else would Doc send? I’m going to take Teng home. We’ll see you guys tomorrow.”

“Good night, Quom.”

“Good night, Gavyn,” he winked.

Luke just shook his head as Quom trounced off, tail flicking happily side to side.

“Oh, boy,” Luke said. “What am I going to do about all of this?”

“Luke,” Obi-Wan Kenobi said carefully in the Force. “I know we agreed on no certain points of view. I didn’t think we had to say, don’t directly lie to the girl.”

“Wash our hands of this, we do,” Yoda said.

Luke sighed, “I know that was probably a bad choice, but she already knows so much now. Can’t we keep this secret just a little bit longer?”

“Alright, but word of advice, don’t cut off her hand when you do tell her,” Anakin advised. “According to your mother that’s a horrible thing to do, and how dare you do that to our child. Ugh, even when I’m dead I’m getting nagged for the Vader stuff. You should hear her rants about strangling pregnant wives.”

“I really should have taken you to a therapist as a child,” Obi-Wan sighed.

“Speaking of people in need of therapists, I’m going to go check on Ben,” Anakin said. “This whole two girlfriends thing is oddly entertaining to watch.”

“Oh, wait until you learn about it.” Anakin chuckled. “And he can barely juggle one of them to begin with. I’m glad I wasn’t that terrible with romancing Padmé.”

Anakin paused as if he heard some voice Luke could not.

“Yeah, well you still fell for me anyway!” Anakin called out. “Who’s that on?”

Luke frowned, “Is he… talking to my mother?”
They do this sometimes,” Obi-Wan replied. “Jakku has a spot on it that’s rather strong with the Force, so sometimes Padmé can tune into our conversations with you.”

“Are you talking about that cave in Carbon Ridge?” Suddenly Obi-Wan’s words processed in Luke’s mind, “Wait, my mother can hear me?”

“To some degree,” Obi-Wan answered. He paused and then said, “Padmé says she thinks you handled that situation with Rey quite well and is proud that you are putting your daughter first before anything.”

“Oh, well, thank you, Mother.”

“She also wants you to know that she wished she could have done the same, but there were extenuating circumstances that she is unfortunately not allowed to explain to you… But basically it’s Anakin’s fault.”

“Isn’t it always?” Luke chuckled. He then paused, “Obi-Wan, if my mother can hear me… can Felicity?”

There was a long silence.

“No,” Obi-Wan finally answered. “There’s… many factors into who can and cannot hear you. Strength of the Force, strength of relationship, and a hundred other things. Your aunt and uncle cannot. Obik Kenu, Gavyn Kene, and most of your students cannot. Zena Halcorr can, but that’s because she’s so strong with the Force, and Reine Agim because you two were so close, but your subconscious is blocking that particular connection. It’s complicated, Luke, but Felicity cannot hear your conversations with us. Qui-Gon Jinn can though, and I think your Darklighter friend might.”

“Oh,” Luke looked down sadly. “So, you can’t pass a message from me to Felicity?”

“We never said that,” Anakin interjected.

Apparently, Yoda had gotten bored with the conversation and left.

“Then can you tell her that…” Luke struggled to find the words. “That I love her, I miss her, and I’m so incredibly sorry that I couldn’t save her?”

Luke felt a warm hand on his shoulder.

“I tell her every time I see her,” Anakin replied. “…Which is a lot more often than you would think.”

“So, you two have mended bridges?”

“For the most part, and very much against her will. I even got her to stop trying to strangle me.”

“Thank you, Father,” Luke smiled. He glanced around casually, “You know, I kind of thought Alyla would want to see this unfold. Especially since Rey now thinks we’re family.”

“Alyla did, but unfortunately she is busy at the moment,” Obi-Wan replied.

“No. She’s off with her son.”

“Oh, ok,” Luke said casually. “…Wait! Her what?”
But Luke received no reply.

“Oh, Rey,” he sighed, once again dumbfounded by the mystery of Alyla Kene, “welcome to the insanity of being a Jedi.”

Chapter End Notes

Coming Up Next Chapter...
Lost and Found
Teng, Quom, and Luke tear apart Jakku to find Rey when she goes missing after a X’us’R’iia. But danger lurks inside when Luke takes Quom to a cave infected with the Dark Side.

…but, yeah. I totally didn’t actually plan for Rey to figure out Luke was a Jedi. It was actually only supposed to be Teng who learned it, and Rey was just unconscious. But the story keeps pulling towards Rey figuring it out, and I couldn’t fight it anymore. Plus, I didn’t want Teng to keep that sort of thing from Rey.

I’m still holding back the moment she learns her dad is Luke Skywalker because I’ve had that image and dialogue in my head for far too long. So, if it seems like the whole she thinks Luke is Gavyn thing feels a little weird and forced, I’ll confess, it’s just my last-ditch attempt to preserve the I am a Skywalker reveal for later.

Why did I give Rey eyeliner and mascara in a desert environment? Because I don’t care what JJ Abrams wants me to believe, Rey is absolutely wearing mascara and eyeliner during TFA.

Again, full credit to the character of Lyra, and the exchange between Luke and Quom about Rey having a fleet goes to R2_D2106.
Lost and Found

Chapter Summary

Luke gives Rey a manicure, Rose and BB-8's closeness gets them both in trouble, and Quom gives good advice for once.

Chapter Notes

The next several chapters will borrow heavily from the book Before the Awakening by Greg Rucka. There will be large sections copy and pasted, but most of the time altered in some way. Please note that continuity wise, I am rewriting the Rey section, anything not shown on screen (in in chapter I guess) is canon for the Finn section, and completely disregard the Poe section as I have shown a different origin for him joining the Resistance and learning about the map.

Trigger warning: Child abuse and violence towards a child is shown and discussed in this chapter. Also Rey has a traumatic flashback to the Burning of Rornian in which Obik Kenu’s murder is explicitly shown in horrifying detail.

HUGE SHOUTOUT to R2_D2106 who wrote a Poe scene so amazing I just had to add it into this story. Full credit for that scene goes to her, though I tweaked a word or two, some formatting, fixed a continuity error, and changed the scene from involving her OC to it involving Rose. Thank you so much for giving me permission to add in your scene.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

The Long Way Home

Chapter Forty-Six

Lost and Found

The Teedos called the storm X’us’R’iia. It had a name because the Teedos believed there was only the one, the same one that returned again and again. It was the breath of the god R’iia, the Teedos said.

R’iia was not a benevolent god, and thus the storm was blamed for a great many things. It was the source of the famine that had plagued that part of Jakku for years. It was the reason the water had gone away. It was why their luggabeasts turned unruly. It was responsible for the interlopers who plagued their lands. It was, significantly, what had brought the great shards of metal filled with many, many soft beings crashing to the sands so many years before. The ship graveyards were a monument to R’iia’s anger, the Teedos said. They were a warning, one that the interlopers in Niima consistently failed to heed, much to the Teedos’ annoyance. Most of the Teedos were harmless, scavengers in their own way, much like Rey and the others. There were orthodox Teedos, though, zealots who were known to attack both their brethren and the salvagers, claiming what they did was a blasphemy to R’iia. R’iia would punish them all for their sins. The X’us’R’iia would punish them all.

Rey didn’t believe a word of it, but she didn’t believe in much outside of herself.

That is until three weeks ago when she had discovered her own father had been one of the legendary figures called a Jedi Knight. He wielded great magic, as the Teedos would call it, though Luke Erso called it the Force. He could do things beyond her wildest dreams, see things that had been and had yet to come. He could bring the First Order to its heels if given the opportunity. He could be unstoppable, a Master that controlled Darkness and Light, and could balance the universe itself, heeding it to his own whims.

And she had that power too.

Now Rey didn’t know what to believe.

But what she did know to believe is that her father would love her, protect her, and train her. What she would do with that training, she didn’t know. She feared the future she now knew lay before her almost as much as she feared the X’us’R’iia about to hit.

She’d been high on the superstructure of one of the old battle cruisers half-buried in the sands, hoping to find something to salvage that the other scavengers had missed. Her father was down below going through the things they had found to determine what needed fixing and what was worthless, while no doubt worrying that her being up so high wasn’t good with her bandaged hand, still healing from her duel with Sarco Plank.

She looked out and saw the storm forming on the horizon. She knew immediately that it would be a big one. It was time to go.

“She spoke into her comm, finding it easier to do than shout down at him. Rey didn’t need to see Luke’s face to know he was scowling at her holding on with only one hand. It was not like her injured hand that was holding the comm was doing much anyway. “I see a X’us’R’iia on the horizon. Time to pack up.”

“You mean you would rather spend hours cooped up alone with your boyfriend than your father? Blasphemy.”

Rey laughed, “I didn’t say you couldn’t join us, Dad.”

“Oh yes, and spend days alone in a confined space with my hormonal teenaged daughter and her boyfriend. That sounds wonderful. Oh, for goodness sake, would you be careful?”

She’d been free-climbing the wreck, and it was—perhaps paradoxically—always quicker going up than it was going down. Going down, you had to worry about gravity in a whole different way, and hurrying was a good plan to get yourself hurt. She knew that from experience.

“Why?” Rey smirked. “Can’t I just use my awesome Jedi powers to stop myself from getting hurt?”

“You mean the powers I haven’t taught you to use yet?” Luke dryly replied. “And you do remember that time I ripped open my side, right?”

She took it fast, anyway—almost too fast—then risked jumping the last three meters to the ground. The sand could be soft if you were close enough, but she wasn’t. From that height, it was like landing on metal. The shock of impact jarred her ankles and ran a sharp pain up her calves and into her knees.

As Rey screamed out in pain, Luke raced to her side and dropped to his knees.

“Are you alright?”

“Fine,” Rey groaned, waving him away from her. She used her staff to right herself, “You were just right about hurting myself. You can gloat about it when we get home.”

“Rey, I would much rather be wrong than to see you hurt,” Luke frowned, rising to his feet. He let out a sigh of relief when he saw that she wasn’t limping as she sprinted for her speeder. “Got everything?”

“All packed,” Rey secured the netting on the side of her speeder. “Race you home?”

Luke grinned as he threw his supplies in the trunk of his own speeder, “You’re on.”

Though they had their own speeders, the pair still liked to scavenge from time to time. There was safety in numbers, plus if they brought two speeders, they could haul twice as much home.

Then it was a race for home, Rey and the speeder shooting as fast as she could push it across the desert, the rising wind chasing her. She had built her speeder to be faster than her father’s, but he knew how to give her a good chase.

With one hand she tugged the end of her long, looped scarf from beneath her belt and wrapped it around her nose and mouth. Quom’s obsession with scarves had infected her at a young age. They truly were a great tool in the desert, and Rey was thankful for the Vrogem as she used her scarf to cover her face as the wind began to pick up.

As she pulled down her goggles – seeing her father doing to same from the corner of her eye – Rey thought of Aletha and Kira’s Council. Depending on the length of the X’us’R’iia, she wouldn’t be able to speak with them for a while. Not if she was going to be stuck with her father the whole time. Thankfully, the girls had come up with a system to preserve their secret from Luke. Only Rey would initiation contact, unless there was an emergency at which time the Council could be the ones to comm her.

The storm had almost caught them by the time the father and daughter reached the wreckage of the walker. It came in surges, strong enough to buffet the speeder from behind, and Rey had to fight to keep the vehicle steady on its repulsors. Glancing over at her father, Rey could see he was focusing intently on something she couldn’t see. He was probably using the Force to keep his own speeder in line. Luke had become more comfortable with openly practising the Force ever since Rey learned the truth.

Sand was swirling when she slid to a stop and dismounted. She stumbled a little from the wind, but strong arms caught her and steadied her. Rey smiled up at Luke gratefully. Her father had always been a quick man, and now she was starting to understand why.

Together they struggled to shove their speeder between two of the broken, bent legs of the giant AT-AT to shelter it from damage as much as possible. The sound of the storm was growing deafening, the wind a near-constant shriek, mixed with the rasping, cruel noise of sand scraping the hull of the walker.

Thunder exploded above Rey, making her flinch. Luke locked his arms around her instinctively, protecting his precious little girl and making her feel safe. He remembered the sandstorms of his youth and the way he would bury himself into the protective embrace of his Uncle Owen.

His heart hurt as he remembered that Uncle Owen, as gruff and rough as he had been, always put Luke’s safety before his own. Owen literally protected Luke to his final breath, choosing to burn alive rather than let his nephew come to harm.

Luke looked down at his not so little girl hiding in his arms. He knew he would make the same choice to protect Rey if it came down to it. Just as Owen did. Just as Beru did. Just as Anakin, Obi-Wan, and Reine Agim had done for him.

And as Felicity had chosen to do so this little girl could grow into the tall, strong, beauty huddled in his arms.

“It’s okay.” Luke pressed a kiss to the top of Rey’s head. “It’s just the storm.”

Rey nodded, but said nothing. She hadn’t jumped because of the lightning, and her father knew it. It was because of the fear and control Jarex Zolhar still held over her that made her jump and flinch at times like this. She couldn’t remember the man’s face or voice anymore; but she remembered his ring, and she remembered the pain of it smashing into her face whenever she upset Jarex.

Sometimes Rey wondered what exactly had been Fallah Menuk’s breaking point that made her leave Jakku. Fallah Menuk, the coward who had fled rather than reveal to Luke what Jarex had been doing to Rey. The one who had escaped the confrontation where Jarex lost his hand. Was it seeing her boyfriend stoop so low that he would hit a child? Or was it what Rey suspected, that Jarex treated his lover with the same contempt.

Whatever the reason, Rey always did think there was something strange behind the eyes of the redhead whenever she beheld Jarex injuring Rey.

Rey squinted skyward in time to see the last of the sunlight being eaten away by the swirling dust clouds. Dry lightning arced and lit the sky as if daylight had returned at once, just for a second. When she closed her eyes, she could still see the lightning flash. She tried to focus on it so she wouldn’t remember the hateful green eyes of Jarex Zolhar and the way they burned with such manipulative hatred. Rey loathed to admit it, but his hold was so great over her that sometime Rey still thought the abuse was her own fault.

Something sky blue filled her up, warming and comforting her.

“It’s okay,” Luke whispered, holding her tight, “He’s gone. He’s never coming back.”

Rey hoped her father was right.

Without a word, the pair started for the entrance of the walker. Her skin stung with biting sand, the wind trying to take her by the feet and lift her, and she had to fight her way to the side of the hull using handholds. Luke was behind her, a hand on her back, pushing at her slightly to combat the power of the wind. Rey winced when her hand had to tightly grip the handles, but her wound had healed quite decently in the past weeks. Rey barely managed to wrench the makeshift door open enough to stumble inside, pull her father in behind her, and then, just as quickly, slammed it shut again.

For a moment, Rey and Luke stood in the darkness of their home, catching their breath, listening to R’iia’s rage outside. The noise was diminished but still sunk through the walker’s armored hull. Though they couldn’t see each other, they sensed each other’s position. Rey didn’t know if it was a Jedi thing, a father-daughter thing, or just a thing that came from living with a person for so long. They looked to each other, and gave a small identical chuckle.

“Yeah, I’m fine,” Rey reached out, fumbled for a second, then found one of their lamps and triggered the key. The light flickered weakly at first, then stabilized into a warmer glow. “I just really hate sand.”

Luke laughed a little too much at that.

“What is it?” his daughter asked.

“Ask me again sometime.” He slung an arm around her shoulder and they walked deeper into the heart of their home. “I assume standard plan for the X’us’R’iia?”

“You ration the water, I ration the food, top left ankle is where we relieve ourselves,” Rey confirmed.

The pair got to work, settling themselves in for the long haul. They took off their boots, and emptied sand from them. They shook off their clothes, Luke hanging up his cloak on a peg. They shook out her hair and Rey made a sly comment about Luke needing to brush sand out of his beard that made Luke smile, shake his head, and say something about her taking after her mother. When they were finished, there was a substantial pile of Jakku’s desert at their feet.

“You know, I feel easily ten kilos lighter,” Rey declared.

“Well, you need the weight anyway,” Luke plugged their commlinks into the chargers. “I don’t like how pronounced your collarbone is.”

He didn’t notice the charge light on Rey’s comm didn’t shine.

Rey grinned, “Teng does.”

“Sweetheart, it’s not your collarbone he stares at.”

Rey wondered if back in Niima Outpost, Teng was having an uncontrollable urge to blush.

Thunder detonated overhead again, vibrating through the metal shell of the walker. Bits and pieces of various salvage jumped. Antar Kymeri’s helmet fell from where it hung on a makeshift hook. Rey carefully brushed it off and placed it back next to Dosmit Raeh’s helmet. She promised Aletha to take care of Antar’s helmet, and she would honour that promise.

They lived in what had once been the main troop compartment of the walking tank, but that had been when the thing was upright. The interior had long before been stripped of anything salvageable and now resembled a cluttered workshop more than anything else. Rey had traded for a generator a couple of years before, a great moment of pride for Luke to see her earn that much. Because of Rey, they had power when they needed it, mostly for the workbench where they would take apart and reassemble and, more often than not, rebuild from scratch those pieces of usable junk they recovered.

Unkar always paid more for things that still worked.

Quom is not fond of Luke and Rey’s little homebrewed operation, preferring the group do all of their work in his workshop. Aletha had managed to get him to drop the subject years ago when she pointed out Luke and Rey needed something to do when they were stuck at home.

Rey was fairly certain Teng still secretly endured Quom’s rants on the matter, but if he did, the boy would never tell her.

“You know, I feel bad that Teng isn’t here with us,” Rey said.

“Sweetheart, you can live without your boyfriend for a few days,” Luke shook his head; though he knew he really had no leg to stand on with how much he had carried on over Felicity’s absence in his life.

Rey rolled her eyes, “I meant that he’s stuck in a small space with Quom and no escape.”

“Oh… You’re right, that is horrifying.”

She laughed, “I think one of the worst things I can remember happening to me was getting stuck with Quom in here for one of the longest X’us’R’iias on record. You must have been going crazy stuck with Aletha in her tent. There wasn’t even anything to distract yourselves with.”

Luke cleared his throat, “We found things to do.”

Rey watched her father carefully, a smirk sneaking onto her face, “Dad?”

“Yes, Rey?”

“I’m pretty much full grown, right?”

“I guess.”

“And that means the two of us can have adult conversations now, right?”

Luke narrowed his eyes, “Where is this going?”

“Did you and Aletha have sex during that storm?” Rey asked bluntly.

His jaw hit the ground, “Rey!”

“What? You said we can have adult conversations!”

“No. I asked where this conversation was going. I definitely did not say you could ask me such things.”

“Come on, I’m curious.”

“Why in the Galaxy would you be curious about that?”

“Because I’m just trying to settle the timeline of when you two got together,” Rey explained. “It was during then, right?”

Luke sighed. If this had been a few years earlier, he would have expected it to be a continuation of the conflict that led to Teng getting an X-Wing dropped on him. But it was true, Rey had matured, and so had their relationship.

“Fine, yes, we did,” Luke confessed. “We kissed a year before and confessed our feelings a year before that. But it was during the first X’us’R’iia that we first made love.”

“Were you already together at the time?” Rey asked.

“Not really. That was what sort of kick started things. Does that make you uncomfortable?”

“Maybe a little, but it’s not my relationship to dictate. The choice was yours and Aletha’s alone.”

“Exactly.” Luke considered his next words, “And speaking of, may I ask if you and Teng have made such a decision?”

Rey blushed and looked down, “I’m technically still a virgin, Dad.”

“Technically?”

“We’ve done foreplay, but no, you know… penetration. At least none of the… fun parts.”

Luke was slightly curious about what sort of things the pair had been up to, but knew he’d regret it if he asked. His family had dabbled enough in incest; he did not need those images in his head.

“Alright,” Luke sighed. “Just promise me that if you do do that with Teng, the two of you will be safe. You don’t want any MisCalcs.”

Rey frowned, “MisCalcs?”

“Makes sense.” Rey paused, “Dad… was I a MisCalc?”

Luke smiled and wrapped an arm around her, “Definitely not. While your mother and I weren’t actively trying to have a child, we had decided to allow the possibility and dropped precautions. Not a miscalculation, but we weren’t calculating anything at all. And it was one of the best decisions of my life, no matter what it may have led to.”

Through a hairline crack in the hull, Rey saw a sudden flare of light, more dry lightning. She picked up one of the blankets on the floor and used it to cover the crack. She secured it using three of the rare magnets she’d recovered from a shattered gyro-stabilizer.

As Rey did that, Luke went to their stash, hidden beneath one of the side panels, unscrewed the plate, and removed one of the dozen bottles of water they’d left there. He took a drink to wash the desert out of his mouth, and forced himself swallowed with a grimace. Even though he kept them in a life of relative comfort, they still couldn’t afford to waste water during a sandstorm. He carefully recapped the bottle, and offered it to Rey to do the same.

While Rey returned the water to their stash, Luke began to pile the remaining blankets on the ground near the back of the hull. He sat down and beckoned for Rey to join him, which she did, settling comfortably in his arms. She rested her head against his shoulders, listening to the storm beat furiously against their home.

“Dad?”
“Yes, Rey?”

“Tell me the story of how Rogue One, Han Solo, Leia Organa, and Luke Skywalker destroyed the Death Star?”

He hugged his little girl tightly, “There was once a man named Alaric, who had a son, a daughter, a skill for mechanics, and pride perfectly equal for all three things…”

She closed her eyes, listening to the soothing sounds of sand and her father’s voice, feeling, for the first time in a very long time like she could be more than half-brave.

The X’us’R’iia lasted three and a half days.

If fate had been a little less kind to Rey – or if Aletha Kymeri understood the term care package didn’t mean two enormous crates – they might have worried about running out of water and food. But Luke kept them on track with the rationing of water, and Rey took pride in using Aletha’s gifts to give them varied meals. She even made a game out of who could manage the largest amount of Dagobah trail mix, that had ended with Rey almost dry heaving in the sand and conceding her defeat to Luke.

To keep themselves entertained, the pair talked. They shared stories, mainly those of the past that Luke knew, but Rey had a few of her own. There were a few projects they had on their workbench that they tinkered around with. Luke also would teach Rey using the books Aletha has sent, which he was very grateful for. He tried his best to give his daughter an education, but he had the sneaking suspicion that when she re-entered the “real world” there would be quite a few subjects she would be lacking in.

There was also their “computer” to keep them entertained. They’d jury-rigged it using pieces scavenged from several crashed fighters over the years, including a cracked but still-usable display from an old BTL-A4 Y-wing. There were no radio communications to speak of—no way to transmit or receive and it wasn’t like they really had anyone with a computer to talk to anyway. If Quom and Teng’s comms couldn’t reach through a sandstorm, there was no point in using a computer to do the same.

On the wreckage of a Zephra-series hauler, though, Rey had once found a stash of data chips, and after painstakingly going through each and every one of them, she’d discovered three with their programs intact; one of them, to her delight, had been a flight simulator.

So when they weren’t sleeping, eating, sharing stories, tinkering at their workbench, or just sitting and listening to the storm, they flew.

It was a good program, or at least Rey imagined it was. Luke wouldn’t answer one way or another, but secretly it was the very program the Alliance had once used to train him. They could select any number of ships to fly, from small repulsor-driven atmospheric craft to a wide variety of fighters, all the way up to an array of stock freighters. They could set destinations, worlds Rey had never visited and Luke imagined one day she would, and scenarios, from speed runs to obstacle courses to system failures.

At first, Rey been truly horrible at it, quite literally crashing a few seconds after takeoff every time. Luke like to joke that she had been cursed with the luck of Felicity Rhiaon, but soon enough the Skywalker side took over. With often little else to do, and with a perverse sense of determination that she would not allow herself to be beaten by a machine that she herself had put together with her own hands, she learned. Rey learned so much that there was little the program could throw her way that would challenge her now. She’d gotten to the point where she would, quite deliberately, do everything she could think of to make things hard on herself, just to see if she could get out of it. Full-throttle atmospheric re-entry with repulsor-engine failure? No sweat. Multiple hull breach deep-space engine flameout? A walk in the park.

It was, if nothing else, a way to pass the time.

But she could never quite manage to beat Luke. The man could fly any course Rey set for him with his eyes closed… Literally. They bet the last of the koyo melons on it.

“That’s it,” Rey shut off the computer as her father bit into the melon. “I’m bored of this.”

“No need to be a sore loser, Rey,” Luke chuckled, wiping a trail of melon juice from his chin. It had been so long since he had tasted fruit, and he wasn’t about to throw away his last shot in likely several more years.

“Nice, Dad. Calling me a loser. Top notch parenting,” she teased.

“It’s just a term,” Luke shook his head, but smiled. “And it’s important I teach you how to deal with disappointment gracefully. But if you’re going to be that way, here.”

Luke reached for a knife and cut off a good portion of the melon.

“Don’t say I never treat you,” he gave her the piece of koyo.

“Thanks, Dad.” Rey winked at him, popping the melon in her mouth, “But isn’t this rewarding bad behavior?”

“I lied to you about being a Jedi for eleven years. I think I owe you a little melon every now and then.”

“It wasn’t a lie,” Rey corrected. “And I don’t hold it to you as one. I get why you didn’t tell me, and I’m not mad now that it’s all in the open.”

“Why don’t you hold off on such declarations for when it’s actually all out in the open?” Luke shuddered, “There are things I so don’t look forward to telling you. At least maybe this time I can have some dignity on how you find them out.”

He would not.

“Speaking of,” Luke reached for Rey, “let me see your hand. I think we can finally take the bandages off.”

Rey followed Luke to where they kept the first aid kit, and Luke got to work. She watched her father patiently, but honestly, she was tired of patience. She had been waiting and waiting ever since the day she got this hand injury to finally face head on the destiny he had been withholding from her. Now he seemed determined to continue to withhold it from her until her hand was long healed and the scar was nothing more than a memory to tell her grandchildren.

She could picture four or five children sitting at her feet, her hair grey but face still full of life as she looked down into innocent replicas of Teng’s eyes and told them stories of her youth.

Would they have her father’s power too?
“When do I get my own lightsaber?” Rey asked suddenly.

If Luke was surprised by the query, he showed no sign, “Rey, I’m not comfortable with you having a blaster yet. I’m not about to give you a laser sword.”

“It’s called a lightsaber, Dad.”

“Hey now, who’s the expert on Jedi here?”

Rey laughed as Luke unwrapped the bandage on her hand and started inspecting the wound. Thankfully sepsis had decided not to grace this particular injury, and she was able to bend her fingers again after a few days.

“Come on, Dad,” Rey said as he studied her stitches. “It’s been three weeks and all we’ve been doing is meditation. I want to do the real Jedi stuff.”

“Meditation is real Jedi stuff.”

“But you’ve been teaching me meditation for years.”

“Yes, I have. In an attempt to teach you balance and control so that when this day came you were ready to wield the Force properly.”

“Exactly!” Rey exclaimed. “I want to learn to control it!”

Luke narrowed his eyes, “Self control, Rey.”

“Oh,” she looked down. “Well, when do I get to learn to control the Force?”

Luke sighed and glanced over to the corner of the walker. Catching sight of the remnants of the care shipment, he got an idea.

“Look, your hand is pretty much healed up, and we’re clearly bored of the flight sim. Why don’t we do something else to pass the time? You never got to play around with some of your presents before your injury. How about I give you a manicure and we’ll discuss the Force?”

“Really?” her eyes lit up.

“Consider it a belated birthday present. Now, wash your hands and I’ll set things up.”

“Oh.”

The pair of them did just that.

“Hey, Dad?” Rey poured a little water from a bottle onto her hands. “How do you know how to give a manicure?”

“I learned that the ability to give you mother a manicure resulted in certain benefits,” Luke gathered his tools. “Massages too.”

“Massages?” Rey chuckled. “Like lie on the table, essential oils, aromatherapy, candlelight, and peaceful music full body massages?”

“Sometimes if I wanted to make a big deal out of it. But never underestimate the power of a good back rub. My back-rubbing ability was the only thing that made your mother let me live through the duration of her pregnancy. And my foot rubs… let’s just say that a foot rub almost gave you a little “Remind me to never ask you for a foot rub,” Rey laughed, though secretly she was making plans for Teng later.

Luke looked down and regarded the colours of nail polish Aletha had sent, “Do you mind if we use the lilac?”

“I was kind of hoping for the silver,” she admitted, gently scrubbing her hands with soap.

“I promise to use the silver at another time, but for now I would like to teach you something, and I need the lilac.”

“Alright,” Rey shrugged, drying off her hands. “It’s my signature colour, after all.”

Luke paused, “Your what?”

“Aletha said a girl had to have a signature colour. It’s a girl thing.”

Actually, Paige had said it, but Rey wasn’t about to explain Kira’s Council.

“I dunno. I’ve always been drawn to it. When I think me, I think of lilac. Is something wrong with that?”

“Not at all.”

Luke pulled his cot next to a table that held things like their new Holo projector and the dolls Rey had outgrown sleeping with (though Luke had still seen her several times when she thought his back was turned, handling the dolls, and talking to the Felicity one in particular.) He deposited the tools on the table and patted the cot.

“Come,” he bade. “Sit here, legs crossed.”

“Why?” she asked.

“Because it’s easier to do your nails when we’re on the same level.”

“I meant…” Rey stopped when she realized his words had nothing to do with Force matters. “Never mind.”

He gently heated some water on the ration cooker, then poured in some room temperature water to cool it down. Luke put it in a bowl and had Rey put her hands in it to soak.

“This will help with the cuticles and such,” Luke explained. “Honestly, I’m not clear on the details.”

“It feels nice at least,” Rey smiled softly.

The look on her face made him smile back.

“Rey?” he removed her hands from the water and gently towelled them off. “What do you know about the Force?”

“It’s a power that Jedi have,” Rey answered. “That lets them control people, and…make things float.”
Luke raised an eyebrow as she awkwardly ended her definition.

“Really?” she brightened. Even she had known that last part wasn’t maybe quite right, but if her father was acting like that, then that must mean-

“Every word in that sentence was wrong,” he ended dryly.

Rey sighed. He was messing with her.

Seeing the way she deflated, Luke reached out and stroked her cheek. He smiled at her, fatherly affection shining for her in spades. He felt how it relaxed her, and her smile came back ever so slightly.

“It was a good guess.” He set her hands in her lap and set aside the towel, “But that’s not quite what the Force is.”

“Alright,” she replied ready to be attentive and studious. The look on her face really did make a good case for her being related to Alyla Kene. It was that patience and willingness to learn and understand that had helped keep Ben Solo in line for years.

Until that patience was no longer enough.

“The Force is not a power you have,” Luke explained. “It’s not about lifting rocks. It’s the energy between all things—a tension, a balance that binds the universe together.”

“Okay,” Rey nodded. His description could have characterized a thousand other mythical traditions. “But what is it?”

Luke sighed, “I wish I could explain it to you better. Show you what the Force truly is. Show you what balance truly is. But this planet… such death and heat and dryness. It’s not the right place. Someday, I will take you to a planet with birds in the sky, lakes on the ground, and trees in between. Where you can feel a cool rain on your face and breathe the fresh oxygen of a forest. There I will show you what true balance is. What the Force truly is. So for today, I will illustrate what we are to it, and that is what you must understand. It is not yours to possess, control, and own. We are part of it, and it is what we are truly made of. Made from.”

Rey stared at her father, “…Okay. But what is it?”

Luke groaned, “How about I just tell you what my mentor told me? The Force is what gives a Jedi their power. It’s an energy field created by all living things. It surrounds us and penetrates us. It binds the galaxy together. We do not have it; it gives us the gift of being able to use it to achieve our goals.”

Rey blinked.

“You’re going to ask what is it again, aren’t you?”

“You know me too well.”

Luke shook his head, “Of course you got the Rhiaon skepticism. Why wouldn’t you? Not getting it would have made my life too easy, and the universe wouldn’t want that.”

“And miss all the fun we have?” Rey grinned. “Come on, Dad. What were you going to show me?”
“I’m going to show you what we like to call a Force Signature. It’s how you can identify specific individuals in the Force. It’s why I don’t mistake you for Quom or Teng when you enter a room while my back is turned.”

“So that’s how you know!”

Rey did as instructed, the world becoming nothing but darkness before her. She could still sense her father sitting in front of her, hearing the familiar sound of his breathing.

She focused on following his instructions to the letter. In and out. In and out. Steady breathing exactly like how he had her do during meditation.

“Now reach out.”

Rey readied herself, and then reached out.

Literally. She literally reached out a hand in front of her like she was trying to grab onto the Force and hold it there.

Luke rolled his eyes. He couldn’t help but wonder if subconsciously some small part of Felicity Rhiaon residing in her soul was just trolling him.

His eyes then fell on the pilot doll sitting on the table. An idea that proved he was just as mischievous as his wife filled his mind. He glanced back at Rey, making sure she wasn’t peeking. Luke picked up the doll and tickled her fingertips with the head.

Rey loudly gasped as excitement and pride filled her, “I feel something!”

“You feel it?” Luke egged her on vaguely wondering if Felicity would love him or hate him for the joke. Considering Anakin Skywalker’s laughter in his mind, Luke knew at least he had his father’s support.

“Yes! I feel it!”

“That’s the Force.”

“Really?” Rey asked. She couldn’t help feeling pleased with herself—after all, she’d only been reaching out for a few seconds at most.

“Wow, it must be really strong with you.”

“Oh, I’ve never felt any-”

Something smacked her hand, not too hard but enough to make her cry out and retract her hand.

She opened her eyes to find her father smirking at her and holding her pilot doll. Clearly it had just been a joke.

One she didn’t find funny.

“You meant reach out like…” she tapped her heart, unable to put it into words.
Luke just nodded, setting the doll back on her table.

“Okay. Got it. I’ll try again,” Rey lowered her eyes submissively, her tone muted.

Luke frowned; something was wrong. Rey wasn’t embarrassed but… there was something else at work in her mind. Something very serious triggered by the smack on her hand.

“Are you alright?” he asked gently.

“I’m fine.” She wouldn’t look him in the eye, “I’m sorry. I didn’t mean to. I shouldn’t have… I’m sorry. I deserved that.”

Luke’s heart dropped to his stomach, it coming to him in an instant.

He had hit her… Like Jarex had hit her.

“Oh, Rey,” Luke reached out and grabbed her hand. He kissed the spot he had hit her, then kissed her head, forehead, and face over and over. “I’m so sorry. I was just playing around. I didn’t mean to remind you of him.”

“It’s okay. It’s my fault.”

“No, it isn’t. None of what happened to you is okay, and none of it was your fault. Don’t you dare ever think that it was.”

Rey held onto him tightly, and Luke’s heart broke when he felt her tears stain his tunic. He whispered apologies over and held her tight. Reaching into the Force, he enveloped her lilac presence with his sky blue.

“Do you feel that?” he whispered. “Do you feel me reaching for you?”

“Yes,” Rey answered softly. Safe in her father’s arms, she was relaxed enough to reach out into the Force. “I think I can feel you.”

“What does it look like, Rey? What do you see?”

“Something… sky blue.”

He pulled back from her and smiled.

“Exactly,” he wiped a tear from her cheek. He then started the promised manicure by massaging lotion onto her hands, proving to her he was as good at massages as he claimed, “That’s me. That’s my Force Signature.”

“So the sky blue feeling means there’s someone around,” Rey watched as he pushed back her cuticles. To her surprise, it didn’t hurt.

“Actually, the sky blue means that I’m around,” Luke corrected. He clipped and filed her fingernails, ragged from her habit of biting them. It took a lot of work to shape them nicely. “Each person has their own individual colour. It’s like a fingerprint, no two colours are the same between people. At least I assume it’s like a fingerprint. I’ve yet to encounter anyone with the same colours, and I’m fairly certain that after someone dies, colours probably get reused. Any time you sense that sky blue light, that means you’re sensing me.”

“Wow,” Rey grinned. “Are Force Signatures always colours?”
“To humans, yes. Other species perceive them differently. To Zygerrians it’s a certain scent. To Aqualishes, it’s a certain note of music. To Gungans it’s the taste of different kinds of water – salt, fresh, pond, lake, filtered water, polluted water. To Ithorians, it’s the form of different animals.”

“That’s amazing,” Rey smiled. “What colour am I?”

“Why don’t you reach into the Force and find out?”

So Rey closed her eyes and reached out, this time properly and not with her actual hand. It was a good thing, because Luke had started to paint her nails.

“I sense another presence,” she said, eyes still held shut. “Something that… is from the blue. But I can’t make out the colour.”

“Keep trying. You’re on track.”

“I see… I see… I see…”

Her eyes flew open.

“Lilac?” she declared in disbelief.

Luke smiled and held up her lilac painted nails, “Why do you think I got so startled when you said it was your signature colour? It’s literally your Signature colour.”

“I don’t believe it. How could I have possibly known?”

“Maybe a long-forgotten memory? Maybe you unconsciously sensed it? Or maybe you’ve just always known. I remember when I discovered my own sky blue colour, and how much sense it made to me.”

“Lilac and sky blue.” Her brow furrowed, “Purple and blue. Is yours being blue why mine’s purple?”

“Exactly,” Luke answered. “Force Signatures are usually influenced by the colours of their family members. I knew a family – actually the Royal family of Eswolla, the Nygwugen family – who had the father, Mwamba with a carnelian Signature-”

“Carnelian?”

“It’s a type of red. Then the mother, Lehana had the colour goldenrod – lovely woman by the way. You ever need any help, go to her and tell her you’re the daughter of Felicity Rhiaon. She’s a fierce ally of your mother’s.”

“Queen Lehana, got it.”

“And their son, Jabari, has a tangerine Signature. So you can see how with the red and the yellow it formed an orange Signature. Now, that’s not always the case. Their daughter, Idi has a mustard Signature, and I’m told that Prince Akron had a maroon Signature, but I never got to meet him before his death, sadly.”

“So what was Mom’s?” Rey asked.

“Crimson,” Luke answered. “You ended up being a regular old red plus blue situation. The blue is as strong with this family as the Force. My father had an azure blue, my sister has navy blue, her husband has yellow-gold, and their son has forest green.”
Rey’s heart lurched, but she dared not voice her thought. Forest green? Hadn’t she encountered that before?

Her mind flashed to the man who had known her name. The man she had known, those eyes she found so familiar.

Was that her cousin?

“Rey?” her father voice drew her mind back from the thought. Luke frowned at her, “Are you alright?”

“Oh, yeah,” Rey cleared her throat. “Fine. What were you saying?”

Luke eyed her carefully but continued with the lesson. They both knew he didn’t buy it.

When they finally ventured outside after three days trapped inside the walker, it took them an hour to get the door open. The sand was piled so high and packed so hard against it that they could move it only by centimeters at first. With each push, more of the desert rushed into they home.

“Can’t we use the Force to get outside and deal with all of this sand?” Rey groaned.

Luke narrowed his eyes, “We’re not going to get into the habit of using the Force to deal with every little mundane thing.”

“But Dad-”

“No, Rey. This is not up for discussion. I’m telling you the same thing I told your cousin when he tried to use the Force for his chores: it is not a toy, it is a tool. Treat it with respect.”

Rey arched a brow, “What kind of chores did he use it for?”

Luke warned, “Rey-”

“I’m just curious!”

“Fine, you really want to know? I once caught him using the Force to change your diaper. A ridiculously dangerous thing that was the result of him getting too lazy with using the Force.”

“Whoa…” Rey blinked, “Did it work?”

“That’s not the point.”

“So, it worked.”

“Let’s get back on topic; namely, opening this door.”

Rey chuckled, “It totally worked.”

When they finally did have the door open, she had to spend another hour cleaning up, but that was mostly because Luke wouldn’t help her at all, still sulking from their conversation. The sun was hot and mean when they finally emerged. Miraculously, their speeders had been spared the worst of the storm. They dusted them off, checked the power, started the engines, and were pleasantly surprised when they both responded without hesitation.
“Alright,” Luke declared, “I think the best course of action would be if I went out and scavenged this morning, while you go into town to trade with Plutt the things we worked on during the storm.”

“Wait, why do I have to go into town?” Rey objected.

Luke grinned, “Because I think you’ll want a little quality time with Teng.”

“Alright, fair point.”

“After you two have reunited, I want you and Teng head out and do some scavenging. We’ll meet back later at Quom’s workshop. Sound like a good plan?”

“Let’s do it.”

As Luke relayed the plan to Quom and Teng via his comm – and also checked that the two hadn’t managed to kill each other after three days alone – Rey headed back into the walker.

She went back inside long enough to get her staff and a few pieces from her workbench to offer Unkar. She then closed up, mounted her speeder, kissed her father on the cheek, and took the drive into Niima.

On the way there, she commed Kira’s Council to see if anyone was up and wanted to chat. Unfortunately, it was late evening back on D’Qar, and Rey interrupted Aletha, who very awkwardly had to vaguely explain to the Diego Nalto in her bed what was going on. Even worse was Aletha’s insistence that Rey speak to someone as she knew how rough and boring a X’us’R’iia could be.

As it turned out, Aletha was not the only one on a late-night visit.

Paige Tico had mysteriously disappeared, though Rose reported she had last been with Evan Tharel, who also was mysteriously missing from base. The next morning, they would arrive in mess hall with dirt on their backs, twigs in their hair, and some weak story about getting “lost” in the woods that would make Diego wink at Aletha and comment that it had been a while since they too had gotten “lost” in the woods.

When she went to Jessika Pava, Aletha found Jessika and Tallie had locked their door and straight up refused to answer any calls.

Kaydel was off showering, so Aletha asked Poe if she could borrow her niece or if Kaydel would be too busy. At that point Aletha knew well enough to check Kaydel’s plans with him if Kay couldn’t answer herself.

Turned out that Kaydel was apparently going to help Poe “test out” the new mattress that had been delivered to his private quarters that day – as Head of Air Force, Poe had been upgraded into a private room on par with Aletha’s room with en suite fresher and no roommate.

Kaydel’s overnight visit was no surprise. Kaydel and Poe were practically living together by that point, and in fact it would be a few months later that he would officially ask her to move in with him.

Aletha conceded defeat and went off to see if she could find Rose… Quickly, as Aletha had a certain Head of Communications waiting for her in her bed.
Poe whistled a happy tune as he entered his room. Snap was no longer his roommate, so he and Kaydel had made, ahem, plans. BB-8 disconnected from his power station and rolled over, beeping out a greeting.

“Hey, there buddy,” Poe affectionally patted the droid’s dome. “Holding down the fort?”

“That’s not good.”

“That was thoughtful.”

Now that he thought about it, he could hear the shower running. Remembering Aletha’s report on Kaydel’s whereabouts, a mischievous grin spread across his face. He stripped off his flight suit, dropping clothing as he went.

Boo. Boop. Bee-

Whatever BB-8 had been about to say was cut off as the fresher door slid shut behind him.

“Mind if I join you?” Poe could see a distinctly female form in the shower. Not waiting for an answer, he pulled back the curtain-

“What the hell?”

Poe jumped back from the aghast Rose Tico in his shower, and grabbed a towel to cover himself.

“Sorry!” the sorely familiar woman exclaimed, clearly horrified by Poe’s distinct lack of clothing.

The shower switched off, and Rose stepped out. Poe quickly averted his eyes. Rose couldn’t get a towel around her fast enough, but Poe still wouldn’t look her in the eye.

“Poe, I’m so sorry,” Rose began to ramble. “BB-8 said you were running drills and that usually takes a lot of time and the plumbing in my hallway shorted out-”

“No, it’s fine,” Poe still wouldn’t look at her barely covered by a towel, fifteen-year-old form.

Dead puppies. Getting blown up in his X-wing. His father in a bath towel.

Kaydel was going to kill him.

“I’m Rose, by the way.” She looked down shyly, “In case you forgot. People don’t really notice me. No one but droids like BB-8 anyway.”

Right. Names.

“I know you, Rose,” Poe assured her. “BB-8 offered up my shower?”

Rose thankfully had finally pulled on a robe, “Again, I thought I had more time. Kaydel has already hit up the other hallway’s shower and with your room empty, I figured it would be quicker than a bunch of us waiting on the two showers.”
She sat on the closed lid of the toilet to pull on her slippers.

“Kaydel knows I’m here so it’s not like she’s going to kill you. Or me… I think.”

“She let you in?” Poe had finally wrapped the towel around his waist and secured it.

“BB did. I’d say he was rather insistent. Kept pushing me here, as a matter of fact.”

“Well, I’m going to have to talk with him about acceptable droid behavior.”

BB-8 was cheerily dumping Poe’s flight gear on his bed as the pair re-entered the bedroom.

“Thanks for the shower, BB,” Rose patted the semi-circular head. “Just make sure you warn Poe next time, okay?

“I mean, send him a message. Don’t tell him when he’s already thinking of spending the night with his girlfriend.” Rose glanced at Poe. “Kaydel’s going to be over soon. She just has to finish showering herself, and then she’ll spend the night. Honestly, I don’t know why she didn’t come use your shower.”

“It was that leap of logic on my part that led to this very incident,” Poe replied.

“Oh, God, I am never going to live this down, am I?”

“I won’t tell the girls if you won’t.”

“Deal.”

“Okay,” Poe was seriously weirded out about by the whole thing. He honestly wanted Rose out before someone caught the twenty-nine-year-old Commander of the Air Force with a basically naked fifteen-year-old, and ended his career. “Good night.”

“Good night, Poe,” Rose still wouldn’t look him in the eye.

Honestly, Poe was going to be avoiding eye contact with her for a long time too.

Beet. Beep!

“Good night, BB-8,” Rose gave a cheery wave to the droid and then hurried out of the room as fast as possible.

“Buddy, we really need to talk about boundaries,” Poe collapsed on his bed, facing the ceiling.

Boop!

“I mean you need to stop making my room the go-to room when there’s something wrong.”

BB-8 rolled up next to the bed, beeping and whirring in fast binary.

“Slow down, what about Rose?”

“You think…BB, Buddy, that’s not how parenting works. First of all, she has Paige. Second, if she’s underage than it’s likely the General’s the one acting in loco parentis. Plus if Kaydel and Jessika don’t count as adult supervision, she’s got Doctor Kymeri watching over her.”

_Bee Bee Booop?_

“In loco parentis means the General is responsible. Not me, not Kay. Not even Aletha. The General. Now, if you don’t mind, my amazing girlfriend is coming over and I’d like to get laid tonight. Preferably before Holdo discovers another reason to piss me off and cockblocks me again.”

_Bop. Beep. Bee?_

“Yeah, I know Holdo isn’t on base, but that’s not the point. I’m not going to see Kay naked if you’re here to kill the mood.”

_BEEP!_

BB-8 spat a binary raspberry before going over to the door. With a few choice words best left untranslated, the droid exited the room.

Kaydel appeared at the door a few minutes later. She was wearing pink pajamas with little hearts on them. A cute image, not so sadly undercut by the way she climbed onto the bed and over top him.

“Peacock,” she kissed him.

He reached up, cupping her neck. She moved to straddle him.

“See you got my message,” she whispered against his ear, reaching for his towel.

An image of Rose he never wanted but was now burned in his mind forever flashed before his eyes.

“Can we just cuddle tonight?” he asked, moving her hand away from his towel.

Kaydel sat up, still straddling him, “What brought this on?”

Poe groaned, “I think BB-8 wants me to have babies.”

“Mood officially killed, Dameron. Scooch over.”

So Rey found herself in the audio company of a clearly flustered Rose Tico and an annoyed BB-8 who had been locked out of Poe’s room.

_BEP BOPP BOOP BOIP BEW BEE!_

“And I’ll help you send it to Kes,” Rose told the droid. “I only hope Poe’s father can talk some sense into those two. I mean who just climbs into a shower without an invitation?”

Her promise of silence to Poe didn’t count Jakku scavengers who could never spread the news around a D’Qar military base.

“_In his defense,”_ Rey said, “_you were in his private shower, and Kaydel is the only other person with the code to his room. Well, her and BB-8, but he’s probably lost that privilege now._”

_BOP BEEP!_

Rose sighed, “I get being in love, but BB-8 is in my room so much that he might as well be my
There was an awkward beat of silence as Rey and BB-8 remembered that Rose’s actual roommate had recently been killed in action – a nice supply runner who was Rose’s age and had been shot down by the First Order – and Rose had been taking the death of her friend pretty hard.

“Well, that doesn’t sound too bad,” Rey said. “I would love to hang out with BB-8 in person.”

“Beep bo beep boop.”

“Well, aren’t you sweet?” Rey chuckled. “Come on, Rose, we both know this isn’t about Poe walking in on you showering. What’s going on?”

Rose sighed and pulled her knees to her chest, “I just feel… so alone. The whole Kira’s Council is fun, but it seems like everyone’s paired off and having romance and adventures while I’m sitting in an empty room every night with a box of crackers and a tech manual. Sure, a fun night every once and a while, but it gets so lonely. Even you, who lives in the middle of nowhere, have a far more vibrant social life. I was fine when it was just me and Paige, but now that she’s dating Evan, I’m left behind. We’re like our necklaces, each a piece of a set. Without her what value am I? I’m not… special. No one’s eyes light up when they speak to me. No one calls me a hero. No one even trusts me with the smallest secret.”

Rey was silent for a very long time, and then made a life changing decision.

“BB-8, could you please leave the room? I want to talk to Rose privately.”

“Bo beep bwep boo blo.”

“I know you can, but the whole point of this is to make Rose feel special.”

Rose frowned, “Point of what?”

“Come on, BB-8. Please?”

“Brep boop bo bee.”

“I’ll give you an oil bath when we finally meet.”

BB-8 was out of the room before Rey could draw another breath.

“Okay, are we completely alone?” Rey asked.

“Yes,” Rose answered. “Why? What’s going on?”

“You want to feel special? Know a big secret? I’ve got one for you. Something that none of the other girls know. Heck, something Aletha doesn’t know.”

“What’s that?”

“I’m going to tell you why my Dad and I are in hiding on Jakku.”

Rose gasped, “What? Really?”

“Really. But you have to swear you won’t tell anyone. It’s a huge secret, and if it gets out, I could be in a lot of danger. Promise you won’t tell?”

“I swear it on my necklace,” Rose gripped the half-moon pendant. Then she hesitated, “But Kira, you don’t have to do this just to make me feel better.”

“I’m not. Honestly, I’m telling you because I’ve been bursting to tell someone.”

“But it’s a big deal. Why would you tell me?”

“Because you’re my best girl friend.”

Rose blinked, “What? Are you serious?”

“Completely,” Rey replied. “The other girls feel more like older sisters and are all busy being adults. You’re the one who still is a kid with me. And Aletha’s my second mom, so she totally doesn’t count. By process of elimination, you are totally my best girl friend.”

“…Oh. Process of elimination.”

In that moment, Rey so wished she could reach out and clasp Rose’s hand.

“And if you put a blaster to my head and made me pick between Paige, Kaydel, Jessika, and you… I would totally pick you.”

“Really?” Rose beamed, her hand feeling odd, like it was wrapped in a strange warmth.

“Really really,” Rey answered. “You talk shop, love ships and flying, fangirl over Rebel heroes as hard as me, and get what it’s like to grow up in a difficult situation. I know what it means for you and Paige to have gotten me that pendant, Rose. What the First Order did to your home… it’s unforgivable. And for your parents to have just sent you and Paige off to the Resistance so you can live, knowing it means they would die… It reminds me of what my mom did. You’re my best girl friend, Rose. No doubt about it.”

“And you’re my best friend too, Kira. Not just girl, but friend period. When I talk to you I don’t feel like I’m just tagging along with my sister’s friends. Kaydel and Jessika are Paige’s friends, but you? You’re mine.”

“Careful with those sorts of words. It might result in Teng challenging you to a duel.”

“I am not fighting an ex-pirate, ex-cult member, Fighting Ring champ.”

“Alright, let’s calm down. It’s not like you’d be fighting me.”

“Deluded with grandeur,” Rose teased.

“Just jealous of my awesome skills,” Rey teased right back.

“Didn’t that sort of thinking recently almost get your skull bashed in?”

“And we come to the secret,” Rey said. “I told you that my Dad saved my life from Sarco Plank, but I didn’t tell you guys why. Are you ready for the secret?”

Rose grabbed a pillow to hug and leaned in intently, “Hit me.”

“The reason the First Order is trying to hunt down my father, and why they killed my mother is that… My father is a Jedi… and so am I.”
Her jaw dropped, “No!”

“Yes!”

“No!”

“Yes!”

“No freaking way are you a Jedi!” Rose exclaimed. “Are you serious?”

“Dead serious. My Dad has a lightsaber and used the Force to summon my staff right into his hand. We’re Jedi, and he’s starting to teach me to be one like him.”

“I don’t believe this. You’re not pulling my leg, right?”

Rey frowned, “Why would I pull on your leg?”

“Oh… it’s a saying meaning you’re not tricking me.”

“Huh. I’ve never heard that before.”

“Really? They don’t say that on Jakku?” Rose paused, “Wait, you just said you were a Jedi, and I’m quibbling over colloquial phrases of Jakku? What is wrong with me?”

“Love you anyways, Rose,” Rey laughed.

“It’s just so amazing. You’re really a Jedi?”

“Jedi-in-training. You see the need for secrecy now, right?”

“Absolutely. Hey, speaking of, since I know you’re a Jedi, can I know your real name?”

“I guess that’s fair. My name is Rey Erso. The Erso part is a fact name, but the Rey part is true… I think. I’ve never actually asked my Dad. Huh, maybe when I get home tonight.”

“Rey,” Rose teased out the name. “My best friend is Rey from Jakku… That’s weird.”

“What, the name Rey?” Rey asked. “It’s spelled with an esk rather than an aurek in the middle. It was supposed to be this thing of significance as I was a ray of light in the darkness when my Mom went through postpartum depression. And now that I know I’m a Jedi, I realize it was probably also a reference to the Light Side of the Force.”

“No, not the name, Rey itself,” Rose replied. “There’s just something… familiar about it. I feel like I’ve heard it somewhere before, but I don’t know where.”

“Well, if you figure it out, let me know. I’m about to hit Nüma Outpost, so I’m going to have to cut you off. Promise me you won’t tell the girls, Rose.”

“Your secret is safe with me… Rey.”

And with that, the transmission ended.

Rose grinned, and giddily started getting ready for bed, her head abuzz with new developments and frantically trying to riddle out the secrets of Rey’s past. She was just about to crawl under the blankets when came three thuds of metal against the door.
She frowned, got out of bed, and opened the door to reveal BB-8 sitting outside.

The droid looked up at her and beeped out one simple question.

You do know I'm still locked out of Poe’s room?

Rose sighed, and nodded inside, “Come on.”

He rolled in, happily beeping behind her.

The little town—if you could call it a town, and Rey wasn’t certain you could, but she didn’t have much to compare it with—was still nearly deserted. The tarps over the washing station had been shredded by the X’us’R’iaa, and there were two sentries out working on repairs. Thankfully, neither were Roke, he probably off seeing if Old Meru had been swallowed by the sandstorm this time. It had been a while since Rey had seen her, maybe she should swing by with Teng later to see if Meru had any extra jobs for them. Unburdened from the fiscal responsibility of Teng, Meru had greatly improved her attitude regarding him and now would openly admit he was pretty handy.

Rey parked between the washing station and Unkar’s place and looked over at the little airfield out of habit, counting the ships. There were the same three ships parked there, the same three as ever. All of them looked like they’d survived the storm without damage. She was glad to see her Uncle’s ship was safe and sound. Maybe she and Teng would have another little adventure in there that night. After three days apart, Rey had needs.

She trudged over to Unkar’s window, feeling the sun pummeling her. He was already there, watching with swollen eyes in a bloated face. Jedi or not, some things never changed, and those eyes were leering at her the same way as ever.

“First one in,” he said.

Rey dug in her satchel, pulled out the three pieces of salvage she’d taken from her workbench, and set them on the counter between them.

“What’ll you give me?” Rey asked, secretly wishing her father had gotten around to teaching her the mind trick.

One of Unkar’s thick hands reached out, palming the pieces one at a time and pulling them through the opening so he could examine them more closely. Rey waited, glancing about. More people were arriving, venturing out after the storm. A couple of other salvagers apparently had gone out hunting first and were making their way to the washing station to clean up their finds. Rey cursed herself quietly for not having done the same. The storm would’ve shifted the sands in the graveyard. Who knew what it might’ve uncovered? By the time she got out there, there’d be nothing left. Was skipping an early morning haul worth a stolen moment with Teng.

Rey blinked in the burning sun, her eyes used to three days of nearly pitch black. Such thoughts were just her headache talking.

“What’s this supposed to be?” Unkar asked.

Rey looked at the piece in his hand, “It’s the actuator for a Kuat-7 acceleration compensator.”

“Not like this it isn’t. And this, this supposed to be part of a data buffer set?”
“Yeah.”

Unkar grunted.

Rey rolled her eyes, but only because Plutt’s were downcast again. Making him happy was priority. That was how you got more food; and Unkar Plutt didn’t care much about dealings with a staff. She had yet to find a way to put him in his place, but honestly, a part of her didn’t want to. She was proud at being able to negotiate big hauls for the boys… they just didn’t need to know the sacrifices that came with it. No touching had ever occurred, but still… there were sacrifices.

“This one is good, low-interference regulator for a Z-70, I can move this.” He spread the three pieces out between them, “Give you three portions, one for each of them.”

“The Z-70 is worth three alone, Unkar.”

“I’m offering you three, Rey. Take it or leave it.”

She winced. The sunlight was making her headache worse.

“Three portions, two bottles of water,” Rey said.

Unkar grinned that lecherous grin she hated so much; the one that would make Luke push her behind him when she was younger.

“That’s my girl.”

Rey shuddered.

He slid her prizes across the counter, but when her hand reached for them, he batted them to the ground.

“Oops,” Unkar chuckled. “Guess you’ll have to pick them up now.”

It took all of Rey’s restraint not to glare at him. She took a deep breath and gathered her strength. Rey could feel his eyes on her body as she bent over in front of him to gather the packets. She scooped them into her bag so quickly, she accidentally threw a handful of sand into the bag in the process.

“That’s my girl.”

Rey gritted her teeth.

As she bent and straightened up again, the lightheadedness returned and she had to steady herself with a hand on the wall of the Concession Stand.

“You okay?” Unkar asked, both knowing he truly didn’t care.

“I’m fine,” Rey grumbled, gathering her things. She went slowly, mindful that she wasn’t at her best.

“Alright, but if you need a hand-”

“I’ll ask Teng,” she cut off. Then she flashed him a smile, “Or maybe my father.”

But Unkar was unphased, “Of course. I’m sure he would love hearing what you’ve done – what you’ve chosen to do – in order to get more food.”
She knew he was wrong. It wasn’t her fault and she shouldn’t feel any shame over what she had done. He was in the wrong. He was the predator.

Then why did she feel safe.

“Have a nice day, My Girl,” he grinned. Then he shouted behind her, “NEXT IN LINE!”

An alien jostled her aside, and Rey got moving towards Quom and Teng’s tent. She tried her hardest to push Plutt from her mind, yet find she couldn’t shake his words… or her shame.

She really had to learn that Force Choking thing.

When Rey entered the tent, she was surprised to find Teng still lying in his cot.

“Is this your new come-hither look?” Rey teased. “I know my bar is pretty low, but you do have to make some effort.”

“Rey,” Teng smiled, sitting up slowly.

Too slowly. His olive skin was rather pale and his breathing slightly laboured. Rey sat down on the cot and placed her hand on his forehead. There was a sheer layer of sweat glistening across, but even more concerning was the temperature.

“You’re burning up,” Rey frowned. “Are you okay? What happened?”

“Quom and I ran out of water at the beginning of day two,” Teng groaned. “Turns out Quom forgot to refill the canisters. He tried to give me enough water, sacrificing his own portions, but Vrogem fare better without water than Humans do. He told me to stay behind and rest today while he went out and checked up on his village contacts.”

“Well, I can’t believe I’m about to say this, but that was very smart of Quom.” Rey bent down and kissed Teng’s forehead, “And he’s right. You should stay here today and just get some rest. Tinker if you’re feeling better, but mostly just gather your strength. I’m going to get you settled with water before I head out. And here.”

Rey set one of the quarter portion packets on the table. Not much, but she needed the rest in case she ended up stranded.

“Thanks.” There was something odd in his smile.

“What is it?”

“I just feel like a mooch.”

“I would rather have a living mooch than a dead boyfriend too proud for charity.”

“Hey, I wouldn’t call this charity.”

“You’re right,” Rey smiled. “It’s a family looking out for each other. We all take our turns, and this time it’s yours. That’s what you do in a family.”

“You know, if we’re family, us making out is really weird,” Teng pointed out.
“Would it trouble you to commit a little incest before I leave?”

“Not in the slightest.”

Rey couldn’t stop laughing as Teng pulled her down to ravish her with his lips.

“For the last time, Quom, the answer is no,” Luke said firmly as they walked through the marketplace having just traded in their portions.

“Why not, Luke?”

“Do I really have to explain to you why it’s a bad idea to send Rey to Tuanul?”

“Look, I have to go to Karica tomorrow to fix their generator, but Tuanul is offering a lot for me to come fix their fleet of speeders. We can do both, but Rey can’t go to Karica because she doesn’t know generators that well. Really gotta train her up on those.”

Luke looked around to make sure no one was paying attention to them, and then dragged Quom into the currently unoccupied tent workshop, “For goodness sake’s Quom, figure it out!”

“Figure what out? This is a great business opportunity. You scavenge, Teng runs the shop, I go to Karica, and Rey goes to Tuanul. Where’s the flaw in that plan?”

“For crying out loud, Quom, let me spell it out for you,” Luke exclaimed. He lowered his voice, “You cannot send the presumed dead daughter of Jedi Grandmaster Luke Skywalker to a branch of the Church of the Force.”

Quom blinked, “…Huh. Didn’t think of it in those terms.”

“Evidently. I might as well walk in there myself.” Luke shook his head, “Just send Teng to Tuanul.”

“No. I’ll go there myself, have you hit Karica, and the kids can scavenge like they did today. They’re young. They can do more athletic things than we can.”

“Speak for yourself. I can beat both of them put together any day.”

“Yeah, but you’ve got magic.”

“How many times do I have to tell you? It’s not magic!”

“I know. I just enjoy the look on your face when I call it that.”

“Blame your girls,” Quom shrugged. “Your wife started my association with your family, your daughter solidified it, and Aletha abandoned you to deal with me by myself.”

“And here I thought the women in my family were smart.” Luke sighed, “Speaking of the girls, where’s Rey? She and Teng not back yet?”

“Luke, I’ve been with you all afternoon. I know as much as you. What, do you think I stuck them in my pocket when you weren’t looking? You know, I bet if we started on dinner, those two will magically appear.”
“Quom, they’re not like that.”

“Wanna make it a proper bet? Winner works solo on my speeder for a month.”

“You’re on.”

Twenty minutes later when Luke was finishing off dinner, the tent flap opened and Quom let out a triumphant shout.

“Well, look at that!” Quom laughed as Teng looked between the men in confusion. “I told you. Wants nothing to do with us all day, but when it’s time to eat, there he is.”

“Yes, because out of all three of us here, I’m definitely the mooch,” Teng shook his head. “I’m feeling better by the way.”

“Oh, were you sick?” Luke asked.

“We ran out of water during the storm. Felt a little off this morning.”

“Glad to hear you’re better. Where’s Rey?”

“She went off scavenging by herself. Insisted I stay back so I could get better. I spent the day tinkering and just went and traded out some stuff to the Blobfish. Didn’t see Rey around, so I thought she was here with you guys.”

Luke frowned, “No… but I’m sure she’s on her way.”

But she wasn’t. First one hour passed, then two, then three. Still no sign of Rey.

“Alright, I’m sure she just went home,” Luke said to the worried men. “I’ll head out to the walker and check. Teng, see if you can find is anyone knows where she scavenged today. Quom, have you got her on the comm?”

“No,” Quom answered. “It’s weird; it’s not even ringing out.”

“Okay, nobody panic,” Luke said. “I’m sure she’s fine.”

Quom and Teng exchanged a look. The easy tone and relaxed look on Luke’s face was odd for the disappearance of his daughter. Usually Luke would be a wreck at Rey missing. But they understood: Luke pretending that Teng and Quom were in a panic was a cover for the terror inside of him. If he was distracted with keeping them calm, then he too would stay calm.

“I’m sure you’re right, Luke,” Teng smiled. “Rey is going to be just fine.”

But in the uncomfortable silence that followed, the men knew they couldn’t be sure of anything.

Luke was calling out Rey’s name long before he even pulled up to the walker. His voice desperate, Luke barely stopped his speeder when he jumped out.

“Rey? Rey?” he yelled as he stumbled into the walker. “Rey, Sweetheart, are you here?”

But Rey was nowhere to be found. He checked the walker thoroughly, every limb, every hatch, every nook and cranny. He even flipped the hammock over to make sure she wasn’t hidden inside of it (after checking it first, but better safe than sorry.)

Rey wasn’t there.

That was when the fear took over.

Where was Rey? Was she safe? Was she unconscious? Dead? Why was it when he reached for her in the Force, she blocked him? It was weak enough that Luke was aware she was doing it and she was on Jakku. But why was she doing it? And why wasn’t she answering the comm?

And then Luke found the answer to the last question. When he plugged his comm into the charger, the slot he chose – which he remembered being the one Rey had used for hers during the X’us’R’iia – it didn’t light up. The port was broken, and if they hadn’t noticed, then Rey had gone out with a comm with almost no juice.

Rey’s comm had burned out.

He had no way to contact her, and no clue where to find her.

That awful wave of terror and helplessness he had experience when he once thought Rey was dead crashed over Luke. He couldn’t charge in with his lightsaber and save the day. Not this time.

His little girl was lost.

Luke fell to his knees and sobbed. Subconsciously he knew that Rey was capable and supplied to take care of herself, but that was not within his consciousness. What was was the sorrow of a father with the strength and grief enough to once tear bare metal from a dejarik board.

He couldn’t lose his little girl.

Then came the warmth on his shoulder. Luke looked up to see the blue visage of his father trying to comfort him.

“Find her,” Luke begged with tears in his eyes. “I know you can’t tell me where she is or if she’s okay, but please… go to her. She needs someone. Rey doesn’t know how to be alone.”

Anakin smiled and then he was gone.

There was a small smile on his face, but as Luke stayed kneeling and weeping in the sand, he just felt so empty.

The twin moons of Jakku were high and full when Quom checked on Teng. He had pulled a workbench outside the tent, and was seated upon it watching and waiting.

“Any word yet?” Teng asked without turning to face Quom.

“Luke senses her presence is still alive and on Jakku, he just can’t figure out where. She’ll be safe."

“You can’t promise that.”
Quom grinned, “I just did.”

Teng shook his head derisively, “I’m not in the mood for humour.”

Quom sighed and patted Teng’s leg, “Come to bed, Pup.”

“What until Rey is home.”

The Vrogem sighed again. He had no idea what to say, so he sat down next to his pup and rubbed Teng’s leg. They sat in silence for a long time, their eyes scanning and searching.

“You know the Teedos believe that a double full moon is a sign of luck,” Quom said after a while. “It lights the way home for those who are lost.”

“Will it bring her home to me?”

Quom grinned. “You know that girl will bring herself home. Probably along with a load of trouble that’s more of a headache than what she’s worth.”

“She’s worth the headache,” Teng smiled.

He chuckled, “Yeah, I guess she is… You really love this girl, don’t you?”

“More than anything in the word,” Teng fought to keep his eyes open.

“You should sleep, Pup.”

“I’m not tired,” he yawned.

Quom patted his leg again, “I know you aren’t. How about you just lay your head on my shoulder? I like it when you do that.”

“Alright,” Teng rested his head on Quom. “But only because you want it.”

“Of course. And your eyes look a little unfocused. How about you close them for a minute? Just to let them readjust to the darkness?”

“Ok… but just for a minute.”

A minute later, Teng was asleep on the Vrogem’s shoulder.

Quom chuckled and stroked his fingers through Teng’s nearly shoulder length black hair.

“Good night, My Pup. May the Force give you the sweetest of dreams.”

So, it did.

And check the chief engineer’s quarters – when I was a kid I found schematics for four different models of the New Republic Starfighter in a datapad.

-Rey’s Survival Guide
While Luke, Quom, and Teng were worrying all night about Rey, she was sleeping on her own for the first time in years. She had found a ship in the desert, and to her surprise it was in decent enough shape that she could probably fix it up. She had spent the day cataloguing everything needed for repair. When the sun started to set, she found she wasn’t done. Rey went to call her father and explain when she found her comm dead. Deciding the haul was too valuable to abandon, she decided to finish her catalogue, nip into town when she did, explain to the others what happened, and then the four of them would take turns guarding the ship.

She couldn’t wait to see the look on her father’s face when she revealed her surprise. And in order to maintain that surprise, she was trying her best to block her Signature in the Force. Admittedly it wasn’t very effective, her Dad could probably tell she was alive and still on Jakku, but she blocked him a little bit.

He was going to be so pleased with her.

To paraphrase Poe Dameron: sixteen-year-olds are idiots.

When she finally decided to admit defeat to the intoxicating power of slumber, Rey found herself a blanket and settled down in the quarters of some long dead crewman.

Up to that point, Rey had never thought about the fact that she hadn’t slept alone since her father found her when she was five. Luke had always been at her side, and when he had spent nights with Aletha, Rey had stayed with Quom. Even the nights she snuck off to sleep on the Falcon, Teng was sleeping at her side. But now, she faced the lonely darkness by herself for the first time in years, and she discovered that there was a reason she hadn’t slept alone.

Rey is small – a child – and snuggly tucked into the sheets of a miniature bed. The room around her is painted pale blue and has all the trappings of a child’s bedroom. It has miniature furniture, a bookcase stuffed with storybooks, a playful artwork print of a silly looking tauntaun hung on the wall, a toy chest filled with all sorts of fun things, and a nightlight in the shape of a blue astronomical droid casts the room in a soft azure light.

She is warm and comfortable. Her hair is splayed out and has an unfamiliar feeling to it. It’s washed, she vaguely recalls the phenomenon. Rey wears pink pyjamas patterned with kiros birds – though where she knows that word from, she has no idea.

Rey is lovingly staring at a woman who seems to radiate love for her. The woman has pale skin, long brown hair, and warm hazel eyes smiles at her from the doorway. The woman is clad in a purple cotton tank top style pyjama top, with purple and white plaid pyjama pants.

“Mommy,” the word comes to Rey.

She tries to pull back the covers and run to her mother’s arm, but she finds she can’t move, trapped by the memory of the past.

Felicity presses a button on the wall to turn off the lights and whispers, “Goodnight, Sweetheart. I love you.”

"I love you too, Mommy," Rey calls back in the darkness.

The words come unwilling from her mouth. She has so many questions for the woman who gave her life, so many proclamations of love, and pleas to stay here with her. But Rey is stuck to the script of her memory, unable to change what happens next.

Rey hears the padding of footsteps on carpet, and she soon senses her mother gone. She’s surprised to find she senses it through the Force.

“No!” Rey can finally speak. “No, Mommy, come back!”

But she still can’t move.

Sleep falls upon her; not real sleep, dream sleep. More a paralysis as she waits for a scene change or a time skip or somehow to get to the next plot point of her dream.

Her eyes are closed, but she can see. She sees the three figures enter her room; tall, wearing dark clothes, and masks.

“Look at her,” the man who stands in the middle cocks his head to the side. His voice is too sickly saccharine to contain genuine sympathy. “Sleeping so sweetly. She won’t feel a thing.”

The three men stare at her. Rey is aware of everything, yet she knows to them she’s sound asleep, safe in her knowledge that her mother is not far away. She knows her father isn’t home, but she doesn’t know where he is.

The man to the left chuckles, “Now where’s the fun in that?”

He grabs her by the ankle and she screams as he drags her onto the floor. Her head lands with a thunk and shrieking in terror, she tries to squirm to her safety. She’s screaming for Mommy and Daddy as the middle man steps on her chest. It’s not just to secure her in place, but it feels like he’s trying to crush her like a bug.

The man lights a red lightsaber and pulls it back, readying for a fatal swing.

“MOMMY!” Rey screams out desperately.

“Go ahead,” the man grins. “I want to hear you scream when I do it.”

His name suddenly comes to her: it’s Zhane Varrs. Now, who Zhane is, is a whole other question to which Rey doesn’t have the answer to.

Zhane swings down. Rey shields her face but the blow doesn’t land. Instead her bookcase smashes into Zhane.

The sound of several snap-hisses fill the room, and then comes chaos. Three figures Rey knows as people who had guided her in the Fighting Ring clash lightsabers with the masked men.

The tall man with grey eyes and parchment coloured skin clashed his blue lightsaber with Zhane. Rey suddenly knows that he is Obik Kenu.

The women she doesn’t know. The woman with ice blonde hair also wields a blue lightsaber, and the catlike one has a green one.

There’s shouting Rey doesn’t understand, and faintly comes the smell of smoke.

“Where’s Felicity?” Obik yells, but to whom, Rey doesn’t know.

The man who had stood in the middle – Rey recalls the name of Cade Ren – laughs, “Trapped in the bedroom. Luke’s whore will burn.”
Rey doesn’t know what happens next to the adults yet. A voice with a Coruscanti accent tells her to run. She finds herself crawling towards the door, crying and trying to be quiet. She reaches out to Daddy in the Force, but she doesn’t find him with her Aunt. He’s supposed to be with her Aunt. Why isn’t Daddy with her Aunt?

So she chooses to reach to her Aunt instead. Instantly she’s enveloped by a navy blue colour.

“Daddy’s coming, Rey,” her Aunt whispers in her ear somehow. She sounds worried.

Someone grabs her ankle. It’s the last man – Bakura Torven she knows. Her drags her along the floor and Rey tries to fight. She’s too weak. Too small. She can’t escape.

Rey closes her eyes in fear. A commotion sounds and when she opens her eyes again, Obik is standing over her and Bakura is lying on the ground in pain.

“It’s okay, Rey,” Obik promises. “I’ve got you. You’ll be oka-”

Zhane’s lightsaber swings through his neck.

Rey screams louder than she has ever before as Obik Kenu’s decapitated head lands next to her.

The catlike woman is on her knees next to Rey.

“Sleep and forget,” she orders.

And then Darkness takes her.

Rey woke up screaming.

No one there to comfort her, Rey screamed and flailed and hyperventilated as she fought and failed to erase the image of Obik Kenu’s decapitated head from her mind.

Then something warm wrapped around her.

“Shh, it’s okay,” the blonde man whispered. “You’re okay. I’ve got you. It’s okay, Rey, you’re safe.”

She cried but she stopped flailing. Rey savored the warmth of the paternal embrace. She didn’t need the Force to know that she trusted the man. After all, he was her blood.

“It’s okay, Rey,” he guided her to lay back down on the ship bunk. “I’m here. You’re safe. I’ve got you. I’m not going to leave you.”

She sniffed, her sobs finally under control, but tears still falling from her eyes, “Promise?”

“I swear it,” he bent down and placed his lips to her forehead. They felt warm. He lazied a hand across her hair as Rey pulled the blanket back over body. “I’m not going anywhere, Sweetheart.”

Rey let her eyes fall closed, her spirit feeling safe under this man’s protection.

“Sweet dreams, my child,” he whispered.

“Thank you,” she murmured, “Grandfather.”
Anakin Skywalker smiled as he watched over his granddaughter’s return to dreamland. As he done all those years ago when Rey slept alone in the walker, desperate for her mother and father’s return, Anakin would stay vigil at her side throughout the long night.

When Rey was sound asleep, her breathing steady and her mind busy with loving images of Teng Malar, Anakin looked up. He looked straight ahead at the other woman who is watching the scene from far beyond this planet of dust and death.

Felicity Rhiaon smiled at the sight of her grown daughter, sleeping safely in the comfort of her grandfather’s vigil.

“Thank you, Anakin,” Felicity whispered, a tear in her eye.

He gave her a smile he had passed on to his son, “Anytime.”

“I don’t understand,” Teng’s face was red and raw. They were having a silent breakfast at the workshop before they set out to another day of searching. “It’s been three days. Where is Rey?”

“You’re sure she isn’t hurt?” Quom asked for the ten thousandth time.

“I don’t know!” Luke exclaimed, throwing down his fork. “I sense her, but I can’t connect to her. There’s something blocking me. I think it’s her, but I don’t know why she would do it.”

“Well, what if it’s a trick?” Teng suggested. “Is there anything or anyone who might affect your connection with Rey?”

“No!”

Teng frowned, “What cave?”

When I was just a kid, the Blobfish bought a used flyer that he made me fix – I always could figure out how a machine fit together or why it had broken. I unclogged one of the turbojets and rebuilt the other out of scrap from the front half of an airspeeder. Then off went six of Unkar’s thugs with a hired pilot to discover the secret of Carbon Ridge and bring back its buried treasures.

Four of the thugs came back with a stack of stormtrooper armor so brittle that Unkar threw it away. The thugs had shot a handful of dead-enders and lost two of their own in ambushes, but found nothing except empty caves and rockslides. The only life-forms that gained anything were the ripper-raptors of Carbon Ridge – their bellies were full for days.

Ever since Unkar’s treasure hunt failed, sensible folks leave Carbon Ridge alone.

- Rey’s Survival Guide
“And this special Carbon Ridge cave,” Teng asked after the explanation, “what’s so special about it?”

“It’s rumoured to be an old Imperial military base,” Luke answered. “But I believe that’s not its purpose. I’ve sensed something else.”

“It’s connected to the Force?”

“Within it there’s a connection to the Dark Side. I’ve encountered this sort of thing twice before. Once on Dagobah, my Jedi Master had me go inside where I was tested with the image of myself as my mortal enemy, unaware of the secret connection between us deeper than I could have ever imagined. Master Yoda told me not to bring weapons into the cave, but I defied him and failed the test as a result.”

“What about the second time?”

“There is an old Jedi Temple on a planet called Ahch-to. Felicity and I once visited there. There is a strong Darkness underneath the island, and as Felicity was not Force Sensitive, she could not resist its power. I woke to find her sleepwalking right too it. I was able to rouse her from sleep, but it was too late. There was a blowhole within the rock that led to the entrance of another cave, this one full of mirrors. Felicity slipped on the wet rock and fell down the blowhole. I tried to caught her, but didn’t grab her hand in time. I dove after her and rescued her, but she had been in the cave for a while by the time I found her as the cave sealed after her once she entered. She didn’t like speaking of what she saw inside, but I managed to learn that it was reflections of other people within herself. Me, her brother, her mother, her friends both alive and dead, and a girl who I know now to be the future image of Rey. But also her enemies, her antagonists, the evil within.”

Luke didn’t dare name them for the safety of keeping his past hidden. But he remembered how shaken Felicity had been after seeing the reflection of Alaric Rhiaon, Anakin Skywalker, Tyla Kinall, Ben Solo, and Captain Phasma within herself.

“So, Rey would be drawn to this cave?” Teng questioned.

“Exactly,” Luke nodded. “I’ve been keeping Rey from it until she was strong enough to resist temptation. Maybe she was called to it… I- I have to go there. I have to save her.”

Quom jumped up as Luke started gathering his things, “I’m coming too.”

“Absolutely not. I am not taking you into a cave infected with the Dark Side.”

“Luke’s right,” Teng said. “We saw what you did to Toras Kern for messing with me. I don’t want to see what happens when you’re actually possessed.”

“Come on, Luke,” Quom objected. “You can’t seriously tell me that you think Teng can handle his own against the dead-enders.”

Teng frowned, “The what?”

The biggest peril of Carbon Ridge is the dead-enders. They sound like a tale from the washing tables, but I’ve seen them myself, prowling the canyons. They’re old men with white beards and crazy eyes. If you run into a dead-ender he’ll chase you out of his territory, throwing rocks and babbling nonsense strings of numbers. Fortunately, if they ever had guns they ran out of power packs a long time ago.

There’s a story in Niima that somewhere beneath Carbon Ridge the Empire had a base, and the dead-enders are still guarding it.

- Rey’s Survival Guide

Luke sighed, his bag slung over his shoulder, “Quom’s right, I can’t take you with me, Teng. You’re not strong enough yet against them, and I can’t take them alone. Quom has more fighting experience than you and better skills. Plus he’ll bite people in the throat.”

“But what about me?” Teng asked.

Luke put a hand on Teng’s shoulder, “Stay here. Keep an eye out for Rey. Someone needs to be here to give her an earful when she gets back. Please, Teng… wait for her?”

Teng smiled and patted Luke’s arm, “Till the moons are nothing but ash.”

“Good boy. Quom, let’s get going. We don’t want to be fighting the dead-enders during high noon.”

“Aye aye, Sir.” Quom smiled at his pup, “Keep your comm on, and try to think of how else we can get a hold of Rey.”

“I’ll see you soon. And don’t go crazy on Luke.”

Quom grinned, “I make no promises.”

Teng burst out laughing.

He would not be laughing that night when the pair returned.

As he watched the pair drive off, Teng sighed. He just felt so useless being left behind. Sure, he understood why he got chosen to stay back, but still, he had to do something.

In an effort to clear his mind, Teng gathered up some projects that he had completed while waiting up for Rey every night. When he joined the line to the Concession Stand, the eyes fell on him, and the whispers started. The disappearance of Luke Erso’s daughter didn’t go unnoticed.

“Girl not back yet?”

Teng was surprised to find Old Meru standing in line in front of him, “Uh, no. But Luke and Quom have got a new lead.”

“That’s too bad,” Meru said. “I’ve been needing you to come fix my water filtration system since the X’us’R’iia.”

“Can’t you get someone else?”

“You know you’re the only one I trust with that.”
“Yeah, I guess it’s the Quom Tinadar’s speeder of water filtration systems.”

“Hey, it’s not that bad!” Meru snapped.

“Yes, Ma’am,” Teng smiled lightly – his first genuine smile in days.

“Anyway,” Meru shook her head, “you tell me the moment that girl gets back. I want you in a speeder on the way to me the second she returns. I don’t care if you come to me with the girl sitting in your lap. She returns, you come to me immediately. Understood?”

Teng’s smile fell, “What if she doesn’t come back?”

Meru rolled her eyes, “Don’t be an idiot. Of course that girl’s coming back. Her sole purpose in life is to cause you trouble.”

The smile returned to his face, something oddly rousing and reassuring in her words, “I’ll be there, Meru. Promise.”

“Rey still gone?” Dirk came up to Teng when he was backing away from the window after collecting his portions. Dirk barely gave Teng the time to step out of the way before Devi and Strunk were crowding around the window.

“Oh, Rey’s missing?” Devi asked in surprise.

Teng shot her a quick glare, “None of your business.”

“Oh, come on, Teng,” Devi laughed, punching him in the arm. “You still sore about the Fighting Ring?”

Teng blinked, “… Yes.”

He grabbed Dirk’s arm and led the alien away, “Sorry about that. Yes, Rey is still missing.”

“I’m worried,” Dirk looked at the ground nervously. He played with a well-worn sand stuffed acklay in his pocket, “I don’t want anything to happen to her. She’s my friend. Who’s gonna look out for me if something happens?”

Teng patted his shoulder, “Buddy, don’t worry. I’ve got you.”

“Promise?”

“Promise. I just wish I could get in touch with Rey.”

“Can’t you try getting her on her comm?”

“We’ve tried,” Teng answered. “Her battery’s dead. None of our comms can reach hers.”

“No, not the four way ones,” Dirk shook his head. “Doesn’t she have one the goes to Doctor Aletha?”

Teng froze, “…To Aletha?”

“Yeah, I’ve seen it on her belt.”
The idea was like a bucket of ice water thrown in his face. Her comm to Aletha! Why didn’t they think of that before?

Teng grabbed his shoulders, “Dirk, you’re a genius!”

Dirk blushed, “No one’s called me a genius before.”

“Aletha,” Teng exclaimed. “I can get Aletha to talk to her. I don’t believe this… but wait, how am I going to get a hold of Aletha? I don’t have a number for the Resistance.”

“Didn’t Doctor Aletha call Quom a few months ago?”

“Would the comm station still have the number?”

“I think so. Let’s go find out.”

“Lead the way, Dirk,” Teng laughed.

He couldn’t believe it. Three days of worrying, and there had been such a simple solution the whole time!

…Except it wasn’t simple. You see, if you remember, Aletha hadn’t called Quom from her personal line or the medical office of the Resistance. She had called him from Diego’s office.

And Commander Diego Nalto, Head of Resistance Intelligence and Communications was very interested to know how and why some scavenger boy from Jakku had the number to his private office line.

Chapter End Notes

Coming Up Next Chapter…

The Cave of Darkness
Trying to get a hold of Aletha, Teng must explain to Commander Diego Nalto exactly how he got the private number to his office, while not revealing Rey’s identity in the process. Meanwhile, at the cave Luke struggles to keep Quom on his side in a battle of Darkness and Light. But when he gets too overwhelmed, the Force provides Luke with a surprising choice of aid.

Screw it, I cut this chapter in half. What happens in the cave is too epic for it not to get its own chapter.

Also, reminder that I am currently on vacation (I totally saw the Luke Skywalker hand prop and bought so much Star Wars stuff from the gift shop, so I may start quoting the cookbook and don’t you judge me,) so either there’s going to be several updates in a short period of time – which means don’t take that as the new norm – or else there’s going to be no updates for a while. Hopefully it’s the former.
The Cave of Darkness

Chapter Summary

The Force tests Luke, Aletha gets in a huge fight with Diego, and some grapes makes Paige cry.

Chapter Notes

Sorry for the wait of the update. Literally the last day of my vacation I got hit with a cold, so that dragged me down for a while.

For anyone who reads the ongoing comic entitled Star Wars, I am so sorry if this story has ruined the Luke and Wedge reunion scene in the latest issue where Wedge says he thought Luke forgot about him, Luke says he never would, and Han tells him that nothing lasts forever.

This was the wrong week for me to randomly pick up that comic.

Also the Poe Dameron comic has a piece of artwork that is an exact image from an upcoming scene between Aletha and Diego. Literally it’s so identical that when that scene plays out, I’m probably going to put in the image into the AO3 version.

And apparently BB-8 has a droid girlfriend named Iveye that is Jessika’s astro droid, and he’s as terrible as Poe with the whole separation of romance and the workplace. The two of them won’t stop talking to each other during the battle, and Poe scolds BB-8 for it.

WHERE DO YOU THINK HE PICKED IT UP, DAMERON?

(I like this too much, and I’m stealing it, ignoring the fact Iveye gets killed off. Fuck you, BB-8’s girlfriend will live.)

Final note, I’m going to start pulling quotes from Bomber Command by Jason Fry, but note that they will be referred to by the book’s subtitle of The Journal of Paige Tico.

Trigger warning: this chapter contains scenes of graphic violence and minor gore. Nothing too much on the end of gore, but it does include a brief moment where a character vomits blood.

See the end of the chapter for more notes.

The Long Way Home
Chapter Forty-Seven
The Cave of Darkness

The Graveyard is where most of the ships came down, but not all of them. You’ll find wrecked fighters in Kelvin Ridge, blown-apart engine nacelles littering Carbon Ridge, and bits of metal and trash from one end of the Goazon to the other. Ships came down everywhere on Jakku, including places people have never thought to look.

-Rey’s Survival Guide

To be honest, Luke and Quom made very quick work of the Dead-Enders. A few swings of a lightsaber and a few bites on the neck – obviously from Quom as if Luke tried it it would be weird and surprisingly ineffective – and the pair easily dispatched them.

“I love being friends with a Jedi,” Quom grinned, wiping the blood from his mouth.

Luke grimaced as a Dead-Ender groaned at his feet. Truth be told, he was scared to have a Vrogem for a friend sometimes.

“Alright, you stay here,” Luke ordered. “I’m to go in alone. If I need you, I’ll yell for you, but I don’t want you close to the Darkness. I have no idea what’s in this cave and I don’t want to worry about controlling you.”

“You make me sound like an untamed animal.”

“You are an untamed animal.”

“Fair point.” Quom sighed, “I’m just worried. I don’t like you going in alone.”

“I don’t like it either, but I like it better than worrying about a possessed Vrogem,” Luke said. “I’ve been in these sorts of situations before. I need to go in alone… and I need to be weaponless.”

Quom’s eyes widened as Luke unclipped his lightsaber from his belt and presented it to him.

“Are you serious?” Quom asked.

“I trust you. Besides, kyber crystals regulate your energy. Maybe this will help. Please, take it.”

“What if you need it?”

“Then I’ll summon it.”

“Can you summon things that far?”

“To be honest, Quom, I could probably summon Teng to us here with the Force.”

Quom raised an eyebrow.
“We’re not using the Force to physically summon Rey to my hand,” Luke snapped.

“You have to admit, it is a good idea.”

Quom smiled and then placed a hand on Luke’s shoulder, “Hey, you be safe.”

“You too,” Luke smiled back and passed his saber into Quom’s furry paw. “And promise me one thing.”

“What’s that?”

“Don’t follow after me. Only come if I call.”

Quom took a deep breath and nodded, “Alright.”

“Also, don’t take apart my lightsaber.”

“Damn it!”

Luke chuckled, and then patted Quom on the shoulder, “Be safe, my friend.”

“You too.”

Luke turned to the cave, took a deep breath, righted his shoulders, and then entered.

Quom sighed, clutching Luke’s lightsaber tightly. He knew his friend would be okay, but he just wished he wasn’t such a bother to Luke. Quom wanted to protect his friend, and Luke was genuinely afraid that he could hurt him.

It was even more painful to know in his heart that he would hurt Luke.

Taking a deep breath, Quom walked back towards the speeder, getting the idea to call Teng and update him on the situation.

“Quom.”

The Vrogem froze. That voice. So familiar, so beloved, but it couldn’t possibly be.

Could it?

Slowly he turned back to the cave. Standing in the entrance was a creature like him, but smaller, leaner, with two tails, and reddish-brown fur. Most importantly, she had the same toothy and slightly frightening smile that he himself bore.

“Mom?” Quom frowned.

His mother smiled, and with one furry, clawed finger beckoned him forward. Quom’s promise to Luke was wiped blank from his mind, and indeed most else along with it. If you had asked him how Teng was doing, he would ask who that was.

With a mind as empty as a non-sentient creature, Quom followed his mother into the cave.
I told you how one of Fossil’s first lessons was the importance of flying in formation, so each bomber can rely on the ones around it. Well, the Resistance is like that. It’s made up of overlapping groups that support each other and depend on each other.

Something I’m still getting used to is that I don’t know very much about our overall capabilities – only our top leaders do. That’s for a good reason, too. We’d be in a lot of trouble if the First Order could discover everything about the Resistance’s capabilities by capturing one bomber crew.

- The Journal of Paige Tico

Diego Nalto rubbed the bridge of his nose, “Alright, let’s start this again from the beginning. Who are you?”

“Teng Malar,” the boy in the Holo answered nervously.

“Malar. Nubian, right?”

“Right, but I wasn’t born on Naboo. Just my parents. Ronhar and Saché Malar.”

“Saché?” Diego asked. “Any relation to Queen Amidala’s handmaiden?”

“No, Sir,” Teng answered. “Just a common name.”

“I see. So, where were you born?”

“Berryl.”

“But you live on Jakku?”

“Yeah, it’s uh… complicated. Long story short, parents got involved with a cult during the war, then afterwards they escaped, but got killed, I ended up with pirates, then they abandoned me on Jakku where I’ve been living for the last six years.”

Diego just blinked.

“Also, I’m sorted of legally owned by a Vrogem,” Teng added as if it would explain anything.

“I meet the oddest people,” Diego shook his head. He sighed, “Alright, Teng Malar from Berryl who is owned by a Vrogem, how exactly is it you know Doctor Aletha Kymeri?”

“She’s a friend.”

“A friend who wouldn’t bother to give you her personal line?”

“Uh… No, Sir. She decided no contact was the best way to keep us safe from her sister.”

“And yet, she has contact? A personal line between herself and this… Kira?” Diego was aware of Kira’s communications with Aletha, but he hadn’t known any specifics.

“Yes, Sir,” Teng said. “I’m surprised she didn’t tell you herself considering your… relationship.”

Diego raised an eyebrow. He looked very imposing seated at his desk, hands folded, and eyes narrowed at the small blue image of a scavenger on his desk.
“Who said she hasn’t?” Diego sighed, “I suppose your knowledge of my personal relationship with Doctor Kymeri is proof enough that you are acquainted and in contact with her. However, that is neither here nor there. If I deem there to be a violation, I shall recuse myself from this situation. I will call for her shortly, but before I do so, I would like to know why you have chosen to contact her?”

“My girlfriend, Kira has gone missing, and Aletha has an encrypted, two-way, single channel comm, the matching one being owned by Kira. I was hoping that Aletha could get a hold of Kira and see if she’s okay.”

“Wait,” Diego’s eyes widened slightly, “Aletha has an encrypted, two-way, single channel comm?”

Immediately Diego’s hand hit his security comm.

“I need a member of the High Council who is free to immediately come to my office. I must recuse myself, and as General Organa is away currently on Hosnian Prime with her husband, I need someone else to step in and mediate. We have a possible security violation among members of our staff. I also need an impartial representative from Communications – not Lieutenant Connix. On the security front, I require the following individuals to be picked up discreetly. If they ask why, tell them there’s a minor comm issue that needs to be sorted out. Please pick up Doctor Aletha Kymeri, Lieutenant Kaydel Ko Connix, Commander Poe Dameron, and the droid BB-8,” Diego recalled who had been in his office with Aletha. He looked to Teng, “Does anyone else know about this comm?”

Teng hesitated.

“Speak up, Son,” Diego ordered. “There’s going to be more trouble for them if you lie to me.”

“Three other girls. The Tico sisters, and a pilot called Jessika, whose last name I think starts with a Peth?”

“Jessika Pava?”

“That’s the one.”

Diego went back to his security comm, “Please also pick up Jessika Pava, Rose Tico, and Paige Tico.”

It took about twenty minutes for the very confused group to gather. Statura arrived to fill the role of Command, and the droid Peazy was the Communications representative. Diego refused to answer questions until everyone arrived, though he did pull Peazy and Statura aside to brief them while they waited.

Aletha had been finishing up with a patient, so she was the last one to arrive. She was still in scrubs with her hair tied back, a face mask hanging around her neck, and pulling off a pair of latex gloves. She was in the middle of an apology for tardiness when she stopped dead at the sight of Teng.

“Teng?” Aletha frowned. She looked around the room in fear and confusion. The group was too suspicious for it to be coincidence. Though she knew the answer, she still asked, “What’s going on?”

“I’m afraid we have a bit of a situation.” Diego gestured to the empty desk chair opposite his, “Please have a seat, Doctor Kymeri.”

Aletha said nothing, just bowed her head and quickly obeyed.

Statura moved to take his place in Diego’s chair, but Diego did not get up. He knew better than to lead the meeting himself, but he was still Second-In-Command of the Resistance and he would use what power he could to help Aletha. He wouldn’t stop her from being punished for wrongdoings, but if she was going to go down, he was going to make sure it was for a good reason.

Statura looked down at Diego, and when the Commander just looked up at him, face unchanging and body unmoving, Statura elected not to press the issue.

“Alright,” Statura cleared his throat, “let’s just cut to the chase: Doctor Kymeri, do you possess an encrypted, two-way, single channel comm?”

Aletha felt the various fearful eyes press on her, “Yes. Yes, I do. My late husband and I had a set during the Rebellion, and I have kept them so I may communicate with my ex-boyfriend’s daughter. Kira has no other female figure in her life, and I’ve acted as a second mother to her. When I left Jakku, I thought it important to continue this relationship. I have since brought these young ladies into the fold to communicate with her as Kira does not have anyone female her age to talk to. We simply engage in girl talk. Fashion, makeup, romantic relationships, how to put a hyperdrive together. Girl talk.”

Diego lifted an eyebrow at the last entry.

“Frankly, I do not understand why Commander Dameron is here,” Aletha gestured to Poe. “True, he is aware of Kira and the comm, but he’s only exchanged two or three sentences with her. Frankly, his droid has had longer conversations with Kira.”

“Where is BB-8?” Statura asked.

“He’s in the middle of an oil change,” Poe explained. “My apologies. He’ll be along shortly, but is it really necessary? BB-8 has anti-espionage measures installed into him by C-3PO himself, and I have been purposely kept in the dark as to what they are or how to undo them in case I prove to be a spy. Which, for the record, I categorically deny being.”

“We might need him later,” Statura answered. “Depending on how this goes, we may need to order a memory wipe for him.”

“What?” Poe exclaimed. “No! You can’t!”

Kaydel grabbed his arm, “Calm down, Poe. It’ll be okay.”

“But Kaydel-”

“Relax.”

Poe sighed and conceded defeat. They hadn’t ordered anything yet, so Kaydel was right. No point in hostility right now, but he’d give them one hell of a fight if they tried to touch his little buddy.

“Commander Dameron is here because he was involved with a transmission you made to Jakku from this office a few months ago,” Diego explained.

Aletha frowned, “You gave me permission to use your office.”

“We’ll get to that in a moment,” Statura said. He pointed to the still waiting Holo of Teng on the desk, “I would like you to tell me who this young man is.”

Aletha’s eyes met Teng’s, and then she sighed. Even star systems away, her Jakku boys were still giving her problems.
“This is Teng Malar,” Aletha answered. “He’s a scavenger on Jakku and Kira’s boyfriend.”

Rose leaned in to Paige and whispered, “Hey, Kira was right. He is cute.”

Paige shrugged, “I guess if you like long hair and the sort of rugged look.”

“Dang,” Jessika muttered. “There goes my he’s only attractive to Kira because he’s the only one around theory.”

The Tico sisters stared at her.

Jessika rolled her eyes, “I’m gay. Not blind.”

Kaydel smirked and leaned in, “Cute or not, my boyfriend is still the hottest.”

“Thanks, Babe,” Poe grinned.

“I really disagree,” Paige added.

Rose sighed, “I need to find a boyfriend.”

“Your self-worth is not predicated on your relationship status, Rose,” Jessika reminded.

Diego and Statura exchanged a truly dumbfounded look.

“Excuse me!” Diego said loudly. “Do you lot not realize you are currently in the middle of an official proceeding to determine if you breeched security protocols and committed treason? This is an expulsion level offence!”

The group gave very muted responses with much muttering and the lowering of heads.

“Thank you,” Diego shook his head. “Doctor Kymeri you may continue.”

“Of course, Commander Nalto,” Aletha said, equally amazed by the young adults and yet not surprised. “As far as I know, Mister Malar is in the charge of my friend, Quom Tinadar. I helped Quom raise him – also with help from my ex-boyfriend – since Teng was something like thirteen when he came into Quom’s charge? I can’t remember the exact age at the moment. But Teng Malar is probably the second most good and non-troublemaking kid I’ve ever met.”

Diego arched an eyebrow, “Second? Who’s first?”

Aletha shrugged, “Rose.”

Rose sighed, “Thanks for that.”

Poe chuckled, “Oh, don’t be so down. I think it’s a fun label.”

“Poe?”

“Yeah?”

“Shower.”

“Shutting up,” Poe’s face reddened and everyone else looked confused.

Rose grinned. Oh, she was going to have fun with this.
“Alright, Teng Malar,” Statura pushed them back on topic. “And what security clearance does Mister Malar have?”

Aletha frowned, “None.”

“Then do you want to explain to me how he got this number? One of the highest priority and secured numbers in this organization?”

She looked at the Holo, “Frankly… I have no idea.”

“Really?” Statura looked around the room, “Anyone else want to wager a guess?”

Everyone was silent.

Then Kaydel slowly raised her hand.

“Yes, Connix?”

“Aleth- uh, Doctor Kymeri was given permission to use this line a few months ago to contact Jakku,” Kaydel explained. “But Poe-I mean, Commander Dameron and I were trying to stop her for personal reasons, and in her distraction, she didn’t encrypt the line properly. As a result, the comm station of Niima Outpost has a catalogued record of the line, enabling any scavenger to use it, as Mister Malar has.”

Stature looked impressed, “Wow. No wonder Nalto and Brance speak so highly of you. That was exactly right.”

“Connix is my best in the Department,” Diego smiled. He glanced at Peazy, “Uh… non-programmed operative. No offense, Peazy.”

“None taken, Commander Nalto,” the droid answered. “Droids are incapable of taking offense.”

“Someone tell that to Threepio,” Poe muttered.

“Admiral Stature, I am truly sorry,” Aletha bowed her head. “You are correct, I was negligent, and I will take my punishment for that. But I fail to see what this has to do with the young adults you’ve gathered here with me.”

“Which brings us back to your comm,” Statura said. “All of you present were aware of this comm?”

Various affirmations filled the room.

“Alright,” Statura sighed. “Doctor Kymeri are you aware that encrypted, two-way, single channel comms are forbidden in the Resistance?”

Aletha frowned, “I don’t recall it in the rules, and trust me, I looked.”

Diego brought the passage up on his work tablet and passed it to Aletha.

“Oh,” she said. “So it is.”

“Wait a second,” Poe interrupted. “No, they aren’t! My father and I have a set and we’re just fine.”

“They’re talking about unregistered ones,” Kaydel explained. “The ones you two own have had all the proper paperwork filed."

“Well, can’t she just register it?” Paige asked.

“Of course she can,” Statura answered, “but the question is why hasn’t she already? We need to determine that answer and if it means we need to consider a major punishment.”

Jessika narrowed her eyes, “Why are you guys doing this?”

Diego sighed, “We need to make sure violations of the code of conduct are dealt with appropriately in respect to the magnitude of the offen-”

“No,” Jessika snapped, daring to raise her voice to members of the High Council. “Why are you guys doing this? You’ve dealt with contraband before; it’s not a big deal. A scolding, a slap on the wrist, maybe confiscation… Why are you making this into a big deal?”

And then it clicked for Kaydel.

“You’re doing this because of our family,” she said.

Diego and Statura shared an awkward look.

“You have to admit, there are concerns considering your family background,” Statura admitted.

“What, because they’re related to Phasma?” Poe exclaimed. “Trust me, these two have absolutely nothing to do with that monster.”

Diego held up his hand, “It’s not Phasma we’re concerned with.”

“Doctor Kymeri and Lieutenant Connix have well documented evidence of their violent estrangement to Captain Phasma,” Peazy informed. “Communications with her are unlikely and not of a concern. It is Timor Connix we inquire about.”

Poe frowned and looked at Kaydel, “Your father?”

Kaydel bit her lip, eyes darting away from Poe.

“Doctor Kymeri, when was the last time you were in touch with Timor Connix?” Statura asked.

“Timor?” Aletha blinked. “I haven’t seen or spoken to him since I was… nineteen. Kaydel’s forty-year-old brother could fit in my lap back then. Why?”

“Would you say you’re close with Timor?”

“Absolutely not.”

“What is your honest opinion of Timor Connix?”

Aletha sighed and glanced at Kaydel, “I’m sorry, Darling, but Timor Connix is an idiot and a freeloader. He ran Adrinna into the ground making her work three jobs while he tried to make his big break inventing useless junk. He’ll never amount to anything.”

“Actually, he’s amounted to being one of the richest men on Mallarex,” Kaydel said quietly.

All eyes fell on her, most in surprise, but none more so than Poe Dameron.
“I’m sorry, Babe, did you just say your dad is rich?” Poe chuckled nervously. “Like, you grew up rich? You’re a rich girl? And now you’re dating a farm boy?”

“Oh my god, can you two not do this classist am I – a poor farm boy – be good enough for the rich city girl crap right now?” Jessika exclaimed. “You’re not even a real farm boy!”

“Well, I wouldn’t have phrased it as such,” Diego said mildly, “but I agree. Could you two save that conversation for later?”

“Sure,” Poe grinned stiffly. “Guess I gotta get used to saving up things.”

“Please, Poe, stop it,” Kaydel groaned. “I’m not a trust fund girl any more than you actually are a farm boy. You’re a pilot and I’m a Communications officer. End of story. That’s what happens when you get disowned. Besides, you know my mother had no intention of spoiling me growing up. I wasn’t living the high life.”

“Lieutenant Connix,” Diego warned. “Enough. Save that for your personal time.”

“I’m sorry,” Aletha interrupted, “can someone explain to me how Timor Connix actually did something with his life?”

Kaydel sighed, “He invented something called a bartering ram cannon.”

“A what?” Poe asked.

She blinked, “What part of that phrase was confusing? It’s a cannon that knocks down doors. Using his connection to Aunt Alecta, he sold a bunch of them to the Empire and formed Connix Industries, one of the galaxy’s leading weapons manufacturers. They’ve since expanded into other weapons, and now they are the First Order’s top supplier of weapons… because my father is terrified of my aunt. And rightfully so. The reason I even met her was because one time he refused to sell a new shipment to the First Order after the whole Burning of Rornian fiasco. A few threats and reminders that we blame the Skywalker family for killing my Aunt Athena, and things were back on track.”

Paige just stared at Kaydel, “I can’t believe your dad is a weapons manufacturer.”

“Oh, it’s not just Dad,” Kaydel said, “it’s a family business. Mom runs the books, Katha’s head of research and marketing. Her kids are interns in various departments. Keth is a freelance safeties and compliance tester and regulator who sometimes picks up jobs to try out the new weapons. Heck, even Deek and Dacken have jobs waiting for them when they get out.”

“Get out?” Diego asked.

“Deek’s in prison. Dacken’s in rehab,” Kaydel shrugged. “Both got into spice hardcore a few years back. Mom was pissed.”

Everyone just stared at her.

“Your family scares me,” Rose said.

“Why do you think I got out?” Kaydel simply offered. “Aunt Ally was the smart one. I’d take decades on Jakku over the drama of the Anthea family any day.”

Poe noticed how she nervously stroked her hair.

He wondered how soon the monsters who set her hair on fire would get their freedom?
“Um…” Teng’s voice came from the Holo, reminding everyone he was still there. “Do I still need to be here? It’s costing me quite a bit to make the call.”

“You can hang up,” Diego said. “I’ll pass the message to Aletha.”

“Alright,” Teng looked over at Aletha. “Bye, Doctor Kymeri. It was nice seeing you again. I hope we talk soon.”

“Me too,” Aletha smiled. “Take care of the boys, and Kira will take care of you. Oh, and don’t forget to watch out for steelpeckers.”

“I will, I promise,” Teng laughed.

Then he flicked away.

“Alright,” Statura said, “if we can all remember where we were… Which I don’t think I do-”

“You were asking about Kaydel’s dad,” Rose supplied.

“Thank you. So, Doctor Kymeri, have you made any contact with the First Order or Connix Industries?”

“Absolutely not,” Aletha declared. “I didn’t even know about any of this before today.”

“So the reason you were keeping an unregistered and secret comm was not for any espionage reasons?” Statura asked.

“Absolutely not.”

“Is it technically a secret comm if,” Rose counted the people in the room not including Statura and Peazy, but added BB-8 for good measure, “at least eight people were aware of it?”

“That is logical,” Peazy said.

“The fact remains it is unregistered,” Statura pointed out.

“Doctor Kymeri, would you be willing to submit your comm for inspection so we may confirm that your calls have only been placed to Jakku?” Diego asked.

Something churned in Aletha’s stomach, “What would that entail?”

“Checking the call log and contacting Kira to verify she has no First Order connections,” Statura answered.

“Absolutely not.”

Diego blinked, “I’m sorry, what?”

“You are not calling Kira,” Aletha crossed her arms. “I won’t allow it.”

Statura and Diego exchanged a look.

“You… won’t allow it?” Diego repeated.

“Doctor Kymeri,” Statura said kindly, “you are aware that your refusal is highly suspicious, and could even be reason for us to believe that this Kira is indeed some sort of First Order operative?”
Might I also remind you that we are a government authority. Your refusal to cooperate in this investigation could result in an arrest for obstruction of justice.”

“Then arrest me.”

Diego genuinely couldn’t believe what he was hearing, “You are willing to be arrested, even imprisoned for this girl?”

“I will die for her,” Aletha said firmly. “I have raised this girl since she was a sad, sunburnt, little girl, mourning the death of her mother. My past relationship with her father aside, Kira is the closest thing I have to a daughter, and I will protect her as one.”

Statura looked at Diego, “Commander Nalto, a word?”

They went to the corner of the room as Peazy tried further attempts to convince Aletha to talk.

“I don’t want to arrest her,” Statura said. “The message that would send, that we turn on Rebel veterans, it’s horrible publicity. We can’t face any more of that, not after the past few years with Wedge Antilles’ death, your maiming, and the actions of General Organa’s son… I think we need to call in the General for this.”

“Please, give me a few minutes,” Diego begged. “I think I can work something out.”

“Nalto, you are dating this woman. You shouldn’t even be in the room anymore.”

“I know, but I’m not going to just stand aside and let her be arrested. Statura, please. Give me a few minutes, and if I can’t get her to talk I’ll leave the room… and we can pass this off to Amilyn.”

Statura’s eye widened, “Holdo over Leia?”

“Leia gets so little time with Han. Let’s let them be. She needs it.”

“Alright, but I’m only doing this because you’re willing to defer the issue to the High Council officer you hate the most, thus proving to me how serious you are about the issue.”

“That’s all I ask.” Diego clapped Statura on the shoulder and they rejoined the group. “Alright, let’s calm down, everyone. Shall we? Doctor Kymeri, we don’t need to arrest anyone. We just want a civil conversation.”

“You’re not having one with Kira,” Aletha refused.

“Then… we’ll speak with the rest of you gathered,” Diego looked around the room. “I want to know every single word Kira has ever spoken to you young ladies… and Commander Dameron. Perhaps we can determine things from there.”

Everyone exchanged a series of looks. Words of a promise to stick together and protect Kira buzzed in their minds.

“No,” Jessika said firmly.

“No?” Diego exclaimed. “Come on! Don’t make me arrest all of you! You know what happens if you don’t cooperate? You lose your ranks and go to jail.”

“If giving up our right to privacy is the cost of keeping my title of Commander and Head of Air Force,” Poe said slowly, “then by all means, take it from me.”
Diego groaned and rubbed the bridge of his nose, “Alright, how about this? You stop cooperating and I bring in Holdo.”

Poe grinned at Kaydel, “I think I’ll need to stretch first. Thighs have been cramping up this morning.”

“Oh for the love of…” Jessika shook her head.

“There has to be another compromise,” Paige said. “One that doesn’t put Kira at risk and makes those two do unspeakable acts on my bed even though Dameron has his own room.”

“What risk?” Statura asked, ignoring the last part.

“The reason we won’t talk to you,” Aletha answered. “Kira and her father are in hiding from the First Order itself. Her father does not want her in contact with the Resistance in an official capacity for fear of revealing themselves to the First Order, however accidentally.”

“Alright, since they are hiding from the First Order, I think we can use this to dismiss the whole issue.” Statura amended, “Though, not without appropriate punishments. I just need for the official record the reason why they are in hiding. Once we verify that, we’re all good. Okay?”

“Well…” Aletha nervously glanced at Kaydel.

Diego’s face darkened, “What?”

“We don’t know the reason they’re in hiding.”

Statura exclaimed, “Oh for the love of-”

Even Peazy started looking like she was annoyed.

“So let me get this straight,” Diego said, his voice increasing in volume with every word, “you’re all willing to go to prison to protect a girl you’ve never even met because you’re protecting her from the First Order and none of you even know why?”

“No,” said Aletha.

“Nope,” said Kaydel.

“Na uh,” said Jessika.

“Not a clue,” said Poe.

“Sorry,” said Paige.

Rose was oddly quiet.

Diego smiled, “Miss Rose Tico… care to add something?”

Rose’s eyes widened, “What?”

“You didn’t say no.”

“Oh, I uh… no. No clue whatsoever. I- I- I don’t know anything about why they are hiding or why the First Order would want to capture them. Not a single solitary clue.”
Diego looked at Paige, “Is she just awkward or truly that terrible at lying?”

Paige sighed, “Both.”

“Rose, you know why Kira’s on Jakku?” Poe asked.

“No!” Rose exclaimed. Buckling under the weight of the eyes on her, Rose sighed, “Alright… maybe a little. Kira might have mentioned a juicy not so little tidbit the other day.”

“Unbelievable,” Aletha shook her head. “They tell you, they tell Quom. But the woman who once shot someone in the knee to save her life? Nothing.”

“Sorry, it was a heat of the moment thing,” Rose said. “She buttered me all up. Said I was her best friend! I was so excited!”

“Wait, she calls you her best friend?” Kaydel sulked a little, “I thought I was.”

“What does it matter?” Paige pointed out, “It’s not like she’s your best friend. I am.”

Poe frowned, “I thought I was your best friend.”

“Once again,” Diego shouted, “treason investigation. Treat it as such. Now, Rose, you know why Kira is hiding from the First Order?”

“Uh huh.” Rose grinned, “It’s a really good reason.”

“Alright… what is it?”

“…I’m afraid I can’t tell you.”

Diego’s face dropped, “What? Why?”

“I promised I wouldn’t.”

He looked like he was ready to throw someone out of a window, “I promised- Rose, please I am trying to make things better all around. I need you to tell me why this Kira is so important.”

“I can’t. Her dad’s right, if this gets out, she’s in a lot of trouble. I won’t do it.”

Statura looked over at the quickly reddening face of Diego, “Should I call Holdo?”

“No!” Diego exclaimed. “One more idea, then we turn it over to her. Miss Rose Tico… are you willing to tell the reason if it was to one person and completely off the record, they then would vouch for the secret on your behalf and not tell anyone? Does that sound acceptable?”

Rose thought about it, “Yes.”

“Alright. Then let’s empty the room, and you can tell me-”

“Oh, I’m not telling you. Sorry, I can’t be confident you would keep this to yourself.”

Diego was definitely ready to throw someone out a window.

“What about another member of the High Council?” Statura asked. “All of them have been thoroughly vetted and we trust their word. If a member of the High Council vouches for you, we’ll settle the matter.”
“Okay, but who is on the High Council?”

“Here’s a list,” Diego’s hand was shaking so hard he dropped his datapad on the floor as he handed it to her.

Rose avoided his eye as she picked it up. She knew the shaking wasn’t just from his injury.

“Pick anyone off that list,” Statura said calmly. “Except for Dameron. He doesn’t count this time.”

Poe frowned, “Why not? Can’t I vouch for this not being a conspiracy?”

“Not when you’re under investigation for participating in said conspiracy.”

Rose scanned the list, weighing her options for a long time. Finally she settled on the one name she knew she could trust to keep the secret of a Jedi’s survival.

The Jedi Doctor herself.

“Doctor Kalonia,” Rose declared. “I want to talk to Doctor Kalonia.”

Diego and Statura exchanged a look. Really? Of all the military figures, Rose picked the Head of Medical?

“I’ll take her,” Statura said. “You look like you need a breather, Command Nalto.”

“Or maybe a good stiff drink,” Poe muttered.

“But Miss Tico, I need your word,” Statura said. “I need you to promise that you will tell Doctor Kalonia the reason this Kira is hiding from the First Order.”

“I promise,” Rey vowed.

“Then please,” Diego gestured to the door, “march!”

But I don’t think there was a base. Why would the Empire have thought twice about this place?

- Rey’s Survival Guide

The cave felt cold; cold just as the ones on Dagobah and Ahch-to had been. Luke’s senses were abuzz, but he was older and wiser. He knew to stay calm and alert, ready for any challenge the Force would throw at him, Light Side or Dark. He did not call out for Rey, sensing this was not a place for that sort of thing.

There was nothing for a very long time, just a corridor of sand and rock. Then the symbols appeared; strange carvings on the walls growing more numerous the deeper he went. Luke realized he had seen them before. One of the ancient Jedi texts on Ahch-to had been written in them. Felicity had picked up the book and immediately dropped it. When Luke scolded her for mishandling the artifact, she told him with wide unseeing eyes that that one was evil. She immediately exited the tree library and threw up. As one not strong with the Force, the Darkness of Ahch-to had been easily able to manipulate her. It was one of the reasons they had not stayed on Ahch-to longer than a day – the other being that the Caretakers did not take too kindly to Luke and Felicity banging in the sacred village they were trying to upkeep.

That had been such an awkward wake up call.

Moving deeper into the cave, Luke fell something strong and Dark calling to him. It concerned him however, that he could not sense Rey.

And then he came upon it: a giant circular clearing. Symbols covered every inch of the cave walls and it sounded like the images were whispering words he didn’t understand.

Most concerning of all: there were no exits. Indeed, Luke looked back the way he came and found the corridor no longer existed.

“Well, no wonder Rey hasn’t gotten home yet,” Luke mused as he tried to spot a way out.

There were two things within the clearing: a giant circle carved into the rock floor with more symbols etched inside, and an enormous glowing Force Sensitive tree exactly like the ones he and Shara Bey had rescued from the Empire.

The tree had bright white, almost translucent leaves. Seeing nowhere else to go, Luke stepped forward the examine the tree. His foot landed right in the middle of the circle.

Something distant crashed like rock hitting rock. Suddenly, invisible yet distinctly present snaky arm reached out for him. Luke couldn’t fight it; it entered his body with an intake of breath. It filled his lungs, slinked through his body, and then bore into his brain.

Luke wanted to cry out, but he couldn’t. He felt it picking through his mind, sifting through his memories. Words of the past whispered in his ear and his mind’s eye flashed faces of those living and dead, but all loved by Luke Skywalker. The leaves of the tree began flashing different colours, cycling through until they each settled on the familiar but unique colour.

---

Taupe

---

Onyx Black

“I’m not going to give up on Ben,” came Lando Calrissian. It had been nearly a month since Alyla’s death, and Luke had opened his home to Lando for whenever he wanted to come see her grave. They were sitting in the living room, talking over a couple cups of hot chocolate. “If anyone can understand his situation, it’s me. He did something terrible, and what he needs most right now is a friend. And before you say anything, I’m not doing this because I think it’s what Alyla would have wanted. It is for sure, but I’m doing it because it’s what I want to do. I know that kid, I love him, and I want to help him. Everyone can change, Luke… it’s a lesson you’ve taught us all.”
Aletha Kymeri smiled up at Luke, “I thought if I found Antar, I could move on… but I realize that I don't need a sign. I don't need to bury his body… I just need you.”

Biggs Darklighter stood before him proudly in a Rebellion pilot jumpsuit, “It will be like old times, Luke. They’ll never stop us.”

“I’m proud of both of you,” Diego Nalto told Luke on his wedding day. “Fliss holds a special place in my heart, and I’m so incredibly happy she found someone has good for her as you. You are a man I am honored to call my Commander and my friend… Even if you nearly destroyed my X-Wing during the war.”

“I promise you that I will take care of her, Sir,” Teng Malar vowed to Luke privately not long after he had begun to date Rey. “She is literally the most important thing in my life, and the respect I have for you is unfathomable. You’re my idol, Mister Erso, and if I can love and take care of Rey the way you’ve loved and taken care of Rey, Quom, Aletha, and myself over these past several years, I know I’ll be good man.”

“I’m scared of him,” Ben Solo confessed one night shortly after moving to Rornian. Felicity was away for treatment and Rey was asleep. Luke had found Ben in a turmoil of nightmares and Snoke’s control, “I don’t know how to be strong like you… like grandfather. More than anything I want to be a Jedi like my grandfather before me… but I’m scared that I’m too weak and now with Rey around… I’m scared you’ll give up on me.”

“You came back,” Leia Organa hugged her brother tightly as the Ewoks and Rebels celebrated around them. “I knew you would come back… You always do.”
Anakin Skywalker’s face looked so pale and fragile as blasts sounded in the distance, “Luke. You were right. You were right about me. Tell your sister... you were right.”

Tyla Kinall stared into the fire with shining eyes, “Do you really think I could ever be more than what they made me? Do you think I could really be… good?”

“I understand the risks of this position, Master Skywalker,” Meredyth Kalonia smiled across the desk, “but I promise you that no matter what insanity the Force decides to throw at us, I’ll stand firm. You have my loyalty and my trust, Luke, and that’s a promise for life.”

“Don’t be afraid, Luke,” Obik Kenu said as he helped Luke load his X-Wing for that fateful month-long meeting on Hosnian Prime. “Reine and I will protect your Rey, even to our last breath.”

“It’s one thing to fight for the sake of our children and our families,” Kes Dameron told Luke once as they had discussed the reason Shara had given her life. “But that can’t be the only reason. If we fight simply for the selfish desire to protect our own, and not be willing to fight for the freedom and safety of even the people we despise, nothing will ever change. The only way we’ll ever win this fight is to do it to make the world a better place… not just our individual worlds.”

Beru Lars crouched down next to her nephew as he sat in the garage, despairing over yet another setback by his uncle from leaving Tatooine, “Your uncle means well, Luke… but he still has much to learn. I know who you are, and I know what you’re meant to truly be. You are not your uncle, or your father, or anyone they tell you to be. You are Luke Skywalker… and that’s all you ever need to be.”
“So, this is how it begins,” Reine Agim sighed as she and Luke sat in his office after the exodus of Cade Ren and his lackeys. “It’s no surprise, not with the in-fighting we’ve had for years… but I’m scared, Luke. If this is how it begins… how will it end?”

Deep Violet

“I love her,” Gavyn Kene said. “I know I should never have fallen for her, and for years I fought it. But Zena… Zena was my destiny and I’m not ashamed of it. So, don’t let anyone make you ashamed of loving Felicity. The First Order may hate it, Snoke may hate it, Cade Ren and his goons may hate it, but screw anyone who stands in your way. Trust me, there is evil in this world… and the love you two share is not a part of it.”

Lilac

Rey Rhiaon Skywalker smiled up at him a small spinebarrel flower growing out of the walker, "Whether big or small, life finds a way on Jakku, Daddy. We'll find a way. I promise."

Mulberry

“Obi-Wan?” Padmé Amidala whispered her dying breath. “There’s good in him. I know… I know there’s… still…”

Bright Orange

Poe Dameron laid mangled in a hospital bed surrounded by his father, Luke, Diego Nalto, Wedge Antilles, Leia Organa, and Felicity Rhiaon, “I only did it because I wanted to be a hero and make the world better… Like all of you… and like my mom.”

Pomegranate

“Any resistance will be met with proper force.”

The Holo image of Shara Bey stared up at Captain Phasma with nothing but strength in her eyes, “And any force will be met with proper resistance.”

Teal

“There is evil in this world,” Alyla Kene told Luke her eyes shining, “and the only way we can defeat it is with love and forgiveness. It’s how you saved Vader and it’s how we’ll save Ben.”

“Rowr roar grw rwl!” Chewbacca roared out such poignant words Luke could never forget.

Han Solo considered his next words as he hugged Luke tightly, "You might not have family anymore, Kid, but I promise… You got me. Promise."

“That place... is strong with the Dark Side of the Force,” Yoda explained the cave too much like the one Luke found himself in now. “A domain of evil it is. In you must go.”

Zena Halcorr told Luke, “I will not hide the sins of my past from my daughter. That is the true task of a parent, to use our mistakes to stop our children from repeating them… and then catching them as they fall when they do.”

“I’ve never had a home,” Quom Tinadar could barely look Luke in the eye. “Even when I was among my own people I was odd. My family was kind enough, but I never belonged. For years I had nothing in my life, just wasting my days away until my final sunset... And then you came along, and everything changed. You’re my best friend, Luke. You gave my life meaning. And I swear to you, I will always stand by your side.”

Crimson

Felicity Rhiaon’s forehead was bowed against his own, “Because I will never believe in destiny… but I’ll always believe in you. I know that we love each other, and that what we have is special. So, no matter what comes our way, we’ll always be at each other’s side, keeping each other from harm.”

“Always,” Felicity whispered. “I will always believe in you.”

And then suddenly all light in the cave was snuffed out.

There was nothing but darkness.

For minutes – though it could have been years for all he knew – Luke stood in the pitch black and silence. He felt an odd sort of calm. The breath flowed in and out of his lungs, feeling like the center of his life, his soul, his entire world.

In and out.

Neither Darkness nor Light simmered in the Force. There was simply nothing.

Then a voice.

“Luke?”

It made his breath stop. That voice. That sweet, snarky voice he had missed so much. With slow movements he turned, afraid and excited that what he suspected was true. He came to a stop, and let out a shaky breath.

There she stood, eyes joyous but uncertain. Tears pricked his own; she looked every bit as he remembered her.

For a moment, time stood still.

And then she was in his arms. They held each other tightly, desperately like a sand about to slip through their fingers. Tears fell freely as Felicity buried her face in the crook of his neck. Luke didn’t kiss her, instead burying his own face in her long brown hair.

It felt like home, every bit of her so familiar. The smell of her hair, the warmth of her skin, how his arms rested perfectly around her waist, how her head fit so flawlessly in the crook of his neck, the sound of her sobs, and the rebellious little laugh that broke through all the tears. It was all so real.

Which was why he knew it wasn’t.

This was not Felicity Rhiaon in his arms, rather an idealized image he had of her. For one thing, she looked way too young. This Felicity looked like the thirty-one-year-old he had first met, but if Felicity were alive, she would be fifty-two. Only two years older than his fifty years of age.

God they were old.

No, Luke had seen it in the cave on Dagobah and the cave on Ahch-to. This was some kind of test. The cave on Dagobah tested the burdens Luke carried within him, and Ahch-to tested the truth of the conflict within – Felicity experiencing the good and evil of her soul while Luke’s own vision had been one about his love for Anakin and Padmé vs Owen and Beru.

So he knew that the Felicity in his arms had to be some sort of test. But until he figured out what sort of test, he would have to play along. He couldn’t let this vision know he was on to it, so he would have to pretend like this was indeed his beloved wife come back to life.

Luke wasn’t certain if this was the easiest thing he would ever do or the hardest.

“I’ve missed you too.” Slowly he pulled back from her embrace but settled his hands on her hips. He would have to treat her like she was a slightly more intimate Sienna Ternan. Maybe like a clone? “I don’t understand. How are you here?”

“Yeah, I figured as much,” he laughed. “I meant more specifically.”

“There’s a power within this cave, Luke, to bring back the dead. Not… forever but we have time. I know it’s ridiculous, but I stopped questioning your weird religion years ago.”

“No, you didn’t.”

“Ok, I got less loud about it.”

“I’ll give you that,” Luke laughed. “And it’s truly you?”

“It truly is.”

Yeah, he knew it wasn’t.

False Felicity smiled at him and then clasped his hand.

“Come on,” she started pulling him forward. “We have to go.”

Luke frowned but let his feet follow, “Where?”

“To Rey. She’s lost here, Luke. She needs her parents to come save her.”

“Rey’s here?” Luke let out a breath of relief.

Part of him wondered if it was part of the trick, but he could feel the play of both Dark and Light in the cave. Not everything was a trick. His interaction in the cave on Ahch-to hadn’t been malevolent. What evidence was there that this one would be?

“But where are we going?” Luke asked as False Felicity led him forward. “There’s no way out.”

False Felicity smiled, “Take another look.”
Luke blinked, and there was an exit, another stony passage leading further into the cave.

“Come on,” False Felicity urged. “Let’s find our daughter.”

Luke glanced back at the tree, uncertain of the path ahead. There could be danger. It could be a trick. He was alone and weaponless. He knew he shouldn’t follow this false phantom deeper into the cave’s heart of Darkness, even if the cave did also contain some light.

But he had to find Rey.

So, with great hesitation, but a smile on his face, Luke followed after the False Felicity into the cave.

The clearing with the tree stood in perfect silence. Not even the drip of water on rock or shifting of sands echoed in the cave. For a long time, there was nothing but stillness. There was nothing, but nothing.

And then the leaves glittered again, and whispers filled the clearing.

You see, the False Felicity had not lied. The cave did have special properties. It did have the power to bring back the dead for even a moment. It was a defense mechanism used to fight off the false phantoms the tree would tear from a victim’s mind and give to the creatures of the cave to take that form.

That was why the Empire had held the cave in such high esteem. It could use the cave to produce figures from the past that the Empire could use against prisoners. Let an enemy loose in the cave for a few days and let them grow mad with the visions of reality and imagination lost in the maze of a cave with nothing but dead ends. Then the Dead-Enders – those trained to navigate those dead ends and manipulate the cave with the Force into letting a person return to the outside world – would retrieve their victim and interrogate them.

By that time, a person would tell them anything they wanted, and admit to anything that would get them away from that horrifying place. No prison was half as cruel as getting lost in a cave of what could have been.

And if the insanity or Dead-Enders didn’t get to the victim, the cave creatures would.

So, to combat the Dark Side that formed the false phantom of Felicity Rhiaon, the Light Side did what it would always: it tore a person from the world beyond this one, bringing them back to life for just enough time to save the poor soul lost in that dark cave.

As the False Felicity Rhiaon led Luke Skywalker ever deeper into the cave, she had no idea that there were now two Rhiaons in that cave.

And the new one was coming for her.

“So, what’s this all about?” Doctor Kalonia asked Rose in her office. Statura was waiting on the other side of the door. “Why are you driving the Admiral and from the sounds of it, Commander Nalto, up the wall?”

“It’s a big secret,” Rose pleaded, “I need you to promise not to tell anyone.”

“I swear it upon the same oath I swear never to reveal a patient’s medical information. Now please, Rose. What’s the big secret?”

Rose took a deep breath and made sure she was relaxed and in control of herself to gently break the news.

“Kira’s name isn’t Kira, it’s really Rey, and she’s actually a Jedi in hiding, and so is her dad, and I’m the only who knows, and her mom was killed by the First Order because Rey’s a Jedi, and Teng and Quom know, and you probably know her dad which is why I’m trusting you with the secret, but her dad has a sister or something in the Resistance so that’s why I didn’t want to declare it on record, and Nalto is so close to the Skywalker family that I didn’t want to tell him because he would make it into a big deal, but if it becomes a big deal then the First Order and Snoke goes after her, and I really really really really don’t want that to happen.”

Kalonia blinked, “I’m sorry, what was that?”

“I stole ten credits off Paige’s dresser, but I’m going to pay it back, I promise,” Rose repeated.

“No, the first part. You and your sister can handle that bit by yourself. Just repeat your whole thing but a lot slower this time.”

“Kira’s name isn’t Kira, it’s really Rey, and she’s actually a Jedi in hiding, and so is her dad, and I’m the only who knows, and her mom was killed by the First Order because Rey’s a Jedi, and Teng and Quom know, and you probably know her dad which is why I’m trusting you with the secret, but her dad has a sister or something in the Resistance so that’s why I didn’t want to declare it on record, and Nalto is so close to the Skywalker family that I didn’t want to tell him because he would make it into a big deal, but if it becomes a big deal then the First Order and Snoke goes after her, and I really really really really don’t want that to happen.”

Kalonia blinked, “I’m sorry, what was that?”

Rose frowned, “You need me to say it again?”

“No, I got it.” Kalonia’s eyes were staring at Rose but seeing something else far away from there. “Kira… is not Kira. Kira is… Rey?”

“Uh huh.”

“Rey…” Kalonia’s voice shook. “Rey who has a father for a Jedi, whose sister is in the Resistance, and they live on Jakku?”

“Yes.”

Tears gathered in Kalonia’s eyes as she realized the weight of what Rose had just told her. It felt like she had lead in her stomach. She wanted to throw up, burst into tears, and scream it to the world.

“By the Force… Rey Rhiaon Skywalker is alive.”

Rose’s jaw dropped, “What?”

“Rey,” Kalonia shook her head. “Of course. Of course. It all makes sense. Of course, Luke would go there. And the name Kira? How didn’t I catch that before?”

“That’s exactly what I’m saying.” Kalonia sighed, “I don’t believe this. I thought Luke was on Ahch-to.”

“Poe knows Skywalker’s daughter, and we had them have a casual conversation?”

“But he couldn’t stand just leaving her there, so he went to Jakku.”
“We had the General sign an autograph to her own niece?”

“And he taught her to use a pseudonym that was the name they were originally going to give her.”

“This is so messed up.”

“Yeah, it is,” Kalonia laughed, shifting her attention back to Rose. “I don’t believe this.”

“Me neither.” Rose frowned, “My best friend, my Kira… she’s famous. When she finds out… she won’t want to be friends with someone like me anymore.”

Kalonia touched her shoulder, “I remember that little girl, Rose, and I can tell you that sure, I don’t know what she’s like now, but she had so much love and joy in her heart that of course she’ll want to still be friends with you.”

“But, this doesn’t make sense,” Rose said. “How can she be Rey Skywalker?”

“Rhiaon Skywalker,” Kalonia corrected. “We don’t want to call down the ghost of Felicity Rhiaon to haunt us for dropping the Rhiaon part.”

“Rey Rhiaon Skywalker… but no. It can’t be. No one survived the Burning of Rornian.”

“Her mother did. Felicity took Rey to Jakku where they hid for months. Then the First Order captured Felicity on Jakku, and she told them Rey was dead. I don’t know how she tricked them… but I believe Felicity Rhiaon found a way.” Kalonia’s smile fell as she remembered how broken Luke had looked the night he left, “Rose, we can’t tell anyone about this.”

“Yeah, that’s why we’re talking about it now instead of with Nalto and Statura.”

“I’m serious, Rose. No one can know. Not even Aletha, not even General Organa. If everyone thinks that Luke is on Ahch-to, having him really be on Jakku will keep them safer until they have the strength to return… I wonder if Luke can find the strength to train her?”

“Rey said he is already.”

“Good,” Kalonia felt a breath of relief. “The sooner they train, the sooner they return.”

“You think he’s going to come back?” Rose brightened.

“Doctor Kalonia has vouched for Rose Tico,” Statura spoke with Diego as the horde of young adults exited his office, no doubt to try to bug the answer out of Rose. “But I still don’t like this whole thing.”

“Neither do I, but we must respect their privacy.” Diego admitted. “You’ll determine their punishments and distribute them accordingly?”

“Top of my to-do list. I’d like to keep this under wraps though.”

“I agree.”

“Now, if you’ll excuse me, I’m going to nip into the cafeteria for some quick lunch. I have got meetings all day.”

“I do not envy you,” Diego chuckled.

He watched the group disperse, no real hard feelings left behind as they exited the office.

Except apparently for the woman leaning against his desk with crossed arms and the look on her face like the time he refused to obey her orders on a battlefield and she drugged him as a response.

Note to self, accept no food, drinks, or shots from Aletha until she was significantly less pissed off.

“Are you staying behind because you would like to have lunch with me?” Diego asked hopefully.

“How dare you treat Rose like that,” Aletha got straight to her scolding. “She is a sixteen-year-old orphan with few friends, little social skills, no grace under pressure, a heart too big for her chest, and apparently has to hold some grand secret that I doubt she has the knowhow to keep.”

“So, that’s a no to lunch?”

“Diego!”

“I treated her exactly how one treats a suspect in a conspiracy case.”

“Yelling at her? Throwing things? Looking like you were going to commit violence against her? If that’s the way leadership behaves in the Resistance, I’m gone. I had to deal with that sort of thing with Alecta; I will not take it from the man I love.”

“Querida-”

“Don’t do that,” Aletha snapped. “Don’t you try to turn this on me.”

“So this is my fault?” Diego shot. “I’m not the one with contraband. You may not have known our opinions on it in the Resistance, but you know it was forbidden in the Rebellion. You knew you were doing wrong, and if I pull each of those girls into a room for interrogation, will I find evidence of conspiracy?”

Aletha narrowed her eyes, “I’m not answering that question without a lawyer.”

Diego winced. Had things gotten that serious?

“What happened to your promise?” Aletha demanded. “You told me If there’s anything you need to withhold from me for the sake of someone else, and it does not affect us, then by all means. As long as you promise honesty and full disclosure should a secret be forced to light.”

He blinked, “Did you remember the exact wording?”

“I have the ability to recall conversations exactly. It doesn’t come up a lot, but I can do it. Now, come on, Diego, what happened to that promise?”

“I’ve kept it. I swear it, Querida.”

Aletha sighed, “Whatever. I’m only here because you still need to tell me Teng’s message. Why did he call?”

“Oh, right. Kira’s gone missing for four days and he’s hoping you can get a hold of her via your comm.”
Her eyes shot wide, “Kira’s missing?”

“Yes.”

“How long? What happened? Why do they need my comm?”

“I don’t know. I didn’t ask. I was more focused on-”

“The investigation?” Aletha snapped. “You knew she was missing, could be injured or dead, and you wasted what money Teng had with bureaucratic nonsense instead of letting me find out more about the situation, so I could be relieved that the girl I view as my daughter wasn’t dead?”

Diego hesitated.

She slapped him.

“I don’t like the way you treated Rose,” Aletha said coldly. “And if you treat any of my girls like that again, we’re done. Now if you’ll excuse me, I need to go make sure that Kira isn’t dead in a ditch somewhere, and you better pray to God that if she is, it isn’t because you withheld Teng’s message from me.”

She turned on her heel and stormed off.

Diego sighed, rubbing his still stinging face.

“Right… that’s why I’m pushing sixty and have been never married.”

He had to fix this and fast.

“Tell me all about her,” False Felicity requested as she walked along with Luke. He was still dodging her kisses, but Luke had fallen victim to the need for touch. It just felt so real, her arms wrapped around his torso.

“Rey?” Luke smiled, happy to put on the act. What father that had a good relationship with his daughter didn’t wish to brag about her? “She’s amazing. She built her own speeder, she’s so strong with the Force, and she’s an amazing pilot.”

“Oh great, three things she definitely didn’t get from me,” False Felicity laughed. “And no, I didn’t actually mean Rey.”

“Who did you mean?”

“Tell me about Aletha.”

Luke froze. Was this the test?

“Why do you want me to talk about Aletha?” he asked stiffly.

“I want to know about the woman who could capture the heart of Luke Skywalker after the epic and tragic romance of Felicity Rhiaon, his one true love.”

Luke genuinely couldn’t figure out if the phantom was nailing the character of Felicity Rhiaon, or massively overdoing. But he suspected it was the former.

“Do you like her better than me?”

Oh yeah, definitely nailing the character. Only Felicity could enjoy tormenting him like this.

“No, of course not,” Luke lied. He absolutely liked Aletha better than some vision from the Dark Side pretending to be his wife. “But she was a wonderful woman there for me when I needed her. I’m happy for the time we had, but I’m not upset that it’s over.”

False Felicity pulled him to a stop, “And what about us? Are you happy for the time we had, but not upset that it’s over?”

Her words hit him hard. Luke swallowed thickly, trying to fight back his tears. True he had done the whole remember their life together and move on thing, but as he held a vision of what he could have had in his arms, it really reminded him of how much he missed Felicity.

“Not a day goes by that I don’t think of the woman I was lucky enough to call my wife,” Luke confessed. “If I could have her back for even a moment.”

“I’m here, Luke,” False Felicity whispered. She ran a hand through his hair and smiled as she caressed his beard, “You know, I thought I told you no facial hair. I’m not kissing you with it.”

Luke almost gave a sigh of relief.

“Oh, screw it,” False Felicity declared. “Eleven years is too long.”

She pressed her lips to his quickly before he could stop her. But he melted into the kiss; something warmer and more real than that kiss with Sienna Ternan.

And yet it felt even more hollow.

“Yes,” the False Felicity imitated the Real Felicity’s signature one corner smirk. Luke thought that she didn’t quite pull it off. “The beard was a mistake.”

“Figure out a way to come back to life permanently and I’ll shave it off.”

“You have a deal, Good Sir.”

He should have just killed this phantom, test be damned. It was far more painful to endure this thing that was so close to Felicity, yet he knew it could not be.

Of course, the real question was could he kill something that looked so much like the woman he loved?

False Felicity frowned, “I’m sorry?”

“I haven’t seen any food around here and Rey only carries so much. What has she been eating the past few days?”

“What she carries with her. I did teach her to ration during the desert trek.”

“How much did you give her for each meal during the trek?”
“Oh, details aren’t important.”

Luke smiled to himself. Funny how “Felicity” couldn’t answer a question he himself didn’t know the answer to, “What about water? How many bottles did you carry?”

False Felicity scowled, “Why are you asking me these questions?”

Luke opened his mouth.

“Dad?” a scared voice came.

Luke heart stopped.

“Rey?” he called back. He took off down further along the passage, leaving False Felicity behind.

The creature smiled after the Jedi. The cave knew when to intervene, and it took care of her well. Of course, the creature suspected the Jedi knew the truth of her, but why not play this out as long as possible?

Slowly, she followed after the father desperate to find his child.

He found Rey in another clearing; she was sitting on a lonely rock, a beam of light shining on her like a spotlight from a small hole in the cave roof. There were more symbols carved into the walls, but a lot less than the clearing with the tree.

“Rey!” he exclaimed.

“Daddy!” she ran into his arms. Rey was dirty and scared; she cried in his embrace, “Daddy is it really you?”

“It is, Sweetheart.” Luke held her head to his chest, his tears falling onto her dusty hair. “Daddy’s got you. You’re safe now.”

“I’ve been so terrified. I was called here by the Force and then I couldn’t get out.”

“It’s alright,” he assured her. “The Force likes to test us sometime, but I’m here and we’re safe now.”

“I want to go home.”

“Of course. Come on,” he grasped her hand and started leading her back the way he came.

“You can’t go that way,” a voice suddenly said.

They looked back, and False Felicity was casually sitting on the rock.

“The corridor closed when I stepped through,” False Felicity said. She pointed to a new passage that wasn’t there a moment before, “We have to go through that one.”

Rey released Luke’s hand, “Mom?”

False Felicity smiled, “Hello, Sweetheart. I told you I’d come back.”

Rey ran into Felicity’s arms and wept. She made exclamations of love, belief, and joy. It hurt Luke to watch the reunion knowing Rey didn’t understand what was happening.

“I never thought I’d see you again,” Rey wept. “I’ve missed you so much. I’m never leaving you
“Alright, Rey,” Luke came up and patted her on the back. “I know how much you’ve missed her, but we really need to get moving. Felicity, would you mind checking to make sure the passage goes somewhere?”

“Sure,” False Felicity pulled away from Rey. She touched Rey’s cheek, gave one last longing look, and then went into the passage.

“Rey,” Luke whispered, pulling her in close. “Listen to me, that’s not your mother.”

“What?” Rey frowned.

“This is a test from the Force. That is just a vision; some sort of phantom pretending to be your mother.”

“Well, what is it testing?”

“I don’t know, but until I figure it out, I need you to play along.”

“Then why tell me? Why not let me continue thinking it’s her?”

Luke lifted her chin, trying to fight back his tears, “I just didn’t want your heart to get broken. You were so happy to think she was here. I don’t want you to get hurt.”

Rey smiled and hugged him, “Thank you, Dad.”

“Anytime.”

“The passage looks good,” False Felicity smiled. “We should get going.”

“Alright, we’re coming.”

“You go on ahead, Dad,” Rey said. “I’ll follow you with Mom. We have a lot to talk about.”

Luke frowned, “Are you sure?”

“Of course,” Rey winked as she hooked an arm around False Felicity’s waist.

He nodded as False Felicity hooked her own arm around Rey’s waist. Of course Rey would spend a lot of time talking with Felicity if it were really her mom. He had such a smart daughter.

And so Luke led the way into the passage, ready to work with his Rey to fight against the phantom if needed.

“Does he have any idea?” False Felicity asked through overly smiling teeth.

“Not a clue,” Rey laughed.

But as we know, Rey wasn’t actually in the cave. She was in the ship she found after the X’us’R’ia. This was another phantom, but this time, Luke had no clue.

So the Force sent another ghost to join Rhiaon, who was following not too far behind. The Real Rhiaon was overjoyed to see the new companion.

But the duo wasn’t the only one stalking the group.

The vicious growl of a Vrogem echoed off the walls behind Luke.

Rey had found seventeen quick-meal packs in the ship. The generous soul she inherited from Luke Skywalker, reinforced by his raising of her, made her know she needed to share them with her family. After all, she didn’t need to scarf down the food like it was the first food luxury she ever had in her life. They were still picking through leftovers of Aletha’s care shipment.

She didn’t need to help herself to any. Nope. Not a single one. She had self-restraint and could wait.

Okay, maybe just one.

It was on the fourth day that she gave into temptation, rationalizing that you can’t split seventeen four ways. She was doing her family a service by helping herself to one.

First thing in the morning, Rey broke the seal on one of the quick-meals and ate, what was to her, some of the finest food she’d ever enjoyed. She had no idea what it was, but there was actual meat product and a sauce that was sweet and tangy at the same time and something she thought might be nuts, which popped between her teeth with a satisfying snap. There was also a small disk, encased in some sort of batter, and when she bit into that it mixed with an almost spicy sugar that was so intense she nearly gagged on its sweetness.

Is this what her friends ate like every day? She couldn’t imagine handling such flavor at each meal every single day.

She was licking the last bits of deliciousness from the plastic container and vaguely wondering if she could reuse the dish somehow, when a faint beeping came from her satchel.

Rey frowned and set the dish aside. She dug through her bag and pulled out her Kira’s Council comm. It was odd. Aletha usually didn’t call at this time of day. It would be a little after one in the afternoon on D’Qar.

“Hello?” Rey answered.

“Rey?” Aletha exclaimed. “Oh, thank the Force! Are you alright?”

“Uh, yeah. Just scavenging.”

Rey swore she heard Aletha’s eyes narrow.

“Just scavenging? …For four days without going home?”

“How do you know about that?”

“Because Luke is freaking out.” Aletha had called the Jakku comm station from her personal comm to get more details from Teng. “You’ve been gone four days and your comm is dead. Teng called me to see if I could contact you for him.”

“Oh, I’m fine. Tell him not to worry.”
“You tell him yourself!”

“Ok, I will when I get back.”

“And you’re going right now!” Aletha demanded. “Stop whatever it is you’re doing and go home. The boys have been sick with worry about you.”

“Aletha, I can’t go.” Rey explained, “You’re not going to believe this, but I found an intact ship, and I think I can make it operational again!”

“Oh well, that entirely changes everything… Oh, no wait, no it doesn’t. You get your little butt home right now, Young Lady.”

“But Aletha, don’t you know how big a haul this will get me? I could get Plutt to pay… maybe five thousand portions. Or even credits!”

“I don’t care. My sympathy went out the window when you decided to put the boys through emotional turmoil! Now you go home to your loving father, weird but adoring Uncle Quom, and boyfriend who would go to the ends of the galaxy for you because even though you live an awful life on Jakku, AT LEAST YOU CAN SAY YOU HAVING A LOVING, ACCEPTING FAMILY AND A BOYFRIEND WHO APPRECIATES YOU AND SIDES WITH YOU UNCONDITIONALLY, AND I DON’T GIVE A DAMN WHAT HIS JOB IS, I’M STILL HIS FRICKING GIRLFRIEND AND WHO THE HELL IS HE TO TREAT A TEENAGER LIKE THAT?”

Rey blinked, “…Did you get in a fight with Diego?”

“Little bit,” Aletha answered quickly. “There was a thing involving my family, and Rose also got interrogated, and Diego was involved, and he didn’t handle things well.”

“Aletha, I love you, but are you sure he was the only one who overreacted?”

“Why am I taking advice from a sixteen-year-old who thought going off the grid for four days was no big deal?”

“Because I have just enough Luke Erso in me to prevent me from going off the edge of insanity?”

“That would do it.” Aletha sighed, “Look, I get it. That is an amazing find, and I hope you do make the ship functional… but you have to go home. Your father is devastated, and Teng’s been sitting up all night waiting for you. The boy has barely slept.”

Rey smiled, “Really?”

“Really really. Come on, Rey… you have to go home.”

“Alright, I’ll finish up the last of my work and head home tonight.”

“Rey-”

“I’m almost done.”

“Fine, but if you aren’t back in Niima by noon tomorrow, I’m coming down there to get you.”

“I believe it,” Rey laughed.

“Good luck with the ship, Rey,” Aletha said. “Keep me updated.”
“And you keep me updated on Diego. If you two aren’t back together by noon tomorrow, I’m coming down there to kick his ass.”

“Rey,” Aletha warned.

“Sorry,” Rey corrected, “I’m coming down there to kick his butt.”

“Better.”

“So, Teng, Quom, and Dad are in Niima waiting?”

“Well, Teng is. I’m not actually sure where Quom and your father are.”

“Will this cave ever end?” False Felicity groaned. “Honestly, Luke, this is worse than our vacation to Dagobah.”

“Aren’t you supposed to be guiding us?” Luke shot back. “Other than to the edge of insanity?”

“Excuse me, you married me knowing very well what I was like,” False Felicity said. “Admit it, you married me because deep down you really do like my snark and insanity.”

“Nah, it’s mostly because you’re really hot.”

“Ew, Dad,” False Rey pulled a face.

“This is worse than him telling me my conception story,” False Rey shuddered.

“Twice,” False Rey added.

Luke shook his head as they entered into yet another clearing. There were no symbols on the walls in this one… but there were bloodstains.

“Okay, we’ve found another one,” Luke cautiously turned back to the women. Once again the way they had come had disappeared. “Now what?”

“Don’t look at me,” False Rey said. “You’re the Jedi.”

Luke prompted, “Felicity?”

False Felicity was looking around, a smile playing on her face.

Then came a growl.

“It’s okay,” False Felicity said.

Then came another growl. And another. And another.

“Daddy?” False Rey whimpered.

Shuffling and snarling and pounding of rock against rock filled the air along with the whispers of words Luke didn’t understand but sensed the darkness of. He really started to regret giving Quom his lightsaber.

“Felicity!” Luke exclaimed as yellow eyes began appearing in the quickly darkening cave.

“It’s okay, Sweetheart,” False Felicity grinned. Something flicked in her eyes that drew his mind back to the cave of Dagobah. “Everything’s fine.”

“I don’t sense anything,” False Rey said.

“You don’t need to sense it; can’t you see what’s happening?” Luke exclaimed.

“Oh, Skywalker, you always did let your imagination get the best of you,” False Felicity laughed.

False Rey laughed too, “It’s given me such headaches over the years.”

Luke’s blood ran cold.

“What did you just call me?” he whispered, his grip on Rey’s arm going slack.

False Felicity frowned, “What?”

Slowly Luke’s head turned back to Rey. He studied her face carefully.

“What is it, Dad?” False Rey asked.

Oh, he prayed he wasn’t wrong about this.

In one swift motion, he twisted Rey’s wrist forcing her scream in pain. Then he slammed a knee into her torso, rammed an elbow into her neck, and threw Rey violently to the ground.

The False Rey let out a hiss too polytonal to be human.

“Thank the Force I was right,” Luke said quickly. “You’re not my daughter.”

The False Rey groaned and sat up.

“How did you know?” her voice was too casual for the situation.

“She called me Skywalker and you didn’t react,” Luke nodded back to the False Felicity, but didn’t look at her.

“So?”

“Rey doesn’t know that part yet.”

The False Rey frowned, and her eyes rolled up like she was going through her mental catalogue of memories to check his claim, “Damn it. And I was doing so good.”

“Oh, it’s okay, Sweetheart,” False Felicity cooed. “We all screw it up sometimes. You know I messed up things the last time. But why don’t we just cut to the good part now?”

“Agreed.”
They attacked at the same time. False Felicity locked an arm around his throat as False Rey hooked leg around his and yanked forward to send him crashing down into False Felicity’s full control.

Luke stumbled, but caught himself. Instantly he reached out and grasped False Felicity’s arm, holding her in place. It allowed him to keep her locked to him as he rammed backwards, slamming her against the rock cave wall with a sickening thwack.

False Felicity cried out in pain and clawed his eyes. Luke yelled, his eyes slamming shut instinctively to protect himself from the attack. Using the grip he had on her, he pried her arm from around his throat, and used the leverage of her weight to flip her over his body and slam her to ground.

False Rey went for his feet, but Luke kicked her in the face and held out his hand, summoning his lightsaber.

It arrived a lot quicker than he expected.

Almost robotically, Luke booted False Rey’s discarded staff to the side, ignited his saber, brought it up, and swung down with all of his might.

It stopped barely an inch from False Rey’s face.

Luke stood there, gripping his lightsaber, frozen in place. He couldn’t do it. He couldn’t bring his saber down on his daughter. True it was not his real daughter, but there was her face staring up at him in the same fear she had stared at Jarex Zolhar.

And Felicity. Felicity curled in pain at his feet, looking as powerless and beaten as the day Ben Solo shot her in the head.

Luke extinguished his saber and stared at the girls, False Rey taking refuge in False Felicity’s arms like Real Rey had done in Real Felicity’s arms so many times when she was young.

He couldn’t do it. He couldn’t kill them, even if they were false images.

What kind of person could attack someone they loved?

That was the moment Quom Tinadar sunk his fangs into Luke’s neck.

Luke screamed in pain louder than he had ever before, save for the time he learned Vader was his father. His vision was overwhelmed by the black unending nothingness of Quom’s eyes that had once been joyful grey irises who loved Luke so much.

“Quom,” Luke gasped as his friend bit down on his neck. “Quom, please.”

But this wasn’t Quom. His cloak and scarf had been shed, he stood on all fours, his eyes were black, his ears twitched, his tail flicked, and he growled and snarled as the Dark Side flowed freely through him.

“Please, Quom,” Luke gasped, struggling to reach out into the Force. He remembered it working before; maybe the Light Side could calm Quom again? “Look at me. You know me. I’m not going to hurt you.”

But Quom did not release him, indeed his grip got tighter. His fangs had pierced the skin of Luke’s neck, but thankfully they had not punctured through to his windpipe. He wasn’t completely screwed yet.
“Please Quom. It’s me. It’s Luke.”

Behind the Vrogem, Luke could see more figures gathering by the False Felicity and False Rey. There had to have been eleven of them including the False loved ones. They were long creatures with slits for yellow eyes, completely hairless, their pure white skin had the texture of a snake, and now that the cave was starting to get lighter, Luke noticed old shedding skins discarded on the floor. But the worst part were the two long and sharp top teeth which was covered in bloodstains that could never be cleaned away.

Well, this was new.

He tried to do as he did before and push happy memories into Quom’s mind, but the Vrogem was closed off. All Luke could turn to were final pleas, hoping there was some part of the true Quom that could reach him.

“Please, Quom,” Luke begged. “You know me.”

For just a second, Quom’s eyes flicked grey.

And then False Rey’s staff smashed Quom in the head, knocking him away from Luke.

It wasn’t wielded by False Rey.

Luke only had a split second to see that, but not much else besides. He couldn’t see who his hero was exactly; just enough to tell it wasn’t Rey’s silhouette. The cave creatures attacked the savior before Luke could see more, but for a split moment he thought he saw brown hair.

Then he gasped in pain as the reality of his injuries set in. Quom’s fangs were out of his neck, so his hand went to the wound to put pressure on the wound and stay the bleeding. But his hand was ripped away by False Felicity. She had False Rey’s gauze, which she whipped around Luke’s neck and pulled back hard, strangling him.

Luke fought and squirmed, but his face slowly turned blue as he struggled for breath. Going limp, Luke fell on his front and as his head was forced back by the force of the gauze, he stared up at the False Felicity.

It seemed the last thing he would ever see was the angry face of his wife strangling him to death.

“Hey!” a familiar voice shouted. “Doppelgänger!”

The False Felicity turned in surprise. Standing before her was a very familiar woman. She was pale-skinned, had brown hair pulled up into an elaborate bun, was short, but taller than Leia, and had a fearsome but joyful spark in her dark eyes.

Before the False Felicity could react, the woman punched her face, knocking her off Luke.

“Get away from my son,” Padmé Amidala warned her pretender daughter-in-law.

Luke frowned in confusion, gasping desperately her air, “Mother?”

She bent down to her knees, but Luke slid back from her.
“Don’t pretend to be her too,” Luke glowered at the woman. “Just face me as your true self. Enough of this charade.”

And then Padmé reached out and stroked Luke’s cheek with the back of her hand.

A flash of a memory that he shouldn’t have took over his brain.

---

_Darkness. All he knew was Darkness. Darkness and the other half of him that was always there._

_Then a woman cried out and the Darkness turned to light._

_Too bright. The light was too bright._

_Something held him – he was a him, a concept he never had until now. The deep voice that spoke to him sometimes in the Darkness was a him. The softer voice that had always been there was a her._

_He was passed to another. A man with ginger hair as a strange robotic voice uttered something._

_Where was his other half? Why was she gone?_

_“Luke,” whimpered the soft voice that had always been there. A woman laid on a table wearing a white gown._

_The ginger man held him out to the woman, and she touched his cheek over and over with the back of her hand._

_“Oh, Luke,” cooed the soft voice._

---

Luke pulled back from the memory in shock. The memory of the only time his mother had ever touched him.

Just as she touched him now.

Confused, Luke reached out into the Force to examine her presence. It was a strong mulberry shade, the exact shade his father had described to him so many times.

And that mulberry Signature thrummed with life.

“Yes,” Padmé softly smiled at her adult son. “But you won’t be for very long. Hold still. Let me deal with that.”

Padmé grabbed the gauze and gently rewrapped it around his neck to serve as a bandage. She secured it with a bobby pin from her up do. Then in the final act of motherhood, she licked the pad of her finger and wiped some dirt from his cheek.

“Sorry, that was bothering me,” Padmé explained clasping her hands tightly with her son.

He smiled. Luke could feel the Light Side filling her up, seeming to radiant out of that joyful, loving smile he adored so much. She was a beautiful as Father had described.

The False Felicity suddenly sprang up to attack, but Padmé pulled a small blaster from her belt and without looking, shot in False Felicity in the leg. The False Felicity collapsed to the ground in pain, and Padmé put her blaster back on her belt.

“I’m busy talking to my son.”

As beautiful… and as fearless.

Luke laughed, “You know, the real Felicity is a big fan.”

“So I’ve heard,” Padmé glanced over at the figure fighting off the creatures.

“If you two are done with the mother-son bonding, I could use some help,” the figure called. A creature went flying backwards as False Rey’s staff struck them expertly.

Luke shook his head, “I’m fine, Mother. I just can’t believe it’s really you. Not a vision. You’re… alive. I’m very confused. Shouldn’t Father be with us right now having a party over this?”

“Oh, Ani can’t enter the cave,” Padmé explained. “Otherwise, without a doubt.”

“Guys!” the other figure called again.

“Coming, Rhiaon!” Padmé yelled.

Luke frowned, “Rhiaon? …Wait, is that-”

A few more creatures were batted aside, and Luke got a clear image of the other person the Force had sent to protect him.

The sight made his heart stop.

That soft brown hair. That athletic form. Those sharp angular lines of the face. That jaw cut the same way as Rey’s. Dinah Andromias’ naturally large lips. Alaric Rhiaon’s cheeks and chin. A mischievous sparkle in those gleaming eyes. And of course that one corner smirk Luke would never forget.

“What is going on?” Luke whispered. He couldn’t believe he was really seeing who was standing in front of him.

“Stay behind us,” the ghost of Rhiaon ordered, pulling him to his feet and shoving Luke back behind Padmé who had also stood up. “Padmé and I will take them. You focus on your Vrogem friend.”

“It’s okay, Luke,” Padmé gently smiled. “There will be a time for explanations. Right now, we need some aggressive negotiations.”

“Negotiations with a lightsaber.”

“Oh,” Luke nodded and focused his position back on Quom alone. Somehow, he would get his friend out of here. “I can do that.”
Padmé grinned, “That’s my boy.”

Luke beamed, happy to make his mother smile and proud.

The ghosts in front of him prepared themselves for battle, weapons ready and minds trying to focus on the enemy alone. Still, the ghost of Rhiaon couldn’t help but spare a glance backward.

“By the way,” the ghost said softly, “it’s good to see you, Luke.”

“It’s wonderful to see you too.” Luke shook his head, “I just never thought I’d get to meet you, Brendan.”

Love is admitting to the other person when you’re wrong. True love is accepting you both were.

- Yavinese Proverb

Aletha was sitting on her bed, reading over a new medical text when the hesitant knock came on her door. She waited a moment, making a note in the margin of a page, then set down her pen and sighed.

“Who is it?” she called, though she was fairly certain she knew the answer.

“It’s me,” Diego responded, confirming her suspicion. “Can we talk, Querida?”

She put her book on the bedside table and rubbed the bridge of her nose. She was very tempted to say no.

“You know the code,” Aletha conceded.

The door slid open and a very hesitant Diego Nalto entered the room.

“Hey,” he simply said.

“Hey,” she gave a small smile. She patted the mattress next to her.

“Thank you,” Diego crossed the room and sat next to her. He was careful not to push her boundaries with any sort of touching. “So…”

“So…” Aletha looked down, smoothing out her skirt.

Diego sighed, “Today did not go well for us.”

“Well, every couple fights. It was about time we had a big one.”

“You understand why I did what I did?”

“Diego, I’m a grown woman who has fought in two wars. Of course, I understand why you got concerned about security. And before you beat yourself up, yes, I know you don’t think I’m actually a traitor. What I don’t appreciate is you assuming that I have something to do with the family who has so cruelly set me aside.”
“I don’t think you do,” Diego whispered. “But Aletha… the question had to be asked. On the other hand, the way I treated Rose—”

“I know,” she placed her hand on his thigh. “We didn’t handle today well. I can’t get mad at you for doing your job—”

“And I can’t get mad at you for trying to protect a child so dear to you. I knew about Kira and still… What I should have done was excused myself from the room and allowed Statura to conduct the investigation. I just was afraid something was going to happen. I wanted to protect you.”

“I’m thankful for that, but as much as I hate to admit it, Holdo has a point about romance in the workplace. Things like this get complicated.”

“Well, we’ll do better next time something like this happens. Promise.” Diego grinned, “By the way, don’t tell Holdo we think she’s right.”

“Or Kaydel,” Aletha laughed. “I think she might punch a hole in the wall.”

“Don’t you mean Dameron?”

“I meant what I said. Don’t underestimate an Anthea woman.”

“Never,” Diego stroked Aletha’s cheek. “So, how is Kira? Did you get in touch?”

“Kira’s fine,” Aletha reported. “She’s just being a stupid teenager. I made it very clear to her that she needs to go home before I go down to Jakku and bring her back myself.”

“If you think I’m going to let you go back to Jakku and your ex-boyfriend without me, you’ve got another thing coming. I may not be very experienced in relationships, but I will fight for my woman.”

“Your woman? So now I’m your property?” Aletha teased.

“Absolutely,” he chuckled darkly, pulling her forward for a heady kiss. “These lips belong to me to do to which as I please.”

“And so do these belong to me,” Aletha ran a thumb over his bottom lip. “You know, since we both agree to be at fault for our fight, it seems that we both need to find a way to make it up to the other.”

“As it so happens, I know the perfect way to use our lips to do that very thing.”

Aletha laughed, “So, we’re all good then?”

“Of course we are, Querida. Nothing could change my mind about you. I love you.”

“I love you too, Darling.”

“Now,” Diego darkly chuckled again, gently pushing her down on the bed. “Let’s get to that atonement.”

“Diego… it’s two in the afternoon. I was thinking more like tonight.”

“Well, you have anything better to do right now?”

She shook her head.
Then do me.”

Aletha laughed joyously as she pulled his shirt over his head and threw it to the floor.

“Luke, on your right!”

“Nice one, Brendan!”

“Oh, you’ve gotta teach me that.”

“Mother, please stop calling me, Ani.”

“Sorry, you look so much like him.”

“Two on your left!”

“Let’s take these three together!”

“Yeah! That’s my mother!”

“What do they teach you in the Stormtrooper corps?”

“That looked like it hurt.”

“He got me in the arm!”

“That’s for looking like my sister!”

“I’m running out of blaster bolts!”

“You know your kid has a good idea with this whole staff fighting thing.”

“What you think you got it from your father?”

“Nice one, Luke!”

“I need to get myself a lightsaber.”

“Aren’t you dead yet?”

“Behind you, Luke!”

“To the left!”

“To the right!”

“Yeah, kick his ass! That’s my little bro-in-law!”

“Guys, Quom’s not dead, right?”

They were down to five creatures and one Quom. Padmé, Luke, and Brendan stood in a tight, defensive triangle, their backs literally touching each other’s. Brendan had the staff, Padmé a blaster, and Luke his lightsaber. The creatures were growling and pacing around the trio, regrouping after so many of their brethren lie slaughtered on the floor. Unfortunately, among those surviving five, the False Felicity and False Rey were still standing.

“We need a better plan than just cutting these things down,” Padmé said.

“Agreed,” Luke said. “Cut one down, and three more appear. You know, I dealt with a creature like this once, but it involved heads rather than full creatures. Han is still making me buy him drinks for helping out with that one.”

“Han Solo is a smart man,” Brendan’s eyes didn’t move from the false image of his sister. “I’d love to give that ship of his a test run. May look like garbage but has it where it counts.”

“Well, that explains why Felicity feels such kinship to him,” Luke shrugged. He had always been suspicious of the similarities between Han and Brendan, but it was weird to see them laid out so bluntly. “So how are we going to fix this? Something tells me fire isn’t going to help me this time.”

Brendan and Padmé exchanged a look.

Luke narrowed his eyes, “You two know how to beat them.”

Padmé sighed, “You have to take out the leaders. Felicity and Rey. Without them to call for backup, we’ll steam the bleed of these creatures and then you can help your friend, who honestly, as your mother, I’m not sure if I like you spending time with him, Luke.”

“He’s not my first choice either, but he is my friend,” Luke grinned. “Alright. Brendan, you take care of Felicity, and Mother, do you think you can handle Rey? I’ll deal with Quom.”

“We can’t do that,” Brendan said.

“Why not?”

“You have to be the one who takes down Fliss and Rey.”

Luke swallowed, “I… I don’t know if I can.”

Padmé touched his arm, “I know it’s hard, but it’s the only way.”

“But I can’t do it,” Luke said. “False images or not, I can’t kill my wife and daughter any more than I could kill my father.”

Padmé said nothing but just gave him a gentle smile.

And then Luke understood.

“That’s the test,” he whispered. “The one I’ve always failed. Am I able to kill, or even just let go of someone I love, in exchange for the greater good?”

“Offering yourself up is something you’ve never faltered at,” Padmé said. “But sometimes giving up yourself isn’t an option. Sometimes you have to cut loose someone you love for the sake of something greater. I love your father, but after Mustafar, if I had survived there would have been no way I would have gone back to him. Not when I had to protect you and Leia.”

“And my father,” Brendan added, “after I found out about the Death Star, I knew I couldn’t continue on with that life. If I had lived and they asked me to do Operation Citadel, wouldn’t have even hesitated… like Fliss didn’t.”

“But she did hesitate,” Luke sighed. “She offered your father a chance of redemption and escape with her… and many people died because of that. Alderaan died because of that.”

“It’s a heavy burden your wife carries,” Padmé said. “Much like the burden I carry of the deaths of the Clone Wars, the Naboo Occupation, and even the Galactic Civil War.”

“Those weren’t your fault.”

“But I played my part in them. I watched liberty die, and though I know Palpatine would have done it with or without me, I am responsible in a way. I’ve moved past it, Luke… now it’s time for you to move past all of this.”

“Besides,” Brendan grinned. “We all know Rey and Fliss would absolutely kick your ass if you laid a hand on them in real life.”

A smile twinged the corner of Luke’s mouth, “Yeah, they would.”

Luke took a deep breath and turned his gaze to the False Felicity. It wasn’t her. He couldn’t kill her because she was already dead. But that Vrogem stalking him in the corner? That was his friend. The one he could save.

He _would_ save Quom Tinadar.

And the False Felicity pounced.

Luke had to give the creature credit; she dodged, dueled, and attacked quite well for a being weaponless against a lightsaber.

“It’s not her, it’s not her,” Luke repeated under his breath as the False Felicity got his elbow to her face. “That’s not Felicity.”

“I might as well be,” False Felicity slammed a knee into his stomach. “I’ve seen all of your memories of her. I know everything. How you met at the ceremony. How you kissed on the roof. How your friends walked in on the two of you having sex the morning after your first anniversary. Remember the looks on their faces as they caught her riding you?”

Both Padmé and Brendan shuddered at the image.

“How you threw her into a bedside table the night your daughter was conceived,” False Felicity continued. “How you promised her in the woods to come back and never did? Oh and the incident you don’t speak of. I remember when R2-D2 commed you and told you there was an emergency back home? How he had stopped her from taking your precious three-month-old daughter and dr-”

He grasped False Felicity by the shoulders and slammed her literally headfirst into the rock of the cave. False Felicity cried out and slumped to the ground, her bloody forehead painting a trail down the cavern wall.

“Luke and Felicity’s Greatest Hits,” Luke said as the creature moaned at his feet. “That’s exactly what I needed to hear so I could remember that you absolutely are not her. So, thank you.”

False Felicity rolled over and glared up at him.

“You’re welcome,” she said bitterly.

Luke smiled, “No… you’re not her at all.”
He swung down his lightsaber, and False Felicity was no longer a problem.

Quom Tinadar however, was.

A growl filled the cave at the same time as False Rey’s scream. She was busy fighting Padmé, but Brendan was finishing off the last of the other creatures. There was no one to stop Quom from attacking Luke.

Like False Felicity, Quom slammed into the rock head first and slumped to the floor in a pathetic mess. But this time it was done with less force and more actual Force.

Quom was out in an instant. He didn’t move an inch.

Luke’s breath was heavy and even, “Is he dead?”

“Not yet,” a voice false but familiar added.

He turned and cried out as a set of nails too sharp to match the vision of the rough, worn scavenger hands of his daughter tore across his face. Luke pushed her away, perhaps too gently. Defeating the image of his known dead wife was one thing, but his living daughter he didn’t know if she was safe… it was hard. Especially knowing that she had been harmed so much as a child.

“I don’t want to fight you,” Luke said, holding out a hand between the two of them. He used a smidge of the Force to keep her away from him, but he wanted to let her make the decision to not attack. “Please, let us resolve this peacefully.”

“Peacefully?” False Rey snarled. “You killed my mother!”

Luke glanced at the dead False Felicity, “I’m sorry. I didn’t know she wasn’t just pretending to be your mother. But I was trying to protect myself.”

“And she was just protecting me! That’s what a mother does – what a parent does – protect their child.”

“I couldn’t agree more,” Padmé’s voice came seconds before she tackled the false image of her granddaughter to the ground.

Luke stared dumbly at the scene of his mother and daughter grappling on the cave floor.

“This is a really weird day,” he muttered.

And then False Rey tore her claws deep across the neck of Padmé Amidala.

Padmé gasped, clutching her throat, her hands staining with deep crimson blood. False Rey grinned, she was straddled across Padmé, watching down on the scene with glee.
“He gets to watch his mother die,” False Rey gloated. “Just like I had to.”

“No,” Padmé coughed, blood burbling in her throat. She convulsed, holding her throat tightly, then turned her head and threw up a mouthful of blood on the cold, stone floor.

Luke couldn’t watch.

False Rey laughed coldly, a type of laugh Luke knew his true daughter could never conjure, “That’s right. Now beg for your husband… Just like you did the last time you died.”

Padmé vomited more blood, coughing grotesquely.

“You see,” her voice was strained, “that’s the thing…”

She took a deep breath and cleared her throat. Padmé opened her mouth wide to take in as much air as possible. Her mouth was no longer filled with blood; the only drops left were the stains on her lips.

Padmé moved her hand from her throat and watched the False Rey’s dumbfounded expression as she shown her perfectly intact skin and perfectly clean hand that had been holding her bleeding throat.

“You can’t kill someone who’s already dead,” Padmé said.

She kicked False Rey right in the face, sending her flying back. Luke instantly rushed to his mother’s side.

“And for the record,” Padmé said as Luke helped her unsteadily get to her feet, “Palpatine killed me. Not some Force Choke, or ridiculous loss of will to live.”

“Luke, I had just given birth to two children, my husband who I still believed in had turned to the Dark Side, and there was a dictatorship to take down. I had plenty to live for.” She patted his hand in a gesture that could only be described as motherly, “We’ll talk about it later. Promise. Now finish her off.”

He stepped forward, his lightsaber at the ready. False Rey slowly got to her face; her face dark and challenging.

“You’re not going to kill me,” False Rey chuckled.

“Yes, I am,” Luke declared. “Maybe if you were my real daughter I wouldn’t-”

“If that’s what helps you sleep at night.”

Luke narrowed his eyes, “I would never lay a had on my daughter, and she would never lay a hand on me.”

False Rey outright laughed, “You both will.”

He frowned, “What are you talking about?”

With another dark laugh, False Rey reached out and grasped the side of his head. Something bore into his temple, and Luke groaned trying to resist.

“Don’t fight it,” she said coldly. “You can’t avoid this destiny.”
And then his mind filled with a vision of something awful. Something not of the past… but something yet to come.

They stood in the darkness of night on a planet of rock and rain. Rey was older, but not by much. Her clothing was different, and her hair no longer in its signature three buns. Though Luke had no context for the scene, the hatred and fear between father and daughter was clear.

“Answer me!” Rey screamed at him.

“No!” Luke turned his back to her. “How dare… I can’t even look at you right now!”

“Don’t you walk away from me!” she yelled as he stormed off.

“Leave me be!” Luke didn’t turn to look at her.

“No!” she grabbed at his arm, only for him to roughly throw her hand off.

“Rey, I need space before I do something I regret.”

But she couldn’t let go. She was so angry; so much had built up inside of her throughout the years, and despite all of her utterances of forgiveness, the resentment had swelled. Now the dam was about to burst.

“Stop!” she screamed. “STOP!”

And then the crack across his head that sent him to the ground. His own daughter had been filled with such Darkness that she committed an act of violence against him.

Pain riddled Luke’s body as he hit the drenched rocky terrain face fist. But as he rolled over to face the furious expression of his powerful and dangerous daughter, holding her staff up ready to fight, that pain wasn’t just physical.

“Is he right?” Rey demanded. “Is what he said true?”

“And what did he say?” Luke snapped.

A buzzing filled the air, the vision not allowing the present Luke to hear what Rey would say. Whatever it was, it infuriated future Luke. His face shook, and he shot to his feet in an instant.

Rey pulled back for a swing with her staff. Luke used the Force to rip a nearby lightning rod from its contraption and summon it to his hand. He brought it up to protect himself, locking with Rey’s staff at the last moment.

In the distance, he heard a baby’s cry.

Luke’s eyes met Rey’s, and for a moment they held there staring at each other. Darkness and hatred, there was no love between the father and daughter in that moment as the thunder rumbled and the lightning cracked.

She attacked first, swinging over and over again, Luke successfully dodging the blows. The force of one of the blows not meeting its target made her stumble forward slightly.

Then Luke did the thing he swore he’d never do.
He hit his own daughter.

It wasn’t hard, more a move of self-defence, and he didn’t press his attack, looking a little startled at it as he gripped his weapon with both hands... but he had hit his precious daughter. The one he swore to protect, the one he loved more dearly than any other before or after, and the one who he knew had been abused once as a child.

He hurt his child.

As the vision melt away, the present-day Luke looked up at the false image of his daughter in fear.

“It’s not a matter of if you’ll hurt your daughter,” False Rey grinned at his horrified expression. “It’s a matter of when.”

And then Brendan Rhiaon smashed his niece in the head with a staff.

“Clearly you’ve never hung out with this family,” Brendan leaned on the staff casually. “Sooner or later we all try to murder each other.”

The False Rey growled and sprung to her feet to attack Brendan. Luke’s lightsaber stopped that from ever happening.

“If that’s the future,” Luke whispered, “…then so be it. I will make the sacrifices needed to bring Light to the world.”

And he felt his mother’s comforting hand on his shoulder, “You did good, Luke. You made the right choice.”

For a long time, not a word was said. The only sound that filled the air was the slow drip of water droplets somewhere deep in the cave. No new creature appeared, and the trio stared down at the false image of Rey Rhiaon Skywalker cut into bloody pieces on the stone floor.

“Well, that’s going to give me nightmares,” Luke said dryly, unable to take his eyes away as he extinguished his saber and clipped it back on his belt.

“Just promise me you won’t kill any Sandpeople because of them,” Padmé added. “Or at least don’t go on and on about it to me.”

“Seriously, I have to ask, why was it you gave into Father’s advances?”

“It was more of situation where although your father was not skilled with flirting, I still genuinely had feelings for him, then thought we were going to die so I confessed them, and really couldn’t take them back when it became apparent we weren’t going to die.”

Brendan rolled his eyes and tossed the False Rey’s staff to the side, “Whatever.”

Luke frowned, “Ok… You know, it really is amazing to actually meet you. Felicity talks about you so much, I’ve always pictured us somehow getting together. I thought we would both be so happy to do so, and… here I am. Absolutely filled with joy at getting to meet the man that Felicity loved so dearly. I was right about this.”
“You were what?” Brendan snapped. “You think I’m happy to see you?”

“You’re a Rebel,” Brendan spat at Luke’s feet. “You slaughtered millions in a terrorist attack, brought about the murder of our beloved Emperor, and worst of all, killed my father. And you have the gall to expect me to be happy about the fact Felicity lowered herself to be your bedmate? You have disgraced her character and disgusted me with my own sister. I should do the world a favor and kill you right here, right now, with my own two hands.”

After all the stories Felicity had shared about Brendan, he had never expected this loyalist who burned with such utter hatred. If forced to it, Luke would fight Brendan, and judging by the action he had witnessed before, Luke knew it would be a tough fight.

And then Brendan burst out laughing.

“I’m just screwing with you,” Brendan smiled brightly, all contempt vanishing from his face in an instant. He clapped Luke jovially on the shoulder, “Don’t worry. I’m a Rebel, and I’m happy for what you did. Especially with Felicity; she became far more a handful than I ever expected. And really dedicated to that no flying thing. If I knew I was going to die, I definitely wouldn’t have made her make that promise… Also probably would have made plans to prevent said death, but that’s a whole other issue. I just couldn’t resist seeing the look on your face when you thought I was Pro-Imperial.”

“Typical Rhiaon,” Luke chuckled, shaking his head as he moved his hand away from his lightsaber. “So, you’re truly not an ally of the Empire?”

“Luke, they blew me up. Yeah, the Alliance isn’t the one I have problems with.”

Padmé shook her head, “Come on, you two. Let’s grab Quom and get out of here. We’ll talk on the way.”

“That way,” Padmé pointed behind her son.

Luke turned around and cave suddenly cracked open revealing the very same spot Luke had entered and they left the pile of Dead-Enders. Even though they were very deep in the cave, the exit was apparently now just right there.

“Come on,” Brendan walked over to the unconscious Quom. “We should move before the cave sends any more creatures.”

“Oh, Rey’s not in the cave.”

“Wh- She’s not?”

“Nope.”
Luke blinked, “So, this whole venture into a cave of the Dark Side, where Quom has bitten me in the neck.”

“Completely pointless,” Brendan nodded.

Luke raised an eyebrow, “I got to ask, the snark you do, is that homebrewed or did you and Felicity get it from your mother?”

“Actually, our father,” Brendan answered. “Never would do it to his superiors, but growing up with Uncle Garvan, Father learned the only true way to survive was to snark… Probably should have done that to my superiors. Getting exploded is surprisingly not fun.”

“Boys, stop comparing wounds,” Padmé shook her head, but he saw the smile on her face. It was the same he always saw on Leia’s face. “Besides I win automatically.”

“Blown up or electrocuted, sure they aren’t fun. But do not look me in the eye and tell me getting clawed in the back by a nexu doesn’t beat them both. Not only are you left alive, but you have to live with the continuing pain, not just the – pardon the pun – aftershock of electrocution.”

Luke chuckled and shook his head, “Tell me, Mother, are you always right?”

“Of course,” Padmé wrapped an arm around her son’s waist. “Where do you think your sister got it from?”

He laughed in a way he hadn’t for a very long time.

Kaydel was having a late lunch with Jessika and Tallie when Poe came up behind her.

“I thought we didn’t have secrets,” Poe said.

Jessika and Tallie traded a look.

“We’ll, uh… leave you two alone,” Jessika grabbed Tallie’s hand and quickly dragged her off, despite Tallie’s objections that she was still hungry and for them to at least grab their sandwiches from their lunch trays.

“Have you eaten?” Kaydel asked, picking at the lettuce poking out from beneath the bread of her shaak and swiss sandwich.

“Not hungry,” Poe took a seat on the bench next to her. Besides a couple stray techs and medical personnel who had just gotten off the morning shift, he and Kaydel were the only ones around.

“Eat,” she pushed over her meiloorun fruit.

“Kay-”

“Eat.”

Poe sighed and obeyed.
“Good,” Kaydel looked rather proud of herself.

Poe didn’t know it, but after the last time he had brought her home to Yavin IV for dinner with his father, she had promised Kes she would make sure Poe properly ate and sought medical assistance when needed. Poe was great at keeping his hygiene, but that rest of his health he liked to gamble on. Since Kaydel and Kes agreed they’d like him around for another good several decades, they had conspired to ensure it the best they could.

Plus, now that BB-8 was distracted with apparently pursuing one of the first cases of droid romance Kaydel had ever heard of, someone needed to keep Poe in line.

Kaydel chuckled quietly.

“What?” Poe asked as he worked on peeling his fruit. The spiky orange skin was edible, but too painful to be worth it.

“Just thinking about BB-8 and Ivee,” she answered. “Particularly about Rose’s reaction to the news. I believe her words were: Are you kidding? Even BB-8 has a girlfriend? Screw it, I’m building my own boyfriend. Jess then started to give her tips on how to build a droid.”

“Well, she would need to know how,” Poe laughed. “If Jess blows up another astromech, she’s not going to get anymore volunteers. She’ll have to build one of her own. BB-8 is so nervous about Ivee flying with her, even though he’s the one who came up with the idea for Ivee to be paired with Jess. You know, the droids call her The Great Destroyer?”

“Apparently Tallie started that one, and things got out of hand. It’s the one secret she’ll never tell Jess.”

The smile on Poe’s face fell, “So, you’re okay with secrets in a relationship, then?”

Kaydel narrowed her eyes, “I didn’t say that.”

“Come on, Babe,” Poe grabbed Kaydel’s knife and started to cut a section from his peeled fruit. “I’ve told you every single one of my secrets.”

“You know, I doubt that.”

“At least the ones that matter. Sure, maybe I didn’t tell you things like I once intentionally packed rotten fruit in a shipment to a vendor when I was six because I wanted to be done with my chores and just go play.”

“You did that?”

“Dad was pissed. Almost wrecked our farm’s reputation for the season, but Mom talked him down. I was only six after all.”

Kaydel watched him quickly pop the piece of meiloorun fruit so he didn’t have to keep talking about his mother, “Look, Poe, I didn’t withhold the thing about my father because I wanted to hurt you… It just hurts to talk about them.”

“That doesn’t mean we shouldn’t.”

“No… it doesn’t.” Kaydel sighed and wiped a little bit of the fruit’s juice that had dribbled down his chin. She lifted up slightly – it really sucked dating a guy seven inches taller – and kissed him. Kaydel grinned as she pulled away, “Your lips taste like meiloorun.”
“Oh really?” Poe kissed her again, “Well, now so do yours.”

Kaydel pulled his head down to share a few more sweet but sticky meiloorun kisses. Poe was eager to respond, but eventually he had to pull away.

“Don’t you distract me with your feminine wiles,” Poe teased. “We still have a conversation to have.”

She smiled and stroked his cheek, “Yeah, I suppose we do.”

So, they talked. And Kaydel found it was so much easier than she thought it would be. But of course it was, she realized. This was Poe Dameron, the man she loved. She could talk to him about anything. Even if it was about how she was thrown out of the house at seventeen because she refused to join the family business and sell weapons to the First Order. Because it didn’t matter if the Connix family were her flesh and blood, they weren’t her family.

Poe was.

Aletha was.

Paige was. Jessika was. Rose was. Kira was.

BB-8 was. Ivey was. Tallie was. Evan was. Peazy was. Diego was. Brance was. Leia was.

The Resistance was.

And she wouldn’t have picked anyone else.

…Though Obi-Wan Kenobi would have been a cool grandfather.

“So, to be clear,” Luke’s mind was buzzing as they exited the cave, struggling to carry Quom who was flopping every which way with the slightest jostle. Even unconscious, Quom Tinadar made everything far more difficult than needed to be, “The two of you are genuinely alive?”

“For a few hours more,” Brendan blinked at the sudden sunlight. “Where can we put your friend?”

“Back seat of my speeder,” Luke led them to do just that.

With a grunt, the trio gracelessly tossed Quom in the backseat.

“Damn it, Doc,” Quom groaned and rolled over, “five more minutes.”

“Well, he’s back to normal,” Luke exhaled in relief. “Or at least as normal as Quom Tinadar can manage. I swear, I love the guy, but I have never met someone so… who could just be so annoying and make things so much worse than they need to be, but somehow manage to make enough accidents to result in success and somehow be a little bit endearing.”

“Clearly, no one has introduced you to Jar Jar,” Padmé muttered.

Luke frowned, but Padmé waved him off.

“Sorry about this mess, Luke,” Brendan said. “I wish we could tell you where Rey actually is so you wouldn’t have had to bother with this whole mess.”
“In a weird way, it’s actually worth it,” Luke smiled. “I’ve wanted to meet both of you for so long. Sure, maybe the two of you aren’t exactly the top of my dead people I wish I could see list, but you certainly are in the top twenty.”

“Top twenty?” Padmé teased.

“Okay, you’re number four after Felicity, Aunt Beru, and Uncle Owen in that order, and Brendan’s number seventeen behind Biggs but before Ji-Dan Hayato,” Luke replied. “Sorry, Brendan, but I’ve got things to resolve with Wedge, I want so badly to see my Jedi students again particularly my closest friends, then there’s Nakari, and not to mention my grandparents—”

Brendan held up his hand, “I don’t need the whole list, Little Bro.”

The name made Luke smile.

“I’m just glad we did get to meet,” Luke clasped his mother’s hand. “Now, what’s this whole thing about your death?”

“It’s why I am so mad about this whole Alyla business!” exclaimed a very familiar voice.

Luke looked at Padmé, “Uh…”

“I told you he couldn’t be inside the cave,” Padmé smiled. “I never said anything about outside.”

Luke sighed as his father materialized before their eyes, and he instantly was trying to find a way to hold Padmé and kiss her.

“Padmé,” his voice was so reverent.

“Oh, Anakin,” Padmé, though wise, was as desperate to hold him as well and was going along in his attempts to embrace her.

Luke watched the scene with a smile but had to admit it wasn’t his first pick of sights to watch.

Brendan laughed and patted Luke’s shoulder, “Nothing quite like the awkwardness of watching your parents kiss.”

“I’m kind of grateful that Uncle Owen wasn’t an openly affectionate man,” Luke admitted.

“Hey, I’d take openly affectionate over my father any day. You know we had a rule in our house that Father was allowed to alter the outfits we were wearing however he wanted?”

“Learned that the hard way when I first asked Felicity to wear a different necklace to a business dinner.”

“Good,” Brendan smiled a little. “I always wanted her to stand up for herself like that… I’m just sad that I never got around to seeing the wonderful woman she became.”

Luke took a deep breath, “Felicity Rhiaon… is one of the greatest women I have ever had the pleasure of knowing. I am truly grateful that I was able to be her husband.”

“By the Gods,” Brendan called to Anakin and Padmé, “would you two quit it already? He is a ghost. Your reunion isn’t going to work. We’re burning daylight. Literally, once that sun has set, Padmé and I are gone.”

Padmé sighed and pulled back from Anakin, “He’s right, Ani. We don’t have a lot of time.”
“But Padmé-”

“Later. It’s not like we don’t see each other in the other world. Well, at least when I can get you to stop bothering our children.”

“Hey, I mostly do it when I’m avoiding Mace Windu.”

Luke frowned, “I have so many questions, and yet a sneaking suspicion none will be answered.”

“Yeah, you’re going to need to wait on that whole answers about the afterlife thing until you’re dead,” Brendan admitted. “So we doing this?”

“I think I’m ready,” Padmé nodded.

Anakin and Padmé traded a look.

“Well, Luke, you have to understand,” Padmé said, “I am so happy to be able to see you and speak with you. I left you far too soon, and we have so much time to make up for… But you aren’t the only one I left behind.”

“Little tricky, but I can manage to transport both of them away from here for a time,” Anakin answered.

“We figured we’d do a half and half thing,” Brendan explained. “You and I can spend some time together while Padmé goes with Anakin to see Leia—”

Luke opened his mouth, but Anakin was quicker.

“I’m not sticking around. I’ll let them have their time together unimpeded.”

“And then Anakin will bring me back and see you while Brendan goes off to visit,” Padmé ended.

Luke frowned, “You want to see Leia?”

Brendan shrugged, “It’d be nice, but I’m more into seeing a blood relative. A female brunette with hazel eyes you are well acquainted with.”

Anakin shot Brendan a look, “Remember the rules about living statuses.”

“Hey, I’m just happy someone managed to tell me Rey is alright,” Luke said.

Padmé and Anakin glared at Brendan, but he just shrugged.

“Alright, we should get going,” Padmé said.

“Wait,” Luke said, “what about the whole death thing you promised to explain?”

“When I return.” Padmé stroked her son’s cheek, “I will come back. I promise.”

Her words were comforting, but the fear in his heart couldn’t be quelled enough. Luke desperately pulled his mother into hug.
“Please come back,” he whispered.

“I will, I promise.”

Padmé held him so tightly, but soon enough she broke the hug. With a final touch of his cheek – the same way she had given his only touch in her life – Padmé stepped back, took Anakin’s hand, and was gone.

“She’ll be back,” Brendan promised. He nodded over to some low rocks outside the cave, the perfect seats, “Come on, let’s talk.”

Luke smiled and followed.

“Allright,” Brendan settled on a rock, completely ignoring the Dead-Enders at his feet. “What do you want to talk about?”

So Brendan explained the cave, how the tree scanned Luke’s memories to find a figure to test him with, how the creatures had been used against enemies of the Empire by the Dead-Enders, how the Force in an effort to even the odds would conjure an equal number of allies as there were opponents by actually drawing a figure from the netherworld of the Force, how the Force could not conjure someone the creatures had taken the form of.

Brendan shrugged, “Makes sense. Any more questions?”

“You know anything about my mother’s death?”

“Nope.”

“Ayila Kene?”

“Not going to lie; barely know who that is.”

“What my mother is doing with my sister?”

“Other than the fact she won’t reveal to Leia where you are, that’s between them,” Brendan answered. “Come on, you said it yourself, Luke, you’ve always wanted to meet me. Now that you’re talking to me… talk to me.”

“I just don’t know what to say. I have a million questions.”

“Well, we don’t have forever. Let’s stick to the biggest ones, Little Bro.”

“You going to keep calling me that?”

“In life I called my sister three things: Fliss, Shortstack, and Little Sis. You can pick between Lu, Shortstop, and Little Bro.”

“Good choice. So, what’s up?”
“Okay, um… What made you become a Rebel? The tipping point that is.”

Brendan sighed, “The last time I visited Felicity, I had already talked to Leia about joining the Rebellion. My senior officer found out, called me into his office, told me that he had received reports of possible rebellious actions on my part… four of the highest-ranking officers on the ship surrounded me, and beat the shit out of me. Afterwards they told me that if I made the wrong choice about all of this, the next time would be worse. I begged Bail Organa to let me join the Rebellion. I would have gotten away sooner, but my mental health issues…”

“Why did you never tell Felicity about your family’s mental health history? Your mother? Yourself? Why didn’t you warn her?”

“I tried to, but Father stopped every attempt I made… and perhaps… Perhaps I was too much of a coward to tell her. I wanted her to escape that mess so badly that I convinced myself she would. I’m sorry about her Postpartum Depression.”

Luke shook his head, “It’s in the past. What about Tyla? Do you blame her for what happened?”

“Yes,” Brendan answered honestly, “but I forgive her. I don’t absolve her, but I believe she made atonement, especially considering her actions during the Burning of Rornian.”

“You’ll find out someday. Come on, Luke, is this what you really want to ask me?”

“I guess my biggest question is,” Luke took a deep breath, “if you had lived, would you have approved of me being with Felicity?”

Brendan was silent for very long time.

“No,” he finally admitted.

“I don’t believe you would be good for Felicity… Not the one whose brother had lived.” Brendan explained, “My death changed my sister forever. It made her harder, stronger, bolder, less easy to manipulate – not that I’m implying you do that to her. But the reason you work so well with Fliss is that the two of you are equals in pain and experience. You challenge each other and understand her as well as you understand yourself. But a Fliss who hadn’t lost me? You two wouldn’t have lasted. She would have had her backbone surgically removed by our father. Felicity would have hated you for being a Rebel, and you would have only pitied her. You two would never have worked.”

Brendan then laughed and patted Luke’s shoulder.

“But hey,” Brendan grinned, “a Luke Skywalker who never met R2-D2 would have been a pretty good match. I would have been annoyed as hell by you, and tried to push you the way I pushed her, but that pairing would work.”

Luke smiled, “And what of a Brendan Rhiaon who was injured by Faclov but not killed?”

“He’d be too busy banking on his fame for destroying the Death Star, and not too concerned with the likes of Luke Whowalker. Hell, I may have even had Leia set the two of you up to get Fliss off my back for a while.”

“Oh, I’d still have taken that shot,” Luke laughed. “I don’t care how good a pilot you were, I’m still better.”

Brendan’s smile stayed on his face but something sad flickered in his eyes.

Luke sighed, understanding, “Too bad we can never know for sure. There is one thing we can agree on, however.”

“What’s that?”

“No matter what path destiny may have played out… Felicity’s a terrible pilot in all universes.”

Brendan barked a laugh, “Yeah. I blame Andromias side. I still can’t believe she kept her promise to me so firmly. Like, I get it Fliss, you hold the moment so dear, but Good Gods, Woman, get a driver’s license. She really screwed herself over with that mess.”

“What can I say? Felicity Rhiaon’s a stubborn woman, and I love her for it.”

“What’s that?”

“Don’t beat yourself up over the whole Aletha thing. Fliss knows you love her above all else, and she will understand why you did what you did. She wants you to be happy. You and Rey are all that truly matters to her. Now, come on, Skywalker, let’s stop dancing around and just get to the thing we really need to talk about.”

Luke frowned, racking his brain for some other dire question he had miss, “I don’t understand. What else is there that is so pressing to speak about?”

“Only the most important information in all of the Galaxy for me to pass on to you,” Brendan gave a one corner smirk that Luke knew so well. “Embarrassing stories about my sister that she never wanted you to know.”

He laughed, “Oh, bring it on.”

---

Refnu reminded me and Rose of home, too, in a way. It was a cold and dark planet, and only warm enough for life because of its dense cloud cover. But Refnu had that same stark beauty I remembered from back home, and that was before we found out the Nefrians had imported snowgrape vines and selakale. For just a moment, holding a snowgrape’s sour fruit under my tongue, I could close my eyes and imagine everything that’s happened to us was a dream. I’d be at home in our sunroom, ready to get geared up and fly another hop for Central Ridge Mining. That wasn’t true of course.

But it was nice to imagine.

- The Journal of Paige Tico

“You know when Cat said the fruit would be a bittersweet thing, I thought he meant the flavor,” Evan watched in concern as his girlfriend had an unusually emotion reaction to eating a grape.

“Sorry,” Paige wiped away a tear, “just memories. I do appreciate the gift, Anh Yêu.”
“Good,” Evan grinned, “you have no idea the lengths I had to go through to get that for you. Savor it though. I don’t have any favors left to call in to get you more after this.”

“Do you mind if I share with Rose?”

“I’d be a fool to tell you no, Em Yêu,” Evan faltered a little bit over the name. It had been his idea to use terms of affection from Paige’s homeworld, but he struggled with the language.

Paige smiled as she folded up the little handkerchief of snowgrapes and tucked them away in a pocket, “Your pronunciation is getting better.”

“I’m glad to hear it,” Evan reached out with his left hand to grasp hers.

She was sitting with him as he had some down time to do paperwork. Unlike Poe and Kaydel, Paige and Evan had proven to their superiors not to be a nuisance when one was trying to work and had been granted the privilege of visiting each other during duty.

Poe on the other hand was currently working on a twelve-day ban from the Control Center – formerly the Communications Center until Diego took charge and decided to rename it for reasons no one had yet to figure out. Poe’s ban was a bit annoying as now Snap and Jessika had to alternate taking his place in the Center and acting as go-betweens when Poe needed to be involved in a meeting. Some asked why Kaydel wasn’t just scheduled to be off-duty during said meetings, but Diego insisted that Connix’s presence or absence wasn’t important. A ban was a ban, end of story.

“So I hear Rose got in a little trouble today,” Evan absentmindedly stroked Paige’s hand with a thumb as he looked over General Organa’s medical chart. She was scheduled for a check up on her bombing injuries from the First Order poison gas she had endured several years ago. “Anything to do with the security officers who picked up Grandma earlier?”

“Nalto found out about the comm and Kira’s Council,” Paige explained. “She got hauled in with Kaydel, Poe, myself, Rose, and Jessika over the matter. Everyone who knows about the Council is in hot water right now.”

“Do they know I know about it?”

“I thought no point in mentioning you as you haven’t actually spoken to her. I like to think of your involvement on the same level as General Organa’s. Knew enough to sign an autograph, but knows nothing beyond that. And definitely wasn’t the orchestrator of the toothbrushes and the Sabacc cards.”

“I knew I loved you for a reason,” Evan grinned. “And don’t knock the toothbrushes. Dental health is very important.”

“Yes, you already told me the story of how you seriously considered being a dentist, but chose nursing for the war, and plan on becoming a dentist after we win.” Paige pushed a lock of hair behind his ear, “Besides, you’re too cute to charge with treason.”

“I am that,” Evan chuckled.

“Alright, settle down, Hot Shot.”

“Only if I get a little something sweet from my Lucky Charm.”

He didn’t need to ask twice.
Brendan Rhiaon was everything Felicity had described. Luke had often wondered over the years if maybe his wife had idealized her brother. Though she may have exaggerated at points, Brendan was indeed as advertised.

If only they had been allowed some real time together. Luke knew Brendan would have fit right into the Skywalker family.

When Anakin and Padmé returned, the brothers shared a hug and a handshake.

Luke smiled, thinking of Rey, “I will.”

“It's time,” Anakin said quietly, standing behind Brendan. “She’s waiting.”

Brendan nodded, and then walked away.

“Yes?” he asked.

“Tell Leia I said hi,” Brendan winked.

And as Luke laughed, his brother-in-law was gone.

“He seems nice,” Padmé said.

“Yeah,” Luke smiled, “he was. Come.”

He led his mother to the rocks and took a seat.

“So,” Padmé started.

“Yeah,” Luke chuckled. “Did you have a nice conversation with Leia?”

“I did. She’s doing quite well. I think she’s with Han, he’s… terrifyingly like Anakin.”

“I know. I think it’s better for the Galaxy that they were enemies. Those two as friends… the thought is horrifying.”

“They certainly would have gotten along like a house on fire.”

“And set a few houses on fire in the process.”

“Oh, undoubtedly.”

Luke smiled, but sighed, “So, what did you talk about with her?”

Padmé took a deep breath, “That’s for her and I to know. If she wants to tell you, then so be it, but we discussed things I think she’d want to stay between us.”

“Ben and Father?”

“You did get my intuition.”
“Not enough to save me from the events of Hoth.”

“Let’s not talk about that,” Padmé shuddered. “You know, I never would have agreed to you two being separated, especially not where one got to be royalty and the other a farm boy. If I didn’t know it was because Bail Organa wanted a girl, I would wonder why it is my son was the one chosen to be trained over my daughter. I don’t care if you were technically born first, I will not stand for sexism. Even if this family does have the women be far more intelligent than the men.”

“In all fairness, despite that intelligence, the men do have a higher survival rate.”

“Your father was lit on fire, Han was in carbonite, you lost a hand and got electrocuted, and let’s not even start on what Ben Solo is doing with his life. The whole thing going on with Sasa is incredibly disturbing to me, and not just because she’s intentionally meant to remind him of me.”

“A nightmare for another day,” Padmé answered dryly. “Come, let this be about us.”

“Yes, let’s make it.”

Luke reached out to take her hand. He intentionally chose his left, and Padmé hesitated for a moment. Then she smiled and clasped the warm natural flesh of her son’s grip.

“Tell me about your death,” Luke asked quietly. “If you didn’t die from the Force Choke or the loss of will to live… how did you die? The droids couldn’t explain it.”

“They wouldn’t have been able to,” Padmé tried to not let her voice sound distant. “It was something beyond their logic filters, beyond the knowledge of the Jedi gathered, beyond anything Bail could have imagined… I died because Palpatine killed me.”

“You know why. He couldn’t have me running around, tempting Anakin back to the Light Side. I was good for the purpose I served him, but soon enough I proved a threat. So he ended my life. As for how, well… it turns out that the power he promised Anakin, the power to save one from death… was real.”

“But he didn’t save you.”

“No… he saved Anakin.”

Luke stared at her, “Father-”

“Died,” Padmé finished sharply. “Anakin died from his injuries on Mustafar, the same way that for a moment Rey died of heatstroke. Throughout my labour, Palpatine drained the life from me and transferred it into Anakin. Anakin Skywalker’s heart stopped the moment they first put on his helmet… and then Palpatine took the very last drop of my life force and gave it to Anakin. That is how I died. I, Padmé Amidala, who survived assassination attempts too numerous to count, fought in wars, dueled droids and humans and innumerable species… who kicked a nexu in the face, died because I was murdered by Palpatine. Not some loss of will to live.”

“That… certainly makes sense,” Luke squeezed her hand, the lump in his throat feeling especially thick. “But what does this have to do with Alyla?”

Something ice cold poured into Luke’s soul.

“…Alyla,” he whispered, “…was a failed attempt at that?”

Padmé squeezed her son’s hand.

Luke scrambled to work it all out, “But- But how? Who did it? How did they know how to do it? Why did they do it? Was she killed to save another? Or did someone try to save her?”

“I cannot tell you,” Padmé replied. “That is a story to be told at another time, but I promise that you will receive answers.”

“But I want to know now!”

He couldn’t help but laugh, “Alright, that may have been a little whiny.”

“You’re not nineteen asking for power convertors anymore.”

“Oh no. How do you know about that?”

“I’m your mother,” Padmé grinned. “And parents know everything.”

Luke laughed, “Now if only that were true.”

“You’re doing a fine job of raising Rey, Luke.”

“I know, but sometimes it’s just so difficult. I wish she had a better life than the one I’ve given her. Something worthy of a Skywalker woman.”

“Luke, considering the fact that at sixteen, Rey’s mother was full time Rebel, her aunt was a Senator, and her grandmother was the Queen of a planet for several years, I think Rey got off easy. Besides, she does get to train to be a Jedi now.”

“I suppose there is that.”

Though they didn’t have much time together, for a moment the pair just sat in silence and stared at each other.

“You know, you’re very handsome, Luke,” Padmé said after a while. “Definitely got your father’s features, though I do see a little of myself in you.”

Luke tried to smile a little, “Father said I got all the best parts of you. The temperament, the sense of style, the responsibility, the unwavering faith.”

“No, you got that from him. Even when he was a slave he was filled with such life… such hope. I’m proud of the man you’ve become.”

“You shouldn’t,” Luke turned his face away. “The choices I’ve made, how I’ve dealt with things… I’m hiding in a desert, away from the family who loves me, and am lying to my daughter on a daily basis.”

“I never said you were a perfect man… you wouldn’t be your father’s son if you were. And you certainly wouldn’t have been mine.”
“I know I’m not perfect. I can be… selfish.”

“Maybe once every ten years.”

“I’m serious. All that’s I’ve done in the past twenty years has been selfish, and people died because of that. Felicity died because of that.”

“Felicity made a choice,” Padmé said firmly. “What happened to her wasn’t because of the things you did. She could have escaped the fate she endured, but she chose not to because she had faith in her husband. The same way I had faith in mine.”

“And yet I couldn’t save her any less than he saved you,” Luke retorted.

“Felicity’s story is not mine. Let’s not waste time on quibbling who is and is not selfish.”

“But I’m selfish… I want you to stay with me. Make up for all of the time we lost.”

Padmé smiled, “And that is not selfish. So let’s start making up that time.”

“There’s just so much more I want to know, to say, to experience.” Luke sighed, unable to bear looking at the woman who was going to be so cruelly ripped away from him once more. “How much time do we have?”

Padmé turned his face back to hers and smiled, “Enough.”

And as the sun set in the distance, Luke enjoyed what time he did have to spend with his mother.

Sitting in corner where no one would bother him, R2-D2 sat in low power mode with a tarp thrown over him. The Command Center wasn’t busy in the evening, so no one gave much notice as Doctor Kalonia pulled off the tarp and bent down to Artoo’s level.

“Artoo?” she whispered, glancing around to make sure no one was paying attention. “Hey, Artoo, it’s Meredyth. I just wanted to let you know… Luke’s not on Ahch-to. He’s on Jakku, and he’s there because we were wrong. Felicity lied. Rey’s alive, and she’s with Luke. They’re training and they’re together.”

Despite the magnitude of the proclamation, R2-D2 didn’t so much as blink a light.

She sighed and patted his dome, “I just thought you would want to know.”

Kalonia rose back to her feet and headed to her room for some much-deserved sleep.

For an hour, nothing happened in the Command Center.

Then R2-D2 – whose conversation functions were still operational – finally finished processing the information Meredyth Kalonia had shared with him.

Though no one could hear it, R2-D2 let out a single triumphant…

BEEP!

His database reviewed an audio clip from Master Luke – though did not play it out loud.
“I can’t do it anymore, Artoo. I can’t stay here knowing what happened to my students... and my girls.”

Mistress Rey was alive.

Mistress Rey was alive and with Master Luke.

If one of Master Luke’s girls were alive, then that meant Master Luke was going to come home.

And R2-D2 would be right here, ready and waiting for Master Luke... to give him a piece of his mind.

God damn Skywalkers and their theatrics.

He wouldn’t have it any other way.

Proving she was in fact a god damn Skywalker, Rey found herself hit by another sandstorm right as she was about to set out. Sure, Aletha was going to be mad Rey didn’t uphold her promise to set out straight away to Niima Outpost, but what choice did Rey have but to spend another night?

She was tweaking a small part of the ship, taking a closer look at the minutiae that would needed to be tended to. When she fixed things, she let her mind wander, and lately that wandering had been focused on the mysteries of her past. Now that she had tangible facts and certain answers, a few of the mysteries were becoming clear.

For example, that funny feeling she got when hearing stories about Han Solo and Luke Skywalker? That feeling like she had heard them before somewhere? That was because she had... because if she lived in Temple Village, that meant she lived very close to Luke Skywalker and Rogue One.

Of course, it was a little closer than she would have guessed, but that’s neither here nor there. Rey was more focused on the idea that it meant she probably had met Han Solo and Chewbacca at some point.

But then came another revelation she neither expected nor wanted. The thought hit Rey so hard and so suddenly that it literally made her drop her wrench.

The revelation that the man she had seen in her vision – her cousin she knew by the colour of his Force Signature – was the same man that had been in the footage of her mother’s death.

She almost threw up. Her cousin had assisted in her mother’s murder? Why? Had he been the one to pull the trigger? Rey would have to see the footage again, as unbearable as that thought was. But she couldn’t remember what exactly her cousin had done in the footage.

Oh kriff, she was wrong. Rey did remember something the man who apparently was her cousin had done.

Her fucking cousin had kicked her mother’s dead body.

What the fuck was wrong with her family?

Rey couldn’t tame her rage; she knew it was of the Dark Side, but she couldn’t temper it. She wanted to rip him to shreds with her bare hands.
Look if he wanted to kill his own mother – even if it was her Aunt Alyla – that was one thing, but killing her mother? Oh, there was going to be hell to pay!

“Calm yourself, Rey,” a voice gently ordered.

Rey whipped around, hand reaching for her staff when she saw the man standing there. Outlined in blue, a man who looked much like her father smiled at her.

“Grandfather,” Rey recognized him from the past few nights ago.

“Hello, Rey,” Anakin smiled. “It’s good to finally speak to you.”

“Yeah, it is,” she gave a small grin. She felt a little of her anger dissipating, but not all of it. “Why have you not spoken to me before?”

“Uh… your father kind of forbid me,” Anakin awkwardly admitting. “Apparently, he doesn’t trust me to keep his secrets… Definitely got that from his mother, though that’s not saying she didn’t have good reasons for said distrust. I’m a bit of a troublemaker.”

“Must be genetic.”

“If it is, it’s definitely the first generation with me. My mother wasn’t anything of that sort. Actually, she’s why I decided to appear to you.”

“How so?”

“I know what you’re feeling, Rey,” Anakin said. “My mother was murdered, and I went down the same path you’re considering. I went waay down that path, and you can’t take back the things that happen down there. I did something very terrible to the people who took her from me, and it was a turning point in my life. One I don’t recommend you take… one I couldn’t stop your cousin from taking.”

“But he kicked her,” Rey fought back her tears. “He took her from me and then made a mockery of the act.”

“I know, Rey. I know far more than even you know, but revenge is not the way of the Jedi. It’s of the Sith, of the Dark Side, and of evil. There’s no good that will come from trying to take revenge whether it’s through words or actions.”

“Words?” Rey frowned, the gears turning in her head. “I’ve spoken to him. In real life?”

Anakin sighed, “Yes, you interacted with him that day.”

“Can I do it again? Can you connect us like Alyla did?”

“Rey, I shouldn’t-“

“Please! I want to talk to him.” Tears shined in her hazel eyes as she looked at her grandfather so helplessly. “Please, Grandfather… let me speak to him.”

Anakin thought about it, “Alright. But I wash my hands of this.”

It was like someone had hit the mute button on reality, all noise ceased as she was sucked into some sort of vacuum. A small pocket of reality, set where she was sitting and yet that set her apart from everything.

There he sat, maybe on a bed though she couldn’t see what clothes he wore. Tall, pale, black hair she knew to be dyed, although that may have been because the brown roots of his father were showing. Clearly it was time for a touch up. His face was long and sullen, and there was something sad and empty in his brown eyes.

She knew those eyes from somewhere. Her heart whispered that it was those of her aunt, but those were not the eyes of Alyla Kene.

His body tensed, and his brow furrowed. Then suddenly, his head turned, and he was looking straight at her.

Their eyes met, Rhiaon hazel locking with Naberrie brown, and the sound of their synchronized breathing screeched in their ears like the screams of the wind in a hurricane.

Her cousin frowned, his face filled with disbelief, “Rey?”

“Ben,” Rey simply said, the name coming to her lips so naturally.

Then Rey grabbed the wrench sitting next to her and threw it at his head as hard as she could manage.

Ben jumped, lifting his arms to shield his face from the weapon.

It hit the ship wall opposite her and fell lamely to the ground.

Ben panted as he realized he had not been hurt. He looked up at her in shock, his body shaking a little as he struggled to process what had happened.

And then he shot to his feet and threw out his hand, trying to harness the Force to push the vision from his mind.

“Leave me be, Alyla,” Ben ordered.

But there Rey stayed, and there she did not move.

Ben frowned and lowered his hand. “She’s not doing this. Her Signature isn’t here, in fact, there’s another… Lilac. Yours. How is that possible? Are you a Force Ghost?”

Rey said nothing, her anger building as the bond between them grew stronger.

“No, you weren’t trained enough for that.” Ben turned to look behind himself, “Can you see my surroundings?”

“You’re gonna pay for what you did!” Rey spat at him.

“I can’t see yours,” he ignored her words as he turned back. Such sentiments of anger had been hurled at him in dreams and visions before, but there was something different about this one. Something he couldn’t put his finger on. “Just you. So, no. Not a Force Ghost. Not a dream. Not a vision. This is something else.”

Rey finally snapped.

“Did you hear a thing I said?” Rey screamed. “I’m going to make you pay!”
“For what exactly?” Ben asked, his voice disinterested. Apparently once you committed enough sins, you didn’t really care which one someone would swear vengeance for.

“For what you did to my mother!”

“Oh, that one.”

“You disgusting traitor! How dare you turn your back on us! How dare you turn against my mother!”

“Honestly, Rey, I didn’t turn on her,” Ben said simply. “You may have been too young to perceive it with much depth, but our mutual hatred was plain even to you.”

“You kicked her lifeless corpse!” Rey screeched. “She was no longer a threat and still what you chose to do to her body-”

“I simply thought it poetic justice.”

Rey scoffed, “Kicking her body was poetic justice?”

“No. When I took her body and-” Ben stopped. His eyes widened with realization, “…You don’t know what I did to her. How do you not know?”

“I know enough.”

“This doesn’t make sense,” Ben whispered, trying to work it out.

Rey’s voice shook as the tears filled her eyes, “I know that you beat her, tortured her, tied her up, and shot her in the head. You killed my mother!”

It was a blow to Ben’s gut. No, there was something really wrong. How did Rey not know the truth? How did Rey not know it was Phasma?

“Rey, please just let me explain,” Ben begged.

“No!” her eyes – Felicity Rhiaon’s eyes – burned into his fearful brown ones. Rey seethed, “Killer.”

“No,” he whispered.

“You killed my mother!” Rey screamed at him.

“Rey, listen to me-”

“You’re a monster!”

“No! I-”

“Kylo?” a woman asked.

Kylo Ren snapped out of the vision. He blinked as he looked up at the woman who had been lying in his arms a short while ago. She had been showering while he held his conversation with the ghost of his cousin, hence why she hadn’t heard it.
At least he hoped she hadn’t heard it.

“Are you alright?” she looked on him with concern as she dropped her towel and picked up her clothing from the floor. Her soft sighs and smiles had been a comfort as always, but always too brief, and never enough to quell the storm within.

He rubbed his face warily as she buttoned her pants. His own were lying somewhere in the room, he sitting on the bed in nothing but a pair of boxers.

“Just a vision,” he turned his face away from her, struggling for control. “It’s nothing, Tara.”

She narrowed her eyes. Of course, she gets the victory of getting Sasa out of his bed for once, and Kylo got hit with a vision, something she hated dealing with.

Tara bent down to pick up her bra at his feet, “Anything important? Or is it more of your angsty family crap? Because you take that shit to Sasa.”

Kylo smiled bitterly, “Wouldn’t want to waste your precious time. I’ll be sure to call for her in the morning.”

Tara stared at him for a silent moment, and then scratched him across the face.

“Ow! What the-”

Her tongue was in his mouth and her hands pulling his hair by the root. His hand went for her neck, squeezing ever so gently and listening carefully for their safe word – Hux. Kylo didn’t know if Tara’s preference for choking was a play on the Vader thing or her own fetish, but he knew it drove her wild. She pushed his tongue from her mouth with her own, then bore down on his lip hard. The tasted blood was on his tongue as she tore open the clot from the earlier assault during their coupling. There were long scratches down his back, and the next morning Hux would make fun of a hickey on Kylo’s neck.

He was breathless when Tara pulled away.

“Tell me,” Tara smirked, “does the redhead give and take pain too?”

“Not as much, as expertly, and as enthusiastically as you,” he answered.

“And don’t you forget it.” Tara stood up and resumed her dressing, “If you are so eager for the rebalancing crap, I could call Sasa for you right now.”

Kylo looked over at his crumpled sheets and discarded clothing on the ground. An odd feeling coursed through him. Was he feeling guilty?

“No,” Kylo said quickly. “Not tonight.”

“I thought not,” Tara smiled bitterly, but Kylo knew he couldn’t get away with biting her lip.

“I’ll be fine tonight,” Kylo tried to pretend he was in control. “Unless you wish to stay?”

Tara shot him a look, “The redhead cuddles. Not me. Good night, Kylo.”

“Good night, Tara.”

He winced when the door closed.
The room was perfectly silent.

Kylo glanced at the clock. 10:47, not that late yet. Maybe he could call Sasa-

No! Something deep inside of him screamed. Sasa may not be cunning, or even overly intelligent, but she would know what happened here. Even if he cleaned the room from top to bottom, she would know it. She would smell it in the air, or just see it on his guilty face.

Why did he feel guilty?

Because Tara Ren is not your chosen bride.

Kylo winced, “Supreme Leader, please. Not right now.”

Snoke’s voice was always so loud, so forceful in his mind. Kylo could never carry a straight thought while Snoke was in his mind. He couldn’t tune it out no matter how hard he tried.

Kylo had never stood a chance against Snoke’s control.

Plus, it was embarrassing to be reminded that the Supreme Leader was always watching him. Even during sex.

My Apprentice, why do you continue to choose to couple with Tara so often?

“Supreme Leader, you said it yourself, the more attempts I make with the most partners, the more likely I am to impregnate one of them.”

Yet you fail to realize that I do not wish for you to impregnate just anyone. The Skywalker Legacy must continue, and it will only grow strong if you find an exceptional mother, unlike the misstep your uncle took.

Kylo winced.

My Apprentice, I seek to take care of you. To guide you on the right path. I have moulded the perfect bride for you, and yet you ignore her in favor of your deputy.

“I couple with Sasa often,” Kylo objected.

But not more than Tara. Things have started to become more even, but Sasa should be surpassing her.

“With all due respect, Supreme Leader, if I were to couple with Sasa more than Tara, I’m fairly certain Tara would cut off my balls.”

To Kylo’s surprise, Snoke laughed.

I suppose that would be counterproductive. Very well, I shall see to Tara and we will reconcile this matter. Continue with your efforts, My Apprentice, but keep in mind that there is more honour in mothering Sasa than Tara. Sasa Ren has been perfectly groomed to be your partner, but if she does not please you there are always others.

Kylo frowned, “Others?”

Sasa is only one of eight whom I have groomed for you. All hold different personalities and traits making you compatible with each pair in a unique way. The project of Nera Ren was an unfortunate failure, but Sasa can be replaced as easily as her.

He swallowed hard. Kylo remembered how well he had gotten along with Nera. If he had to pick one Knight of Ren he genuinely would have called his friend, Nera had been it. Unfortunately, they had not been sexually compatible, and it had cost Nera her life.

Kylo was stunned to hear that Nera had been groomed like Sasa. Nera had been against coupling with him from the get-go, but if that’s what she had been trained for-

Then he smiled. He knew the truth: Nera had been too much of a rebel for the First Order – another reason she had been knocked off – and rejecting Kylo would have been the perfect way to get back at Snoke for all those years of training she never wanted.

He missed Nera.

Rest, My Apprentice. Gather your strength and reflect on your bond in the morning. If Sasa does not please you, I will replace her.

His heart hammered in his chest, “What? No. You can’t!”

Oh? Has My Apprentice found favor with someone?

Kylo didn’t like how happy Snoke sounded, “I only find favor with her because you find such favor with her. Truly she must be the best of the best if of all the women you groomed for me, you chose her above all others.”

She was chosen for her control of emotions, plain and simple. You struggle most with such abilities, so I chose her because she was the only one able to regulate and cut off emotion, nothing more. I’m sorry if I misled you, My Apprentice, but Sasa Ren is not special.

And as Snoke disappeared from his mind, the Supreme Leader’s words left Kylo feeling numb.

He was puttering around the room, collecting his clothes when he saw it. There was a hair clip sitting on his desk: a bit of silver twisted into the royal crest of Alderaan.

Sasa often sported Alderiaan symbols, and even Kylo understood it was a mandate from Snoke to manipulate him. Actually, he didn’t mind it; Sasa was very interested in Alderiaan history, culture, and most of all, fashion. Kylo had been known to spend some of the nights they lie in bed together, sleep beyond their reach, teaching her the language of High Alderiaan – a practically dead language taught to him by Threepio and his mother as a child.

Kylo glanced back at his bed. His heart ached as he longed for her warm arms to be waiting there for him. But he couldn’t bear to see the look on her face when she realized Tara had ridden him on that very mattress only twenty minutes before.

He sighed as his hand closed upon the hair clip.

I’m sorry if I misled you, My Apprentice, but Sasa Ren is not special.

With a tear shining in his eye, Ben Solo whispered, “She is to me.”
In a world not of the living, Obi-Wan Kenobi found a rather nervous looking Anakin Skywalker by himself.

“Relax, My Friend,” Obi-Wan said. “Padmé will return to this world soon enough. Frankly, I thought you would be happy to hear that she gets to bond with your children in their world for a while.”

“That’s not why I’m nervous, Obi-Wan,” Anakin said.

“Then what is it?”

“I think… I think I may have just accidentally formed a permanent Force-bond between Rey and Ben. I only meant to do it briefly, but well… now their minds are connected… forever.”

Obi-Wan blinked at his former Padawan, the painful silence stretching on endlessly.

“That… is not good news,” Obi-Wan finally declared.

Anakin groaned and buried his face in his hands.

Only he could continue to directly screw up the Galaxy from beyond the grave.

Chapter End Notes

Coming Up Next Chapter…

To Be a Knight
When Sasa makes her monthly report to Snoke, FN-2187 is asked by Wiln Ren to come along and help him train The Chosen – the girls specially raised to be the consort of Kylo Ren. As FN-2187 gains insight into the life of a Knight of Ren, he fears he may not be right for the job. Meanwhile, Tara, Hux, and Cern plot to end Sasa and Kylo’s budding romance.

Yeah, so that’s my answer in this story for why Ben and Rey develop their Force-bond. It’s not because of Snoke, or destiny, or the nature of their family.

It’s because Anakin Skywalker can’t stop fucking up the Galaxy.

Someone needs to revoke his Force Ghost privileges.

To those excited at the idea of the cave being a thing to bring back dead people and maybe Luke using it to see Felicity again for real, and oh the possibilities, I can’t wait…

It’s not coming back.

Brendan and Padmé’s appearance was the result of me literally writing Luke into the corner and not knowing how to get him out alive and with Quom. I’ve always wanted to write a scene between him and dead big bro-in-law Brendan, and I’m a sucker for anything with Luke and Padmé interacting so I thought ghost cameo.
For those wondering, yes, I will show the scene of Leia and Padmé’s meeting, but I cut it out of this chapter because it was running too long. I’m going to put it in as a Leia flashback later, probably during TFA when Leia’s story needs a little padding. Likely right before the scene she tells Han to bring their son home.

In case anyone is confused because I told them something else, I decided at the last moment to switch the order of the next two chapters. So since Before the Awakening takes place over about eight months, it will come after the chapter To Be a Knight which occurs roughly the same time as this chapter. I thought it would be better to alternate the next few chapters between Jakku and the First Order rather than have a long time again where we don’t really see a lot of the people on Jakku. Some very important stuff is about to go down in the First Order, so I wanted to leave some breathing room. Plus people wanted to see some more Finn, so let’s check in on him.
To Be a Knight

Chapter Summary

FN-2187 learns what it means to be a Knight of Ren, Kylo comes up with a stupid solution to the Tara and Sasa feud, and Hux learns that no means no when dealing with a woman who uses Force Lightning.

Chapter Notes

So, I missed May the Fourth be with you, but it seems fitting that I post the First Order heavy chapter on Revenge of the Fifth… Get it?

I’ll shut up now (except not really because that would mean no chapter after this author’s note.)

Please note that huge chunks of the Finn portion of this chapter once again comes from Before the Awakening by Greg Rucka, whose writing I adore, but whose paragraphing is driving me insane. Particularly the very first section is almost entirely copy and pasted, but I have gone through, changed things, cut things, and added things. Just know that the bulk of it, is in fact not my work.

Trigger Warning: This chapter contains a scene near the end where Hux very clearly sexually harasses Sasa. The scene is uncomfortable, and intentionally written to be. Reader discretion is advised.

See the end of the chapter for more notes.

The Long Way Home

Chapter Forty-Eight

To Be a Knight

There were four of them in the fire-team, and because shouting out things like, “FN-twenty-one eighty-seven, watch your back!” was a mouthful, especially when the blaster fire was searing the air around them, they’d defaulted to shorter versions. In front of the officers, in front of Captain Phasma especially, they always used their appropriate designations, of course. But in the barracks and in combat, they used the names they’d given one another or the names they’d given themselves.

FN-2199, he was Nines, because he liked the sound of it, simple as that. FN-2000 had told everyone to call him Zeroes, because he was proud of the fact that he’d landed such a straightforward number as his designation. He thought it made him special, and either nobody had ever told him that being a “zero” wasn’t exactly something to be proud of or he didn’t care.

FN-2003 was the only one with an actual nickname. They called him Slip because of the incident that occurred on the day of their team selection. He always seemed just a little slower, a little clumsier than the rest of the fire-team. It wasn’t simply physical, either. Sometimes—in briefings, during training, during drills—you got the feeling that orders didn’t quite take with him, that he didn’t, or couldn’t, fully understand what it was he was supposed to be doing or how he was supposed to be doing it.

FN-2187 was simply Eight-Seven whenever one of the team wanted to shorten his designation. They didn’t do it very often. In whispers, Sasa Ren had been trying to come up with a name for him when Kylo wasn’t looking. They had tried FN, but it sounded too much like his general squad. Two-One didn’t roll off the tongue well and often became ‘Ton’ which FN-2187 wasn’t fond of. Eight-Seven reminded him of his isolation in the squad. Fyrn – his future Knight of Ren name – always made FN-2187 feel uncomfortable. Sasa had even tried Big Deal for a while in a secret reference to his still unknown to him connection to Felicity Rhiaon Skywalker, but that sounded ridiculous.

But FN-2187 was in fact a big deal in the First Order. Connection to Felicity Rhiaon aside, he was, as far as the training cadre and his peers were concerned, one of the best stormtroopers anyone had ever seen. He was everything their instructors wanted—loyal, dutiful, brave, smart, and strong. Whatever the test, whatever the evaluation, FN-2187 consistently scored in the top 1 percent. So he was FN-2187, well on his way to becoming the ideal First Order stormtrooper and some day an excellent Knight of Ren. That was what everyone thought, at least.

Except FN-2187 himself.

FN-2187, Zeroes, and Nines had taken cover behind what was left of an exterior perimeter wall, the section they were sheltering behind still mostly intact but cracked and scored with innumerable blaster hits. The wall marked the edge of the Republic compound, still heavily defended, and the suppressing fire being directed their way was withering. Bolts of bright blue sizzled overhead and smashed into the ground around them. They punched into the wall with enough force that the stormtroopers could feel the impact even through their armor.

“He did it again,” Zeroes said, elbowing FN-2187 and then pointing up-range, the direction from which they’d advanced.

FN-2187 crouched down and looked in the indicated direction. They were all virtually indistinguishable in their stormtrooper armor, but within his helmet, along with the near-constant stream of data projected across his lenses—telemetry, firing solutions, atmospheric conditions, everything up to and including the ammo count for his blaster rifle—individual ID tags would pop up whenever he looked directly at another trooper, his in-suit computer reading friendly identifications. According to that same stream of data, FN-2187 could see that Slip was exactly 29.3 meters back, crouched in cover behind the hulk of a blasted-out Republic speeder.

He could also see what Slip couldn’t—a squad of five Republic soldiers advancing on him unseen from the left flank. FN-2187 raised his rifle, sighting, but he knew before his helmet confirmed it that he was out of range. He could open fire, but there was no way he’d score a hit.

“He’s done,” Nines said. “We’ve got to advance.”

“He’s one of us,” FN-2187 said, lowering his rifle.
“We’ve got an objective,” Zeroes said. He jerked a thumb over his shoulder, toward the base. “It’s that way. We go back for him, we’ll be cut to shreds.”

Face hidden inside his helmet, FN-2187 frowned. Yes, they had an objective, and yes, there were enemies all around them, and yes, Zeroes was right. In the compound was their objective: an enemy position defended by a heavy repeating blaster. And whichever Republic soldiers were manning that thing, they knew their job. They’d seen two full squads cut down by it during their advance. The only reason FN-2187 could figure it hadn’t taken out Slip already was that whoever was on the trigger was waiting to see if one of them was going to do exactly what FN-2187 was thinking of doing – go back for him.

“We’re running out of time,” Zeroes said.

FN-2187 checked over his shoulder, back toward the compound. The terrain was uneven, and there was enough cover for a sustained fire-and-move advance. It would thin out the farther they advanced into the compound, approaching the heavy blaster emplacement, but it was doable if it was done smart.

“We’re gonna blow the mission,” Nines said. “On my order. Hold at the inner wall.”

“Hold at the inner wall,” FN-2187 said again. “Go!”

Neither Nines nor Zeroes liked it, FN-2187 could tell, but they were Stormtroopers, and that meant once orders were given they would follow them and follow them quickly. They moved at once, and FN-2187 waited a half-breath’s pause, letting each of them draw enemy fire, before launching forward. The terrain was just as bad in that direction, cruel, uneven, and strewn with broken rock and battle debris. Thick black clouds from engine fires clung to the ground, rolling across it like an uneven tide. He sprinted the first dozen meters, trying to keep low, zigzagging his way from points of cover and occasionally hurdling obstacles in his way.

He’d closed half the distance when one of the Republic soldiers saw him and gave a shout of alarm that carried across the battlefield. Just as the soldier opened fire, FN-2187 dove forward, tumbled into a freshly made crater, and lay flat for a second before popping up on his elbows. He fired twice before dropping down again, then rolled to his right and repeated, firing three times. He was pleased to see that he’d taken out two of the enemy.

But that left three more, and now he had their attention.

FN-2187 keyed his radio. “FN-2003, check right, check left!”

There was static, then Slip’s voice. “I don’t see them!”

“Your left!”

Another blast of static, loud enough that it made FN-2187 wince. He rolled back to his initial position and edged his way to the lip of the small crater just in time to see Slip opening fire on the remaining Republic soldiers closing in on his position. Now FN-2187 could take his time.

“Breathe. Just breathe,” Sasa Ren’s voice echoed in his mind. She had been teaching him control of emotion during battle in exchange for helping her improve her lightsaber skills, which FN-2187 again was at the top of the class for.

He sighted carefully, then stroked the trigger on his blaster rifle three times in succession. The last of the enemy soldiers dropped.

“On me!” he shouted, but he needn’t have bothered, because Slip was already out of cover and running toward him. FN-2187 rolled onto his back, making room in the crater as Slip slid into place next to him and rapped him on the chest plate hard enough that it sounded like he was knocking on a door.

“Thanks, 2187,” Slip said. “Thank you, man. Thought you were gonna leave me behind.”

“You’re one of us,” FN-2187 said the words that were often spoken in the Expert Lightsaber Training Class. Slip was not part of that class – or any of the Lightsaber Classes – but Nines was and had recently advanced into the Advanced Class, along with his only other Stormtrooper friend than Slip, Marks. FN-2187 pointed back the direction he’d come. “Stay tight on me.”

“Right behind you,” Slip nodded.

FN-2187 took another moment to catch his breath. He let Sasa Ren’s soft and silky voice play in his mind.

“Breathe. Just breathe,” her words filled and calmed his soul. In fact, Sasa in general could just calm him in a moment. Her voice, her gentleness, and not to mention her radiant smile.

FN-2187 would be lying if he said he didn’t have a little bit of a crush on her. He knew it wasn’t mutual, but if given the shot, he wouldn’t hesitate to take it.

“Eight-Seven?” Slip asked.

“Let’s do this,” FN-2187 nodded.

He vaulted out of the crater, Slip clambering up behind him. The fire from the Republic Base seemed to have diminished, but FN-2187 knew that was an illusion, that it was just as intense as before, only less concentrated. That, of course, had been his plan: by splitting Zeroes and Nines, he’d forced the enemy to divide their attention, and that had given him the opening he needed to reach Slip. The downside was that Zeroes and Nines were now isolated, pinned down with no way to escape.

But there was a benefit to that, too, FN-2187 realized. With the enemy fire divided, it gave him a straight shot to the bunker, to the heavy repeater and their objective. All he had to do was be quick and not lose his nerve.

He began running faster. He heard Slip struggling to keep up behind him, but he could no longer worry about that, he realized. If he could do this, if he could do it fast enough, it wouldn’t matter if Slip stayed tight on his back or not. If he could do this, not only would he obtain their objective but he might do it without losing anyone on his fire-team.

Another cloud of smoke billowed across his vision, and cutting through it were the red and blue bolts of blaster fire—Zeroes’ and Nines’ and the enemy’s, too. He could hear his breathing, amplified within the helmet, feel his pulse in his temples.

He knew she wasn’t actually there, her words no more than a memory, but it comforted him all the same.

The bunker was ahead, the data across his lenses declaring the objective twenty meters away, then fifteen, then ten.
That was when they saw him, but it was already too late. He could see motion inside the bunker, see the Republic soldiers manning the gun react to the sight of him racing toward them and try to swing the barrel around in time. He could imagine himself as they saw him, the immaculate white armor, the symbol of unity and strength and power and skill that was a First Order stormtrooper.

If only they knew who he really was: not just a Stormtrooper, but a future Knight of Ren, handpicked and groomed by the Master of the Knights of Ren himself. If only he had a lightsaber, then the Republic would know true fear.

Just before they had their shot, FN-2187 dropped low, sliding feetfirst toward the edge of the bunker—one hand holding his rifle against his chest, the other going for one of the grenades on his belt. He rolled at the last moment, thumbing the activator hard as he collided sideways with the bunker wall and then, in one smooth motion, bringing his hand up and tossing the grenade through the opening into the bunker. Almost instantly there was the sound and the flash of the explosive detonating. He felt it echo, the vibration running through his armor.

For a moment there was silence, interrupted only by the sound of FN-2187 trying to catch his breath.

The world flickered, froze, and then winked out of existence. Where there had been an unnamed Republic outpost, where there had been dead Stormtroopers and Republic soldiers, there were only four walls and a perfectly flat metal floor. Where there had been a battlefield, there was only the simulation room, vast and empty and cold and sterile. High on one wall, the observation window became visible—heavily tinted, making it impossible to see who was inside.

Then Captain Phasma’s voice echoed over hidden speakers.

“Impressive,” Wiln Ren said, his arms folded as he watched the scene. Tara Ren glanced at Cern in the corner.

“If you say so,” she answered dryly.

Wiln frowned, “What are you talking about? He used solid teamwork to achieve success. That’s exactly what we look for in a Knight of Ren.”

“Yes, but sometimes not every team member is solid,” Cern lounged a little too casually in his chair. “Sometimes to make something stronger, you must prune the imperfections.”

“Imperfections or not, you can’t tell me this wasn’t a successful mission,” Wiln said.

“They completed the objective,” General Hux said. “There is that.”

“They completed the objective due to the skill of FN-2187’s leadership,” Captain Phasma said. “Wiln Ren is correct, that was a good demonstration of what a Knight of Ren should be.”

“Forgive me, Captain, but leave such declarations to us Force Sensitives,” Tara said in a light but snippy tone.

Phasma glared at Tara from behind her helmet. She basically hated every member of the First Order in general, but Tara Ren could be a bigger pain in the ass than even Kylo and Hux put together.

While the Knights of Ren were seated in the rather comfortable chairs of the observation room, Hux and Phasma stood side by side at the two-way glass window. They all watched as the FN fire-team filed out of the simulation room below.

Three of the four Stormtroopers were clearly jubilant, clapping one another on the back and shoulders, pleased with their performance. But the fourth – FN-2187, Phasma could tell – was following behind them, not quite part of the group. She bit her lip, glad of the privacy of her helmet. She knew all too well what that felt like.

As they all watched, FN-2187 paused at the exit, looking back in their direction. Phasma wondered what he was thinking.

“He isolates himself,” Hux said, turning to look at her. “A good leader, part of his unit but standing apart.”

“If that’s why he’s doing it, General,” Phasma tried to keep her voice from being too quiet.

“You have concerns?” Hux raised an eyebrow. “Speak them.”

“These stormtroopers will be the finest the First Order has ever produced,” Phasma said. “I have overseen their training at every stage, from induction to deployment. This class is exemplary.”

“They’re also the only class that has three members in the saber classes,” Wiln added. “2187 excels in the Expert Class, 2199 is near the top of my Advanced Class, and Kylo reports that 2000 is doing well in the Beginner Class. Not exactly going to upgrade any time soon, but shows promise.”

“The FN Squad is my crowning jewel,” Phasma said proudly, though her mind focused on 2187, the only one that truly mattered to her. She would never say it out loud, but she was desperate to show everyone what she could make of the child Felicity Rhiaon had once tried to save from the First Order. It would be one of the best revenges… though nothing could compare to killing the idiot who had destroyed her family.

“Yet you have concerns, Captain,” Hux’s eyes narrowed. “I would hear them.”

“Not for this class,” Phasma snapped.

Hux sighed, at the edge of annoyance. Tara and Cern exchanged a grin.

“Let us not keep secrets, Captain Phasma,” Cern chortled. “If you make us to force it out of you, I fear that might open the door to exposing other secrets. And I think everyone here has a few they’d like to keep close to their chest.”

Phasma stiffened, Wiln went pale, and Hux traded a fearful look with Tara.

“It’s FN-2187,” Phasma finally admitted, the threat too great to ignore. Cern had managed to get into his position of power by not only having the ability to force his way into people’s minds like Kylo, but a far more quick draw tendency to do it. “He has the potential to be one of the finest stormtroopers I have ever seen.”

“From what I just observed, Captain, I agree,” Hux nodded.

“But his decision to split the fire-team and return for FN-2003 is problematic. It speaks to a potentially…dangerous level of empathy. You heard him.”
“You’re one of us?” Tara repeated.

Wiln shrugged, “It’s a mantra we use in the Expert Class. If he’s going to be a Knight of Ren, he must be one of us.”

“While I am entirely in support of unit cohesion, Master Ren, a stormtrooper’s loyalty must be higher. The Knights of Ren are a team, but a soldier must be a singular weapon. His loyalty must be to the First Order, not to one’s comrades.”

Hux glanced back at the window, surveying the empty simulation room.

“I trust you to remove any impurities from the group, Captain,” Hux said. “Wherever they may be found.”

He glanced at Tara.

“I can trust you to remove such impurities?” Hux asked.

Phasma gave a sly smile, “As much as Snoke can trust you to do so.”

Hux’s face fell.

“Now if you’ll excuse me, I have a squad to debrief,” Phasma bowed her head.

“I’ll come with you,” Wiln rose out of his chair. “I want to talk to you about tomorrow’s trip.”

Hux, Tara, and Cern did not a say word until the pair had left.

“Remind me again why we keep Wiln around?” Tara glared at the doorway.

“Because apparently I’m too violent and impatient to teach the Advanced Class,” Cern replied. “Besides, he’s well established with the Chosen.”

“Too established with some of them if I hear correctly,” Hux said.

“Wiln is too straight-laced to let that become a problem,” Tara replied. “Besides, I hear she’s an idiot anyway. Speaking of idiots and Chosen and things to be pruned, where is Sasa? Wasn’t she meant to join us today? Don’t tell me she’s off with Doxl and Berd on Onderon.”

“You think he’d send Solo’s whore on such an important mission?” Hux smirked. “No, she’s here with us on the Finalizer.”

“Then where is she?”

“Where do you think?” Cern grinned.

Tara rolled her eyes, “For fuck’s sake, it’s two in the afternoon.”

“Well, she does not have much purpose beyond being bred,” Hux pointed out. “Can we really blame a whore for doing her job?”

“I hope you do not refer to myself in such crude terms, General,” Tara said sharply.

“Of course not, you do so much more than spread your legs for Ren,” Hux chuckled. “Women who do such things as Sasa Ren are no more than the label I give them.”
Tara glared at him; there was something a little too gleeful in his grin.

“You’re right.” Tara bit, “By the way, how’s your mother?”

Cern didn’t care how openly he laughed. Hux’s face filled with red, and his hands shook at his side as he glared at Tara. It wasn’t exactly hidden knowledge that Armitage Hux had been the result of an affair the great Brendol Hux had with a kitchen woman.

“Doing quite well, actually,” Hux gritted his teeth. “My position allows me to keep her in comfort.”

“And mine allows the same for me,” Tara replied. “I’d like to keep it that way, and this little snit seems to be compromising that.”

“Yeah, but look on the bright side,” Cern grinned, “then you don’t have to raise the child of Ben Solo.”

Tara glanced over at Hux. He gave a small nod, and Tara used the Force to flip Cern’s chair over.

“I hate you two,” Cern groaned as he climbed back onto his chair.

“Good,” Tara replied, “if you liked me, I’d be doing something wrong.”

“I do have to agree with Tara,” Hux said. “Sasa is starting to get in the way. Even Ben Solo has some purpose in this Order, and I do need him to perform his duties without distraction.”

“Not to mention the embarrassment they’ve been raining upon us to the future Knights,” Cern sneered. “Late for class, blatant groping, and worst of all, the way she flirts with them to make him jealous. Sasa Ren is a problem I’d be glad to be rid of… right along with Wiln. He’s a little too goody goody for me.”

“Well, hypothetically,” Hux drew out his words, “it would be a challenge to get rid of such a problem. Both are in high favor with Solo and the Supreme Leader.”

“Snoke has half a dozen other girls trained to be exactly like her,” Tara shot. “Even he knows Sasa is not special. Wiln on the other hand, can be useful. He keeps his head down and does what he’s told but retains a personality. He’s still beneficial to us. Sasa on the other hand… I think it’s time to move on. The only question is how?”

“Can’t pull your usual tricks?” Hux smirked.

Tara shot him an innocent smile, “I have no idea what’s you’re talking about. The unfortunate string of deaths among the Knights of Ren is something I mourn greatly. Sasa is lucky; her favor with Kylo ensures it hard for her to befall such a tragic fate as the others… Not impossible, but difficult.”

“Well, I might have a better way to deal with the situation,” Cern offered.

“I’ll consult you when I hit rock bottom,” Tara rolled her eyes. “Until then, I just need to figure out a way to make her fall out of Kylo’s affections. Then the defences and protections will lower.”

Hux considered an idea, “What if you were to convince him those affections weren’t mutual? At least, not truly?”

Tara smiled, “Go on.”

“Sasa is not a soldier or a Knight or honestly even a person. She’s simply Snoke’s tool- No, not tool. A mere toy to distract Kylo and puppet around to the Supreme Leader’s desires. She’s vapid; nothing inside of her but the urge to seduce.”

“What’s your point?” Cern asked.

“Make Kylo think he’s not the only one she’s seduced,” Hux suggested. “She flirts to make him jealous; it’s not unreasonable to make him think she does something more. Maybe plant the idea that she’s having an affair with that Stormtrooper she’s close with. 2187.”

“They are rather close,” Tara mulled over the idea. “But how do I convince Kylo of this?”

“Make him see her seducing another man.”
Tara shot him a look, “Let me guess, you’re going to be generous and volunteer?”

“She did insist on eating all of her meals with me for nearly a month,” Hux grinned smugly. “Let me eat right off her plate.”

“You do know it’s because she thought I was going to poison her?”

The put out look on Hux’s face suggested that he did not know that.

“I don’t know,” Cern frowned. “Do you really think you could convince Kylo that Sasa is sleeping with Hux? Would you really go after the woman you call Solo’s Whore?”

Tara chuckled, “The General here has always had a predilection for taking what belongs to Kylo.”

Hux exchanged a curious smile with her.

“That doesn’t comfort me,” Cern shook his head. “I think we should go with my idea.”

“How about this?” Hux suggested. “First we try it my way, then Tara’s, and if our ideas prove to be as foolish as you declare, then we’ll try yours. Agreed?”

Tara and Cern looked at each other and thought it over.

“Alright,” Tara finally said. “Let’s give it a try.”

There was no preamble. There never was. Captain Phasma faced them, surveyed them, and then said, “Adequate.”

FN-2187 glanced in the corner where Wiln was watching with folded arms. FN-2187 had learned that “adequate” was the closest Captain Phasma would ever get to saying “well done” or “good job.”

“FN-2000, you’re wasting ammunition,” Phasma continued. “Telemetry indicates you expended one hundred and twenty-seven shots, with a hit ratio of less than five to one. You are assigned to the range tomorrow during your second detail. I expect an immediate and marked improvement.”

Zeroes drew himself even higher, “Yes, Captain.”

The shiny helmet shifted almost imperceptibly to the left. It was another thing that FN-2187 had noticed about their captain; you never knew exactly who or what she was looking at. He thought it was Slip, but she spoke to Nines, instead.
“FN-2199, biosensors noted your heart rate eight percent above acceptable range, with an additional twenty-second delay in reverting from strong exertion to resting pulse. Your weight is up two percent, without corresponding gain in muscle mass. Your meals are being modified, and you will begin additional physical training tomorrow, second detail.”

“Yes, Captain,” Nines said.

Phasma didn’t move, not even the slightest shift in the angle of her helmet, yet FN-2187 was absolutely positive she was now looking at Slip. She didn’t speak. The silence stretched, and as it went on it changed, and FN-2187 could see Slip growing more and more nervous, fighting the urge to say something. Still the silence grew, and then 2187 could feel it, too, found himself silently urging Slip to stay silent, to wait it out, somehow knowing that if Slip should speak it would be a mistake and that another mistake was exactly what Captain Phasma wanted him to make.

At last she said, “FN-2187, your targeting was exemplary. According to the simulation, you fired your weapon only thirty-six times, scoring kills with thirty-five of those. You deployed one explosive, which resulted in the achieving of the objective and another six enemies killed.”

Now they could all see her head move as she looked them over in turn.

“All of you should take your example from FN-2187,” Captain Phasma said. “However you have proved yourself worthy enough to be assigned to a special mission. Master Ren?”

Wiln spoke, “I will be taking you and the MK squad with me tomorrow when Sasa and I visit the Supreme Leader aboard the Supremacy. The Chosen need some fresh meat to spar with, and since three of the four of you are in saber classes, I’ve decided to take you boys. FN-2003… good luck.”

Nines and Zeroes laughed.

“You are dismissed,” Captain Phasma announced. “Master Wiln will show you out. FN-2187, stay.”

The others collected their helmets and headed for the door. Slip shot him a last glance before it sealed shut again. FN-2187 remained standing. If FN-2187 had been using the Force, he would have sworn that Phasma hesitated for a moment before she spoke. He might have sensed her eyes flick to the door, the security cameras, consider something, and decide against it.

“Why did you go back for FN-2003?” Phasma asked.

“He’s one of us,” FN-2187 said. “I was taught in Tara Ren’s class to work as a team.”

“This is not the first time you’ve helped him. Your instructors have noted multiple occasions where you’ve been seen assisting him in various duties. Why are you doing this?”

“We’re only as strong as our weakest link, Captain.”

“I agree.”

“Thank you, Captain.”

“I want it to stop.”

He blinked, surprised. “Captain?”

This time, Phasma openly allowed herself to look at the cameras before she turned back to FN-2187.

“We are only as strong as our weakest link, FN-2187. While you believe you are attempting to strengthen that weak link, I assure you that is not what you are actually doing. Rather than fixing the problem, you are allowing it to persist. As a result you are, in fact, weakening the whole. Further, you are weakening yourself.”

FN-2187 frowned, brow furrowing, “Captain Phasma, I don’t—”

“You have great potential, 2187. You are officer corps material. Your duty is to the First Order above everything. Nothing else comes before that. FN-2003 must stand or fall on his own. If he stands, the Order is strengthened. If he falls, the Order is spared his weakness. Am I understood?”

“Yes, Captain.”

“I sense hesitation.”

“No, Captain. None.”

“Then it will stop.”

He swallowed, then nodded, “Yes, Captain.”

Phasma took a step forward and placed a hand on his shoulder, “If you remember only one thing I ever tell you, FN-2187, let it be this. Never let them see behind your mask. I’m counting on you, FN-2187. Don’t let me don’t.”

“I won’t, Captain,” FN-2187 said. “I promise.”

“Then that is all. You are dismissed.”

When FN-2187 was gone, Phasma just stood there for a long time in perfect silence. Then she looked up directly at the nearest camera.

“I fucking hate all you people.”

“Isn’t the saying I have a bad feeling about this?” Sasa asked as she sat on the bed, waiting with her arms wrapped around the shirtless Kylo’s neck.

“There’s no law against switching it around. Besides,” Kylo smiled and snuck a kiss on her cheek, her soft breasts pressing against his back, “we’re not exactly law-abiding citizens in the first place.”

“No, we are not,” Sasa laughed, waving her hand through his freshly dyed black hair, pulling him in for a gentle kiss.

A thin blanket was tangled around the couple, shielding their bare legs twisted together, and privatizing the areas in between. Kylo bit his lip as he felt her sweet sex pressed against his thigh, already wet and wanting. His cock was a bar of steel and he wanted so badly to bury it inside of her as she thrashed and mewled beneath him.

“For the record,” Kylo said, “if anyone asks about the story of how we learned you were pregnant, we are absolutely not telling anyone that we decided to take a pregnancy test in the middle of sex.”

“Oh dear, now I have nothing to discuss with your mother when I finally meet her,” Sasa teased.

“Yeah, you are never meeting my mother. I don’t need her turning you against me.”
“Hey,” Sasa frowned.

His tone was joking, but she could hear the hint of fear in it. She stroked his cheek and eased it over to look him in the eyes. Sasa felt him relax immediately as his eyes stared into her forest green ones. She could sense him taking comfort in the familiarity of his own Force Signature as if there was some small part of his soul contained within her eyes.

“Kylo,” Sasa whispered. She hesitated and then added even quieter, “…Ben.”

She heard his sharp intake of breath, but he did not chastise her. Sasa sighed and then bowed her forehead against his.

“I will never turn against you,” Sasa vowed. “I swear it to you.”

She felt the tension dissipate from his Force Signature. He believed her. He trusted her.

Something about the look in his eyes – that confusing mix of adoration, faith, and desire – scared her. Even more frightening was her knowledge that she had the very same look in her eyes.

“Besides,” Sasa chuckled, running a thumb over his bottom lip, “I am so not looking your mother in the eye and discussing our sex life.”

“Good,” Kylo smiled, “then I really could never go home.”

“Really? Not after murdering Alyla?”

“In all fairness, I only like half killed her. Besides, they were more upset about Rhiaon’s death.”

“And you didn’t even kill her.”

Kylo raised an eyebrow.

“Hux gets surprisingly chatty around me,” Sasa shrugged. “And we had to talk about something during those lunches I had him be my taste tester.”

“That was the only reason I didn’t kill him for sharing private meals with you,” Kylo turned, forcing her arms off him so he could pull her into his lap. His now only semi-erect shaft inadvertently found purchase resting against her clit. A small roll of his hips made Sasa gasp. “The thought of him touching you, making you gasp, even making you give him a smile…something dark burns inside of me. I don’t want anyone else making you feel the way I get to. Not Hux. Not FN-2187. Not Wiln. Not Cern. Not even Snoke. You… are mine.”

Sasa shivered, “Then take what’s yours.”

Kylo crushed his lips to hers, taking them desperately like a drink of water in the desert. Helping Sasa adjust her hips, he positioned himself at the entrance of her beautiful cunt. Sasa cried out enthusiastically as he pulled her down onto his cock.

“Yes, please. Please take me,” Sasa moaned, wrapping her arms around his neck and losing herself into the kiss.

He grunted and panted as his gripped her hips tightly, guiding her up and down his shaft. He thrust into her desperately as her tongue caressed the roof of his mouth.

“I guess we’re just not going to discuss the pregnancy test sitting face down on my desk with the answer of whether or not you’re pregnant?” Kylo chuckled, his lips moving down to take her
“We don’t need a test,” Sasa panted, cradling his head to her breast as she had done almost every time they had sex. Kylo was very much a breast person, and he could never get enough of hers. Sasa was as desperate for his touch too. She wished he could take her even deeper, fill her entirely on the pleasure of his cock. “I can feel it in the Force. This time it’s real. This time I’m truly carrying your baby. A little Knight of Ren… Or would our baby have the last name Solo?”

“Over my dead body,” Kylo grunted. Oh, the pleasure was too much for him as she rocked up and down on his cock, “I don’t know how much longer I can-”

“It’s okay, Kylo,” Sasa clutched his neck as her anchor point as she lost all inhibition and just bounced frantically. “Cum when you’re ready. I don’t care if I finish; I just want to feel you fill me.”

Kylo gave a strangled cry at her words. Her skin was soft, sliding across his hard muscles with ease as the sweat on their bodies acted as some agent to ease the friction. A layer of lubricate almost, but nowhere near as wet and abundant as the slickness dripping between her legs that let him drive into her over and over. She whimpered as he stretched her walls sliding in and out with wild abandon. His nails almost pierced her skin as he desperately tried to keep a hold on her hips to slam their pelvises together.

“Oh God, Sasa,” Kylo moaned, his breath getting heavier as he buried his face into her copper curls. He never wanted the moment to end, but he was starting to feel the twinges in his legs that meant things were about to.

“It’s okay,” Sasa cooed. She was well aware of the signs of Kylo’s pleasure by that point, “It’s okay. Let yourself go. I want it. I want you. I want that strong Skywalker seed.”

“Fuck!” Kylo cried and shot off.

Sasa clung tightly to him as he emptied himself into her. They panted roughly as his body jerked against her a few times, and then he buried his face into her breasts as he tried to catch his breath.

“Okay,” Sasa laughed, placing a kiss on a scar across his shoulder, “you definitely have some sort of impregnation fetish.”

“If not naturally, then Snoke certainly had trained one into me,” he chuckled and kissed her lips softly. “You know… I’m lucky to have you. You’re the first person in a long time who’s really got me.”

She nuzzled him, still holding him close, “I don’t have many people I’m close with either. Just you and FN-2187. Oh, and Nova.”

“Nova?”

“She’s another one of the Chosen. My former roommate actually.”

“Is that the one Wiln-”

“Oh yeah.”

Kylo smiled and brushed back a lock of her hair, “You know, I thought the Chosen were held in enough esteem that you would have your own rooms.”

“Well, between you and me, Snoke’s ship is really poorly designed when it comes to having enough quarters. He’ll swear against it to his grave, but the last time Hux went on board, he had to room with Tara.”

“How is he even still alive?” Kylo was genuinely surprised.

“I think Hux is smart enough not to make a move on Tara.”

“Or any girl who’s mine,” he pulled her closer.

Sasa’s smile fell.

“What is it?” Kylo asked.

“I’m sorry, it’s foolish,” Sasa shook her head. “Just hearing you say that Tara’s yours… I know we’re not exclusive, but I’d be lying if I said that sometimes I didn’t try to pretend.”

“Sasa,” Kylo murmured. “You know what this is between us-”

“I don’t think either of us know what this is.” Sasa looked down, “But… I know what I want it to be.”

Kylo looked away. He really didn’t want to be having this conversation now… or ever if he was being completely honest. He had spent almost twenty-eight years of his life avoiding his problems. Why start facing them head on now?

“It’s not going to be anything until there’s a child in the picture,” Kylo sighed as he glanced towards the pregnancy test face down on the desk.

“And what happens when there is?”

“Then I think we become something… more.”

“And if Tara is the mother of that child?”

“…I have no idea.” Gently he eased her off his lap, “Come on. We’ve delayed it enough.”

He went to stand, but a hand on his thigh stopped him, “Wait, Kylo.”

Kylo turned and looked at her.

Sasa bit her lip, “Can I ask you something? Something you’ll answer honestly?”

“Of course.”

“Do you actually want a child?”

The silence in the room was so heavy.

“I…” Ben finally said, “I don’t know.”

Sasa sighed.

He looked away from her, “I’ve just been told so many times that I had to have a child, I never stopped to think if I wanted one… To be honest, I don’t know.”

She didn’t say anything, sensing he needed to work it all out in his own head.
“But,” he said after a long while. He wouldn’t look her in the eye as he admitted the truth, “I know I am ready… to have a family again. I truly miss knowing there’s someone out there who cares about me, no strings attached. I can’t change who my family is… was but I do wish I didn’t… I don’t know. I wish I didn’t burn my bridges, but at the same time how can I act like I want the traitors who vilify the Supreme Leader and Vader?”

“I understand that longing,” Sasa said. “The First Order isn’t the easiest place to be. Everyone is about ten seconds away from literally stabbing you in the back. You wouldn’t believe how competitive things were in the Chosen. I only got along with Nera and Nova because they honestly weren’t that interested in being with you. I was honestly so surprised when Snoke chosen me for you. It was simply because of the emotional regulation. If you had your shit together, I wouldn’t be here right now.”

He knelt down back on the bed, pregnancy test unchecked in one hand, her legs between his spread thighs.

“Then maybe being an emotional wreck isn’t such a bad thing,” he cupped her cheek.

Sasa laughed, “Kiss me, you fool.”

Kylo was happy to oblige. No hands wandered, not lustful thoughts traded between their minds in the Force. All it was about was a soft, sweet, tender kiss. A pleading kiss, begging to fulfill that lonely, longing in their hearts. A prayer that someday this could be something morning.

They parted but did not draw back. His hand on her cheek, and hers securely on his neck. The bare skin of his overly broad chest burned with literal desire, his touch warm on her skin. Their eyes were locked together, gentle brown and reassuring forest green.

“Whose eyes will she have?” Sasa asked with a teasing grin.

Kylo chuckled, “He will have my brown eyes. Brown is a dominant gene, and it is tradition in my family.”

“So, she will be like the rest First Order you lot and have brown hair and brown eyes? Geeze, no wonder you’re attracted to me. Your family is in severe need of variety.”

“Well, maybe he will get the blue Skywalker eyes. Straight from the Force itself.”

“Have you considered the possibility that the Force isn’t your paternal grandfather? I doubt mean to doubt the word of your great-grandmother, but if she wasn’t lying, there are still ways that she simply just might not know-”

“Don’t even go there,” Kylo shuddered. “I get enough of those stories from Alyla.”

“I swear to Palpatine, if she appears right here and now and starts making comments about our sex life, I’m leaving you.”

“Don’t worry, I’m haunted by the ghost of Alyla Kene, not Felicity Rhiaon.”

“Not physically anyway,” Sasa teased.

Kylo laughed and shook his head. He held so light, so relaxed in that moment. He craved another kiss, but that wasn’t the foremost urge in his heart. There was something lingering in the air; three simple words that he yearned to vocalize… but knew he didn’t have the strength to do so.
Sasa sighed and touched his cheek. She opened her mouth to say something, but no words came. Whatever assurance she wished to utter died on her tongue.

Then her eyes flicked to the pregnancy test in his hand. Kylo made a small swallow and nodded. Without exchanging a word, they shifted themselves to sit side by side on the bed. Each took one end in their hand and held it up, the result screen facing down.

“Are you ready to confirm our daughter?” Sasa asked.

“I can’t wait to see the look on Hux’s face when we announce our son,” Kylo grinned.

“On three?”

“One.”

“Two.”

“Three,” they said together.

They flipped the test over.

Silence.

Long, long silence.

As Kylo let out a long exhale, Sasa shifted away from him and set the test.

“There’s always next month,” Kylo said.

“Isn’t there always?” Sasa shook her head.

“We just have to keep trying. There’s nothing wrong with us. The tests always come back very positive. We should easily be able to have a baby!”

“Then why do I have to face Snoke tomorrow and tell him once more there is none?”

Kylo didn’t have an answer for her, instead just pulled her back against him and pressed soft kisses against her bare shoulders.

“I don’t want you to go tomorrow,” Kylo murmured against her skin.

Sasa closed her eyes, relishing the feeling of his strong arms holding her close, “I don’t either, but orders are order. I have to do my tri-yearly check-in.”

“I hate every time you do those.”

“Kylo, this is the first time I’ve done one. I’ve only been a Knight of Ren for four months.”

“Seriously? I thought it was a lot longer than that.”

“It’s been two months since the weird Alyla ghost thing – which you still haven’t explained to me – and the first time we had sex was two months before that.”

“That’s what I get for losing track of time,” Kylo shook his head. “Do you really have to go?”

“I don’t have a choice,” Sasa sighed. She turned back and stole another one of his sweet kisses, “Gods, I love your mouth.”
Kylo winced, “Really? I’ve always hated my mouth. Thought my lips were too large.”

Sasa chuckled, “You say that like it’s a bad thing.”

He had never had much confidence in his looks, so to hear that about one of his most vulnerable features caused him to give a cheek splitting chin and grace her with another of the kisses she adored so much.

“Promise me your bed will be empty the night I return?” Sasa whispered.

“Three days? I promise.” He pressed his forehead to hers, “Just promise me you’ll be safe.”

She laughed, “I’ll be perfectly safe. Promise.”

Sasa’s scream echoed off the red walls as the lightning violently thrashed through her body.

“STOP! SUPREME LEADER! PLEASE STOP!”

She hit the floor with a heavy thud as the Force Lightning ceased. Sasa panted as she laid on the floor, curled in the fetal position. Tears pricked her ducts, but she wouldn’t let them fall.

Snoke settled back down in his throne and watched her, “Well, well. I am most impressed, Sasa.”

Sasa gave a ragged gasp as she tried to push herself up. She looked pathetic, like a rag doll thrown across the room by a child ungrateful of the present.

“Twenty-seven minutes,” Snoke declared. “A new record for you. None of the other Chosen have even come close. I look forward to the day you can stand it entirely without screaming.”

“As do I,” Sasa bowed her head.

So that I may stop this training method?

She winced as his words pounded in her mind.

Never forget that you cannot hide from me, Sasa. You are mine to do with as I please. Your mind belongs to me. You belong to me.

“Yes, Master,” Sasa blinked, eyes struggling to focus as she saw two Snokes before her.

“I suppose that was a long session,” Snoke nodded to the Praetorian guard who held the supplies to treat Sasa after her lightning sessions. Prolonged exposure to lightning could have dire side effects if untreated, including paralysis.

As the guard treated Sasa, she could feel the Supreme Leader picking through her mind, fishing in particular through the memories of Kylo.

“Good, good,” Snoke sounded pleased, a noise that churned Sasa’s stomach. “You have earned Kylo’s favor firmly and quickly. But what’s this? Jealousy? Do you doubt your destiny?”

“No, Supreme Leader.”

“And you should not. It is as I have foreseen. You will bear Kylo Ren a son, then a daughter, and then a son. But only if you conceive it first. I am most disappointed that you come before me today without a child in your womb."

“I am trying, Supreme Leader.”

“Then try more.” Snoke paused and sent a knowing look to Sasa, “And no more of that business he did on your first night. If he wishes to manipulate you orally, it should be in preparation for you to receive his seed. Not after you already have.”

Sasa didn’t know she could blush that brightly.

He declared, “I want you to couple with him no less than five times per week, and that’s sessions. Not finishing. He should do so at least seven times.”

Oh, God, she couldn’t look him in the eye. Did he really have to do this in front of the Praetorian guards?

Yes, I do have to do this in front of them. Everyone knows what duty I have given you. Do not feel shame in performing it.

Well, you couldn’t say the First Order wasn’t at least a sex positive environment.

Am I understood, Sasa Ren?

“Yes, Supreme Leader,” Sasa bowed her head.

“Now,” Snoke said. He nodded to the guard treating Sasa to withdraw. “Shall we do another test? Perhaps you can bet twenty-seven minutes.”

“I suppose. Supreme Leader why again do we have to do this?”

“It’s a test of obedience, pain tolerance, and how well you can lower yourself into the power of the Force. Remember, empty yourself of everything and you won’t feel a thing. Are you ready?”

Sasa hesitated, “Considering you can read my mind, I’m going to say not really.”

Snoke laughed, “I appreciate the honesty. Now prepare yourself.”

She took a deep breath and stood firmly on her feet.

“And to think Kylo envies my one on one training with the Supreme Leader,” Sasa thought to herself.

I never said I picked him for his intelligence.

If there was one thing that was certain, it was that all of the Chosen were absolutely gorgeous. The collection of women Wiln Ren and the Stormtroopers found waiting for them in the training room took every Stormtrooper’s breath away. There were six of them in total, each of varying looks. Some pale skinned, some olive, and two with the same tone of FN-2187. Some were tall, but others rather short. None of them stood at average height. Some had ample chests, others were more blessed from behind. Long hair, short hair, blue eyes, green, brown, hazel, blonde hair, brunette, black, and the smallest girl of all seemed to have naturally blue hair.
“Gentlemen, these are the remaining Chosen.” Wiln gestured to each woman in turn, “Nova. Alix. Cleo. Echo. Iona. And Dido. Ladies, these are FN-2187, FN-2003, FN-2199, FN-2000, MK-6093, MK-6122, MK-6089, and MK-6191. They will be your sparring opponents today.”

“Fresh meat,” the one called Iona grinned.

“Who’s who?” Cleo asked.

“I’m Marks,” Marks answered. “My guys are Tone, Weevil, and Duck.”

“Duck?” Alix lifted an eyebrow.

“He’s not great at aiming with grenades,” Tone explained.

The women laughed.

“And you boys?” Nova – the blue haired one – smiled, Wiln coming to stand next to her.

Slip grinned and indicated himself, then the others. “FN Corps. Slip, Zeroes, Nines, and FN-2187.”

“Let me guess,” Dido said. “FN-2187 is in charge, right?”

“That’s right,” Slip nodded enthusiastically.

FN-2187 punched the snickering Marks in the arm.

Alix fixed FN-2187 with a stare, “No nickname. You’re one of those.”

“One of those what?” FN-2187 asked.

She laughed. Alix looked to be in her late twenties, perhaps, but there was something hard in her eyes, and the laugh wasn’t amused.

“An outsider, cadet,” Alix explained. “You’re on the outside, and you’ll always be looking in and wondering why you don’t belong.”

The rest of the stormtroopers laughed, Nines and Zeroes and even Slip along with them. FN-2187’s heart fell… but no more than when he saw the sympathetic but agreeing look in Marks’ eyes.

FN-2187 looked down at the number tattooed on his wrist. Phasma’s words echoed in his mind.

Never let them see behind your mask.

“Alright, Ladies and Gentlemen, let’s get to work,” Wiln used the Force to summon a rack of weapons from a closet.

Wiln explained that the Chosen would be fighting with lightsabers like the students of the Expert Class did, and the Stormtroopers would be using a variety of other weapons. In a truly impressive display – one that FN-2187 noticed brought a peculiar smile to Nova’s face – Wiln demonstrated the use of each weapon, the vibro-axes and shock staffs and force pikes and resonator maces, elaborating at length on the respective strengths and weaknesses of each and when and how to employ them to best effect.

He explained the composite alloys used to make the weapons, how all of the equipment was strong enough to block even a lightsaber. FN-2187 wondered about that—not whether it was true as they were fighting against lightsabers, but he couldn’t help but wonder if as a Knight of Ren he would ever be expected to fight someone who used a lightsaber. Not just fight with a lightsaber. According to the First Order, the Jedi were extinct.

Right?

Soon enough, Wiln passed out the weapons. FN-2187 found himself with a mace and shield. Zeroes and Slip each ended up with force pikes. Nines used a one-handed vibro-axe and a shield. Marks was given a shock staff. They were told that all the powered weapons carried only a nominal charge, making them incapable of penetrating stormtrooper armor.

They began drills, basic moves—stance, attack, parry—and then repeated, over and over again, until FN-2187 could feel perspiration running down his back inside the bodysuit he wore beneath his armor. When they’d finished, his arms ached from the effort of maintaining the mace and shield, but there was a sense of pleasure, too, the delight of learning something new and learning it quickly and well.

Wiln then called for a meal break, and FN-2187 was thankful for it. Their food was brought to the training room, and they sat on the floor in groups. Many of the Stormtroopers took the opportunity to chat up the lovely young ladies, but Marks and FN-2187 had sensible heads on their shoulders and stayed far away.

FN-2187 was disappointed that Sasa didn’t join them, but that thought was soon banished when Marks pointed out Wiln and Nova huddled in the corner.

“They’re sitting rather close, aren’t they?” Marks said.

“Yeah,” FN-2187 frowned. “They are.”

Neither commented on how Nova kept touching Wiln’s arm, or that schoolboy grin on his face.

After lunch, they resumed the training where they’d left off but now with the introduction of sparring. Wiln would pick two of the trainees – sometimes Chosen vs Stormtrooper, sometimes two Chosen, or sometimes two Stormtroopers – to square off against each other. He’d give a go signal, and then it would be on, weapons swinging through the air while the white-armored figures collided, blocking and jabbing and parrying until one was knocked off their feet or Wiln announced a winner. The losing combatant would return to the others waiting their turns at the edges of the room, the winner would remain, and it would start again.

FN-2187 realized that, powered or not, armored or not, their weapons could cause real damage. Twice, trainees had to be helped off the floor, one with broken fingers from a particularly savage mace blow, the other stabbed by the tip of a force pike that had slipped off of an armor plate and punctured the membrane holding the plates together.

With a shudder, FN-2187 remembered that terrifying moment with Tara Ren and the lightsaber to his neck. He made a mental note not to let his guard down for even a moment with the girls. He knew the damage lightsabers could do, and he was not about to pull a Skywalker and lose a hand.

Slip was the first of the Stormtroopers to be called onto the floor, and for a moment while he watched his friend sparring, FN-2187 thought that might be the one thing at which Slip excelled. His footwork was consistent and good, and he kept his force pike in its proper grip. He didn’t make any of the obvious mistakes.

It didn’t last.

Slip’s opponent, Tone, was using a pike of his own. They were exchanging blows for the sixth time, quick end to end as if fighting with staffs, when suddenly Tone stepped back, spinning his pike in both hands over his head, then bore down with a blow that cracked so loud on the top of Slip’s helmet it sounded like his helmet—and his head—had been split in two. Slip staggered, and his opponent flipped the staff and brought the opposite end up, just as hard, smashing it into Slip’s chin. Slip dropped like a stone, and when Wiln removed his helmet to survey the damage, FN-2187 could see blood coming from his mouth, his vision looking unfocused.

Slip got back in line.

The person who remained longest on the floor was Zeroes. He went four bouts without falling, sending Nova to the floor in a particularly nasty display.

Wiln rushed to her side faster than to any of the other women Zeroes had beaten. Zeroes turned to Nines to gloat about his success, and FN-2187 saw the way Wiln narrowed his eyes at Zeroes.

“FN-2187, you’re up next!” Wiln ordered.

Exactly as Wiln expected, FN-2187 easily ended Zeroes’ run.

“Win!” shouted Wiln Ren.

FN-2187 moved to help Zeroes back to his feet, dropping his mace and taking him by the elbow. Zeroes shrugged him off, his anger evident even behind his armor. FN-2187 figured that was because he’d broken Zeroes’ streak.

It was the start of FN-2187’s own streak, however. The next trainee to go at him was Duck, also armed with a mace and shield. The fight lasted three seconds. FN-2187 feinted an overhead blow with the mace, and when his opponent brought his shield up to parry it, he hit him instead with his own shield and knocked him flat. His next two opponents were Chosen, Iona and Cleo with a pair of lightsabers. The second of those took the longest, almost a full minute, but for FN-2187 it was a simple matter of waiting for an opening and striking at the right time.

Then it was Nines’ turn, with his vibro-axe and shield, and if FN-2187 had thought Zeroes was angry when he’d lost, Nines seemed to start out that way. Nines began with a swipe straight at FN-2187’s head, and the next thing 2187 knew Nines had rammed into him, body to body, their armor clattering as he was pushed back along the training floor. It took all his strength to keep his feet, to keep from giving Nines another opening with his axe, and finally FN-2187 dropped his shield altogether and used his free hand to take control of Nines’ wrist. They spun in place, and FN-2187 slammed his shoulder into Nines’ chest, sending him off balance long enough to create distance between them. Before he could recover his discarded shield, though, Nines was launching at him again, and FN-2187 was using his mace with both hands, knocking away Nines’s attacks as quickly as they came. He could feel his heart pounding inside the armor, the echo of his breathing as it grew labored. The thought occurred to him, unexpected and shocking, that Nines thought this was real, not an exercise, not training.

The vibro-axe fell again, slashing at his arm, and FN-2187 skipped back. The two of them began to circle. Nines feinted with the axe, then swung the shield and nearly caught him in the side, but FN-2187 managed to get the mace up to parry just in time. He saw the follow-up coming before Nines launched it, knew the axe was slashing in again, and that time, instead of stepping away from it, FN-2187 stepped forward and under Nines’ guard. The mace was in the wrong position, its heavy head toward the floor, so FN-2187 used its pommel instead, smashing it into Nines’ helmet. The other trooper went sailing onto his back. He laid still, dazed for a moment.

FN-2187 recovered his shield and reset it on his arm. He didn’t move to help Nines up.
That was four of them, which tied him with Zeroes’ streak.

Bout five was Slip, and right away FN-2187 could see something was wrong. Maybe it was the blow to the head, or something else, but he was moving slowly. His footwork, impeccable before, was sluggish and sloppy. His grip on his force pike kept slipping, not obviously but enough that the point was too low, so it would be easy for FN-2187 to knock it out of the way or even disarm him entirely. In his helmet, tasting his sweat, FN-2187 glanced over at Wiln observing them, looking for any sign that they were seeing what he was, that Slip wasn’t up to it, that it wasn’t going to be a fair fight at all. Wiln were impassive, standing in his uniform, hands behind their backs. Nothing in their expressions betrayed anything but vague interest. There was no sign of sympathy.

None except for whenever Nova came onto the floor. The girl was truly terrible – worse than FN-2187’s first day with a lightsaber – but still held a note a skill she almost seemed to fight against.

But Slip didn’t have a natural skill to fight against.

Slip lunged, and FN-2187 blocked him easily, sending the tip of the pike off his shield and to the left. Slip followed, unable to stop himself in time, almost at full reach and obviously off balance. FN-2187 stepped back, giving him room to recover. Again he glanced at Wiln. He was frowning... but at FN-2187.

FN-2187 swung his mace in an easy arc, putting no real power behind it, all but telegraphing the move. Slip barely got his parry in place in time and failed entirely to launch a riposte. They circled. Another glance at Wiln, and both he and Nova were frowning, Nova somehow having made her way to Wiln’s side. Slip tried to flip his grip on the pike and made a staff-end swing that FN-2187 ducked before he’d even thought about it. He had another opening and almost took it but for some reason found himself unable to.

It struck him, then, that if he were to lose, Slip would be left to face whoever went next. And based on the way Wiln kept glancing towards Alix – the Chosen that appeared to be the best with a lightsaber – FN-2187 suspected he knew who was next.

It struck him, too, that whoever Slip fought next wouldn’t care that he was already hurt, that another injury might be too much for him.

_You’re one of us_, FN-2187 thought.

He attacked with the mace, an upswing that Slip blocked but without any strength behind it. The parry blew through Slip’s guard and sent his hands and the pike high, almost over his head, leaving his middle exposed. FN-2187 stepped forward, leading with his shield, pressing rather than striking while at the same time bringing his left leg forward, behind Slip’s right. It took almost no discernible pressure; suddenly, Slip was on his back and FN-2187 was standing over him, and Wiln was shouting.

“Win!”

That was when FN-2187 sensed it, a small tug of cerise at the back of his mind. In the chrome reflection of his weapon he saw the miniature image of a woman standing in the doorway behind him. FN-2187 realized that Sasa Ren was watching them.

He stepped back, waiting as Slip pulled himself unsteadily to his feet. He turned to face Sasa, wanting to rush up to her, but Sasa shook her head. FN-2187 understood and nodded, ready to face his next opponent and try as hard as he could to impress Sasa.
FN-2187 so wanted to impress Sasa.

The next combatant was as he guessed, Alix, but FN-2187 didn’t really notice and didn’t much care. He knew Sasa was watching him, though it was impossible to be sure as she approached Wiln – with a slight stumble in her step – and the pair started to talk. Alix was using a pair of lightsabers, and she was wild with both.

By that point FN-2187’s mind was racing—thinking about Slip and Nines and Zeroes, and Sasa watching him—and it wasn’t really a surprise when the world burst into a flare of white, when the hilt of the sword connected with his jaw, when he could taste his own blood. One moment he was up, the next he was on his back, staring at the lights in the ceiling through the lenses of his helmet.

He got up and took his place in line.

“Here,” Sasa brought FN-2187 a cool cloth for his head when the group was taking a break. “That was a nasty blow to the head Alix gave you. Trust me, I know. Alix was my baptism by fire. Knocked me around quite a bit when I was one of them.”

“Thanks,” FN-2187 held the cloth to his forehead as she sat down next to him on the floor. “You’re an angel.”

“No, I’m not,” Sasa grinned, bumping playfully against him. “I wouldn’t be allowed to be a Knight of Ren if I was.”

FN-2187 laughed as Sasa shifted back upright. Suddenly she jolted, nearly losing her balance but FN-2187 caught her wrist.

“Are you alright?” he asked trying to steady her.

“Fine,” Sasa pinched the bridge of her nose and took deep breaths. “Just some of my training with the Supreme Leader has painful after effects. The… painkillers haven’t kicked in yet.”

Sasa wasn’t up to explaining to FN-2187 how Snoke would electrocute her and inject her with a treatment serum to deal with the medical after effects of Force Lightning.

“Well, I have something here for you,” Cleo sat down next to them and offered Sasa a steaming cup of tea. “Here, drink. You know it’ll help.”

“Thank you, Cleo,” Sasa smiled, sipping the usual after lightning tea the Chosen would partake in. “It was just a bad one today.”

“He’s gotten very over zealous lately,” Cleo chuckled. “So… Sasa… I’ve got to ask about Kylo. Is he any good?”

Sasa blushed, “Cleo!”

“Maybe I should leave,” FN-2187 started to get up.

“You stay!” Sasa pulled him back down. “I need someone to help me with this fiend. I’m not discussing it, Cleo.”

“Why not?”
“Because it’s between me and him... and FN-2187 that one time he walked in on us.”

“In my defense, you were in a supply closet,” FN-2187 shuddered at the image he wished he could be rid of. Kylo’s back had been to the door so he had seen very little of Sasa and far too much of Kylo than he ever wanted.

“Come on, Sasa” Cleo punched her shoulder, “I want to know what I’m going to deal with when I get my shot.”

The humor fell from her eyes, and her lips got very thin.

“When you... get your shot,” Sasa said slowly.

“Yeah,” Cleo said. “The Supreme Leader said the next slot that opens is going to another Chosen. I think I have a shot. I hope he’s as good as imagine.”

From her glare, FN-2187 seriously wondered if Sasa was trying to choke Cleo with her mind.

“Well, Cleo,” Sasa’s voice went very formal as she stiffly sat up straight and set aside her tea. “I’m afraid that you won’t have a chance.”

Cleo gasped, “Sasa, are you pregnant?”

“No,” Sasa admitted, “but any day now I should be.”

“Oh,” Cleo looked away, something uncomfortable setting upon the group. Cleo was happy to be friendly with Sasa, but at the end of the day their rivalry for Kylo would always get in the way.

FN-2187 certainly didn’t have anything to add to the conversation.

“Well,” Cleo finally said, “good luck on that. But I want you to promise me something.”

“What’s that?” Sasa asked.

Cleo grinned and grabbed FN-2187’s arm, “When you do get pregnant, I call dibs on this one.”

Sasa laughed and clutched his other arm, “No way, this one is definitely mine.”

Well, FN-2187 was not unhappy how this conversation turned out.

“FN-2187,” came a stern voice.

His heart fell as he looked up to see Wiln Ren staring down at him.

“Yes, Sir?” FN-2187 rose to his feet.

“Can I see you in the hallway... now?”

“What do you think you’re doing?” Wiln demanded when they were alone.

FN-2187 frowned, “What do you mean?”

“I mean I look over to see some Stormtrooper with two Chosen hanging off his arms. Would you please explain?”
“Well, Cleo was… I don’t know, flirting with me to tease Sasa, and Sasa’s my friend—”

“Based on what I’ve seen from you, I think you hope for a little more than friendship.”

“Master Ren—”

“Don’t lie to me, FN-2187,” Wiln cut off. “I’ve seen the way you look at Sasa. She’s Kylo’s. End of story.”

“Does it have to be?” FN-2187 boldly asked. “I mean, once Kylo gets someone pregnant there’s just these women left with nothing. If it so happens that Sasa is one of those women left behind—”

“Careful FN-2187,” Wiln warned, “that’s a dangerous train of thought.”

“It seems to be the same one as you the way you and Nova are all over each other—”

Wrong choice. FN-2187’s words died in his throat as Wiln violently slammed him against the wall and choked him. Not with the Force, but his bare hand squeezed around FN-2187’s throat, using that grip to pin FN-2187 to the wall.

“I didn’t just hear you say that,” Wiln seethed. “Right?”

FN-2187’s only reply was a desperate gasp.

“Let me explain to you why I didn’t hear that, the Chosen are chosen for Kylo Ren not anyone else. So, if Snoke even gets the whiff of an idea that anyone else has touched a Chosen, the punishment is death.”

FN-2187’s eyes widened.

“So,” Wiln eased the grip on FN-2187’s throat, but did not release him, “you are either going to nod your head or shake it right now. Did I hear you wrong? Was I mistaken when I heard you say that I was messing around with one of the Chosen?”

He nodded.

“Good man,” Wiln dropped FN-2187 to the floor. His face showed no sympathy as FN-2187 struggled to catch his breath. “On your feet, Soldier. We need to return.”

FN-2187 nodded and with a hand up by Wiln, re-entered the training room.

“Just remember,” Wiln looked over at Sasa and Cleo. There was no doubt in FN-2187’s mind that Wiln knew exactly how much he cared for Sasa. “It doesn’t matter how charming and beautiful and friendly they are. The Chosen are not for us. So, do not touch them ever.”

FN-2187 sighed and glanced at Sasa. It was true, maybe if fate had dealt him a better hand he would have gone after Sasa. But her eyes were not for him, and they had never been turned on him. Her heart was firmly in the palm of Kylo Ren.

He just wished there was someone who looked at him the way Sasa looked at Kylo.

FN-2187 refused to admit that he was lost. It was his first time spending the night on the Supremacy and he had gotten up to use the fresher. The fresher was strangely far from the crew quarters he and the rest of the FN and MK squads were staying in. On his way back, the similar looking hallways had confused him, causing FN-2187 to take a wrong turn. But he wasn’t lost. No, sir; not one bit.

…Okay, maybe he was a little bit lost.

He turned down a hallway and was pleasantly surprised to recognize it as the one he had accompanied Sasa to her quarters in. The FN squad had acted as her bodyguards until Snoke’s Praetorian Guard took over those duties.

Thinking to ask Sasa for help, FN-2187 was trying to decipher which door was hers when he heard it. A strange sort of wet noise, some muttering, and a lot of panting. Frowning, FN-2187 followed the noise around another corner, down the hallway that he vaguely remembered to hold offices for visiting guests. They usually were empty at this time of night, but not right now. One of the doors had been left open and the sight he saw inside made FN-2187 stop dead.

Nova was lying on the desk, legs spread lewdly, top pulled down to expose her small and pert breasts, her skirt was hiked up her waist, and Wiln had his pants around his ankles as he thrust into her like no tomorrow. Moans, grunts, and whispered declarations of pleasure told FN-2187 just how much the pair was enjoying it, and the way they kissed, and touched, and just clung together…

FN-2187 lived in the military. He had heard about sex. He had seen sex. He knew sex.

This wasn’t sex. This was the thing they called making love. FN-2187 didn’t need the Force to feel the raw passion and deep adoration in that couple. But he did have the Force – whoever slightly – and he felt that love pulse through the air.

Wiln’s words from earlier echoed in his head, “It doesn’t matter how charming and beautiful and friendly they are. The Chosen are not for us. So, do not touch them ever.”

Nova let out a groan and arched her back, “Oh, Willarn. Please, don’t stop. Don’t ever stop.”

“I won’t,” Wiln grunted and buried his face in her neck. “I never will.”

She gently guided his head up and they stared down into each other’s eyes. Then she wove a hand into his hair and pulled him down into a passionate kiss.

When they pulled apart, he whispered, “I love you, Nova.”

“I love you too,” she pulled him in for another kiss.

So, this is what love was, FN-2187 realized. The willingness to risk absolutely everything, even your very life to be with the one you cared most for in the Galaxy.

And in that moment, FN-2187 realized and accepted one simple fact: he would never have that with Sasa.

Without a word, FN-2187 slipped away back down the hall. He glanced at the doors as he passed by, wondering which of them belonged to her. But he supposed it didn’t really matter. She absolutely was his friend, but he didn’t want to bother her. He needed some time alone to digest the new information.

Sasa Ren would never love him, and honestly, he never truly would love her.
But he hoped with all of his might that someday he would find a woman he could.

They returned a day early. Sasa was so giddy at the thought of surprising Kylo that she thought she’d make a whole deal out of it.

She slipped into her room, throwing her bag onto the bed, and quickly found one of Kylo’s favorite pieces of lingerie all black and red with lace cut outs and halter stockings. She threw on a beautiful grey silk robe over top, let down her hair and brushed it out. Sasa did her makeup, a simple natural look but was a gorgeous smoky eye and cerise lip – Kylo loved it when she wore her Force Signature colour. She dabbed on a bit of Kylo’s favorite perfume, checked over her appearance in the mirror, gave her breasts one last push up, and headed out the door.

Sasa received many odd looks as she made her way to Kylo’s room, but no one dared make a comment to her face. Wanting to surprise Kylo even more, Sasa focused on cutting herself off from the Force so neither she nor Kylo could sense each other.

She punched in the code to his bedroom and was pleased to hear the shower running in his fresher. Grinning like a minx, Sasa crawled onto the middle of his bed, untied the sahs of her robe and pushed off one shoulder. She assumed her most seductive pose and twisted her face into her best come hither, Master and take me look.

Kylo was going to lose his mind.

The shower shut off, and Sasa could barely sit still. Electricity buzzed in her veins as she heard the door slide open. The grin across her face was so wide that it was almost physically painful.

He stepped out of the fresher, water dripping down his completely nude body (what point was there in putting on a towel between the shower and the bed?) Kylo stopped dead at the sight of her.

“Sasa?” his eyes were wide as saucers.

“What are you doing here?” he demanded, not actually sounding too happy.

“Well, um, we came back a day early, so I thought I’d surprise you.” She took a deep breath, trying to gain a hold of the situation again. In an attempt to be seductive she turned over onto her stomach to entice him over, “I missed you, my-”

“Why can’t I sense you in the Force?”

Sasa blinked.

“I, uh… wanted to surprise you, so I cut myself off for a few minutes.” Sasa frowned, “Kylo, what’s going on?”

Kylo groaned, putting his face in his hands, “Sasa, now is really not the time-”

“Kylo?” a voice came form the fresher. “Is someone out there?”

Sasa’s heart froze. No, it couldn’t be.

Sure enough, a minute later, Tara Ren emerged from Kylo Ren’s fresher, freshly showered.
An equally nude Tara Ren.

“Sasa,” Tara flashed the girl a smile as fear filled Sasa’s eyes and she scrambled to tie closed her robe. Tara came behind Kylo and wrapped her arms around his shoulders, “We didn’t think you were coming back until tomorrow.”

“Kylo?” Sasa whispered looking so embarrassed and even a little ashamed.

“I’m sorry, Sasa,” Kylo summoned a pair of towels. He wrapped one around his waist and offered the other to Tara, but she took her time in covering up. “Like Tara said, I didn’t think… You weren’t supposed to be here tonight… especially in my room.”

Sasa looked down at the ground. Why did she want to cry? She knew he did this. She knew he slept with Tara Ren. His relationship with Tara wasn’t a mere fantasy.

But seeing it made it so much more real.

“Sorry, Kid,” Tara snickered, “but Kylo wanted a real woman’s touch tonight. Someone who actually knows how to take care of him.”

Sasa balls her fists in the sheets of his bed, “I… I don’t… I’m… I’m sorry. I just thought of the promise Kylo made that my turn would be when I got back.”

“Oh, Sasa,” Tara laughed. “Stop pretending like it’s a surprise you’re second string. That’s the way it’s always been.”

Sasa squeezed shut her eyes. Why wasn’t Kylo saying anything?

“Now run along, Little Girl,” Tara ordered. “And let a real woman handle this real man.”

Sasa opened her eyes to find remorseful brown ones staring back at her.

She tightened her fists on the bedsheets.

“No,” Sasa whispered, her eyes not moving from Kylo’s.

Tara frowned, “What?”

Sasa took a deep breath, “I said no.”

“No?” Tara repeated.

“Can she do that?” Kylo asked.

Tara punched him in the shoulder.

Gathering her courage, Sasa rose to her feet, “I am not a little girl. I am real woman who knows how to handle a man – this man. I’m Sasa Ren, Knight of Ren, Chosen of the Chosen, Heir to a Mighty Bloodline. I have every right and more than you to lay claim to Kylo’s bed. I will be the mother of his heir if it’s the last thing I do. So, no Tara. I’m not going anywhere.”

Tara took a step forward, “He wants me.”

“He wanted me,” Sasa snapped. She looked at Kylo, “Isn’t that right? Didn’t you promise that I would share your bed the night I returned?”
Kylo’s throat was very dry, “Uh… well-”

“He asked me to come to him tonight,” Tara snapped. “He pulled me into his shower and did things to me that are too vile for your delicate little ears to hear.”

“Oh trust me, we’ve done plenty of unspeakable things,” Sasa retorted.

“You know, maybe I’m focusing on that too much and that’s why I can’t have a kid,” Kylo mused.

“Shut up!” the girls said together.

Kylo held up his hands and took a step back.

Sasa sighed, “Kylo, tell her what you want. Tell her that you want me in your bed tonight.”

He looked to her, “Well, uh-”

“Kylo!” Tara snapped.

His head swung to her.

“Tell her to leave,” Tara demanded coldly. “Now!”

Kylo just stared at the two of them.

Oh God, they were both mad at him and half a second away from killing each other. How the hell was he going to save this situation?

And then it hit him.

“Well,” Kylo hesitated, looking over at Tara, “she doesn’t have to leave.”

Tara’s eyes flashed, “What?”

“And neither does Tara,” Kylo quickly added.

“Excuse me?” Sasa scowled.

Kylo swallowed, “Well… If you ladies are so insistent on wanting me tonight, I’m sure I could manage satisfying you both.”

There was a painfully long silence.

“Both of us,” Tara parroted back at him.

As Sasa stared at Kylo with a blank, white face, Tara honestly wanted to laugh.

“You’re suggesting we solve this rivalry,” Tara said slowly, “…with a threesome?”

“It’s not the first time we’ve invited another girl into bed with us,” Kylo shrugged. “In fact, as I recall, you quite enjoy it when we do.”

Tara shot a deathly glare at Sasa as the other girl failed to restrain a giggle.

“You both want me,” Kylo continued smugly, “I deeply desire both of you, and there’s plenty of me to go around. So what do you say, Ladies? Think the two of you could handle all of this?”
Sasa’s eyes met Tara. Silence stretched an eon. Then, with a raise brow from Tara and a nod from Sasa, they smiled and advanced toward Kylo, slowly and seductively.

Kylo chuckled to himself.

This had gone surprisingly well.

---

Twenty Minutes Later…

Phasma helped hold the bloody cloth to Kylo’s face, “So, how did you break your nose?”

Kylo shuddered, remembering the pain the girls had inflicted upon him before leaving his bed empty, “I don’t want to talk about it.”

---

It wasn’t the most nervous Ben Solo had ever been, but it certainly was up there. Somewhere between the moment Jaina commed his mother after the Burning of Rornian and the day he walked into a room to find Uncle Luke, Felicity, Reine Agim, Obik Kenu, his parents, and Darth Vader’s helmet.

He was embarrassed to enter the control room sans helmet, but his Medic-droid, Max had insisted on a sabbatical from the helmet for a few days to allow his nose to heal. Kylo caught many strange and confused looks from the soldiers and officers when he entered, but no one said a word. He doubted some of them even knew who the bare-faced man was.

Sasa was discussing a report with a high-ranking officer Kylo honestly couldn’t recall the name of. When said officer spotted Kylo, he was sure to excuse himself fast. Even if the general populace of the Finalizer didn’t know Sasa was personally responsible for Kylo’s nose – Tara had even complimented Sasa on her nose breaking work last night – Kylo and Sasa had developed enough of a reputation that everyone knew to just get the hell out of the way when they were in the same room together.

If Sasa was aware of his presence, she didn’t acknowledge it. Her head was down, and she focused on reading over the report again. Worried he might startle her if he just straight up approached her, Kylo cautiously reached out to touch her mind.

It was ice cold.

Kylo swallowed, a memory unwillingly surfacing. He didn’t like to think about his father at all, but a scene from the night of Uncle Luke’s bachelor party came to mind.

“Last fucking time I get into a drinking contest with Kes Dameron,” Han Solo groaned on the cool tile of the fresher floor. He looked absolutely trashed, and his eleven-year-old son was doing his best to take care of his father while not waking his mother. “I swear the man has a second stomach just for liquor.”

Ben’s mind briefly went to Poe Dameron as Han pulled himself to his feet to stagger over to the sink,
“Well, at least I’m not the only son dealing with their drunk father tonight.”

Han paused splashing water on his face, “Hey, Ben? I’m sorry about all this. You shouldn’t see me like this.”

“It’s okay. It’s not like you do this a lot.”

“I know, but still. I should be a good role model for you.”

“Dad, you’re a smuggler who once spent a year in carbonite because you owed a mob boss money. I don’t think there was even a point where you could have been a good role model to me.”

Han chuckled, “Fair enough. Hey, I ever tell you the story of the time I tried to beat Chewie at a drinking contest?”

“Yeah, you had to get your stomach pumped, and Uncle Luke had to mind trick a few nurses to stop them from calling the Imperials. Mom heard what happened, declared all three of you were idiots and refused to send other Rebels to help, but then Boba Fett showed up and you guys had to escape through the infectious diseases unit. The Alliance wouldn’t let you return to base and you were quarantined on the Falcon with a Medic droid for over a month until you were declared safe,” Ben laughed. “I love that story.”

“We sure have had some adventures,” Han grinned. “You still haven’t told your mom that I told her what happened with Lando, Chewie, and I on Mallarex?”

“Oh course not. I don’t want her to murder you.”

“Good boy,” Han patted his son’s head. He groaned again, “Alright, Chewie’s in Luke’s old room, so there’s a couch in the living room with my name on it.”

“Sorry, Uncle Luke and the woman are sleeping on it.”

“Stop calling Fliss the woman.”

“I’m not calling her Aunt Felicity.”

“I never said you had to,” Han replied. He rubbed his face, “Alright, what are the odds that you’ll let me share your bed?”

Ben raised an eyebrow, “Solo Family Motto.”

“Never tell me the odds,” Han rolled his eyes and muttered something about his son being too much like him. “Fine, I may be able to sneak into your mom and I’s room, but I’m worried I’ll wake your mother. She knows I was drinking heavily and want revenge on Luke, so, if I’m going to risk that yelling match, I want you to do me a favor.”

“…Ok.”

“Reach out with the Force and check the temperature of her Force Signature.”

“Because your Uncle always tells me that if a woman’s Force Signature is cold, you’re fucked. And not in the good way.”

“Ugh! Dad!”
“Ben, you were conceived in an Ewok village with C-3PO in sleep mode in the corner, and this is not new information for you. Let’s not act like we have pretences.”

“The Threepio information was new.”

“Could you just please check your mother?”

“What’s in it for me?” Ben asked.

Han narrowed his eyes, “Excuse me?”

Ben flashed his father a smile that was a mirror of Han’s, “You always told me not to do something risky for someone else unless there’s benefit to yourself.”

Han shook his head, “Note to self, teach next kid in the family selflessness over profit.”

“You have no one to blame but yourself.”

“So, what’s this going to cost me?”

“How about you start naming numbers and I’ll tell you when to stop?”

Han couldn’t help but smile, “That’s my boy.”

After a number had been agreed on – a number that had made Han Solo mutter something about forgoing protection on Endor had been a mistake – Ben had done what his father asked. Kylo would never forget how white Han’s face had gone when Ben declared his mother’s Signature was ice cold. He remembered thinking how hilarious the bind his father was in at dealing with a woman pissed enough to have an ice cold Signature.

But as he stared at Sasa Ren, her Signature probably even colder, Kylo Ren simply prayed for mercy.

…Or death. Death would be a lot easier.

Gathering his courage, Kylo took a deep breath and approached Sasa. When he was standing next to her, Sasa glanced up briefly, but did not acknowledge him as she focused on her work.

Ben Solo never wished harder than in that moment that he was a naturally charismatic person.

Kylo didn’t know how else to start the conversation, so he simply said, “Hey.”

Sasa barely looked up, “Good morning, Master Kylo.”

“I wanted to talk about last night.”

“What’s there to talk about? You were doing your duty and suggested a solution to do it more efficiently. I let my personal bias get in the way. I apologize.”

“Sasa, don’t do this,” he didn’t need to be a Solo to identify the sarcasm dripping from her voice.

“What?”

“This.”
“Sarcasm?” Sasa shot. “Sass? Doesn’t your family hold such virtues in high esteem?”

“No, I forgot,” she cut off. “You just want me to be quiet and submissive and do as you say until Tara comes calling.”

“It’s not like that.”

“Yes, it is.”

“Not anymore!” Kylo exclaimed.

A pair of techs looked up, and the Knights of Ren quickly turned their faces away.

“Look,” Kylo muttered when the officers went back to work, “that may have been how it started, but things have changed.”

Sasa looked away.

“No, they haven’t,” she whispered. “Nothing will ever change the fact that you picked her – you wanted her – but you didn’t choose me. The Supreme Leader did.”

“I’m not some nobody,” Sasa cut off firmly. “You’ve seen it. I was hand chosen by the Supreme Leader. I’m special. I come from high stock.”

“And what stock is that?”

Sasa blinked, “What do you mean?”

“What high stock do you come from?” Kylo repeated, his brow furrowed with a mystery that had been crossing his mind more as of late. “You say that you come from some great bloodline, but what bloodline is that? The old Jedi Order had rules against attachment, and the only children from the new Order were Rey Skywalker and Miri Halcorr-Kene. You can’t be Miri, because I personally killed her, and if you’re implying you’re Rey Skywalker, then you and I have a whole different set of issues to deal with.”

“I’m not Rey Skywalker,” Sasa snapped. She studied Kylo’s face for a long stretch, “Why are you asking such questions?”

“It’s just-”

“Do you doubt the Supreme Leader?”

There was no one in the room who was pretending they weren’t listening anymore.

Kylo glanced around, sternly but also nervously, “Of course I don’t. I just have… questions.”

For a very long time, Sasa said nothing. He could feel her cerise Signature gently probing at the borders of his mind. Kylo let her in, willing to show her the questions he dare not utter so publicly.

She drew back from his mind like it was a red-hot iron that scalded her skin.

“I am what he says I am,” Sasa whispered, a tear forming in the corner of her eye. Kylo so wanted to wipe it away and quell her own fears with a kiss. “I believe what he claims. I know in my heart that I was made for something more, made from something more.”

Ben Solo closed his eyes. He may reject the more undesirable parts of his blood, but at least he could say the world knew his family’s names.

Sasa shook her head, “I am not a nobody, Kylo Ren… and I’ll prove it to you. Just you wait. I’ll show everyone.”

And without another word, Sasa strode out of the room.

Kylo could feel every eye in the room on him.

“What are you all looking at?” Kylo barked. “Get back to work!”

He didn’t need to ask twice.

Kylo sighed, rubbing his face. Then he caught sight of a somewhat familiar figure – the Stormtrooper called Marks. Marks was a promising future Knight of Ren according to Wiln, and was a friend of Sasa’s friend, FN-2187. Having no better option, Kylo went up to Marks.

“Tell me the truth, Soldier,” Kylo muttered his order, looking around nervously. “Did I just make things worse?”

Marks glanced towards the door Sasa had exited, “With all due respect, Sir… Hell yes.”

Kylo groaned.

It took a couple of days after his visit to the Supremacy — and the warning from Wiln Ren — for FN-2187 to realize that something had changed. Activity in the base, in their training, seemed on the uptick—a new, quiet urgency pervading everything they did, everything they were expected to do. Instruction seemed suddenly more intense. Their classwork and lectures, which until then had focused primarily on their duties as stormtroopers — on small-unit tactics, weapons maintenance, military structure and integration — gave way to more discussions on particular deployments, stormtrooper specializations, and localized scenarios using named, known locations. For the better part of a week, they studied and were repeatedly tested on different historical battles, many from the Clone Wars, some even earlier.

They were stormtroopers, but they weren’t quite, not yet. They were cadets, and as cadets they had additional duties aside from their training. Those duties covered everything from maintaining the armory to performing minor repairs on equipment to quite literally moving equipment from one location to another, often by hand but frequently with the assistance of the heavy-lifter droids, when whatever was to be moved was too big to be moved manually. They mopped the floors. They emptied the trash. They worked in the galley preparing meals.

That part of sanitation duty was fine for FN-2187, especially since Sasa tended to pull the right strings that FN-2187 would bring her her lunch. He would have to stay and supervise her meal, ensuring Tara hadn’t slipped in any poisons. And if they so happened to talk about things like training, schedules, and how pissed off Sasa was with Kylo like a pair of good friends, then so be it.

What FN-2187 didn’t enjoy was toilet scrubbing duty. And FN-2187 found he seemed to have his roster changed to toilet scrubbing duty whenever Kylo saw him exiting Sasa’s room in his daily plea to get Sasa to speak to him again. Sasa was proud to tell FN-2187 that she had never actually let Kylo into her room so this was a special perk that even Kylo didn’t get.

Truth be told, FN-2187 was not keen on getting privileges from Sasa that Kylo didn’t get. There were enough rumours about FN-2187 and Sasa, and the angry glares he had been getting from Kylo lately made FN-2187 wonder if Kylo was starting to believe him.

FN-2187 still had a bruise on his back from the first time he ran into Kylo doing such plea. Kylo made it very clear what would happen to FN-2187 if he ever told anyone he saw Kylo bringing her flowers.

Even worse with this change of duty, free time in which to relax, simply to rest in the barracks or to read First Order–approved literature or watch First Order–approved vids, vanished.

Being a good friend, Sasa had been stealing FN-2187 away with made up excuses about duties for him to fulfil, but in reality she would sneak him back to her room for said downtime. They would play dejarik or watch some HoloVids that weren’t First Order approved. When Captain Phasma discovered what was going on, she put an instant stop to it.

Well, except for every Tuesday when she actually joined them to watch a hilarious melodrama based on the Skywalker family, The Starkillers. Both Sasa and FN-2187 were too afraid to ask why she was interested.

There was always something more to do, somewhere else to be, another session in the simulator or more dishes to wash. There was always someone watching their performance, no matter what it was, someone to tell them that they needed to work faster, work harder, that they had to be better.

It didn’t leave a lot of time to think, and FN-2187 began to wonder if that wasn’t the point.

As grueling as their schedule had become, it was Slip who took the worst of it. He had never been the best under pressure, and his mistakes became more common. Under scrutiny, each error was magnified. Minor infractions—a broken plate when they were doing the dishes, a battery pack left on the wrong shelf in the armory, things that could’ve happened to anyone—were dealt with punitively, and all of them were punished, not Slip alone.

Nines and Zeroes made no secret of their growing resentment. Even FN-2187 felt it. He could see Slip struggling, and he would think to help him, to try to ease his burden, even move to do so. Then he would remember Captain Phasma and would instead turn away.

FN-2187 hated the look on Sasa’s face whenever she saw him do that.

He didn’t like how that made him feel—almost like he was sick, like there was something sitting deep in his stomach that didn’t agree with him. It didn’t help that FN-2187 couldn’t see any indication from anyone else—not from Nines, not from Zeroes—that they felt the same way. He was sure he felt it alone.

He began to wonder if there was something wrong with him.

---

Sasa Ren wasn’t sure how she found herself alone in a hallway with General Hux, but she knew she should get out as quickly as possible.
“General,” she nodded as she passed.

Force Sensitive or not, she couldn’t help but give a small yelp when he hooked an arm around her hip and pulled her back to him.

“Don’t startle,” Hux held up his hands innocently. “I just wanted to talk.”

She glared at him, “You could have asked politely.”

“Sorry, I had a bit of a rough upbringing and I fear my interactions in treatment of women can be lacking.”

“You’re not actually justifying that kind of bullshit?”

Hux frowned, “Anyway… I wanted to speak to you about Kylo Ren. I hear that things are a little rocky with you two.”

“You must be delighted.”

“On the contrary, I hate seeing a beautiful woman upset.”

“Well, I’m not wilted flower, but I thank you for the concern,” Sasa said coldly. “Kylo and I are just going through a tiff.”

“I see, well,” Hux reached up and cupped her cheek, “if you need any help getting through such heartbreak, I am more than happy to offer my services. You are a very beautiful woman. What do you say? Would you like some comfort?”

Sasa answered sweetly, “Get your hand off my face, or I swear to the Force, I’ll bite your fingers off.”

Hux frowned, “Can you really do that?”

“Do you want to find out?”

He stepped back from her.

She flashed him a smile, “I thought not.”

As a member of the Expert Class, FN-2187 had the privilege of being allowed to access the lightsaber training room alone. It was a few days before he managed to get away to do so, thinking it would be a good way to clear his head of everything. Maybe he could finally settle this whole Slip/Sasa/Kylo/Phasma/Wiln mess in his head.

“Looking for a partner?” Wiln Ren asked.

FN-2187 sighed. Or not.

“Sure,” FN-2187 nodded. “You can only deflect remotes for so long.”

“And that’s the kind of thinking that let you skip the Advanced Class,” Wiln smiled. “You ready?”

“Your move, Sir,” FN-2187 raised his lightsaber.
They sparred and clashed for a good long while, Wiln critiquing him as they did so.

“You’re very good, 2187,” Wiln finally declared. “I’m really impressed. They told me you were born to be a soldier. Thought Sasa had made you too soft for that, but now I believe them.”

“Thank you,” FN-2187 blocked a blow. “Marks helps me practice when I need it.”

“Good. I’m almost ready to graduate him to the Expert Class. You both will make fine Knights of Ren.”

FN-2187 couldn’t manage a smile.

Gaining no reply, Wiln studied FN-2187 for a long time as they fought.

“You know,” Wiln said slyly, “there’s some offices near those rooms Sasa and I stayed in. No one uses them at night, so the doors are left open so that no one can sneak into them and hide behind a locked door.”

FN-2187 missed a block. Oh God, were they really going to talk about this? Couldn’t they just pretend it never happened?

“So whenever those doors are closed at night an alarm is sent to Security and they check the cameras,” Wiln continued. “So, if someone was doing something they shouldn’t in one of those offices, they wouldn’t close the door. But that’s nothing to worry about, because there would be nothing to see in said office. Do you follow me? Was there something to see?”

FN-2187 met Wiln’s eyes, “No, Sir. Nothing at all.”

He really didn't want to be choked again.

“Good,” Wiln nodded. “You know, the Chosen were originally selected from the Blessed.”

“Is that so?”

“I was one of the Blessed… and so was Nova. We became… close. We had plans. Goals. We knew what we wanted, but then Snoke chose her. I busted my ass to get into the position I am in today so that I could continue to see her, but there was no point. She had become off limits.”

“Yes, you made that point very clear.”

Blades locked, Wiln just stared at FN-2187, “Do you know what makes a good Knight of Ren?”

“No, Sir.”

“A good Knight of Ren knows how to play the game. They follow all the rules, obey all the orders, and do it without hesitation. I’ve seen many good Knights of Ren… but the Knights who are alive now… they’re not good Knights of Ren. Not the ones who have held their place for years. Who survive through it all. Those Knights – Tara, Cern, Kylo, myself – we’re great Knights of Ren.”

“What about Sasa?”

“She’s getting there, but she still hasn’t figured it out.”

"Figured out what?"

“Figured out how to be a great Knight of Ren. You know, Nova is not as dim as she presents herself, and she’s a lot better at lightsaber than you’ve ever seen. But you’ll never see it.”

“Why?” FN-2187 asked.

“Because she does enough to keep herself from being punished, cast off, or even killed… but she’ll never present herself as good enough to ever truly fill a spot as a Knight of Ren. You see, the Chosen don’t have to sleep with Kylo, just the ones who become Knights of Ren. So, if she’s never a Knight of Ren, she doesn’t have to be with Kylo. And if she’s not forced to be with Kylo, well then…”

FN-2187 understood. If she wasn’t a Knight of Ren, then Nova could be with Wiln.

Wiln smiled, “That my friend, is how you be a great Knight of Ren. A good Knight of Ren follows the rules… but a great Knight of Ren knows how to rig the game. So the choice is yours FN-2187. Don’t make the wrong one.”

He frowned, “And which one is the wrong choice?”

“Now isn’t that the eternal question?”

After the second multiforce battle simulation, Captain Phasma singled out FN-2187 for praise in front of everyone who had participated. She had him stand and face the debriefing – and there were hundreds of them there that time, all the pilots and stormtroopers and instructors; it felt like everyone.

He especially didn’t like how Captain Electra’s droid, BB-9E looked at him. There was just something about BB Units that made FN-2187 uneasy.

She talked about his skill and his efficiency and his ruthlessness, how all the trainees could learn something from watching FN-2187. It made him feel awkward, even embarrassed, and he was thankful he had his helmet on so no one could see him.

“You know I can sense that blush on your face,” Sasa teased as everyone started to file out.

FN-2187 rolled his eyes, his blush not getting any better, “You sense everything.”

“True, but my point still stands.”

“Did you have a point?”

Sasa paused, “I suppose not.”

FN-2187 opened his mouth to speak but suddenly went very stiff.

“He’s watching us, isn’t he?” Sasa didn’t turn around.

FN-2187 nodded as Kylo’s eyes bore into him from across the room. He didn’t even look like he was paying attention to Captain Roan speaking to him.

Sasa glanced back and dramatically shook her head.

“Come on,” she boldly took his arm. “Let’s go have lunch.”

FN-2187 could feel Kylo’s eyes burning into him the whole way until Sasa dragged him out the “They’re close,” Hux said, then though no one asked. “Almost too close one might say.”

“He’s a good soldier, he wouldn’t dare,” Kylo answered shortly.

“Oh, sure, he’s a good soldier, but that Sasa… How far would she go to prove her point? After all, isn’t toying with men and doing whatever it takes to get your attention exactly what she’s been trained for?”

“Hux?”

“Yes, Ren?”

“One more word against Sasa and I’ll throw you into the wall of this simulation room.”

Hux grinned, “That’s not a no.”

That was the last thing Hux said before Kylo used the Force to send him flying into the wall.

“Let it not be said I’m not a man of my word,” Kylo told the laughing Phasma.

FN-2187 couldn’t stop shaking. He had just had his very first real deployment. The deployment was to a mining colony established in an artificial asteroid field collectively known as Pressy’s Tumble.

The largest of the fragments was the base of the mining operation, a sprawling refinery complex that covered most of the surface and had been sunk deep into the rock itself. FN-2187 wasn’t exactly sure what was being mined; opinions varied. Some of the stormtroopers said it was fuel, vital to First Order fleet operations. Others said it was some kind of ore needed for starship shield generators. One stormtrooper claimed it was Tibanna gas, but he was clearly mistaken.

What FN-2187 did know was that they were there to “restore order,” according to the briefing given by Captain Phasma herself. Republic agents, she told them, had infiltrated the mining operations and were both sabotaging equipment and creating dissent among the miners. The First Order’s presence was required to put a stop to it, to get the miners back on schedule, and to prevent any further delays.

Theirs was the second squad to shuttle in, and it was different from their trip to the Star Destroyer. This time FN-2187, Slip, Zeroes, and Nines stood in deployment formation for the entire ride, along with another three fire-teams of stormtroopers, some cadets and some more seasoned veterans. All of them were locked and loaded, carrying live ammunition and grenades, and one of the fire-teams, FN-2187 saw, had shock staffs and neurocage nets—weapons designed for crowd control, meant to subdue rather than kill.

Or so he had thought.

What happened was now thing more than a blur, but a blur he couldn’t move from his mind. They had been called in the accompany Phasma to deal with the striking miners. It was supposed to be a simple mission. The miners had offer terms of agreement to the First Order. All Phasma had to do was accept them or negotiate until she accepted.

But instead… Instead she had ordered them to open fire on the unarmed civilians in the middle of a negotiation. FN-2187 didn’t need to be briefed on the Reasonable Wartime Measures Act to know what had been done was a war crime.

A war crime he helped commit.

True, he never actually fired on them. Slip had. He had finally proved himself and opened fire. Zeroes and Nines followed suit. FN-2187 froze. By the time he had collected himself, they were all dead. Dead at the hands of his team.

Dead at the hands of Slip.

“Don’t make the wrong choice,” Wiln Ren’s words thundered in FN-2187’s mind as he made his way to Captain Phasma’s office. She hadn’t been very happy with his actions at Pressy’s Tumble.

When FN-2187 arrived at the office of Captain Phasma, he wasn’t quite sure what to do. Her door was open, but she wasn’t looking up at him from her desk. Instead she just sat there doing paperwork, forcing him to wait in silence.

The minutes stretched on endlessly as he just stood there waiting. His posture was ramrod and as perfect as one could imagine a soldier, but after a while of her letting him sweat, FN-2187 dared to let his eyes flick about.

He had been in a few offices before. Wiln Ren’s was filled with books, maps, artifacts, and Holos of information and pictures. Kylo being busy with his other duties, Wiln had taken the place of the First Order expert on the history and study of the Force, as well as the one in charge of advancing the potential Knights through the proper training. Meanwhile, Kylo was the top member of the High Council and was in charge of the military aspects of the Knights of Ren – especially relations with the Resistance. Cern was the intelligence and interrogation expert, while Tara made sure everything ran smoothly and kept everyone in line.

The other Knights of Ren didn’t seem to last long enough to have a permanent role. He’d be lying if he said that didn’t concern him about his future with the Knights of Ren… and Sasa’s.

If Tara or Cern had an office, FN-2187 hadn’t seen it. He had seen Kylo’s… and it was freakishly well-organized. He had a cross-reference catalogue system for all of his files that would make a droid salivate. Kylo had been proud to tell FN-2187 that he had programmed it from scratch all by himself. He was great with putting together mechanics and programming… which was good because every time Kylo got pissed off, whatever poor piece of machinery was nearest would become very well-acquainted with his lightsaber. The worst part was that then they would have to put up with a few days of Kylo’s complaining at his lack of equipment while they waited for the new parts to be shipped, until someone inevitably just gave up their own equipment to him to make the complaining to stop.

Three computer terminals and an interrogation room had taken the brunt of Kylo and Sasa’s feud. He remembered what Sasa had said upon him telling her the latest damage: Kylo Ren knows two ways to deal with his problems. He either fights them out or fucks them out. Since I’m not giving him one (Tara had conveniently left on a two week mission after the nose breaking incident) he’s gotta turn to the other. When we do make up, I’m probably not going to walk straight for a week.

FN-2187 really wished he didn’t remember that.

He had also seen General Hux’s office briefly, and he was surprised to see just how many framed awards, certificates, and various accolades the man could fit onto his walls.

But Phasma’s office was different; it was spartan and spotless with a few propaganda posters on the wall. It was easy to tell she didn’t spend much time in the office, and honestly FN-2187 probably would have never guessed it was hers, lacking any personal touch whatsoever.

Except possibly the shelf that contained twelve small Holos each projecting the wanted poster of a different enemy of the First Order.

Everyone in the First Order knew the face of General Leia Organa. FN-2187 had seen that wanted poster so many times, it might as well have been tattooed onto the back of his eyelids.

FN-2187 was also a little bit familiar with the poster of Commander Diego Nalto, though honestly FN-2187 couldn’t recall the man’s position in the Resistance other than being Organa’s second-in-command.

He had no idea who the hell Commander Poe Dameron was. The man looked so smug in his file photo. Dameron was no doubt some pompous jerk like Hux or Kylo Ren. FN-2187 would probably hate him.

Three of the images were of droids: a blue astromech, a golden protocol droid, and an orange and white BB-8 unit. All had bold, capitalized letters under their pictures that read DISASSEMBLE UPON CAPTURE.

Next was some golden-brown furry creature FN-2187 had never heard of, but he had heard the name of Chewbacca. He had also heard of the next person: the infamous Rebellion General Han Solo.

Weirdly, the more FN-2187 stared at the picture of Solo, the more he started to think that the former General looked scarily like Kylo Ren. FN-2187 had been given the privilege of seeing Kylo sans mask, but he certainly was not in on the intel that Kylo was the son of Solo and Organa. Kylo liked to keep that under wraps as much as possible. Sure, FN-2187 knew Kylo was the grandson of Darth Vader via Vader’s daughter, but First Order Stormtroopers were not informed that Vader’s daughter was General Leia Organa.

Then was an image FN-2187 was certain he had seen before: a photo of Luke Skywalker ten years too old for FN-2187 to recognize him as now… Or when their paths did cross in about three years’ time. Luke’s photo also had bold, capital letters under it. TERMINATE IMMEDIATELY. CONTACT THE KNIGHTS OF REN FOR BACKUP. NO EXCEPTIONS.

The picture next to Luke Skywalker’s made FN-2187 do a double take.

Was that seriously a child on a wanted poster? Listed with a reward price twice the amount of General Leia Organa?

A sweet, smiling little girl stared out at FN-2187. He scowled at the image, something inside of him being pulled towards it. It gave him that funny stirring inside of him that Sasa always claimed was the Force when she tried to practice rebalancing with him. FN-2187 wasn’t very good at it, but there was something about that image that called him.

His eyes slipped down to the information section to figure out why such a young girl was considered one of the greatest enemies of the First Order, but what he saw in the text made his stomach drop.

MOST WANTED

NAME: Rey Rhiaon Skywalker
“Don’t make the wrong choice,” Wiln Ren’s words repeated.

FN-2187 gulped. Was this another thing he would have to do as a Knight of Ren?

He looked to the next Holo next to Rey’s. It was another one that listed the subject was terminated. Felicity Rhiaon Skywalker. Human. Female. Homeworld: Coruscant.

Why did something in the Force tug at him while he read that name?

The final one was a strangely unremarkable woman. She didn’t even have that high a bounty; just some old woman with the title of doctor before her name.

“Doctor Meredyth Kalonia,” Phasma suddenly said.

FN-2187 nearly jumped a foot. When had she started watching him.

“C- Captain?” FN-2187 stuttered.

Phasma just looked at him, “Kalonia. Doctor Kalonia. That’s the woman you were looking at.”

“Oh, uh, yes, Captain.”

“You’re wondering why I have her on my shelf?”

“Well, uh… yes, Captain.”

“That woman,” Phasma pointed to the Holo, “is the only one who was smart enough to get the hell off Rornian before the Knights of Ren burned it to the ground. That’s what Felicity Rhiaon should have done. Grabbed her daughter and gotten the hell out of there, Skywalkers be damned. What happened next to her daughter is her own damn fault.”

FN-2187 just stared at Phasma.

“Sit,” Phasma gestured to the empty chair across her desk.

He obeyed.

“You didn’t fire,” Phasma simply said.

FN-2187 hung his head, “No, Ma’am.”

“Why not?”

“I, uh… I don’t know. I just… couldn’t. They were unarmed.”
Phasma closed her eyes briefly, “Such attitudes won’t get you far in the First Order, FN-2187.”

“I know, Ma’am.”

“Do you not understand what’s going on here? We’re trying to groom you into a perfect soldier. You could be a General. You could be a Knight of Ren.”

“I know, I just… I can’t explain it. Perhaps I need a reconditioning session.”

Phasma raised an eyebrow. There was something really wrong when a soldier willingly requested a reconditioning session.

“I reviewed the footage of your session with the Chosen,” Phasma moved to the next point. “I saw your bout with FN-2003.”

FN-2187 winced.

“I have one question for you, FN-2187.”

“Yes, Captain.”

“Were you toying with FN-2003? Was that what I saw?”

FN-2187 hesitated, and just doing that, he knew, made Captain Phasma unhappy. If she was angry, he couldn’t tell. Through her helmet, her voice was always carefully modulated.

“FN-2003 had been injured in a previous bout,” he said. “I didn’t want to see him hurt any further.”

“I see.” Her helmet turned toward him, hidden eyes seeking his, and suddenly FN-2187 felt horribly exposed sitting across that desk, just the two of them. “You didn’t want him fighting someone else, someone who wasn’t…sympathetic to his situation.”

“No, Captain.”

“Your objective was simple, FN-2187.”

“I won the bout, Captain.”

“But you considered losing to him first, didn’t you?”

FN-2187 didn’t respond.

“A real stormtrooper has no room for sympathy,” Phasma told him. “A real stormtrooper is the extension of the First Order, of Supreme Leader Snoke’s will, nothing less. Do you think the Supreme Leader would have hesitated, FN-2187?”

“No, Captain.”

Phasma studied his face for a long time, “You must understand, FN-2187. What you’re doing now, what you’ve been doing these past few weeks is dangerous. If you don’t fit into the First Order… that’s not a good position to be in. I like you, FN-2187. I have high hopes for you, but I can’t protect you if you don’t play the game.”

There it was again, those words: play the game. What a horrible game it was.

“You need to make a choice, FN-2187,” Phasma said. “Do you have what it takes to be a Knight of Ren? Or do you want something else entirely?"

FN-2187 was scared that he knew the answer.

Marks found him an hour later, curled up in his bunk having a full-on panic attack.

“It’s going to be okay,” Marks promised sitting on FN-2187’s bunk with him.

“No, it isn’t! You don’t understand!” FN-2187 admitted, “I don’t know if I want to be a Knight of Ren.”

Marks frowned and looked away, “You don’t get it.”

“Get what?”

“You and I… we’ve never had a choice. If they want us, they will make us a Knight of Ren. It was decided a long time ago, and they don’t care if we agree or not. You’re going to be a Knight of Ren. You better get used to the idea.”

FN-2187’s heart raced in his chest. Marks was right, for some reason Kylo Ren had decided his fate a long time ago. Someday FN-2187 would bear the name Fyrn Ren and do things as unspeakable as Phasma had done at Pressy’s Tumble.

“Don’t make the wrong choice,” Wiln Ren’s words had been nothing but the illusion of choice. He would be a Knight of Ren whether he liked it or not.

And FN-2187 didn’t like it.

“Wow, you really must have pissed her off,” Cern chuckled. “She won’t even look at you.”

“Shut up,” Kylo glared at him.

Cern just laughed.

It had been two weeks since his stupid threesome suggestion. Kylo and the rest of the Knights were scattered across the Command Bridge of the Finalizer. Sasa had placed herself on the absolute opposite end of the bridge from Kylo, electing to rather stand near Hux and Captain Electra than be anywhere near Kylo.

He knew he had fucked up when someone willingly chose Electra over him. Even Snoke kept his distance from her.

When Sasa looked up, Kylo tried to catch her eye – an admittedly difficult feat while wearing a mask – but he managed it. Unfortunately, the second he had, Sasa immediately looked towards Hux. She flashed the General a smile and touched a flirty hand to his arm.

Kylo smirked. Really? She was going to use Hux to make him jealous?

“You know, you look like an idiot wearing that fucking mask while the rest of us are barefaced,” a woman’s voice came from behind.
Oh good, because the day wasn’t unbearable enough already.

“Welcome back, Tara,” Kylo rolled his eyes. “Would it kill you not to disparage me in front of the officers?”

“It might,” Cern grinned.

Kylo and Tara exchanged a look. A nod from Kylo and Tara flipped Cern’s chair over.

“I gotta stop sitting next to you,” Cern grumbled, pulling himself back up.

Kylo shook his head, “How did the trip go?”

“Well, Tekka certainly knows something, but he’s on the run,” Tara reported. “I chased him across half the Galaxy before he gave me the slip on Scarif.”

“We’ll double our efforts to find him. Broken or not, I don’t like the idea of Luke Skywalker being out there somewhere.”

“Agreed.” Tara causally glanced towards Hux and Sasa, “My, my. Those two are getting rather touchy, aren’t they?”

Kylo scowled as he turned his attention to the two. Sasa was laughing and Hux standing behind her, hands caressing up and down her arms.

Those soft arms Kylo loved to feel wrapped around his body. A smile spread by lips he so craved the taste of. A sparkle in her spirit he had thought was only reserved for him.

He didn’t want to be jealous of Hux… but damn it, it was working.

Behind Kylo’s back, Tara shot Cern a smirk. Cern just rolled his eyes.

Kylo’s mind filled with dark images of choking out Hux, throwing him across the room, then dragging Sasa to his bedroom where he would tie her up, spank her, and punish her as he pleased. Unable to trust himself not to act on such thoughts, Kylo stormed over to observe a monitor that would force his back to the pair.

“Got him,” Sasa’s eyes twinkle mischievously. “Thank you for your help, General Hux.”

Hux chuckled, “Any venture that has the sole goal of angering Kylo Ren is one I’m happy to pursue. Especially when it concerns such a beautiful woman.”

Sasa smiled and moved to break away from Hux now that Kylo wasn’t watching. A hand suddenly caught her wrist and Sasa found herself pulled back towards Hux.

“Now, wait a moment,” Hux grinned. “We’re not done yet.”

“No, I think we are,” Sasa said kindly trying to shake his grip.

“But we’ve only just gotten started. Stay for a while. Let’s see what else will anger Ren.”

Kylo sensed the change in Sasa. Immediately his head snapped toward them. Hux had a firm gripping on Sasa’s wrist and she was trying to wrestle free. It looked innocent enough, maybe a playful act between lovers.

“I always did think Sasa’s eyes linger on Hux a little too long,” Tara murmured in Kylo’s ear. “So shameful. I would barely give him the time of day, and yet there she’s throwing herself at him.”

Indeed, Kylo might have even believed it to be the act of a pair of lovers… if he couldn’t sense her discomfort in the Force.

“I’m serious, Hux,” Sasa kept her voice low not to make a scene. “Let go of me.”

“Just listen to what I have to say.”

“I will if you let me go. Come on, General, you’re hurting me.”

Someone cleared their throat, and Hux looked up to find the disapproving eyes of Wiln Ren.

“Is there a problem?” Wiln asked slowly.

Hux swallowed. The Supreme Leader hadn’t just made Wiln the instructor of the Chosen; it was also well-known that Wiln had been trained to be their protector. If you messed with one of Wiln’s girls… lets just say it never ended well.

Locking eyes with Wiln, Hux released Sasa and held up his hand innocently.

Wiln looked to Sasa, “Tell me if he’s giving you problems.”

Sasa nodded and Wiln departed. She turned her attention back to Hux, fixing him with a glare.

Hux tried to flash her a charming smile, “I’m sorry, Sasa, that was inappropriate of me, but a woman of your beauty just does things to a man.”

“Just look at them,” Tara took a step closer to Kylo so she was whispering in his ear. “So, blatant.”

“You are a very beautiful woman,” Hux twirled a lock of her hair. “Red is totally the loveliest hair colour. There aren’t nearly as many of us as there should be.”

“So intimate,” Tara hissed.

Sasa glared at Hux as he took a step closer to her and slid his hands up her arms, “General, please stop.”

“Why do you fight me?” Hux breathed. “Why do you fight this? He doesn’t respect you. You’re his second thought and will always be. He gives you no purpose but to spread your legs.”

“You’re wrong. I’m more than that.”

“But he doesn’t let you be. You need someone who will let you be more.”

“Someone like you?” Sasa shot, her body stiffening as his hands drifted down and settled on her hips.

“So much more than they pretend to be,” Tara smirked.

Kylo clenched his fist tightly.

“I could make everything change for you. Show you the world and give it to you. Together we would be unstoppable,” Hux ghosted his lips over hers. “You would be so much more than you are now. So much more than Solo’s Whore.”
“I’m sorry, Kylo,” Tara cooed, her hands running across his shoulders, “but it looks like it’s just a blatant betrayal of you.”

That was the moment a blast of blue lightning from Sasa’s fingertips shot Hux clean across the room, hitting the wall.

The room fell perfectly silent.

Kylo looked to Tara, “You were saying?”

“You’re right, General Hux,” Sasa said coldly but loudly. “I am far much more than just Solo’s Whore.”

Hux let out a pathetic groan against the wall.

With a smirk on her lips, Sasa’s head snapped to Kylo. He raised an eyebrow, a coy smile on his face, and Sasa crossed the room to him in less than four steps. With no preamble, she grasped those strong arms she had so missed, and looked up at him, forest green eyes burning with desire.

The same desire that inflamed his forest green soul.

“I forgive you,” Sasa declared before he could say a word. “Now take me to your room and fuck me until I’m raw.”

Kylo did not need to be asked twice; he simply gestured to the door and said, “Lead the way.”

Grasping his arm, Sasa led Kylo towards the exit when they were stopped by the call of Hux’s voice.

“You can’t leave!” Hux exclaimed, still crumpled in a heap against the wall. “We have important work to do, Sasa! Where do you thinking you’re going?”

Sasa just smirked, “To do what a whore does.”

And with that they were gone.

Slowly – and with much confusion – the officers got back to work, muttering among themselves about what had just occurred. No one dared to approach Hux as he sulked on the floor.

No one but Cern and Tara Ren.

“Would it be too much to ask for a hand up?” Hux inquired, looking quite pathetic.

Tara just crossed her arms, “We did it your way, General. Now it’s my turn.”

Sasa was already undressing Kylo before they had even stumbled kissing into his room.

“I’m so sorry,” Kylo managed through ragged breaths as Sasa fumbled for the door close button behind her. “I wanted you so much that night, I just didn’t want to let you go. But Tara would have literally tried to kill us if I sent her away, plus I don’t think you wanted to be with me after knowing I had been with her that night—”

“Kylo, shut up, you’re not making this better,” Sasa pulled his shirt over his head.
“Right,” Kylo turned her around and gently pushed her against the wall to unzip her dress. He kissed across her shoulder blades. “Basically what I’m saying is I was wrong and an idiot.”

“Oh God, can you repeat that into a tape recorder later?” Sasa teased as he pushed down her dress.

Kylo grinned, spun her back around, and carried her to the bed. She giggled as he threw her down and climbed atop her.

“I’m sorry,” Kylo her neck as her hands fumbled with his pants. “You were the only one I wanted in my bed that night. I just thought you weren’t coming back for another day and I needed your touch so bad. I thought Tara might be some sort of poor substitute.”

Sasa pulled back.

“What?” Kylo asked.

“Are you serious?” Sasa whispered. “I thought that when you wanted to be with her but couldn’t, you would call for me.”

Kylo shook his head, “At the start, but now… Oh God, and when I saw Hux trying to touch you and Tara pretending that you could ever be with him, I knew. I knew I didn’t want to let anyone else to have you.”

“And I don’t want anyone else to have you,” Sasa pushed him off. Before he could react, she pulled off his pants and shoved him down onto the bed. “I know you want Tara, but damn it, I want you Kylo. I want you to be mine. Only mine. I know you still want her, and I know that Tara wants the power of being the mother to your child. But I want to be the mother of your child to bond with you, and to have your child, no strings attached. I want you for no other reason than to be with you, whether it be Kylo Ren, Ben Solo, or whatever else you want to name yourself. But until there’s a baby in the picture, nothing can change. Tara and I can bicker all we wanted, but at the end of the day, it’s a race to the finish.”

Kylo looked up, rising from the mattress, “Sasa, listen-”

She put two fingers on his lips and smirked, “And if I know one thing…”

Kylo grunted in surprise when Sasa pushed him ungracefully back down on the bed.

“It’s that between now and tomorrow morning,” she straddled his lap and tossed her hair clip on the floor, “there’s plenty of chances to finish.”

He grinned and viciously flipped her over, throwing her down onto the bed. Kylo pinned her wrists above her head with one of his large hands. She mewedled as he caressed her sides, and Sasa writhed her body up against his. As he began to tear the rest of the clothes from her body, Kylo bent down and bit her lip until it drew blood.

“Yes, Master,” she moaned. “Take me.”

Kylo chuckled, “Am I forgiven?”

“I suppose you’ve suffered enough. But I swear to God if you ever suggest a threesome as a solution to this rivalry again-”

“Believe me, lesson learned.”
As he pulled her panties down to her ankles and forced her legs apart, Kylo couldn’t help but think how much hotter this seduction was over Tara’s.

He finished inside of her with a grunt, a moan, and a tender kiss, Ben panted and looked down at the woman beneath him. She was breathtaking, copper hair splayed on the bed, all pale skin and forest green eyes. Her mind freely reached for him and her Force Signature entwined with his own, forest green and cerise mixing into one. He could feel her body tremble beneath him, and the ferocity of her mind. He felt what she did, and the thought scared him.

“Don’t be afraid,” she whispered, though as a tear rolled down her cheek, Ben couldn’t tell if the words were to him or herself.

“I’m not afraid,” he bent down and kissed away the tear. But his breath was shaking and his eyes filled with alarm.

“I know you are,” she downcast her eyes and reached out to stroke his lips. She took a deep breath, “And I know you fear feeling the same way I do. You don’t want to hear these words.”

“Say them.”

“I love you,” Sasa whispered.

And Ben Solo – afraid of what it would mean if he felt that way too but also knowing that he very well might – replied with two words that were so much easier… and yet meant so much more.

“I know.”

That night General Hux was not surprised to find Captain Phasma when he entered the private medical office for the High Council. It was where they kept all of the personal medical supplies of the highest-ranking officers of the First Order.

“Mixing another batch of Ren’s sleeping cordial?” Hux asked as he casually searched through the cupboards.

“Kylo can’t sleep without it,” the Chrome Stormtrooper mixed the familiar set of ingredients spread out on the table. “What are you doing in here?”

“Trying to find something for the after effects of Force Lightning. My left arm has been numb for hours and my teeth keep… buzzing.”

Phasma chuckled.

Hux shook his head, “Do you know any remedies?”

“Why would I know any remedies?”

“Come now,” he shot her a look. “We both know why I would ask you that.”

She smirked behind her helmet, “I know, and I take great pleasure in also knowing you can never voice it. Tell me, how does it feel to be so certain of something, and yet still have enough of a seed of doubt that you dare not confront it? Or is it not the doubt? Is it now that simply you’ve let it go on for so long you fear the repercussions if it were to be true?"

“I think we both would find ourselves in a difficult situation if the truth about Felicity Rhiaon were to come to light. I still can’t believe they honestly think Ben Solo killed her.”

“Imagine my feelings. It’s such a blow to my reputation.”

“And that brings us back to our earlier question.”

Phasma shook her head, “Try making some Flasse petals and Smie root into a tea. That should help a little.”

Hux hesitated to take the suggestion but nodded and opened the appropriate cupboard.

“Speaking of roots,” Phasma watched her liquid simmer over the burner. It was almost completed. “I’m almost out of Aabane root. I’m going to need it in no less than two weeks. I don’t trust the potency of this batch to ration it out any longer.”

“I’ll arrange the shipment from Valra first thing in the morning.” Hux watched her for a while as Phasma poured her concoction into a bottle for Kylo, “You know, I must ask. This cordial you make him, does it actually have any sedative properties in it?”

“Not a one. A mere placebo.”

“A placebo with a nasty side effect,” Hux smirked. “How does the root work?”

“It damages sperm production, makes them deformed. Oh sure, take a sample and they’ll test fine, but the second it crosses the cervix and is met with the hormone progesterone, the sperm loses its tail and can’t travel far enough to meet the egg. I mean, it’s possible to still impregnate a woman if she’s released an egg and it travels down far enough, but for the most part the man is rendered impotent.”

“Impotent enough that as hard as Tara or Sasa or any of them try, it’s almost impossible Kylo would ever get her pregnant,” Hux chuckled.

“Exactly,” Phasma capped the bottle. “And as long as he thinks I’m actually on his side, he’ll keep taking it.”

“And why are you pretending to be on his side?” Hux crossed his arms. “You hate him just as much me, maybe even more. Why pretend?”

“Because I have nothing left to fight for but my family, and if protecting them means manipulating Ben Solo into thinking I like him rather than my true feelings that I would be willing and eager to drop kick him into the lavas of Mustafar, then so be it.”

“And that’s why you prevent him from having any children.”

“No,” Phasma shook her head. “I do it because if I can’t have any children of my own, then I damn well am not going to let Ben Solo have one either.”

Chapter End Notes
Before the Awakening

After finding a nearly intact ship in the desert, Rey thinks she’s hit the jackpot. But when she is forced into a partnership with Devi and Strunk, she turns to her father to stop a betrayal. Back on D’Qar, Poe and Kaydel celebrate their first anniversary.

Not going to lie, I absolutely am starting to love Cern Ren. He’s kind of like the First Order Quom: can get away with whatever insane shit he wants, and still people keep him around.

So, I learned during this chapter that you can only highlight and copy paste a certain percentage of kindle books before they cut you off. I am not going to have fun with this, am I? I ended up finding a solution… I literally set up a new kindle account and bought another copy of the book.

I kid you not, I now own four copies of it. Two hardcovers (one for me to read and another filled with notes, highlights, and sticky notes) and two digital copies.

Someone please stop me.

Also, to all the people who were saying that Aletha and Diego need to make up and/or Poe and Kaydel need too, actually they were meant to have already. That’s what those two after argument chats were about. People were more angry towards Diego treating Rose the way he did, so if you want, I can add a small scene in the next chapter to address that issue. I’m sorry that things were unclear.
Before the Awakening

Chapter Summary

Rey repairs a ship, Kylo sees the inside of Sasa's room, and Malar's Men forms.

Chapter Notes

PLEASE NOTE, THIS CHAPTER CONTAINS A SINGLE SMALL REFERENCE TO A SCENE FROM SOLO. IF YOU DON’T WANT SPOILERS SKIP THE LINE THAT STARTS WITH “Rey was exactly right, the second bed of the Captain’s quarters” AS I CHOSE TO EXPLAIN WHY I SAID THE CAPTAIN’S QUARTERS OF THE Millennium Falcon HAD TWO BEDS IN IT, BUT THERE WAS CLEARLY NO ROOM SHOWN FOR A SECOND BED IN THE MOVIE SOLO.

Sorry about the long wait between updates. My computer broke, and literally the only ways to write this next chapter were pen and paper, and later I purchased a bluetooth keyboard to literally write this on my phone. Unfortunately, most of the things I needed were actually on my computer, and it turns out that my failsafe backup system wasn’t actually saving anything. I’ve basically had to take a sabbatical from writing, but honestly that’s a good thing because I was starting to feel burnout and this gave me a nice little break.

Warning: This chapter contains the storyline of a 17-year-old and 18-year-old having consensual sex. Both characters in story are considered to be of legal age on their planet, but this is not applicable to Earth. Age of consent laws vary in area. If you are uncomfortable by the depiction of a 17-year-old having sex, please skip those sections.

Once again, huge chunks of this chapter comes from Before the Awakening by Greg Rucka. Again, I have gone through, changed things, cut things, and added things but a lot of it, is in fact not my work.

Credit also goes to R2_D2106 who once more wrote a scene for this chapter – in particular the picnic scene.

Please note, this chapter starts the morning after chapter forty-seven (the cave chapter.) Chapter forty-eight ran about two weeks, but this one spans almost a year, so I decided we’re going to jump back in time slightly. The opening scene takes place on the same day the FN squad does their simulation, Tara plots with Hux and Cern against Sasa, and Kylo and Sasa take the pregnancy test.

Dirty version on AO3.

[Side note: I really recommend listening to Walking the Wire by Imagine Dragons during this chapter. I listened to it while writing, and it’s really a good theme for it.]

Enough housekeeping, on to the story.
“Drink,” Luke ordered, shoving a steaming mug in Quom’s face.

The Vrogem blinked blearily from his cot, barely awake, “What’s going on? What’s this?”

“That drink mix that Aletha sent for you. I told you I would need to use it on you at some point.”

“Why do you need to use it on me?”

Quom stared at Luke in confusion for a very long time. Then his eyes drifted to the swath of bandages wrapped around Luke’s neck, and everything clicked.

“Whoa,” Quom let out a low whistle. “That was… an adventure.”

“I think I saw my dead mother.”

“Hey, I saw my dead mother and you didn’t see me get possessed by the Dark Side.”

“Huh, so the woman really was your mom.”

“Yeah, it’s kind of complicated,” Luke said.

“When is it ever not with your family?” Quom grinned. “By the way, who’s the asshole who knocked me on my ass with Rey’s staff?”

“Brendan. My brother-in-law.”

“Huh. …He had good form.” Quom took another drink of his tea. He could feel it working its magic. “So, you found Rey in the cave?”

“No, apparently that venture was completely pointless,” Luke answered. “And I sense that Teng didn’t find her either.”

“How can you tell?”

That was the moment the noticeably alone Teng ducked into the tent.

“Stupid Jedi powers,” Quom grumbled.

“Good morning,” Teng had a small frown on his face, confused by Quom’s words but knowing not to push for an explanation. “I see you two made it back before the sandstorm yesterday.”
“I see you didn’t,” Quom shot back as he sipped at his tea. After the events of the cave, he was certain he’d be drinking it non-stop for weeks. “Where were you, Pup?”

“Oh, I stayed in the walker last night hoping Rey would show up. Unfortunately, she didn’t. She’s not here, is she?”

“No,” Luke sighed, fiddling with the bandage wrapped around his throat. He really hoped he wouldn’t end up with a permanent scar of Quom’s toothmarks on his throat. “Still no sign of Rey. I swear, guys, I’m starting to lose my mind.”

“Me too,” said Quom.

“Hey, you lost yours years ago,” Teng waved off.

Quom narrowed his eyes, and Teng took a nervous step back.

“Easy boy,” Teng held up his hands.

Teng frowned, “Wait, why is your neck bandaged?”

Luke and Quom traded a look.

“I’ve experienced so many weird things with you two over the years. I think I can handle it.”

They traded another look.

“Alright,” Luke said. “Quom got possessed by the Dark Side, and there were these two cave creatures who took the forms of Rey and Felicity to help him attack me, but it’s okay because my temporarily resurrected brother-in-law and mother saved me. Also I had a vision of the future and apparently Rey and I are going to get into a duel on a rocky plain in the middle of the rain, because it’s this family. Of course we’re going to have a dramatic duel in a lightning storm.”

Teng blinked, “…I regret asking.”

“Okay…” Teng said slowly, “so that doesn’t answer the neck bandage.”

“Oh, Quom bit me in the throat.”

Teng’s jaw dropped.

“What?” Quom scowled. “It wasn’t that hard.”

Teng lowered his head into his hands, “How did this end up being my life?”

“I think it has to do with you wanting to bang Luke’s daughter.”

“Alright, I’m going to go bury myself in the sand. It was nice knowing you.”

“Teng, come back,” Luke laughed as the boy ducked out of the tent. He and Quom followed quickly, “Come on, we were just having a little fun with you.”

He came to an abrupt stop and turned to Luke in disbelief, “A little fun? How could you joke in a time like this?”

Luke sighed, lazily glancing at the people gathered at the town well in the distance behind himself. There was no true privacy on Jakku.

Teng took a deep breath, “I’m just… scared. It’s been five days since I saw Rey. I keep kicking myself for not going with her that day.”

“I know how you feel,” Luke said gently. “I’m the one who sent her off, and I’ve paid for that mistake dearly.”

“Luke… it’s not a mistake to give Rey a little independence.”

“No, it’s not,” Luke smiled, “and I’d be a fool to try to hold her back. But I know how you feel; I’m so scared right now. I lost her once and it destroyed me. I broke and walked away from everything I loved. She’s the most important thing in my universe… and to just have her go missing. I’m barely holding it together.”

“Come on, Guys,” Quom said. “It’s the Miracle Girl. Rey’s made of tough stuff. She’s just probably being the naïve, idealistic, fool she was genetically predisposed to be. She’ll be back.”

“I just wish I could think of a way to get a hold of her.”

Teng suddenly stiffened.

“At least we know she’s still on Jakku,” Quom said. “We probably would have heard about it if she wasn’t.”

“But what good does that do?” Luke shook his head. “She could be anywhere. Lost in the desert. Dead in a ditch-”

“Standing right next to the town well?” Teng pointed over Luke’s shoulder.

Luke frowned and turned. Sure enough, there was a familiar red speeder parked next to the well, and a perfectly intact Rey was splashing some water on the back of her neck.

“REY!” Luke and Quom shouted together.

She looked up at the noise, a mild expression on her face as the three most important men in her life came racing towards her. Luke reached her first, wrapping his arms around her and holding her tight.

“You’re safe,” Luke literally wept in relief. He buried his face in her greasy brown hair and let his eyes dampen the buns that had started to naturally come undone. “Thank the Force.”

“I’m fine, Dad,” Rey smiled at Teng over Luke’s shoulder. She moved to embrace her boyfriend, but Luke wouldn’t let her go. “Dad? Dad?”

Luke wouldn’t move.

Teng smiled and Rey sighed. She gave in to being caught in her father’s hug. Giving Teng a small smile, she managed to get a hand free and reached out for him. Teng clasped it, bringing up their interlocked fingers to kiss the back of her hand.
“I missed you,” Teng murmured.

“I missed you too,” Rey said. She nodded to Luke, “But I think he beats both of us.”

“Indeed,” Teng chuckled.

Her eyes turned to Quom, “Hey, Uncle Quom.”

“Hey, MG,” he smiled. “You okay?”

“Yeah, I’m fine. But I don’t think I’m ever escaping my father’s hug.”

“Damn right you’re not,” Luke mumbled into her shoulder, still squeezing as tight as he had the day he found her scared and alone all those years ago.

“Oh for goodness sake,” Quom rolled his eyes. “Luke, let her go. You’re going to suffocate the girl.”

Luke sighed and then complied. He shook his head as she immediately launched herself at Teng, and the pair of young adults locked in the kind of kiss that would make even Felicity Rhiaon blush.

“Young love,” Quom chuckled, slinging an arm over Luke’s shoulder.

Luke let the pair have a few minutes, even after they had disengaged from the kiss. He knew that desire to just hold each other for a few minutes after a long parting. It was the kind he wished he could share with Felicity or Aletha or any of the others in his life he had loved and lost.

Honestly, maybe it was time for him to start dating again. Sure, he knew he was never going to fall for someone like he had fallen for Felicity and Aletha, but a fling with a merchant might not be out of the question. He could have sworn Kelan Tolorna was checking him out last week.

“Oh, no, I was fine,” Rey waved off. “I just found a really good haul and decided it was better to stay with it than come home. Sorry, I would have told you, but my comm was dead. You didn’t go to any trouble, right?”

The men stared at her.

“Wait,” Rey frowned. “Why is your neck bandaged?”

Something furious flashed in Luke’s eyes.

“And Teng Malar Tinadar!” Quom turned on the boy.

Teng frowned, very confused, “Uh… My name isn’t Tinadar.”

“It is when I’m mad at you.” Quom looked at Luke, “…Why am I mad at him?”

Rey rolled her eyes, “Why do you do anything?”

Luke shook his head, “Quom, we’re not mad at Teng.”
“Oh. Sorry, Pup. Usually when we’re mad at Rey, you’ve tagged along and we’re mad at you too.”

“Eh,” Teng shrugged. “You’ve given me a lot worse.”

“Wait, why are you mad at me?” Rey asked.

“You’re not actually serious?” Luke said. “Rey, you disappeared for four days without a word simply because you wanted to and not that there was an emergency, and you don’t get why I’m mad?”

“Not really.”

“Rey Rhiaon Erso… you have exactly two minutes to completely explain everything to me or there will be Hell to pay.”

She did it in a minute forty-seven.

And yet, somehow it just made things worse.

“You thought you would… That it was no big deal… Burnt out comm… Four days… My dead mother… Quick meals!” Luke sputtered out some nonsense, looking like even he didn’t know what he was trying to say. Finally he just declared, “Rey Rhiaon Erso, you’re grounded!”

Rey blinked, “What?”

“Can he do that?” Quom whispered to Teng.

“I don’t know,” he answered.

A stern look set on Luke’s face as he crossed his arms and fixed her with a glare, “You are grounded. For an entire month.”

“Dad! No! I can’t!”

“You can and will.”

“But Dad, this ship is too good a haul.” Rey glanced around the market and lowered her voice, “Dad… I could make it functional.”

That made Luke think twice.

“Functional?” he repeated.

“Uh huh,” Rey nodded. “A working ship. Can you even imagine how many portions that would get us? I could do this, Dad.”

Luke looked over to Teng and Quom who looked enthralled by the idea of a working ship.

“That would bring in a huge haul,” Quom admitted.

Luke sighed, “Alright. Let’s go take a look at this… haul.”

I’ve never seen an Imperial command shuttle’s hyperdrive generator, but I know the manual for it by heart. Give me one and I could get the shuttle running in ten minutes – and I could fly it, too. I’ve flown lots of ships, at least by simulator. And one real ship, for a little while – a Ghtroc 690 freighter. But I don’t want to talk about that.

- Rey’s Survival Guide

“So, what do you think?” Rey asked.

Luke and Quom traded a look. They had just completed a thorough inspection as Teng and Rey waited outside the ship and spent some alone time.

“It’ll be a lot of work, but it’s fixable,” Quom declared. “I know some great caches for supplies.”

“Good work, Rey,” Luke smiled. “This will be a wonderful project for us to all work on.”

Rey frowned, “Oh, uh, actually, I kind of wanted to do it by myself.”

“By yourself?” Quom questioned.

“Yeah, tackle a big project, get a sense of pride. I’ll ask for help when I need it but otherwise… can’t I do this alone? Please?”

Quom and Luke exchanged a look.

“It would be a good challenge. Then we can be sure that Rey is well-acquainted with all parts of ships.” Quom shrugged, “I don’t know. I don’t see any harm in letting her do it all by herself.”

“Alright, fine,” Luke smiled. “You can do this repair all by yourself on one condition.”

“What’s that?”

“Since you’ve been missed for four days and I got bitten in the neck because of it, we all work on it together today and make up with quality time.”

“Alright, but only if you explain to me how your neck got bitten in the first place.”

“Deal.”

“Well then,” Rey smiled at the boys. “Let’s get to work.”

There was a cheerful beat of silence as they looked at each other in excitement to get to work.

And then Luke narrowed his eyes and said, “Oh, and you’re still grounded for the next month.”

Rey frowned as Teng and Quom burst out laughing.

“Focus, focus, come on you can do this, Rey,” Luke guided.

Rey held out her hand trying with all her might to use the Force to summon the screwdriver across the walker into her hand.

Rey let out a yell and threw up her hands.

“I can’t do it!” Rey conceded defeat. “I give up. I can’t use the Force to summon objects. I’ll just be the one Jedi who can’t do it.”

“Rey, you and I are the only living Jedi. That doesn’t account for a lot.”

“Dad,” Rey rolled her eyes.

Luke sighed and motioned for her to sit next to him on the cot. With a heavy heart she slumped down next to him and laid her head on his chest. She listened to his soothing heartbeat as he stroked her hair.

“It’s okay if you can’t do it now,” Luke told her. “It took me a while too.”

“But it’s been months,” Rey moaned.

“And it took me almost a year. For me it took the support of someone I loved – my first girlfriend. Actually the first thing I ever moved with the Force was a noodle.”

“Really?”

“Yeah, she called me her Noodle Scooter as a result.”

“…I don’t know what to do with that information, Dad.”

Luke shrugged, “I just thought it would be a charming anecdote. Look, why don’t we just move on from the summoning lessons today and just relax. How’s the ship going?”

It had been five months since she started her project and Luke’s encounter in the cave. Unfortunately Quom’s bite mark had become a subtle scar on Luke’s throat. Not noticeable at first, but when people looked close they would get very confused why there were white toothmarks on his throat.

“Ship’s doing great,” Rey reported. “Teng and I finally got the fresher working.”

Luke raised an eyebrow.

“There’s no water.” Rey blushed, knowing her father’s thoughts. “…Teng and I haven’t showered together. I promise.”

“That’s okay, I trust you.” Luke hesitated, “Uh, Rey, have you and Teng-”

“Not yet,” she said quickly. “Still not ready.”

“Right. Well, if you ever wanted to talk about things-”

“Can we just go back to talking about the Force?”

“Alright. How has your meditation been going? Doing it before bed every night?”

“Yep,” Rey nodded.

She, Luke, Quom, and Teng had been taking turns sleeping on the ship each night to protect it. Or rather Luke, Quom, and Teng with Rey alternated. Teng and Rey liked the privacy, and Rey liked having Teng there for other reasons too.

Rey shuddered as she remembered what she saw the night she slept alone on the ship.

“It was awful,” Rey clung tightly to her father.

“I’m sorry,” he kissed her forehead. “I wish you didn’t have to remember that. But I’m happy that you told me about it. I don’t want you keeping any visions from the Force a secret, okay?”

Rey heard a familiar muting sound and looked up. Staring back at her once more was her cousin.

They said nothing as Kylo and Rey stared at each other. These connections had been on and off for months, but the sound and image of them grew stronger with every connection.

She was pulled back to Jakku in an instant.

“Sorry,” Rey shook her head.

Luke frowned, “Are you okay?”

“Yeah, just spaced out for a second?”

“Thinking about the vision?”

“Something like that.”

“I will, Dad,” Rey smiled widely. “I promise I have and will tell you about every vision I get.”

But Luke knew from the look in her eye that she was lying.

Living on the Resistance Base, things could be quite hectic. Dates were missed, meetings canceled at the last minute, promised visits home often never happened, and honestly hardly anyone kept a calendar for purposes beyond scheduling missions.

So it wasn’t all that odd for Kaydel Ko Connix to wake up, roll over, and be startled by the date on the calendar.

“Woah!” she sat up suddenly, jarring the half-asleep Poe, whose bed she was in.

“What?” Poe groaned, rubbing his eyes as he tried to remember where he had put his pants. As he shifted around, the blankets fell down, exposing his bare, broad chest.

“Nothing,” Kaydel turned a little pink when she noticed a scratch born from her nails across his chest. “It’s just… I totally didn’t realize that today was Anex twelfth.”

He frowned, “Oh, uh, okay. Why? Is there something special about today?”
Kaydel raised an eyebrow.

“Oh shit,” he sat up straight. “It’s our anniversary.”

“Yeah,” she laughed a little. “We’ve been dating for one whole year.”

Poe and Kaydel stared at each other in silence for a moment… then plastered on identical grins.

“Nice!”

“We did it!”

They high fived.

Poe laughed as they settled back down, “Wow, an entire year.”

“It feels like that’s too long to be possible, and yet at the same time, not long enough.”

“Well, we’re in it for the long haul, Babe. One year down, eighty to go.”

“You plan to live to 108?”

“At the very least.”

Kaydel shook her head, “Oh Peacock, I love you so much.”

“Right back at you, Babe.” He glanced at the droid powered down in the corner of the room, “Hey, BB’s still in sleep mode. Want to get a quick one out before he wakes up?”

She laughed, “Dating a year and yet you still want to make love to me like we’ve been only dating for a month.”

“Let’s be real, Kay,” Poe positioned himself over her and started to kiss her neck, “I’m never going to get my fill of you.”

“No, I suppose not.” Kaydel had a twinkle in her eye that Poe knew meant no good. She whispered in his ear, “But I would like to be filled by you.”

Without another word, Poe pulled the covers over their bodies to hide themselves from BB-8 in case he woke up. He pushed up the hem of Kaydel’s nightgown to her waist and pulled off her panties. Poe lavished her with a passionate kiss as he undid his pants and shoved them down to his knees, leaving just enough room to kneel over her.

Knowing they wouldn’t have much time for preamble, Kaydel licked her palm and started to stroke his cock to get him fully erect. At the same time, he reached into his bedside drawer and found a bottle of lubricant. With a grunt, he guided Kaydel’s hand from his cock.

“That’s enough, or it’s going to be over before we start.”

He spread some of the lubrication over her pussy lips and clit, happy to feel a little bit of natural wetness seeping out of her entrance. Getting right to it, Poe fondled her clit for about a minute, making her even wetter. When she was ready, he slathered lube over his pointer and middle finger and slipped the middle one inside of her.

Not quite aroused enough yet, Kaydel gasped when as his invading digital forced its way inside of her. Kissing her lips tenderly and muttering adorations of love in Yavinese, Poe enthusiastically fingered her passage, his thumb playing with her clit. When she was ready, he slid another lubricated finger into her and pumped faster.

When she was ready after that, he pulled his fingers out of her and slid them into her mouth. As Kaydel licked her own juices off his fingers, Poe reached down and positioned his cock. With a grunt and a few Yavinese swears, Poe pushed into her and quickly got to work.

The room was filled with impatient moans and the squeak of a bedframe as Poe thrust eagerly into that woman who so adore. He had meant what he said; he fully planned on spending the last eighty years of his life with this wonderful woman.

Especially if the sex was going to be this good.

They made love rather efficiently, Poe using his hand on her clit to bring her to a quick orgasm and then emptying inside of her almost immediately after.

“Yeah, I’m never giving you up, Babe,” Poe said as he helped her clean up after. “Who cares if we forgot our own anniversary and have no presents? At least we have great sex.”

“Well, actually,” Kaydel grinned, “I got you something.”

Poe gave her an amused smile as she reached across his body to rummage through one of the drawers of his bedside table. He kissed her shoulder as she located it and held it out to him. It was a small disc about the size of her palm.

“What is it?” he asked.

“Take a look,” she slipped it into his hand.

Poe smiled and flicked it on. The room was filled with the blue projection of a star map. There was no route marked, but there were three stars glowing bright red with large labels above them.

MALLAREX
YAVIN
D’QAR

“My home, your home, and the one we made together,” she explained. “That way we can always remember where we came from, how far we traveled, and all of the places we can go… together.”

“Forever,” Poe promised, unable to wipe the grin from his face. He sat up, the blanket falling down to expose his bare chest and he saw her eyes drift over his body with a smug smirk. She knew every inch of that skin belonged to her, just as the heart beating beneath those amazing pectorals belonged to her. “Kay, I don’t know what to say. This is so amazing. So thoughtful… Kinda making me look bad, Babe.”

“Didn’t mean to bruise your ego, My Peacock,” Kaydel chuckled, pushing herself up to kiss him. “But don’t you worry, I’m sure your gift will be just as wonderful as mine.”

Poe froze, “My gift?”

Kaydel scowled, “You were just joking about not getting me an anniversary gift, right? It’s our first anniversary, we’re going to remember this above any other anniversary. I mean, I’m not expecting an engagement ring or my own planet, but… you did get a gift, right?”
“Yeah, no, of course I did, Babe.”

She narrowed her eyes.

“I just can’t give it to you yet,” Poe chuckled, grinning far too widely to be truthful. “But I will give it to you. Promise. Tonight. We’ll do something tonight and I’ll give it to you then.”

From the way those brown eyes pierced him, it was clear Kaydel knew he was full of Bantha crap.

“Fine, tonight,” Kaydel conceded. “I don’t want to sound entitled or bitchy-”

“No offense, Babe, but I don’t think it’s physically possible for you to be a bitch.”

“You clearly haven’t met the women in my family,”

Poe shuddered as he recalled just how damn petty the one member of her family he had met could be. There was a reason Aletha had earned the nickname Doctor Chlor-meri-form. Poe himself had been tricked into sedation by Aletha no less than three times.

“I’ll have something for you, Babe,” Poe said. “I promise. I love you and I want to show you how much I do in the same way I see your love for me through this.”

“I know, but Poe-”

“Come on,” he lifted her chin, “you know you’re my girl. I put you in my tooth for goodness sake.”

Kaydel smiled, “Yeah, I guess you did do that. I just… sometimes I worry that I’m getting myself caught up in some whirlwind romance like Aletha did and that… I don’t know, this is just some fantasy that will fizzle out. I really do love you, Poe, and I worry-”

“Over nothing. Kaydel… I have a picture of you in my tooth. I’ve literally fought against a commanding officer to be with you. I’ve brought you home so many times, you have your own toothbrush there. I don’t mean my military base fresher, I mean the sink of my childhood home has a toothbrush specifically for you. I’m in it to win it, Kay. I promise.”

She sighed and rested her head against his chest, soothed by the beating of his heart, “I know. I’m sorry for being silly-”

“You’re not being silly,” he told her. “You have legitimate fears and I’m going to find a way to quell them. I promise.”

He held her in silence for a very long time. They revelled in the feel of skin against skin, so warm, so comfortable, so natural. It was as if the Force had planned from the very beginning that those two bodies lock together so perfectly.

Poe looked down at Kaydel and smiled. As he held his beloved in his arms, Poe felt pure joy. All was right in the world when Kaydel Ko Connix was in his arms.

And then the panic took over. What the hell was he going to get her for an anniversary gift? He had ten hours and a military base to work with. He was totally screwed.

Well… maybe he should ask General Organa for some ideas about a thoughtful last-minute gift he could pass off as having been purchased weeks ago. Because there’s no way in hell Poe Dameron believed Han Solo had never forgot his anniversary.
The task of repairing the ship was even harder and slower than Rey had imagined. Problems magnified and grew exponentially, and it wasn’t simply with the repairs to her ship. That would have been bad enough, just trying to get everything aboard working again. That would’ve been a full-time job in and of itself.

She still needed to eat. She still needed to survive. She still needed to work, and that meant she had to work twice as hard, because she was effectively trying to gather salvage for two jobs. Sure, she had Luke, Quom, and Teng to help, but she was precious with her project the same way she had been building her speeder. This was her project. Her baby. She was going to do this all by herself.

Well… mostly. Could you really blame the girl for unloading some of the heavy lifting? Sometimes quite literally?

Every piece of salvage she managed to collect was now subjected to critical evaluation: was it for the ship or for Unkar? The best pieces, of course, were worth the most to Unkar and could bring multiple portions. Invariably, those same pieces were the ones Rey needed to repair her ship. The harder it was to replace, the more it was worth; the harder it was to replace, the less likely that Rey would find another.

For that reason, the ship had to come first; it had to be the priority. If it wasn’t, then all that work was for nothing. Two months, then three, then five passed, and now she was up to seven. If it wasn’t for her father, she would almost always be hungry. Days spent crawling through the graveyard, desperately searching for bits and pieces, racking her brain trying to remember where she had seen an oscillation gyro that might still work, an intact plate of duralloy shielding that was big enough to help seal the gash in her freighter’s side, a coercive reciprocating pump for the oxygen scrubbers.

It was exhausting. It was unending. It took its toll, and Rey wasn’t as careful as she might have been.

“What’re you building?” someone asked her at the wash table one day.

Rey looked up from her scrubbing and resisted a groan, “I’m not building anything, Devi.”

Devi ignored her words, “Unkar’s not gonna pay for that. Porto’s crew brought in, like, maybe a hundred band limiters in the last week. You gotta know that.”

Rey shook the component dry and shoved it into her satchel, hoping the conversation was over.

“I have to get back to my Dad’s shop.”

It wasn’t.

Before Rey could get to her feet, Strunk slid onto the stool beside her. Devi took the one opposite. She was pinned… and a little pissed.

“My dad is waiting,” she said, gathering the pieces she’d set out to dry. Her staff was to her left, in easy reach, opposite where Strunk had taken a seat. Rey wondered if she would have to use it.

“You hold pieces back.” Devi said bluntly. “We’ve seen it. Like, you had the junction box for a power inverter on the YT series a couple days ago. That could’ve gotten you a lot. But you didn’t trade it.”

“Doing a lot with circuits and cabling, too,” Strunk said. “Like you’re wiring something up, you know?”
Rey stared at him, “Do you two actually think I’m going to tell you anything after the stunt you pulled with the Fighting Ring?”

Strunk shrugged and smiled apologetically.

“We don’t mean to pry, Rey,” Devi said.

“Then don’t!” Rey snapped. She could feel that simmering inside, the Darkness her father warned her about. She took a deep breath to control herself.

“We’re just curious, is all,” Devi continued. “You’ve not been around as much as you used to, and it’s just…you know, it’s just strange. Like, why would you not trade that stuff, you know?”

“I’m not that hungry,” Rey said. “I do have a rich father to take care of me after all.”

Devi looked surprised. Rey never played the money card, and often was embarrassed to bring it up to other scavengers. Somehow her father’s security of food made her a lesser scavenger in the eyes of the others.

Then Devi laughed, “Sure, okay. I get it. We all mind our own business. I get it.”

“Yes,” Rey said shortly. “That’s what we do.”

Strunk nodded.

Rey stuffed the remaining components into her satchel, grabbed her staff, and got to her feet. She spotted Teng walking across the market towards her and smiled.

“Nice talking to you,” Rey lied. “Now if you’ll excuse me, I have a man waiting.”

“Of course,” Devi nodded, but there was something in the corner of her eye that Rey didn’t like.

“Hey, Starshine,” Teng smiled as she came up to him. He nodded towards Devi and Strunk, “Everything okay?”

“Yeah, but can we get going?” she adjusted the staff slung across her shoulder. “I’m getting dangerously close to the Dark Side.”

“Let’s get you home and wrapped in something comfortable. Like me,” Teng grinned.

She swatted at his chest and he slung an arm around her waist. They had taken a few steps when they heard Devi call out.

“Hey, Rey!”

Rey turned back to see Devi had left the wash tables to follow her. There was that look in her eyes that Rey so hated.

“Thing is,” Devi said in a low voice, looking around, “we’ve noticed. So maybe somebody else has, like, noticed, too. Know what I mean?”

Devi tilted her head ever so slightly in the direction of Unkar’s window.

Rey couldn’t see him there, but that didn’t mean he wasn’t watching. She looked back at Devi.

“I’ll keep it in mind,” Rey said shortly.
Devi smiled, “We girls gotta look out for each other, right?”

Memories of the disaster that occurred the last time Devi said those words flitted through Rey’s mind.

“Right,” Rey narrowed her eyes.

Devi gave Teng a playful punch in the arm, “See you around, Malar.”

“See you,” he frowned as they watched Devi leave. “What was that all about?”

“I don’t know,” Rey said. “But I got a bad feeling about this.”

Poe Dameron was not nervous.

It had taken some planning (read: begging, pleading, and bargaining) but he had put together what he hoped would be a romantic date with Kaydel.

BB-8 was keeping an eye on his set up. Poe didn’t really know what sort of creatures were in the woods around the base, but he’d rather be safe than sorry, especially as he wanted to make it a surprise. He supposed he could have asked Paige and Evan about the dangers of the forest considering how often they would get lost in it, but Paige might tip off Kaydel, and he wasn’t very close with Evan.

Considering how close Paige and Kaydel were, it might be a good idea to remedy that.

Ivee had been given the responsibility of keeping Kaydel distracted until Poe was ready. Kaydel naturally wanted to spend as much time as possible with her boyfriend on their first anniversary, but Poe needed prep time and enlisted BB-8’s help, who had turned to his own girlfriend to do the job.

Poe still couldn’t believe his droid had a girlfriend. What did droids even do romantically? What programming sequence was the result of that? Was it an off-shoot of the programming that helped droids establish relationships and calculated actions and consequences to determine how to treat people. It was the same sort of program that made BB-8 like Poe and hate Ben Solo.

Admittedly BB-8 had a little bit of a better relationship with Ben. It was the result of a loyalty program the droid had to the people who would assemble him, and BB-8 had been assembled by Poe, Ben, and Rey… if sitting Rey in a corner, giving her screwdriver, and asking her to hand them things counted as her assembling BB-8. To be completely honest, it was very clear that Luke’s idea of setting the trio in the living room, wishing them luck, and going off to do chores with Felicity, was really just having Poe and Ben babysit Rey while they snuck upstairs for a quickie.

Poe shook his head at the memory of that summer. Felicity Rhiaon’s house design was truly beautiful… but the walls to her and Luke’s room were way too thin. Poe remembered the few weeks in Ben’s room, which was the one directly next to theirs. Poor Ben had no buffer for when Luke and Felicity got, uh, affectionate. No wonder he hated Felicity. Poe could have happily lived his life not knowing what Luke Skywalker sounded like when he had sex.

Maybe that’s why people always made fun of him and Kaydel. They were as bad as the Skywalkers.

It was nearly sunset when BB-8 sent Ivee the okay to disengage from Kaydel.

Alright, Poe thought to himself, taking a deep breath, here goes nothing.
“Hey,” he said, coming up behind Kaydel at her work station.

She knew something was up when Diego Nalto didn’t intercede.

“Hey,” she smiled, slipping off her headset. “How are you?”

“Good.” He wiped his palms on his pants. Come on, Dameron, where was that fearlessness when he needed it? He had dealt with higher stakes situations than this. Why did Kaydel Ko Connix always knock him right down? “Want to go for a walk?”

She narrowed her eyes, glancing towards Diego in the corner. He was talking to General Organa, both of them smiling and shooting glances towards Kaydel and Poe. Oh, yeah, there was something up.

“I just need to turn in this last report to Brance and I’ll be done,” she said, tapping away at her keyboard. She hit a final button and smiled, “Shall we?”

Poe offered his arm, “We shall.”

A few minutes later, the two of them were walking along a path in the woods surrounding the D’Qar base.

“Why a walk tonight?” Kaydel asked as they ambled along a river.

“You mean other than it being our anniversary? I just thought that since we both had the night free, we could, uh—” Poe stumbled over his words. “Well, we really haven’t been able to spend that much time together since the purple-haired bitch came back. Can Holdo just keep away from the base forever?”

“That would require the universe not hating us, Poe.”

“Well, at least I like you,” he bent down and gave her a quick kiss.

“I like you too, Peacock,” Kaydel chuckled. She sighed and leaned her head against his arm. “So, why are you so nervous?”

Kaydel was pretty sure that for all he was trying to play it casual, Poe had a fixed destination in mind.

“I thought some time away would give us time to…” he drifted off. “Y’know,”

“I’m not having sex in the woods.” Kaydel said flatly. “Not even if you do that thing I like.”

“Don’t you kink shame me.”

Poe smiled as he spotted BB-8. Yep, everything was set. He discretely tried to motion BB-8 away. In typical fashion, BB-8 treated this as irreverently as he did all of Poe’s romantic encounters: he blipped twice in recognition before speeding by, forcibly separating the pair who had been holding hands.

Blip. Beep. Bwhop.

“BB-8, shoo” Poe tried to get the droid to continue back to base. “Please.”
BB-8 flicked out his welding torch in a brief gesture that was decidedly ambiguous at the moment before wishing Friend-Poe the best of luck and speeding off. No doubt he was off to spend his own romantic evening with Ivey doing… whatever droids considered romantic.

“What was that about?” Kaydel asked looking back at the slowly disappearing droid in confusion.

“I set up a dinner for the two of us and BB was keeping watch.” Poe confessed. “I wanted it to be a surprise.”

“It is a very, very good surprise,” Kaydel looped her arms around his neck, drawing him into another kiss. He was only too happy to oblige.

She melted into the kiss, carding her fingers through his hair. After a moment they pulled apart, though they wished it could have gone on longer.

“We might want to eat before it gets cold,” Poe said, guiding her to where he had set up a picnic blanket for the two of them.

The view they had was of the stream that ran near the base. A pair of beavers were building a dam nearby and for a while, they ate in silence. “How long have you been planning this?” she asked as the sun started to set.

“Couple of weeks,” Poe lit the candles so they would still have some light. “Wasn’t until Jedek brought his last run in that I could actually pull it together.” He leaned back on his elbows. “I think it turned out well.”

“I think it did,” Kaydel set aside her plate and straddled him. Her lips found his with such ease one would think she had been born to kiss Poe Dameron’s lips.

The beavers paused in their dam building and exchanged glances before hurrying off. The two humans clearly wanted privacy even in the open.

When they came up for air, Poe found himself lying down fully.

“This is a dangerous position to put me in, Lieutenant Connix.”

“I’m well aware of what I’m doing, Commander Dameron. And after all, isn’t that why you brought me out here in the first place?”

“Actually, I wanted to ask you a question,” he nuzzled the hollow behind her ear with his nose.

“What?” Kaydel sighed in pleasure as his nose dragged along her skin. Poe loved the way her eyes drifted closed.

It took all of Poe’s willpower to focus with her breath hot on his ear. He knew exactly what he wanted, not just in the moment, but for the rest of his life.

Leia Organa’s words from earlier that day rang in his mind, “If you want to wake up every morning next to that girl… then do it.”

It was now or never.

He whispered into her ear, “Move in with me?”
Kaydel froze and Poe wondered if he’d pushed too far too soon. She sat back on her heels and Poe let out a groan.

“Are you serious?” she looked absolutely stunned.

Unable to speak, Poe nodded.

“You’re completely serious,” Kaydel said.

“I am,” Poe finally found his voice.

Kaydel hesitated and Poe felt his heart speed up. He’d pushed too far—oh Force, he’d mucked this—

“Of course, I’ll move in with you.”

He let out a breath as a wide smile tore across his face. Poe didn’t remember the last time he had such a huge smile.

“Really?” Poe laughed.

“Really really,” Kaydel joined him. “The peacock had successfully courted his chosen mate. The peahen submits eagerly.”

She brought her lips to his and they shared a long kiss.

“Good,” Poe reached for the pins keeping her hair in place. “That means I’ll get to see this every night.”

He rolled them over so he was on top. His legs pinned hers apart as she panted and gripped his shoulders, eagerness in her eyes. He was erect already, and ground the hard tent in his pants against her damping apex. Kaydel threw her head back and groaned. It would be a lie to say she didn’t want to feel him fill her with his hot cum after being denied that morning. Poe kissed his way down her neck to nibble at her collarbone.

His eyes sparked playfully, “Now, will the Peahen submit to the male for a breeding attempt?”

Kaydel slapped his chest playfully, “Shut up and kiss me, Peacock.”

And it turned out Kaydel Ko Connix would make love in the woods.

It was ten days before Devi and Strunk found her. Rey knew it was coming, but still her heart fell when she heard Devi calling out her name.

“Rey! Hey, Rey, you in there?”

Rey sighed and looked to her father who had been helping her wield a component.

“It’s okay,” Luke put a hand on her shoulder. “We’ll be fine. Come on, guys. Let’s deal with this.”

Teng nudged Quom with his foot. The Vrogem was knelt down fixing some wiring as Teng worked the control panel for tests of whether or not Quom had succeeded.

The group exited the ship via the newly repaired boarding ramp.
Devi and Strunk were both standing outside. Devi was grinning and Strunk’s mouth was open, as if he couldn’t believe what he was seeing.

“What?” Rey snapped, gripping her staff tightly. Behind her the boys all had crossed arms and intimidating looks. “What do you want, Devi?”

“This is amazing!” Strunk shouted, as if snapping out of a trance. He wasn’t at all perturbed by Rey’s wall of muscle. “R’iia’s shorts, Rey! This is amazing!”

Teng frowned and whispered to Quom, “R’iia’s shorts? Isn’t R’iia a female Teedo?”

“You stay in the sun too long, you come up with insane expressions,” Quom muttered back.

“It’s just a ship,” Rey said coolly.

Devi laughed. “Just a ship? You’re crazy! Look at this thing! How’d you find it?”

Rey held her staff in both hands, leaning on it, but it would be easy enough to move it into a swing if necessary. She could also see Teng, Quom, and Luke’s hands resting on their blasters, and Luke reaching back to the lightsaber clipped on his belt.

Deciding which of the two would be the better first mark, Rey looked first at Strunk, then at Devi.

“I figured it had to be something,” Devi said. “I knew you were working on something big, but, like, no way I ever imagined it was something like this. I thought maybe one of the ground vehicles or a repulsortank or something like that. Never imagined this! Rey, you’ve got a ship, girl! You’ve found yourself a ship!”

Devi. Devi would be the first one to get it if things turned sour.

“It needs a lot of work.” Rey said.

“Yeah, I’ll bet.” Devi stepped forward, craning her head back to look at the exposed underbelly. “Looks like one of the repulsors is totaled. And the landing gear.”

“There’s a Ghtroc 720,” Strunk said. He spoke slowly. “You know the one? Out by Feressee’s Point? The one that split when it came down? It’s all upside down and in pieces, but it’s still got its gear. This is a Ghtroc, right?”

“Two of us could move it,” Devi said, excited. “Be about a day’s work, maybe two, get it cut free and haul it back over here.”

They were both looking at her. And so were the men.

“It’s my ship,” Rey said after a long pause.

The men looked back to Devi and Strunk, Rey’s decision made for them.

“We can help you,” Devi said.

“She’s got lots of help already,” Quom snarked.
“C’mon. Strunk’s big and strong and stupid, so he’s fearless, like, and I’m small and smart and can get into the tiny crawl spaces,” Devi said.

“I’ve got Quom for strong, Dad for smart, Teng for fearless, and myself so small,” Rey shot back.

“And what about the days they need to go off and do their own work?” Devi asked. “I’ve seen it. They’re not helping you full time. We can help you fix this thing up full time, Rey.”

“You take us with you,” Devi said.

Rey blinked. The sentence didn’t make sense to her, not at all.

“Where?” she asked.

“Wherever it is you’re going.”

Rey looked to Luke, “I’m going to Niima. I’m going to sell it to Unkar.”

“No, serious,” Devi laughed. “Where are you guys going?”

Everyone was silent.

“We’re going to Niima,” Teng repeated. “We’re selling to Plank.”

Strunk opened his mouth to speak, but Devi moved her hand in a way that Rey understood was meant to shut him up. Strunk closed his mouth and shrugged.

She got that calculating look in her eye again; the same one she got after learning Rey would be trained for the Fighting Pit by Dirk.

“Unkar’ll pay a lot for it, especially if it’s spaceworthy.” Devi nodded, agreeing with herself. “Yeah, figure, what? Six, maybe seven thousand portions? He’d go higher if it’ll do hyperspace.”

“The converter chamber fractured,” Rey said. “If I can find a replacement and fit it, it can do hyperspace. It needs fuel.”

“Sure, yeah, perfect!” Devi was enthusiastic. “We help you fix it up, we do shares of the sale, split whatever Unkar’s willing to pay. That’s what I’m thinking. That’s fair, right? Each of us gets, like, a third?”

The men looked at Rey again.

“It’s my ship,” she repeated.

“Besides, there’s six of us,” Quom pointed out.

“Right, that’s fair, too, your ship, you found it, and there’s more of you. So you get two thirds, and Strunk and I split the rest. That’s gonna be five thousand shares for you, at least. Unkar’ll fall all over himself for this, you know he will.”

Rey didn’t say anything, thinking. The split didn’t seem fair to her somehow, but she wasn’t entirely certain what fair was considering her life.

Devi looked up at the hull again, as if admiring the ship, “In fact, he’d probably fall all over himself
Strunk had his hands in his pockets and was looking down, but he glanced at Devi for a moment before returning his eyes to his boots. Devi was turning slowly in place, still taking in the lines of the hull.

It wasn’t an overt threat, Rey knew. The way Devi had said it, maybe it hadn’t been meant as a threat at all but rather an observation, a statement of fact about Unkar’s greed and the worth of Rey’s little light freighter.

The problem was, of course, this was Devi.

Of course it was a threat.

Rey looked to her father for help, but he could only offer her a sad sigh. No way to be certain that they wouldn’t go to Unkar and tell him about the ship and claim the finder’s fee on it, if nothing else. The more Rey thought about that, the more she realized she couldn’t trust them not to do it. If she couldn’t trust them to keep it secret, how could she trust them to help her repair it?

But there didn’t seem any other option.

“What do you say?” Devi asked. She was looking at Rey again. “Partners?”

Rey looked at her hands, where they met on her staff. Her fingers were filthy, her nails cracked and grease stained. She needed to ask her dad for another manicure.

She felt his comforting hand on her shoulder and she considered her options. Rey didn’t like any of them.

Rey sighed and sadly admitted defeat, “Let me show you around.”

The sorrow in Rey’s eyes just broke Luke’s heart.

Our mother, Thanya, always told us that fears get smaller if you share them with people who care about you.

- The Journal of Paige Tico

“I can’t believe those two!” Paige exclaimed, slamming down onto the extra chair at Evan’s work station.

“I know!” Evan agreed, not looking up as he highlighted a passage on his datapad. “…Who are we mad at?”

“Poe and Kaydel. Kaydel especially.”

“Ok.”

Paige raised an eyebrow, “Aren’t you curious why we’re mad at them?”
“Mildly,” Evan shrugged. “But you’re my girlfriend so if you’re mad at someone, I’m mad at them too.”

She laughed and shook her head. Evan smiled; he so loved her laugh.

He reached out and clasped her hand, “So, why are we mad at them?”

“They’re moving in together!”

“Those dastardly fiends.”

Paige rolled her eyes but had a smile on her face, “Kay agreed to it without even talking to me.”

“So? They basically live together already.”

“I know, it’s just I’m her current roommate, so she didn’t even think about what this means for me. I’ll be given a new roommate. Who knows what strange person will end up in the bed next to mine? Not to mention our room is the one we use for our Kira’s Council.”

“I’m sure Jessika wouldn’t mind offering up her room.” Evan took down a note, “Hey, doesn’t Rose have an extra bed in her room?”

“No, she’s in a one bunk room right now. I think I’m going to ask General Organa if we could be reassigned together.”

“Or, you know, you could always move in with me,” he suggested casually.

Paige blinked.

Evan noticed the silence and looked up, “What?”

“Are you serious?”

“Bout what?”

“Moving in with you?”

“Sure,” Evan shrugged. “I get a nice room as med team anyway. Makes the late night visits easier. I don’t know if I can stand getting any more splinters from the sniping platforms when we get lost in the woods overnight.”

Paige smiled and squeezed his hand, “You really want to move in together?”

Evan set his datapad aside and took both of her hands in his, “Absolutely.”

Her heart fluttered. With Evan she felt a peace within her that only Rose had managed to bring ever since their parents had sent them away to give them a chance to live. He had brought her that peace ever since they met at the Battle of Valra when Evan had decided to stay at her side, watching over her for Aletha when Dr Kymeri had gotten too busy with dealing with Diego and the passing of Wedge Antilles. Those three weeks of recovery with gentle, kind, simple natured Evan as her nurse had sparked something that even Rose hadn’t been able to unearth. It was difficult to go through every day knowing her parents were dead, but also knowing she would never get official confirmation. Evan at her side made those days a little bit easier.

“Alright,” Paige felt her gold pendant sitting against her chest. She mentally thanked the medallion for her luck in finding Evan, “I’ll move in with you, Hotshot.”
“I can’t wait, Em Yêu.”

“Me neither.”

Evan scratched his neck, “No, seriously. I can’t wait. You wanna file the paperwork now?”

“Can we do that?”

“I can get the request forms on Grandma’s computer,” Evan pointed to Aletha’s desk. He grabbed her hand and stood, “Don’t worry, I have user access on the terminal.”

Paige allowed him to lead her over to the computer. She watched him as he fired it up, navigated the system, and found the right form.

“Give me a second,” Evan punched in a code that automatically input all of his required information on file into the form. “Just need you to add your own information and we can send it right off.”

“Alright, I’ll do that right-’” Paige stopped typing. “Hey Ev? I think you hit the wrong code.”

“What?”

“The form has the wrong name filled in.”

Evan squinted at the screen to the top of the form.

‘Resistance Soldier Geno Namit, ID Number 53554, member of the Medical Department requests to be his/her roommate, Paige Tico, ID Number 47640, member of the Bomber Command.’

“You must have punched in your code wrong,” Paige said. “Though that’s weird, I’ve never heard you, Kalonia, or Aletha mention a Geno Namit before.”

Silence.

Paige narrowed her eyes, “Evan?”

“Oh, uh,” Evan pulled at his collar, “that’s not an error. I don’t think I’ve ever told you this, but uh, Evan Tharel isn’t my real name. It’s Geno Namit. I just go by Evan.”

She stared at him, “I’m sorry, what?”

“My birth name is Geno Namit,” he repeated.

“Evan, we’ve been dating almost a year now and you’ve had a secret name this whole time?”

“It wasn’t a secret. It just never came up.”

“I feel like this is the kind of thing you don’t wait for a relevant conversation to mention,” Paige said.
“I’m sorry, but why do you have a secret name?”

Evan sighed, “It’s uh… because of med school.”
“Med school?”

“When I was studying to become a nurse, I was met with a lot of sexism and mockery from the males in the doctor program. Apparently droid midwives are okay, but male nurses are something to be mocked.”

“People are stupid.”

“Kind of how we ended up fighting in a Resistance, Em Yêu. Actually it was that type of mockery that made me think I had to prove myself as a manly Hotshot when I first joined up and led to my embarrassing sniper lesson display.”

“Hey, don’t knock that embarrassment,” Paige said. “I ended up getting a boyfriend out of it.”

Evan laughed.

“So how did this lead to a new name?” she asked.

“Well, I was met with the brunt of the mockery from a guy named Dalen, and the name Geno is actually a negative slang word for homosexual on his homeworld, so that didn’t help matters. Nor did Namit rhyming with Gambit. They ended up calling me the Gay Nurse Gambit... So I said, screw this, I’m changing my name. It’s not a legal name change, but I’ve gone by Evan Tharel ever since. General Organa is well aware of the situation. We’ve actually bonded over it a little as Evan and Tharel are Alderiaan names. Together they mean Gracious Bird.”

She stared at him.

“No, there’s no real reason I picked that name,” Evan admitted.

Laughing, Paige bent forward and pressed a kiss to his cheek, “Alright, Geno Namit. I’ll move in with you as long as you promise me two things.”

“What’s that?”

“No kicking Rose out of the room or restricting her access unless it’s for a good reason.”

“Is sex a good reason?”

“It’s a very good reason,” Paige winked, her smile joyous. “And the other thing: no more big secrets like names.”

“Alright, but in that case you need to know that my mom is alive, paralysed below the waist, and I’m terrified of introducing you two because she raised me to believe no sex before marriage, and I don’t know how long I can keep our sex life a secret from her. It’s not that she would disown me or anything; I just really don’t want to see that disappointed look on her face. She is aware of you though, and Aletha’s met her. Jokingly calls her Mom because of my Grandma nickname for her. Oh, and also I’ve been hiding a secret pet bird in my room for three months because General Organa refuses to approve pets on base, so I took matters into my own hands.”

Paige blinked.

“His name is George,” Evan added as if it would help anything.

“That was a lot of information in a very short time.”

“I know, but hey, other than that we’re secret free.”
“Well, that’s… good.”

“So,” Evan drew out the word. “We have a deal?”

She smiled, “Geno Namit, I’m moving in with you.”

“Glad to hear it,” Evan shook her hand, the two sealing their agreement in a very businesslike manner. “But please, call me Evan. I prefer it to Geno.”

“Alright.” Paige suddenly frowned, “Wait, isn’t Evan usually with two Aureks… and a woman’s name?”

“Yeah, I didn’t think that one through.”

Later that night at Kira’s Council, Paige’s news was met with a joyous reaction.

Except from Rose.

“Oh Gods,” she buried her face in a pillow. “I’m going to die alone.”

Aletha laughed and rubbed Rose’s shoulder. Out of the corner of her eye she watched Kaydel and Paige chat happily about their plans for domesticity with their boyfriends.

She couldn’t help but smile. Leia’s plan to suggest to Poe that Kaydel officially move in with him so that Paige would move in with Rose or Evan, thus freeing up an extra room for the next batch of incoming recruits had gone perfectly.

After all, sometimes you needed to be sneaky to get more resources.

They’re little, but don’t mess with them. Their spears are ionized and can knock you unconscious or even kill you. They’ll fight to defend their territory, or over something they think is theirs, or just for some strange Teedo reason.

Still, I’ve never had a serious problem with the Teedos.

- Rey’s Survival Guide

She couldn’t sleep.

Within the walls of the walker, Rey lay in her hammock and stared up at the ceiling, listening to the soft moan of the wind as it caught in the cracks of the hull. Her dad was away with Quom at one of the Sacred Villages overnight doing business. Rey was instructed to hold down the fort and protect the walker. Teng was sleeping on Luke’s cot as Rey refused to sleep alone after her horrifying vision of Obik Kenu’s death.

Plus it made illicit trysts a lot easier if he was only sleeping a few feet away. They had done some things on her father’s cot that night that Rey was certain Luke would absolutely not approve of.
The thought brought a classic Rhiaon smirk to her face.

She’d shut off her power for the night, and it was very dark. She was tired, but she couldn’t keep her mind from racing. Questions and thoughts, memories long buried and fresh. When she had first reached into the Force it felt like something new had come alive in her. It had been extraordinary.

…Except for the part where her mind started randomly connecting to her murderer cousin who seemed to be convinced she was a ghost haunting him. Well, if that’s what the mother murdering traitorous son of a bitch wanted to think, then a ghost she would be.

“Sorry for calling you a bitch, Alyla,” Rey whispered.

Teng was too soundly asleep to notice.

But it wasn’t her idiot, awful, life destroying cousin she worried about. No, it was the ship, and her whole forced partnership with Devi and Strunk. It wouldn’t take much more to finish the job, to return the Ghtroc to something of its former glory. She could see the end in sight.

_Maybe that’s the trouble, _she thought._ Maybe I know exactly what’s about to happen._

Rey rolled from side to side on her hammock, struggling to get comfortable, trying to push away thoughts that refused to leave. She didn’t trust Devi or Strunk, either of them alone and certainly not together. She hadn’t before the Fighting Ring, and she certainly didn’t after.

Yet each time she had that thought, she remembered everything they had done, all the times they’d kept their word. They had delivered on every promise. They had followed her instructions. They had, without question, helped bring the freighter back to life.

But then her mind would race back to the business with the Fighting Ring. She would remember Devi’s conniving when things hadn’t gone in her favor.

And selling the ship rather than using it to get off Jakku wasn’t in her favor.

Rey _should_ trust them. She _wanted_ to trust them.

But she couldn’t. They would betray her. Try to trick her. Try to steal the prize, cut her out of the sale. As much as she wanted to believe otherwise, she was certain that Devi and Strunk would turn on her, and soon.

The ship was alone, unprotected, out in the desert.

It was the dead of night and bitterly cold.

Oh, screw it.

“Teng, wake up!” Rey sat up and reached for her boots in the dark.

“What?” Teng blurrily awoke. He frowned as he watched Rey pull on her boots, then found her goggles and her staff. “What’s going on?”

“Get up,” she took one of the blankets and switched on a light long enough to find a knife. “We’re going to the ship.”

Teng cringed at the brightness, “Why?”

She cut a slit in the blanket’s center, then pulled it over her head, wearing it as a poncho, “Because I
“I’m not afraid of violence,” Rey said as she and Teng settled for sleep in the bunk of the Ghtroc. It was just big enough for both of them. “I don’t enjoy it, but I’m not afraid of it.”

“Of course you aren’t,” Teng undid her hair ties. He greatly disliked the way her buns dug into him when they laid together, so they had a rule that during cuddle time, Rey’s hair had to be down. “Violence is a necessary part of surviving on Jakku. You’ve kicked ass from Carbon Ridge to Kelvin Ravine.”

“I’ve been in more fights than I can remember.” Rey grinned smugly, “More wins than losses, thankfully.”

“That’s my girl,” Teng chuckled. “Good enough that the word has spread in Niima to stay clear of her and what she could do with her staff. Oh and the things you do with your staff, I must say they do things to me, Rey.”

“Trust me, I know,” Rey smiled. It didn’t linger for long, “But this is serious, Teng. I’ll fight the two of them if necessary.”

“The only question is which one is the bigger threat? Strunk is quite a wall of muscle.”

“Devi,” Rey decided. “She’s the dangerous one. Strunk is strong, but he’s slow and follows Devi’s lead. Devi’s quick – both physically and mentally.”

“And have you seen the vibro-knife she carries on her belt?”

“Not to mention she wears a cut-down shock stick strapped to her left leg, beneath her pants.”

“How do you know that?”

“Don’t ask.”

“No, seriously tell me,” Teng said. “My ideas are turning me on.”

She smacked his chest, “Good thing Jessika Pava isn’t here to hear that. Fetishizing lesbians. Really, Teng?”

“Look, I’m sorry if sometimes I say things like that or make jokes about Dirk’s mental state. I’m really trying to be better, but I grew up with pirates, a cult, and then was a slave. Political correctness was not the environment I grew up in.”

Rey just shook her head, “Look, if it comes to a fight, I’ll go for Devi first. Then we deal with Strunk together.”

“Alright, but I’m not looking forward to it.”

“Me neither.”

Rey tossed and turned roughly, trying to get comfortable.

“Hey, whoa, settle down,” Teng said. “Remember you’re lying on me. Elbows are sharp and should not be placed into several spots on my body.”
“I’m sorry, I just feel so foolish,” Rey said. “I was so certain that we would arrive here to find the ship already gone or, if we were lucky, Devi and Strunk in the process of trying to steal it.”

“How is that lucky? Plus, this ship can’t fly yet.”

“Teng please. I rode through the Graveyard and across the Crackle and risked gnaw-jaws and frostbite and crashing all because I can’t bring myself to trust them. What is wrong with me that damaged me so emotionally that I can’t trust them?”

“Well, I suspect it has to do with the cousin trying to murder you, the Jarex child abuse situation, and the fact that Devi has betrayed us before.”

Rey sighed, “I just wonder if the situation had been reversed, if Devi and Strunk had been the ones to discover the ship and I had stumbled on it later, would they have felt the same? Would I have done to them what I’m certain they plan to do to me?”

“Absolutely not,” Teng said.

“How can you be so sure?”

“Because I know you. You’re loving and caring and honest. You would never do something like that to them… besides, your dad would never let it happen.”

Rey chuckled, “I suppose not. I just don’t know why my mind is doing all of this.”

“You’re tired,” Teng kissed her forehead. “Lay back and get some sleep. Nothing’s going to happen. I promise.”

“How can you say that?” Rey tried to grin, but it turned into a yawn. “I thought I was the Jed… aye. Sorry didn’t mean to yawn. Jedi.”

Teng smiled, “I know because I will never let anything happen to you.”

“Promise?”

“Promise.”

Rey didn’t know when she fell asleep, but she knew she was safe in Teng Malar’s arms.

Rey started awake, one hand automatically reaching for her staff only to hit the sleeping Teng in the face.

“I’m up! I’m up!” he sat up.

“Sorry,” she whispered. “I didn’t mean-”

“It’s okay,” Teng yawned. “What’s going on?”

“I sensed something. Something nearby.”

“Oh goodie, and Luke is nowhere to be found. Good thing I have my blaster.” Teng’s eyes cast about the ship. “Well… good thing you have your staff because I forgot my blaster at home.”
“Really, Teng?”

“Hey, I thought you were the muscle in this relationship… Oh no, wait, I left my blaster in the cockpit. Sorry.”

Rey just shook her head. She wasn’t entirely certain she hadn’t been dreaming when she sensed it. She tumbled out of the bunk, grabbed her staff, and she and Teng crept to the cockpit.

“Get down,” Rey whispered, setting down her staff. She got on her hands and knees, using the flight console to conceal herself. “We’ll be safer this way.”

Teng frowned, but she summarily pulled him to the ground with a yelp.

“Alright, I get it,” Teng grumbled, “listen to your girlfriend Jedi.”

“Damn right,” Rey sounded exactly like her mother in that moment.

They peered up through the cockpit glass at the horizon. It had taken two months to secure the materials needed to repair the glass. Rey had to admit it was Devi and Strunk who ultimately turned that into a success.

Something moved in the corner of her eye.

“Did you see that?” Rey whispered.

“See what?” Teng asked.

The shadows moved again. Two figures were descending the dune toward the ship.

“Oh, I see them,” Teng said. “How many are there?”

“I can’t quite make them out,” Rey squinted through the glass. “Wait, look. Two more shapes cresting the dune, leading luggabeasts.”

Teng muttered a few Nubian swears and said, “It’s Teedos.”

Four Teedos coming toward them. As they drew closer, they could start to make out details. All the Teedos were armed, most of them with staves but one had a rifle. Rey couldn’t see their markings in the darkness, but she didn’t need to. They had come either to take the ship or to destroy it. It didn’t matter.

Either way, Rey and Teng wouldn’t let them. The Ghtroc was armed with a fore-mounted dual laser cannon, but the gun was nonoperative. Rey had restored the wiring and firing controls as best she could, but the Tibanna gas required to charge the weapons had long before leaked into the atmosphere and was impossible to replenish. Never mind that using the cannon was an absolute last resort solution, and willing though she was to defend her prize, Rey didn’t want to kill anyone if she could avoid it.

“Come on,” Rey nudged Teng. “We gotta get outside.”

“Give me a second,” Teng slowly rose to his feet to grab his blaster from the dash where he had left it earlier that day. He dropped back down to the floor and clumsily set it.

“Teng?”

“Yeah?”
“Have you ever killed anyone?”

“…Once. When I was with the pirates.”

“Is it…” Rey hesitated. “Is it hard?”

“To kill? Not really… It’s harder to live with, especially when you kill with a blaster. The simple pull of a trigger is all it takes to end someone’s entire life. It’s not an action to take lightly… but if it means the difference between your life ending and theirs, it’s an action you have to commit. Put the morals aside and just do whatever it takes to survive.”

Rey nodded and clasped his hand, “Thank you.”

“It’s nothing.”

But it wasn’t nothing, those words would carry with her for the rest of her life. And those words would be the thing that pushed her to fight three years later on Takodana when she took her first life.

They crawled quickly back to the cockpit hallway before getting to their feet. Stumbling through the darkness to the loading ramp, Rey hit the release, and followed it down as it descended. She and Teng jumped out before it had touched the ground, weapons at the ready. They ran to the front of the freighter. Rey had both hands on her staff and Teng’s blaster was ready to fire.

They skidded to a stop, facing the Teedos.

The Teedos paused their advance, the nearest of them—the one with the rifle—six, maybe seven meters away. For a long moment nobody moved and nobody spoke. One of the luggabeasts huffed, pawing at the sand, its gears grinding.

“This is mine,” Rey said. “It’s my ship, do you understand? You can’t have it.”

The Teedos didn’t respond.

“Did you hear her?” Teng yelled. “This is ours. Not yours.”

Rey couldn’t tell what kind of Teedos they were dealing with, scavengers or worse. Her stomach was tight, an ache in the pit of her gut, and she could feel her heart beating in her breast.

But then she sensed Teng’s fear in the Force and felt courage. She loved Teng and would do anything to protect him.

“Leave,” Rey said firmly to the Teedos. “Go away.”

The Teedo nearest her, rifle still lowered, turned his wrapped head to look back at the others. Their bodies were always hidden — everything, including their eyes — so even if the light had been better, Rey wouldn’t have been able to read anything in their expressions. The body language was clear enough, though.

The Teedo in the lead looked back at her. They had no intention of leaving.

“We don’t want to fight,” Teng told them,

Rey cut in, “We don’t want to fight, but we will. I will.”

Teng glanced at her nervously. He hoped she couldn’t see the way his hand holding the blaster was shaking. Just because he had taken a life before didn’t mean he wanted to.
The Teedo with the rifle brought the weapon up to his shoulder. It was pointing at Teng. Clearly the Teedos could see he was the weaker of the two – emotionally in the situation as well as physically.

Rey’s mind raced a mile a minute. She had to save Teng. How could she save Teng? Her own safety didn’t matter, but Teng… She wouldn’t let anything happen to him.

Ok, focus, think, calculate. How far was the Teedo from Teng?

Six meters.

Six meters was a close-range shot but too far for Rey to cover the distance before he could make it. She figured she had to try, anyway. Try for Teng. If she got lucky, if she led with her staff, maybe she would hit the end of the weapon before he fired, maybe she could knock it away, force him to miss. Rey doubted she would be so lucky, but she didn’t see any other choice.

She never got the chance to find out.

A blaster bolt zapped into the sand between Teng and the Teedo with the rifle. The shot was brilliant red in the darkness and made the sand spit and sizzle. A second shot followed the first, hitting closer to the Teedo. Both had come from Rey’s right, atop one of the dunes.

“You heard her!” Devi’s voice rang across the desert. “It’s her ship!”

Rey, Teng, and the Teedos turned to her in surprise. She was standing just over the rise, a small blaster held in both hands. Strunk was beside her, and as Devi spoke, he ran clumsily down the slope, splashing sand as he went. His hands were empty, but he seemed even bigger than before, twice the height of the tallest Teedo.

“I don’t have a lot of shots in this thing,” Devi said. “But I’ve got enough left. A couple of you are gonna get really hurt. Or maybe worse.”

Strunk had reached the bottom and jogged up alongside Rey. He touched her elbow as he passed but kept moving forward, striding toward the Teedo with the rifle. Teng could do nothing but blink and watch Strunk try to save his life.

He reached out and grabbed the weapon by its long barrel, then pulled it aside. The Teedo didn’t let go, but he couldn’t control where it was pointing. Strunk yanked, and the rifle came out of the Teedo’s three-fingered grip. Strunk turned the gun in his hands, found the charging clip, and tore it free. He flung the cartridge over the dunes, then handed the rifle back to the Teedo.

“What would it be inappropriate to clap?” Teng muttered to Rey.

“Teng!”

“Sorry.” Teng glanced around and very gently banged the tip of his fingers against the heel of his other hand making a very quiet clap Rey could neither see nor hear.

“It’s time for you to leave,” Devi told the Teedo.

The message clearly received, Teedos turned and went back the way they had come.

“Okay, can I faint now?” Teng asked.

Rey and Devi frowned at him.

“See,” Devi said, “this is why I don’t believe you when you say he belonged to pirates and a cult.”
Rey just sighed.

“You’re welcome,” Devi said, as she followed Rey and Teng up the ramp and back into the ship. Strunk’s footsteps were heavy on the metal behind them.

Rey spun on her heel, hands still gripping her staff.

“What were you doing out here?” Rey demanded as Strunk stumbled the last length off the ramp.

Teng let Rey take the lead on this one and holstered his blaster. He flicked on the lights in the main compartment and hit the switch to close the ramp once more.

Devi tucked her little blaster into one of her many pockets and ran her grimy fingers through her hair, looking up at Rey.

She seemed puzzled, “We were keeping watch.”

“Keeping watch?” Rey shot.

“Yeah, Strunk and I have been camping out here pretty much the last two weeks whenever you headed home,” Devi looked genuinely confused. “Someone had to stay on guard, right?”

“Two weeks?”

“About that, yeah. I’d have thought you’d be more grateful.”

Rey looked at her staff, then Teng. He placed a hand on her staff and forced her to lower it.

“We thank you, but it’s not necessary,” Teng said, giving Rey a look.

She sighed and set it against a bulkhead, “We already have guards for the ship. Either I, Teng, Quom, or Dad will sleep on it overnight.”

Rey didn’t mention that she never slept alone in the ship.

“Yeah, but we thought safety in numbers,” Devi said. “You know, in case something like this happened.”

Rey didn’t know how she should feel. They had been sleeping out in the cold for two weeks, risking the gnaw-jaws and everything else just to guard the ship.

But still… this was Devi she was dealing with.

“I didn’t know you were doing that,” Rey said.

“You guys keeping warm?” Teng asked.

“We’ve got one of those old emergency shelters we pulled from a wrecked X-wing a couple years ago. It’s pretty warm inside, though it gets kinda cozy,” Devi shot a grin at Strunk, who was standing mutely by, listening closely.

Teng and Rey traded a look, and Teng gave her a smirk.

“I'd ship it.”
“Shut up,” Rey snapped.

Devi smiled, but for once it looked like a real smile, “We normally wait until we see you guys arrive and then we head out on the salvage runs, get our portions, like that. Hadn’t you wondered why you were always here first?”

Honestly, Rey thought it was because of her super awesome Jedi powers.

“I just thought I was early,” Rey lied.

“Nah, Rey, we’ve been making sure everything stays safe.”

Rey considered and found that she was struggling with what she should say. It was nice but still… it was Devi.

“Thank you,” Rey forced herself to say. She nearly choked on the words.

Devi laughed. “See, that’s it! You’re welcome! It’s not a big thing, Rey. We’re just protecting our investment, right? That’s all it is. Nothing more to it.”

Rey narrowed her eyes, “Just like the Fighting Ring? Nothing more to that?”

Devi’s face fell, “Look, Rey, I’m sorry. That was a shitty move to pull. I shouldn’t have done it. It was just once I heard that Dirk was going to train you, I got scared. But I’m sorry. I shouldn’t have done that and I promise I won’t ever double cross you again.”

Rey nodded slowly. Her Force powers weren’t strong enough yet to sense Devi was lying.

Teng sighed and wrapped his arm around Rey’s waist, “We thank you for the apology, Devi. And Strunk, thank you for saving my life.”

“No problem,” Strunk shrugged.

“So, listen,” Devi said in that smooth as oil way she liked to peddle. “I was talking with Forna, when she, Oth, and Grand were in Niima the other day. They say that the X’us’R’iia all those months back uncovered an Uulshos XP, one of the yachts, you know? They said it’s entirely wrecked, they stripped it of everything, but they also said the main engine compartment came down intact. Neither me nor Strunk can ever remember Unkar selling a converter chamber, the thing’s just too hard to separate from the remix junction, right? But the one on this XP, it might still be intact. So we’re going to go out and take a look, what do you think?”

“I think it’s a good idea,” Rey said stiffly.

“Gonna be a real pain separating it out, though. Strunk’s strong enough to help lift it, but getting it disconnected without making it useless or cracking the diverter, that’s the part that’s worrying me.”

Rey and Teng traded a knowing look. Her big hazel eyes stared up at him begging please don’t make me do this. Teng nudged her, and Rey sighed.

“I can help,” Rey tried to sound enthusiastic about the offer.

Devi looked surprised, but not too surprised, “You sure? Isn’t your dad and Quom away on business? It’ll leave the ship alone.”

“No, I can help,” Rey said. “Strunk, Teng, and I can go. You stay with the ship.”
Devi stared at her, then looked away sharply. When she looked back, Rey thought her eyes had grown wet. The cynical Rhiaon half of her said they were fake, but the optimist Skywalker half hoped they were genuine.

“I won’t let anyone touch it,” Devi promised.

She almost sounded earnest.

Almost.

---

AGE SEVENTEEN

The Year of the Tragedy

Rey Erso knew exactly what she wanted for her seventeenth birthday. Sure, if Quom or her father asked, she would pretend she didn’t. But Rey knew what she wanted, and exactly who she wanted to give it to her.

“I want to have sex.”

Teng Malar – still eighteen for another month or so – blinked.

“I’m sorry, you want what?”

“I want to make love,” Rey said. “Tonight.”

“Tonight,” Teng repeated. He honestly didn’t remember how to return his eyes to a normal width. “Like… tonight tonight?”

“Look, if you don’t want to-”

“Oh, trust me, I want to, I just… wow. Wasn’t really expecting that.”

Rey frowned, “Really? Because we’ve been doing stuff for a year. We’ve seen each other fully naked. We’ve done stuff to each other naked.”

“Believe me, highlight of the year,” Teng said, “I just… it’s a lot to take in.”

Rey grinned, “Well, I’ve seen it, Teng. Not saying there’s nothing, but let’s not overestimate.”

“Yes, insult my body. This is a sure-fire way to get me to sleep with you.”

“Come on, Teng,” Rey laughed, setting down her scrub brush. They were the only ones at Unkar Plutt’s wash tables, the safest place to discuss such plans without risk of being overheard by Luke or Quom. “I’m ready. So if you want it…”

Under the table, Teng felt a hand slid up his thigh. Rey leaned forward so her breath was hot on his ear and breasts were pressing against his heaving chest.

“Then take it,” she whispered in his ear.
“Rey,” Teng choked out. “You can’t… You can’t just say things like that.”

“Why not?”

“Because now I’m not going to be able to stand up from this table for a while.”

And then Rey got a downright wicked look in her eye.

“Everyone’s out seeing what yesterday’s X’us’R’iia turned up. There’s no one at all watching,” Rey whispered, her hand drifting up his thigh.

“Rey,” Teng grunted as her fingers ran over his pant’s bulge.

“Just relax, Teng,” Rey grinned. “No one will see.”

“But Rey-”

“Are you not consenting to this?” Rey’s hand stopped.

Teng stared at her in a hot, heavy silence, the answer clear in his eyes.

“We have to be quick and quiet,” Teng panted, covertly unsnapping his fly under the table.

"Then we have a deal," Rey grinned. "I give you what you want… and tonight you give me what I want.”

Teng’s breath hitched as her hand slipped under his pants, “Agreed.”

“No,” Rose Tico’s voice came across the comm.

“Yes,” Rey grinned as she worked in Quom’s tent alone. Luke and Quom were out scavenging, and Teng was out trading, which was difficult as he couldn’t look anyone in the eye after their little stunt at the wash table.

“No,” Rose repeated.

“Yes!” Rey exclaimed.

“Holy fuck…” Jessika said.

Paige was speechless.

“I can’t believe you seriously gave Teng a handjob under the table at the wash tables… in public,” Kaydel said.

“Excuse me?” Rey frowned. “Is Miss I once broke into Holdo’s office, had sex on her desk, and broke her chair in the process really judging me?”

“She’s got a point,” said Jessika.

“Oh, be quiet,” Kaydel grumbled.
“I’m just happy Aletha isn’t here tonight,” Paige shook her head.

“Yeah, she might tell my dad about my plans with Teng,” Rey smirked.

“Are you sure you want to do this tonight?” Kaydel asked.

“Yeah,” Rey nodded. “I love Teng with all my heart and I’m ready to take our relationship to the next level. Besides, we’ve done pretty much everything you can do already.”

The older girls burst out laughing.

“Oh honey,” Jessika said, “you have no idea how much more there still is.”

“And we’re not even talking about thing I really like but Poe refuses to do level stuff,” Kaydel added.

“Ok, seriously, what is it you want him to do?” Rose asked. “Are we talking about non-sexual bodily fluids, extremely weird fetish, or bordering on the illegal?”

“Not illegal…just very unsanitary,” Kaydel answered. “Let’s just say that it involves a mouth in a very unhygienic place.”

Rey’s eyes went wide.

“Oh,” the girls said together.

“That’s it?” Jessika scoffed. “Gods be cursed, Kaydel, I thought we were talking something weird like a fire play fetish. Not something you can easily see in mainstream porn.”

“Hey, there’s nothing wrong with a little fire play,” Paige said.

The line went very silent.

“Wow,” Kaydel stretched out the word.

“Mark that down on the list of things I never wanted to know about my sister,” Rose grumbled.

“Fuck, Paige,” Jessika said, “I really underestimated Evan Tharel’s kinks.”

“Well, actually I was the one who convinced Ev-”

“So, Kira and Teng!” Rose hollered, so not wanting to hear anymore and silently praying for amnesia of the last two minutes. “You nervous, Kira?”

“A little,” Rey admitted. “But mostly excited.”

“Just remember,” Kaydel said kindly, “it’s perfectly natural for you not to get off on penetration alone. Don’t be afraid of additional stimulation.”

“And don’t freak if there’s a little blood,” Paige advised. “The whole hymen thing is a myth for the most part.”

“Oh, trust me, I had a bad fall years ago and broke that.”

“But there still might be blood,” Paige continued. “Just relax and make sure you’re good and ready before any penetration. There doesn’t have to be pain and blood, but there’s absolutely no shame if you do experience that."

“And for the love of all the Gods,” Jessika said, “make sure he clips his fingernails.”

Rose spoke, “I don’t have any advice, but I will offer you a you go get some, girl if you wish.”

“Sure, Rose,” Rey smiled.

“You go get some, girl.”

Rey chuckled, “Thanks, girls. I’m so glad I have you all to talk to. It makes me less nervous knowing I can talk to people with experience and who can answer my questions. I think that’s why Teng is so nervous; the only person he can talk to about this is my dad, and that doesn’t sound like a good topic of conversation for them.”

“Yeah, if Evan asked my dad how to sexually please me, he and Rose would be burying a body,” said Paige.

“Why would I hide the body?” Rose asked.

“Daddy/daughter bonding?”

“Fair enough.”

Rey sighed, “I just wish there was someone for Teng to talk to. His own Kira’s Council. I don’t know… Malar’s Men.”

Something occurred to Kaydel, “Well, actually…”

The girls looked to her.

She grinned deviously, “Girls… I have an idea.”

“However much foreplay you think you’ll need, times that by three,” Poe instructed.

“And add another five minutes,” Evan nodded.

Tallie added, “And for the love of the Force, clip your nails.”

“Thanks, guys,” Teng chuckled. “I really appreciate this.”

“Eh, we really didn’t have much to do on base today anyways,” Poe shrugged. “So what exactly is it you want to talk about? You do know what sex is, right?”

“Of course I do!”

“Dameron, be nice,” Tallie warned. “Tell us, Honey. What do you want to know?”

“I’m just not quite sure, you know… what to do,” Teng admitted. “I mean, I know which part goes where and… you know, what motions to make with said parts, but… well, how do I start? What do I do?”

Poe Dameron and Evan Tharel traded a look, seated next to each other on the bed. Aletha Kymeri’s comm sat on the bedtable in Poe and Kaydel’s room – said room cleared of the comm’s usual council of girls – and the pair of men were joined by Tallissan Lintra seated at the desk.
“Look, sex is all about going with the flow,” Evan said. “Whatever feels right, just do that.”

“But keep open communication,” Tallie cut in. “You don’t need to ask her every two minutes if this is okay, but if you’re not going to outright ask her if she wants to proceed to something new, very slowly transition into and back off if she feels uncomfortable. Watch her body language.”

“That said,” Poe added, “asking a girl if they want you to do something to them… I swear nothing gets Kaydel hotter. Don’t be afraid of a little dirty talk, but don’t go all out at first, okay?”

“Oh, yeah no, good advice, but that’s not what I meant,” Teng started to sound frustrated. “What exactly do I do? How am I supposed to go with the flow if I don’t know what we’re flowing between.”

“Alright, fine,” Poe rolled his eyes, “you want specific instructions? Think of the five things you want to do most tonight. It can range anything from kissing to outright sex. Order them from 1-5 from most erotic to least. Got them?”

“I think so.”

“What you need to do is build up to number one. Linger between each number. Do something like 5 for ten minutes, then 4 for five minutes, then do 3 for two minutes, then go back to 4 for another five minutes. Mix and match as you will, jumping up and down in intensity and level. Maybe you go down from 2 to 5 for another two minutes just to make her go that wild. But whatever you do, do not do number 1. Tease her that you’re going to, tell her that’s what you’re going to do, but always pull back. Then, when you’ve literally got her begging for it, give her number 1.”

Tallie bit her lip and Evan cleared his throat.

“I uh…” Evan shifted awkwardly, “I think I need to find Paige after this.”

“Yeah, Jess is going to have some fun with me too,” Tallie said. “Damn, Dameron. No wonder Kaydel brags about you so much.”

Poe grinned, “I take my title of Sex God very seriously.”

“You think Kaydel calls you a sex god?” Evan raised an eyebrow.

“Maybe not to you guys.”

“Teng,” Tallie turned her attention back to the comm, “just relax. There’s no program to follow, just do whatever is comfortable to yourself and Kira.”

“I know,” Teng sighed. “I just want it to be perfect for her.”

The trio laughed.

“Oh Honey,” Tallie chuckled. “It’s not going to be perfect the first time. It’s always awkward the first time.”

“ Heck, it’s awkward the first time with a new partner,” Poe said. “The first time Kay and I had sex, I fell on her while trying to take off my boot, pinned her against my desk, and couldn’t figure out how to take off her bra.”

“First time Paige and I had sex, I couldn’t get her off,” Evan added.

“Jessika was my first, so you can imagine how well that went. Why don’t we each take a turn and tell Teng something embarrassing from our very first times?” Tallie suggested. “The first time I had sex, I rolled right off the bed, slammed face first on the corner of the bedside table, and gave myself a black eye.”

The others laughed.

“Alright, I’ll go,” Evan volunteered. “The first time I had sex, I was so nervous, I couldn’t get hard for over an hour.”

“Ouch,” Poe chuckled, wincing a little. “That’s bad, but not quite as awful as what happened my first time.”

“Oh yeah? What happened?” Evan asked.

“My dad walked in.”

Tallie, Evan, and Teng winced.

“Oh, that’s awful,” Tallie laughed.

Poe groaned, “But it gets worse. When my dad walked in, he froze, turned bright red, and stuttered out an apology for interrupting. He started to back out the room when he paused, looked back, and I shit you not, then started to give me pointers on how to make things more enjoyable.”

The comm crackled with hysterical laughter from Teng. Evan just stared at Poe with his face perfectly white and jaw hanging open, and Tallie laughed so hard she literally fell out of her chair.

“How did you even respond to that?” Teng howled.

“I threw my pants at him and told him to get out,” Poe had gone a shade a red that had only been seen by Rose Tico after he walked in on her in the shower. “It completely killed the mood and scarred me for a very long time. It was a year before I had sex with a girl where I got to finish.”

“And somehow you are now an exhibitionist,” Evan said.

“Actually not really,” Poe corrected. “I get a thrill of the idea of possibly being caught, but actually getting walked in on is one of the worst things to endure. It’s why I hate Holdo so much... and why it took me two months to look General Organa in the eye again after the night of my promotion ceremony. So, yeah, there’s advice for you, Teng. Don’t let anyone walk in on you.”

“That’s hard to avoid,” Teng said. “I live with a Vrogem, and apparently not only can they smell sex on you, they can determine exactly what sex act you’ve performed.”

“Remind me never to hang around Vrogems,” Evan muttered.

Tallie raised an eyebrow, “Wouldn’t that involve you getting laid on a regular basis?”

Evan scowled, “You know I have a live-in girlfriend, right? Sure, I may not be Commander Sex God Dameron, but Paige and I have a very healthy and fulfilling sex life.”

“Healthy?” Poe shot. “Kay told me some of the shit you and Paige get up to. Tharel, that girl is weird.”

“Oh, she told them about the fire thing, did she?” Evan scratched his neck. “In my defense, it was only one time.”
Tallie raised an eyebrow.

“Okay, six times,” Evan admitted. “And don’t you give me that look. I know what you and Jessika get up to in unattended ships.”

“Uh, guys?” Teng cut in. “Aren’t we supposed to be talking about me?”

“Sorry, Kid,” Poe laughed. “This there anything else you want to talk about?”

“Yeah, how long is it supposed to last? Five minutes? Ten minutes? An hour?”

“Oh, God, don’t go for an hour, Teng,” Tallie shuddered. “You’ll chaff the girl.”

“And honestly, no one can last an hour,” Poe said.

“Didn’t you once last three?”

“I gave him a pill to do that.” Evan shook his head, “Don’t worry about lasting long, Teng. The first time you’re inside a woman, it’s going to be over quick. My first time, I lasted two minutes.”

“Really?”

“He’s right,” Poe agreed. “I’ll kill you guys if you tell anyone, but the first time I finished inside a girl, I lasted three pumps.”

“Anything else?” Evan asked. “You guys are using condoms, right? Because if not, I will tell Aletha, and she will come down there and castrate you.”

“We’re going to use a condom. But I did mean to ask about that,” Teng replied. “So, Kira and I have had absolutely no partners other than each other. We’re absolutely going to use a condom for the actual sex, but what about the rest of it? We don’t have to use one for foreplay, right?”

“Wrong,” Evan answered. “You can transmit some STIs through foreplay, and you can have an STI without knowing. You could be born with one, or maybe there’s some abuse that happened to you when you were really young that you don’t remember. Even if you both are virgins, until you both get tested, always use condoms. Heck, it’s a good idea to use them even when you are clean, monogamous, and on other birth control. Paige is on the pill, and we still use condoms every time, just in case.”

“Seriously?” Poe asked. “Kay’s got an IUD and the second we were both declared clean, we decided to get rid of them.”

“Dude, I’m a nurse. I don’t screw around with this sort of thing. The success rate of birth control may be in the high 90’s, but we’re not taking a chance. We’re not having a baby in the middle of a war.”

“So, is there anything else you wanted to discuss, Teng?” Tallie asked.

“No,” Teng laughed. “I think I’m ready.”

“Then Teng Malar,” Poe grinned, “go forth and get laid.”

That night Rey and Teng shared dinner with Devi and Strunk. Luke and Quom were back at the shop, working on their own projects and having dinner. Rey and Teng didn’t dine with Devi and Strunk a lot, but as they worked together more and more, those dinners started to get more frequent.

They sat on the floor and had one portion apiece. Devi talked throughout the meal, the way she always seemed to be talking, but Rey found herself enjoying it more each time. Devi was no Kira’s Council, but it was nice to be face to face with a girl her age for once.

When they’d finished, Strunk got up to head for the ramp, Devi moving to follow him.

“See you in the morning, you guys,” Devi said and then, to Strunk, “I’ll take the first watch.”

Devi and Strunk had been camping out near the ship every night. Sometimes Rey got up the nerve to trust them alone with the ship, but never overnight. Instead she or Teng or sometimes even Luke or Quom would sleep on the ship, guarding it. In the middle of the night, there sometimes was an interruption from Devi and Strunk. Not every night, but often enough to make Rey wary.

She didn’t want any interruptions tonight.

“You guys can stay on the ship,” Rey said. “It’s warmer.”

They stopped. Teng even froze, giving her a funny look.

Surely she didn’t want an audience?

“That is true,” Devi glanced at Teng, looking a little confused but sly as she formulated a plan in her mind. “Also, it doesn’t smell so much like Strunk. Which, I hate to say it, that shelter totally does.”

“I do not smell.” Strunk sounded wounded.

“We all smell, Strunk.”

“Don’t you guys use the bathing hut?” Teng asked.

“Too expensive,” Devi replied. Her voice was a little bitter.

Teng winced. Sometimes he forgot that living with Luke meant he was living a life of privilege. Well… as privileged as you could get on Jakku.

Devi continued, “I can’t remember the last time I was in a refresher.”

Rey pointed to one of the small closed doors off the main compartment, “Fully functional.”

“You serious?”

“No water, but the sonics work.” Rey glanced at Teng. “I tested it this morning. Thought I’d be nice and fresh for… my birthday.”

Teng’s eyes went wide. Oh Gods, he was in trouble tonight.

Devi glanced between Rey and for a moment, opened her mouth, and then closed it.

“You can have that first watch, Strunk,” she disappeared into the refresher. Devi poked her head back out, “Oh, and Teng?”

Teng had been in the middle of grabbing Rey’s hand and leading her off the ship.
“Good luck,” she winked.

Rey couldn’t help laughing.

“Well, that was embarrassing.” Teng grumbled as they walked off the ship.

“Hey, I didn’t tell anyone,” Rey hung on to his arm.

He raised an eyebrow.

“Other than the Council,” she corrected.

Teng shook his head, “So, are you ready for tonight?”

“I think so. Are you?”

“I think so. You bring the condoms?”

“In my satchel,” she patted it.

“Good,” he took a deep breath.

“Hey,” Rey pulled him to a halt. “I’m happy we’re going to do this.”

“Yeah,” Teng smiled. “Me too.”

Rey took a breath, “I love you, Teng Malar.”

“I love you, Rey Erso,” he wrapped his arms around her. “Nothing will ever change that. I’ll love you to my dying breath.”

“And you to mine,” she rested her head against his chest. “I’m ready to do this.”

“Me too… So where exactly are we going to do this? I thought we were going to on the Ghroic, but that didn’t work out. And somehow I don’t think Quom and Luke would appreciate it if we did it in the walker or tent next to them while they try to sleep.”

Rey grinned, “Oh, I have the perfect idea.”

In the year since Kylo had met Sasa, he had never actually been in her room. Sure, he knew where it was located and he had seen outside of it, but he had never been inside.

He had seen Tara’s, and Nera’s when she was alive. He had been in Wihn’s several time when the two most trustworthy Knights – and that was saying something considering who they were – needed to speak alone. Cern’s room Kylo had no desire to see – there were probably deceased animals pinned to cards hung on the walls. And to be honest, he didn’t care at all about Doxl and Berd.

But Sasa’s room… well, at first it hadn’t been intentional that Kylo had never been in it. Then it became a bit of a game between the two. If Kylo showed up at her door and was able to correctly sense one object – non-living things were harder to sense in the Force – then he would be allowed in.
To be honest, it wasn’t that his Force Powers were too weak to sense things, but that Sasa had her ways to distract him during her tests.

The last time they thought she might be pregnant – due to the constant stress of trying to have a baby and avoiding Tara’s constant schemes to murder her, Sasa often missed her period – had been from one of those tests, resulting in Kylo having sex with her against her bedroom door.

But Kylo knew today wasn’t going to result in such a lighthearted flirting. Kylo stood before her bedroom door, uncertain what to do. She was in there, probably hiding from everyone again. If he waited long enough, he would likely find FN-2187 bringing her dinner shortly.

FN-2187 was in saber classes that moment, which was why Kylo chose to visit Sasa now. He liked FN-2187 well enough, but he didn’t feel comfortable speaking to Sasa in an intimate fashion in front of FN-2187. Heck, he barely could do it in front of Sasa.

In the almost year since her confession of love, Kylo couldn’t muster up a response beyond “I know.” Sure, as the son of Han Solo and Leia Organa that phrase meant so much more, but there was still a distance between himself and Sasa. A distance he was afraid to close.

Tara had been pissed off again when Sasa failed to show up to the Expert Saber Class. This snub was less egregious now that Sasa had been officially graduated from the class as a student. It hadn’t been Tara’s choice, rather a mandate from the Supreme Leader, championed by Kylo and Wiln. The Stormtrooper FN-2187 liked called Marks had taken her spot, and Sasa attended the class as a Knight of Ren helping, testing, and instructing like Doxl and Berd did.

Strictly speaking, a Knight of Ren didn’t have to attend, and it was no big deal if they missed one due to a mission – Cern had been away from three months tracking the missing Lor San Tekka – but if you were on Starkiller Base or the Finalizer with Tara, then you were expected to show up.

It had been three weeks since Sasa came to class.

Kylo could sense her inside; she was as somber as he had sensed her yesterday… and every day for weeks. She had been avoiding him, and he wanted to know why.

He took a deep breath and knocked on the door.

For a moment, she hesitated, but he heard the padding of footsteps. The door slid open only a little, and Sasa’s face peeked out.

“Hey,” Kylo said.

“Hey,” she gave a slight smile, but it didn’t reach her eyes.

She wasn’t her usual polished self, but Kylo could tell from years of living with Leia Organa that Sasa had done herself up a little. Ben Solo knew the difference between simple hair and makeup and the days he spent with his mother as she lounged around the house in baggy clothes, no makeup, and wild, frizzy hair tumbling down her shoulders, watching HoloNet together.

He wouldn’t admit he missed those days.

“Can I come in?” Kylo resisted the urge to stroke her cheek.

Sasa’s smile was real this time, “Can you earn your entry?”

Kylo shook his head, ready to make some witty retort when he paused, “Are you playing music?”
Sasa said nothing, but sure enough, faintly in the background some melody was playing. A melody he knew.

“Ubari Menvoln,” Kylo said. “Opening song of the second act of his opera, Imperio Tulada Mornay, aka The Empire’s Crushing Shadow. The song is called ‘Warra Aldeera,’ Cry for Alderaan.”

She lifted her eyebrows, “You know it?”

He frowned, “The song is about the destruction of Alderaan. Yeah, my mom may have played it a few million times growing up. I could sing it in my sleep.”

“Actually, now that I think about it, you may have literally done so.”

“Nice enough recording,” Kylo observed the music. “Truth be told, it’s most beautiful when played live. There’s layers to it you just can’t get in a recording.”

“I’d love to hear it played live.”

“Perhaps someday I’ll take you… You know, if I would immediately to arrested the second I stepped foot in the Coruscant Grand Opera Hall.”

Sasa smiled, “I’d like that… the outing and the part where no one arrests you.”

“So, did I pass the test?” Kylo asked.

“Alright, looks like you paid your toll. Come in.”

Kylo grinned and stepped past her when the door slid open.

Why was he not surprised her walls were pink?

“So, not like the rest of the rooms on this military ship?”

“Exactly.” Kylo chuckled, “Do I get the grand tour?”

“Well, there a door and a bed and a closet-”

“Come on,” he turned around and placed his hands on her hips. He grinned as he pulled her close, “I mean it.”

“I guess it is a nice room,” Sasa settled her hands on his broad arms.

“And big,” he frowned glancing around. “Is this bigger than my room?”

“Uh, kind of. Technically it’s three rooms. No, wait… four.”

Kylo blinked.

“The Supreme Leader really wants to make sure he’s getting a lot out of his investment,” Sasa gave an awkward shrug.

“I’d say,” Kylo kept surveying the room. “So… tell me about the room.”

It was bright and fresh unlike Kylo’s room with its dark grey walls and dank quality. But Sasa’s room had soft pink walls, a little extra oxygen pumped in, and smelled faintly of flowers. She had about as much furniture as him, but the elegant wood fixtures were larger and had decorative carvings. Her bed looked like it could sleep four comfortably, or maybe two adults and three kids which was the number Snoke had always predicted Kylo having. A son, a daughter, and a son he had foreseen.

She had deep purple silk bedsheets and pillowcases, and the mattress was so soft. Oh, he was so nailing her in that bed. His bed was a joke compared to hers.

There was a desk and bookshelf in one corner, and a vanity set with a grand number of hair products, skincare, and makeup so beautifully organized that Leia Organa would be proud to call Sasa her daughter-in-law.

Wait… Where the hell did that thought come from?

Her fresher – the second room of her quarters – was identical to his own, except she had a bathtub to go with her shower.

But it was something in the main room that surprised Kylo the most.

“Is this a… dejarik table?” he ran a hand over the rim, his mouth hanging open.

“Yep,” she smiled. “I love playing. Nova and I had a travel set we played all the time. When I was chosen, the Supreme Leader let me choose three personal enjoyments for my room. Dejarik was one of them, and the speaker system was another. It’s wired throughout all parts of my quarters; even the fresher for some ambiance during a bubble bath.”

Oh sweet Force, he so wanted to see her in a bubble bath… maybe join her too.

Sasa continued, “I have a program of over two thousand opera songs, symphonies, and other instrumental music. Do you like dejarik or opera?”

He just stared at her, “Is this a trick?”

“Excuse me?”

“Come on, you have to know. Don’t pretend you have interest in things you don’t.”

“I’m not,” Sasa frowned. “I like these things, Kylo. If you don’t, there’s no need to disparage-”

“You really like them.” He blinked at her, “You’re serious?”

She crossed her arms, “Yes.”

There was a very long silence.

Then Kylo laughed.

“Well,” he grinned. “I’m starting to see more and more why the Supreme Leader picked you for me.
My mother took me to the opera all the time when I was young. As for dejark, I, uh… I played it all the time with my father on his ship. I love the game. I’m great at it. I can even beat Chewie – er, Chewbacca – and he won’t tear my arms off… Although I have the feeling he wouldn’t hesitate to do so now. Even if dejark wasn’t involved.”

“Well, I won’t let him,” Sasa grinned. “I like these arms.”

“You’ll take on a Wookiee?”
“For you? I’d take on anything.”

Kylo smiled, and gently stroked her cheek.

“Anyway, if you’re really so great at dejarik, I’d love to play you,” Sasa said. “Of course, you couldn’t beat me—”

“Oh, I’d be careful,” he tilted her chin. “Don’t say something you know not to be true.”

“Challenge accepted, Master Ren.”

Kylo bent his head down to touch his forehead to hers, and then reluctantly let her go, “So, what was the third thing?”

“Sorry?”

“The other personal item you chose?”

Sasa grinned and grabbed his hand, “Follow me.”

Her room had three doors in it; two to the right – one of which lead to the fresher – and one to the left. She led him through the door to the left.

At first glance, Kylo thought it was a walk-in closet. There were outfits – particularly dresses – hanging from almost all of the walls. Probably somewhere near a thousand different garments. They were arranged by colour from lightest to darkest, and all had id cards listing extensive information like date made, materials, and suggested complementary pieces.

Two thirds of the outfits were black, grey, or dark brown, the colours the Knights of Ren were allowed to wear. But the colourful ones – all the reds, greens, purples, and every colour in the rainbow – were more lavish. It was easy to tell more effort and care went into them. Where a black dress might have a simple, practical design, a glittery gold dress might have three layers of skirt, intricate embroidery, and an elegant, perfectly cut back that showcased bare skin in a wavy hem until it reached her hips.

But it wasn’t a closet; it was a workroom. Hanging from the ceiling were computer screens that played a montage of fashion designs. One of the monitors showed a home screen with folders labeled “Sewing Patterns” “Alderiaan Fashion History” “Amidala Outfits” “Inventory Spreadsheets” “Sewing Techniques” “Past Designs” “Current Projects” “Unfinished Ideas” and so forth.

In the middle of the room was a large desk with a digital screen running some sort of design program. The incomplete sewing pattern of a long sleeved black tunic, skirt, and legging combo sat open in the program, titled “Battle Outfit – Version 7.”

Along the walls, stored under the racks of clothing were drawers filled with thread, buttons, zippers, various sewing notions and tools, and hundreds of bolts of fabric. And in one of the corners was a table, rather comfy looking chair, and sewing machine that looked more complicated than the hyperdrive of the Millennium Falcon.

“What,” Kylo looked around in amazement, “is all this?”

“Oh, I like to sew,” Sasa answered simply.

He just laughed, “Really? I couldn’t tell. Seriously, what is all this?”
“My wardrobe. I love making outfits… even if I can’t wear them,” she sent a longing look to the colourful garments to her left. She glanced down at her gainsboro grey dress. A light blueish grey was as colourful a Knight of Ren could get, and it would be a lie to say Kylo hadn’t noticed her discontentment at that before. “Still, I love designing and creating beautiful clothes. I especially love studying the fashion of Alderaan and Naboo. The Supreme Leader gave me a book of the fashion of Padmé Amidala when I was young, and I became obsessed. That woman knew how to put together an outfit.”

Kylo tried to keep the smile on his face. He wanted to ask her exactly why Snoke gave her a book of his grandmother’s fashion specifically. He was not yet aware that Sasa had been groomed to remind him of his grandmother, but every now and then he would get a weird feeling about Sasa.

But he wouldn’t ask her, not now when she was all smiling and bright eyed for the first time in weeks.

Then something flashed in those bright eyes, and she bit her lip.

“Do you… like them?” she asked.

Kylo was taken aback by the question, “What? Yes, of course. They’re gorgeous.”

She blushed, “Thank you.”

“How long have you been doing this? All of it. The opera, the sewing, the dejarik.”

“Well, let me think… I started seriously sewing at twelve, the opera came when I was fourteen, and I’ve been playing dejarik since I was eight. What about you?”

“My mother started taking me to the opera at eight, the sewing is a moot point as I can’t even sew a button-”

“Oh, I am so changing that.”

Kylo chuckled at her seriousness, “And the dejarik… I think I’ve literally been playing since the day of my birth. I have memories of sitting on my father’s lap on the Falcon, as we played against Uncle Chewie.”

Sasa smiled kindly.

“Happy memories?” she carefully asked.

His throat felt dry.

“Yeah,” he admitted with a nod. “Very happy. It’s been a very long time since I’ve had a game of it. I used to play with Wiln sometimes but the dejarik table… kind of was ruined.”

She stared at him.

“You had a temper tantrum and destroyed it with your lightsaber?”

“Little bit.”

Sasa laughed and hooked her arm around his, “Come on, let’s go play a game.”

“Are you sure?” Kylo grinned. “I’m really good at it.”
“Just as long as you promise not to destroy my table when I totally kick your ass.”

“Milady,” he kissed her hand. “…game on.”

To find the most valuable equipment, you need to know ship schematics backward and forward – that will keep you from spending hours poking around blindly and getting hurt.

- Rey’s Survival Guide

“Your uncle’s freighter?” Teng looked around the Millennium Falcon in surprise. “Rey Erso, you are a devious one.”

“I thought it fitting,” Rey smiled. She wrapped her arms around his neck. “Besides, we haven’t spent nearly enough time inspecting the captain’s quarters.”

“Mmm, which one are the captain’s quarters?” Teng wrapped his arms around her waist.

“The weird room that looks like normal quarters but has that small room that looks like a closet but for some reason has another bed shoved into it.”

Rey was exactly right; the second bed of the Captain’s quarters had originally been a closet. More specifically the cape closet of Lando Calrissian. But after Qi’ra’s betrayal, all Han could think of when he saw that closet was the stolen moment they shared in it. So, Han had a bed installed in it and turned the space into another bedroom. After all, Lando Calrissian had had a big ass closet.

He let Lando keep his capes, though.

“Well, then,” Teng said, “why don’t we go… explore that room?”

“Yeah,” Rey smiled. “Let’s do it.”

“My monnok just took your Ng’ok. You still want to pretend you’re good at this game?”

“I’m just a little rusty,” Kylo scowled, staring at the board to rethink his strategy. “It’s been a while since I’ve had a good opponent.”

“If that’s what you want to believe,” Sasa grinned as she punched in another move that made things dangerous for Kylo. “And to think, Tara doesn’t believe I can be calculating.”

“No, she just thinks you’re a pain in the ass,” he chuckled, punching in a move that impressed Sasa with how easily it relieved him of danger. “Speaking of, Tara is not happy you’ve been avoiding saber class. Did something happen with the two of you?”

“Not with us.”

Kylo scowled, “So… something’s happened.”
She looked up at him. Sasa was silent for a long time, unable to find words. Then she sighed, glanced down, and punched in another move.

“It’s nothing, really,” she said.

“You’ve been avoiding people for weeks, hiding in your room. You won’t even come share by bed, sexually and non-sexually. You’re hiding something,” he typed in his move. “Tell me.”

Sasa hesitated, “I… I had a chemical miscarriage.”

Kylo felt like he had been punched in the chest.

“You… I… what?” he exclaimed. “You had a miscarriage? You were pregnant?”

She held up a hand to calm him, “Not technically. A chemical miscarriage is when a sperm fertilizes an egg, but the cells never start dividing. We had the right ingredients, we just… never started cooking.”

Still, Kylo could barely handle the news. He just couldn’t believe it. He had actually gotten Sasa pregnant.

And later when he told Phasma, she wouldn’t believe it either. FN-2187 on patrol duty that night would walk by her office and overhear Phasma yelling to Hux about the one time she was away on a mission and Ren ran out of sleeping cordial of course the horny little bastard would bang the redhead.

FN-2187 knew not to pry.

“I just… I don’t believe it,” Kylo shook his head. “You know what this means?”

“It means that we can conceive a child,” Sasa said. “You and I have compatible reproductive cycles.”

“You know, all these years I thought that there might be something… wrong with me.”

“What makes you say that?”

“I’m twenty-seven. I’ve been trying to have a kid for years, and nothing. None of the women I’ve slept with could ever get pregnant. It had to have been me. But now—”

“Now the pressure’s on.” Sasa’s eyes flicked towards the one door she had yet to open to Kylo. “When the Supreme Leader finds out about this…”

“Gods,” Kylo groaned, punching in his move. “If he tells me to start putting in even more effort in conceiving a child, I think he’s going to bleed me dry.”

Sasa smirked, “Actually, I think that’s my job.”

Kylo grinned, “Then why don’t we take this over to the bed?”

She punched in a move and simply said, “Nope.”

“Why not?” he scowled as he lost his Ghhhk to her Houjix.

“My bed,” she paused to consider her pieces, “is a place of tranquility and relaxation. It’s to be filled with happy memories, not ones of getting shagged by a man who turned around and left me when Tara – a woman actively trying to kill me – got pregnant.”

“You think I would leave you for Tara?”

“Well, what would happen if someone else did get pregnant?”

Kylo sighed, “I don’t know.”

They sat in silence as he played another move.

“Well…” Sasa spoke, “until the day comes that you decide you want me and only me, you’re not touching me in that bed.”

A thought crossed his mind and he grinned, “And what about the rest of the room? Say the bathtub or your desk… or maybe this very dejarik table?”

“Oh, those are possibilities. But you have to beat me at dejarik before you’re allowed to have me on the table.”

“I really need to brush up on my technique. I’m definitely going to lose this game, and that is absolutely embarrassing. I’m starting to think my father and uncles went easy on me.”

“I believe it,” Sasa chuckled. “You play a lot with them?”

“Mostly my dad, but Uncle Chewie and Uncle Lando liked to play me. Uncle Luke sometimes played with me – a lot when I was younger – but after Rhiaon came into the picture, most of his spare time was redirected from me to her. Then when Rey was born… I was lucky if I could get fifteen minutes alone with him. Honestly as much as we hated each other, at least I could say I did get a lot of quality time with Rhiaon. Even if we were just scheming different ways to push each other down the laundry chute and convince Uncle Luke we were innocent.”

“Was your Skywalker your hero growing up?”

“He was my mentor, but if I had to be honest… my dad was my hero.”

“Really?” Sasa asked.

“Well, when I was really little,” Kylo sighed. “He taught me to fly, to shoot, told me the wildest stories. Some of my favorite memories are being with him on the Millennium Falcon fixing things, playing dejarik, or just sitting in the co-pilot chair and fiddling with his precious gold dice.”

“It sounds lovely. I would love to have such memories of my parents.”

“Yeah, but it’s a shame to have those memories tainted when they ended up so misguided in the end. We had good times, but it was never easy to be a family. I was completely unplanned, and I know to a degree I wasn’t… wanted.”

“I’m sure that’s not true.”

“But it is,” Kylo punched in another move. “They never would have picked to have me if given the choice. I was just in their way. Mom was always off with her politics, and Dad… he just wanted to be free. Able to run off and explore the galaxy the way he did before. Instead he was stuck on planet with me. He never even knew how to be a father. I heard him talking to Mom one time how it felt like everything he did was wrong. But still… I admit he tried. He was really protective of me when I was young. There was an incident one time at a podracing track when I got really upset. We were in the washroom and I was trying to calm my emotions, but I lost control with the Dark Side and broke a mirror. The management was angry and tried to kick me out. Dad was right there at my defense. And when one of the guys ended up making a comment under his breath that Dad needed to control his kid when it was a freak like that one… oh, he lost it. Mom was the only reason he didn’t punch out the guy or worse.”

“He sounds like a hell of a father,” Sasa chuckled. “When did you two grow apart?”

“My mom got pregnant with a boy they were going to call Jacen. We were all so excited and everything was going fine… Then Mom got attacked, and she miscarried my brother. Dad pulled away from me, too ashamed at the thought of giving one son attention but not the other. Mom buried herself in politics. Chewie was on Kashyyyk with his family in those days. Uncle Luke was busy with Rhiaon. And Lando and Alyla were all tangled up with each other. That’s when the Supreme Leader really reached out for me. He had been speaking to me before, but that’s when things got more intense. He supported me and comforted me and taught me when no one else would. As I followed the teachings of the Supreme Leader, I started to turn to my Grandfather as my idol of what I wanted to be, and less so that Non-Force Sensitive. Dad saw that I was pulling away from him, but he did nothing to stop it.”

Sasa glanced again at that fourth door, and then reached out and clasped Kylo’s hand.

“I remember the day I packed to leave for Rornian,” Kylo tried to fend off the sorrow in his voice. “I remember Dad leading me into my room with a bag and telling me to pack. I asked him how long I was going, and he told me Take everything that’s important to you. That place… Luke’s house… It’s your home now. You’re not coming back here. Not for a while. Not to stay. I was devastated and tried to object but he just shook his head, wouldn’t look me in the eye, and said It’s better this way, Ben. What can I do for someone like you?”

“And what did you want him to do?”

“I… I wanted him to fight for me. I wanted him to let me be home with him and Mom. Instead I got stuck as a live-in-babysitter to Rhiaon’s spawn, and eventually was forced to play nice with that pain in the ass, Poe Dameron for an entire summer.”

“Poe Dameron?” Sasa punched in another move. “Is that the handsome one from the reward posters?”

Kylo narrowed his eyes.

“Sorry,” she grinned. “So, do you know exactly when came the moment you started hating your father?”

“That’s the problem,” Kylo punched in a move. “I don’t hate him.”

Sasa didn’t know what to say. Thankfully she was saved by the sound system which had been playing quietly in the background. It changed to a song from an opera Kylo knew well.

“Oh man, I must have seen this opera a hundred times,” he chuckled. “Mom would make Dad and I go with her to the Coruscant Grand Opera House all the time. Apparently it was to make us more cultured, but the Opera House is where all politics are truly done on Coruscant – the planet my mom was Senator of. As long as we didn’t get in her way or embarrass her, she didn’t care what we did. But Dad… Dad hated it so much, and so did I. We would constantly scheme on how to get out of it. I remember one time we faked food poisoning and I even went so far to force myself to throw up. Dad said I didn’t have to go that far, but admitted he was kind of impressed at my commitment.”
“Well, it would be quite unlike you to half ass a dramatic overreaction.”

“Hey!”

Sasa laughed, but her eyes drifted to the unopened door again.

“What’s in there?” Kylo asked.

“Huh?”

“The room. You keep looking at it.”

“Oh, it’s nothing.”

“It’s not nothing if you keep looking at it.”

Sasa looked away, “Trust me, Kylo, you don’t want to know.”

“Yes, I do,” Kylo insisted. “Sasa, I care about you so much. I don’t care what secrets you may have. What sins you may have committed. None could be greater than my own.”

“I’m not hiding a secret. I’m just… scared of what your reaction to the room will be. What you’ll think when you see what’s inside.”

“She’s, please… what’s in the fourth room?”

She looked up at him, and there was something just awful in her eyes.

“You really want to know?”

“Viola,” she turned on the light, the pair of them standing in the doorway. “The adjacent room to mine. Always there to remind me.”

Kylo Ren didn’t know what to say.

The adjoining room… was a fully stocked nursery.

A crib with a mobile of different models of ships. Pale green wallpaper with white silhouettes of kiros birds. A rocking chair in one corner, a changing table with enough supplies they could change a baby that very minute and still be good for three months. A dresser Kylo was certain he could pull open the drawers and find filled with enough boy and girls outfits to last a dozen babies. A shelving unit with a couple varieties of toys and books.

And creepiest of all, what Kylo swore was – if not a perfect replicate, then legitimately – the exact same nightlight that had been in Rey Skywalker’s room.

He hoped to God that it was just a replica.

“This…” Kylo looked around the room in utter shock, taking a few steps in for a closer look, “is… so uncomfortable.”

"Oh, it gets worse," Sasa leaned against the doorframe with folded arms, "the Supreme Leader himself designed the room. Our Master is a man to be feared and respected… but I will be first to admit that the image of Snoke putting a stuffed Acklay on our baby’s toy shelf downright scares the shit out of me.”

“I’m not going to argue that point. I just... I don’t understand. Why is this here?”

“It’s like I said, it’s his reminder to me. Sure, there’s the practical side of this being the place we’ll keep our baby when she’s born, but still... he put it in so that I will always have a reminder of what my purpose is in the Order. I’m ordered to spend at least half an hour in here everyday and just reflect on that purpose. What my goal is. What my value is.”

Kylo frowned, “Sasa... you have value beyond just giving birth.”

“Not to the Supreme Leader.”

He sighed; he couldn’t refute that.

“What did you mean this is where we’ll put our baby?” Kylo asked. “Wouldn’t that be inconvenient?”

Sasa frowned, “What do you mean? I’ll be right next door.”

He blinked, “You will?”

“Yeah. Where else would I be?”

“Well, I thought...”

Sasa startled a bit, “You thought I would be in your room?”

“Yeah, well, I guess I assumed that if you got pregnant with our child that our situation... I don’t know. It would change.”

“To what?”

He said nothing.

“Kylo,” she sighed, walking up to him. Sasa uncrossed her arms and wrapped them around his neck. She bowed her head against his chest, and his arms wrapped around her waist, pulling her in close, “I understand. This is all very complicated... but I know my feelings for you. When I tell you that I love you... I do mean it. I want to be with you, have a family with you. Not because I was trained to, but because I choose you. We are meant to be together; I can feel it in the Force. We will join together someday and bring life to the world.”

“And what if we can’t?” Kylo’s throat felt thick. “What if this is my punishment? That because I have caused so much death, I can’t create life? What if this is my punishment for what I did to Alyla?”

“My Love,” she stroked a thumb across his lip, “don’t beat yourself up. There’s no reason to believe you are incapable of siring an heir.”

“But there is! Sasa, I can’t get a woman pregnant! I’ve been trying for years, and nothing! Even with this chemical miscarriage you can see that there’s something defective about me that just can’t successfully create a child. Something’s wrong, but I don’t know what. It has to be the Force.”

Sasa sighed, “Then maybe it is.”
“It… what?”

“Maybe the Force is punishing you. Not for what you think, but something else.”

“What else could it be?”

“Maybe the turmoil is too much. Maybe the Force won’t let it happen until you’ve admitted the truth.”

“What truth is that?” Kylo asked.

Sasa took a deep breath, “Of what you want… Who you want.”

Kylo looked away.

“You’re going to have to make a choice, Kylo,” Sasa said. “It’s not just a matter of toying with the hearts of two women – assuming Tara even has a heart. It’s not just a matter of waiting until someone gets pregnant. Maybe the Force won’t let that happen until you decide. Because the truth is, Kylo… you have to make a choice. Not just which woman you want, but what future you want.”

“Sasa, I—”

“I would wait a thousand years for you, Kylo. I’ve made my decision; I know what I want. I’m ride or die, plain and simple. I want you by my side, our child in my arms, and FN-2187 covering my back.”

“You really have bonded with him, haven’t you?”

“He’s my only real friend.”

“You know he’s in love with you?”

“How could he not be?” Sasa grinned.

Kylo couldn’t help but smile.

Sasa – still grinning – sighed in contentment, “I’ll wait for you, Kylo. It doesn’t matter how long it takes, I’ll wait. I know we’re meant to be… but you have to make a choice. And you’ll have to make it soon.”

Her words took hold of him, Kylo exhaled deeply and pulled her into a hug. He held her in silence, burying his face into her copper hair, the background noise of space, opera, and mechanics filling the air.

He battled and lost to a shaky breath.

“Kylo?” Sasa looked up. She frowned at the tears in his eyes and touched his cheek, “Are you alright?”

He struggled to swallow.

“I’m fine,” he lied. “You’re just… you’re right. I need to make a choice.”

But as Sasa looked up at him with the tender smile on her face and love in her eyes… he knew he “Are you sure you want to do this?” Teng whispered.

They were lying on the bed together, naked under a sheet. The pair had performed foreplay many times before, so they were well acquainted with each other’s bodies. Still, it was really cold in the desert, and the sheet was for warmth.

“Yeah, I’m sure,” Rey couldn’t stop trembling. “I love you.”

“I love you too.”

Rey smirked at him, “Then why don’t you show me?”

Teng grinned, knowing exactly what she wanted. He kissed her, savoring the taste of her lips. She moaned, threading her fingers through his long black hair.

She chuckled as he kissed along her jaw, “You need a haircut.”

His lips were on her neck, “You know I like it long. And you like it too.”

“It’s not your worst feature,” she sighed as he kissed along her collarbone. “Oh Teng. Lower please.”

He shifted his head down to her breasts, already slightly damp from lots of attention paid to by his lips as he had slid his fingers in and out of her between her legs. Teng took a tender nipple into his mouth, and Rey shuddered. He hand stroked her silky thigh, the scent of her desire on the air.

Teng himself was hard and wanting. Rey had wanted to be adventurous before they moved to the captain’s bed. In the adjacent room she had stripped him down, knelt before him and sucked his cock almost to completion.

“That feels so good,” Rey moaned lifting her chest higher to his mouth. “But that’s not where I want your lips… that’s not where I want your tongue.”

He looked up at her and grinned. Teng kissed her lips and with a wicked grin, ducked his head below the blankets.

Rey squealed as his tongue found her clit.

“Oh, fuck, don’t stop!”

Teng had no intention to do so.

Rey laid boneless on the bed as he feasted on her. It was a thrilling eroticism, not seeing what he was doing, just feeling his tongue lapping at her. A mysterious force giving her pleasure as she lay on the bed, eyes squeezed shut and moaning. She gripped at the sheets tightly and rolled her pelvis up at him.

Oh fuck, it felt so good. His tongue flicking at her clit and then circling her opening. Her oh so wet and wanting opening. But right when she thought he was going to submit to her pleasure he would drag his tongue back up to her clit and give her a different type of pleasure.
Rey wanted to cum so badly.

“Please Teng,” she moaned wildly. “I need you inside of me. Please, Teng. Please!”

She screamed when his tongue fulfilled that need.

“FUCK!”

A few minutes later, his hand joined his tongue, and thumb dipped down to collect the wetness seeping out between her legs. He ran his wet thumb across her lower lips, while Rey bit down harder on her bottom mouth lip. Teng swirled that thumb around her clit as his tongue slid in and out of her, curling up and giving her pleasure she had never known.

It didn’t take long. Her hips shot off the bed, her thighs clamped around his head, and she screamed his name as she came.

He backed off after the last of her aftershocks and rested his head against her thigh. Every now and then he would place a gentle kiss to said thigh, but otherwise he just let her rest.

“That,” Rey panted. “That was wonderful.”

Teng took that as his signal to come join her back above the covers.

“Thank you so much for that,” Rey grinned as they cuddled.

“Anytime you want,” Teng grinned.

Rey blushed as she saw the dampness on his lips, “Teng, I’m… I’m on your lips.”

“I know. There’s few things better tasting in this universe than that sweet nectar between your legs.”

“Sweet nectar?”

“Don’t ruin the moment.”

Rey laughed, “Alright then, what is better tasting than the nectar between my thighs as you call it?”

“Only one thing,” he ghosted his lips over hers. “The taste of you on your own lips.”

And he bent down and kissed her.

They stayed like that for a while, kissing and cuddling, savoring the intimate moment. Then Rey looked into his eyes and said three simple words.

“I’m ready, Teng.”

He swallowed hard and nodded.

They were both trembling as they shifted their limbs so Teng was knelt over her. The blanket was pulled protectively over their bodies, both a little awkward about the situation and wary of the possibility of someone interrupting them.

“Ok, hold on,” Rey scowled and fumbled around a bit, “where do I… does my legs go over yours or beside or-”

“Here, hold on,” he grasped her failing leg, “I’ll just shift it-”
“Ow! Teng it doesn’t bend that way!”

“Sorry, hold on, let me just hook it over like this.”

“It’s just to cramp if I keep it there.”

“Alright where do you suggest?”

“Look. Just shift your hips like… No not that way! Oh fuck!” Rey shuddered as his cockhead stroked across her clit.

“Sorry, I didn’t mean-”

“Oh, I’m not complaining about that,” Rey laughed. “That felt good.”

“Yeah, too good,” Teng frowned. “I forgot we don’t have a condom on yet. Move your leg so I can reach your bag on the floor.”

“No, wait, let me see if I can do this.” Rey reached out her hand to her bag and concentrated, “Come on… come on.”

“Rey, that’s what I’m going to do if we don’t get this started quickly.”

“Knock it off,” she bumped her shoulder against him as she held out her hand towards the bag. “Come on… Come on… Damn it! I don’t think I can do it.”

“That’s alright. You really want to tell your dad that the first time you used the Force to grab something, it was a condom?”

“Fair point. Alright, I’ll let you go.”

Teng stumbled off the bed and rummaged through the bag. He quickly found the condoms and then held up the small bottle of lube.

“Poe and Evan said to use a lot of this the first time,” Teng sat on the bed and unwrapped the condom. “Apparently even if I have you nice and ready, it’s still a good idea.”

“Yeah, that’s what Kaydel said. The more lube the better. What are you doing?”

Teng jerked himself slowly, “I want to make sure I’m hard enough, otherwise the condom can fall off.”

“Here,” Rey gently wrapped her hand around his shaft. “Let me.”

He moaned as she pumped him, absolutely ensuring he was nice and hard. Teng loved the feeling of her body pressed against his. He bent down and sucked at her nipple as her hand slid up and down his silky shaft.

“Hard enough?” Rey whispered.

“Any harder and I’m going to explode,” he groaned.

“Good. That’s the plan.”

He chuckled as Rey took the condom and rolled it down his shaft. He was twitching at her touch. Rey then uncapped the bottle of lube and squirted some in her hand, then set it on the ground. Teng dug his nails into his palms as she watched her spread it around her palm and then wrap her hand around his shaft.

“The condom needs to be lubricated too,” Rey whispered.

They locked lips as Rey resumed her stroking and Teng grunted, trying to restrain himself.

“Rey, please, I can’t…”

Mercifully she removed her hand and laid back on the bed. She reached down and slipped her lube covered fingers inside her pussy.

“Have to make sure I’m ready too,” she panted as she pleasured herself.

He watched Rey enjoy herself for a few minutes, and then moved her hand away.

“Are you ready?” he asked.

“Yes,” her voice was barely more than a whisper.

They shifted back into their previous position, but this time found a comfortable enough position for all of their limbs. They stayed in position, just staring at each other and reflecting on the magnitude of what was about to happen.

“Are you sure you want to do this?” Teng asked once more.

“Yes,” she gripped his shoulders. “Are you sure?”

“I’ve never been more sure of anything in my life. I love you, Rey Erso.”

“I love you, Teng Malar.”

Teng bent down to give her a passionate kiss, and then… then he pushed into her.

Or at least he tried. Instead his cock just bumped against her awkwardly, finding no entrance.

Rey couldn’t stop her giggle.

“Sorry,” Teng blushed a little. He readjusted his hips, “Let me just move and little bit… there. That should do it.”

He pushed forward again.

And found nothing.

“Damn it!”

“Teng do you want me to-”

“No, I got this.” Teng grunted as he pushed forward again but slid uselessly against her body.

“Damn it!”

“Teng-”

“For the love of…” He let out a frustrated breath and yanked up the sheet to duck down his head, “Where are you?”
Teng fumbled around a bit, and then he felt Rey’s hand wrap around him and point his cock to her entrance.

“Oh, there we go,” Teng said, his head returning above the blanket. “Thanks.”

“No problem,” Rey smiled.

“You know that’s a lot further down than I expected. Are you sure it’s not… you know, that far down?”

“Teng, if it was that far down I would definitely be saying something.”

“Oh, so it’s… off the table?”

“For tonight at least. Let’s master the art of putting that where it’s supposed to go before we explore other avenues.”

“Right,” Teng laughed. He took another deep breath, “Alright, take two. Here we go. Ready?”

“Uh huh,” she nodded, gripping his shoulders tight.

“Ok… here I go.”

“Not too fast.”

“Right… right. Okay… Deep breath… here we go.”

Rey gasped as he pushed into her. Her nails dug into his skin and she let out a shocked whimper.

Teng immediately stopped, “Are you okay? Did I hurt you?”

“No! Well, I mean yes, but, no, it’s okay,” Rey grunted as she tried to adjust to the feeling of him inside of her. “I just need a moment.”

“Right,” Teng nodded. She couldn’t see the way he clenched his teeth behind his lips. He needed to show restrain. “How, uh… how does it feel?”

“Honestly? At the moment, I don’t see what the big fuss over sex is.”

“No, I mean specifically, how does it feel? What does it feel like?”

“Uh, kind of like a… a hot pressure, stretching me out. But not necessarily in a bad way, it just feels… different.”

“Good different?”

“Getting better. I think I’m ready for you to move again. But slowly, just a little.”

“Right.” Teng forced himself to control his breathing as he slowly pushed a little more inside of her. He stopped when she gave another uncomfortable grunt. “You okay?”

“Yeah, I’m fine, please, keep going.” Rey panted. That pressure was increased, but something nice was simmering under the surface. “How much further until you’re all the way in?”

“Just a little more… there,” he stopped when he was fully inside of her. “How’s- How’s that?”

“It’s, uh… it’s good.”
“Getting better?”

“Yeah. Uh, try pulling out and pushing back in. One slow thrust.”

Carefully and slowly, he did as requested. Oh Gods, he understood what Poe and Evan told him about not lasting long. Teng already wanted to cum.

“Was that okay?” Teng asked.

“Yeah,” Rey swallowed. “Try- Try another.”

And he did, this time getting a groan from Rey with a hint of pleasure.

Teng grinned, “Getting better.”

“Oh, it’s starting to feel good.” She gasped as he gave her a faster thrust, “A lot better. OH go faster. Not too fast, but… oh, I want more.”

Teng bent down and kissed her as he started into a slow but steady pace of thrusting.

Rey moaned, closing her eyes as her head lulled back onto the pillow, “Oh, god, it… it feels good. Really good. I don’t get it. How do Jessika and Tallie not want this?”

“Well there are certain toys they can use to replicate it.”

“Toys?” Rey asked in confusion.

“Huh, I guess sex toys weren’t part of Aletha’s sex ed talks. Ask the girls about them sometime.”

“I will.” She sighed in contentment, experimenting in lifting her hips up to meet his thrust, “I really like this. Like, a lot. How does it feel for you?”

“Oh, I… Uh,” Teng cleared his throat, “It’s good.”

“Teng,” she warned. “Tell me the truth.”

“The truth? Well, uh, the truth… The truth is that… This is the best thing I have ever felt in my life. Gods, you’re so tight and wet… I just want to slam into you so hard and fast.”

Rey moaned, “That sounds so hot.”

“Yeah, but that wouldn’t be very good for you. Not yet anyways. But still… oh, I can barely hold back.”

“Then let’s switch.”

“What?”

“Let’s move so I’m on top and can control the speed and depth. Does that sound good for you?”

The image of Rey slamming up and down his cock, breasts bouncing in his face filled Teng’s mind, “Yeah, I think I can agree to that.”

Rey moaned as he continued to thrust into her, “Oh, but that would involve you pulling out of me, and I don’t want that. I want you inside of me.”

Reluctantly, Teng stopped thrusting.
“Actually, I think I can manage that.” He hooked an arm around her waist, “If I just roll you like this-”

Teng quite gracefully threw Rey right off the bed.

“Ohops,” he stared at her lying naked and dazed on the floor. “My bad.”

Rey just laughed, “That’s alright. Accidents happen.”

“Speaking of,” Teng frowned at a spot of blood on the mattress. “Are you okay? There’s blood here.”

“Oh, Jessika said that was normal,” Rey waved off, climbing back onto the bed.

“Are you sure?”

“Positive,” Rey nodded. “My only worry is that it’s going to leave a stain.”

It would, and two years later Rey would have to very awkwardly explain to her uncle the origin of it... right in front of Luke, Finn, Chewbacca, and BB-8.

But we’re getting ahead of things.

They repositioned themselves, Rey mounting Teng with an intense moan of pleasure. The air was filled with moans, grunts, and squeaking of furniture as Rey lay across Teng, rolling her hips to move up and down his cock with increasing enthusiasm.

So much enthusiasm that Rey jerked upright, throwing her head back in pleasure, and smacking it right against the top of the bunk.

“Damn it,” Rey rubbed her head as Teng laughed beneath her. “Who designed this room?”

“Rey, this ship is a piece of garbage, what do you expect?”

“Next time we use the other bedroom.”

“There’s going to be a next time?”

“Fuck yes, there’s going to be another time,” Rey got back to work bobbing up and down his cock. “In fact, I don’t think I want to do anything else for now on but feel your cock drive in and out of me.”

“Oh fuck!” Teng cried. Rey wasn’t a saint, but he wouldn’t say she swore like a sailor. So to hear those words come out of her mouth just pushed him straight to the brink. “Fuck, Rey! I’m sorry, I... I’m think I’m about to- I can’t- I’m gonna- FUCK!”

Teng jerked up, head slamming into her shoulder as he climaxed.

“Fuck,” Teng panted as they lay together in bed. “I’m sorry that I-”

“It’s okay,” Rey placed a finger on his lips, dismounting him and moving to remove his condom. She tied it up and set it down on the floor to dispose of later. “The girls warned me that you might not last too long.”

“Did... did you want me to finish you off?” Teng shrugged to catch his breath.
“That’s alright. You got me once already,” Rey curled up at his side, pulling the blanket over them. “I just want to cuddle.”

“I can do that,” he wrapped his arms around her and held her tight.

And so they stayed that way for a long time, holding each other, whispering and laughing, just revelling in the feeling of skin against skin and hearts that beat as one.

“Oh, Starlight?” Teng whispered.

“Yes, Moonshine?”

“Happy birthday.”

And Rey smiled.

This moment on the Millennium Falcon where she and Teng just held each other, basking in the afterglow of the first time they made love… It was a moment she would carry with her to her dying days.

The benefits of working with Devi and Strunk were immediate, much to Rey’s initial annoyance. She was so used to being alone – ok, maybe she also had help sometimes from Luke, Quom, and Teng – having them around the ship – her ship – set her teeth on edge.

And Devi talked all the time, which made it worse.

“I thought you liked your girl talk,” Teng said when she complained about it one day.

“Not girl talk with Devi,” Rey replied.

But they were good salvagers, and there was no denying that fact. They knew the graveyard as well as Rey did, but like everyone working in the deserts of Jakku, they had discovered their own prime spots, their own special finds that they’d kept hidden from everyone else.

Many of the parts that Rey had begun to despair of ever repairing, let alone replacing, Devi and Strunk were able to produce in a matter of days.

They brought in the promised landing strut within the first twenty-four hours; three days later, they showed up in the afternoon dragging an entire repulsorlift complex that they’d pulled, whole, from a crashed Lambda-class shuttle. It was an Imperial design, never intended to incorporate with the Ghtroc’s systems, but it took Rey and Luke only another day and a half to fashion an interface converter.

But there were some things they couldn’t speed up the process on, and one of those things was the flight system. Rey needed to bring in Luke to help her with it, and they elected to fix it last. For one reason was that it was so complicated and would take a long time, but another reason was that Devi and Strunk couldn’t steal a ship that couldn’t fly.

Nearly a year after Rey had started work on her project, they’d replaced the missing port-side generator.

Rey and Luke went up to the cockpit to check that the systems had interfaced properly. She’d replaced the batteries for the main flight system months earlier, and the ship rested in a low-power... standby mode.

Devi and Strunk followed them, eager and excited, watching closely as Luke went quickly through the power-up sequence, then initiated the repulsorlift engines. Each of the three emitters had its own gauge, blue vertical bars that measured lift power in percentages, and the fore and starboard ones responded immediately, indicating that they were fully operational.

“Did it work?” Devi asked. “Is it working?”

Luke fiddled with the port-side controller, trying to get the jury-rigged engine in synch with the other two. Its power bar remained stubbornly empty and then, all at once, jumped to full. All of them felt the ship tremble beneath them, vibrating slightly. Grains of sand bounced off the repaired canopy of the cockpit and slid down the window.

Strunk whooped, cheering inarticulately, and Devi was laughing. Devi slapped Rey on the shoulder, which annoyed Rey, but she found herself smiling anyway. Luke chuckled and pulled in Rey for a hug.

“You are amazing, Mister Erso!” Devi said.

“Oh don’t look at me,” Luke said. “It was mostly Rey.”

“You are unbelievable, Rey!” Devi turned to her.

Rey squirmed awkwardly, “You guys helped.”

“Sure, if you call dragging chunks of starships across the desert helping!”

“Hey, it’s how I’ve made my living for twelve years,” Luke grinned.

“Come on, Rey!” Devi exclaimed. “You’re the one who put it all together. You’re the one who’s making this thing work!”

Rey blushed and caught her father’s eye. That smile of pride on his face just filled her heart.

“Alright, I guess I can take most of the credit,” Rey admitted, “But I didn’t do it alone.”

“Oh thank the Force,” Luke sighed. “You got my humility and not the Rhiaon arrogance.”

“Is the Rhiaon arrogance really that bad?”

“Remind me to talk you about my father-in-law sometime.”

“What are we waiting for, you guys?” Devi swung herself into the co-pilot’s chair and spun it around on its post. The chair creaked as it turned. “Let’s take her up!”

“Wait, what?” Rey blinked.

“What, now?” Strunk seemed to share Rey’s confusion. “Dev?”

“Sure, now,” Devi said. She swept one hand toward the view out the canopy. “Sun’s low enough. We stay level nobody’ll see us, right? They’ll be looking at the sun. Let’s do it! I want to see if it’ll really fly!”

Rey looked at the indicators on the console, the power levels, the temperature and pressure and flux gauges. The repulsors were idling, fully powered. The freighter was alive, trembling almost imperceptibly around them.

“I don’t know… Dad?”

Luke grinned, a thought occurring to him, “Well, I think it’s a good idea, but if we fly… you’re going to be the one to fly it.”

Rey blinked, “What? Are you serious?”

“Absolutely.” He gestured to the pilot’s seat, “Go on. Take the controls. You’ve got this.”

“You know you want to,” Devi said. “You totally know you want to, Rey.”

Rey put her hands on the yoke and licked her bottom lip. Her very blood was calling out to her to join the ranks of her father, grandfather, and uncles. She was born to be a pilot, and now it was time to fulfill that destiny.

“Just to make sure everything’s hooked up properly,” Rey said.

He secretly prayed that Rey didn’t end up taking after her mother and crash the ship, killing them all.

Rey settled her feet on the control pedals and reached with her right to disengage the static locks. A warning light came on to tell her that the ship wasn’t properly pressurized, and she switched it off, then reconfigured the controls for atmospheric flight.

Devi was watching her, grinning the same as ever. Strunk had moved to stand behind Devi’s seat and was holding on to the back of it so tightly Rey saw the color had gone out of his knuckles.

“First flight?” she asked him.

He nodded.

“Mine, too,” Rey said.

She looked up at him and smiled. He nodded down at her and reached her for in the Force.

“You can do this,” he whispered in her mind. “Breathe. Just breathe.”

Rey took a deep breath.

And then she cut the brakes.

She brought up the power on the repulsors, the way she had thousands of times before in simulations. The ship moved, rising in an almost perfectly straight line. Luke heard her gasp, but she had a goofy grin on her face that he recognized all too well.

Rey felt Jakku trying to pull her back down, her, Dad, Devi, and Strunk and the ship, too, as if afraid to let them go. She felt the ship wobble slightly as she held the yoke, felt the nose dip as she came off the pedals and directed the repulsor field to propel them forward. The little freighter hesitated, as if uncertain of its relationship with gravity.

Rey’s stomach dropped, and Strunk made a noise that sounded like a whimper and a moan
“Breathe. Just breathe,” Luke’s voice rang in her mind. Rey teased the power and fed more to the repulsors, and all at once they were sliding forward into the late afternoon sky. They were flying.

“I’m so proud of you,” her father’s words sung in her head. Rey didn’t know how many times he actually said it, but they rang in her head over and over like a song of love and pride.

She was really flying a ship.

“So amazing,” Devi whispered. Rey had to agree but couldn’t find the words.

According to the instruments, they were only fifty meters up and coasting at a sedate one-tenth acceleration, but the ship was alive in her hands and the world outside was changed because of it. The graveyard, the Crackle, the Spike, everything was recognizable yet entirely different seen from that new position. She could make out Niima on the horizon, the tiny specks of its huts and few buildings. She could see a lone Teedo and luggabeast traversing the desert away from the setting sun. She could see the sky changing colors, growing richer and deeper than it had ever looked from the ground.

“It works,” Devi said. “It scorchin’ well works, Rey!”

“It works,” Rey said softly.

All the repairs seemed to be holding. A few warning lights were flashing, but they were all nonessential systems they would never have the means on Jakku to fix. The engines were still in synch and at full power.

Luke bent down and actually whispered in her ear this time, “You did it Sweetheart… Now wait until you see how hyperspace feels.”

“Someday,” Rey smiled. “Someday.”

“I’m glad it works,” Strunk said. “Can we land again, please?”

Devi turned in her chair to look at him, “You big baby.”

“No, he’s right,” Rey said. “We don’t want to be seen, not yet.”

“Right, yeah.”

Luke frowned at the tone of Devi’s voice. There was something longing and regretful in it.

Rey banked the ship, the maneuver graceful and effortless, and circled back to where they’d lifted off. The sense of movement, the response of the freighter to her commands, had her smiling again. Her flight sim, for all its wonder and entertainment, had never captured that, and how could it? How could it have ever synthesized the reality of that freedom and power?
She set down the ship as gently as it had lifted off, powered down the engines in sequence, then put the main batteries back into standby mode. The sky had turned to dusk.

Devi got out of the co-pilot’s seat and clapped Rey on the shoulder again, “Mechanic and pilot, you do it all! C’mon, Strunk, let’s go home.”

“Yes, rest up you two,” Luke said. “With this fixed I think we’re finally all done.”

Rey’s eyes lit up and she shot out of her seat, “Are you serious?”

“Yes, Sweetheart,” Luke smiled. “You did it. You fixed this ship all up. I am so proud of you.”

Rey didn’t think she could stop smiling.

“But I’m still pissed about that disappearance stunt.”

Oh look, she could stop smiling.

“So, what do we do now?” Devi glanced at Strunk.

Luke didn’t like that glance.

Neither did Rey.

“Well, I think we should go and sell the ship to Unkar Plutt,” Rey said. “Oh, can you even imagine how many portions we’re going to get?”

“It’s going to be a lot.” Devi hesitated, “But… Are we sure we want to sell.”

Rey crossed her arms, “That was the deal. We can break it now and you get nothing, or you can follow it and get your portions.”

“The choice is yours,” Luke crossed his arms as well. They stared down at Devi in perfect genetic match.

Devi thought about it for a while and then smiled, “Of course we’ll continue our deal. I just wanted to make sure you weren’t regretting anything.”

Luke and Rey exchanged an identical unimpressed look.

“We should get going,” Devi grabbed Strunk’s arm. “See you tomorrow, Rey. It’s going to be so much fun!”

Without a word, Rey and Luke watched them disembark down the boarding ramp.

“Dad?” Rey said. “I have a bad feeling about this.”

Luke sighed, “Yeah… me too.”

Devi and Strunk once told me they were crossing the Sinking Fields at night and saw a nightwatcher that could have swallowed Niima. But I don’t believe that. Because those two swindlers have told me a lot of things.

- Rey’s Survival Guide
Unkar was waiting outside as she pulled up in her speeder. The ship was perfect and sitting behind her. She was so proud, especially when she saw the dumbstruck look on Plutt’s face. He blinked at her slowly, waiting until she'd shut off the speeder and hopped down. There would be no bending over for more portions this time.

“It’s a Ghtroc 690,” Rey said proudly. “Fully restored, working hyperdrive, everything but the laser cannon and the water tanks. Everything else fully operational, Unkar.”

He blinked at her again, then turned his heavy head to the side, looking toward the airfield.

That was when the sound of the engine reached her, and Rey turned to look, as well, just in time to see the Ghtroc rising into the air.

It ascended quickly, almost too fast. It banked hard, its nose jerking up. The main engines ignited, and a blue flare of ionized gases jetted from the aft end.

Then the Ghtroc was a dot in the blue sky.

Then it was gone.

Unkar grunted and headed back inside. Rey heard the outpost coming to life again around her, the voices of scavengers and vendors, Niima returning to normal.

Rey stood there a long time. When she finally moved it was to mount her speeder and drive home, back to the walker. She knew she should be angry, but she wasn’t.

She had been expecting it all along.

“NO!” Rey gasped as she shot up in bed.

Luke startled awake, half from the shout, and half some sensing her distress in the Force, “What? What is it?”

Rey panted hard, gripping her blankets, “Dad… I think I just had a vision.”

“Alright, is everyone ready?” Luke looked around the cockpit suspiciously. Devi, Strunk, and Teng were crammed all over behind Rey in the pilot’s seat.

“Ready,” Rey gave the thumb’s up.

“Then let’s go sell a ship,” Devi grinned.

So, Rey flew the Ghtroc 690 light freighter she had found, the spaceship she had spent the better part of a year reassembling, into Niima with Devi sitting in the co-pilot’s seat beside her, Teng and Strunk hovering behind them, and her father’s hands resting on her shoulders.

“I’m so proud of you, Sweetheart,” he whispered in her ear.
The hyperdrive was functional and communicating cheerfully with the navicomputer. The repulsor engines were humming along at optimal efficiency. The pressure seals on all the external access ways were tight, and the atmosphere was stable, steady, and comfortable. There were only two warning lights flashing on the console, and each was nonessential; one told Rey that the water tanks were empty.

“What does that one mean?” Teng pointed to the other light.

Luke grinned, “Just that the Ghtroc is overdue for its scheduled twenty thousand light-year maintenance.”

Devi and Teng burst out laughing.

They flew in from the south, Rey slowing so everyone in Niima could get a good look at the ship as it came in over the airfield. Almost every approach was from the east, and Rey knew that sharp-eyed observers would know the difference, would be wondering who they were and where they had come from.

She banked in a lazy loop around the little town, looking through the canopy at the activity below. Devi leaned forward, doing the same. They could see the small figures of scavengers and vendors emerging from their shelters and from beneath awnings, raising hands to shield their eyes from the glare of the sun.

“Think they’ve seen enough?” Rey asked.

“I think they’ve never seen anything like this,” Devi said.

“Oh, yeah haven’t even begun to see what this family is capable of with ships,” Luke chuckled.

Rey rolled the ship out of its turn and then, on a whim, gave the engines a sudden nudge. The freighter shot forward, the horizon vanishing from view as she brought the nose up. She turned the ship in a half loop, then rolled out of it and doubled back.

Devi whooped.

Teng clapped.

Strunk’s grip on the seats tightened.

Rey slowed once more as they reacquired the airfield and put the freighter into a hover, letting it turn in place. There was space between the Millennium Falcon and one of the newer, cleaner ships that Unkar had acquired.

With perfect precision Rey set it down so gently the landing gear didn’t make a sound as Jakku once more took the Ghtroc’s weight.

She worked the console quickly, excited, putting the ship into standby. Unkar would want to know it worked, that everything worked, and when Rey brought him aboard she wanted to be able to show off her work without delay.

Rey released the yoke and got to her feet, “Everyone ready?”

Teng, Devi, and Strunk replied affirmatively. None noticed the secret look exchanged between Luke “Then let’s go,” Rey grinned.

Devi and Strunk moved after her, and Luke and Teng headed towards the landing ramp. They would go out first, Luke leading an air of credence to the transaction, and Teng to extol her virtues to Plutt – which was something Teng excelled in.

But Rey… oh Rey had plans for a dramatic entrance worthy of the Skywalker she was.

They’d loaded her speeder into the main compartment. Rey mounted it and gave a thumb’s up. Strunk nodded and hit the release for the ramp.

As it lowered, Rey could see people gathered at the edge of the airfield, trying to get a look at the newcomers.

“Don’t let anyone else aboard,” Rey told Devi.

“Only me and Unkar, nobody else, no matter how much they promise, no matter how hard they beg,” Devi nodded.

Rey hesitated, “Devi? Strunk? …Thanks for all the help. I thought I couldn’t trust you, but you proved me wrong. I forgive you for the Fighting Ring incident.”

Devi’s smile fell, and with it, so did Rey’s heart.

She couldn’t believe that her suspicions were true.

“I’ll be right back,” Rey said.

“For all of us,” Rey nodded.

Then she gunned the speeder forward, down the ramp and out of the airfield, turning hard and fast toward Unkar’s place. Someone shouted as she passed, and a couple of the scavengers at the washing station burst into cheers when they saw her, understanding at once just how immense Rey’s accomplishment was.

She was smiling again, her cheeks aching, but that time she didn’t mind so much. Unkar was waiting with her father and Teng outside as she pulled up.

He blinked at her slowly, waiting until she’d shut off the speeder and hopped down.

“It’s a Ghtroc 690,” Rey said. “Fully restored, working hyperdrive, everything but the laser cannon and the water tanks. Everything else fully operational, Unkar.”

He blinked at her again, then turned his heavy head to the side, looking toward the airfield.

That was when the sound of the engine reached her, and Rey turned to look, as well.

“Oh no,” she whispered as her vision started to come true.

“It’s alright,” Luke put his hand on her shoulder. “We got it covered.”
“Come on, hurry, Strunk,” Devi said from the pilot’s chair as they madly flipped switches and pressed buttons. “We gotta get this ship off the ground.”

“Ahem!” a deep voice cleared their throat.

The two scavengers’ eyes went wide, and in unison they turned around. Standing at the entrance of the cockpit was Quom Tinadar.

“Going somewhere?” Quom asked, flashing his teeth.

“Uh…” Strunk stared at him in fear.

Devi just looked confused, “Where did you come from?”

“You really should double check your bunk room before you take off. I was quite enjoying my nap.”

“You were… having a nap?” Devi repeated nervously.

“Well, kind of. Mostly keeping guard because Rey, Luke, Teng, and I aren’t stupid enough to actually trust you alone with a functional ship. Now,” he took a step forward and the pair winced. “What are we going to do with the two of you backstabbers?”

What happened next wasn’t pretty, but Devi and Strunk learned that you didn’t ever want to cross a girl who called a Vrogem Uncle.

“That bitch!”

“Jessika, language!” Aletha scolded her.

“Oh, I am not apologizing for calling her a bitch.”

“I just don’t believe it,” Kaydel said. “They really were going to steal the ship?”

“If it wasn’t for Dad I would be standing here empty handed right now,” Rey said. “Well, and Quom. The mess he left of those two was not pretty. Dad’s only instructions were don’t kill them and Quom took that literally. I’m not surprised they betrayed me, though. I knew Devi was devious and she wanted the ship.”

“Still, what a bitch,” Paige said.

“Okay, I will cut this transmission if you ladies don’t clean up your language,” Aletha warned.

“Aunt Ally,” Kaydel said kindly, “Paige and I just had a twenty-minute conversation about whose boyfriend was better at going down on them. I don’t think a few bitches is going to ruin our innocence.”

There was a long pause like Aletha was considering something.

“…Who won?” Aletha meekly asked.

“Tallie,” Jessika sounded too proud.
Rey just laughed.

“Anyway, Kira, tell us what happened next,” Rose urged.

“Ok, so Plutt tried to make me an offer, but Dad interrupted and said-”

“Sweetheart, did you want me to fill up your speeder?” Luke suddenly entered the walker. “I’ve got some leftover gas from mine and-”

He stopped in his tracks when he saw Rey frozen in shock on her hammock holding a comm.

“Uh, no, nothing at all,” Rey lied.

“Sunshine, what’s going on?” Aletha asked, her voice ringing out in the walker painfully for Rey.

Luke raised an eyebrow.

“That’s a recording I made of Aletha, Dad,” Rey grinned.

“With what?”

“Uh… Quom helped me?”

Luke crossed his arms, “Sweetheart, stop that wide, false grin. I don’t appreciate you literally lying through your teeth. Now you’re going to look me in the eye and tell me that you’re holding Antar Kymeri’s personal comm and communicating to Aletha.”

“How do you know that?” Rey asked.

“Because I walked in on you talking to her over a year ago, Kira. In fact, I’ve walked in many times and you’ve never noticed. I leave it alone because I know they call you Kira, so clearly you’re protecting your identity, and hey, I figure you could use the female influence on your life. But I don’t like you lying to me. I’m going to let this go, but I know that you are talking to Aletha. In fact, I know you’re talking to more than Aletha.”

“More?”

“Yeah, you’re talking to Aletha, someone named Rose, Aletha’s niece, Kaydel… and two other girls whose names escape me at the moment.”

“Whoa,” Rose sounded starstruck. “He knows my name.”

“Rose, shut up!” Jessika scolded.

Aletha’s voice chuckled over the comm, “Well, I guess the cat’s out of the bag. It’s good to hear your voice again, Erso.”

Luke smiled, knowing she didn’t use his first name as a safety measure, “It’s wonderful to hear yours too, Aletha. You keeping out of trouble?”

“Not in the slightest.”

“Good,” he grinned. “You ladies having fun with your chat?”
“As always,” Kaydel laughed. “It’s nice to finally put a voice to all the stories I’ve heard from Kira and Aunt Ally?”

“Oh?” Luke lifted an eyebrow at the blushing Rey. “And what stories have you been telling?”

“I think my favorite is when you beat the shit out of the Jarex guy,” Jessika said. “When you cut in speaking Huttese, oh, it’s so beautiful. I wish I had seen it.”

“It was a bit of an adventure,” Luke said. “Alright, well, I don’t mean to cut in on girl time. Kira, you want me to fill up your speeder?”

“Sure,” Rey answered. “Thanks, Dad.”

“No problem,” he bent down and kissed her forehead. “Now if only we can figure out what to do with your new ship. I don’t think we’ll get our money’s worth from Plutt. If only we knew someone else who wanted to buy a ship.”

“Actually,” Aletha cut in, “I have a suggestion.”

Luke paid a merchant an exorbitant amount to take Devi and Strunk with him the next morning. They didn’t know where they were headed, but they also didn’t particularly care. Anywhere was better than Jakku.

Rey saw them off, glaring at them the whole time as Teng stood patiently by her side.

“I’m glad to be rid of them,” Teng confessed as the merchant’s ship became an increasingly smaller dot in the sky. “I don’t think I could have survived another one of her tricks.”

“It’s a shame really,” Rey sighed, resting her head on his shoulder. “It would be nice to have a girl friend that isn’t just a voice on a comm, a weird ghost thing that appears randomly, or a pseudo mom figure who dates my dad. If I didn’t have you guys around, this whole situation might have embittered me towards friendship.”

“Nah, made you more guarded, but not embittered you. You’re too full of hope to let that happen. It’s one of the reasons I love you.”

“And it’s one of the reasons I love you,” Rey pressed a kiss to his lips.

Teng chuckled when they reluctantly broke apart, “My optimism, really? Well, that solves the mystery of why you like me. I was starting to think your friend Jessika’s theory of you liking me simply because I was the only guy around your age was true.”

“Nah, it’s your optimism, your generousness, and your ability to hand me the exact right tool from the toolbox on the first try.”

“I do excel at that.” Teng looked down at Rey as she gave a loud exhale. The ship was completely gone, “Better?”

“Much,” Rey nodded. “Now, come on, I’m running late for the ship’s price negotiation.”

He frowned, “Didn’t you decide against selling to the Blobfish yesterday?”

“Oh, I’m not selling to the Blobfish.”

“What? Who are you selling to?”
“I’m happy you decided to contact us, Miss Kira,” Diego Nalto sat straight and stiff at his desk. Even though he was just speaking to a voice on a comm – Kira had refused to switch to visual for some reason – he still looked as professional as ever.

“Actually it was Aletha’s idea,” Rey’s voice replied.

Diego nodded to his girlfriend seated across the desk from him. “Thank you, My Querida. The Resistance is always on the lookout for additional resources.”

“Just as long as one of those resources isn’t Kira herself,” Aletha gave him a playful smile.

“Oh, trust me, I learned my lesson during the treason interrogation. I was apologizing to you and Rose for months.”

“Isn’t that how Rose ended up getting her own private room?” Rey asked.

Aletha nodded, “Diego pulled some strings to get Rose an upgrade to a nice one bed unit with private fresher. Nowhere near as fancy as myself or Poe’s rooms. More on the level of Hot Shot’s room before Paige moved in with him.”

“Rose and I called things even after that,” Diego concluded, a small scowl on his face. “That was not fun to justify to Leia and Holdo.”

“Holdo? …Oh, is that the one whose office Poe and Kaydel broke into and they wrecked her chair?”

“Dameron was responsible for that?” Diego exclaimed.

Aletha rolled her eyes, “Oh, don’t act like you didn’t already suspect it. The only person who hasn’t figured it out was Amilyn herself.”

Diego opened his mouth, paused to think, and then closed it.

“Fair point,” he conceded. “So, Kira, what kind of ship are you offering up?”

“It’s a Ghtroc Industries 690 freighter. An older model but runs so beautifully.”

“I’m proud of you, Re- Kira,” Aletha caught herself. She was used to censoring Rey’s name in the company of the girls, but not so much Diego.

“A 690?” Diego thought about it. “A freighter, right? Made for a crew of one, carrying a maximum of three passengers. Cargo capacity, what… 50 metric tons?”

“60,” Rey corrected.

Diego glanced at Aletha, “It’s not quite what we’re looking for. If it were larger or a fighter then we’d be in business. But a 690, I’m going to be honest, it’s barely worth the effort it would take to collect it, maintain it, and fuel it. I’m not saying never but at the moment it’s not something the budget would allow for.”

Aletha’s eyes slipped shut as she imagined the heartbreak Rey was suffering at the news.

“But it’s operational,” Rey sounded lost. “Flies and everything. Couldn’t you use it for small missions and undercover service?”

