Summary

Before vanishing, Luke Skywalker decided to make a detour to Jakku and collect the body of his reportedly dead daughter, Rey, only to find her alive. With hope renewed, Luke stayed on Jakku to raise and protect her from the First Order, while hiding their past from Rey. But while he waits for the day the Force awakens, he begins a chain of events that changes the story entirely.

Notes
Warning: If you're here for just Luke being in The Force Awakens, that's not going to start for a very long time. This is the story of a father and daughter fighting to stay together after being torn apart.
A Peaceful Night

Chapter Summary

While Luke is away on Jedi business, a peaceful night at the Skywalker residence turns into a nightmare.

Chapter Notes

Before I start, I’d like to explain that for Luke’s wife and Rey’s mother, I’m operating under the theory that she will be the main character of Rogue One. Since her name has yet to be revealed, I’m using the name of Felicity Rhiaon after the actress who will play her (Felicity Jones). Felicity is the subject of some photosets and oneshots I’ve written so I will refer to those from time to time (including ones I haven’t written yet) so you might want to check them out.

The Long Way Home

Chapter One

A Peaceful Night

We like to think that major turning points are always foretold by some dramatic sign. A birth is announced with the break of dawn, healing with a flower’s bloom, and a tragedy with a thunderstorm. Perhaps that is why the metaphor of weather reflecting a situation is called a pathetic fallacy. Because frankly, it’s pathetic to think the weather cares about someone’s insignificant life.

The day Luke Skywalker came into possession of R2-D2 and C-3PO started with Uncle Owen yelling at him to get up. The day Han Solo met Ben Kenobi started with yet another piece of the Falcon breaking. And Leia Organa… Well, she had always had a rather exciting life, so the fact the day she received the plans to the Death Star started by getting shot at by Imperial Forces wasn’t out of the ordinary.

By all rights of literature, the massacre of the Jedi should have been marked by a hurricane, but was not. The weather had been perfect, and day free of anything but the most minor of transgressions.

The Jedi lived in a community called Temple Village on the planet of Rornian. Temple Village was not an academy but rather a place to live and learn. The Jedi shared their knowledge in the Temple, which was located in the center of the village. In addition to the resident Jedi who trained there, all were welcome to come and learn about the Force regardless of their Force Sensitivity. Lor San Tekka, a friend of Luke’s and religious leader of the Church of the Force, had established a branch of the Church on Rornian specifically to encourage non-Force Sensitives to visit.

Temple Village and the New Jedi Order had been a labour of love that took sixteen years for Luke Skywalker to build. Though both the village and the Order had had its ups and downs, there were few things Luke was prouder of. It was especially evident in the placement of his home.

On the north edge of the village, set a few yards away from the beginning of the forest’s treeline resided the Skywalker home. It sat on a slope that overlooked Temple Village with pride. Some might have thought the placement sent the message that Luke thought himself above his students, but a well groomed path led straight from the Temple to Luke’s front door. A gate sat at the edge of the house’s front lawn, but it was ornamental, always remaining open as a symbol that no matter the hour, Luke would always welcome his students inside.

Though more opulent a residence than that of the Jedi Knights of the past, the small house was relatively modest, reflecting the family who lived there. Two floors, two bedrooms for the family, and one for guests, a refresher on each level, a combination kitchen and dining room, a small living room, an office for Luke’s wife, a front and back lawn, various charge ports for Artoo, toys scattered every which way by Luke’s daughter, and a garage that usually housed Luke’s X-Wing, but that night sat empty.

“When’s Daddy coming home?” Rey Skywalker – the youngest resident of the home – asked as her mother tucked her into bed.

“Twenty-two days,” Felicity Rhiaon Skywalker shook her head with an amused smirk. “One less from the amount I told you when you asked last night.”

Rey adored her father, and hated whenever Luke had to leave her behind. Felicity always insisted to Rey that neither of her parents would ever abandon her, but Rey was five and not quite mature enough yet to understand. Luke would always laugh whenever his wife told him of Rey’s uncertainty and say that there was nothing more they could do at that time, and that it did only made the reunions all that much better.

“When did he go away?” Rey asked.

“For reasons that would only bore you,” Felicity answered.

“Aunt Leia Senate stuff?”

“Aunt Leia Senate stuff,” Felicity nodded. “Now enough questions. It’s time to go to sleep.”

“But you and Daddy say to never be afraid to ask questions.”

“Yes, but Daddy and I also know when you’re only using questions to delay going to sleep.”

“I’m not doing that,” Rey tried to look as innocent as possible.

“Sweetheart, I gave you that false innocence look. Don’t you dare try using it against me.”

Rey pouted, “How come it works when Daddy looks at you like that?”

“Uh… I’ll tell you when you’re older,” Felicity hastily answered. “Now go to sleep.”

“But I’m not tired!” Rey’s declaration might have been convincing had it not been concluded with an enormous yawn.

“Sure you aren’t,” Felicity dryly replied.

“Okay, I might be a little sleepy,” Rey confessed. “But I would be even sleepier if I heard a story.”
Felicity shook her head and smiled, “Fine, one story but then you sleep. It’ll be short, and I pick the story to ensure it is. We’re not having another ‘Mommy, tell me the entire story of Anakin Skywalker’ incident.”

“Deal,” Rey settled into her bed.

“Alright,” Felicity tucked Rey in, “how about I tell you about the time I led the team that stole the plans to the first Death Star?”

Seven hooded figures stood on the edge of the forest surrounding Temple Village.

Their focus was directed on the dormitory and handful of houses where the other Jedi lived. But one of those hooded figures – a mere sixteen-year-old boy – had his eyes locked upon the Skywalker residence.

It was a place he once called home – or at least the place he lived. The house was also the dwelling of the two people he hated most in the universe: Rey and Felicity Rhiaon Skywalker.

“You’re certain they’re alone?” one of the hooded figures asked the boy.

“Positive,” the boy nodded. “Uncle Luke’s- I mean, Skywalker’s presence in the Force is too great for me to miss. The girls are alone.”

“This is your chance to prove yourself to us, Kylo,” another hooded figure said. “If this information is wrong-”

“It’s not wrong!” Kylo snapped. “I’ve upheld my end of the bargain, and I expect that you’ll keep up your end.”

“We have an understanding then,” the first hooded figure said. He looked behind himself at the others and declared, “Knights of Ren! Tonight we cleanse the universe of this hypocritical, archaic teaching of the Force. If Kylo’s information proves to be correct, we will accept him into our ranks as our most junior Knight, Kylo Ren. Knights of Ren, do whatever you wish to the other Jedi, but remember that the daughter of Luke Skywalker must die! As for his wife, Rhiaon, our newest member has claimed the right to end her life. Do not fail me, Knights!”

Had this moment been from a story, the battle cry would have been accented with a thunderclap.

“After nearly a month of hiding out on Jakku and working for that terrible Unkar Plutt, Diego and I were finally able to contact the Alliance and transmitted the battle plans to your Aunt Leia,” Felicity concluded her story.

“Then what happened?” Rey asked as if she had not heard the story a thousand times before.

“Well, the Alliance sent a pilot called Shara Bey to come pick us up. Diego and I were taken to a medic ship where we recovered from the mission and mourned the deaths of our other team members. Diego finally admitted that he had respect for me, and we became the best of friends.”

“And what happened to the Death Star plans?”

Felicity shot her daughter a look, “You know very well what happened to the plans. They went to Daddy, who, with Uncle Han’s help, rescued Aunt Leia and brought the plans to the Alliance. But that’s another story for another night. Now, enough, Rey. It’s bed time. No more stories, no more questions, just close your eyes and go to sleep.”

“Fine,” Rey crossed her arms and slumped back against her pillow with an adorably pouty look.

“Goodnight, Sweetheart,” Felicity laughed and kissed Rey’s forehead. Rey reluctantly kissed her mother’s cheek as Felicity gave the covers a once over, pulling and smoothing the sheets to ensure Rey would be warm and comfortable. “I’ll see you in the morning.”

“Night, Mommy.”

Felicity made her way to the door and was about to push the button to turn off the lights when suddenly Rey spoke.

“Mommy?” Rey’s voice was different from a moment before. It was small and sad, as if she was afraid to pose the question that had been gnawing away at her mind for weeks, “Why did Ben leave?”

Felicity’s mouth went dry. How could she possibly explain to Rey what had happened to their family?

“Ben…” Felicity began reluctantly. “Ben decided he had to go away for a while. He was having some trouble with accepting Daddy’s teachings of the Force.”

“Like you?”

“No,” Felicity shook her head. “Not like me.”

Felicity’s doubts about the extent of the Force’s reach had become something almost legendary after her marriage to Luke. The Jedi Grandmaster’s wife rejecting the destiny aspect of the Force yet still having a healthy marriage with said Grandmaster was almost too hard to believe. But Luke and Felicity had long ago discussed her reasons for her beliefs and learned how to live with opposing views.

Ben Solo’s views on the other hand, were a little too hard to swallow.

Felicity sighed, “Rey, what happened with Ben is too complicated for you to understand right now.”

Rey scowled, “You and Daddy say that all the time. I’m not stupid!”

“No one said you were but there are some things about the past that you might not be able to grasp just yet. It’s why the night I told you about Grandfather Skywalker that story took so long.” Felicity muttered to herself, “Maybe if Luke hadn’t insisted on me editing out so much. Whatever happened to let’s never lie to Rey, Felicity? Or was him saying a certain point of view nearly destroyed me just a load of-”

Felicity suddenly remembered Rey was staring at her.

“What I’m trying to say is that we will explain everything when you get to be a little older. Kind of how Daddy won’t let you learn lightsaber until you’re older. We know nothing bad is going to intentionally happen, but you haven’t grown enough to know how to handle things properly and you might accidentally get hurt. But I promise you, Rey, neither Daddy or I will ever hold back information from you because we want you to get hurt. Do you understand?”

Rey gave a small nod, “Yes, Mommy.”
Felicity sighed, weighing her next course of action, “Maybe… maybe when Daddy gets home, you, me, and him can sit down and have a talk about Ben. Think you can wait that long?”

“Twenty-two days?”

“Twenty-two days.” Felicity pressed the button to turn off the lights and whispered, “Goodnight, Sweetheart. I love you.”

“I love you too, Mommy,” a voice in the darkness called back.

Felicity smiled, comforted by the thought that her daughter was nestled safe and sound under the protective covers of her bed.

Felicity never dreamed that hours later she would be woken by Rey’s shriek as she was forcibly dragged kicking and screaming from the safety of those covers.

“Come on, come on!” Luke banged his mechanical hand against the computer of his X-Wing. The words Transmission Failed blinked mockingly at him from the screen.

Luke was not at home the night the Knights of Ren attacked. The Knights of Ren had timed it perfectly; they had waited for Luke to leave the small Jedi settlement without his protection. It happened the midnight of the eighth day of a month long meeting between Luke and the Senate determining the extent of Jedi authority as a governmental agent. Luke had been preparing for the meeting for over a year, and thus his focus was not on protecting his students and family.

What they didn’t plan on was Luke coming home early.

Luke had been woken at the crack of dawn by a Force Vision of the Temple of Rornian burning, and the residents of Temple Village slaughtered on a rainy battlefield. Immediately Luke had tried to contact Felicity, but found communications had been blocked to their home. He had spent the next hour trying every possible means of communication to Temple Village, but nothing could get through.

With some profuse apologies to the Senate, Luke had immediately jumped into his X-Wing with Artoo and set a course for home.

“Artoo, try the transmission again!” Luke ordered sharply, his voice getting more desperate.

He waited nervously as Artoo attempted to make communication with any device on Rornian, but once again was met with failure. Despite the consistent results, Luke had been trying non-stop his whole journey home to find some way to communicate with Rornian.

“Someone must have hacked into the communication center blocked the channels,” Luke muttered to himself as the words Transmission Failed refused to leave his screen. “Artoo keep trying, but connect me back with Leia in the meanwhile.”

Artoo gave a few beeps, and after a minute of crackling over the radio, a familiar voice was transmitted into Luke’s headset.

“Luke, this is Leia,” his sister’s voice was perfectly political – worried enough to show she cared, but strong enough to broadcast that she wasn’t shaken into a helpless wreck. “Have you had any luck?”

“Negative,” Luke replied. “I’m still being blocked. Have you gotten a hold of anyone to check things out?”
Unfortunately, Luke had no one he could ask to go check on Temple Village while he raced to get back. Temple Village was the only place on the planet Rornian inhabited with sentient creatures, and the only other body in the Rornian Star System was a small uninhabited moon orbiting Rornian. The surrounding systems had no one friendly to the Jedi Order, as since the opening of the Rornian Jedi Temple, the First Order had been overtaking the surrounding systems, getting uncomfortably close to Luke and his students. It was an action Leia heavily warned Luke about, but only once it had become a problem did Luke regret not doing anything about it.

“None that can reach them yet,” Leia answered. “I’ve got both Wedge Antilles and Diego Nalto en route, and Han and I will set off in about an hour – I’ve just finished cleaning up the political mess you left behind and the Falcon is… well, being the Falcon.”

“Sorry about leaving you with such a hassle regarding the Senate,” Luke apologized. “It’s just the vision-”

“Thirty minutes.”

“Alright, keep me updated on the situation.”

“I will,” Luke promised. “And if you don’t hear from me in an hour-”

“I’ve already got Republic troops on standby,” Leia cut in knowingly. “But I do hope this is only a false alarm.”

Luke sighed, “Me too.”

“Good luck, Luke. May the Force be with you.”

“And with you,” Luke ended the transmission as he pulled out of hyperspace and Rornian came into view. “Artoo begin the landing cycle. Cut off any unnecessary processes, and get us home is quickly as possible.”

The attack on Temple Village was so horrifying, Rey would block out most of her memories of that night. Even years later, when she began to uncover the truth of her past and the things her father had hidden from her, there were still parts of that night she could never recall.

Rey didn’t know how she went from being dragged out of bed in the dead of night to laying on the training field. Rain pelted her as she looked around in shock and horror. The bodies of her friends and Daddy’s students laid unmoving around her with horrible bloody injuries.

Frantically she crawled over to the nearest person, a Zygerrrian named Zena Halcorr. Zena was one of Daddy’s best fighters and had helped him recruit nearly half the Order.

Rey turned Zena over. Zena felt cold and had a large slash across her chest. Rey was young enough to understand injury, but as Zena’s eyes stared unseeing at the stars above, Rey didn’t understand the signs of death.

To her, death was a foreign concept. She knew of death: both Daddy and Mommy’s parents were dead, and so was Mommy’s brother, a man Rey was supposed to call Uncle Brendan. Daddy’s teachers Masters Yoda and Kenobi were dead. The Evil Emperor Palpatine was dead. Mommy’s friends, Ji-Dan, Riz, and Gunner from her team to steal the Death Star plans were dead. Uncle Han often said if they hadn’t heard from Uncle Lando in several months, that probably meant he was dead (or at least in trouble.) But Rey had never encountered real death before. To her, death was simply a person going away, never to be found again.

But in that moment, as she held the shoulders of Zena Halcorr, Rey was forced to face the reality of death. Death was not someone disappearing – unless you were like Grandpa Anakin, or Master Kenobi – death was an ending. A shell left behind, and an entire life coming to an abrupt halt. It was undignified, it was never by choice, and it could never be reverse.

Zena Halcorr was just gone.

“No!” Rey being so young couldn’t accept it. She shook Zena’s still body hard, “Wake up! Wake up, Master Halcorr!”

Zena would never wake.

But there was another thing that Rey failed to understand; her screaming for Zena to wake up had attracted attention.

“Get down!” someone screamed at her.

Rey spun around to just in time to see a red lightsaber drive through the back of a Jedi Padawan named Genko.

“NO!” Rey screamed in terror as Genko fell to the ground, unmoving like Zena.

Lost and disoriented, Rey rose to her feet and looked to see Genko’s source of death. Seven black clad figures stood before her in the rain, slaughtering every man, woman, and child they could find.

A loud clap of thunder rang out as the rain fell upon the training field, washing away the stains of blood. In the distance, Rey saw the Jedi Temple burning, as well as her home on the slope.

Looking around wildly, Rey could not see her mother anywhere. In fact, the only people in sight were the seven black figures. Of course, taking another look around at the bodies, Rey knew that there weren’t enough for everyone in Temple Village to be dead… but the number of missing people was very small.

Rey was at the complete mercy of the seven figures.

“MOMMY! WHERE ARE YOU?” Rey screamed for her mother, too young to understand the danger of her actions.

The figure whose red lightsaber had ended the life of Genko looked to her. Rey took a few steps back in fear. For some reason, the figure seemed familiar.

He started forward at her, and Rey could sense his intentions were of the Dark Side.

Pathetically raised her arms to shield her face from the figure, meekly withdrawing. She barely registered that between her tears she was softly begging the boy to spare her life.

“Please, no!”

The figure backed her away from the battlefield until she was pinned against a trunk at the edge of the treeline. A path to her left led deep into the dark forest. It was a path she knew Mommy and Daddy had forbidden her from going down alone, but in that moment it was her only escape. If only she could get around the dark figure.
“Rey,” the monster said in a mechanical voice that Rey couldn’t recognize, yet still felt familiar something, “I’m sorry. This isn’t personal.”

The monster was suddenly ripped backwards, crashing back to the ground.

Rey frowned, looking around in confusion before setting her eyes on a glorious sight. Daddy’s second-in-command, Jedi Master, Reine Agim had Force Pushed the monster away from Rey.

“Rey! Run!” Reine yelled as she rushed towards the monster in black.

Rey glanced at the monster. His helmet had been knocked slightly askew, and he was gently stirring. Black curls spilled out of the helmet, but as Reine screamed again for Rey to run, Rey took her chance. Rey dashed down the forbidden path as fast as her little legs could carry her.

The monster who called himself Kylo Ren pushed himself off the ground. He fiercely swung his saber at Reine as she advanced on him, trying to drive him away from Rey.

Kylo’s cousin had disappeared into the dark forest, and unfortunately his helmet made it difficult to see through the moonlit branches. With a growl, he pushed Reine back and ripped off his helmet. Tossing it to the ground, he decided it would be better if her just came and collected it again later.

Everyone looked up. A familiar X-Wing had appeared in the sky, and was preparing to land.

Kylo frowned, “How did he know to come back?”

Reine and Kylo looked at each other. The same thought went through their minds.

Kylo was quicker, slashing Reine across the abdomen before she could defend herself. She stumbled back, clutching at her wound. It was not fatal… but it was only a matter of time before it would be.

Smirking at her, Kylo told Reine, “Tell my Uncle I said hello.”

Then dashed down the path after Rey.

Reine looked helplessly after the boy she used to call Ben. She didn’t have much time; the wound was already getting to her. There was no way she could both save Rey, and find Luke in time to help him. Weighing her options frantically, blood seeped her tunic and began staining her arm as if to say make your choice NOW.

So she did. She knew that the forest had enough twists and turns for Rey to be able to shake off Ben for a while. Luke was the priority; he needed help. He needed to know what had happened, and where the survivors were.

Reine turned in the direction of Luke’s X-Wing, and made a run for it.

She only prayed that Luke would be able to find Rey before Ben did.

Chapter End Notes
Ok, I know what you’re all thinking. Isn’t this supposed to be Luke in the Force Awakens? Why aren’t we in the events of the Force Awakens? I will admit that the Force Awakens material doesn’t actually start up until roughly chapter eight as there’s a lot of backstory to set up. I really feel like I need to show how Luke got separated from Rey, how she ended up on Jakku, why Kylo freaks out at hearing about a girl on Jakku, why Luke wouldn’t go looking for Rey, and how Rey could be left behind for so long. So, I’m sorry if you have to wait a while for the actual Force Awakens material, but I’m aiming for shorter chapter for this fic that I hope it doesn’t end up taking too long to get there.
Lost to Flame

The Long Way Home

Chapter Two

Lost to Flame

Luke could see the flames from the Temple the second he broke atmosphere. His stomach lurched at the sight. Sixteen years of hard work had literally gone up in flame.

How could he have been so stupid? Why would he leave when he knew Ben was out there plotting revenge? Luke had brushed aside the thought of exactly how angry Ben could have been. Ben hadn’t left over much, but it was the culmination of the Dark that had been building in him over the years.

As Luke stared at the Temple, another flame flickered in the distance. The Skywalker Residence too was burning. For the second time in his life, Luke had returned to find his home burnt down. He prayed that he would not find his wife and daughter in the same condition he found his aunt and uncle.

The scene before him became clearer as his ship came ever closer to the ground. Had he not have been locked in the cockpit of an X-Wing, Luke would have vomited. Flames, blood, and bodies littered the village. Everything Luke had worked for was gone in the most violent way possible. Even worse, it was clear that the attack was targeted to Luke specifically. Only his temple and home had been set on fire; the rest of the buildings looked fine on the outside. Luke feared what he would find on the inside: especially in the dormitory and residences.

Luke felt like he had been stabbed. No, not stabbed. Something much different.

It felt like his hand had been cut off.

Yes, an important part of him had been violently removed, and there was no way to return it. Sure, he could start anew and replace it, as he had replaced the hand he had really lost, but it would never be the same as before. A part of him was gone forever.

“Artoo, contact Leia!” Luke ordered. “Tell her to send the troops immediately.”

But Artoo beeped back that he couldn’t get out a signal. Luke’s communications were being blocked.

“Alright, when we land I want you to get to the Communication Center and stop whatever’s blocking signals to and from the planet.”

“No, Artoo, you can’t come with me!” Luke snapped. “I need you at the Communication Center.”

“Leave the attackers to me, and do what I tell you to!” Luke sighed, taking a minute to calm himself, “I’m sorry, I shouldn’t take this out on you, but I need you to listen to me. Please, Artoo.”

Artoo bleeped again.

“I’ll be fine. Please, go.”

Artoo let out a mechanical noise that sounded very much like a sigh, and then sounded his agreement.

Rey ran as fast as she could, darting and weaving through the dark branches. She had no idea where she was going. The monster was long gone, and she could barely see a thing, but still, she ran.

A Knight of Ren was waiting for Luke. Luke had barely unbuckled his seatbelt when Zhan Ren fired a blast at the ship.

Luke pulled his saber from his belt, and ignited the brilliant emerald blade as he jumped from the cockpit. A crimson blade locked with his before Luke’s feet had even touched the ground.

“Jedi scum!” Zhan spat, pressing forward his advance.

Artoo beeped at Luke as he was lowered from the ship. He rolled straight up to Zhan and zapped him in the leg.

“Stupid, Astro Droid!” Zhan clutched his tingling leg.

He moved to strike at Artoo, but Luke swung at him, causing Zhan to leap back. Artoo let out a raspberry at the Knight Ren before rolling away at top speed.

Zhan was a strong fighter, sparring and clashing fiercely with the Jedi, but he was no match for Luke Skywalker. Every attack was met with a solid defense. Every swing was met with a carefully timed dodge. Though Zhan’s saber moves swung forward wildly, Luke’s footwork was stronger. Zhan hadn’t realised that Luke was forcing him backward until Zhan was pinned against a tree with Luke’s blade an inch from his throat.

“I have no intention of killing you,” Luke calmly stated. “I don’t kill unless it’s in defense. Instead you’re going to answer a few questions. Who are you, and why are you here?”

Zhan smirked, “You’re an honourable man. Too bad honour wasn’t enough to save your family.”

Pain shot through Luke’s wrist as something stabbed him. Luke looked down; Zhan had thrust a small viroblade into the circuitry of Luke’s false hand. He tried to move his artificial limb, but it would not respond.

“Think I might take the other one off,” Zhan smirked as he pinned Luke’s left hand against the tree. “Take a little trophy.”

Luke tried to fight back. He used the Force to push at Zhan with his left hand, but Zhan pinning it rendered the attack mostly useless. Luke tried to shove at him, but Zhan was a man made broad by muscle, and Luke could not get the advantage. He considered kicking at Zhan, but if he lost his balance, Luke has good as dead.

Screams filled the air as the viroblade bit into Luke’s flesh.

Luke heard a familiar snap-hiss and an arc of yellow-green light swung across, cleaving Zhan’s head from his neck.

Zhan’s body dropped to the ground, and Luke saw Reine standing before him. She held her ignited lightsaber in her right hand, as her left arm tightly gripped her torso. Reine smiled at Luke, but there was a pain in her eyes and her stature looked weak.

Luke rushed forward and caught her a second before she hit the ground.

“I-” Reine couldn’t find the words. So she winced, and moved her left arm away from her body.

Luke’s eyes went wide as they set on the large, bloody lightsaber gash.

“It’s the Knights of Ren,” Reine said, struggling to hold on to life for a few more minutes. “I’m sorry, Luke. I’ve failed you, Master Skywalker.”

“No!” Luke cried out. “No, Reine! You’ll be fine!”

Of all the Jedi that could have come stumbling into his arms that night, why did it have to be Reine?

Reine had been the first Jedi Luke ever recruited. A willowy brunette with light eyes, Reine too had fought in the Rebellion. Like with Felicity, Luke didn’t meet Reine until after the Empire had fallen. About a month after the Battle of Endor, Reine had awkwardly approached Luke, having been introduced through a friend of a friend.

“It’s an honour to meet you, Master Skywalker,” Reine had said as she and Luke shook hands.
“I’ve heard a deal about you.”

“Thank you, Miss Agim,” Luke had nodded at her. “What can I do for you today?”

“Well, this is sort of awkward, but... I think I might be Force Sensitive.”

Force Sensitive she was indeed. Reine had had her suspicions for years, and after hearing of Luke’s exploits had debated whether or not to approach him for training. She eventually settled to wait until the Empire was defeated when it would be safe for her to train as a Jedi.

Reine became Luke’s best friend among the Jedi, and served as his faithful second-in-command. Often she found herself in charge of Temple Village while Luke was away, and in fact had been the first person to move into residence.

She had been very much a guinea pig for Luke as he learned how to pass on what he had learned about the Jedi and the Force. It had been a lot of trial and error, but Reine had been patient and a quick learner, eventually being the first permitted to take on a padawan. Luke had rewarded her by constructing the very first house of Temple Village specifically for Reine, and it had gone up before even the dorms.

Of all the Jedi, Reine was the last person Luke wanted to see dying in his arms from a lightsaber wound.

“It’s alright, Luke,” Reine smiled gently at him. “I’ll be alright. I’m going to be one with the Force.”

“No, there has to be something I can do to save you!” Luke urged.

Reine shook her head, “Luke, please listen to me. You cannot save me, but there are others you might yet. Not everyone has died tonight. Your family might be safe.”

“My family?”

“Zhan was taunting you,” Reine explained. “Rey isn’t dead, and I don’t think Felicity is either. Some survivors have gathered in the training gym. I think I saw Felicity among them.”

“They’re not at home?” Luke felt a small weight taken off his shoulders. “Reine, what happened tonight? How do you know Rey isn’t... one with the Force?”

Luke couldn’t bring him to utter the horrid word “dead” in relation to his daughter.

“I saw her,” Reine replied. “She’s here, in the woods. The Knights of Ren attacked her. I tried to save Rey from them, and she ran off into these woods. You have to find her! She’s in danger! I couldn’t stop him from going after her.”

“Who?”

“Ben.”

With one word, Luke felt his world come crashing down.

“Ben?” Luke whispered. “No, he couldn’t have-”

“He did,” Reine cut Luke off. “And he went after Rey.”

Reine had started to gasp for air.

Luke felt Reine shift in his arms as her drooped shut.

“What? What, Reine?” Luke shook the woman in his arms forcefully, trying to keep her alive. “What do you want me to know?”

Reine gave Luke a soft smile, “It has been an absolute honour serving with you.”

And with that, Reine was gone.

Tears blurred Luke’s vision as he held the still body of his very first student. He felt like he was twenty-three again, and standing at the pyre of his father. Luke mourned Reine’s passing, but felt joy that she had become one with the Force.

“Rest in peace, my friend,” Luke whispered, drawing the lids over her eyes.

Gently Luke laid her body next to tree, making a mental note to come back for her and give Reine a proper burial. He gave himself a minute to collect himself and process all that had just happen, and then went straight into action.

Luke opened the cargo hold of his X-Wing and retrieved a large grey bag. After far too many instances of kidnapping, crash landings, and other ridiculous adventures that came with being a Skywalker, Luke and Felicity had taken to stashing bags of emergency supplies all over Temple Village. Luke carried on such bag in his X-Wing at all times.

It contained everything a person needed to survive, as well as various Luke, Felicity, and Rey specific items. One of Luke’s items was an emergency hand repair kit. Somehow the idea of stab Luke Skywalker in the artificial hand had become very popular over the past decade.

After a quick fix of his hand, Luke threw the kit back in the bag. He summoned Reine and Zhan’s lightsabers to him. He couldn’t allow the Knights of Ren to use them against his students, and surely more Knights would come to the area when Zhan didn’t return. He put the sabers in the bag and tossed it into the cockpit.

Luke quickly checked over the ship to see if anything could prevent a quick getaway. He tried not to think about the limited seating.

When Rey had been born, Felicity insisted that Luke modify his X-Wing to include a second seat facing backwards. It had taken a ridiculous amount of money and work, and if the X-Wing didn’t hold such sentimental value to Luke, he might have just bought a new ship. But it all paid off and now two people could fit and make a quick getaway if needed. There had never been a question that Rey would automatically get the back facing seat, but Luke and Felicity tended to avoid discussing which one of them wouldn’t get a seat at all. They hoped never to be forced to decide, but as they were Skywalkers and Fate seemed to hate them, Luke found himself potentially having to answer that question.

It was then Luke remembered what Reine had told him.

Rey was in danger.

Luke summoned his lightsaber from where it laid on the rain sodden ground. His eyes darkened as they set on the pitch black woods before him. Gripping his lightsaber, finger hovering over the button to ignite it, Luke dashed into the forest.
He prayed he’d find Rey before it was too late.

Rey couldn’t run any further. Her legs were on fire, and she wanted to throw up.

Certain that the monster was gone, she came to a halt and took in her surroundings. She had absolutely no idea where she was. Rain continued to pour down hard. All around her were tall tree and sounds of unknown forest creatures. She was deep in the forest.

And she was completely lost.

She stood, shivering. How would Mommy ever find her now? There she recalled Master Zena Halcorr and felt her stomach drop. Was Mommy even alive?

Deep in the forest she heard the sounds of war. The ping of blasters. The sizzle of lightsabers. The cries of the wounded. Death.

Rey burst into tears. She couldn’t help it; the image of Mommy laying still and unseeing on the ground, skewered by a red lightsaber haunted her.

She couldn’t understand. How could this happen? Mommy tucked her into bed and told her to sleep. Mommy and Daddy always promised that they’d keep her safe in her bed.

Then the monsters had dragged her out of that bed. Why hadn’t Mommy saved her? Had they killed Mommy in her own bed? Mommy and Daddy had never promised they’d be safe in their own beds.

Rey dropped to the ground, and hugged her knees to her chest as she cried. She wanted Daddy. Why wasn’t he here? He would tell her if Mommy was okay. He would hug her and kiss her and make the monsters go away. He would make sure she could be safe in her own bed.

She didn’t hear the footsteps running towards her.

Then behind her, a voice.

That voice.

“REY!”

Rey’s head jerked up. Someone spoke behind her. Calm, kind, and eerily familiar.

It was Daddy.

The intense joy Luke experienced when he set eyes on Rey made him feel as if he could burst.

“REY!” Luke couldn’t help but cry out. He regretted it in an instant. Someone could have heard him.

Rey’s head jerked up, and she wildly looked around, glazed eyes desperately scanning the dark gaps between the slender trees, trying to penetrate the darkness.

Luke wanted to run to her; sweep her up into his arms, carry her away from there, and never let her go again. But the clashing of weapons in the distance kept him in reality. Ben was nowhere to be found, and frankly Rey was so deep into the forest it would be almost impossible to find her. Luke was even surprised he found her in the first place.

Luke knew what he had to do; even if it would be one of the hardest things he ever did in his life.

It was a stupid plan to leave her behind, but what other choice did he have?

Stay behind with her? He had to help his students and find Felicity.

Take her with him? Oh, yeah, take her to the scene of fire and death. That’ll end well.

Take her to his X-Wing? Everyone had seen his arrival. They would find her far too easily.

Leaving her behind was best of a group of terrible options.

His little Rey whipped around to face him. Luke’s heart broke as he saw Rey’s sadness and fear shining through her mother’s eyes. It was night and too dark for Rey to see him, but she was strong with the Force, and Luke knew she could feel his presence.

“Where are you?” Rey started running towards him.

Luke wanted nothing more than to pick her up in his arms and whisk her away to safety. But the others needed him and Luke needed to know she was safe. He knew that if he allowed himself to hold her, he would never let her go.

“I’ll come back, sweetheart,” Luke tried to keep his voice calm and level. Rey was far too young to understand. “I promise.”

Rey did not want Daddy to come back. She wanted Daddy to stay.

Unwilling to taunt Rey any further, Luke rushed towards the battle. But he could not avoid the desperate pleading screams that followed him.

“I’M HERE, DADDY! I’M HERE! COME BACK! PLEASE, DADDY! COME BACK!”

It haunted Luke to think those could have been the last words she ever said to him.

“I love you too, Mommy.”

If Felicity had to chose the last words her daughter ever said to her, those words would have been perfect.

But not when her daughter was only five years old.

“Any sight?” Felicity’s military training had kicked in, and she requested the information as if on a battlefield… which, she sort was.

“Negative,” Gavyn Kene shook his head as ghosts shone behind his eyes. “No sign of anyone but you and I.”

Hauled up in the nearly empty cemetery that sat on the southern edge of town, Gavyn and Felicity held onto the hope that they weren’t the final survivors. They prayed that their families would be safe, and held onto the hope the bloomed when they had set eyes on a familiar X-Wing landing in the forest.

“Felicity, you know that Master Luke is the best bet to find Rey,” Gavyn said softly.
Tears shone in Felicity’s eyes as she gave a small nod, “I know.”

Crouching next to Gavyn, Felicity felt selfish at being so terrified for Luke and Rey. She still had hope that her family was alive, but Gavyn… They had already discovered the bodies of Gavyn’s family. Zena Halcorr, his wife, had died on the training field. Alyla Kene, his sister, was slaughtered in the Meditation Gardens. Worst of all, his thirteen-year-old daughter, Miri, laid dead on the floors of the Healing Quarters.

Felicity could see the fight had gone out of Gavyn. He clutched his lightsaber as if it were the last thing holding him to the world. His shoulders were dropped and he looked tired.

It was a striking image. Gavyn had been one of the first Jedi Felicity had met. It was a long and complicated story, but Gavyn, Zena, and several others had been slaves that Felicity and Luke helped free and escape Zygerria. Gavyn had always been a fighter. Even during the direst of circumstances, he would often laugh at the others and urge them to push just a little more.

To see Gavyn looking so broken made Felicity struggle to find any hope in their situation. She had no doubt that if she asked him, he would allow himself to be killed so she may escape.

“Look at me, Gavyn,” Felicity ordered. In that moment she was not Felicity Rhiaon Skywalker, mother, wife, architect, and emissary. She was Rogue One, and she would always get at least one person out alive. “When I say ‘now’ we’re going to make a break for the forest. We’re going to fight with every last drop of energy we have, and we’re going to find Luke.”

“There’s only two of us, Felicity,” Gavyn replied. “Seven already overwhelmed more than twenty Jedi. What chance do we have?”

Felicity grabbed his shoulder, “I’ll tell you the same thing I told Diego Nalto when we had to escape the Death Star. If we can’t get out of this alive, then damn it, they’ll remember that we went down fighting! Are you with me, Kene?”

Gavyn pulled out a blaster from his belt holster, “Let’s do this, Rhiaon!”

They came out firing. Gavyn deflected shots with his lightsaber in his right hand, while firing at the Knights of Ren with a blaster in his left.

Felicity had blasters in both hands. She had learned from one of her Death Star teammates – appropriately nicknamed Gunner – to load herself with as many weapons she could. When either the gas cartridge or power cell died on her blaster, Felicity tossed it aside and pulled out another.

Though neither said it, both Felicity and Gavyn knew they had no hope of making it to the forest. It was a glorious death they sought, and sure enough, a glorious death is what Gavyn got. For twenty minutes, Gavyn duelled two Knights of Ren with his lightsaber.

Felicity had her own Knights to deal with – three to be exact – so she couldn’t help Gavyn. When he was finally run through, Felicity screamed in anger, but secretly she smiled on the inside. Gavyn died with a grin on his face.

Without even thinking, Felicity drew a blaster and shot dead Gavyn’s murderer.

Victory was sweet, but fleeting. Suddenly she realised she was alone with four Knights of Ren.

“What do we do?” Iago Ren asked their leader. “Kylo Ren has already claimed her life.”

“Kylo Ren has had every chance to kill her tonight,” Cade Ren, the leader, replied. “He has earned his place as one of us but he has failed to collect his bounty. He forfeits the right to take her life.”

“Cade’s right,” Baku Ren agreed. “She killed Forr Ren. She must die.”

“No!” Jaek Ren objected. “We gave him the right to end her life! We must honour that.”

As the Knights bickered among themselves, none noticed Felicity pulling out her blaster. They surrounded her in a circle so she couldn’t make a break for it. She knew they were about to kill her no matter how strongly Jaek was objecting. But damn it, she sure as hell would go down fighting.

In a flash she had her blaster pointed at the leader. Felicity fired at Cade.

The blast hung still in the air.

Felicity’s eyes widened as Cade held the bolt in place. She tried to fire again, but found she couldn’t move a muscle. Iago was reaching toward her, holding her in place.

“Killed by her own bolt,” Iago taunted. “Wouldn’t that be very poetic?”

“Quite. Don’t worry Missus Skywalker, we’ll be sure to let your husband give you a dignified burial,” Cade taunted, knowing how much Felicity hated being reduced to only Luke Skywalker’s wife.

Felicity glared at Cade. She had always wanted to deliver some epic last words if she were executed, but in that moment she could think of nothing more profound than three simple words.

“Go to hell.”

Cade redirected the bolt, and released it.

Snap-hiss.

An angry cry rang out across the training field and a beam of emerald light swung before Felicity, deflecting the bolt straight into Iago. The Knights of Ren stared in shock as Iago fell down dead, and then turned to the source of the attack.

Standing between Cade and Felicity was a murderous Luke Skywalker.

Yeah, I’ve officially lost control of this story’s length. I’m still not even done what was supposed to be chapter one.

Also, yeah, I lifted a few lines from both the adult and junior novelizations.
I Won't Leave You

Chapter Summary

After saving Felicity from the Knights of Ren, Luke must do the hardest thing in his life: tell Felicity to take Rey leave without him.

Chapter Notes

Alright, so since the last update there has been a whole mess of material released that now contradicts the background of this story. I have decided that this will be a whole Alternate Universe called the Rogue Love Verse. This verse contains the stories: The Long Way Home, Definitions of Home, an upcoming story called Beneath the Mask, continuing stories of The Long Way Home covering the events of Episodes Eight and Nine, and probably a few small shorts in the future.

As such, materials such as Bloodline by Claudia Gray and the newly released material for Rogue One are not canon in the Rogue Love Verse. Therefore, keep in mind the following changes:

- Darth Vader being Anakin Skywalker/Luke and Leia's father has public knowledge since shortly after Endor.
- Ben has known basically since birth that Anakin was Vader.
- Luke had a very public life (though not exactly by choice) until shortly after Rey was born.
- Luke lived on Coruscant until a year before Rey was born.
- Leia and Han did in fact live together always while married.
- Han didn’t own a shipping company or become a racing pilot, but to be honest, I’m not sure what he did. Probably things that made the family have a don’t ask, don’t tell policy.
- Leia and Han had constant contact with Luke and Ben while Ben lived on Rornian.
- The Resistance was a Republic approved operation founded by Leia to combat the First Order after footage of Shara Bey’s execution by them was leaked into the public. (More details can be found in Definitions of Home.)
- The backstory of Felicity Rhiaon is (scarily) similar to Jyn Erso’s, but not identical. All information can be found in Definitions of Home, and all relevant points will be mentioned in this story.
- These are the counterparts of the Rogue One characters: Jyn Erso = Felicity Rhiaon, Cassian Andor = Diego Nalto, Bodhi Rook = Riz Drayson, Chirrut = Ji-Dan Hayato, and Baze = Wen “Gunner” Arroyo.
- K-250 does not exist.

Most of this can be found in current and future chapters of Definitions of Home. Now that that’s all settled, enjoy this chapter.
I Won’t Leave You

Luke Skywalker had never felt so angry in his life. He hadn’t even been that angry when he stood in front of the Emperor, having beaten his father into submission. The Knights of Ren had corrupted Luke’s nephew, torn apart his family, slain his students, terrorized his daughter, and had just tried to kill his wife.

In that moment, as Luke stood between Felicity and Cade, he wanted nothing more than their blood. Jaek and Baku exchanged a nervous look as they felt Luke’s anger through the Force, crashing violently against them like waves against a rock. It was so tremendous, even Felicity could feel it bleeding into the Force.

“Hello, Boys,” Luke’s eyes flashed darkly in the glow of his lightsaber. “I believe you forgot to invite me to your little party.”

Cade Ren was unphased, “Stand aside, Skywalker.”

“You don’t actually think I’m going to do that?”

“He does have a point,” Jaek shrugged. “We are trying to kill his wife.”

“Shut up!” Cade snapped.

She couldn’t believe it; Luke had come to save her. Their relationship had never been that of a knight in shining armor and a damsel in distress, but they had grown unafraid of asking each other to help.

Felicity would have resented Luke if he had stolen the glory in a normal First Order battle, but she wasn’t foolish enough to believe she could hold her own against Force Sensitives. No, Felicity was more than willing to pass the buck to Luke. After all, battling Dark Side users was his speciality. But she still kept her blaster primed and pointed at the Knights. No matter the enemy they faced, Luke and Felicity always operated much better as a team than they ever did apart.

Hearing Felicity’s whisper, Luke spared the briefest glance back at her. She was still in the strong pose she assumed to face death, but Luke was happy to see Felicity had relaxed.

Yet there was fear in her eyes.

Luke knew all too well that the only Force Sensitive Felicity had ever feared was Darth Vader. If brought before Palpatine, Felicity probably would have sassed the Emperor all the way to her execution. Felicity didn’t fear the Knights of Ren and would have torn them to shreds in a fair (aka Force powerless) fight.

Then what was it she feared?

Luke reached out into the Force and found his way to the barriers of Felicity’s mind. He gave the barrier a gentle nudge and felt her mind open to him automatically. Over the years, Felicity’s trust of Luke had grown so strong that he no longer needed to vocalize his request to search her mind. One gentle touch and Felicity opened willingly to him.

The cause of Felicity’s fear was forefront in her mind as she relived her memories of that night: Felicity tucking Rey into bed, Felicity waking to Rey’s screams, Felicity racing to Rey’s room, Felicity seeing the pile of blankets on the floor showcasing that their daughter had literally been dragged out of bed.

Anger flared up again in Luke. They had torn his five-year-old daughter out of bed in the middle of the night? Luke had always sworn to Rey that she would be safe in her bed. He would make the Knights pay for breaking his promise.

Luke shook as he gripped the hilt of his lightsaber tightly. He postured the beam defensively across his body. Luke knew his feelings were wrong: anger and vengeance were not the way of the Jedi. But after all the Knights had done – burning down the Temple, burning down his home, terrorizing his family, and murdering dozens of innocent lives – Luke wanted to tear them apart. It felt like gripping the hilt of his lightsaber was the only thing stopping him from slashing Cade into a million little pieces.

“You have exactly sixty seconds to lower your weapons and step away from my wife,” Luke’s words were ice.

Cade’s face faltered; Luke’s anger was so strong it was almost a physical entity. Luke didn’t notice when even Felicity took a step back from him. She herself wasn’t quite sure if it was out of fear or to simply get out of the splash zone.

“And… And if I don’t?” Cade asked.

Luke’s eyes flicked to Iago Ren laying dead on the ground, “Fifty-five seconds.”

“Luke,” Yoda’s voice suddenly called to him through the Force. “Dangerous feelings, these are. Set them aside, you must. Anger, fear, aggression; the Dark Side of the Force are they.”

“But Master Yoda,” Luke tried to reason into the Force, “the Knights are a threat. They have already done so much damage; I have to stop them from taking what’s left.”

“Stop them, you may,” Yoda replied, “but remember: a Jedi uses the Force for knowledge and defense, never for attack.”

“Forty-five,” Luke hesitated. How was ending Cade’s life not defense?

“Count down all you want,” Cade snarled. He had found new resolve in viewing Iago’s body. Revenge may not be the Jedi way, but it was a powerful motivator in his group, “I’ll be the one laughing when I kill your little wife.”

And Luke understood: he couldn’t stop the Knights by attacking them for murdering his students, he could only stop them by defending his wife.

“I’m afraid you’ll find that you’re both right and wrong,” Luke lowered his saber slightly. He turned and walked towards Felicity who was watching him hesitantly. “You’re wrong in thinking that you’ll be able to kill my wife.”

Felicity frowned at the confident look on her husband’s face. What was he playing at? And why had he given no reaction to the revelation she had lost Rey? Felicity tried not to think of Rey in that moment, trying to keep her mind on the present, but Felicity feared for their daughter while Ben was nowhere to be found.

“And what am I right about?” Cade asked, his eyes following Luke as he settled at Felicity’s side.

Felicity yelped when Luke suddenly pulled her against his hip.

If it had been anyone but Luke that said it, Felicity would have slapped them. Felicity was no one’s property, least of all some man’s. But Felicity knew Luke like the back of her hand, and she understood that with that one gesture of pulling her against him and declaring his claim on her, Luke was communicating ten different things.

Firstly, it was true, Luke was claiming her to the Knights as his own, but in that case it wasn’t such a bad thing. No matter how hard she tried, the Knights could defeat Felicity. There was no denial of that fact. But they could not defeat Luke, especially if he had someone to back him up. By claiming Felicity to the Knights, he was informing them that if they tried to take her from him, he would destroy them.

Secondly it put them in a better position to fight. Luke held his saber in his dominant left hand, the emerald beam humming as it hovered defensively in front of both of them. At the same time, his free right arm was locked possessively around Felicity’s waist. This meant that Felicity’s right arm was free.

One of the small details Felicity loved about her relationship with Luke was that he was left handed while she favored her right. During fights they could literally stay by each other’s side, each protecting one side for the two of them.

The third thing was that it put them in a position to communicate with each other. True, whispering in that situation could probably be fatal, but Luke and Felicity had long lost their need for whispers. To an extent, Luke could directly speak to Felicity’s mind as long as she was in a reasonable range. Since she was not a Force Sensitive, doing it around other Force users was not a smart idea, and Luke restrained himself, but the duo had another method of communication. After being on one too many adventures gone wrong together, the pair had created their own series of codes communicated entirely by the most discreet of signals. They could convey an entire battle plan without saying a word.

Which led to the fourth thing Luke did with the gesture. Luke lightly traced the letter Resh – the Aurebesh letter for R – against Felicity’s spine. It was their code for “Rey is safe.”

… and yes, sometimes their code was that specific.

The fifth thing came after Luke heard Felicity’s sigh of relief. He could sense that she still worried over the fact that Rey was not physically with Luke, but for the moment knowing Luke had seen her was enough for Felicity. Now that Luke knew Felicity had settled, it was his turn to calm down.

Felicity shot Luke a half glare when he gently tugged the material of her shirt up. He exposed less than an inch of her bare skin to the cold rain, and stroked her soft familiar flesh with his mechanical fingertips.

It may not have been the most appropriate thing in that moment, but Luke couldn’t help himself. Luke needed to feel her, to be certain she was safe and unharmed. After Reine’s death in his arms and denying himself the chance to comfort his daughter, Luke needed to touch his wife.

As he stroked her skin Luke could feel his rage getting replaced with calm and level headedness... and the slight fear that Felicity was going to smack him for this later.

“Sorry,” Luke muttered has he started to move his hand away.

“Did I ask you to stop?” Felicity whispered back.
Luke grinned and replaced his hand on his wife’s hip to Felicity’s satisfaction.

The sixth and seventh messages played off each other. By holding Felicity to him and stroking her side, Luke reassured Felicity that he was there to protect her. On the other side of the coin, it also reassured Luke that she was there to protect him, something she had done nearly as many times as he had in all their time together.

Eighth was the most important thing to Luke: by claiming her, Luke was conveying to the Knights that as long as Felicity was there, Luke would ensure she could escape them. He was more than willing to die to protect Felicity, but he had to know that his sacrifice meant she would be safe.

It was not hard to imagine how Felicity could escape. While the Knights struggled not to show their fear of Luke, neither Cade nor Baku moved to block the gap left by Iago’s fallen body. The Knights knew that the smallest movement could set off Luke and weren’t willing to risk it.

The ninth meaning of the gesture was up to Felicity to convey, and she was more than happy to deliver it.

With a grin and blaster in her right hand, Felicity boldly locked her own free hand around Luke’s muscular torso, staking her claim on the Jedi Grandmaster.

Tenth was the final overall message sent by the duo. How they could look so fierce in the face of death. How they could joke, and smile, and apparently even feel up each other in the middle of a battlefield. But their defenses were not lacking with both sides covered and a near perfect system of communication.

They were a formidable enemy, and above all, they were a team.

“Twenty seconds, Gentlemen,” Luke announced. “This is your last chance. Drop your weapons and surrender.”

“And if we don’t?” Baku challenged.

“Then I’ll remind you of what I did to Forr while my husband reminds you of Iago,” Felicity nodded to the bodies of the fallen Knights of Ren. “Just a quick question, do you prefer burial or cremation?”

Jaek gulped.

“Fifteen seconds,” Luke’s hand ran across Felicity’s back, making a series of marks to communicate his plan to her.

“They’re bluffing,” Cade declared.

“Ten,” Felicity teased as she traced her thoughts on Luke’s plan along his spine.

“I don’t think they’re bluffing,” Jaek’s voice had gone very high.

“We’re not afraid of you,” Baku snarled.

“Five,” Luke said, his hand stroking the one last detail of their plan against Felicity’s shin.

“Four,” Felicity tapped Luke’s neck to signal she understood the plan.
“Guys?”

“Defensive positions!” Cade ordered.

“Two,” Felicity smiled.

“ONE!” They shouted in unison.

Jaek threw himself to the ground.

Felicity shot Baku, hitting him in the arm while Luke swiped at Cade. Luke missed while Baku’s wound wasn’t fatal. But death had not been their goal: merely distraction, and they had hit their target perfectly.

They ran for the opening where Iago’s body laid. Felicity took the lead, directing Luke towards the trees while firing shots back at the Knights of Ren.

“Switch to blasters!” Cade commanded, grabbing Jaek by the neck and pulling him to his feet. “And get up you!”

Luke trailed behind Felicity, using his lightsaber to deflect the blasts the Knights shot at them. Deflecting the blast of one gunner was hard enough. Deflecting the shots of three people? Luke should have been charging admission to watch the nearly impossible feat.

A blast hit him in the mechanical hand. Luke cried out, and stumbled forward. Unfortunately, the ground was muddy from the thunderstorm, and as he lost balance from the jolt of the shot, he slipped in the mud and smacked against the ground.

“Luke!” Felicity called, turning about face and racing towards him.

“No, Felicity! Run!” Luke called.

But it was too late, she was already at his side.

“Thanks,” Luke said as Felicity pulled him to his feet.

“Anytime,” Felicity winked, responding with their infamous phrase. “Are you okay?”

“I’m fine,” Luke glanced down at his hand. The synthetic skin had been shredded by the blast, and pieces hung limply from the exposed metal skeleton, “Well… Maybe not all of me.”

“Hey, we’ve had this discussion before,” Felicity smirked. “The only parts of you I care about working are your head, your mouth, and your-”

“DOWN!” Luke shoved her shoulder, forcing her to the ground. Lighting his saber, Luke dramatically spun and deflected a blast that if Felicity had stood there a second longer would have nailed her in the head.

The blast bounced off Luke’s lightsaber, and redirected to Jaek. It hit Jaek in the chest, and he fell down dead.

“You know, I kind of liked that one,” Felicity aimed a few shots at the remaining Knights, missing as she clumsily got to her feet. “If he hadn’t murdered all of our friends, I might be sad that he’s dead.”

They took off like a shot, resuming their previous positions of shooting and deflecting. They were down to two Knights, while Ben was still missing in action. Luke had not sensed Ben endangering Rey, so Luke had that small comfort to hold onto.

“Remember the plan,” Luke whispered as he and Felicity crossed into the dark forest.

“Yes, Sir,” Felicity replied in an all too familiar tone that never failed to bring Luke to his knees.

“Is now really the time?” Luke struggled to resist the urge to respond in the usual manner.

“Just turn left,” he spoke to her through the Force so Baku and Cade wouldn’t overhear the direction.

They ran through the forest, and Luke occasionally used the Force to communicate a change in direction. Eventually the voices of Cade and Baku became more distant, and Luke found the terrain more familiar. They were approaching the spot he had left Rey.

Luke suddenly grabbed Felicity and pulled her behind a small patch of trees.

They waited a few minutes, listening to the soft noises of the forest nightlife and their own heavy breathing. There was no sign of any Knight of Ren.

“I’ll check the area,” Felicity pulled out of Luke’s embrace.

“Be careful,” Luke cautioned. He’d rather check himself, but Felicity was a grown woman capable of looking out for the two of them.

“All clear,” Felicity finally declared a few minutes later. “We’re out of danger for now.”

They were in each other’s arms in an instant: kissing, touching, and reassuring each other they were alright.

“Luke,” Felicity groaned, trying to withhold the tears that had been threatening to fall all night. She had gripped the front of his shirt with two hands and pressed him against a tree as she passionately kissed him over and over.

“Are you… all…right?” Luke managed to ask her between breaths. He could not stop kissing her. If their lives weren’t still in danger, he probably would have done something else to her against that tree.

“I’m okay, Sweetheart,” Felicity reassured him, finally ceasing the kissing and just holding him as tightly as she could. “I’m okay. I’m here. I’m safe. I’m alive.”

Felicity buried her head in the crook of his neck as Luke too held onto Felicity as tightly as he could. Luke could feel her tears dripping down his neck, and knew his own tears were returning that favor. Neither of them cared; all Luke cared about with that his beloved wife, Felicity was in his arms.
again.

“I’m alive, Sweetheart,” Felicity whispered. “I’m alive.”

“Luke…” Felicity felt a lump in her throat. She could hardly bear to say the words in her mind, but knew they needed to be spoken. “Luke, I’m afraid.”

Luke couldn’t help but smile. Felicity had been a very guarded person when they first met. Over the course of her life she had lost nearly everyone she loved. As a result, she had put up many barriers to her heart. Her previous relationships struggled to survive when her partners had either ignored her walls or tried to tear them down.

But Luke understood her need of walls, just as he had a few of his own. Their pain had shaped who they were, and their walls were an integral part of their souls. True, Luke was more open and forgiving than Felicity, but that is what made them such a good match. Luke taught Felicity when to let her guard down, while Felicity had taught him when to bring his up.

In the end, Felicity’s relationship with Luke had lasted because instead of tearing down her walls, he had learned where to find the secret passages and side doors to find his way to her heart. No one got to hear when she was sad, broken hearted, or scared. No one but Luke.

So Luke understood how significant Felicity’s admission of fear truly was. It meant that she was unafraid to admit to him that she was afraid.

“Felicity,” Luke whispered, gently stroking her hair. “It’s alright. We’re here together. I’m not going to let anyone hurt you.”

Felicity sniffed, and gave a chuckle, “And I’m not going to let anyone hurt you.”

“Promise,” Felicity kissed him again.

“Better?”

“Actually your looks were probably at least forty percent of the reason I married you.”

Luke raised an eyebrow, “I honestly can’t tell if you’re joking or not.”

“What?” Felicity said. “You can’t blame me. For goodness sake, will you look at yourself?”

“I don’t know how to answer that question.”

“Look, Luke, I know bantering in the face of death is one of our favorite pastimes-”

“We need a new hobby.”

“But we need a plan,” Felicity finished. “Starting with fixing that hand.”

“The synth skin is ruined,” Luke assessed his injury. “And the wiring is pretty shot. I had to fight
Zhan Ren when I landed, and he stabbed me in the hand. I gave it a temporary fix, but the second blast has fried the skin and some of the wiring. The best thing I can do is strip the skin so it doesn’t get in the way, and wear my mechanics bare until I can get a replacement. There’s just one small problem.”

“What’s that?”

“I can’t strip this with one hand.” Luke looked sheepish, “Do you… Do you think you can strip it for me?”

Felicity withheld revulsion. While she didn’t judge Luke for having a mechanical hand, and didn’t mind when he used it to touch her, she wasn’t exactly a fan. Additionally, since Luke’s hand looked so realistic, the thought of Felicity stripping the skin from it made her want to throw up.

“I wouldn’t ask you if I had any other options,” Luke recognized Felicity’s look.

“Luke, what about the sensors? Wouldn’t it feel like I was peeling your skin off?” Felicity muttered, “Add that to the list of sentences I never should have to say but do because I was dumb enough to marry a Skywalker.”

“That’s what you get for marrying for looks. Besides, the sensors aren’t working after the blasts. I can’t feel anything with this hand. Now, please, Felicity?”

“Fine, but you owe me,” Felicity reluctantly pulled a small viroblade off her belt (thank goodness she always had a fully stocked weapons belt in her closet) and began cutting off the fake skin. “I guess you know it’s real love when you are willing to strip a guy’s skin off to help him. Now, where’s Rey?”

“Rey?” Luke repeated, surprised by the change in subject.

“You told me she was safe. Where is she?”

Luke clipped his lightsaber onto his belt, “About a kilometer east.”

“Who’s with her?”

Luke was silent.

“Luke,” Felicity’s voice was perfectly measured as her hazel eyes flicked up coldly at him, “tell me that you did not leave our five-year-old daughter alone in the woods during a massacre.”

“I didn’t have a choice.”

“Luke!”

“What was I supposed to do, Felicity?” Luke questioned. “Bring her further into the fighting where she had the greater risk of dying?”

Felicity froze.
“No one?” Felicity whispered.

Luke bowed his head, shame enveloping his face. The silent, stillness of the night overtook the pair as the horror of what had happened finally set in. Their home, their friends, everything they had spent the last decade working toward had been taken from them.

As the husband and wife clung to each other, they wept over the loss of their friends.

“At least we have each other,” Felicity struggled to put on a brave face for Luke. She was used to losing the people around her and had learned to mourn later.

Luke was about as experienced as Felicity in the field of loss, but he had the unfortunate habit of pushing his grief aside for a proper moment, and then never would revisit it. Eventually it would grow bit by bit until it overtook him and he lashed out at someone. Felicity had never been particularly bothered by the habit as the person he lashed out against usually deserved it. But after seeing what the Dark Side had done to Ben, and knowing their daughter could suffer the same fate should Luke not properly instruct her to control her temper, Felicity had made it her mission to force Luke to face his emotions as quickly as possible. She refused to lose either him or Rey to the Dark Side, and if that meant Felicity had to put on a strong act for them, then so be it.

“It’s alright, Luke,” Felicity tried to comfort her husband. “Your students died the way they wanted to: defending the Light Side of the Force.”

“But after everything they’d been through, this wasn’t the way they should have died,” Luke replied. His arms were locked around Felicity so tightly, she worried he might accidentally break something. She refused to complain: he was clutching her like he feared she would dissipate if he let go.

When building Temple Village, Luke had been required by the Emissary Office to bring a non-Force Sensitive to Rornian, as well as a medical doctor. Luke had decided to kill two birds with one stone by hiring a non-Force Sensitive doctor. After a rather failed start when Luke was dumb enough to date the first doctor, he hired Doctor Kalonia, a friend of Leia’s.

“Isn’t she at that conference?” Luke tried to keep the desperation from his voice. “That one about the experimental cloning procedure to replace limbs?”

“Yes,” Felicity grinned. “She left a few days ago. She’s expected back next week.”

Luke couldn’t help but laugh as he joyfully pulled Felicity into a kiss, “That’s wonderful! That means at least one person escaped Be-”

The word died in Luke’s throat.

Felicity winced, “I’m so sorry, Luke. This is all my fault. I spent so much time provoking Ben-”

“No, it’s my fault. I should have been more attentive,” Luke sighed, “Felicity… Ben killed Reine. She died in my arms.”
“Tyla Kinall died in mine,” Felicity said. “She helped me escape the house when they set it on fire.”

“You two actually getting along? It’s a miracle.”

“It was for five minutes, Luke. Don’t lose your head.”

Tyla had always had a grudge against Felicity. It was a combination of Tyla’s jealousy that Luke loved Felicity and not her, and the fact that Felicity had very vocal doubts about the Force.

“I guess it literally killed her to be nice to me,” Felicity barely managed a laugh.

A silence fell over the duo as they stood there holding each other.

Then, Luke made a decision.

Felicity frowned, “Go? Go where?”

“The First Order?”

“The Knights of Ren have always been Snoke’s lackeys, and he was the one who corrupted Ben. It’s obvious why they came here.”

Felicity suddenly understood what Luke was telling her.

“No!” Felicity jerked it out of his grasp.

“You have to take Rey and get out of here.”

“We’re not leaving you!”

“We don’t have a choice,” Luke used his extremely calm voice that always annoyed Felicity. It wasn’t fair that someone should sound so peaceful when they were panicked.

“Yes, we do,” Felicity insisted. She lightly gripped Luke’s forearm and hope danced in her eyes, “You can come with us.”

“There’s no room,” Luke shook his head. “The only ship we have access to is my X-Wing. That’s a two seater, Felicity.”

“So what?” Felicity asked. “We can each take a seat, and Rey will sit in my lap.”

“The X-Wing can barely hold two people, it couldn’t fit three of us, let alone bare the weight.”

“Don’t ask me to leave you to die,” Felicity begged. “I’ve left too many people behind to their deaths. I won’t do it to you.”

“Then we condemn Rey,” Luke calmly said. Tear were shining in his eyes, “If we both stay, she does too, and we put her in the line of fire. I have the best chance of the two of us to survive, and I might be able to reason with Ben. Your presence would aggravate him. You’ve already had too many close calls with death tonight. Please, escape while you still can.”

Felicity threw her arms around Luke’s neck and sobbed into his chest, “I won’t leave you.”

Luke savoured the embrace with a sense of finality. As the time passed, Luke felt increasingly unsure he could bring himself to release her.

“Allowing yourself to let her go is not the same as ceasing to love her,” The ghostly voice of Anakin Skywalker whispered in his son’s ear. “It took me too long to learn that. Do not make my mistake of accepting it when it was too late. In letting her go, you are not asking yourself to permit things to end. You are asking her to live… Even if it means doing it without you.”

Luke sighed: his father was right. No matter how much he wanted Felicity to stay, he couldn’t let that happen.

Luke took a deep breath, and then pulled back from Felicity. He propped two fingers under her chin and tilted her head up. Felicity’s tear filled hazel eyes were locked with own glistening blue orbs.

“I promise you, Felicity,” Luke’s voice was calm, but filled with pain, “I will never leave you. But I cannot always be by your side physically, so you’ll just have to accept my emotional presence. My memory. My promises. You’ll have to trust me that this will not be the end.”

“I love you. I have from the moment I first met you, and I’ll love you even beyond my death. But you have to take Rey and go. It’s our best choice right now. I can handle the Knights of Ren, and you… We both know that you are more capable of making difficult decisions and even sacrifices for Rey’s safety. Decisions… I could never bring myself to commit.”

Felicity winced, closing her eyes as she lowered her head and sobbed. Luke’s words were too true for her to deny.

Luke sighed, making a face not unlike the one he had made upon seeing his father’s unmasked face for the first time: a sympathetic, loving, and pained expression.

He lifted her chin once more, “But that is why I love you. You are strong where I am weak, and we balance each other perfectly. I swear to you, Felicity, this will not be like Brendan. We will see each other again.”

“Promise?” Felicity choked.

“Promise,” Luke sealed it with a passionate lingering kiss.

They poured everything into that kiss. The magnitude of their love, the happiness of their friendship, the firmness of their partnership, the passion of a lover to the person they selected to create a child with, the depth of their promises, and even the sting of the possible finality of their parting.

Then they broke the kiss, they still did not part. They held onto each other, resting their foreheads together, listening to the other’s heavy breathing.

Luke used his flesh hand to stroke a thumb over Felicity’s cheek.

“I love you, Felicity Rhiaon,” Luke whispered, relishing the warmth of her skin.
Felicity ran a loving hand through his soft blond hair, “I love you too, Luke Skywalker. Thank you... Thank you for loving me.”

They embraced one final time, Felicity tightly locking her arms around his neck. Luke reached up and slowly clasped Felicity right hand with his left. Eventually he eased her arms down but did not release their clasped hands.

“Now go,” Luke’s voice quaked as he pressed a kiss to her forehead.

Slowly, Felicity backed out of his embrace, but their hands did not let go.

“Promise me,” Felicity ordered. “Promise me this isn’t goodbye.”

“I promise you, Felicity,” Luke grinned the goofy grin his wife so loved, “we’ll see each other again.”

Felicity gave the smile her husband loved, and let go of his hand.

“Promise me, Luke!” Felicity backed away from him into the treeline towards Rey.

“I promise!” Luke called as she disappeared into the night. “We’ll see each other again! I promise, Felicity. I promise!”

In the years to come, Luke would replay that moment in his mind thousands of times.

He refused to let himself forget the last time he saw his wife.

Luke and Cade were duelling fiercely when they heard it: the confusing scream that changed Luke’s life forever. The scream that led to the one mystery he would struggle to solve: the mystery of how Felicity Rhiaon and Rey Skywalker escaped Rornian.

The scream was faint, but far too familiar for Luke: it was the scream of his daughter.

Luke turned off his saber, and Cade fell to the ground dead. He watched the boy sadly for a moment.

Luke remembered when the young man first came to him. At the time, Cade had been a boy no older than Ben was now. Cade had always been angry and had a thirst for the Dark Side. Luke did his best to curb it, but it was to no avail. He remembered the day Cade had staged a walkout over the announcement Luke would marry a non-Force Sensitive. Luke remembered how Jake Comarila, Zhane Varrs, and Bakura Torven followed Cade Ren, altered their names, and became the first Knights of Ren.

And that’s when Luke remembered: both Baku and Ben were still unaccounted for.
As were Felicity and Rey. Rey, who had just screamed.

Luke tossed Cade’s red saber into the fire that littered the training field. He waited a moment to ensure the saber would catch fire and be destroyed. Luke was so distracted by it, he never noticed the first ship leaving the planet. The very same ship Ben had stolen from the Jedi months ago.

Luke ran for the woods, trying to find where he had left Rey, and hoping Felicity had found her. To his relief and horror, he did find the spot, but there was no one around.

It was the scene that horrified him. The trees had saber slashes on them. There were two marks in the mud that indicated bodies had hit the ground. One was adult shaped and blood was seeped into the mud. The other was child sized. Three sets of footprints – two adult and one child – muddled in a confusing fashion. Eventually all sets led away from the scene: a set of adult prints in one direction, while the child and other adult headed in the other direction. It was hard to tell whether the child prints were accompanied by adult footprints that paralleled the saber marks on the trees or the adult prints that came rushing onto the scene from the direction Luke and Felicity had parted.

Before Luke could puzzle over it some more, he heard another cry from the direction of his X-Wing. Without a thought, he raced towards the scene, but when he arrived, he again found himself too late.

Footprints muddled the scene. Blast marks and saber slashes had hit the trees and the ship. The back hatch was open, and the ladder was lowered. Luke climbed up into the cockpit and was surprised to find two saber slashes over the dashboard, destroying the equipment.

He looked in the back compartment and found the survival bag containing Reine’s lightsaber was gone. Remembering Reine, Luke looked to see where he had left Reine and Zhan’s bodies. They were there, but not far off was another figure.

A brunette.

Luke scrambled down the ladder towards the body, and frantically turned it over. To his relief, it was Baku Ren, dead by what appeared to be a blast to the chest. Next to Baku’s hand was the remains of a lightsaber and the rock that had bludgeoned it to pieces. Luke sighed and looked around. He then noticed that only one set of footprints led away from the scene: adult footprints.

Where was Rey?

There were child footprints leading to and around the scene, but none away. Yet there was no child to be seen.

But there was no answer.

As he puzzled over the scene, Luke heard a distant roar. He looked up just in time to see a larger ship exiting the planet’s atmosphere. Luke would never learn that that was the very same ship the Knights of Ren, save for Ben, had used to come to Rornian.

And then Luke was alone. He could feel it in the Force. There was no Ben. There was no Rey. There was no Felicity. No Reine. No Gavyn. No Zena. No Tyla. No Obik.

Only Luke and the wild dumb creatures that lived on Rornian.

Luke was completely alone.
For a while he couldn't bring himself to move. Everything and everyone was gone. He didn’t know what had happened to his wife, child, and nephew, but he prayed that they were all safe.

Eventually he stood. He left the Knights and his broken X-Wing, but he collected the body of Reine Agim and carried her back to the training field.

Luke was resting her on the ground when a familiar beeping sounded. He looked up to see Artoo wheeling towards him.

“I- I’m fine,” Luke muttered in answer to Artoo’s worried noises. “No, they’re not here. We’re alone, Artoo. Please, just- Can you contact Leia?”

Instantly a projection of Leia’s worried face was before Luke.

As he stared at the image of his sister, Luke suddenly found himself without words.

"I- I..."

"Luke?” Leia frowned, fear coursing through her body. She prayed that it wasn't what she thought it was.

Luke swallowed hard and readied himself for Leia's heartbreak, "Leia... The Knights of Ren attacked... They- They had a new initiate."

Luke could feel the pain that coursed through his twin sister's body. Luke knew she could sense her son's involvement. Her worst fear had finally come true.

And it was all their fault.

"I'm sending the Republic troops right now," Leia promised.

“Why not?”

Luke surveyed the field of dead, “Because there’s no one left.”

Luke didn’t take in Leia’s worried response. There was a ringing in his ears and a thudding in his throat. The world went out of focus and Luke felt like he was removed from reality, observing the tragic scene from afar.

He didn’t register hitting a button on Artoo that cut off the transmission. He didn’t register pulling the hood of his cloak over his head. Luke Skywalker was dead to the world. His eyes were unable to move from the bodies of his students and friends. The magnitude of the situation building.

His students who had fought against Empires, escaped slavery, wished for nothing but to bring justice and peace to the world. They were all dead. His home was burn. His nephew was corrupted. His family had disappeared.

And it was all his fault.

He couldn’t hold it back anymore.

“NO!” Luke screamed dropping to his knees.
He was a picture of sorrow as his cloaked figure posed next to the burning remnants of the massacre. Artoo was in front of him, and Luke used his stripped metal hand to reach out and touch Artoo.

That was how Wedge Antilles and Diego Nalto found Luke when they arrived an hour later.

“Luke!” Wedge spotted his friend and grabbed Diego’s shoulder.

“Luke!” Diego shouted as he and Wedge raced over.

“Are you alright?” Wedge asked, shaking Luke. The droid was the only thing keeping Luke upright. “What happened?”

Luke said nothing. He would remain silent no matter how much Wedge and Diego tried to get him to respond. Luke was too shell shocked. The man they called friend was gone.

“He hasn’t said anything?” Han asked the next morning when he and Leia arrived at the horrible scene.

“Not a word,” Diego shook his head. “Eventually we had to leave him there.”

“We put out the fires and collected the bodies,” Wedge added.

“Is everyone accounted for?” Leia questioned as she looked at the bodies lined up on the training field. She couldn’t stand the sight of the deceased children or her still unmoving brother.

Diego and Wedge exchanged a look.

“Not everyone,” Diego answered. “All the Jedi are here but we’re still looking for three people.”

“Who’s missing?” Han frowned.

Diego and Wedge shared another look.

“One Knight of Ren is missing,” Wedge said. “All six we’re aware of are accounted for, but Luke told you they had a new one. Whoever that is, they’re missing.”

Han and Leia avoided each other’s gaze. They dare not voice the shared thought in their head. Their son just couldn’t just wouldn’t do this.”

“And the other two?” Leia asked.

Diego gave a half-smile, “Felicity and Rey are nowhere to be found.”

Leia let out a selfish sigh of relief.

“I wouldn’t celebrate just yet,” Han shook his head. “You said the house burned down. Are we sure they escaped?”

“Positive,” Wedge replied. “We used my ship’s scanners to confirm there’s no human remains inside. Plus we found Baku’s saber smashed to pieces, and we all know who hates lightsabers enough to do that.”

“Felicity,” Han allowed himself a sigh of relief, and hugged Leia tightly. They were overjoyed to hear Luke’s wife had managed to escape.
Felicity had originally started as Leia’s friend, and even was recruited into the Rebellion by Leia. They had drifted apart after Leia make Han and Luke, but after reintroducing Felicity to Luke, the girls rekindled their friendship. Leia was ecstatic that Luke fell in love with Felicity and was delighted to call Felicity her sister.

They had drifted apart after Leia met Han and Luke, but after introducing Felicity to Luke, the girls rekindled their friendship. Leia was ecstatic that Luke fell in love with Felicity and was delighted to call Felicity her sister.

Han thought of Felicity as a sister as well. Their personalities were similar enough that the two got along like a house on fire. They even had a running joke that Han could have been a long lost Rhiaon child. Han and Felicity were such a duo that Luke and Leia didn't like leaving them alone because it usually resulted in them sassing someone to the point of tears, a disastrous adventure that cost thousands in property damage, or the occasional pissing off foreign dignitaries to the point they threatened war against the New Republic.

And of course, both Han and Leia adored Rey. It broke their hearts to think of her in any sort of danger, and were disgusted by the fact that the First Order would do anything to hunt her down like an animal. If it was the last thing they did, Han and Leia would see Rey again. They would tear the galaxy apart to find their niece.

But the only question was where to start?

Even worse, there was the question of Ben.

Luke looked up at the sound of her voice. The physical presence of his twin sister seemed to be just the thing Luke needed to snap out of his stupeor. But it did not withhold the shame, the guilt, the sorrow, and the look of being at a complete and utter loss of knowing what to do.

He didn’t need to say the word; Luke’s look said everything.

“Ben,” Han’s voice was thick as he tried to hold back the tears.

His son. His precious, innocent, idiot of a son, who Han had sworn to do everything in his power to protect... had murdered Luke’s Jedi Order.

Han turned away, ashamed to let Luke and Leia see him.

Leia said nothing as Han stormed off. She didn’t dare question what her husband was going to do. Leia would get her answer when she had to bandage Han’s knuckles after he had beaten them bloody while repeatedly punching a tree.

“I’m sorry, Leia,” Luke spoke for the first time since messaging her the previous night. His voice trebled as Luke fought against bursting back into tears, ‘I’m so sorry!’

Leia held her brother, allowing him to wept into her comforting embrace. You've always been strong. Luke’s words from years before rang through her mind. But she hadn’t been strong. Not strong enough to save her son.

No. If Vader could be saved, then so could Ben. There was still hope. She would be strong for all of them, and she would save their family.

“Luke,” Leia pulled back from her brother, noticing Wedge and Diego had given the siblings some distance. “Where are they? Where are Rey and Felicity?”

“I… I don’t know.”
The Long Way Home

Chapter Four

Half-Brave

“Hey Lando, it’s Han. Have you seen Felicity and Rey?”

“I’m looking for information on someone who might have checked into your inn. Do you have any guest under the name Rey, Felicity, Rhiaon, and/or Skywalker?”

“And you’re sure you’ve checked in with the entire family, Aunt Sola? What about the lake house?”

“Fixer, it’s Luke. I know this is out of the blue, but has anyone been around the old homestead lately?”

“Lando, it’s Han again. Just checking to see if you had any updates from any of your contacts.”

“Tell Admiral Akbar that it’s an emergency and he needs to comm me back as soon as possible.”

“I know it’s a long shot, Pax, but you haven’t heard anything from Felicity, have you?”
“Nothing, Kes? Well, can you get Poe to ask around the academy if anyone has heard news of Felicity or the First Order?”

“For the last time Jaina, I can’t attend to any Senate business. My family is in the middle of a crisis. Tell the other Senators to leave me a message if it’s that important.”

“Yes, I’m aware that this is the fifth time I’m contacting you, Lando! In case you haven’t heard, Rey and Fliss are missing!”

“Are you sure you’ve communicated with the entirety of Rogue Squadron? What about Dak? … Yes, I forgot he died on Hoth! My wife and child are missing! I’m under a lot of stress right now!”

“Nerissa sends her condolences and regrets, Luke,” Leia sighed as she ended the communication with the Queen of Zygerria. “But she hasn’t heard from Felicity either.”

“I guess we can scratch Zygerria from the list,” Diego got off the couch to cross off Zygerria from the large board full of planet names that was propped against the wall.

The Organa-Solo living room had been transformed into a call center dedicated to the search for Rey and Felicity. Luke, Han, Leia, and Diego desperately contacted every person Felicity had ever crossed paths with and nearly every location she had stepped foot in.

Artoo sat in the corner, searching every media outlet, Republic wavelength, and spy network he could connect to for any mentions of his disappeared Mistresses. Lando was contacting every shady connection he had ever made. Wedge and Chewie were leading ground teams of several of Luke’s friends to follow up any leads on the missing women. And Threepio was serving refreshments, translating calls, and loudly panicking, detailing what horrors he feared Mistresses Felicity and Rey must be encountering.

“One more word about Fliss and Rey dying, and I’ll lock you in the closet, Goldenrod,” Han had threatened the droid.

Threepio was oddly quiet after that exchange.

“Cross Naboo off the list as well,” Luke rubbed his temples as he slumped helplessly back onto the couch. Much of his usual liveliness and optimism had been missing since Felicity and Rey’s disappearance three days ago. “My mother’s family has searched Naboo high and low. No sign of Felicity or Rey.”

“I guess that means we start Round Six of messaging our contacts,” Leia sympathetically rubbed Luke’s shoulder as she sat next to him.

“Fine, but someone else has to talk to Lando,” Han replied. “I think he’s going to punch me if I call him again.”

“What’s even the point of contacting the people we’ve already spoken too?” Diego objected. “They’ll let us know if they find anything. We should be looking in places we haven’t checked yet.”

Leia frowned at the list of planets, “The problem is we’re running out of places.”

“This is ridiculous!” Han shook his head. “Fliss wouldn’t go to an obvious significant landmark, but she also wouldn’t go to some random planet we’ve never heard of. She’d go somewhere discrete she knew we could find her. Somewhere only we would guess based on knowledge only we have.”

“Not to mention it would have to be a place she’s quick to think of,” Leia pointed out. “She couldn’t have had a lot of time to plan her escape.”

“Alright, so Fliss is sitting in the cockpit of a ship with the enemy on her tail,” Han posed. “She has ten seconds to type in a set of coordinates. What does she type?”

Diego froze. He recalled a similar moment between himself and Felicity many years before.

“I can’t fly this thing!” Diego shouted, clutching the bleeding wound on his shoulder. His vision was fuzzy, and the world around him was fading.

Of the five Rogue Squadron members sent in to steal the plans to the Death Star, only he and Rhiaon remained. They were almost out of the woods. The plans were in a chip hanging from a pouch around Rhiaon’s neck, and the two of them had made their way into a TIE fighter to escape the battle station. Unfortunately, Diego had been injured badly on the way in and was barely staying conscious.

“Hold on, Nalto,” Felicity begged. “I just need you to get us into light speed and we’ll be in the clear.”

A blast blot hit the ship.

“I can’t move my arm!” Diego replied. “Look, I’ve got us set up. Just punch in a destination, push the buttons I tell you, and we’ll be out of here.”

“What destination?”

“Anything! As long as it isn’t Yavin IV, Coruscant, or Naboo, I don’t care where you take us!”

“But Nalto-”

“PUNCH IN A DAMN COORDINATE, RHIAON!”

Without any hesitation, Felicity entered a set of numbers.

“What did you type?” Diego asked.

“Jakku,” Diego remembered Felicity’s answer. He looked over at Luke, “She would go to Jakku!”

“Jakku, of course,” Luke scrambled to his feet. “Artoo get me a contact number for- Who did you and Felicity work for again?”

“The planet coordinates are the same numbers as her brother, Brendan’s birthdate,” Luke explained.

Han looked over at Leia, “Brendan? He’s the brother she promised to let teach her to fly, but then he died and now she uses it as excuse not to learn how to properly take off and land?”

“How many brothers do you think Felicity has?” Leia replied.
“Niima Outpost!” Luke exclaimed as Artoo projected a comm station code. He quickly typed it in and waited for the connection to be made. “It’s the only known comm station on the planet. If Felicity’s going anywhere, it’s going to be there.”

Artoo let out a few beeps signifying the connection had been established.

“Message for Unkar Plutt,” Luke said as a comm station operator was projected before them.

“Haku?” the creature replied in confusion.

“Oh right, I forgot to mention most people in Niima Outpost speak Huttese,” Diego explained. “Niima was a Hutt who established the place.”

Luke shook his head and then repeated his message in Huttese, “Wankee che Unkar Plutt.”

The creature replied for Luke to hold on, and the group waited for a few minutes.

“So how friendly is this Plutt?” Han asked.

“Haku chuba naga?” someone suddenly snapped at the group.

Han frowned, recognizing the phrase, “Never mind. Anyone who starts a conversation with ‘what do you want’ can’t be pleasant.”

Luke shot Han a look before turning back to the new creature, “Unkar Plutt?”

“Tagwa,” Unkar confirmed.

A long silence ensued as Plutt just stared at Luke.

“Listen, boy,” Plutt awkwardly scratched his head, “I only know a little Huttese. If it’s not a greeting or bartering words, I have no idea what the hell you’re saying. Mind telling me in Basic what it is you want before I cut this message off?”

Luke turned and glared at Diego.

“Oh yeah,” Diego remembered. “I forgot he doesn’t speak Huttese.”

“Thank you, Han,” Luke nodded at his brother-in-law as he scrambled to think of a rough translation of what he had said to Plutt. “Sorry, Mister Plutt. I’ll try that again in Basic. Hello, I am Luke Skywalker, a Jedi, and my friend bargained with you one time. I want your help searching for a woman and girl who is running from the First Order. I want to bring them home. There is a payment for help.”

“A reward, eh?” Unkar paused at the last sentence. His mouth had opened to tell Luke to bugger off, he wasn’t going to help him look for any runaway females, but the mention of payment intrigued him. “How much are we talking?”
“That all depends on the help provided,” Luke narrowed his eyes. “I’m looking for a woman who once worked for you briefly twenty years ago.”

“Twenty years ago? You’re joking, right?”

“Her name is Felicity Rhiaon Skywalker, and she might come to you in the next few days,” Luke continued. “Additionally, she might be accompanied by a young girl named Rey. Rey looks a lot like Felicity. They’re pale skinned humans, with hazel eyes, brunette hair, and petite statures.”

“That’s what happens when a five foot six man procreates with a five foot three woman,” Han muttered. “ Seriously, why is everyone in this family short?”

Luke ignored Han, “If Rhiaon or Rey shows up, Plutt, you will immediately get them to contact me, and you will take care of their needs until I can come get them. By needs I mean water, shelter, appropriate portions of food, medical attention, and whatever else they ask of you. When I come get them, we will negotiate a reward. If you fail any of my conditions, you will forfeit your prize. Do we have an understanding?”

Plutt considered Luke’s words, “Agreed.”

The transmission was abruptly cut off and Luke sighed.

“And now we wait,” Luke said. “I hope they’re alright.”

“I’m sure they are,” Leia got off the couch and hugged her brother.

“I must say, that was disappointing,” Diego admitted. “I thought they would have been in Niima by now.”

“I did too,” Han admitted. “I guess the only question now is if they’re not at Niima Outpost… Where are they?”

In the middle of the Jakku desert, Felicity silently watched the smouldering transport ship sink into the sand with a cloud of smoke and fire. Rey stood next to her mother as Felicity rested a hand on Rey’s shoulder; the girls taking in the sight of Felicity’s failure of a landing.

“Mommy?” Rey asked in an innocent voice. “Is that why Uncle Han never lets you pilot the Falcon?”

“Yes. Yes, it is,” Felicity simply answered. She looked down at Rey and gently pulled her daughter in closer, “Careful, Sweetheart. I don’t want you breathing in the fumes.”

Rey buried her face against her mother’s leg.

As the wreckage burned – and Felicity thanked the Force neither of them had been hurt in the crash – Felicity looked around her environment. Surrounding them was absolutely nothing but endless desert.

The wreck had been caused by Felicity accidentally triggering a self-destruct when the ship belonging to the Knights of Ren recognized she was an intruder. Apparently one of the Knights had rigged the ship so that unless someone typed in an exact sequence, the ship would blow up when the landing cycle activated. Typical Knight of Ren mentality: lure your enemy into a false sense of security and then unleash hell when they aren’t expecting it.
Felicity sighed; she had wanted to land much closer to Niima Outpost, but now it looked like she and Rey would have to endure several days of walking.

She put down the emergency bag she had swiped from Luke’s X-Wing and rescued from the crash of the stolen ship. This was the exact type of situation they carried the bags around for.

Felicity unzipped the bag and checked over the contents. It had a basic first aid kit; food and water rations; clothing for Rey, Felicity, and Luke; basic navigational equipment like a compass and a star map; extra shoes; flares; a sewing kit; some ice packs that would become cold when you snapped them in half; flashlight; tool kit; basic ship repair kit; two sleeping bags; a pair of lightsabers for reasons Felicity couldn’t explain, though one looked like Reine Agim’s; and several other odds and ends that would be useful.

Felicity grimaced at the weight of the bag. Walking in a desert would be bad enough, but add an extra, what ten? Twenty pounds? Felicity was never great at gauging measurements.

It was only natural that her next task was to figure out a set of measurements. Felicity opened the navigational kit and pulled out a small silver box. It was a simple machine that calculated the latitude and longitude of a person’s location, as well as stored a list of coordinates for popular locations on most chartered planets in the galaxy.

To Felicity’s relief, Niima Outpost on Jakku was one of the places listed. Using the coordinates and the other tools in the navigation kit, Felicity calculated that she and Rey were about three days’ walk from Niima.

Well… three days in ideal conditions.

The first time Felicity had come to Jakku, she and Diego had landed right in the shipyard of Niima Outpost. Additionally, the work they did for Plutt was packing food ration packs for Unkar to dole out. One of the benefits of the job was that Plutt had kept Diego and Felicity in the shade at all times, and provided them a small tent to spends the nights in.

Therefore, Felicity had never really travelled in the desert before. Yes, she had been to Tatooine with Luke a handful of times, but they never walked for long periods of time. Add in the fact that Felicity had her heavy bag to carry, and Rey by her side, and Felicity knew it would be more than three days of walking.

But then how long would it be? And more importantly… How long could they survive?

Felicity rummaged through the bag, taking inventory of their rations. When she finished, Felicity found that she wanted nothing more than to slap Past Luke and Past Felicity.

They had a supply of five days of water, and three days of food… for a single person.

The emergency supplies bag was not designed to support more than one person’s survival for a short period of time. It was because of a rule Luke and Felicity established after Rey was born. Technically only one member of the Rhiaon Skywalker family at a time was allowed to be in a potentially dangerous situation where the bag was needed. Additionally, they were not allowed to be far from a way of contacting each other, that way a rescue could be made as quickly as possible.

Felicity hated herself for her lack of foresight. Luke had altered his X-Wing so that Rey could make a quick getaway with one of them and Felicity had ensured there was an extra set of clothing and footwear for Rey. Why in the Galaxy did they not stock enough food for Rey? Had they really been so naïve to think that one of them wouldn’t bring Rey into a situation with no food?
Looking at the meager rations, Felicity groaned. Everything had to be perfectly portioned if both of them were to survive the trek. Felicity would have to be very strict with Rey when she inevitably asked for more food and water. But what kind of mother would she be to deny her child water?

Luke’s words from the forest echoed in her mind, “We both know that you are more capable of making difficult decisions and even sacrifices for Rey's safety. Decisions… I could never bring myself to commit.”

Felicity looked at Rey and knew. She would be a mother who would rather her child be alive rather than momentarily comfortable.

So how long would it take for them to reach Niima Outpost? Felicity quickly did some calculations in her head. She vaguely recalled Luke telling her never to travel in the desert between 11 am and 2 pm. Factor in at minimum six hours of sleep. Maybe about three hours of resting. So walking for twelve hours a day in desert conditions with a child and heavy bag… Four days? Five?

Felicity decided to budget for five. Ten portions of water and food were needed. Felicity had five portions of water, and three of food. So half a portion of water for each of them a day, and one third portion of food. Felicity’s stomach churned of the thought of her daughter going hungry; maybe she would give up a few of her meals for Rey.

Felicity quickly snapped the ration packets into thirds (and vaguely wondered why she let Luke talk her into stocking the bag with the revolting dehydrated nutrient bars instead of real food) and measured the water in each of the five canisters. A capful every few hours should do it.

Next was the question of attire. Felicity eyed Rey critically; her daughter was still in her pyjamas. Felicity thankfully had thrown on some clothes appropriate enough for the desert during the massacre.

“Rey, come here,” Felicity ordered as she pulled out some clothing for Rey.

Felicity quickly stripped off Rey’s pyjamas, and dressed her in a pair of leggings, short boots, and a long tan tunic.

“Now what are we going to do about your hair?” Felicity mused as she tied a dark brown belt around Rey’s waist. Felicity was trying to keep the mood light before Rey began to panic about the situation.

“My hair?” Rey frowned, touching the dark hair that fell to her shoulders.

“We have to put it up or else it’ll trap heat and make your neck all sweaty,” Felicity gently forced her daughter to turn around. Felicity grabbed a few hair ties and a brush from the bag, “Then it’ll get all matted and tangled and you’ll be terribly uncomfortable. So how do you want me to do your hair? Bun? Ponytail? Braid?”

Tears gathered in Rey’s eyes, “I want Daddy. He does my hair best.”

Felicity paused brushing Rey’s eyes, “I want Daddy too,” Felicity said softly. After a moment of silence in which Felicity had to fight back her own tears, she cleared her throat and put on a brave face, “He does do hair very nicely. He sometimes even does mine. But you know what? Daddy only does hair so nicely because it’s in his blood. You know what Grandma Padmé and Aunt Leia’s hair look like. How about I do something like them?”
Rey sniffed, “Okay.”

“Alright,” Felicity gathered a few hair bands, “well, Grandma had a very famous one bun style, and Aunt Leia had a famous two bun style, how about we carry on the family legacy and put your hair in three buns?”

It took a few minutes for Felicity to properly tie Rey’s hair, but soon she was proudly observing the three bun hairstyle that would become Rey’s signature look.

“There, functional and fashionable.” Felicity proclaimed with a wink, “That’s the Rhiaon way.”

“Thank you, Mommy,” Rey smiled, running her little hands over her hair to make a picture of it in her mind. Rey glanced towards the burning sun, but cast her gaze down quickly when it hurt her eyes. Rey hesitantly looked at her mother and said, “Mommy… I’m hungry.”

“We’ll have to fix that, won’t we? Here,” Felicity gave Rey one of the food portions. As Rey ate, Felicity unscrewed the cap off the first canister and poured the lukewarm water into it the cap, “Drink this. Slowly.”

Rey gratefully took the cap of water, and drank slowly under her mother’s critical gaze.

She didn’t want to say anything, but Rey knew there was something wrong with her mother. Mommy looked like Uncle Han when the Falcon broke. What was the word Aunt Leia taught her? Stressed. Mommy looked stressed.

Rey didn’t know how to help Mommy, so she did the thing that would always help Daddy when he looked stressed. Rey gave Mommy the biggest, brightest, cutest smile she could muster. The same one that Daddy couldn’t help but make his own grin at and give her bug hugs.

Felicity could barely resist Rey’s grin. It was the same goofy grin of Luke’s that Felicity had fallen in love with. There was something about seeing it on the mirror of her own face that made Felicity’s heart lift. Despite their terrible situation, at least Felicity had Rey, the physical proof of her shared love with Luke, at her side.

Rey grinned even wider when she saw the corners of Mommy’s mouth upturn. Even though to only took the corners of Mommy’s mouth, Rey knew it was a full on genuine loving smile, and not the smirk Mommy gave to Daddy that often made Daddy tell Rey to go to her room so Mommy and Daddy could go to bed… sometimes even in the middle of the day.

“More, please,” Rey sweetly asked, politely holding the lid out to Mommy.

Felicity’s smile faltered.

“Rey, Sweetheart,” Felicity went down on her knees to be at Rey’s level. She took the canister lid from Rey and gently clasped her hand over Rey’s, “I can’t give you anymore. I’m sorry.”

Rey’s smile dropped.

“But I’m thirsty,” Rey was confused. Her upbringing never left her wanting for basic needs, so to be denied water was incomprehensible for the five-year-old.

“I know, Sweetheart,” Felicity softly replied, trying to keep the pain from her voice, “but Mommy can’t give you anymore water right now. We have to save it.”

“Why?”
Felicity looked over at the ship, and Rey’s eyes followed.

“Do you think Mommy wanted to land here?” Felicity asked.

A loud bang and a puff of flame and smoke rose from the ship.

“No,” Rey looked back to her mommy. “Where are we?”

“We’re on a planet called Jakku,” Felicity explained. “You remember that from my stories, right?”

Rey nodded, “The planet whose coordinates are Uncle Brendan’s birthdate.”

“Correct. I took us here because Uncle Diego would know to look for us here. He would tell Daddy, who would come and get us, but I wanted to land in a place called Niima Outpost.”

“But the ship blew up.”

“Right, so we’re on the right planet, but just not in the right spot. We have to get to Niima Outpost to call, Daddy.”

“Then who is coming to get us?” Rey asked.

“No one, yet,” Felicity confessed. There was no point in giving Rey false hope with the uncertain path before them. “You, see, the thing is there aren’t any towns or places to get food and water and a ride between here and Niima Outpost. So we have to walk to Niima Outpost, and in order to have the energy to walk, Mommy needs to take special care that we have enough food and water to last the trip.

“Can you carry me?”

“No. That takes a lot of energy and Mommy needs to keep her energy or we’ll never make it.”

“We’ll die?” Rey exclaimed.

Felicity said in a dead serious voice, “You are not going to die. I won’t let that happen. I promise.”

“What about you? Will you die?”

Felicity let the silence linger for a moment too long.

“Mommy!” Rey cried out.

“Mommy will do whatever it takes to keep you safe,” Felicity vowed. “That might mean Mommy does some things you don’t like, and some things Mommy might not be proud of. But I will get you back to Daddy. I swear that to you, Sweetheart.”

Felicity words didn’t comfort Rey, and Felicity couldn’t stop Rey from bursting into tears. She tried to hush Rey, worrying that Rey would deplete the water in her body from the crying, but Rey was inconsolable. Trying not to cry herself, Felicity pulled Rey into a tight hug.

“Shhh, it’s okay, Sweetheart,” Felicity soothingly rubbed Rey’s back. “Please don’t cry. Mommy doesn’t like when you cry.”

“I’m scared, Mommy,” Rey sobbed.

“Mommy’s going to protect you,” Felicity swore. “But she gets needs you to be brave.”
“I can’t,” Rey wailed. “I can’t be brave now.”

As Rey sobbed, her foot accidentally kicked one of the canisters of water next to the survival bag. Seeing the canister, Felicity got an idea. She took a deep breath, gathered herself, and gently pulled back from Rey.

“Then you don’t have to be brave,” Felicity rubbed the sides of Rey’s arms. She had her strong hazel eyes met the mirrored, albeit teary, eyes of her daughter. Felicity said in a strong voice, “Rey, I’m going to tell you a secret. Can you keep a secret?”

Rey nodded, and Felicity smiled, happy to see that her questions were keeping Rey engaged in the conversation.

“People have the same capacity for bravery.” Felicity picked up the canister, “That means they all can have the same amount of bravery. It’s like this canister. You can have a little water in it or a whole lot, but they can only have one canister’s worth. That’s enough for them to be fully brave for one person. Now, you can share your bravery. I can pour some of this water into another canister, but I’ll still only have enough bravery for one person. Does that make sense?”

Rey nodded, her tears drying up as she focused on the canister in her mother’s grasp.

“Now, come in close. Mommy’s going to tell you the secret. Promise not to tell?”

“Promise,” Rey leaned in.

Felicity dramatically looked around, like she feared someone would overhear them, “When a person becomes a parent, they get a second canister of bravery. A whole nother person’s worth.”

“Enough for their baby?”

“Exactly! And they get one for every child they have, whether by blood, or adopted.”

Felicity unconsciously rubbed the tattoo along her right wrist. It read FN-2187, the serial number of the child she once upon a time tried and failed to save from the First Order, back when the Resistance’s job was to reclaim children kidnapped by the First Order. Felicity had gotten the tattoo so she would never forget about the disastrous mission where a little boy was literally torn out of her arms by a Stormtrooper called Captain Phasma.

It was an event that set off the infamous rivalry of Phasma vs Rhiaon. Felicity and Phasma had had many encounters since that day, the most famous of which involved Phasma kidnapping Felicity while she was pregnant with Rey. Felicity may have hated Ben, but she despised Phasma more than even Darth Vader himself.

“So the canister,” Felicity shook her head, getting her mind back on track, “is enough so that if a Mommy has a little girl who is afraid, she can pour a little extra bravery into her little girl, and her little girl won’t be scared anymore. Now, I’ve got my full extra canister, but there’s just one small problem. Mommy needs a little bravery herself to get us to Jakku, but Mommy is just as terrified as you.”

“So you need some of the bravery?” Rey asked.

“No. Take all the bravery. Let Mommy be full-brave for you. It’s my job, and I’m happy to do it, but I do need a little extra bravery. So how about this? How about you take to make some bravery, and you share that with me? I make you full-brave, and you make me, what quarter-brave? A third?”
“Half,” Rey grinned. “I can be half-brave for you, Mommy!”

“Half-brave,” Felicity declared. “You’ll make Mommy half-brave! That’s perfect!”

Perfect, because that was all Felicity knew she could manage.

Felicity let the tears fall that night when she was sure Rey was asleep.

The day had been long and hot, and the novelty of adventure had worn off far too quickly for Rey. Felicity couldn’t blame Rey for the complaints near the end of their day long hike: Rey was only five.

Felicity’s stomach growled, begging for more sustenance, her parched mouth echoing the chorus. She prayed that she and Rey had made good headway to Niima, but Felicity was uncertain and far too tired for the calculations to figure it out. Every muscle ached in Felicity’s body as she sat on a smile hill, Rey sleeping silently next to her. Felicity couldn’t find the peace to sleep: she was terrified something might happen to Rey while she was sleeping. Felicity would never let that happen to Rey again. She never would wake up to Rey’s desperate screams; even if it meant Felicity would never sleep again.

She wanted Luke. Throughout the day, Felicity refused to let him enter her mind. It was too painful to entertain the ache she felt for her husband. Felicity wanted Luke. She wanted his arms wrapped around her. His lips pressing against her own. Their hands lazily clasping as they strolled along. Their bodies intertwined and molded into one as they made love.

Felicity didn’t care what they were doing; she just wanted Luke.

She knew he wasn’t dead: the notion of Cade Ren killing Luke Skywalker was ridiculous. Felicity knew somewhere out there he was desperately searching for them. Luke was probably staying at Leia’s apartment on Hosnian Prime. Bags under his eyes, lines across his forehead, arguing with Leia that he didn’t need to eat, but rather find Felicity and Rey. He was probably blaming himself for what happened, but Felicity refused to lay it on anyone but Ben.

Ben Solo had destroyed their life.

Felicity cried softly, trying not to wake the peacefully sleeping Rey. It had taken a long time for Felicity to convince Rey she’d be safe to sleep. Rey could sense Felicity’s distress, and once again Felicity cursed Luke’s damn Force Sensitive DNA for corrupting her little girl. A mother had the right to lie to her daughter that everything would be okay, and have said daughter believe it.

Stupid midi-chlorian tattletales.

Felicity watched the steady breathing of Rey as she slept. Rey was curled up with the survival blanket; a specially designed blanket that would adapt to the environment. Felicity shivered, holding herself in a vain attempt to keep warm. Who knew that the desert got so cold at night.

Once again Felicity cursed Past Luke and Past Felicity for their planning. It was true that their survival pack could only carry so much, but only one blanket? Felicity was seriously doing their other packs when they got home.

Felicity sighed and began digging through the pack. She wasn’t going to keep cold if she didn’t have to. Felicity pulled out some of the spare clothes. It wasn’t like she or Rey needed winter clothes, and Luke’s clothing was free game since he wasn’t around.
Her hands set on something orange, and Felicity paused. It was Luke’s flight suit. It was used, though maybe not really in need of a wash. Luke must have stripped out of it sometime before returning to Rornian. He might have even changed out of it when stashing Reine’s lightsaber in the bag.

Felicity ran her hand over the suit. It was Luke’s. It may have been “dirty” but it was Luke’s. It had touched him not much longer before the last time she had. Felicity lifted it out of the bag, and hesitated. She held it against her face and closed her eyes, pretending he was wearing it as he lovingly held her.

Felicity didn’t try to inhale the scent or anything, because seriously why did book go on about characters smelling like things? To Felicity, Luke either smelled like a person, cologne if he was wearing it, or BO when she would tell him to take a shower. Luke didn’t magically carry the lingering scent of sand, lightsaber, and fried Death Star bits, or whatever the hell the girls wrote in their fan mail to him. No, Felicity justified holding the flight suit against her face on the basis that it was in good enough laundered condition to be like when he was away on a trip, and she stole his pillow as a reminder of him. Yes, it was like a pillow.

…Or maybe a blanket.

Felicity dug out the sewing kit and fished out a pair of scissors. She was about to cut the fabric when suddenly she heard something.

“Daddy,” Rey moaned in her sleep. “I want you, Daddy.”

Felicity smiled; she knew just how to get Daddy for Rey.

Luke tossed and turned in the guest bed of Han and Leia’s apartment on Hosnian Prime. His comlink was set on the side table next to his lightsaber and a set of clothes. At the drop of a hat, he could be up and ready to go get his wife and child.

He wanted them back so bad. A million scenarios played in his mind. Where were they? Were they safe? Were they comfortable?

Luke didn’t want to sleep. He wanted to find Felicity and Rey. Everything that wasn’t tracking them down was a waste of time. Replacing his synth skin had yet to be done, as it wasted too much time. Responding to the media’s questions on the events of the Burning of Rornian was a waste of time. Eating was a waste of time, though Han had physically forced him to after he got annoyed with Luke and Leia’s arguments every meal time.

Sleeping was just wasting time. He wouldn’t even try it sleep if Leia hadn’t tricked him into the room and locked the door until morning. It was the same bed Luke had slept in when he received that blessed yet accursed vision of Rornian burning.

He had had trouble that night too, struggling to sleep without the snores of his petite wife against him, stealing the blanket. Felicity’s snores had become a soothing rhythm to fall asleep to, and even if they weren’t, Luke still got the better end of their bed sharing deal. Luke may not snore, but he was prone to kick in his sleep whenever he got a vision from the Force. Being the Grandmaster, his visions were so frequent that Felicity’s threats to smother Luke in his sleep if he didn’t stop kicking her was almost part of their nightly routine.

Luke missed their nightly routine. He missed tucking Rey into bed while Felicity showered. Luke missed the way Rey’s eyes would light up as he told her stories of their family’s many adventures.
He missed Rey falling asleep in his protective arms and sending Artoo to get Felicity’s help to rescue him without awaking Rey. Luke missed Felicity laughing at his predicament until Luke pinned her against the hallway wall in a playful, passionate kiss. He missed the nights where that passionate kiss would turn into a bout of lovemaking as he inhaled the scent of her freshly washed hair. Luke missed the way he and Felicity would chat for hours whether or not they had made love, talking about everything and nothing until they drifted off to sleep.

He missed them, and he wanted them back.

When he found them, Luke would never again let them go. Well… He would never let Felicity go. Luke would briefly let Rey go and send her to Han and Leia so he could make love to Felicity more passionately than he had ever before.

And that was saying something considering once he threw out his back.

“Daddy?” a hesitant voice came through the Force. Rey was unsure of the connection she was making, and Luke fought back tears as he heard his little girl’s voice speak to him. “Daddy, I want you.”

Luke smiled. Rey was speaking to him. He finally had confirmation that Rey was alive. Luke would have burst into Han and Leia’s room proudly proclaiming the discovery if Leia hadn’t locked Luke’s door. He couldn’t wait to tell them in the morning.

“She won’t answer you,” Obi-Wan Kenobi’s voice replied. “She’s speaking to you in here sleep. She’s not conscious to the connection. I don’t know if she’ll even recall this in the morning.”

“Obi-Wan!” Luke exclaimed. He had gotten into the habit of referring to Kenobi’s true name as not to confuse Ben Solo. “You can tell me! Are Felicity and Rey safe? Where are they?”

“I’m sorry, Luke,” Obi-Wan replied. “But you know the rules. We can only offer you guidance. We cannot tell you the living status, location, or specific current actions of another person. I cannot tell you where Felicity and Rey are, specifically what they’re doing, or even if they’re alive.”

“But you just told me that Rey is sleeping.”

“That falls under the vague category,” Anakin Skywalker input. “Have faith in your family, Luke. Rey’s a Skywalker after all, and that wife of yours… Well, I can count on one hand how many people have ever injured me during the Vader phase.”

“Phase?” Obi-Wan shot.

“Oh, not this again,” Anakin groaned.

Luke chuckled, remembering the story of Rogue Squadron’s encounter with Vader while stealing the Death Star plans. Felicity had managed to get her team away when she shot Vader in the life support system and he went down. When Luke informed his father that he was marrying the girl who once shot Vader, Anakin had chuckled and said, “That girl? I like her. She’s feisty.”

Felicity turned to drinking upon hearing that Darth Vader had called her feisty.

“So, Rey won’t remember what I say to her when morning comes?” Luke asked when he realized Obi-Wan and Anakin had been bickering over definition Anakin’s time as Vader as being a ‘phase.’
“That remains to be seen,” Obi-Wan answered. “But she won’t reply now.”

“You can still give it a shot,” Anakin encouraged. “Now if anyone needs me, I’m going to go to that embarrassment I call a grandson and try to talk some sense into him.”

“He couldn’t have done that before?” Luke bitterly snapped before he could stop himself.

“Anakin’s been trying for years, Luke,” Obi-Wan explained. “Ben just won’t allow himself to see Anakin. I think I’ll join Anakin in his attempt. My namesake is shaming our good name.”

Luke chuckled as the Force became quiet. Even years after their deaths and the whole Vader fiasco, Anakin and Obi-Wan still bickered like brother. Luke hoped twenty years from now, he and Han still acted the same.

Luke settled in his bed, comforted by his knowledge that Rey was safe. Replaying her call through the Force to him and in his mind, Luke made one last attempt to reach her before falling asleep.

“Rey, wake up,” Felicity urged the next morning.

“Daddy?” Rey moaned in confusion as her eyes fluttered open. Mommy was smiling down at her, and all around was an endless stretch of desert. Daddy was nowhere to be found. “I thought I heard Daddy. He said he misses us and hopes we’re safe.”

“It must have been a dream, Sweetheart,” Felicity gathered their breakfast from the survival kit. She didn’t dare get Rey’s hopes up that Luke had contacted them through the Force, but Felicity allowed the thought to secretly comfort herself. She handed Rey her breakfast, “Eat up. We have another long day of walking.”

Rey observed her mother as they had their breakfast. Felicity’s eyes had bags under them and she kept yawning.

“Are you tired, Mommy?” Rey asked.

“A little,” Felicity confessed. “I didn’t get much sleep last night.”

“Mommy needs her full energy if we’re going to make it to Niïma,” Rey teased.

“Cheeky,” Felicity ruffled Rey’s hair. She then turned to the survival bag and pulled something out, “I have a surprise for you. This is why Mommy didn’t sleep a lot last night. She was busy making this.”

Rey gasped as Felicity held up a blanket that had been patched together with the spare clothing in the survival bag.

“Daddy!” Rey exclaimed as she focused on Luke’s familiar flight suit taking up the middle of one side of the blanket.

“Yeah, Mommy needed her own blanket and thought Daddy wouldn’t mind,” Felicity grinned. “And if he does, well… Mommy has her ways of making sure he doesn’t.”

“Or those the grownup things Aunt Leia doesn’t let Uncle Han and Uncle Lando joke about around me?”

“Some of them. Daddy didn’t just marry me for one thing after all.”
Rey suddenly noticed something odd about the flight suit, “Mommy, what happened to the sleeves of Daddy’s flight suit?”

“I cut them off.”

“Why?”

“To make this,” Felicity pulled another item out of the bag that made Rey gasp. A small doll had been stitched out of the flight suit and a few other pieces of clothing and stuffed with sand to look like a Rebellion X-Wing Pilot, “I heard you calling for Daddy last night, so I thought I’d make you this.”

Rey happily accepted the doll, “Is it Daddy?”

Rey hugged the doll tightly, “Thank you, Mommy.”

“You’re welcome, Sweetheart,” Felicity packed their items in the bag. She held out a hand and pulled Rey to her feet, “Now, come on. The sooner we get to Niima, the sooner you can show Daddy your new doll.”

Felicity Rhiaon miscalculated.

She realized it on their forth night when she recalculated their position to Niima while Rey slept. They were still a few days from the Outpost, maybe three or four.

Felicity only had enough food and water for one more day.

She did her best to hide it from Rey in the morning, but Rey sensed Felicity’s distress through the Force. Felicity was forced to admit to Rey they were running out of food when Rey asked why Mommy hadn’t eaten breakfast or lunch.

Rey had been upset to hear Mommy was giving up her portions of food and water, but Felicity was tired, hungry, overheated, and frankly had had enough of Rey’s whining. Felicity knew Rey was young and irrational, but she couldn’t stop herself from snapping at Rey.

“Rey, nothing has changed around us! There’s no food, no shade, no water, and no civilization! I cannot do anything more right now! Stop crying about it!”

That outburst led to Felicity apologizing non-stop to Rey during their rest between 11 am and 2 pm. She and Rey shared the last of their water and final portion of food. Felicity refused to tell Rey what running out of food and water meant, and Rey was too afraid to ask.

“I’m hungry, Mommy,” Rey whispered as Felicity laid her against the sand that night to rest. Rey was very pale and barely had the energy to move.

“I know, Sweetheart,” Felicity couldn’t fight back the tears. She kissed Rey’s forehead, “I’m so sorry. I’m so sorry. Please, just close your eyes and sleep. I promise it’ll be better in the morning.”

Rey tried to sleep but couldn’t. Felicity wasn’t mad; she couldn’t sleep either.

“Poe taught me a trick one time,” Rey said as she and Mommy lay next to each other staring at the stars trying to figure out which one Daddy was on. “He said that if you ever get in a situation where you get really upset, but can’t do anything to change things, you should dig a hole and scream in it.”

“Dig a hole and scream? Why?” Felicity asked in amusement. It was nice to have a conversation distracting her from the nagging thought that she was being a terrible parent letting her daughter be tired and thirsty and hungry.

“The screaming gets the angry out,” Rey explained. “And the digging gives you something to beat up and focus on.”

“Dig a hole and scream,” Felicity chuckled. “You want to do that?”

Rey nodded.

“Alright, let’s dig a hole,” Felicity sat up but Rey didn’t follow. “Sweetheart?”

Rey looked like she was going to cry, “I- I can’t sit up.”

Felicity cringed as she looked over Rey. Rey was pale and still. Her breathing was labored and if Felicity didn’t know any better, she might have thought Rey wasn’t breathing.

“How about I dig the hole and then move you to it?” Felicity suggested. “You just close your eyes.”

“Okay, Mommy.”

So Felicity dug a hole. She had no shovel, so she dug it with her bare hands. Frequently she looked over at her daughter and every time almost had a heart acted. Eyes closed, pale skin, undetectable breathing, unnaturally still.

Rey looked dead.

When Felicity was finished digging the hole, she did as promised and moved Rey so they could scream. As they took turns screaming, Felicity had to admit that it did help a little bit. It helped enough that Rey was able to sleep.

Felicity feared what would happen when Rey woke up.

Rey couldn’t move in the morning.

“Carry me, Mommy?” Rey asked when Felicity determined that Rey wasn’t faking it. Rey legitimately could not get up and walk.

“All right,” Felicity picked up Rey and began carrying her. They would get there slower, but Felicity had no choice.

With no food, water, or signs of civilization, they were running out of time.

“Momma, where’s Papa?” Rey’s question on the seventh day threw Felicity for a loop.

Momma? Papa? Rey never called Luke and Felicity those terms. It was always Mommy and Daddy, or Mom and Dad if she was feeling bratty. Momma and Papa were terms you found in old stories, and Luke and Felicity hated the titles. Luke always said he felt like an eighty year old grandfather when he heard the term Papa.

But even more troubling was the question itself.
“Daddy’s with Aunt Leia,” Felicity reminded.

“Why isn’t he here? And where are we?”

Felicity stopped in her tracks.

“Rey, let’s take a little rest. Mommy wants to look at you,” Felicity set Rey down and placed a hand on Rey’s forehead. “Does your head hurt?”

“A little,” Rey answered.

Felicity looked over Rey. Rey’s skin looked red; at first Felicity thought it might be sunburn, but examining her arms closely Felicity determined that Rey was flushed.

She checked Rey’s pulse and watched Rey’s chest as she breathed. Rey was fast on both accounts.

Fear struck Felicity. No, it couldn’t be. She had been so careful. Rey couldn’t have-

Felicity dug in the bag and pulled out the thermometer from the medical kit. She took Rey’s temperature and observed the result with horror. 104 degrees Fahrenheit.

Rey had heatstroke.

Felicity needed shade now.

She threw everything back in her bag, scooped Rey into her arms, and ran. Felicity ran as fast and as far as she could. When she thought she could run no further, she looked down at her dying daughter and found the strength to push forward. Even if it meant she ran until she dropped dead, Felicity would not stop until her daughter was safe.

Felicity had no idea if she was heading in the correct direction, or even what she was looking for, but she didn’t care. She quite literally held a matter of life and death in her arms.

“Hold on, Sweetheart,” Felicity begged as Rey groaned in her arm. “Please hold on.”

An hour later the vomiting started. What little was in Rey’s stomach ended up splatted on Felicity’s clothing. But Felicity don’t even flinch, it was simply a reminder to her that Rey was very close to the end. Again and again, Rey vomited as Felicity carried her on. She threw up until all was left was stomach acid, and then there was nothing.

The sound of Rey’s dry heaving carried across the desert as tears gathered in Felicity’s eyes. She wanted Rey’s pain to stop, but what would happen when it did?

Overwhelmed by the possibility that Rey was about to die in her arms, Felicity did something she hadn’t done in years.

She prayed.

“I don’t believe in destiny or fate,” Felicity let the words in her head reach into the great unknown. “But I know there is something more in the universe. It may not dictate my actions, or have set my choices, but something is out there. And in this moment of desperation, I ask, I pray, I beg please help me save my daughter. Don’t take my ray of light from me. Don’t let her die.”

And the great unknown delivered.
As Felicity came to the top of a desert hill, she spotted it: a downed AT-AT, laying on its side.

Felicity and Rey had seen a great many battle remains on Jakku, and used them as shelter. But they were few and far between, the machines being concentrated mostly near Niima Outpost.

Felicity burst into tears at the sight of the AT-AT, but she paused to observe the situation. She looked down to see that Rey had fallen asleep. Felicity pulled out the survival blanket and laid it on the sand. She rested Rey atop it, and covered her with the patchwork blanket. Felicity pulled out her blaster, and with great reluctance left Rey to check out the AT-AT.

It was abandoned and untouched by the scavengers. There was a large enough space for someone to live in, and even had scraps of supplies. Felicity was quick to bring Rey inside.

Wasting no time, Felicity pulled the gels packs out of the bag and snapped them to activate their cooling powers. In the fog of her own overheated mind, she hadn’t thought to use them before that moment. She rested a pack against the survival blanket to see how it reacted to the backs. When Felicity saw that the blanket cooled, she set about placing the cool packs against Rey’s groin, neck, back and armpits before wrapping her in the survival blanket.

She thanked the Force that Luke had rambled on with so many childhood stories involving people getting heat stroke that Felicity memorised the cooling technique. Of course, Felicity would need to get Rey to the doctor to completely heal her, but it was a start.

Felicity raided the AT-AT for food supplies. Unfortunately all water had been long evaporated, but she managed to find food rations. Expired nutrient bars, but food nonetheless.

Felicity took a small bite out of one to test if they were still edible, and upon tasting food for the first time in days, Felicity finished the whole thing in less than a minute. Finding her self-control, she gathered up the rest and brought them back to where Rey was wrapped up.

“Rey, Sweetheart, I found some food,” Felicity settled next to Rey. “Here, eat this.”

But Rey didn’t stir.

“Rey?” Felicity very was nervous as she saw how pale and still Rey was. She gently prodded her daughter, “Rey, Sweetheart, please wake up.”

Rey didn’t move.

Fear overtook Felicity. No, she had gotten Rey to safety. She had made it. Felicity didn’t care if Rey was so young and sunstroke so harsh, they had made it to safety. Rey had to be alright.

“Rey, come on, this isn’t funny,” Felicity shook the little girl. “Rey, wake up!”

Tears fell from Felicity’s eyes onto Rey’s face, but still Rey did not move.

“Rey! Wake up! Wake up, Rey!” Felicity begged. “You’re safe! You’ll be alright! Please, Rey, wake up. REY! WAKE UP! REY!”

Rey wasn’t breathing.
Felicity immediately began CPR.

“Come on, Sweetheart. Rey, please wake up,” Felicity begged as she pumped her hands against Rey’s chest. “Rey, Mommy’s here. Mommy’s got you. You’re safe. Please wake up.”

Counting thirty compressions, Felicity stopped to administer a set of rescue breaths. She tilted back Rey’s head, pinched her nostrils together, and sealed Rey’s mouth with her own. Felicity watched in disappointment as both breaths failed to raise Rey’s chest. Felicity straightaway went back to chest compressions.

“Please, Sweetheart. Wake up. Come on, wake up. Please, wake up.”

There was no such thing as time anymore to Felicity. It could have been seconds or it could have been years since she started, but she wasn’t going to stop until her little girl was breathing again.

“Come on, Rey. Just one little breath,” Felicity’s voice shook as tears blurred the sight of her tiny daughter looking so pale, lying perfectly still in the sand. “Can you give Mommy one tiny breath?”

Felicity was hysterical. She begged, pleaded, prayed, scolded, and offered Rey anything she could dream of: toys, pets, clothing, delicious foods, her very own lightsaber, never having to go to school again, flying the Falcon at age five. Anything Rey wanted, Felicity would give her. She just needed Rey to live.

“Wake up, Baby. Please, wake up,” Felicity’s tears splashed on Rey’s pallid face.

Felicity was never one for pet names, choosing only to call Rey “Sweetheart” and finding the term “Baby” to be ridiculous. Even Luke chose to only use the pet name “Sweetheart” for Rey and Felicity. Although, he was never really one for nicknames to begin with. After spending too much time with Han and Leia, Luke had really been nicknamed out.

Yet in that moment, as hope slipped further and further away, Felicity could not call Rey anything but Baby. That was what Rey was: Felicity’s little baby girl.

The little baby she had conceived in love and carried in joy for nine months. The little baby who was the light at the end of the tunnel after Felicity’s difficult transition into motherhood. The little baby who was her ray of hope as Felicity struggled through postpartum depression. The little baby Felicity had fought and killed countless enemies to protect from harm. The little baby Felicity had rescued from a massacre and braved a desert for seven days to keep alive.

The little baby who was lying dead in the sand.

“Please, don’t die,” Felicity wailed. “Please, wake up. Wake up, Rey! Please, wake up!”

But as Rey continued to be unresponsive, Felicity’s desperation turned into anger and guilt.

“Don’t you dare die on me, Rey!” Felicity vehemently chastised. Her firm chest compressions pressed down so forcefully that Felicity wouldn’t be surprised if she broke one of Rey’s ribs. “Don’t you dare do this to me! I promised to protect you, to bring you home. I promised that you’d live, Rey, so live, damn it! LIVE!”

Rey didn’t move.

Felicity didn’t hear the faint rumble of the motor advancing on the AT-AT, but she certainly heard the footsteps when they approached.

Using her break to administer the rescue breaths, Felicity did her best to lean over and grab the survival bag. It was just out of reach. Grumbling as she restarted the chest compressions, Felicity stretched out her leg and hooked her foot over the bag strap. She clumsily pulled it across the sand so the bag was resting next to her. Felicity administered the next set of breaths as she reached for the bag. She had just eased the zipper open when a stranger came barrelling red-faced and furious into the AT-AT.

“What do you think you’re doing?” demanded a male alien, who was a species Felicity had never encountered before. He looked something of a cross between an anteater and a wolf. “This is my territory!”

Felicity ignored the alien and did her best to angle her body to hide Rey from his sightline. She didn’t care if the alien wouldn’t recognize Rey. Felicity dictated who did and did not get to see her daughter, and a hostile stranger did not get to see Rey.

“Did you hear me, girl?” the alien snapped. “This is my turf! I’m the only one who scavenges in these parts!”

Felicity still did not respond.

“Are you deaf or just stupid?” the alien yelled, storming towards Felicity. He didn’t see her hand closing over something inside the bag next to her. He aggressively grabbed Felicity’s shoulder to force her to turn and face him, “This is my walker if I have to drag you by the hair out of here-”

The alien suddenly found himself staring down the barrel of Felicity’s blaster.

“If you try one more time to stop me from resuscitating my daughter, I will kill you,” Felicity coolly threatened.

The alien then noticed the very still, pale child lying on the ground that the woman was kneeling next to. As he registered the woman’s puffy red eyes and the desperation and seriousness in her face, his own transformed into a look of guilt. The alien weakly released his grip on the woman’s shoulder, and she immediately turned back to resume CPR.

“That poor kid,” the alien offered. “Too young to die.”
“She’s _not_ going to die!” Felicity snapped.

The alien gave Felicity a sympathetic look as if she were the most naïve person he had ever met, “Try all you want, Girlie, but we have a saying around these parts. Miracles-”

“Don’t happen on Jakku,” Felicity finished remembering the words from long ago.

She had of course heard them on her previous visit, the people of Niima repeating them so often it might as well be put on the town flag. At the time, after suffering through so much tragedy, death, and betrayal, Felicity had nearly lost herself to the words, altering them and adopting them as her own personal mantra.

Miracles don’t happen.

She had repeated them over and over ago. She whispered them to herself in the dead of night after dreaming of ways she would save her friends if she could turn back the clock. She whispered them to herself when the Rebel medics told her she waited too long for treatment, and they couldn’t fix the scar Vader’s lightsaber had left on her back. She whispered them to herself when the report came in that the Death Star plans had been lost and Leia captured. She whispered them to herself when she lost her nerve halfway through stealing a Rebel ship to go rogue and track down the plans on Tatooine. She whispered them to herself when she learned it would take a one in a million shot to destroy the Death Star.

But that had all been before Luke Skywalker.

Luke Skywalker who had given purpose to the death of her friends. Luke Skywalker who loved her scar and taught her not to hate lightsabers, but rather those who used them for evil. Luke Skywalker who had rescued both Leia and the plans, and brought them home. Luke Skywalker who would make that one in a million shot and save the Galaxy. Luke Skywalker who would honor that achievement in a celebration ten years later where he would meet her. Luke Skywalker who had reminded her what home and love felt like. Luke Skywalker who had been her miracle. Luke Skywalker who, with Felicity created the most perfect miracle to ever grace the galaxy.

A miracle that was lying before her dead in the sand.

Felicity didn’t care if she was on Jakku, because of Luke Skywalker she knew that miracles _did_ happen, and she’d be damned if she couldn’t make one happen for Rey.

“You’re going to be alright, Rey.” Felicity didn’t know whether she was assuring her daughter or herself. She _had_ to make this miracle happen. “Come on, breathe! Breathe! BREATHE!”

A loud gasp suddenly filled the walker.

“Rey!” Felicity burst into tears, slumping back on the sand in a sitting position. She wept, her hands shaking violently as she thanked the Force over and over for allowing her to save Rey.

Rey gave a series of raspy breaths, her lungs struggling to readjust to a normal breathing pattern. Felicity forced Rey to sit up, and immediately Rey threw her arms around Felicity’s neck. Rey clung tightly to her mother, but Felicity gave a ginger hug, careful not to restrict Rey’s airflow. Felicity would have loved nothing more than to crush her daughter with such a tight hug it would leave her breathless.

“Well, would you look at that,” the alien had a slight smile on his face. “I guess miracles do happen on Jakku.”
"We’re not out of the woods yet," Felicity couldn’t help but give a slight smile. She placed her hands on Rey’s body to feel the heat of her skin. Rey was still burning up. Felicity began to rewrap Rey in the survival blanket, “Just lie still here for a couple minutes, Sweetheart. Mommy has to figure out what to do next.”

The alien shook his head before taking a closer look at the pair, “Sorry for snapping at you. I thought you were a scavenger.”

“So the lack of speeder didn’t tip you off?” Felicity shot, digging through her medical kit for inspiration.

“I suppose not,” the alien chuckled. “Must have had a hell of a walk.”

“That’s one way of putting it.”

“Indeed. I’m Quom Tinadar. Who might you be?”

Felicity considered her answer.

“Jyn Erso,” Felicity offered one of her various aliases from her undercover work during the rebellion. Unfortunately, she had already spoken Rey’s name, so she couldn’t cover that up, “This is my daughter, Rey.”

Rey frowned. Jyn Erso wasn’t Mommy’s name. Rey opened her mouth to question why Mommy had lied when she caught the warning look on Mommy’s face. Rey immediately fell silent.

“What’s wrong with the girl?” Quom asked.

“Heatstroke,” Felicity answered. “It wouldn’t be that bad if she wasn’t so young.”

“What? Heatstroke?” Quom burst out laughing. “You can’t honestly tell me you haven’t used your pills?”

“Pills?”

“Don’t tell me you’re out here without some of Unkar Plutt’s pills. You’d have to be an idiot to wander Jakku unprepared.”

“I?” Felicity paused. Considering her ill-planning on the food situation, Felicity couldn’t bring herself to refute the claim. “What pill are you talking about?”

“The cooling pill?” Quom prompted. “The one that helps with heatstroke? I’d never have a kid that young walking around the desert without.”

“Do you have one with you now?” Felicity demanded.

Quom looked taken aback by the interruption. Jyn had the ferocity of a nexu protecting her cub.

“Possibly,” Quom’s eyes drifted to the entrance of the walker where his speeder and supplies waited not very far away.

Felicity’s eyes narrowed. As much as she could do for Rey, Felicity knew there was no way she could get Rey to a doctor in time without another miracle. A miracle that in this case took the form of Quom Tinadar’s pill.

And she was getting that pill.
In that moment, nothing mattered to Felicity but Rey’s survival. Her ethics as a good person. Her adherence to a moral compass. Her fidelity to her husband. Her honour as a fair individual. Her belief to only taking a life in self-defence. None of that mattered. If saving Rey meant she had to lie, cheat, steal, or even murder the man in front of her, Felicity would not hesitate.

“What would it take to get you to give me that pill?” Felicity asked.

“What are you willing to offer?” Quom countered.

Felicity looked between Rey and Quom, before rising to her feet. She gave Quom her infamous seductive smirk, but kept one hand on the hilt of her blaster. Reaching his side, Felicity looked back at Rey once more before leaning in close enough that Quom could feel Felicity’s breath against his pointed, furry ear.

“Anything,” Felicity whispered. She was fairly certain that Luke wouldn’t be happy that she offered Quom the seduction route, but he also wouldn’t condemn her considering the circumstances.

She watched as Quom looked her up and down. He gulped as her finger stroked the hilt of her blaster. Felicity then smiled and casually looked towards her supply bag. In a few small movements she had presented Quom with his options.

“The choice is yours,” Felicity cocked her head playfully. Her voice was the perfect mix of seduction, bartering, and threat.

“Sorry, Girlie,” Quom chuckled, “while you certainly do get, how do you humans say it? You get my motor running, Vrogem and Humans aren’t… physically compatible. But that’s a nice bag you’ve got over there.”

Felicity knew she had leverage, “Anything catch your eye?”

“Go ahead,” Felicity gestured to the bag. “You can have anything in this bag in exchange for your pill.”

Rey gave a small whimper and Felicity saw her eyes flick to something.

“Except the doll,” Felicity gave an amused smile. “That’s my daughter’s.”

Quom dug through the bag. “This is pretty good stuff you’ve got. It must leave you wanting for nothing.”

“You’d be surprised.”

“Alright, how about my pill for the flares, flashlight, one of these sleeping bags?”

“That depends. What exactly does the pill do?”

“It’ll cool down the girl’s internal body temperature for a couple of hours. That should give you enough time to take a speeder ride to the doctor in Niima. It’s a good deal. One pill is worth twenty full portions of food, which is several weeks of work. Oh, and I’m also going to demand that you and your girl leave this walker.”

Felicity frowned. She had been so focused on a short term solution, she had barely thought about what she would do next. Staying in a tent for a month was fine when she was twenty-one and with twenty-seven-year-old Diego Nalto. But her five-year-old daughter?

No, Rey needed a higher level of protection; protection the walker could offer. There wasn’t anything around for miles, and it was a large, sturdy structure. It was the perfect place to hide if Felicity could figure out a way to get to and from Niima to collect food and water. Not to mention she would have to use the communication station in Niima to contact Luke to come pick them up.

Her mind was made up; Felicity wanted food, water, the pill, the walker, and transportation to Niima.

Quom Tinadar was going to give her all of that.

“I’ll give you those items, but the walker’s mine and I get all the food and water you have,” Felicity said.

Quom chuckled, “You two aren’t from here, are you?”

“Look, I don’t care what turf wars are happening on Jakku. I’m just trying to find a way to keep my daughter safe and get her home. If that means setting up camp in a walker for a while, then so be it.”

“Let me guess, your ship crashed and now you think you own the place? Don’t forget, I haven’t given you the pill yet. I still have the upper hand here, Girlie.”

Felicity’s eyes went cold, “First of all, I am not ‘Girlie.’ I am forty-one years old. I am way past ‘Girlie,’ long done with ‘Miss,’ drifting away from ‘Ms,’ don’t even get me started on ‘Mrs,’ and am even pushing ‘Ma’am.’ Do not call me ‘Girlie.’ And secondly, as far as I see it, I found this walker which means it’s mine.”

“And as far as I see it, Erso,” Quom snapped, “I can easily walk away right now with my pill and leave your daughter to die.”

Felicity drew her blaster and pointed it at Quom. The alien froze, fear filling his eyes, as Rey gently whimpered in the background.

“Listen to me, Scavenger,” Felicity’s voice was dark, “I have faced many enemies in my life. If you were to add yourself to my list, I guarantee you wouldn’t break the top twenty. In fact, you’re so insignificant that I would probably even forget I killed you. Don’t make the mistake of thinking I’m a naïve outsider. I’ve been on Jakku before; I’ve dealt with your kind. Yes, my daughter and I are stuck here, but you can’t imagine what we just escaped from.”

Rey shuddered as she remembered the night of the massacre.

“Now, I’m a reasonable woman,” Felicity continued. “I was a professional negotiator for years. I’ve handled far worse than you. I don’t want to kill you – I think it would be a waste, plus a very traumatic sight for my daughter – but I will if I have to. Since I doubt that you wish for me to kill you, I’m fairly certain that somehow you and I can work out an agreement. There has to be something in here I can offer you. Something worth giving up this walker.”

Quom’s eyes narrowed in on the golden bands on Felicity’s left hand, “You’re a married woman.”

“I assure you that I can take care of myself, but if you are foolish enough to involve my husband, I will warn you, he’s definitely someone you don’t want to cross-”

“I want your rings.”

Felicity blinked, “My rings?”
“Wedding band and engagement,” Quom pointed to her left hand. “Those rings of yours each must be worth at least a year of meals.”

“Here,” Felicity pulled them off without hesitation. She held them out, but drew back as he tried to grab them, “But on my terms. I’ll give you the wedding band now; think of it as a deposit. You’re going to give me all of your food and water, plus that pill. You’re going to leave this walker alone, forever. Finally, you will give Rey and I a ride into Niima, taking us to the doctor. After you do, I’ll give you the engagement ring. Deal?”

Quom grabbed the wedding ring, “Deal.”

Felicity watched carefully as Quom administered the pill to Rey with a drink from his canteen. While they waited for the pill to work, Felicity portioned out the proper amount of food and water for her and Rey to eat. After suffering from starvation, eating too much food, too quickly could easily make them throw up.

Next, Felicity took inventory of their remaining possessions as Quom loaded his bounty into his speeder. It was an older model, but vaguely familiar to Felicity. She was fairly certain she had seen another one in a Holo somewhere, but she couldn’t place her finger on where.

After taking Rey’s temperature, Felicity decided that Rey was healing enough that she could stash the survival blanket with the rest of the supplies. While Quom was out of the walker, Felicity took the opportunity to hide her bag. She didn’t want to take it into Niima where someone would try to barter for her items, or worse, steal them.

When Quom helped Felicity get Rey into the speeder, the only things Felicity had on her were her vomit-stained clothes, her blaster, her credit chip, and her engagement ring.

Felicity felt a pang of guilt as she watched Quom stuff her wedding ring into his pocket. While Rey’s life was worth far more than some band of gold, she couldn’t help but get sentimental. She remembered the moment Luke had slid it onto her finger, vowing to love her for the rest of his days. Felicity remembered sliding his own matching band onto his finger and making the same vow.

It was ironic that Felicity had been forced to give up the cold, material representation of her love with Luke to save the living, breathing representation of the very same thing.

With a tear in her eye, Felicity pressed a kiss to her engagement ring. She remembered the day that Luke had presented it to her. He had proposed to her on the hill overlooking Temple Village, promising to build the house of their dreams on that site, and asking her to enter it as his wife. A home he would build, where they would love each other, create and raise a child in, and build a life together.

A home that was now nothing more than ash.

“Let’s get going,” Quom’s gruff voice broke Felicity’s reverie.

Closing her hand tightly around the ring in her palm, Felicity silently nodded and climbed into the speeder.

Sitting in the backseat next to her daughter, Felicity and Rey slowly sipped on Quom’s spare canisters of water.

“How are you feeling?” Felicity gently asked, her hand absent-mindedly stroking Rey’s hot, sweaty forehead. She couldn’t help but note that Rey’s temperature felt lower.

“Better,” Rey answered.

“I’m a lot better, Mommy,” Rey assured her mother in a chuckling tone Felicity was positive Rey had gotten from Luke. Heck, Rey’s need to reassure Felicity of her wellbeing alone was proof enough that the Skywalker genes were acting up.

“Are you sure?” Felicity gave Rey a playful smile, but her tone betrayed her lingering concern.

“Promise.” Rey glanced down at the canister in her hands, and looked up at Felicity brightly, “I’ve got a whole canister full of okay!”

Felicity couldn’t help but laugh and pulled Rey into a tight hug. She pressed a kiss to Rey’s sweaty forehead, and finally gave a sigh of relief as Niima appeared as a dot on the horizon.

A tear ran down Felicity’s face. Their home may have been burned to the ground, but as long as Luke, Felicity, and Rey had each other, they knew there was still hope.

“Thank you for staying alive,” Felicity whispered to Rey.

Rey grinned and gave Daddy’s famous reply, “Anytime.”

Felicity almost burst into tears when they arrived in Niima. She had done it: she had gotten Rey to safety.

When he parked the speeder, Quom Tinadar pointed out the doctor’s hut and then held out his hand. Felicity sighed and handed over her engagement ring.

“Nice doing business with you,” Quom grinned.

“Anytime,” Felicity sarcastically replied as she lifted Rey out of the speeder. She didn’t trust Rey’s condition enough to let her walk.

“Maybe I’ll see you around, Erso,” Quom chuckled. “You and your little Miracle Girl.”

Felicity just shook her head as Quom started up his speeder. Quom had just barely driven back towards the desert when a creature came up to Felicity.

“Kachay foo je,” the creature demanded in a language Felicity didn’t understand.

For the first time in her life, Felicity missed having Threepio around.

“Pardon me,” Felicity politely said, trying to step around him.

“Nobata,” the creature cut off her path to the doctor. “Kachay foo je!”

Felicity’s eyes narrowed dangerously. Was he really going to put himself between a doctor and a mother holding a dying child?

He began gesturing to a stand in the middle of the outpost where a large group of scavengers were lined up. Felicity was fairly certain it hadn’t been there the last time she was on Jakku. Niima Outpost was much smaller at the time, Unkar operating out of a small tent. The Battle of Jakku must have expanded the scavenging business.

“I have to get to the doctor,” Felicity snapped. “Move out of the way before I’m forced to harm you.”

“Kachay foo je!” the creature exclaimed looking exasperated.

“Mommy, he’s saying ‘walk with me,’” Rey suddenly piped up. “He’s speaking Daddy’s language.”

“Huttese, of course,” Felicity muttered. “How could I have forgotten?”

Luke had been ecstatic the day he learned Felicity could speak his second language. Of course, it was only bits and pieces she had picked up decades ago, but she did know a little. Over the years, Luke had attempted to teach Felicity to speak fluently. Felicity had always struggled with languages and despite Luke’s best efforts, she could only speak Huttese a bit better than she could land a ship.

Which basically meant her current trip to Jakku was her own personal hell.

Rey on the other hand, was very fluent in the language. The idea to teach Rey Huttese came from a time while Felicity was pregnant with Rey. Luke had gone through a phase where he read every parenting book he could get his hands on. In one, he read that the first few years of a child’s life was the best time to teach them other languages and Luke decided to introduce Rey to as many as possible. Rey, being a Skywalker, had easily picked up on Huttese and often had full conversations with Luke in the language.

Which meant Felicity only had one option.

“Rey, can you please tell him that Mommy needs to take you to the doctor?” Felicity asked.

As Rey turned and said something to the creature, Felicity tried not to dwell on the fact that her five-year-old was acting as her translator.

The creature and Rey exchanged a few sentences, and at one point the creature paused to say something into a comlink. After a few more exchanges, Rey looked up at Felicity in excitement.

“He says we have to come with him because he’s going to help us get back to Daddy!” Rey proclaimed.

Felicity was instantly suspicious, “How does he know Daddy?”

“Daddy called his boss and promised them a reward,” Rey explained.

“Who’s his boss?” Felicity questioned.

“Now you haven’t forgotten me that easily, have you, My Girl?” a voice from the past answered her.

Felicity turned to find herself face to face with the familiar, nauseating form of Unkar Plutt. It had been twenty years since Felicity had encountered him, but not a thing had changed. Especially not the way his beady eyes liked to roam over her body.

“Plutt,” Felicity said shortly. Protectively she shifted Rey in closer, tightening her embrace on her daughter.

“Rhiaon,” Unkar grinned. “You got old.”
“Apparently not old enough,” Felicity glared at his hungry gaze. “What do you want?”

“To congratulate you. That husband of yours in a fine catch. Very handsome, very powerful, and word on the street, very rich.”

Felicity said nothing. It was true, Luke certainly made sure his family wanted for nothing. He had come into a frankly ridiculous amount of credits when he inherited the estate of Darth Vader. There were many rumors about the exact amount, but Luke had not even disclosed it to Felicity until they had been married a full month. Upon seeing the number, Felicity had gone catatonic for an hour until she finally exclaimed that she didn’t care if Vader was the second-in-command for the Empire, Vader had been way overpaid.

That said, Luke and Felicity did not live a life of excess. Most of their money went to charity, funding the Jedi Order, and buying their way out of the trouble that seemed to constantly follow them. The credit chips stored in their survival kits – one of said chips being stored on Felicity’s person at that moment – was more than enough to take care of whatever Felicity needed to do to get herself and Rey off of Jakku.

Not that Felicity was about to disclose any of that information to Unkar Plutt of all people.

“Luke takes care of us,” Felicity offered simply. Normally she would add a caveat that she earned her own way in life, but considering her job was architect to the Jedi Order, Felicity was technically on Luke’s payroll. “You claim to have been in contact with him?”

“About a week ago.”

“Prove it.”

“I thought you might say that,” Unkar held out a small holo recording.

A small blue image of a haggard-looking Luke Skywalker was projected from the disc, “If Rhiaon or Rey shows up, Plutt, you will immediately get them to contact me, and you will take care of their needs until I can come get them. By needs I mean water, shelter, appropriate portions of food, medical attention, and whatever else they ask of you. When I come get them, we will negotiate a reward. If you fail any of my conditions, you will forfeit your prize. Do we have an understanding?”

“I naturally agreed to his proposition,” Unkar flicked off the transmission. “So, how much do you think Lover Boy will give me?”

“Depends on how well you behave yourself,” Felicity smirked. Luke had given her plenty of leverage to get Plutt to meet her demands. “Now, how about that doctor?”

Felicity had barely handed Rey over to Doctor Aletha Kymeri before Plutt was dragging Felicity towards the communication center. She was almost a little disappointed in how eager Plutt was to get his reward. Felicity wanted to stay with Rey, but was also comforted that Dr. Kymeri had been very warm and kindly, vowing to take care of Rey. But only the knowledge that Felicity was about to see Luke and assure him they were okay was what let Felicity leave Rey with the doctor.

“She gets as many messages she needs,” Plutt ordered the station attendant as he followed Felicity into the communication room.

It was a simple room: four black walls forming a small box, a transmission pad to stand on, a number pad to type in your com code, and a machine that listed basic important code numbers such as the Republic Academy, and the Senate Building on Hosnian Prime.
Felicity gave Plutt a look, “Do you mind?”

Plutt looked like he did, but he backed out of the room, “Just tell me when you’re done.”

Felicity turned to the number pad and paused for a moment to fix up her appearance as best she could. She knew Luke was probably already feeling guilty enough, so there was no point in distressing him further by bluntly displaying the hardships she had been through.

Typing in Luke’s personal com code, Felicity let out a sigh of relief. She smiled as the room filled with mechanical squeals as the line tried to connect to Luke.

This was it. After seven days of walking through the desert. After being constantly hungry, thirsty, sleepy, and sad. After the loneliness, the bitterness, the grief, the guilt, and the worry. After house fires, ship crashes, massacres, heatstroke, and bartering. After everything they had been through, Felicity and Rey would finally be saf-

“The line’s busy!” the operator shouted.

What?

What?

“Try it again!” Felicity ordered. “There has to be a mistake.”

“Alright,” the operator retried the call. A few moments of silence passed, “Sorry. Can’t get through.”

He had to be joking. Felicity had just walked through the Force damned desert for seven kriffing days with a laughable amount of supplies basically dragging their dying daughter behind her… and Luke had the gall to be busy?

“Are you positive you can’t get through?” Felicity asked.

“Sorry, but the line’s all tied up,” the operator replied. “Do you want to leave a message? I can bypass the line, and go straight to his message box system.”

“Yes, please,” Felicity’s teeth were gritted.

Oh, she was going to leave Luke a message alright. A long, loud, angry message detailing how she would kill Luke when she got her hands on him.

A busy line; was he serious?

As the operator fiddled with his controls, Felicity paused to mess up her appearance, undoing and worsening her previous appearance. She was going to do anything to make Luke feel the shame of promising to find her and Rey and then apparently being too damn busy to follow through on it.

“You’ve reached the message box of Luke Skywalker,” a tired, familiar voice filled the room. Luke sounded desperate, “I’m currently either using, or away from my line at the moment. Please, feel free to leave a message. However, I am currently going through a family emergency, and most likely will be unavailable to return most calls. If you do have any information on the whereabouts of my wife and daughter, please try to contact either my sister, Leia Organa-Solo or brother-in-law, Han Solo.”

Oh, Felicity had information about Luke’s wife and daughter alright. They were on Jakku, his daughter recovering from her almost death, and his wife pissed off in the communication center. She didn’t know if she could get even madder than she was at the moment.

“I’m sorry,” the clinical female voice of a recording chirped, “but this inbox is currently full.”

Felicity was madder.

“I can’t get through,” Felicity snapped at the operator, her eyes flashing darkly. “I’m calling someone else.”

“Go ahead!” the operator shouted.

Felicity typed in Leia’s number. Leia was about to get an earful. Felicity knew that Leia would be just as mad. Heck, Felicity figured she probably should go easy on Luke, or Leia might tear Luke to shreds before Felicity could.

A busy line and a full inbox. Felicity couldn’t believe it. And for it to be Luke of all people who was doing this. She couldn’t wait to talk to Leia, because honestly, who was so stupid to-

“That line’s busy too!” the operator called.

Felicity’s jaw dropped. What kind of sadistic joke were they playing on her?

But, the ridiculousness didn’t stop there. Sure enough, just like Luke, Leia’s line was busy and her inbox was full. And so was Han’s, and so was the line for the Falcon, and so was Han and Leia’s home line on Hosnian Prime.

What the hell were they doing that was so much more important than finding her?

That very same moment on Hosnian Prime...

“Lor San, have you heard anything from my wife and daughter?”

“Han, Luke, I have an update: Chewbacca’s taken the Falcon off-line while they search Mandalore.”

“Guys, I think Lando blocked my number.”

Felicity stared at the number pad in disbelief. She couldn’t get through to them. What was she supposed to do now? It would only be a matter of time before the First Order tracked her ship to Jakku. Then what? Would she hide? Flee? How could she do either? She was in the middle of fighting for the lives of herself and her daughter, and yet their family apparently couldn’t be bothered to leave one com line open.

No, she had to keep calling. But who could she call?

Her first thoughts were either the lines to her home on Rornian or Luke’s office line. But considering the last time she saw her home and the Jedi Temple, both were on fire, Felicity had little faith either of those lines were still in service.

She could call her own office, but who would even answer?

Could she call a friend? Diego Nalto? Lando Calrissian? Wedge Antilles? Chewbacca’s family? Kes and Poe Dameron? The thought was tempting, but dangerous. If the First Order was tracking her, calling a friend would put that friend in danger.
Calling someone to deliver sensitive information in the hopes that they could call and deliver that information to someone else – someone even Felicity couldn’t get through to at the moment – was placing a little too much trust in the third party. Felicity did trust her friends, but she didn’t trust that the First Order wouldn’t intercept her message before it got to Luke.

She thought about calling her old work, the Senate Emissary Office on Coruscant. It would be safer considering it was a governmental line. But she remembered her former boss, Nils Arlos mentioning that the com number had been changed a few months back after it was discovered the First Order had bugged their line. If only Felicity could think of another governmental line to call.

Wait, a governmental line?

“Put me through to the Senate Building on Hosnian Prime,” Felicity ordered the operator. “Enter extension 1138.”

A few moments later a cheerful but diplomatic voice chirped into the room.

“You’ve reached the office of Leia Organa-Solo, Senator of Coruscant and Founding General of the Resistance Movement.” Jaina Fel, Leia’s assistant said in a recording. “The Senator is currently experiencing a family emergency, and has taken a leave of absence. You may leave a message if you wish, but know that it might take the Senator some time to return it. If you are calling to express your condolences regarding Felicity and Rey Rhiaon Skywalker, the Senator would like to thank you, but asks you not leave a message to prevent her inbox from filling, and preventing the leaving of messages containing important information regarding search.”

Felicity loudly snorted.

“If you are a journalist calling to seek further details regarding the Burning of Rornian, the search for the Skywalkers, the movements of the First Order, or the newest recruit of the Knights of Ren, I would like to reiterate the address the Senator made the night after the incident. A statement has been released, and the Senator and her family will not be answering any further questions at this time. There will be a press conference held if there has been a development. If you would still like to leave a message, please press 1.”

Felicity pressed one.

To Felicity’s surprise, Chancellor Mon Mothma of all people began to speak.

“Due to the high volume of calls Senator Organa-Solo has been receiving, the Senate has determined to restrict access of this number to a list of specific persons for select reasons,” the recording said. “A computer system will be going over all messages left, and filtering out the unnecessary one. Only the approved persons correctly identified by voice signature, contacting for an approved reason will be forwarded to the office of Senator Leia Organa-Solo.”

Felicity was amazed; people really must have been tying up the Senate lines if Mothma had gotten involved.

Jaina’s recorded voice returned, “At the tone, please state your full name, and one of the following reasons for your message: One, Senate Business; two, First Order Information; three, the Search for Felicity Rhiaon; four, Media Inquires; or five, Other.”

A beep filled the room.

“Felicity Rhiaon Skywalker, the Search for Felicity Rhiaon,” Felicity spoke in a calm, clear voice. She had to be careful that the computer would understand her words, match it to her voice signature, and actually put her message through.

"Approved," Jaina’s recording sounded.

Felicity vaguely wondered if there was even a denial message or if an unapproved message would just be deleted when it went to the external sorting computer. In fact, she wondered what things would be filtered out. Would they think the search for herself was unimportant for a business line? She hoped not, or else she was in big trouble.

Jaina continued, “At the tone, please leave your message… Beep.”

Felicity took a deep breath and composed herself. She was furious at her family, but didn’t want an aggressive tone to get the computer to delete her message.

“Hey, Leia, it’s Felicity,” Felicity smiled for the recording. “I’m calling you to tell you that safe. I’ve been trying to contact you and the boys, but funny story, all of your lines have been tied up, and message boxes full. Considering the hoops I had to jump through just to get to this inbox, I can only imagine you guys are so busy trying to find me, you don’t really have the time to actually stop and listen for me.”

Felicity took another breath, calming herself before she got into a rant.

“I’m worried that the First Order might try to track me, so I’ll keep this brief. I’m fine – a little battered around from my journey – but fine. I would say I’m doing good, but considering the hell I’ve suffered through the past few days, I’ll stick to the word ‘fine.’ Rey is-”

Felicity paused. How much should she tell about Rey? She certainly wasn’t about to tell Luke via Leia via an answering machine that an hour ago, Rey had basically died but now was fine.

“Well… we can discuss Rey later,” Felicity decided vagueness was the best route. “I’m on Jakku, and I took up that offer Luke arranged. I should be fine for a while, but please, for the love of the Force, would someone please come pick me up? I’d settle for Lando at this point. I love you all. Tell Luke I love him, and that I’m counting the minutes until I see him again.”

Felicity hit the end call button.

There she had done it; she had left a patient, composed, friendly message that would ensure they come get her. No need to get angry, no need to rant, no need to think about how tired and hot and hungry and thirsty she was. No need to think about how much her feet and head hurt, no need to recall the horrifying sight of her dying daughter, and that desperate attempt to save Rey’s life. No need to think about how after suffering through hell, she couldn’t even get a damn message through to her own family. No need to be upset.

And yet, she was.

“Call them back,” Felicity ordered the operator.

She fumed as she waited through the extensive recordings. No, she was not allowing them to get away with this scott-free. How dare they do this to her?

“At the tone, please state your full name, and one of the following reasons for your message: One, Senate Business; two, First Order Information; three, the Search for Felicity Rhiaon; four, Media Inquires; or five, Other.”

“Felicity Rhiaon Why the Hell Did I Ever Marry a Skywalker for the Search for Felicity Freaking
“Thank God for computers searching by code words,” Felicity muttered knowing her voice signature and the keywords of ‘Felicity’ ‘Rhiaon’ ‘Skywalker’ and ‘Search’ were probably the only things that had gotten her through.

Jaina continued, “At the tone, please leave your message… Beep.”

“You know what?” Felicity yelled, “No! I am not letting this go! Who the hell tells someone they’ll see each other again, and then doesn’t leave even one damn com line open so they can contact you. I mean, seriously? Are you kidding me, Luke? I’ve been through hell and back and I get a busy signal? You get your ass here, Skywalker, right now or I swear to the Force itself, I will kill you.”

Felicity slammed her hand against the end call button and loudly exhaled.

“Feel better now that that’s out of your system?” the operator asked.

Felicity smiled, “Much better.”

“There, home sweet home,” Felicity proclaimed later that night as she finished tying up a hammock in the walker.

After the call to Leia, Felicity had gone back to Plutt and worked out a deal. She and Rey got a ride back to the walker, and was promised a ride was available anytime they wanted to go in and out of Niima Outpost. In addition to a handful of supplies, such as the hammock and a small ration cooker, Plutt was going to personally bring the girls food and water rations every couple of days. Felicity preferred to have Rey away from the sketchy figures that populated Jakku, and you never knew who was secretly working for the First Order.

If Felicity received any calls, or if a member of the family showed up on Jakku, Plutt would fetch Felicity immediately. Anything else Felicity wanted or needed, Plutt insisted that all she had to do was ask. It was clear Plutt wanted to milk Luke’s promise of reward for everything it was worth.

Felicity had spent the rest of the day trying to spruce up the walker for herself and Rey. The hammock was strung up and made with the emergency blanket for Rey. For herself, Felicity found a large piece of non-metallic paneling she set on the floor and put the remaining sleeping bag and her cobbled together blanket on top of. Most of the day had been spent on exploring the walker, and figuring out how to turn it into a temporary home.

Admittedly, Felicity was at a bit of a disadvantage when it came to AT-AT walkers. Her only experience with them was during the glory days of the Rebellion where she was forced to run away from them and hope she wouldn’t get shot. Her war stories weren’t as grand as Luke’s who took down a walker with a lightsaber and grappling hook.

Show-off.

But she was a trained architect, and most of her studies had been on Imperial designs. Her schooling had mostly come from her undercover recruitment missions during the Rebellion where she would enroll into Imperial Academies and scout future Rebels.

Her architecture knowledge and the mechanical things she had picked up from others over the years gave her a little room to work with in converting the walker into a livable space. Most of the exploration would have to wait for the next day, but she and Rey had poked around the walker a little that day.

First off, Felicity knew enough to disconnect the fuel slug tank.

“That stuff’s dangerous,” Felicity warned Rey as she watched in curious interest.

Rey was a true Skywalker and therefore fascinated with all things mechanical. Knowing that the Skywalker love of mechanics originated with Anakin, Felicity had once tried to pin Rey’s love on the Rhiaon side of the family. Luke was only too quick to point out that if that was true, it had to have come from her father, Alaric Rhiaon, Head Technician of the Death Star.

Grandpa Sith Lord or Grandpa Death Star Creator; either way Rey was screwed.

Of course, the whole walker was dangerous. It would take some serious work for Felicity to make it safe for Rey. In the meanwhile, she would have to restrict Rey to stay in the troop section where there was plenty of living space and a lot less danger.

Well, except for the ten E-11 rifles that were still racked and ready, and the five scattered DLT-20 As Felicity found. Thankfully, over the years, Luke and Felicity had firmly instilled in Rey not to touch weapons without both Mommy and Daddy’s permission (both, as there had once been a disagreement when Luke let Rey handle his powered off lightsaber without Felicity’s knowledge.)

The good thing about the guns was that if the First Order found them, Felicity could use the weapons to make a hell of a last stand. Not to mention she could trade them to Plutt for about three months of rations.

Felicity prayed that they wouldn’t be on Jakku long enough for that number of rations to be necessary.

“Mommy, why are you mad?” Rey asked as they got ready for bed. She held her doll tightly in her arms as Felicity laid the emergency blanket over her.

Felicity frowned at Rey, “Why do you say that?”

“I can feel it, like Daddy taught me to.”

Felicity grimaced; there was Rey’s Force sensitivity acting up again. Felicity had tried very hard not to let Rey know how frustrated she was about their situation. She tried to remember why she ever agreed to let Luke teach Rey to sense emotions.

Rey looked down timidly, “Are you mad at me?”

Felicity gasped in shock, “No, Sweetheart, of course not. Why would you think that?”

“Because I couldn’t make it Niima for you, and I think I used up all of our bravery.”

“Don’t you dare worry about either of those things,” Felicity lovingly stroked Rey’s cheek. “We got there and that’s all that matters.”

“But I scared you, didn’t I? When everything went dark.”

“Yes, you did,” Felicity swallowed hard; she never again wanted to think about Rey lying dead in the sand. “In fact, I’ve never been more terrified in my life. I almost lost you today, Sweetheart, and I never want to experience that again.”
Rey whimpered, “I’m sorry.”

“There’s nothing to be sorry about,” Felicity wiped away a tear trailing down Rey’s cheek. “It’s not your job to prevent me from being scared. Now, if you go jump off a roof and knock yourself out, then we’ll have a problem, but if I’m worried about the fact that I have done something that put you in a dangerous situation, like not have enough water for you, or if someone is going to hurt you, it is not your job to make me feel better. It’s my job to protect you and make sure you get out of the situation safely.”

“So,” Rey sniffed and rubbed the tears out of her eyes, “you’re not mad at me?”

“Not in the slightest.”

“Then… why are you mad? Did something happen? Is Daddy ok?”

“I’m sure Daddy’s fine, it’s just…” Felicity sighed, she couldn’t keep it from Rey, “I couldn’t get through to Daddy today.”

“What?” Rey exclaimed, shooting up straight upright in the hammock.

“Relax,” Felicity gently eased Rey to lay back down. “Daddy was so busy trying to find us, I couldn’t get through to his com line.”

“What about Uncle Han or Aunt Leia?”

“They were busy too.”

“So no one’s coming to rescue us?”

“I didn’t say that,” Felicity shook her head. “I was able to get a message to Aunt Leia’s office. You know Aunt Leia’s assistant, Jaina, right?”

Rey nodded.

“Well, Jaina’s going to make sure that Aunt Leia gets the message, and when she does, Daddy’s going to come get us,” Felicity explained.

“When will he come?” Rey asked.

Felicity paused, “Truthfully, I’m not sure, but I know he will, and if Daddy can’t, then either Uncle Han or Aunt Leia will find you and bring you home to our family. I promise. Besides, Sweetheart, we’ve been on Jakku for a while now, it can’t be much longer.”

“Twenty-two days?” Rey echoed the answer she had gotten the last time she asked how much longer until she could see Daddy.

A pained look crossed Felicity’s face; she remembered the promise she had made Rey, a promise that would never come true.

“No, Sweetheart,” Felicity said sadly, “I can’t promise twenty-two days.”

Rey finally broke down. She threw her arms around her mother’s neck and sobbed heavily.

“I want to go home, Mommy!” Rey exclaimed through howls. “I want to go home!”

Felicity clung onto Rey tightly, her own tears falling, “I know, Sweetheart. I want to go home too.”
The next morning, Rey woke up in her mother’s arms, snuggling up to her in the hammock. Rey had cried herself to sleep last night, and Felicity had been stuck with Rey’s arms around her that it made more sense to share the hammock than wake Rey up.

Rey sniffed, remembering the things her mother had told her last night. She couldn’t understand what was happening, and why her parents were breaking so many promises.

They promised she’d be safe in her bed.

They lied.

Mommy promised that Daddy would be home in twenty-two days.

Mommy lied.

Daddy promised to come back for her in the woods.

Daddy lied.

Mommy promised she would get Rey safely to Niima Outpost.

Mommy lied.

Daddy promised that Ben would never try to hurt her.

Daddy lied.

What could she believe anymore?

“Morning,” Felicity’s gentle greeting interrupted Rey’s thoughts.

Rey startled like a deer, and Felicity chuckled as Rey scrambled to gather her bearings, nearly flipping the hammock.

“I’m sorry about last night,” Felicity grasped Rey’s arm to steady and calm her. “I know things have been very scary lately, but I promise you that Daddy and I are trying our best to keep you safe.”

“You and Daddy made a lot of promises,” Rey sniffed, trying to hold back fresh tears.

Felicity took a deep breath, “I know, and we haven’t been great at keeping them lately, so I’ll promise you this: I promise to not make you any more promises I can’t keep. Do you believe me?”

Rey was hesitant, but the words that had been broken were nothing compared to the actions her mother had performed to keep her safe. Facing off against Ben, getting her through the desert, and even using her own breath to restore Rey’s. Rey may not be able to trust Mommy to keep her promises, but she could trust Mommy to keep her alive.

“I believe you, Mommy,” Rey hugged Felicity.

And as Felicity held Rey in her tight embrace, Felicity knew that for just a moment, they were safe.
“Here we are: breakfast,” Felicity placed in front of Rey a plate of Imperial rations Unkar Plutt had given them.

Rey took a bite and made a face, “Ugh! That’s horrible.”

“Rey,” Felicity warned. “What do we say when we don’t like something?”

Rey gave her mother a sheepish look, “I don’t really like that, but thank you for letting me try it.”

“Better. Now eat up; that’s all we have.”

“But Mommy-”

“I know Alliance rations taste better, but I’ve run out of those, and not eating is not an option.”

“I want to eat,” Rey said quietly to herself, remembering all too vividly the pangs of hunger. She took a small bite of her rations and struggled to swallow it. “I’m tired of rations, Mommy. When can we have real food?”

“Not for a while yet,” Felicity answered honestly. There was no point in hiding anything about their situation from Rey.

Rey crossed her arms, “I can’t wait to get home.

Felicity paused, “Rey… when we leave Jakku we’re not… We can’t exactly go home.”

“Why not?”

“Sweetheart, the Knights of Ren set it on fire. I don’t know how much of it is left.”

“But it was my stuff!” Rey exclaimed, her five-year-old not making sense of the concept.

“I know,” Felicity placed a hand on Rey’s shoulder trying to calm her down. “There’s things in there I didn’t want to lose either.”

“Like what?”

“Well,” Felicity dry swallowed. Caught up in the situation of taking care of Rey and getting them to Niima, Felicity hadn’t even entertained their house burning down. “There’s my wedding dress, my blaster collection, all of our family Holos, there’s my and Daddy’s medals of bravery for destroying the Death Star, I had a box tucked in the attic of some of your baby things, all of our personal records – birth certificates, my and Daddy’s wedding license – Uncle Brendan’s urn-”

Felicity couldn’t go on.

Tears had filled her eyes and she put her head in her hands. Felicity’s shoulders jerked as desperate sobs escaped her throat. Every object that meant anything to her was gone for good.

“Don’t cry, Mommy,” Rey’s scared, but trying to be helpful voice broke Felicity’s heart.

“Come here,” Felicity pulled Rey into her arms. She held Rey as tightly as she could and gently stroked her hair, “I know that you’re sad about losing all of your things, and I am too, but the most important thing to remember is that you, Daddy, and I all got away. We’re safe, and soon we’ll be together again.”

Rey buried her face in Felicity’s neck, “Are you going to call Daddy again tomorrow?”

“No, Sweetheart.” Seeing Rey’s shocked expression, Felicity explained, “The people who burned down our home are looking for you and I right now.”

“Why?”

“Because they’re bad people who think we can help them do bad things. I’m not going to let them find us, but that means we can’t draw a lot of attention to ourselves. Sending a bunch of messages would draw attention, so I’m going to wait before trying to call Daddy again. Do you understand?”

Rey nodded, “Mommy, what will happen if the bad people come here?”

“I will do anything and everything to make them go away before they find you.”

“Would you…” Rey looked down, the image of Zena Halcorr flashing through her mind, “Would you kill them?”

There was a beat.

“Yes,” Felicity finally answered. She caressed Rey’s teary cheek, “You know that Daddy and I have a strict code about violence.”

“Right, I only use it if I’ve run out of options, but there is no shame in killing to protect someone from imminent danger.”

“Is that true all the time?”

you don’t need to worry about any of this because the bad people aren’t going to find us. Daddy’s going to come for us.”

“When will you call him again?” Rey asked.

“A couple of weeks,” Felicity answered.

“How many?”

Felicity smiled, “Why don’t you pick?”

Rey thought hard, “How many days have we been here?”

“Eight. So one day and one week.”

“Then we’ll call him in three weeks to make it a month.”

“Deal!” Felicity held out her hand and the girl shook on it. Inwardly, Felicity shuddered at the thought of being stuck on Jakku for a month. “Now, how about you held me keep track of the days?”

“How?” Rey asked.

Felicity set their plates aside and pulled Rey to her feet. She took Rey by the hand and led her to a large wall where a small sharp object was set neatly next to it.

“I figured this out last night,” Felicity let go of Rey’s hand and picked up the object. She looked seriously to Rey and warned, “You are not allowed to touch this without Mommy’s permission. Do you understand? It’s very sharp.”

Felicity held out the sharp object and Rey nodded.

“We’re going to keep track of how many days we’ve been here by marking the wall,” Felicity scratched eight lines onto the wall.

“Mommy, you forgot to cross your tallies,” Rey pointed to the side by side lines. She was used to seeing hash marks that were crossed every fifth line.

“It doesn’t matter,” Felicity shook her head. “I want you to focus, because if you pay attention you could get a prize out of this.”

“A prize?” Rey’s eyes lit up. “What prize? How can I get it?”

“Rey, you’ve been such a good girl, and Mommy’s put you through so much that I’ve decided to reward you for your behaviour. Every day I’m going to add a line to the wall, and at the end of this adventure I’m going to let you cash in the lines. You can use one for say… double dessert one night, or a small toy. For bigger things, you can cash in multiple lines, so if you wanted a new doll that might cost three lines. What do you think?”

Rey grinned, “I hope we’re here for lots of days!”

Felicity laughed and ruffled Rey’s hair, “Don’t get your hopes up, Sweetheart. This is Daddy we’re talking about. How long could Daddy make us wait here?”

---

Two Weeks Later…
Luke Skywalker stared at himself in the refresher mirror. His hair was done perfectly, his grand black Jedi robes were immaculate, and the rest of his body was freshly washed and polished.

But there was no denying the deadness in his tired blue eyes. There was no denying the weary lines that were etched onto his face. There was no denying the droop of his posture or the way his eyes constantly flicked to his comlink. And there was no denying the look of sorrow and brokenness that haunted his expression.

He missed his girls.

Luke wondered about them constantly. Were they safe? Were they happy? Why hadn’t they contacted him yet? He had barely been away from his comlink for a minute in the past three weeks, yet not a word from his wife.

Today he finally had to pause his search and give his testimony of the Burning of Rornian to the Senate. Thankfully Leia had arranged for Chancellor Mon Mothma to see them privately to give the account, but recalling the events of that night was the last thing Luke wanted to do.

And then there was the issue of outing Ben.

Rumors had swirled about his involvement and new membership in the Knights of Ren, but Luke had refused to publicly confirm a thing. He knew it needed to be revealed at the right time or Leia’s reputation in the Senate would be broken beyond repair.

They had all heard the catty whispers: Darth’s Daughter. Vaderspawn. Imperial Heir. The Sith Senator. It was one of the reasons Leia refused to accept any of inheritance from their father’s estate. Leia did everything in her power to be known as something more than Darth Vader’s daughter. Despite doing all she could to distance herself from their father, Leia could not escape Vader’s shadow.

It was shocking how quickly the public eye had reduced her from a war hero to nothing more than Vader’s daughter. No amount of reminding people that Leia herself had been tortured by Vader seemed to do the trick. Ever since Luke and Leia announced their true parentage, Leia had struggled to hold on to her Senate seat, and every election cycle would just bring up the whole controversy once more.

Luke probably didn’t help her case by constantly advocating for Anakin whenever the subject of Vader came around. Leia always preferred the company of Han and Felicity when the issue popped up. Han would give a gruff response that Vader was a psychopath that Leia wanted nothing to do with, and then threaten to beat up anyone who pushed the issue. Felicity would go on long, angry rants about how much good Leia had done, how evil Vader was, and that if anything it should be Vader who was ashamed to be related to someone as amazing as Leia.

Luke smiled at the thought of his wife. There were still days he woke up and couldn’t believe he had found someone he could love as much as Felicity Rhiaon. He couldn’t have asked for a better woman to be his wife, and the mother of his child.

And he wanted her back so much.

“Coming,” Luke smoothed down his hair once again and slipped out of the bathroom.

He walked with Leia into the living room where Han, Chewie, Wedge, Diego, and Kes Dameron (who had come to visit his son, Poe at the academy) were continuing the search for Rey and Felicity.
“Have you found anything?” Luke asked hopefully.

“Only that you seriously need to make some female friends, Skywalker,” Wedge glanced around at the surplus of men.

A sad look crossed Luke’s face, “I did have some.”

The room was filled with an awkward silence as everyone was forced to remember that Luke’s main female friends – Reine, Alyla, Zena, and so forth – had all been Jedi slaughtered on Rornian.

“Hey,” Han spoke up to break the ice, “remember that time Wedge complained that no one could make the shot to destroy the Death Star and Luke just offhandedly said he did it all the time to womprats?”

Wedge raised a brow, “That’s really the best story about me you can recall?”

“Well, we don’t really hang out a lot, do we Antilles?”

“Personally I would have gone with, remember that time Antilles accidentally put Fliss in the hospital,” Diego suggested.

“Thought about it, but figured it would remind Luke of Fliss and he’d get all mopey,” Han answered.

“Because getting upset over the disappearance and possible death of my wife is apparently not worth getting moody over,” Luke rolled his eyes. “So I take it that there’s no new leads?”

“Sorry,” Kes shook his head. “But we’ll keep looking. Keep your chin up, we might find them yet.”

“Luke,” Leia touched his arm, “it’s time to go.”

“I still don’t think this is a good idea, Leia,” Luke said as they walked towards her office in the Senate building. His hood was pulled over his lowered head so no one would recognize him. He and Leia had been mobbed by a flood of reporters upon entry to the building and constantly stopped by Senators on their way to Leia’s office.

“It’ll only be an hour or so,” Leia replied. “Besides, people need to see that you aren’t just hiding away.”

“Fine, but we go out the back way when we leave.”

“Deal,” Leia pushed open the door to her office.

Jaina looked up from Leia’s desk, “Senator Organa! It’s good to see you.”

“Good to see you too, Jaina,” Leia smiled not at all surprised that her assistant had overtaken her desk. Jaina had been forced to act as a pseudo-stand-in for Leia, and letting her have the desk just made everything easier. “How have things been?”

“Much better since the Chancellor had a computer start sorting your messages.” Jaina looked over at Luke and kindly said, “Master Skywalker, I am so sorry for your loss.”

Jaina had only been in Leia’s employ for a couple years, but the entire family had taken an immediate like to her. Fair skin, dark brown hair and eyes, Han liked to tease Leia that Jaina looked enough like her that Jaina was the result of an affair she had spectacularly managed to hide from him. Furthering the long lost daughter narrative was the fact that Jaina had been born the exact same day as Ben.

However, Leia would always point out that Jaina was obviously not her secret lovechild because not only would it mean that Jaina would be Ben’s twin and ergo Han’s daughter, but what was the point in hiding Jaina from the family? Not to mention fair skin, brown hair, and dark eyed women weren’t exactly uncommon, showcased spectacularly in the Skywalker family (literally the only female in the family who didn’t have those features was Beru Whitesun who had married into the family via the son of a man who had married into the family.)

Jaina was only sixteen, but highly capable for the job of Leia’s secretary. When Leia had hired Jaina two years ago, there had been some question regarding the wisdom of Leia hiring a fourteen-year-old. But Leia had always had a habit of hiring young girls as her assistant, and they had all worked out so far. Felicity had even pointed out that she had been the first example of it many years ago, working as Leia’s very first assistant a few months before Felicity’s fifteenth birthday.

But there was no doubt that the family saw Jaina as a close friend and almost daughter-like figure at times. So when Luke set eyes on her that day, he was comforted by her sincerity.

“I can’t stay long, Jaina,” Leia began collecting some materials from her desk. “Are there any urgent matters I need to attend to?”

“Not much other than the messages the computer set forward,” Jaina replied.

“Anything important?”

“To my knowledge, nothing that can’t wait. I’ve been going through them and saving the ones you need, but there is a bit of a backlog. We’re getting hundreds of messages and despite all the filters, the computer sends dozens a day. I’m going through as many as possible, but with all of my additional duties I have to do, I think we’re about three weeks behind.”

“How many messages are there?”

“Currently?” Jaina hit a button.

“You have 74 unread messages,” an automated voice said.

Leia sighed, “Alright, try to get through as many messages you can today, and call me if there’s any news about Felicity.”

“Actually, about that,” Jaina said, “you got a message a while back from Poe Dameron. He said that he’s asked around the Academy, even the professors and no one’s heard anything, but there’s rumors the First Order is searching the Thalesian system.”

“The Thalesian system?” Luke looked at Leia. “Have we checked it?”

“It was one of the first rumors we heard,” Leia replied. “Chewie checked. It’s just a dummy trail to throw us off. But why didn’t you tell me sooner, Jaina?”

“That’s the thing,” Jaina answered. “I’ve been trying to contact your coms for weeks, but I can’t get through.”

“Because you’re all so busy placing calls nobody can actually get through to your lines. I’ve had a dozen senators come physically to the office in an attempt to communicate with the Senator.”

Luke and Leia went silent.

“No one can get through to us?” Luke whispered. Did that mean that someone might have found something but couldn’t get through to him? Or worse, had Felicity actually tried to call? “No, that can’t be true.”

“Try it yourself,” Jaina offered. “I’m surprised your coms aren’t going off right now.”

“We turned them off so we weren’t distracted during our briefing,” Leia muttered, her mind elsewhere. “Jaina, use the com to call my husband right now.”

Jaina placed the call, and to the shock of the twins, the line was busy.

“Even worse is that all of your inboxes are full,” Jaina added. “Have you been clearing them out?”

Luke’s face was pale, his body froze with horror and shock, “No, I’ve… I’ve been so busy that- No! We had to have left one line open!”

“No,” Leia cringed, inwardly hating herself, “My line, yours, Han’s, the home line, they’ve all been in constant use.”

“I can’t believe this,” Luke put his head in his hands. “What if Felicity’s tried to call? What if she’s waiting for me to respond? What if I didn’t answer and now something’s happened to her or Rey? What if?”

“Stop,” Leia grabbed Luke firmly by the arm. Her voice was strong and commanding, “Look at me, we both know that Felicity wouldn’t just give up after one com call.”

Luke nodded, “She would try other lines.”

“Jaina call Lando Calrissian,” Leia ordered. “His line is probably not busy. Get him to call our main contacts and get them to check their message boxes. Try to get through to Kes Dameron as well. He’s at our home and I know he’s keeping his line open in case his son needs to call him. Kes can tell Han what’s going on. Have Han check our message boxes and clear them.”

“Yes, Ma’am,” Jaina nodded.

“We have to do this, Luke,” Leia reminded her brother.

Luke sighed as Leia rubbed his arm. He wanted so badly to get to work on the new development with Felicity and Rey. He couldn’t fail them.

But there were others he had failed; his Jedi were dead by the Knights of Ren, and he needed to see that justice got served.

“We’ll check our messages the second we’re finished,” Leia promised. “Now come on. Let’s get this over with.”

Thanks to a series of shortcuts and mind tricks, no one noticed the hooded figure slipping down dark hallways of the Senate building and past the security officers. Growing up with a mother as a Senator proved to be quite useful to the figure. He followed the familiar secret passages, his mind focused on his goal: to find the Senator of Coruscant.

He wondered what his mother would think of him and what he had done. Would she hate him? Disown him? Turn him in to security, or worse, his uncle? Would she be in denial of his actions? Would she think he had been framed? Or maybe even think that he had helped his aunt and cousin escape the horror. The figure only prayed his mother could find the forgiveness for him that she withheld for her birth father.

Jaina had been busy listening to the backlog of messages when the figure entered the secretary area of the office. A door stood between Jaina and the figure who was deciding his next move in the area next to Jaina’s normal desk that was filled with a pair of couches in a pseudo-waiting room. Jaina was in her own world, carefully listening to the messages, writing down their contents, and saving them for Leia’s future use.

Then she heard a noise; movement from the waiting room.

Jaina frowned and pulled up Leia’s schedule. No one had scheduled a meeting. Who could it be? Hesitating, Jaina got up from the desk and carefully approached the waiting room.

“Hello?” Jaina called. “Is someone out there?”

There was no response.

Jaina’s finger hovered over the button that would send an alert to the security force of the Senate building. With the events on Rornian, she had been worried that the First Order might pick Leia’s office as their next target.

Taking a deep breath, Jaina once again mourned the fact she was not allowed to carry a weapon in the Senate building. Readying herself, she slowly pressed the button to open the door. Raising her fists, Jaina recalled all of the self-defence training Leia had made it mandatory for her assistants to learn, and Jaina launched herself into the waiting room.

It was empty.

Jaina looked around in confusion. She was certain she had heard someone enter, but there was no one to be found.

Then she noticed it: the chair of her regular desk was pulled out. Someone had been sitting in it.
Jaina carefully approached her desk and was relieved to see no one had hidden under it, but she was concerned when she saw a few files opened on the screen.

Taking another look around, Jaina pressed a button on her wrist com that would connect her to a security officer. She turned her back to the doorway into Leia’s office and turned down the volume of her com.

“Security, this is Jaina Fel in Senator Organa’s office,” Jaina whispered into the com. “Please come in.”

“Miss Fel, this is Security Officer Tymon,” a voice crackled back. “What’s your emergency?”

“I think someone was in my office looking through my computer.”

“What makes you think that?”

“I was in the Senator’s office when I heard a noise and now a piece of furniture has been moved from my desk and there are files open that shouldn’t be.”

“Did you see anyone?”

“No, and they don’t seem to be here anymore but can you check the tapes?”

“Affirmative,” Tymon said. “I’ll check it out and come to the office asap. I would suggest you confine yourself to the main office until I get there. Call me if you notice anything else, and send an alert if they return.”

“Thank you,” Jaina flicked off the communication.

Taking a deep breath, she went back into Leia’s office.

She gave a quick look around to confirm no one was in it. Jaina decided to keep the door open so she could greet Tymon when he arrived. She glanced at the large glass window that made up the back wall of Leia’s office. Jaina was comforted by the fact that the wall gave her an escape route; it had a door opening onto a balcony connected to the fire escape.

Jaina was walking towards Leia’s desk when suddenly the office door slammed shut.

She whipped around to find herself face to face with the last person she wanted to see.

“Ben,” Jaina whispered.

Ben Solo looked terrible. He had pulled the hood of his ratty black robe back, exposing the bags under his wide eyes. His skin was especially pale and had so little muscle underneath that looked like someone had tried to stretch too little skin over his face. His dyed black hair was tipped with its natural brown colour at the roots, and his hands couldn’t stop shaking. But worst of all – worse than the scared, desperate look in his eyes – was the ugly mark of a blaster shot on his face.

Jaina’s hand instantly went to her wrist com.

“No! Stop!” Ben carried out fearfully. He extended a hand at Jaina, his fingers out stretched.

Jaina couldn’t move a muscle.

“I don’t want to hurt you,” Ben’s voice was earnest and regretful. “Please, don’t call security.”
“What do you want?” Jaina boldly asked. Ben may have the upper hand, but she’d be damned if she gave up without a fight.

“I just- I want to see my mother,” Ben answered.

Jaina narrowed her eyes, “If you think I’m going to let you lay a hand on her-

“I just want to talk!” Ben desperately exclaimed. That was the moment Jaina noticed the tears in his eyes and the tremble in his voice, “Jaina, please, I… I made a mistake. What happened on Rornian- I’m in over my head, and I just want to come home. Please, let me talk to my mother.”

Jaina’s face softened. She hadn’t known Ben for long, but she had seen his struggle over the years with the Dark Side. If there was one thing Jaina knew, it was that Ben Solo truly loved his mother. Anytime Ben had gotten in over his head, he would come running to Leia, so it wasn’t stretch for him to have come now to her for help.

“Look, Jaina, I know we don’t really know each other, but I’ve always thought we had a sort of connection,” Ben’s voice was soft and silky. It was hard to resist the complimentary tone, “We were born on the same day, and you are so much like my mother that I’ve always viewed you almost like… like a sort of sister in a way. Please, Jaina, I’m not going to hurt you. Let me speak to my mother.”

Jaina sighed, “Alright, if you’re sincere, I’ll contact her, but you have to let me go and promise not to hurt me.”

Ben smiled and lowered his arm, “Promise.”

“Sit,” Jaina gestured to the chair across the desk and took Leia’s. As Ben obediently sat down, Jaina commed Leia through the office line, while a finger was poised under the desk at the panic button, “Senator Organa, please respond.”

It took a minute but eventually a voice rang through the room, “What’s going on, Jaina? Has there been a development?”

Jaina met Ben’s eyes, “… Of a sort. Senator, I need you to return to your office immediately.”

“Jaina, I’m in a meeting with the Chancellor, it’s going to have to wait.”

“Senator, it’s not the kind of thing that can wait. If you could please just come down-”

“Jaina, it’s not happening.”

“Senator, I strongly insist you return to your office.”

“Jaina-”

“Please, Senator-”

“For goodness’ sake!” Leia exclaimed. “What is so important that I need to leave a meeting with the Chancellor to return to my office?”

“Senator… your son is here.”

There was a pause on the other end, and then a flurry of whispers.

“Jaina, switch us from audio to visual,” Leia commanded.
Jaina pressed a button and a small blue figure of Leia was projected onto the desk.

“Ben,” the blue Leia whispered in disbelief.

“Mom,” Ben swallowed hard, fear in his eyes. “Mom, I’m sorry. I am so sorry.”

Leia was speechless, just staring at her son. Ben waited anxiously, his shoulders shaking as he struggled to withhold collapsing into tears. Leia had never seen him so afraid and upset.

“Ben, I…” Leia looked off screen, probably at Luke who was not shown on the visual. “Ben, I don’t know what to say. What have you done?”

He gave in to his tears.

“I am so sorry, Mom!” Ben wailed, sobbing loudly in a powerful display of sorrow. “I am so sorry! This wasn’t what I wanted. I should never have run away and joined the First Order. They’re evil, Mom, and they want to make me into something I’m not. They want me to do things for them that I don’t want to.”

“Ben,” Leia struggled not to give in to her son’s breakdown. As his mother, Leia wanted nothing more than to sprint down to her office, pull her son into her arms, and hold him as she made everything better. But as a government authority she couldn’t deny the cold, hard facts. “Ben, you killed people.”

“That wasn’t supposed to happen!” Ben insisted. “I didn’t mean for any of this to happen! No one was supposed to get hurt!”

“But they did, and you helped them. You murdered people. People who were your friends and mentors. People who taught how to fight and protect yourself from Darkness. You took those skills and used it them end their lives in the names of monsters.”

“I… I’m sorry, Mom,” Ben could give no other reply.

Leia took a deep breath as she looked over her haggard, sobbing son.

“Ben, what happened to your face?” Leia calmly asked, assuming her political demeanour. She knew she needed to be emotionless and authoritative if she was to ever figure out what was going on with her son.

He unconsciously touched the blast mark on his face and hesitated, “It… it was my own fault.”

“Did someone do this to you?”

“Yes.”

“Who?”

Ben was silent.

That wasn’t good enough for Leia, “Was it the First Order?”

“No,” Ben lowered his eyes.

“Was it the Knights of Ren?”

Ben couldn’t resist a laugh, “Not possible. I’m the only one left.”
“Who did this? A Jedi?”

“No.”

“Snoke?”

“No. He would never.”

“Then who?” Leia demanded.

Ben winced, “You’re not going to like it.”

“Tell me.”

Ben took a deep breath, “It was… Aunt Felicity.”

“Felicity? Why?” Leia didn’t know whether to be more shocked that Felicity had attacked her son… or that for the very first time, Ben had called her his aunt.

Ben gulped.

“What happened, Ben?” Leia pushed. “I know you and Felicity have never gotten along, but she never would have escalated it to violence without a reason.”

Ben bit back a comment about how less than a year ago Felicity had legitimately kidnapped him to take him on a bonding trip. His parents and uncle may have ultimately sided with Felicity, but that didn’t change the fact Ben had been forced on ship in the middle of the night against his will without Felicity informing anyone what she was doing.

“I…” Ben sighed. “I encountered Rey.”

Horror filled Leia’s expression.

“I didn’t actually end up doing anything!” Ben insisted. “I just sort of… tried.”

“Rey?” Leia whispered unnaturally low. It was always the sign that she was about to start screaming at you. Sure enough, “You attacked Rey? Rey! Your five-year-old cousin who looks up to you and idolizes everything you do? Rey who looks at you as one of her heroes?”

“I know, but I didn’t want to do it. I didn’t want to do any of it!” Ben cried out. His face was completely red as a mass of tears streamed down his face. His voice was starting to hitch, “M- M- Mom, p-p-please! I didn- I didn- I didn’t want to h- hurt anyone!”

“Then why did you?”

“It’s Snoke. He’s in my head,” Ben’s hands started to grab and claw at his forehead as if he was trying to dig Snoke out. “He whispers to me all the time, and he won’t let me ignore him. He tells me to do things, and he promises the greatest rewards. He tempts me and I’m not strong enough to resist him. I want him out, Mom! Please help me! I ran away from the First Order to get away from him, but he still follows me. Even now he’s whispering in my ear. GET OUT! GET OUT OF MY HEAD!”
Jaina grabbed Ben’s clawing hands and retched them away so he couldn’t continue to hurt himself.

“Relax,” Jaina said in a soothing voice, trying to calm him. “You’re safe here.”

Ben gave Jaina a half hearted smile and sniffed, “Thank you.”

Leia was quiet, her head in her hands as she struggled between being a governmental agent and Ben’s mother. The situation was unprecedented; what was she supposed to do? What could she do? Justice must be done, but at the same time her son needed help. Help only she could give him.

And in that moment, Leia finally began to understand the way her brother viewed Vader. One foolish decision could forever alter someone’s path, and if no one was there to help bring them back to the Light, a Force Sensitive could be lost to the Dark. That said, Leia was not about to completely forgive Vader, or even ponder the issue of her father all that much. But Ben… Ben needed the understanding and forgiveness that Luke had given Vader, the same understanding and forgiveness that Leia withheld from Vader.

She would not shut out her son.

Leia took a deep breath, “Alright, Ben, let’s see if we can figure this out. I need you to stay right there in my office, and I’ll come meet you there to talk about this. I’ll call your father, and your Uncle and I—”

“NO!” Ben exclaimed looking panicked. “No, don’t bring Dad or Uncle Luke into this. I’m not ready to face them! Please, Mom. Don’t bring them, not yet. Please.”

Leia looked at Luke off screen and after a moment said, “Fine, I won’t bring them, but if there’s any funny business—”

“There won’t be.”

“There better not,” Leia warned. “Stay right there. I’ll be down in a few minutes. Jaina, don’t let him leave that chair.”

“Yes, Ma’am,” Jaina nodded, and ended the call.

“You’re not actually leaving me behind, right?” Luke asked as the transmission cut out.

Leia looked at Luke like his was crazy, “Of course not. My son or not, there’s still a wannabe Sith Lord sitting in my office who wants to see me alone. Chancellor, I’m sorry things got cut short, but can we pick this up again later?”

“Of course,” Mon Mothma replied. As Leia had conversed with Ben, Mothma had busied herself with putting the building on lockdown. “A troop of security officers are already assembled and waiting for you on your level. I trust you understand that Mister Solo must be arrested and tried for his crimes.”

“Absolutely,” Leia nodded. “But, please, let me talk to him first. We don’t want him to get violent, and if I play this right, we might get some information about the First Order out of this.”

“Off you go then, and may the Force be with you.”

Jaina watched Ben sympathetically as he tried to get his sobbing under control.
“I’m sorry,” Ben wiped the tears from his face only to have more tears replace them. “I shouldn’t be crying over this.”

“It’s alright,” Jaina reassured him. “You’ve been through something very emotional and there have been some drastic consequences to your actions. I might think you were heartless if you didn’t shed a few tears.”

“Thank you, Jaina,” Ben smiled, his tears starting to clear up. He gave her a guilty smile, “You’ve always been so kind and understanding. I’ve never appreciated you enough.”

“Think nothing of it.”

Ben grinned and opened his mouth to say something when suddenly he began to cough. They were horrible, hacking, phlegm filled coughs. Ben violently doubled over as the coughs wracked his entire body.

“Are you alright?” Jaina worriedly grabbed his arm.

“Yeah, I’m-” Ben coughed loudly. He patted Jaina’s hand as he cleared his throat a few times, “Sorry, it’s just with all of the crying, I think my body depleted itself of all moisture. My throat is just really dry, but it’ll pass.”

Jaina glanced to her right at the door that connected to Leia’s small en suite bathroom, “How about a get you a cup of water?”

Ben’s eyes widened, “Oh, no! I don’t want to put you out or get you in trouble. Mom did say I wasn’t supposed to move from this chair.”

“Nonsense, I’ll get it for you.”

“Are you sure?”

“Think nothing of it. You just sit in that chair, and I’ll go get you some water,” Jaina stood and crossed towards the bathroom.

Ben watched her go, “If you insist.”

Jaina didn’t notice the wicked grin on his face.

She quickly filled a glass in the sink, leaving the door behind her open so she could keep an eye on Ben. Jaina turned around to exit the washroom and bring the glass to Ben but was startled to find him standing in the doorway.

“Surprise,” Ben grinned.

Jaina gasped as Ben grabbed her by the shirt and violently threw her to the floor. The glass shattered as it hit the tile, and Jaina tried to scramble back to her feet. Ben slammed the button for the door and it slid closed before Jaina could escape. She pushed the inside button to activate the door, but it would not open.

Ben had locked her in.

“Let me out!” Jaina slammed her fists against the door, trying to force it open.

“Hit it all you want, it’s not going to open,” Ben mocked. “I just can’t believe you all actually fell for my little act.”
“Ben Solo, open this door right now!”

“Ben Solo is dead. The name is Kylo Ren, new Master of the Knights of Ren,” Kylo chuckled. “I suppose I should thank my uncle. It’s so easy to climb the ranks of succession when your uncle murders all of your superiors. Of course, now I’ll have to recruit more, but at least I don’t have to take orders from the likes of Cade and Zhan anymore.”

Jaina hit her wrist com, “Senator Organa! Come in!”

“What’s going on?” Leia said a minute later.

There was chattering on the other end for a few minutes.

“Alright, the building is in lockdown and a security team is on its way,” Leia informed Jaina. Her breathing pattern was slightly altered like she had started to run. “What’s he doing right now?”

“I don’t know. Senator, everything he said was a lie.”

“Especially that part about not wanting to hurt Rey,” Kylo called from Leia’s desk. He then whispered to himself, “The sooner the kid is out of the way, the sooner Supreme Leader can focus on my training.”

Truth be told Kylo didn’t really want Rey to get caught up in everything. He rather liked his cousin, and generally Rey was harmless. But only one person could carry on the Skywalker legacy, there could only be one Skywalker Heir, and Kylo sure as the nine Corellian Hells wasn’t going to let it be the child of a man who idolized Vader’s flaws and a woman who despised him.

But he had to find her before he disposed of the child, and her lying, backstabbing mother.

The First Order had had just as much of a struggle to find Felicity and Rey as the Skywalker family had. Snoke was desperate to find the girls before their family did, which is what had led to Kylo’s little charade. After hacking into the family’s message boxes and finding nothing, Leia’s line was the next logical step.

Kylo went to Leia’s messaging system and hit a button.

“You have 74 unread messages,” an automated voice said.

Kylo hit a few buttons and began to listen to the messages. The machine would play the identifier that listed the person’s name and reason for the message, and the listener would then either click the button that marked it unread, or a second button to proceed to the main message. Jaina had already listened to a fair amount of them, but marked them all unread afterwards so that none accidentally got missed.

Kylo patiently listened to the introductions.

“Gilian Kardal, Senate Business.”

“Kyra Varga, the Search for Felicity Rhiaon.”

“Cal Nilar, Senate Business.”

“Jeran Landala, Senate Business.”
Kylo grinned and pressed the play button.

A small blue image of a rather disheveled Felicity Rhiaon was projected. Kylo grinned as she took a deep breath and began her message.

“Hey, Leia, it’s Felicity,” Felicity smiled for the recording. “I’m calling you to tell you that I’m safe. I’ve been trying to contact you and the boys, but funny story, all of your lines have been tied up, and message boxes full. Considering the hoops I had to jump through just to get to this inbox, I can only imagine you guys are so busy trying to find me, you don’t really have the time to actually stop and listen for me.”

Kylo chuckled victoriously. So they didn’t know where Felicity was. Perfect.

Felicity took another breath, “I’m worried that the First Order might try to track me, so I’ll keep this brief.”

“Too late,” Kylo taunted.

In the bathroom, Jaina strained to hear what was going on. She could hear that Kylo was listening to a recording, but she couldn’t make out what it was saying.

“I’m fine – a little battered around from my journey – but fine. I would say I’m doing good, but considering the hell I’ve suffered through the past few days, I’ll stick to the word ’fine.’ Rey is-Well… we can discuss Rey later. I’m on Jakku, and I took up that offer Luke arranged.”

“Bingo!” Kylo grinned as the recording continued to play. He hit a button on his wrist com and said, “Phasma, come in.”

There was a pause and then a reply, “Phasma here.”

“I’ve found Rhiaon’s location. Dispatch a squad to Jakku and send my ride.”

“At once, Sir.”
The transmission cut off just as Felicity’s recording was saying, “Tell Luke I love him, and that I’m counting the minutes until I see him again.”

With far too much satisfaction, Kylo hit a button on the machine.

“Message deleted,” said the recorded voice. “Next message-”

“Open up in there!” a voice yelled as someone slammed on the office door Kylo had locked. “This is Security Officer Tymon. Surrender at once!”

Kylo turned off the machine and went for the balcony door. To his surprise, it was locked.

“We’ve sealed all of the exits,” Tymon yelled. “Only this door will open. Surrender yourself before we are forced to take further action.”

“Ben, please,” Luke’s voice added, “don’t make this harder for yourself. We just want to help you.”

“Sorry, Uncle, but I don’t need your help,” Kylo called back to Luke as he took a few steps back from the glass window and readied him. “Have fun looking for your wife.”

Kylo waved his hands, and with a great surge of the Force, the window shattered into a million pieces.

Hearing the crash, Tymon yelled to one of his technicians, “Open the door, now!”

The technician hit a few buttons as everyone readied their weapons.

Tymon forced the door open and everyone flooded into the room, ready to fight Kylo into submission. But the room was empty, and Kylo was long gone down the fire escape and whisked away by his escort.

“Fan out and search the building!” Tymon ordered and the security officers went into action checking over the room, going to the balcony and fire escape, or running back into the hallway to search elsewhere.

Luke and Leia made a beeline for the washroom and released Jaina.

“I am so sorry,” Jaina apologized as Leia sat her down in the desk chair while Luke dug out the first aid kit. She had been cut up by the pieces of glass Kylo had pushed her down on, though there were no major injuries. “I shouldn’t have gotten him the water.”

“It’s alright,” Luke set the first aid kit down on the desk and pulled out alcohol wipes and bandages. “He still would have attacked you somehow. I just don’t understand why he was here.”

“He was listening to your messages,” Jaina looked at Leia as she wiped off a cut on Jaina’s forehead. “I don’t know if he found anything. I couldn’t hear what the messages were saying.”

“Let’s take a look then,” Leia hit a button.

“You have 73 unread messages,” an automated voice said.

“They’re all here,” Leia sighed.

“No wait!” Jaina exclaimed. “There were 74, not 73. He must have deleted one.”
Luke and Leia exchanged a nervous look.

“Please don’t let be what I’m thinking,” Leia muttered.

“Do you have any way to see who all the messages are from?” Luke asked.

“I know they keep the introductions in case there’s a glitch, but it takes weeks to recover them.”

“Leia, I have to know.”

Leia sighed and played the messages.

Luke listened nervously to each introduction, his mechanical fingers – which Leia had forced Luke to replace the synth skin on a week previous – drummed anxiously against the desk. Jaina exchanged a look with Leia, and quickly vacated the chair just in case.

“Trinna Kelrune, Media Inquires.”

“Gunn Aldamar, Senate Business.”

“Felicity Rhiaon Skywalker, the Search for Felicity Rhiaon.”

“Play it!” Luke exclaimed, his heart beating wildly.

How could he have done this? How could he have been so foolish to not leave Felicity an immediate way of contacting him? He would never forgive himself if something happened to her from this. Please let the message be okay.

“This message has been deleted,” the automated voice said. “Please contact your message provider for details on how to retrieve deleted messages.”

Luke collapsed back into the chair. His world had ended. Ben had found Felicity and before he could. Felicity was as good as dead, and Rey would be brainwashed and turned into Snoke’s minion- no, not minion, slave. She would remember nothing but service and loyalty to Snoke. He would exploit her powers for evil, and his little girl would be lost forever.

“No,” Luke put his hand in his hands. “No, this can’t be happening. There has to be something we can do.”

“Jaina call the message provider,” Leia ordered. “Tell them we need that message now!”

“Alright, I just need to remember which button it is,” Jaina hit a button. “Oops. Sorry, wrong button, that’s the back button.”

“Felicity Rhiaon Skywalker, the Search for Felicity Rhiaon,” Felicity’s introduction was repeated.

“No, Jaina,” Leia shook her head, “stop playing these intros and press-”

“Felicity Rhiaon Why the Hell Did I Ever Marry a Skywalker for the Search for Felicity Freaking Rhiaon AKA Me!” an angrier version of Felicity’s voice flooded the room.

The trio stared at the machine in shock.

“There’s another message?” Luke whispered a twinge of hope flaming in his heart. Maybe he could save her. Maybe she had gotten sick of waiting for him, found passage, and was on her way to him right now.
“Please press one to play the message or two to continue to the next message,” the automated voice prompted.

Luke hit one with so much force he worried for a second it might break the machine.

“I can’t believe this,” Leia said in amazement. “She left another message.”

“I don’t understand why she would,” Luke racked his brain for ideas. “What more did she need to say?”

“Well,” Leia replied, “you two did just undergo some pretty traumatic and emotional events. I remember the way I felt after Han was frozen, and how there was so much I needed to say to him. Things like this have a way of reminding us how important love truly is, and how blessed you can be to find your perfect mate, even if you don’t always see eye to eye. Maybe Felicity needed to take a moment to just express and reiterate the depth of her love for you, and how grateful she is to have you as the father of her child.”

“You know what?” Felicity’s recorded voice began to yell, "No! I am not letting this go! Who the hell tells someone they'll see each other again, and then doesn't leave even one damn com line open so they can contact you. I mean, seriously? Are you kidding me, Luke? I've been through hell and back and I get a busy signal? You get your ass here, Skywalker, right now or I swear to the Force itself, I will kill you."

Luke and Leia stared at the machine in shock.

“…Or to threaten your life for missing her calls,” Leia weakly offered. “I’m sorry, Luke.”

“Did you hear that?” Luke whispered, his eyes unmoving from the machine.

“In Felicity’s defense, she is in a pretty bad situation. You can’t blame her for being upset, but she’ll be happier when we get her.”

“That’s the thing, Leia.” Luke looked up at Leia, horror frozen on his face, “Felicity didn’t say where she was.”

Leia’s jaw dropped.

“Jaina,” Leia ordered, “we need to find the source of this message now.”

“Yes, Ma'am!” Jaina was immediately on the phone with the message provider.

As Luke watched Jaina helplessly, he prayed that he would find Felicity before the First Order did.

But that was a race Luke would not win.

Chapter End Notes

So this chapter was originally going to contain the inevitable abandonment, but this chapter just got so long I had to split it up. That's right, the next chapter is solely devoted to the trauma of a mother abandoning her child. It's terrible and I love it.

The Long Way Home

Chapter Seven

Felicity’s Sacrifice

It was an ordinary day on Jakku when the First Order arrived. A fearsome display of soldiers, ships, and weapons. At first it was worried that it was some sort of attack or raid or that the many criminals of Jakku had been found in some elaborate sting arranged by Plutt. But much to everyone’s surprise, the chrome suited Captain leading the charge was merely there to interrogate the whereabouts of a brunette woman and her child.

“Sorry, haven’t seen them,” a scavenger named Ivano Troade shrugged. “Although, the little one would be useful for getting in small ducts and conduits. I should look into that.”

“Oh yeah, I’ve definitely seen them,” Jarex Zolhar, another scavenger grinned. “Now about that reward?”

Phasma quickly discovered Jarex actually had no knowledge of the girls and was just trying to scam the reward out of her. She ordered that her soldiers beat a lesson into him that he’d never forget.

“I haven’t treated a child in ages,” Doctor Aletha Kymeri told Phasma while tending to Jarex’s wounds.

Aletha had a policy not to give out information about her patients, no matter how hard her arm was twisted. She was from a more civilized planet where doctor-patient confidentiality was a legal obligation, and that was habit she had been unwilling to give up after getting stuck on Jakku.

“A child in these parts? How ridiculous,” a scavenger named Mashra shook her head when she was interrogated at one of Plutt’s washing tables.

“And what of this woman?” Captain Phasma pulled out a hologram of Felicity Rhiaon Skywalker. After a myriad of encounters and scuffles between the two, Phasma wanted nothing more than to overtake Rhiaon and finally declare herself the champion of their rivalry. “She is a very dangerous criminal who must be subdued.”

Mashra looked up at Phasma in amusement, “Honey, if you’re on the hunt for dangerous criminals, you’ll have your pick of the litter here on Jakku. Now make yourself useful and hand me that brush.”

Phasma slammed her hand down on the brush before the Aqualish could grab it. Even behind her emotionless helmet, Phasma looked intimidating as her chrome suit shone in the sunlight.

“Answer the question, scavenger or I’ll arrest you for withholding evidence,” Phasma snapped, her voice still elegant behind her voice modulator.

“Is there a problem here?” someone asked.

Phasma turned to see a great blob of an alien staring her down surrounded by several intimidating looking creatures no doubt of ill repute. Of course, Phasma knew she could take them all down in seconds, but they hardly seemed worth her time.

“Shiny’s just giving me a few problems, Plutt,” Mashra unaffected by Phasma’s display grabbed the brush and started using it on her salvage. “Asking me about a wanted woman. I warn you, Plutt, you better not charge me for my time at the table she’s wasting.”

“Just this once,” Plutt would have usually fought Mashra tooth and nail on the discount, but the shiny Stormtrooper concerned him. “Ma’am, I must ask you not bother my customers.”

“Sir, I will bother them if I wish,” Phasma turned her focus on Plutt, “and I suggest you cooperate with me if you wish to keep the peace.”

“Now you listen here-”

“Perhaps you can help my search. We are offering a reward.”

“A reward?” Plutt perked up. “What are we looking for? I know every criminal in town and where you can find them.”

“Have you seen this woman?” Phasma held up the hologram of Felicity. “She’s traveling with a young girl. I do not have an image of the child, but reports indicate she is almost the mirror image of her mother.”

“She is that,” Unkar thought. He considered his options. Why wait for Lover Boy to deal him a reward when Lover Boy seemed the be taking his sweet time, and the First Order could deliver one today?

Then again, Lover Boy was Luke Skywalker. Though Felicity refused to speak of her husband’s finances, there was no doubting his was a much pricier meal ticket than some wannabe Imperial. Not to mention Plutt had heard the stories of the Hutt gang who had crossed Skywalker, and attacked his friends. There was no telling what Skywalker would do to someone betraying his wife and child.

Phasma chuckled, “That, Plutt is a bold faced lie.”

“And what makes you say that?” Unkar sounded nonchalant, but inwardly was scrambling to figure out where he messed up.
“You have seen her.”

Phasma paused and looked back at Mashra. She was unsure if she should reveal Felicity’s identity in front of the scavenger. Mashra however, had completely tuned Phasma and Plutt out, and was even shooting them the occasional glare.

“This woman’s name is Felicity Rhiaon,” Phasma continued. “Felicity Rhiaon Skywalker to be exact. Twenty years ago she came to this planet with a man named Diego Nalto. The two of them worked for you for a month. Think hard: Rhiaon. Felicity Rhiaon.”

“Not ringing a bell,” Unkar shook his head. “Listen, Sweetheart, you can’t actually expect me to remember someone who worked for me briefly twenty years ago. I can’t even remember what I had for breakfast yesterday.”

“Imperial rations,” one of the goons suddenly put in.

“Thank you, Dirk,” Unkar rolled his eyes while the goon next to Dirk smacked him. “But my answer hasn’t changed: I haven’t seen that woman or her kid in the past twenty years. Now if you don’t mind, I’m a very busy man with lots to do. Good luck with your search.”

Phasma glared at Plutt, “I’ll be watching you.”

“I’m sure you will,” Unkar grinned.

With that, Phasma turned on her heel and stormed off.

“Roke!” Unkar snapped at the closest goon. He leaned in close and whispered, “Spread the word quickly, anyone who gives up Rhiaon will be dead by nightfall. Her husband’s far too loaded for us not to tap into his resources. And get me a speeder and some rations. I think it’s high time to pay Mrs. Skywalker a little visit.”

“Oof!” Felicity was woken up by a heavy bag landing on her body.

“Rise and shine, My Girl!” a voice called.

Still half asleep, Felicity grabbed the blaster at her side and pointed it at the intruder.

“Hey, don’t shoot!” the voice exclaimed.

Felicity’s eyes focused and revealed that Unkar Plutt was standing at the entrance of the walker. She groaned, setting down the blaster and shoved aside the duffle bag he had thrown at her.

“Mommy?” Rey whimpered from the hammock, clutching her pilot doll tightly. “Are we in trouble?”

“No, it’s just Plutt,” Felicity assured Rey. “Although he’s going to be in trouble pretty quick if he doesn’t explain the rude awakening. Seriously, you throw a bag at me while I sleep? You just lost a hundred credits from your reward for that. And why is that bag so heavy?”

“It has two weeks of rations in it,” Plutt explained. “Enough for you and girl. I can’t come out here to bring you rations or messages for a while.”

“We had a deal, Plutt,” Felicity glowered at him “You promised I wouldn’t have to go into Niima.”

“Trust me, Niima’s the last place you should be right now.”
“And why’s that?”

“Because the First Order decided to make a visit today.”

Felicity shot onto her feet, “The First Order?”

“Mommy, are the bad people here?” Rey asked fearfully.

“No, of course not,” Felicity grinned at Rey. She turned back to Plutt and jerked her head towards the exit. “Can I have a word?”

“Ladies first,” Plutt extended an arm to the exit.

“When did they get here?” Felicity asked the second they were outside.

“Yesterday morning,” Plutt answered. “I would have come sooner, but it’s hard not to draw attention when you go into the desert with a bag of rations.”

“I assume the bag of rations means you want me to stay put for two weeks and hope they leave?”

“I’ve already made it clear to my customers that if they want to continue to eat they’ll not say a word about you or the girl.”

“Never thought you cared that much about us,” Felicity sarcastically shot.

Plutt grinned, “The only thing I care about is the reward Lover Boy is going to give me and I’ve invested far too much in you two to turn you over to the First Order. Besides, Skywalker’s much richer than the First Order. Is it true he personally financed the Jedi Order?”

“For the last time, Plutt, I’m not discussing my family’s finances,” Felicity warned. “Do you really think the First Order will leave in two weeks?”

“You have more experience with them than me. What do you think?”

Felicity sighed, “I need you to call Luke.”

“Tried. They’re blocking all calls.”

Felicity muttered a swear, the origin language of which she had long forgotten.

“I suggest you just wait, hope, and if Skywalker doesn’t show up, I’ll see you in two weeks.”

Felicity had no choice, “I guess I’ll see you in two weeks.”

No one knew what to make of the Stormtroopers that swarmed Niima Outpost. There were many rumors about their reason for being there: they were there to inspect that old Imperial science station or whatever that random military base thing hidden several ridges over was. Some thought they were there to salvage old Imperial artifacts leftover from the Battle of Jakku.

“Good luck,” the scavengers would snicker as they saw teams bring out scanners. Much of the good stuff have been found a long time ago.

But most rumors centered on the image of a woman and young girl that was shoved in the face of everyone who had the misfortune of interacting with a First Order officer. Some had seen the girls: human, pale skin, brown hair, hazel eyes, looking too well-fed, and under the protection of Unkar Plutt.

The theories about them were abundant: they were spies, foreign royalty, thieves, con artists, slaves, a defected First Order officer and her secret love child with another officer. There was even one crazy story that the girls were the wife and child of the mythical Jedi Grandmaster Luke Skywalker.

None of these theories were shared with the First Order, however. While there was no law on Jakku, there was a sense of order and a set of rules everyone would follow. The most important rules were: 1 – you didn’t ask about other people on Jakku, and 2 – you certainly never gave someone up unless it was in your best interest.

And screwing over someone under the protection of the man in charge of your food supply was definitely not in anyone’s best interest.

Of course, not everyone was intimidated by Unkar Plutt and his cronies. Generally, they were the people who had enough honour not to surrender a mother and child to a faceless military organization.

“Never seen ‘em,” Quom Tinadar lied when the First Order barraged into his mechanic tent. Pulling himself on a small scooter underneath the broken speeder he was fixing, Quom felt sympathetic to no nonsense Jyn Erso and her little Miracle Girl. “People like that – especially people with kids – don’t stay on Jakku long. They tend to find the first transport and get the hell off this dust ball. If they were here, they’re long gone by now.”

“If you see or hear anything, you will let us know,” Phasma ordered.

“Absolutely,” Quom said.

As he fiddled with the machinery he heard the soldiers trample out of his tent. Sighing, Quom pulled himself back out from under the speeder and watched the soldiers outside from the flap of the tent.

It would take a miracle for that little girl and her mother to escape the First Order, and if Quom knew anything, there was no miracles on Jakku.

A thought suddenly occurred to him: if it was discovered that he had helped them, Quom could be in a lot of trouble. But that wasn’t possible, right? There was no evidence to implicate him, no proof that he had ever interacted with Jyn and Rey Erso.

Nothing except for the rings.

Scrambling to her feet, Quom crossed to a small cabinet in the tent where he kept various odds and ends. The top drawer locked, and it was where he had kept the rings. Sure enough, there they were shining brightly in the top drawer.

Quom couldn’t help but admire how well they had been taken care of. Jyn Erso had clearly loved the rings, thoroughly cleaning and polishing her rings on a regular basis.

Whoever gave them to Jyn must have loved her pretty fiercely as well. The golden engagement ring had no less than nine diamonds on it: one large one in the middle that was a little more than one carat, then two smaller ones on each side, and then a further three on either side each the size of a stylus tip. The clarity and quantity of them indicated that the giver had been well off, yet the sizes suggested he still had a sense of modesty.

But it was the touch of personality of the wedding bands that intrigued Quom the most. Engraved on the inside was the phrase: Thank you. Anytime.
He wondered what it meant. Was it some kind of code? A phrase they used often? The first words they ever said to each other? Quom was tempted to track down Jyn and ask her about it. However, he refrained as he felt asking the meaning of the engraving on the wedding ring he extorted from her would probably just get him slapped.

Quom sighed; he felt guilty about taking the rings. After all the rough and tumble people who Quom had to deal with on Jakku, he just assumed that demanding someone’s wedding rings as payment was acceptable. But these Erso girls weren’t from Jakku, and he had taken advantage of Jyn’s desperation for a miracle.

Making up his mind, Quom opened another drawer and found a piece of string. He threaded the rings through it and tied it around his neck before tucking it into his shirt. Wearing the rings around his neck solved two problems for Quom. First, the First Order wouldn’t find it if they raided his tent. Second, he had quick access to them for the next time he ran into Jyn Erso.

Because the next time he saw Jyn Erso, he was going to give her back her wedding rings.

It was the least he could do for the woman who taught him to believe in miracles again.

“‘They’ve moved on to the sacred villages,’ Plutt declared to Felicity two weeks later as he dropped off the next set of rations. ‘I don’t know what’s going to happen when they reach the end of Pilgrim’s Road and find nothing. But if something doesn’t happen soon, they’re going to set up camp permanently and then we’re all in trouble. Jarex Zolhar almost gave you up, you know.’”

“Who is Jarex Zolhar, and why does he want to give me up?” Felicity frowned as she sat next to Plutt on the hill outside the walker.

Rey was safely asleep in her hammock, oblivious to Plutt’s visit. It was for the best, Felicity had always hated the way Plutt stared at her, and he had made one too many comments for Felicity’s liking on how much Rey looked like her. She would keep Rey and Plutt apart as much possible.

“A two-bit scavenger who thinks he’s entitled to whatever he wants,” Plutt answered. “Pain in the ass, but always sells a damn good haul. You would have been done for if he actually had anything to tell the First Order.”

“Why won’t they leave?” Felicity sighed.

“They know you’re here,” Plutt answered. “There’s this really shiny one who is determined to find you. Keeps bugging my customers, and when they’re not profitable, I’m not profitable, and then we have a problem. Shiny’s been on my case from the start. I think she knows something’s up.”

“Shiny?”

“Her suit is chrome.”

Felicity put her head in her hands, “Of course, Phasma is here. Can’t that woman just leave me alone? I have enough to deal with right now.”

“Not to be brash, but there is a little business I’ve meaning to discuss with you. If something were to happen to Lover Boy, you still have a way of paying me, right?”

Felicity glared at Plutt, “Do you want me to shoot you?”

“Funny, Sweetheart.”
“Do not call me Sweetheart!” Felicity snapped. Only Luke was allowed to call her that. “And yes, I do have something I can pay you with.”

“Wh-”

“No, I’m not tell you where I keep it.”

“Damn.”

Felicity sighed, “They’re not going to leave are they?”

“The only way they’re leaving is if they have you on board,” Plutt said.

Felicity refused to believe it; there had to be something she could do to get them to leave.

The only question was: could she do it?

Felicity would be lying if she said the thought never occurred to her. It would cross her mind in the black of night when Rey was asleep and Felicity allowed herself to cry. The nights when she was cold, sad, and missing her husband.

But it was a dark thought, one she refused to allow stay in her head for very long. It was a remnant of those dark days when she battled postpartum depression in secret, avoiding treatment and allowing the condition to worsen due to pride not allowing her admit she had a problem. Those dark days when she allowed the condition to get so bad that an accidental moment of neglect had nearly taken the life of her precious daughter. The incident she never spoke of.

Felicity did not like to dwell on the memories of those days. She had secretly held on to the thought that the incident she never spoke of made her a terrible mother. It was why Felicity always pushed herself to be constantly ensuring Rey was taken care of. She had fought so hard against her depression to accept that just because she made a few mistakes didn’t make her a bad mother and that as long as she did things to keep Rey safe, she would be a good one.

Then why did it seem that in that situation with the First Order on their tail, the only way Felicity could be a good mother was to be a bad one? Why did the thought of a horrific act keep entering her mind? And why did it seem to be the only way to keep Rey safe?

As Felicity laid under her blanket, a hand absentmindedly stroking the material of Luke’s flight suit, she wondered what her husband would do in this situation. Would he take the selfish choice to stay behind with Rey or would he make the sacrifice required of the best choice?

Felicity didn’t need to wonder though; the question had been answered the last time she saw her husband.

“But you have to take Rey and go. It's our best choice right now,” Luke had insisted.

He had made the sacrifice of the best choice, but this was different. Luke knew that Rey would be taken care of by Felicity in that situation. What Felicity was considering now was a whole other matter.

"Then we condemn Rey,” Luke calmly said the night they parted. Tears were shining in his eyes, "If we both stay, she does too, and we put her in the line of fire.”

The First Order was getting closer by the day. Plutt couldn’t even stick to a two week delivering lations schedule for fear of getting caught by the First Order. Pretty soon, someone on Niima was going to crack and turn in Felicity, and she was only dragging down Rey with her.

But she couldn’t do it. How could she bring herself to do it? How could she or Luke forgive her for doing it? How could she even begin to explain it to Luke? How could he possibly ever understand what she did and how she could do it? Luke would never do it. He would stand and fight, even if it meant both he and Rey went down in a blaze of glory.

But she wasn’t Luke.

“We both know that you are more capable of making difficult decisions and even sacrifices for Rey's safety. Decisions… I could never bring myself to commit.”

Felicity hugged her knees to her chest and quietly cried. Luke was right, she could make this decision. But why did she have to? How could Luke ever love someone like that? How could Rey?
How could she even love herself?

“But that is why I love you. You are strong where I am weak, and we balance each other perfectly.”

Felicity looked over at Rey soundly asleep in her hammock. Rey was the perfect representation of how Luke and Felicity balanced each other. How they loved each other, and accepted each other, flaws and all. Felicity had to protect that precious proof of their love.

Rey would never understand why her mother did it, but Luke would, and hopefully one day, he would explain it to Rey.

“I swear to you, Felicity, this will not be like Brendan.”

Brendan, her beloved older brother who promised to come home from Imperial duty as a Stormtrooper, and then was blown up by the Imperials in a failed piece of propaganda meant to pin the incident on the Rebels. An incident that when discovered would lead to one of the highest number of recruits in Alliance history, second to only the events of the first death Star.

Luke had been wrong; this would be like Brendan: a broken promise to come home.

But then again, Rhiaons never were great at keeping promises to their family. Felicity should be as ashamed as Vader to call herself a Skywalker.

“We will see each other again.”

No, they wouldn’t; but if this sacrifice meant that Luke and Rey would see each other again, then it was a sacrifice Felicity was willing to make.

Her mind made up, Felicity crossed to Rey peacefully sleeping in her hammock. Careful not to let her tears fall on Rey, Felicity bent down and kissed her forehead.

“I love you so much, Sweetheart,” Felicity whispered. “I love you far more than you could ever imagine. If there was any other way, I swear to you, I’d take it. I- I’m so sorry, Rey. I’m sorry.”

Then Felicity went back to her bed, wrapped herself in Luke’s flight suit blanket, and cried herself to sleep.

Felicity was waiting for Plutt three days later when he brought them their next set of rations. She stared fixedly at him, fiddling with her credit chip in one hand. Though her demeanour was strong, inside Felicity was terrified.

Rey was inside the walker, completely unaware of what her mother was about to do.

“The First Order?” Felicity demanded as Plutt got out of the speeder.

Plutt sighed, “They’ve finished searching the villages and are now searching the wreckage in the desert. You’re running out of time.”

“I know,” Felicity said sadly. She held out the credit chip, “Here.”

“A credit chip?” Plutt raised a brow.

“My emergency funds. This should cover all costs we’ve incurred, as well as enough costs for five years and then some. The passcode to access the funds is ‘Burning Homestead.’”

“Kinda morbid.”

“And ironic, that’s why no one would ever think of it. If you follow my terms, the entire thing is yours to keep.”

“What’s all this? Are you changing our agreement?”

“Call it Plan B,” Felicity’s voice was cold and emotionless. She wouldn’t allow Plutt to be the thing that made her break down.

“And what is Plan B?”

Felicity looked back at the walker.

Plutt understood, “You want me to watch the girl until Lover Boy gets here. Well, I think I can—”

Felicity pulled the credit chip away from Plutt’s grasp.

“You listen very carefully,” Felicity’s voice was firm. “You keep her safe. You keep her fed. You keep her hydrated. You keep her clothed. And above all, more than anything else, you keep her distracted. Are we agreed?”

Plutt grabbed the credit chip and smiled, “Agreed.”

Taking a deep breath, Felicity readied herself as best she could for the next part. She of course, could never truly be ready, but she had no choice. Wiping the tears from her eyes, Felicity ducked into the walker.

Rey was playing with her doll when Felicity entered.

She looked up and beamed at her mother, “Mommy, want to play with me?”

Felicity struggled not to burst into tears. She was the worst mother in the history of the galaxy for doing this.

“Rey, I need you to come here for a minute,” Felicity struggled to regulate her voice. “Mommy needs to talk to you.”

Sensing something was wrong, Rey set her doll down and approached her mother.
“What’s wrong, Mommy?” Rey asked.

“Oh, Rey,” Felicity pulled into a tight hug. “Rey, you know that Mommy loves you more than anything in the galaxy, right?”

“Except Daddy,” Rey said.

“No,” Felicity shook her head and pulled back. Rey’s arms settled around Felicity’s neck as Felicity placed her hands on Rey’s shoulders, “I love you even more than Daddy. More than anything and anyone in the entire galaxy. I swear that to you, and I don’t want you to forget that.”

“I won’t,” Rey looked confused as to why they were having that conversation.

“I know… Rey, do you what Mommy said all that while ago about keeping you safe? How Mommy will do whatever it takes to keep you safe and that might mean Mommy does some things you don’t like, and some things Mommy might not be proud of?”

Rey nodded, “But I’ll get back to Daddy.”

“What choice?” Rey asked innocently.

Felicity took a deep breath, “Mommy- Mommy… has to go away for a little while.”

Rey’s eyes went wide, “What? Where are you going?”

“Mommy has to go see some people so that you’re safe.”

“Where do I go?”

“You… you have to stay here with Mister Plutt. He’s going to take care of you until Daddy gets here.”

“What? No! NO!” Rey wailed as she tightened her arms around Felicity’s neck. “No, I’m going with you!”

“No, you have to stay,” Felicity struggled to maintain her composure.

“NO! NO! Mommy, don’t go! Please don’t leave me!”

“Listen to me, Rey,” Felicity stroked Rey’s tear stained cheek. Tears had swelled in Felicity’s eyes as well, “You listen to me. Our family is going to come back for you. You do not go with anyone but our family. Do you understand? You go with Daddy, you go with Uncle Han, or you go with Aunt Leia. You do not go with anyone else. Even if Uncle Lando or Poe shows up, you don’t go with them. Okay? And under no circumstance do you go with Ben. You see Ben, you run away and you don’t look back. Do you understand me?”

“No, Mommy! Please don’t go! Don’t leave me!” Rey sobbed, clutching onto her mother as a lifeline.

“I’m so sorry, Rey. I’m so sorry,” Felicity tried to ease Rey’s arms off of her, but Rey wouldn’t let go. “Rey, you have to let go of Mommy.”

“NO!” Rey clung on as tightly as possible.
“Rey, please let go!”

“NO! NO! NO! MOMMY! DON’T GO!”

“I’m sorry. I’m so sorry,” Felicity took a deep breath, grabbed Rey’s tiny hands, and using her superior strength, forced them off of her neck.

“NO!” Rey launched herself at her mother and grabbed her leg.

“Plutt! I need a hand!” Felicity called as she sobbed and tried to pry Rey off only to be reattached the moment she had. Felicity tried to look strong when Plutt entered the walker. “Please, hold her back.”

Easily Plutt pulled Rey off of Felicity and held her in his tight grip, refusing to let her go, “Take my speeder. Drop it off with one of my guys and tell them to come for me in an hour. I won’t let her follow.”

“Thank you,” Felicity gasped in pain at the sight of her daughter fighting against Plutt’s grasp.
“Goodbye, Rey. I love you.”

“NO! NO! MOMMY! DON’T LEAVE! PLEASE, DON’T LEAVE ME!”

Felicity climbed into the speeder and looked back at her daughter one last time. Just a push of a button and Felicity would have completed the unthinkable act of abandoning her daughter.

“DON’T LEAVE ME!” Rey begged. “PLEASE, MOMMY! DON’T LEAVE ME!”

“I’ll come back for you,” the words escaped Felicity’s mouth before she could stop them.

She wanted to believe it, she wanted her last memory of her daughter not to be Rey desperately screaming and crying for her to come back. She wanted to someday be reunited with her husband and child, and be one big happy family.

"I'll come back, Sweetheart," Felicity tried to keep her voice calm and level. Rey was far too young to understand. "I promise."

Unbeknownst to Felicity, she had just repeated Luke’s own final words to Rey. For the second time, a parent was abandoning her and Rey didn’t understand why.

“I love you, Rey,” Felicity whispered before starting the speeder.

“MOMMY, NO!”

And Felicity hit the gas.

“MOMMY! COME BACK, MOMMY! COME BACK!”

“I’ll come back, Sweetheart,” Felicity promised as she drove away. “I promise.”

“MOMMY!”

And as Rey disappeared in the distance, Felicity’s heart shattered. Felicity knew that despite swearing never to make Rey another bad promise, her final words to Rey were a lie.

Because Felicity knew she was never coming back.
Ten minutes later, Felicity stopped the speeder. All courage had been sapped from her as she left her daughter behind in the hands of a man she didn’t trust. She couldn’t stop replaying those desperate screams in her mind. Felicity pulled the speeder over next to a hill, sat behind it and cried.

“Oh, God, what have I done?” Felicity wailed, hugging her knees to her chest. “I’m sorry, Rey! I am so sorry!”

She cried and cried and cried and cried.

Felicity hit herself, spat insults at herself, and screamed to the high heavens. She told herself that she wasn’t worthy of the beloved family she had, and was no better than its lowest members.

She was no better than her father: the man who she had begged on the Death Star to come back to the Rebel base with her, but instead he had sounded the alarm. A man who fatally shot her best friend, Riz Drayson while he stood right next to her. A man whose love and acceptance of her was not unconditional like a proper parent, but only came when she submitted to his terms.

She was no better than her father-in-law: a man who couldn’t even recognize his own daughter and tortured her on multiple occasions. A man who had threatened to turn his daughter to the Dark Side when he did learn of her connection to him. A man who cut off his own son’s hand seconds before asking said son to rule the Galaxy with him.

She was no better than her nephew: a man who betrayed everyone who loved him. A man who worshiped the charred helmet of a dead monster. A man who had attempted to murder his five-year-old cousin for the title of legacy.

Felicity was no better than any of them, and she had committed the offence she most despised of her father.

She hated the disgusting creature she was: a mother who had abandoned her child.

Felicity cried. She didn’t care who heard her. She cried until there were no more tears left in her body, and even then she convulsed with dry sobs. Eventually, with no tears, the crying ceased, and Felicity just sat there staring out at the distance in silent horror at what she had done.

By the time the sun was at its highest point, Felicity knew she was ready to face the First Order. She knew there was nothing pleasant in store for her: torture and even death. They would do all they could to break her. But she also knew that there was nothing they could do to hurt her.

She had nothing left to break.

Feeling dead inside, Felicity slowly stood, got into the speeder, and drove for Niima.

She stopped not far from the outside. There were First Order officers guarding what served to be the entrance of the town. There was no way she could get Plutt’s speeder to one of his lackeys without being stopped by the First Order. Without any means of checking up on Rey, Felicity had no idea if Plutt would break the deal if his speeder wasn’t returned.

Of course, she didn’t know if Plutt could cut off the deal in general, but there was nothing more she could do about that.

What was she going to do?

“Erso!”
Felicity forgot she was supposed to answer to that name when a familiar alien pulled his speeder up next to you.

“Hey, Erso,” Quom Tinadar smiled. “Been a while.”

Felicity frowned, “I’m really not in the mood, right now Tinadar.”

Quom frowned as he took in the red puffy faced, dead eyed sight of Jyn Erso.

“Is everything alright?” Quom shut off his speeder and hopped out of it.

“Oh, just fine,” Felicity snapped. “Or have you been so out of it that you actually believe that statement could be true?”

“What happened?”

“None of your damn business.”

“Come on, you can tell me. I’m harmless.”

“You blackmailed me into giving up my wedding ring or you would leave my daughter to die. What the hell do you call harmful?”

“I’m sorry. Look,” Quom pulled out the rings from his shirt and untied the string from around his neck. “I’m sorry. I was a jerk. You can have them back.”

Felicity stared at the ring hanging from Quom’s grasp. She remembered the ecstatic looks of pure joy as Luke gave her each one. She remembered that goofy lopsided smile she fell in love with. She remembered the passionate kisses he bestowed upon her after agreeing to marry him, and sealing it with an I do.

It hit Felicity hard: she would never see Luke again. His joy would be replaced by sorrow when he learned what had happened to her. That grin would never be given to her again. Those lips would never taste her own again. They had promised each other a marriage until they were old and gray, but would only get six far too brief years.

“No,” Felicity was ashamed; she couldn’t bare to let those rings grace her finger again. “I can’t.”

Felicity couldn’t stop the tears. Her only comfort was that she could at least leave Rey behind for Luke. At least they could have each other.

“Hey,” a furry hand touched Felicity’s shoulder. “Don’t cry.”

Felicity looked up in surprise at Quom comforting her, “I’m sorry, I just can’t take those rings back. I can’t even look at them.”

“How about I hang on to them until you’re ready?” Quom suggested, tying the string back around her neck.

Felicity chuckled, “Sure. We’ll go with that.”

She wondered what Quom would do when he found out Felicity could never take them back.

“What happened? Why are you so upset?”

“I… I’ve done something terrible,” Felicity couldn’t bare to admit what she had done. “It was for the greater good, but it hurts like hell.”

“Here,” Quom pulled her into a hug. “I’m sorry you had to do whatever it is you’ve done. Please, is there anything I can do to help? No strings attached, promise. I feel terrible about what I’ve done to you and I want to make it up to you.”

Felicity sniffed, “Well… there is something.”

“Name it.”

Felicity pulled out of his embrace and wiped the tears out of her eyes, “Can you take this speeder back to the walker? It’s Plutt’s and he needs it back, but I can’t get it to his crones.”

“Sure, of course,” Quom scrambled to his truck to hitch his speeder to Plutt’s. “But that doesn’t seem like a lot. Is there anything else? I did do something terrible to you.”

“Trust me, it’s not the worst thing someone’s done to me.”

“Well, considering the people you hinted at knowing when you almost shot me, I don’t want to be lumped in with them. Come on, anything you want and I’ll do it. Promise.”

Felicity hesitated, “Alright, if you ever see Rey and she needs help… will you give it to her?”

“Sure, but that doesn’t sound like much,” Quom laughed as he fastened the cable. “After all, you’re very much a Mama Nexu. Where are you going to be when Rey needs some help?”

Felicity was silent.

Quom understood.

“Oh,” He looked down at the sad guiltily. “I didn’t realize-”

Quom didn’t hesitate to hug her again, “I’ll take care of your little Miracle Girl. I promise you, Jyn.”

Felicity smiled, “Actually… my name’s Felicity.”

“Alright, I’ll take care of her, Felicity.”

“Thank you.”

Quom smiled and whispered, “Anytime.”

Felicity didn’t ask how he knew the phrase, but she knew he understood its significance.

When Quom was gone, Felicity took a deep breath, squared her shoulders and said, “I’m ready.”

Without a speeder, Felicity was able to sneak into Niima Outpost unnoticed. If she was going to turn herself in, it wasn't going to be to Random Stormtrooper Number Eighty-Three, she was going the big boss herself.

Phasma was easy for Felicity to find; her suit was blinding in the Jakku sunlight.

When Felicity found her, Phasma was harassing the poor doctor who had treated Rey all those weeks ago. Felicity was upset at the sight; Aletha had been very kind to Felicity on that day.
“So I performed CPR and got her breathing again,” Felicity had said in a panic.

Aletha smiled and put a gentle hand on Felicity’s arm, “She’ll be alright. I’m going to do an ice bath, and that should have her all better in a little while.”

“You swear she’s going to be okay?”

“Take a deep breath, Mommy. You did everything right, and because of that you managed to save her from a very horrible death. It could have been a lot worse, but she’ll sleep soundly in your arms tonight.”

“And wake up in the morning?”

“And wake up in the morning,” Aletha chuckled. “Now go with Plutt and tell her father his little girl will be alright.”

Felicity looked hesitantly at Plutt waiting irritated in the doorway, “Fine but if anything happens to Rey, I’m coming after you personally.”

“Deal.”

“Please! I don’t know anything about a little girl, I swear!” Aletha cried out as Phasma’s troops pointed their blasters at her.

“Well, someone knows something around here and I’m not leaving until I get some answers!” Phasma snapped. She looked at her troops, “Let’s see how much she loves her little practice.”

“No! Don’t!” Aletha screamed as the Stormtroopers began smashing her equipment. “I don’t know anything.”

“Let me through!” Felicity ordered the crowd who had gathered to watch. “Move!”

“Now do you know anything?” Phasma turned to Aletha.

“No, I don’t,” Aletha answered. It appeared that Phasma had underestimated her resilience.

“Then we have no choice but to make you talk.”

Aletha yelped as Phasma backhanded her fist across the doctor’s face sending her clattering to the ground.

Felicity pushed her way out of the crowd, “HEY!”

Phasma looked in surprise as Aletha cowered on the ground.

“Leave her alone,” Felicity ordered, her eyes flashing fiercely as she marched towards the women.

The Stormtroopers immediately turned their blasters on Felicity.

“Don’t fire,” Phasma held up her hand as Felicity reached them. “Well, well, Felicity Rhiaon finally arrives.”

Felicity glared at Phasma and then bent down to help Aletha, who was lying on the ground.
“Get up and get out of here,” Felicity commanded. “My husband should arrive on Jakku shortly. Find Luke, tell him what happened, and he’ll pay for new equipment. Tell him Felicity sent you. If he doesn’t believe you tell him that I told you to say anytime when he says thank you. Do you understand?”

Aletha nodded.

“Go,” Felicity pulled her up and gently pushed her towards the crowd.

The crowd was a flurry of whispers as Aletha disappeared into them. After weeks of interrogation they were finally getting the showdown they craved.

“So kindhearted,” Phasma said.

Felicity rose to her feet, “From time to time, but it’s my fury that’s my signature.”

“Funny, I thought it was making excuses as it why you’re not just some… what’s the term? Golddigger that leeches off her husband’s legacy.”

“You are wrong on so many levels, the least of which being that fact that the only gold Luke and I own are our wedding rings.”

“Which I see you’re not wearing,” Phasma shot a pointed look at Felicity’s bare hand. “What’s the matter? Gave up so soon? Think the Knights of Ren killed him?”

“Don’t make me laugh,” Felicity shot. “Let’s cut the crap, Phasma. We both know why you’re here.”

“Alright then. Where is she? Where’s the girl?”

Felicity smirked, “In a place you’ll never find her.”

“I doubt that,” Phasma chuckled. “Come on, Rhiaon, make my job a littler easier and just tell me where she is. We won’t kill her; the Supreme Leader has glorious plans for her.”

“He will never lay a hand on my daughter.”

“Just tell me. We’re going to find her eventually. It’ll just save us some time, and if you cooperate the Supreme Leader might find some use for you.”

Felicity glowered at Phasma, “Listen to me carefully, PH-5177, the only way you’re going to get the location of my daughter is if you beat it out of me with my dying breath.”

“Alright then,” Phasma bashed the butt of her blaster against Felicity’s temple, knocking her out cold. She gestured to Felicity lying on the ground, “Get her on the ship and bring us to the base. Have a team stay behind and sweep the area. The girl can’t be too far.”

The crowd muttered to each other as Phasma picked up the unconscious Felicity and carried her to the ship. The citizens of Niima Outpost didn’t usually care about anyone but themselves, but they knew what the First Order had just done to Felicity Rhiaon was wrong.

No matter how much Rey fought against Unkar Plutt, he wouldn’t let her go.

“NO! MOMMY, COME BACK! I WANT MOMMY!” Rey screamed, trying to claw her way out of his grasp. She managed to get free only for him to grab her roughly by the arm and hold her still.
Why did Mommy leave? She couldn’t understand why it had happened, but she did understand what had happened. This wasn’t like the times Mommy told Rey to stay in the living room while Mommy went to see Daddy working in the garage. This wasn’t like the times Mommy said to stay with Master Alyla Kene in the meditation garden while Mommy went to see Daddy in his office a few hallways down. This wasn’t even like the times Mommy would said to stay with Uncle Han while he worked on the Falcon while Mommy went to Aunt Leia’s office which was a twenty-minute drive from the hangar the Falcon was stored in.

Rey knew that Mommy wasn’t just going for a quick visit to someone. But leaving her behind? That had to be a mistake.

Suddenly she sensed it; the Force pulling her attention to a ship in the sky. It was flying away from Jakku, and Rey knew that Mommy was on it.

“NO!” Rey yelled at the ship. “COME BACK!”

“Quiet, girl,” Unkar chastised.

Rey quickly looked over at Plutt, but turned her attention back to the ship, “NO!”

And then something strange happened. The Force was all around her, pushing images and sounds into her mind. Was this what Daddy meant when he talked about getting visions from the Force?

The ship flying away with her mother was heading into the sun. The sky turned red as a dark object eclipsed the precious light.

Then suddenly Mommy was on her knees before a shiny Stormtrooper and a red haired man. They were hitting her and demanding to know where Rey was.

Mommy wouldn’t tell.

The scene shifted to Daddy watching a holo of the bad people hurting Mommy. He was standing next to the dejarik table on the Falcon. Uncle Han and Aunt Leia were with him. Mommy said something Rey couldn’t make out.

“NO!” Daddy screamed, falling to floor on his knees. Everyone was crying and hugging.

Rey didn’t like seeing everyone so sad. Why were they sad?

The scene shifted to an orange and white droid. It was BB-8, Rey recognized. That was Poe’s droid, and she loved both Poe and his droid. They played the best with her.

BB-8 was on Jakku with a tall girl wearing the same hairstyle and clothing as Rey.

“I know all about waiting,” the tall girl said.

BB-8 beeped something at the girl.

“For my family,” the girl said. “They'll be back. One day.”

The scene shifted and the girl was talking to a dark skinned boy.

“Don’t go,” the girl begged.

“Take care of yourself,” the boy said. “Please.”
The scene shifted again. The girl was strapped to a table and Ben was standing before her. His hand was outstretched and he was doing the bad mind thing Daddy had forbidden. The girl was struggling to hold back tears.

“You're so lonely... so afraid to leave...” Ben taunted.

The scene shifted to Uncle Han in the Falcon talking to the girl and dark skinned boy.

“Luke felt responsible,” Uncle Han said. “He walked away from everything.”

The scene shifted again. Ben was walking down a hallway carrying Mommy. Mommy was hanging limply in his arms, her eyes glassy like Zena Halcorr’s.

A strange woman’s voice sounded along to the scene.

“Dear child. I see your eyes. You already know the truth. Whomever you're waiting for on Jakku…”

An image of Mommy’s face filled Rey’s mind followed by an image of a chrome Stormtrooper helmet.

“They're never coming back.”

Rey screamed as the images vanished and the sky came into focus again.

Mommy’s ship was gone.

Rey sobbed as she struggled to make sense of the visions and Mommy’s abandonment. She didn’t understand what was happening or what the visions meant. Who was going to take care of her? When was her family going to come back? What was going to happen to Mommy?

But if there was one thing Rey did understand it was this:

Starting now and lasting for a very long time… Rey was completely alone.

Chapter End Notes

... Please don't hate me.
Phasma smashed a fist into Felicity Rhiaon’s face.

“Where is she?” Phasma demanded.

Felicity chuckled, “Oh yeah, hit me again. That’ll make me want to tell you.”

Felicity cried out as Phasma hit her again.

The First Order had been torturing Felicity for five days. They had tried several forms of torture: shoving wedges of bamboo under her nails, electric shocks, whips, burning her joints, dunking her head under the water over and over, and many more unspeakable acts. But despite all of the abuse Felicity endured, she had yet to break.

Felicity Rhiaon was no super human, but there was a strength in her love as a mother that gave her the courage to endure for the sake of her child. Perhaps it was related to the momentary strength that allowed a mother to pull a speeder off their pinned baby. Perhaps it was the Force giving her a boost as it recognized her as the lover of the most powerful living Force user, and being the mother of his heir. Or maybe it was the haunting screams of her child that forced her not to allow that harrowing experience to mean nothing.

Whatever the reason was, Felicity would not break. Not even as she was forced on her knees before Hux and Phasma, with her hands tied behind her back, hair crudely sheered to cut out the dried blood from her numerous beatings, while a security camera openly recorded the incident.

“Cheer up, Rhiaon. When we send this footage to your husband, don’t you wanted him to see your pretty smile?” General Hux jeered as he watched from the sideline. He smirked as Phasma hit Felicity again, “Where is the girl?”

Felicity spat out a mouthful of blood, “You know, I wonder about the might of the First Order when they have little boys like you running the show. What are you? Twenty-one?”

The fist smashed into her face again.

“Then again, I was twenty-one when I stole the plans to the Death Star,” Felicity conceded only to cry out when Phasma kneed her in the stomach. “Damn it, Phasma, you really think kneeing me in the stomach will make me talk?”
“No, that was for bringing up the Death Star again,” Phasma answered. “If I have to hear that story one more time-”

“Captain,” Hux warned.

“Very well.” Phasma pulled Felicity’s head by the hair up to look into her eyes, “Where is Rey Skywalker?”

“There’s no such person,” Felicity shot. “Now if you’re talking about Rey Rhiaon Skywalker, her actual name- AH! You know, at least the Imperial torturers liked the occasional witty banter.”

“Enough,” Hux snapped. “Tell us whether the girl is.”

Felicity’s cold eyes locked with his, “Listen to me very carefully, you can do whatever you want to me. Beat me, cut me, poison me, drown me, burn me, suffocate me, or whatever other creative way you can think of to torture me, but I will never, ever tell you where my daughter is.”

Hux looked at Phasma and nodded.

Phasma threw Felicity to the ground and signalled to the guards, “Clean her off and cut the dried blood out of her hair. We’ll try again in an hour.”

“You know, she’s right,” Phasma walked along the corridor back to the torture chamber with Hux. “If we haven’t broken her yet, I don’t think she ever will. This is a woman who had the nerve to shoot Lord Vader in the life support suit, and then turned around and married his son.”

“Don’t glorify her because Skywalker designated her his bedmate,” a voice suddenly said. The duo turned to see a masked Kylo Ren stepping into the corridor, “She’s no legendary hero because she knows a few tricks under the sheets.”

“I should have guessed,” Hux sneered. “We can’t have one conversation about Rhiaon without Ben Solo expressing his petty hatred. There are bigger things at play here, Solo.”

“Don’t call me that!” Kylo snapped. “It’s Kylo, Master of the Knights of Ren, and don’t act like either of you enjoy Rhiaon’s company.”

“Of course not,” Phasma shook her head. “I’ve despised Rhiaon since the day we met and she became a constant thorn in my side, but even I have to admit that Rhiaon didn’t receive such prestige in the Republic for her marriage to Skywalker alone.”

“What are you even doing here So-?” Hux cut off when he caught Kylo’s look which managed to look annoyed yet deadly from even underneath his mask. Not wanting to piss off the moody teenager armed with a dangerous weapon who had recently murdered a bunch of people, Hux conceded, “What are you doing here, Kylo?”

“I just finished speaking with the Supreme Leader,” Kylo reported, sounding particularly smug.

Hux rolled his eyes.

“The Supreme Leader wants to know why we have yet to retrieve Skywalker’s daughter,” Kylo relished in Hux’s failure.

“Surprisingly, Rhiaon has not been very compliant to her beatings,” Hux sniped. “And don’t you dare criticize my results. We wouldn’t be in this mess if you hadn’t failed that night on Rornian.”
Remind me again, how pleased was the Supreme Leader when you told him your Knights tried to kill the girl rather than capture her?”

Kylo knew he had no comeback so rather than respond to Hux, he turned his attentions to Phasma.

“What about Jakku?” Kylo demanded. “Why did you withdraw your troops?”

“They didn’t all withdraw,” Phasma pointed out. “There are still teams searching Niima.”

“But why did you leave?” Kylo snapped. “Felicity Rhiaon turns herself in and you decide there’s no possible way that could lead you to Re… Skywalker’s daughter?”

Hux and Phasma exchanged a look, but neither commented on the guilt riddled way Kylo had failed to utter his cousin’s name.

“With all due respect, Master Ren,” Phasma politely answered, “I’ve been fighting Felicity Rhiaon for a very long time. If there’s one thing I’m certain of, it’s that Felicity Rhiaon would not just waltz up to me in the town square after nearly a month of tearing Jakku apart to find her and surrender herself unless her daughter was well-hidden.”

“So then, what’s our plan?” Kylo asked. “Keep beating and healing her until what? She dies? We find the girl? Her husband comes?”

“Until she tells us where her daughter is,” Phasma answered.

“And why after five days of torture do you even think that’s still possible?” Kylo snapped.

“Everyone has their breaking point,” Hux said. “We just have to figure out what it is.”

Hux sighed, “Yes, but I highly doubt threatening to kill her daughter so we can capture said daughter is going to work. Are there any other weaknesses she has? Any other children? Maybe she’s pregnant?”

“Negative,” Phasma reported. “We had the medics test her upon capture. But the child idea does have merit. Isn’t she attached to one of our program children? FN something?”

“FN-2187,” Kylo recalled. “She’s so haunted by her failure with him that she had the number tattooed on her wrist. Why don’t we bring FN-?”

“No,” Hux cut off. “The Supreme Leader doesn’t want us touching the children, and I won’t you compromising the program over one prisoner.”

“I’ve said it before,” Kylo muttered, “Clones would be much easier.”

Hux glared at Kylo, “What about the Rhiaon family? Does she have any special attachment to them?”

“Her brother, but he’s dead,” Kylo replied. “Left an ugly scar in her mind, but we can’t exploit… Wait a minute. Her mind! That’s it! That’s her weakness!”

“Of course,” Phasma agreed. “Why didn’t I think of that?”

Hux frowned, “I don’t follow.”
“Rhiaon had postpartum depression when her daughter was born,” Phasma replied. “A very extreme case. Almost killed her daughter.”

“So how do we exploit this?” Hux questioned. “Has she overcome it?”

“Mostly,” Kylo answered, “but there is something I can do.”

“And what’s that?”

Kylo grinned.

Two Stormtroopers were by Felicity’s side cleaning her off when the door opened. She looked up and her expression turned to pure hatred when Kylo Ren stepped into the room.

“You!” Felicity screamed and threw herself forward at him. The two Stormtroopers were barely able to grab and forced her back down on her knees in time.

“Hello, Rhiaon,” Kylo grinned at the sight of his beaten, bloodied, and bruised aunt by marriage.

Felicity growled, “Give me one good reason not to tear your throat out right now, Ben!”

“Well… I’m going to go with the Stormtroopers will stop you. And it’s Kylo, not Ben.”

“You really think I’m actually going to call you that? Hell, I’m the one who gave you that name.”

“As I recall it you actually pitched Skylo,” Kylo shot. “Oh yes, I remember that day. You kidnapped me to Endor, and then took me to Grandfather’s grave and gave this big speech about how this was my destiny if I continued down this dark path, and how I’m not just a Skywalker but a Solo as well, a Skylo if you would, and blah blah blah.”

“Last time I try bonding with you,” Felicity muttered. “Oh, but you left out the part where you desecrated Vader’s grave by stealing his helmet and then hid it under your bed next to your dirty socks.”

“Since when do you care about Darth Vader?”

“I don’t. Hell, if I could, I would punch the man, but that’s not my point.”

“Then let’s get to the point, shall we?”

“Fine, you don’t like me, and – despite the fact that I’m apparently legally obligated to, because I married your mother’s brother – I don’t like you.”

“You don’t like me?” Kylo exclaimed. He pulled off his helmet and threw it on the floor exposing the blast wound on his cheek, “You shot me in the face!”

“You were trying to kill my daughter,” Felicity simply said. “And come on, it’s been like a month. You can’t honestly tell me that that wound can’t be healed by bacta. Have you seriously been walking around with a blast scar to make yourself look more intimidating? God, this is like the hair dye all over again!”

Hux snorted.

Kylo glared at Hux, “Where’s Rey?”
Felicity laughed, “Oh sure, I’ll tell you. It’s not like the last time I saw you, you were trying to murder her!”

“You attempted to murder her?” Hux shot Kylo a look. “You said it was the other Knights and that you stopped them.”

Felicity snorted, “Please tell me you’re not stupid enough to fall for his little tortured hero ploy.”

“You know the Supreme Leader wants her,” Hux continued, though inwardly had to admit Rhiaon had a point. “If he finds out that you—”

“Let that be an issue between the Supreme Leader and myself,” Kylo snapped. “Now, Rhiaon I’m going to ask you one more time, and if you don’t answer, I’m going to have to use force. Where is Rey?”

Felicity’s cold eyes met his, “I’ll never tell you.”

Kylo smiled, “Yes… you will.”

With an impossible grace, Kylo calmly walked over to his discarded helmet, picked it up, and walked over to a table laden with torture devices. He carefully set down his helmet and ran his hand over a scalpel.

“Do you know why I’ve always hated you, Rhiaon?” Kylo picked up the scalpel and made a show of examining it.

“Let’s see, which of the many petty reasons could it be?” Felicity rolled her eyes. “Is it because I stole your special uncle-nephew bonding time? Is it because dared to exercise my right over my reproductive system to build a family that threatened your precious ego? Or is it because I never cared about your age and called you out on things Luke and Leia wouldn’t? Is it because save for being terrible with ships, I’m a lot like the father you inexplicably hate, because seriously who hates having Han Solo as your father? Or maybe it’s the thing that bugs you most: I always have and always will hate Darth Vader.”

Kylo set down the scalpel, “It’s because we’re too much alike.”

Felicity blinked, “Alike?”

She had honestly not expected that answer.

“Yes, we are,” Kylo’s voice was calm, clear, and bordering on threatening. It was easy to tell he was trying to emulate the dangerous, controlled, arrogant taunt someone like Tarkin would give, but Kylo fell short of the mark and came off amateurish. “We idolize the memories of dead men – myself, Vader, and you with your brother. We’re both strong willed and sarcastic. We don’t allow ourselves to be taken in by the myths of Luke Skywalker. But most importantly, we’re both monsters.”

Felicity scowled, but said nothing. She wanted to know where he was taking the conversation before refuting his claims.

“Look at, my so called Aunt, and tell me what do you see?” Kylo slowly began walking toward her. “You would look at me a call me a traitor, a murderer, and a liar. And when I look at you, I see the exact same things. But that is why I hate you, because I freely admit to my crimes while you walk around making excuses and pretending to be a good person.”

“I have never claimed to be a good person,” Felicity coldly shot. “But I am not like you.”
“You are a traitor because you turned your back on the Empire and as a result, your own father to join some petty band of rebels. You are a murderer because you have taken more lives than you can even recall. Knights of Ren, Stormtroopers, Imperial Officers, Slavers, and even assisted your future husband in the massacre of million of innocent lives because they had the misfortune of being assigned to work on the Death Star. And above all you are liar because you promised to keep my secret, and didn’t.”

Felicity’s eyes widened. In a moment she knew what was about to happen next.

“No!” Felicity struggled against the Stormtroopers holding her down.

Kylo casually turned to Hux and Phasma, “Have I ever told you the story of the first time I used the Dark Side?”

Hux smirked as Phasma made a show of shaking her head despite, in fact knowing the story.

“The first time I used the Dark Side, it was on Rhiaon here,” Kylo continued. “But this is not the story of me attacking my aunt. No… she begged me to do it.”

Felicity’s eyes filled with tears at the memory, “I was sick.”

“You were weak!” Kylo snapped. “And arrogant, and a liar.”

“Ben, please,” Felicity whispered.

“It was the first time and only time we ever spoke as if we weren’t rivals,” Kylo turned back to Hux and Phasma. “She had been… different. Withdrawn, moody, impatient, and quick to anger. I sensed her conflicting emotions, I knew there was something in her mind telling her go against everything expected of her and destroying her ideas of right and wrong. I knew that she felt no attachment to her daughter, and in fact resented how her baby took everyone’s attentions from her.”

Felicity closed her eyes, struggling to push away the memories of the darkest time of her life.

“Oh, she was sick, alright,” Kylo ridiculed the story. “But she was so damn prideful that she refused to admit there was a problem to anyone.”

“Anyone but the venerable little boy who confessed he heard a voice in his head,” Felicity shot.

Kylo glared at Felicity, “So the little boy for the first time related to the woman he was supposed to call his aunt. And the little boy told her that the voice in his head had taught him a trick, and that he could use it on the sick woman so that someone could understand what was going on without the sick woman having to say it out loud. The sick woman begged the little boy to do it… and he did.”

“But then the little boy broke his promise and pushed too far into the sick woman’s mind, forcing her to relive her darkest memories while the sick woman screamed at him to stop.”

“And then the sick woman attacked the little boy.”

“I pushed you back onto the couch to break your concentration. I didn’t shoot you.” Felicity’s eyes landed on Kylo’s blast scar, “… that time.”

Hux chuckled and Kylo shot him a dirty look before turning back to Felicity. Kylo was standing only about a foot away from his kneeling aunt.

“I’ll give you one last chance to tell me where Rey is. Otherwise,” Kylo outstretched his hand to Felicity, “I’ll take by force.”

Felicity spat at his feet.

Kylo smirked, “Then so be it.”

Felicity groaned, muffling a much louder scream as the intrusion began. It was hard to describe the feeling of someone pushing their way into her mind. It was like someone pressing a boulder down onto her forehead but her head would not smash like a melon if a boulder really was crushing her. Then like it was sent forth from the boulder through osmosis, a searing, slinky arm emerged behind her skull, burrowing and weaving through her brain picking through her memories.

She was forced to relive so much darkness.

Vader slashing his lightsaber down her back.

Her father shooting and killing Riz Drayson, her best friend.

A whip striking her as Zygerrian slavers captured her during an Emissary mission gone wrong.

The haunting announcement that Bail Organa and the rest of Alderaan had been destroyed because Felicity has passed the Death Star plans to Leia.

Her brother, Brendan been blown to pieces by the bombs when he was trying to make peace between a civilian and a cruel Imperial officer.

The incident she never spoke of.

Phasma tearing FN-2187 out of her arms.

All of her darkest moments and more. The memories she never wished to revisited were forced to the forefront of her mind. But there was one memory she would do anything to stop Ben from finding. She couldn’t let Rey down now.

But how could she stop Ben, or Kylo, or whatever he was calling himself these days? She was no Jedi, and thus was powerless to stop him from taking control of her memories. How could she prevent him from finding what he wanted when she was physically restrained?

And that’s when the answer hit her. She couldn’t fight him physically… but she could mentally.

She couldn’t stop him in his tracks, she knew that much, but maybe she could divert him somehow. Maybe she could take advantage of that arrogant pride. Maybe if she showed him what he wanted he would stop before he found the truth.

Felicity would not let her sacrifice be in vain.

Taking a deep breath, Felicity remembered how Luke told her that the Force resided in all living creatures. She was not Force Sensitive like him, but it was within her and maybe she could harness what little she had to buy her some time. Felicity gathered all the strength she could muster and poured it into her feeble attempt to call on that microscopic bit of Force and push back Kylo.

“Wait…” Kylo said after a minute. He laughed and in disbelief asked, “Are you trying to use the Force?”

She had the edge. In those brief moments she scrambled to collect her memories and tap into her emotions. She had one shot at this, and she only prayed that she was a good enough actress.
And then she told the lie that would forever change the course of history.

“Rey’s dead!”

Felicity’s proclamation shocked everyone in the room.

“What?” Phasma exclaimed as Hux’s eyes went wide and Kylo’s intrusion stopped.

Hux and Kylo exchanged a look of disbelief as if asking the other if they had heard it too. With a look of determination, Kylo pressed forward again into Felicity’s mind.

“What do you mean Rey’s dead?” Kylo barked.

Felicity’s lie was working.

“I mean that Rey’s dead,” Felicity sobbed uncontrollably. The Stormtroopers were lightly gripping her arms as Felicity was doubled over crying. “My little girl. My sweet little Rey. She’s gone, and it’s all my fault.”

With as much sorrow Felicity had gone through in her life, it wasn’t hard to summon the necessary tears. Her conviction to protect her child pushed forward such an impressive display of grief that even she might have believed it if she was an outsider looking in.

Digging into her mind, Kylo was assaulted by a flood of Felicity’s memories with Rey. Countless happy moments, moments with her mother, father, aunt, uncle, friends, and cousin. Moments that had apparently been brought to an end.

And it was all his fault.

“How did she die?” Kylo demanded.

He had played right into Felicity’s trap. She pushed forward key memories of her time on Jakku, making Kylo believe he was in control and finding the truth. But they were the exact memories Felicity needed to convince him she was telling the truth, and she was going to present them in the order she wished.

Felicity took a deep breath and pretended to gather herself, though her voice was lined with sobs and pauses. As she told her story, Kylo saw the memories she was secretly presenting him with.

“We- We went to Jakku after the massacre but our ship crashed.”

In the middle of the Jakku desert, Felicity silently watched the smouldering transport ship sink into the sand with a cloud of smoke and fire. Rey stood next to her mother as Felicity rested a hand on Rey’s shoulder; the girls taking in the sight of Felicity’s failure of a landing.

“Mommy? Rey asked in an innocent voice. “Is that why Uncle Han never lets you pilot the Falcon?”

“Yes. Yes, it is,” Felicity simply answered. She looked down at Rey and gently pulled her daughter in closer, “Careful, Sweetheart. I don’t want you breathing in the fumes.”

Rey buried her face against her mother’s leg.
"We were too far from Niima and had to walk there ourselves."

"Then who is coming to get us?" Rey asked.

"No one, yet," Felicity confessed. There was no point in giving Rey false hope with the uncertain path before them. "You, see, the thing is there aren't any towns or places to get food and water and a ride between here and Niima Outpost. So we have to walk to Niima Outpost."

"But we didn’t have enough food."

Felicity rummaged through the bag, taking inventory of their rations. When she finished, Felicity found that she wanted nothing more than to slap Past Luke and Past Felicity.

They had a supply of five days of water, and three days of food... for a single person.

"I tried to keep her safe."

Felicity drew her blaster and pointed it at Quom. The alien froze, fear filling his eyes, as Rey gently whimpered in the background.

"Listen to me, Scavenger," Felicity's voice was dark, "I have faced many enemies in my life. If you were to add yourself to my list, I guarantee you wouldn't break the top twenty. In fact, you're so insignificant that I would probably even forget I killed you. Don't make the mistake of thinking I'm a naïve outsider. I've been on Jakku before; I've dealt with your kind. Yes, my daughter and I are stuck here, but you can't imagine what we just escaped from."

"I tried to keep her brave."

"So you need some of the bravery?" Rey asked.

"No. Take all the bravery. Let Mommy be full-brave for you. It's my job, and I'm happy to do it."

"But the walk was too far, and Rey was too young."

"I'm hungry, Mommy," Rey whispered as Felicity laid her against the sand that night to rest. Rey was very pale and barely had the energy to move.

"After a few days, Rey started to fail."

"Carry me, Mommy?" Rey asked when Felicity determined that Rey wasn't faking it. Rey legitimately could not get up and walk.

"Alright," Felicity picked up Rey and began carrying her. They would get there slower, but Felicity had no choice.
“The heatstroke had set in.”

She took Rey's temperature and observed the result with horror. 104 degrees Fahrenheit.

Rey had heatstroke.

Felicity needed shade now.

“I tried to get her to shelter in time.”

She threw everything back in her bag, scooped Rey into her arms, and ran. Felicity ran as fast and as far as she could. When she thought she could run no further, she looked down at her dying daughter and found the strength to push forward. Even if it meant she ran until she dropped dead, Felicity would not stop until her daughter was safe.

“One afternoon, Rey went to sleep.”

She kissed Rey's forehead, "I'm so sorry. I'm so sorry. Please, just close your eyes and sleep. I promise it'll be better in the morning."

“But she didn’t wake up.”

"Rey, come on, this isn't funny," Felicity shook the little girl. "Rey, wake up!"

Tears fell from Felicity's eyes onto Rey's face, but still Rey did not move.

“I tried to save her.”

Felicity immediately began CPR.

"Come on, Sweetheart. Rey, please wake up," Felicity begged as she pumped her hands against Rey's chest. "Rey, Mommy's here. Mommy's got you. You're safe. Please wake up."

“But she had stopped breathing.”

"Come on, Rey. Just one little breath," Felicity's voice shook as tears blurred the sight of her tiny daughter looking so pale, lying perfectly still in the sand. "Can you give Mommy one tiny breath?"

"Don't you dare die on me, Rey!" Felicity vehemently chastised. Her firm chest compressions pressed down so forcefully that Felicity wouldn't be surprised if she broke one of Rey's ribs. "Don't you dare do this to me! I promised to protect you, to bring you home. I promised that you'd live, Rey, so live, damn it! LIVE!"

Rey didn’t move.

“I screamed and cried to the high heavens at what I had done.”

“Oh, God, what have I done?” Felicity wailed, hugging her knees to her chest. "I'm sorry, Rey! I am so sorry!"

“I was so hot and hungry and exhausted; I wasn’t thinking straight.”

“What happened? Why are you so upset?”

"I… I've done something terrible,” Felicity couldn't bare to admit what she had done.

“So I put her down on the ground and wrapped her in a blanket.”

Felicity pulled out the survival blanket and laid it on the sand. She rested Rey atop it, and covered her with the patchwork blanket.

“I dug her grave in the sand with my own two hands.”

So Felicity dug a hole. She had no shovel, so she dug it with her bare hands. Frequently she looked over at her daughter and every time almost had a heart acted. Eyes closed, pale skin, undetectable breathing, unnaturally still.

Rey looked dead.

“In the morning, when my head had cleared, I came back, but a sandstorm had happened overnight and I couldn’t find where I buried her. So I went on to Niima alone.”

Feeling dead inside, Felicity slowly stood, got into the speeder, and drove for Niima.

“I called Luke and couldn’t bring myself to tell him what happened. Not through a com message.”

“Rey is-” Felicity paused. "Well… we can discuss Rey later.”
“I waited for him to arrive, and hid myself when the First Order came.”

"When did they get here?" Felicity asked the second they were outside.

"Yesterday morning," Plutt answered. "I would have come sooner, but it's hard not to draw attention when you go into the desert with a bag of rations."

"I assume the bag of rations means you want me to stay put for two weeks and hope they leave?"

"I've already made it clear to my customers that if they want to continue to eat they'll not say a word about you or the girl."

“Eventually I realised that Luke wasn’t coming.”

"What's all this? Are you changing our agreement?"

"Call it Plan B," Felicity's voice was cold and emotionless.

“So I turned myself in, ready to face the punishment for letting my daughter die.”

"Alright then. Where is she? Where's the girl?"

Felicity smirked, "In a place you'll never find her."

"I doubt that," Phasma chuckled. "Come on, Rhiaon, make my job a littler easier and just tell me where she is. We won't kill her; the Supreme Leader has glorious plans for her."

"He will never lay a hand on my daughter."

“Rey is dead,” Felicity finished showing her manipulated memories. “I tried so hard to save her but it was just too much. She fell asleep and never woke up, and because of my haste I don’t even have her body to bury. And that is why Snoke will never lay a hand on Rey… No one can ever touch her again.”

Kylo stared at Felicity in horror and shock. He couldn’t believe it, his adorable little cousin whose only crime was getting in his way. Rey had died a horrible death… and it was all his fault.

Felicity saw the guilt in Ben’s expression, for in the moment it wasn’t the feared Knight of Ren standing before her, but the vulnerable son of her best friends. It wasn’t the boy who hurt her family, but rather the boy who had once reached out to help her through depression in return to safeguard the secret of the voice in his head. At the time, Felicity did not regret telling Luke and Leia, Ben’s secret when confronted with the incident she did not speak of. And now, in that moment, Felicity felt no regret in making Ben believe he had led to the death of Rey.

She was only thankful that Kylo hadn’t even seemed to notice that the memories had taken place in a variety of places and times of day.

“Is it true, Ren?” Hux demanded. “Is Rey Skywalker dead?”

Ben lowered his hand, his eyes meeting the teary red ones of his aunt. Felicity’s eyes shone with grief, anger, and accusation. Her message was clear.

He had killed her daughter.

Ben couldn’t shake the image of a little girl lying unmoving on Jakku.

“Yes,” Ben whispered. “I saw her memories myself. Rey Skywalker… is dead and buried in an anonymous patch of sand on Jakku.”

Hux sighed, “The Supreme Leader will be most unhappy.”

“Even so, we must follow the orders he laid out for us,” Phasma pointed out. “We know our next move.”

Felicity could barely contain her glee. Everything had gone exactly as she had planned it.

She just didn’t plan on what Hux said next.

“Send this footage to Leia Organa’s office. Luke Skywalker should know his daughter is dead.”

“Clamp,” Han’s hand stuck up from one of the mechanical hatches on the Falcon.

A clamp was placed into his hand.

“Harris wrench.”

A Harris wrench was placed into his hand.

“Power convertor.”

Nothing.

“Power convertor.”

Still nothing.

“Power convertor!”

Silence.

“Dang it, Luke!” Han pulled himself back up. “What is it with you and power convertors?”

Han stopped short was he saw Luke staring blankly at the hallway to the cockpit.

“Kid?” Han hoisted himself onto the floor. “What’s wrong?”

“Do you remember Rey taking her first steps down that hall?” Luke asked, his voice distant.

“Oh yeah,” Han chuckled, settling next to Luke and clapping him on the shoulder. “Fliss had been trying to get Rey to walk to her for six weeks, and then she wobbled right into my arms.”

“Felicity was so upset that she jokingly tried to smother you with your own vest.”

“I’m still not convinced that was a joke. Doesn’t she try to smother you on a regular basis?”

“Only when I kick in my sleep.”
“Well, kid, I’ve been on the wrong end of your sleep kicks, and I don’t really blame her.”

“When have I ever sleep kicked you?” Luke asked. “I only kick when I get visions.”

“One word,” Han smirked. “Hoth.”

“I thought we agreed never to speak of that night.”

“Come on, we huddled for warmth not slept together. Although that certainly would have made the whole love triangle thing a lot more awkward.”

“I thought we maxed out our awkwardness when we discovered the accidental incest.”

“Fair,” Han conceded. “But like I said, that night on Hoth wasn’t too bad if you take out the kicking and the almost dying. But you smelled terrible.”

“Don’t feel self-conscious, kid,” Han punched Luke playfully in the arm. “Despite all of your flaws you still managed to bag a pretty good wife.”

Luke’s grin faltered a bit as sadness flashed behind his eyes, “Yeah… I did.”

“Hey,” Han slung an arm around Luke’s shoulder. “We’ll find her. Promise.”

Luke patted Han’s arm, “Thank you.”

“Anytime,” Han echoed Felicity’s usual reply. “Now, how about you hand me that power convertor and we get this ship in shape so when we do find Fliss, we can get to her straight away.”

“Alright,” Luke laughed handing Han the convertor. “I’m sorry I’m so distant lately. I just feel like… something’s wrong.”

“Well, I tell you what, Ben is so grounded when he gets home. Plus, he is paying for the window he broke.”

“Yes, because breaking Leia’s window is the worst crime he’s committed lately.”

Suddenly, Luke’s comlink started beeping. Han paused from jumping down into the hatch and shared a look with Luke. Luke’s eyes were lit up with hope, and he was looking at Han as if seeking permission to allow the emotion. Han nodded at Luke, and Luke pressed the answer button.

Luke frowned, “… Han?”

“No!” Lando cried out.

Luke grinned at the exasperation in Lando’s voice, “Wedge?”
“Nalto?” Han teased.

“What was your co-pilot’s name again?”

“Would you two shut up and listen it me?” Lando exclaimed. “I got Fliss’ message!”

“Not… exactly,” Lando said in the tone that always proceeded the confession he had done something shady. “Look, people are really interested in the massacre, and no one’s answering any questions so I sort of… found a guy who tapped Leia’s Senate com to sell information to media outlets and he passed Felicity’s messages to me. Do you want to hear them or not?”

“Yes!” Luke exclaimed. He paused, “… also, we should probably tell Leia her com is tapped.”

“Later,” Han waved off. “Lando, play the message.”

“Sure thing,” Lando said.

A moment later, Felicity’s familiar voice came through the com.

"You know what?" Felicity yelled, "No! I am not letting this go!"

“You can skip this one,” Luke said quickly.

“Oh, come on,” Han laughed. “I like that one.”

Luke rolled his eyes as his com went silent for a moment before playing the next message.

"Hey, Leia, it's Felicity," Felicity smiled for the recording. "I'm calling you to tell you that I'm safe. I've been trying to contact you and the boys, but funny story, all of your lines have been tied up, and message boxes full. Considering the hoops I had to jump through just to get to this inbox, I can only imagine you guys are so busy trying to find me, you don't really have the time to actually stop and listen for me."

Luke and Han exchanged a guilty look.

“I'm worried that the First Order might try to track me, so I'll keep this brief. I'm fine – a little battered around from my journey – but fine. I would say I'm doing good, but considering the hell I've suffered through the past few days, I'll stick to the word 'fine.' Rey is- Well… we can discuss Rey later.”

Luke frowned, “What do you think she means by that?”

Han shrugged.

“I'm on Jakku, and I took up that offer Luke arranged. I should be fine for a while, but please, for the love of the Force, would someone please come pick me up? I'd settle for Lando at this point. I love you all. Tell Luke I love him, and that I'm counting the minutes until I see him again.”

“You know, I don’t really appreciate the ‘I'd settle for Lando’ comment,” Lando said.

“What are we waiting for? Let’s get going!” Han shoved his toolbox into a storage container and the men sprinted for the cockpit.

“I’ll be sure to call that in next time I get in trouble.”

“Don’t you always?” Luke chuckled. “I’ll talk to you later. I have to go now.”

“Go get your girls, Skywalker!”

And with that the line went dead.

“Putting in the coordinates now,” Han said in the pilot’s chair as Luke settled in the co-pilot. “Why don’t you call Leia to tell her we found the girl and we’re going to get them, and then give Plutt and your wife a head’s up we’re on our way? Oh, and one thing: you’re stepping off the ship first. If Fliss is going to tear the first person apart, it’s going to be the one who told her to go to Jakku in the first place.”

He was about to type in Leia’s com number when suddenly he stopped.

“What’s up?” Han asked.

“It’s Leia,” Luke had a slight frown on his first. “She’s here in the hanger bay… she’s coming towards us.”

“Maybe she’s bringing us lunch?” Han suggested. “Either that or yell at us. What’s the matter? Doesn’t this save us a call?”

“Han…” Luke’s eyes were squeezed shut. “Something’s wrong. Leia’s blocking her mind from me. She doesn’t want me to sense her.”

Han frowned. Before he could say anything, he spotted something in the window: Leia entering the hanger.

“Well, there she is,” Han pointed to Leia. “Why don’t we go find out what’s going on?”

---

“Leia, what’s going on?” Han called as he and Luke ran down the loading platform. Reaching her, Han grabbed the sides of Leia’s arms and observed her.

Han didn’t like the look on Leia’s face. It looked too much like Luke the day after the massacre: dead, distant, and uncomprehending. Her posture was drooped, and she was fiddling with some sort of disc. Tears were glistening in her eyes.

“Honey?” Han asked. “What’s wrong?”

“I…” Leia looked at her twin. “Luke, there’s something I need to tell you.”

Luke looked anxiously back to the Falcon, “Not to be insensitive, Leia but can this wait? We just found out that Felicity’s on Jakku, and—”

“Felicity’s not on Jakku.” Leia held up the disc in her hand, “The First Order captured her and they sent me this security footage and…”

“No!” Leia interrupted. “As far as I know, she’s still alive.”

“Then what’s wrong?” Han asked.

Leia looked between Han and Luke.

“Luke… I think you should sit down.”
In the wake of her niece’s death, Leia makes a career-changing decision.

“NO! NOT REY! NOT MY LITTLE GIRL!”

Han Solo would never forget the sound of Luke’s scream when he discovered his daughter was dead.

“NO! NO! NO!” Luke fell to his knees next to the dejarik table where they had watched the footage of Felicity’s torture and confession. “IT’S NOT TRUE! IT CAN’T BE TRUE!”

Han found that Luke had always had a sort of quiet grace when it came to reacting to death. Han had always figured it was because Luke had always been expecting the deaths of people he lost. Luke knew going to his burnt down home that he wouldn’t find anyone alive. He knew seeing how old Yoda was that he would soon pass from the world. He knew taking off Vader’s helmet that it meant Anakin Skywalker would die. He knew heading into a battlefield he would lose good fighters and friends. The closest to an unexpected death Luke had experienced was Ben Kenobi’s death, but even that reaction had been brief as Luke had always known someday he would outlive Ben.

But this time was different. This time his reaction was more akin to the discovery that Vader was his father, for this revelation was completely unanticipated. This death was the death of Rey: his innocent five-year-old daughter with a vast future ahead of her. A future that would now never be.

Luke remembered the first time he held her: she was tiny, pink, and squalling. Felicity had waved off her chance to hold Rey immediately after delivering her, instead telling Doctor Kalonia to pass Rey to Luke as she was so exhausted by the labour. (Several months later, Luke would realize that her disinterest in holding Rey had been the first sign of Felicity’s emerging postpartum depression.)

The moment Doctor Kalonia put Rey into Luke’s arms it seemed like the world paused. There was a brand new life, a life he had created, a physical proof of love, radiating with the Force, and filled with the potential to do anything. This miniscule delicate little girl who wasn’t even the length of his forearm was bonded to him for life. She would grow tall, beautiful, and strong, looking to him for morals and guidance. He would show her the world and teach her everything she needed to succeed in it. He would provide and care for her: feeding her when she was hungry, warming her when she was cold, holding her when she was sad, healing her when she was injured, and protecting her when she scared.

Luke stared at his little girl in wonder, amazed that he could love someone so much and so quickly. He looked into those large eyes – which at the time were blue – eyes that stared up at him in echoed wonder and love. Through the Force, she knew who he was and what he meant to her, just as he had known her from the exact moment of her conception.

“Hello, my Ray,” Luke whispered using the nickname that later would be altered and made into her given name. “I’m your Daddy.”

The yet-to-be-named Rey gurgled happily at her father’s words.

The depth of his overpowering love made Luke want to embrace his beautiful little girl with all of his might. On the other hand, he didn’t want to hurt her, so he held her gently in his arms taking in the magnificence that was this miracle. He held her close to his chest, Rey resting mostly in the crook of his right arm.

Luke carefully shifted Rey so that his left hand was free to move. He brought it to her face and used two fingers to gently stroke her cheek. Rey squirmed a little, but Luke couldn’t wipe the grin from his face. He relished the feeling of her skin against his natural flesh. The cold hard metal of his right hand would be confusing to the small girl, but his left hand provided her with the gentle, loving hand he would raise her with. He would not be like his vicious father that severed his own son’s hand. Luke would never harm nor allow anyone to harm a hair on her head.

“I love you so much, Sweetheart,” Luke whispered, using his daughter’s pet name for the first time. “I’m going to spend the rest of my life loving, guiding, and protecting you. And someday, when I pass from this life and leave you behind, I promise that I will have learned how to preserve myself like Ben Kenobi, so that I can continue to be there when you need me. I promise that I will never leave you; not even in death.”

Luke had made the promise on the assumption that he would be the first of them to pass away. The thought of Rey dying before him never crossed his mind. He never expected to outlive her. He never wanted to outlive her. He was not meant to outlive her.

And yet he had.

But why? Why did the Force decide to take her – his innocent little girl – away from him? A parent was never supposed to bury their child… and even worse, because of Felicity’s rashness, he never would.

His little Rey of Hope was lost to the desert of Jakku.

If only he knew how literal that truth was.

“NO! NO! NOT MY REY!” Luke cried, the hot thick tears splashing down his face. “NOT MY LITTLE GIRL!”

On the floor of the Falcon, Luke sobbed uncontrollably in front of Leia and Han. He didn’t care what anyone thought of him. He had been utterly destroyed by the fact that his daughter was dead.

“TAKE ME INSTEAD!” Luke begged the universe. “BRING BACK MY LITTLE GIRL AND TAKE MY LIFE INSTEAD!”

Tear flooding her eyes, Leia fell to her knees in front of Luke and clutched him tightly. She tried her hardest to stop Luke from throwing himself prostrate on the floor. The sight of that was just too heartbreaking to witness.

Han saw Leia’s struggle to keep Luke upright and decided to intervene. Han knelt behind Luke and locked his arms around his brother-in-law, firmly holding him up and against his chest.

“IT’S NOT ALRIGHT!” Luke tried to fight off Han, but Han held tight. “MY DAUGHTER – MY BEAUTIFUL LITTLE RAY OF HOPE, OF LIGHT, OF JOY – IS DEAD AND LOST IN AN ANONYMOUS STRETCH OF SAND ON A DESERT PLANET OF ALL PLACES! NO! GOD, NOT MY REY! NOT MY BABY! WHY? WHY? OH, GOD WHY?”

Leia and Han held Luke tightly, kneeling on the floor of the Millennium Falcon sobbing over the death of their little girl. Their niece, their daughter, their hope for the future was gone.

They cried together for a long time, no one speaking as they worked through the unbelievable turn of events.

She was the calmest of the trio as she had watched the footage the moment she got the transmission. It was a horrible thing, knowing she had heard of her niece’s death before her brother had. Off in a far hanger, Luke was completely ignorant of the fact that his daughter was dead. It was why she had blocked herself from Luke, so he wouldn’t learn of the terrible news from her thoughtlessness.

It hadn’t been any easier when he did know.

Letting Leia know through the Force that he was ready, Luke pulled back from her embrace. His face was a wet, red, swollen mess. He was utterly destroyed.

“This is my fault,” Luke whispered. “I told Rey I’d come back for her, and then I told Felicity to take her and run. And then I ignored her messages—”

“No,” Leia objected. “That’s not your fault. You heard Felicity; Rey was already gone by the time she sent her message.”

“I still told Rey I’d come back.”

“And you had every intention of doing so,” Leia rubbed his shoulder. “But it turned out not to be the best choice.”

“Wasn’t it?” Luke snapped. “If she had stayed, if I let Felicity stay on Rornian, we would have ended the Knights of Ren, and then they both would have been safe with me.”

“And then the First Order would have turned up the next day,” Leia pointed out. “They wanted her and would have done anything to get her.”

“I just can’t believe she’s gone,” Luke wiped the tears from his eyes, only to have them be swiftly replaced. “If I had heard it from anyone else… if it wasn’t Felicity who said it, I would never…”

“Shhh,” Leia tried to calm her brother. His sorrow was bleeding into the Force sending pain through it all around them. She was almost upset that she didn’t see the shape of blue Force ghosts come to comfort Luke in his time of need.
“Are we sure Fliss was telling the truth?” Han suggested. “I mean if she thought they might break her, wouldn’t Felicity lie as a last resort?”

“You heard Ben,” Leia answered sadly. “He saw it in her memories. Felicity couldn’t possibly manage to lie about that.”

“I suppose not,” Han sighed, turning his face away so they wouldn’t see his tears. Someone had to be strong for the family, it only made sense for it to be him. Luke and Felicity would mourn their daughter, Leia would comfort them and cry with them, and he would keep them all standing tall with a grin, a joke, a load of optimism, and schemes of revenge.

But strength was hard to find when his five-year-old niece had died a horrible death. As Han tried to be strong for Luke, he was struggling not to recall the flood of memories involving his niece that were trying to tear to the forefront of his mind. Her little laugh, her bright smile, the way her eyes would light up when he taught her about the different parts of the Falcon, playing with her and spoiling her as “Fun Uncle Han,” telling her less desirable stories about her parents. All of it was gone.

“I want her back,” Luke said with a sudden determination. He grabbed the rim of dejak table and shakily pulled himself to his feet, “I want Felicity. I want her safe in my arms, away from those monsters. And I want her to tell me to my face that our daughter is gone.”

Han and Leia exchanged a look; there was a dangerous obsession in Luke’s eyes. Broken, angry, and determined, Luke looked like a feral animal ready to tear off the head of anyone who stood in his way. It was one of those terrifying moments when no one could deny that Luke Skywalker was the son of Darth Vader.

“Where is she?” Luke demanded as Han and Leia rose to their feet. “Where are they holding her?”

“Tonides,” Leia answered. “It’s in the Ouvis System. They set the security footage with a set of coordinates…and a message.”

“What message?” Luke’s hand gripped the dejak table like it was the only thing holding him up.

Leia hesitated, “You don’t need to see it. It just says that you’re free to come collect Felicity.”

“Leia!” Luke knew she was holding something back. “I want to see the message.”

Leia shot a reluctant glance Han who gave her a sympathetic look. Behind her, Leia could hear Luke’s mechanical fingers drumming impatiently against the table. She sighed, pulled out a small holo disk, set it on the table, and pressed play.

It was a continuation of Felicity’s interrogation. Felicity was kneeling on the floor, her hands bound behind her back, and a pair of Stormtroopers were holding onto her shoulders. Phasma, Kylo, and Hux were still in the room, but they had turned to face the camera and directly speak to Luke.

Hux smirked, “Well, Skywalker, with the girl dead it appears that we have no further need of her mother. You are free to come collect Rhiaon, but bring only two companions with you. If you bring more, there will be consequences. Don’t worry about this being a ruse, we have no problem with allowing you to reunite with your wife and take her to wherever you now call home. After all, the Supreme Leader will be needing the two of you to get to work on replacing the child you wasted.”

“Wasted?” Luke exclaimed. There was a loud crack as his mechanical hand broke off a small section
Felicity seemed to echo Luke’s anger at the careless mention of their daughter’s death. Enraged, Felicity screamed and threw herself forward to attack Hux. Yelling profanities from over a dozen different languages, Felicity fought against the Stormtroopers to take her revenge on the First Order’s golden trio.

“As I said before,” Hux continued while Felicity hurled insults in the background, “we will deliver you your wife in good condition.”

One of the Stormtroopers smashed a baton against Felicity’s temple. She cried out and collapsed to the floor as blood poured from her head.

“Well… mostly good,” Hux watched as the Stormtroopers pulled the limp Felicity back to her knees. “We have sent you the coordinates to her location. You have one week to arrive and collect her. If you don’t appear in the next seven days, we’ll assume you don’t want her anymore, and we’ll dispose of her for you.”

Luke clenched his jaw, his fingers pressing down on the dejarik table with threatening cracks.

Though Han was horrified and angered at the holo message and what was being done to Felicity, he couldn’t help but wince as Luke destroyed one of the few sources of entertainment on the Falcon.

In the background, Phasma had approached Felicity and the Stormtroopers, and muttered a few orders.

Taking advantage of their distraction, Felicity looked to the camera and shouted, “LUKE, NO! REMEMBER WHAT-”

A piece of fabric cut into Felicity’s cheeks, muffling her words as Phasma gagged her. The Stormtroopers tied her feet together and fasten the rope to her bound hands, immobilizing her.

Luke’s eyes narrowed; the Dark Side coursing through his veins. He watched in disgust as Felicity continued to scream out muffled warnings. Warnings that Luke misunderstood as Felicity telling him to not come rescue her.

Sometime later, after discovering Rey was in fact alive, Luke would look back on the memory and realise that Felicity was trying to remind him of her first message she sent on Jakku. With horror, Luke would recognize that it was Felicity’s last ditch attempt to get him to go to Jakku and collect Rey from Unkar Plutt.

And maybe, if he had, things would have gone differently.

But he hadn’t… and they didn’t.

“Seven days, Skywalker,” Hux warned. “The clock is ticking.”

The message cut off.

Han, Leia, and Luke stared wordlessly at the holo disc, angered and horrified at what they had seen.
No one would ever comment on how Ben had stood there watching in glee as the First Order beat and degraded his aunt. No one would comment on how Luke had broken the table in his fury. And no one would comment on how the image of Felicity Rhiaon hogtied and bleeding profusely from her temple would be forever seared into their memories.

“You know it’s a trap, right?” Han asked casually, his eyes inspecting Luke carefully. Both he and Leia were sure not to make any sudden movements.

“Of course it’s a trap!” Luke snapped. “But I’m still going to get her! Do you actually think I’m going to leave her there to be tortured like that?”

“I didn’t say you were!” Han exclaimed. “Don’t take this out on me, Luke! This isn’t my fault!”

“So it’s mine?”

“Stop it, both of you!” Leia ordered. “Luke, I know you’re going through a lot of emotions right now, but Han is just trying to help. Don’t lash out at him because of what others have done. We’re your family, and we’re here for you.”

Distantly in the Force, Luke heard Leia’s words echo in another woman’s voice. A woman who was very beautiful, kind, but sad. It was a woman Leia didn’t remember much of, a woman who Luke remembered nothing of, and a woman their father had once fruitlessly killed hundreds so they would remember everything of.

A woman that when his father lost her, he lost himself. A father who left Luke a very clear picture of what could happen if he gave into his grief. A father who had ignored the plea of the woman that was now being echoed by their daughter to their son.

Luke sighed and pulled Leia into a hug, “I’m sorry. I shouldn’t have snapped at you. It’s just… Ten minutes ago I was on my way to rescuing my wife and daughter, and now…”

“I know,” Leia whispered as Luke lost himself to grief again.

Silently, Han walked up to the two and placed his hand on Luke’s shoulder. Luke looked up. When he met Han’s eyes, guilt flooded his features.

“I’m sorry I snapped at you,” Luke hung his head in shame. “You’ve always had my back. I shouldn’t have—”

“Thank you.”

“Come on. Fliss is waiting for us and I count three people in this room. I’ll call Chewie to let him know what’s up. He’s off getting a few things for the ship and will be confused if he comes back and finds we’re gone”

“Wait,” Luke frowned. He looked at Leia helplessly, “People need to know that… I have to announce that… People are wondering and searching for… I…”

“Rey,” he simply said.

Leia nodded, “Han, call Chewie. Tell him to accompany the two of you. I’ll stay here and inform our friends what happened.”

“This is my fault,” Diego Nalto’s projected com figure sat with his head in his hands, overcome with grief. “I should have gone there the second I thought of it. Jakku is no place for a little girl, and we just left Fliss-“

“It’s no one’s fault but the First Order,” Leia assured Diego as she sat on the couch of her empty living room.

He was just one of dozens of com calls Leia had to make telling their family and friends that Rey had passed away. No matter how many times she relayed the message, it never got easier. In fact, it felt like it had gotten worse.

Leia remembered each and every call. She remembered each expression of grief, similar yet individually unique.

Chewbacca had been the first call, made before Leia had left the Falcon for home. Upon hearing Rey was dead, Chewbacca let out an agonized roar that made everyone jump back at the intensity of it. He then babbled on in Shyriiwook, which Han informed the twins that Chewie was rambling nonsensically, overtaken in grief. What he was saying was a mix of crying out to the universe for an answer of why it happened, vowing revenge on the First Order, saying some traditional blessings for the dead, and repeating words they did recognize: the Shyriiwook version of Rey’s name.

It was long and something the humans couldn’t attempt to pronounce. Han tried to explain the meaning to them many times, but Shyriiwook was complicated and he never could get the point across. The closest translation was “The Queen of Light Who Walks the Skies” which was a play on all three parts of the name Rey Rhiaon Skywalker.

Queen was taken from Rhiaon, which was a Coruscant name meaning “Great Queen.” Light was what Chewie decided to call the made up name of Rey, relating it to the term “Ray of Light” as well as the fact that her father’s name also meant “Light.” Walks the Skies was again Chewie’s own decision on the meaning for Skywalker.

When informed of the mission to rescue Felicity, Chewie cried out that he would be honored to join “Life Saver and Wookie Friend” (his name for Han) and “Knight of Light Who Walks the Skies” (Luke) to save “Joyous Queen Who Walks the Skies” (Felicity, who Chewie also sometimes called “Lands Ships with Many Flames.”)

Artoo and Threepio were the next call, waiting at Han and Leia’s apartment continuing their search for Rey and Felicity. As Threepio wailed in his typical over-the-top fashion, Artoo spewed a collection of angry squeals that were too impolite to translate.

Lando Calrissian had been called while Leia traveled home. He was overwhelmed with sorrow, openly crying before Leia. Lando had a soft spot for Rey, always bringing her toys and other gifts from his travels. Leia had vivid memories of Lando spoiling and playing with Rey, taking her swimming, flower picking, giving her piggyback rides, playing hide and seek, and sneaking her hot chocolate before dinner while Felicity wasn’t looking (and buying Luke’s silence with another cup.)
As Lando ended the transmission so Leia could inform other people, she could see that he was heartbroken.

After that things had become very much a blur for Leia.

The Naberrie family mourned deeply, and her grandparents offered to help Luke and Felicity with working through the death of their daughter as they had worked through the death of his mother.

Mon Mothma gave her deepest condolences and told Leia to take off as much time as she needed.

Doctor Kalonia cried hard over the death of the first baby she had ever delivered. Leia couldn’t blame Kalonia for her intense grief. She had left home and had her entire community slaughtered leaving only three survivors, and now one of those survivors was dead.

Jaina Fel had collapsed to her knees and begged Leia’s forgiveness for falling for Ben’s trick. It took Leia nearly an hour to convince Jaina it wasn’t her fault, and that Rey had been long gone by the time she was tricked.

Admiral Akbar was furious, ranting and raving about the First Order and how more than ever the Resistance needed to take action against them.

Wedge Antilles was very quiet. He was sad, but not outraged, almost like he wasn’t affected too much by what had happened. Wedge had seen so many families destroyed by the war, Leia wondered if he had gotten so used to death that he regarded it with now no more than a shrug and a “Oh, well. Dang. I’m going to miss them.”

Leia didn’t know why she called Maz Kanata next. There was something odd that pulled her to Maz, and Leia found herself dialing the number. Maz was calm and grandmotherly, but angry under the surface.

“That poor girl,” Maz shook her head. “Far too young for such a great tragedy. Those First Order soldiers are truly monsters. I will never forget the eyes of that little girl; her strong, beautiful, brave, mother’s eyes.”

Lor San Tekka told Leia about the branch of his church on Jakku and that if they ever found anything, he’d let her know. Leia didn’t expect his people to go actually searching for Rey, but it was comforting to know someone would keep an ear and an eye open.

After ending her call with Diego, Leia started to type in the number for Kes Dameron.

“Mistress Leia, perhaps you should take a break from these calls,” Threepio walked into the living room with a tray of lunch. It was a simple sandwich and glass of juice, but considering he had made them without Leia requesting it, it was the thought that counted. “They do seem to be upsetting you greatly.”

“It has to be done, Threepio,” Leia wiped the tears from her eyes as Threepio set the tray on the caf table. “Our friends should hear it personally from a member of the family rather than whichever media outlet finds out first. Plus telling people makes it so I can’t pretend this hasn’t happened. It makes it real.”

“I wish it was not,” Threepio said sadly. “Though I don’t remember it, I was there when Master Anakin was a child, I was there when Master Luke and yourself were born, despite Captain Solo’s best efforts, I was there was Master Ben was born, and I was there when Mistress Rey was born… I had thought that maybe I might be around long enough to see her own child before I made my way into the scrap heap.”
"I did too," Leia said sadly. She looked at her lunch, and then back up at Threepio, "Thank you for the food."

"As you may recall, Princess, I am first and foremost a droid of etiquette. I have many customs in my database spanning dozens of planets and races to perform for a grieving person that I intend to perform for you."

Leia frowned.

"Exactly how many customs are we talking about, Threepio?" she asked apprehensively.

"438 for a grieving family member, 78 of those being specific to an aunt grieving for a niece, and 17 specific to the sister of the firstborn brother grieving his firstborn daughter. The 438 customs are as follows: One-"

There was a knock on the front door.

"Thank the Force," Leia leapt to her feet, thankful she was saved from Threepio going on about 438 grieving customs.

"Hello Senator Organa," A tall, tan young man flashed Leia a pearly white grin. She was surprised to find Poe Dameron standing at her door with his droid, BB-8 at his feet. "May we come in?"

"Of course," Leia frowned slightly at the unexpected guest. She gestured for him to follow her, "I was just about to call your father. What can I do for you, Poe?"

BB-8 followed behind Poe and let out squeal when he saw Artoo. The orange droid rolled up to Artoo letting out many excited beeps rolling in circles around him. Not fond of the younger droid, Artoo let out a few short angry beeps, one of which Leia was fairly certain meant whippersnapper.

"Yesterday was the last day of the semester at the Academy," Poe chuckled as BB-8 persisted in trying to make friends with Artoo. "I’m done now until the fall so I thought I’d come volunteer for the search effort. Felicity’s always been a good family friend, and you know how much I fell in love with that little girl of hers. It’s just killing me to know they’re out there suffering somewhere."

Threepio spoke up, "Actually-"

"Threepio," Leia silenced him with a look. "Don’t you have to switch the laundry over?"

Threepio gave a slight bow and headed to the laundry room. Artoo rolled after him but stopped short when BB-8 started following. Artoo gave another angry beep, but BB-8 chattered happily back. Suddenly, Artoo extended one of his attachments and zapped BB-8 with an electrical shock. The room filled with a mechanical yelp as BB-8 rolled as fast as he could to hide behind Poe’s legs.

"Sorry, buddy," Poe laughed at the droids’ antics, “but no means no. You should have backed off when he asked you to."

BB-8 gave a sad trill.

"BB wants to help find Rey too," Poe told Leia. "I promised her we’d come visit over the summer and she could play with him. She adores BB-8 and he adores her. It might be nice if after all these terrible things she’s been through she got a little time with her favorite droid."
A very loud, angry beep came from the other room.

“Why do I feel like Artoo would legitimately fight me over not calling him Rey’s favorite droid?” Poe joked.

“Rey sure does love BB-8,” Leia said sadly as she sat down on the couch. She gestured for Poe to do the same, “Please sit.”

The summer Poe turned sixteen, he had lived on Rornian with Luke, Ben, Felicity, and Rey who came to absolutely adore him. Kes had bought Poe BB-8 for his birthday, and Poe, Ben, and Rey spent an afternoon assembling him. Overjoyed with the adorable droid roughly the same height as her three-year-old self, Rey had fallen in love with BB-8 the moment she saw the box. Rey had cried just as much over BB-8 leaving at the end of the summer as she had cried over Poe.

And now neither Poe or BB-8 would ever see her again.

Leia took a deep breath and gathered herself to deliver the news.

“I’m afraid that you’ve come too late,” Leia said. “The search for Rey and Felicity is over.”

“They’ve been found?” Poe asked, excited as he sat on the couch opposite and BB-8 settled by his feet.

“Not exactly. Luke and Han are on their way to Tonides to rescue Felicity from the First Order. Rey on the other hand… I’m afraid that Rey has passed away.”

“WHAT?”

“Felicity meant to hide themselves at Niima Outpost on Jakku, but her ship crashed in the desert and they had to walk the rest of the way. Rey was so small and the conditions too harsh. At least it happened painlessly. One day she fell asleep and then… well, she just never woke up.”

“Oh God, Rey,” Poe’s head was in his hands, his back hitching with small sobs. “That poor little girl. How could this happen? It isn’t fair!”

“Death rarely is,” Leia said sadly.

BB-8 watched his Master cry. He pulled up his memory files concerning Rey Rhiaon Skywalker and found that they were talking about the nice little girl who loved to hug and play with him. BB-8 let out a whimper and his head drooped down as he updated his record file of her to the living status of Deceased.

“How can I help?” Poe asked. “Do you need any help bringing her body to here or Rornian or… man, what are you guys going to even do with her? I know Luke’s all for cremation but she seems a little young for that.”

“Actually,” Leia looked down guiltily, “there’s no body to recover. In the panic of her grief, Felicity buried Rey in the sand. When she realized her mistake it was too late: a sandstorm had happened and the grave site was gone. Rey’s… out there somewhere, lost forever to the sands of Jakku.”

Leia couldn’t go on. She broke down crying in front of Poe and BB-8. BB-8 made a small noise and rolled over to Leia, nudging her leg and purring to comfort her.

Poe however was not enveloped by sadness; he was consumed by anger. Rey Skywalker had done nothing to anyone, and yet because of the First Order she was lying dead in the sand.
His decision made, Poe shot to his feet.

“General Organa,” Poe declared with a salute, “I would like to formally request to join the Resistance.”

Leia looked up at him in horror, “Absolutely not.”

“I’m not going to let that little girl die for nothing!”

“I won’t let you join.”

“My studies will be finished next year and I can participate full time during the summer.”

“Come on, there are kids younger than me fighting in the Resistance!” Poe exclaimed.

“Poe, you know why I don’t want you to join.”

Poe locked his eyes with Leia’s.

“And that’s exactly why I have to,” Poe’s voice was distant as his worst memory replayed in his mind. “The First Order executed my mother. She wouldn’t back down as they tried to steal the little children of our community, so they forced her on her knees and opened fire. Footage of it was leaked to the media, and everyone in the galaxy saw my mother die. I remember the speech that you gave afterwards. You quoted my mother’s last words: any force will be met with proper resistance. You used the outrage to form the Resistance, and have saved countless lives as a result. I’ve always meant to join when I was old enough, and now it’s time. My mother lost her life to the First Order on fighting to save the children of the next generation. Now the First Order has taken the life of one of those children, and it’s my turn to fight back.”

Leia thought over Poe’s words carefully. She thought about the speech she made all those years ago. She thought about the speeches she had made since, begging the Senate to recognize the threat of the First Order. They had waved her off as an alarmist and warmonger, and because of that her niece was dead.

There was only one thing left for her to do.

“Please, General,” Poe begged. “Let me join.”

“On one condition,” Leia looked up at Poe and smiled. She patted BB-8’s head, “BB-8 has to join too.”

“Deal,” Poe held out his hand to her.

“Poe Dameron,” Leia shook his hand, “welcome to the Resistance.”

“Aren’t you sure you want to do this?” Jaina questioned for the hundredth time as she followed Leia and Poe into the Senate box.

“No,” Leia said pressing a button for her pod to float forward. “But it needs to be done.”

“At this time, the Chair recognizes the Senator of Coruscant,” Chancellor Mon Mothma broadcasted to the Senate as Leia’s pod floated to the center of the room. “The Senator has an announcement to make.”
Her eyes met Leia’s briefly, and they shared a sad look. Mothma knew what Leia was about to say, and although Mothma didn’t like it, she knew it was something Leia had to do.

“Senators,” Leia began, “for weeks I’ve faced a barrage of questions concerning my brother and the disappearance of his family. Today I come forward with an answer to your questions. My brother’s wife, Felicity Rhiaon Skywalker is being brutally tortured and held as a prisoner of the First Order.”

Chatter spread throughout the room. Intermixed with the concern and horror was the usual disbelief and hand waving of the seriousness of the situation that came anytime Leia tried to speak to the Senate about the First Order. But this time it was different; this time she would make them listen.

“However that is not the announcement I must make,” Leia continued, shooting dirty looks at those who dared question the validity of her statements. “I come forward today to tell you about the other missing Skywalker. My five-year-old niece, Rey Rhiaon Skywalker who is loved by and charms everyone she meets, an innocent with pure goodness radiating from her very soul, the daughter of famed war heroes Luke Skywalker and Felicity Rhiaon… is dead.”

The whole room gasped as one. Outrage cried from the Senators who were horrified, angered and even some unconvinced at the news. Shutters clicked madly as the media scrambled to record announcement. Luke and Felicity had been hounded relentlessly after the announcement of Rey’s birth; Leia could only imagine how it would be with her death.

“She died fleeing the First Order,” Judgement and admonishment for the opposition to Resistance laced every one of Leia’s cruel words. “Rey wasted away in the hot Jakku sun, and her grief-stricken mother dug the grave with her own two hands. Then her mother was captured by the First Order and tortured for her dead daughter’s whereabouts, only to reveal it when they violated her mind. And what did this honorable, non-threatening organization that we don’t need to concern ourselves with do? They sent a holo of the beating and confession to her husband. My brother learned his daughter is dead from watching a holo of the First Order brutalizing the woman he loves. This wasn’t about them; this wasn’t about anything they did or believed in. It was about the views of the Republic, and yet it is Rey and Felicity who paid the price. My brother is on his way right now to get back his wife, but he will never get back his daughter.”

Leia took a long pause as she looked around the room.

“But this announcement means nothing to you, does it?” Bitterness dripped from Leia’s voice. No longer the measured politician, Rey’s death had made something inside of Leia snap. “For years, I have been begging you all to recognize the threat the First Order poses. Yet every time I broach the subject, I’m met with mockery and indifference. I’m told that the Resistance and all of its efforts to save innocent children from being stolen from their families is nothing more than hobby. The last defense between the Republic and destruction has been viewed with no more seriousness than knitting. There was time where I placed my faith and trust into politics and our justice system. But that’s all been a folly, for what good has politics ultimately done to protect the people I love and fight for? You sit here and squabble while people are out there dying. I believe now more than ever we need this Resistance, but I will no longer stand idly by as lives are lost because of petty bureaucracy. That is why today I come forward to announce that I will be stepping down as the Senator of Coruscant, and will commit myself fully to the Resistance.”

Leia’s stunning announcement caused even more commotion.

“I do not come to this decision lightly,” Leia continued above the shouts, “just as I did not come to the decision to form the Resistance lightly. Ten years ago, I stood before this Senate and made a speech, begging for you all to understand. I asked that you take a moment and think of the children in your life, children that are now fully grown. I asked you to imagine what it would be like to lose that child to the First Order, and have no one care to even lift a finger. And I told you that this was not about igniting the war of the past, but preventing the war of our future. Well, now the future how come, and the war has not been prevented.”

Leia paused to look back at Poe. With a resolute expression, Poe nodded at Leia to resume her speech.

Leia turned back to the Senators, “That speech was prompted by the execution of a woman named Shara Bey who lost her life protecting a group of children from the First Order. I founded the Resistance in the name of Shara Bey, and on the promise that her eight-year-old son, Poe Dameron would not have to fight her war. Earlier today the now eighteen-year-old Poe asked to join the Resistance. Prompted by the death of a little girl, Shara Bey’s son will now take up arms to protect the future his mother tried to give him. All because of ignorant, self-serving politicians, most of whom never even fought against the Empire like I and the Rebel Alliance did. We gave our lives, our blood, our sweat, and our tears, and now our children are being murdered thanks to the negligence and indifference of selfish people.”

The outrage at Leia’s speech was great that she could barely be heard above the commotion. Leia didn’t care; the words were coming out of her mouth like snarls. Her eyes flashed menacingly in the chamber, for a split second turning yellow like her birth father’s had been after the slaughter on Mustafar. Leia was vaguely aware that the Dark Side was pumping through her veins. She could almost hear Luke telling her to take it down a notch, but Leia didn’t care. She had given so much to the Resistance, and for what? For Rey to be dead? For her pleas to be ignored? For the sacrifice of time that could have been used helping her son not fall to darkness?

Leia finally understood the way Vader had viewed politics. For years she had clung to the values her mother Padmé Amidala, and adoptive father, Bail Organa had lived by, but it was Darth Vader who had ultimately gotten it right. While Leia certainly wasn’t about to advocate for a dictatorship, she understood his frustrations with the Republic. They just sat there and squabbled, doing nothing while people lost their lives. If Leia ever wanted anything done, she would have to do it herself.

A hand placed on her shoulder jolted Leia out of her reverie. Jaina was touching her, looking on in concern while Poe frowned in the background. Leia then realized that she was shaking, and tears were blurring her vision.

Luke was right: losing yourself to the Dark Side was easy.

Wiping the tears from her eyes, Leia turned back to the Senate in determination, “My resignation begins immediately. I will not let the names of Shara Bey and Rey Rhiaon Skywalker get scrubbed from history. I will ensure they are remembered for their sacrifices as Martyrs of the Resistance and our fight for freedom. If any wish to join our cause, we welcome you with open arms. And to those who still deny the reality of the situation, I say this: Wake up, Senators! Wake up! This isn’t a game; this is a battle we cannot afford to lose. If you continue to allow your ignorance and stubbornness to prevail, then you are digging your own grave. This Imperial wannabe already has Stormtroopers, already has TIE Fighters and Star Destroyers, they already have Dark Force Users in charge. How much longer until they build another Death Star? How long until they target this system? Now is the time to make your decision, and I only pray that you all make the right one.”

The room has quieted, waiting for what Leia would say next. Having the orphan heir of Alderaan suggest the creation of a new Death Star dropped in their stomachs like lead. Fear filled the room.

Leia took a deep breath and looked around the room, “It has been an honour serving as the Senator of Coruscant, and I only hope that my new role will come to serve you even better. Be careful Senators, and goodbye.”
“Organa’s speech has thrown the Government into utter chaos,” the Anchor of HoloNews Nightly reported.

Luke, Han, and Chewie watched the projection on the dejarik table as they mended the table rim, still hours away from the Ouvvis System and Felicity. Leia’s shocking announcement was all over the news on every channel. The boys had been greatly surprised when the story broke, Leia not having informed them ahead of time. While Luke and Chewie had stared at the news station in shock, Han decided to break the ice by declaring that he guess it meant he needed to get a job.

“Reports are pouring in of the different responses Organa’s speech has provoked,” the Anchor continued. A muted image of Mon Mothma at a press conference was brought on screen, “Less than an hour after Organa’s speech, Chancellor Mon Mothma announced that she was stepping down in protest of the way the Republic has handled the issue.”

The clip of Mon Mothma played.

“I am horrified that two of our brightest and most revered war heroes has lost their child as a result of this inaction,” Mon Mothma said in a passionate, yet measured tone. “My condolences go out to Jedi Grandmaster Luke Skywalker and Resistance Lieutenant General Felicity Rhiaon. I apologize for and willing bear partial responsibility for your loss.”

“The Chancellor was not the only politician to step down in protest of Rey Skywalker’s death,” the Anchor said as they cut to a clip of Luke and Leia’s cousin, Pooja. “Senator of Naboo, Pooja Naberrie, cousin of Organa and Skywalker has also announced her resignation.”

“This is an awful blow to our family,” Pooja said in her own press conference. “My aunt, Padmé Amidala did not fight against Palpatine and give up her life so that her granddaughter could suffer an unimaginable death. As long as the Republic and Naboo remains indifferent, it shows that we are no better than champions of Palpatine and all that he stood for.”

“The military took a large hit today as well,” the Anchor was the focus again. “Many of the highly ranked military commanders of the Republic Army and Air Force fought alongside Skywalker and Rhiaon during the Rebellion. Twenty-five of them have resigned their commissions in protest.”

“I’ve been on Jakku,” the camera cut to Diego Nalto, “I know that suffocating heat. I remember Felicity and I practically crawling to Niima Outpost, the heat being so terrible. I can’t imagine what Felicity went threw when she lost Rey to that heat. And to dig the grave of her daughter with her own two hands…”

Diego couldn’t go on.

“But those aren’t even the most shocking things to happen,” the Anchor continued. “The planet of Zygerria is withdrawing its membership in the Republic. Queen Nerissa released a statement: Felicity Rhiaon, Luke Skywalker, and a dozen Jedi helped me overthrow my cruel sister, and bring an end to a thousand generation of slavery on Zygerria. We stand with Luke Skywalker, Felicity Rhiaon, and the Jedi. Justice must be served.”

The footage then cut to yet another press conference, where the entire staff of the Republic Emissary Office stood in front of the reporters.

“And the most shocking development was the resignation of the entire Senate Emissary Office,” the Anchor announced. “Felicity Rhiaon was employed as an Emissary for over a decade, before leaving Coruscant to become the Jedi Order’s architect on Rornian. Nils Arlos, former Head of the Senate Emissary Office and Rhiaon’s former boss, explained their reasoning.”

“Felicity Rhiaon is an excellent worker, and a close friend to all of us,” Nils told the cameras. “Dozens of planets joined the Senate because of her hard work. News of her loss as devastated us and shaken our views. None of us can continue on in our roles as we do not believe it to be right to advocate planets joining a government we no longer can stand behind. We ask that as long as the Republic refuses to do anything about the First Order, each and every planet must seriously revaluate their membership.”

“Man, people are pissed,” Han gave a low whistle as the station cut to montage of stock images of Luke, Felicity, and Rey as a pair of political analysts discussed the situation. “Then again, they’ve got a cute little girl as the face of the issue.”

Luke said nothing, staring with teary eyes at the images of Rey. Han looked at Chewie, who growled that maybe they should turn the news off. With a sheepish expression, Han flipped off the projection.

“I’m really sorry, Luke,” Han said quietly.

“I just can’t believe she’s gone,” Luke whispered. He swallowed hard and looked at Han and Chewie, “You know, I always thought that if anything were to happen to you guys, especially Leia and Rey, I would sense it, but… Nothing. I didn’t feel a thing. I had no idea-”

“It’s alright, Luke,” Han placed a hand on Luke’s shoulder. “Most people don’t sense that sort of thing. And you know… maybe it’s better you didn’t sense it. Can you imagine what would have happened if while we were searching for Fliss you suddenly sensed that Rey was gone? You were already pretty broken down and desperate, that may have just pushed you off the deep end.”

Luke lowered his head, “What am I supposed to do now?”

“You go on living.”

“How?”

“… I have no idea.”

Taking in the despondent expressions of the men, Chewie growled something.

Han perked up at the words, “You’re absolutely right!”

Luke frowned, “What did he say?”

“Look, nothing is going to ever fill the void that Rey left behind, and the Jedi may be gone too, but not everything’s lost. You still have us, you still have Leia, and you still have Fliss.”
Luke gave a small smile but said nothing as he contemplated Han’s words. Han and Chewie were right, Rey left a very unique hole in his heart. Rey was more than family; Rey was part of him in a way she was part of only one other. The combination of two hearts, yet one unique individual in her own right. Luke could never replace Rey, nor did he want to, but there was only one person who could ever come close to mending the wound left by Rey’s death. And that person was the other heart who had created Rey; the person who was the other half of Luke’s soul.

Luke took a deep breath and found the strength to hold on.

For as long as Felicity Rhiaon was alive, Luke still had hope.

The confrontation of his nephew on the Tonides base of the First Order had occurred over a month ago. As expected, the whole thing had been a trap. Han had done his best to distract the guards while Luke and Chewie pressed forward to find Felicity. Instead they found an unmasked Kylo Ren waiting for them with a legion of Stormtroopers and devastating news.

“I killed her myself!” Kylo had been gleeful at the thought of his aunt being murdered. “I ended her miserable existence, and ridded the world of her corruptive influence.”

“No, You’re lying,” Luke had said, half in fear and half in genuine disbelief. “Felicity is not dead.”

“Yes, she is,” Kylo had grinned. He had pulled out a small HoloDisc from his cloak. “See for yourself.”

Kylo had switched on the HoloDisc. It had projected the image of Felicity on her knees, tied up, face bruised, bloodied, and hair sheered crudely. Evidently the footage had been recorded seconds after Hux telling Luke he had seven days to get Felicity.

The camera was zoomed in extremely close, only Felicity’s panicked expression filling the screen. There were muffled screams behind her gagged mouth, and she was shaking her body, trying to wrench free.

Luke would never forget her wide hazel eyes; panic and fear filling them as she tried to scream for help. He would never forget the gloved hand that brought the blaster to her temple. He would never forget Felicity’s muffled shouts as the hand squeezed the trigger. He would never forget the blast, the way Felicity’s eyes went blank, and how she fell to the ground.

“And do you know what I did next?” Kylo had asked gleefully, watching as Chewie let out a roar of grief and his uncle literally shaking with anger, struggling not to attack Kylo where he stood. “Do you know what I did to that schutta you call a wife?”

Luke would never forget the image Kylo next showed. The thing he would refuse to ever tell Han and Leia. The thing he would swear Chewbacca to secrecy about. The thing that would cause Luke to leave the base without his wife’s body.

Because what the First Order did to Felicity Rhiaon ensured Luke would have no body to lay to rest.
She was lost, just as Rey had been.

Kylo was arrogant. He was not the naïve Ben Solo, Luke had been pleading with to come home. Luke looked upon Kylo with new eyes: he knew there was no redemption. Even Vader wouldn’t have sunk to the level of vicious anger and bitter hatred that Kylo had resorted to. In Luke’s eyes, Vader was a hero for strangling his pregnant wife compared to what Kylo did to Felicity.

Kylo couldn’t stop gloating, going on and on about what he had done to his rival and how much he enjoyed every moment of it. Luke didn’t hear any of the words, them becoming muted in the background, an angry buzzing paired with the pounding in Luke’s ears. It was only when Kylo slipped the disk into Luke’s breast pocket that Luke finally snapped.

The Dark Side flooding into him, Luke grabbed his nephew by the throat and threw him to the ground. Kylo let out a surprised yelp while Chewie roared and the Stormtroopers advanced. Despite their efforts, and the objecting cries of Force Ghosts in his mind, no one could get Luke to stop. Consumed by hatred, anger, and the Dark Side, Luke wrapped his hands around the throat of his own nephew and refused to let go until Kylo Ren was as dead as his wife and daughter.

It was Chewie who eventually got Luke off of Kylo, locking his arms around Luke’s chest and pulling him backwards. Holding Luke in place with one arm, his used his other to bash away a line of Stormtroopers and pulled Luke towards the door.

“No! NO!” Luke had cried out, struggling to escape Chewie’s unyielding grasp.

By the time they got to Han at the Falcon, Luke had calmed enough for Chewie to let him go. Luke was in complete and utter shock: shock at what happened to Felicity, and shock at what he had done to his own nephew.

“Let’s get out of here!” Han had cried when he caught sight of the others. When they came closer into view, running at top speed for the loading ramp of the Falcon, Han frowned at the number.

“Wait! Stop! Where’s Fliss?”

There was a heartbreaking silence.

“Felicity’s dead,” Luke couldn’t believe his own words.

He still didn’t believe his words a month later. His wife, Felicity Rhiaon, the love of his life, his other half, his opposite, his match, his soulmate, his true love, the mother of his child, and keeper of his heart… she was dead.

And it was all his fault.

If he had gone to Leia’s office the second Ben showed up…

If he had stayed in Leia’s office in the first place to listen to the messages…

If he had called Unkar Plutt again…

If he had left his line open…

If he had gone with them to Jakku…
If he had let them stay on Rornian…

If he had never left in the first place…

If he had stopped Ben’s fall to the Dark Side…

So many errors, one disaster after another and now the two most important women in his life were dead. True he had Han and Leia, but knowing what Ben had done, knowing he had failed their son, Luke could barely stand being in their presence. It was all his fault; he had destroyed their family, and this time there was nothing to go back to.

It felt hollow to be back on Rornian. The ceremony to burn and bury the ashes of his Jedi was long past, and now Luke and a team of people were picking through the rubble of the Jedi Temple and his home to see what they could recover.

It felt even more hollow for Luke to be standing in the office of his late wife. As architect, Felicity’s office stored all of the blueprints of the various buildings on Rornian, and Leia had sent Luke in to get the ones for the Temple to make sure they didn’t miss any rooms. The fire had collapsed and buried many walls and hallways, and it was hard to recognize the once familiar floorplan.

Luke suspected ulterior motives to being sent in to Felicity’s office. It was the only building left standing of personal significance to the Skywalker family. The home, Temple, and Luke’s office within the Temple had been burned down, but Felicity’s office had been left untouched. Unlike some of the houses that though left standing, had been trashed, Felicity’s office was exactly like she had left it. Looking around the room, Luke could imagine Felicity had gone home for lunch and would be back to start on work any minute.

But she would never step foot in that room again.

The office was a small building not far from the Skywalker residence. Originally it had been a house for a Jedi named Obik Kenu, but two years after moving to Rornian, he had married Reine Agim and moved into her bigger house. Obik had very simple tastes, and his one floor house had zero frills. The entrance way had relatively unchanged as had the small bathroom and kitchen. The ship garage was retained, though always sat empty as Felicity would walk to her office from home. The living room was converted into a waiting room, the guest bedroom as the designing room with her easel, drawing implements, measuring equipment, and other such tools, and the master bedroom served as Felicity’s actual office.

Unlike the office Felicity had during her years as a Senate Emissary, her architecture office was very homey. Personal holos riddled the walls and various surfaces, and a set of clothing, weapons, and a fold up cot were stored in the closet for times she had to pull all-nighters. A fully stocked caf station sat in the corner, accompanied by a select of hot chocolate mix for the times her husband would visit her. There was a small box with toys and activities that Felicity would open during the days she had to work and babysitting for Rey fell through (Felicity being relegated to watching Rey as Luke’s duties didn’t allow him a lot of distractions and were honestly a lot more boring to Rey.)

The rest of the house had other such personalization to it that sometimes Luke would joke that she secretly was planning to leave him and live there but just needed to figure out what to do with Rey. There was a tiny element of truth to the idea as during the two or three times Luke and Felicity had gotten into a big enough fight that they need space from each other for a while, Felicity had actually lived in her office building for a few days. It was extremely rare for their fights to get to that level, and it usually ended with one of them going to the home of the other, both apologizing and falling into each other’s arms in a bit of passionate reconciliation.
Those fights had mainly been for the really big issues such as when Felicity suffered her postpartum depression, or one time when they had gotten into a huge disagreement involving Ben and how Felicity no longer felt safe with letting him be alone with Rey. Luke had managed to eventually convince Felicity that everything would be alright, and Felicity had come home.

And because he won that argument, now Felicity would never come home.

Luke sighed as he retrieved from a cabinet the small data chip that contained the blueprints of the Jedi Temple. Felicity had not designed it, and in fact had only been designing things for a little more than six years. Most of Temple Village had been completed when he and his new bride had moved to Rornian, and in fact that had been the whole point. Luke had thought it selfish to put his personal needs before that of the Jedi Order, and thus made a point of having his home be one of the last buildings constructed.

Yet looking around Temple Village, one could see Felicity’s projects all around. The small school where Jedi Knight Eline Typhe-Korden taught the children their basic education. The library where the residents would gather for entertainment and trade HoloNovels, HoloVids, HoloMags, and other such Holo technology. The market building Felicity had convinced Luke to build so that all supplies would be in a central location. There was no money exchanged between the residents of Temple Village, and all supplies was communal, trusting that people would take only what they need. Before Felicity created the market, one had to go to each individual location to collect their needs: medical supplies at Doctor Kalonia’s office, food from the meditation gardens, outside materials from the delivery hangar, and so forth.

Now none of it would be needed; only he and Doctor Kalonia were the last people alive.

A light knock on the door stirred Luke from his thoughts.

“Come on,” Luke hastily called as he wiped the tears he just realised had formed in his eyes.

The door slid open to reveal Poe Dameron carrying a small storage crate, followed by BB-8.

“Hey, General Organa said I could find you here,” Poe hesitantly lingered at the door. “Am I interrupting anything?”

“No, of course not.” Luke gestured to the chair across the desk, “Please, come on.”

Poe gave a half smile and entered the room.

“Thank you, again Poe for coming to help go through the debris,” Luke said. “I know there’s a huge list of things you’d rather spend your summer vacation doing.”

“Don’t think anything of it,” Poe set down the crate on the desk. “It’s the least I can do. This is the first box of things we’ve found. Some of it’s a little charred, but everything’s in a good enough condition. General Organa said to go through it when you’re ready…You know, Luke, I don’t know if I’ve had to chance to express my condolences. I’m really sorry for your loss.”

“Yeah,” Luke said, his voice distant as he stared at a Holo on Felicity’s desk. It was a simple shot of Felicity with her arms wrapped around Rey in a hug, the two girls laughing. “I’m sorry too.”

“Is it true what they’re saying about Felicity? She’s gone too?”

Luke nodded as he lowered his head, trying not to let Poe see his tears. BB-8 watching from the corner made a sad noise and updated the living status of Felicity Rhiaon’s file in his system to deceased.
Poe sighed and dropped his own head, “I’m sorry. She was a good friend to me and my family. If you need anything at all.”

“I know,” Luke gave Poe a smile, but Poe could see the pain and falseness behind it. “Thank you.”

“Wait, can you give this to Leia?” Luke handed Poe the data chip with the Temple blueprints.

“You too, Poe.”

Luke sighed and looked at the crate Poe had delivered. It was filled with the smallest of things, most of which had no reason to have escaped the flames yet through a series of random circumstances had manage. They were a lot like Luke, he should have been lost to those flames, yet there he stood.

Shifting through the box, Luke didn’t find much of significance. A charred frying pan, a blast remote to practise using a lightsaber to deflect bolts, a chip containing some poorly written science fiction HoloNovel Luke had probably found in a one credit bin at a refueling station to pass the hours on a long trip.

But there were also a few things that Luke was glad to see had survived: the box containing both Luke and Felicity’s medals of bravery for defeating the Death Star, the replica the gold jacket Luke wore at the medal ceremony where he met Felicity, Felicity’s favorite blaster – a blocky silver NN-14 Han always liked the look of – and the japor snippet Anakin Skywalker had once gifted Padmé Amidala that had been reclaimed by the Naberrie family before her burial that Padmé’s sister Sola later gave to Luke.

There was also an assortment of old Holos including a fifteen-year-old Luke posing on Tatooine in front of his first speeder, a Holo of Felicity and Leia with Felicity’s brother Brendan that was taken a month before his death, a Holo of Padmé Amidala that Luke had received from the Naberrie family, and a Holo of Luke and Han in their suits at Han and Leia’s wedding.

The thought of weddings led Luke to probably the most painful item in the box. Though her wedding dress had been eaten up by the flames, the metal box Felicity had stored her wedding veil had proven to be flame-resistant.

Luke’s hands shook as he lifted the veil out of the box. The day he married Felicity Rhiaon had been the happiest day of his life, rivaled only by the day she gave birth to their daughter Rey.

“Do you, Luke Skywalker take this woman to be your partner in life and sharing your path; equal in love, a mirror for your true self, promising to honor and cherish, through good times and bad, in sickness and in health, for as long as you both shall live?”

“I do,” Luke vowed, unable to wipe the adorably goofy grin off his face that made Felicity Rhiaon fall in love with him in the first place.

Felicity have that mischievous one corner of her mouth upturned smirk that Luke could never resist,
“Good. I did not spend all that time getting this dress altered for you to go, ‘yeah, maybe not’ at the last second.”

Luke broke down at the memory. How many times had he pictured with growing old and grey together? How many times had the argued over whether or not Felicity would allow Luke to grow a beard when got to be a wrinkly, wise, ancient mentor? How many times had Felicity boasted that she was going to stay in good enough shape that she could still kick Captain Phasma’s ass in hand-to-hand combat when Felicity was fifty-five or even sixty? How many times did Han and Luke joke that Luke was going to freak out his grandkids with his false hand? How many times did Luke imagine walking Rey down the aisle, maybe even as she wore her mother’s veil on her wedding day?

He sobbed as his clutched his wife’s wedding veil, the words ‘for as long as you both shall live’ echoing in his head. Luke remembered the day he and Felicity decided on those words in place of ‘till death do you part’ as they had both knew that their love would last beyond the grave. Luke had always thought that when they did pass, it would be at the very most a few years apart. Secretly, Luke had even hoped that they would pass away peacefully in their sleep in their nineties on the very same night, maybe even holding hands.

And yet there he was at thirty-nine, a widower to the greatest woman he could have ever hoped to love.

As sadistic as it sounded, Luke wished there had been a body. He wished that the First Order had been cruel enough to throw his wife’s corpse at his feet. At least then he could have held her, desperately clutching his cold, still body in his embrace as he cried out to the heavens. It would have been something out of a gothic tragedy, his sorrow consuming him as her head hung limp and her glassy eyes staring unseeingly at the sky.

He would have built her the best pyre imaginable, and cremated her with the highest respect and noblest of ceremonies. It would have been the same for Rey if he had her body. Luke probably would have laid Rey in her mother’s arms, and watch silently as they burned.

Then again, maybe it was a good thing he couldn’t light their pyre. If he had, Luke probably would have thrown himself upon it.

Is this what it felt like for his father the day he was told his wife and child was dead? This anger, this emptiness, this rage at the world? Luke could almost understood wanting to build a Death Star and destroy all the people who had taken them from him.

Almost.

Slamming the lid of the veil box shut, Luke dropped to his knees and sobbed. Everything he had loved and worked so hard for was gone. And it was all his fault. He stayed there, crouched underneath Felicity’s desk, sobbing, uncaring if anyone saw him. Nothing could ever make this better.

But a person can’t cry forever, and eventually Luke ran out of tears. He body convulsed with dry heaves, but soon that too came to a stop. Luke just crouched there, his mind blank like it had been the night of the massacre, staring at nothing, dead to the world.

And then he saw it.

Lying forgotten underneath the desk was a doll.
Rey had many toys, in fact probably too many. She had many honorary uncles, plus an actual aunt and uncle who liked spoiling her with treasures from their travels. Even Poe Dameron and the other Jedi had gotten in on the game. Luke and Felicity tried their best to taper off the excess of gifts, but the other had soon caught on to the idea that if Rey saw the gift before Luke and Felicity said no, her parents rarely had the heart to deny her her present.

Lando was probably the worse offender, always bringing her lavish gifts, spoiling her like she was his own daughter. Eventually things got out of control with Lando’s gifts, and Felicity had had a few ‘words’ with him. Luke wasn’t certainly exactly what was said, but the next thing he knew, Lando eased back to a reasonable level.

But this doll wasn’t something a family friend had picked up in a shop. This doll had been handstitched by Felicity.

It was a hobby Felicity had picked up in the early days her involvement of the Rebellion. In need of stress relief, Felicity would take scraps of fabric and sew them into various creatures, and the dolls would be handed out to children during aid missions. Felicity had become rather famous in the Rebellion for her hobby and often received requests for her to sew them for the newborn children of Rebel soldiers. In fact, Poe Dameron’s first toy had been a loper sewn by Felicity.

This doll in particular had been modeled after Felicity, Rey begging her mother to make her a mommy doll to go with all the dolls her uncles bought her that looked like Rey. It was faceless and had brown hair tied into a messy bun. She wore Rey’s favorite outfit of Felicity’s: the one she had worn while stealing the Death Star plans. Black pants and boots with cool looking gun belts strapped around her waist and right look. Brown fingerless gloves and vest, and a long sleeved blue shirt. Luke shared Rey’s love of the outfit, often saying that if he had run into Felicity when he was nineteen, he definitely wouldn’t have spent all those years mooning after Leia.

Luke grabbed the doll and stared at it painfully. How many times had he scolded Rey for leaving her toys laying around everywhere? How many times had he scolded her for bringing toys to the dinner table? How many times had he scolded her for playing with her toys when it was bedtime?

How many toys had he scolded her for the stupidest things? For rolling her eyes while someone said something she found stupid (something Luke knew for a fact she had picked up from Han.) For refusing to eat all of her vegetables? For throwing a temper tantrum like any five-year-old? For touching something she shouldn’t? For going outside to play without supervision?

How many times had he made his precious daughter sad? Angry? Frustrated? How many times had he hurt his little girl?

He wanted to take it all back. Turn back the clock and replace every bad thing with something good. He wanted to hold her in his arms and make her smile. He wanted to play with her endless sea of toys. He wanted spin her around, dance, laugh, and do anything that made her happy. He wanted to show and teach her the things he had waited until she was older to do. He wanted to teach her hand-to-hand combat, how to use a lightsaber, how to fly a ship, comfort her the first time someone broke her heart, let her have her first sip of alcohol, let her cut and dye her hair in whatever crazy fashion the rebellious teenager wanted to.

Luke slowly rose to his feet and set the doll on the desk next to Felicity’s wedding veil.

He wanted a lifetime with his wife and daughter… and all he had was useless junk.

Luke finally let out the scream of rage he had been holding back for months. He grabbed things out of the crate at random and threw them against the wall.
It was all useless junk! Junk that could never replace having Rey and Felicity in his life, only haunting him with their memories.

Loud crashes filled the room as most of the item broke them a shatter. What good was any of it? They were gone and it was all his fault. Though Luke felt the catharsis of the destruction, he felt empty when he ran out of things to break. He still didn’t have his girls, and now his treasured possessions were broken.

And it was all his fault.

Luke fell to his knees and sobbed again.

Felicity and Rey were dead, Ben was corrupted, and the First Order was taking control. It was all his fault. He couldn’t save them, the people he loved had been hurt, and it was all his.

His fault. His fault. His fault!

Luke felt a warmth on his shoulder like someone trying to put their hand on it.

“I’m so sorry, my son,” the ghostly voice of Anakin Skywalker filled the room. “I understand how you feel.”

Luke looked up with tear filled eyes to see the blue form of his father trying to comfort him as Obi-Wan Kenobi and Master Yoda looked on sympathetically. As Luke’s eyes took in his father, rage flared up in his chest.

“This is all your fault,” Luke whispered. Anger building in his core, Luke stood and screamed, “THIS IS ALL YOUR FAULT!”

“Calm down? Calm down? MY WIFE AND DAUGHTER ARE DEAD AND IT’S ALL HIS FAULT!”

Anakin tried to defend himself, “Luke, listen-”

“No!” Luke screamed. “Everything truly bad that has ever happened to me is because of you! You cut off my hand! You threatened my sister! You burned down my childhood home, murdering my aunt and uncle! You killed the Jedi! You dismantled the Republic! You created the Empire! You killed Obi-Wan! You froze Han in carbonite! You shot down Biggs! You tortured Leia and killed the innocent billions of her planet! You made my mother die!”

Anakin physically recoiled at the final accusation.

“And after all that you somehow managed to find redemption,” Luke spat the words as if they were bitter acid. “Yet the effect of your tyranny lived on. How many people wake up everyday with loved ones dead because of you? How many people wake up screaming like Felicity does… did sometimes, remembering the things you did to them? But it doesn’t end there, because Vader’s legacy lived on. The Empire’s legacy lived on. Now we have the First Order. Now we have another slaughtered Jedi Order. Now we have another Sith, or whatever Snoke and Kylo want to call themselves. Now we have another dead mother and child who wastes away in a desert. Except this time that child will never leave that planet. Felicity and Rey are dead because of you!”

Anakin closed his eyes and lowered his head in shame. He had no excuse to give.

“I want to see them,” Luke turned to Obi-Wan. “Make Felicity and Rey appear to me like you do!”

Obi-Wan looked at the other Jedi awkwardly, “It doesn’t work like that, Luke.”

Plus there was the little fact that not both Rey and Felicity were dead. Obi-Wan however, could not tell Luke that. It was against the rules of being a Force Ghost. If he tried to say something like ‘hey, go to Jakku, Rey’s actually alive and waiting for you’ Obi-Wan would be physically incapable of opening his mouth.

It was painful to see Luke suffering from the thought that his wife and daughter were dead, but it was worse knowing that it wasn’t true.

“Careful with your grief, you must be,” Yoda advised. Luke angrily noticed that Yoda didn’t appear to be too perturbed by Luke’s grief. “Of the Dark Side these emotions are. Against attachments for this is exact reason, I advise.”

“Uh, oh,” Anakin muttered, taking another step back.

“Well, excuse me for getting upset over the fact that my five-year-old daughter is dead!” Luke’s eyes flashed. “I don’t mean to bother you with my petty problems! Of course that wouldn’t be a problem if I hadn’t been too old to be trained and brainwashed by your mantras against human emotion! But of course, that’s not my fault, is it? Who was the one who waited until I was nineteen to start training me?”

Obi-Wan looked away.

“Insult the child, I did not intend to,” Yoda calmly replied.

“Of course not, but her mother who doubts the Force is free game, isn’t she?”

“We have nothing against Felicity, Luke,” Obi-Wan assured him. “She is a good partner for you. We’re just worried about how you’re dealing with your grief.”

“It’s very easy to become obsessed with loss, Luke,” Anakin added. “Take it from someone who made that mistake. It gets you nothing in the end, and you just push anyone who might be left to support you. You can’t waste your life on what if, because if you do, when your life comes to an end you wind up thinking what if I hadn’t wasted my life. Maybe if I hadn’t let my grief consume me, I could have been saved a lot sooner.”

Luke stared at his father, conflicting, bitter emotions swirling about, “I don’t care about anyone getting saved. It’s too late for Rey and Felicity and the others.”

“What about Ben?” Anakin asked.

Luke’s face hardened, “After what Kylo did to Felicity… I don’t want to save him.”

Silence filled the room. Luke Skywalker who believed in Darth Vader after Obi-Wan and Yoda gave up, had just sentenced Ben Solo to a life of darkness with no chance of redemption.

“Errored we have in the past,” Yoda admitted. “Natural, grief is, and allow time to work through it, we must. For your wife and child, grieve, Luke Skywalker. Then in their memories, rebuild the Jedi Order you will.”

“What?” Luke felt like he had been slapped. “You’re already telling me to rebuild the Order?”

“And the essence, time is,” Yoda nodded.

Anakin was in the corner, shaking his head, “How am I the smartest ghost in the room right now? I thought cutting off my son’s hand before asking him to rule the Galaxy with me was a good idea.”

Luke however, was shaking, “I have spent the last twenty years of my life rebuilding the Jedi Order and fixing the mess you three made! Yes, three! Because of your pride and stubbornness, whether it was on the idea of allowing attachments, unwillingness to confess you had a problem, or view that Sith are unredeemable, the Jedi Order fell and took the Republic with it. You waited nineteen years to do a damn thing about it, and put it all on my shoulders. I struggled for three years without any guidance, and then was told I couldn’t be trained, despite everything apparently riding on me being so. Then you kept to your stubborn pride that put us here in the first place and told me somehow to fix things. And I did. I gave everything I had for twenty years to rebuild the Jedi Order, and in one moment, because one boy decided to idolize your mistakes it was all gone. Dozens of people were slaughtered because of the legacy of your mistakes. Now their bodies are barely cold and you’re asking me to replace them?”

And then Luke hit upon it, the question he hadn’t considered since he was nineteen years old. He always knew it was his duty, his responsibility, his mission to be and rebuild the Jedi.

But did he even want to be one? A long time ago his answer would have been an automatic yes, but as he stood in the ashen village of his efforts, he felt the passion gone.

He had once spoken with Felicity on the topic of optimism. She had called herself a pessimist, but Luke told her she had a spark in her eye. Felicity had told him it was a dying ember that Luke replied could be fanned back into a flame. He had only known her a few months at the time, the conversation taking place at the beginning of their friendship. Luke would spend the next ten years fanning that ember, helping Felicity believe in the world again.

And then Ben cruelly stamped out that flame, and with it, so went out the flame of Luke’s passion to be a Jedi. He didn’t want it anymore, people trusting him, believing in him, and relying on him. He just let them down.

It reminded him of another memory of Felicity from a time when the two of them had seriously questioned whether or not they could be a couple with her disbelief in the Force.

“I love you, Luke,” Felicity said. “But you need to understand that I’m never going to view the idea of destiny with more than raised eyebrows. To me it’s all just a logical sequence of events, with the occasional random thing thrown in. Believe me, I’ve tried not to be this way, but I can’t do it. I can’t find it in myself to believe something like my brother’s entire purpose was to die so that I could steal the plans to the Death Star so that some farm kid could get his sorry butt off Tatooine.”

Luke replied, “And I can’t believe that all of that wasn’t part of a plan to save the Galaxy from the Empire, find Han and Leia, and lead me to you.”

“And I respect that, but I can’t bring myself to agree.”
Then where does leave us?"

Felicity smiled, “At a compromise.”

Luke frowned questioningly at her as Felicity put a hand on his cheek. As Felicity gave a happy sigh, Luke placed his hand over hers.

“Luke, we can make this work,” Felicity pressed her forehead against his. “And do you know why?”

“Why?”

“Because I will never believe in destiny… but I’ll always believe in you. I know that we love each other, and that what we have is special. So no matter what comes our way, we’ll always be at each other’s side, keeping each other from harm.”

“Always,” Felicity whispered. “I will always believe in you.”

It was gamble that cost Felicity her life… and that of their daughter.

Obi-Wan sighed, “In time.”

“No!” Luke snapped. “Never! I’m done! Done with the Jedi, done with the First Order, done with you!”

“I want you to leave,” Luke coldly declared. “All of you. Go back to the Force, or the afterlife, or wherever you go when you’re not bothering me, and never come back.”

The ghosts looked at each other in a loss of what to say.

Yoda sighed, “If that is what you wish.”

And Yoda was gone.

And Obi-Wan was gone to.

Luke locked eyes with Anakin who looked like he desperately didn’t want to leave his son.

“Luke,” Anakin pleaded. “Please don’t do this.”

And Anakin was gone.
Luke was alone. Looking around the room, he felt a heavy sense of finality and displacement.

“I have to get out of here,” Luke whispered.

Luke crossed the room and pulled a holo to the side revealing a small locked safe hidden away.

“Passcode?” the safe prompted.

“Brendan Rhiaon died a martyr,” Luke spoke Felicity’s passcode and a minute later the safe clicked open.

Only one thing sat in the safe, a small pouch hanging on a string that could be tied as a necklace. Inside was a data chip that once held a copy of the Death Star schematics, but now it held the Jedi Order’s greatest secret.

Closing the safe, Luke tied the string around his neck. He grabbed the Holo of the laughing Felicity and Rey, and Rey’s Felicity doll.

Luke didn’t look back as he walked away.

It had to have been the worst time for Luke to walk past the door of Han and Leia’s room. Staying in the guest room of Reine Agim’s house, Leia and Han were in the middle of a heated argument.

“Don’t play stupid, Sweetheart!” Han snapped. “I saw the torture footage! I heard what Ben said to Felicity! When exactly were you going to tell me that the reason we sent Ben to Luke was that he was hearing voices in his head?”

“T’m sorry, Han but what was I supposed to say?” Leia replied, her voice twice the volume as normal.

“I don’t know, how about, hey Han, our son’s hearing voices! Maybe we should do something about it!”

“Look, I didn’t think you’d know how to deal with it. Luke and I are Force Sensitive so we understand this a little better, and Felicity only knew because she’s the one who told us in the first place.”

“Right, sorry, I forgot, you and Luke are the might Jedi and I’m just the guy who knocked you up.”

Luke winced as he stood in the hallway. This was his fault, he had failed Ben and now Han and Leia were paying the price. More sure than ever of his decision, Luke carefully slipped into his room and started packing.

Leia was sitting on the bed, head in hands as Han stood facing the wall, hands pressed upon it and leaning forwards. It was painful to hear the quiet sobs Leia was trying to repress.

Han sighed and walked over to the bed, “I’m sorry.”

Leia sniffed and said, “Hold me.”

Han sat down on the bed and pulled her into his arms. He couldn’t help remember the night on Endor Luke had left. Leia had asked him to hold her the same way, and it had been the moment Han knew he wanted to spend his life with her. No matter what fight they had, no matter what secret they may hold, no matter what trauma they went through, no matter what forces may try to tear them apart, Han needed this five foot nothing trigger happy Princess who could match him in their battle of wits. He may just be some stuck-up, half-witted, scruffy-looking nerf herder, but he was her stuck-up, half-witted, scruffy-looking nerf herder.

“Hey, I love you,” Han said.

“I know,” Leia couldn’t stop the small smile that graced her expression. “We can’t keep doing this.”

Han grinned, “Actually, I think it’s because we haven’t been yelling at each other as much as usual that this happened.”

“Han-”

“I don’t care if you didn’t tell me about Ben. I know I haven’t been the best father, and that’s on me, but now this is bigger than Ben being a moody teenager.”

“I know,” Leia sighed, resting her head on his broad chest. “I can’t believe we’re going back to war.”

“Hey, if the First Order thinks they can kill our sister and niece and get away with it, then bring it on.”

“What are we going to do about Luke? I can’t imagine the pain he’s going through right now.”

“We do what we should have done when he found out Vader was his dad. He stand by him and help him through this. We’re not going to leave him to suffer and blame himself like last time. Now, in my defence of last time, I was frozen in carbonite, but I don’t know what your excuse is.”

“Han,” Leia warned.

“I’m just messing with you,” Han squeezed Leia. “But I’m serious, we need to stand behind Luke.”

“And we’re not going to let him blame himself and do something drastic.”

Little did they know, he already had.

“Looking for something in particular?”

Luke jumped nearly a foot when he was caught by Doctor Kalonia raiding the medical closet of her office.

“Doctor Kalonia! I didn’t hear you come in,” Luke said, trying to calm his heartrate back to normal.

“You didn’t answer my question,” Kalonia said pointedly.

“Uh,” Luke looked back at the closet. “I was having troubles sleeping and wanted to find something for that.”

“Really? Because your bag is filled being topped with what looks like basic first aid supplies,” Kalonia stared at the duffle bag at Luke’s feet that was filled with clothing, food, weapons, credit chips, and other such provisions. “Planning a trip?”

“Sort of,” Luke confessed. “Look, if we could keep this just between us…”

“Well, I’m just glad someone other than me survived.”

“I’m glad I caught you, actually… if it was because you’re raiding my supplies. I’ve been meaning to ask you something.”

“What’s that?”

“Your sister has asked me to join the medical team of the Resistance. I told her I would be honoured, but my first duty is to the Jedi Order.”

“Doctor, if you want to join the Resistance, that would be fine with me,” Luke said.

“I know,” Kalonia nodded. “But that’s not what I was getting after. If you need me, I’ll stay, but if I don’t have a job anymore…”

“I’m afraid I don’t understand what you’re getting at.”

“Luke, will you be rebuilding the Order?” Kalonia asked. “If yes, I’ll stay on, but if you’re not…”

Luke looked down, “I’m afraid that the Jedi Order is going to be put on hold for a while.”

Kalonia nodded, understanding the words that Luke dare not utter, “I understand. I’ll tell Leia in the morning that it would be my honour to serve the Resistance.”

“I’m glad of it.”

A silence hung in the room.

“Luke,” Kalonia finally said. “I know you’ve been through something traumatic, but be careful, you don’t want to do anything rash.”

“If you ever wanted to talk to someone I can recommend a few therapists who might help you.”

Luke laughed, “I think I’ve been a lost cause to therapists ever since I found out the man who cut off my hand was my father and that I’d made out with my twin sister.”

Kalonia couldn’t suppress her chuckle.

“Here,” Kalonia reached up and grabbed a small box, “it’s a first aid kit that has a few more advanced things your average kit doesn’t.”

“Thank you,” Luke smiled and put the kit in his bag.

“The honour’s all mine.”

“If you ever need anything, don’t hesitate to ask.”

Luke shook Kalonia’s hand and picked up the bag, “Goodbye my friend.”

“May the Force be with you.”
“And with you.”

Luke thought he was in the clear when he made it to his X-Wing unnoticed. He had stored his bag in the hatch when he heard a familiar beeping.

“Quiet, Artoo,” Luke ordered as Artoo rolled towards him. “I don’t want anyone to hear me.”

Artoo beeped something.

“I’m… going away for a while.”

Beep beep.

“No, I’m not sure where.”

Bop, beep, bleep.

“No… you’re not coming with me.”

BEEP, BEEP, BOP, BOOP, BLIP!

“Because I need to be on my own for a while.”

Bleep.

Luke sighed, defeat lining his voice, “I can’t do it anymore, Artoo. I can’t stay here knowing what happened to my students… and my girls.”

Beep, beep, boop.

“I do want you to come, but it’s just not for the best.”

Bloop, bee, boo.

“Well… there is one thing you can do.”

Bee?

“Hide the map. The one to Ahch-to. Don’t let anyone know you have it.”

Boop, bop, beep.

“No, I don’t know if I’m going there, but just in case…”

Bee, bee, bee.

“Yes, I’m sure about this.”

Suddenly Artoo rammed into Luke’s leg. At first Luke thought Artoo was attacking him as Artoo did from time to time when he was determined to stop Luke. Then Luke recognized what Artoo was saying and realized Artoo was giving his imitation of a hug.

Beep, bop, boop.
“No, Artoo, I won’t forget it,” Luke chuckled. “Goodbye my friend. I hope we see each other again.”

And with that, Luke climbed into the cockpit and flew away.

Blaming himself, Luke walked away from everything.

Artoo watched him leave sadly. Luke had been the constant in Artoo’s life for twenty years, and the Skywalkers for decades before that. Artoo belonged to the Skywalkers, he loyally served Padmé Amidala, then Anakin Skywalker, then Leia Organa, and finally Luke Skywalker with eventually the addition of Rey Rhiaon Skywalker. Artoo was made to be their friend, his purpose was to help the Skywalkers, and he would belong to no other. Now Artoo was without one, he had no Skywalker to serve, and thus, no point to continue on. Masterless, Artoo did not know what next to do.

And then he decided.

Artoo’s dome turned to scan the room and he locked visual on the charge port. He wheeled himself up to it, plugged himself in, and switched into low power mode.

Someday a Skywalker would return for him. He just had to wait.

“Master Luke!” Threepio shuffled down the hallway in search of his former Master.

There had been quite a commotion that morning when everyone woke to find Master Luke had disappeared. Several of his possessions were missing and Doctor Kalonia reported that Master Luke had discussed a trip the previous night, but Threepio wouldn’t believe it. Master Luke would not simply just run off of his own accord.

Well… except that time Master Luke discovered Artoo had run away.

… And that time Master Luke realized the Empire would have traced Artoo and himself to the Lars Homestead.

… And that time on the Death Star when Master Luke convinced Captain Solo to rescue Princess Leia.

… And that time Master Luke went with Artoo to Dagobah to meet Master Yoda.

… And that time Master Luke left Master Yoda to rescue them on Bespin.

… And that time Master Luke surrendered himself on Endor.

… And that time the terrible Captain Phasma had taken Mistress Felicity hostage while Mistress Felicity was carrying the developing fetus of Mistress Rey within her reproductive system.

… And that time-

Threepio’s hardware detected a pattern.

Oh, dear.

The others had taken to the woods and various buildings on Rornian to find Master Luke, but Threepio had been assigned Master Luke’s temporary residence. Determined not to let anyone down, Threepio was being most thorough in his examination of each room, but had yet to obtain a positive result.

“Oh, Artoo, there you are,” Threepio said as he entered the garage. “Where have you been? Master Luke is missing and we need your help to find him.”

Artoo said nothing.

Artoo was silent.

“Artoo, I am speaking to you!”

Nothing.

“… Artoo?”

Threepio shuffled over to Artoo and tapped his dome. Still Artoo didn’t move. That was when Threepio recognized the signs of low power mode.

“Artoo, wake up! Please wake up, my friend!”

Nothing.

“Artoo, please, loathe I am to admit it, I… I need you.”

Nothing.

“Artoo, please, is there anything I can do to get you to wake up?”

But there wasn’t. No matter how much Threepio begged and pleaded, no matter how many people Threepio raced to, hysterically shouting the news and begging them to do something, no matter how many planets Threepio insisted Leia drag Artoo along with them to on the off chance that this time his pleaded would finally work… Artoo would not reply.

It would be fourteen years before a Skywalker returned, and R2-D2 woke up.
The Key to Ahch-to

Chapter Summary

A look into the history of Luke Skywalker, Felicity Rhiaon, and the map to Ahch-to.

Chapter Notes

So this chapter delves into some of the backstory of Felicity and the Rogue One mission. I’d like to make it clear that all of the backstory was plotted out before we got any information about Rogue One. That said, there ended up being some freakish similarities, but remember that this is not me trying to write the script for Rogue One. Much like how Felicity Rhiaon is not meant to be Jyn Erso, this is an interpretation of how events of Rogue One could have gone and how they went in the Rogue Love universe.

Also to those of you that want to complain about the fact that is a flashback chapter mostly focusing on Felicity and not moving the story forward really at all, I want to say this. Today is my birthday, and if I want to write a chapter that is 90 percent Felicity flashbacks, then I’m going to write a chapter that’s 90 percent Felicity flashbacks.

See the end of the chapter for more notes.

The Long Way Home

Chapter Eleven

The Key to Ahch-to

Let us pause the narrative for a moment to discuss an important element of the forthcoming story. Years later, when news of the map to Luke Skywalker broke, many people would have questions about it. Where did the map come from? How did Luke get it? Why did he follow it? How long had he known about it? Why didn’t he tell anyone about it? Who else knew about it? How did Lor San Tekka come into possession of it? And why on earth was there a piece cut out of it?

There are answers to each of those questions, and surprisingly enough it actually all starts with Felicity Rhiaon…

Six Months Before the Battle of Yavin

“Again!” Diego Nalto, a twenty-eight-year-old pilot for the Rebellion, codenamed Rogue Two ordered.

Riz Drayson, a twenty-four-year-old hacker/technician codenamed Rogue Five struggled to get to his feet on the gymnasium exercise mat as he shakily gripped a staff.

“Is this really necessary?” Riz asked. “I mean, what’s the likelihood that we’ll have to use staffs to fight the Empire?”

“Come now,” his sparring partner, Ji-Dan Hayato, a fifty-year-old soldier codenamed Rogue Three smiled at Riz, holding his signature staff casually. “Are you really afraid of fighting a blind man?”

“I am when that blind man has knocked me on my ass six times today,” Riz rubbed one of his many bruises.

“Come on, Riz! You can do it!” Felicity Rhiaon, a twenty-one-year-old recruitment officer codenamed Rogue One cheered from the belchers.

Diego shot her a look, “Don’t you have work to do, Rhiaon?”

“Oh, what, and miss the warmth of your company?” Felicity shot before flicking on her tablet to study the details of their mission for the thousandth time.

“Settle down, kids,” ordered Wen ‘Gunner’ Arroyo, a forty-six-year-old soldier codenamed Rogue Four. He was lounging on the bleachers next to Felicity, cleaning his huge stockpile of blasters. “We’re all on the same team here. Who cares who gets to be in charge, or who has a higher status rank normally? The enemy won’t care who is Rogue One and who is Rogue Two when they’re shooting at us.”

“Hey, he started it,” Felicity muttered.

“And a commander should know better than rise to bait,” Diego shot.

“Nalto, I will come down there,” Gunner warned.

Diego shuddered.

“Shall we try again?” Ji-Dan asked Riz.

Riz whimpered.

“Begin!” Diego ordered.

Five seconds later, Riz was back on the ground.

“Alright,” Riz weakly crawled across the mat, “I’m tagging out.”

“Rogue Five, get back here!” Diego commanded. “Honestly, Drayson you’re going undercover in two months and you still can’t fight back properly. Do you want to get killed?”

“That’s enough, Nalto!” Felicity snapped. “I’m in charge here and I say that Riz has earned a break.”

Diego rolled his eyes, “Yes, because a recruitment officer knows best when it comes to training for combat. Remind me, Rhiaon, how many combat missions have you taken part in? Twenty? Thirty? Oh right, your entire combat history consists of one time you got arrested at a protest, and then let go when the arresting officer turned out to be your father.”

“I wouldn’t dismiss such an event out of hand, Lieutenant Nalto.” Ji-Dan reminded, “It’s the entire reason we have this mission in the first place.”
“He’s right,” Felicity said, setting down her tablet. “It’s my father’s offer to give Riz and I a job if we ever want to come back to the Empire that’s getting us into the Death Star.”

Felicity couldn’t fight back the memory of the deal Alaric Rhiaon had put forth two years earlier when she and Riz got arrested by him at a protest. Riz had only been dragged into the mess because Alaric had caught him with Felicity. In all fairness, they should have avoided each other in such a public space. That screw up was on them.

She could still recall the desperation in her father’s eyes as he begged her to come home. It had been a few years since the day Alaric told his daughter that if she walked out the door, she could never come back. Felicity had walked out with no regrets and not a glance back. Yet as she stood before him years later, she found that Alaric did regret his ultimatum. After losing his wife to illness, and his son to a bomb going off in the middle of a town square, Felicity was all Alaric had left.

But then came the revelation that the bombing that killed Brendan Rhiaon had been a set up by the Empire in an effort to pin it on the Rebels to garner support in the fight against the Alliance. The incident had pushed Felicity straight into the arms of the Rebellion. It had been Alaric’s refusal to accept the circumstances of Brendan’s death that caused Felicity to leave home and disavow him as her father. Even worse was what Felicity later learned after joining the Rebellion. She had been destroyed by the knowledge that Brendan had been planning to join the Alliance, and when the Empire discovered it, he was specifically targeted to not only be killed by the explosion, but to have his death filmed and used as the face of the tragedy.

Perhaps it was Alaric’s refusal to accept that fact that made Felicity have no qualms about using him to get inside of the Death Star.

“Riz and I are going to be undertaking the most dangerous part of this mission,” Felicity said. “We’ll be living for several months as employees on the Death Star. Of the five of us, Riz and I are the ones most likely not to make it out of there alive.”

A heavy silence fell upon the men of her team. Even Diego looked like he was taking Felicity seriously.

“So that means if Riz is tagging out of training today…” Felicity climbed down the bleachers, grabbed Riz’s training staff, and stepped onto the training mat. She faced Ji-Dan with an eager grin, “I’m tagging in.”

Sensing Felicity’s smile from her lighthearted tone, Ji-Dan returned the expression and bowed his head respectfully to his opponent.

“It is an honour, Rogue One,” Ji-Dan held out his staff in front of him in a customary salute. “The honour is all mine, Rogue Three,” Felicity repeated the custom, signalling to everyone that the duel may proceed.

Felicity was on the ground in less than five minutes.

“Ok, seriously, what is your trick?” Felicity groaned as she struggled to stand up. She was as always amazed when Ji-Dan offered his hand in the exact correct spot to pull her to her feet. “You’re blind as a bat yet I’m pretty sure you’ve cracked my tailbone.”

“Then let’s get you to your seat,” Ji-Dan helped Felicity hobble to the bench Riz was sitting on. “And it’s no trick you can’t learn yourself. I just simply trust the Force.”

“It’s complicated.” Ji-Dan struggled to explain, “It’s a sort of energy that binds the world together and dictates the order of things. Not quite a God, but it’s more than destiny.”

“Destiny? There’s no such thing,” Felicity resisted the urge to roll her eyes. He may be blind and saying ridiculous things but Ji-Dan was one of her closest friends.

“Wait, the Force?” Riz frowned. “Are you talking about the whole Jedi thing?”

“In part,” Ji-Dan nodded. “The Jedi were a significant influence on our knowledge of the Force, but you don’t need Force Sensitivity to tap into its might. Everyone has at least a small part of themselves that can connect to the Force and harness its power. The Jedi were just more adept at it.”

“Oh please,” Riz laughed. “Everyone knows that the Jedi are just a myth. A bedtime story when your kids won’t sleep.”

“Are you kidding?” Diego asked in genuine disbelief. “How young are you? The Jedi were absolutely a real thing. They fought in the Clone Wars. I remember growing up and seeing them on the HoloNet.”

“The Jedi were amazing,” Gunner agreed. “Especially the Grandmaster. Yoda may have been small and green, but that alien was impressive.”

“Nah, you know who I liked?” Diego asked. “It was that really famous one. The one all over the HoloNet. I can’t remember his name right now but they called him something like the Fearless Hero?”

“You mean the Hero with No Fear? Anakin Skywalker?”

“Yes! That’s the one! Anakin Skywalker! Now there’s a heroic sounding name! I’d follow someone named Skywalker into battle any day!”

Felicity scoffed, “Oh please, Anakin Skywalker? Sounds like a pompous ass who would throw a temper tantrum that would level a building.”

“Hey, are you insulting Anakin Skywalker?” Diego sounded even more aggressive than usual.

“Don’t play with me, sister. You wanna take this outside?”

“We’re in space. We take this outside, we die.”

“Children!” Gunner snapped.

Normally the adults would get defensive at being reduced to a child, but when Gunner called them it, Felicity and Diego would shut up before he was forced to do anything drastic.

Ji-Dan just chuckled, “Bicker all you want, but the Jedi were real.”

“What happened to them?” Riz inquired.

Ji-Dan’s face hardened, “The Emperor and Darth Vader eliminated them and destroyed all of their temples. There’s rumors some Jedi managed to survive, but until the day they return, we’re stuck with waiting for it to arrive.”

“For what to arrive?” Felicity asked.
Ji-Dan smiled at her, “For a new hope. For someone to take up the reins, rebuild the temples, and bring the return of the Jedi. I’ve studied the Force and the history of the Jedi for years, and I want to witness the return of the Jedi Order. But more than anything, I think I would love to see a Jedi Temple.”

Felicity couldn’t help but smile. She had to admit she was intrigued by the story. As little as she cared for destiny – and how much she doubted the abilities she had heard Jedi were rumored to have – Felicity like the idea that they were actually waiting for something special.

A new hope.

That didn’t sound bad to her at all.

35 Days Before the Battle of Yavin

“And… in!” Riz cried as loud as he dared to risk. Breaking into not only the quarters of the second-in-command of the Empire, but also Vader’s personal computer was far too impressive to blow it all on a victory shout getting overheard.

“Good job,” Ji-Dan patted Riz’s shoulder as he stood next to the seated technician at the Vader’s desk.

“Yeah, great work, Kid.” Gunner congratulated as he stood guard at the door ready to blast anyone who discovered what they were doing. “Now, hurry up before we get caught.”

Diego remained expressionless as he guarded the door with guard and Riz hacked his way through Vader’s computer.

“Come on, it’s only a test run,” Diego urged. “Get in and get out quick.”

“I know,” Riz waved them off. “I’m just trying to find a piece of data that’s expendable. Something they won’t notice I’ve deleted.”

“Just pick something from the Aureks and do it already!” Diego restrained a scream. He spoke into his com, “Rogue One, do you read?”

“I read, Rogue Two,” Felicity’s voice answered.

“How we doing for time?”

“Well, we’re lucky Vader doesn’t arrive on the station until tomorrow, but we’re cutting it close.”

“Alright, keep them stalled as long as possible.”

“I thought I was the one giving orders, Rogue Two. Speaking of. Guys, be prepared to get out of here if this doesn’t work. If we can’t pull and delete a meaningless piece of data, we have no chance to get the Death Star plans.”

“I don’t get why they want us to delete anything in the first place,” Gunner shook his head. “If we delete the Death Star plans, they’ll know we’ve stolen them.”

“It’s better that they don’t have the plans so that if we find a weakness they won’t know what it is,” Ji-Dan answered. He patted Riz’s shoulder again, “How are you doing?”

“I’ve got the files starting with Aurek open, but I don’t know what to delete,” Riz reported.
“Alright, read the names to me and I’ll tell you what to delete.”

“Well… he has over ten thousand files concerning something called Amidala… And he’s meticulously numbered them and keep detailed names. Listen to this: ‘378 - Amidala, age 24, white drees, Tatooine’ ‘1576 - Amidala, age 25, purple outfit, speech at Alderaan anti-war conference, 6:48 minutes long’ ‘9765 - Amidala, age 27, blue dress, pictured with Bail Organa, Mon Mothma, Chancellor Palpatine.’ Man, it sounds like whoever this Amidala is, she’s got a Sith Lord stalker.”

“If Vader is that meticulous about this information, he’ll probably notice if any disappears,” Ji-Dan said. “What else is there?”

“Wait, what was the last one?” Ji-Dan interrupted.

“Oh, the Empire keeps tabs on applicants to the Imperial Academy,” Riz replied.

“No, Ahch-to,” Ji-Dan corrected. “What’s that file?”

Riz typed a few things, “It looks like a map to an uncharted planet. Why, what’s Ahch-to?”

“It’s a very special place,” Ji-Dan smiled, recalling the day he read about the first Jedi Temple. “And one I don’t want Vader destroying. Can you use this file for our test?”

“Well…” Riz checked the data, “It’s a little too big to delete without anyone noticing.”

“Can you cut a piece out of it?”

Riz gave Ji-Dan a surprised look, “That’s an odd request.”

“Vader cannot peruse this map,” Ji-Dan said, praying that Vader had not had time to use it. Luckily for him, Vader had in fact not used the map yet. “Can you destroy his ability to?”

“Let’s find out,” Riz pulled from his shirt a small drawstring bag that hung around his neck. From the bag, he pulled out a data chip and plugged it into the computer. After several minutes of tense typing, Riz announced his results, “I did it! I copied a piece of the map onto the chip, and I deleted it from the computer. Now there’s no record of this piece of the map in any Imperial archive!”

“Rogue One,” Diego reported into his comm, “Rogue Five was successful.”

“Great job, Rogue Five!” Felicity congratulated. “Do you think we’ll be able to pull off the real heist anytime soon?”

“The computers are sending out their automatic reports to the main Imperial archives in approximately thirty-seven hours,” Riz answered. “There will be so much data transferring that us pulling the plans will go unnoticed. Rest easy, Rogue One, two days from now you’ll be buying me a drink in celebration.”

33 Days Before the Battle of Yavin

The blast hit Riz straight in the chest and he collapsed to the ground.

“NO!” Felicity screamed as she and the others exchanged shots with the Stormtroopers her own father had called in when he discovered them stealing the Death Star plans.

Alaric looked guilty in the glow of the blast fight as he accidentally murdered what appeared to be his daughter’s best friend. As an Imperial Officer, Alaric was required to shoot at the Rebels, but he had intentionally been missing, firing shots near, but not actually at Felicity. That way he could say he fulfilled his duty without harming his daughter.

He just hadn’t planned on Riz Drayson jerking himself backward to dodge a bolt, putting himself right in the path of the one Alaric had just fired.

“I’ve got your back!” Diego nodded to Felicity. “Get the chip!”

Felicity dropped to her knees and crawled to Riz.

“Riz, hey, it’s Fliss,” Felicity grasped his bloody shirt and shook him. “Come on, buddy, stay with us.”

“I- I’m sorry,” Riz gave Felicity puppy dog eyes as he gripped the drawstring pouch in his hand. He was so ashamed at his failure. “I got the plans… but I couldn’t delete them from the Imperial system.”

“No, Fliss. It’s the end of the line for me; we both know it. Don’t weigh yourself down with my corpse. I’m already dead.”

“Riz,” Felicity whispered, tears shining in her eyes.

“Take it,” Riz pressed the pouch into her hand. “And promise me one thing.”

“Name it.”

“Promise me that you’ll do whatever it takes to get the plans to the Rebellion, and if for any reason you have to transmit the plans to someone else, promise you’ll delete the original copy on this chip. I- I don’t want them to build another one of these stations.”

Felicity smiled, “I promise.”

Holding Felicity’s hand tightly, Riz gave an exhale of relief.

He would not inhale.

Pressing her head to his chest, Felicity wept over the corpse of her best friend. She could feel her father’s guilty eyes on her. Because of a single blast, Felicity no longer had a best friend.

… Nor did she have a father.

2 Days Before the Battle of Yavin

“I’m going to Tatooine, and you can’t stop me,” Felicity boldly declared.

The hangar bay was dark and mostly empty save for a few pilots watching the stand-off between Felicity Rhiaon and Mon Mothma.
“I understand that you have been through a lot, Miss Rhiaon,” Mon Mothma calmly said.

“A lot?” Felicity snapped. “I did not spend months undercover as an Imperial, lost Riz, Ji-Dan, and Gunner, betrayed my father, took a freaking lightsaber to the back, and then spent a month alone with Nalto on Jakku so that the Empire could destroy Alderaan!”

The announcement of the destruction of Alderaan had hit the Alliance hard. The death of Bail Organa had left Mon Mothma in charge, but she never expected it would affect Felicity Rhiaon enough to lead the girl to attempt to steal a ship to go after the wayward Death Star plans.

“Leia and Bail Organa are dead because of me!” Felicity exclaimed. “It took me a month to get in contact with the Alliance and then I blow it all on transmitting the plans to Leia rather than wait for my transport to arrive the next day. It’s my fault Vader attacked her ship and killed everyone on board. It’s my fault the Death Star destroyed Alderaan. I have to get those plans. I have to wash this blood from my hands. I have to make sure it wasn’t all a waste.”

The gravity of everything finally set in and Felicity broke down. She fell to her knees in front of the X-Wing she was trying to steal and sobbed. Never mind that she had no clue on how to fly it, she had just been so determined to get to Tatooine pesky details like that hadn’t occurred to her.

Felicity didn’t care that she was crying in front of a bunch of strange pilots and the head of the Rebel Alliance. There was no one to comfort her. Most of her friends were dead, and those that were living had gone away.

Felicity was on the Joorvan Rebel base, a base not far from Mon Mothma’s home planet, Chandrila. Diego was on a med ship orbiting an uninhabited planet called Rornian. Shara Bey had been assigned to report to the Verenis base after she had delivered Felicity and Diego.

Finally, Biggs Darklighter, her first recruit – and occasional friends with benefits – had been stationed on the Yavin IV base awaiting the Death Star plans. The plan had been to meet up when Felicity brought the plans, but that had gone awry when Felicity never made it to Yavin IV. She had in fact been planning to comm Biggs on her way to Tatooine to see if he could help her in the search for the plans, but Mothma had put a stop to Felicity’s escape plan.

Mon Mothma had the tendency to feel a little cold with her elegant posture and posh accent. Her fair features gave the impression of an ice queen, and her intolerance for antics made Felicity certain Mothma hated her.

So Felicity was greatly surprised when Mothma crouched to the ground and wrapped her arms around Felicity as she cried.

“It’s alright, Miss Rhiaon,” Mothma said in a motherly tone. “War is difficult for us all. We lose people we love, but we continue to fight to protect those we do have now, and those we will have in the future. I had to learn that lesson a long time ago, and I still struggle with it now. But one thing I have learned is that you will never be alone in life. Friends come and go. Family does the same. In ten years, the people you spend your life with will not be the same as today. But we will never forget those we lose.”

“Yes, we will,” Felicity bitterly shot. “No one’s going to remember what I’ve done. No one is going to care who stole the plans to the Death Star. If we fail to get them back, I’ll just be that girl who tried to steal them. If we do get them back, but the Empire finds and destroys us, I’ll be the girl who killed us all. And if we get them back and destroy them? No one will care about anyone other than the arrogant pilot or bomb team, or whatever that sets the charge or fires the shot that destroys it. No one will care that Riz, Ji-Dan, and Gunner died for the plans.”
Mon Mothma let the silence linger before saying, “Yes, they will care, and if you come with me, Miss Rhiaon, I’ll show you why. You just have to promise to stop trying to steal the ship.”

Felicity sniffled, “Alright. Couldn’t get the damn thing off the ground anyway.”

Mon Mothma just laughed.

“I want you to have this,” Mon Mothma pulled something out of a drawer in her office.

Felicity frowned, recognizing the drawstring pouch, “The data pouch?”

“We checked it to make sure the plans weren’t still on them.”

“Riz asked me to delete it if I had to transmit them,” Felicity explained.

“I understand the reasoning,” Mothma replied. “The test data wasn’t anything too important, but we decided not to wipe it. However, because it isn’t important, I’m at liberty to give this to you.”

“You want me to have it?” Felicity scowled as she took the pouch.

“A memento of your adventures and reminder that your friends didn’t die for nothing. Their legacy will live on, and their efforts will be appreciated. With this you can remind people of their sacrifices.”

“Thank you… Commander.”

Felicity hesitated.

“What is it?” Mothma asked.

“Riz couldn’t delete the Death Star plans from the Imperial Database,” Felicity explained. “…and as he died, he worried that the Imperials might build another.”

Mothma frowned, “I certainly hope they don’t.”

“If they do, can you promise me two things?”

“What’s that?”

“First, don’t let anyone forget the sacrifices of the team who gets the intel on the new Death Star.”

“Consider it done,” Mothma nodded. She would follow through on that promise four years later when she emphasised the death of Bothan spies to a room full of Alliance leaders. “What’s the other request?”

Felicity replied, “I want to be told in person about it. Don’t let me hear it from the grapevine. I’ve earned that much.”

“I will make sure of that too,” Mothma made the second promise she would follow through on.

When news arrived of the second Death Star, Felicity Rhiaon and Diego Nalto were escorted into a room and privately told.

Felicity Rhiaon flipped over a desk, and Diego Nalto put a chair through the window.

Neither objected to the stripping of certain privileges as punishment… though they weren’t happy about having to fix the window.
“You know,” Felicity sniffed, tying the pouch around her neck. It felt heavy, like she was bearing the physical weight of her friends’ legacies, “Ji-Dan told me that the reason we’re fighting this war is because we’re waiting for a new hope… Maybe… Maybe I can help us find it.”

“I hope you can,” Mon Mothma said. “I promise you, Miss Rhiaon, these sacrifices will not go to waste.”

Mon Mothma’s third promise would also come true.

Two days later, a Rebel pilot would blow up the Death Star, killing all on board, including Alaric Rhiaon.

Thirteen years later, Felicity Rhiaon married the pilot who killed him.

13 Years After the Battle of Yavin

“Thank you so much, Alyla for letting me use your computer,” Felicity said as she powered up the Jedi Master’s personal computer.

Newlyweds Luke and Felicity Rhiaon Skywalker were temporarily staying in the home of Jedi Master Alyla Kene as Luke attended to some business in Temple Village. Due to the fact that the Grandmaster didn’t actually have a standing residence on Rornian, Felicity found that she and her husband were forced to play “musical house guests” rotating between which Jedi they would impose upon during their visits.

“Anytime,” Alyla replied as she casually perused her bookshelf for some form of entertainment. “Just don’t open personal files.”

“Yeah, considering you have a weird on-again, off-again thing with Lando Calrissian of all people, I certainly don’t want to know what you’re taking pictures of,” Felicity grinned. “Although, I sometimes wonder if it’s just charm that gets women flocking to him.”

“Shut up!” Alyla blushed bright red and threw a notebook at the laughing Felicity.

“Ok, seriously, who has paper notebooks these days?”

Alyla shook her head. It was going to be an interesting week alone with the new Mrs. Rhiaon Skywalker.

While Luke had his typical Grandmaster duties, Felicity didn’t have anything to do in Temple Village. She was three months away from the construction of her and Luke’s home from being completed, and she was five months away from finishing her architecture degree and taking on the duties of architect to Temple Village.

Alyla didn’t have anything to do either. Usually she was in charge of training the children of Temple Village, but she had the week off while her twin brother Gavyn Kene and his wife Zena Halcorr had taken them on a field trip to the crystal caves of Illum. Alyla typically took her weeks off to meet up with Lando, but those plans were halted when it came up as her turn to host Luke and Felicity.

Alyla strongly suspected that the roster had been tampered with considering that Luke and Felicity had only been married two weeks, and they were definitely still in the honeymoon phase. Between the other Jedi Masters being married, having children in their house, jealous of the Grandmaster’s choice of wife, or generally having a stronger backbone than Alyla, Alyla was fairly certain she had been the target of “who isn’t going to tell the newlyweds to knock it off?”
Although she had certainly put her foot down earlier than day in the kitchen. Honeymoon phase or not, there were some things one didn’t want to see over breakfast.

Speaking of honeymoons…

“You and Luke are going on your honeymoon next week, right?” Alyla asked.

Felicity frowned, “Are you still upset about breakfast? We said sorry. We weren’t even doing anything that bad.”

“I’m not trying to get rid of you,” Alyla laughed. “Just making conversation. Although seriously, stay away from my kitchen table.”

“And if we don’t?” Felicity teased.

“I’ll tell you all the things Lando and I have done on it.”

Felicity shuddered, “Okay, you win. And yes, we’re going next week.”

“How exciting! Where are you headed, and for how long? Luke isn’t scheduled to come back to Rornian for another two months.”

“We’re spending a month on Takodana. Han has a friend who found us a nice villa by the ocean. Maz is… a little odd, but a very good friend.”

“That just sounds wonderful,” Alyla sighed. “I should take a vacation.”

“If it’s with Lando, promise not to show me any Holos.”

Alyla shook her head and watched as Felicity plugged a data chip into the computer.

“What’s that?” Alyla asked.

“The Museum of Rebellion History on Yavin IV is doing a whole exhibit on the Rogue Squadron Death Star Mission,” Felicity replied. “They asked if they could borrow the data chip and pouch that held the plans so they can display it for about year. I told them yes, but I want to wipe the chip first in case someone tries to steal it. The plans are gone, but we still have our test file on it and I don’t want it falling into the wrong hands.”

“What’s in the test file?”

“No clue. Boys did that part of the mission by themselves. Let’s see here, file name ‘Test’… and open.”

The room was suddenly filled with the projection of a star chart with a red line traced through it.

“Only part,” Felicity scowled at it. “It’s not complete. What in the galaxy did they pull, and why?”

“Here,” Alyla came up to the computer and switched off the projection. She took control from Felicity and explained, “Zena taught me a few hacking tricks from when we would fudge the slave records during operation on Zygerria. If I do this… There, the name of the source file was… No way.”

“The file was called, ‘No Way?’”
Alyla looked at Felicity in excitement, “It was called ‘Map to Ahch-to!’”

“What’s an Ahch-to?”

“What’s an Ahch-to? What’s an Ahch-to?” Alyla exclaimed.

“Repeating my question does not answer it.”

“Afternoon, Ladies,” Luke suddenly walked into the room followed by Artoo. He automatically crossed the room to greet Felicity with a kiss, “I missed you.”

Felicity nuzzled him, “I missed you too.”

“He was gone an hour,” Alyla rolled her eyes.

Luke shook his head, “Sometimes I wonder how with your cynicism, you and Lando ever got together.”

“Alyla and I were discussing that very thing earlier, weren’t we?” Felicity teased.

“I will throw this at you again,” Alyla brandished the notebook threateningly.

“Do you want to sleep alone tonight?” Felicity gently punched his arm. She smiled as Luke pressed a kiss to her cheek and wrapped his arm around her. “Hey, Sweetheart, what’s Ahch-to?”

“Would everyone stop repeating the word Ahch-to and just tell me what it is?” Felicity exclaimed.

Luke shook his head, “Ahch-to is a lost planet that was home to the first Jedi Temple. I would kill to visit there.”

“Where did you hear the name?”

“A… HoloNovel about Jedi. Sort of a romance/fantasy/one credit bin at a fueling station thing.”

Luke winced, “Ugh. Next time save yourself the money. Pretty much all romance novels concerning fictionalized versions of Jedi are terrible.”

“Agreed.”

“Hey, Alyla?” Luke looked at the Jedi who had been watching them in curious amusement. “Have any packages arrived for me?”

“For Artoo over there,” Luke jerked his head towards R2-D2 in the corner. Luke looked quite annoyed, “Apparently he hasn’t been wiped in almost fifty years, and since he refuses to delete any extra data as ‘you never know when it’ll come in handy’ I had to purchase extra memory storage chips for him.”
Artoo beeped something from the corner.

“No, don’t you try to defend yourself,” Luke rolled his eyes. “You steal and hoard data like your battery will die if you don’t.”

Beep, beep, boop.

“Artoo, you downloaded a copy of the entire Imperial database when we were on the Death Star!” Felicity’s ears perked up.

Beep, bop, beep.

Luke rubbed the bridge of his nose, “No, I’m sure you don’t see a problem with that.”

Alyla chuckled, “And people ask me why I don’t want a droid.”

“Honestly, sometimes I feel like he’s my child I have to look after.”

Boop, bop, beep.

“Yes, Artoo, I am aware that you are older than my father.”

Beep.

“And my mother too,” Luke sighed. He leaned over and quickly kissed Felicity who was staring at something on the computer, “Sorry to run off so quickly. I have a class to teach with Zena.”

“Oh, that’s alright,” Felicity pulled him back in for another quick kiss. “I’ll see you at dinner. I love you.”

“Actually,” Felicity interrupted. “Do you mind if I borrowed Artoo for a bit? I wanted to double check a couple details about our house.”

“Of course,” Luke nodded. “And feel free to change or adjust or outright get rid of anything you want. You’ve been designing this home since you were a teenager, I want it to be the house of your dreams.”

“Honestly, kudos on your choice of husband, Felicity,” Alyla nudged Felicity. “I wish someone would build me a house as a wedding present.”

“If you worked things out with Lando, I’m pretty sure he would give you the entirety of Cloud City,” Felicity replied.

“She does have a point,” Luke teased. “My wedding gift to you was pretty amazing. I don’t know how your present to me could ever top it. Have you thought of anything yet?”

Felicity grinned, “I have an idea. Now off you go. Zena will not accept ‘I was late for class because I was bantering with my wife’ as an excuse.”

“And Gavyn will make fun of you for it,” Alyla added.

And with that Luke was gone.

“So,” Alyla turned to Felicity, “what is this big wedding present idea?”

Felicity turned on the projection of Ahch-to.

“What better present for the Jedi Grandmaster than a map to the first Jedi Temple?” Felicity grinned.

“Artoo? Is it true what Luke said? Do you have a copy of the Imperial database?”

Beep, bop.

“Can you find a file named ‘Map to Ahch-to?’”

A minute later the room was filled with a projection of the full star chart, the projection of Felicity’s piece fitting in perfectly.

“Bingo,” Felicity chuckled. “Artoo, call Maz Kanata. I have to adjust our honeymoon plans.”

“Keep your eyes closed,” Felicity covered Luke’s eyes with her hands as she stood behind the pilot’s chair on the private shuttle they had rented for their honeymoon.

“Felicity, Sweetheart I can’t land the ship if my eyes are closed,” Luke laughed. “Come on, I know you diverted our travel plans to have a stay over at another planet. Would you just tell me what the big surprise is so that I can launch the landing sequence without pulling a Rhiaon?”

“You know calling a ship crash ‘pulling a Rhiaon’ is not going to win you any brownie points with me.”

“No, but this will.”

Felicity yelped as Luke suddenly pulled her into his lap. She laughed as she reclined across his lap, his arm wrapped firmly around her waist to stop her from falling. Felicity arched her neck as he trailed fervent kisses up it. Felicity let out a moan as his lips hit the special spot right behind her earlobe that always made her go wild.

“Oh, yes, that’s the spot,” Felicity groaned.

“Now do I get to have my surprise?” Luke nuzzled the sensitive skin of her neck.

“Alright, you’ve earned it,” Felicity grinned. “But you still have to close your eyes.”

“Fine, but if we crash the ship, your bank account is the one paying the rental company for repairs.”

“Deal. Now close them.”

When the world went black, Luke felt his wife’s small hand wrap around his wrist. Relaxing his hand, Luke allowed Felicity to guide it towards her. His hand felt something warm and soft as she set it on what felt like the center of her chest.

“You know, Felicity, if you wanted to make love on the ship, all you had to do was ask,” Luke began trailing his hand down her breast only to be surprised by a smack.

“Hands where put them, Mister,” Felicity chastised bringing his hand back to the original spot.
“There will be plenty of time for that later. Right now we’re focusing on your surprise.”

“And what is my surprise?”

“Feel and find out.”

“I just tried and got smacked for it.”

His hand shifted to find a cord hanging from her neck. Gripping the string, he ran his hand down and extracted a small drawstring pouch from underneath her shirt.

“Go ahead,” Felicity consented.

Luke opened his eyes to observe the drawstring pouch around Felicity’s neck. It looked familiar, but he couldn’t place where he had seen it before. It was definitely Felicity’s possession, but he couldn’t recall the significance of it.

“Open it,” Felicity urged.

Luke did and find a small data chip inside. He failed to make the connection.

Felicity grinned, “Good. Now, I’ve put some coordinates in the computer. Land us there and put on your hiking boots. We’ve got a bit of a walk ahead of us.”

“How many freaking stairs are on this hill?” Felicity exclaimed as she and Luke walked up the ancient path built into the mountains.

“I can’t answer that considering I don’t know where we are,” Luke pointed out. He looked in interest as they came upon a cluster of strange huts shaped something like a beehive. “Felicity, does anyone live her? I don’t want to trespass.”

Luke paused, “So let me get this straight, the first day into our honeymoon you take me to a planet won’t tell me the name of, lead me to an island no one inhabits, and make me walk up a perilous cliff using stairs that are little more than ruins… Felicity, I trust you, but I have to ask. Has this been a long con where you married me for my money and now are going to kill me with no witnesses and claim it was an accident and take my fortune?”

“Of course not!” Felicity grinned and grabbed his arm, “You haven’t amended your will to make me your beneficiary yet. I’ll kill you once you’ve done that.”

Luke shook his head, unable to fight off his grin as Felicity laughed.

“Come on,” Felicity quickly pecked him on the lips. “I think it’s just over this hill.”

“Hey, what are you doing?” Luke frowned as Felicity suddenly started unclipping the lightsaber from his belt.
Felicity looked up at Luke and smiled, “Luke, Sweetheart, I love you. You’re brave, and loyal, and kind, and loving… but you’re also a total drama queen. And I know that when you see your surprise, you’ll want to dramatically summon your lightsaber, ignite it, and strike a pose. So I thought I’d help.”

Luke rolled his eyes, “I am not a drama queen.”

“Luke… you literally delayed rescuing Han from Jabba the Hutt just so you could do a fancy backflip.”

“I didn’t delay it for the backflip! …That was just a perk.”

Luke sighed, “…I suppose if there is the opportunity.”

He handed over the saber to a chorus of Felicity’s laughter.

As Felicity had expected, at the top of the hill, the steps ended, as a grassy summit lay before them. On the opposite ledge were several stones, most of them lining the edge of the cliff. One short slab of rock stood out among the rest. It looked like a grave marker, but Felicity knew what it really was.

The couple walked forward into the summit, but Luke was surprised when Felicity suddenly came to a stop.

“Go on,” Felicity said as she caught Luke’s confused expression. “Look at the stone.”

Luke hesitated; he knew that whatever this place was, it would be special to him. He could feel the intensity of the Force on the island, not unlike the feeling of Dagobah. Luke was surprised and happy to see that Felicity had extended something Force based as her wedding gift to him, but it felt wrong not to share the moment of discovery with her.

“It’s alright,” Felicity encouraged her husband. Though not a Force Sensitive, Felicity did have somewhat a grasp on being able to read Luke’s expressions and emotions. “Go on without me. I want you to have this.”

Luke gave her a small smile and proceeded forward. He wasn’t sure what to expect, but he was in for a surprise as the slab of rock came better into view. Luke could see words etched upon it.

“Here marks the site where the founding Grandmaster of the Jedi Order first made contact with the Force.” Luke looked up at Felicity in shock, “Is this…”

Felicity grinned, held out his lightsaber and declared, “Luke Skywalker… welcome to Ahch-to.”

Luke let out a disbelieving huff of air. There he was on Ahch-to, the home to the first Jedi Temple, standing where the first Grandmaster had started it all.

As he looked at Felicity, he couldn’t help but lock the image of the scene into his mind. Standing across the summit was the woman he loved most in the galaxy. Brown hair tied back into a bun, hazel eyes shining at him in joy, arm outstretched, offering him his lightsaber.

“Go on,” Felicity smirked. “You know you want to.”
With a confident grin, Luke extended his hand and summoned his lightsaber. Igniting the brilliant emerald blade, Luke raised the saber and struck a dramatic pose worthy of a poster.

Felicity couldn’t help but laugh at her husband’s larger than life antics. He may be a drama queen with delusions of grandeur and unfailing optimism, but Felicity wouldn’t want him any other way.

Luke joined in the laughter as he met her eyes. They had a vibrant spark burning in them that showed up far too rarely. He couldn’t believe how lucky he was to have her. Despite all the trauma Felicity had endured, and mental defenses she put up as a result, she was still able to put aside her issues with the Force and give Luke the best wedding present he could imagine.

And he had no idea how he was going to thank her.

Luke and Felicity’s heavy pants filled the air as they lied next to the fire in one of the huts. Covered only by a thin blanket, their clothing was scattered about the floor. Felicity rested her head against Luke’s muscular chest and his arms were wrapped securely around her waist.

“I told you there’d be time for that later,” Felicity grinned.

“You know, as Jedi Grandmaster, I don’t think I was supposed to do that here,” Luke said, lazily brushing his fingers in random patterns against the soft skin of Felicity’s thigh. “I’m pretty sure we just desecrated a holy site.”

“Luke, of all the things we usually do in the bedroom, we definitely didn’t desecrate this place as much as usual.” Felicity shifted onto her side so she was face to face with Luke. She ran a hand through his sandy hair and down his broad chest, “Besides, I don’t think the Jedi introduced the no attachments rule until they were long gone from this planet. I highly doubt you’re the first Jedi to bring a pretty girl into one of these huts.”

“No, but I’ve definitely brought the most beautiful.”

“Flatterer.”

“I try.” Luke sighed, “I don’t want to go to Takodana tomorrow.”

“I know, but Maz was already mad enough that I cut our trip short one day, I don’t think she’ll be too happy if we don’t show up tomorrow. Besides,” Felicity rolled over so that she was lying on top of him and rested her forehead against his, “the rest of the honeymoon is going to be mostly this anyways.”

Luke chuckled, “I suppose it is.”

He tilted his head up and captured her lips in a soft tender kiss. Felicity put her hand on his jaw, lightly pulling him in closer. Her eyes slipped close as Luke took charge, his lips caressing hers hungrily for several minutes.

When they finally pulled apart, Luke smiled, “Felicity, promise me something.”

“Anything,” Felicity vowed.

Luke took a deep breath.

“When we… When we have children,” Luke’s hand slid across the juncture of Felicity’s stomach and pelvis. His voice was almost a whisper. Though they had long ago discussed their desire to start a family, being still so newlywed had made the topic somewhat taboo. “Promise me that we’ll bring them here.”

Felicity smiled, “I promise.”

Luke kissed her again, and slowly as the fire died, Luke and Felicity fell asleep in each other’s arms. The last thought that ran through their minds before sleep claimed them was that they could never imagine feeling any emotion but pure love for each other.

15 Days Before the Burning of Rornian

Felicity slammed the cup of hot chocolate on the desk in front of Luke.

“I sense you’re mad at me,” Luke observed.

“You think?” Felicity shot him a look before wrestling roughly with her office cabinets.

Luke sat in silence, watching her as he took a measure sip from his cup. He winced as the boiling water scalded his tongue. He knew he had messed up when she made him drinks that hot.

“Felicity,” Luke said politely, “when you took this job, we agreed that we wouldn’t let our personal issues interfere with our work relationship. When we are in this office we are professionals, not husband and wife. So if this display of anger is centered around a home issue, I must ask you to stop it and withhold it until we return to our home tonight. Can you consent to that?”

Felicity gave Luke a very dangerous look.

“… Please don’t live here for the next week,” Luke said meekly.

Felicity rolled her eyes.

Luke frowned at the building proposal file on the desk he had given to Felicity, “Well, I thought it would be like a pseudo-restaurant but without the need to hire waiters and such. A sort of gathering place at meal times to bring the community together.”

“Are you- IT’S NOT THE DINING HALL I’M UPSET ABOUT!”

“Then I’m afraid you’ve lost me.”

“BEN, LUKE! I’M ANGRY BECAUSE OF BEN!” Felicity shouted.

“Oh? That’s all you have to say?”

“Well, what do you want from me? I can’t change what happened!”

“Alyla Kene is dead, Luke!” Felicity snapped. “Ben killed her, and slashed Reine Agim seven times across the face, horribly scarring her face, all because they got between him and the charred mask of his dead Sith Lord grandfather. Two months ago, Ben Solo, your nephew killed a woman in cold blood, stole a ship, and ran away to join the First Order. And you want to build a dining hall.”
“What do you want me to do? Go after him? I would if I knew where to find him.”

“I want you to take this threat seriously. Luke, he’s going to come back… and he’s going to come after Rey.”

“I don’t believe that,” Luke looked away affronted, but Felicity could see how tightly he was clenching his fists.

“Well, I do believe it,” Felicity said. She took a deep breath, “And if I have to, I’ll take matters into my own hands.”

Luke’s head snapped back to her.

Dead seriousness in her eyes, Felicity warned Luke, “If you don’t take this seriously, I’m taking Rey and I’m leaving.”

“No! I will not put her in danger on the faint hope that Ben can be redeemed. I know he’s your nephew and you love him, but I’ve seen first hand what he can do. He may hesitate to harm his uncle’s child, but there will be no second thoughts when he remembers she’s mine. He will go after her, Luke. He’s determined to be the heir to the Skywalker legacy, and he will remove any obstacle in his way.”

“Alright,” Luke put his head in his hands; he couldn’t fight her words any longer. “What should we do?”

Felicity pulled something out of her desk drawer and tossed it to Luke.

It was the drawstring pouch.

Felicity answered, “We hide.”

14 Days Before the Burning of Rornian

“You want us to what?” Tyla Kinall exclaimed.

“We’re going to temporarily relocate to Ahch-to,” Luke repeated to the gathered community of Temple Village. They were holding a meeting in the meditation gardens, a peaceful place that would calm anyone and thus made the perfect meeting spot. Luke was standing in front of the assembly, gently gripping Rey’s shoulders as Felicity stood by his side supportively, daring anyone to refute him. “We can’t deny the danger that Ben Solo poses.”

Rey frowned in confusion, “Daddy, what’s wrong with Ben? Did he do something bad?”

“Hush now, Rey,” Luke whispered kindly but authoritatively. “I need to discuss this with the adults.”

“Come here, Sweetheart,” Felicity gently eased Rey into her arms. “Let’s be nice and quiet for Daddy right now, and Mommy will explain things later.”

“I don’t understand why we need to go anywhere,” Tyla crossed her arms. “If I recall correctly, Ben only has hatred for a certain non-Force Sensitive. Maybe instead of all of us relocating, Mrs. Skywalker goes somewhere else for a while.”
Felicity gave Tyla a sickly sweet grin, “Hey, Tyla, remind me when my daughter’s not around to tell you where you can go.”

“Ladies,” Zena Halcorr warned.

“Sorry,” Tyla and Felicity muttered.

Luke shook his head, “I’m not forcing anyone to leave. This is completely voluntarily, but I strongly urge that you come with us. There’s no knowing what might happen if Ben comes back.”

“And where exactly would we be going?” Reine Agim asked.

Luke could barely look his second-in-command in the eye. The scars marring the brown skin of her face served as a constant reminder of Ben’s betrayal and Alyla’s murder. Luke had had no doubt that Reine would join in on the exodus, but sting of Luke’s failure still hurt him.

The crowd gasped and loudly began chatting among themselves.

“You know where Ahch-to is?” Eline Typhe-Korden asked in shock. “How?”

“Long story short, my team stole a map from the Death Star,” Felicity answered. “Now, Luke and I have been to Ahch-to. We checked it out a few years back. There are existing structures that we can use at the start. However, there’s a finite amount of them, so unmarried people will be receiving a roommate… or hutmate. Masters, you will share quarters with your Padawans. Children will be with parents, and husbands with their wives obviously. Luke and I have already started working on some designs of further structures to build using materials that already exist on the planet. There’s some vegetation and lots of fish, but we will need to bring additional supplies. We should gather these as quickly as possible. I don’t want us leaving any later than a week from now.”

“So how long would we be going?” Doctor Kalonia asked. “I have a conference in a few weeks I was looking forward to attending.”

“Felicity and I were estimating about three months and hopefully we can come up with a plan of action by then,” Luke replied. “However, Doctor Kalonia, I was thinking that because you are not a Jedi and ergo not much of a target, that it might be best if you simply went to the conference on Kamino a few weeks ahead of time and stay there for a while. I’ll pay for all of your expenses.”

“Look, I take what’s happened very seriously,” Obik Kenu said, “but I don’t think running is the answer. We’ve never run away before, we stand and we fight honourably to protect our values. Why shouldn’t we face them with honour?”

“Because they won’t face us with the same,” a voice came from the back on the crowd.

Everyone turned to see Gavyn Kene sitting on a bench far away from the rest of the group. He was staring at a spot on the floor, with ghosts in his eyes. No one needed to say it, they all knew that it was the spot Gavyn had discovered his sister’s body.

Alyla and Gavyn were twins, and had never been apart. They had not been separated when they were abandoned at an Old Republic hospital and tested positive for Force Sensitivity. They had not been separated when they were taken in by the old Jedi Order to be raised until they could be trained. They had not been separated during Order 66 when a Jedi named Vonar Ghyron had taken them and fled the massacre of the Jedi Temple. They had not been separated when Vonar was caught when they were 13, when they were sold into slavery as a result, or any times they were resold. And they had certainly never been separated when Luke and Felicity helped free them and accepted them into the new Jedi Order.

Only death had managed to take Alyla from Gavyn, and the loss had taken its toll. The usually sarcastic and peppy Gavyn Kene had become quiet and reserved since his sister’s murder. It was hard losing Alyla… but it was worse seeing the affect it had on Gavyn.

“Ben won’t care what his goal is,” Gavyn’s voice was low, but no one dared speak over him. “If he comes for Felicity, or Rey, or even Luke, and one of us gets in his way… he’ll kill us. It won’t matter who, and it won’t matter how hard we fight. Ben Solo does not fight fair, and he will take advantage of that fact. Do not offer him an olive branch. He’ll only use it as a distraction to murder you… just as he used the distract of Alyla’s death to scar Reine.”

A heavy silence fell over the room as they thought of Alyla and what Ben had done.

With their daughter, Miri following, Zena Halcorr walked over to her husband and placed her hands on his shoulders. Gavyn looked up, slightly comforted by the gesture and squeezed her hand in thanks. He then turned to Miri and hugged his daughter tightly.

Luke could understand the heartbreak Gavyn was going through, imagining how it might feel if he lost Leia. But Luke knew that as long as he had his wife and daughter by his side and his Jedi pupils to have their backs, he had something worth living for.

“We’ll accompany you,” Zena declared.

“So will we,” Reine glanced at her husband Obik.

“I’ll take you up on your offer concerning Kamino,” Doctor Kalonia agreed.

One by one, each Jedi pledged to follow Luke to the temple on Ahch-to. Even Tyla Kinall conceded, though Luke had to stipulate that her home be the furthest away from his family’s, and that she and Felicity weren’t allowed next to a cliff together. Luke would honestly not put it past either Tyla or Felicity to struggle with the urge not to throw the other off a cliff. They wouldn’t actually do it… but better safe than sorry.

The Jedi quickly began making their plans to flee to Ahch-to. It was agreed that no one outside of Temple Village was to be told where the Jedi went. It was up to Doctor Kalonia to inform all outsiders that the Jedi were safe and had a plan.

There was just one small problem Luke didn’t account for.

“This isn’t fair,” Felicity sat that night on the edge of their bed, her head in her hands.

A mixture of sorrow and anger riddled her body as the curls of her brown hair cascaded down her back, bathed in the moonlight. It was a beautiful sight that might have led to a moment of passion had the couple not been so frustrated.

It had been hours since Luke got the unexpected call from Chancellor Mon Mothma informing Luke that he had finally been summoned for his meeting. He and Felicity had spent the entire night desperately searching for a way out, but the timing made things unfortunate. It would look terrible if Luke refused to meet with the Senate to negotiate the extent of Jedi authority, and then the Jedi mysteriously disappeared for several months. In fact, it could come across suspicious enough to look like rebellion and vigilantism that could get the adults of the Jedi Order arrested, and the children seized by Child Protective Services.

“I don’t have a choice,” Luke sighed, sitting next to his wife, his mechanical hand resting atop hers. “I have to go.”

“I don’t want you to,” Felicity leaned her head against his shoulder.

“I don’t want to either. I’d much rather spend the next month home with you and Rey.”

“What are we going to do?”

“We have to postpone the move. It’s too risky to keep both pieces of the map together, and I need Artoo with me on Hosnian Prime. I suppose the rest of you will have to work on getting things ready for the move.”

“When do you have to leave?” Felicity asked.

“Six days,” Luke answered. “I’ll spend all of that time helping however I can. We’ll just have to hope that nothing happens while I’m gone. And if something does-”

“We can worry about that in the morning. Right now there’s a more pressing issue I need to attend to.”

“Oh? What’s that?”

Felicity grinned.

“The issue that my husband is going to be away for an entire month,” Felicity crawled on top of him, pinning his wrists to the bed. Grinning like a minx, Felicity began unbuttoning his shirt, “I’ve only got six days to get my fill of him, so I’m going to need all the help I can get.”

“Well, I am most happy to help, Miss Rhiaon,” Luke chuckled as Felicity’s lips roamed his neck. “But first, I think I’m going to have to get a little more comfortable.”

Felicity squealed as Luke flipped her onto her back. After that they became nothing more than a flurry of limbs, laughter, and physicality of love.

3 Days Before the Burning of Rornian

“How’s the move going?” the Holo of Luke asked Felicity during their nightly transmission.

Luke had made a transmission earlier to say goodnight to Rey before she went to bed, but Luke would always make a second one later with his wife as they got ready for bed. The solar cycles of Rornian and Hosnian Prime were so similar that their time zones equated to about an hour apart, causing Luke and Felicity to go to bed roughly the same time. Anytime one was away from home, Luke and Felicity would comm each other and spend an hour or two just chatting so they did when they were home in bed together. It had become such a ritual for the pair that Felicity found it hard to sleep without her nightly chats with Luke.

“It’s going fine,” Felicity glanced back at the Holo as she brushed her hair at the nightstand. “We’re a little antsy, waiting for you to come back, but we’ve been able to gather more than enough supplies. We should be good for six months on Ahch-to.”
“That’s good to hear.” Luke sighed, his eyes following the brush, “I wish I was there with you, running that brush through your hair. Have I ever told you how much I love your hair?”

“Yes, and it’s usually followed by me joking that you love it so much you might have a fetish.”

“I can’t help it. Your hair is just so amazing. It’s so soft and silky and beautiful. I wish I was there, running my fingers through your hair as my lips suckled on the sensitive spot under your earlobe.”

Felicity smirked as she set down the brush, “Now, now, Master Skywalker, if this is going to become that kind of comm and least let me lock the door so Rey doesn’t wander in.”

“Misses you like crazy. She threw a fit today because I couldn’t do her hair as well as you.”

“Well, don’t tell her yet but I think Han’s going to make a visit next week to cheer her up.”

Felicity frowned, “Is that wise considering we’re secretly organizing an escape?”

“I’ve hinted to Han and Leia that something might be up with the Jedi, and Han doesn’t really ask questions like that.”

“Well, I’m not going to be relaxed until the three of us are safe and together.”

Luke was quiet.

“Yes?”

“If something happens… if you feel like something might compromise our plans for Ahch-to, I need you to promise me that you’ll hide the map.”

“Hide the map?”

“Put it in the safe in your office. No one will look there. Ahch-to needs to remain a safe haven, so if something goes wrong, I want you to hide the map. Can you promise me to do that?”

“Of course,” Felicity nodded.

“Anytime,” Felicity grinned. “Now, how about I lock the door and we go back to you telling me what you would do if you were here?”

Luke chuckled, “I love our transmissions.”

14 Hours Before the Burning of Rornian

Transmission Failed.

Felicity frowned at the error message for what felt like the thousandth time. It had been happening all day. No one in Temple Village could get a message to or from anywhere on Rornian. A team had been sent to the Communication Station, but there had been no response from them all day.
It worried Felicity, and she couldn’t help but feel a sense of dread. Nothing else had been wrong – the weather had been perfect, and day free of anything but the most minor of transgressions – yet Felicity thought that something felt off.

She knew there was no evidence to support her fear, but she had long ago learned to trust her gut.

Felicity took off the drawstring pouch from around her neck and pulled aside the Holo on her office wall that hid a safe. She opened it and placed the map to Ahch-to in the otherwise empty safe. Nothing might happen, but the map needed to be secured just in case.

Passcode? The safe requested as Felicity closed its door.

“Brendan Rhiaon died a martyr,” Felicity spoke her standard passcode and the safe happily accepted it.

‘Brendan Rhiaon died a martyr’ and ‘Burning Homestead’ were Felicity and Luke’s standard passcodes. Morbid, but no one would ever guess them. Felicity knew that if something happened to her, Luke would be able to guess the passcode and get the map.

“I’m probably being ridiculous,” Felicity muttered to herself. “Nothing’s going to happen.”

That night, Felicity woke to the scream of her daughter getting dragged out of bed by the Knights of Ren.

78 Days After the Burning of Rornian

"Brendan Rhiaon died a martyr.”

Approving the passcode, the safe unlocked. With a shaking hand, Luke Skywalker pulled open the door and found it. Untouched since Felicity had stored it, sitting in the safe was the drawstring pouch containing the map to Ahch-to.

Luke gave a sigh of relief. He knew his wife well enough to know that she would have locked the map away at the first sign of trouble, but he had been worried that the attack had been so unexpected that she hadn’t had to chance to do so.

He grabbed the pouch and tied it around his neck. The rest of the map that was stored on Artoo had been downloaded into the computer of Luke’s X-Wing. The plan had been that Luke was to meet the others on Ahch-to after he was done with the Senate.

Unfortunately, as most often happened in Luke Skywalker’s life, things had decidedly not gone according to plan. With his wife, daughter, and students dead, Luke was drifting aimlessly through life.

He didn't look back as he walked away.

So that is how a small piece of the map to Ahch-to secretly came into Luke Skywalker’s possession. Of course, it was not a complete secret as many of the still living people who had taken part in the story would later recall the events. Rumours would swirl about, supported by testimony from Doctor Kalonia that the Jedi were planning a move and that Luke did have possession of a map.
As for how that map fell into the hands of Lor San Tekka? Well, that is where our story continues…

90 Days After the Burning of Rornian

Rey was crying.

Luke viewed the sight with displeasure. Curled up in a hammock in an odd environment of machinery, Rey was clutching a doll and crying. She looked smaller than usual in the giant hammock. A patchwork blanket made from clothing including oddly enough an orange flight was wrapped around her. Tally marks were etched into one of the walls of the machinery, and an endless stretch of sand was all Luke could see beyond the door to the outside world.

Rey was dirty, shivering, and scared as she quietly sobbed. Luke wanted to run over to her and gather her in his arms, but he observed the scene as if a ghost. He was rooted to the spot and Rey did not appear to see him as she wept.

“Mommy, Daddy, please come back,” Rey cried. The tears running down her face broke Luke’s heart. “Please come back for me.”

A woman’s desperate scream filled the air. Rey and her hammock were gone, the image replaced with a brown haired woman trapped in a cell. She was pounding on wall, her cries drowned out by distant blaster fire.

Luke would recognize her face anywhere.

“LUKE!” Felicity screamed as she pounded on the wall frantically. “LUKE!”

In the distance, Luke could once again hear Rey’s sobs.

“Daddy, come back,” his little girl cried. “Please, come back.”

“YOU HAVE TO GO BACK, LUKE!” Felicity shrieked.

Suddenly it felt like whatever was freezing Luke in place melted away. Experimentally he lifted a hand, and to his joy found he could move. Luke couldn’t believe it; Felicity was alive and within arm’s reach.

Felicity stopped banging on the wall and turned to face him. She had a strange expression, like she had the still, blank face of a porcelain doll. Her eyes were glassy and unseeing, her posture mechanically straight, and it looked as if her joints were fused together.

Something felt hot and sticky under his natural hand. Luke pulled it away from her head and froze with horror. His hand was covered in blood. His eyes flicked back to Felicity’s face. Blood was pouring profusely out of her temple which was marked with a fresh blaster mark.

“NO!” Luke cried out as Felicity collapsed in his arms like a rag doll. Falling to his knees, Luke lovingly cradled her suddenly cold body. Tears streamed down his face as he shook her, “Come on, Felicity. Please, wake up! Please, wake up!”

Felicity’s corpse made no reply.

“NO! GOD, NO! FELICITY! FELICITY!”

Then, she spoke. Her lips did not move, nor her body revive, but around him like the wind, Felicity and Rey’s voices called to him.

“LUKE!”

“Daddy!”

Everything disappeared. Luke stood in utter blackness as the voices of his wife and daughter circled him.

“YOU HAVE TO GO BACK, LUKE!”

“Come back, Daddy! Come back!”

“YOU HAVE TO GO BACK!”

“You promised, Daddy!”

“GO BACK, LUKE!”

“Daddy!”

“YOU HAVE TO GET—”

Luke shot up straight in his bed.

He was breathing heavily, his heart beating wildly. The sweat on his bare chest stuck to the blanket belonging to the cheap hotel he was hiding himself away in.

Grabbing his aching head, Luke tried to blink away the images of his strange dream. Rey and Felicity had not been uncommon guests in his dream as of late, but there was something different in this dream.

Dream? …Or was it a vision?

It didn’t make sense; his wife and daughter were dead. He had seen Felicity’s execution for himself. There was no reason to question that his wife was gone.

The image of blood pouring from Felicity’s temple haunted Luke the most out of his dream/visions. Holding up his left hand, Luke had to double check that it wasn’t stained with red. To his relief it wasn’t, but he could still feel hot stickiness of it.

But what did it all mean? Why has Rey crying in a desert? Why was she covered in a blanket made from his suit? Why were she and Felicity begging him to go back somewhere?

Did it mean that… Rey was alive? Had Felicity’s ghost or influence in the afterlife teamed up with Rey to send him a message that she was waiting for him? No, Luke refused to let that hope take root. Rey wasn’t strong enough in the Force to connect with him, and a non-Force Sensitive speaking beyond the grave was impossible.
It had to have been a dream. Rey and Felicity were dead, and the dream was just Luke’s subconscious trying to reconcile the tragedy.

Why else would Luke have dreamt of Rey?

Little did he know, that night was the first time Rey’s desperate plea through the Force managed to connect to him.

And it wouldn’t be the last.

Chapter End Notes

So, I would just like to state for the record that Felicity having a line about washing blood from her hands and then Luke having a vision of her blood on his hands was totally not intentional. Nor was Luke seeing Felicity’s blood on his hands meant to be a metaphor for him blaming himself for what happened to her. Those were just happy (or maybe unhappy) coincidences.

Also please send me lots of reviews for this chapter! It’s my birthday and I’ve given you a supersized chapter. What more does a girl need to do to get reviews?
Desperate to Sleep

Chapter Summary

While Luke unknowingly connects to Rey in his dreams, Felicity's influence causes Rey to make some friends.

Chapter Notes

So the chapter ran away on me again causing me to split it in half. So, good news: quicker updates for this and the next chapter, but the bad news is we’re yet another chapter away from the reunion. However, it absolutely will be taking place in chapter fourteen so you guys can stop ending every review with “how much longer until the reunion?” Chapter fourteen, I swear.

As for when will TFA kick in… according to my plan Chapter Twenty-One. Then again, in the last twenty-four hours alone I’ve added three extra chapters to my outline (I’ve decided to do a mini story for every one of the fourteen years on Jakku, plus I’m going to rewrite the Rey portion of Before the Awakening, although the Finn and Poe parts won’t be canon in my story.) At this point TFA is just a distant dream.

… Why do I get the feeling Episode 8 is going to be out before I’m done the Episode 7 portion of this story?

Chapter Twelve

Desperate to Sleep

Luke Skywalker was lost.

Well… metaphorically. Luke knew exactly which backwater outer rim dust ball he was on. Not that it was much different from the dozen other backwater outer rim dust balls he had wandered between in the last two months.

Honestly? He had no plan of action. Sure, he had vague notions of running off to Ahch-to and wallowing for the rest of his life in the memories of what he had lost. It would be torture to live there; a constant stream of memories flooding into his mind as the slightest thing reminded him of his students or family. Of course, that was the whole idea, exiling himself was punishment for his failure to protect his students, wife, and daughter. Maybe he’d even take up residence in the hut he had made love to Felicity in all those years ago. Just to twist the knife a little more.

He already had the full map logged into the navi-computer of his X-Wing. Just the push of a button and he’d seal his fate.
Yet, he couldn’t bring himself to go. Instead he’d fly himself to a nothing planet where barely anyone could (or would care to) recognize him. He’d rent a room in a seedy inn and spend his days drinking at a bar, watching Leia’s desperate pleas on the HoloNet for someone to find him and bring him home.

If there was one thing Luke did regret about leaving, it was that he didn’t tell Han and Leia goodbye. He didn’t know why he hadn’t. Perhaps it was because he’d acted too quickly. Perhaps it was because he was ashamed of himself. Or perhaps he thought Chewie might break his promise and tell them what Ben did to Felicity.

That would make them understand.

The nights were unbearable. Dreams, visions, and nightmares of what could have happened and what had.

Rey dead in the sand. Ben dead by his hands. Felicity bleeding out on the floor of the First Order base. The Jedi successfully fleeing to Ahch-to. Rey alone and scared, crying herself to sleep. Felicity in his arms, crying in relief. Luke on his knees, crying in grief. Rey as a beautiful grown woman fighting the First Order by his side. Felicity pounding on the door of prison cell, begging him to go back.

Not a night went by that he didn’t wake in a cold sweat, haunted by a dream of either the horrible reality of what had happened, what could have.

The ghosts of his mentors had obeyed Luke’s command to leave him alone, but the Force hadn’t. It spoke through his dreams and interrupted his days with visions. In the day he was strong enough to push them out of his mind, but in the dead of night he was too tired to resist. In fact, part of him didn’t want to resist. In his dreams they were alive. In his dreams he held Felicity, he watched Rey grow up, and he trained his students. In the dream world they were still there, and as long as he kept them in his mind, the ones he loved would never be banished to the black world of death and nothingness.

But it was the same message every night: go back. Rey begged him, Felicity begged him, Leia begged him. Yet he ignored them all. How could he ever go back? How could he ever start again? Replace them? Forget what they died for? And ultimately fail all over again?

He could never do that.

Eventually, Luke would be recognized by someone on the planet he was hiding on, so he would pack everything up, pay his tabs, and move on to the next planet.

Truth be told there wasn’t even much Luke had to pack. Stored in his X-Wing was a couple of credit chips, a few Holos, some basic supplies, his lightsaber, a spare glove for his mechanical hand, his hand repair kit, Rey’s doll, and some clothing. He had about three outfits, all of which were black. Luke used them as a sign of mourning, and honestly didn’t know if he could ever stand to wear any other colour for the rest of his life.

It wasn’t just his clothing Luke used as a sign of mourning, he had stopped keeping his hair the way Felicity liked it. Shaggy and unstyled, his hair resembled less of his appearance on the Second Death Star, and more like when he was on the First.

Plus, he had grown a beard. Luke Skywalker was known for his clean cut look, and had barely even considered facial hair an option. The one time he had decided to give it a try, the decision was firmly vetoed by his family. Leia had given him a twenty-minute lecture on the importance of public appearance and maintaining a certain image, and Han had proclaimed that he looked like Ben Kenobi got hit by a speeder. When Luke called them out on how a family was supposed to be loving and supportive, Felicity had told him she loved him too much to support such a stupid decision. She then proceeded to refuse to sleep with Luke until he shaved.

To Luke’s credit, he lasted six weeks.

As such, growing a beard seemed to be a fitting punishment for Luke. He had destroyed his public appearance, earned Han’s taunts, taken on Ben Kenobi’s legacy as a shameful recluse, and would never again make love to his wife.

He couldn’t get rid of his lightsaber, however. True, it was as special to him as many of the things he had left behind, but it was not for sentimental reasons he continued to carry it. Nor was it for his protection. Truth be told, he was heartbroken enough that he had potentially become suicidal. Luke wouldn’t plan or attempt anything – heck he wouldn’t even imagine trying to hurt himself – but if someone were to try and kill him… Luke honestly wasn’t certain how hard he would fight back. The draw of living wasn’t nearly as great as it was to being reunited with his dead loved ones.

The reason he kept his lightsaber was probably the only noble thing he had done in his whole running away to become a hermit plan. Luke would not allow a lightsaber to be carelessly abandoned for anyone to claim. He would not risk letting a tool of justice fall into the wrong hands and let it take innocent lives.

That was also the reason he kept the drawstring bag around his neck. As far as Luke knew, the only completed map to Ahch-to on record was the one in his navi-computer. No one could find Ahch-to without the piece that hung around his neck, and that was the way he was going to keep it.

It was hard for Luke to stop being a Jedi; it had been a part of his life for so long. So that was how he would respect the legacies of those who had died for the Order. He would protect what little was left by withholding his lightsaber from Darkness, and keeping Ahch-to to himself. He would be the protector of the Jedi Order, and ensure its legacy – though not its operations – would live on beyond his death. He would spend the rest of his pitiful days tending to the site of the First Jedi Temple, and hiding the last Jedi lightsaber (the others had been burned at the memorial with their owners, and who knew where his father’s had ended up?)

Just the push of a button and he’d seal his fate.

And yet, he still couldn’t bring himself to go.

So, Luke Skywalker simply ordered himself another drink and watched the HoloNet recording of Leia begging him to come home.

Luke Skywalker was lost.

… Metaphorically.

Rey Rhiaon Skywalker was lost.

… Literally. Rey was lost. She had no clue where she was or how to get back home. Or at least what passed for her home these days.

Did she even have a home? Mommy said it had burned down, so where was their new home? Not Jakku, Rey was certain. No place was home if Mommy and Daddy weren’t there. Even her warm, comfy bed on Rornian wasn’t home when Mommy or Daddy went away on business.
Rey missed Mommy and Daddy. Why hadn’t they come back for her yet? What was taking so long? Didn’t they want her? Both Mommy and Daddy told her to stay where she was and then left her alone with bad people.

Well… maybe not bad people. Mommy left her with Mister Plutt, and while he wasn’t nice, he didn’t seem to be evil. When Daddy left her in the woods, however…

Unwanted memories flashed through Rey’s mind.

Rain pouring down from the sky.

Lightning and thunder crackling dangerously.

A figure emerging from the trees.

“Ben!” Rey crying out.

Rey hugging Ben.

“You came to save me!”

A scary look in Ben’s eyes.

“I’m sorry, Rey.”

A red lightsaber swinging down.

Rey couldn’t bear to remember anymore. The memories of that night were too scary. She didn’t want to remember what happened in the forest with Ben. She didn’t want to remember what happened with Mommy and Baku Ren by Daddy’s X-Wing. She didn’t want to remember the monsters dragging her out of bed. She wanted to forget all of it. She wanted to wake up and find it was all a dream.

But she never would.

Holding back tears, Rey looked around Niima Outpost in confusion. Unfamiliar places and people surrounded her, and not one friendly face appeared who would help her.

When Mommy first went away, Mister Plutt kept her cooped up in the walker. Well… first he had raided the walker for anything valuable, but luckily one of Mommy’s games had been exploring the walker and stashing anything of value in case Mommy needed to barter with Mister Plutt. Rey knew exactly where Mommy had put everything, but since Mister Plutt didn’t think to ask Rey, and Rey didn’t want to upset Mommy by revealing the secret, Rey kept quiet.

While Rey was confined in the walker, three times a day Mister Plutt would send someone to bring and cook her food. At first it was a little fun to Rey. She’d play make believe and pretend she was in some epic adventure like one of her family’s stories.

She’d be Grandma Padmé during the invasion of Naboo, and Great Uncles Obi-Wan Kenobi and Qui-Gon Jinn would come save her. Or she’d be Aunt Leia in the Death Star, and Daddy would come bursting into her cell in a Stormtrooper outfit saying, “I’m Luke Skywalker. I’ve come to rescue you.” Or she’d be Mommy trying to save the baby FN-2187 from the evil First Order, and Daddy would come pull her away to safety just in time, but tragically had to leave FN-2187 behind and would get angry at Daddy, hitting him and yelling at him before collapsing in tears in his arms.

Rey wasn’t actually supposed to know that last story, but she’d overheard Uncle Diego talking about it one time. Actually, Mister Plutt had said Mommy had gone to the First Order. Rey wondered if Mommy had met up with FN-2187. Maybe Mommy would rescue him and bring him home with her when Mommy came to get Rey. Would that make FN-2187 her brother? Rey didn’t like that idea, but she really did want to meet him. She hoped FN-2187 would like her.

After a week of Plutt’s lackeys bringing Rey food, he had gone on a tirade about it wasting too much gas to go there and back three times a day. He was bound to his promise to Felicity to keep Rey in the walker, but she didn’t have to spend every minute there.

So Plutt changed his plans. Every morning one of his minions would drive to the walker, wake up Rey, and make her breakfast. He would then bring her into Niima where she was free to wander wherever she wanted until midday when she would return to the concession stand for lunch. Plutt had enough eyes in town to make sure Rey didn’t get in trouble, or that any of the locals got too friendly with her. Rey would then be free to wander until sundown when one of Plutt’s minions would bring her back to the walker and make her dinner.

They would then leave her to spend the cold nights alone and add another scratch to the wall. Rey knew Mommy told her not to touch the sharp object, but she wanted to make Mommy happy that she had continued keeping count. She didn’t even cross her tallies out of respect for Mommy.

Sometimes she would look at the tallies and frown. Rey knew how to count, but the tallies were starting to add up quite a bit. Without Mommy there to tell her, Rey had lost track of how many days she had been on Jakku, and the tallies were too frustrating for Rey to count.

If she had counted them, she would have known that she had been on Jakku for 157 days.

She had spent 118 of those days alone.

Rey hadn’t changed out of the clothing Mommy put her in. She was afraid if she did, Mommy might not recognize her and would accidentally bring home some other little girl. Not that Rey had seen any other little girls on Jakku, but Daddy had always said that their family had “the Skywalker curse” and anyone named Skywalker was cursed to have terrible luck.

She had always been confused about whether the curse applied to her since her name wasn’t Skywalker, but rather Rhiaon Skywalker. However, Mommy told her that after Mommy and Daddy got married, they both changed their names to Rhiaon Skywalker, which was apparently very strange for Daddy to do, but not Mommy? That part always confused Rey. Why did girls have to take boy names, but boys couldn’t take the girl’s name?

However, even though Mommy and Daddy were both called Rhiaon Skywalker, Daddy claimed to still be under the Skywalker Curse. True, professionally (Rey thought that was the right word. She had read it in one of Aunt Leia’s boring politic books that made no sense) Daddy continued to call himself Luke Skywalker, rather than his actual name of Luke Rhiaon Skywalker, but every now and then Mommy also blamed Daddy that she fallen victim to the curse and that she should never have become a Skywalker. That must mean that the Rhiaon Skywalker name was enough of a Skywalker for the curse to get her, and Rey didn’t want to take any chances. She was so afraid of the curse getting her, that Rey refused to even change the hairstyle Mommy had given her. Rey would do whatever it took not to fall victim to the curse Daddy warned her so many times about.

Of course, being five, Rey failed to understand Luke was joking.
Every night was the same for Rey. She would scratch a tally on the wall and then climb into the hammock Mommy had strung for her. Rey had taken the sleeping bag and Mommy’s clothing blanket and would cuddle up in them in the hammock. Clutching her pilot doll, Rey would cry, feeling so lonely. So afraid to leave.

At night, desperate to sleep, Rey would try with all her might to reach out into the Force and find Daddy. She could see him sometimes, but he didn’t look like the Daddy she knew. His hair was shaggy and unstyled, his eyes were sad, and he had beard.

She would focus on the image and push forward the image of herself bundled up in the hammock, clutching her doll and crying.

“Please, Daddy,” Rey cried. “Please, come back. You promised you’d come back. Come back, Daddy! Come back!”

Every night was the same for Luke. He would drink at the bar of the inn he was staying at and kept drinking until the pain was just an angry buzzing in his mind. He would then pay his tab and stumble back to his room.

Clumsily he would strip off his shirt, boots, and belt, and carelessly toss his lightsaber and effects on the dresser. He would go into the fresher to splash water on his face and stare silently at his reflection for twenty minutes, wondering what he was doing with his life.

Entering the bedroom, he would climb into bed and get under the covers, but not turn off the light. Instead he would stare at the wedding ring on his left hand for an hour, losing himself in memories of his wife. He would wonder if tonight was the night he finally admitted she was gone, he was a widower, and it was time to take the ring off.

His bed always felt like something was missing when Felicity wasn’t curled up next to him, but now knowing that she would never again be at his side, his bed felt cold and empty. The sight of the ring she had once slipped on his finger in exchange for a promise to love her as long as he loved was a knife to the heart.

Ben hadn’t even been kind enough to give her rings back to Luke. He would have liked to have just that small memento to hang onto. Maybe it would numb some of the pain and Luke could finally move on. But Ben had despised Felicity, and probably took great pleasure in knowing he had denied his uncle the small token of his enemy. And after what Ben had done to Felicity, Luke knew he could never recover them.

Of course with that thought Luke would only be reminded of the horrifying reason he hadn’t been able to bring Felicity’s body home. He didn’t know if he could ever forgive Ben for how he disposed of Felicity’s body. The act was horrifying, albeit not the worst thing he could have done to her. It was really the sentiment behind it, the cruel irony, and intentional strike at Luke that came with it that made what Ben did so unforgivable. If Ben had merely killed Felicity, he and Luke may have come to an understanding, but Ben had taken it one step too far.

Luke sighed. Though he refused to admit it to anyone, carrying the secret of what Ben had done was one of the reasons he had left. How long could he have kept it from Han and Leia? They didn’t need to carry that burden, and it would only bring them shame, horror, and regret. Luke couldn’t stand the idea that every time they looked at him, they would be reminded of what Ben did.

It was on those dark nights that Luke would do something he was ashamed of. No one knew, not even Chewbacca, but Luke had kept the holo Ben had slipped into his pocket. The holo of his wife getting shot.

And Luke would watch it.

Over and over, Felicity’s muffled screams tearing at his heart as the blaster was raised to her temple. After a lifetime of fighting and never backing down, Felicity was powerless to avoid her fate. She begged for mercy, but none was shown.

Over and over, the trigger was pulled and she fell to the floor. Unlike his dreams, there was no blood pouring from Felicity’s head: a blast shot was a clean death, but at point blank range it would have hurt like hell.

Over and over Luke would wonder how she felt in that last moment. Was she afraid? Did it hurt? Did she think of him? Was a part of her happy that she would be reunited with those she loved and lost? What did she do when she reached the afterlife? Was she greeted by those she had loved and lost? Did she jump into Brendan’s arms? Did she pick up Rey and twirl her around? Did Rogue Squadron gather for a group hug? Did Luke’s Jedi praise how she fought to save them? Did she hug and thank Bail Organa? Did she slap Anakin Skywalker as she proclaimed so many times to be her plan if she encountered him in the afterlife? Did her father miraculously appear and they finally found reconciliation? Did the mother Felicity barely knew greet her? Did the mother Luke barely knew?

Over and over Luke listened to Kylo confirm that he hadn’t felt the death through the Force, and ergo Luke hadn’t either. Hux would explain and show footage that earlier they had held Felicity down and stuck a needle into the back of her neck. They injected her with a specially formulated serum primarily consisting of ysalamir blood that blocked Force Sensitives from sensing her in the Force. The Force could still be used against her, but Luke wouldn’t feel the moment she was shot.

Over and over Luke would watch the horrifying thing Ben did next to Felicity. The thing that would give him nightmares for years to come. The thing that if Luke could manage it, he would take with him to his grave.

Eventually he could watch it no more and would throw the disc across the room in anger. But just before it hit the floor and shattered, Luke would use the Force to cushion the landing so he could torture himself another night.

Then he would finally turn off the lights and try to cry himself to sleep.

It rarely worked.

At night, desperate to sleep, Luke would try with all his might to reach out into the Force and fend off the visions that barraged him. He could see them sometimes: Rey dirty and sunburnt on Jakku. Leia sobbing as another day passed with no sign of Luke. Han staring out at the horizon without a clue how to handle everything. Kylo begging the helmet of Darth Vader to speak to him. Anakin on the floor of the Lars Homestead workshop with his head in his hands. Obi-Wan muttering apologies as he sat on an ashen hill next to the molten banks of Mustafar. Felicity lying on the bench of a prison as she stared up blanking at the ceiling. Padmé crying in her apartment on Coruscant as the Jedi Temple burned. Lando knelt in front of Alyla Kene’s grave regretting the life he was too afraid to make with her.

There were dozens more he saw: people both living and dead, suffering through various scenarios both real and imagined.

But it was the image of Rey that haunted him the most.
He would focus on the image of Rey bundled up in the hammock, clutching her doll and crying.

“Please, Daddy,” Rey cried. “Please, come back. You promised you’d come back. Come back, Daddy! Come back!”

Luke sobbed as he punished himself for breaking that promise. Why hadn’t he gone back?

“Please, come back, Daddy. I miss you.”

Rey’s words sounded so much like the ones she had said during their nightly transmission the day before the Burning of Rornian. He had comforted her with hints of their move to Ahch-to and promises of the fun they would have there. Luke could imagine training Rey in the field Felicity had presented him his lightsaber. He could imagine telling her stories by the fire in the hut he had loved Felicity in all those years ago. He could imagine her getting tired of all the steps like her mother and him giving her a piggyback ride as he jokingly complained about having to carry Yoda like that all those years ago on Dagobah.

The ghost of Yoda had always liked to chuckle whenever Luke told that story. Luke had been none too pleased the day Anakin told him that had never been a part of Jedi training. Obi-Wan had tried to defend Yoda by saying he was doing what he could with the environment provided.

Yoda himself offered no further excuse than, “Old, am I. Keep up with you, how else could I? Hmm?”

Surprisingly, Luke found thinking of Ahch-to to be comforting. As his mind filled with visions of the ocean and the island, he felt the visions of Rey drift away.

The images flooded Rey’s mind as she pushed forward her own. They slipped into her mind so easily it felt like she was imagining it herself.

She imagined an ocean. She could see it. She could see the island.

And Luke Skywalker. She could feel his touch behind it. He was the greatest father she could ever have. He would have never disappointed her.

Luke felt the vision of Rey lessen and slip away. There was a certain serenity and comfort flooding through the Force. A relaxing feeling like the exhale of a deep, cleansing breath.

The images of Rey disappeared.

With a smile on her face, Rey Rhiaon Skywalker slept soundly, comforted by the Force and the images her father had sent her.

With a smile on his face, Luke Rhiaon Skywalker slept soundly, comforted by the Force and the images his daughter had sent him.

Little did he know, that night was the first time Luke managed to answer Rey back in the Force with comforting images of Ahch-to.
And it wouldn't be the last.

During the day when Rey was left to wander, Mister Plutt would always warn her not to go too far from the concession stand and not to lose track of what turns she had made. So of course, it was only natural that she had forgotten that she took three right turns, a left, two more rights, and then left twice.

It was her own fault for getting lost. She should have followed Mister Plutt’s warnings.

Looking around the Outpost, Rey had no clue how to get back to the concession stand. Had she been more mature, Rey could have come up with the idea to follow the scavengers who were coming in to trade their scrap to Plutt. But her underdeveloped brain could only think about how hot and thirsty she was, how her stomach was growling, and how much her skin hurt.

Her skin hurt a lot. She had turned as red as Admiral Akbar, and her skin had gotten hot and peely. It hurt too much to touch, but it was so itchy. She would cry as she sat huddled in the shade and scratched her painful skin, doing more damage than good.

Rey vaguely understood that it was sunburn. She had gotten it the year before, when it got extra hot on Rornian. She remembered Mommy calling it a “heatwave” and that when Daddy went on a business trip for a few weeks, Master Obik Kenu had “commandeered” (which Master Reine explained meant he took without Daddy’s permission) part of the money meant to build more homes, to get air conditioning installed in every building in Temple Village. Daddy was not happy when he got home.

Daddy was even more unhappy about what Mommy accidentally did to Rey. The day before Daddy came home, all the Jedi were so bogged down by the heat, Reine officially declared it a day off and everyone went to the lake to cool down and have fun. Mommy was supposed to put something called screen (or at least Rey thought it was called screen) on Rey, but fell asleep reading a HoloNovel in the shade while Rey played with the other children. Mommy later claimed she thought one of the other adults would have put the screen on Rey, but the others thought Mommy had done it. In the end, both Rey and Mommy got horrible sunburns and Daddy was really annoyed.

“Don’t give me that look,” Mommy had chastised Daddy, as Daddy rubbed Rey down with some lotion. “I said I was sorry.”

“I just don’t understand how this could have happened,” Daddy had replied. “I thought you’d be careful.”

“I was careful!”

“Not careful enough.”

“Well, I’m sorry, but not all of us grew up on planets with two suns,” Mommy had rolled her eyes. “I grew up on the planet of air conditioning in every building.”

“Speaking of,” Daddy had given Mommy a suspicious look, “I have a few question concerning the architecture budget and a certain withdrawal that was recently made.”

“Hey, had nothing to do with Obik’s little expenditure. If you’re looking into who authorized the withdrawal, you take that up with Reine.”

“Believe me. I will.”
“Oh, stop moping,” Mommy had laughed at the grumpy expression on Daddy’s face. “Not everyone can stand the heat like you, Desert Boy. The rest of us are very happy about the air conditioning, and as for the sunburn, it happens, Luke. Kids get sunburn, it’s not the end of the world.”

But as Rey struggled with the pain of her sunburn on Jakku, she couldn’t help but think it was the end of the world. Rey remembered a little about how Daddy treated it (mostly lotions Rey didn’t know where to find) and she had no idea how to stop from burning in the first place.

With one last look around, Rey gave up. She let the tears fall as she scurried towards a large tented structure that cast a lot of shade. Curling up against the entrance flap, Rey cried as she desperately scratched at her burns, her stomach hurting with hunger, and having no clue how to get back to Mister Plutt. Worse yet, not one person seemed to care about the little girl crying against the tent. Wasn’t there anyone willing to help her?

Suddenly the tent flap flew open and out stepped Quom Tinadar.

“What in the galaxy is that noise?” Quom looked around for the source of the high pitched gasping coming from outside his workshop tent. He looked down and was shocked to find a familiar little girl at his feet, “Why if it isn’t the Miracle Girl.”

Rey sniffed and looked up. She recognized the alien who Mommy had threatened into helping them.

“Hullo,” Rey muttered, hugging her legs tightly. She wasn’t sure if he was supposed to be a good guy or a bad guy. He seemed friendly, but Mommy had threatened to shoot him, and it wasn’t the joking way she usually threatened to shoot people.

“Are you okay? You don’t look too happy,” he sounded concerned, but Rey wouldn’t look him in the eye. When she said nothing, he asked, “You’re Rey Erso, right?”

Rey shrugged.

Quom’s brow furrowed. The girl needed help, but she clearly didn’t want it from him. He had half a mind to leave her alone like she wanted, but he remembered the promise he made to Felicity Erso (or whatever her name was) and knew he had to push on.

“Well, hello Miss Erso,” Quom gave Rey his nicest smile. Unfortunately, due to his intimidating Vrogem features of long snout, sharp pointed teeth, and fur set in patterns around his mouth and eyes that conveniently always made him look like he was scowling, his nicest smile looked like something out of Rey’s nightmares. Quom winced at the withheld fear in Rey’s eyes, “My name’s Quom Tinadar. Do you remember me?”

Rey looked down at the ground and nodded, “You took Mommy’s rings.”

The smile on Quom’s face froze.

“Uh… yeah,” he said awkwardly. “But I can give them back if you want.”

“No,” Rey shook her head. “They’re Mommy’s. We don’t take things that belong to other people.”

“Smart girl. And you’re right, I shouldn’t have taken them. But if you don’t take them, how am I supposed to make up for taking them from your Mom?”
“Give them to her when she gets back.”

It hit Quom like a knife to the heart. Not only had Felicity Erso been forced to abandon her daughter and surrender herself to certain death, but Rey had no idea. Rey thought her mother was coming back.

Well, promise or no promise, Quom certainly wasn’t going to be the one to tell her otherwise. He may have owed the Erso Family a debt, but not one that big.

“Alright,” Quom said. “I’ll hold on to them for a while. So, do you want to tell me why you’re crying?”

Rey shook her head.

Quom was starting to remember why he’d never had a litter of pups.

“Look, Girlie, I just want to help you,” Quom insisted. “Your mom asked me to help care of you while she was gone.”

“She- She did?” Rey sniffed, wiping her nose on her arm. “I thought she wanted Mister Plutt to help me.”

“I don’t think anyone wants Unkar Plutt to help them. He’s far more of a scavenger than any of us who strip those ships in the desert. Your mom probably only asked him to help because he’s got all the food around here… that and an army of muscle you don’t want to be on the wrong side of. Me, on the other hand, she asked because she thought I could help you a lot better than Unkar Plutt. After all, I did kind of rescue you guys.”

“You made Mommy pay you for it.”

Quom sighed, “Listen, Rey, there’s something you should understand about Jakku; it’s a very rough place. People around here often can’t just give help without needing something in return. Resources are precious and few, so giving out of the kindness of your heart is hard to do when it might mean the difference between life and death. It’s not like, where’d you grow up?”

Rey shook her head, “Daddy says don’t tell personal things to people without Mommy and Daddy’s permission.”

“Smart guy. Alright, can you answer this? Where you grew up, is there food on the table everyday?”

Rey nodded.

“What about heat and electricity?”

“Oh huh.”

“A nice house with a bed where you can sleep safe and sound?”

She wakes with a jolt. Hands grabbing her, dragging her forward. Rey tries to scream but a hand covers her mouth. She grips the sheets but she goes over the edge of the bed and hits the floor. They’re surrounding her with raised crimson lightsabers.

“Don’t cry,” Cade Ren laughs cruelly. “We’ll make this quick.”

“MOMMY!” Rey screams as the Knights hold her down.
Rey shut her eyes tight and grabbed her head. She let out a sob as she tried to forget the night her bed no longer was safe.

“Hey,” a furry hand touched Rey’s shoulder. “Don’t cry.”

Rey looked up in surprise at Quom comforting her, "I’m sorry.”

“There’s nothing to apologize for,” Quom smiled; the girl really was her mother’s daughter. “I’m sorry if I scared you. I’m a pretty scary guy.”

“Not the scariest I’ve seen,” Rey tried to smile for him, but couldn’t forget the monsters who destroyed her home.

“I don’t know if I should be flattered,” Quom laughed, purposely avoiding the pain in Rey’s lighthearted tone. “Listen, what I was trying to say to that Jakku doesn’t have things like food whenever you want it. That’s why I had to ask your mom for something in return for help. But I crossed a line, and I shouldn’t have asked her for her rings. I asked your mom how I could make up for that and she told me to help you for her, so let me help. What’s wrong?”

Rey sniffed and held out her arms, “My arms hurt.”

Quom winced as he looked over Rey’s arms. It was by far the worst case of sunburn he had ever seen. Her skin was dark red, blistered, and peeling off in several layers. She was a tough little girl not to be screaming in pain.

“Ouch,” Quom said. “That’s not a pretty sight. Come in here, I’ve got something that’ll help.”

Rey hesitated but after a glance around making sure none of Mister Plutt’s men was around looking for her, she followed inside.

The workshop of Quom Tinadar was simple. It was a large tent, big enough to host a speeder. On the ground was some repurposed paneling, and he had a small scooter to roll under a speeder to work on it. There were various benches and cabinets of drawers filled with odds and ends: wires, tools, spare parts, cleaning supplies, power cells, and so on. In the far corner there was a curtained off area with a table, ration cooker, and a cot.

Quom was busy pulling things out of drawers, muttering to himself as Rey wandered into the tent. She tried to stay quiet and still, but being surrounded by so many tools and mechanical parts made her Skywalker half restless…and actually the Rhiaon side too.

Both her Uncle Brendan and her Grandfather Alaric had been big into fixing and designing machines. Felicity’s disinterest had come from her mother, Dinah’s side of the family. In fact, the Andromias family were supposedly very minimalistic and anti-machinery as much as possible. They were livid when Dinah married a technician.

Apparently Felicity had also inherited her mother’s need to marry the man who would piss off her father the most…though with all fairness to Alaric, Felicity had married the man who killed him.

Something shiny caught the corner of Rey’s eye. Rey was drawn to the bench nearest her, on top of which sat some copper wiring with a small flashing box attached. Not thinking, Rey reached out to grab it.

“Don’t touch that,” Quom ordered firmly but not harshly. “You can’t imagine how long it took for me to get a hold of one of those. I’m trying to fix up my R3-187K generator and you can’t get one to run without a-

“Talis 13KR4 wiring conversion plug,” Rey said in unison with Quom. Seeing Quom’s shocked expression, Rey blushed and looked at the ground, “Daddy likes fixing things, and I like watching Daddy.”

“You are full of surprises, aren’t you Miracle Girl?”

Rey grinned.

“Now have a seat,” Quom gestured to a chair, his other hand holding what looked like a couple bundles of fabric. “I’m going to show you a trick to stop sunburn.”

Rey nodded and climbed into the chair.

“Hold out your arms,” Quom ordered.

Rey did as she was told. Quom unwound the two bundles of fabric and began wrapping them around Rey’s arms.

“The sun is going to burn any exposed flesh, so to stop you from getting all burned up, we have to cover you as best we can,” Quom explained, careful not to wind the fabric too tight against Rey’s wounds. “I want you wearing these all the time from now on, okay?”

“No!” Rey pulled her arms from his grasp. “I can’t change my clothes! Mommy needs to recognize me! I don’t want her bringing home another little girl.”

Quom couldn’t help but chuckle, “Your mom is a smart woman, I’m fairly certain she can tell the difference between her own daughter and another little girl. Besides, you’re not changing your clothes, you’re just… accessorizing.”

Rey crossed her arms, a resolute expression on her face.

“I do know she won’t recognize you if you’re a different colour than how she left you,” Quom said.

“Fine,” Rey held out her arms.

“Alright, that should do it,” Quom announced as he secured the white arm wraps. He then grabbed another, longer, thicker piece of fabric, “Now, let’s talk scarves.”

Twenty minutes later, Quom had fully educated Rey on how to wrap a scarf to protect her face and head from the sun. He had also educated her on the versatility of a scarf and how it could be used in a bind as a bandage, a sling, an oil rag, a shade from the sun, a very small tent or blanket, or even a napkin.

“Then why don’t you have one?” Rey’s eyes observed how Quom used merely the hood of his dark brown cloak as a shade from the sun. Though the cloak was shabby and threadbare, the cloak’s colour offset Quom’s black fur very nicely.

“I’m a Vrogem,” Quom explained. “We’re built differently than you humans. We have a special kind of fur on the tops of our heads that traps heat there, allowing the rest of our bodies to remain cool. People sometimes call us ‘Hot Heads’ because of that.”

Rey giggled.
“Laugh it up all you want, Miracle Girl,” Quom grinned waggling his long, pointed ears. “At least I don’t have to worry about sunburn. Now, come on. I’ve shown you how to prevent sunburn, now I’m going to show you how to fix it.”

Rey didn’t hesitate to take Quom’s furry hand and follow him out of the tent.

Doctor Aletha Kymeri had just finished setting up the last of her new medical equipment when Quom Tinadar walked into her tent with a little girl.

“Would you look at that,” Quom looked around, impressed. “Finally got the place back in order, Doctor.”

“The First Order certainly left quite a mess, and haggling around town for new equipment wasn’t the easiest thing,” Aletha raised an eyebrow at the sight of Quom holding the little girl’s hand, but didn’t comment. “People were surprisingly hostile to trading with me. You’d think people would want the only doctor in the outpost to be properly stocked.”

“Unfortunately, you’re right,” Aletha shook her head. “Anyways, what can I do for you?”

“Not me. Her.” Quom looked down at Rey, who was practically glued to his leg, “Have you met, Rey Erso?”

“I believe so.” Aletha got down on one knee to be at Rey’s eye level, “Hello, Rey. Do you remember me?”

Rey nodded, “You made me feel better when Mommy got scared. She said you were nice and I would be safe with you while she went to call Daddy.”

“You’ve got a great memory,” Aletha smiled. “Now, is there something wrong you need me to help you with?”

“My arms hurt,” Rey held them out.

“She hasn’t been covering up properly and got really bad sunburn,” Quom explained as Aletha began unwrapping Rey’s coverings. “I wrapped them up for her but she’s going to need some help.”

“Oh, this is bad. Really bad.” Aletha went over to a drawer and pulled out a tube of paste, “I’m going to put this on you. It might hurt a little but that means it’s working. Do you think you can hold still for me?”

Rey looked apprehensive but nodded.

“Alright then,” Aletha smiled.

Rey tried not to make faces as the paste burned her skin, but it hurt so badly.

“Hold still,” Aletha reminded as Rey squirmed in her seat. “We’re almost done… There. It’s probably going to hurt for the next half an hour, but I promise you’re going to feel a lot better.”

“Thank you, Missus Doctor,” Rey said, forgetting what Aletha’s name was.

“You can call me Aletha or Doctor Kymeri. Whichever you’re comfortable with. And actually it’s Ms. Doctor. I’m not married anymore.”
“What happened?”

Aletha gave a sad smile, “My husband died fighting in the Rebellion.”

“I’m sorry, Doctor Aletha. My mommy and daddy fought in the Rebellion,” Rey said proudly. “But they didn’t die.”

“Well that’s good they didn’t die.” Aletha ruffled Rey’s hair, “If they had, by my calculations you wouldn’t exist, and what a terrible tragedy that would be.”

“A life not worth living,” Quom winked.

Rey giggled at the adults’ antics.

“Here, Rey,” Aletha opened a cabinet and pulled out a bottle. She handed it to Rey, “I want you to have these.”

“What are they?” Rey squinted at the label. Mommy and Daddy had started to teach her to read, but she didn’t know what the words zinc, folic acid, or pyridoxine hydrochloride meant.

“Vitamins,” Aletha replied. “Rations aren’t good for a growing girl to live on alone. While these aren’t going to be a miracle pill, vitamins will help you get the things you need to develop strong bones and muscles and keep you healthy. I want you to take one every day with your…”

Aletha paused.

“Rey, how are you eating right now?” Aletha asked.

“Rations,” Rey replied. “Mommy paid Mister Plutt to give them to me.”

“How much and how often?”

“One portion, three times a day.”

Quom raised an eyebrow while Aletha gave a sigh of relief. Rey was eating better than both of them… put together.

“Okay, I want you to take one vitamin every day with your first meal,” Aletha instructed. “Only one, though. Promise?”

“Promise,” Rey vowed.

“Good,” Aletha smiled.

But as satisfied with Rey’s answer Aletha was, there was something bothering Quom.

“Where do you stay?” Quom asked.

Rey carefully thought over her words, “The place you found me and Mommy.”

Quom frowned, “Why are you here then? Why not stay at…”

He noticed Rey’s nervous look. She couldn’t hide where she lived from Quom, but she clearly was worried about telling Aletha. Her mother probably warned her not to tell anyone.

“Your place?” Quom finished.
Rey took a deep breath and explained the situation with Plutt as best she understood it. At the conclusion, Doctor Aletha and Mister Tinadar were exchanging a bad look. It was the kind of look Uncle Han would usually exchange with Mommy or Daddy or Uncle Chewie or Aunt Leia before proclaiming he had a bad feeling about this.

“So Plutt has you just…” Aletha was at a loss for words, “wander the outpost?”

“Oh huh,” Rey nodded.

Mister Quom and Doctor Aletha exchanged that look again.

“You know, Rey,” Aletha said, “if you’re every feeling lonely or bored, you can come see me for a while.”

“Or me,” Quom offered. “We can talk all about those things your dad fixes.”

“He’s really good at it,” Rey said proudly.

“He’s gotta be if his five-year-old knows what an Talis 13KR4 wiring conversion plug is.”

Aletha stared at Quom, “What is that? A radio?”

Quom frowned at Aletha but whatever he was going to say was lost to time when a yell ripped across the road.

“WHERE IS THE GIRL?”

There was no mistaking the voice of Unkar Plutt.

Rey whimpered, intimidated by the angry tone. Quom and Aletha shared yet another look. The two had never really been friends, or even much more than Aletha fixing up Quom every now and then. Yet, there was something about their mutual desire to care for Rey that had brought them together. They need not exchange words to communicate; in one simple glance they had set on their plan.

Aletha began rewrapping Rey’s arms with the fabric, running a soothing hand up and down Rey’s shoulder to relax her. While Aletha did that, Quom very calmly walked to the entrance of the tent and looked for Unkar Plutt.

“Plutt!” Quom called. “She’s over here!”

Unkar Plutt offered no thanks as he barged into the tent, roughly pushing Quom aside as his goons followed in.

“Where have you been?” Plutt demanded of Rey. “You were supposed to be at the stand two hours ago! Do you want to starve?”

“No,” Rey whimpered, looking down.

Aletha’s eyes narrowed, and she took up a protective position at Rey’s side, gripping the top of the chair.

“You don’t need to yell at her, Plutt,” Quom said boldly. “The girl got lost.”

“It’s her own fault,” Plutt said. “I warned her not to go too far. And what business is this of yours, anyway? She’s under my protection.”
“I was bringing her to you when I noticed how badly burnt her arms were,” Quom replied. “I brought her to the doctor so she could get treated.”

“And she was,” Aletha affirmed. Without showing any signs of fear of Plutt, Aletha looked to Rey, “Sunshine, your arms aren’t fully healed, so I want you to come to me every day for the next two weeks, and I’ll reapply the paste. Understood?”

“Uh huh,” Rey nodded. She liked the idea of spending time with Doctor Aletha. She was a very nice lady, and Mommy trusted her, so Rey could too.

“Now wait a minute,” Plutt interrupted. “I’m not having her run up a medical bill I’ll have to pay you.”

“You won’t have to,” Aletha countered. “It’s free.”

“Really?” Plutt didn’t sound convinced.

“Well… not exactly,” Aletha confessed. “When the First Order destroyed my equipment, her mother told me that Rey’s father would be willing to pay for replacement equipment.”

“Did she now?” Plutt sounded too interested and exchanged a suspicious look with his lead goon Roke.

“I’ve got a dozen witnesses who came verify my claim,” Aletha shrugged looking causal, but Quom could see her actions were measured carefully. “I’ve gathered what I can, but there’s still a few things I need that I’ll take him up on. I’ll factor her treatments into our negotiations. Oh, and I’ve given her a bottle of vitamins. She needs to take one every morning. You boys can supervise that.”

Quom took a step back in fear. No one ordered Unkar Plutt around. But every more terrifying was the “pleasant” smile he gave.

“Of course,” Plutt said in a far too jovial voice. “Come on, My Girl. Let’s get you back where you belong. Dirk, drive her home and give her her lunch when you get there.”

“What about her dinner?” Dirk asked, though he was staring back out the tent flap distracted by something shiny.

“Stay with her until then,” Plutt rolled his eyes. “Honestly, sometimes.”

“Come on, Girl!” Roke ordered.

Rey gave a reluctant look at Aletha and Quom. Aletha gave her a false smile and nodded. Rey dry swallowed and recalled a distant memory of her mother telling her to always walk into battle with your head held high. Gripping her bottle of vitamins, Rey found her courage and jumped off the chair.

“Thank you, Doctor Aletha,” Rey called as she scurried over to Dirk. “Thank you, Mister Quom. I’ll see you tomorrow, okay?”

“See you tomorrow, Sunshine,” Aletha smiled, entertained by the innocence of Rey’s youth that yet held a veiled hint of ferocity.

“See you, Miracle Girl,” Quom gave her a wink.

“So,” Dirk said as he and Rey stepped out of the tent. “What is a vitamin?”
Rey just giggled.

“Well, I should go too,” Quom made to exit but found the way blocked by Plutt and Roke.

There was silence as Plutt and Roke stared down Quom and Aletha. With Rey gone, the threat and danger lingered in the air. Plutt wasn’t happy.

“Be careful,” Plutt said simply.

And with that Plutt and Roke were gone.

Aletha and Quom stood in the continued silence.

“We made the right choice, right?” Quom asked, uncertain of his actions.

“Plutt can intimidate me all he wants,” Aletha replied. “I’m not going to let that little girl suffer.”

“You know,” Quom looked slyly at Aletha, “vitamins are really hard to get here on Jakku. You’re really just giving them all to her?”

“She’s a growing girl.”

“Nah, there’s more to this. Come on, giving up your precious stock of vitamins to the girl and free medical care? What’s the deal?”

“Her mother saved me,” Aletha explained. “When that Captain came looking for them, I refused to give them up. The Captain beat me and destroyed my equipment. Rey’s mother—”

“Felicity,” Quom interrupted.

“Felicity,” Aletha nodded, “she put herself between us. She saved me, she made sure I was alright, she provided an opportunity to let me escape, and she promised to reimburse me for my losses. She didn’t have to do any of that. There were dozens of others there that day, and none stepped in to help me. She protected me when no one else would, so I’m going to protect her daughter.”

“You know she’s probably dead, right?”

“Yeah, I figured.”

“Girl thinks she’s coming back. What do we do if she doesn’t?”

“We wait for her father,” Aletha replied. “Apparently his name’s Luke. I’ve got a little phrase to use as a code to identify myself, I think.”

Quom raised a brow, “That phrase wouldn’t happen to be, Thank you. Anytime.”

Aletha raised a brow back, “And how would you know that?”

“Long story short, I accidentally stole her wedding rings,” Quom pulled the cord with them out from under his shirt.

“How do you accidentally steal her wedding rings?”

“Fine, I extorted her, regretted it, and now I’m watching over Rey to pay back my debt.”

“Why don’t you just give the rings back?”
“I’ve tried twice now. At this point, the onus is not on me!”

Aletha chuckled as she walked towards the tent entrance.

“So what do we do now?” Quom asked, following her.

“We wait for this Luke to come back and take care of her until then,” Aletha replied.

“Wait about Plutt? Aren’t you worried he’s going to get a little annoyed about us meddling in what I assume is his meal ticket.”

“Meal ticket?”

“Based on Plutt’s dedication to the girl and the value of Mrs. Felicity Erso’s wedding ring, I’m going to guess that Mr. Luke Erso is pretty well off,” Quom held up Felicity’s engagement ring.

Aletha’s eyes widened at the sight, “Maybe I should think about charging him for Rey’s medical costs.”

“Tell me, Doctor, do you taken insurance in this little backwater outpost?”

“Scavengers,” Aletha shook her head. She held open the tent flap, “Now, go on. You’ve got some ships to scavenge and you’re burning daylight.”

Quom chuckled as he made to pass Aletha, but he suddenly came to a stop.

“What is it?” Aletha asked.

“Take a look,” Quom replied.

Aletha joined Quom outside the tent and stopped short at the sight across the road. Plutt was furiously yelling at his goons, pointing back at her medical tent. They could make out the names Tinadar and Kymeri among his shouting.

“Are you thinking what I’m thinking?” Quom asked.

The Kindness of Strangers

Chapter Summary

On the day of Felicity’s birthday, Aletha and Quom cross a line, and Luke makes a drunken mistake.

Chapter Notes

Fun fact, a lot of this chapter includes things directly from the book Rey’s Survival Guide. It’s actually a really interesting book that gives you the best idea on Rey’s life on Jakku, and I’ve referenced it a few times in the past. In fact, Felicity teaching Rey to disconnect the fuel slug tank and saying, “That stuff’s dangerous” is a direct quote. Check it out if you have the chance.

I AM A HORRIBLE LIAR. THE REUNION WILL NOT BE NEXT CHAPTER! THIS CHAPTER AGAIN GOT TOO BIG AND HAD TO BE SPLIT. IF I DIDN’T FOCUS SO MUCH ON CHARACTER’S FEELINGS AND PROPER DEVELOPMENT, THEN THIS CHAPTER WOULD HAVE BEEN THE ORIGINAL SIZE, BUT I CAN’T JUSTIFY NOT SPLITTING THIS CHAPTER WHEN THERE’S STILL ANOTHER FIVE SCENES THAT HAVE TO HAPPEN BEFORE LUKE CAN SET OFF FOR JAKKU.

Also, the life on Jakku portion got expanded again and now the start of TFA is going to be chapter 26.

I AM VERY SORRY.

The Long Way Home

Chapter Thirteen

The Kindness of Strangers

Dedicated to the lovely Thechosenbibliophile, a constant reviewer who submitted the 100th review.

“What’s the most important danger in the graveyard when scavenging?” Quom quizzed.

“Heat,” Rey automatically answered.

“What are the four things you can do to protect yourself from it?”

“Wear wrappings and sun goggles. Carry much more water than you need. Have replacement parts for your speeder. Leave the site ninety minutes before you think you should.”

“Gold star,” Quom grinned. “Now pass me that wrench.”
It had been two weeks since Quom found her crying, and Rey had spent every day with Quom, or Aletha on the days Quom ventured into the graveyard of ships to scavenge.

“Mister Quom?” Rey had asked the first time Quom had handed off Rey to Aletha. “Why are you going into the ship graveyard? Aren’t you a mechanic?”

“As much as I can be,” Quom had explained. “I only go out to the graveyard about once a month actually. I collect things that need repairs and bring them to my shop to fix up. Most scavengers take what only needs a little tweaking, but I do full restoration. In addition to my projects, sometimes people will bring me items they need fixing before they can sell it. You know, a lot of the stuff in the graveyard just needs a little elbow grease, but most scavengers don’t like thinking long term. When I run out of projects to work on, I go back out.”

“Why don’t you just stay here and get people to bring you stuff all the time?”

“People get really protective about their haul around these parts. They really don’t want to have to pay someone to fix something that either they can fix themselves, or that ends up costing more than they sell it for in the end. I would love it though, if I could get someone to either stay here and fix while I scavenge or vice versa.”

Rey loved spending time with Quom. He reminded her of Uncle Han the way he would get her to help him fix things and teach her all about survival and mechanics.

“How do you identify fuel, MG?” Quom used his nickname for Rey, which was short for Miracle Girl.

“By the colours they leave in the sand,” Rey answered proudly. “Rhydonium is chrome and can be salvaged but don’t touch it with your bare skin. Barium is green, but it’s poisonous so be careful handling it. Rubidium is purple and strontium is red. You see it, you back up. Even breathing them in can kill you.”

“Aletha’s right; you do have a great memory. Keep it up and you could write a book. Rey’s Survival Guide. Sounds like a bestseller.”

Rey laughed.

Although she preferred the company of Quom, Aletha was able to offer Rey something he couldn’t: stories about fighting in the Rebel Alliance. Even better was that Doctor Aletha had no connection to any of the Skywalker family, so she had a huge repertoire of material Rey hadn’t heard from her family or surplus of honorary uncles. It was especially interesting to hear stories about other aerial battles as Aletha’s late husband, Antar Kymeri had been a member of the Tierfon Yellow Aces, a squadron Rey had never even heard of.

Rey loved hearing tales of all the battles Antar fought and the gruesome injuries Aletha had fixed up over the years. There were a few stories Rey wondered if Mommy and Daddy might not want her to hear, but Aletha had never been great with the concept of “maybe you shouldn’t tell the five-year-old the story of how your husband got in a ship crash and had to cut off his own arm to escape and survive.”

Of course, Rey wasn’t great with the concept either and had simply proclaimed, “Daddy has a fake arm too! Except it’s not because it got pinned in a crash and he had to cut it off.”

“Well, what happened then?” Aletha had asked.

“His daddy cut it off.”
Aletha decided to stop asking questions about Rey’s family.

As Rey spent more time with Quom and Aletha, she found herself happy and not thinking about Mommy and Daddy so much. True, she would still leap to her feet every time a ship landed in Niima, but she was crying a lot less. There were even some nights where Rey didn’t feel sad enough to reach out to Daddy in the Force. Still, Rey missed her family and talked about them constantly, but Aletha and Quom were doing a good job of distracting her. It was a happy little arrangement they had come up with.

And one that Unkar Plutt didn’t like.

True, Rey still got her food and rides from him, but Aletha and Quom could sense the danger. It had become rare for them to look over their shoulder and not find one of Plutt’s cronies watching them. Even at times when they didn’t have Rey, Plutt’s men were still there like shadows. They were taking advantage of Quom and Aletha’s services a lot more, even coming in for the most minor of things like a small cut on their finger, or simply needing to turn a device off and back on again.

And they would ask question; lots and lots of questions. Most of them were directed to Rey when she was around. How long have you been here today? Did Doctor Kymeri feed you anything? Did you get that new scarf from Tinadar? What’s he been teaching you? What’s that new bottle of vitamins Kymeri gave you?

The questions for Aletha and Quom were even more intrusive. Why are you teaching her about the graveyard? Where have you taken her? What has she said about her family? Exactly how much does that bottle of vitamins cost? Why were you looking at children’s clothing at Tryvon’s stall yesterday? Has the child been doing anything weird or unusual, like magic tricks?

Plutt’s men hadn’t done anything… yet. It was the yet part that worried Quom and Aletha.

When darkness fell and Rey was long gone back to her walker for the day, they would secretly meet in each other’s tents. It was inconsistent whose place they would go to, as not to establish a pattern for Plutt. Two days at Quom’s, three at Aletha’s, alternate dates for a week, and so forth.

They would discuss Rey and what their plan of action was if something happened. While Rey had continued to hide certain facts from one person over the other, Aletha and Quom had told each other all they knew. Aletha knew about Rey’s walker, while Quom knew that when Aletha had been saved, Phasma had called Rey’s mother Felicity Rhiaon.

Unfortunately, neither of them had been familiar with the name, and didn’t know that she had stolen the Death Star plans (Luke Skywalker being the only name ever thrown around while Aletha was in the Alliance.) Nor did they know that Felicity Rhiaon was the name of Luke Skywalker’s wife, or that Rey was his daughter. Leia’s whole declaration of Rey’s death was not important enough news to reach Jakku, and indeed would not come to Jakku for over a decade.

Many nights Aletha and Quom would try to puzzle out the mystery of the names Erso, Rhiaon, Rey, Luke, Felicity, and Jyn. Eventually they settled on just calling the family Rey, Felicity, and Luke Erso and would change it if there was a new reason.

They had also decided on their plan of action which was to take as best care of Rey as possible without crossing a line with Plutt. This meant that sometimes they had to take a firm stance with Rey. Rey was not allowed to share her food with Aletha and Quom, even when she saw how little they had and how much she did. Rey was not allowed ask them to give her any rides, cook her food, or let her sleepover in their tents. Rey was not allowed to suggest that her parents were going to give the duo any form of compensation, and insisted to her that this all was merely out of the goodness of their hearts.

Rey had been very confused by that one as she recalled Quom’s speech about how people on Jakku couldn’t do any such thing.

So with Plutt’s minions watching their every move, Aletha and Quom walked a tightrope to take care of Rey without upsetting Plutt. But here’s the thing about tightropes; no matter how good of an acrobat you are, you can’t walk one forever. Eventually, you will lose your balance and fall.

And ironically, it was a fall that did them in.

He should have been watching her more carefully, Quom chastised himself. In fact, he probably should have just sent her to Aletha that day. Rey was too curious for her own good. Quom had turned his back for one minute, just one minute.

Quom had been working on his speeder, a TS-742 that had always given him problems over the years. Rey had proclaimed his speeder was like her uncle’s ship, it kept breaking but Quom loved it so much that he would somehow patch the problem temporarily and leave the worry for another day.

It had stopped working yet again and Quom was doing a deep repair. Many parts were laid out on the floor of his workshop – many sharp parts – and he was too focused on his repairs to notice Rey. The accident was inevitable.

A loud shriek made Quom slam his head against the popped hood of the speeder and he spun around frantically to see the crying Rey. She was clutching her bloody knee, ripped open by a deep gash from something sharp she had tripped on. He immediately scooped her into his arms and made a beeline for Aletha’s tent.

“Quom’s got you, MG. Don’t cry,” Quom assured Rey as he ran through the town, eyes following him as they sought the source of the wailing. He had no time to think about the number of those eyes belonging to Plutt’s minions.

Aletha was tending to what she suspected to be a self-inflicted wound on Roke when Quom burst into her tent.

“Doc, you gotta help me!” Quom exclaimed as Rey cried in his arms.

“Put her on the cot,” Aletha was immediately on her feet. Rummaging through her drawers, Aletha asked, “What happened?”

“I was fixing my speeder and she cut herself on a part,” Quom explained as he set Rey down on the cot in the back of the tent that served as both surgery bed and Aletha’s own sleeping area.

Roke said nothing as he sat in his chair, lightly clutching the “injury” on his left arm. Observing the scene with a measured expression, Roke’s eyes felt like they were burning in Aletha’s back as she scrambled to fix Rey’s wound.

“This is really deep,” Aletha frowned as she put some rubbing alcohol on a cloth. “Hold still, Sunshine. This is going to hurt.”

Sharing a look with Aletha, Quom understood that Rey might lash out when Aletha put the cloth on her knee. Being in such a desolate place, medicine typically tended to be more of the makeshift/natural remedy/battlefield operation/frontier variety. Quom knew from experience that the alcohol Aletha used to clean wounds hurt twice as much as the more diluted solutions found in more civilized places, and with a gash that bad, Rey was going to hurt like hell.
Standing behind her, Quom wrapped his arms around Rey in a pseudo hug. The gesture was comforting with its outward appearance, but Quom gripped Rey firmly enough to restrain her from hurting Aletha.

“Be a good girl for the doctor, MG,” Quom cautioned Rey.

Sure enough, when the cloth met skin a piercing scream ripped through the tent and Rey jerked violently in Quom’s grasp. Having plenty of muscle on her, Quom was able to hold her back, pulling her away every time a limb got too close to Aletha. He stroked Rey’s hair and whispered comforting words in her ear, but she sobbed hard as the stinging pain shot through her body.

Aletha was resolute as ever, unphased by Rey’s actions. For someone who had once performed an impromptu appendectomy literally in the middle of a crossfire, putting some rubbing alcohol on a little girl’s knee was nothing.

“Just a few more seconds… There!” Aletha declared as she pulled away the cloth and grabbed the roll of bandages on the table. Wrapping up Rey’s wound, Aletha smiled and asked, “That wasn’t so bad, was it?”

Rey just sniffled.

“You’re a brave girl,” Quom praised. “Just like your Mom.”

That got a smile out of Rey.

“She gonna be okay?” Roke asked, reminding everyone of his presence. “Plutt isn’t going to be happy if you damaged his merchandise.”

Aletha narrowed her eyes at Roke’s cruel label, “She’ll be fine in the morning, but she needs to stay off her feet for the rest of the night. I suggest you take her home, otherwise she may aggravate the wound and develop more permanent injuries. The cut got very close to her tendon.”

Roke chuckled, “I can run it by Plutt, but I can already tell you that the answer’s going to be no. He likes his people in town during the busy periods. I don’t think he’d even send Dirk off mid-day.”

“Call him,” Quom challenged.

“Excuse me?”

“Call him. If he’s so determined to protect his… Quom couldn’t bring himself to call Rey merchandise, “…ward, then he’ll send her home. Call him.”

“Yes, call him,” Aletha smirked at Roke.

Roke looked in surprise between the two who dared to stand up to Plutt. He thought about it for a minute, then smiled and exited the tent.

As they listened to the vague arguing over Roke’s com outside, Aletha and Quom shared a look. Aletha nodded at Quom, and Quom nodded back before giving Rey’s shoulder a pat. They knew that they were about to do something very dangerous, but they would stand together as they did it.

After about twenty minutes, the voices outside stopped and Roke walked back into the tent, ready to deliver the verdict.

“Well?” Aletha pressed.
“Plutt says no,” Roke answered. “The girl’s going home at the regular time.”

“Did you tell him that if she doesn’t go home and rest that she could develop further injuries?”

“He said that if that happened, you and him can press her dad into paying more.”

“Are you kidding me?” Quom was disgusted. “He’d mess up this kid’s life to get more money?”

Roke smirked, “You have met Unkar Plutt, haven’t you?”

Quom gritted his teeth, resolving to make the dangerous and difficult decision he had to. He remembered how pale and dead Rey looked when he first came across her. He remembered how desperate and upset her mother was, and how much Felicity Erso had sacrificed to reunite her family. He had made a promise to help Rey when she needed it, and now was the time to pay back the debt he owed the Erso family. Even if that meant crossing Unkar Plutt and risking not only his food source, but his very life.

“Doc, can MG walk?” Quom asked sending her a significant look.

Aletha was silent for a moment as she processed the implications of Quom’s question.

“I’d rather she be carried and stay off her feet for the rest of the day,” Aletha answered, her tone sending the unspoken message to be careful.

“Alright,” Quom scooped Rey into his arms. “Let’s go, MG.”

“What are you doing?” Roke snapped.

“Well, if you’re not going to take her home, then I will,” Quom replied, staring at Roke with a look that said just try and take her from me. “Now, get out of my way.”

“Plutt’s not going to be happy about this,”

“Good thing I don’t care.”

“You take that girl home, and Plutt’s not giving her food tonight.”

Rey looked up and Quom fearfully, “Mister Quom-”

“It’s okay, Sunshine,” Aletha said, pulling a ration packet out of a drawer. It was one of her emergency stash. “Take this.”

Quom shifted Rey into the crook of his massive left arm and held up his right. Aletha tossed the ration to him, and he impressively caught it without dropping Rey.

“There,” Aletha declared. “Food and a ride. I sent some medical supplies with her the other day, so you should have bandages if they need to be changed. Do you need anything else?”

“Just for Roke to get out of my way,” Quom replied. He looked to Roke, “You going to cooperate?”

Roke looked between the pair a few times. The silence was terrifying as Roke processed the fact that Aletha and Quom had outright challenged and defied Unkar Plutt. He met their eyes multiple times as if waiting for one to crack. But the strength in their eyes did not fail, and in fact it seemed to increase. They weren’t going to back, consequences be damned.

“Alright,” Roke chuckled and surprised them by stepping aside. “If you’re sure.”
“Positive,” Quom pushed past Roke. He instructed Rey, “Say goodbye to the doctor, MG.”

“Bye, Doctor Aletha!” Rey called innocent to the dangerous situation formulating around her.

“Bye, Sunshine,” Aletha gave a false smile as Quom carried Rey off.

In a minute, they were gone.

Roke and Aletha said nothing as they stood there unmoving, waiting to see who made the first move. Aletha knew that she had just sealed her fate by committing the worst offence against Plutt possible: she had provided Rey with food. With Quom, she had challenged Plutt’s claim of reward from Luke Erso.

She looked Roke dead in the eye.

“I won’t hesitate to do it again,” Aletha avowed in a measured voice.

Roke gave a dark laugh, “Perfect.”

Quom probably pushed his luck by not only driving his barely repaired speeder out to Rey’s walker, but also by staying with her in it the rest of the day. The walker had changed slightly since the last time he had been there, but he couldn’t help but stay there. As much as Felicity Erso had tried to make the walker into a home, it was so lonely and he couldn’t bear leaving Rey alone in it.

Rey was ecstatic to show Quom her home. She showed him her hammock and her doll. She showed him her tally marks and proudly proclaimed that she was doing it for her Mommy. She showed him the parts of the walker she had explored and Quom checked through everything eliminating dangers Rey and her mother had overlooked. When it came to identifying dangers in the structure of a walker, Felicity Rhiaon may have been an architect but Quom Tinadar was a scavenger.

Quom was impressed with the presence of mind Rey demonstrated to him. She refused to divulge any secret stashes or even let him look in the duffle bag at the contents Felicity had once used to barter Rey’s life for with him. Even after he pointed that out, Rey still wouldn’t let him look inside.

He was a little disappointed as he had wanted to ask her about something he had seen in it that had been gnawing at his mind. Two silver tubes with buttons on the side that made Felicity Erso tense up when he touched them. Oh well, maybe some mysteries weren’t meant to be solved.

As much as he enjoyed spending time with Rey in her walker, it eventually started to get dark.

“I should get going,” Quom declared.

“What?” Rey’s eyes went wide. “You’re leaving now?”

“I have to, MG. It’s too dangerous to drive when it’s dark.”

“I just thought, maybe…” Rey trailed off, looking down at the sand guiltily.

“What?” Quom asked.

Rey took a deep breath, “Mister Quom, can you stay with me tonight?”

Quom was shocked, “What? Stay with you? No, I couldn’t-”

“It’s scary at night and… And I get sad and lonely. I thought maybe if you were around, I wouldn’t Damn it. Rey’s eyes were filled with shame and tears and she looked so cutely pathetically. It wasn’t fair to Quom! He was already in so much trouble with Plutt, but staying overnight was taking it to a whole new level. And yet she look so damn cute and sad, how could he possibly say no?

Quom didn’t know what had brought Rey to Jakku. He didn’t know why the First Order was after them so much. He didn’t know why she was separated from her father or what was taking Luke Erso so damn long to get there. He didn’t know why death had been the only answer for Felicity Erso. He didn’t know what had happened to this innocent little girl, but he knew something bad had happened.

He had suspected for a while that Rey may have had a mild case of PTSD from whatever happened to her. There had been many times Quom had said something off hand only for Rey to suddenly go reeling into some horrifying memory he struggled to calm her down from. Yet, despite all the blanks that needed to be filled in, Quom had uncovered one answer.

"A nice house with a bed where you can sleep safe and sound?" Quom had asked all those weeks ago.

Rey shut her eyes tight and grabbed her head.

Quom sighed, “You know, you’re lucky you’re cute.”

Rey giggled, “I know.”

“Hey, don’t let it get to your head. You’re only cute for a human. You should see Vrogem children. Now come on, MG, let’s get you to bed.”

Quom took great care as he tucked Rey into the hammock. She seemed a lot calmer than normal, the usual sad look behind her eyes all but disappeared. He told Rey a story of one of his scavenging adventures, and settled down on the piece of panelling that Felicity had used for a bed.

He ended up falling asleep before Rey, but she didn’t mind. She was so relaxed by the thought that she could fall asleep knowing there was someone to protect her, and soon she had drifted off to sleep herself.

Though she didn’t realise it, that night she didn’t reach out to her father in the Force.

Luke had done some terrible things since the death of his wife and child. He had abandoned all responsibilities and fled into the night like a coward. He had walked away from his family and friends without so much a word. He had banished his mentors from contacting them, blaming them for failures they couldn’t fix. He had spent every waking moment in the last nearly three months getting drunk as a means to forget his pain. He had tortured himself by watching over and over again the footage of his wife getting shot in the head.

And yet, despite it all, Luke Skywalker had not yet hit rock bottom.
The night Quom stayed with Rey in her walker had actually been the day of Felicity Rhiaon’s forty-first birthday. Rey had no way of realising this fact, but Luke could not let himself forget.

Felicity had never been one for grandiose birthday celebrations. A Felicity Rhiaon birthday mainly consisted of a few presents in the morning and a com call with birthday greetings from Mon Mothma, the Damerons, and her friends in the Emissary Office. Diego, Han, Leia, and Chewbacca would come to Rornian for a visit. Lando would join them too, but it wasn’t so much that Felicity wanted him there as Lando never passed up an opportunity to come to Rornian to see Alyla and get a free meal. Felicity would try to go to work as normal, only to be dragged off by her friends to some simple activity like spending the day at the lake. The group plus a handful of Jedi Felicity was close to would have a nice dinner together, and then Leia and Han would take Ben and Rey for the night so Luke and Felicity could have an uninterrupted night of lovemaking.

That was probably one of the harder missing points for Luke that night. It had been almost four months since Felicity had been shot, and nearly seven since he had made love to her. At first his mourning had been focused on the general thought of living without her. Eventually it turned to more specific thoughts like never sleeping next to her, never kissing her, never having another child with her, never dancing with her, never stargazing with her, never comforting her while she cried, or never intimidating Rey’s first boyfriend (or girlfriend) with her. He, Felicity, and Han literally had a file folder filled with ideas on how to mess with Rey’s significant other should Rey even pursue a romantic relationship with someone.

But all of that had been focused on missing their emotional and romantic relationship, it was only when the shock had faded away and living without Felicity normalized that Luke suddenly was starting to deal with losing their physical relationship. Sure, he had thought about the fact that he would never get to make love to her again, but it was the first time he was struggling with craving it. And so, on the night of Felicity’s birthday, Luke found himself facing an unexpected question. How was he supposed to handle moments of lust when his wife was dead? Even worse, what was he supposed to do when that lust centered around thoughts of her? Was it wrong to feel that way? To think of her in that way? To center his thoughts on the physical attributes of hers he loved? Would doing something to… alleviate those urges dishonour Felicity’s memory? Of course, Luke would never take some other woman to bed to deal with the situation, but there were other things he could do.

Luke really had to stop this train of thought.

After a few drinks in, Luke called it an early night and tried to go to bed. Yet as he lay in bed, once again desperate to sleep, he found something odd. For the first time in nearly a month, Luke didn’t get the image of Rey in the desert begging him to come back.

Did that meant he was healing? No, nothing had changed since the previous night. In fact, with the painful reminder of Felicity’s birthday, Luke’s sorrow had probably increased in the last day cycle.

He tossed and turned for hours, struggling to get to sleep, but he couldn’t without the strange urges from the equally strange visions. Eventually, Luke gave up; he couldn’t sleep so he might as well go downstairs back to the bar and have a few more drinks.

No bothering to throw on his hooded cloak, Luke returned to the bar. He ordered a drink, his famous features broadcasting his identity to all the patrons. As his drink was placed in front of him, Luke threw it back in one go, not caring if anyone recognized him.
But as he set down his glass, he was surprised to find someone he recognized.

Luke blinked a few times, confused and stunned at the figure sitting by herself at a booth in the corner. Pale skin, petite stature, hazel eyes, angular facial lines, straight brown hair that fell a little ways past her shoulders, and the right corner of her mouth quirked in an irresistible smirk. Luke would know that face anywhere.

“Felicity,” Luke whispered as he stared at the woman who unmistakeably looked like his wife. “It can’t be. It’s impossible. It can’t be her.”

And Luke was right, it wasn’t her. True, the woman did look identical to Felicity Rhiaon in a genuinely terrifying case of doppelgängers, but it wasn’t her. It took Luke’s alcohol riddled brain several minutes to realize that the woman didn’t look like a forty-one-year-old Felicity Rhiaon, but rather a thirty-one-year-old Felicity Rhiaon, exactly like how Luke first met her.

Luke sighed, chastising himself for daring to hope. It hadn’t been the first time we thought he saw Felicity or Rey wandering around. The sight of brunette females had been tricking Luke for months. He had long last track of how many times he had embarrassed himself by running up to some strange woman thinking she was his wife. Even worse were the times he had approached little girls he mistook as Rey.

He turned away from Felicity’s double, ordered another drink. But it was too late, he had drawn the attention of the woman.

“Excuse me,” the woman approached Luke. “I don’t mean to interrupt, but I noticed you were looking at me.”

“Oh, yes,” Luke cleared his throat, looking away from the familiar face. He was slightly relieved to find that the woman’s voice didn’t sound identical to Felicity… although it was a little similar. “I’m sorry, I thought you looked like someone I know. Sorry for interrupting you.”

“You didn’t,” the woman had a grin that held a secret. “You’re Luke Skywalker, aren’t you?”

“Don’t worry,” the woman said. “I won’t tell anyone it’s you or that you’re here, I just am honored to meet you if you are. As in, you have no idea how much I’ve always wanted to meet you.”

“I guess there’s no point in hiding it,” Luke chuckled. He had always been amused when he met a fan. “Yes, I’m Luke Skywalker. And you are?”

“Sienna Ternan,” the woman replied, settling in the chair next to Luke. “So this woman you thought I was… that was Felicity Rhiaon?”

Luke gave a sad sigh, “Yeah, but uh… I knew it was impossible.”

“Don’t worry,” Sienna patted his hand in a comforting gesture, “it’s certainly not the first time. Ever since she came into the spotlight, I’ve had people constantly mistaking me for her. It’s actually gotten really uncomfortable lately with having to explain to people that no, I’m not Felicity Rhiaon who secretly faked her death.”

Luke was silent.

Sienna bit her lip, “I’m sorry for your loss. From what I heard, she was a wonderful woman.”
“She was,” Luke looked away, wiping a tear from his eye.

Sienna was quiet for a few moments, wrestling with her next words.

“Uh, Master Skywalker?” Sienna asked.

“Luke,” Sienna smiled. “I know it’s kind of embarrassing, and you probably get asked this all the time... but, can I take a picture with you?”

“A picture?” Luke repeated in surprise. It certainly wasn’t the first person to ask him that, but it was very unexpected for the situation.

“It’s stupid, but my friends and I have this sort of game,” Sienna explained. “Since I get mistaken so much for Felicity Rhiaon, and people actually ask for pictures with me, we started trying to find ways for me to meet and get a picture with different people who know- well... knew her.”

“You’re kidding?” Luke was surprised to find himself grinning. There was something so innocent and undemanding about the way she was speaking with him. She wasn’t like so many others who wanted to talk about nothing but his loss, but rather just talk about something fun.

“Yeah, we have this list of people associated with her, and we ranked them. Every picture that person arranges, you get a certain amount of points. After Felicity herself, you are obviously the highest ranked person. I’ve been trying to pull ahead in the points with my friends for years, but they’re much better at tracking your people down.”

Luke chuckled, “Who all have you met?”

“Loads. Mostly Rebels and Senators. But there’s been Admiral Akbar, her ex-fiancé, Pax, there was Diego Nalto, Nils Arlos, Lando Calrissian, and a few Jedi even. I’m surprised you haven’t heard about it.”

“To be honest, someone probably mentioned it in passing,” Luke shrugged. “So how many points am I worth?”

“500. Felicity was 1000. I’m currently at 347 points. My buddy, Eran’s at 738. I’d love to pull ahead, and also just have proof that I met, well, Luke freaking Skywalker himself.”

The smile on Luke’s face froze as an unwanted memory pushed to the forefront of his mind. A memory of the conversation that had pushed Luke and Felicity from people acquaintances to friends.

"So, you knew Shara too?" Felicity said at the funeral of Shara Bey. "Or are you here because you're well... Luke freaking Skywalker and can pretty much freely attend any Rebellion affiliated event you want?"

Luke chuckled, "As true as that may be, I actually did know Shara. In fact, her last mission with the Rebellion was helping me track down a Force Sensitive tree."

Felicity raised a brow, "A Force Sensitive tree? You're joking right?"

"Why would I joke about that?"

"Come on!" Felicity laughed. "It's hard enough to believe in the Force on its own, but now you're asking me to believe there are trees that are 'one with the Force?'"
Luke then recalled Felicity's speech at the Tenth Anniversary Celebration of the Battle of Yavin where they met, "You don't believe in the Force?"

"I believe it to an extent," Felicity admitted. "I believe you personally can sense people's emotions and move things with your mind, but the whole destiny aspect is where you lose me. There's no mystical force that decides my fate, and if there is – after everything it's taken from me – I want nothing to do with it."

Luke swallowed hard. He had to stop thinking about her. He had to stop thinking about how Felicity had ultimately been right about not wanting anything to do with a mystical force that takes everything one loves away from them.

And he had to stop thinking about how much Sienna looked like Felicity.

“Are you okay?” Sienna asked.

“Good. So where are we on that picture? You in?”

Luke grinned, “Only if you buy the next round.”

“Deal,” Sienna signalled to the bartender.

They had the bartender tended take the picture using Sienna’s tablet, and Luke had her join him in the next round of drinks… and the next… and the next. Luke found it very easy to losing himself in conversation with Sienna. It was probably from how much she looked like Felicity, and how much alcohol they were consuming. They had long lost track of how many drinks they had, each offering to buy the other just one more.

And that was how Luke spent his wife’s forty-first birthday. Lonely, missing the visions Rey would send him, unable to sleep, drinking copious amounts of alcohol, desiring to make love to Felicity once more, and chatting it up with a woman who looked identical to her.

It was a recipe for disaster.

“You know what I don’t get,” Sienna’s loud words were slurred. She and Luke were away past the point of no return level of drunk. To be honest, it was very surprising that neither of them had passed out. “Why the heck did it take you so long to get married?”

“Because I have very bad luck with women,” Luke chuckled. Both had lost their inhibitions on topics of conversation. Luke was so far gone, he probably would have regaled Sienna with a play-by-play of Rey’s conception if she asked. “I dated a lot of attention-seeking drama queens, and people who wanted my money. I even had one girlfriend, Calla, who was just flat out insane. When I got engaged to Felicity, Calla took out a hit on my sister.”

“You’re joking.”

“I am dead serious. But it wasn’t all my fault. My brother and sister apparently actually used to chase off any girl they thought wasn’t worthy of me.”

“Well, what made Felicity so worthy?” Sienna asked.

“Because it wasn’t just about being a romantic couple,” Luke said, gulping down another drink.
“That’s the secret to finding a good relationship. To making it work. Felicity and I are friends first, partners second, and lovers third. That’s my advice to you, young Padawan. Marry your best friend… or second best friend. I didn’t marry my best friend, Han. He married my sister after knocking her up in an Ewok village.”

Sienna burst out laughing, laughing harder and louder than what was appropriate.

“But that doesn’t mean that because she was my lover third, that she wasn’t a good lover,” Luke chuckled to himself. “As smart and intelligent and independent and loyal and passionate and smart and athletic and creative and smart and funny and caring and smart as she was… that woman had one hell of a body, and by God did she know how to use it. Oh, and she was smart. I think I forgot to say that.”

“You know, I don’t think I’m allowed to say she was pretty without looking arrogant,” Sienna smiled. “Do I really look like her?”

“Too much. You have no idea how many times I kept thinking you’re her and having to stop myself from doing something to you… I’m sorry. I don’t mean to be creepy. I promise I’m not going to try anything.”

“That’s ok… You don’t seem like you’d do something like that. Besides, we barely can stay on our bar stools. I think if you jumped on me, we’d both fall down.”

“Most likely,” Luke grabbed Sienna’s arm as she tipped precariously to the side.

Sienna laughed as Luke brought her upright, but he didn’t let go of her arm.

“So, she was attractive?” Sienna asked.

“I wish I can find someone who thought I was the most beautiful woman in the galaxy.”

“Well, considering how much you look like the woman I think deserves that title, I think you get at least half points from me.”

“Man, if you were like five years younger and unmarried, I probably would try something with you.”

“So that wasn’t your original intention when you can to talk to me?” Luke teased.

“I’m just after a picture and freeze booze,” Sienna laughed as the bartender refilled their glasses. “I guess I just need to find your doppelgänger.”

“If you do, promise to send me a wedding invite.”

“I will take that up on you, good sir!” Sienna downed her drink in time Luke. “So… tell me, what feature did you like most about her… or us I guess.”

“Her hair,” Luke admitted. “I think I’ve always had a thing for hair. Probably some strange incestuous thing considering how nice the hair is in my family. But I am not going down the road of incest… again.”

Sienna giggled again… she was definitely a happy drunk.

“But Felicity’s hair was just so long and soft and just the right shade of brown,” Luke had a faraway look in his eyes. “She usually just threw it in a bun, especially during formal events. My favorite part was undoing her hair tie and it cascading down her shoulders.”

Sienna unconsciously tucked back a lock of her hair.

“Or when it fanned out around her on the bed as I laid atop, making love to her,” Luke continued, losing himself in memories. “Her expressive hazel eyes squeezed shut, her mouth hanging open in ecstasy. Those soft, sweet lips that I could just kiss all day. The way the taste lingers on my tongue.”

Sienna licked her lips.

“And her legs,” Luke chuckled. “Smooth and muscular. I miss the way they wrapped around my hips. I miss trailing my lips from calf to thigh, her moans getting louder as she squirmed in expectation.”

Sienna squirmed as she crossed her legs.

“I wish… I wish I could make love to her one last time. Kiss her. Touch her. Taste her. Make her call my name. Love her until she bucked against me and-”

Sienna’s lips were on his.

“I don’t know,” Sienna look genuinely embarrassed. “I just got lost in what you were saying and wondering how all those incredible things would feel. I didn’t mean to. I promise.”

“I believe you,” Luke said. “Look, I can’t deny the fact that I’m extremely attracted to you. How could I not be when you look so much like her? But that’s why I can’t do this. It wouldn’t be because I wanted you, it would be because I want her… God, I want her so much.”

Sienna looked down and considered her words. She was a sensible woman who had just wanted a picture with Luke Skywalker, but in the fog of alcohol and lust it had taken an abrupt turn. She couldn’t deny the fact that in that moment, she wanted Luke Skywalker. Not for bragging rights, not for fulfilling her teenage fantasies, but simply because she wanted to be touched the way he had described. And because this nice man had had his heart broke so terribly, and she wanted to make him feel happy again.

Then Sienna said something that she would spend the rest of her life hating herself for saying.

“What if you could have her?” Sienna asked.

Luke’s eyes met Sienna’s and he understood.

“No, I couldn’t,” Luke said, hating that a part of him liked the idea. “I couldn’t do that to you or her.”

“I wouldn’t tell anyone.”

“That’s not why I’m saying no.”

“Then why? You want her but you can’t have her. But you can have me, the closest approximation to her. Look, I don’t care what goes through your head. I don’t care if you call me her name, or pretend that I’m her. Let me help you. Let me give you closure. Luke… let me be her.”

Luke closed his eyes and kissed Sienna.
“Sienna,” Luke whispered as he pulled back for air.

“Felicity,” Sienna urged.

It was just a horrible set of factors that caused Luke to do it. Too much alcohol, too much sorrow, too much resemblance, too painful a day, and too much unbridled lust.

He kissed her as if he were kissing Felicity. Sure, it wasn’t the same, Sienna not knowing how Felicity would kiss him, and uttering a different set of moans, but it was close enough. As his lips moved along her jaw and down her neck, Luke could pretend for a moment that he had his wife again. And beneath the fuzz of the alcohol, he fully intended on ending this in his room.

Luke’s hands wrapped around her waist and pulled her off the bar. His lips ran across her neck as he began to lead her to the stairs to his room.

“Oh, Luke,” Sienna giggled as his scruffy facial hair pleasurable scratched against her neck. “I love your beard.”

It was like someone threw a bucket of ice water over his head.

Luke reeled back from Sienna, regaining his senses immediately. She liked his beard? The beard that Felicity had hated so much she refused to sleep with him, as in literally moving into the guest room to not share her bed with him?

The woman he was kissing was not Felicity and never could be. We was using some strange girl as a proxy for his dead wife. He was dishonouring this girl, he was dishonouring his wife, and he was dishonouring himself.

“I… I’m sorry, Sienna,” Luke said. “It was nice meeting you.”

Luke turned and went back up to his room alone. He threw himself on his bed and cried.

“I’m sorry, Felicity!” Luke begged into the Force. “I’m so sorry!”

A vision overtook his mind of Felicity curled up in the corner of a small room, crying hysterically into her hands.

On the night of Felicity’s forty-first birthday, filling with regret and drunk off his ass, Luke Skywalker cried himself to sleep.

The next morning, Luke found a holo recording disc slipped under his door. He was surprised to turn it on and find the recording of an extremely guilty Sienna Ternan.

“Luke, I left the inn this morning but I wanted you to know that I’m so sorry about last night,” Sienna’s recording said. “I didn’t mean for it to happen, and I’m sorry for even suggesting pretending to be her, much less actually going through with it. Thanks again for the picture, and I wish you the best of luck in your travels. Goodbye and may the Force be with you.”

The recording flicked off and Luke smiled. Faults and all, Sienna Ternan appeared to be a genuinely nice girl. He hoped someday she’d find that Luke Skywalker doppelgänger.

So with a half smile on his face, Luke Skywalker packed up his room and moved on to the next planet.
The sun was just barely beginning to shine on Jakku, but Niima Outpost was already alive with the activities of Unkar Plutt and his minions. Crowding around the concession stand, they waited for Roke to return with his report.

“Well?” Unkar Plutt demanded as Roke approached.

“Confirmed,” Roke reported. “Tinadar didn’t come home last night. He gave the girl a ride and spent the night with her.”

“And Kymeri gave her food?”

“A ration packet. Tinadar probably cooked it for the kid.”

“Well, then, it seems we have a problem to deal with. Roke, take a few of the men to the walker to deal with Tinadar,” Plutt ordered.

“And the doctor?” Roke asked.

“I’ll deal with her myself,” Plutt grinned. “And when you’re done with Tinadar, bring him to the doctor’s. I think it’s time we three had a chat.”

Quom Tinadar was aware of the figure standing over him before he had even fully woken up. It took him a few moments to remember why he was sleeping on a piece of panelling in Rey Erso’s walker, but when he opened his eyes and saw Roke, it all came rushing back.
“Good morning,” Roke grinned, backed by four others of Unkar Plutt’s goons.

Panicked, Quom tried to jump to his feet, only for Roke to step on his chest, pinning him to the ground.

“Mister Quom?” a whimper came from Rey’s hammock. She was clutching her pilot doll, curled up, making the tiniest ball she could. Rey whispered as if she could magically make only Quom hear her words, “What’s going on?”

“And good morning to you, too,” Roke turned to Rey with a smile she knew meant no good. “Did you sleep well with Tinadar here last night?”

Rey gave a reluctant nod.

“Good,” Roke’s toothy grin was truly terrifying. “Now get a move on! Dirk’s taking you to the Outpost to have breakfast this morning.”

“What about Mister Quom?” Rey dared to ask.

“We have some… business to take care of.”

Quom didn’t like the look in Roke’s eyes.

Rey looked fearfully at Quom, “But—”

“MOVE!” Roke roared.

Rey clumsily scampered out of the hammock and hid herself behind Dirk’s legs.

“Dirk,” Roke shot a look at the goon.

Dirk grabbed Rey’s hand and lead her out of the tent, “I really like your doll. Where’d you get it?”

“Mommy made it,” Rey answered.

“That’s so cool! Do you think she could make me something?”

“I can ask her when she gets back.”

“Cool! I want an acklay.”

Pinned down by Roke, Quom listened nervously as a speeder started up and Rey and Dirk’s voices became more distant. No one said a word, the tension inside the walker building as Roke stared at the entrance of the walker… waiting.

And then the voices were gone.

“Take him!”

Quom didn’t have time to get away. The second Roke moved his foot, two goons grabbed Quom under his armpits and hauled him up. Quom tried to jerk from their grasp but the third goon slammed a fist into Quom’s face. Going limp in their arms, the goons forcibly dragged him out of the walker into the lonely desert.
Roke followed them, observing the situation clinically like he was a member of corporate upper management in Unkar Plutt Rations Incorporated. He was willing to let the other goons do the dirty work… until they threw Quom on the ground.

They beat him. A flurry of fists and kicks pounding his flesh. Eight arms and nine legs – Plutt’s goons were a diverse set of creatures – doing all they could to inflict as much pain on Quom as possible.

He tried to fight back, but there were four of them, each with at least a hundred pounds of muscle on him. Quom didn’t stand a chance. All he saw was hate, limbs, and spots of black. And he felt was unbelievable, unending pain. All he tasted was blood, dust, and sand. All he heard were his own screams. And all he smelt was… well, he was getting beaten in a desert, there honestly wasn’t much to smell.

It felt like it went on for hours, though admittedly Quom’s beating probably only lasted sixty minutes at the most. But it did cease, and when it did, Quom lay before them, a mess, unable to move, unable to do anything but moan in pain looking pathetic.

After an embarrassing stretch of time as the goons mocked and watched his humiliation, Roke gave a chuckle.

“Don’t get too comfortable, Tinadar,” Roke warned. “We’re not done yet.”

Quom was suddenly hoisted up by two of the goons. They dragged Quom to his own speeder – theirs having been taken by Dirk and Rey – and threw Quom into the backseat.

“Come on, Tinadar,” Roke climbed into the pilot’s seat. “We have to go see the doctor.”

Aletha was doing her weekly inventory when Unkar Plutt and a few of his goons walked into her tent. She tensed at the sight of them. It wasn’t their appearance that surprised her – she had been waiting for this since she and Quom dared to defy Plutt – but she was surprised when they starting hauling into her tent brand new, extremely expensive medical equipment.

“What’s this?” Aletha demanded. She was standing straight and slightly puffing out her chest to show she was standing her ground and that Plutt didn’t scare her.

“I’ve thought very hard about the offer Rey’s mother made you, and thought I’d help out,” Plutt explained. “I got you everything needed to replace what the First Order destroyed, so when her father comes he can just pay me for it rather than you having to go through all that hassle.”

“Is that so?” Aletha arched a brow. Observing her new equipment, she knew Plutt had bought many things she hadn’t originally possessed.

“I bought all the best equipment-”

“You mean the most expensive.

Plutt grinned, “Is there a difference?”

Aletha didn’t dignify a response, “I appreciate the gesture, Plutt, but I’m afraid this isn’t necessary. I can deal with her father myself, and besides, I’ve already obtained most of what I need.”

“Yeah… about that.”
Plutt snapped his fingers.

Aletha shrieked when one goon grabbed her by the waist, restraining her as the rest began smashing and destroying her old inventory.

“No! Stop!” Aletha screamed, struggling in the goon’s grasp. She cried out as the goon suddenly threw her to the ground and started beating her.

“That’s enough,” Plutt ordered after several minutes, though Aletha’s beating did not endure nearly as long as Quom’s. “The doctor has a patient to attend to.”

Four of Plutt’s men entered the tent, and Quom was suddenly thrown next to Aletha. Both of them were beaten and bloody, but Quom looked like he could barely move.

“Doc,” Quom moaned. “You okay?”

“It’s okay, Quom,” Aletha assured him. “We both knew what we were signing up for.”

“I know. And you know what’s funny?”

“What?”

“I’d do it again in a heartbeat.”

Aletha smiled and grabbed Quom’s hand, “Me too.”

Both were met with a swift kick to the face.

“Worth it,” Quom grinned.

The goons grabbed Quom and Aletha and sat them on Aletha’s cot. Plutt pulled up a chair across from them, his bulbous mass threatening to fracture it into kindling. His goons lined up behind him, forming a menacing wall of muscle.

“We have a problem,” Plutt began. “And that problem is the girl.”

Aletha sighed, “Plutt-”

“Quiet!” Plutt snapped. “I think you two misunderstand the situation. That girl is not yours to take care of. Sure, entertain her, keep an eye on her, give her lessons, give her free medical care even. But you do not give her food.”

Plutt’s burning eyes locked with Aletha’s.

She did not look away.

“You do not give her rides,” Plutt looked to Quom.

Quom did not look away.

“You don’t give her clothing. You don’t give her water. And you sure as hell don’t sleep at her feet like a hothead dog!”

“Hey!” Quom snapped at the Vrogem slur.

“In case you forget, her mother made a deal with me. Me!” Plutt roared. “Not either of you. I am her protector and provider! I am the one to watch out for her! I am the one to keep her alive!”

“And what about comfortable?” Aletha challenged. “What about happy? That girl is heartbroken and lonely!”

“I don’t give a damn,” Plutt replied. “Her mother told me to keep her fed, clothed, hydrated, safe, and distracted. I didn’t agree to entertained or happy or wipe her tears at night. It is not my fault that the girl is heartbroken and lonely. It’s the fault of the mother who abandoned her.”

“Hey!” Quom snapped.

A ripple of indignation shot through Quom and Aletha. Plutt may have witnessed the moment Felicity Erso left her child, but they had been witnesses to how destroyed she had been by that decision.

“How dare you?” Aletha whispered, unable to say anything more.

“We all know that her mother is dead,” Plutt continued. “No doubt the First Order put a bolt through her temple the first chance they had. But you know who isn’t dead? Her father. Now, if you haven’t guessed yet, her father is a very rich man. One whom I plan to take full advantage of. If I have to take care of his brat, I’m going to get my money’s worth. But imagine what will happen if he comes here and the girl tells him, ‘No, Unkar Plutt didn’t take care of me. Aletha Kymeri and Quom Tinadar did.’ Well… then we’ll have a problem.”

Quom’s head snapped up.

“Why wouldn’t,” Aletha gasped.

“You both know I would,” Plutt smirked. “If that girl is going to be worth nothing to me, then she’s going to be worth nothing to you. Since these beatings have proven that you’re willing to endure violence for the girl, then maybe violence against her will make you behave.”

Quom’s eyes burned with hatred, “And what is going to stop me from telling her father about your threats?”

“Because from this moment on, the girl will always be within arm’s reach of my men,” Plutt answered. “The second you tell her father what I said, my man snaps her neck. If her father is going to kill me over something, I’m going to make sure it’s for a damn good reason.”

The hate coming off of Aletha and Quom in that moment was palpable.

“You disgust me,” Aletha whispered.

“Here’s how things are going to work from now on,” Plutt said. “You are going to graciously accept my gift of medical equipment and let me charge her father for the cost. We’ll just pretend that the items you originally gathered were the ones destroyed by the First Order, and the items they destroyed were actually destroyed by me. You replaced the items I destroyed, and the husband follows through on Rhiaon’s promise. Everything’s fair then.”
Aletha let out a mirthless chuckle.

Plutt ignored her, “Now when it comes to Rey, you can continue to watch her during the day, but if I catch you overstepping your bounds again then I’ll consider that as you deciding to take over the role of her caretaker. And we all know what that means. Do you understand?”

“Yes,” Aletha hissed through gritted teeth.

If looks could kill, the ones Quom and Aletha were giving Plutt would have killed him ten times over.

“Good,” Plutt smiled. “Come on, boys. We’re done here.”

The group thundered out the tent one by one, darkly joking among themselves about what just happened.

“Oh, Doctor?” Roke turned as he reached the tent flap. He was the final one to exit. He gestured to the broken glass and machinery on the floor as well as their bloody wounds “You might want to clean this place up. It’s hardly professional.”

Quom had to physically restrain Aletha from tearing out Roke’s throat.

Rey slipped away from Dirk the first moment she could. She had been scared for Mister Quom since Roke had pinned him to the ground. Then Plutt, Roke, and the other goons returned to the concession stand with bloody knuckles and joking about Mister Quom and Doctor Aletha. Rey knew she had get to them.

She was aware that one of the goons was tailing her, but she ran as fast as her little legs could carry her. Reaching Aletha’s tent, Rey would have thrown open the flap when she felt something jolt through the Force.

“Stop!” a ghostly voice ordered.

Rey failed to recognize the voice of Obi-Wan Kenobi, although unbeknownst to anyone, she had heard him, Yoda, and her grandfather through the Force before. Rey knew that she could trust the voices. The voices had always only said things that protected her, though she hadn’t yet figured out to have a conversation with them.

She didn’t find the phenomena of hearing them weird, having witnessed her own father talking to them through the Force. Rey had even secretly seen the blue outline of Anakin Skywalker talking to Daddy once.

Following Obi-Wan’s instructions, Rey paused at the tent flap and listened as Quom and Aletha spoke inside.

“We can’t just stop taking care of her, Doc,” Quom said.

“I know, but we need to figure out a way to do this without anyone getting hurt,” Aletha replied. “I’m willing to take as many beatings as possible, but if they go after Rey-”

A barrage of images filled Rey’s head. The Force revealed to her the events of that morning. Quom’s beating. Aletha’s attack. Plutt’s threat. Graciously, the Force spared Plutt’s discussion of Felicity’s likely death.
Rey hesitated outside the tent. She knew what she would see if she entered the tent: Aletha’s equipment destroyed and Quom and Aletha injured from their beatings. Beatings they had happily endured to protect her.

Rey was young and naïve, misunderstanding jokes about curses as literal, and unable to use common sense to find her way to Unkar Plutt without Quom’s help. But she did understand the concept of selflessly putting yourself in harm’s way to protect someone else. It was a complicated lesson she had learned a year previous from Uncle Han.

Uncle Han had shown up at their front door unannounced, as he usually did. Rey had been happy to greet him, racing forward to tackle him in a hug, but Mommy and Daddy had been very unhappy. Uncle Han was bruised and bloody, fresh from one of his many adventures.

Rey watched as Uncle Han had greeted Ben with an air of surprise, almost like he had forgotten the living location of his own son. The tension was increased when Han pulled Ben into an awkward hug, almost like an afterthought, only to quickly push him away when Ben hurt one of his bruised ribs. Ben had made a cold comment about how Uncle Han never bothered to visit him without getting beaten up, and Daddy told Ben to take Rey and go his room.

Ben had spent a long time with Rey in his room, ranting about how much he didn’t like his father. He then got frustrated when Rey failed to understand how someone couldn’t like their daddy, especially since it was Fun Uncle Han, and going on about how much she loved hers.

Eventually Ben decided to start beating the punching bag Mommy got him for his fifteenth birthday (the only time Felicity and Ben had actually genuinely gotten along.) Rey watched as Ben did the weird thing where he started muttering to himself like he was having a conversation with a person only he could hear. Rey always thought he must be speaking to Grandfather Skywalker as Ben talked about him a lot.

With Ben distracted, Rey took the opportunity to sneak downstairs.

Hiding behind the couch, Rey tried with all her might to block her Force Signature from her father. It was the very first thing Daddy taught his students as it was the first line of defence they had. An enemy can’t hurt you if they can’t find you.

“When are you going to stop all of this, Han?” Daddy sounded very unhappy as he helped clean up Uncle Han.

“Kid, if I wanted a passive aggressive lecture from a Skywalker, I would have gone home to Leia,” Uncle Han chuckled.

Daddy let out a noise that Rey didn’t think sounded happy.

“Don’t you give me that look, Kid,” Uncle Han said. “You get in as much trouble as I do.”

“That’s because people seek me out for trouble,” Daddy replied. “I don’t go and find it like you.”

“Oh please. Don’t make me laugh, Kid. You absolutely do go looking for trouble.”

“Do not.”

“Do too.”

“Do not.”
“Do too.”

“Knock it off, Boys!” Mommy’s voice called from the kitchen, “It’s really sad when Rey and Ben have more intellectual arguments than you two. And he’s right, Luke. Both you and Loud Mouth Solo go looking for trouble.”

Rey giggled at Mommy’s nickname for Uncle Han.

“Fine, but I’ve definitely cut back after Rey was born,” said Daddy. “I mean, honestly, don’t you think you’re getting too old for this? You’re forty-eight and have a fifteen-year-old son.”

“You say that as if Ben actually cares what I get up to.”

“Well, maybe if you tried spending a little less time getting into scrapes and more time at home with him-”

“Last time I checked his home was here with you,” Uncle Han snapped. “Maybe if you and Leia hadn’t insisted on sending him to live with you and Fliss when he was eleven I wouldn’t have messed up this whole father thing. I mean honestly, he thinks I didn’t want him, that I’m unworthy because I don’t have the Force, and that my closest female friend who I sent him to live with, is the devil.”

“Hey!” Mommy yelled from the kitchen.

“Look me in the eye and tell me he doesn’t think that, Rhiaon!” Uncle Han yelled back.

Rey didn’t need to see Daddy to know he was shaking his head.

“So what happened this time?” Daddy asked. “Promise me it wasn’t a gang.”

“Come on, Luke, you know I promised no more gangs as long as you’re around to keep me in line,” Uncle Han laughed.

“That does explain those four months I was on Malaita and you ended up dealing with Kanjiklub.”

“Oh no, I’m never messing around with Kanjiklub again. Believe you me.”

“So what was it then?”

“A buddy from my former smuggling days-”

“Former?”

“Earlier smuggling days,” Uncle Han corrected. “Think circa the time I won the Falcon from Lando. Chewie was away on Kashyyyk for a few months and I teamed up with a guy named Marklin. We were hired by some seedy characters to move some merchandise... Merchandise to be delivered to Zygerria.”

“Slaves,” Daddy said with no question in his voice.

“When we figured out what was going on, we refused to go to the pickup site, gave back the payment advance, and reported the operation to Imperials. I heard that there was a raid, the slaves were freed, and the slavers were personally executed by Vader... who had a surprisingly strict anti-slavery policy. For a man who did a magnitude of horrible things, I will admit that Vader did have morals when it came to the slave trade.”
“Benefits of being a former slave.”

“I’m still not sure I believe that story.”

“Han, there’s plenty of evidence to prove it.”

“I’m sorry, it’s just the part where you claim that he built Threepio that you lose me.”

Mommy once again called from the kitchen, “You have to admit that it only makes sense for Threepio to have been built by someone as evil as Vader.”

“Felicity, I don’t mind you eavesdropping while making lunch, but could you please stop calling my father evil?” Daddy sounded very annoyed. “I don’t want Rey to overhear and develop preconceived notions.”

“I make no promises.”

Daddy sighed and Rey giggled again from behind the couch.

Uncle Han shifted in his seat.

“Go on,” Daddy urged.

“Marklin and I went our separate ways,” Uncle Han continued. “Marklin reformed himself, settled down, and had a few kids. We ran into each other a few years back and exchanged numbers in case either of us needed a favor.”

“And he needed a favor.”

“The guys we turned in were part of a larger operation who wanted revenge for what we did. Marklin disappeared off their radar, but they’ve given me trouble a few times over the years. They even threatened to go after Ben once, but dropped that notion when I reminded them if they did that, they would be hunted down not only by me, but by a Far Too Happy to Tap into the Dark Side Mama Nexu Senator, a Jedi Grandmaster Who Has Literally Murdered Millions, a Wookie With a Life Debt to Ben’s Father and a Hell of a Crossbow, a Strangely Protective Astro Droid You Don’t Want to Upset, and a Trigger Happy Emissary Who May Hate Ben but Will Shoot You in the Face If You Mess With Her Family.”

“We are not a family you want to cross. So what happened then?”

“They left me alone, but they found Marklin, kidnapped his seventeen-year-old daughter, and sold her into slavery. Marklin called me and we’ve spent the past six weeks tracking her down and rescuing her.”

“So you got these wounds by helping free a former smuggling buddy’s daughter from slavery?”

“You say that like it’s a bad thing,” Uncle Han accused. “Oh, don’t give me that look. I would have done it if it were Rey.”

Daddy sighed, “It’s different if it was Rey-”

“Are you actually going to continue that train of thought?”

“No. You’re right. I’m not.” Daddy sighed again, “It’s just, Han… I don’t know how many more times I can handle you showing up unannounced, beaten and bloody on my doorstep. It sets a bad example for Rey… and Leia yells at me.”
“Honestly I like it when she yells at me. It kind of makes me-”

“Are you actually going to continue that train of thought?”

“No. You’re right. I’m not,” Uncle Han chuckled. “Alright, fine, for Rey I’ll stop showing up uninvited like this. But in all fairness, corrupting her is in my job description as Fun Uncle Han.”

“I know,” Daddy said dryly. “Rey hasn’t stopped making fun of me for power convertors since your last visit.”

“It’s your own fault for telling me that story.”

“I didn’t tell you. Artoo showed you footage of it.”

“I always did like that droid.”

Daddy groaned, “There, you’re all fixed up.”

There was a bunch of clattering that must have meant Daddy was packing up the first aid kit.

“Come on,” Daddy ordered. “If you’re joining us for lunch, you at least are going to set the table.”

“Can I do the dishes instead and use this time to go visit that girl who is far too adorable to be your kid?” Uncle Han suggested.

“Step in this kitchen after doubting my fidelity, Solo, and I will slap you,” Mommy angrily called.

“I’ll say that’s a yes,” Daddy laughed.

Rey heard a set of footsteps leading away to the kitchen. Then Daddy’s voice sounded distantly in the kitchen, exchanging some words with Mommy who sounded mock-angry, but after a few words from Daddy, she laughed and Rey knew they probably had started kissing.

Uncle Han chuckled, and Rey was suddenly aware of the fact he was about to go looking for her. She was going to be in a lot of trouble if she got caught spying.

Rey was busy thinking about how to get upstairs before Uncle Han when he casually lifted his arms and stretched. Suddenly his arms came down, and scooped up Rey, plopping her on the couch in front of him.

Uncle Han grinned at her, “You may be able to use the Force to hide from your dad, Kiddo, but I would recognize that little giggle anywhere. Especially if it’s coming from right behind me.”

Rey giggled and launched herself at Uncle Han, “I missed you, Uncle Han.”

“I missed you too. Ow!” Uncle Han winced and gently pried off her arms from his torso. “Sorry, Sweetie. Uncle Han’s ribs hurt too much for that.”

“Sorry,” Rey looked down. “… Uncle Han?”

“What’s up, Kiddo?”

“Did you really get hurt saving that girl from slavery?”

“Yes.
“Slavery’s the bad thing that happened to Masters Alyla and Gavyn and the others, right?”

“Right again,” Uncle Han nodded.

“What is slavery?” Rey asked.

“Uh... Ask your parents.”

“But it’s a bad thing, right?”

“One of the worst things in the world,” Han nodded.

“Did getting beat up hurt?”

“A lot.”

“How much did your friend pay you?”

Uncle Han looked surprised, “He didn’t pay me, Sweetie.”

Rey frowned, “Why not?”

“Because saving people is not something you pay someone to do.”

“Daddy pays the Jedi to save people.”

“That’s different. That’s their job. I did this out of the kindness of my heart.”

Rey looked suspiciously at her uncle, “How close are you with this girl?”

Uncle Han burst out laughing, “Don’t worry, Kiddo, you’re still my Number Two Girl.”

“Number Two?”

“Aunt Leia would get really mad at me if she wasn’t my Number One. But don’t worry.” Han looked around conspiratorially, “It’s a very close race.”

Rey giggled, “You’re funny, Uncle Han.”

“I try my best. To answer your earlier, though, I never met Marklin’s daughter before this.”

“Why did you save her then? If there’s no reward and you don’t know her, why would you save her?”

Han wrapped an arm around his niece’s shoulder, “Rey, Sweetheart, I’m going to teach you something that it took me too long to learn. It’s something really vital in life, but I didn’t do until your dad showed me the importance of it.”

“What’s that?”

“It’s called being selfless.”

Rey rolled her eyes, “I know what selfish means, Uncle Han.”

“Not selfish,” Uncle Han chuckled. “Selfless. It means doing something for other people without any benefit to yourself. You remember the story of how I met your dad and brought the Death Star plans to Yavin?”
“Uh huh.”

“Remember how I was going to run away after I got my reward?”

“Yeah, and then you came back and saved Daddy.”

“Well, that was me being selfless,” Uncle Han explained. “There are going to be times in your life when people need help. People are going to be at risk of getting hurt, and only you can stop it. Now, sometimes there’s not going to be a reward or benefit for doing it, but it will help the other people. Rey, when that happens, I want you to promise me something.”

“What’s that?” Rey leaned forward eagerly.

Uncle Han looked her in the eye and without a trace of humour said, “If you can ever help someone and stop them from getting hurt, and in no way can you get hurt by helping them, I want you to promise me that you’ll do it.”

“What?”

“Because it’s the right thing. It’s what good people do. And sometimes just making someone else smile is the best reward. But you never know what’s going to end up happening because you chose to be selfless. Think about the Death Star. If I hadn’t come back and saved your dad, he would have been killed in that battle, I never would have had my best friend, your mom would be lonely having never met your dad, Aunt Leia would have been killed when the planet was blown up, Ben wouldn’t exist, Vader never would have turned back to the Light Side, the Empire would still reign, and worst of all, you wouldn’t exist. All that because I chose to be selfless and save that naïve farm kid I picked up on Tatooine. Promise me, Rey. Promise me you’ll be selfless.”

Rey nodded, amazed by Uncle Han’s words, “I promise, Uncle Han.”

“Good.” Uncle Han grinned and ruffled her hair, “Now, let’s go make fun of your dad.”

Rey giggled and followed Uncle Han into the kitchen.

As she came to the end of her memory, Rey was surprised to feel a tear running down her face. She missed Uncle Han, Daddy, and Mommy. What was taking them so long to get back to her?

Rey looked back at the tent and remembered what had triggered the memory. Mister Quom and Doctor Aletha had gotten beat up for taking care of her. And Plutt was going to hurt them even more if she continued to stay around them.

But if she didn’t…

Uncle Han’s words echoed in her head.

“If you can ever help someone and stop them from getting hurt, and in no way can you get hurt by helping them, I want you to promise me that you’ll do it.”

If she left them alone, no one would get hurt. It would be like the days before they found her. She would be sad and lonely, but no one would get hurt.

But she didn’t want to be sad and lonely. She had spent so many nights crying herself to sleep, afraid that the bad people were going to drag her out of bed again. That she would get hot and hungry and woozy and things would get dark like when Mommy got scared. She didn’t want to be lonely, desperate to sleep, and waiting for her family. Rey wanted to sleep the way she had last night with Quom there to protect her.

She wouldn’t do it. She would be selfish and keep Mister Quom and Doctor Aletha around and not be lonely. Rey sent a mental apology to Uncle Han, and with the confidence of her parents walking into danger, Rey opened the flap of the tent.

Rey stopped dead. She saw the broken glass and equipment on the ground. She saw the pile of already used bandages soaked with Quom’s blood. She saw the bruises on Quom and Aletha’s faces. It was one thing to see the visions in the Force, but it was different when it was right in front of her.

This was the price of selfishness.

And it wasn’t a price Rey wanted to pay.

“Rey,” Aletha looked up in surprise. Worry etched across her face as her eyes flicked around at the mess left by Plutt’s goons. “Are you alright?”

“Uh huh,” Rey looked at the ground. “Is Mister Quom going to be okay?”

“They can’t keep me down that easily, MG,” Quom grinned.

But Rey couldn’t return the smile.

“I’m sorry that my place is such a disaster right now, Sunshine,” Aletha said as she began picking up the pile of bandages. “Give me a few seconds to finish up with Quom and he’ll take you to his place-”

“No,” Rey interrupted.

Aletha froze.

“What?” Quom blurted out.

“I’m not going to Mister Quom’s anymore,” Rey firmly said. “And I’m not staying with you, Doctor Aletha. Mister Plutt hurts you for taking care of me, and I don’t want you to get hurt anymore. So I came to say goodbye.”

Aletha and Quom shared a disbelieving look.

“Rey,” Aletha started in a coaxing voice, “you don’t have to-”

But Rey ran out the tent, refusing to let herself be swayed. She heard Aletha and Quom calling after her, but Rey pushed into the crowd and soon enough lost them.

She would stay away from that part of the outpost for a while. If she saw them, she would run and hide. Rey couldn’t trust herself not to break down and go back to them. The first few days Aletha and Quom tried to find her, but Rey hid until they gave up and stopped. It may have hurt all three of them for Rey to avoid them, but it would hurt so much more if she allowed anything to happen to them.

So Rey banished herself from their friendship. She followed her promise to Uncle Han and selflessly avoided putting Quom and Aletha in anymore danger.

And she had never felt more alone in her life.
“I don’t believe you,” Eran Kestral declared. “There’s no way you actually met Luke Skywalker. That picture’s got to be something you made on the computer.”

Sienna frowned at her friend, “Why would I make a fake picture that has him looking almost nothing like he usually looks?”

“She’s right,” Pollix Octhar agreed. “What’s the point of the beard?”

“Besides, we all know little Sienna here can’t use a computer to save her life,” Zeven Ruellis laughed as he perched himself on the arm of the couch next to Sienna.

Sienna rolled her eyes, and pushed Zeven off the couch.

“Ignore Eran,” Tendra Kestral playfully shoved her husband. “He’s just bitter you scored so many points.”

“Yeah, about that,” Zeven said, using the couch arm to pull himself off the floor. “Now that, you know, Rhiaon’s dead, should we reevaluate score values? I mean, none of us can arrange a photo with her anymore unless we do something very illegal like dig up her body.”

“Don’t the Jedi practice cremation?” Sienna asked.

“They do, but she wasn’t a Jedi,” Tendra answered. “I don’t know if they burned her, or buried her, or whatever else there is.”

“I heard there wasn’t even a body to bring home,” Pollix said.

“Hey, maybe she’s alive,” Zeven suggested.

“Don’t be ridiculous,” Tendra chastised.

“Fine, but I’ll be the one laughing when she makes her miraculous return.”

“You do that.”

“I just felt so bad for him,” Sienna admitted. “I actually met him on the night of Felicity’s birthday. He was so heartbroken.”

“Losing his wife must have been hard on him,” Tendra sadly shook her head. “How did he deal with meeting someone who looked so much like her?”

“Uh… It wasn’t his finest moment.”

Her friends or not, there was no way Sienna was about to admit that she and Luke had gotten near alcohol poisoning levels of drunk and then she offered to slept with him while pretending to be his dead wife.

In fact, Sienna was a little disappointed that the mass amounts of alcohol she had consumed hadn’t killed the brain cells containing that humiliating memory.

“I heard he’s taken it pretty badly, basically vanishing from even his own family,” Pollix said.

“Can you blame him?” Tendra asked. “I mean, we all know what happened to his little girl. And then with his wife’s death, well…”

“You gotta wonder what happened to her body,” Pollix mused.
“Frankly, considering how torn apart he was, I don’t think I want to know the answer,” Sienna shook her head.

Silence filled the room as the group imagined a thousand horrifying possibilities of what had been done to Felicity Rhiaon.

“… I still don’t believe you met him,” Evan suddenly declared.

Sienna just sighed.

He shouldn’t be there. Luke knew that he had no business returning to Rornian after running away like a coward. And yet somehow he found himself back in the place where everything went wrong.

His heart broke at the sight of Temple Village: it had been abandoned. All reconstruction stopped, the buildings boarded up, and the weeds overgrown. After his disappearance it appeared that the world had moved on from the Jedi Order. It was frightening how quickly people gave up on the notion of hope and greater purpose in the face of tragedy.

Then again, who was he to judge anyone for that?

Luke had had no idea what he would find when he returned to Rornian, but he was slightly relieved to find himself alone.

He had come to see them: the graves of those he had failed. With a heavy heart, Luke walked through the graveyard where the ashes of his fallen pupils had been buried. Every grave marker sent a stab of pain into his heart as he read the names of his friends.

While the graves were clearly cleaned up by someone every so often, there was one grave that stood out from the rest. The grave of Coria Pellis was extensively adorned with fresh flowers, Holos, thoroughly burnt candles, and other such mementos. Luke had no doubt who had been furbishing Coria’s grave. Queen Nerissa Scintel’s extraction of Zygerria from the New Republic had not been purely politically motivated. Nerissa and Coria had been lovers for almost two decades, a difficult long-distance relationship that they struggled to make work. Luke remembered Nerissa’s heartbroken reaction when he informed her of Coria’s death. In fact, Nerissa had been the first person Luke called after the massacre. At the time, he couldn’t imagine how it would feel to hear second hand of his wife’s death long past any opportunity to save her.

He wished he still didn’t know how it felt.

There was another grave that appeared to be tended more frequently than the rest. Blue morning glories had been planted at Alyla Kene’s grave. The flower’s dual meaning of love and mortality was a sad testament to the story of Alyla Kene, blooming in the morning but dead before the afternoon. Luke remembered how Lando Calrissian struggled to withhold tears, dirt caking his fingers as he planted them with nothing more than his own two hands. Luke had never truly understood the relationship between Lando and Alyla, but as Luke and Gavyn had watched Lando plant the flowers at her grave, he knew that whatever it was they felt, it was real.

Luke had done his best to comfort Lando after Alyla’s passing with Lando latching onto spending as much time with Rey as possible due to associating Rey with Alyla’s love of caring for young children. It had been hard for Luke to help Lando, for although he had lost many people in his life, he hadn’t lost someone who he loved like Lando loved Alyla.

But now that he had lost Felicity, Luke understood it far too well.
Luke sighed, looking up from Alyla’s grave at the large glowing tree that resided at the top of Burial Hill (the name of the graveyard as it was on a hill.) She had been their first loss on Rornian, and the Jedi had been unsure where exactly to bury her ashes. It had been Miri who suggested they bury her aunt under the large Force Sensitive tree that was planted at the top of the hill. It had been the very same tree that Shara Bey helped Luke steal from the Empire. Luke and Reine had planted it on Rornian two months later as a symbol of their start to rebuilding the Jedi Order.

It was a small hill the tree sat on, so Felicity had voiced concerns regarding its ability to provide enough space for the burials of the future generation. Luke had waved off the concern, saying that the hill would be for them as a memorial for the first generation of the New Jedi Order, and that the next generation would find somewhere else to put themselves.

Luke never imagined that it would become a memorial three months later when he buried his entire Jedi Order.

His eyes painfully scanned the names etched on the gravestones. Alyla Kene was buried next to her brother, Gavyn Kene, who was buried next to his daughter, Miri Halcorr-Kene, who was buried next to her mother, Zena Halcorr. Luke’s second-in-command, Reine Agim was buried at the top of the hill next to her husband, Obik Kenu. Tyla Kinall was near the bottom of the hill near Genko, and the husband and wife pair of Jafan Typhe, and Eline Typhe-Korden. Dozens more Jedi graves littered the hill, but it was the two graves directly under the tree that broke Luke’s heart.

Slowly approaching the graves, Luke placed a hand on each of the headstones. His eyes filled with tears as they read the inscriptions Luke never wanted to live to see.

Felicity Rhiaon Skywalker
Fighter, Mother, Lover.
Rogue One
21 BBY – 20 ABY

Rey Rhiaon Skywalker
Daughter, Niece, Friend.
A Light in the Dark
15 ABY – 20 ABY

Luke fell to his knees and sobbed. How could this have happened? Of course, the graves of his wife and child did not actually contain their bodies. Both had been cruelly lost to fate, but Luke had been unable to let them go without a memorial.

The most heart wrenching part of the grave inscriptions by far were Rey’s dates. Five years. Five years. Her life had only begun and her parents had wanted her so much. Why did the Force see no other option but to bring her life to such a quick end?

When Rey was born, Luke and Felicity weren’t exactly at their peak fertilities. They had become new parents at the ages of thirty-four and thirty-six. Of course that was due to the fact that they had already been twenty-nine and thirty-one when they met, then thirty-three and thirty-five when they married.
That said, Rey wasn’t the result of years of struggle in conceiving. In fact, Rey had been semi-unplanned. Recognizing the dangers of a later pregnancy, Luke and Felicity agreed to go off birth control for a year and see what happened. If nothing happened, then they would start making a serious effort, but of course during the year, Rey happened. Then after Felicity’s bout of Postpartum Depression, she decided that due to her age and fear of going through PPD again, she refused to ever get pregnant again. Luke and Felicity had actually started looking into the process of adopting their next child, but Ben Solo had thrown it all out of the window.

They were gone. Luke would never see his precious wife and child again, and there was nothing he could do about it.

“I’m sorry,” Luke whispered to his family’s graves. Getting to his feet, Luke looked back at the graves and his pupils and proclaimed, “I’m so sorry.”

It was a cruel irony that the graves were located underneath the Force Sensitive tree, which Luke had dubbed the Heart Tree. It had been ten years ago that he stood underneath that very tree and proclaimed Temple Village open for operation.

Luke stood proudly at the top of the hill, immaculate in his formal, black Jedi robes. Reine stood proudly at his left (Luke had always referred to her as his “Left Hand” because his dominant hand was the left instead of the right) and Ben stood to his right as a representative of the future generation who the Order would one day be passed to. The Jedi made up the first rows of the assembled audience, but Luke’s friends and family had been given a spot near the front.

As the crowd chattered and waited for Luke to give his speech, Luke’s eyes found Felicity’s in the crowd. She waved at him, and he gave her a large, goofy grin.

Though their attraction to each other was – unbeknownst to them – budding, both had come to the opening of the Temple on the arm of another. Luke with current girlfriend, Calla who would later prove to be his infamous crazy ex, and Felicity was with her podracer boyfriend, Drystan. It would be several months before either Luke or Felicity discovered their attraction to the other, but Calla and Drystan would be the last people they dated before getting together. In fact, Drystan would dump Felicity a mere two weeks later, and Calla would get dumped by Luke a week after that.

Luke cleared his throat and launched into his speech. He told the history of the Jedi Order, and how he discovered it through Obi-Wan Kenobi. He told the tale of his father’s redemption. Expectations and plans for the future were revealed, and lists of people were thanked for various contributions. The speech was long, and elegant, and clearly written by Leia, but there was one part that Luke remembered most of all.

“I promise that Temple Village will be a safe haven for all,” Luke declared. “There will be no judgement or rejection on these grounds. This is a welcoming place for anyone who wants to learn about the Force, regardless of whether or not you can use it. We all have a past. Whether you were a Rebel.”

Luke looked at Reine.

“Oh an Imperial.”

He looked at Tyla.

“Whether you sought me out the second you learned of your powers.”

Luke looked at Obik.
“Or decided not to use them at all.”

He looked at Leia.

“Whether you were a slave.”

Luke looked at Gavyn and Alyla.

“Or a slave master.”

He looked to Zena.

“Whether you always believed in the Force.”

He looked at Lor San Tekka.

“ Took some convincing.”

Luke smirked at Han.

“Or even outright reject some aspects of it.”

Luke’s eyes found Felicity’s, and she smiled.

“It does not matter to me who you were,” Luke continued. “What matters is who you strive to be now. And I promise you that as long you fight for justice, freedom, goodness, and light, I will help you. I will have your back and nurture your skills. I will teach you all I know, and learn all you can teach me. I will provide a comfortable home and a place where you never need to worry about where your next meal will come from. But above all, I promise to fight to protect you with every ounce of strength I have, from this day until the day of my last breath. I promise to never let you be lost to evil. I promise to keep you safe, and keep you alive.”

He had failed to keep that promise. They had all trusted him, and he let them all down.

How could he ever even think about going to such a scared place as Ahch-to?

But then where was he supposed to go next?

A vision of Rey flooded his mind.

“Come to me, Daddy,” Rey sobbed in her hammock on Jakku.

It changed to an image of Obi-Wan.

The vision turned to Leia.

“Come home, Brother,” Leia whispered as she stared at her household com.

The vision shifted to Felicity.

“Come back, Sweetheart,” Felicity sat on a bench in a prison cell.

It changed to Ben.
“Come face me, Uncle,” Ben stared out the window of a Star Destroyer at the skies around him.

Luke turned back to the tree like it was a connection directly to the Force he could request answers. Where was he supposed to go? Who was he supposed to listen to? What was he supposed to do?

What he really needed was some clear guidance.

“Master Skywalker?” a voice suddenly came from behind.

Luke froze like a deer in the headlights. Fear coursing through his body, paralysing it. Luke wanted to bolt for his X-Wing, but couldn’t move a muscle. It was too late to run; the figure was already behind him.

The figure grabbed Luke’s shoulder. Looking pale as a sheet, Luke gulped and slowly turned around. He found himself face to face with Lor San Tekka, a friend of his who was a leader of the Church of the Force.

“Master Skywalker, I don’t believe it,” Lor San looked over Luke in shock. “What are you doing here?”

Luke thought for a moment whether he should answer Lor San’s question or just make a run for it. He might have selected the later if he could think of a destination, but Luke’s mind was oddly blank.

“I come here every week to tend to the graves. Master Skywalker, I must say you look…”

“Terrible?”

“I was going to say unkempt.”

Luke snorted, “That’s one way of putting it.”

Lor San Tekka found he had no reply. An awkward silence hung in the air as both men refused to address the obvious situation at hand.

“I saw your sister a few weeks ago,” Lor San finally said. “She was here with flowers for Rey and Felicity. Calendulas if I remember correctly. The Alderiaan flower for grief.”

Luke looked away, “How’s she doing?”

“Better than you.”

“That’s not saying much.”

“Well, there’s nothing much to say.” Lor San sighed, “Master Skywalker, I’m not going to pretend I need to ask why you did it. Very few men could go through something like that and find the will to continue on.”

“But I will ask what you’re going to do now. There’s been rumors of sightings of you here and there, but no clear plan.”

“Truth be told, there is no clear plan.”
“I hardly believe Luke Skywalker would go do something without at least a vague plan.”

“I think Master Yoda might disagree with you on that one.”

Lor San grinned, “Just because one is impulsive does not mean one has no plan. Sure, you may throw yourself into danger, but you always have some idea of what you want to do… even if it’s a stupid idea.”

“Come now,” Lor San urged. “What’s your plan? What is it that you’ve been wandering the galaxy aimlessly, avoiding the people who care about you for?”

“I… I can’t.”

“Luke, I’m your friend. I won’t talk anyone your plan if you wish me not to, but I do want to know you’ll be alright. Tell me, what is this burden you carry?”

Luke sighed, his hand reaching up for the data pouch around his neck tucked under his clothing.

“I have a map to Ahch-to,” Luke confessed. “Felicity’s team stole it from Vader on the Death Star, and I have the only full map of it stored on my X-Wing’s computer. They cut a piece out of the map which I now carry around my neck. The Order and I were planning on hiding there from the First Order and the Knights of Ren, but then I got called to the Senate, and well…”

Luke’s eyes drifted around at the graves.

“I see,” Lor San nodded. “And you intend on… going there?”

“Well, then, let me help you decide. Tell me, why don’t you want to go?”

“Too many memories. Too many reminders of my failure. Too strong with the Force to run away from being a Jedi.”

“And why do you want to go?”

Luke gave an ironic smile, “Lots of memories. Lots of reminders of my success. Too strong with the Force to run away from being a Jedi.”

Lor San laughed, “I can see where you would struggle. Alright, so the scales are balanced, but I think I know how to get you to make a decision.”

“How’s that?”

“Answer this one question: what would be the consequence – a new one, mind you, not a continuation of something like abandoning your sister – what would be the consequence of you leaving for Ahch-to today and never returning?”

“I suppose to would be that no one would ever find it again,” Luke answered. He took a long pause to think about the situation. “You have to understand; I don’t want to be a Jedi anymore… but that doesn’t mean no one else should be. Our history has to be preserved, and maybe someday, someone else can start it again, fix our mistakes, and rebuild. I just can’t be a part of that.”
“And if you go to Ahch-to that can’t happen?” Lor San inquired.

“There’s going to be records they follow, but to be cut off from the birthplace of it all, it’s not fair to the generations to come. If there was a way I could ensure that that legacy doesn’t die—”

“What if I offered you that?”

Luke looked at him oddly.

Lor San was quiet as his plan formulated, “I may not be a Jedi, but the Church of the Force respects and honors what you and the brave Jedi before you did. We can preserve the history and pass it on to the Jedi of the future.”

“But what about Ahch-to?” Luke asked. “No one can find it without this data pouch.”

Lor San smiled, “Then give it to me.”

“… What?”

“Give it to me.”

Luke frowned and said nothing.

Lor San urged, “Give it to me, and then go to Ahch-to,” Lor San urged. “Give yourself some time alone to work through this all. Mourn your losses, accept their deaths, and rediscover why it is you love the Force. Be something you’ve been unable to be for years: a normal man. Don’t be the hero who destroyed the Death Star, the Leader of Rogue Squadron, or the Jedi Grandmaster. Be Luke Skywalker, and find again who that is. I will keep the map safe until the day the Galaxy truly needs the Jedi again. And with or without you, the Jedi will thrive, and you will find peace.”

“Perfect.”

“But you have to promise me two things.”

“Anything.”

“Promise me that unless the world truly, absolutely, has no other option needs me… Don’t send anyone to find me,” Luke warned. “I want to stay hidden unless there is no other way out. Promise?”

Lor San nodded gravely, “Promise. What your other request?”

Luke unfastened the data pouch and pressed it into Lor San’s hand, but did not let go.

“Swear to me that the First Order will never get their hands on this,” Luke requested.

Lor San smiled and clapped his other hand overtop Luke’s, “I’ll give my life to protect this.”

Little did they know, in fourteen years, Lor San Tekka’s promise would come true.

Having said his goodbyes to Lor San, Luke climbed into the cockpit of his X-Wing. He took a deep breath and set the coordinates in his X-Wing to Ahch-to. In a few minutes, the calculations were complete and with the press of a button, he would be on his way to Ahch-to.
And yet, he found he couldn’t press the button.

“Daddy, come back.”

Images of Rey had flooded his mind, her tears leaving a scar in his brain. His little girl had suffered a tragic death and now would suffer an entirety buried under the sand of Jakku.

Rey cried as she lay in the sand, clutching her doll and crying out, “Daddy! Where are you, Daddy? I want to go home!”

Luke clutched his head, eyes squeezed shut as he tried to rid his mind of the images.

“Daddy, please!” Rey sobbed. “Daddy, please come get me! Daddy!”

Just a press of a button.

“Daddy!”

“AHHH! I CAN’T!” Luke slammed his fist against the console. He rubbed his head in a frenzy, almost like he thought he could physically extract the visions from his mind. “I CAN’T DO IT!”

Then the images were gone.

What was he supposed to do?

“Daddy, please come back,” Rey begged again.

And then he made his decision.

“I can’t keep the vision out of my head,” Luke said to himself. “She’s my daughter. I’ve gotta find her.”

And in a moment that would change the course of history, Luke punched in the coordinates for Jakku and took off.

As he flew to Jakku, one mission was set in his mind. No matter how long it took, even if he had to sift through every single grain of sand on Jakku with his bare hands, he would find Rey and give her a proper burial. Maybe then he might finally be able to get some closure.

And sure enough, Luke would find Rey on Jakku.

He just didn’t expect her to be alive.

Yes, the reunion is next chapter. I don’t know whether I’m more excited to write it, or to finally stop getting reviews bugging me about it. Nah, I love you guys, I’m just kidding… mostly.

The Long Way Home

Chapter Fifteen

An Unexpected Reunion

There was an odd sense of familiarity to Luke when he saw the planet of Jakku. Though that was probably because desert planets tended to all look the same and Luke couldn’t help but think of his home planet of Tatooine when he set eyes on the drab planet.

It made sense why Felicity had chosen the planet both times she needed to hide away. It seemed to give off an air of uncomfortableness that naturally led outsiders to want to leave the planet as soon as possible.

It broke Luke’s heart to think this was the last planet Rey had ever seen. When she had been born, Luke had been determined to ensure Rey saw as many different types of environments as possible. Planets of water, of fire, of forests, of ice, of deserts, mountains, cities, and hundreds more. He didn’t want her to be some nineteen-year-old staring up at the skies of a barren wasteland, dreaming of better worlds.

As he broke atmosphere, Luke paused to consider where he was going to start his search for Rey. Thinking back on Felicity’s torture session – he had replayed it so many times that he had memorized it – Luke found himself at a loss at to where Rey’s body was supposed to be. Felicity said that they crashed and had to walk to Niima, but for how long and from what direction?

This has going to be a lot harder than he expected.

Luke first idea was to get low to the planet and skim the surface to see if there were any ship crashes around. However, that plan went out the window when he saw the remains of the Battle of Jakku and how many hundreds of ship crash sites there were.

Where was he supposed to start?

Then it hit him: he would start with Niima Outpost and Unkar Plutt. Felicity had reached Unkar and hidden somewhere in the vicinity of Niima for weeks. Maybe she had left Rey not far from wherever she set up residence. If not, then maybe she had mentioned something to Unkar during her time in Niima.
Using his computer to determine the location of Niima Outpost, Luke found that he wasn’t far from it. If he was on foot it would probably only be about an hour’s walk. Below him, Luke noticed a small set of caves.

Having always been interested in the differences between Tatooine and Jakku, Luke had had plenty of conversations with Felicity and Diego about Jakku. Luke was fairly certain that the set of caves below him had been the topic during one of those conversations.

Diego had dubbed them the “Miracle Caves” while Felicity had titled them the “Rogue Caverns” after learning the phrase “there’s no miracles on Jakku.” In truth they were called the Qyhsh Caves after some Teedo God based on a legend in the Teedo religion. There was a very long story about Qyhsh, the banished son of the Teedo mother Goddess R’iia and the trials he went to redeem himself, that frankly made the history of Mandalore seem like a short story.

The Qyhsh Caves were technically considered to be an offshoot of Carbon Ridge, despite being hundreds of miles apart. Diego’s best guess for the classification had been that there were so few caves on Jakku, the residents probably thought they might as well count all of them as the same.

But the reason the caves had been remembered by Diego and Felicity is that the caves had been the site of their salvation. Hiding their stolen TIE fighter inside the cave, Felicity and Diego had trekked out to the caves every day and attempted to signal a Rebellion ship that was close enough to Jakku to hear their signal. It took a month, but hidden in the caves, finally one day they made contact with the Tantive IV, and the rest was history.

Recalling Diego and Felicity’s stories of the shady scavengers that populated Niima Outpost, Luke decided it might be best to hide his extremely recognizable X-Wing in those caves. Not only would it conceal his ship, but an hour’s walk in the desert might allow Luke to collect his thoughts before reaching Niima.

Landing his X-Wing flawlessly, Luke hopped out of the cockpit and opened his cargo hatch. After several minutes of rummaging through his possessions, Luke found a more desert appropriate outfit than the ensemble he was wearing. Already sweating under the hot Jakku sun, even shaded by the cave, Luke was seriously regretting his vow to always wear black in memory of his wife. True, when he went to save Han from Jabba, he had braved the desert of Tatooine in a slick black outfit, but that had been all about projecting a certain image and showcase of power, demonstrating how he was mighty and well put together and…

Okay, maybe he just thought he looked really good in that outfit and only planned to be in the sun for a short period of time.

… Felicity had been right; he was a drama queen.

Of course the reminder of Felicity only made Luke struggle with foregoing black completely in favor of comfort. He could almost hear her mocking him, “Oh, you don’t want to wear black because you’re uncomfortable? Well, don’t let the fact that I literally died because of the depth of my love for you hold you back. I mean, I have been dead a whole four months. Hey, why don’t you just throw your wedding ring off a cliff too? What is the matter with you? You know what’s even more uncomfortable than wearing black in the desert? GETTING SHOT POINT BLANK IN THE TEMPLE AND DYING!”

He really had been on his own for too long.

Luke decided to keep his black boots, belt, and glove. Though his false hand had long ago been patched up, Luke always worried about getting sand in his mechanics. He wore a light grey under tunic, brown over tunic, and dark brown pants and hooded cloak. A blaster was clipped to one side of his belt and his lightsaber hung off the other side, but Luke kept it tucked away from view under his robes. Grabbing his satchel, Luke packed it with some containers of water, some first aid supplies, a few credit chips, and Rey’s Felicity doll. He knew Unkar Plutt would call Luke on the promise of reward, and he wanted to be prepared. As for the doll, well… he wanted to give his daughter something to comfort her when he laid her to rest.

Prepared for his trek, Luke made his way to the entrance of the cave when a thought occurred to him. He could use the Force to try to find Rey.

Luke had tried avoiding using it as much as possible since his abandonment of the Jedi Order, but the idea had its merits. Rey’s flame may have been snuffed from this life, but perhaps the ashes still smouldered somewhere on Jakku.

Taking a deep breath, Luke closed his eyes and reached out into the Force, searching for that tiny, yet familiar signature.

And he found it. Far from Niima, lost somewhere in the desert, Rey’s signature echoed in the Force. Feeling a spark of hope, Luke was overjoyed to sense that his search wouldn’t be for folly. Out there, somewhere Rey was waiting for him.

As he set off eagerly for Niima, Luke failed to realise that Rey’s presence was living.

Rey was awoken by a strange feeling. It wasn’t physical, something spiritual and familiar reaching out to touch her presence in the Force.

Blurry-eyed and half-conscious, she tried to reach out and touch it back, identifying what it was. It felt familiar and loving, and part of her instinctually yearned for it. Safety. Comfort. Kindness. Loving. Protector.

_Daddy._

Scrambling in her hammock, Rey pushed hard into the Force, trying with all her might to answer the call. It had been the first time she was aware of him answering her calls in the Force, and the first time he had initiated contact. But all too soon, the touch was gone and Rey was alone again.

What did it mean? Was Daddy nearby? Was he looking for her? Was he trying to tell her something?

“Come back, Daddy,” Rey whispered looking down at her pilot doll as if she was talking directly to her father. “Please come back.”

But the touch didn’t return.

As the tears fell from her eyes, Rey got out of the hammock and scratched another tally onto the wall. The wall was covered in scratches, a constant reminder of how many days it had been since she was separated from Daddy. If she counted them she would know that she had been parted from him for 192 days.

But, they would not be parted for 193.

About twenty minutes from Niima, Luke started to encounter the speeders. They whizzed past him, carrying their hauls from the ship graveyard. Many yelled unprovoked insults at him, and a few nearly ran him over (Luke doubted most were accidental.) Still, his eyes locked forward in the direction of Niima, Luke trekked forward to the Outpost. He didn’t know what he would find when he got there, but it was too late to change his mind.

Luke had tuned out the shouts of the scavengers, instead filling his mind with memories of his loved ones. But his attention was drawn back when there was a sudden loud BANG!

His head snapped to the left.

“Stupid piece of junk!” An alien creature kicked their speeder. Thick black clouds of smoke were pouring out of the control panel.

Luke frowned, recognizing the speeder model. It was a TS-742, the first kind of speeder Luke had ever owned until he wrecked it in a race in Beggar’s Canyon. Honestly, it had been completely Biggs’ fault, but Uncle Owen had refused to hear it and disallowed Luke from applying to the Academy for another year as punishment.

“Need a hand?” Luke called to the alien. He knew exactly what was wrong with the speeder, and being a Skywalker, he felt the uncontrollable urge to go fix it.

The alien looked up at the strange human on foot nearby that apparently was offering help. Had he heard that correctly.

“Come again?” the alien said as Luke came closer.

“No need help?” Luke asked the creature he now recognized to be a Vrogem. “I couldn’t help but see that you were having a problem with your speeder. Forgive me, but I used to own one of these and I think I know what your problem is.”

“Really?” The Vrogem raised a brow. After twelve years of his speeder giving him problems he was reasonably skeptical at the idea that someone knew how to fix his ruddy speeder. “And what would that be?”

“It’s your wiring,” Luke opened the smoking control panel. He pointed to a pair of wires – one red and the other blue – plugged in next to each other. “The power cables to the breaks and the handling were mixed up in production. It’s a fault all the 742 models had; that’s why they’re so cheap. It’s fine for a while since there’s not much of a difference in their power requirements, but after a while the breaks spark. You’ll need to replace a few parts in them, but as for preventing the issue in the future all you need to do is swap the two wires.”

“Oh, well, thanks,” the Vrogem looked surprised as Luke switched the wires. “You a mechanic?”

“What do I owe you for the assessment?”

It was Luke’s turn to look surprised, “Oh, I didn’t mean- It’s free. I just recognized your problem and thought I’d save you some trouble and tell you what was wrong. I fixed my own 742 so I knew it would work, and thus save you from getting the run around from an uninformed mechanic. Not many of these speeders are still around, and only a handful were ever released. Technically they were all meant to be recalled.”

“You think you could fix mine?” the Vrogem asked. “I’ve made a few modifications throughout the years and I think I’ve messed up the mechanics somewhat fierce, which is very embarrassing since I’m actually a mechanic. Not professionally trained, mind you, but I’ve always had a mind for figuring out machines.”
Again Luke was surprised, “Well there are a few issues I think I can give you some advice on, but I’d need to do a full assessment to fully fix this… if that’s even possible at this point.”

The Vrogem laughed, “I know. It’s basically homemade at this point. Probably the worst put together thing you’ve ever seen.”

Luke chuckled, thinking of the Falcon, “You’d be surprised.”

“So you in? I’ve got plenty of supplies in my shop.”

Luke glanced at Niima Outpost. A pit stop couldn’t hurt. It wasn’t like Rey’s body was going anywhere.

“Nice to meet you, Quom,” Luke smiled.

“Of course the tension coil would snap halfway there,” Luke groaned.

“Quit whining and keep pushing,” Quom grunted as he and Luke pushed the speeder through town. He purposefully avoided Aletha’s questioning gaze and raised eyebrows as they passed her tent.

“We’re almost there. It’s the blue tent right by the town well.”

“You have a town well?”

“Yes.”

“As in people can just walk up and get as much water they want?”

“If you don’t mind sharing with the happabores,” Quom replied. “You from a desert planet?”

“No man who hasn’t lived through drought gets excited at the thought of free water.”

“You should have seen me the first time I visited Kamino.”

“Honestly, I avoid that place on principal,” Quom grunted as they pushed the speeder into his tent workshop. “There. Help me unload my haul and then we can take a look at this thing.”

As Quom got to work, Luke began setting things around the tent in whatever spot seemed appropriate. He was placing some power convertors in a drawer when he came across a drawer full of small human clothing: goggles, scarf, a tunic, and some shoes.

“You have a child?” Luke asked, holding up the shoes.

“Of a sort,” Quom replied. “The girl isn’t mine, but I was watching over her for a while. Thought I’d get her some clothes in case she outgrows or ruins the ones she has. What about you? You got a litter of your own?”

“I had a daughter,” Luke sadly put the clothing back in the drawer. They would have fit Rey perfectly.
Quom decided not to pry on the man’s use of past tense, “So what are you doing here, Outmian?”

The Vrogem’s usage of the Huttese word for foreigner threw Luke off for a minute until he remembered they spoke it on Jakku.

“Anything in particular?” Quom pressed.

Luke just chuckled, “Actually you might be able to help me. Do you know where there was a sandstorm about four months ago?”

Maybe he could find a general search area of where Rey had been left and covered by the storm.

Quom frowned, “Four months ago? I don’t think there was one.”

“Not positive, but I think we went about three months without one before the big one two months ago.”

“Huh,” Luke dismissed Quom’s claim. Felicity had sworn that she lost Rey during a sandstorm. The Vrogem’s memory had to be faulty.

For the next hour Luke and Quom thoroughly inspected the speeder, Luke making suggestions where he could.

“That should be about it,” Quom declared. “You want to help me start with the repairs.”

“Well, thanks. If you ever want to swing by a work on something, you’ll always be welcome.”

“I’ll take you up on that. Hey do you know where I can find Unkar Plutt?”

Quom flinched, “Take my advice, Outmian. Stay away from him.”

Luke shook his head, “Unfortunately he’s a vital part of my search.”

“Are you a bounty hunter?”

“No.”

“Damn,” Quom muttered. “Well, you should find him in the middle of the town. Big concession stand, you can’t miss it.”

“Thanks,” Luke said. “Good luck with your speeder, Quom.”

“And good luck with your search, Outmian.”

Luke nodded and exited the tent.

Sighing, Quom turned back to his speeder and busied himself with fixing it. It took a good ten minutes before Quom’s mind clicked.

His name was Luke.

Racing out of his tent, Quom frantically around the street for the long haired, bearded man named Luke who had a daughter and was searching something. Could it possibly be Luke Erso, finally arriving to collect his daughter?

… Nah.

Quom went back into his tent, shaking his head at his foolishness. What were the odds he would actually randomly find Rey’s father in the middle of the desert?

Though Luke had long craved for anonymity, he found it rather inconvenient when he achieved it on Jakku. Joining the line up at Unkar Plutt’s concession stand, many creatures were all too happy to shove in front of the itemless human who clearly wasn’t there to trade anything.

Looking around at the gruff creatures who populated Niima Outpost, Luke grimaced at the thought of Felicity living among them. She of course could well handle herself, and Luke had never been a particularly jealous man, but he hinted the though of Felicity having to deal with them day in and day out, their hungry eyes roaming for the newest pretty thing. Diego had secretly told Luke that there had been a time on Jakku that a scavenger tried to get a little too handsy with Felicity, only for her to break their wrist. Luke wouldn’t be surprised if Felicity in her heartbroken state had put half the town in the hospital.

“Did you see when the First Order took the woman away?” a scavenger by the name of Jarex Zolhar was saying to his posse at their washing table.

“No, I missed all the fun stripping that A-Wing for you lot that day,” the other male of the posse replied. “Why do you guys keep rubbing it in?”

“It wasn’t that exciting,” sneered one of the woman. “The Stormtrooper took one shot to the woman’s head and she went down like a bag of bricks.”

“Why would you carry bricks in a bag? OW! Fallah!”

“I’ll hit you again, Dairh.”

“It was rather anti-climatic after all the fuss they made,” the other woman said. “You’d think the First Order would at least tear the planet apart for someone pretty.”

“You’re just jealous, Minati,” Jarex laughed. “The woman was gorgeous. I wouldn’t have minded trying to get her onto her back.”

Luke smirked at Jarex’s yelp when the gas cartridge he was cleaning mysteriously exploded in his hand.

The creature behind Luke shoved into his back, and Luke realised the line was moving forward.

Letting his eyes wander, Luke noticed two large creatures that were overseeing things had started to mutter to each other as they watched him. Luke figured by their supervisory role that they must be employed by Unkar Plutt. He gave them a smile and looked back at the front of the line where Unkar Plutt was bartering with a scavenger.

Suddenly a large man dragged Luke out of line.

“Hey, what?”

“Shut up!” Roke snapped at the stranger.

Luke was dragged off to the side, still within sight of the concession stand while six of Unkar Plutt’s goons surrounded him.

“You don’t have haul and you don’t come from here,” Roke demanded. “What do you want?”

Luke grinned, they had no idea who he was.

This could be fun.

“I merely seek an audience with the great Unkar Plutt,” Luke smoothly said.

“Stop talking like you’re addressing a Hutt!” Roke snapped. “And Plutt doesn’t just talk to anyone. Now get out of here before I kick you so hard out of town you end up in the next star system!”

“Gentlemen,” Luke looked around at the goons, “I would be careful if I were you. I am not a man to be trifled with.”

“Oh yeah?”

The goons moved in closer, creating a wall through which Luke could not escape. The sound of cracking knuckles filled the air and a few of the goons chuckled menacingly.

“I’ll say it again, Gentlemen,” Luke said. “I wish to speak to Unkar Plutt, and I know he wants to speak with me as well.”

“And why’s that?” Roke’s voice was dangerous.

“I’ve been so rude, Gentlemen. Allow me to introduce myself. My name is Luke Skywalker, and I’m looking for my daughter, Rey.”

The goons were tripping over themselves to back away from Luke. Many stammered out hasty apologies as Roke just stared at the amused Luke in wide eyed shock.

“Skywalker?” Roke whispered.

“…Excuse me a second,” Roke was ten feet away on his com in an instant.

Luke watched as Roke frantically spoke with Plutt while the other goons sweated under Luke’s gaze. None of them seemed to know what to do with him. Should they talk to him? Assure him that the threat was gone and they weren’t going to hurt him? All had the feeling that despite Plutt’s orders to isolate and deal with the stranger, they would pay for menacing the stranger tonight.

In the distance, the window of the concession stand slammed shut. Then Roke had Luke by the arm, pulling him towards the concession stand going on about how happy Unkar Plutt was to see Luke and offering his apologies of their earlier treatment of him.

Unkar Plutt was… not what Luke expected, and yet in a way was exactly what he expected. A giant lumbering mass, Unkar Plutt had earned the nickname of the Blobfish the residents of Niima Outpost called him behind his back. Luke had talked to Unkar Plutt on the com, but it was another thing seeing the intimidating creature in real life.

Of course, Luke could easily slaughter him and all his goons without breaking a sweat but he’d rather keep his hands clean of blood as much as possible.

“Master Skywalker,” Unkar greeted. “We finally meet. Mrs. Skywalker told us so much about you.”

“Really?” Luke raised a brow. “Did she mention that she hates the moniker Mrs. Skywalker and will punch you if you refer to her as such?”

An awkward silence hung in the air.

“She… might have mentioned it,” Unkar finally replied. “I apologise for the slip of tongue. I can give my regrets to her in person if you’d prefer.”

A heavy weight pressed upon Luke’s chest, “I’m afraid that Felicity is no long with us.”

“My condolences,” Unkar’s voice held no true emotion in it. “She was a good woman.”

“The best,” Luke whispered. Unkar may not have believed his words, but Luke would give his life to defend the statement. “I suppose I should just get to it and explain why I’m here. I’ve come to find my daughter.”

“Of course,” Unkar said. “We’ve been expecting you for a while.”

“You… You have?”

“We did have an agreement after all.”

Luke recalled the deal he had made with Plutt, “I just didn’t think you expected me to actually come to Jakku.”

“Well, we didn’t think you were going to send just anyone to come get her,” Unkar frowned. He was puzzled at Skywalker’s words. Felicity Rhiaon didn’t seem like the woman to marry a man who would delegate the collection of his daughter.

Luke however, was also puzzled, “You were expecting someone to… get her?”

“Of course,” Unkar answered. “Your wife was very clear about the bargain.”

“Bargain?”

“When she amended the plan.”

“Plan?” Luke frowned. What was going on?

Unkar sighed, trying to keep the annoyance from his voice, “When she turned herself in to the First Order. So made it very clear how we were to handle the situation with the girl until you came to collect her and pay us. We’ve been taking care of her ever since Felicity left.”

“Taking care of her?”

“Of course. She left your girl in our care, and I assure you we’ve been taking very good care of her.”

There wasn’t a sandstorm, Luke remembered Quom’s claim. She left your girl in care, Unkar claimed.

Wait… had Felicity lied? Lied to protect the whereabouts of Rey to prevent the First Order from finding her? Was it possible that Rey… hadn’t been lost to the deserts of Jakku?

Luke simply couldn’t believe it.

Felicity had left Rey’s corpse with Unkar so Luke could bring her home and bury her!

“You have my daughter?” Luke whispered in disbelief. “Is she close?”

“In town as we speak,” Unkar assured. “We can bring her right to you.”

“I just can’t believe this. I thought I had lost her forever.”

“Don’t you worry about that at all Master Skywalker. Rey’s been safe with us, waiting for you to come get her,” Unkar Plutt assured Luke in his smooth-talking voice which Luke would find at home in a salesman at a used speeder lot. “As I said, we’ve been taking very good care of your little girl.”

“I’m truly thankful, Mister Plutt,” Luke sighed, bittersweet feelings fighting for control. “It takes a large burden off me to know I don’t have to spend years tearing Jakku apart to find her.”

“Well, I don’t think it would have taken years to find her,” Unkar chuckled. “Now, I know this may seem a little insensitive but we do have an issue of payment to discuss.”

“Of course.”

“I’ve got the boys putting together a final statement, but I’ve been keeping careful track of all the expenses your girls have incurred. I’ve tried to keep them down as much as possible, but this has proven to be quite the costly venture for me.”

Luke frowned, “With all due respect, I’m not sure how it could be.”

After all, it was just Felicity’s expenses for a few weeks and then caring for a dead body.

“Well, that wife of yours was very specific as to what my responsibilities with your daughter were,” Unkar replied. “I’ve kept her safe. There’s been at least one of my men with her at all times, but usually I’ll have two or three protecting her.”

“Sounds reasonable,” Luke nodded, vaguely surprised at how prevalent the act of corpse looting appeared to be on Jakku.

“Kept her in clean clothing, nice and wrapped up, protected from the sun.”

He had been slightly worried that in his grand plan to find Rey, he would end up finding Rey in a state of decomposition. It would be terrifying to find his daughter’s body to begin with; it would be horrifying to find her rotting under the hot Jakku sun.

“Protected her from the First Order.”

“Great.”

Luke was glad the First Order wouldn’t get his daughter. They had already taken away his chance to bury his wife, but at least Luke could have the chance to bury his daughter. He’d probably take her to Romian and put her in her grave. Or maybe he’d take her to Ahch-to and bury her in the field Felicity had brought him too ages ago.

“Made sure to give her lots of water,” Unkar continued.

Luke paused, “… Come again?”

“We kept her hydrated,” Unkar repeated. “Just like your wife asked.”

Luke gave Unkar Plutt a strange look, “… Okay.”

That’s odd. Why did a body need water? Maybe it was some sort of embalming or preservation technique Luke had never heard of? A special desert technique? Growing up on Tatooine, Luke never had water he could spare for such things, but Jakku was different. He remembered Diego telling him that despite the desert conditions, there were plenty of wells, and water was not much of a problem for the people of Jakku. Maybe the water thing was simply a technique not possible to be performed on Tatooine.

“And we’ve kept her distracted from the situation,” Unkar continued.

Luke scowled, “Distracted?”

“Yep,” Unkar nodded.

Luke figured that Unkar Plutt must have misspoke. Clearly he meant to say And we’ve kept others distracted from the situation.

Right?

“And of course, we’ve given her plenty of food.”

Wait, what?

“Three portions a day,” Unkar Plutt said proudly.

… And now Luke was lost.

Rubbing the bridge of his nose, Luke struggled to make sense of what Unkar Plutt was saying. Water, food, distractions? None of it made any sense. He of course anticipated Unkar to jack up the prices however he could – he had heard far too many stories from Felicity and Diego not to expect it – but this was ridiculous, and frankly, insulting to his intelligence.

And then it hit him.
“Rey…” Luke whispered, his eyes wide as a duet of hope and horror blossomed in his chest, “Rey’s alive?”

Unkar Plutt looked surprised, “What? Of course she’s alive. Like I said, we’ve been taking good care of her.”

“So we’re not talking about her corpse?” Luke clarified.

“Her corpse? Wait, did you think she was dead?”

This couldn’t be. Rey couldn’t possibly be alive. He would have sensed it if she-Wait a minute.

Luke reached out in the Force and located Rey again. He focused on her presence, digging hard into the Force to see where she was and what was going on. It was a very rare Force ability to get that intimate into someone’s Force presence, and could only be done through the strongest of Force connections. Luke had only ever seen it performed between a parent and child, and it took all of his might to perform it then.

Focusing hard, he saw the image of Rey, sad and lonely. He felt the air in her lungs and the blood pumping through her heart.

He roughly stroked his own presence against Rey’s in an over-the-top way that he knew she couldn’t ignore. Luke waited with bated breath for a few minutes, and then he felt it.

Rey touched him back.

Luke half expected to drop dead in that moment. Had the Force taken up his offer to trade his life for hers? Yet nothing happened. He still lived, he still breathed, his heart still beat in his chest. Just as Rey’s heart beat within her own.

The joy and hope was tremendous; Luke was almost afraid he’d choke on the overwhelming feelings. Rey was alive. His daughter was alive. His Rey of Hope was alive! She had been alive on Jakku this whole time!

And then the horror overtook him.

Rey had been alive on Jakku this whole time!

While Luke spent his nights getting drunk at bars and making out with women who looked like her mother, Rey had been crying herself to sleep, lonely on Jakku.

And he had known about it the whole time.

Luke wanted to throw up. All those visions of her crying, begging him to come back, they had been genuine pleas through the visions. He had abandoned his daughter alone on a desert planet.

He would not tolerate another moment of them being parted.

“Where is she?” Luke demanded, cutting Unkar Plutt off.

Unkar looked surprised. Luke only realised then that Unkar had been speaking the entire time and he didn’t take in a single word.

And yet, Luke didn’t care.

Unkar hesitated and looked over at Roke, “Go get the girl. Don’t worry, Master Skywalker, Roke will get the girl while we discuss the bill.”

“No!” Luke snapped. “You’re not getting a credit until I have Rey in my arms! How long will it take for her to get here?”

“Well…” Unkar looked at Roke. “We’re not entirely sure where she is at the moment. We sort of… let her wander town between meals.”

“What?”

“It’s okay, Master Skywalker. My men would never let her get hurt and Rey’s made a few friends in town. Gotten all buddy buddy with the doctor, in fact. Speaking of, you’ll probably want to talk to the doctor as your wife made a few monetary promises to her. But I’ve helped with that debt so we’ll go over that later.” Unkar leaned offered and jovially grasped Luke’s arm, “Just give us an hour and-”

“No!” Luke shook off Unkar’s grip. “If she’s not here, I’m not going to just stand here and wait for her. I’m going to find her!”

“I can’t let you do that, Master Skywalker,” There was a threatening edge to Unkar Plutt’s voice, and his goons started to surround him again. “I’m afraid that you’re going to have to stay right here and-”

“You will let me go find my daughter,” Luke waved his hand at Plutt.

“I will let you go find your daughter,” Plutt replied, his eyes glazing slightly as he stepped out of Luke’s way.

Luke smirked. The mind trick worked on Unkar Plutt; that would come in handy.

“Sir?” Roke frowned. “Should we let him go?”

“Yes,” Luke used the trick.

“Yes,” Plutt repeated.

Roke glanced at one of the goons, “… Okay.”

The goons all disengaged, and Luke took off a shot.

“I have no idea,” Roke shook his head.

“I want to learn that!” Dirk exclaimed.

Roke slapped Dirk.

“Thank you, Roke,” Plutt said.
“Anytime, Sir,” Roke grinned.

“Excuse me, have you seen a girl?”

“Sir, have you seen a little girl?”

“I’m looking for a little girl.”

“Have you seen my daughter?”

“Anybody seen a girl?”

“Kickeeyuna stuka emeela?”

“Around somewhere, alone and afraid.”

“Dee boonkee tchuta, solo an theechu.”

“Has anyone seen my daughter?”

Switching between Basic and Huttese, Luke ran up to everyone in the street, begging for information. Most shoved him away and those that didn’t usually had a few swear words for a reply. Still, Luke pressed on. Somewhere in Niima Outpost his daughter was waiting for him and he would find her.

“Excuse me, Doctor?” Luke ran into the tent of the doctor, startling a blonde woman. “Have you seen my daughter?”

“I’m sorry?” Aletha blinked, still confused by the sudden intrusion.

“My daughter,” Luke repeated. He held up a hand against his leg, “She’s about that high, brown hair, hazel eyes, pale skin, human. Her name’s Rey!”

“Rey?” Aletha repeated in shock. Wait, wasn’t this the guy Quom had been with earlier?

“Yes, Rey!” Luke exclaimed. “Do you know where she is?”

“Well, not at the moment, but-”

Luke ran back outside.

“Wait!” Aletha called, running out of her tent, but Luke was already gone. “Oh my God.”

She knew exactly where to go.

“Quom! Quom! Quom Tinadar!” Aletha yelled racing into the mechanic tent.

Quom rolled on his scooter out from under his speeder, “What’s up?”

“It’s about that man you were with earlier,” Aletha said.

“Oh, him.” Quom got to his feet and handed Aletha a flashlight, “Hold that would you?”

“What?” Aletha found the flashlight shoved into her hand as Quom popped the hood of his speeder. “Uh, sure. I mean, why are you being so casual? Don’t you hear the panic in my voice?”
“Yeah, but I just did something that might blow up this speeder and kill us both if I don’t fiddle with a few things in the engine, so hold the light straight.”

Aletha sighed, “Why did I get involved with you?”

“Beats me. You initiated it with the whole vitamins thing. And don’t think you can escape this newfound friendship. We took kicks to the face together. That sort of thing bonds you for life. Alright, that should do it. My speeder is completely fixed!”

Aletha didn’t look convinced, “That speeder is completely fixed?”

Quom shrugged, “Well, either it’s fixed or it’s going to blow up in fifteen minutes. So what’s this about the guy?”

“Quom,” Aletha said seriously, “he’s Rey’s father!”

“Huh, so I was right.”

“You knew?”

“I had my suspicions.”

“Why didn’t you tell me or Rey?” Aletha exclaimed.

“Well, I wasn’t certain,” Quom replied. “Besides, it’s not like I know where Rey is. She hasn’t exactly been hanging out with us since our beatings. Tell me, how can a kid that young be that selfless?”

“Would you get out of here!” Aletha grabbed Quom by the arm and dragged him out of the tent. “We’re going to find Rey and reunite her with her father!”

“I don’t think that’s necessary,” Quom pulled out of Aletha’s grasp.

“And why not?”

Quom grinned and pointed at the street.

“Please, has anyone seen my daughter?” Luke exclaimed.

“Get out of here!” a creature shoved Luke away.

Breathing hard, Luke turned in spot, scanning the streets for any sign whatsoever of his daughter.

And then he stopped.

Sitting ten metres away on the ledge of the well, directly in front of him, crying gently as she clutched a pilot doll in her arms… was Rey.

“Oh my gosh, we have to tell her!” Aletha moved forward to get Rey’s attention as Luke stared in frozen disbelief at his daughter.

“No, no, no,” Quom grabbed Aletha and pulled her to a halt. “Let the magic unfold naturally.”
“Quom-”

“Aletha,” Quom’s voice turned serious. “This is their moment. Let them have it.”

Aletha smiled and grabbed Quom’s hand, “I promise I’m not going to cry.”

“I make no such promise.”

Rey’s tears had been brought forward by the moment she felt her Daddy’s presence brush against her own. Desperately she brushed back and for a moment it worked.

But then Daddy was gone again.

Rey had collapsed, sitting on the edge of the well, clutching her pilot doll as she wailed. She was so sick of waiting. Of being alone. Of sleeping by herself. Of crying. Of her heart aching as she missed her mommy and daddy.

She loved them so much. Why were they teasing her? She just wanted to go home. She just wanted to see them again. She wanted to be safe in their arms as they made the monsters go away. She wanted Mommy. She wanted Uncle Han. She wanted Aunt Leia. She wanted to snuggle into Uncle Chewie’s fur. Get spoiled rotten by Uncle Lando. Get taught and taken care of by her Jedi friends. Listen to Uncle Diego’s embarrassing stories about Mommy. Listen to Uncle Wedge’s embarrassing stories about Daddy.

Rey wanted Daddy.

How much longer did she have to go through this pain? How many nights did she have to be alone? How many times did she have to reach into the Force and beg Daddy to come get her? She just wanted her daddy. She couldn’t understand what was going on. Why things were taking so long.

Where was Daddy?

“REY!”

Luke watched as Rey’s head snapped up. Her eyes widened as they locked across the street with his.

In that moment, the world stopped. They didn’t move, they didn’t speak, they didn’t even breath. There they were, metres apart, and no amount of blinking to clear from view, no amount of pinching to be woken up, no amount of doing anything to clear the image from their minds made it go away.

It was real. They were there and moments from being together again.

“DADDY!” Rey screamed.

Rey was running to him and he to her. Subtly using the Force, Luke cleared the path between himself and Rey. They ran to each other, nothing on their minds but the thought of sharing each other’s warm embrace. The sweet victory they had so longed for.

Three.
“REY!”
Two.
“DADDY!”
One.
“REY!”
“DADDY!”
Collision.

Luke’s arms locked around her body and hoisted her into the air.

“Daaddyy!” Rey wept, burying her face into Luke’s shoulder as her daddy spun her around.

“Rey!” Luke sobbed as his clutched onto her for dear life. She alive and safely in his arms. “Rey! Oh my Sweetheart.”

“Daddy! Daddy, you came back!”

“I came back, Sweetheart, just like I promised.”

“Daddy!” Rey wailed, her sobs hitching in her throat.

Uncaring of the eyes on them, Luke fell to his knees still holding his daughter tightly in his embrace.

“It’s you,” Luke said in amazement, his hands running all over her. Running over her face, her eyes, her cheeks, her arms, her hands, her neck, her chest, and pausing to feel her heartbeat. Caressing, reassuring, and verifying that she was truly alive and breathing. “You’re okay.”

“Daddy, don’t leave me!” Rey desperately pleaded. “Please, don’t leave me! I don’t want to be alone again!”

Rey sniffed, the goofy grin she had inherited from him running across her face, “I love you, Daddy.”

“I love you too, Rey,” Luke laughed, unable to wipe the mirrored grin off his face. “I love you so much. It’s okay. Daddy’s here.”

Standing at the entrance of the mechanic tent, Aletha Kymeri and Quom Tinadar watched the scene of the father and daughter’s reunion with utter joy.

“I said I wasn’t going to cry,” Aletha was grinning as the tears streamed down her face.

“I made no promises,” Quom blew his long nose onto his scarf. Catching Aletha’s disgusted look, Quom shrugged and held up his scarf, “They’re very versatile.”

It felt like ages Luke and Rey were knelt on the ground, holding each other and sobbing. They didn’t need to move, they didn’t need to speak, they didn’t need to do anything but feel the other’s warm, familiar embrace.

And after 192 days apart, Luke had fulfilled his promise.

Luke couldn’t believe it; that morning he had woken up prepared to dig through Jakku’s desert to find his daughter’s corpse, and now she was alive and safe in his arms.

“I love you, Rey,” Luke kissed her over and over as he held her tight. “I love you so much.”

He rested his head atop hers and held her with all her might. He thought he had lost her, he had spent so many hour crying, begging the universe to have her back, and now she was.

Luke could see those moments he thought lost. Rey growing up. Rey learning to read. Rey learning to drive. Rey learning how to fix ships. Rey learning how to fly. Rey getting her first crush. Intimidating Rey’s first boyfriend or girlfriend. Rey’s first sip of alcohol. Rey going through teenage rebellion. Rey doing stupid things she needed her father to come in and fix. Rey getting married. Rey having children. Rey living a full life that lasted far longer than five measly years.

Luke could fulfill his promises he thought lost. He could spend the rest of his life loving, guiding, and protecting Rey. And someday, when he passed from this life and left her behind, he could preserve himself so that he could continue to be there when she needed him. He would never leave her; not even in death.

And there was one more small perk to Rey being alive. It meant that the First Order hadn’t take away the woman Luke loved so much. As long as Rey was alive, Felicity’s spirit lived on in her daughter.

Luke couldn’t have been happier than to have Rey in his arms again.

And Rey couldn’t have been happier than to be in Daddy’s arms again.

He had come back, and now she didn’t need to be afraid. Daddy would protect her from whatever monsters came for her next. She wouldn’t have to spend another night alone, missing him, and sad. She could go home, to a real home and eat real food and see her real friend and but loved by her real family.

It was a dream come true.

So they knelt there in the middle of the streets of Niima Outpost, holding each other and revelling in their reunion. Luke and Rey Rhiaon Skywalker, together again forever.

Just for a moment, everything was right with the world. For a moment, they were together, safe, and above all, happy. In that moment, nothing could destroy their joy.

And then reality came crashing down.

“Daddy? Where’s Mommy?”

Chapter End Notes
What? You actually thought I was going to let you come away from this chapter feeling good?
“Where’s Mommy?” Rey repeated as Luke stared open-mouthed at her.

Words stuck to his dry throat. How was he ever going to tell Rey that Mommy wasn’t coming home? It was a pain Luke had yet to cope with himself; how could he thrust that upon his innocent little girl?

The sight of Rey’s bright hazel eyes, shining with hope – eyes that were mirror copies of the woman Luke so thoroughly mourned – tore at his heart. How could he break his daughter’s heart? She had been through so much already and they had finally found happiness in their reunion. Why did Luke have to deliver such cruel news that the mother Rey adored wasn’t coming back?

He didn’t want to tell her… but he knew he had the responsibility to do so.

“Rey,” Luke gently stroked her cheek. “Oh, my Sweet Rey of Sunshine.”

Tears glistened in his eyes but Luke would not allow them to drop. He struggled to keep himself together, to be strong and catch Rey when she made her eventual fall into sorrow. Yet he selfishly prayed that something, anything would intervene and delay telling Rey the news her mother was dead.

“Rey,” Luke whispered hoarsely. He paused to clear his throat after the false start. This was one of the hardest things he would ever have to say, “Rey, Mommy… Mommy’s not-”

BANG!

The explosion cut off any train of thought the residents of Niima Outpost might have had. Instantly, the street turned as one to identify the source of the noise and see if it would negatively affect them in any way.

A cloud of smoke was arising from Quom Tinadar’s tent as Doctor Aletha Kymeri looked violently perturbed – eyes wide and shaking like a startled steelpecker – from the explosion.

Quom Tinadar however, looked completely unphased.
“Alright, maybe the speeder isn’t quite fixed,” Quom said casually. He looked down at his watch and grinned, “Hey, look! I was right; fifteen minutes on the dot!”

Aletha groaned, throwing her head down into her hands.

“What?” Quom asked innocently.

Rey gasped when her eyes set on Quom and Aletha. Daddy was here! Mister Plutt only wanted Daddy’s money, and now that he could have it there was no reason to harm Mister Quom and Doctor Aletha. That meant that she could safely see her friends again and tell Daddy everything they had done for her.

She was about to start for the pair when Rey suddenly remembered her vision of Plutt’s words.

“But imagine what will happen if he comes here and the girl tells him, ‘No, Unkar Plutt didn’t take care of me. Aletha Kymeri and Quom Tinadar did.’ Well… then we’ll have a problem.”

Rey paused to think. She would have to be very careful about what she told Daddy. Rey knew her father was a man few dared to cross, but she still didn’t know what would happen if Daddy learned the truth about Mister Plutt. It was only when Rey was positive that she, Doctor Aletha, and Mister Quom would all be safe that she could tell Daddy what the mean Mister Plutt had threatened to do.

But there was one thing Rey was positive about: she could see her friends again.

“Daddy! Daddy!” Rey exclaimed, tugging on her father’s arm. Luke was still knelt on the ground, at eyelevel with the standing Rey. She wildly pointed towards Quom and Aletha, “Daddy, come see my friends!”

Luke was surprised at Rey’s sudden enthusiasm. Rey had friends on Jakku? Had Felicity known about them? Were they under Plutt’s employ? Was his daughter warranted in trusting them?

Luke was cautious about the idea of Rey’s supposed friends, but truthfully he was a little relieved that Rey had been distracted from the question of where her mother was. Of course, it left Luke with a lingering dread of when he did have to tell her, but at least he didn’t have to deal with it at the exact moment.

“Daddy, come on!” Rey pulled on his arm insistently.

“Yay!” Rey let go of her father and ran towards the panicked looking Aletha and Quom.

“They’re heading this way,” Aletha said, a sudden sense of fear enveloping her. “What do we do?”

“I don’t know!” Quom exclaimed. “We didn’t think this far ahead! …Should we run? There’s a clear path to the left.”

“No, they’ve already seen us. Besides where would we hide?”

“Your tent?”

“Rey would follow us.”

“Damn it! What do we do? Plutt’s going to kill us!”

“I don’t know!” Aletha’s eyes darted to the tantalizing open path as she reconsidered the option to run. No, it was too late; Rey was almost to them with her father. They’d have to face the Ersos and hope that it didn’t get them killed by Plutt. “Just play it by ear, and follow my lead!”

“Aye aye, Captain!” Quom gave a quick salute.

“Actually I was a Lieutenant in the Rebellion,” Aletha quickly muttered. “My husband was the Captain.”

“Ground team or pilot?” a male voice asked and Aletha found herself face to face with Rey’s father.

“Doctor Aletha!” Rey attached herself to Aletha’s legs in a tight hug.

“Hello, Sunshine,” Aletha leaned down and hugged Rey.

Aletha had always been the kind of person who attached themselves to others very quickly, and in such fashion, Aletha had become dedicated to the sweet little girl. She had worried fiercely about Rey’s wellbeing during her avoidance of them, and Aletha was happy to see Rey was in good condition. In fact, Aletha would confidently bet that Rey looked even better now that her father was back.

Detaching herself from Aletha’s leg, Rey turned to Quom.

“Mister Quom!” Rey pounced on the Vrogem, knocking him to the ground.

“Hello there, MG,” Quom laughed as Rey embraced him tightly.

How Rey had missed her friends.

As Aletha smiled at the scene, she heard a quiet chuckle from the man to her left. Aletha spared a glance at the mysterious figure that was Rey’s father. She had heard so much about this man that it almost seemed unreal to encounter him in the flesh.

Felicity Erso had spared some words about her husband while Aletha had treated Rey for heatstroke. Felicity told Aletha how grateful Luke would be for saving their daughter and hinted at providing Aletha with some sort of reward. Felicity had also mentioned him being an ass and an idiot, but Aletha took it with a grain of salt considering those proclamations came after Felicity’s failure to contact Luke’s comm.

Plutt and his cronies had whispered about Luke Erso being powerful, and that he was absolutely loaded. Aletha didn’t know how much of that to trust considering it came from Unkar Plutt, but then again, Felicity Erso had promised that her husband could cover the costs of Aletha’s broken medical equipment so there probably was some truth in it.

Most of what Aletha had heard about Luke had come from Rey. She loved to boast that her daddy was a hero who kicked butt in the Rebellion along with her mommy (although they didn’t kick butt together as they met when the war was over.) According to Rey, Luke Erso was brave and smart and strong and loved her oh so very much. But the thing Rey had been most confident in was that Daddy would not let her down. Daddy was going to come back to Jakku with Mommy and save Rey and take her home.

And Rey was correct, Luke Erso had come to Jakku… though he was noticeably Mommyless.

Aletha’s weak blue eyes met the sad but strong gaze of Luke Erso. He was rather handsome. Luke was noticeably fit, though not particularly tall – Aletha was surprised that he stood head to head with her height of 5’6”. He had shaggy blonde hair that was tinged with his first grey hairs and a beard that looked unkempt in the way the newly bearded did. A single black glove covered the hand Rey had informed Aletha to be false, and a wedding band was set on his left hand. The most striking thing about Luke Erso was how he seemed to carry an air about him that was both confident and modest. But there was also something noticeably sad about him; a tinge of guilt in his eyes and a slump to his posture as if he carried the physical weight of his sorrow.

In turn, Luke observed Aletha. Though he had yet to acknowledge the connection, he recognized the Vrogem to be the same he had helped earlier that day. It was the strange woman Rey had declared to also be her friend that intrigued Luke.

Doctor Aletha, Rey had called her, and a Rebel, Aletha claimed to be. For a moment, Luke worried that she might identify him, but he could sense no recognition in her. He went through his memories of his time in the Rebellion and her face appeared in none of them.

She was a human that was tanned, though from his life on Tatooine, Luke could tell it was not of ethnic origins as the tan skin of Alyla and Gavyn Kene had been. Aletha was likely naturally pale, and had earned a tan from her many years on Jakku.

Aletha was probably somewhere between four and seven years older than Luke, and had wispy ice blonde hair peppered with streaks of grey. Unlike Aletha’s assessment of them having the same height, Luke suspected that she may have actually been half an inch taller than him. (Being exact in measurements of height had become a point of survival in the Skywalker family as Luke and the girls’ short statures had been mocked ruthlessly by the ridiculously tall Han Solo and later Ben in one of the few points of bonding between father and son.)

But the thing had disturbed Luke was how slender Aletha was. Her bone structure did suggest Aletha had a small frame, but her skin clung onto her bones with very little muscle. Aletha’s eyes were slightly slunk into her head, her ribcage stuck out, and she was lightly shivering, a result of lower body temperature caused by starvation.

She didn’t look like Luke could easily snap her in half, but there was no denying the Doctor was underfed. Perhaps that was the reason for the sadness that haunted her eyes, and yet she also had a gleam of light. Luke felt a sense of kinsmanship; Aletha was a woman who had seen too much yet somehow retained a sense of hope.

“So,” Aletha finally spoke, “you must be the Mister Luke Erso I’ve heard so much about.”

“Of course,” Quom grinned, getting to his feet when Rey had finally crawled off him. “Husband of Jyn Erso.”

Rey frowned, “But Daddy, Mommy’s name is-”

“Hush now, please Rey,” Luke ordered. Recently reunited or not, Luke was unafraid to step into an authoritarian role with Rey when needed.

“Oh, it’s okay,” Quom lazily waved his hand, “we know her real name was Felicity Rhiaon, but hell if we can figure out what the big deal about that was. So Luke Erso, Luke Rhiaon, Luke Insert Last Name Here, take your pick.”

Luke chuckled, “How about we go with Erso?”
“Works for me,” Quom smiled. “I’d introduce myself, but you and I know each other already.”

“Your dad helped me with my speeder this morning.”

“Is that what exploded?”

Quom was silent, “… Yes, yes it was.”

Luke couldn’t help but grin, “Rey, why don’t you properly introduce me to your friends?”

“Okay, Daddy!” Rey said excitedly. “Mister Quom, Doctor Aletha, this is Daddy.”

“Daddy, these are my friends,” Rey introduced. “The nice lady is Doctor Aletha Kymeri. She and her husband fought in the Rebellion, and her husband, a pilot named Antar was in a crash and cut off his arm and got a mechanical one like you. But he’s dead now.”

Luke raised a brow as Aletha stifled a laugh.

“Don’t you love how blunt children are?” Aletha grinned at the horrified Luke.

“I’m more concerned with how blunt your storytelling has been,” Luke said.

“Daddy, I’m talking,” Rey tugged on Luke’s pant leg, annoyed that she had been interrupted.

Luke bent down and kissed Rey on the forehead, “Go on, Sweetheart. I’m listening.”

“You better be,” Rey crossed her arms.

Luke shot her a look and Rey understood she had crossed the line from cute and bossy to demanding and rude.

“Sorry, Daddy,” Rey said.

“You’re forgiven,” Luke said, but gave her a look that clearly meant don’t do it again. “Now, who is your other friend?”

“Mister Quom Tinadar,” Rey proclaimed. “He’s a mechanic and been teaching me survival stuff. Mommy almost shot him, but we’re okay now.”

It was Quom’s turn to get Luke’s horrified look.

“Look,” Quom said casually, “I don’t know you and I don’t really know your wife, but let’s be honest, does Felicity threatening to shoot me sound out of character?”

Luke opened his mouth and paused, “… Yeah, I’ll be honest, that sounds right on the mark.”

“I thought so.”

Luke sighed, “Alright, now that we’ve all been properly introduced, why don’t we get down to it? I’m very confused as to everything that’s gone on here. If you don’t mind me asking, can you please explain how exactly you knew my wife and why I should trust either of you with my daughter?”
To emphasis his point, Luke wrapped his arm tightly around Rey’s shoulders and pulled her firmly against his leg.

“But Daddy!” Rey cried out. “They’re good guys!”

“No, Daddy, listen to me!” Rey pulled out of her father’s grip.

“Hush!” Luke snapped, grabbing her arm and pulling her back against him. “I’m not going to ask you again, Rey!”

That was when Luke noticed the tears in her eyes.

It was like he had been punched in the face. How many times in the past few months had he regretted yelling at Rey? Heck, he had cried over it that very morning, and yet here he was angry again with her.

“Please don’t cry, Sweetheart,” Luke knelt before Rey as she started to sob. He wiped the tears from her eyes and pulled her into his loving embrace. “I’m just trying to make sure you’re safe.”

“But I am safe!” Rey wailed. “They’re my friends!”

“I know they’re your friends,” Luke said. “But I don’t know them and after everything we’ve been through I’m so terrified that someone is going to try to hurt you again.”

“But they made sure I didn’t get hurt! They got beat up so I wouldn’t!”

“MG, we don’t need to talk about that,” Quom said nervously. “It’s okay. Listen to your dad. He’s a smart man who just wants to protect you. Besides, we know how to get him to trust us.”

Luke frowned at Quom and Aletha. What was Rey talking about? They had taken a beating? And someone had tried to hurt Rey?

Luke’s eyes meet Aletha’s and he silently pleaded for more information. Aletha shook her head and mouthed the word, later. Luke nodded and turned back to Rey.

“Alright, Sweetheart,” Luke kissed her forehead and held her close. “Why don’t we let Quom and Aletha prove they’re trustworthy?”

Rey sniffed and wiped her nose on her arm. “How?”

“How about we start with what your mom told me to say to him?” Aletha suggested.

Suddenly Luke’s throat felt very dry, “What? …What did she say to tell me?”

A strange feeling bloomed in Luke’s chest. Felicity had left a message for him? As he rose to his feet, he struggled not to get too excited over the idea that Felicity had managed to speak to him one last time. Was it some dire message? Was it an explanation of what had happened? Was it a taunt that she had been right about Ben the entire time? Was it a final declaration of love?

Aletha gave him a gentle smile. She regretted that Felicity had not left some epic final message to her husband, but Aletha prayed that somehow the simple words would offer Luke comfort.
“She said to say that Felicity sent you, and if you were to ever say ‘thank you’ that I should say ‘anytime’ and you would know what that meant,” Aletha relayed.

Luke felt the tears gather in his eyes. No, Felicity had not left some epic final message, but the words did offer a strange comfort. Their phrase was so simple, but for Luke and Felicity it meant so much more.

He remembered the first time they ever exchanged those words. It had been on the day they met, at the tenth anniversary celebration of the Battle of Yavin. Luke had praised Felicity’s unrecognized efforts in stealing the Death Star plans so that the Battle of Yavin and the destruction of the Death Star could be possible.

“Thank you,” Felicity had said what would be their sacred words for the first time. “It's nice to see someone appreciate my team's accomplishments for once.”

Luke had grinned at her, “Anytime.”

Felicity had later told Luke that that had been the moment she realized she loved his smile; her often professed favorite feature of his.

Their sacred phrase had been repeated later that day when Luke had given his tribute to the fallen pilots of the Battle of Yavin. It was when he got to Biggs Darklighter that Luke struggled to go on.

“Biggs Darklighter,” Luke's voice had broken on the last name. “Biggs was my best friend, and we had just been reunited. I was going to tell him all about the adventures I had had, but…”

Luke couldn't bring himself to finish the sentence.

Felicity had looked up at him. Luke was staring into the flames, tears shining in his eyes. As if it was the most natural thing in the world, Felicity had gently touched his arm. Luke visibly relaxed at the gesture of comfort.

Felicity had smiled, “Anytime.”

Luke would have been lying if he said he hadn’t probably loved Felicity from the very start. Of course, they hadn’t fallen immediately into each other’s arms. That’s what probably had made their relationship work so well; they had taken the time to become friends over lovers.

Perhaps that’s why losing her had so destroyed Luke. He hadn’t just lost his lover, but his best friend and partner. Both of them had endured so much trauma in their lives but were always determined to stand on their own and deal with things on their own. It was only once they found each other that they had found someone to catch them when they fell. Luke had become so dependent on Felicity that now he let himself fall, but only at the last moment had he remembered she was no longer there to catch him.

“I promise you, Felicity,” Luke's voice had been calm, but filled with pain during their final encounter, “I will never leave you. But I cannot always be by your side physically, so you'll just have to accept my emotional presence. My memory. My promises. You'll have to trust me that this will not be the end.”

Felicity had painfully whispered, “Luke-”

“I love you. I have from the moment I first met you, and I'll love you even beyond my death.”

Felicity had not needed to repeat Luke’s professions; he knew every word he spoke could be perfectly switched around. She would never leave him, and she would love him beyond her death.

And that’s why that one final thank you meant so much to Luke. The words thank you and anytime had become so much more than gratitude; it was an unrivaled testament of love, a vow to catch the other when they fell, and a promise to be there even when they couldn’t physically.

“I love you, Felicity Rhiaon,” Luke had whispered during their final night, relishing the warmth of her skin.

Felicity ran a loving hand through his soft blond hair, her final gesture of intimacy, “I love you too, Luke Skywalker. Thank you... Thank you for loving me.”

Luke had gently smiled, “Anytime.”

As the memories faded away, Luke found himself staring at Doctor Aletha Kymeri through a veil of unfallen tears.

Still smiling her gentle smile, Aletha nodded and said, “Anytime.”

“So... does that get you to trust us?” Quom asked, feeling kind of awkward during the silent emotional moment.

He wasn’t the only one; Rey was squirming by her father’s feet. Why was Daddy so sad to hear his and Mommy’s phrase? Couldn’t Mommy just tell him that when they all got home? And where was Mommy?

“A little bit,” Luke admitted, wiping the tears from his eyes. “But I’m still uncertain as to your connection with my wife. Do you two work for Plutt?”

“Oh God, no!” Aletha exclaimed in disgust.

“I’d rather be dead,” Quom proclaimed. “No, your wife and I met independently of Plutt. She later asked me to keep an eye on Rey to pay off my debt.”

Quom awkwardly scratched his back, his eyes darting away, “Uh... we had an interesting first meeting.”

Luke narrowed his eyes, “Go on.”

“Well... We made a bargain and I sort of took advantage of the situation and overstretched my demands.”
Luke said nothing but crossed his arms and gave Quom a look the Vrogem was terrified to be on the receiving end of. Luke Erso appeared to be a man who was willing to cause a lot of damage to anyone who crossed his family.

“I tried to give it back!” Quom exclaimed. “But she wouldn’t take it and neither would Rey!”

Luke looked down at Rey, “Is that true?”

Rey nodded, “We don’t take things that aren’t ours, and it belongs to Mommy, not me.”

Luke ruffled her hair, “Well, I’m not going to chastise you for following that rule. But what exactly are we talking about here? What of my wife’s do you have?”

Quom untied the string around his neck and held it up, “These are some pretty rings, don’t you think?”

“Felicity!” Luke gasped, grabbing the rings. Turning them over in his hand, Luke studied them intently, “I thought these were lost.”

“Nope,” Quom shook his head. “They’ve been hanging around my neck for months, waiting for you or you wife to take them back.”

Without seeking permission to claim ownership, Luke tied the string around his neck, his wife’s rings resting on his chest. Luke had been so angry at Ben for not allowing him to have that small memento of Felicity, and now Luke had them, the metal pressing next to his heart.

Rey frowned, “Daddy, are you okay?”

Daddy was looking sad again and she didn’t like it.

“It’s okay, MG,” Quom assured her. “I think your dad has just been through a lot lately and it’s hard for him to take it all in. ‘Specially since he doesn’t understand everything that’s happened.”

“Don’t be sad, Daddy,” Rey hugged Luke’s leg tightly. “How can I make things better?”

Luke laughed, “It’s not your job to make me feel better.”

“Mommy said the same thing, but then she kept getting sad and I didn’t like it. She cried when she thought I was asleep, but I didn’t say anything cause I didn’t want to make her more sad.”

A harsh silence clung to the air as Luke failed to find a response to Rey’s blunt admission. He hated the thought that Felicity had been so sad on Jakku, but it was worse knowing that Rey had witnessed it.

“I’m sorry, Daddy,” Rey looked at the ground. “I didn’t mean to make you sad again.”

“No,” Luke got down on one knee and pulled her into a hug, “I’m not sad. In fact, I’m happier than I have been in five months. I have you back, and that’s all that matters.”

“But you keep crying.”

“Sometimes it’s not easy to be happy when you’ve spent so much time being sad. I just need a little help from time to time to get happy again.”

“I want to help! How can I do that?”
“Why don’t we tell him about all our adventures, MG?” Quom suggested. “Where should we start?”

“What’s an MG?”

“MG?” Quom asked. “It’s shorthand for Miracle Girl.”

“Miracle Girl?” Luke glanced down at his daughter. “Isn’t there some sort of phrase against miracles around here?”

“There’s no miracles on Jakku,” Aletha said the infamous mantra.

“That’s the one,” Luke nodded.

“And one that I believe in.” Quom grinned, “Except when it comes to this little girl.”

“Why’s that?”

“Well, how many people do you know that come back from the dead?”

What the hell was going on on this crazy planet Felicity had brought their daughter? Rey was dead, but not really, but actually was, but then got better?

Where was aspirin when Luke needed it?

“Knock it off, Tinadar!” Aletha smacked Quom’s arm. “He’s making it sound worse than it was.”

Luke frowned, “So… Rey didn’t die?”

Aletha weighed her words, “Well… technically she did.”

“What?”

“She suffered a clinical death,” Aletha explained. “Rey suffered an extreme case of heatstroke and at one point her breathing ceased and heart stopped beating. Felicity Erso managed to revive Rey via cardiopulmonary resuscitation.”

Quom stared at her.

“CPR,” Aletha said.

“Oh,” Quom nodded.

Luke sighed, rubbing his temples in exasperation, “You know... maybe we should just start from the very beginning?”

“Sounds good to me,” Quom declared. He held open the flap to his tent, “But why don’t we have seat? This might take a while.”

And so they told Luke everything. Luke sat on Quom’s cot with Rey in his lap, as Quom sat in a rickety metal chair and Aletha settled on a workbench. They told Luke all that had happened as far as they understood it.

Quom told of his encounter and bargaining with Felicity in the walker. While Luke felt pride at the retelling of Felicity protecting Rey, he was less than impressed at the part where Quom implied Felicity had offered herself as a bartering option. Considering the circumstances, Luke wasn’t going to put a black mark against her memory, but he still didn’t like the idea of someone else being intimate with his wife.

Rey stayed silent during the story. Even when Daddy asked her questions about the missing parts that had involved only her and Mommy, Rey refused to answer them. She didn’t want to think about that scary hike through the desert. She didn’t want to remember when Mommy went away. She didn’t want to confess how sad and lonely she had been. She didn’t want to make Daddy feel bad about not coming earlier.

Rey could feel the guilt in him and didn’t want to make it worse. Though Daddy hadn’t said anything about it, Rey could feel deep down that if Daddy could have come earlier nothing in the galaxy would have stopped him. So as the adults urged her once more to fill in a blank neither Quom or Aletha could fill, Rey shook her head and snuggled into her father’s loving embrace. Luke accepted his daughter’s decision to stay silent, and kissed her forehead as he continued to lovingly stroke her hair.

Of course, there was another part of the story that got left out, and that was where Quom and Aletha had endured a beating for Rey. As intrigued as Luke was about it, the others knew it was too dangerous to cross Plutt until they had set up the proper circumstances. Plutt would not get away with it, but they would like to have it end preferably with unsnapped necks.

So as far as Luke knew, this was the story of Felicity and Rey’s time on Jakku:

Quom had found Felicity and Rey in a walker where Rey had suffered heatstroke. Felicity saved Rey via CPR and bartered with Quom for his cool down pill. Quom brought Felicity and Rey into town and headed back out for the desert. Shortly after, Unkar Plutt had brought Felicity and Rey to Aletha. As Aletha treated Rey, Felicity made her comm attempts and came back without success.

Neither Quom nor Aletha saw Felicity and Rey for two weeks but Plutt was seen taking portions out of town every few days. Then the First Order arrived and searched for the girls for several weeks. Plutt threatened to cut off and/or kill anyone who turned in Felicity and Rey to the First Order. Both Quom and Aletha were interrogated by Captain Phasma but hid their knowledge out of moral principal.

One day Quom encountered a tearful Felicity Erso by herself. She claimed to have done something terrible for the greater good, and later implied that she had abandoned Rey. Felicity forgave Quom, and rejected her rings. She then asked Quom to return a speeder to Plutt’s goons and asked if Quom could, to help Rey if she needed it.

After her equipment was destroyed, Aletha was beaten by Phasma. Felicity intervened and turned herself in, saving Aletha. Though Aletha had fled, word had spread that Felicity was knocked out by Phasma and taken onto the First Order ship.

Aletha bashfully mentioned to Luke that Felicity promised compensation for her destroyed equipment, and quickly said he didn’t have to as Plutt had already replaced it. Luke just smiled and said they’d discuss it later.

Rey was then left in the care of Unkar Plutt until one day Rey got lost and wound up on Quom’s doorstep (or rather, in front of his tent flap.) She had gotten sunburn, so Quom took her to Aletha and they became friends with Rey. Rey started spending time with them everyday until an incident where Rey cut her knee at Quom’s. After that, Rey started avoiding the two of them.
Luke had raised his eyebrow at that. Rey had gone very stiff in his lap at the story, and neither Quom nor Aletha would look him in the eye. Clearly there was something more to the story, and Luke strongly suspected that it had to do with the mysterious beating. The only question was who was behind the beating?

“And then today I was coming back in from scavenging,” Quom came near the end of the story, “and I ran into you of all people. It wasn’t until you told me your name and left that I realised who you might be. I couldn’t find you so I chalked it up to coincidence. It wasn’t until Aletha came to me and said she had been accosted by you that I was certain you were Rey’s dad.”

Luke chuckled, “Considering my desperation, I wouldn’t be surprised if I did. My apologies, nonetheless.”

Aletha smiled and shook her head, “You know, Rey’s a lucky little girl. Not only does she have a Mama Nexu, but she appears to have a Daddy Nexu as well. I very much would not like to get between either you or your wife and Rey.”

Luke’s smile dropped slightly at the mention of Felicity, “We would do anything to keep her safe.”

“Daddy?” Rey looked up at him. “Why didn’t Mommy come with you to get me? She knows Mister Quom and Doctor Aletha. She could have told you we were friends.”

Luke bit his lip and avoided Rey’s eyes, “Rey-”

“I know she doesn’t like this planet!” Rey objected as if that were the reason Luke was about to give. “But she said she’d come back to get me! Why didn’t she come back?”

Quom and Aletha exchanged a look.

Luke sighed, “Rey-”

“And if she didn’t want to come, why didn’t you comm her and ask her if Mister Quom and Doctor Aletha were okay?” Rey demanded. “And why didn’t she tell you where my walker was so you could have come get me first thing this morning? I felt you, Daddy!”

“Rey-”

“And why didn’t Mommy-”

Rey fell silent at the look on Daddy’s face. There was anger, but even more so, sadness; a sadness that frightened Rey. The same kind of sadness that had been on Master Gavyn Kene’s face after Master Alyla died. The same kind of sadness that had been on Aunt Leia’s face when Ben ran away. The same kind of sadness that had been on Mommy’s face when she went away.

Rey didn’t want Daddy to have that kind of sadness.

“Daddy?” Rey whimpered, her fear shining on her face.

Luke couldn’t stop the sob that escaped him as he placed his hand over his eyes, shielding his tears from Rey. How could he tell her that Mommy wasn’t coming home?

“Rey,” Luke swallowed, taking a moment to compose himself. When he felt he could hold himself together, Luke took a deep breath and removed his hand. His heart broke as his eyes met Rey’s innocent hazel gaze. Gently stroking her cheek, Luke said to Rey with a hitch in his voice, “Sweetheart… There’s something I need to tell you… Mommy-”

At that moment the tent flap flew open and Unkar Plutt barrelled into the tent with his minions.

“There you two are!” Unkar Plutt declared jovially as his beady eyes set on Luke and Rey. The joy in Plutt’s voice was clearly false, and yet that’s what made it so dangerous.

As Rey tucked herself into the safety of her father’s arms as much as possible, both Luke and Aletha groaned at the interruption.

“Honestly, at this point I was expecting something like this to interrupt,” Quom shrugged.

Unkar Plutt grinned at Luke, “Well, it looks like you found your little girl, Master-”

“Erso,” Luke cut off before Plutt could reveal to Quom and Aletha that he was the famous Luke Skywalker.

“Erso?” Plutt frowned.

“Erso,” Rey nodded, a look of satisfaction on her face. She may not understand the game, but she did occasionally know when to play it, “It’s our last name. Luke, Fliss, and Rey Erso.”

Plutt looked at Luke, “… Okay.”

Luke couldn’t help but smile; it amused him that Rey would default Felicity’s name as her nickname Fliss. Luke never used it – secretly he thought the name Fliss was awful – but it was Han and Diego’s moniker of choice for Felicity, and Leia used it often. Clearly Rey had been influenced by those three in her usage of names and not her parents.

Then again, both Luke and Felicity had almost exclusively referred to themselves and each other as Mommy and Daddy to Rey. It was a small concession to Luke who always tried to speak to Rey as a level-headed equal.

Luke didn’t speak to Rey in the third person as Felicity did, nor did he judge her for doing so. It had been a coping technique Felicity practiced during her struggle with postpartum depression that stuck around years afterwards. It allowed Felicity to stop spending so much time placing blame and guilt on herself, and mentally removed herself from the equation so she could look at the situation objectively.

Ultimately that was the difference of their parenting styles, and a strange inverse of their personalities. While professionally Felicity was great at negotiating one on one, and Luke was great at mechanics and equations, Luke held the one on one approach to parenting while Felicity viewed it as an equation of the greater good.

There was no doubt in Luke’s mind that if he had been the one on Jakku, he never would have walked away from Rey.

Luke looked down at his blissfully unaware daughter. Rey knew that horrible things had happened over the past few months, but she didn’t understand why. Yet there she sat patiently waiting for answers and knowing it wasn’t her turn yet to speak.

Thank the Force, Padmé Amidala’s patience had been stronger than any of the Skywalker, Andromias, or Rhiaon genes.
Especially the Skywalker genes.

“Well, isn’t this a nice little picture?” Plutt gestured to Luke and Rey. “Father and daughter, all safe and reunited.”

Luke didn’t know why, but he suddenly felt the need to wrap his arms firmly around Rey.

“There aren’t words that can describe how glad I am to have her back,” Luke said politely.

For some reason, Rey pressed back against his chest as if trying to bury herself in his grasp. Luke could sense her fear. Suspicious, Luke glanced over at Aletha and Quom. Both were rather stiff and uncertain where they should be looking, but certain their eyes should be downcast.

Luke had a bad feeling about this.

“I don’t mean to intrude on your happy reunion, but I’m afraid we still have some business to conduct,” said Plutt. “Namely the issue of compensation for my services to care for your daughter.”

Aletha let out an involuntary snort. Luke frowned at her while Plutt shot her an icy stare. Aletha lowered her head, but there was a smirk across her lips.

“Yes, well, forgive me,” Luke said, “I’m still trying to assess the situation and understand what all has gone on around here in my wife’s absence. Quom and Aletha were explaining everything to me.”

Both Quom and Aletha’s eyes went wide and Plutt’s beady eyes set on them.

“Have they now?” the threat was clear in Plutt’s voice.

“Yes, they have,” Luke observed their reactions carefully. There was definitely something more to this Plutt situation than was being spoken. “Perhaps you might have something to add?”

“Depends on what they’ve been saying,” Plutt growled.

Quom looked away sheepishly.

Then his eyes set on it; Luke’s arms wrapped around Rey.

Quom quickly looked back at Plutt. Plutt was several feet away from Luke and Rey; close enough to be a threat, but far enough that they would have some reaction time to act. But the best part was that all of Plutt’s goons were backing him up, making their usual intimidating wall of muscle.

They were even further away from Rey.

“Doc,” Quom whispered.

Aletha looked up and Quom nodded to the goons. Not understanding, Aletha frowned at Quom but he kept jerking his head towards the goons. Aletha gave him her best “what are you saying” look and shook her head. Quom looked her in the eyes and very obviously let them drift over to Luke’s arms wrapped around Rey.

Then Aletha understood.

“Because from this moment on, the girl will always be within arm’s reach of my men.”

Aletha looked back at Quom and shared a gleeful look. Their eyes shared an unspoken conversation of “should we do it” and subsequent agreement. Plutt had made a grave error, and it was unlikely he would make one of this magnitude again. If they were ever going to do it, now was their chance.

Oh, this was going to be fun…

“Don’t worry, Plutt,” Quom laughed heartily, “we’ve behaved ourselves.”

“Of course,” Aletha grinned. “We wouldn’t dare cross the great Unkar Plutt. Don’t bite the hand that literally feeds you after all. No fear, Mister Plutt, we’ve only told him about our interactions with Rey and her mother. The personal conversations exchanged between you and us are none of Mister Erso’s business. We would never tell him that you had us beaten and extorted for taking care of Rey in the ways you purposefully neglected.”

“Excuse me?” Luke’s eyes shot to Plutt. There was a dangerous storm brewing behind his blue gaze.

“And we would never tell him that upon Doc questioning Rey’s need to be happy and comfortable you said.” Quom paused, “What was it, Doc?”

“I think he said, ‘I don’t give a damn,’” Aletha replied. She had always had a mind to remember conversations word for word. “And then he said, ‘Her mother told me to keep her fed, clothed, hydrated, safe, and distracted. I didn’t agree to entertained or happy or wipe her tears at night. It is not my fault that the girl is heartbroken and lonely. It’s the fault of the mother who abandoned her.’”

Plutt looked back at his goons in fear. That look usually was the signal for Roke to take his place by Plutt’s side, but with Luke Skywalker’s anger directing itself on Plutt, Roke didn’t feel the urge to put himself between his boss and the Jedi Grandmaster.

Aletha continued, “And of course we wouldn’t tell him that if we continued to take care of his daughter that you would stop taking care of her yourself, and then we would have a bigger problem.”

“Would we?” Luke said through gritted teeth. He could sense the honesty coming from Quom and Aletha, and even if he couldn’t, the fear coming from Plutt was more than enough to convince Luke that they were telling the truth. “And what problem would that be?”

Aletha pretended to be scandalized, “Why I could never tell you that the problem would be that if he stopped taking care of her, then he couldn’t get a reward from you. And even worse that if she wasn’t going to be worth anything to him, she wouldn’t be worth anything to us.”

“Yeah,” Quom chuckled, “and we wouldn’t dare dream of telling you that if she became worthless to him that he would have his men-”

Quom stopped as he noticed Rey’s fearful eyes on him.

“Snap her neck,” Quom had to say it, but he felt no delight as Rey buried her face against her father’s chest.

Unkar Plutt was honestly surprised he didn’t just explode on spot.

Silence filled the tent as all eyes fell on Luke. He said nothing, but his eyes were cold and dangerous. An energy filled the tent; it was hot and suffocating, a weight pressing down on them, crushing them, burning them.
“Daddy?” Rey whimpered. She knew it was the Dark Side of the Force and she was scared.

At the sound of her innocent voice, Luke looked down. He blinked. It was like he had forgotten she was there. He smiled down at her and then closed his eyes and took a deep breath. The Darkness washed away with the exhale of his breath, and Rey felt the Light fill her father once more.

“I love you, Daddy,” Rey whispered back, as if her words were some dangerous secret.

“I love you too, Rey,” Luke stroked her cheek, intimately pressing his forehead against hers. It was the same act he had done the last time he held her mother in his arms.

Aletha sighed in part happiness and part longing. It had been a long time since she had seen someone demonstrate that depth of love. Though over the years she had seen many parents rejoice at the healing of their child, there was something that much more special about a father declaring their love for their child when their child was completely safe in their arms.

And that was exactly what Quom had been playing off of.

“As we said, Plutt, we would never tell him that you threatened to kill his daughter.” Quom paused, “That is… unless she was safe and sound, literally in his arms while your goons are much too far from her to do any harm to Rey.”

“Yes,” Aletha grinned, “I can see us making an exception for that.”

Calmed by Rey’s presence, Luke was able to restrain himself from acting on the more Skywalker half of himself, and gathered the patience his mother had passed to him.

“Mister Plutt,” Luke said calmly, “may I have a word with you? Privately?”

Unkar Plutt swallowed and dumbly nodded. A dozen goons backing him up or not, Luke Skywalker was a man even Plutt knew not to cross, and now that Skywalker knew he had been crossed… maybe there was still some way to salvage this.

“I’ve got a building not far from here where I meet my traders from off-world,” Plutt said. “It’s empty now. We can discuss business there.”

“Very well,” Luke nodded. “Rey, Sweetheart, Daddy has to go talk to Mister Plutt for a few minutes. Can you stay here with Quom and Aletha?”

Rey’s eyes went wide.

“No, Daddy! No! Please don’t leave me!” Rey screamed, locking her arms around her father’s neck. Tears coursed fast and thick down Luke’s neck as Rey begged him not to leave her behind. It was too soon to be alone again; Daddy had only just come back. How could she be certain he would return if he went away again? “Daddy, no! Don’t go!”

“Hey, hey, hey,” Luke tried to soothe Rey, rubbing her back as she sobbed on his shoulder. His heart broke to see that Rey feared abandonment, but he certainly wasn’t going to deal with Plutt in front of her. “It’s okay. I’m not leaving you behind again. Okay? I promise I’ll never leave you behind again, but I need to talk with Mister Plutt and that’s a private conversation for grown ups.”

“I don’t care!” Rey sobbed. “I’m scared you won’t come back! Like Mommy didn’t come back!”
Pain coursed through the room as Luke struggled to calm Rey. Both Quom and Aletha wanted to grab her and promise that they’d make sure her daddy came back, but if Luke couldn’t convince Rey he would return, what chance did Quom and Aletha have? Tears shined in the eyes of many of the assembled as they watched the heart wrenching scene, and there was a loud sob that sounded suspiciously like it came from Roke’s direction.

Luke held Rey close as her words devolved into meaningless sobs. Her screams teared at Luke’s heart. How could he possibly assure her that he wasn’t going to abandon her?

And then he thought of it.

“Rey,” Luke whispered. He didn’t move or make any indication to their audience that he had spoken. Rey’s head buried in the crook of his neck poised her ears perfectly next to his mouth. His lips barely moved and the volume of his speech was nothing more than glorified breaths. “Rey, don’t cry. It’s going to be okay. I’ll prove to you that I’m not going to run away. Do you want to know how to do that?”

Rey still cried but she gave a small, indiscernible nod. She recognized the privacy of their conversation.

“Well, I can’t run away from you if you track where I am. Can I?”

Rey shook her head.

“Rey, if I show you how to track me, can I go with Plutt while you stay with your friends?”

Rey sniffed and nodded.

Luke smiled, “Reach into the Force, Rey. Can you feel my presence?”

Rey took a deep breath and closed her eyes. She reached into the Force like Daddy had taught her. She felt the energy surrounding her, warming her, embracing her, moving in and out of her with every breath. The Force was concentrated largely in the spot in space she occupied; it wasn’t like the spots where Quom, Aletha, Plutt and the others stood where the Force was moving in and out with each breath, but with a lower quantity.

“Find me, Rey,” Daddy’s voice whispered.

Rey concentrated and remembered how Daddy had explained finding an individual in the Force. He had explained it to her like colours; every presence, whether Force Sensitive or not, had its own unique colour. Presences were affected by genetics, being a mixture of their parents’ colours, yet were individual in their own right.

Daddy liked to explain that was how he had first sensed her in the Force when Mommy was pregnant with her. He had sensed a new colour in the Force, a sort of purple presence. Whenever Rey had reached into the Force she saw what Daddy meant. The energy occupying her spot had a lilac hue. Mommy’s hue was crimson, and Daddy’s was a sort of sky blue, like the colour of his eyes. Together that crimson and sky blue had mixed together to form lilac, half blue, half red, and yet a colour in its own right.

Of course bloodlines and their hues weren’t strictly mother and father related and not always as exact as the genesis of Rey’s hue had been. Aunt Leia’s hue was navy, a blue like her twin, strong yet calming.

Rey had always liked determining the hues of the people she loved. Uncle Han was a yellow-gold like the medal he had been given after saving Daddy in the Battle of Yavin. Ben was a green, dark like the ominous and scary forest on Rornian. Uncle Chewie was a golden brown like the shade of his fur. Uncle Diego was copper like the X-Wing he flew in the Republic Military. Poe was bright orange like BB-8. Uncle Lando was black like his hair and the market that he liked to trade things on (Rey always wondered why the colour of a market was so important. What did it matter if Uncle Lando used a black market or a white market? And why did markets have colours anyway?)

The Naberries had shades similar to mulberry, like the flowers they brought to Grandma Padmé’s tomb every week. Maz was saffron like the spices in the yummy dishes she made in her watering hole (Uncle Han had brought Rey there once in a really dire emergency and Daddy hadn’t been happy.)

Reine was charcoal like the dark metal of her lightsaber hilt. Obik was parchment yellow like the old books he read and organized as the Jedi Historian. Alyla was magenta like one of the pretty dresses she preferred to wear over the earth toned robes of most Jedi. Gavyn’s hue complemented hers as a deep violet, the colour of his daughter’s eyes, and a hue he had never been ashamed of. Zena was emerald like the lightsaber she was fiercely wielded (Rey had always thought Zena was Daddy’s best fighter.) Miri was aquamarine, the only colour present in both her mother and father’s hues and reminded Rey of the lake where Miri liked to go swimming all the time. Tyla was silver like ice to match the cold personality she always gave off.

Mister Quom was a rusty grey like the machine parts he scavenged and worked with. Doctor Aletha was a crisp clean white like the walls of a hospital. Mister Plutt was dirt brown, like the-“Rey, focus,” Luke ordered, sensing her trailing thoughts.

“Right, Daddy.”

Rey focused her attentions back to the Force and on finding his comforting sky blue hue. It didn’t take long for her to find it. It was entwined with her lilac hue, embracing it, guarding it, and protecting it.

“Found you,” Rey whispered, holding onto Daddy extra tight. The hue of his presence was calming like refreshing water pouring over her as she stood under a waterfall.

“Good,” Luke smiled, himself taking in her lilac hue. In his arms she felt like the flower of her hue; bright, lively, craving the light, always thriving best when surrounded by others, but tiny that could easy crushed with one careless movement. “Now, I want you to focus on me. I’m going to go to Plutt’s place and you’ll follow me in the Force. After that, I’m going to come right back. If you feel me divert my path in anyway, you have my full permission to come chasing after me. But you can only do that if you stay here with Quom and Aletha. Agreed?”

“Agreed.” Rey wiped her eyes and smiled, “Daddy, does this mean you trust Mister Quom and Doctor Aletha?”

Luke glanced at his daughter’s protectors, “Absolutely.”

Luke gave Rey one last firm squeeze of a hug and kissed her on the forehead, “Be good for your friends.”

“I will, Daddy,” Rey promised.

He gestured to Quom and Aletha, and Quom approached with arms outstretched in understanding.
With what could only be described as elegance, Luke gracefully stood, lifting Rey as his lap disappeared from underneath her. In the same motion, he placed Rey into Quom’s arms and turned back to Unkar Plutt.

“Shall we, Mister Plutt?” Luke asked.

Unkar Plutt frowned and looked at the suspiciously red-eyed Roke.

“If you’re going to make a break for it, now’s the time, Plutt,” Quom grinned. “Of course, then I’d have to tell the other scavengers you ran away with your tail between your legs.”

Plutt moved his hand to signal to his goons.

“Not so fast, Plutt.” Quom held up Rey like a shield, “I have Erso’s daughter. You can’t touch me.”

Plutt glared at Quom and declared, “Let’s move out, Boys!”

Rey waved at her father as he followed Plutt and his men filing out of the tent. She couldn’t stop the fear in her heart that Daddy would never return, but she also felt a new sense of hope.

“Come on, MG,” Quom plopped Rey on the ground when Plutt’s party had gone. “I’ve got a speeder to fix, and you have some identifying indicators of things buried under the sand to brush up on.”

“Yay!” Rey raced towards the toolbox.

Aletha just shook her head, “First, come here, Rey. I want to take a look at you and make sure you’ve been keeping yourself in good order while on your own.”

As Aletha led Rey to the corner to examine her, Quom sighed in contentment. He was happy to see Felicity Erso’s husband had finally come for his daughter. No doubt Luke Erso would take her away from them very shortly, and Quom would miss her, but at least he had gotten Aletha as a friend out of the deal. After all, they took kicks to the face together, and that kind of stuff bonds you for life.

There was a tap on Quom’s shoulder.

“Yes?” Quom turned around to find himself face to face with Roke.

“You set the girl down,” Roke smiled.

Roke slammed his fist into Quom’s stomach, and Quom fell to the ground.

“Nice doing business with you, Mister Tinadar,” Roke bowed his head and exited the tent.

Quom groaned and pushed himself up on his elbows.

“Worth it,” Quom grinned.

Quom collapsed back onto the ground.

Luke was silent as Unkar Plutt and his goons led them to a small building next to the nearly empty shipyard. It was a high-tech building for Jakku… by which high-tech meant it secured with locks and had air conditioning.

Luke waved off the offers of food, water, and to take his cloak. He just followed Plutt into a small room with a door, table and chairs set on either side. Luke wanted to be in and out of the building as fast as possible. This wasn’t a business meeting, but rather the chance to tie up the last loose ends of his agreement with Unkar Plutt.

Roke nodded to the other goons, and they did not follow Luke and Plutt into the room. The goons lined the wall of the hallway opposite of the door, and Roke stationed himself in front of the door, shutting it, leaving Luke and Plutt alone.

“Are you sure I can’t get you anything?” Plutt asked, trying to sound put together but his nerves getting the best of him.

“No, thank you,” Luke glided over to the table and pulled out a chair. “Let us have a seat.”

Plutt nodded and muttered a few things Luke couldn’t make out. Luke wasn’t sure if they were failed attempts at trying to come up with an apology or way to explain the issue away, or if Unkar Plutt actually had the nerve to utter a few insults to Luke Skywalker himself.

The bulbous mass that the residents of Niima Outpost called the Blobfish behind his back, took the seat across from Luke. Luke neatly folded his hands and placed them in front of himself on the table. He said nothing but watched as Plutt shifted uncomfortably under his gaze. The minutes stretched on as Luke enjoyed Plutt’s discomfort and fear, while Luke also took the time to figure out his objective in the meeting.

Finally, Luke spoke.

“I only want to ask this once,” Luke began, his voice calm and level. “Mister Plutt, do you think I’m an idiot?”

“What? No!” Plutt spluttered. “Please Master Skywalker, let me just explain-”

Luke held up his hand and Plutt fell silent.

“Good,” Luke lowered his hand. “You know… I grew up in conditions not unlike the ones in this town. Given, they were certainly better in some regards, but there is a general sense of Tatooine on this planet. One of the biggest similarities is the gang control in both environments. I grew up living under the thumb of Jabba the Hutt, and believe me, it was not easy. He controlled many things, but the thing I remember most is him controlling the water during a particularly bad drought. To deny water to a person is one of the worst things you can do.”

“With all do respect, Master Skywalker,” Plutt interrupted, understanding the veiled meaning behind Luke’s words, “I provide a valuable service by doling out food to the residents of Niima Outpost. We can’t grow anything here, and by bringing in and distributing food from off-world, I’m doing the citizens a favor.”

“I do not object to your food distribution business, Mister Plutt. It is your other activities that concern me. Now, I’m not a fool. I know that I cannot possibly waste my time on taking down gangs and their activities. There are too many in the Galaxy and more always spring up in their place. I have not come to shut you down. My job is not to seek out and take down criminal activities; it is to keep the peace.”

“Of course.”

“But I will make an exception when my family is threatened.”

Unkar Plutt said nothing.
Luke took a long pause, “Mister Plutt, have you ever heard what happened to Jabba the Hutt?”

“When I became a Jedi, I never intended to return to Tatooine and bring an end to Jabba’s reign of terror. There were far more important things for me to concern myself with. That is, until it got personal.”

Plutt said nothing once more.

“My best friend, Han Solo, who would later become my brother-in-law, was captured by Jabba the Hutt and held as hostage—”

“I heard he was a wall decoration,” Plutt snorted.

Luke raised an eyebrow and Plutt fell silent.

“The method in which he held Han hostage is irrelevant,” Luke continued, his voice level as ever. “I approached Jabba multiple times and tried to come to a fair agreement. He refused. Finally I came in person and offered a peaceful agreement that there would be no violence. If he did not agree, I would be forced to take action. I told him the choice was his but not to underestimate my powers… He refused.”

Unkar Plutt looked down at the table. Without his goons surrounding him and his concession stand to hide in, he felt very powerless next to the Jedi Grandmaster.

“You killed them all,” Plutt answered. “They say you used your lightsaber to cut Jabba the Hutt’s throat himself.”

“Well, actually my sister strangled him, but yes, me and my friends systematically murdered Jabba and his gang. Now people on Tatooine are safe, but many families mourn and crave revenge for their dead loved ones. It didn’t have to be that way for Jabba… and it doesn’t have to be that way for you.”

Unkar Plutt looked up in shock.

Luke looked Plutt directly in the eyes, “My first choice is always to forgive. I forgave Darth Vader; I certainly can forgive you. I don’t know what possessed you to think to threaten my daughter… my helpless, innocent, never did anything to harm you, five-year-old daughter… but I’m not certain you truly meant it. Maybe it was a reputation thing. I certainly have fallen victim to delusions of grandeur. Maybe you felt your income was threatened and that Quom and Aletha were too afraid of you to force you to act on your threat. Or maybe you really did mean to kill my daughter if you couldn’t get a paycheck. The fact of the matter is that my daughter ended up safe and in my custody. Ergo, I will forgive you and forget this matter.”

Unkar Plutt couldn’t believe what he was hearing, “Thank you, Master Skywalker! Thank you!”

“But if I ever hear you threaten her again—”

“It will never happen. I swear it.”

Plutt frowned, “Uh… Sorry, but don’t we still have an issue of money to discuss?”

“I don’t see that we do.”

Plutt scowled, “You promised that I would get a reward.”

“Yes,” Luke nodded. “If you followed the terms of agreement. Since you violated them, I see no reason to give you anything further.”

“Now listen here!” Plutt shot to his feet. “We had a deal!”

“And what deal was that?”

“I would follow everything your wife said, and she told me to keep Rey fed, hydrated, clothed, safe, and distracted.”

Luke glared at Plutt, “Alright, I’ll play your game. Yes, those were the terms of our agreement, but you did not fulfill those terms.”

“Now you listen here,” Plutt growled.

“I will give you that you kept Rey fed and hydrated,” Luke continued. “While Rey does noticeably has less mass than when I last saw her, I will chalk that up to the little nutritional value of rations. Now, that’s not me accusing you of not feeding her properly; I know well enough that rations are perfectly fine to survive on. I can’t tell you how many times I ate them during the war. As for the issue of water, I have been informed of its strange abundance on this desert planet, and not once has Rey complained of thirst. But do you really wish to argue me on the points that she was clothed, distracted, and safe under your care?”

“Yes, I will argue,” Plutt replied. “True, I may have not done the possible job that maybe I could have, but that girl has been distracted, safe, and certainly well-clothed while in my care.”

“Really?” Luke raised an eyebrow. “Mister Plutt, is it true that Doctor Kymeri treated my daughter for sunburn?”

“Well… yes,” Plutt frowned, uncertain where Luke was going with this.

“Third degree sunburns. Burns that the doctor has described to me as some of the worst she’s ever seen?”

“She’s the doctor, isn’t she?”

“Mister Plutt, why did Rey get this terrible sunburn?”

Plutt thought hard, still trying to figure out Skywalker’s game, “Because her skin was exposed to the sun.”

“Correct,” Luke gave a pleasant smile that did not reach his eyes. “She was burned because she did not have proper arm or facial coverings. Ergo, you did not keep her clothed.”

“A mistake, but one that was corrected.”

“But not by you,” Luke shot. “Don’t lie to me, Plutt. I recognize her tunic, boots, and leggings. I recognize them because they are from an emergency supplies bag stored in my X-Wing, a bag I know that my wife took to this planet. My wife dressed Rey in her clothing, and I know that Quom Tinadar provided her with the extras, as well as had a backup set of clothing from her. Is any of this information incorrect?”

Luke narrowed his eyes, “Mister Plutt, are you aware that both Rey and I have the ability to use the Force?”

“Of course.”

“And are you aware that I get visions through the Force of things that are happening or will happen?”

“Yes.”

“And are you aware that Rey is able to communicate to me through the Force via these visions?”

Plutt went white, “No, I wasn’t aware of that.”

“I thought not.” Luke said. “So do not sit there and tell me that you kept Rey distracted, because I know for a fact that every night Rey has gone to sleep in tears, wallowing in her situation, and begging for me to come find her. Or do you call that distracted?”

Plutt shook his head.

“I thought not. Now, the issue of safety-”

“Don’t you dare, Skywalker!” Plutt snapped. “I kept that girl safe from the First Order, and went through hell to do so. Sure, maybe I neglected a few bullet points, but that this was all about, wasn’t it? Hiding her from the First Order. Well, I did that! Don’t you dare try to weasel out of our agreement! You owe me big time for watching your brat, and if you walk away without giving me a single credit then I promise you that my boys are going to hold you here while they make a little visit to your precious-”

Luke slammed Plutt against the wall.

“Do not underestimate my powers!” Luke growled. “Especially when the situation concerns my daughter! Keeping her safe does not count when it’s keeping her safe from your wrath!”

“Boss, what’s going on?” Roke called.

The door swung open and Plutt’s goons barreled into the room. Roke stopped short when he saw Luke pinning Plutt against the wall, murder flashing in his eyes.

“Sir!” Roke exclaimed.

“Anyone who intervenes will not leave this room alive,” Luke warned.

Roke looked to Plutt, and Plutt gave Roke a frantic nod. Roke swallowed and signalled for the others to back down.

“Good,” Luke turned back to Plutt, who he was still holding in place against the wall. “I said I only wanted to ask this once, but it appears it needs to be reiterated. Mister Plutt, do you think I’m an idiot?”

“No,” Plutt whispered.
“I may be a good man who fights to justice and Light, but I am also a very dangerous man who has no qualms about ending your life if you or any of your goons touch my daughter. Rey is the only good thing I have left, and I will defend her with all of my skills and abilities. I’m not afraid of you, and I’m also not going to fall fool for your little act.”

“I just wanted what I was promised.”

“Shut up!” Luke barked. “Don’t you try to fool me! I know you’ve already been paid a great deal!”

“You... you do?”

“Do you seriously think I don’t watch my bank accounts? I know that several months ago, one of my accounts was emptied of a certain large sum. The exact sum that was on a credit chip connected to the account that was kept in the same emergency supplies bag that Rey’s current clothing was in. Felicity paid you enough to cover Rey’s expenses for five years and then some.”

“Okay, fine!” Plutt admitted, “She paid me. I just thought I might get an additional reward.”

“You thought wrong,” Luke smiled and released Plutt. He took a step back, “Now I’m a nice man, and you did fulfill some of your promises. My wife and I have been through a difficult time, and you helped ease part of the burden when you didn’t have to. Therefore, I will allow you to keep all the money you already were given. But there’s a few rules and here’s how things are going to go. The money was enough to cover the expenses of Aletha Kymeri’s equipment, which I’ve been told you helped replace. We will consider that debt settled. It was also enough to feed and care for Rey for her duration on this planet. We will also consider that debt settled. Now, it’s getting late and seeing as I didn’t know Rey was going to be alive, I don’t exactly have a plan for my next move at the moment, but I feel like I’ll probably spend a few days on Jakku making arrangements. Therefore, you are going to make an account book with me. Every day that Rey and I are on this planet, you will feed us three portions each. You will then deduct the cost from the remaining amount of money you received from the credit chip after we subtract the previous debts. We will use this account book to subtract any other deals I may make with you. Lastly, we will make a large subtraction today. I require a method of transportation on this planet, so you are going to use part of that money as my payment of buying a high-quality speeder with a full tank of gas. Are we understood?”

Unkar Plutt nodded, “And what happens to the money when you leave?”

“You get to keep whatever remains.”

“And what if you run out of money before you leave?”

Luke shrugged, “I suppose I would have to make another payment. But before you decide to fudge the numbers, there’s another rule for our deal. Every time we make a transaction, I will view our book and sign off on the deduction. Do we have a deal?”

Unkar Plutt hesitated, “Am I in a position to refuse?”

Plutt grabbed Luke’s hand and roughly shook it, “Done! Boys, someone get Master Skywalker a speeder. Or would you prefer Mister Erso?”

“I’ll be keeping my true identity secret, thank you very much. Now, that speeder?”

“This way, Mister Erso.”
Luke grinned and followed Unkar Plutt out of the room. He certainly didn’t trust Unkar Plutt, but he didn’t have a reason to worry about him. Plutt was afraid of the power Luke wielded, and swayed by the amount of money he possessed. And worse came to worse, Plutt was susceptible to the Mind Trick.

The important thing was that Luke had secured a way to keep himself and rey properly fed for five years. But that was absurd in itself. Luke wasn’t going to spend the next five years with Rey on Jakku.

… Was he?

Chapter End Notes

Ok, I know this chapter was kind of a tease about Luke telling Rey about Felicity, but I did intend on him telling her right before Plutt showed up. The problem was that once I hit this massively emotional level of a five-year-old who got abandoned by her mother being told that her mother was murdered, I couldn’t scale back the emotional level to have Luke deal with Plutt. It just wasn’t a good tonal fit to hit the peak of emotion and then lower down to anything else. So the next chapter will be a chapter mostly dealing with Rey’s reaction to Luke’s news and his subsequent decision to stay on Jakku.

And for those of who who want to know, there’s going to be a collection of chapters spanning the fourteen years of Luke and Rey on Jakku, with the occasional pit stop to check up on Han, Poe, Leia, and Diego in which I set up their storylines for TFA, and then we will finally be into TFA. So basically, next chapter ends act one of this story, and I promise that every chapter of the fourteen years on Jakku does set up at least one element for the later story.

Remember, even though the summary does say “basically Luke in TFA” this is really about the story of Luke being in Rey’s life. It is really important to me to show how her life changes on Jakku with Luke there before he changes her life off Jakku.

And if you’re still upset with me for wanting to take detours, blame Before the Awakening and Rey’s Survival Guide for having too much fodder for me to work with. I kept reading them through and going “hey, how would Luke react to that” “oh that’s perfect for Luke and Rey to spend time together” or “well, that would certainly never happen if Luke was around.”

This fic has ruined my ability to enjoy Star Wars stuff independently of it.

Chapter Summary

Luke makes a decision that changes the course of history.

Chapter Notes

Sorry that it’s taken so long to update but working retail during the holiday season and writing fan fiction don’t mix very well. Then I got knocked on my butt (again) with a nasty cold. I also took a little time to start writing a side fic about Felicity’s backstory and the theft of the Death Star plans called Operation Citadel. Please check it out if you haven’t already, especially since there are going to be parts of this story that reference the backstory that story establishes.

And of course, this chapter is dedicated to our beautiful Princess who left us too soon. Rest in Peace Carrie Fisher.

See the end of the chapter for more notes.

The Long Way Home

Chapter Seventeen

The Man Becomes the Myth

With his speeder issue resolved, Luke Skywalker exited Plutt’s building. He was going to head back to Quom Tinadar’s tent when he was surprised to find Doctor Aletha Kymeri waiting for him.

“Hi,” Luke smiled at her, unable to stop his confusion from seeping through.

“Hey,” Aletha grinned, walking up to him. “I thought you might need help finding your way back to Quom’s and came to walk you back.”

“Why not?”

“I managed to get myself a speeder from Plutt.”

Aletha’s jaw dropped, “You got a- …Oh my god! What did you do to get that kind of deal from Plutt? Witchcraft?”

“She’s fine. Quom managed to distract her with repairing his speeder. I told him no explosions next to the four-year-old.”

Aletha nodded. “My mistake. So… if you don’t mind me asking, what’s next for you and Rey? Heading out today, or…?”

Luke laughed at himself, “Honestly? I have no idea.”

“Come on. You must have some idea.”

“Not a clue.”

“Well, what was going through your mind when you came here to pick Rey up? ‘Whatever, I’ll think about it later.’”

Luke’s smile fell and he looked to the ground guilty.

“Of course,” Aletha nodded.

“Aletha… when I came here… I wasn’t expecting… I didn’t plan for… I thought…” Luke gave a loud sigh, “Aletha, I thought Rey was dead.”

Aletha’s eyes went wide, “Dead! Why?”

Luke rubbed his face, “It’s… a complicated story that might get you in a lot of trouble if anyone discovered you knew it, but the First Order had an interest in my family and captured my wife. She lied and told them that Rey was dead, and the First Order showed me enough evidence to make me believe it.”

“They didn’t capture your wife,” Aletha interrupted.

“The First Order didn’t capture Felicity. She turned herself in. Remember your wife’s apprehension for what it was: the bravest, most selfless act I have ever seen a mother do for their child.”

Luke grinned. After the hell Felicity had gone through with her postpartum depression and the lingering fears it had left behind in her, Luke knew that Aletha’s declaration would have meant the world to Felicity.

“She truly was the most… amazing woman I have ever had the pleasure of meeting,” Luke felt the lump forming in his throat. “It was the greatest honour in my life to be selected to be her husband and the father of her child.”

Luke looked back to the ground and fought the tears threatening to fall. Aletha gave Luke a sad smile. She touched Luke’s arm and a sob escaped from his throat.

“She’s dead, isn’t she?” Aletha asked softly.

Luke looked at her with wet, red eyes and nodded, “It’s my fault. She’s gone, and it’s all my fault!”

Luke clutched onto Aletha and sobbed harder than he had dared to in months. He rested his head on the junction of her neck and shoulder and wailed in a heart wrenching display. It was the first time he had truly focused on the loss of Felicity without alcohol or Rey being a factor. He had lost his soulmate, and he needed to experience the physical catharsis of letting it all out.

But Aletha didn’t care as she held Luke in her arms. It wasn’t like the other hugs Luke had gotten during his breakdowns about Felicity. It wasn’t Leia or Han holding him; struggling and failing to hold back their own tears. Aletha just held him, eyes dry, stroking his hair and alternated between telling him it was okay and making a soothing shushing noise.

years ago.”

“She wasn’t supposed to die,” Luke sobbed. “She was supposed to come back and we’d be together again.”

“I know. It was the same thing with Antar. He was supposed to go out, make his final stand against the Empire, and then we would live happily ever after. He wasn’t supposed to be shot down on these pathetic heap of a planet,” Aletha glared at the very ground of Jakku.

“How am I supposed to tell Rey that her mother is dead?” Luke asked, slowly pulling himself away.
“I wasn’t expecting to find Rey, and now not only do I have to figure out what to do next, but I have to tell her the worst news of her life.”

“Well, I’m not great with kids or mourning, so I can’t really help you with that, but I will say this.
Just remember that no matter how terrible this news you have to share is, this could have gone a lot worse. You could have lost both of them, or worse, what if you spent the next fifteen or twenty years thinking you had lost Rey and she grew up alone on Jakku?”

Luke shuddered at the thought. He could imagine it, being a bearded hermit on Ahch-to until one day the Millennium Falcon arrived on and he found himself face to face with his grown daughter he didn’t raise, her frame thin from starvation and loneliness.

That sounded horrible.

“Besides,” Aletha went on, “if that little girl has a tenth of the strength her mother had, she’ll be fine.”

Luke smiled, “Yes, she will be. I just have to be open and honest with her. Nothing from ‘a certain point of view.’ Just the full truth… But I still have no clue what to do next.”

“Why don’t you stay here on Jakku for a little while and figure things out?” Aletha suggested.

Luke was surprised, “Stay here?”

“Quom and I will help you with Rey any way you want, and apparently, the place Rey is staying is pretty safe and stable for Jakku. You could do worse.”

Luke hesitated at the thought of living for any amount of time on Jakku, “I suppose a few days couldn’t hurt, and it would give her a sense of normalcy which she probably hasn’t had in a while.”

Aletha just grinned at him.

“Oh alright,” Luke conceded. “We’ll stay for a little while.”

“Perfect,” Aletha looped her arm around Luke’s. “Come on. Let’s go tell that little girl her mother’s never coming home.”
Luke didn’t know why he smiled, “You’re not really great with this whole kid thing, are you?”

“You don’t even know the half of it.”

“Lead the way,” Luke gestured in the direction of his new speeder, and together they set off.

Thankfully for Luke, Quom had managed to distract Rey enough that her first question to him wasn’t the whereabouts of her mother. In fact, she was rather set on the idea of showing Daddy the walker where she had been living.

After Luke revealed his new speeder, the group agreed on driving arrangements, and set out for the walker. By that point, Quom’s speeder was functional again, and they tethered Luke’s new speeder to Quom’s (because Quom was driving), towing it behind them as they rode in Quom’s speeder. Quom led the way to the walker, instructing Luke on the landmarks he would need to memorize to drive to and from Niima everyday. Luke’s new speeder would stay with him, while Aletha and Quom would take Quom’s speeder back into town when it came to bow out, which they did very quickly after arriving.

Luke was naturally hesitant about the fact that his daughter had been living in a walker, but he supposed it could be worse. However, he wasn’t expecting the wave of guilt and nostalgia that swept over him as he entered the living space of the walker and faced the evidence of his wife’s history there.

So many little things were scattered across the room, and so many of them were tied to powerful memories.

The hammock strung up, Luke remembered sharing (not well as it was made for one person) during a mission gone wrong with Felicity, as they stared up at the stars of Thahd waiting for the next day’s rescue.

The water canisters he remembered filling up as he packed his emergency bag before leaving for Hosnian Prime. He and Felicity had spoken about the move to Ahch-to as he filled the canisters, unaware that they would be the difference between life and death for Rey and Felicity very soon.

The patchwork blanket containing his flight suit: the suit that Felicity would never admit drove her wild. He remembered the way she would always act coy, yet in control as she flirted with him, pressing herself suggestively against his body, yet lightly enough to tease him. And the way she would grasp the zipper of the suit and slowly drag it down as she gave him that smirk that raised the right corner of her mouth that he always made him want to press his lips to hers.

But the flight suit was also attached to bitter memories; the memory of the last time he had worn it. He had stripped it off quickly and chucked it into his emergency bag on the night Rornian burned. Though Luke didn’t know it, Felicity had wondered why he had taken off his suit that night. Why had he paused in that scene of panic, almost not making it in time to save Felicity, just to take off his suit?

That was because Felicity didn’t know that the blood on the suit didn’t belong to Luke. It was Reine’s blood that had stained the orange suit as she died in his arms. How could he ever again wear the reminder that Ben had murdered Reine?

“And that’s where I eat. And that’s where I sleep. Daddy are you listening?”

Luke hadn’t even realised Rey was talking to him, “Sorry, Sweetheart, I was just thinking about a few things. What did you want to tell me?”
Rey crossed her arms and shot him an annoyed glare in a way that reminded Luke far too much of Leia.

“I was showing you around.” Rey sighed dramatically and set her pilot doll on the hammock, “This is where I sleep with the doll Mommy made me.”

“I was wondering about that,” Luke grinned, realising he had yet to ask her about the doll. “Is that my flight suit?”

“Uh huh,” Rey nodded. “Mommy made it to make me feel better. She said it can be you, or Uncle Wedge, or Uncle Diego, or Poe, but I made it just be you. When Mommy was here we were all a set. A mommy, a daddy, and a me. But now it’s all wrong. There’s no mommy, two daddies, and a me.”

“Well, some families only have two daddies,” Luke pointed out.

“Like Uncle Wedge and Uncle Ceren?”

“Exactly. And it’s nice to know I can so easily be replaced by a doll,” Luke teased. “But I think I know how to fix our problem.”

“How?” Rey frowned.

Luke dug in his satchel and pulled out Rey’s Felicity doll, “Does this look familiar?”

“Mommy!” Rey exclaimed, snatching the doll and hugging it tightly. “Mommy said this went away in the fire.”

“Hey, even in doll form you know it takes a lot to bring Mommy down,” Luke grinned, and then realised he should probably change the topic before it segued into the bad news. That was when he noticed the marks on the wall, “Rey, what’s that?”

“It’s the count,” Rey set her Mommy doll next to the pilot doll. She followed Daddy as he approached the wall, “It’s how many days we waited for you.”

That almost brought Luke to his knees; the wall was covered in tallies.

“Rey,” Luke whispered, running his hand over the marks scratched into the metal, “how many marks are here?”

Rey shrugged, “I lost count.”

But Luke didn’t; he stood and counted all 192 scratches on the wall. He was horrified to realise that he had miscalculated and that Rey had been on Jakku not four months as he previously thought, but five.

Dear God, how many of those days had she been alone?

“I’m sorry, Daddy,” Rey said when she saw the horror on his face, “I know Mommy said not to use the sharp object myself, but I didn’t want to lose any points. And I didn’t hurt myself!”

Rey very quickly explained the promise Felicity had made about the tally.

“Can I still have my treats for the days Mommy wasn’t here?” Rey innocently asked at the end of her explanation.
“Sweetheart, you can have as many treats you want.” Luke frowned and touched a tally that had a small v above it. “Rey, why is this mark different?”

“That’s the day Mommy went away. It made me sad. I didn’t want Mommy to leave.”

Luke looked down at his daughter, “Rey, I promise you, Mommy didn’t want to leave you either.”

“Then why did she?” Rey had tears glistening in her eyes.

Luke picked up his daughter and sat the both of them on the hammock. This would be the hardest conversation he’d ever have in his life, but he knew what he had to do. Transparency was key. No stupid, traumatizing from a certain point of views. He would tell Rey the bitter truth, no matter how much it hurt.

“Rey, did Mommy tell you why she brought you here?” Luke asked.

Rey nodded, “She said that bad people wanted to make us do bad things.”

“That’s right. Well, you see Mommy thought you would be safe here until I came for you, but I made a mistake.”

“You wouldn’t answer your comm. You were too busy looking for us to find us.”

Luke couldn’t help but smile, “You really are a blunt one, aren’t you?”

Rey grinned, “I get it from Mommy.”

“Protect me from what?”

“The bad people found you before I could. They came to Jakku to take you away, but Mommy wouldn’t let that happen.”

“So she came to find you?” Rey guessed.

Luke shook his head, “No… she gave herself up to the bad people so they would go away and leave you alone.”

Rey frowned, “Why would going with them make them leave me alone?”

“But lying’s bad.”

“Not always,” Luke replied. “It’s like violence, it’s never good to lie but sometimes you have no choice.”

Rey struggled to work out what was going on, “So… Mommy’s with the bad guys?”

Luke closed his eyes, “…No. She’s not with them anymore.”

“Then where is she?” Rey asked. “And why didn’t she come with you?”

Luke didn’t know what to say next, it was an impossible scenario, telling his long thought dead daughter that Mommy wasn’t coming home. But he couldn’t avoid it anymore; Rey needed to know what had happened to her mother.

Rey’s eyes went wide.

“No!” Rey exclaimed. “No! You’re lying! Mommy said she’d come back! She’s coming back, Daddy!”

“Sweetheart… I’m so sorry,” Luke raised his hand to stroke Rey’s face. “But Mommy’s gone.”

Rey swatted his hand away, “STOP LYING, DADDY!”

“Rey,” Luke struggled to keep his voice calm for her, “I’m not lying. Mommy’s not coming back.”

“She promised she would!” Rey screamed, tears flowing down her face as her two tiny hands tried to shove her father away. “YOU’RE LYING, DADDY! WHY ARE YOU LYING?”

As Rey wailed desperately, Luke made a decision. Firmly, but not roughly, he grabbed Rey and held her against him. She struggled under his grasp, but his strength was far superior. Words came from her sobbing like “No” “Stop” “Liar” “Why” and “Promise” but the clearest and most frequent word was “Mommy.”

“I’m sorry,” Luke whispered as he held his crying daughter closely and tenderly. “I’m so sorry, Rey.”

Tears fell from his own eyes as he held her tightly as if he were afraid she’d disappear if he let go.

It broke his heart as his daughter wept in his arms, but Luke sat there stroking her hair and kissing the top of her head as Rey processed the horrific news about her mother. Slowly but surely, Rey stopped fighting her father’s grip and she clung to him desperately, her mind a mix of sorrow and fear.

Together they held each other, broken hearted but together, mourning the woman they loved most in the Galaxy. Rey’s grief came in waves as her sobs ebbed and then restarted, some new facet or reminder hitting her every few minutes. Her desperate pleas for explanation and insistence that Mommy was coming back eventually ceased until she just whispered over and over again the simple, loving word, “Mommy.”

As Luke held his daughter, he never wanted to let her go. The warmth of her body reminded him of how close he came to losing her, and her tears reminded him of the grief that had been inflicted upon her. He never wanted Rey out of his arms; he would hold her forever, not letting the cruel world ever hurt her again. Luke didn’t care what he had to do, lie, cheat, steal, murder, he would die before he ever let Rey hurt this much again.

Hours stretched on as they held each other, slowly allowing silence to fall upon them. As the sun set, Luke kicked off his boots and reclined back in the hammock, pulling Rey to lie on top of him.

Rey followed suit, kicking off her own boots with a glassy-eyed look that terrified Luke when he remembered it was the same look Felicity had in her eyes during her postpartum depression.

“It’s going to be okay, Sweetheart,” Luke whispered as he used the Force to summon the patchwork blanket and lay it over them. “I know it hurts now, but for I’m here for you no matter what. Okay? We’ll find a way to smile again, I promise.”
Rey sniffled, letting a long stretch of silence fill the walker as she stared up at the twisted metal above. Luke could see in her face that her mind was worlds away, wondering the same questions about Felicity that he had asked himself over and over in the past few months.

Then finally, Rey spoke.

“Daddy?” Rey’s voice was barely a whisper as if she were afraid to ask her question.

“Yes, Sweetheart?” Luke used his flesh and blood thumb to wipe a tear from her cheek. Neither Luke nor Rey hated his mechanical hand, but in that moment, he needed to feel her with his own flesh. Just as he had needed the first time he held her in his arms.

Rey swallowed hard, gathering the courage to ask her question, “Daddy… If I’m extra, extra, specially good… will Mommy come back?”

It broke Luke’s heart.

“Oh, Sweetheart,” Luke felt a fresh stream of tears roll down his face. He clutched her tightly, too tightly, but Rey made no protest. Her innocent question teared at his heart, awash with guilt and regret anew that he hadn’t been able to save Felicity. Luke’s voice shook as he fought a losing battle against sobs, “Sweetheart… Rey, I swear to you, if there was anything anyone could do to bring her back, I swear… She’d be here right now, holding you and drying your tears.”

Rey sniffled, wiping her nose on her arm, “Anything?”

Luke closed his eyes, debating his next words.

“Rey…” Luke whispered. “I would do anything to get your mommy back to you. Even if it meant trading my life for hers.”

“No, Daddy,” Rey buried her face in his neck. “Don’t leave me too.”

Luke took a deep breath and kissed the top of her head, his paternal strength filling him with determination.

But that was a promise he wouldn’t be able to keep.

Luke wasn’t aware he had fallen asleep until he heard the whisper in the Force that woke him. The first rays of the sunrise were creeping up the sands of Jakku when Obi-Wan Kenobi’s voice came to Luke in the Force.

“Luke… I’m sorry. I wish I could have told you the truth.”

Luke frowned as he looked around; Obi-Wan was nowhere to be found but his words echoed in Luke’s mind. Obi-Wan wished he could have told Luke the truth? What truth? About Rey? About Vader? About everything?

But Luke received no reply to his unspoken thoughts; just silence.

Frowning, Luke started to sit up when he heard a small groan. He had forgotten about the tiny girl lying in top of him. Luke smiled, joy filling his heart as he reflected on the fact that he could once more wake up to the sight of his precious daughter.
There was something symbolic about waking up that morning to the sun’s first rays. He woke up to a new peace that he had not experienced in many months. Bathed in the morning’s warmth, his daughter lay against his chest, soothed by the steady beats of his heart. The world had hope again as he had his light Rey of Light back in his life.

And now what was he to make of that life?

All Luke wanted to do was take Rey home and resume their life as normal, but that chance had literally gone up in flames. There was nothing to go back to in that life; no home, no Jedi, no Felicity.
But more importantly, there was no safety in that life.

The First Order had come for Rey once; they would come for her again.

Luke’s next thought was to contact Han and Leia; they would be so happy to hear that Rey was alive.

… Which was exactly why Luke couldn’t tell them.

He trusted his family with all his heart, but he couldn’t put them in that position. He especially couldn’t let Leia know the truth, not if Rey was to remain safe. Leia had made a grand gesture and accusation when she announced Rey’s “death.” Many people had resigned their jobs as a result, and the Resistance had profited by getting new recruits and supplies. If Luke told Leia that Rey was alive, she would be obligated to reveal the truth to the galaxy or else face possible charges of fraud.
And if the galaxy knew Rey was alive, then so would the First Order.

He couldn’t tell Han either; he wouldn’t put his brother-in-law in the position of hiding that sort of news from Leia. Luke couldn’t help but remember that bitter argument he overheard the night he ran away. Han and Leia had more than enough to fight about; Luke wouldn’t help one of them betray the other… not again. Not after what happened with Ben.

Luke couldn’t tell Han and Leia about Rey. The thought broke his heart. It wasn’t the answer Luke wanted – he wanted to be able to tell Han and Leia that Rey was alive – but ultimately, Luke knew both Han and Leia could keep his secret, but he also knew they shouldn’t.

But then what was he supposed to do?

Ahch-to was the next thought in Luke’s head. Yes, Ahch-to made so much sense! It was hidden, it was uninhabited, it was peaceful, strong with the Force, a place where they could live a good life, and most of all, it was his planned next move!

… Which was exactly why he couldn’t go there.

Luke’s face fell as the realization hit him. He had told Lor San Tekka what his plan was. He confided his plan, his location, and left behind a map directly to it. He trusted Lor San Tekka, but the man wasn’t infallible. If the First Order ever learned that Lor San had a map to him, they would take it by any means necessary. Worst of all, Luke would only have the Force as a means to be tipped off.
If he didn’t sense the First Order coming for them, he could find himself coming home to a burned down house and a dead family for the third time in his life.

And that would probably actually kill him.

But then, what was he supposed to do? Where could he hide that Rey would be safe. He wouldn’t let them take her, but it was only a matter before they started looking.

Luke needed to clear his head.
Naturally, Luke couldn’t help but wake Rey as he eased her off him to get out of the hammock. Thankfully, Rey was still in the middle of her early morning sleep fog, so while she did plead with her father not to leave her, so didn’t protest too much when Daddy whispered that he was just going outside and to go back to sleep. Luke smiled as Rey curled up in the blanket and went back to sleep with a look of utter trust and peace as she knew Daddy was there to protect her. She would be safe to sleep in her bed.

“I love you, Sweetheart,” Luke stroked a hand lovingly down the side of her face and kissed her forehead.

When he was young, Luke found it easiest to think when he stood in the sand, staring at the sun across the endless desert. The landscape was so empty, full of possibilities that his mind couldn’t help but clear.

What was he going to do? The only thing that now mattered to Luke was keeping Rey safe. He had come so close to losing, and he would never endure that again. It didn’t matter what he had to do to protect her, to hide her, to keep her away from the First Order. He would never let Ben take Rey away from him.

… Or so he thought.

But we’ll get there.

Luke stood there in the silence of the sunrise, trying to come up with a plan. Everywhere seemed too dangerous, too obvious, too hopeless. Where could they live that no one would think to look for them? Where was the last place someone would look? It couldn’t even be the last place, because the last place would be obvious as the first place to look. But then again, he also couldn’t go to the first place, because that would be too obvious. Luke had to figure it out. Where was the place that was the least obvious that wasn’t the most obvious but also not the most obvious that it would be the least obvious?

… Of course, it would probably be a lot easier for Luke to figure out the answer if there wasn’t someone standing behind him, staring at him.

Luke took a deep breath but did not turn around, “I thought I told you to leave me alone, Father.”

The ghostly form of Anakin Skywalker chuckled, but did not approach Luke, “Well, Son, I don’t know if you’ve noticed this, but I’ve never been great at following the rules.”

Luke couldn’t help the smirk that twitched his face, “Yes, my entire existence is proof of that.”

“Hey, don’t pin that all on me,” Anakin objected. “Your mother deserves at least fifty percent of the blame on that one.”

“Considering what I know of your relationship, I’d go more with twenty percent.”

“Forty-five.”

“Thirty.”

“Deal.”

A laugh escaped Luke’s throat as he shook his head. He knew he should be angry that his father had appeared to him, but part of him glad. After all, like some many times before in his life, Luke had questions that could only be answered by the mouths of the dead.
Behind him, Luke heard his father sigh, “Ask it.”

“The question in your mind,” Anakin’s voice was uncharacteristically serious.

Luke was tempted to reply with the question of how Anakin could sigh when he was ghost and didn’t need to breathe, but there was something pressing on his heart; a question that needed to be asked.

Luke sniffed, realising that he had the urge to cry. He wiped his eyes and nose on the sleeve of his cloak, refusing to let his father see him like that.

“Did…” Luke’s words caught in his throat as he struggled against an unbidden sob. “Did you know?”

Anakin closed his eyes and lowered his head, “Yes… I knew Rey was alive.”

“This whole time?”

Anakin nodded, “This whole time.”

Luke squeezed his eyes shut, lowering his forehead into his hand as he began to shake.

“Why?” Luke’s voice shook as violently as his body. He spun around, his emotions a flurry of anger and lack of understanding. “Why didn’t you tell me? You know that pain, Father! The pain of thinking your child is dead. Why did you inflict that upon me?”

Anakin looked very regretful as he slowly walked over to Luke and put a non-corporeal hand upon his son’s shoulder. There was no weight to Anakin’s touch, but Luke could feel the warmth.

“If I could have told you, I would have,” Anakin swore. “But there are rules to this, and you know that. I can’t tell you the living status, location, or specific current actions of another person. I couldn’t tell you that Rey was alive on Jakku, trying to reach you in the Force.”

“Couldn’t you?” Luke frowned. “When I was on Hoth, Ben told me that Yoda was alive and on Dagobah. Doesn’t that violate the rules?”

“You were dying of hypothermia at the time, Luke,” Obi-Wan’s voice reminded Luke. It seemed that Obi-Wan was more willing to respect Luke’s request to not appear to him anymore, and Obi-Wan’s form did not appear before them. “You were on the bridge between life and death, and the rules are more relaxed on the bridge. Why else would I have not told you about Yoda until three years after my death?”

Luke let out a singular laugh, “Well… that solves a mystery I’ve been wondering for seventeen years.”

“Hey, look Obi-Wan!” Anakin joyful exclaimed. “You were forthcoming for once! Gold star!”

“Knock it off, Anakin. There wasn’t much harm done by my secret keeping, and nothing that would concern you.”

“You let my children commit incest.”

“Oh, it always comes back to the incest with you two! It wasn’t like I was telling them to kiss.”
“Guys? Can we get back on topic?” Luke interrupted knowing if he didn’t put a stop to this, it could go on for a while. “Did either of you have any regrets about not telling me Rey was alive?”

Anakin’s eyes flicked to the side as if he was perhaps looking to an invisible Obi-Wan next to him. There was an odd look on Anakin’s face as he thought something over.

“Luke… I’m going to be honest with you,” Anakin said. “You know I’ve never been anything but forthcoming when I could. So let me just say this, if I could tell you everything, if I could tell you about Rey, about Felicity, about Ben, about Han and Leia, and Padmé, and all that’s happened, and all that’s to come, I would. You know, I would.”

Luke sighed, “Yes, I do know that.”

“I’m sorry that I can’t tell you everything,” Anakin continued. “There are things I wish I could have told you, and there are secrets that I wish I could tell you now.”

“But everything will be revealed in time,” Obi-Wan promised. “What matters now is what you choose to do next.”

“And what is next?” Luke asked.

“Things are coming, Luke,” Anakin warned. “Faces from the past, choices that will mean life or death, enemies who are friends, and friends who are enemies. Love, hate, betrayal, hope, death. But all that’s changed now that you’ve found Rey.”

“Changed?” Luke frowned. “Was I not meant to find her?”

“It is pointless to dwell on what could have happened,” Obi-Wan replied. “You have found her, and that’s all that matters.”

“Luke, now that you’re together this story could change,” Anakin said.

“The story that awaits you,” Obi-Wan answered. “For what happens when the First Order finds your daughter.”

Luke’s eyes went wide, “They’re going to find her?”

“You won’t be able to hide Rey forever,” Anakin continued. “And you won’t be able to hide yourself.”

“Nor should you,” Obi-Wan pointed out.

“The past will catch up, Luke,” Anakin said. “It always does. And when it does, how this story ends is up to you. How you’ll change it might mean the difference of life and death for the ones you love. Your family’s story, your family’s fate is now in your hands. Choose your next move wisely.”

Luke rubbed his temples. Their ominous words frustrated him as he tried to fill in the blanks. What was so dangerous to his family and how was he supposed to change it.

“And this story begins now?” Luke asked.

Anakin glanced at the invisible Obi-Wan again, “Uh… well… Not quite.”

“Well… You know how this family sort of gets a pattern of big adventures alternating with lulls? … You’ve reached a lull.”

“Have I?” Luke said in a cross-examining tone Anakin knew for a fact Luke had gotten from Padmé. He hated when Padmé got like this, and their son was no better. “How long is this lull?”

“That is not for you to know,” Obi-Wan answered.

“Are you kidding me?” Luke exclaimed. “You can tell me all this nonsense about lulls and the fate of the Skywalkers rest in my hands, but you can’t give me a timeline to plan accordingly?”

“See, this is why Padmé would have never made a good Jedi,” Anakin said.

“Your priority is to keep you and your daughter safe until the day comes to fight.”

A long silence followed.

“I’m not saying it,” Anakin crossed his arms.

“Anakin,” Obi-Wan warned.

“You can’t make me say it!”

“There’s no other way and you know it,” Obi-Wan said. “Think of your granddaughter, Anakin. Do you want something to happen to her?”

“Of course not,” Anakin snapped. “You think I’ve been sitting at her feet every night while she slept because I’ve been bored?”

“Watching over Rey for you,” Anakin confirmed. “Just because I couldn’t tell you about her, doesn’t mean I couldn’t alleviate her suffering a little. Why do you think no animal or stranger has come into her walker? I’ve been keeping them away.”

“Why didn’t she tell me?”

“Rey can’t see me, Luke. She doesn’t know.”

Luke smiled; there were tears in his eyes again, but this time they weren’t of sorrow.

“I would hug you, if I could,” Luke told his father.

“We’ll catch up in the afterlife. But didn’t go rushing there just to hug me,” Anakin winked. “You got a kid to think about. Don’t pull what I did and die right after getting her back.”

“I’ll do my best,” Luke chuckled. “So, tell me, where is it that the First Order would never think to look for me?”

Anakin sighed, “This hurts me to say, Luke… but maybe you should stay… here.”

“Luke, I would not advocate a member of this family living on a desert planet unless it was necessary.”

“But, why here? This is a place my family has a connection to.”

“The same reason I took you to your aunt and uncle on Tatooine, ” Obi-Wan answered. “It’s the last place your father wanted to ever step foot on, and the site of where your daughter allegedly died would probably be the last place you ever wanted to go.”

“Well, unless you were dumb enough to want to comb the desert for the body of a little girl,” Anakin smirked.

Luke locked his gaze on Anakin, “I blame your genetics.”

“I second that notion.”

“I’m not dumb enough to do something like that!” Anakin exclaimed.

Obi-Wan chuckled, “Anakin, do the words ‘I have the high ground’ ring a bell?”

“So, you really think I should stay with Rey on Jakku?” Luke asked. “It’s not exactly the best environment to raise a child, and I’d be at the mercy of Unkar Plutt.”

“Every place you go is going to have its dangers,” Anakin said. “But you’ll learn to make it work, and besides, I think you asserted your dominance over Plutt. He steps out of line, you put him back in his place.”

“I don’t know if I should be taking advice from a Sith Lord.”

“I never said you had to be a Jedi.”

Luke shook his head and thought about his father’s suggestion.

That temporary shot would end up being fourteen years.

“And that’s why we’re going to stay here,” Luke finished explaining their situation to Rey later that day. He of course, had not included every detail, but he told Rey what she needed to know and did not hide anything that would harm her down the line. “Do you understand?”

“I do,” Rey nodded sadly as they sat on the floor of the walker eating their lunch rations. “Does that mean we’re not going to see Uncle Han and Aunt Leia for a while?”

“I’m going to miss them.”

Rey nibbled at her bread, “Daddy?”

“Yes?”
“Is it still safe to use the Force?”

Luke was surprised at her forethought, “Maybe, not entirely. We could still use some things, but maybe-”

“If it’s not going to be safe, I don’t want to know any more stuff,” Rey refused. “You can stop teaching me the Force, Daddy.”

“Rey,” Luke slightly chuckled, unsure what to make of Rey’s decision. “You don’t need to stop.”

“Yes, we do!” Rey exclaimed. “I’m scared, Daddy. The bad guys want me because of the Force. Don’t they?”

Luke sighed, he hadn’t expected Rey to figure it out, “Yes, they do, but Rey, Sweetheart, I’m going to protect you.”

“You can’t always protect me,” Rey’s eyes glistened with tears. “You didn’t protect me when they pulled me out of bed. You didn’t protect me from Ben in the woods.”

“Rey-”

“You didn’t protect me when Mommy and I had to walk all that way. You didn’t protect me when I got hot and the world went dark.”

“Rey-”

“You didn’t protect me when Mommy went away. You didn’t protect me when Mister Plutt hurt my friends.”

“Rey-”

“But that’s okay,” Rey wrapped her arms around her father’s torso. “It’s okay, Daddy.”

Luke’s jaw hung open; was he hearing that right? Was she… forgiving him? He had spend so much time beating himself up over failing her and she had it in her heart to know and be willing to forgive him. It was unbelievable, after everything he had done, how could he deserve forgiveness? It was like… It was like…

It was like how he had forgiven his own father.

“Oh, Rey,” Luke wrapped his arms around her and pulled her in tight. “Thank you for taking after me.”

“I like having your forgiveness part,” Rey nuzzled his neck, enjoying the warmth of his embrace.

“I like you having the forgiveness part too,” Luke chuckled. He sighed, “Oh, Rey… what are we going to do? Jakku is such a hard place. I don’t want you to suffer.”

“I won’t,” Rey grinned and pulled out of his embrace. He started to tug on his arm, “Come with me, Daddy.”

Luke slightly frowned but followed her outside of the walker.

“When Mommy went away, at first I was really sad,” Rey led her father around the lopsided structure they had made their home. “I didn’t think I could live here. Everything around was so… Mommy used a special word. …Barren. She said it was barren.”

“It is,” Luke nodded. “Do you know what that word means?”

“Not really, but I think it means no sign of life.”

“Something like that.”

“Well, I was sad and didn’t think I could survive by myself… then I found this.”

Rey brought them to a stop in front of the walker’s hip joint. There was a little groove where a few millimeters of sand had accumulated. And growing out of that tiny groove was a speck of green: a tiny spinebarrel flower somehow alive in the dead desert.

“People around here say there’s no miracles,” Rey told her father. “But Mister Quom calls me the miracle girl because I made a miracle happen. Miracles do happen on Jakku, Daddy. Mommy saved me, you found me, and this little flower somehow manages to survive. And when I saw it, I decided if that little spinebarrel could survive here, so could I. We can do it, Daddy. We can survive here on Jakku without the Force.”

Luke was amazed at his daughter’s words, “You are a very wise person, My Little Rey of Light.”

Rey smiled up at him, “Whether big or small, life finds a way on Jakku, Daddy. We’ll find a way. I promise.”

And with those words, Luke knew they’d be alright. Rey was right, if that tiny flower could thrive in the desert, then she could too.

Luke wrapped an arm around Rey, lovingly pulling her against his side, “Thank you, Sweetheart.”

With another woman’s twinkle in her eye, Rey answered, “Anytime.”

And so, against his better judgement, Luke stayed on Jakku, the safest place to hide his daughter from the First Order. Aletha, Quom, and Plutt all thought he was insane for staying voluntarily, but secretly, each for their own reasons, was glad of his decision.

Luke was careful in how he introduced himself to others, and when Quom offered him a job as a fellow mechanic, Luke jumped at the idea. As for Rey and their ties to the life they left behind, Luke slowly began transitioning their bedtime stories and conversations away from the subject. He would not outright lie to Rey, and he would not gaslight her, but he knew it was too dangerous for Rey to have an open knowledge about their past while she was still so young and vulnerable. Ultimately, to Luke’s discomfort, he decided that the best course of action was to simply stop talking about the past with Rey and hope that one day she would forget.

Rey also continued to insist they distance themselves from the Force, but Luke knew he would continue to use parts of it to his advantage, even if it wasn’t openly in front of Rey. Someday he might teach her, but hopefully it would be before the end of the lull.

Now if only he could figure out how long the lull would be, but he knew he would enjoy every moment if it. Something was coming for them in the future, but for now, nothing else in the galaxy mattered but loving, protecting, and caring for his precious child.

So Luke Skywalker became the man called Luke Erso, and to Rey, the man who called himself
Luke Skywalker became nothing more than a myth.

Three Months Later…

“Happy birthday, Dear Rey, happy birthday to you,” Luke and Aletha sang as Rey grinned at the tiny cake set in front of her. A single lit candle proudly stood in the middle as Rey, Aletha, Luke, and Quom held their small gathering in Quom’s tent.

They were celebrating Rey's fifth birthday. Actually, it technically wasn't Rey's fifth birthday. Rey had turned five during her adorious trek in the desert, on the day she had gotten heatstroke and Felicity found the walker. Felicity had had more important things on her mind that day - like not letting her daughter die - and so it wasn't until a few days later that Felicity had acknowledged it when she knew they were safe and calm. They celebrated it alone in their walker with very little fanfare, and the night ended with Rey crying herself to sleep in her mother's arms wanting nothing more for her birthday than to be home with Daddy. When Luke arrived two months later, she and Luke were so caught up in being reunited that neither even thought about Rey's missed birthday. It wasn't until Aletha casually asked Luke when Rey's birthday was, that he realized his error and sought to correct it.

Luke couldn’t believe Aletha had actually pulled off getting Rey a cake for her birthday party. Apparently, Aletha had made a deal with one of the traders Unkar Plutt allowed her to make transactions with to get medical supplies.

Her most frequent supplier, a man named Jedek was a proud family man who liked to go on about his five children (a girl, two boys, another girl, and then the most precious baby boy you’ve ever seen, Jedek would always say.) Jedek had met Rey a few weeks after Luke’s arrival on Jakku and instantly taken a liking to her. Of course, with the rules Plutt enforced on Jakku, Jedek wasn’t allowed to openly give her anything, but every now and then he managed to sneak a treat for Rey in his business transactions with Aletha.

The cake wasn’t the kind of homemade cake Rey had celebrated all her birthdays with, but rather one of those mass-produced, small, packaged cakes one bought for a couple of credits at a refuelling station. The kind that was always sat next to stale strudels, questionable muffins, and cream-filled snacks that contained a person’s daily amount of calories. But still, after almost a year of eating nothing but rations, Luke knew that Rey was over the moon. If he hadn’t taught her drooling was rude, she would be doing it.

“Make a wish,” Aletha grinned at Rey.

Rey thought for a minute and closed her eyes tight. She blew it out on the first try and was met with a round of applause from Aletha, Luke, and Quom.

“Happy birthday, Sweetheart,” Luke pulled Rey in for a hug. “I can’t believe you’re already six years old. You’re growing up so fast.”

“Not fast enough,” Rey pointed out. “You still won’t let me drive.”

“Yes. For good reason.”

“Your daddy started driving racers when he was six.”

“Rey, what do we say about Grandpa Ani?” Luke asked. They had transitioned into calling Anakin Grandpa Ani as it would be harder for anyone to figure out who Luke and Rey were talking about.
“If Grandpa Ani did it, it’s probably a bad idea,” Rey recited.

“HEY!” came the ghostly shout of Anakin Skywalker in Luke’s ear.

“That’s exactly right,” Luke grinned, giving Rey another quick squeeze of a hug.

Aletha smiled at the happy moment and did her best to cut up the tiny dessert. The adults were willing to let Rey have the whole thing for herself, but Rey had insisted on sharing her cake.

“Uncle Quom, why didn’t you sing with Doctor Ally and Daddy?” Rey asked using the nicknames she had transitioned into using for Quom and Aletha over the past few months.

For Rey it was only natural to call a close adult male figure who wasn’t a Jedi, her “Uncle” due to her relationships with Wedge, Lando, Chewie, and Diego.

The first time she had called Quom “Uncle” she hadn’t made a big deal about it. It had been about a month after Luke came to Jakku that she did it. She simply slipped the term “Uncle Quom” into a casual conversation, not expecting it to stop Quom dead in his tracks. He had been shocked that Rey had learned to love him as an avuncular figure, and he was willing to take up the mantle of Uncle Quom.

Luke was relieved that she had found someone to fill the empty part of Rey that had missed Han, Chewie, and the rest. She had spent so many nights asking about when she could see them again, and struggled to accept that it was best they don’t see their family for a while. It had been especially hard for Rey to let go of Han, but over time Rey stopped asking about Fun Uncle Han so much. She still brought him up at least once a week, but she was phasing out of it.

Of course, it only made Luke feel that much guiltier to know he was making her forget Han.

But oddly, when it came to Aletha, Rey would not call her Aunt. In Rey’s life there was only one Aunt, and that was Leia. The other significant women in Rey’s life had been Jedi Masters and in Kalonia’s case, she was called Doctor Kalonia. Thus the term Aunt in Rey’s mind was for women she was actually related to. However, due to the whole debacle of the titles of Aunt, Uncle, Doctor, and Master, Rey had also formed the idea that she had to give everyone a title. Or at least people who were the age of her parents, having no title for people like Ben and Poe.

But Rey didn’t think about Ben or Poe anymore.

Feeling uncomfortable with choosing between Ms. and Mrs., Rey continued calling Aletha “Doctor” but had decided to switch into calling her Ally to signify that she had a close relationship with Aletha.

When Rey had explained it to them, Aletha and Luke had both been extremely surprised with how analytical the (then) five-year-old had been with her decision. Luke blamed his father-in-law, Alaric Rhiaon who had managed to logic his way into not only justifying disowning and betraying his daughter, but justifying creating a death machine that destroyed planets.

Then again, Anakin Skywalker had managed to convince himself the Dark Side was a good thing…but there was probably a lot less logic involved in that decision.

“Yeah, Quom,” Aletha teased, nudging him with her elbow. “Why didn’t you sing? You have a lovely singing voice.”

“I have my ways,” Aletha grinned mysteriously.

Luke wasn’t even going to bother asking.

“Vrogem do not acknowledge the survival of year by singing,” Quom said with a sneer, as if Aletha had just said one of the most offensive things ever.

After three months with Quom, Luke had learned that Vrogem culture was complicated, strange, and made very little sense. It was just best to not ask questions most of the time.

“So then how do you ‘acknowledge the survival of year’ in Vrogem culture?” Aletha asked.

Quom grinned and pulled a small neatly wrapped package out of a drawer, “With a gift.”

“Thank you, Uncle Quom!” Rey squealed in delight as she tore open the package and found a small paper book. She opened it and frowned, “Uncle Quom, the pages are blank.”

“Well then,” Quom chuckled, “I guess you should fill them up.”

“With what?”

“Writings. Drawings. Whatever you want. But I think you might get a little inspiration if you read the title.”

Rey squinted at the title and read aloud, “Rey’s Sir- Supper- Service-” “Survival,” Luke corrected and made a mental note to work on Rey’s reading skills.

“Thank you, Daddy,” Rey smiled. She tried to read the cover again, “Rey’s Survival Guide.”

Rey gasped.

“Like we talked about?” Rey asked hopefully.

“You fill those pages MG with everything you learn here,” Quom said. “Can’t let all that knowledge go to waste. And who knows? Maybe it might prove to be helpful to someone else someday.”

“Thank you, Uncle Quom!” Rey threw her arms around Quom. “My writing’s not so good right now, but when it goes better I’ll write the book. Promise.”

“Deal,” Quom smiled and hugged her back.

“Gets better, Rey,” Luke corrected her usage of goes.

“It will, Daddy,” Rey nodded. “Promise.”

“Alright, time for cake,” Aletha announced, and the group descended on the tiny dessert as the small, odd family they had become.

Though Rey did appreciate the present, it would be many years before she actually wrote her guide.

But when she did, written on the first page was the following:
If you’re reading this, then something’s gone wrong.

You’re stranded on Jakku – a barren little planet with nothing but baking sand, hot sun, and wrecked starships.

Stranded like me.

My name is Rey. I’ve been here my whole life, scratching out a living with the lost and the broken. I don’t know how I got here, or why. But I know it was a mistake – and somebody out there will make things right, someday.

That means I need to wait for them. And that means I need to survive.

And survive she did, but it wasn’t as big a struggle as it could have been, because one major change had occurred: she had her father by her side.

Although Luke’s presence in Rey’s young life could not alter every event and protect her from every danger or heartbreak, it would be quite reasonable to say that her life did change for the better. True, maybe Jakku was not the best place to raise a child, and maybe Luke could have done some things better, but there was no denying that until fourteen years later when BB-8 showed up on Jakku, Rey and Luke Erso were generally safe and happy.

But don’t get me wrong; those fourteen years were very eventful.

Chapter Notes

I DIDN’T WANT TO DO THIS! WHY DO I HAVE TO DO THIS! I HATE WHEN I HAVE TO DO THIS! I ONLY DO THIS FOR YOU PEOPLE TO HAVE A MORE ENJOYABLE READING EXPERIENCE! I AM SO SORRY! SERIOUSLY SCREW EXPOSITION AND HOW MUCH OF THE WORD COUNT IT TAKES UP!

… So yeah. I split the chapter in half again.

WHHHHHHYYYYYY?

TRIGGER WARNING: This chapter contains the description of violence against a young child. The events are limited to only showing the bare minimum of what is needed, the scenes are written tastefully, and Luke totally kicks their ass later, but this chapter does include a storyline of a young child getting physically abused. If you can’t handle the subject matter, you have my total blessing to skip this chapter, and I promise to recap the important (non-child abuse) events that affect the rest of the story in the author’s note of the next chapter. This fic is a safe place, and if at any point you have any issues with content or fears that certain content may appear in the story, please let me know so I can accommodate you. I have already worked out one arrangement regarding a person’s discomfort with certain content, and I am happy to make this fic as inclusive and comfortable for all of my readers. I love you guys and I want to keep you on this wild ride.

And for anyone wondering why I would include this in the fic, it’s suggested in the canon book Rey’s Survival Guide that something of this nature happened.

Finally, since each chapter in the life on Jakku section is supposed to be a full mini-story, don’t be surprised if the chapters start clocking in between 10-15k. We’ll go back to short chapters (6-8k is apparently my definition of “short”) when we get to TFA, but these mini-adventures need a little bigger wordcount. Hopefully I won’t have to split all of these chapters like this one.

See the end of the chapter for more notes.
If you can, fix it yourself. But sometimes that isn’t possible.

If that’s the case, tinkerers in the bazaar will recharge gear or let you poke through their replacement parts. Not for free, of course – nothing on Jakku is free except heat – but they’ll make a better deal with you than Unkar will.

- Rey’s Survival Guide

AGE SIX

“What planet was the capital of the Old Republic?” Luke quizzed.

“Coruscant,” Rey diligently answered.

“What planet is the capital of the New Republic?” Quom asked.

“Hosnian Prime,” Rey replied.

“Perfect,” Luke smiled. “Now hand me the 4 gage, rertal clamp.”

Rey hopped off her little stool in Quom Tinadar’s tent and handed her father the tool.

“Thank you,” Luke was lying on the scooter beneath a speeder, fixing the last few details while Quom tinkered with the engine over at the workbench.

It was another ordinary day in their mechanic shop. A few days ago, Quom had gone into the desert and pulled new material for he and Luke to work on. Rey would watch and help the men most days, and other days she liked to hang out with Aletha. Luke trusted Aletha enough at that point and Rey was over her attachment issues enough that Aletha could be with her alone.

Every day, no matter where Rey went, the three adults would homeschool her. Jakku had no school system so it was up to Luke, Quom, and Aletha to teach Rey all she needed to know. It was difficult at times to figure out exactly what they should be teaching her and what difficulty level she should be having. They all helped out each other, but they had settled into different areas of expertise.

Luke, being the one who interacted with the civilized world most recently, was in charge of history and language, both in dialect and the study of grammar and literature.

Aletha, having a medical degree, took on the subject of science, mainly focusing on biology while Quom proved to have an outstanding knowledge of geology.

And Quom’s main focus was on mathematics when he proved to be able to do complicated mental math as quickly as a calculator. Everything else they just sort of winged with whoever knew it best.

“Now, spell your full name,” Luke ordered as he pulled himself under the speeder to change the oil.

Rey paused to think, “Rey Erso… Resh, Esk, Yiry is Rey, and Erso is Esk, Resh, Sen, Osk.”

“Sorry, Daddy,” Rey apologised.

“That’s alright,” Luke assured her. “So, how do we spell Erso?”

“Esk, Resh, Senth, Osk. Erso.”

“Perfect.”

“Now what?” Rey asked.

“Here,” Quom walked over and handed a datapad to Rey. “Read that schematic, and I’ll quiz you on it in twenty minutes.”

“Yes, Sir!” Rey eagerly examined the datapad.

“Good girl,” Quom ruffled her hair. The tent flap opened, and Quom nodded to new arrival, “Morning, Ivano. Here to pick up your engine?”

“You know it,” Ivano Troade, a fellow scavenger nodded, dropping his pack on the floor with a loud thud. He nodded at Luke’s legs sprawled out from underneath the speeder, “Hey, Erso.”

“Could be better,” Ivano grumbled.

“Still trying to get that driver matrix?” Quom chuckled.

It had been a few weeks since Quom had stumbled upon Ivano at the same crash site trying to strip a driver matrix from a long, narrow shaft. Driver matrixes were worth quite a bit to Unkar Plutt, so Ivano was set on claiming it. The problem was that the shaft it was down was ridiculously small, which was probably why no one had gotten to it yet. But Ivano was determined to get that driver matrix if it was the last thing he did.

“Yep, still just out of reach,” Ivano said ruefully. “Hey, you wouldn’t happen to have a very large stick, would you?”

The statement was so ridiculous that Luke pulled himself out from under the speeder specifically to shoot Ivano an incredulous look.

“Or a pole,” Ivano offered. “A pole would work too.”

“Yeah, I don’t think it would.” Quom wiped one final speck of grease off the engine and proclaimed, “There! Done. That’ll be five portions.”

“Really, Tinadar?” Ivano scoffed. “Five full portions?”

“Sorry, Troade,” Quom shrugged. “I’ve got employees now, so prices are up.”

“You’re welcome,” Rey replied innocently.

“Besides, Plutt’s going to give you a minimum of twelve portions,” Quom replied. “It’s only a forty percent cost. Well… 41.6 repeat.”

“Highway robbery,” Ivano said.

“Hey, we could always keep the engine as payment,” Quom shrugged.

Ivano grumbled, “Fine. I’ll bring you the portions once I sell it, but I swear Tinadar, one more trade like this and I’m bringing it straight to Plutt next time.”

“Be my guest,” Quom grinned. “But broken equipment fetches far less, and you know it.”

“Whatever,” Ivano grinned as Luke got up from under the speeder and began wiping the oil and grease off his face.

“Oh, stop moaning,” Quom rolled his eyes. “You’re only upset because you can’t get that driver matrix.”

“It’s just driving me insane that it’s just out of reach,” Ivano complained. “Just another foot, but it’s too small to reach in the crawl space. I mean, what would I give to-”

He stopped when his eyes set on Rey.

“Hey, is anyone using the kid?” Ivano asked.

Luke frowned, the grease rag pausing on his cheek, “I beg your pardon?”

“The kid. The girl. Is someone using her?”

Luke’s eyes narrowed as he set the rag down, “You’re asking if someone is using my daughter?”

“Yeah,” Ivano nodded, completely missing the danger in Luke’s tone. “Is she free? I could really use her to get into that crawlspace. I’d give you a cut if you let me borrow her.”

Luke looked over at Quom and raised an eyebrow. Luke was incredulous that Ivano was asking to borrow Rey to get into a dark, dangerous crawlspace with the same cadence one would use to ask to borrow a screwdriver.

“Well, technically she is free,” Quom pointed out.

“I never said I was trying to,” Quom shrugged as he turned and started work on another project.

“So,” Ivano looked at Luke, “is that a yes?”

“No!” Luke snapped. “Of course, you can’t borrow my daughter!”

“Why not?”

“Are you serious?”

“Look, that driver matrix is going to be worth at least ten portions,” Ivano explained. “Now I know you’ve got some fancy deal with Plutt where you don’t have to worry about food, but the rest of us do. Ten portions could feed me for over a week, and I’ll give you a fair cut.”
“It’s not the economics of the situation that concerns me,” Luke said. “It’s the fact that you are asking to send my six-year-old daughter into a dark crawlspace that could be very dangerous.”

“He’s right,” Quom agreed. “The Doc had to deal with Rohm Skjed just last week when he walked into some jagged metal and sliced open his throat. Poor man didn’t make it.”

“Aletha was heartbroken,” Luke sighed. He really hated to see Aletha sad.

“We’d have a flashlight, and besides, she’s short,” Ivano offered. “Look, if you would feel safer coming with us—”

“So, we’re negotiating then?”

Luke felt like he was moments away from a blood vessel bursting in his head. He was about to yell at Ivano when he felt a small tug on his pant leg.

“What is it, Sweetheart?” Luke looked down at Rey.

“I wanna do it, Daddy,” Rey replied. “I want to help Mister Troade.”

“But I want to,” Rey pleaded. “Please, Daddy, I’m so bored sitting around watching you and Uncle Quom and Doctor Ally do things. I want to climb the ships like you and Uncle Quom.”

“It could be dangerous, Rey,” Luke pointed out.

Rey gave a wicked grin that looked like it could have equally come from either Felicity Rhiaon or Anakin Skywalker. “I live for danger!”

Luke grinned and shook his head; she was definitely the offspring of himself and Felicity.

“Come on, Daddy!” Rey insisted. “I’m not a little kid anymore. I’m six whole years old.”

Luke smiled, “You’re right, you’re practically ancient.”

Rey frowned, “Wait, if I’m ancient, what does that make you?”

A loud thud sounded as Quom dropped his toolbox from laughing so hard. Ivano had to prop himself against the workbench to hold himself up as he too burst out laughing.

“Laugh all you want. You both are older than me,” Luke pointed out.

“Excuse me,” Quom was offended, “but I am 103 years old; just barely out of young adulthood.”

Luke blinked, “Wait, you’re how old?”

“Daddy!” Rey tugged on his leg again.

“Sorry,” Luke shook his head. “Are you sure you want to do this?”

“Please, Daddy?” Rey begged. “Please?”

“Yeah, please?” Ivano joined in.
Luke sighed, “Alright… but I’m supervising, and we get a one-third cut.”

“One hundred and three years old?” Aletha repeated in shock, two weeks later.

She and Luke were washing dirty bandages at the small tent that offered laundry service (aka, tubs of water, scrub boards, and clothing detergent at a ridiculous markup.)

“I know, I was surprised too,” Luke hung the clean bandages on the clothing line. “How long do Vrogem live anyway?”

“Apparently, pretty long,” Aletha answered. “I wonder how many years he’s been on this planet? Do you think he saw the Battle of Jakku?”

“Who knows? It’s amazing,” Luke shook his head. “That means he’s seen the fall of the Old Republic, the entire war, the rise of the New Republic, the fall of the Old Jedi Order, the rise of the New Jedi Order, the fall of the New Jedi Order—”

Luke froze in fear. He had not confided in either Quom or Aletha his identity of Luke Skywalker. He trusted them, but still not quite enough. Even if he did trust them that much, divulging his identity would put them in grave danger, and he didn’t want that. They were his friends, and he had already gotten far too many friends hurt in the past.

“It was fairly recently.” Luke tried to change the subject, “How long have you been here?”

“I came shortly after the Battle of Jakku,” Aletha answered quickly. She clearly did not want to discuss the subject as she too tried to immediately change it, “So did Rey like scavenging?”

“I think a little too much,” Luke admitted. “She’s been begging me to do it again.”

“Aw, we’ve got ourselves a little scavenger on our hands.”

“Force help me if that’s true.”

“Hello, Doctor Kymeri,” a voice suddenly greeted.

Aletha turned to see a familiar Aqualish woman in a cast, “Hello, Mashra. How’s the arm doing?”

“Better,” Mashra replied. “Can’t wait to get this cast off, though.”

“Three more weeks,” Aletha said in her professional authoritative tone. “Doctor’s orders.”

“Well, I’ll have to stretch my rations a bit better. I was hoping I could sweet talk you into getting it off sooner.”

“Look, I know it’s hard to do, but this is exactly why I advise everyone to keep an emergency stash of rations. You never know when a three-day sandstorm is going to hit, or when-”

“You’ll fall off a ship deck and break your arm?” Mashra completed.

Aletha nodded, “Exactly.”

“Don’t rub it in,” Aletha teased, though a part of her agreed with her words.

Everyone on Jakku knew that Luke had a steady stream of food, and anything he earned working with Quom was pure profit. Usually he used that profit to purchase new tools, services like laundering clothing and baths, and various other items like new clothing and things to make his walker home more comfortable. It also helped that Luke could use the Force to sense good spots to scavenge, so he and Quom frequently hit the jackpot. Luke shared the wealth with his friends, especially Quom and Aletha, but sometimes it was annoying that Luke was what would be considered “wealthy” on Jakku.

“Actually, I had another proposition for you, Erso,” Mashra said. “I heard from Ivano Troade that you let your little girl help him a few weeks back for a one third cut. That sounds like a great deal. Would you consider extending the service to me?”

Luke’s jaw dropped, “I’m sorry, what?”

“I would like to borrow your daughter. How far in advance do I have to book? A week? Two?”

Aletha giggled.

“I’m sorry, I think you misunderstand,” Luke said, wondering exactly when he started renting out his daughter like heavy machinery. “My daughter did a favor for Ivano; nothing more.”

“Yes, and I’m asking if she could do a favor for me,” Mashra replied. “Come now, Erso, your daughter can’t possibly be that entertained on a planet like Jakku. Maybe it would be beneficial to have her doing something like this.”

Aletha shrugged, “Well, she does make a good point. The stimulation of investigation and getting a first-hand examination of how ships are put together might be good for her brain development which is paramount in a child of her age.”

Luke scowled at Aletha, “You and Quom are the worst.”

“Come on, Luke,” Aletha laughed, “how much longer are you really going to get have Rey sit around doing nothing all day? You said it yourself, she loved helping scavenge. Maybe you should give it a shot. Not all day, every day, but once in a while might be good for her.”

Luke sighed, once again finding his hands tied, “Alright, if Rey wants to do it, we’ll give it a shot.”

And that’s how Rey Rhiaon Skywalker became a scavenger at age six.

---

I worked for others at first, climbing into ducts and conduits too small for grown-ups. Some of the scavengers I helped were kind like Ivano Troade and Mashra. Others – whose names I won’t mention – thought I was their property.

-Rey’s Survival Guide

---

AGE SEVEN
Rey had been scavenging for a year when Jarex Zolhar and his posse approached Luke for her services.

Luke had stuck to a core group of people allowed to work with his daughter, mainly Ivano, Mashra, Quom, and himself, but he did occasionally let her work with others. Tym Montoya, Binz Scoty, Dione Aldan, Nyla Renarus, Zexter, Turgot Mynes, and Varé Malago had all passed Luke’s vetting system to work with Rey and were frequent customers.

Rey loved every moment of it, and Luke took great joy in seeing her so happy. She made friends easily, which was hard with how reserved most people on Jakku were. Ultimately, Rey could only count on Luke, Aletha, and Quom, and without them she would be lonely, but she did have casual acquaintances that made the days a little more bearable. She cried the day that Turgot Mynes messed up, forgot his cooling pill, and died of heatstroke in the desert, but Rey had to learn quickly that death was not a stranger in Jakku.

Luke was very strict about the conditions under which Rey was allowed to work. She could only work for three hours a day, you had to have a certain amount of food and water on your person, and a dozen more rules like that. Some people impressed Luke and found themselves on the very short list of people who were allowed to have Rey scavenge with them without Luke’s supervision.

It would be Jarex Zolhar and his posse’s actions that made Luke rescind that rule.

At the time Jarex approached Luke, Luke had forgotten that Jarex was the one who had made crude comments about Felicity the day Luke was reunited with Rey. Luke was also oblivious to the fact that it had been Jarex who attempted to turn Felicity in and was beaten by Phasma when he failed to deliver.

Luke thought himself a good judge of character, being able to use the Force to sense people’s intentions, but Jarex was a charming man. He was tall and handsome with dark hair and eyes. His clothing was as tattered as anyone’s on Jakku, but his signature was a small silver ring with the symbol of the Empire that he wore on his right hand. Luke had once asked Jarex about it, suspicious that the man may have once been an Imperial, but Jarex claimed to have gotten it off a body he once looted. Luke thought it was unethical until he remembered that Jarex was literally a professional scavenger. He was kind and gracious and generous when he approached Luke, causing no alarm bells to go off in Luke’s head.

“It’s just a couple places we want to hit, and your daughter would be a very valuable asset to help us,” Jarex finished his spiel.

“Yes, I can see that,” Luke said politely, “but Rey’s already got so many people wanting to use her, and she’s still a little girl. I can’t send her out every day to every person who wants her.”

“I understand that,” Jarex nodded. “But I think I have something to sweeten the pot.”

Luke crossed his arms, “Oh really?”

“Look, I’ve got a four-person team, so giving you a one third cut isn’t really feasible,” Jarex pulled out a data chip out of his bag and plugged it into his datapad. He handed the datapad to Luke, “I hope this might make up the difference.”

“What is it?” Luke examined the datapad. On the screen was some sort of numbers lesson.

“A schooling program. I found it in the desert several years back,” Jarex explained. “It was in the personal effects of an Imperial bunk. Probably some soldier bringing it to his homeschooled child.
Plutt wouldn’t give me anything for it, so I’ve been stuck with it for years. I figure that maybe you might be able to use it on your daughter.”

Luke examined the program and was blown away. It had almost everything he needed: spelling and vocabulary lessons, math, literature, science, and even history. Sure, it was Imperial era propaganda, but Luke could correct whatever was wrong and use it as an example of what the Empire was and not to trust the government implicitly.

“This is perfect,” Luke admitted. “But still… This is my child we’re talking about.”

“Erso, I have the utmost respect for you and your parenting,” Jarex swore. “I love kids and would never let your daughter come to harm. Please, come out with us tomorrow with Rey and let me show you how great a team we’ll be. Besides, don’t you want the schooling program?”

Luke sighed and looked down at the datapad. He really didn’t want Rey’s education to suffer, and Jarex did seem like a good guy.

“Oh, why not?” Luke gave in. “We’ll do it.”

After all, what was the worst that could happen?

It had been three months since Luke and Rey had started working with Jarex’s crew. Luke had left Rey and Jarex alone for two minutes while he and Dairh loaded some bulky pieces of equipment into the speeders parked outside. Returning, Luke came around the corner to find Rey standing on Jarex’s shoulders, head completely submerged in the exhaust vent she was rooting around in.

“What is going on here?” Luke asked.

“Hi, Daddy!” Rey called as Jarex gripped her legs tightly, trying his hardest not to let her fall.

“Hi, Sweetheart,” Luke said pleasantly and he wasn’t looking at Jarex with the happiest expression. “Jarex, I thought we discussed my rules about what is an appropriate method of boosting up my daughter.”
“Sorry, Erso,” Jarex flashed him a smile, “but Rey saw something shiny and I just couldn’t say no to her. You know this little one has me wrapped around her finger.”

It seemed all of Jarex’s team was wrapped around Rey’s finger. They stumbled over each other to dote on her, giving her whatever small prizes they found that would only be worth less than a portion. They loved to share their lunch with her, give her piggyback rides, and play with her. The girls, Fallah and Minati, adored redoing Rey’s hair into her signature buns which Rey still refused to change to honour her mother. Aletha had actually gotten quite jealous as fixing Rey’s hair was usually her job. Overall, the team had completely fallen in love with Rey and she had fallen for them.

“Got it!” Rey proclaimed. “Let me down! I wanna see what it is!”

“Alright, let’s see this treasure,” Jarex chuckled, lowering her to the ground.

As he set her down, the object in her grip became clearer: an old Rebel Alliance helmet that must have been blown off a pilot during an explosion.

“Cool!” Rey exclaimed as she took in her treasure, studying the symbols on the side.

Luke felt a lump in his throat; he had so many memories of strapping on a helmet just like that.

Each Alliance helmet was different, customized by their owner. There were many symbols pilots put on their helmets; but the most notable were the small Vs of different colours. The most morbid symbols of all, each V kept track of a pilot’s kill count.

The helmet Rey held had three yellow Vs on either side. A yellow V represented twenty kills, so the pilot who owned that helmet had made 120 kills in their career. Luke felt sick as he remembered flashes of the battles he fought and the lives he took. Luke didn’t know how many people he had killed in the war. Literally millions, as he had blown up the Death Star, but he didn’t even know how many he had killed in direct ship-to-ship combat. On either side of his personal helmet had been two yellow Vs and three red Vs. Each red V represented fifty kills.

Luke’s collective six red Vs and four yellow Vs boasted of 380 kills… Luke had stopped counting after that.

He tried to focus on the other symbols on Rey’s helmet. There was a yellow starbird, the representative of the pilot’s squadron.

When he was a member of Red Squadron, Luke’s symbol had been a simple red firebird, but when he became the leader of Rogue Squadron they changed the symbol. First off, the firebird had become blue (Red Squadron was not willing to give up their colour to even Luke Skywalker.) It was surrounded by a twelve-pointed star of fire, and at each tip was a miniature ship.

Thinking about the symbol caused a tightness in his chest. Luke had seen that symbol time and time again, long after the war, because it had been tattooed on the woman he loved.

During the war, Felicity had gotten arrested and one of her punishments was getting the starbird tattooed on her right shoulder to identify her as a Rebel to everyone. After falling for Luke, Felicity had the tattoo altered into the symbol of Rogue Squadron as a way to honour her original Rogue team as well as her love for Luke.

Luke had to tear his thoughts away from Felicity. He couldn’t believe that it had been almost two years since he lost her, but he still missed her so much. It hurt every day as Rey grew more and more into an image of Felicity. Every milestone Rey reached seemed an insult for Felicity not to witness. But Luke had to carry on because he knew she was never coming back.
He switched his attention onto another symbol on Rey’s helmet. It was one that adorned Luke’s helmet too; a symbol that denoted he fought in the Battle of Yavin. That same circle with lines through it sat on the back of Rey’s helmet near the base of the skull. That surprised Luke; did he know who this pilot was?

“Rey, what name is on that?” Luke asked.

Rey looked at the helmet and gasped, “Raeh!”

“No, Sweetheart,” Luke chuckled, “not your name. The name on the helmet.”

“No, the name is Raeh!” Rey repeated. She held up the helmet to her father, “Look! Resh, Enth, Herf! That spells Raeh!”

Luke’s jaw dropped, “Raeh?”

“Yeah! Raeh!” Rey exclaimed.

Luke chuckled as he took the helmet and confirmed the name on the side, “Well, would you look at that.”

“Daddy, what does this mean?” Rey asked.

Luke looked away; he didn’t like discussing destiny these days.

“Can I keep it?” Rey asked.

Jarex lovingly ruffled her hair, “Well, I can’t keep it if it has your name on it, can I?”

“Thank you! Thank you! Thank you!” Rey threw her arms around Jarex in a hug.

Jarex chuckled and returned the hug, “No problem, Little One.”

Luke couldn’t help but smile. As he watched Jarex with his daughter, he realised that Jarex truly cared about Rey. Finally, Luke decided that he could trust Jarex with Rey.

“You can’t trust him, Luke,” Aletha warned the next day.

Luke had finally consented to allowing Jarex and his team to take Rey alone for a few hours. Quom and Aletha had not been too pleased with the announcement.

“I think I can,” Luke replied as he sat at Quom’s workbench cleaning up Rey’s helmet. “My gut’s telling me to trust him.”

“Then your gut must be sick after eating too many rations,” Quom replied as he tinkered with his latest project. “Doc’s right. Jarex has a bit of a reputation.”

“I know he does,” Luke said. “I have been living here for almost two years now.”

“Wow, has it been that long?” Quom mused.

“You must not have noticed since you’ve already lived 104 years,” Aletha teased.

“I should have never told Luke my age,” Quom grumbled.
“Look, I know that Jarex can be intense,” Luke said, “but every time I’ve seen him with Rey, he’s focused on her safety and comfort. He adores her and treats her with respect. I have no reason to distrust him with Rey other than vague rumours about, what? Yelling matches at best?”

Aletha sighed, “I still don’t trust him.”

“Well, it’s not up to you to trust him, is it?” Luke snapped at a far more intense tone than he had ever taken with her before. “She’s my child, not yours! I’m not going to fail at protecting her! Not again!”

Aletha said nothing at his outburst, but fixed him with a pointed glare. A minute later, Luke had been firmly put back in his place.

“We are not your enemy, Luke,” Aletha sternly reminded him.

“I know that,” Luke sighed. “Look, I’ll keep an eye out, but until then, can you just please trust me to make good decisions for my daughter?”

“Alright,” Aletha conceded. “But I’m going to keep an eye on her as well.”

“And I’m grateful for that,” Luke smiled, glad that Aletha didn’t appear to be mad at him anymore. With one last wipe, Luke set down the polishing rag and declared, “There, all done.”

“Spiffy job, Erso,” Quom complimented. “Nice and ready for battle.”

“Rey’s going to be so happy,” Luke grinned. “I just wished I could tell her more about the owner of this helmet. I don’t recognize the squadron, and I only have the last name and a kill count. Not the best picture to paint for a child.”

“Here,” Aletha reached for the helmet, “let me try.”

Luke raised a brow, “You?”

Aletha shot him a look, “I will remind you, Luke Erso that I too fought in the Rebellion and met a few pilots myself.”

“Alright,” Luke tossed her the helmet, “give it a shot.”

Aletha grinned as she caught the helmet. She set it in her lap and looked down. Instantly the smile fell off her face.

“The Tierfon Yellow Aces,” Aletha said quietly. Ghosts flitted behind her eyes, “This is Captain Dosmit Raeh’s helmet. Yellow Leader.”

Luke and Quom shared a look. Aletha liked to tell Rey stories about the Rebellion, but every now and then, her face would drop and she would start speaking in that sad tone of voice. Usually it involved her husband, Antar and the query as to why Aletha had come to Jakku. In the two years Luke had known Aletha, she had yet to divulge the reason she had chosen to live on Jakku after the war.

“Aletha?” Luke reached forward and placed a comforting hand on her leg. His blue eyes met hers and he gently asked, “Is there something you want to talk about?”

Aletha sniffed and wiped her eyes on her sleeve, “No. Not at this time.”
Luke gave her a soft smile, “Alright. But know that if you ever want to talk about it… I’m here for you.”

Aletha smiled and placed her hand overtop his, “I know, but for now… Just tell Rey that Dosmit was a good woman and to take special care of that helmet.”

Luke nodded, “I will.”

They let the silence linger for a few minutes. Aletha didn’t ask Luke to move his hand from her leg, and Luke had no inclination to do so.

Aletha took a deep breath, “Please be careful with Rey and Jarex. You… You can never guess when you might lose the one you love.”

Luke looked down at the gold band he still wore on his left ring finger, “I know. Believe me… I know.”

For four months, nothing happened with Jarex; in fact, Rey had the absolute time of her life with him. She begged Luke every day to go have fun with Mister Jarex, and Luke was only too happy to comply. It sadden Quom and Aletha to see Rey attaching herself to someone else, but they were still there for her every day.

But try as she may, Aletha could never shake the feeling that Jarex was bad news. She stopped bringing it up to Luke because although he agreed that something felt off, there was no reason to doubt him. Of course, Aletha may have understood a little bit better why Luke wanted to give Jarex the benefit of the doubt if she had known he had been willing to give Darth Vader the benefit of the doubt as well. Still, every day Aletha watched Rey go off with Jarex and worried that something bad was going to happen.

And unfortunately, she was right.

It can take a couple of days to remove all the salvageable gear from an X-wing, so keep your lips zipped until it’s a chassis full of sand.

- Rey’s Survival Guide

Rey didn’t mean to do it; she honestly didn’t mean to reveal the location of their huge score to Dione Aldan. Rey had thought Jarex and their team had finished stripping everything from the X-Wing, so when she mentioned the site to Dione, she thought there would be no harm in it.

When Jarex announced they were going to the X-Wing again the next day, Rey knew she had messed up. Dione had already arrived at the ship with a team of others and was stripping the last few good things when Rey and the others showed up.

Rey saw Jarex’s face go red, and the team hopped back into his speeder so he could drive them away. For twenty minutes, Jarex drove, and no one said anything. Finally, they stopped where the sand stretched endlessly and there was no one in sight.
“Everyone out,” Jarex ordered coolly.

Rey diligently followed Minati, Fallah, and Dairh out of the speeder. They lined up side-by-side, and Jarex paced the length of them.

Rey was afraid. She no longer practiced the Force and had nearly forgotten about it, but she could still sense when something was wrong, and something was very wrong.

“Who told?” Jarex snapped.

Rey swallowed hard; if she stayed silent, the others might get hurt and that wasn’t fair to them.

“I did,” Rey said in a quiet voice, taking a step forward.

Jarex looked surprised, “You told?”

“Uh huh,” Rey nodded. She tried to keep her voice light because she knew that Jarex liked her and that she really shouldn’t have a reason to fear. “I’m really sorry. I thought we were done and I only mentioned it in passing. It won’t happen again, I prom-”

Jarex hit her.

The world seemed to stop.

Rey’s mouth quivered, her face buzzing with heat from the impact as she tried to process what just happened. Jarex had punched her in the face. Her hands started to shake as she breathed heavily, shocked by her friend’s actions.

Why? Why had he done it? Rey thought he was her friend. He gave her gifts and played with her. Why had he hit her? It didn’t make sense. He wasn’t the type of man who would hit a child. But he had, and that only meant one thing.

She had to have done something to deserve it.

“I’m sorry,” Tears streamed down Rey’s face, her heart thudding wildly in her chest. “I’m sorry! I didn’t mean to!”

Fallah, Minati, and Dairh didn’t know what to say. They couldn’t believe that Jarex had just punched a seven-year-old child in the face.

“What are we going to do?” Fallah whispered.

“We’re not going to do anything,” Jarex said, taking a deep breath. He composed himself, then smiled and got on one knee in front of the sobbing Rey. “Rey… I… I shouldn’t have done that. I lost my temper, and… and that was wrong. You just shouldn’t have told anyone about our site. Do you understand?”

Rey’s breathing was erratic. She looked at him with fear in her eyes, but his gentle tone and apologies soothed her.

“I understand,” Rey nodded. She looked at the ground, “I’m sorry, Jarex.”

“It’s okay,” Jarex pulled her into a hug. “We both made some mistakes and it won’t happen again. I promise.”
“I forgive you,” Rey said, not realizing he hadn’t actually apologized. “It won’t happen again. I promise.”

“Good girl.” Jarex glanced back to his team, “I don’t think we need to tell anyone about this, right? Rey, you don’t need to tell your dad, okay? This can stay between us.”

Fallah had an uncertain look, “But what if there’s a bruise?”

“Then she’ll say she tripped,” Jarex ordered. He looked sternly at Rey, “Right?”

Rey looked at Jarex in a confusing mass of emotions, “R- Right.”

“Good girl,” Jarex patted her head and stood up. “You’re not going to tell anyone, Rey. You’re going to keep coming with us every day, you’re going to sound excited about it, and most of all, you and everyone here is going to keep their mouths shut. Understand?”

Minati and Dairh didn’t look at all phased or disturbed by Jarex actions, but the scene unsettled Fallah.

“What if we don’t?” Fallah asked.

Jarex smiled at Fallah, “Whoever tells about this incident, or any future ones is going to get a lot worse than what happened today. Understand?”

Fallah looked away and Rey nodded her head.

Rey understood perfectly what was happening to her… she just didn’t know how to get out of it.

Two days later, Luke and Rey were eating their dinner rations when Luke noticed the purple bruising around Rey’s eye.

Rey nearly dropped her plate. For the past two days, she had done everything in her power to hide what happened from her father. She struggled to keep her mood positive and her face down. At first her eye was just swollen so she spent enough time looking at the ground that her father didn’t notice, but now that the bruising had set in, Luke couldn’t overlook it anymore.

“Oh, um, that,” Rey struggled to think of an answer.

She wanted nothing more than to tell her father what happened, but she remembered the threat of what Jarex would do if she told. She didn’t want to know what worse was, so she would do as he asked and keep her mouth shut.

“I, um…” Rey though hard. “I walked into a… a low hanging pole, yesterday. I mean, the other day. I mean… There’s nothing to worry about. Nothing at all… It was an accident. I’m… I’m clumsy now… Lately. Have been. How’s your dinner?”

Luke frowned; Rey wouldn’t look him in the eye. He set down his plate, then reached over and grabbed Rey’s hand. She looked up at him, nerves riddled clearly on her face.

“No, of course not,” Rey insisted.

Luke felt her hands shaking.

“Rey…” Luke’s words were cautious, “You know you can tell me anything.”

Rey wanted to tell him, but what could he do to help her? How could he protect her from Jarex? Her father may love her with all of his heart, but Luke Erso wasn’t a violent man and Jarex was. What chance would Luke Erso stand next to Jarex Zolhar?

Luke sighed, “Alright, I trust you wouldn’t lie to me about this.”

“I wouldn’t,” Rey lied. A part of her feared what he would do when he learned she had lied to him.

“Just remember, you can come to me with anything,” Luke promised, brushing his hand through her hair. “I love you more than anything or anyone in the universe. I would never let anyone hurt you, but I need to know there’s a threat before I can protect you from it.”

Luke gently pulled her into a hug, “I love you, My Rey of Light.”

“I love you too,” Rey buried her face into his neck and struggled not to let the tears fall. “Daddy?”

“Yes, Sweetheart?”

“…Can you hold me for a little while?”

Luke closed his eyes; he was certain something was wrong.

He needed to figure out what had happened. Aletha’s warning about Jarex came to mind, but Luke brushed it off. Rey hadn’t dealt with Jarex in the past two days, and she had been interacting with him with no incident for months. Jarex was a friend who had never so much as raised his voice to Rey before. No, it had to be something else.

Was it Plutt? Roke? Had she truly walked into a pole and just been upset by something different? Did the something different distract her enough that she had walked into the pole? And what could that something different be? A different one of Plutt’s minions? Was it a memory of Felicity? A flashback of Ben? Had she heard news about the First Order?

Luke had to figure it out.

Rey held onto her father and tried not to cry. She was being silly about this; it was nothing to worry about. She remembered times where her parents had gotten physically aggressive with other people. It had to be a normal thing.

No, Jarex was her friend, and she knew deep down that he would never hit her again.

But it did happen again.

And again.
And again.

It was a cycle: an incident would happen, followed by apologies and gifts, then she would do something that frustrated him until he finally snapped and hurt her again. For two months, Jarex abused Rey, and his team kept their mouths shut.

Rey struggled to keep the abuse hidden from her father. She would cover up the bruises, lie that she had done something clumsy, tell him she had been with someone other than Jarex, faked being overly happy and eager to spend time with Jarex, and do whatever it took to make her father believe she wasn’t being abused.

But Luke knew; he heard her crying at night and saw the bruises. Over and over he begged her to talk to him, to confess what was going on, but Rey refused. She simply pretended she had gotten clumsy, and with Rey hiding how frequently she was with Jarex, it was nearly impossible for Luke to figure out who was hurting his daughter.

So many people kept asking to have Rey help them and he had to narrow the list to discover her abuser. Slowly, Luke whittled down the list of people he trusted, and unfortunately Jarex’s charm and Rey’s silence ensured he stayed on the list. Luke tried reaching into the Force to identify his daughter’s abuser, but as more time went on that he stopped using the Force, Luke found his connection to it weakening. The Force wouldn’t help him discover who was hurting his daughter.

But who was doing it? Mashra? Ivano? Roke? Jarex? Plutt? Loathed he was to admit it… Luke had started keeping a close eye on Rey’s interactions with even Quom and Aletha. Luke was getting to the end of his rope. It was at the point where he was scared enough for Rey that he was seriously considering keeping them in the walker all day for a while.

Rey wanted to tell him, but Jarex terrified her. His threats never left her mind, and it seemed like lately nothing she could do was right. She deserved the bruises, and Jarex appeared so sad to have to hit her. He was kind though, Rey insisted to herself at night. He wouldn’t hurt her more than she deserved, and he’d just leave bruises, never break any bones.

She avoided her old friends now; Rey no longer could stand the scrutinizing looks of Doctor Aletha Kymeri. Rey didn’t bring her injuries to Aletha anymore because she feared the questions.

As the deception got deeper, Rey feared more and more the consequences of what would happen if she told her father the truth. She would be in so much trouble for sneaking off and lying. It was almost worth the bruises rather than seeing the look on Daddy’s face if she told him the truth.

Rey was trapped. It was as Jarex had said so many times: she was his property now and there was nothing she could do to escape.

Jarex was comfortable in his position; his team was too afraid to admit they had assisted in child abuse. Minati and Dairh had even started taking a few swipes at Rey too. Fallah on the other hand had completely freaked out and left Jakku on a merchant’s ship a few weeks later when she couldn’t take it anymore. Jarex feared that Fallah was going to tell Luke Erso what happened before she left, but she was too afraid of Jarex and had kept her mouth shut.

Things were going good for Jarex; he knew he had complete control over Rey. The girl would never tell her father, and even if she did, what did that matter? Jarex obviously could kill the man if it came down to it. No, Luke Erso was nothing to worry about, and Rey Erso was Jarex’s to harm as he pleased.

There was just one small problem with that thought. It’s wasn’t Luke Erso’s daughter, Jarex Zolhar was beating.

It was Luke Skywalker’s.

Chapter Notes

Also, today marks the one year anniversary of when I posted chapter one… so at this rate, Episode 9 will probably be out when I finish this story. Oh god, what have I done?

See the end of the chapter for more notes.

The Long Way Home

Chapter Nineteen

Something Strange About Him

Still, there are always new scavengers who don’t know the rules, or are desperate enough not to care. I keep my ears open in Niima so I know who might do something stupid.

-Rey’s Survival Guide-

“Aletha, can I ask you a question about child development?” Luke finally asked after two months of Rey’s abuse. There was just something too wrong about the situation to wave off anymore. He needed an answer.

“Of course,” Aletha replied. “Is it about Rey?”

“Yeah, look, she’s been getting a lot of bruises lately,” Luke admitted. “I was wondering if maybe children start getting clumsy during growth spurts?”

Aletha considered the theory, “I suppose some children might. They’re not used to the length of their limbs and start having mishaps.”

“So, that might be what’s going on with Rey?”

“Well, I would have to see the bruises to tell you for certain.”

Luke frowned, “You haven’t seen her bruises?”

Aletha sighed, “She’s been avoiding me, Luke. I think something’s going on.”
“I think so too,” Luke admitted. “I just can’t figure out what’s causing it… or who.”

Aletha let the silence linger for a minute, “Luke? …Is that why you’ve been keeping Rey from me lately?”

“Luke, you know I would never do anything to your daughter!” Aletha desperately cried. “I love that little girl!”

“I know,” Luke assured her. “And for the record, I don’t think you’re the one doing it, but I’m just trying to make sure. I’ve got to get to the bottom of this, Aletha.”

“I understand,” Aletha placed her hand on his arm and Luke visibly relaxed at her touch. “Let me help you, Luke. Next time Rey gets an injury of any sort, I want you to bring her in directly to me whether she wants to come or not.”

It would be a full minute of Luke and Aletha silently staring at each other and smiling before she moved away her hand. And truth be told… Luke would miss the feel of her touch.

“Daddy, I don’t need a doctor!” Rey whined as Luke led her by the arm to Aletha’s tent two weeks later. A nice black bruise was forming on her cheek.

“Rey, you’ve been getting hurt a lot lately,” Luke explained. “I just want to make sure you’re not sick.”

“I’m fine! Daddy, please don’t make me do this!” Rey begged as Luke dragged her into the tent.

“Sit,” Luke ordered, pointing at the cot.

Rey scowled and crossed her arms as she plopped down in the cot.

“Hello, Sunshine,” Aletha greeted, her voice sounding overly cheery and lyrical. “It’s been a while.”

“I’m not sick, Doctor Ally,” Rey said immediately.

“Well, I don’t think you’re sick, but I do see a nice bruise forming here,” Aletha leaned in close to examine Rey’s cheek. “Now how in the world did you get such a big bru-”

Aletha stopped dead, her eyes wide with shock.

“Luke,” Aletha’s voice was smaller. “Can you take a look at this?”

Luke was puzzled and raised a brow at Aletha before walking over.

“Right here,” Aletha whispered, pointing at a part of the bruise. “Does that look familiar?”

Luke frowned at the small, odd shape, “That’s… an Imperial symbol.”

“Exactly what I was thinking.”

“But what does it mean? Why would a bruise form like that?”

Aletha glanced at Rey. The little girl’s eyes had widened, but the second they met Aletha’s, Rey quickly looked down.

“Can I see you outside, Luke?”

“What’s going on, Aletha?” Luke asked as the tent flap closed behind them. “What’s that mark?”

“Luke,” Aletha carefully placed a hand on his forearm like she had done so many times before. It had become a gesture of comfort and support between the two. “That shape… is an indentation mark.”

Luke scowled, “I don’t understand. What does it mean?”

Aletha took a deep breath, “It means that… Luke, somebody hit your child.”

Luke’s eyes went wide as horror washed over him like being dunked in a lake of ice cold water. It was his worst fear… someone was abusing his child.

“No,” Luke clenched his fist. He was shaking. “This can’t be.”

“I’m so sorry, Luke,” Aletha rubbed his arm.

“How can you be certain? What is an indentation mark and why does it make you say this?”

“An indentation mark is a mark left behind when someone is hit with an object. If Quom smacked you hard enough with a wrench, the mark would take the shape of said wrench.”

“And the Imperial mark?”

Aletha cocked her head to the side, “A very small mark, wouldn’t you say? Almost the size of… I don’t know… a ring?”

“My guess is that he back handed her while wearing his ring,” Aletha observed. “And I would also guess that this isn’t the first time he’s hit Rey.”

Luke’s hands were shaking as his mind was abuzz with the situation. Over and over he examined every single moment between Jarex and Rey, searching for overlooked clues that signalled the abuse. Memory after memory shot through his mind, his brain obsessively picking out the most random details and analyzing them from every angle until there was nothing left to examine.

A smile from a hot day. A compliment on her skills. A gift given as reward. A request to spend time with Jarex. A lie that nothing was going on. Was there something beneath the surface to every action? When had the abuse started? Why didn’t Rey tell him? Why didn’t he stop it? Why didn’t he sense it?

Why her? Why Rey? After everything they had been through, why was she suffering again?

Rey was not perfect, but did she truly deserve the terrible things that had happened to her? Her home burning down, getting attacked in her bed, almost dying from dehydration in the desert, her cousin trying to kill her, her mother abandoning her, the mother getting captured by the First Order who shot her and did something horrific to the body, being alone for months while her father thought she was dead, getting abused by someone she thought to be a friend, and not to mention the incident Felicity never spoke of (even in his own thoughts, Luke did not like to dwell on what happened that day and what Felicity had done to Rey in the haze of her postpartum depression.)

Rey deserved none of this, just as Luke had never deserved the horrible things that had happened to him. Was it his fault then? Had he passed this life of misery and tragedy to his daughter as easily as he had passed on his jawline? Was the so called “Skywalker curse” not a simple joke, but rather the worst thing he could have done to his daughter? Was he a terrible father?

The last question was easy for Luke to answer: yes, he was a terrible father. For what else could he call a man who let his daughter be abused?

“How did I not see it?” Luke put his head into his hands. A few rogue tears slid down his cheeks as he let out a strangled sob. “How could I let this happen?”

Determination setting on her face, Aletha gently, but firmly pulled Luke’s hands down and lifted his chin so he was forced to look her in the eyes.

“You listen to me, and you listen carefully,” Aletha had her authoritative tone on. “This is not your fault.”

“Isn’t it?” Luke shot aggressively, yet not angrily. “I left her alone with him. Force… why didn’t she tell me? Can I not be trusted to protect her? Of course, I can’t. I let this happen. Why would Rey ever trust me after that?”

“Stop it!” Aletha ordered. “This is not your fault! This is a classic case of abuse, Luke. He probably has scared her into silence. After all, who’s more terrifying to a child? A brute who hits her? Or a man who likes to talk things out and gives unlimited second chances?”

Luke clenched his jaw, Aletha’s words ringing in his mind. She was right, no one on Jakku other than Plutt and his cronies knew of Luke’s true identity. No one feared him. He was the nice mechanic who could fix almost anything, had the sweet little scavenger daughter, and had an uncanny ability to identify wrecks with big pay offs.

No one knew about the lightsaber he kept hidden beneath his clothes, tucked away on the back of his belt. No one knew how he had duelled Darth Vader himself into submission, how he had slaughtered Jabba the Hutt’s gang, killed hundreds of Imperial pilots in aerial combat, and once killed several million people – his father-in-law included – with a simple press of a button.

No one on Jakku feared Luke Erso, or even knew what he was capable of.

But that was about to change.

“Luke?” Aletha called as he turned and marched back into the tent. “LUKE!”

He threw the tent flap open with a flourish, and Rey looked up timidly from the cot. Luke marched directly to her, and dropped to his knee in front of the cot to look Rey straight in the eyes. Her father looked angry, but there was still the gentleness in his eyes he always had for her.

In a moment, Rey knew the jig was up.

“Don’t,” Rey jerked her head to the side to avoid his gaze.

“Don’t,” Rey simply repeated.

Luke sighed and shook his head. Behind him, he sensed Aletha quietly slip into the tent. He took a moment to collect himself, recognizing aggressiveness wasn’t going to get him anywhere with Rey. Then he tried again.

“Rey,” Luke lifted a hand to turn Rey’s face back to him, but froze when he saw her flinch. He considered the implications for a moment, then sighed and dropped his hand. “Rey… please. Talk to me.”

“What’s to talk about?” Rey’s voice was watery.

“Rey…” Luke took a deep breath. “I need you to tell me the truth. Did Jarex Zolhar hit you?”

Rey sniffed and wiped her nose on her sleeve, “… No.”

“Rey,” Luke said her name again, soft yet sternly. Repeating her name was a subtle way to maintain control and authority over the conversation, while also pushing at her to correct her actions. “You are not a liar. You are a good girl; trustworthy and honest. Please do not lie to me. I don’t deserve that.”

Rey’s face scrunched up, contorting in sadness as she struggled with all her might to hold back her tears, “I’m sorry, Daddy. I’m sorry.”

“Oh, Rey. My Sweetheart.”

Luke lifted his hand again to touch her. Rey flinched once more, but this time Luke merely held his hand still for minute and then proceeded. He stroked the side of her cheek with his left hand, his natural skin ghosting over the bruise. Rey was sobbing, her breathing erratic, but was comforted by his warm, loving caress. Slowly, her cries ceased as Rey relaxed. She dropped her head to rest against his hand. Luke cradled her marred cheek and stroked his thumb in circles over her jaw.

“Daddy,” Rey whimpered.

“It’s okay,” Luke promised. “But we need to talk about why there’s a bruise on your face in the shape of Jarex Zolhar’s ring.”

“I… I’m sorry, Daddy.”

“But I lied to you, Daddy,” Rey confessed. “I lied to you a lot.”

“I know,” Luke could sense her fear through the Force. “But I’m not mad at you.”

“You’re- You’re not?”

“No,” Luke said in his how could you ever be so silly, but it’s okay, I love you anyway, and totally validate your feelings tone of voice. “Of course I’m not mad at you. But I can’t accept your apology until you tell me everything that’s happened.”

Rey sniffed and looked up at him, fear shining in her eyes, “Everything?”

Luke gave her a slight, mischievous sort of gotcha grin, “Everything.”
So Rey did. She told her father about the abuse, the cycle, the lies, the bruises, everything.

Luke didn’t say a word for Rey told him the story in a very familiar way. The way she told the story was identical to the way Felicity had once told Luke the story of her past. Luke knew that like her mother, Rey needed to get it all off her chest with minimal interruptions. There was a time for questions later, for now Rey needed validation that someone would listen to her and care.

“And that’s why I didn’t tell you,” Rey finished. “I was scared that it would get worse. It’s going to get worse, Daddy. Please don’t tell him I told you.”

“I can’t do that, Rey,” Luke shook his head.

“But Daddy!”

“No, Rey,” Luke said firmly. “I’m not going to let him get away with this. He won’t touch you ever again, Rey. I promise you, and he’s going to pay for what he’s done.”

“No,” Rey sniffled, the tears beginning anew. “No one’s going to be able to stop him. Not even you.”

Luke smiled, “Rey… That is a bet you don’t want to make.”

He brought Rey into his arms and held her tightly.

“Stay here,” Luke whispered, pressing a kiss to her forehead. Before Rey could object, Luke was on his feet and heading towards the flap of the tent. He looked at Aletha and said, “Watch her for me.”

“Where are you going?” Aletha frowned.

“To talk to Jarex Zolhar.”

Jarex and his posse were just getting out of line from the concession stand when Luke found them.

“Jarex Zolhar!” Luke yelled across the Outpost, completely uncaring that most of Niima Outpost’s residents were in the small area.

The son of a bitch of course greeted Luke with a smile.

“Erso!” Jarex greeted with a charming tone as Luke stalked across the market. “Nice day isn’t it? I was thinking I would take your little girl out and—”

Luke’s fist smashed into Jarex’s face, sending him sprawling to the ground.

As Luke stood over Jarex, he smiled. It was satisfying to see how much damage he could do without the Force and using his natural hand rather than the mechanical one.

All activity in the market had ceased to watch the scene of goody goody Luke Erso punching the daylights out of Jarex Zolhar. The residents gasped, whispering among themselves in shock and speculation of why he had done it and where in the Galaxy Luke Erso could have come from that taught him to punch that well.

Plutt and his goons, on the other hand knew that Luke Erso was Luke Skywalker, and knew that if Jarex Zolhar had pissed him off, they were in for a show. Roke had already started taking bets on how long Jarex would last. Only Dirk was dumb enough to bet that Luke wouldn’t end up killing Jarex, and the idea was ridiculous enough that Roke accepted the bet with 100 to 1 odds.
For a moment, Luke could have sworn he heard his father say, “That’s my boy!”

“Don’t encourage him, Anakin,” Obi-Wan’s voice followed.

“Son of a bitch!” Jarex cried out. “What the hell was that for?”

The market fell silent.

Niima Outpost was not the kind of place where people banded together. Luke’s friendship and pseudo family situation with Quom and Aletha was viewed with the same air people viewed polygamy on Coruscant, strange, unnatural, and harmful (not to mention the ridiculous rumour that the three-way friendship was a polygamous relationship.) Rey was not beloved by the community and people tended not to look down on crimes like assault and murder.

But child abuse was another story entirely.

Survival of the fittest was the way of life in Niima Outpost. If you were harmed by another, it was your own fault for not defending yourself and you deserved it. But a child could not possibly defend themselves against an adult and that was where Niima Outpost drew the line.

Jarex could feel the eyes on him as every resident of Jakku turned their hardened expression on him. Luke Erso’s furious expression was a sight to behold, but Jarex wasn’t about to yield to the likes of a mechanic.

“Seriously Erso?” Jarex tried to pass the situation off with a laugh as he slowly got to his feet. “You think I’d hit your kid?”

“I know you did,” Luke replied coldly. Out of the corner of his eye he could see Ivano Troade in the crowd just barely holding Quom back. “Rey told me everything.”

“Well the kid has got quite the imagination then, though I don’t know why she would turn it against me. Clearly the girl is lying-”

Another punch sent Jarex back to the ground.

“Why don’t we try that again?” Luke urged as Jarex held his jaw.

“Nice one, son!” Anakin cheered.

“Alright... I will admit that was a good punch,” Obi-Wan conceded.

“Taught him that, I did,” Yoda boasted.

Luke sighed; it was a miracle he got anything done with those three voices in his head.

Lucky for Jarex, Luke was not giving in to the worst part of himself. Han had made sure that Luke learned long ago how to throw a punch without giving in to the Dark Side. Though considering his mentors’ comments, he wasn’t sure he would be chastised if he had given into the Dark Side.

“Look,” Jarex slowly got to his feet again but put a few steps between himself and Luke. He glanced behind him at Dairh and Minati who looked extremely nervous. “I have no idea where this is coming from. I have never hit your child.”

Luke raised an eyebrow, “Then why is there a bruise in the shape of your ring on my daughter’s “Keepuna,” Dairh swore in Huttese under his breath.

Unfortunately it was loud enough for both Jarex and Luke to hear… and confirm Jarex’s guilt. Jarex winced as he met Luke’s steely gaze, and then gave a soft chuckle. With a smile still on his face, he turned to Dairh and addressed him in Huttese. Jarex hoped that Luke Erso hadn’t picked up more of the language than the usual curses and business terms thrown around on Jakku.

Jarex spoke to Dairh in a lighthearted tone to mask his anger from Luke, “Chuba doompa, dopamaskey kung.” [You low-down, two-faced scum.]

Dairh shook his head, “Jarex… Soong peetch alay.” [Jarex… It's too late.]

“Keel-ee calleya ku kah,” Jarex sneered. Without turning to face her, he said to Minati, “Koona t'chuta?” [You disappoint me.] [Going somewhere?]

Minati winced, her attempt to slink away from the group brought to the forefront of the conversation, “Jarex, chess ko.” [Jarex, be careful.]

“Minati,” Jarex growled.

“Uba cheesp bo coopa!” Minati warned. She gestured to Luke, “Haba hees azalaus. Uba heeta emeela!” [You better watch out!] [Maybe he is dangerous. You hit his girl!]

“Smeelleya whao toupee upee,” Jarex instructed Minati as he grinned falsely at Luke, trying to keep up the façade. [Smile when you say that.]

But Minati continued, “Bona nai kachu, Jarex.” [You're in trouble now, Jarex.]

“Schutta!” Jarex snapped. [Shut it!]

“Hees koona tah killee chuba!” Minati exclaimed. [He's going to kill you!]

“Sie batha ne beechee?” Luke calmly cut in. [Are you talking about me?]

Three sets of eyes widened in fear before Luke. Jarex, Minati, and Dairh knew now they were truly screwed.

“Hagwa boska blastoh,” Luke instructed as Dairh’s hand moved towards his blaster. Luke couldn’t help the smug look that consumed his face as he added, “Ubana nabuke wu.” [Don't go for that weapon.] [You'll never win.]

Jarex stared at Luke in horror and confusion, “Ah'chu apenkee?” [Who are you?]

Luke shook his head.

Jarex took a deep breath and plastered across his face the most charming smile in his arsenal.

“Eniki, hi chunkee fa goota?” Bargaining was Jarex’s only hope to get out of this encounter alive. “Ting cooing koo soo ah… er rateena.” [Ok, what's your final offer?] [I've got the credits… er
Luke’s gaze hardened, “Bargon wan chee kospah.” [There will be no deal.]

“Ban gon wan she co, cah,” Luke declared, pulling Jarex’s arm from around him. [There will be no bargain.]

“Rey harl tish ding,” Luke desperately fought the urge to punch Jarex a third time. Catching Dairh and Minati’s movements in the corner of his eye, he snapped, “Pasta mo rulya!” [Rey’s through with you.] [Hands off your weapons!]

Dairh and Minati held up their hands and took a step back from Luke.

Luke took a measured breath and then turned back to Jarex, “I trusted you. I trusted you with the most precious thing in my life, and you betrayed me. You hit my daughter. Don’t you dare try to deny it.”

“Fine!” Jarex snapped. “You want me to say it? I hit her. Happy now?”

Luke gave a mirthless chuckle, “You think that admission makes me happy? Why did you ever think it was okay to harm any child, much less mine?”

“Come on. Everyone knows the saying: spare the rod, spoil the child. You spoil your kid and I was just giving her a little much needed discipline.”

Luke clenched his fist; he was shaking with his withheld anger, “Well, your generosity isn’t appreciated. From now on, only I will be doling out punishments for Rey. Is that understood?”

“Fine!” Jarex barked, a little more intensely than he intended to. “I won’t hit Rey on our outings anymore! Now are we done here?”

Luke’s eyes narrowed, “You don’t actually think you’ll be allowed anywhere Rey from now on?”

“What? But I need her to get to the small stuff in wrecks!”

“You should have thought about that before you hit my child.”

“No!” Jarex snapped. “Rey’s going to continue coming with me or I will.”

Jarex froze; the look in Luke Erso’s eyes were terrifying. Something in the back of his mind – perhaps his survival instincts – were telling him back off.

Luke stepped forward so he there was barely an inch of room between himself and Jarex. Luke knew that dealings in Niima could not be solved with logic and negotiation. Deals in Niima were more primal in nature, and it was a battle of animalistic nature that went head to head. By standing so close to Jarex, Luke was asserting his dominance and establishing himself as the alpha male; a figure to be feared and never challenged.
“Let me tell you how this is going to go,” Luke said in deadly whisper; cold and measured, yet also loud enough that the people around them could still hear. “You are never going to interact with my daughter again, and if you are stupid enough to ever lay a hand on my daughter again… Anything you do to her… I'll do tenfold back on you.”

Luke turned to view the silent crowd watching them.

“That goes for everyone here!” Luke announced. “If anyone hurts my daughter, they deal with me. And as nice as I seem… trust me, you don’t want to get on my wrong side. Don’t believe me?”

“Well…” Luke chuckled. “I’m more than happy to provide references.”

Jarex glared at Luke and shook his head, “How dare you stand there and pretend to be the perfect father. You’re not!”

As he turned back to face Jarex, he struggled not to let it show how deep Jarex’s words cut.

“You let this happen for months,” Jarex laughed, “and despite knowing something was up, you still let it happen. You pretend to be the perfect father, but I know the truth. You’re no better than that obona wife of yours who left your kid to die in the des-”

The next thing Jarex comprehended was the intense pain of something metal slamming into his jaw. He fell to the ground, clutching his jaw as the metallic taste of blood seeped onto his tongue. A few of his teeth were loose and the main source of the blood, and his jaw hurt like hell to move.

Luke shook out his right hand, the sensors in his mechanics sending appropriate messages of pain to his body as the natural result of punching someone.

“What was that?” Jarex shouted, despite the pain of moving his jaw.

“I warned you,” Luke simply said. “I’ll do tenfold. That was for the bruise on Rey’s face.”

“What the hell?” Jarex clutched his face. “What in the galaxy even happened? That felt like you hit me with a pole… or a wrench… or- Or- Or… something that’s not a fist!”

“Oh, have I never told you?” Luke pulled off the glove that always covered his mechanical hand. He held up his bare hand, pulled down his sleeve, and flipped open the control panel on his false wrist to reveal the mechanics, “I lost my hand years ago. This one’s metal.”

Luke smiled as he enjoyed Jarex’s dumbfounded look and heard the murmuring from the crowd.

His enjoyment only got greater when he heard Quom exclaim behind him, “Wait. Was that not public knowledge?”

Luke couldn’t help but recall the day Quom found out about his hand, because it had almost been beat for beat the same as the day Han found out. In both cases, Luke had been working on fixing some electrical unit – the control panel of the Falcon in Han’s case, and a plasma conduit in Quom’s – only for the item to spark and zap his hand, shorting out the workings of Luke’s false hand. Both Quom and Han had asked if Luke was okay, only for Luke to assure them he was, and then proceed to open up his wrist and strip stripping wrists to their shock and horror.

“This is your only warning, Jarex,” Luke snapped close his wrist panel. He looked back to the crowd and said, “Everyone’s only warning.”
No one said a word as Luke marched out of the market, head held as high as ever, clearly overtaken with delusions of grandeur. The market was silent for a long time as they tried to process what had just happened. No one dared to make the first move and speak. What should they even talk about? Jarex Zolhar hitting Rey Erso? Luke Erso asserting a foreign amount of confidence and dominance? The fact that Luke Erso had a freaking mechanical hand.

Then… someone spoke.

“Does that mean I win the pool?” Dirk innocently asked Roke.

His only reply was Roke smacking him upside the head.

I try to avoid those scavengers but if it comes to it, I’m not arguing with a blaster. Anyone operating that way in the Graveyard isn’t going to last much longer anyhow – they’ll make a mistake and stop being a problem.

- Rey’s Survival Guide

“Luke, can you hand me that screwdriver?” Quom asked.

“Sure,” Luke muttering, moving away from the engine to fetch Quom his tool.

Luke’s confrontation with Jarex had been the previous day and Luke had been seething all morning as he and Quom worked in their shop.

Pulling their toolkit from its storage crate, Luke set it on one of the work benches and began to rummage through it.

“I was thinking I would take out your little girl.”

Jarex’s words from the day before haunted Luke. How many times had he said those words to Luke knowing full well he was going to beat Rey when Luke’s back was turned?

“Clearly the girl is lying.”

He had tormented Rey and made her fear her own father. Jarex had cared Rey into submission that she believed Luke would be more upset that she lied to him than that someone was beating her.

“Okay, what’s your final offer?”

And to think Jarex thought he could make it all go away with what? Some ration packets?

“Fine! I won’t hit Rey on our outings anymore! Now are we done here?”

And he had the nerve to think that Luke would let him anywhere near Rey anymore.

Quom worked on the engine for a minute as Luke stood silently next to the toolbox.

CRASH! went the toolbox as Luke suddenly lashed out and violently kicked the workbench over. A small clattering filled the room as various tools and miscellanea like screws and bolts spilled onto the Quom just stared at the overturned toolbox, “Well, that was unnecessary.”

Luke took a deep breath, “Quom, I’m sorry. It’s just-”

“No, I get it. Trust me, I don’t blame you at being mad at Jarex. I am too.”

“Really?”

“Of course. MG means the world to me. You don’t think I’d be upset at hearing someone’s been beating her? Last night, I seriously considered sneaking over to his tent and smothering him in his sleep.”

Luke shook his head, “I’d be lying if I said the thought hadn’t also occurred to me.”

“Well, what I don’t get is why you let him live,” Quom picked up the toolbox, and they started cleaning up the mess. “If she was actually my child – and I completely perceive her as such at this point, but I’m not going to oversteps our bounds – I would have teared him limb from limb.”

“Why not?”

“Because it can be very dangerous if I give into such darkness.” Luke sighed, he couldn’t possibly make Quom understand without confessing the truth about his past, “Look… it’s complicated.”

“I get it,” Quom waved off. “Part of that super secret past that made the First Order go after your wife personally. I won’t pry more.”

“Really? You don’t want to know?”

“Oh, I do want to know, but I also know that once I learn about your past, I’m probably going to end up on some list that means I could suffer the same fate as your wife. I love you like a brother Luke, but I really don’t want to be caught up in the kind of drama that makes a man think raising his kid on Jakku is the safest course of action. Force protect me from your past.”

Luke paused as he did every time Quom threw around the word Force. It came up every now and then, not enough to make Luke think Quom was a member of the Church of the Force, but enough to make Luke wonder.

“But I still don’t get why you simply punched Jarex three times and told him to stay away from Rey,” Quom continued. “I’d want to beat him to a bloody pulp and force him to leave the planet.”

“Jarex has nothing beyond scavenging,” Luke explained. “The only way I could comfortably force him to leave Jakku is to pay for the pilot to take him and give him credits to find his way in the world, and I’m not about to give Jarex Zolhar any credits. As for beating him to a pulp, I hit him a few times, but I don’t want to teach Rey that violence begets violence.”

Luke sighed and looked down at his mechanical hand. So much pain and violence in the history of the Skywalkers, Solos, Rhiaons, Organas, and Amidalas.

Han Solo tortured and frozen in carbonite. Padmé Amidala strangled while pregnant. Anakin Skywalker all of his limbs removed by lightsaber, then lit on fire and left to burn. Brendan Rhiaon blown to bits. Leia Organa tortured by her own father. Luke Skywalker hand cut off by his own father and electrocuted by the Emperor. Alaric Rhiaon killed in an explosion caused by his future son-in-law. Rey Rhiaon Skywalker attacked by her cousin. Ben Solo attacked by his aunt. Felicity Rhiaon a lightsaber slashed down her back by her future father-in-law, shot in the head by her nephew, and then…

Luke couldn’t bare to think of what Ben had done next to her.

“There’s been too much violence in my family,” Luke said quietly. “I don’t want that legacy to continue with Rey.”

Seeing the pained look on his face, Quom simply nodded and patted Luke on the shoulder.

Luke smiled, “Thank you, Quom.”

“So,” Quom closed the lid on their reorganized toolbox, “where is Rey right now?”

“With Aletha. I’m having her do a thorough look over Rey and talking to her to see if she can get any further answers from her.”

“Did Doc try to pull the ‘I’m not great with kids’ card again?”

“First words out of her mouth.”

“I don’t why she does that,” Quom shook his head. “She’s great with Rey.”

“Why are you humans always so mysterious?”

“Excuse me, but you’re not exactly forthcoming with your own past. I don’t even know why you came to Jakku.”

Quom just shook his head, “Hand me the wrench, Erso before I make you look for a new job.”

Jarex watched Rey and Aletha from the shadows of the tents across the makeshift street of the marketplace. Rey looked happy and was laughing with the Doctor. But Jarex’s thoughts were not of reciprocal happiness; in fact he was rather angry.

“Are you sure we should do this?” Dairh nervously asked.

“I agree,” Minati frowned at Jarex. “After yesterday, I don’t think going after Rey Erso is a very good idea.”

Jarex glared at his companions, “Shut it, both of you. After the way I’ve carried you two over the years, you don’t get to doubt my decisions. We’re going after her, and that’s final.”

Minati glanced at Dairh, “But why?”

Jarex’s eyes narrowed at Rey, “Because no one makes a fool of me.”
“LUKE! LUKE!” Aletha’s desperate screams far preceded her dramatic entrance into the workshop.

“LUKE!”

“Aletha?” Luke instantly dropped his tools and rushed to her side.

Tears were streaming from Aletha’s eyes, her clothes were torn, hair mussed, and her face was bloody and bruised like someone had smashed her face first into a piece of machinery.

“What’s going on, Doc?” Quom too was at her side, his own project abandoned. “Did someone attack you?”

Luke was headed for his speeder instantly.

Jarex had taken his daughter, and he was going to make him pay.

“I tried to stop them, but there was three of them,” Aletha explained through her tears. “I’m so sorry, Luke.”

“It’s okay, Aletha,” Luke muttered, his mind focused on nothing but getting Rey back. He had no idea where they would take her, but he knew exactly how to find them.

Then Luke’s fury rose.

“Why not?” Luke hollered, whipping around more than ready to tear Quom to shreds for impeding the way to Rey. But he stopped dead when he saw Quom open the lid to a familiar box.

“Because you’re not armed,” Quom pulled out a blaster from his weapons case. He immediately began fastening as many weapons as possible to his person.

Luke smiled and joined him at the case with Aletha he started to pick out her own weapons. Though quick, Luke selected his weapons with much thought as the weight of his hidden lightsaber pressed against his back. There was no denying that this confrontation would end in violence, but he would only use his lightsaber as the absolute last resort.

“Getting Rey out safely is the priority,” Luke instructed as he reloaded his blaster’s power cell. “We should take two speeders. Quom and I will go in the first, Aletha, you in the second. Once we have Rey, I want you to take her and go, Aletha.”

“You think I can’t handle myself?” Aletha said with an edge to her voice.

Quom and Luke watched silently as Aletha dramatically cocked and set a very large blaster rifle in flawless, fluid motion. They had seen her shoot enough steelpeckers to know the damage she could do.

“That’s not it at all,” Luke said carefully.

He used his hand to gently lower the barrel of Aletha’s rifle. She was taking a practice aim with to check if the scope was properly functioning. Luke was reminded in that moment of his friend, Diego Nalto and his similar affinity for sniper weapons.
“It’s because you’re a doctor,” Luke explained, “and I think Rey would be in more need of you after this than Quom.”

“Alright, then,” Aletha strapped on her final weapon. “Then let’s roll, boys.”

Looking quite imposing, the trio exited the tent and made their way to the speeders. It wasn’t really an unusual sight in Niima to see a group of heavily armed people head out as if they were on a mission, but the sight of Luke, Quom, and Aletha still turned some heads. Friendly mechanic Luke Erso, generally passive Quom Tinadar, and kindly Doctor Aletha Kymeri weren’t usually part of those groups.

“Luke, how are we supposed to find them?” Aletha asked as she crawled into Quom’s speeder – her own was parked by her tent. “We don’t know where they’re headed.”

“Oh, I’ll find them,” Luke’s face was serious and determined. “I’ll find them.”

Aletha and Quom didn’t ask any questions. They had long ago learned that if Luke Erso side he could do something and offered no other explanation, that meant he could unquestioningly do it.

As they set off, Luke focused more energy into the Force than he had in years. He stretched out with his mind using all his might to find that familiar like lilac-coloured Force Signature.

And sure enough, he found it.

If they doubted Luke’s ability to find Rey, it was confirmed when they heard her screams a few minute before arriving.

There they were, Jarex, Dairh, and Minati surrounding a screaming Rey next to some old shipwreck.

“You’ll go in there now!” Jarex roared, a tight grip on Rey’s wrist.

“No!” Rey shouted defiantly, but the fear was clear in her eyes. “I’m not afraid of you! Daddy said I don’t have to listen to you!”

“You’ll do what I say or I swear I will kill you! Now, get in there!”

He threw her against the jagged wreck. Unfortunately, the way Rey landed was hand first. It buckled as the contact point to the ground, contorting at an awkward angle, and pain shot through her arm as her full body weight. Luke and company could hear the sickening crash and the ear-splitting scream by Rey from yards away.

“HEY!” Luke yelled, bringing his speeder to a halt.

Aletha just barely stopped Quom’s from crashing into it as she brought it to a halt. Luke and Quom had jumped out of the speeder and were alright charging at the group. Aletha was quick to follow.

“Boss!” Minati yelled.

Jarex and Dairh instantly began shooting at the group. Luke was tempted to use the Force to pull the blasters from their hands, but even in that moment he couldn’t risk revealing his true identity.

Aletha and Luke’s war experience took over, and they fell into the routine of dodging and firing blasts at the enemy. Luke had a history of being a commandeering, and Aletha willingly obeyed his orders.
As a blast hit Dairh’s hand, causing him to drop his weapon for a minute, Luke found that steelpeckers weren’t the only thing Aletha could sharp shoot well. She had taken up position behind Jarex’s speeders, which were parked close to the shipwreck next to Jarex’s group. Aletha helped clear the way as Quom and Luke pressed forward.

Quom wasn’t all that great with a blaster it turned out – which was odd considering how much he had liked to threat to use it on others – but he was great at calculating where the next blast would come from. If Luke didn’t know better, he might have though Quom was Force Sensitive and using the Force to detect it as Luke was. But Luke knew one fact about Vrogem that he had known long before ever meeting Quom: there were no Force Sensitive Vrogem.

But it seemed that Quom’s instincts were even better than Luke’s as after one shot by Minati – who had since joined the fray – Quom tackled Luke to the ground. If Luke had stood for another moment, Minati’s blast would have nailed him in the head.

“No problem,” Quom chuckled. “ROLL!”

Laying on the ground, Luke and Quom rolled in opposite directions, just barely avoiding a blast from Dairh.

“DADDY!” Rey screeched.

Luke looked up. Jarex’s arms were locked around her, and his large hand bearing the silver Imperial ring was over Rey’s throat. He was no squeezing her throat, but the threat was there.

Fury raged in Luke’s heart and he leapt to his feet. He aimed his blaster right for Jarex’s head, and cocked it.

“Not so fast,” Minati snapped.

Both she and Dairh aimed their weapons on Rey.

“Anyone fires their weapon and we kill her,” Dairh warned.

Quom, Aletha, and Luke all lowered their weapons without a second thought.

“Alright,” Quom held up his hands and took a few steps back, “we’ve stopped. Don’t hurt the girl. Please.”

“It’ll be okay, Sunshine,” Aletha set her rifle in front of her on the speeder and lowered her hands behind the speeder. “You’re going to be okay.”

No one could see what was happening with Aletha below forearm level. He one could see her hand inching for the small blaster strapped to her ankle. No one was paying attention as Quom slowly, step-by-step inched ever closer around the group. All eyes were fixed on Luke whose eyes were burning with fury.

“Let her go, Jarex,” Luke’s voice was deadly.

Jarex snorted, “I don’t think I will. In fact, I think I’m going to claim this girl for what she is: my Luke had never wanted to Force Choke someone more than in that moment.

“This is your last chance, Jarex,” Luke warned. “I’m altering our agreement. Now instead of you being able to live on Jakku, here’s what’s going to happen. You’re going to hand over Rey now, then I’m going to pay a pilot to take you and your friends off-world, and you will never return. I will give you now credits and no further hospitality. Pray I do not alter our agreement further.”

“And if I don’t hand her over?” Jarex scoffed; who was Luke Erso to threaten him?

“Accept the offer I have given you, or prepare to lose your life.”

Minati laughed, “Well, look who talks the big talk. Come on, Erso, saying you would kill for your child is just hyperbole. You wouldn’t actually do it.”

“I don’t suggest to taste me on this, Minati,” Luke seethed. “Hand my daughter over now or my friends and I—”

“Your friends?” Minati gave a shrill laugh like the noise of a dog whose tail has just been stepped on. She looked mockingly over at Aletha, “What harm is Aletha Kymeri going to do?”

Minati yelped as Aletha’s blast hit her square in the kneecap. Dropping her weapon, Minati clutched her knee in pain.

Aletha lifted up her concealed blaster and aimed it at Minati’s heart, “Next one goes higher.”

“Dairh!” Jarex shouted.

Dairh fumbled with his weapon to aim at Rey when suddenly he was tackled by Quom. A clash of limb, claws, and teeth occurred. Quom’s sharp Vrogem features were finally put to a test as he subdued Dairh.

“Fight back, you fool!” Jarex yelled at Dairh as his hand squeezed down on Rey’s throat.

Rey let out a literally strangled cry and Luke took a warning shot next to Jarex’s head. Minati turned her blaster at Rey, but Aletha fired again. Luke too turned his weapon, and Minati was forced to go on the defensive and dodge Luke and Aletha’s blasts.

She dodged very well, but Luke was primarily distracted by the fact that Jarex was strangling Rey. Taking a deep breath, Luke knew there was only one way he could subdue Jarex without Rey getting too hurt in the process. He threw a pained look at Aletha, who seemed to have the same train of thought. Reluctantly, Aletha nodded at him, signalling that she approved the medical risk.

Rey’s vision was going fuzzy as she gasped for air. She tried calling out her daddy’s name, but words couldn’t make it through her throat. Barely any air could even do that.

She watched in confusion as Daddy flipped a switch on his blaster. Rey frowned as she recognized it: it was the lowest stun setting on his blaster. Fear filled her heart when she saw Daddy point the weapon at Jarex. If Daddy stunned Jarex while he was touching her… Rey would be stunned too.

Rey could have sworn she suddenly heard Daddy’s voice in her ear, “I’m sorry, Rey.”

Another voice spoke, a voice she sometimes heard in the night. It had the same accent as Daddy and usually was as sarcastic as Mommy, “This might hurt a little, my child.”
Anakin was careful not to use the term grandchild, but still wanted to convey affection.

“Just close your eyes, Rey, and everything will be alright,” said a third man’s voice that had Mommy’s Coruscanti accent.

Rey felt something warm fill her and closing her eyes, she took a deep breath. Though she didn’t understand it, the Force overtook her, filling her, protecting her, shielding her, and giving her the strength to do what came next.

With great reluctance, Luke shot Jarex stunning him… as well as his own child. Jarex and Rey hit the ground and Luke’s heart ached at the sight of Rey’s prone body.

But there was no further time to think: they had to act now. Luke turns his weapon on Minati and stunned her as well. There was no need to stun Dairh, as Quom was doing an excellent job of subduing him with his fists and teeth. Dairh would need a lot of bandages when Quom was through with him.

“They won’t be out for long,” Aletha warned.

“It’ll be long enough,” Luke dismissed. “How is she?”

Aletha sighed, her hands on Rey’s injured arm, “Broken wrist.”

“Keepuna,” Luke muttered. “Alright, grab Rey and we’ll get her back to-”

Jarex lunged at Luke with a roar, pinning him too the ground. Apparently, Luke had miscalculated exactly how effective the blast was.

“Get her back to Niima!” Luke yelled, turning his focus on fighting off Jarex. The distraction cost Luke his weapon as Jarex managed to get a hold of Luke’s last blaster and threw it across the desert. Jarex was meant with a swift punch to the face with Luke’s mechanical hand.

As they scuffled, Luke could hear the commotion behind him, though he did not turn to face with throughout his entire confrontation with Jarex. He heard Quom and Aletha’s voices, the scuffle between Minati and Dairh, a pair of footsteps, an engine starting, and a speeder driving away. Luke sensed that the lilac Force Signature had disappeared. He felt no need to check Aletha or Quom’s, knowing they would have told him if something had happened.

Relief washed over him; Rey, Aletha, and Quom were safely away.

Which was a good thing, because as Jarex had Luke pinned to ground with no weapon close at hand, it seemed that Luke’s only option was the lightsaber pressing into his back.

His mind made up, Luke slammed his forehead against Jarex’s. It made Jarex stumbled back for a moment; enough time for Luke to reach behind himself, unhook the saber from his belt, ignite it, and swing.

A yell carried across the vast desert as Luke’s emerald blade severed Jarex’s hand from wrist. Dairh and Minati, who had been rushing to aid Jarex, stopped dead in their tracks. Screaming and clutching his new stump, Jarex fell to his knees and looked up at Luke in fear.
Standing before them like a great warrior, the emerald lightsaber humming in the grip of his left hand, Luke simply looked down at Jarex and said, “I warned you.”

Dairh’s gaze hardened and he reached for his blaster.

Luke sensed it, and without a second thought, reached into the Force to pick up Jarex’s speeder – the one Aletha had used for cover – and threw it at Minati and Dairh. The clattered over like bowling pins, but Luke ensured that the speeder was not left on top of them. They were in pain… but they would not die.

Luke glared at Jarex, who was moaning in pain and said, “Don’t worry, lightsaber cauterize wounds. It won’t bleed or become infected. Hurts like hell for a while, but you won’t die from the wound. I would know, my father cut off my hand with his own lightsaber.”

Jarex looked up at Luke in fear and awe. Finally the pieces all fell into place.

He was running from the First Order. His wife and daughter had been of special interest to the First Order. His wife was reportedly executed by the First Order. His had a hatred of anything Imperial. He had the ability to find jackpot hauls. He spoke fluent Huttese. He had Unkar Plutt in his pocket. He had a lightsaber. He had a false hand. His father had cut off his original hand. He could move objects with the Force. He could sense where Rey was.

His name was Luke.

“Oh my God,” Jarex breathed heavily, clutching the stump of his arm, his eyes wide with fear. “You’re Luke Skywalker.”

Luke seemed to look even more fearsome with the revelation of his identity, “Yes, that is a name I once went by. And I warned you not to get between me and my daughter.”

“What have we done?” Minati whispered, falling to her knees like he was a God.

“A very foolish thing,” Luke replied. He glared at all three of them, “Yes, I am Jedi Grandmaster Luke Skywalker. My daughter is Rey Rhiaon Skywalker, my sister is former Senator Leia Organa, my brother-in-law is Han Solo, my mother is Padmé Amidala, my father was a man known both as Anakin Skywalker and Darth Vader, and my wife was Felicity Rhiaon, Rogue One, the leader of the team who stole the plans to the Death Star. I come from a very powerful, very passionate, and very angry family. You strike one of us, you strike all of us. My brother-in-law was captured by Jabba the Hutt, and my sister, our friends, and I killed all of his followers… But I am not agent of Darkness. I could kill you so easily right now, but for my own sake… I will refrain.”

Minati, Jarex, and Dairh were shocked.

“What?” Jarex blurted out.

“Why?” Dairh asked, and Minati smacked him upside the head.

“I don’t want to tell my daughter that I killed three subdued, defenseless people in cold blood,” Luke’s gaze was ice cold. “I did not kill my father after he threatened to turn my sister to the Dark Side… I will not bother with killing the likes of you. But we are done here. This whole situation is done. You are all leaving Jakku tomorrow morning and never returning. And if you even think about coming after Rey tonight, I will kill you. Do not make the mistake of testing me again. …Oh, and don’t even think about telling anyone in Niima who I am. Are we agreed?”

All three nodded.
“Go.” Luke moved their speeder upright with the Force and used it to pop open the driver’s side door, “Now… get out of my sight.”

They didn’t need to be told twice. Luke watched with a grin as they hurried away with their tales between their legs. He could sense that they would be no further problem. Luke had won, and he kept him identity a secret.

With a satisfied smile, Luke turned back to his speeder.

Quom was standing in front of it with his jaw on the floor.

Luke’s eyes went wide, “Quom! I- I thought you went with Aletha and Rey.”

Quom just shook his head. His eyes very obviously drifted over to the still lit lightsaber in Luke’s left hand.

“Oh, that,” Luke couldn’t deny the emerald blade in his grasp. “I, uh…”

As the silence stretched on, Quom just raised an eyebrow at the lightsaber and his friend.

Luke sighed and deactivated his lightsaber, “I think we need to talk.”

If you ask the people who live here why they do, you’ll get a number of answers – none of them good.

- Rey’s Survival Guide

“And that’s the whole story,” Luke finished as he pulled his speeder with himself and Quom up to the Qyhsh Caves.

Luke had told Quom the entire tale from beginning to end, including the horrifying thing that had been done to his wife’s body and the history that made the act so horrifying. He hadn’t intended to tell Quom that, but once Luke had gotten on a roll, Luke found he couldn’t stop.

“Whoa,” Quom said as they started to walk into the Qyhsh Caves, “no wonder you decided to stay here. So you can really talk to dead Darth Vader?”

“Good because I have a few bones to pick with him.”

“I’m not being your go-between, Quom,” Luke denied the unfortunately usual request that always seemed to come when Luke tell people he could talk to his father. Luke paused, “But out of curiosity… why do you want to talk to him?”

Quom stopped walking and sighed, “He’s the reason I came to Jakku.”

Luke frowned but said nothing.

Sensing the push to continue, Quom asked, “What do you know about Vrogem, Luke?”

“Vrogem are very close with the Force,” Quom explained. “The story goes that our planet Vongar used to be a very fruitful place. The trees were close with the Force and the Light Side. So close there were two trees kept in the old Jedi temple on Coruscant. Or so the legend says.”

Quom was surprised, “You know them?”

“I rescued them from the Empire. One was planted on Yavin IV, and one on Rornian in Temple Village,” Luke explained. “I can’t believe they’re from Vongar. Isn’t it a barren planet? Very arid, almost desert conditions?”

“It is,” Quom nodded. “The tale goes that a Sith Lord saw how powerful our planet was, so he infected one of our trees with the Dark Side. We tried to save our planet by removing the trees. Our leaders abandoned it on a lost planet, one called Dagobah. There a cave formed, one where a Force Sensitive would be tested with Darkness.”

An imagine of his own face behind the mask of Darth Vader in cave on Dagobah flashed through Luke’s mind.

“What happened?” Luke was intrigued by the story. He wondered where the line between fact and legend was drawn in Quom’s story.

“We couldn’t save our planet,” Quom continued. “Darkness infected and ravaged our land, changing the climate into a desolate place. It’s said that the Force itself stepped in and battled the Dark Side, stopping its assault. The Light Side protected us, altered our features to survive in the desert, and did the most extreme thing it could do.”

“What was that?”

“It made all of our bodily energy to be rooted in the Force.”

Luke frowned, “… Sorry, what exactly does that mean?”

“Basically we got a lot of Midichlorians,” Quom replied. “Since the Dark Side would attack non-Force Sensitive individuals, the Force made us all artificially Force Sensitive. We can’t use the Force like Jedi, but our energy is heavily influenced by the Force. That’s why when someone is using the Dark Side of the Force around me, I’ll start getting hostile and irritated.”

Luke thought back on his experiences with Quom. He was shocked to find the truth in Quom’s words. The most dramatic case of Quom being hostile had been when he met Rey, and she was overcome with fear, the Dark Side lingering around her after she fell unconscious. Quom had always side that he calmed down when Rey had.

And of course there was the previous day when Luke was very close to using the Dark Side and Quom had to be held back by Ivano Troade from attacking Jarex.

“I can’t believe I never noticed,” Luke said in wonder. “But what does this have to do with my father?”

“As a result of our connection with the Force, we have a close relation with kyber crystals,” Quom went on. “Touching on regulates the energy in our bodies and stabilizes our emotions. When the Empire formed, we could feel the Dark Side all around, and that was bad for us. So we started hoarding all the kyber crystals we could find to stabilize ourselves… The Empire didn’t like that.”

Luke’s stomach dropped; he could only imagine the tale about to follow.
Quom balled his fists as he remembered the worst day of his life, “I was away the day it happened, so I survived. I was one of the lucky few who would go to the crystal caves of Illum and scavenge all the crystals I could find. But one day, I returned to find our village had been burned down and slaughtered, while our stores of crystals had been ransacked. We knew who did it because we weren’t the first village hit. Vader was leading raids on our planet and leaving no survivors but the ones who were lucky enough to not be around.”

As many times Luke heard the stories of the terrible things his father had done, it never got any easier when something new came up.

“I wasn’t married,” Quom said, “and I didn’t have a litter… but that didn’t mean I didn’t lose anyone. With my family and friends dead, I did what the rest of my kind did. I escaped to a desert planet and decided it was better to live this life than one of fear of the Empire. I thought about going to Tatooine, but I couldn’t live under the thumb of the Hutt clan. When I arrived, about… what calendar is used now? Right, it was about 6 BBY. Back then things weren’t like this in Niima… in fact there barely was a Niima. About two years after I came, Plutt arrived and when he did he was a pretty decent fellow. You could trade scrap for food back then, but you didn’t have to. It wasn’t until Niima died shortly after the Battle of Jakku that Unkar Plutt took control. But by then I was trapped. No credits, no prospects, where could I go but Jakku?”

“I’m so sorry, Quom,” Luke said. “I will not defend my father’s actions, but I know he is remorseful now.”

“Thanks,” Quom wiped away a tear and started back down the cavern path. “So, enough about my sad story. What are we doing here?”

Luke brought them to a halt; a giant boulder was blocking the rest of the path into the cave. The boulder was big enough that maybe two men could roll it away with much effort, but certainly not one by himself.

“Stand back,” Luke instructed. He reached into the Force and used it to unblock the path and reveal his old X-Wing hidden away. “This is my X-Wing.”

“Nice job,” Quom admired the cockpit. “Not many could manage to make this a two seater. Is it comfortable?”

“No, but that’s not the point. It’s to make sure that I can always make a quick getaway with Rey. She’s my top priority.”

Quom sighed, “You’re a good dad, Luke. Sure, you make mistakes, but at the end of the day, Rey always come first.”

Quom frowned, “What do you mean?”

Luke took a deep breath, “I can’t hide her forever, Quom. Someday the First Order will learn she is alive, and I need to make sure she’s protected. Now that you know the truth about me, I have to ask you keep her safe.”

“Oh course. Should we go get Doc, and show her this too?”

“No,” Luke shook his head. “The best way to keep her safe is to keep her unaware. You would still be unaware of my identity if I could help it.”
Luke glanced at his X-Wing, his mind still reeling from Quom’s story.

“Quom?” Luke said. “There’s something I want you to have.”

Luke opened the hatch and pulled out a familiar bag. It had been the bag Felicity Rhiaon carried across the desert years ago. Luke had hidden it back with his X-Wing for fear someone may find the walker and steal the contents. Digging through, he pulled out an object for Quom: one of the three lightsabers he owned. One Luke kept on his belt, one Luke kept in the bag, but one Luke was willing to be parted with.

“You said that kyber crystals help Vrogem?” Luke began taking apart the lightsaber. He got to the heart of it and pulled out the crystal, “What about manmade ones?”

Quom could sense the unnaturalness of the crystal. If the crystal was used in a saber, it would have projected a crimson blade like all agents of the Dark Side.

“They’re not as effective as naturals,” Quom hesitantly reached out for the crystal. A good feeling overtook him as he touched, like all the energy in his body balanced. “You know… I recognized those sabers when I was dealing with your wife. I’ve always suspected you had some connection to the Jedi, maybe even were a survivor of the Burning of Rornian. I just never expected you to be Luke Skywalker.”

Quom laughed, “I guess that should have tipped me off… Thank you for the crystal, Luke.”

“It’s nothing, really. That saber was used to kill many people I love. I’ve wanted to get rid of it for years, but I feared the parts would get in the wrong hands. I… I can’t give you the other crystal, though. The natural one. I can’t…”

Luke fought his tears as he remembered the day Reine assembled her saber.

Quom put a hand on his shoulder, “It’s okay. This one will be fine.”

“Are you sure?” Luke asked. “The connection to the Dark Side won’t throw you off balance, or tip you towards the Dark Side.”

“There’s Darkness and Light to everyone, Luke. It’s all about learning to balance them. I’ll be fine. Thank you for the gift.”

“You’re welcome,” Luke smiled. Quom’s words about Darkness and Light couldn’t help but remind Luke of Ben. Naturally that made his thoughts turn to the First Order. “Quom… I want you to promise me something.”

“Anything,” Quom offered.

Luke looked at his X-Wing, “I can’t hide Rey forever. Someday, the First Order will discover she is alive and when that day comes, she needs to be protected.”

“Yeah, you already said that bit,” Quom chuckled. “I assume you’re going to explain why you wanted to show me your X-Wing.”

“I wanted to show you it so you knew where it was… because I want you to promise that if the First Order comes to Jakku, and I can’t protect Rey… I want you to take this ship with her to the Resistance, and my sister, Leia. Can you promise me that?”

Quom put a hand on Luke’s shoulder and said, “Promise.”

And indeed, one day those events would happen; Quom would use Luke’s X-Wing to leave Jakku with someone fleeing the First Order and take them to Leia Organa and the Resistance.

… But Rey was not that person.

I’d put on my helmet and help Captain Raeh explore the walker and the sand outside, and together we’d find lost rebels and get them back to their ships.

I don’t do that anymore. But I’ve kept these things anyway – to remind myself of how far I’ve come, I guess.

- Rey’s Survival Guide

It was about midnight when Luke woke to the sounds of Rey crying.

“Rey?” Luke sleepily looked up from his bed, a rickety old cot that was placed near, but not exactly next to Rey’s hammock.

Over the years on Jakku, Luke had secured them pillows and blankets, though Rey still slept every night with the patchwork blanket Felicity had made. Luke expected to find Rey curled up in that blanket, but inside found a shapeless pile of bedding in her hammock.

His heart pounded wildly as he shot up in bed.

“Rey? Rey!” Luke called in fear. Had Jarex taken her away in the middle of the night while Luke slept unaware. He nearly had a heart attack at the thought, but relief washed over him when he spotted Rey sitting in the corner. “Oh thank goodness, Rey. You scared me.”

Rey’s only reply was a wet sniffle.

“Rey?” Luke frowned, pushing his blankets aside and approaching her. “Rey?”

In the dark of the night she was barely more than a silhouette in the corner. Luke grabbed the flashlight and shone it on her as he walked closer.

She was sitting next to the wall of scratches where Rey insisted they still keep tally as technically she hadn’t been able to leave Jakku yet. Rey was crying, her knees tucked against her chest as she held Dosmit Raeh’s helmet in her hands.

“Rey, what’s wrong?” Luke knelt down beside her and wrapped his arm around her shoulders.

“Nothing,” Rey automatically leaned into his embrace.

“Rey,” Luke said softly, stroking her hair, “you promised me you wouldn’t lie anymore.”

“I’m sorry.”

Rey sniffed and looked up at him. Utter guilt was etched across her face.

“I don’t want this helmet anymore, Daddy,” Rey admitted.

Luke frowned, “But you love playing with this helmet. How many times have I had to tell you to take it off and go to bed… And then compromised and let you sleep in it?”

Rey grinned softly, “You’re the best daddy, you know that?”

“I’m not the best daddy,” Luke chuckled. He glanced at his false hand, “But I’m certainly not the worst. Now, come on, Rey. Why don’t you want the helmet?”

Rey lowered her head in shame, “Jarex gave it to me.”

Luke had forgotten about that, “Oh, my little one. I’m so sorry this all happened to you.”

“No, it’s not okay,” Luke said firmly. He placed his hands on her shoulders and looked her directly in the eyes, “Rey, I’m sorry I let this happen. I’m sorry that I wasn’t aware enough to notice what was going on with Jarex. I’m sorry that I put you in a position where he could hit you and I wouldn’t know. I’m sorry that you didn’t think I was strong enough to protect you against him. I’m sorry for every tragedy I’ve ever made befall on you. You are the most precious thing to me in my entire life. My love for you is unmeasurable and unimaginable. I should have been better and I’m going to be better. I promise.”

“I promise to be better too,” Rey vowed. “I’m going to be more honest and trust you, Daddy.”

“Good, because we’re in a delicate situation here, Rey. This whole thing, this relationship between us can’t work unless we fully trust each other. Okay?”

“Okay.”

Luke smiled and let the conversation have a silent beat before he began again.

“But…” Luke continued. “That doesn’t mean I’m the only person you can trust. Don’t let Jarex do this, Rey. You are free of him and his control. Do not let him spoil the things you love.”

Rey looked at the ground in pain, “But it hurt so much, Daddy.”

“I know, Sweetheart. I know,” Luke sighed. He looked at the helmet for a few minutes, “Rey, I think you should keep your helmet.”

Rey frowned, “Why?”

“Because every time you look at this helmet now you can remember how strong you are,” Luke smiled. “You can look at that helmet and say ‘I survived’ because that’s what you are, Rey. You’re a survivor. No matter how many times this terrible world has tried to take you from it in one way or another, you scrap, kick, and fight to survive, and you succeed every time… You remind me of your mother in that way.”

“Really?” Happy tears filled Rey’s eyes at the thought of being like her brave mother. She was starting to remember less and less of the woman who had given her life, but the memory of Felicity Rhiaon’s strength, love, and bravery would forever be seared in Rey’s mind.

Pain stabbed at his heart as he stroked a lock of hair out of Rey’s face. It was Felicity’s hair, brown and curly that Rey had. Hair Luke had loved to run his fingers through, a gesture he had taken up with Rey (though in a paternal fashion rather than the original romantic way it was done with Felicity.)

Felicity had not left him, and certainly not in his dreams. Luke didn’t like to talk about how at least once a week he dreamed about Felicity locked in a cell, crying, asking why he had done what he had done, and begging him to come back. Try as he might, Felicity haunted him just as much as his father and mentors so literally did (apparently that “go away” command he made was only good for a year before the Jedi party started back up in his head.)

“Mommy would have wanted you to keep this helmet, Rey,” Luke held up Dosmit’s helmet. “And you know what? I think Dosmit would too.”

“Really?” Rey frowned. “Why?”

“Because she gets to live on in your heart and go on adventures with you. I never met Dosmit Raeh, but if she fought in the Battle of Yavin…” Luke pointed to the symbol at the base of the helmet. He had long ago figured Dosmit must have been part of Gold Squadron, and probably left it when she was offered her own command of the Tierfon Yellow Aces, “Then she must have been one amazing fighter. And she would be flattered to serve as a symbol of hope and strength to you.”

Luke did know what that last thing felt like. Although the pressure got to him sometimes, Luke had been proud to serve as a symbol of hope and strength while fighting in the war.

“So,” Luke asked, “are you going to keep the helmet?”

Rey smiled, “Absolutely!”

“That’s my girl,” Luke laughed, setting the helmet on top of her head. “Now, come on, time for bed, Sweetheart.”

"But I'm not tired!" Rey's declaration might have been convincing had it not been concluded with an enormous yawn.

For some reason that made Rey smile. Those words sounded familiar, though she couldn’t place from where.

"Okay, I might be a little sleepy," Rey confessed. "But I would be even sleepier if I heard a story."

Luke shook his head and smiled, "Fine, one story but then you sleep. It'll be short, and I pick the story to ensure it is. We're not having another 'Daddy, tell me the entire story of Qyhsh’s banishment and request for redemption' incident."

"Deal," Rey settled into her hammock.

"Alright," Luke tucked Rey in. He looked at the helmet on Rey’s head and suggested, "How about I tell you about the Battle of Yavin?"

A crowd gathered to see Jarex, Minati, and Dairh leave, but Luke, Rey, Quom, and Aletha had a special spot at the front of the crowd.
Luke watched silently as Minati and Dairh hung their heads and slunk into the ship of the pilot Luke had handsomely paid off. They would never be foolish enough to return.

His arms were wrapped protectively around Rey. She stood in front of him sporting a brand new cast on her left wrist, clinging onto the arms of her Luke and Felicity dolls with her right hand, and crowned with Dosmit Raeh’s helmet. Rey held her head high with an air of confidence and bravery. She had overcome Jarex’s abuse and although a tragic event it was, she was stronger for it.

Luke recalled the old adage Obik Kenu lived by: we are not thrown into the fire to show we are wax to melt, but rather that we are steel to forge. And Rey had truly been forged by the experience.

As Jarex Zolhar reached the threshold of the ship, he paused and looked back at the crowd. Luke Skywalker stood front and center in the middle of the guileless crowd. None of them knew the truth about the blonde mechanic that lived among them; no one knew the threat he posed.

But looking down at the stump that used to be his arm, Jarex was reminded. For the rest of his life he would be reminded that he had been foolish enough to cross the man that called himself Luke Erso, who was truly the myth they called Luke Skywalker.

It was a harsh lesson to learn, but never again would Jarex mess with a man without knowing who they truly were. And never again would he victimize a child who had someone there to protect her.

Luke’s eyes met Jarex’s and the Jedi gave Jarex a stiff nod. The message was clear: it was time to go.

Jarex nodded back and took a deep breath. For years he had done nothing but scavenged Jakku. Now his future was unclear; he had no money, no plan, and nowhere to go. But there was one thing he was certain of.

He was going to get the hell as far away from Luke Skywalker as possible.

“He’s gone,” Rey declared when the ship became less than a dot in the sky. She gave a breath of relief, “He’s really gone.”

“Yes, he is,” Luke gave her a tight hug.

Rey bit her lip as a scary thought occurred to her, “He won’t come back, right?”

“Not a chance MG.” Quom grinned at Luke, “I don’t think anyone’s going to cross you or your dad after yesterday.”

“He was quite a sight to behold,” Aletha jokingly nudged Luke with her elbow. “Quite the hero. One might even call it the deeds of a Knight.”

“A Knight, huh?” The former Jedi Knight blushed. Luke could feel Quom’s smirk burning at him, “That’s one way of putting it.”

“Doctor Ally’s right, Daddy!” Rey hugged her father tightly. “You’re my hero!”

“Well, don’t discount our friends,” Luke chuckled. “Quom had some impressive hand to hand combat with Dairh and I’m still amazed at that knee shot you pulled on Minati, Aletha.”

“Nothing to it,” Aletha waved off. “Besides, the brave one here is you, Rey. You pushed aside your fears and told us what happened. Once again you demonstrated that you are by far one of the bravest people I have ever met. And I fought in a war.”
“Yeah, our little Miracle Girl is a brave one,” Quom scooped up Rey in his arms and swung her around playfully. “So what do you want to be MG? Solider like your mom? Pilot like your dad? Medic like Doc? Or scavenger like me?”

“Be careful,” Luke half-heartedly warned as Quom swung his daughter around in the air. His eyes nervously followed them, terrified by the thought that someone could hurt his daughter again, but his heart warmed by Rey’s joyous laughter.

“Come on, Captain Rey,” Quom put Rey on his back and wrapped her arms around his neck for a piggyback ride. “Where are we flying to today?”

“Kamino!” Rey cheered. “A planet full of water.”

“Your wish is my command!” Quom laughed and headed them for ‘Kamino’ which was what they called the town well in their games of make believe.

Luke chuckled as Quom zoomed with Rey on his back through the market. He was making completely undignified whooshing flying ship noises that destroyed his reputation but made Rey smile.

Aletha gave a soft chuckle of her own from Luke’s side, “They’ve certainly come a long way from him leaving her to die unless he got your wife’s wedding rings.”

“Yeah,” Luke nodded. He wrapped an arm around her and said, “We all have.”

“You know, as tragic as the situation that brought you here was… I’m glad you and Rey came into my life. Even if it meant dragging Quom into it as well.”

Luke smiled at her, “I’m glad you came into my life too. You have no idea how much you’ve meant to me over the past two years with Rey, and I don’t think I’ve ever properly thanked you.”

“It was nothing, Luke,” Aletha dismissed.

“No, you’ve been there for us. You’ve helped me raise Rey, you’ve comforted me, and related to me in a way that no one has been able to with my loss of Felicity. I honestly don’t know what I would have done without you.”

“Well then,” Aletha grinned. “You are most welcome. And thank you for finally livening up my life on this truly horrible planet.”

“If Jakku’s that bad, why do you stay?”

“The people need me,” Aletha answered. “And besides, how could I ever walk away from you lot now? Quom and I took kicks to the face together for Rey after all, and you defended us from Plutt for that. Things like that bond you for life.”

“They really do,” Luke chuckled remembering the numerous situations of insanity his family and friends had dragged him into throughout the years. “So, what’s your plans for the rest of the day?”

“Inventory of my supplies and laundering the bandages again.”

“Need an extra set of hands?”

“As always,” Aletha wrapped her arms around Luke’s waist and he hooked his left arm around her,
“Let’s go, Mister Erso.”

So off the quartet went; Quom and Rey to play in the town well as they got many dirty looks from the happabore owners and people filling up their canteens, and Luke and Aletha to her medical tent to engage in another boring day of inventory that for some reason seemed a lot less boring when they were around each other. They were a family again, and as happy as one could possibly be in a place like Niima Outpost living the lives of scavengers, mechanics, and doctors with minimal equipment.

And they never did think much about Jarex Zolhar again.

One Year Later…

“Well, if it isn’t my favorite Wookie and his pet smuggler,” Maz Kanata greeted before they had even stepped foot through the door.

“Hiya, Maz,” Han couldn’t help but grin, glad she didn’t yell his name across the room for once.

“What business brings you two around this time?” Maz asked, her voice well-practiced to carry over the noise of her watering hole. “Another ‘business man’ needing you to move ‘merchandise’ for him?”

“Actually, Resistance business,” Han replied. “Diego Nalto has an old army buddy that’s heard a few whispers about the First Order. Chewie and I are meeting with him to learn what we can.”

“Why didn’t Nalto come himself?”

“He and Leia are on D’Qar, investigating it as a possible permanent base.”

“Oh, he’s with Leia?” Maz lifted her non-existent eyebrows. She had probably seen other creatures do it so much that she adopted the habit herself.

The tone of her voice annoyed Han.

“What about it?” Han snapped.

“Just rumours,” Maz waved off.

“What rumours?”

“Just that Leia Organa and Diego Nalto having been spending a lot of time together.”

Oh, great, this again.

“Nalto has become the second-in-command of the Resistance ever since Luke’s disappearance,” Han dismissed the irritating rumours about his wife and Nalto for what felt like the millionth time. “He became very motivated to get justice after the First Order murdered his best friend. You remember Fliss, right?”

Dang, even three years after her death, Han couldn’t mention what happened to Felicity without it hurting. While Leia had always been the paramount woman in his life, and both Chewie and Luke easily surpassed Felicity in the best friends department, Fliss had been special to Han. His best female friend and a woman he honestly thought of more like his sister. Not a day went by that he didn’t miss her… and not an hour went by that he didn’t miss Rey.

“Look, Nalto’s not interested in my wife,” Han pushed away the painful memories. He had to keep his head in the present and complete his mission. “He’s never really been interested in any woman. Honestly, I used to think he was one of those weird guys who were into inanimate objects since he’s so into his ship. Then Luke told me Nalto has dated several women casually over the years. I think he’s more like Lando is… or was, you know… before Alyla.”

Of course that only reminded Han of how Lando hadn’t even flirted with a woman since his son, Ben had murdered Alyla in cold blood.

“Anyway,” Han pushed away his thoughts again, “Leia and I are fine. We even… reconciled a little a couple days ago.”

Maz gave he a knowing smile, “So, you and Leia got back together?”

Han rolled his eyes, “We never broke up.”

“Han.”

“Our relationship is complicated,” Han interrupted, vaguely wondering why he was talking about it to Maz of all people. He didn’t even like talking to Luke about his relationship with Leia. “Just because we’re currently not living together doesn’t mean we’re not together. Chewie, would you help me here?”

Chewbacca let out a few roars.

“Well, look who’s suddenly the relationship expert,” Han glared at the Wookie. “When was the last time you even saw your wife?”

“How is Malla doing?” Maz asked.

Chewbacca and Maz instantly fell into conversation about his wife and family. Han just shook his head and wondered once again how he had ended up with these people as his friends.

When Chewie started gushing about his son, Waroo, Han felt a wave of pain hit him. He couldn’t help but think about his own son. Ben would be nineteen now, the same age Luke and Leia had been when Han got dropped smack in the middle of their crazy lives. He had heard rumours of Ben – now called Kylo Ren – and his terrible actions. Han didn’t know what to believe, but one thing was certain: Ben was killing people, and he was being control by Snoke like a puppet.

Han sighed; some days he really regretted ever crossing paths with Ben Kenobi.

“It was Luke Skywalker himself. I couldn’t believe it.”

Han’s head turned automatically at the sound of his brother-in-law’s name. A tall, dark man with a false arm and an Imperial ring was regaling a crowd with some story about Luke.

Leaving Chewie and Maz to their conversation, Han slowly got closer, listening carefully to the story.

“It wasn’t Skywalker,” a woman dismissed. “You’re so full of it, Zolhar.”

“It was! I swear!” Jarex Zolhar insisted.

“But Skywalker’s been gone for years,” a man pointed out.
“Well, I saw him last year,” Jarex crossed his arms. “What a sight he was with that lightsaber.”

“Only a year ago?” an Aqualish questioned.

“Swear on my mother’s grave.”

Han stopped in his tracks. Someone had sighted Luke?

Obviously this was not the first claim Han had ever heard, but even though every time ended up being a lie, Han’s heart still lifted with hope every time he heard a claim. Maybe today was the day he would finally find Luke and bring him home, because one day he would find Luke, and one day he would bring him home.

Even if Han had to literally drag him kicking and screaming all the way back to Leia.

Of course, Han knew Luke was supposed to be an Ahch-to, but something nagged in the back of his mind. Something whispered to him that Luke never made it to Ahch-to.

He’s not there. He’s not there. Over and over again it played in his mind.

Sometimes he could have sworn that voice sounded like Ben Kenobi.

“But there he was,” Jarex bragged. He had long ago gone his separate ways from Minati and Dairh. “What a sight he was with that brilliant green saber.”

“Where’d you see him?” Han asked.

Jarex looked up at the new voice, “Who wants to know?”

“Don’t pretend you care,” Han shot. “I know guys like you; you just want attention. Here, I’ll give you some. Where’d you see Luke Skywalker?”

Jarex considered Han’s words and then said, “Jakku.”

Han blinked, “Jakku?”

“Jakku,” Jarex nodded. “Something special about it?”

“No,” Han muttered.

He felt like he had been punched in the chest. Luke had gone to Jakku? No, that was impossible. Why would he ever go to that junkyard?

… Rey.

He would go to find Rey. Of course. Luke couldn’t bring himself to abandon everything, not without finding his daughter’s body first.

Han struggled not to picture his niece’s tiny body wasting away in the desert of Jakku. It was too perfectly in-character for Han to ignore. Forget meeting with Nalto’s buddy, he had to go to Jakku.

“So then I said, ‘Oh My God. You’re Luke Skywalker.’ And he says, ‘Yes, that is a name I once went by. And I warned you not to get between me and my daughter.’”

Wait, what?

“What was that you said?” Han interrupted.

Jarex rolled his eyes, “I said, ‘Oh My God. You’re Luke Skywalker.’ And he says, ‘Yes, that is a name I once went by. And I warned you not to get between me and my daughter.’”

Han’s heart dropped.

“Never mind,” Han muttered as he began walking away. “Enjoy your drinks.”

Han tried not to feel too dejected as he walked away. He had been a fool, of course he wouldn’t find Luke on Jakku based on the word of some drunk in a bar. How stupid could he be?

“Hey Maz,” Han approached the little woman still engaged in conversation with Chewbacca. Han nodded towards Jarex, “You might want to cut that guy off.”

“Why’s that?” Maz asked. She hadn’t served Jarex too many drinks.

“Because he’s telling some wild story that Luke is on Jakku. Only a drunk would tell a lie like that.”

Maz frowned, “And how are you certain his story is a lie?”

“Because he’s saying that Rey’s alive, and that… that’s impossible.”

It would be eleven years before Han Solo learned that Jarex Zolhar had been telling the truth.

The town of Niima Outpost comes to a stand-off when Roke violates Aletha's only rule.

Chapter Notes

You know what? I can’t do it. I can’t stick to my original plan of trying to do 2-3 years of Rey’s life per chapter. If I do that, it’s going to end up being 15k per chapter, and I physically and mentally cannot handle that. So, I’ve reassessed my outline and broken down the chapters to more reasonable levels. This way we can get a fuller, more well-developed story without killing me in the process. As a result, I have added an additional five chapters. Thank you to everyone who says they’ll read 15k chapters, but I’m not going to put you through it.

In other words, the whole Luke struggling with his feelings for Aletha is going to be pushed back two chapters. And please… don’t even ask about The Force Awakens at this point.

The Long Way Home

Chapter Twenty

Doctor’s Orders

The Blobfish’s thugs keep their faces hidden while they work, which I’ve always found funny.

- Rey’s Survival Guide
For those wondering, Rey would write her survival guide at the age of seventeen after witnessing one of the most traumatic events of her life. That is saying a lot considering that before age seventeen, she had been front and center in the events of a massacre, and after age seventeen she would be kidnapped, assaulted, and have her mind violated by her own cousin.

What was this horrifying event? You will learn in time, but it is important to note the age of which she wrote the above phrase to understand the situation a little better. Up to this point of our story, there has been no mention of facial coverings on Unkar Plutt’s goons, and you may be wondering the origin.

Rey herself did not know the origin, but the adults around her did because it was the fault of the adults around her. Specifically, one fateful encounter between Roke and Aletha Kymeri that would cement one very firm rule in the rule-free domain of Niima Outpost:

Do not piss off the only doctor in town.

AGE EIGHT

“I’m just asking you to consider it,” Ivano Troade insisted as he cleaned his findings at one of Unkar Plutt’s wash stations.

“Ivano, it’s nothing personal,” Luke replied, seated at the wash station next to Ivano, “but after what happened with Jarex, I’m just not comfortable letting Rey go scavenging alone with anyone but myself and Quom.”

“Come on! You don’t think I’m going to hit your kid. Don’t you trust me?”

Luke sighed, “I’ve been burned too many times by people I thought I could trust. I’m sorry, but where Rey is concerned there is no wiggle room. End of story.”

“Whatever,” Ivano rolled his eyes and looked at Mashra on his other side. “I think he’s being ridiculous.”

“It’s not my prerogative to question the wisdom of a father protecting their child,” Mashra’s reply was followed by a series of cringe worthy coughs; the usual postscript to her sentences.

“That’s sounding pretty bad, Mashra,” Ivano observed. “Have you seen Kymeri lately?”

“Yesterday,” Mashra answered. “Got the usual advice. Stay away from the southern reaches; they’re much too dusty and aggravate your condition. I live in a desert and have a chronic respiratory condition; everything’s going to aggravate it.”

“Aletha’s just trying to help,” Luke pointed out. As much as he liked Mashra, he never could bear anyone disregarding Aletha’s medical opinions. “Maybe staying north for a while would do you good. Your cough is getting worse by the day.”

“Out of the question, Erso,” Mashra shook her head. “Everyone knows the north has been picked over. The south is where the value is.”

“She’s got a point,” Ivano shrugged.

Luke rolled his eyes. The people on Jakku had to be the most stubborn people he had ever met... and his family contained Leia Organa, Felicity Rhiaon, Han Solo, and Darth Vader.
“Daddy!”

Luke looked up to see Rey racing towards him with Aletha trailing at a distance.

Aletha was smiling at the sight of Rey being so happy to see her father. Her brown happabore leather medical bag was slung over her shoulder like it always was when she was out and about. She was quite literally ready for a body to drop in the street at any moment... which wasn’t entirely unusual in Niima Outpost. Luke couldn’t help but notice that Aletha’s hair was looking especially golden from the sun today... At least what parts hadn’t been streaked with grey; she was forty-eight years old after all.

“Hello, Sweetheart,” Luke hugged his daughter as she launched herself at him. “Did you have fun with Aletha this morning?”

“I guess,” Rey shrugged, looking quite sullen all of a sudden.

“We did inventory and sanitation this morning,” Aletha explained. “While very important and necessary, I don’t think she found counting and cleaning my equipment to be the most fun thing in the world.”

“Well, not everything’s going to be fun in life, Rey,” Luke pointed out. “So there’s no need to get upset every time you have to do something boring.”

“Alright, Daddy,” Rey conceded. She glanced at Aletha, “Sorry, Doctor Ally.”

“No need to apologize, Sunshine,” Aletha laughed. “Hey Luke, I’m sorry we interrupted you.”

“Aletha, I’m never going to be mad over Rey interrupting my scavenging business. What’s up?”

“I’ve got to go talk to a supplier who is behind on my orders,” Aletha gestured vaguely behind her where the visiting merchants and traders congregated, “and Quom’s busy dealing with that speeder.”

“The one that’s leaking gas fumes?”

“Right. I don’t want Rey near that stuff, and who knows what’s going to happen with my supplier. He... doesn’t have the best temper so it’s probably best to keep Rey away. So I was wondering if instead of dropping off Rey later with Quom like we planned, maybe you could watch her until he was done with the speeder. I know you wanted to head back out into the desert for a second trip, but-”

“Are you sure?” Aletha asked.

“Aletha,” Luke chuckled, “she’s my daughter. Trust me, it’s no hardship to watch her. Go talk to your supplier.”

“Thank you so much!”

Aletha surprised Luke by suddenly hugging him. Luke blinked and gave a hesitant pat on her back. He hadn’t really noticed the ease of intimacy she felt with him. Before he could think of something to say, Aletha was already scurrying off to talk to her supplier.

“Huh,” Luke found himself staring after her.

“Daddy, you have a weird look on your face,” Rey blurted out. “What’s wrong?”
“Nothing, it’s just...” Luke blinked. “Since when does Aletha hug me?”

Rey looked confused, “What do you mean? You guys do that all the time. Is that weird?”

“No, it’s just... I’ve never noticed.”

Luke shook his head and turned his attention back to cleaning his haul. As he absentmindedly scrubbed a power coupling and Rey played with a screwdriver, Luke couldn’t help but recall a certain memory.

“So be honest, Han,” Luke asked, “what was it that made you realize I was in love with Felicity... before even I did?”

“The hugging,” Han shook his head like he was disappointed in Luke. “That first time she hugged you in front of us, and you just so casually accepted it like you did it all the time – which you did – I knew you were falling in love.”

Luke shook his head. No, Aletha’s hug wasn’t like the way he started hugging Felicity. Aletha’s hugs meant absolutely nothing.

... Right?

“Thanks for watching her, Luke,” Quom came up to Luke and Rey in line for the concession stand. A bulging bag was slung over his shoulder; a portion of their stockpile Quom used to trade Plutt for rations. Quom could be very proud at times and had time and time again rejected Luke’s offer to procure rations for Quom out of his credit line with Plutt. “I’m sorry to put you out so much, but the speeder—”

“Really, it’s okay!” Luke insisted, ignoring the dirty looks from Ivano, Mashra, and the rest of the people who he had just let Quom cut in line in front of. “She’s my daughter. I’m just glad I have you and Aletha to help watch her.”

“Speaking of,” Quom turned to look towards the market. “Have you seen what’s going on with Doc?”

Luke frowned as he sighted Aletha and her supplier. Even from several yards away there was no doubting how heated the argument was. Yelling and wild failing of the limbs broadcasted the disagreement of parties at all around. Aletha was very passionate about providing the best possible medical service to the residents of Niima Outpost, and Force help you if you got in her way of that. Aletha was also the kind of person who got really relentless and petty while pissed off. She had no concept of personal space and would even give some downright nasty threats. Given, she only used them when the argument was about someone else’s health or safety, but Aletha could be downright brutal sometimes. But after spending years on Jakku having to do surgeries without sedatives, and amputations with an everyday saw, pain and discomfort had been quite normalized for Aletha.

She was giving into that concept in her argument with her supplier. Aletha had gotten right up into his face, standing so close to him that she was basically on his toes. One might think that she would use a low volume of voice because of the lack of distance to her supplier, but there she was screaming right in his face.

The anger on the supplier’s face was clear even from Luke’s position. The supplier looked like he very much wanted to tear Aletha to shreds.

Plutt’s goons were monitoring the situation from distance, ready to step in if things got violent. The last thing anyone needed was for Plutt to lose a repeat customer, and the doctor to lose her supply chain.

“Should we do something?” Luke asked as he frowned at the scene.

Mashra laughed, “Really Erso? Haven’t you lived here long enough to know to leave people to their own disagreements?”

Luke glanced back at the group, “But-”

“Yeah, Daddy! Doctor Ally’s tough!” Rey joined in.

The group chuckled at the proclamation, but that was soon cut short when Mashra’s laughter devolved into a series of coughs.

Rey frowned, “Are you alright, Mashra?”

“I’m... fine... Little One,” Mashra’s body wracked with coughing so hard she was having trouble keeping her bag of haul on her shoulder.

“Let me help,” Rey offered, tugging at the bag to carry for Mashra.

“That’s alright,” Mashra shook her head, her coughs still going hard.

“I insist!” Rey’s voice was authoritarian as she took Mashra’s satchel. Her head was held high as she shouldered the satchel that was much too large for her. Yet even as the bag dragged on the ground, Rey looked confident and in charge.

Luke and Quom shared a grin as they watched Rey’s act of kindness.

“We may be raising MG on Jakku,” Quom nudged Luke, “but it looks like at least we’re doing it right.”

“Yeah, we are,” Luke smiled at his daughter.

“NEXT!” Unkar Plutt roared.

Luke scowled as Quom strode up to the concession stand.

“See,” Ivano said, pointing at Quom, “you shouldn’t have let him cut.”

Luke opened his mouth to reply.

“YOU LISTEN TO ME YOU LITTLE SHUTTA!” Aletha’s supplier roared.

Luke’s head whipped back towards Aletha just in time to see the supplier roughly grab her by the arm and yank her against him. Luke’s eyes narrowed as fury ripped through his body.

“Quom, can you watch Rey?” Luke glanced back at his friend but found Quom was still dealing with Plutt. He then looked at Mashra, Ivano, and Rey, “Looks like you got your wish, Troade. Watch my daughter for a second.”

“The Doctor can handle herself!” Ivano called as Luke stalked towards the confrontation.

It looked like Ivano’s words were right; just as Luke began walking towards them, Aletha wretched her arm out of the supplier’s grasp. She got even more into his face as a result, and looked like she was close to hitting him herself.

That’s when Constable Zuvio stepped in.

The closest thing we’ve got to law and order in Niima is Constable Zuvio. You’ll see him under his big Kyuzo helmet, with his fellow self-proclaimed guardsmen. Zuvio and his men are decent enough, actually – they step in when the Blobfish’s thugs get too rowdy. But like everybody else on Jakku, they work for Unkar and they know it.

- Rey’s Survival Guide

As Plutt’s goons had taken a few steps back from the confrontation, Luke figured they must have had Plutt call Zuvio in. Zuvio had stepped between Aletha and her supplier, forcing them apart to calm the situation. Luke couldn’t hear what was being said, but whatever it was it appeared to be diffusing the situation.

After a few minutes, the supplier threw his hands in the air and stormed back into his ship. Aletha and Zuvio patiently waited for his return.

As she waited, Aletha’s eyes drifted around the marketplace until they met Luke’s concerned gaze. He watched her smile at him and nod, and he let out a breath of relief. Yet his eyes still didn’t move from hers. In fact it seemed they were locked in an endless duet as Luke couldn’t tear his eyes from her kindly and comforting gaze. The world around him seemed to go silent; he could hear Quom and Plutt’s negotiations, he couldn’t hear Plutt’s goons barking orders at the people in the wash stations, and he could even hear the coughs that still wracked Mashra’s body.

In that moment there seemed to be nothing but those beautiful blue eyes upon his.

And then Aletha’s suppler returned with a large box to shove into her arms, and the moment ended. Luke smiled as Aletha continued to speak to her supplier, struggling to hold the large box containing her coveted medical supplies. He was considering going over to offer his help when a scream ripped across the marketplace.

“DADDY!”

He whipped around in an instant.

Mashra was on the ground, convulsing, blood spewing out of her mouth with every cough. Rey was staring at her, frozen in horror as it literally sounded like Mashra was trying to cough up her lungs.

Luke raced back as Ivano dropped to his knees by Mashra’s side, trying to find a way to help.

The whole market heard Rey’s scream, including Aletha. The second she saw Mashra on the ground, she dropped her box and ran as fast as she could.

“Medical emergency! Move!” Aletha screamed, abandoning the medical supplies she had argued so hard for.

The crowd parted instantly for Aletha. No one in Niima dared get between the doctor and someone having a medical emergency. It wasn’t out of sympathy or any sort of instinctual need to help one’s fellow man; it was simply that Aletha had one hell of a memory. If you got between Aletha Kymeri and a medical emergency the next time you broke your arm, Aletha might find she was conveniently out of casts. Of course, Aletha had never denied medical attention in the serious, life-lasting cases, but she could be petty about the little stuff.

Luke had actually once called her out on it, only to get the answer of “they had to treat that stuff themselves before I got here, and they’ll have to do it again when I leave one day. They might as well get the practice and remember that on planets like Jakku, having a trained medical doctor is a luxury. It’s sad, but true.” Luke had no argument to respond with.

“Is she breathing?” Aletha skidded to a stop and got down on her knees to assess Mashra’s situation.

“I don’t know,” Ivano tried not to sound panicked. While friendly with Mashra, Ivano didn’t have a relationship with her anywhere near the extent of Quom, Luke, and Aletha’s friendship. Sure, he would try to help her if she dropped dead next to him – as it looked like she was about to do – but he wasn’t ready to be responsible for her.

“She just started shaking and then dropped and started coughing up blood,” Ivano explained.

“Luke, get me the stethoscope and towels out of my medical bag,” Aletha ordered.

Without a second thought, Luke did as she said. It wasn’t until Aletha was instructing Luke to mop up the blood as she checked the now passed out Mashra’s pulse that Luke noticed Rey still watching the scene in horror.

“Daddy?” Rey whimpered.

Luke’s eyes went wide, “Rey-”

“I got her,” Quom seemed to come out of nowhere to scoop Rey into his arms and carry her away from the scene. “Come on, MG. Let’s let Doc work.”
“How’s she doing?” Luke asked as he noticed Aletha frowning at the results of the pulse check.

“Not good,” Aletha reported.

“What’s wrong with her?” Ivano asked.

“Let’s be honest, even if I explained it to you, neither of you would understand,” Aletha’s voice contained no humour. “Basically she has a terminal Aqualish lung disease and it’s slowly killing her. Today it’s decided to take a real swing at killing her. I’m going to have to operate immediately. Luke, can you help me carry her?”

Luke scooped up Mashra into his arms, “Let’s go.”

The only stop Luke and Aletha made on their way back to her tent was a brief one to pick up the box of supplies Aletha had abandoned.

“Lay her on the medical cot,” Aletha ordered upon their arrival as she started to sanitize the area for surgery.

“Here we go,” Luke was careful to lay Mashra on the medical cot, and not the personal one Aletha slept on every night. “Do you need anything? An extra set of hands to give you things? Someone extra to mop up blood?”

“Are you asking to be my nurse?”

“If that’s what you want to call it.”

“I’d love it, Luke, but you don’t know medical instruments,” Aletha replied, tying up her hair. “If I’m in the middle of surgery, I don’t have time to explain the difference between a catheter and an intravenous tube.”

“You won’t need to explain anything,” Luke assured her. “Just tell me what you need and I’ll know.”

“How?”

Luke gave her a mysterious smile, “Another benefit of my mysterious past.”

“Of course. The secret past,” Aletha gave him a smile against her will, but her face didn’t seem to want to obey the part of her brain saying it was inappropriate. “Alright, scrub up, Nurse.”

“Yes, Doctor.”

“And can you put up the black sheet?”

“Of course,” Luke set about putting up the black sheet over the entrance of Aletha’s tent before going to scrub up.

Aletha used a series of differently coloured sheets over the entrance of her tent to signal her availability. White meant that you were free to come in. Brown was you can come in, but knock first. Grey was knock only if there was an emergency. Blue was that she was sleeping. Green was that she was away at the moment, usually paired with a note of where she was. Purple was she was with someone but it shouldn’t take long. Red was that she was with someone already and it would take a while so it was best to come back later.
For every colour of sheet, Aletha was very flexible. She would bend the rules for emergencies, but if there was one colour you did not mess with that was when the black sheet was up. It was usually used when Aletha was performing surgery or the handful of times she had delivered babies on Jakku. The black sheet meant do not under any circumstance come into the tent.

And as Niima was about to find out... she truly meant that.

---

“Is Mashra going to be okay?” Rey asked as she and Quom sat outside Aletha’s tent waiting for the surgery to finish.

Quom had his arm around Rey and was resting his head atop hers, “I don’t know. To be honest it would probably take a miracle to fix her.”

“There’s no miracles on Jakku, Uncle Quom.”

“Don’t you believe that for a minute, MG,” Quom used his thumb to wipe a tear rolling down Rey’s cheek. “There are miracles on Jakku.”

“How can you be sure?” Rey sniffed.

Quom hugged her, “Because I’m looking at one, Miracle Girl.”

Rey sighed and hugged him back.

“Doctor! Where’s the Doctor?” Roke’s voice roared across the market.

Quom and Rey looked up.

Roke was stomping towards Aletha’s tent. He was clutching his face that was bloody and torn.

“What happened to you?” Quom blurted out.

“None of your business, Tinadar!” Roke barked. “Where’s Kymeri?”

“In her tent,” Quom jerked a thumb toward it.

Roke made a beeline for it.

“Whoa, stop!” Quom cried. “She’s got the black sheet up. She doesn’t want to be disturbed.”

“I don’t give a damn what colour of sheet she’s hung!” Roke snapped. “A steelpecker just tried to eat my face. I need medical attention.”

Quom put himself between Roke and the tent, “She’s doing surgery. Come back later. Your face isn’t going to get worse.”

“Get out of my way.”

“Or what?” Quom challenged.

Roke’s eyes shifted to Rey, “I’ll go after the girl.”

Rey whimpered and hid behind Quom’s leg. Quom’s face harden as he felt her arms wrap around his arms. After the Jarex incident, no one messed with Rey and got away with it.

“You wouldn’t dare,” Quom place a hand protectively over Rey.
“Erso’s not around to stop me,” Roke replied. “Now, move.”

Quom didn’t move an inch.

Roke let out an aggressive grunt. He grabbed Quom and threw him to the ground out of the way. Quom fell on Rey, so he was too busy checking to see if she was alright to stop Roke from barging into the tent.

Luke was in the middle of handing Aletha another size of scalpel when Roke barged in. He was shocked that someone would intrude when the black sheet was up, especially when Aletha literally had Mashra cut open so he could clearly see her lungs. In fact, Luke was so shocked he nearly dropped the scalpel.

Aletha however didn’t even look up.

“The black sheet’s up, Roke,” Aletha simply said taking the scalpel from Luke.

“I got attacked by steelpeckers,” Roke replied. “You need to stop what you’re doing and help me.”

“Not happening. Now get out.”

“I could make your life very difficult for you, Kymeri.”

“You already do. Get out.”

“This isn’t up for argument, Kymeri,” Roke warned.

Finally Aletha looked up.

“No, you’re right, it’s not!” Aletha snapped, the irritation finally getting into her voice. “Do you not see that I’ve literally got a woman cut open in front of you, seconds from death? You’re contaminating a sterile environment! Get the hell out of my tent!”

Luke saw it before it happened: a flash of the image of Roke grabbing Aletha by the throat and Mashra dead as a result.

He moved a fraction of a second before Roke did, but it was enough time to shield Mashra and make it so that Roke could only grab Aletha’s arm.

Roke roared in her face, “You’re going to treat me right now, Kymeri, or else I’ll-”

The coldness in Aletha’s eyes made Roke stop dead.

“Let me go right now and get out or I swear I will never treat you for anything again,” Aletha threatened in a tone that even scared Luke.

Roke hesitated. With a grip still on Aletha’s arm, he sent an uncertain look at Luke who was still guarding Mashra. He was met with a single nod, and Roke released Aletha.

“Get out!” Aletha screamed. “NOW!”

Roke retreated trying not to look too much like he was limping out with his tail between his legs.
Aletha threw her bloody rubber gloves in her medical wastebasket.

“Done,” Aletha declared.

Mashra was all sewn up and resting. She was aided by a few of Aletha’s sleeping pills to ensure she had slept through the entire four-hour surgery.

“Did you heal her?” Luke asked hopefully. He rather liked Mashra as she had a fondness for Rey and often entertained her while they were working at the wash tables.

“I fixed her problem... temporarily.”

“But she’s not better?”

Aletha sighed, “She has a terminal respiratory condition. I bought her a few more years, but she is going to die from this someday.”

Luke gently took Aletha’s hand in his, “You and I know more than anyone that death is a natural part of life. Just as we lost Felicity and Antar, one day we’ll lose Mashra. The important thing is to savor what time we have left.”

Aletha smiled at him and pulled him into a hug, “Thank you, Luke. You always know what to say.”

Luke hesitated for a moment, then slowly wrapped his own arms around her, holding her tight. He couldn’t shake the notion that his arms around her just felt so... right.

Aletha and Luke exited the tent holding hands. They were laughing at some joke she had made and Luke couldn’t stop smiling.

“Well?” Quom prompted as he and Rey came up.

“How’s Mashra, Daddy?” Rey added.

Luke scooped her into his arms and hoisted her up, “She’ll be fine for now, but you have to understand that Mashra is very sick. Someday soon she’s going to pass away.”

“Can I say goodbye to her before she does?” Rey asked. “I didn’t get to say goodbye to Mommy when she died.”

Luke nearly dropped Rey. The question was so innocent, but it completely broke his heart.

Aletha and Quom shared a look; the expression on Luke’s face was of utter devastation.

“I’ll try my best to get you there in time,” Aletha rubbed Rey’s back.

“How about this, MG?” Quom offered, “When Mashra starts getting really sick, you come sleep in my tent so Doc can get you there in time if things should take a turn for the worst?”

“I’d like that.” Rey looked at her father, “Daddy, can I do that?”

“Sure, Sweetheart,” Luke’s mind was clearly elsewhere; probably lost in memories of Felicity.

“Hey,” Aletha whispered, putting a hand on his arm. “Are you okay?”

“I’m fine,” Luke sighed, trying to bring his mind back to the present.
“Deep breath, Luke,” Aletha instructed. She wrapped her arm around his waist in a gesture to keep him upright. “Take it one day at a time.”

Luke smiled at her, “Thank you.”

For a minute, they shared another of those strange moments. Those moments where everything just seemed to be right for a minute. Though the problems of the world did not go away, in those moments none of the world’s problems seemed to matter. There would always be peace in those moments. Peace, safety, and happiness.

“Kymeri!”

And there was also always someone like Roke to ruin those moments.

Aletha wouldn’t look at him; she was frozen in shock and fury. Rage was slowly filling her features and her hands had started to shake.

“Yes,” Aletha’s teeth were firmly gritted. “I have completed Mashra’s surgery. Thankfully she’s going to live. She’s recovering in my tent for a while.”

Murmurs of conversation filled the street at Aletha’s pronouncement. Even in uncivilized worlds like Jakku, humanity had a morbid fascination with death. Mashra’s medical emergency gathered a small crowd outside Aletha’s tent to see if the Aqualish would live or die.

Roke’s interruption had drawn an even larger crowd to see how Aletha would deal with it once she was done her surgery. Everyone expected Aletha to charge triple her usual rate, or give Roke a public dressing down, screaming so loud the Sacred Villages could hear her.

No one expected what happened next.

“Come on, Kymeri,” Roke gently grabbed her arm to direct her into the tent (he honestly would have grabbed her much harder if she didn’t have her other arm around Luke Skywalker.) “Let’s get my face all fixed before it leaves scars.”

Aletha didn’t move.

“No,” Aletha whispered.

Roke froze, “What did you say?”

Aletha could hardly believe the decision she was making, but she had no choice. Roke had violated the one rule she refused to have broken. Such actions needed consequences, even if they would result in further consequences to herself.

She took a deep breath, readying herself and looked Roke directly in the eyes.

“No,” Aletha declared, her voice loud enough to carry to the crowd. “I’m not going to fix you.”

The entire street went quiet.

It was hard to tell which emotion dominated Roke’s face more: anger or fear.
“What do you mean you’re not going to fix me?” Roke tried to sound as fearsome as ever, but he couldn’t deny the terror that Aletha’s refusal caused. His face had been mauled by steelpeckers. Not only were they nasty little buggers that could tear a man apart in seconds, but those who were lucky enough to survive would have agonizing pain until properly treated. Not to mention the scars that would form if left untreated would be hideous.

But the most terrifying thought of all to Roke was if Aletha refused to heal him... Who else would refuse him?

Aletha narrowed her eyes, “I am a very flexible woman, Roke. I’m not some puritan, and am willing to bend the rules when needed. I became a doctor to heal people; to help them. I stayed on Jakku because I saw how much you people all needed me. I stayed here for Mashra. I will do most anything for the people of Niima, and I don’t ask questions. I starve and sweat and thirst so you can have a better life. And all I ask – all I have ever truly asked – is that you obey one simple rule: do not enter my tent when the black sheet is up... and yet you did.”

Roke could feel a few dozen eyes on him. The people of Niima Outpost would literally tear him to shreds if he had made their doctor decide to leave.

Luke and Quom exchanged a look. The street was charged with a dangerous energy.

Slowly, Luke placed Rey down and ordered her, “Rey, go into Aletha’s tent.”

Rey knew better than to argue.

“You broke my rule, Roke,” Aletha continued once Rey had scampered inside her tent. “Not only did you violate my rule, you compromised the sanitation of my surgery area. Now I’m not going to pretend it was the cleanest area – we do live in a desert – but you compromised the safety of my patient as a result. Actions have consequences, Roke; so will this one. Your punishment for violating my black sheet rule is that I will not treat this wound.”

“You can’t do that,” Roke whispered.

“Yes, I can.” Aletha paused to look at the crowd gathered, “Take this as a warning for everyone. I am the only trained medical personnel on the entire planet. I am not bound by the rules of a hospital or even a licensing agency on Jakku. I can choose to refuse you service.”

“Wait, does that mean she has an expired medical license?” Quom muttered to Luke.

Luke shrugged, “Considering how long she’s been here, probably. But are you really going to turn your nose up at the only trained doctor on the planet?”

“Fair enough.”

“No,” Roke shook his head. “You can’t refuse me. Not in Jakku! I, me, Plutt’s top man! You have to treat me!”

Aletha gave a cold smile, “Make me.”

Roke lunged at her. Before she could defend herself, Aletha was pinned against the display table of the clothing merchant whose tent was next to Aletha’s. Roke was holding her down by the throat, and Aletha was making desperate gasps for help.

It happened in a matter of seconds, but already Luke, Quom, Ivano, and a few others had their weapons pulled on Roke. Trying to kill the only doctor on the planet wasn’t going to fly.
“Let her go!” Luke ordered as half a dozen blasters were pointed at Roke.

But it seemed that trying to kill Aletha might fly, for all of Plutt’s goons in the vicinity had their weapons turned on Aletha’s defenders. To cross Roke was to cross Plutt, and no one was going to cross the only food source in Jakku.

But then more people turned their weapons on Plutt’s goons; they wanted to protect the only source of medical help. Then others turned their weapons on those people; they didn’t want to risk Plutt getting upset and cutting off the only source of food.

Eventually everyone in the market had their weapon turned on someone else. It was a question that divided the town: who did they need more? Someone to provide food? Or someone to provide medical aid? If it came down to it, most everyone could find some way of treating a wound or getting food. Some would fail, and die as a result, but so could the same thing happen with a stable source of food or medical aid. The only question which was more important to have a stable source to fall back on, and everyone had to make a decision that day.

As Luke held his blaster on Roke, he was glad that Rey was hidden away in the tent. Things were about to get messy, and fast.

For several minutes the town was at a standstill. No one wanted to make the first shot. Then they all watched as Constable Zuvio slowly made his way to Plutt and his concession stand.

Zuvio and Plutt talked for a long while. People were glancing around nervously, and arms started to shake from holding up heavy weapons for a long period of time. Everyone was waiting for Plutt to make the decision of what was to happen next, and if he would allow Roke to kill Aletha. Roke was waiting patiently for the call, holding Aletha down so she was immobilized and in pain, but wouldn’t die.

As Aletha gasped desperately she let her eyes turn to Luke. When their eyes met, Luke was brought back to a moment three years previous. He remembered holding Ben down in a similar fashion for taking away the woman he loved. And now Roke was threatening to take away Aletha, another woman he loved.

You know… as a friend.

Finally, Plutt made his decision.

The order came over Roke’s comm, “Let her go, Roke.”

The town let out a collective breath of relief and lowered their weapons.

“What?” Roke exclaimed. “No! I won’t!”

The weapons went back up.

“You heard the order, Roke,” Quom said. “Let her go. Even Plutt doesn’t want the town to obliterate itself. Which is fair because then who could he swindle?”

“Butt out, Tinadar!” Roke snapped.

Roke stared Luke down for a minute, then slowly he withdrew his hand from Aletha’s throat.
Aletha just laid there for a few moments: panting and recovering her breath. She glared at Roke, who was hovering over her, inches from her face.

“You win,” Roke growled as the crowd dispersed, but he could feel Luke and Quom’s eyes and weapons still on him. “But I won’t forget this, Kymeri.”

Aletha narrowed her eyes, “Neither will I.”

Suddenly she slammed her head up into his face. Roke yelled in pain as he reeled back. He clutched his face which throbbed in pain as the headbutt further aggravated Roke’s steelpecker wounds.

Aletha took the opportunity to leap up from the table – but not before apologizing for the scene and messing up of merchandise to her neighboring stall owner. Without a second’s thought, she ran right into Luke’s arm. She held his tightly and whispered her thank yous over and over again. Luke just smiled and held her, telling her it was okay and he had her. He could feel her shaking in his arms; apparently, the event had scared her a little more than she had let on.

Quom joined them almost the second Aletha hugged Luke. He wrapped his own arms around Aletha, and the two males stood their hugging their precious friend. After everything they had been through, they were a team and a family, and would literally kill to protect each other.

And sometimes it was good to get a reminder of that.

Luke watched Roke as he held Aletha. Roke was sulking, and swatted away Dirk who came to offer his assistance.

A smile crossed Luke’s face as his eyes set on a small sand stuffed acklay toy that Dirk carried in his breast pocket. It was a gift Rey had made him the previous year when she overheard Dirk say no one had remembered his birthday. Dirk had actually been the only one who had his weapon turned on his own men in the stand off. Dirk had a soft spot for Rey, and no doubt wanted to not have to tell her that her pseudo aunt had been killed.

Dirk was… a little slow mentally. It was a joke on Jakku, but he was broad and strong so Plutt used him as a wall of muscle. Rey however did not see him as a joke and wanted to do anything to help him. After her lessons, she would sometimes see Dirk by the well – these days supervised by Quom, Aletha, or Luke – and try to teach what she learned that day to him. Quom had told Rey that Dirk had never learned to read or write, so she took it upon herself to teach him.

It warmed Luke’s heart to see Rey deal with Dirk. Very few people had shown him kindness, and he was proud to have a daughter that no only respected him, but tried to help him overcome whatever mental difficulties Dirk struggled with. Luke knew in his heart that Dirk was the one goon of Plutt that he never had to worry about.

But Roke was another story. As Roke wandered away from Aletha’s tent, he threw an innocent bystander into a display table. Roke would forever be sore about what Aletha did to him, and everyone knew this wasn’t over.

Luke’s gaze hardened as he watched Roke walk away. He looked down at Aletha, and felt something stir in his heart. He wasn’t going to let anyone take away a woman he loved.

Not again.

Three Weeks Later...
It was the same dream he always had; Luke would observe the bare cell and the woman within. The cell looked to be about ten feet by ten feet, it had bland grey walls, a metal bench bolted to the wall, a single locked door, and a bucket in one corner of the floor. Considering the condition of the room, Luke didn’t need to wonder what the prisoner used the bucket for.

She was in the same position he always found her; laying on the bench, staring up at the white ceiling with the single light bulb that lit the room and the security camera recording her every action. The woman had a blank, glassy-eyed stare she held during her battle with postpartum depression.

Even dirty, tired, depressed, starving, and locked in a cell, Felicity Rhiaon was still the most beautiful woman in the galaxy to Luke Skywalker. But time and situation had taken its toll on her appearance.

Her hair was bloody and shortly cropped like it had been in her torture recording, but grey streaks had formed over the years. Her skin was dirty as always; a result of the lack of bathing resources provided to her. It also had a sickly pale tone from the deprivation of sunlight. She wore the same clothing that she had that final night on Rornian, but they were now barely more than rags on her. Those beautiful hazel eyes he had spent so many hours staring into her sad and distant. Her body weight was lean, no doubt from her starvation on Jakku and subsequent underfeeding at the hands of the First Order. Though oddly she had a more muscle to her, probably from the hard labor of surviving on Jakku and making that endless trek through the desert.

The way Felicity looked had helped Luke identify the scene the first time he had had the dream, so many years ago. It had to have been some sort of take on her imprisonment in the First Order, though over the years the scene had shifted, mixing elements of reality and visions of the Force. It was hard for Luke to tell exactly what was real and what was a manifestation of the guilt that nagged at his mind.

The scene preceded as it always did, with the most heartbreaking moment of what was to follow. The moment when Felicity would Luke up from her bench and see him. It killed Luke to see her face light up at the sight of him.

She leapt off the bench and ran into his embrace.

“Luke!” Tears would stream down her face as she threw her arms around his neck and held him tightly.

His tears would mingle with hers as he held her as tightly as humanly possible. Luke wouldn’t let himself pretend this was anything more than a dream and a ghost haunting him from within. Yet was he held her, as he kissed her, as he whispered sweet nothings in her ear, every time it felt so real. Too real. Real enough that his heart always broke anew each night.

Every night for three years he had dreamt of that moment; the moment of reunion with Felicity he knew would never come. Yet as he kissed her over and over, each kiss lingering until his lungs stung, begging him for more air. It was worth the pain to savor her familiar taste, the one that had never left his lips since the first time, that night on the roof of their apartment building on Coruscant when they first pressed against his.

“I am,” Felicity’s eyes would always light up. “I’m here, Luke… but you’re not.”

“Felicity,” Luke would struggle not to let his sobs take control of him.
He would always fail.

“Felicity!” Luke burst into tears. He was sobbing as hard as he had in Chewbacca’s arms as his Wookie friend had pulled him off Ben after attacking his nephew for killing his wife. Luke’s thumb stroked Felicity’s cheek as he lovingly held the side of her face, “I’m so sorry I didn’t come.”

“You still can,” Felicity would always insist, breaking his heart. “Don’t you understand? It’s not too late.”

“Yes, it is,” Luke would whisper.

The script was the same every night; he watched was more as Felicity’s gentle pleas turned angry.

“No, it isn’t!” Felicity snapped, pulling out of her grip.

Luke would always reach back for her, not wanting to feel her leave his arms as she did the final night on Rornian.

“You promised to come back, Luke!” Felicity’s eyes would flash. “You promised to find me! Why did you give up? Why have you left me behind? You need to find me! To save me! I can’t save myself, Luke! I’ve tried so many times!”

That was when her tears would start.

“Shh, Sweetheart,” Luke would soothe her, holding her and stroking her hair as her face pressed into his chest. “It’ll be okay.”

Luke would say nothing but cry over how he had failed to succeed at her request.

“I’m so sorry, Felicity,” Luke would kiss her hair.

“Don’t be sorry,” Felicity begged. “Save me, Luke! Please, come back!”

In those moments Luke could have sworn like she was holding something back. Perhaps it was the part that used to beg him to save Rey, and piece of the dream that had ceased once he found her.

“Felicity,” Luke whispered, but he was always at a lose for words as her pleas dominated the dream.

“Come back, Luke!”

“Felicity… I can’t.”

“Please, come back for me!”

“Felicity-”

“Come back, Luke! Please, come back!”
“Felicity-”
“Come back!”
“Feli-”

“icity!” Luke exclaimed as his eyes shot open.

He was back in the pitch-black darkness of night in the old metal AT-AT walker. Luke was sleeping on his cot, bundled up in blankets, protected from the freezing desert nights.

Rey slept in the hammock next to him. If she had been woken by her father’s yell, she made no indication of it. She had long ago learned to pretend she didn’t hear her father’s nightmares every single night. Nor would she acknowledge that every single night, he would cry in the middle of the blackness, with the name Felicity on his lips.

But some nights she would. Some nights, she would creep out of her hammock and crawl into his arms. Rey would let him sob, holding her so tightly she could barely breath, and listen without comment as he apologized over and over for letting her mother die.

This was one such night.

Unkar’s thugs are big and mean, but they’re used to people who are too scared to fight back.

- Rey’s Survival Guide

“Bad night?” Quom asked as he noticed Luke moving particularly sluggishly that day.

“The Felicity vision was particularly bad last night,” Luke sighed, glancing down at his wedding ring. “I miss her so much, Quom. Just when I think I’m over her death, I’m sent right back to square one.”

“Whoever told you that a person gets over a loved one’s death told you a damned lie. You never get over someone that special to you; you just get used to missing them.”

“Well, I’m sure I wasn’t lied to. I’m sure it’s true,” Luke let a small smile grace his lips as he shot Quom a look, “… from a certain point of view.”

“Look, I know you respect Kenobi, but I swear if I ever encounter him in the afterlife, I am so going to give him a good beating for messing with you on the whole certain point of view thing.”

“Well, he’s a Jedi Master so good luck with that.”

“I’m serious. No one messes with my Luke!”

Luke slowly raised an eyebrow, “Uh… Thank you?”

“Come on, Luke, you know you love me too,” Quom grinned.

“I guess if I had to put a label on it,” Luke teased. “Though I’m not exactly sure what to call our relationship. I wouldn’t quite say pseudo-brothers – we don’t really get into the emotional or personal stuff that often – but we’re more than friends. I don’t know, what do you call really good friends, business partners, people who are raising a child together, and one person holding the secret of your true identity that you’re fairly certain you’ll never be rid of said person?"

Quom thought for a minute, “… Platonic life partners?”

“Morning, Boys!” Aletha greeted in a sing-song voice as she and Rey entered the work tent. “Good haul this morning?"

“Pretty decent,” Luke shrugged, bending down to give Rey a hug. “Thanks for letting me drop off Rey early. I was having troubles sleeping last night and thought I’d start the day early.”

“Anytime,” Aletha waved off. “Get anything interesting today? See any X-Wings?”

“I wish,” Quom laughed. “And no, we just found the usual stuff. What about you? What’s the word in town?”

“Daddy?” Rey nudged her father. “Can I go see Dirk by the well?”

“Sure, Sweetheart,” Luke smiled. The well was close enough to Quom’s tent that Luke felt safe letting Rey go alone – with the added bonus of supervising via the Force. “But stay within sight of the tent.”

“Thank you!” Rey scampered off.

Quom chuckled, “That kid gets cuter by the day.”

“Totally must get it from her mom.”

Quom ducked the screwdriver aimed at his head.

“Nice try, Erso,” Quom laughed, though he knew if Luke had really wanted to get him he would have used something heavier… and he wouldn’t have missed. “As I was saying, what’s new in town, Doc?”

“Well, did you hear about Roke?” Aletha settled on the work bench.

Luke frowned, “No. What’s going on with Roke?”

“Remember how people started to talk back to him and ignore him after our little… incident?”

Luke and Quom traded a look.

“You mean after you proved just how seriously you take the black sheet rule?” Quom smirked. “Of course, we do.”

“Didn’t people start making fun of his steelpecker scars as well for that?” Luke cringed remembering how furious Roke had gotten the first time someone dared to do it.

“Exactly,” Aletha replied. “In fact, things have been so bad for Roke that Plutt’s image has been compromised. People aren’t obeying him anymore. Sure, he’s got the other guys to keep the town in line, but Roke’s basically the only person who is up for beating people without direct orders from Unkar.”
“And he kicks hard,” Quom rubbed his jaw, recalling his beating by the walker years ago.

“Well, it’s so bad for Roke and Plutt that the Blobfish has a new rule,” Aletha continued.

Luke shook his head, “I can’t believe this town actually calls Plutt ‘The Blobfish’ behind his back. So what’s the rule?”

Aletha leaned in and grinned, “From now on, all the goons have to wear facial coverings and hoods and voice modulars and use only Huttese or Teedospeak to talk to people.”

Aletha shook her head, “I’m not. Go outside, see for yourself. You can’t tell who is who, except for Mast Surko because he’s got the black metal cybernetic leg. Oh, and Dirk because he carries around the acklay.”

“Who knows?” Aletha shrugged. “Maybe it’s permanent. I guess I’ll have to brush up on my Huttese. You’ll help me, Luke?”

“Well, I guess this goes to show you one thing,” Quom said.

“What’s that?” Aletha asked.

“In this rule-free domain that we call Niima Outpost, we do have one firm rule.” Quom slung an arm around Aletha’s shoulder, “Do not piss off the only doctor in town.”

A Deal's a Deal

Chapter Summary

Luke finds himself in a difficult situation when he runs out of credit with Unkar Plutt. Meanwhile, when Wookies come to Niima, Rey becomes fascinated by the stories of Han Solo and his friends.

Chapter Notes

Due to the re-evaluation of the story’s pacing, the timeline got changed a smidge, and I have edited the previous chapter to say that the traumatic event that spurs Rey to write her guide happens at age 17 instead of 16.

Also, I’ve cleaned up chapter three a little bit and added some new pieces. For example, I originally mentioned that Luke couldn’t sense Alyla on Rornian in the list of people who Luke couldn’t sense. This doesn’t make sense (no pun intended) for Luke to mention her in that list considering Alyla had been murdered a good while earlier. She and Genko have been replaced by Obik and Tyla, who have since become more prominent characters and naturally be people Luke thinks of in that situation.

If you are reading on AO3, I forgot to make the changes on that site at the same time I was editing the fanfictiondotnet version, so I might have missed a few parts when I edited the AO3 version.

See the end of the chapter for more notes.

The Long Way Home

Chapter Twenty-One

A Deal’s a Deal

Unkar trades rations for the gear scavengers salvage from the Graveyard. That’s it. No credits, no barter – except for food.

- Rey’s Survival Guide

AGE NINE

“What do you mean we’re out of food?” Luke exclaimed.

Unkar Plutt smirked at the dumbfounded… and slightly dangerous Jedi.
“You’re out of credits,” Plutt repeated. “These six portions are your last.”

Luke scowled at Plutt. “That’s impossible. I gave you enough for five years of rations and it’s only been four.”

“Five if you used the money for nothing but rations,” Plutt corrected. “But as I recall it you’ve purchased from me a speeder, a cot, a power generator, two sets of basic scavenging supplies, four commlinks so you and your friends can always communicate, a welding torch and mask, a ration cooker when Tinadar broke yours-”

“A couple sets of dishes,” Plutt continued, “some water canisters, a translation guide to Teedospeak, a tool belt-”

“I get it.” Luke held up his hand. “Fine, but I want to see our log to ensure no numbers have been fudged.”

Plutt sighed noisily and muttered into his comm, “Roke, take over trade. I have to talk to Erso in private.”

“Here you go!”

The transaction log fell to the table with a heavy thud. Seated at the same table in the same room he had threatened Plutt years ago, Luke began flipping through the book.

Luke could already tell by the way Plutt was seated across the table grinning at him that he would find no error in the record. Yet still Luke sat for hours calculating each and every transaction and triple checking each entry to find some source of fraud.

Three hours later, Luke conceded there was none to be found.

“Fine,” Luke shut the book and pushed it aside. “I accept that you were honest. But why didn’t you inform me we were near the end of our credits?”

Plutt grinned, “I thought the look on your face would be hilarious.”

“Come on, Skywalker,” Plutt chuckled and playfully elbowed him. Due to his size, Plutt nearly knocked Luke out of his chair, “Just a little joke. I thought it might make you happy. It’s exactly the kind of joke that looker of a wife of yours would have made. You know, I never complimented you on your taste in women. You should have seen her when she was twenty-one; quite the good-looking thing. I remember when she and her friend first came to me, I offered a different kind of job for her. Sadly, she wasn’t having any of that and her male companion was a little too trigger-happy for me, even if he did have a messed-up hand.”

Plutt grinned at Luke, “You know, I never would have left your wife and child out to dry even if you hadn’t made our deal. Your wife was as pleasing at age forty something as she was twenty-one. And she was desperate enough that I’m sure we would have agreed to something.”
The temperature seemed to instantly drop in the room as Luke fixed Plutt with a terrifying glare.

“I assure you Mister Plutt that making sexual comments about a Jedi Grandmaster’s dead wife isn’t going to get you anywhere good,” Luke warned. “Though by all means, continue if you wish.”

Plutt had enough sense to change the subject, “Our bargain is complete. You’ve run out of credits, Skywalker. Now, I am open to extending our agreement… for an additional payment, of course.”

Luke raised an eyebrow, “Oh really? And how much are we talking about?”

“Maybe a little more than our original bargain… Just in case.”

Luke scowled, “I honestly don’t get it. You live on Jakku, trading rations. What do you even need all this money for?”

“Do we have a deal or not, Skywalker?”

“Why not? Aren’t you rich?”

“Yes, technically,” Luke always hated to admit his wealth since it was all inherited from his father’s evil works as Darth Vader. “But I’ve also been MIA for four years. I can’t just call up the bank and ask them to transfer a large sum of money no questions asked. It’s too risky, and I’m not jeopardizing Rey.”

“You know if you insist on staying on Jakku that I’m your only source of food,” Plutt pointed out. “If you don’t renew our agreement then you’ll just have to scavenge like the rest of them. And Jedi powers or not, even you can’t bring in enough haul on a daily basis to get you and your daughter three meals a day. Just give in, Skywalker. Get me the money, and your daughter will be fine.”

Luke looked down at the floor and clenched his fists. He was upset at the situation he had put himself and Rey in. Why wasn’t he more careful about tracking the withdrawals, and why hadn’t he come up with a more long-term plan?

“So you’re telling me that if I don’t call the bank and risk our exposure,” Luke said slowly, “then you’re going to let Rey starve.”

“You’re going to let her starve,” Plutt corrected. “I’ll give you as fair a price on haul as everyone else. It’s up to you to ensure she eats enough from what you obtain.”

Luke took a deep breath.

“You have to decide, Skywalker,” Plutt urged.

Luke couldn’t help but think of the people around Niima Outpost; how much they were nothing but skin and bones. He thought about how hard Quom and Aletha tried to hide from Rey that they didn’t have enough food to silence the rumble in their stomachs every day. Sure, Quom had gotten a higher income since he started working with Luke, and Aletha had a higher income as the only doctor in town, but it wasn’t enough.

He thought of Felicity and that long trek she had taken with Rey. It hurt Luke to think that she had been forced to tell Rey she couldn’t eat when she was hungry. And now here he was in that very same position. The only difference was he had a way to ensure her stomach was full.
But there was a catch, and it was an important one; he had to risk exposure. Of course, he did have a bank that had rules and planetary laws about confidentiality – you had to when you had the celebrity status of Luke Skywalker – but there was still the threat.

After so many years of disappearance, control of his accounts would have been given to Leia. If he made a transaction, there was a very good chance that Leia would find out. And if Leia found out… well, he was back to square one of the “why don’t we tell Leia that Rey is alive” question.

Was it worth the risk? What was the worse that could happen if he was exposed?

Simple, the First Order would take Rey from him. He couldn’t let that happen. He would never again let them take her from him.

“No,” Luke decided, “the risk of exposure is too great. I can’t risk Rey.”

Plutt surprised Luke when he just folded his arms and chuckled.

“We’ll see about that, Skywalker,” Plutt grinned at Luke. “We’ll see.”

“Absolutely not,” Luke declared to Quom and Aletha as he got ready to head home that night. “I won’t let you do it.”

“Luke, you don’t actually think this is up for debate?” Aletha raised an eyebrow.

“Yeah, you really think we’re going to let Rey starve?” Quom shot, equally annoyed with Luke.

“I can’t ask you two to sacrifice your portions so that Rey can eat three of them a day,” Luke shook his head. “It’s my responsibility to take care of her. I’m not going to ask you to make up the difference.”

“Luke, let’s make one thing clear,” Quom said. “You’re not asking, we’re not offering, we’re telling you this is what’s going to happen. You really think that after all we’ve been through, after everything we’ve overcome, and done for Rey that this isn’t our responsibility? Yes, you’re her dad, but we’re all her family.”

“And family doesn’t abandon each other in time of need,” Aletha’s voice had an odd, distant tone to it.

Luke looked away from her; Aletha couldn’t possibly understand how deep her words cut him.

“The two of you don’t get enough rations to feed yourselves,” Luke tried to argue.

“It’s Jakku,” Aletha dismissed, “we’re never going to have enough to feed ourselves. But come on, Luke, you’re forty-three, I’m forty-nine, and Quom’s-”

“Don’t say it!” Quom exclaimed.

“106,” Aletha finished.

Quom sighed.

Luke shook his head, “I hardly see how pointing out our ages is relevant, but thank you for that.”

“Because Rey is nine, Luke,” Aletha continued. “It’s important that she’s getting enough food for her growing body. Do you know what some of the consequences of malnutrition in childhood are?
Growth deficiency. Gastrointestinal infections. Compromised immune system. Limited total bone growth. Delays in motor and cognitive development. Memory deficiency. Kidney failure. Delayed sexual development. She might never get a period. She could get scurvy. She could get night blindness. She could get rickets or anaemia—" Aletha just looked at him for a silent moment, then shook her head.

“And you’re asking me to just let that happen?” Aletha scoffed. “Well, I’m telling you as a doctor, as a friend, and as someone who loves Rey almost more than anything else in the Galaxy, I am not letting that happen.”

“Neither of us are,” Quom crossed his arms. “And if you won’t let us openly give rations to Rey, then we’ll do it in secret. I’ve seen Rey dead, Luke, and I’m never seeing that again.”

Luke turned away so they couldn’t see the tears in his eyes. This wasn’t what he wanted. He didn’t want to have to choose between Rey’s health and her exposure. Luke wasn’t even sure he was making the right choice, but what was the right choice? Was there even one in this situation? What would Felicity choose? Or Leia, or Han?

Then again, considering how badly they had messed up raising Ben, maybe the four of them weren’t the best people to base parenting decisions on. Maybe he should have been wondering what good parents – parents like Chewbacca and Malla, or Zena and Gavyn – would choose to do in that situation. It was hard to know what any of those four would pick – they all had such different personalities – but there was one thing they had in common. All four of those people had a habit of putting others’ needs first.

The answer was clear to Luke; he was making the right decision to not risk Rey’s exposure. Starvation would be bad for Rey, but Rey getting turned into a Sith wannabe, brainwashed, killing machine would be bad for the Galaxy. She was the Heir to the Skywalker legacy, and had great power; power that could not be allowed to be corrupted.

Yes, Luke was doing the right thing by choosing not to make another withdrawal… but he wasn’t making the right decision to refuse Aletha and Quom’s generosity. After four years together, he knew nothing was going to stop them from helping Rey, and to deny easy access to that would only break apart their relationship. That would be good for no one.

“Alright,” Luke conceded. “But you can only top up her portions if she doesn’t have three already.”

Quom frowned, “What if you only get three in total for the day? What are you supposed to eat?”

Luke sighed, “I… don’t know.”

As the sun started to set on the horizon, blanketing the three of them in the first shadows of darkness, no one knew quite what to say.

And none of them noticed the new ship about to land in Niima.

The folks I wonder about most in Niima are the visitors.

- Rey’s Survival Guide
Luke couldn’t help the look of annoyance on his face as Rey stared at the new strangers haggling in the market.

“What are they?” Rey continued to ogle the aliens.

“Rey,” Luke warned. “Time is money and we don’t have either to spare right now. Plutt takes wash table time out of his final calculation, and now that we don’t have extra portions to fall back on, I need all the help I can get.”

“Sorry, Dad,” Rey gave him a sheepish smile and picked up a piece of metal and a scrub brush.

“Better,” Luke looked back at the piston he was polishing. His hands stilled as something clicked in his mind, “Rey… what did you just call me?”

Rey frowned, “What do you mean?”

“What did you just call me?”

“Nothing. Just Dad.”

Luke blinked, "You called me… Dad?"

"Yeah," Rey nodded.

"Dad?"

"Yes," Rey started getting exasperated.

"Dad?"

"Yes!"

“… Dad?”

“Dad!” Rey exclaimed.

“Sorry,” Luke scowled, looking down as he rubbed his temples. “It’s just… when did you stop calling me Daddy?”

Rey sighed and shrugged, “Couple of weeks?”

“Why?”

“I don’t know. Daddy just started sounding… juvenile.”

Luke raised an eyebrow, “Where did you learn that word?”

“Aletha,” Rey answered. “Oh, what’s the big deal? So, I call you Dad.”

“Why?”

Luke sighed, “I don’t know… Maybe it reminds me that you’re growing up. That someday you’re not going to need me anymore.”
Rey smiled, set down her equipment and wrapped her arms around her father.

“I’m always going to need you, Daddy,” Rey promised. “Even if I call you something different.”

Luke beamed as he held her tight, “I know, Sweetheart. And I’m always going to be there. I promise.”

There was another reason Luke wanted to be called Daddy. To Luke, the label a child gave their parent was important. It was a testament of the state of their relationship.

Papa, Mama, and other such terms had always made Luke think of an older age. It was the kind of term he expected a young Obi-Wan Kenobi to use.

Father and Mother were formal and distant, terms you used for a parent you feared or didn’t know. Those were the terms Luke and Felicity had used for their own parents. Luke didn’t want to be a father like Anakin Skywalker or Alaric Rhiaon, fearful, distant, and dangerous to his own child. Neither did he want Rey to call Felicity “Mother” like the deceased mothers Padmé Amidala and Dinah Andromias Luke and Felicity never knew.

(Also, what was up with the A names in this family? He really had to stop fraternizing with people who had names starting with A… Aletha was not going to be happy with him.)

Dad and Mom were close, loving terms that Luke could handle, but they weren’t as precious as the terms Daddy and Mommy. Daddy and Mommy represented that earliest time of Rey’s life when she needed them for everything. But as she grew up and gained more experience and independence, she no longer needed Luke to the extent she had as an infant.

Rey could walk, talk, feed herself, read, even bandage her own wounds. She wasn’t his baby anymore, and a part of Luke struggled to let that go. After losing Felicity, and abandoning the rest of his family, Rey was the only real thing he had in his life anymore. Sure, Quom and Aletha were there too, but it was different. Aletha didn’t know who Luke was, and Quom had been on Jakku too long to understand what being Luke Skywalker meant.

She was his little ray of light; his hope in the darkness. Yes, she would always need him, but every passing day made him realise just how much he needed her.

So if he had to give up the term “Daddy” to keep her close to him, then so be it.

“But I’m disowning you if you call me Father,” Luke joked.

Rey chuckled, “Deal.”

“Hey, Erso!” Someone in the queue of people waiting for the wash tables yelled. “Little less hugging, a little more scrubbing!”

The father and daughter laughed as they went back to work.

“Three portions,” Unkar Plutt pushed the rations out to them. “Tough luck, Erso. Just renew our contract, and let’s finish this little song and dance.”

Luke snatched the portions, “It’s nice doing business with you, Plutt. Come, Rey.”

“Come on, Erso!” Plutt called after them as Luke grabbed Rey’s hand and they marched away from the window. “You really going to feed yourself and your daughter with that few portions?”
Rey stopped and looked back at Plutt, “Don’t worry, Mister Plutt. I’m not that hungry anyway.”

“Thanks, Sweetheart,” Luke chuckled and slung an arm around her shoulders, pulling her forward. “And don’t worry, we’ve got some extra portions back at the walker. You won’t go hungry tonight.”

“I mean it, Dad,” Rey replied, “I don’t think I even need that much food. What bad could possibly happen if I don’t eat three portions a day?”

“Aletha could give you a list.” Luke’s grin fell as they walked past the new strangers that had so captivated Rey earlier. He gently urged Rey forward again, “Come on, Sweetheart. Quom is waiting for us.”

“Dad, what are they?” Rey whispered as they walked past the strangers. “They look kind of familiar…”

Luke scowled, “Familiar?”

“Yeah. Have I seen that species before?”

Luke sighed; there was no point in lying to Rey.

“Yes, you have seen one before,” Luke confessed. “It was a very long time ago.”

“From before we got here?” Rey asked.

It had been a few years since Rey stopped recalling the people she once loved so dearly.

“What are they, Dad?”

“Those creatures, Sweetheart, are called Wookiees.”

“A hand drawn picture of a teenaged Rey hauling salvage in her net fills the bottom of the page]

Another self-portrait

- Rey’s Survival Guide

“Wrench,” Quom called, sticking a hand out from under the speeder they were working on.

Rey looked up from her stool in the corner.

Her hands were covered in pencil lead from the drawing she was working on. Though she hadn’t been using the notebook Quom gave her for her survival guide as a guide book yet, she did use it as a sketchbook.

Rey always liked to draw, especially since it made her father smile. Apparently, her mother was a little bit of an artist, preferring to draw buildings. Her mother’s mother had also been an artist; a painter more specifically. According to Luke, they used to have a few of Grandmother Di’s paintings hung on the walls of their old house.

She particularly loved hearing Luke describe the painting in the living room of a sunrise over a lake and how the sun’s rays glittered over the water. Rey could almost feel the dew of the grass under her feet, and smell the crisp, fresh morning air of the mountains in the distance. Someday she would find that lake and lay on the grass, watching the sun rise above her.

When Quom called for her, Rey was working on a picture of the crashed Star Destroyer called the Inflictor. She mostly drew random things from Jakku in the corner of the pages, but she would later in life add a few self-portraits.

Rey never drew pictures of Aletha, Quom, or her father at the request of Luke who thought it was too dangerous to connect themselves on paper to Rey. Even a simple notebook stashed in their walker might fall into the wrong hands some day, and he didn’t want to drag his friends into his mess, or make it public knowledge that he was with Rey.

She looked over at her father to see if Quom had been calling for him.

Luke had the hood of the vehicle popped up and was fixing the sparkplug. Sweat poured down his face, already tired from the morning scavenging. Grease and oil marked random spots on his skin; the trademark of a mechanic.

“Rey!” Quom called, his hand twiddling in a grabby motion, trying to grasp the tool not being offered to him.

“Right,” Rey set the book aside and grabbed Quom his tool.

As Quom accepted the wrench, Luke’s comm started beeping in the corner.

“Rey, can you get that please?” Luke’s voice was muffled from holding a pair of pliers with his teeth as he fiddled with a pair of wires.

Luke’s comm was one of a set of four, the other three belonging to Quom, Aletha, and Rey so that they also could communicate with each other. Since only one of the four owners weren’t present in the mechanic tent, it was easy to guess who was calling.

“Hey, Doctor Ally,” Rey greeted. “What’s up?”

“Hello, Rey,” Aletha’s voice crackled back. “Is your father free?”

Luke yelped and jerked his hand back as something sparked.

“Uh… sort of,” Rey replied awkwardly. “What do you need?”

“Okay, this is going to be a sort of odd question,” Aletha said, “but I’ve got a pair of travelers in my tent, and one of them got hurt.”

“Well, you are the doctor,” Rey pointed out.

“Aw, look at that,” Quom chuckled from under the speeder. “She’s taking after her Mommy. She’ll be threatening to shoot us all in no time.”

“Shutting up.”

Luke sighed and walked over to the comm, “What is it you need me to do, Aletha?”

“Well, you’re pretty good with languages, right?” Aletha asked.
“I have a predilection for them.”

“I’m having troubles talking to these merchants. You wouldn’t happen to know Shyriiwook?”

The clattering of Quom’s tools stopped.

Luke stared at the comm for a long moment, “You’re asking if I… speak Wookie?”

“Not speak,” Aletha corrected. “Humans don’t have the vocal cords capable of vocalizing Shyriiwook. But maybe you might… understand a little?”

Luke looked over at Quom, who had pulled himself out from under the speeder. There weren’t a great many of humans who really understood Shyriiwook, and it was massively suspicious to encounter a man who knew it who happened to share Luke Skywalker’s extremely unique first name – seriously, what kind of name was Luke? Couldn’t he have been named something mundane like Sarco or Antar?

“I know it’s a long shot,” Aletha continued. “But I’m not the most knowledgeable about Wookiee biology and I don’t want to do anything that would cause complications-”

“Oh my goodness, thank you, Luke!” Aletha exclaimed.

That reaction was why Luke admitted it. While it wouldn’t be “a man named Luke deciding to raise his daughter named Rey on the Lars homestead” level of suspicious, it was risky to come forward as speaking Shyriiwook. But the joy in Aletha’s voice was worth it. There was a part of Luke that yearned to make her smile, to make her happy, to make her existence on this terrible planet a little bit better.

And oddly enough, he didn’t really feel the same way about Quom.

“I’ll be there in a few minutes,” Luke promised.

“Dad, can I come, please?” Rey asked. “I think it would be exciting to meet a Wookiee.”

Luke sighed; if there was one person on Jakku who Luke desired to make happier than Aletha, it was Rey.

It turned out the Wookiees were stranded in Niima Outpost. They had been sabotaged by some pirates they had fought off and nearly crashed on Jakku. It was impossible with the funds the Wookiees had to buy the replacement parts from Plutt, so Luke had offered to find them in the Graveyard with a team of others.

Since Luke had what the locals called “the magic touch” at identifying wrecks that yielded good results, he had many volunteers for his team. Ultimately, he chose Quom, Ivano, Binz Scoty, Varé Malago, Dione Aldan, Nyla Renarus, and Zexter.

Of course, life on Jakku remained as difficult and tragic as ever. Luke’s team squared off daily with other teams to stake their claims on the sites they wanted. Food was scarce and sometimes other scavengers would loot their supplies while they worked. Injuries were abundant: bones broke, skin burnt, flesh cut open, and all the usual things that kept Aletha in business. And of course, like always on Jakku, there were a few fatal accidents.

Binz insisted on staying at one of the sites too long and ran out of water. His speeder shorted out halfway back to Niima and he had to walk the rest of the way. A sandstorm hit two hours later that lasted for three days.

Quom found him half buried in the sand a day after the storm, and Aletha diagnosed the cause of death as heatstroke. It never was clear exactly what day he died on, but it was clear that he suffered in those last hours.

Varé’s death was worse.

Varé Malago died when he stepped on the loose end of some TIE bomber power trunking – it was beneath a couple of centimeters of sand but left him burning like a torch.

- Rey’s Survival Guide

Death was a common tragedy on Jakku, but Luke still had to hold Rey as she cried the nights Binz and Varé died.

Luke originally had also picked Mashra to help, but on the first day, she had coughed herself unconscious and Quom rushed her to Aletha.

At the time, Aletha had been treating one of the Wookiees, checking on his cast – an injury he had obtained during the pirate scuffle. Aletha had been struggling to communicate without Luke. To her surprise, once Mashra had gained consciousness, Mashra revealed that she knew Shyriiwook, having lived on Kashyyyk for a year, fleeing the Imperial occupation of her home. This led to Mashra staying with Aletha, Rey, and the Wookiees all day as a translator.

The Wookiees had run out of money. Most of it had been taken by the pirates, and the rest went to Unkar Plutt for rations. They traded work for Aletha to give them medical treatment, and Rey spent every day with Aletha, completely fascinated by the creatures.

Luke was fine with the arrangement… until the day they mentioned Chewbacca to her.

I’d heard of Chewbacca from some Wookiee traders who’d stopped off at Jakku. They said he was an amazing hyperspace scout and smart smuggler, with a reckless human first mate who was always getting him in trouble.

- Rey’s Survival Guide

Luke was exhausted. He had spent nine hours hauling salvage, and it had only amounted to four portions. It had been weeks since he had a full day’s worth of meals.

He was pushing the flap of Aletha’s tent open when he heard something that made him stop dead in his tracks.

“And then what did Han Solo do?” Rey’s voice was eager.

Han Solo?

Luke flew into the tent as the Wookiees roared, continuing their story. Rey and Mashra sat on the medical cot together, Mashra’s arm around Rey, while Aletha sat on her personal cot supervising the situation.

The Wookiees – named Tvruuvv and Wrushk – were cleaning Aletha’s various equipment. Wrushk was silent, focused intently on meticulously cleaning the small equipment like scalpels and shears. Tvruuvv was standing and working on the few machines that crowded the tent – Aletha was the only non-trader in Niima Outpost that Unkar Plutt allowed to hook up equipment to his power grids. He was the one telling the story as usual, and had found great joy in entertaining Rey over the past few weeks.

Of course, most people who met Rey seemed to fall in love with her immediately. There were exceptions – Roke in particular seemed ready to punt her off a cliff at any given moment – but Luke understood why she was so loved easily. It mostly stemmed from the fact that Rey was really the only child on Jakku, and most people felt sympathetic to her situation. Indeed, as Rey grew into adulthood, she would encounter a lot fewer people who were fond of her. But for now, she could still use her cuteness to her advantage.

Tvruuvv started growling again, and Luke could vaguely understand that the story was about the time he had gone missing on Hoth. Of course, Tvruuvv didn’t use the same name for Luke and Han as Chewbacca had – as previously mentioned, there was no direct Shyriiwook translations of their names. Instead, Tvruuvv referred to them as “The Solo One” and “Sky Walking” and if Luke had to guess, Aletha had probably supplied the correct names because who in the Rebellion hadn’t heard of Luke Skywalker and Han Solo?

“Han Solo was so worried about his friend that he decided it was time for a rescue mission,” Mashra translated. Her narration skill was very dramatic and both Rey and Aletha were absolutely engrossed in the story. “So he asked if the speeders were ready and when he was told no, he told the other Rebels that they would have to go out on Tauntauns. A Rebel objected. The weather was dropping too rapidly. Surely someone would die if they went out into the snow.”

Rey gasped, “I don’t want Luke to get hurt.”

“Oh, Sweetheart, I’ll be fine,” Luke joked, bringing everyone’s attention to him.

“Dad!” Rey rolled her eyes, teasing her father. “I was talking about Luke Skywalker.”

Rey just shook her head. The others in the tent clearly thought he was just being funny, unsuspecting that he was in fact Luke Skywalker.

“Welcome back, Luke,” Aletha greeted. She asked her usual question of, “Find any X-Wings today?”

“You know, I’m actually going to find one someday, and you’ll have no idea what to do,” Luke teased.

“I think I’ll make do.” Aletha patted the empty spot on the cot next to her, “Have a seat. Tvruuvv was just telling some stories about a few Rebel heroes.”

“Yeah… I heard,” Luke reluctantly sat down next to Aletha. He wanted nothing more than to tell them all to knock it off in case the story triggered Rey’s memory that she was related to the subjects of the story. However, there was no way he could reasonably object without revealing his true self. “Han Solo, huh? Are you liking the stories, Rey?”
“So much!” Rey exclaimed. “Did you know that Han Solo actually took a shot at Darth Vader when they got captured in Cloud City? And that he made the Kessel Run in 14 parsecs?”

A tiny voice in the back of Luke’s head that sounded a lot like Han shouted the correction.

“Actually, I think it was 12,” Luke tried to say as casually as possible.

Rey shook her head, “Tvruuvv said 14.”

Luke hesitated, “I might be mistaken.”

The whole subject was a minefield. Rey absolutely could not be allowed to remember that Han was her uncle until an appropriate time. As for the rest of the people in the room, Luke was only comfortable with Aletha ascertaining his identity… and even that thought terrified him. He did not want Aletha to ever be at the same risk Felicity had been.

Er… He meant Leia. Or Han. No, maybe more like Reine. A very close female friend, but not his be all end all, his heart would be utterly broken without her like Felicity had been.

Why would his mind automatically put Aletha into the level of Felicity?

Luke was suddenly very aware of the fact that Aletha was sitting awfully close to him.

“So, what happened to Han Solo next?” Rey eagerly asked.

“No, the story’s about Han Solo.”

Rey shrugged, “Not really, no.”

“Excuse me?” Luke’s voice was a pitch higher than he wanted.

“Well, he’s going to survive,” Rey pointed out. “This takes place before the whole Cloud City thing. He’s gotta live till then.”

“Oh…” Luke looked down. It seemed that everyone was staring at him with an amused grin. “My mistake.”

“Oh, Luke,” Aletha laughed, clapping his bicep and tilting her head against his shoulder. She didn’t notice how Luke stiffened, then relaxed at her touch. Aletha barely noticed then Luke’s head shifted fractionally towards being atop hers. “Don’t you worry one bit. We all know why you’re worked up about this.”

He was in so much trouble.

“Of course,” Aletha grinned. “And don’t worry, your secret’s safe with us.”

Luke’s mouth was suddenly very dry, “Aletha, I can explain-”

“There’s nothing to explain,” Aletha shook her head. “Everyone knows that all the Rebel pilots were huge Luke Skywalker fanboys.”
Wait, what?

“It’s nothing to be ashamed of,” Aletha chuckled. “All the Rebel skyhoppers were Pro-Luke, while the grounders were Pro-Han.”

“What were the medics, Doctor Ally?” Rey asked. “Han or Luke?”

“We were neutral,” Aletha replied. “Had to be. Though if you put a blaster to my head, I’d probably pick Skywalker. Always had a thing for pilots.”

Luke couldn’t deny that Aletha’s head was full on resting on his chest at this point.

“You know, I met him once,” Aletha said.

“No. Han Solo.”

“You did?” Rey’s eyes lit up. “When? Was he as cool as he sounds?”

“He was as cranky as he sounds,” Aletha grinned. “I was one of the doctors who looked him over after he was freed from carbonite. Didn’t really get an opportunity to talk much. His girlfriend would barely leave him be for five minutes. Chewbacca actually had to remove her from the room at one point she was so all over him.”

Luke held back a laugh. He remembered how affectionate Leia had been with Han after his carbon freezing. It made sense since he had been frozen right as their romance started and they hadn’t really had much time to explore their physical relationship.

Luke had been slightly jealous on Tatooine… then found out she was his twin sister a day later. After that, he was quite fine with Han and Leia being affectionate in front of him, and only told them not to go too far.

And then Han got his sister pregnant in an Ewok village a few days later.

“So what happened with Han Solo?” Rey asked. “Can you tell me the rest of the story?”

Mashra gave Luke a mysterious look, “I can... Unless your father wishes for me to stop.”

“No, it’s fine,” Luke frowned. Why was Mashra looking at him like that?

“Allright,” Mashra nodded to Tvuuvv to continue the story. “So, Han Solo said ‘My friend’s out there.’”

As Mashra told the familiar story, Luke couldn’t help but wonder what that look had been about.

For a month, Mashra and Tvuuvv told Rey story upon story of Han Solo and Chewbacca’s adventures. Aletha liked to supplement Rey’s knowledge with her own stories that she had heard over the years. Most were things that had been passed around the Rebellion rumour mill and were highly dramatized. It killed Luke a little on the inside not to correct them when Rey would relay her fantastical stories at the end of the night, but for the most part they were harmless.

Aletha would also tell Rey stories of her own adventures in the Rebellion. There were many new stories, but every now and then he would be faced with a very familiar one. Luke would always be shocked when a friend of his turned up in one of her stories.

As it turned out, Aletha had crossed paths with many of his friends.

She had served on the medical ship the same day Luke had gotten his new hand. She had been one of the operating doctors for Reine Agim when she had been shot above the pelvis, leading to the emergency hysterectomy that left her infertile and self-conscious about dating for years. Aletha had been one of the doctors Shara Bey had seen during her pregnancy with Poe. She had given Biggs Darklighter (who had come in on the same recruitment group as Antar) his initial physical. She had once stitched up Nils Arlos after he was caught recruiting and was beaten horribly by the Imperials before he managed to escape.

Aletha had once even fixed Lando Calrissian’s arm after it had been dislocated in a fight. Lando then proceeded to hit on Aletha, which annoyed her greatly because Antar was literally standing in the same room. Aletha had run a little over the end of her shift, and he was waiting for her to finish with Lando so they could go to dinner.

It wasn’t completely unexpected for Aletha to cross paths with that many friends of Luke’s. The actual number of people who actively served in the Rebellion was much lower than you would expect. Luke had once heard that it ended up being roughly 30,000 over a span of twelve years. That included all the people who left, died, or worked as informants. The highest number of soldiers the Rebellion had at one time was 10,000 shortly after the Battle of Yavin. It had been said that with the amount of times soldiers were relocated between bases, a soldier encountered at least one in five Rebellion soldiers.

The recruitment and medical teams were a different story. There was only about one hundred fully trained doctors in the Alliance at their peak. A Rebellion doctor saw at least 1,000 patients a year, and in total ended up working on about one in three Rebellion soldiers.

The recruitment department was no better. According to Felicity, in the twelve years of the war, the recruitment team only ever had a grand total of twenty-two full time recruiters who actually went out and brought people to the Rebellion. The Rebels called them “Ambassadors,” and Felicity worked with a core team of thirteen of them over nine years. Twelve of the thirteen Ambassadors had ended up becoming the Republic Emissaries, which was how she got her job.

There were others who worked in the recruitment department, but most were “the Selection Committee” who identified marks, ran background checks, created fake documentation for the aliases of the Ambassadors, piloted the collected groups of recruits called “Batches,” and did other technical know-how.

Ambassadors would also often make their Batch pick ups in groups of three or four. As a result, Ambassadors knew about one out of every four Rebellion soldiers. In fact, a lot of Rebels would relate to each other and make their friend groups based on who their Ambassador was. It wasn’t uncommon to hear a soldier tell someone “I’m one of Rhiaon’s,” or “I threw my lot in with Arlos,” or “I’m a Kenu girl.”

And as Luke was very surprised to find out, Aletha was a Kenu girl.

“You were recruited by Obik Kenu?” Luke repeated in shock. He was having lunch with Rey, Quom, and Aletha on a day when the Wookiees were working on repairing their ship.

“Yep,” Aletha confirmed. “I was in one of his very first Batches. Nice man, but smoked like a chimney. I always gave him an earful about it whenever he brought a new Batch in. I don’t know if he ever quit though, always just said in a war a man needed a vice. I don’t see why you need to destroy your lungs if you need to let off a little steam. Hope he did quit.”

Luke held back a smile. He so wanted to tell Aletha that Obik had quit smoking, and was extremely embarrassed by his former bad habit.

Reine always liked to tease Obik that it was one of the reasons that she refused to date him while they were in the Rebellion, though it had really been over her embarrassment of her infertility. She was convinced Obik won’t want her if he knew she couldn’t have kids, and it wasn’t until six years after the war ended that Reine fessed up.

Obik’s response?

“Are you kidding me? I could have been dating you for ten years? Dang it, Reine! If we want kids that bad, we’ll adopt! I’m picking you up for dinner tonight at eight. End of story!”

They married ten months later.

Obik liked to say that Reine was the reason he gave up smoking; that it was a grand gesture to win her over. But that wasn’t the truth; the truth was actually pretty hilarious. Even though Reine refused to date him, even though Aletha lectured him, even though Kalonia threatened to fail his physicals, and even though Nils Arlos warned that he would have Obik kicked off the Ambassador team, Obik refused to quit smoking during the war.

It wasn’t until Luke came into the picture that Obik decided to quit. Obik decided to do it after learning of his Force Sensitivity and approaching Luke to become a Jedi. But it wasn’t some moral decision made in the name of being a model Jedi.

No, Obik Kenu quit smoking because Luke wouldn’t give him a lightsaber until he did.

“Who is Obik Kenu?” Rey asked, sitting next to Quom who was poking at his food in disinterest.

“He was a recruiter for the Rebel Alliance,” Aletha replied. “One of their best. He had the knack for being able to identify people’s true intentions and sense who would be the best candidate. Everyone liked to joke he had some sort of magic touch… which he did, because we later found out he was a Force Sensitive.”

“Force Sensitive?” Rey frowned. “Is that another Vrogem thing, Uncle Quom?”

“Nah,” Quom shook his head. “A Force Sensitive is a Jedi thing. It’s kind of like… I don’t really know how to explain it. Luke?”

“A person with an especially strong connection with the Force,” Luke explained, wishing Quom hadn’t singled him out.

“Usually it’s dictated by the level of Midichlorians in your blood,” Aletha added. She saw Rey’s expression, “Microscopic beings in your cells that speak to the Force.”

Luke tried not to glare at Aletha, “Don’t you start throwing that nonsense around. Connection to the Force isn’t just some scientific phenomena; it’s a spiritual connection. Anyone can connect to the Force, just some more than others.”

“Yes, and those beings can use the Force better because of the Midichlorians,” Aletha shot.

“Ok, if you two are going to start being all woman of science vs man of faith, I’m leaving,” Quom started to stand up.

“We’ll stop,” Luke promised. He then muttered, “But Midichlorians are mostly nonsense.”

Aletha glared at Luke, “You know, without the Midichlorians, Obik Kenu would have never learned he was Force Sensitive. Now there’s a good story.”

“What happened?” Rey asked, as eager as ever to hear a story about the Rebellion.

“After the Rebellion, all the Rebellion Ambassadors were offered Senate positions called Emissaries,” Aletha explained. “All thirteen accepted, including Obik. At the time, they were stationed in a small building on Yavin IV. The Battle of Jakku was a few days away from being fought, but the Rebellion was confident enough that people were freely discussing the location of bases. However, not everyone wanted the Rebels to win, and Rebels were being attacked. The Ambassadors were packing up their office when a group of pro-Imperials threw a dozen thermal detonators into the building. All thirteen of the Ambassadors were injured, but luckily no one was killed. I was stationed in the nearest Rebellion Medic Center, so I helped treat the injuries. Obik Kenu by far had sustained the worst injuries.”

“Why was that?” Rey asked.

“There was one Ambassador – a close friend of Obik’s – that had a bomb land almost on top of her foot,” Aletha answered. “Obik sensed the attack before it happened, though he didn’t understand why at the time. He was close to her, but not quite next to her. He charged and threw himself over her, tackling her to the ground. Obik got them far away enough to not be killed, but he was severely hurt.”

Luke was very silent. He knew this story all too well; he had heard it many times. But that was not what made him go silent; he was silent because of who Obik had thrown himself over.

It had been Felicity.

Obik had been Felicity’s Ambassador, and they had been very close friends during the war. Obik had recommended Felicity for her job on the recruitment team after their Batch on their way to join the Rebellion had been boarded by two Stormtroopers.

The sixteen-year-old Felicity impressed Obik when she managed to talk the Stormtroopers into not only letting them go, but joining the Rebellion themselves. One of the Stormtroopers had lost a loved one in the Bombing of Faclov – where Brendan had died – and Felicity used that to win him over.

The other Stormtrooper was a new cadet, fresh out of the Academy who was just itching to join the Rebellion. It was a good thing he met Felicity, because he became an excellent pilot for the Rebellion and gave his life in the Battle of Yavin.

His name was Biggs Darklighter.

“We immediately knew Obik needed a blood transfusion,” Aletha continued her story. “But we couldn’t get a hold of his medical file. I think there were Imperial hackers messing with our system. So, we ran a blood analysis for his blood type, and then discovered that he had a high Midichlorian level.”

“Was he okay?” Rey questioned. She felt oddly worried at the thought of Obik Kenu being hurt.

“We fixed him up just fine,” Aletha assured Rey. “Told him that he was a Force Sensitive. He was so excited. Obik immediately jumped out of his hospital bed, ran over Nils Arlos three beds down, told him he was resigning his position as an Emissary and ran out the door… only to immediately collapse in the hallway.’

Rey looked a mix of confusion and horror.

“He had just had a blood transfusion,” Aletha reminded. “Wasn’t really in a state to run out the room.”

“Oh,” Rey nodded. “So, what happened to him?”

“I’m not certain,” Aletha looked away awkwardly. Her voice was the same distant tone is always turned to when she started speaking about what happened to her at the end of the war, “I, uh… Came to Jakku shortly after. Never heard about him again.”

He tried to keep the horror off his face as his mind flashed back to the ultimate fate of Obik Kenu. Luke remembered how he stayed there frozen, kneeling on the training field as Diego Nalto and Wedge Antilles collected the bodies of his Jedi.

Luke had put Reine down next to himself, so Wedge and Diego ensured that they placed Obik next to her. Luke remembered how Wedge struggled to carry the charred body of Obik over to his peaceful wife. Reine was one of the lucky ones who had a relatively painless death – a lightsaber slash across the chest.

Obik was not so lucky.

He was found buried under the rubble of the Skywalker residence, the only body pulled from the site. The only comfort Luke had in the situation was from Wedge telling him that he had found Obik in what remained of Rey’s bedroom. Both Obik and Reine had given their lives to protect Luke’s precious little girl. If they had to die in a horrific way, it almost seemed right to have Obik and Reine laying together on that battlefield.

Luke remembered how Obik’s corpse had been burnt almost as badly as Uncle Owen and Aunt Beru. It would have been totally agony to burn to death… but it was clear that wasn’t how Obik died.

It would take Diego Nalto three hours of digging through the rubble to find Obik Kenu’s missing head.

“Dad?”

Luke felt something tug on his arm.

“Uh,” Luke hastily wiped away the tears threatening to fall from his eyes. “What is it Rey?”

Rey just looked at her father with concern, “Is something wrong?”

“Oh my goodness!” Aletha gasped. Rebels tended to have strong feelings about their Ambassador.

“How?”

“Oh,” Luke thought over his words. “Obik became a Jedi, and there was an attack on the Jedi Temple. He died in a fire.”
“Luke,” Obi-Wan Kenobi’s voice sounded cautious, “did you just answer her question from a certain point of view?”

“Maybe,” Luke answered through the Force. “Well, what was I supposed to say? He was beheaded saving Rey? This isn’t lying someone is dead when they’re not, just being vague about circumstances. Obik Kenu isn’t secretly Kylo Ren, and also Aletha’s father.”

“How would that timeline even work?” Anakin Skywalker questioned.

“Oh my goodness,” Aletha looked blank. She had a hand over her gaping mouth, “Poor Obik.”

“Yeah,” Luke sighed. “It was pretty bad.”

Rey just stared at her father; there seemed something off about how upset he was.

“Did you know Obik Kenu?” Rey suddenly asked.

Luke blinked, “Uh…”

Oh no, he had been caught.

He looked over at Quom, but the Vrogem just shrugged. Quom had no clue how Luke was supposed to get out of this one.

“I…” Luke sighed. He had promised never to lie to Rey, so he only had one option left. The truth. “Yes, I did.”

Rey blinked, startled that her father was willing to admit something about their past.

“And did…” Rey whispered, afraid to push her luck and ask the question nagging in her mind. “…Did I know him too?”

Luke smiled and rested a hand atop Rey’s, “Far too briefly, Sweetheart. Far too briefly.”

Rey smiled back, and silence fell over the room. She wanted so badly to ask more questions about her past, but she could sense that she would receive no more answers today.

“You know, I actually really like the story of how Obik learned he was Force Sensitive,” Aletha knew they needed to move the conversation forward from people burning to death. “It’s sort of a fun twist of fate for me.”

“Why’s that?” Quom asked.

“The girl, Obik saved?” Aletha replied. “She recruited Antar.”

Luke dropped his spoon, “Excuse me?”

“She recruited Antar,” Aletha repeated.

Luke just stared at Aletha in shock. He knew that there was a one in twenty-two chance of it happening, but he had honestly not expected to hear that Felicity had recruited Aletha’s husband.

Oh no… did Aletha know the connection between Antar’s recruiter and Luke’s wife?
“What… what was her name?” Luke tried to sound casual. He could see Quom’s confused look out of the corner of his eye.

“Oh, I have no idea,” Aletha waved off.

Luke gave a sigh of relief.

“But I do remember she became quite famous,” Aletha added.

“Why’s that?” Rey asked.

“She was Rogue One,” Aletha replied. “I remember Antar was so proud to be recruited by her. Poor man was extremely disappointed when he didn’t make the Rogue Squadron named after her.”

Luke was surprised once more. Very few people had remembered Felicity’s role as Rogue One unless there was an asterisk involved. But there was no time to contemplate why Aletha had remembered Rogue One, because what Rey said next horrified him.

“Who’s Rogue One?”

Felicity was so going to kick his ass in the afterlife.

“Who’s Rogue One?” Aletha too sounded shocked. “Rogue One was one of the bravest women-No, bravest soldiers in the entire Rebellion. And her accomplishments were completely forgotten in favor of what a couple of men did.”

“You know you’re blushing, right?” Quom whispered to Luke.

Luke just swatted Quom away.

“She sounds kind of cool,” Rey set her plate aside, finished her lunch at last. “What did she do?”

“Oh, Sunshine, settle in,” Aletha looked very eager. “I’ve got a good story for you.”

Unkar has power because he controls the food supplies on Jakku, which consist almost completely of survival rations his goons took out of the Graveyard. If you want to eat, you have to find junk to bring to Unkar in exchange for food.

- Rey’s Survival Guide

“And then Rogue One shot Darth Vader right in the chest!” Rey told her story enthusiastically several weeks later. “Isn’t that awesome?”

“She does sound pretty epic,” Luke couldn’t stop smiling. He set their dinner plates on the small table they had made from repurposing a storage crate. “Eat up.”

Rey grabbed her fork and was about to dig in when she stopped.

“Dad?” Rey frowned, noticing the significant proportion difference between their plates. “How much are you eating?”

“It doesn’t matter, Rey,” Luke waved off. “You have a full portion.”

“Dad.”
Luke sighed, “Alright… I have a third of a portion.”

“Dad!”

“I didn’t bring in a big haul today, Rey. I haven’t been finding as much since the Wookiees left last week and my team disbanded. But it doesn’t matter, as long as you have enough.”

“No,” Rey shook her head. “That’s not how we’re doing this.”

“Rey,” Luke chastised as she started scraping some of her food onto his plate. “Stop. You’re a growing girl.”

“And you need your strength to scavenge and get us more food,” Rey countered.

“I’m not eating this.”

“Fine, let it go to waste.”

Luke narrowed his eyes, “Have I ever told you that you sound exactly like your mother when you have this attitude?”

“Could she get you to give in?”

Luke picked up his fork and began to eat.

Rey grinned and glanced up, “Thanks, Mom.”

Luke just shook his head.

For a while they sat and ate in silence.

“I miss them, Dad,” Rey suddenly said.

“Tvruuvv and Wrushk. I think I was starting to get a hang of their language.”

“Maybe, but Shyriwook is a hard language that takes many years to learn.”

“Well, I at least know a few phrases. ‘Can you hand me that?’ ‘What story would you like next?’ ‘Darth Vader killed them all.’ ‘He wanted to come back for you.’”

“When is that phrase ever going to be useful?” Luke raised an eyebrow.

Rey shrugged, “You never know. I will miss their stories, though. Han Solo and Chewbacca led such fascinating lives. You know that Solo married Princess Leia? And Luke Skywalker married Rogue One?”

Luke chuckled, “That sounds like a very interesting family tree.”

“Tell me about it,” Rey grinned. Her smile lowered as she paused to consider something. “Dad?”

“Yes, Rey?”

“Do you think… you could tell me more stories about the heroes of the Rebellion? Like Luke Skywalker, Han Solo, Obik Kenu, Dosmit Raeh, and Rogue One? Aletha’s run out of stories and I wonder if you knew any more?”
“I’m sure I could think of a few,” Luke smiled at his daughter. His grin was probably far too large, but he didn’t care. It felt so good to have Rey interested in their family. “So, Rey, you’ve heard quite a few stories of the Rebellion and its heroes by now. Tell me, who’s your favorite?”

Rey shrugged, “I really like Rogue One, but I don’t know much more about her, so I don’t think I can call her my favorite yet.”

“Well, maybe I’ll try to find a few more stories about her for you,” Luke beamed. His heart swelled to hear that Rey so loved her mother, even if she didn’t know it was her mother. He may yet avoid that afterlife ass kicking from Felicity. “So, if you can’t pick Rogue One, who would be your favorite?”

“I guess it would have to be the greatest one of all. The one who made it possible to defeat the Death Star! The best pilot in the Rebellion!”

“No. Han Solo!”

Silence.

Rey frowned, “Dad?”

“Rey,” Luke said slowly, “are you saying you like Han Solo more than Luke Skywalker?”

“Yeah. I mean Luke Skywalker’s great and all, but do you think Luke Skywalker would have attacked a Star Destroyer and used its own shields to cloak himself in said Star Destroyer’s shadow?”

“But you said the one who made it possible to destroy the Death Star.”

“Yeah, both of them. I mean, sure other people fired the shots that exploded them, but those shots wouldn’t have been taken without Han Solo. He helped destroy the first one by shooting Vader, and the second by blowing up the reactor shield.”

“I see,” Luke had gone very quiet.

“Just admit it, Dad,” Rey grinned. “Han Solo is ten times better than Luke Skywalker.”

Luke set his plate down and strode out of the walker.

“Dad? … Dad?”

Rey couldn’t figure out why her father refused to speak to her for the rest of the night.

Luke was so hungry. He had only had a quarter portion for breakfast and that was twelve hours ago. He knew he shouldn’t do this; not on days when he was scavenging the Inflictor.

The Inflictor was a hot spot – pun not intended – in the Graveyard. Even almost twenty years after the Battle of Jakku, scavengers were still finding things to strip from the ship.

On that day, Luke had decided to use his grappling hook to get up high in the Star Destroyer. Very few people risked going that high, but his Jedi powers made it easy not only to reach there, but sense any unstable spots that would lead to a fall.

He was climbing back down the rope with his bag of haul over his shoulder. His stomach was growling as noisily as it had the past few weeks since his rations had run out. It was this day that the physical side effects had started to kick in.

As he moved hand under hand down the rope, his hands started to shake. That was nothing new as climbing down a rope to the ground positioned probably about one hundred feet below was a nerve-wracking action. It was when his hands started shaking more than Diego Nalto having one of his hand spasms – Diego had a permanent hand injury from Vader slashing the underside of his forearm during Operation Citadel – that Luke knew he was in trouble.

Luke had just moved his right hand off the rope, when the left spasmed and he lost grip.

He was falling. He was falling hard and falling fast down, down towards the ground below. Just seconds, and he would be nothing more than a splat in the sand, neck broken and leaving behind a gory mess.

As with any near-death experience, his mind went to his loved ones. To Rey. To Felicity. To Han and Leia. To Quom and Aletha.

But Luke Skywalker wasn’t a stranger to near-death experiences. Heck, he wasn’t even a stranger to falling. If hanging off the antenna of Cloud City hadn’t killed Luke, this fall wasn’t about to.

His Jedi instincts kicked in automatically. Luke was only glad that no one else was around to notice how he slowed his descent to a speed that wouldn’t kill him. But he had to still keep an eye out for anyone who might suddenly emerge from one of the dozens of pathways in the ship. The Inflictor was never empty of scavengers, except maybe at night. Even then there was usually one person who didn’t leave earlier enough and had to camp out overnight.

He was so focused on keeping an eye out for other people that he didn’t notice he started to drift.
Closer and closer he moved towards the wall, and then suddenly a sharp pain ripped through his body. A piece of jagged metal sticking out from the wall sliced Luke’s left side clean open.

Luke screamed and his concentration broke. In a display not unlike the time he had done a one hand handstand on Dagobah, Luke lost control and he went crashing to the ground. At that point he was only a few feet away, but those couple of feet hurt when he made impact.

Luke cried out as he landed on his arm. His full weight centered on it as his body hit the ground, and his likely had bruised himself badly.

He grabbed the wound on his left side, and rolled onto his back. Luke moaned in pain as his hand gripped the bleeding wound on his side, keeping pressure on it to prevent it from becoming worse. It didn’t feel like it had cut too deeply, and had probably missed all the important parts of his body, but it was quickly staining his shirt crimson, and he was in utter agony. Luke would definitely have to see Aletha very quickly… if he could ever manage to move from that spot.

For a long while, he laid there alone in the Star Destroyer. His pack was still hanging from his shoulders, but he was too paralyzed from the pain to get the first aid kit from inside. The longer he laid still, the more dangerous it got to remove the pressure from his wound.

Panic began to flood Luke’s senses. The impact hadn’t killed Luke, but he very well could die if he didn’t get himself patched up and moving. But how could he move and patch himself up when he was in such unbearable pain.

“Is there anyone there?” Luke called out. He hoped his voice would echo down the passages to one of the other scavengers working on the ship. “Somebody, please help me!”
Of course, even if it did carry to someone there was no guarantee they would help him.

“Help! Somebody, help me!”

As the minutes passed and he got no answers to his calls, Luke’s mind started going horrible places. What if he couldn’t move? What if he died? Would anyone find him? How long before people notice he was gone?

What would happen to Rey? He knew that Quom and Aletha would help her, but raise her? And Aletha didn’t know the truth about his identity and the danger that came with raising Rey. Would Quom tell her? Would they know what to do?

What about Han and Leia? Would they ever know that he was dead? They thought he was on Ahch-to, what if someday they went there and he was nowhere to be found?

And what did happen after death? What he end up a Force Ghost like his mentors? Was there an afterlife where Felicity, Biggs, Uncle Owen, Aunt Beru, and his mother waited for him? What happened in that afterlife? Would his Force Ghostness stop him from going to said afterlife? Was that why his mentors hung around him so much? Because they were bored?

There was one thing Luke knew for sure, and that was if there was an afterlife where Felicity waited… She was so going to smack him upside the head for dying in such a lame way. Luke could already hear her voice – well, not literally, but you get the idea – chastising his method of death.

“Seriously? You fight Sith Lords, and that’s how you died? You couldn’t have at least had a cool death like mine?”

Alright, he really needed to get out of the heat.

“Help!” Luke continued to call. “Can somebody help me?”

Then, an answer to his prayers.

“Erso?” Somebody called back.

Luke didn’t need to see them to know who it was; the horrible coughs following her cry easily identified her.

He heard the clang of footsteps against metal, and then the Aqualish appeared from the shadows.

“What happened to you?” Mashra dug out her well-stocked First Aid kit. Aletha had been personally filling Mashra’s kit for years so Mashra would have the supplies she needed in case she had another episode.

“Fell and cut myself. How bad is it?”

Mashra had pulled up his shirt to inspect the wound, “Looks like it missed anything vital. But Aletha would need to look at it.”

“She’s not going to be happy with me,” Luke groaned.
“Just do what I do and remind her that at least you’re not dead.”

Luke chuckled, “I suppose. You wouldn’t mind helping me out and giving me a few stitches so I can get out of here?”

“Of course. What am I supposed to do? Tell your daughter I left you to die? You know Tinadar would try to attack me, and Kymeri would stop treating me. I’ll bring you back to Niima, Erso, don’t you worry. Now, hold still, this might hurt a little.”

Luke grunted as her needle pierced his flesh and Mashra began sewing his wound together. He gritted his teeth, fondly remembering the days when he had access to desensitizing sprays to numb the area getting stitched.

“Thank you, Mashra,” Luke laid his head back on the ground and endured the pain.

“I appreciate it. She’s very fond of you too, especially since you started telling her stories.”

“I loved telling them.” Mashra finished off the stitching. “There.”

“Thank you, Mashra,” Luke started to sit up. “I-”

She placed a hand on Luke’s chest and shook her head at him.

“Bandages,” Mashra simply said.

Luke nodded and laid back down, letting his wound adjust to the stitches as she dug through her pack.

“Luke…” Mashra’s voice was hesitant as she pulled a roll of bandages from her bag. “My apologies if those stories made you uncomfortable.”

Luke frowned, as he stared up at the ceiling, “Why would they make me uncomfortable?”

“I just thought you feared they would make Rey realize you are Luke Skywalker.”

Luke shot up straight, “Excuse me?”

“Luke, your stitches,” Mashra chastised. “And it’s no great secret. I’ve known for years who you were.”

“How?”

“When the First Order came, a shiny Stormtrooper was looking for a Felicity Rhiaon Skywalker, and her daughter, Rey. A few months later, Felicity Skywalker’s husband, Luke arrives and Plutt does whatever he can to butter him up. The conclusion was easy to come to. Why else would a man choose to raise his daughter on Jakku.”

“Mashra,” Luke’s voice was desperate. “You can’t tell anyone about this. Not even Aletha.”

Mashra gave him an odd look, “Luke, if I have not told anyone your secret yet, why would I do it now?”

Luke opened his mouth and paused, “… Fair point.”
“Luke, your business is your business, not mine,” Mashra sighed and began winding the bandage around Luke’s torso to protect the wound and absorb the blood. “If you want to keep your identity secret, that’s your prerogative and I will not interfere. The same goes if you want to raise your daughter on Jakku. I will not question it.”

Luke smiled, “Thank you, Mashra.”

“But I will question why you have chosen not to renew your deal with the Blobfish,” Mashra continued. In towns like Niima Outpost, everyone knew everyone’s business, and Luke’s refusal to renew with Plutt was the gossip of the month. “If you want to raise Rey on Jakku, fine, but don’t let her starve.”

“It’s not that easy, Mashra. You saw what it was like when the First Order was hunting for Felicity. If they found out Rey was alive—”

“Are you saying that they’ll never learn she is?”

Mashra’s question made Luke pause.

Mashra cut him off with a loud sigh.

“Luke,” Mashra said sternly, “you must come to accept that there are some things in life we cannot change. I’m going to die, Luke. It will be very soon, and very painful. Doctor Kymeri will do everything in her power to save me, but I will inevitably waste a good deal of her resources, and die on her medical cot, breaking both her, and your daughter’s hearts. I have accepted that this is going to happen, so I will not waste a moment of the time I have left making myself suffer. I will suffer—suffering is as inevitable as war and death—but I will minimize the amount I endure, and not put myself in a situation where I suffer when I don’t have to.”

Luke sighed, “I understand where you’re going with this. Someday the First Order is going to find Rey, it’s inevitable. So I shouldn’t make her suffer to prevent something that will happen anyways.”

“Exactly,” Mashra nodded. “I know giving in to the Blobfish is something none of us wants to do… but for Rey it’s worth it.”

Luke smiled and thought of his little girl, “Yeah… it is.”

“Master Skywalker,” Nova Zethiel, Luke’s account manager watched the blue hologram of Luke Skywalker on her desk, “are you sure you wish to make this large a transfer to this… Unkar Plutt?”

“Yep, signature, retina scan, blood sample, mother’s maiden name— which was strangely complicated in your case—everything checks out.”

“Good,” Luke smiled. “Now, I trust that you understand the need for discretion? I am in a very delicate situation, and there are people who would love to find me. Since I do have a rather large account with you, I think it would be very bad for business if I found you didn’t uphold your standards of confidentiality and I had to move my money elsewhere.”

“Of course, Master Skywalker,” Nova nodded.
“So, no one will be told of this?”

“My lips are sealed, Master Skywalker.”

“It’s been a pleasure doing business with you.”

“As with you, Master Skywalker. Once more, I thank you for choosing the First Galactic Bank of Coruscant for all your financial needs.”

Luke’s image flicked away, and Nova sighed. She knew that when it came to their clients, confidentiality was of that utmost importance. Even if it was Luke Skywalker, she couldn’t tell anyone who she had just been talking to.

And yet her stomach couldn’t settle.

Nova remembered the despite pleas of Leia Organa throughout the years. She remembered the tears Leia had shed when the bank had forced her to come deal with the paperwork of closing Felicity Rhiaon’s accounts, transferring power of attorney of Luke’s funds to herself, and dissolving Rey Rhiaon Skywalker’s college funds. Nova remembered the awkward time she had walked into her office to find Leia Organa crying in Han Solo’s arms that “Luke should be here. He should be the one to do this. Not me. Why me? Why is it always me?”

Not even Han Solo could give Leia an answer to that one.

Taking a deep breath, Nova made up her mind.

It was a little after two in the morning when the call came in on Leia Organa’s comm. The insistent beeping uncomfortably roused both her and her equally annoyed husband from their sleep.

“It’s two in the morning,” Han groaned as Leia untangled herself from his arms. “Tell whoever it is that we’re not home, and will be home at a more reasonable time. Like at least when the sun has bothered to rise.”

Leia just yawned and rubbed her eyes. She leaned over Han to grab her comm from his bedside table. Han had once again scolded her for bringing her work comm into bed, and decided to force her into calling it a night by stealing the comm out of her hands and locking it in his bedside table. The ensuing playful scuffle to get it back had led to the events that finished with Leia falling asleep in his arms, soothed by the sound of his heartbeat as her head rested against his bare chest.

Han grunted as Leia fumbled over him, trying to get the bedside table open in her sleep-addled mind.

“Leave it, Leia,” Han insisted. “It’s the middle of the night. Whatever it is, can wait.”

“Well, isn’t that why we keep Goldenrod around? To answer calls at two in the morning, translate languages, and occasionally pretend to be a deity to stop Ewoks from eating us?”

Leia resisted the urge to swat her husband and flicked on the comm, “General Leia Organa.”

The blue image of a semi-familiar woman projected up from the comm, “General, I am so sorry to interrupt, but I have urgent news. My name is Nova Zethiel. I work for the First Galactic Bank of Coruscant handling your brother, Luke Skywalker’s assets.”

“Ms. Zethiel,” Leia said shortly. “I know that Coruscant and Hosnian Prime do not have similar hours of daylight, but it is two in the morning our time. Whatever this is about, I would kindly ask you to reschedule for a more agreeable time.”

“But General, it’s about Master Skywalker’s bank account. There was a transfer request and it needed authorization—”

“I assure you, Ms. Zethiel, I am up-to-date on managing my brother’s account in his absence. So, whatever investment or bond that is making a transfer request—”

“General Organa, Master Skywalker is the one who has made the transfer request.”

“What?” Han and Leia exclaimed, sitting straight up in bed.

That woke them up.

“What do you mean Luke has made a transfer request?” Leia demanded. “Has he contacted you?”

“About an hour ago,” Nova confessed.

“Where is he? I’m getting him right now,” Han was already pulling on his boots and shirt.

“Unfortunately, I am not allowed to disclose that,” Nova replied awkwardly.

“Excuse me?” Han’s voice was dangerous.

“It’s a confidentiality issue,” Nova explained. “Not only is it bank policy – something we pride ourselves on since typically our customers are people of the celebrity calibre of Luke Skywalker – but Master Skywalker himself specifically requested to keep this information between ourselves. I’m not even supposed to be telling you he contacted us.”

“And I suppose you can’t tell us why he requested a funds transfer? Or to whom?” Leia’s voice was rather formal. Part of her was wondering why Luke needed money when he was on Ahch-to of all places.

“No, I cannot,” Nova confirmed.

“Then why did you even call?” Han was frustrated. “What’s the point of knowing Luke has contacted your bank if you can’t disclose where Luke did it or why?”

“Because I’ve seen your pleas for him to come home, and I thought you deserved some peace of mind,” Nova answered. “I’m sorry I couldn’t be of more help. I just thought you would like to know he contacted us.”

“Thank you, Ms. Zethiel,” Leia smiled. “Have a good night.”

With that she flicked off the comm.

“The nerve of Luke,” Han wretched off his boots and threw them across the room. “Who does he think he is, pulling this crap? Disappearing for four years without so much as a goodbye? Then mysteriously pulling out money and refusing to let the bank tell us where he is or why he needs the money. I swear, I love that kid, but when I find him the first thing I’m going to do is smack his upside the head and give him an earful. You know, sometimes I think Luke—”

That was when Han noticed Leia was crying.

“Hey, whoa, what’s wrong?” Han’s rant instantly switched into comforting husband mode.
“Han,” Leia choked, unable to hold back the tears.

“Come here,” Han pulled her into his arms. He held her close making soothing hushing sounds as he stroked her hair, “What’s going on?”

“He’s alive, Han,” Leia let the tears of joy fall from her face. “Luke’s alive.”

Han smiled, something warming in his heart, “Yeah, he is.”

It didn’t matter what Luke had done. As rage inducing as it all was, Luke was their brother and they loved him dearly. There would be a time for anger later; all that mattered in that moment was that Luke Skywalker was indeed alive.

The Strength to Let Go

When Luke realises he has a growing attraction to Aletha, he struggles to let Felicity go. But before he can get closure, he allows himself to remember their story one last time.

Looking at my plans for next chapter… It’s definitely going to be a long one.
The Strength to Let Go

Chapter Summary

When Luke realises he has a growing attraction to Aletha, he struggles to let Felicity go.

Chapter Notes

OH GOD, WHAT HAVE I DONE? THIS CHAPTER GOT SUPER LONG AND IT WAS EITHER GOING TO KILL MY DRIVE TO WRITE THIS STORY OR FLAT OUT KILL ME. I WANTED TO BASICALLY RECAP THE RELATIONSHIP OF LUKE AND FELICITY AND THINGS GOT OUT OF HAND.

So, yeah, this is my way of saying that I had enough content that this chapter is going split into – I kid you not – five chapters. Since most of the other parts have already been written, I’m not going to do any riddles or coming up next chapter bits until we get to the end of this section. Also, just be prepared that the three chapters following this one will be exclusively flashbacks.

SOMEBODY PLEASE STOP ME!

For those who don’t know, I cross post this story to both ao3 and fanfictiondotnet. Up to this point, they have been identical, but that’s going to change next chapter. You see, net and ao3 have different standards on sexual content. Net automatically filters out M rated stories, and will even take down stories if content is too explicit. Ao3 on the other hand… well, let’s be honest, it’s basically got a 3 to 1, porn to normal fic ratio.

On net, this story is rated T so that it is not filtered out with default search parameters and I can reach a wider audience. On ao3 however, it holds a M rating, which starts to kick in next chapter. Now, I have no plans to write full on porn. Most of the love scenes will be the build up and aftermath with the exception of a few scenes that will probably be not very descriptive and use quite a few euphemisms. However, there will be a difference in most scenes between ao3 and net. For example, in the upcoming chapters there’s a flashback to the events surrounding the first time Luke and Felicity made love – which does go pretty far at a few points, and the night Rey was conceived. The ao3 version is going to go more into the actual act, but again will be vague and not the full scene.

So, what does this mean for you? It means you can choose how much adult content you wish to see. Google either The Long Way Home Star Wars Fanfiction AO3, or replace AO3 with fanfictiondotnet (net filters out link names in stories so please put in an actual period in the place of dot) to find either story. If you want the more adult version, go to AO3, and if you want the tamer (though not entirely chaste) version, go to net.

- Rey’s Survival Guide

Four years after losing Felicity Rhiaon, Luke Skywalker still wore his wedding ring. Granted, he did not wear it 24/7; Luke always took it off while sleeping, doing fine work, or before his hands were to get wet as his fingers tended to swell during those activities. But every morning, Luke woke up and grabbed his wedding ring from atop the small storage crate that served as his bedside table, and once his fingers had gone back down to their normal size, on went the ring.

Life remained the same in Niima. Every day, Luke and Rey woke up, had breakfast, went into town, dropped Rey off with either Quom or Aletha, Luke scavenged in the desert until lunch, traded haul with Plutt, collected his rations, the foursome had lunch, worked with Quom the rest of the day, went home, had dinner, scratched another day onto the wall, and went to sleep.

The sun went up, the sun went down, Jakku’s two moons waxed and waned, storms shifted the sand, and the only change that occurred was Rey outgrowing her clothes every few months.

Much like Luke, Rey clung onto the memory of her mother, though they did not speak of Felicity as much. Though she had – for the moment – accepted the death of her mother, Rey continued to retain the same hairstyle and outfit Felicity gave her all those years ago. Perhaps it was unhealthy not to force her to move on, but Luke wasn’t about to be a hypocrite.

Neither Luke nor Rey had any interest in letting Felicity go, and Luke revelled in his nightly meetings with Felicity in his dreams. Yes, Felicity was gone from them physically, but she still endured, and frankly, Luke found there was absolutely no reason to move on.

Until the day that changed everything.

Despite the lack of calendars on Jakku, Luke was pretty good at keeping track of the days. He could always remember birthdays and anniversaries, so he knew that it was the day before his tenth wedding anniversary.

Had you asked Luke several years before what he would do on his tenth wedding anniversary, he probably would have answered something along the lines of “Taking Felicity on a trip, and figuring out what one is supposed to give on the ‘tin’ anniversary.”

Luke liked to give Felicity her anniversary present based on the traditional theme, and Felicity really liked seeing Luke get creative with the theme.

The first year – paper – saw Luke tracking down some of Dinah Andromias’ artwork that had been sold to a few collectors (the fact they were painted by Luke Skywalker’s mother-in-law had really increased their value.) Felicity had burst into tears, though that may have partially been from the pregnancy hormones.
The second year – cotton – resulted in the most luxurious bed linens (sheets, blankets, pillow cases, etc.) that Luke could find. Luke had many fond memories of using those sheets.

Year three – leather – was probably Felicity’s favorite gifts. New leather boots, belt, wrist cuffs, and a pretty badass looking vest. It was the perfect outfit for Resistance missions, and Luke had gotten it because he probably found her most attractive when she was actually kicking ass, and not just threatening to do so.

The fourth year – fruit and flowers – saw the only time Felicity was disappointed in a gift. Luke had their front yard professionally landscaped and a magnificent garden planted. Felicity thanked Luke, but admitted she never was that into flowers and lamented at the type of upkeep it would take to maintain the garden. Luke conceded she had a point, and ended up paying his Jedi Shar’vida – caretaker of the Meditation Gardens – to tend their garden for them.

Year five – wood – saw a period of time where Luke decided to get into woodworking. Felicity liked to see her husband get into something she could understand better than mechanics, and she adored the bedframe he ended up building for them… even if it was a little wonky. Luke loved the look on her face when he unveiled it to her… but could have done without Felicity telling him every time she saw him woodworking that he had to be careful or he might lose another hand.

Luke was so over hand jokes by the time he was thirty-eight.

On their sixth anniversary, Ben Solo told Luke he had murdered Felicity.

… The gifts came to a stop after that.

Luke was trying not to think of his anniversary as he worked in Quom’s shop while Quom was off scavenging with Rey. Luke had been stuck on shop duty after his accident in the Inflictor, and had to wait out the weeks until his stitches got better.

Luke was rolled under Quom’s speeder which was broken again – Quom and Rey were borrowing Luke’s – and not really paying attention to his bodily position. He was reaching for his tool kit when pain shot through his body. Luke screamed and slammed his wrist against the speeder as his stitches tore.

He cried out in pain as he scrambled to get out from under the speeder and put pressure on his wound. It took a few minutes, and he didn’t notice the light on his commlink blinking.

Luke moaned as he sat on the ground, holding his stitches, trying to breathe through the pain. Several minutes passed, and soon the stinging subsided. Through gritted teeth, he looked down at his shirt and saw the fabric stained with blood. Luke cursed under his breath and moved his hand away to pull up his shirt so he could examine his wound.

“Luke?” Aletha’s voice was panicked as she ran into the tent. “Are you okay?”

“Aletha,” Luke groaned, looking up at her in shock. He tried to get to his feet, “What are you doing here?”

“I heard you yelling in pain through my commlink,” Aletha darted across the room. Without asking, she pulled his arm around her shoulders and helped him up, “I tried to comm you back, but you weren’t answering me.”

Luke looked down at his comm. Sure enough, the on button had been pressed, as well as the speaker off button, and “LINE TWO – Aletha” glowed up from the miniature screen.
“Sorry, I must have triggered it when I hit my hand,” Luke smiled, and Aletha took the hint to release him so he could stand on his own.

“What happened?” Aletha asked, her eyes going to the blood stain on his shirt.

“Tore my stitches, I think. Doesn’t hurt so much now.”

“Doesn’t matter; you could have done some serious damage to them. Let me see them.”

Luke dutifully pulled up his shirt and Aletha went into doctor mode.

“Yeah, I’m going to need to redo these stitches,” Aletha shook her head. She ordered, “Take off your shirt so I can get to them easier, Luke.”

Luke grinned, unable to resist teasing her, “Are you sure you’re not using this as an excuse to see me shirtless?”

Aletha rolled her eyes, “Luke, I’m a doctor. I’ll be completely professional.”

Luke shrugged and pulled off his shirt. Despite their many years together, Luke didn’t actually think Aletha had ever seen him fully shirtless.

Aletha was silent for a moment as she took in the sight of his strong arms and bare, muscled chest. Despite being in his forties, Luke still looked like he belonged on the cover of a men’s fitness HoloMag. Luke of course, worked hard to maintain his physique… but there truly was a reason he held the record for longest running HoloNet’s Most Attractive Bachelor title holder.

“Okay… maybe not completely professional,” Aletha bit her lip as her eyes roamed over Luke’s form.

Luke burst out laughing, “Yeah, I get that a lot. The first time Felicity saw me shirtless she just said, ‘Damn. I must have really done something right to deserve this.’ Well… not exactly the first time, but let’s just say the first time she saw me shirtless is part of a really interesting story.”

“You know, I hate it when you tease me about all these stories from your past,” Aletha set about stitching Luke back up. “Why hint at them if you’ll never tell me them?”

“Oh, you’re not better. You have just as much a mysterious past as I do.”

“I do not.”

“Oh, really?” Luke raised an eyebrow. “Ok, why did you decide to stay on Jakku?”

“None of your business.”

“Why did you come to Jakku in the first place?”

“None of your business.”

“How did Antar die?”

“Ok, you’ve made your point.”

“When did he die?”

“Luke-”
“Why do you say you’re bad with children? Why do you always ask if I found an X-Wing? Where were you born? Do you have family? Are they still alive? Why don’t you talk to them? How do you know Dosmit Raeh?”

“Enough!” Aletha pressed two fingers to his lips.

Luke grinned at her, “Annoying, isn’t it?”

“Well, why don’t I make you a deal?” Aletha rested her free hand on his bicep. She made no attempt to move her fingers from his lips. “How about I answer one of your questions, and you answer one of mine?”

“I’ll tell you how I knew Dosmit, if you tell me… who did you leave behind?”

Luke frowned at her, “What do you mean?”

“I was here, Luke when Felicity left behind Rey. I remember her speaking of family, and I know that look in your eye. It was a look so many Rebels had, the look of regretting walking away from someone they loved. I know that look, Luke, oh so well, because I’ve never had it. There’s no one left waiting for me, Luke… but there’s someone waiting for you, isn’t there?”

Luke sighed and looked away. Gently Aletha was rubbing his arm, and he found the gesture quite soothing. There was no question of if he could trust Aletha to keep his secret… the only question was if he could admit it.

“Well…” Luke hesitated. “I don’t want to get into it too much but… my sister.”

“Twin,” Luke sighed. “Plus her husband was my best friend. They… didn’t know I was leaving, and I’ve regretted not saying goodbye.”

“I’m sorry.”

“She was the Captain of the Tierfon Yellow Aces,” Aletha answered. “Antar… was Yellow-4.”

Luke watched as something changed in her face, that look that always came across when she spoke of Antar. That longing, that regret, the flash of anger, the tears that threatened to fall, but the part Luke hated most was the feeling that would surge in the Force. It was oddly the same surge that would happen when Felicity spoke of Alaric.

The feeling of wondering why she hadn’t been good enough.

“Am I interrupting something?” Quom’s voice suddenly ripped through the tent.

Luke and Aletha turned their heads to see Quom and Rey staring at them with very confused expressions. It wasn’t hard to imagine why, Luke was shirtless, Aletha was rubbing his arm, and had her fingers against his lips. They were standing very close, and the intimate tone of the room made the display look extremely suspicious.

“Luke tore his stitches,” Aletha immediately stepped away from Luke and began packing up. “Luke, see how those hold and let me know if you have any issues. You should probably hold back some scavenging another one week, in addition to the two you were already abstaining. Come, Rey. You’re with me this afternoon.”

“Bye, Dad!” Rey waved as she followed Aletha out of the tent. She was confused by the sight of her father with Aletha, but still young enough to not be suspicious of anything.

“Have fun,” Luke called back as the girl disappeared.

Quom on the other hand, was not too young.

“Had a fun morning?” Quom asked very shortly.

Luke shrugged, pulling his shirt back on, “Making good progress on your speeder. Good haul?”

Luke frowned, watching Quom, “Are you upset about something?”

“What make you think that?” Quom replied in an annoyed tone that made it clear the answer was yes.

“I sense it through the Force,” Luke answered, still not getting what the problem was.

“Well, good for you! Thank the Force you have those special beings in your blood to help you figure it out. It’s not like you could use basic reasoning.”

Luke said nothing but watched as his friend sorted through the haul in silence. Long minutes stretched on as Quom sat with his back to Luke, digging through his toolbox and cleaning supplies to fix the odds and ends he collected.

It had to have been a good thirty minutes before Luke decided to leave Quom to it, and grabbed one of their on-going projects to work on. It was Ivano’s engine, which was giving him troubles with running smoothly. Luke dare not slide back under Quom’s speeder, instead opting to observe Quom from the other work table.

Finally, Quom snapped.

Quom violently threw his screwdriver down on the workbench.

“Oh, for the love of the Force!” Quom exclaimed. “Would you just make out with Aletha already? This unresolved sexual tension is getting old, Luke!”

“Excuse me?” Luke put down his tools.

“Aletha!” Quom spun around his chair. “Look, I don’t mind being the awkward third wheel of the group, but could we at least break the tension and acknowledge the fact that you two are clearly attracted each other. Seriously, Luke, make out with her before my hair starts going grey.”

“I am not attracted to Aletha, Quom!”

“Oh great,” Quom rolled his eyes. “I was really hoping all those stories about you being completely oblivious to the fact Felicity was in love with you, were exaggerated. You really are telling me that you don’t see the sexual tension between the two of you?”

“YOU WERE JUST SHIRTLESS WHILE SHE STROKED YOUR RIDICULOUSLY ATTRACTIVE, TONED, MUSCULAR BODY! YOU WANT TO TELL ME THAT WAS NOTHING?”

Luke opened his mouth to yell, but suddenly stopped, “You think I’m attractive?”

“I’m straight, Luke, not blind,” Quom said flatly. “I assure you, both Aletha and I find you very attractive. She’s just more willing to pursue things.”

“Quom, stop,” Luke snapped. “I am not attracted to Aletha, and Aletha is not attracted to me.”

“Luke, stop,” Quom used the exact same tone. “Just think, for minute, please reflect on your relationship with Aletha. Think about the things you do, the things you’ve done, the way you feel about her, the way she makes you feel about yourself. How soon in the day after you wake do you want to see her? How much of the day would you spend with her if you had unlimited time? Who do you talk to when things get rough? When you want a second opinion on health, on Jakku, on parenting, on anything, who do you go to? Because I’ve watched you two over the past few years, and I’m telling you, Luke, whatever you feel, Aletha feels the same way.”

“Quom-”

“No, seriously, Luke. Stop… Think… Tell me what you feel.”

So Luke did.

He thought about his history with Aletha. How Aletha gave his Felicity’s strange final message, and ensured he understood the meaning behind it, even if she didn’t understand it. How she held him while he cried after making his deal with Plutt, allowing him to selfishly mourn Felicity for the first time. How she had been there every day for both himself and Rey. How she always had his back. How she smiled when their eyes met, and he couldn’t resist returning that joyful grin, so unlike Felicity’s sardonic smirk. How she had helped him through the Jarex fiasco. Refused to let alone during the Plutt credit shortage. How her first thoughts were always the health and safety of Rey, of himself, and of Quom.

How he counted the minutes until he could see her each day.

Luke found it hard to breathe, “Oh my God… I think I’m…”

Quom stared at Luke for a long time, waiting for him to finish the sentence. But Luke just sat there with mouth agape and a shocked look on his face.

“In love with Aletha,” Quom hurriedly supplied the ending. “Yeah, we all know. Can we hurry this up, this whole you finally catching on to the obvious? Because I have things to do.”

“I just can’t believe it. How have I never seen this before?”

“And you’re sure Aletha returns my feelings?” Luke asked.

“She and I have literally had conversations on the subject,” Quom replied. “So, please, I am begging you, go profess your love for Aletha and resolve this whole unacknowledged sexual tension before I have an aneurysm. You probably still have a few more years left if the two of you want to have kids together. I’m not exactly privy to Aletha’s menstrual cycles, but she’s probably still young enough to-”

Quom frowned, “Why? She likes you, and you like her. What’s stopping you?”

Luke rolled his eyes, “I’m married, Quom.”

Quom smirked, “Last time I checked, wasn’t your Dearly Beloved also your Dearly Departed?”

He barely dodged the screwdriver Luke aimed at his head.

“Ok,” Quom pulled himself back off the ground, “as a Vrogem, which will actually attack you if I’m near enough Dark Side of the Force, I beg you not to give in to the Dark Side for both of our safeties.”

“Sorry,” Luke sighed, “I just can’t stand you talking about Felicity like that.”

“Doesn’t mean you have to throw a screwdriver at my head. And it’s the truth, Luke. Face it: Felicity is dead. She has been for four years, she will continue to be for the next four years, and every increment of four that comes to pass. I know you love Felicity… but she’s not here, Luke, and she’s not going to make some miraculous return. She’s dead. Don’t throw away something good, over the ghost of something great.”

Luke sighed and looked down at the wedding ring on his finger.

“For as long you both shall live,” the ghostly words of their wedding officiant rang in Luke’s ears.

“We'll see each other again! I promise, Felicity. I promise!” His own words echoed.

"Allowing yourself to let her go is not the same as ceasing to love her," The advice of Anakin Skywalker whispered in his son's ear. "It took me too long to learn that. Do not make my mistake of accepting it when it was too late. In letting her go, you are not asking yourself to permit things to end. You are asking her to live… Even if it means doing it without you."

“So?” Quom asked. “Are you going to give it a shot?”

Luke felt tears sting his eyes.

“Tell Luke I love him, and that I'm counting the minutes until I see him again,” Felicity’s comm message repeated in his head.

“I’ll…” Luke stared at his wedding ring. “…I’ll think about it.”

There was a light knocking on Aletha’s tent pegs.

“Hey, Dad,” Rey jumped up from her chair and hugged him.

“I’m better,” Luke looked very distracted as he gave Rey a one-armed hug. “Rey, can you, uh…”
Can you go outside for a few minutes? I have to talk to Aletha.”

“Ok.” Rey waved at Aletha, “See you tomorrow, Doctor Ally.”

“Let’s sit.” Luke lead them to the chairs. He set his across from Aletha so they were staring straight at each other.

“Are you okay?” Aletha frowned and put a hand on his forehead. “Your hands are shaking and your skin is a little pale and clammy.”

“I’m fine,” Luke removed her hand. “Listen, Aletha… I have to talk to you about something.”

Aletha nodded, folded her hands in her lap, and waited for him to speak.

“Ok, I can do this,” Luke took a deep breath, mustering all his courage. “I’m attracted to you, Aletha.”

Aletha smiled.

“I know,” Aletha’s reply was simple.

He hadn’t expected that answer. Sure, Quom said they had had conversations about Aletha liking Luke, but he didn’t realize that it meant she knew he returned those feelings.

“Of course,” Aletha looked like she wanted to chuckle, but recognized the seriousness of the situation. “It’s very obvious, Luke. For goodness sake, we walk around the market with our arms wrapped around each other’s waist.”

“Oh, right,” Luke looked down at the ground.

He had always perceived that as the gesture between two friends, but after Aletha bringing it up as proof of his attraction to him, and Han once bringing it up as proof of Luke’s attraction to Felicity, he might as well give up all notions of friendship with that gesture.

Aletha swallowed and gently touched his arm, “I’m attracted to you too, Luke.”

“But…”

Aletha looked to the ground, “I’m not going to do anything about it.”

Aletha took a deep breath and grasped his left hand. She brought it up to eye-level to showcase the gold band gleaming in the sunlight.

“Because you’re still wearing this,” Aletha whispered.
It felt like a blade went through his heart. Here he was disappointed that Aletha Kymeri didn’t want a relationship with him, while he still wore the band of his marriage to Felicity Rhiaon.

“You’re married, Luke,” Aletha said. “Maybe not legally anymore, but your heart still calls her your wife. And I won’t be your mistress. Not legally, not emotionally, not physically.”

“You wouldn’t be my mistress,” Luke objected.

“Yes, I would.” Aletha sighed, “Look, I know it’s hard. It took a long time before I gave up Antar, but I won’t do this, Luke… Not again.”

Luke frowned, “Again?”

Aletha looked away, “There are things I haven’t told you about myself, Luke.”

“Things like you were someone’s mistress?”

“Not legally, but… emotionally. I’ve been with someone who wouldn’t let their past love go, and I’ve never felt more worthless in my life. I’m never doing that again.”

He said nothing, but stared at her, his heart aching. The thought of someone hurting Aletha that way broke his heart, and he wanted nothing more than to make her feel better. As he looked at her, he could see her in a new light. He had been through this before, this revelation and acceptance of loving someone, and knowing that he couldn’t pretend to be friends anymore.

Aletha looked like she was about to cry, “I want to love you, Luke Erso. I really do. But I’m not going to compete with a woman with whom your heart so clearly belongs.”

“Then how do I prove to you that this isn’t going to be a competition?”

Aletha took his hand, “Let her go, Luke. Truly let her go. Take off this ring, take a few months to discover who you are without her… then let me know. I’m willing to wait for you, Luke, because I know you’re worth it.”

Luke smiled, “You are too.”

“Then, please… take the first step and let her go.”

“I will,” Luke promised. As Aletha was holding his hand, looking at him with such joy and hope in her eyes, it seemed so easy to let Felicity go.

It was once he had walked away from her, that the terror overtook him.

He would have to let Felicity Rhiaon go.

Luke didn’t leave the walker the next day.

Rey didn’t question why her father didn’t get out of bed in the morning; he would have these days every now and then. She didn’t know it was the days Luke was weighed down by the fates of the people he loved: those who lived, those who died, and all of them he had disappointed. Rey knew just to make her own breakfast and call Quom for a ride. They never spoke about those days, at least not to Luke himself.
Luke spent the day reflecting, looking at the single Holo of Felicity he still possessed. He kept it private, even from Rey. Sometimes it was too painful to see Felicity’s face and think of how he let her down.

He had loved her more than he thought it was possible to love another person. And through that love, they had performed the greatest miracle of all and created a new life. Luke would have given anything to have her back, but part of him struggled to realize the hopelessness of that situation. It felt like maybe a part of him thought there was still a chance she would walk through the door.

But he knew it would never happen. He knew, he would never sit in that walker and hold her, talking, reflecting, counting the tallies on the wall, and try to figure out how they could still have happily ever after.

He wanted those years stole from him. Watching their hair turn silver, debating to what extent they were allowed to let themselves go with age, reaching the plateau point of their love life and trying to figure out how to put the spark back in it.

Luke wanted it all, the good, the bad, even the ugly. Arguing over how to raise Rey. Clashing from their opposite – yet oddly similar – upbringings. Her threats to kick his ass for whatever was bugging her at the moment. His pretending he was locked in a deep state of meditation when really he was just ignoring Felicity. The times they would scream at each other until they were red in the face.

How they would fall back into each other’s arms with the sincerest of apologies. How no matter how upset she got with him, the Force around her always brightened when she saw him. Her arms wrapped around him, savoring his embrace. Those lazy mornings in bed when they just spoke about anything and everything curled up in the blankets and each other.

There wasn’t a single moment good or bad Luke wouldn’t give up anything – except Rey – to have again.

And yet there he sat on their tenth anniversary in the shell of an AT-AT walker on Jakku, completely alone.

There was something warm on his shoulder.

“I am so sorry, My Son,” Anakin sat next to Luke. If there was one person who could understand Luke’s pain, it truly was Anakin.

“Am I responsible?” Luke asked. “Did she die because I told her to go? Because I didn’t leave a comm line open? Because I didn’t get there in time? Did she die because of me?”

“Absolutely not.”

“You say that so confidently.”

“Trust me, Luke. You didn’t kill Felicity Rhiaon. Have I ever lied to you?”

Luke sighed, “No.”

“No,” Luke chuckled. “She’d probably want me to go storm the First Order and kill everyone who held her hostage.”
Anakin looked away, “Probably something along those lines. You did marry an interesting woman.”

“Didn’t she shoot you?”

“That doesn’t mean she isn’t interesting.”

Anakin hesitated, he knew the real question Luke was asking.

“Luke…” Anakin thought over his words, “I don’t think you should do this. Felicity is who you are meant to be with, there’s no reason to start up with someone else.”

Luke couldn’t help the anger that flashed across his face, “Excuse me?”

“Things will just get complicated and I think you’ll regret it.”

“Oh, well if you say I’ll regret it, I suppose it’s true. After all, I am talking to the expert of regrets.”

But Luke was beyond upset, “You don’t get it. You never even looked at someone after my mother. You didn’t feel this way after feeling that way.”

“What does that even mean?”

“But what about Felicity? What happens when…” Anakin trailed off.

“I’m not going to stop loving Felicity, Father… but I need to move on. I can’t throw away something good, over the ghost of something great. So, please, if you’re not going to give me advice on how to let her go, then go away.”

Luke was little surprised when Anakin did just that.

His father didn’t understand; Anakin Skywalker spent his life afraid of losing the ones he loved. Luke wouldn’t be that way, he would let Felicity go. He sighed and looked at the Holo in his hands, of the image of Felicity, the absolute love of his life.

Yes, he would finally let her go.

But maybe one last time, he would let himself remember their story…
Part One: Friendship

Chapter Summary

Luke remembers how he met Felicity Rhiaon and developed a friendship.

Chapter Notes

Please note that the first chunk of these flashbacks are directly from my story Definitions of Home. If you have already read these parts and don’t feel like rereading what you’ve mostly read before (there were a few tweaks due to these being flashbacks solely in Luke’s perspective) please skip to “3 Months, 12 Days” where the new content starts. So don’t be intimidated by the word count of 12k, because more than 5k of those words are old material.

…Starting to understand why I split this into five parts? (Actually, it's now going to be six parts because the DoH material took up so much space.)

The Long Way Home

Chapter Twenty-Three

Part One: Friendship

TEN YEARS AFTER THE BATTLE OF YAVIN

YAVIN IV

Museum of Rebellion History – AKA Former Yavin IV Rebel Base

Tenth Anniversary Celebration of the Destruction of the Death Star

Day 1

Luke had been busy chatting with Wedge when Leia came whizzing by, leading a woman towards them.

"We'll have you stand next to Luke. It'll be a great photo op," Leia hurriedly said to the woman. "Have you met my brother yet?"

"Uh, no," the woman replied taking a glance at Luke – who was desperately restraining an amused smirk at Leia working herself up over nothing. The woman extended her hand to Luke, "Felicity Rhiaon."
"Luke Skywalker," Luke shook her hand as Leia dashed off to check for the eighth time that they had enough medals.

"Pleasure to meet you, Luke. It's nice to finally meet the man who destroyed the Death Star."

"The pleasure's all mine," Luke gave her an overly large grin that didn't reach his eyes.

"You have no idea who I am, do you?"

"I'm Rogue One," Felicity returned the chuckle.

"Who?"

Wedge elbowed Luke, "Leader of the team who stole the plans to the Death Star."

"Oh," Luke said. "Well, it's definitely a pleasure to meet you."

Felicity was rather attractive. Pale skin, brown hair in an elegant updo, slender figure though not very curvy, her face had sharp angles, and her brown eyes seemed to assess even the smallest of details as she too took him in.

Luke opened his mouth to say something more when he was suddenly cut off.

"PLACES PEOPLE!" Leia called out.

"See you around," Felicity gave a smile before heading off.

"You never have been good with women, Luke."

"Let's get one of Skywalker and Rhiaon together!"

Luke blinked, trying to clear the bright flashes of the cameras from his eyes as the reporters crowded around the photoshoot. No doubt the pictures would be on every screen the next day.

People shuffled awkwardly as Luke suddenly found Felicity Rhiaon pushed next to him.

"Hello, again," Felicity smiled at him.

"Master Skywalker, put your arm around her!" someone ordered.

Luke looked at Felicity, "May I?"

"Go ahead."

Though he didn't think much of it at the time, Luke found there was something to how perfectly his arm fit wrapped around her waist. Felicity placed her hand on his shoulder and they silently paused for the cameras for a few minutes.

"I bet this will be the star photo tomorrow," Felicity muttered, trying not to mess up the shots.
"Rogue One and Rogue Leader. The woman who stole the plans to the Death Star, and the man who blew it up."

"We do make a sensible match," Luke nodded. "I liked your speech during the ceremony."

"I'm just glad I was allowed to make it. Very few people ever talk about my team, and we suffered very heavy losses."

"Well, thank you. Without you stealing the plans in the first place, none of this would have been possible."

"Thank you," Felicity said. "It's nice to see someone appreciate my team's accomplishments for once."

Luke found Felicity at his side once more during the tribute to the fallen. A large pyre had been built and lit in memory of those who had lost their lives. Leia, Felicity, and Luke stood at the head of the assembly and took turns saying the names of the fallen. Felicity listed the members of her team, Luke the pilots, and Leia the rest. Leia even took a few moments to mention Obi-Wan Kenobi, and Owen and Beru Lars, who merited recognition for their part in refusing to expose Luke, Obi-Wan, and the droids.

As the flames burned bright, Luke’s voice quavered as he listed his set of names. Luke hadn’t known any of the men who spoke of, yet his voice was filled with heartbreak.

"Biggs Darklighter," Luke's voice broke on the last name. "Biggs was my best friend, and we had just been reunited. I was going to tell him all about the adventures I had had, but…"

Luke couldn't bring himself to finish the sentence.

Felicity looked up at him. Luke was staring into the flames, tears shining in his eyes. As if it was the most natural thing in the world, Felicity gently touched his arm. Luke visibly relaxed at the gesture of comfort.

Felicity smiled, "Anytime."

1 Month, 21 Days

"So, you knew Shara?" Luke asked Felicity at the reception of the funeral of Shara Bey. It had been the first time he had seen Felicity since the celebration on Yavin IV.

"She was the one who retrieved Diego and I after we stole the plans to the Death Star," Felicity explained. "We became friends, and she piloted me to a lot of my recruitment missions."

"You needed a pilot?"

Felicity looked away awkwardly, "I… Can't fly ships. At least not well."

Luke frowned, "I thought it was a requirement of all Rebels."

"It's a long and rather personal story, but Bail Organa made an exception when he recruited me."
Besides, I do know the bare minimum, just don't ask me to land a ship unless you want flames and extensive property damage."

"I'll keep that in mind."

"So, you knew Shara too? Or are you here because you're well… Luke freaking Skywalker and can pretty much freely attend any Rebellion affiliated event you want?"

Luke chuckled, "As true as that may be, I actually did know Shara. In fact, her last mission with the Rebellion was helping me track down a Force Sensitive tree."

Felicity raised a brow, "A Force Sensitive tree? You're joking right?"

"Why would I joke about that?"

"Come on!" Felicity laughed. "It's hard enough to believe in the Force on its own, but now you're asking me to believe there are trees that are 'one with the Force?'"

Luke then recalled Felicity's speech at the Celebration of the Battle of Yavin, "You don't believe in the Force?"

"I believe it to an extent," Felicity admitted. "I believe you personally can sense people's emotions and move things with your mind, but the whole destiny aspect is where you lose me. There's no mystical force that decides my fate, and if there is – after everything its taken from me – I want nothing to do with it."

Luke sensed the pain behind her words, but as she was still barely more than a stranger to him, he felt it inappropriate to push any further.

"I respect your opinion," Luke replied. "You're not the first person to say that to me, and you certainly won't be the last. In fact, even my brother-in-law, Han, used to believe that."

"Speaking of your family, do you have any idea what Leia's going to say at the Senate meeting? She won't answer my questions, and I want my office to be prepared."

"You're a Senator?"

"Senate Emissary," Felicity corrected. "Hence why I'm not exactly in the loop to Leia's plans. A lot of planets have been contacting us because of this incident. They want to be protected from the First Order."

"That's good," Luke was glad that some good was going to come from the First Order's senseless murder of Shara Bey. Though he did not know it at the time, it would indeed be the catalyst for the creation of the Resistance.

"It is, but I just wish that they had come to us for different reasons," Felicity sighed. "More for, you know, actually believing in the good of the New Republic?"

Luke smiled, "And I wish most of my students didn't come to me because they want to play with lightsabers. If only the universe was perfect."

The pair laughed together only to be stopped short when they noticed the dirty looks they were getting.

"Sorry," Felicity playfully winced as she and Luke withheld smiles and sent apologetic looks to the people around them. "We probably shouldn't laugh at a funeral."

"I'm sure Shara wouldn't have minded." Luke's face suddenly grew serious, "Felicity? I don't mean to pry but… did you see the Holo?"

Felicity looked guilty, "The first part. I shut it off when the Troopers readied to fire. What about you?"

"It's not that I didn't want to respect her," Felicity insisted. "I just… I sort of have a thing about last words. I always hope that a person is allowed to make their peace if their life is taken unfairly. I wanted to see if she got that dignity."

"And did she?"

Felicity grinned, "She did. Rather good final words too."

"What were they?"

"The troops told her 'any resistance will be met with proper force' and she told them 'any force will be met with proper resistance.' Then she took out about five troopers before they overwhelmed her. I… didn't watch anymore after that."

"Any force will be met with proper resistance," Luke smiled, gently shaking his head. "Pretty good final words. But to answer your earlier question, I don't know what Leia is planning on doing. Truth be told, I'm not sure that even Leia knows what she'll do."

"Well, she's pretty good at winging that sort of thing," Felicity said with a shrug.

Luke looked a little confused, "Are you… close to Leia? You keep calling her casually by her name. I know you transmitted the Death Star plans to her, but I don't remember Leia ever talking about you."

Felicity smirked, "Well, that's a wonderful thing to hear that she doesn't ever discuss our friendship. No, we're not close, but we used to be before the First Death Star. Bail Organa hired me to be what he called her personal assistant when she first started working in politics at thirteen. Though, to be honest I wasn't so much a personal assistant. Senator Bail Organa described the position as something like the Handmaiden of a Queen of Naboo. Leia was really obsessed with this one politician at the time – someone called Amidala – and Bail thought it might be handy to have someone roughly her age around."

"So what exactly was your job then?"

"I like to describe it as one third bodyguard, one third babysitter, and one third salaried friend. Of course, I found out years later that Bail hired me specifically because he knew my father was a technician on the Death Star and was using me as a way to keep on eye him. But bygones."

Luke grinned at Felicity and couldn't help but wonder why Leia had never mentioned Felicity to him. He understood that people drifted apart and got too busy to socialize, but there was something about the beautiful, charming woman before him that made Luke resent Leia not introducing them sooner. Felicity seemed like she could be a nice friend to have around.

"Oh," Felicity's eyes caught something over Luke's shoulder. "Looks like my ride is waving me down. I think I have to go."
"Really?" Luke looked back to see Diego Nalto waving to Felicity. "That's too bad. It was nice talking to you."

"That'd be nice."

Felicity's smile faltered as she looked back at Diego, and she rolled her eyes.

"Alright, I'm coming!" Felicity called across the room, completely forgetting she was in the middle of a wake. She turned back to Luke, "Can you tell Leia to contact me? It'd be nice to catch up. And if you guys need anything to deal with this First Order situation, she has my number. I'd love to help."

"I'll be sure to let her know."

"Thank you."

"Anytime," Luke smiled, remembering the phrase they had exchanged at the celebration they had met at.

"Likewise," Felicity grinned, clearly recalling the memory. "Well, since I'm so fond of last words, let mine be this: it's always a pleasure to bump into you, Luke. Even if the circumstances aren't the best."

"I find the same joy in meeting you," Luke grinned. She gestured behind Felicity toward the exasperated Diego, "Now, I think you better go before Nalto has an aneurysm."

"I told him to put more money in the parking meter," Felicity laughed as she walked away.

Luke couldn't help but watch as she left. He couldn't put his finger on it, but there was something about that strange, beautiful girl with the affinity for final words.

2 Months, 2 Days

"Thanks," Luke smiled at his sister as she handed him the stack of dishes while he and Ben set the table for dinner. He was halfway to the table when he noticed that he was holding five plates, "Uh, Leia? I think you grabbed one too many."

"Oh, didn't I tell you?" Leia said as she pulled a dish from the oven. "We're having a guest."

Luke and Ben shared an apprehensive look and Artoo let out a beep from the corner. "Guest" usually meant foreign dignitary leading to an awkward dinner involving a lot of political talk and Han causing some sort of incident when his best behaviour turned cynical. Thankfully, Han was out at the hanger that hosted the Falcon doing some last minute repairs before dinner (which the family was always grateful to allow him to do because it meant he got clean up duty after dinner.) If Han had been in the room for Leia's announcement it would have been nothing but complaining and attempted bartering until the guest arrived.

"Knock it off," Leia shot the boys a look as she checked over Threepio's work on dessert. "There's no need for looking like you dread some impending doom. It's a friendly visit, not a political meeting."

Luke nudged Ben to prompt him to resume setting the table, "Who did you invite?"
As if on cue the apartment door buzzed.

Leia wiped her hands on a dish table, and tapped Threepio's back to signal she was passing him. She crossed to the door and opened it with a grin to reveal a brunette woman clutching a bottle of wine.

"Fliss," Leia greeted her friend with a hug. "It's been far too long."

"It's good to see you too, Leia." Felicity held up the bottle she was clutching, "I brought wine. It's Alderiaan and a pretty good vintage… I think."

"Thank you." Leia took the bottle and peered at the label. "Wait a minute. Did my father and I give this to you for your twenty-first birthday?"

"Maybe," Felicity smirked. "Sorry, I'm not a wine drinker. But don't worry, I looked into it, a ten-year-old bottle of wine from that vineyard isn't poisonous. Doesn't age that well, but it won't kill you."

"Well, I can always give it to Lando," Leia shrugged, urging Felicity into the apartment. "He'll drink anything. Boys, this is Felicity Rhiaon. Fliss, this is my son, Ben and you know my brother, Luke?"

"We've run into each other a few times," Felicity grinned, shaking Luke's hand. "Luke, it's always good to see you."

"Likewise," Luke replied looking over Felicity. She was wearing a simple black dress and heels, and for the first time, Luke saw what her hair looked like down. Her straight brown hair fell a little past her shoulders and appeared to be very soft. As nice as her hair looked up, Luke definitely favored it down. "You look great this evening."

"Thank you," Felicity replied.

Felicity grinned at him, "So are you all ready for tomorrow?"

"Felicity's one of the volunteers for the first Resistance mission," Leia explained as she and Ben began to carry the dishes to the table. Threepio had taken Felicity's coat to the closet while Artoo had wheeled himself over to plug into a charge port. "As capable as you and Han are, I thought the two of you could use a little backup."

"Oh right, the mission," Luke remembered.

Leia had already secured a lead on one of the facilities where the kidnapped children were, and Han was taking the Falcon there first thing in the morning. Leia wanted to prove to the Senate as quickly as possible how effective her taskforce would be.

"Yeah, I meant to ask you," Felicity said, "I know that people have promised equipment, but considering we haven't been approved for even twenty-four hours yet, do I have to bring anything?"

"Just proper clothes and maybe some extra weapons," Leia took her usual seat leaving a spot on each side of her for Han and Luke. "I've got everything else handled. Han's just checking over the Falcon as we speak. Maybe if he would hurry up, we could finally have dinner."

"Here," Luke pulled out the chair of his usual spot. "Have my seat."
"Thanks," Felicity smiled as Luke pushed her in and took the seat next to her. "Been a while since a man pushed in my chair for me. So how many weapons would you recommend? I haven't been on a military mission for a while. I mean that's not to say I haven't gotten in trouble every once in a while, but I'm sort of rusty on the planning area."

"Well, I usually take maybe two blasters and my lightsaber," Luke used the Force to put back down the bread roll Ben was floating towards him as they waited for Han to join them. "It all depends on how you use your weapons I suppose."

"Gunner taught me the best thing in this case would be drop and fire. No use in fiddling with your gas cartridge or power cell when you could just pull out another weapon. He usually said ten would do the trick… though I don't actually own ten blasters."

"How many do you have?"

"Uh…" Felicity thought hard. "Leia this is a governmental operation, correct?"

"Correct," Leia nodded.

"Ok, I can probably use my work blaster in that case, but better check with my boss," Felicity thought aloud. "Let's see, personal, work issue, the one in my bedside drawer…"

"I'm a single female who lives alone on Coruscant," Felicity hastily explained. "Better safe than sorry. So, that's three, though I could probably borrow two from my coworkers who are here on Hosnian Prime right now. The rest are on Coruscant or some mission. I guess I could scrounge up maybe five."

"You could borrow the four I own if you wanted to drop and fire," Luke offered. "Though please don't actually drop them."

"You own four? And you looked at me funny for keeping one in my bedside drawer," Felicity told. "Wait, if I take all of your blasters, won't that leave you weaponless?"

"I'll have my lightsaber to protect myself."

Felicity raised an eyebrow, "In other words, you're dead."

"You might want to ask everyone on Jabba's sail barge how ineffective I am with a lightsaber."

"You do know I have no idea who Jabba is or what happened on his sail barge? Do you get completely overtaken? Or did you get lucky with your laser sword and kill everyone on board?"

Luke narrowed his eyes slightly unsure if she was mocking him or just teasing him, "It's not a laser sword, it's a lightsaber. An elegant weapon from a more civilized age."

Something in Felicity's face changed. If Luke struggled to tell if there was humor behind her words before, he could tell they were now gone completely.

"There's nothing civilized about a lightsaber," Felicity muttered looking down.

Luke could feel the difference in the Force. The shields in the back of Felicity's mind had shot up, and the aura around her had darkened. Something about lightsabers had set off her defenses.

They sat for a minute in silence, Felicity staring at her plate to avoid eye contact with everyone. The tension in the room was so thick that nobody noticed when Han walked through the door.

Felicity finally spoke, "If you're still offering those blasters, Skywalker, I'll take them. You can enjoy your little glow stick of death all you want, but to me there's nothing better than a good blaster at my side."

"A good blaster at your side?" Han's eyebrows lifted at the girl as he recalled once saying something similar. "Sweetheart, I have no idea who you are, or what you're doing in my house, but I think I like you."

"Thanks," Felicity dryly said.

"Finally! We can eat!" Ben exclaimed as Han took the seat next to him. With a challenging smirk, Ben made eye contact with Luke and deliberately used the Force to call the bread roll back to his plate.

Luke shook his head.

"Since we're on the topic," Han said as everyone began piling food on their plates. "Who are you and what are you doing in my house?"

"Han, this is Felicity Rhiaon," Leia introduced. "She's an old friend of mine who will be joining you on your trip tomorrow. We've been meaning to catch up for a while so I invited her to dinner."

"Oh, good," Han replied. "I thought she was another one of Luke's girlfriends."

Luke choked on his glass of water.

"Han!" Leia swatted his arm.

"What? He goes through them so quickly, I can't keep track sometimes."

"I don't go through girlfriends quickly!" Luke objected.

"Luke, we've had cans of soup in our cupboard longer than some of your relationships."

Felicity snickered, covering her mouth with the back of her hand. She cleared her throat and put on her best false innocence look as she caught Luke's scowling glare.

"Yep, definitely like her. Good sense of humour," Han raised his glass at Felicity. "And I'm definitely stealing that glow stick of death thing."

2 Months, 3 Days

As Han walked into the cockpit of the Millennium Falcon, Luke was sitting in the co-pilot's seat deep in conversation with Felicity, who standing behind him.

"It just gets everywhere," Luke was in the middle of saying to Felicity.

"I know," Felicity laughed. "I swear, it's been ten years and I'm still finding it in my clothing. But you know, that's not even the worst part about desert living-"

"I'm sorry," Han loudly interrupted. "Are you two talking about sand?"
"Not sand," Luke quickly corrected as his face reddened. "Desert living. Apparently Felicity actually lived on a desert planet called Jakku for about a month. I was just comparing it to Tatooine."

"Jakku?" Han raised an eyebrow. "That junkyard?"

"It wasn't exactly by choice," Felicity answered. "Anyways, what I was saying was that sand isn't the worst part of desert living: it's the hunger. Water wasn't too bad an issue on Jakku, but food portions were the literal currency."

"That's so odd. On Tatooine it was the opposite, enough food but no water."

"Okay, if you two are done being… strange," Han took a long pause as he shot a judgemental look at each of them, "there's some kids we're going to go rescue. Fliss, can I call you Fliss?"

"Sure," Felicity shrugged.

"Fliss, you better go strap in in the back with the others," Han ordered. "Luke, you're my co-pilot. We're going to go pick up Chewie on Kashyyyk and then head to the Meridian System. And, Fliss? Leia told me about your… luck with ships… Don't touch anything."

"Aye, aye, Captain. Let me know when we can move about freely. Skywalker here thinks he can beat me at dejarik," Felicity winked at Luke and exited the cockpit.

"Hey, do you know how many times I've played?" Luke got out of his seat and called after her from the door. "Your credit chip is mine, Rhiaon!"

Luke grinned to himself and turned back to his seat. He was surprised to see Han staring at him with an eyebrow raised.

"Nothing," Han said. "Help me put in the coordinates."

"Kashyyyk's number one on the list of favorite routes, right?" Luke sat down in the co-pilot seat and started working.

"That's right," Han pressed a few buttons.

The men sat in silence as they readied the ship for takeoff.

"Hey, Luke?"

"Yeah, Han?"

"Marry that girl."

Luke just looked at Han like he was crazy.

---

3 Months, 7 Days

"Luke, I cannot thank you enough for agreeing to come with me to Zygerria," Felicity repeated for the umpteenth time as Luke piloted their ship to Zygerria.

Felicity had been struggling to get Queen Thali – who liked to refer to Felicity as Miss Rayon – to allow Zygerria to join the Republic, but discovered that Thali was very interested in meeting Luke Skywalker. Luke had agreed to accompany Felicity on her Emissary planet visit, unaware of the danger they were about to wander into.

"I really owe you one," Felicity continued.

"Don't think anything of it," Luke replied. "It's my duty as a Jedi to act as keeper of the peace."

"Yeah, well this isn't so much peacekeeping as it is desperately trying to break Zygerrian from a mindset of brutality and subjugation."

Luke looked at Felicity.

"I tend to use ostentatious language while I'm on the clock," Felicity quickly explained. "Sort of picked it up from Leia and her father when I was younger."

"Leia does have an extensive vocabulary when she's being professional… and insulting Han." Luke paused, "I'm sorry, this is probably going to be the strangest segue you've ever heard, but speaking of Han, can I ask you why Queen Thali keeps calling you Miss Rayon?"

Felicity frowned, "That is the strangest segue I've ever heard."

"Well, I thought your name was pronounced Ree-On. Or is it like Han, and everyone pronounces it differently without there be a correct way of saying it?"

Felicity smiled, "No, it's pronounced just the one way: Ree-On."

"Then why don't you correct Thali when she says Rayon?"

"It's a mind game," Felicity explained. "She knows it's pronounced Ree-On, but she's using Master/Slave mentality. Thali chooses to call me Rayon because it sends the message that I'm so beneath her that I'm not important enough for her to remember my name. If I call her out on it and correct her, she wins. We're going to get a lot of that type of thing during this visit, so be aware and don't give in."

"I'll stay on alert." Luke glanced at the navi computer, "One hour until arrival."

"Well, if we haven't killed each other in the last sixteen hours, I don't think we're about to start," Felicity spun in the co-pilot seat.

She and Luke were the only people aboard the small Emissary vessel. Technically the Emissary in charge was supposed to fly, but Nils had insisted Luke pilot instead. He had informed Luke that Felicity was so terrible at landings that she had a black mark against her name and was forbidden from flying any government owned craft.

"So," Felicity said. "We got time to kill. You want to tell me what you were doing on Coruscant at the office when Thali visited? Don't you live with your sister on Hosnian Prime?"

"No," Luke quickly answered. "Well… okay, yes I live with my sister… sort of. She's got a place on Coruscant too, being the Senator and all. I sort of move around a lot, so it's never really made sense for me to get my own place."

"Hey, I'm not judging you for living with your sister. I'd love to live with my brother if he wasn't… dead," Felicity became quiet.

Luke watched her, waiting for a signal of what to do next. He could see her walls go up in the same way they had when discussing lightsabers.

Felicity cleared her throat, "Uh, Nils said your case was ongoing, and ergo confidential. I can't ask him for details, but I'm allowed to ask you."

"Oh, I'm just having some issues with the base planet of my Jedi Order," Luke explained pushing forward the change of conversation. At his response he could already see Felicity relaxing. "I've been permitted to build the temple – which should be opening next month – but I've run into some roadblocks when it came to building any residences."

"Why's that?"

"I picked a planet called Rornian that is strong with the Force, but also unclaimed, uninhabited, and undeveloped planet. There's no pre-existing authority of any kind on Rornian, no sentient species, and it's the only planet in its system. However, it is in Republic controlled space, so the Republic is in charge of the matter."

"Ouch! No pre-existing authority whatsoever?" Felicity winced, "That's a lot of paperwork."

"Nils said it would probably be minimum a year before we settled everything," Luke sighed. "You'll probably see me around your office a lot."

"You bet I will. Luke, that's only going to be a year if every person in the office stops what they're doing and devotes twelve hours a day, seven days a week to your case. And no offense, you're a nice guy, but I like my weekends off."

Luke frowned, "How long will it be then?"

Felicity thought hard, "Well, the Republic has to set up a body of Government on Rornian. In order to do that, you have to have residents, some of which can't be a part of your organization – say one person for every thirty you have – and you'll need a place for them to live. You have to buy the property for them to build on, and in order to do that, the land needs to be claimed. With your temple residing there, you have a good case for claiming it yourself, but that will need to be approved. Honestly, I'd say this is easily three to four years of paperwork."

Luke's jaw dropped, "Four years?"

"You might want one of your Jedi to buy a place on Coruscant. Otherwise that'll be a hell of a commute."

Luke couldn't believe it, "You know, maybe I had my information wrong. I'll talk to Nils when we get back. That can't truly be four years of work."

"Whatever you say," Felicity shook her head. "Well, I suppose since we're getting close to Zygerria, now would be a good time to go over the rules again. As I've said before you are here as an agent of the Emissary Office, not as a Jedi or a private citizen. Everything you do directly reflects myself and this office. Don't screw it up, Skywalker."

"I'll try not to," Luke laughed. "You really don't have to go over the rules again. You made them pretty clear when you refused to let me bring Artoo along."

"Personal products such as droids can be used to collect confidential information, hence why they are forbidden. Just be glad I talked Nils into letting you bring your lightsaber, and trust me, I really did not want to."
"Someday I'm going to convince you to tell me why you hate lightsabers so much."

"If thinking that helps you sleep at night," Felicity shrugged. She then became very serious, "Luke, this last part is the most important. While we're in Zygerria, as Senate Emissaries we will be bound by both the laws of Zygerria and the Republic. That means the Republic won't allow us to participate in slavery whatever the capacity, and Zygerria will not allow us to interfere with anyone else attempting to participate. I know that this is a lot to ask you, but I don't have a choice-"

"I understand, Felicity," Luke assured her. "But hopefully we can convince Zygerria to end this and save even more people. And perhaps if any runaway slaves might just happen to sneak aboard this ship-"

"We'd return them immediately to Zygerria," Felicity interrupted. She shot Luke a hard look, "Luke, I know this is a horrible situation, but I need you to promise me that you will not help any slave escape this planet."

Luke took a deep breath, "I promise."

It was a promise Luke would be forced to break.

But then… so would Felicity.

---

3 Months, 12 Days

“Alright,” Felicity announced as she walked into the Organa-Solo living room where Luke was sitting on the couch. She had just returned from the Senate building after giving her report on the mission gone massively wrong. “So the good news is that we got Zygerria to join the New Republic, slavery is now illegal on that planet, and you found a bunch of new Jedi for your order.”

Luke raised a brow at Felicity, “And the bad news?”

Felicity gave a sheepish smile, “We got captured and sold into slavery because Thali didn’t like me and she thought your father killed her mother… And we also may have just started a civil war between Thali and her sister.”

Luke sighed, “You know, this is probably at least the third war my family accidentally started.”

“I haven’t even gotten to the worst part for you.”

“Oh?”

“I spoke with Nils, and there’s a little problem with the Rornian case. It’s now been given the status of a refugee camp until everything gets sorted out with the legal statuses of Gavyn, Alyla, and the rest of the former slaves. Nils is going to tell you tomorrow that you must cease construction on your Jedi Temple until it loses its refugee camp status because there are laws against undue religious influences in refugee havens.”

Luke groaned, “Perfect. How long will the delays be?”

“Probably four to six months,” Felicity plopped down on the couch next to Luke. “Sorry. I know halting construction will be expensive.”

Luke shook his head, “At least we now have time to sort through the collection of Jedi artifacts Coria managed to hoard. Finally, we’ll end our lightsaber shortage.”
Felicity barked a laugh, “I have no idea how you even managed to only have three lightsabers in your Order for six years. I get that you only had about six people, but come on, Luke!”

“It has been interesting,” Luke chuckled, leaning back against the couch.

Felicity followed suit, leaning back against the couch cushions. She was sitting close enough to him that her leg was brushing against his. It was an intimate distance, and was about to get much more personal.

“Hey, Luke,” Felicity casually grabbed his thigh, “you never mentioned Obik was in your Order.”

Luke shrugged, unthinking as he rested his arm on the back of the couch behind Felicity, “Didn’t know to mention it. He’s never told me you knew each other.”

Felicity scowled, “I’m going to kill him.”

“Please don’t. It would make Reine very unhappy. They only finally went out last night.”

“About time. He’s had the biggest crush on her since before I even met him.”

Luke chuckled and the pair fell into a comfortable silence. There was no pressure for conversation, just the desire to enjoy each other’s company was they sat there and dwelled on their deepest thoughts. It was a marvel to Luke how relaxed he felt around her.

As he sat in the quiet, Luke thought about Felicity and her actions over the past several weeks. How desperate she was to complete her Emissary mission to Zygerria, and how happy she was when Zygerria finally outlawed slavery. Something deep down nagged at Luke; there was something off about the situation.

“Felicity?” Luke finally asked. “I hope I’m not overstepping my bounds, but… was there something personal about your actions on Zygerria? You seemed very… tense.”

Felicity’s hand moved off Luke’s thigh.

“No,” Felicity said shortly, looking away from him. Her body had gone very rigid. “Nothing at all.”

Luke frowned. He started to open his mouth to respond when he froze. Felicity watched the look on his face as he put it all together and realized what was so important about the number two billion.

Felicity looked down at the ground and tears gathered in her eyes. She looked so sad and innocent in that moment. A part of Luke wanted to do nothing more than pull her into his arms and hold her until the sorrow was gone.

“It’s my fault, Luke,” Felicity’s voice broke. “I could have held onto the plans until Shara Bey picked up Diego and I. But I decided it would be better to transmit them to Leia.”

“Felicity, the Empire was hunting you down. Transferring it was the safest route.”

“But it wasn’t!” Felicity snapped. “Leia got caught and I didn’t. Because of that, Alderaan was destroyed. And it’s all my fault!”

For the first time Luke had known her, Felicity Rhiaon broke down into tears in front of him. Up to that moment Luke had mostly seen the smirking, sarcastic, snarky side of her. He had seen her happy and he had seen her angry, but he had never seen her at the deep, dark sorrow she fought so hard to hide from everyone. Luke didn’t understand at the time truly how important it was that she felt comfortable enough to do that in front of him.

In that moment, all Luke knew was he wanted to make her pain go away.

“Felicity,” Luke whispered, daring to wrap his arms around her. To his surprise, she instantly threw her arms around him and buried her face into his chest.

He held her, stroking her hair and trying to comfort her through the Force. Luke didn’t outright ask Felicity to go into her mind, but he did it in a very obvious way. When Felicity didn’t say anything, and he felt her barriers relax, Luke pushed in further. It wasn’t far; he merely dipped his toe into the pond.

Images flashed through her mind. A man he would later learn to be Brendan. One he would learn to be Riz. One who would be Alaric. A man he did know to be Bail Organa. An explosion in a town square, and Felicity falling to her knees in the hallway of the old Senate building. A tattoo forced on her arm. Mon Mothma delivering the news of another Death Star. The breath of Darth Vader. His imposing mask. A young Felicity laying in pain on the floor of a hallway while Vader stood over her with his lightsaber. On her back there was-

“Stop,” Felicity suddenly said.

Luke pulled back and looked at her, “I’m sorry.”

Felicity gently smiled, “It’s okay, you just went a little too far.”

“It won’t happen again.”

Luke and Felicity stared at each other in silence for a long stretch of time. Luke could feel her pain, her fear, and yet there still was still a lightness in her heart. She still had hope and she still had love, even if she didn’t believe she deserved it.

“Yes, I am,” Felicity insisted. “I have hurt so many people… and they’ve hurt me. I think about it all the time, what happened on the Death Star. What happened to Alderaan. When we were on Jakku, Diego asked me why we were the ones who survived. All of them – Riz, Ji-Dan, Gunner – they all had children. They had families. Ji-Dan and Gunner had their wives, and Riz had his parents. Diego and I had nothing. They were the ones who deserved to live. I remember Diego saying that we didn’t deserve it. And I told him that we had to prove we were worthy, and deserved to survive. That’s why I’m a Senate Emissary rather than an architect.”

“My dream job since I was a little girl,” Felicity shrugged. “I took some classes at the universities when I was recruiting people for the Rebellion. My professors said I had a natural talent for it. I even have these plans to my perfect home I’ve been designing and refining since I was a child. But I chose not to pursue my dream, because I need to make up for the deaths I caused. I thought if I freed all those slaves, maybe I could forgive myself for Alderaan… but I can’t, because at the end of the day I am so broken that I will never be worth anything.”

Luke gave no words of comfort; he just stared at her with a serious look on his face.

“Stay here,” Luke ordered. He stood and went to his room, emerging a few minutes later with something in his hand. He sat back on the couch, just as close to Felicity as before and held up the object, “Do you know what this is?”

Felicity frowned, “A rock?”

“This is a kyber crystal,” Luke looked down and fiddled with it. His fingers ran over a prominent crack in the crystal, “I got this in my most recent collection of Jedi artifacts Lando procured for me. Ben has asked if he can have it, but I’ve told him no. I never want something like this in his hands.”

“Why?”

“This crystal has been corrupted with the Dark Side. It’s been forced to perform evil things, and when a kyber crystal is used for the Dark Side, it bleeds. That’s why if you put it in a lightsaber, it will project a red blade.”

Felicity gave a sharp intake of breath, “A Sith crystal.”

“Lightsaber crystals are a high value black market item,” Luke continued. “Your average crystal will run you somewhere between five and six thousand credits. A Sith crystal is even rarer and more valuable. It’ll run between ten and twelve thousand. But this one here is cracked. If you put it in a saber without proper ventilation, something like a cross guard – which would run the risk of cutting off your hand – the saber would explode. How much do you think this crystal costs?”

Felicity sniffed and wiped her eyes on her sleeve, “I don’t know… three thousand?”

Luke looked her straight in the eyes, “Seven thousand.”

Felicity frowned.

Luke carefully reached forward with his left hand and took Felicity’s. With his right hand, he raised up the crystal and held her gaze as he spoke.

“This is still a Sith crystal, Felicity,” Luke spoke slowly. “Yes, it is damaged and very few people would want to bother with it. But someone out there will believe this is the greatest thing they could have in their life, and for them it would be an insult to even consider putting a price on it. Just because something is broken, Felicity, doesn’t mean it’s worthless.”

Luke placed the crystal in Felicity’s palm.

“I want you to have this,” Luke said.

“You can,” Luke closed her hand over it. “And every time you look at this, I want you to remember that even though you think you’re broken… you’re still worth something. To me. To Diego. To Leia. To the two billion slaves you just freed. And to the trillions you saved by defeating the Death Star.”

“Don’t you mean the trillions you saved?”

“No. I just fired a shot. You were the one who showed me where to aim. You made sure that Ji-Dan, Riz, Gunner, Bail Organa, and everyone on Alderaan didn’t die for nothing.”

Felicity smiled, “You really believe that?”

“Absolutely. Your team died knowing that their leader was someone worth dying for. You are worthy of surviving, Felicity Rhiaon,” Luke whispered. He used his thumb to wipe a tear rolling down he cheek, “And I swear to you, Felicity. I will never hurt you.”

Felicity reached up and placed a hand on Luke’s cheek, “Thank you.”

3 Months, 20 Days

“Hey, Leia,” Felicity opened the door to her apartment to find Leia and Luke standing at the entrance. “You ready to go to lunch?”

“Of course not,” Felicity waved off. “Always good to see my favorite Jedi. But don’t tell Obik I called you that.”

Luke chuckled, “My lips are sealed.”

“Come in,” Felicity ushered them in. “I just have to send a quick message to Arlos about one of my cases. Make yourselves comfortable.”

As Felicity went over to her computer and Leia settled on the couch, Luke observed the small apartment with interest. It looked like it had been professionally decorated with its trendy colours and clean looks. The kitchen was spacious and modern; granite countertops and the appliances looked barely touched. Luke would later learn that they were barely touched because Felicity couldn’t cook anything that wasn’t “put in the oven for 20 minutes at 350 degrees.”

The walls were mostly decorated with personal Holos, although a few paintings hung among them.

Luke observed one painting in particular of a sun rising over a lake. Signed in the corner was a signature that looked to say D Andromias.

“Dinah Andromias,” Leia’s voice sounded behind Luke. “Felicity’s mother. Died when Felicity was young but was a very talented painter from what I’ve seen of her work. I remember seeing this in the hallway of the Rhiaon family apartment.”

“I wonder how she managed to get this,” Luke sometimes forgot that Leia had been childhood friends with Felicity. “If her father died on the Death Star, I doubt his possessions would go to his known Rebel daughter.”
“Felicity has her ways,” Leia shrugged. Her eyes then locked on a Holo, “Now there’s a face I haven’t seen in a long time. Brendan Rhiaon – Felicity’s brother. I had such a crush on him.”

Luke studied the picture of the handsome young man, “Her brother? …He’s dead, right?”

Leia sighed, “Such a waste. Good soldier and great man. Went in a pretty tragic way that really messed up Felicity. I don’t think she would be the same woman she is today if he hadn’t died. But I don’t think I should tell you anything else without Felicity’s permission.”

“Your suspicions are correct,” Felicity looked up from her computer on the dining table. “So, why are we stuck with Luke today?”

“We’ve been looking at apartments for him all morning,” Leia answered.

“I took your advice about how to deal with the Emissary office on such a regular basis,” Luke replied. “You were right: it’s going to be at least four years and I think permanently taking over Leia’s Coruscanti apartment is abusing her hospitality too much.”

“Does a farmboy like you have the money for an apartment on Coruscant?”

Luke and Leia exchanged a look.

Felicity raised an eyebrow, “And the long answer?”

“Yeah,” Luke looked at the ground.

“Have you found anything?” Felicity quickly changed the subject.

“I’m not being picky, Leia,” Luke rolled his eyes. “It’s just that there are some very specific features I need to survive.”

“Luke, I know for a fact that you once lived in your X-Wing, stranded on an asteroid for three months. Tell me again that you need two bathrooms.”

“Alright, I’m ready to go,” Felicity went over to the closet to grab her jacket. “Leia can regale me with tales of your pickiness on our way to the restaurant. Oh, and you’ve got to try the roast leek soup at this place, Luke. I would literally kill a man for a bowl of it. No hyperbole. I mean it.”

Felicity was just about to grab her purse when there was a knock at the door.

“I’ve got it,” Leia offered.

She opened the door to reveal a short, middle-aged, balding man with salt and pepper hair, a dark complexion, and round spectacles that sat on the end of his nose.

“Hey, Osto,” Felicity greeted. “Guys, this is my landlord and the building manager, Osto Foss. He lives just downstairs. Osto, these are my friends Luke and Leia.”

“A pleasure,” Leia said at the same time, looking as regal as ever.

“The pleasure’s all mine,” Osto smiled warmly at them. “Miss Rhiaon, pardon for interrupting, but… did you get kidnapped again?”

“A couple weeks ago,” Felicity shrugged. “Did my banks freeze my accounts again?”

“Unfortunately.”

“Dang it! Nils said he would stop telling them when I get kidnapped. It always messes up my bills when that happens.”

Luke stared at Felicity, “This happens often?”

“Kidnapping occurs in at least 20% of Emissary missions,” Felicity shrugged. “My bank freezes my accounts to prevent impersonation or ransom, but it happens often enough that things like my rent payments end up bouncing, despite having the money. I’m sorry, Osto. I’ll send you the transfer by tonight.”

“I know you will,” Osto nodded. “You’ve never let me down yet. I would have just called, but I also wanted to give you a head’s up. Do the owners of the penthouse still let you access the roof?”

“Yeah,” Felicity nodded. She looked over at Luke and Leia and explained, “The building has this really nice roof space where I like to stargaze and workout. Technically it’s off limits as it’s the property of the owners of the penthouse, but they never use it and let me have access.”

“Unfortunately, it looks like that is coming to an end. The owners are selling. They’re staging the first open house today.”

“Oh, that’s too bad,” Felicity moaned. “I really like that roof. Now I’m going to have to find a gym.”

Felicity paused, a thought occurring to her.

“Hey, Osto?” Felicity furrowed her brow in a thinking face, “You said they had an open house… Would you mind if I took a look at the apartment? I’ve always wondered what it looked like, and plus I’d like to have one last moment on the roof.”

“I can take you there now,” Osto offered.

“You guys wouldn’t mind?” Felicity asked the twins. “I know our reservations are in twenty minutes—”

“Felicity,” Leia laughed, “I’m the Senator of Coruscant… they’ll push back the time.”

“That apartment was amazing,” Luke declared as they got off the private elevator to the roof. “Three bedrooms, state of the art appliances, comes furnished!”

“We had the tour too, Luke,” Felicity chuckled as they stepped onto the roof.

It was a large greenspace with lots of room to move, and a few nice patio chairs placed near the edge of the roof.
“There’s the private elevator that accesses the ground floor, the roof, and the penthouse,” Osto had been showing off all the features of the penthouse to the group. The group told him it wasn’t necessary, but he insisted it was a chance for practice when the real tours came. “There’s also a set of stairs in case of emergency, and fire escapes on the side.”

“I run the staircase twice, every morning,” Felicity added. “Oh, and tell them about the roof edge.”

“We have the market’s best force field generator on the rim,” Osto declared. “You can’t hear it or see it, but if you bump into it, it’ll stop you from falling to your death, plus it’s got the gentlest touch. No burning sensation at all.”

“Wow,” Luke looked around the roof in amazement, “I could just see my Jedi training out here, and the generator would make it safe. I can’t believe how perfect this place is. See, Leia, why couldn’t you get the realtor to show me something like this? This is exactly what I—”

“Osto… How much are they asking?” Luke inquired.

Osto pulled out his datapad and showed Luke the listing.

Very slowly his eyes flicked over to Felicity, who was staring out at the gorgeous view of the city below.

“Felicity…” Luke said leisurely. “Would it be… weird if I put an offer on this place?”

“This place?” Felicity looked surprised. “To own?”

“Would you be okay with me living here?” Luke asked, looking very eager.

“Well… I guess that depends,” Felicity thought about it. “Could I still use the roof?”

“Yes.”

“Can you give me a ride when we have mutual Resistance missions?”

“Sure.”

“Can you get my mail when I’m off-planet?”

“Only if you get mine.”

4 Months, 23 Days

“Twenty-seven… twenty-eight… twenty-nine…” Luke was in the middle of working out the first morning after he had moved into his penthouse apartment.
It was about six in the morning, but the sun was already high in the sky. It was warm enough for Luke to be working out shirtless, sweat glistening off him as he did a series of sit-ups. He was so focused on his routine that he didn’t notice he was no longer alone until he heard the all too familiar, teasing tone.

“Damn. I must have really done something right to deserve this.”

Luke sat up to see Felicity watching him by the door to the staircase. Her hair was pulled back in a ponytail and she wore workout gear. Her arms were folded, her signature one corner smirk was plastered across her face, and she made absolutely no attempt to hide that she was checking him out.

“You know my birthday was a few months ago?” Felicity bit her lip and let her eyes drift over Luke’s sculpted chest, “But I am all for the belated present.”

“Good morning, Felicity,” Luke shook his head as he rose to his feet and tried to remember where he had put his shirt. “How are you this morning?”

“Regretful that this is the first time I’ve been able to see you shirtless.”

Luke frowned, “You saw me shirtless on Zygerria.”

“Yeah, but we were captured and enslaved. I didn’t get the chance to appreciate the view… and my, what a stunning view.”

“Okay, the shirt’s going back on,” Luke used the Force to summon it. “You look like you’re about ready to jump me, and if we continue like this, you might do something we’d regret.”

Felicity barked a laugh, “Oh, Luke… Not to brag, but if I were to have my wicked way with you, it would certainly not be something you regret.”

“Noted,” Luke said flatly. “So, I assume you’re up here to run the stairs? Or have I become your new target of mockery?”

“New target of mockery? You think I would go out of my way to have a specific person to mock?”

“Felicity, you do know I’m friends with Diego, Obi, and Leia?”

“Dang it,” Felicity muttered. “I’m going to have to pick a new target. You think I’ll get a lot of material with Han?”

“I am washing my hands of this,” Luke held up his hands defensively.

“Noted,” Felicity chuckled. “And yes, I’m here to run the stairs. Or at least I was going to.”

“What’s stopping you.” Luke paused, “Is this about me shirtless?”

“No, that was just an early morning bonus,” Felicity smirked. “I just don’t see a point in running these stairs. I’ve been doing it every day for a couple years now. There’s no challenge anymore.”

“I get it. I had the same feeling training on Dagobah. You can only run around a swamp with a… whatever Yoda was on your back so many times.”

“I have so many questions about that sentence I don’t even know where to start.”

Luke couldn’t help but smile, “Some questions are better not answered.”

“Agreed.”

“So why don’t you change your workout routine? Maybe go for a run around the neighborhood? We’re in a pretty safe sector. I don’t see the harm.”

“I’m not sure I have the brain power to come up with a new running route until I’ve had breakfast, and unfortunately my oven’s currently broken.”

Felicity frowned, “What? Together?”

“Why not?” Luke shrugged. “I’m new in town… or planet. I don’t know the area very well, and I could use a little bit of a tour. It’d be my treat.”

“Well, there is this diner that just opened. Or reopened. It was closed either by the Empire, or the owner closed it out of fear of the Empire.”

“No, actually the reason the owner was threatened by the Empire was apparently he’s pretty pro-Jedi. Maybe even had a close friend in the Jedi Order.”

Felicity saw the ecstatic look on Luke’s face.

“We’re going to the diner, aren’t we?” Felicity asked flatly.

“I’ll grab my credit chip.”

“Here we are, Dex’s Diner,” Felicity announced as they entered the restaurant.

It was on the smaller side, and not very busy. It looked just like any typical diner that served the best cup of coffee you’d ever tasted and food that was half its weight in grease.

Luke instantly liked the place because when he walked in, the conversations didn’t stop as every eye fell on him. It had been a while since he walked into a restaurant on Coruscant without being recognized.

“Seems like a decent place,” Luke said, looking around. “Do we just sit, or-?”

“You and your little lady grab a booth, Hon!” A WA-7 waitress droid suddenly answered his question from across the room. “I’ll be with you in a sec.”

“Little lady?” Felicity scowled as she and Luke crawled into opposite seats of a nearby booth. “I’m not sure if that’s supposed to be unintentionally sexist or a quip about my height. Either way, I’m pissed.”

“It’s just a droid,” Luke laughed. “And in its defence, they’re not programmed to discriminate… and you are pretty short.”

“You wanna start this, Skywalker? Because step ladders are not exactly redundant to you, are they?”
“Sorry about the wait, Kids,” the waitress droid wheeled over to them and put down a couple of menus on the table. “I’m FLO, and welcome to Dex’s. Can I start you with anything? Juice? Tea? Blue milk?”

“I’ll just have a cup of caf,” Felicity replied. “Luke, same?”

“Not a big caf person,” Luke scanned the menu. “Wait, you have Jawa juice?”

“Best you can find on Coruscant,” FLO answered. “I’ll get you a cup, Honey. You’ll think you’re on Tatooine.”

“Jawa juice?” Felicity scowled. “Where does the juice of a Jawa come from?”

“You don’t want to know,” Luke shuddered.

“I’ll get right on that, Hon,” FLO whizzed away.

Felicity scooted out of the booth, “I’m going to run to the fresher.”

Luke nodded, and went back to scanning the menu. A few minutes later, FLO returned with their drinks.

“Thank you, FLO,” Luke always made it a habit to use a droid’s name. It helped them know he thought of them as more than machines made to serve his needs.

“No problem, Hon,” FLO answered. “Any questions about the menu?”

“Not about the menu, but I heard that the owner of this diner is very pro-Jedi?”

“Oh, absolutely! Dex had a good buddy that was a Jedi.”

“May I ask who that Jedi was?”

Felicity stopped in front of a picture of two very handsome men in Jedi robes. The one on the left was a bearded ginger with a serious look, and the other on the right had blonde hair, blue eyes, and a teasing look with a touch of darkness lurking underneath.

Luke knew that the blonde man was his father, but the man on the left was identified with a caption on the Holo frame.

OBI-WAN KENOBI

“Oh yeah,” FLO had followed the pair to the picture. “That’s Dex’s old friend. Used to come in here at least three times a month when he got tired of the food they served at the Temple.”

“Oh my goodness,” Luke looked around the diner in excitement. “Obi-Wan Kenobi used to come to this diner?”

“All the time,” FLO confirmed. “Dex has such a plethora of stories about him.”

“Would you mind if I speak to him? I would love to meet a friend of Obi-Wan’s and hear the stories.”

“Sorry, Hon, but no. Dex doesn’t really like to share them with just anyone. You never know who to trust and Old Republic Jedi have a bit of a mixed reputation. Doesn’t want to sully the memory or be questioned on it.”

“Oh, I think Dex would be more than happy to speak to this one,” Felicity playfully bumped her hip against Luke. She imitated the droid’s voice, “Tell him who you are, Hon.”

FLO’s head swerved to look at Luke.

Luke looked around to make sure no one was listening, and then sighed, “My name is Luke Skywalker. My father was Anakin Skywalker, and I was trained to be a Jedi by Master Yoda, and Obi-Wan Kenobi.”

FLO was silent for a long minute, and then said, “I’ll be right back.”

“I just can’t believe it,” Luke turned to look back at the picture of Obi-Wan and Anakin. They could hear FLO yelling for Dex in the kitchen. “I get to hear more stories about Obi-Wan.”

Felicity chuckled, “You are just a essentially an Obi-Wan Kenobi fan at heart, aren’t you? Though I can see why… This is weird to say, but if that’s what Obi-Wan Kenobi looked like… I must say he looks pretty good.”

Luke raised an eyebrow, “You… You do?”

“Come on, Luke. Look at him. Chiselled features, but with that hint of softness rather than that sort of sharp angular look. Confident, but easy going, kind blue eyes. That curly blonde hair-”

Wait. What?

“And the scar over the eye really pulls it all together,” Felicity finished with a sort of dreamy look.

“The scar?” Luke repeated, his jaw hanging open. “Felicity, which man are you talking about?”

“The one on the right,” Felicity answered, oblivious to her error. “I must say, he looks a little younger than I thought he would be, but, hey, if I were thirty years older, or he was thirty years younger, I’d go for it.”

“You would?”

“I see,” Luke crossed his arms. He stared silently at the picture for a long moment before saying, “Felicity… Obi-Wan is the one on the left.”

Felicity frowned, “Then who’s the one on the right?”

Luke tried to hold back his smile.

“Dex will be at your booth in a second, Hon,” FLO returned to them. “You wanna sit back down and I’ll get you two some breakfast? Dex says if you are who you say you are, it’s on the house, Honey.”

“Just a minute,” Felicity stopped them. “FLO, who is the other man in this Holo? You only labeled one.”

“Oh, we used to have both names up, but we got too many complaints, and it drove off business. That’s why Dex doesn’t like telling stories; people don’t like the association Dex has with him.”

“But who is he?” Felicity looked back at the picture for clues. “Who could Dex have known that people would-”

Then it clicked.

“No,” Felicity whispered.

“Luke,” Felicity’s voice was serious. “Did I just say that I was attracted to… Darth Vader?”

“I don’t know what’s more strange about it,” Luke answered. “That you said you were attracted to the man you despise most in the Galaxy… or that you said you would take a shot at my father… and I’m not talking about the time you actually shot him.”

“Luke!” Felicity exclaimed. “You let me go on about how hot I thought Vader was! I mean, sure, okay, fine, he’s a very attractive man. He would have to be considering how attractive you are, and you are so attractive that say the word and I’ll be all over that in a hot second, but come on, Skywalker!”

“Wait, what was that about me?”

Luke turned and found himself suddenly trapped in the hug of a four arm bulbous creature. Luke was caught off guard, not expecting the sudden affection, but returned the hug when he sensed Dex’s good intentions.

“Sorry, Kid,” Dex pulled back. “I’m a pretty friendly guy.”

“Wow, would you look at you,” Dex gave Luke the once over. “You don’t have his height, but you look every bit like your father. May he rest in peace.”

“Well, you don’t hear that very often for Darth Vader,” Felicity muttered.

“And who’s your little lady?” Dex asked.

Luke watched as Felicity bristled, “A friend, Dex. This is Felicity Rhiaon.”

“Typical Skywalker,” Dex chuckled. “You know your father was quite the ladies’ man. It seemed every time he came in, he was talking about some girl or other. Got him in a lot of trouble sometimes. I remember the time the Queen of Zygerria herself wanted to keep Anakin as basically her pet. Ani was not happy about that.”

Felicity burst out laughing, “I’m sorry… Ani?”

Felicity couldn’t stop laughing, “Darth Vader was called Ani?”

Luke narrowed his eyes at Felicity, “Do you need a moment?”

“Nah, I’m good,” Felicity was still chuckling but managed to compose herself. “And to clarify, do you mean that Queen Miraj tried to make him her pet?”

“Yeah,” Dex nodded. “How’d you know that?”

“We… ran into some troubles with her daughter, Thali,” Luke quickly answered.

Dex’s face turned, “Look, here. Anakin Skywalker was a complicated man. I’m not going to pretend I was extremely surprised to learn he was Vader. The kid was messed up. He was far too old and attached to his mother to give in to the Jedi’s views on non-attachment. It didn’t help that the Council didn’t trust him, and didn’t want him to be trained in the first place. Even Obi-Wan only gave in because it was Qui-Gon’s dying wish. But Anakin Skywalker didn’t kill Miraj. Yes, Queen Miraj was a slaver, and Anakin was born into slavery, but he didn’t kill her. I said it when the Jedi Council dragged him into an investigation or the matter, I said it when Miraj’s daughter spread that rumour, and I’ll say it on my deathbed.”

“Wait, what?” Luke interrupted. “Anakin… was a slave?”

Dex blinked, “…I think there’s a few stories I need to tell you. Why don’t we sit?”

“Of course.”

Luke held out his arm and Dex headed for the booth. FLO was flagged down by another customer, and the waitress droid rolled over to them. However, Felicity didn’t move.

Felicity crossed her arms, “I didn’t really want to spend my Saturday morning hearing stories about Darth Vader.”

“Not Vader. Anakin.”

“It’s the same thing to me, Luke. Even if it isn’t for you.”

“You can go if you want, Felicity,” Luke offered. “I just… I’d like you to stay.”

Felicity frowned, her features softening, “You do?”

“I might need some emotional support, and I… I know I can trust you to support me. I know it sounds strange, but the Force is telling me to trust you. And I do.”

Felicity smiled, and rubbed his arm, “Alright. If you need me, I’ll stay,”

“Thank you,” Luke grinned that goofy grin she loved so much.

“Anytime,” Felicity promised. “Besides… I guess there had to be some good in Vader. He begot you.”

“Don’t ruin the moment, Skywalker,” Felicity linked her arm in his. “But, you owe me an Anakin Skywalker-free breakfast after a run at this diner.”

“How about we have a morning run and come here again tomorrow?” Luke suggested.

“Alright,” Felicity agreed. “But don’t think this is going to become a habit, Skywalker.”

For the next ten years, Luke and Felicity would go for a run and have breakfast at Dex’s Diner every single morning they were both on Coruscant.

5 Months, 28 Days

“Would you just ask Fliss out already?” Han rolled his eyes. He and Luke were busy working on the Falcon and Luke had once again spoken of nothing but Felicity.

“Don’t you Han me. You’re clearly attracted to her. You constantly talk about her, go running and have breakfast with her every morning, and you spend every single Saturday at her place teaching her how to cook.”

“That’s only because she doesn’t know how, and she’s teaching me how to do laundry in exchange.”

“How are you almost thirty and not know how to do laundry?”

“I grew up on Tatooine. We didn’t have enough water for a washing machine. After that, the Alliance dealt with all my laundry and housekeeping needs.”

“Then you freeloaded off us after the war,” Han added.

“Hey, I offered to pay rent,” Luke reminded. “It was Leia who refused.”

“Whatever. That doesn’t invalidate the fact that ever since Felicity Rhiaon walked into your life, your mind has been on nothing but her. Be honest, do you find her attractive? And I’m not just talking about physical attributes.”

Luke sighed, “If we’re being honest… Yes. I’m very much attracted to her. She’s beautiful, intelligent, athletic, witty-”

“I think sarcastic as hell is the term you’re looking for.”

“And definitely gives me a run for my money,” Luke chuckled.

“So, what’s holding you back? You think she doesn’t like you?”

“She wouldn’t spend every morning with me if she didn’t. And we have talked about maybe getting drinks or dinner sometime.”

“Then go for it,” Han encouraged. “If I have to see you date one more dime a dozen girl, can of soup girl, I’m going to do something I’ll regret.”

“Would you please stop calling my dates cans of soup?”
“Look Felicity may not be someone I can see throwing her life away for her friends like your ultimate goal is, but there’s something about that girl that’s pretty perfect for you. Go for it, Luke. I’m sure you won’t regret it.”

5 Months, 29 Days

“And that’s how you make bread,” Luke declared as they observed the misshapen loaf on Felicity’s kitchen counter. “A little time consuming, but a good staple.”

“Wow,” Felicity looked at the loaf in amazement, “if you told me weeks ago that I would be making bread today, I’d laugh in your face.”

“Well, you laugh in my face about so many things, I don’t think it would be much of a difference,” Luke chuckled as they started to load up the dishwasher.

He watched her for a moment, savoring the joyous look of pride on her face. A warm feeling spread through his body. Luke wanted to make her feel that way always.

“Go for it, Luke,” Han’s voice rang in his head. “I’m sure you won’t regret it.”

Luke took a deep breath. Here went nothing.

“Yeah, Luke?” Felicity was setting the dishwasher to run.

“I was thinking,” Luke began as Felicity turned to face him. He tried to lean casually against the stove, pretending the still cooling oven wasn’t hurting his skin. “Maybe you and I might-”

“Oh my gosh, is that the time?” Felicity exclaimed as her eyes fell on the oven display’s clock. “Dang it! I’ve got to go get ready! My boyfriend’s going to be here in an hour.”

“Drystan,” Felicity frantically pulled her hair out of her ponytail and untied her apron. “We’ve been going out for a few weeks now. Podracer. Really handsome. Plus he doesn’t mind me constantly going off on Emissary and Resistance missions.”

Luke just stared at Felicity, “Huh.”

“I’m sorry. I’ve got to start getting ready, but what were you going to say?”

“Oh, I, uh,” Luke searched his brain for an out, “I was thinking maybe you’d be interested in making an entire meal next week. Maybe invite Han and Leia?”

“Oh, that would be perfect. I love the idea! Maybe we should invite Obik and Reine. Oh! And you can meet Drystan!”

“Perfect,” Luke tried to sound enthusiastic.

“How’d it go?” Han asked later that night over the comm.
Luke frowned at the Holo of his brother-in-law, “Went great. Not only does she have a boyfriend, but we’re having dinner with him next week.”

“When you say we-”

“Oh, I am so dragging you down with me on this one, Han.” Luke sighed, “What was I even thinking? Of course she would have a boyfriend.”

“I’m sorry it didn’t work out, Kid,” Han was sincere. “Are things going to awkward with you two now?”

Luke took a deep breath.

“No,” Luke said confidently. “No, Felicity is my friend, and that’s good enough. I liked her as a friend before, and I’ll like her that way now. So, I don’t date her; it’s not the end of the world. Felicity Rhiaon’s friendship is more than enough for me.”

But as Luke would discover… it truly wasn’t.
Part Two: Love

Chapter Summary

Luke continues his reflection on the past with memories of how he fell in love with Felicity.

Chapter Notes

A short continuity note for the future. In this chapter, I feature a flashback that shows Zev Senesca (Rogue Two, who finds Han and Luke on Hoth) alive and well in 10 ABY… however, upon researching the members of Rogue Squadron, I discovered that Zev actually died during the Battle of Hoth.

As a result, I have made the decision to retcon that, and say that when Zev got shot down, he was able to eject and survive. This is because I have actually already written material in TFA where Zev appears. I really feel that he could only be replaced by Wedge, who I want to keep out of TFA because I couldn’t really set him aside the way I do Zev when Luke returns. Zev and Luke can have a quick chat and be done with things, but Wedge has a more meaningful relationship with Luke.

So, yeah, don’t tell me that Zev is dead because I know, but I don’t really actually care.

See the end of the chapter for more notes.

The Long Way Home

Chapter Twenty-Four

Part Two: Love

6 Months, 27 Days

“You seriously don’t know who your mother is?” Felicity asked in amazement. They were in Dex’s Diner after their early morning run.

“No, I do not,” Luke absentmindedly stirred his hot chocolate. “My father did a good job of destroying most records of Anakin Skywalker, and Jedi weren’t allowed to have relationships, so there’s no evidence he ever had an intimate interaction with a woman.”

“I think there’s a pretty big piece of evidence sitting across this table,” Felicity smirked. She bit her lip as another possibility came to her mind, “Luke, this is awkward to bring up, but have you considered that there… wasn’t a relationship? Maybe it was a brief hookup… or maybe… you know? He was pretty bad as Vader.”

Luke sighed, “I’ve entertained the possibility, but I don’t think Leia and I are the by-product of rape… or even a casual encounter. The evidence doesn’t add up for that.”
“How so?”

“First of all, Obi-Wan was sent to watch over me while I lived with my paternal Uncle and Aunt. Leia was sent away for her own safety. It’s highly unlikely that Yoda and Obi-Wan tracked down a random woman and convinced her of this. They would have had to know about us. Not to mention because of the timeline. Leia and I were born two days after the formation of the Empire-”

“Or so you’ve been told,” Felicity pointed out.

“Regardless,” Luke answered. “The math at least puts our birth around that time. Order 66 took place the day before the Empire formed. Obi-Wan and Yoda couldn’t have tracked down a random woman within two days as there are articles that were published announcing Bail Organa’s adoption of Leia three days after the Empire formed. Additionally, my father sustained his injuries that put him in the suit the day after the Empire formed, and they would have made it impossible for him to produce a child after that.”

“At least not without a load of painkillers and getting pretty creative.”

“Please don’t make me picture such things about my father.”

“Too late,” Felicity grinned. “Alright, what about the possibility of it happening when you were actually conceived?”

“And there’s the images again.”

“Luke!”

“Alright,” Luke conceded. “It could have been a one night stand, but not a rape. I don’t believe that he would do that, but if he would, it would have been after his turn.”

“I’ll accept that,” Felicity poked at her eggs. “You know, I didn’t know my mom either. She died when I was very young.”

“Dream sores. They were these terrible sores that develop while you sleep. A really bad case of them spread like wildfire on Coruscant when I was three. The Empire didn’t provide the medication needed to cure them until one million people were already dead. My mother didn’t survive.”

“I’m sorry.”

“It’s okay. I don’t really remember her, so there’s nothing to miss. It’s not like how I lost Brendan.”

“And your father?” Luke asked, carefully avoiding the fact he had killed Alaric Rhiaon. “Did you mourn when he died?”

Felicity took a measured sip of her caf. “I mourned my father the day he shamed me at the Imperial Ball for wearing a slightly low cut dress. My father had been dead to me long before his body was destroyed. When my father died, I shed a single tear and no more. He made that evil machine and deserved what he got.”

“But he was your father.”

“He never chose to be,” Felicity said shortly. “Did Diego ever tell you what happened when Riz died?”
Luke shook his head.

“We were in the middle of stealing the plans from his office when my father walked in and saw what we were doing. Diego and Gunner wanted to shoot him, but I refused. I begged my father to come with me, to be a family again. To choose me over the Empire. Do you understand what that’s like?”

Luke could feel Palpatine’s jolts of electricity shoot through his body and desperate pleas of “Father” filled the air.

Felicity got him a hard look, “I begged him, Luke. I begged him to choose me. And you know what he did?”

Luke shook his head.

Tears swelled in Felicity’s eyes, “He took me in his arms to hold me like a father should hold his daughter. Tears fell down my face and he wiped them away. He smiled at me and said, ‘Oh my little girl. My sweet little Felicity… I’m so sorry.’ Then he pulled out his comlink and sounded the alarm. He gave us away to the Empire. He chose them over me.”

“Then he killed Riz,” Felicity continued. “I don’t care if it was an accident. He killed my best friend, a man he knew had a small child waiting at home for him. You know he sent Riz’s body home to his parents? The parents who were watching Riz’s daughter? That’s how the Rebellion found out things had gone wrong with Operation Citadel. My father didn’t rescue the bodies of Ji-Dan or Gunner, but for some reason he decided to send home Riz’s body.”

“It’s why I don’t tend to give second chances. Because I gave my father chance after chance and he threw it in my face. You know, I have family still? My mother had like six brothers and sisters, all these super anti-establishment, all natural, we should reject any form of technology or advancement, even if it could save your life type of people. As for the Rhiaon side, my father has an older brother. Oh boy, Garvan Rhiaon. Pray you never meet him. He makes Tarkin look like a wild child. Neither side of the family wants me as I am. The only person who ever did was Brendan, and that got him…”

Felicity sighed.

“I wonder about my mother sometimes,” Felicity moved on. “Would she have liked me? Approved of me? Given me a better life?”

“I wonder the same things,” Luke said. He looked down at the table, “I wonder if she knew who my father became? What happened to Leia and I? Why wasn’t she there? Sometimes I even wonder if my mother’s alive. Is she out there, and just… doesn’t want me?”

Luke started to draw back his hand, but Felicity clutched it, and put her other atop his, trapping his hand in her grasp.

“Anyone who doesn’t want you in their life is an idiot,” Felicity was dead serious. “You are kind, and loyal, and generous, and always put other people first. You are the definition of selflessness to the point of annoyance, and if there is a woman out there stupid enough to not want to be your mother, I’m going to track her down and kick her ass.”
Luke smiled, “You know she would probably be in her fifties?”

“I’ll still throw down with her.”

Luke chuckled, “Too bad you don’t know where to look for her.”

Felicity’s eyes flicked over Luke shoulder, “No… But we know someone who might.”

Luke frowned and opened his mouth to speak but stopped when Felicity waved a familiar face over.

“Well, if it isn’t my two favorite customers,” Dex Jettster greeted. “What can I do for you, Fliss?”

“Dex, of course,” Luke threw his had back on the cushion of the booth seat. “Why didn’t I think of that?”

“Leia got the brains, you got the whole spiritual thing,” Felicity laughed over the rim of her caf cup.

“You’re not actually suggesting Leia can’t kick ass just as much as you? In fact, I think she could probably take you if you didn’t do anything Force related.”

“Did you want me to come back later?” Dex asked.

“No, we need you, Dex,” Felicity sat down her cup. “It turns out that Skywalker here doesn’t know who his mommy is. I know you’ve said that his dad was a bit of a flirt, but do you know anything about the X to his Y chromosome?”

Luke frowned, “I don’t think that’s how chromosomes work.”

“Sorry, I forgot about your top-notch education of homeschooling on Tatooine. Aunt Beru give you a gold star on the DNA unit?”

“I’m sorry we couldn’t all be indoctrinated by Imperial public school, then have personal professors paid by the royal family of Alderaan. Then again, I didn’t drop out of school like you.”

“Low blow, Skywalker. And I did finish my schooling… eventually.”

“Seriously, Kids,” Dex said awkwardly. “I have tables to clean.”

“Sorry,” Felicity flashed him a smile. “Any thoughts?”

Dex scratched his chin, “Well… Anakin had strong attachment issues, so he wasn’t the type for a one night stand. I can’t imagine him being with a woman he didn’t have a relationship with. Probably a serious girlfriend, or more likely because of how…. Colourful Anakin was, I’d put my money on secret marriage.”

“I’m certain of it,” Dex nodded.

“I’m sure you’ll come up with something else,” Luke said flatly.

“So, who would be the unlucky Mrs. Skywalker?” Felicity asked.
Dex replied, “Well, you say woman Anakin Skywalker is close with, only one name comes to mind.”

Dex paused, “… Okay two names.”

“So, my father’s padawan is for sure not my mother?” Luke asked. “She’s been my biggest lead, I just haven’t found the resources to pursue what happened to her. She left the Jedi Order about seven months before I was born. Maybe she went to have my sister and I?”

“With all due respect, Luke,” Dex said kindly, “you don’t look half Togruta to me. Besides, Ahsoka was only sixteen when she left, and she left because the Jedi Order accused her of bombing the temple.”

Luke looked at Dex in horror.

“Long story,” Dex waved off. “No, you say woman Anakin Skywalker is close with, you think Padmé Amidala.”

Felicity choked on her drink.

“What?” Felicity exclaimed. “No, no, no, no, no, no, no. Padmé Amidala would never even let Darth Vader look at her, much less knock her up.”

“Are you kidding?” Dex laughed. “Anakin and Padmé were extremely close. Always a little too close. In fact, up until now, I thought her being your mother was a forego conclusion.”

“But why are you so sure?” Luke dare not get excited. He had been down this path with many potential mothers before and it always ended in disappointment.

“Let’s start with the fact he was completely in love with her from the day they met,” Dex replied. So Dex told them everything. How Anakin and Padmé met, how Anakin never stopped talking about her in their ten years apart, how Obi-Wan told him that Anakin had completely embarrassed himself upon their reunion. Dex told them about the assassination attempts, the fleeing to the super romantic lake country of Naboo, of the dreams Anakin suffered from concerning his mother, of how Anakin and Padmé ended up on Tatooine where they failed to save his mother, how they ended up in the battle arena with Obi-Wan – that certainly was Felicity’s favorite part of the story – of Anakin arguing with Obi-Wan to go back for Padmé, of Anakin losing his hand where Padmé comforted him, of how Anakin escorted her back to Naboo.

He told them stories of Anakin and Padmé’s associations during the Clone War, and how they were significantly closer during it. They heard of Anakin and Obi-Wan rescuing Padmé from the Malevolence, of the Blue Shadow Virus, of the Hostage Crisis – which completely threw Felicity for a loop when she realized her father missed her birth because of Luke’s parents – of the whole Rush Clovis fiasco, of how they had worked together to help defend Ahsoka during her false accusations.

“That does sound like a lot of stories of their interactions,” Felicity finally conceded. “But that doesn’t mean they had a relationship. Honestly, from what you’ve described… Anakin sounded like a stalker that couldn’t take no for an answer.”

Dex shifted uncomfortably, “Well…”

Amidala, is she still alive?”

“Oh no, died years ago,” Dex answered. “Right around the start of the Empire.”

Luke scowled, “The timing might not be right then. If she died before I was born… Do you remember exactly when she died?”

“Two days after the founding of the Empire,” Felicity suddenly remembered.

Luke turned to her, “Are you sure?”

“Yes!” Felicity exclaimed. “Leia was always so excited about the fact she shared a connection with Padmé, having been born the same day Padmé Amidala died. I even used to tease her that maybe she was reincarnation of her. And…”

Felicity stopped.

“Oh my god,” Felicity whispered.

“What?” Luke urged, something eager shining in his eyes. What was she onto?

“Vader…” Felicity’s jaw was hanging open slightly, her eyes distant as her mind struggled to put long forgotten pieces together. “The day I met Vader, he said that Leia reminded him of someone. Some passionate woman with a love of politics… Luke… he said he killed her.”

Luke went silent.

“He killed her?” Luke whispered. “…Why would he kill her? This doesn’t make sense.”

“Actually it makes a lot of sense when you think about it,” Felicity still had her thinking face on.

“What do you mean?”

“Luke, think about it. Vader was terrifying, but he wasn’t an idiot. He wouldn’t believe the random appearance of his supposed child he’d never knew existed, who randomly showed up twenty years after his wife’s death. He had to have known you were a potential at some point. He probably thought that his child had died with his wife.”

“He knew she was pregnant and still attacked her? Felicity, he wanted me to be with him. To rule the Galaxy as father and son. Why would it make sense to you that he wanted that, but killed his pregnant wife?”

“Because, Luke, Bail Organa was the one who ‘discovered’ Padmé Amidala’s body when she died,” Felicity answered. “Or so it was claimed.”

Luke frowned, “I don’t follow.”

“Bail Organa was with Padmé Amidala when she died. That’s how he got Leia.”

“And?”

“You told me yourself, Luke; Owen and Beru never left Tatooine once in their lives. So it stands to reason, that Obi-Wan Kenobi knew to come to Tatooine to watch over you… because he was the one that brought you to them. Which means-”
“He was there when I was born and my mother died.”

“...There’s one more thing, Kids,” Dex had nearly been forgotten in the conversation. “Vader was put in his suit two days after the founding of the Empire.”

Luke mouth hung open, “No... I don’t believe it.”

But the conclusion was clear: Vader must have attacked Padmé for being with the fugitive Obi-Wan Kenobi, forcing Obi-Wan to attack Anakin and put him in that horrible suit.

“I don’t believe it,” Luke put his head in his hands and struggled not to cry. “I don’t believe any of it. I can’t.”

Felicity’s hand was automatically on his shoulder, rubbing it, trying to soothe him.

“No, it’s not,” Luke’s voice was not harsh with her. “My father killed my mother, and not only did Obi-Wan lie about Vader killing my father, but he was the one who put him in that suit.”

Dex watched as Felicity gently pulled Luke into her arms, and Luke began to cry on her shoulder. Such an intimate gesture for two people each dating someone else, but it looked so natural to see them together. Dex wanted to do something similar to comfort Luke, but what gesture could he possibly make?

“I’ll be back in a sec,” Dex whispered to Felicity as she held Luke.

Felicity nodded, and went back to stroking Luke’s hair, much like he had done to her the day he gave her the kyber crystal.

True to his word, Dex returned a few minutes later holding a Holo.

“Luke, I’m sorry about what happened between Obi-Wan and Anakin,” Dex sat back down. “I truly am. I watched those two grow from awkward strangers thrown together by fate, to the absolute best of friends. I swear to you, Luke, whatever happened at the end – whether Obi-Wan put your father in a suit, or... Anakin killed Obi-Wan – they were brothers, and they did love each other. If Obi-Wan did try to kill Anakin, I swear that he would have done anything to get out of it.”

Luke sniffed and sat up.

“I know things went bad,” Dex continued, “but I also have to doubt that those two worked out things in whatever after all awaits us. I would put good money on them being the best of friends once again.”

Luke chuckled, remembering all the times Obi-Wan and Anakin had bantered in his head, “I think you’d be right, Dex. Thank you.”

Luke looked to Felicity.

Felicity smiled gently.

“Here,” Dex slid the Holo across the table. “I found this a while back and have been meaning to get it to you.”
Frowning, Luke flipped it on. Both he and Felicity gasped.

It was a Holo much like the one hanging by the fresher: a simple shot of some people sitting in a booth in the restaurant. This booth however was one of the ones in the corner with a semi-circle seat. Anakin and Obi-Wan were in it again, but there were more figures they recognized.

“Oh my god,” Felicity whispered, “is that Bail Organa?”

“Yep.” Dex pointed to each figure and named them, “That’s Ahsoka Tano, Anakin’s next to her, he’s got his arm around Padmé Amidala – I told you they were always really close-”

Luke objected, “Hey, just because he puts his arm around her doesn’t mean they’re romantically attracted to each other. I do it to Felicity, and we’re not romantically attracted to each other.”

“Yes,” Felicity agreed, “I mean Good Gods is Luke hot, and I am absolutely attracted to him a physical manner – frankly I think fooling around with a Jedi would be interesting enough to try at least once. Doesn’t mean we’re in love with each other.”

Dex chose not to say anything.

“Next to Padmé is Obi-Wan,” Dex continued to name the figures. “Then next to Obi-Wan is Bail Organa. It was the very first time Organa had come to my diner, but it certainly wasn’t the last. If you could convince your sister to come in, I’d love to serve her the Alderaanian breakfast pastries Senator Organa loved so much.”

“They are pretty spot on,” Felicity sipped her caf.

Luke gave her an odd look.

“You forget that I spent almost three years traveling around with the Organa family,” Felicity reminded. “Yeah, I know what Bail Organa liked for breakfast.”

“So what’s the circumstance that brought this picture about?” Luke asked. “I can’t imagine Bail Organa sharing breakfast with a bunch of Jedi very often.”

“It was to celebrate a successful mission,” Dex answered. “A few months before that Hostage Crisis that made Fliss have an identity crisis-”

“Skywalkers have literally been screwing with me from the date of my birth! You try not having an identity crisis!”

“Ahsoka was having some visions about Padmé Amidala getting assassinated at a peace conference on Alderaan,” Dex continued. “They were able to stop the assassination attempt and figure out that Ziro the Hutt was behind it all. They all decided to have breakfast together to celebrate and Anakin asked for a Holo of his Padawan’s first successful solo mission… Though I don’t think it was actually Tano’s first successful solo mission. To be honest, I think it was an excuse for him to have a picture where he was allowed to have his arm around Padmé.”

“This is amazing,” Luke stared at the Holo. “This could be the only Holo containing Obi-Wan, my parents, and Bail Organa… It’s a nice gesture if that’s true.”

“You don’t think it’s true?” Dex asked.

“I’ve been let down so many times before,” Luke admitted. “I don’t want to get my hopes up that I’ve found my mother until I have proof.”
“Well, let’s take a look.” Felicity picked up the Holo and zoomed in the picture until it was only Padmé and Anakin in the picture. She lifted the Holo up beside Luke’s face and said, “Hold still. Let’s take a look here.”

“I’d say a match,” Dex declared.

“Yep,” Felicity set it down on the table. “You’ve got her face shape, eye shape, and your nose is the perfect blend of Anakin and Padmé.”

Luke raised an eyebrow, “Is that the first time you’ve called him Anakin?”

“Luke, I’ve never seen Vader sans helmet,” Felicity shot, “but I’m going to assume he didn’t look like that underneath.”

“No, he certain did not.” Luke sighed as he looked down at the Holo. He ghosted his fingers over the image of Padmé Amidala, “I just wish I knew for sure. I want to know who my mother is so badly… but there’s no proof.”

“Well, you might want to ask your droids about getting some proof,” Dex suggested.

Luke frowned, “Why would they be helpful?”

“Really? Your droids are R2-D2 and C-3PO, right?” Dex asked.

“Well, then they would definitely have some stories, considering they used to belong to Anakin and Padmé.”

Luke, who had been about to take a sip of his hot chocolate, dropped his mug, “Excuse me?”

“Luke!” Felicity exclaimed, grabbing for the napkin to wipe the hot chocolate stains off her shirt. “Come on, this is new.”

“Apologies,” Luke floated some more napkins over to her. “What do you mean they belonged to Anakin and Padmé?”

“It’s the biggest evidence at all,” Dex replied. “R2-D2 was Anakin Skywalker’s Astro Droid during the Clone Wars, and C-3PO belonged to Padmé Amidala. But they ended up with those droids when they traded at the beginning of the war. Artoo was Amidala’s during the Invasion of Naboo, and was given to Padmé as a thank you after her service as Queen.”

“Owned?” Dex chuckled. “He built Threepio!”

As Luke sat, shell-shocked at the declaration… Felicity did not stop laughing for five minutes straight.

After a while, Luke’s shock faded away to annoyance as he sat with crossed arms, glaring at the hysterical Felicity.

“You done?” Luke asked shortly when Felicity’s laughing started to subside.
“I’m good,” Felicity wiped tears from her eyes. “I’m sorry, but Threepio being built by Darth Vader is probably the best thing I have ever heard in my life.”

“Well, if you’re done, I think I have some work to do.”

“We have work to do,” Felicity corrected. “You’re not getting rid of me that easily. I’m seeing this through with you.”

“You sure you don’t want to spend the day with your boyfriend?”

“Drystan will be fine. What about your girl? You think Calla would appreciate you spending the day with me getting to the bottom of this?”

“Let me deal with Calla. She can be a little-”

“Possessive? Territorial? Absolutely obsessed with you, which is kind of why you like her, because growing up as a poor farm boy on Tatooine, deep down you quite like the idea of someone who worships the ground you walk on?”

“You want to really get into this whole psychological analysis of each other’s current romantic partner?” Luke challenged. “Because I’m more than happy to discuss again that Drystan looks frighteningly similar to Brendan, and the implications of that.”

“You want to play the incest card? You’ve literally made out with your twin sister!”

“Right,” Luke returned to the topic at hand. “I’m going to find out if Padmé Amidala is my mother.”

“I can get a hold of Pooja Naberrie if you want.”

“For sure, but first… we have some droids to talk to.”

7 Months, 16 Days

“So, the mystery is solved,” Lando declared as he lounged on the couch of Luke’s apartment. “Padmé Amidala is your mother.”

“DNA tests with the Naberrie family have confirmed it,” Leia replied. “I can’t believe I’ve worked so many years with Pooja, and she was my cousin this entire time.”

“Well, it explains so many of those odd moments Bail Organa had around her,” Felicity smirked. “That and why he basically had a conniption every time Leia and Vader were in the same room.”

Luke’s apartment was filled that Saturday afternoon. Drystan was racing in the big Coruscanti podrace, and Luke was hosting a viewing party in his apartment.

It had been Leia’s idea, in fact, saying something about how Felicity shouldn’t be all alone down at the track. Initially the plan was for the group to get a private box at the track, but Felicity had taken Han, Leia, and Ben down to the track before. Ben had ended up being asked to leave and kindly never return – the track wasn’t about to outright ban a child, but the implication was clear – after Ben had semi-accidentally wrecked a bathroom with the Force. Luke then decided to offer to host a viewing party at his place, and Drystan was planning to join the group that night for dinner.

The group consisted of Luke, Felicity, Han, Leia, Ben, Chewbacca, the Droids, Lando, Calla, and Alyla. Alyla had recently decided she wanted to see more of the world and asked Luke to stay at his apartment for a few days while she saw the sights of Coruscant. At first it had been a little awkward, considering it was the first time she had been on a different planet from Gavyn, but Alyla was having the time of her life.

“I’m still hung up on the fact that Vader made Threepio,” Han chuckled. He was sharing the couch with Leia on one side and Lando on the other. “I don’t know if I buy it.”

“I’m not sure that I’m convinced of the idea either, Captain Solo,” Threepio replied as he worked in the kitchen, helping Alyla and Felicity – who wanted to show off her new cooking skills – make refreshments. “How could I have possibly been built by Master Luke’s father? There’s nothing in my memory banks about it. Nor about serving Senator Amidala.”

But Artoo had an answer.

Beep, bop, hoop, bup.

“Of course Senator Organa wouldn’t order my mind wiped and not yours,” Threepio chided. “How ridiculous it is for you to even suggest that.”

Bop, hoop, beep.

“What do you mean you have footage of it?”

Artoo projected an image into the room that caused Leia and Felicity to gasp. Most of the people in the room had seen images of people in the recording, or familiar with setting, but it was them who could remember those long, bright white hallways, and the men dressed in regal Alderaanian garb. The Tantive IV was a welcome sight to Leia and Felicity, but the faces they saw made their hearts lift.

There was a man in his late thirties or early forties walking down the hallway with Threepio and Artoo – though they could only guess at Artoo’s presence since the footage was from his point of view. The man was tall and broad, had dark skin, and his raven hair both on his head and face was immaculately styled and trimmed. A man with a kindness in his eyes, but hard face that would stare down any opponent. He was strong, wise, intelligent, and had been fiercely protective of both Leia and Felicity.

“Father,” Leia whispered, a smile spreading on her face.

Han glanced at her and said nothing. There was a hint of a smile at the corners of his mouth as he wrapped an arm around Leia. He would not ruin this moment of melancholy joy as Leia got to see new footage of the man she called Father.

“Bail,” Felicity smiled. “And look, it’s Captain Antilles.”

The figure of Bail approached the young Raymus Antilles, with the droids following close behind.

“Captain Antilles,” Bail said.

Raymus turned to face him, “Yes, Your Highness.”

Bail’s next words were short, sweet, and had no trace of hesitation, “I’m placing these droids in your care. Treat them well. Clean them up. Have the Protocol Droid’s mind wiped.”
“What?” Threepio’s head snapped to the side.

But Bail Organa said nothing to comfort the droid, merely walking away without a glance backward.

Artoo made some chittering laughing noises at Threepio’s plight.

“Oh, no!” Threepio sounded utterly distraught.

The image faded away and everyone just stared at R2-D2.

Beep, beep, bop.

Threepio gave Artoo’s dome a thud, “There’s no need to say I told you so!”

“Whoa,” Lando finally spoke. “So, he’s known everything this whole time?”

“It appears so,” Luke took a swing of his drink.

“Wow,” Lando shook his head. “So he knew Vader was your father, and Amidala was your mother? …Does that mean he also knew Leia was your sister? …Even on Hoth?”

Horror filled Luke, Han, and Leia’s faces as everyone exchanged awkward looks. Everyone’s eyes fell back to the eerily silent R2-D2. Silence stretched in the room as they waited for some sort of explanation or excuse.

Instead, Artoo just rolled out of the room.

“R2-D2, you get back here!” Threepio went after them. “You have a lot of explaining to do!”

“You know, it’s actually kind of sweet,” Alyla said after a minute. “Even when one of them had their minds wiped, they still stayed the best of friends.”

“If them constantly insulting each other and dragging the other into danger from their antics is what you call friendship,” Leia shook her head.

“Sweetheart, that’s literally the basis of every friendship in this room,” Han chuckled.

“It’s a wonder any of you are still friends,” Calla returned from the hall where she had been putting the empty drink bottles and cans in the recycling.

She scanned the living room and saw that there were open spaces on the various couches in Luke’s living room. Then she glanced, not so subtly at Felicity and Alyla, and plopped right down into Luke’s lap. He let out a loud “Oof!” as Calla dropped on him hard and wrapped her arms tightly around his neck. There was definitely not enough room on the chair to hold both of them.

Both Alyla and Felicity rolled their eyes at the possessive display.

“Luke, Sweetie,” Calla asked in a sickly-sweet tone, clearly trying to establish her romantic entitlement over Luke to the others. “What was that whole thing about Hoth?”

“Oh, uh,” Luke grunted as he tried to shift into a comfortable position. “Leia and I had a sort of embarrassing moment on Hoth.”

“Ah, yes, one of my favorite moments of all time,” Han chuckled.
“You weren’t too enthusiastic about it at the time, Nerfherder,” Leia nudged her husband.

“What happened?” Ben asked from the loveseat he was sharing with Chewbacca. “Wait, is this the kiss story?”

“I still can’t believe you told him that,” Luke exclaimed at the smirking Han.

“Wait, what kiss?” Calla asked innocently, but the way her grip tightened around Luke’s neck showed her displeasure.”

“Oh, before Leia and I found out we were twins… I had a bit of a crush on her,” Luke awkwardly admitted. “… And once on Hoth, Leia kissed me to make Han jealous.”

Calla’s grip tightened even more.

“It was nothing,” Luke dismissed. “We misinterpreted our innate bond as twins as something romantic.”

“I get that,” Alyla said. “If Gavyn and I had been separated at birth and then reintroduced as adults, I probably would have had the exact same feelings.”

“Anybody getting really uncomfortable with this conversation?” Felicity asked.

“Excuse me,” Han interrupted, “but doesn’t your boyfriend look like your brother?”

Felicity’s face went white, and beside Han, Leia went stiff.

“I don’t want to talk about Brendan,” Felicity turned her back on everyone, using washes dishes as a pretext to do so.

Leia glanced at Han for a second. Then she stood and crossed to the kitchen, where she gently touched Felicity’s arm.

Luke frowned, tuning out the subsequent conversation of the group as he watched Leia with Felicity.

“Are you okay?” Leia’s voice could barely be heard.

“I’m fine,” Felicity muttered.

“I know today’s a hard day-”

“I really don’t want to talk about it.”

“Alright.” Leia looked at Alyla, “Pass me the vegetables. I’ll help you two start prepping dinner.”

Alyla used the Force to float the vegetables, cutting board, and knife over to Leia.

Leia scowled at her, “Did you really need to do it like that?”

Alyla frowned, “What? What’s wrong with that?”

Leia stuck a thumb behind her at Ben.

As if on cue, Ben suddenly exclaimed, “That’s so cool! Mom, why do I get in trouble when I do that at home?”

“Oh,” Alyla gave a sheepish smile. “Sorry, I’ll talk to him.”
“Good,” Leia sighed. “He actually listens to you.”

It was true; after Luke, if there was one Jedi Ben probably called his favorite, it would be Alyla. She was tough, but nice, had some really interesting stories she wouldn’t censor for Ben, and he always thought the scars that lined almost every inch of her skin were awesome. There was even a running joke in Temple Village that only Alyla was allowed to teach Ben lightsaber moves, because she was the only person they trusted that Ben wasn’t going to run through with a lightsaber.

If only they knew how far from the truth that was.

“Alright, everyone be quiet!” Han announced. “It’s Drystan’s final race.”

The group happily watched as Drystan piloted his pod impressively through the track.

“That’s a pretty difficult course,” Leia said.

“It’s not that bad,” Luke was pretending his leg hadn’t fallen asleep under Calla’s weight. “You should see the one on Tatooine.”

“Oh Gods,” Felicity rolled her eyes. “If I have to hear about Beggar’s Canyon one more time, Luke-”

“I meant in Mos Espa,” Luke interrupted. “Always wanted to go see a podrace, but Uncle Owen refused to let me go… Considering my father’s history there, I now understand why.”

“Whoa,” Lando cringed as one of the racers crashed into the side of a wall. “These men are certainly brave. You never could get me in one of these races.”

“I don’t know,” Han shrugged. “I’ve always kind of wanted to try a swoop bike race.”

“Literally, over my dead body, Han,” Leia warned.

“You just say that because the last time you were on a swoop bike, you ended up the prisoner of an Ewok.”

“I wasn’t Wicket’s prisoner.”

“Whatever. I just want know where you got that brown dress.”

Luke winced, “Considering that Ewoks initially wanted to eat us… I don’t want to know where that dress came from.”

“This is so exciting!” Alyla became distracted by the race on the screen. She casually crossed from the kitchen to stand behind the couch. She rested her arms on the back of it and leaned forward, standing very close to Lando, he noted with pleasure. “It’s so nice to see a competition I’m not a part of.”

“You played a sport?” Lando asked in interest.

An awkward look crossed Alyla’s face, “Sort of… My first slave owner used to make Gavyn and I fight other slave pairs in the Fighting Pits for the entertainment of others.”

Lando’s eyes widened, “You fought in the Pits?”

“It’s not like how it sounds,” Alyla waved off. “We weren’t in the death matches. We just fought until the other team was unconscious. I mean, sure, it was ugly, and brutal, and we may have accidentally killed seven guys, but it wasn’t that bad.”

Lando stared at Alyla, “I’m not sure if I’m terrified of you… Or extremely attracted.”

Alyla shrugged, “It could be both.”

Lando grinned, “I think it is.”

Luke and Han exchanged a look.

“Oh look, it’s the final lap,” Han drew everyone’s attention back to the screen.

Everyone waited with bated breath, then burst into celebration when Drystan crossed the finish, not only winning the match, but the championship.

“You make sure you congratulate that boy very well tonight, Rhiaon,” Lando winked at Felicity.

She rolled her eyes, “And you wonder why I don’t like spending time with you.”

“Alright,” Leia declared, “the race is over. Let’s get started on dinner. Luke, the roast is in the fridge?”

Leia open the fridge, and then stopped.

“Luke, where are the calfa roots?” Leia asked.

“The purple vegetable I put in the bottom of the pan with the roast? Tell me you didn’t forget to buy them.”

“Alright, I won’t tell you then.”

“Luke!”

“It’s alright,” Lando stood up. “I can run to the grocery store and get some. It’s just down the street, right Luke?”

“Take a left at the intersection, it’s not very far,” Luke replied.

“How many do you need, Leia?” Lando asked.

“Seventeen should do it,” Leia answered.

“Then I’ll be right back.”

“Wait, you’re going to a grocery store?” Alyla asked, her eyes lit up. “Can I go with you?”

Lando looked amused, “I have never heard such excitement over a trip to the grocery store.”

“Well, I’ve never actually been to one,” Alyla looked shyly at the floor. “You know… slave and all. I think seeing a grocery store would be quite novel to me.”

“Well, then,” Lando grinned and waved his hand towards the door. “This way, Milady.”
Lando took a few steps before he realized Alyla hadn’t moved.

“Something wrong?” Lando asked.

Alyla winced as she realized what she was doing, “Oh sorry. Slaves have to walk five steps behind their masters. It’s a habit I’ve found very hard to break.”

“I guess there’s only one way to break it then.” Lando held out his arm for her, “Shall we?”

Alyla smiled and wrapped her arm around his, “We shall.”

They were smiling brightly as they exited the apartment.

Luke and Han were not.

“We should probably keep an eye on that,” Han said flatly.

“Agreed,” Luke nodded, vaguely wondering if Gavyn Kene was the type of brother to murder any man wanting to flirt with his sister. Considering Alyla’s past interaction with men… Luke would absolutely put money on the answer being yes.

“Ugh,” Ben groaned, his eyes fixed on the HoloVision set. “The news is on now. Uncle Luke, do we have to watch it? Mom makes us do it everyday at home.”

“Leave it on,” Luke answered. “I think Wedge told me he had some sort of interview tonight.”

“Wasn’t that tomorrow?” Han asked.

The Newscaster on the set began their broadcast, “Our top story today is one of remembrance. Fifteen years ago today, the Galaxy was shaken by the Bombing of Faclov.”

In Luke’s peripheral, Felicity stiffened. He noticed Leia’s hands stopped their knifework, and her eyes turned on Felicity.

“We can change the channel,” Leia’s voice was barely audible to Luke.

He could feel the shift in the Force; the tension, the fear, and the heartbreaking grief. Intrigued, Luke turned his head to watch Felicity and Leia.

“I’m fine,” Felicity muttered. “I’ll be fine.”

Leia touched Felicity’s arm, “If you need anything—”

“I know,” Felicity interrupted. She smiled at Leia, “I know.”

Luke frowned and looked to Han. Han was oblivious to the strange conversation occurring in the kitchen.

“Luke, Sweetie,” Calla pressed a kiss to his cheek, “I’m just going to run to the fresher. I’ll be right back.”

Luke nodded and Calla hopped off his lap, disappearing down the hall. He tried not to look too happy as he rubbed his stiff legs, finally free of her weight. Calla was surprisingly bony.
When she was gone, Luke debated standing and going to talk to the girls to figure out what was going on. Something dark and desperate had entered the Force, and he wanted to get to the bottom of it.

Luke was about to stand, when Felicity exited the kitchen. She carried a tray of snacks and set it down on the coffee table. As Felicity was standing back up, the Newscaster continued to speak.

“And in the spirit of Remembrance we at TRX5 Holo Action News would like to share with you the footage that changed the Galaxy.”

Felicity froze in place.

With her back to him, Luke couldn’t see the look on Felicity’s face, but he could tell she had gone perfectly stiff. A small tap would have probably pushed her to the ground with a thud. Felicity just stared at the screen, while the Newscaster warned about the graphicness of the footage about to be shown.

On the screen, security footage of a Stormtrooper played. He was helmetless and handsome. The Stormtrooper looked slightly familiar to Luke, though at the moment he couldn’t place from where.

The Stormtrooper was talking with a feuding pair of civilians. Luke semi-recognized the footage. He vaguely knew about the Bombing of Faclov that had killed thousands of innocent people. It was done by the Empire, but the Rebels had been framed as the culprits to garner support for the Empire. A few months later, the plot with uncovered and thousands of people joined the Rebel Alliance in protest.

Such news made it to Tatooine, but only in pieces. Luke didn’t know the names of the specific people involved… but he was about to learn them.

“Leia,” Felicity suddenly whispered.

The next thirty seconds were a mad scramble.

“Luke, turn off the HoloSet!” Leia yelled at him.

“Turn off the set now! Now, Luke!” Leia screeched. “Ben, close your eyes! Don’t you dare watch!”

“Leia, what is going on?” Han demanded.

“Yeah, why do I have to turn off the set?” Luke asked.

“JUST DO AS I SAY!” Leia screamed. “BEN, CLOSE YOUR EYES!”

“Leia,” Felicity whimpered again, her voice louder and more desperate this time. She was pale and still frozen.

Leia was at her side, pulling Felicity into her arms in an instant.

“It’s okay, Felicity,” Leia whispered, stroking Felicity’s hair as she sobbed into Leia’s shoulder. “It’s okay. Luke! Han! Turn off the set! BEN, CLOSE YOUR EYES! I’M NOT SAYING IT
Luke got to his feet. He was utterly confused, but heartbroken as Felicity whimpered incomprehensible words nonsensically. He thought he heard maybe the words “bomb” or “make it stop.”

He didn’t notice that Chewbacca had strung into action until a massive furry paw shoved him towards the HoloVision set.

As Chewbacca roared at Luke and Han, he grabbed Ben and held him firmly against his body. Ben struggled to break free, but Chewbacca would not allow him to break free and see.

Luke looked back at Felicity, and then felt it. That horrible, desperate, heartbreaking sorrow in the Force was coming from her. It was a sickening desperation and emptiness, the most horrible display of grief he had ever seen. It was a display he would only witness from her one more time after that; when she finally confessed her postpartum depression after the horrifying incident they never spoke of.

Luke knew he had to put a stop to this.

“Turn it off, Luke!” Leia yelled again.

Luke was so overwhelmed by the confusion of the room, it didn’t occur to him to use the Force to turn off the set. Instead he stumbled forward to do it physically, praying that he could reach the set in time.

But he was too slow.

The Stormtrooper on the screen said, "Gentleman, at the end of the day I think we all can agree we just want peace."

Then everything blew up.

Felicity gave the most bloodcurdling scream Luke had ever heard in his life.

She fell to her knees, bringing Leia down with her as she screamed and cried hysterically. Leia was holding her, trying to calm her, and give her reassuring words as tears streamed down her own face.

In the memory of that moment, Luke couldn’t remember what was said or by who. He only remembered next being on his knees, with his arms around Felicity, trying to calm her like Leia. Felicity might have try to push him away, but Luke couldn’t remember if that was real or simply something he imagined.

He didn’t remember when Felicity was boosted back to her feet, or by who, or how they managed it. He couldn’t remember Han’s confused words as he tried to understand what was going on. He didn’t remember when Calla came back in the room, confused by the display, and startled by the scream she had heard in the fresher. He didn’t remember helping Leia lead Felicity to his guest bedroom, while trying to ward off their well-intentioned pursuers, who just wanted to know what was going on.

All Luke remembered was how brokenhearted and desperate Felicity had been.

They got her in the bedroom, and Leia held her as Felicity cried in her arms.

Slowly, Luke backed out of the bedroom, while ignoring that pit in his stomach that yearned to be the one holding Felicity in her grief.

After closing the door, Luke stared at it, stunned by the events of the past two minutes. What had just happened? And why had it happened?

“I don’t understand,” Luke said, as he entered back into the living room. His words weren’t really for anyone but himself, and his eyes were far away as he tried to figure out the mystery before him.

“What happened to Felicity? Why was she acting that way?”

“It looked like PTSD to me,” Calla suggested. “Or at least something close to that.”

Calla was actually a licensed psychiatrist, which was ironic considering the mental problems she would eventually have. Calla would become Luke’s infamous crazy ex, who had nearly had Leia killed out of jealousy.

When she learned that Luke and Felicity were dating, she decided to get revenge by tipping off the Hutts that Leia had been the one who killed Jabba the Hutt. Luke eventually had to put that whole bounty against Leia from the Hutt Clan to rest by calling on the life debt Rotta the Hutt – Jabba’s son – owed the Skywalker family from that time Anakin Skywalker had saved his life.

Leia was so not happy that she was ultimately saved by a good act performed by the biological father she so hated.

“But what could have brought that on?” Luke asked.

“The explosion probably triggered a war memory,” Calla suggested. “Probably a battlefield flashback.”

“No, she was affected from the start the footage. Long before the explosion.”

“Guys,” Han suddenly spoke, his eyes locked on the HoloVision screen. “I think that might be it.”

The camera was back on the Newscaster, an image of the Stormtrooper, a handsome brunette man in the corner. And under his picture was his name.

Brendan Rhiaon

The room was filled with silence for a long time.

“Well, that certainly explains a few things,” Han declared.

It was over an hour later when Leia came out of the guest bedroom. Luke was already waiting for her.

“How is she?” Luke asked.

Leia sighed, “She’s calmed down… Luke, I’m sorry, I should have warned you what today is.”

“The anniversary of Brendan’s death?”

Leia looked away; she was about ready to cry, “He died because of me, Luke. He figured out I was part of the Rebellion and asked to join. An Inquisitor, Third Sister overheard us and they orchestrated his death. The Bombing of Faclov wasn’t just to set up the Rebellion, but it was specifically targeted to kill Brendan.”

“Yeah. Why?”

He had never revealed to anyone the dark secret Tyla Kinall had confessed to him: that she used to be Vader’s favorite assassin, called Third Sister. That Tyla had been spared by Vader when he slaughtered the Inquisitors after he believed all Jedi had been stamped out. That Vader had kept Tyla as his personal assassin, and groomed her into the role of his son’s future spouse to ensure their family dynasty lived on. It was why Tyla had always insisted that she and Luke were destined to be together – she had been brainwashed into the idea – and why Luke, even if he ever had remotely been attracted to her, would never let romance bloom between them.

There would be time later for Luke to confront the former Inquisitor about her role in the Bombing of Faclov. For now, all that mattered to Luke was Felicity.

“Can I see her?” Luke asked.

“If she’s willing,” Leia stepped away from the door. “Just be careful… and prepared to dodge any lamps thrown at your head.”

“That is my default mode while dealing with Felicity Rhiaon, anyway.” Luke touched his sister’s shoulder, “Thank you.”

Leia frowned, “For what?”

Luke glanced at the door, “I… I’m not sure. But thank you.”

Leia smiled and touched his arm, “Anytime.”

Luke gave the door frame a gentle knock as he stepped into the room.

Felicity was sitting on the bed, red faced, and tears still shining in her eyes. Her long brown hair was dishevelled as it tumbled down her shoulders.

Luke felt guilty at how Felicity was utterly heartbroken… and yet he found her breathtakingly beautiful.

At the knock, Felicity looked up at him.

Felicity nodded, fidgeting with something on her wrist.

Slowly, Luke crossed the room and sat next to her. He wanted nothing more than to pull her into his arms as she had when he had cried over the revelation that Obi-Wan had put Vader in his suit. But he respected her boundaries and did not touch her.

They said nothing, just sitting next to each other, letting the heavy silence overwhelm the room.

Luke frowned at her, “Say what?”

“Say what you told me when you gave me this,” Felicity held up the wrist she had been playing with.

Luke hadn’t noticed the bracelet she had been wearing that day: three black cords woven together holding a cracked crystal.

“Of course, I kept it,” Felicity said, no annoyance in her voice. She looked down at it and ran two fingers over the crack in the crystal, “I don’t wear it often but I like to keep it around for when I need strength. So I can remember what you said.”

“I’m broken, Luke,” Felicity repeated her words from months before. “I like to say that my father destroyed me, or that it was Vader, or the deaths of Ji-Dan, Gunner, and Riz… But that’s not what broke me. Brendan’s death was what broke me. Before he died… I was an idiot. A simpering, stupid, stuck up, selfish idiot, who couldn’t open her eyes wide enough to see the world around her actually mattered. All I cared about was impressing my Father, the Empire, the Emperor, and all the evils of the world. Who cared if people were dying and starving? I was living it up with Royalty, eating fine food and wearing beautiful clothing. I hate the person I used to be. I despise her.”

“She couldn’t have been that bad,” Luke said. His voice was measured to not show any strong emotion. He had known Felicity long enough to understand the balancing act required when Felicity was in this state.

“She was,” Felicity insisted.

Luke looked at her, “No… she wasn’t. Is she who you are now? Of course not. I’m not the same person I was at sixteen, you aren’t either. But I know that the girl you were before had the same qualities I adore in you. Passionate… brave… selfless. A hero.”

“No,” Felicity shook her head. “You didn’t know me then, Luke. How can you be so sure I was anything like that?”

“Because I know that the first time you met Darth Vader… you stepped between him and Leia when he was going to hurt her. Leia, a girl you had known for what, two hours? You were terrified of him… but were still willing to give your life to protect her. If your brother was anything like how you claim him to be, he would have been so proud of that.”

Felicity wiped her nose on her sleeve and gave a small laugh, “He was. I remember telling him that story, and he was so proud… He was always so proud of me, even when I didn’t deserve it.”

Luke dared to wrap his arm around her shoulders, “And I know he would be proud of the woman you’ve become, and all you’ve achieved.”

Felicity automatically leaned into his embrace, “I miss him so much, Luke. It isn’t fair. Why did he have to die? He shouldn’t have died.”

“No, it doesn’t,” Felicity said stiffly. “You want to know why I don’t believe in destiny? I don’t believe in destiny, because I refuse to believe that my brother had to die an excruciating death so, what? I could have character development? It’s true, there’s things that have happened to me because he died… but I’m not sure if it was all worth it… Was it worth it, Luke?”

Luke took a deep breath, “I don’t know. I suppose the only way to know is asking yourself… would you be willing to give it all up to have had him live?”

Felicity was very quiet.

“I don’t know,” Felicity’s confession was barely a whisper.

Luke held her tight, “I don’t know either… but if there is such thing as destiny… I’m glad it brought me to you.”

Neither of them kept track of the time after that. They simply held each other and reflected on it all. Sometimes they spoke – Felicity telling the story of Brendan and how it led to Operation Citadel or Luke telling Felicity about that horrid day he found the charred skeletons of the couple who had loved him and raised him – sometimes one held the other as they cried, and sometimes they just sat in silent.

It must have been two or three hours later, when a jubilant voice came yelling down the hallway.

“Fliss! Fliss! Did you see?” Drystan called. “Did you see my race!”

Drystan stopped dead in his tracks as he entered the room and saw Luke holding Felicity.

As Felicity hugged Drystan, he was staring in confusion at the awkward looking Luke.

“Uh, yeah,” Drystan said. “Sorry… is something going on here?”

“Oh, it’s nothing,” Felicity waved.

“Doesn’t look like nothing,” Drystan tried to keep the edge from his voice.

“Unfortunately today is the anniversary of Felicity’s brother’s passing,” Luke stood up. “Felicity was feeling a little down, and since you weren’t here to comfort her, I thought I’d do so.”

“Oh,” Drystan frowned. He looked at Felicity, “Your brother died today?”

Felicity nodded.

“Why didn’t you tell me?”

Felicity shrugged, “I just didn’t want to put that on you. I’m sorry.”

“That’s okay,” Drystan’s tone made it clear it wasn’t. “I just wish you would tell me these things. You’re always so closed off.”

“I’m not closed off,” Felicity objected.

“I should go,” Luke declared. “You two must have things to discuss.”

As the door shut behind him, Luke leaned against it and sighed.

Calla was grinning as she approached him. She wrapped her arms around his neck, his arms wrapping automatically around her waist.

“I’m so proud of you,” Calla kissed Luke. “You’re such a good friend comforting Felicity.”

“Really?” Luke teased, “You’re not jealous that I was alone with another woman for several hours?”

Something dark flashed across Calla’s face, “Should I be jealous?”

“Of course not,” Luke kissed Calla. “I’m sorry we didn’t spend a lot of time together today.”

Calla grinned, “Well you can always make it up to me when everyone has gone home tonight.”

“Alright, but may I remind you that Alyla is currently staying in my guest room?”

“Is that something I should be worried about?”

“Of course not,” Luke laughed. “Come on, let’s see how soon dinner will be ready.”

And as they walked back to the living room, Luke couldn’t help but think how much better it had felt to hold Felicity than it had been to hold Calla.

8 Months, 15 Days

“So, I heard that Calla finally dumped you,” Felicity smirked at Luke over breakfast at Dex’s.

“Finally saw how crazy she was?”

“I resent that you and Han insisted on calling her crazy. It was through the entire relationship, and that was simply not fair to her!”

Felicity raised an eyebrow.

“But yeah, she was insane,” Luke weakly admitted, poking at his eggs.

Felicity chuckled, “Knew it. What did she do?”

“Doesn’t matter.”

“Come on, Luke. You know I’ll hear it from Han if you don’t tell me.”

“Alright, she may have… accused me of cheating on her.”

“And you obviously didn’t,” Felicity knew Luke’s character enough to know the claim was baseless. “Then again, I wasn’t involved, so for all I know you count have cheated.”
“Well, actually,” Luke awkwardly scratched his chin. “She accused me of cheating on her… with you.”

Felicity choked on her caf, “With me?”

“Is this because of the wedding?”

About a week ago, Felicity had begged Luke to attend a wedding with her as her plus one. It had been the wedding of Riz Drayson’s daughter, Ayessa and Gunner’s youngest son, Koran. Drystan had dumped Felicity a week before citing that she was too “emotionally unavailable” and Felicity had begged Luke to be her plus one.

Normally, Felicity was fine going stag, especially since she would be surrounded by Diego and the families of her Rogue team, with whom she was close friends. However, Ayessa was very close with a former Rebel soldier named Pax and had invited him and his wife to her wedding.

Pax just so happened to be Felicity’s ex-fiancé whom she had dated for four years before breaking up with him. The breakup was amicable, but Felicity still didn’t want to show up to the wedding and face Pax and his wife still alone at age thirty-one. (Or was it thirty-two? Luke couldn’t remember if Felicity’s birthday had passed yet.)

Ultimately, Pax ended up not attending the wedding when his wife had to rush to the hospital to get her appendix removed. But Luke and Felicity had had fun at the wedding.

Calla had been very uncomfortable with the whole notion to begin with. It was an off-world, overnight trip, and Calla made it very clear that despite them having each other own hotel room, she didn’t trust Luke alone with Felicity.

Luke had objected, and thought he successfully talked her into letting him go with Felicity. But when he returned home, Calla had absolutely lost it on him.

“She accused you of sleeping with me?” Felicity shook her head. “She actually thinks Luke Skywalker is the kind of guy who would cheat?”

“Oh, it gets worse than that,” Luke looked down at the table.

Felicity grinned like a child on life day, “What did she do?”

“She sort of, um… accused me of cheating on her with more than just you.”

“Let me guess. Alyla? She never did like Alyla staying at your apartment.”

“Yes, Alyla… but there was more.”

Felicity frowned, “Who? What did she think you finally gave in to all of Tyla’s advances?”

Luke sighed, “She sort of… accuse me of using the Jedi Order as a front for some sort of polyamorous society.”

“Oh my Gods, so she thought you were cheating on her with-”
“You, Alyla, Tyla, Reine, Zena, Obik, Gavyn…” Luke took a deep breath, “…And Leia.”

Felicity burst out laughing, “She accused you of cheating on her with your own twin sister?”

“She said that hiding what happened on Hoth clearly meant that something was still going on. Like I was actually hiding that fact from her. I’m sorry if ‘I kissed my own twin sister’ doesn’t come up in conversation that often.”

“So be honest, which accusation made you call it quits? The infidelity? The polyamory? The homosexuality? Or the incest?”

“All except the homosexuality.”

Felicity raised an eyebrow.

Luke looked away, “I don’t think I’ve ever told you, but I am… interested in both genders.”

“Oh,” Felicity looked surprised. “So you’re… bi?”

“Is that a problem?”

“No, of course not,” Felicity shook her head. “I just didn’t expect that. So is it more a theoretical thing, or have you had boyfriends before?”

“A few,” Luke admitted. “Mostly during the war. Actually, my very first crush was my childhood best friend, Biggs Darklighter.”

“Biggs, huh?” Felicity chuckled. “I don’t blame you. He was a looker.”

“I recruited him. We got to know each other quite well.”

“When you say you knew him…”

“It happened every once in a while,” Felicity admitted. “Nothing serious. Just a way to blow off steam between friends. Every Rebel had their vice… mine was of a more carnal nature.”

Luke shook his head, “Of all the Rebels you could have had a friends with benefits arrangement, it had to be my childhood best friend.”

“Hey, of all the Rebels you could have had a fling with, not only was it my childhood best friend, but it also turned out to be your twin sister.”

“For the last time, it was just one kiss.” Luke sighed, “And I wonder why I’m thirty and still single.”

“Join the club,” Felicity shrugged. “I couldn’t tell you why I’m still single.”

“Severe emotional brother and father issues that tamper with your view on relationships with men?”

“That’s rich coming from a man whose relationships are marred by only ever dealing with motherly figures, or women who worship the ground he walks on.”

“Don’t forget that whenever I do find a woman who doesn’t fall under those categories, she ends up rejecting my romantic advances.”
“Or dead.”

Luke raised an eyebrow.

“Leia told me about Nakari Kelen... my condolences.” Felicity sipped her caf, “Face it, Skywalker, we are so massively screwed up, the only people who could possibly tolerate a long-term relationship with us would have to be equally screwed up.”

“He wanted me to forget the pain in my past. Do I need to move on from my brother’s murder and my father’s betrayal? Of course. But those things also moulded me into the woman I am today, and I wouldn’t change it.”

“I know exactly what you mean.” Luke sighed, “Maybe that’s a sign that we’re both too far gone, that there’s no one in the Galaxy left for us.”

“Then we’ll spend our days growing grey and infinitely more insane and emotionally damaged together,” Felicity raised her mug in a cheers motion. “Maybe we should just make one of those ‘if we’re both still single at fifty, we’ll get together’ pacts.”

“I’m game,” Luke shrugged. “So, what are you doing tonight?”

“Nils is keeping me late. We’re switching to a new computer system and have to transfer and reorganize literally hundreds of thousands of documents.”

“Sounds rough.”

“Well, I get tomorrow off in exchange. Of course, I have absolutely no plans, so I’ll probably spend the night staring glassy eyed at the HoloNet until my brain starts to leak out of my ear.”

“Well, if you’re free, you should come out with me tomorrow night,” Luke offered. “The remaining members of Rogue Squadron are coming in for a night of drinking. You should join us. Nalto will be there.”

“Nah, I don’t belong with Rogue Squadron.”

“Are you kidding? You’re Rogue One! You belong to this squad more than any of them.” Luke reached across the table and took Felicity’s hand, “Come on. Let’s go out, have a few drinks, and forget we ever met Drystan or Calla.”

Felicity grinned, “Alright, Skywalker. Let’s go drink some Rogues under the table.”

8 Months, 16 Days

“Gentlemen, correct me if I’m wrong, but we are all in our thirties, are we not?” Felicity scowled as the waitress droid set the shots on the table.

“Look, if you’re scared, you don’t have to do this,” Wedge Antilles teased.

“I’m not scared, I’m just confused as to why of all the drinking games out there, we, fully grown adults are going to play truth or dare?”

“Actually, truth, dare, or I never,” corrected Deena Kopos, the former Rogue Eight. She was the only surviving female of the Squadron and had been most happy for Felicity to join them. “You pick a person and they get to pick from the three options.”

“Standard rules, Gentlemen?” Zev Senesca, former Rogue Two asked.

“What are the standard rules?” Felicity asked.

Derek “Hobbie” Klivian, former Rogue Seven answered, “Nothing illegal, immoral, and if you do any ‘I never’ to specifically target one person, you’re buying everyone’s drinks.”

“What do you mean by targeting someone?” Felicity inquired.

“It means pulling something you know for a fact only one person in the Squad has done or had,” Diego responded. “For example, I could say ‘I never had a father who was a significant Imperial Officer’ and that would be fine because that applies to both you and Luke.”

“But if you say ‘I never had a Sith Lord for a father’ then you have to pay,” added Wes Janson, Rogue Ten.

“Now, for the questions where we discuss Rogue Squadron,” Nala Hetsime, Rogue Five began, “do we count Rhiaon?”

“I think adding her and her group is fair,” agreed Tarrin Datch, Rogue Four.

“Perfect,” Nala grinned.

“Alright, boys!” Deena grinned. “Let’s drink!”

“I say the guest of honor should go first,” Diego grinned at Felicity.

“Good idea, Nalto,” Wedge nodded. “Rhiaon, truth, dare, or I never?”

Felicity thought, “I never.”

“Alright,” Wedge grinned. “I never kissed another member of Rogue Squadron. And if you drink, you have to tell us who.”

“Wait, are we talking on the lips?” Zev clarified. “Because Jek Pugilio used to kiss everyone on the cheek when he got drunk.”

“Lips,” Wedge confirmed.

Luke, Diego, Tarrin, and Felicity all drank.

“Alright, Skywalker, you first,” Wes grinned. “Fess up. Who was it?”

“I knew it!” Wedge exclaimed, clapping Luke on the back. “I knew Rogue Nine was into you. Alright, Nalto. Who was it?”

“Uh…” Diego’s eyes flicked over at Felicity.

“Actually, she’s mine too,” Tarrin confessed.
“Thanks, Tarrin,” Felicity rolled her eyes. “Yeah, I’ve kissed Diego… and Tarrin… and Jek.”

“Someone’s certainly working their way through our ranks,” Hobbie chuckled.

“It’s not like that,” Felicity insisted. “Okay, fine once upon a time, after one of our victories, yes, I had a one night stand with Tarrin. I also had a drunken kiss Jek once. But Diego was different.”

“I always knew you two dated,” Wedge shook his head.

“We never dated!” Diego exclaimed. “Look… once on Jakku when were cooped up in this tent during a sandstorm… We were having a very heart to heart conversation about Ji-Dan, Gunner, and Riz, and… we had a… moment of weakness.”

Luke couldn’t wipe the scowl from his face, “You slept with Diego?”

“No!” Felicity burst out laughing. “Oh Gods, no. What happened was the conversation was getting all deep, and we were both really sad. Then Diego kissed me-”

“No, you kissed me!” Diego exclaimed.

“Why would I ever kiss you?” Felicity shot.

“Fine, someone kissed the other,” Wedge exclaimed. “What happened next?”

“We sort of got into it a little bit,” Diego confessed. “And I laid her on her back, and it certainly looked like it was going to head that way, but…”

“But?” Luke’s voice had an odd edge to it.

Why did the images of Felicity with Diego disgust him so much? In fact, it was the feeling he got every time he had seen Drystan leave Felicity’s apartment in the morning, and he unwillingly imagined what had happened the previous night. The truth was, he absolutely hated the idea of Felicity being intimate with someone.

Of course, what person wanted to picture one of their best friends like that?

…Right?

“But…” Felicity shared a smirk with Diego. “When we broke off the kiss to catch our breath, we paused to take in the situation. My arms wrapped around his neck, him hovering over me about to put his hands on my body…”

Luke’s fist tightened under the table.

“And we burst out laughing,” Diego did just that.

“It was just so ridiculous!” Felicity laughed hysterically. “We had just barely stopped hating each other and what? We were going to have sex?”

“God, and the kiss,” Diego shook his head. “There was nothing behind that. No connection, no spark, no nothing. I could probably kiss the men’s room wall and get more out of it.”

“Seriously, I’ve had more romantic chemistry with my own brother than I did Diego,” Felicity shook her head.

Luke found himself relaxing.
“Although it did lead to something good,” Felicity voluntarily took a swing of her drink. “Since I know I have so little physical chemistry with Diego, I use him for my boyfriend gambit.”

“Boyfriend gambit?” Hobbie asked.

“If a guy simply won’t take no for an answer, and I’ve done literally all I can to get him off my back but he won’t go, I’ll pretend Nalto’s my boyfriend. He’s kissed me, like, seven times under that façade.”

Felicity grinned, “With pleasure.”

Far too many shots to count later, the group was absolutely wasted. It was enough that none of them would be able to fly themselves home, and more than enough for Wes to know that his wife was going to be pissed.

“Tesha is so going to make you sleep on the couch tonight,” Wedge chuckled as Wes stumbled back to the table from the fresher.

Wedge wasn’t in much better shape, basically only holding himself up by leaning all his weight against Zev on his left. Zev was displacing some of the weight by leaning on Felicity, who was sitting on his left. On Wedge’s right was Diego, who was targeting Luke on his right with his “touchy, feely, buddy-buddy” level of drunk where he kept clapping him on the arm, and rubbing his arm, and throwing an arm around his shoulder, and basically just pawing at Luke.

“On the couch?” Wes took his seat next to Felicity. “I’m going to be lucky if she doesn’t throw me out of the house. Oh Gods, I just remembered that I’m supposed to take my daughters to gymnastics in the morning… Tesha’s going to kill me.”

“I am so happy Ceren knows to expect nothing from me after drinking nights,” Wedge chuckled. “That’s my advice to you, Rhiaon. Get a husband who’s okay with drinking nights with the boys.”

“Alright, but someone’s going to have to catch him for me first,” Felicity chuckled. “I am so bad at picking men.”

“Well, it’s your turn to pick something else,” Hobbie smiled. He leaned back a little too far back on his stool, and caught Deena’s shoulder at the last minute to keep him upright. “Truth, dare, or I never?”

“Truth,” Felicity picked. “I don’t know if we could all handle another I never.”

The squad grumbled in agreement.

“Alright.” A wicked look sparked in Hobbie’s eye, “Since we established that you are working your way through our ranks… who’s your next victim?”

“Excuse me?” Felicity frowned.

“If you had to kiss any member of Rogue Squadron you haven’t done something with yet, who would it be?”

Felicity looked around the table, “Well… If I had to kiss someone… Luke.”

Luke choked on his drink.
“Called it!” Diego raised his drink.

“Me?” Luke gaped at her.

Felicity giggled – which was something Luke had learned she only did when she was out of her mind drunk – and leaned back in her seat, “I think you’d be a good kisser. Alright, let’s see. Wedge, your turn.”

“I never,” Wedge chose.

“You should do ‘I never held the highest test score for incoming pilots in the Rebellion,’” Luke suggested.

“Alright, let’s do that,” Felicity grinned.

Wedge scowled as he and Luke took a drink, “Not fair, Skywalker! You only said that because you like bragging about how you beat my score.”

“You just won’t admit that I’m a better pilot than you.”

“Alright, fine, Skywalker. Truth, dare, or I never?”

“I never.”

“Good!” Wedge exclaimed. “How about this, Mister Best Pilot in the Rebellion? I never made out with my own sister!”

The table fell silent as all eyes turned on either Wedge or Luke.

Luke just smirked and raised his drink, “Alright, I’ll drink… And thank you so much for paying for all of our drinks tonight.”

Wedge went white as the table burst out laughing, everybody remembering the rule.

“Damn it,” Wedge muttered as Nala waved over the waitress droid and told her of Wedge’s generosity.

“I never,” Diego chose.

“You are such a liar, Skywalker,” Diego shook his head as a number of people, Diego and Luke included took a drink. “I’m going to invoke the rule that if you do an I never that you have done, I’m allowed to turn the choice back on you.”

“We’ll allow,” Tarrin said.

“Truth, dare, or I never, Skywalker?” Diego asked.

Luke paused to think, “I don’t think I can drink anymore. Let’s going with dare.”

Diego grinned, “Alright… I dare you to kiss, Fliss.”

“You heard me.” Diego jerked his head towards his friend, “Kiss Felicity.”

“I’m not doing that,” Luke refused.

“You have to,” Hobbie insisted.

“Come on, guys, we’re not thirteen!”

“What are you, scared?” Diego teased. “I may have had no chemistry with her, but she’s a pretty good kisser.”

“I’ll drink to that,” Tarrin raised his cup.

“I don’t see the big deal,” Felicity shrugged. “It’s just a kiss… Unless I repulse you.”

“Oh, you definitely don’t repulse me,” Luke swallowed.

“Then let’s do it,” Felicity laughed. “Come on, it’s just some friends messing around. It doesn’t mean anything.”

“Sir?” The waitress droid rolled over to Wedge. “We need your credit chip for your table’s tab.”

“No, it’s okay,” Felicity said as Luke started to stand. She got out of her chair and stumbled towards him, “I’ll come to you.”

It happened in a second. Wedge backed out his chair just as Felicity stepped behind it. It banged into her, knocking her over and the next thing anyone knew, Felicity’s head cracked against the corner of the table behind them, and she was on the floor, knocked out cold.

A flurry swears from a dozen different languages flew out of the Rogues’ mouths, and everyone leapt out of their chairs, racing to her side, ensuring Felicity was okay.

The drinking game had come to an end.

---

8 Months, 17 Days

“How did ‘let’s go for a few quiet drinks’ turn into ‘that time Wedge put Felicity in the hospital?’” Luke glared at Wedge as the Rogues sat in the waiting room.

Wedge shrugged, “You were the one trying to kiss her, Skywalker.”

The Rogues filled the waiting room, all groaning as the first rays on morning light filtered in.

“Felicity is going to kill me,” Diego had his head in his hands. “What if she has serious brain damage?”

“She hit her head against a table,” Deena rolled her eyes. “They’re just doing all the tests for liabilities’ sake. She’ll be fine.”

“But did you see how much blood there was?” Tarrin shuddered. “That was a lot.”
“Come on, man!” Nala scolded. “We were in a war! You call that an injury?”

“Skywalker, Nalto,” Wes winced as he glanced at the clock, “I really don’t want to look like the bad guy here... but I gotta get home. My wife’s already pretty mad at me, but I’ve got to be up in four hours to take my daughters to gymnastics.”

“It’s okay,” Luke assured him. “Go home. I’ll tell you how she is when we get news. That goes for everyone. If you need to go, go. No one will blame you.”

Slowly each of the Rogues got to their feet, saying apologies and how they’ll do the same drinking get together the next year. They cleared the room, and soon it was only Luke and Diego waiting.

“I should call my work,” Diego sighed. “I’m supposed to leave for Hosnian Prime in a few hours and teach a class at the Academy tomorrow morning. I’ll have to reschedule.”

“No, Diego, it’s fine,” Luke said. “You should go. Felicity will understand. You know she wouldn’t want a big fuss over her.”

“But who’s going to be here for her?”

Luke raised an eyebrow.

Diego smiled and patted Luke on the leg, “You’re a good kid, Skywalker.”

“Look, I’m sorry about putting you up to the kiss. You’re right, we’re not thirteen. We shouldn’t act that way.”

“No, it’s okay. Truth be told... I actually kind of liked the idea of the kiss.”

Diego grinned knowingly, “I wasn’t lying when I said she was a good kisser. We just don’t have chemistry. But I bet if you kissed her... Maybe you’ll find out someday.”

Luke didn’t know why he smiled, “Maybe I will.”

He watched as Diego clapped his shoulder once more and exited the room. But even after Diego was gone, Luke was still smiling.

Kissing Felicity Rhiaon. Why did such a thought bring a smile to his face? It gave him that same feeling he got when he held her in his arms.

Kissing Felicity Rhiaon. He had never considered the idea before, and yet as he mused over the idea, there was one conclusion he was certain of...

He absolutely wanted to.

An hour later, a nurse came into the waiting room and called, “Felicity Rhiaon?”

Luke stood up, “Is she alright?”

“She’s doing fine,” the nurse assured him. “Her tests are clear and the doctor is ready to discuss the results. Are you family?”

“Uh... No. I’m a friend... and neighbour.”
“Oh, well perhaps you can help me then. We’ve been looking in her records to find an emergency contact, and I’ve been unable to come up with one.”

“Yes, we contacted Mr. Arlos and it turns out she does not have an emergency contact registered with him.”

It hit Luke like a bag of bricks.

“What?” Luke whispered. “She doesn’t have an emergency contact?”

“Mr. Arlos was very upset to learn she hadn’t registered one,” the Nurse replied. “But perhaps you can help me find one. Our records say that she was born to an Alaric Rhiaon? Might we contact him?”

“Oh, no, he died when she was twenty-one.”

“Alright. What about Dinah Rhiaon?”

“Died when she was three.”

The Nurse looked through the file she was holding, “It says Dinah also gave birth to a Brendan Rhiaon?”

“Her brother… died when she was sixteen.”

Luke hadn’t ever really thought about it. Who did Felicity have in her life? He couldn’t really recall any other friends. Sure, there was Diego, but Diego lived on Hosnian Prime, and Felicity had more than enough of the people at her office during work hours.

…Was he really the only person Felicity hung out with?

“Well…” The Nurse flipped through he file, trying not to look desperate. “We do have it down that she used to be entrusted to a Bail Organa and occasionally a Raymus Antilles.”

Luke gave her an awkward smile.

“Alright, they’re dead too,” The Nurse shook her head. “I suppose I will have to go back into the records of her family. Did her parents have any siblings?”

“We have no reason to trust you from a legal standpoint. Now, there is another possibility… The file says that Organa had a daughter Miss Rhiaon is associated with. A Leia Organa?”

“Absolutely, Sir. Have a seat and you can see Miss Rhiaon once Ms Organa verifies you.”

“Thank you.” Luke paused, “Um, Nurse?”

“Yes, Mr. Skywalker?” The Nurse asked.

“If Felicity didn’t have an emergency contact and you couldn’t get a hold of Leia or her family, what would happen?"

“Miss Rhiaon would have to deal with all of this herself.”

“But what if she was in a coma, or found… dead in a ditch?” Luke’s stomach dropped at the thought. “What would happen?”

The Nurse sighed, “She would be registered with the police as a Jayne Antilles case, and they would seek to identify someone to notify. If there was no one to notify, she would retain her Jayne Antilles status.”

Luke swallowed, “… And if she were dead?”

“The hospital would put her in a simple, unmarked plot.”

Luke felt like his legs were about to buckle from underneath him.

“I’m sorry, Sir,” The Nurse smiled.

“No,” Luke sat down in a chair. “… It’s okay.”

But as the Nurse walked away, Luke knew it wasn’t.

It was almost noon when Felicity finally woke up. Luke was sitting at her side, waiting for Leia – who had been delayed in a meeting – to arrive.

Luke’s face was white and blank as he obsessed over the horrifying thought that Felicity could have be lost to an unmarked burial plot.

“Well, don’t you look terrible,” Felicity’s voice weakly jolted Luke from his thoughts.

He grinned at her and took her hand, “I’m not the one in the hospital bed.”

“Yeah, why am I here? Last I remember we were drinking… and I think I was trying to kiss you.”

“You were.”

“Did I succeed?”

“No.”

“Not surprised,” Felicity shrugged. “If we kissed, I’m sure I would remember it. So why am I in the hospital?”

“Wedge hit you with his chair and you knocked yourself out on the table beside us,” Luke explained. “The doctors say you’ll be fine, but you’ll have to wear the head bandage for a while.”

Felicity sighed, gently touching the cotton wrapped around her head, “It’s a good thing I have a fashion whizz to help me make this work. I’m sure Leia will help me pick out a few outfits.”

“I’m sure she will,” Luke chuckled. “Leia’s on her way.”

“Why?”

“I had the hospital use her as your emergency contact. It was either that or one of your aunts or uncles.”

Luke’s smile fell, “I recently learned the answer to that question.”

Felicity frowned and cocked her head.

Luke gathered his courage to speak, taking both of her hands in his, “Felicity… you don’t have an emergency contact.”

Felicity looked away, “I know… but I didn’t have anyone I could count on. I don’t really have any friends, and those I do are on Hosnian Prime or Rornian… or dead.”

“Felicity,” Luke whispered. Tears were gathering in his eyes, “They told me that if you were found dead in a ditch, they would have no one to contact. No one to tell. No one would know.”

“I’m sure they would figure it out eventually.”

“You don’t get it!” Luke exclaimed.

Felicity winced at the volume, her injured head throbbing.

“I’m sorry,” Luke calmed himself. “But you have to understand, Felicity, the thought of you dead in a ditch somewhere and me not knowing, terrifies me. I have lost so many people I care about, Felicity. I care about you. I couldn’t stand the thought of me not knowing what happened to you.”

Felicity smiled and placed a hand on his face, “I’d be lying if I said I didn’t feel the same about you. Luke… I don’t have an emergency contact because there was no one on Coruscant I could depend on. But now…”

Felicity took a deep breath, “I know I can depend on you. Luke… I trust you. I trust that you’d be here for me… like you’re here now. I trust you would make the decisions I would chose for myself, and I know that you would be here to support me through any of them.”

“Felicity… what are you saying?”

Felicity grinned, “What I’m saying is… Luke Skywalker, will you be my emergency contact?”

Luke gave that goofy grin Felicity liked so much and clasped his hand over hers, “Of course.”

“Perfect.” Felicity lowered her hand and readjusted her position in the bed, “Now, head injuries take a lot out of you. I think I’m going to have a little nap.”

“Of course,” Luke pulled the blanket back over her. “Sweet dreams, Felicity.”

“Thank you.”

“Anytime.”

Silence filled the room for a few moments as Luke watched Felicity turn on her side and close her eyes.

Then Felicity, with her eyes still close, whispered, “Luke?”

“Yes, Felicity?”
“Promise me you’ll be here when I wake up?”

“I promise.”

“Thank you.”

“Anytime.”

“… And Luke?”

“Yes, Felicity?”

“You really would have enjoyed kissing me.”

Luke chuckled, “I’m sure I would have.”

He watched her as she fell asleep. Luke smiled as her body relaxing, drifting into the vulnerable state of sleep, but he knew he would be there to protect her. He would always be there to protect her.

“You really would have enjoyed kissing me.”

Luke couldn’t help but think of her words. He wished he had done it, press those beautiful lips to his own. He wondered how it would taste, how it would feel. Would they have the same easy chemistry they had in everything else? Or would they be like Felicity and Diego, no spark at all?

He should have kissed. He wanted to kiss her.

… He could kiss her.

She was laying there, unaware of the actions around her. If he wanted to kiss her, just try it once without the possibility of her laughing him off… he could do it.

Of course, he wouldn’t actually kiss her. Not taking advantage of her while she slept off a head injury. If he was going to kiss her on the lips, it would be with her full knowledge and enthusiastic consent.

But he wanted to kiss her.

Luke sighed and thought about the situation. No, he shouldn’t do it, not like this. Why did he even want to kiss her so badly? She was his friend. His best friend. Her had such perfect chemistry, such a natural connection.

He had to kiss her.

Luke took a deep breath; okay, he would do it. But not her lips, not taking advantage of her. It would have to be innocent, for that’s all it was: an innocent kiss. Much like one he would give Leia.

…Okay, maybe Leia was a bad example.

Felicity gave a soft moan, and a turned over in her sleep. She was lying on her back and had a small on her face. Luke couldn’t deny how beautiful she looked. Soft, pale skin, petite, delicate features, sharp, angular lines. Her hazel eyes with the teasing twinkle were shut, but her long, brown hair fanned out on the bed. And a sight that made him smile: on her right wrist was her kyber crystal bracelet.

She was simply breathtaking.
Luke made his decision. He stood and leaned over her. He paused for a minute, ensuring that he hadn’t woken her.

Felicity made no movement.

He took a deep breath, and gently stroked her cheek. Her skin was so soft – he would absolutely have to ask her what moisturizer she used – and to his luck, Felicity didn’t stir.

Felicity didn’t move.

Luke took another deep breath, and then leaned forward and kissed her on the forehead.

Felicity smiled in her sleep, but did not wake.

A jolt seemed to go through Luke’s body when his lips touched her skin. There was something odd about it, something so right. His heart pounded faster as he pulled away from her and looked down at her beautiful sleeping form.

He wanted to do it again.

And again. And again. And again. And again.

Inside him, a dam had just burst open. Yes, he always knew he was physically attracted to her, but now that he had kissed her, he wanted more.

Luke wanted to kiss her. Her forehead, her lips, her neck, and so much more. He wanted to hold her in his arms the way he craved the night he learned how Brendan died. He wanted his arm around her waist the same way it had been during the very first picture they had taken together. He wanted her close to him, her skin soft and warm, pressed against him like the time they had danced at Ayessa and Koran’s wedding.

He wanted her body to make him feel just as wonderful as everything else about her did. The way her laugh brightened his life, or her courage gave him strength. He wanted her touch and her taste to fill his heart and make it beat faster the way it did anytime she entered the room.

Wait… His heart?

And then Luke finally realized it. He didn’t just want to hold Felicity or kiss her… he wanted to be with her.

Everyday he woke up and his first thought was counting the minutes until he saw her face. He looked forward to those breakfasts, those cooking lessons, those Resistance missions, and any moment where he was lucky enough to have Felicity Rhiaon grace his life.

It wasn’t just her beauty, but her smirk, her sarcasm, her passion, her courage, or how she found hope in the darkness. It was those moments of vulnerability, or kindness, or sorrow, of hatred, of conviction, and everything in between. He didn’t agree with every opinion she had, or every aspect of her, but he adored her flaws and all.

She was broken, but still whole. She fought for what she believed in, and protected that which she loved. Felicity certainly had her flaws, but then again, so did he.
Felicity was just as messed up as him, as insane, and as fearless. She in every way she was either his match or his opposite. Their chemistry was effortless, and their connection deep. They balanced each other perfectly, making each other not only a better person, but wanting to be a better person in process. A person worthy of the other’s affection.

And Luke wanted to wake up every morning to her face beside his.

Looking upon her peaceful face, that day in the hospital, Luke Skywalker’s love forever changed. There was a truth he no longer could deny, nor did he want to fight it.

Luke Skywalker was in love with Felicity Rhiaon.

“I love you,” Luke whispered again, though she still did not stir. His words were a reverent prayer that he was terrified to utter. But now he had said them, and now he had made them true. Gently, he stroked a thumb over her cheek, stunned at his revelation. He was looking upon the face of the woman he loved, “I love you, Felicity Rhiaon.”

He knew this time was different; Felicity was more than just some run of the mill, can of soup girl. No, this time it was true love, epic love, unending love.

Felicity Rhiaon was his soulmate.

And he was never going to let her go.

11 Months, 4 Days

Han Solo was starting to get annoyed. For the past eight months, Luke Skywalker and Felicity Rhiaon had been making eyes at each other in the back of Han’s ship, and it was getting on his nerves. And he was not afraid of letting Luke know it.

Not that the idea of them as a couple irritated Han; in fact he was quite on board with the idea of Luke dating Felicity. She was a nice girl with just enough of an edge to her to make things interesting. Besides, she liked blasters better than lightsabers, and could exchange snarky banter with Han for hours… which actually happened on their last mission until Leia literally threw something at Han to shut them up.

What bugged Han was that the kid would never make his move.

It didn’t surprise Han. Back when Luke didn’t know Leia was his sister, he harbored an unspoken crush on her for three years without taking the next step.

Thank the Force for small miracles.

Luke refused to make his move though, hiding behind excuses of “it has to be the perfect moment” or “what if she rejects me?”

But it wasn’t like Luke had anything to be afraid of; the girl was clearly into him. They spent all the time possible together on mutual assignments, and they hung out regularly outside of the Resistance too. Felicity and Luke would find any excuse to spend time together. Luke would contact her constantly asking her opinion on one subject or another, or needing to share some exciting new fact or adventure. They would always ask the other to join them on off-planet trips, whether it be Luke recruiting a new Jedi, or Felicity’s work as a Senate emissary. Not to mention they had breakfast at Dex’s diner every single morning.
There was also the small fact that a few months ago, Leia and Felicity had a little misadventure on Endor where Felicity finally actually figured out that Luke was in love with her. Felicity had subsequently on a recent Resistance mission openly admitted to Han that she was in love with Luke.

… And started calling Han “Loud Mouth Solo,” after he had almost gotten them killed.

Of course, Han knew the reason why Luke had backed out from confessing his feelings. The whole FN-2187 incident had shaken Felicity, and Luke didn’t want to make his move until she had recovered from it. But that had been two months ago, and frankly, it was ridiculous that Luke and Felicity weren’t together yet.

They laughed, joked, talked, worked, played, worked out, and generally spent as much time together possible. They took long walks together, and spent late nights telling each other their life stories. Hell, Felicity had even bought herself a broken speeder to have Luke fix up to her place, and Felicity didn’t even know how to pilot one of Ben’s toy ships.

But Han finally drew the line when Felicity and Luke developed a new habit: finding any reason to touch one another. Felicity would fix the collar of Luke’s shirt, and Luke would grab her arm whenever they went into hyperspace. They had even taken to walking together arm in arm. Han didn’t walk arm in arm with Leia, and they had an eight-year-old kid together.

So, as the Falcon flew into hyperspeed once more – and Luke gently used an arm to hold Felicity back in her seat – Han snapped.

“Hey Fliss?” Han said.

“Yeah, Han?”

“You think Luke’s a good-looking kid, right?”

Luke’s head shot up, “What?”

“She thinks you’re cute. Right?”

Chewie growled something to Han, clearly trying to get him to back off the subject.

“Don’t worry, Chewie, I got this,” Han waved off the Wookiee before looking back at Felicity. “Got any plans tomorrow?”

“No.”

Luke – now crimson red – opened and shut his mouth a few times, struggling to overcome his embarrassment. Finally, Luke settled on a small nod.

“Good, it’s a date,” Han declared.

“Just one more question, Loud Mouth Solo,” Felicity shot him a look. “Do I get to talk to Luke on this date, or will you be doing that too?”
Han just laughed as he and Chewie exited the cockpit.

“I’m sorry about him,” Luke apologized as they were left alone together. “You don’t have to go through with this if you don’t want.”

Felicity grinned, “Are you kidding? I’ve had a dress sitting in my closet for three months that I bought for when you would finally cave and ask me out.”

“You- You do?”

“Honestly, Luke, it wasn’t some big secret. I’ve known since Leia and I’s little misadventure on Endor. I was going to wait another week before asking you out myself. Pick me up at six?”

“Uh… yeah. Six.”

“Great, see you tomorrow,” Felicity kissed Luke on the cheek and made her exit.

With a grin and a nod, Luke thought to himself, “Well, that turned out better than I thought it would.”

11 Months, 5 Days

They sat on the roof, staring up at the stars. Dinner had been nice enough, albeit a little odd. What were you supposed to say on a first date when you had already been friends for nearly a year? But the best part of the evening had to be when Luke suggested they go to the rooftop to stargaze and chat.

It had been Felicity’s request that Luke wear the outfit he had been wearing the day they met. The black shirt, brown pants, and gold jacket Leia had replicated from the medal ceremony after the Battle of Yavin.

The gold jacket was around Felicity’s shoulders, as was Luke’s arm. She rested her hand against his chest, soothed by the beating of his heart as they spoke in low voices. Felicity wore a dark red dress, low cut in the front with a sort of scooped slit on the short skirt. It was a dress that made Luke’s breath stop when he first saw her in it, and would permanently stay in Felicity’s closet as her de facto “I want to drive Luke wild” dress.

“Did you ever stargaze as a child?” Felicity asked.

“Sometimes,” Luke answered resting his head atop hers. “It wasn’t that safe to go outside with the Tusken Raiders, but I liked to look out at the distance and imagine the places I’d see when I finally got off Tatooine.”

“Oh, I bet you did.” Felicity chuckled, “I can see it now: you posed dramatically as you stare at the setting twin suns of Tatooine. An epic orchestra swelling in the background as you crave the life you wish you had, but accept you never will.”

Luke playfully nudged her, “You’re really lecturing me on being dramatic? Who’s the one who literally made a vow of revenge against Captain Phasma?”

“I will get her one day. I’ll make her pay for taking FN-2187 from me. Then I’ll find him and save him.”

“I know you will,” Luke chuckled. He pulled her in close, “What about you? Did you stargaze as a child?"

“My brother and I,” Felicity answered. “We would go up to the roof and make up our own constellations. That’s why this roof means so much to me. It helps remind me of the good times with Brendan… I miss him so much.”

“I wish I could have met him.”

Felicity smiled at Luke, “He would have loved you. …Given you a hard time about wanting to date me, but you would have gotten along so well. Father on the other hand, would have hated you.”

“In all fairness, I did kill him,” Luke pointed out. “I’m not sure what my aunt and uncle would have thought of you. They’d definitely be very wary of you, and beg me to reevaluate my life decisions. But Aunt Beru would have liked how you make me feel, and you probably would have really bugged Uncle Owen.”

“And I would have enjoyed bugging him.” Felicity paused, thinking over Luke’s words, “Your Aunt Beru would like how I make you feel?”

“Absolutely.”

“…How do I make you feel?”

Silence clung to the air.

Luke turned to face Felicity. Expectation riddled her face, coupled with fear; the fear of rejection, the fear of anticipation, and the fear of the strong feelings neither of them could deny. They both knew exactly how they felt about the other, and it was unspoken that those feelings were returned. But they needed to be spoken, to break the spell holding them back, and freeing them to move forward into that scary epic love story they knew was awaiting them.

The chance of happily ever after was staring them straight in the face… and it was up to them to take the chance.

She reached up and stilled his hand, “Luke.”

Luke’s heart felt like it was about to explode. He was so afraid, and yet had never been more excited in his life. The world felt right, the Force balanced. The universe was flawless when he held her in his arms.

He wasn’t going to let this opportunity pass him by.

“Felicity,” Luke took a long breath. “This might be too soon to say, but-”

“Say it,” Felicity whispered.

Luke looked deep into her eyes, “I love you.”

Felicity smiled, not that teasing smirk that constantly graced her face, but a true smile filled with utter joy, “I love you too, Luke Skywalker.”

She released his hand and placed hers on the side of his face. Felicity stroked his cheek with her thumb, and he let out a soft moan at the feeling.
Neither one could deny anymore how right it felt to have her skin against his. Her hazel eyes gazing into his sky-blue orbs. Her heart beating in harmony with his.

Luke wondered how it would feel to taste his lips against her.

“Felicity,” Luke whispered, tilting his head forward to rest against hers. The moment was perfect, desire and intimacy clung to the air. It felt all so right, like the millions of decisions they had made throughout their lives had all been leading to this one perfect moment.

“Luke,” Felicity breathed. “…Kiss me.”

He didn’t need to be asked twice. Luke placed his hand behind her head and pulled her lips to his.

It was perfection. Not the best kiss he had ever had – it would take some time for them to adjust to the other’s kissing pattern – but he had never had a kiss that felt so right. This was where he had always belonged, in Felicity Rhiaon’s arms and his lips against hers. Her lips were addicting; the taste intoxicating as he desperately scrapped to got more and more of her kiss.

She was enjoying it as much as him, her hands weaving in his hair, pulling him as hard against her as possible. Felicity moaned and pulled away, arching her neck. He trailed his mouth against her soft, supple neck, kissing, sucking – even gently biting a little – but made his way back up to her intoxicating lips.

For nearly an hour, they didn’t speak; they just reveled in each other’s touch and taste.

And as he enjoyed every single second of that landmark moment – the moment he first kissed his soulmate – Luke knew that he would never want to kiss anyone else.

Chapter End Notes

So the first flashback to Luke and Felicity discovering who Luke’s mother is is actually a bit of a longer story in which the Naberrie family resists the idea of officially verifying that Padmé is Luke and Leia’s mother. Basically, Pooja Naberrie asks that they keep it a family secret because they don’t want Padmé’s legacy to be "Vader’s wife" and she’s already remembered negatively as the woman who put Palpatine into power and the catalyst for the Clone Wars. Leia, of course does not take this idea sitting down and tells Pooja that if they don’t consent to a DNA test, she and Luke will sue them for the inheritance of their mother’s estate (which went to Padmé’s family) and the court will force a DNA test. The family argues a bit before Artoo finally reveals footage that proves that Padmé is their mother (as well as the fact that Artoo’s memory is intact) and Pooja agrees to arrange the DNA test.

If you would like to see that in a full version, let me know as I’m considering making it a short story of its own. It would be what I described to you, as well as probably a little addition of Luke and Leia meeting the Naberries, Luke struggling with the newfound information about Obi-Wan's role in Vader's suit, and Luke's conflicted feelings about suddenly having a new aunt and uncle, and having no memory of his mother and how much he really wants a connection to Padmé, plus his guilt over Anakin's role in Padmé’s death.

No guarantees I'll actually write it, but I'd like to hear if there's interest.
Part Three: Intimacy

Chapter Summary

Luke remembers the first time he and Felicity made love.

Chapter Notes

Welcome to the chapter where the more adult stuff starts kicking in. If you prefer a cleaner version, read the net version. If you want the smut, read the AO3 version. I highly recommend the AO3 version as I consider that the canon version, and things make more sense tone-wise if you understand what really went down in some of these cases (no pun intended.) Also, it’s my first time really writing smut and I’m rather proud of myself, so I want to share it.

Plus, this chapter is probably not going to make a lot of sense if you read the clean version.

And for those worried that this story is going to suddenly become all smut, all the time, this chapter with be the one with the most love scenes as it is the period of time where Luke and Felicity’s physical relationship develops. There will be other smut scenes in future chapters, but not as many as this chapter.

I’m just going to stop making promises about chapter lengths but surprise surprise, I had to split this one also in half… Actually, technically thirds as the love scenes took up so much space it made more sense to do one chapter that was about them becoming lovers, one about them dating, and one about them getting married. Why? Because the dirty version of this chapter is over 35k words aka over 80 pages long. Does this make up for not updating in a month?

Because, seriously, I have devoted over 50 hours to these three chapters, and they were just not getting done. Writing smut is surprisingly hard… pun not intended.

See the end of the chapter for more notes.

The Long Way Home

Chapter Twenty-Five

Part Three: Intimacy

Dedicated to my wonderful Emily, who has been my absolute rock throughout the story, especially through writing this chapter. Thank you for your support, feedback, and helping me accept that it’s okay to write some really naughty scenes.

11 Months, 19 Days
“You’re really okay with taking a couple weeks off work?” Luke asked Felicity as they gathered their bags from the ship. “I’m sure Nils isn’t too happy about it.”

“And how happy was he when you told him you went to Temple Village ten days early to help your boyfriend with preparations?” Luke teased.

Felicity smirked, “His exact words were ‘It’s about time you dated Skywalker. I’ve been calling this ever since you made him your emergency contact.’ And then Ceilara said ‘Seriously, what took you so long? If I had a shot with Luke Skywalker, I would have hopped at that right away.’”

“I think the same could be said the other way around,” a voice interrupted.

The pair turned to see Lando emerging from the cockpit to grab his own luggage.

It was Lando’s ship and he had accompanied them to Rornian since Luke’s X-Wing only – at the time – sat one. He had decided to join them because he claimed it made no sense to make Luke go from Coruscant to Cloud City, pick up the ship, return to Coruscant, pick up Felicity (she had work and couldn’t go to Cloud City with Luke), then go to Temple Village, when Lando was going to be on Rornian ten days later.

And no – he kept insisting – it had nothing to do with Alyla Kene. Okay, yes maybe that blue morning glory he has been caring for so delicately in his bag he brought to give to her, but that was only because they had talked one time about how they grew in the greenhouses of Cloud City, and Alyla wanted to see one, and why are you looking in my bag anyway?

“Honestly, Luke,” Lando chuckled, “what took you so long to take a shot with this fine, sophisticated, beautiful woman right here?”

“Normally I would be annoyed with Lando flirting with me like how he always does even when I’ve asked him to stop,” Felicity glared at Lando. “But I have to admit he has a point. Why did it take you so long to ask me out, Luke? You know I’ve made it no secret that I have been physically attracted to you from the moment we met, and the mental and emotional connection came so easily… Look, I’m just saying, we probably should have been sleeping together for at least seven months by now. Heck, we even used to talk about getting dinner or drinks when we first started hanging out. Why didn’t you ever decide to make your move then?”

“I did try,” Luke smirked, trying not to get distracted by Felicity’s flippant comment about them making love. “I was going to do it, Felicity. I was prepared to ask you out, and even began the sentence to do so.”

Felicity frowned, “Why did you stop?”

“Because your boyfriend you never told me about was going to be at your apartment in an hour.”

Felicity’s eyes widened, “Oh my God. You were going to ask me out then?”

“Had a whole speech prepared.”

“Why didn’t you give it?”

“You don’t actually think I’m the kind of guy who would declare my attraction to a woman in a relationship?”
“I’d only been dating him, what? Three weeks?”

Lando looked between the pair, “I’ll let you two work this out and see if anyone’s come to greet the ship.”

Lando knew when to make a quick exit.

“I can’t believe it!” Felicity’s arms were crossed and she was shaking her head. If Felicity was mad, Luke knew it was directed at her own self, “You let me waste my time with some airheaded podracer!”

“Well, I didn’t date him for his brains. He was just a handsome piece of arm candy who let me run off and do my own thing whenever I wanted. I’m not even sure we were in an exclusive relationship.”

Luke paused, “So… Is that what you’re looking for in this relationship? A nice face and someone you can drop and pick up again as easily as a book?”

Felicity’s eyes widened, and Luke was surprised at the flash of fear that surged in the Force.

“No,” Felicity shook her head quickly. She had gone very rigid, “No, Luke, I-”

“I’m not looking for a fling,” Luke said plainly. “I love you, Felicity Rhiaon. I have fallen desperately, hopelessly in love with you… but I’m not some… pull out couch to be used when the occasion arises. I’ve had my fun, but now I’m looking for something serious, and if that’s not what you’re looking for-”

“It is,” Felicity grabbed his arm. Shining hazel eyes stared out into his own blue orbs, something more than love reflected in them, “I didn’t know it when I met you, or even know that I was searching, but you are exactly what I’ve been looking for. You’re handsome, brave, kind, like my sardonic nature, but call me out when I step over the line. You have my back, and trust me to have yours. And your love is fathomless, for me, for your family, for everyone. I don’t even come within an inch of deserving you.”

“No,” Luke placed a hand on her cheek. “I’m the one who doesn’t deserve you. You’re Rogue One. You were kicking ass and risking your life for a greater cause for years before I even got my act together. While you were shooting Sith Lords in the chest on the Death Star, I was home playing with model ships and worrying about power convertors. Everything I am is because of you, and nothing more than a pale imitation of your greatness. Even my elite squadron of pilots was named to honour your accomplishments.”

Felicity laughed, “Did Diego have anything to do with the naming of your Squad?”

“No, actually… Mon Mothma named it. She told me that the Council had selected the name for our greatest pilots to honour our greatest soldiers… and like the fool I am, I never thought to look into it further.”

“Well, in your defense, you were juggling Jedi studies without a teacher and being the Commander of the Rebellion’s most elite squadron of pilots at the time.” She reached up and played with a lock of his hair, “And you’re no fool.”

Luke pressed his forehead against hers and whispered, “I’m a fool for not making you mine the second I laid eyes on you.”
“Oh Luke,” Felicity chuckled, “Yes you were. But I think you’ll soon find that it’s not me who belongs to you… rather that it’s you who belongs to me.”

“I can be yours,” Luke ghosted his lips over hers.

“Don’t be a tease.”

“I’m not.”

Felicity gasped as her back suddenly hit the wall. Luke’s hands were in her hair, his lips on her own, and his tongue in her mouth. She moaned and arched her back, rubbing her small breasts against his broad chest, stimulating herself. Her hands wove into his hair, pulling him in as closely to her as possible.

“Luke!” Felicity gasped as his mouth moved from her lips down to suckle her neck.

“Felicity,” Luke breathed into her neck, finding a particularly sensitive spot on Felicity’s body: the skin perpendicularly beneath her earlobe. He gave a dark chuckle, as she whimpered under his touch, “I’m yours, Felicity. My heart, my soul… yours. But you’ll soon find that there are certain cases-”

Felicity yelped as Luke yanked down the straps of her top and bra. His lips caressed the newly bared skin and begin trailing down towards the breast threatening exposure.

“Where you’re mine,” Luke grinned as Felicity panted heavily. He could feel the buzz of emotions in her mind, and the dull throb of lust that threatened to take charge. “With your consent, of course.”

“Yes, yes,” Felicity panted. “A thousand times yes. Just please don’t stop.”

Luke chuckled, “Then who am I to disappoint you?”

His hands were on her, touching her, tasting her, memorizing every inch of her skin and mapping it in his mind. She was warm and her skin soft, though athletically muscular. While not muscular to the extent of himself – you had to have pretty good biceps if part of Jedi training involved one armed handstands – her arms and thighs were strong. Luke wondered what it would feel like to have those thighs wrapped around his hips.

It was what he had been imagining for the past two weeks since they had started to date… or maybe it was slightly longer than when they started dating. Maybe there were a few occasions he had thought of it before.

Like the middle of the night when his bed was cold, and he knew she was only a few floors below him in her own bed. When he wondered if she was having the same thoughts about him, and doing the same things to herself with those thoughts that he was doing to himself. Only he wished it was her hands in place of his, tangled in the sheets beside him where he would gladly return the favor.

Or like those mornings on the rooftop before their run when Felicity would stretch. The way she arched her back, her breasts thrusting into the air. Or when she would bend over right in front of him wearing those tight, black spandex workout pants that hugged her curves just right. Those pants that just made him want to grab her hips and-“Someone’s getting excited,” Felicity chuckled, her laugh breaking his thoughts. Seductively, she ran her hands over his hips, slightly down into his pants and pulled out his shirt. She slid her hands underneath the fabric and watched Luke throw his head back as her hands traced the lines of his abs. Felicity tilted her head to the side and coyly asked, “Am I doing that to you? Making you hard against me?”

“It’s not the first time,” Luke grinned. He leaned in and whispered in her ear, “And it won’t be the last.”

He gripped her hips and pulled them forward, grinding her most sensitive spot against his.

Felicity gave that throaty moan again, and then growled, “Get your lips back on me now, Skywalker.”

Luke didn’t need to be asked twice.

“What in the Seven Corellian Hells!” Obik Kenu suddenly exclaimed behind them.

Luke and Felicity froze. Their lips were on each other, and their bodies tangled in a rather inappropriate display.

“Please tell me you just sense two people behind us,” Felicity whispered.

Quickly, Luke and Felicity untangled themselves, and turned to see their audience. Luke had to tuck his shirt back in his pants, while Felicity pulled back up her bra and shirt straps.

Standing in the ship, absolutely dumbstruck was their greeting party: a shocked Obik Kenu, a fuming Reine Agim, a grinning Gavyn Kene, a raised browed Zena Halcorr, a rather jealous looking Tyla Kinall, and a barely holding back a giggle Alyla Kene, who was standing rather close to a very proud looking Lando Calrissian.

“I’m sorry about the display, everyone,” Luke hurriedly smoothed out his clothing. “I got a little carried away.”

“Carried away?” Reine exclaimed. “Luke, what the hell was that?”

Gavyn chuckled, “Yeah, I mean, I know you two are friends, but don’t you think you’re getting a little too friendly?”

“I’m just happy we decided not to bring Miri,” Zena shook her head. “I wasn’t planning on giving her that talk anytime soon.”

“Yeah, and considering our whole cross species thing, that’s a long talk,” Gavyn added.

Luke sighed and looked at Felicity.

“I take it you didn’t tell them?” Felicity asked.

Luke shrugged, “I didn’t think it was going to be this big a deal.”

“Tell us what?” Tyla demanded.
Luke glanced at Tyla, then took a subtle, protective step in front of Felicity. Tyla couldn’t Force Choke Felicity if Luke was standing in the way. And considering Tyla had been taught to choke people from Vader himself, better safe than sorry.

“I didn’t want to make this into a big deal so close to the wedding,” Luke began, “but… Felicity and I have started to date.”

Silence filled the ship for a long moment as all eyes turned on Felicity.

And then all at the same time:

“Called it!” Obik yelled.

“It’s about damn time!” Gavyn exclaimed.

“ Took you long enough!” Alyla laughed.

“They do make a lovely couple,” Lando playfully nudged Alyla.

“I’m never going to have a shot with you, am I?” Tyla groaned.

“Wait, you weren’t already dating?” Zena frowned.

But Reine still remained silent… and angry.

Luke frowned, “Reine, what’s wrong?”

The look on Reine’s face was deadly, and her arms were crossed.

“You’ve started to date Felicity?” Reine’s voice was cold. “When?”

“Reine—”

“When?” Reine demanded.

Luke sighed and glanced back at Felicity. Of all the people he expected to object to his relationship with Felicity, Reine had never even been a mile close to the list.

“Damn it,” Reine whispered as Obik took a cautious step towards her. She yelled as Obik gently grasped her wrist, ready to pull her away from Luke and Felicity, “DAMN IT, LUKE!”

Luke scowled, trying not to let his anger flare up, “Reine, what is the problem? I thought you liked Felicity.”

“I do,” Reine replied. “The problem is…”

Reine exchanged a look with Obik. Some understanding rippled through the group as a series of looks were shot between various people.

Reine sighed, “…I had next week in the pool.”

Luke’s jaw dropped, “You had a betting pool on when I would date Felicity?”
“Of course we did,” Reine dismissed. “We always have pools like this. We’ve got another going on what’s going to happen with those two.”

Reine pointed back at Alyla and Lando. They exchanged an awkward look, and then took a step away from each other. Unfortunately, Lando’s step made him bump right into Gavyn, who had a none too pleased look on his face on the topic of a betting pool concerning the love life of his formerly enslaved and abused twin sister.

“I can’t believe it,” Reine shook her head. “Three weeks. You couldn’t have waited three more weeks? What even prompted this?”

“You are not going to believe it,” Felicity laughed. “Han actually asked me out for Luke.”

At the same time, jaws dropped, eyes went wide, and faces went pale.

“Han?” Reine exclaimed. “Han asked out Felicity for you?”

“That cheating bastard,” Gavyn shook his head. “I can’t believe that guy would sink so low.”

“What are you talking about?” Felicity asked.

Reine sighed, “Han had two weeks ago in the pool… He just won himself a hundred credits.”

“So, Han didn’t ask me out for you to help kick start our relationship because we were so in love with each other and just needed a push?” Felicity exclaimed, “He did it to win a hundred credits?”

“Yes,” Zena nodded.

Luke gritted his teeth, “I am going to kill him.”

That night was the first time Luke and Felicity shared a bed… as a couple anyway. There had been a night several weeks ago where they had been forced to share a bed. It was the typical mission gone wrong and we have to spend the night on a strange planet waiting for rescue in the morning, and what do you mean there’s only one room with one bed left available in this inn, and good Gods, no I’m not going to sleep on the floor, do you see the state of it, so I guess we have to share this bed, and no this isn’t awkward at all with our unspoken sexual tension.

Han had actually been so annoyed at Luke that he didn’t try anything – Luke wanted his relationship to start with Felicity in a romantic way and not with a hookup – that the next morning, Han had asked out Felicity for Luke.

The plan was as always for Luke to stay in Reine’s spare bedroom – which was basically Luke’s bedroom at this point – in the days leading up to the wedding. Originally Felicity was going to stay at Obik’s place – Lando was staying with Alyla and Gavyn was quite unamused – and then on the wedding night, Obik and Reine would spend the night at Obik’s house, and Felicity would come sleep in Reine’s room at her house.

After walking in on Luke and Felicity’s make out session, it was quickly decided that it just made sense for Felicity to stay in Luke’s room for the duration of the visit.
“You don’t mind?” Felicity asked as she and Luke unpacked their bags into a small dresser.

“Hey, if I can share a bed with you as just friends, I can do it as your boyfriend.”

“As I recall it, we didn’t really share that bed as just friends. You were pressed up pretty close to me.”

“It was cold,” Luke blushed. “We decided to sleep close for the body heat.”

“It wasn’t that cold,” Felicity gave him that one corner smirk he loved.

Luke grinned, then pointed to each dresser drawer, “From top to bottom, the drawers are tops, bottoms, pyjamas, then underwear, socks, belts and other such miscellaneous. You can put shoes, dresses, coats, and anything that needs to be hung in the closet. And if you’re not comfortable with putting your underwear in a place I can see, I’m sure Reine can find a hat in her closet or something.”

Felicity paused from unpacking her dress for the wedding out of her bag on the bed, “I’m sorry?”

“Nothing,” Luke winced, not meaning to have made a big deal out of it. “Just, you know, comfort levels and all.”

Felicity hung her dress up in the closet, and crossed back to her suitcase, “Luke, you just dry humped me against a wall in front of your Jedi friends-”

“They walking in wasn’t planned.”

“But it stands; you just dry humped me against a wall… What makes you think I’m afraid of you seeing my underwear?”

Luke dug his fingernails into his palms, trying to control himself as Felicity mischievously laid out two weeks worth of bras and panties on the bed. They were all matching… and lacy… and cut seductively… and…

And he was going to need a fresher very soon if she kept this up.

Not only did she unpack two week’s worth of sexy undergarments, but she also unpacked four silky, almost transparent night gowns, and one black get up that was definitely for the bedroom, but absolutely not for sleeping.

“Does any of this make you uncomfortable?” Felicity challenged. He could sense that she was testing the waters.

“Yes,” Luke confessed stiffly, “but in a very different way.”

Felicity smirked and let her eyes drift down, “I can see that.”

His mouth felt dry. He took a step forward, his arms outstretched slightly, lust pulsing in the air.

“Felicity-”

“LUKE!” Reine’s voice called from the hall. “Doctor Kalonia’s here! She needs to go over inventory with you!”

“Coming,” Luke called. He looked back at Felicity and apologized, “I’m so sorry.”
“It’s okay,” Felicity nodded. “Duty calls. Do you want me to finish all the packing?”

Felicity laughed as he made a quick exit.

“I love this,” Felicity moaned that night as they laid in bed together, Luke’s arms wrapped around her in the way that would become so familiar. “I could lie in your arms forever.”

“I don’t know how I’ve ever slept without you in them,” Luke sighed, nuzzling her neck. He wanted to trail a hand across her bare shoulder, but Felicity had chosen to wear a long-sleeved pyjama top and pants rather than one of her nightdresses. “Nothing has ever felt so right in my life.”

The moment was perfect as they held each other, sleep slowly creeping upon them. Silence filled the room, not out of awkwardness but simply that nothing needed to be said.

“I love you,” Felicity whispered, darkness casting shadows over them. She was snuggled into his side, always sleeping on her side, while Luke was the kind of man who slept flat on his back. It allowed for a nice bit of intimacy.

“I love you too,” Luke murmured, his eyes feeling heavy. “Now close your eyes and sleep.”

“I’m not tired.”

For a long time, there was silence, and Luke figured that Felicity must have followed his instructions. After what must have been nearly an hour, Luke felt Felicity shift next to him. It roused him slightly, having not yet fallen into deep sleep, but Luke was so tired that he felt no need to open his eyes. Felicity was probably just shifting in her sleep.

Okay, maybe she was awake. But there was no need to reply; she was just probably checking to see if she woke him. Felicity made no further inquiry, and Luke was certain that was the end of it.

Then a few minutes later, he heard the panting. It was rhythmic and throaty. Occasionally, Felicity would let out a small moan. Then he could hear something wet, a sort of familiar squelching noise, and the panting picked up in pace.

Confused, Luke cracked an eye open. It was enough that Luke could see, but indiscernible enough that Felicity shouldn’t be able to see he was watching her.

She was lying on her back, her head thrown back on the pillow. One hand was pawing at her clothing clad breasts, and Luke could barely make out their pointed tips through the darkness. The blanket was pulled up to the end of her ribcage, and it was oddly tented in two perpendicular spots. Her knees, Luke realized. Her legs were spread wide… and something was moving frantically under the blanket between them.

It hit Luke at the same time the wet, heated smell did.

Felicity was touching herself… and thinking about him as she did so.
He was iron hard in an instant.

Luke considered revealing that he was awake; maybe he could join her. Yes, that’s what he wanted so much, to be on top of her, his hips making that movement under the blanket, his cock replacing the finger sliding in and out of her wet passage. To peel that shirt off her body and show those pert breasts some real attention. To see just how pointed her nipples could get as his tongue and teeth ran over them.

But it was too risky. What if she stopped when he revealed he was awake? What if she was embarrassed about masturbating next to Luke as he slept, his name on her lips? Reaching in the Force, he could sense how close she was to climax, and he didn’t want to take that from her.

It took all of Luke’s strength not to wake her, or even reach down to his pulsing cock, and stroke himself to the seductive image of Felicity pleasing herself. But he did watch her; he couldn’t tear his eyes from the incredibly sexy sight of Felicity Rhiaon, skin flushed, breath ragged, eyes squeezed shut, furiously pumping her fingers – how many did she have in her? One? Two? Three? – into her wet passage.

She was given over to passion, and there was no doubt that she was thinking of Luke. Not only was she softly panting his name, but every now and then she would look over at him. Felicity would gently bite her bottom lip, her eyes roaming over his bare chest – he wore no shirt that night – and the squelching would get louder as her fingers pumped herself faster.

Was she also thumbing her clit? Circling it? Teasing it with every pump? Luke wished he could just pull back the blanket at see. Yet, the mystery of the unseen turned on Luke even more. No doubt there was another tent in the blanket; this one between his own thighs.

But the best part was when she would touch him. They were brief, hesitant touches; ones Felicity knew she shouldn’t make. Yet she couldn’t seem to help it as occasionally she would risk a touch. Ghosting a hand down his abs, twining her legs with his, and his absolute favorite move of all.

Emboldened by the proximity of her orgasm, Felicity pulled her fingers out of her heated tenderness. She had a wicked look in her eyes, and drew her glistening fingers gently across his lips.

Luke almost came then and there.

“There,” Felicity grinned, her fingers diving back under the covers and back into her passage. “Now, you’re going to wake with the taste of me on your lips. I taste good, don’t I?”

She did. So good that it took all of Luke’s strength not to pin her to the bed and dive his tongue into her throbbing quim until her legs were locked around his head and she was screaming his name.

“I bet your tongue would feel great between my legs,” Felicity whimpered as her hand furiously thrust under the sheet. “You would lick me, and taste me, and curl inside of me, and thrust faster than my fingers, and show me what a real man’s tongue can do. OH, FUCK! LUKE!”

Felicity hunched forward, her body clenching and clasping around the hand inside of her, holding it in place as she rode out her orgasm, his name on her lips.

When the last aftershocks subsided, she just sat there panting, fingers still buried inside of her. After a minute, she fell back onto the mattress and pulled her fingers out of her cunt. Then she started the laugh.

“I know you’re awake, Luke.”
Luke reluctantly opened his eyes and found her staring at him and laughing.

“Oh, Luke,” Felicity rolled onto her side and stroked her fingers across his chest. He couldn’t ignore the wet trail a few of them were leaving behind. “Did you enjoy the show?”

“You are going to be the death of me,” Luke said simply.

“Good.” Felicity grinned and kissed him. Before he could grab her head to pull her in closer, Felicity had pulled back and was climbing out of bed, “Now, if you’ll excuse me, I have to run to the fresher. Masturbating under the covers in front of your boyfriend is sexy, but getting a UTI is certainly not. Oh. Before I forget.”

Luke frowned as Felicity slid back under the sheet. She wriggled for a moment, then pulled something out. A moment later her pyjama bottoms were on the floor, and panties were lying on his chest. They were purple, lacy, and damp, infused with the musky feminine scent of sex. Luke stared at them in amazement, and then his eyes flicked up at Felicity.

She was of course giving that one corner smirk, hands on hips, and eyes filled with mischief. Her pyjama top was just barely covering her quim from sight, but he could see something wet, shining on her thighs in the moonlight.

“You can use my panties if you need a little help getting that under control,” Felicity openly stared at his erection tenting the covers. “And yes, I am not wearing anything under this top, so my cunt is completely unprotected from any potential intrusion. Yes, I am extremely wet, horny, and turned on by the sight of your shirtless torso. And yes, I am quite turned on by the image of you sneaking into the fresher after me, bending me over the sink, and having your way with me… But somehow, I think Reine might not be too happy if we did that. Shame really. We’ll have to do that sometime after we get back to Coruscant. My sink’s at a pretty good height for that, but I supposed we can do it at your place too.”

Luke just stared at Felicity, “What have I gotten myself into with you?”

Felicity grinned, “You have no idea.”

And with that, she sauntered out of the room.

Luke’s head hit the pillow and he stared up at the roof. The scent of Felicity’s slick desire staining the panties on his chest, overwhelmed his nostrils.

What was this woman doing? She was driving him insane. First grinding against him on the ship, then displaying not only her sexy underwear to him – forcing him to imagine how they would look on her – but revealing she had brought lingerie with herself to Rornian, and now masturbating in front of him, giving him her wet panties, and teasing him with images of fucking her over a sink?

The answer was very clear.

Before this visit to Rornian was over, Luke Skywalker was going to have sex with Felicity Rhiaon.

11 Months, 29 Days

“…and from that first day when we joined the Rebellion and got paired together in fight training orientation… and you totally kicked my ass, I knew you were the one,” Obik grinned as he recited his vows to Reine in the Meditation Gardens, surrounded by their friends and family (even if that family only consisted of Reine’s sister.) “I only dreamed of this day when you would have some impossible moment of stupidity where you thought marrying me would actually be a good idea.”

Reine raised a brow at him, “You know the marriage isn’t finalized yet, Obik? I could still back out.”

“Love you,” Obik said quickly, flashing his most charming grin.

Reine smiled and shook her head.

“Reine Agim,” Obik continued, “I vow that until the day I die, I will love you, and will always have your back. I will be there in good times and bad, there to support you through any challenge the Force makes us face, whether it be death, disagreement, or even the Dark Side. Reine Agim, you kicked my ass seventeen years ago, you kick my ass to this day, and I look forward to you kicking my ass for the rest of my life.”

Luke, who had been granted the honor of officiating the ceremony, smiled at the pair, “Now that Obik and Reine have declared their vows to this marriage, they will exchange rings as a token of their love and symbol of their eternal bond.”

Obik and Reine’s wedding was the first legal one between two members of the Jedi Order (two years later, Gavyn and Zena accidentally discovered that their marriage hadn’t been legal, leading to a hasty re-dedication ceremony.) As such, the Order had to come up with their own version of a ceremony.

One aspect of the ceremony had all the members stand on either side of the bride and groom. The rings were held by the two people at the end of each line – Shar’vida and Davarl in this case – and it would be passed down from member to member, each Jedi blessing whichever ring was passed to them, until the rings were handed to Luke in the center.

The “blessing” of the ring was simply saying “May the Force Bless This Bond” and shifting some of the Force around the ring into it, so that the rings were imbued heavily with it when they reached the bride and groom. When the rings got to Luke, he too “blessed” the rings, then used the Force to bond the rings together in the same way a Jedi bonded with their lightsaber upon its completion.

As the rings were passed down the line, Luke let his eyes drift among the guests. Ben was up on the raised platform with Luke and the other Jedi, standing in Obik’s line. Han, Leia, Chewie, and Lando had all been invited (though Reine had threatened to kick Han out after the betting pool revelation,) but chose not to sit too close to the front. While they all were friendly to Luke’s second and third in commands, the only time they spent together with the couple sans Luke was Han, Lando, Chewie, and Reine’s monthly Sabacc game (which Alyla had been recently tagging along to even though she played so terribly that she insisted Lando help her every time… Though Han and Reine had a theory about that.)

But it wasn’t his family Luke was looking for in the crowd, but rather the woman who had stolen his heart.

Felicity was sitting closer to the front, among the groom’s guests. She was sitting next to Nils Arlos and the other former Recruiters Obik had worked with in his Rebel days.

She looked stunning; wide smile, simple makeup, a sleek black dress that fell just past her knees and had a golden zipper partway down her front to just underneath her breasts, and her brown hair was elegantly styled in an intricate updo resembling a bun. Honestly, Felicity Rhiaon spent at least 70% of her existence wearing a bun, so it didn’t surprise Luke.

Felicity looked so beautiful, and Luke was ecstatic that she was here with him. The last time she had been to a celebration on Rornian, Luke had been with Calla, and Felicity with Drystan. Luke wished he could go back to the day of the Jedi Temple’s official opening and share it with her, rather than with her… plus two significant others they were forced to be with while subconsciously longing for each other.

It no longer mattered; Luke Skywalker was in love with Felicity Rhiaon, and he didn’t care what anyone thought.

But that didn’t mean he didn’t feel the eyes on him. They weren’t of an audience member watching him officiate the ceremony, they were angry eyes, burning with rage as he watched Felicity.

Those eyes belonged to one of the Jedi standing on the platform, named Cade Ren.

Cade was nineteen and had joined Luke’s Order when he was sixteen. Cade had very much the mindset of the ends justify the means, and vaguely Luke wondered if Cade had some sort of connection to the Empire in his past. Cade would often clash with Luke over his ideas of right and wrong, and Cade definitely took a more grey approach to the whole Jedi thing.

Honestly, Luke was even reluctant to take on Cade in the first place, but Luke had a policy that anyone who wanted to learn was welcome in Temple Village. If he hadn’t turned away Tyla Kinall who still didn’t exactly agree that the Sith had been a bad thing – undoing her brainwashing was slow going for Luke – he wasn’t about to turn away Cade.

There were three things about Cade that made him particularly dangerous: first was his view that using the Dark Side wasn’t actually a bad thing. Second was how skilled he was in lightsaber combat. Luke had actually barred him from building his own saber until Cade proved to him that he wouldn’t be dangerous to the other Jedi with it.

But the third thing was that Cade could be quite charming when he wanted too. As such, he had gathered himself a little posse of the younger students in Temple Village.

Bakura Tarven was his second in command, equally as dangerous with a lightsaber, and there to agree with anything Cade said. Bakura had strong notions of who deserved Force powers, and been very much against accepting Zena’s group of freed slaves into the Order.

Zhane Varss was definitely the group’s muscle, and was one of the few in Temple Village who could take on Luke in practice combat. Zhane didn’t play fair, and often Luke had to chew him out for using dirty tricks like distractions and feigning surrender only to deal a last-minute blow. But Zhane also didn’t blindly agree with Cade, and often would call out his stupidity or arrogance.

Jake Comarila was a small, skinny kid with no mind of his own. Scared to death of the other boys, and unable to make decisions for himself, Jake blindly followed whatever Cade wanted. Even if it meant defying Luke, Jake always did what Cade demanded of him.

Luke glanced over at Cade who had sternly passed Obik’s ring to Ben for blessing. Luke never liked Cade influencing Ben, and wondered why they had been placed together in line. He met Cade’s burning gaze, and could feel the anger in the Force.

Discretely, Luke shook his head at Cade, and sent his thought through the Force.

Not now.

But Cade wasn’t about to let it go.

I’ve heard the rumours, Master Skywalker. Have you really taken up with Rhiaon?
Now is not the time, Cade.

Are you sleeping with Rhiaon?

... No, at the moment I am not sleeping with Felicity Rhiaon. We are dating.

That's even worse. You can’t take up with a woman like her. A faithless, non-sensitive. Do us all a favor, Skywalker, sleep with her a few times, use up the pleasure you desire of her, and then drop her. You're too powerful to waste your blood on mating with the likes of her. Take up with Tyla Kinall or Brinna Tharen, and forget this road of folly.

This discussion is over, Cade.

For now?

Forever.

“May the Force Bless This Bond,” a pair of female voices – those of Tyla and Brinna who stood closest to Obik and Reine respectively – came from either side of Luke. He suddenly found the rings being offered to him, which reinforced Luke’s ending of conversation with Cade as the attention of the ceremony turned back to Luke.

Shaking off the hostile words about his relationship with Felicity, Luke was overjoyed to complete the marriage ceremony of his closest and oldest students.

“Obik Kenu,” Luke turned to the groom, “do you vow to take this woman as your wife? To remain loyal, respectful, her partner and equal in all things? Keep her first and foremost in your heart, and vow to love, support, and protect her until your dying breath?”

“I do,” Obik’s words had no hesitation.

“Reine Agim,” Luke repeated his query, “do you vow to take this man as your husband? To remain loyal, respectful, his partner and equal in all things? Keep him first and foremost in your heart, and vow to love, support, and protect him until your dying breath?”

There was a sense of relief among all those gathered to watch the ceremony. Obik and Reine’s marriage was a long time coming, and all were happy to see them finally give in to the love that had been just out of their reach for so long.

And as Luke observed the absolute love and joy in the eyes of his friends, all he could think was how happy he was that he decided to allow attachment, marriage, and overall love in his Jedi Order.

Luke smiled, “Obik, please place your ring on Reine’s finger and repeat these words: With this ring, I, Obik Kenu bond my life to yours as it is bonded to the Force. For this day, for all days, and for beyond my end day.”

“With this ring, I, Obik Kenu,” Obik slid the ring onto Reine’s finger, “bond my life to yours as it is bonded to the Force. For this day, for all days, and for beyond my end day.”

Luke turned to Reine, “Reine, please place your ring on Obik’s finger and repeat these words: With this ring, I, Reine Agim bond my life to yours as it is bonded to the Force. For this day, for all days, and for beyond my end day.”
“With this ring, I, Reine Agim,” Reine’s hand shook as she slid the ring onto Obik’s finger, “bond my life to yours as it is bonded to the Force. For this day, for all days, and for beyond my end day.”

“Still sure you don’t want to back out?” Obik winked at her.

Reine grinned and clasped her left hand with his, “Never.”

“Then, by the power vested in me by the choosing of this Jedi Order, and the Government of the New Republic, I now pronounce you husband and wife.” Luke grinned at Reine, “Reine, you may kiss the groom.”

And the hall laughed and cheered as Reine did just that.

“To Obik Kenu!” Felicity raised her glass to toast Obik at the reception with the rest of the former Rebellion Recruiters. “You finally wore her down!”

“To Obik!” Everyone cheered and clinked glasses.

“Thanks, Everyone,” Obik just shook his head and took a drink.

“You Rebel Recruiters sure are an interesting bunch,” Luke was at Felicity’s side, his arm lovingly wrapped around her waist.

“You don’t know the half of it,” Felicity smirked that one corner, upturned smirk Luke loved so much.

Luke grinned at Felicity, “You know, I’m really glad we’re dating now.”

“Why’s that?”

“Because now I can kiss that smirk right off your face,” Luke gave a husky whisper.

Felicity yelped in surprise when Luke suddenly grabbed the back of her head and crushed his lips against hers. It wasn’t the soft, tender kisses they had been sharing as of late, but rather that hungering kiss he had given her ten days previous as he had slammed her against the wall of the ship.

Luke and Felicity had not yet consummated their relationship, but the sexual tension that clung to the air was abundant. They had spent nearly a year developing their emotional and mental relationship. Now it was time to explore their physical one. There was no doubt in Luke’s mind that it would have the same sort of instant chemistry that had accompanied their friendship and romance, but he had yet to find an opportunity to prove that theory.

“Get a room,” Drexel Orunitia laughed causing Luke and Felicity to come back to reality and break apart. “But truly, Kenu, it’s been a long time coming for you and Reine.”

“Well, that’s why Kenu was such a good recruiter,” Nils Arlos said, “he never did give up on a good thing. That’s why he had the best success rate of any of you.”

“I thought it was because he had the Force,” Talanis Leentro rested her arm on his shoulder. “Gave him that extra edge.”

“Whatever helps you sleep at night, Leentro,” Gren Roscoe smirked over the rim of his champagne. “It’s not Kenu’s fault your numbers were so low.”
“If I was so bad at recruiting, why did Arlos keep me on the team?” Talanis challenged.

“We needed someone to pilot our ships,” Ceilara Keseg teased.

“Didn’t stop us from getting boarded,” Obik said in a voice that sounded like he was trying to pretend it was a mutter, but really wanted everyone to hear exactly what he had said.

“Oh, God no,” Drexel shook his head, “we’re not telling the ‘sixteen-year-old Felicity Rhiaon talked two Stormtroopers into joining us instead of arresting the Batch she was picked up in’ story again.”

“I’ll tell you later,” Felicity promised.

“Besides, we’ve got other things to talk about.” Sarli Kahn nudged Felicity, “When’s your wedding? Think you and Skywalker are going to also have it here?”

Felicity choked on her champagne.

“Oh, for the love of—” Felicity rolled her eyes, “I’ve been dating Luke for a month. Let’s not start picking out wedding presents just yet.”

“Speaking of,” Gren looked around, “can I go in on a gift with someone? I’m really drawing a blank as to what to get them.”

“Really?” Obik asked. “Reine and I figured it out months ago.”

Luke groaned, dropping his head into his hands.

“That’s it!” Felicity threw her hands in the air. “I’m going to go talk to Leia! Somebody sensible, who hasn’t already started planning my future wedding.”

The group chuckled as Felicity stormed off, but Luke had an uneasy expression on his face.

Luke looked at Obik, “Has Leia—”

“Already looking at florists,” Obik smirked. “I think she’s fond of the one we used.”

“Of course she is,” Luke shook his head and took another sip of his drink.

He turned his focus to the dance floor for a moment. Zena and Gavyn were awkwardly stepping to the music, more out of obligation to dance than actual desire to do so. Lando was twirling Reine across the room in an impressive display Obik could never dream of doing (Obik had never been the greatest dancer.) But Lando’s eyes weren’t on the bride; they kept trailing over to the scarred beauty that had somehow managed to convince Ben to dance with her.

“I can’t believe how tall that kid is,” Obik raised a brow as he and Luke watched Alyla and Ben.

“You’re positive he’s only seven?”

“Last time I checked,” Luke shrugged. “So, have we gotten a read on the whole Lando/Alyla situation and if I should be afraid of Gavyn murdering Lando?”

“No on both counts,” Obik replied. “I don’t even think Alyla and Lando know what’s going on with them. All I know is that Alyla keeps making those trips to Bespin to be his plus one to various formal dinners. She says she likes doing it to see more of the world and experience the things she never could before… But let’s not pretend there isn’t something going on after dinner ends.”
“And Gavyn?”

“He says as long as Calrissian treats Alyla with respect and she gives full consent, it’s not his place to interfere. Considering he’s married to a woman who once legally owned him, Gavyn doesn’t really have a leg to stand on objecting to Alyla’s interest in Lando. Nor does he seem to have the desire to interfere with Alyla’s love life… or whatever they have.”

“Wish I had a twin like that,” Luke sighed. “You know that Leia originally thought that Felicity was only going to be interested in a fling with me, and actually tried to warn her off when they ended up stranded on Endor together a few months back?”

“No kidding,” Obik said.

“Ended up actually making Felicity realize she was in love with me.”

Obik smiled, “You know… I’m really happy you and Fliss got together. I’ve known her since she was sixteen, and boy has that girl gone through some messed up things.”

“Yeah, she told me about her mother dying, and her father betraying her, and the whole Brendan thing.”

“Oh, what happened with Brendan was awful. I was actually the one scheduled to pick him up, but… Well, you know what happened. I swear, if I ever meet that Third Sister Inquisitor, I’m not sure I can be responsible for my actions. I saw so many people destroyed by that bombing, and not just the ones who died.”

Luke’s eyes couldn’t help but flick over to Tyla Kinall; he was the only person she had confessed her former identity to. Of course, both Felicity and Diego knew she was a former Imperial and close with Vader, having actually encountered her during Operation Citadel, but they didn’t know her former Inquisitor role.

“Why Third Sister specifically?” Luke asked, carefully looking away from Tyla before Obik caught on that something was wrong.

“She’s the only person living who was involved in the conspiracy,” Obik explained. “Apparently after the last few Jedi died about a year before Yavin, Vader killed all the Inquisitors, but spared Third Sister because she was so obedient. Became his personal assassin or something. Last I heard she was alive, probably biding her time to kill us all. Just pray that Felicity is never in the same room as her, or Felicity might actually kill her.”

Luke shifted uncomfortably, “I never really realised how close you were with Felicity.”

Obik sighed, “After Riz died she was very lost. I stepped in with Nalto to fill the void Riz’s death left. I always did sort of regret phasing her out after I joined the Jedi, but by then she was with Pax and it didn’t seem like she needed me anymore. But I still remember the day I met her. She was so young and scared, yet strong and brave. She ran away from home at sixteen to join a war she barely believed in. I know that she would have been a very different person if Brendan hadn’t died. But the amazing thing is that despite everything she’s been through, there’s been one thing no one could take from her.”

“What’s that?”

“Her passion. For romance, for fighting in what she believes in. Even her passion for architecture endured.”
“She mentioned that to me,” Luke said. “Was it a big hobby of hers?”

“Hobby?” Nils interrupted. “It wasn’t her hobby; it was her dream job. Rhiaon’s mode of recruitment was going into universities, being a student, and talking other students into joining us. Every single time when we asked her, what courses do you want us to enroll you in this time – because you actually had to do your studies undercover – it was the same answer; architecture.”

“Yeah, she’s actually gotten a lot of credits in architecture study,” Nils replied. “She could have gotten a degree with another year of study. She still could.”

“I’m surprised she didn’t,” Obik said. “She always said that’s what she was going to do after the war.”

“Well, after the bombing while we were packing up the office,” Nils said, “she felt a responsibility to the Republic and chose to take the job offer of Senate Emissary. I’ve encouraged her to pursue a degree, but she says there’s no point.”

Luke was silent; he wasn’t sure if it was from his displeasure at hearing Felicity never achieved her dream job… or the low thrum of alcohol buzzing through his system. He wasn’t drunk, but he certainly wasn’t sober.

“Hey, Luke, I’m sorry to bring it up,” Nils said, “but I’ve been meaning to ask. Did you manage to submit your T93847 form to the Senate yet?”

“It’s almost done,” Luke promised. “I’ve just been busy with the wedding and we’ve started construction on a new batch of houses. I’ll submit it next week.”

“Luke, you have to submit it tonight.”

“Tonight?”

“The cut off for this quarter is tonight. We went over this. If you don’t submit by midnight, your case won’t go before the Senate until next quarter. That’s a three-month delay, and we’re talking about getting permission and funding to build your medical center. That’s a vital piece of your claiming process. You could get delayed years if things don’t move quickly.”

“Alright,” Luke groaned, “I can head to my office now and finish it.”

“Fine,” Nils shrugged. “But if anyone asks me if you did your paperwork under the influence of alcohol, I’m not going to lie.”

Luke looked at Obik, “I’m sorry for running out. I’ll be back as quickly as possible.”

“Don’t worry,” Obik waved off. “I’ll explain to Reine. She’ll understand.”

“Thanks.”

“Just try to hurry. We’re cutting the cake soon.”

Luke shook his head in amusement, “I promise I won’t miss the cake.”

Luke was busy typing at his computer when he sensed the presence in the doorway.
“What are you doing here?” Luke asked, a grin across his face.

Felicity was standing at the doorway with a tray and a coy smile, “You missed the cake.”

Felicity set down the tray on a side table. It held two plates of cake and two glasses of champagne. She sauntered across the room, swinging her hips, and if Luke didn’t know better it looked like she was sticking out her chest slightly, that irresistible smirk on her face.

Reaching him, Felicity placed a hand on his right arm, and slowly glided it across his arm, shoulder, neck, and other shoulder as she passed behind him. Her touch was with just the right pressure to be seductive, yet at the same time look innocent.

She clearly had an agenda.

“Mmm,” Felicity gave a small satisfied moan as she ran her hand from his shoulder, across his chest, and back to his right shoulder. It was the kind of moan that set every nerve in Luke’s body on fire.

Luke groaned and leaned back in his chair as her fingers glided over his chest, dipping down ever so slightly under his collar to brush against his bare skin.

Felicity smirked and wrapped her arms around Luke’s shoulders, pressing herself against him ever so gently, nuzzling her nose just barely against the sensitive skin of his neck.

Luke couldn’t ignore how tight his pants were getting.

Luke gave a short, strangled cry as she gave his earlobe a sudden quick nip. That minx smile ripped across her face as Luke struggled to control himself.

“Felicity,” Luke whispered, weaving a hand through her hair to pull her in closer as her lips and tongue ran wild with deliberate motions across his neck. “Felicity, I want you so much.”

She smiled, dislodging herself from his neck, and whispered in his ear, “I want you so much too.”

Her hand trailed down his body, down his muscled chest and cut abs. She moved lower and lower, and Luke’s breath came out in ragged pants.

“I want you so much, Luke Skywalker,” Felicity continued to murmur in his ear, nuzzling it. “I want your hands on my body, your mouth on my breasts, and this…”

Felicity’s hand rested just above the pronounced bulge in his pants.

She giggled naughtily, “Well, I think you know where I want that.”

“Felicity,” Luke’s eyes were dark with lust. His mind was filled with images of fulfilling her desires in a thousand different ways.

“But…” Felicity smirked. Luke could feel her breath on his ear as she whispered, “You have work to do.”

Suddenly she was across the room casually arranging the forks on the cake plates, leaving a completely dumbfounded Luke.

“You are the most evil person I have ever met,” Luke stared at her with his jaw agape. “And I’ve met Palpatine.”

“I’m sorry, Luke,” Felicity laughed, carrying the tray over to the desk and setting it down. “I just couldn’t resist.”

“You are going to make that up to me.”

“Oh, don’t worry,” Felicity rubbed his bicep, “I will.”

Luke sighed, and shook his head, “I should have known what I was getting into when I decided to get involved with a woman who takes pleasure out of constantly messing with people.”

“What did you seriously expect?” Felicity grinned.

“Was it just an act then?” Luke asked. “What you said about my hands and my lips and my…”

Felicity raised an eyebrow.

“Were you just teasing about that?”

Felicity gently ran a hand over the short hairs of his neck. She was standing so close to him, and his nostrils were filled with the light floral scent of her perfume.

“I can be yours,” Felicity ghosted her lips over his.

“Don’t be a tease.”

“I’m not.”

Felicity pulled his head forward, crushing her lips to his. Luke’s arms locked around her waist, pulling her in as close to his body as possible.

“But,” Felicity breathed as Luke’s lips trailed down her neck to the scoop of her dress’s neckline. She gave a ragged gasp as Luke rolled his hips, grinding the bulge in his pants against her sensitive apex which was only protected by the fabric of her underwear. Felicity moaned, her hands brushing through his hair as his tongue teased the tops of her breasts. She found it hard to break away while he gently nibbled her collarbone, but she managed. “You really have to submit that form.”

Luke groaned, pulling himself away before he couldn’t stop himself from shoving her down on that desk and having his way with her, “Fine, but if this is how visits while I’m working are going to happen from now on, you’re banned from my office if I need to get work done.”

“Deal,” Felicity hopped up to sit on Luke’s desk, her smooth, soft legs crossed mere inches from his face. It was impossible not to notice that her legs were bare; Felicity had forgone any hosiery.

“You are really going to be distracting, aren’t you?” Luke sighed, his eyes locked on her legs. He wanted nothing more than to trail his lips up those thighs.

They spent a while in the office, casually chatting as Luke completed his paperwork. The mood had simmered down, but the sexual tension still clung heavily to the air. Just when Luke thought Felicity had finally stopped teasing him, she would cross her legs or brush her hand against his arm and set him off all over again.

“Good job,” Felicity smiled. “Nils will be so happy we don’t have to delay your progress another three months. Although I wouldn’t mind having you on Coruscant more often.”

“I’ll make an effort to be there more,” Luke promised. His hand absentmindedly trailed down her leg. “Nils seems like a nice guy.”

“Best boss you could ask for.”

“He was telling me that he’s encouraged you to study architecture.”

Felicity looked away from him, “It’s merely a hobby.”

“Really? Because I recall you saying it was your dream job.”

Felicity sighed, “Alright, fine, maybe I would be interested in taking some night courses and finishing my degree. You know, casually, maybe stretch it out over a few years. It would be fun.”

“But?” Luke didn’t need to be a Jedi to sense there was something more.

“But it’s pointless,” Felicity said flatly. “I’m too old to make a career change.”

“You’re only thirty-two. That’s not old.”

“It’s old enough that my doctor recommends that if I do plan on having kids, to get on that as quickly as possible.” When she saw Luke’s expression, Felicity deadpanned, “I’m not joking. She told me that last week at my yearly physical.”

“Wow,” Luke just shook his head. “What did you even say to that?”

“That I’d get on you as quickly as possible,” Felicity grinned.

A silence clung to the room as Felicity slowly realized the implication of her words.

“You want to have children with… me?” Luke said slowly.

“It… was just a joke,” Felicity laughed, but Luke knew what genuine laughter from Felicity sounded like and that wasn’t it.

“You want to have children with me,” Luke repeated.

Felicity sighed, “Great, I’ve completely scared you off. Good going Rhiaon, you held onto him, for what? Three weeks?”

“Felicity-”

“Luke, the only reason I’m so comfortable with the idea is that, okay yes we’ve only been dating for a few weeks, but we’ve been getting to know each other and develop our bond for almost a year.”

“Felicity-”

“Look, can we just forget I said anything?”

“Felicity!” Luke put two fingers over her mouth. “I want to have children with you.”

It was Felicity’s turn to be shocked, “What?”
“I want to have children with you,” Luke repeated, not a trace of hesitation in his voice. “I’ve wanted that for quite a while now.”

“When did you-”

He grabbed her left wrist and trailed a thumb over the tattoo, “When I saw you with FN-2187 that day, and how motherly and devoted you were to him, when I saw how hard you fought to safe him, and when I actually had to physically drag you away to leave him behind… I knew. I knew that was the mother I wanted for my children.”

Luke took a deep breath as Felicity stared at him saying nothing.

“I’m not saying I want a baby in my arms nine months from now,” Luke assured her. “But I want you to know… I’m not afraid of the idea of us having children someday… and it’s not going to make me run. In fact, knowing that you do want that too…”

Luke gently pulled a loose strand of hair over her ear.

“It makes me want to stay all that much more,” Luke said softly.

“Well…” Felicity coyly cocked her head to the side and played with the fastenings of his tunic. “It would be a lie to say it wouldn’t make me stay as well.”

Luke smiled brightly, “I want you to promise me something, Felicity.”

“Luke, we’ve been only dating for a few weeks. I’m not promising marriage or kids or even being roommates at this point.”

“Noted,” Luke chuckled. “What I want is for you to promise me that you will pursue your architecture degree.”

Felicity opened her mouth.

“It doesn’t have to be now,” Luke cut her off. “But someday. Please… you can’t waste your life at a job you don’t really want just because you feel regret for what happened to Alderaan. Yes, we lost billions, but through your work as an Emissary, you’ve saved trillions. Your debt has been repaid, and now it’s time to pursue your dreams.”

Felicity smiled, running her hands over his chest, her thumbs trailing across the bared skin at his collar, “How do you always know exactly what to say?”

“I practice speeches in my head before giving them. You wouldn’t believe how many incarnations of I am a Jedi, like my father before me I went through.”

Felicity laughed and bowed her forehead against his.

“Promise me, Felicity,” Luke whispered. “Promise you’ll pursue your degree.”

Felicity gently nodded, “Alright… I’ll do it.”

They stayed in that position for a while, heads bowed together while Felicity sat on Luke’s desk, and he in his chair. The moment started off sweet, but as they stared at each other, lips millimetres apart – and maybe a little too much alcohol in their systems – something heavy set in their gazes.

He needed no other urging, pulling her head toward him in a soft, tender kiss. Felicity’s breath was heavy as they pulled apart, and Luke needed to taste her lips again. They kissed over and over for several minutes, their pulses rising higher with each tender touch.

At some point, Luke’s hand found its way onto Felicity’s bare calf. He gently stroked the soft, smooth skin, and massaged the tense muscle.

“That feels wonderful,” Felicity murmured, her eyes drifting closed.

“You know, Luke,” Felicity’s tone was heavily laden, “when you started saying you wanted me to promise something… I thought you were going to make me vow to have children with you.”

“That would be ridiculous. After all,” Luke’s hand began to slowly drift up her leg. His eyes locked her gaze, a strong cloud of lust darkening his blue irises, “we haven’t even made love yet.”

Felicity smirked as his hands moved higher, passing above her knee getting very close to the hem of her dress. Her chest moved up and down with heavy breaths, trying to contain her desire, but Luke could sense its strong pulse in the Force.

“Well, maybe I’m saving myself for marriage,” Felicity teased.

Luke raised an eyebrow, “Felicity… I was at your apartment enough times in the morning finding Drystan still there.”

“I don’t want to think about Drystan right now,” Felicity whispered. “Only us… Only you… You touching me… the warmth of your arms… the taste of your lips… the feeling of your hand – ah – sliding up and – uh – under my dress.”

Luke noted that the skin of her thighs seemed to be particularly sensitive.

“Felicity,” Luke leaned forward and gave her ear a kiss. His hot breath tickled against her, “Do you want me?”

Felicity looked at him directly and then placed a hand on the back of his neck to retain the intimate distance.

“Yes,” she breathed.

Luke kissed her, long and passionately, worshiping the lips that danced atop his. Kissing her soft lips felt like tiny shocks of electricity, like popping sparks of passion, like the sweetest water from the galaxy’s most beautiful stream.

He wanted her; and he wanted her now.

His fingers stroked the delicate skin of her thighs, continuing to rise, edging closer to the touch that would sate her pleasure as well as his. Felicity’s breath made strong, even pants in anticipation. She squirmed, rubbing her legs together one time, then subtly spread them open. A shiver went through her as his hand inched higher and higher, her breathing getting faster and faster.

His fingers stopped moving, lingering at the hem of her silk, lace panties.

She closed her eyes and arched her head back, “Luke… Please.”

He looked up at her with dark eyes, his own breathing as loud and heavy as hers. She whimpered as he moved his hand away. His lips were on her shoulder now, kissing and caressing her bare skin. Felicity whimpered again as both hands – flesh and mechanical – settled on either hip. Luke’s mouth trailed up her neck as his thumbs hooked underneath the sides of her panties.

With an agonizing slowness, he inched them down her legs. Felicity writhed under him, further teased by the lips on her neck. Luke wasn’t just kissing her or suckling the delicate skin. Every so often there would be a tiny jolt of pain as he suddenly nipped at her neck. She would give a small cry as the pain and pleasure dueled in her body, and his tongue would tenderly balm the mark.

Her underwear hit the floor.

Luke pulled his mouth from her, and they stood there staring at each other, their breath panting in harmony with the collective beating of their hearts. They were on the brink of the next step.

Lust crackled through Luke’s body like electricity – and he of all people knew how that felt. Felicity was reclining on his desk, prone to his body and the way he would touch her. She was still clothed, yet intimately bared to him at the same time. He stood between her spread legs, his heart thudding as he thought about how there was no barrier to her intimate heat beneath the skirt of her dress.

From her thighs, he had felt the dampness of her desire, and he could smell it in the air. He could see it on her face, the way her eyes were hooded, dark, and locked on him. Her arm, placed behind her body, holding her upright was shaking, her chest heaving with heavy breaths, and her thighs trembling on either side of his hips.

She wanted him… and he wanted her.

“Luke,” Felicity’s voice was low but not quiet. She wanted the intimacy of silence, but she needed him to hear her words. “Luke… please.”

Felicity Rhiaon was not the type of woman who begged, so it made him erect when he heard the desperation of her desire.

“Felicity,” Luke whispered reverently. He reached out and cupped her face, “Not yet. I want to remember this. Every sound, every scent…”

His natural hand trailed down her jaw, her neck, and to the top of her breast.

“Every inch of your skin,” Luke looked her straight in the eyes as he caressed all of her breast he could reach.

Felicity let him touch her for minute, a low moan humming in the base of her throat. Then she grabbed his hand and slowly moved it away. She left it against the curve of her neck and shoulder, and let her fingers glide down to the zipper of her dress. Wasting no time, Felicity yanked it down, exposing the lacy black bra underneath which matched the panties lying forgotten on the floor by Luke’s feet.

The zipper’s track was far enough down that it exposed Felicity’s chest completely without having to pull down the straps of her dress. Luke had the perfect view of the start of her toned stomach – those morning workouts were for something after all – and the soft breasts being contained by that seductive black lace bra which Luke noted with pleasure, was fastened from the front.

Felicity’s breasts wouldn’t ever be considered large, but they also certainly weren’t non-existent.
They looked to be about the size of a handful, which Luke would like nothing more than to test that theory.

“You can touch them,” Felicity smirked that irresistible one corner smirk. “I wouldn’t mind.”

“Are you sure?” Luke asked. He always wanted to establish clear consent before going ahead with anything.

Felicity laughed, “Luke, I unzipped my top and let you take my underwear off. I’m positive I’m okay with you touching my chest. Although if you need more encouragement…”

Felicity watched his face with glee as she reached down and unclasped her bra. Luke’s breath hitched as he finally saw Felicity’s bare breasts for the first time. They were pert, pale, and beautiful, crowned with small, brown tips that were hard with desire. He wanted to touch those breasts, feel their weight and the softness of her intimate skin. He wanted to taste them, running his lips all over them, grazing his tongue and teeth over her erect nipples. He wanted to find how he could give her pleasure through those beautiful breasts.

“Like what you see?” Felicity grinned at him. She had a hand on her hip and a cocky twinkle in her eyes, but she couldn’t disguise her true feelings. Not from Luke, the Jedi Grandmaster who better than anyone could sense a person’s true emotions in the Force.

Felicity had always been very confident in both her body and sexuality, so Luke was surprised when he sensed her anxiety in the Force. She was genuinely afraid of Luke finding something about her unattractive, of him judging something about her…and yet, Luke didn’t quite think it was her breasts.

“You are so beautiful,” Luke was sure to look her in the eyes as he made the declaration. He could ogle her chest later, but as he called her naked body—or at least a part of her naked body—beautiful for the first time, he wanted her to know it was from his heart, and not something else calling the shots.

“You’re not too bad yourself,” Felicity replied with a smirk. A sense of relief shot through the Force. “Now, let me get the rest of this out of the way.”

Felicity struggled for a minute trying to take off her bra. She was trying to do it, but still keep up her dress straps. As she laboured to pull her bra strap underneath the dress strap, Luke grasped the obstructing fabric.

Instantly Felicity stiffened.

“No, it’s okay, Sweetheart,” Felicity moved Luke’s hand away from her dress strap. “I’ve got this.”

“Alright,” Luke scowled as she fought with her bra. That moment had been quite odd.

After a few minutes, Felicity had wrenched the bra off, and dropped it onto the floor next to her underwear.

Luke gazed at the beautiful sight of her unobscured breasts, “Felicity, you are the most beautiful woman I have ever seen.”

She looked at him with dark eyes, “And you are the sexiest man I have ever seen. Damn it, Skywalker, kiss me.”

Felicity grabbed the fabric of his shirt and roughly yanked him forward. Her lips crushed his, and a hand buried itself in Luke’s hair, pulling him in desperately. Felicity kissed him passionately, her tongue ramming into his open mouth at the first opportunity.

Luke grunted as she pressed against him, her naked chest rubbing against the fabric of his black tunic. She hooked a leg over one of his hips and undulated her pelvis against his. Luke moaned as a wet heat drew over him; he had forgotten she wasn’t wearing any panties.

“I’ve thought about it too,” Felicity whispered. “Ever since I saw you shirtless on the roof that first time.”

Luke pulled away in surprise, “Really? Even when we were dating other people you thought about doing this with me?”

“At the time it was more a passing thought.”

“I see.”

Felicity grabbed Luke’s left hand and without ceremony put it onto one of her shapely breasts. His hand instantly went to work exploring the tender flesh. She felt so soft. Luke had been right; they were the perfect handful.

“Do you like them?” Felicity arched her back, pressing herself more into his pleasure giving hand. “Not too small?”

Felicity moaned as his thumb ran over her sensitive nub, “Oh, Luke.”

Luke raised a brow in mock surprise but also held a very cocky look, “Did you like that?”

“So much,” Felicity’s head was tilted back and her eyes closed.

“Then you might like this too.”

Felicity cried out as Luke’s mouth latched onto her nipple. Teasing her, tasting her, dragging his teeth across. She wove her hand into his hair and pulled him in close.

Luke felt so satisfied as he heard the moans Felicity couldn’t hold back. There was nothing more erotic to him than the noises of a satisfied lover. He explored her different reactions, each new moan music to his ears. Every action had its own specific noise. The moan she gave as he sucked on her nipple, the grunt she made as his teeth pressed gently down on it, the breathless “ah” that she uttered as his tongue licked the underside of her breast.

She was rolling her hips against him, the one leg still hooked around him. Felicity was seeking further satisfaction; she needed something to sate that throbbing heat between her legs.

She pulled his head back up to her lips and they spent a few minutes just kissing each other. It was a step somewhere between eroticism and romance. They had both had sex before, but this was different, something they had only experienced a few times before. This action, those kisses was what could only be classified as lovemaking. No, Luke wasn’t inside her body, but this was what he would come to consider as the first moment he had made love to Felicity Rhiaon.

“I love you too,” Felicity whispered, bowing her forehead against his. “Oh, Luke… I know this isn’t the time or place, but please… I need you. I need you so much. Please, please touch me.”

“Well,” his mechanical hand trailed up her thigh, “you did say please.”

Luke moved to bury his face and lips in her neck, when Felicity suddenly put out a hand to stop him.

“Wait, Luke,” she was hesitant, “can you… I just…”

“What?” his voice was loving.

Felicity took a deep breath, “Please don’t take this the wrong way, but this time… could you use your left hand?”

The implication was impossible to escape.

“You… you don’t like my mechanical hand?” Luke drew back, but Felicity caught him.

“It’s not like that,” she insisted. “Trust me, I feel horrible for asking this, but I have to. I love you, every part of you: flesh or metal. But when I think of that hand… I think of Vader.”

Luke’s face shifted in understanding. Felicity pressed her forehead to his and brushed her nose against his own, their lips hovering an inch apart.

“And right now, I only want to think of you,” she whispered. “Please, Luke, just this time.”

“Well, I’m not exactly going to say I want you thinking of my father,” he chuckled and switched hands.

“Oh, yes,” Felicity threw her head back as his fingers moved closer and closer to her throbbing anticipation. “Please, Luke, please.”

“Please what?” His hands were centimeters away.

“Please… touch me.”

Her body almost jolted off the desk when his thumb found her clit.

“Felicity,” Luke gritted his teeth as his fingers explored her quim. “Felicity, you’re so wet.”

“Oh, god, Luke,” Felicity’s breathing was sporadic as he teased her clit. He circled it, and occasionally would swipe a finger across all too briefly. “Please, Luke! Please!”

Luke’s mechanical hand was on her hip, not caressing her, but holding her down on the desk. Her hips were jerking wildly, trying to seek the pleasure he was teasing. Luke was actually surprised how strong Felicity was as she tried to fight against his impediment. She was completely at his mercy.

“Felicity, calm down,” Luke instructed between kisses. “Let’s take this slow.”

“No, Luke, no,” Felicity shook her head. “I don’t want slow; I’ve waited long enough. Please, I need you. I need your hands, your fingers, on me, in me. I don’t care! Just please! I need it!”

He pulled away from her lips and grinned, “Well, you did say in me.”

Felicity shrieked as he thrust a finger inside of her.

“Oh God, Luke!” Felicity clutched his shoulders tightly, her body writhing against his, trying to pull him in as close as possible as his fingers worked her quim.

She panted heavily, moaning his name over and over as his hands gave her the ultimate pleasure. His thumb played furiously with her clit and his fingers pumped forcefully in and out of her.

“Oh, Luke!” Felicity moaned. “Don’t stop! Don’t stop! Please, don’t stop!”

So it was very dangerous when Luke decided to stop.

“Oh?!” Felicity looked confused as his fingers withdrew from her, but her words were stopped by a kiss crushed to her mouth.

“Shh, shh, calm down, it’s okay,” Luke tried to soothe Felicity as she thrashed against him, trying to reobtain the pleasure she had just been given. “It’s okay, calm down. You were too close.”

“Too close?” Felicity moaned. “Luke, I wanted to go all the way to the end.”

“And you will,” he promised, “but that’s not how you’re going to finish. Not our first time.”

“Then how do you want me to finish?”

“Spread your legs,” Luke ordered, a dark dominant look casting over his eyes.

A shiver ran down Felicity’s spine, and she slowly spread her thighs for him. She yelped when Luke suddenly hooked her legs under his arms and pulled her right to the edge of the desk. He wasted no time, grabbing the hem of her skirt, and yanking it up. There was no grace in the movement, only the actions of a man on the edge of giving in to uninhibited lust.

Felicity shuddered and closed her eyes as Luke’s hand began stroking her inner thigh, getting close to her damp heat. She could feel the cool air on her lower half and the skirt of her dress bunched at her waist. Though the skirt blocked her own view on the space between her thighs, Felicity knew he had exposed her body fully to him.

Luke watched the realization fall over her face, but his eyes did not drift down… yet. Instead he watched her accept the fact that she was practically naked in front of him. Yes, her dress was still on her, but both her breasts and cunt were completely exposed to him. He could see those fleshy pink lips, that hard nub begging for attention, and the warm, tight entrance that was gushing wet for him. While she may not have felt naked, she might as well have been.

He watched her slowly bite her bottom lip, and wished it was himself doing that. Luke wanted to touch her, feel her, just glance down, but he abstained. He could sense that she wasn’t ready… but she was close.

Felicity took another deep breath and opened her eyes. She found Luke’s blue orbs intently locked on hers. The amount of love radiating in his eyes was almost painful. He could sense her thought; that she didn’t deserve this.

“I love you,” Luke said, his voice shaking. “I don’t care if you don’t deserve it, or I don’t deserve your love, or any other excuse people could come up with to keep us apart. I love you, for now and for always.”

Felicity didn’t say anything for a few minutes, something odd going across her face. Then she took a final deep breath and spoke.

“Not yet,” Luke’s left hand trailed up her thigh, “there’s still one more thing I want to do first.”

“And what’s that?”

Luke’s mouth was in a hard line, he was staring deep into Felicity’s gaze as he dropped to his knees. Felicity gasped as she realized what was about to come next.

“Luke,” Felicity moaned, running a hand through his soft, blonde hair, “yes, please do it.”

“Felicity Rhiaon,” Luke looked up at her darkly, placing gentle kisses on her inner thighs, getting closer to her wet desire. He hooked an arm around each leg and pulled her in closer. He could feel her emanating heat and smell that lustful scent of desire. “I’m going to taste and touch you until all you remember is my name on your lips.”

“And I’ll scream it to the high heavens,” Felicity promised. “But damn it, Luke…”

Luke raised an eyebrow at her.

“I am done with your teasing.”

She tightened her grasp on his hair and pulled him right onto her begging cunt. Felicity shrieked and threw back her head as Luke went to work, licking her length, and teasing her lower lips.

He swirled random patterns across her tenderness. He very gently bit and pulled at her lips. He pointed his tongue and made very short, deliberate licks in the spots that really sent her wild, but avoided her clit like the plague. It wasn’t time for that yet.

Luke slid his tongue between her outer and inner lips, and then gently blew around the area of her clit, getting her ready. He flattened his tongue and lapped at her like an animal at a stream. She seemed to really like that move as she shuddered and moaned at the sensation.

“Oh, God, yes!” Felicity grunted pulling him in as close as possible. “Oh, fuck, Luke that’s so good.”

Luke chuckled, sensing her extreme pleasure in the Force, “You really like this.”

“So much,” Felicity moaned. “If there’s one thing that will always get me off, it’s oral. Oh, you’re so good at that. Oh, Luke.”

Luke smiled as Felicity rambled on, moaning his name and instructions for better pleasure. Though she was finding him to be pretty talented sans guidance, and wasn’t afraid to let him know.

“Oh, Gods, Luke, yes!”

Huh, Felicity Rhiaon was a talker during sex. Luke hadn’t expected that.

As he slid his tongue up her length, Luke loved feeling her legs clamp around him. She was trying to draw him into her slick passage, but he avoided it.
That delicious, sweet and salty liquid her quim produced in anticipation of his cock hit his tongue. Luke’s mind was drawn back to the show she had put on for him ten nights ago, and the taste of her juices that she had spread across his lips. It tasted good then, but it was heavenly coming from the source.

Luke stayed lapping at her, knowing that changing position could reset her track to orgasm. Besides, he really liked just going to town, lapping roughly at her juices as she squirmed beneath him. Felicity tasted so good; he could do this for hours.

He wanted to delve into the source of her juices and lap that nectar leaking out of her passage, but Luke restrained. Not yet; they weren’t ready for the next step yet. There was still something he had to do.

Slowly he moved up and around, teasing her as he got ever closer to her clit hood. Felicity squirmed underneath him in anticipation and made little shoves up with her pelvis to guide him to her sweet spot as he circled around it.

Then his tongue gently stroked the hood covering her most sensitive spot. He could already see her engorged clit peeking out, begging to be exposed and pleasured.

A groan came from Felicity, “Oh that’s a good spot! Just maybe move a little to the-”

Felicity’s words cut off as his tongue hit her clit. When Luke looked up at her it looked like she was screaming out, her face contorting with pleasure, yet no sound could escape her mouth.

“Yeah, that’s the spot,” Felicity squeaked out.

Luke held a secret smile. Sometimes a man didn’t need to be told where the perfect spot on his lover was. Sometimes a man just knew how to please a woman.

…And other times, a man had a mythical Force that let him tap into his lover’s emotions to guide him to those spots.

But Felicity didn’t need to know that.

“Is that good?” Luke’s voice was husky. “Does that make you feel fantastic?”

“Yes!” Felicity groaned. “Oh, yes!”

“I bet I can make it better… how about I do this?”

Luke pushed his tongue into her wet passage.

“Luke!” Felicity yelled as he curled it in a dozen directions, each seasoning her cunt with a new brand of pleasure.

Her back hit the desk as she gave in to his control, surrendering herself to the ministrations of his tongue. Felicity moaned and screamed and writhed wildly on the desk, not caring as she knocked things to the floor.

Though the champagne glasses that broke and stained the floor, Luke would later have to explain to Gavyn when he asked Luke a few days later why the carpet smelled like alcohol. In that moment, Luke was happy his office was located in the Jedi Temple and not the Meditation Gardens where the reception was taking place. No one would overhear them or interrupt.
“Oh, Imar, Itar, Djun, Ethys, Koena, and Ipgyn!” Felicity cried out the names of the pantheon of Gods and Goddesses of her father’s birth planet, the religion in which she had been raised. “Oh, fuck! Fuck! Fuck, that’s so good! Luke!”

She panted like a dog as Luke feasted upon her. Her hips rocked against his face as his tongue delved deep inside of her and curled, lapping up every drop of wetness she could make.

He began thrusting his tongue inside of her like it was his cock. Felicity rode his face, moaning out nonsense, just a jumble of names and swears as she lost herself completely. Luke could sense her desire building and building until finally…

“LUKE!”

Felicity’s legs clamped down on his head, holding him in place as she climaxed. She screamed out his name as her cunt convulsed from the first orgasm Luke Skywalker had ever given her.

Her breaths came steady and hard as she rode out the last twinges of her orgasm. She couldn’t move a muscle; Felicity was absolutely sated with pleasure.

But Luke was not.

“Felicity,” Luke pulled her back up into a sitting position, and kissed her hard. “Felicity, I need you, right here, right now.”

Without a second thought, Felicity started undoing the fastenings of Luke’s tunic. He buried his face in her neck, and trailed across it hard, bruising kisses – which Felicity would awkwardly have to explain away to Leia the next morning. Luke lifted his arms, and helped Felicity pull his tunic off, throwing it to the floor next to her bra and underwear.

“Oh, God, these arms and abs,” Felicity ran her hands over Luke’s athletic form. “I’ve been wanting to run my hands over these since the first time I saw you shirtless. When you were all sweaty and sexy, I wanted these bulging arms that can pin me down.”

“And you said I wouldn’t regret it if I let you have your wicked way with me,” Luke recalled, unbuckling his belt and pulling his pants – though not yet his underwear – to his ankles.

Felicity grinned, “I would rake my nails across your back and lick every inch of your body. Especially these arms.”

“You have a thing for athletic arms, don’t you?”

“Little bit.”

“Felicity,” Luke groaned as she sensually licked up the crevice of his abs. “I’m going to make love to you, right here, right now, on this desk.”

“Do it, Luke,” Felicity’s voice was husky as she ran her hands up and down his abs. “Take me here and now. I want your cock inside of me.”

Luke was kissing her neck again, Felicity moaning wildly beneath him as she arched her neck for better access. This was it, the moment they would finally consummate their love. Luke just needed to pull down her dress straps, then he would drive himself into her core, thrusting frantically as she wrapped her legs around his hips and arms around his neck, giving into pleasure.

“I’m on the pill,” Felicity answered. “And I got tested a few weeks after Drystan dumped me. I haven’t been with anyone else since. You?”

“Had my routine physical two weeks ago. I’m clean. Are you sure you’re comfortable going bare?”

“It would be my first time bare since Pax,” Felicity confessed. “But if it’s you… I’m willing to take the risk.”

Luke immediately stepped back and held up his hands to show he wasn’t going to touch her.

Luke frowned, “If this is about protection, I can run over to Kalonia’s office and get some.”

“No, it’s not that. It’s…” Felicity unconsciously rubbed her shoulder. “Look, I just changed my mind, okay?”

“Okay. That’s fine. I understand and respect you’re withdrawing your consent,” Luke immediately began redressing himself. “I’m just… a little confused as to what suddenly happened. You said you wanted it and… now you don’t. Did I do something wrong?”

“No, look it’s just…” Felicity sighed. She grabbed Luke’s hand and pulled him to her. Felicity wrapped her arms around his neck and said, “I do want to make love to you. I want that more than almost anything… But the first time we make love… It’s not going to be on a desk, in your office, during Obik and Reine’s wedding reception.”

As they slowly got dressed, Luke didn’t tell her that he knew she was lying, that there was something else holding her back. But Luke had no clue what that was and what had happened that triggered the sudden change.

“There,” Felicity smoothed out her dress. “We don’t look too bad. Maybe no one will notice.”

“Felicity, we’ve been gone from the wedding for at least an hour and we’re a little drunk and our clothing and hair are a mess,” Luke pointed out. “People are going to notice.”

“Fine, but if Han and Leia ask questions, you have to be the one to talk to Leia. I am so not having to tell her that her twin brother went down on me… Though, seriously Luke, you are absolutely doing that again to me very soon.”

“As often as you wish,” Luke smiled.

Felicity grinned and grabbed his hand, “Come on. Let’s go.”

“What’s wrong?” Felicity frowned as she noticed the pained expression on his face.

Felicity grinned as her eyes fell on the still erect tent in his pants, “Are you going to calm yourself by meditating? Or are you going to… Maybe calm yourself by pulling that out and stroking it as you think about my naked body and how it felt and tasted… and how you want your cock to feel one more place. One more hot… tight… wet place.”

Luke groaned, shifting his erection into a less painful position, “Felicity, please don’t start something you’re not going to finish. Or at least leave me your underwear again.”

“Who said I wasn’t going to finish?”

Felicity walked over to Luke in the chair and kissed him deeply. As Luke kissed her, Felicity slipped her tongue into his mouth, gently stroking the sensitive palate. Her hands drifted down, across his chest and abs before settling on his belt buckle. She pulled back from the kiss, and with a coy smile, unbuckled his belt.

“Oh, fuck!” Luke groaned, raking his hand through her hair, encouraging her to take him deeper and deeper. “Felicity, God, your mouth feels so good.”

The next several minutes were utter ecstasy. Luke’s mechanical hand gripped the arm of his chair tightly as he struggled to last as long as possible. Her tight, wet mouth around his stiff shaft was absolute heaven. His left hand was buried in her hair the same way hers had been when he had performed oral sex on her. He guided her head in a rhythmic bob up and down, letting out sporadic grunts as she worked him masterfully. As her swollen, wet lips slid across his shaft, inside her mouth, her tongue dragged across his cock in wild, random patterns.

“Oh, fuck Felicity, that feels so good,” Luke panted, his hips involuntarily bucking to get deeper in her mouth. “Don’t stop, Felicity. I’m so close. I’m so close.”

“Felicity,” Luke moaned as her lips wrapped back around him. She picked up the pace, her head bobbing faster and faster over him. His thighs clenched as he struggled to hold back, until he could do it no longer. “Yes, Felicity. Felicity! Oh, fuck Felicity, I’m going to- Do you want me to pull out?”

“No,” Felicity whispered.

The look in her eyes set him off, “FELICITY!”

He tightened his grip on her head and wrenched Felicity forward, making her take him as deep as possible without choking her. Luke collapsed as he let go of everything. His hand held her in place as he released himself down her throat. Luke might have been a little rough with her, but the moans she was emitting made it clear that she certainly did not mind.

Luke let out a heavy groan when he finished, slightly disappointed when Felicity pulled off him to deal with the aftermath. His eyes were closed and his body had slumped forward. He took a deep breath, returning his heart rate back to normal.

When he opened his eyes, he found Felicity casually pulling back on her discarded undergarments.

“Better?” Felicity grinned at him innocently as if he hadn’t just climaxed in her mouth after she had orgasmed on his own.

Luke chuckled, “I am so happy you decided to keep me company.”

1 Year

Tonight was the night, Luke was sure of it. One year from the day he had met Felicity Rhiaon, he was finally going to make love to her.

He had set the scene just right; no detail had been left behind in his apartment. The lights had been dimmed and some easy going instrumental music was being pumped from the various speakers throughout the apartment. The dining room table had been set by the droids with Luke’s finest dishes, cutlery, tablecloth, matching cloth napkins and placemats.

In the center of the table, a pair of candles burned, held by some rather remarkable silver candlesticks that had been bequeathed by the Naberries to Luke. They had been given to Padmé from Bail Organa as a thank you for her participation in the peace summit held on Alderaan… even if she had almost been assassinated halfway through it. The same candlesticks had also been given to Mon Mothma for her participation in the same summit, and Luke had seen them used during dinner parties held by Mothma in honour of the memories of Bail and Padmé.

Luke had decided on the candlesticks not only because of the fondness Felicity had for Bail and Padmé, but it had been at Mothma’s last dinner party that Luke and Felicity had made their first public appearance as a couple… To absolutely no one’s surprise. In fact, more people were surprised to learn that Luke and Felicity hadn’t been a couple up to that point.

General Madine even thought that they were married.

The bedroom had been thoroughly prepared too. Windows washed, furniture dusted and polished, carpet vacuumed and even shampooed. The nearby fresher had been scrubbed just as thoroughly, and some sweet-smelling incense had been burned in all the rooms. Luke’s bed had been made with his nicest, silk bedsheets, freshly washed. The pillows had been fluffed and the cases had been replaced with the ones that matched the bedsheets.
He knew not to put any candles in the bedroom. During one of their romantic evenings in, Luke thought to inspire the mood by lighting a few candles. Several minutes later Felicity asked him to put them out as she always could never focus when candles were lit during a makeout session. She always was too worried one would get knocked over or something would happen while they were unsupervised and the apartment would burn down.

The mood had fallen apart shortly after that.

To be honest, while it was romantic to choose this day to make love to Felicity… it hadn’t exactly been Luke’s first choice. He had attempted several times since their encounter in his office to initiate physical intimacy.

While Luke had succeeded on getting Felicity to repeat bouts of foreplay – good Lord was that woman a Goddess with her mouth – he had been very unsuccessful in the department of getting his hard cock inside of her dripping cunt.

And she had been keeping him very hard.

Luke was putting the finishing touches on a romantic dinner that he had cooked special for her. The meal was a simple dish: pasta with cream sauce and roast nuna legs. It had been the first dish Luke ever taught Felicity how to make, an extremely easy dish that anyone could make. And yet, Felicity still had managed to get oil on the top of the pasta water… which she somehow managed to set aflame.

Only Felicity Rhiaon could set water on fire.

While easy, Luke pulled out all the stops to jazz up the dish as much as possible and show off his cooking skills. He marinated the nuna legs in a complicated marinade overnight, the pasta was homemade, and the sauce was made with the freshest ingredients.

Luke had literally done nothing that day but cook and clean in preparation for that night. In the past year, he had fallen hopelessly in love with this woman, loving her with a depth he never imagined possible. Her presence had been the gaping hole in his life up to that point, and with her finally in his arms, his life was perfect. Luke loved Felicity Rhiaon with all his heart and wanted to show her that. He just wanted to give her the greatest, most romantic night of her entire life.

…And if she rewarded him by deciding to spread her legs for him, naked on his bed, who was he to argue?

He too had been cleaned up extensively. Luke had gone for a hair cut the previous day, that morning he had showered, scrubbing, shaving, and smoothing almost every inch of his body. His face had undergone an extensive skincare routine… though that was actually just an everyday thing for Luke.

Skincare is very important, alright? Why was it a bad thing if Luke took pride in his appearance?

Luke could almost hear Han’s constant teasing about his complicated morning routine.

His hair was perfectly styled (as always), his teeth brushed, flossed, and rinsed with mouthwash, his brows tweezed, and his nails clipped, which Felicity would be grateful for. Finally, he was dressed in that black Jedi outfit he knew drove Felicity absolutely wild. He had briefly considered wearing his workout gear, which was another favorite outfit of hers, but he felt like it was a little too informal for a candlelit dinner.

Luke was just pulling the nuna legs out of the oven when the doorbell rang.
“Master Luke!” Threepio called from the dining room where he was putting the final touches on the table. “I believe Miss Rhiaon has arrived!”

“Thank you, Threepio. I’ll get it,” Luke called back. He looked over at Artoo, who was sparking up his lighting torch, “Thank you, Artoo, but not until dessert, remember?”

Beep bop boup boop.

“Yes, I know you’re not a culinary droid. Just put them on the warming center on the stovetop until dessert.”

Bop bee bop boo.

“Come on, you’re not actually going to make me say it.”

Boop.

Luke sighed, “Fine. R2-D2, you make the best crème brûlée in the Galaxy. Now would you put them on the warming center? I’ll let you make a whole show about finishing the tops for Felicity.”

Beep beep!

Luke shook his head as Artoo happily set the desserts on the warming center, “Of all the droids in the Galaxy, it’s you I end up with.”

The doorbell rang again, and Luke wiped his hands on a dish towel before exiting the kitchen. Reaching the door, he smoothed down his hair once more, righted his shoulders, and took a deep breath.

“Here we go,” Luke muttered, and then hit the button to open the door.

Felicity was standing in front of him looking like an absolute vision. Every detail of her appearance that night had been seared into his mind.

Simple makeup with an earthy reddish-brown eyeshadow, a touch of black eyeliner and mascara, and bright scarlet lipstick. Her hair was styled up into a beautiful bun, though had no flair to it, like she was expecting to take it down that night.

The fragrant perfume of a flowery meadow danced off her neck. It was the same perfume he remembered smelling as he kissed her shoulder that night in his office as he tried the pull down the straps of her dress.

Felicity’s only jewelry that night was her kyber crystal bracelet and a small silver necklace with a red starbird pendant. No doubt a tribute to it being the anniversary of the Battle of Yavin.

Her legs were covered with short nylon stockings that looked to come up just above the knee, but as the ends were under her dress, Luke would love to see just how far up they went. Black strappy, open toed heels covered her small feet. Luke couldn’t wait to pull them off as he kissed his way up her legs.

But the sight Luke could never forget is what she wore that night: a black leather jacket and that amazing dark red dress, that was low cut in the front, zipped up the back, and had a sort of scooped slit on the short skirt that barely reached past her knee.

“When you pick your jaw up off the floor, I’d love to kiss you,” Felicity smirked that one corner smirk he loved so much.

Luke grinned that goofy grin she adored and said, “Come here.”

He wrapped his arms around her waist and pulled her in for a deliciously passionate kiss.

“You look wonderful tonight,” Luke murmured when they broke the kiss, still not releasing her from his arms.

“You don’t look half bad yourself,” Felicity gave an appreciative look up and down his form. “Have I ever told you that you look sexy in black?”

Luke’s mind couldn’t help but flash back to the image of Felicity, prone on his desk wearing a tight black dress, and a matching set of lacy black bra and panties lying on the floor.

“Not as sexy as you in black,” Luke replied stiffly, quickly pushing her forward out of his embrace.

Felicity raised an eyebrow, “Getting a little too excited?”

“You know the influence you have over me,” Luke played with her necklace. “I like this. Where did you get it?”

“Leia, actually. She gave it to me before the Imperial Ball when I was sixteen. She gave it to me as a symbol of our friendship or some other lie.”

“Giving me that gift was probably one of the most despicable things Leia ever did to me. Sure, I now cherish said necklace as a symbol of our friendship and my history with the Alliance. But Leia gave me that gift before I had joined the cause. She had effectively marked her territory, claiming me for the Rebellion without my consent.”

“Ouch,” Luke winced. “Tell me you didn’t wear it to the Imperial Ball.”

“This is why I do not doubt Leia is the spawn of Darth Vader,” Felicity teased. “I walked into the biggest Imperial event of the year wearing a necklace that screamed “I’m a member of the Rebel Alliance.” And I had no freaking clue.”

“Maybe it’s a good thing I was the one trained to be a Jedi,” Luke chuckled. “I don’t trust Leia wouldn’t have turned to the Dark Side.”

“Look at the bright side; at least it would have been against Vader and Palpatine. You know she would have ripped them to shreds and then forcibly changed the Empire into the Republic.”

“Tyrannical democracy.”

“Isn’t all democracy tyrannical?” Felicity grinned. It faltered when Luke started to take off her coat, “Oh, hold on a second. I have something here for you.”

“For me?” Luke looked surprised.

“A small gift. I’m not exactly sure where we keep track of anniversaries in regard to our relationship, but I figured a year from the day we met counts for something.” Felicity pulled a pair of black and white gloves out of her jacket pocket, “Here. I want you to have these.”

Luke frowned as he took them, “Stormtrooper gloves? That’s… interesting. Is it supposed to be a reference to Han and I pretending to be Stormtroopers on the Death Star?”

“Actually… no.” Felicity was very quiet as she hung her jacket up in the closet. She took a deep breath, mentally readying herself before revealing the meaning behind the gloves, “They… were Brendan’s.”

Luke couldn’t stop the stunned look on her face, “Brendan’s? No, Felicity, I couldn’t-”

“I want you to have them,” Felicity put her hands over Luke’s, clasping his over Brendan’s gloves. “His death changed my life entirely… and it changed yours.”

“If he hadn’t died… I wouldn’t have been a Rebel… then I wouldn’t have stolen the Death Star plans… and Leia would never have been given them… and then Artoo wouldn’t have had them… then he wouldn’t have met you… then everything that happened to you with the Death Star and Yavin and the Rebels… it wouldn’t have happened.”

“What are you saying? That it was destiny?”

“I don’t believe in destiny, Luke, and certainly not one that says my brother died so you could get your sorry butt off Tatooine. But I do acknowledge the series of events that led to the intertwining of our lives, and while I do wish it didn’t require the death of Brendan… I’m glad that it brought me to you. He meant everything to me, Luke… and now you mean everything to me too.”

Luke placed a hand under Felicity’s jaw and stroked a thumb under her cheek, “You still don’t have to give me the gloves to prove that.”

“I know, but I want to. I have my mementos of Brendan, Luke… I want you to have these.” Felicity took a deep breath and looked down, “Luke, I wanted to tell you this the day you helped me in your guest bedroom mourn Brendan’s death. But Luke… the way I feel with you, the trust, the loyalty, the safety… I haven’t felt this safe with someone since Brendan died. Not with Leia. Not with Diego. Not with Riz, Ji-Dan, or even Pax. When I’m with you… I’m not afraid to be afraid. I trust you. I feel safe with you… I finally feel home.”

Luke kissed her deeply as the tears fell from their eyes, “I’m home with you too.”

They kissed over and over, tears and smiles mixing with laughter and sobs. The moment was perfect. The moment was complete.

“Master Luke! Dinner is ready!” Threepio called.

The moment was ruined.

“Thank you,” Luke couldn’t help but laugh with Felicity as they broke apart. He set Brendan’s gloves on the ottoman sitting by the door, “I’ll find a special spot for these. I promise.”

“Thank you,” Felicity smiled, running her fingers down his cheek. “I’m sorry for all that. This wasn’t really the mood we were hoping for tonight.”

“It wasn’t?” Luke asked carefully. He may have been all set on consummating his relationship with Felicity, but he wasn’t certain on her own designs for that night.

“Of course not,” Felicity’s eyes darkened, her fingers playfully trailing down his neck and torso. Her hips were pressing against his pelvis suggestively, and no doubt she felt the beginnings of his erection against her thigh. “I thought we were going for romantic and maybe a little bit… more.”

“You think I would dress like this if we were just going to order in and watch HoloNet? …Unless you don’t want more?”

“I am all for more,” Luke bit his lip, his eyes roaming over her figure. “Felicity—”

“Thank you, Threepio,” Felicity chuckled.

“Dinner is served if you two are ready,” Threepio announced.

“Yes, we heard, Threepio,” Felicity said.

“Forgive me, Miss Rhiaon. I was not sure if you heard me,” Threepio continued. “Master Luke can get quite distracted when you are in the room.”

Threepio turned to Felicity in confusion, “Have I done something wrong, Miss Rhiaon?”

“No, Threepio,” Felicity shook her head. “But you don’t have to call me Miss Rhiaon. We’ve known each other since I was fourteen. We have to be friends by now.”

“I suppose we are,” Threepio replied. “How do your friends address you?”

“As Felicity.” She paused, “Well, actually I guess most of them call me Fliss.”

“Then that is what I shall call you, Miss Fliss.”

Felicity was silent for a minute, “Never mind. Rhiaon’s fine.”

“No, it isn’t,” Luke wrapped his arm around her waist. “You can call her Felicity, Threepio.”

“Oh, did he?” Felicity twined her arm around Luke’s waist and rested her free hand against his chest. “Aren’t I a lucky woman?”

“Just one of the perks of dating a romantic like myself,” Luke smiled. “Though… I’d like to apologize in advance for dessert.”

“Why’s that?”

“Artoo is doing crème brûlée… and I promised that he could make a show of finishing the tops.”

“You own a fire extinguisher?”

“Cannot own R2-D2 without one.”
Felicity laughed as she and Luke followed Threepio into the dining room.

“That was simply delicious, Luke,” Felicity declared as Artoo and Threepio cleared the plates away.

“I’m glad you liked it,” Luke watched the droids head into the kitchen. Usually they didn’t play wait staff for Luke, but he had bargained his way into the deal with a few promises of oil baths, replacing old wiring, and giving Artoo a dozen new memory chips.

The astro-droid knew how to drive a hard bargain.

“So, I meant to tell you before dinner, but I also got you a present.” Luke used the Force to float in a small disc from the living room. He presented it to Felicity, “It’s a Holo from the photoshoot we had last year at the ceremony on Yavin IV.”

“The first Holo we ever took together,” Felicity examined their small figures. “Damn, how did we look this good together and not decide to date from the get go?”

“As I recall, Leia dragged me off to meet someone important,” Luke answered. “I really should have asked for your number.”

“Well, you have me now,” Felicity rested her head on his shoulder.

“Yes, I do,” Luke chuckled, kissing the top of her head.

They sat peacefully there, enjoying the moment of contentment.

“But if you ever tell anyone you have me or own me or possess me in any way, I will break your nose.”

“I believe you will,” Luke said plainly. He looked down at Felicity curled up underneath him. From his angle, he had the perfect view down her dress, “I can’t get over how beautiful your breasts are. They’re just the perfect size and shape.”

Felicity smirked, “Someone’s being rather forward.”

“And someone’s rather flattered,” Luke watched as she subconsciously thrust her cleavage higher in the air, “I know what I want tonight, Felicity. I’ve thought about it so many times this week.”

But there was a hesitation on her face, and Luke could sense that uneasy feeling in the Force that had always preceded Felicity’s withdrawal. She was playing with her starbird pendant and biting her lip. Luke could sense she wanted him… but something held her back.

“Felicity,” Luke lifted her chin to look in her eyes. There was something so unnaturally fragile in those beautiful hazel orbs, “I want this… I want you. Now and forever. Mentally, emotionally… physically.”

“I want you too,” Felicity whispered. “I… I want you so much.”

“But every time we try to do this, you pull away. Felicity, am I fooling myself? Are we going to make love tonight?”

Felicity opened her mouth to respond when Threepio entered the room.

“We have started the dishwasher, Master Luke,” Threepio announced. “Do you require anything else of us at the moment?”
“Actually, Threepio,” Luke’s eyes didn’t move from Felicity, “you and Artoo can power off for the evening.”

“Are you sure, Master Luke?”

Luke simply looked at Felicity to make the choice.

“He’s right, Threepio,” Felicity said. “We would like not to be interrupted of the rest of the night.”

“As you wish, Miss Felicity,” Threepio bowed his head and exited the room.

Luke couldn’t wipe the grin off his face, “Are you sure?”

Felicity smiled, “Positive.”

Luke outstretched his hand to Felicity, and she took it. He pulled her into his embrace and once more kissed her passionately. His mechanical hand was buried in her hair, his flesh one lovingly rested against her neck. Felicity’s hands grasped his waist, settling above his lightsaber belt – with the life he lived, Luke always kept his trusty weapon on hand – stroking his sides.

Emboldened by her moans, Luke took a step, forcing her backwards against the table, almost in a sitting position atop it.

“Do you have a thing about having me sit up while you paw at me?” Felicity teased as Luke trailed his lips against the familiar paths of her neck.

“Not intentionally,” Luke’s breathing was heavily. “But if we’re talking about the sitting position in general, I do find it to be the most intimate of all positions as that’s when you’re physically closest, on the same level to look each other in the eyes, and the partners are in mutual control. Personally, I think both partners sitting up is the ultimate lovemaking position.”

“Well, that’s good to know,” Felicity chuckled, and then moaned as his flesh hand slipped down her top and found her nipple. “Oh god, I love you playing with my breasts.”

“Then let’s go to the bedroom and get a little more comfortable.”

Felicity put a hand on his chest to stop Luke, “The living room. Let’s go to the couch for now, and… we’ll work our way to the bedroom.”

Luke pressed his forehead against hers and whispered, “I love you, Felicity.”

They started by kissing; just standing in front of the couch and kissing. Loving kisses, tender kisses, passionate kisses, rough kisses, kisses.

He kissed all the spots that were home to him now: her lips, her neck, her jaw, under her earlobe, her collarbone, the exposed tops of her breasts. Felicity was doing similar work to him, but his memory was not of how Felicity Rhiaon explored him, but rather how he burned the image of her taste and touch into his mind. He could recall her body perfectly, the shape, size, and feel. How many times had he made love to her, played her body expertly in a symphony of lust? It had to be hundreds of times, thousands even maybe.

Felicity was the one to progress things that night. When she had decided they had kissed enough, her lips left his neck, and she pulled open the flap of his tunic. He lifted his arms and helped her make quick work of his shirt.

His torso bared, Felicity smirked and slowly got on one knee, her lips trailing down his body over his collar, pectorals, and licking right down the middle of his hard abs. Luke groaned, burying his hand in her hair – her bun was a mess by that point – urging her lips towards the hardened cock that was tenting his pants. But Felicity just trailed her lips back up, getting back onto her feet, and kissing him once more on the mouth.

Felicity gasped as Luke suddenly picked her up and tossed her down on the couch. He knelt before her and grasped her right leg. Hands ran over it, and unclasped the buckle fastening the black heel around Felicity’s foot. He eased it off and carelessly threw the shoe over his shoulder. His hand slid up her leg, across the nylon, reaching higher and higher and then underneath her skirt.

But his fingers hooked under the ends of her nylon stocking and pulled it down off her foot. He began kissing his way up the soft skin of her leg, his hands massaging her calf.

“Your legs are so smooth,” Luke murmured into her skin.

“They better be,” Felicity chuckled, her head lying back on the couch, her eyes squeezed shut with pleasure. “I just got them waxed yesterday.”

“Really?”

Luke groaned as his cock hardened even more, “Please tell me it’s where I’m thinking.”

“You’ll have to explore and find out.” Felicity’s grin fell slightly, “Luke… I’m sorry if during the wedding I wasn’t as… groomed as usual. I wasn’t exactly expecting us to get naked that night.”

“My God, if that’s the underwear you put on when you aren’t expecting sex, I don’t think I’m going to be able to handle the stuff you wear when you do expect it.”

“Luke, you saw the entire collection I brought to Rornian. I didn’t have much choice,” Felicity replied as Luke started to do the same ritual with her shoes and stockings on the other leg. “So… you didn’t mind that I was a little…”

“That you have hair in a place hair naturally grows?” Luke raised a brow. “Felicity, three times since the wedding I have tongued and/or fingered you, all in varying states of bareness. I don’t care how you choose to keep your own body: whatever makes you happy and comfortable. If it’s too much work, by all means, grow it out. I know what five o’clock shadow on my face feels like… I imagine it’s pretty annoying down there.”

“Come on, Luke! Even my kindest previous lover has had preferences.”

“Oh, I have a preference. It just doesn’t matter what that is. And please… let’s not talk about any previous lovers tonight.”

“I’ll try my best.” Felicity moaned as he ran a tongue up her leg. “How the hell did I manage to get a “Secretly I think it may have just been that I was lazy,” Luke joked as Felicity hooked a leg over his shoulder. “I mean who wouldn’t fall for the incredibly sexy downstairs neighbor who happens to be close friends with some of my friends, works at the office I have to go to on a regular basis, and has breakfast with me every morning? Frankly, I don’t have the energy to put that much effort into another relationship, so I figured why not?”

“I think I had the same mentality. Wow, there’s a hot guy living upstairs that can drive me places and holds down my feet while I do sit ups. I should bang him.”

“It’s a literal work in progress, Luke,” Felicity groaned as he began lifting the hem of her dress. “You know, maybe it’s good thing we didn’t kiss that night we went drinking.”

“Why’s that?”

Felicity blushed a little which surprised Luke greatly. Had he ever seen her blush?

“I was really horny that night and kind of lonely,” Felicity admitted, “and if you had kissed me as masterfully as you always do… I would have fucked you that night. Not made love; just had carnal, meaningless sex with you.”

Luke froze, “You… you would have?”

“Or at least tried. I don’t know how you would have reacted.”

Luke suddenly imagined what would have happened that night. Luke bringing her back to her apartment where they kissed passionately at the door. Felicity pulling him into her place, unzipping his fly, getting to her knees, and sucking his cock against the door. Luke throwing her down on the couch and ripping off her panties. Shoving his head up her skirt and eating out her hot, wet cunt. Pulling down the top of her dress and throwing her bra across the room, his mouth sloppily feasting on her breasts. Spreading her legs and slamming his hard cock into her and thrusting hard until he came.

“I’m sure I would have been very accommodating,” Luke cleared his throat. “But that probably would have wrecked our friendship.”

“Screw friendship,” Felicity kissed along his jaw. “I like this arrangement much better.”

“I concur,” Luke started to ease up the hem of her dress.

“Take a look,” Felicity pulled up her skirt to reveal familiar black panties. “I thought we should finish what we started.”

Luke stared at her for a minute, then stood up and pulled off his belt and pants. He set his lightsaber belt on the table, dropped his pants to the floor, and chucked his boots across the room in the general direction of Felicity’s heels.

He tried to climb on top of her, but Felicity shoved him down on the couch.

“Now, now, Master Skywalker,” Felicity threw a leg over his, mounting and straddling him. She rested her soaked panties atop the hard erection tenting his underwear. “Who said you got to be on top?”

“You are going to be the death of me,” Luke threw his head back as Felicity started to grind against him. Oh God, he was so close to being inside of her that the pleasure of simulating the act he wanted most was unbearable. Felicity was so hot and wet as she dragged her sex across his erection.

“You’re so hard,” Felicity moaned, planting her hands on the back of the couch for a better grip as she rode him. “I want you so much.”

Luke gripped her hips and started to pull her faster across him, but keep a careful eye on the angle to make sure it wasn’t self-serving. He wanted for them to have mutual pleasure, and this was the first act that really could give it to them.

“That feels amazing,” Felicity started to pant. She was probably getting very close to orgasm. “You are going to feel incredible inside of me.”

Luke peppered a series of kisses across the bared skin of her cleavage, then nimble fingers unclasped her necklace.

“I want to see you naked, Felicity,” Luke deposited the necklace on a side table and then pulled off his black glove and Felicity’s kyber crystal bracelet. “No jewelry, no semi-long pyjama shirts that cover up the good bits, no dress bunched at your waist. Completely naked.”

“Then what are you waiting for?” Felicity smirked. She took her hands off the back of the couch and pulled her hair out of its bun. Felicity sensually shook out her hair, making a show of her long brown waves falling down her shoulders.

“And you call me dramatic,” Luke said flatly.

“Just kiss me,” Felicity captured his lips.

His hands ran up her back and for a split second, she tensed. Then his hands went to the hem of her dress and pulled it up from where it was bunched at her hips.

“How do you pull this thing over your head?” Luke frowned as he tried to do just that.

“You don’t,” Felicity said. “You unzip the back and step out of it. But we don’t have to go that fast.”

“You don’t want to take your dress off?”

“No, I do,” Felicity said quickly. There was something odd in her tone, “But… is there anything else you want to do first? This is our first time making love. It should be as memorable and romantic as possible, so if there’s anything you want-”

Felicity gave what oddly sounded like a breath of relief, “And what’s that?”

“Felicity… I want to see your mind.”
Silence filled the room.

“I’m sorry?” Felicity asked blankly.

“It’s a Force Ability,” Luke explained. “The most intimate thing you could do to a person: see inside their mind. What they see, what they remember, what they know. I would never do it without consent, but if you want… I think it would be the ultimate piece of intimacy while we made love.”

Felicity didn’t say anything for a long time, and Luke let her work it out in her mind.

“You want… to see what I see… and think and feel?”

“Would it hurt?”

“Not if it’s consensual. Think of your mind like a house. There are dozens of rooms in the house and each room is a memory or emotion. Each room has a door that only you can operate. You can close and lock it to others, but Force Sensitives can get in the house and try to get in the rooms.”

“Could someone force their way in?” Felicity asked.

“I know…” Felicity frowned. “So… you want into the room?”

“Only if you wish to unlock the door.”

She took a deep breath, “Alright… if it won’t hurt-”

“It won’t,” he promised.

“Okay, so how do I do it?”

“Just take a deep breath and close your eyes,” Luke instructed.

Felicity did just that. Luke watched her for a second and could feel her trust in the Force. He focused on her Force Signature, examining it deeply for the first time. Her colour surprised him: crimson, like the blade of a Sith. Perhaps her life had always been destined for Darkness if her family had red signatures.

Luke took a deep breath and leaned his forehead against hers. She flinched for a second on contact, but then relaxed.

“You’re going to feel a slight pressure on your mind in a minute, Felicity,” Luke continued. “It won’t feel physical weight, but like a tapping against your mental barriers. If you want me to do this, take a deep breath, relax, and lower the barrier.”

He watched her take the deep breath and relax. Luke felt the shift, and then he was pouring into the unfamiliar terrain of her mind.

“Are you in?” Felicity whispered, cracking open an eye uncertainly.
Luke chuckled, “That’s a phrase I didn’t want to hear tonight, but yes, I’m in. I can see your thoughts. Thank you for letting me into your mind.”

Felicity opened her eyes and smiled, “Anytime.”

They kissed for a while, holding each other as Luke explored Felicity’s mind. Memories of them filled it. Their first meeting. Laughing at Shara’s funeral. Comparing Jakku and Tatooine in the cockpit of the Falcon. Working out together. Felicity sitting on Luke’s feet as he did sit ups. Cooking together. Felicity playfully smearing icing on his face as he taught her to bake a cake. Having breakfast together at Dex’s. Kissing Luke passionately in the booth to Dex’s utter surprise, which was how they revealed to him they were dating. Drinking with Rogue Squadron. Dancing at Ayessa and Koran’s wedding. Screwing around at Reine and Obik’s wedding.

Love, that was the emotion that filled Felicity’s mind, and there was no doubt that what she wanted most of all in that moment was to make love to Luke Skywalker.

“You have to step out of this dress, right?” Luke murmured, his hand trailing up the zipper.

Something flared in Felicity’s mind. Something vague and distant. A yell? And a… crackle? Whatever it was, Felicity was fighting it.

“Yes, I do,” Felicity tried to sound normal, but Luke could feel something struggling to take over.

“Are you okay?”

“I’m fine,” Felicity said shortly.

She shifted on his lap and her leg knocked something off the coffee table. It landed on the carpet with a thud. Instinctively, Felicity and Luke turned to look at it: it was Luke’s lightsaber.

All of a sudden, a flurry of images flooded Felicity’s mind.

A scream, feminine and spine tingling.

A man lying dead on the floor.

Immense pain ripping down her spine.

A mechanical breath.

Another scream, male and familiar to Luke.

A kick to the ribs.

A blaster.

A control panel.

A scream of grief.

A-

“No! No! No!” Felicity suddenly shoved Luke away, and her mind was sealed to him.

Luke blinked, utterly baffled as Felicity sat with her head in her hands trying not to cry.
“Felicity?” Luke placed a hand on her back.

“No!” she instantly slapped it away.

It wasn’t the playful sort of smack she might given his arm, or the sort of semi-violent way she would always threaten to kick people’s asses but never actually doing so. It was a violent smack, instant and mindless like a reflex.

Felicity’s eyes widened as she realized what she had done.

“Oh my God, Luke, I’m sorry,” Felicity exclaimed. “Oh, Gods what’s wrong with me? I can do this. I can do this!”

“I can do this. I can do this,” Felicity desperately chanted to herself, her head in her hands. “I can do this.”

Luke sighed, “We don’t have to do this.”

“Yes, we do!” Felicity snapped. Then she realized her words, “I mean… we can. I want to.”

Luke looked away at a loss of what to say or do, “This isn’t meant to be a chore, Felicity. It’s just a way to express our love, and if you can’t do this, that’s alright. I still love you and want to be with you.”

“It’s not-” But Felicity didn’t even know how to end that sentence. “I just… I can do this!”

“Felicity, do you usually have this problem with sex?”

“No. Never.”

“Then why me?” Luke boldly asked. “What’s so wrong with me? Why is it so hard for you to do this?”

Felicity looked away, nervously rubbing her shoulder.

Luke frowned. Hadn’t she rubbed her shoulder the exact same way after turning him down at the wedding?

And then it clicked.

Felicity had rubbed her shoulder after turning him down at the wedding.

She had packed several flimsy nightgowns for their stay on Rornian, yet wore the same pyjama shirt every night after it had been decided they would share a bed.

She had stopped things in his office when he had started pulling down her dress strap.

She had gone through a huge amount of effort to pull her bra off while keeping her dress strap up.

She had tensed and stopped him when he tried to help her with her bra by grasping her dress strap.

When they went swimming on Rornian that one time, Felicity wore that extremely conservative one
When they had been enslaved on Zygerria, she had been given a special shoulder and back covering that no other slave had.

She had hit him when he touched her back.

“Felicity…” Luke said slowly. “What’s wrong with your back?”

Fear flooded Felicity’s eyes, “What did you just say?”

“You’re afraid of me seeing your back,” Luke stated plainly. “That’s why you keep stopping things. That’s why you were willing to sex on my desk during Reine and Obik’s wedding until I tried pulling your dress down. That’s why you just slapped me. You don’t want me to see your back.”

Felicity looked away and said nothing.

“Why?” Luke demanded. “What’s so wrong that you don’t want me to see it?”

She still said nothing.

“Come on,” Luke took her hands in his, “you know me. I’m not going to judge you. There’s no scar, no tattoo, no brand, no birth defect, no traumatic injury that’s going to make me find you unattractive.”

Felicity looked him in the eyes, “I’m not afraid of you finding me unattractive, Luke.”

Luke frowned, “Then what is it?”

Felicity took a deep breath, turned around, and pulled down her zipper.

At first Luke didn’t see the problem; there was some subtle red mark near the top of her back. But as her zipper dragged further down, and the mark became clearer, Luke’s heart stopped. His mouth was dry and eyes wide when Felicity’s zipper reached the bottom of the track.

Splashed vividly against the pale skin of her back, an angry red scar ran the full length of her spine.

“I don’t think I need to tell you what kind of scar this is,” Felicity whispered. She was too afraid to turn back and look at him.

Luke felt like he was going to be sick. It all made sense now, why she didn’t want him to see her back… and why she was so afraid of the weapon he proudly wielded everyday.

“There’s nothing civilized about a lightsaber, Luke,” Felicity said darkly. “Not when a man in a mask has dragged one down your spine.”

Felicity turned to look at him, a challenge in her eyes. “You want to know why I hate people using lightsabers? Why I didn’t want you to see my back? Why I will never forgive Vader? Go ahead, look in my mind and find the answer.”

Luke took a deep breath, and looked.

_The walls were familiar to Luke; eleven years later, he could still remember the halls of the Death_
Star, and so could Felicity.

Four figures ran down the hallway: three men and a woman. He recognized the younger Felicity Rhiaon and Diego Nalto, and he could figure out the bulky man loaded with weapons was Gunner and the slender one carrying a staff on his back was Ji-Dan. Gunner was holding Felicity in his arms, dragging her along. Felicity was hysterically shouting and squirming, trying to escape Gunner’s grasp.

“We have to go back! We have to go back!” Felicity was screaming. “We can’t leave him! I can’t leave Riz!”

“Get a hold of yourself, Rhiaon!” Diego snapped, his tone far more aggressive than Luke had ever heard. This was the ‘still had a stick stuck up his ass and an ego bigger than the Death Star’ Diego Nalto Luke had heard so much about. “Drayson is dead! There’s nothing we can do!”

“We still have to go back!” Felicity yelled. “I won’t leave him!”

“Rhiaon, get it together or I swear to God, I will slap you!”

Gunner cuff ed Diego upside the head, “Enough! Have you no heart? Were you not the same when you lost your first friend in battle?”

“It doesn’t matter what I did,” Diego exclaimed. “We have Death Star plans to get to the base! We can’t go back for a corpse!”

“Felicity,” a kindly voice said.

She felt a hand on her arm, and found Ji-Dan at her side. Felicity looked into those eyes, blind yet could deeper into a soul than anyone else.

“My child, he is gone,” Ji-Dan said softly. “Mourn not, but rejoice that he has passed into a better world than this. He died a hero, and his memory will live on.”

“Because he’s with people who will care for him, and he will never feel pain again.”

“Who is he with?” Felicity shot. “His parents are alive. His daughter is alive. His friends are alive. The only person who’s dead is his bitch ex-girlfriend who didn’t even tell him they had a daughter until she was four… and that was only through her Death in the Line of Duty Action Plan. Who is there to watch over him? Because she sure as hell won’t!”

“If he has no one, then I suppose he’ll just have to borrow someone from you,” Ji-Dan smiled softly. “I think Brendan wouldn’t mind watching him for a while.”

That brought a smile to Felicity’s face, “He’s with Brendan?”

Ji-Dan nodded, “He’s with Brendan. The Force will care for them both, and they will care for and watch over you, as they always have, as I always have, and we always will.”

Felicity grabbed and clasped his hand, “Alright, boys. Let’s get these plans the hell out of here!”

“Yeah!” Gunner cheered.

Diego rolled his eyes, “Oh sure. Listen to the motivation speech we definitely did not have time for.”
“One more comment, Nalto, and I’m reporting you for insubordination during the mission debrief,” Ji-Dan warned.

“Besame el culo,” Diego muttered.

“And no swearing in your homeworld language,” Ji-Dan chided.

“Alright, let’s go,” Felicity wiped the tears from her eyes and broke into a run.

They raced down the hallway, weapons at the ready for the Stormtroopers that were trying to track them. Surely word would have gotten out by now of the group of Rogues who had stolen the Death Star plans. The directive would be clear; the Imperials would not let them leave that station alive.

Things were oddly quiet… too quiet. Felicity had just come to the end of the hallway and was about to direct their next move, having been the one to memorize the layout of the Death Star.

“The ship hanger is just one floor down,” Felicity instructed, turning her back to face the men. “There’s an elevator lift just down this hallway, so we should-”

Pain ripped open her spine, and Felicity screamed louder more painfully than ever before in her life as she fell to the floor. The world was dark as her face crushed against the floor. She was blinded and paralysed by the pain burning down her spine.

How wasn’t she dead?

She could hear what was happening around her. Diego’s screams and a thud to the floor. Had they killed him? God, she hoped they didn’t. She may hate the man but she didn’t actually want him dead.

There was a blast, a crackle, a zing, followed by Gunner’s grunt and a thud as he hit the ground. What had been done to her team? What had been done to her? Where was Ji-Dan? And who had done it?

She got her final question answered a moment later when she heard an iconic noise.

Koo-pah.

A mechanical breath.

A black boot gave her a sharp kick in the ribs, turning her over to face him. Towering above her was Darth Vader himself.

“Organa’s Handmaiden,” Vader said. “I should have guessed.”

“Did you hold your breath to sneak up on us?” Felicity moaned. She hissed in pain as Vader kicked her in the ribs again.

“This makes perfect sense,” Vader began. “Alaric Rhiannon’s known Rebel daughter showed up out of nowhere with another Rebel begging for a job on the Death Star, and when she arrives, three other Rebels manage to find their way onto the station. I told them not to trust you, but Tarkin and Rhiannon refused to listen. Why do you think I sent for Major Kinall? To keep an eye on you. And now here we are: exactly where we’ve been destined to end up ever since you stepped between the Princess and I all those years ago. And to think I stood up for you during the conflict over dealing with your brother’s body.”
“Oh yeah, I don’t think I ever thanked you,” Felicity glanced over at her companions. “Thanks for that. The lightsaber down my spine? Not so much.”

“You’ve certainly gotten mouthy over the years,” Vader kicked her again.

As sassy as her words were, there was no denying the fear burning in her heart and mind. Ji-Dan was nowhere to be found, but probably had ducked into a nearby hall. Gunner was not far behind Felicity, groaning in pain on the ground. She didn’t know at the time that his legs had been slashed by Vader’s lightsaber. Diego was lying next to Felicity, clutching his arm, moaning loudly as his lifelong hand injury was freshly planted in his body. Between Felicity and Diego, just out of her reach and not far from Diego’s feet was Brendan’s blaster, the weapon she would never abandon.

“I can make this easy on you, Rhiaon,” Vader said. “Give me the plans and I may let you and your friends live.”

“Do you think I’m an idiot?” Felicity challenged. She knew her words were a death sentence, having seen far too many times what this man in a mask could do in his fury. But still, Felicity grasped the pouch around her neck in a death grip and declared, “I’ll never give them to you, Vader!”

“Then you have decided to die,” Vader raised his lightsaber above Felicity.

She shut her eyes and waited for the blow. Her only comfort as she heard the zing of the saber swinging down was that when she next opened her eyes, she would see Brendan and Riz.

The blow never landed.

After a minute of confusion, Felicity opened her eyes. Standing over her, his staff blocking Vader’s saber, was Ji-Dan.

“The Force is with this woman,” Ji-Dan said boldly. “She will not die today, and not by your blade or corrupt ideology.”

“You know nothing of the Force!” Vader snarled and struck at Ji-Dan.

They engaged in the duel that would end with Ji-Dan’s death. He fought bravely against the Sith Lord wielding staff against saber, but all knew how this encounter would end.

As Vader’s saber slashed and clashed with Ji-Dan’s staff, it was clear that the Sith Lord wasn’t putting his full effort in the fight. He was toying with the man, forcing his friends to watch helplessly as Ji-Dan edged ever closer to certain death.

Felicity watched in horror: Ji-Dan was the only one left standing. If he fell, none of them had a chance of escape. To their advantage, Vader had been proud enough to not believe he needed any Stormtroopers to back him up, and indeed Felicity, Diego, and Gunner were incapacitated enough to make that true. The battle station readouts hung from Felicity’s neck like lead. It was her responsibility one way or another to get this into the hands of the Rebel Alliance. They had to find a way out of this, to escape Vader or the Galaxy was doomed.

But how?

Behind her, Gunner was struggling to get to his feet. He was unsteadied, and if he were to fight, it wouldn’t take much to finish him off. To the side, not far from her brother’s blaster, Diego was desperately clutching his arm, moaning in pain as he fought to stay conscious. It would take more of an attack to finish off Diego, and that was good as Felicity would need the help of a pilot... though with a bum arm like that, any more injury to it would mean a prosthetic.

It was bitterly cruel that Diego would be given a metal limb by a monster whose body was nothing but metal.

Words from the past suddenly flooded into Felicity’s mind.

"As unbelievable as it may sound," Vader's voice boomed down the hallway to the young Felicity Rhiaon and Leia Organa, "my body is the flesh and blood of a human, with all its unfortunate limitations. But do not think I am not a very powerful man. I wield more power than you can possibly imagine."

The younger Felicity Rhiaon blurted out, "If you're so powerful, why are you in a life support suit?"

"FELICITY!" Leia, a mere thirteen-year-old screeched.

"What? I'm curious. How often do you get to ask Darth Vader what's up with the suit?" Felicity knew she had messed up but damn it, she was standing her ground. "It is life support, right?"

Vader was silent for a few moments before deciding he might as well answer Felicity’s question.

"Yes, it is a life support suit," Vader replied. "When I was younger and more naïve, I suffered injuries from a nefarious, despicable man who sought to corrupt those I may have cared about."

The eyes of the twenty-one-year-old Felicity narrowed in on the control panel over Vader’s chest. A life support suit: Vader’s one weakness. Felicity’s eyes flicked over to Brendan’s blaster. If she could take out the suit, she could take out Vader.

Of course, that would require moving, and that was no easy feat. She tried to reach for her brother’s blaster, and it took all of her strength not to cry out and alert Vader to her actions.

Felicity was still in immense pain from Vader’s attack. Every time she moved, her spine felt on fire and she struggled not to vomit from searing pain screaming from her spine. Her limbs didn’t want to cooperate, taking all of her willpower to move them before they would obey.

Then a swipe from Vader’s blade got too close to Ji-Dan.

Diego frowned and glanced at the blaster near his feet, “What are you going to do? Shoot Vader?”

“It’ll never work. He’s too powerful to be taken down by a single blaster bolt.”

“We have to try.”

“It’s suicide, Rhiaon!”

“We can’t give up on the Galaxy, Nalto!” Felicity’s eyes burned with passion. “You and I may have no one left to fight for, but that’s not why we fight. We fight so that everyone else doesn’t have to endure the pain that we have suffered. Do I expect either of us to make it out alive today? Absolutely not, but the Alliance is getting these plans. And if we can’t get out of this alive, Nalto, then damn it, they’ll remember that we went down fighting! Now, Rogue Two… Kick. Me. The. Blaster!”

Something sparked in Diego Nalto’s eyes, igniting the flame of hope and rebellion inside of him. With one firm kick, Diego kicked over Felicity’s blaster.

Felicity’s hands enclosed upon it just as Vader’s saber went through Ji-Dan’s chest.

“NO!” Felicity screamed as Vader extinguished his saber and Ji-Dan fell dead to the ground.

Adrenaline surged through her body. Without thinking, Felicity lifted her brother’s blaster, and barely aiming, took a shot at Vader.

She hit him right in the control panel.

It was almost comical how hard Vader went down; wheezing and crackling as his electronics were fried.

“GO! GO! RUN NOW!” Felicity screamed as she, Diego, and Gunner shot to their feet and made a run for it.

“Nice blast, Rhiaon!” Diego laughed, something light in his tone Felicity had never heard before. It would be the turning point in their relationship.

“Come on, you two!” Gunner egged on, not acknowledging he was actually lagging behind the other two. He was moving in a sort of limping run, “We’re not out of here yet!”

And as Felicity reached the end of the hall – her spine still aflame – she paused for a moment to look back. She shivered like a cube of ice had been shoved down her throat as she saw Vader slowly – extremely slowly – rising to his feet. He couldn’t give them chase, but he was still dangerous as he summoned his lightsaber back to his hand.

Then her eyes set on Ji-Dan’s body. Felicity thought of Ji-Dan’s wife and two grown children. She wondered how she could ever tell them what happened. But then she saw something that lifted her heart ever so slightly: Ji-Dan had died with a smile on his face.

He would always be with her.

Luke pulled out of the memory.

“Uh huh,” Felicity nodded. “Also, you agree with me, Battle of Yavin era Diego Nalto was an asshole.”

“Undoubtedly. So that’s it then? That’s why you’ll never forgive my father. That’s why you hate lightsabers.”

“I don’t hate lightsabers.”

Luke blinked, “I’m sorry?”

“I don’t hate lightsabers,” Felicity repeated. “I hate when they’re wielded for evil. I have seen them and what they can do. I saw Vader put one through Ji-Dan’s chest, I saw Tyla Kinall put another through Gunner’s chest.”
“She has renounced that life, Felicity.”

“I know that, but that doesn’t mean I’ll ever be comfortable with her using one around me. That doesn’t mean I’ll be comfortable with anyone using one around me. Not Obik, not Reine, not even you.” Felicity took a deep breath, “I have felt them, Luke, that horrible pain dragging down my spine. Burning and ripping my flesh. Scarring it forever. You know what’s the worst part? He intentionally toyed with us; incapacitating us, but not killing us. He wanted to know who we were before he killed us. Diego and I weren’t able to access real medical aide for a month, and as such we have permanent scars and injuries from that. That’s why Diego’s hand shakes and has its spasms. They told us that one more slice to Diego’s arm and he would lose all muscle control in that hand. As for me, the doctors told me that if Vader had really been going for it, when he slashed me down the spine with a lightsaber it would have put me in a coma. It would have been so easy to kill me after that.”

“Felicity…”

But Luke couldn’t find the words to continue.

Felicity looked his deep in the eyes, “I am not afraid of lightsabers, Luke. What I’m afraid of… is you turning to the Dark Side.”

Luke’s eyes went wide, shock coursing through his body, “Felicity, no. I would never.”

“You can’t say never.”

“Yes, I can. I’ve been tempted and tested. I’ve been to the edge, and I’ve walked away from it.”

“You think that’s the only time you’ll ever be tested? You think you’ll never tempted again?”

“I know better than that. I know how to walk away without losing myself.”

“Said every single person who ever gave in to the Dark Side,” Felicity snapped. “Your father himself probably once said something along those lines. I know you’re strong, but what happens if that strength gets turned against you? Against me? I will not be Padmé Amidala, Luke.”

“I know you won’t,” Luke sighed. “… And I know you would literally kick my ass if I ever Force Choked you.”

“Well, without my permission.”

Luke raised an eyebrow.

Felicity grinned, “Why don’t we get the normal sex out of the way, and then we can talk about kinks?”

“I’m all for that,” Luke leaned in to kiss her but was stopped by a finger on the lips.

“We’re not done talking yet,” Felicity said.

Luke sighed, “Alright, fine, I will admit that I will likely be tested in the future, but I swear to you I will never give in.”

“I accept that, but you need to understand that if you ever do give in, we’re done. I’m not going to come beg you to return to the Light Side. If you make the choice to forsake the Light Side, knowing all you do about the Dark Side, then that is a bed you need to lie in. If you turn to the Dark Side, I “am leaving you, and if we have any children, I’m taking them with me and you will never see them again. We’re not going to have a third fricking Skywalker with a mechanical hand. And if we do, I’m going to find who cuts off my child’s hand, and cut off far more than just their hand.”

“Agreed,” Luke chuckled. Carefully, he lifted his mechanical hand, and trailed the fingers down the scar on Felicity’s spine. He was testing her, and though she shivered, she did not push him away. “Is that why you don’t like this hand touching you?”

“Yes,” Felicity breathed. “I see that hand and not only do I remember what he did to you, but I remember what he did to me… I wish this was like a normal relationship, Luke. That we could come in with a blank slate, but we can’t. We have a long, complicated history that started decades before we ever crossed paths. I wish we could just pretend that none of it happened, or at least that it doesn’t matter. But it does. I will always hate your father, or at least be antagonistic about him. He tried to kill me, Luke, and I shot him in the chest. And you…”

Felicity sighed.

“You killed my father, Luke.”

Luke frowned as he felt something dark and tragic pulse in the Force. He was surprised at the amount of sorrow that suddenly came off of Felicity. Usually she spoke of Alaric Rhiaon with such hatred and distaste; Luke hadn’t expected Felicity to associate Alaric with grief.

Felicity took a deep breath, and it seemed that she knew the thoughts in his head, “My father did a lot of terrible things to me, Luke… but he wasn’t all bad. I do have affectionate memories of him. You know the house I’ve been designing since I was a child?”

“Uh huh.”

“When I was eight, he took the current design and had it made into a dollhouse for my birthday,” Felicity had on a bittersweet smile. “It was exactly like my drawing, and he rigged the house himself to have lights that turned on and off, and doors that slid open… I did love my father, Luke. As much as I try to fight it, I did love him. I did want him to turn to the good side and reunite with me and we could be a family. The last time I saw him, he betrayed me, but I’ve always wondered if after the destruction of Alderaan he regretted anything. Maybe he changed his mind? What if I had one more chance to try to get through to him?”

Felicity sighed heavily.

“And I killed him before you had that chance,” Luke said the words Felicity could not.

“When my father died, I shed a tear for him. A single tear, but a tear nonetheless,” Felicity’s eyes did not move from Luke’s. “I know that it was his own doing, his own choices that put him on the Death Star… But I can’t deny the facts. I can’t deny that you played a role in my father’s death. I can’t deny that I did love my father. I can’t deny that I have fallen hopelessly in love with the man who killed my father. I can’t deny that I want to make love to my father’s killer.”

Felicity reached up and ran a hand through Luke’s soft blonde hair.

“And I can’t deny that… I’m perfectly okay with that.”

“Felicity,” Luke whispered trying to seek her lips, but Felicity stopped him again with a finger to his lips.

“I know I’m irresistible, but you are going to have to be strong for just a little longer,” Felicity teased.
“How much longer?” Luke chuckled, always a little turned on by her self-confidence, especially with how she was never afraid to admit she thought she was attractive. Sure, Felicity sometimes had the usual slips of thinking maybe she could drop a few pounds, or thought her thighs were too large, but generally Felicity Rhiaon was confident in her body and not afraid to flaunt that confidence.

“I am going to make love to you tonight, Luke Skywalker,” Felicity promised. “And it’s going to be so hot and good, you’re going to say, Calla who?”

“But first,” Felicity went back to being serious, “I need you to promise me three things. If we’re going to have a relationship and move on from the scars of the past, I need you to promise me three things.”

“Anything.”

“First… you will never treat me as my father did: like his possession. I was his doll; dressing me how he wanted, putting me in pretend scenarios where I was this perfect, simpering daughter that he could use to better his position in life and prove to everyone he was worth something. I am not Luke Skywalker’s Significant Other or some piece of arm candy or trophy for you to flaunt. I am Felicity Rhiaon, a woman with her own heroics and accomplishments, who just happens to also be bedding Luke Skywalker.”

“I promise that,” Luke took her hands in his, his mechanical thumb running over her knuckles. “But you have to promise to make that last part true.”

“Patience, My Love,” Felicity chuckled.

Luke pulled a face.

“What?”

“… Calla used to call me ‘My Love.’”

Felicity frowned, “… How about Sweetheart?”

“No Dark Side,” Felicity said. “You have to promise me that you will never turn to the Dark Side. I saw that holo of your parents on Mustafar. I’m actually going to kill you if you try to pull that crap on me, and I’ll get Han and Leia to help.”

“I promise,” Luke played with a strand of her hair. “What’s the last thing?”

“Swear to me you’ll never lie to me.”

“Felicity, I-”

“I’m not finished. By never lying to me, I mean the big stuff. If you’re planning a surprise party for me and lie, telling me instead we’re going out for dinner, I don’t give a shit… But if you’ve had sex with Tyla Kinall, I want to know.”

“I can honestly say that I have never had sex with Tyla Kinall,” Luke smiled, but his mind flicked over to Tyla for a moment.

No, he had never slept with Tyla, but he did know something that Felicity didn’t: that Tyla was responsible for Brendan’s death. It was Tyla’s darkest secret that she used to be an Inquisitor, and it wasn’t Luke’s place to share it. But not telling Felicity Tyla’s secret wasn’t exactly a lie; she had never asked him if he knew anything about Brendan’s death or Third Sister.

“Good,” Felicity smiled and ran a hand through Luke’s hair.

Luke was careful to make his tone just right, “Now, in this no lying rule… do you count lies by omission?”

Felicity raised an eyebrow, “Of course I do. You know better than anyone know how much that can mess up a person. Don’t you ever do that to me.”

“Alright, that’s good to know,” Luke looked away. He would absolutely have to talk to Tyla the next time he went to Temple Village.

When Luke looked back at Felicity, she was watching him with narrowed eyes.

“Is there something I should know about, Luke?”

Non-Force Sensitive as she was, Felicity Rhiaon could read Luke just as well as he could read her.

“There’s just something I have to do first before I tell you. It’s not exactly my secret to tell, but I will ensure you learn it. I just want to respect the person whose secret it is, and let them come forward with it themselves. Can you accept that?”

“I’m not going to be mad at you for respecting someone’s feelings,” Felicity conceded. “Just… promise me there won’t be lies.”

“I promise you, and will make you a fourth promise on top of that.” Luke summoned his lightsaber and held it out to her. He took one of her hands and put it atop the saber so they were holding it together. He looked her deep into her eyes, blue locking on hazel, “Felicity Rhiaon, I swear to you that this lightsaber will never be used to harm you. I will use it to defend and protect you until my dying day. I vow that, and I vow to spend as long as you’re willing to tolerate me, loving you as fiercely and passionately as I can manage.”

“I make you that same vow,” Felicity smiled and stroked his cheek. “Now, with all of that out of the way, I guess this is the part where we have a perfectly normal relationship.”

“Felicity,” Luke set down the lightsaber and lifted a hand under her chin, “as far as I’m concerned, a normal relationship… sounds frightfully boring.”

She laughed, “Kiss me, you idiot.”

“Finally.”

Luke captured her lips in a heady kiss. It was a kiss to end all others as they poured the depth of their love and connection into that intimate touch. When they broke for air, their parting was short lived. Luke’s lips were once more against Felicity’s neck, while hers suckled upon his collarbone, teasing it with gentle nibbles.
“Felicity,” Luke whispered her name against her skin.

Her hands stroked down his chest, trailing down his abs, and reaching down until they settled upon the bulge between his legs. With practiced hands, they started running over the fabric of his briefs, working the erection that had calmed down during their conversation, but that was reawakening under her touch.

Luke’s fingers played with her short neck hairs as she stroked him through his underwear, and his tongue dragged up her thin skin. Felicity moaned at his touch, arching her neck for better access. The thumb of her hand working his shaft slid down and began stroking the outline of his balls that were getting heavier as he hardened. Luke grunted and eagerly shoved a hand under her dress going straight for her panty-clad sex.

She was already so wet.

Then the thought crossed his mind, the one that made his cock hard as iron, he was about to make love to Felicity Rhiaon. For real this time; he was going to join with her as one flesh and perform the most intimate act of love possible.

He couldn’t wait another moment.

“Felicity,” Luke whispered, his hands on the shoulders of her dress. “Please, let me make love to you.”

She smiled coyly and pressed one more tender kiss to his eager lips. Luke moved forward to shove a hand in her hair and pull her lips in closer to him, but Felicity drew away. She watched with that one corner smirk as he jerked forward to kiss her again, but she leaned away. Felicity placed a hand on his chest to stop him from moving forward, and shook her head.

“Luke, please…” Felicity bowed her head against his and whispered just barely above his lips, “undress me.”

Slowly, she turned her back to him and pulled her hair away with one hand. Luke was treated to a simply stunning view of her unzipped dress splayed open to present the pale skin of her back, the band of her black lacy bra, and the exposed, red, angry scar.

With tender hands, Luke reached forward, his mechanical hand taking hold of the right shoulder strap. His flesh hand gently caressed the length of her scar.

His hands moved to the bared skin next to the shoulder straps, and he gripped the skin, massaging the tension coiled in her joints. Felicity gave a sharp breath and bit her lip. Her desire for him with churning boldly in the Force.

Luke bent down and started to feather kisses along the length of Felicity’s lightsaber scar, one of their most intimate acts from that day forward. She shivered again, as she would always do when he kissed her scars. When Luke reached the spot above her tailbone where the scar ended, he dragged his tongue back up.

Leisurely, Luke repeated the action of kissing and licking the other handful of scars that lined her back. He frowned at one scar that had almost completely faded away: the scar made by the whip she was struck with when they got captured on Zygerria. He could still remember that first time he had ever heard her scream in pain. How dare anyone do that to this amazing woman in his arms?
A moan from Felicity brought his mind back to the present. His hands ventured down for a moment to circle the tender flesh of her heaving breasts, his fingertips teasing her erect nipples, and the hands immediately withdrew back to their original position on her shoulders.

“Luke,” Felicity’s head lolled back. Her eyes were squeezed shut, and Luke almost stumbled back when an extreme wave of pleasure crashed against him through the Force like a wave against a rock. “Luke, please, undress me.”

He smiled and pressed one more kiss to the back of her neck. His thumbs hooked under the fabric of her shoulder straps, and with an almost painful lethargy, he pulled down her dress.

“You said you had to step out of the dress,” Luke whispered in her ear as his hand ran over the muscles of her toned stomach. “I am so happy we focused on ab workout routines.”

“Wait until you see what the flexibility ones made me able to do,” Felicity teased as she stood and pulled the dress off her. She chucked it carelessly across the room like their other clothes.

Felicity stood before him in a simply stunning set of black lacy bra and panties, and Luke sat on the couch admiring her in his briefs. That which was unspoken clung to the air: there was no turning back from this… and both were perfectly happy with that.

“Enjoying the view?” Felicity placed a hand on her hip, which she popped to the side, modeling her body to him. As with any body, it did have its flaws, but for Luke in his memory of that night she looked like an absolute Goddess.

“Yes,” Luke’s answer was barely more than a puff of air as everything tensed in his body. Tonight, he would make that body his: touching, tasting, teasing, and making her cum.

“Well, I guess this is it,” Felicity climbed upon his lap, spreading her legs to straddle his throbbing erection. She deliberately shifted her pelvis across him, and Luke struggled to hold himself together, “I guess tonight, I finally learn if your saber skills-”

“I swear to God, Felicity, do not make a lightsaber pun right now,” Luke gripped her hips, gently pulling to encourage her to rock against him. Her panties were sopping, and with every stroke the fabric pulled a little to the side. Had he not been covered by briefs, he would have slid right inside her.

Felicity seemed to melt in his arms; bare skin against bare skin. Heat burned in their bodies as they touched each other without restraint. Only one garment remained between them each. One year of sexual tension was finally bubbling to the surface, and with a surge of electricity, it was about to come to a head.

“Fine, I’ll abstain,” Felicity’s lips found his ear as she rocked against him.

“I sincerely hope that is our only abstinence tonight.” Luke’s chest was already damp with sweat. “I think it would actually kill me if you stopped things now.”

“Far from it. Oh, Gods, Luke!” Felicity jolted as his fabric-clad head found her clit. Felicity panted heavily, her arms gripping his shoulders as she struggled to find purchase on him, “Luke, please! I’m ready. Take me to the bedroom! Let me make love to you!”

“Who am I to disappoint you?” Luke moved her legs to wrap around his hips, holding her upright as he stood. While Felicity gripped at him tightly so she wouldn’t fall, he felt the rest of her relax when the pleasurable pressure of his erect cock against her hot sex between her legs was relieved.
“Good, that was getting a little much for now,” Felicity rested her head against his shoulder. “Thank you for that, though.”

With Felicity’s legs locked around his hips and his lips on hers, Luke carried Felicity to the bedroom.

“Droids won’t bother us?” Felicity asked between passionate kisses as Luke carried her over the threshold.

“I bribed Artoo to keep Threepio out of the way,” Luke set her down on the ground and turned to close the door. When he looked back at her, he couldn’t help but chuckle.

“What?” Felicity grinned with a hand on her hip.

“You’ve got lipstick smeared all over your face.”

“Oh really? You should see your face and neck with all that red all over it.”

Luke wrapped his arms around her waist and kissed her, “There’s some tissues in my bedside table. I’ll get the makeup remover from the fresher.”

“Why do you own makeup remover?”

“I don’t. Alyla left it here after last visit. I don’t think she’ll mind us using a little.”

“I won’t tell her if you won’t.”

“Deal.”

When Luke returned from the fresher with the bottle, he found Felicity sitting on his bed, waiting for him. His bedside drawer was open, revealing that he had stocked it properly for that night: condoms, lotion, lubrication, breath mints, and one item that Felicity was holding up with a smirk on her face.

“I’ve been looking for these, Master Skywalker,” Felicity dangled the lacy purple panties in front of her. “Is there a fetish I should know about?”

Luke chuckled and sat on the bed, his free hand going to rest on her thigh where he stroked small circles with his thumb.

“No fetish, but I do like a nice set of lingerie on a beautiful woman,” Luke’s hand slid up her leg to the hem of her panties.

“Enough that you steal women’s underwear?” Felicity asked as Luke poured the makeup remover on a tissue.

“Hey, you said to use them. You didn’t say I had to give them back,” Luke started to wipe the lipstick smears from Felicity’s face, “We’re really doing this.”

“We are,” Felicity took her turn to wipe the lipstick Luke’s face. “Any hesitations?”

“None. You?”

“None,” Felicity put the makeup remover and panties in the drawer and shut it as Luke used the Force to put the tissues in the wastebasket across the room. Their hands found each other’s bodies in a second.
“So, birth control,” Luke asked, “I have condoms this time.”

“I’m still on the pill, and unless something’s happened in the past few weeks that you need to tell me, I believe we’re both clean.”

“Bare it is then,” Luke’s hand ran slowly up and down her sides. “Just wanted to make sure we’re safe.”

“I’m not going to fault you for that,” Felicity kissed Luke. They kissed for a while, savoring each other’s lips, and letting their hands explore each other’s bare skin. Luke didn’t call her on it, but there was no denying Felicity had goosebumps as he touched her. She felt so good, so soft but strong, smooth but had her scars as any soldier did.

He wanted to do so many things to her that night, just push her down and have his way with her, but tonight wasn’t for that. Tonight he would make love to her as tenderly and passionately as possible.

“Felicity,” Luke breathed, his lips trailing down her jaw, her neck, her collarbone, and to the tops of her breasts. He kissed there for a while at the edge of the fabric, his lips and tongue teasing the tops of her exposed skin.

Her hand was in his hair, urging him on, his own hands running up and down the length of her spine scar. Every time they reached her bra strap, he teased her a little, playing with the clasp and feigning release, but then continuing to run down her scar.

With lust burning in his eyes, Luke reached behind Felicity and unclipped her bra. Something flashed in his eyes – confidence and dominance – and roughly he yanked down her bra, throwing it on the floor. Felicity yelped as pushed her down on the soft bed, but moaned as he began suckling at her breasts. Tongue and teeth teased her pointed nipples as his erection pressed into her thigh. His hands skilfully kneaded the soft flesh of her breasts. God, she was so soft and responsive. She writhed under him as he expertly worked her sensitive breasts.

While Felicity had only let him touch her bare quim three times since that first time in the office, her breasts had been free game and Luke had seen them over a dozen times since. Luke worshiped Felicity’s cleavage, and since her breast size had been one of only two things she was sensitive about her body – her height being the other – Felicity had glowed over the attention Luke paid to them. In fact, yesterday morning, before they had gone on their morning run, Luke had pulled her breasts out of her athletic bra and sucked on them, rocking a knee between her legs until she came. They had shared a secret smile when they got to Dex’s and he asked them why the two of them looked so happy.

To him they were perfect; perfectly sized, perfectly soft, perfectly round, perfectly sensitive. Her brown nipples adored his attentions, and one touch of them would get Felicity sopping in an instant. Someday Luke would try his hardest to see if he could get her off simply through her breasts, but for tonight he would use it to prepare her quim for his pulsing cock.

Speaking of…

Felicity yelped as Luke reached down and shoved a finger into her cunt.

“Just as I thought,” Luke chuckled, pumping his finger in and out of her heated passage. “You’re so wet, and yet… So tight. I can only get one finger in you right now.”
“I guess you’ll just have to do something to change that,” Felicity panted. “Because I’ve seen your cock, and there’s no way you’re going to be able to get that into me now.”

“No,” Luke withdrew his finger and knelt down. “But this will.”

Felicity threw her head back onto the mattress as Luke shoved his tongue into her. She panted frantically in time with the thrusts – in, out, in, out – how Luke loved to make her moan with his mouth. He feasted on her hungrily, licking up every bit of that salty sweet nectar, digging hard into her passage to get the last of it, and lapping it from the length of her sex with a quick, flat tongue. When his tongue hit her clit, her pelvis raised off the mattress, smothering her cunt against his face for grander feeling. Luke didn’t even mind that she was slightly suffocating him.

But he did mind the panties digging into the side of his cheek.

“Sorry, Felicity,” Luke answered her whimper as he tore away his tongue from her gushing pussy. He hooked fingers under her panties, “But I have to get these off you.”

He went to pull, but found her hand blocking him.

“Wait,” Felicity looked up at him. “Luke… this is the first time I’m going to be fully naked in front of you.”

Luke smiled, “Yes… it is.”

“I want to see you too. Can I?”

Luke pressed a kiss to her lips, “Of course.”

Then, never breaking the kiss, he slowly eased the panties off of her. He held the panties for a moment, focusing his attentions to it. Sexual effusions clung to the damp fabric. It smelled of her desire for him, and that was a smell Luke would never forget.

But of course, that wasn’t the sight Luke wanted. He dropped the panties to the floor and then got up, standing next to the bed to enjoy the view.

What a glorious view, pale skin smattered with scars; a toned, athletic form; heaving breasts with perky nipples; sweat glistening across her skin; and a bare, sopping pussy, just waiting for him to bury his way to the hilt.

This body was his to do as he pleased.

He didn’t get to enjoy the view for very long. Felicity jumped off the bed and knelt before him. With no ceremony, she yanked down his briefs, his hard cock springing toward her eagerly. His erection knew its final destination and wanted to reach it as soon as possible.

Felicity was very compliant with that, for the second Luke had kicked his underwear from around his feet, her mouth was around his cock. Her mouth was so tight and wet as she bobbed up and down his shaft. He wanted more, so much more. He wanted to explode again down her throat. Felicity was skilled in a great many things, and this was definitely one of them.

“Stop,” Luke pushed her head away from him. He panted, trying to regain control, “I’m not going to last if you keep this up. Please, I just want to look at you.”
“Alright,” Felicity laid down on the bed, spreading her legs slightly, presenting her naked body to him as he stood before her fully nude and hard for her. “Do you enjoy the view? I’m certainly enjoying mine.”

“You are truly a piece of art,” Luke’s eyes roamed over her naked form, his breaths slow and heavy. Felicity smirked that one corner smirk that had been driving him wild for a year.

“Well, I have some good news for you, Master Skywalker,” Felicity’s hands trailed down her body teasingly as Luke crawled onto the bed over her. She teased her lips over his when they came into reach, “This isn’t a museum. You are more than welcome to touch the art.”

And he did.

Half an hour later, they laid nude in Luke’s bed, their skin illuminated only by the ever-present lights of Coruscant that filtered through the window.

Luke was reclining on his side, his right arm supporting his torso upright to look upon Felicity lying next to him. She looked like a Goddess, bathed in pale blue light, panting gently. His left hand caressed her soft skin in random patterns as she rested from the orgasm his mouth had just given her.

They had already gone through the prerequisite motions of making each other hard, wet, and ready. Their hands and mouths had passionately refamiliarized themselves with the foreign territory of each other’s bodies. They had explored and found the tender spots that would drive and enhance future lovemaking. That spot on Luke’s left shoulder blade, the pit of Felicity’s right knee, the one rib close to Felicity’s heart, and even that one spot on Luke’s left elbow that had surprised them both.

They had discovered every odd or unnatural mark the other carried on their skin. Every tattoo – at the time, Felicity had three – every birth mark – Luke had one on his left thigh, and Felicity had one a few inches above her right hip that Luke would develop the tendency to kiss during lovemaking – and every scar, though there were too many of those to count. Later they would lounge in the bed and tell the story of each mark, but in that moment, nothing mattered but looking deep into each other’s eyes and basking in the love that pulsed through the air.

Luke’s hand traced the lines of one of Felicity’s scars. That one she had gotten in a shoot-out on Onderon.

Felicity watched him with a smile on her face. It was intense how much love and trust filled her eyes in that moment.

Slowly, Felicity sat up, and pressed a tender kiss to his lips. Luke sighed into the kiss, once again enjoying how right her lips felt upon his. His left hand reached up into her hair, and held her head close to him.

No blanket shielded their modesty, but they needed no coverings. They were not embarrassed to lay nude together, it felt easy and natural. Luke even briefly thought that he could see them doing it in a completely non-sexual manner.

Breaking the kiss, Felicity bowed her head. Luke pressed his lips to her forehead and she trailed a hand across his broad chest.

“This moment feels so perfect,” Felicity murmured. “I don’t deserve this.”
Luke lifted her chin and let his sapphire orbs stare into those large hazel rings.

Felicity reached up and stroked his cheek.

Luke gave a small frown and whispered, “You’re trembling.”

Felicity took a deep breath, she couldn’t deny the jittering of the hand against Luke’s cheek, “I’m frightened.”

Luke gently grasped her shaking wrist, and her arm stilled. His eyes bore into her own.

She swallowed.

“This moment,” Felicity admitted. “Of it not being perfect. Of it being something you regret. Of it not at all being right. But most of all, I’m terrified… of it being the most right thing in my life.”

“This isn’t a death sentence,” Luke said.

“No… It’s a life sentence.”

She wrapped her arms around his neck, and they kissed passionately for a several minutes. His lips were upon her own, her cheek, her neck, and her lips graced his forehead and suckled on his jawbone.

When they finally broke, it wasn’t just Felicity who was trembling.

“I love you, Luke Skywalker,” Felicity pressed her forehead to his again – it was a gesture Luke would learn to be her sign of utmost trust and intimacy. His name was like a prayer on her lips.

“I love you, Felicity Rhiaon,” Luke whispered back, her own name just as tender upon his lips.

Felicity took a deep breath, and then threw her leg over his to straddle him. She sat raised on her knees, hovering over his erect shaft, not yet joined as one. Lust crackled in the air from the tease of proximity.

“If we do this,” Felicity’s lips ghosted over his, “…that’s it. Game over. We both know there’s no going back. If we make love…”

She sighed happily as Luke pressed phantom kisses to her breast. Felicity moaned in appreciation, but removed his mouth from her skin. She guided him to look at her.

“If we make love…” Felicity did not break eye contact, “I’ll be yours… forever.”

He placed a hand on her cheek, “And I, yours.”

“Promise?” There was no teasing in her tone, quite uncharacteristic for Felicity. No, this was Felicity Rhiaon at her absolute most vulnerable, opening her heart fully to someone for the first time since her brother had died.

“I swear it,” Luke vowed. “For the rest of my days, from this night forward, there will be no other. No man. No woman. Just you. Only you.”
“And if I die?” Felicity couldn’t look him in the eye as she asked the question.

“Only you,” Luke promised. “Force Forbid you leave this world before I do… I will be faithful, not one other into my heart, life, or bed.”

“No,” Felicity said firmly. “Love me forever, Luke… But don’t let our love shut you off. I will love you beyond my dying days, and I know you will love me too. But don’t be afraid to move on… if you find another who can keep your heart full until we meet again, take that chance.”

“Alright,” Luke said. “But I should let you know that I absolutely plan on going before you. Yes, I look good in black, but I am so not working out what to put on your tombstone.”

“Rogue One. Fighter. Lover… Maybe throw in Mother if I have kids by then, because I am so going to be the best mom.”

“You will, will you?” Luke chuckled.

“Yes, you do appear so,” Felicity glanced down with a teasing smile. She gave a sigh of contentment as he held her arms and traced circles with his thumbs into her skin. Felicity looked back up at Luke, a serious expression overtaking her face. She brushed some of the hair groomed neatly behind his ear, and staring deep into his eyes, said, “Luke… I’m ready.”

His breath hitched, “Are you sure? Because if you need anything else… Oral, fingers, kissing, a glass of water, a bathroom break-”

He furrowed his brow ever so slightly, then testing her, he reached out and stroked the lightsaber scar down her spine.

Felicity didn’t flinch, “Positive… Luke Skywalker… I want to make love to you.”

Then without another word, Felicity leaned forward and kissed him deeply. Luke’s hand automatically wove into her hair, pulling her in close. His tongue danced with her own in perfect harmony as they poured the unfathomable depth of their love into the insatiable kiss.

Luke frowned slightly, “You don’t want to remain in this position? With you on top? You can control the depth and speed much better.”
“I’m not a frigid virgin, Luke,” Felicity teased. “I can handle you just fine.”

“Now, that’s not very sexy talk.”

“No, but this is,” Luke grabbed her by the waist and gently flipped them over so she was lying on the mattress, completely prone as he hovered over her. He leaned in close and in a tone a little above a whisper, ordered Felicity, “Spread your legs.”

Felicity swallowed, her eyes heated as Luke triggered something basely lustful about her.

“Yes, Sir,” Felicity spread her legs apart obediently.

Luke’s breath caught; Felicity was submissive in bed?

Looking at Luke, one wouldn’t expect him to enjoy a very dominant role, but in the bedroom, he was very much the one in charge. He had always had a flair for the dramatic and he loved the sensation of taking complete control of his partner’s body and the pleasure it received.

With Felicity, he had expected a fight for control; two alphas scrapping over dominance. To see Felicity presenting herself to him without a mocking look or sarcastic quip made Luke hard as a rock.

“So, this is what turns off the snark,” Luke kissed the valley between her breasts. “I daresay, I might miss it.”

“Worry not, Master Skywalker,” Felicity arched her neck as he nibbled at her collarbone, “I have other methods of torment in the bedroom.”

Luke groaned as she grasped his cock. She jerked it a few times, letting her hand run up and down the entire length. Reaching his base, her fingernails ever so lightly dragged across his engorged balls. Felicity stroked back up, then unsheathed his head, and circled the exposed crown.

He moaned in pleasure and trailed soft kisses down her middle, starting at her collarbone, between her breasts, and stopping at her waist. Luke then grabbed her wrist and moved her hand from his hardened cock. He kissed his way back up to her lips, and held her face as he lovingly kissed her for several minutes.

Their kiss was tender and sweet, only with a touch of sensuality. It wasn’t until Felicity slid her tongue into Luke’s mouth and caressed the roof, stimulating his sensitive palate that Luke was drawn back to his ultimate goal.

Caressing her sides, Luke shifted his legs and hers into position. It took a few tries for Luke and Felicity to figure out which limb went where, but soon they were settled in position: Luke’s legs between her thighs as her legs hooked over his hips. Just a few more movements and his cock would be propped against her aching entrance.

Luke reached down and grasped his cock. He pumped it a few times, making certain it was hard, then positioned it at her entrance. Felicity lifted her pelvis in anticipation, but moaned when Luke started gliding the head across her wet sex.

“Luke,” Felicity moaned as his cock rubbed against her clit. “Oh, that’s so not fair. That feels so good, but I want you inside of me.”

“Patience, Sweetheart,” Luke assured her. He angled his cock back towards her entrance and rubbed against it, coating himself in her juices. “I just need to make sure we’re both properly lubricated. Just enjoy.”

“Oh, I am. Don’t you worry about that.”

He stimulated her for a while, enjoying her moans and the feeling of his cock gliding across her quim. The quim he was about to take, and claim as his forever. No more distractions, no more interruptions, no more pulling away at the last second. It was time.

Luke Skywalker going to make love to Felicity Rhiaon.

He hunched over her and settled his cock against her entrance. Felicity moaned, her hips twitching as she sensed what was about to happen.

Luke peppered kisses up her neck, and then whispered in her ear, “I love you, Felicity Rhiaon.”

“I love you too, Luke Skywalker,” Felicity whispered back, wrapping her arms around his neck and looking deep into his eyes.

Luke bent down and kissed her passionately. They poured all of their love and devotion into that one earth shattering kiss.

Then he pushed inside of her.

Felicity cried out as his cock filled her for the first time. It was Luke’s favorite moment of sex to hear the noise she made when he entered her. Every time it happened, whether it was passionate lovemaking, a primal fuck, or a quickie at lunchtime on his desk, Felicity always moaned when he entered her.

Oh, God, Luke couldn’t stand it. Felicity felt amazing; wet and tight, her walls gripping his stiff shaft as he slid in deeper and deeper. Her cunt was so warm, so good. Oh, fuck, if he had known this is what it felt like to be buried inside of Felicity Rhiaon, he would have shoved her against a wall, pulled down her panties, and drove himself into her in front of everyone on Yavin IV a year ago.

“All the way, please,” Felicity begged. “I want to feel you all the way inside of me.”

Luke kissed her deeply again and pushed himself hard into her. He was pushing so hard that Luke wasn’t paying enough attention and slammed into her cervix.

Felicity shrieked.

“I am so sorry,” Luke hastily pulled back out. “I didn’t mean to hurt you.”

“Stop,” Felicity grabbed his hips again, “you didn’t hurt me.”

“Depends on the woman,” Felicity eased his hips forward, Luke sliding his shaft back into her. Her eyes closed in pleasure, “For some it’s the worst pain imaginable… For others- Oh Gods, yes!”
Luke grinned, gently swirling his hips to churn his cock inside of her, “I assume you’re in the other category.”

“Oh, yes, Luke, just like that,” Felicity panted as he didn’t withdraw. He allowed her to adjust to the feeling of his cock inside of her. Her arms and legs were clutching him tightly, her face buried in his neck as she moaned in pleasure at him filling her and stretching her out. “Oh Gods, you’re bigger than you look.”

“Is it too much?”

“No, you’re big but not to a point where it’s unmanageable. I’m just going to have to reposition myself a little,” Felicity wriggled until settling into a better position. “There we go. That’s right.”

“It is, isn’t it?” Luke grinned, kissing her shoulders. “You feel so good around me. So hot and tight and wet. It’s like you were molded to fit around my cock.”

“Well, technically,” Felicity moaned as she gently rolled her hips. “Your cock was molded to fit my cunt. I am older than you, after all. I came first.”

“And you always will,” Luke made his first thrust out and then back in her. “Oh, I could get used to doing this.”

“I have no objections to that,” Felicity groaned as he steadily thrusted in and out of her. “Oh, yes, Luke. Faster. Push that big cock in me. Don’t stop, Sweetheart. Don’t you dare stop this time!”

And so he made love to her, his cock thrusting in and out of her heat at a steady pace. The wet slapping of their flesh filled the room, accented by moans and cries of pleasure, and Felicity’s increasingly profane utterings.

Luke held her body down, his cock pounding her into the mattress. Felicity clutched at him; scratching and biting his shoulders and back. Mouths burned kisses across tender flesh, hands stroked and grasped sensitive spots. Felicity’s juices seeped out of her cunt, staining the sheet below while Luke’s pre-cum dripped into her tender passage.

The room smelt musky and hot, filled with the undeniable scent of sex. Their bodies and mouths tasted a mixture of sweet, and salt, and the metallic taste of blood (during a particularly rough kiss, Felicity ended up biting Luke’s lip a little too hard.) Their tongues danced with each other, and ran the length of each other’s skin.

Hands pulled at hair, and took turns sliding down to the blazing juncture where Luke’s cock drove in and out of Felicity’s cunt, to tease her begging clit. During one of Luke’s ventures down, Felicity got the idea to join him down there and tease his heavy balls as they slapped against her. She could feel them tightening, ready to explode.

“You’re getting close,” Felicity whimpered, not wanting the glorious feeling of his cock driving in and out of her to end.

“Oh, yes, Luke. Faster. Push that big cock in me. Don’t stop, Sweetheart. Don’t you dare stop this time!”

And then, a miracle.
Felicity’s breath started hitching, and Luke felt the tremors in her legs.

“You’re about to come, aren’t you?” Luke whispered in her ear, driving into her like no tomorrow.

“Yes,” Felicity panted, thrusting up against him. “Oh, I don’t want this to stop. You feel so good inside of me. Like it’s right. Like this is the most right thing in my life here with you. Oh Gods, oh LUKE!”

Felicity climaxed violently around him, screaming his name. He tapped into her mental shields, which she lowered to him, and felt the mental euphoria she experienced spasming around his hard cock, which was still thrusting into her. Luke wished he could physically feel the pleasure she was experiencing, but was satisfied by the knowledge that he was the one giving it to her… and he was giving it good.

He stopped his thrusting as Felicity came off the end of her orgasm. She panted beneath him, his hard cock still wedged inside of her.

Felicity looked him in the eyes and with a lazy smile, ran her fingers through his hair and said, “Thank you.”

He smiled, bent down, and kissed her. He gently pumped into her quivering passage a few times, savouring the feeling of being inside her the first time. Luke enjoyed watching her face as she gave into the pleasure he made tingle between her legs.

And then he emptied inside of her. It was like electricity crackling through his body as his climax exploded in him. He shot into her a few times, her sensitive quim gripping him tightly, milking him for all he had.

Even more arousing was the fact that he was actually climaxing inside of a woman, something he had not done for a very long time. Condoms had been his go-to for years, but knowing Felicity was on the pill and they were both clean, Luke didn’t want any barrier between them. In that moment, he knew this would be the last cunt he ever entered, the last woman whose legs would wrap around his hips, the last partner he ever climaxed inside of. While he wasn’t worried about pregnancy, a small part of him was smug about how he was shooting into her, marking her, and trying to stake a claim on her womb. Not to mention there was the extremely sensual fact that as he pulled his deflated cock out of her wet cunt, his essence dripped out of her onto the sheets below.

“I hope you didn’t have plans for tomorrow,” Luke whispered huskily, hands caressing patterns into her skin as he laid down on the bed next to her. “Because you are not leaving this bed anytime soon.”

Luke frowned, sitting up, “Where are you going?”

“To the fresher,” She answered. “Luke, we’ve already established that I don’t want to get a UTI. Plus as sexy as it is to have you dripping down my leg, when this stuff dries it starts to get uncomfortable, and I would like to get a few of these in before we call it a night. I’m just going to go clean up a little.”

“And you’re not going to dress?” Luke watched her walk naked across the room.

“Is there a point to me getting dressed?” Felicity smirked, pausing at the door.
“Well, is this when I get to bend you over the sink in the fresher?”

“Maybe after round two… or three.”

“I suggest you get moving, or round two is going to be against that door.”

No more than ten minutes later, Felicity was crawling back into the bed and into Luke’s awaiting embrace. Felicity couldn’t wipe the grin off her face as she lay nude, staring up at the ceiling, tangled in the sheets with Luke. They were sweaty and breathless, basking in the aftermath euphoria of their lovemaking.

“So, you were absolutely right,” Luke said between pants, still in something of a daze. “Letting you – how did you put it – have your wicked way with me is something I definitely don’t regret. How was it for you? Your emotions were pretty… well, let’s just say I was getting a lot of positive feedback.”

“That was… Oh, my God, that was amazing,” Felicity struggled to focus on forming words. She’d much rather use her brainpower to memorize the images of their bodies pressed together, and the feeling of his gentle, yet commanding touch.

Felicity chuckled, rolling over onto her side to face him. Slowly she ran her fingers over his chest, tracing lazy patterns onto his skin.

“Well,” Felicity tried to sound coy. “It wasn’t the best I’ve ever had, but we need more time to learn each other.”

“I am definitely up for that,” Luke nibbled at her earlobe.

“Oh, Luke,” Felicity moaned as his tongue and teeth played with the sensitive spot under her earlobe. She whimpered when he eventually pulled away. “All that said, it was by far the best first time I’ve ever had with a new partner. The way you can just sense-”

Felicity stopped short. Luke knew she had figured out his secret.

“You know,” Felicity propped her head onto her hand, her elbow resting on the mattress. “I don’t think you’re allowed to use the Force for that.”

Luke grinned at her, reaching out to run a hand through her soft brown hair, “I’m the Jedi Grandmaster.”

Catching her lips in a heated kiss, Luke shifted his body so that he was hovering over top of her. Slowly, he pulled out of their kiss and began trailing his lips down her body, nipping, kissing, and licking.

“And if I say I am allowed to use the Force to know to do this.”

Felicity gasped as his tongue thrust into her. She buried her hand in his blonde hair as his mouth worked magic between her thighs. Her hips bucked and she threw her head back against the mattress, moaning wildly at the pleasure he gave her.

Luke broke from her and Felicity let out a pathetic whimper. She gripped his hair tightly by the roots, and tried to pull his mouth back onto her, but he just smiled up at Felicity.

“Then I’m allowed to use the Force for that.” A thought occurred to Luke and he paused. Luke looked so innocent with his sparkling blue eyes, and he could sense the look was driving Felicity wild, “Unless… you don’t want me to do that?”

Felicity grinned down at Luke, staring into his loving eyes, “Luke, if you don’t do that to me again right now, I’m leaving you.”

Luke smirked, pulling himself up to kiss her, “I have a better idea. Something else we can do, regarding a small fact you may have forgotten.”

“Oh?” Felicity arched an eyebrow, mischief dancing in her eyes. “We’ve done quite a bit. Hands… Mouths… Something else.”

Luke grunted as she quickly lifted her hips and rolled against him.

“What could I have forgotten?” Felicity smirked, watching in amusement as he struggled to recover from the sudden bit of pleasure.

Luke pulled her face to his, kissing her fervently. Felicity was quick to return the gesture. As their kisses became heated, Luke pressed Felicity against the bed and his mechanical hand drifted lower.

Kissing his way across her jaw, Luke leaned in close and whispered, “I’m ambidextrous.”

She yelped again as not one, but two mechanical fingers slid into her, his oral performance having made her more than ready to receive them. He revelled in the small gasps he was causing her to emit as her arm wrapped around his shoulders pressing his body close to her.

“And you said you didn’t like my hand,” Luke chuckled. The heel of his palm pressing down hard on her clit as his fingers worked her deftly.

“Never mind, you win, that hand is amazing,” Felicity’s words came out a mile a minute. She writhed, her hips arching off the mattress, “Just don’t stop what you’re doing to me.”

Luke didn’t stop.
Part Four: Courtship

Chapter Summary

Luke recalls the trials and triumphs during the years leading up to his decision to propose to Felicity.

Chapter Notes

So, there are more sex scenes planned in the future, mostly between Luke and Felicity, but I’m curious to hear feedback on whether or not you guys want to see more of them in the story (sex scenes, I mean. I know you guys love Rhiwalker.) It wouldn’t just be Luke and Felicity, but (as you probably have guessed) Luke and Aletha, Lando and Alyla, and then a few more ones involving people I can’t reveal at the moment because of spoilers. Considering how this is tagged on AO3, I will say, no there’s not going to be any love scenes between Finn and Rey in this story (we’ll see how things develop in The Last Jedi for their relationship) but there may be at least a foreplay scene with Rey and Teng Malar, who yes, is a canon character, but no, you’re not allowed to look him up yet.

Please let me know what you think. I’ll also continue to inform you in the author’s notes if there is a dirtier version on AO3 for that chapter, which for this and all the Luke flashing back to Felicity chapters on, there will be.

Enjoy!

See the end of the chapter for more notes.

The Long Way Home

Chapter Twenty-Six

Part Four: Courtship

1 Year, 1 Day

When Luke woke in the morning, he was relieved to find that the previous night had not been a dream. Felicity Rhiaon was lying nude in his bed, peacefully sleeping next to him, her legs splayed apart obscenely as the remains of his cum leaked out of her cunt.

Luke smiled to himself at the sight. He wanted nothing more than to dive between her legs, and have her for breakfast. It would be so sexy to wake her up by eating her out, but it would have to wait for another time. First there would have to be a conversation where he gained her consent to such an action. It was like that day in the hospital: if he wasn’t going to kiss Felicity without her permission while she slept, he certainly wasn’t about to perform oral sex.
He admired the sight for a while; waking up to Felicity Rhiaon in his bed, snuggled up against him, her hair splayed across the pillows, her chest heaving up and down was steady breaths, and her bare skin pressed against his, sending warm feelings of love and intimacy through his body. The act of sleeping next to a person was so profoundly intimate; it was the state in which a person was most vulnerable, and one was placing absolute trust in their partner to protect them.

Luke would protect her: from anything and everyone, from this day forward until the day he died. He would spend every morning for the rest of his life with Felicity having her to hold, and love, and kiss, and laugh, talk about the painful past, talk about the terrifying future. … And to take care of his hard on that had risen with the sun.

He couldn’t wait any longer; he needed Felicity awake.

Luke leaned over her, and with a hand stroking her thigh, whispered lovingly, “Felicity. It’s time to wake up, Sweetheart.”

Felicity groaned negatively and shifted slightly. Her neck arched as she turned her face away, trying to capture a little more sleep than her lover would allow. Luke couldn’t help but grin when he saw the series of dark marks on her neck. Hickeys were scattered about her pale skin, mostly concentrated on her neck – he had kissed that quite a bit last night, now that he thought about it – but there were also a few marks on her breasts and thighs.

“Felicity,” Luke murmured into her skin as he tenderly kissed the marks on her neck. He couldn’t help but touch her, his hands stroking up her sides. “Felicity, please wake up.”

Felicity cried out as a knuckle bared down on her clit. Now that she was awake, Luke felt at ease to start touching her again.

“Oh, I have to wake up next to you more often,” Felicity moaned. “Kiss me, Master Skywalker.”

He needed no further instruction. Shifting himself to hover over her, Luke pressed his lips to hers hungrily, his tongue slipping into her mouth, and his knuckle bared down on her clit. It was one from his natural hand, as a mechanical knuckle would have seriously bruised Felicity at that pressure, putting her out of commission for a while. And after a night like last night, he wasn’t going to take a break from making love to her for a very long time.

“Easy, easy,” Felicity moved his hand away from her clit and rested it on her hip. “Give me a second to actually wake up before we get to the main event.”

“Sorry,” Luke chuckled. “I was just so eager. How can I not be when I have a naked Felicity Rhiaon in my bed?”

“You say that as if it’s an accomplishment. Let’s not forget that I am the vixen who miraculously got the legendary Luke Skywalker into her bed. I should get a medal for that, or at least a discount at restaurants.”

Luke frowned, “I’m not a legend.”

“You are after last night,” Felicity pushed the topic away. She knew how self-conscious Luke could get about his hero reputation. “You know, after Reine and Obik’s wedding, I had a hypothesis, and I had tested it a few times since, but after last night I can safely say that you are an absolute God with your mouth.”
“Well, if you need to test that theory any further, I’m more than happy to oblige,” Luke lined kisses down the length of her neck, then gave a long flat lick back up to her jaw. “And if I’m a God, then you must be my Goddess. You’re so… beautiful.”

Felicity smiled as Luke worked his way across her jaw, “Only because I’m so in love.”

Luke laughed and pulled back, “No, no, it’s because I’m so in love with-”

“Wait,” Felicity put a finger on his lips.

“What is it?”

“Nothing,” She had an odd expression. “I just feel like if we continue this train of dialogue, we’re going to end up saying something completely sappy that, while I may not particularly mind the words, a lot of other people would find it something to mock.”

Luke frowned, “Felicity… who is going to even know we said this?”

“I just feel like we shouldn’t risk it.”

Luke sighed, “Fine. Can we just get back to kissing?”

Felicity chuckled, “Wow… four times last night and you’re still eager for more? I severely underestimated you. I don’t know if I’ll be able to keep up with that on a regular basis.”

“Actually, I’m quite proud I managed four times in one night. That’s not an everyday thing.”

“I’m glad I can inspire you.” Felicity moaned as his erection pressed against her thigh, “And it looks like you’re already inspired this morning too.”

“Ready for round five?”

“I think I’m going to need a little inspiration first. It’s a pity you didn’t wake me up a different way this morning,” Felicity’s thumb ran over Luke’s lips.

“Thought about it,” Luke confessed, “but wanted to run the idea by you first. How horrifying would it be for you to wake up to my tongue in your quim and you not wanting it?”

“Yes, thank you for not raping me. I do appreciate it.”

“Anytime.”

The pair of them laughed. The heat of the mood was simmering, but neither seemed too inclined to progress things at the moment. They enjoyed just lying together, sharing lazy touches, kissing, and loving each other.

“And I made love to Luke Skywalker, scars and all,” Felicity stroked her hands across his broad chest. “Luke Skywalker kissed me, and touched me, undressed me in his living room, carried me to his bedroom, peeled off my underwear, and threw it-”

Felicity looked over the edge of the bed as if she was going to say it as she looked upon the location of her undergarments. But her words died when she saw they weren’t there.

“Luke?” Felicity frowned, her voice completely serious as she looked around the room. “Where did my underwear go? And my bra… and your underwear?”

Luke scowled and looked about in confusion. His eyes fell on the hamper in the corner, and he gave a heavy sigh, “Threepio.”

“Excuse me?”

“It was Threepio. Look, the sheets and blankets are neatly folded, sitting on top of my hamper. He must have come in at some point this morning and… cleaned up our mess.”

Felicity stared at Luke, “Threepio came in the room?”

“Oh huh.”

“While we were sleeping?”

“And we… slept naked.”

“I see where this is going, Felicity, and there’s no need to freak out,” Luke said calmly.

“No need to freak out?” Felicity’s tone was the opposite of calm. “LUKE! C-3PO saw me naked!”

“Felicity, Threepio saw Leia and I come out of our mother. If he doesn’t talk about that on a regular basis, he’s not going to talk about this.”

“Luke!”

“Felicity,” Luke chided. “C-3PO is an etiquette droid. He may be a little oblivious when it comes to interrupting romantic encounters, but it is literally against his programming to discuss someone’s sex life with an outside party.”

Felicity sighed, “Are you sure? The last thing I need is Han Solo winking at me and telling you ‘Atta boy.’”

“You say that as if I’m not going to tell Han everything already.”

“No fair,” Felicity playfully smacked his chest. “I don’t get to discuss this with anyone. Diego tells me to stop anytime I bring up my sex life, and Leia’s your sister. I’m so not going to look her in the eye and tell her ‘Guess what? I screwed your twin brother last night. Four times! High five!’”

“Try Zena,” Luke suggested. “She’s surprisingly open about that kind of conversation. And I’m sure Gavyn would be happy to provide a high five. Though he might only give you it if you manage to bed me five times.”

“Well, we’ll have to get to work on that, won’t we?” Felicity smirked. Casually, she glanced back at Luke’s hamper. “Luke… didn’t we fall asleep under the sheets last night?”

“After round three, yes. But we ended up pushing them on the floor when you misbehaved.”

“Misbehaved?” Felicity arched a brow. She slowly ran a hand down her body and caressed her breast, her middle finger ringing around her hardening nipple, “How did I misbehave?”

Luke grinned, recalling the events of the previous night, “You pulled a Romian.”
“A Rornian?”

“You lied next to me, my body pressed against yours, waited until I was seconds from sleep, and then started touching yourself.”

“You mean like this?” Felicity slipped a hand between her legs and started stroking herself in front of Luke.

“Yes,” Luke breathed, something dark flashing in him. “While I was right next to you, ready to give you pleasure, you touched yourself. Your hands teased your nipples…”

Luke knocked Felicity’s playful hand from her breast, his mechanical hand replacing it with carefully calculated – rough touches.

“And your other teasing your clit…”

Luke pushed away the fingers on her sex and replaced it with the knuckle action he had tried earlier. Felicity was moaning wildly as he pleasured her.

“While I was next to you,” Luke whispered in her ear. “Do you know how hard it was for me to let you do that on Rornian, and not do anything about it? Do you know how much I wanted to follow you into the fresher and bend you over the sink, Reine be damned? Do you know how hard you made me that night? How frantically I jerked myself stimulated by the images and underwear you had given me? Do you know how hard I climaxed while you were in the fresher?”

Felicity’s hips bucked, jerking her clit against his hand.

“I wasn’t going to let it slide this time,” Luke’s voice was husky.

“So what did you do?” Felicity begged him to further the pleasure. To take her the same way he had last night.

But that wasn’t his plan this time. At least… not exactly.

“So, I ripped off the sheets and threw them to the floor to watch you touch yourself,” Luke’s fingers dipped down to her entrance to spread her forming wetness across her aroused sex. “Then I shoved you onto your side.”

Luke did just that.

“Your back was pressed against my chest,” Luke pressed firmly against her. His hands readjusting the angle of their play as kissed down the scar on her spine. “Then I made you hold up your leg…”

Luke hooked Felicity’s own hand around the leg on top, and guided her to raise it. He had her bend at the knee and readjust the grip, opening her wet cunt wider to him for a deeper angle. When Felicity was holding her leg up herself, Luke swirled his fore and middle fingers in her juices, getting them well lubricated. His hard cock was against the thigh of the leg lying on the bed, and he gently bucked his hips against her.

“And then I fucked you,” Luke’s words were sharp in her ear as he slammed his fingers into her.

The previous night, Felicity had told him that she loved when kindly, soft-spoken Luke Skywalker suddenly said the most vulgar things about how she made him feel and what he would do to her. It felt like he was losing control to her, but in reality, it was the opposite.
That was the signal that Luke was taking control.

“I fucked you so hard,” Luke hissed in Felicity ear as she moaned wildly, his fingers crudely slamming in and out of her. “I fucked that sopping cunt until you cried. Do you remember that? How you buried your face into the pillow, tears staining it as you begged me never to stop?”

“Oh Gods, Luke!” Felicity squeezed her eyes shut as he curled his fingers and rubbed the coarse walls of her G-spot.

“That was after the first orgasm, right? You were crying because your cunt was so tender from that orgasm, but I kept pumping into you, rubbing your clit and nipples until you came undone, screaming my name again. Was it the first orgasm that made you sensitive? Or had you not calmed down from the previous times? How many times did I make you cum last night? Did you count?”

“Seven,” Felicity gasped as he withdrew one finger and the remaining started stroking her cervix. It wasn’t a move made for every woman but it was literally making Felicity’s toes curl as her legs tensed at the pleasure. “You made me cum seven times last night.”

“Seven?” Luke chuckled, swirling his finger around her walls. “That sounds like a lot. Are you sure?”

“Positive.”

“Count them for me.”

Felicity gasped as he started pumping his finger in her again. Desperately, she reached back, her hand rubbing cluelessly against him as she searched for his cock. Luke rocked his hips to remind her his shaft was still resting on her thigh. Immediately she reached down and grabbed it.

After the first pump, she paused and then let go. Luke frowned and was about to direct her hand back when he felt her fingers join him. Her fingers swirled around the exterior of her sex, and she shuddered as their fingers met, her fingers playing around as his pumped in and out of her sex.

Luke realized that she was trying to gather up her own natural lubrication to smear against his cock and pump him easier. Eagerly, Luke removed his hand and let Felicity’s fingers enter her passage in search of her slippery effusions. He reached down to his hard cock and spread Felicity’s juices that clung to his fingers across it. Watching her pleasure herself as he rubbed his shaft, Luke was tempted to stay that way, and get himself off to the live performance of Felicity pumping her fingers in and out of that tender sex he had claimed over and over again the previous night. But that very action was what had started this whole thing.

“No,” Luke pulled her hand out of her cunt and wrapped it around his cock. His hand over hers, he guided her to pump him, spreading her wetness the length, “No, that’s what got you in trouble in the first place. That’s why I’m punishing you.”

“If this is what you call punishment,” Felicity panted as he bent down and sucked sharply on her nipple, “bring it on.”

“That’s not your punishment.”

“Oh? What is?”

“This cock,” Luke rubbed it against her one agonisingly slow time. He whispered in to her ear, “Is not going in your cunt this time.”

“Beg all you want, but the answer is no. That’s your punishment for not inviting me to join you on Rornian. Tease me all you want, Miss Rhiaon, but actions have consequences.”

Felicity’s hand paused and her face scrunched together as the wheels turned in her head.

“Huh… Luke, that’s… huh.”

“Luke, what exactly do you like in the bedroom, because that’s getting kinky. It almost sounds like… it’s very dominant.”

“Is it?” Luke softly kissed her neck, a hand gently kneading her breast. “Is that a problem?”

“No, I’m fine with that, but maybe save that sort of thing for another time. Right now, we’re just learning what to do with each other,” Felicity stroked one of his bulky arms.

“I see.”

“I would like an answer, though.”

“An answer to what?”

“Luke, are you in to domination?” Felicity asked plainly.

He chuckled and tenderly kissed her lips, “Ask me again sometime. Right now, we’re just learning what to do with each other.”

Felicity pressed her body back against him as his hand trailed back down.

“Now,” Luke’s voice dropped darkly. He thrust his fingers back into her passage, “I told you to count. One?”

Felicity gasped as his fingers withdrew and violently slammed into her, “Your mouth! After taking off my panties, you laid on the bed and had me kneel over your mouth. Your tongue licked me and ate me and fucked me as I gripped the headboard and rode your face to orgasm.”

“Two?” Luke slammed his fingers into her again.

“Making love. You made love to me so passionately and tenderly, and I came to you pumping me and rubbing my clit.”

“What position did I do that in?”

“On my back. I lay on your bed, naked, dripping, my legs spread for you, Master Skywalker.”

Luke pulled her hand off his cock. He was too close.

“Three?” Luke tried not to sound on edge as his slammed him fingers in and out of Felicity again.

“We were getting ready for round two,” Felicity laid her head back on his shoulder. “You fingered me with your mechanical hand, hovering over me, watching my face as my eyes rolled back into my head and I came so hard we worried all that liquid might ruin your mechanics. You had to actually leave the room for a moment to get your hand kit from your office and clean your hand and check

“You came back into the room and I was on my hands and knees, offering myself to you like a nexu in heat. You mounted me and fucked me until I screamed your name. You bit and scratched my back, kisses trailing along my scar. Then you gripped my hips and slammed me back into you as your hips slammed forward into me.”

“And when you came?” Luke prompted.

Felicity moaned, “You tried to keep going but I begged you to stop because I couldn’t take it anymore.”

“Five?”

“I went into the fresher for a while, wearing one of your tunics so the droids didn’t see me naked. I needed to clean up and get away from temptation for a minute.”

“And when you returned to the room?”

“You were waiting for me at the door,” Felicity gasped as his fingers moved ever faster inside of her. “You shut the door, slammed me against it, and thrust into me like there was no tomorrow.”

“And you wrapped your legs around my hips,” Luke grunted as his cock yearned for attention. One touch and it’d all be over. “I drove so deep into you, your walls clinging against me. I could feel my other deposits in you, and tasted them when I ate you out. You remember that, right? How my tongue tasted your cunt against the door before my cock claimed you?”

“Six?” Luke’s hand slammed into her. Needing to up the pleasure, he slid another finger into Felicity, stretching her out three fingers wide.

“On my side, as you said before,” Felicity rocked her hands back against him. “You fucked me in this position until I came. It didn’t take long.”

“No, that was a quick one,” Luke chuckled. He gently pressed her face into the pillow, “In fact it was so quick that it led to seven.”

“You fucking me as I cried into my pillow,” Felicity’s voice was muffled in the pillow as she got closer and closer, “Just one more, Felicity, you said. Just one more, Sweetheart. You whispered that as you thrust in and out, in and out, until…. OH FUCK, LUKE!”

He shoved his fingers in hard and held them there as her cunt climaxed violently against them. His lips were on hers the whole time as she whimpered beneath him. When she finished, he withdrew his hands and held her in his arms tenderly, calming her down from her high.

“Please tell me we’re not leaving this bed today,” Luke panted heavily, the dark dominance fading away having been satisfied by Felicity’s satisfaction.

Felicity let go of her leg, nuzzled his neck, and snuggled up in his arms, “I will have to make one detour down to my apartment in about an hour to take my pill, or else we’re going to have to start using that box of condoms in your bedside table.”
“Well, I did pay good money for them.”

“Alright, we have a plan for this weekend,” Felicity had that eager, confident look in her eyes that always came with a challenge. “Today is Saturday morning, and by Sunday night, we’re going to have fucked our way through an entire box of condoms.”

“Thank the Force I did away with the no attachment rule.” Luke started to turn Felicity over onto her back, “But first, I need to finish this round.”

“Wait,” Felicity stopped his hands. “No, not right now. I’m still really tender and you’re probably only going to last one pump. If you’re going in me, I don’t want you out for a while.”

Luke frowned, “What do you want me to do then? Wait for it to go down?”

“No, you can finish yourself off.”

“I would like to literally request a hand with that then.”

“I have a better idea.” Felicity spread her legs, “How about you rub yourself between my thighs?”

The idea thrilled Luke. He immediately lifted her leg, wedged his cock between her thighs, and closed her legs to a tight but comfortable squeeze. Luke thrust into her frantically, delighting in the new sensation of his cock gliding between her smooth thighs.

“I thought we established that last night. It was laziness.”

It didn’t take long before Luke came between her thighs. After he did, the two decided to take a little break. They casually chatted for about fifteen minutes as they cleaned each other off with the tissues from Luke’s bedside table. Several minutes were then devoted to examining each other in the light of day, taking time to inspect each other the way the previous night’s frantic lovemaking hadn’t allowed. The examination eventually led to Luke giving Felicity a back rub, which somehow devolved into him once more rubbing and sucking on her breasts.

“You really love doing this, don’t you?” Felicity teased, her hand buried in his hair as he was latched onto her nipple.

“I’ve always been into breasts,” Luke replied when he broke for air. “I don’t care about size, just as long as they’re perky, sensitive, and real.”

“Oh, so when I’m old and my boobs aren’t perky anymore, it’s game over?”

“Absolutely,” Luke teased. “Having a great set of breasts is a very important factor in my choice of sexual partner. God, these breasts are so perfect. So round, so perky, oh God, I could suck these forever.”

“I’ve never gotten the obsession with breasts. My mind just always goes to it being some subconscious thing about feeding from your mother as a baby.”

“In my defense, I don’t think I was nursed as a babe.”

“Maybe that’s why you like them so much,” Felicity joked. “You have a subconscious yearning to suckle as you never got to as a child.”

“Felicity, I thought we agreed not to talk about my parents during sex.”
“Technically we only agreed on your father.” Felicity grabbed his head, and pulled him to her lips. She kissed him deeply, and then asked, “Are you getting hard again?”

“A little,” Luke confessed. “I’m still a little spent from having climaxed so many times last night, but I should be up and running soon.”

“Then let me help you with that,” Felicity smirked.

“Felicity?” Luke grinned as she slid down his body, “What exactly are you doing?”

Her head was between his legs, and her hands rubbed his flexing thighs, “Consider this my apology for that first night on Rornian.”

Luke’s head hit the pillow as she took as much of his cock into her mouth as possible.

Pleasure; it was ultimate pleasure as Felicity’s head bounced up and down his straining cock, guided by his hand in her hair that fine Saturday morning. Her mouth so tight and hot then that unique bit of suction blowjobs provided. If Felicity thought he was a God with his mouth, she was certainly his Goddess Consort with hers. She knew how to lick him, touch him, and suck him in just the right ways.

He held her hair out of her face so he could watch his thick cock disappear between those delectable lips. Luke knew that the ultimate goal was to get hard enough to dive back into her quim, but as she sucked him hard, sloppy saliva getting everywhere, he wanted nothing more than to climax down her throat like he did that night in his office.

Oh God, next time they were on Rornian, he absolutely was going to fuck her on his desk… and over Reine’s sink.

“Felicity,” Luke’s voice was reverent. He stroked her cheek tenderly, and she pulled off his cock, switching to licking the length and fondling his balls.

God, she was exquisite. At 32, Felicity had long passed any thoughts of being self-conscious during sex. Yes, there were times, usually when trying something new or that she wasn’t 100% into that Felicity could get shy, but otherwise Felicity loved to flaunt her body and the pleasure she was given. Perhaps if he had been disparaging about her breast size, she might have been a little more reserved as she had been with her scar, but once Felicity realized that there wasn’t an inch of her body Luke didn’t adore, she was all for the ego trip he would give her during sex.

It was the perfect morning for Luke, this beautiful woman having him for breakfast. He never wanted the moment to end.

The pair froze.

“You have got to be kidding me,” Luke seethed as Felicity pulled her mouth off him.

“Where’s that tunic I wore last night?” Felicity looked around wildly as the metallic clang of footsteps came towards the door.

“Master Luke?” Threepio called again. “Forgive me, sir, but it is almost noon and you are still abed.”

Suddenly, they heard a series of angry beeps.
“Beep boop beep!”

“Yes, Artoo, I know Miss Felicity is in there.”

“Bop boop beep.”

“What else would they be doing but sleeping? They coupled last night. Why would they couple again this morning?”

“Beep bop bee bop.”

“Well, I’m glad you’re proud of him, but I am unclear as to what you are proud of. I must admit, I am happy that Master Luke has chosen Miss Felicity for his reproductive partner. Their genetics would create wonderful offspring.”

Luke’s head was in his hands. He could barely look at Felicity out of embarrassment.

Felicity, to her credit, looked rather unphased by Threepio’s comment.

“Hey, we’ve already agreed we’d be up to making some kids together,” Felicity shrugged. “And with our combined look, our kids would be gorgeous.”

“Master Luke, is that you?”

“Damn it,” Luke muttered. He collected himself, and called to the droids in as light a tone as possible, “Yes, Threepio. We’re awake. Please don’t come in at the moment.”

The footsteps halted, “Oh, forgive me, Sir. I didn’t think you were busy at the moment.”

Luke glanced at Felicity waiting between his legs to resume things, “Uh… little busy. I think we’re going to have a late morning.”

“Of course, sir. I was just going to inform you that I have put Miss Felicity’s clothing from last night in the laundry. Miss Felicity, might I suggest you invest in a cleaning droid for your personal use? You seemed to have made quite a mess of your laundry last night, all scattered about. I know it’s not my place to pry, but your habits seem to be rubbing off on Master Luke. His clothing was quite scattered last night as well.”

Felicity chuckled, “I’ll look into it, Threepio.”

Luke frowned at Felicity; there was a mischievous look in her eye that worried him.

“Uh, Threepio?” Luke cautiously watched as Felicity started to stroke his thighs. “Were you in my room this morning?”

“Of course,” Threepio replied. “I folded your sheets for you and set them on the hamper. Was the temperature too warm in your room for them?”

“I don’t know,” Felicity whispered. “I thought things got pretty hot last night.”

Suddenly her mouth was back on his cock.
“What are you doing?” Luke tried to stay quiet as he pushed Felicity’s head off him.

“Why?”

“I’m bored and horny. I thought doing this while you talk to Threepio would be entertaining to watch.”

“It’s not happening!”

“So you’re saying you don’t want my mouth on your cock?” Felicity raised a coy eyebrow. “Bobbing up and down, sucking, licking, making you feel so good that your empty yourself down my throat as I swallow every last drop?”

There was a beat.

“Yes, sir,” Felicity smirked.

It was a miracle he didn’t cum right then.

“Uh… yeah, fine,” Luke’s voice was strained. Was he actually doing this? Carrying on a conversation with the droids while a beautiful woman sucked his shaft. Good Lord, what kind of witchcraft did this woman use on him. He tried to carry on the conversation as normal, but would mutter every so often words the droids couldn’t hear. “The room temperature was – uh – fine. Felicity was just – ah – a little self-conscious about you being in the room while she was – yeah, like that – not clothed. God, faster Felicity.”

“Oh, fear not, Miss Felicity,” Threepio said, “I am a droid of etiquette. It’s against my programming to discuss your sexual relationship with Master Luke to an outside party.”

Luke smirked; now it was time to turn the tables.

“Master Luke, will Miss Felicity be joining you at lunch today?” Threepio asked.

“I should think so.” Luke looked at Felicity, “You want to have lunch with me?”

“I’d be honored,” Felicity chuckled. She added in a low voice, “Besides, I’m already having my appetizer.”

“Then I guess it’s time for me to have mine,” Luke whispered.

He yanked up Felicity so her sex was inches from his mouth. Instantly, he spun her around so her mouth was back at his cock and his mouth was at her wet quim. Luke pushed her mouth back on his cock, muffling her surprised gasp. Before she could even grasp what had just happened, he thrust his tongue into her cunt and started eating her out as quietly as possible.

“Miss Felicity, I put all of your garments in the laundry,” Threepio said. “Would you like me to go down to your apartment and gather you some clothing for today?”
Luke groaned; would the droids just go away already? He and Felicity had much better things to do.

Felicity pulled off Luke sloppily and rolled her hips against Luke as he defended his title as God of Oral Sex.

“Sure, Threepio,” Felicity answered as politely as she could in the situation. “My apartment code is 2736326.”

“Of course, Miss Felicity. I… Miss Felicity, 2736326 translates to Brendan on a keypad. I highly recommend changing that as relative names are not a secure passcode.”

“I’ll think about it, Threepio,” Felicity started to shake as Luke curled his tongue inside of her and stroked her cervix. Her face pressed against his thigh as she fought not to cry out in pleasure, Luke sensing the struggle in the Force. She muttered, “By the Gods, Luke your tongue is so long.”

“I could suggest some alternate passcodes, Miss Felicity,” Threepio obliviously continued. “I do have the ability to generate easy to remember but random series of num-

“No, Artoo, I’m sure Master Luke didn’t forget.”

Beep boop beep beep beep beep.

“Interrupting? I didn’t interrupt anything.”

Bop bop beep bop.

“Master Luke would never do that while carrying out a conversation with me!”

Boop bop.

“Watch your language R2-D2!”

And with that the droids were finally gone.
“Wow, looks like R2-D2 is the ultimate wingman.” Felicity laughed at her joke, “Get it? Wingman? Because he sits in the wing of your ship, and-”

That’s when Felicity noticed the dark look in Luke’s eyes. She yelped as Luke suddenly flipped her on her back.

“You think that was funny?” Luke’s dark tone was simply erotic as his eyes burned. “You think teasing me while I’m having a conversation is entertaining?”

“And what if I do?” Felicity challenged, her eyes filled with lust as she placed her hands on his chest.

“You have let your mouth run a little too much, Miss Rhiaon,” Luke kissed his way down her neck. “I’m afraid I’m going to have to punish you again.”

“Punish away,” Felicity’s voice was husky. Suddenly she shoved him back, so he was the one lying down on the mattress, his head pointed right at the door. She straddled him, her slick sex hovering right over his hard cock, “But who said you got to be on top?”

“We tried a lot of positions last night, Luke,” Felicity positioned his cock at her entrance, “but we didn’t manage to get this one in.”

“Then by all means, get it in.”

She slammed down and Luke was back in the ultimate pleasure of her hot, tight, wet cunt. Felicity riding him was frantic and erotic, her head thrown back, her breasts bouncing freely as she bounded up and down on him. They moaned wildly, their hips jerking in harmony, Luke thrusting up into her and she slammed down onto him.

“You’re in so deep,” Felicity moaned as his hands of course went to tweak the nipples of her bouncing breasts.

“And you’re so wet,” Luke groaned. “If you weren’t on top, I’d slip right out. How are you this wet?”

“I get off on the thought of getting caught.”

“That explains a lot.”

A while later, there was the distant sound of the apartment door opening.

“Is that Threepio?” Felicity asked breathlessly. Her stamina was impressive as though she was starting to get tired, she continued to bounce up and down on Luke’s cock as energetically as ever.

“Probably. I could use the Force to find out,” Luke grabbed her arms and planted them on his chest. He pushed on her back so that she was bending down slightly, and he resumed playing with her breasts. Luke sat up for a moment to run a long lick between the valley of her breasts, “Or I can focus all my attentions on making sure my cock is stroking into you at just the right angle.”

“Focus on your cock, please,” Felicity pushed Luke back down, her thrusts picking up in pace.

Luke could sense she was getting close, and the sight of her was making him close too. Felicity may have been hunched over slightly, but it was just the right angle that a person could see everything that was happening. Luke and Felicity’s faces contorted in pleasure, Luke’s hands frantically rubbing her gently bouncing breasts and stroking her erect nipples, and Luke’s cock disappearing in and out of Felicity’s shining wet passage.

The sight was utterly erotic, and there was nothing that could stop it.

“Come on, Kid, time to get out of bed. It’s almost noon!” Han called as the door flew open and he walked in with Leia.

“Luke!” Leia gasped, instantly turning her head away from the explicit sight of her brother having sex with her childhood best friend.

“Whoa!” Han just looked amused as Felicity tried to cover herself with a pillow and Luke lay on the bed frozen.

Leia’s face had drained of all blood, and she looked absolutely beside herself, “I’m just- I…”

Finally snapping out of it, Luke sat up, grabbing a pillow to shield himself, “Leia, we were just-”

“No!” Leia shook her head. “No, I don’t want to hear it! Just… no.”

“Leia, I’m sorry,” Felicity was curled around a pillow, her head bowed so her long hair was covering her face from view. He glanced at Luke and hit his leg, “Luke!”

“Sorry,” Luke muttered. Using the Force to summon the blankets on top of his hamper. They quickly moved so they were lying with their heads to the headboard, the blankets pulled up to their armpits, and reclining slightly so they were mildly sociable but not uncovering themselves. “Leia, I’m sorry to you too.”

“There’s nothing to be sorry about,” Leia was looking fixedly at the wall beside her. Ever the politician she politely said, “You’re grown adults in a committed relationship. You have absolutely nothing to be sorry about. But as your sister… I just don’t want to see that. Especially not when I have… Oh no.”

“What?” Luke asked, glaring at Han who was doing his best to suppress his laughter.

“Han, where’s Ben?” Leia looked to her husband. “He was following us, right?”

Han glanced behind them, but Ben wasn’t there, “I think he ducked into Luke’s office to get into those boxes of Anakin Skywalker stuff. BEN, ARE YOU IN LUKE’S OFFICE?”

“YEAH!” Ben’s voice called back.

“DO YOU SEE ANYTHING IN LUKE’S BEDROOM?”

“NO. WHAT WAS I SUPPOSED TO SEE?”

“NOTHING!” Han answered quickly. “ARE YOU TOUCHING YOUR UNCLE’S STUFF AGAIN?”

“…MAYBE.”

“PUT EVERYTHING BACK WHEN YOU’RE DONE! NO SOUVENIRS WITHOUT LUKE’S PERMISSION! AND DON’T BREAK ANYTHING! ...UNLESS IT BELONGED TO VADER! FEEL FREE TO BREAK THAT STUFF!”

“Han!” Luke snapped.

“BEN, DON’T BREAK YOUR UNCLE’S THINGS!” Leia called, swatting Han’s arm. She sighed, “I’ll go check on him. Han, care to join?”

Luke had never given a dirtier look in his life. Felicity was surprisingly quiet in her embarrassed state. Leia was just happy to make a quick exit.

“So, you finally did it, Luke,” Han said slowly, grinning wide as he crossed his arms. He winked at Felicity, “He bedded the illusive Felicity Rhiaon. Atta boy.”

“I will kill you, Solo,” Felicity growled. “If you even think about telling anyone-”

“Funny, I never pictured you as being ashamed in this department,” Han chuckled. “And of course I’m going to tell others. Your involvement or not, I just walked in on Luke having sex. I can’t wait to tell the others at our Sabacc game.”

Luke glared at Han, “I swear to the Force, if Reine has a betting pool on this-”

“Relax, she doesn’t have a pool on when you and Felicity are going to have sex… at least I think she doesn’t.”

“I must say, congratulations, Fliss,” Han winked at her. “That was some impressive work. You’ve got to tell me your secret to having such a toned stomach.”

“I’m just teasing, Kid.”

“Good God, Solo,” Felicity shook her head. “The one time you’re not a Loud Mouth. You couldn’t have announced your presence entering the apartment?”

“Keep calling me Loud Mouth Solo all you want, Fliss,” Han said. “You’re the only one who calls me that. It’s not going to catch on.”

“What are you even doing here, Han?” Luke groaned. He couldn’t believe that his family had walked in on him having sex.

Han frowned, “Kid, it’s the day after the Battle of Yavin.”

“So?”

Han shot Luke a look.

“How could you forget? We do this every year!”

“Do what?” Felicity asked.
Every year on the day after the anniversary of the Battle of Yavin, Han, Leia, Chewie, the Droids, and myself go out for lunch,” Luke explained. “We do it every year because lunch after the medal ceremony was the first time the six of us sat down and shared a meal together.”

Han added, “It’s to remember that first time we sat together as the weird pseudo family we were, and later became on a legal scale… except Chewie. He’s not legally related to us.”

“That must be why Threepio asked if you were joining us for lunch,” Luke sighed, rubbing his face as Felicity rubbed his back. “I’m sorry about this, Han. I had… other things on my mind this morning.”

Han raised an eyebrow and looked directly at Felicity, “Kid, you had something on you this morning, but it certainly wasn’t on your mind. Come on, Fliss, no need to be bashful. Is the Kid any good?”

But Felicity wasn’t going to back down and let him make her feel uncomfortable.

“Oh, Luke’s fantastic in bed,” Felicity said bluntly. “He’s amazing at oral sex, plays my nipples just right, has a perfectly shaped and sized cock, has a short rest period between rounds, and gave me several amazing orgasms last night.”

As embarrassed as Luke was, part of him was glad to see Han suddenly so uncomfortable.

“Well, it’s good to hear a friend is being taken care of so well,” Han weakly offered. “So, Fliss, do you want to join us for lunch?”

“You mean spend the next two hours in awkward silence as I avoid making eye contact with Leia?” Felicity shrugged, “I guess.”

“Are you sure about inviting her, Han?” Luke asked. “I’d love it, but if you guys aren’t comfortable—”

“You act as if this is the first time I’ve seen you naked.”

“Long story,” Luke waved off. “No, I meant that this is usually more a family thing. I don’t want to make assumptions—”

“You’re not. She’s family,” Han said flatly. He grinned at Felicity, “Besides, if last night was anything like I just walked in on, I bet you have some Skywalker in you right now.”

Felicity rolled her eyes, “I’m going to ignore that last part and just say, Han, I’m flattered you see me as family.”

“Hey, after what happened on Takodana, you earned your spot.”

Luke frowned, “Takodana?”

“The whole Loud Mouth Solo origin story,” Felicity reminded.

“Right.”

“Well, I’m going to check on Leia and make sure she isn’t too traumatized,” Han announced. “We were thinking about going to that Dex’s Diner place you won’t shut up about.”

“Alright, well, get some pants on, Kid,” Han teased. “I don’t think you want me to see a repeat show of what I just got. Though I would love to see again the looks on your faces when you got caught. Maybe I’ll start not announcing I’m about to walk into your bedroom.”

Felicity narrowed her eyes and warned, “Han Loud Mouth Solo, I swear to the Gods if you intentionally walk in on us having sex—”

“Yeah, I know, you’ll kill me,” Han finished flippantly.

“No.” Felicity flashed Han a very evil grin, “If you intentionally walk in on me having sex with Luke, when I see you… I’m not going to stop.”

Both Han and Luke’s faces went white as they stared at Felicity.

“Do I have a say in this matter?” Luke raised his hand.

“No,” Felicity said simply.

“Alright then.”

Han raised an eyebrow, “That… is not the kind of woman I thought you’d end up with, Kid.”

“Neither did I,” Luke wrapped an arm around Felicity’s shoulder, and pulled her in to kiss her forehead. “But I’m glad I did.”

Felicity leaned in to Luke’s ear and whispered, “May I remind you that we’re having a casual conversation with your brother-in-law, completely naked?”

Luke shrugged, “We have a sheet.”

Felicity glared at him.

Luke sighed, “Han, would you mind grabbing something for Felicity to cover herself in? Threepio put her clothing from last night in the washer.”

“Sure thing,” Han riffled through Luke’s closet and tossed Felicity a long tunic.

“Well, it’s been fun and awkward, but I’m going to go nip into the fresher until Threepio gets here with my clothes,” Felicity pulled on the tunic and climbed out of bed. The tunic was black, a little bulky on her, and fell to just above her knees. She leaned over and kissed Luke’s cheek. “You were amazing. Now, let’s hope I don’t run into Leia and Ben in the hallway.”

“Love you too,” Felicity said as she slipped past Han and out the door.

“So…” Han stared after Felicity, it now just being him and a naked Luke, covered only by a sheet, “That was eventful.”

“Could have been worse,” Luke shrugged. “It could have been Felicity and I walking in on you and Leia. Imagine that my best friend and my twin.”
“You realize that is exactly what happened here but just the other best friend and the other twin?”

“I meant worse for me. At least I got to make love to a beautiful woman for a little while first.”

“Yeah, about that. I have to ask Luke… Not that I was intentionally looking, or focusing on that area, but… Are you guys using protection? Because that didn’t look like it.”

“We’re covered, Han, don’t worry.”

Han gave a sigh of relief, “Good.”

Luke raised a brow.

“Look, I love Ben. He’s the best thing that I’ve ever done in my life. Having an amazing kid like that is far more than a lowly smuggler like me has ever deserved, and I wouldn’t give him up for anything,” Han was beaming with pride as he spoke of his son. Then his face fell, “But I’m serious about forgoing protection, Luke. Not even once.”

“Did someone call for clothing and a side of birth control?” Luke asked, carrying the aforementioned items into the fresher with him. He was fully clothed in a casual, yet every sexy black pants and boots, an ash gray tunic, and a grey lightsaber belt – Luke had five custom made lightsaber belts to go with various outfits, proving he was in fact, the son of Padmé Amidala. His cybernetic hand had its signature black glove on, and his hair already was neatly styled. “Threepio also brought your makeup bag.”

Felicity turned to face him, quickly wiping her hands on a towel. She was pretending she had been in the fresher to wash her hands, and not that she had been cowering in it for twenty minutes, hiding from Leia.

“Thank you so much,” Felicity said as Luke set the pile down on the sink top. She unzipped her makeup bag, “Hopefuly I can cover up some of these marks you left on me. Someone was a little overzealous with me.”

“No, I wasn’t,” Felicity gave him that one corner smirk he loved so much.

He watched her as Felicity filled a cup of water and dispensed her daily birth control. God, she just looked so sexy, and it thrilled Luke to know he had just made love to Felicity last night, making her scream his name in pleasure, over and over, in position after position. Rough sex, tender sex, Luke had made this gorgeous woman his last night, and he wasn’t going to ever let her go. Felicity Rhiaon was his and he looked forward to reasserting his claim over and over again.

Maybe it was that smirk Luke couldn’t resist, maybe it was the act of preparing to take birth control so she could fuck him without consequence, or maybe it was that their early morning coupling had been interrupted, but Luke was hard again.

“So,” Luke casually walked behind Felicity and wrapped his arms around her waist. “That was… interesting?”

“Luke,” Felicity took a swig of water and knocked back her birth control pill, “your brother-in-law, and twin sister, who was my childhood best friend, just saw an unobstructed view of me passionately fucking you… Interesting is not the appropriate word for what just happened.
Pressing his body against her, Luke started to kiss the hickeys up her neck. Felicity moaned as he pressed his budding erection into her thigh, Luke remembering how good it felt to cum between them.

“Well, I wish they hadn’t walked in. It felt so good to fuck you,” Luke hoarsely whispered in her ear, holding her tight, and rocking his hips against her. His gloved hand reached down and stroked up her bare leg, getting closer to her uncovered quim, “To be encased in your hot, tight cunt. You were so wet. So ready to take my cock. Are you still wet for me, Sweetheart?”

Felicity gasped as his fingers found her sex.

“Yes, you are,” Luke grinned, his fingers swirling around her folds. He avoided her clit, but teased the proximity, “You’re so wet.”

Felicity panted as she gripped the edge of the sink, “What… do you think… you’re doing, Skywalker?”

“Nothing,” Luke sounded innocent, but there was a dark smirk on his face. He watched Felicity look up at the mirror and see it in his reflection. Her desire flared in the Force, and he pushed the heel of his palm against her clit.

“Oh!” Felicity groaned, her eyes slamming shut at the sensation of the coarse fabric of his glove against her aching sex. “That doesn’t feel like nothing.”

“I guess it is something,” his gloved fingers rubbed her with an increasing speed. His natural hand clutched her hip to hold Felicity firmly against his solid body. “I was just thinking how… familiar this scenario sounds.”

“Familiar?”

“Think about it…” Luke’s natural hand drifted up her body, along the fabric of his overly long tunic, teasing over her fabric clad breasts. “Yes, you are not wearing anything under this top, so your cunt is completely unprotected from any potential intrusion. Yes, you are extremely wet, horny, and turned on by the fact that we just got walked in on.”

“Luke-”

He had never really been an exhibitionist, but he was turned on by how much the idea thrilled Felicity. Luke could see in her mind what she was thinking, the scenarios she was picturing. He may not be particularly turned on by the images, but he certainly wanted to be the one whose cock was sliding into her in them.

“The scenario is familiar, isn’t it?” Luke panted as Felicity thrashed against him. “Yes, you are quite turned on by the image of me sneaking into the fresher after you – kind of like I’ve done – and then bending you over the sink, and having my way with you, Han be damned. He’s in the living room right now, you know? Waiting for us. We’d have to be very quiet if I were to fuck you right here, right now. Do you want that, Sweetheart? For me to bend you over this sink and fuck you until I empty my balls inside of you? We said we’d have to do that sometime after we get back to Coruscant. My sink’s at a pretty good height for that, but I supposed we can do it at your place too.”

“Yes, here,” Luke gently pushed her forward. Her hands gripped the counter automatically as he bent her over the sink. “Yes, now.”

“Luke…” Felicity moaned as she heard the unmistakable sound of Luke unzipping his fly. A jolt of electricity went through her body as Luke’s bare cock was suddenly resting against her thigh. “Oh, I want to, but-”

“Felicity,” he said her name like a prayer. Luke grasped his bulging cock and rubbed it against her tender folds, circling it around her aching bud, “Please. I’ve been picturing this every day since that night you teased me. Do you remember that? When you lay next to me, your fingers in your cunt, the cunt that burned for this cock? This cock that buried itself inside of you so many times last night? Don’t you want it, Sweetheart? To make that fantasy inside of your head a reality? Don’t you want me to fuck you right here, right now?”

“Damn it,” Felicity growled and bent over the sink. She lifted her hip, presenting her wet cunt it him like a nexu in heat, ready to be mounted, “Just be quiet.”

Luke grabbed her hips and drove himself into her. The angle was so perfect, so deep. He thrust in and out of her, their voices moaning in harmony as his balls slapped against her wet flesh over and over.

In and out, he pinned her hips against the porcelain sink, her pelvis slamming against it over and over. The coupling was so hot and primal: the position of traditional mating was animalistic, the scenario of trying not to be discovered was thrilling, and the sensory overload of wetness, heat, musk, salt, and moans was downright elysian.

Luke’s face was buried in Felicity’s shoulder as he slammed in and out of her, his teeth digging gently into her neck. One of Felicity’s hands was steadying herself on the sink, while the other was behind her, wrapped around Luke’s hip, holding his body against her. His natural hand was groping her breast, and the gloved hand was pinned between Felicity and the sink, frantically rubbing her clit, the fabric of his glove soaking with her juices.

It was exactly like Luke had imagined that night on Rornian as he stroked his cock, clutching her damp underwear. In retrospect, he was okay with the fact that his wasn’t the first way he had made love to Felicity Rhiaon, but he was also certainly glad he got to do it now.

Luke glanced up at the mirror and saw Felicity’s face: the ultimate pleasure, mouth twisted, eyes squeezed shut, her skin flushed and sweaty. It was too much for Luke. He grabbed her hips and slammed deep into her one last time, burying himself to the root, and then emptied himself into her.

He panted and dropped his head back to her shoulder, “You took the birth control, right?”
“Thank the Gods for a non-puritanical health care system,” Felicity chuckled. “So what are you going to do next? Finger me? Eat me out? See if your cock can hold out a little longer?”

“What I’m going to do next is… Go into the living room and wait with Han for you to get dressed.”

“Wait, what?” Felicity exclaimed as Luke pulled his cock out of her, sorted himself out, and then did up his fly. “What do you mean you’re going to leave?”

Luke raised an eyebrow, “What part of my sentence was confusing?”

Felicity looked completely lost, the lust still pulsing in her body, “You promised me I would always cum first. I didn’t cum.”

“Yes, you did,” Luke chuckled and pressed a kiss to her lips. “You did that night on Rornian.”

Felicity’s jaw dropped, and Luke couldn’t help but give her an imitation of her trademark smirk.

“Consider us even, Miss Rhiaon,” Luke said darkly.

“I don’t believe it,” Felicity shook her head. He couldn’t quite pin her emotion: she was either incredibly pissed off at him, incredibly turned on, or most likely both. “Revenge is not the Old Jedi way.”

“No, and neither is this.”

Felicity gasped as shoved his glove fingers inside of her. Luke lowered his mouth to her nipple, and pumped this fingers in and out of her three times, coating the glove with their combined fluids. He then pulled out of her and took off the glove.

“You can use my glove if you need a little help getting that under control,” Luke set it on sink. “And yes, I am quite turned on by the image of dragging you into as many different rooms as possible and having my way with you on all different pieces of furniture… But somehow, I think Han might not be too happy if we did that. Shame really. We’ll have to do that sometime after we get back from lunch. My apartment’s a pretty good location for that, but I supposed we can do it at your place too.”

Felicity just stared at Luke, “What have I gotten myself into with you?”

Luke grinned, “You have no idea.”

And with that, he sauntered out of the room.

“Felicity’s just going to be a few more minutes,” Luke announced as he entered the living room.

“Good. The Droids already headed out,” Han lounged on the couch. “Everyone’s waiting for us at Dex’s. This place better be good, Kid. You have no idea how much convincing I’ve had to do to get Leia to agree to eat at a place Daddy Vader frequented.”

“So…” Han shifted in his seat. “I gotta ask. Fliss… she any good?”

“To be blunt, she’s the best sex I’ve ever had, and when we get home from lunch I’m going to have sex with her again. Multiple times.”

“Well… good for you.” Han playfully punched Luke’s arm, “Just don’t chaff the girl, Kid.”

There was no denying the cocky tone in Luke’s voice, or the smirk he couldn’t wipe from his face. Silence hung in the air as Han watched Luke and his head held high cockiness. The conclusion was inevitable.

Han squinted at Luke, “You know… you were in the fresher with Fliss for a while.”

“Yes, I was.”

“… You two had sex, didn’t you?”

Han slung an arm around Luke’s shoulder, “Atta boy!”

1 Year, 1 Month, 1 Day

“To Felicity Rhiaon!” Wedge led the rest of Rogue Squadron in a toast during their twice annual drinking night out. “She finally slept her way to the top!”

“And to Wedge Antilles!” Felicity laughed, Luke’s arm lovingly wrapped around her. “Let’s pray he doesn’t put anyone in the hospital this time.”

“Speaking of,” Hobbie leaned over in his chair to examine Felicity. Her dress had some suggestive cutouts down the sides exposing the bare flesh underneath, “Is that a hand shaped bruise on your hip?”

“What can I say, boys?” Felicity chuckled, sipping her drink. “Sex gets rough when a Jedi with a mechanical hand and a taste for dominance gets involved.”

The Squadron hooted and teased Luke as his face turned red.

“I always had a feeling about you being into that, Luke!” Wedge punched his arm.

“Could we please change the subject?” Diego groaned. “I don’t want to picture Skywalker and Rhiaon humping.”

Felicity smirked, “Oh you’re just jealous because the only real action you’ve gotten in the past three years is from your war wound.”

“Classy, Rhiaon,” Diego smacked her playfully with the aforementioned messed up hand, “making fun of a man’s disability!”

“It’s what I do,” Felicity giggled. “Boys, I have come to discover that I was put in this world to do three things: steal Death Star plans, make fun of Diego Nalto, and screw Luke Skywalker until he can’t walk straight. Hey! Bar attendant person! Another round for me!”

Luke lowered her hand that was hoisting up her empty glass, “Okay, you’re giggling, which means you’ve had way too much to drink. I’m cutting you off.”

“Or,” Felicity giggled, pressing her body against his, “you could give me another drink, and when we get home, we’ll have a little fun tonight, and I’ll do that thing you’ve been trying to get me to do.”
Luke swallowed, very aware of the eyes on them, “No, Felicity. We’re not doing that without proper – aka sober – consent.”

“Oh, good, then I didn’t record this for nothing,” Felicity pressed a button on her wrist comm.

A small recording of Felicity’s voice played, “Hey, Luke, this is Sober Felicity. Just wanted to record this because I know you’re getting back from Rornian today and we won’t have a chance to speak and get this on the record until we meet tonight at the bar with the other Rogues. I would like to state on the record in my sober state of mind that I have finally decided I’m okay with trying that thing you’ve been attempting to get me to do. I consent to having that act performed on me in either a sober state of mind, or an intoxicated state of mind. I also consent to, should we so choose, engage in sexual intercourse with you tonight, even if we are drunk. I consent to this on the understanding that it will be you and only you whom I have sex with tonight, and that we will honour our pre-established boundaries while doing so. Have fun tonight, and I look forward to our sex.”

Luke looked at Felicity in amazement, “You know it’s sexy how organized you can be sometimes.”

“So am I doing that thing tonight, or am I cut off from alcohol?”

“Waitress! One more round!”

The other Rogues laughed at the pair of them.

“Nalto, you should have set these two up years ago,” Zev shook his head.

“They would have so many smirking, trigger happy, Jedi kids by now,” Wedge shook his head.

“Actually, I did try to set them up once,” Diego recalled.

Luke frowned, “Excuse me?”

“Remember on Hoth? I tried to set you up with my friend that one night.”

“That was Felicity?” Luke’s jaw dropped, having forgotten about the time Diego had seen Luke watching Han and Leia forlornly, and suggested Luke go to dinner with his female friend who was coming in for one night. Luke had agreed, but the plans had gone a little off the rails.

“I thought you knew,” Diego said.

“No, I completely forgot about that.”

“Wait, you’re the jerk who stood me up?” Felicity narrowed her eyes at Luke, which would look a lot more threatening if she wasn’t struggling so hard to just sit upright. She poked his chest, “You better have a good reason for that, Skywalker.”

“I was attacked by a Wampa.”

“That’s a good reason.”

“Wow, I can’t believe it,” Luke shook his head. “You almost went to Tatooine to track down the Death Star plans… You were almost assigned to go with the mission to Endor until they decided you were too invested personally… We almost went on a date on Hoth. So many times we almost got together, years before we actually did. It’s almost like this was—”

“If you say destiny, we’re not having sex tonight.”

“Here, Fliss,” Deena Kopos got out of her chair. “Let’s get you to the fresher. I think you’ve had a little too much to drink.”

Luke kissed Felicity on the forehead and helped ease her into Deena’s arms, “Make sure she drinks some water.”

“Will do,” Deena started to lead Felicity to the fresher.

“Did I ever tell you the story of how I stole the plans to the Death Star?” Felicity slurred as she stumbled along with Deena.

“Can’t say you have.”

“It all started with the day of my birth…”

Luke laughed as he watched the girls walk away.

“That girl’s certainly a handful,” Wes chuckled. “Makes me glad that Tesha’s bark is worse than her bite.”

“Fliss has always been a lively one,” Diego shook his head. “I’m glad she found someone like you, Skywalker. I think this could go the distance.”

Luke smiled as he watched Felicity stumble towards the fresher, “Yeah… me too.”

Diego took a swig of his drink, “Hey, Luke?”

“Yeah, Nalto?”

“Since all the other male figures in her life have passed on, I feel it’s my duty to tell you that if you ever hurt Felicity, I’ll kill you and make it look like an accident.”

Luke raised an eyebrow, “I have absolutely no intention of hurting Felicity Rhiaon mentally, emotionally, physically, sexually, intellectually or any other allys.”

“Good.”

“But you do know I’m the Jedi Grandmaster? You really going to go up against me?”

“Luke Skywalker, you hurt Felicity Rhiaon or any woman I love, I will absolutely kick your ass.”

1 Year, 3 Months, 27 Days

“I’m Third Sister,” Tyla’s declaration was simple, straight to the point, and without any excusing or handwaving away the magnitude of her crimes.

It was also probably one of the stupidest things Luke ever decided to do.

When Luke started hanging out with Felicity, Tyla had come to him expressing the fear that someone was going to finally figure out the truth about her past. When Luke started dating Felicity, that fear intensified. And when Luke came to Tyla, telling her of his no lies by omission agreement with Felicity, begging Tyla to come forward with the truth or else he would be forced to tell Felicity himself, Tyla finally agreed.

Tyla had very complicated feelings and a very long history with the Empire. She hadn’t come to Luke’s Order initially out of the goodness of her heart and desire to be a better person.

It was a whole different kind of desire that led her to Luke.

Tyla had been Vader’s favorite Inquisitor, and later his right-hand assassin, sending in Major Kinall to strike fear into the hearts and deal with any insurgents when the issue was too insignificant for Vader to be bothered with. Vader had strongly bonded with Tyla and left her wanting for nothing. But they were careful of her position, ensuring Palpatine didn’t think she was Vader’s potential Sith Apprentice and that Vader was plotting to overthrow him.

…At least, she wasn’t at first.

Shortly after the Battle of Yavin, Vader discovered that Palpatine had been training a whole horde of possible replacements for him because he was useless in his life support suit.

To say Vader was unhappy about that was putting it mild.

For about a week, Vader formulated the plan. He would overthrow Palpatine and take Tyla as his Sith Apprentice. And then came the news that changed his life: the news that the pilot who blew up the Death Star was named Luke Skywalker.

Vader’s son was alive.

His plans changed. He couldn’t possibly give the spot of Apprentice to some girl over his own son, but he knew that Tyla was faithful to him, and she would be a valuable asset to the throne if he became Emperor. So, Vader told Tyla of Palpatine’s betrayal and the revelation of his son (Tyla was smart enough not to ask about Luke’s mother.) Tyla swore her fidelity and loyalty to Vader’s grand designs and agreed to step aside for Vader’s son. Luke was a handsome young man only a few years younger than her and surely wielded far greater power than Tyla.

She agreed to step aside for Luke because Vader had promised her that when he died, she would gain the role of Empress… Empress Consort to the Emperor Luke Skywalker.

The plan was simple, Vader would lure Luke to the Dark Side, and Tyla would seduce him into staying. Luke and Tyla would wed, and Tyla would have the honour of bearing the next generation of the Skywalker line, which would no doubt be extremely powerful with their combined power through the Force.

They just didn’t expect that Luke wanted nothing to do with the Dark Side.

But Tyla was patient, and she waited through the years for Vader to find and turn his son.

…But then Luke rejected Vader in Cloud City.

…And rejected him again on Endor.

…And defeated Vader, becoming a full Jedi in the process.

…And then the Emperor died.
…And then Vader.

…And then the Second Death Star.

…And then the Empire in general.

When the dust had all settled, Tyla had nothing. No job, no money, no purpose. She wandered for a while; killed and stole as needed, and struggled to survive in a world without a place for her. The only thing that kept her going was the one thought Vader had hammered into her head over and over for four years:

Luke Skywalker is your destiny.

So, when Tyla heard that Luke Skywalker had opened a Jedi Order and that anyone was welcome to come live and learn, she knew she was on the right path. She would go there, meet Luke, be accepted in the Order, train as a Jedi and give her own insights to the Dark Side, maybe seeing what all this fuss was about the Light Side, and she and Luke would fall madly, hopelessly in love as was their destiny.

And all that happened… Except Luke rejected her advances. He wanted nothing to do with her in a romantic and even sexual context. Not only did he find her personality abrasive and unattractive, but he worried that pursuing a relationship with Tyla would only lead them both down the path to the Dark Side. Her so-called “love” of Luke was rooted so firmly in her history with the Dark Side, that Tyla could never detach one from the other.

So, to see Luke fall in love with a woman who not only hated Darth Vader, but barely believed in the Force, led Tyla to an antagonistic relationship with Felicity. But there was one part to their relationship that was hidden away in the shadows, and the longer it stayed there, the more explosive the reaction would be once uncovered.

Though both parties were reluctant, Tyla and Luke agreed that it was time for Tyla to come clean to everyone about her past. Luke gathered the Order, as well as Han, Ben, Leia, and Felicity in the Meditation Gardens on Romanian, and had Tyla go before them and confess the truth.

For the declaration, Luke had Obik, Felicity, and Leia – the three people who had actually been connected to the death of Brendan Rhiaon – stand closest to Tyla. It would be good for them to be close so that if they wanted to break off from the group and have a quiet chat they could.

Luke couldn’t say he wasn’t disappointed with the reactions of Tyla’s confession.

Leia immediately grabbed Ben, and shoved him behind her, towards Alyla – who frankly didn’t understand what was going on but just went with it. Leia of all people had the most reason to hate Third Sister. Yes, Tyla had orchestrated the death of Brendan Rhiaon which was life-changing for Felicity, but Tyla had killed him because of Leia. Brendan had confessed his desire to join the Rebellion twice. Each time it had been in the vicinity of Third Sister, and each time that confession had been to Leia.

Leia would never trust Tyla again after learning her identity, and she made sure to never discuss classified information around Tyla again.

Luke was also disappointed in Obik’s reaction. Obik knew the history of Third Sister’s crimes with Brendan Rhiaon all too well, and he had made some pretty strong implications of what he would do to Tyla. But Obik didn’t attack her; what he did was much worse in Luke’s eyes.

Obik stared at Tyla for a long minute, then turned and looked back at Felicity. Felicity, who was stunned and blank, her body shaking with a mixture of rage and sorrow. There was only one person standing between Felicity and Tyla, and that person was Obik.

After another minute, Obik turned back to Tyla, and a hard, dark look set on his face. Luke could sense the Force shifting with a touch of Darkness around him. Reine – who was standing next to her husband – sensed it too, and grasped his arm.

Obik gently shook Reine’s arm away, and he took a step forward. He locked eyes with Tyla, waiting until she looked at him. When he had caught her attention, he made a show of looking back at Felicity, and back at Tyla.

And then he stepped out of the way.

He didn’t say a word, but his eyes were dark as he made a show of walking not only out of Felicity’s path, but to the edge of the glass wall of the garden’s greenhouse enclosure. He leaned upon it and crossed his arms, an angry scowl upon his face.

His message was clear: whatever Felicity did to Tyla… he wasn’t going to stop it.

Luke didn’t quite know what to expect Felicity’s reaction to be. He thought maybe some screams and swears and probably at least an attempt at a slap. But he wasn’t expecting what she did.

Hearing that her brother’s last remaining killer – and the only one Felicity ever had the opportunity to face – was standing before her… Felicity said nothing. She did nothing. She just stood there in stunned silence as the rage built up in her.

For a few minutes, everyone was distracted by Leia and Obik’s reaction, but make no mistake, it was Felicity’s reaction they truly waited for. No one dared to move or speak until Felicity did.

Then she did.

Slowly, wordlessly, Felicity walked towards Tyla.

Luke and Reine exchanged a look and readied themselves to jump into action. They didn’t know what was about to happen, but they could sense the Darkness building around Felicity.

Tyla, to her credit, stood her ground. She knew that admitting her identity meant facing Felicity Rhiaon, and she would do it with dignity. If Felicity wanted to scream, she would not argue. If Felicity wanted answers, she would give them. If Felicity wanted to slap her so hard that Tyla would fall unconscious, she would not flinch.

But Felicity didn’t do that.

Luke had always known Felicity liked to talk the talk about beating someone up, or threatening to kill Han over leaving the toilet seat up. He also knew that Felicity had in fact ended lives during the war. But he knew deep in his heart that Felicity Rhiaon was not the type of person who would commit cold blooded murder. Luke was certain that Felicity would never kill but in self defense.

So, he was greatly surprised when she grabbed Tyla by the throat, slammed her against a tree, and actually tried to choke her to death.

“Felicity!” Luke yelled as he and Reine sprung into action.

Felicity screamed nonsensically about her brother’s murder and that she was going to kill Tyla as she strangled her. Tyla desperately tried to gasp out an apology and pry Felicity’s hands from her throat.
Reine got to Felicity first. She locked her arms around Felicity and wrenched her away from Tyla. Luke was at Tyla’s side, checking that she was okay as Reine wrestled the thrashing Felicity.

Felicity smashed her elbow backwards, hitting Reine right in the nose. Reine yelled and grabbed her bloody, possibly broken nose. Felicity took advantage of moment to escape Reine’s grasp.

Tyla saw Felicity coming for her, and not wanting to put Luke in a position where he might have to hurt one of them to protect the other, used the Force to push him back.

The next few moments were utter chaos.

It wasn’t clear who struck first, but the next thing anyone knew, Tyla and Felicity were desperately scrapping. Felicity was actually trying to kill Tyla, while Tyla perhaps went a little overboard with self defense.

A group converged to pull the women apart: Han and Gavyn got a hold of Felicity while Cade and Zena tried to get Tyla to back down. All parties got quite a few injuries for their efforts. Leia, on the other hand, much like Obik didn’t seem too inclined to stop Felicity from hurting Tyla.

Ben would learn a magnitude of new curse words from the brawl that day, but he didn’t get to stay for it. Luke nodded at Alyla, and she made to remove Ben and the other children from the Gardens with the help of Eline and Jafan.

Luke watched from the side as he held Reine’s shoulder while her nose bled fiercely. He was trying to inch her over to Doctor Kalonia – who was only a few months on the job and seriously re-evaluating her decision to come work for the Jedi – where Reine could get her nose looked at.

“Luke, you have to do something!” Reine snapped.

“I…” Luke frowned. “I don’t know if I can.”

“Luke!”

He felt so helpless in that moment. Luke could absolutely walk into that brawl and shut it down in three seconds flat, but doing so would be very costly. He didn’t want to hurt either women, certainly not emotionally and absolutely not physically. Luke Skywalker would never put himself in a situation where he might strike Felicity Rhiaon.

But he couldn’t just let Tyla become victim to Felicity’s fury. Temple Village was not governed by the will of a lynch mob, but there was more to it than that. If Tyla was pushed too far, not only would she overpower Felicity easily with her Force abilities, but it might trigger a return to the Dark Side.

At the same time, he couldn’t just step in and defend Tyla. She had orchestrated the death of Brendan Rhiaon, the defining moment in Felicity’s life. Was he really going to say her feelings of anger were unjustified? Was he really going to step in and side with Tyla? Not only was it morally gray, Luke worried the effect it could have on his relationship with Felicity. He could lose her.

Luke sighed and looked over at Leia. His sister had the same confliction in her heart, and possibly even more so than Luke. She had known Brendan, and probably a small part of her had genuinely loved him (though not the way she loved Han, despite her crush on Brendan. It was more the casual friendship type love Leia had for Lando.)

But, as conflicted as Leia was, her decision was clear. She wasn’t going to be the one who stepped between the woman, but they couldn’t let this happen. Yes, what Tyla did was wrong, but they couldn’t let Felicity kill her. And yes, losing Felicity was a risk of standing up for Tyla … But if she killed Tyla, the Felicity Luke loved would be lost anyway.

Luke took a deep breath, and then a step forward.

Felicity was on top of Tyla, though Luke couldn’t quite see what she was doing, but whatever it was, based on Tyla’s shrieks it clearly hurt. Tyla smashed an elbow into Felicity’s face, and Felicity jerked back. Catching Felicity off-guard, Tyla made a movement with the lower half of her body that seemed to be some combination of a kick and twisting her pelvis. It managed to get Felicity off of her.

Seizing the opportunity, Han ran up behind Felicity, hooked his arms under her armpits and clasping his hands behind her neck. No matter how hard Felicity tried fighting him off, Han had incapacitated her… but that certainly didn’t mean Felicity wasn’t trying to fight him.

“Let me go! Let me go right now, Solo!” Felicity screamed as Han dragged her back.

“Not a chance, Rhiaon,” Han struggled to hold Felicity up as she thrashed in his arms.

“LUKE!” Anakin Skywalker’s voice was sudden and urgent in Luke’s mind. “Look into Tyla!”

Anakin had the habit of getting involved where Dark Side Tyla Kinall was concerned. Considering he was responsible for Tyla’s difficult life, and for a very long stretch of time, she was the closest thing Vader had to a kid, he felt it his duty to help Luke guide her onto the right path.

“Son of a-” Han yelled as Felicity suddenly bit his arm. As childish as the move was, it was effective because he dropped his hold on her, and Felicity managed to sprint towards Tyla.

Tyla likewise had escaped the hold of Zena and Cade. She could see Felicity heading straight for her, and Darkness pulsed in the Force around her.

Luke knew Tyla’s mental barriers were vulnerable and he pushed into her mind. Tyla didn’t push him out, allowing him to see the memory playing in her mind.

_Tyla was standing next to Vader on the bridge of a Star Destroyer. She was clothed in her all black Imperial gear, her straight, ice blonde hair falling down her back, and her ice blue irises had changed to yellow. Based on her attire and age, Luke knew this was after the other Inquisitors had been killed and Vader had taken her on personally._

_She stood with a vindictive grin, her arm outstretched, her black gloved hand contorted in a clutching motion. A few feet away in front of her, an Imperial officer clutched his throat, choking on air as the rest of the crew looked on in fear._

“Good,” Vader praised Tyla. “The Force Choke is always the best line of defense. No need to get bloody or personal, except for those who are worth it. And a Non-Force Sensitive is almost never worth it.”

Luke’s eyes widened; he knew Tyla’s next move.

“No!” Luke ran forward to stop it.

But it was too late; Tyla’s eyes narrowed at Felicity, and Luke could have sworn they flashed yellow. She threw her hand forward and made an all too familiar motion. Felicity stopped in her tracks, gasping, her hands flying to her throat. There was no denying what had happened.

Tyla was Force Choking Felicity.

He threw out his hands, and everyone but him found themselves knocked to the ground. Bewilderment pulsed through the building as everyone tried to collect themselves and get back to their feet. Tyla and Felicity had been thrown the furthest, which had successfully ended the choking, but immediately they shot back to their feet. Both women went to charge back at each other, but suddenly found they could not move a muscle.

After a moment of confusion, all heads slowly turned to Luke. He stood before the assembly, arms outstretched towards Felicity and Tyla, his face red and shaking with rage.

It took a while for the group to figure out that Luke was holding Felicity and Tyla in place, preventing them from hurting each other. No one had ever seen that Force Ability before, and frankly it just felt… wrong.

Luke Skywalker was furious. His eyes were dark as he looked upon Felicity and Tyla, not knowing who he was angrier with.

“I DON’T WANT TO USE THIS POWER!” Luke yelled, struggling not to let the Dark Side overtake him. Most people in that building had never heard Luke raise his voice in anger before. It would be a lie to say there wasn’t genuine fear pulsing through that building. “THIS IS THE MOST DISGUSTING FORCE ABILITY I HAVE EVER ENCOUNTERED, AND I’VE BEEN HIT WITH LIGHTNING!”

He looked at Tyla and saw both fear and shame in her eyes, but when he looked at Felicity, he didn’t see fear… he saw anger.

“To take away someone’s agency over their own body is reprehensible,” Luke lowered his voice, but his tone was no less stern. “But I will use this ability if it’s the only way I can you two from killing each other!”

Slowly, Tyla and Felicity stopped trying to fight off their restraint, but Luke still did not lower his control.

“You two are grown women!” Luke snapped. “And I thought you two were a lot smarter and more mature than this display. You are acting like children. You think this is going to solve anything? Change the past? Bring back the dead?”

Tyla looked to the ground, and Felicity’s eyes narrowed.

Luke looked to the former, “Tyla… you know better than this. You know you cannot give in to those urges. You know that Force Choking someone is never acceptable.”

“Hypocrite,” Cade Ren disguised in a cough.

Luke gritted his teeth, “Cade, not now!”

Han walked up behind Cade and grabbed the back of his robes, ready to put the kid in line if he acted out again.

Jake asked Doctor Kalonia if she had a cough drop for Cade.
“You cannot give in like that, Tyla,” Luke warned. “I am trying to help you, but I cannot fight this battle for you. And I cannot have you attacking anyone in this village. Do you understand me?”

Tyla bowed her head, “Yes, Master Skywalker.”

“Felicity,” Luke tried not to let his voice shake as he faced the woman he loved, “I am so sorry for what happened with Brendan. If I could go back and change what happened, I would. But this isn’t the way to settle it, and it certainly isn’t what Brendan would want you to do.”

The look Felicity was giving him was downright lethal.

“Do not speak of my brother as if you knew him, Luke,” Felicity growled. “You don’t get to tell me what Brendan would have wanted!”

“You’re right, I don’t,” Luke conceded. “But this isn’t what I want. And I don’t think this is what Han wants, or Leia, or anyone who is alive and cares about you.”

“She killed my brother, Luke.”

“I know, and how to deal with that fact is something I’ve been struggling to figure out for months.”

Felicity’s eyes widened.

“But you can’t do this, Felicity,” Luke continued. “You can’t kill Tyla for arranging Brendan’s death. This isn’t war! If you killed her here and now for this, you would be arrested for murder. Do you honestly think Brendan would want you to waste the rest of your life in a prison cell?”

“Felicity,” Tyla quietly said. “I am truly sorry for what I did… to you, and to everyone who was affected by that bombing.”

“And yet you chose to continue to be an Imperial,” Brinna Tharen muttered.

“Brinna,” Reine warned.

“Come on, she has a point,” Coria said. “Do we really want an Inquisitor among our ranks?”

“I’m not an Inquisitor anymore,” Tyla dismissed.

“Once an Imperial, always an Imperial,” Davarl sneered.

“So, being a former Imperial automatically makes you bad?” Zhane snapped. “Nice to know where you lot stand on my role in this Order.”

“If we have issues with you being in the Order, Zhane, it’s not over your Imperial past,” Obik glared.

“You have something to say to me, Kenu?” Zhane growled.

“Nothing he doesn’t have a point about,” Zena said coolly.

Bakura scoffed, “That’s rich coming from a slaver.”

“And that’s rich coming from a murderer,” Gavyn shot.

“You would know, Kene.”

“Yeah, well at least I didn’t lie about my murder, blaming it on a ‘surge of uncontrolled Force Powers,’ and called it an accident. How many years of prison did you avoid in exchange for joining this Order?”

“Probably the same number of years you let slavers use your sister, till she ran dry and tried to kill herself.”

“STOP!” Luke yelled. “We can’t keep doing this, people! We can’t continue all this in-fighting, or it’s going to destroy us just like the Old Jedi Order. It doesn’t matter! It doesn’t matter if Tyla was an Inquisitor! It doesn’t matter if Zhane was an Imperial! It doesn’t matter if Zena was a slave owner! It doesn’t matter if Gavyn once murdered a man for hurting Alyla! It doesn’t matter if Bakura exchanged a murder prison sentence for service to the Order! It doesn’t matter if Alyla once decided to disfigure herself! It doesn’t matter if I’m the son of a Sith Lord! We all have sins in our past. All that matters is how we live our lives now! Who we choose to be now! It doesn’t matter if Tyla was an Inquisitor! It doesn’t matter if Zhane was an Imperial! It doesn’t matter if Zena was a slave owner! It doesn’t matter if Gavyn once murdered a man for hurting Alyla! It doesn’t matter if Bakura exchanged a murder prison sentence for service to the Order! It doesn’t matter if Alyla once decided to disfigure herself! It doesn’t matter if I’m the son of a Sith Lord! We all have sins in our past. All that matters is how we live our lives now! Who we choose to be now! So, Tyla… Felicity… I’m going to let you go in a second. If you move to strike anyone in this building, I’ll put you back under my hold until you can behave like an adult.”

Taking a deep breath, Luke released the women. To his relief, Felicity and Tyla behaved themselves… but Felicity’s face was dark with pure rage.

“Now,” Luke looked at the women, “can you two choose to be the better person? I’m not asking anyone to forgive or excuse the other. All I ask is that we can live our lives without you two trying to murder each other. That’s all I want! Is that too much to ask?”

Tyla sighed, “No, it isn’t.”

Luke smiled, “And Felicity?”

He was shocked at the fury in her face.

“You knew,” Felicity whispered. “…You knew that she killed my brother. You knew she was Third Sister, and you didn’t tell me?”

“Felicity,” Luke cautiously walked towards her. “This was that lie by omission I promised to eventually reveal to you.”

She looked like Luke had just hit her.

“How long have you known?” Felicity demanded.

“How long?”

Luke took a deep breath as he came to a stop in front of her, “I’ve known since that day in my apartment when you told me that Third Sister was involved with Brendan’s death.”

“You son of a bitch!” Felicity screamed. “You’ve known this entire time, and you didn’t tell me! You swore to me you wouldn’t hide anything from me. You looked me in the God damn eye and lied!”

“I told you I had one secret that wasn’t mine to tell!” Luke snapped. “I had to give Tyla the chance to “Oh, screw you! We both damn well know the only reason you didn’t tell me that night was because you wanted to fuck me, and that would have ruined the mood!”

Luke took a deep breath, unable to face any of the eyes on him after that declaration.

“Felicity, please,” Luke said calmly, closing a hand over her arm, “let’s go somewhere private and discuss-”

“No! Don’t you touch me!” Felicity wretched her arm out of his grasp. “Don’t you dare touch me!”

Luke took a step back and held up his hands to show he was going to honour her request. He could see Felicity struggle not to completely break down in tears in front of the audience. She felt that he had betrayed her and broken her heart.

Diego Nalto was so going to kick his ass.

Felicity took a deep breath and turned to Tyla, “I hate you. I hate you more than I’ve ever hated someone in my life. I hate you more than Phasma… I hate you more than Vader. But maybe… maybe that will pass with time. Maybe you won’t be my end all, epitome of hatred someday. I will never like you, but I’ll be the person that Brendan would want me to be. I won’t kill you. That is the only mercy I will ever grant you. Do you understand?”

Tyla nodded.

Felicity looked back at Luke, tears falling from her eyes, “I love you, Luke. I truly do… but I can’t forgive this. How can I ever trust you after this?”

“Felicity,” he begged, reaching for her, “please, just-”

“No,” she moved her arm away again. Felicity looked into his eyes – her own so vulnerable – and firmly said, “No, Luke. You… will never touch me again.”

“Felicity-”

“We’re done, Luke.” She took a ragged breath and pushed past him, “This is over.”

“Felicity, please!” Luke called after her.

But Felicity marched straight into the arms of Leia, who comforted Felicity as she led them out of the Gardens. Han and Obi-k were quick to follow.

Luke looked to the ground, trying not to break down into tears. He could hear the judgemental and disapproving whispers around him, and struggled not to let the others see him cry. Felicity’s leaving had fractured his heart, and it would fully break later that night when Han informed Luke that neither Felicity nor Leia wanted him on the Falcon when they went home.

One by one, the Jedi silently left the Meditation Gardens, and Luke to his misery. He didn’t need to look up to know when just he and Tyla remained.

That was when he let himself cry. He had just lost the best thing that had ever happened to him. This wasn’t supposed to happen, he was supposed to live happily ever after with Felicity, not lose her after four months.

To Tyla’s credit, she didn’t approach Luke; she got stood in the spot he had frozen her and watched as he cried.

“I’m sorry, Luke,” Tyla said, a foreign vulnerability in her tone. “I should have come clean to her the first time she came to Temple Village. Keeping this secret was holding me back from the path of healing.”

“No,” Luke shook his head, “this is my fault. I shouldn’t have kept this secret from her.”

“It wasn’t your secret to tell… and I appreciate it.”

“I don’t,” he admitted.

“I’m sorry for that. Look on the bright side, if she wasn’t going to stay with you through thick and thin, at least you found out early on. You deserve someone who will stay with you no matter what. You know, if there’s anything I can do—”

“Please, Tyla, stop,” Luke said firmly. “I cannot deal with this right now. Please, just… leave me alone.”

Tyla looked at the ground, “Yes, Master Skywalker.”

She took a few steps and then paused.

“Luke?”

“What, Tyla?”

“If there’s one thing I know for certain about Skywalker men it’s that, good or evil, a Skywalker never gives up without a fight.”

And with that she was gone.

Luke’s hands shook as he struggled to figure out his next move. This had been one of the worst days of his life. Almost everyone he cared about had turned on him, and he had betrayed them all. The Jedi and his family would be forced to eventually move on with their continued interactions, but Felicity… Felicity was about to slip through his fingers.

A Skywalker never gives up without a fight.

Tyla was right; he had could fight against all odds and redeem Anakin Skywalker, if he could destroy a Death Star, and save Han from carbonite, he could somehow, someway win back Felicity Rhiaon.

With new resolve, Luke turned around, ready to formulate some game plan. But he froze when he saw the sight behind him.

Crouched in the greenery, hidden quite cleverly, having somehow broken off from the group of children, was Ben Solo.

Luke’s mouth went dry as his heart dropped to his stomach. He had performed the most atrocious Force Power he knew, to hold someone against their will… And he had shown his nephew exactly how to do it.

He had a bad feeling about this.
Luke knocked incessantly on the apartment door, just as he had been doing for nearly two hours.

“Felicity, please, open up,” Luke called, sensing her presence inside. “I know you’re in there. Please, can we just talk about this?”

There was no reply.

“Felicity, please, come on, it’s been two weeks,” Luke started up his knocking again. He was honestly surprised that no neighbour had come to see what was going on. “I miss you and I love you. Please, just let me talk.”

Nothing.

Luke took a deep breath and pounded on the door more firmly, “Come on, Felicity. I’m not going anywhere. If I have to knock non-stop for the rest of the day, sleep on the floor, and then spend all of tomorrow knocking on your door, I will.”

Finally, footsteps thudded towards the entrance, and the door slid open to reveal Felicity.

“I’m only opening this door to tell you that if you don’t vacate my property in the next sixty seconds, I am calling the police,” Felicity said sternly.

But based on how she looked, Luke knew that wasn’t true. She had clearly spent the two hours he had knocked, putting herself together so that every part of her was specifically tailored to be a way that drove Luke wild.

The casual way her hair was down on her shoulders that looked natural, but Luke knew she used extensive products to get that slight curl, that airy hold, and the perfect volume. Her simple makeup that was made to look like she wasn’t wearing any, except for the expertly executed smoky eye look, and the crimson lipstick that Luke had told her was the exact shade of her Force Signature which she wore whenever she was trying to seduce Luke. The starbird necklace strung around her neck, sitting right in the valley of her cleavage. The casual cranberry tank top, covering a bra that was lifting her breasts just right. The tight black leather pants Luke had picked out for her one time they had gone shopping together, which she had worn out of the store, and then Luke had eagerly peeled off her when they got home. And those brown, knee high, heeled boots that drove Luke wild, which cemented the fact that Felicity was intentionally putting herself together for Luke.

Because Felicity didn’t wear shoes in her apartment.

Luke looked Felicity up and down, and he knew the way she was casually shifting her body was to subtly show it off to him. Whether this display was to seduce Luke or flaunt what he was missing, Luke didn’t know.

But he could definitely work with this.

“Well, it’s nice to see you haven’t been too devastated during this unfortunate turn of events,” Luke grinned appreciatively at the outfit. “I know it must be hard for you to be apart from me.”

Felicity crossed her arms and leaned against the doorframe, “Aren’t you arrogant this afternoon?”

“No, I said that because I know our separation has been unbearable for me. Arrogance would be saying that if we weren’t in a fight and you greeted me wearing that, I’d be having you against the door right now.”

“It’s no one’s fault but your own that you’re not. I bet you’ve been touching yourself in bed to the image of us even more than I have.”

“So, you admit you still want me. That’s a relief,” Luke struggled to stay on task and not think of Felicity sprawled nude on the sheets, her breasts heaving with steady pants, sweat dripping down her body as her fingers frantically pumped her tender sex, wishing it was instead his cock working between her thighs.

Felicity scowled, unhappy how he had turned things around on her, “Get out of my doorway, Luke.”

“No, I’m not leaving,” Luke replied confidently. His eyes drifted to her overexposed cleavage; those breasts that he adored to suck. He struggled to keep the image out of his head of his tongue licking up the crevice between those two perfect globes. Luke had to resist the urge to shove her against the apartment wall, yanking off her tank top and having his mouth reclaim those delicious brown nipples. That was when he noticed her nipples were pointed, straining for his attention. “And I don’t think you want me to leave either.”

Felicity raised an eyebrow. Luke looked up to meet her gaze, and then let his eyes very obviously go to her erect nipples. Felicity’s eyes darkened and she threw an arm over her chest, concealing her arousal. Luke wondered if there was a damp spot starting in her panties. He too had made sure to fix up his appearance to its most alluring.

Scowling, Felicity pushed a button on her side of the wall, and the door quickly slid shut. Luke shoved his right arm in the doorway at the last second, and the heavy metal pinned it against the doorframe.

Luke smiled as the door recognized the obstruction and quickly slid back open, releasing his arm. He stood there, grinning at Felicity as she glowered at him.

“You turned the sensors on your prosthetic to zero, didn’t you?”

“I’m not ready for this conversation to be over,” Luke lowered his arm. “If speaking to you means I have to shove my hand between a few doors, then so be it.”

“You know, the sentiment would be more flattering if you had turned your pain sensors to 100 rather than nothing.”

Luke flipped open his wrist control panel, cranked the sensor dial to maximum, and held his arm back in the doorway.

Felicity rolled her eyes, “This isn’t mating season, Luke. You’re not going to wow me with a show of strength, then drag me back to your apartment where I present myself for breeding.”

Luke shifted, “Felicity, after two weeks without even a hello… I’m not sure I can handle that sort of image.”

Wrong move.

Fury burned in Felicity’s eyes as she suddenly gripped Luke’s tunic, and wretched him forward with a strength that actually surprised Luke. He stumbled into her apartment, struggling to gather his bearings as Felicity slammed the door button to shut.

“This isn’t a game, Luke!” Felicity roared when the door was closed. “I’m not one of your bimbos who you can flash a few smiles at and their panties hit the floor! By the Gods, Luke! Do you even get why I’m so mad?”

“Of course, I get it,” Luke said calmly, bowing his head. This conversation had to be serious; no more eyes roaming lustfully over Felicity’s body. “And you’re right, this struggle over sexual dominance is inappropriate for this conversation. I understand why you’re mad at me. I shouldn’t have withheld the truth from you, and I’m sorry.”

“Oh, you’re sorry? Well, that changes everything!”

“What do you want from me, Felicity? I can’t bring your brother back from the dead.”

“I’m not expecting you to.”

“Then tell me what you want!”

Felicity grabbed Luke’s arm and dragged him to her living room where three things sat neatly on her coffee table: a bracelet, a blaster, and an urn. She had definitely planned on letting him in.

“First, I want you to take this stupid bracelet back!” Felicity chuckled the kyber crystal bracelet at Luke, whose Force Sensitive relaxes ensured he caught it no problem. “I mean, are you serious, Luke? Your dad slices my back with a saber, and you give me that? Give it to Ben! He wants it!”

“I’m not giving Ben a Sith crystal,” Luke didn’t acknowledge the fact he learned about her scar nearly a year after giving her the crystal. “Felicity, please-”

“Two, I want you to look at this,” Felicity picked up the blaster off the table. It was the blaster she always carried on her, no matter how many times she needed to repair it. “An Imperial issue, NN-14 blaster presented to Brendan Rhiaon and bequeathed to me upon his death per his request. The day he gave me this, he changed my life. In that moment, he turned me from a simpleton to a soldier, he chose my path for me… and Tyla chose his.”

“Felicity-”

“Third,” Felicity didn’t pick up the urn on the table. She had too much respect for it to wave it around carelessly… though hadn’t been bothered by waving around a blaster in Luke’s face. “Look at that urn… That tiny urn, barely bigger than a travel shampoo bottle. You know why it’s so small? Because he stood right above the most powerful bomb, the one that had been designated to kill him specifically to become a symbol of the Empire’s cause. Have you ever heard the details of the Bombing of Faclov? How the blood literally ran in the streets and the air smelled of roasted flesh… Like… barbeque puffer pig. You know, I throw up anytime I smell cooked swine?”

Luke wanted to mention that he didn’t partake in any swine based food after watching the Rancor eat that Gamorrean. He abstained from the comment.

“You want to know what they found of Brendan?” Felicity asked. “Guess.”

“I’m not going to play that game, Felicity,” Luke said calmly.

“His comlink was found three blocks away, smashed beyond repair. His weapons belt with his blaster – this blaster – was found hanging from a tree next to Antilles Fine Imports. His dog tags were found lying on top of Sergeant Myec – the man who set off the bombs – who was so horribly mangled they had to match him to his dental records.

Luke found he had nothing to say.

Still Felicity continued, “Brendan’s arm was found in a nearby alley, identified as him by a tattoo of the word Felicity, which was followed by my date of birth. I didn’t even know he had that tattoo.”

“That’s why you got one of his name?” Luke asked.

Felicity nodded and looked away. Luke could feel the shift in her mind; something dark, stormy, and painful was left.

“You don’t have to say it,” Luke said gently. What he wouldn’t give to just take her in his arms at the moment and make her sorrow go away.

She looked up at him with tears in her eyes, “Yes, I do.”

A tender look on his face, Luke took a step forward and placed a hand on her shoulder.

“It’s okay, Sweetheart,” Luke fought the urge to wipe away the tears in her eyes. “You can tell me.”

“What they found…” Felicity’s voice shook as she struggled to get the words out. She cleared her throat and tried again, “Two feet away from the X he stood on… The X that set his death sentence, Brendan’s helmet was found… With his head still inside.”

“His head and his arm is all they could recover,” Felicity’s breath hitched. “They made his most precious features something sickening. Those arms that held me when I cried, those loving eyes, the carefree smile, the hair he was way too proud to maintain… I’ll never hear his voice again, calling me Shortstack as pulls me into a headlock during the most inappropriate occasions. I’ll never hear his laugh, hold him in my arms, introduce him to the man I choose to spend my life with, have him give me away at my wedding, put my newborn in his arms. He was more than my brother, he was my father and my best friend. And Tyla took him from me.”

“I understand exactly how you feel, Felicity.”

“No, you don’t,” Felicity sneered. She pointed at urn, “That’s all that left of him, Luke. All that’s left of my brother. Look at it. Look at it and imagine that was all you had left of Leia. Can you imagine the pain I went through? To see the person who raised you murdered in a horrifying display?”

Luke looked her straight in the eyes and said, “When I was nineteen, I came home to find my Aunt and Uncle – the people who loved and raised me – as charred skeletons on my front door.”

Felicity fell silent.

“You forgot that story, didn’t you?”

Felicity nodded.

“They tried to escape, you know?” Luke continued. “One of them was on their hands and knees, trying to crawl away. The other on their back, having made it to freedom, but could not escape the flames. Spread eagle but in agony… So, yes, Felicity, I know what it’s like.”
Felicity chewed her lip, pondering his words. Then she took a deep breath and looked him in the eyes.

“I am truly sorry for your loss, Luke… But do you remember the first time you told me that story?”

Luke winced, “When you told me about Brendan’s death.”

“That’s when you should have told me,” Felicity said. “I’ll concede that I kind of understand you not telling me the night we made love… that night already had enough soul bearing confessions, and the two of us were so aroused, you could smell the pheromones. But you didn’t tell me when you should have.”

“Felicity, I will not apologize for not being the one to tell you. Tyla’s past as an Inquisitor isn’t my secret to reveal. Don’t you understand? If the Republic discovers who she is, she’ll be executed, likely without a trial. No one got to execute Darth Vader or the Emperor… An Inquisitor is the next best thing.”

“Maybe she should be executed for her crimes.”

“Tyla killed 2,147 people in 2.38 seconds.”

“And I killed 1,148,309 people in 5.94 seconds,” Luke snapped. “What makes my action good and hers evil? We both killed without distinction. Innocents died by both our hands… yet the history books will call me a hero and her a villain. I won’t stand for that. She was forced into that role without choice as a child. Now that she’s an adult who knows better, she deserves to get a second chance at life.”

“Second chances,” Felicity scoffed. “No one deserves a second chance. You are who you are, and what choices you make is because of that. You don’t get a do over for being that person.”

“I don’t believe that. Han Solo can turn from a smuggler to a war hero. Lando Calrissian betrayed his friends, then fought to the death for them. Zena Halcorr was a slave owner and became one of the most successful underground slave liberators in the Galaxy. Anakin Skywalker became Darth Vader and back to Anakin. Even you went from an Imperial stooge to shooting Vader in the chest. Everyone can change.”

“So, that’s how you think I should live life? Forgetting the horrible crimes people commit? Because, what? They thought they were doing good? My father thought he was doing good. So did Vader. So did Tyla. But still what they did was evil.”

Luke sighed, “I’m not asking you to forget, but simply decide that you’re strong enough to stand up and say, ‘I forgive you.’”

“So, now I’m weak?” Felicity shot.

“That’s not what I’m saying!”

“Then what are you saying?”

“I’m saying that Tyla is being the bigger person and saying she’s sorry.

“I can’t do it, Luke. I won’t do it!”
Luke put his head in his hands, trying to keep his temper, “Why do you find it so hard to forgive people?”

“Why do you find it so easy?” Felicity shot.

“It’s never been easy!” Luke roared.

Something had finally broken inside of him, and Luke found himself fully angry with Felicity Rhiaon for the first time. Fear flashed in Felicity’s eyes, and she took a step back from him. Even she could feel the Dark Side crackling in the air as Luke lost it.

The couple stood there, staring at each other, burning blue irises battling with teary hazel orbs. Their heavy breathing was in harmony as Felicity watched Luke like he was an animal about to strike. He knew he needed to relax, to back down, and not give into the Dark Side. But this was a rage that had been building for years as he took abuse after abuse over his decisions to stand by Vader and Tyla and even the troublemaking Cade Ren.

“You think it’s been easy to forgive?” Luke snapped. “You think it’s been easy to step back and say I can move on from this? To reach out to my father with love and trust? He cut off my hand!”

Luke held up his artificial appendage.

“Do you know what it’s like to have your hand cut off?” he shot. “It’s like what happened to your back… but worse. A blinding white-hot pain shooting through your body. The laser going through your bone, the cauterizing of the wound, that severing of your nerves and sudden loss of feeling. That’s even not considering the aftermath and recovery. The look on Leia’s face when she first saw my hand was just gone. The horror on Han’s when he learned why I wear this glove. The meetings I had to attend in the Rebellion to make sure that I could still fly… that moment when I had to give up my command to Wedge. The awkwardness between Nalto and I when he tried to bond over the fact that Vader had ruined both our hands. The well-intentioned but still painful time they sent this other pilot to talk to me about it… Andar or something, who also had a false hand that he had been forced to amputate himself.”

Luke clenched his metal fist tightly.

“Then there’s the prosthetic… those fittings I went through. The times I heard the other Rebels whispering that if I wasn’t the poster boy for the Rebellion, they wouldn’t have paid for this, and Force knows the poor farmboy I was, would never have been able to afford the prosthetic. Then there’s the whole Phantom Limb Phenomenon, or whatever it’s called. I don’t like to talk about, but there are times where I wake up and I think I feel my real hand attached to my wrist. And there’s the shame of having this hand… I remember the first time I put on this glove, after my hand had been shot saving Han from Jabba. It was only supposed to be on my hand until I could get my hand fixed… but it became a part of my identity, hiding this piece of metal that isn’t me.”

Felicity suddenly grabbed his hand, clasping both of her own around it, “It is you, Luke. I don’t care if it’s metal instead of flesh, it’s still you.”

“But you do care,” Luke shot. “In my office, you didn’t want me to touch you with that hand. For the first few months we knew each other, you avoided my hand as much as possible. And every time we make love, I have to be careful not to hurt you… I did that once with a partner. It wasn’t even anything kinky, just fingering, and I bruised her clitoris and vaginal passage. Recovery would be a few months, but I never saw exactly how long because she broke up with me over it. I apologized many times, but she never wanted to risk it again.”
Felicity closed her eyes but said nothing.

“I have my left hand,” Luke shrugged, “and yes, it’s my dominant hand, but… my hand’s gone, Felicity. Gone.”

She took a deep breath and released his hand. Immediately, he brought it to her face and stroked her cheek.

“I’ll never get to use that hand, Felicity, to stroke your cheek… run a thumb over these beautiful lips,” Luke did the actions with his mechanical hand as he described them. “Feel the curve of your neck… the sensitivity of your collarbone… the beating of your heart.”

His hand drifted down to the center of her left breast where her heart thrummed a steady beat against her ribcage.

Luke’s eyes burned as he looked down at Felicity, desire sizzling in the air. His hand on her soft breast, Luke couldn’t stop his mind from recalling the image of her naked body and the things he had done to give it pleasure.

“The swell of your breasts,” Luke stroked the tender flesh and Felicity shivered. His fingers circled the point in the center, straining the fabric of her tank top, “The hardness of your nipples under my fingers…”

He dragged his fingers across her soft breast and ran them down the valley parting the identical mound.

“The firmness of your stomach… the perfect resting place of your hips… the silkiness of your thighs…”

Felicity gasped as his hand stroked her tender thigh, teasing trail to the core of her pleasure. She bit her lip tightly, struggling to fight off her lustful desires to let him do what he wanted to her body.

“The heat of your eager cunt,” Luke stroked her pant covered sex. He grinned as he felt the touch of wetness staining the fabric of her crotch. Felicity was always extremely turned on by his dominant side.

He sighed and removed his hand, bringing it back to her face, “There’s so many things I’ll never get to touch… I’ll never ruffle Ben’s hair… I’ll never hold my newborn with natural hands. My father took that all from me, and you know what the worst part of it was? He knew I was his son and he still did it.”

“Then why did you forgive him?” Felicity asked. “Why do you put yourself through so much turmoil and choose to forgive him? To forgive everyone?”

“Because, frankly… it’s exhausting to hate someone, and this world has enough darkness in it… I don’t need to add to that pain.”

Felicity lowered her head. Luke could sense the turmoil in her mind, the battle that was struggling to tear her apart.

“You can’t do this, Luke,” Felicity shook her head and pushed him back from her. “Stop trying to win me back.”
“Never,” Luke said firmly. “I believe in destiny, Felicity. I believe in it to cope with the idea that these pains I’ve endured have all been for something. And I know that you are my destiny.”

“No!” Felicity snapped. “You can’t just come in here, spew some pretty words, and think I’m going to fall at your feet. This isn’t about me forgiving Tyla, Luke. I’ve made my peace with her. This is about you lying to me after you promised not to.”

“I know,” Luke sighed. “Felicity, please… I’m sorry. I made a mistake and I regret it, not because I lose you, but because it hurt you. I don’t want to hurt you, I never intended to hurt you. That’s why I didn’t tell you, because you were in so much pain and I didn’t want to cause you more.”

“That’s not an excuse.”

“Nor do I want it to be… Please, Felicity.” Luke took her hands in his, “I know the stories they tell of me, the way the Galaxy views me, like the character of a myth… but I’m not a myth. I’m not a God. I’m a man. A man desperately in love with you, who is going to make some stupid mistakes in his life. Believe me, I’ve made horrible mistakes, removing Artoo’s restraining bolt, letting Ben Kenobi go off alone on the Death Star, running off to Cloud City unprepared, and so many more. I’m going to make mistakes in the future, Felicity, and some of them will involve you… but I swear to you, I will spend every waking moment making up for those mistakes and proving to you the depth of my love. Please, Felicity, let me spend my life loving you.”

Tears swelled in Felicity’s eyes, and Luke could sense her turmoil, how much she wanted to say yes, and yet…

“No,” Felicity released his hands and turned her head away from him. “No… We need to stop this, before it’s too late, before…”

And then Luke saw it in her mind, a flash of faces: Brendan, Alaric, Riz, Ji-Dan, Gunner, Diego, Bail, Obik, Biggs, and Leia.

“Before what?” Luke puzzled over the images. “What’s going to happen if we continue this?”

Felicity sighed but still did not look at him, “The same thing that’s happened to everyone I’ve cared about… Sooner or later, one of three things happen to the people I love. They die… they betray me… or they abandon me…”

Luke’s jaw dropped slightly, his brows knitted together as Felicity crossed her arms and took a seat on the couch.

“I wasn’t meant to be loved, Luke,” Felicity said bitterly. “My mother died, so did my brother, so did my father, so did Riz and Ji-Dan and Gunner and Bail and Biggs. Losing them hurt, but it didn’t hurt as much as my father’s betrayal… Over and over again he hurt me and betrayed me and made me feel worthless. He showed me that I wasn’t worthy of love, and everyone else in my life has reinforced that point. Literally, the only person who has stayed with me this whole time has been Nils Arlos, and even then that’s probably only because he would have to pay me severance. Everyone else abandoned me.”

“No one abandoned you,” Luke stared at Felicity from across the coffee table as she stroked the top of Brendan’s urn.

“Pax abandoned me… four years together and then he told me that either I needed to move on from Brendan’s death or call off the wedding. Drystan abandoned me… he sided with the track during that whole Ben fiasco, and then dumped me for being emotionally unavailable since I wouldn’t tell him all of the painful things in my life when he demanded it. Obik abandoned me... He saved my freaking life, found out he was a Jedi, and ran off to Rornian without so much as a goodbye, then didn’t speak to me for six years. Diego abandoned me... He was offered a position on Coruscant, you know? Better pay even, but he liked the military base on Hosnian Prime better and chose to move there instead of going in on a Coruscant apartment like we promised. Leia abandoned me... once you and Han came into the picture, that was it for our friendship.”

“That’s not true. You and Leia just grew apart.”

Felicity’s eyes narrowed, “Is that what she told you? Well, let me paint a picture of ‘us’ growing apart. I learn that the Empire killed my brother and Leia offers to get me into the Rebellion. I go off, but not before we promise to see each other as often as possible... The next time I see Leia is five years later via hologram on Jakku. Fair enough, she needed to keep a low profile as it couldn’t be public knowledge that she was a rebel. I give her the plans, and we promise to meet up as soon as possible... Six months later, we run into each other in the hallway on a Rebel Base and are happy to see each other. Okay, sure, Leia was dealing with a lot during the aftermath, but now’s my chance to see Leia and comfort each other over the death of Bail... except Han Solo comes up to her two minutes into our conversation and says that he and ‘the Kid’ – whom I assume was you – are waiting for her. Leia excuses herself, and promises we’ll catch up in no less than two months.”

Felicity sighed heavily, and Luke had an uneasy feeling.

“Two and a half years later,” Felicity continued, “I hear Leia’s in the control room on the Hoth Base, which I am passing through for the night. I go to see her immediately and we’re happy, and Leia asks permission to leave her station to catch up with me. It’s granted but first I have to check in with my commanding officer. I tell her to wait right here and I’ll be right back. I return, and Leia’s in the hallway screaming at Han Solo that she’d rather kiss a Wookiee. Han Solo storms away, and I timidly approach her making some joke about Solo to break the tension. Leia tells me that she’s sorry but she needs to go rant at Luke for a few minutes as he’s the only person who understands how frustrating Han Solo is. She promises to come hang out with me a little later, so I go to my assigned bunk, unpack, and wait.”

“This was the night we were supposed to go to dinner together, right?” Luke recalled Diego’s story.

“I met with Diego when I got off the transport. I totally planned on blowing off my blind date to hang out with Leia.”

“And you got mad about me not showing up,” Luke teased.

Felicity smiled, then immediately dropped it as if her lips were betraying her face, “Pretty soon, I hear what’s happened to you and Han, and I go to see Leia. She tries to act strong, but I remind her of how she comforted me with Brendan. She breaks down and cries in my arms. Then she says words that I will never forget, ‘Felicity, I can’t lose Han and Luke... I don’t have anyone else in the Galaxy but them,’ ...And that was the moment I knew that Leia viewed our friendship as over...
She had traded me in for a Jedi and a Smuggler, and Felicity Rhiaon was nothing more than a memory.”

Luke didn’t know what to say; he had never questioned the odd friendship between Leia and Felicity. And he had never imagined that forming their little family of Rebels during the war had involved Leia abandoning her childhood best friend.

He hesitated and placed a hand on her back. Felicity closed her eyes, but made no move to stop him.
Gently using his real hand, he traced his fingertips along her spine scar.

“That wasn’t the last time I saw Leia, but I never fooled myself when I did,” Felicity said. “I found out about the whole twin and Vader thing via the press conference you inexplicably held. Luke… why the Hell did you hold a press conference to announce that?”

“Leia said we had to tell the public before someone else figured it out,” Luke shook his head in mild amusement. “Then we could publicly acknowledge we were siblings, and explain where my sudden inheritance came from.”

“Makes sense. At first, I feared the whole Leia is the secret spawn of Vader thing… but I got used to it because I knew what kind of relationship they had had. I ran into Leia a month after the announcement, and we had awkward discussions about how we were both now engaged… and Leia was pregnant out of wedlock. I remember teasing her that Bail would have been so proud. At the end of our discussion, we promised to catch up some time, and promised to invite each other to our weddings… Except I never received an invitation.”

“Felicity, they only had about twenty people at the wedding,” Luke said. “It was more a Han had to marry Leia as quickly as possible before he ruined her campaign for Senator… and I killed him for impregnating my sister in an Ewok village.”

“Wait, is that where it happened?”

“I would rather not discuss my best friend impregnating my sister.”

“Sorry.”

“So, did you and Pax invite Leia to your wedding?” Luke asked.

“She declined the invitation in favor of some conference she easily could have skipped,” Felicity shrugged. “…I didn’t even bother to tell her when I broke off my engagement. We saw each other a few more times after that, but we weren’t friends anymore. Slowly, I watched my life fall apart: Diego moved, Pax and I broke up, and slowly my Rebel friends dropped out of contact. I got an apartment, had my job, went on business trips, dated occasionally, and just went on with life. Nobody noticed I didn’t have an emergency contact. Nobody noticed that I ordered in and heated up frozen premade meals because I didn’t know how to cook. Nobody noticed that I only had sex to obtain pleasure to fill the emptiness inside of me, forgetting what it even meant to make love. I would wake up every day and just feel… nothing. I took up running to connect with the outside world, but I would run through the crowds, surrounded by people and I would just feel… so alone. Most nights, I cried myself to sleep, and repeated the empty daily cycle all over again the next morning. For six years, I existed, but I didn’t live.”

Luke’s heart broke at the confession. Felicity Rhiaon was so strong and confident; he never dreamed that she had lived such a sorrow-filled existence.

“And then…” Felicity whispered. She looked up at him with tears in her eyes, “I met you.”

Luke frowned, “Felicity…”

She lifted a hand and stroked his cheek. Her hand stilled, like she had just remembered she was still mad at him, and Felicity lowered her hand.

“Leia and I got trapped in an elevator alone for an hour,” Felicity continued. “It was the first time we had been together in years. We talked about the old times, and the day we messed up with the elevator and met Vader. We talked about her family, and all the things you lot had accomplished.
Then we got on the subject of the upcoming Tenth Anniversary of the Battle of Yavin celebration. I joked with her that I was mad I never got a medal in the original ceremony, and Leia got the idea to give the medals to Diego, Wedge, Chewbacca, myself, and the others posthumously. A few weeks later, Leia contacts my office and arranges this whole event. Then the fateful day comes, and I tease Leia that it feels like just yesterday we were promising to hook up with each other's brother, and she says she suddenly has this great idea. Then she grabs me by the arm and drags me over to you, and… the rest is history. I find the greatest man who I have ever met, and fall madly in love with him.”

Luke smiled warmly and wrapped an arm around Felicity’s waist. She relaxed slightly, and leaned into his embrace.

“You filled all those empty parts of my life,” Felicity’s voice shook as he stroked her hair. “You’re there, just a few floors above me and spend time with me every day. You noticed I didn’t have an emergency contact and you’re so upset over the thought of me being hurt that you happily take the job. You go running with me, and I no longer feel alone in the crowd. You teach me how to cook, and join me when I eat out every morning.”

“I guess that’s one habit I couldn’t break you of,” Luke teased.

Felicity gave a small smile, but that quickly fell, “And… you showed me… maybe even for the first time, what it is to make love. Slowly and tenderly, fast and furious, vanilla and boring, spicy and kinky, but no matter how or where we have sex, I feel like we’re truly making love. And I do love you, physically, emotionally, mentally, with all of my being… And I-I…”

She started to cry.

“Luke, I can’t lose you,” Felicity sobbed, burying her face into his chest. “I can’t do it, not this time, not after knowing what it’s like to truly be in love. If I had you and lost you, this time I wouldn’t survive. I couldn’t go back to that life I had before. I was on the track for either dying from the emptiness of that life or losing myself to become bitter and dark like… not quite to the extent of Vader but maybe more like… like Phasma. That’s what I would face again. If I ever lost you, Luke, I would either die or become Phasma. I can’t live either of those lives, Luke, so please, please let’s stop… because I can’t go through death, betrayal, or abandonment with you. Please, Luke, please.”

“Felicity, stop,” Luke held either side of her face and forced her to look at him. “Stop. We don’t need to do this.”

“Yes, we do.”

“No. And I’m not letting you go; not ever. Okay? I showed you what real love is, and you also showed me. I never dreamed of obtaining this depth of love, but I’ve captured my heart, Felicity Rhiaon. For now and forever.”

“But Luke-”

“No buts,” Luke placed a finger on her lips. “Okay? We don’t need to do this, to cause this pain over wanting to prevent, what? This very same pain. You love me, and I love you, and that’s the end of it.”

“Luke, please,” Felicity whispered. “Everyone I love has either died, abandoned me, or betrayed me. I couldn’t survive it if you did too.”

Felicity raised an eyebrow, “Even death?”

“…That one might be a little tricky, but maybe more the route of do whatever it is Yoda and Obi-Wan did to retain their forms. I’m not sure if Non-Force Sensitives could see a Force Ghost, but hopefully I have a long time to figure that all out.”

Felicity sighed, and shifted her head to rest against his chest, listening to the steady beat of his heart.

Luke wrapped his arms tightly around her and pressed a kiss to her forehead, “Felicity Rhiaon, I truly, deeply love you, and if you’ll have me to share in that love, I swear to you that I will never betray you.”

“I know you won’t,” Felicity murmured. “Death or betrayal isn’t what I’m worried about… It’s abandonment.”

His hand reached out and cupped her cheek. Luke eased her head up to look him in the eye.

With unbroken eye contact, and a quiver in his voice, Luke Skywalker vowed, “Felicity Rhiaon, I will never abandon you.”

Felicity took a shaky breath as the truth of his words shone through, “Promise?”

Luke bowed his forehead against her own, “Promise.”

Felicity released a breath it looked like she didn’t know she had been holding back. Luke smiled, his thumb stroking away the tears running down her cheeks. Felicity closed her eyes and took another cleansing breath. When she opened them, she leaned forward and pressed her lips to his.

Savoring the taste that had denied to them for two weeks, Luke and Felicity melted under each other’s touch. His free hand buried its way in her hair while the other continued to cup her cheek. He used both holds to pull her into him as close as possible. Felicity’s right hand gripped the same bunch of shirt she had grabbed when she had dragged him into her apartment. This time the grip wasn’t of anger, but a desperate need to draw him in as close as possible. She moaned as her left hand clasped the back of his neck, her fingers swirling around the short hairs.

Taking a chance, Luke slid his tongue into her mouth and stroked the sensitive roof. Felicity gasped, rubbing breasts against his chest, not caring that her hand was being crushed in the process. The pleasure was too much for Felicity, and she broke away. Luke groaned when he felt her lips leave his and tried to recapture them, but Felicity used her hand on his chest to firmly hold him back.

“I’m still mad at you, you know,” Felicity panted, trying her best to look angry, but it came off as rather adorably grumpy. “You don’t just get to jump back in to heavy petting and passionate sex.”

“Well, I’m more than happy to work my way back,” Luke nipped on her collar bone.

Felicity pushed him away, and Luke gave her an innocent grin.

“Down, boy,” Felicity ordered.

“I’m sorry, but you dressed specifically in a way to turn me on.”

“No, I didn’t.”

“Admit it, you did.”

“Alright, I did,” Felicity chuckled, lifting a hand to stroke his cheek. Her hand paused halfway across his skin and she frowned, “You didn’t shave today.”

“Oh… no, I didn’t,” Luke pulled back and awkwardly rubbed his jaw.

“Don’t tell me you need a woman in your life to ensure you’re keeping proper hygiene.”

“Sorry, right. I forgot. Don’t tell me you need a partner of either gender in your life to ensure you’re keeping proper hygiene.”

“That’s not what I… Never mind,” Luke shook his head. “And no, I don’t need you to remind me to shave. In fact, I was thinking about maybe growing out a beard.”

Felicity raised an eyebrow, “You’re not growing a beard.”

“Because I say so.”

“It’s my body, Felicity.”

“Seeing as we’re in a physically intimate relationship, I think I do have some say regarding at least a few of your body parts. But don’t worry, equal opportunity, you have say in some of mine as well.”

Luke stared at her, “I’m not sure if I agree with that notion.”

“Too bad for you,” Felicity smirked.

“I don’t understand. Do you think I wouldn’t look good with a beard? Should I wait a few more years until I look a little more mature and it would suit my face better?”

“No, I’m saying that I’ve had partners in the past with facial hair, and decided I don’t like the feeling. So, if you ever want to go down on me again, you’re going to stay clean shaven. Understood?”

Luke scowled, “Okay, that’s not fair. I won’t grow a beard, if you don’t want me to, but you can’t say things like that after explicitly telling me that we aren’t going to have sex right now.”

Felicity grinned, “Come on, Luke, by this point, you know exactly what you’ve gotten yourself into with dating me.”

“Well, I can always hope that someday you won’t want to spend every waking moment messing with people.”

“Yeah, don’t hold your breath on that on.”

Luke shook his head, “I suppose, I’ll redirect my efforts back into the whole getting you to believe in destiny thing.”

Felicity sighed and pulled back from him.

“I love you, Luke,” Felicity said. “But you need to understand that I’m never going to view the idea of destiny with more than raised eyebrows. To me it’s all just a logical sequence of events, with the occasional random thing thrown it. Believe me, I’ve tried not to be this way, but I can’t do it. I can’t find it in myself to believe something like my brother’s entire purpose was to die so that I could steal the plans to the Death Star so that some farm kid could get his sorry butt off Tatooine.”
Luke replied, “And I can’t believe that all of that wasn’t part of a plan to save the Galaxy from the Empire, find Han and Leia, and led me to you.”

“And I respect that, but I can’t bring myself to agree.”

“Then where does leave us?”

Felicity smiled, “At a compromise.”

Luke frowned questioningly at her as Felicity put a hand on his cheek. As Felicity gave a happy sigh, Luke placed his hand over hers.

“Luke, we can make this work,” Felicity pressed her forehead against his. “And do you know why?”

“Why?”

“Because I will never believe in destiny… but I’ll always believe in you. I know that we love each other, and that what we have is special. So, no matter what comes our way, we’ll always be at each other’s side, keeping each other from harm.”

“Always,” Felicity whispered. “I will always believe in you.”

Gently, Luke lifted his hand and stroked her cheek. Then he pulled her in for a passionate lingering kiss.

“Oh, I have missed kissing you,” Felicity sighed in contentment when Luke finally broke away. “Even if you are all scruffy.”

“Not as much as I’ve missed kissing you, and forget about the beard for now. I’ll shave it off later, but right now I need your taste on my lips.”

Luke pulled her in for another fervent kiss.

After a minute of reacquainting each other with the lips they had missed so much, Felicity pulled back from Luke.

“But if Tyla ever makes one disparaging comment about my brother, or jokes about his death,” Felicity warned, “I am so going to kick her ass.”

They kissed frantically, over and over until their lips were wet and swollen. Luke’s tongue was dragging up Felicity’s neck when she lifted into his lap to straddle him.

“Are you positive we’re not going to have sex today?” Luke moaned, running a hand up her leg.

“You know, I considered going off birth control just to spite you,” Felicity confessed as Luke eased the straps of her top down.

“I bet if I really concentrated, I could use the Force to summon the condoms in my nightstand down here,”

“As much as I genuinely would like to see that, as well as Threepio’s confusion if that happened, I stayed on my pills.”
“Thank the Force for a non-puritanical health care system. So, is sex off the table?”

Felicity grinned and glanced at the coffee table, “I want you to give it to me good on the table.”

Luke considered it, “That’s a new location. Bit of an awkward angle, and my back and/or knees are probably going to ache so much tomorrow… But if it means being buried inside of you, then I’m game.”

His lips on hers, Luke used the Force to start clearing off the coffee table. Felicity was kissing him with her tongue in his mouth when she noticed what he was doing.

He frowned at her and Felicity gave a sheepish smile.

“Brendan,” Felicity awkwardly nodded to the urn on the coffee table.

“Yeah,” Felicity rubbed her shoulder. “Don’t really want my tragically murdered brother’s ashes right next to my head while you screw me hard on coffee table. I’m going to go put this stuff away. Don’t go anywhere.”

“Had no plans to do so.”

As Felicity exited the room, Luke prepped for what was going to happen next. He pulled his shirt over his hand, and took off his glove, boots, socks, and lightsaber belt. Luke made sure to move his lightsaber to the kitchen counter so it wouldn’t get in the way. Felicity re-entered the room just as he was smoothing down his hair and checking himself over one last time.

“All clear,” Felicity announced, pulling her tank top over her head, and dropping her bra to the floor. “You ready?”

“Almost.”

Luke walked over to the armchair and lifted up one of the arms to reveal a secret storage compartment. Technically it was meant to be a cubby for remotes, but Felicity had repurposed it for nefarious purposes to hide some of her naughtier possessions.

“Are you keeping a pair of my briefs in here?” Luke frowned at the contents of the armrest as he pulled out the bottle of lube.

“Luke, you keep a pair of my panties and a bottle of lotion in your bedside drawer. You’re really going to judge me?” Felicity noticed the item Luke had collected, “Lube? Really, Skywalker? We just had a big fight and you think for make up sex I’m going to let you do an-”

“I’m smarter than that, Felicity.” Luke assured her, using the Force to set the lube on the floor next to the coffee table. He wrapped his arms around her waist and started leading her backwards, “The lube is to help get inside you the old-fashioned way. I can’t wait another moment, Felicity. I need to be in you now.”

Felicity gasped as her legs hit the coffee table and Luke started lowering her down.

“Wait, stop,” Felicity pushed on his chest. “We’re not there yet, Luke. You know, I’m still mad at you.”
Luke chuckled and held her upright, knowing that coy tone, “Oh, really?”

“Really,” Felicity wrapped her arms around him and placed them on his ass. She grinned and gave his cheeks a small squeeze, “Have I ever told you, you have a good butt? Nice and firm.”

“Right back at you, Miss Rhiaon,” Luke squeezed her ass. “All those squats are really paying off. So, what’s this about you being mad?”

“You have to work a bit before your cock can become reacquainted with my cunt.”

“And how do I do that?”

Felicity smirked. Stepping backwards, she led Luke back to the couch. She pushed Luke down and straddled him, her tits hanging in his face, and her crotch hovering above his.

“Looks like someone’s erect,” Felicity glanced down at the bulge in Luke’s pants that was straining to reach for her.

“Someone else is too,” Luke lowered his mouth onto her nipple and started to suck on it masterfully.

“Oh, I missed that,” Felicity moaned, cradling his head against her breast. “Yeah, just like that. That’s the spot. Oh, bite my nipples, Luke. Bite them and suck them and make them yours, Master Skywalker. They missed you so much.”

Luke moaned between his sloppy sucking, “So… how… do I… reach coffee table… level… apology… *Fuck, your breasts are delicious, Felicity. Does that feel good?”

“Bloody fantastic;” Felicity groaned as Luke sucked hard on her areola, the suction no doubt feeling incredible as he swirled his tongue around her nipple. “That turns me on so much, Luke.”

“It does, does it? How good? Does it get you wet? Does my mouth on your breasts make you wet? What about when I lick up the valley of these perfect pale orbs?”

“Oh!”

“Yeah, you like that. Remember the first time I put my mouth on your breasts? When I first sucked your nipples? When you seduced me in my office, making some excuse about cake and loneliness? But that shouldn’t have been the first time. No, the first time should have been that night we went drinking. I should have kissed you, and then brought you back here and sucked your breasts. Then I should have pushed you back on this very couch, unbuckled my belt, pulled down my pants – but only past my knees – pushed up that short little skirt you couldn’t even bend over in, yanked off your panties, and drove myself to the hilt. Picture it, Felicity, your legs spread, thrashing wildly as I pumped your core, fucking you into the couch cushion. The room filled with your rhythmic moans, the steady clinking of my undone belt, and the wet slapping of my balls beating against you with every deep thrust into your hot, tight cunt. Does that image get you wet? I bet it does. I bet your panties are soaking right now.”

“It gets me wet, Luke,” Felicity groaned, “but it doesn’t make my panties damp.”

“Why not?”

“Because I’m not wearing any underwear.”

“You’re kidding,” he looked her in the eyes.

Felicity smirked and unbuttoned the fly of her tight black pants, “Feel for yourself.”

Luke reached down her pants, and sure enough, his fingers slid through her wet fleshy folds unobstructed.

Luke buried his face between her breasts as Felicity rocked against his hand, building her pleasure. She panted faster and faster as her cunt got wetter and wetter against his fingers. He circled the entrance of her slit with his middle finger and was about to push in when Felicity suddenly removed his hand.

“Not yet,” Felicity told him breathlessly. “You have to earn your way into me.”

“Would you just tell me how to do so already? I swear, I’m this close to using a Mind Trick on you.” Felicity glared at him.

“To get you to tell me,” Luke corrected his phrasing error. “Not to get you to have sex my way.”

She still glared.

“And no… I don’t think you can but fooled with a Mind Trick.”

Silence.

Felicity shook her head, “You’re lucky you’re cute.”

Before he could protest, her lips were back on his and she was easing him down.

“Lie on your back,” Felicity instructed, scooting off him.

Luke lay back and reclined on his elbows to watch her as Felicity pulled off her pants.

“All the way,” Felicity chided.

Luke obeyed, “Now who’s being dominant?”

“We’ll resume normal programming some other time. Today’s my day.” Felicity spread her legs on either side of his thigh and lowered herself. She sighed when her pussy rested on his leg, “Oh, that feels good.”

She took a deep breath and started rocking against his toned thigh. Her hands were planted on his torso, her breasts bouncing gently, and her well-lubricated cunt glided easily across him.

“Here’s how today’s going to work,” Felicity moaned as she masturbated herself on his leg. “We are going to spend the entire day fucking. We’re going to take fresher breaks and stops for meals, but you are going to spend the entire day bringing me as much pleasure as humanly possible until it’s the dark of night, we’re completely exhausted, and you’ve fucked me completely dry. Now, as I recall, the most orgasms you’ve given me in one night is seven… Today you’re going to give me an absolute minimum of eight. As for yourself…”
Felicity swatted away Luke’s hand as he tried to reach down to play with his pant-clad bulge.

“You don’t get to have any orgasms unless I allow it,” Felicity said. “You’re going to do – oh – exactly what I say, exactly when I say it, and in what position I tell you to, and for how – ah – long I tell you to. If you’re good and follow the rules – yes – I’ll let you cum. But every time you cum without my permission… I’m withholding sex for a week. So, if you cum three times without my permission – yeah, that feels so good – you don’t get to touch this body for another three weeks… and then I’ll be really mad. Oh, God, I’m getting close. And one more thing… you don’t get to cum any way except your cock in my pussy. Your hands aren’t allowed on your cock today, and I’m not touching it with my hands, mouth, breasts, or anywhere except my pussy.”

“What if I need to get hard?” Luke took a deep breath, struggling not to grab himself.

She rode his thigh harder and moaned as he flexed it, “You can rub against me, and push comes to shove I’ll use my hands, but otherwise you are not being touched. Understand? This is how you really are going to make things up to me.”

“And when will I get to have you on the coffee table?”

Felicity thought about it, “How about number four? Agreed?”

Luke smiled, enjoying the sight of her pleasuring herself, “I don’t think I have much of a choice but… agreed.”

“Good, because I can’t wait for you to be inside of me. Pounding that thick cock of yours into my tight pussy, my cunt dripping with the cum from my previous orgasms. The room filled with the scent of sex and the sound of moans and wet slapping as you thrust ever faster and… faster and… faster, until you finally- OH GOD, YES!”

Felicity’s face contorted as she rode through the pleasure of her orgasm. Luke loved how she would always scream – usually his name – whenever she climaxed. He knew he had done right when Felicity literally screamed with pleasure.

Slowly, Felicity stopped moving and she struggled to catch her breath.

“That’s one,” she whispered.

Then she collapsed against him.

Luke smiled and pulled her up into his arms. He lovingly held her close to him as she calmed down from a rather intense orgasm if the feelings in the Force had been correct. Softly, he pressed tender kisses to her shoulders, and whisper assurances of love in her ear. He used the Force to wet a washcloth in the kitchen and bring it over to them on the couch where he used it to gently clean Felicity up. He was careful to use a pressure that would clean her but not masturbate her.

“Mmm, thank you, Luke,” Felicity snuggled up in his arms.

“Anytime,” he kissed her forehead. “I love you so much… I just want you to be comfortable.”

Felicity looked up at him and smirked, “Damn it, Skywalker. Take off your pants.”

“What?”

Felicity reached down and unzipped Luke’s pants. The zipper was barely over Luke’s cockhead when his erection was already poking out. She eased down his pants and briefs, telling him to lift when they reached his butt, and chucked them across the room.

“Can you get the lube?” Felicity asked.

Luke frowned and summoned it, “Here.”

“Thanks,” Felicity popped off the lid and squirted a fair amount into her hand. She then wrapped that hand around his cock and began to pump.

“Oh God,” Luke threw his head back. “Felicity, what are you doing?”

“Well, that whole cleaning me up thing was just so romantic that it’s only fair for me to get you off,” Felicity swirled her thumb around the head of his cock.

“But you said you weren’t going to do this today.”

“You don’t need to worry about that. Oh, that feels so good. Could you do that gentle twisting motion I like?”

“Yes, Sir.”

It only took a few minutes before Felicity had Luke spurting off in her hand.

“It’s fine, Luke, really,” Felicity waved off as he tried to wipe away a little that had landed in her hair. “This isn’t the worst mess you’ve made on me. Remember Bespin last month?”

“Oh yeah,” Luke chuckled. “Next door, Han was so mad that he decided to storm into Lando’s office to file a noise complaint.”

“Only to come back ten minutes later all awkward saying that Lando was busy… That busy being Alyla spread eagle on his desk, and that yes, her scars are everywhere on her body. Seriously, what is it with Jedi and having sex on desks?”

“That reminds me, I have to make sure the next time we’re on Rornian together, I can find the time to finally bend you over my desk without any interruptions.”

“Speaking of interruptions, this one has come to an end.” Felicity climbed over Luke, “Lay flat and shimmy a little towards the end of the couch.”

Luke chuckled as Felicity grabbed the arm of the couch his head was pointing towards, and knelt over his face.

“I should have known this was going to be your next move,” Luke hooked his arms around her thighs to anchor her. “It’s your favorite thing.”

“No, my favorite is oral in the position of a sixty-nine,” Felicity replied. “Remember the signal if you can’t breathe?”

“Three taps on your thigh.”

“Bingo. I want you to go until I cum once. If you can do it twice, that would be great, but it’s okay if one or both of us can’t handle it twice,” Felicity’s tone was very matter-of-fact. But when the smirk graced her face once more, her voice dropped to a sultry tone, “Now, Master Skywalker… it was your mouth that got you into this mess… let’s see if it can get you out.”
“My pleasure, Miss Rhiaon,” Luke gently rubbed her thighs, inhaling the scent of her slick desire.

The next thing Luke remembered was those delicious, wet folds upon his lips. His tongue immediately set to work, lapping at her cunt hungrily. Felicity moaned wildly, her thighs clamping tight as she rocked above him.

Felicity Rhiaon riding his face to a pair of orgasms was the opening act to a simply erotic day of passionate lovemaking.

It was about one in the afternoon when Luke started pleasuring Felicity. By 2 am that night when they finally drifted to sleep, he had made her orgasm nine times.

And she had given him five.

1 Year, 6 Months, 4 Days

Luke was honestly surprised he didn’t just collapse at the front door of his apartment and sleep face first on the carpet that night. It was two in the morning, and even the droids didn’t bother to come greet him. He had just returned from three and a half very busy weeks on Rornian, and was glad to finally be home. The only downside to his late arrival was that it meant he couldn’t see Felicity until the morning, but the sooner he got to sleep, the sooner he would wake up and see her again.

Of course, he wouldn’t see her until they met on the roof to stretch for their early morning run. And if Felicity was going to bend over in front of him in tight spandex shorts after three and a half weeks of sexual abstinence, he was so not going to be responsible for what happened next.

Speaking of Felicity… As he entered his bedroom, stripping off his clothes and picking out a pair of pyjama pants, he called Felicity’s message box on his comm.

“Hey, Sweetheart, I just got home,” Luke said in his recording. “I decided to go straight to your inbox so I didn’t wake you up. You know, you look so beautiful while you sleep. I’m fine, my trip went well, but I wish you had been there with me. I swear I only lived for those nights you commed me. Especially the night you wore that sexy little purple thing. I can’t wait to see that in person, and of course seeing you. I’m going to take a shower now, and then go to bed. I love you, Sweetheart. I’ll see you in the morning.”

Luke took a quick shower, jerking himself off quickly to the image of Felicity doing erotic pre-morning run stretches, then him tearing off her clothes and having his way with her on the roof. It didn’t take long before he was shooting off against the shower wall. Then he toweled off, blow dried his hair, and pulled on his pyjama pants.

He was in the middle of brushing his teeth when he sensed the presence enter his apartment. Luke was surprised at the familiar Force Signature, but not endangered. He made no attempt to hurry up his bedtime routine as his guest waited for him.

Luke had a warm smile on his exhausted face when he entered the bedroom and found Felicity Rhiaon sitting on his bed, in a nightgown.

Felicity smiled, “Hey.”
She immediately stood up and crossed the room to his waiting arms. He pulled her in for a tender kiss, and warm, loving embrace.

“I missed you so much,” Luke murmured as he leaned back in for another kiss. “Three and half weeks is too long to be apart from you. I’ve been craving the flavor of your kiss. I forgot how good it tasted.”

“Oh Luke,” Felicity sighed. “There are just some things you can’t replicate through a view screen. Not that I was complaining the nights we tried.”

“No, you certainly weren’t complaining,” Luke chuckled, finally breaking away. He wrapped her arms around her and held Felicity close, “So… you broke into my apartment.”

“You gave me the passcodes,” Felicity reminded. “Besides, I just missed you so much, and when I heard you had come home—”

“I’m sorry that my message woke you.”

“I wasn’t asleep, Luke. I’ve had trouble sleeping the last week and was wide awake when you called. Then I saw you left me a message and heard you were home, so I thought I’d come up.”

“Oh, Felicity,” Luke groaned. Why did it have to be two in the morning? “I want nothing more than to make love to you right now, but I’m sorry, Sweetheart. I’m so exhausted. I just had my flight from Rornian, and this morning I had a big thing with the contractors over the medical center when they apparently somehow mixed up the designs with a different project they’ve been hired for. Then I had Reine on me about budget overages, then Shar’vida going on about seeds and bulbs and environmental conditions about the Meditation Gardens, Zena about taking a group to Illum to build lightsabers, Gavyn debating what age Miri should be allowed to use an actual lightsaber in training, Obik talking to Lor San Tekka about opening a Church of the Force in Temple Village, Alyla asking about what ages Younglings should be made into Padawans, Brinna and Tyla had a tiff about Tyla’s Imperial past, and Cade and his lot were causing their usual trouble, dragging poor Jake into the middle of it… Plus, I just masturbated in the shower, and I really don’t think I have the energy to get it back up, or take care of you while doing so—”

“Luke!” Felicity pressed her fingers to his lips. “I’m not here to make love to you.”

He blinked, “…Oh.”

Felicity laughed and pressed her body against him, “I mean, I would love to, but you’re right, we’re both exhausted.”

“So… why are you here? Not that I don’t want you here,” Luke was quick to add. “I mean, I do. I really do. Have I mentioned I love you? I’m going to kiss you.”

Felicity laughed as he pressed a frantic kiss to her mouth, “You are such a dork when you get flustered. But it’s okay, I find it adorable.”

“Adorable and dork are not very high on the list of words I want you to call me.”

“Fine, you sexy stud,” Felicity teased. “I came up here because like I said, I’ve been having troubles falling asleep, and I thought maybe… can I sleep with you tonight? I mean actual sleep. We’ll have sex first thing in the morning, but for tonight, I just want to sleep in your arms.”

Luke smiled, took her by the wrist, and led her to the bed as he used the Force to pull back the covers.
“If it will help you sleep, then by all means, Miss Rhiaon,” Luke pulled her into bed with him, “please join me. There’s plenty of room.”

He smoothed the blankets over them and used the Force to turn out the lights. Oh yes, it felt so right to have Felicity Rhiaon back in his arms.

“Thank you, Master Skywalker,” Felicity snuggled up against him, her head resting on his chest as his arms automatically wrapped around her.

Luke pressed a kiss to her forehead, “Anytime.”

1 Year, 8 Months, 22 Days

“Luke, Sweetheart, I’m back,” Felicity’s voice yelled from the doorway. “Threepio, can you help me with the groceries?”

“Coming, Miss Felicity!” Threepio called back. He nodded at Luke, who had been tinkering with him, “Pardon me, Master Luke, but your Beloved calls.”

“Of course,” Luke chuckled, flipping closed Threepio’s control panel. He smiled at Felicity as she and Artoo – heavily laden with groceries – entered the living room, “Well, what do we have here? It appears a beautiful woman has decided to grace us with her presence. I wonder what we have done to deserve this, Threepio?”

Felicity grinned in amusement as Threepio’s head spun between herself and Luke, trying to work something out.

“Pardon me, Master Luke, but…” Threepio’s voice was positively confused as he took the groceries from Felicity, “that is Miss Felicity Rhiaon, your Beloved. You have been courting her for nine months and seventeen days, and coupling with her for eight months and twenty-two days.”

Felicity laughed as Threepio looked at them once more and then entered the kitchen with Artoo, still clearly confused as to what had just happened.

“Well, I didn’t know your droids were so informed about our sex life,” Felicity shook her head. “I didn’t realize that Threepio had been keeping track of the days.”

“Neither did I.”

“I wonder if he’s also been keeping a tally of how many times we’ve made love, because we sometimes do it more than once a day.”

“Let’s not find out,” Luke smiled, his arms still lovingly wrapped around her. “Grocery store was okay? Artoo didn’t give you any problems?”

“None. He was on his best behaviour,” Felicity replied. “But that also might be because he just finished a six month ban from that place and didn’t want to get banned immediately afterwards. You know, give him a few weeks before causing another ruckus. Actually, they were having a sale on Jawa juice, and I got an idea.”

“Oh?”

“I am going to cook us dinner tonight,” Felicity declared, “and they are all going to be recipes native
Luke looked surprised, “Felicity, wow, are you sure?”

“Of course. We got all the stuff, and Artoo has all the recipes. It’s going to be just like the food you had growing up.”

“Wow… I don’t know what to say.”

Felicity’s smile dropped, “You’re a little afraid of eating what I’m going to make.”

“Our relationship is built on honesty.”

Felicity shook her head, “I’m sure it won’t be that hard, and even if it is terrible, you won’t say a thing about it.”

“Oh really?” Luke raised an eyebrow. “And why wouldn’t I?”

“Because I’m really good at sex, and can withhold it from you.”

“You really should have been named Lysistrata.”

“Probably,” Felicity shrugged. “So, what have you been up to this afternoon?”

“Tinkering with Threepio. You know, I think I might be able to retrieve his erased memories.”

“Have you considered that might not be a good thing?”

“It’s passed my mind, but to be honest… I really just want to know why Threepio is programmed not to impersonate a deity.”

Felicity frowned, “What?”

“It’s not a standard protocol to for a droid to have, and certainly wouldn’t be something you can find in the junk to harvest as a slave,” Luke explained. “That means that Threepio was specifically given this protocol by someone, which probably means that there was an incident where he did pretend to be a God.”

“You’re right, I do need to know that,” Felicity said. “Hey, ten credits say Artoo’s the reason it happened.”

There was a knock on the door.

Luke and Felicity looked at each other.

“Expecting someone?” Felicity asked.

Luke shook his head.

“Alright, you get it and I’ll help the Droids with the groceries.” Felicity shot a look back at the kitchen, “Truth be told, I don’t trust Artoo with produce anymore.”

“Do I even want to know?”

“Probably not.”
“Alright then,” Luke quickly kissed her and headed for the door. He checked the security camera panel next to the door and found the building manager was waiting outside. Quickly he opened the door, “Hello, Osto.”

“Hello, Master Skywalker,” Osto Foss bowed his head. “Is Miss Rhiaon here?”

“Sure, why?” Luke didn’t like the idea that someone would come looking for his girlfriend at his apartment.

“I’ve been trying to get a hold of her for the past few days and she hasn’t been home,” Osto explained.

“Oh, sorry, my comm’s broken and been in the shop all week,” Felicity called from the kitchen, and Luke allowed Osto in. “What’s going on, Osto?”

“I need to know if your apartment is alright,” Osto answered as Felicity walked back into the living room.

“Uh…” Felicity frowned. “It should be fine.”

“So, it wasn’t one of the units affected by the flooding?”

“There was flooding?”

“Yeah, a couple of units on your floor flooded. There were signs posted on all the walls of your floor. Haven’t you been down there?”

“I honestly can’t say I have,” Felicity looked surprised. “Luke, do you mind if I go check?”

As Felicity and Osto exited the apartment, Luke frowned. When had Felicity last been to her apartment? Because his was so much bigger and luxurious – it was a penthouse on Coruscant – Felicity and Luke had been spending all of their time at his apartment.

But before he could ponder it any further, he heard a loud crashing from the kitchen.

“R2-D2! Look at what you have done!” Threepio exclaimed.

Luke sighed. This is why he didn’t let the droids put away groceries.

“Tah-dah!” Felicity set the serving plate down on the table. “Lablabi, Mloukhia, and Shakshouka. Just like you’re back on Tatooine, but instead of having dinner with a grouchy man yelling at you about moisture farming, you get to eat with an attractive woman wearing a certain red dress I know you like so much.”

“Felicity, you have outdone yourself,” Luke grinned taking a seat, the dishes smelling positively delicious.

“Oh, and we’re having Samsa for dessert,” Felicity added.

Felicity laughed as she took a seat next to Luke.
She had gone the whole nine yards for their dinner with candlelight, soft music, and even wine from Tatooine which was extremely rare. And as they were about to discover… there was a reason.

“Ugh!” Felicity groaned as she and Luke pushed their glasses away, trying to get the taste out of their mouths. “I will never be able to undrink that.”

“Well, at least we can say we tried it,” Luke used the Force to lift the bottle off the table and put it in the kitchen. “So how did your inspection with Osto go?”

“The apartment’s fine,” Felicity reported. “It’s weird that I didn’t notice the flooding though. How long has it been since I stayed in my own apartment?”

“I’ve been trying to work that out. I think it was when I went to Temple Village last week?”

“No, remember, I stayed here with Alyla and Lando… which reminds me, you owe me for that.”

“They both happened to be visiting at the same time and needed a place to stay, and unfortunately Han and Leia were already having Aunt Sola stay with them in their apartment.”

“Luke, they conspired!” Felicity exclaimed. “I will never be able to unhear the things I heard through that wall. Lando is apparently pretty chatty when he’s getting down to business.”

Luke frowned, “They were supposed to stay in separate rooms.”

“Didn’t mean they did, and I wasn’t about to break up that party. There is not enough bleach in the galaxy to clean the image out of my eyes of those two making the beast with two backs.”

“How poetic,” Luke said flatly. He took a bite out of the food, “Oh, wow this is good.”

“That’s two you owe me then,” Felicity smirked.

Luke grinned and ran a hand up her thigh, “I can give you two.”

Felicity rested her head against Luke’s shoulder, “So I guess that means the last time I was in my apartment was after my last Resistance mission you couldn’t make.”

“Rornian needed me, Felicity.”

She ran a hand up his shoulder and started playing with the short hairs on the back of his neck, “I missed you that night. That bed was so cold and lonely without you.”

“I think I’ve made that up by now,” Luke kissed her hand. “Apparently, you’ve been sleeping in my bed for over a month.”

“Wow… and we didn’t even have sex quite a few of those nights. I just really like falling asleep in your arms.”

Luke pressed his forehead to hers, “And I love waking up to you in them. It’s truly the highlight of my day.”

Felicity closed her eyes, enjoying the moment as she stroked Luke’s face. Then she sighed and reluctantly pulled back, “I guess we’ll have to stop doing this so much. There’s no point to me paying rent on an apartment that I don’t even use.”

Luke paused, “No… you’re right, there isn’t.”
Felicity frowned at the look on his face, “What?”

“I was just thinking,” the idea formed in Luke’s mind, “why don’t you just stay here… permanently?”

“Are you asking me to move in with you?”

“Yeah. I mean think about it. We go running every morning, have breakfast, I drive you to and from work, we spend the evenings together up here, make dinner together, you have most of your clothing, makeup, and all the important things like that up here, we share the same bed every night. You even bought groceries for this place today. We’re basically living together already.”

Felicity grinned, “You’re right. It does make sense.”

“So, is that a yes?” Luke asked eagerly.

“Absolutely,” Felicity kissed him.

Luke couldn’t wipe the grin off his face as he kissed her over and over, savoring the taste of her lips. His hand moved slowly higher and higher until her reached the hem of her underwear. He started to trail his fingers across, closer and closer to her apex where he-

“Oh, ah, ah!” Felicity shook her head, pulling his hand away. “Not yet, Skywalker. I spent too long cooking all of this only for it to get cold because you have desires. Now, eat up, and we can make love after dinner.”

Luke tried not to look to sullen as he pulled back from Felicity. They sat there and ate dinner together without exchanging a word.

“Oh screw it,” Felicity threw down her fork after several minutes. “We have a microwave.”

Luke laughed as he grabbed her hand and dragged her toward the bedroom.

2 Years, 3 Months, 14 Days

“Mmm, we have got to go on vacation more often,” Felicity moaned.

She and Luke had gone on a week-long trip to Naboo to the lake country. They were standing on the veranda, Luke’s arms wrapped around Felicity as they watched the lake. The sun was just rising, the morning rays filtering through the window, bathing them in golden light.

It was the very same lake house that Anakin Skywalker and Padmé Amidala had hidden in in the prelude of the Clone Wars. Luke and Felicity’s choice of accommodation was a testament to how far their relationship had come: that Felicity was willing to spend a romantic week away with Luke in the house Anakin Skywalker had been married in.

Of course, Felicity had been so delighted to point out to Luke that he had very likely been conceived in that very building, and if not, it was at least definitely the place Anakin Skywalker lost his virginity.

That was why they weren’t sleeping in the master bedroom.

“I love waking up to you every morning,” Luke glided his fingers across her soft skin, glowing in the golden light dancing across the lake. “I’m going to lock this memory in my mind forever: you in my arms, bathed in rays of light. I’ve always loved the first ray of the sun, bringing life and hope anew to the world. In that precious moment, with a ray of light… everything is right in the Force.”

Felicity shivered at the sensation of his fingers one her skin and romance of his words, “Waking up with you is my favorite part of the day. I wish I could do it every morning. Between Resistance, Emissary, and Jedi missions we don’t get to do it often enough. But I could spend every morning at your side.”

“You could?”

“Mmm hmm.”

Luke took a deep breath to calm his nerves, “Felicity… there was another reason I wanted to bring you here, other than vacation.”

Felicity frowned and looked back at him carefully, “Okay…”

Luke closed his eyes and took another deep breath. He knew that the best thing to do was just lay it all out before her:

“Felicity, someday I’m going to ask you to marry me,” Luke announced. “I know we’ve thrown the ideas of marriage and children around casually, but now I’m pledging myself to the idea. I’m completely committed to this relationship, and I can no longer imagine spending my life without you. Now, I’m not proposing to you at this exact minute, but I’m letting you know that marriage is my endgame. If you don’t see that as a future possibility, I want you to tell me now so we can end things amicably.”

Felicity stared at Luke, the barrage of new information buzzing around in her mind.

“I’m sorry, what was that first part?”

“Look, I don’t want to pressure you into anything,” Luke assured her. He had known her long enough to know she used the whole I didn’t hear you excuse as a way to avoid difficult conversations. “But this shouldn’t come as that big a surprise. I’m not saying let’s get married today, but I want you to know where I’m directing this relationship. Just please, promise me that you’ll think about it.”

Felicity took a deep breath and nodded, “Okay… I’ll think about it.”

“Thank you,” Luke turned back to watch the sun slowly rise. He was quiet for a minute, and then said, “I just completely killed the mood, didn’t I?”

Felicity laughed, “Little bit.”

“Dang it.”

2 Years, 3 Months, 18 Days

“It’s nice they clear this place out for you when you visit,” Felicity said as Luke paid his respects to his mother’s grave.

“They have to,” Luke gave a small grin as he knelt by the closed casket of Padmé Amidala. “They can’t exactly say sorry, we can’t let you have private time with your deceased mother because this memorial is one of Naboo’s top tourist attractions.”

“It could be worse,” Felicity smiled. “They could charge you admission.”
Padmé’s casket was in the center on a platform in the circular walled gazebo type structure. The walls were black, and blue light filled the room. An image of Padmé Amidala was projected on the north wall, and as Luke knelt on the steps leading to the casket, Felicity couldn’t help but see how much Luke looked like his mother.

Felicity stood off to the side, at the entrance to give Luke some semblance of privacy. Luke had always come to visit his mother’s grave whenever he came to Naboo, but this was the first time he had brought Felicity with him. Felicity had visited the grave when she was a teenager working for Leia. It had been Leia’s request to meet the great Nubian Queen, never suspecting it was her own mother.

Luke had spent most of the visit just talking to his mother, vaguely updating her on his life. He kept one hand on the stone of her casket, as if securing his connection to her. It was his ritual. Sometimes when he spoke to her, he could feel the Force change, like somehow a part of her was in the room with him.

He wished he had known her… the least he could do was ensure she knew him.

“And that’s about everything that’s new,” Luke spoke to the grave. “You should see how well Ben is doing with his studies. He grows stronger in the Force every day.”

“You say that like it’s a good thing,” Felicity joked.

Luke looked up at her. Felicity and Ben wouldn’t truly start their rivalry until Luke proposed to Felicity, but their relationship had never been a smooth one. Even at that time, Ben had decided to give Felicity as much trouble as possible… and she was more than happy to give him just as much trouble back.

“Sorry,” Felicity smiled. “I shouldn’t interrupt.”

“No,” Luke grinned at her and held out his free hand. “Come.”

Hesitantly, Felicity walked forward and took Luke’s outstretched hand. Gently, he guided her down to kneel with him at the grave. His flesh hand remained on the casket. He would not touch his mother’s grave with the hand replaced by metal after the flesh had been stolen by his father.

Felicity clasped his false hand tightly; the days of her hesitance to be touched by it were long over. The hand may be mechanical, but to her it was just as much Luke as any other part of him. And truth be told, Felicity had long ago learned that a mechanical hand could be quite the interesting asset in the bedroom.

“Mother,” Luke spoke to the grave, clasping Felicity’s hand, “I want to introduce you to someone. This is Felicity Rhiaon. She’s the woman who protected Leia from Father the day they met. Felicity also was the one who stole the plans to the Death Star, and helped me find you… But most importantly – at least in the sense of introducing her relationship to me – Felicity Rhiaon is the love of my life.”

Felicity’s breath caught. Luke had said such things hundreds of times before, but this time was special. This time, when he was introducing her to his mother – even if it was a casket – Felicity finally felt the weight of those words.

“I spoke to Grandfather Ruwee once, and he told me something I keep close to my heart,” Luke continued speaking to his mother. “He told me that everyone gets three loves in their life. Their first love, their last love… and their true love.”
Luke looked at Felicity, fear behind his eyes.

“I didn’t get the pleasure of having her be my first love,” Luke said, “and I know I’m not hers. But I know in my heart, not only is she my true love… but I know that I will never love another woman after her. Not after having a taste of what this means. She is my true love… my last love… and with respect to Nakari Kelen… Felicity is the only love that will ever matter.”

Tears shone in Felicity’s eyes. She knew his words were not for his mother, and Felicity didn’t know how to handle it.

She didn’t deserve Luke Skywalker. She was broken, she was angry, and she was skeptical of the mysterious Force that was the center of his very being.

But she was the love of his life.

…and he was hers.

Felicity smiled, squeezed Luke’s hand, and looked at the grave.

“It’s truly an honor to meet you, Senator Amidala,” Felicity told Padmé. “You were something of an idol to me growing up. You gave me courage and strength… and now you’ve given me something even better. Love. You gave me a man who loves me fully and unequivocally, and I swear to you that I feel the same way about him.”

Felicity looked over at Luke. He was smiling brightly at her, his thumb stroking the back of her hand clasped with his.

And with his eyes filled with such utter love and trust… Felicity made her decision.

Felicity looked back at the casket, “You know, your son has been keeping something from you, Senator Amidala.”

“Luke didn’t tell you this,” Felicity continued, “but a few days ago, your son told me that one day he’s going to ask me to marry him. And I just want you to know, when that day comes…”

Felicity turned and locked eyes with Luke.

“I’m going to say yes.”

3 Years, 3 Months, 3 Days

“And so, with great pleasure, I declare the planet of Rornian to officially be a member of the New Republic,” Nils Arlos announced.

The crowd cheered and cameras flashed as Luke and Nils shook hands, posing with the datapad listing Rornian’s new certification. Among the crowd was the entire Jedi Order and Emissary department, as well as some personal friends, and of course, Luke’s family.

Luke could never forget how beautiful Felicity looked that day wearing her hair up, the kyber crystal bracelet, and a semi-formal dress. It was dark green, which Felicity later told him was a wink to Luke’s lightsaber… even if it was the wrong shade of green.

“Now that doesn’t mean we don’t still have at least another year or two of paperwork,” Nils grinned at Luke. “You’ve still got to work out a few trade agreements and establish organic population growth. In other words, someone on this planet is going to have to give birth sometime soon. Though I think I might have an Emissary to help get that in motion.”

Everyone laughed as Nils winked at Felicity and she rolled her eyes, shaking her head for the cameras.

After Luke gave a short speech, the ceremony quickly concluded. People slowly started to make their way to the Meditation Gardens for the reception while reporters asked various Jedi and Emissaries for pictures and comments.

“Congratulations, Master Skywalker,” Felicity sauntered towards Luke as he finished speaking to a reporter. “This must be a dream come true.”

“It’s only a dream because you’re here with me,” Luke smiled, pulling her into his arms and kissing her.

To the side, a pair of cameras flashed, capturing the tender moment for history. Luke and Felicity broke apart, startled by the interruptions.

“I hate when the cameras intrude on our moments,” Luke groaned.

Felicity gave her famous one corner smirk, “Then let’s make sure it’s a moment to intrude on.”

“With pleasure.”

Felicity locked her arms around his neck, and Luke dramatically dipped her down, planting a passionate, and not quite appropriate kiss for the audience. The cameras went absolutely wild.

“All right, knock it off, you two!” Reine yelled after a minute. “You’re not leaving me to speak to all of these reporters by myself, Luke.”

“Sorry, Reine,” Luke chuckled as he brought Felicity back to her feet, but his arms were still tightly wrapped around her.

Reine rolled her eyes, “Geeze, you guys go at it worse than humanoid cats.”

“Excuse me?”

Reine turned to see that Zena, Coria, and Nerissa – all the Zygerrians in attendance – just happened to be walking past her at that exact moment.

“My apologies, Ladies,” Reine grinned, but the women didn’t seem impressed.

“Oh, don’t act so high and mighty, Hon,” Gavyn grinned at Zena from where he had been talking to a reporter with Obik. “I can give plenty of testimony advocating the truth of Reine’s words.”

Obik leaned forward and squinted, “Is that a bite mark on your neck?”

Gavyn just smirked and arched a brow at Zena.

“You have no shame, do you?” Zena shook her head.

“Must run in the family,” Felicity jerked her head towards the nearby treeline.

Lando Calrissian had pinned Alyla Kene up against a tree, and the two were passionately making out as if they didn’t care about the dozens of reporters surrounding them.

Gavyn scowled at the sight of his sister going at it with Lando, “I need a drink.”

He grabbed the very confused Obik, and dragged him towards the reception.

“Sure, when we do that we get yelled at,” Felicity pressed suggestively against Luke.

“Well, I’m more than happy to do it again,” Luke gave a kiss to her neck.

“Miss Rhiaon, can we get a few quotes?” a reporter called.

Felicity sighed, “Sorry, Skywalker. Duty calls.”

“I’ll see you in the reception.”

Luke watched her go start the interview, which no doubt would eventually turn – as always – into an interview about dating the Jedi Grandmaster. Felicity enjoyed those because she liked to make up the most ridiculous rumours in them. People still thought he had a tattoo of Han’s name in a very inappropriate place.

“Master Skywalker.”

Luke turned and smiled when he saw an old friend make his way through the crowd.

“Lor San Tekka,” Luke shook the man’s hand and clapped him on the back. “I’m glad you made it.”

“Wouldn’t miss it for the world,” Lor San smiled. “I must say, congratulations. You’ve come very far. How do you feel?”

“Like all my dreams have just come true.”

“There’s always something so bittersweet when they do. You have everything you want: Jedi Order, a secure home, friends, family, and – if that little show was anything to believe – a very beautiful young woman to share it all with,” Lor San winked.

Luke laughed and looked back at Felicity; his heart fluttering as always at the sight of her, “I do have it all, don’t I?”

“The only question now is what comes next?”

Luke stared at the woman he so loved; sharing and supporting one of the biggest moments of his life. His heart knew there was only one answer to that question.

“Actually… I have an idea.”

3 Years, 6 Months, 10 Days

“So, can you guys come to Rornian next month?” Luke asked eagerly as Han, Leia, and Ben sat in his living room.

Han and Leia exchanged a confused look.

“Yeah, sure Kid, but… why?” Han asked.

“Han’s right,” Leia said. She held up a hand to shush Han when he opened his mouth to commentate the rarity of those words. “We’re very proud that you’ve finally decided to build your house on Rornian, but you don’t even break ground for two months. Why do you need us to come when you tell Felicity you’re starting?”

“Maybe it’s damage control,” Ben said, the almost nine-year-old lounging across the loveseat by himself. “Rhiaon’s not going to like you breaking up with her.”

“For the last time, Ben, I’m not breaking up with her,” Luke replied calmly. “You know, I’m sure the two of you would get along very well if you just spent some alone time with her.”

“I’ll pass,” Ben rolled his eyes.

“Ben sit up, and don’t roll your eyes at your uncle,” Leia ordered. “And would it kill you to even try giving Felicity a chance?”

“It might,” Ben shrugged. “Let’s not take the risk.”

“Ben!” Han snapped.

“What?” Ben moaned. “Come on, she’s just another one of Uncle Luke’s girlfriends. Why do I have to get to know her?”

“Felicity is not going anywhere, Ben,” Luke firmly said. “Please, could you just try getting along with her?”

“She doesn’t try getting along with me!” Ben exclaimed.

“Enough!” Leia ordered. “We’re not having this conversation again. Ben stop disparaging Felicity, and I’ll talk to Felicity again about going easier on you.”

It was hard for Luke to see Ben and Felicity always fighting, but it seemed like there would never be an end to the feud. Felicity refused to back down when she felt Ben had stepped out of line, and Ben refused to give his uncle’s Non-Force Sensitive girlfriend the time of day. Luke had the feeling Ben and Felicity would be much like Han and Anakin: under different circumstances they would have gotten on like a house on fire, but due to their past they would never be anything but mortal enemies.

Why did this family always have to be so dramatic?

“Now, Luke,” Leia turned back to her brother, “why do you want us to come with you and Felicity?”

Luke took a deep breath, “Because I want all of you to be there. Han, Leia, Ben, the Droids, and Chewie’s already agreed to come. I want- I need you to be there with me when it happens.”

“When what happens?” Han asked.

“Guys… I need your help to do something important,” Luke grinned and grabbed his HoloMag reader off the table. The catalogue chip had already been inserted, and the two pages had been bookmarked. “The first step is helping me decide between this…”

Luke’s reader projected the image of an engagement ring.

“And this…”
A second ring was projected.

Luke grinned at his family, “Which do you think Felicity will like better?”

The Solos were staring at Luke with open mouthed shock.

“Kid…” Han started, but couldn’t find the words to continue. Luke could sense Han’s disbelief through the Force.

“I’m going to take Felicity to the site of our future home, and give her one of these rings,” Luke announced.

“Luke, I don’t believe it,” Leia’s eyes were filling with tears. “Are you saying that-”

“Yes,” Luke declared. “I’m going to ask Felicity to marry me.”

Han and Leia were instantly on their feet, hugging, crying, and congratulating Luke. It was a moment they had waited so long for. Not just seeing Luke proposing to Felicity, but seeing Luke finally finding someone to spend his life with. It was a truly happy moment as they celebrated their family taking on a new member, and the chance to call Felicity Rhiaon their sister… and their wife.

Ben was utterly devastated.

Chapter End Notes

So I’ve been sending out feelers to a few people on this, but I want to know the consensus. Would you guys want me to extent this group of flashbacks another chapter to delve more into Felicity’s PPD? There are plans to go over some more of the major stuff a little later on – particularly the Ben/Felicity incident, and the incident we do not speak of – but if you guys want to see it, I’ll extend the flashbacks one more chapter.
Part Five: Marriage

Chapter Summary

Luke remembers the events leading up to his marriage.

Chapter Notes

I just want to address the issue of how long it’s taking to get to TFA. Let me be clear: the intention of the story is not Luke being in TFA, but rather Luke being in Rey’s life. If you must know, the chapter in which BB-8 shows up at the walker is currently slated for Chapter 43.

Why? Because I personally feel it’s important to see how Luke’s presence changes Rey’s childhood for better, and in some cases, for worse. I don’t only want to see Luke in TFA, I want to see him in Before the Awakening. I want to see him react to her first love and first heartbreak. I want him there when she gets her staff and learns to fight. When she builds her very own speeder, when she learns to pilot, and when the freaking Millennium Falcon shows up.

At the same time, I also want to see how Luke’s life would change. How he gets new friends, lives without the Force, and maybe even falls in love. I want to see him torn between giving his daughter a better life, choosing to abstain from helping the Galaxy, and the consequences of such choices. I want to do things that will make this story more powerful and emotional. You guys wouldn’t care at all that Felicity was shot if I just summed up how Rey and Luke got separated, then reunited, and then jumped into TFA. But I made the decision to take the time to let the audience get to know Felicity, and her character, and the relationships she has with Luke, Rey, and the rest and why the removal of her from their lives was so devastating. You guys wouldn’t care about her at all, but because I did that, I had people begging me to let her live, and people asking to see more of her.

So that’s why I choose to take this time to spend on Jakku. To show these relationships with Quom, Aletha, Mashra, and others to understand how leaving Jakku later on affects Rey. To show how strong this bond between Luke and Rey is, so that later on when the truth comes out and the bond gets damaged and even at one point, broken, you understand the weight of that relationship, how at times it was all the two had, and now it’s being lost.

To me, this is a better, more complete story with that included. If I were to skip to TFA next chapter, you genuinely would not understand what was going on. You would wonder about references made, choices of characters, why Rey – having had her father in her life – might not be the same girl she is in TFA originally, and even one thing that would very much confuse you. Spoilers ahead where the heck did one of the characters go?

This is the story I want to write, and at the end of the day, that’s all that matters. This is a hobby and something I do for my own pleasure. I want to read about Luke during Rey’s childhood, and I want to write it, and that’s what I’m going to do.
So, if you don’t want to read a story where I don’t immediately jump into TFA, you have three options:

Grin and bear it until you get to the part you like, and maybe try to find some enjoyment in the literally over 130,000 words I have written since chapter 17.

Take a hiatus from reading until Chapter 43, though many things you won’t understand as a result, and I can’t guarantee 43 will absolutely be the beginning of TFA.

Stop reading. I really don’t want you to, but at the same time I’m not going advocate you wasting your life reading something you don’t enjoy. If you do stop, I thank you for your support and wish you a happy life.

To come down to it, this is the story that is being told. Take it or leave it. The choice is yours, but I’m writing the story I want to write, and nothing’s going to stop me.

…Unless The Last Jedi does something to completely screw me over. Which it probably will.

Damn it.

The Long Way Home

Chapter Twenty-Seven

Part Five: Marriage

3 Years, 6 Months, 28 Days

Being Luke Skywalker, his proposal didn’t go exactly to plan.

It was all because of Reine. Honestly, if she had just stayed quiet, Felicity wouldn’t have been pissed at him.

When Luke and Felicity started dating, Felicity withdrew all involvement in Rornian’s Emissary case out of conflict of interest. However, when Luke decided to propose to Felicity, Luke withdrew his own involvement and sent Reine in his place, using the excuse that Luke felt it more appropriate now that Rornian was an official member of the New Republic.

To Reine’s credit, the only people who knew about Luke’s proposal plans were Luke, Han, Leia, Ben… and the Force Ghosts who were evenly split between happy for Luke and trying to talk him out of it. Despite seeing the successes of the relationships between Gavyn and Zena, Alyla and Lando, Reine and Obik, Eline and Jafan, and Coria and Nerissa, Yoda was determined that attachments should not be allowed. Obi-Wan was on the fence, torn between traditional Jedi beliefs and his own personal desire to see Luke happy.

Meanwhile Anakin was weirdly overly excited about the woman who once shot him in the life support suit becoming his daughter-in-law.

When Luke informed his father that he was planning on marrying Felicity, Anakin had chuckled and said, “That girl? I like her. She’s feisty. You sure know how to pick them, son. She’s absolutely gorgeous. I mean, no Padmé Amidala by any means, but Felicity’s the most attractive girl I think you’ve ever dated.”

Luke was very uncomfortable with the notion that his father found Felicity attractive.

Reine was staying at Luke and Felicity’s apartment on Coruscant for Emissary business a few weeks before Luke was to take his family and Felicity to Rornian. As far as Felicity knew, the reason for the upcoming visit was something to do with Ben’s training, hence why Han and Leia were coming, and she always joined Luke on his visits to Rornian whenever she could.

Luke was lounging on the couch of the living room, reading a historical record of the governmental funding the Old Jedi Order received. Felicity was kneeling by his feet at the coffee table, working on tweaking the hologram design of her latest university course project. He had suggested she use the dining room table, but she wanted to be near him.

He casually glanced down at Felicity and couldn’t help but smile at her scrunched up concentrating expression.

Felicity groaned and pressed a button on her design pad to bring up the calculator, “It’s the load weigh. I can’t get it just right.”

Luke set his HoloReader aside and – wrapping an arm around Felicity’s shoulders – squinted at the design, “Have you tried adding another pillar?”

“I can’t. The assignment is to use only five of them. Maybe if I reordered the spacing…” Felicity made a few adjustments to her design and then calculated the result, “Ugh! No! I swear, I’m going to throw this thing out the window.”

“I’m sure you’ll get it, Sweetheart,” Luke kissed her cheek. “But maybe you should take a break.”

“You’re right; I need to take my mind off it for a while. Maybe I’ll work on my dream house design.”

Luke froze. Felicity had no idea that he had technically stolen it from her and given it to the contractor. He really didn’t want her to discover it was gone.

“Are you sure you want to work on that now?” Luke asked as Felicity searched their office room. “We could, uh… We could do something else.”

There was a loud thud as it sounded like Felicity was moving boxes in the closet.

“Do what?” Felicity asked.

“Uh…” Luke thought hard for a good idea. “We could… We could have sex.”

I didn’t say he came up a good idea.

Felicity’s laughter echoed from down the hall, “Really, Skywalker? That’s how you’re going to seduce me? I’m bored. Let’s have sex. You actually think that’s going to work?”
“It did yesterday.”

There was a pause.

“Good point.” Felicity leaned out of the office doorway, “Hey, Luke, do you know where my house design went? It’s not here.”

“Have you checked the bedrooms?” Luke suggested, trying to buy himself some time.

Felicity went and checked, but naturally found nothing.

“It just so odd,” Felicity frowned, leaning against the wall of the hallway. “You’re sure you haven’t seen it?”

Luke needed to come up with a lie fast. He knew it would be okay in this situation. This was more surprise party secret Felicity proclaimed not to give a shit about, and less I’ve been harboring your brother’s murderer, but we’re cool right?

“I had it last on Rornian,” Felicity thought hard.

“Oh that’s right!” Luke pretended to suddenly recall. “You left it at Alyla’s place when we stayed with her. She meant to send it with Reine to give to you, but she forgot.”

Felicity frowned, “That’s weird. I’m certain I remember packing it.”

Luke just shrugged. Sure, he was willing to occasionally fib to her in the name of a surprise, but he wasn’t about to gaslight her.

“Well then, I guess there’s only one thing to say,” Felicity walked back into the living room.

Felicity smirked and shoved him against the couch back.

“I’m bored,” Felicity straddled his lap. She bent down and kissed his neck. “Let’s have sex.”

He grinned, his hands stroking her spread thighs as she started to unbutton her top. Luke grinned at the view of her black lace bra and the way it seductively presented her pale breasts. God, he wanted his mouth on them. As she dropped her top on the floor, Luke pushed on her back, bringing her closer to his embrace and drew his lips across her newly exposed skin. His hand was on the clasp of her bra when suddenly the apartment door slid open.

“Luke, I’m going to kill the contractor!” Reine shouted as she stormed into the apartment.

“Reine!” Luke exclaimed, gently pushing Felicity off his lap. “We didn’t think you’d be back so soon.”

Reine stopped in her tracks when she saw Felicity pulling on her top and hastily buttoning it. Felicity’s actions were so frantic she didn’t realize her shirt was inside out.

Luke flushed red, “I’m sorry, I… What was that about the contractor?”

Reine seemed as happy about the change of conversation as him, “Right… I’m going to kill him.”
“Please don’t,” Luke said dryly. “It wouldn’t look good for me if my first student turned to the Dark Side… though I guess technically Ben was my first student.”

Felicity smirked, “What the hell were you doing to him in-utero?”

“Luke, I’m serious, we need to fire this guy!” Reine exclaimed.

“Well, he finished the frame for his latest project… except it’s backwards.”

“Excuse me?”

“Yeah, he built the frame for your house backwards.”

Felicity frowned, “What did you just say?”

“I am not lying,” Reine said. “The house entrance is in the backyard, and the back entrance is in the front yard. Your house, Luke, is backwards. We’re going to have to tear down the frame and re-stake the area.”

“Your house,” Felicity whispered.

“Luke…” Felicity said slowly, “are you building a house?”

Reine looked at him in confusion, “You didn’t tell her?”

“It was going to be a surprise,” Luke explained, taking Felicity’s hands. “Please, don’t be mad at me. I was going to tell you when we went to Rornian. I was going to show you the house frame and explain. I didn’t mean for it to be some big secret.”

Felicity glared at him, “I am mad, Luke, but not because you kept this secret.”

“Then what are you mad about?”

Reine awkwardly glanced between the pair, “Um… I’m going to go to the roof and call Obik about… not being here while you two fight.”

She couldn’t escape the apartment fast enough.

“Why are you mad at me, Felicity?” Luke calmly asked. “You know that I’ve been planning on building a house for years.”

Felicity sighed; this wouldn’t be one of their rare screaming matches, “I know and I was expecting that, but I’m mad that you started the house without even telling me. Without discussing it first.”

“I thought you would like the surprise.”

“In theory, yes, but Luke have you stopped to consider the position this puts me in? We live together. My job is here. How is this going to work? You living on Rornian and me on Coruscant?”

“Well… I was sort of expecting you to come live with me on Rornian.”
“I can’t come live with you on Rornian and work on Coruscant. You didn’t even ask me about this, you just assumed.”

“Felicity, I’m sorry.”

“So, what am I supposed to do? Stay here and just be your Coruscant girlfriend, like a piece of furniture to be left in this apartment?” Felicity echoed his words from years before, “Is that what you’re looking for in this relationship? A nice face and someone you can drop and pick up again as easily as a book?”

“I love you, Luke Skywalker. I have fallen desperately, hopelessly in love with you… but I’m not some… pull out couch to be used when the occasion arises.”

“You aren’t, just like how I’m not either. We never have been that, and never will be.”

Her own words sunk into her mind and Felicity burst out laughing, “I’m sorry, did you actually once call yourself a pull out couch, and I didn’t mock you for it?”

Luke smirked, placing a hand on her leg, “If I recall correctly, you were too horny to mock me.”

“I suppose,” Felicity chuckled. She smiled softly at him and ran a hand through his soft blonde hair, “I love you, Luke… but I can’t move to Rornian. It’s too much to ask me to uproot my entire life for a boyfriend.”

Luke tried to keep the grin off his face.

“Let’s not make any decisions just yet, ok?” Luke said. “How about you come see my house and we’ll talk about how we’re going to make this work?”

Felicity sighed, “Alright, fine. But only because you’re cute.”

“I’ll take it,” he chuckled and kissed her.

“Oh Luke,” she moaned as he slowly pushed her to lie on the couch.

“You know, Reine isn’t probably coming back down for a while,” Luke fiddled with her shirt buttons. “How about I make things up to you by relieving some boredom?”

Felicity laughed, “Bedroom, Skywalker, or with our luck the Droids will wander in.”

“Alright, but how about we shake things up and use the guest bedroom?”

“The one Reine’s staying in?”

“No, the one I keep set up for Han to hide from Leia in when she’s mad at him and crashes with me.”

Felicity pretended to think about it, “You know what? Yeah, I could bang you in Loud Mouth Solo’s bed.”

Luke scooped her up into his arms, “Then what are we waiting for?”

They kissed the entire way to the bedroom. When they arrived inside, Luke set Felicity down, and locked the door while she started to undress.
“Luke?” Felicity’s voice called as he turned back around, pulling his shirt over his head.

“I just wanted to be clear about one thing.” Felicity moaned as he pushed her onto the bed and started teasing her stiffening nipples with his tongue. “I’m willing to move to Rornian… just not when I’m your girlfriend.”

“Good,” Felicity smiled, her hands going to his belt buckle. “Now… let’s get these pants off, Master Skywalker.”

“With pleasure, Miss Rhiaon.”

And in that moment, Luke was truly glad that Felicity wasn’t Force Sensitive. Because if she was, she could see that all he could think about while they made love was the engagement ring hidden in his sock drawer.

3 Years, 7 Months, 8 Days

Luke took a deep breath. He righted his shoulders and smoothed down his hair. He was standing in one of the two bunk rooms on the Falcon – the one that usually served as his and Chewbacca’s. In his hand was the ring box that was about to change his life.

He could do this.

“Hey, Kid?” Han stuck his head into the room. He grinned as he saw the ring in Luke’s hand, “You ready?”

Luke smiled and tucked the ring box into his pocket, “Let’s do this.”

“Could Loud Mouth Solo really make no better excuse to get out of seeing your house other than, Leia, I can’t think of an excuse?” Felicity shook her head as she climbed up the hill to the site of Luke’s future home. “I mean, at least Ben ran off with Alyla, Chewie… honestly I didn’t understand, the Droids went to get oil baths, and Leia said she wanted to see the new Church of the Force building. But really Loud Mouth Solo?”

Luke chuckled, “Are you ever going to stop calling Han that?”

“Nope,” Felicity shook her head. “So can people stop making fun of my nickname for him? Even Phasma has said she wouldn’t be caught dead using the nickname for Han. Phasma, Luke. Phasma.”

“Yes, I get it, Captain Phasma would never call Han, Loud Mouth Solo,” Luke wrapped an arm around Felicity’s waist. “Now can we focus on what I have planned? I want to tell you about the house.”

“Fine,” Felicity leaned into his embrace. “You want to tell me why you decided to build it at the top of the hill? This climb is going to be so annoying on the days you’re exhausted… but hey, at least you’ll have a great looking butt.”

Luke chuckled and shook his head, “Sometimes I wonder if you’re only with me for my looks.”
“Of course not. It’s also because you can use the Force to get things from across the room without me having to stand up.”

“How is someone as athletic as you also so lazy?”

“Genetics. My father built a Death Star but couldn’t be bothered to plug a simple leak.”

“Then thank the Force for your family being so lazy.”

As they climbed up the hill, Luke explained to Felicity the symbolism of his home looking down upon Temple Village, and how it meant he would always protect them. He explained where the pathway would lead to the house, and of the ceremonial gate. He spoke of the trees and plants he wanted to line the path and the paving material to make the road.

At no point did Felicity notice that Luke was hiding his right hand behind his back.

He led her to the top of the hill where stakes were pegged into the ground, outlining the various rooms. Luke only wished the contractor hadn’t messed up the framework. He had planned on Felicity putting the pieces together at the sight of the house, but the stakes didn’t leave a very clear picture.

“Do you like the layout of the house?” Luke asked Felicity, trying with all his might to keep his cool.

Felicity looked around with raised eyebrows, “Well... it’s a house. Hard to tell much more at this stage.”

“I suppose so,” Luke fiddled with the disk in his left hand.

“Are those the blueprints?”

“Yes.”

“Can I see?”

“Not yet.” Luke clasped her hands in his, “First I wanted to talk.”

Felicity frowned, “Luke, your hands are shaking. What’s wrong?”

He took a deep breath, “I’ve been thinking a lot lately about us and where this relationship is headed.”

Felicity’s breath caught. His words were so simple, but the weight of them so great. There was of course only one conversation that began with those words after multiple years of dating, living together, and promising to get married some day.

Of course, what was life like without having a little fun?

“Felicity, you’re right. I can’t ask my girlfriend to move to Rornian with me. I’ve been thinking long and hard about this, and I’ve come to a conclusion. Felicity Rhiaon, I love you so much... and I think we should stop dating.”

Her jaw dropped.

“WHAT?” Felicity screeched. The look on her face was priceless, “What did you just say to me?”

Okay, he had to keep it together if this was going to end well. Stick to the script, Luke reminded himself.

“I love you, Felicity,” Luke continued, “I truly do, but as much as I love you, I can’t have you be my girlfriend. I can’t keep dating you, no matter how much I enjoy it. You understand, right?”

Felicity was breathing heavily. Her mind was a buzz of confusion, fear, and sorrow. He could sense the thought in her mind: that he was going to break his promise to never abandon her. She looked like she was going to hit him, burst into tears, or pass out. Honestly, she might do all three, so he had to talk fast before she decided between anger and sorrow.

“I know this is hard to accept, and I think it’s for the best,” Luke continued, ready any moment for her to lash out. She still hadn’t noticed he was hiding his right hand behind his back.

“I don’t- I don’t understand,” Felicity struggled to hold back her tears. “I thought… I thought you loved me. I thought I did things right.”

“You did,” Luke wiped a tear that started to roll down her cheek. He needed to turn this around right now. “That’s why this is happening. I love you, Felicity. You’re my perfect mate.”

“I…” Felicity took a step backwards. “I need to go.”

Wait, what? No, that wasn’t part of the plan. Violence and screaming he could deal with, and if things went wrong, he had several plans b, c, d, and so forth. He had everything from getting Han and Leia involved, to absolute worse come to worse using the Force to physically push the image of the ring into her mind. But Felicity running away from him was so unexpected, it wasn’t even in Plan Z.

“No,” Luke caught her arm before she could escape. He had to pull this back immediately, “Wait, I want to show you something first. The house plans.”

Felicity’s expression was absolutely heartbreaking, “Luke, no, I-”

Felicity must have been too overwhelmed by the sudden turn of events to disagree. Slowly, she nodded her head, probably hoping it bought her time to collect her thoughts.

When he flicked on the holo, her thoughts settled. She saw that the blueprints were that of her dream home… and she was pissed.

“This is where my design went?” Felicity hissed, her eyes flashing dangerously.

“I loved it so much, I knew I had to build it,” Luke smiled, but his grin was not returned.

“Luke Skywalker,” Felicity said in a deathly cool voice, “you have exactly five seconds to explain why I shouldn’t RIP YOUR THROAT OUT!”

“Felicity-”

“ONE!”

“Because the house-”

“TWO!”

“Because the house is your wedding present.”
Felicity froze, “…What?”

“It’s my wedding present to you,” Luke repeated. He flicked off the holo of the house and tucked the disk into his pocket. “I’m not breaking up with you, Felicity. Far from it. The reason I’m saying we should stop dating… is because I think we should get married. I can’t have you be my girlfriend, because I need you to be my wife.”

Felicity said nothing, frozen in shock. She was crying still, but they had changed to tears of joy.

“This isn’t happening,” Felicity whispered. “Tell me this isn’t happening.”

Then he did that most iconic of actions and went down on one knee. Felicity still don’t notice he was hiding his right hand.

“Felicity Rhiaon,” Luke’s voice was reverent as he delivered the speech he could never forget. “When I was a young man growing up on Tatooine, I was restless. Every day I woke up and knew that this was not the place I was meant to be, and this life was not the one I was meant to live. I watched the suns rise and set, days stretching on and on, yearning for something more than that. I would stare out at the horizon and know deep in my heart that there was something, somewhere out there waiting for me. A piece of me that had been displaced, and I needed to find it.”

“Luke,” Felicity had a very small smile. Yet the depth of happiness it conveyed twinned with those tears of joy made it probably the most beautiful smile Luke would ever see grace her lips.

“I made it off Tatooine, found friends, saved the day, became a Jedi, and even got a sister out of the deal… But still, part of me yearned. I had the greatest sister, and a brother who is by law in title, but of my heart in practice. I built a Jedi Order from the ground up, and I served in the military, earning titles, accomplishments, and respect. I am the center of bedtime stories, history books, and someday even myths. I have fame, fortune, family, everything one aspires for… and yet, I still watched the horizon, waiting to find that piece of me that never seemed to appear. After a while, I thought to myself that maybe there wasn’t anything more, that I had gotten everything I needed.”

Luke took a deep breath, trying to collect himself as his voice shook harder and harder. The amount of happiness and love and Light he felt in that moment was unmeasurable. He was certain that down the hill, the Jedi of Temple Village were feeling a disturbance in the Force. Heck, with the amount of Light Side filling him, Luke honestly wouldn’t have been surprised if he started to literally glow.

“And then you just waltzed right into my life,” Luke laughed, sniffing as the tears started to fall, “like it was nothing at all. Like you owned the place. You just settled right down smack dab into the middle of my life and told me to deal with it. You know, that’s one of the things I love about you so much. You may inwardly be a little self-conscious and unsure, but when you decide to do something, you put your all into it. You step forward with your strength and your heart, and you do not falter. I can be vulnerable around you, Felicity, and you’ll be my rock. You balance me, you support you, and yet you’ll call me out for the idiot with delusions of grandeur I am.”

“You’re not an idiot,” Felicity gave a small laugh. “You’re the kindest, bravest, most loving man I have ever met.”

“And you… how could I possibly name your attributes? Books upon books could be filled with your amazing qualities, but there are not enough pages in the galaxy to list them all. Courageous, intelligent, passionate, loving, and of course beautiful. Not just of body but mind and soul and heart. That said, don’t you dare think for a moment that you are not the most gorgeous woman I have ever laid eyes on.”

“And hands,” Felicity smirked.

There was a pause for a few seconds, the two just allowing the memory of this moment to lock permanently in their minds. This turning point that would change their lives forever. This goal they had worked so long for. No fight mattered anymore, no conflict of belief. When it all came down to it, all that mattered how perfectly those two hearts fit together.

“I know you don’t believe in destiny,” Luke finally continued, looking up at the beautiful visage of Felicity Rhiaon’s face… One that he would only get for a far too brief period in his life. “But I believe in this. Felicity Rhiaon, we were meant to be together. You are my soul’s mate, who else could ever match me in the ways you do? Who else could balance me? Who else could possibly be as messed up in the same bizarre fashion as me?”

She laughed.

He sighed, “I’m never going to find another person as perfect as you.”

Felicity closed her eyes, “I’m not perfect, Luke.”

“You are to me,” Luke whispered.

Her eyes reopened and enflamed blue orbs locked upon her joyous hazel gaze.

“You are the reason for the stars in the sky, for the suns to rise and set, and for flowers to bloom,” Luke’s words were barely audible. “You are perfect to me, flaws and all. I’ll never find another person as perfect as you, and frankly, I don’t want to look. My brain may not have known it, but my heart did. It looked at you and said, ‘done. There she is, the thing we’ve always been waiting for.’ The piece of me that had been missing had been found, and next thing I knew, you had stolen my heart. These past three years with you have been the greatest of my life, and I pray that they’ve been as wonderful for you.”

Felicity nodded, “They have.”

Luke took her left hand, “Felicity Rhiaon, I love you more than I thought it was physically possible to love another person. I want to spend my life you, from this day, and every day, until the day I die, and even beyond that. I offer you this ring as a symbol of my love for you and my vow to you.”

In his hand, she intertwined her fingers with his own. This wasn’t just an offer of marriage, but a vow for forever partnership.

“Felicity Rhiaon, I vow to spend the rest of my life making you feel as happy as you make me. I do not vow to try, for there is no try, there is only to do or do not, and I choose to do. If I can even make you feel a tenth of the love I have for you, I know that not you will never go wanting, for my love is unending. I want to spend the rest of my life with you. I want to marry you, have children with you, and spend our days growing older and only ever more in love.”

“Felicity Rhiaon… will you let me marry you?”

“Yes.”
He was on his feet, in her arms in an instant.

“Yes, yes, yes Luke, yes,” Felicity repeated as he kissed her passionately over and over.

Their tears and laughter mingled as they held each other, laughed, kissed, and cried. Still, Luke kept his right hand behind his back.

Felicity laughed, “Anytime.”

Luke pulled her in for one more passionate kiss.

Suddenly, mid-way through the kiss Felicity pulled back and smacked Luke on the chest in a very unplayful manner.

“You asshole!” Felicity scolded. “I think we should stop dating. I can’t have you be my girlfriend. You made me think you were breaking up with me, and you had stolen my house design!”

Luke burst out laughing, “I am so sorry, but you should have seen the look on your face.”

“You are such a telano!”

“Have I ever told you that I love when you use Huttese… even if you only use the swear words.”

“Luke,” Felicity smacked his chest again, but this time it was a playful hit. “Seriously, why would you propose like that?”

“Well, I thought long and hard about how to do this, and I felt that when one proposes to their partner, they should do it in a way that says something about their partner,” Luke explained. “Bring in that personal element that is so uniquely that person. If they love flowers, do it in a garden. If they’re family centered, have their family be an audience… Or maybe if you’re that person’s former slave master, do what Zena did when she proposed to Gavyn and… give him a broken shackle… I suppose.”

“When you sit down and think about it, Gavyn and Zena are a very weird couple.”

“Agreed.”

“I still don’t understand your proposal,” Felicity said. “Why do I merit cruel and unusual punishment?”

Luke grinned, “Because when you think of Felicity Rhiaon, there’s one very specific thing you think of. So, I knew the only way I could truly propose to you was bringing you to the site of our future home, the house you designed… and completely messing with you.”

“Luke!” Felicity scolded, playfully hitting him again. “You thought the perfectly unique way to propose to me was by messing with me?”

“I...” Felicity paused. “Yeah, actually, you know that does check out.”

“It was either that or bring you to Yavin IV,” Luke shrugged. “I did also find a way to incorporate Brendan into this, though.”
“Oh? How so?”

Luke brought forward his right arm to reveal that he had actually been wearing Brendan’s stormtrooper glove instead of his own black glove.

“Please don’t think this is weird,” he quickly said as Felicity stared at him in shock. “I just figured the three main things about you were Brendan, architecture, and messing with people. This was the best I could come up with that didn’t involve also stealing your brother’s urn.”

“Luke, I…” Felicity didn’t seem like she knew what to say. It was a little bit of an odd gesture, but the intent behind it was the main thing to focus on. Gently she smiled and grasped Luke’s glove-clad hand, “Thank you.”

“You’re not weirded out by it, then?”

“Oh, I am a little, but when you sit down and think about it, you and I are a very weird couple.”

“Agreed,” Luke chuckled, pulling out the ring box. “So, do you want to try on the ring?”

“Sounds fun,” Felicity laughed. When she saw it, her eyes nearly popped out of her head, “Holy crap, Skywalker! How much do you pay for that ring?”

“Let’s just say my insurance has gone up significantly,” Luke reddened slightly. “Sorry, Felicity, but I still want to keep the grand total of my finances private – even from you – until absolutely necessary… You’ll understand when you hear the amount.”

She shrugged, “As long as you understand I’m keeping my job. I don’t care to be a kept woman.”

“Wouldn’t dream of it.”

Felicity frowned as she inspected the engagement ring closely, “Luke… did you engrave ‘Thank you. Anytime’ on this?”

“…Maybe. Are you mad?”

Felicity shook her head, “No, but you’re getting it engraved in your wedding ring.”

“We’re getting married,” Felicity beamed.

“You’re going to be Mrs. Felicity… Did you want to take Skywalker?”

“Luke, we got engaged three minutes ago. Let’s talk about it later.” Felicity slid on the ring, “It fits perfectly. How did you know my ring size?”

“I may have… measured you in your sleep.”

Felicity raised an eyebrow.

“Isn’t it pretty?” Luke quickly said.

She shook her head, “This is the man I chose to spend my life with.”

“No takebacks.”
Felicity laughed, “So, who do we tell first? It’s nice and convenient that your family and most of our friends are already here… You totally planned that, didn’t you?”

“Why else would I bring everyone here to look at wooden stakes planted in the ground?”

“That explains Han’s pathetic exit. I’m surprised the Loud Mouth could keep quiet about you planning on proposing to me.”

“Honestly, I’m more surprised that you didn’t catch any of the hints he’s been dropping for the past two months. I was certain he was going to ruin this somehow. Thank goodness I had Leia to enforce the ‘please do not interrupt this moment’ rule I told them. Shall we go down and tell them?”

Felicity smiled, “Not yet. I want a few more minutes with you, just basking in this moment… this beautiful moment I’ll never forget.”

“Promise?”

“Promise.”

Luke took her in his arms once more to hold her and kiss her and celebrate their newly made promise. And in that moment, it seemed like nothing could ruin their happiness.

…Except for Ben Solo.

3 Years, 7 Months, 9 Days

“Please, Uncle Luke, don’t marry Felicity!” Ben begged.

Luke stared at his from the other side of his desk, “I don’t believe what I’m hearing. Ben, do you understand what you’re saying?”

“I understand fully. Please, you can’t marry her, Uncle Luke. She just ruins everything!”

“Ben, stop,” Luke said firmly. “This feud between you and Felicity has gone too far. Bickering is one thing, but asking me to break off our engagement is crossing the line, and I will not stand for it.”

“But you can’t marry her, and not just because I don’t like her!”

“Oh? Then why can’t I?”

“Because she’s not… pure.”

Luke raised an eyebrow, “That’s very dangerous vocabulary, Ben. What exactly is ‘unpure’ about her?”

“She doesn’t have the Force!” Ben exclaimed.

“Neither does your father.”

“But he believes in the Force! She doesn’t!”

“She doesn’t believe in destiny, Ben. Not the Force. Trust me, she knows all about the Force existing. You can’t live with a Jedi for two years and not know.”

“But she needs to believe in all of it!” Ben objected. “If you marry her, then you’ll have kids with her, and you shouldn’t wasting your genetics on someone like her! You’re the son of Darth Vader! You have a responsibility for the producing an acceptable heir… If I’m being replaced, it better be with someone worthy.”

Luke scowled, “Alright, first off, you are not being replaced in any capacity. You will still be trained as a Jedi, and you will remain my nephew.”

“But who’s going to take over the Order when you pass?” Ben shot.

“As it currently states, that would be Reine Agim. Now that might change when your generation grows up, but you have never been promised leadership of the Order, Ben. If you are the strongest and best person for the job when I pass on, the Order could very well pass to you. Then again it might go to Reine, or Obik, or Miri, or Genko, or this non-existent child of mine you’re getting worked up over.”

“But-”

“Uncle Luke-”

“Third, you are getting into extremely dangerous territory with this purity nonsense. Let me remind you that for most of history, Jedi did not have Force Sensitive parents. Your own power is not negated based on who your parents are, and if they are, our family has a very power case. I’m only half Jedi. My mother wasn’t Force Sensitive. Your father isn’t. Felicity isn’t.”

“Felicity isn’t my family!” Ben snapped.

“But she will be,” Luke shot, “because none of this matters. This wedding is happening, Ben. I’m marrying Felicity. She will be your Aunt. End of story.”

“I’m never calling her my Aunt,” Ben’s eyes were dark.

Luke took a deep breath, “That’s your decision, but Ben-”

A knock came from the open door.

“Am I interrupting?” Alyla asked.

Luke looked over at Ben and saw that he had relaxed a little bit, “No, of course, come in.”

“I was just wondering if Ben was free to practice blocking remote bolts,” Alyla stepped into the room. “He’s getting really good and I want to keep him going. I think we might be able to do two remotes soon.”

Luke looked at Alyla and curiously tapped her mind in the Force. Sure enough, his suspicion was correct: Alyla had sensed Ben’s distress and came to calm him down.

“I think we’re done here.” Luke looked to Ben, “You want to go practice with Alyla?”

“Sure,” Ben hopped out of his chair. He mumbled, “I need to blow off some steam.”

As Alyla wrapped an arm around Ben’s shoulders, she looked at Luke and mouthed, “Fliss?”

“Come on, Killer,” Alyla led Ben to the door. “Hey, did I ever tell you about how mad I got at Gavyn when he started dating Zena?”

Luke smiled as the pair exited the room, talking easily with each other. Alyla always could defuse Ben, now if only Luke could figure out her secret.

Felicity wasn’t pure. Where in the Galaxy had Ben heard that nonsense? Luke would need to have a very serious talk with the members of the Order about this whole blood purity thing.

Luke was free to marry whomever he wanted, and he wanted to marry Felicity. End of story.

But unfortunately, that was not the end of the story.

As Luke looked back on his time with Felicity that night on Jakku, he chose not to remember what had happened next.

How Tyla Kinall had confronted Felicity with the same diatribe to the point that Felicity was in tears. How she had fled to Luke’s arms in tears for love and reassurance that she was worthy of him. How Reine discovered that Cade Ren was responsible for the whole purity nonsense going around. How Luke called the entire Order to the Meditation Gardens for a very explosive meeting where the group’s conflicts finally came to a head. A meeting that ended with Cade Ren abandoning the Jedi Order, taking Bakura, Zhane, and Jake with him to later become the Knights of Ren named Baku, Zhan, and Jaek respectively. How Luke’s decision to marry Felicity would be the catalyst for the Burning of Rornian.

But worry not, we will revisit that story.

3 Years, 10 Months, 17 Days

“We’re back!” Luke called as he and Han entered the living room.

Leia and Felicity looked up from the couch where dozens of wedding materials were spread across the coffee tables.

“How did the fitting go?” Leia asked. “The suits look fine?”

“They look great,” Han answered. “Luke, thanks again for not picking formal Jedi attire for the wedding party. I don’t think I can exactly pull off robes.”

“Alright, new life goal, get Loud Mouth Solo in a robe at some point,” Felicity smirked as she read through a catalogue. “Luke, can you look at the cake design mock ups? I’m thinking either design 4 or 17.”

Luke frowned as he approached the couch and noticed the myriad of cake drawings, “How many of these do we have?”

“Uh, last time I checked, I think it was 37,” Felicity absentmindedly scrolled through the pages on her tablet screen.

“Wow, I really didn’t picture you as the kind of girl who couldn’t settle on a cake,” Han took a seat on the couch next to Leia. He picked up a few of the sheets to inspect them himself, “Then again, I guess it is a whole design thing and you have a liking for that stuff with your architecture degree.”

“Actually, a bunch of bakeries have sent their designs unsolicited,” Felicity informed Han.
“Apparently, it’s a pretty high honour to bake a cake for Luke Skywalker’s wedding. Not that we’re really going to advertise who did it. How they got our address is beyond me, though.”

“Speaking of your degree,” Leia said, “have you got a set date for your graduation? I want to book it off so we can be there with you.”

“Oh, thank you, Leia,” Felicity was flattered. “You really don’t have to.”

“Of course, I do,” Leia smiled, placing a hand on Felicity’s leg. “We’ve been friends for so long, sisters practically. I know your actual family isn’t here anymore, and I know we did drift apart for several years, but you are my sister, and I will be there for you.”

“You’re my sister too,” Felicity smiled and hugged Leia. “I’m just so happy you ended up having an incredibly sexy twin brother to make us legally so.”

“Ugh!” Leia shuddered and pushed Felicity away. “Come on, Felicity, we’ve talked about you calling Luke sexy in front of me. It creeps me out.”

“I know. That’s why I do it,” Felicity smirked. “Besides you thought he was hot first.”

“So anyways!” Luke loudly interrupted, not wanting to go over the topic of incest yet again. “Felicity have you heard back from your family yet?”

“You invited your family?” Leia was surprised.

“The Andromias side,” Felicity admitted. “They’re not that bad, but we’re having a firm discussion of rules they must follow if they are to attend this wedding.”

“And Zena’s going to make sure they stay in line,” Luke added.

“What about your dad’s brother?” Han asked. “I’m sure your uncle must be absolutely thrilled that you’re marrying your father’s killer. God, that guy was an ass. I’m still trying to scrub that awkward dinner the four of us had with him out of my mind.”

“Oh, Garvan Rhiaon can go to hell,” Felicity said simply. “I would much rather have Darth Vader – and I mean actual Vader, not redeemed Anakin – at my wedding, than my uncle. Hell, I’d gladly accept Palpatine over Garvan.”

“Felicity?” Luke frowned, picking up a pamphlet, “What’s this? ‘What You Need to Know About Name Changes.’”

“Just an information brochure on the process of name change after marriage,” Felicity flipped through a flower catalogue. “Do you think we should try to find some Tatooine flowers for my bouquet?”

“I didn’t know you were changing your name,” Han said. “I thought you would take Leia’s route and keep your surname.”

“For the last time, Han,” Leia sighed, “it was because I had established a professional life behind the name Organa, and I was still really clinging onto the whole Bail Organa is my father, not Anakin Skywalker notion.”

“Still, I think Leia Organa Solo would have been just fine,” Han shrugged.

“Excuse me, but I let you name our son, Ben Solo. Not Ben Organa Solo.”
“Hey, where is Ben?” Luke frowned, awkwardly noticing the absence of his nephew for the first time.

“Sent him off with the Droids to do errands,” Leia shook her head. “Told them to bring him back when he can treat Felicity with respect.”

“So, he’s never coming back,” Felicity smirked.

Han groaned, “What did he do now?”

“Keep trying to find a legal loophole that would bar me from marrying Luke,” Felicity rolled her eyes. “I swear that kid’s getting more antagonistic to me everyday. If he keeps this up, I’m literally going to take the name Skywalker simply to spite him.”

“Your dad blew up a trade blockade when he was nine,” Felicity pointed out. “I’m not underestimating the power of a Skywalker. Can’t wait to see the look on his face when he’s told he has to start calling me Aunt Felicity now.”

“You know, he’s never going to give in,” Leia shook her head.

“So, you have settled on Skywalker, Fliss?” Han asked. He tried out the name, “Felicity Skywalker… Very sibilant.”

“I haven’t fully settled on it yet,” Felicity answered. “And honestly, I don’t think I’m going to call myself Skywalker.”

“The cons outweigh the pros,” Felicity sighed. “Luke, I really do want to share your name, but let’s look at the facts. In addition to an excessive S noise in City being followed by Sky… There’s a few issues I have with taking your name.”

“Like what?”

“Well, there’s the fact that everyone already simply looks at me as Luke Skywalker’s girlfriend. So, in addition to being known as Luke Skywalker’s wife, I’m going to be reduced to simply Mrs. Skywalker… which kind of sounds like what people should call Padmé Amidala… and given the fact I do look a tad bit like her, that just raises a bunch of questions about you that I don’t really want to answer.”

“I see.”

“Not to mention it’s going to get really expensive to have to keep using a lawyer to fight off all my assault charges, when I keep punching everyone in the throat who calls me Mrs. Skywalker.”

“Fair enough,” Luke nodded, not really wanting to get into Felicity’s violent tendencies. As long as he wasn’t on the receiving end of those punches, it was none of his business. Felicity was a grown-up woman who could make her own decisions… even if sometimes they ended in her getting charged with war crimes.

“And of course, there’s the Bantha in the room,” Felicity said through gritted teeth.

Luke raised an eyebrow.
“I’m not taking Darth Vader’s surname,” Felicity said simply. “I don’t care if I associate the name Skywalker with the man I love, Skywalker Senior sliced a freaking lightsaber down my back.”

“Well…” Felicity hesitated, “I’m not willing to take Skywalker outright, but I am open to adding it to my name.”

“Or you could combine them,” Han suggested. “Rhiwalker sounds pretty nice.”

“Noted,” Felicity nodded at Han. “The truth is… I don’t know if I want to be Rhiaon outright. Yes, it’s my name and has been for thirty-four years, but it’s also the name of the man who designed the Death Star, and the name of a man who was murdered in a senseless act of violence. People hear the name Rhiaon and they think of pain and misery.”

“In all fairness, Fliss,” Han smirked, “you do cause plenty of pain and misery yourself. OW!”

“Shut it, Loud Mouth Solo,” Felicity warned. “Besides, there’s another reason I don’t want to be simply Rhiaon.”

Her eyes awkwardly flicked over to Leia, and then she turned her head to look at Luke.

“We want kids, right?” Felicity asked.

Luke blinked in shock, “Of course. We’ve always talked about that.”

“Well…” Felicity sighed, “when we do have kids, what are we going to call them? If I’m Rhiaon and you’re Skywalker… it’s probably going to be Skywalker. And no offense to you Leia, but I do want to share a surname with my child.”

“That’s fair,” Leia nodded.

“We could call our children Rhiaon,” Luke offered.

Felicity laughed, “That’s sweet, Luke, but let’s be realistic. The mythical Luke Skywalker is going to call his kids Skywalker. Even if we don’t do it legally, everyone else will. That’s not a battle I’m going to fight. At least if we do the combination name, then I’ll share part of their name.”

“No,” Luke shook his head. “If you don’t want to call our children Rhiaon, that’s fine. But if you’re going to take the name Rhiaon Skywalker or Skywalker Rhiaon, our child will share the same name.”

“And then there’s the problem that bothers me most.” Felicity grabbed Luke’s hand, “Luke, I want our family to have a common name.”

Luke sighed, “Felicity, it doesn’t matter if we all share the same name.”

“Yes, it does! Luke, look at your family. Your father was Skywalker, sure, and maybe that’s why you always wanted to have a connection to him, because look at the rest of your family. Your mother was both Naberrie and Amidala, your nephew is Solo, your Uncle was Lars, your Aunt was Whitesun Lars, your other Aunt and her family are Naberrie, even your own twin sister is Organa, and now we’re going to add Rhiaon into the mix? No, Luke. No. One thing that I’ve always liked about my family is that we have a common name, a thread that ties us together, and connects us. That way anytime someone says Rhiaon, I can say, yes, that’s my father, that’s my brother, that’s my mother.”

Han frowned, “Don’t people call your mother, Andromia? Ow! Quit it, Fliss!”

“I want that for us, Luke,” Felicity continued as if she hadn’t just smacked Han. “I want to feel like a family in every way. Name and all.”

Felicity sighed and looked down at the pamphlet. Luke could feel her pain in the Force as she made a decision.

“I guess I have no choice then,” Felicity muttered, defeat written across her face. “I don’t want it to be two Skywalkers and a Rhiaon Skywalker. I want that harmony. So, if it means having that connection in our family… I’ll take the name Skywalker, and leave Rhiaon behind.”

Luke wanted to be happy in that moment, but he couldn’t when he saw the heartbroken expression on Felicity’s face. He could feel her pain in the Force, how she felt like she was abandoning not only her family, not only Brendan in particular, but she was abandoning a part of herself. Yes, not many knew the name Felicity Rhiaon, but that was who she was, who she would always be. How could he take that away from her?

He gently took Felicity’s hand, and glanced down at the pamphlet.

And then the idea hit him.

“No,” Luke murmured. “No, I won’t let this happen. You don’t want to be Felicity Skywalker, and I’m not going to make you.”

“No, it isn’t, not if it’s going to affect our children.”

“I need that commonality, Luke.”

“And we’ll have it. With Rhiaon Skywalker, or Skywalker Rhiaon, or even Rhiwalker. Whatever you want.”

“And it will,” Luke said. “Because I’m going to change my name too.”

The room was silent.

“I’m sorry what?” Felicity stared at him as if he had just suggested water wasn’t wet.

“I’m going to change my name to Rhiaon Skywalker or Skywalker Rhiaon or Rhiwalker,” Luke repeated. “Whichever one you want.”

Han looked at Leia, “Can he do that?”

Leia just stared at her husband, “Han… both my father and Aunt Sola’s husband took their wives’ surnames. Yes, Luke can do that.”

“Oh right,” Han said. “I forgot that Bail was originally Prestor.”
“You’re going to give up the name Luke Skywalker?” Felicity said slowly, clearly not believing him.

“Yes,” Luke nodded. “At least legally. Think about it, if we both change our names we have a common legal name, and yet both keep our original surnames for our professional lives. It doesn’t matter what name the tabloids call me, or what’s the name on the plaque on our desks. All that matters is which name we sign our marriage certificate with… and what name we put on our child’s birth certificate. You want to be Rhiaon? You want to be Skywalker? You could be both… and so can I.”

Felicity smiled in absolute disbelief, “You would really do that? You would take the name of the man who designed the Death Star? Whom you killed.”

“And you would take the name of a man whom you once shot in the chest.” Luke clasped her hands, “We’re making a family, Felicity. A new one with a blank slate where all that matters is how much we love each other. Forget Alaric. Forget Anakin. Forget everything.”

“You know I never really noticed how similar our fathers’ names are when you put them next to each other.”

“Focus, Felicity.”

“Sorry.”

Luke smiled, “Felicity Rhiaon, I want to take your name and give you mine. And whatever form you wish, that will be what we choose.”

Felicity reached up and stroked his cheek, “Luke Skywalker, I would be honoured to give you my name and take yours.”

“And how should we present those names?”

“How about… Rhiaon Skywalker?”

“Felicity Rhiaon Skywalker,” Luke tasted the name on his lips for the first time. “I like the sound of that.”

“Luke Rhiaon Skywalker,” Felicity tried out his new name. “The media is going to have a field day with this one.”

Leia smiled as she watched her childhood best friend and her brother. She felt Han’s arm wrap around her shoulders and she laid back onto his chest.

“I never even thought men could take the woman’s name,” Han murmured to Leia, not wanting to ruin the other couple’s moment. “But I think that’s the perfect thing for those two.”

“Maybe that’s what we should have done,” Leia said. “Leia Organa Solo doesn’t sound that bad. I’m sure Organa Solo would fit you too just fine.”

“Han Organa Solo,” Han tried out the name. “…Kind of sounds like a health food store.”

Leia shook her head, grinning, “Forget it, Nerfherder.”

3 Years, 11 Months, 5 Days
Luke hadn’t even been in the apartment for five minutes when Felicity had shoved him down on the couch and started kissing him.

“I’ve got to go on month long trips more often if this is what I come home to,” Luke chuckled as Felicity pulled off his shirt and threw it across the room.

“I’m just glad you were able to get home for our anniversary,” Felicity managed between kisses as she sucked on his neck and unbuttoned his belt.

“Three years already. I can’t believe it,” Luke pulled her silky tank top over her head and dropped it to the floor. He ran his hands up her smooth sides when he noticed the bandage on her arm. “What happened here? Did you get hurt?”

“No,” Felicity grinned. “It’s a little surprise for you, for our anniversary.”

Luke scowled, “Felicity, you really don’t have to maim yourself as a present for me. In fact, I’d prefer you don’t.”

Felicity chuckled, “Luke, doesn’t the location look familiar?”

It took him a minute to get it, “Felicity… you didn’t cut off your tattoo?”

She shook her head and sat up. Luke moved to follow, but Felicity pinned his wrists to the couch. Smiling like a minx, Felicity leaned forward, pressing her body against him in all the right ways. It was dangerous how much control her body held over him, and even worse was that she knew exactly how much power she had. Yes, he loved her for her mind, soul, and heart… but good God if her body and the ways she used it wasn’t as equally as important a factor.

“Stay down,” Felicity whispered in his ear. When she was satisfied that he wasn’t going to move, she began to unwrap her tattoo. “You remember the story of how I got my starbird tattoo, right?”

“It was forced on you by Imperials to identify you as a Rebel when you were arrested?”

“Exactly. Since then I’ve worn it as a symbol of my pride and history of fighting in the Rebellion. But lately… it’s taken on a new meaning. Now whenever I see the starbird, I think of the people I fought the war for. I think of Rogue Squadron, I think of Han and Leia… I think of you. I think of the happiness you brought me, a happiness beyond that I ever knew possible, and a love of an infinite magnitude. Who is Felicity Rhiaon the Rebel Recruiter? She is a woman who brought hope to millions, helped people join the Rebellion, stole the plans to the Death Star, somehow managed to get Diego Nalto to pull the stick out of his ass, and got Luke Skywalker’s scrawny butt both off Tatooine and into my bed, but managed to do all those things in my own unique way.”

“That’s funny,” Luke chuckled. “You weren’t calling any part of me scrawny when we commed two nights ago.”

Felicity smiled, and stopped unraveling the bandage. Just one more tug and her tattoo would be exposed.

Of course, it was hard for Luke to focus on her tattoo when the warmth between her thighs had decided to rest on his sprouting erection. Thirty days was far too long to be without making love to Felicity Rhiaon.

“Who is Felicity Rhiaon the Rebel Recruiter?” Felicity repeated. “She’s two simple words: Rogue One.”
Felicity pulled off the bandage to reveal her crude starbird tattoo had been altered into the symbol of Luke’s Rogue Squadron.

“And it’s time I take my rightful place as the originating member of Rogue Squadron,” Felicity smirked. “Any objections to that, Commander Skywalker?”

“None,” Luke sat up and examined the tattoo. “How long ago did you do this?”

“About a week after you and Reine left for Dagobah,” Felicity answered. “Why you thought it was a good idea to camp out in a swamp for a month is beyond me, but hey, at least Obik was around sometimes to hang out with. And I do have Dex in the mornings. So, what do you think of the tattoo?”

“Oh, the bandage was only so I could do a big reveal.”

“You are so over dramatic sometimes.”

“And that’s why you love me, because frankly I’m nothing compared to you.”

Luke shook his head and looked at the tattoo closer. The Rogue Squadron symbol was a starbird with twelve X-wings ringing it, each ejecting a line of fire from their engine. To Luke’s surprise he noticed tiny letters – two or three at most – on each ship.

“What are these?” Luke trailed his thumb across the tattoo, playing absentmindedly with her bra strap.

“The initials of the twelve people who were most important to me in my role as Rogue One.” Felicity pointed to the top ship in the crest, “LS – Luke Skywalker.”

“I’m your first ship?”

“Well, this is more than just a tattoo about me being Rogue One, it’s also to honour this relationship. Our love. I mean, we’re getting married. I thought if we’re going to mark our commitment in ink, I might as well mark it on my skin.”

Luke played with a strand of her hair, “I thought you hated being known as simply the woman Luke Skywalker loves.”

“Yes, I hate it when others reduce me to that… but I’m than happy to declare our love myself.”

Luke leaned in and pressed a tender kiss to her lips.

Felicity sighed in happiness but forced herself to pull back, “Let’s put a pin in that for a second. I still have to tell you about the other initials.”

“Well, then,” Luke pulled Felicity into his lap and she automatically wrapped her arms around his neck. He nuzzled the bare skin of her shoulders and back, “Do tell.”

“I’m not surprised at that group.”

“BO – Bail Organa. SB – Shara Bey.”
“Shara, really?”

“She’s the one who picked Diego and I up from Jakku,” Felicity reminded. She pointed to the next ship, “BD – Biggs Darklighter. He was the one who got me my job as a recruiter which led to my father finding me and making me that promise that got us into the Death Star. Not to mention he was going to help me track down the droids on Tatooine if I had stolen that ship, and he gave his life in the Battle of Yavin.”

“Sounds like he earned his spot,” Luke gave her a quick squeeze of a hug. He never had really gotten comfortable with the whole idea that his soulmate had lost her virginity to his childhood best friend and first crush. Luke was very thankful that it hadn’t been a factor into the tattoo. “Now, I know what these last four are going to be.”

“Take a guess,” Felicity offered.

“HS – Han Solo,” Luke proclaimed. “LO – Leia Organa. BR – Brendan Rhiaon, of course. I would be genuinely shocked if he wasn’t factored into this somehow.”

Felicity playfully smacked his chest.

“Ooh, that’s a good mark.” Luke’s voice dropped to a throaty, more seductive tone. “Do I get a prize?”

“How about this?” Felicity unclasped her bra and threw it over the back of the couch. His hands were on her, playing with her breasts and thumbing her nipples before the bra had even hit the ground. Felicity arched her head back, basking in the pleasure for a few minutes, before finally asking, “Luke, Sweetheart, it’s been a month since we shared a bed, and today is our three-year anniversary. Can we please have sex now?”

“Of course, we can,” Luke laughed and scooped her up into his arms.

“Thank you,” Felicity pecked his cheek with a kiss.

Felicity laughed and ducked her head to avoid the door frame as Luke carried her bridal style into the bedroom.

“So, what would you like for our reunion/anniversary sex?” Luke hit the button to close and lock the door behind them in case any droids decided to interrupt. “Passionate, slow, tender lovemaking or take me now, I haven’t been fucked in a month sex?”

“Your wish is my command,” Luke threw her onto the bed with very little ceremony.

As Felicity landed on her hands and knees, Luke stripped off what little clothing he had on left. He crawled onto the bed behind her, and yanked off her pants and underwear in a single movement, throwing them carelessly over the edge of the bed. She tried to shift onto her back to take him missionary, but Luke pushed her down back to her hands and knees.
“I think taking you from behind will work just fine,” Luke chuckled darkly at the moan she emitted as his fingers expertly stroked the delicate folds of her sex. “You’re already so wet… So ready for me. You’ve been waiting for this, haven’t you?”

“I’ve been ready for a month.” Felicity pressed her face into the mattress as his fingers slid inside her, “Oh, yes! Yes! Luke! Oh, there’s just some things you can’t replicate via hologram communications and a view screen.”

“Is that so?” Luke used his free hand to rub her clit. She was practically dripping on the sheets. “Not even when I use the Force?”

Felicity moaned as she felt the familiar sensation of invisible hands caressing her body as Luke’s physical hands continued their assault on her sex. She writhed on the bed, clambering towards the precipice of her orgasm.

“I seriously can’t believe it took you so long to figure out you could do this,” Felicity gasped as the invisible hands teased her stiff nipples. “And over view screens too. I mean seriously, why did it take so long for you to make the connection that if Vader could choke people over a view screen, you could do a few other things over one?”

“Please don’t talk about my father during sex,” Luke whispered, picking up the pace on rubbing her clit fiercely. His fingers pistoned in and out of her frantically, curling up to stimulate the coarse area of her g-spot. “Come on, Felicity. I can sense you’re close. Let go, Sweetheart. Let go.”

“Oh, Luke!” Felicity squirmed against his fingers. Her legs tried to clamp shut, but whether it was to trap the pleasure between her legs or fend it off, Luke held steady. His fingers were slick with her juices as he pumped in and out of her, and his other hand pressed ever harder down on her clit with every stroke. He could sense her edging ever closer to her precipice, until, “LUKE!”

Luke grinned as he felt the familiar clenching of her quim around his fingers, and she lost control of her senses. He could tell how strong the orgasm was since she was doing the thing where his name was on her lips, yet she was so overcome with pleasure no sound came from her voice. It always turned him on so much when she did that. At the sight of Felicity surrendering completely to the pleasure he gave her, Luke lost concentration, and therefore control, of the Force playing with her breasts. But that was alright as he continued to pump his fingers and rub her clit through her orgasm.

Felicity fell to the mattress when the last aftershock of her orgasm subsided. She panted hard and let out a little moan as he withdrew his fingers from her smouldering sex.

“Just as I remember.” Luke grinned as he saw how slick she had made his fingers, “Now let’s see if this is the same.”

His tongue delved into her folds, and Felicity gasped, throwing her head back as pleasure was renewed on her still sensitive quim. She mewled as he explored the familiar landscape of her lower lips and throbbing clit, but he knew that wasn’t what Felicity craved. He knew the sure-fire way to claim control over Felicity’s body in an instant.

Ever so slowly, Luke slid his tongue into her heated passage and with the frantic begging moans she uttered as he slid into her deeper and deeper, he knew she had surrendered to his ministrations. She clenched the bedsheet tightly in her fists as Luke slowly withdrew his tongue from her passage.

“Oh, fuck, don’t tease me, Luke,” Felicity begged as her hips wriggled when his tongue moved too slowly back into her.
“I’m not teasing you,” Luke removed his tongue from her tender sex, causing Felicity to whine pathetically. His natural hand thumbed her clit and dipped briefly into her entrance as he spoke, “I’m doing exactly what you want, and tasting this delectable pussy.”

Felicity moaned as he shoved his tongue back into her, this time a little harder and faster.

“Isn’t that what you want?” Luke asked when he withdrew.

“Harder,” Felicity ordered as he entered her again, this time with a steadier pace, but still teasing her with not giving her quite what she wanted. She panted in time with his thrusts and begged Luke, “ Faster, please. Harder, faster, deeper. That’s what I want.”

“No,” Luke chuckled. “This is what you want.”

She screamed as he thrust his tongue inside her hard, and curled it, stroking the walls of her dripping quim, shooting intense pleasurable sensations through her body. Each new angle brought a different pleasure to her body, all of which he could sense in the Force. He tried shifting his head down to get in the absolute best angle: the one achieved in a 69 when she would lose complete control over herself and ride his face to ultimate pleasure.

Luke briefly considered moving them into that position – it would be wonderful to feel her lips around his cock and her soft hands playing with his balls – but he knew if he let himself into the tight, wet cavern of her mouth, Felicity would milk him dry. And Luke was much more interested in his first climax home taking place in a different tight, wet cavern. But he was absolutely going to get her on her knees, servicing him when he could gain interest for the second round.

Of course, first he had to finish with round one.

Felicity wantonly reached behind herself and pulled at his head, trying to get him in as close and deep as possible. She arched her hips and desperately gripped his head as he hungrily lapped at her sweet sex.

Unknown to her, she wasn’t the only one being pleasured. Luke was discretely taking care of himself, preparing for the main event with as little preamble as possible. In fact, he had fun playing with himself as she was obliviously pleasured by him. He would change the pace of the curling and plunging of his tongue inside of her, moving in harmony with the hand wrapped around his cock, lubricated with the dampness Felicity had left on his fingers.

Luke wished he could see her in that moment; completely abandoned to lust. Were her eyes closed? Was her face twisted in pleasure? It was one of his favorite things while making love to Felicity, seeing the pleasure he gave her. She had never been self-conscious about the faces she made in the bedroom, and in fact greatly enjoyed Luke watching her ecstasy.

It was why he didn’t take her from behind very often; he almost couldn’t climax without seeing her expression. If only he could see her now.

That was when Luke spotted the full-length mirror in the corner of the room by Felicity’s dresser. He released his erection and held up his hand, moving the mirror with the Force to the end of the bed.

“What?” Felicity frowned as she heard the commotion. “Luke, why did you move my mirror?”

Luke reluctantly pulled his tongue out of her cunt, and sat up, “I want to see you.”
He jerked his cock a few times and shifted himself and Felicity into position. Because of their sizes, he had to lift her hips and crouch himself down a little to align his shaft to her entrance. He stalled a minute to rub his head across her quim, coating himself in her juices and arousing her further.

“Oh, Felicity,” Luke moaned, squeezing his eyes shut as he enjoyed her slick folds. “I’m so ready.”

“I think I’m even more ready than you,” Felicity groaned, sliding herself against his head. “Please, Luke. I need you.”

“Patience, Sweetheart,” Luke chuckled, teasing her entrance but not pushing in. “I’m going to take you so hard.”

“Really? Should we use the safewords then?”

“No, if you want me to stop or slow, just tell me.”

“Good,” Felicity smirked. She moaned and tried to push herself back so he would enter her, but he resisted. “Luke, please.”

“Please what?”

“Don’t play this game. Just do it.”

“Not until you tell me what you want.”

Felicity groaned in defeat, “Fine! Luke Skywalker, please, please, please, take me now. Take me hard and deep like a nexu in heat. Make me and mark me yours, and shove that shaft inside my tight, dripping, hot cunt, and just take me already!”

He slammed inside of her.

Felicity shrieked and panted as her body adjusted to the not so foreign entity stretching her out. Luke chuckled and leaned over her, taking the time to feather brief kisses over her back and down her scar.

“Your wish is my command,” Luke whispered in her ear.

And then he started to thrust.

It wasn’t tender, passionate lovemaking, but a primal, animalistic fuck. He slammed into her over and over, Felicity screaming out in pleasure as he grasped her breasts tightly, his fingers tweaking her nipples. She thrust back at him, trying to pull him in deeper and deeper, tilting her pelvis until she found the position where he was hitting her right in the a-spot. Felicity gave a strangled cry, and reached down to play with her clit. Luke seemed to like it as he began to piston inside of her tight walls even harder.

His pelvis slamming against her hips, it took all of Luke’s control not to empty himself immediately into Felicity’s quim. She was so tight and wet, her slick walls clutching his cock as he thrust in and out of her. Being inside of Felicity Rhiaon’s cunt was the most pleasurable thing Luke Skywalker had ever experienced, the way his cock would slide through that familiar passage, that delectable wet heat. How her body would grip him and so eagerly guide him deep into her core, showing Luke just how badly she wanted him inside of her.

Something chemical and primal would overtake his mind as he felt her clench around him. His mechanical hand released her breast and grabbed her shoulder for a better hold to thrust into her. Luke’s hand clutching her shoulder was tight enough that she would have to awkwardly explain to several people that “no, that bruise is not from Luke abusing me. Sex can just get a little rough sometimes when a metal hand is involved.” But Felicity didn’t mind the pain, and in fact, it quite turned her on.

“Oh, yes!” Felicity cried out. “Clutch me harder, Luke!”

“You like that?” Luke whispered in her ear. “You do, don’t you? You like when I mix a little pain with your pleasure. You like it when I dominate you and take you as mine. You like when I claim, and punish your body… and I know when we’re in this position, you also like this.”

Felicity yelped as his natural hand slapped one of her pert ass cheeks. His hand immediately lovingly rubbed over the forming red area of her pale cheek. Luke was always careful when they started drifting into playing with kinks, especially whenever BDSM was a factor, no matter how mild. Her would never use his metal hand to strike her unless to was specifically agreed upon beforehand as his metal hand could cause serious damage if used improperly. Luke also made sure that any blow struck when they went into sex without planning BDSM elements beforehand, it would immediately be followed with aftercare and reassurances of love. As he spanked her again, his hand would immediately rub the wound, then go back to playing with her breasts as he would lean forward to whisper utterances of love in her ear. When she had calmed down, Luke would begin the cycle again.

“That’s enough spanking,” Felicity said after a while, and Luke immediately stopped. “Felt wonderful, but damn it, I just want you to fuck me into this mattress until I’m sore and filled with your cum.”

“As you wish,” Luke tenderly kissed down her the length of the scar on her spine. He repositioned himself to have his right hand on her shoulder, left hand on her breast, Force on her clit, and cock in her cunt, and went to town.

Luke thrusted frantically harder and harder into her, losing himself to his primordial instincts. Something was triggered in the back of his mind; she was wet, and tight, and his. His chosen mate, his vessel for child bearing – someday, but Luke’s mind was narrowly focused on the animalistic level of sex and mating, causing the thought. He was the one Felicity had chosen to spread her legs for, and assumed the most traditional position for mating. Her moans and slickness urged him on, and he could feel her emotions in the Force; she wanted him. She wanted him thrusting hard inside her, stretching her, claiming her, dominating her, and filling her, marking that she belonged to him.

She was his mate, and he was hers.

As Luke thrust into her as hard and fast as humanly possible, Felicity turned over complete control to him. Their bodies were slick with sweat, and Luke stopped playing with her breasts, both hands gripping her shoulder because now he legitimately feared he would lose his grip on her.

For a moment, in the franticness of their fucking, Luke’s cock slid out of her, her vaginal muscles clenching just a little too tightly as his cock pulled out too far. Felicity moaned, and rubbed herself desperately on Luke’s cock as he grabbed a hold of it. He closed his eyes, basking in the pleasure of her clit sliding on the head of his shaft, her most pleasurable spot stimulating his most pleasurable spot.

“You like that?” Luke panted, using his hand to rub her clit with his cock harder. “Do you like my head teasing your clit?”

“Oh, yes,” Felicity moaned.
“I know you do. You’re dowsing me with your wetness. Do you want it back in you? Do you want my thick shaft in your tight little cunt? Do you want me to thrust my big cock inside your tight, wet walls?”

“Yes!”

Luke slammed his cock back into her.

Words were a lost concept to Felicity Rhiaon; primal grunts and moans were the only language she knew. She glanced up and remembered the mirror positioned in front of the bed. Luke was observing her through it, watching himself powerfully thrust into her over and over as she played with her clitoris, one of his hands was back working her bouncing breasts, and the other gripped her shoulder painfully. He was watching her enraptured expressions giving herself over to their wild frenzy of lust. Luke was taking pleasure from the sight of her own unending pleasure and their carnality as he rutted with her like an animal in the spring.

It was too much for Felicity.

“LUKE!” Felicity screamed out, climaxing hard on his thrusting cock.

Her arms buckled out from under her, and her torso fell onto the bed. But Luke moved his hand from her shoulder to a take a firm grip of her hip. He held her upright still frantically slamming into her.

“Luke!” Felicity breathlessly gasped, her body slumped down on the bed, the pleasure of his hard shaft shoving in and out of her tight, wet walls overwhelming her. It felt so good that it was almost painful, and her own body was trying to jerk away from his touch, but Luke held fast.

“Come on, Felicity,” Luke panted, his chest covered in sweat as he desperately held off his own climax. “Let’s try one more. Can you handle that? I want to give you one more.”

“I can handle one more,” Felicity moaned, her face buried in the mattress. “Just don’t expect me to do any of the work.”

“Tell me if you want me to stop.”

“No, don’t stop, never stop.”

After that Felicity’s moans became nonsensical as she writhed on the mattress. He could feel her blinding pleasure in the Force, and the way her quim gave small jerks trying to reject his cock from entering her, but Felicity begged him to go on. Her skin was slick with perspiration, and he struggled to maintain a good grip on her.

Luke released her breasts, and locked an arm underneath her hips holding her close to his rocking pelvis, as a wet slap filled the room with every thrust. His free hand returned to their habitual territory of her hard clitoris. He unsheathed it and stroked the bare head, causing her to shriek even louder. The musky scent of sex assailed his nostrils, and her skin tasted of salt as he kissed and bit her shoulders, marking his claim on her to any man who might try to steal her from him.

She was close, he could sense it in the Force, but he was even closer. Two times already had Felicity gotten her release, but Luke was still hard as a rock. He needed to release, to let go inside that trembling warmth, but he had promised her one more orgasm, and with the way she was moaning his name, he wasn’t about to disappoint her.

All at the same time, he converged the Force upon her most sensitive areas. Around her breasts and nipples, across her clit, inside her slick channel, and even simple spots like the tender area underneath her earlobe.

Felicity screamed out absolute bloody murder as she came harder than she had ever in her life.

Luke watched in satisfaction at the pleasure he had given her… and thanked the Force once again that the apartment was soundproof and their downstairs neighbors couldn’t hear Felicity’s literal screams of pleasure. Though, truth be told, that wasn’t a citation he minded getting from the building manager. In fact, Felicity would probably frame it and hang it on the wall.

Pathetic moans came from Felicity beneath him as she rode out the tremors of her orgasm, and Luke couldn’t hold himself back anymore. He wrapped his arms around her torso and pulled her upright into a sitting position against him. Luke was holding her tightly, hugging her and kissing her neck and shoulders as he finally allowed his own orgasm, emptying shot after shot inside of her.

They panted hard, not moving from their position as they caught their breath. Felicity smiled and gave a small, satisfied moan as she pressed back against his cock, though deflated, still buried inside of her. His cum was too much for her quim to contain, and the excess started dripping out of her quim, and down her thighs. She then started chuckling, which Luke joined as he eased them down onto their stomachs as he tenderly trailed kisses across the scars on her back.

Luke chuckled as he kissed his way up her back and her neck to her ear where he whispered, “It’s so good to be home.”

4 Years, 6 Months, 10 Days

The two things Luke was aware of when he opened his eyes were pain… and Han and Ben Solo smirking at him.

“Han? Ben?” Luke groaned as he started to shift. His muscles felt sore from the night they had spent sleeping upright on the couch of Han and Leia’s Hosnian Prime apartment, “What’s going on?”

“Careful, Kid,” Han cautioned. “Don’t want to wake Sleeping Beauty.”

He was suddenly aware of something in his arms. He looked down and found Felicity in them… and her face covered in black marker ink.

“Honestly, I’d classify her as Sleeping Average at Best,” Ben grinned. “Brunettes like Rhiaon are a dime a dozen around here.”

“Watch it, Ben,” Han shot his son a look.

“Well, what would you classify her as? Do you think she’s attractive?”

“Ben, I am not answering the question, do you think your wife’s brother’s fiancée is attractive.”

“Han,” Luke narrowed his eyes, “did you let Ben draw on Felicity’s face while she slept?”

“Of course not,” Han replied. “Seriously, Kid, what kind of parent do you think I am that I would let my son draw on his uncle’s future wife’s face, whom he has openly declared a hatred for said woman? ...I drew on her face. Ben drew on yours.”

“Luke?” Felicity moaned, his yell having woken her. She groaned as she straightened out her stiff body and her eyes focused in the morning light. “What’s going-”

She stopped dead at the sight of Luke.

“Luke, why are there whiskers drawn on your face?”

He sighed and rubbed the side of his nose, “Same reason there’s a beard drawn on yours. Solos.”

Felicity glared at Han and Ben who were still smirking at each other.

“Alright, fess up,” Felicity snapped. “Was this Loud Mouth Senior, or Loud Mouth Junior?”

“I swear to the Gods, Loud Mouth Solo!” Felicity growled. “This better come off before the wedding, or I’m going to play artist on your face, and it won’t be with ink!”

“And you wonder why I don’t like her,” Ben muttered. “She does spark to violence so quickly, doesn’t she?”

“Can it,” Han ordered. “And don’t worry, Fliss, we made sure it’ll wash off... in a few days.”

“That’s it!”

Felicity tried to launch herself at Han, but Luke grabbed her and pulled her back down into his lap.

“I’m sorry, I didn’t realize Han was so juvenile,” Felicity snapped. She looked to Han, “Seriously, Loud Mouth Solo, your ten-year-old, I would expect this from, but you’re forty-three.”

“Hey, I needed to enact a little revenge and Ben’s idea sounded good to me.”

“Han, please,” Luke groaned. “You know how dangerous teaching Ben the idea that revenge is acceptable could possibly be.”

“I’m standing right here, Uncle Luke,” Ben scowled.

“What did you need revenge for?” Felicity asked.

“Luke,” Han glared at his brother-in-law. “I spend a month putting together the perfect bachelor party for him. Nothing that Luke wouldn’t love or be uncomfortable with. I spend God knows how much time tracking down all his male friends, arranging schedules, and booking reservations... then two hours in, Luke says he has to use the fresher and completely disappears. An hour later, Lando and I are about to call the police because being who you are, there’s a huge possibility Luke has been kidnapped. Then I get a comm from Leia saying that he’s decided to escape his bachelor party, and is back at the apartment, opting to spend the night playing cards with his sister, nephew, and fiancée instead.”

“If it makes you feel better, Dad, I won most of Uncle Luke’s money.”
“It does, Ben. It does.”

“So you decided to come here and draw on our faces?” Luke raised an eyebrow.

“No, Lando, myself, and the rest of your guests decided to spend the night going absolutely wild – though doing nothing that would give Leia the grounds to divorce and/or kill me – and charging it all to your bank account, which Obik has access to via Reine. It wasn’t until I got home and found you two all lovely-dovey, having fallen asleep on the couch in each other’s arms that I wanted to be sick.”

Ben frowned at Han, “You said you threw up because you drank too much, and I shouldn’t follow your life choices in this regard.”

“It’s a little of both.”

“How did you get involved in this?” Felicity asked Ben.

Ben shrugged, “I wasn’t sleeping well last night, and sensed Dad come home. Then I sensed him getting sick in the fresher and went to check on him. You know, make sure he didn’t choke on his vomit or pass out and hit his head on something. I don’t want my Dad dead. I agreed to help him sober down… after he bribed me because Mom would so kill him if he stumbled home that drunk.”

Felicity raised an eyebrow at Han, “You don’t go on benders often, Solo, but when you do, you go hard.”

“Says the woman who once ended up in the hospital.”

Luke groaned, “Can we just cut to the part where you decided drawing on us was a good idea?”

“Well, Ben and I saw you two and decided we’d have some good old-fashioned father-son bonding time,” Han wrapped an arm around Ben. “Thank you for facilitating that special moment.”

“And that’s why if I ever die, custody of Ben goes to Chewbacca,” Leia’s voice came from the hallway, everyone’s heads turning to see that she had watched the entire exchange.

“Come on, Sweetheart,” Han said, “I’m not that bad a dad.”

Leia raised an eyebrow, “You bribed our son to hide the fact you were drunk.”

“I didn’t say I was a good dad.”

Leia just shook her head and looked at Felicity, “Seriously, Fliss, this is a typical day in this family. The wedding’s in two weeks. If you want to get out of this, now’s the time to do it. No one would blame you for not wanting to attach yourself to these doofuses.”

Felicity smiled and wrapped her arms around Luke’s neck, “No, Leia. I’m fine right here. I’ve never been happier than I am with this doofus.”

“I love you too,” Luke leaned forward and kissed her tenderly.

The moment was so perfect and at peace.

“Ugh!” Ben groaned loudly, causing Luke and Felicity to break apart. “If anyone needs me, I’m going to go throw myself out a window.”

“Have fun,” Han sarcastically called.
Leia sighed as Ben stomped towards his bedroom, “I’m sorry about him, Felicity.”

“Don’t worry, he’s just going through a phase,” Felicity waved off. “Hey, how pissed would Ben be if I started insisting he called me Aunt Felicity?”

“Felicity, we’ve discussed this,” Luke groaned. “You agreed to stop antagonising Ben.”

“We discussed it. I agreed to nothing.”

Luke dropped his head into his hands.

“I just don’t know what to do anymore,” Leia shook her head. She had recently confided in Luke that with the wedding day getting closer, Ben was starting to act out even more. Leia was dangerously close to getting to the end of her rope.

“Don’t stress about Ben, Sweetheart,” Han said. “Like Fliss said, he’s going through a phase.”

Luke and Leia exchanged a lot. As well-intentioned Han and Felicity were, they couldn’t sense the building Darkness within Ben.

“We’ll figure it out, Leia,” Luke promised.

Leia smiled, “Don’t worry too much about it. You’ll have your own kid to worry about soon enough, I’m sure.”

“You better,” Han warned. “I should have been Uncle Han years ago.”

“Han,” Luke tried desperately to pretend he wasn’t blushing.

“Word of advice, Felicity,” Leia chuckled. “These two doofuses can be charming and do have some redeeming qualities… but seriously, be careful reproducing with one.”

Little did Luke Skywalker know that in a year from then, Felicity Rhiaon would be pregnant with his baby.

4 Years, 6 Months, 24 Days

"Do you, Luke Skywalker take this woman to be your partner in life and sharing your path; equal in love, a mirror for your true self, promising to honor and cherish, through good times and bad, in sickness and in health, for as long as you both shall live?"

"I do," Luke vowed, unable to wipe the adorably goofy grin off his face that made Felicity Rhiaon fall in love with him in the first place.

Felicity had that mischievous one corner of her mouth upturned smirk that Luke could never resist, “Good. I did not spend all that time getting this dress altered for you to go, ’yeah, maybe not’ at the last second."

A low laughter filled the room as Mon Mothma turned to Felicity. The Chancellor of the New Republic didn’t really perform weddings, but she was willing to make an exception for Rogue One

"Do you, Felicity Rhiaon take this man to be your partner in life and sharing your path; equal in love, a mirror for your true self, promising to honor and cherish, through good times and bad, in sickness and in health, for as long as you both shall live?"

“I do,” Felicity grinned. Luke could see that she was struggling not to let herself cry. “And I’ll fight anyone who tries to take him from me.”

That quip got even louder laughter.

“May we have the rings?” Mon Mothma requested.

Luke turned to Han standing at his side.

As he dug the rings out of his pocket, Han was beaming with pride for his brother-in-law. Behind Luke, Leia was sobbing happy tears, standing next to Felicity as her Matron of Honour. It seemed that none of them could actually believe this day had actually come.

Han held out the rings, but when Luke went to take them, Han pulled Luke into a hug. Smiling, Luke accepted it and hugged his best friend back.

“You did good, Kid,” Han said into Luke’s ear. “You picked the right one.”

“I know I did,” Luke chuckled. “… Please don’t ever point out to her that she can do better.”

Luke clapped Han on the back, “Thank you.”

Han let Luke pull away, but he still didn’t let go of his hand.

“Do you remember when I found you two in the Falcon talking about sand?” Han grinned.

If there wasn’t hundreds of people looking at him, Luke would have probably slapped his forehead.

“I remember after she left I just looked at you and said Marry that girl. Well, here on your wedding day, I have to say… Told you so.”

As Luke laughed, Han finally let go of the rings and let Luke turn back to his bride.

When he set his eyes back on Felicity there were tear tracks down her face. Her mascara had held up – that goodness for the Nabberrie women’s collective knowledge about makeup – but Felicity clearly had been getting some crying in when Luke’s back was turned.

“You okay?” Luke whispered as he gave her his ring.

“Literally, I’ve never been happier,” Felicity clasped his hand tightly.

“Luke, please present Felicity with the ring,” Mon Mothma instructed.

Luke held Felicity’s left hand and let the ring hover at the tip of her finger.
Mon Mothma continued, “Luke Skywalker, if you choose to enter into this marriage with Felicity Rhiaon of your own free will, slide your ring on her finger, and make your solemn vow.”

Luke slowly slid the ring onto her finger, “Felicity Rhiaon, I give you this ring to wear with love and joy. As a ring has no end, neither shall my love for you. I pledge to you all that I am and all that I will ever be as your husband. I choose you to be my wife this day and forevermore.”

“Luke Skywalker,” Felicity voice shook. Luke could sense that she was struggling with all her might not to cry. “I accept your oath, and will forever wear this ring as a sign of my commitment and the desire of my heart.”

“Felicity, please present Luke with the ring,” Mon Mothma instructed.

Felicity took Luke’s left hand and let the ring hover at the tip of his finger, “I am so happy this hand wasn’t the one cut off.”

The wedding party – Felicity, Leia, Reine, Alyla, Zena, Luke, Ryoo, Pooja, Han, Obik, Lando, Chewbacca, Ben, Wedge, and Diego, who was giving Felicity away – all laughed from the platform. Luke and Felicity had decided to get married on Yavin IV in the old Rebel Base as it was where they had met and had been the site of the most significant moments of their life. It only seemed natural for the woman who stole the plans and the man who blew it up to get married in the shadow of the Death Star.

Mon Mothma continued, “Felicity Rhiaon, if you choose to enter into this marriage with Luke Skywalker of your own free will, slide your ring on her finger, and make your solemn vow.”

Felicity slowly slid the ring onto his finger, “Luke Skywalker, I give you this ring to wear with love and joy. As a ring has no end, neither shall my love for you. I pledge to you all that I am and all that I will ever be as your wife. I choose you to be my husband this day and forevermore.”

“Felicity Rhiaon,” Luke couldn’t wipe the smile off his face, that adorably goofy grin that had made her fall in love with him. “I accept your oath, and will forever wear this ring as a sign of my commitment and the desire of my heart.”

Felicity smiled back, not that irresistible one corner upturned smirk, but that gloriously beautiful smile of pure joy that had been reserved for very few others before him.

“Is… Is that it?” Felicity looked at Mon Mothma.

Mon Mothma smiled, “Yes, My Dear.”

“Good, because I don’t know how much longer I can hold myself together,” Felicity gave what sounded like half a laugh and half a sob.

“Well then,” Mon Mothma declared, “by the power vested in me by the New Republic, and the Government of Yavin IV, I now pronounce you husband and wife. You may kiss the-”

They kissed and laughed and let the tears stream down their face. After all the hardships and sacrifices they had made, the road had led them to this perfect moment.

“Ladies and gentlemen, I present for the very first time, Mr. and Mrs. Luke and Felicity Rhiaon Skywalker.”
The whole hall cheered.

And for once in their life, Luke and Felicity could say there was absolutely nothing wrong.

… But years later, Ben Solo would admit that he finally learned it was Snoke’s voice in his head during that very wedding.
Part Six: Parenthood

Chapter Summary

Enter Rey: Stage Right.

Chapter Notes

I have made my decision, and I will not be devoting an additional chapter to this series of flashbacks depicting Felicity’s postpartum depression. While it is an important piece of backstory, I have decided to show it when it’s more impactful and relevant to the story. We do see a few scenes depicting the beginning and ending of that time, as it is an important part of Luke and Felicity’s history, but hey, while reflecting on a relationship that ends with being shown footage of your wife getting shot in the head, Luke’s maybe not going to focus too much on the time she almost killed their daughter.

Also, with actually dedicating to a timeline, Chapter 17’s birthday party scene ends up being way off from when Rey was actually born since I have now established when she was born in relation to when Luke and Felicity got married. (You know, I intended to keep that vague, but no, I always decide to throw in timelines that mess everything up.) Since Luke’s confrontation with Ben took place on the wedding anniversary, and that means Rey’s sixth birthday was shortly before her reunion with Luke. I have gone back to chapter 17, changed the birthday scene from six months to three months, and inserted a small paragraph to explain why they’re celebrating her birthday on the wrong day.

…And fixed a typo that said “to face his face” rather than “to face his father.”

Oops.

TRIGGER WARNING: This chapter does very briefly refer to Alyla and Gavyn’s pasts as slaves. This does include mentions of sexual abuse, forced medical procedures resulting in infertility, and self-harm. If any of this content triggers you, please skip the second paragraph in the section “4 Years, 8 Months, 9 Days” and the rest of the paragraph that starts with Alyla’s line, “And if I can’t give him either?”

See the end of the chapter for more notes.

The Long Way Home

Chapter Twenty-Eight
Luke tried to breathe normally as he put the final screw in the wall. Finishing this fireplace mantel was honestly the only thing keeping him calm in that moment. He just needed to focus on simple things like the whirr of the electric screwdriver filling the living room, or the paint drying in the master bedroom, or Artoo triple checking the wiring in the garage.

Or what Felicity was doing in the fresher.

No, he couldn’t think about that.

He focused on the house and its mile-long to-do list. The actual “home” part had been constructed, but Luke and Felicity still couldn’t move in. There were still rooms to be painted, comm lines to be connected, appliances to be installed, landscaping to be finished, and furniture to be assembled. Han, Leia, Chewie, Ben, and Diego would be there the next day to join the other Jedi helping Luke and Felicity cut down that to-do list.

Lando had arrived that morning, choosing to spend the extra day with Alyla. Luke thought he heard Alyla mention something about a picnic by the lake. That was exactly the sort of charming move Lando Calrissian would pull. But his visit wasn’t all Alyla centric; Lando would do his fair share of helping the others. It would be a major day of painting and putting together furniture.

And maybe a certain announcement.

No, stop thinking about it!

His turned his mind to Threepio, running over the conversation they had a week earlier. Threepio would not be coming with Luke, Felicity, and Artoo to live in Temple Village. There wasn’t much use for a protocol droid in Temple Village, and to be honest he had been nothing but a glorified housekeeping droid for years. It had been a hard conversation, but Luke had made Threepio understand why living with Leia was the better idea.

Oh, good, this line of thought was working. Yes, perfect, Luke could be calm and cool and collected and face this whole situation with a level-headedness that-“I did it!” Felicity announced, rushing into the room with thee pregnancy test.

“Well, what does it say? Is it positive? Are you sure you did it right?” Luke frantically tried to see the result.

So much for level-headedness.

“I can pee on a stick, Skywalker. Come on, Luke, stop it,” Felicity shrugged him off and crossed back to the coffee table where the test box sat. “I just used it. The result isn’t in yet.”

“Oh,” Luke tried to calm himself down as Felicity sat on the couch and set down the test. “Sorry. How long will it be?”

“Not sure,” Felicity reread through the instructions. “I think tests usually take two to three min-”

Felicity froze.

“Of course!” she gave something that sounded like a quiet scream and threw the instructions across the room. “Of course I bought the one that takes ten freaking minutes!”

“Funny, if you hadn’t said that three weeks ago and let me go look for the condoms, we wouldn’t be in this situation!”

“Hey, you’re the one who said there’s a fifty/fifty chance I forgot to take my pill, but I think we’ll be good.”

“So this is my fault?” Felicity snapped.

Luke paused, “Wait… Are you mad about this?”

Felicity froze, “What? Luke, I… No, I mean, I want us to have a baby someday, I just wasn’t expecting it to be now. We’ve only been married for a few months.”

“Right.”

“Are you mad?”

“No,” Luke laughed, sitting down on the couch next to Felicity and wrapping an arm around her. He pressed a kiss to her forehead, “Having a child with you is a dream come true. I would love a little boy with your hair—”

“Or a little girl with your eyes?”

“Hey, considering my family history, maybe it’s twins.”

“Oh, God, don’t even joke about that. Taking care of one Skywalker baby sounds difficult. Two of them would be downright horrifying.”

Felicity glanced down at the tattoo on her wrist.

“Let’s not get too excited. You don’t want to fall in love with an idea,” Felicity stroked the ink reading FN-2187. “It makes it so much harder when you lose that possibility.”

Luke understood, “He’d be four now, wouldn’t he?”

“Something like that.” Felicity sighed, “I think the hardest part is that I could never find his family. No one ever registered his disappearance. It’s very likely that no one wanted that child… and now that the First Order has him, no one ever will.”

Felicity nodded, “Thanks. Alright, let’s talk about something else.”

“Okay. Do you think we’re having a boy or a girl?”

“Something other than the baby that may or may not exist.”

“Sorry.” Luke was quiet for a minute, “… What should we call it?”
“Luke!”

“Sorry.”

“Good,” Felicity glared at him, “… The baby’s room should be the empty one furthest from ours. Give ourselves a little buffer.”

“Agreed. What colour should we paint it?”

“I don’t want to be one of those mothers that paints it yellow to be a so called neutral colour.”

“I’m definitely making the crib’s mobile.”

“You can rig it, but I’m making the objects. Do you think we should do ships? Or maybe planets that are important to us?”

“I like the planets idea.”

For several minutes they babbled on about the baby. Names, room decorations, godparents, who it would look more like, and all sorts of arrangements to be made.

“Wait, what are we doing?” Felicity suddenly exclaimed. “We can’t talk about this stuff yet! Luke, change the subject!”

“I don’t know! Anything! What were you doing before I came into the room?”

“I was installing the fireplace mantel,” Luke got up and crossed to the fireplace. “This is where we’ll put Brendan’s urn and the Holos of our deceased family and friends. It’ll be a nice little memorial. And look.”

Luke banged the bottom of the mantel. Instantly a covering of metal shot up from the bottom and completely covered the mantel.

“Fireproof, waterproof, everything proof,” Luke announced. “In the event of an emergency – or it just plain falls off the wall – this will protect the mantel and whatever sits on it. We just can’t place anything on it that’s taller than eight inches.”

“Oh Skywalker,” Felicity shook her head. “Why are you so obsessed with making this house and its contents fireproof? You even installed a whole security system around it.”

“What can I say?” Luke shrugged, pressing a button on the side of the mantel to reset the shield. “You have one home burn down, you get a little paranoid.”

“I’d say. How many things did I have to veto getting extra fireproofing?”

“Fine, but I’ll be the one laughing when our house burns down.”

Felicity raised an eyebrow, “I don’t know what’s stupider about that sentence. The idea about you laughing if our house burns down… or the subtle implication that you might kind of want to burn our house down.”

Luke chuckled, “I didn’t mean to imply that.”

“Too late. Enjoy me joking for the next three years that you want to burn down our house.”
“I would expect nothing less.”

Felicity smiled, “I like the mantel, Luke.”

“I do too,” Luke nodded. “I promise you, Felicity, someday we’re going to gather all of our children and tell them about each and every person whose picture sits on this mantel. Brendan, Riz, Ji-Dan, Gunner, Uncle Owen, Aunt Beru, Padmé Amidala, Obi-Wan Kenobi—”

“Bail Organa, Biggs Darklighter. Dinah Andromias.” A sad smile crossed Felicity’s lips, “Alaric Rhiaon and Anakin Skywalker as well. Good or bad, our children will know exactly who their family is.”

“I’m so excited for this, Felicity.”

“Well, you should be Luke, because my watch says it’s been ten minutes, and this test says that I’m…” Felicity picked up the test. “…Not pregnant.”

“I’m… not pregnant,” Felicity’s voice was riddled with disappointment. She flipped the test around to show Luke as he approached, “See.”

There was no denying the NEGATIVE flashing across the screen.

“Only by a week,” Felicity sighed. “Besides, I’m under a lot of stress with the move and my final exams coming up. It’s probably just that.”

“Huh.”

Luke and Felicity sat on the couch in silence.

“You as disappointed as I am?” Felicity asked after a while.

“It’s strange. I knew I wanted children but… I didn’t know I wanted them this bad,” Luke answered.

“I know. There was that moment of glory and now… Nothing.”

“It’ll happen someday, Felicity.”

“When, Luke?” Felicity questioned. “We keep saying someday, but we don’t make any serious plans.”

“Well, we just got married.”

“Yeah, but we’re not getting any younger. My doctor has already told me that I’m running out of time, and she said that three years ago. The longer we wait, the riskier it gets.”

Luke looked carefully at his wife, “What are you saying? Do you want to start trying?”

“Sort of,” Felicity confessed. “Look, you’re right, we did just get married so let’s not jump straight into trying for a baby… But if one happens…”

“What exactly are you getting at?”
Felicity bit her lip, “Well, I went off birth control a few days ago when I thought I might be pregnant because I think I heard that sort of thing can hurt a baby. What if I… didn’t go back on?”

“So… we’d try for a baby?” Luke clarified.

“How about for the next year we don’t intentionally try for a baby, with all the tracking cycles and upping the number of times we have sex and using whatever strange things make a person more fertile… but we just don’t use birth control? And if nothing happens after a year, then we go for it?”

Luke smiled, “I think it’s a good plan. Sort of trying but not going all out. Whatever happens, happens. Leave it up to dest-”

“You say destiny and I’m not having sex with you for the next year,” Felicity warned.

“So you agree?”

“Yeah, let’s do it.”

“Perfect.”

Luke and Felicity sat in silence after another minute.

“Felicity…” Luke side glanced at her. “You said you stopped birth control a few days ago, right?”

“Do you want to have sex right now?”

“Yep,” Felicity pulled off her shirt.

A second later Luke’s shirt joined hers on the floor, and he had pushed her down on the couch, kissing her and working the clasp of her bra.

“Come on, Skywalker,” Felicity laughed as he pulled off her bra and began kissing his way down her body. “Let’s make a baby.”

4 Years, 8 Months, 2 Days

“Felicity Rhiaon Skywalker.”

The crowd clapped as Felicity walked across the university’s stage to accept her degree.

Luke couldn’t wipe the smile from his face while he sat between Leia and Obik. Reine, Diego, and Nils Arlos were next to Obik, with Nils and Obik being particularly happy about seeing Felicity accomplish the dream she had spoken of to them since she was sixteen. Luke’s aunt, Sola, and her husband, Darred had come to attend as well. Darred himself was an architect and had been something of a casual mentor to Felicity during particularly difficult projects. Han, Ben, Chewie and Threepio were next to Leia, with Ben being as dramatic as possible about being bored and not wanting to be there. And Artoo was battling with the other droids in the aisle to get the best recording of the people walking the stage. Luke made a mental note to get Han to pull out Artoo after Felicity got off the stage before it turned into a literal battle.

Seriously, which Skywalker thought it was a good idea to equip Artoo with a blowtorch?
“Congratulations,” the Professor shook Felicity’s hand before presenting her with the diploma.

Felicity’s smile was utterly radiant as she turned to look out at the crowd, her heart probably swelling at the sight of her supporters. Though the group around him cheered, Felicity’s eyes were for Luke only.

It had been three years since that night in his office where Felicity had agreed to pursue her dream, and Luke was overjoyed to see she had accomplished that dream. It felt like everything in their life was finally falling into place.

Though she was distant from him on the stage, Luke didn’t need to see her happy tears to know they were filling her eyes. His heart glowed at the utter joy his wife projected as she finally received her architecture degree. And it never would have happened if not for him.

“Thank you,” Felicity mouthed at him from the stage.

Luke nodded, and used the Force to whisper in her ear, “Anytime.”

---

4 Years, 8 Months, 9 Days

It happened because Luke was feeling reflective. It had been another night when Alyla Kene showed up on the doorstep of the Rhiaon Skywalker household in need of Luke’s advice. She was having another moment of a crisis of faith and wondering if her on again off again relationship with Lando Calrissian was worth it.

While Felicity went upstairs to shower and get ready for bed, Luke made Alyla a cup of tea and had a long talk with her on the couch. Luke always thought his life was full of tragedy, so it was his talks with Alyla that kept things in perspective. As she recounted the horrors of her slavery, sexual abuse, self-mutilation, and their subsequent effects on her life, beliefs, and self-perception, Luke was thankful for his own life. Despite the bleakness he lived through, he still managed to have hope and faith.

“The Dark Side and Light Side will always battle, Alyla,” Luke counselled her. “But we must remember that good will always triumph.”

“It’s not that I don’t believe good will triumph, but I’m never going to have that happy ending. I… have very strong, romantic feelings for Lando,” Alyla never could bring herself to utter the word Lando, except to her brother. “But I can’t give him a happy ending. I can’t carry children and marriage feels like another form of ownership. I won’t be owned again, Luke.”

“Lando has no desire to own you,” Luke reminded. “But remember who we are speaking of. Marriage and children don’t exactly sound like Lando’s version of a happy ending.”

“I suppose not.”

“Alyla, as a friend to both yourself and Lando, I can tell you that I never see the two of you happier than when you’re together.”

“But we shouldn’t be happy. We’ve been together for almost five years and we don’t live together, we don’t spend most of our time together, we don’t even really see each other exclusively.”

Luke tried not to look surprised, “I was unaware that you have any other relationships, Alyla.”

Alyla sighed, “Well, I haven’t been with anyone other than Lando… ever. But I know he wasn’t exactly… I- I made it clear he didn’t have to… We had an understanding that… Lando-” “Hasn’t been with anyone else as far as I’ve seen.” Luke took a sip of his drink, “Not since he started things with you. Of course, Lando doesn’t give me a detailed debriefing of his love life. But I know what he was like before you, Alyla, and trust me, Lando isn’t like that anymore. Whatever it is that goes on between the two of you, Lando respects it, and has throughout the duration of your involvement. As far as I see it, you do have your happy ending. Lando isn’t huge on commitment, but his involvement with and leadership of Cloud City shows he can be responsible. You don’t want marriage, but you want someone dedicated to you, will open the world to you, who make you feel beautiful but not like a prize at a fair. If Lando is that man and gives you the relationship you want, then what’s the problem?”

“The problem is I shouldn’t want this.”

“Oh, forget about what you should want,” Luke waved off. “If everyone followed what they should want rather than what they actually wanted, Leia and I never would have been born. Then where would the Galaxy be? Still in the grasp of the Empire.”

Alyla gave a wiry smile, “Didn’t the Empire rise because of your father’s relationship with your mother? Therefore, if he had followed what he should have wanted, sure, you may not be born, but the Empire might never have come to be.”

Luke just shook his head, “The point is don’t put so much stock in what you think you should want.
Just because marriage and children is one person’s idea of a happy ending, doesn’t mean it’s another’s. Look at my love life. I’m the Jedi Grandmaster who destroyed the Death Star, and my wife is the daughter of the creator of the Death Star, as well as a woman who has serious doubts about the extent of the Force. I shouldn’t want to have anything to do with her, and yet-

“You do unspeakable acts on my breakfast table?”

“Still doesn’t wipe the image from my mind.” Alyla cocked her head to the side, “Then again you and Felicity aren’t exactly hard on the eyes. I suppose I could have worse images in my mind. You know, I walked in on Gavyn and Zena once? My brother committing what could technically be considered bestiality is an image I will never be rid of.”

Luke blinked, “I… don’t know what to say to that.”

Alyla shrugged.

“The point is Felicity is my perfect mate,” Luke continued. “I shouldn’t want anything to do with her, yet I would give my life for her. So what if you and Lando don’t want to get married? Don’t. It’s your life, and life is too short to live it to someone else’s standards.”

Alyla looked down, “And what about children?”

“Your life isn’t incomplete if you don’t have children.”

“Is that why you don’t have any? You don’t want them?”

“No, I want them someday, but life… hasn’t been agreeable on that point. Felicity and I may be getting a little older, but we still plan on having them… someday.”

“So you get it. You understand that draw to raise and care for the life of a child. I want that, Luke.
I’ve talked to Lando and he’s open to the idea. He rather likes the idea of having a son…What if I can’t give him one?”

“Having a daughter is no disappointment. I know I’d be happy with one just as much as a son. So would Lando. He’d love to have a little girl to spoil.”

“And if I can’t give him either?” Alyla looked down shyly. There was no need to remind Luke that her slave masters on forced a hysterectomy on her when she was only fourteen years old.

Luke smiled, “Adoption is always a possibility. Take it from someone who was adopted. It doesn’t matter if you have a child with your genetics, or someone else’s. A child is a child no matter where it comes from. And Lando would be thrilled any way you had one… but there’s something you have to do first to get there.”

“What’s that?”

“Talk to Lando,” Luke chuckled. “Ultimately, if you want a child, he’s going to have to help get you one, not me.”

“Yeah, I think Felicity would kill me if you helped out with that,” Alyla teased. “Thank you, Luke. You’re always so easy to talk to.”

“Well, when you have a family as loud as mine, you either learn to listen or yell louder.”

“Explains Felicity,” Alyla chuckled. “So… out of curiosity, when are you and Felicity planning on filling those empty bedrooms upstairs?”

“No, silly… the current pool is on whose Padawan you’re going to make Ben.”

“Dang it, Reine!”

Alyla laughed, “Come on, Luke, she’s from Canto Bight. What did you honestly expect?”

Luke sighed, “I know. You know, this is a very surreal conversation to be having.”

“Why’s that?”

“When we were born, a Jedi even thinking about having children would probably have gotten them thrown out of the Order… Now I, the Grandmaster, am constantly fielding complaints that I haven’t had children yet.”

He fully expected Alyla to laugh, but was surprised to see her face fall.

“Promise me you won’t treat children like the Old Jedi Order did, Luke,” Alyla’s voice was very muted. “Not the way the younglings were treated: torn away from their families and a lightsaber put in their hands at five years old. Not to keep of course, but still far too young to hold a weapon. Don’t treat them like Gavyn and I were treated.”

“Never, Alyla. You know I wouldn’t.” Luke sighed, “You know, I think about it sometimes, what would have happened to Leia and I if we had been born under the Old Jedi. If my father hadn’t done something drastic and tried with all his might to keep us from the Order. What would have happened if we were born Force Sensitive to our mother, and our father’s identity was hidden? We would have been Luke and Leia Amidala, taken from our mother, made into younglings. Maybe we would have been the Padawans of Obi-Wan and my father. Maybe we would have struggled not to let our bond lead to attachment.”

“It wouldn’t because they never would have let you know.”

Luke raised an eyebrow.

Alyla looked down at her now empty cup of tea, “What would have happened to you would be exactly what happened to Gavyn and I. They wouldn’t let you keep the name Amidala – far too recognizable – and they wouldn’t have acknowledged that you were siblings. That’s what they did to us. They named us and planned on never telling us we were brother and sister. We weren’t even given the same surname by the Order.”

“The Order named you?”

“We were abandoned at a hospital, Luke. The Order took custody and thus got naming rights, so they followed their traditions and gave us separate names. Why risk attachment when you can just not acknowledge the relationship. I didn’t start going by Kene until Gavyn and I were sold into slavery. I liked it better than the name they originally gave me.”

“How were you named? I’ve never heard of Jedi naming traditions.”

“It was simple: Clan name,” Alyla answered, referring to the practice of splitting Younglings into small classes, or ‘clans.’ “We were supposed to be in the Hawk Clan. Gavyn is a Coruscanti name meaning White Hawk.”

“And Kene? Were you two… eager?”

“We were a month old when Order 66 happened,” Alyla reminded. “Far too young to look particularly eager. No, that name came from the practice of naming children after popular Jedi of the time. Kene is a play on Kenobi.”

“No kidding. You guys are named after Obi-Wan?”

“Gavyn was. I was originally named Alyla Starkiller, after Aayla Secura and of course, Anakin Skywalker.”

“You were named after my father?”

“No thanks. I’ve already had two.”

Alyla laughed.

“I think I did too,” Luke admitted. “It’s hard to find someone I can talk so freely about children with. With everyone else there’s just so much… pressure.”

“I don’t mean to pry.”

“No, it’s alright, but I am curious about why you wonder.”
“The reason I ask, is you speak of children with such affection.” She placed a hand on his arm, “I know you want them, Luke, and you said it yourself, you and Felicity aren’t getting younger. Have you at least discussed the topic?”

“Oh course,” Luke nodded. “But we’ve been married for less than a year. We’re going to wait a little while before going on in with trying. But honestly, with my family’s track record, we have a better chance at pregnancy if we don’t want it, or it’s the absolute worse possible time to have a child. But yes, someday it’ll happen… Someday soon hopefully.”

Alyla grinned, “Well then, I’ll tell Reine to start the pool.”

Luke just laughed.

Felicity was lying in bed, reading a HoloNovel when Luke entered their bedroom. She looked beautiful as always, her soft brown hair spilling down her shoulders, wearing a simple purple nightgown, and face scrunched in concentration as she read.

Luke stood in the doorway, his right hand gripping the doorframe as he watched her with a smile on his face. His heart fluttered at the sight of her, spurred by the emotional discussion of family, fate, and children he had just had. It still took his breath away how much he loved Felicity Rhiaon.

After a few minutes, Felicity looked up, noticing him, “Hey.”

“Hey,” Luke grinned that goofy grin she loved so much.

“What’s with the grin?”

“Just…. Thinking.”

“About what?”

“How much I love you,” Luke entered the room, stripping off his shirt and casually tossing it in the hamper.

“I love you too,” Felicity smiled. She set aside her HoloReader in her bedside table drawer and watched him pick out a pair of sleep pants and take off his lightsaber belt. He sat down on the bed, and she wrapped her arms around his neck, hugging him from behind, “Anything in particular spurred these thoughts?”

“Just my conversation with Alyla,” Luke turned his head back stole a quick kiss before storing his saber in a special holder that sat on his bedside table – he slept closest to the door, so it was within reach sitting at the edge of the bed. He used the Force to stash his belt in the closet and begin unlacing his boots, feeling Felicity nuzzling her face into his back, “It just made me think about… things.”

“What kind of things?” Felicity ran her hand through his hair. She moaned as he stood and changed into his sleep pants, playfully reaching out to tease his bare skin between the time his old pants came off and new pants went on.

“Someone’s playful tonight,” Luke chuckled, turning around, ready to tend to his wife. He wrapped her in his arms and pulled her close, almost so she was sitting in his lap. Natural fingers teased the strap of her nightgown, “I love this nightgown on you.”

“You’re avoiding my question, Skywalker,” Felicity teased. “What thoughts did Alyla make you think? Hopefully nothing that would make me kill the both of you. That would be hard to explain to Lando.”

“Let’s be honest, should Alyla ever manage to get herself murdered by an irate member of my family… Han will be the one to call Lando.” Luke buried his face into her freshly washed hair, inhaling the familiar scent, “Have you been using my conditioner again?”

“It just makes my hair so soft,” Felicity moaned as he kissed the tender spot beneath her ear.

“Sounds like a deal,” Felicity laughed as they broke apart from each other.

It was an intimate scene, that moment in bed. Luke’s arms wrapped around Felicity’s waist, absentmindedly stroking her clothed spine scar. Felicity smiling in contentment, she hands resting on his bare pectorals. Their foreheads bowed together as they stared deep into each other’s eyes, love and happiness crackled in the air around them like electricity. The image could be used in dictionaries as the definition for love. No one could look upon that moment and not understand perfectly the depth of emotion that single image conveyed. It was simply a moment of pure love.

“So,” Felicity whispered, “what was it that Alyla made you think about?”

Luke reached out with his natural hand and stroked her bottom lip with his thumb, “Just… how happy you make me feel. When I was young and dreamed of what my life would be, I never even came close to imagining this. This… moment… This love. I truly, deeply love you, Felicity Rhiaon. I always have and always will.”

“I always will too,” Felicity leaned in like she was about to kiss Luke, but stopped herself. Luke could feel the air of her exhales tickling his lips. “And part of me, maybe wonders if… maybe I was always meant to.”

Luke cocked his head but said nothing.

“I still don’t believe in destiny, Luke,” Felicity said. “But if anyone could make me… it would be you. For how could I ever find someone so perfect for me?”

“I’m not perfect.”

“Neither am I, but when we’re together…”

Luke smiled as she let the sentence linger. There was nothing more needed to be said. He just revelled in the purity and sincerity of the moment. Luke loved this woman more than anything else in the world, and he couldn’t wait to see what life brought them next.

“I love you, Felicity Rhiaon,” Luke whispered. He cupped her face and stroked a thumb along her cheek, “Thank you for letting me spend my life with you.”

Felicity did not smirk, but playful sparks danced in her eyes, “Anytime.”

She leaned forward and kissed him. It was passionate and tender; their lips moving against each other’s in slow but familiar patterns. There was nothing demanding in their kissing, just pure expression of the feelings deep in their heart. It was not a battle or demand for dominance, there was no biting or painful sucking of the bottom lip, no tongues invading foreign territory, or wandering hands. Just two souls converging between interlocked lips.
“Luke,” Felicity moaned when they were forced to break for a proper take of air. One could only take in so many small breaths from short partings. She panted, resting her forehead back against him, “Oh, Luke. I love you.”

“I love you too, Felicity,” he panted.

Felicity took a deep breath, the darkness of lust burning in her eyes, but still something in that flame kept the desire pure. Luke could see her mentally preparing for something.

“Do you really love me?” Felicity’s voice held no doubt of his affections.

“Yes,” Luke breathed, ghosting his lips over hers, but Felicity pulled back at the last second.

He watched her give an ever so slight smirk, and she leaned back into a sitting upright position. Though he desired it, Luke knew better than to make a move to follow. Felicity had a plan, and Luke knew it was not one to thwart.

Revelling in the sight of his hungry eyes on her body, Felicity slid her thumbs under the straps of her nightgown and pulled it down, exposing her breasts.

Felicity smirked as Luke’s eyes ran over her bared body. She always did enjoy seeing the effect her body had on him.

“Then make love to me,” Felicity whispered.

Luke didn’t need to be asked twice. Immediately she was on her back, Luke yanking her nightgown the rest of the way off as his lips passionately reclaimed hers.

Suddenly he reared back.

“Just to be clear,” Luke said in a serious tone that was threatening to be undercut by his passionate panting. “This wasn’t my endgame when I entered the room. I wasn’t trying to trick you. Those were honest declarations of love.”

“Oh, I know,” Felicity said simply, propping herself up on her elbows.

“Yeah. That’s why I want to make love to you.”

“Okay. Just checking.”

They both laughed as Luke lowered her back down onto the bed. And the next thing Luke knew, his pants were on the floor, and his body was on Felicity’s.

Slow, steady breaths filled the room as they tenderly made love. The impassioned moans and vulgar cries that usually echoed off their bedroom walls made no appearance that night. That night wasn’t for crazed lust, or even to experience the sexual pleasure given to them by their partner. That night was just about love: pure love and the way they could express it in a physical fashion. The tempo of their lovemaking was set by those heavy moans and the squeaking of the bedframe as their hips rocked against each other.

The sight of Felicity Rhiaon that night was one of the most erotic images Luke would ever lay eyes on. Her hair cascading down her shoulders, her eyes squeezed shut, an almost wince on her face from magnificent pleasure, her skin pale in the moonlight, sweat glistening as she worked him hard, and her breasts gently bouncing with every thrust.

Felicity was atop Luke; he sprawled out on the bed, and her legs spread open across his hips. She was leaning forward slightly, her hands anchored flat upon his pectorals, steadying herself. Impaled upon his stiff erection, his cock glistening with her arousal, Felicity slowly rocked back and forth, stimulating them both as she set the pace of their lovemaking. Luke was buried to the hilt inside of her, and his testicles were hard and heavy, ready to burst. His body was eagerly responding to hers, building to the moment where he would empty himself inside of her womb and let nature take its course.

Felicity didn’t lift and drop herself atop him that night. While certainly athletic and flexible enough to pull it off, Felicity didn’t have the stamina to last very long in that action. She often needed Luke’s hands on her hips to guide the motion and keep her going, and even then it usually ended up with Luke thrusting up into her. So that night when Felicity had lowered herself onto Luke, she elected to keep him submersed inside her tight canal and just rock to stimulate them both. Additionally, this motion provided just the right angle to pleasure her clit, bringing her closer to climax than regular penetration could.

Luke’s hands didn’t have a set place as Felicity rode him, but he was always touching her somewhere. He refused to be the kind of lover who just took and never gave back. There was something arrogant and even insulting in the idea of his wife naked on top of him while he just lay there like some Lord and Master. Not while they were making love anyway.

He touched her: gripped her arms, clasped her hands with his own, stroked her abs, twirled a strand of hair, or palmed her breasts. For the most part, Luke elected to touch her breasts, hands resting on them in a mirror of how she rested the flats of her palms upon his chest. Of course, Luke would occasionally ring a thumb around one of the erect nipples or drag a finger across them. Fucking, having sex, or making love, Luke knew by now how much pleasure Felicity derived from her super sensitive nipples.

“I love you too, Sweetheart,” Luke’s eyes burned with love and passion as his wife rocked in the moonlight.

“Oh, Gods, I’m getting close,” Felicity groaned, throwing her head back as she rode him harder. Her panting was getting faster as she started to lose control.

“Just hang on, Sweetheart,” Luke pleaded. He could tell by the way her arm was shaking that her loss of control wasn’t her approaching climax, but rather running out of stamina. “I want to make you feel so good, Sweetheart.”

“Then hang on. Please just hang on a little longer, Felicity.”

The truth was that neither had climaxed yet that night, and with the amount of edging they had done, Luke knew he wouldn’t be able to come up with a round two. They had, of course, touched each other in different ways that night. Felicity had used her hands to prepare Luke for the main event, and Luke had spent a very long time using his mouth on her. But neither had been used to get the other person off, merely to observe their partner’s expression as they experienced the gift of pleasure.
Their actual action of coupling had also started differently with Luke and Felicity beginning in the missionary position, until Felicity had decided on a change of pace. While Luke wasn’t about to stop to glance at the clock, he had no doubt that they had been making love for nearly an hour. He was more than ready to finish off, but Felicity still needed a little push.

And if he was going to last, he was going to need to assert a little control.

“Felicity,” Luke sat up, his arm wrapping behind Felicity’s back automatically to prevent knocking her over.

She gasped and moaned as his mouth found her breasts and his natural hand wedged between their bodies to play with her clit.

“Just a little more,” he urged.

“Luke,” Felicity groaned, her arms shaking as she tried to hold herself upright.

He started to push her down back into the missionary position, but Felicity threw a hand behind herself, stopping him from forcing her down. Luke pulled his mouth away from her breasts and frowned. Felicity smiled and pressed a kiss to his swollen lips.

Then she wrapped her arms around his neck, and Luke understood. She was trying to assume the position of both of them sitting up – Felicity being seated in his lap – so they could hold each other close and look each other in the eye. It was the position Luke had always claimed to be the most romantic of all, and he gladly helped adjust her legs into a better stance.

“Oh, Luke,” Felicity whispered, looking deep into each other’s eyes as they embraced tenderly.

“Felicity,” Luke murmured her name upon her skin as he kissed and touched her tenderly. She felt so incredibly good around his cock, so tight and wet, and he never wanted the moment to end.

“Yes, Luke. Just like that,” Felicity moaned as he rocked up into her. Their bodies were glistening with sweat, making it harder to hold on to each other. “Please, Luke. Please finish me. I want it. I want it so bad. No Force powers, just touch me. I want your skin on mine as you make me cum.”

He pulled his lips away from her, and using two fingers to lift her chin, Luke looked deep into her eyes and said, “I love you, Felicity Rhiaon.”

Then he pulled her head forward, crushing her lips to his, and buried his hand between them to pleasure her enflamed clit.

“Felicity!” Luke cried out, ejaculating deep inside as her quim clenched his rod, milking him for every last drop.

They climaxed together, screaming the other’s name on their lips, as they stared deep into each other’s eyes. When the pair had calmed down, Felicity stayed upright in Luke’s lap, his softening cock still sheathed inside of her, unintentionally preventing his seed from spilling out of Felicity.
The lovers stayed in each other’s arms for a while, recovering from their passionate lovemaking and craving further intimate skin to skin contact. They smiled at each other, chuckled softly, and exchanged a few kisses as they stayed there intertwined.

Luke rested his forehead against hers, and whispered, “I love you, Felicity Rhiaon.”

Felicity smiled widely, that genuine loving smile so few got to see, “I love you too, Luke Skywalker.”

He grinned, kissed her one final time, and laid back on the bed, pulling her down with him. After withdrawing his cock from Felicity, Luke cradled her in his arms, holding her head against his chest so she could hear the soothing rhythm of his heart.

“That was amazing,” Felicity cuddled up into his embrace.

“It was,” Luke ran a lazy hand over her hips. “I don’t want this moment to ever end.”

“Who said it has to?”

“Then it won’t.”

Felicity sighed in contentment and Luke felt his eyelids getting heavier. He looked over at Felicity and saw her give a large yawn. It made Luke smile; he always thought the perfect way to fall asleep was naked, Felicity in his arms, after having made love to her. The perfect night would have the perfect ending…

Suddenly, Felicity lifted Luke’s arm off her and shifted to get out of bed.

“Where are you going?” Luke gently wrapped an arm around her waist to stop her. It was a grip she could easily get out of if she truly wanted to, and Luke would of course let her go if asked.

“To the fresher to clean up,” Felicity did not move away his hand. “We’ve had the discussion about UTI’s, Luke.”

Luke groaned and sat up, pulling Felicity into a tight hug, halting her progression out of the bed.

“Stay with me,” Luke placed gentle kisses up her neck. “I want to hold you.”

“And I want to be held,” Felicity relaxed into his embrace, “but if I stay here, I’m going to fall asleep in your arms.”

“Is that a terrible thing?” Luke pressed kisses to the back of her neck. “Come on. Just a while longer.”

“Luke,” she groaned, but there wasn’t much fight in her voice.

“Please?” he trailed his kissing down her back scar. “Worse comes to worse, you can skip the fresher. Come on, Felicity. Please? Just a few minutes.”

They lay together cuddling, desperately trying to fight off the sleep that was doing its hardest to claim them. Luke set the alarm on his bedside table while Felicity settled against him. Luke usually slept on his back, and Felicity on her left side, facing Luke, curled in to his embrace.

“But just a-” a large yawn cut off Felicity. “Little while.”
“Of course,” Luke smiled down at her, pulling the blankets over them. There was no need to dress that night. “A little while.”

“And I love you, Felicity Rhiaon Skywalker.”

Five minutes later, they were both fast asleep.

Perhaps if Luke hadn’t talked Felicity out of going to the fresher, none of it would have happened. It’s possible that if Felicity hadn’t fallen asleep in his arms that night, lives would have been saved. And maybe if Luke hadn’t been in that reflective mood, the history of the Galaxy would have gone a much different way.

But history did change as they slept together in their bed that night. They were peaceful; their naked limbs entangled lovingly with her head resting on his chest and his essence planted within her from their lovemaking. In complete bliss and utter ignorance, Luke and Felicity Rhiaon Skywalker changed the Galaxy.

For there was nothing now that could stop what happened at 2:39 AM.

---

4 Years, 8 Months, 10 Days

2:39 AM

The second the bedside clock flicked from 2:38 to 2:39, Luke shot upright in a panic.

Unfortunately, for Felicity, whose head was resting on his chest, this meant she was quite suddenly and quite violently flung off him, her head smacking into the corner of her bedside table.

“Ow! LUKE!”

“Shh!” Luke held out an arm, his eyes wide as he struggled to identify what had woke him. “Something’s going on.”

“What could possibly warrant you smacking my head against the bedside table? I’m fine, by the way. Thanks for asking.”

“Felicity, I’m truly sorry for hurting you, but please just give me a minute.”

She grumbled something about jerks named Skywalker next to him and turned onto her side so her back was to him.

Luke squeezed his eyes shut. Something had happened, something in the Force, but… what? Luke sat in the bed for a long time searching through the Force, trying to identify the problem… or whatever this was. While Felicity may have been upset at her rude awakening, Luke sensed that she was patiently waiting for him to figure it out and help him in anyway he might need her.

After a long stretch of silence, Felicity finally asked, “Luke, what’s going on?”

“A disturbance?”

“Not… quite. I don’t know, it feels… familiar. I’ve sensed something like this before.”
“Has someone entered the house?”

“No. That’s a disturbance.”

“Is it a vision?” Felicity suggested.

“No, those don’t wake me up,” Luke shook his head.

“I’m aware of that fact, Skywalker,” Felicity said pointedly. “You know, I sometimes dream I live in a better world. It’s exactly like this world, except my husband doesn’t sleep kick me when he gets visions or throw me into bedside tables because of non-disturbances in the Force. It’s a beautiful world. At least tell me I’m not bleeding, Luke.”

Luke looked at Felicity and tenderly touched the place that had hit the table, “No blood, but you might get a bump.”

“Well, that will be fun to explain to the others without making it sound like spousal abuse.”

“Don’t worry, the Jedi are used to it. Remember Obik’s broken arm last year? Reine did that to him when she had a vision and accidentally knocked him down a staircase.”

“You people really need to work on getting your visions under control before someone ends up dead. So, what the heck is this Force thing that woke you up?”

Felicity just stared at him, “Well, that’s specific.”

Luke pulled back the blankets and grabbed his sleep pants off the floor, “We should probably get up and investigate.”

“We? Luke, I may be on the Order’s payroll, but that’s for designing buildings, not Jedi sleuthing.”

“Fine, I’ll go by myself.”

“What?” Luke didn’t look back at her, too focused on the weirdness with the Force.

“Is this thing dangerous?”

“No. I don’t sense danger.”

“Is it affecting anything?”

“Not at the moment.”

“Is it going anywhere?”

“Doesn’t seem like it.”

A pillow smacked him in the face.

“Ow! Felicity!” Luke rubbed his face as Felicity put his pillow back down.
“Luke Skywalker, it is two o’clock in the Gods damned morning! Go back to sleep! We’ll figure it out later!” Felicity dramatically dropped back down on the mattress and turned her back to Luke.

He sighed and shook his head.

“Good night, Sweetheart,” Luke bent down and kissed the forming bump on her head. “I love you.”

“Love you too. Now go to sleep.”

And as Luke settled back down for sleep, he couldn’t help but wonder if he had only imagined something different in the Force.

Felicity and Luke did not know it at the time, but a change had happened in the Force. A very significant change for them. For though two people had climbed into the bed that night, in the morning three would get out.

Because at 2:39 AM, Rey Rhiaon Skywalker was conceived.

8:27 AM

“Sorry for hitting you with the pillow last night, Luke,” Felicity said in the morning as she brushed her teeth in their en suite fresher.

Luke was standing next to her, a towel wrapped around his waist, fresh from his shower as he performed his own morning routine.

“Sorry for knocking your head against the bedside table,” Luke winced as he saw the bump on his wife’s head. “Have you figured out what you’re going to say to people about it?”

“I’ll just blame it on rough sex,” Felicity spat out her toothpaste. “People honestly expect it between us at this point. And we did have sex last night.”

“Didn’t really get rough, though.”

“Luke, who is exactly going to ask for details?”

Luke opened his mouth.

“Other than Han?”

He closed it.

Felicity smirked, her eyes flicking down to the towel around his waist, “You are ridiculous, Skywalker, you know that?”

The modesty towel,” Felicity laughed. “For goodness’ sake, Luke, I saw you naked getting out of the shower before you put the towel on. I saw you naked getting into the shower. We had sex last night, during which I vividly saw and touched your nakedness. Heck, the first five days we were on Takodana for our honeymoon, we literally never put on clothing.”

“Well, if we had known Maz was going to walk in to check up on us during the fifth day, I’m sure we would have rethought that idea.”
“The point is,” Felicity wrapped her arms around his waist and fiddled with the hem of the towel, “you literally have nothing left to hide from me, Skywalker. Why hide the goods?”

Luke smirked, “Because I have the big meeting with the other Jedi today, and I can’t be late for it, so I decided to keep the towel on to fend you off from any nefarious plans.”

“Leave it to Luke Skywalker to refer to a blowjob as a nefarious plan,” Felicity shook her head. “You know calling it that only makes me want to do it more, just to mess with you?”

“Yes, I am familiar with my poor decision in choosing a wife.”

Felicity playfully smacked his chest, “I’m more than happy to withhold nefarious plans if you keep up those kinds of remarks.”

“No, you aren’t.”

“You want to play this game, Skywalker?”

“Oh, I know you’ll do it, but you won’t be happy about it. Remember the great beard disagreement?”

“I still can’t believe you managed to hold out for six weeks.”

Luke just shook his head, “So, it’s your day off today. Any plans?”

“Not really,” Felicity started to floss her teeth as Luke re-entered the bedroom. “You?”

“The meeting, some paperwork, and figuring out this whole change in the Force business.”

“You still sense it?”

“That’s so weird. And you don’t know at all what it is?”

“I think I do, but I just can’t figure out how I know it,” Luke confessed as he picked up the clothing off the floor. When it came to bedtime sex, Luke and Felicity had a strip now, clean up later rule. “I’ve definitely felt this before, but not this exactly. Something like it. It’s getting to be a little clearer though. Whatever it is, it’s taking root.”

“Taking root?” Felicity frowned.

“What happened last night was this thing becoming its own thing,” Luke explained, finding it hard to put into words. He bent down and picked up his pants off the floor. “It comes from parts of the Force, but it morphed and changed into something different. I was woken by the moment the things merged into one, and now it’s solidifying itself in the Force. Oh, this is so frustrating. I know I’ve sensed this before.”

That was when he realized Felicity was staring at him, or rather the pair of pants in his grasp. Her jaw was slightly agape and her face a little paler than it had been a moment ago.

“Are you okay?” Luke frowned as he placed his pants in the hamper.

Felicity blinked, “Oh? Yeah. Uh, fine. I’m fine.”

“Are you sure?”
“Of course I am. Just remembered something that I… never mind,” Felicity turned away from him.

Luke narrowed his eyes; something was definitely up, and Felicity seemed to have figured it out. Now if only he could.

“I’ll ask the others about it after the meeting,” Luke pulled his clothing from the closet and began to dress.

“Good. You should,” Felicity’s voice had a strange tone to it. She was silent for a moment, probably trying to gather courage or debate her next words. “Hey, Luke?”

“Yes?”

“Does this change… Have a colour?”

Luke raised an eyebrow, “Colour?”

“Like we have,” Felicity explained. “You know, in the Force? You’re sky blue, Han’s yellow gold, Leia’s navy blue, I’m crimson, Ben’s forest green. Does… does this have a colour?”

Luke frowned and reached into the Force, “Actually… now that you mention it… yeah, it does.”

“Really?”

“It’s faint but it’s there.”

“What… What colour is it?”

“Give me a second…” Luke closed his eyes and focused. “It’s… lilac.”

He opened his eyes to find Felicity staring at him in utter shock.

“Lilac,” Felicity said slowly. “So, it’s… purple?”

Felicity seemed to consider something for a moment, but then decided against saying it. Luke would later learn why Felicity had gotten so mysterious. She had put the pieces together: something changing in the Force being new but coming from something pre-existing. Something “merging” and then “taking root.” How Luke picking up the clothing they had discarded during the previous night’s lovemaking had been the thing that made it all click. How the colour lilac – a combination of Luke’s sky blue signature and Felicity’s crimson one – sealed the deal in her mind.

The answer was clear to Felicity: Luke Skywalker had gotten her pregnant.

…And Luke had no freaking clue.

“Nothing,” Felicity shook her head. “Uh, you should probably finish changing and get to your meeting. Do you need breakfast?”

“No, the meeting’s being held at Gavyn and Zena’s house. You know, she’s a surprisingly good cook. Gavyn… for your own safety, I beg you never to eat his cooking.”

“Wait, why is it being held at their house?”
“The Temple is being fixed for the water damage caused by that flood Ben, Miri, and Genko somehow managed to start. I’m still trying to wrap my head around how that happened.”

Felicity shot him a look, “Luke, you gave them lightsabers and left them alone with Lando Calrissian. What did you think was going to happen?”

“That Alyla would be able to keep them in line.”

“You really do live in your own world, don’t you?”

“Sometimes it’s better than this world.” Luke finished dressing and went over to give Felicity a kiss, “Have a good day. Sweetheart. Hopefully I can figure out this whole change in the Force thing. Maybe I’ll ask Alyla or Gavyn if they’ve ever encountered something like this.”

“I think asking Gavyn would be an excellent idea,” Felicity said more to herself than Luke. She kissed Luke and gave him a smile, “Have a great day, Sweetheart.”

“You too.”

Luke would later learn that the second he left the house, Felicity had Artoo search how long conception took place after sex.

4 Years, 9 Months, 8 Days

Luke and Felicity had returned to their apartment on Coruscant together for the first time since they had moved to Rornian. Originally, it was just supposed to be Luke going to Coruscant, attending to some Emissary business – Felicity had left the employ of Nils Arlos – but Luke insisted Felicity come when a week had gone by and she still hadn’t stopped throwing up every day.

He was concerned about this stomach bug she must have, though Felicity insisted that it wasn’t a stomach bug and he shouldn’t worry. Felicity had gone to see Doctor Kalonia about it, and Kalonia assured Luke it would be okay. Kalonia and Felicity were very secretive about her visit, and Luke told Felicity that she either had to tell him what was going on, or she had to come to Coruscant where he could rush her to a full hospital should something go wrong.

Felicity chose Coruscant.

It was the second day into their visit, and Luke arranged that they have lunch with the Solo family that afternoon. But that didn’t mean they were going to get lunch together. Leia was busy at her office in the old Coruscant Senate building, which also housed the Emissary office. Luke and Leia were going to get lunch together with Ben, who was spending the day tailing Luke to get some mini Jedi lessons in.

As for Han, Luke – concerned about Felicity’s wellbeing – decided to send him to the apartment to hang out with Felicity and care for her until Luke could get home. Luke hadn’t forewarned Felicity about this, as the thought only occurred to him about an hour after he left home. However, Han and Felicity were dear friends, so he knew neither would object to the arrangement.

So Luke was very confused when he got a comm call from an extremely excited Han insisting they all go out together for lunch.

Luke would later learn the series of events that had led up to that call.

That Felicity had discussed Luke’s disturbance in the Force with Zena Halcorr, the only other person she knew who had been pregnant with the child of a Force Sensitive. That Felicity and Zena had gone to Doctor Kalonia with the suspicions, who told them they would have to wait until the fetus was more than a day old before she could determine if one existed. That Kalonia didn’t keep pregnancy tests on hand in the Temple Village Medical Center – there weren’t many Jedi having kids in Temple Village, Rey being the very first birth among them – so she would have to add it to the requisitions list that Luke oversaw.

That Felicity hadn’t wanted to tip off Luke until she was sure she was actually pregnant, not wanting to get his hopes up like last time, and told Kalonia not to add the test to the list. That Felicity had held out until Luke’s trip to Coruscant and originally planned to secretly go off-planet when he was in Coruscant to get a pregnancy test. That she decided to take advantage of his offer to go to Coruscant so she could get a store bought pregnancy test.

That Han had inadvertently walked in on Felicity taking said test. That Han had been there to hold her hand as she waited for the results. That Han and Felicity hugged and celebrated when they read the test as positive. That Han had insisted Felicity immediately tell Luke, and forced his hand by setting up a lunch with the family when Felicity tried to get Han to shut up until Luke came home that night. That Han had dragged Felicity to Dex’s Diner – for what other restaurant could be more appropriate – to meet their family.

But at the time, all Luke knew as he walked into the diner with Leia and Ben was that Han was overly excited and Felicity was grumpy. Additionally, Han refused to let Felicity move from her spot, forcing her to sit next to him on one side of the booth while Ben, Leia, and Luke sat on the other side. He insisted that Luke and Felicity sit on the end as you never know when you might suddenly need to get out of the booth.

Throughout lunch, Han kept dropping not so subtle hints about Felicity’s condition, but Felicity wasn’t willing to play.

“Knock it off, Loud Mouth Solo,” Felicity refused to look up from her menu even though Dex hadn’t changed it in years.

“Come on, Fliss,” Han nudged her with his elbow. “Just tell them.”

“Don’t make me smother you with that stupid vest.”

“Hey, the vest is not stupid! And would you give it up already? Just tell Luke.”

“It’s nothing!” Felicity snapped. “I’ll tell you later. Maybe when we don’t have an audience.”

“Ow!” Leia cried. “Felicity, did you just kick me?”

“Sorry, thought it was Han,” Felicity shot Han a dirty look.

“Okay, seriously,” Leia demanded. “What’s going on? Do you have some sort of news?”

“Are you leaving Uncle Luke?” Ben’s face lit up.

Han pointed at Ben, “Wipe that grin off your face, she’s not going anywhere.”

“Ben, we’ve talked about this,” Leia chastised. “You will not deride your aunt. This is your last warning. Do it again, and there will be consequences.”
The ten-year-old Ben crossed his arms, slumped back in his seat.

“She’s not my aunt,” Ben muttered.

Leia narrowed her eyes, “We’re having a talk when we get home.”

Ben shot Felicity a dirty look. Felicity just shot him a sickly sweet grin and shrugged.

“Don’t think we’re done with you,” Luke said to his wife. “What’s going on? Why is Han so worked up about you?”

“I’m just really glad to be fortunate to have such a wonderful family that I love so much.” Han grinned at Felicity, “The old members… and the new ones. Ow! Stop kicking me!”

“Stop making me kick you,” Felicity simply said.

“Oh for the love of-” Han rolled his eyes. “Fine, you know what, if you don’t tell him, I’m going to.”

Felicity scoffed, “You wouldn’t dare.”

“Alright then.” Han turned to his brother-in-law, “Luke, Fliss is pregnant.”

It was hard to tell who was more surprised: Luke at Han’s declaration… or Han, when Felicity tackled him.

Felicity let out a laugh, her features softening, tears welling in her eyes, “You were wondering about the disturbance in the Force, well…”
She rested a hand on her stomach.

“You’re pregnant,” Luke whispered, a smile plastered on his face as he processed the life changing news.

“Oh my gosh, Felicity,” Leia had a hand on her mouth and tears in her eyes. “Felicity, I don’t even know what to say… except your uterus is about six inches lower down.”

“Oh,” Felicity moved her hand lower, so it was more over her pelvis. “Thanks.”

“I’m going to be a father,” Luke’s jaw hurt from smiling wider than he had even before. Excitement filled his voice as he placed his natural hand next to Felicity’s, over the area of her uterus where a miracle was taking place. His hand shook as he realized that underneath his palm was his child. “We have a child.”

“Yes, we do,” Felicity started to cry happily.

Joy exploded in the Force. Luke didn’t even comprehend what happened next, but Felicity was in his arms as he spun her around, laughing, crying, kissing her as his heart was overwhelmed with joy.

“We’re having a baby! I’m going to be a father!” Luke cried out, not caring at all about the other diners in the restaurant. Dex would come by shortly and discover the happy news, giving them their meals on the house.

But nothing else mattered in that moment as he held Felicity. She was pregnant. His wife was pregnant. He had made a child with Felicity Rhiaon. Luke Skywalker was finally going to be a father.

“Alright, alright, I do need to breathe, Luke,” Felicity pulled back from him a little, but the joy in her eyes and voice did not leave her. She placed a hand on her stomach, and the other on Luke’s cheek, “You don’t want to crush the baby, Skywalker.”

“No need to thank me, Luke,” Felicity laughed. “After all, you did have a hand in making this baby.”

“I can’t believe this… We’re having a baby.”

“Yes, we are.”

Luke pulled her head forward and crushed another kiss to her lips. Finally, all of her dreams had come true.

“Alright, break it up,” Han called. He and Leia were getting out of the booth, “You’ve had your fun. It’s time to let Uncle Han and Aunt Leia celebrate.”

“Aunt Leia,” Leia grinned, pulling Luke in for a hug. “I can’t believe you two are having a baby. If you told me years ago that my childhood best friend would have a baby with my twin brother, I would have called you crazy.”

“I think more for the twin brother part than the best friend part,” Luke laughed as they broke apart.
“Congratulations, Kid, I was starting to think you didn’t have it in you,” Han hugged Luke as Leia hugged Felicity. Luke hadn’t noticed yet that Ben wasn’t around.

“You know me, Han, slow and steady wins the race.”

“Yeah, and that’s why Leia ended up with me and not you.”

“You say that like it’s a bad thing.” Suddenly a horrible thought occurred to Luke, “Oh no.”

“What?” Felicity asked.

“Han, promise me you won’t tell the baby about the accidental incest.”

“Why in the galaxy would I promise that?” Han asked. “I look forward to thoroughly embarrassing you to your kid, Kid.”

“Okay, if I’m a father, you can’t keep calling me Kid.”

“Watch me, Kid,” Han smirked. “Don’t worry, I won’t call your kid, Kid, so we can avoid confusion.”

“That wasn’t really my concern about that.”

“I know, Kid,” Han chuckled. “But don’t think this baby isn’t going to get a nickname. This family has a proud history of nicknames.”

Felicity narrowed her eyes, “And what exactly are you going to call my child, Loud Mouth Solo?”

Luke could have sworn for a moment he saw fear in Han’s eyes. If Felicity Rhiaon was ever going to follow through on her threat to punch someone in the throat, it would be while pregnant.

And from that day forward, Han would always call Luke “Kid” and Rey “Kiddo.”

Luke couldn’t stop kissing Felicity when they got home. Over and over he kissed her as they made their way to the couch. Their lips were only parted occasionally for a brief “thank you” or “I love you.”

When they got to the living room, and Felicity sat on the couch, immediately, with the gentlest of touches, Luke pressed her body to lay down. Hovering over her, Luke trailed kisses down her lips, neck, collarbone, the valley of her breasts, the length of her torso, and to the place of her womb. Without a word, Luke pulled up Felicity’s shirt to expose her midriff, and placed tender kisses over the spot where their child was contained.

“I love you, I love you so much,” Luke whispered, though he didn’t know whom he was addressing: Felicity or the baby. “I love you both so much.”

“I love you too,” Felicity ran a hand through Luke’s hair as he showered their child with kisses. “I’m sorry Han couldn’t let me tell you in private. He was just so excited.”

“Felicity, finding out in the company of my family, in the restaurant I fell in love with you is the perfect way to find out. How did Han know?”

“Walked in on me taking the test. I guess that’s now, what? Three important life moments he’s performed for us?"

“I still can’t believe Han actually locked us in a closet to resolve our first real fight.”

“I still can’t believe you actually ever wanted me to learn how to fly a ship,” Felicity smirked. “And that you got that mad when I said no.”

“Yeah, when our child grows up, I’m teaching it to fly,” Luke said. He grinned at the thought of a little girl or little boy sitting in his lap, fascinated by the controls of his X-Wing. “I just can’t believe we’re having a baby. How long have you known?”

“The morning I’m pretty sure I got pregnant.”

Luke frowned, “You mean the day I started sensing the change in the Force?”

Luke scowled, “That’s… odd.”

“How so?”

“If you’re right, I’ve sensed this baby since the exact moment of conception. It’s had a presence in the Force since its conception.”

“Well, don’t bring it up during any reproductive rights debates.”

“Felicity, you don’t get it,” Luke said. “I didn’t sense Ben in the Force until Leia was three months pregnant.”

She frowned, “Actually, Zena did mention that she didn’t sense Miri until four months, and Gavyn didn’t sense her until six.”

Something heavy weighed on Luke, “That’s very unsettling.”

“Why? What does this mean?” Felicity asked.

“From what I’ve gathered, if a Force Sensitive biologically produces another Force Sensitive, they’ll sense the baby sooner from their connection, but the timing will depend on both parties’ amount of power.”

Felicity sat up and stared at him, “Luke… In Basic?”

“The baby is Force Sensitive… and very powerful.”

Luke could feel the jolt of fear that coursed through the Force from Felicity.

“How powerful are we talking?” Felicity nervously rubbed her belly. Luke’s heart fluttered at the sight of Felicity already unconsciously performing such a protective act for their baby.

“Well, I’m very powerful myself, so that sped things up, and so did our relationship of father and child,” Luke explained, “but I would wager that this baby is going to be somewhere on my level of power. Definitely stronger than Ben, if I can sense it from the moment of conception. Which means, this baby is in a lot of danger.”
“Would Snoke want—”

“I wouldn’t be surprised if he already knew and was plotting to take it.”

He clasped her hands in his and looked her straight in the eyes, “No one is going to touch our child. Not Snoke. Not the First Order. Not Cade Ren and his lackeys. No one. Alright? We’re going to fight this together. Promise?”

She smiled, “Promise. I’ll die before I let the First Order have the baby.”

Luke laughed, “Hopefully things won’t need to go to that extreme.”

“So,” Felicity sighed, her hand trailing down to stroke her belly, “I guess there goes my hopes that maybe I’d luck out and get a Non-Sensitive child. I guess Han and I don’t get a new member in our club.”

“Well, maybe the next one,” Luke chuckled. He kissed her as his hands started roaming suggestively.

Felicity playfully shoved him back, “Oh no, you don’t. You just put one baby in me. You gotta wait at least eight months to get started on the next.”

“Who knows? Maybe it’ll be twins.”

“Luke, we’ve had this discussion. Just no.” Felicity paused, “Wait… wouldn’t you have sensed if it were two? You said you only sensed one colour.”

“You’re right, I did.” Luke smiled and placed his natural hand over Felicity’s so they were both caressing their unborn child. “Lilac.”

“Lilac. Purple.”

“Sky blue and crimson mixed together,” Luke finally understood her odd question the morning the baby had been conceived.

“That was the moment I was certain,” Felicity confessed. “I knew I was carrying your child.”

Luke bent down and pressed another kiss to her stomach, “Thank you. It’s the greatest gift anyone could ever give me.”

“I would return the thanks with the typical anytime, but I think I’m going to have a very different opinion in eight months.”

“Just promise me you’ll let me live to see this child.”

“I make no such promise.”

Luke laughed, his fingers stroking her stomach, “What does it feel like? To have the baby inside of you?”

“Honestly,” Felicity shifted, “I don’t feel it yet. I feel the effects of it – whoever decided to call it ‘morning’ sickness is a liar and a bastard – but not the baby itself. But I’ll try to describe it when I do. Also, we really have to come up with another term than ‘it’ for the baby. Feels so impersonal, like we’re trying to detach.”
“Agreed.” Luke sighed, “I wish I could feel the baby like you will.”

“Can’t you through the Force?”

“Well, I see the baby’s signature, but I don’t see it.”

“What did I just say about calling our child it?”

Felicity smiled, running her hand again through Luke’s hair, “So you can’t see more? What the baby looks like? The sex? Anything?”

“Well… Let me try.”

Luke frowned in concentration and focused on the lilac signature and the body containing his progeny. His hand no longer caressed Felicity’s stomach, but rather laid firmly atop it as he focused on her womb underneath and what it therein contained. He pushed hard into Force to follow this signature into a presence that once was a part of his own.

He felt something familiar in the Force, something that had once belonged to himself, but was blended with another presence familiar and dear to him. It was a piece of Felicity’s presence mixed with his own, and yet the blending of the two felt unique, its own separate identity in the Force.

“I think I can see the baby,” Luke closed his eyes to focus more intently.

“Tell me what you see,” Felicity softly urged. Luke always adored when she asked to share in the Force with him.

“I see… Darkness.”

“Darkness?”

“Nothing to worry about,” Luke assured her. “The world is filled with Darkness, for without Darkness there is no Light.”

“Luke, I think my morning sickness is creeping up on me. Can we skip the philosophical musing and get to the point before I go make friends with the fresher again?”

“Sorry.” Luke returned his focus to the Force, “I… I see something.”

“What do you see?”

“It’s small, not much, but…”

“But?”

“In the Darkness I see it, our baby.”

Luke heard Felicity’s sharp intake of breath, “You do? What do they look like? Can you see how big they are? If we’re having a boy or a girl?”

“Nothing like that,” Luke shook his head. “In fact, it doesn’t even look like a baby at the moment. I don’t think I’m seeing into your uterus, just the baby’s image in the Force.”

Using the Force, he cautiously reached out and gently touched his own presence to the baby’s. The baby recoiled, scared by the unfamiliar sensation in the Darkness, but after a moment of consideration it returned to its original spot. Luke reached out and again touched it ever so slightly. This time the baby embraced it, clumsily bumping back against him.

The baby didn’t know what was going on, but it could sense the safety and love it would find in Luke. It recognized its origin in Luke, and trusted him. This act Luke would perform many times throughout the pregnancy, familiarizing the baby to himself before even exiting the womb. When Rey Rhiaon Skywalker was placed in Luke Skywalker’s arms eight months later, she would already fiercely know and love her father.

“So, what does the baby look like then?” Felicity asked. “Come on, Luke, tell me.”

“A tiny light?” Felicity sounded amused.

“Yes… The baby right now is just a small light in the Darkness… a ray of hope and light.”

Luke opened his eyes and found Felicity smiling radiantly at him.

“A ray?” Felicity grinned.

He smiled and clasped her hand, “Our ray.”

“Our little ray.” She rubbed her belly, “Hello little ray.”

Luke paused, “I like that.”

“What?” Felicity looked up.

“What do you mean?”

“You didn’t want us to call our child it or the baby… Why don’t we call it Ray?”

“Isn’t it a little masculine? I don’t know about Tatooine, but on Coruscant, Ray is a boy’s name short for Raynar.”

“Well, if it’s a girl we can change the aurek to an esk,” Luke suggested. “Besides, it’s just a nickname until we figure out a proper name. What do you think?”

The baby’s presence pushed back at him insistently, though Luke doubted the baby understood what was being said. It probably was just excited to play with its new ability.

“Well?” Felicity asked.

“Then for now, we’ll call the baby Ray.”

In that beautiful moment either Luke nor Felicity dreamed how important the name Rey would soon
Luke stood in the line of family members the guests were lining up to give their condolences to. Leia and her boys stood to his left, her being the youngest grandchild and ergo at the end of the line, while Felicity was on Luke’s right.

Luke had no idea how the man had known his grandmother, but it touched him to see how many people loved Jobal Naberrie. At 92, Jobal’s death hadn’t been a surprise – she had been sick when Luke was introduced to her, and things had gone very downhill in the past five years – but it did hurt horribly.

“Thank you,” Luke clasped the man’s hands. “We appreciate it.”

A woman Luke figured must be the man’s wife said, “It must be so difficult to deal with death when you’ve been looking forward to the introduction of a new life.”

Luke clenched his jaw; he had wanted so badly for his grandmother’s death not to be overshadowed by Felicity’s newly protruding bump. She had tried her best to dress in a way that would hide her pregnancy, but with the way the media had plastered the joyful news everywhere after the news had leaked – Luke was almost positive that Ben was behind it, and had done it to get reporters to annoy Felicity – it was hard not to acknowledge the fact that Luke Skywalker was going to be a father.

Felicity touched Luke’s arm, and after sharing a meaningful look with Luke, she spoke on their behalf, “We are delighted by the news, but our baby will be here in six months… My grandmother-in-law will not, and so we have decided to let the focus be on her for today.”

“Of course,” the woman nodded.

“Wow, Fliss, nice save,” Han looked very uncomfortable in his black, formal attire. Leia hadn’t managed to get him into a suit, but even the business casual look she had talked him into appeared to be too stuffy for Han. “And here I thought Leia was the political one.”

“Must I remind you all again that I grew up in a very political environment?” Felicity shifted, looking even more uncomfortable than Han. Her morning sickness had started to phase out as she approached the second trimester, but staying on her feet for very long was getting harder. “I was Leia’s assistant, had Bail Organa as my pseudo-guardian, my father was a high-ranking Imperial official, heck Vader and Palpatine personally helped plan Brendan’s funeral.”

“Maybe don’t talk about those two today, Fliss,” Leia eyed her mother’s mausoleum nearby.

A new chamber had been constructed a few years back that was closed off to the public. It would be the future burial sites for the Naberrie family so they could be laid to rest with Padmé, as Jobal had just been.

“You know what’s weird?” Han said. “I think this is the first time one of us has actually been able to have a funeral for a family member since Fliss with Brendan.”

“Han,” Leia chided.
“No, I think he’s right,” Felicity carelessly added. “Alaric and Bail got… Death Starred. Owen and Beru were… well. And Padmé was… you know. I don’t think either of you attended that. Han, we don’t even know where his family is. Is there anyone in this family that got laid to rest by one of us?”

Luke’s heart lurched as he remembered the pyre he lit on Endor, “Yes… there was.”

A very heavy silence fell on the group.

“…Right,” Han eventually said.

No one pried. While the family did know that Luke had burned Anakin Skywalker, they didn’t speak of it. No one outside of the family knew that Anakin had been laid to rest, Luke having lied that Vader was destroyed with the Second Death Star. They knew if the resting place of Darth Vader was revealed to the public, it would be destroyed. Their feelings on Vader aside, Han, Leia, and Felicity loved Luke so much that they allowed him to have peace for his father.

Soon enough, the line of mourners ended and everyone had started to make their way to the reception at the Palace of Theed. Padmé and Pooja’s roles of Senator, along with Luke and Leia’s celebrity status had given Jobal a high enough profile to earn her reception at the palace.

Luke was about to make his way to the reception when his Aunt Sola stopped him.

“Dad is still inside,” Sola explained. “He’s a little… I figured he could use someone to talk to, and he’s always so open with you. Would you mind-”

“Of course,” Luke nodded. He looked to Felicity, who he was arm in arm with, “This might be a little while. Do you mind going with Aunt Sola and Uncle Darred?”

“Sure,” Felicity unhooked her arm from Luke’s. “I’ve been wanting to talk balusters with him anyway.”

“I’m always up for balusters,” Darred laughed, taking Felicity’s arm.

Luke smiled and rubbed Sola’s shoulder, “I’ll bring Granddad along shortly.”

“Thank you,” Sola had a pained smile.

She was trying so hard to keep things together, and Luke’s heart ached. It was bad enough that he couldn’t exactly relate to losing his mother – losing Beru and Owen to violent murder was much different than one parent to a long illness – but it made it so much worse when he thought about his mother’s relation to Sola.

He found his grandfather standing at Jobal Naberrie’s closed casket. Ruwee said nothing, but the tears in his eyes spoke volumes.

Slowly, Luke walked forward and settled at Ruwee’s side. He didn’t say anything, but laid a hand upon his grandfather’s shoulder.

As the only male grandchild, Ruwee had latched onto Luke immediately upon introduction. He had always said that after a wife, two daughters, three granddaughters, two granddaughters-in-law, and a great-granddaughter, it was good to finally have some male blood in the family. Darred, Han, and Ryoo’s husband, Jagrav could only do so much, and Ben had very little interest in the Naberrie side of the family. Luke had filled that yearning for a boy to pass his legacy onto that Ruwee had craved for years – though he adored all of his girls more than life itself.

It was why Sola had asked Luke to speak to Ruwee, as well as his helpful ability to sense emotions in the Force. Peering into Ruwee, Luke felt nauseous at the overwhelming grief his grandfather felt for his grandmother. Ruwee’s heart was utterly broken.

“I’m so sorry, Granddad,” Luke finally spoke. “She was a great woman.”

“The greatest woman I’ll ever know,” Ruwee smiled, his hand running across the smooth wood of the coffin. “And that’s saying something considering our family.”

“I wish I had known her longer,” Luke’s words were honest.

“I knew her for seventy years, and somehow that doesn’t feel like enough.”

“I can’t imagine what you’re going through. If I ever lost Felicity…”

“Pray that you won’t have to find out,” Ruwee said simply. “Jobal is everything to me. It’s impossible to imagine how I’m going to live without her. Though, I suppose with my age… At 93, I won’t have to live very long without her.”

Luke swallowed hard, tears welling in his eyes. After so many years of searching, he had found his family, and just like his father, Luke was going to lose them far too soon.

“I’m glad I got to meet her,” Luke said. “She was so sick. Always in so much pain.”

“She’s a fighter,” Ruwee gave a small smile. “It’s where your mother got it. She fought so hard to hang on just a little longer, long enough to see it.”

“See what?”

“You and your sister. For the day you would come home to us.”

Luke frowned, but didn’t say anything.

“She was always certain that Padmé’s baby couldn’t have been lost. She knew out there somewhere she had a grandchild waiting to come home. I remember the day Ryoo came home and told us that Luke Skywalker had just joined the Rebellion. She wanted us to reach out to you so much, but we kept our distance. It killed her to not go to you, especially after the war.”

“I’m not mad at the family,” Luke assured him. “I understand why you worried about my mother’s relationship with my father becoming common knowledge. I don’t blame you for not coming forward.”

“It hurt Jobal so much to sit back and let it happen,” Ruwee sighed. “She would clamour to get her hands on every piece of news about you and your sister. She cried so hard when she saw Leia’s wedding photos, and Ben’s birth announcement. Jobal always said that we needed to be around for your wedding and child. To be there where Padmé couldn’t. She knew one day you would come home to us, so she fought hard and saw that through.”

Luke felt tears prick his eyes as he realized that his grandmother’s sickness had started taking a turn for the worse after meeting him. She truly had held out to meet him, to share in those firsts that her daughter should have cherished. Jobal barely made it through Luke and Felicity’s engagement, but made sure to dance with her grandson on his wedding night. And once she heard the news that her daughter was going to be a grandmother via Luke, Jobal had finally allowed herself to give in to the inevitable and quickly passed away.

“Granddad…” Luke said slowly. “Felicity and I have been talking about something. We’re thinking about maybe naming the baby Jobal if it’s a girl.”

Ruwee smiled, but shook his head, “I’m touched by the gesture, but you don’t need to do it. If it’s a girl and you must name it after someone, give her the name of the woman who raised you, Luke. Jobal would understand.”

“My word of advice, Luke, don’t name your child after someone. It gets confusing enough when someone says Padmé and I don’t know if they’re talking about my daughter or Ryoo’s.”

“I’ll take it into consideration.”

They fell back into a comfortable silence, allowing themselves to be lost in the memory of Jobal Naberrie.

“Granddad,” Luke said after a while, “is there anything I can do for you?”

Ruwee took a deep breath, “Promise me something, Luke.”

“Anything.”

“Promise me that you’ll cherish every single second you have Felicity.”

Luke smiled, “I will Granddad. I promise I will.”

5 Years, 7 Days

“What does it feel like?” Luke asked as his hand rested on her protruding bump.

“I’m not sure,” Felicity shifted on the bed. “How does one describe the feeling of a human living inside of them?”

“I don’t know, but I can offer the reverse.”

Felicity raised an eyebrow.

“Because I was inside a tauntaun?” Luke reminded, but the joke fell flat. “Never mind.”

It was their nighttime ritual. Even though it would be a while yet before Luke could feel the baby move, Felicity had been feeling it for weeks. To compensate, Luke had started to feel the baby through the Force every night, familiarizing its presence with his. Sometimes if he tried really hard, he could see a flash of the baby. Not much but sometimes a nose, or a strand of brown hair.

“How about we discuss baby names?” Luke suggested.

“We don’t even know the sex yet, Luke,” Felicity pointed out.

“Yeah, but our little Ray of light needs a name… and besides, going by what I’ve felt in the Force… I think it’s a boy.”
“A boy?” Felicity grinned. She looked absolutely radiant, but she couldn’t help cracking a joke. “Great, Leia and I continue to be outnumbered.”

“There’s always next time,” Luke laughed, leaning over to kiss her. Lazily in the background, Luke was getting closer to the baby in the Force, “Now, I know it’s out there, but if it is a boy, I was thinking we could name it-”

“You say Anakin, and you’re never seeing this baby,” Felicity warned.

“Never mind then.” Luke paused, “You know, I’m getting a pretty clear picture tonight. Maybe I can see something more about Ray.”

“Maybe it’s because Ray knows his mommy already has the perfect name picked out. I’m surprised we even need to discuss names. Clearly we’re going to name it Brendan.”

Luke was silent.

“Look, I like the name-”

“Luke!”

“But my nephew is named Ben,” Luke pointed out.

“What does that have to do with anything?” Felicity snapped.

“Ben and Bren?”

“So, we wouldn’t call him Bren.”

“I don’t think so, Felicity.”

Subconsciously, Luke noted the baby’s picture was getting clearer. Was that hazel eyes?

“Luke, are you seriously telling me I’m not allowed to name my son after my murdered brother?” Felicity exclaimed.

“And I can’t name him after my father?” Luke shot.

“Your father sliced me down the spine! The worst thing my brother ever did to you was flirt with your sister!” Felicity winced and grabbed her stomach. “Oh great, and now he’s kicking pretty hard.”

“Settle, Ray, settle,” Luke whispered, running a hand over his wife’s bump. He could sense the little girl’s distress in the Force, “I’m sorry. She can sense in the Force that we’re arguing.”

Felicity froze, “…She?”

Luke looked up, “What?”

“You said she,” the grin was back on Felicity’s face.

Luke’s patented goofy smile split his face as he realized his own words, “Yeah… I did. I can see her more clearly now… It’s a girl, Felicity.”

“A girl,” Felicity whispered in amazement. Tears filled her eyes, “We’re having a girl.”
She started to laugh, and Luke couldn’t help but join her. With joyous tears shining in their eyes, Luke and Felicity laughed and kissed and held each other, reveling in the news of their forthcoming daughter.

“We have to call Han and Leia right now,” Felicity said after a few jubilant minutes. “We have to tell them it’s a girl!”

“No,” Felicity laughed, “because now Han owes me ten bucks.”

5 Years, 1 Month, 3 Days

The Millennium Falcon was filled with the sound of weapons being set and readied. The charging of power cells, the buzz of lightsabers, and the cocking of blasters. The Falcon was absolutely filled to the brim, the entire cavalry having been called when word got out that the First Order had kidnapped the five months pregnant Felicity Rhiaon Skywalker.

Without a second’s hesitation, the rescue party had clamoured to Rornian to go after Felicity. Luke Skywalker, Leia Organa, Han Solo, Chewbacca, Diego Nalto, Wedge Antilles, the entire remaining Rogue Squadron, Alyla Kene, Lando Calrissian, Gavyn Kene, Zena Halcorr, Reine Agim, Coria Pellis, Obik Kenu, Kes Dameron, Ryoo Naberrie and her husband Jagrav, Nils Arlos, and even Ji-Dan, Gunner, and Riz’s children had gotten in on the fun.

“You all have your instructions,” Leia addressed the crowd. “According to our information, this base is a complex arrangement with eight separate containment cell blocks. The main hallway divides in two, each of those hallways divide in two, and each of those divide in two, leaving eight blocks. Wedge will stay back and guard the ship with Rogue Squadron and the legacy Rogues.”

“Don’t let her get a scratch,” Han warned.

Leia continued, “When we get inside, Han, Chewbacca, Ryoo, Jagrav, Alyla, Lando, Coria, and Nils will go left. Zena, Gavyn, Reine, Obik, Diego, Kes, Luke, and myself will go right. Left team, split into Han, Chewbacca, Alyla, and Lando to the right, with Ryoo, Jagrav, Coria, and Nils to the left. Han and Chewie will take the next right, Alyla and Lando their left. Ryoo and Jagrav, right. Coria and Nils left.”

“When you find her, call for backup immediately,” Han ordered. “Jedi will go on the offense, everyone else, hang back and use your blasters – or bowcaster – as a range weapon. And whatever you do, do not shoot Fliss.”

“If this devolves into a hostage situation,” Luke continued, “wait for my orders. That means both if Fliss is the hostage, or any of us here gets taken hostage. We do not want any of us to get hurt.”

“Alright, let’s show the First Order who’s boss!” Ryoo cried.

Everyone cheered and went back to making the last few adjustments. Han and Chewie ducked back into the cockpit to check on everything.

“Danka,” Luke muttered a Huttese swear as he checked over his blaster. “Does anyone have an extra gas cartridge? I forgot to bring a backup.”

It was true. Last minute babysitting arrangements was the reason their numbers weren’t slightly higher. Ben was left at home with the Droids, Miri Halcor-Kene had been left with Tyla – who frankly was happy to have an excuse not to come as she didn’t find Felicity someone worth facing the First Order over – and Ryoo’s sister, Pooja had stayed back home with her wife Kashi to watch Ryoo’s daughter, Padmé.

“It’s okay, Poe’s with my dad,” Kes waved off. “I’m happy to come save Fliss. She had my back when we were trapped in that Imperial Work Camp, and I know what it’s like to lose your wife to the First Order.”

“Shara would be proud of all your contributions to the Resistance,” Leia placed a hand on the bulky man’s shoulder.

“Thanks,” Kes gave a bittersweet smile.

“What I don’t get is why Fliss got taken in the first place,” Diego said. “I mean, I know she’s a pain in the ass to them, especially Phasma, but… kidnapping worthy?”

“They want the baby,” Luke answered plainly, trying to keep the edge from his voice. “Snoke knows that she’s going to be extremely strong with the Force, so he wants her; to train and corrupt her to the Dark Side.”

“We’re not going to let that happen, Luke,” Lando said as he was bent down, helping Alyla strap a hidden viro knife around her thigh.

With the glare Gavyn was giving, Luke hoped for Lando’s sake that Alyla was wearing something underneath the skirt Lando clearly had full view up.

“Yeah, I’ll be dead before the First Order manages to get their hands on your little girl,” Alyla nodded.

“Five minutes to touchdown,” Han announced from the cockpit.

The rescue of Felicity Rhiao Skywalker from the First Order didn’t go quite how Luke had pictured it would happen. Sure there was the expected exchanging of blasts and violence between the group and the Stormtroopers protecting the entrance of the base. However, not even half of the rescue party had made it off the ship when Luke – who had made it almost to the entrance with Han, Leia, Diego, Chewie, and Kes – heard a sudden commotion.

Blasts and shouts came from just beyond the doorway, and Felicity shot out the entrance, blaster in hand, running with a comedic slight waddle, pursued by a legion of Stormtroopers.

“Hey, Sweetheart,” Felicity casually zipped past Luke as if it were the easiest thing in the Galaxy to break herself out of prison and outrun a legion of Stormtroopers by herself, while she was five months pregnant no less. She screamed to the stunned crowd of rescuers, “Haul ass!”
The group near the door froze in their tracks, and stared at each other in disbelief.

“Oi! Loud Mouth Solo and company!” Felicity called back as she raced past the equally confused Reine and Obik. “I’m currently outrunning all of you, and technically I’m two people right now! Move it! I would like my daughter to grow up with a father!”

That knocked Luke into his senses, and quickly he and his group were tearing back towards the ship.

“Back to the ship!” Luke ordered as the rescue party finally managed to get a move on again.

It was definitely a confusing several minutes, but after a disjointed scramble, soon enough everyone was back on the ship, flying back to safety. And everyone was just staring at Felicity as she hugged and kissed the equally confused Luke.

“What?” Felicity looked around, sounding completely unphased as she pulled out of Luke’s embrace.

“Nothing,” Reine spoke. “Just… wow.”

“Yep, that sums it up nicely,” Obik nodded.

“I’m almost disappointed,” Lando said. “I was hoping for a little more action than that.”

“Oh, I think you’ve had plenty of action with my sister today,” Gavyn muttered.

“Gavyn!” Alyla elbowed him in the ribs.

Lando just smirked.

“So… you’re okay, Fliss?” Diego awkwardly asked.

“Yeah, I’m fine,” Felicity shrugged.

“And, uh… the baby?” Leia glanced at Han.

“Our ray should be okay,” Felicity rubbed her belly.

Still the room was silent.

“What?” Felicity frowned, “You people act like I’ve never been in a battle before. Or even kidnapped.”

“But… you took on a legion of Stormtroopers by yourself,” Kes said slowly.

“So?” Felicity shrugged. “I once shot Darth Vader in the chest with a back injury. Hey, does anyone have an antacid? This kid is giving me major heartburn.”

Luke grinned and wrapped an arm around her waist, “I love you so much.”

5 Years, 3 Months, 15 Days

“I don’t know what’s more ridiculous, Kid,” Han shook his head as they walked into Maz Kanata’s bar on Takodana. “That your wife’s cravings are so insane that you travel to another planet to satisfy them… or that I agreed to fly you to Takodana for the sole purpose of finding some fruit.”

“Well, if I recall correctly, you jumped through some ridiculous hoops when Leia was pregnant,” Luke reminded.

“That’s different, Kid. Fliss’ cravings aren’t for stuff that grew only on one planet, and said planet was blown up. I think Leia’s still mad at me for not being able to find Telana bread. But I sort of get why you gave into Fliss. Leia and I bicker pretty badly, but I’m more confident that Felicity would actually smother someone in their sleep. Especially with all the hormones making her emotions out of whack.”

“Would you two stop talking about me like I’m not standing right here?” Felicity yelled behind them.
At seven months pregnant she was moving significantly slower than the men and was only just approaching the door. “And you two idiots could have helped me with the stairs.”

“Sorry, Sweetheart,” Luke wrapped an arm around her waist to help lead her to the door.

“Get off,” Felicity shoved him away. “I’m not an invalid.”

“My mistake,” Luke hid a grin. While he was used to seeing a snappy Felicity, there was just something so adorable about how grumpy she was that day.

“Hey, careful everyone! Fliss is coming through the door!” Han called out as they entered the watering hole. He smirked at Felicity, “Are you sure you’re going to fit, Rhiaon?”

“Make another joke about my weight Loud Mouth Solo, and I will sit on you.”

“Well, what do we have here?” Maz Kanata greeted, ending the conversation.

“Hello, Maz,” Luke smiled. “It’s good to see you.”

“It is, isn’t it? It’s been quite a while since you’ve come to see me, Luke,” Maz playfully nagged.

“Sorry, Maz, but we’ve been a little busy,” Luke laughed.

“I can see that,” Maz turned her eyes on Felicity’s pregnant swell. She reached out a hand but didn’t touch, “May I?”

“Only if I can get some of that jamba fruit I had on my honeymoon,” Felicity teased. “I’ve been craving it so badly the past few months.”

“No, seriously,” Han said in a firm voice, “that’s literally the entire reason we’re here. Give the woman some fruit!”

Maz chuckled, “Of course.”

She then yelled something towards the kitchens in a foreign language.

“It should be quick.” Maz took Felicity’s hand, “Come, my child.”

She led them to a table, and the group took a seat. Han wisely took the seat furthest from Felicity because as Maz helped Felicity into her chair, he had made a comment about how long it would take for her to get back up again, and Felicity didn’t look like she received the comment well. A few minutes later, a plate of jamba fruit and a few other things to nibble on were set on the table by a waitress as As Felicity began devouring the fruit – it was clear to the men they were welcome to anything on the plate but the fruit – Maz crouched down in front of Felicity and rested her hands on the woman’s pregnant swell.

“Beautiful,” Maz smiled. “How far along are you?”
“Seven very long months,” Felicity bit into another fruit. “Oh, that hits the spot.”

Han smirked and whispered to Luke, “Exactly what she said seven months ago.”

Luke swatted at Han.

“The child will be here soon enough,” Maz chuckled. “Enjoy these last few months without the responsibilities of a parent. Do you know the child’s sex yet?”

“How fitting. The son has a daughter, and the daughter has a son.”

“She’s already very strong with the Force.”

“The Force must have grand plans for this little one.”

“Hopefully not too grand,” Han chuckled. “I think we’ve had enough excitement for a lifetime.”

“Come on, Loud Mouth Solo, you know you’d get bored without some fun even now and then,” Felicity smirked.

Luke groaned, “What is my life that getting shot at is your two’s definition of fun?”

“It’s your own fault that we stuck around,” Han reminded. “Leia tried to get rid of both of us, but you insisted on dragging us back in.”

“Your daughter certainly will have an interesting family,” Maz said. “Have you named her yet?”

“We’re thinking about Kira,” Felicity answered.

“Kira Skywalker.”

“Kira Rhiaon Skywalker,” Luke corrected, wrapping an arm around Felicity’s shoulders. “But we’re not committing to it just yet. Maybe when we meet our Ray of Light, we’ll look at her and think a completely different name fits her.”

“Thought about it, but my cousin Ryoo named her daughter Padmé, and Padmé’s already thirteen,” Luke explained. “Besides, it was Beru who raised me not Padmé.”

“Why not name her Beru then?”

“Because then we’re back to the Ben/Bren/Brenna/Brenda/Brendi/Beru debate.”

Maz frowned.

“Long story,” Felicity waved off. She rubbed her belly, “I don’t know. I really like Kira, but we’ll see what fits our Ray.”

“Well, whatever you name this little one, you must promise to bring her to meet me,” Maz insisted. “I can’t wait to see what this little one is like.”

“Me too,” Felicity smiled radiantly. “I’m so sick of being pregnant. I just want to have this baby so badly.”
5 Years, 5 Months, 1 Day

9:15 pm

“I’ve changed my mind!” Felicity sobbed. “I don’t want the baby anymore.”

“Come on, Sweetheart, you are doing so well,” Luke urged as Felicity worked her way through another excruciating contraction.

They were in the overnight room of the Rornian Medical Center. It was a decently sized room, something like a hospital room but a lot friendlier. There was less medical equipment, though there was plenty stored in the closet next door, ready at any moment to be wheeled in and used. Pale green walls, a comfortable bed, an en suite fresher with a shower, a large curtained window that looked upon the beautiful forest that surrounded Temple Village, a few cushy armchairs by said window, and a medical grade bassinet that had been brought in specially for when Felicity gave birth.

It had been very comfortable for when Felicity had first gone into labour, but far too many hours later, both Felicity and Luke were ready for this ordeal to finally be over.

“Just breathe, Felicity,” Doctor Meredyth Kalonia urged as she settled by the end of the bed, readying herself to deliver a baby for the first time. “It’s almost time.”

“I’ve said that a hundred times! Yet here I am, thirty-two fricking hours later, and still no baby!” Felicity exclaimed as Luke shushed and tried to calm her down. His arms were lovingly wrapped around her as he sat next to her, supporting her throughout the pain.

“Kalonia’s doing the best she can,” Luke pressed a kiss to Felicity’s sweat drenched forehead. “It’s not her fault this baby was inflicted with the stubbornness of a Skywalker, Amidala, and Rhiaon.”

“But I just want her out,” Felicity was in tears, exhausted and in pain. It hurt Luke to see how hopeless she was in that moment, having lost her strength to thirty-two hours of labour.

“Shh, Sweetheart, it’s okay,” Luke hugged Felicity tight. He reached into the Force and checked on the baby once more. “I can sense Ray, and she’s eager to come meet us.”

“I want the baby out, Luke. I want this over but Ray won’t come, and Kalonia keeps promising it’ll be over soon.”

“It will because I mean it this time,” Kalonia maintained her calm presence. “In a couple minutes, I’m going to have you start pushing.”

The words hit Luke hard.

“What?” he whispered.

“Really?” Felicity brightening, a new hope overtaking her.

“She’s ready to come out,” Kalonia grinned.

Luke couldn’t breathe. His daughter was ready; he was about to be a father. Was he ready? Could he do this?

He reached into the Force and touched the lilac presence. It was bigger and better formed, but still his little ray of light that loved him instinctually and unconditionally.
Luke was ready for this.

“Last call for visitors,” Kalonia said. “You’ve literally got a crowd of people in that waiting room. Anyone else by your side during this?”

Felicity smiled and clasped Luke’s hand, “No. This is special. One of the most intimate moments of our – crap, contraction. Ow! Ow! OW! DAMN IT, LUKE, WHY DID I LET YOU DO THIS TO ME! OW! – Sorry. Of our lives. I want this to just be Luke and I.”

Beep bop bop bee!

“And… Artoo in the corner because he is obsessed with recording everything in this family, and I owe him a favour,” Felicity sighed, glancing over at the droid. “Hey, tin can! I told you the corner by my head. No up-skirt shots!”

Artoo blew a raspberry at Felicity for her name calling, and wheeled himself into the opposite corner.

“Better,” Felicity said.

Artoo gave her another raspberry.

“All right then,” Kalonia said. “If there’s no one else joining us, then let’s do this. Felicity, on the next contraction, I want you to start pushing.”

“Oh Gods,” Felicity started to breathe heavily. “Luke, I don’t know if I can do this.”

Luke squeezed her hand, “You can. I know you can. You’re the strongest woman I have ever met, and you’re going to be an amazing mother.”

Tears welled in Felicity’s eyes, “You are the best father I could have asked for my child.”

“I love you, Felicity.”

“Here we go,” Kalonia declared. “Felicity… push.”

Soon the room was filled with voices: Felicity’s screams, Kalonia’s counting, and Luke’s unending encouragement. For nearly an hour, Felicity pushed with all her might, and still no baby.

“It’s alright, Felicity,” Kalonia assured her while Felicity took a short rest to regather her strength. “This is perfectly average. Pushing can be anywhere from half and hour to two hours. We’re getting very close.”

“I don’t care!” Felicity wept. It broke Luke’s heart to see her so tired and helpless. “I’m done! I’m not doing this anymore! She can stay in there, because I’m done pushing.”

“Don’t say that,” Luke lovingly kissed her forehead. Sweat had plastered a strand of hair across it, which Luke stroked away tenderly. “You can do this.”

“Oh, I’m sure I could, but I’m not going to. I’m done, Luke. I don’t even think I really want to be a mother.”

“Don’t say things like that. I know you want this baby just as much as I want her.”

“If you want her so much, then you’re going to have to get her out yourself.”
“Well…” Luke frowned, thinking it over, “I guess if you really wanted me to do it, I suppose I could maybe… reach out with the Force, grab the baby, and pull.”

“Absolutely not!” Kalonia snapped. “We are not going to start playing with Force Abilities in my delivery room! I will not have you destroy this woman’s insides because you wanted to play Magic Doctor. Now, Felicity come on, you have to push. Whether you like it or not, you’re pushing on this next contraction. Now push!”

Felicity pushed and pushed, but still it seemed like nothing happened.

“I can’t do it,” Felicity sobbed as Luke held her close. “I can’t do this, Luke. I can’t get her out.”

“Yes, you can,” Luke assured her. He was almost unsure what to do, never really having seen her so helpless and vulnerable before. “I’m sure you’ve made a lot of progress. Right, Doctor?”

Kalonia hesitated, “Well…”

Felicity burst into tears.

“Thanks for that,” Luke sighed, trying to keep the bitterness from his voice.

His wife was inconsolable; Felicity had completely given up on the idea of finishing the job of labour. Instead she just cried, mumbling things about how she didn’t even want to be a mother anyway. Artoo made a small whine from the corner and wheeled up to the bed. One of his arms extended with a rag Luke didn’t know Artoo possessed, and the droid started to wipe the sweat from his Mistress’ forehead.

Beep beep bop.

“Thank you,” Felicity gave him a slight smile through her tears.

Beep.

His job finished, Artoo wheeled himself back to the corner, out of the way. Despite the droid’s kindness, Felicity still cried, absolutely helpless to her labour.

Luke didn’t know what more he could possibly do. The baby just didn’t seem to want to come, and Felicity had expended the last of her energy. There was nothing that could give her that last little push.

… Except.

Luke took a deep breath. Several hours ago, he and Leia had spoken about the upcoming moment of delivery. As a woman who had given birth, as well as someone who had seen Felicity in some of her most desperate moments, Leia had a few suggestions. There was one suggestion in particular that might work… but could he really say it?

“I can’t do it, Luke,” Felicity cried into his chest as he hugged her tight. “I can’t do this.”

Luke sighed; he had to say it. He had no choice.

“Felicity, Sweetheart,” Luke gently moved her from his chest. “My Dearest Love, you are everything to me. You are strong and courageous, and loving and bold. I truly do love you, and I’m so excited to take this next step with you… And that’s why I’m going to say this next thing to you; because I love you and I want your suffering to end.”

“Come on, Luke,” Felicity groaned. “What could you possibly say right now to make me think I can do this.”

Luke sighed and remembered the words Leia had given to him “…I bet your father would think you couldn’t do it.”

The change was immediate on Felicity’s face. No amount of love or encouragement could motivate her to finish the job, but getting one over on Alaric Rhiaon? That lit a fire beneath her.

“Let’s do this, Skywalker!” Felicity rallied, sitting up straight, the tears dried from her eyes.

“Felicity why don’t we try a different position?” Kalonia suggested. “I want you to bring yourself right to the edge of the bed. Feet planted on the edge, butt about level, basically a squatting position. We’re going to let gravity do most of the work here. Lock your arms around either leg to support yourself.”

Luke helped ease Felicity into the new position, but he saw her struggle to hold herself up.

“Master Skywalker, why don’t you get on the bed with her?” Kalonia suggested. “Sit behind her and let her support her weight against you? Felicity, let Luke focus on holding the two of you up. I just want you to focus on pushing, alright?”

His right arm gently wrapped around her body, beneath her breasts, but above the swell where their baby was contained. He was hugging her with the motion, but his natural hand was firmly clasped with her own.

“We’re going to do this,” Luke whispered in her ear, peppering a few kisses down her neck. “Okay? We created her together, and we’re going to bring her into the Galaxy together. Okay? I’m going to be right here.”

“Oh Luke,” Felicity sobbed, the overwhelming feeling of her love crashing against him in the Force. She put a hand on his jaw, and stroked his cheek with her thumb, “Thank you.”

“Anytime,” Luke smiled and squeezed the other hand that was clasped in his own. “Now… push.”

And she did. She pushed and she pushed, Luke there holding and kissing her and quite literally supporting her throughout it all. But this time, it was not all for naught; this time, their daughter was ready to make her escape from the womb into the world.

“Push, push, keep pushing,” Kalonia instructed as Felicity yelled in pain. “And… relax.”

Felicity let out a loud groan and threw her body back against Luke.

“This kid better be cute,” Felicity panted.

“I believe you once said with our combined looks, our kids would be gorgeous,” Luke chuckled.

“I’m holding you to that, Skywalker. I’m going to be mad if this kid is ugly.”

“I make no promises.”

Kalonia said, “Give me another big push now Felicity. She’s very close… That’s right. Just like that… That’s wonderful, Felicity! Keep going! Keep going! Keep going- I can see her head!”

“You do?” Luke moved to take a look when he felt Felicity yank him back down. “What? I want to see the baby.”

“And I want us to have sex in the future, but that might be difficult once you’ve seen a person come out of there,” Felicity glared at him.

“It’s a once in a lifetime opportunity to watch my child enter the world.”

“Just ask Artoo later. We both know he’s broken his promise to me and recorded all of this.”

Bee be bop bo.

“See,” Felicity gestured to Artoo in the corner.

“Alright, Felicity,” Kalonia said, “one last giant push and we’ll have ourselves a little baby. On the count of three. One… two…. Three. Push!”

Screams filled the room as Felicity gave her final push. Her hands gripped Luke’s like a vice, but he didn’t flinch, ever encouraging her to persevere and keep pushing. The back of his mind was focused on the lilac Force Signature that had become so familiar to him. That little ray of Light he had waited months – no, years – to meet. He tracked it, monitoring it as it came ever closer to his world as Felicity screamed and pushed with all of her might.

And then, the most beautiful noise Luke would ever hear.

His baby’s first cry.

“It’s a girl!” Kalonia announced, she covered in as much sweat and tears as Luke and Felicity. Her voice could barely be heard over the baby’s cries, “Ten fingers, ten toes, and a fine set of lungs. Congratulations, you two.”

Luke moved over from Felicity as Kalonia held up the baby. Instantly the breath was knocked out of him. Felicity’s head immediately hit the pillow, collapsing back from exhaustion, but Luke’s mind was focused on one thing alone: the lilac signature, his ray of Light in the flesh.

She was red and wrinkled, screaming her head off, and covered in goo.

It was the most beautiful thing Luke had ever seen.

“Here, Mommy,” Kalonia beamed as brightly as Luke as she started to hand the baby – his baby – to Felicity. “Hold your little girl.”

“Ah! Give me a minute!” Felicity groaned, head affixed to the pillow, her eyes slammed shut. “I am so exhausted, I don’t even want look at her at this moment.”

“You did amazingly,” Luke chuckled. He kissed her forehead, but his eyes didn’t move from his infant daughter. “She’s beautiful.”

“Here Daddy,” Kalonia grinned at Luke. “Why don’t you hold her while Felicity rests up a bit? Thirty-two hours is a long labour. Felicity give yourself a few minutes to relax. I’ll deal with the afterbirth and then check over the baby. After that, why don’t you hold her?”
“Sounds like a plan,” Felicity didn’t lift her head but stick up a thumb.

“Thank you,” Luke whispered as he held his daughter for the first time.

She was really real. He was holding her in his arms.

Luke Skywalker had a daughter.

The moment Doctor Kalonia put Rey into Luke's arms it seemed like the world paused. There was a brand new life, a life he had created, a physical proof of love, radiating with the Force, and filled with the potential to do anything. This miniscule delicate little girl who wasn't even the length of his forearm was bonded to him for life. She would grow tall, beautiful, and strong, looking to him for morals and guidance. He would show her the world and teach her everything she needed to succeed in it. He would provide and care for her: feeding her when she was hungry, warming her when she was cold, holding her when she was sad, healing her when she was injured, and protecting her when she scared.

Luke stared at his little girl in wonder, amazed that he could love someone so much and so quickly. He looked into those large eyes – which at the time were blue – eyes that stared up at him in echoed wonder and love. She had calmed down and was staring at him in as much rapture as he stared upon her. Through the Force, he felt her reaching out to his familiar presence. She understood who was holding her. She knew who he was and what he meant to her, just as he had known her from the exact moment of her conception.

The yet-to-be-named Rey gurgled happily at her father's words.

Daddy. He was a father. He wouldn’t believe it if this tiny ball of flesh wasn’t warming his arms.

The depth of his overpowering love made Luke want to embrace his beautiful little girl with all of his might. On the other hand, he didn't want to hurt her, so he held her gently in his arms taking in the magnificence that was this miracle. He held her close to his chest, resting the baby mostly in the crook of his right arm.

He wanted to touch her more; check that this was really real. Feel that soft skin and solidify her existence in the Universe. But he couldn’t just go at this willy nilly; consideration must be factored in.

Luke carefully shifted the baby so that his left hand was free to move. He brought it to her face and used two fingers to gently stroke her cheek. She squirmed a little, but Luke couldn't wipe the grin from his face. He relished the feeling of her skin against his natural flesh. The cold hard metal of his right hand would be confusing to the small girl, but his left hand provided her with the gentle, loving hand he would raise her with. He would not be like his vicious father that severed his own son's hand. Luke would never harm nor allow anyone to harm a hair on her head.

"I love you so much, Sweetheart," Luke whispered, using his daughter's pet name for the first time. "I'm going to spend the rest of my life loving, guiding, and protecting you. And someday, when I pass from this life and leave you behind, I promise that I will have learned how to preserve myself like Ben Kenobi, so that I can continue to be there when you need me. I promise that I will never leave you; not even in death."

And so at 9:37 pm, five years, five months, and one day after Luke Skywalker met Felicity Rhiaon met, their daughter came into the world.

5 Years, 5 Months, 2 Days

6:42 am

Luke Skywalker couldn’t stop staring at his daughter. Sitting by the window in one of the comfy armchairs, Luke sat with his daughter in his arms, marvelling the miracle before him. She was so beautiful, so perfect, so pure. Brand new to the world, she was a blank slate, not knowing fear, grief, or hatred. She was a ray of light personified… and she was his.

The curtains were open, and the first rays of morning light were breaking on the horizon. His daughter was awake taking in the sight of everything with fresh eyes. Luke admired her beautiful form, trying to pick out which features of his baby had come from himself, and which had come from Felicity.

She had his eyes and his nose, but the cut of her jaw and the fuzzy mop of brown hair on her head was Felicity’s. As with the Force Signature that he had familiarized himself with for the past nine months was the perfect blend of Luke and Felicity, her features were equally as mixed. This truly was the product of their love.

“Luke?” Felicity’s small moan came from the bed where she had given birth.

Felicity had been absolutely exhausted from her ordeal. After Kalonia had run the standard newborn tests, the baby had been given to Felicity. She had only held her daughter for a couple minutes before passing the baby off to Luke.

He sensed the barrage of emotions going through Felicity’s mind: discomfort, delirium, exhaustion, and fear. Luke had tried to push in further, but felt her mental block and decided to give Felicity the privacy of experiencing holding their daughter for the first time. Of course, there was no doubt in Luke’s mind that behind that fog of fear and uncertainty, Felicity had that same overwhelming feeling of love. After all, he too was scared, and Felicity was the baby’s mother. Shouldn’t her love come as naturally as breathing?

Felicity had been forced to hold the baby again when Kalonia declared it was time for the first nursing. Kalonia had made sure to barricade the doors against the horde overtaking the waiting room, giving father, mother, and child a good several intimate hours alone. Of course, the waiting room full of Jedi had sensed the birth, and that all of the family was doing well, so that helped hold them off for a while.

Artoo had returned to the waiting room with strict instructions not to show any footage of the baby. Last Luke heard, Artoo was taunting Threepio over the fact that he had been allowed in the delivery room, and not Threepio.

The nursing was difficult. Felicity had been stiff and nervous, though Luke chalked that up to it being the first time she did it. Almost immediately after she was done, Felicity had handed the baby back off to Luke, once again citing exhaustion. It had confused Luke as he remembered how emphatic Felicity had been throughout her pregnancy about doing extensive skin to skin bonding to first few days of the baby’s life. Yet somehow he found himself being the one to do it, loosening a few buttons of his tunic to rest the baby against his bare chest.

But it made sense, didn’t it? He remembered Leia’s mood swings after Ben’s birth due to the cocktail of emotions running through her system. It must have been the same thing for Felicity.
Looking back on those first few weeks of Rey’s life, it hurt Luke to realize how many signs of Felicity’s emerging postpartum depression he had overlooked at the time.

“Good morning, Felicity,” Luke grinned at his wife, but did not get out of his chair.

“Morning,” Felicity groaned, blinking her sleep laden eyes. “What time is it?”

“Almost seven.”

“What are you doing up so early? Did you sleep last night?”

“A little,” Luke shrugged. “I put Ray in the bassinet and slept in the chair for a while, but she started to fuss and I got up to soothe her.”

“I see.”

“She’s fine,” Luke assured Felicity.

Felicity blinked, “Oh… right. Good.”

Luke’s brows tightened fractionally. Had she not even thought to wonder the result of the baby’s discomfort?

“Has anybody come in to see her yet?” Felicity asked, quickly changing the subject.

“Kalonia’s holding them off for now,” Luke replied. “Introducing our daughter to the rest of our family is something both of us should be present and conscious for. Though Kalonia says Han is starting to threaten to break down the door if he doesn’t get to see her soon. I’m fairly positive Leia would help him do it too.”

“Damn it, Loud Mouth Solo,” Felicity rolled her eyes. “Does he have to intrude on every life moment?”

Luke’s face fell, “Felicity-”

“I know. Don’t worry, I do love him, and if it wasn’t for him, we probably would still be stuck in will they, won’t they territory.”

“Actually, Felicity, that’s not the issue… You, uh… I thought we agreed not to swear in front of Ray. At least not for a while.”

Felicity looked startled, “Oh, right… Sorry. I, uh… I forgot. It slipped.”

“That’s alright,” Luke offered. “You don’t exactly have the cleanest working vocabulary. It’s hard to quit cold nuna sometimes.”

“Right,” Felicity gave a half smile, but it did not reach her eyes. “So, what are you doing awake at six in the morning? Between this, sleep kicks, and throwing me head first into bedside tables, I’m starting to suspect you hate the concept of me sleeping.”

“I was letting you sleep, and the bedside table only happened once!”

“So, what are you up to?” Felicity shook her head, smiling at him, but Luke couldn’t help notice that she had yet to even glance at the baby.

Luke turned his head back to the window, “It’s her first sunrise. I wanted to share it with her. You know, I think about that sunset sometimes. The one I watched the night Artoo ran away. I remember looking out at it, wishing for something more. And now… I have the greatest thing I could possibly imagine… and I’m holding her in my arms.”

Something passed over Felicity’s face as he smiled at their daughter. Was it fear? Hurt? Even… jealousy? He had to have been imagining things.

“I’m fine,” Felicity said too quickly. “I… I don’t know. My emotions are running wilder than even the last nine months.”

“It has been a wild nine months. I’m honestly surprised you managed not to actually kill Han,” Luke grinned. “Here. Join us. Come watch Ray’s first sunrise.”

Felicity smiled and slowly got out of the bed. She winced as her feet hit the floor. Her eyes fell on the baby and something in her presence shifted. It felt like fear, but it could have been something else. Whatever it was, she had only made it a few steps before she stopped.

“I…” Felicity stared at the baby in Luke’s arms. Suddenly she backed up and returned to the bed, “I’m sorry, I can’t. I’m… I’m in a lot of pain.”

Luke frowned, “It’s only a few steps.”

“Well, they’re very painful steps!” Felicity snapped. “You’re well acquainted with the area I just pushed that kid out of. Yeah, I’m a little tender.”

At Felicity’s raised voice, the baby started to fuss and cry.

“Shh, it’s okay, Sweetheart,” Luke held the baby close. He rubbed her back in small circles, gently bouncing her to soothe her. “It’s okay. Daddy’s here. You’ll be fine. Daddy’s got you.”

Felicity stared in horror at the sight of Luke comforting their crying daughter, “Did I- Di I do that?”

Felicity looked away; she couldn’t meet his eyes.

There was a gentle knock at the door, but it was a courtesy only, for Doctor Kalonia entered the room immediately after her knock.

“I thought I heard voices,” Kalonia smiled. “How are you three doing?”

“I’m okay,” Felicity muttered. She still couldn’t meet anyone’s eyes.

“That’s good to hear,” Kalonia said. “So, I’ve got a waiting room full of people waiting to meet this beauty, and they’re starting to threaten a mutiny. I don’t know how much longer I can hold the horde off. Are we ready to share this little one with the world?”

Luke smiled down at his daughter, “I’m never going to be ready to share her with the world… but I suppose I’m ready to share with family. What do you think, Felicity?”

“Your call.” Felicity shrugged, “I don’t really care either way.”
“Then I guess it’s time.” Luke looked to Kalonia, “I don’t want to overwhelm the baby, so just a small group.”

“Oh, of course,” Kalonia nodded. “Family only? Leia, Han, and Ben?”

“Plus Chewbacca and the Droids,” Luke added. “They’re her family just as much as the others.”

“What about Calrissian?”

“He can see her when Alyla does. I’ll need someone to pry the baby out of her arms when Alyla decides she’s never giving the baby back.”

“Alright, I’ll go grab your family,” Kalonia said. “Felicity, you should try feeding the baby again.”

“Do I have to?” Felicity asked. “I’m uh… Still tired.”

“Unfortunately, the shipment that has the emergency formula supplies isn’t coming in until the shipment in a few days. The baby decided to come a little bit too early for me. But don’t worry; if you’re having issues, we’ll figure them out. It might take her a while to latch, but she’ll get it. Just be careful that she doesn’t fall asleep while nursing. She’ll stop eating, and then not be fed enough. She falls asleep, wake her up.”

“How does it feel?” Luke asked as Felicity nursed their daughter. It once again took a lot longer than it probably should have for the baby to latch. Kalonia had promised to give them a little bit of privacy to nurse before bringing in the family.

Felicity tried to suppress some expression as she stared down at her daughter feeding, “Weird… and a little painful.”

“I’m sure it’ll get better with time,” Luke reached down and stroked the baby’s hair.

“I don’t like it,” she declared. “If it doesn’t get better I’m going to quit.”

“It’s only your second time doing it. Let’s not make any rash decisions. Besides… Isn’t it a wonderful bonding experience?”

Felicity said nothing to that.

When the babe finished feeding, Felicity was quick to hand her off to Luke for the burping. Might as well make it a team effort, Luke supposed.

“Luke?” Felicity said softly from the bed.

She watched him holding their daughter, with large, watery eyes. There was something off about the look in her eyes, but Luke didn’t notice it at the time. At the time, he thought they were tears of joy and disbelief… but in later reflection would understand the fear and sadness shining out.

“Yes, Sweetheart?” Luke had finished burping the baby, but still held her against his chest. Gently, he rocked her, basking in the physical proof that he did indeed have a daughter.

Felicity took a deep breath, “Do you… Are you… How do you feel?”

“About the baby?” he turned his body to face her.

Immediately Felicity turned away her face, “It’s just… I never imagined this… feeling.”
Luke smiled, “Me neither, and yet here it is.”

Something brightened in her eyes and she looked up at him in shock, “You… You feel the same way?”

Of all the times for Luke not to reach into the Force for her emotions…

“Of course. Just look at her,” Luke turned the baby to display her to Felicity better. “We… made this. We created a life. We mixed ourselves together and formed a human, with lungs to breath, a mind to think, and a soul to love. I knew what I was supposed to do, love her because she’s part of me, but that’s not what happened.”

“Yes! Exactly!”

Luke grinned, “Yet I looked at her and this… this is more than love. I looked at her and saw a piece of my soul, and yours. I looked at her and felt something grander than love. Love is a child’s word compared to my feelings for her. Maybe… this is what the Light Side is. I never expected to just look at her and immediately feel a love deeper than a thousand hearts could muster.”

Felicity’s smile fell, “… Oh.”

A fraction of a frown creased Luke’s face, “… Oh?”

“What?”

“I wasn’t expecting an oh.”

“Well, I wasn’t expecting a speech with the flowery language of olden days. That was… very poetic, Skywalker.”

He stared at Felicity, “You… Feel it too, right?”

“What?” Felicity scared. “Yes. Of course, I do. Took the words right out of my mouth. After all, that is what a mother is supposed to feel for the child she carried for nine months. Right?”

“Right, of course,” Luke smiled and walked over to press a kiss to her forehead. “I’m tired and probably not thinking about things clearly.”

“Me too,” Felicity laughed. Her head turned again and she said in a low, bitter voice she probably didn’t want him to hear, “Believe me… me too.”

Luke never would figure out when Felicity’s postpartum depression came upon her, whether it was from the long labour, a thing that gradually edged in during the last days of pregnancy, some inevitable result of messed up life she had had in her youth, or from the terrible thing Felicity would admit to him nearly a year later when the pain had ebbed enough to speak the truth.

That holding her baby for the first time, she looked upon Rey and felt absolutely… nothing.

There was a faint knock at the door.

“I guess it’s show time.” Luke smiled down at his baby and shifted her from against his chest to a cradle hold, “Are you ready to meet your family, Ray?”

The baby squirmed in his arms, and he felt her Force presence bump clumsily against him.

“I’ll take that as a yes,” he laughed and kissed her forehead.
She had been reaching out to his Force presence ever seen her birth. For the past nine months she had been safe, only truly knowing two things: darkness and her father’s Force presence. The other Jedi occasionally interacted with her, but she knew her father’s presence inside out. Now that the safe darkness was gone and she was in another world, her father was the only comfort she knew, and she knew she had security in him.

Luke was just about to call out to his family to come in when he felt it: Leia’s presence in the Force. She cautiously reached out to Luke, seeking his permission before pursuing her end goal. With a smile on his face, Luke responded to her request and rerouted Leia to that small lilac Signature. He didn’t intercede further, but observed in the Force how his sister reached out for his daughter. The baby was hesitant at first, but she must have recognized how much of Luke was in Leia’s presence and vice versa for the baby was soon happily entwining her presence with Leia’s.

“Hey!” Han’s voice called from behind the door. “Some of with without Force Sensitivity would like to meet her too!”

A loud Wookie roar sounded in agreement.

Felicity rolled her eyes and called back, “The door’s open, Loud Mouth Solo!”

The door hissed as it slid open, revealing Kalonia, Leia, Ben, Chewbacca, Artoo, Threepio, and a somewhat sheepish Han.

“Oh,” Han said.

“There she is,” Leia’s eyes were locked on the baby, a huge smile splitting her lips. She strode into the room, arms outstretched, “Give me that baby right now.”

“Wow, Sweetheart,” Han chuckled. “The girl hasn’t been alive for twelve hours, and you’re already bossing her around.”

“I’m not bossing her around. I’m bossing Luke around.”

“You’re still dictating where she goes.”

“It’s what Mom does,” Ben shrugged, his eyes locked on the floor. “Are you new here?”

“Come on you,” Han slung an arm around his son and took a step forward. He jerked to a stop when Ben didn’t move forward. “Ben-”

“I don’t want to go in.”

“Ben,” Leia warned. “Come meet your cousin.”

“No.”

“Come on. Move!” Han’s arm was still around his son, so he turned to gently push Ben forward.

Ben wouldn’t budge.

“Did you lock your knees?” Han exclaimed.

“Maybe,” Ben smirked.

“Don’t make me get Alyla.”
Suddenly a paw collided with his back, and Chewbacca forced Ben to stumble forward in the room. He gave a low roar and hit the door close button.

Luke chuckled and passed his daughter to his sister, “This is your Aunt Leia, Sweetheart.”

“She’s absolutely beautiful, Luke,” Leia stared down at her niece in amazement. “Congratulations to you both.”

“Mind her head,” Felicity weakly said.

Out of the corner of his eye, Luke saw Han frown slightly.

“Don’t worry, Fliss,” Leia grinned, but her eyes were locked on her tiny niece. “I’ve got plenty of practice.”

“Besides,” Luke added, “Han dropped Ben when he was a baby, and Ben turned out fine.”

“You dropped Ben?” Leia exclaimed.

“That explains a few things,” Felicity smirked at Ben, who glared at her. That smirk was the facial expression Felicity displayed with the most genuine emotion that day.

Han was giving Luke an identical glare to the one on his son’s face, “You promised never to tell her about that.”

“Master Luke. Mistress Felicity,” Threepio said joyously, shuffling to the side of the bed. “I congratulate you heartily upon the successful and healthy delivery of your progeny. Though I must say that the delivery was not the most… efficient one. Thirty-two hours of labour is a long time.”

Felicity scowled at Threepio, “Does the O in your name stand for Obvious? Or maybe Oblivious?”

Threepio cocked his head to the side, “No, Mistress Felicity. The 0 is a zero. Do you not know that.”

_Beep beep bop bop!_

“R2-D2! There is no need for that sort of language!” Threepio scolded. “Especially in front of Mistress Kira!”

Artoo blew a raspberry.

“So, Kira Rhiaon Skywalker,” Han grinned, coming up next to Leia to observe his niece. “Bit of a mouthful, but if you like it-”

“Actually…” Luke frowned and cast a hesitant look to Felicity.

Felicity wasn’t even paying attention, strumming her fingers fidgety on the mattress as she stared to the side, focusing on nothing in particular.

“What is it, Luke?” Leia caught the prompt when Felicity said nothing.

Han’s frown deepened.
Luke sighed and came up next to Leia to observe his daughter, “I don’t know…it’s going to sound stupid.”

“Kid, I’ve heard you say a lot of dumb things throughout the years,” Han said. “Try me.”

“She just doesn’t seem like a Kira to me,” Luke admitted. “Is that weird?”

“Of course not,” Leia shook her head. “We had the same thing with Ben. For months we were going to call Ben, Bail, but once he was born we changed our minds.”

“Yeah,” Han laughed. “And you were mad. I can still hear you objecting that you wanted to name your still to this day non-existent son, Ben.”

“Ben Skywalker is a good name,” Luke insisted.

“Yeah, and then you suggested for us to name our kid Anakin, which is the stupidest thing I have ever heard. Seriously, who ever would think Leia and I would decide Anakin Solo was a good thing to call our kid? Next thing I know you’ll be telling me you’ve fallen in love with some sort of pseudo Sith/assassin.”

“Han, I literally just had a baby with Felicity. Nothing’s ever happening with Tyla.”

A beat of silence followed as Han stared at Felicity. When nothing was said, Han’s frown was very clear.

“So, what do you want to call her then?” Leia asked. “Felicity managed to talk you into Brenna?”

“No offense, but I don’t think I want any version of Brendan,” Luke confessed. “Sorry, Sweetheart, but it’s not my favorite name.”

Felicity shrugged, “Whatever. I don’t really care.”

Everyone stared at Felicity in shock.

Her eyes widened, “Uh… because I don’t think she looks like a Brenna or Brenda or anything like that. What- what do you think, Luke? What should we call her?”

“Really?” Luke frowned. “That’s it? You loved the name Kira, and you’re not going to fight for it?”

“Well…” Felicity’s eyes flicked down and she gently bit her lip in what Luke recognized to be her thinking face, “It’s just… Kira’s a Tatooine name, but too close to the Coruscanti name Keira with an esk before the isk. The Tatooine Kira means light, but Coruscanti Keira means dark. Considering the whole Light Side/Dark Side thing, maybe it’s best we don’t tempt fate.”

Silence filled the room as everyone worked out exactly what Felicity had said.

“I… guess that makes sense,” Luke finally said. “So… what should we call her?”

“Luke, I’m tired, can we figure this out later?” Felicity groaned.

“Ray needs a name.”

“And she’ll have one, but can I please maybe have some recovery time from this? It’s not easy to grow, carry, and push out a person from inside of you.”

Something was making Luke uneasy, “I… I guess it makes sense. Give us a few days to get to know her and name her later.”

“A few days?” Kalonia interrupted. “You can’t wait a few days. What about the birth certificate?”

“We can leave the name spot blank,” Luke shrugged.

“No, you can’t,” Kalonia said. “It’s literally illegal.”

“Luke…” Felicity said slowly. “You didn’t have Rornian take on the standard set of registration laws, did you?”

“Uh…” Why did that look on her face make him so nervous. “I wasn’t really… Registration isn’t exactly my area of expertise- Okay, fine. Yes, I had Arlos just go with the basic one.”

“Luke!” Felicity swatted his arm. “You were literally living with an Emissary at the time. I told you to ask me about things like this! I told you to ask me questions!”

“What’s the big deal?” Han asked. “The Kid made a mistake.”

“Yeah, he made a mistake!” Felicity exclaimed. “In the standard registration laws, we have a clause for safe haven practices. If a child is born at a medical facility registered with the New Republic – like this one is – and no name is put on the birth certificate for twenty four hours, the child is considered abandoned, and custody is surrendered to the New Republic.”

“That sounds like a very stupid default,” Han said flatly.

“It’s to combat black market adoption and underground slave trades,” Felicity explained. “Luke, how could you do this? What? Do you not want the baby?”

“Of course I do!” Luke objected. “I’m sorry. I made a mistake. We can name her now.”

“Fine, name her!”

“Yeah, just name her. I don’t care.”

He stared at Felicity, “You don’t care what we name our daughter? The title we give her for the rest of her life?”

“I don’t know if you realize this, Luke, but I’m not good with names. My first Alliance alias was Brenda Andromias… They assigned me names after that.”

“Felicity, this is important,” Luke said. “I don’t want us to rush into a name.”

“Luke, I’m tired. What part of that don’t you understand?”

Ben grinned at the fight before him, “I’m so glad I came in the room.”

Felicity glared at him.

“Look, how about this?” Leia suggested, “Just do a placeholder for now, and you can change it later if you want.”

“Sure. Let’s do that.”

“The only question is what to put for the placeholder.”

“Oh, for the love of the Gods,” Felicity rolled her eyes.

“Alright, while you two fight over that, Fun Uncle Han has to interject.” Han held his arms out for the baby, “Hand her over, Sweetheart.”

“Fine, but if you drop her, just remember that Luke can choke you with his mind,” Leia warned.

“I won’t drop her,” Han chuckled through his teeth. He leaned back to Chewbacca and whispered, “You won’t let me drop her, right?”

Chewie growled, shaking his head.

“Good.” Han smiled as he looked down at his niece, “She’s a real looker, you two. We’ll bee fending back the boys in no time.”

“Force help us all,” Leia shook her head.

“I must admit, Kid,” Han said, “your kid is pretty quiet. I remember nothing could get Ben to stop screaming.”

“He’s the son of Han Solo and Leia Organa,” Luke teased. “What did you expect? But I’m sure she’ll give us trouble in no time, won’t you Ray?”

“Ray, huh?” Han said. “Why don’t you call her that for now?”

“It’s been your placeholder so far,” Leia agreed. “What was it you guys said? Change the aurek to an esk to make it a girl’s name.”

Felicity shrugged, “I guess for now.”

“Of course, Master Skywalker,” Kalonia nodded.

“Rey,” Han chuckled, adjusting his grip on his niece. “Better than Loud Mouth Solo, at least.”

“Give it up, Han,” Felicity said. “I will call you that until the day I die.”

“Even Phasma said she wouldn’t be caught dead calling me that.”

“Well, I’m not Phasma, am I?”

“I’m sorry,” Kalonia cut in, “I have to ask. What is the whole Loud Mouth Solo thing?”
“You’ve never heard the story?” Han looked surprised.

“Maybe bits and pieces.”

“Well, listen up, Sweetheart,” Han crossed over to the chairs by the window. “Rey, your Fun Uncle Han is about to tell you your very first story. The story of Loud Mouth Solo.”

A while later, Han finally managed to convince Luke to leave the room to get something proper to eat. He had been so focused on his girls that he had neglected to take care of himself. Leia and Ben were staying with Felicity and Rey, while the Droids went to get the next horde of visitors, and Chewie commed his family to deliver the news of Luke and Felicity’s new baby.

“This is crazy,” Luke chuckled as they walked down the hall to a some dining area. “It seems like yesterday I was that farm kid whose hand you slapped away from the controls of the Falcon, and now… we’re parents. I… have a daughter.”

“Yeah, it’s sweet, Kid. You think something’s up with Fliss?”

Luke shrugged, “She’s tired.”

“No, I don’t think that’s it. I remember what Leia was like after Ben, and… it’s not the same. You really haven’t noticed?”

“There’s been a few things here and there, but nothing that jumps out at me. Why? Do you think there’s an issue?”

“She’s not herself. Multiple times, people said things like congratulations to the two of you, and she didn’t make any sarcastic comments about doing it all by herself, or mocking that you were the one who did it.”

“Lack of sarcasm in Felicity is a red flag,” Luke was serious.

“And she doesn’t care what you call your kid? Three months ago, she sat on you until you promised that if by some miracle you ended up having a boy, the two of you would call him Brendan.”

“In all fairness, the sitting was more a joke… sort of.”

“She sat on you an hour, Luke. Plus did you see how defensive she got about the whole, don’t you want the baby thing?”

“You’re reading too much into that, Han,” Luke warned his brother-in-law.

“Maybe,” Han admitted, “but that doesn’t change the fact that not once while I was in that room did Felicity look at her child.”

Luke looked away from Han. It was hard to deny that fact.

“Ben didn’t either,” Luke said.

“Ben is jealous of her Force potential. We’ve known this for months. That is not a surprise. Felicity not looking at Rey is. Ben is her cousin. Felicity is her mother. There’s something wrong, Luke.”

“Alright, maybe there is something off,” Luke admitted. “She’s not a perfect woman, but I know she loves Rey. She’ll come around. Give it a few days.”
Han sighed, “Alright, Luke, but just promise me that you’ll be careful.”

Unfortunately… Luke was wrong.

5 Years, 8 Months, 25 Days

Though the door was open, Luke still knocked on the doorframe of their bedroom. He could see Felicity, her back turned to him as she silently packed her suitcase on their bed. It was the same suitcase he had thrown on the couch next to her three days ago during his big confrontation of her illness.

“Start talking or start packing,” he had told her.

Luke loved Felicity, and he could do her little song and dance forever of not telling him something was wrong until she was ready to come forward. But when Rey’s life had been put in danger, Luke had to put his foot down. She either needed to confess to him the truth about the way she had been during the past three months, or she needed – for the sake of their daughter’s sake – to leave.

…Thankfully she had chosen to confess.

When Luke knocked, he saw Felicity’s back straighten, but she did not turn to face him.

Felicity took a beat of silence and then nodded, her back still turned to him.

He crossed the room with slow steps, giving her a wide berth as he rounded the bed and headed to the small bassinet in the corner. Perhaps he shouldn’t have carried Rey into the room with him, but after her near-death experience, Luke had been inseparable from his daughter. He wouldn’t even let Han or Leia take Rey away from him.

Luke said nothing as he laid Rey in the bassinet. Before Rey had been born he made sure every room had a bassinet, playpen, high chair, carrier seat or some sort of baby holding device in every room of the house. He felt Felicity’s eyes on them as he ran a hand over her tiny head, brushing his fingers through her unruly brown hair.

“Her irises are darkening,” Luke said, but didn’t look up at her. “Turns out she’ll have your hazel eyes after all. Little disappointed she’s going to look so much like you.”

He could feel her wince.

“Not that looking like you is a disappointment,” Luke looked up at her. “You are the most beautiful woman in the Galaxy to me. I’m proud that our daughter takes after you so much, I just wish I had left more of a mark on her.”

“Hopefully you will,” Felicity’s voice was stiff. Her face looked so tired, “I’m nothing worth emulating.”

“Felicity,” Luke’s heart broke at her words. He crossed the room to pull her into his arms, but when he reached her, Felicity took a step back from him. “Felicity, please… You are an amazing woman. A hero.”

“I’m bitter, broken, and dangerous,” her tone was the exact description of her words. “You don’t deserve to have your child’s mother to be like me.”

“I love you,” Luke said, his voice shaking as he echoed the words he uttered the first night he had made love to her. “I don’t care if you don’t deserve it, or I don’t deserve your love, or any other excuse people could come up with to keep us apart. I love you, for now and for always.”

Felicity’s eyes squeezed shut, a tear slipping from them, “Luke.”

“Felicity,” he took the final step between him. His hands grasped the sides of her arm but he didn’t pull her into his embrace yet.

She took a deep breath and opened her eyes. She found Luke’s blue orbs intently locked on hers. The amount of love radiating in his eyes was almost painful.

“I almost killed her, Luke.”

“I know… But in case you haven’t noticed, I am quite lenient on that sort of thing. If I can forgive my father, I certainly can forgive you.”

Felicity gave something that almost sounded like a laugh, and the corner of a smile lifted her face, “Really, Skywalker? You’re going to bring up Vader now? I swear you make any excuse to bring him into conversation.”

“I guess you’re about to bring up Brendan then,” Luke teased.

That time Felicity did give a laugh: short and light, but still a laugh.

“Oh, Felicity,” Luke gently pressed a kiss to her forehead. When he pulled back, she rested her forehead against his: her sign of utmost trust and intimacy. “I love you.”

“But Luke, what about the almost dr-”

“We don’t have to talk about that,” Luke cut her off. “Okay? You don’t want to talk about it again? We never have to. We’ve already hashed it out and decided on our plan of action. You know I’m proud of you, right? It’s not easy to admit you have a problem.”

“Well, someone as handsome as you tells a girl to either admit it or get out, a girl is inclined to start talking.” Felicity rested her head against his chest, and Luke wrapped his arms around her in a hug. “Luke?”

“Yes, Felicity?”

“Did Kalonia get the records yet?”

Luke took a deep breath, “… Yes.”

Felicity closed her eyes again, “What did they say?”

“They said…” He kissed the top of her head, “…It’s true. Obik was right about your mother and Brendan.”
When Luke told Reine and Obik that Felicity had been diagnosed with postpartum depression, Obik told him that he wasn’t surprised as Brendan had depression. It had blindsided Felicity who didn’t know about her brother’s condition. Obik revealed that he knew as during Brendan’s recruitment into the Rebel Alliance, Brendan had disclosed it – as well as having PTSD, and his mother having been diagnosed with severe depression – so that the Rebels could secure a steady stream of his medication. It had been securing the medication that pushed his pickup date to after his stationing at Faclov, and resulted in Brendan’s death. Kalonia had Felicity sign a few forms and requested that Brendan and Dinah’s medical records to be sent for her review to help guide Felicity’s diagnosis.

“Did my father know?” Felicity asked.

“I can’t believe my father hid something like this from me,” Felicity shook her head. “Actually, scratch that, I can. How bad were their depression?”

“Brendan was apparently at an average level, but your mother…”

“That severe?”

“The doctors suspected it may have helped contribute to her death. She… just couldn’t bring herself to fight for her children.”

“Like me,” Felicity whispered.

“No,” Luke pulled back. “You’re fighting for her. That’s why you’re leaving. This isn’t goodbye. The facility is less than an hour’s flight from here, okay? It’s a wonderful place according to Kalonia, and I’m come see you multiple times a week. Rey too.”

“No,” Felicity said strongly. “Don’t bring her with you. Not until I can be trusted.”

“Felicity-”

“I have to pack, Luke,” she pulled out of his arms.

Felicity crossed the room to the vanity table and started to grab various objects. She didn’t even look like she was paying attention to what she was grabbing, just things at random: a few necklaces, a can of hairspray, a hairbrush, a scarf, a wedding holo, a pair of Luke’s cufflinks. Then she pulled a drawer open and froze.

“Luke,” her voice was distant as she reached in the drawer and traced her fingers over some object Luke couldn’t see. “Tell me again.”

Tears filled her eyes as she turned back to him, holding up the object, “What you told me when you gave me this.”

It was her kyber crystal bracelet.

He crossed the room and pulled her into his strong embrace. Felicity flung her arms around his neck and sobbed into his chest. He could feel the bracelet pressing into the back of his neck as she clung onto him like a lifeline.

“Just because something is broken, doesn’t mean it’s worthless,” Luke whispered into her hair. His face was buried in it as his lips peppered her scalp with kisses. “You are not worthless. You are the greatest woman I have ever met, and I’m proud that you are fighting for this family.”

He held her there for a long time, and eventually her sobs ebbed and ended. Still he held her in his arms, the two of them clinging to each other desperately like they would lose the other if they let go. Luke gently kissed her and muttered inconsequential utterances of love to her, though they soon became white noise.

“I just… wish I could do something to prove to everyone I’m not a terrible mother,” Felicity finally confessed.

“I almost killed her.”

“She’s a Skywalker. Someone in this family was eventually going to try to kill her.”

Felicity couldn’t stop her laugh.

“But…” Luke clasped her hands, intertwining their fingers preciously. “There might be something you can do.”

“What’s that?” Felicity asked.

“Name our daughter.”

Felicity looked away.

“It’s been three months, and you still won’t let me give Rey a name,” Luke said.

“Just name her yourself, okay?” Felicity replied weakly.

“No, you need to be involved. It’s kind of like a pet,” Luke teased. “Once you name it, you’ll be attached.”

“But I’m not attached. I don’t care about her, Luke. That’s why I’m going away.”

“Then make this your first step… Look, it’s been three months… Why don’t we just call her Rey? Rey Rhiaon Skywalker is a good name.”

“I can’t call her Rey.”

“Why not?”

“Because she’s not to me,” Felicity confessed. “She’s not a ray of hope and light and goodness like she is for you. She not my ray.”

At that moment, a small cry came from the bassinet. Felicity’s head turned, and something in her face softened. Something shifted in the Force, and Luke sensed Rey reaching out for her mother. Though Felicity could not feel it directly, a part of her could almost sense it.

Carefully, she dropped Luke’s hands, and took a step forward. As she approached the bassinet, she looked upon Rey almost like with new eyes. She came to a stop beside it, and Luke was ready to spring into action any moment in case some unexpected turn endangered one of the girls.

Felicity started to reach towards Rey, but stopped. She hesitated and tried again. Luke had to admit that when Felicity touched Rey’s cheek, he tensed. Felicity did too, but then she smiled and gently ran a finger across her cheek.

“She is kind of cute,” Felicity admitted.

Luke shrugged, “Gets it from me.”

Felicity looked up at him and smiled, “No… She gets it from me.”

Luke smiled back at her.

She looked down again at Rey, and drew back her hand. Slowly, she dropped down to one knee, kneeling beside the bassinet as Luke approached them. As he came to a stop next to them, he saw her lower something into Rey’s grasp.

The kyber crystal bracelet.

“Just because something is broken, doesn’t mean it’s worthless,” Felicity said softly, watching her daughter. There was a familiar spark in her eye: the look of building strength. “This bracelet is my promise to you. I’m going to get better, Sweetheart. I promise you. I’m… going to learn how to love you. And you know why? …Because you may not be my ray now… but you will be.”

Luke smiled and wrapped an arm around his wife’s waist, “I am so proud of you, Felicity.”

“Thank you,” Felicity said.

“Anytime.”

She smiled. It had been a long time since they exchanged their signature words.

He pressed another kiss to her forehead, and they stood in silence for a while. But unfortunately, all silences must come to an end.

“Felicity?” Luke said after a while.

He took a deep breath, “Felicity, you once asked me to make you three promises; promises I have kept that have strengthened this relationship. I have never asked you to uphold those same promises… but I am now.”

“Luke-”

“You don’t treat me like a possession the way you have the past few months. I’ve been your nanny and housekeeper, not your husband. Especially a few nights ago.”

Felicity couldn’t look him in the eye. Part of her depression had been a non-existent libido, and it had been months since they made love. The night before the incident, Felicity had initiated sex with Luke, which was the first time they coupled since before Rey’s birth – though not for lack of trying on Luke’s part. It soon became clear to Luke that not only was she not obtaining pleasure from the act, but she was merely using it – and as a result, him – as a vessel to simply feel something. Luke had quickly cut things off, which had angered Felicity and led to a big fight.

“I’m sorry. It'll never happen again,” she promised.
“Second, no lies. We can’t let things get to this extreme ever again, alright? Not when Rey is in the picture. I won’t put her at that risk.”

“Agreed.”

“And finally, no Dark Side.” Luke grinned at her, “Though I don’t think that’s a problem with you.” He was greatly surprised when he saw her face go white.

“Luke?” Leia called, entering the room before he could question Felicity.

She, Han, and Ben had come to stay with Luke and Felicity a few weeks ago when Luke reached out with the problems Felicity had been having.

“Oh, sorry, am I interrupting?” Leia looked between the two.

“Not at all,” Felicity shook her head and went to the bed where she resumed packing.

“I don’t mean to bother you, but Reine really needs you to go to the Temple to sign a few things,” Leia answered.

“Alright, I’ll be along shortly,” Luke started to pick up Rey.

“Put down the baby, Brother,” Leia warned. “I’ll keep an eye on her while you go.”

Luke glanced to Felicity, “But-”

“I’m sure Leia can find me off if I have another episode,” Felicity darkly joked. Her eyes flicked between the horrified twins, “Too soon?”

“Sorry.”

“Alright, I’m going,” Luke groaned. He bent down and kissed Rey’s forehead, then kissed both Felicity and Leia’s cheeks as he exited the room. “I’ll be back shortly. Love you all.”

“Love you too,” Leia picked up Rey out of the bassinet. “Look who’s getting to be a big girl.” Rey babbled happily and reached up to play with Leia’s hair.

Luke was just about to step out the door when suddenly a word stopped him.

“Luke?”

He turned to Felicity. Fear shone in her eyes.

She looked down at the floor, “We said no Dark Side, right?”

He nodded, crossing his arms as he leaned against the doorframe.
Felicity took a deep breath.

“I need to tell you something.” She looked over at Leia, “It’s about Ben.”

5 Years, 10 Months, 13 Days

“Everyone ready?” Pooja Naberrie asked as the group prepared themselves.

“Ready,” Luke secured the blanket over Rey’s carrier one final time. The blanket had been a gift from Leia; a special one that fit over the carrier that completely blocked out any camera flashes that might disturb the baby. “What about you?”

“Ba da me ro!” Rey flailed her little limbs. She was at the age where she was testing out saying syllables, yet still couldn’t form them into actual words.

“Sounds like it to me,” Ruwee Naberrie chuckled.

“Alright then,” Pooja announced. “Then let’s go.”

Blinding flashes flooded the walkway between the speeder containing the Naberrie family and the entrance to Padmé Amidala’s grave.

For months, media outlets had been trying to get a hold of a picture of Luke Skywalker’s daughter, but he kept her safe from the media spotlight. Luke knew he couldn’t protect her from it forever, so on his trip to Naboo he decided it would be the perfect time to release the first image of Rey to the galaxy. A picture of her in her father’s arms standing at the casket of Padmé Amidala.

Luke’s trip to Naboo had been a reluctant one. There had been some business involving the memorial to Qui-Gon Jinn – though for the life on him, Luke couldn’t remember what all those years later on Jakku. Luke had needed to go personally, but for one reason or another, all possible babysitters were unavailable. Ultimately, Luke had decided to take Rey to Naboo with him, taking the opportunity to bring his daughter to his mother’s grave.

Unfortunately, the babysitters the palace of Theed had promised for him had also dropped out at last minute, so his first day of meetings involved dignified Jedi Grandmaster Luke Skywalker… conducting negotiations while holding a fussy baby.

Pooja had made sure to share all the hilarity to their family at dinner at the Naberrie house that night.

Sola and Darred were off-world, Darred working the final steps of some great project, and Ryoo was busy at the Nubian academy training a new batch of military cadets. Her husband Jagrav was the one who ended up with babysitting duties, able to work from home from his journalist job. Technically Ruwee was the one actively watching the baby, but Jagrav was there to ensure nothing went wrong from leaving the baby with a ninety-four-year-old babysitter.

“Alright, stand right there,” Jagrav instructed, snapping the pictures of Luke and Rey at Padmé’s casket. As family, he was the one who got the exclusive first photos of Rey Rhiaon Skywalker for his HoloMag, “The light is just perfect.”

“She looks so much like her mother,” Ruwee said, something soft and mournful in his voice. He rested a hand atop his daughter’s coffin, “I miss you, Darling Padmé. I suppose I’ll see you soon enough.”

Pooja placed a hand on her grandfather’s shoulder and smiled.
“Alright, I think we’ve got it,” Jagrav announced. “I’m going to have a busy afternoon. My boss is so excited about breaking this story. And to think, all those other outlets crowded around outside to see if I would slip up and let them get the exclusive first.”

“Sometimes I wonder if you married my sister for the exclusives to photographs,” Pooja shook her head. “But I don’t envy you. I’m up to my eyeballs in paperwork this afternoon. Negotiations are going to be long today, Luke.”

“Wait, you’re both busy today?” Luke frowned. “Who’s going to watch Rey? I can’t leave her with Granddad, he’s…”

Ruwee raised an eyebrow, “Statistically likely to drop dead at any moment?”

“You said it, not us,” Jagrav grinned.

“No, she’s not coming back from her trip with Padmé to her old law school until next week.”

“Seriously Luke, thanks for the photos,” Jagrav said. “It’s the only way I’m going to be able to afford to put my daughter through law school. Stupid politically inclined family.”

Luke frowned at Ruwee, “Then who is helping you with Rey?”

“Hello, boys,” a familiar voice came.

Luke’s jaw dropped as he turned to see Felicity standing in the entrance way.

“Did you miss me?” Felicity smirked. It was so good to see that mischievous glint in her eyes.

“Felicity,” Luke crossed the room in three steps, and then she was in his arms, and he was kissing her. “I’ve missed you so much.”

“We’ll give you two some privacy,” Ruwee chuckled, and the family made an exit to go visit Jobal’s grave.

“What are you doing here?” Luke asked after the preliminaries of reunion.

“I heard you had some babysitting issues, so I came for a visit.” Felicity smiled down at her daughter, “How is my girl? She’s getting so big.”

“Gah bah nah mo re,” Rey babbled excitedly. Luke sensed that she recognized her mother’s Force Signature.

“Is she talking yet?” Felicity asked.

“Not actual words yet, but she’s getting close,” Luke replied. “Do you want to hold her?”

“May I?” Felicity’s eyes lit up.

“Mind her head,” Luke instructed, passing Rey to Felicity.
“Tee ma da be,” Rey said.

“Hello, Sweetheart,” Felicity cooed. “Are you going to be a good girl for Mommy this afternoon? Mommy is going to watch you with Great Granddad. Won’t that be fun for Mommy?”

“What are you doing?” Luke asked kindly.

“Oh, the Mommy thing?” Felicity explained, “My therapist suggested it. By referring to myself in third person, I can detach personal responsibility and focus on what Mommy should be doing than what I should be doing.”

“Should I refer to myself in the third person as well?”

“That’s sweet but unnecessary. Are you okay with me helping Ruwee watch Rey today?”

“Of course,” Luke led Felicity to the perch he had knelt at all those years ago while introducing Felicity to his mother. “The doctors said you should be doing it more and more. Did they ever get around to lowering your medication?”

“Last week.”

And so they sat at Padmé Amidala’s grave, chatting about everything and nothing. Three months into treatment, and it felt like Luke had gotten the old Felicity back.

“I dream about it sometimes,” Felicity confessed. “The incident we don’t speak of.”

“I do too,” Luke admitted. “Thank goodness Artoo was around to stop you.”

“I do owe that droid a good oil bath.”

“Oh, he’s got a list of things he expects from you when you get home.”

“Of course he does,” Felicity laughed.

“Te ma do rah,” Rey babbled, waving her arms to play with Felicity’s necklace.

“How’s Ben doing?” Felicity asked.

“Still very mad at you.”

“Isn’t he always? That’ll be fun to come home too. How long is he going to stay on Rornian with us?”

“Indefinitely at the moment. Han’s still trying to get answers out of us.”

“I don’t understand why you won’t tell him,” Felicity sighed.

“It needs to be kept between you, Leia, and I. The few people know, the safer he is. Alyla doesn’t even know.”

“Gah ma da be,” Rey said.

Luke took a deep breath as he watched Rey in Felicity’s arms, “So… when are you coming home?”

“Soon,” Felicity promised. “The doctors are saying maybe a few weeks… I’ve missed you so much. I’m so proud of how you stepped up to this whole temporary single father type thing.”
“I must say I don’t like being a single father,” Luke teased. “Promise me you won’t make me be one again.”

“I promise,” Felicity chuckled. She looked down at Rey, “Mommy’s going to be here for you, Rey. Mommy promises. You believe Mommy, right?”

“Ma-mi,” Rey said.

“Felicity, did she just say-”

“Mommy,” Felicity gasped. “Rey, say it again! Say Mommy.”

“Ma me.”

“Mommy,” Luke urged, a grin plastered on his face.

“Mo-me.”

“Mommy!” Felicity exclaimed joyously.

“Mommy!” Rey repeated, a huge smile on her face.

“Yes! That’s a good girl!” Felicity hoisted Rey in the air, hugging her tightly.

He grinned and pulled her in for a kiss, careful not to crush Rey in their tight embrace.

“Good girl,” Felicity kissed Rey’s head. She sniffed back a tear, “Hey, Luke?”

“Yes, Sweetheart?”

Felicity smiled and touched his cheek, “I don’t regret having children.”

Chapter End Notes

I will not apologize for the open mockery of the old EU. Anakin Solo was a stupid name, and you know it.

I hope you enjoyed the penultimate flashback chapter. The only reason there’s one more after this is to set up a few threads for Poe, Ben, and BB-8 to know for the future, reveal the final step to how Ben got Felicity’s kyber crystal, and of course show those final moments of the Rhiwalker relationship and how it was forced to come to a tragic end.

Then we can jump right back into the story of Luke falling in love with another woman. You know… after seven chapters outlining his relationship with Felicity.

…I didn’t think this through, did I? Oh well, enjoy the Aluketha relationship anyway (and no, I will not call it Skymeri, because Kymeri is the name Aletha took in marriage to another man, so it would be more like pairing Luke/Antar together.)

And yes, I will finally admit doing this series of flashbacks was probably a mistake. Honestly, the goal at this point is to get to TFA by the time TLJ comes out… but don’t hold your breath.
Part Seven: Ending

Chapter Summary

The flashbacks finally end... oh and Luke learns his wife got murdered.

Chapter Notes

So it turns out I messed up the timeline and accidentally made Rey four during the first part of this story and not five. Therefore, I have to go back to chapters 27 and 28, and changed the dates of the morning after the bachelor party, the wedding, the pregnancy scare, and Felicity’s graduation. I’ve also gone back and reedited the chapter I already edited to fix the line about the birthday party for Rey. It’s the only way to make sure the whole timeline isn’t massively screwed up.

Why did I dedicate to a freaking timeline?

So, I’ve been listening to the audiobook of TFA at work to get the creative juices flowing, and wow, I cannot say my work has too much profanity for Star Wars. In the novel Finn uses the term Hell on a regular basis, and Rey actually calls Plutt a bastard.

Felicity would be so proud.

And yes, we’re finally at the final flashback chapter!

Enjoy all the murder.

The Long Way Home

Chapter Twenty-Nine

Part Seven: Ending

8 Years, 6 Months, 27 Days

“I regret having children!” Felicity exclaimed as she stormed into the kitchen.

Luke grinned as he stirred the sauce simmering on the stove top. He could hear the commotion from the living room: three-year-old Rey’s delighted squeals, the loud, excited beeping of the droids, and the bickering of the two teenaged boys.

“Having fun with the kids?” Luke teased as Felicity grumpily crossed her arms and leaned against the dishwasher.

“I swear to the Gods, Luke, I am about thirty seconds away from pushing one of them down the laundry chute, and I’m pretty sure it’s going to be Ben.”
“Sweetheart, it’s always Ben with you,” Luke chuckled. He offered her a spoonful of sauce, “Taste this. I’m not sure I got the spices right.”

Felicity tried and paused to think, “…Needs a little more oregano.”

“Thanks. Can you grab it from the spice cupboard?”

“You mean the mighty Jedi isn’t going to use the Force to get it down?” Felicity smirked.

Luke pulled a face, “I’d rather not use the Force to lift items anytime soon. We don’t want another incident.”

“Fair enough.” She glanced up towards the cupboards and groaned, “Why did we install that cupboard so high?”

“Because we had it custom-built to have the inside to hold the spice bottles in a certain way, then told Chewie to install it at an easy to reach height without specifying that it should be easy for us to reach and not him.”

“You know, I think Chewbacca might literally be the height of two of me stacked vertically.”

“He’s at least three Reys tall,” Luke conceded.

“Lesson learned then,” Felicity smirked, “don’t let Chewie do anymore construction for us.”

“Agreed.”

Felicity grabbed the stool from the corner and began rummaging through the top cupboard where they kept the spices. Even custom-built kitchens proved to be a little too tall for Felicity sometimes… though Luke certainly enjoyed the view. Her back turned to him, her muscles stretching and flexing as she moved to reach, her glutes pulling tight.

“I may not be a Jedi, but I can sense when you’re checking me out, Skywalker,” Felicity called without even looking down at him.

Luke blushed slightly and turned back to the meal cooking, “Sorry. Sometimes I just can’t ignore the view.”

“Hey, I’m not complaining,” Felicity hopped down from the stool. “Let’s not pretend I don’t drool over you in the same way when watching you at the training gym. You know, when you’re shirtless and sweaty and out of breath. Reminds me of one of my favorite activities with you.”

Luke glanced at Felicity warily. She crossed the room with a slight… zest in her step, and from the look on her face, Luke knew he was in trouble in a we’re about to do something we really shouldn’t when the kids are literally on the other side of this door way.

“Here,” Felicity handed him the oregano bottle with a sultry look in her eye. “That’ll help spice things up.”

Luke set the bottle on the counter, very aware of how close her body was to his, “Careful Miss Rhiaon. A man might get ideas about your intentions.”

“Well after a three-week dry spell, I think my intentions are quite clear,” she ran a hand down his chest and Luke struggled not to shudder. “Unless… you have reason to not want to fulfill those intentions?”
“Felicity, we have three children in the house. Finding a time and place isn’t easy.”

“Yes, I know,” Felicity looked down and bit her lip. “Especially since both Rey and Ben have been having horrible visions… but I miss you.”

Luke wanted to kiss the look right off her face, “I miss you too. It’s been so hard these past few weeks.”

Felicity smirked and pressed her hips against him, “I’m sure it has.”

“Honestly if Reine hadn’t started insisting on sitting in on all our meetings. I swear, if I just have you, twenty minutes alone in my office-“

“She’s just mad because Gavyn told her what we did during her wedding reception.”

“I should have lied about those broken glasses,” Luke stroked a thumb over her bottom lip. His eyes were locked on that delectable mouth. “Is that door locked?”

Felicity glanced coyly at the kitchen door, “It could be.”

Luke took a dominant step forward and Felicity gasped as she was suddenly forced back against the counter.

“Master Skywalker,” Felicity panted, desire burning in her eyes. “Whatever are you doing?”

“I think my intentions are quite clear,” Luke placed his hands on either side of her, gripping the edge of the counter, trapping her against it.

“Now, Master Skywalker, don’t start something you can’t finish.”

“Oh, I intend on finishing.”

“There’s food on the stove,” Felicity reminded.

“I don’t care.”

“The kids could walk in.”

“I don’t care.”

“I want it as bad as you.”

It was passionate and desperate, lips and tongues and bodies tangling together. Luke’s hand was buried in Felicity’s hair as her nails raked down his back. Felicity moaned as Luke lifted her up onto the counter, ready to have his way with her.

“You definitely have a thing for me on tables,” Felicity chuckled, breaking away.

Her hands grasped the hem of his shirt and started lifting over his body as his lips suckled at her neck.

“This isn’t fair to me!” Ben Solo’s voice rang out as the door slid open.
“Not fair to you? It’s not fair to me!” Poe Dameron objected as they entered the kitchen, both boys completely oblivious to Luke and Felicity’s frantic pulling apart.

“Are you two seriously still fighting about that?” Felicity exclaimed as she smoothed down her hair.

“Fighting about what?” Luke tucked his shirt in, pointed ignoring Poe’s raised eyebrow. Apparently the sixteen-year-old Poe was a little less oblivious than Ben was.

Thunk thunk thunk.

The sound of Ben’s crutches rang out as he hobbled through the kitchen, his left foot sporting a tightly wound cast.

“He wants to sleep in my room,” Ben cried.

Luke raised an eyebrow, “Yes. That was what was agreed.”

“Not by me.”

“As one of your legal guardians, and co-owner of this house, I’m authorized to make that decision on your behalf,” Luke shot.

When Ben had come to live on Rornian, Han and Leia had legally given Luke and Felicity partial custody in the event of medical or legal emergencies. It was a point Felicity very much liked to flaunt.

“But I don’t want him in my room, touching my things,” Ben objected.

Poe rolled his eyes, “I guarantee you, Ben, there’s nothing of yours I want to touch. But I need a bed. I’m not about to master the art of sleeping standing up.”

“Why don’t you sleep in Uncle Luke’s X-Wing?” Ben suggested. “If you want to be a pilot, you gotta learn to sleep in a cockpit.”

Luke wasn’t certain if the boy was trying to be genuine or just flat out mocking Poe.

“I’ll pass,” Poe replied.

“Ben,” Luke sighed. “You can’t get up the stairs in that cast.”

“Not my fault Rhiaon’s house design was so ableist,” Ben shot a smirk at Felicity.

She rolled her eyes, “Where did you even learn that word?”

“What he’s saying is you can’t sleep in your room because it’s upstairs,” Poe said. “Which means you have to sleep on the couch AKA the couch I’m currently sleeping on, leaving me with no bed but that free one you have vacated.”

“Then sleep on the floor,” Ben shot.

“As long as you are in that cast, Poe will be sleeping in your bed,” Luke firmly stated. He noticed in the corner of his eye that Felicity had taken up tending to the cooking. “Sweetheart, the nuna needs to be basted.”

“On it,” Felicity grabbed the oven mitts.

At that moment, the room filled with a loud squeal, and two droids and a little girl burst into the kitchen.

“Don’t let her get you, Buddy!” Poe grinned at the sight of the laughing Rey chasing a happily bleeping BB-8. He admired the previous day’s paint job, “You were right, Luke. Orange does look good on him.”

“Rey be careful!” Luke urged as she and BB-8 got too close to Ben’s injured leg. “Artoo can you please-”

Beep bop beep.

Artoo had been dutifully following around the household’s two youngest members, supervising and guiding them out of danger. Of course, he would chastise BB-8 most colorfully whenever he thought things got too risky. Luke was only glad neither Rey nor the week-old BB Unit understood such vulgar binary.

“Rey,” Luke frowned as she again got too close to Ben’s leg.

“I just don’t understand why he has to sleep in my bed.” Ben’s eyes followed Rey carefully, “Hey, Nightlight. Careful of my leg, okay?”

“Okay,” Rey nodded. “Can you play with us? I’m catching BB!”

“And doing a great job, Nightlight,” Ben grinned. “You don’t need your old cousin to play with you.”

“But I wanna play with you Ben! Please play with me? Please?”

“Sorry, Nightlight,” Ben patted his leg, “can’t with this thing.”

“Daddy, why does Ben have that on his leg?”

“It’s called a cast and it’s used to heal his broken leg,” Luke answered.

Rey frowned, “Can’t Doctor Kally heal broken bones? She made Master Gavyn’s all better last week.”

“She can but Uncle Han, Aunt Leia, Mommy, and I agreed his should be healed by a cast instead.”

“Why?”

“Because Ben was a bad boy,” Felicity cut in with a taunting tone. “He disobeyed Daddy’s instructions during Jedi lessons, lifted something with the Force that was too heavy for him to handle, dropped it on himself, and broke his leg. Loud Mouth Solo and Mommy decided Ben would learn his lesson better if he had to suffer through six weeks with a cast. And that’s why you have to always listen to your teachers during lessons.”

“I always listen in my lessons!” Rey exclaimed. “Right, Daddy?”

Luke chuckled, “Well… almost. Wouldn’t quite be my daughter if you always listened to the rules.”

Rey turned back to Ben, “Well if you can’t play catch, let’s play something else. How about hide and seek? BB-8 and I will hide and you seek. We won’t go upstairs.”
“Nah, wouldn’t be fair, Nightlight,” Ben chuckled. “True, you might be a clever hider, but playing with droids is no fun. If I tried to hunt down BB-8, I would find him no problem.”

“I think you underestimate my droid’s evasion skills,” Poe said.

“Challenge accepted Dameron.”

“Some other time, Boys,” Luke interjected. “Ben’s right, Rey. He can’t play hide and seek with his leg like that. Why don’t you just play with BB-8?”

“Okay,” Rey nodded. She turned back to BB-8, “I’m gonna get you!”

BB-8 let out a playfully squeal and shot across the kitchen. Rey followed, hot on his trail, chasing him all over the place. It was only when they got too close to Felicity bent over the oven, putting back in the freshly based nuna that Luke got concerned.

But she wasn’t paying attention. Screaming in joy and obliviousness, she and BB-8 were running straight for the open oven.

She leapt back automatically and Luke used the Force to slam shut the oven door right before Rey would hit it.

…That is, if she hadn’t suddenly frozen in her tracks, her body contorted slightly. She was mid-step, but it seemed like her muscles had just stopped and she was hovering in place.

Luke frowned, “What the-”

His heart stopped when he saw it: Ben’s hand extended, eyes locked on Rey…using the Force to hold Rey in place.

He dropped his grip on Rey and instantly she lurched forward. It was only Felicity’s quick reflexes that caught Rey’s arm before she faceplanted on the floor.

“Are you okay, Sweetheart?” Felicity whispered, dropping to a knee to examine her for injury.

“What were you thinking, Ben?” Luke scolded.

“She was about to hit the oven,” Ben defended himself.

“And your first thought was to use the Dark Side and freeze her in place?”

Poe’s eyes flicked awkwardly around the room, “Uh… Fliss, if Rey’s okay, why don’t I take her and the droids upstairs to play until dinner?”

“Sounds like a good plan,” Felicity nodded. She kissed Rey’s forehead and turned her around, “Go with Poe.”

Rey nodded and ran to Poe, who took her arm and led her out of the room.

“Look, I was using the Dark Side for a good reason,” Ben said.
Luke crossed his arms, “I’m sure my father thought the same thing the first time he used it. Heck, I said that the first time I used it.”

“Exactly! You use this power!”

“I have in the past,” Luke conceded. “But only as the last resort when there was genuine danger of someone losing their life.”

Felicity guiltily looked away from Luke.

“The problem here, Ben is your thought process,” Luke continued. “Your first thought was to physically stop Rey. Your instinct was to take away her free will and agency.”

“Should could have gotten hurt!”

“And it’s her mistake to make.”

“Careful, Skywalker,” Felicity warned. “You’re starting to sound like you wanted her to go in the oven.”

“My point is that when I acted, I had a different mindset.” Luke said. “I went to remove the danger. I closed the oven. Yes, if she hit the door, she probably would have been hurt by the heat a little. Then she learns her lesson not to play by the oven. Sometimes you have to let a kid hurt themselves in order to learn the concept of danger. Ben, you have to start thinking about things different. Don’t try to control the person. Control the environment. Using that power should be your absolute last resort.”

“That’s not what he says,” Ben muttered.

Luke’s eyes went wide, “Are you hearing Snoke again?”

“No.”

“Ben, don’t you dare lie to me about this!”

“Maybe… sometimes. I don’t listen to what he says!”

“Ben! We’ve been over this, you have to tell me when you hear him. He wants nothing good.”

“He appreciates my powers,” Ben snapped. “Unlike some people.”

Luke took a deep breath, “Ben… is this about the cast?”

“I told you I could lift that speeder! You wouldn’t even let me try!”

“Do or do not. There is no try, and clearly,” Luke gestured to Ben’s cast, “you did not. Just… Just go to your room, okay?”

“I can’t. Remember?”

“Then the living room, Ben. Just please… go.”

Ben grumbled and hobbled out of the kitchen, his crutches thudding down the hall.

Luke sighed, grasping the bridge of his nose and lowered his head. Why couldn’t Ben just understand?
A pair of arms wrapped around his waist, and her felt Felicity rest her head against his back.

“Did I?” Luke sighed, “I just don’t understand him. Why doesn’t he realize I’m only trying to help him?”

“He’s a teenager. He’s going through a phase.”

“He’s attacked you before, Felicity.”

“That wasn’t an attack… at first,” Felicity looked away, not wanting to remember that horrible day she let Ben into her mind.

“Who knows what else Snoke is teaching him? I don’t know what to do, Felicity.”

“Maybe it’s time to outsource. Miri and Genko are being assigned as Padawans soon, right?”

“You think I should make Ben a Padawan?”

“I don’t know. I’m not great at the whole Jedi thing.” Felicity came around to Luke’s front and wrapped her arms around his neck, “What I think you should do is finish making dinner, have a nice meal with the family, put our daughter to bed… let the boys fight out their sleeping arrangements, and then come to bed with me and show me what I’ve been missing for three weeks.”

Luke smiled and rested his palm on her hips, “Sounds like a plan to me.”

They leaned in for another tender kiss.

SQIUUEEEE!

A loud mechanical shriek filled the house, startling Luke and Felicity to break apart. But before they could say a word, it was instantly followed by a series of loud thuds coming from the staircase.

Thud!

Thud!

Thud!

Thud!

Thud!

Thud!

Thud!

Thud!

Thud!

Luke and Felicity cringed with each impact on the stairs, but after the silence the followed the eighth, they frowned.

“Aren’t there nine stairs?” Felicity asked.

Thud!
“There we go,” Felicity said. “What do you think-”

“Wait for it,” Luke held up his hand. “In three… two… one.”

“Uh oh,” Rey’s voice echoed through the house.

A rumble of footsteps sounded as two humans and a droid flurried down to the main level.

“Oh no,” Poe’s voice was distant and soft. He then called to Luke, “WELL… REY AND I ARE OKAY, BUT…”

Poe re-entered the kitchen with a guilty looking Rey following.

Her head was bowed and her hands were clasped, “Sorry, Daddy.”

“Rey was playing with BB near the stairs, and I was trying to get them to stop, but Rey accidentally pushed him and…” Poe looked awkwardly at the doorway.

Artoo rolled into the kitchen. Two cables trailed behind him, dragging in the detached head and body of BB-8.

“I’m sorry,” Rey said again.

“Don’t apologize to me, apologize to Poe and BB-8,” Luke instructed.

“Sorry Poe. Sorry BB.”

_Bwop beep bo._

BB-8’s noises were weak, but the forgiveness was clear.

“What happened?” Felicity asked.

“I think the mechanics that keep his head upright shorted out,” Poe explained. “Luke, do you think you could fix it?”

“Sure, but this won’t be the last time this type of thing happens. I’ll show you after dinner how to fix it.”

“Thanks,” Poe smiled.

“Why don’t you guys go now?” Felicity offered. “I’ll finish up dinner. You fix the droid.”

_Beep beep bop._

“See, I’ll be fine,” Felicity said. “Artoo will help me.”
“Alright then.” Luke picked Rey up with one arm. She squealed happily as he slung her over his shoulder and started tickling her stomach, “Let’s go fix a droid.”

Dinner was typical that night, the usual chatter that filled the dining room. Rey trying to sneak a toy under the table cloth, Luke finding it and chastising her as he repossessed it from her, and Poe, Ben, and Felicity bickering and bantering until Luke was certain his ears would bleed.

Luke was discussing hair products with Poe, while Ben mimed stabbing himself with his butter knife.

“Oh, that reminds me,” Felicity grabbed Rey’s knife out of her hands when she imitated the gesture. “Stop stealing my hair dye, Ben! We live on Rornian. I can’t run out to the corner store to buy more.”

This was during the year and a half where Felicity had cut her hair to shoulder length and dyed it black. She grew out bangs, and straightened it everyday, curling the ends inwards in a rather pretty look that Luke had been quite fond of. However the hassle of it all proved too much for Felicity, and she changed her hair back about six months after that night.

“I’m not using your dye,” Ben refuted.

Luke raised an eyebrow, “Really? So your hair has just randomly started turning black even though no one in this family has black hair?”

“You don’t know what my father’s family has. And didn’t Great-Grandmother Shmi have it?”

“There is no one alive who can confirm it.”

_Beep bop beep!_

Luke sighed, “Of course you have footage of it. Why did I assume otherwise?”

“Oh, and if you ruin another one of my towels with said dye,” Felicity warned, “you’ll be using _paper_ towels from here on out to dry off.”

Ben rolled his eyes and grabbed the salad from Luke, “I am truly blessed to call you Aunt.”

“Exactly.”

“So, you boys fixed BB-8?” Felicity asked.

“Good as new,” Poe proudly announced.

“Oh good. I didn’t want to tell Kes you had destroyed your really expensive birthday gift, three weeks in.”

“Kes was smart in his purchase,” Luke said. “BB Units are supposed to be nearly indestructible. You could set that thing loose in a desert, and he’d probably be okay… Sarlaacs not withstanding.”

“What’s a sarlaac?” Poe asked.

“Pray you never find out.”
“I’m still impressed,” Felicity said. “A brand-new droid, literally the eighth one of the model ever made. That’s an extravagant present.”

“Had to give me something to distract from your beauty,” Poe grinned. “What do you say, Fliss? Wanna run away together?”

“You know I have you on retainer,” Felicity chuckled.

Luke shook his head but said nothing. It was a long running joke between Felicity and Poe to run away together. It had stemmed from the day Poe had flirted with Felicity at his own mother’s funeral – a nice distraction to the eight-year-old mourning his mother – and had continued for years to come. Poe had even had the gall to flirt with Felicity at her wedding reception, though Kes had made it clear to his son beforehand not to interrupt the actual ceremony.

“So seriously,” Ben asked, “what’s with the droid?”

“I think he’s trying to make up for my mom not being around,” Poe shifted the food on his plate.

“What happened to her?” Rey looked at her father.

“That’s a story for when you’re older, Sweetheart,” Felicity said. She eyed her daughter’s plate, “Looks like someone forgot to grab vegetables tonight.”

Rey sulked as Felicity portioned out the dreaded greens.

“Of course, a droid isn’t the end of it,” Poe said. “Next year we’re going to finish fixing up Mom’s X-Wing and Dad says I can have that. And when I’m eighteen, he said I can get a tattoo of Mom’s flight squadron on my shoulder blade.”

“Left or right?” Felicity asked.

“Left.”

“Good spot. If you need, I can give you my guy’s information.”

“Nah, Dad’s got a tattoo artist all lined up already. Did his.”

“Well, good. If there’s one thing I have to say about tattoos is get a good artist… and under no circumstance do you let it be done by two Imperials – one with a boot on your back, pinning you to the dusty ground – holding you down outside an alley in the middle of the street, with a machine Gods know how old that probably was never cleaned, while your father watches in horrified helplessness.”

Poe grinned, “I really gotta sit you down one day and hear your life story.”

“It’s a long story,” Felicity shrugged.

“How many tattoos do you have?”

“Oh, let’s see. There’s the starbird/Rogue squad one on my right shoulder. Brendan on my right ankle. Rey of Light over my heart. And FN-2187 on my right wrist… I never thought about how all my tattoos but the Rey one is on the right. Next one will be on the left.”

Poe blinked, “F- What?”
“FN-2187,” Felicity repeated. “You know, the kid I lost?”

Poe’s face went white, “Oh, I didn’t know you two lost a-”

“No, the First Order child,” Luke corrected. “Rey’s our one and only.”

“So far,” Felicity added.

“I still don’t know what you’re taking about,” Poe said. “Who is FN-2394?”

“2187,” Felicity corrected. “You don’t know that story?”

Poe shook his head.

“Well, buckle in,” Felicity said. “Have I got a tearjerker for you.”

And so she told him the story of the child that was torn out of her arms.

“That’s horrible,” Poe said at the conclusion. “And you have no idea who his parents were?”

“No one’s ever come forward,” Felicity replied. “And I’ve spent a lot of time and money trying to find them. As far as the galaxy is concerned, FN-2187 has no family.”

“He has you,” Luke pointed out.

“I don’t count.”

“You’ve said numerous times that if you had saved him, you would adopt him. Admit it, Sweetheart, you are obsessed with this child.”

“Better than your obsession.”

“What’s your obsession?” Poe asked.

“Fireproofing,” Ben answered. “Uncle Luke is convinced someone is going to burn down this house. He’s even had a whole security system installed that if there’s a fire, just tell the system Burning Homestead and all the doors seal shut. They won’t open again.”

“It’s to trap and contain the fire,” Luke explained. “And you can open the doors.”

“You can?” Ben blinked.

“Have I never told you that? If you get locked in during the shutdown, just tell the system Lars and it opens the door. Tell it Whitesun to lock. And if you need to reset the passcodes for some reason, that code is Beru.”

“Not Owen?”

“Owen sounds too close to open. I didn’t want the system to open on the wrong word.”

“Lars, Whitesun, Beru, Burning Homestead,” Poe repeated. “Got it.”

“You know, it’s strange to think about FN,” Felicity admitted. “He’d be about seven these days. I wonder how long until the First Order puts a weapon in his hands.”
Luke reached over and clasped her hand, “We’ll find him, Sweetheart. I promise.”

“I don’t think I can ever be at peace until we do.”

“We’ll find him, Fliss,” Poe promised. “I swear to you, I’ll find him, save him, and give him a name other than FN whatever he’s called. I promise.”

Of course, at that time, Poe didn’t know how true those words would become.

But then again, as Luke remembered those words years later on Jakku… neither did he.

8 Years, 8 Months, 12 Days

Luke’s eyes were so heavy. It was late and the speech was completed, but still he sat at the dining table tweaking the last few lines.

He heard when Felicity entered the room, but was surprised when she didn’t say anything. Instead she just stood there, staring at him. Her arms were folded and she was in a plain blue sleeping tank and black night pants.

He didn’t look up at her, “I have to get this speech just right.”

Felicity said nothing but exited to the kitchen. He heard some rattling and several minutes later she emerged with two steaming mugs. She set them on the table and without asking, took the datapad from his hands.

“This is good,” Felicity sipped at her tea, reading his speech.

“Thanks,” Luke stirred the hot chocolate in his mug. “I’m just nervous. The last time I assigned Padawans, they ended up leaving with Cade. Reine was heartbroken about Jake.”

“I hear he goes by Jaek these days. Jaek Ren. That’ll be fun to deal with in a few years.”

“I don’t even want to think about that right now. Felicity, this is so important. What if I give the wrong Masters the wrong Padawans?”

“Who is assigned to whom?”

Luke was silent.

“You’d think sleeping with the Jedi Grandmaster would get me in on all the good tidbits,” Felicity teased, setting the datapad down. “Instead I’m left in the dark with the rest of the plebeians.”

“You are not a plebeian.”

“Do you even know what that word means?”

“…That’s beside the point.”

Felicity smiled and clasped Luke’s hands, “Come on, tell me who is assigned to whom.”

“Genko is going to Gavyn, and Miri to Obik.”

“Genko and Gavyn? Interesting match.”
“They’ll play off each other well.”

“What about Miri?” Felicity asked. “I thought one of her parents—”

“I don’t want children to be Padawans to their parents,” Luke dismissed. “I feel that this is the chance to develop a strong mentor bond but without the obligations and complications of parents with their children.”

“For example, less likely to cut off the Padawan’s hand.”

“Oh for the love of— You are never giving up on that, are you?”

“Nope,” Felicity grinned. “So, who is Ben going to?”

Luke sighed, “That’s the hard part. I can’t decide. I think she’ll be the best choice for him, but I’ve always promised he’d be my Padawan.”

“Your padawan?” Felicity’s eyes widened. “Luke, he can’t be your padawan!”

“Why not?”

“Oh, Honey,” Felicity put her head in her hands. Luke knew he had done something ridiculous when Felicity called him Honey in that utterly disappointed and pitying tone. “Sweetheart, I love you. I love you so much. I love how exuberant you are, how you want to just take care of everything and everyone. You’re a real people pleaser and an optimist. It’s one of the reason I love you… but you can’t keep taking on so many things.”

“I haven’t taken on a lot of things.”

“You’re the Jedi Grandmaster, in charge of management, resource allocation, ensuring everything is running smoothing on a practical, emotional, and spiritual level. Reine only just got you to give up financial control to her last year. You deal with the politics of making Rornian a Republic planet. You take business trips and go on expeditions with Lor San Tekka. You work with the Church of the Force and the Senate. You’re active in the Resistance and fight the First Order. You’re making buildings and gardens and tracking down Force Sensitive. You’re raising Ben and Rey, and at the moment, Poe. You’re married to me and have to maintain a physical, emotional, mental, romantic, and sexual relationship with me. If you take on anymore, you’re going to crack under the weight. Something is going to be lost or ignored, and I won’t have it be this family. You can’t take Ben as your Padawan. You’re the Grandmaster. Let the Masters do their job. You taught them to be Jedi, now let them teach others.”

Luke sighed, “I suppose you’re right.”

“I always am. Even when I’m wrong.”

“I don’t think that’s how it works.”

“It is. Just go with it.”

“Alright then,” Luke laughed. “So it’s official, Ben will be the Padawan of Tyla Kinall.”

Felicity’s jaw dropped, “Tyla Kinall? Luke, what are you thinking? We want Ben to like Vader less, not more!”

“I just think that it would be good for him to see another side of Vader. Get a personal account so he “Luke, Tyla hasn’t even seen how flawed he is. You give Ben to Tyla for her Padawan, and I guarantee within six months there’s going to be a dead Jedi.”

“Ben’s not going to kill anyone.”

“You can’t promise that. With the crazy life this family leads, that’s no way he’s not going to end up killing someone. Even Threepio has killed people!”

Luke sighed and rested his forehead against his hand, his elbow planted on the table.

“Come on,” Felicity wrapped an arm around Luke’s shoulder and began to rub the opposite tense muscle, “why are you so afraid of this? Give him to Alyla.”

“What happens if she gets more serious with Lando? I know they’ve been discussing adoption.”

“They don’t even live together, Luke.”

“And if they move in? If they adopt a child? He’s threatened by Rey, what happens if he feels he loses Alyla to another child?”

“Ben is threatened by Rey, yes,” Felicity admitted. “But he loves her. He would never let someone lay a hand on her. It would be the same for Alyla. Luke… Ben is in a dangerous place, he needs Alyla there to guide him. She’s his only hope.”

Luke smiled and reached an arm across his chest to stroke her hand, “You know… you’re better at this Jedi thing than you think.”

Felicity clasped his hand and leaned her head against his neck, “Well… I learned from a great teacher.”

“Thank you for this, Felicity.”

She smiled, “Anytime.”

---

8 Years, 8 Months, 13 Days

“And so we pass down our knowledge to the new generation, not only so we can teach them, but so they can teach us in return,” Luke finished his speech, his hands resting on the podium.

The ceremony took place in the Meditation Gardens. Truth be told, the Jedi Temple didn’t actually have a large enough room for ceremonies, and that was on Felicity to-design list. For now, all ceremonies would take place in the Meditation Gardens until they could make such a space.

Luke stood at the head of the ceremony with the Jedi surrounding him not unlike the formation at Reine and Obik’s wedding. Standing before the group were Genko, Miri, and Ben, all dressed in their finest formal Jedi robes, hands clasped behind their backs, nervous and excited.

Han and Leia were in the crowd collected behind the future Padawans, looking absolutely filled with pride. Han was even wearing formal wear… at least as formal as Han Solo could possibly get, so clean black pants with Corellian blood stripes, shined black boots, a crisp white shirt that was actually ironed, and a brown jacket with sleeves. To Luke’s utter shock, Han wasn’t wearing a blaster belt or any sort of weapon. He had only seen Han voluntarily sans weapon three times in his life: at Han and Leia’s wedding, at Luke and Felicity’s wedding, and in the hospital room when Ben was born – Leia had asked Luke to be in the room with her and Han to keep Han in line as well as to help if any weird Force things happened.

Leia was as elegant as ever, her hair up in an elaborate bun with braids and curls in her usual style that looked both complicated yet she bore it like it was nothing more than a pony tail. Her dress was white with gold accents, some Alderaanian and Jedi symbols embroidered in shining gold thread across the waist and down several lines of her slightly flowy skirt.

Felicity stood with them wearing a very similar outfit. Her hair was the same simple bun she always wore, though it did look odd with her bangs. The dress she wore was a near copy, though her dress was black with silver accents to match Luke’s formal black robes. Her skirt was also a little more formal fitting, and the bodice laced up in the back rather than zipped like Leia’s.

Han had confided in Luke years ago that he managed to talk Leia into switching to zippers because as fun as helping her lace up – and even more fun to unlace her, which Luke glared at Han for the comment – it was taking Leia way to long to get ready for formal events, and then she would blame him for it. He gave her an ultimatum: he either helped her with laces or with her hair, or else he was going to start leaving the house before her.

She chose hair, but was known to on occasion to rope Luke, Felicity, and even Threepio into helping her with dress laces when she insisted on them.

Felicity’s dress also had symbols on it, but it wasn’t Alderaanian ones. Instead she wore Jedi and Tatooine symbols to honour Luke. In fact, the dress design had originally been Felicity’s, having gotten the dress custom-made after deciding to marry the Jedi Grandmaster. She knew that as his wife, she would have many cases of attending ceremonies and events in that role. While she was insistent on being more than just Luke Skywalker’s wife, she also knew there were times where she would just have to concede her role. The dress was designed to reflect her role and support of Luke, but the outfit was a perfect match for Luke’s so that when they did stand next to each other it was clear the outfits were a set, and thus they were equals and a team.

Rey was with her mother, trying not to fidget as she struggled to stand still and be quiet. BB-8 was at her stand, watching the ceremony and gently nudging her anytime her detected Rey’s focus waning. Rey’s outfit wasn’t particularly formal, a nice set of grey tunic and leggings. She had little black boots that she liked to brag looked like Uncle Han’s, and Leia had done her hair up nice and fancy.

Everyone else looked the same nice, but not too formal look. Poe wore his academy outfit, Lor San Tekka wore brown robes and had trimmed his beard, and Chewie didn’t wear his ammo belt… which in Luke’s opinion looked a little weird and made it feel like Chewie was naked. But he wasn’t going to argue Chewie on the point, especially since Waroo and Malla had come to Rornian for the ceremony and were in a similar state of “undress” by human standards.

Of course, Lando Calrissian was dressed to the absolute nines, wearing a cape and everything. The man honestly made any excuse to wear a cape, but even this display was a little much for a Padawan ceremony. Upon seeing Lando, Gavyn declared that he looked like a peacock, but the outfit made Alyla smile, so Lando figured his mission was accomplished.

Everyone knew that Alyla was probably going to get either Ben or Miri as her padawan, so she had dressed up nicely herself. While the rest of the Jedi wore robes, Alyla wore a gorgeous magenta dress she had gotten the very first time Lando had asked her to attend a dinner with him. Her outfit had no other ornamentation, though a small blue morning glory had appeared in her hair shortly after Lando arrived.

Seeing Alyla, Luke was glad he had chosen her to be Ben mentor, even if it was just so that all her outfit efforts didn’t go to waste. Besides Felicity, Luke was the only one who knew which Padawan would be matched to which Master. All the Jedi who were interested in getting a Padawan had told Luke, but he decided not to reveal assignments until the actual ceremony that way no one tried to talk him out of assignments… exactly as Felicity had done the previous night.

Speaking of assignments, it was now time to given them. Luke took a deep breath and nodded to the Jedi at his side. Tyla Kinall nodded back, and as he stepped back, she and Zena Halcorr took Luke’s spot at the head of the ceremony.

“This Order is about openness,” Tyla announced to the group. “We come from all walks of life to seek the same goal: to know the Force more intimately than we know ourselves. To study and cultivate the power within us. The Padawan/Mentor relationship is also a vessel to come to understand another person’s perspective, no matter how opposite it might be.”

Zena looked around the group, “As many of you know, Tyla and I came from dark beginnings. I was born into a family that was a cornerstone in the slave trade. Tyla… had Imperial roots. We will not get into those today, but we will acknowledge the fact that she was a familiar of Darth Vader’s.”

“Though from different backgrounds, Zena and I ended up doing a common thing: we ended up saving precious Jedi artifacts. Zena did it through her little team with Gavyn, Alyla, Coria, and the rest, and I… well, what most of you don’t know is that Vader did keep some Jedi artifacts as trophies. When he died and I ended up destitute… I broke into one of his homes and stole some of the artifacts. I wouldn’t let anyone else have them, because I couldn’t trust anyone with them. Throughout the years, I ended selling all but one piece simply to get the money to survive. As the Force would have it, all those pieces ended up with Zena. But the one I kept, I have held to this day, the day on which I finally pass it on to a worthy apprentice.”

Zena nodded, and Luke brought forth a chest he had stashed behind a large tree. He set it down on the podium and lifted the lid.

“A lightsaber is the weapon of a Jedi Knight,” Luke said. “Not as clumsy or random as a blaster. An elegant weapon... for a more civilized age. These words were once said to me by my first mentor, who gave me my first lightsaber, the lightsaber of my father. That weapon is long gone, along with a hand, which I only mention now because if I don’t, my brother-in-law and wife will never let me hear the end of it tonight.”

The crowd laughed and Han patted Felicity on the shoulder.

“That weapon served me well for many years,” Luke continued. “It is true that no lightsaber will work better than that which has a kyber crystal that calls to you… but I think it is important to have a lightsaber before you build your own. That way you come to respect it and understand its importance before you bind yourself to such a dangerous weapon. I do not give these to you lightly, but I know that you three are the future of the Jedi Order, and I trust you to wield these with respect to the past of not only the saber, but of the Order itself. They will be yours to care for until the time comes for you to build your own saber… And for the love of the Force, do not break them.”

The audience laughed again.

Luke turned and nodded to Zena and Tyla, who withdrew, both hoping that they were about to hear their names called as a Padawan’s Master.

“Alright then,” Luke took a deep breath. “Let’s get to the pairing.”

A buzz of chatter filled the room in anticipation, but Reine joined Luke at his side – she had requested she not get a Padawan, still too hurt by Jake’s abandonment. She held up a hand, and the room fell silent.

“Genko,” Luke looked to the Mon Calamari boy. “You are vibrant, lively, and eager… but you are not grounded. While I commend your selflessness, you need to learn not to throw yourself into things with such reckless abandon… That’s how you lose a hand.”

The room laughed.

“What you need is a healthy dose of reality, and a little bit of cynicism to grant you perspective. You need someone who will grab you by the back of the shirt when you try to throw yourself in front of a lightsaber dealing a killing blow. And that is why I have matched you with…” Luke looked over at the tanned man to his left, “Master Gavyn Kene.”

The crowd applauded as Gavyn smiled and stepped forward to shake the hand of his Padawan. Later that night, each of the three Padawan/Master sets would have private binding ceremonies with Luke and Reine in front of the Force tree. They would recite the very same vow he and Reine had sworn, making up the words on the spot, standing before that very same tree fourteen years ago.

When the room had settled, Luke took a lightsaber out of the chest, and presented it to Genko.

“This is the lightsaber of Vonar Ghyron, Gavyn’s own Master,” Luke proclaimed. “It was recovered by Zena Halcorr many years ago, the very first piece in her collection. It is with great pride we hand this saber down to you. May you wield it with pride and honor.”

“Thank you, Master Skywalker,” Genko accepted it solemnly. He then looked up at Gavyn and asked with an excited grin, “Hey, Master, what colour is it?”

Gavyn raised a brow, “Green.”

“Awesome! That’s the colour I wanted!”

Gavyn chuckled, “I think you and I are going to have a lot of fun, Genko.”

Genko was bouncing with excitement, trying to bombard Gavyn with a million questions as his Master led him to the side.

Luke smiled and looked at the girl standing below, “Miri Halcorr-Kene. You are very much like your parents: solemn, a wonderful trait for a Jedi. But you need to learn to laugh a little more, to not take everything so seriously. You’ve shown a talent for being a healer, and are passionate about nurturing the people around you. I believe studying the Living Force would be a wonderful avenue for you. Therefore, I have assigned you to… Master Obik Kenu.”

Miri received the same sort of applause and greeting from Obik as Genko had with Gavyn. As before, Luke selected a lightsaber out of the chest and presented it to her.

“This is the lightsaber of Qui-Gon Jinn,” Luke announced. “This was saved by Darth Vader, stolen by Tyla Kinall, and sold to Zena Halcorr. It’s a special lightsaber, being one of the few used to defeat a Sith Lord. Qui-Gon believed in following his own Code and followed the ways of the Living Force. It was he who found the pathways beyond death that opened new opportunities to use. I believe he would be honoured to pass his saber on to you.”

“Thank you, Master Skywalker,” Miri bowed her head.

She and Obik joined Genko and Gavyn at the side – the latter trying to get Genko to stop talking.
Gavyn grinned at his daughter and patted her on the arm.

Luke turned his attentions to his nephew.

“Ben Solo,” Luke couldn’t wipe the grin off his face. “What can I say about you? I have known and loved you seen you were a mere speck in the Force. I have seen you grow strong with the Force, and been there to guide you at every step. And now we reach this next step, one of the most important in your education. Ben, you are powerful, in mind, spirit, and personality. There is a legacy that follows you, but also a darkness. What you need is a Master who knows you inside out, who can nurture and empower you, who understands the weight your legacy, and who can teach you to defeat the darkness within as they too once did.”

Ben made a movement that looked very much like a rooster proudly ruffling his feather. Even his dyed black hair – the sight of which Han and Leia had been upset to see more so out of the doing it without permission, and stealing the dye from Felicity – shimmed a little bit. A cocky grin consumed his face.

Luke locked eyes with his nephew, “Therefore I have decided that there is only one Jedi who could possibly be your Master… Jedi Master Alyla Kene.”

The grin fell off Ben’s face, “WHAT?”

The polite applause came to a stop.

“I’m not supposed to be with Alyla!” Ben exclaimed. “I’m supposed to be with you! I don’t want anyone but you!”

Ben looked absolutely outraged, and Luke wasn’t sure what to do. He hadn’t expected an outburst, let alone over having Alyla assigned as Ben’s Master.

The crowd muttered among themselves, unsure what to make of the display. Han and Leia exchanged a very anxious look, and as Han wrapped an arm around Leia, he looked like he half wanted to murder Ben. Felicity had her arms crossed and was chewing her bottom lip, nervous over the knowledge that this was partially her doing. Lando looked offended and moved like he was going to step into the circle with Ben and give the boy a piece of his mind, but Chewie put a hand on his shoulder, urging him to stay where he was.

But worst of all was the absolutely devastated look on Alyla’s face. She adored children, always wanting one of her own, and Ben is some ways was one to her. To be not only rejected by him, but so publicly, broke her heart.

“Ben,” Alyla weakly said, her voice starting to hitch.

Gavyn looked furious, Zena’s hand went to the hilt of her lightsaber, and Lando made the forward movement once more.

“I’m your Padawan!” Ben cried out, taking a step towards Luke.

Luke turned to Reine, and with a stiff nod from her, he understood what to do. He grabbed the final lightsaber and scaled down the few steps from the platform with the podium. Luke marched over to Ben and before he could object again, Luke thrust the lightsaber into Ben’s hands.

“This is the lightsaber of Obi-Wan Kenobi,” Luke proclaimed loudly, making it clear to Ben to be
“The man for whom you are named. He was a great friend and mentor… if not the most honest one. In many ways, he reminds me of you.”

The hard look in Luke’s eyes shut Ben right up.

“This lightsaber was saved by Vader after he killed Kenobi on the Death Star,” Luke continued. “It is the one piece of Tyla’s collection she refused to part with, until today when she agrees to pass it to you, Ben Kenobi’s namesake. I hope you learn to become as great a Jedi that he was, and that you treat it, as well as your Master with uttermost respect.”

“This conversation is over,” Luke warned, leaning in close so only Ben could hear. “Now go greet Alyla, and apologize for your outburst and how you have embarrassed her.”

Ben swallowed hard, finally noticing the look on Alyla’s face. He stiffly nodded, clutched Obi-Wan’s lightsaber tightly, and slowly walked over to Alyla as if he were approaching the executioner’s block.

As Ben apologized to Alyla, Luke returned to the podium and the very solemn Reine. They exchanged a wary look, and he turned back to the audience, who was now immensely uncomfortable.

Luke shook his head as Ben and Alyla spoke, “Reine… I have a bad feeling about this.”

“Uncle Luke!”

Luke was chatting with Felicity, Rey, and Poe after the ceremony when he heard Ben’s angry shout.

“Well, this should be fun,” Felicity said.

“What was that all about?” Ben exclaimed as he stormed towards Luke.

Luke crossed his arms, “I could say the same thing.”

“I can’t believe you would do that to me!”

Rey frowned and tugged on Luke’s pantleg, “Daddy, why is Ben mad?”

The query seemed to defuse Ben ever so slightly.

“I’m mad, Nightlight,” Ben answered, “because your Dad is supposed to be my Master, not Alyla!”

That confused Rey even further, “But I thought you liked Master Alyla?”

“I thought he did too,” Alyla said as she joined the group. “Ben, I’m very upset with how you disrespected your uncle and I today.”

Ben looked away uncomfortably. The look on her face was worse than anger… it was disappointment.

“I was very glad to been assigned as your Master,” Alyla continued. “I’m sorry if you don’t feel the same way.”
He sighed, “I’m not… unhappy, it’s just-”

“BEN!”

Han Solo was a man born to loudly bark his son’s name across a room. At the noise, Ben Solo winced and seemed to shrink down to half his size as his father approached with his equally stern looking mother.

“What. Were. You. Doing?” Han glared at his son, looking half a second away from grabbing him by the scruff of his neck.

“How dare you do that to Luke and Alyla,” Leia fixed Ben with a look that clearly read she was the daughter of Darth Vader. “You embarrassed and belittled them in front of their friends and colleagues. Would you pull something like that to me in the middle of a Senate meeting?”

Ben looked to the ground, “No, Mom.”

“I don’t see what the boy’s problem is,” Lando said. His eyes were locked on Alyla and he had on that ever-present charmer smile of his that made women either blush or roll their eyes. Luckily for him, Alyla was a blusher. “He gets to spend hour upon hour with this beautiful, sophisticated, intelligent, courageous young woman.”

Alyla blushed as Lando wrapped an arm around her waist.

“That sounds like an absolutely glorious way to spend all of my time,” Lando grinned before planting a passionate kiss on her. “You look absolutely stunning today, My Dear. Congratulations on the Padawan, My Darling… even if you did get stuck with Han’s kid.”

“Thank you, Darling,” Alyla had an embarrassed smile as she felt all eyes on Lando and his little display. “And he’s not that bad.”

“Ben, you will apologize to your uncle right now,” Leia ordered.

“Fine! Uncle Luke, I’m sorry for embarrassing you during the ceremony, but I will not apologize for being mad about my Master. It was supposed to be you! You’ve always promised that it would be you!”

“Well, I changed my mind,” Luke said firmly. “Ben, I’m the Jedi Grandmaster, I don’t have time for a personal Padawan. Besides, it’s not a good idea to make relatives be Padawans and their Masters.”

“But that’s not what you thought before!”

“It’s what I think now.”

“No, that doesn’t make sense,” Ben looked confused and frustrated. “You never had a problem with it before. It’s what you thought last year. What you thought last month. What you thought last night-”

Ben realized his mistake too late.

“Late night?” Luke repeated sternly. “What do you mean, that’s what I thought last night?”

Felicity and Leia exchanged a look of wide eyed horror, while the others just seemed confused.

“Ben…” Luke said slowly, “have you been prying into people’s minds again?”

He looked like a rat caught in a trap, “Well, I, uh…”
“Ben Solo!” Leia scolded. “We’ve been over this. This was the entire reason I sent you to Luke to begin with!”

“Wait, what?” Han frowned. “I thought you said it was because you received intel via the Resistance that Snoke was going to make a move to kidnap him.”

Leia looked awkwardly at Luke and then her husband.

“Uh…” Leia struggled for words, “we’ll talk about it later, Han.”

Han opened his mouth like he was about to object, but then he caught sight of Lando and Poe. He closed his mouth, clearly not wanting to have the discussion in front of such a crowd.

“Uncle Luke, I’m sorry,” Ben bowed his head. “I shouldn’t have been looking in your mind.”

Luke crossed his arms, “How did you do it without me knowing?”

Ben gave a sheepish look, and Luke knew the answer:

Snoke.

“We’ll continue this discussion later,” Luke said calmly. He did not want to start discussing the fact Ben heard Snoke’s voice in his head in front of Han, Poe, and Lando.

“But we will discuss this,” Leia eyed her son sternly.

“Yes, Mother,” Ben bowed his head. He clenched his fists tightly, “But Uncle Luke… I still don’t understand. It doesn’t make sense. Last night you were going to make me your Padawan, and this morning you changed your mind. It doesn’t make sense!”

“Ben, just drop it,” Luke said coolly. In the corner of his eye, he noticed how nervous Felicity was getting.

“No, it doesn’t make sense.”

“A lot of things don’t make sense in life. You just have to deal with it,” Luke refused to divulge the source of his change of heart.

“But it’s what you thought for years! You always promised! It’s not fair!”

“Ben-”

“No, you lied to me! How can I ever trust anything you say to me from now on?”

“Felicity,” Luke interjected, “you don’t have to-”

“No, it’s okay, Luke. I’ll tell him.”

Ben looked between the two, “Tell me what?”

Felicity took a deep breath, “It’s my fault. Okay? I changed his mind.”

Ben’s face scrunched in confusion, “What?”

“Luke told me that he was going to make you his Padawan, and I talked him out of it,” Felicity explained. “Luke has so much on his plate as Jedi Grandmaster, financial provider for the Order, Senate representative for Rornian, he works with the Resistance and the Church of the Force, and he’s a father, husband, and teacher. He can’t give all of that adequate attention – he can’t give you adequate attention with all those burdens. It would be detrimental to your education, and after a while, something was going to give out. I had to talk him out of it. I didn’t want any of his relationships to suffer. Not the one with me, not the one with Rey, and certainly not the one with you. For your own good, I talked him out of making you his Padawan.”

Ben stared at Felicity, his face pale, his eyes wide and round, and his jaw hung open in complete, utter shock.

“You did it?” Ben whispered.

“Yes,” Felicity said simply.

He shook his head incredulously, and then uttered the eight words that would change the magnitude of their feud forever.

“Oh my God…” Ben stared at her with disbelieving fury in his eyes, “you are such a bitch!”

“What?”

“Hey!”

“Whoa!”

“Ben!”

A flurry of shouts broke out from the group as all seven adults – Poe counted among them – turned on Ben angrily for his insult.

“Whoa, whoa! Everyone calm down!” Leia ordered, holding up her hands.

And then came the six words that destroyed any possibility of Ben and Felicity ever reconciling their feud.

“Mommy?” Rey asked in an innocent tone. “Why are you a bitch?”

Felicity’s eyes flashed with dark anger and Ben’s face paled as he stumbled back towards his mother in fear.

“Oh, Rey, why don’t we go talk with Obik and Reine?” Poe hurriedly said, literally picking her up off the ground and racing away with her – BB-8 obediently following behind – before the scene got ugly.

“I’m gonna kill him!” Felicity roared.

She lunged for Ben, but Han caught her around the waist and yanked her back. Ben scampered behind his mother, literally hiding behind her as his hands clutched Leia’s shoulders.

A flurry of shouts overlapped each other in both reprimand and defense of Ben and Felicity’s actions. The commotion was so loud, it was impossible to tell who was saying what.

Until a loud whistle shut them all up.

“That’s better,” Leia glared around at the group. “Now, what Ben did was inappropriate, but Felicity, you are definitely old enough to know that trying to attack a child is equally such.”

“He called me a bitch and taught Rey to do it in the process,” Felicity’s eyes were cold.

“And he should be reprimanded,” Leia agreed. “But not by a lynch mob. Ben needs one person to talk to him, not seven.”

“Technically the seventh is gone,” Lando jerked a thumb in the direction Poe exited.

A cold stare from Leia made Lando take a step submissively back behind Alyla. He wrapped his arms around Alyla trying to make it look like an affectionate gesture, but there was no denying that he had placed Alyla between Leia and himself as a buffer. Alyla just smiled at the action, and patted Lando’s arm.

“I will deal with my son alone.” Leia wrapped a strong arm around Ben’s shoulders and forced him to turn away from the group, “Come on. Let’s go have a chat.”

“But Mom,” Ben whined as his mother marched him to the exit of the Meditation Gardens.

“No buts, Benjamin. Move it.”

No one said a thing until Leia and Ben had exited the gardens.

“Okay, you know Ben’s in trouble when Leia calls him Benjamin,” Han looked a little scared.

“That’s not even his name.”

Alyla blinked in confusion.

Lando waved it off, “Skywalkers are a strange family.”

Alyla sighed and shrugged, “Can’t disagree with that. I’m really sad that this is the reaction Ben had to being assigned my Padawan. Truth be told, I’d been hoping for him to be mine for years.”

“Give him a few days and you two will be good again,” Lando promised. He kissed Alyla on the forehead, “Why don’t you go celebrate with your brother?”

“Are you coming with me?”

“I’ll pass for now. Gavyn always seems like he’s half a second away from running me through with his lightsaber whenever we’re together in front of him.”

“Oh, Darling he would never run you through.”

“That’s a relief.”

“He’d get Zena to do it.”

Lando blinked, “… You are a devious one sometimes.”

Alyla grinned mischievously, “I wouldn’t with you if I wasn’t.”

“Well, if that isn’t the truth,” Lando chuckled and kissed her. “Now, get going. And tell your brother I said congratulations.”

Alyla pecked another kiss on his lips and then went to find her brother.
Lando had a very satisfied look on his face as he turned back to the remaining trio. He froze when he saw the six eyes staring at him.

“Oh, that was adorable and you know!” Lando exclaimed. He gestured to Han still holding back Felicity, “This? Not so much.”

Felicity shoved Han away from her, “Get off, Loud Mouth Solo.”

“Jeeze, Fliss!” Han smoothed down his shirt. “I was just trying to protect my son.”

“He was out of line!” she exclaimed.

“I agree, but that doesn’t mean you need to kill him. Seriously, is this family playing an elaborate game of attempted familicide bingo I don’t know about?”

“You could probably actually get Reine to start that up,” Lando said.

“Can it, Calrissian!” Felicity snapped. “Alright, I’ll admit it, I may have been in the wrong.”

Lando slapped his forehead.

Han groaned, “Oh, for the love of—”

“Completely overreacted?” Felicity exclaimed. “Luke, I shouldn’t have tried to attack him, but he taught our daughter to swear at me!”

“Yeah, Kid,” Han agreed, “he just taught your kid her second swear word.”

Han froze, “Oh, she hasn’t said it in front of you?”

“Said what?” Felicity’s voice was threatening.

“Nothing! Nothing at all!” Han lied unconvincingly. “Hey, if Rey ever uses the f word in front of you, I definitely didn’t teach her that. I… I’m going go make sure Leia doesn’t commit filicide.”

Han could not escape the conversation fast enough.

“Well, that’s what you get when you leave Rey alone with Han while he’s fixing the Falcon,” Lando watched Han in amusement.

“We’ll definitely have to talk to Rey about appropriate language tonight,” Luke mused. He eyed Felicity, “Then again with your vocabulary, I’m surprised she hasn’t picked up worse yet.”

She glared at him, “Would you like me to get you a shovel, or are you happy to continue digging this grave with your mouth?”

“Felicity, Ben is just a child.”

“Oh, in Itar’s sweet name! Are you serious? You’re on his side.”
“He’s suffered a disappointment. You can understand his reaction.”

“He called me a bitch!” Felicity exclaimed. “That would be appropriate if he needed a kidney transplant, I was the only match in the world, and I said no. But, no, what was this? This was me calmly and politely explaining why I made the logical decision to talk you out of it. Gods, Luke, nothing I do can ever please him, and I’m sick of all this fighting!”

“I’m sick of it too.”

“And you here you stand taking his side once more.”

“I’m just sick of having to take sides to begin with!”

Felicity just scoffed, “… And I’m sick of pretending that one day you’ll take mine.”

Luke sighed, calming down, “Felicity-”

“No, I get it,” Felicity said quietly. There was rage simmering below the surface, but it was overwhelmed by a sense of defeat in her voice. “Ben’s your nephew, and no matter what he does to me… you’ll always take his side.”

“Felicity-”

“I’m going to go congratulate Obik on getting a Padawan,” Felicity pushed past Luke and walked away.

He didn’t follow.

“Wow,” Lando gave a low whistle, reminding Luke of his presence. “That was impressive how much you screwed up. I think you even gave Han a run for his money.”

Luke sighed, “What am I supposed to do?”

“Definitely not what you just did.”

“I’m sick of all this fighting, all this side taking. Why can’t they just get along?”

“Not everyone gets along. I have nothing against Felicity, and she has nothing against me, but we don’t get along well.”

Lando shrugged, “Then there’s probably a lot more to that feud than even you know. But I can tell you that the way you treat both of them, pitting them against each other, flip flopping between sides… it’s only making it worse all the time.”

He paused.

“Actually, you remind me of your father in that way.”

“Lando-”

“You messed up, Luke, and you hurt Fliss in the process.”

“She put me on the spot and asked me to pick a side!”
“And you picked wrong,” Lando said bluntly.

“I shouldn’t have to pick at all!” Luke exclaimed. “She’s being unreasonable. Ben is my nephew and Felicity is my wife. I’m not supposed to choose sides!”

“Yes, you are,” Lando said. “And you’re constantly making the wrong one.”

“What are you even talking about?”

“He’s a child.”

“And needs to learn personal responsibility. Fliss is right, Kenobi probably made these exact excuses for Vader and next thing we know, he’s forcing me to freeze Han in carbonite.”

“Forcing you?”

“It was for the good of my people. Look, we’re getting off topic. What I’m saying is that you need to start siding with Felicity over Ben.”

“When he teaches your daughter to swear at her mother, it’s not just a petty feud,” Lando shot. “Throw me all the standard excuses. He’s a kid, he’s your nephew, he’s jealous. None of that matters. He’s not always going to be a kid, and he needs to learn to get over jealousy. Do I get jealous when Alyla acts flirtatiously with other men? Of course, I do. Have I learned that I need to get over it because it’s her way of taking control of her body image, self-worth, and sexuality after years of abuse? Yes, I have. And I also know that no person owes me anything. Not their time, not their affections, not their attentions… Some people may owe me their money, but that’s a whole other issue. The point is that Ben needs to realize he’s not entitled to lay any sort of claim over you, whether as his Master, Uncle, or anything else. He’s jealous, and needs to get over it.”

“But he is my nephew,” Luke calmly spoke. “I can’t just set aside that fact.”

“Yes, you can,” Lando shot. “Ben is your nephew, but Fliss is your wife. You may be on close terms with your family, but the fact remains that you did not choose to bring him into your life. That was out of your control… Felicity was not. You looked at all the romantic partners in your life and decided that this was the one you wanted to be involved in the rest of it. You made the choice to be with her, to love her, to protect her, to have her back no matter what… And you have to live up to that. You may love Ben, but the fact remains: you picked Felicity… but you did not pick Ben.”

“So, I should just stand by and let her belittle and threaten him?” Luke said coolly.

Lando groaned, “Luke, Fliss belittles and threatens people hourly! You knew what you were getting yourself into with her. And truth be told, she’s actually pretty harmless most of the time. …But don’t you dare ever tell her I said that. I don’t want to get my ass kicked because I misjudged this.”

“She’s not harmless, Lando.”

“Fliss threatens to punch Han in the throat on a regular basis, but has she ever actually done it?”

Luke cast down his eyes, “No.”

“And when she mocks someone, isn’t it always when they’re legitimately doing something stupid?”
“Yes, but with Ben she always gets so defensive-”

“Exactly! Defensive. It’s her guard going up and trying to protect herself from an attack. It’s why she’s always so aggressive, because she’s fighting back to defend herself. I don’t know why she does it, but there’s something in Fliss that triggers her fight or flight instincts on a regular basis.”

And then it clicked. The big question that Luke had always struggled to answer: what made Felicity so aggressive? Finally, it made sense to Luke… and with that knowledge he could see the possible root to the whole rivalry with Ben.

How could he have missed it this whole time?

“You’re right,” Luke admitted. “About all of it. I’ve been too lax on the issue, and it needs to come to an end.”

“Well, you’re starting on the right path,” Lando grinned, staring at something over Luke’s shoulder.

Luke glanced backward and saw Alyla speaking with Gavyn and Miri probably congratulating each other over their Padawan assignments. Alyla looked absolutely radiant as she smiled brightly at her brother and niece. There was a grin one Lando’s face as he watched her that Luke knew Han would absolutely make fun of Lando for if he saw it.

“She’s good for him,” Luke smiled at Lando. “And good for you.”

“Better than either of us deserve,” he laughed. “She’ll teach him to a better man just as well as she taught me.”

“As well as you? I’m hoping for a little better than that.”

“Temper your expectations. He’s the son of Han Solo.”

Luke laughed, “I suppose so… Ben will be in good hands with Alyla.”

“And Alyla will be in good hands with Ben,” Lando smiled charmingly as he caught Alyla’s eye across the lawn. “If there is one thing I am certain of… it’s that Ben Solo will never let anything happen to Alyla Kene.”

Felicity was at her vanity table putting away her jewelry when Luke entered the bedroom that night. Her eyes caught his reflection in the mirror. Luke smiled at her from the door. She instantly scowled and turned her head away.

Luke chuckled at the display. He came up behind her, wrapping his arms around her waist, and kissed her neck.

“Get off,” Felicity shoved him away.

Luke put up his hands in surrender, “Sorry.”

“Whatever,” Felicity crossed the room and hit the button to close the door. She then walked over to the closet and turned her back to him, fiddling with the zipper of her dress. Felicity struggled for a moment and then let out an exasperated yell. “Fine, you want to get handsy? Come help me with my zipper.”

He made sure his movements were slow and respectful as he came over and unzipped her dress. His eyes couldn’t help but roam as the dress hit the floor and she was all soft, pale skin. Luke resisted the urge to touch her all over and have her undergarments join the dress on the floor. He did however give into the urge to run his natural fingers down the spine on her scar.

Felicity shuddered at his touch but quickly stepped away and gathered her dress from the floor.

“I’m still mad at you,” Felicity shot as she set about hanging her dress in the closet. She grabbed the closest nightgown hanging up and pulled it on without ceremony. She didn’t take off her bra or change her underwear, sending a clear message to Luke that her dressing wasn’t to get ready for bed, but rather to just cover herself from his hungry eyes.

“As you should be,” Luke unclipped his lightsaber belt and hung it up in the closet along with his cloak. He did not change out of his other articles of clothing, leveling the playing field. They were going to fight this fight without letting either party use their body or the promise of sex as a weapon.
“I made the wrong decision today, and I’m sorry about that. I should have stood by you when Ben got out of line. I’m sorry, and I promise to be at your side in all future conflicts.”

“Sure,” Felicity rolled her eyes and entered the fresher where she began removing her makeup and letting down her hair. “And now this is the part where you say you just don’t understand why we can’t be friends, and how I aggravate him, and he’s just a child.”

“I’m not saying any of that. I’ve realized that I’m wrong. Ben is old enough to know better than to treat you this way, and he certainly should not be swearing at you. Especially in front of Rey.”

“Oh really? What brought you to this revelation?”

“Well, I was talking to Lando-”

“Gods help me.”

“And he made me realize something,” Luke shook his head lightly at Felicity. He took a deep breath and said, “He made me realize why you’re so… Felicity, I love you so I say this with utter respect and devotion, why you’re so sarcastic and violent.”

The makeup removing cloth paused on Felicity’s cheek, “Oh, you have, have you? You figured it out, the big question that you’ve never had an answer to. What Diego, Riz, Leia, and everyone else couldn’t solve? What only my psychiatrist at the mental health facility could figure out. You have the answer.”

“You were emotionally abused by your father as a child, so after you escaped his hold on you, you became snarky and violent as a defense mechanism to prevent anyone from taking control of you like he did. The reason Ben’s hatred of you irks you so much is that not only does this trigger memories of your father’s abuse, but it reminds you that you lost Brendan, the one person who ever protected you from Alaric, and that’s why you hold onto his death so tightly. Losing Brendan was losing your defense mechanism. Meanwhile, I – who as your husband, you would hope most to step into that role of protector that Brendan once held – have been siding with your pseudo-abuser, and hence you have to double down on your defense.”

Felicity just stared at him.

“Damn, Skywalker, you’re good,” Felicity replied. “Last time I doubt a Jedi.”

“Well, I doubt that,” Luke chuckled. “So… I’m right?”
Felicity sighed, “I think so… At least the Ben part. The Alaric part, you’re right on the money.”

“Felicity-”

“I thought I was over it,” she pushed past Luke out of the fresher. “I thought I was over my father.”

“He’s the man who raised you,” Luke followed her into the bedroom. “Like it or not, you did have several good years with him.”

“But they weren’t good. He told me how to speak, who to consort with, what to do, where to go, what to eat, how to dress… He said I looked like a whore in front of the Emperor, Vader, Tarkin, Bail, Leia, Brendan, and every important Imperial in the Empire. All for wearing a dress with a neckline cut higher than this,” Felicity gestured to her average low-cut top. “I mean, I’m not even spilling out of this, but yes, call your daughter a schutta in front of Palpatine for less than that. By the Gods, I barely even have anything to spill out.”

“Can it, Skywalker. This isn’t the time to check me out.”

“Sorry.”

Luke joined her on the bed, “Same reason I love Vader even though he cut off my hand. Because however fleeting, we know there were points they loved us… And truthfully, we crave having those moments even more.”

“Perhaps that’s why we fell in love,” Felicity leaned against Luke. “To fill the voids our fathers left in our hearts, we found someone with a similar trauma and history that we knew our partner would understand the love, but also the boundaries, we needed to cope with that scar in our hearts.”

“You know, this conversation turned a lot more analytical than I was expecting.”

“It’s us, Luke. All our conversations end up spinning out of control with nonsensical bantering and analytical thoughts about religion and our daddy issues.”

Luke smiled and let a silence fill the room. He could sense Felicity working out the conflicting feelings in her mind.

“Ben is not Alaric, Felicity,” Luke said after several minutes.

“You’re right, he’s not,” Felicity said. “My father was a weak man, but Ben is anything but. Oh, my father tried to pretend he was high and mighty, but at the end of the day he wasn’t dangerous on a personal level. He just followed orders, even when they were wrong. But Ben… Ben isn’t weak. He grows stronger everyday, not just with the Force, but physically. I’m scared, Luke.”

Luke’s heart dropped. Felicity almost never admitted to fear, so when she did, it meant business.

“I’m scared of Ben,” Felicity repeated with great difficulty. “He gets more and more aggressive towards me everyday, and I’m worried that someday it will escalate to violence. And I’m going to make it clear to you here and now, Luke… If Ben ever attacks me… If he ever throws a punch, a kick, or a Force Choke at me, I will defend myself. I will hurt him, and I will defeat him. And if he ever hurts Rey… I will do what must be done. If I have to kill him, I will.”
“He loves Rey,” Luke objected. “He would rather die than hurt her.”

Felicity looked at her husband, “And that’s the only reason I don’t sleep with one eye open. But you and I both know that could change in an instant. Anakin Skywalker loved Padmé Amidala, and he ended up strangled his pregnant wife. Obi-Wan Kenobi loved Anakin Skywalker, and he cut off all of Anakin’s limbs and left him to burn. Love is powerful, Luke… but so is hatred, so is the Dark Side. You’ve tasted it, you know how intoxicating it can be, and with Snoke in Ben’s head there is a real possibility that this could all go south really fast. I don’t want my life to end at the hands of Ben Solo, Luke.”

“It won’t.”

“I want you to promise me that. I can fight and try my hardest to protect myself, but the Force is a greater power than I. I’m not asking you to be a knight in shining armor… but I want you to promise me that you will protect me if I encounter a situation I cannot overcome. Promise me, Luke… Promise you won’t leave me behind.”

“I swear to you, Felicity,” Luke bowed his forehead against her own, “I will never leave you behind.”

But that was a promise he would one day break.

8 Years, 9 Months, 14 Days

Felicity looked up from her HoloReader, “BB-8 would love a cardboard box. Rey still devastated?”

“Only way I could get her to sleep was promising she could comm them in the morning. She’s completely enamored with Poe Dameron and his droid.”

“And she has both wrapped around her little finger.”

“Meanwhile Artoo is sulking about no longer being her favorite droid.”

“Give him a week, and he’ll be again. R2-D2 is overly dramatic.”

“Yeah, he threatened to go into Low Power Mode if she continues to call BB-8 her favorite.” Luke crossed over to the liquor cabinet in the corner of the room and punched in the code, “Might I interest you in a drink, Miss Rhiaon?”

“A drink?” Felicity smirked and set her HoloReader on the coffee table. “What’s the occasion, Master Skywalker?”

“A quiet house,” Luke poured wine into a pair of glasses and resealed the cabinet. He set the glasses on the coffee table and joined Felicity on the couch, slinging an arm around her. “Poe is home, Ben moved in with Alyla a month ago, and Rey’s going to start her first Youngling lessons next week with Reine. Sure, it’s just meditation… which I’m hoping will make bedtime easier.”

“I’m much looking forward into tricking her into going to sleep by getting her to meditate.”

“But our kids are growing up,” Luke grinned and grabbed one of the glasses. “So, I say we toast to a job well done, and see where the evening leads after that.”
“Master Skywalker,” Felicity playfully chided. “A girl might think you’re trying to lower her inhibitions. What do you have to say for yourself?”

Luke gave a dark chuckle, “I’d say… drink up.”

Felicity laughed with him as she grabbed her glass. She picked it up and raised it to toast with Luke.

“To a quiet house,” Felicity proposed.

“And to only almost killing a kid once,” Felicity grinned. She caught Luke’s horrified look, “Oh, come on. It’s been three years!”

“Fine. To only almost killing them once.”

They clinked their glasses together and took a long drink.

“Oh, breaking out the good stuff,” Felicity set her glass down. “We must really be celebrating.”

“Well, I also wanted to talk to you about something,” Luke set his glass down beside hers.

“Luke, I’m going to need a lot more wine if you want me to do that tonight.”

“No!” He paused to think for a moment, “… Well, okay, yes I want to do that tonight, but that’s not what I was talking about.”

“Then what did you want to talk about?”

Luke gently rested a hand on Felicity’s thigh, “I’ve been thinking a lot lately, ever since Ben moved out that once Poe left, Rey would get really lonely.”

Felicity shrugged, “She has Artoo.”

“It’s not the same. I want her to have someone to play with and spend time with and love.”

“Okay… So you want to hire a nanny, or-”

“Not a nanny. This wouldn’t be just for Rey, but for all of us.” Luke took a deep breath, “I want to make another addition to the family.”

Felicity frowned, “You want to get a pet?”

“No!” Luke groaned, rubbing his temples. “Felicity… I want to have another baby.”

She froze, “A what?”

“We’ve talked about this. We want two children, and I think it’s time to have our second. Everything I’ve read says that a three year age difference is best, and I think with Ben gone now’s the time. We do have an empty room upstairs now.”

“Luke, are you certain that you want a baby, or does your poverty ridden childhood make it hard for you to bear having an empty room in your house?”

“Felicity.”

“I’m kidding,” Felicity gently swatted his arm. She grinned at him, but when she looked down, her

“What is it?” Luke stroked a strand of hair out of her face.

She looked up at him, “Luke, I do want to have another baby. I truly do, but... But there’s something I should have talked to you about. I think I didn’t because no matter what you say, I’m standing by my decision, so please try not to talk me out of it.”

Felicity took another deep breath, “I’ve decided I’m not going to have another baby.”

“I’m open to adoption or surrogacy if you really want it to be from our genetics, but... I’m not getting pregnant again, and there’s nothing you can say to change my mind.”

“No, of course. I’ll support you 100% in this. Sorry, I’m just caught a little off guard. You’ve never talked about this before. Might I ask why?”

“A number of factors. I’m almost forty years old. Pregnancy at thirty-six was complicated enough, but forty and above can legitimately have dangers. Higher risk of complications, higher risk of multiple babies, it’s a risk I’m not happy to take. Plus, pregnancy wasn’t fun. The morning sickness, the back aches, and not to mention that oh so fun thirty-two-hour labour. But of course, there’s the most obvious reason... I don’t want to risk getting Postpartum Depression again.”

She took a deep breath as tears shone in the corners of her eyes, “Luke, that period in my life was horrible. The darkness and emptiness. I never want to go through it again. I know that there’s no guarantees and that you can get it when you adopt, but I’m not risking it from pregnancy. Ok? I’m not putting myself through that again. That moment when I almost killed our daughter... That was the most terrifying moment of my life. And that includes lying on the floor of the Death Star, my back ripped open and bloodied, your father standing over me with a lightsaber as he swung down to deliver a death blow.”

“Are you disappointed?” Felicity had uncertainty in her eyes.

He chuckled, “Only that I don’t get an excuse to make love to you more frequently.”

“Luke Skywalker, have you not realized it by now? I’m pretty much good to go any time, any place.”

“Yes, and that has gotten me a lot of trouble in the past, Miss Rhiaon.”

Felicity chuckled, wrapping her arms around his neck, “How much trouble?”

Luke laughed and pulled her into a heated kiss. They played for a few minutes, hands roaming and lips teasing their tastes. But when Felicity started to lift the hem of his shirt, Luke pulled away.

“And you call me a tease,” Felicity groaned, slumping back against the couch. “Alright, hit me.”

“Which do you want? Adoption or surrogacy?”

Felicity absent-mindedly rubbed her wrist tattoo, “As much as I love Rey being our genetic offspring, I think I want to adopt our second. We both know what it was like to be… sort of orphans. I think giving a misfortunate child a home would be great.”

“That’s exactly what I was thinking,” Luke smiled warmly. “But if we are going to adopt… then I think we should wait a few years before bringing another child into the house. Wait until Rey’s maybe five or six, that way she can understand what’s going on better.”

“I completely agree,” Felicity nodded. “Besides, Brendan was five years older than me. I think I like that age difference.”

“Then we have a plan.”

“In two or three years, we’ll talk to Rey and start the process of adoption… and tonight I’m going to make love to you so passionately, it’ll make up for not having trying to make a baby sex.”

Luke grinned, “Should we take this into the bedroom then?”

“Oh Master Skywalker,” Felicity chuckled. She straddled his lap and wrapped her arms around his neck, “Rey’s asleep upstairs, Artoo’s powered down for the night, there’s no more boys in the house… I think this couch will be just fine.”

He laughed and laid back on the couch, pulling Felicity down with him.

9 Years, 6 Months, 4 Days

Luke leaned against the doorframe, arms folded and a smile gracing his lips. Dressed in casual pyjamas, he silently watched his beautiful wife and daughter, not wanting to interrupt the peaceful scene.

Felicity was lying in the bed with Rey, her voice soothing the little girl to sleep as she absentmindedly stroked Rey’s hair. The kyber crystal bracelet was wrapped around Rey’s wrist from where it had almost never moved ever since it became safe for her to wear it.

Luke sensed the footsteps thudding up the stairs before he heard them.

“Good night, Ben,” Luke didn’t even turn around to look at his nephew.

Ben had a scowl on his face as he reached the landing. He had been so sullen the past few weeks when Alyla had announced she was moving to Cloud City to live with Lando. Alyla still was on Rornian most of the time, but not long enough to be able to supervise a fifteen-year-old on a regular basis. As a result, Ben had moved back in with his uncle.

“Night, Uncle Luke,” Ben headed for the door of his bedroom.

“Ben?”

He stopped at the door.

Ben sighed dramatically and then entered the room.

“Ben!” Rey sat up, her happiness and energy levels going up at the sight of her beloved cousin.

“Sweet dreams, Nightlight,” Ben gave her a hug that Rey was all too happy to return.

Felicity groaned as Ben undid all the work she had done to get Rey settled for sleep. But if that was his intent – and considering their relationship, it was very likely – Ben didn’t say anything. He just broke off the hug and started for the door.

“Ben,” Luke gently grasped his arm as he tried to pass. He shot Ben a look, “Felicity?”

“Ugh! Fine!” Ben rolled his eyes. “Goodnight, Rhiaon. Feel free to die in your sleep anytime.”

“Bed, now!” Luke used his grasp on Ben’s arm to move him out of the room. “And you’re going to lose some privileges for that comment. You are not allowed to say things like that to my wife. We’re going to have a chat in the morning about how you speak to Felicity.”

Ben grumbled some angry words in Huttese, stalking down the hallway, and dramatically slamming his hand against the button to close his bedroom door.

“I’m sorry, Felicity,” Luke apologized, turning back to his wife.

Felicity carelessly waved her hand, “It’s nothing I’m not used to.”

“Mommy, why doesn’t Ben like you?” Rey innocently asked.

Luke and Felicity shared a panicked look. That answer had a few too many things in it they weren’t ready to share with Rey… Heck, there were even a few things they hadn’t shared with Han.

“You know what, Sweetheart?” Felicity quickly said. “That’s a story for another night. Don’t you want to hear the end of the one I was already telling?”

“Yes, please!” Rey exclaimed. “Were you and Master Obik scared during the Battle of Yavin?”

“So scared. I must have been squeezing Obik’s hand so hard during that broadcast, but he never said a word,” Felicity’s voice was low as she told Rey’s favorite story: the Battle of Yavin, this time from her own perspective when she listened to the broadcast of the battle with the rest of the Rebels on the Joorvan base.

Felicity’s mind was on nothing but the sleepy little girl in her arms. It was impossible to conceive how much love Felicity held for her daughter. Those dark days of postpartum depression were long past, and the incident they did not speak of was a mere memory.

“Mommy?” Rey asked. “Did they really play the transmissions on all Rebel bases?”

“They did,” Felicity nodded. “We knew whether we won or lost, the Battle of Yavin would be something that went down in history.”

“Was flying in the battle scary, Daddy?” Rey looked to her father.

“What was that?”

Luke smiled and looked at Felicity, “Hope. The hope that was planted by your mother and her team.
Hope of victory, of peace, of freedom. Of the future…”

Felicity’s eyes met Luke’s. They stared lovingly at each other, a flood of love and Light engulfing the Force in the room.

“Of this,” Luke whispered. “I knew, I was fighting for this.”

A half hour later, when Rey was asleep and the lights were out, Luke and Felicity quietly slipped out of the bedroom and shut the door behind them.

Luke smiled at Felicity in the darkness of the hallway as she turned from the door to face him. Beaming brightly, Felicity’s arms automatically wrapped around Luke’s neck, and she pressed her lips to his.

“Thank you,” Felicity whispered when the kiss came to an end. She followed Luke’s lead, bowing her head to rest her forehead against him. “Thank you for fighting for this.”

“No,” Luke placed his natural hand upon her cheek and stroked her lips with his thumb. “Thank you for fighting for this.”

Felicity smiled, “Anytime.”

9 Years, 11 Months, 21 Days

The Holo of Felicity shrugged, “I prefer the term borrowed against his will.”

“You kidnapped Ben,” Alyla repeated, seeming to hold back a smile.

“Maybe a little bit.”

Luke groaned as Lando chuckled at his side.

Lando and Alyla had invited Luke over to Alyla’s Rornian home for breakfast that morning to go over some paperwork. The couple was in the middle of the approval phase of the adoption process, and had asked Luke to be one of their three references to vouch they had a stable home and would be good parents – the other two references were Han and Leia, and Gavyn and Zena. While Luke knew that Alyla’s brother would ensure she got a glowing reference, he could only imagine what Han and Leia would say about Lando.

Luke had actually been quite excited but the prospect. As an orphan, he always loved to see unfortunate children find a home. He had even been a reference once before when he wrote a letter on behalf of Wedge and his husband.

Lando and Alyla had Luke over for dinner the previous night to discuss Luke’s letter and the following interview process, and Felicity suggested Luke just stay the night so he could continue the work with them in the morning. At the time, Luke thought it was Felicity being thoughtful, but the following morning when Luke received a comm from Reine, he realized her deviousness.

Late last night, Reine and Obik received a comm from Felicity. According to Reine, Felicity claimed that Luke had taken Ben to an overnight bonding time camping in the woods. She then had received an emergency comm from Nils Arlos saying there was something going on with an old Emissary case of hers that could only be handled by her, and he needed her to come to Coruscant right away to sort things out. She asked if she could drop off Rey at their home for the night to watch her until Luke could pick her up in the morning.

Reine and Obik agreed without a second thought, and Felicity dropped Rey off at about midnight promising Luke would come for her in the morning. When eleven o’clock rolled around and they still hadn’t heard anything from Luke, Reine commed him and the deception was soon discovered. Felicity was gone, Ben was gone, and Gavyn Kene’s ship was gone – Felicity having fed Gavyn some story about a family emergency and she needed to borrow it to go with Ben, Luke, and Rey to Hosnian Prime to see Leia.

One call to Gavyn’s ship later and it was clear what had happened: Felicity had gotten Luke out of the house, dropped off Rey with Reine and Obik, stole Gavyn’s ship, then got Ben out of bed spouting the same story about a family emergency, and essentially kidnapped Ben when he realized it was a trick.

“I don’t know why everyone is so mad at me,” Felicity’s Holo said. “It should be a life lesson. I lied to at least four Jedi and no one caught me out.”

“She has a point there,” Lando agreed.

“Uncle Luke, please come save me,” the Holo of Ben pleaded in the co-pilot seat of Gavyn Kene’s ship – which Felicity had also ‘borrowed against his will.’

“Felicity, you have to turn the ship around immediately,” Luke calmly ordered.

“You piloting a ship is enough to worry about.”

“Actually, she’s making me do that too,” Ben admitted.

“Well, that’s a relief,” Lando smirked as he took a drink of his hot chocolate – he having been the culprit who introduced Luke to the drink and began Luke Skywalker’s addiction to the stuff.

“What is your plan, Felicity?” Alyla asked.

“Yes, where are you going?” Luke nodded.

“Endor,” Felicity answered.

“Why?” Ben questioned.

The Holo of Felicity turned to Ben, “You want to be all obsessed about Grandpa Vader? Fine. Then it’s about time you took a field trip. We’re going to the grave of Darth Vader, and we’re having ourselves a little chat.”

Lando and Alyla exchanged a look.

“I thought Vader died on the Death Star,” Lando frowned.

“I’ll- Uh… Explain later.” Luke turned back to the Holo, “Felicity are you sure about this?”

“Relax, I know where it is. Leia showed me it the time we got trapped on Endor. And you needn’t worry about Ewoks. Wicket’s chief now; he wouldn’t dare eat Leia’s kid… I might run into some issues, but I can always get Threepio on the Holo to translate.”

“Well, I’m sure Ben wouldn’t let you get eaten by Ewoks. Right Ben?” Alyla looked at Ben.

Ben was silent.

“…Right, Ben?” Alyla repeated with a little more of an edge to her voice.

“I’m thinking!” he exclaimed.

Luke sighed, “Felicity-”

“We agreed we had to do something about this,” Felicity reminded. “Well, I’m doing something. Please, Luke… Let me do this.”

Luke looked at Ben, “Do you want to go to Endor?”

Ben looked down shyly, “I would like to see Grandfather’s grave.”

Luke turned to Alyla.

She nodded.

“All right,” Luke conceded. “But I want you home in three days, and I’m not doing the laundry for the next three months.”

“Deal,” Felicity grinned. “Oh, cheer up, Skywalker. What bad could possibly come from this?”

10 Years, 2 Months, 17 Days

It was a lazy Saturday afternoon when their lives changed. Ben was in the living room floating some fruit for the entertainment of Rey as she tried to imitate the ability.

“Almost there,” Ben encouraged as she focused on the pear. “Almost. Almost. Little more. There! You got it, Nightlight!”

Rey giggled as the pear floated in front of her, “Daddy! Daddy! Look what I’m doing!”

Luke looked up from the couch where he was reading. He immediately beamed at the sight of his daughter first ever fruit – or anything – floating.

“Good job, Sweetheart,” Luke said proudly. “Wow, I couldn’t even do that when I was nineteen.”

“You were at a disadvantage, Uncle Luke,” Ben said. He leaned in conspiratorially to Rey, “Go along with me. Your dad can’t know we’re better than him.”

Rey nodded, “It’s okay Daddy. Everyone has their own… learning rates.”

“Okay, you two aren’t spending anymore time alone with Han.”

“But he’s my Dad,” Ben frowned.

“I don’t care.”

“Mommy! Mommy!” Rey jumped up when Felicity entered the room, a laundry basket propped on her hip. She guided the fruit to turn in her mother’s direction, “Look what I can do!”
“Good job, Sweetheart,” Felicity grinned and bent down to kiss Rey’s forehead. “Did Daddy finally teach you that?”

“No, Ben did! He’s a extra good teacher!” Rey declared. “Even better than Daddy.”

“Yeah, Uncle Luke’s only got one to spare,” Ben teased.

“I’m about to start a load of laundry,” Felicity announced. “Everyone got their laundry down the chute?”

Luke and Rey nodded, but Ben shook his head.

“Well, are you going to put it down the chute?” Felicity tried to keep it friendly.

“If it inconveniences you… nope.”

“Thank you, Ben for volunteering to fold all the laundry for the next month,” Luke said dryly. “Your mother’s generosity surely rubbed off on you.”

“Fine,” Ben grumbled, standing up, “I’ll go get it.”

“Nope, I like this arrangement better,” Felicity pushed on his shoulder, forcing him back down. “I’ll get it from your hamper.”

“Fine, but don’t touch anything in my room.”

“Why would I ever want to touch anything in your room?”

Ben sulked as Felicity went to fetch his laundry. Meanwhile Luke get down on his knees with Rey to see if he could get her to float anything bigger.

“By the Gods!” Felicity exclaimed when she returned to the living room with Ben’s laundry filling her basket. “Ben, what is with the stench in your room? It smells like something died!”

Panic filled Ben’s eyes, “You didn’t touch anything?”

“No!” Felicity snapped. “Why would I want to touch something that smells like death? But I’m warning you: you’ve got until this load of laundry is done to get rid of that smell, or I’m going in there and finding it myself.”

“Alright, I’ll do it,” Ben groaned. “I just want to help Rey with this whole floating book thing. Give me ten minutes?”

“Fine,” Felicity stormed out.

Luke narrowed his eyes, “Ben, isn’t Alyla coming to pick up you and Rey in five minutes?”

“Yep,” Ben grinned.

“Six months of folding laundry, and three months of mowing the lawn.”

“Worth it.”
“He’s ridiculous, Luke,” Felicity declared two hours later as she dumped the freshly washed laundry on the coffee table. “If he thinks I’m not following through on my threat-”

“Don’t take this specific situation so personally,” Luke shook his head. “This is him just being a teenager. Besides, you know he’s being so difficult because of the whole Alyla adoption situation. I still can’t believe that next week those two are actually going to start meeting with children to find one that suits them. This time next month, Lando Calrissian could be a father.”

“That is a terrifying thought,” Felicity said. “But Ben… I swear, Luke, at this rate either I’m going to kill him, or he’s going to kill me.”

“I would not be surprised at either of those options.” Luke caught her hand as she reached for a shirt, “I’ll fold the laundry. You go upstairs and prove to Ben you mean business. That stench is getting pretty bad.”

“I just don’t know what he could possibly have in there that smells so bad.”

“Well, scream for me if it moves and attacks you.”

“And to think, people call me the sassy one,” Felicity kissed his cheek.

Luke chuckled and set about folding the laundry. It was just a simple afternoon with his family’s usual antics. There was absolutely nothing to indicate that their lives were about to change forever. Until Luke heard Felicity’s bloodcurdling scream.

He raced up the stairs, lightsaber at the ready, rushing to defend his wife. He found Felicity on the ground, terror in her eyes, her face pale and panicked.

“Felicity!” Luke exclaimed, kneeling down next to her. “What’s going on?”

“I want it out! I want it out of my house!” Felicity screamed hysterically, pointing across the room. “I want it out NOW!”

Luke looked up at the object she was pointing to, and his heart dropped.

Lying on the floor of Ben Solo’s bedroom… was the charred mask of Darth Vader.

10 Years, 2 Months, 18 Days

“I don’t like this,” Gavyn Kene declared as he paced the length of Reine and Obik’s living room.

It was where they had gathered after their failed confrontation of Ben. The mood was miserable among Sensitives and Non-Sensitives alike. After Luke, Felicity, Leia, and Han had failed to talk sense into Ben, he had been unceremoniously banished to Obik and Reine’s guest room for the night. In the morning they would try again, but Luke wasn’t sure how successful they would be.

“Yeah, my kid running around with my dead father-in-law’s helmet isn’t exact high on the list of life events I ever want to happen,” Han said as he lounged on the couch next to Felicity and Zena Halcorr. He tried his best to sound grumpy and snarky, but there was no hiding the inner turmoil from Luke. Han was struggling not only to grasp an understanding of what was going on with his son… but how was he even supposed to deal with it.
“You have to admit, seeing the melted, decapitated head of Darth Vader is mildly satisfying,” Felicity grinned, long over her terror of the mask. She caught Luke’s dirty look and shrugged, “Sorry.”

“Ok, for the record,” Luke declared, “that is not my father’s head. It is only his helmet. His head burned to ash along with the rest of his body when I lit his funeral pyre. And he wasn’t decapitated, he died after getting electrocuted saving my life.”

“Yeah, Luke, we get it,” Obik said dryly. “He saved your life. Doesn’t mean he wasn’t an ass to the rest of us.”

“Am I the only one here who genuinely doesn’t have any harsh feelings towards Vader?” Zena asked.

A series of positive responses chorused through the living room.

“Just thought I’d ask,” Zena shrugged it off, indifferent to the response.

“How do you not hate Vader?” Han sounded genuinely curious.

“He did some wonderful things for anti-slavery regulation.”

“See,” Luke said, “he wasn’t a complete monster.”

Felicity glared at him, “Luke, it’s those freaking lectures that put us in this position in the first place. Stop praising Vader! Ben takes them _way_ to heart!”

“Would you all shut it about Vader?” Gavyn exclaimed. “I’m freaked out about the fact my daughter _had a vision about me dying_!”

“Relax,” Zena fixed Gavyn with a look. “You know how excitable Miri gets during meditation.”

“Yeah, I swear that kid sees death every other day,” Obik added. “Last week she foresaw me drown, and I’m fine.”

“Obik, you _did_ almost drown,” Gavyn pointed out.

“Yeah, but I didn’t die.”

“Can we please change the subject?” Felicity asked.

“Gladly,” Leia sighed. “I just don’t understand what would possess Ben to steal Vader’s helmet. What does he even do with it?”

“I genuinely don’t want to know,” Felicity shuddered. “And to think, it’s been in my house for _months_. Thank the Gods, Rey never found it. Luke, are you _sure_ she’ll be safe tonight with Miri?”

“Ben isn’t going to do anything to her,” Luke tried to keep the annoyance from his voice. “For goodness’ sake, he’s locked in the bedroom of _this_ house.”

“Yeah, did we really have to do that?” Han asked. “I’m pretty sure that breaks a few fire codes.”

“It’s for his own good,” Leia said. “We can’t be sure of his actions until we talk some sense into him. He is a member of _this_ family after all. We have the tendency to wander off and do some stupid things. That’s how Luke lost a hand… a father.”
Luke raised an eyebrow, “You weren’t exactly stopping me from leaving that night on Endor.”

“Luke, you underestimate how close I was to yelling for Han, Chewie, and a few good yards of rope.”

Han smirked, “And now I’m picturing the Battle of Endor with Luke tied to a tree in the background… It’s a good image.”

“It is,” Felicity grinned.

Luke narrowed his eyes at the duo and opened his mouth to speak when his mind suddenly filled with an image.

Ben stood in the Meditation Gardens, lightsaber in his hand and desperation on his face. A crate lay on the ground a few feet away and inside was the helmet of Darth Vader. Alyla and Reine stood between Ben and the helmet, their lightsabers in hand, ready for a fight.

“Step aside,” Ben ordered, his voice shaking as hard as his grip on the lightsaber. It was unlit but his stance was threatening.

“Ben, please don’t do this,” Alyla’s voice was peaceful and tender. It was the tone that could always calm and contain Ben, but this night it didn’t seem to work.

“You don’t understand.”

“Then help me understand,” Alyla tried to coax. She took a step forward and Ben took one back. Alyla sighed and tried again, “You don’t have to do this.”

“Yes, I do,” Ben whispered.

“No, you don’t. You’re stronger than this. Stronger than him. Don’t listen to Snoke. Don’t let him in!”

“He’s already in.” Tears shone in Ben’s eyes, “Alyla, please don’t make me do this. I don’t want you to get hurt.”

“No one is getting hurt. I promise. Please, Ben, just listen to me!” Alyla begged.

Reine’s countenance was not so friendly, her eyes dark and her tone hard, “Ben, if you attack, we will be forced to defend ourselves.”

A panicked look flooded Alyla’s face, “Reine, no!”

But Reine’s words had spurred Ben on. His eyes flashed yellow, and he gripped his saber with both hands.

“Then so be it,” Ben growled.

And a brilliant cerulean blade ignited.

“Luke!” Felicity’s panicked voice drew him back from the vision. She was gripping the sides of his arms, looking up at him in fear.

How long had she been trying to get his attention? Long enough for everyone in the room to be staring at him uneasily.

“Did any of you see that?” Luke croaked, his voice oddly dry.

The Jedi shook their heads.

“What did you see, Luke?” Terror was also in the eyes of Gavyn Kene.

Luke blinked, reaching into the Force to try to catch back the vision, “Ben. Where is Ben?”

“It’s okay,” Leia said. “He’s upstairs in the guest room.”

“I’ll go check,” Han lifted off the couch and tried his best to look casual as he climbed the stairs, barking his son’s name. There was no fooling the room into believing he wasn’t booking it up the staircase in panic.

And then the Jedi saw it.

“BEN! I don’t want to do this!” Alyla screamed, her violet blade interlocked with the saber that once belonged to Obi-Wan Kenobi. The weapon she had taught him to fight with, interlocked with the weapon she had entrusted him with.

There was pain in Ben’s eyes, and perhaps even guilt. He loved Alyla as dearly as his own mother, and it showed in his actions. Ben used the Force to throw Alyla back from him, away from the line of fire as he swung powerfully at Reine.

Reine’s face was hard, but not in anger as she dueled back Ben Solo, the same boy she used to playfully spar with as a child. But as she fought him it a clear duel to the death, Reine did not hold back. As a Jedi, it was her responsibility to subdue the Dark Side, regardless of who was using it.

Ben yelled as Reine’s saber bit across his wrist, causing him to drop it. He glared at her, gripping his bloody wrist. The message was clear: Reine was not only capable, but willing to cut off his hand if she was pushed to it.

“We really got to stop using the term disarm so literally,” Obik said dryly as the Jedi looked to each other in horror.

Leia and Felicity looked about the room in confusion. Neither of them were able to see visions of the Force, but Leia could sense when her family was in danger, and Felicity had lived among the Jedi long enough to know when someone was having a vision.

“What’s going on?” Leia demanded. “Luke, is it Ben? Has something happened to his…arm?”

“Yeah, seriously,” Felicity said, “three generations of Skywalker men losing arms just sounds tacky.”

“Fliss!”

“What? It does!”

“My son could have lost his arm and you’re joking about it?”
“I don’t do well under this type of conversation! I thought you would have caught on to that after I made a joke about killing Rey three days after I literally almost killed her!”

“Everyone calm down,” Luke ordered. “Ben hasn’t lost a hand. Reine just caught him on the wrist… or will catch him. The visions aren’t probably current. Last time we checked, Ben was up in the room.”

“BEN!” Han bellowed from the floor above. There was a loud thudding of running footsteps and they heard Han yell, “He’s gone! Ben’s gone!”

“What?” Leia exclaimed, as everyone shot into action.

Han thundered down the stairs, panic on his face, “The window is open and Ben is gone.”

“The visions are current,” Zena shot to her feet, joining Gavyn, who was already prepping his saber belt.

“They can’t be,” Obik insisted. “His saber is locked in a cabinet in the upstairs office.”

“Your cabinet is open, and the saber is gone.” Han spat a few curses in an alien language and said to himself, ‘Damn it! Why did I teach him to pick locks?’”

“Shocking how teaching our son to do criminal activity had negative repercussions,” Leia shot. She noticed Gavyn in the corner of her eye, “What are you doing?”

Gavyn secured his saber to his belt, “Arming myself.”

“No, he’s not going to hurt anyone!”

“You didn’t see the vision!” Gavyn snapped.

“Don’t you Gavyn me,” Gavyn imitated Luke’s tone of voice. “My sister is in a duel to the death right now. I don’t care who this kid is or how young he is. If he tries to hurt my sister, I will defend her.”

Gavyn’s tone spoke of more than the immediate situation. He had spent the entirety of his youth protecting Alyla from the dregs of society. Sometimes he had won, but more times he had failed. It was clear that Gavyn refused to fail this time.

Little did he know what was about to come.

“No, please,” Leia begged. “You can’t hurt him.”

“Hurt who?” Han arrived back in the living room.

“They want to go after Ben.”

“Like hell you will!” Han exclaimed. “If you think you’re going to lay a hand on my son-”

“So, I just let him hurt my sister?” Gavyn snapped.

“He would never hurt Alyla!”

“Boys! Am I going to have to get Lando on the comm to mediate you two?” Felicity yelled.
“I’d at least think you would be on my side with how much you threaten him,” Gavyn countered.

Felicity rolled her eyes, “My desire to smack Ben upside the head is opportunistic. I don’t get the whiteboard out and design schemes in my garage.”

The group fell silent.

“We can’t go in with aggression and anger,” Luke spoke slowly. “Now everyone, let’s take a deep breath and calmly proceed to the Meditation Gardens.”

“He’s right,” Obik agreed. “We need to stay calm. If he go in with Dark Side in our hearts, it’s only going to provoke-”

A bone chilling scream filled the Force as Ben’s blade slashed down Reine’s face, and she collapsed to her knees.

Obik’s eyes went wide.

“REINE!” he screamed and bolted for the door.

Gavyn followed, hot on his heels pushing Luke aside to get to the door. The men were out the door, Zena tagging behind before Luke even realized what was going on.

“Damn it, Kene!” Han roared, running after the trio.

“What’s going on?” Leia asked.

Luke sighed, “Ben may have just injured Reine, and he’s fighting Alyla. Gavyn and Obik are going to go defend the women, I think.”

“And Loud Mouth Solo is going to defend Ben,” Felicity sighed.

“Oh God,” Leia groaned. “Han’s either going to kill someone or get himself killed.”

“Let’s go after the Loud Mouth before he does anything else stupid,” Felicity grabbed Leia’s hand. “Coming Skywalker?”

A few seconds later the groggy, sleep-laded voice of Kalonia replied, “Yes, Master Skywalker?”

“Join us in the Meditation Gardens immediately. I think there’s been an accident.” Luke then punched off his comm and looked up at Leia and Felicity, “Let’s do this.”

“Gavyn! Gavyn, slow down!” Luke yelled as the group raced through the village to the Meditation Gardens.

It didn’t take Luke long to catch up to Gavyn. Besides Zena, Luke was the fastest runner of the lot, and in no time, Luke was at his side, grabbing Gavyn’s shoulder.

“Get off me, Skywalker!” Gavyn shoved Luke away, not slowing his pace. “Alyla’s in danger!”
“Alyla is not in danger!” Luke exclaimed. “How many times do I have to tell you, Ben would never-”

Something Dark slammed through the Force, and Gavyn fell to his knees. Luke was standing close enough to Gavyn to feel the ice-cold emptiness that ran through Gavyn’s violet Force Signature. Looking around, he could see the wound in the Force had been so violent that not only had Leia felt it, but even Han and Felicity froze for a moment. Luke didn’t understand what could possibly have affected all of them so suddenly and so dramatically.

And then he saw the vision.

---

Ben’s lightsaber shoved through Alyla’s abdomen, and a look of absolute shock on her face.

"Why?" she whispered.

Ben had no answer.

---

“ALYLA!” Gavyn screamed as the vision faded away.

Luke could barely stand. No, this couldn’t true. Ben couldn’t have…

He felt Gavyn’s frantic movements in the Force. The way his violet signature flurried around Alyla’s diminishing magenta one. The violet reached out for the magenta, trying to grasp and hold her, to keep her tethered to the world of the living as bit by bit it faded away.

And then the magenta was gone.

Instantly, everyone’s wrist comms started to beep. A flurry of confused Jedi had been woken in the middle of the night by the sudden loss of Alyla Kene.

“No,” Gavyn panted in shock, on his hands and knees. He shook violently, and his chest convulsed like he was holding back the urge to vomit. “No, Ally. Alyla!”

He opened his mouth to speak, but no words came out.

“Luke!” Another voice called, and suddenly Doctor Kalonia – still in her pyjamas – was at their side. “Master Skywalker, what’s going on?”

“Alyla…” Luke swallowed. His throat was dry, “Alyla’s… I think she’s dead.”

He didn’t need to be a Jedi to feel the fear that coursed through the group.

“No,” Leia shook her head. Her voice shook as tears threatened to fill her eyes. She was leaning against Han whose white was white and still. “No, it’s not true. It’s impossible.”

Then a flurry of movement behind Luke. Gavyn Kene shot to his feet and he and Obik – fearing for Reine’s life – booked it towards the Meditation Gardens. There were no words exchanged by the group, they simply turned and raced after the group.

Luke would never forget the moment Gavyn Kene entered the Meditation Gardens that night.
“ALYLA! ALYLA!” Gavyn screamed, frantically looking around the Gardens for his sister. “ALLY, WHERE ARE YOU?”

“REINE?” Obik called behind Gavyn. Both he and Gavyn had their sabers lit, ready to fight Ben should they be forced to. “REINE, BABY I’M HERE!”

“ALLY!” Gavyn screamed again as the rest of the group arrived.

“Shh,” Zena held up a hand, her cat ears twitching. “Do you hear that?”

The humans strained to reach the Zygerrian’s hearing abilities, but sure enough there was a faint sobbing coming not too far from them.

“REINE!”

“ALLY!”

The group raised through the gardens, Gavyn carelessly pushing through plants, trampling quite a few in the process.

“REINE, BABY WHERE ARE YOU?” Obik called.

“ALLY! ALYLA! I’M HERE! I’M HERE!” Gavyn desperately yelled. “IT’S GOING TO BE OKAY! WHERE ARE YOU!”

And then they broke into the clearing where they found a horrifying sight. Reine doubled over, screaming and sobbing in pain as she clutched at her face, her hands dripping with blood. Alyla lying on her back, perfectly motionless, her lightsaber gone and Obi-Wan’s discarded at her feet with a piece of black, bloody fabric. And both Ben and Vader’s mask were nowhere to be found.

“ALLY!” Gavyn bolted to Alyla’s still form.

“REINE!” Obik raced to his wife’s side and dropped to his knees. Without a thought, he pulled Reine into his arms and placed his hands over hers to maintain the pressure over Reine’s wounds. Soon enough, his hands were coated with her hot, sticky blood as she cried in his embrace. “It’s okay, it’s okay, Baby. I got you. I got you.”

“Oh Gods,” Felicity gasped, staring at the scene in horror.

Zena slowly followed Gavyn, but said nothing as she stood watching her husband take Alyla into his arms.

“Ally!” Gavyn gasped, holding her up. He winced as her head drooped back limply. “Ally, it’s okay. I’m here. I’m here. You’ll be okay. You’re gonna be fine.”

Han, Luke, and Leia said nothing as they stared at the scene in voiceless shock. What could even be said? Ben had done this.

In an effort to help, Gavyn pressed a hand to Alyla’s lightsaber wound that was oddly bloody. Lightsaber wounds were cauterized by the blade; they only bled if they were irritated. But Luke eyed the probable culprit: the bloody piece of fabric by Obi-Wan’s lightsaber, that looked oddly like a piece of the shirt Ben had been wearing. Had he scrubbed at the wounds? If so… why?

“Doctor, help Reine!” Obik shouted as his sand toned hands stained with the crimson of his wife’s blood. He had to shake Reine a few times to stop her from passing out.
“No!” Reine weakly pushed Kalonia away. “Help Alyla!”

Reluctantly, Kalonia rose to her feet and turned away from the woman with the bloody face. She approached Alyla, but a few steps away she stopped in her tracks. The expression on her face said everything.

But as Gavyn looked up helplessly at her, he wasn’t ready to take no for an answer.

“Help her!” Gavyn screamed, cradling his sister as tenderly as he had his infant daughter. “Don’t just stand there! Save her!”

Slowly, Kalonia dropped to her knees and gently began examining Alyla’s form. A few touches were all it took to make her diagnosis.

“Gavyn…” Kalonia whispered. “Gavyn, she’s cold.”

His eyes filled with tears, “No, no.”

“I’m so sorry,” Kalonia touched his shoulder.

Gavyn let out one of the most desperate cries Luke would ever hear in his life. Gavyn pulled his sister’s dead body into his tight embrace and sobbed hysterically as he clutched her desperately in his arms.

The scene was a blur around Luke. He barely noticed when Kalonia left Alyla to tend to Reine. He couldn’t believe that Ben could have done this.

Slowly a conversation ensued among the group, but Luke barely listened. Instead, he looked around the room with detachment, trying to be more than a ghost as he participated in the scene. But he was just so stunned that night he mourned Felicity on Jakku, it was only three specific moments he could truly recall.

He remembered when he made eye contact with Zena Halcorr.

“Jedi Killer,” she snarled, her eyes as cold, hard, and sharp as ice.

“No,” Leia whispered. “Don’t call my son that.”

“Well, he is, isn’t he?” Zena snapped. “He killed a Jedi, therefore he is a Jedi Killer.”

“He’s just a child!”

“He killed Alyla! He killed my sister who was more my sister in heart than by law. If he killed Felicity, would you want me to ask you not to mourn?”

Luke remembered the moment that Kalonia wanted to move Reine.

“I have to take her to surgery now,” she said, interrupting the feud.

Obik and Kalonia helped Reine to her feet. Kalonia had applied some temporary bacta to her face to stop the bleeding and regulate her a bit.

“How are you feeling?” Obik asked.
Reine groaned, “My face… There’s not even a word for this pain.”

“Are you drowsy? Have a headache?” Kalonia inquired.

“Little bit of a headache from the constant beeping of everyone’s comms.”

“Sorry, Reine, we’ll turn them off,” Felicity said.

“Wait, we might need them,” Kalonia said. “Reine, I’m going to need to do a blood transfusion, but I don’t keep blood on hand. I’m going to need a donor.”

“Take mine,” Obik rolled up his sleeve and held out his arm.

Reine rolled her eyes, “Honey, you are AB Positive, and I’m O Negative. We’re the absolute opposites of the spectrum.”

“Oh, I was hoping you weren’t O Negative,” Kalonia groaned. “You can only receive O Negative blood and there’s only one other person who has that type on Rornian.”

“Who?” Obik asked.

“Tyla Kinall.”

Luke sighed, “I’ll call her. Hopefully she won’t object to being a donor.”

“And if she’s not, I’m more than happy to hold her down and force a transfusion,” Zena sneered.

Kalonia sighed at Zena’s comment but said nothing.

Luke was surprised, usually Felicity or Han would be the one to make that type of comment, but Han was looking so utterly lost, and there was fear in Felicity’s eyes as she looked around the Meditation Gardens wildly.

“Master Skywalker?” Kalonia prompted.

“Luke, what’s going on?” Tyla’s voice was immediately on the comm.

“There’s been… An incident,” Luke sighed, not knowing how else to phrase it. “Tyla… Alyla Kene is dead.”

In the corner of his eye, Luke saw Leia wince. She turned and buried herself in Felicity’s embrace.

“Oh my God, what happened?” Tyla exclaimed.

“It was… It was Ben,” Luke admitted. “Please, Tyla I’ll explain later. He also injured Reine badly. She needs a blood transfusion, and you’re her only match-”

“Yes, of course, I’ll come down immediately. Oh God, how could Ben have done this? And to Alyla of all people.”

“I know it’s all very shocking, but we need to act quickly.”

“Has Ben been detained?”

“No. We weren’t-”
“Master Skywalker, are you telling me that someone who just killed and injured two of our own is roaming wild? He has to be stopped! The others have to be warned!”

“Tyla, it’s alright. Ben isn’t-”

Zena growled, “Skywalker, if you say Ben isn’t going to hurt anyone, I’m going to punch you.”

Luke took a step away from Zena.

“You’re right, Tyla,” Luke admitted. “Everyone should be warned. I’ll make an announcement, just get to the Med Center.”

“Yes, Master Skywalker.”

With a shaking hand, Luke punched in the code to broadcast to all of the Jedi’s comms and made one of the worst announcements of his life.

“I know you all have a lot of questions, so I’ll make this simple. Alyla Kene is dead. Reine Agim is injured, but alive and being rushed into surgery. Ben Solo is responsible. Though his own saber has been discarded, Alyla’s is missing so he may be armed. I implore that you do not go searching for him. Justice will not be met by a lynch mob, am I understood?”

Obik, Reine, Zena, and Gavyn exchanged a look, and then reluctantly nodded.

“If you do encounter him, he is to be considered as extremely dangerous. Immediately call for backup, and absolutely do not engage him, especially not alone. If you defy my orders and do manage to capture and subdue him, do not harm him. Call me and I will deal with the situation. And Ben, if you’re listening to this, I just want to say… I- I just… want to say… Oh God, Ben, what have you done?”

The final moment he remembered was when he flicked off his comm and Felicity said:

“Tyla’s right.”

Those were words Luke honestly never thought he’d hear her utter.

“Tyla’s right,” Felicity repeated. “Ben is somewhere out there on the loose.”

Leia pushed away from Felicity, “Don’t talk about my son like that! He’s not a wild animal!”

“He just murdered the one woman we swore up and down he would never hurt!” Felicity exclaimed. “That boy is no longer the one you called son! If he can kill Alyla, who else will he kill? Me? Han? There’s nothing to hold him back now!”

“You’re wrong,” Leia’s voice shook. “There’s still good in him, I feel it.”

“God, is that what you sounded like on Endor?” Felicity shot a look at Luke.

Luke had no response, so gave a non-committal shrug.

“Easy, Reine,” Kalonia said as she and Obik guided her towards the exit.

To Luke’s surprise, Han was following behind them.
“Where are you going?” Leia frowned, equally confused by Han’s action.

Han stopped and sighed, his head drooping slightly. His reply was devastating:

“Someone’s gotta tell Lando.”

Luke did not envy that conversation.

“Oh God,” he heard Gavyn sob behind him. “She’s supposed to go next week and pick out her kid… She’s supposed to become a Mom. She’s always wanted to be a Mom.”

Luke couldn’t bear to look at Gavyn as he broke down even further. Instead he watched Zena as she considered something, then went over to a grow of flowers, picked one, and laid it on Alyla’s chest.

It was one of the blue morning glories Alyla and Lando had planted together.

“Nobody is safe now,” Felicity whispered. “Not any Jedi, not any family, not any-”

And then she stopped dead.

“Rey!” Fear flooded into her heart, and Felicity bolted for the door.

“Felicity!” Luke yelled, running after her, Zena following close behind.

In the distance, he could see Han heading for the Millennium Falcon, and the other group proceeding to the Medical Center. They left Leia and Gavyn back in the Meditation Gardens with Alyla’s body, while Felicity was headed straight for Gavyn and Zena’s home.

“Rey! Rey!” Felicity exclaimed as they burst through the door. Before Luke could slow her, Felicity was already headed to the garage where they had hidden Rey for the night.

“Mom!” Miri scrambled down the stairs into her mother’s embrace. Her face was red, sad, and confused, “Mom, I heard the message! Is Aunt Ally dead?”

Luke didn’t hear the answer as he followed Felicity into the garage.

“Rey!” Felicity cried as she raced into the room.

A sleepy little girl blinked and groaned in as she sat up in her cot, confused by her mother’s panicked voice.

“Mommy?” Rey rubbed her eyes, pushing away the heavy blankets wrapped around her. Instead she chose to be wrapped up in something warmer and more comfortable: her mother’s arms. “Mommy, what’s going on?”

“It’s okay, Sweetheart, Mommy’s here,” Felicity frantic checked her daughter over. “Is everything okay? Are you hurt?”

But things weren’t okay, Luke realized numbly. The garage was missing its most prominent fixture: Gavyn’s ship.

“I’m okay,” Rey replied. “I promise. Did Ben tell you I wasn’t?”

“Rey, was Ben here?” Luke asked slowly. He ran a hand over her chocolate curls, doing his own examination of Rey’s safety.

“Uh huh,” Rey nodded. “He woke me up and asked if I was okay.”

Rey shrugged, “Not much.”

“Sweetheart,” Felicity said slowly, “you have to tell Mommy and Daddy exactly what happened with Ben. What did he do? What he say?”

“He said that he was sorry, but he had to go. He did something bad and had to go away for a little while. He didn’t want to leave and he said this wasn’t my fault. He just wanted to say goodbye and to tell me to always remember that he loves me. Then I went back to sleep… Is Ben in trouble?”

“Yes,” Felicity answered bluntly. “He’s in a lot of trouble right now.”

“What did he do?” Fear filled Rey’s eyes.

“Oh Sweetheart,” Luke rubbed her arm. And then he froze. In glanced down in confusion and noticed something was very wrong, “Rey… where’s your bracelet?”

Rey frowned and looked down. Her eyes widened when she noticed her bare wrist.

“It’s gone!” Rey exclaimed. “Daddy, it’s gone! It was on when I went to sleep! I promise!”

Felicity glanced at him warily, “Luke… what does this mean?”

Luke sighed, “It means that Ben Solo has been seduced by the Dark Side… and is now armed with the Sith crystal I never wanted him to have.”

10 Years, 2 Months, 19 Days

A heavy silence clung to the Skywalker house. Luke’s eyes were dark and his head hung heavily as he walked down the hallway of the upper level. His heart lurched as he glanced into the empty room that belonged to his nephew. Ben’s possessions lay abandoned, and Luke couldn’t help but wonder what other dark secrets might be hidden inside.

He couldn’t bear to discover that today.

In the bedroom he had just come out of, Rey was crying into the furry arms of Chewbacca. She couldn’t understand what was going on. Why Ben had left, why Reine had been slashed across the face, why Alyla was dead.

Truth be told, Luke didn’t have an answer either.

Reaching the top of the stairs, Luke glanced over the railing at the entrance to the living room where Leia and Han were mourning. He felt so guilty, how could he have failed them so terribly? How could he let this happen to their son, his nephew?

Luke just didn’t understand.
He sighed and entered the bedroom. Felicity was sitting on the bed, staring blankly at the wall, a hint of guilt in her eyes, and her face white with shock.

“Reine’s out of surgery now,” Luke announced. “Kalonia says she’ll be fine. The scars won’t go away for more than a year but they will fade.”

“That’s good to hear,” Felicity didn’t look over at him. “How’s Gavyn?”

“In shambles.”

“I can’t imagine the sorrow he’s going through.”

“Really? I expected you to make an analogy to Brendan.”

“What happened is worse than losing Brendan.”

“Never thought you’d say those words,” Luke said completely serious.

Felicity ran a hand through her hair, “Alyla was such an important part of his life for him entire life. I just had Brendan at the start, and you’ve only had Leia since you were nineteen. Losing Alyla must be like losing Brendan and Leia put together.”

“Well, truth be told, it’s Zena I’m frightened for. She’s out for blood and already has everyone calling Ben… Jedi Killer.”

Felicity looked down, “I guess that is what he is… Rey was asking me to explain what happened, but I don’t even know what to say.”

“I’m just thankful Chewbacca got here so fast. He’s making sure she’s taken care of while we four take care of ourselves.” Luke sat down next to Felicity and pulled her into his arms, “Lando’s breaking every law of government and physics to get here as quickly as possible. Gavyn’s agreed to hold off on funeral plans until Lando arrives. He said that if Zena had died, he would deserve the chance to see her body, and that Lando deserves the same.”

“Do you think Lando and Alyla loved each other?”

Luke kissed the top of her head, “I know they did.”

“They were going to adopt a child.”

“Yes, they were.”

Felicity began to cry.

“I’m sorry,” Felicity wept in his arms as Luke held her tight. “I’m so sorry.”

“There’s nothing for you to be sorry about,” Luke assured her.

“I did this, Luke. I pushed him to this.”

“No, you didn’t. He made his own choices. I should have tried harder to save him.”

“Enough,” Luke urged. “We could sit here and lay blame all day. I just… I wished I had listened to you. All these years you tried to tell me that Ben was turning… why didn’t I listen? Why didn’t I see that you were right?”

“You know for once,” Felicity rested her head against his, “I wish I wasn’t right.”

And so they held each other and cried.

10 Years, 4 Months, 11 Days

“Pack as many weapons as you can,” Luke ordered as he and Felicity hurriedly packed their bags. “I don’t know if anyone else has a map to Ahch-to, and if the First Order finds us, we’ll need to be prepared.”

“What are we going to tell Rey?” Felicity asked as she went through the closet.

“We’ll tell her we’re going on an adventure. I don’t want her to panic, so let’s make this fun. A game of sorts.”

“This isn’t a game, Luke. She needs to be protected over anything else. If Ben gets to her-”

“He’s not going to hurt her,” Luke snapped.

“How can you be so sure?” Felicity shot back. “He’s threatened by her.”

“He loves her.”

“That’s not enough! He loved Alyla and still killed her.”

“But he didn’t hurt Rey,” Luke reminded. “He had the chance that night, but he didn’t hurt her.”

“He stole her bracelet,” Felicity objected. “He has a Sith crystal. Let’s not pretend we don’t know what he’s going to do with that, Luke. Our only hope is that he forgets to ventilate it properly and blows himself up.”

Luke winced at the image of his nephew dead. As much as Ben had hurt them, Luke didn’t want him to die.

“Let’s speak of something else,” Luke shook his head. “Have you and Obik gone over hut assignments?”

“Still needs a little tweaking, but if I remember the layout correctly, we should be fine.”

A coy smirk crossed Felicity’s lips.

“I know that look,” Luke chuckled. “Should I take off my pants now, or wait for you to do it?”

“I may have done something sneaky, Luke,” Felicity set her gatherings from the closet on the bed.

“Oh, really?” Luke wrapped his arms around her waist and pulled her against him. “What did you do?”

“I may have assigned us a very familiar hut,” Felicity nuzzled him. “I look forward to re-enacting a certain scene from our honeymoon.”

“As do I,” Luke whispered, his lips hovering over hers. “But I think we might need to practice a bit first. You know, go over the choreography, and remember our cues.”
“With pleasure, Master Skywalker,” Felicity wove a hand into his hair and pulled him in for a tender kiss.

He had her on the bed in a moment, lying between the two suitcases crowding the mattress. She moaned as their lips hungrily pressed together over and over and their hands ran over each other’s bodies.

Felicity gasped as Luke’s natural hand found berth between her thighs. She rolled her hips against his touch, and pulled his shirt over his head. Luke grunted as her tongue dragged down his bare torso, and he eased off her sexy black tank top. Felicity whimpered as his hand moved off her, but his lips were on her neck, and his soon his hands palming her bra covered breasts.

“If I remember correctly,” Luke chuckled, “I got smacked for doing this to you that day.”

“And if I remember correctly,” Felicity shivered as his tongue ran down the valley of her breasts. “I got smacked for doing this.”

Felicity unbuckled his belt and pulled his pants and underwear to the floor.

“It was a spank and you asked for it,” Luke leaned forward to kiss her shoulder while his hands lifted her back off the mattress to unclasp her bra. His hardening cock pressed against her thigh in anticipation.

They were interrupted by the beeping of Luke’s comm.

Luke groaned when he saw the name on the screen, “It’s the Chancellor. I have to answer it.”

“But Luke,” Felicity whined as Luke pulled up his pants. Her desire was throbbing in the Force as she ran hands over her body to entice him back.

“I’ll be right back, Sweetheart,” he kissed her before pulling back on his shirt. He surprised her by suddenly nipping at her erect nipple, “I’m going to take this call into the office. I want you ready for me when I get back.”

Felicity chuckled, a wicked twinkle in her eyes as she unbuttoned her pants and slid a hand beneath them to stroke her likely already moistened sex, “Don’t take too long with that call.”

“I’ll get her off as quickly as possible,” Luke promised. “Then I’ll come back here and get you off as quickly as possible.”

Felicity giggled and eagerly pulled off her pants. She was wearing a matching set of purple bra and panties, practical for daily wear, but with sexy lace and suggestive cuts that turned Luke on. It was the kind of underwear she wore on days she wasn’t positive she was going to have sex with Luke, but was open to the prospect.

“I wonder what Mothma could possibly be calling about,” Felicity openly stroked herself beneath her panties, her eyes locked on Luke.

Luke had to shift the stiffening erection in his pants, “I don’t know, but whatever it is, I’m sure it won’t ruin our plans for Ahch-to.”

Unfortunately for Luke, it did.
“Oh, Luke!”

“Felicity!”

The bed springs squeaked frantically as Luke thrust into her, riding out her orgasm as her body spasmed below him. Her nails dug into his hips, pulling him in deeper and holding him there as her body exploded in pleasure.

It took a few moments, but when she had finished, so did he. Felicity groaned in pleasure as Luke buried his face against her breast. When he was done, he peppered a line of kisses between her breasts, up her neck, and back to her lips.

Felicity whispered back, “I love you too.”

He kissed her lips one more time, and then moved to roll off her. She laughed and locked her legs around his hips, refusing to let him free.

Their panting and soft laughter filled the room as they basked in the pleasure they had just partaken in. They were entangled in the blankets and each other, nothing but the intimacy of their bare skin and the aftermath of lovemaking filling their senses.

“You have to let me go, Felicity,” Luke grinned, absentmindedly stroking his hand across her naked thigh.

“I won’t do it,” Felicity murmured, her voice sounding sleepy. It was nearly three in the morning, and both were exhausted. “Because if I let you go, then you leave me for a whole month.”

“Orders are orders, I have to go to Coruscant. And I’m going to be late. I should have left two hours ago.”

“It’s your own fault for falling for my bewitching charms.”

“Is that now what you’re calling it?”

Felicity swatted his chest and unhooked her legs from around his waist to let him roll off her. When Luke had done so, he rested on his side, playing gently with her hair.

Luke and Felicity had a system that whenever one went on a trip, they would leave in the middle of the night, way past Rey’s bedtime so that she wouldn’t insist on staying up too late to say her goodbyes, nor that she would make a scene in the morning.

Of course, that also meant it gave Luke and Felicity plenty of time to say their own goodbye.

“I wish I didn’t have to go,” Luke sighed. “A whole month without you sounds unbearable.”

“At least it’s not a lifetime,” Felicity rested her head against his chest, soothed by the steady beating of his heart.

“Let’s make a pact, when we do die, we die together so neither one of us has to miss the other.”

“I agree. We’ll die together… or I’ll die first and you deal with all that pain.”
Luke chuckled, “You’re actively wishing me pain?”

“Consider it revenge for the thirty-two-hour labour.”

Luke shook his head, “Or, how about I die first, and then at least I can come back as a Force Ghost and visit you from time to time?”

“Time to time?”

“You’re not the only person I’ll want to visit in the afterlife.”

“I love you too,” Luke kissed her forehead. He glanced at the clock and sighed, “It’s time for me to go.”

Her voice was small, “…I know.”

He dressed slowly, Felicity’s eyes following his every movement. If he had known that was the last time he shared that bed with her, he would have jumped right back in and never left.

“I’ll comm you when I arrive at the first fuelling station,” Luke bent over the bed and kissed her.

Felicity ran her fingers through his hair, “And I’ll comm you with Rey first thing in the morning.”

He walked towards the doorway and grabbed his packed suitcase propped against the wall. He punched the door’s open code, but when it slid open, he paused and looked back at Felicity.

“I love you, Felicity Rhiaon,” Luke declared taking in one last sight of the beautiful woman he loved so much.

She smiled at him, not that wicked smirk but that joyous smile so few got to see, “I love you too, Luke Skywalker.”

And with one last smile, Luke left behind his wife.

10 Years, 4 Months, 25 Days

“I can’t reach them.”

“Luke, don’t jump to conclusions,” Leia said.

“Yeah, Kid, just take a moment to calm down,” Han encouraged.

“No, this is serious!” Luke slammed his fist on the dining table he, Leia, and Han were seated at. “I’m woken in the middle of the night of a vision of Temple Village burning, and now I can’t get a hold of them!”

“It’s been six hours!” Luke said. He lowered his head and took a deep breath, “Something is wrong, Leia. I have to go before it’s too late. Please… Rey and Felicity are in danger. I can’t lose them.”

Han and Leia exchanged a solemn look.

They need not exchange a word to make their decision.
“The Falcon’s acting up, so we can’t take that,” Han said. “You go in your X-Wing to Rornian, and I’ll fix up the Falcon to follow.”

Luke looked up in surprise, “But what about the meetings? The Senate?”

“I’ll take care of it all,” Leia promised. “Please… just make sure the girls are safe.”

And so, with a pat on Han’s arm and a kiss on Leia’s cheek, Luke Skywalker grabbed Artoo and his flight suit and set off for Rornian.

He only prayed that it wouldn’t be too late.

10 Years, 4 Months, 26 Days

Luke and Felicity stood in the forest as the rain poured down and their home burned in the distance. A heavy silence hung over the duo as they stood there holding each other, taking in the tragedy before them.

Then, Luke made a decision he would regret for years to come.

Felicity frowned, "Go? Go where?"

"Somewhere far from here. Somewhere the First Order wouldn’t think to look for you."

"The First Order?"

"The Knights of Ren have always been Snoke's lackeys, and he was the one who corrupted Ben. It's obvious why they came here."

"No!" Felicity jerked it out of his grasp.

"You have to take Rey and get out of here."

"We're not leaving you!"

"We don't have a choice," Luke used his extremely calm voice that always annoyed Felicity.

"Yes, we do," Felicity insisted. She lightly gripped Luke's forearm and hope danced in her eyes, "You can come with us."

"There's no room," Luke shook his head. "The only ship we have access to is my X-Wing. That's a two seater, Felicity."

"So what?" Felicity asked. "We can each take a seat, and Rey will sit in my lap."

"The X-Wing can barely hold two people, it couldn't fit three of us, let alone bare the weight."

"Don't ask me to leave you to die," Felicity begged. "I've left too many people behind to their deaths. I won't do it to you."
"Then we condemn Rey," Luke calmly said. Tears were shining in his eyes, "If we both stay, she does too, and we put her in the line of fire. I have the best chance of the two of us to survive, and I might be able to reason with Ben. Your presence would aggravate him. You've already had too many close calls with death tonight. Please, escape while you still can."

Felicity threw her arms around Luke's neck and sobbed into his chest, "I won't leave you."

Luke savoured the embrace with a sense of finality. As the time passed, Luke felt increasingly unsure he could bring himself to release her.

"Allowing yourself to let her go is not the same as ceasing to love her," The ghostly voice of Anakin Skywalker whispered in his son's ear. "It took me too long to learn that. Do not make my mistake of accepting it when it was too late. In letting her go, you are not asking yourself to permit things to end. You are asking her to live... Even if it means doing it without you."

Luke sighed: his father was right. No matter how much he wanted Felicity to stay, he couldn't let that happen.

Luke took a deep breath, and then pulled back from Felicity. He propped two fingers under her chin and tilted her head up. Felicity's tear filled hazel eyes were locked with own glistening blue orbs.

"I promise you, Felicity," Luke's voice was calm, but filled with pain, "I will never leave you. But I cannot always be by your side physically, so you'll just have to accept my emotional presence. My memory. My promises. You'll have to trust me that this will not be the end."

Felicity painfully whispered, "Luke-"

"I love you. I have from the moment I first met you, and I'll love you even beyond my death. But you have to take Rey and go. It's our best choice right now. I can handle the Knights of Ren, and you... We both know that you are more capable of making difficult decisions and even sacrifices for Rey's safety. Decisions... I could never bring myself to commit."

Felicity winced, closing her eyes as she lowered her head and sobbed. Luke's words were too true for her to deny.

Luke sighed, making a face not unlike the one he had made upon seeing his father's unmasked face for the first time: a sympathetic, loving, and pained expression.

He lifted her chin once more, "But that is why I love you. You are strong where I am weak, and we balance each other perfectly. I swear to you, Felicity, this will not be like Brendan. We will see each other again."

"Promise?" Felicity choked.

They poured everything into that kiss. The magnitude of their love, the happiness of their friendship, the firmness of their partnership, the passion of a lover to the person they selected to create a child with, the depth of their promises, and even the sting of the possible finality of their parting.

Then they broke the kiss, they still did not part. They held onto each other, resting their foreheads together, listening to the other's heavy breathing.
Luke used his flesh hand to stroke a thumb over Felicity's cheek.

"I love you, Felicity Rhiaon," Luke whispered, relishing the warmth of her skin.

Felicity ran a loving hand through his soft blond hair, "I love you too, Luke Skywalker. Thank you... Thank you for loving me."

They embraced one final time, Felicity tightly locking her arms around his neck. Luke reached up and slowly clasped Felicity right hand with his left. Eventually he eased her arms down but did not release their clasped hands.

"Now go," Luke's voice quaked as he pressed a kiss to her forehead.

Slowly, Felicity backed out of his embrace, but their hands did not let go.

"Promise me," Felicity ordered. "Promise me this isn't goodbye."

"I promise you, Felicity," Luke grinned the goofy grin his wife so loved, "we'll see each other again."

Felicity gave the smile her husband loved, and let go of his hand.

"Promise me, Luke!" Felicity backed away from him into the treeline towards Rey.

"I promise!" Luke called as she disappeared into the night. "We'll see each other again! I promise, Felicity. I promise!"

10 Years, 6 Months, and 24 Days

The hallway was too quiet. Luke and Chewbacca were slowly walking down one of the passages of the First Order Tonides Base. They had their weapons at the ready, but not a single soul was anywhere to be found.

When he, Chewie, and Han had touched down on the landing platform, they had been met with the usual legion of Stormtroopers guarding the base. But there was a small number of them, and they were easy to defeat. Perhaps they had been ordered not to give Skywalker much of a fight.

But still... it was too easy.

Han had stayed behind to guard the ship, and Chewie went with Luke to find where they were keeping Felicity. It was a difficult feat though, for Luke couldn’t find her Force Signature anywhere.

He reached desperately into the Force to find that familiar crimson colour, but he didn’t find her. Luke felt the red tone of Phasma – maybe a scarlet shade, but he honestly wasn’t paying attention to her. He felt the blood orange signature of General Hux, but he was relieved to not find the signature of Snoke: a soul black and cold as the night.

But there was a familiar signature, one that made him stop in his tracks.

Forest green.

Luke took a deep breath, “You’re right. She probably is.”

It didn’t take them long to find Ben, a few more turns and the duo find themselves in a very large and very dark room. The location was probably a place to address multiple legions of Stormtroopers at once, for there were multiple legions of Stormtroopers crammed into the room.

There was stage and a long aisle leading up to it. Dozens upon dozens of Stormtroopers in gleaming white armor lined the aisle, filling up the audience. They stood at attention, blasters at the ready, and facing towards the stage. As Luke and Chewie slowly walked down the aisle, not a Stormtrooper so much as twitched.

But Luke’s attention was not on the Stormtroopers; it was on the figure they were staring at. A young boy, aged only sixteen clad in black and armed with a lightsaber stood proudly on the stage. He wore a mask not unlike the one his Grandfather had used to survive, but this boy’s mask was one of vanity, not survival.

Luke didn’t take his eyes off the boy as he wordlessly scaled the stage, Chewbacca following behind. He was holding his lightsaber, but it was unlit. After staring at the boy for a few minutes in silence, an agreement was settled between them. Luke hooked his saber on his belt, and the boy removed his mask, setting it on the ground.

“I prefer Kylo,” the boy answered, his eyes dark with pride and fear.

He looked so much paler since the last time Luke had seen him. Paler and skinnier. He stood straight, but his hands twitched at his side. The blast wound on his face had been done away with, but his visage was not the handsome young man Luke had helped raise.

Ben’s lips twitched but his said in his best formal tone, “We are not here to discuss me. We are here to discuss Rhiaon.”

“Oh, I think we can find time for both subjects.” Luke nodded to the Stormtroopers, “Will they shoot?”

“No,” Ben admitted.

“So they’re here for show,” Luke shook his head. “Oh, Ben, do you even understand what you’ve gotten yourself into?”

“Even if I wanted to escape – which I certainly do not – you can’t be so naïve to think there’s anything to go back to at this point? You think I can Lando Calrissian? Mon Mothma? The Senate? Han Solo?”
“Don’t call your father such a cold name.”

Ben stared right into Luke’s eyes. “A cold name for a cold man. He’s no father.”

“No, my father was no father,” Luke sternly chided. “Your father is flawed, but he is a good father.”

“And why should I get my reference point on good fathers from a man who never had one?”

Luke shook his head, “You’re afraid. I can sense it.”

“I’m not afraid.”

“Don’t lie to me, Ben. I sense the fear, the regret, the guilt.”

“I don’t regret anything I’ve done.”

Luke didn’t buy it for a minute, “Really? You regret none of it?”

“Absolutely nothing.”

Ben flinched at the name.

Luke tried not to smile. He knew where to get Ben.

He continued on, listing the name of every single Jedi who had been slaughtered on that rainy night. But he saved the name of the woman who had died first – the one that would hurt Ben the most – for the very last.

Luke spoke slowly, “You don’t regret killing Alyla?”

Ben winced.

Ben looked down at the ground, “Alyla wasn’t supposed to die.”

“But she did. By your hand. She loved you. She trusted you. She wanted nothing more than your happiness and safety. And you killed her for it. She was protecting you from this.”

“And was Felicity just protecting Rey?” Ben snapped.

Luke took a step back in shock. The cold, hard accusation that had been hanging in the air.

“I will not claim responsibility for her death,” Ben hissed.

“But she is dead!” Luke shouted. “My daughter is dead! You took her from me! Why? Why?”

Ben said nothing, but the guilt in his eyes spoke volumes.
"Why were you so threatened by her?" Luke felt a tear drip down his face. "She... she was innocent. She didn't deserve this. To waste away in a desert."

Ben fixed his eyes to the ground.

"That wasn't my fault," he clenched his jaw. "I didn't take away their supplies, I didn't do anything! I didn't know she was there!"

"And that's the point," Luke glowered. "She was only there because you tried to kill her! Your cousin who loved you and idolized you. Rey trusted you... and now she's dead. I will take some responsibility for what happened... but I will not take all of it."

Ben said nothing.

"But," Luke said after a while, "if I can forgive Vader... I certainly can forgive you. Come with me, Ben. I'll help, I'll show you the way back to the Light."

"I can't go back. I don't want to go back."

A smirk twitched the side of his face, "I wouldn't be so positive. You don't even know half of what I've done."

"And I don't care what you've done. If you killed people, hurt us... even took away Rey. I still love you. Please, hand over Felicity, and then come home with us."

Ben shook his head, "You won't love me after what I tell you next."

Luke frowned, "What do you mean?"

Ben looked up with the cockiest expression Luke had ever seen on his face. A gloating, taunting mock that was ten times more threatening than his pseudo-Vader helmet.

"Felicity Rhiaon is dead," Kylo Ren's mocking words seemed to echo in Luke's mind.

In an instant, his world shattered.

His heart pounded violently in his chest, and he could barely breathe. No, Felicity wasn't dead. She-she couldn't be! She was alive- He- he would have felt it if she had- Oh God, but he hadn't felt Rey, had he? No. No, it's wasn't true. Felicity was alive. It was impossible for her not to be. He promised they would see each other again. He promised!

"I killed her myself!" Ben was gleeful at the thought of his aunt being murdered. "I ended her miserable existence, and ridded the world of her corruptive influence."

Ben killed Felicity? It was his absolute worst nightmare after the thought of losing Rey... But Rey was dead so this was his worst nightmare. No, it couldn't be true. Ben. Ben could not have possibly killed Felicity Rhiaon.

"No. You're lying," Luke said, half in fear and half in genuine disbelief. He refused to accept it as the truth. "Felicity is not dead."

"Yes, she is," Ben grinned. He reached into his cloak and pulled out a small HoloDisc. "See for Ben hit play.

The Holo projected the image of Felicity on her knees, tied up, face bruised, bloodied, and hair sheered crudely. Ben, Hux, Phasma, and the Stormtroopers holding Felicity back stood around her. A Holo of Supreme Leader Snoke was projected into the room during the recording. Evidently the footage had been recorded seconds after Hux telling Luke he had seven days to get Felicity.

“Skywalker should be on his way shortly, Supreme Leader,” Hux reported.

“And Skywalker’s daughter is dead?” Snoke asked.

“I’ve seen it for myself,” Ben took a step forward.

An odd look crossed Snoke’s face, “Most interesting.”

“Supreme Leader,” Captain Phasma spoke. “What do with do with Rhiaon while we await Skywalker’s arrival?”

Snoke regarded Felicity, “If Skywalker must produce another heir, it should not be with such corrupted chattel as this. Rhiaon has no further use to us. Terminate her immediately.”

Felicity had been making objections behind her gag and trying to shake off her captors, but upon hearing the order to kill her, her eyes went wide. She began trying to scream at the top of her lungs and fight as furiously as possible. The gag muffled her words, but the Stormtroopers were losing the upper hand to her fighting.

“She needs to be subdued first,” Hux crossed the room and opened a small case on the table laden with torture devices. He picked out one of the objects from the case and examined it, revealing it to be a set of three needles.

“What are those?” Ben asked.

“This first one is a paralytic,” Hux answered. “It will get her nice and limp so with can kill her without endangering ourselves.”

The Stormtroopers struggled to contain Felicity as she desperately attempted to fight them off.

“And the others?” Ben inquired.

“A special serum developed by the First Order ourselves. It’s a two-part injection. This formula uses ysalamir blood as its base.”

“The stuff that renders Jedi incapable of using their powers? Why? She’s not Force Sensitive.”

“But she is closely bonded to Skywalker,” Phasma pointed out.

“Exactly,” Hux said. “This is a special formula that will block out a person’s presence in the Force, hence, Skywalker will not sense the moment we kill her.”

“Wouldn’t he sense her presence abruptly being removed from the Force?” Ben asked.

“The serum masks the disappearance of a presence. It will block her, but you, nor Skywalker will not sense the moment that happens. And you, nor Skywalker, will be able to sense when she’s killed.
The next sight was unbearable for Luke to watch. The Stormtroopers did as they were told and pinned Felicity to the ground. There were only two of them, so Phasma had to join in to help. They cut her ropes, though Luke couldn’t at first tell why. Felicity lashed out violently trying to kick, punch, scratch, and injure in any way possible. It was her one last desperate stand to escape death.

Unfortunately, Phasma smashed a fist into Felicity’s face, and as she reared back in pain they were able to grab her and force her face first on the ground. One Stormtrooper pinned down her legs, the other her arms, and Phasma herself held down Felicity’s head.

Hux knelt down on the floor, and it was then clear why they cut her ropes. Felicity screamed as he shoved the first needle into the back of her neck – which had previously been obstructed by the ropes. He didn’t follow proper hygiene, placing the needles straight on the floor. Hus didn’t wipe down the areas before he injected her. Just one, two, three; the needles were shoved into her neck one by one, and he rammed down her plunger as Felicity screamed, cried, and desperately tried to shake loose of her captors.

But to Luke, even more heartbreaking than his wife’s brutal violation was how Ben just stood there, his face pale and scared, watching it happen… and doing nothing to stop it.

“There we are,” Hux stood up, collecting his needles. “That wasn’t so bad, was it Rhiaon?”

Felicity’s response was muffled but angry. Still there was a heartbreaking sound of sadness in her muffled tone.

Luke had watched Felicity’s eyes during the ordeal, and he observed the change with horror. As they pulled Felicity up to her knees, her body had already started to fall limp. Still she tried her hardest to fight, even though her body betrayed her more and more with every passing minute. When she could no longer hold up her own head the heartbreaking realization filled her eyes.

She couldn’t win this fight. Luke watched the moment his wife knew she was going to die.

Tears flooded her eyes and her fight simmered down. Instead of trying to punch her way out, she started to yell behind her gag. Her only last hope was talking her way out of it, but the gag cut deeper into the sides of her mouth, muffling and suffocating her words and her lungs.

“What’s that, Rhiaon?” Hux taunted, holding up a hand to his ear as he returned the needles to their case. “I can’t hear you.”

“Mmm hmph tpmh mhm!” Felicity screamed.

“You’re not talking your way out of this one,” Phasma said. “Not this time.”

She sucker punched Felicity right in the face, and the helpless woman fell to the ground, the paralysis almost complete.

But Felicity was a fighter, and she fought to push herself up on her elbows and lift her head.

Standing in front of her was Ben.
Tears and desperation filled her hazel eyes as they met Ben’s looking down on her.

Luke could have sworn he saw fear in them.

Felicity made a choice, and using her very last ounce of strength, she kept her head up, her eyes locked on Ben and began to scream.

“It’s a pity that whatever her last words are, they’ll be lost to time,” Ben said, shifting nervously.

“I suppose it is,” Hux shrugged indifferently.

“Perhaps,” Ben hesitated. “Maybe we should ungag her.”

“Ungag her?” Hux frowned.

“Give her one last dignity,” Ben tried to sound nonchalant. “Let her have some final words. She might tell us something useful.”

Hux glanced over at Phasma, “She might.”

After a moment of consideration, Phasma nodded.

“Men,” Hux ordered the Stormtroopers standing beside Felicity, “ungag her. You have one minute to speak, Rhiaon. Better make it last.”

A Stormtrooper bent down and untied her gag. The second it was off, Felicity started speaking. She wasn’t snarky, or formal, or loving as she addressed Ben. She wasn’t hateful or guilty. There was only a single emotion in her voice as she faced her last moment to escape a death sentence.

She was desperate.

"Ben! Ben, please! Don't let them do this! Please let me live!” Felicity screamed, tears spilling out of her eyes. She was a broken woman, begging her arch-nemesis for one last show of mercy. "Please, Ben! You win! You win! Alright? You win! Please, don't do this! Please, Ben, you have to help me! You have to save me! Please, don't let me die! I don't want to die! Please, Ben, help me! I can forgive you this! I can forgive you this!"

And then the gag cut back across her mouth, muffling her cries as the Stormtroopers pulled her back to rest upright on her knees.

Luke’s hands shook as he watched Ben indifferently displayed the scene before him. Felicity had begged him for her very life… and he had done nothing.

Then the camera cut to the worst footage Luke would ever see in his life.

The camera was zoomed in extremely close, only Felicity's panicked expression filling the screen. There were muffled screams behind her gagged mouth, and she was shaking her body, trying to wretch free.

Luke would never forget her wide hazel eyes; panic and fear filling them as she tried to scream for help. He would never forget the gloved hand – Ben’s hand – that brought the blaster to her temple. He would never forget Felicity's muffled shouts – begging Ben one last time for mercy – as his hand squeezed the trigger.
Luke would never forget the blast, the way Felicity's eyes went blank, and how she fell face first to the ground dead.

Chewbacca let out an agonizing roar.

“Poetic, isn’t it?” Kylo chuckled. “Set up to die, and then filmed when she does… Just like her brother.”

A rage Luke had never known filled his heart.

“Is she dead?” Kylo’s voice asked on the Holo.

He wasn’t visible, the shot instead focused on Felicity’s unmoving body.

“Check for yourself,” Hux instructed.

The camera cut to a wide shot where Kylo, Phasma, Hux, and the Stormtroopers stared at Felicity’s body. The Holo of Snoke was gone, but Luke’s were only on Felicity’s still form.

Kylo hesitated and took slow steps towards Felicity’s body. When he was a step away, he stopped. In the background Hux watched with hands clasped behind his back, and Phasma fiddled with the dial charge on her blaster.

Carefully, Kylo stuck out a foot, and gently prodded Felicity.

She didn’t move.

It did it again, like he was afraid so was a wild animal he had hit with a speeder and wasn’t sure if it was dead or playing at it, about to spring up and tackle him.

Felicity still didn’t move.

Kylo took a deep breath and kicked her hard. Once, twice, three times he kicked her defenseless body.

She still did not move.

Finally, he made one powerful kick, flipping her body over to observe the damage.

She laid on her back, crumpled like a rag doll. Her chest rise and fall with breaths, not an inch of her body twitched, and her beautiful hazel eyes stared glassy and unblinking up at the roof.

Kylo bent down and checked her over. He felt for a pulse, a heartbeat, the breath entering and exiting her mouth, and motioned at her eyes like he was about to hit her, trying to trigger and blink or a flinch. Felicity’s body was unresponsive, but as the camera lingered on the motion of Ben trying to trigger a flinch, it almost looked like her eyes were trying to plead one last word.

Help.

Chewie growled again and again, screaming out his grief so loud it almost seemed like he was trying to let Han know back on the Falcon.
Luke shook as his brain processed the footage he had just been shown. It seemed impossible, but Luke couldn’t deny that Felicity Rhiaon, the love of his life… was dead.

"And do you know what I did next?" Kylo asked gleefully, watching as his uncle literally shook with anger, struggling not to attack Kylo where he stood. The Holo played on, but Luke had no idea what more there could possibly be. "Do you know what I did to that schutta you call a wife?"

Then things got worse.

Luke would never forget the image Kylo next showed. The thing he would refuse to ever tell Han and Leia. The thing he would swear Chewbacca to secrecy about. The thing that would cause Luke to leave the base without his wife's body.

Because what the First Order did to Felicity Rhiaon ensured Luke would have no body to lay to rest.

Kylo was arrogant. He was not the naïve Ben Solo, Luke had been pleading with to come home. Luke looked upon Kylo with new eyes: he knew there was no redemption. Even Vader wouldn't have sunk to the level of vicious anger and bitter hatred that Kylo had resorted to. In Luke's eyes, Vader was a hero for strangling his pregnant wife compared to what Kylo did to Felicity.

Kylo couldn't stop gloating, going on and on about what he had done to his rival and how much he enjoyed every moment of it. Luke didn't hear any of the words, them becoming muted in the background, an angry buzzing paired with the pounding in Luke's ears.

“I did it, Uncle Luke!” Kylo boasted. “I did it! I killed her! I killed Felicity Rhiaon! I freed you from her!”

Felicity was dead…

“You know, you really should be thanking me,” Kylo went on. “Now you can find something worthy of your genetics. I mean, you’re old, but I’m sure plenty of young Force Sensitive girls would be happy to be with the legendary Luke Skywalker himself.”

Ben had killed Felicity…

“And it was so satisfying to do it too,” Kylo bragged. “To wipe that smirk off her face and see her so desperate. She begged me Uncle Luke! Felicity Rhiaon begged me.”

Everything was gone. His home. His pupils. His family…

“Oh, and that pièce de résistance! What I did to her body!”

He had taken away Rey… And now he had taken away Felicity…

“You’ll want to see that again,” Kylo chuckled. He flicked off the Holo and slipped it into Luke’s breast pocket, patting his chest jovially, “Well, not worry Uncle Luke. Now you can watch it again and again and ag-”

The Dark Side flooding into him, Luke grabbed his nephew by the throat and threw him to the ground. Kylo let out a surprised yelp while Chewie roared and the Stormtroopers advanced.

“Stop, Luke!” Obi-Wan said at the same time.

“Stop, you must,” Yoda urged a second after the pair because he always liked his voice to stand out above others.

When questioned why he did that, Yoda would usually reply along the lines of ‘when 900 years old you are, have something useful to say, you will.’

Despite the objecting cries of Force Ghosts in his mind, as well as Chewie and the Stormtroopers’ efforts, and no one could get Luke to stop. Consumed by hatred, anger, and the Dark Side, Luke wrapped his hands around the throat of his own nephew and refused to let go until Kylo Ren was as dead as his wife and daughter.

If they didn’t get to live, then neither would Ben.

It was Chewie who eventually got Luke off of Kylo, locking his arms around Luke's chest and pulling him backwards. Holding Luke in place with one arm, his used his other to bash away a line of Stormtroopers and pulled Luke towards the door.

"No! NO!" Luke cried out, struggling to escape Chewie's unyielding grasp.

With his bowcaster in one arm and Luke in the other, Chewie found off the hordes of Stormtroopers advancing on them.

Kylo stayed behind, stunned at the turn of events. The last sight Luke would have of him for years was Kylo on his hands and knees, gasping for air, scrambling to grab his helmet off the floor.

He looked pathetic.

“No! No!” Luke continued to scream as Chewie dragged them through the maze of corridors. It didn’t take them long to lose the Stormtroopers, but still the Wookiee dragged Luke along. “No, Chewie we have to go back! We have to go back!”

ROAR!

“HE KILLED FELICITY!”

And then Luke heard it: Felicity’s desperate scream.

“LUKE! LUKE!”

She sounded as she did in the recording: desperate and begging. Why did the Force have to taunt him so?

“LUKE!” Felicity’s voice distantly screamed for him. “HELP! HELP ME!”

There was a loud pounding, but Luke was so disconnected from the situation he barely put it together that it was a pounding in his head.

“LUKE!”

Oh God, how could he do this? How could he live with this knowledge that he had failed to save her.
He should have gone to Jakku the second Diego mentioned it. He should have kept a comm on. He should have properly stalked his X-Wing. He should have checked Leia’s messages before going to Mothma. He should never have told Felicity to go. He should have never gone to Hosnian Prime.

He should have listened to her this whole time.

"LUKE, PLEASE HELP ME! HELP! LUKE!"

Chewie pulled him into a hallway and the screams and thudding in his head got louder with every step. Luke hadn’t even noticed when he had started to cry until Chewie had slammed him against a door and he found himself only being held up by two furry paws.

"LUKE!” Felicity’s voice screamed, her voice hitting a climax of volume. The pounding seemed to be throbbing all over Luke’s body, banging him over and over against his head, shoulders, and back. He felt the vibrations tingling to the tips of his limbs.

“I can’t get her out of my head, Chewie,” Luke sobbed. “All I hear are her screams.”

"HELP ME!"

Chewie cocked his head, sadness in his eyes and softly roared, “Raw rah ro rah.”

Luke frowned, “…You hear it too?”

"LUKE! CHEWIE!" Felicity’s voice now took on cries to Chewie, the only other person who had to suffer through that footage.

Chewie replied that he didn’t think he’d ever stop hearing her screams.

"LUKE! LUKE! PLEASE!"

Luke sniffed, staring up into the eyes of his Wookiee friend; a friend he knew would always be there for him now matter what.

“She’s dead, Chewie,” Luke finally let the reality escape his lips. “Felicity is dead.”

"LUKE!"

“This is my fault,” Luke said.

Chewbacca gave a long series of roars. They were comforting words; a speech about the heartache of placing blame, the regrets of what ifs, and the danger of letting grief consume him. It was a touching and beautiful speech that calmed Luke, even if the whole time he could hear Felicity’s screaming and banging.

Chewie smiled and roared a word that was long in Shyriiwook, but short in Basis.

Anytime.

“LUKE!” Felicity screamed again.
Luke swallowed hard, “Chewie… You have to promise me something.”

War Rah?

He locked eyes with the Wookiee, “What Ben did to her… To her body… It’s sickening and pity… and the hardest thing I’ve ever had to watch in my life. And I don’t want Han and Leia to ever see what their son did to her. Please, Chewie, promise me you will never tell them what he did.”

Chewie hesitated, but promised his friend.

“Alright,” Luke swallowed back his tears, “let’s get out of here… Oh god, what am I going to tell Han? What am I going to say to Leia?”

Chewie patted Luke on the shoulder and promised they would do it together.

And as they got further from the hall, Felicity’s screams and the pounding faded away.

“Felicity Rhiaon is dead,” Kylo’s words echoed in Luke’s head as the Falcon flew away from Tonides.

Luke stumbled towards the sanctuary of the bunk room. He hadn’t spoken a word since revealing to Han what happened to Felicity. Han knew Luke well enough to leave him alone to grieve. Perhaps Han also needed time to process what Ben had done… and formulate a way to tell Leia.

Luke closed the door to the bunk room behind him. He stared at the room, his eyes focused on the bunk of the right wall – the bunk that had been unofficially claimed as Felicity’s. Luke’s unofficial bunk was the one across. He recalled the nights when Felicity would tease him by throwing a pillow across the room and tell him to go to sleep.

“Felicity Rhiaon is dead.”

Screaming out an anguished cry, Luke fell to his knees and sobbed helplessly.

This was supposed to be his happy ending. His happily ever after where he would spend the rest of his days with Felicity Rhiaon, the woman he loved most in the entire galaxy.

And instead he was lost at the end of a tragedy.

Because he knew Felicity Rhiaon was never coming back.

Chapter Summary

Chapter Notes

To be clear in case this transition back is confusing, this chapter picks up right back on Jakku, immediately after the ending of chapter 22.

We were last on Jakku, four years after the Burning of Rornian with Luke remembering his life with Felicity. He did this because he discovered he’d been falling in love with Aletha (after an intimate shirtless moment was walked in on by Quom and Rey, and Quom told Luke as much.) After Aletha confessed she returns the attraction, Luke decides to officially let Felicity go. This takes place on Luke and Felicity’s tenth wedding anniversary, and Luke was having a day of depression where he didn’t want to do anything but stay in bed, stare at Felicity’s picture, not speak, and mourn all the people he lost and failed. Rey leaves Luke to himself on those days and goes into town, having Quom pick her up and drop her off.

See the end of the chapter for more notes.

The Long Way Home

Chapter Thirty

Time to Move On

“I can forgive you this! I can forgive you this!”

Felicity’s final words rang in Luke’s head. He sobbed as he let the memories of their life together wash over him. That moment of Felicity Rhiaon’s death would never leave him – the number of times he had watched the Holo of it ensured that point.

But as Luke reflected on Felicity’s final moments, Luke realized with horror that the most heartbreaking part of it all was not how desperate and broken she had been nor how Ben stood by and let it happen, then finally delivered the killing blow. The worst part Luke realized, was that all she had to say… all she had to do to escape that horrible fate, to stop that inhumane torture and murder was admit one small truth.
If she had confessed that Rey was alive, Felicity could have saved her life.

The woman who had felt nothing upon holding Rey for the first time, and had gone so far as to almost kill her baby, had made the ultimate sacrifice. Felicity had chosen to literally die for their daughter.

And Luke would never get to thank her for that.

He loved Felicity Rhiaon with every fiber of his being. She had changed his life, shown him true happiness, and share with him that oh so rare, and oh so precious emotion of true love. Felicity Rhiaon was his soul’s mate, and there would never be another who could possibly match her.

But that didn’t mean he couldn’t love again. That didn’t mean that the loves that came before – Nakari, Biggs, even Leia to so degree – meant anything less. Aletha was not Felicity, and frankly Luke didn’t want her to be. If he had wanted a Felicity clone, he would have let things progress with Sienna Ternan – God was that a mistake.

The truth was as much as he did love Felicity... he had fallen in love with Aletha. Just as he had loved Nakari Kelen but still fallen in love with Felicity.

Luke remembered his grandfather’s words. Everyone got three loves in their live: their first love, their last love, and their true love. As it turned out, for Luke those three loves would be three different women. He had been wrong all those years ago: Felicity Rhiaon would not be the only love that mattered. His love for Aletha and Nakari were equally as special... and besides, his love for Rey trumped them all.

And as he turned the idea over his head again and again, it all sounded right.

Nakari Kelen was his first love.

Felicity Rhiaon was his true love.

And Aletha Kymeri would be his last love.

He would never forget Felicity. He would always love her. He didn’t want to let go, he shouldn’t need to let go.

And yet he knew it was time.

Luke sighed and looked at his wedding ring. He remembered again the way Felicity’s screams had faded when he exited the hallway with Chewie, and so now must Felicity now fade from his dreams. Tonight was the night of their tenth wedding anniversary. If he was going to let go at anytime, this would be it.

He ran a finger over him wedding band, stroking it like he might stroke her face if she were here. Yes, tonight, he would finally let Felicity Rhiaon go, not abandoning her from his heart, but letting himself move on. He had to do it, for Aletha, for Rey, for himself.

For Felicity.

Luke loved her so much that he would honour the request she made of him so many years ago, and he would find the strength to let her go.

But first, there was something he needed to do.
Rey found her father digging a grave. It wasn’t far from the walker, a little trek so it wouldn’t be in sight and a constant reminder. She found him by following the set of footprints Luke had left behind in the sand. Quom had dropped her off after taking her out to scavenge that day.

“Dad, did you kill someone?” Rey asked. “If so, please tell me it’s Roke.”

“Sorry, Sweetheart. Roke’s still around to terrorize us all,” Luke laughed. He stopped and held out his hand to her. It was not unlike the gesture he had made the day he invited Felicity to join him at his mother’s grave, “Come.”

Rey smiled, took his hand and let him guide her over and down to kneel at the grave. Her heart fluttered as she saw the words etched onto the sheet metal.
