“The undercover outfits we are running at the moment are more involving high-class businesses and sniffing out the affiliations of the elite. No millionaire is going to be flying a 690 on a regular basis. Maybe a collector would have one in storage, but not in action. As for small missions, we’re not running a lot of those at the moment. Mostly straight up battles and attacks. We might be seeing different sorts of missions if the Senate would finally pull their heads out of their.”

“Diego,” Aletha warned.

“But they haven’t,” Diego finished. “I’m sorry, Miss Kira, but I can’t offer to purchase your ship at this moment. Now, if you were to join the Resistance and fly it here—”

“Diego,” Aletha snapped.

“Then we could take it into our inventory,” Diego continued. “However, I know that you are not interested in joining us at this time.”

There was a long pause from the comm.

“What about when I am ready?” Rey asked.

Diego blinked, “You wish to join the Resistance?”

“Not right now, but maybe someday in the future.”

Aletha looked between Diego and her comm, “How about this? Kira, you keep the ship for now, that way if you and the boys ever need to make a quick getaway, you have something. When you decide to join the Resistance, then fly it here and donate the ship. I bet we could give you a little bit extra for the donation. Maybe a nicer room, better initial rank, privilege to recused from certain chores?”

“I could swing that,” Diego nodded. “What do you think Miss Kira?”

There was a long pause.

“Aletha?” Rey replied. “I think we have a deal.”

“Great, then let’s start the paperwork.” Diego turned to his computer and pulled up the form, “Now, I’m going to have to ask you a couple questions. Let me know all that you can answer. Since the transaction will not be completed just yet, I can hold off on some information. Understand?”

“Yes, sir,” Rey answered.

“Alright, first thing is a first and last name,” Diego tapped at his keyboard. “Now, I can put Kira in as a placeholder for the first name, but I will need an accurate surname.”

“Oh, I don’t actually know my real surname.”
“Whatever you go by right now should be fine.”

“I don’t know. …Aletha?”

“It’s alright, Sunshine,” Aletha smiled. “It’s just Diego and I right now. We’ll keep you safe. Just tell him the surname you and your dad go by.”

Rey sighed, “Alright. It’s Erso. Esk, Resh, Senth, Osk.”

“Alright, Ers-” Diego paused his typing. “…huh.”

“What is it?” Aletha frowned.

Diego had a very puzzled expression on his face, “Nothing, it’s just… I knew someone who sometimes called themselves Erso.”

A very long silence ensued as Aletha watched Diego ponder the thought. Something pulled at her mind as her stomach felt unsettled.

Then Diego finally spoke.

“Eh,” he shrugged. “It’s probably nothing.”

He continued on with his conversation with Rey, but Aletha could barely pay attention. All she could think about was that maybe, just maybe… there was something there she was missing.

But she couldn’t figure out what.

Chapter End Notes

Coming Up Next Chapter…

A Momentary Truce
Undercover at a conference, things get complicated for Poe and Kaydel when Kylo and Sasa Ren arrive. But when Imperial Loyalists attack to take down both Resistance and First Order in one swift move, Poe, Kaydel, Kylo, and Sasa find they must set their issues aside and team up in order to save their lives… If only Poe could stop punching Ben.

(I fully expect that chapter to clock in somewhere between 30-40k just with all that happens. If you can find it on youtube, play the song “It’s About to Get Crazy” by Oh the Larceny right now.)

So, the good thing about my computer breaking is that this all gave me a chance to sit down and outline the last section of this story before we finally get into TFA. I know I keep saying it’s close, but we’re in the homestretch guys. I did have to add an additional few chapters just due to length of some story lines. However, one of those chapters is actually moving up a chapter that was originally going to take place in TFA. I’ve decided to move up a plot twist to being revealed before TFA.
And believe me, you’ll know exactly what I’m talking about when it happens.

I will give you a heads up that this final section will mostly concern the First Order. We will check in on Jakku and the Resistance, but for the most part, we will be setting up the position the First Order is in at the start of TFA. It does make sense though, the first chunk of chapters in the fourteen years segment were about Jakku, then we’ve had about ten chapters of Resistance, and now we’re moving in to the First Order.

In this chapter, Evan reveals that his real name is Geno Namit. I would like to clarify that, yes, that is the male character who follows Holdo around, played by Hugh Skinner. When I created Evan, I didn’t have a full picture of him, and then started playing around with the idea of making him Geno. I hesitated as I had already given Evan a name and Geno is a supporter of Holdo, but then I really latched on to the idea of Evan turning into a supporter of Holdo, and turning against some of his friends, Poe in particular after the death of Paige.

So, in case anyone was confused, yes, Evan Tharel is going to be the tall, skinny, brunette guy that follows Holdo around.

Final note, I saw Solo, and I freaking love it. Love it so much, I’ve seen it twice and fully intend on seeing it more times in theatre. I actually think it’s in my top five Star Wars movies (ROTJ, ESB, ANH, TFA, Solo, ROTS, AOTC, TPM, TLJ, and then Rogue One if you’re curious.) As such, I have decided to take that movie 100% into the canon of my story. This is going to be particularly evident in the next chapter, so I will give a heads up to anyone who hasn’t seen the movie yet. Do not read chapter fifty until you have seen the movie if you don’t want spoilers, because not only will I have references to the film… I’m bringing in a surviving character that’s going to make this story so much more fun.

Oh yeah, I’m bringing back exactly who you’re thinking of.
Messes in Mess Hall

Chapter Summary

Paige meets Evan’s mother, Kaydel argues about baby names, and Poe might have a new brother.

Chapter Notes

Alright, I decided to cut this chapter into four, so not all of the awesome stuff I wanted to happen, happens in this chapter. But there’s a lot of fun about to happen in the next few chapters, and I wanted to try doing a smaller chapter to see if I show switch back to a smaller length.

Enjoy the – not supersized but I’ve literally work over 30 hours on these next few chapters – fiftieth chapter. If you haven’t reviewed already, I’d love to hear how you’ve been enjoying the last fifty chapters and what you look forward to the next fifty.

Because this story’s going to end up clocking in at 200 chapters. Mark my words.

The Long Way Home

Chapter Fifty

Messes in Mess Hall

You could usually tell when Poe Dameron was about to go on an undercover mission because his appearance would turn into what Jessika Pava liked to call Scruff Mode Activated.

“I always forget that you have your mother’s curly hair,” Leia said as she and Poe walked towards the mess hall. “Doesn’t really look it all that much until it gets long.”

“Well, that’s mostly because I use about ten thousand products to smooth it down,” Poe replied. His black hair had been grown out at least a good four inches, and he had a thick, rather untamed beard. He looked the opposite of his usual peacock nature. “Dad always tries to get me to keep the natural curl, always going on about how I should be proud of my heritage, but honestly, it’s just easier to control smoothed down.”

“If that’s what you want to tell yourself,” Leia chuckled. “How’s Kaydel?”

“Quite excited that we get to do an undercover mission with me. I’m surprised the Council agreed to let the two of us go on one together.”
“Well, when the personas of charismatic but overly affectionate married couple was pitched, we knew exactly where to look.”

Poe shook his head, “I’m surprised Vice Admiral Holdo didn’t object.”

“Object? Poe… she was the one who suggested you two,” Leia grinned. “Said something along the lines of if they’re going to be constantly making out on the job, might as well put it to good use.”

Poe gave a hearty laugh as they entered the mess hall.

He immediately spotted Jessika Pava waving him over to the table where Tallie, Paige, and Rose were sitting. Poe glanced at Leia and saw her eyes searching for a friendly enough face. It seemed that no other heads of department were at lunch. Made sense, what with Nils Arlos busy with Poe’s upcoming mission, Diego Nalto stressing over event planning, and the rest dealing with the commotion going on at the landing platform.

“Hey, do you know if my Dad come in yet?” Poe asked Leia.

“No, he’s not supposed to land for another hour,” she answered. “Remind me to thank him for helping out with this relocation.”

“Of course.”

The Resistance was busy that day helping move about a thousand refugees off Preon IX – yet another system that had been ravaged by the First Order. Kes had volunteered to help out with administering aid and supplies. Holdo was overseeing the exodus, claiming Leia could use a break. Usually Diego was the one to step in when Leia needed a break, but she and Holdo were fairly certain that if Diego had one more responsibility to oversee, the Commander might just literally explode.

An event planner, Diego Nalto was not born to be.

“Looking for anyone in particular today?” Poe teased as he saw Leia searching the faces in the mess hall.

She grinned at him. “I might have a surprise or two today.”

“Poe!” Jessika finally called out.

“I’m coming,” he yelled back. Poe looked to Leia, “Well, until you get your surprise, would you like to join us? Or are we whippersnappers a might too young for you?”

“Oh, don’t remind me. So, you in?”

“I suppose one lunch wouldn’t hurt. I’ll get our food and you get our seats. Just make sure we keep a few seats open for later.”

“Holdo can’t sit with us.”

“Noted, Poe,” she patted him on the shoulder and joined the food line.

“Uh… are you not eating today?” Paige frowned as Poe took his seat at the table. “Because Evan’s joining us in about fifteen minutes after shift and I’m not up for another why you shouldn’t skip meals lecture.”
“Oh, the General’s getting it for me,” Poe nodded towards Leia who was arguing with the people in line that no, she didn’t want them to let her cut to the front of the line, they don’t need to give her special treatment.

“The General?” Jessika exchanged a look with Tallie. “Great. Here, I thought lunch was going to be relaxing.”

“Knock it off,” Poe shook his head. “You know the General isn’t like that.”

“Where’s Kaydel?” Tallie asked. “Thought she was coming with you.”

“She had to finish some prep for the mission.”

“When are you guys setting out?”

“Day after tomorrow,” Paige answered. “This is so exciting, I’ve never been on an undercover mission.”

“How did Paige get assigned to this mission?” Rose frowned, trying to pretend she wasn’t insanely jealous and feeling a little left out.

“We thought it might be a good idea to bring Evan just in case something went south and we need a medic,” Poe explained. “Since it’s good to have a second seat of eyes, we thought having Evan be off as a second ‘unaffiliated’ team would be good. He pitched Paige and the Council figured that they work well together.”

“I just don’t see why I couldn’t go too,” Rose crossed her arms.

“Hey, you want to sleep in a hotel room with your sister and her boyfriend, that’s your prerogative,” Jessika held up her hands.

“Jess,” Paige scolded. “Evan and I are going to be on a mission. We’re not going to be doing that.”

“Why not?” Poe shrugged. “Kay and I will.”

“Oh please,” Jessika rolled her eyes, “you two will do it anywhere.”

Poe opened his mouth and then paused. He considered her words, closed his mouth, and shrugged.

“Just my luck,” a voice said behind Poe. “I approach the table to once again find Poe Dameron discussing his sex life. Scoot over, Dameron.”

Most heads turned to the newcomer: a petite brunette with an amused but pretending to be annoyed grin.

“Oh, sorry,” Tallie spoke up to the brunette as she set her lunch tray down on the table, “you can’t sit here. We’re waiting on some others and all ful…”

Tallie stopped.

“Kaydel?” her jaw dropped.

The brunette – indeed one Kaydel Ko Connix – smiled and placed her hands on Poe’s shoulders. Poe chuckled as the others stared at Kaydel in shock. She bent down, and he turned his head to give her a kiss and a hello. He couldn’t stop smiling as everyone watched in shock as a not only brunette Kaydel Ko Connix sat down next to Poe, but a blue-eyed, brunette Kaydel Ko Connix with her hair down.

Silence clung to the table for a long minute as everyone just stared at her.

Kaydel looked around the table and frowned, “What?”

“What is going on with your hair?” Jessika said bluntly.

“And eyes?” Tallie added.

“Contacts,” Poe explained the latter. “I’m going to wear green contacts on the mission. But yeah, can you believe this hair?”

“Oh,” Kaydel grimaced a little as she pushed the brunette locks off her shoulder, “it’s for the mission. They wanted me to change my appearance a little bit and figured the best way was dying my hair… the whole having my hair down thing is not my idea, but Colonel Arlos insisted I get rid of the… how did he put it?”

“Yavin era Leia buns I believe he called them,” Leia cut in setting down two trays on the table and taking the other seat next to Poe. “Apparently the style is too recognizable. As if I’m the only woman in the world to ever wear two hair buns. Our styles aren’t even the same ones. And all of you, stop.”

Everyone paused, all but Poe having been moving to stand and salute the General.

“There’s no need for ceremony,” she motioned for them to sit down.

They awkwardly obeyed.

Paige smiled at Kaydel, “Well, I for one like your hair down. You should wear it like that more often.”

Poe watched as Kaydel struggled to return the smile. He was fairly certain he was the only one on base – maybe with the exception of Aletha – who knew the story of why Kaydel’s hair was always up.

“I’m sure she’s got her reasons,” Poe slung an arm around her shoulder. “Up, down, long, short, bald. Who cares? She’s beautiful inside and out no matter how she wears her hair.”

“So, to be clear,” Jessika said dryly, “this constant praise of Kaydel’s feature is something we’re going to have to put up with from you for the rest of our lives? It’s not just a… first year thing?”

“Try to get used to it,” Poe nodded. “There’s nothing wrong with a little public display of affection.”

Jessika shook her head as Paige asked General Organa a question. She didn’t pay attention to where the conversation went, instead turning her head towards Tallie. Jessika hesitated and then reached for Tallie’s hand resting on the table.

Tallie slipped her hand from Jessika’s grasp.

Scowling, Jessika caught Tallie’s eyes. Tallie gave her girlfriend an apologetic smile and then jerked her head towards Leia.

Jessika sighed and tried to force a smile to her face. In the nearly two years since they started dating – it was about five months from Rey’s eighteenth birthday – not once had Tallie allowed a public display of affection in front of a Council member. Jessika just let it slide, mostly because she didn’t want to get into a big, emotional fight… but she was starting to reach her limit.

Why did it seem that Tallie didn’t want any Council member but Poe to know she was dating Jessika? Jessika even wondered if Diego knew they were an item.

“Well, look who’s back!” Poe’s joyous exclamation caught Jessika’s attention.

Catching sight of the couple who had just entered the mess hall, Jessika’s face split into a grin and she shot to her feet.

“All right!” Jessika cried as Snap Wexley and Karé Kun approached the table. “Black Squadron back together.”

“It’s good to be back,” Karé laughed. “Mind if we join you?”

“All right,” Paige glanced around. “But I’m starting to think we’re going to need a bigger table.”

“Oh, definitely,” Leia nodded. “Someone want to help me push that table together with this one?”

Snap frowned, “General, are you sure that-”

“Anyone who implies I’m too frail to push a table will get latrine duty for three months,” Leia cut off. She narrowed in on Snap, “Newlywed or not.”

He chuckled and held up his hands.

“Here, I’ll help,” Kaydel got up.

Tables could fit about four on each bench – which each table had two of – so when the tables were pushed there was a bit of shuffling, which looked odd until later when their other visitors had filled the rest of the seats.

The first table had Leia seated alone on one side of the bench facing Karé, Snap, Jessika, and Tallie on the other bench. The next table had Paige and Rose sitting on the end of the bench parallel to Leia. Poe and Kaydel sat in the middle of the bench opposite them.

“Okay, we better get more people sitting with us soon,” Poe said, looking around. “This just looks weird.”

“Evan should be finishing up soon,” Paige replied. “Poor thing got pulled for the morning shift at last minute.”

“Well, we had no choice,” Leia said. “We need all hands on deck with the refugees coming in, especially in the medical department. Since Doctor Kymeri is off on Hosnian Prime sorting out vendors for the upcoming ceremony, we had to pull Evan.”

“Oh, you’ll hear no complaints from me,” Paige laughed. “He was just a ball of nerves, excitement, and stress this morning. I thought he was going to bounce off the walls.”

“Doctor Kymeri’s sorting out vendors?” Snap blinked. “I thought Nalto was the one sorting this whole thing out.”

Kaydel grinned, “Well, she figured she’d help give him a hand. Besides, she was going to Hosnian Prime for a supply run anyway.”
“How is the Commander coping?” Karé asked.

“He yelled at Threepio for an hour about trying to arrange the seating chart for him,” Leia chuckled. “Apparently figuring out which military officers should share a table and which ones should absolutely not is serious business.”

“Oh, you have no idea,” Poe shook his head, his voice sounding like he was experiencing a battlefield flashback. “So, how was the honeymoon?”

“Wonderful,” Karé grinned, looping her arm with Snap’s. “But strangely it’s nice to be back here. Thank you again, General Organa for officiating the ceremony.”

“It was my pleasure,” Leia smiled warmly. “In time of war, love is a precious resource. That’s why I’m not upset with any of the relationships at this table… as long as none of them give me any issues.”

All eyes turned to Poe.

“Ok, that’s not fair,” he objected.

“Don’t worry, General,” Rose gave a nervous smile. She still had trouble talking to Leia sometimes… especially after discovering she totally knew the General’s beloved late niece was really alive. Rose had the tendency to just run out of the room when she saw Leia, too afraid that she would blurt out the truth. “You don’t have to fear my relationships giving you trouble. I’m fairly certain I’m going to die alone.”

“Oh for the love of!” Paige slammed her head against the table. “Enough, Rose! You are seventeen! You have plenty of time to find a boyfriend!”

“Or girlfriend,” Jessika added.

“But, be careful, Rose,” Kaydel grinned. “You might end up settling like your sister.”

Paige narrowed her eyes at Kaydel, “Yeah, because everyone wants a Poe Dameron. Good lord, even thinking about being with someone like him gives me a headache. Evan is sweet, caring, nurturing, and very uncomplicated. Who gives a damn is he’s not a muscular flyboy? At least I can always say Evan has composure and dignity.”

That was when the very desperate and unkempt Evan Tharel raced into the mess hall and made a beeline for Paige.

“Is she here yet?” Evan skidded to a halt, his eyes holding a not unlike crazed look.

Poe snorted.

Paige turned in her seat and took Evan’s hands, “She’s not here yet. Anh Yêu. Take a deep breath. Relax. Sit and have something to eat.”

“Oh, I can’t eat,” Evan climbed onto the bench next to Paige. He shot a glance to the empty spot left on the bench, “I’m too nervous.”

Paige shook her head, “Oh, no, you don’t. You don’t get to give lectures on skipping meals, and then skip one yourself, Hot Shot. Eat.”

She pushed her lunch try in front of him.
He gave her a nervous smile, grabbed a fork, and started picking at the pasta.

Kaydel frowned, “You’re not worried about germs from sharing?”

Evan raised an eyebrow, “I put my mouth against hers on a regular basis. If I was going to catch something, I would have a long time ago.”

“That is the most clinical description of a kiss I have ever heard,” Jessika said.

“I’m still a little grossed out,” Rose shuddered.

Evan grinned and reached over to ruffle her hair. Rose batted his hands away but smiled the whole time. Ever since Evan had moved in with Paige, he had made it his mission to be as big brotherly to Rose as possible as recompense for stealing away her sister. He wanted it to be clear to Rose that he wasn’t trying to break their family apart, but rather wanted to become part of it. Not just a partner for Paige, but he would care for and protect Rose as Paige did for her and he did for Paige.

“I AM NOT FILLING IT OUT, AND THAT’S FINAL!” a shout rang out through the mess hall.

All heads turned to the door to identify the owner of the man’s voice carrying from the hall.

All heads but Poe Dameron’s. Instead Poe grinned and turned to look at the wincing Leia Organa.

“I’m assuming that’s your surprise?” he chuckled.

“Don’t smile yet,” Leia said. “I don’t think you’ll like part two.”

The grin fell right off Poe’s face when he saw the woman who walked in with the shouting man.

“Would you lower your voice?” Holdo chided. “I’m standing right here.”

The man rolled his eyes, “I know, but apparently, you’re not getting what I’m saying, so maybe a higher volume will get it through the hair dye. I am not filling out your useless, arbitrary paperwork to file a… what? A record of my ship landing on the base? I’m dropping off a few refugees, not signing up for battle.”

“Don’t make me laugh,” Holdo huffed. “You signing up for battle? That would involve you caring about this war again. But no, you would rather just go mess around in the Galaxy, not getting involved because you don’t care.”

“I don’t care?” the man exclaimed. He laughed dangerously, “Oh, say that again, Sister. I dare you.”

Rose leaned over to Paige, “Who is that?”

“I don’t know.” Paige looked to Kaydel, “Do you know?”

Kaydel shrugged, “No. Poe?”

Poe just smirked.

Jessika blinked, “Wait a minute… Is that-”

“Oh yeah,” Poe laughed. “It is.”

“Wait for it,” Poe said.

“You want to look me in the eye, Holdo, and tell me that I don’t care?” the man challenged. “That this war means nothing to me? That I’ve lost nothing in it?”

Holdo just looked disgusted at him, “You don’t fight, you don’t go on missions, you won’t even fill out paperwork.”

“Fine! You want paperwork? Alright, here’s my ID Number 10002. Got that? 2! Because I was the second person to answer the call and join this damn Resistance. So you can take your paperwork and shove it right up your—”

General Leia Organa’s voice loudly cut in, “Do you always have to make a scene?”

Holdo and the man stopped and turned to look at Leia. She was sitting with crossed arms and a stern look but still a smile on her face.

“Hey, she started it,” the man pointed to Holdo.

A loud growl filled the room, and a Wookiee lumbered into the mess hall, chiding the man at Holdo’s side. Leia moved from the table to greet the Wookiee and embrace the man.

“Oh my god,” Rose’s eyes were as wide as saucers.

“Is that…” Paige couldn’t finish her sentence.

“I think it is,” Kaydel’s jaw was hanging open.

“Ladies and gentlemen,” Poe gestured to the man now hugging Leia, “I give you, Han Solo.”

“No way,” Rose whispered.

“Are you sure?” Jessika asked.

Han bent his head down and kissed Leia.

“Well, if not, then someone should probably give him a call about that,” Poe smirked.

“Oh my god,” Rose gasped. “Oh my god. Oh my god. Oh my god!”

“Oh, breathe,” Evan leaned forward. “You’re starting to sound like you’re hyperventilating.”

“Oh my god!” Rose exclaimed. “That’s Han Solo! The Han Solo!”

Karé frowned, “Yeah, we get it. Poe just said that.”

“No, you don’t get it!” Rose cried. “We’re finally in the same room as Han Solo!”

Everyone stared at her.

“We can get her autograph for Kira!”

Silence.

Then Poe burst out laughing.

“Oh, please do!” Poe was turning red from laughing so hard. “I need to see his reaction.”
Kaydel glared at him, “You mean better than the one you’re having at Rose’s expense right now?”

Her glare shut him right up.

“Babe,” Snap leaned over to his wife. “Who’s Kira?”

“I have no idea,” Karé replied looking equally lost.

We don’t have enough capital ships or troops to oppose the First Order everywhere, but we can look for ways to make a difference – contributing medicine or blasters, or bringing rebels to Resistance headquarters for a week of commando training.

- The Journal of Paige Tico

“So, how’s the refugee intake going, Amilyn?” Leia asked as she led Holdo, Han, and Chewbacca back to the table. They all settled on Leia’s formerly lone bench.

“Good,” Holdo nodded. “Almost all the transports have arrived. We’re still waiting on Seneca with Phoenix Rising, but otherwise everyone’s accounted for. The humanitarian tents are set up in the sniping field. The New Republic should have relocation homes ready in a week or two. Technically we’re still waiting for the freighter Eravana to arrive because I haven’t gotten the paperwork-”

“I will leave right now if you don’t drop this,” Han warned.

Holdo shrugged, “You say that like it’s a bad thing.”

Leia narrowed her eyes. Han was another person who had permanently blacklisted Holdo from his affections after her business with Felicity. It didn’t help that upon Holdo’s first meeting with Han she had told Leia – admittedly not to Han’s face – that Leia could do better.

Of course, they were already married with a baby on the way by then.

“Excuse me, Vice Admiral?” Evan cut in. “Sorry for bothering you, but I was wondering about a certain passenger.”

Leia held up her hand, “It’s alright. She’s on Phoenix Rising with Senesca and Dameron.”

“Dameron?” Han perked up. “Huh, thought you would have Poe on base in case of attack.”

“Uh, Captain Solo?” Poe held up his hand. “I’m right here. She means my dad.”

Rose bit her lip very hard to stop herself from making a comment about how put together Luke Skywalker could be living in an AT-AT in the desert of Jakku.

“I’ve got an espionage mission in a few days,” Poe said. “Trust me, no one’s looking forward to me shaving this beard more than myself.”
“I think my thighs would disagree,” Kaydel muttered.

Han blinked at her, “Uh… Leia? Do we have a kid I don’t know about?”

“Well, this girl looks a lot like you,” Han nodded to Kaydel. “Like… a creepy amount. Like absolutely could be your daughter.”

Everyone looked between Leia and Kaydel.

“No.”

“Not really.”

“What are you talking about?”

“I don’t think so.”

“Maybe if you squint.”

“I don’t see it.”

“He doesn’t mean Kaydel, right?”

Han scowled at the group, “You all must be joking. Seriously?”

Poe shook his head, “I don’t think they look anything alike.”

“Oh, what do you know?” Han waved off. “You probably don’t spend a lot of the time with the girl.”

“Sorry,” Leia cut in, “I forgot to introduce you. Han this is Connix… the girl I told you about.”

Han scowled, “No, I don’t remember anyone called Connix.”

Chewie growled something to Han. Poe didn’t know many words in Shyriiwook… but he did recognize the word desk.

Crap.

Han grinned, “Oh, right. That Connix.”

As Kaydel looked at him in confusion, Poe made a mental note not to ever tell her what he translated.

“Speaking of the mission,” Holdo said, “is everyone ready for it?”

Paige, Evan, Poe, Kaydel, Karé, and Snap replied affirmatively.

“Good,” Leia said, “Jaina will be here tomorrow.”

“Jaina Fel?” Han asked.

“She’s pretending to be my personal assistant,” Poe explained. “General, are we sure it’s a good idea to send her? She’s got that scar on her arm from Kylo Ren pushing her onto the broken glass. It might tip someone off.”
“Jaina will wear long sleeves and gloves,” Leia replied. “Besides, she’s the only person available who knows what a personal aide should act like.”

“I need her on Hosnian Prime making my case to the Senate,” Leia answered. “We can’t back down on making them understand the danger of the First Order.”

“Well, if the death of Luke Skywalker’s daughter wasn’t enough to get them to do anything, somehow I don’t think anything is going to make them act,” Han said bitterly. “Hey, maybe you can show the footage from Fliss’ torture or Shara’s murder. Those we really effective.”

A very awkward silence clung to the table.

“Alright, then,” Poe cleared his throat. Kaydel’s hand was gripping his in comfort, “Hey, Snap, have the rings finished being polished?”

“Oh, yeah, here,” Snap produced a pair of weddings bands and simple, but visibly expensive engagement ring from his pocket. As he handed them over to Poe and Kaydel, he glanced at his and Karé’s bare fingers. “I hate that Karé and I can’t also act married.”

“You’re supposed to be our bodyguards,” Poe retorted. “Why would I hire a married couple to be our bodyguards?”

“Still,” Snap shrugged, “it’s just weird that the married couple has to pretend to be single and the single couple is acting married.”

“Now be careful with those rings,” Holdo warned Poe and Kaydel as they slipped the rings on. They had already measured a while back to make sure they would fit the pair. “Those rings actually belong to a couple in the Resistance. I expect them to be returned to their owners in perfect condition or you will be replacing them. Understood?”

“Yes, Ma’am,” Poe gave a salute with his left hand, a glint of gold catching the light.

Evan shot to his feet, “Mom!”

Many people at the table laughed as Evan sprang to his feet at the sight of a brunette woman and made a run for her. She was – as they were soon to find out – the exact same age as Leia, she had her son’s brown hair and green eyes, and she was bound at a wheelchair.

As Evan raced forward, Paige nervously got to her feet, brushing off and straightening her clothing. It was time for the dreaded meet the parents moment she knew Evan luckily and unluckily wouldn’t have to endure in return.

Or so she thought.

There were other smiles at the table with the arrival, Holdo following after Evan in a leisurely pace to complete business. That was because Shayna Namit wasn’t entering alone. Strolling in behind her was Kes Dameron and Zev Senesca, the latter making a quick exit to finish other tasks after he reported in to Holdo.

“Hey,” Rose nudged her sister as they watched Evan drop to his knees and hug his mother tightly, the two immediately breaking into conversations of how the other had been. “You should go to them.”
“Oh no, I couldn’t,” Paige fiddled anxiously with her crescent moon pendant, trying to suck as much luck out of it as possible.

“Yes, you can! She’s going to love you!”

“Paige,” Kaydel reached across the table, “you’ll be fine. If she’s anything like Evan, she’s going to adore you.”

“I’ve just never done something like this. Met a boyfriend’s parent.”

“You know, Kay said the exact same thing to me before meeting my dad,” Poe cut in. “When I told Dad that, he told me to tell her that the parents want to like their kid’s significant other. Parents want above all else their child’s happiness, and the significant other makes them happy, so you’ve already got an edge.”

Kaydel clasped his hand, “Poe’s right, in my experience the boyfriend’s parents don’t try to kill you… Just your parents.”

“You clearly have never met my father-in-law,” Han mumbled stealing a fried nuna strip from Leia’s plate.

“Look, Paige,” Kaydel said, “if Evan’s mom is even half like Kes Dameron, you’ll be fine.”

“Aw, how sweet. Thank you, Dear,” Kes laughed. No one had noticed when he had reached the table with a couple of bags he set on the ground.

“Dad!” Poe leapt to his feet to grab his father into a hug. “It’s so good to see you!”

“Good to see you too.” Kes pulled back and gave his son a good look up and down, “Or so I thought I would see you. What happened to you? The voice is right, but where’s my son behind all this scruff?”

“Just a mission,” Poe swatted away Kes’ hand as he ruffled Poe’s unruly hair. “I’ll be back to normal soon enough.”

“You better. Just when I finally give up on the you should have Yavinese hair argument you let it grow out? I don’t think so,” Kes patted Poe shoulder, chuckling. He turned his attention to Kaydel, “And don’t tell me you traded in that sweet Connix girl for some brunette. I mean this one gives me very nice compliments, but I’m rooting for Kaydel.”

“Very funny, Kes,” Kaydel laughed, getting to her feet to hug him. “Again, it’s just for a mission. I’ll be back to blonde in no time.”

“You might want to do it before the mission,” Kes scowled. “You know, you look a lot like Leia.”

“Thank you!” Han exclaimed. “Finally someone else sees it!”

“I don’t know how you can’t,” Kes slid onto the end of the bench next to Poe. “Good to see you, Solo.”

“Kes,” Han nodded. “Been a while. What are you up to these days? Still doing the farming thing?”

“It’s a nice, quiet life. You doing much of the same? And by same, I mean the same life you always have which is the absolute opposite of my life?”

“The quiet life is a boring one. Nothing like a good heist to get the heart pumping.”
“That reminds me,” Leia said, “I’ve got to pull something in a few months here and I want to get your opinion on my plan.”

“Sure. What’s up?”

“I’ll explain it later when we’re alone but let’s just say Lor San Tekka has… run into a little trouble lately.”

“Yeah, he hasn’t been around much,” Kes frowned. “What happened to him? I know he travels, but he likes to visit the old Force Sensitive tree Shara and I planted. Hasn’t been around Yavin IV in almost a year.”

Leia shifted uncomfortably. She did not like answering this question in front of so many people.

“Um…” Leia cleared her throat, “there was an image of Lor San obtained by the First Order in which he may or may not be wearing a neck pouch not unlike the one used in Operation Citadel.”

Han lifted an eyebrow, “So, you’ve found-”

“The key to Ahch-to,” Kes finished.

“Rrer gre row ree?” Chewie added.

“It’s not confirmed,” Leia insisted. “Besides, we’re not even 100% sure that Luke ever made it to Ahch-to. A few years ago there was some suspicious activity involving certain assets of his that were confirm to be done by him personally. Luke may be at the first Jedi Temple, or he might have changed his mind. For all we know we went to Jakku to find Rey.”

Rose loudly coughed as she choked on her drink.

Every eye turned on her.

“Just, uh…” Rose cleared her throat, “went down the wrong way.”

Jessika frowned.

“So Lor San is off finding Luke?” Kes returned to them to the previous conversation.

“I think that was his plan,” Leia replied, “but then Tara Ren turned up on his doorstep and he’s been fleeing from the First Order ever since. We’ve completely dropped out of contact. I have no idea what he’s doing.”

“I’m sure he’ll show up sooner or later,” Holdo said.

“He better,” Han cut in. “It’s far past the time that Luke should have come home. I get needed some time alone after what happened, but it’s been twelve god damn years. I don’t care with we have to drag him back literally kicking and screaming; Luke is coming home.”

He crossed his arms and slumped back in his chair.

“I’m bringing someone home,” Han muttered so only Chewie and Leia could hear him. “I failed with Qi’ra, Rey, Felicity, and Ben. I’m bringing Luke home.”

Chewie gave a soft growl and Leia placed her hand over Han’s.

“Well, I’d be more than happy to help you fetch him,” Kes offered. “This all reminds me of the Rebellion pre-Battle of Yavin. A cold war is worse than an active one.”

Holdo gave a sympathetic smile, “It’s true, especially with this refugee situation. Forcing mining towns under their thumb and putting those who rebel in prison camps. If we hadn’t gotten to the Preon system first, this might have ended up like what they did to Otomok.”

Rose winced. She felt Paige grasp her hand under the table, but when she looked at her sister, Paige had a pained, longing look over to Evan who was still off talking to his mother.

“Anyone left there these days?” Snap asked, unaware of the Ticos’ association with the system.

“No,” Karé shook her head sadly. “It’s barren. Everyone’s either dead or in prison camps.”

Rose struggled not to think of her parents. She wanted nothing more than to go into the First Order with blasters blazing to find that list of Otomok prisoners in the camps. Maybe looking through that list for the names Thanya and Vien Tico would finally quell the ache in her heart. At least then she could come up with a plan for rescue.

Or finally get closure on their deaths.

“It’s okay,” Paige whispered in her ear. “We still have each other. I won’t leave you. I promise.”

That was a promise she couldn’t keep.

Holdo said, “The sad thing is this cold war won’t heat up until either Luke Skywalker returns and brings hope back to the galaxy… or they blow up another planet and we get united by a lust for revenge.”

“If they build another Death Star, I call blowing that one up,” Poe yelled dibs.

He sunk back in his seat when he saw Leia’s deathly glare.

“Not to diminish the loss of Alderaan or sacrifices made in the Battles of Yavin and Endor. Right, Dad?”

“I’m not backing you up in this one, Poe. Your mother and I both fought in Endor. You want to mock it, you’re on your own.”

“You do have to admit,” Kaydel tried to backup his boyfriend a bit, “if there is anything that’s a magnet for drawing out Luke Skywalker, it would be a Death Star.”

“Well, if there is another Death Star, I’m not telling Nalto,” Nils Arlos cut in as he approached the tables. “I had to tell him and Felicity about Death Star Two, and I’m not dealing with him putting another chair through the window.”

“How about we just take him to a field, put him at the opposite end, yell it to him through a megaphone, and then run like hell?” Poe suggested.

“Sounds good to me,” Nils shrugged. “I’ve got your ID chips ready.”

Nils set a handful of identification chips on the table and took the free seat next to Kaydel. It put him right between Kaydel and Poe and at the next table, Karé and Snap, giving them the best access to the chips.

“Nice,” Poe snatched up his while Kaydel slid Paige’s and Evan’s across the table. “And Vice Admiral Holdo, I respectfully disagree with your assessment.”
“Whoa,” Holdo blinked, “is that the first time you’ve used the word respect in relation to me without a negative connotation?”

“Don’t get used to it,” he flashed her a smile. “Besides, I am disagreeing with you. This isn’t a cold war anymore. Things are definitely heating up with the air force.”

“Not by much.”

“I think BB-8 would refute that.”

Kes frowned, “Now that you mention it, where is the little ball?”

Most of the eyes at the table turned on Poe as he gave his father a sheepish smile.

“Well, uh, he, sort of,” Poe rubbed the back of his neck, “he kind of… blew up… a little.”

Kes blinked, “I’m sorry, what?”

“BB-8 blew up,” Jessika repeated.

“Wow, tough luck, Kid,” Han said.

“Oh, no, he’s fine,” Poe assured. “He just got hit by a blaster bolt and went flying in a few different directions. We’ve got all the pieces but a lot of him is scorched and melded together so BB needs a very thorough repair job that’s going to take about a month. Memory core’s intact, so he’ll be the same BB-8 we all know and love, but he needs some intense work.”

“Honestly Poe,” Jessika teased, “you need to treat your droids with more respect.”

“Whatever you say, Great Destroyer.”

Tallie gave a nervous chuckle. Jessika still hadn’t figured out Tallie was the mastermind behind the nickname, and Tallie very much wanted to keep that a secret.

“If we could redirect our attention,” Nils said a little louder than necessary, “I’d like to go over the mission a little.”

Rose hesitated, “Do we… Do the rest of us have to leave?”

“No, Dear,” Holdo gave her a sickly smile not intending for it to be condescending. “It’s not that classified.”

“Hey, Hot Shot!” Poe turned and yelled to Evan. “Get over here! We’re briefing.”

Evan nodded, and he approached the table with his mother. Paige shot to her feet in an instant. As she waited for them, she kept adjusting her stance, shifting her weight and swaying in jerky movements, appearing to have forgotten entirely how standing normally was supposed to look.

“Everyone, this is my mother, Shayna,” Evan announced when they reached the table. “Mother, these are my friends, commanding officers, and… and I’m not sure who the fuzzy one is.”

Chewbacca growled a greeting.

“Sorry, we’re last minutes additions as always,” Han said. “I’m Han Solo and that’s Chewbacca.”

“It’s a pleasu-” Shayna stopped and blinked, “Wait… the Han Solo? Like Kessel Run Han Solo?”
The one who did the Kessel in twelve parsecs?

Han too blinked, then broke into an enormous grin, “Lady, I think I like you.”

“I don’t believe it,” Shayna sounded as excited as Rey when she spoke of Han Solo. “This is amazing. I’ve always wanted to meet you and shake your hand.”

“Well, I don’t want to be rude,” Han got to his feet and did just that. “It’s always nice to meet someone who focuses on my best accomplishment.”

Leia raised an eyebrow, “Didn’t you used to say our son was your best accomplishment?”

“In all fairness, General,” Poe grinned, “I feel history will disagree.”

“Poe,” Kes warned.

“Captain Solo, tell me,” Shayna leaned in conspiratorially. “Did you really do the Kessel Run in only twelve parsecs?”

Han grinned, “Absolutely.”

_Roar rah ro grr!

He glared at Chewie, “You’re not supposed to tell them we round down!”_

_Rah grr gre raw roh greh!

“Oh, whatever!” Han stomped back to his seat. “It’s still less than thirteen, so it counts as twelve!”_

_Grr grah roh gree!

“No, we are not doing this again, Chewie! Now drop it!”_

Chewie huffed and crossed his arms but did as he was told.

Holdo just stared at the two, “…Alright then.”

Rose suddenly pushed Paige forward. She went stumbling almost falling right onto Shayna, but Evan caught her in time.

Paige caught her bearings and scowled at her sister, “Rose!”

“What?” Rose held up her hands in surrender. “She seems nice and you looked like you needed a push.”

“Rose!” Paige blushed.

Evan just looked like he wanted to laugh but knew at least one person in the company would slap him for doing so… Most likely Jessika.

“Oh, come on,” Rose exclaimed, “she’s a Han Solo fan. She’s good in my book.”

“For the love of,” Paige groaned.

Leia leaned over to Han, “Rose there is a big fan of yours as well.”

“Oh really?” Han looked so smug.
“Yep, and she’s got a little friend here that absolutely adores you. Like I mean Felicity didn’t idolize Brendan as strongly as her friend idolizes you.”

“Sweetheart, I have no interest in being a hundred feet near someone who idolizes me more than Fliss idolized Brendan. That’s just a terrifying image.”

“You’re in luck. The girl isn’t actually on base.”

“Good. Won’t want to have the girl hear her idol doesn’t want to meet her.”

“It would be devastating, but I would never focus you into that situation. I am however making you sign an autograph to her.”

“I don’t do autographs,” Han said instantly.

“No, but you’ll do this one,” Leia answered as a matter of fact. “You’re going to grin and bear it, take a picture of yourself, and sign it To Kira, Never Tell Me the Odds, Love Han Solo, Captain of the Millennium Falcon.”

“Qi’ra?” Han frowned.

“Not your Qi’ra. Kira like how Luke and Felicity were going to spell it.”

“Good, that would just be awkward if it was my Qi’ra.”

“Especially since we’re taking and sending a picture of the two of us as well.”

“The two of us?”

“A picture and autograph from Chewie as well. This girl has grown up in an environment like Tatooine mixed with Corellia. The least was can do for her is send a couple of pictures.”

“Leia,” Han groaned. He hated it when she played the Corellia card.

“Don’t even start,” Leia count off. “You know you’re not going to win this argument.”

Han huffed but conceded defeat.

While that was happening, Paige was trying to find a way to actually open her mouth and speak to Evan’s mother. She didn’t even need to introduce herself, she just needed to find a way to regain the ability to speak. Even the word hi seemed out of her grasp. Hell, she’d be happy to just blurt out I slept with your son last night to calm his nerves over your arrival today.

Okay, maybe not exactly that.

Shayna watched as the girl struggled to speak. She glanced at her son and found Geno was being of no help.

She sighed; fine, if she had to do it herself, she would.

“Hello, Dear,” Shayna offered her hand to shake. “It’s a pleasure to meet you.”

“The pleasure’s all mine,” Paige shook. When they let go, she started to crouch down, but stopped herself. She started to go back up but again hesitated and started to crouch until she stopped again. “I, um… I’m sorry, I haven’t met someone in a wheelchair before. Should I be standing, or is it more offensive not to look at you at eye level?”
“Standing is preferred,” Shayna said politely. “It’s actually considered to be condescending to crouch unless asked.”

Horror filled Paige’s face, “Oh my God, I am so sorry! I didn’t mean-”

“Oh, I didn’t think we were trying to be.”

“I know!” Paige said getting increasingly hysterical, “I just- I thought- I don’t- I- Evan- I mean, Geno… Uh, you see-”

Shayna held up a hand, and Paige fell silent.

“Relax,” Shayna said gently. “Why don’t we start this over?”

Paige nodded, “Ok.”

“Take a deep breath… and you start.”

She gathered herself and then smiled, “Hello, my name is Paige Tico, and your son, Geno is the best thing to ever happen to me.”

Rose loudly cleared her throat.

“After my sister, Rose,” Paige amended.

Shayna chuckled, “Hello, Paige. I’m Shayna Namit. Genie’s told me a lot of good things about you.”

“That’s good, and again, it’s a pleasure to meet you, Mrs. Namit.”

“Oh, Dear, call me Shayna.”

“Alright,” Paige smiled finding herself relaxing. “Shayna’s a pretty name. My mother had one similar, Thanya.”

“Has Genie had the pleasure of being introduced yet? Or is the tardiness in introductions mutual?”

“Mother,” Evan groaned.

“Don’t you mother me,” Shayna countered. “I know you live with the girl.”

“Hey, we just sleep in the same bed. We haven’t done anything else!”

Jessika leaned over to Tallie, “Yeah, just like we only sleep together.”

“Jess!” Tallie hissed, eyeing Holdo.

“Uh, no,” Paige answered the query, “Evan- Er, Geno hasn’t met my parents. They’re, um… We’re from Hays Minor and…”

Shayna smiled, “I understand. It’s a horrible thing the First Order has done to the Otomok system and now the Preon moons.”

“Why were you living on Preon IX? I thought you guys were from,” Paige paused. “Actually I can’t remember where you guys are from. Evan only mentioned it once, but I know it wasn’t Preon IX.”

“Oh, I work for a mining organization as a coordinating director,” Shayna explained. “I decide which employees to send to which sites. Actually that’s how I met Geno’s father. He was a safety inspector for the mining industry. He was checking out one of my sites, then started to check out me, and I checked out him, and well… Things went from there. It was strange, not meanly man take a second look at a girl in a wheelchair.”

“I’m sorry about your husband. Evan said he died in a work accident?”

“We was inspecting a mountain operation’s safety measures and there was an avalanche and… let’s just say the operation wasn’t up to code.”

“I’m sorry.”

“It was years ago,” Shayna waved off. “I think I did a good job with Genie afterwards.”

“I agree,” Paige grinned at Evan. “I think you did a very good job.”

Evan reddened slightly.

“Sorry to cut in,” Jessika said, “but you’re one of the refugees?”

“I haven’t had a stable home since Geno joined the Resistance,” Shayna explained. “I sold our house so that Geno could afford to do so. That’s the problem with these volunteer organizations, they don’t come with a salary.”

“Believe me,” Leia interjected, “if I could get actual funding from the New Republic, anyone would be able to join. Not just the well-off and the homeless.”

A series of looks were exchanged across the tables. Far too many of the people seated there were technically homeless. The mere beds, food, and refreshers just barely allowed those who didn’t have money to survive, and those who did often felt pressured to foot the bill.

And those revenue streams were starting to dry up.

“So, where were you living if you didn’t have the house anymore?” Holdo asked.

“Thankfully my company would pay for places to stay while I was out traveling,” Shayna answered. “Otherwise I’ve been doing a mix of motels and the generosity of friends. I was living on Preon IX for a few months when my company got into this mess with the First Order. We’re currently pretty broke and have to shut down until things get better. I was in the middle of trying to find somewhere to go when the New republic finally woke up and ordered the evacuation. I’ve been promised a place to live from the government and a meager pension, but it’s going to be a little longer to find a placement for me, what with the whole wheelchair situation.”

“Which brings me to my point,” Jessika said. She turned to Holdo and Leia, “You’re not seriously going to make her sleep in the sniper field in a tent? General Organa, I know that forest. I know its trials. Even BB-8 gets knocked over on those paths.”

Leia said, “It’s alright, Miss Pava. Due to her disability, Mrs. Namit has been allotted a room for better accessibility.”

“Speaking of,” Holdo stood, “I was about to go check on how things are going with the camp. Would you like me to run your bags to your room, Mrs. Namit?”

“That would be wonderful.” Shayna looked to Kes, “Is this the one you said your son complains about a lot?”
Poe glared at Kes.

He shrugged, “What? It was a long flight. Having sons was a mutual topic for conversation.”

Holdo went to the end of the table where Kes had dropped Shayna’s bags.

“Genie, help her out,” Shayna said as Holdo struggled to find a bag way too hold all three bags. Amilyn Holdo was definitely not a stand in for a pack mule like Kes Dameron.

Evan frowned as he helped Holdo, “Is this all you have?”

“It’s all we were allowed,” Shayna replied. “They told us we could only bring three bags. You know, it’s not easy to put a lifetime into a bag. Not that I really had much after selling the house.”

“I know how you feel,” Kes said. “I remember during the Rebellion you were allowed to pack a single bag. Lead to some weird items showing up on base. Didn’t Fliss steal her brother’s urn from her father?”

“Carried that thing everywhere,” Leia shook her head. “Although, admittedly it was the size of a travel shampoo bottle. There wasn’t a lot of Brendan’s body to cremate. But hey, at least she got a bag. There were people like Diego, Luke, and I whose homes and families were destroyed and you literally only had the clothes on your back.”

“Sweetheart,” Han said, “you absolutely had more than one outfit.”

“Well, in my case I already had a bag packed at the base,” Leia reddened slightly. “It still counts!”

Holdo had managed to get the bags all sorted out. She said her goodbyes and then she was gone.

“Hey, Mom, I’m going to go grab you some lunch,” Evan put a hand on her shoulder. “You want to stay here with Paige?”

“Of course,” Shayna wheeled to the end of the bench where an empty spot was left for her and Evan. “She’s a lovely girl. Why don’t you, I, and her have dinner tonight. Privately?”

“Right. Privately,” Evan reddened as he caught her meaning. He probably shouldn’t have made Paige have an audience for meeting his mother. Oh well, he didn’t exactly have a reputation around base for thinking things through. He wasn’t called Hot Shot for nothing.

As Evan left to get his mother some lunch and Shayna settled at the end of the table, only then did Paige realize that Shayna wouldn’t be able to sit on spot on the bench they had left for her.

Oops.

When Nils announced in annoyance that he couldn’t proceed with the briefing until Evan got back, the table broke off into several side conversations. Kes, Kaydel, and Poe fell into their natural rhythm – Kes adoring Kaydel so much that Poe suspected Kes liked her better than Poe. Han, Leia, and Chewie broke into Skywalker family banter. Karé, Snap, Jessika, and Tallie went into the topic of piloting. And surprisingly, Rose and Nils – seated across from each other – fell into a conversation about tricking computer systems while undercover.

That left Paige and Shayna alone.

“So,” Paige shifted in her seat, “did you and Evan have a nice conversation earlier?”

“A wonderful one,” she smiled. “Geno is truly my pride and joy. He’s a little eccentric and hotheaded sometimes. I think I might have been a little too by the book when raising him and he wants a life that isn’t too cliché. A little cliché, sure, but not his whole life.”

“Yeah, he told me that you were very conservative.”

“Oh, Honey, if you think I’m conservative, you should have met my parents. They wouldn’t let me do anything after I ended up in this thing.”

Paige hesitated, “If you don’t mind me asking… Evan doesn’t- Won’t tell me-”

“How I ended up in the chair?”

She nodded.

Shayna said, “Have you ever heard of the Bombing of Faclov? That’s how.”

“The Bombing of Faclov?” Paige blinked.

“Yes. I grew up in Faclov City. Raised Geno right on the intersection of Rhiaon Boulevard and Memorial Street.”

“Wow, I didn’t even know people survived the bombing.”

“Oh, 2000 may have died but there were over 5000 injured. I was near a lamppost when the bombs went off. Said lamppost exploded and I got fragments shot into my spine, paralyzing me from the waist down. People don’t like to talk about the survivors of Faclov, just the martyrs like Brendan Rhiaon. But thousands of us survived, and we were pissed. I wanted to join the Rebellion in revenge, but I was only fourteen and my parents became super protective of me.”

“I’m so sorry,” Paige said.

“It’s okay. I’ve lived a good life,” Shayna said. “You know, Genie tells me you’re a bomber.”

“I, um… I don’t believe violence should ever be used, especially when there are bystanders involved, but I believe the use of bombs in space battles are an important tool. No, we’re not always going to hit the right people, but I think it’s a good way to accomplish a lot using only a little.”

Shayna patted Paige’s hand, “I’m not going to debate the ethics of bombs with you. You live a different life than I do, and with that comes… different beliefs.”

Paige frowned, why was there that odd tone in Shayna’s vo-

Oh.

“Oh.

“You, uh… you know about Evan and I…” Paige couldn’t even bring herself to say it.

“Darling, you share a bed,” Shayna said simply. “I’m not an idiot.”

“Right,” Paige chuckled nervously. “Look, I don’t want you to think that I devalue the uh, act of lovemaking. I just, um, I don’t think you have to be married. I think it’s up to each person to make that decision for themselves.”

“I agree. I think that’s a choice for each individual to make. Personally, I think it should be reserved for your spouse alone, but I’m not going to impose my will on others.”
Paige frowned, “I thought Evan said you’d kill him if he had sex before marriage.”

“I may have told him such things,” Shayna smiled slyly. “But that’s only because I wanted Geno to treat the thing very seriously. His nickname around here of Hot Head is appropriate. If I told Genie that I didn’t care who he slept with and when, I know he would have rushed into something he regretted. He holds me in high regard… maybe too high. I knew he wouldn’t want to hurt me. If he had come talked to me about why he wanted to have sex before marriage, I knew he would be taking the issue seriously. I knew that if he wanted to tell me – or as it turned out not tell me but do it anyways – that he wanted to be with a woman intimately, that meant this girl was something very special to him. If he wanted to also just go out and sleep with every woman on this base, that would have been okay. I simply gave him my opinion and enough passion behind it to treat the issue seriously. Did I over step? Perhaps, but ultimately Geno… Evan is an adult free to make his own choices. So, if he wants to be Evan Tharel, war nurse, and having sex before marriage, then that’s the man he chooses to be, and I respect it.”

“For what it’s worth,” Paige said, “personally, I think you should only do it with someone you love.”

“And do you love my son?”

She smiled, “Absolutely. Meeting him was one of the greatest things to happen to me. I’m so happy that Aletha was too busy to treat me after the Battle of Valra.”

“That’s wonderful,” Shayna reached out and squeezed Paige’s hand. “Now that that’s out of the way, I’ve been meaning to ask. Where is Aletha?”

Evan returned at that moment with a lunch tray.

“Grandma’s on Hosnian Prime helping secure vendors,” he set down the try in front of her and took his seat next to Paige. He wrapped his arm around Paige. “She’ll be back in a few days. This ceremony is stressing out half the Resistance.”

“Oh right, the big ceremony.” Shayna teased, “Do I get an invitation? After all, Aletha apparently is my mother.”

“I know you’re joking about getting invited,” Leia interjected, “but I don’t suggest you make such comments to Diego. He’s so obsessed with putting this all together that a joke like that might break him.”

“Nalto’s planning this?” Han had given up the pretense that he hadn’t just stolen Leia’s lunch tray. “I’m surprised. Based on history, I would have thought you’d be all over that, Sweetheart.”

“I have far too much to deal with to be concerned with event planning. Diego was actually really excited to do it himself at first. Aletha’s been lending a hand, but this will ultimately be his vision. Which reminds me, Diego wanted me to tell the lot of you that he does need an official RSVP. Even if you’re involved with the ceremony. So far, he’s only received Holdo’s.”

Poe leaned over to Kaydel, “Remind me again why it would have been rude not to invite her?”

“She’s the third-in-command of the Resistance.”

“What’s your point?”

“Well, I’d reply if I were invited,” Han said, “but Chewie and I only heard about all of this this morning. Guess we weren’t included.”
“Yes, you both were,” Leia responded, “Diego was just smart enough to send the invitations to Malla and I. You’re both going.”

“Oh, I am, am I?” Han countered.

“Yes, and you’re going to remember how Diego spent hours collecting the bodies of the Jedi while you punched and tree and threw up. So put on a suit, take a shower, comb your hair, smile, and deal with it.”

An indignant look flooded Han’s face and he opened his mouth to argue, finger pointing right in Leia’s face. Nothing came from his throat but a small, strangled noise as he realized he had no retort.

So he grunted, crossed his arms, and mumbled, “Fine.”

“And that,” Kes leaned over to Poe, “is how he ended up married to her.”

Poe chuckled.

“Chewie,” Leia turned her attention to the Wookiee. “I’ll need you to get a hold of Waroo. He’s invited, but Malla said he wasn’t home when I commed her. I need to know if he’s coming.”

Rowr roo ree wah.

“No, Chewie, I can’t. I don’t know where he is.”

Grr rowr gree raa.

“What? D’Qar here?”

Roar.

Leia just stared at Chewie. Then, slowly, she turned to face the cringing Han.

“Why is Waroo on your ship?” Leia demanded.

Han shrugged, “Chewie wanted to spend more time with his son, so I suggested he come spend a few months doing business with us.”

“Illegal business?”

“We may bend the rules from time to time.”

“Han,” Leia chided.

“Oh, don’t start, Leia,” Han was in no mood for this argument. “Waroo is an adult. He can make choices like this. Frankly it’s a better choice than our own son is making ever since he decided to take roleplaying as Darth Vader Junior far too seriously!”

“Do you have to make a joke about everything?”

“It’s the only way I know how to cope with pain.”

The table fell silent.

A very, very long silence.

“…So, anyway,” Kes cleared his throat. “Shayna, if you actually wanted to come to Nalto’s thing, I’ve got a free plus one. You could come as my date.”

“What?” Poe blinked.

“Really?” Shayna asked.

“Yeah, in fact, I’ve got a spare room at my place if you wanted somewhere to stay that’s better than what the New Republic would give you.”

“That would be wonderful!” Shayna grinned, excited at the thought. “You know the entire time you were talking about your farm, I was thinking how much I’d love to see a place like that. Are you sure I wouldn’t be a bother?”

“Oh, not at all. Frankly, I’ve been quite lonely these past few months.”

“Dad,” Poe said nervously.

“You have no idea what these would mean to me,” Shayna continued. “You know, I’m a certified accountant. I could run the books for you as thank you.”

“Mom,” Evan groaned looking as frightened.

“That would be amazing. I’m terrible at math.”

“Math is one of my favorite things.”

“Hey, I’m going to go grab a sandwich,” Kes stood up. “We can talk details when I get back.”

“Why don’t I come with you?” Shayna suggested.

“Let’s do it!”

The table was silent again as Shayna and Kes went off talking excitedly.

“What just happened?” Evan stared blankly after his mother.

“I think my dad is going on a date with your mom,” Poe looked pale.

Evan turned to Poe and blinked, “…I’m not calling you brother.”

“Don’t worry, Boys,” Han chuckled, “Chewie and I are meeting a contact on Yavin IV in few weeks, so we offered to give Kes – and now, Shayna, I guess – a flight home. We’ll keep an eye on that. For what it’s worth, I don’t think they mean a date date.”

Poe scowled at Evan, “I still don’t like this. My dad is meant for my mom. End of story.”

“Don’t worry,” he sighed, “my mom is ridiculously straight-laced. If he’s anything like you, he won’t have any fun with her at all.”

“Well, if we’re done chatting,” Nils Arlos cut in impatiently, “can we please get to the briefing?”

“Right.”

The soon to be spies scrambled for the ID chips they had forgotten about.
“Okay, let’s go over the mission,” Nils began. “You lot will be going to the planet of Nixrye in a few days. You’ll be staying at a hotel that’s holding a business and pleasure conference as they call it, for Kation Defense Holdings. This is a new company offering defense weapons and systems and we want to check them out, as well as who they’re doing business with, before the Resistance approaches them for a partnership. Now, you are allowed to partake in the hotel’s amenities, but try to keep the costs as reasonable as possible. You will be required to list everything in your reports later and anything deemed too extravagant you will be asked to reimburse the Resistance for. Got it?”

“No facials with 14 karat gold, got it,” Poe nodded.

“You lot will be going as two separate groups. Tharel and Tico, who are you going as?” Nils quizzed.

“Doctor Zeth Bahol, veterinarian,” Evan answered as he studied his fake ID chip. “Paige is going to be Doctor Liin Mallix, my coworker who may or may not be having an affair with me even though that’s against workplace rules.”

“Good, make a story,” Nils nodded. “So, why are you two attended a weapons conference?”

“We work on an endangered animal reservation and are looking for new anti-poaching measures.”

“Good.” Nils turned to the others, “Now the rest of you, as well as Miss Fel, who has already been briefed, will be going as another group. Poe, you’re Kane Nilar, millionaire real estate mogul with other side projects of a questionable nature. You may or may not be involved in the spice trade.”

“I refuse to confirm or deny,” Poe smirked.

“Now, Miss Connix, you are playing Dania Nilar, his, uh… how to put this nicely? Trophy wife.”

“Got it,” Kaydel nodded. “He’s ten years older than me and we got married when I was eighteen after only knowing each other for three months, but I was conveniently impregnated by him – we’ve had blood tests to prove it – so it’s what you do. You get married.”

“How’d you two meet?” Nils tested.

“Well, Dania here,” Poe wrapped his arm around her, “we were at the same gala together. She came in on the arm of a business associate of mine, and she left the museum night on my arm.”

“In all fairness, he ended up being an absolute creep,” Kaydel said. “Kane saved me from him, and I thought it polite to reward him.”

“We went straight to my luxury penthouse apartment, and I, uh, made her breakfast for the next three days. One of my favorite memories,” Poe nuzzled her neck.

Kaydel paused him away, smiling, “Come on, not in polite company, Dear.”

“Since when have I been polite?”

He was suddenly literally pulled off Kaydel by the returning Kes Dameron.

“Since I taught you to be so,” Kes set Poe back in his seat. “Now sit up and stop mauling your girlfriend. It’s rude.”

“Can you please stay here forever?” Jessika begged.
Leia shook her head, “I think you two are going to have fun with this cover story. Just make sure you stay consistent.”

“We will,” Poe nodded.

“Oh, really?” Han smirked. “Why don’t we test that theory?”

“Go ahead,” Kaydel welcomed. “We can answer anything and do it consistently.”

“Alright,” Jessika said, “how many kids you have?”

“Three,” Poe answered.

“Names?” Tallie asked.

“Abril, Persephone, and Mateo,” he shot back like he had picked them out years ago. “Two Yavinese names like me, and one Mallarex for Kaydel.”

“How old are they?” Rose challenged.

“Eight, seven, and Mateo’s about to turn five,” Kaydel shot back.

“How old were you when you had them?” Leia asked.

Kaydel paused to calculate.

“And you just blew your cover,” Leia said. “A mother knows the age she had a child. Make sure you know that by heart. So, I’ll ask again. How old were you when you had your kids?”

“Nineteen, twenty, and twenty-two.”

“Good girl,” Nils smiled. “General Organa’s right, you all need to study and practice your stories a lot. The tiniest slip of the tongue could blow the entire mission. Know your story and go along with what the others come up with.”

“Speaking of,” Kaydel turned to Poe, “really with those names?”

“What?” he frowned. “They’re nice. I like them.”

“Well, I don’t.”

“What’s wrong with them?” he challenged.

Kaydel raised an eyebrow, “I hate the name Abril – it sounds like we misspelled the name April and just went with it.”

“Abril is the Yavinese word for April.”

“I don’t care. Then there’s Persephone, the kind of name a trust fund baby would have.”

“Which is why, it’s perfect.”

“Poe, can you ever spell Persephone? Then there’s Mateo-”

“What’s wrong with Mateo?” Poe snapped.

“Poe… it’s Diego’s father’s name. Tell me that isn’t a little weird to use.”
He considered it, “Alright, I’ll give you that one. We can change the names if you want.”

“I’m sorry but I’m going to have to veto that,” Nils said. “We now all know the names, so it’s safer to just have those names in your heads than them and another set. Abril, Persephone, and Mateo it is.”

Poe shrunk back from Kaydel’s glare.

“Now, this is a good angle to have,” Nils said, “two girls and a boy. It’s exactly what my wife and I had, and Sabrina is from Yavin III. Our younger selves kind of look like you two, so our kids might pass as yours. I’ll get a picture of them from the right age that you can use in case anyone asks to see them.”

“Thank you,” Kaydel smiled, “that sounds wonderful.”

No one at the table considered the fact that Kaydel was now sporting brown hair instead of the blonde of Nils’ youth. So no one thought to stop Nils from giving black-haired Poe and brunette Kaydel a picture of two black-haired children and a blonde.

On and on the preparations went. Snap would be Thon Sho, Poe’s personal bodyguard, and Karé would be Vella Takan, Kaydel’s bodyguard. Jaina Fel would pretended to be a personal assistant named Artora Dimodan. The job of Poe’s team was to get as close to the employees of Kation Defense Holdings and their clients while Evan and Paige would monitor what happened behind the scenes.

The group had been talking about the mission on Nixrye for about half an hour when something hard and metallic tapped Leia’s shoulder.

“Excuse me, General Organa?”

Leia looked up in surprise to see Threepio standing between herself and Han.

“What is it, Threepio?” Leia asked.

“Pardon me for the interruption – it is a pleasure to see you again, Captain Solo – but I’m afraid it’s Commander Nalto.”

“Can’t get the centerpieces just right?” Poe asked dryly.

Kaydel swatted his arm.

“What happened, Threepio?” Leia asked.

“Well, this is rather embarrassing, but it appears that Doctor Kalonia has discovered she’s allergic to a certain root vegetable on the menu she committed to, so she told him she had to switch her catering choice from nuna to fish, and uh… Commander Nalto has locked himself in his office crying and cussing… Mostly cussing… And throwing his possessions.”

Kes shook his head, “That’s it, I’m putting Diego in anger management courses.”

“Maybe wait until after the ceremony,” Poe suggested. “He might actually try to kill you if anyone pisses him off in the next two months.

Leia sighed, “I’m coming.”

“I’ll get Aletha on the comm,” Kaydel too rose.
One by one everyone took this as the signal the meal was over and each gave farewells and muttered plans for where they were going next. Han had just risen from the bench himself when someone tugged his arm.

“Uh, Captain Solo?” Rose asked nervously.

“What is it?” Han tried to be polite but he wasn’t sure why he was talking to this girl who was roughly the height of Felicity, he noted sadly. Maybe that was why he gave her his attention, for that speck of resemblance she held to his best female friend that he missed so much.

Rose bit her lip, nervously fiddling with what appeared to be a comm on her belt, “I know it’s out of the blue, but I was wondering if you might do me a favor?”

Han sighed as he caught an encouraging look from Chewie out of the corner of his eye, “Depends on the favor.”

“Rose, you are the best person in the universe!” Rey squealed into the comm as she sat alone in the walker. “You got Han Solo to come talk to me?”

“Well, I thought since it was just going to be just the two of us tonight we might do something self indulgent.” Rose was indeed alone that night, Kaydel and Paige off having dinners with their boyfriends’ parents, Aletha on Hosnian Prime – these days she tended to leave Rey’s comm with the girls when she went away – and Jessika decided to have some alone time with Tallie that night.

“Is he going to be there soon?”

“Any moment. Are you alone? Your dad would be so upset if he discovered this.”

“I don’t think he would.”

“Trust me, he would.”

Before Rey could argue, she heard the compression of a door.

“Captain Solo!” Rose greeted. “Thank you so much for doing this!”

“Alright, alright, settle down,” a gruff voice made Rey’s heart stop. Holy shit, that was Han Freaking Solo. “I’m only doing this because it’s always good when a mechanic owes you a favor. Now, where’s your friend?”

“She’s off-planet, but we’re communicating over the comm. Say hello.”

It took a second before Rey realized Rose had said that to her, “Oh, right, hello, Captain Solo. It’s truly the greatest honor to speak to you.”

“Yeah, well, nice to speak to you too, I guess. I’ll be honest the only reason I’m doing this is that Leia says you grew up on a place a lot like Corellia and Tatooine, and I have a weakness for kids I find in the desert. So, what’s your name?”

Rey wanted to scream her real name at the top of her lungs, but held back. Considering her connection to the Jedi, it wasn’t safe.

“Kira,” she answered.
“Oh, right, Leia mentioned that. Okay, I know this whole thing means a lot to you, but not to be crude, I do have a Princess waiting for me back in her room. So let’s try to make this quick. You get one story. Which do you want to hear?”

“Tell me about the Kessel Run!”

Han chuckled, “A good choice. Alright, settle in, it’s a long one. Now, picture this: It is a lawless time. Crime Syndicates compete for resources - food, medicine, and hyperfuel. On the shipbuilding planet of Corellia, the foul Lady Proxima forces runaways into a life of crime in exchange for shelter and protection. On these mean streets, a young man fights for survival, but yearns to fly among the stars...”

Rey listened in her hammock, clutching her pilot and Felicity dolls, Dosmit Raeh’s helmet on her head, and a smile plastered on her face. She could barely believe what was happening. Han Solo was actually telling her the story of the Kessel Run. She could barely focus on breathing, let alone anything else.

Which was why she didn’t notice Luke watching in the corner.

His arms were folded, a smile identical to hers was on his face, and he made no movement whatsoever to put a stop to it.

It was simply wonderful to hear Han’s voice again.

Chapter End Notes

Coming Up Next Chapter…

Sins of a Family
The mission on Nixrye doesn’t go as smoothly as the Resistance hoped when Kylo Ren and entourage show up. But Kaydel struggles to help Poe through his feelings of anger and betrayal when faces from her own past also arrive.
If anyone is interested in what I meant by Poe’s Scruff Mode Activated I pretty much meant, Poe in this chapter looks like Oscar Isaac did in The Nativity Story.

I want to clarify one note about the timeline of this story. In the last chapter I mentioned that Snap and Karé had recently gotten married. This event occurs in the Poe Dameron comic, issue 25. However, Leia mentioned a heist, which refers to a story arc from the comic taking place from issues 20-25. I want to state for the record that the events of issues 20-25 have not taken place yet, but Snap and Karé got married already. I have a moment planned for later to explain why the divergence happens.

So to be clear, Snap and Karé are married, but Leia’s heist has yet to take place. It will happen (off-screen probably) but it hasn’t happened yet.

…And the reason that is is because something’s going to happen that saves Padmé Amidala’s dresses. Yes, I changed the relationship of two characters simply so I can have a way to save Padmé’s outfits.

Also, don’t ask me where the events of issues 1-19 take place. I actually just started reading the comic at issue 20, so I don’t have the proper knowledge yet to give you an answer.
Sins of a Family

Chapter Summary

Poe discusses his feelings about Ben Solo, Jaina is woefully under-prepared for the amorousness of Poe and Kaydel, and Kes Dameron just wants to feed all the parentless children.

Chapter Notes

So, I don’t know if it was the time of day I posted or because I dropped back down to the 10k range, but last chapter was a great success. Therefore, I am testing out going back to the 10k range for word count.

…Which means, there’s going to be about twenty more chapters added before TFA. But hey, I can pump out 10k chapters a lot quicker so there should be more frequent updates.

I promise we’ll get to TFA someday guys. I’m aiming for November, but I’m going to stop making promises. Trust me there’s a bunch of things that are about to happen that will make it very very clear why it’s taking so long to get to TFA. There’s going to be some major character and plot changes to TFA.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

The Long Way Home

Chapter Fifty-One

Sins of a Family

It was the fanciest place Poe had ever seen. Twenty-seven levels of ever increasing luxury hotel rooms. A private beach of white, highly-groomed sand leading into a picture-perfect piece of ocean where the aiwha liked to play. Seventeen full service restaurants with chefs paid a yearly salary higher than the cost of the Rebellion’s war. Eight additional pools with exotic landscaping of the best flora from across the Galaxy. A five-star spa that was larger than the Resistance base on D’Qar. Three business centers, an excursion booking desk whose lowest package started at half a million credits, nine gardens to stroll in including an honest to god hedge labyrinth, a massive library, a full service shipyard with onsite mechanic, three golf courses, an entire floor dedicated to gambling in which Evan would later swear he saw Lando Calrissian playing a hand of Sabacc, two dance clubs, one place with 24/7 ballroom dancing, a stunt flying school, a shooting range, a personal sommelier for each room, a tea sommelier available upon request, and a fathier riding school that Paige was trying to find a justification to attend.

Poe was overwhelmed. Sure, in his thirty years of life, he hadn’t been to a lot of fancy places, but this was the stuff of Senators and Royalty.

How was he ever going to pretend he belonged?

“Relax,” Kaydel said as Poe tugged at the collar of a suit that cost more money than he had ever made in his life. She was seated at a vanity, putting on a pair of earrings embedded with a recording device. “You’ll do fine.”

“What if I don’t, Kay?” Poe plunked down on the bed. “I don’t fit in with these people.”

“Neither do I, but good thing for you, I know what they’re like.”

“Really?”

“Yeah, these people are exactly like my family,” Kaydel smiled and moved from the chair to kneel in his lap, “Just pretend you think you’re better than everyone else. Make them think you have twice as much money as them, five times as much excitement, and ten times as much family drama.”

Poe laughed and ran his hands across her sides, “Well, I think I might have to borrow a little of your true backstory to inspire that last part. Aside from the First Order killing my mother, my family is pretty drama-free.”

“Lucky,” she bowed her forehead against his. “Just remember, I’m going to be right there with you. I believe in you, Poe, so if you need to draw on me to get confidence and inspiration… then draw way.”

He chuckled and pressed his lips to hers for a gentle but wanting kiss. Kaydel gave into it, moaning as his mouth took charge. She only pushed him away when his hands went for her dress zipper.

“Nuh uh,” Kaydel pulled back. “It just spent an hour putting my appearance together so I look the perfect part of trophy wife. I am not having you muss up my outfit because you have needs.”

Poe smirked, “But didn’t you just say to draw on you?”

“Poe,” she warned, standing up.

“Stop, Kay, I’m sorry,” he grabbed her hand and pulled her back to sit on the bed. He kissed her hand, “I’m sorry. You’re right. We shouldn’t.”

“That’s right we shouldn’t.”

They were silent for a moment.

“That is, unless…” Kaydel said slyly, “there was some you wanted to do that wouldn’t harm my appearance.”

He had her on her back with his head between her legs in an instant.

“There you guys are,” Snap fiddled with his cufflinks as Poe and Kaydel exited the bedroom twenty minutes later. “Finally!”
Jaina had her dark hair pinned up and she was in a simple, conservative charcoal dress, “We’re going to be late. What took you two so long?”

Poe and Kaydel exchanged a sheepish long.

“Well, you see…” Poe scratched the back of his neck.

Karé narrowed her eyes, “You two had sex, didn’t you?”

“Depends on your definition,” he conceded.

As Snap laughed, Kaydel couldn’t manage to look anyone in the eye.

“What?” Jaina scowled. “Why would you two do that right before we’re supposed to commence our mission?”

Poe lifted an eyebrow and smirked, “You and I haven’t hung out a lot, have we?”

She frowned and shook her head looking a little lost.

Snap slung an arm over her shoulder, “Jaina Fel… welcome to Poe Dameron and Kaydel Ko Connix. They go at it worse than nerfs in the springtime.”

“Come on,” Jaina pushed off his arm, “they can’t be bed.”

“You clearly haven’t heard about the desk incident,” Kaydel bit her lip looking both red from embarrassment and a little mischievous.

“Desk incident?” Jaina repeated slowly. She looked to Karé, “Do I want to-”

“Absolutely not,” Karé cut off. “This is the pair that when I told them that I cut off things with Snap because I didn’t want things to get intense during the war and we should just be like Jedi and not get attached… Oh what was the lovely response I got from you, Kaydel?”

Kaydel sighed, “I believe my exact words were… that is the stupidest thing I’ve ever heard. And then Poe preceded to rant about the summer he spent on Rornian and how much sex the New Jedi Order members appeared to be having.”

“Celibacy and non-attachment were certainly not tenants of those people,” Poe shook his head.

Jaina just stared at the group, “And Senate Organa asks me why I don’t like hanging out with the Resistance a lot.”

“Don’t worry,” Snap smiled, “it’s just Poe and Kaydel that are the notorious animals. Karé and I are very professional on missions, and barely anyone who doesn’t know them personally can tell that Tharel and Tico are dating. I promise, two out of three couples on this mission are very professional.”

“That reminds me,” Karé said, “Hon, can you check in on Paige and Evan and ask them if they’re ready to go?”

“Sure.” Snap retrieved a comm and earpiece from the coffee table, “Bey Five and Bey Six, come in. Do you read?”

The response was confined to Snap’s earpiece, so the others had to wait as Snap listened to the response.
“Perfect,” Snap smiled. “Are you guys ready to go?”

A few seconds later, the smile fell from his face.

“Oh… Okay. Uh, sure. We’ll see you then. Okay. Bey Three out.”

Snap said nothing as he slowly and awkwardly set the comm back on the coffee table, very aware of the eyes on him.

“So?” Karé urged.

Snap cleared his throat, “Uh, Evan says that they’re going to need another ten minutes… They were kind of in the middle of… something.”

Silence filled the room.

He gave a weak smile to Jaina, “How does one professional couple out of three sound?”

“Okay, Rose,” Kes said, “you can put it down wherever.”

Rose grunted as she dropped the box of BB-8 parts on the dining table. She had been invited to join the party heading to Yavin IV and work on repairing BB-8 so she didn’t hang around the D’Qar base moping that she couldn’t go on the mission with Paige. It was perfect for Rose who not only got to hang out with Han Solo and Chewbacca but Kes had offered to take her on a tour of the old Yavin IV Rebel Base – now the Museum of Rebellion History – which was hosting a revival of one of its most popular exhibits, the exhibit on the Death Star, a mix of the story of Operation Citadel and the story of Luke Skywalker’s side of the story.

She wanted to take a lot of pictures to send to Rey but decided against it as she was fairly certain they would end up getting intercepted by Luke first.

It would be so weird to see Rey’s parents in the exhibit.

But she did plan on making fun of the Diego parts to Aletha later.

“So…” Rose looked around the Dameron kitchen, “this is the house where Poe grew up.”

“Yep,” Kes smiled as he watched Rose observe the house in wonderment. “I can give you the grand tour when I’m a little less jetlagged.”

Rose walked around the kitchen, admiring the Holos hung on the walls. Kes had seen her briefly glancing at the others as they entered the house, but now she had the chance to truly examine them. He enjoyed seeing the slightly confused expression on her face when she saw that a few of the Holos had Kaydel in them.

“Girl’s one of the family to me,” Kes said. “I know it’s kind of quick, but Poe loves her so much and that poor girl is so lonely and screwed up from her own family that how could I not just instantly want to take her in? Sure, she’s got Aletha and that serves her need of love from female figures, but you can see how much she craves paternal love too. From what I’ve gathered the men in her family are spineless and distant. So to meet a loveable protective father figure… well, I’m happy to play my part.”

“You don’t think it’s little weird considering she’s your son’s girlfriend?” Rose asked.
“Well, yeah, it’s the girl who my son is doing unspeakable things to, but on the other hand, I just… I don’t know. There’s a part of me that just wants to wrap the girl up in the blanket and feed her pupusas. Oh, God, I’ve turned into my mother.”

Rose gave a small laugh as her eyes turned to another picture, “Is this Shara?”

“Yeah,” Kes leaned against the stove. “Most wonderful woman I’ve ever had the pleasure of meeting.”

“You really loved her, didn’t you?”

“Shara Bey stole my heart and took it with her to the next world. I’ll get them both back in the next life, but for this one, she ruined me completely for anyone else.”

Rose hesitated, “Including Shayna?”

Kes laughed, “Is that the deal you and Poe made? You come here and fix his droid as a cover for watching what happens between me and Evan Tharel’s mother?”

“Actually, it was Evan’s idea,” Rose admitted. “You weren’t really thinking about-”

“Shayna seems like a nice woman, but I’m not looking for anything more than a friend. I enjoy my spot in the lonely hearts club.”

“Well, I don’t,” Rose grumbled. “I’m sick of everyone having someone and me being alone.”

“Don’t you fret, Pobrecita,” Kes laughed. “Your time will come. I know it’s hard for you, but let your sister enjoy her boyfriend. He seems to make her very happy.”

“I know he does, but it’s just that we’re not supposed to be apart. We promised we wouldn’t, not after…”

Kes frowned as she trailed off.

Rose sighed, “Our parents sent us to the Resistance. Our planet had been ravaged and attacked by the First Order, so they put us on a supply ship to Botajef. I asked if they were coming too… They said they had to stay and fight. We told Mama we wanted to fight, and she said we would, but not there. Papa promised we’d see each other again and then gave us his parents matching medallions.”

Rose pulled the crescent from underneath her clothing. Tears shone in her eyes as she held it up to Kes.

“Papa said that us having the medallions meant that Otomok would always be with us – the precious minerals at its heart would sit next to ours.”

Kes watched as she struggled to choke back a sob. Slowly, his crossed the kitchen and placed a hand on her shoulder.

“Hey,” he whispered, “it’s alright.”

Rose sniffed, still fighting back her tears, “I keep insisting to Paige that Mama and Papa survived and one day we’ll be together again back home… but I know she doesn’t believe it. And to be honest… I don’t either. But the more I say it, the longer I can go before finally admitting defeat. Admitting that my parents are-”

“Shh, it’s okay,” he pulled her in for a hug. Kes Dameron held this strange little girl as she cried,
“It’s alright, Rose.”

“I’m sorry,” she sniffed, getting herself back under control. “I’m sorry, you must think me a mess.”

“No,” Kes laughed, “all I’m thinking right now is if I should ask if you want a blanket and a pupusa.”

Rose paused, “…Can I?”

“Let me show you how to make tortillas.”

“Hey, Kes,” Han Solo entered the kitchen oblivious to the emotional scene, “we got all of Shayna’s things in but are you aware all of your bedrooms are at the top of a staircase? How is she supposed to get up and down?”

“I was thinking that she could take the office down here. Do you think you and the Wookiees could bring down the bed into the office and the desk set up into the spare bedroom?”

Han crossed his arms, “Excuse me, I am not your moving service. Just because I have two Wookiees doesn’t mean we have to do your heavy lifting.”

“I just thought you would want to do it.”

“And why would I want to do it?”

“Because if you don’t,” Kes opened the fridge to gather ingredients for Rose’s pupusas, “then you don’t get to have dinner with us.”

Han rolled his eyes, “You really think dinner is going to entice-”

“I’m making hilachas.”

Han fell silent.

“And rellenitos for dessert,” Kes added.

“CHEWIE!” Han yelled. “GET WAROO! WE’RE MOVING FURNITURE!”

Rose giggled as Han Solo left the kitchen.

Kes grinned at her, “Food is not the way to a man’s heart, My Dear… but it is the way to many favors.”

Poe Dameron must have been a politician in another life. Not a particularly intelligent one that focused on economical platforms and infrastructure maintenance budgets, but one who flashed his pretty smile to the camera and made empty promises of new jobs and lower taxes without the knowhow to put them into action.

Twenty minutes into the opening night reception, he had a small crowd of people around him. Millionaires, governments, even some people Kaydel was certain belonged to crime syndicates, all fell to the charms of Kane Nilar and his wife, Dania.

Kaydel clung onto his arm, smiling and adding in small details to his anecdotes, acting the perfect part of trophy wife. But as Poe melted into the role of roguish former playboy millionaire, Kaydel felt uneasy. Her eyes flicked around the room as she remembered being dragged to parties like this in her childhood. Any moment, she was certain someone was going to get a flicker of recognition in their eyes and exclaim Kaydel Ko Connix, is that you?

It was ridiculous; the Resistance had done their checks. If the name Connix had shown up on even a list of friends of friends of friends of an attendant, they would have pulled Kaydel from the mission in an instant.

Besides, who even noticed the youngest Connix girl?

Still, Kaydel’s eyes flicked through the room. There was a bad feeling that she just couldn’t shake.

No one else seemed disturbed or anxious. Jaina or “Artora Dimidan” was perfectly in her element, filling in Poe and Kaydel with names, relevant backstories, and bullshit statistics about the Nilar Company in an instant. Karé or “Vella Takan” did seem uneasy, constantly looking around the room, but that was just her role of bodyguard. Snap or “Thon Sho” seemed much more interested in the delicious offerings at the buffet in the corner. A roast quail had caught his eyes more time than his wife.

“And that was the last time we ever let the children cook,” Poe finished an anecdote. He was using a somewhat thick Yavin II accent that didn’t sound unlike Diego Nalto.

The ruckus laughter of the crowd drew Kaydel back to the people before her.

“Oh, you laugh now, but at the time I was horrified,” Kaydel hoped her words were vague enough to cover the fact she wasn’t paying attention.

“Hey, Abril’s eyebrows grew back just fine… eventually,” Poe gave her a thin smile, reading her uneasiness as if she had screamed out to the entire room.

Kaydel shifted her weight, “I told you from the start, we should just hire people to do all the cooking and cleaning for us.”

“You’ve been saying that since our second date.” Poe grinned at an Ithorian, “You know, some people say that she’s just after my money. To them, I say… who cares? I’m trading her in for a young model in fifteen years anyway.”

The Ithorian laughed as Kaydel smacked his arm.

“Alright, Mr. Nilar,” Jaina stepped in, “why don’t we let Mrs. Nilar cool off a bit before she kills you? We still haven’t introduced ourselves to the host yet.”

“Oh yes, business calls.” Poe looked around the group, “Pardon us, Ladies and Gentlemen. I need to get a few drinks in my wife before I’m sleeping on the couch tonight.”

The group give a mixture of laughter and disappointment as Poe led his team away.

“Hey,” he said in a low voice to Kaydel, daring to drop into his normal accent. He stood close to her at the edge of the room. Everyone around them was too wrapped up in their own conversations to notice. “Are you alright?”

“Yeah,” Kaydel nodded, trying to manage a smile. “Just… it brings back a lot of memories.”

Poe sighed and pulled her in closer. He kissed her forehead and gave her a tender smile.
“I love you,” he murmured.

“I love you too,” Kaydel leaned in to kiss him.

“Guys?” Karé interrupted. “We are standing right here.”

“Sorry,” Poe took a step back.

Snap just grinned at him, “Don’t worry. You’ve done worse to me.”

“Sorry about your bed.”

He frowned, “What about my bed?”

Poe’s eyes widened as he realized he had never told Snap the locale of his and Kaydel’s first lovemaking session.

“Nothing!” Kaydel replied quickly. But her blush couldn’t hide her guilt.

“Anyway,” Jaina said after a pause, “I was serious about introducing you to the host. They’re footing most of the bill. We need to go talk to her.”

“We need to also work the room,” Poe looked around the room. “The… vets aren’t here.”

“Well, it’s a good thing our ship has such a good valet,” Karé replied. Evan and Paige had gone to the hotel resort’s private shipyard to check out who else was visiting the hotel. “You never know who might show up at these events. I would like to know that very much.”

“How about we split up?” Kaydel offered. “Artora, take Kane and Thon to meet our host, and while you do that, Vella and I will take a look around the reception. You know, check out who and what is here.”

Snap narrowed his eyes, “You’re going to hit the buffet, aren’t you?”

“I’m hungry, damn it!” Kaydel exclaimed.

Karé sighed at Snap, “I’ll bring you a plate.”

He lit up at that.

“Mr. Nilar,” Jaina nudged Poe, pointing at someone over Kaydel’s shoulder, “I’ve spotted our host.”

“Then let’s go turn on the charm,” he gave Kaydel a quick kiss and departed.

“Alright,” Karé said. “Where’s that buffet?”

Kaydel grinned, but before she could speak, someone barreled right into her.

“Oh my gosh!” a man exclaimed as Kaydel fell to the ground. “I am so sorry! Are you okay?”

Karé instantly stepped between them, “Back it up, Buddy.”

“I’m so sorry, I didn’t mean to,” he had brown skin, black eyes, and was wearing a charcoal grey uniform.

The other man with him grabbed him by the arm and pulled him back, “Easy now. Let the girl breathe.”
“I’m sorry,” the first man told Karé as she helped Kaydel off the ground.

“So you’ve said,” Karé narrowed her eyes.

“It’s alright, Vella,” Kaydel brushed off her dress. “I’m not hurt. It was just an accident.”

“Are you sure, you’re okay?” the man asked.

His friend laughed, “The girl’s not made of porcelain. She’ll be fine.”

Kaydel still smiled at the man, “I’ll be okay. Now if you’ll excuse us, I have a buffet calling.”

The man’s friend continued to laugh as he stared helplessly after Kaydel and Karé as they departed.

“Whoa, I can’t believe it,” the friend shook his head. “Usually you only get this awkward around Sasa, Eight-Seven.”

FN-2187 rolled his eyes, “Come on, Marks. They’re going to be waiting.”

Jaina led Poe and Snap to a woman who looked even more groomed than Poe on a good day. Perfect manicure, professionally blonde hair dyed to mask her burgeoning greys that was tied up into a fancy updo without a strand out of place, skincare and makeup obsessively done to make her look ten years younger making her look weirdly like an older version of Kaydel, and her conservative lavender dress was pressed hard so that a wrinkle wouldn’t dare grace the fabric.

“Mr. Nilar,” Jaina introduced, “this is Mrs. Sindal, CEO of Kation Defense Holdings. Mrs. Sindal, I spoke to you earlier? This is my boss, Kane Nilar?”

“Oh yes, the owner of Nilar Company,” Mrs. Sindal grinned, offering her hand in an awkward motion that confused Poe as to whether she wanted him to kiss it or shake it. “An inventive name, Mr. Nilar.”

“Please, Mrs. Sindal,” Poe decided to just go for the hand kiss. “You flatter me.”

“You seem to be the flatterer,” Mrs. Sindal laughed. “And please, call me Kat.”

“Only if you call me Kane.”

“It’s a deal. My, my, you seem to be just as handsome and charming as your assistant advertised. She was desperate to get your company on my guest list.”

“Artora insists that you have a high reputation.”

“Admittedly, we are a subsidiary, but the prestige and history of our parent company brings a certain legitimacy to the table,” Kat waved down a waiter and she helped herself to two glasses of champagne. She offered one to Poe, “Have you dealt with our parent company before?”

“No,” Poe grinned as he accepted it. His eyes drifted up and down her form, only being able to pretend he enjoyed it as much as he put on due to the fact that there really was something about her that reminded him of Kaydel. “But I’m very much regretting that decision right now. Are you from Mallarex by any chance?”

“Born and raised. What about you? Where are you from?”
“Can’t you guess?”

“Well, I’m fairly certain that you’re from a Yavinese moon… but which one? Thirteen? Eight? Twenty-Six?”

“Two.”

“Dang. So close,” Kat laughed. “How could you tell I’m from Mallarex?”

“You have features like my wife. Thought I’d take a shot in the dark,” Poe shrugged.

“I do have traditionally Mallarexian features.”

“You should see my kids.”

“Are you joking?” Kat asked. “Because I do love a Holo of a cute kid.”

“Oh, then you have to see mine,” Poe patted at his pockets trying to find the Holo of Nils Arlos’ children.

And as Kat cooed over the picture of his supposed children, Poe couldn’t help but think that things were going very well.

“This is humiliating,” Zeroes muttered. “Our first deployment is not a battlefield. No, we pull bodyguard duty for the most redundant set of people in the First Order. Why do the Knights of Ren even need bodyguards?”

“Just shut up and help me carry the champagne,” Nines rolled his eyes as they carried a pair of trays back to the group.

The MK squad – Marks, Duck, Tone, and Weevil – were standing behind Berd and Doxl Ren, taking their role of guard very seriously as they surveyed the room. Slip and FN-2187 were granted a higher amount of freedom as they openly conversed with Sasa Ren, Slip looking a little lovesick as he did so. Poor Nines and Zeroes somehow managed to pull the waiter cards as they had been sent off by Sasa – who was acting like such a belle of the ball one might think she was hosting the reception – to get the group some refreshments.

Apparently the miserable Kylo Ren had made a break for it in the time since they left.

“Thank you, Boys,” Sasa flashed them a smile, though the pair could barely manage one in return. At least she let them have a drink, something Captain Phasma would never allow them to do on duty. “I must say, this is such a wonderful party. Good food, good music, great drinks.”

Marks frowned, “Perhaps this should be your last, Master Sasa?”

She grinned, “It’s only my third.”

“Yes,” FN-2187 bowed his head, “but Master Kylo-”

“Can come stop me himself if he finds it to be a problem. If he wants to go off and slink in the shadows, he must face the consequences.”

“Like me getting a chance to dance with you?” Berd raised a coy eyebrow.
Sasa chuckled nursing the rim of her champagne, “I’m going to need a lot more of these before that happens. Now… Zeroes and Nines, did you see anyone?”

“No, Master Ren,” Nine bowed his head. “No one appeared to be suspicious or an enemy of the First Order.”

“Master Ren,” Duck said kindly, “are you certain there’s a reason to be alarmed?”

“Master Kylo said he sensed something. Someone familiar and dangerous, he just couldn’t quite place who it was.”

“We’ll keep looking, Master Sasa,” Tone promised.

“You better,” Doxl warned. “We have many enemies and the Force can only work so far. I don’t want anyone getting the jump on us.”

“Who’s going to get the jump on us?” Berd shot. “No one knew we were coming, and Master Kylo was added at the very last second when he decided he couldn’t trust us alone with his lover. For goodness sake, we’re not Wiln!”

FN-2187 traded a look with Sasa. That had been the entire reason the FN and MK squads had been ordered to act as bodyguards. It wasn’t that Kylo didn’t trust Berd and Doxl not to sleep with Sasa—it’s that he didn’t trust them not to use the opportunity to work with Tara to kill Sasa.

But FN-2187 wasn’t going to let that happen.

“You know, it doesn’t matter if you are Wiln,” Sasa decided to act coy. FN-2187 could see the calculation behind her eyes, “You gentlemen – all of you – can look as much as you want. Only Master Kylo may touch me.”

In that moment, all eight Stormtroopers felt more than welcome to enjoy the instruction to look at Sasa as much as they wanted.

Sasa took another drink of her champagne and sighed, “Oh for goodness sake, he forced his way onto the mission and now he’s sulking on the balcony. Marks, go find Master Kylo and bring him back.”

Marks frowned, “But Master Sasa, I don’t think he-”

“If he gives you any problems, just tell him that if wants to hide in the shadows while I have to deal with all these boring business people alone, I’ll put him through a hell worse than his threesome suggestion.”

No less than two minutes after Marks found Kylo were they both at Sasa’s side.

“I didn’t want to see what worse was,” Kylo admitted.

“Good,” she lifted on her toes and kissed him. “Now, I’ve been working this party for over an hour. I want a break, maybe let loose on the dance floor a little.”

Kylo sighed, “Alright, I suppose I can-”

Everyone turned to look at him.
He gulped, “I’m going to be dead within twenty-four hours, aren’t I?”

“Probably,” Kylo answered honestly.

“Oh, stop it,” Sasa swatted his arm. “This is the consequence to your sulking. You didn’t want to join me doing the boring stuff, you don’t get to join me during the fun stuff.”

“Sasa…” he eyed the others watching the scene in amusement.

“And if you don’t get yourself in order, there’s going to be no fun stuff this entire trip,” Sasa warned. “You forced your way onto this mission, Kylo. Hell, not even Tara knows you’re here with us.”

“Only way I was able to go on a week-long getaway with you.”

Kylo knew what he should be doing; he should firmly re-establish his superiority to the group of Stormtroopers and Knights as not to compromise his position… But on the other hand, there was no way in hell he was spending a week in a fabulous hotel with Sasa and not trying his absolute hardest to knock her up.

And if he kept this up, he was probably going to end up bunking with the MK squad tonight.

“Alright,” he conceded. “How can I win my way back into your graces?”

Sasa smirked, “You need to make us three new business contacts.”

His face fell, “Three?”

“No need for firm contracts, but feel the room out. Find a few new allies for the First Order. The Supreme Leader will be very proud if you do. So go, let me dance with FN-2187 for a while, then come take his place when you’ve made three contacts.”

Kylo huffed, “Fine. But FN-2187, if your hands touch any place on her that is not her waist or shoulder I will remove said hands. Understood?”

“Perfectly,” FN-2187 stiffly nodded.

“Enjoy yourself!” Sasa called after Kylo as he stormed off to find some poor, unprepared potential business contact. She looked at FN-2187, “You ready?”

“You know I don’t know how to dance?” FN-2187 asked.

“Then I’ll teach you,” she grinned and led him to the dance floor.

Nines and Zeroes frowned at the disappearing pair.

“So…” Nines asked, “are they sleeping together?”

Zeroes shrugged, “I have no idea.”

Kylo found a brunette alone by the buffet table. There was a dark-skinned woman with her, but by her posture and the way her eyes constantly darted about, Kylo could tell she was a bodyguard.

He took a deep breath. Show time.
“You might want to skip that one,” Kylo advised as the small brunette reached for the plate of deep-fried gorg. “Only trust gorg from Tatooine. Every other planet ruins it.”

When the woman looked up at him, he was surprised. She did not look unlike his mother.

“Oh,” she blinked. “Thank you.”

“No problem,” Kylo had to stop himself from using the Force to summon a plate, instead picking it up like the worthless Non-Sensitives he was constantly surrounded by. He started piling miniature koyo melons on his plate and noticed the small heap on the woman’s plate, “Fan of koyo melons?”

“My husband got me addicted to them,” she blushed a little.

“Yeah, someone hooked me on them years ago too,” Kylo tried to push Poe Dameron from his mind. “I swear, they’re never better than right as soon as you pick them.”

“Tell me about it. My husband loves taking me to the orchard during harvest.”

The bodyguard nudged her.

“We own many orchards,” the woman randomly added, sounding a little frantic. “Part of our investments.”

“Oh? What kind of investments do you make?”

“Mostly realty but have… other avenues of a less clean hands nature if you catch my drift,” the woman said.

Kylo smirked, “You don’t meet many people who openly admit to such things.”

“I like knowing who I’m dealing with,” the woman shot. “So I wonder, who am I dealing with?”

He considered it, and then extended his hand, “Someone with very dirty hands.”

“Then forgive me for not shaking it.”

Kylo couldn’t stop a laugh.

“Fair enough,” Kylo pulled back his hand. “Have you dealt with Kation before?”

“No. Have you?”

“Done a lot of business with their parent company.”

“I’ve heard good things about it.”

“Oh, you should see some of the things they can cook up. Our enemies don’t stand a chance.”

The woman looked at him suspiciously, “And who are your enemies?”

“I don’t know,” Kylo smiled. “But I do like to know the names of my friends.”

Considering his words, the woman looked to her bodyguard. The taller woman gave a small nod.

“I’m Dania Nilar,” the woman said. “My husband, Kane, owns Nilar Company. And you are?”

Kylo knew it was dangerous to give his real name without an extensive background check, “How about you call me… Oh, let’s see… How about… Tobias Beckett?”

“Wasn’t that the mercenary who killed Aurra Sing?”

“I heard that she fell,” Kylo smirked.

The woman returned it, “I’ll keep my eye out around you.”

“Oh good… I found a smart one.”

“Em Yêu, hurry up, we’re already late!”

“A few more minutes and I’ll be done. I promise.”

Paige Tico looked kind of ridiculous, arms crossed, wearing a pair of heels and a floor length gown that once belonged to Leia Organa, tapping her foot impatiently as a handsomely suited Evan Tharel crouched in the shadows of the dirty cover ship yard.

“Someone’s going to see us,” Paige worried.

“Just hold on,” Evan held up a tablet to capture on image of the ship in front of them, which would cross match it to the Resistance database of enemy craft. “This is the last ship.”

“I’m just so nervous,” Paige’s hand went to fiddle with her pendant but found nothing but the flesh of her neck. The pendant was too recognizable for Paige to bring, so she had left it with Jessika to bring her friend luck. “This is my first undercover mission. I don’t want to blow it.”

“Same here,” Evan said, “but I think we’re going to do just that if we keep talking about it. How about this? When we get back to the room tonight, as my way of saying sorry for dragging you into this garage while the others get to dance and drink, I’ll give you that pressure point focused, stress relieving massage you love so much?”

“I think you need to drag me into dirty garages more.”

“I can arrange that.”

Evan’s device beeped.

“There,” he declared, “the ship’s all around through, now we can leave because the result is-”

He stopped.

Paige frowned seeing something change in his eyes, “What?”

“You might want to see this,” he said.

She walked over to him and took his tablet. Her heart fell when she saw the result.

FIRST ORDER VESSEL: PRIVATE SHUTTLE OF KNIGHTS OF REN

PRIMARY OPERATOR: SOLO, BEN aka “KYLO REN”

Paige looked at Evan in horror and said, “Fuck.”
“Yeah,” he nodded. “We gotta get out of here before it’s too late.”

Just then an instruction from Poe buzzed over their hidden ear pieces, “Bey Four! Move Bey Two right now! Get him the hell away from her!”

Paige swallowed, “I think we’re too late.”

---

Two Minutes Earlier…

Poe and Kat were laughing hysterically at the story of one of Poe’s pretend children. Little Mateo truly was a precocious one.

“I honestly don’t know how I’m going to survive these children,” Poe chortled.

“Oh, it’s hard but you’ll get through it,” Kat playfully touched his arm. Poe found she was a very touchy-feely person, especially when doling out compliments. “I got through it with my three with very minimal cuts and bruises.”

“You have children?”

“Two girls and a boy just like you. Sage, Serena, and Sinon.”

Poe frowned, “Do all Mallarexians like to do the alliteration thing?”

“No. Why?”

“Nothing,” Poe shook off. It was probably just a coincidence. “So, who’s the lucky father?”

“That would be the charming man talking to my father and our eldest daughter, Sage, over there who has been shooting you dirty looks throughout our conversation,” Kat pointed to a blonde, blue-eyed man talking to a slightly older blonde, blue-eyed man and young blonde, blue-eyed woman. “He’s a very steady man but can get jealous considering how flirtatious I can get during business. Never would be unfaithful to him, but it does ruffle his feathers a little.”

“Oh, I know what you mean. It’s the same with my wife and I. I should introduce you to Dania.”

Poe turned towards the buffet table, “She’s just right over-”

Poe stopped dead.

Kaydel was talking to a tall, pale man clad in all black. His dark eyes had something haunted and piercing in them, and his hand rested on a hilt clipped to his belt.

Kaydel was talking to Kylo Ren.

Poe couldn’t believe his eyes, and in fact wouldn’t believe until he heard a squeak from Jaina by his side, confirming the man was really there.

Immediately Poe sprung into action. He barely managed a goodbye and excuse to Kat as he raced forward. He heard Snap trying to call from him, but thankfully it seemed Jaina was willing to explain things.

All Poe could think about was saving Kaydel.
Not caring that people could see him, Poe frantically went for his hidden comm, “Bey Four! Move Bey Two right now! Get him the hell away from her!”

Karé and Kaydel looked confused but made some sort of excuse and got away from Kylo Ren. Kylo went off – where Poe didn’t know, nor cared, all he wanted was Kaydel in his arms – and Kaydel led Karé to a secluded corner where there was a convenient potted plant to hide behind.

Poe literally skidded to a stop and had his arms around Kaydel in a second, “Are you okay? What did he do?”

“What’s going on?” Kaydel tried to push him off her to get some answers.

“You need to tell me everything he said and did. Why were you talking to him?”

“Babe?” Karé looked to Snap, “why is he losing his mind?”

Snap shrugged, “I have no idea.”

“Dameron,” Jaina lowered her voice, “what is he doing here?”

Poe turned on her, “I could ask you the same question. Weren’t there supposed to have been checks done?”

“You think if I even got a whiff that he would be here that I would have let this happen? We need to get the hell out of here.”

“Agreed.” He turned back to Kaydel. Poe looked helpless and increasingly angry as he ran his hands over her face and shoulders, checking for harm, “Are you okay? Did he hurt you? Did he touch you? I swear to God if he even laid a hand on you, I’ll-”

“Stop it!” Kaydel snapped she pushed him away.

The group started in a stunned silence. Even Kaydel looked shocked at her dramatic rejection of Poe’s affection.

“Look,” she took a deep breath to collect herself. Kaydel touched his arm, “Poe… what’s going on?”

He sighed, “Alright… That man?”

Poe pointed to who Kaydel had been talking to. The man had cut in to a couple dancing and said a few words to a dark-skinned man in a First Order uniform. The man held out an arm for a copper-haired beauty in a sleek glittery silver dress. It hugged her body in all the right ways, fitting her like a glove, but her skirt had a little swish to it.

The trio crossed to a wall where seven other men in First Order officer uniforms were gathered. All but the black man and a copper-skinned man – who took a moment to slap the black man on the butt – looked uncomfortable in the uniforms. The black and copper-skinned men looked like they had been born to wear the uniforms.

There were two men in the ground, but their outfits looked similar to, albeit a little less grand, than the man Kaydel had spoken to.

The man hooked an arm around the copper-haired beauty’s waist and her delighted laugh carried across the room. They had been approached by the very woman Poe had been talking to and the conversation appeared to be a little too comfortable.
“That’s Ben Solo,” Poe whispered.

Kaydel went perfectly stiff.

“Kylo Ren?” Snap’s jaw hung open. “Are you kidding?”

“We need to pull out right now,” Poe said, “before it gets worse.”

“Uh, Darling?” Kaydel whispered. “…It’s worse.”

Karé frowned, “How could it be worse?”

“It’s worse because that means that the First Order is already working with this company,” Jaina said. “I know business deals and politics. That body language they have – formal but comfortable – is clearly the type you display to someone you’ve done a deal with before. Oh, we have to get out of here before Ben recognizes Dameron or I.”

“Jaina,” Kaydel grabbed her arm as she tried to move for the door. “That’s not what I meant.”

“What? What do you…” Poe frowned, “Babe, what’s going on?”

She pointed to Kat, “That woman-”

“The head of the conference? Kat Sinon?”

“Uh huh,” Kaydel’s throat was dry. “…That’s my sister, Katha.”

The group stared at Kaydel in horror.

“I’m not joking,” she said quickly.

Poe sighed, “Fuck.”

“Are you positive?” Leia Organa’s voice came over the comm.

“I saw him with my own eyes,” Poe answered, pacing behind the couch of his and Kaydel’s hotel suite. “It’s Kylo Ren.”

As part of the guise, one of the most expensive suites had been rented for them, with Snap, Karé, and Jaina in a smaller adjoining room. Paige and Evan were two floors down in a standard. They weren’t allowed to come up to Poe and Kaydel’s room for fear of their connection being discovered.

“And the presenters of the seminar?” Diego asked.

“Absolutely tied to Connix Industries,” Kaydel said, watching Poe pace as she was seated on the couch next to Jaina. “I saw multiple members of my family. My sister, Katha, her husband, Telon, her daughter, Sage, my father, Timor, and my nephew, Dacken.”

“This is a problem,” Holdo sighed. “We did all of our checks properly?”

“There was absolutely nothing to suggest the First Order or Connix family would be involved,” Jaina frowned at the scar on her arm. The one she never allowed to be healed, her self decided punishment for her roles in the deaths of Felicity and Rey Rhiaon Skywalker. “I would never have come on the mission if I’d known that bastard, Ben would be here. My apologies, General Organa.”

“Well, he was conceived out of wedlock, so not exactly an incorrect term,” Leia’s voice still didn’t sound pleased.

“Should we pull out?” Snap asked.

“No, it would be too suspicious now,” Leia replied. “And if the First Order is interested in these weapons, then I am too. We’re just going to have to be extra careful to keep Kaydel from her family and Poe and Jaina from Ben. We don’t want them recognized.”

“Plus I feel like there would be a lot of paperwork after I murdered Kylo Ren,” Poe said.

Absolute silence filled the room. Jokes about murdering members of the High Council of the First Order were the norm in the Resistance… but you didn’t joke about killing Ben Solo in front of Leia Organa. And even worse, it was clear that Poe was making no joke.

“Commander Dameron,” Leia never used his formal title unless he was in serious trouble, “suspicious or not, if you do not follow directives, I will pull you off this mission so fast your head will spin. You absolutely do not have permission to kill a Knight of Ren unless in appropriate, battle, self defense circumstances. Am I understood?”

All eyes turned to Poe.

“Understood,” he hung his head.

And yet the look on his face only made Kaydel worry.

Honestly, the only time I want to discuss Kylo Ren again is when he’s rotting in a prison cell.

- Poe Dameron’s Flight Log

“Want some company?” Kaydel asked an hour later as she tip toed onto the balcony.

Poe sighed. He had been out there for twenty minutes already, making a swift exit from the room the second the transmission to base had ended. The room felt so hot and suffocating. At least out there in the cool night air he could breathe.

“I’m alright, Kay,” Poe leaned against the balcony railing. He was met with a glorious view of the moon and stars over the vast ocean, a deep midnight blue reflecting down with twinkling pinpricks of stars far away. It was hard to tell where water met the sky.

“No, you’re not,” she joined him at the railing. Kaydel glanced to the side wall of the balcony separating their suite from the suite next door. White crosshatched wood made the wall and a voluminous plant of small pink flowers and hanging ivy provided the neighboring tenants their privacy. She sighed and gently grabbed his right bicep, “You’re no more alright than I am. I’m so freaked out right now, Poe. I don’t need you to be tough. I need you to be honest.”

“Honestly, I’m fine, Kaydel, really,” Poe shook her off. He paused, then turned his head to look at her. He winced as he saw her bowed head and dejected expression. Taking a deep breath, Poe wrapped his arm around her waist and pulled her close, “It’s just… hard. It’s the first time I’ve really seen him since Rey died. You don’t understand what that little girl meant to me. To us.”

“Then make me understand,” she rested her head on his chest.

Poe sighed, “Rey was… I don’t know. In some ways I felt like she was my responsibility. Ben too. After my mom died, Luke, Leia, and Felicity all made sure to take care of me, so when I was old enough, I chose to thank them by caring for their own children. That summer I spent with the Skywalkers was one of the happiest times of my life. Far and away, one of my all-time favorite memories is Rey, Ben, and I assembling BB-8. Sure, Ben may have been an annoying pain in the ass, but he was in the way your little brother would be. We never said it out loud, but Ben and I were friends. And Rey…”

He struggled to find the words.

“She really was a ray of light. Sure, she had temper tantrums and whatnot, but I’ve never met someone who was such a stranger to hatred. She saw the best in people and did whatever it took to take care of people. Even when it was beyond her capabilities, she still tried to help. And Ben absolutely adored her. Called her Nightlight. He was there to hold her when she cried, lift her when she fell, and chase away the monsters who wanted to scare her… And then…”

Kaydel pressed her face closer against his chest, resting her cheek to his heart as Poe choked back a sob.

“And then he became the monster,” Poe couldn’t fight the tears anymore. Twelve years he had tried to bottle it up, but now the dam exploded. He had to voice the feelings he truly felt about Ben’s betrayal. “She was… She was dragged from her bed, Kay. In the middle of the night, a five-year-old was torn from the safety of her own bed and had men in masks try to cut her into pieces. That home we made so many memories in was burned to the ground. People who loved us, who protected us, who didn’t do anything wrong were slaughtered… And Ben made it all possible. He led them into Temple Village, he gave them the codes to the Skywalker house. Luke told us the passwords to lockdown the house and to reset the codes. Ben used the reset to trap Felicity and her daughter in the place that was supposed to be their sanctuary.”

There was nothing Kaydel could find to say to bring Poe comfort.

“I never hated Ben Solo,” Poe said slowly. “Not even was he was being an annoying prick. Not even when he cussed out Felicity in front of her own daughter. Not even when he killed Alyla Kene… but then he chased Rey into the woods and tried to murder her using a saber powered by a crystal he stole from her. He tried to murder her in cold blood. His five-year-old cousin who thought of him as her hero.”

Kaydel’s throat went dry and she too fought tears. She knew vaguely the story of Rey’s death, but now hearing the details and hearing them from a man who had loved that little girl, it was an unbearable tale.

“And then there’s what he did to Felicity,” Poe’s voice grew stronger, his fists tightening on the balcony rail. “He didn’t just shoot her in the head, Kay. He tortured her. Not metaphorically or hyperbolically. He legitimately tortured her. He hunted her down like a dog and tortured her for the whereabouts of her daughter. A daughter who died a horrific death in the wastes of Jakku, whose body will never be recovered… and I think I’m the reason why.”

“What?” Kaydel found her voice. “What are you talking about?”
“Digging a hole. I taught Rey that when she was in a situation she couldn’t change but was frustrated that she should dig a hole and scream in it. What if… what if she told Felicity? What if the reason Felicity thought to bury Rey was that she had dug that hole to scream? I’m the reason Rey’s body was lost!”

“No! No, you are not!” Kaydel firmly pulled him into her arms. “Don’t you dare think like that!”

“But I do all the time. I think about the things I could have done. Should have done. I think about how I should have cut out the Academy early to join the hunt for Rey and Felicity. What if I had shown up, and they had an extra person, so they decided to send me to check Jakku? What if I had found them? Saved them? What if I had done SOMETHING?”

“Stop it,” the tears were flowing from Kaydel’s eyes now.

“But I think about it all the time. I think about Felicity’s death. I wonder what Ben Solo could have done that was so cruel that it broke Luke Skywalker. I think about that last conversation with Luke. I know Kalonia spoke with him, but let’s be real, I was the last person to interact with Luke before he decided to just up and leave everything. What if I said something? What if I did something? What if it’s my fault?”

Kaydel grabbed the sides of his face and pulled his head down, “Look at me, Poe. None of it is your fault. Do you hear me? Do you understand? It wasn’t your fault.”

Poe closed his eyes and took a deep and shaky breath. He let the feeling of oxygen flowing in and out of his lungs as a way to cleanse his soul. He took another breath, then gently removed Kaydel’s hands from his face, and bowed his forehead against hers.

“I know,” his voice was calmer, stronger, but still held a slight tremor, “but still I have to live everyday with the thought that somehow I could have changed everything… I loved Ben, Kaydel. He was like my annoying little brother. And that’s why I hate him now, because he destroyed the people who loved him… all for a vanity project. I want to kill him, Kaydel.”

“Don’t exaggerate.”

“I’m not. I want to kill him. My blood boils at the thought that he is somewhere in this building. I want to hunt him down the way he hunted down Felicity and put a blast through his temple as easily as he did through hers.”

“Poe.”

“I won’t do it, though,” he said. “I know that. I know I’m a better man than that, but I want it. The same way I want to break Captain Phasma’s neck for murdering my mother. I won’t kill him, Kay, but Ben Solo is dead to me. No, Ben may not have cut Rey Rhiaon Skywalker down with his lightsaber, but as far as I’m concerned, he murdered that little girl in cold blood. And I will never forgive him for that.”

Kaydel took a deep breath and closed her eyes, processing all that Poe had said.

He looked down at her and his face fell. His darkest thoughts had been laid bare at her feet. Could she love a man whose heart held such darkness?

“Kaydel,” he whispered, “I’m sorry if-”

“Don’t,” she put a finger to his lips. “I understand. It’s alright, just promise me that you’ll never act on these feelings. It’s one thing to think them, but another to act on them.”
A smile quirked his lips, “Are you saying I don’t have your permission to murder Kylo Ren?”

“That’s exactly what I’m saying,” Kaydel smiled.

He stroked her cheek and felt the last of his tears drying, “Then I promise you, until the day I am granted your permission to do so, I will not murder Kylo Ren… but I do request permission to punch him in the face a lot if given the chance.”

“By all means.”

“Then we have a deal,” he pulled her in for a kiss.

Two years later when Kaydel Ko Connix held a beaten, bloodied, and broken Poe Dameron in her arms, his wounds a consequence of being the victim of Kylo Ren’s torture… she would grant Poe her permission to kill Ben Solo.

They stayed outside for another hour just talking, trying to collect themselves to face the others again. Some of their discussion was as heavy as Poe’s confession, but for the most part they kept things lighthearted.

It was just as Kaydel had convinced Poe he was calm enough to go back inside the suite when they heard a voice from the next balcony over.

“I just can’t believe the Supreme Leader put me on such a humiliating mission!” Kylo Ren exclaimed.

“You need to calm down,” Sasa Ren urged. “It’s not that humiliating. In fact, I think this will be a lot of fun.”

“Fun, Sasa? This isn’t fun! Let Hux wine and dine the elite. Or send Captain Anthea! It is her family after all.”

“Excuse me, I am not telling Alecta Anthea to do this mission. That woman scares me more than Tara.”

Kaydel’s jaw dropped, “Is that—”

“Oh, shit!” Poe mumbled. Very slowly and strategically he tiptoed over to the crosshatched wood partition and peered through the flora. A few seconds later he hissed a series of very vulgar Yavinese swears.

“Poe,” Kaydel chided, her voice a whisper. “Keep it down!”

“I don’t believe this,” Poe groaned. “It’s Ben Solo and the redhead woman. Of all the suites they could be staying in. Kay, I don’t know if I can restrain myself if we’re next door.”

“You have to. I’m not letting you go to jail for murder because of rooming arrangements.” Kaydel took a deep breath, “Besides, think of the opportunity. We’re right next door to them. This will make spying so much easier.”

“Spying? Kay, we’re not spying on them. We’re going to get back inside and switch rooms as quickly as possible. It’s too dangerous for Jaina and I to be so close to Ben Solo. We can’t draw attention.”
“And switching rooms in the middle of the night would draw massive attention. Poe, please.”

He conceded, “Fine, but no spying tonight unless he get a reason. I just want to get you inside away from him. Please, Kay.”

“Deal.”

They were about to pull open the balcony door when one sentence stopped them in their tracks.

“I just wish I could be supervising the building of the new base,” Kylo said.

Kaydel winced and Poe looked like he wanted to punch something. For safety measures, the Resistance was not required to stay near First Order personnel during spy missions if it wasn’t part of the directive, except for in the cases of the three B’s. Bombing, battles, and bases. Due to the importance of those three items, if First Order personnel mentioned any of those topics, the Resistance fighters were required to stay and listen to the rest of the conversation in an attempt to gather as much information as possible.

With a sigh, Poe nodded to Kaydel. She took off her earring, activated the recording device, and planted it into the balcony partition for the closest reach to record the conversation.

As she planted the device, she peered through the ivy to get a look at the scene next door. Sure enough, there was General Leia Organa’s son taking to the redhead called Sasa. But it was a little more than talking; it appeared they were in some sort of embrace.

“Hey,” Kaydel whispered, “what information do we have on the redhead woman?”

Poe shrugged, “I don’t think we have any. I don’t have any off hand other than he hung off Kylo’s arm at the reception, and a black Stormtrooper was always one step behind her. Why?”

“They’re in an embrace, I think they might be lovers or something.”

“Lovers?” Poe let out a laugh that was bit too loud. “Ben Solo has a lover. Sure, yeah. I believe it. Wonder how much he’s paying her.”

“Poe!” Kaydel scolded.

“Oh, come on, he’s a murderer,” Poe rolled his eyes. “Anyway, do we even have to listen to this? They mentioned a new base once.”

Kaydel narrowed her eyes, “Do not let your feud affect your work, Poe. I don’t care what’s between you and Solo. What’s between us and Holdo is more pertinent to me, and I don’t need her to get anymore ammo. We’re recording this conversation.”

Poe and Kaydel were in a little bit of luck. Earlier that day, Poe, Snap, and Karé had played a few rounds of Sabacc on the balcony, so there was a deck of cards and a pair of dice on the table. They settled in the deck chairs and played a few rounds, vaguely listening to Kylo and Sasa periodically mentioning some new base, but mostly Kylo bitching about having to be on this mission while Hux was back on said new base doing his work for Kylo.

After about half an hour, Poe had managed to talk Kaydel into turning it into a round of strip Sabacc. He was running out of money for Kaydel to win from him, so he figured he might as well give her a show if she was going to beat him every right. Poe was in the middle of taking off his shirt to the enthusiasm of Kaydel when the conversation from next door took a turn he didn’t like.

“Look, Master Kylo,” they couldn’t see Sasa’s hand running suggestively over Kylo Ren’s chest,
“you need to relax. Sure, you don’t want to be here, but at least you’re here with me. No pressures to interrupt us. No Tara trying to murder me again.”

“That is a plus. She’s getting more desperate to get rid of you. I’m surprised she hasn’t taken out a mob hit yet.”

“Give it time. Now, come on. Relax. Let’s have some fun while we’re here. Nice dinners, some dancing, maybe a few spa trips.”

“I heard there’s a theatre in this resort,” Kylo said. “Maybe I can get them to perform you some of that opera you love.”

“You are the sweetest man alive,” Sasa cooed.

Poe rolled his eyes, “I highly disagree.”

“Shh,” Kaydel hushed.

“Take a nice little break from all the pressures and the politics,” Sasa continued.

“Well, not exactly,” Kylo said. “Hux wants me to do up a report of all the things we still need to get for the new base. From personnel to materials. Ugh, it’s going to be a nightmare, and you just know I’ll forget to list something that Hux will throw in my face.”

Poe and Kaydel’s eyes brightened.

“Personnel and materials?” she mouthed.

“Jackpot!” he lipped back as they high fived.

“Well, how about this?” Sasa offered, “You tell me the list now and I can see what you’re forgetting.”

“You’re going to stand there and listen to a boring list I have to make?” Kylo said.

“Of course not. I was thinking of… kneeling.”

“Kneeling?” Kylo repeated.

Poe’s eyes widened, “Kneeling?”

Sasa gave a mischievous chuckle, “How about while you list all your items, I do something to relax you? That way it’s truly a vacation? What do you say?”

“What do I say?” Kylo grinned darkly and pushed her down, “I say get kneeling.”

She smirked up at him, “And I say get listing.”

So they did… much to the absolute horror of Poe Dameron.

“I am not hearing this,” Poe tried covering his ears, looking as pale as the snow on Hoth. "I am not listening to Kylo Ren getting a blowjob and telling his probably paid lover that he's going to bend her over the railing and take her, Berd and Doxl be damned. This is not happening!"

“Poe,” Kaydel grabbed his hand. She looked him in the eyes, “Go.”

“What?”

“Get out of here,” she urged. “Someone has to stay with the recording device to ensure the machine is working. Its placement isn’t discovered or compromised, and to remove it when needed. But only one person needs to do that. I can do that for you, Poe. I’ll stay and… and listen. You go.”

“No, Kay,” Poe said. “I couldn’t ask that of you.”

“It’s okay. I want to do this for you.”

“Why?”

“Because I love you too much to make you listen. Now, go.”

Poe nodded and got to his feet. He scurried to the balcony door, but stopped when he reached it. He looked back at Kaydel and sighed.

“What are you doing?” Kaydel frowned as Poe returned to his seat at the table, the moans from next door getting louder.

“I’m staying,” Poe plunked down in his chair. He pulled on his discarded shirt and picked up his Sabacc cards.

Kaydel blinked, “But Poe, you hate Kylo Ren. This is a nightmare for you. How could you sit here and listen to this?”

“Oh, Kylo!” Sasa’s voice rang out.

Poe shuddered as Kylo gave a drawn-out moan, “Because… I love you too much to make you sit through this alone.”

Kaydel smiled and reached for his hand, “Oh, Poe. You are the sweetest.”

“Don’t touch me.”

“Sorry.”

“Just,” Poe took a deep breath and winced as another of Ben Solo’s moans carried to him, “deal me a new hand of cards.”

Forty-five minutes later, Poe Dameron slammed closed the door of the balcony behind himself and Kaydel.

“You guys were out there a while,” Snap said. “Jaina went to bed.”

“Great,” Poe replied through tightly gritted teeth.

Karé looked up from her HoloNovel and noticed how awkward and flushed the pair was, “Did you two have sex on the balcony?”
Kaydel stifled a giggle.

Poe just looked pissed, “I never have and never will have sex on a balcony for the rest of my life.”

Karé looked at Snap in confusion, “What’s going on?”

“Kylo Ren is in the room next to us,” Kaydel explained. “We overheard him and that girl – Sasa, he called her – talking about some military information, so I used my earring to collect a recording. The problem is that Poe and I had to stay out there the entire conversation to make sure everything went okay.”

Snap frowned, “Alright…”

“They were having the conversation during sex.”

Karé and Snap winced.

“So, send this off to Tharel and Tico to process, because I am never listening to Ben Solo have sex again,” Poe threw the earring on the coffee table. “Now if anyone needs me, I need to take ten thousand scalding showers.”

The others just laughed as Poe stalked off into the fresher.

“I guess we’ll need to find a way into the room next do and rig it for audio,” Karé said. “I’ll talk to Tharel and Tico, and we’ll see what we can do.”

“I can’t believe it,” Snap shook his head. “Not only do we run into the General’s son at the conference, but we rent the room next to his… and have to listen to him have sex.”

“Yeah,” Kaydel nervously scratched her neck. “And you know what the worst part is?”

“What?” Karé asked.

“I’m actually kind of turned on.” Kaydel glanced towards the fresher, “I’m going to go see if Poe wants some company in the shower.”

Snap and Karé laughed as Kaydel scampered off to the fresher, a red tinge to her cheeks.

“So,” Snap slung an arm around his wife, “how bad do you think that’s going to end?”

“I’m going to say pretty bad,” Karé grinned.

As if on cue, Poe Dameron’s voice rang through the suite, “FOR THE LOVE OF GOD, KAYDEL, OUT!”

And Snap and Karé laughed as the very embarrassed Kaydel shot out the fresher not two seconds later.

“IT just received word from Nixrye,” Tara announced to the two men gathered secretly in her office. “Everything’s set. By this time next week, Sasa Ren will no longer be a problem.”

“Good,” Hux crossed his arms, “this girl was never going to make it in a political climate such as the one we have in the First Order.”
“You’re just saying that because she won’t sleep with you,” Cern smirked.

“You're sleeping your way to the top is a time-honoured woman’s tradition of getting power.” Hus glanced at Tara, “You won’t quarrel over that?”

“Why would I? It’s true,” she said. “However, Sasa is already sleeping her way to stay on top. Your plan was never going to work, Armitage. We need to reduce her level, not raise her up higher.”

“Which is exactly why I think we should be going with my plan,” Cern snapped. “With one move, I can take down Sasa, Kylo, Wiln, and one more person.”

Tara narrowed her eyes, “Betray me, and I cut your throat, Cern. I even know which knife to use.”

“I believe it,” Hux muttered. “Honestly, Tara, do you truly think we can trust… this person? We’re talking about criminals.”

Tara just smiled, “Yes, Hux, I do believe I can trust her. In fact, I’m the only person in the galaxy who can trust her.”

Hux raised an eyebrow, “Not her husband?”

“Oh, he’s the last person who can.” Tara looked between the two of them, “So, Gentlemen, do we have an agreement?”

Cern and Hux traded a look. Cern sighed and nodded. Hux flicked on the holo projector.

“Have you finished discussing?” an older, but highly groomed woman sat on a luxurious couch in the office of her private yacht. A signet ring hung proudly on her finger, and no matter what outfit she wore, she never hid the brand on her wrist declaring her affiliation with one of the most dangerous organizations in the galaxy… one she had claimed for herself exactly forty years ago.

“We’ll take the offer, Lady Qi’ra,” Hux announced.

“Good,” Qi’ra said. “I knew Tara would bring you around. She’s my…”

“Top Lieutenant?” Tara finished.

Qi’ra grinned, “Just promise you won’t do what Dryden Vos’ top lieutenant did to him.”

“Don’t ask me to make a promise I can’t keep.”

“Good girl.” Qi’ra turned her gaze back to Hux, “Do you have any concerns, General?”

“How do I know I can trust you?”

“You can’t. The sooner you learn that, the easier our dealings will be.”

“With all due respect, Lady Qi’ra, I’ve had bad dealings with your husband in the past. If Ores is in anyway involved-”

“Laertes doesn’t even have a whiff of this,” Qi’ra assured him. “He’s away dealing with the Guavian Death Gang if you must know.”

“Attempting another acquisition?” Tara asked.

In Qi’ra’s reign over Crimson Dawn, she had absorbed seven various notable syndicates and gangs into the fold of Crimson Dawn. It had been no less than marriage to Syndicate Leader, Laertes Ores that had sealed the deal between Crimson Dawn and Black Sun.

Surprisingly, the marriage was a happy one… well, as happy as a pair of backstabbing crime bosses who were always one miscalculated move away from murdering their spouse could be together.

Still, the man knew how to make her laugh.

“A very promising one,” Qi’ra replied. “So, are we agreed?”

“On one condition,” Hux said. “If things go south, the Supreme Leader must not find out that we were the ones to hire you.”

“Crimson Dawn won’t so much as mention your name during the operation,” Qi’ra said. “You have my word. Trust me.”

“I thought I was not to trust you?” Hux countered.

“Oh, good,” Qi’ra smiled at Tara, “he does learn.”

“Slowly, but perhaps has more merit than we give him,” Tara shrugged. “So, you’ll deal with the redhead?”

“Don’t spare another thought for her, My Dear,” Something softened in Qi’ra’s eyes, “You know, you simply must come visit me soon, Tara. It’s been far too long. Laertes and I have so missed you.”

Tara gave a small, genuine laugh, “I’ll see what I can swing, Mother.”

Chapter End Notes

Coming Up Next Chapter…

Bad Feelings About This
In the looming shadow of Crimson Dawn’s plan, Poe and Kaydel try to avoid the faces from their pasts. But the inevitable collision will change everything when Kylo decides to taunt Poe by finally revealing what happened to Felicity Rhiaon’s body. Meanwhile, Evan unknowingly sends a certain recording to Leia without properly screening it.

Yes, I know Tara had the whole line of my backstory doesn’t matter, but when I watched Solo I got major Sasa and Tara vibes from Qi’ra’s relationship with Vos, and I thought that Han would be having basically war flashbacks to Qi’ra and Vos when he saw Ben with the girls. Then I offhandedly joked to a friend about what if Tara was Qi’ra’s daughter, started thinking about it, pitched it to a few friends, received great feedback on the idea, and went screw it. Ben Solo lost his virginity to the daughter of the woman Han lost his virginity to.

And yes, both Han and Ben will eventually discover this fact… it will be glorious.
Also, no, Han is not Tara’s father. Laertes is. I know there’s a lot of jokes about brothers and sisters making out, but we’re not going all Game of Thrones up here with Kylo/Tara stuff.

Final note, as I was writing this chapter in which Poe pretends to be a guy named Kane, I learned that Oscar Isaac has also played a character named Kane in the movie Annihilation. …In which his wife is played by Natalie Portman. So there’s apparently a movie that was shot at the exact same time as TLJ (Oscar would literally film one movie, have lunch, then go film the other which was in the same studio) in which Poe Dameron and Padmé Amidala bang.

…That’s an image I won’t get rid of anytime soon.
Bad Feelings About This

Chapter Summary

Evan sends Leia a message he shouldn't, Finn gets a couple's massage with Kylo Ren, and Timor Connix tries to get Poe to dump Kaydel for his daughter, Kaydel.

Chapter Notes

Reminder that in this story the timeline is a little bit fluid putting scenes in order that fits best thematically and not necessarily in the order they happened. The Yavin IV scene takes place about a day before the scenes occurring directly before and after it.

Since people seemed to like the Oscar Isaac fact in the last chapter, I’m going to tell you another one. I’m working on a Robin Hood series that I plan to actually publish on Amazon (let me know if you are interested in hearing more about it) so I’ve been watching different Robin Hood movies. I knew that Oscar Isaac was in the Russell Crowe version, but what I didn’t know was that his first scene involves him in bed having a fun time with a girl who does not look unlike Kaydel. It gave me all the Poydel hilarity.

Oh, and Max von Sydow aka Lor San Tekka is in it too and might have scenes with Oscar… I got too distracted by naked Oscar Isaac to pay attention to anything else. The boy is as cut as I describe Poe to be.

See the end of the chapter for more notes.

---

The Long Way Home

Chapter Fifty-Two

Bad Feelings About This

The morning after the balcony incident, Sasa had seen Kaydel exiting the neighboring hotel suite the same time Sasa was departing hers with Kylo. Kaydel very quickly shoved Poe – who had been following her out – back into the room and locked the door, pretending like it was nothing at all.

Sasa recognized her as the girl Kylo had spoken to the previous night and was quick to strike up a conversation as she hung off the not even pretending to be bored Kylo’s arm. Apparently Kylo had taken a liking to Kaydel and thought she could be a potential contact – read, could help bankroll the First Order – and encouraged Sasa to spend time with Kaydel. This resulted in an invitation for Kaydel and Karé – a bodyguard for protection wasn’t an unreasonable request when alone with the First Order – to join the Knights of Ren for breakfast.

And for the life of her, Kaydel could not think of one excuse to turn it down.

In fact, poor Kaydel found herself practically attached to Sasa’s hip all that week. She had been forced to do everything from having multiple lunches with Sasa – and sometimes Kylo and the other Knights of Ren – to taking sightseeing tours with Sasa, to even having a girls’ day at the hotel spa. Thankfully the First Order was paying for everything, and as awkward as it was to be invited to a dual couple’s massage with Kylo and Sasa, it was a hell of a spa. Her manicure left her nails looking so fabulous that Karé insisted on getting one while watching Kaydel and Sasa at the spa the next day.

Poe had avoided the hallway when Kaydel ran in to Sasa, and he managed to avoid Sasa and Kylo through a number of increasingly unconvincing excuses. The worst moment had been when Kaydel showed up for the dual couple’s massage sans Poe – Karé basically sewn to her side as firmly as Kaydel was to Sasa’s. After “Kane’s abandonment” at the massage, Kaydel was fairly certain Sasa thought her “husband” was having an affair with his assistant, who Kaydel liked to talk about, but again neither she nor Kylo had yet to see.

Like Jaina Fel was going to willingly come within a mile of Ben Solo or his arm candy of the week.

Then to make things worse, at the dual couple’s massage, Karé couldn’t take the extra spot of massage for fear of not being able to adequately protect Kaydel. Sure, she was tempted, but Diego Nalto and Aletha Kymeri would string her up by the ankles upon return to Dqar for pulling that.

So Sasa decided to not let the extra spot go to waste, and offered it to her favorite bodyguard, some soldier named FN-2187.

Two years later, Poe Dameron, Rose Tico, and Rey Rhiaon Skywalker would laugh at the story about that time Kaydel inadvertently got a couple’s massage with Finn.

While Kaydel spied on the First Order, Poe was working the Connix family for information with Jaina and Snap. He was as charming as ever, creeping right into the hearts of Katha and particularly Timor. He wouldn’t admit it out loud but there was a small part of him pleased that Kaydel’s father had taken such a liking to him. Timor was requesting him by name for as many meals as Sasa did Kaydel. Poe’s favorite moment had to be the day he and Timor went golfing and Timor told him that if Poe wasn’t already married, he’d offer him a daughter.

Kaydel had a good laugh that night in bed, nestled in Poe’s arms, waiting to recount her awkward massage to him.

Poe was strangely interested in if Ben Solo was good looking shirtless.

“He’s surprisingly well cut,” Kaydel admitted, “but the man is freakishly broad. The other guy though… you probably should watch your behaviour. I might be interested.”

Poe did not like that answer.

Finn didn’t either two years later.

---

FATHIER: If you told me I could only see one creature in the galaxy, it would be a fathier. Someday I want to see a fathier race! I wouldn’t even bet – I’d just watch!
Evan and Paige would survey the goings on in the hotel, particularly Berd and Doxl Ren, or just show up wherever Poe or Kaydel’s groups needed extra backup.

As much as Evan preferred joining Poe’s team, he was starting to admit he liked trips to the spa.

But the best thing in Paige’s opinion was the day she found that someone in the Resistance had anonymously paid for Paige to attend a day session at the fathier stable learning to ride and care for the creatures. It was handwaved away with some excuse that Berd Ren was dragging FN-2187 – Sasa was otherwise occupied that day by a certain Ben Solo – and the soldier called Marks to the stables to check out the creatures as potential resources for the First Order. Surely Evan and Paige just had to go keep an eye on them.

Paige thought that FN-2187 was one hell of a fathier rider, and she was so thankful that someone had made one of her childhood dreams come true.

Two months later, Leia would ask about it while going over Holdo’s financial contributions to the Resistance. Holdo would simply answer that she had heard the Tico sisters go on about it so much that she just had to. She then swore Leia to secrecy. After all, she had a reputation to maintain. She couldn’t let Poe Dameron and Kaydel Ko Connix think she actually was a little charmed by them and their friends.

_A little._

But it wasn’t all fun and luxury, each group had their fair share of difficulties whether it was Paige and Evan being locked out of most of operation due to their “lesser wealth status” or the way Kaydel’s conscious wrestled with wining and dining the First Order.

For Poe, the hardest part of his mission were all the times he had to deal with Dacken Tokani, Kaydel’s nephew. The first Kaydel Connix’s husband was named Rogen Tokani and apparently was running the finance department of Kation Defense Holdings, and Kation turned out to be an anagram of Kaydel I’s married surname. Dacken had an internship as a way to get clean after his addiction to spice, granting the young man a second chance at life.

He also just so happened to be one of the nephews who once upon a time _set Kaydel’s hair on fire._

Poe had playact, laughing and smiling along with the Connix family. He could only do it by pretending they weren’t horrible monsters to Kaydel and Poe was seriously trying to win them over as Kaydel’s boyfriend. But with Dacken, it was different. He had to struggle to pretend every moment that he didn’t want to just throw him headfirst through a plate glass window.

Admittedly, while golfing he had managed to “_accidentally_” knock Dacken into a pond. Kaydel was surprisingly unhappy about that.

To be fair, Poe could see Dacken was trying to be a good guy. A recovering spice addict, he was using the family business to get clean and back on his feet. Timor told “Kane Nilar” in a whisper that Dacken was in intense tri-weekly therapy sessions.

But Poe could never forget how scared Kaydel was of letting her hair down. He couldn’t stop thinking about it. How was Dacken involved in the incident? Was it his idea? Was it the brainchild of his brother? Did he make sure she was sound asleep? Did he light the match? Did he put the flame to Kaydel’s beautiful golden hair?

Kaydel had talked about the incident one time, and that was it. She wouldn’t give Poe any further answers. He had no idea how Dacken had reacted to what he had done. Poe didn’t know if Dacken ever apologized or expressed remorse. He didn’t know who had called for help or how long Kaydel’s hair had been on fire.

What he did know was how it felt to have your hair on fire. He could remember vividly that accident that almost took his life, that had turned his face to meat, that had singed every hair from his head.

And he could never forgive someone for doing that to Kaydel.

That was why he and Kaydel seemed to have the same conversation every night.

“I’m going to punch him.”

“No, Poe, don’t.”

“Fine, you want to punch him?”

“No, I’m not going to punch him!”

“Then, I’m going to punch him.”

“Poe, I said no.”

“Kay, one of us is going to punch him. So if it’s not you, then I’m going to punch him.”

“Poe,” she sighed, “please… you don’t need to do this.”

He blinked, “Kay… he set your hair on fire.”

Somehow that was never a good enough argument for Kaydel… but Poe knew why. He knew that punching Dacken would cause a big enough scene to inevitably reveal Kaydel to her family. And that was her biggest fear on this mission. Not of being discovered, not of Kylo and Poe coming face to face, not of being captured, tortured, or killed.

Kaydel was terrified of facing her family.

One week into their trip, Evan Tharel was in the middle of processing the recorded audio they had gotten from Kylo and Sasa’s balcony. Apparently, Kylo was worried his room was bugged – which it was not as they had yet to find a way into the room undetected – so whenever he needed to speak of something confidential he went to a place that wasn’t bugged, the balcony – which they had been able to bug.

Evan was busy going through the files to double check audio quality while Paige was off taking a shower. He was watching the door as he listened to the audio, vaguely wondering if he should go offer Paige company in her shower when he noticed his comm flashing.

“Bey Five,” Evan answered.

Bey – after Shara Bey – was the Resistance’s standard undercover code name. Before the mission, Poe had gotten into a very heated argument with Diego Nalto that he should be called Bey Three instead of Bey One as he was the third member of Shara’s family. Diego’s hands full with preparations for the big upcoming event and trying to figure out how many people could fit in the mess hall of D’Qar’s base, Diego had snapped and told Poe to shut up before he got uninvited from the event, which would massively piss Kaydel off.

“How are things going, Bey Five?” Leia Organa asked from the comm.

“Pretty good. Bey Two managed to be invited to lunch by Sasa Ren again.”

“Good, I like that she’s made a contact and connection with Sasa. Have you been able to build a profile on her yet? I want an accurate record of all Knights of Ren.”

Evan’s lips quirked; more accurately General Organa wanted to know everything about the girl who according to the team’s reports was so very clearly sleeping with Leia’s son.

“We’ll send it along tonight,” Evan chuckled lightly. “I must say, it’s been all so nerve-racking for Bey Two. Did we tell you she had a couple’s massage with Kylo Ren?”

“No, but I greatly look forward to that report.”

“It will be in tonight’s information batch.”

“Good,” Leia said. “What about the audio files?”

“Just double checking the quality as we speak.”

“Oh, don’t worry about the quality, just send it forward to me now.”

Evan blinked, “Are you sure, General?”

He was actually unaware of the content of the very first recording, instead Snap had just given him a weird look, a chuckle, and warned him to listen to it last.

“I’m positive,” Leia replied. “Besides, my workload’s a little light today. It will give me something to do.”

Alright then,” Evan worked at his computer. “Sending them now.”

A minute or so passed.

“Received them,” Leia declared. “Thank you, Bey Five.”

“You are very welcome.”

He had no idea what he had just sent her.
C-3PO was busy with a report from one of his spy network droids when he processed something in the utmost corner of his visual matrix. Princess Leia had a listening device on, and the longer she listened to her present audio, the more intensely did his photo receptors register the emotion of utmost horror on her face.

Suddenly in a very uncharacteristic display, she tore the listening device from her head and literally threw them down on the workstation.

“Amilyn!” she called out desperately, causing a few people to look up in worry.

Amilyn Holdo made quick work of getting to Princess Leia’s side, “What is it, General?”

Princess Leia sounded very shaken, “Amilyn, I need you to finish this audio report for me. I can’t… I can’t listen to it personally.”

Vice Admiral Holdo frowned, “Why is that, General?”

“It’s an audio recording of Kylo Ren.”

Sympathy on the face of Vice Admiral Holdo registered in Threepio’s databanks.

“Leia, I understand,” Vice Admiral Holdo said kindly, “and I know that it is a conflict of interest with you. But I’ve been briefed on the magnitude of this information. It’s important that you as Head of the Resistance be the one to listen to it.”

“Amilyn, I don’t think you understand-”

“A new base, Leia. We can get a jump on them before they even know. What could be so wrong about you listening to your son divulge that information?”

“Because he divulges that information in the middle of having sex with some woman called Sasa Ren,” Princess Leia said bluntly.

The entire Command Center fell silent.

Vice Admiral Holdo blinked at Princess Leia, and then quickly picked up the listening device.

“I’ll finish that for you, Leia.”

“Thank you, Amilyn.”

Princess Leia immediately exited the room, and very slowly the Command Center resumed normal activities.

Most peculiar, Threepio decided. He had heard the sounds of sexual intercourse many times in his programming history. From Captain Solo and Princess Leia, to Master Luke and Miss Rhiaon, and even Master Ani and Mistress Padmé as Master Luke had managed to restore Threepio’s wiped memories about a year before his disappearance.

Threepio just couldn’t understand why Princess Leia thought the sounds of her son having sexual intercourse were so sickening.

Humans were quite odd creatures.
Why the hell would you send that to Leia?” Poe Dameron exclaimed as they entered the ballroom. It was finally the day of Katha’s big presentation.

“I didn’t know you had that kind of recording!” Evan shot back. “Why didn’t you tell me?”

“I told Thon to tell you.” Poe eyed Snap, “Thon did tell you, right?”

Snap chuckled nervously, “I may have only hinted at it.”

The group groaned and Karé smacked her husband upside the head.

Kathy was hanging on Poe’s arm, talking with Paige. She and Evan were able to walk in with the others because there were so many people entering the ballroom at once that they blended in. Jaina excused herself to go get the information packages that Dacken and Sage – Katha’s daughter – were handing out.

Suddenly, Paige’s eyes widened, “First Order.”

Everyone’s heads snapped in the direction Paige was watching. Sure enough, Kylo, Berd, Doxl, and Sasa were heading straight towards them with their eight Stormtroopers following behind.

Kylo was in a smart looking charcoal grey business casual jacket and crisp black shirt, pants, and boots. His lightsaber hung from a belt very clearly as a warning to everyone. Berd and Doxl in their regular black Knight of Ren outfits – admittedly not as dramatic as Kylo’s – looked quite out of place next to him and Sasa.

Sasa was in a rather stunning seafoam green dress, the fabric of her sweetheart neckline crisscrossing in a complicated sewing feat that had taken her three days to get just right. Snoke had allowed her to wear colours other than black, grey, and brown for this mission and she was damn well going to take advantage of it.

“I think his girlfriend dressed him,” Kaydel muttered.

“Fuck, he’s heading right towards us,” Poe whispered in a panic.

“What do we do?” Evan asked.

Without a word of warning, Poe grabbed Evan and Paige, yanked them slightly away from the group, then spun Evan around, pinned him against the wall so Poe’s back was facing the group, and started talking to Evan and Paige about opening a zoo.

“And I will need good veterinarians like you two to take care of my animals,” Poe spoke in such a thick, deep Yavin II accent that Diego Nalto would slap him if he heard it. “Just think of all the children who would come and see.”

“Forgive me, Mister Nilar,” Evan did his best to inflect a prim and proper Coruscanti accent. He sounded more Bail Organa than Grand Moff Tarkin. “But Liin and I did not study for years to work in a zoo.”

“Dania!” Sasa greeted with a happy call and a sudden hug.

“Oh, hello, Sasa,” Kaydel sputtered as she reluctantly returned the hug. She nodded to Ben when Sasa broke the hug, “Master Kylo.”
“Mrs. Nilar,” Kylo nodded. He glanced at Poe, his face not so much twitching at his uncharacteristic long black locks, “So this must be the husband we’ve heard so much about. Hello, I’m Ky-”

“Not now! I’m busy!” Poe held out a hand to shush him, not turning his head in the slightest. He laid on the accent even thicker… if that was possible, “Now, tell me, what is so horrible about zoos?”

“Well, have you heard about the way they treat Fathiers?” Paige countered.

“Yes, but that is a racing track. It would be a very humane operation this zoo.”

Kylo stared at Poe, his mouth still opened to form the word he had been cut off at. He looked like he wasn’t quite sure what had just happened. It had been a while since someone waved him off so easily.

“Sorry,” Kaydel gave a sheepish smile. “You know how they can get with business deals. Kane’s wanted to open a zoo ever since he was a young man and now with the kids he’s become obsessed. It’ll be Mateo’s fifth birthday present if Kane has his way.”

“An admirable goal,” Sasa cuddled up on Kylo’s arm.

Kylo closed his mouth but still looked stunned.

“Do you have any children together?” Poe grinned but still didn’t turn.

Oh, he loved that awkward silence he caused.

“Um, well, no,” Sasa cleared her throat, looking suddenly like she wanted to be anywhere but there. “But maybe someday… someday soon.”

“Hopefully,” Kylo nodded.

Kaydel raised an eyebrow. Now there was something to put in the report.

For a minute there was silence and Poe could feel Kylo’s eyes on the back of his head. Sure, Poe had green contacts and a beard, but he still didn’t trust Ben Solo not to recognize him.

Then he realized what the silence was for… Ben was searching in the Force for Poe’s Force Signature. And there was nothing Poe could do to stop him.

Kylo focused on the myriad of colours. The vets had some sort of pink and red colours, he didn’t pause long enough at the bodyguards to specify their colours, and Dania had a soft orange… that of an orange blossom.

And her husband had an orange too. A strong, bright orange, almost like the colour of…

A cerise Signature slammed into his.

“Sasa,” Kylo hissed. “What are you doing?”

“It’s rude to pick through the colours and minds of our new friends,” Sasa chastised softly while giving the others an everything is okay smile. “That’s not the way you make business partners.”

Kylo opened his mouth to argue, but then considered it, “Huh, I guess you’re right. My apologies.”

“No problem,” Kaydel said quickly.
“Think nothing of it,” Poe still wouldn’t turn around.

“You know,” Kylo leaned in to Sasa, “in all her years as my right hand, Tara’s never stopped me from doing that before.”

“Is that so?” Sasa’s voice was very measured.

“Yeah.” He moved so close his breath was hot on her ear, “I guess that makes you better at this than her.”

Sasa couldn’t wipe the grin off her face, “Oh, you are so being rewarded for that tonight.”

As the pair laughed, Paige noticed that the black bodyguard nearest Sasa quickly lowered his head.

“Sorry about us,” Sasa grinned at the group. “He’s terrible and a work in progress for me.”

“Trust me,” Kaydel smiled, “mine puts me through the ringer on a daily basis.”

“Why do you still keep him around?” Sasa teased.

“Well, the kids would ask questions if I didn’t, plus he looks really good with his shirt off.”

“Thank you, Darling,” Poe said dryly.

“Anytime,” Kaydel replied.

Kylo frowned at the choice of words.

Sasa looked to Kylo and bumped him with her hip, “Well, we were wondering if you lot wanted to sit with us during the presentation? We’ve done many transactions with Connix Industries. We could give you some insight.”

Kaydel bit her lip and glanced at Poe.

“Thank you,” Poe said stiffly, “but we’ll draw our own conclusion.”

“Oh, but I must insist,” Sasa pushed. “They are truly a wonderful company, plus I don’t want to get stuck next to the Prince of Averna again. He always stares down my top.”

Kylo scowled, “Sasa, always tell me if he does. I warned him last time I’d break his wrist if he ever did it again.”

The Resistance group had nothing to say to that.

“Well, if you’ll excuse me,” Evan cleared his throat, “but my associate and I must be going.”

“Lucky bastards,” Snap muttered as Evan and Paige made their escape.

Poe dared to turn his head for two seconds to kiss Kaydel on the cheek, and then put his back to Kylo again to speak to Karé.

“I’m going to go see what’s taking Artora so long with that information packet,” Poe said. “Keep Dania safe, and get us a good seat.”

Kaydel glared at Poe’s back as he left with Snap. She knew it was best for Poe to get away from Ben Solo as quickly as possible…but she was still going to get Jessika to kick his ass for leaving her alone with the Knights of Ren with only Karé for backup.

Admittedly, Karé was excellent back up, but it was the principle of the thing.

“Now,” Sasa turned her attention back to Kaydel, “please, come sit with us.”

Kaydel gave what could only be classified as a whimper.

Then came something that was both amazing and horrifying.

The good news was that someone decided to interrupt their conversation.

The bad news was that someone was her father.

“Masters Ren,” Timor Connix greeted, his son-in-law, Telon Sindal – Katha’s husband – following. “It’s so good to see you all again.”

As he shook hands with Kylo, Sasa, Berd, and Doxl, Kaydel seriously considered using the distraction to make a run for it. But she eyed the eight Stormtroopers – at least four of them still had eyes on her – and decided against it. Instead she pulled the brown hair in front of her face and kept her head down.

She also made sure to flick on the recording device in her earring.

“How goes things in the First Order?” Timor asked Kylo.

“Same as always,” Kylo replied. “Bringing peace and order. I presume Connix Industries is still selling to the right people?”

Telon smiled at him, “I assure you, Master Ren, no matter what you hear today, Connix Industries never has and never will sell weapons to the New Republic or the Resistance.”

“Good,” Kylo said shortly. “You know what Captain Anthea would do to you if you did.”

“That’s why we cut the fat from the family as one would say,” Timor grinned.

Karé took a protective step forward, but Kaydel held her back. Suddenly Kaydel was glad Poe wasn’t present. A comment like that in front of Poe would have ended with her father’s teeth on the floor.

“How is Alecta doing?” Timor asked, completely ignoring the two women right in front of him.

“Scaring the crap out of the cadets,” Berd cut in.

“Good,” Timor laughed. “The more time she spends scaring the crap out of them, the less she spends scaring the crap out of me. You know my wife’s sister decided she’d rather live in a desert than deal with Alecta?”

“I didn’t know that was an option,” Doxl grinned.

Kaydel’s fist tightened. Aunt Ally had endured that horrid desert just so she wouldn’t be brutally murdered by one sister in revenge for another… but sure, make jokes about it.

“May Telon show you to your seats?” Timor asked. “He needs an excuse to escape Katha for a while.”
“Not that I don’t love my wife,” Telon said quickly. “I just don’t dare interrupt her prepping for a business presentation.”

“Well, we were wondering if we could sit with some new friends of ours?” Sasa smiled at Kaydel. “I’ve become very well acquainted with Dania Nilar here.”

“Oh, this is Mrs. Nilar. I’ve been spending a lot of time with that charming husband of yours.” Timor held out his hand, “It’s nice to meet you, My Dear.”

Kaydel took a deep breath and looked up.

It was the same man she knew. That pale skin had more wrinkles, the blonde hair was almost completely grey, but those brown eyes – the only break from Anthea family tradition – her own eyes were the ones she was staring straight into.

…and he didn’t even so much as blink at her.

“It’s nice to meet you, Mister Connix,” her voice was soft and subdued as she shook the hand of her own father and he didn’t recognize her. Either her contouring skills were a true gift from the Goddesses… or Timor was as absent a father as she always suspected.

Kaydel so wished she could say it was the former.

“Kane has told me so much about you,” Timor grinned. He took a good look up and down, “Just as pretty as he claimed. I guess that’s why he doesn’t want one of my daughters.”

Oh, trust me, Dad, he does, Kaydel thought. Up to four times a day.

Karé took a menacing step forward and stared down Timor.

“Well, as pretty as Mrs. Nilar is, unfortunately we’ve already got some special chairs set up for you.” Timor leaned in and whispered, “Not these piece of crap hotel ballroom chairs.”

Sasa laughed, “How considerate.”

“Oh, don’t thank me, Love,” Timor grinned wide enough that Kylo’s arm tightened around Sasa’s a bit more. “It’s strict orders from Alecta, and I don’t want to get on her bad side. Telon, will you show the First Order to their seats?”

Telon nodded and didn’t even glance at his sister-in-law. Instead he just led the First Order to a reserved section near the front of the stage.

That left Kaydel alone with her father.

“So,” Kaydel looked to the floor, taking a step back towards Karé’s protective stance. “What made you decide to go into defensive weapons and systems?”

“Oh, well, I’ll tell you the full story during the presentation, but my eldest daughter, Kaydel was killed by a speeder bomb,” Timor answered. “Some Imperial Loyalist extremists. After that I decided to focus on defensive measures instead of just wrecking the world.”

Funny, in her twenty-three years of life, not once had Kaydel heard him mention defensive measures.

“I’m sorry about your daughter,” Kaydel said.

“Yes, poor thing. Left behind two sons. One of them’s here with us today.”
Timor waved at Dacken across the room. He started to wave back… then his eyes fell on Kaydel and he frowned.

“There you are,” Poe Dameron suddenly stepped in front, blocking her from Dacken’s line of sight. “I was looking all over for you, Querida.”

Querida? Kaydel blinked. Okay, seriously, was Poe just doing a caricature of Diego Nalto now?

This was because of the Bey Three thing, wasn’t it?

Poe locked his arm around Kaydel’s waist and pulled her in close. Snap and Jaina were behind him, both on guard to make a run for it if things went south.

“Shall we go get our seats, Darling?” Poe asked, wanting to get Kaydel away from Timor as quick as possible. He didn’t know if Timor Connix was dangerous, but Alecta Anthea was and that was a risk he wasn’t willing to take.

“I was just going to offer to escort her to some,” Timor said.

“We can find them ourselves,” Jaina smiled politely at him. “Really Mister Connix, you must be very busy. Go get everything in order.”

“Oh, no, I don’t dare get in Katha’s way,” Timor chuckled. “I must admit, Nilar, you did pick a pretty one. Though, if – the Goddesses Forbid – anything happens that puts you in the market for a new someone special, I’ve got a few daughters left to test your palate.”

Kaydel scowled. She didn’t know what was more disturbing, that her father was hinting that her “husband” leave her for herself, or…

No, wait… That was it. That was the disturbing thing. Her father was trying to tell her husband to leave Kaydel for Kaydel.

Why was her family so weird?

“Well, if they’re all as pretty as Katha over there,” Poe nodded to the blonde wearing a headset coordinating everything, her daughter, Sage looking a perfect mirror at her side, “then I might take you up on that.”

Kaydel made no secret of stomping on Poe’s foot.

“Ow! Babe, I was kidding!”

Timor laughed, “She’s a feisty one, isn’t she?”

“You should see her aunt,” Poe gritted his teeth trying to soothe his foot by rubbing it on the back of the opposite leg. “Best part, the kids got it too. Little monsters.”

“Kane,” Kaydel warned.

“What? They are,” Poe objected. “Abril’s new attitude I do not like at all.”

“Oh kids,” Timor said. “They are a handful. You got any pictures?”

“She only lets me carry one,” Poe pulled out Nils Arlos’ Holo. “Afraid they’ll get kidnapped or something.”
“Kane, we’re worth a lot of money,” Kaydel chided. “I don’t want another hostage situation like what happened with Jewel.”

“Who honestly ransoms a tooka?”

“I think the worst part is how much you paid to get her back.”

“Hey! Jewel is one of the family! It was worth every credit!”

Snap and Karé exchanged a look. Poe and Kaydel were a little too good at this.

“That’s a sweet family,” Timor smiled at the Holo. “I’m assuming the boy is Mateo, but which is Abril and which is Penelope?”

“Persephone,” Kaydel corrected. “And she’s the one who looks like her father. The blonde is Abril.”

Timor frowned, “Huh, where does she get the blonde hair?”

Kaydel blinked.

Fuck.

“Oh, it’s my natural colour,” Kaydel mumbled. “But I like being a brunette, so I dye it.”

“Honestly, she dyes it so much I forgot she was naturally blonde before Abril was born,” Poe quickly lied.

Timor just frowned.

Oh, Poe didn’t like the way Timor was staring at Kaydel.

“You know…” Timor said slowly, “Persephone is a Mallarexian name.”

“Is it?” Kaydel feigned surprise. “I read it in a book and liked it. I was so high on labour drugs when she was born that I was just out of it when I named her. Honestly, if it wasn’t for Vella here-”

Kaydel pointed to Karé.

“I probably would have broken Persephone in those first few days,” Kaydel gave a false chuckle. “Mister Honey, it’s just a quick business trip, I’ll back before you know it, and of course the baby won’t decide to come a month early didn’t show up until five days later and by then the name was finalized and he couldn’t stop me.”

“Good God,” Poe rolled his eyes, “miss one kid’s birth out of three and suddenly I’m an awful father.”

“I never said that.”

“No, but you’re going to hold it over my head for the rest of my life.”

“You missed the birth of our child!”

“I made it the other two times!”

An awkward silence clung to the air.

“I, um,” Timor cleared his throat, “I think I’m going to go check on Katha.”
“Good luck with the presentation!” Jaina called after him.

When he was gone, they all let out a breath of relief.

“Huh,” Karé said, “Maybe you guys being too good at this isn’t such a terrible thing.”

Jaina sighed, “Let’s just get to our seats before we run into another face from the past.”

“Alright, but if Luke Skywalker shows up, I am dropping everything to drag him back to base,” said Poe.

“Deal,” they all agreed.

Evan and Paige were minding their own business, settled in a pair of hotel ballroom chairs – not necessarily uncomfortable, but there’s a reason people got up and danced at wedding. Admittedly it was a nice ballroom. It even had old fashioned lanterns with real flames for lights on the wall. Paige looked around to see where Poe, Kaydel, and their lot settled while Evan flipped through the information package.

“Zeth?” she frowned, “do you feel bad about… leaving our colleagues behind at work?”

“Not really,” Evan understood what she was getting at. “You know this line of defensive weapons are actually really interesting. Just no one show Grandma the tranq gun. A rifle and a sedative are two things put together she would so abuse.”

Paige laughed.

“Oh, hey, did you ever hear if your mom arrived safely…” Paige looked around, “with the guys and you know who?”

“Yeah, I got word. They’re all fine. The Sex God’s father has promised to show my mom some fun, but clarified it’s not a date date. I think the two of them are just lonely and looking for a friend. I think the… couriers were going to stick around too. Our little bloom will be happy about it.”

“That sounds like she’ll have so much fun,” Paige smiled. Hanging out with Kes Dameron, Han Solo, and Chewbacca the Wookiee would be an amazing night, one Rose would lose her mind over.

“Honestly, I feel bad for them trying to entertain my mother,” said Evan. “She is ridiculously straight-laced. I don’t think she even knows how to have fun.”

“Drink, you Rebel bastards! The next round’s on me!” Shayna cried.

Kes, Han, and Chewie all cheered as the bartender filled another row of shot glasses in front of them. Waroo was up in the atmosphere on the freighter (it was too large to land so Han had a smaller shuttle to the surface and kept the Eravana in orbit) tinkering and Rose was back at the house working on BB-8 while the group had a no sons around night.

Of course, for Han, every night was a “no sons around” night… which was probably why he was drinking in the first place.
Following Han yelling some old Corellia drinking phrase, in perfect unison Han, Kes, Chewie, and Shayna downed their shots in one go, slammed them on the bar, and signaled to the bartender to pour another round.

“And here I thought you wouldn’t drink,” Kes laughed as Shayna knocked back another shot.

“Boys, I took half a lamppost through the back when I was fourteen,” Shayna slammed down the glass. “I deserve as many drinks as I want for the rest of my life.”

“Okay, I gotta ask,” Han said. “Your kid… is he adopted? Cause I can’t figure out the whole paralyzed labour thing.”

“Two words: caesarian section.”

“You know, you’re lucky you got to be there,” Kes was too drunk to think about that statement too hard. “I missed Poe’s birth and it’s one of the biggest regrets of my life. I didn’t get to even meet him until he was three days old.”

“You’re welcome for that, by the way,” Han said.

Shayna frowned, “Wait, what?

“Han brought me to see Poe after he was born,” Kes answered. “Let’s just say that it wasn’t exactly a Council approved excursion.”

She blinked, “Okay, I think I need to hear this story.”

Kes shook his head but conceded, “About two years after the Battle of Yavin, Poe was born. Shara had returned here to Yavin IV several months earlier, and it had been three since I last saw her. She commed me about an hour after giving birth and told me the news. Would have done it sooner, but she insisted on being the one to tell me and Shara was so exhausted from the childbirth. I was of course, over the moon about it, and immediately I was trying to find a way to get leave and go meet my son.”

“But the bastards on the High Council denied him,” Han cut in.

Roar raw row roo!

“You said it Chewie,” Han signalled the bartender to refill his whisky glass.

“So, I tried pulling every favor I had to get approval,” Kes continued, “but nothing could move them. I was down to one last person: Princess Leia. Thought that with my connections to Felicity and Diego that I might have a chance. Leia was on the Millennium Falcon, arguing with Solo here over something I honestly can’t remember.”

“Probably that she wouldn’t admit her feelings for me.” Han chuckled as he sipped his topped-up whiskey, “I got her in the end.”

“Anyway, I beg Leia to let me go, and she’s sympathetic but ultimately tells me there’s nothing she can do and goes off to talk to Chewie in another part of the ship.”

Chewie tried to interject and pick up the story from there, but it soon became clear Shayna didn’t understand a word he said, so he just enjoyed another drink.

“What he was saying,” Han said, “was that I saw Kes and Leia talking and after Leia left him looking disappointed, I asked what was going on. Kes explained and I felt bad about it all – I’ve always had a bit of a soft spot for dads who overtly love and protect their kids, maybe I should have done a bit more of that with my own – and I told Kes to strap in. We’re heading to Yavin IV.”

“I remember telling him that we didn’t have leave, and Han just grins at me and says that’s why they call it AWOL.”

“So we go into the cockpit and we take off.”

Kes chuckled nervously, “And twenty minutes later we realized Leia is still on the ship and we’ve just kidnapped the Princess of Alderaan.”

“She yelled at me for three hours straight,” Han shuddered. “I think I went deaf in one ear. But you know what? It was worth it in the end.”

“Yeah,” Kes smiled warmly. “Getting to hold Poe when he was only a few days old, knowing this was what I was fighting for, a future where he could grow up in peace, choose to pursue any career he wanted, never go hungry or sick, never be afraid of speaking his mind or standing up for what he believes in… and screw his girlfriend on the desk of his superior officer.”

“I still can’t believe he did that,” Han shook his head. “I never did hear whose desk it was. Was it Nalto’s? Or was it Leia’s, because if so, been there, done that many times… in fact did that the morning before we left D’Qar.”

“I didn’t need to hear that. And it was Holdo’s desk.”

“I knew I liked your kid for a reason, but, uh… that’s not why the AWOL kidnapping was worth it to me.”

“Oh?” Shayna asked, “Then why was it?”

Han gave a small grin, not the haughty smirk of condescension he displayed so often, but rather the genuine one he reserved for Leia, Ben, Leia, and those of similar rank to him.

“Leia told me years later that seeing me do that for you Kes,” Han said, “…was when she finally let herself accept the fact she was in love with me. Sure, fought against those feelings for another year, but she finally admitted it. Actually, when we were discussing whether or not to actually have our kid, Leia brought up the memory. Said that was the thing that made her believe that I could be a good father to her kid. If I was able to go that far for someone else’s kid, imagine what I would do for ours…”

The group was silent as Han took another drink of his whiskey. No one spoke for fear of breaking the spell that allowed for Han Solo to bare his shoulders so honestly. Han never talked about his family so candidly unless he was with people he really trusted… or was really drunk.

Han sighed, “Lot of good I ended up being for our kid. I don’t know, sometimes I think maybe we…”

He couldn’t even finish the thought.

Chewie put a paw on Han’s shoulder and growled something soft and personal to him. Kes and Shayna couldn’t understand, but they knew it was something not for their ears.

“It was a hard decision,” Kes said. “Having a kid in general… especially in a war. It’s always a gamble.”
“Here I thought I was a good gambler,” Han bitterly smiled. “Turns out I was only lucky once…and that was winning the Falcon.”

Chewie batted him upside the head and started roaring out something about Leia and Luke and their family and how Han wasn’t being fair with that statement.

“Alright, alright, calm down,” Han tried to shush him. “We don’t want to get kicked out until our contact gets here. I get it, Fuzzball. You’re right, I made a few good gambles in my life. Best one was probably vocalizing Shyriiwook to a Wookiee trying to eat me. If you hadn’t been around, Buddy, I would have been killed long before ever meeting Ben Kenobi.”

Chewbacca gave an arrogant growl that Kes was fairly certain translated to something like And don’t you forget it.

“Kids really are a gamble,” Shayna said. “And they never come when you want them to.”

“I’m honestly surprised there aren’t a dozen MisCalcs running around D’Qar right now,” Kes agreed.

Han smirked, “And I’m honestly surprised your kid doesn’t have a dozen MisCalcs running around right now.”

“You and me both. With how much he and Kaydel get at it, I should be a grandfather seven times over.”

“See, another point in waiting until you’re married to have sex,” Shayna said.

“Hey, Shara and I were married, and Poe was still a MisCalc,” Kes pointed out.

“Well, it’s a good thing Poe doesn’t have a kid,” Han said. “What would he even do with a kid?”

“Oh, we’ve got a deal in case he gets someone pregnant,” Kes replied. “If he has a MisCalc, I’ll do for him what my father-in-law did for Shara and I. I’ll raise the kid until the war is over.”

“Are you sure?” Shayna asked. “That’s a lot of responsibility.”

“I wasn’t there for the first two years of my son’s life. I want to be there for my grandkids.”

“Meanwhile I’m scared shitless that someday I’m going to overhear in a bar that I have a grandkid,” Han shook his head. “I kid you not, the current rumour is that my son has some sort of breeding harem?”

Kes, Chewbacca, and Shayna stared at him.

“What does that even mean?” Shayna whispered.

“I’m too afraid to find out,” Han admitted.

Shayna shook her head, “Look at us, sitting around a bar getting drunk over our idiot sons.”

Grr roar gar gree.

“You can’t possibly be happy that your son has joined the family business of black market smuggling or whatever you guys do,” Shayna said. She knew a little Shyriiwook from dealing with some Wookiee miners a decade ago.
Chewbacca shrugged.

Rawr.

Shayna smiled and shook her head, “I swear, sons are the reason their parent go grey.”

“You should have seen my hair,” Kes sighed. “It was better than Poe’s.”

Han frowned, “You had it shaved what, an inch to your skull?”

“I looked good!”

“No wonder your son’s a fricken peacock,” Han rolled his eyes.

“Look at us,” Shayna sometimes tended to repeat herself when drunk. “Complaining about our sons.”

“Our sons are worth complaining about,” Kes said.

Han shook his head, “A wannabe Sith Lord who shot my sister-in-law in the head.”

“An immature flyboy who can’t keep it in his pants even during business meetings,” Kes knocked back his drink.

Gar roar grr ree.

“And pretender virgin who keeps a secret pet bird in his room and walks around with a Alderiaan women’s name,” Shayna swirled her glass. “You know, I don’t mind him having a new name. He wants me to call him Évan, I’ll do it, but he’ll always be my Genie.”

“He’ll always be my Cielito,” Kes said.

“He’ll always be my Ben, stop using the Force for that,” Han said.

Roar rah grah gree.

“Yeah, Pal,” Han chuckled, “is he your little fuzzball… Though I think he’s finally taller than you.”

Chewbacca gave a very sharp growl.

“They’re idiots,” Kes laughed. “And we wouldn’t want them any other way.”

“Oh, I could tweak my kid a little,” Han said. “Make him a little less stabby… Maybe also get rid of the hair dye. Though he does look kind of good with the black hair.”

“Gentlemen,” Shayna raised her glass, “shall we toast to the insanity that is our offspring?”

“Just think, at one point or another we were as stupid as them all,” Kes laughed.

“Wait, her kid has a medical license,” Han said, “I don’t think I’ve ever been that smart.”

Ree raw gro raw.

“We toast,” Shayna moved as if she meant to stand up only to realize at the last second she hadn’t been able to walk in thirty-six years. Maybe this should be the last round.

The men lifted their glass.
“To sons,” Shayna said.

“Idiot sons,” Han amended.

“Who think they know everything,” Kes added.

Grah ree roar raw gree groh!

Shayna smiled and combined it all, “To idiot sons who think they know everything but don’t have the first freaking clue.”

“To idiot sons who think they know everything but don’t have the first freaking clue!” the men chorused.

They clinked glasses and drank.

“Well, it seems like I arrived at the perfect time,” a voice made Han look up.

He grinned at the woman standing before him. Her curly, red hair had long ago turned grey, but her freckles were as bright and numerous as ever.

“Hey, Nest,” Han greeted. “Guys, this is Enfys Nest, the contact who decided she was so busy that we could only meet up on Yavin IV for some inexplicable reason.”

“The Civil war may have been won, but my war is as tumultuous as ever,” Enfys shook her head and plopped down on the bar stool next to Han. “Buy me a drink?”

“Hey now, didn’t I give you several million credits worth of coaxium?”

“Yeah, forty years ago. Now, buy me a drink or I get lost.”

“I think you underestimate my powers of persuasion.”

“Oh, is this the part where you lie and tell me you have thirty hired guns on a freighter waiting to ambush me when you give the signal, and at that exact moment the freighter takes off without you?”

Shayna snorted into her drink.

“True story,” Enfys told Kes.

“I believe it,” he said.

“Alright, I’ll get you a drink,” Han conceded.

He signalled to the bartender and placed an order for her usual, a double of Savareen brandy. Not cheap either. She gulped it down like she was drinking water on Tatooine.

“Alright, what’s the news?” Han asked. “And I’m not getting you another drink unless you’ve got something good.”

As a thank you for his contribution to her gang on Savareen, Enfys met up with Han once a year to fill him in on all the details of the criminal underworld. So Enfys launched into a long spiel about the ongoings in the black market and the wars between the Crime Syndicates that Nest and her gang protected the little people from. Kes wasn’t particularly interested, and Shayna appeared to fall asleep on the bar counter.
It was the last piece of news that caught their attention.

“Laertes Ores has officially strong-armed the Guavian Death Gang into the fold of Crimson Dawn,” Enfys said.

“Oh good,” Han groaned, “three things I really God damn hate teaming up together… Is… Is Qi’ra involved?”

Kes perked up.

Chewie growled that it was a different Qi’ra than Kira.

“Nah, according to my sources Lady Qi’ra,” Enfys rolled her eyes at the title, “is off pulling her own thing on Nixrye that Ores doesn’t know about. Bombing some weapons conference.”

Kes dropped his glass.

“What?” he exclaimed as it shattered in the floor and a disgruntled mouse cleaning droid whizzed under his feet mumbling words in binary that were definitely not in the default list.

“What?” Enfys frowned.

“Bombing a weapons conference… on Nixrye?” Kes’ heart hammered in his chest. “When?”

“Kes, what’s going on?” Shayna asked.

“When?” he demanded.

“Tomorrow afternoon,” Enfys answered. “What’s it to you?”

Kes caught Shayna’s eye, and she understood.

“Yeah,” Enfys frowned. “You know about it?”

“I’m calling Geno,” Shayna set to it quickly.

“Kes, what’s going on?” Han asked.

“That’s the conference Poe is at,” Kes said. “Please, Ms. Nest, tell me everything. What’s going to happen at the conference?”

Enfys gave Han an uncertain look, but he nodded.

“They’re going to bomb the resort during the business presentation,” Enfys said. “They’ve also sent people in dressed up and acting like Imperial Loyalists because there’s going to be First Order presence there.”

“First Order presence?” Han repeated.

“Four Knights of Ren and a handful of Stormtroopers, but no, I don’t know names,” Enfys caught Han’s look. “So, yeah, your kid could be one of them.”

“Han,” Kes said in a low voice, “Jessika commed Rose last night. Apparently Ben is at that conference.”
“Kriffing hell,” Han muttered. “So that’s it? They’re just going to blow it up and blame it on Imperials for no reason?”

“Oh no, that’s just the cover story,” Enfys said. “They’re pretending to be there to steal the weapons on display, but according to my mole in Crimson Dawn, really it’s an elaborate plan to kill one of the Knights of Ren. Again. Don’t know who.”

Han felt a knot in his stomach.

“Is there any way to stop it?” Han asked.

“I don’t think so. Look, Solo, I’m sorry to leave after throwing that on you but I’ve got a transport waiting. You got what you wanted. I got what I wanted,” she held up her fourth glass of Savareen whiskey, which Han did not remember agreeing to buy. “See you next year?”

“Yeah,” Han stiffly nodded, his mind set only on the danger his son was in. “See you next year.”

Enfys finished her drink and walked out the door.

“Ben,” Han whispered.

“Now there’s no need to panic,” Kes said, his voice a pitch higher than normal, “we don’t know for sure that this information is correct.”

“Guys,” Shayna frowned; she had been busy fiddling with her comm, “I can’t get a hold of Geno.”

Kes and Han looked at each other.

“Okay, now we can panic,” Kes approved.

“What are we going to do?” Han sighed.

Shayna frowned, “What are we going to do? Are you serious? You’re Han Solo. Those are our sons out there. If they’re in danger, what do we do? We go all Mama and Papa Bears on their asses and save our boys!”

Kes raised an eyebrow, “You are not at all what Evan described you as.”

“Genie likes to put me on a pedestal. Now let’s go and kick some ass!” Shayna slapped her hand on the bar, “Hey, barkeep! One more shot for courage!”

“So, are we doing this, Solo?” Kes asked as the bartender poured another round. “It’s your ship.”

And it was his son in danger.

Han sighed and grabbed a shot, “Let’s go get our boys.”

They were all a bit too drunk to think “Hey, maybe we should call the Resistance and give Poe and his team a head’s up, and get Leia to send back up.”

All they could think about was the grand adventure they were about to have saving their sons from Crimson Dawn.

“To idiot sons who think they know everything but don’t have the first freaking clue!” Han, Kes, Shayna, and Chewie cheered – Chewie cheering in Shyriwook.
So, they all took one last shot, paid the tab, and headed back to the shuttle.

“Hey, is anyone sober enough to pilot?” Han asked.

Silence.

“I think we better call Rose,” Kes said.

Chewie agreed.

“That’s weird,” Kaydel frowned fiddling with her concealed comm as they waited for the presentation to start. “My comm won’t work.”

“Sometimes places like this will use a signal blocker to prevent interruptions in the presentation,” Jaina informed.

“That doesn’t sound safe,” Poe said, lazily flipping through the information packet.

“Neither is interrupting eccentric, short-tempered millionaires.” Jaina glanced nervously towards where the First Order was seated, “Are you sure they don’t know it’s us?”

“Not positive but sure enough not to take action at the moment.” Poe sighed, “Look, we’ve got Thon sitting on the end. He’s big and bulky and will block us. No offense, Thon.”

“None taken.” Snap winked at Karé sitting on the opposite end of the group next to Jaina, “Just more of me to love.”

Karé smiled.

“But if things do go south we’re going to do it like this,” Poe said. He gestured to Jaina, “If Artora or myself get recognized, she, I, and Vella will sneak away and leave you two behind.”

“And if Dania gets recognized?” Snap asked.

“I want you to take her and go. Our,” Poe glanced across the seated crowd towards Evan and Paige, “other friends have their instructions when and where to leave. Try to leave through the back exit, understood?”

“Yes, Sir,” everyone nodded.

“Is everything alright, Kylo?” Sasa asked when his head once again turned towards the Nilar group. “You keep looking at them.”

“I don’t know,” Kylo squinted at Kane Nilar. There was something about him. “I just feel something’s off.”

Berd and Doxl exchanged a look.

“Do you want us to go pull them, Sir?” Marks asked.
“No, we’ll wait and see what happens,” Kylo said. “But if any of them move to leave during the presentation, Sasa, I want you to take Berd and Doxl and go after them.”

“Just the three of us?” Berd inquired.

FN-2187 narrowed his eyes, “Sir… perhaps you should send more soldiers to accompany Master Sasa?”

Kylo caught his meaning, “Good thought, FN-2187. Marks, I want you to take your squad with the Knights. FN-2187, I want you and your squad with me. If they split up when they leave, split into two groups.”

FN-2187 leaned over to Marks, “Don’t leave Sasa alone with any Knight of Ren who isn’t Wiln or Kylo.”

“Oh you?” Marks teased.

“Don’t even joke about that,” FN-2187 shuddered. “I’m not ready to be a Knight.”

“Well, physically you are, but mentally…”

Marks let the thought hang as the lights went down and Katha Sindal née Connix mounted the stage. She wore a headset and black, athletic-looking pantsuit, perfectly dyed blonde hair falling down pin straight on her shoulders, and she had a plastic looking smile on her face.

Poe leaned over to Kaydel, “She looks like she’s about to give a seminar on how to achieve your dreams with nothing but the power of believing in yourself.”

“Give her ten years,” she grinned as Poe slung his arm around her shoulders.

“Ladies and Gentlemen,” Katha’s voice was blasted through the room with more stereos than the mid-sized ballroom needed. A giant screen projected the logo of Kation Defense Holdings behind her. “Welcome to the first showcase of Kation Defense Holdings, the soon to be number one selling and top trusted name in defense systems and weaponry. In our first year alone of business we have already won twenty-seven safety standards and consumer satisfaction awards, and made net sales of over five million credits.”

The room clapped.

“Of course, at our prices that might not be saying much, but who can put a price tag on safety? But I still think those prices are going to make you smile.”

A door slammed shut and Paige instinctually turned to look. Two people in dark clothing had entered the room. They waved off Dacken’s attempt to give them an information packet and Sage’s offer to help them to a seat. Instead they chose to lean against the back wall.

Odd.

“We are the very first Connix family run subsidiary of Connix Industries, one of the top names in weapons manufacturing for thirty-eight years. For decades the name Connix is one people know to trust when they need a good blaster at their side. But unfortunately, until now we have not been thinking enough of the other side of the equation. A good blaster is a wonderful way to make an advance… but what about the times you don’t seek violence at all? What about when you want to stop the threat before it even starts?”
Paige nudged Evan and pointed at the two men at the back of the room.

“ Weird, right?” Paige asked.

“Yeah,” Evan frowned, subconsciously shifting his back forward to be in between Paige’s back and the men.

“Twenty-three years ago, my older sister, Kaydel Tokani née Connix lost her life to a terrorist attack.”

An image of the first Kaydel Connix flicked on screen.

“Thought she’d look more like you,” Poe whispered.

Kaydel shot him a shut up right now look.

“She left behind two sons, a devastated husband, a broken family-”

Kaydel snorted. The Anthea family was broken long before Kaydel I ever died.

“And a sister with a resolve to make something like that never happen again,” Katha had tears in her eyes. “What happened to my older sister was inexcusable.”

“But throwing your younger one out like garbage, totally on the up and up,” Karé muttered.

“Don’t forget the aunt,” Jaina added.

“So the day we buried Kaydel, I went to my father and told him that I was going to make something of my sister’s legacy.”

“So did my parents,” Kaydel joked to Snap. “They had me.”

On and on Katha went with her speech giving the expected presentation. She told all about the company’s history, the offerings, the prices, the safety tests, the awards, the sales…

It was a miracle half the Resistance group didn’t fall asleep.

FN-2187 had to kick Slip when he did.

After about forty-five minutes, Katha turned the stage over to her father, and Timor Connix greeted the crowd with a smile.

“Do we secure the doors now?” Sasa heard the whisper.

“Shut up!” someone hissed back.

She turned around to see the same men as Paige had spotted… and one had just smacked the other.

“We are a proud, loyal, transparent company,” Timor was droning on into a microphone. “I am so proud of my daughter, Katha for seeing this through to the end.”

“Kylo,” Sasa nudged him. She pointed to the men at the door, “Do you sense something… off about them?”

He frowned when he noticed a blaster hanging from the belt of one of the men, and the other… what was that round thing on his belt?
“And I guarantee every piece you receive from Kation Defense Holdings will be of equal or greater quality than that of Connix Industries products, or your money back.”

Snap too frowned when he saw the gun on the man’s hip. With the exception of the First Order, everyone had been patted down before they entered the ballroom. Sure, the Resistance group had their ways to hide weapons on their persons, and Jaina had snuck in and stashed some blasters under a few floor tiles last night… but people weren’t supposed to have weapons in the room.

“Now, I know what some of you are thinking, that’s great and all, but is it worth the risk of doing business with you? In this mess of Republics, Empires, Resistances, Rebellions, and First Orders, where do you stand?”

Kaydel frowned. What was her father getting at?

“And I can assure you that we are a truly neutral company. We don’t step out of the conflicts the galaxy faces, we’re right on the front line with every side.”

Paige clenched her fists as she thought of what had been done Hays Minor by the First Order. How could someone be proud to stand with them?

Evan grabbed her hand and squeezed tight.

“My wife,” Timor smiled as an image of Adrinna Connix née Anthea was projected on the screen, “a lovely thing, isn’t she? Couldn’t come with us this week, too busy running Head Office of Connix Industries. Without her I would be nowhere.”

“So that’s your mom?” Poe lifted an eyebrow. “If that’s what I’m looking at with you in forty years, Babe, then I’m in for a treat. I mean, I knew Aletha was hot, but- Ow!”

“I’m not even going to tell you two to shut up,” Karé smirked.

“Now, for those of you who don’t know, my wife and I come from the planet of Mallarex. And on Mallarex we believe in the Five Sister Goddesses who bring luck and fortune to the world. It is considered a blessing to have five girls in our culture, and my wife is the eldest of five sisters. A true Goddess each one of them.”

Everyone heard Kylo and Poe snort in unison at the thought of Captain Alecta Anthea being dubbed a Goddess.

“Now, I didn’t have five girls, but I got close. One son to throw things off, but I’m not unhappy with my boy, Keth. Kindest soul you’ll ever meet.”

FN-2187 noticed the man seated behind him fidgeting with a bag at his feet.

He was also wearing an Imperial pin on his lapel.

And a brand on his forearm.

“But I had four girls, and between my wife’s sisters and my daughters, we have covered every possible spectrum of these conflicts the galaxy has and does face. We are neutral because our girls are everywhere.”

“Wait, what?” Poe blurted out.

Kaydel frowned, “What’s going on?”
The screen flicked to a picture of a woman who looked not unlike Kaydel and was wearing a New Republic Defense Fleet pilot formal uniform. Poe noticed that her rank patches and medals were really impressive. This girl was going to be a General one day. Not might be. Would be.

“My second youngest, Kyra Connix flies in the New Republic Defense Fleet as a Lieutenant General, and has nowhere to go but up. With her we prove our loyalty to the New Republic.”

“What is he doing?” Kaydel whispered in horror.

The photo changed to one that looked like a mix of Aletha and the flatter features of Adrinna. This woman was wearing an Imperial uniform and was posed in what Poe could have sworn was a hallway of the Death Star.

“Athena Anthea. The middle child of the five sisters, my beloved wife’s younger sister who died on the Death Star. But don’t worry, we don’t blame Luke Skywalker or Felicity Rhiaon for it. Athena is the testament of our loyalty to the Empire.”

“Bull fucking shit!” Poe exclaimed… or rather half exclaimed because after the first syllable Jaina clapped her hand over his mouth.

Next was a picture of Alecta Anthea, first in her Imperial gear, and then unhelmeted in Stormtrooper armor.

“Wait,” Evan frowned. “Is that picture right?”

Paige shrugged. She was too focused on the men at the door. Even more so now that two men had gathered near the emergency exit.

Evan held up his conference lanyard – which Paige had planted a camera in – and took a picture of the image of the armored Alecta Anthea.

“Alecta Anthea, a terrifying woman, my wife’s sister, born only a year after her. Alecta is a committed soldier in the First Order, and our proof of partnership to them… But we were not all Imperials and First Order lovers. No, some of us were Rebels.”

The Resistance group’s jaws dropped as the next picture flicked on screen.

“Is that Aletha?” Kaydel stared in utter disbelief.

“Oh my God,” Poe lifted his watch which could also secretly snap and store a small number of pictures. “Nalto’s so going to want to see this. What is she, seventeen?”

“Why is she talking about Aletha?” Snap asked.

“Aletha Anthea,” Timor said, “my youngest sister-in-law, joined with the Rebels at nineteen and spent her life as a doctor helping the misfortunate. We love her, are proud of her, and stand by her no matter what.”

“Well, the first sentence was right,” Poe conceded as Timor explained Aletha was their connection to the Rebellion.

“Oh God,” Kaydel whispered.

“I know, it’s a horrible thing to claim they love and stand by Doctor Kymeri,” Snap said.

“No, you don’t understand.” Kaydel shot them all scathing looks, “They said they had connections to everyone. Including the Resistance.”

“So?” Jaina asked.

Kaydel cocked her head and said pointedly, “Who do we know that’s in the Resistance that’s connected to them?”

A horrified silence fell over the group.

“Babe,” Poe whispered. “Run!

Kaydel and Snap shot out of their seats the second her image flicked on screen.

“Kaydel Ko Connix, my youngest girl, named for her older sister who died before they could meet, and a proud member of the Resistance.”

“Fuck!” Kaydel winced.

“Go,” Snap pushed her forward. “Go. Move!”

“Out the back way,” Poe ordered as Snap and Kaydel scrambled forward, tripping over very confused people. It was only Jaina’s hand on his shoulder that was stopping him from racing off with Kaydel.

Sasa, who had been finding the presentation frightfully boring, sat up straight at Kaydel Ko Connix’s picture.

“Is that Dania?” she exclaimed.

Kylo blinked, “Yeah, I think…I think it is.”

In perfect unison, their heads snapped over to the Nilar group. Dania and her bodyguard, Thon were making a very suspicious and quick exit. Dania’s husband seemed to be urging them to move fast.

And then Kane Nilar’s head turned just a little too far.

Even across a ballroom, extra hairy, and bearded, Ben Solo knew the face of Poe Dameron.

…Okay, the Force helped a little.

“Dameron,” Kylo growled. He turned to the others, “Everyone move! We have Resistance members present. You know your positions.”

“Oh, fuck!” Poe exclaimed as the First Order started to move. “We’ve been compromised. Everybody move!”

Figuring there was no point to secrecy now, Jaina turned and yelled to the crowd, “EVAN! PAIGE! RUN!”

They sprang to their feet immediately and booked it towards the main exit.

“Wait, not that one,” Paige pulled Evan’s arm to guide them away from the main exit. “I don’t trust those men.”
Evan wordlessly pivoted towards the emergency exit.

“And that’s why you should trust us…” Timor looked around in confusion at the suddenly shouting and movement. “We’re truly neutral because it’s bad enough to have one woman mad at me, so if we side with one party above the other, then I’ll have five. And five women mad at you is a… nightmare.”

He glanced down at Katha.

She looked as lost as her father.

“Ladies and Gentlemen,” Katha scaled the stage, “the presentation isn’t over. We were just about to demonstrate our technologies.”

She gestured to the tables in front of the tables laden with weapons both of the Kation Defense Holdings and Connix Industries variety.

But no one was listening to her.

“Groups, split up!” Kylo ordered. “Knights of Ren and MK squads go after the girl. FN squad with me.”

He locked eyes with Poe.

“Dameron’s mine.”

“Oh shit,” Poe muttered.

He just sprung to his feet and having no other real option, picked up his chair and just chucked it at the First Order.

Poe wasn’t anywhere near close enough to hit them, but it did cause a bit of a commotion that gave Karé and him time to pull out their concealed blasters and for Jaina to spring for the hidden cache.

Paige and Evan slid the last few feet across the ballroom tile only to find those two other men blocking the emergency exit.

“You gotta move!” Evan exclaimed.

“I’m not going nowhere,” one of the men shook his head. “Now get back in your seat.”

Evan’s eyes narrowed, “I will move you if I have to.”

The men laughed and pushed Evan, “You’re not going to move me.”

“You’re right,” Paige cut in. “I am.”

He turned just in time for Paige to clock him across face, knocking him to the ground. She immediately pivoted and kicked the other in the face, forcing him to fall back.

They hit the ground with a thud and a groan.

Evan blinked, “That… That was really hot.”
“Really?” Paige smiled, taking a step closer to him.

“Yeah,” he grinned, wrapping his arms around her waist, “it makes me really—”

One of the men suddenly grabbed at Evan’s ankles. In unison he and Paige kicked them in the face.

“Later?” Paige asked.

“Later,” he nodded.

Together they kicked the men again, lunged down, took their blasters, and pointed them at the men.

“Not another move,” Paige warned as the men realized they had been bested.

The men held up their hands, but the sound of blasters cocking reached their ears. Paige and Evan looked up to see that Marks had broken off from Sasa’s group, leading Duck and Tone with him. Weevil was off tailing Sasa, Berd, and Doxl.

“Come on, let’s go!” Evan grabbed her hand and they crossed through the door.

The fire alarm went off the second they opened it. People leapt to their feet and the scene inside the ballroom was absolute madness.

Marks shouted to his men over the alarm, “Come on! After them!”

The Stormtroopers barrelled forward certain that things couldn’t get worse.

Marks came to a stop so fast both Tone and Duck slammed into him. It didn’t take long for them to figure out why. Standing before them were the pair of Resistance soldiers frozen in shock, blasters lax at their sides.

Because the pathway between the ballroom emergency exit and the garden… was completely riddled with explosives.

Snap and Kaydel had nearly made it to the back exit when someone grabbed her arm and pulled her.

“Aunt Kayko!”

She suddenly found herself face to face with her nephew, Dacken.

Kaydel blinked.

Then Kaydel swung her fist.

She landed him flat on his ass.

“Nice to see you too, Aunt Kayko,” Dacken groaned, holding his face.

Snap had to hold her back from jumping on him, “Oh no, you don’t. Let’s get out of here!”

“No, wait!” Dacken cried, scrambling to his feet. “Kayko, look I’m sorry for being a dick when we were kids, but—”

“Dacken!” she rounded on her heel, “now is really not the time! So, can you pencil me in to come kick your ass later?”

He quirked a smile, “Hey, you got badass.”

Kaydel lunged forward but another arm grabbed her.

“Ko?” Timor Connix pulled her back. He looked stunned as she tried to squirm out of his grip, “Oh, Sweetie, I thought it might be you, but I didn’t think it was possible.”

“Let me go!” Kaydel threw him off.

Timor moved to grab her arm, but Snap stepped between them and shoved Timor back. Snap had managed to draw his concealed blaster and was pointing it at Timor.

“Touch her again and I fire,” he warned.

Kaydel took the time to pull her own blaster from her boot and point it at Dacken.

“I hate you, Dacken,” she growled. “You messed me up and got away with it.”

“I know,” he hung his head, “I’m sorry.”

She took a deep breath, “I don’t forgive you. Now we’re going to go, and you people won’t follow.”

“Ko,” Timor started.

“Shut it!” Snap cocked his blaster.

“We’re going,” Kaydel repeated.

“But you can’t!” Dacken objected.

Kaydel grinned, “Watch me.”

With a haughty smirk she glanced over to the back-exit door and pulled on the handle.

It didn’t open.

Dacken sighed and put his hands up in surrender, “I mean it has a lock code. That’s what I’ve been trying to give you.”

Snap pointed his blaster at Dacken, “Then unlock the door.”

Free hands still held up when applicable, Dacken revealed a hidden panel on the wall and started typing a code.

“Ko?” another voice called.

“Oh for the love of…” Kaydel rolled her eyes and turned her blaster on the very confused looking Katha, followed by Telon and Sage. “I’m kind of busy right now, Kat.”

“What’s going on?” Katha exclaimed.

“Undercover Resistance mission to check out your company, but no one knew it was affiliated with Connix Industries. Your little slideshow blew my cover.”

“Told you not to do the picture thing,” Telon told his father-in-law.
Timor shrugged.

“Ko…” Katha looked lost.

“No,” Kaydel held up her blaster, “don’t call me that. Don’t call me Ko, don’t call me Kayko, don’t call me Kaydel Ko. My name is Kaydel… and you people have wrecked everything for me once more.”

Timor blinked, “Ko-”

He caught her look.

“Kaydel,” he corrected, “I can’t believe this. You’re really here. I’ve missed-”

“No, you haven’t,” Kaydel spat. Why wasn’t Poe or Paige or Aletha at her side right now to give her the strength she sorely needed? “You went up there and lied saying you love me and miss me and are proud of me… But if that were true, you never would have abandoned me.”

“Kaydel, your mother-”

“Don’t blame her, because you still went along with it,” Kaydel shook her head. “But doesn’t matter anymore because I have a new family now. One that includes Aunt Aletha.”

Timor blinked, “You’ve seen Aletha?”

“Yeah… and in two years she’s been more of a mother to me than you were a father in seventeen. But maybe it’s true, maybe you do love and miss me and are proud of me. And if that’s true, then you’ll let Snap and I walk through that door and not tell the First Order.”

The Connix family exchanged a series of looks.

“Okay,” Timor agreed. “We’ll let you go.”

Kaydel froze, “What?”

“You can leave,” Timor repeated. “Go, while you have the chance. We’ll cover you however we can.”

She wanted to smile but was too afraid to do so.

“I don’t believe it,” she whispered.

“Believe it, Little Sister,” Katha took a step forward. “I’m sorry about everything that’s happened, Kaydel. I thought by telling you about Aunt Aletha I could have spared you her fate… but that wasn’t meant to be. You need to go be the rebel you were born to be. But… before you go, can I have a hug?”

Kaydel hesitated, but with a nod from Snap, she accepted the offer.

The hug was so warm and cozy.

“I’m sorry, Kaydel,” Katha whispered.

“It’s okay,” she squeezed her sister. “I know what Mom’s like.”

“I’m not apologizing for Mom kicking you out.”
“Then what are you apologizing for?”

Katha suddenly twisted Kaydel’s wrist, forcing her to drop her blaster. As she screamed in pain, Katha slammed a knee into her stomach, grabbed her blaster, and looped a weird thin piece of chain around her wrist.

When Kaydel’s brain finished registering the attack she understood what had happened.

Katha had handcuffed her.

“Sorry, Ko,” Katha said, “but Aunt Alecta would have killed my kids if she knew I helped you escape.”

“Oh, well, that makes it okay then,” Snap pointed his blaster at her.

He heard the cock of a blaster and found Telon holding one to his head.

“We have a family business of weapons manufacturing,” Telon grinned as Katha also pointed Kaydel’s blaster at Snap. “Of course, we’re always armed.”

“What the hell is even this stupid chain?” Kaydel squirmed, trying to prevent Katha from closing it properly.

“New Kation technology,” Katha smirked as she secured the chain closed. She held Kaydel’s blaster confidently at Snap, “A chain strip that has an end that hooks onto various parts of the strap for a portable, less obvious pair of handcuffs. $32.95 a pair if the Resistance is interested.”

She yanked on Kaydel’s arm, forcing a cry from her sister. Katha dragged her to the wall and chained the other end to one of the open flame lanterns.

“You’re a bitch,” Kaydel glowered at Katha.

“No, Kyra’s the bitch of our generation,” she slung an arm around her daughter’s shoulder and guided Sage to the exit. “I just know what’s important to me. HEY! FIRST ORDER! KNIGHTS OF REN!”

She gave a loud whistle and waved at Sasa, Berd, Doxl, and Weevil.

Katha looked back at her glowering sister, “Good luck, Sis… You’re going to need it.”

And with that, Katha, Sage, and Telon disappeared through the back exit.

Timor and Dacken were left looking very confused.

“Yeah, no, Aunt Kyra just lost the title of Bitch Aunt,” Dacken agreed with Kaydel.

“Dacken, language!” Timor scolded.

He raised a brow, “I’m a recovering drug addict and you’re scolding me for my language?”

“Kid, you set my hair on fire as a child and he didn’t raise his voice,” Kaydel tugged on her handcuff. “My sister just chained me to the wall and left me to be tortured and die, and he said nothing. This man does not have the proper priorities. Now can somebody get me out of these handcuffs?”

Timor and Dacken exchanged a look.
“She had the only key, didn’t she?” Snap asked.

“Yeah,” Dacken nodded.

Kaydel rolled her eyes, “Fuck.”

By that time, most people had cleared the hall. The mystery men at the doors had disappeared into the crowd, most leaving by either the emergency exit or the main exit.

But Poe Dameron wasn’t leaving, not until Kaydel Ko Connix was out safe.

And currently she appeared to have been handcuffed to the wall… so that might be a while yet.

“How the hell did that happen?” Karé rubbed her eyes, trying to figure out if she really was seeing Kaydel handcuffed to a lantern.

“At this point I don’t ask,” Poe shrugged.

They had their blasters ready, but there were still quite a few bystanders in the room, so they wouldn’t open fire yet.

“Where are Jaina with those weapons?” Poe asked.

A chair whipped across the room and slammed straight into Poe’s knees.

He groaned as he laid face first on the ground, “Alright… now we get to it.”

Poe didn’t need to hear Kylo’s saber to ignite to know he was there. He just rolled and kicked Ben Solo right in the face.

Kylo stumbled back, a little taken by surprise, but right back to business as quickly as possible. He swung his saber down at Poe, but Poe dodged and rolled right under the rows of chairs.

“I am so thankful now that Luke taught me to fight someone using a lightsaber,” Poe declared from under the chairs.

Kylo used the Force to sweep the first row of chairs aside. Poe was just laying underneath with hands pillowing his head.

“Hey, Ben,” Poe grinned. “Long time, no see.”

The lightsaber swung down at him, but Poe rolled again to dodge.

Poe spared a glance to the side to see Karé taking on three Stormtroopers by herself. Jaina literally slid up next to Karé armed with the new weapons and joined Karé in her melee.

Damn, they were good.

He narrowly missed the saber at his head.

“Oh, come on,” Poe laughed as Kylo ripped away the next row of chairs. Poe was already five rows in. Literally crawling away from a Knight of Ren wasn’t his finest hour, but hey, whatever kept him alive. “After all these years, you’re not even going to greet me? We haven’t seen each other since we were kids.”

“We saw each other a few years ago, Dameron.”

“Oh right, when you gassed your own mother.”

Kylo swung his saber down and cleaved a chair in half. He left a disappointing burnt hole in the floor. What he thought had been Poe’s feet was simply an abandoned bag.

“Come on, Solo,” Poe laughed daring to pop his head up to taunt Kylo with his true location. “Not even one passing comment of how I’ve faired over the years?”

“Poe Dameron,” Kylo took in his long hair and unkempt beard, “you look terrible.”

He grinned, “And you look like your father.”

Kylo’s saber caught Poe’s throat a little that time. Not enough to do damage but enough to make his throat sting like hell.

“Fuck! That was a good one,” Poe cried.

Kylo grinned, “Thanks.”

He threw the chair aside with the Force, but Poe had bet on that. He planted his elbow on the ground and leveraged his weight to give a powerful kick upwards. It sent Kylo tumbling back over two chairs.

And it made him drop his lightsaber.

Poe sprung for it. When Kylo pushed himself off the floor, he was pinned to it by the red crackle of his own blade.

“You stole this from Rey Rhiaon Skywalker,” Poe pointed the lightsaber at Ben’s throat.

Kylo laughed, “Put it down, Dameron, it’s not a toy.”

“You have no idea what you’re doing with that weapon.”

“No… but I bet I’m going to have a lot of fun.”

Kylo turned and shouted, “SASA!”

A saber flew across the room into Kylo’s outstretched hand. He ignited it just in time to block Poe’s shot.

“Oh yeah, Solo,” Poe grinned. “Let’s do this.”

A pair of men ran along the shadows of the hotel. The area was chaos as people were trying to figure what was going on. The fire alarm still blared loudly, and the local authorities were discussing whether or not to intervene. Technically in the broadest sense of the term, the Resistance was a governmental authority and the First Order did not have jurisdiction over Nixrye.

But both parties were causing one hell of a confusing mess.

And that worked in the favor of the two men who slunk in the shadows wearing old Imperial uniforms but had Crimson Dawn brands on their wrists.

The men came to a stop and one pulled out a comm.

“Lady Qi’ra, come in?”

“Yes, Revenor?”

“Everything’s in place. We’re ready to fire.”

“Hmm… wait until the top of the hour.”

“But Lady Qi’ra-”

“Make it more memorable to sell the lie.”

The man bowed his head, “Yes, Lady.”

“And at the top of the hour?” the other man asked.

Qi’ra smiled on her end, “Blow them all to hell.”

Poe was pretty impressive for never having really wielded a lightsaber in his life. Sure, Luke and Reine showed him how to spar, but not with a real, you could cut your hand off lightsaber. He tried to remember everything Luke had taught him as he clashed and slashed with Kylo.

But he was doing good. Really good.

Or was Ben just terrible?

“I can’t believe you’re still doing the fucking spinning thing,” Poe laughed as the blades locked. “You know you’re going to lose a hand like that?”

Perhaps Poe had a little too much fun. He jumped up on the back of a chair, only for it to immediately topple over, sending him sprawling to the ground. But Poe Dameron was quick, he slashed Kylo’s borrowed blade from his rightful blade, and Poe was back on his feet.

They circled each other like feral dogs, blades extended and sizzling.

“You know this is a lot fun,” Poe said.

“Yeah,” Kylo grinned, “but you know what? I think I’ve had enough fun with you.”

He looked towards the back exit, Poe frowning, eyes following to Berd and Doxl with Snap, Timor, and Dacken on their knees and lightsabers pointed at them. Karé and Jaina were still scrapping against the four Stormtroopers.

“Wouldn’t you agree, Sasa?” Kylo added loudly.
Then came an agonizing scream. A bloodcurdling scream. A scream that dropped Poe’s heart to his stomach.

Kaydel’s scream.

The scream she gave as she hung from the lamp fixture, writhing in pain under Sasa’s Force Lightning.

“You bitch!” Poe roared trying to race towards her.

He was jerked to a stop by Kylo using the Force.

“You love her,” Kylo chuckled. “I can sense it. It’s not just a role you’re playing of pretend husband and wife. You love this girl.”

Kaydel screamed again as another bolt hit her body.

Kylo smirked, “What will you do if I comply?”

Poe’s eyes flicked around the room. To Snap. To Kaydel. To Karé. To Jaina. But he knew it didn’t matter what they thought… he knew what he was going to do.

“If I surrender,” Poe began, “will you let her go?”

Kylo extinguished his lightsaber and folded his arms, “You’ll come with me? No fight?”

“As long as you play fair, yes. I will put down my weapon and come with you.”

“No! Poe, don’t!” Kaydel yelled.

“It’s okay,” he promised her. “I’ll be okay.”

“No, you won’t. Don’t do this!”

Poe turned back to Kylo, “You let her go, and you let my friends go—”

“I’ll let the Connix ones go and the male who was with your girl.” Kylo looked back at Karé and Jaina, “But the other girls stay. You wanted to split up into teams? Then we fight that way. Agreed?”

Poe turned off Kylo’s lightsaber and set it on a chair.

“Agreed.”

Kylo extinguished Sasa’s lightsaber and threw it across the room. It flew into her hand and she ignited the crimson blade, making a clean slash through the handcuff.

Kaydel hit the ground hit. She didn’t linger on the pain, instead her eyes automatically going up to meet Poe’s gaze across the room.

“You have two minutes,” Kylo declared.

“Poe,” Kaydel whispered.

“Kay, Baby, go,” Poe ordered.
“No,” she refused.

“Babe, go.”

“A minute fifty,” Kylo said.

“Kaydel, go!” Poe demanded.

“No!” she refused. “I’m not going without you!”

“I’ll be fine. I promise.”

“You can’t promise that,” her eyes filled with tears.

Kaydel smiled and nodded, “108.”

“I’ll be fine. Now please… go.”

Silence clung to the room as Kaydel struggled to her feet. Dacken reached for her to check if she was alright, but Kaydel pushed him away. Timor did allow Snap to help him to his feet though.

“Wait,” Timor looked between Poe and Kaydel in confusion, “are those two actually a couple?”

“Honestly, they might even be engaged at this point,” Snap shrugged. “Don’t remember, but yeah, they’re a rather infamous couple in the Resistance.”

“Don’t you mean famous?”

“No, infamous. If you heard some of the stuff they got up to, it would turn your hair white.”

“A minute thirty!” Kylo declared. “You’re wasting time.”

“Right,” Snap nodded. He looked over longingly at his wife, “Karé-”

“I’ll be fine,” Karé said. “Poe’s got my back.”

“Promise?” Snap fixed him with a look.

“You cover my girl, I cover yours.” Poe caught Karé’s look, “And vice versa. Karé will watch Kay’s man, and Kay will watch hers.”

“Damn straight,” Karé grinned.

He turned his eyes back to Kaydel, “Be safe, Mi Amor.”

“I love you, Poe Dameron.”

“I love you too, Kaydel Ko Connix… Stupid name and all.”

Timor frowned, “I don’t think it’s stupid.”

Kaydel rolled her eyes and grabbed his wrist, “Come on.”

Snap, Kaydel, Timor, and Dacken raced through the exit. It was a dark hall that led them far from the ballroom. They skidded to a stop when the hallway suddenly split into two. Unfortunately, there was no signage to direct them and they couldn’t find a sign of Katha and her family.

“Well?” Kaydel asked Dacken and Timor. “Which way?”

“I think they said in the event of an emergency to go to the right,” Dacken said.

They raced forward to the right.

But they should have gone left.

“Sasa?” Kylo looked to her a minute later. “Take Berd, Doxl, and Weevil. Bring me back their heads.”

Something tackled Kylo to the ground.

“Surprise,” Jaina Fel said to him the same way he had the day he scarred her arm. Then she pulled out a vibro blade and stabbed him in the leg.

He cried out, but his scream was drowned out by hers when Sasa threw her highest voltage of lightning at Jaina. She flopped to the ground helplessly, and Kylo used the Force to slam her into the chairs like a bowling ball at pins.

“Go!” Kylo ordered Sasa. “Get them! Kill the other three, but bring me Dameron’s girl alive.”

Sasa nodded eagerly and departed with the others.

“You hear that, Dameron?” Kylo looked around the room for Poe. “We’ll make your girl suffer. Maybe give her to her aunt and finish off with a Rhiaon special.”

A powerful blaster bolt hit him, knocking him off his feet, hitting the ground hard. Kylo groaned and pushed himself up to see Poe Dameron standing at the table of Connix weapons holding one of the new blasters.

Poe frowned at the weapon, “Damn it! Lowest stun setting! I wanted kill. Who built this display?”

He yelped when Kylo used the Force to grab Poe by the ankle and drag him across the room to Kylo. When he reached Kylo – who was still flat on his back, fighting the twinges of a stun blast – Poe slammed his elbow into Kylo’s face and threw himself on top of him.

The boys started scrapping like a much deadlier version of the roughhousing they used to do as kids.

Jaina groaned as she laid on the groan, sizzling and sore. Her head flopped helplessly to her side as she wished her revenge plan had gone a little smoother. She didn’t have the energy to move.

All she did was just stare at the abandoned bag on the floor next to her head.

Kylo had Poe pinned to the ground, choking him with his bare hands. Poe fought against his grip but Kylo was using the Force to his advantage. Kylo wasn’t squeezing hard enough to outright kill him, but definitely enough to make him suffer.

“And to think,” Kylo smirked, “you once thought we could be friends.”

Defiant to the last, Poe gasped out, “Why would I ever be friends with a monster like you?”

“Oh, you don’t even know why I’m a monster,” Kylo growled. He released Poe’s throat slightly, and bent in uncomfortably close to Poe, “How about this? How about I tell you a secret? A very, very dark secret. How about I tell you exactly what made Luke Skywalker break and walk away from everything he loves?”

Poe grunted, trying to shake Kylo off of him.

“How about I tell you…” Kylo whispered, “what I did to Felicity Rhiaon’s body?”

Poe stopped moving.

“What… What hap- You’re going to tell me what happened to her body?”

“Oh yes, Poe, after all you and I are such good friends,” he squeezed Poe throat. “Do you want to know the truth? Do you want to know what happened to her?”

Poe grunted, “Yes.”

“Say it.”

“Yes!”

“Tell me you want to know what happened,” Kylo demanded.

“I want to know what happened to Felicity Rhiaon’s body!” Poe exclaimed.

Kylo chuckled and eased up on his grip, just slightly but he was still choking Poe.

“Alright, Dameron, I tell you,” Kylo Ren smirked. “You see when we tied her up, beat her, made her paralyzed, tortured her, gagged her, made her beg for her life, and shoot her in the head… well, it wasn’t enough.”

“I can imagine, Poe said dully.

Kylo just shook his head, “So, I thought to myself, how can I do more? How can I give one final humiliation to this horrible woman, give her what she truly deserves, and end it all on a satisfying note? And then it hit me. Felicity Rhiaon wanted to be remembered for her participation in the Death Star, so I thought… why not give her her own Death Star adventure? …Except this time there was no C-3PO or R2-D2 to save her.”

Poe’s eyes widened.

Wait… did that mean…

“That’s right Poe Dameron, I threw Felicity Rhiaon in the trash compactor.”

Poe blinked.

Silence.
So still and solid a silence that not even the wind dared to blow.

“You…” Poe whispered, “you what?”

“I threw her in the trash compactor… and hit compact.”

He tried to stop it, but at those words, Poe threw up a little in his mouth. Kylo turned out to be gracious enough not to want him to die from choking on vomit, so he rolled Poe’s body on his side and released his throat. At first Kylo thought Poe might attack, but instead Poe gagged, cried, and panted as he processed the horrifying demise of one of his closest family friends.

And Kylo wanted to make sure he knew truly how horrifying it was.

“Imagine it,” Kylo whispered, “her body falling all that way down and down into murky cold water, darkness, jagged metal. Then the walls, that tremor and slow creak to her doom. No turning back, no changing what had been done. And then, walls reach her and start to press.”

Poe slammed his eyes shut trying to fight back the image.

“Imagine it, what happens when those walls crush her. Bones snapping, organs rupturing, insides becoming outsides as the walls mash her up until she’s nothing but bloody… soggy… pulp.”

A fleck of spit hit Poe in the face.

“And then I spaced her,” Kylo laughed. “I spaced the bitch so that Uncle Luke still couldn’t even have that much. Oh, and you know what happens to things that go into space.”

Poe’s fist tightened so hard he was shaking.

“I put Felicity Rhiaon right where she belonged. Where she’s always belonged. In the trash… right where Uncle Luke found her.”

Images of Felicity Rhiaon’s loving and kindness flashed through Poe’s mind. Images of Felicity holding her little Rey. Images of those simple kisses Luke liked to sneak from her. Images of that one corner upturned smirk that Poe would never see again.

Images of the woman who had been there after his own mother had been taken.

“We treated her exactly as she deserved,” Kylo continued to taunt. “He beat up that trash, forced her to her knees, and shot her in the head. Just like she deserved. Just like trash deserved.”

Kylo paused.

“…Just like your mother deserved.”

Poe slammed Kylo on the ground with the agility of a tiger and began punching him in the face as hard and as many times as physically possible. Kylo’s blood stained his fist, but Poe didn’t care about his promise to Kaydel.

Poe Dameron was ready to kill Kylo Ren.

If the Connix group plus Snap had gone down the left hallway, it would have led them to the gardens that held a camouflaged saferoom. That was where Katha, Telon, and Sage were hiding until things died down.

The right hallway led them straight into the chaotic hotel lobby.

“Come on,” Kaydel lead them to hide behind a pillar that supported a grand staircase. The group panted as they tried to stay out of sight, “Okay… we need to make a plan.”

Before they could even get their bearings, a woman asked, “Would you like a suggestion, Dania?”

They heard the cock of a blaster and the snap hiss of three lightsabers.

Slowly, the group turned and saw Weevil with a blaster pointed at them, standing next to Sasa, Berd, and Doxl Ren, all ready to kill.

“I suggest you just surrender,” Sasa gave a sickly sweet smile.

“Come on, Sasa,” Kaydel faked a smiled. “I thought we were friends.”

“So did I, but it seems that-”

Sasa stopped, her eyes widened at something over Kaydel’s shoulder. Carefully, Kaydel turned around and she too stood in wide-eyed frozen shock.

There was a bomb planted on the pillar, only inches from Kaydel’s head.

“Get down!” Sasa and Kaydel shouted together.

But it was too late.

FN-2187 was very impressed the way Karé Kun was able to down hand-to-hand combat with his team. She was so impressive that no one really noticed when she backed him into the chair and he tripped.

He groaned. The damn man’s bag behind him had been left on the floor. His training kicked in, and in order to avoid being trampled by Karé and the others, FN-2187 crawled underneath the chairs and stayed still.

Then his eye caught sight of another bag. It was about ten chairs away but a completely identical bag.

Then he saw another, two rows back. And another three rows up and six to the left. And another. And another. And another.

His heart pounding, FN-2187 tore open the bag and confirmed his fear.

It was a remote activated explosive.

The place was rigged to blow.

FN-2187 scrambled as fast as he could from the chairs and tackled the first person he saw, ironically helping Kylo Ren as request by unintentionally knocking Poe Dameron to the floor.

Kylo leapt to his feet, “Two-One, where have you-”
And then he sensed it.

FN-2187 and Kylo Ren locked eyes, and they screamed in unison:

“EVERYBODY DOWN!”

Then in moment the survivors would claim to have passed in slow motion, the ballroom, hotel lobby, and garden pathway blew up.

Chapter End Notes

Coming Up Next Chapter…

A Momentary Truce
Crimson Dawn’s attack has left our heroes dead, damaged, and divided. As they struggle to find a way back to each other and off the planet, First Order and Resistance are forced to work as teams. But how long can patience last when Poe learns the identity of Sasa’s favorite bodyguard? How long can prejudice last when Kaydel notices something wrong with Sasa? And how long can Kes Dameron last before breaking into laughter when Han runs into his ex-girlfriend?

So, yeah, that’s what happened to Felicity. Ben Solo threw her in the trash compactor.

Doesn’t that make Han’s line later about throwing Phasma into the trash compactor so much more fun?
A Momentary Truce

Chapter Summary

Han Solo runs into his ex-girlfriend, Evan Tharel yells at a lot of people, and someone loses a leg, leading to a questionable battlefield medical decision.

Chapter Notes

Due to popular request, the summary of this story has been changed to reflect the fact that TFA doesn't come into the story into much, much later than originally advertised. I'm sorry, when I originally wrote the summary, I genuinely thought it wouldn't take so long.

Sorry for stalling between updates. There was about thirty-three characters moving between about ten locations and certain characters couldn't meet, and so and so died and character X had this injury, and there's this problem to solve, and this room is located next to this room.

I had to write out about six different versions of just plotting where everyone was and where they were going. I kid you not, I drew a map and used Lego to figure this out.

Oh God, I saw Mamma Mia: Here We Go Again and the whole time I watched Hugh Skinner as young Harry, all I could think is "that is Evan. What is Evan doing?" So if I randomly make Evan Tharel sing Waterloo, just ignore me. Also, I am officially addicted to the show he stars in, The Windsors. If you haven't seen it, go do that right now.

Not going to lie, this opening scene is one of my most favorite things I have ever written.

Trigger Warning for descriptions of gore in this chapter as people are being vividly described as killed via blowing up. There are also particularly brutal depictions of questionable battlefield first aid. Also, there is some brief discussion of drug use and a character having track marks. Finally there are some hints in a Force vision about Sasa suffering child abuse. I will warn you that that is an endgame piece of her background: she was physically abused as child at an age even younger than Rey was. Please let me know if this is triggering for you, and I can work out a way to accommodate you (such as giving you skip markers or even rewriting portions of chapters. Whatever you need.)

See the end of the chapter for more notes.

The Long Way Home

Chapter Fifty-Three

A Momentary Truce
Poe Dameron was dead.

He was lying on the floor of the ballroom dead.

He had to be dead. He couldn't be in so much pain and not be dead.

Well… actually he had been in this much pain before and survived. When he crashed his ship back when he was seventeen.

Of course, back then he had been on fire.

Was he on fire now?

…Maybe.

He couldn't tell.

His leg did tingle.

Poe Dameron was dead.

He had been killed by a bomb during an undercover mission gone wrong.

He had been fighting Kylo Ren when the blast knocked him to the ground.

A blast that yelled "get down."

…Wait. Blasts couldn't yell.

No, wait, that was right. He had been knocked down by a person. A black Stormtrooper had yelled for him to get down and pushed him out of the way.

That was a nice gesture.

It was probably only because Poe had been fighting Kylo Ren.

Kylo Ren. The murderer. The monster.

Ben Solo. His once upon a time long gone friend.

Kylo Solo.

Ben Ren.

Kylo Ben.

Ren Solo.

The monster who had thrown Felicity Rhiaon down a trash compactor.

Leia would be devastated.

She would also be devastated that Poe Dameron had died.

Poe Dameron was dead.
He screwed up this mission with his hatred for Ben Solo.
At least he took Kylo Ren with him.
Except he could hear Kylo breathing raggedly next to him.
Wait, how could he hear Kylo breathing?
Unless Kylo wasn't dead.
But how could a dead tell man tell if Kylo was breathing?
Unless…

Poe Dameron wasn't dead.
But he was about to be.
He could hear the crackle of fire and the cries of agony.
He could smell the burning of flesh and the air of smoke.
He could taste the flecks of ash and drip of blood.
He could feel the coldness of tile and the shards of shrapnel.
He could see nothing.

Poe Dameron wasn't dead.
But he was about to be.
So close. So close to the end.
So close to seeing his mother again.
He hoped she was proud.
Dad would be devastated, but he would be with them someday.
Poe just hoped his father would watch over Kaydel for him.

Kaydel.

Kaydel Ko Connix.
The woman he loved.
The woman pretending to be his wife.
The woman he wanted to be his wife.
Where was Kaydel?
Kaydel was gone.

Was she okay? Had she been hit by the bombs?
How far did the bombs hit? How far had they been rigged?

He had others with him.

They could be hurt.

They could be dead.

None were his concern.

Not in that moment.

Only Kaydel.

Where was Kaydel?

Was she hurt?

Was she worse?

Poe Dameron wasn't dead.

Kaydel Ko Connix might be.

His heart cried out at the thought.

His body made no move to prevent the grief.

Poe Dameron wasn't dead.

But he was close.

So close. Too close.

All he had to do was give in.

Give in to death and see his mother again.

Give in to death and see Kaydel again.

Unless she wasn't dead.

Poe Dameron wasn't dead.

Kaydel Ko Connix might not be either.

But Poe Dameron was almost dead.

It would be so easy to die.

Too easy.

It was living that was the struggle.

It was too hard to fight death.
Poe Dameron wasn't dead.
But he was about to be.
Poe Dameron wasn't dead.
He was going to be.
He had no choice.
…No.
Kaydel.
No, he wouldn't die.
He had to find Kaydel.
He had to get up.
Poe Dameron wasn't dead.
Kaydel Ko Connix might not be either.
He had to get up.
Get up.
Get up, Poe.
You have to get up.
Wake up, Poe.
You have to wake up.
Poe, wake up.
Come on, Poe.
Poe, wake up.
Wake up, Poe.
Wake up!

"Wake up!"
Poe jolted awake.
"Wake up, Poe! Wake up!" Karé was screaming in his face as she shook him hard.
"I'm up," Poe groaned, pushing her away from him. "I'm okay."
"Oh, thank God," Karé exhaled deeply, shifting back on her knees. "You're okay. Your cheek is sliced open and you're bleeding heavy from the arms, and your face is… you're going to be very upset when you look in the mirror, but the Stormtrooper who knocked you down protected you mostly from the from the blast. I couldn't find any shrapnel on you-

"Yeah, I'm fine, Karé," Poe took a series of deep breaths but coughed as smoke filled his lungs. "Though my legs really hurt. You have any idea why?"

Karé couldn't find the words, instead her eyes drifted down his charred pant leg and Poe discovered the truth.

"Was I on fire?" Poe exclaimed.

"Little bit," Karé nodded. She grimaced as she moved her arm which was torn up and bloody. "But I put you out. Mostly your clothing burned but your legs may have first degree burns. Other than that, you seem to be fine."

Poe just sighed and shook his head, "What about you?"

"Pretty good, except for the arm, and well…"

Karé pulled a face and looked down. Poe's eyes followed hers. Embedded in her leg was a nasty piece of metal.

"I can still move," Karé's face was covered in ash and blood, chunks of her hair burnt off too. "But it's painful."

"Don't take it out until we can get Evan to help you," Poe advised. He started to sit up as he struggled to clear the smoke from his lungs. "It may hurt, but it's going to be a bigger problem if you pull it out."

Karé cringed as she shifted her leg, "Now here's hoping Evan is alright."

Poe's stomach dropped as he thought about Evan and Paige. He couldn't muse that long as he suddenly started coughing so hard his face started to turn red.

"Keep low," a man's voice ordered. "There's a lot of smoke."

Poe looked over to see the black Stormtrooper who had knocked him down. The man was crouched over the body of Kylo Ren trying to rouse him.

The Stormtrooper was as shredded and bloody as them, but Kylo looked pretty untouched. He must of used the Force to protect himself. The only mark on him was a very large and bloody spot on his forehead where it looked like something had slammed into his head, knocking him out.

"Master Kylo," the man urged as he shook Kylo. "Come on, wake up. Wake up for me. Wake up for Sasa."

Kylo was breathing… but he wasn't waking.

"What?" Poe blinked as he pulled up his shirt to cover his mouth as a pseudo-filter for the smoke. He need to collect his bearings, "What happened?"

"Bombing," the black Stormtrooper said. "This place was rigged. Explosives placed under the chairs. There were some guys in here trying to trap us all. They're all dead now."

"What about the other people in the room?" Poe asked. "Your soldiers and our… Karé, where's Jaina?"
The Stormtrooper and Karé exchanged a look.

"Well…" Karé struggled to start, "um, Jaina was right next to one of the bombs and I… uh… well, I found her over there."

Karé gestured towards the shattered pile of ballroom chairs that was ablaze. Poe's stomach shifted when he realized that wasn't the end of Karé's answer. Taking a deep breath, Karé turned and pointed to a different spot across the room.

"And I found the rest of her over there," Karé said quickly. She bowed her head, "I'm sorry, Poe. Jaina Fel has been killed in action."

Clenching his fist, Poe slammed his eyes shut but forced back a sob.

"She… She died honorably," Poe struggled to say. He didn't know her well, but he never took losing someone on a mission well. He looked to the Stormtrooper, "What about your men?"

The Stormtrooper's face fell

"Well… two of mine survived," he indicated to two men huddled together bloody, broken but still alive. Then he pointed to a body lying on the floor, "I… uh…"

The Stormtrooper cleared his throat, trying to fight back tears.

Poe put his hand on the Stormtrooper's shoulder, "It's okay."

"I lost one," he choked out. The Stormtrooper hung his head, "He- He's gone."

"Your friend?" Poe rubbed the man's shoulder slightly to try and comfort him.

"Yeah," the Stormtrooper nodded. "Uh… Slip. He was never really the top of the class, but he was my teammate."

"I'm sorry for your loss."

Karé touched the Stormtrooper's other arm, "I am too. It's okay. You don't need to playact in front of us. Kylo doesn't need to know."

"What the hell are you two doing?"

Poe and Karé's heads snapped over to see Kylo Ren sitting up and looking very confused.

"Oh good, you're up," Poe said sarcastically.

Kylo narrowed his eyes at Poe.

"Two-One!" Kylo snapped and pointed to his side. "Here! Now!"

Quickly and quietly, FN-2187 obeyed.

"Report," Kylo ordered.

"FN-2199 and FN-2000 survived the bombing. All three of us have minimal injuries… FN-2003 was killed in action."

If Kylo noticed the sadness in FN-2187's voice, he didn't comment, "And the Resistance group?"
"Those two lived," FN-2187 pointed to Poe and Karé. "The other girl was killed."

"The oth-" Kylo frozen. For a moment, something very sad and contemplative passed over Ben Solo's face. "Jaina Fel… is dead?"

Poe nodded.

Whatever it was that Ben Solo felt, he fought very hard not to let Poe and the others see it. Maybe not full remorse, but there was something about Jaina dying that hurt Ben.

And then just as quickly as the moment came did Kylo Ren push it away.

Poe raised an eyebrow at the desperate way he asked the last name.

"I… um…" FN-2187 looked sad and frightened, "I can't get a hold of her. All comms are being blocked, and I'm not… strong enough to sense her."

Poe expected there to be a reprimand or an explosion of anger. Instead he was surprised by Kylo turning his attention instantly to reaching out into the Force. The whisper of Sasa slid from his lips as Ben Solo's eyelids blocked him from distraction and he focused his all of his energy into searching for that copper-haired beauty.

A smile quirked Poe's lips. Interesting… Sasa Ren was Kylo's first priority. Poe didn't know what to do with this information, but he was sure the Resistance could find a way.

"What do you see?" FN-2187 asked.

Kylo waited a second, and as the vision came to him, he whispered the name, "Sasa."

---

She was facedown on the ground, chunks of a staircase pinning her to the marble floor of what used to be a grand lobby. A blonde girl – Dameron's – was next to her and not moving.

Sasa was alive, but her breathing was ragged. Kylo could feel the pain coursing through her body; that numbness, the throbbing, the slight burning in her leg and collarbone.

"Sasa," he whispered her name.

It seemed enough to rouse her.

"Kylo," she moaned, her eyes fluttering open far too slowly.

Then came a cry of pain as she tried to move. He felt her weakly reaching for him in the Force and he held on to her presence as tightly as possible.

Kylo wished he could send Alyla to Sasa for comfort and help – the other Knights of Ren knew of his ghost but were wise enough not to ask questions. However, in order to get some peace during the trip he had allowed her to go visit the boy she called "her child" and thus was out of his reach at the moment.

Feeling secure enough that Sasa was at the very least alive, Kylo reached out to see who was around her that could help. He couldn't put names to most colours. Orange blossom was unconscious. Fallow was just barely stirring. Persimmon was having a panic attack. Smoke was in immense pain. Salmon and Oxblood were nowhere to be found.
He narrowed in on Russet.

"Berd," Kylo reached to the russet Signature. "Berd, do you hear me?"

The russet Signature pressed back against the Forest Green in acknowledgement.

"Help Sasa," Kylo ordered.

Then he saw Berd obeying.

"It's okay," he whispered as he helped prop Sasa up.

She was crying in pain as Berd observed the safest way to rescue her. It was one thing to have something fall on you, but a crash injury... sometimes removing the obstacle would lead to immediate death.

"Well?" Kylo demanded. "How is she?"

"...I think I can help her," Berd said. His hand stroked his shoulder and the other cupped her neck. "All I need to do is-"

The vision cut out.

Kylo couldn't sense Sasa or Berd anymore.

"Well?" the female Resistance soldier pushed.

He shot her a derisive look, "What are my visions to you?"

"Are you kidding me?" she shot back.

"God, Solo," Poe looked absolutely shocked at Ben's callousness. "We just want to know about our people. Are they safe? Are they alive?"

"What are their Force Signature colours?"

Poe frowned at him, "I'm not sure."

"Then how am I supposed to help you?" Kylo shot.

Poe opened his mouth to argue but stopped. Ben did have a point.

"Can you at least tell us if these explosions were confined solely to the ballroom?" Karé asked.

"Of course," Kylo said.

There was a pause as Poe and Karé waited for him to elaborate further. Kylo just smirked as they realized he wouldn't.

"You're a dick," Karé glowered.

FN-2187 looked between Kylo and the Resistance soldiers awkwardly.

"Master Ren?" he dared to ask. "What of our people?"

Kylo glanced at FN-2187, "Weevil's dead. I can't sense the other Knights of Ren, but I'm not certain if they've been killed. I was able to touch Sasa and Berd, but... something cut us off. We need to connect to their comms."

"I've tried," FN-2187 said, "like I said, something's jamming the signal."

"All comm signals," Karé added. "We can't contact our people either, which is a pity considering we brought a medical officer with us... and then sent him away from the fighting. Why did we think that was a good idea?"

"We didn't exactly expect the ballroom to blow up. Jaina said that Kation was using a blocker." Poe looked at the debris of what used to be the ballroom, "It'll be hell to find it among the rubble."

Kylo frowned, "That's odd... the Connix family don't typically use blockers. Captain Anthea wants us to able to contact her the second they break our deals."

"Looks like they wanted to break it in a major way this time."

"Excuse me?" Kylo glared at Poe. "You're seriously pinning this on me?"

"Nobody knew we were here," Poe shot back. "This has to be your doing."

"The First Order is well aware of threats like this and deal with them before they come to head. We were not the targets of this attack."

"Oh, I don't think you were the targets. I think you were the one targeting. Bombing a weapons conference seems right up the First Order's ally."

Kylo scoffed, "You would think I would do something as awful as this?"

There was a dark look that fell on Poe's face that Kylo Ren did not like one bit.

"Do I think you would do something as awful as this?" Poe repeated slowly. "Do I think you would do something as awful as this? You son of a bitch! You burned down Rornian, you slaughtered the Jedi, you hunted down Rey and Felicity like dogs, you shot Felicity in the head and threw her in the trash compactor, you mangled Diego Nalto because he called out your granddaddy issues, you tortured my girlfriend in front of me to get me to surrender, you gassed your own mother, you disfigured Reine Agim's face, murdered in cold blood the one woman who never gave up on you, and tried to murder your five-year-old cousin! Do I think you would do something as awful as this? What the FUCK do you think my answer is going to be?"

"Oh don't you dare stand there and try to act like the good guy. It's all my fault, isn't it? No one else is to blame about everything that has happened, isn't that right?" Kylo scoffed, "You just can't admit the truth: that if Rhiaon had just stayed on Rornian with Skywalker, their daughter might still be alive. That if all your friends weren't just sitting on their asses during the search, maybe one of them might have actually followed the Jakku lead and find them in time. Hey, maybe if you had thought it a cause worth joining you might have been able to find them instead of lollygagging in the day Skywalker learned his daughter died. Go ahead, stand there and blame me all you want... but let's not forget that you were the one who last spoke to Skywalker before he left. What exactly was it that you said to him that made him leave."

"Don't pin that on me. You killed his kid and wife, and threw Felicity's body in the trash compactor. You destroyed everything he cared about!"

"And yet... he didn't leave until he talked to you. So tell me, Dameron... what do you say?"
The memory was forced to the forefront of his mind. Poe couldn't stop himself to agonizing over the scene that had haunted him for years. What was the sentence that triggered Luke?

"Is it true what they're saying about Felicity? She's gone too?"

Luke nodded as he lowered his head, trying not to let Poe see his tears. BB-8 watching from the corner made a sad noise.

Poe sighed and dropped his own head, "I'm sorry. She was a good friend to me and my family. If you need anything at all."

"I know," Luke gave Poe a smile, but Poe could see the pain and falseness behind it. "Thank you."

He wanted so much to find a way to help Luke.

"Wait, can you give this to Leia?" Luke handed Poe the data chip with the Temple blueprints.

"Of course. Take care of yourself, Luke."

Take care of yourself, Luke.

Poe had told Luke to take care of himself, and that's exactly what he did. He thought only of himself and left everyone else to struggle to cope. Because of Poe, Luke Skywalker had decided to only take care of himself.

It was all his fault.

"Take care of yourself, Luke," Kylo chuckled. "Well, he certainly has done that, hasn't he?"

Poe's eyes widened as she realized why the memory had surfaced. Kylo Ren was picking through his mind.

"You know, I should thank you, Poe," Kylo continued to laugh. "Because of you and you alone, Luke Skywalker is not an issue anymore. He's broken. Beaten. He's never coming back."

Poe punched Kylo as hard as physically possible.

Kylo landed on the floor. He let out a growl and grabbed his lightsaber. Poe advanced forward as Kylo leapt to his feet, thumb over his ignition button.

"ENOUGH!" Karé screamed.

Suddenly the men were yanked away from each other, FN-2187 pulling Kylo and Karé dragging Poe.

"Enough!" she repeated. "Enough with this fighting!"

"Let me go," Kylo ordered FN-2187.
"Don't you dare!" Karé snapped. She gave Poe a rough jerk back as he fought against her, "And that's enough from you too."

"Let me at him," Poe growled.

"No! Listen to me! I get it, you two have a history and guilt and has done some pretty terrible things. I get it. But this is a waste of time. Out there right now are the people we love, and we don't know if they're even alive. This isn't our doing. This wasn't the Resistance and this wasn't the First Order. Someone is targeting either one or both of us. We're all injured. My leg is killing me, maybe even literally. But we have no communications, no medical help, no idea what's going on… what we do have is each other. I don't care who killed who or what eighteen-year-old Poe Dameron said to a grieving man. What matters right now is surviving this, and the only way we can go so is by working together. So please… for the sake of my husband, for the sake of Kaydel, for the sake of that girl both of you guys are so clearly infatuated with-

Kylo and FN-2187 exchanged an awkward look.

"For the sake of the ones who just died," Karé looked over to where the bodies of Jaina Fel and Slip lay, "…can we put this all aside for one day and just figure out a way to get out of here?"

Poe and Kylo had relaxed in the arms of their captors, but neither looked thrilled at the idea of a truce.

"And what happens afterwards?" Poe asked. "If we agree to help them, what happens when the threat is dealt with?"

"I'm not saying we have to end the war," Karé answered, "far from it… but can't we just a timeout?"

Poe sighed and looked over at Kylo, "I'm willing to make the call if it means saving my people. What about you? Or is this just some new Faclov gambit?"

Kylo's mouth was a thin line, "We are not the Empire."

"That's exactly right!" a voice shouted across the room.

All heads whipped towards the main entrance where about twenty soldiers were flooding into the room. The emergency exit leading into the gardens was nothing more than a pile of rubble and completely blocked off. Poe turned to the back exit where Kaydel and co had disappeared down. Even more soldiers – about ten – were blocking that exit.

The soldiers were pretty non-descript, a motley of brown, black, and grey pieces from a hundred different outfits cobbled together in similar enough looking outfits. Some looked a little less military than the rest, their weapons and gear too complicated and customized to be a uniform.

"Bounty hunters?" Poe whispered.

"Bounty hunters, mercenaries, workers of various crime syndicates," Kylo Ren had seen enough shady criminals thanks to his father to know the difference.

They were surrounded by the soldiers, all of them wearing the Imperial symbol somewhere on their bodies – necklaces, shirts, hats, tattoos, arm bands, or wherever else they could find a spot. Weapons were raised to Kylo, Poe, Karé, FN-2187, Nines, and Zeroes, but none of them moved to surrender.

"Look what we have here," the Leader – aka the one who had shouted across the room – grinned at Poe. "This one is that Resistance pilot, isn't he? The one with Rebel parents."

The Leader spat in his face.

Poe barely flinched, "That wasn't very nice."

"Who are you people?" Kylo demanded, his hand resting on his lightsaber but not yet moving to use it.

His other hand slipped to the other hip and Poe was surprised to see that Kylo was also carrying a blaster. Poe grinned a little. Apparently being the son of Han Solo wasn't something you could shake off entirely. Considering how well Han Solo and Kes Dameron had worked together in the war, maybe a truce between their sons wasn't the worst idea.

"We are the true believers," the Leader gave Kylo a haughty look. "We are the Emperor's men. We fight to restore the galaxy back to its glory and take it from the hands of the usurpers who killed our beloved monarch."

"So, Imperial Loyalists," Kylo said simply.

The Leader frowned a little at that, "We seek to return to the ways of the old. The galaxy was united under the Imperial, under Emperor Palpatine. Not this pretender, Snoke."

"Palpatine was short-sighted. The Supreme Leader knows how to rule with both love and fear. The First Order does not crush the galaxy like Darth Sidious did. He only chooses the best to be at his side, not like Sidious who used apprentices who fit a single need. The Knights of Ren are capable in every aspect and obey his every order."

"Obeying orders?" the Leader scoffed. "That's rich coming from the grandson of a murderer. Ben Solo, as the grandson of the traitor Darth Vader, he who plunged a lightsaber through the back of our glorious and merciful leading, I bestow his crimes onto you as his heir and sentence you to die for them."

"Oh, look at that, they're making you the heir of Darth Vader," Poe teased, "just what you've always wanted."

"And you," the Leader turned to Poe, "son of Shara Bey and Kes Dameron--"

"Call me Poe."

"I bestow the crimes of your parents upon you and sentence you to die for them. You and all of your companions."

"Is that so?" Poe smirked. He looked to Ben, "Well, it seems we've in a bit of a pickle."

"Indeed," Kylo's eyes flicked about the room. Then he met eyes with FN-2187 and nodded.

FN-2187 nodded back.

Kylo shifted his weight, still not moving for his weapon as many blasters were turned on him. Poe caught Karé's eye, but he too did nothing as a pair of men grabbed him the same time another pair grabbed Kylo.

"Ben Solo and Poe Dameron, you will be executed immediately in the name of the Magnificent Emperor Palpatine," the Leader said. "If you wish to go to the next world with a clean conscience, you may now confess your family's crimes."

Kylo just smiled, "Hey, Dameron?"

"Yes, Solo?" Poe replied casually as his arms were forced behind his back.

"Remember that move Skywalker and Rhiaon liked to do?"

"One, Two, Flip?"

"Yep."

"I remember."

"Good."

"Ben Solo and Poe Dameron," the Leader said, "may the Force have mercy on your souls."

He lifted his blaster.

Kylo ripped his hand from his captor's grip and used the Force to whip the blaster from the Leader and fling it to Karé.

"Now, Dameron!" Kylo yelled as Karé, FN-2187, Nines, and Zeroes opened fire on the Loyalists.

Poe and Kylo moved in perfect harmony. They bashed their elbows into their captors' solar plexuses. Both captors groaned and lurched forward only to have their heads slammed down to the floor. Then Kylo turned to face Poe, who put one hand on top the other and crouched down. Without a thought, Kylo stepped onto his hands and Poe thrust him up into a high leap. Kylo's foot smashed into the Leader's face and knocked him to the ground. The Leader groaned and started to sit up, but Poe shot him dead.

"Nice kick," Poe complimented as he shot down another soldier.

"Nice shot," Kylo lit his lightsaber and blocked a dozen blaster bolts aiming for his head.

His eyes widened fractionally, and suddenly he stabbed at Poe. Poe flinched but realized a second later that Kylo had actually aimed over his shoulder. The blade wasn't skewering Poe but rather a man who had been sneaking up behind Poe.

"Thanks," Poe said.

"Don't mention it," Kylo said.

"Of course not," Poe chuckled.

Kylo grabbed his shoulder, "No seriously, don't mention it. I have a reputation to maintain."

"Whatever you say compactor boy," Poe just shook his head. "Just know I will be informing your mother how into recycling you proved to be. Tell me, do corpses of your aunt-in-law go in the blue bin or green bin?"

Kylo shuddered at the thought of his mother finding out what he had done to Felicity.

It took about ten minutes, but soon enough the floor was littered with the bodies of all the Imperial Loyalists. Poe, Karé, Kylo, FN-2187, Nines, and Zeroes barely had a scratch more than their initial explosion injuries, though Zeroes was getting quite dizzy from his head wound.

"Well, that was fun," Karé said, panting a little as she double checked that everyone was indeed dead.

"Don't start the celebration," Kylo replied, "I sense more coming."

"Sir?" Nines shot Zeroes a confused glance, "what about the Resistance soldiers? Are we taking them into custody?"

Kylo sighed and looked at Poe, "I think working together is what's best for the moment. The higher our numbers, the safer we are."

"So what exactly are you saying?" Poe asked.

"I'm willing to offer a truce. A momentary truce. Once we have our people all accounted for, then things are back to normal. I can take you into custody and you can try to take us prisoner."

"I cannot wait to drag your ass back to your mother and see what she does to you," Poe smirked. "But you're right, a momentary truce is what's best."

Poe holstered his blaster and offered Kylo his hand to shake.

"Ben Solo, do we have a truce?"

Kylo grabbed it, "Deal."

They shook on it.

"Okay," Poe instantly dropped his hand. He wanted to touch this monster as little as possible. "Let's get to work. Do you know which way the others are going to come from, Solo?"

"I sense people from both the main entrance and the back exit. The side emergency exit is too blocked off to pursue our other people."

"Can't you do that with the Force?"

"I'd rather save my energy for fighting the inevitable fight than lifting rocks."

"Alright, I'll give you that."

"So, can we just make a break for it out the main doors?" Karé asked.

"Not quite," Kylo shook his head. "We're going to just trap ourselves if we go the long way around, but the back exit has a shortcut to the lobby which is where I saw Sasa at the very least, so that will be our best bet. But first what we need to do is find the comm blocker in this room and disable it."

"If it's even in the room," Poe pointed out.

"In case there's something wrong with the machine, who is the most tech savvy here?" FN-2187 asked.

"I've got a pretty good handle on machines," Karé raised her hand. "Sure, I'm no Jessika, but gotta work with what we have."
Everyone has to be able to do with the least one other job, in case someone gets hurt or killed during a mission.

- The Journal of Paige Tico

"You should team up with Ren," Poe nodded to Kylo. "He's got the Skywalker touch with mechanics. I can lead the defense."

"Sounds good to me," Kylo nodded. He looked to Karé, "What's your name?"

"Karé," she replied.

"How bad are your injuries?"

"Pretty banged up and got some shrapnel in the leg, but I can still fight for a while before passing out. Besides, I'm not fainting until I know the one I love is okay."

Kylo thought of Sasa, "Yeah... I get that."

Poe scowled and glanced at the black Stormtrooper. He just made a dramatic shaking head motion clearly signalling Poe not to ask questions.

"Okay..." Poe looked a little uncomfortable. "Ren, the main entrance will have more people coming through it?"

"Yes. Nines and Zeros, you should cover the back." Kylo nodded to FN-2187, "You're my best man, so you help Dameron with the front."

"Yes, Sir," FN-2187 saluted.

"Alright," Kylo went into battle mode. "There's a group heading our way at this moment. Karé and I will look for the machine and shut it down. When I gave the all clear signal we go out the back exit and make our way to the lobby. That's where I sense most of the others."

"Their Signatures are back?" FN-2187 asked. "Are they reaching out to you?"

Their eyes met and Kylo understood that FN-2187 was truly asking about Sasa.

"No," Kylo's voice was quiet. "I can't sense them at all."

Thinking of Kaydel, Poe's tongue touched the tooth with the Holo projector of her image.

He could do nothing but simply hope she wasn't dead.

Kaydel Ko Connix should be dead.

Instead she woke gasping, bleeding, and confused under the rubble of what used to be a grand staircase.

She should be dead. She was standing right next to a bomb that went off. By all accounts she would be dead.

Why wasn't she dead?
Kaydel panted as she surveyed the scene of devastation surrounding her. She had been standing right next to the bomb. How had she survived?

And then she remembered. Not only was she standing next to the bomb… she was also standing next to three Force Sensitives standing next to a bomb about to explode.

It had happened so fast; the blink of an eye, just a flash of white light. Three Force Sensitives had used their abilities to chuck that bomb – and any others within reach – away from them. Kaydel – standing next to them – just so happened to benefit from the situation.

Of course, whipping the bombs away didn't completely solve the problem. In fact, it seemed to make things a little worse personally for the group. The explosion's location had been the perfect spot to bring down the staircase. It had been a chunk of stone that hit Kaydel in the head and knocked her out.

Kaydel groaned as she struggled to stay sitting up. A wave of nausea and dizziness swarmed her, and she instinctively laid back down. Her hand went to her forehead and her fingers felt the sticky drip of blood. She had no mirror but the pain that pulsed through her body told her that her visage was a mess.

She wanted to just close her eyes and go to sleep.

No! Kaydel refused the thought, forcing her eyes to stay open. She had to get back to Aletha. To Paige.

To Poe.

Oh God, Poe. What if he was dead?

"I'll be fine. I promise."

"You can't promise that."

"Yes, I can. Remember. 108."

Kaydel took a deep breath and remembered. 108. If there was a man who would fight, charm, and trick his way to 108-years-old, it was Poe Dameron.

And Kaydel Ko Connix was determined to make it as far to that with him as possible.

Poe Dameron was alive.

So, she gathered her strength and forced herself to sit back up.

Kaydel couldn't hear anything beyond the ringing of her ears, her hearing deafened temporarily by the explosion. But her sight was as perfect as ever, and everywhere she looked, she saw total devastation. The people who had crowded the lobby were in shambles. Bloody, broken, even dead. It was a scene straight from a horror movie.

As a member of the Communications team, Kaydel didn't see much action on the battlefield or the grizzly injuries wheeled into the Medical Center. She could barely handle watching the destruction before her. Kaydel didn't know if it was from her head injury or the awfulness before her, but when she saw a mother holding a young boy – no more than seven years old – who was now missing a leg... she promptly lurched forward and threw up the contents of her stomach.

Then her ears crackled and the screams that filled her senses would haunt her to the rest of her days.

She wished she hadn't woken up.

"Help! Someone help!"

Kaydel's head slowly turned to the side. She was shocked to see that redhead Knight of Ren not far from her. She was pinned under some pieces of the staircase. Her body was twisted like she had moved to shield it. Her leg and collarbone were the victims, and the woman was crying in pain.

It was strange to see a monster of the First Order shedding tears.

One of the Knights of Ren – Berd if she recalled correctly – was trying to pry the rubble off her. He couldn't lift it and he was the one crying for help.

It would be easy to just leave them there, let nature take care of the problem and live in a world where there was one less Dark Side user. Yet there Kaydel Ko Connix was, pushing herself to her feet and stumbling forward to help.

"What happened?" Kaydel felt so woozy as she collapsed to her knees next to Sasa and Berd.

Berd looked surprised at her arrival, "She got hit but I think the Force protected her enough that it's still safe to free her."

"Any doctors around?"

"If there are they're busy with other people," Berd gestured to the scene of chaos. He was right, there were some people giving what medical assistance they could, but the screaming children of the lobby were their foremost attention, as they should be.

"So we need to lift this?" Kaydel positioned herself at the pinning rubble. She scanned Sasa for further injuries, trying to conjure up all the medical advice Aletha had ever imparted on her. "Why don't you use the Force?"

"We've tried," Sasa moaned, "but something's blocking us and we don't have the strength to do it."

"What about the other Knight? Can he help?"

Sasa and Berd exchanged a look. Together they pointed towards a man on the ground not far from them. It was Doxl Ren... bloody and unmoving.

"We lost him," Sasa said quietly.

Kaydel squeezed her eyes shut, struggling so hard against her feelings of sympathy. It wasn't wrong to be empathetic, but if anyone deserved a fate like this... No. No one deserved this.

"I'm sorry," Kaydel said quietly. She took a deep breath, "Okay, I'm going to help you. You grip that end and I'll grab this one. Okay... on the count of three. One... Two... Three... Lift!"

Berd and Kaydel groaned and used all their strength, but they didn't have enough to make it budge.

"We're almost there," Kaydel's voice strained, "we just need a little more-"

Her eyes fell on a man buried in the rubble.
"Snap!"

His head shot up. He smiled when he saw her, but his face was contorted in pain.

"Kaydel!" he exclaimed. "You're okay! Poe's not going to kill me!"

"No, he isn't. And Karé wont kill me!" Kaydel smiled in relief. "Come over here and help us!"

"Kaydel, I can't."

"No, it's okay."

"No, really, Kaydel, I can't."

"Just crawl over!"

"Kaydel, my leg is-"

"I got it," suddenly Dacken was crouched next to her, helping lift. He was bloody, his clothing scorched, had bad burns on his arms, and half the blonde hair on his scalp had been singed off.

"What- What happened to you?" Kaydel stared at him in shock.

"I caught on fire," Dacken gripped the rubble. "We even now?"

Kaydel rolled her eyes, then they fell on a series of large, red, puncture scars on his arm, "What about that?"

"Oh don't worry, just track marks."

She stared at him.

"Aunt Kayko, I'm a drug addict. Yeah, I got track marks. Can we discuss this later?"

"Right," Kaydel shook her head. "Come on, let's lift."

The three of them groaned as they raised the rubble off Sasa and set it aside. They made quick work of the second piece. Sasa was free, but she was sobbing in pain.

"It's okay," Berd crouched next to her. He stroked the back of her neck, "Let me take a look."

"No. It hurts," Sasa cried as he gently pushed on her collarbone and leg.

"I can imagine. I think they're broken. You just stay put. We don't want it to get worse."

"You're being kind," Kaydel said.

"If anything happens to her, Kylo Ren will behead me," Berd replied bluntly. "I very much enjoy having my head on my shoulders."

Kaydel blinked, "Fair enough."

"Aunt Kayko," Dacken touched her arm. "Look I know you don't like us, but I need your help. It's Grandpa Timor."

"I don't want anything to do with him," she said instantly.
"Kayko, he is missing half his face. Personal feelings aside, Grandma Adrinna will murder both of us if we don't help."

She sighed and glanced about the room, "Okay, but I'm going to need your shirt."

"Half of it's burnt off anyway," Dacken shrugged and pulled it over his head. His body was charred and thin. There were more track marks scarring him and on his back it looked like he had whip scars.

"What happened to you?" Kaydel whispered.

"Some bad stuff," he tossed her his shirt. "Now what do we do?"

Kaydel said nothing but started to pull up her shirt.

"No! No! Stop!" Dacken covered his eyes. "Our family's screwed up, but we're not moving into incest."

"I'm not doing that!" She smacked his arm but flinched when it hit one of his burns and he howled in pain, "Sorry."

"It's okay," he whimpered holding his arm. "We gotta be even by now though."

"Let's talk about it later. Now, go to that couch," she pointed to a pile of splinter, fabric, and stuffing that used to be a beautiful couch, "and get me some stuffing."

He ran off to do so.

"Kaydel!" Snap called for her. "My leg."

"In a minute!" she yelled.

Kaydel ignored whatever Snap called next; he was far away enough to be tuned out. She lifted her shirt and revealed that wound and tied around her torso were a few yards of bandages and a small white pouch clipped around her waist.

"What's that?" Dacken asked as he returned with an armful of stuffing.

"Aunt Ally insists I always carry bandages and some medicine with me on missions," Kaydel started rolling the bandages off her. With her other hand, she fumbled in the little pouch and pulled out a few sachets of aloe vera, "Here. Put these on your burns. It'll help… I think. I don't know. Aunt Ally's the doctor, not me. I think I should call her."

Dacken shook his head, "The comms are all being blocked. No one can call for help. No one can even tell the New Republic."

"This wasn't an accident. There's something more going on here."

"There's been some claims about Imperial Loyalists. Makes sense, Ben Solo is here to make an example-"

"No," Kaydel cut off. "Something else is happening. Earlier this week Sasa told me that Kylo Ren wasn't supposed to be here, and nobody knew about the Resistance being here either. It's a front, but I don't understand what for."

She glanced over at Berd who was tending to the dead body of the Stormtrooper, Weevil.
Berd was oddly uninjured.

"Come on," Kaydel slowly got to her feet, eyes not moving from Berd, "let's go save my father."

They took off across the lobby, not hearing Snap's yells after them.

Kaydel would come to regret not paying attention.

"I cannot believe you people!" Rose exclaimed, the idolization of her war heroes slipping. "Four grown adults, and not one of you thinks to call the Resistance for back up?"

"Rah ro gree rwah!" Waroo added, shooting his father a look. He looked very much like his father but had his mother's snout, streaks of black fur, and was a little taller than his father – not that anyone ever dared tell that to Chewbacca's face.

Chewie tried to explain, "Roo gra roar-"

Waroo cut him off, "Arr ragh rawr rah groo graw!"

Chewbacca had no retort.

Kes and Shayna just exchanged a pained look.

"All this growling is terrible for my hangover," Kes moaned.

"Agreed," Shayna nodded.

"I get it, Daisy or whatever your name is, we screwed up," Han rubbed his temples wishing this little girl would stop yelling at him. He already had a Princess to do that. "But why didn't you call them either?"

"I thought you guys had already done so!" Rose exclaimed.

"In all fairness, Rose, we were drunk," Kes pointed out. "This one is a little bit on you. We were obviously too inebriated call for help."

Rose and Waroo traded a truly amazed look.

"But not too inebriated to stock up on weapons and medical supplies?" Rose shot.

"I can't be responsible for what Drunk Han Solo does," Han said. "Drunk Han Solo once made me wake up in a dumpster on Mandalore, handcuffed to a shoeless Felicity, and the proud new owner of a shaak farm."

Everyone stared at Han.

"We don't have time for that story," Han waved off.

"Look, the fact is that the signal is now being blocked," Kes said. "We can't call the Resistance so the best we can do is go in there and help our kids/siblings/friends."

"Starting descent," Han announced as he flipped a few controls on the cockpit of the transport.

"Why don't we just backtrack far enough to send a signal and then return to the planet to help them?" Rose asked.
"Because knowing our sons, Kes' son either has mine in a headlock or mine is Force Choking his."

"I still don't understand why-"

Waroo put a hand on her shoulder and growled something.

"Fine," she conceded. "But for the record, I still think we should take the hour it takes to backtrack, send a message, and return."

"You know, maybe Rose is right," Shayna said. "Maybe we've taken this out of proportion. For all we know it was just a little bomb or not even attempted yet. Maybe things aren't as bad as-"

Her words died on her tongue as the resort came into view and all they could see was black smoke and utter devastation.

"Hold still," Kaydel instructed as she and Dacken tried to help her father. They had wrapped the couch stuffing in Dacken's shirt as a way to soak up the blood and wrapped the bandage around his face to hold it in place. "There. That should do it until we can get you better help."

"Thank you, Ko," Timor said. Unluckily his mouth wasn't covered. "I don't know where you learned that-"

"I learned it from Aunt Aletha," Kaydel cut off. "You know, you really have some nerve-"

"Excuse me?" a woman interrupted.

"Yes?" Kaydel felt like she knew her for some reason but couldn't pinpoint where.

The woman's eyes were red and puffy, "Please… I heard that you had some painkillers and medical stuff. My son is very hurt. I don't know how to help him, but we've bound his wound in a shirt."

"I'm sorry but I just used the last of my bandages on my father."

"Of course… but maybe. Do you a painkiller to spare? Please he's so young and in such pain."

Kaydel's face softened, "Of course."

"Bless you, Young Lady," the woman smiled as Kaydel dug in her pouch. "The people around here aren't very generous. They think because they have wealth that makes them better than my family."

"Father!" Kaydel hissed.

"No, it's okay," the woman sniffed. "I, uh, won a HoloNet contest. All expenses paid. I just los my husband and money has been tight. This vacation was a blessing, but now… I don't know how I'm going to pay the medical bills."

The woman broke down crying and Kaydel pulled her into a hug. She felt her father's eyes on her and looked up to meet them.

There was something in them that she hadn't seen in a very long time.

Timor placed his hand on the woman's shoulder, "Don't you worry about a thing. I'll give you my contact information and take care of everything."
"Of course," Timor nodded. "I lost my eldest daughter many years ago. I know the pain of your child suffering."

The woman looked beyond words, "Thank you. Thank you, so much."

"Wow, Dad, that's very generous," Kaydel said softly. She didn't know quite what to feel.

"I know I can be a hard man," he said.

Kaydel raised an eyebrow.

"I know how hard your mother can be," Timor corrected, "but I'm not a monster. Go on, go take care of your friend and I'll help this woman. I'm Timor Connix, and this is my daughter, Kaydel Ko, and my grandson, Dacken Tokani."

"Hena Narden," the woman smiled gently as Kaydel handed her the painkiller. "Thank you so much, Mr. Connix."

"Think nothing of it," he clasped her hand.

Kaydel smiled as she watched her father. For a moment, she hesitated, craving to hug her father.

"You know, Ko," Timor said as Dacken spoke with Hena to collect her details, "it's nice to see you actually doing something useful for once. Fighting for the right cause and not making scenes about how evil we apparently are. Maybe you'll see the light and be able to rejoin the family. But you're definitely going to have to break up with that Yavinese boy and cut ties with Aletha."

Well, the hug feeling passed quite quickly.

"Just when I thought you might have a soul," Kaydel glared at him. "Come on, Dacken."

Dacken blinked in surprise that she was being nice to him but shrugged and followed after her.

"Snap!" Kaydel cried out as she raced back across the room. "Snap, where are you?"

She knew she was getting close when she saw Berd and Sasa. Doxl and Weevil had been placed next to the still reclining Sasa as Berd was trying to find a way to make his comm work again.

"Snap!" Kaydel continued to call. She locked eyes with Sasa, "Hey, do you guys know where-"

"I'm over here, Kaydel!" Snap called. "Please, help! Quickly!"

"I'm coming," she raced towards the rubble with Dacken trailing her. "Don't worry, I'm going to-"

Kaydel stopped dead. She could see Snap buried in the rubble, trying to crawl his way out. But his injuries were making that escape from the rubble very difficult.

Because everything below Snap's left knee had been blown clean off.

Kaydel didn't have the stomach of doctor. She promptly dropped to the ground and threw up.

"Oh Goddesses! Snap!" she screamed racing towards him. She fell to her knees before him, "Snap! I don't- I can't- Oh my God, what do I do? What do I do?"
Her hands were shaking and her mind was a mess. She shouldn't have ignored him. Why had she ignored him? Oh god, what was she supposed to do when a guy on her mission lost a leg?

Karé was going to actually murder her.

"What do I do? What do I do?" Kaydel repeated it over and over in a panic. "What do I do?"

Dacken took charge.

"First we're going to get him out of the rubble," he said with a clear head. Dacken hooked his arms under Snap's armpits, "Come on, Kayko. You gotta help me."

Kaydel nodded and did so.

"Let's pull him to a clear space," Dacken ordered. "Back by the couch."

"Couch, got it," Kaydel tried not to watch the smear of blood his mangled knee drew across the floor.

They settled close to the Knights of Ren who watched the scene in interest, though they didn't have much of a clue what to do either. None of them had medical training or an instruction book or anyway to search for the correct way to handle the loss of a limb. They just had to sort of wing it and hope for the best.

"Water!" Dacken ordered Berd and Sasa. "Throw me a water flask!"

Berd pulled the one off Weevil's belt and tossed it to Dacken. Using the water and what scrap they had left of his shirt, Dacken did his best to clean Snap's leg.

Snap screamed the entire time.

"We need something to bind the leg, I think," Dacken said. "Does anyone have a shirt we can use?"

Kaydel, Sasa, and Berd looked at each other. Berd's had been used to fashion Sasa a splint to prevent her from further injuring her collarbone which had broken on the left side, so any movement of her left arm further damaged it. Sasa's outfit wasn't an option either, her fancy dress too tight-fitting and made of poor bandage fabric. That left only one option.

"Oh screw it," Kaydel pulled hers over her head.

Both Dacken and Snap looked away as Kaydel was left in just her bra. Berd looked a little too hard at her, and Sasa swatted him for it.

"Yeah," Snap groaned as Kaydel tied her shirt around his bleeding leg. "Poe is actually going to kill me."

"Snap, you are missing a leg," she said. "Me shirtless is nothing compared to your injury."

She knotted the end with maybe too tight a tug.

"Sorry," she frowned as he winced. "At least you'll have good pressure."

"Until I bleed to death," Snap groaned. His eyes flicked to the pouch still buckled around her torso, "What's that?"

Kaydel gasped. In her panic, she had forgotten about it.
"Yes!" she cried out joyfully. "I can help you! I can save you!"

"How?" Snap frowned as she zipped open her belt and began digging through it. "Is that a money belt?"

"A medication belt," Kaydel corrected. "Basically Aunt Aletha stocked a money belt with emergency medical supplies. Not much, but there's a few things to help us. Including this."

Kaydel held up a tiny green pill.

"What's that?" Snap asked.

"For sudden loss of limbs," Kaydel grinned. "She makes Poe and Diego carry them too. Almost like she wants someone to lose a limb."

"Glad I could please her," Snap groaned. "Oh God, what is Kare going to think?"

"She's going to be happy you're alive." Kaydel thrust the pill at him, "Now take it. It'll clot the blood, relieve the pain, and start a course of medicine to treat your... stump until you can get help. Take it, Snap. Please."

He reached for it but did not clasp the pill. His eyes flicked over and his smile fell. Kaydel's eyes followed Snap's and her heart sunk. Snap was staring at her father and Hena. The reason that Hena had looked familiar was that she was the crying mother holding her legless child. The boy was getting paler by the second.

"Oh no," Dacken whispered.

Snap sighed and dropped both his hand and his head, "We have to do it, don't we?"

Kaydel bit her lip and nodded, "Yeah, we do. Snap, I."

"Don't worry about me," he said. "I'm old. The kid's young. We have to give him a chance."

"You're a good man, Temmin Wexley."

Kaydel bent forward and kissed his cheek. Dacken offered her the First Order water flask and she smiled as she took it. Firmly gripping the pill, she got to her feet and approached the mother.

Hena pulled her son a little closer when Kaydel knelt down in front of her. Timor looked confused but let his daughter talk.

Dacken patted Snap's shoulder, "I'm going to go see if I can find something else to help you."

Snap nodded as Dacken walked away, and then he turned his attention back to Kaydel and the mother. He watched the moment bittersweetly as Kaydel explained. Suddenly Hena cried out and grabbed Kaydel in a hug, almost dropping her son in the process. She wept into Kaydel's shoulder repeating the words "thank you" a thousand times.

Kaydel stroked the boy's hair as she urged him to drink from the First Order canteen and ensured the boy swallowed the pill. Snap smiled as he made the right choice.

"That was very kind," Sasa Ren surprised him. She was suddenly lying down next to him. Her injuries didn't stop her from moving, but there was enough pain for her not to want to do very often.

Berd was nowhere to be seen.
"Oh, uh, yeah," Snap blinked. "But he's a kid, so what else could I do?"

"But your leg-"

"I've had worse."

"...Really?"

"No," Snap conceded, "but I'll live. Provided I find a way to stop the bleeding."

Sasa got a strange look on her face.

"What?" he asked.

"I think I have an idea, but it's not a pleasant one."

"What is it?"

"Well, there is one tool I have that's known for cauterizing wounds."

"Really?" he perked up.

It took a moment for Snap to get it but when he did, his jaw dropped.

"Your lightsaber?" he exclaimed. "Are you crazy?"

"It was just a suggestion," Sasa defended.

"I'm not going to let you torture me!"

"What's going on here?" Kaydel asked as she returned to Snap. Her eyes hardened at Sasa, "Is she giving you a problem?"

"I was just suggesting a way to help him," Sasa said.

"She wants to use her lightsaber on my leg."

"WHAT?"

"To stop the bleeding!" Sasa groaned at herself, "Look, it was just a suggestion."

"Yeah, what a great suggestion," Snap scoffed. "Hey, you lost your leg. How about I torture you?"

"It's not torture!" Sasa paused. "Well, not intentionally. Look, there's a very good chance you're about to bleed to death, and your medical officer isn't anywhere to be found."

"Isn't cauterizing wounds generally considered to be a terrible way of stemming bleeding?" Snap shot.

"Do you have any other option?" Sasa countered. "Listen to me, if you want to get back to your wife – the dark-skinned woman is your wife, right? – the bleeding needs to stop. It doesn't matter to me if you live or die, but this will make you live... Don't you think you owe your wife that?"

For a very long time, Snap was silent as he considered her words. Even Kaydel had to admit she saw the logic in the argument. What else did they have that could stop the bleeding? How else could they save Snap?
Snap took a deep breath and looked to Kaydel, "What do you think?"

Kaydel didn't answer right away. She wondered what she would do if it were her and Poe in Snap and Karé's place, "It… it's not my choice to make."

"I know," Snap looked down. "But if it were you?"

"I'd do whatever it took to get back to Poe," she admitted. "…We have to do it, don't we?"

He allowed a small smile, "Yeah, we do. Kaydel, I-"

"It's okay," Kaydel took his hand. "I'll stay right by your side."

"Have you made your decision?" Sasa asked.

"Yeah," Snap squeezed Kaydel's hand. "I'll do it."

Sasa smiled and then called out for Berd. Snap looked very uncomfortable as Sasa explained the situation to Berd and asked him to hold down Snap. Dacken had gone off to check on Hena and her son. The two of them looked too relaxed for Kaydel to call Dacken away. That poor mother deserved a little relief.

Kaydel looked down at Snap, and her heart sunk as she knew Snap would have none of that any time soon.

"You okay?" Kaydel asked as Berd gave him some water.

"No." Snap swallowed a painkiller from Kaydel's medicine belt. The most powerful pill in her stash was still not going to be anywhere enough to ease the agony he was about to endure. "I know I have to do it… but I have a really bad feeling about this."

"I'm not going anywhere," Kaydel settled Snap to lie in her lap – Berd holding down his torso – as she hugged him tightly. "I promise."

"Are you ready?" Sasa ignited her lightsaber. She was kneeling by what remained of his leg, strong enough to perform the act but wouldn't be able to prolong the experience.

Snap took a deep breath, "Okay… do it."

And Kaydel Ko Connix would never forget the sound of Snap's screams as the lightsaber bit into his mangled flesh.

---

Evan Tharel wasn't dead.

It took him about three minutes to register that fact as he lay on his back in the garden staring up at the smoke-filled sky.

He wasn't dead. Evan, Paige, and the First Order soldiers had forgotten their hostilities and just made a run for it. The door of the emergency exit had locked behind them, so they had no choice but to run further and further down the garden path.

More bombs littered the path and doors were secured a little too strong to be the work of normal hotel staff. They were nearly at the resort's famous hedge maze when the explosion sent the five of them flying.
The last thing Evan remembered was Paige's hand reaching for him and her small fingers slipping through his.

It took Evan Tharel three minutes to realize he wasn't dead. Three minutes for him to realize there was a hope of seeing his mother again. Three minutes to realize there was a chance to hold Paige Tico in his arms once more. Three minutes to realize that he could provide the others with what they needed most at the moment: medical attention.

At three minutes and four seconds, Evan Tharel took a deep breath. And at three minutes and twelve seconds, he grabbed his medic bag he always carried on his shoulder – thankfully it had stayed there – shot to his feet, and got to work.

The closest person to him was the soldier called Marks, and he was writhing and groaning on the ground as his left arm bled profusely. In a moment, Evan was on his knees next to Marks helping fix him up. There was no thought of First Order vs Resistance in his mind. Marks was a patient and Evan a medical officer. Loyalty didn't matter. His mind wasn't even on Paige; just his patient.

"It's alright, I've got you," Evan assured Marks as his pulled the proper tools from his bag. "Just relax."

Groaning, Marks let Evan see the extent of his injuries. His ankle hurt, and a quick feel made Evan suspect at least a fracture, but Marks would be able to limp enough until the shot of a vaccine from Ryloth that helped treat bone injuries in emergency situations kicked in.

The worst part of Marks' injuries was his left arm; a good chunk of it was missing. Evan slathered it in more bacta than he wanted to ration out for one person, and then cut off the sleeve of his formal jacket to make a secure band to hold still the bandages he wrapped around the wound. Another chunk was missing from Marks' cheek, but he stopped Evan from using any more bacta on him.

"But it'll scar if I don't," Evan said.

"That's alright," Marks grimaced as he forced himself to his feet. "Save it for someone else. Besides, scars are considered a good thing to have in the First Order."

Evan hated that he laughed at that.

"Thanks for helping me," Marks said as Evan's eyes scanned the garden for another wounded person.

"I'm a medical officer for a reason," Evan wasn't even looking at Marks as he searched frantically for someone else to have survived. His heart turned cold as he realized he couldn't see Paige anywhere. He had heard enough stories of the Bombing of Faclov from his mother to have been scared shitless of explosions. "I don't care who you fight for. If someone's injured, I fix them. Especially when it comes to bombs."

"Still," Marks said, "I appreciate it."

Evan smiled a little.

"What about you?" Marks asked. "Are you hurt?"

"Had the wind knocked out of me, got thrown into a hedge and landed on the grass. Other than that… actually I don't think I have any injuries. I guess the Force decided to not break the one medic around."
"Thank goodness for that." His eyes suddenly went wide, "Tone!"

Marks raced limping over to a man before Evan could stop him. Tone was wheezing and lying on his front. When Marks flipped Tone onto his back, he gasped. A piece of metal was lodged in his throat.

"Doctor!" Marks called to Evan as Tone flailed in panic. "Please help him!"

"Alright," Evan dropped to his knees and nudged Marks back away from Tone. "By the way, just call me, Evan, I'm not a doctor. But I am going to help him… His name's Tone?"

"Yeah," Marks nodded, nervously watching his squadmate gasping.

Tone kept reaching for the metal in his throat, instinct telling him to remove the danger, but Evan kept yanking his hands away.

"Stop!" Evan ordered sternly. "I'm going to help you, but whatever you do, you must not pull-"

Instinct won over reason. Tone yanked the metal from his throat. Evan's eyes slammed shut as Tone's blood spurted onto his face. There was nothing more he could do in the last three seconds of Tone's life. Tone sputtered, gurgled on blood, and died.

Evan sighed and wiped the blood from his face onto his sleeve, "Alright… Now I have to get tested for blood transmitted diseases. That's tedious."

He glanced up at Marks and shifted away slightly when it looked like Marks was about to hit him.

"My condolences for your friend," Evan got to his feet and backed away.

"Thanks," Marks sighed as he stared down at Tone's body sadly. "I just don't get why he pulled it out."

"People aren't in their right minds with they have metal lodged in their throat," Evan walked along the garden path scanning the bushes. He stopped when he saw a hand sticking out from a hedge. Evan knelt down and pushed back the foliage to investigate, "To be honest there wasn't much I could do to save him. Not with the equipment I have here. I think I found your other friend… or what's left of him."

Something in Marks' eyes fell, "…Left of him?"

Evan held the bush back for Marks to see. There was an arm attached to a torso… and nothing more. They would find his head a few minutes later smashed again the wall.

Marks choked back a gag, "Yeah, that's him."

"I'm sorry, Man."

"Nah," Marks shook his head, but his eyes were sad. "Life of a soldier."

"Life of a Stormtrooper," Evan corrected. "We're not like that in the Resistance."

Marks laughed bitterly, "Please don't act like I have a choice in who I get to fight for."

Evan frowned at his words but didn't pry.

"Come on," Marks said. "Let's find your girl… She is yours, right?"
"Yes," Evan said a little too loudly.
Marks laughed at his defensiveness. "Sorry, just didn't expect a girl like that to be with a guy like-"
"Like what?"
"Nothing."
"No, you were going to say something. Say it."
Marks shook his head, "All I was going to say was does she have a sister?"
"Yes, but I'll punch you if you do anything to her."
Marks quirked a smile, "Can you throw a good punch?"
"It's more of the principle of the thing," Evan admitted.
"Well, if we have time, maybe I can show you how to punch better. Now what's your girl's name?"
"Paige."
"Then let's look for Paige."
"Right, Paige!" Evan yelled running off to the left. "Em Yêu!"
"Paige!" Marks hollered to the right.
They must have called her name for a good five minutes before Evan heard a weak call of:
"Evan?"
His eyes widened and shot off after the sound of her voice.
"Paige! Em Yêu! Paige, where are you?"
He found her on the ground bleeding from the leg and a small piece of shrapnel was embedded in her forehead.
"Hey, hey," he dropped to his knees. "Hey, I got you."
"Evan?" she moaned. Her head flopped to the side and her eyes fought to close, "Evan, I'm so tir-"
"No, no, no!" he shook her. "Don't go to sleep. Don't you dare go to sleep!"
"My head-"
"You'll be fine, I promise. You just gotta stay awake, Baby. Please stay awake. For me."
Paige gave a pained smiled as she laid in Evan's arms. She lifted a shaky hand and stroked his cheek.
"You're not hurt," she struggled to speak.
"Of course not," Evan smiled. "I've got my lucky charm."
"It's a good thing too," Marks crouched down next to them. "He's been doing a great job as a medic."
"Really?" she smiled.

"I've been totally awesome," Evan smirked.

She rolled her eyes, "Settle down, Hot Shot."

"Only if you promise not to go to sleep," Evan replied.

"But it's hard," she moaned. "I'm in pain and so tired."

She started to reach for the shrapnel in her head but Marks grabbed her hand and stopped her.

"Don't you go doing that," Marks firmly put her hand back down.

"It's too dangerous to pull it out," Evan agreed. "But it's just a little bit and not too deep. You should be fine, but we'll keep it in until I can get you to a place with proper medical equipment. Okay? But in order to do that, I need you to stay awake, get up, and move. We can't stay here."

"He's right," Marks agreed.

"I don't know if I can," Paige winced. "My leg-"

"We'll help you," Marks promised. "Both of us. I think if we go in the maze, it'll bring us to the front of the hotel. Evan and I will help you. You just gotta stay awake."

"But-"

"Do it for Evan. For the Resistance. For your friends-"

Evan cut in, "Do it for your sister."

There is one part of my life you absolutely need to understand: nothing is more important to me and then my LITTLE SISTER ROSE.

- The Journal of Paige Tico

Paige smiled, "My sister?"

"She's only got you left," Evan said. "You gotta fight for her."

"I've gotta fight for her," Paige whispered.

"Then fight," Marks urged. "Fight for your sister. Fight for… What's her name?"

"Rose," Paige answered.

"Rose, huh?" a thought occurred to him. "I've got an idea."

Not far from them was a rose bush. They were only tiny little red things and Marks liberated one. He secured it in his breast pocket and returned to the pair.

"Listen to me, Paige," Marks said, "anytime you think of going to sleep, you look at my pocket, and you remember Rose."

"I'll remember Rose," Paige nodded.
Marks frowned a little and leaned over to Evan, "Does she always repeat things in such a simplistic fashion?"

"It's the head injury."

"Fair enough. Come on. Let's get going."

Together they helped Paige to her feet. There was no discussion of swearing a truce. They were going to trust each other to get through this, no negotiation required. And stationed on either side of the girl, struggling to hold her up and shaking her when she started to drift, Evan Tharel, Paige Tico, and MK-6093 hobbled into the hedge maze to find safety.

"Whoa! These guys really know how to move!" Poe exclaimed as he and the Stormtrooper fired blasts at the two dozen or so Imperialists that were trying to get into the main entrance of the ballroom.

Swarm after swarm of soldiers had come at them, but Poe, FN-2187, Zeroes, and Nines had held them back pretty well. It helped that they could restock on weapons and ammo from the dead bodies and the Kation Defense Holdings weapons left behind. Unfortunately, Karé and Kylo had yet to find the machine blocking comm signals.

"Good thing we can move faster," FN-2187 let off a rapid succession of blasts as they hid behind a crumbled pillar.

Poe was absolutely amazed to see every single one of the Stormtrooper's shots hit their mark.

"Nice shooting, Rex," Poe grinned as he reloaded his weapon with a new gas cartridge hidden beneath his clothes. "Now, we gotta take out as many of these guys we can or we're not gonna get very far."

"All right," FN-2187 nodded.

"We're in a good position. Just stay sharp. Got it?"

"Got it," FN-2187 answered. "Since Master Ren is busy and we have that truce going, are you going to be the Commander in charge?"

"What?" Poe blinked. "No, we're working as a team. You got my back, I got yours. Partners, okay Buddy?"

Buddy. FN-2187 liked being called Buddy. Marks did it sometimes, though he was never one for nicknames. Sasa had tried a two-week stint, but the name fell flat. Nines liked to mockingly call him that. And Kylo had once call him that, only for it to be so painfully awkward they agreed never to speak of it again.

But this time, the name Buddy coming from this man… Maybe there was something just so naturally charming with that man, but FN-2187 liked hearing that voice call him Buddy. He wanted to be this man's buddy. Even if it was just pretend for a little while.

"Okay… Buddy," FN-2187 replied with an awkward eagerness.

Poe grinned. He kind of liked this guy.

The Imperialists – or what was left of them – had made it into the ballroom, taking refuge behind blown bits of junk like Poe and FN-2187. They were nowhere near Kylo and Karé, or Zeroes and Nines who were fending off more not so Imperialist looking thugs at the other entrance. If Poe and FN-2187 had anything to say about it, the thugs would stay far away from them.

"Up ahead! Up ahead!" Poe called, pointing to a lopsided piece of stage that had been blown clear off the floor and thrown across the room. "You see it?"

FN-2187 squinted. There were about three Imperialists trying to crouch behind it, waiting until they were inconspicuous enough to take the shot. There were far too many of them trying to hide than the trash could provide cover for.

"I see them," FN-2187 acknowledged.

"It's too far for me, but you can get them dead center," Poe said, firing off a few blasts at another pair of Imperialists. "It's a clean shot."

"Okay, got it."

FN-2187 flipped the settings of his blasters to a higher impact level and aimed quickly, fluidly, and accurately. The Imperialists wore masks over their faces, so to FN-2187 they were no different than the holograms in the Sim Room. He hit the first thug in the chest, the second in the head, the third in the neck, and then blew up the stage debris causing it to explode and rain shrapnel in different directions.

Poe and FN-2187 pressed themselves backwards behind the pillar, shielding their faces as the shrapnel shot towards them. Their backs hit each other, but they did not recoil, instead settling into a safety of their "Buddy" quite literally having their back.

When the dust settled – the blasts stopping for a moment on their end of the ballroom as everyone ducked for cover – Poe saw that not only had the Stormtrooper shot down the three Imperialists, but four more had been killed by the explosion.

"Yeah!" FN-2187 screamed.

"Yes!" Poe exclaimed.

The two men whooped and cheered in triumph as they surveyed the damage. Poe was damn impressed by the soldier's abilities. No wonder the First Order had been giving the Resistance such a run for their money. Their soldiers were good.

Or at least this one damn well was.

"Did you see that?" FN-2187 yelled. "Did you see that?"

"I saw it," Poe was proud of his friend. Huh… he thought of the Stormtrooper as his friend.

Weird.

"That was amazing!" Poe called as he and the Stormtrooper opened fire again. "Who taught you to shoot like that?"

"I'm the top in Captain Phasma's class," FN-2187 admitted.

"Phasma?" Poe paused for a moment. Could he really want to be friends with a Phasma lackey? No, wait, he wouldn't judge the Stormtrooper. The boy had been forced into this life as an infant. It wasn't his fault, "Hey, tell me something I've been arguing with some guys back on base about. Is Phasma the biggest bitch in the First Order?"

"Honestly, I'd say the fifth biggest bitch," FN-2187 laughed. He felt a freedom in his life he had never felt before. Back on base he could never call a commanding officer a bitch, and yet here he was discussing rankings.

"Fifth, huh?" Poe nailed another soldier in the knee – or what Kaydel liked to call the Aletha Specialty. "Who are the top five biggest bitches in the First Order?"

"Number five: Phasma. Number four: Hux. Number three: Kylo."

Poe snorted. Oh he was so telling people back at the Resistance that Kylo Ren and Armitage Hux were officially the some of the biggest bitches in the First Order, and he was fairly certain the Stormtrooper didn't mean in the badass way… Though from a glance back at Kylo with Karé and the way Kylo was just taking down man after man, Poe could admit a little that Kylo was a bit of a badass with the Force.

"Number two: Tara," FN-2187 continued. "And number one: Captain Electra."

"Captain Electra? Really?" Poe asked. "Never even heard of her."

"Be glad you haven't," FN-2187 shuddered. "Though she did torture your guys' second-in-command before Kylo Ren screwed up his arm."

"Ah. The Captain who owns BB-8's evil twin."

"BB… Who?"

"Just my droid," Poe waved off. "He's not here because he was blown up on a different mission. He'll be okay, though."

"Oh," FN-2187 said.

"Hey, what's your name?" Poe asked, it finally occurring to him that maybe it was polite to know his new friend's name.

He expected his Stormtrooper friend to have a name like Captain Phasma, considering that his Stormtrooper friend had been apparently Kylo Ren's lover's personal bodyguard or something. At least highly trusted by Kylo Ren in some capacity, and certainly had the skills to be a commanding officer.

Poe fully expected his friend to declare his name was something like Lieutenant Sabre, or Sergeant Macro. And even if his Stormtrooper friend had not yet climbed the ranks, Poe was planning on hearing some inconsequential serial number like THX-1183, NH-1977, or RJ-1983.

What Poe wasn't expecting was to hear a very familiar string of letters and numbers.

"FN-2187!" the Stormtrooper shouted.

"F," Poe started to repeat, his brain not yet making the connection.

And then he stopped firing.

"What?" Poe exclaimed.
Did his Stormtrooper friend just say FN-2187?

"That's the only name they ever gave me," FN-2187 explained, clearly thinking that the issue was Poe was shocked by the concept of Stormtroopers only having serial numbers.

But that wasn't what had thrown Poe. Oh, he was perfectly aware that First Order Stormtroopers only had serial numbers. He had fought in the Resistance far too long not to be aware of it.

It was the number FN-2187 that gave him pause. A significant number in his family's circle of friends. A number that had been defiantly displayed by a founding member of the Resistance. A number that had been very famously tattooed onto the wrist of a close family friend. A number that had been repeated over and over throughout the years as a reminder of one woman's failure and determination. A number that was at the very center of one of the Resistance's biggest fiascos.

Poe Dameron could not believe what he was hearing; FN-2187. He was crouching right next to the very child that had been ripped out of Felicity Rhiaon's arms, twenty-one years ago.

Holy hell… Poe had to save him.

As FN-2187 focused on shooting a group of Imperialists trying to sneak up on them from the right, Poe let his mind go to the memories of Felicity Rhiaon, his dear family friend who suffered a horrifying death at the hands of the man who was standing only feet away from him. Poe remembered Felicity's determination to someday once again find FN-2187 and free him. He remembered how Felicity had always said she could never be content until the day FN-2187 was free, had his own name, and knew that there was at least one person in the world who cared about him.

Poe had always been disturbed by the thought that Felicity Rhiaon's soul could never find peace. He wondered if she was restless in the afterlife, helpless to complete her one last piece of business.

Well, Poe was more than happy to complete that business. He was determined to ensure that FN-2187 was freed – though he wasn't sure yet how to do that – and knew someone cared about him – he had seen the way FN-2187's eyes lit up at the term Buddy – and there was something Poe could do here and now to fulfill that other part.

He could give him a name.

"Well, I ain't using it!" Poe stubbornly declared. "F-N, huh?"

Poe thought quickly. After all these years, FN-2187 would be granted his very own name and become his very own person. The only question was what to call him? It had to be something epic and brilliant and significant and unforgettable. Something like…

"Finn," Poe decreed. "I'm gonna call you Finn!"

…Okay, maybe Poe wasn't the greatest at naming things.

Kaydel was so going to make fun of him for this.

Oh, God Kaydel. He had been trying so hard not to think of her because it would only send him into a panic. Poe hoped with every fibre of his being that Kaydel was alright.

No, he had to focus. He would use Finn to focus.

"Is that all right?" Poe turned to look back at his friend.
"Finn," FN-2187 tried out the name. "Yeah, Finn, I like that! I like that!"

Poe turned back and had to suppress a chuckle. Good, the kid had as bad taste in names as Poe did. He was certain that Commander Nalto would tease him endlessly when he brought Finn back to the Resistance with him, but at least Finn liked his name.

"I'm Poe," Poe introduced himself. "Poe Dameron."

"Good to meet you, Poe!" Finn said enthusiastically.

"Good to meet you too, Finn!" Poe shot back.

And Finn had no idea truly how good it felt for Poe to finally meet Finn.

"On your right!" Karé shouted.

Kylo Ren swiftly blocked five blaster bolts aimed at their heads.

"Thanks," he said as the bolts bounced off his saber and hit a few of the soldiers. "Now where is this blocker? I can't find it anywhere."

"Maybe it's not in the room," Karé suggested. "Maybe this is a bigger conspiracy."

A man rushed at Kylo and he easily cut him down, but when the man hit the ground, Kylo saw something that made him pause.

"I think you're right," Kylo bent down and grabbed the man's arm. He pushed down a wristband and found a very familiar mark underneath, "Look at this."

"What is it?" Karé frowned.

"It's a brand," Kylo explained. "That's the mark of Crimson Dawn."

"Crimson Dawn?"

Kylo chuckled, "These aren't loyalists. They're part of a crime syndicate. I guess it's a good thing I tagged along to this trip, because now they're a crime syndicate who just made a very big mistake."

"What mistake?" Karé asked.

He just grinned at her.

With one final shot, Poe downed the last Imperialist and the ballroom went silent.

"We all clear?" Kylo shouted down to them.

The others raced across the ballroom to join Kylo and the still confused Karé.

"Yeah, we're good," Poe panted a little. A battlefield sure knew how to get the heart pumping, "We're out of guys on our end."

"Same here." Kylo looked to Finn who had been speaking with Nines, "Nice shot with that blast at the stage."

"Thank you, Sir," Finn bowed his head.
Poe clenched his fist, wanting so hard to drive it across Kylo's face. Of fucking course. How could he not guess it? Ben Solo had intentionally picked and trained and turned into his lackey the child Felicity Rhiaon Skywalker so badly had wanted to save.

Oh, Leia was going to be pissed when he told her.

"We should get a move on, then," Kylo said, bracing himself against the wall with one hand. Even Knights of Ren could be felled by exhaustion. "We'll take the back exit as there's less of a chance to meet other soldier and it has a shortcut to the hotel lobby. I think that's where I saw the others were. Karé, Nines, Zeroes, and Two-One, I want you to check the coast and clear the way. Dameron and I will follow when we've given the main entrance a final check."

"Yes, Sir," Zeroes, Nines, and Finn saluted.

Karé frowned, glanced at Poe, and then gave a reluctant, small salute.

"You heard him." Poe clapped his hands, "Everyone get moving."

"Yes, Sir," Karé nodded.

The second they were alone at the main entrance, Poe immediately slammed Kylo's head into the wall.

"Ow! Dameron!"

"You son of a bitch," Poe growled.

Kylo glowered at him, rubbing his head, "Does your commanding officer know you call her a bitch?"

"She knows I want to stab you a lot."

"Then I guess I'm lucky you don't have a knife."

"You are a sick bastard," Poe said. He pointed to Finn, "That is FN-2187. Are you serious?"

Kylo smirked, "He turned out to be one hell of a soldier. It's a good thing Rhiaon failed to steal him."

Poe slammed Ben's head into the wall again.

"Stop it!" Kylo snapped. "I've got a reputation to maintain, Dameron!"

"You didn't seriously just say that, right?" Poe stared at him.

Kylo let out an exasperated huff of air, "Look, I know we don't get along, but we agreed to a momentary truce."

"I said I wouldn't kill you. Not that I wouldn't hurt you."

"Oh, come on, Dameron. What do you want from me?"

"I want my mother, Fliss, and Rey back."

Kylo froze.

"But I know you can't achieve that," Poe sneered. "No matter how powerful you are."
"Poe…" Kylo said quietly, "I had nothing to do with your mother-"

"Don't you even start, not after taunting me over her death. And you can't say the same thing about the other two. You shot Felicity in the head and threw her into the trash compactor! You murdered Rey!"

"I didn't kill her," Kylo shot a nervous look towards his Stormtroopers.

There was nothing but ice behind Poe's eyes, "No… you just tried, and led her into circumstances that caused an even more painful death than a lightsaber. You made her die of thirst, hunger, and exhaustion in the desert. You know, I bet she cried herself to sleep the night she died."

Poe could have sworn there were tears in Kylo's eyes.

"Dameron…" Kylo whispered. "Not a day passes that I don't think of how Rey died."

Poe's eyes darkened, "And nothing can ever be said or done to or by you that will ever make up for what happened to Rey Rhiaon Skywalker."

Kylo opened his mouth… and then froze in a way Poe still vaguely recognized.

"Did you just sense someone?" Poe asked.

He nodded, "Yes… a ship just landed near the hotel. I don't recognize the ship… but I know the people."

Poe cocked his head.

Fear filled Kylo's face as the blood drained from it, "Poe… my dad is here."

He blinked, "…Okay, that does make up things a little."

---

"No, I don't have a landing permit. I'm trying to reach my son." Han scowled and leaned over to Chewbacca, "Why am I having flashbacks to Cloud City?"

Chewie roared something a shrugged.

"Sir, for the last time, you are going to have to remove your ship from the yard and vacate the property," a man in a New Republic uniform crossed his arms. A barricade had been set up at the entrance of the hotel as hundreds of people attempted to get inside the hotel to find loved ones and see what was going on. "You do not have the resort's permission to be here."

"Yeah, but the resort may have just gotten my kid blown up, so I would call it even."

"Please, Sir," Shayna rolled to the front of the group, "there's a crime syndicate framing Imperial Loyalists so they can kill a Knight of Ren. We need to get in there to save our Resistance soldier children."

Everyone stared at her.

"Ma'am, that is the most insane story I have ever heard," the man said. "Now get back to your ship and vacate the property."

The group decided to fall back to think of a new plan of action. They lingered several yards away from the barricade, still in sight of it, but hanging out by the opening of the resort's famous hedge
"Okay, Lando's been here a few times before," Han said into the huddle. Why they were in a huddle was beyond him. "He's told me about a few shortcuts, and I'll admit that I don't remember any of them but this, if you go through the hedge maze, you'll end up in the gardens and there's an emergency exit that leads into the ballroom. If there was a conference being held, that's where the presentation would have been."

"So let me get this straight," Kes said, "your plan to save our kids is to solve a hedge maze?"

Han rolled his eyes, "Well, I mean we could use Shayna's kid as an excuse to get in due to the fact he's a medical officer, but there's the slight problem of him not being here, unless you think he's about to stumble out of this maze."

That was the moment Evan, Paige, and Marks stumbled out of the maze.

"Paige!" Rose yelled, racing forward.

"Genie!" Shayna wheeled after her.

Han Solo blinked as he and Kes stared at the group in shock.

"Damn, I'm good," Han mumbled.

"Yeah," Kes nodded. "Didn't see that coming."

"Hey, I wonder..." Han turned something over in his mind. He suddenly – quite loudly – declared, "And it's not like Luke Skywalker is just going to randomly show up behind me!"

Han and Kes turned around in unison, honestly expecting to find a Jedi Knight standing behind them.

They were disappointed.

"Well," Kes patted Han on the shoulder, "can't fault you for trying."

"Mark my words, I am going to randomly stumble upon him one day."

Two years later in the cockpit of the Millennium Falcon to be exact, but we're getting ahead of ourselves.

Evan and Paige looked very confused at the sight of the group but allowed for hugs anyway.

"Mom?"

"Rose?" Paige stumbled into her sister's arms as Evan bent down to hug his mother.

"Easy," Marks said, helping right the girls.

"Thanks," Rose smiled at him. "Uh... who are you?"

"Oh that's Marks," Evan said, frowning as he took in the sight of everyone else. "He's a First Order soldier."

"But our friend," Paige interjected. She shot him an awkward look, "At least... at the moment."
"Friend?" Rose looked at Marks warily.

"We've sort of made a temporary truce," Evan explained. "It's a long story. But he's been keep Paige awake for me, and since she probably has a concussion, that makes him a good guy in my book."

"You've been keeping her awake?" Rose regarded him suspiciously.

"Well, technically you have," Marks corrected. He pulled the little rose from his pocket, "I've been having her look at this and think of you anytime she started to drift off. Here. Take it."

"Thanks." Not knowing what to do with it, Rose slipped it in her pocket. She tried to keep a scowl on her face, but his smile was a little disarming.

Marks was tall, very muscular, copper skinned, had longer black hair than most men kept theirs (though nowhere near what Rey had claimed Teng's hair to be.) He had a no-nonsense attitude etched onto his facial features – especially on those really cute cheekbones – but there was kindness too, and there was more going on behind his grey eyes than first glance suggested.

But the man was also wearing a First Order uniform, so it didn't matter how cute those cheekbones were, this man was the enemy. No sir, didn't matter at all how cute his cheekbones were, or strong his calves, or tight his butt, or the fact he could probably bench-press her and not break too much into a sweat.

…Why was she blushing?

"Okay then," Han said loudly, "if we're all done our flirting…"

Rose refused to acknowledge her face was as red as the rose in her pocket.

"Where's everyone else?" Kes asked for Han. "Poe? Kaydel? The rest of you guys?"

"We don't know," Evan watched Paige as she struggled to stay upright only with the help of Rose and Marks. "We got separated. Comms are all being blocked. What are you guys doing here?"

"We got some information that there was going to be an attack and rushed to your rescue." Shayna frowned at Paige, "Oh, Honey, come on, let's get you in the ship."

"Waroo, help them," Han ordered as Marks and Rose started guiding Paige towards the transport. He growled and obeyed.

Evan gave a sigh of relief as Paige and her helpers started to move off, "This is wonderful. I can't believe you guys are here. Who gave you the information?"

Han briefly explained the meeting with Enfys Nest – leaving out most of the drinking – and by the time he was done, Rose, Marks, and Waroo were racing back to the group.

"Evan!" Rose exclaimed. "We got Paige down on the bunk but she went to sleep!"

"Rose-" he said calmly.

"I'm so sorry!" tears were coming from her eyes. "What do I do? How bad is it?"

"Rose-"

"I didn't mean to-"
"Rose!" Evan snapped. "It's okay. She'll be fine."

She frowned, "But you can't sleep after a head injury."

"Oh no, that's a myth. In fact, head injuries need sleep to properly heal."

Marks scowled, "But… you wouldn't let her go to sleep."

"Not while we were in danger," Evan replied. "I can't carry her. I don't have arms like yours."

Rose did admit that Marks had very strong arms.

"I figured it was best we keep her awake and moving on her own until I could get her somewhere safe rather than each of us carry one end of her and leaving us vulnerable to attack."

Marks blinked, "Dude… I could have carried her."

Evan paused to think about that, "Huh, guess you could have… Eh, I know for next time."

"You plan on consorting with the First Order a lot?" Han shot.

"Oh, don't even," Evan cut off. "You sired the second-in-command of the First Order."

"Well, aren't you a little Hot Shot?" Han glared at Evan.

"How do you think Nalto came up with the nickname?" Kes stated.

"Speaking of," Evan said, "how long did Nalto say it would take for the troops to get here?"

Han, Kes, and Chewie exchanged a look. Shayna decided it was best to let everyone keep ignoring her.

"Excuse me?" there was a nervous strain to Kes' voice.

"Oh, sorry, did you talk to General Organa, or maybe Vice Admiral Holdo? Doesn't matter, how long till they get here?"

Rose and Waroo crossed their arms and looked at the trio.

"Go on," Rose urged dangerously, "tell them."

Han sighed. How did he always find a sassy midget woman to piss off?

Kes bit the bullet and confessed, "We… kind of forgot to comm the Resistance and by the time we remembered, our communications were being blocked."

Evan's jaw literally dropped, "You didn't call the Resistance?"

"It was a mistake and we apologize," Kes said. "We just heard our sons were in danger and acted on instinct."

"But, but why? Why didn't you think to call-" Evan stopped when his brain made it click. They had been in a bar when they heard the news. "Were you guys drunk?"

Han, Kes, and Chewie exchanged a look.

"Maybe a little," Kes admitted.
"But," Evan sputtered, "my mom-"

"Was knocking them back harder than Chewie," Shayna said, quietly watching the scene from the side.

Evan looked like he had gone catatonic.

Marks too was just staring at them, "How did you people win a Rebellion?"

"Actually the three of us just blew up shit on Endor and… let teddy bears do most of the work," Han replied. "And none of us fought in the Battle of Jakku, so technically we didn't win the Rebellion personally. just… helped?"

"I did throw you the last charge when we were rigging the control bunker," Kes offered.

For the first time in his life, MK-6093 thought maybe he was fighting on the right side.

"I can't believe this," Evan whispered. His eyes flashed at the trio of grown ass men, old enough to be grandfathers who apparently were just as stupid as they alleged their sons to be in a toast the previous day. "You didn't call the Resistance because you were drunk? How long ago did you find out?"

Han was almost afraid to admit it, "A day ago."

"A day a- You've know for an entire day that we were going to be blown up, and you didn't tell us?" Evan screamed at them. He was beyond any semblance of respect for these 'war heroes' as memories of the horrors he had seen inflicted upon five people alone rung through his mind. "You are kidding me! Are you actually fucking kidding me?"

"Watch it, Kid," Han warned. "Technically all three of us are a higher rank in the Resistance than-"

"No!" Don't you dare!" Evan roared. "This is the absolute most idiotic and selfish thing I have ever seen! And I watched Commander Nalto get Wedge Antilles killed! Hell, I pulled Wedge Antilles' body from the wreckage!"

Kes winced as he remembered Wedge's funeral. Han and Chewie unfortunately didn't hear of Wedge's death until four months after his death, not that they were particularly close.

But Evan… Evan was shaking.

"People just died! No, not died! People just exploded! You see this blood?" he pointed to his crimson soaked clothing. "This is the blood of a man who pulled shrapnel out of his throat and bled to death on me! And you're telling me that not one of you could pick up a damn comm!"

Absolute silence fell on the group as they just stared at the blood on Evan in horror.

Then he said fifteen words that chilled Han Solo to the core.

"Fuck this. I am telling General Organa what you did. Good luck with that, Solo."

Han shuddered. Maybe the Force would be merciful, and Ben would murder him before Leia could. Either way, he was sure he was going to die at the hands of a Skywalker some day.

Then Shayna, who had been patiently observing the scene from the side, wheeled over to her son.

"Geno," Shayna's voice was calm as she took Evan's hands in her own. "Enough. We are sorry, we made a mistake. We just heard that our children were in danger, and we didn't think. We were wrong and I'm sorry for that. But we need to move on with this situation. You're right, people are dying, and we need to find the rest of our people. Can we put a pin in this, and you do what you do best? Go help people? We did bring medical supplies."

Evan took a deep breath and let his anger dissipate, "Okay, fine. There are people who need our help and we're going to help them."

"That's my boy," she smiled. "Now, what's the plan?"

Everyone looked at each other, waiting for someone to take charge.

"Alright then," Shayna sighed, "who has the highest rank?"

"Not me," Rose was quick to answer. "I don't even know if I have an official rank. I was literally just carted off to the Resistance by my parents. I know Evan's higher than me."

"I'm First Order," Marks said.

Waroo roared that he wasn't a member of the Resistance.

"Kes Dameron outranks me slightly," Evan said.

"Han was my commanding officer at Endor," Kes countered. "So, I guess that makes him in charge now… Because his plans are always so… Don't make me end that sentence."

"Alright," Han sighed, reluctantly taking charge, though honestly he'd always rather give orders than take them. "What do we need to do?"

"Find our people," Marks answered.

"And how do we do that?"

"We need to get in the building," Kes replied.

"It would be easiest to find them if the comms were working," Rose pointed out. "Then we could also get help from the New Republic for the planet. We need to find the communications control center because the blocking is too powerful to be an independent machine. This is being straight up wired from the main center."

"I know where that is," Marks said. "It's on the other corner of the hedge maze, not too far from here. We don't have to enter the maze at all, just hug the side. I could get there and provide protection, but I'm useless at machines."

"Do we have someone here who isn't?" Han asked.

---

Rose can't fly the way I can, which has always driven her crazy, but she's a genius with machines. Give her a few minutes to poke around inside something broken, and she'll figure out why it isn't working and how to fix it.

- The Journal of Paige Tico

"Rose," Evan suggested. "Rose can do it."
"What?" her eyes widened. "Oh no. No, I couldn't."

"You can, and you will," Evan countered. "Don't forget, everyone here outranks you. If we say you have to do it, you have to do it."

She fixed him with a look that her sister was known to give him, and that never meant any good when she did.

"Fine," Rose huffed, crossing her arms. She eyes Marks, nervous about the thought of being alone with him… though she couldn't put her finger on exactly why. "Are you really going to leave me alone with a First Order Stormtrooper?"

"Good point," Han said. "Waroo, go with them."

Roar.

"You guys have enough ammo?" Kes asked.

"I picked up some extra from my killed squadmates," Marks answered a little stiffly.

"Waroo's got extra if you need it." Han leaned over to Waroo and gave a few very crude and short growls in Shyriiwook that translated to, "If he tries anything, shoot him."

Waroo nodded.

"Alright," Han said, "you three, move it. Comm us when you've fixed things and we'll figure out what to do from there."

"Wait," Rose didn't move when Waroo and Marks started to, "what about Paige? Who's going to be with her? Evan."

"I'm going into the hotel," Evan shook his head. "It's my duty as a New Republic medical officer to go assist the injured."

"I'll stay," Shayna offered.

"Are you sure?" Evan asked.

She patted his arm, "I don't need to see another bombing. Faclov was more than enough for a lifetime. Go on. I'll watch over Paige."

"Thank you so much," he bent down and hugged her.

"Alright," Han looked around. "The next step is the remaining four of us find a way through the barricade. Hopefully now that we have a medic with us, we can get through."

Han was wrong.

After the different groups went on their ways and they had a chance to grab that extra medical supplies from the ship, Han, Kes, Evan, and Chewbacca strolled right back up to that barricade and demanded they get in because they had a medical officer with them.

The man at the barricade's response to Han?

"Sir, am I going to have to call the police?"
That resulted in Evan having a full on yelling match with the man for ten minutes about denying a New Republic medical officer into a disaster site to administer aid.

"Look," Evan dug his official medical officer ID lanyard out of his bag and hung it on his neck. Even in undercover missions he had to carry it just in case, but they kept it concealed in a secret pocket of the bag, "Right there: Geno Namit. Certified Nurse. A list of all my credentials. Are you seriously telling me that you are refusing to let a certified medical officer into a disaster zone to administer aid?"

"Sir, I'm going to have to ask you to lower your voice," the man said. He looked very smug on the other side of that simple wooden barricade, little more than a glorified construction work ahead sign. "You're causing a scene."

"Yeah, that's the point!" Evan's voice rose even higher. "I want to make sure that everyone here knows that you are Refusing To Admit A Certified Medical Officer Into A Disaster Zone To Administer Aid! Or Do I Need To Go Even Louder?"

The angry mutterings of the crowd started to unnerve the man.

"Sir, I understand what you are saying," the man tried to calm the situation, "but I can't let anyone in without the New Republic officially declaring it an emergency situation."

"They can't declare it an emergency situation because they don't know about it, you idiot," Kes growled. "Now you are going to let us in right now or I swear to God, if you stop me from seeing if my son is okay-"

"Kes, stop," Han held up a hand. "I got this. We just got to stay calm."

He raised an eyebrow, "Stay calm? …Who are you and what have you done to Han Solo?"

"Now, now, boys," Han swaggered casually up to the wooden barricade, "I think we can handle this like mature, responsible adults."

"Thank you, Sir," the man brightened.

"Now, if you don't mind," Han gave a friendly pat on the man's arm, one he might give Luke or Lando, "can I just offer a little bit of a… different perspective? A new, calm, level-headed argument?"

"Well… I suppose." The man leaned in close to Han, careful that the crowd couldn't hear and start using this new argument against him if it worked for this group, "What is your argument?"

Han punched him to the face.

"Chewie!" Han yelled as the man hit the ground and a few other officers started to rush towards him.

Chewbacca picked up two and smashed them together before dropping the men to ground. A female officer reached for her blaster, but Kes hit her first with a stun blast as Han took out two more with his own blaster – hopefully also on stun. Evan slammed over the wooden barricade and made a run for it. The men were quick to follow.

"Alright," Evan said as they raced into the hotel through the spa entrance but continued into the hallway instead of booking themselves in for some battlefield manicures. "At the end of this hallway there's a stairwell and set of elevators. The next floor down is the main level – this part of the resort is on a hill which is why we entered on floor two – and that leads to a restaurant. We take a left there and we'll be able to dart into the next building where the ballroom is."

"Sounds easy enough to me," Kes nodded.

That was when they started to get shot at.

"You just had to say it, didn't you?" Han yelled as they returned the fire.

"Head for the stairwell!" Kes ordered. "We can take up a defensive position there."

They hunkered down and for long past half an hour they were stuck in a back and forth of blaster fire as neither the Resistance men or the "Imperial Loyalists" – or rather Crimson Dawn members they explained to Evan – could gain an advantage against the other.

"Why do I always try to save people?" Han muttered as he swapped in a new round of ammo as Kes and Chewie covered him. Evan had gone a little higher to take up a sniping position, and he wasn't bad at it.

"You're more kind-hearted than you want to admit," Kes answered. "I don't blame you though. You're kid's here. I'm going to do anything in my power to save Poe. I know you'll do the same for Ben."

"Oh yes, saving Ben is such a delight. Here I am risking my life for my son who helped murder his five-year-old cousin, actually murdered the love of my brother-in-law's life, manipulated those around him to find that pair to do so to them, killed multiple friends and mentors, probably will at same point attempt to kill me, and will absolutely hate that I'm here. Oh, and we're being shot at by Crimson Dawn pretending to be Imperial Loyalists." Han groaned, "Could this get any worse?"

"Hold your fire!" a female voice made Han freeze up.

The firestorm stopped, and after a minute or so of inactivity, the Resistance men dared to peek their heads out to see what was going on.

They saw a woman approaching the group, the "Imperial Loyalists" parting automatically and some even bowing their heads. Elegantly dressed in a perfectly pressed blackish brown jumpsuit and a black cape with hood covering her face, a low-slung weapons belt properly stocked with blaster and extra ammunition, a half-bib logo hung from her neck, and a gold signet ring sat proudly on her finger.

"Stand down, men," the woman ordered. "They're not who we're after."

"Oh?" Kes challenged as the Resistance men slowly descended the stairwell. "And who are you after?"

The woman chuckled, her head was turned to Han and never moved away, "I always find you with the fieriest people, don't I?"

Han said nothing, but Chewie was giving a low growl.

Evan frowned at the scene, refusing to holster his sniping rifle, "Uh… Captain Solo, do you know her?"

Han still didn't reply. He just clenched his jaw as tightly as his fist.
Slowly, the woman pulled down her hood. A mess of brown and grey hair spilled onto her shoulders, and though there were new wrinkles upon it, her face was one that Han knew well.

"Hello, Han," Qi'ra smiled. "It's been a while."

Finally, he spoke.

"Oh look. Things got worse."

"Resistance come in," Kaydel tried her comm yet again. "Resistance, this is Lieutenant Connix, please come in, we have a Mayday. Please respond!"

"Still nothing, Sweetie?" Timor asked.

"No," Kaydel rolled her eyes. Dacken had abandoned her to once more check on Hena and her son. "And don't call me Sweetie."

"Why not?" Timor chuckled. "I'm your father. I'm allowed to call you whatever I want."

He tried to sling an arm over her shoulders. They were sitting on the floor together as Kaydel fiddled with her comm to see if there was something she could do.

"Get off!" she pushed his arm off her. "You lost that right when you let Mom throw me out of the house. You turned your back on me, and now you want to pretend that nothing's happened? No, that's not how this is going to work. I don't care if you offered to pay Hena's medical bills, you're despicable."

"Ko..." Timor took a deep breath, "your mother is a very difficult woman-"

"And you're a spineless snob," Kaydel spat.

Dacken laughed, returning to the pair, "Look, I came back in time for our family's favorite tradition: yelling at each other."

"Shut up!" she snapped at him. "You're just a cruel, sadistic, bastard. At least he can say his cruelty is from a lack of agency."

Dacken sighed, "Am I not allowed to apologize?"

"Apologize all you want. You set my fire on fire you sick fuck!" Kaydel was too stressed and had too many years of anger built up in her to consider his recent kind actions.

"You do remember that I was recently set on fire?" Dacken asked dryly.

"Fuck off!"

"Kaydel Ko Connix! Watch your language!" Timor scolded. "And for the love of the Goddesses, would you put on a shirt?"

"Oh, don't even!" Kaydel spun on her heel. She didn't care that she had been waltzing around for more than an hour in her bra. A very alluring and lacy black and magenta piece that had clearly been meant for Poe to have fun with her later. Timor had offered his own shirt, but Kaydel refused to accept anything from him. "Aunt Ally can scold me for my language, not you! And I am more than happy to waltz around in a bra if it means my friend won't bleed to death."
Snap groaned where he was lying not too far from them, horror in his eyes knowing he could never unlive a lightsaber cauterizing his no longer bleeding leg.

"I support this topless decision," Berd, who hadn't moved from near the group, called out.

Sasa promptly shocked him with a little Force Lightning.

"Bitch," he muttered, rubbing his leg.

Sasa and Kaydel shared a small smile.

"Aunt Ally?" Timor scowled.

"That's what you're focusing on?" Kaydel rolled her eyes as Dacken decided he had enough of being insulted and walked back to Hena and her son. "Yeah, I found Aunt Aletha. She's been ten times the parent to me in two years than you and Mom were in seventeen."

"You threw your daughter out at seventeen?" Sasa groaned, cradling her arm but too afraid to move her leg. There was no doubt that Sasa's leg had been thoroughly screwed up but the pillar collapsing on her. Her collarbone was barely in better shape and she refused to take any of Kaydel's painkillers, convincing Kaydel to hand them out to the injured children in the hotel lobby.

"And speaking of Aunt Ally," Kaydel continued, "how dare you use us in your presentation? You don't support the Resistance or the Rebellion!"

Timo sighed, "Ko, you have to understand, your Aunt Alecta-"

"I don't care!" Kaydel snapped. "I know she's a threat, so I decided to stand and fight, not cower behind Mom and excuses like you do. Timor Connix, you're just a pathetic fucking coward and worst Goddesses-damned father in the galaxy."

"Oh, am I?" he glowered at her. Timor may be the submissive one in his marriage, but he wasn't completely spineless. "And that boy you've been cavorting with... bet he's just a gift from the Goddesses."

"After the life you put me through, yes, Poe, Aunt Ally, General Organa, and my friends are truly a gift from the Goddesses."

"Unbelievable. What happened to you, Ko? You were such a nice girl. A sweet girl. And now you're a foul-mouthed, violent, turncoat who gave her innocence to some Yavinese pilot."

"Oh no, I gave my innocence to a Nubian waiter on Coruscant six months after you threw me out, but trust me, Poe's been vigorously and eagerly meeting those needs for almost two years now. And trust me, Father, he's really good at screwing me."

Timo could barely hold back a shudder, "Did he teach you your uncouth vocabulary?"

"No, that's credit to Jessika fucking Pava."

Somewhere in the Galaxy, Jessika fucking Pava smiled.

Timo shook his head, "I just don't understand, what changed you?"

"What changed me?" Kaydel's eyes flashed. Rage exploding, she pointed to Dacken, "What changed me was that you let him and his psychopath brother set my hair on fire and get away with "it! ...You never even apologized for it."

A silence clung to the air like everyone was waiting for Timor to apologize now.

Timor said nothing.

Kaydel fought her tears, "I'm going to go try to contact the others again."

No one followed after her as she cried... but Dacken considered it.

Sasa sighed and looked away from the speechless Timor Connix. Something pulled at her mind, a voice she wanted to forget.

"Get that thing to stop crying, or I'll do it myself!"

No, Sasa pushed the voice away. Timor wasn't like the voice. Timor was hands off and neglectful.

That voice was anything but.

"Well, that was eventful," Berd knelt down next to Sasa. Noticing her pained movements, he offered her his water flask, "Here, drink. Kylo will have me strung up if I don't take care of you."

"Thank you," Sasa's hands shook as she took it from him.

His eyes were on her carefully as she brought it up to her lips, but her eyes were not on him. Instead, Sasa watched Kaydel off in the corner trying to contact the Resistance. Feeling someone staring at her, Kaydel looked up, and for a minute their eyes met. A strange sort of understanding passed between them... one they couldn't explain.

And then the voice spoke again.

"Come on, it's a good deal. The right thing to do. Then she won't be our problem anymore."

The water met her lips and Sasa winced. Her connections with both Kaydel and the voice was severed as an acidic bitterness hit her tongue.

Sasa coughed, her body instinctually rejecting the water.

"Are you okay?" Berd rubbed her back.

She struggled to keep a grip on his flask, "Yeah. Fine, just the water's a little off."

Berd chuckled, "Budget cuts are a bitch."

Sasa laughed, "Don't I know it."

"Here," he guided her hands to lift the flask once more. "Drink deep so you're in good shape for Kylo."

He watched her very closely as she swallowed a mouthful of the bitter water.

"Good," Berd patted her shoulder. "Keep drinking. I'm going to see if I can make contact with the First Order. Keep an eye on Doxl."

"Will do," Sasa smiled and eyed the unmoving form next to her.

She checked his pulse and held her hand above his mouth. No pulse. No breath. Doxl was one with Sasa's stomach dropped as she wondered who would take his place among the Knights of Ren... and who would take hers if she let the pain she was in win.

She was so tired.

"Hey, are you okay?"

Sasa looked up to see a very concerned Kaydel standing in front of her.

"Yeah, fine." She made a cheers motion with the flask, "The water will make me right."

Kaydel frowned, "Is something wrong with it? I saw you pull a face."

"Oh, no," Sasa chuckled, "our budget got cut last year, so the First Order bought all these really cheap water flasks. After a few months, they start getting this bitter taste because of something in the plastic. It's fine. Just wasn't expecting the water to taste sour."

"Are you... Are you sure?"

"Positive. What else could it be?"

Kaydel wasn't certain... but she had an idea. An idea she didn't like one bit.

And in that moment, Dacken could have sworn he saw Doxl twitch.

---

We tried, but then the First Order started testing weapons on our planet, and invited arms dealers from all over the galaxy to watch. You'd see them in the spaceports and supply depots, wearing shimmering fabrics and lush furs that made us feel ashamed of our stained jumpsuits and patched cloaks.

- Rose Tico: Resistance Fighter

A very long silence hung in the air as the men stared at Qi'ra. She looked absolutely stunning in the scene of death and destruction. The hood of her cape was trimmed with fur that had been stained with blood. Hung from her belt were the pair of custom bronzium Kyuzo petars Dryden Vos once tried to slit her throat with.

Elegant and deadly. Headgirl Scrumrat Qi'ra had grown into the position of Crime Syndicate Mob Boss well.

Qi'ra smiled, brushing a bit of dusk off her fur as she waited for the men to respond. Kes and Evan exchanged a confused glance, lost by the situation, while Chewie gave her a low but vicious growl and Han was just glaring at her.

"What?" Qi'ra smiled at Han. "Not even a hello?"

"Why are you messing with the First Order, Qi'ra?" Han asked. His weapons was still raised, "Don't you have better things to do?"

"Laertes is off with an expansion possibility and I had to amuse myself somehow," her voice was light speaking as if they were still friends or even lovers. "Besides, I owe someone a favor."
"Bombing a conference, stealing some weapons, and assassinating a Knight of Ren?" Han saw her startle at the last one. "You must owe a really big favor."

"I don't know what you mean," Qi'ra's voice was smooth.

"Oh, don't do that. I know why you're here."

"I doubt that."

"Yeah?" Han challenged. "It's Crimson Dawn pretending they're stealing weapons by pretending to be Imperial Loyalists, but really you're here to kill a Knight of Ren. Just admit it."

Qi'ra sighed, "Alright, fine. I don't know where you got your information, but yes, that's why we're here. But I'm not pretending about stealing weapons. We are doing that too."

"Have you actually lost your mind?"

"Oh, I could counter with so many stories about your insanity, I don't even know where to start."

Kes and Evan just stared at each other.

"What is going on here?" Evan asked.

"I have no idea," Kes replied.

"Well, aren't we being rude?" Qi'ra laughed. "We haven't done proper greetings, Han. Aren't you going to introduce me to your friends?"

"Oh, no you don't," Han knew better. "Last time I introduced you to one of my friends, you ended up stabbing her in the leg."

"Hey! Your sister-in-law started it!"

"It's Felicity Rhiaon. She always starts it."

"Yeah, I heard what the First Order did to her. Tough break." Qi'ra's childhood on Corellia had hardened her at a very young age to the idea of death.

Kes blinked, "Guys… can we focus on why we're here?"

"This is why we're here," Han snapped. His eyes flashed as they narrowed in on Qi'ra, "What do you think you're doing going after the Knights of Ren? I thought we had an agreement."

"An agreement I'm not breeching," Qi'ra countered instantly.

"What agreement?" Evan asked.

Han sighed, "We… kind of have a pact about our kids. I've never met hers and she's never met mine, but Qi'ra and I agreed that Ben and… I honestly don't even know if her kid is a boy or girl, much less what it's named."

"I think Laertes would kill both of us if I told you. He's very protective of our child."

"Your husband is an ass, and you should have dumped him years ago."

"Well, I'm sorry that we can't all marry royalty," Qi'ra spat. Her voice was rank with bitterness, "Do you honestly know how insulting it is for your first boyfriend – and probably only man who genuinely ever cared about you – to turn around and marry an honest to the Gods Princess?"

"Hey, you had your shoot with me! You were the one who threw it away!"

"Wait, wait, wait," Kes interjected. He looked like he was holding back a laugh, "Your ex-girlfriend… is the leader of Crimson Dawn?"

"Not just ex-girlfriend," Qi'ra chuckled as she turned to Kes, standing next to Han. Both of them facing towards Kes, Qi'ra placed a hand on Han's shoulder in an overly familiar gesture,
"First girlfriend. I made him a man."

"Oh, I am so telling Poe to use that against you," Kes grinned.

"Huh," Evan mused, "that's where Poe gets it from."
Looking rather annoyed, Han physically lifted Qi'ra's hand off his shoulder and dropped it to her side.

"This isn't a joke, Qi'ra," he said coldly. "What do you think you're doing? Why are you going after my son?"

"I'm not going after your son," she replied. "Our deal is unbreeched, Han. My target isn't Kylo, just some a Knight of Ren. A girl who needs to be knocked out of power because she's gained the wrong person's affections."

"So your men are instructed not to hurt my son as collateral damage?"

"If that's why you came out here, I'm sorry to say but it was all in vain. Kylo isn't here. I made sure of that before I took the job."

"Kylo Ren is here," Evan spoke up. "He joined the mission at the last minute."
Qi'ra's face faded a few shades lighter, "He- He's here?"

"Yep," Evan held up his recorder watch and after a little fiddling display a small holo of Kylo in the ballroom.

"No…” she looked lost. Panic filled her eyes, "No, I specifically asked if Kylo was going to be here.
I was assured he would not be."

"Looks like your informant had it wrong," Han said bitterly.
Qi'ra sighed, closing her eyes as she considered the situation. She didn't know if Tara had made a mistake or genuinely withheld information from her. Either way, they were have a serious talk later.

"This is... a big problem," Qi'ra admitted.

"I don't think so," Han shot. "Call your men and tell them not to shoot my son. Theirs too if you feel like it."

"You don't understand," Qi'ra said, "I can't call them off. The comms are being blocked."

"Wait," Evan cut in, "you blocked off your own comms?"

"Why?" Kes asked in amazement.
"It was an all or nothing situation," Qi'ra explained. "Besides, I didn't expect I needed to communicate with them once the plan was in action. Crimson Dawn runs like a well-oiled machine. I expect the best."

"Well, I'm glad that your team building exercises and training Holos have been such a hit," Han rolled his eyes. "But what are we going to do."

"They're only going to stand down if the order comes directly from me." Qi'ra thought about it, "Maybe we can come to an arrangement."

Chewie and Han exchanged a look. The Wookiee rolled his eyes and said they probably shouldn't take it.

"I don't know if we have a choice, Pal," Han sighed. He still didn't move to holster his blaster, "Alright, Qi'ra, what's this grand idea? I swear if it results you helping Luke's ex-girlfriend taking out a hit on my wife again-"

"For the last time, Han, that was Laertes. Not me."

"Laertes?" Kes questioned.

"Her husband," Han explained. "He's never liked me hanging around and constantly schemes ways to get rid of me. I think my favorite time was the one where he didn't like that once upon a time, I slept with his wife, so he decided it would only be fair to sleep with mine."

Kes raised an eyebrow.

"It didn't end well for him," Han grinned. "Leia put in the hospital for six months."

"Again, I was not involved with that at all," Qi'ra said. "In fact, that was when I took a year and a half off from Crimson Dawn to spend time with our child."

"Speaking of kids," Han prompted.

"Alright," Qi'ra sighed, "I can tell my men to stand down, but only personally. If anyone hurts Kylo before I can find them, I refuse to accept responsibility. I specifically looked in to whether or not he was going to be here and the answer was no."

"Okay," Han nodded. "So what's the catch?"

She smiled, "However… if you want protection for the rest of your people, I'm not willing to give a bunch of names and descriptions. It's too confusing beyond just one person and my men might forget and your people will get hurt anyway."

"So?" he pushed.

"You want protection for everyone else, you have to stick with me. All of you. The deal is you stay with us as we go into the ballroom – where your son should be – as we go collect the Kation Defense Holdings and Connix Industries weaponry – whatever remains of it – and we'll help you and your people escape unharmed."

"Are you crazy?" Evan exclaimed. "We help you with a heist and you'll try to not get us shot?"

Kes placed a hand on Evan's arm and shook his head. The message was clear: stand down.

"Fine, but… Solo," he said, "how can we trust her?"
"Kid's got a point," Han's eyes didn't move from Qi'ra. "Why should I do this deal?"

"Because it's the only way you'll safely see your son."

The answer clung to the air as her words sat on them like a heavy fog.

Qi'ra watched as Han debated the deal, sure his son may have been a monster in the mask these days, but she knew Han Solo. She knew his heart; she knew he would do anything for his son the way he once would have done anything for her. The thought Han still always made her smile.

And smiled she did as he slowly lowered his weapon. Qi'ra moved her hand forward to offer a handshake but stopped when he suddenly reached into his pocket.

Han Solo held up a pair of golden dice on a chain.

Qi'ra gave a small laugh, "I thought you kept those on your ship."

"Only when I'm flying it, otherwise I like to keep them on my person," he replied stiffly. "A nice little reminder that no matter how much I love something or someone, I can still end up losing them."

Han could have sworn he saw Qi'ra flinch.

Kes and Evan just traded a look.

"I am so confused right now," Evan declared.

"Yeah, is she helping us or not, Solo?" Kes asked.

Han put the dice back in his pocket, but made no move to shake her hand, nor to extend his weapon.

"I don't trust you," he said. "I haven't been able to trust you in forty years. You've betrayed me not once, not twice, but every time we've crossed paths since Corellia. But this is not about you and me anymore. It's about my kid. It's about his kid."

Han nodded to Kes.

"About every kid who is now fighting a war we should have ended a long time ago. And because of that, and only because of that, I will agree to the terms and make this deal with you… even though I know you're going to stab me in the back once more."

Qi'ra was hesitant when Han offered his hand but conceded to shake it.

"Alright," he quickly dropped her hand and took two steps away. "Let's get in there and find our kids."

Kes Dameron and Chewbacca had his back immediately, the trio heading for the door. Evan looked between Qi'ra and the men a few times, still greatly confused, but then scampered after them.

"You're wrong about one thing, Han," Qi'ra called.

Han stopped and turned look at her, "Oh yeah?"

"I've never stabbed you in the back." That vulnerable part of Qi'ra he once knew and loved on the filthy streets of Corellia emerged. "I've never been able to betray you to your face."

"Yeah," he said softly. "And it just makes things all that much worse. Come on, we've got a deal to
"Alright," Qi'ra grinned, "just promise me you're not going to pretend another rock is a thermal detonator."

Han clicked his tongue and winked, "Got us off Corellia, didn't it?"

Qi'ra just laughed.

Kaydel was sitting with knees tucked into her chest, staring in dismay at Snap when she heard a voice.

"Is this seat taken?"

She looked up and just nodded at Dacken. He gave a half-hearted smile and settled next to her.

For a long time they sat in silence.

"It was Deek's idea."

Kaydel frowned and turned her head, "What?"

"Deek was the one who thought to set your hair on fire," Dacken said. "Deek was the one who found the matches. Deek was the one to make sure that Grandma was asleep… I was the one who lit your hair on fire."

Kaydel winced.

"I am truly sorry about that Kayko," he said softly. "I try to justify it by telling myself that I was the one who brought the water to put you out, that you didn't really get hurt, that it wasn't my idea, but… but you're right. I'm a sick fuck. I need help, Kayko. And I don't know what to do with my life. I don't fit in with this family. I don't have the heart or stomach to do the awful things they do."

She said nothing; just let him talk.

"Part of my internship is filing the customer complaints… there are so many people getting hurt. So many lives being lost that shouldn't. So many people who don't get to grow up with a mother because of weapons we make."

Kaydel sighed, "I guess I've never really stopped to think how this all feels for you. You had a mom that cared about you and she got taken away. I'm an insult to your memory of her."

"Doesn't mean you deserved what happened."

"No, it doesn't."

Dacken took a deep breath, "Kaydel."

She sucked in her air; she knew the struggle it would be for him to call her his mother's name.

"I am truly and deeply sorry for what I did," there were tears in his eyes. "There is no excuse for what I did. It was wrong and if I could take it back, I would. Is there any way you could ever come to forgive me? Maybe not today, maybe not tomorrow, but… someday?"

It took her a long time to answer.
"Yes."

Dacken gave a disbelieving smile.

Kaydel reached out her hand and clasped his, "Maybe not today, maybe not tomorrow, but someday."

"I want to be a better man Aunt Kayko."

"Then be one. Join the Resistance."

"Really?"

"Aunt Ally took me in, and now I'll take you." Kaydel grinned and quoted her aunt, "I'll take any part of you you're offering, My Darling."

"Ugh," Dacken shuddered, "don't call me Darling."

Kaydel laughed and pulled in her nephew = her four years older than her nephew – in for a hug. Her family was hard, but maybe, just maybe, some of them deserved a second chance.

Suddenly she pulled back, "But if you screw this up, I'm setting you on fire."

"Deal," he laughed.

Kaydel returned his laughter, smiling wider than she had in a long time. She opened her mouth to respond with some witty retort when she saw something that made her blood run cold.

Moaning in pain, Sasa Ren was rolling on the ground convulsing and throwing up uncontrollably.

"Sasa!" Kaydel leapt to her feet, Dacken on his a moment after.

Loath she was to admit it, Kaydel had developed a bit of an affection for Sasa over the past week. Their ideologies might be different, but there was something genuinely sweet and honest about that Knight of Ren. So Kaydel was determined to do whatever she could in her power to help Sasa in her condition.

But Kaydel didn't reach her in time because when Kaydel was only a couple of metres away from Sasa, someone got to her first. The so-called dead body of Doxl Ren suddenly rolled over and pulled a vibroblade from his belt.

Dacken and Kaydel could do nothing but watch in horror as he plunged it down into Sasa's abdomen.

Her scream was another noise that Kaydel Ko Connix would never forget.

Author's Note (too big to put in normal spot)

For those of you who don't know, I'm not just forgetting about TFA and now TLJ. I actually have some days I sit down and write bits of those future chapters. In fact, the first chapter of TFA where Poe goes to Jakku has been fully written for about a year and a half now. I've been changing and adding new things as new material is released and new stories arise. For example, I have recently had to go in and add in parts that include Poe's relationship with Kaydel, Kylo's relationship with Sasa, and address the fact that Rey knows who BB-8 is.

That was not a fun edit to work all of that in.

The problem with this is that sometimes choices I make have ended up contradicting the material I have already written, forcing me to change parts and delete others.

Why do I mention this?

Because I have already fully written the scene of Poe naming Finn in its original spot in TFA. I now have to fully cut the scene and replace the dialogue with something else now. As I do enjoy the original scene, I will present it to you here now as a deleted/alternate scene.

Enjoy.

"Hey, what's your name?" Poe asked, it finally occurring to him that maybe it was polite to know the name of the guy who had rescued him and helped him steal a ship to epically made an escape (or were at least attempting an epic escape) from the First Order.

He expected his Stormtrooper friend to have a name like Captain Phasma, considering that his Stormtrooper friend had been unquestioned when he claimed Poe was needed by Kylo Ben (Poe made a mental note to always call Ben Solo that from now. It really had pissed him off, and Poe wasn't about to give any shred of kindness to a man who facilitated the death of a five-year-old, especially when said five-year-old was the cousin of said Wannabe Sith Lord.)

Poe fully expected his friend to declare his name was something like Lieutenant Sabre, or Sergeant Macro. And even if his Stormtrooper friend had not yet climbed the ranks, Poe was fully expecting to hear some inconsequential serial number like THX-1183, NH-1977, or RJ-1983.

What Poe wasn't expecting was to hear a very familiar string of letters and numbers.

"FN-2187!" The Stormtrooper shouted.

"F," Poe started to repeat, his brain not yet making the connection.

And then he stopped.

"What?" Poe exclaimed.

Did his Stormtrooper friend just say FN-2187?

"That's the only name they ever gave me," FN-2187 explained, clearly thinking that the issue was Poe was shocked by the concept of Stormtroopers only having serial numbers.

But that wasn't what had thrown Poe. Oh, he was perfectly aware that First Order Stormtroopers only had serial numbers. He had fought in the Resistance far too long not to be aware of it.

It was the number FN-2187 that gave him pause. A significant number in his family's circle of friends. A number that had been defiantly displayed by a founding member of the Resistance. A number that had been very famously tattooed onto the wrist of a close family friend. A number that had been repeated over and over throughout the years as a reminder of one woman's failure and determination. A number that was at the very center of one of the Resistance's biggest fiascos.

Poe Dameron could not believe what he was hearing; FN-2187. He was sitting right next to the very child that had been ripped out of Felicity Rhiaon's arms, twenty-three years ago.
And Poe had saved him.

… Okay, FN-2187 had actually saved himself, but Poe definitely helped.

In the brief few seconds granted to Poe by FN-2187's explanation, he let his mind go to the memories of Felicity Rhiaon, his dear family friend who suffered a horrifying death at the hands of the man who had captured and tortured Poe. Poe remembered Felicity's determination to someday once again find FN-2187 and free him. He remembered how Felicity had always said she could never be content until the day FN-2187 was free, had his own name, and knew that there was at least one person in the world who cared about him.

Poe had always been disturbed by the thought that Felicity Rhiaon's soul could never find peace. He wondered if she was restless in the afterlife, helpless to complete her one last piece of business.

Well, Poe was more than happy to complete that business. FN-2187 was free and knew someone cared about him (his new friend, Poe) but he still needed one more thing.

A name.

"Well, I ain't using it!" Poe stubbornly declared. "F-N, huh?"

Poe thought quickly. After all these years, FN-2187 would be granted his very own name and become his very own person. The only question was what to call him? It had to be something epic and brilliant and significant and unforgettable. Something like…

"Finn," Poe decreed. "I'm gonna call you Finn!"

…Okay, maybe Poe wasn't the greatest at naming things.

Kaydel was so going to make fun of him for this.

"Is that all right?" Poe turned to look back at his friend.

"Finn," FN-2187 tried out the name. "Yeah, Finn, I like that! I like that!"

Poe turned back and had to suppress a chuckle. Good, the kid had as bad taste in names as Poe did. He was certain that Commander Nalto would tease him endlessly when he brought Finn back to the Resistance with him, but at least Finn liked his name.

"I'm Poe," Poe introduced himself. "Poe Dameron."

"Good to meet you, Poe!" Finn said enthusiastically.

"Good to meet you too, Finn!" Poe shot back.

And Finn had no idea truly how good it felt for Poe to finally meet Finn.

Chapter End Notes

Coming Up Next Chapter…
Kaydel's Decision
The groups converge in an epic battle to escape the resort, but when the other Knights of Ren arrive, Kylo forces Kaydel to make a decision between Poe's freedom and her own.

I absolutely love that in the reviews for last chapter everyone thought it was going to be Kaydel who died. Come on, guys. I literally said a chapter ago that Kaydel will tell Poe in a couple years to kill Kylo Ren. Plus I brought back Jaina for what honestly looked like no reason whatsoever. You really think I would be that cruel?

...She says in a chapter where a guy's leg was blown off and they used a lightsaber to cauterize the wound.

So, I was informed there is another book in the series of Rey's Survival Guide, Poe Dameron: Flight Log, and The Journal of Paige Tico called Rose Tico: Resistance Fighter. I got it and love it (there is a god damn hilarious quote about Poe hating Holdo that I need to use so badly) and I will be pulling quotes from there too as you have seen.

There is just one tiny problem from the book, in it, Rose confirms her parents are named Thanya and Hue. In my story you'll have noticed that I named Rose and Paige's father, Vien. Frankly, I like the name Vien better than Hue and there is something later in this story involving the name of the Tico father. So, I've decided to disregard the canon name Hue and just go with Vien.

So, for those who are asking, I've got good news and bad news for the question of when will we reach TFA. The good news is I sat down and pounded out a scene by scene, beat by beat, joke by joke, 100% inclusive exact plan and outline of what happens between now and the start of TFA.

This includes sorting out all the characters from Luke, Quom, and Rey on Jakku, Kira's Council and the Resistance on D'Qar, Kes and Shayna on Yavin IV, Han, Chewie, and Waroo, what Lando is up to, what happens in the Tara/Kylo/Sasa love triangle, what the Knights of Ren do, what happens with the other First Order officers, what happens with Black Squadron, what happens with Holdo, what happens with the Resistance medical teams, what happens with Teng, what happens with Lor San Tekka, the story of Rey using Luke's lightsaber for the first time, the story of how Aletha learns the truth about Luke, a flashback sequence explaining and revisiting important moments of the story to see a certain character's point of view and explain their motivations, what happens with Finn and the FN squad.

I know everything. The outline is 74 pages long and tells me exactly what chapter will be the first one of TFA... give or take a few if certain chapters get too long but I kept a two-page rule for each chapter.

And that's the bad news. You want the honest truth? TFA starts at chapter 90.

Yes, I tried to cut that down but in order for every character to properly be in the spot I need them to be for TFA, we've got a lot of chapters to go. I'm hoping to hit TFA sometime next year, but let's be honest, it's probably going to be around the release of Episode 9.

I thank you all for your patience and understanding. As I said before I changed the story summary to reflect the fact we won't hit TFA until chapter 90. However, please keep in mind, as evidenced by this chapter where Finn and Poe meet and Poe names Finn, there will be parts of TFA that happen before technically the Force Awakens.

That said, I can't explicitly say why it's going to take so long to get to TFA, but you will see why. There's about four or five major stories that occur that significantly change the characters and stakes of TFA. Let me just put it this way (skip if you don't want spoilers) Finn and Rey might not actually be meeting for the first time during TFA, and the whole idea of Rey coming in and being the Skywalker Heir is a much larger threat to Kylo.

Once more, I thank you for your patience and I hope you enjoy the story for what it is rather than what ultimately is one of many story arcs in this tale. Remember, this is the story of Luke and Rey being in each other's lives; TFA is just one part of a much bigger story.
Chapter Summary

Sasa Ren's dress is a secret masterpiece, Snap makes a badass shot, and Roses hates Stromtroopers, yet can't stop thinking about Marks' butt.

Chapter Notes

Fuck it, I’m cutting the chapter in half because you guys need an explanation.

Hey guys, sorry about the long wait between updates. I’ve been really busy over the past few months because – great news – I got a new job.

Also I get ridiculously addicted to Mamma Mia, so don’t be surprised if you see a Mamma Mia fic pop up under my penname.

Anyway, the new job now has me working normal hours, will allow me most of the weekend off (Sundays for certain and getting home at 4:00 at the latest on Saturdays.) Plus, I’m no longer mentally and physically exhausted after work and spending my days off just resting as I’m too tired even to write. It also unloads a bunch of other stresses and offers other benefits to me that are tangential to writing, but a little too personal to get into here.

So, sorry about the wait, but hopefully with this new job I can get into a better posting rhythm. However, I would like to remind all of you that I never promise a consistent day to update. With my personal life, mental health disorder, and general writing style (I literally cannot force myself to do creative writing as my brain and muse just shut everything down in retaliation) I can’t keep to hard deadlines with creative writing.

I also want to thank everyone who gave me encouragement in the last chapter over the fact it’s still a long way away until TFA. As one reviewer said The title said all. Isn’t it, the Long Way Home after all. Indeed it is, and the title of this fic became ironically meta, but trust me, I guarantee that in the next chapter you will see one of the many reasons why it's taking so long

Finally, I’m going to be breaking my self-imposed rule of don’t directly translate what Wookiees or droids are saying. I’ve always believed it to be part of the magic of Star Wars, and I don’t translate. However, Waroo’s dialogue is going to be important not in this chapter, but a little while from now. So I’m introducing a Waroo exclusive thing. Anytime I want to translate what Waroo is saying, the dialogue will be framed [Like this. Waroo will be the only Wookiee or droid I do this for, so don’t get used to it.] Got it? Good.

Anyway, yay me! Enjoy the chapter.
The vibroblade had been in Sasa’s abdomen for less than a minute before she shot Doxl off her. The surge of blue lightning coming from her fingertips was more intense than the shocks Luke Skywalker endured on the second Death Star. Still, the blade was painful, so her scream rang off what remained of the walls.

Immediately the nausea returned and Sasa rolled onto her front and resumed her vomiting. Her convulsions began to ebb, but she still twinged and shook beyond her control.

And then the boot came down on the back of her neck.

If there was something Sasa Ren was proud about, it was her knowledge of fashion and her ability to remember what people were wearing. Even pinned to the ground, she could tell whose boot was on her neck.

Rubber sole, grip slightly worn down. The tread had a stylistic star pattern – the signature of a Corellian designer she personally liked to shop from. The man – indicated by the masculine grunt he made – shifted his weight forward to intensify the pressure. He moved a little too far and the toe of his boot brushed her neck. It was happabore leather, she knew the texture in an instant, and she only knew one person who wore rubber soled, happabore leather boots made by her favorite Corellian designer.

“Berd,” Sasa squeaked. “Stop… Please.”

She tried with all her might not to throw up again. Berd Ren was strangling her in a very odd way, face down, forcing her head to bend painfully as the front of her neck was pinned to the floor. If she threw up in this position, she was done: she would choke, and she would die.

“Sorry, Sasa,” Berd pressed down hard. “But you knew this was coming.”

Her throat burned with the stomach acid left behind from her convulsions of vomit. She shook, making the strangulation more painfully. Her Cerise Signature thrashed about as well, desperately, pathetically searching to find Kylo, to find FN-2187, to find Nova or Wiln or even Marks.

But the Force was out of her reach.

“Please, Berd… Please… It hurts.”

“If I could switch it to a Force Choke, I would. It would be quicker and cleaner, but that’s the problem: it’s too clean. Kylo would know it was me in an instant. He has to think it was Doxl, and with both of you dead there will be no one to correct him.”

“But Doxl isn’t-”

“I’ll take care of that soon enough.”

Sasa just sobbed. Where was Kylo? Where was FN-2187? She wanted them. Someone by her side who cared about her. Sasa didn’t even need rescue, her death at Tara’s hands seemed a given. All she wanted was at least someone who cared about her by her side to give her one last comfort. But she was alone… and she was going to die alone.

And then Kaydel Ko Connix smashed Berd across the head with what pieces remained of a side table from one of the cozy lounge areas of the lobby.

Having watched HoloNet all her life, Kaydel expected such an act to knock Berd out.

It did not.

But it did make him fall forward, giving Kaydel time to flip over Sasa… but it also made Berd furious.

“You bitch!” he roared as Kaydel turned Sasa’s head to let her throw up. Berd lunged for Kaydel but was knocked to the ground by Dacken.

“Go, Kayko!” Dacken yelled.

“Come on,” Kaydel urged the Knight of Ren.

Sasa was unable to get to her feet, her body still going haywire, so Kaydel went with Plan B. Kaydel struggled to pick up Sasa off the ground. She wasn’t strong enough to carry Sasa, at least not very far. Fumbling, Kaydel ungracefully dropped Sasa to the ground.

“Sorry!” Kaydel winced.

As Kaydel and Sasa figured out the best way to get Sasa away was Kaydel dragging her by the arms across the ballroom – not a fun thing for Sasa with her broken collarbone – Dacken tried his best to hold off Berd with his fists.

The girls had just reached Snap when Kaydel was grabbed by the hair and torn away from Sasa. Kaydel shrieked in pain, but tackled Doxl, who had finally gathered himself from his electrocution. Doxl tried to throw her off him but Sasa scratched him across the face and grabbed his lightsaber.

She chucked it to Snap, who caught it with one hand.

Sasa went to do the same with the vibroblade but he grabbed her wrist and twisted. Sasa dropped the knife but Kaydel’s fingers instantly replaced hers, and now she was the one grappling with Doxl. Kaydel locked her free arm around his neck and tried to strangle him as best she could.

Kaydel was very thankful for all those fisticuffs training General Organa insisted all Resistance soldiers have (sometimes even being the one who sparred with the students.) Actually, it was being assigned partners in that class that Paige and Kaydel met, and Jessika Pava had beaten up Kira’s Council many times as so called training sessions. Though sometimes Kaydel wondered if Jessika’s matches with all the members of Kira’s Council (minus Kira) was just showing off to Tallie.

And yes, by all members of Kira’s Council that included the occasional session with Aletha.

But thank the Goddesses for Jessika’s need to show off, Kaydel thought in that moment as one arm strangled Doxl while the other hand fought against his to grip the vibroblade.

Then Doxl decided to slam backwards to smash Kaydel to the ground.

Kaydel had the wind knocked out of her, but it was the moment she got the upper hand. Doxl was distracted by performing the move, and Kaydel took her chance. She tore the vibroblade from his grasp and when he pinned her to the ground, Kaydel released her choking arm.
Without a second thought, Kaydel slit the blade across his neck.

His eyes bugged, and Doxl gave a raspy choke. Then he went limp in her arms.

It jolted through her. Shocked at her two second decision, Kaydel dropped the blade. She touched his neck and felt his clotting blood. Her fingers trailed across the line left behind by his own blade, not stomaching the action of looking at her handiwork.

He was dead. Kaydel Ko Connix had held a man in her arms and slit his throat. Bile rushed up into her mouth, but she forced it back down. Kaydel dropped Doxl and hit the ground face first with a sickening thwack!

She stared at his unmoving body, shaken by her actions. Her fingers frantically twiddled, pushing the blood around like she was trying not to let herself forget this hot, sticky red mess she brought forward.

Kaydel had killed in battle before… but this was the first time she had murdered someone.

And her hand was wet with his blood.

Across the room, Berd and Dacken were still going fist to fist. Dacken’s moves were so quick and unexpected that Berd hadn’t gotten the chance to even reach his lightsaber, let alone use it.

“Get out of my way,” Berd swung at Dacken with his fist, but he dodged and hit Berd square in the face.

“What? And miss all the fun?” Dacken drove an elbow into Berd’s stomach.

“Oh, you want fun?”

Berd kicked high, his boot smashing into Dacken’s face and sending him to the ground. The Knight automatically reached for his lightsaber, but Dacken grabbed a shard of twisted metal and barrelled into his legs. Berd buckled and hit the ground knees first.

Using the opportunity, Dacken slashed Berd’s belt, slicing it in two. The lightsaber hit the ground with a thud. Berd may have the Force, but he was cut off from it and Dacken was quicker. A split second before Berd could grab it, Dacken’s hand enclosed over the hilt and snatched it away.

“Granddad! Catch!” Dacken chucked it at Timor without another word of warning.

But as Kaydel had learned long ago, Timor Connix did not value family over his own neck. Timor didn’t even watch to see where the lightsaber landed – heck, the lightsaber might not have even hit the ground – before he started into the excuses.

“Oh no, Dacken, we can’t. If Alecta found out I had helped-”

And so forth the usual nonsense he had used to justify disowning his daughter. He just rambled on, sitting next to Hena, the mother of the legless child.

“Throw it back!” Berd roared at Timor.

“Granddad, no!” Dacken pleaded.

But that meant nothing to Timor, “Of course, Master Ren. I’ll just-”

Timor froze.
“Throw it!” Berd was losing his patience. “Do not make me come over there!”

“The lightsaber!” Timor cried. “It’s gone! I can’t find it!”

“What?”

“I don’t understand,” Timor looked around the area frantically. There was no sign of that silver hilt. “It has to be here! It landed over here. Oh, where is it?”

Hena kept her head low, trying not to draw the attention. She held her son tightly against her, counting the seconds until this would all be over.

No one noticed the lightsaber she kept hidden under her torn, bloody skirt.

“You little-” Berd grabbed Dacken by the throat. “I swear to the Supreme Leader, I’ll make you-”

A blaster bolt hit Berd square in the temple. He dropped to the ground, making Dacken stumble down with him in the process.

Dacken scowled, “What the?”

Snap Wexley slowly lowered his blaster, “Did everyone see that? Because that was awesome, and we’re telling everyone when we get back to D’Qar.”

“Uh… Buddy?” Dacken realized he didn’t actually remember what Snap’s name was. Dacken had chosen to check out the unmoving Berd to ensure they were safe, “You didn’t kill him.”

“I know,” Snap said. “Shot him with the highest stun setting.”

“Why?” Kaydel asked. She hid her bloody hand behind her back. No one could see it. She wouldn’t let them.

“Come on, Kay,” Snap lifted an eyebrow, “this is a set up against the First Order.”

“The First Order?” Sasa questioned. Her vomiting was starting to quell and her convulsions lessened. Sasa muttered what Kaydel could have sworn was to her own dress, “Come on, kick in faster.”

“Oh, yeah,” Dacken said. “Didn’t you have the same thought, Kayko?”

“What’s going on?” Sasa frowned.

“Never mind,” Kaydel knelt down next to Sasa. “I’ll explain later. How are you doing?”

“I’m doing better. I don’t think-” Sasa stopped to gag but nothing came up. “Sorry. I think the vomiting is subsiding. The twitching is stopping too. It’s finally starting to kick in.”

Snap and Kaydel exchanged a confused look.

“Uh… what’s kicking in?” Snap asked.

Sasa grunted as she shifted to show them where she had been stabbed. The handsewn, intricately designed seafoam green dress that Sasa had bragged to Kaydel about over breakfast that morning had barely been punctured. In the tiny area that had, a blue familiar ooze was seeping into the fabric and Sasa’s minor injury.

Kaydel stared at it in shock, “Is that… bacta?”
“What the actual hell?” Snap whispered.

Sasa grinned as she shifted herself again, this time into a more comfortable position, “Why do you think I was so proud of this dress? When I said that it had a complicated sewing feat that took me three days to get right, I didn’t mean the neckline. It was the under netting that was difficult.”

“Under… netting?” Kaydel repeated slowly. Sure, she didn’t know much about fashion, but she was a lot more lost than she knew she should be.

“The fabric is special,” Sasa explained. “I made it myself. Technically it’s four layers of fabric. The top is the seafoam gossamer, then underneath are two layers of a certain Mandalorian fabric. It’s woven into a protective material almost as impenetrable as plate armor, but surprisingly light weight. Was a bitch to dye green. You should have seen my hands. I made the mistake of… having an encounter with Kylo and he went into a meeting with the Supreme Leader not realizing he had green hand marks on his neck. Hux wouldn’t let him live it down. Underneath that is a material – very expensive, way too high a cost to mass produce – I designed of netting with pockets of bacta. If the other material got pierced, then the bacta would be punctured and I could immediately start getting medical treatment. Not only is it healing my stab and bombing wounds but whatever I’ve been drugged with is getting its ass kicked in my biological system right now. All in all, this dress is stronger and more beneficial protection than most suits of armor… and damn it, if I don’t look drop dead gorgeous in it.”

Kaydel, Snap, and Dacken all just stared at her.

“What…” Snap’s mouth was hanging open slightly.

“You’re hardcore,” Dacken nodded.

“I definitely underestimated your cunning,” Kaydel admitted.

“Come on, Kaydel,” Sasa smiled playfully, “Tara Ren has been trying to kill me for over a year. You don’t actually think I’d walk around defenseless?”

“Damn, Sasa,” Snap shook his head, “if I wasn’t happily married, I think I’d be falling in love.”

“Well, just remember, I did sear your leg with a lightsaber.”

“Feelings gone.”

“Good. You wouldn’t want to face Kylo.”

“And you wouldn’t want to face Karé.”

“Yes, forget Tara Ren,” Kaydel agreed, “Karé Kun can be a scary woman. So… Are you all healed now or something? I mean you were poisoned.”

“The bacta will do what it can, but I’ll need further medical intervention.” Sasa glanced to Snap, “Your friend too. But with me the best thing for healing will be to figure out how I got poisoned and stop it at the source.”

Kaydel blinked, “Are you serious?”

“What?”

“You can’t figure out how you were poisoned? Come on, it’s the simplest thing in the book! You drank from Berd’s water flask! It tasted sour! He poisoned you with his water!”

“Uh… Kay?” Snap interrupted. “It wasn’t poisoned.”

“What?” she scowled. “How do you know?”

“Because I drank from it too.”

It confused her for a minute and Kaydel remembered.

"You okay?" Kaydel asked as Berd gave him some water.

"No." Snap swallowed a painkiller from Kaydel's medicine belt. The most powerful pill in her stash was still not going to be anywhere enough to ease the agony he was about to endure. "I know I have to do it… but I have a really bad feeling about this."

“I drank before she did,” Snap pointed out. “If it had been poisoned, I would have gotten the symptoms too.”

Kaydel blinked, “…Oh.”

Sasa lifted an eyebrow, “You really think I would drink something untested? I saw your friend didn’t have a reaction, so I knew it was safe.”

“But… it was sour.”

“Because the idiotic department who bought them didn’t make sure they were BPA free. Plastic and chemicals have been leeching into the water making it sour. A replacement shipment is on the way to the First Order with better water bottles and canteens, but the new bottles got packed by our mission prep squad. Kylo was mad when he opened our bags and saw, but we were stuck with them. Repurchasing equipment we already had is something the expenses department would have our asses over. The Supreme Leader gives them a surprising amount of power.”

“So…” Kaydel tried to puzzle it out, “you were poisoned another way?”

“I suspect it happened when Berd dug me out of the rubble. That’s when I lost connection with the Force and Kylo. Now, let’s try to find Berd’s lightsaber and a way to contact our people so we can see if that medic of yours is still alive and can help me figure out the source of the poisoning. Someone go over to the check-in desk computer and see if you can find a layout of the grounds. We need to find the communications control center because the blocking is too powerful to be an independent machine. This is being straight up wired from the main center.”

Kaydel just stared at Sasa, “I’m starting to see why Kylo Ren is in love with you. You are so much more than dresses and flirting.”

“Come on. You don’t think the Supreme Leader keeps me around because I look pretty?”

“Not anymore.”

“There is a brain behind this beautiful face. I have a much grander purpose than to screw Kylo.”
Sasa paused. “So… put in a good word about me to his mother, okay?”

“Sure…” Kaydel sighed. “That’ll be a fun conversation.”

It wasn’t.

“So,” Marks stared up at the catwalk inside the communication control center. He and Waroo had been doing whatever Rose demanded of them, the group reprogramming, rebooting, and rewiring various control systems for a good half an hour. “The last thing that needs to be dealt with is up on that catwalk.”

“Correct,” Rose stood between him and Waroo looking extra short between the figures who were both abnormally tall for their species.

“And we need a ladder to get up there?”

“Correct.”

“But Waroo broke the ladder in half when he used it to hit those five Crimson Dawn lackeys guarding this place when we first got in here.”

[Correct] Waroo said.

“So we have dead guards… but no way to get up there,” Marks said.

“Well…” Rose turned her head to both sides to look up at each of them, “there is one way. But I don’t think you’re going to like it.”

“Waroo, please stop shifting!”

[Your heels are digging into my back, Human!]

Rose had crossed arms and a smirk as she watched Marks standing on Waroo’s back, the Wookiee down on all fours.

“I really should have brought a recording device with me,” Rose smirked.

“Would you just climb up us already?” Marks rolled his eyes.

Rose thought nothing of it as she climbed on the back of Waroo, trying to finding her footing so Marks wouldn’t knock her off. But it wasn’t until she tried to climb on Marks’ back and he nearly fell off, taking her down with him.

“I think we’re going to have to rethink this,” Marks said as he and Rose climbed off Waroo.

“Waroo, you relax for a moment while we figure this out.” Rose turned to face Marks, “So, how we gonna do this? I can’t climb you while on another living thing.”

“I don’t know,” his brows knit together, his grey eyes getting all serious in a way that made Rose want to bite her lip.

And maybe a few places on him. Oh God, she really had to stop thinking about his cheekbones, and butt, and how much he could bench-press.
Wait a minute.

“How much can you bench-press?” Rose asked.

He raised an eyebrow but answered, “Bout 120.”

Rose frowned, “What about 130?”

Marks understood, “I could lift you.”

“Alright, Waroo,” Rose turned back to the Wookiee. “Get ready. We’re going again.”

Waroo grunted and repositioned himself. Marks crouched down, and though she was a little awkward at it, Rose climbed onto his back and locked her arms around his neck.

“Are you sure you got me?” Rose nervously asked as Marks grabbed one of the steel support beams that connected the catwalk to the ground.

“Don’t worry,” he reached up and gripped her arm, his hand firm on her yet still gentle. “I promise I won’t let you fall.”

God damn, she thought she was more independent. Why did that make her swoon a little? This was what she got for being so desperate for a boyfriend. When the Force finally gave her a potential love interest, it had to be a god damn Stormtrooper.

Eh. Could be worse. She could have ended up with Evan Tharel.

Seriously? What did Paige see in Evan?

“AH!” Kes collapsed when a blast hit him in the arm.

“Tharel!” Han yelled as he, Chewie, and Qi’ra fired at the Imperial Loyalists across the hallway. Turned out that those who genuinely believed in the cause weren’t so happy about the pretenders from Crimson Dawn and had turned against Qi’ra and her people.

“On it,” Evan pulled Kes against a closed door, a small potted plant giving the tiniest bit of coverage. Not even pulling off his medical satchel, Evan dug out the bandaging supplies with one arm, the other still firing off shots with his blaster. “Hold still, Lieutenant Dameron. It won’t take long.”

As Evan bandaged him, Kes was forced to face the hallway down which they had just come. It was clear behind the group… until Kes spotted five armed men appear over Evan’s shoulder.

“Tharel! Watch out for-”

Without even looking back, Evan turned his weapon behind him and fired five perfect shots. They all hit the men square in the chest, each falling down dead.

Evan then returned to Kes’ injuries without even a blink.

“You know, it’s a good thing Paige was there with Evan during the bombing,” Rose said as Marks climbed up on Waroo’s back. “He needed someone with actual brawn to watch his back.

“Actually,” Marks said as Rose climbed on top his shoulders. He reached up to put a hand on her back to support her. “Considering his actions after we woke up, I think your friend Evan might secretly be a badass.”

Rose snorted as she pulled herself up onto the catwalk, “I’ll believe it when I see it.”

“You up safe?” Marks asked.

“Yeah.” Rose turned to the machines and cracked her knuckles, “Let’s see how Crimson Dawn hurt you guys.”

It took about ten minutes. Marks got off Waroo, and the Wookiee went over to monitor the ground level computers to see Rose’s progress. Marks just stood below, watching Rose dutifully with concern. He had the posture and expression of a guard dog, ready any moment to spring into action.

“Alright, and…” Rose flipped a switch.

Light and sounds filled the room as the dormant machines flickered on and buzzed into order.

“Got it!” Rose exclaimed.

A little too caught up in her victory, she jumped a little in the air. When she came back down, her foot caught a cable and she stumbled back. As it so happened she was perfectly aligned to the part of the catwalk that didn’t have a railing, and she screamed as she found herself falling backward toward the ground and a broken neck.

…Only to land in Marks’ quick arms and slam him into the ground.

When the two broke from their daze, Rose was startled to realize that she was lying atop Marks… and she had no motivation to move away from being so close and feeling every inch of his body.

After a moment, Marks smiled up at her, “I told you I wouldn’t let you fall.”

In a split second she had a vision of pressing her lips to his. Rose yelped and pushed off Marks before she surrendered to making it reality.

“Thanks!” she yelped. Seeing his amused expression, Rose cleared her throat and repeated, “Thanks. Thanks.”

Somehow she couldn’t find a normal tone of voice.

“No problem,” Marks smiled.

Oh God, she wanted to smack that stupid handsome smile off his face. He was the enemy; what was she doing?

“So,” Marks scratched his neck, finally catching on to her awkwardness, “are the comms working now?”

“I think so,” Rose looked down and saw hers was working. “I’m not sure if the line will hold though. We need to test it.”

“Here,” Marks pulled out his comm, “I’ll call Captain Phasma for a distress call. That way if the line, breaks, diverts, or is compromised we’re not risking something important.”
Rose couldn’t argue with that, but when Marks successfully called Phasma and she heard the stupid Stormtrooper Captain voice, she wanted to tear the comm from his hand and scream until her face was purple. That arrogant, mechanical voice was the voice of the woman who helped torture and murder the mother of Rose’s best friend. She wanted to do a great many things to Captain Phasma, and while yelling at her was low on the list, it was on the list.

Rose did take twisted, smug pleasure in hearing Phasma’s reaction to the news of who had accompanied Rose to Nixrye when Marks explained the situation.

“So, just so that I’m clear,” there was an odd tone to Phasma’s voice, “Han Solo, Chewbacca the Wookiee, Chewbacca’s son, and both the Dameron men are there on planet with you?”

“Yes, Ma’am,” Marks reported.

“…huh.”

Marks frowned and shot an awkward look to Rose. The girl merely offered him a shrug but not withhold her smirk.

“Uh, alright then,” Phasma cleared her throat. “I’ll send reinforcements immediately. And Marks?”

“Yes, Captain?”

“If you manage to get one of those males alone… Do not let them escape your custody.”

The smirk fell off Rose’s face in an instant.

Phasma continued, “I want them face to face with me or I swear to the Gods, I will break your wrist. Am I clear?”

“I understand completely, Ma’am.”

“Communication over.”

And the line went dead.

Star systems away, the woman who called herself Captain Phasma stood in her quarters, staring at her communication device in shock.

“Han Solo… Chewbacca… Waroo… Kes… and Poe Dameron… are on Nixrye… And I stayed back on the Star Destroyer.”

Phasma blinked.

“SON OF A BITCH!”

Behind her, her visitor chuckled, “Well… I told you to go with Ben.”

And even though she knew she wouldn’t hit him, Phasma threw the closest heavy object at his head.
But I won’t let myself hate everyone in the First Order. For all I know the Stormtroopers, pilots, and technicians are just like me and Rose – they found themselves stuck in a situation they never chose. Maybe some of them are looking for a way out of that trap.

- The Journal of Paige Tico

“So…” Rose began as she exchanged a look with Waroo. “Phasma wants you to hold onto Solo, Chewbacca, Waroo, or the Damerons if you get one alone.”

“That is correct,” Marks replied simply.

Rose and Waroo looked at each other again.

“And… you’re alone with Waroo,” Rose continued.

“Well, not exactly,” Marks countered. “You are present, but I suppose that this would fit the parameters.”

Waroo shifted his blaster rifle. He didn’t carry a bowcaster like his father, but the rifle he carried was so large and powerful that Rose suspected if Aletha ever saw it, she would come up with some elaborate plot to claim it as her own.

Note to self: don’t let Aletha give Waroo any “vaccines”.

Marks looked between Rose, the Wookiee, and the rifle.

Then he began to laugh.

“I’m sorry, you don’t actually think I’m stupid enough to grapple with a Wookiee?”

Waroo growled something to Rose that she was fairly certain meant, [He’s got a point.]

Rose was not willing to concede the point, “But Phasma ordered you to hold him.”

“So what?”

She blinked, “…Excuse me?”

“So what?” he repeated. “So what if she told me to capture him? I’m not a droid to program. I’m a human being who can think and decide for myself. And I’ve decided to institute a policy of not fucking with Wookiees.”

“But… But you’re a Stormtrooper!”

“And there’s a face behind that mask.”

Rose shifted on the balls of her feet. She refused to acknowledge just how handsome the face behind the mask was. No Sir, not handsome at all. The blast wounds made him ugly, not rugged and mysterious. Those eyes were cutting and cold, not clear pools of grey that could see into her very soul. And those cheekbones…

Oh God damn it, she knew those cheekbones would be her downfall.
“Whatever,” Rose’s voice was louder than she intended. They needed to get back on track and not quibbling over individuality among the First Order and Marks’ stupid handsome face. “You had your turn to talk to your people, and now it’s mine.”

She pushed him – lightly – to the side and made herself at home with the communicator. Marks just smiled and watched her as Rose hailed the Ninka and explained to Vice Admiral Holdo’s crew about the situation.

He had never quite met anyone like Rose Tico before. The girl was tiny, but with her feisty spirit and confidence the way she carried herself made her loom over the Wookiee in the room. Marks stood almost head to head with Kylo and Phasma, but when he talked to Rose he felt like he was looking her right in the eye… Probably because she lifted on her toes when yelling at him that way she could indeed look him in the eye as she scolded him. He didn’t mind; she did have pretty eyes.

In no way was Rose a super model, and she wouldn’t be found among the Chosen with Sasa and Nova and the like, but she was more than simply the word cute in his eyes. Not to mention the girl didn’t mind getting her hands literally dirty, Marks had noticed. Her hands were rough and scratched and grease stained. There was a smudge of oil on the side of her nose that Marks fought desperately against the urge to wipe it away. She’d probably tear his arm off if he touched her.

But still… he did yearn.

There was one fact about her no one could deny, Marks decided. Her lips were the dictionary definition of perfection… and something warm and liquid danced in his stomach whenever she bit that perfect bottom lip.

Oh, this was not going to end well for him.

“There!” Rose turned off her comm with a flourish. “The Resistance is on its way to rescue us.”

Both she and Marks desperately fought to hide their overt attraction for each other… even if it was so plain to Waroo he would approach Reine Agim for a betting pool if the Jedi was still alive.

“And the First Order is on its way to save us,” Marks pointed out.

“Yes? Well, the Resistance will get here first,” Rose shot, lifting onto her toes.

“No, it isn’t. Phasma said that there was already someone halfway here.”

Rose dropped to the flats of her feet.

“What?” Marks asked.

“I thought the First Order wasn’t involved in this bombing.”

“It isn’t.”

“Then why is there already someone on their way?”

He frowned, not realizing the point until Rose pointed it out. But it didn’t take long for him to put it together, and he let out a huff of air when he did.

“What a bitch,” Marks shook his head.

“Excuse me?” Rose’s voice was an octave higher than normal.
“Sorry, not you,” Marks realized how that must have come across. “Look, just because it wasn’t set up by the First Order doesn’t mean it wasn’t set up by someone in the First Order. Five credits says it’s Tara Ren on her way. That woman is getting so damn creative in her murder attempts. This is a lot cleverer than that whole poisoned hair comb idea.”

Rose and Waroo exchanged a look that reminded Marks they had no idea what the hell was going on.

“It is far too long a story to explain.” Marks summed it up with, “Basically, Kylo Ren has some crazy ass girlfriends.”

Rose didn’t even want to understand more.

Thankfully they were cut off by the beeping of Rose’s comm.

“Tico,” she answered.

“Rose?” Han Solo’s voice came. “You still alive?”

“I’m fine.” She eyed Marks, “The Stormtrooper didn’t try anything… yet.”

He lifted an eyebrow, “Is that an invitation?”

She should slap that smirk off his stupid, handsome face.

“Hey, Tharel, you can relax!” Han’s voice was faint in the comm. “Your girl’s sister is safe.”

“Then get off the comm and we can check on the others,” Evan’s voice just barely was audible.

“Kid’s got a point,” Han conceded. “We should try to reach Dameron and his lot. Are guys still armed?”

“Yes, Sir,” Rose answered.

“Good. Come meet us in the ballroom and we’ll find the others together. Understood?”

“Perfectly. We’ll see you soon.” With that she turned off the comm. She pointed towards the door and ordered Marks, “You go first. We’ll need a meat shield if we run into any trouble.”

Marks smirked, “Explains why you’ve been staring at me like I’m a piece of meat.”

Rose turned as bright as her namesake and jabbed a finger at the door, “March! Now!”

Marks teasingly saluted and obeyed. Meanwhile Rose grumbled and glowered with crossed arms, hung up on his accusation. She hadn’t been staring at him and didn’t even remotely want to do so.

Still, as he marched away… Rose had to admit his butt did look pretty cute.

They were still bickering. It had been ages since they left the ballroom… and Poe and Kylo were still god damn bickering.

If it wasn’t about the bombing it was about Skywalkers, if it wasn’t Skywalkers it was about General Organa, if it wasn’t General Organa then it was about Han Solo or Felicity Rhiaon or the murder of Poe’s mother or a pissing contest over who was more worried about their girlfriend or which of them was a better shot or who was responsible for the death of Jaina Fel.

Karé Kun was fairly certain that if she asked the First Order Stormtroopers to help her smother them both, the Stormtroopers would do it.

“Okay, if you two would shut up,” Karé exclaimed. She did not have time for this childhood rivalry bullshit. Her husband might be dead; Karé Kun did not give one single damn over whether or not Kylo Ren should have been forced to sleep on a pullout couch and Poe Dameron in his room when he had a broken leg at age fourteen. “We clearly took a wrong turn somewhere. We have been walking for too long in this direction not to hit the lobby.”

“Karé, there was only one turn,” Poe remembered the right or left fork not far from the ballroom’s back door. He eyed Kylo, “We were supposed to go left, correct?”

“That’s where you’re supposed to go in an emergency,” Kylo replied. “Come on, my… Sasa is in danger too. You think I would delay going to her just to screw with you?”

“I genuinely consider it a possibility.”

“Uh, Master Ren?” FN-2187 nervously piped out. “Didn’t you see Master Sasa in the lobby?”

“Yes,” Kylo turned on FN-2187. Why was he undermining Kylo in front of Dameron. Ugh, that was the last thing Kylo needed: FN-2187 and Poe to be friends.

“Well, uh,” FN-2187 shifted nervously, “isn’t the lobby east? Meaning we should have gone to the right? I mean, the Resistance group might have taken the wrong turn and Master Sasa sensed it, following them to the right.”

Kylo blinked.

“Damn it.”

“Oh, for the love of,” Poe rolled his eyes when he heard Kylo admit the mistake. “How long have we been walking down this hall?”

“Forty-five minutes of you two idiots bickering over nothing,” Karé seethed. “Great now we’ve got to turn around and… Poe, what’s flashing on your belt?”

Poe looked down, “Oh my god… that’s my comm. It has a signal!”

Kylo scowled, “But who fixed-”

“Who the hell cares?” Poe ripped his comm from his belt. Since he was posing as a business man, his image allowed for him to openly carry his comm rather than have it concealed and disguised like Evan and Kaydel’s. He flicked it on without a second thought and desperately called into it, “Kaydel? Babe? Kay, can you hear me? Are you okay? Are you hurt? Please pick up!”

“Uh, Dameron?” Kylo interrupted. He was pulling out his own comm to call Sasa. “You gotta cut your own transmission to let her respond.”

“Oh… right.” He cleared his throat and lifted off his thumb.

A voice answered… but it was not the one he expected.

“Dacken? What the hell are you doing answering Kaydel’s comm?”
“It’s uh… long story.”

“Ok, just hold still,” Kaydel ordered as Sasa cried out, her body jerking when needle pierced skin. The women had decided that it would be best to aid Sasa’s healing process by stitching up her wounds. Bacta could fix things, but stitches would make the healing faster. “I can’t do this if you keep jerking around. I know it hurts, but I’m trying to help.”

“I know, it just hurts.” Sasa glanced down at her wound, “Hey, don’t take this the wrong way, but could you try to make your stitches a little more uniform. They’re a little crisscrossed and of varying lengths.”

Kaydel scowled, “Oh, is this not going to hold right?”

“No, it will, it’s just… I like to sew a lot and if I have to stare at bad hand stitching for a couple weeks, I’m going to go insane.”

Kaydel just stared at her.

“Sorry,” Sasa gave a meek smile. “You know how people can get about hobbies.”

“Yeah, this right here is the reason I never pilot things when Poe’s a passenger. He is the worst backseat driver. I can barely manage to land a ship, and here he yells for me to do evasive maneuvers of loops and spins.”

“Sounds as bad as Kylo.”

“I can imagine. A Skywalker and a Solo mashed into one? Flyboy should be his legal surname.”

“So… you’re not mad at me?” Sasa asked carefully.

“Sasa… you electrocuted me with the Force over an hour ago. If I’m complaining about you, it’s not going to be about sewing constructive criticism.”

“Oh, right, I did do that, didn’t I? Uh… sorry, heat of the moment. Orders are orders. Insert awkward excuse here.”

“Well, my sister handcuffed me to a wall right before that and I’ve had to worked out my relationship problems with the nephew who set my hair on fire, in between questionable battlefield medical decisions. Also someone tried to blow me up. I’m not having a very good day so far.”

“You and me both,” Sasa chuckled. “You have to admit, at least breakfast was good.”

“Oh, those deviled pelikki eggs were to die for,” Kaydel said. “And that tea, I wish I had asked about the brand.”

“I would offer to get it for you, but I have a feeling after today we won’t have many opportunities to socialize.”

“We’ll always have that time we cauterized a man with a lightsaber on Nixrye.”

“You know, speaking of tea,” Sasa said, “you’ll need to treat the after effects of that Force Lightning. A tea of Flasse petals and Smie root usually do the trick.”
“Thanks. I was starting to wonder if my teeth were supposed to periodically buzz.”

“That should wear off in a couple hours.”

Sasa suddenly hissed, her body jerking forward.

“Whoa, careful,” Kaydel guided Sasa back down. “Don’t want me to stab you in the wrong place.”

“Sorry, I’ve just been getting a lot of cramping in the pelvic area.”

“Stomach?”

“More uterine area. What is this stupid poison and how do I get it to stop?”

Suddenly, something caught Kaydel’s eye.

“Sasa, is your leg hurt?” she scowled.

Sasa frowned and looked down. Kaydel had been forced to pull up her dress and cut parts of her skirt to stitch the stab wound. It was their best at giving Sasa some modesty – they also had nestled themselves in a vacant corner – without full on pulling off Sasa’s clothing and forcing Kaydel to deal with her in nothing but her underwear. She could offer Sasa some level of dignity in the mess.

On the exposed skin of her leg, Sasa could see dark red blood staining her thigh. She pressed her legs together – painful considering one was broken – and felt that the blood was coming somewhere a little north of her thigh. So overwhelmed by the pain and injuries of battle and bombing, Sasa hadn’t even noticed the tell tale signs of womanhood.

“Oh, damn it.” Sasa glanced around, and secure in her knowledge that only Kaydel was watching, she shifted her body away and discretely reached down between her legs. When she brought her hand up, bright red blood stained her fingers. “Are you kidding me? After two weeks of being late, now is when I get my period?”

Kaydel raised an eyebrow, “You were two weeks late and openly drinking?”

“What do you mean?”

“Weren’t you worried you might be pregnant?”

“Oh, I wish. The stresses of being in the First Order and Tara constantly trying to kill me means I’m almost always late. Besides I get monthly pregnancy tests and I had one a week ago, which was negative. And here I thought the cramping I was getting was from the poisoning.”

Something still unsettled Kaydel.

But before they could debate it further, Kaydel’s comm started to beep.

The women stared at each other in shock.

“Do you-”

“I hear it. Is it-”

“It’s working!”

“Oh my god, it’s working!”
Kaydel scrambled over to the pile of clothing and supplies they had shoved a little bit away from them. Kaydel’s comm had been planted in a bracelet, and Kaydel had taken off the bracelet when she started to stitch up Sasa, wondered the blood would ruin it.

As Kaydel reached for the bracelet, she paused. Kaydel had been wearing latex gloves while stitching Sasa – thank you, Aunt Aletha and your medical pouch – to protect herself, but underneath her hands were still stained with blood.

Suddenly Kaydel was fighting Doxl Ren again. He was trying to hurt her. Kill her.

She slit his throat without a second thought. His eyes bulged, his blood stained her hands. He burbled, choking on his blood as Kaydel held him in her arms. She held him there, didn’t move to help Doxl as he drowned in his own blood.

Then she dropped his body to the ground with a sickening thwack.

“Kaydel?”

A hand was on her shoulder. She was in the present, and Dacken was looking down at her. Her eyes were wide and her throat dry.

“I heard beeping,” Dacken explained. “I thought your comm might… Are you okay?”

Her hands shook as she looked down at them.

They were still stained with the blood of the man she had murdered.

“Aunt Kayko?”

Her head whipped up. No, she couldn’t do this. She couldn’t tell him the thoughts running through her mind.

“Did…” Dacken glanced towards the comm, “did you want to answer it?”

Kaydel stared at it. No, she knew. She couldn’t touch it, stain it… infect it.

“Here,” Dacken picked up the bracelet. “I’ll play the transmission.”

He flicked it on and Kaydel’s heart swelled in joy as she heard a familiar voice fill the room.

“Kaydel? Babe? Kay, can you hear me? Are you okay? Are you hurt? Please pick up!”

She wanted to burst into tears. Poe was alive. He was safe. His voice filled her with heart with joy. And then it flooded her with despair.

The transmission repeated itself.

“Kaydel? Babe? Kay, can you hear me? Are you okay? Are you hurt? Please pick up!”

She couldn’t answer it. How could she possibly speak to Poe? If she spoke, he would know. He “Could you answer that? Kaydel can’t touch it right now; she can’t risk cross-contamination and she’s not done stitching me up. Kaydel, would you mind?”

“Right.”

“Go on, Dacken,” Sasa smiled pleasantly, “you take it over to Snap. He’ll need to talk with his people. Kaydel will be there shortly.”

Dacken stared at the pair for a minute, “…Ok then.”

He nodded, grabbed the comm, and left to find Snap.

Kaydel let out a breath of relief.

“Are you alright?” Sasa asked.

“I’m fine,” Kaydel tried to push away her thoughts. Taking deep breaths, she lied, “I’m fine.”

“No, you’re not.”

Kaydel’s mind immediately went on the defense, “What, you think because you have the Force you can tell people what they do and do not feel?”

“No… I can tell you’re not fine because you’re shaking and pale. Was Doxl the first time you killed someone?”

“No!”

“Was it the first time you killed someone one to one?”

Kaydel was silent.

“I see,” Sasa said. She reached out her hand, “Come here. Let me help.”

But Kaydel couldn’t touch her, not with the blood of Doxl Ren on her hands.

“Here. Come on, Kaydel. I won’t touch your hand. I promise.”

Slowly, Kaydel came forward and allowed Sasa to take her by the wrist. She guided Kaydel to kneel next to her and gently stroked Kaydel’s arm.

“You know, the reason I am a good partner for Kylo Ren is that I’m good at handling people who struggle with emotion. If I had my access to the Force, I would try something with you called rebalancing. It helps regulate emotions using the Force.”

“But I don’t have the Force.”

“Everyone has the Force, no matter how remote.” Sasa reached up to casually scratch her neck. “I think I would be able to help you if I wasn’t being bloc-”

She froze.

“What- What the hell is that?”

Kaydel frowned, “What?”
“Is there something on my neck?” Sasa bent her head forward.

Kaydel leaned forward and examined, “Can you push your hair aside?”

As she did so, Sasa muttered to herself, “How did something get on my-”

And then she remembered:

“I think I can help her,” Berd said. His hand stroked her shoulder and the other cupped her neck. “All I need to do is-“

And so also remembered:

“It's okay,” Berd crouched next to her. He stroked the back of her neck, ”Let me take a look.”

“That bastard!” Sasa cried out.

“Yep,” Kaydel reached into her medical pouch and pulled out a pair of tweezers. She pulled off a clear adhesive patch stuck to the back of Sasa’s neck. “He stuck you with something. Does it look familiar?”

It took a second, but then Sasa saw it. When the patch was tilted one way, it took on a slight red tinge, if it tilted the opposite way it got a sickly bright mustard tinge.

“That son of a bitch!” Sasa exclaimed. “This is a ysalamir patch! We use these on Force Sensitives to cut them off from the Force! He put it on me so that Kylo couldn’t sense what was happening to me! I can’t believe he used one on me!”

Kaydel frowned slightly, “Well, he was trying to kill you. Cutting you off seemed like the next logical move to get away with it.”

“No, you don’t understand. I came up with these patches. We used to inject people with a serum, and then I suggested we develop a patch as it would be easier to apply and have less risk of injury to the person applying it when the one drugged fought them. Plus the patches also have a poison in them, where the injection version didn’t.”

“Oh yeah, that two part ysalamir blood injection they gave Felicity Rhiaon,” Kaydel recalled the story.

“What? Two parts?” Sasa scowled. “Yeah, they used it on Rhiaon, but just has one part. Only the patch has poison.”

“Huh. Must have remembered that wrong. So does that mean you can connect to the Force now?”
“I think I’ll need a minute but-” Sasa yelped and grabbed her head, “Yes. Yes. Kylo, I’m alive. Could you just… No, I understand, but… Kylo… Kylo… Kylo…”

Kaydel stifled a laugh.

Sasa sighed and started speaking to the air again, “Look, I’m not happy I had to use that name either, but you were the only one who heard it… Well, you and Kaydel. Huh? …Yeah, Dameron’s girl is fine… No, you absolutely will not do that. …Kylo! …You will tell him this minute that Kaydel is- I don’t care how entertaining you find Dameron arguing with Dacken is! You tell him that Kaydel is alright, right now! …Oh, I have my ways and you know. I swear to the Supreme Leader, if you think the threesome story was bad, you haven’t even seen me pissed. …Look, I have got one hell of a headache right now. I am bleeding and broken and stabbed-”

Sasa paused.

“Yes, stabbed. Big shocker, this was another ploy for Tara to murder me. …Huh? …Berd and Doxl. Doxl’s dead now… No, Kaydel actually. …No, I didn’t force her to. See this is what happens when you try to be mildly sociable and charming, people stop other people from killing you, not attempt to themselves. …Kylo, you have had six people try to kill you in the past week alone, and I’m not even counting the events of today… Look, like I tried to say, I have a headache, so can you stop pushing into my Force Signature so hard? …Thank you.”

There was a moment of silent, and a grin crept across her face.

“I’m relieved that you aren’t either. …Yeah, I’m a little hurt. …Ok, more than a little hurt, but hey I’m alive. Are you on your way to me? …A patch, in fact, my freaking patches. …Yeah, I don’t think either of us can be too proud that we didn’t figure it out sooner. Kylo, it cut off when he touched my neck, we should have put two and two together. …Yeah, the netting worked.”

Sasa blushed a little as he soothed her with the declaration of how proud of her he was.

“Um, Kylo, there’s something I need to tell you. You know how Max said that even though we got a positive it was possible I could be… you know? I, um… just got my period, so it’s a no again this time around. …Hey, we’ll just keep trying. …I know but… it’s going to work someday. You know it will… Because I believe it will.”

Why did Kaydel feel sad at the fact Sasa wasn’t pregnant with Ben Solo’s baby? Note to self never tell Poe.

“Look, how about Kaydel and I get on her comm and coordinate the meetup with you guys?”

“Hey,” Kaydel whispered to Sasa. “Can you ask how Poe is taking talking to Dacken?”

“Kylo?” Sasa asked. “How is the conversation going between Dameron and Dacken Tokani?”

Sasa paused.

“Ok, thanks.” Sasa looked to Kaydel, “Dameron is swearing at Tokani in every language he knows.”

Kaydel sighed, “Well, you can’t say Poe is uncultured in the array of languages he knows.”

The whole time Sasa had spoken to Kylo, Kaydel had worked on finishing Sasa’s stitches. She ended them and took off her latex gloves.
Her heart sunk as she saw the bloodstains on her fingers.

Sasa sighed, “Kylo? We’ll just be a moment. I’m, um… it’s kind of hard for me to move right now… No, having Wexley walk the comm back over to us is not an option right now. Is his wife happy he’s alive… That’s good for the wife… Oh no, he has adequate reason to be vague… Yeah, don’t worry, won’t take long… I promise. …Hey, I’ll be safe. Connix has my back… No, not Timor Connix, I too want to strangle him with the Force right now. …Oh shit, no you can’t, that’s too cruel. …Oh, we should do it!”

“How do you?” Kaydel asked.

“Leave him to Alecta Athena.”

Kaydel shuddered and thought about. Aunt Alecta was too terrifying to throw her father to that wolf… but she wouldn’t stop someone else from doing so.

“Alright, we’ll see each other soon,” Sasa told Kylo. “You promise me you’ll be safe. …A truce with Dameron? You must be loving that. …Yes, I’m teasing you. Alright, I- Huh? …No, we didn’t fix it. …I don’t know. Maybe the resort staff. …Look we can talk about things later? I think Kaydel and I better start trying to get to the comm before Dameron figures out how to strangle Dacken through it. …Alright. …Soon, I promise. …I can’t wait to be in them. Be careful.”

And then Sasa was silent.

“Are you, uh,” Kaydel scratched her neck, “you guys done?”

“Yeah,” Sasa smiled. “Uh, arms. That’s what I was saying I wanted to be in.”

“I got it,” Kaydel didn’t want details on Ben Solo’s love life. The balcony had given her enough details for a lifetime. “But, can I ask you something?”

“Sure.”

“What was that threesome thing?”

“Oh God, that story. Look I’ll tell you it, but only if you promise not to tell anyone else.”

“I promise.”

Within a week, everyone on D’Qar knew the story of the time Kylo Ren suggested a threesome. And Leia Organa was frankly getting sick of how much she had to hear about her son’s sex life.

“So, we should probably go get that comm,” Kaydel started to stand.

Sasa pulled her back down, “I have the Force again. Let’s deal with your problem.”

“But Kylo and Poe.”

“That slow movement thing was to buy us some time. Come on, you need a good rebalancing.”
Kaydel took a deep breath and then reached forward.

Sasa’s eyes shot wide, “Oh crap!”

“What?” Kaydel dropped her hand. “Did I-”

“Not you,” Sasa groaned. “Sorry, I can sense people with the Force and I just sensed that…”

“…That?”

Sasa sighed, “She’s here.”

It was over half an hour before the officers at the entrance of the hotel had re-erected the barricade and gotten the crowd back under control. Far too many people had slipped into the hotel during the chaos, but things were back in order and would stay that way.

And then he was approached by a black-haired woman and two men clad in black attire, all of whom carried a strange silver cylinder on their belts.

“Halt,” the man who had been punched by Han Solo commanded. To his surprise the trio obeyed, stopping right on the other side of the wooden barricade. “Please take several steps back. We’re trying to contain the situation.”

“Oh, but we’ve come here to help,” the woman said. “Aren’t we, Wiln? Cern?”

“Definitely,” Cern agreed.

“Ma’am,” the officer said. “Listen to me-”

“Call me Tara,” the woman smiled at him.

“Tara,” he corrected. “I’m afraid I can’t let civilians-”

“Oh, but I’m not a civilian.”

He blinked, “You’re… You’re not?”

“Forgive us. We haven’t introduced ourselves.” Tara offered her hand to him, “We are the Knights of Ren. Tara Ren. Cern Ren. And Wiln Ren.”

The officer whispered, “Knights of…”

He couldn’t force out the words, his horror too great at the assembly before him.

Wiln saw the error, “We’re not the ones who burned down Rornian. They’re all dead, and we’ve vowed not to make that mistake again.”

“We’ve seen the error of our ways,” Cern’s voice made the officer believe the opposite.

“And that’s why we’re here,” Tara gave a pleasant smile. God, she hated this innocent, little, kind, simpleton act. Her mother may have been able to smooth people, but Tara felt like God damn Sasa. Should she giggle and twirl her hair too? “As a Knight of Ren, I am strong with the Force. I had a vision of this awful scene, and immediately the First Order rushed to put together an aid mission. We have eight ships on their way right now with doctors, medical supplies, and relief workers. I assume that the New Republic wouldn’t mind the additional help?”

The officer sighed, “Tara… We thank you for your offer, but it’s unnecessary. The New Republic—”

“Whoa? Tell me, Sir, what orders have the New Republic given you? Are you allowing doctors in?”

“Well… no.”

“Are you allowing aid in?” Wiln asked.

“…No.”

“Are you in any way helping the people inside?” even Cern was pretending to be nice. It made him want to set his tongue on fire.

“No. Our orders are to contain the scene until we get further instructions,” the officer admitted.

“And is the New Republic on their way with aid?” Tara inquired.

“Well… As- As far as I know… they’re not.”

The crowds of people began to buzz with mutterings of anger. Even the other soldiers were starting to look annoyed.

“Please,” Tara said, “let us pass. Let the First Order demonstrate we are here to help the Galaxy. Support it… Take care of the people the way the New Republic has refused to do so. Let us provide these victims with the care they require.”

Her voice increased with every word, not the way the male nurse had yelled at him, but more that Tara Ren was turning her attention from him to address the crowd. All eyes were on him.

Which was why he couldn’t defy orders. If it was public record that he disobeyed instructions, his commanding officer would punish him in an equally public fashion.

“Ma’am, I am afraid that I cannot let you pass,” the officer firmly announced. “This planet is New Republic jurisdiction, and I must follow my orders. I’m sorry.”

Tara sighed, “Yes, I’m sorry too. But the people in there must be saved, so I’m afraid I have no choice.”

The last thing he saw was a blur of red from the cylinder on her belt. Then his head was off his shoulders, and he knew no more.

There was a rumble from the crowd and the other New Republic soldiers, but none seemed unhappy with the turn of events.

“Ladies and Gentlemen!” Tara announced to the crowd. “This man was an infection that is taking root in the New Republic. A remnant of the days of the Empire where you blindly followed orders without thought. The First Order is not like that and will protect you from it, just like we will protect the people inside of this building. So… officers of the New Republic.”

Tara turned to face the soldiers, every single eye following her.
She gave them as pleasant a smile she could muster without looking fake, “Will you allow us in?”

Instantly the soldiers saluted and took a step backwards to clear the way. Two men picked up the barricade and gestured their hands to the cleared pathway.

“Thank you,” Tara smiled again. Good she hated being cheerful. At least she got to kill someone this time. “You are all fine examples of a military who cares.”

She stepped over the body of her victim – one of the soldiers taking her hand to assist her like it was a puddle and she in a fine dress. Wiln was quick to follow, courteously stepping around the body.

But Cern actually climbed atop the body and announced, “And if anyone is interested in joining our cause, please come talk to me.”

He was instantly mobbed by an easily manipulated horde.

“Come on, Wiln,” Tara said as they left behind Cern. “We have to go see how many Knights of Ren have survived this unfortunate bombing. If we’re lucky, it’ll only be one.”

“You mean if you’re lucky, it will be none.”

“Willarn Gresley, I have no interest in being first in command. And you speak of this incident as if I actually had something to do with it.”

Wiln laughed, “Don’t think for a second that I buy your little I had a vision of it story. I know you set this up, probably to kill Sasa.”

“What a horrible thing to say.”

“Don’t sound so flattered. Why do you think I keep Nova away from you?”

“Nova is of no concern to me. She keeps out of the way. Actually, if you ask me, I think she’s kind of pathetic.”

“I didn’t ask.”

Tara laughed.

“You know…” Wiln glanced back at Cern, who appeared to start getting annoyed with the crowd. A few bodies would probably be hitting the ground soon when Cern lost his temper. “I will give you this. It may be a horrible scene of tragedy and needless waste of life for the First Order to come to the rescue of a bombing… but damn if it isn’t good propaganda.”

“Oh, look, I don’t speak Yavinese, but even I know you’re just swearing at me in it,” Dacken said into the comm. “What happened with Kaydel and I is frankly none of your business, so we’ll handle it ourselves, alright?”

Wrong move. Poe started screaming so loud into the comm that not only would everyone in the building know their location, but Kylo was pretty sure his mother on D’Qar could hear it too.

Or his father somewhere in this very resort.

Oh, Han Solo better not run into Sasa at any point. Kylo was so not explaining that relationship to his father. He knew how hard Han Solo would judge him. He was staunchly anti-polygamy to the point that Leia couldn’t invite certain political guests for dinner.

Han would at the very least smack his son upside the head… and that wasn’t even factoring into all the stuff Kylo had pulled back in 20 ABY. Between Alyla, the Burning of Rornian, Rey, Felicity, and Luke, he wouldn’t be surprised if his father genuinely tried to kill him.

His only saving grace was the knowledge of how much it would piss off his mother, and that that ire might be enough to prevent filicide.

This family really was playing an elaborate game of attempted familicide bingo.

“Oh, give me that!” a voice snapped over the comm.

Dameron perked right up, “Kay? Babe?”

“You can settle down, Peacock. I’m here now.”

Kylo snorted, “Peacock?”

“Excuse me, you walk around bearing a name that was a sarcastic comment made by your aunt who you hated,” Poe pointed out.

“She was not my aunt!”

“Then what the hell was that ceremony my father and I attended? Or that dedication ceremony the day after involving the Force Sensitive tree on our family farm?”

Kylo groaned as he remembered that little ceremony on the Dameron ranch his mother had dragged him to. Rhiaon and Luke resting their hands on the tree and vowing their love. It was sickening.

…Why was he now picturing doing the same thing with Sasa?

FN-2187 just frowned at the pair and leaned over to Karé, “Hey… would you mind drawing me a quick family tree? I’m kinda lost with all this.”

“I’ll let you know when I figure it out myself,” Karé replied. “But word of warning, don’t go down the rabbit hole of the Anthea family. I can’t even figure out how many members there are, alive or dead.”

Thirty-eight at that moment for the record, but it would take the collective knowledge of Aletha and Kaydel to figure out everyone, and even then, they would probably miss someone.

And in a year’s time it would be forty-one.

“Guys?” Kaydel cut in. “Can we focus?”

“Right,” Poe said. “How are you? Are you okay?”

“I’m… I’m okay. A little bloodied and bruised but mostly fine. I was standing next to the Knights of Ren when the bombs went off. When they used the Force to protect themselves, I was close enough to benefit and be shielded by the Force.”

“Thank the Force.”

“I think you mean thank the Knights of Ren,” Kylo smirked.
“Those words will never leave my lips,” Poe vowed.

“So, how are you?” Kaydel asked. “Are you okay?”

“He’s fine,” Karé leaned forward to answer. “I kept up our bargain and watched out for your man.”

Poe glowered, “May I remind you I’m your commanding officer?”

“Oh, don’t even make me bring up Holdo’s desk and the level of regard you hold for Commanders.”

“I’ll be quiet.”

“So, Kaydel,” Karé continued, “how about you? Snap won’t tell me. Am I going to be getting my husband back 100%?”

There was a very long silence.

“Kaydel?” Karé repeated nervously.

“Well, um… would returning 85% of your husband still be acceptable?”

Karé and Poe stared at the comm.

“Babe…” Poe asked slowly, “what are you talking about?”

“Kaydel, maybe you should just give me the comm,” Snap’s voice was barely heard in the background.

“Temmin?” Karé’s body language shifted slightly. She panicked a little more upon hearing his voice. She had been glad to hear it earlier, knowing it meant he was alive, but after how evasive he had been and Kaydel’s words, her heart was filled with fear, “Honey, what’s going on?”

There was a shuffling and a bit of crackling over the comm as Kaydel passed it to Snap. Since hers was in a bracelet so it was a little more difficult than passing a small openly showing communicator.

“Karé?” Snap asked once he had taken it over.

“I’m here,” she said. “What’s going on?”

“Okay.” He took a deep breath, “Are you sitting down?”

She almost rolled her eyes, “Babe, we’re currently running away from Crimson Dawn. Sitting down is not an option.”

“Crimson- Never mind. Right. Okay. Babe, this is going to be hard to hear, but I need you to be strong.”

Karé braced herself.

“Babe… Karé,” his voice struggled. “I… I’ve lost my left leg.”

In a word, her whole world turned upside down.

“You- You what?” she exclaimed.

It sent the others reeling.
“No, Snap you… you can’t,” Poe stiffened. “Come on, Man, you’re just pulling my leg, right?”

Even Finn stared at him like he was an idiot.

“Did you just seriously use that idiom, Dameron?” Kylo balked.

“And instantly regretting it,” Poe admitted. “You’re never going to let me live that down, are you?”

“Absolutely not.”

“At least we’re on the same page.”

“You lost your leg!” Karé exclaimed. “Oh my God, Snap-”

“That nickname is a little too ironic now,” he said. “Look, it’ll be okay. It’s more like half a leg. Just the stuff below the knee, and it’s all bandaged up. Not even bleeding anymore. Once we get back to the doctors on D’Qar I’ll be fine.”

“How did you get the bleeding to stop?”

There was another very long pause.

“Um… Let’s say we got very creative, and I’ll fill you in on the details later.”

“And I refuse to take responsibility for what happened,” Kaydel cut in.

Karé sighed, “I’m not going to like this, am I?”

“If it makes you feel better, I’ve already been severely punished for allowing it,” Snap replied.

She wanted to ask more questions… but she was too afraid of the answer. When they asked her and Snap to take a mission directly after their honeymoon, they should have said no.

“If you all are done with that, can I talk to Kylo?” Sasa’s voice buzzed on the comm.

“Sasa?” FN-2187 perked up.

A cold look from Kylo made him slump back down.

“You, uh… must be happy to hear her, Sir.”

“Indeed.” Kylo held out his hand for the comm, and Karé reluctantly gave it to him. “Sasa? Is that you?”

“I told you I’d be fine,” her voice was gentle, joyous, but pained. “Kylo, we have to get out of here.”

“It’s okay, no one else will touch you or I.”

“I’m going to have to disagree.”

“Doxl is dead and I’m assuming Berd has been dealt with?”

“Out cold, but not dead. We’ll be able to deliver punishment.”

“Good,” Kylo said coldly. “I’ll make sure he gets quite the public execution.”
“Oh, that’s… sweet,” Poe sighed. “Would you publicly execute someone for me, Babe?”

He had no idea that behind Kaydel’s silence her body had gone stiff as a board, her face white and wide, and her eyes down to her still bloodstained hands.

“Alright, stupid question,” Poe admitted, not understanding exactly how stupid.

Sasa sighed on the comm, “Kylo, Berd and Doxl aren’t a problem; there’s something larger going on here.”

“It’s Crimson Dawn, but that’s okay,” Kylo said. “There’s actually an agreement in place that… protects me from them.”

Everyone stared at him.

“I’m not getting into it right now,” Kylo refused.

“Basically they can’t touch him because his father once dated their leader,” Poe remembered Felicity telling him about the deal during his summer with the Skywalkers as Qi’ra had decided to visit Rornian and cause a little trouble.

“Kylo,” Sasa said, “I’m not talking about Crimson Dawn.”

He frowned, “Who are you talking about?”

“Come on. Can’t you sense them?”

When he reached out into the Force he found the answer almost immediately.

“Tara,” he growled.

“And Wiln. And Cern,” Sasa pointed out. “Looks like we’re playing with a full deck of Knights.”

“Wow,” Poe said, “I didn’t think you guys all actually went to places together. You do so many things alone Solo, I wondered if the Knights of Ren thing was just a myth.”

“Can it, Dameron. You have no idea what we’re dealing with having all of us here. Things aren’t so harmonious when we get together.”

“You see, a good Commander builds a team of people who respect them. Right, Karé?”

“Screw you, Poe. You asked my legless husband if he was pulling your leg.”

“Alright, maybe Black Squadron isn’t on its A Game right now.”

Kylo shook his head, “I still can’t believe they made you Head of the Air Force.”

“Only because you tortured Diego Nalto.”

“You’re welcome for the promotion.”

“That’s it!”

Poe lunged forward to smash Kylo’s head against the wall again, but Finn caught him and held him back.

“Easy,” Finn ordered.
“Fine,” Poe sighed and stepped back. “But only because you asked.”

Kylo glared at Poe. Great, his suspicions were correct. Oh, Kylo wasn’t keen on Poe becoming friends with FN-2187.

He also wasn’t keen on the word keen because it just made him think of Alyla Kene and that whole mess. Seriously, why did he let her leave him for this trip?

Something pricked at his brain.

“Dameron,” he said seriously, “someone’s coming.”

“Uh, hold that thought, Guys,” Poe switched off the comm.

Instantly the group fell into formation, readying themselves with blasters and lightsaber alike.

“Who’s coming?” Poe asked, taking position next to Kylo. Nines and Zeroes were crouched on the ground at the front, Karé and Finn behind them, and Poe and Kylo standing at the back.

“I don’t know,” Kylo answered. “I’m not familiar with the signatures. Mahogany, some sort of red, and a bronze… why do I feel like I should know bronze?”

Poe shrugged. He could hear the footsteps now, running – racing – towards them. Heavy boots and blasters in holsters banging against their hips with the bounce of every step. Something growled in the darkness stretching before them. It was the way they were headed, and Poe for once was thankful Ben Solo was there to sense something for him. What would have happened if they ran into the trio without any warning?

“Here they come,” Karé whispered as three looming shadows stretched along the wall.

In perfect unison, six blasters – even Kylo wielded one – set and cocked. Fingers hovered over the triggers and slowly Poe lifted his hand to give the signal.

“Wait for it… Wait for it…” Poe’s voice was low and tense as his eyes followed the shadows. One was short, the other abnormally tall, and one… one was a ferocious creature. Then they stepped into range, “NOW!”

Rose Tico, Waroo, and Marks ran into view.

“STOP!” Kylo and Poe roared.

Six bolts jerked off course in an instant, firing into various spots on the wall.

Rose, Waroo, and Marks just stared at the group in shock.

“Marks?” Finn frowned, getting to his feet.

“Hey Buddy,” Marks panted, still recovering from almost getting shot. “Nice shooting.”

“Nice dodging,” Finn holstered his blaster.

“Rose?” Poe scowled, looking utterly confused. “What are- How did- Aren’t you on Yavin IV right now?”

“Uh, no, I’m here,” Rose answered nervous. “…Surprise.”
“It’s okay, Solo, the girl’s with us… How, I don’t know, but she’s under my protection. I’m assuming the man’s yours?” Poe looked to Kylo and stopped.

Kylo was staring at the Wookiee in only what could only be called dumbfounded fear.

“Wa… Waroo?”

Poe blinked. He knew the name Waroo, so it utterly confused Poe as to why Kylo was so afraid of Waroo. After all, it was only Chewbacca’s son.

…And then Poe understood. Waroo was Chewbacca’s son. Kylo was Han Solo and Leia Organa’s. Throw in Rey Rhiaon Skywalker and you had Millennium Falcon: The Next Generation.

Of course, two of those elements were gone forever.

But Kylo… Oh, Kylo was in trouble. Han Solo and Chewbacca were the dictionary definition of “best friends” and Kylo had to stare down his counter component after destroying everything their families had worked so hard to build. Poe knew that Wookiees could tear a man’s limbs from his body, and there was a damn good chance he was about to see it in action.

Waroo made a curious noise at seeing Ben – his Bond-Brother – for the first time in years. Kylo’s throat was dry and wordless. Indeed, they had been Bond-Brothers, sons of fathers who shared a life debt. Waroo was as much bonded to Ben as Chewbacca was to Han. And when they were younger, Ben and Waroo had lived the title.

Though Waroo was 53-years-old – even older than Ben’s mother – in human terms he and Ben were roughly the same age. They had played together as children, gotten into trouble as teenagers, and planned to have adventures like their fathers as adults.

And then Ben Solo became Kylo Ren and destroyed both their families in the process.

Poe Dameron knew that there was genuinely the risk that Waroo was about to murder Ben Solo.

Then Waroo let out a ferocious roar and grabbed Ben Solo off the ground with both his massive, furry arms.

“No!” Poe yelled. He couldn’t let Ben be killed, not after the truce deal, and definitely not after General Organa made it clear Poe was not to kill Ben himself.

Poe rushed forward to help pry Kylo away from Waroo. The Wookiee was holding Kylo to his chest, crushing him with his arms as Kylo squirmed to escape. Poe had to explain their deal, stop this from happening.

But he suddenly came up short.

Poe’s jaw hung open as he realized that Waroo wasn’t attacking Kylo… he was hugging him.

“Yes, yes,” Kylo awkwardly squirmed in the Wookiee’s embrace, shooting furtive looks back at his First Order soldiers. “Yeah, I know, Waroo… Yes… Yes… Yeah, I get it but… Waroo you have to put me down… No, Waroo… Waroo, listen… Look, I…”

But Waroo’s moans and cries were too insistent.

Kylo gave up and sighed, hanging his head as he admitted with a mutter, “Yeah, I’ve missed you too.”
Waroo gave a satisfied moan.

“Now would you put me down, you overgrown fuzzball?”

Kylo instantly found himself dropped to the ground.

He glared up at Waroo and rubbed his aching backside, “That’s not what I meant.”

[I know] Waroo said smugly.

Kylo gave a low growl of a Shyriiwook word that used to get him in a lot of trouble with his father.

“Okay,” Karé looked around at the scene. “What is going on? Who are these people?”

“This is Waroo,” Poe pointed to him. “He’s the son of Chewbacca. A friendly to us, and if not, he’s knows I’ll tell his father.”

Waroo gave a sharp growl.

Kylo chuckled.

“And you?” Karé stared down Marks.

“MK-6093, but you can call me, Marks,” he strolled over to Finn. “You okay, Eight-Seventy?”

“I’m fine, Marks,” Finn grinned. “I’m glad you didn’t get blown up.”

“Hey, we Batch Eights are made of stronger stuff. Batch-eight, heigh-ho!”

Finn turned bright red when Marks suddenly slapped his butt. Poe had to stifle a chuckle, and Kylo Ren rolled his eyes.

“Right,” Finn cleared his throat. “Batch eight… heigh-ho.”

He gave a very muted butt slap back.

Rose bit her lip hard. Oh, how she wished to be that hand. She would slap it as enthusiastically as Marks had delivered his. God, would he do that to her too?

…Okay, what was wrong with her? This man was working with the people who murdered her parents, and all she could think about was touching his butt.

That tight, perfect butt.

Rose didn’t see Poe’s eyes on her.

“Uh… Rose?” he asked. “Something you want to share with the class?”

She startled, “What? Share with- No, there’s nothing to share! Nothing at all!”

Poe arched one perfect eyebrow on his equally stupid handsome face. It was sight that would have brought Kaydel Ko Connix to her knees – to Poe’s enthusiasm – and Rose cursed herself once more. She finally finds herself a man who makes her as weak in the knees as Poe did Kaydel (and half the population of the Resistance), as Teng did Rey, as Evan did Paige, as Tallie did Jessika, as Diego did Aletha… and hers had to be a god damn Stormtrooper with cheekbones that could grate cheese.

If she were alone, she would have slammed her head against the wall.

“No, I don’t!” she snapped. God, why did Poe Dameron have to clue in to this?

“Yes, you do,” he insisted. “Rose, no offense…but what the hell are you doing here?”

Oh right.

That.

“Uh…” Rose exchanged a look with Waroo. “It’s a long story.”

“Are you the people who fixed the communications?” Kylo asked.

“This girl is amazing,” Marks nodded to Rose.

Ok, she had to focus on something else before she literally swooned. How about the Stormtrooper that Marks was friendly with? He could distract her.

“What happened to your team? Unfortunately, we got the report Weevil was KIA.” FN-2187 added quietly, “Slip was also KIA.”

God damn it, this one was hot too.

“Tone and Duck were KIA,” Marks reported. “The Resistance people, Evan and Paige are fine. Paige has shrapnel in the head and is resting on their ship, but the medic has entered the building to help people… I think. We had to split up, so I can’t vouch for how far they got.”

“They?” Kylo questioned. “Who are they?”

Rose’s head snapped to the side. Suddenly it clicked.

This was Kylo Ren. This was the bastard who had tortured and murdered her best friend’s mother and tried to kill Rey as a five-year-old.

She wanted nothing more than to launch herself at him and tear his throat out.

Rose even moved for a second to do so, but the thought of Rey held her back. If she attacked Kylo – no matter how egregious his sins against Rey, the best friend Rose hadn’t even met yet, were – there was only one conclusion to that scene. Doing so could only end with Kylo learning why Rose attacked him… and that meant revealing to him Rey was alive.

She couldn’t let that happen.

So Rose had to grit her teeth and just bear it… even if the only way she could manage was by picturing punching his stupid face over and over again.

But that didn’t mean she couldn’t hurt him.

“Your Dad is here,” Rose declared. “…And he’s here to rescue you.”

Damn, she loved the look on his stupid face.

As they raced into the ballroom, the first words on the men’s lips – save for Evan – were the names
“Poe! Poe! Cielito! Poe!”

“BEN! BEN! DAMN IT, I WILL CALL YOU KYLO IF THAT’S WHAT IT TAKES TO GET YOU TO REPLY!”

And Chewie just let out a very long and loud roar that Han barely could make out to be the Wookiee verbalization of Lumpawaroo.

It was so long that Evan, Qi’ra, and Qi’ra’s men had to literally cover their ears.

“That’s it,” Evan lowered his hands, “I’m testing us all for hearing damage later.”

“Bombs went off, Kid,” Han pointed out. “Everyone will need it.”

“Allright,” Qi’ra walked over to what remained of the weapons display. She made a face like she had bit a lemon when she saw how much of a disaster it was. Little of it would be salvageable. “It appears that your sons aren’t here, so we’ll all go carry these weapons to the ships and once your friends have fixed the comm lines, I’ll tell my men to retreat. The boys should be safe for you all to go find them after that.”

Kes glanced at Han, “Uh… that wasn’t what we agreed on.”

“Our agreement was predicated on the fact that your boys would be in the ballroom,” Qi’ra shot. “Well, we’re in the ballroom and the boys aren’t here. We have to figure out Plan B, and that’s mine. You got a better idea?”

Han scowled, “The last time you said that, we ended up hiding in a bucket of eels.”

Kes opened his mouth to question that, but thought better of it.

“Uh, guys?” Evan held up his watch, a side button now lit up, “How about we use the comms that work now?”

All heads turned to Qi’ra.

She sighed.

“Minati,” she ordered one of her minions, a bodyguard she had taken in after Minati had fled from Jakku. “You start having the men load the weapons. I have to make a few calls.”

Qi’ra moved to walk away but Han caught her by the wrist.

“Where are you going?” he demanded.

She pulled her hand out of his grip, “I will call off the hunt of your son… but I’m not revealing codenames and procedures to you and your friends.”

Han sighed and let her pass.

“I don’t trust her, Solo,” Kes said bluntly.

“Oh, I don’t either,” Han replied. “Alright, Hotshot. Make the call.”

Evan lifted his watch and hit the call button to his comm, “Bey One, this is Bey Five, please come in.
Bey One, this is Bey Five, do you read?”

After a minute, there was a crackle, and then a voice.

“Bey Five, this is Bey One,” Poe Dameron replied. “Nice to hear you’re alive, Tharel. Paige would have had Jessika kick my ass if you died.”

Kes let out a breath of relief. His son was alive, well, and snarking.

“Bey One, shouldn’t you be using our codenames?”

“Tharel, I am literally standing next to Kylo Ren. Consider our cover thoroughly blown. Now, what’s this I hear about my dad getting drunk with your mom?”

Evan sighed, “I… Yeah.”

“So my dad’s standing next to you?”

Without a word of warning, Kes grabbed Evan’s wrist and held the watch up to his mouth, “Poe? Are you alright?”

“Yeah, Dad, I’m fine. It’s just some explosions and some gangsters. The usual Tuesday stuff.”

Kes didn’t know if he was annoyed or proud, “I’m assuming you met up with Rose?”

“Why did you bring her here with you? No offense, but from a practical standpoint that’s more a liability.”

“Poe?” Rose’s voice came.

“Yeah?”

“Shower.”

“Shutting up.”

Han stared at Kes, but Kes just shrugged.

“I’ll be honest,” Kes answered, “it’s mostly because she and Waroo were the only sober ones around and he needed a co-pilot.”

“Which brings me to my next question, why is Waroo not attempting to murder Ben Solo?”

“Hey!” Kylo exclaimed.

Han went stiff.

It had been twelve years since he had seen or heard his son, and there he finally was. His son was really in reach, in the same building. A few footsteps more and he would be face to face with the little boy who he had created on the night the Emperor died.

And as Han thought about the fact he could see the face of his son for the first time in twelve years… he wanted to do nothing but throw up.

Even worse was Chewbacca watching the scene, knowing that terrible sin Ben had committed against Felicity. That disgusting, defiling act that had broken Luke Skywalker. The one he had sworn – and kept that vow – to not share with anyone, not even Han.

That didn’t make Chewie feel too comfortable either.

“Uh…” Kes watched Han, “did you, uh… Did you want to talk to Ben?”

Han stared at Kes, but no words came.

Did he actually want to talk to Ben? In the bar where it had been an idyllic notion, Han would have said yes. But now? Facing the reality of his son who had destroyed so much? Killed so many? Murdered Luke’s daughter?

Han didn’t know if he had the strength.

There apparently was the same conundrum going on on the other end of the comm because Poe soon enough piped up.

“He wants to know what Han’s answer is.”

Han’s breath caught; his son was really there and paying attention.

“I…” Han struggled to find his voice. “I… wanna know if he wants to talk to me.”

There was a pause.

“No, Solo! For the love of the Force, I am not replying with I asked you first!”

“Guys?” Evan awkwardly cut in, not enjoying how his wrist kept getting passed back and forth. “Not to interrupt, but can we figure out a meet up? I have patients to treat.”

“The boy’s right,” Kes dropped Evan’s hand and it smacked him a little too hard in the leg. “You Solos can work out your thoughts on awkward reunions once we’ve met up. Sorry Qi’ra, but I don’t think we’re going to take your deal of helping you take the weapons back to your ship. I think we’re just going to go meet up with our people.”

“Oh, how cute. You think you have a choice.”

Qi’ra let out a laugh that to Han – who had known her true nature as a teenager – sounded like ice. Taking her example, the rest of Crimson Dawn echoed the laughter, everyone’s hands shifting to their belts.

Han and his understood in a heart beat and their hands were on their weapons in an instant. They drew them simultaneously as Crimson Dawn. Everyone stood in standoff not unlike the one on Jakku when Roke violated Aletha’s black sheet rule.

“Oh look, you betrayed me,” Han hand his blasters pointed at Qi’ra while she pointed hers at him. It was impossible to tell who drew first, but Han knew he would have no hesitation to shoot first.

“Exactly as I predicated. What a surprise.”

“We’re not teenagers on Corellia anymore, Han,” Qi’ra replied. “Our lives led us down very different paths. I have no choice but to do this.”

“You’ve always had a choice, Qi’ra. You just keep lying to yourself that this life wasn’t what you wanted.”

Silence clung to the room as if a sneeze would trigger Armageddon.
“Uh… Guys?” Evan awkwardly spoke up. “Do any of you care that since I an Army Medic in a non-active battlefield situation, to directly target and attack me is against the Reasonable Wartime Measures Act and technically a war crime?”

There was more silence as every eye turned on him in annoyance. Evan found that at least ten more weapons had been directly turned on him.

“All right. Just checking.”

Chapter End Notes

Coming Up Next Chapter…

The Same Damn Description That Was Here the Last Chapter

Seriously the whole Kaydel’s Decision thing happens at the end of next chapter. But hey, I guess have this. Evan is horrified to learn of the lightsaber cauterization, Kylo and Sasa’s reunion changes the stakes of the Resistance/First Order truce, Poe asks Finn to join the Resistance, Wiln tries to comfort Kaydel for her PTSD, Timor throws his daughter under the bus, and Kes meets Kaydel’s father… then immediately punches him in the face.

I got the novelization for Solo, and to my surprise there’s a part where it’s revealed that the Imperials intended to sell Chewie “as a pit fighter.” And there is also a Queen who had fighting pits. Apparently the Zygerrian Fighting Pits and Queen Thali (a character from Definitions of Home, sister of Queen Nerissa of Zygerria) I made up are pretty much canon. Now I really want to write an AU where Chewie meets Alyla and Gavyn.

So going through my “Future Parts” document, I found another little excerpt of the original Finn and Poe meeting that now has to be cut. Enjoy.

Back in the TIE Fighter, Poe was mulling over what surname he suggest Finn take. After all, everyone needed a surname, and it would help Finn feel like a regular person to have one. Plus then Finn the Stormtrooper wouldn’t have his paperwork mixed up with Finn Braxol in Communications, or Finn Antilles in Medical, or Finn Treyvon in Mess Hall.

Maybe Poe should have picked a less common name for Finn.

A part of Poe felt like Finn Rhiaon would be appropriate. Poe knew that the Resistance had never actually been able to track down who FN-2187’s parents had been (and Felicity Rhiaon had spent years and thousands of credits searching.) Felicity’s husband, Luke Skywalker had offhandedly mentioned to Poe once during his summer with the family, that Felicity said she would have adopted FN-2187 if she had rescued him.

But then would that mean Finn should be Finn Rhiaon Skywalker? Of course, said hypothetical adoption would have taken place years before Felicity had married Luke Skywalker, but that hypothetical adoption had never actually taken place. Would it be presumptive to give the name Skywalker to Finn without the express consent of Luke, especially considering the weight of the legacy? Would it be rude to the memory of Felicity Rhiaon to give Finn her surname?

Poe could suggest the name Finn Dameron, but that kind of felt like he had found a wild animal on the side of the road, brought him home and said, “Dad, can I keep it?”

And he was not having that conversation again.

Sorry again about the long wait!
Silence filled the room for a very long time. They all just stood there glaring at each other, fingers threateningly resting on the triggers of their blasters. If someone so much as sneezed, they would spark a chain reaction that would blow everything to hell.

“Uh… Guys?” Poe’s voice came from Evan’s watch. “It’s been like seven minutes since anyone’s spoken to us. What’s going on?”

Evan turned his head to look at Qi’ra. His voice was soft and sympathetic, and his facial expression as meek and courteous as possible.

“May I-”

Qi’ra sighed and nodded at the men with blasters pointed at Evan to lower their weapons.

“Thanks.” Evan answered the comm in a mild tone, “Hey Commander Dameron, sorry, Crimson Dawn has taken us hostage and now we’re in a stand-off.”

“So… regular Tuesday?”

“Pretty much.”

Han finally huffed, “Qi’ra, this isn’t going to get us anywhere.”

“Oh, I know,” Qi’ra admitted. “Honestly, I really had no intention of taking you guys hostage. In fact, if it were literally anyone but you I made the deal with, I would have kept it. Luke, Leia, hell even your sister-in-law.”

Kes scowled, “Then why are you taking us hostage?”

“If word got back to my husband that I made a deal with Han – my ex-boyfriend who Laertes is so insanely jealous of that he has literally set up a bounty on Leia on behalf of Luke Skywalker’s crazy ex girlfriend.”

“Oh, that’s who Calla hired for that.”

Qi’ra continued, “And that I didn’t backstab Han and take him hostage… well, that wouldn’t be pleasant for anyone involved.”

Evan frowned, “Wait, are you worried he’d get violent with you? With all due respect, crime boss or not, no one should have to go through that. You deserve better, Lady Qi’ra.”

Han stared at Evan, his jaw hanging open, face filled with the are you kidding me version of disbelief, and kind of looking like he was about to be the one to shoot Evan.

“Thank you, Boy,” Qi’ra laughed a little, “but I’ve got a handle on things with my marriage.”

“Are you sure?” Evan asked.

Han shook his head, “Tharel… what are you doing?”

“Don’t worry,” Qi’ra assured Evan. “Laertes and I know where we stand. We’ve literally had a calm, polite conversation many times about how we fully intend on killing each other if the other steps out of line. Anytime I talk to my daughter, the first words out of her mouth are have you killed Dad yet?”

“Tharel,” Han snapped. “Seriously, shut the hel-”

He stopped.

“Your kid’s a girl?” Han looked to Qi’ra.

She shrugged, inwardly cursing herself for the slip of tongue. Thirty years she managed to keep that fact to herself. Laertes wasn’t going to be happy. She was going to have to recruit a lot of new minions to replace the ones he would kill in his anger.

“Huh.” Han’s eyes flicked upwards as he weighed something in his mind, “Qi’ra?”

“Yeah.”

“Keep her away from my kid. His love life is… weird enough.”

Yeah, Qi’ra knew her daughter had taken his son’s virginity… but she certainly wasn’t going to be the one to tell him.

“Guys?” Poe Dameron spoke into his comm. Everyone was gathered around, though Kylo had managed to be the closest. The kid refused to admit he was clinging onto Han Solo’s every word.

“Can we focus, please? I have had more than enough of Solo Junior’s weird ass love life this month.
Just ask Evan.”

“No, please,” Evan begged. “Don’t ask me. General Organa is already going to kill me when I get back to base.”

Kylo frowned at Poe, “What are you talking about? What’s going on with my… Uh, Organa?”

Poe’s face went white. Oh God, no. Why? Why him?

“It’s nothing,” he said quickly. Too quickly.

Kylo’s eyes darkened, “Tell me.”

Poe glanced at Karé, he gave him a pained nod.

He took a deep breath and then admitted the truth… very quickly, “Long story short, we bugged your quarters, accidentally made an audio recording of you having sex, then Tharel accidentally sent the recording to your mother, who accidentally listened to it.”

Ben Solo looked like the world had ended.

“Ok…” Kylo said slowly. “Ok… This… Entire trip… Never happened. For good or ill, Light Side or Dark Side, I will never, ever speak to Leia Organa ever again. …Because I sure as hell am not having that conversation with her.”

“Something tells me that Leia will be happy to sweep this incident under the rug,” Poe patted Ben’s arm supportively. He turned back to the comm, “So what exactly does Crimson Dawn want?”

“They’re stealing what’s left of the weapons from Kation and Connix and want four people to accompany them back to their ship,” Evan explained.

“Why four?” Poe frowned.

“Standard Corellian hostage tactic,” Kylo answered. “When you take prisoners and are at risk of them being rescued, you put one in front of you, one to the back, one to the left, and one to the right. You surround yourself and make a meat shield so if someone shoots at you they hit a hostage instead.”

Everyone stared at him.

“What?” he frowned. “When I turned ten, my… father said he was going to teach me the three things every Corellian kid needs to know: how to take hostages, how to hotwire any vehicle, and how to get away with always keeping ten percent of the product someone gets you to smuggle or trade on their behalf.”

They still stared at him.

“You know…” Poe said, “I’m starting to understand why you turned out the way you did.”

“Look, I don’t see how any of this affects us,” Kylo dismissed. He did not want to keep discussing his father. “They got taken hostage. That’s not my problem. All I need is to go to the lobby. They can deal with that themselves.”

“Are you kidding me?” Poe exclaimed. “We have to save them!”

“Why?” Kylo crossed his arms. “What’s in it for me?”
“God damn it, Ben,” Han’s voice buzzed over the comm. The exclamation was pretty loud considering Evan’s wrist could pick it up.

Twelve years, and those were his first words to his son.

“Are you really that arrogant and selfish?” Karé was amazed and very much angry. “Those are our people!”

“Right,” Kylo shot. “Your people. Not mine. I made a deal with you and Dameron, not the merry band of Rebel Vets.”

Waroo decided to cut in and plead the case. He roared a lot, Kylo replying to his remarks, though not enough to understand what they were talking about. Poe could see though that a little bit of Waroo was getting to him. Not close to what was needed to change his mind, but there was a bit of a soft spot in Kylo for Waroo.

“I said no, and that’s final!” Kylo ultimately snapped at the group. “Now, we are wasting time! I am going to the lobby and my people right now, and those weaklings with delusions of grandeur can get themselves out of the hole they dug themselves into. Let’s move, now!”

He started to walk away.

Rose bit her lip nervously. She couldn’t let Evan be taken hostage, if something happened to him it would hurt Paige so much. And Aletha. Not to mention, Rose liked him well enough herself. Sure, not exactly like an older brother, but definitely more than Paige’s boyfriend and Aletha’s protégé.

She looked around the group feeling a little helpless. Poe and Karé were at a loss for what else they could say. Waroo pleaded with Kylo to change his mind. The Stormtroopers looked dejected, especially Marks’ friend.

But Marks… he actually looked kind of haughty. A haughty hottie with that perfectly arched eyebrow over stormy grey eyes that read a challenge in them.

Ok, at this rate, her thoughts about him were getting so ridiculous, Rose knew she was sounding like a trashy HoloNovel you got out of the one credit bin at a refueling station, the cover bearing a swooning maiden and an Adonis with just the right amount of his shirt pulled open.

That didn’t negate the fact that Marks clearly had an idea. But what could possibly-

“Tharel is a medic,” Marks called after Kylo. “Forgive me, Master Kylo… but didn’t Master Sasa get attacked and badly injured?”

Kylo stopped dead in his tracks.

Oh damn, that was good.

Rose couldn’t see the expression on Kylo’s face as he took a moment to consider Marks’ words. Rose didn’t know who Sasa was, but clearly there was something about her that made him care about her safety.

Slowly Kylo turned around, “MK-6093… what are you suggesting? That I have some sort of selfish personal dilemma or conflict of interest that makes me unfit to make decisions?”

“Of course not,” Marks bowed his head dutifully. “All I’m suggesting is that the events of this bombing have already destroyed two Knights of Ren. We wouldn’t want to lose another.”
Kylo was sure even Rose Tico picked up the subtext.

“No… we wouldn’t.” Kylo sighed, “Alright, how about this? We do a trade.”

“A trade?” Poe raised an eyebrow.

“A trade?” Evan echoed. He had only heard Poe’s voice and was a little confused.

Kylo returned close enough to Poe so his pitch could be heard, “How about we trade one of the people here in exchange for the medic being released? Would that be an option?”

They heard some muffled noises on the comm as Evan and Qi’ra discussed the idea.

“She says she would be open to an exchange, but we can’t have Solo or the Wookiee,” Evan finally said. “Who would we trade me for?”

“I’ll go,” Marks offered.

“You absolutely will not,” Kylo snapped. He glanced at Poe and then walked over to Marks. Kylo whispered, “What are you playing at? Is this some sort of plan surrounding Calrissian? I know Qi’ra is on good terms with him.”

“This has nothing to do with that,” Marks’s voice was low. “Trust me, if I wanted to get in contact with him, I would have already.”

“Oh, I think you do and are just waiting for your chance.”

“I suggest we continue this conversation when we don’t have an audience,” Marks said coldly. “Now, let’s be realistic; I’m the best choice here. Nines and Zeroes are good soldiers, but they’re not the kind of people you send on missions like this. So, what? Are you going to send FN-2187 in Tharel’s place? You’re going to send FN-2187 to Han Solo? We both know if Han Solo finds out who FN-2187 is, we’re not getting him back.”

“Yeah, Solo would probably tie him up, throw him in his cargo hold, and bring him to Organa to avenge Rhiaon,” Kylo conceded.

“Exactly,” Marks said. “So send me, because your only other option is sending someone from the Resistance… or yourself.”

Kylo sighed, “Fine. But if you even mention the word Alyla to Solo or Chewbacca-”

“I won’t. I swear.”

“Alright.” Kylo took a step back from Marks and announced, “We’ll send MK-6093 and trade him for Tharel. Everyone, say what goodbyes you need to. By the time this is all through, Marks will be safely back with my people, and you probably won’t see him again. I know he’ll be greatly missed.”

Rose knew that he was being sarcastic, his voice was overtly dripping with cynicism, yet for some reason she took the words for heart. Her pulse quickened at the thought of not seeing Marks again.

“Wait, he can’t go,” Rose blurted out.

Poe stared at her in great confusion, “Uh… what?”

Her cheeks burned red, “Well, uh… I just meant, that, well maybe…”
Oh God, what were words again? She suddenly understood how her sister felt while meeting Evan’s mother.

“I think what Rose is saying,” Marks cut in. He caught her eye, and the corner of his mouth twitched up in a kind smile, not a mocking smirk, “That… Well, all the fathers came racing to see their children safe. The Crimson Dawn woman said Solo and the Wookiee couldn’t be traded; she didn’t say the elder Dameron couldn’t.”

“Yeah!” Rose latched onto the line of thought. “Trade me for Kes Dameron. Then at least this whole thing would be worth it for the parents… a little. Besides, Poe, you don’t want just a member of the First Order going to Crimson Dawn alone. You’d want a Resistance member to go too.”

Poe just stared at her, “…Huh.”

He wasn’t blind. Poe had seen the way Rose kept glancing over at Marks, though originally he thought it was because of her deep bias and mistrust of Stormtroopers. But now… Poe hadn’t exactly paid a lot of attention to Paige Tico when he first started dating Kaydel, but Poe was fairly certain Paige had given Evan a lot of similar looks before they started their own courtship.

“Tharel, what do you think?” Poe asked Evan. “Swap Rose for my Dad?”

“You’re going to have to make that an order, Commander Dameron,” Evan replied. “Because if Paige finds out I agreed to put her little sister directly into the hands of gangsters in exchange for your father’s life… I’m not going to have a girlfriend anymore... Or certain parts of my body, and my mother will no longer need to have any more no sex before marriage discussions as they will be redundant.”

“Then, it’s an order, Tharel. And don’t you give me any lip about it.”

“Oh, but please, Sir, won’t you reconsider?” Evan didn’t even pretend his objections were real.

“That’s enough, Evan.” Poe looked over to Rose and Marks, “Well? Shall we?”

“So, what’s going on with you and the Stormtrooper?”

Rose frowned as she looked up at Poe. He was leading her and Marks back down the hallway to the ballroom entrance. Poe had originally been in the lead, Marks a few feet behind him, and Rose a few feet behind Marks. She hadn’t noticed when Poe dropped back to speak to her in a hushed voice.

“What?” Rose fiddled nervously with her work gloves. She had forgotten her own back on D’Qar and borrowed a pair from Kes at the ranch. They were quite bulky on her, so her hands were stained with oil and grease when she had to deal with minutia that the mass of fabric on her fingers blocked.

“What do you mean?”

“I’m not Head of the Air Force because I overlook the subtle details,” Poe said. “Those were some looks you were giving the Stormtrooper. And I thought I heard you mutter cheekbones?”

Could she run? Just run fast and far away? Say screw everything, I’m going to go live with Rey on Jakku where no sexy Stormtrooper with heavenly cheekbones and exhibitionist pilots weren’t making her blush up a storm?

She stuttered over her words, trying to think of something to say in her defense, “Well, it, uh, just is,
I kind of—”

“Rose,” Poe grabbed her arm and pulled her to a stop. “It’s okay to be attracted to a Stormtrooper. You just can’t act on those feelings, okay? I don’t want you getting hauled into Nalto’s office for a treason… again. So, if you want to tell me you think he’s cute, that’s okay. I’m not going to get mad.”

She sighed, “Ok, I… I think he’s kind of cute. But I don’t want to talk about it right now.”

“That’s fine with me. I don’t think I have the proper credentials to deal with helping you through your first crush. Although, I will be filing the proper paperwork with Kira’s Council on the issue with a concise report of the events as I understand them.”

“Just make sure you don’t forget Form Q-13,” Rose teased. They began to walk again, “Poe… have you ever, you know, been attracted to someone you shouldn’t?”

“To be honest… no. I think my most risqué crush was the brief one I had on Gavyn Kene’s daughter Miri when I was sixteen. She was like half cat person and both her rather overprotective parents were Jedi so things were difficult for me. Though I never acted on the crush, and once the summer ended so did the feelings pretty much.”

“Oh.”

They walked in silence for a little while. Rose continued to fiddle with Kes’ gloves while Poe watched Marks. His eyes never moved from Marks, inspecting him extra carefully now that he knew of Rose’s crush.

Poe was Kira’s Council’s unofficial significant other assessor. He was protective of the girls, and if you weren’t approved of by Poe, you pretty much weren’t allowed to date one of the girls… though that was mostly the muscle of Jessika Pava would scare off unapproved would be suitors. But Teng Malar was currently Poe’s top approved significant other, mostly because he had literally had a three-hour interview with Poe over the Aletha and Kira’s comms to get said approval. And Teng was the one significant other who get away with dating a girl without approval, what with the whole living on a different planet.

“Hey, Rose?” Poe asked. “Sorry for asking, but I wasn’t really paying attention to your role in things when you explained how you get here earlier.”

Rose shook her head, “Thanks, Poe.”

“How’d you two meet?” he pointed between Marks and Rose.

There was a bit of a smile on her face, “Just luck.”

He laughed a little, “Yeah? Good luck?”

Rose looked back at Marks, who had reached the door into the ballroom, “Not sure yet.”

“Hey guys?” Marks called.

Poe and Rose glanced at each other. Rose nodded, and they raced forward.

“What’s the problem?” Poe asked.

“I can’t get the door open,” Marks answered. “The power isn’t even on.”
“Oh yeah, Solo messed with the cables to secure the door and make sure no one came after us,” Poe explained. “This was before we knew about the rescue party. It’s nothing big, but it was Solo doing the work, so I can’t fix this. Rose, wanna give it a shot?”

“I like a challenge,” Rose grinned.

As Marks opened the control panel next to the door for Rose, Poe got on the comm and gave Evan a heads up that they were on the other side of the door.

Rose shook her head lightly when she saw the mess of wires. As Poe had said, it was something a little too advance for him to fix, but this? This was a walk in the park. The only problem she had was when she tried to grasp the wires, her bulky gloves were just getting in the way.

“Marks, do you mind?” Rose asked once more.

“Hand them over,” Marks held out his hand, Rose having passed the gloves to him a few times in the communication centre. Without a second thought, he shoved them into his pant pocket.

“How’s it going, Rose?” Poe asked.

“Almost got it,” she replied. “Just another few wires.”

“Okay. Now when that door is opened, we need to be armed and ready. There’s going to be a few members of Crimson Dawn waiting for us. They’re going to be led by a woman named Minati. They have been instructed not to hurt us, but be wary. Qi’ra has given permission that if they touch us, we are allowed to defend ourselves.”

“Minati?” Rose scowled. “Why does that name sound familiar?”

She set the last wire into place and suddenly the door flew open. Cocking of blaster filled the hall as a tall, black-haired woman flanked by four burly soldiers came into view.

“Poe Dameron?” the woman asked.

“The one and only,” he winked. “You Minati?”

“Yes,” Minati said. “Are those the new hostages?”

“Yes.”

“Huh. That girl doesn’t seem like much of anything. I’d show her the back of my hand, and she’s shatter into a million pieces.”

Poe said nothing, but openly rested his hand on the blaster on his hip.

“Come on,” Minati gave a shrill laugh like the noise of a dog whose tail has just been stepped on. “Qi’ra’s waiting.”

They began to walk forward. The Crimson Dawn members went first, with the other trailing, Rose in particular caught close to the burly henchmen. The burly men eyed Rose and gave somewhat lecherous laughs.

“I hope Lady Qi’ra lets us keep this one,” one of the men leered at Rose. “Not very pretty, but we could have fun.”

Later that day, Rose would sulk over being called not very pretty, but in that moment she was more afraid of what would happen to her now. But she had an angel on her shoulder. A hand grasped her wrist and gently pulled her back, away from the men and brought her close and securely to his protection.

Rose turned her head back to thank Poe for keeping her safe, but gasped when she saw Marks holding her wrist instead.

“Don’t say a thing,” he kept his voice low but neutral. He was completely in control of his situation, “I’m here. They won’t touch you. I’ve got you.”

She found herself more relaxed than if it had been Poe who grabbed her. Instead she could focus on something else entirely.

As they entered the ballroom, Rose couldn’t keep her eyes off Minati. She didn’t recognize the woman, but there was just something about that name. Something buried in her memories screamed at her to know that name. Indeed, she knew it, she just couldn’t figure out how she knew it.

But as Rose struggled to recall the name, she was very aware of the blast on one hip and the taser on the other. Deep down, as Rose focused on nothing but this Minati woman, she knew she wanted to use them.

Poe’s focus, however, was on someone else entirely.

“Dad!” he cried out the second he set eyes on Kes.

“Poe!” Kes’ body jerked like a thousand ton weight was lifted off by the sight of his son alive and relatively well.

Kes did not care at all about the dozen blasters trained on him. He just holstered his weapon, dropped the bag of medical supplies and ammunition he had been lugging around, booked it straight across the room, and pulled his son into a bone-crushing hug.

“You’re alright,” Kes whispered, trying not to cry. “You’re safe.”

“Yeah, Dad, I’m alive,” Poe’s voice was quite muffled as Kes firmly held Poe’s face against his neck. Kes was a little taller than Poe and a little stronger, so with the angle, power, and desperation of the embrace… he was kind of smothering Poe. “Dad? Can’t… breathe… help?”

“Sorry,” Kes released his son. Pulling back, Kes set his hands on the sides of Poe’s face and looked him over in a twisted mixture of fear and relief. “Thank the Force you’re alright.”

“Come on, Dad. You don’t need to make a fuss,” Poe waved off as if the situation was as minor as getting in a minor speeder accident. “This sort of thing is a normal occurrence for me.”

Kes arched an eyebrow, “And you wonder why I worry over you on undercover missions.”

“What can I say? Both my parents were Rebels. Honestly, you’re the one responsible for dooming me to such a life. But don’t worry, I forgive you for it. Not only did you and Mom give me your Rebel genes, but you also gave me your extremely handsome looking person genes. On behalf of most of the sight seeing populace, I thank you for that.”

Kes didn’t say anything, rather just gave Poe a look he was far too familiar with.

Poe shuddered, “You know, I think part of the reason I’m with Kay is she’s the only person who can nail the cut that shit out, Poe look as well as you.”
“Poe?”

“Yeah, Dad?”

“Cut that shit out.”

“Yes, Sir.”

“Uh… guys?” Evan finally spoke up. During the Dameron reunion, he and Rose had exchanged their own hugs. “Can we get a move on? I have patients to see.”

“I think that might be up to the hostage takers,” Poe jerked his head to left. “Qi’ra, right?”

“That is correct,” Qi’ra nodded.

“Huh… so you’re the woman I’ve heard so much ranting about.”

Qi’ra chuckled and looked over at Han, “And you try to convince me that Leia doesn’t give me a second thought.”

“She doesn’t,” Han said flatly. “Leia only thinks about you when you decide to interject yourself in our lives. You can cut that out, by the way.”

“Please Han, if Leia doesn’t think about me, why does her prodigy know me by name?”

“Oh, I wasn’t talking about Leia,” Poe piped up. “I was talking about Felicity Rhiaon. Man, that woman really knew how to go on rant. I think she liked to call you Han’s leg stabbing ex-girlfriend.”

“Leg stabbing ex-girlfriend?” Rose scowled.

Qi’ra shook her head, "Ugh, you stab a woman in the leg one time and you're nicknamed for life."

“Fliss did like her nicknames,” Kes shrugged. “What was it she called you again, Solo? The Loud One?”

“Loud Mouth Solo,” Han corrected. He muttered to Chewbacca, “You know, I kind of miss being called that.”

_Graw growl gr?_

“Thanks for the offer, Pal, but I’ll pass,” Han replied. “Loud Mouth Solo was something only Felicity called me, and I’d kinda like it to stay that way.”

“You know, in my defense,” Qi’ra said, “I didn’t even leave a scar on Rhiaon… and she was asking for it.”

“It’s Felicity Rhiaon. She _always_ starts it!”

“HEY!” Evan screamed.

The room fell silent as every eye turned on him.

“Come on!” he ranted. “You two have literally already had this argument. We are going in circles! Now, can I leave and go find the injured people, or are we going to stand around and trade barbs all day?”
Qi’ra sighed, “I suppose since we have been given two people in trade for the two of you, you are free to go. Now, which ones are we keeping? The men?”

“Oh, hell no,” Poe said. “I’ve got a pretty little blonde in the lobby who has been waiting for me long enough. You get the dream team of these two, but I’m warning you, I want Rose back in one piece. Do with the Stormtrooper whatever you want.”

Poe was promptly smacked upside the head by his father.

“And to think the First Order gets labeled the bad guys,” Marks rolled his eyes.

“Come on,” Han glowered at him. “You’re not honestly going to stand here and tell me that you’re fighting on the right side.”

“The fight I fight is none of your business,” Marks seethed. “You don’t know the first thing about me, so you have no right to judge me for the choices I make. I have my reasons, and yes, I do fight the good fight.”

Poe scoffed, “If you were doing the right thing, you would be fighting with the Resistance, not the First Order.”

“I’m sorry I can’t do better, but I’ve got my own problems.”

Han frowned.

“So, to be clear,” Qi’ra spoke up, “I’m getting you and the girl.”

Marks glanced towards Rose, something hard flicking in his eyes, “Yes.”

Qi’ra took a moment to look him over. Her face was tight as her eyes roamed over his body, trying to put some puzzle together.

“Have we met before?” Qi’ra asked.

“No,” his reply was quick and sharp.

“Huh. You know… you seem familiar to me.”

“I imagine I would,” his tone made it clear the discussion was over. “So are we doing this?”

Qi’ra took a moment to examine her fresh hostages, “Yes, I think we are.”

Minati had been at Qi’ra’s side ever since returning. Her eyes had been on Rose’s just as much as Rose’s had been on her. The entire time her face looked like she had just bit into a lemon, and when Qi’ra declared they were taking Rose, Minati looked personally affronted.

“You can’t be serious, Lady Qi’ra,” Minati objected. “I mean look at her. She’s a piece of nothing. We’re going to give up a medic and a man built like an ox in exchange for her?”

Rose scowled. Come on, why did she know this woman? Where had she heard the name before? Wait, wasn’t it from Kira’s Council?

“Minati, having a full member of the Resistance is an important hostage,” Qi’ra said. “If we lose the medic, we lose our edge at making the most damage.”
“But Lady Qi’ra,” Minati started.

“That’s enough,” Qi’ra snapped. “I don’t know what manners they taught you on Jakku, but you’ve been away from it long enough to know better.”

No, not Kira’s Council. Kira herself, Rose realized. Rey had said the name before. But from what and when and why did the thought of Minati make her so angry?

What had Minati done on Jakku?

“Now, we’ve fussed long enough,” Qi’ra took control. “Han?”

He grunted.

“If your people still want this deal, then they need to leave now.”

“Come on,” Poe urged Kes and Evan. “The others are waiting.”

“Yes, I can imagine some of them are in terrible need of medical attention,” Evan readjusted the strap of his medical bag.

“Oh, you’re telling me,” Poe gave a low whistle. “Snap’s down a leg.”

Evan’s face went pale, “Down a…”

He said nothing more: Evan Tharel just bolted out of the ballroom in the general direction of Snap Wexley.

Kes looked stricken, but he walked back across the ballroom to collect the bag he had dropped, “Snap has lost a leg?”

Poe shrugged, “Otherwise everyone seems to be pretty good.”

And then he remembered.

“Hey Solo,” Poe turned his attention to Han. “Unfortunately, Jaina Fel was killed by the bombing.”

He watched it fall over Han’s face. The man looked both upset and annoyed; he was a man sick and tired of hearing about death. Poe knew the relationship the Solos had had with Jaina, and although Han’s hadn’t been as strong, Han would be upset that the girl died.

“Damn it, Qi’ra,” Han glowered at her. “Whoever you owe a favor to have better saved the galaxy or something to kill this many innocent bystanders.”

Qi’ra gave no defense for her action.

“We, uh,” Poe cleared his throat as he glanced in the direction that he and Kylo before leaving the ballroom had placed both remaining parts of Jaina Fel so she could be found by later recovery teams, “we had to leave quickly and didn’t have a way of bringing her with us. You think you could-”

“I’ll take care of it,” Han promised. “Now go and keep my kid from killing anyone else today.”

“Actually, he wasn’t responsible for this bombing,” Poe hated himself for pointing it out.

“I know.” Han kicked the body of an Imperial Loyalist who had been killed by a lightsaber across the chest, “But he did this.”
“Right.”

“Come on,” Kes slung an arm around Poe shoulder. “Let’s go find that girl of yours. Rose, you gonna be okay?”

“I’m with Han Solo and Chewbacca the Wookiee,” Rose grinned. “I’ll be fine.”

Han nervously chuckled, “Yeah… we’re good at keeping people safe and out of harm’s way. My speciality.”

He leaned over to Chewbacca.

“Chewie, kept an extra eye on Tico,” Han muttered. “Leia is going to murder me if we get this girl killed.”

“Come on,” Kes directed Poe out of the ballroom.

“Wait! Wait a moment!” Minati objected, but the Damerons were already gone. She huffed and rounded on Rose, “Really, Lady Qi’ra? You really accepted this girl over that hunk of muscle we just let waltz out the door? I mean look at her.”

Rose yelped as Minati reached her and immediately grabbed jaw, yanking Rose’s face up to look Minati straight in the eye.

No one noticed Marks’ hand rest on his blaster.

“Look at this girl,” Minati scoffed. “Tiny, weak, dirty. Probably an idiot who they only send in when all the grown ups are too busy to deal with whatever simple task this girl barely has the brain power to perform.”

“I remember how she broke down my self-confidence,” Rey’s voice echoed in Rose’s head. She had told a story about Minati, but what story?

“I mean, really,” Minati’s voice dripped, “she’s got no bite to her whatsoever.”

“Minati always knew the exact words that would break my spirit.”

Minati gave a shrill laugh like the noise of a dog whose tail has just been stepped on, “She’s almost as pathetic as that little girl the Kymeri bitch shot me in the knee for.

Rose felt like a bucket of ice water had been dumped on her head.

This was Minati… as in Jarex Zolhar’s Minati. One of the women who had once beat up Rey when Rose’s best friend had only been a seven-year-old… Beat her and made her think she was responsible. This bitch was the reason Rey had struggled with her abilities for years.

Actually, if it hadn’t been for Minati destroying Rey’s self-confidence, Rey might never have agreed to do the fighting ring with Devi, and thus Kira’s Council wouldn’t have formed. Minati was the reason Rose had even met her best friend.

…Ah, screw it. The bitch had to pay.

“Just look at this little face,” Minati used a babying voice like she was speaking to a dumb mutt.

Rose did see the murderous looks on Han, Chewie, and Marks’ faces. Even Qi’ra looked annoyed.
Minati laughed that dog tail laugh again, “Oh, the poor little thing. Bet she doesn’t know the first thing about fight-”

Rose whipped her taser off her belt, shoved it onto Minati’s neck, and turned it on to full voltage. Unfortunately, the Resistance didn’t carry tasers with as high voltage as Captain Electra or BB-9E, but boy could Rose’s taser do some damage. Minati’s screams echoed off the walls as Rose held it to her neck for a good minute straight.

When she turned it off, Minati instantly hit the ground. She curled in a ball, whimpering in pain as Rose stood over her and seriously debated giving her another round.

Rey’s face filled Rose’s mind… or rather the image of five-year-old Rey that Rose had dug out of the archives after Aletha refused to let Kira’s Council have a picture of Rey. Rose actually didn’t know what Rey looked like. Sometimes she thought of her as that five-year-old, and other times Rose conjured different images of the faces of Felicity Rhiaon and Luke Skywalker – again using archive images – mashed together in the best approximation of Rey that Rose could manage.

This time she thought of Rey as that five-year-old… that helpless five-year-old who this woman at her feet had abused.

And it was for that five-year-old that Rose holstered her taser. She had to be better than the monster at her feet. She had to be a better person for Rey.

But that didn’t mean Rose would let Minati go without knowing she paid for her crimes.

Rose dropped down to her knees and bent her head in so close to Minati’s ear, flecks of spit from Rose’s intentionally perfect enunciation were hitting her.

“That… was for Rey Erso.”

Minati looked up at Rose in shock, fear, and above all, confusion.

“I know what you did to her,” Rose whispered. “And if you ever mention her to anyone, or if you even whisper her name to anyone in this room… I will do this over and over again until you beg me for death… Then I’ll tell Chewbacca what you did to Luke Skywalker’s daughter, and he’ll deliver that release of death… after getting to have his own punishments for you first. Am I understood?”

Minati quickly nodded.

“Then this stays between us?”

Minati nodded again.

“Good.” Rose got back to her feet like nothing at all had happened.

She found that everyone was gawking at her in shock.

“Whoa,” Marks simply said. It would be a lie to say he wasn’t kind of turned on.

“Yeah,” Han just stared at Rose unable to formulate words for a very long time. “Kid, if we had you in the Rebellion, we probably would have won the war a good two years earlier. Forget my kid and his serial killer emotional issues. Can I have like five of you?”

“Add me onto that list,” Qi’ra agreed. “If I had a girl like you helping me, this bombing wouldn’t have been such a failure.”
Not going to lie, Rose very much enjoyed the stroking of her ego.

“That’s more than I can say for you, Minati.” Qi’ra narrowed her eyes at the woman still lying in a ball on the floor, “Get up and get to the back of the line. You’ve been demoted.”

Shooting very nervous glances at Rose, Minati got to her feet and obeyed.

“Alright,” Qi’ra said, “we’ve lollygagged enough. Let’s get a move on. Han you’ll be on my left, Chewie to the back, the Stormtrooper will be in the front, and you…”

Rose blushed a little as Qi’ra’s eyes turned to her. There was something a little too pleased in Qi’ra’s eyes. It was the way Leia looked at Poe or Aletha looked at Evan, the desire to groom that person into their own personal mini me.

Maybe she shouldn’t have made a show of dominance in front of the leader of the most powerful Crime Syndicate in the Galaxy.

“You, Rose…” Qi’ra cooed. “you’ll go on the right. I want to keep my eye on you. You have spunk. Have you ever considered joining Crimson Dawn?”

“I think I’ll pass,” Rose said dryly, but still nervously.

“Well… let me know if you ever change your mind.”

Rose bit her lip and glanced at Marks. Wasn’t she was supposed to have just gone to Poe Dameron’s childhood home and fix his droid? Why was she in a position where Crimson Dawn was trying to recruit her?

She sighed. Rose doubted this was what Mama had meant all those times she told Rose to keep her career options open.

“And it’s called Rebalancing?” Kaydel sat with Sasa in their private little corner. They sat facing each other, clasping hands as Sasa finished explaining the Force power to regulate emotion.

“Yes, and it’s very effective.” Sasa looked around conspiratorially, then leaned in and smirked, “You should have seen the mess Kylo was before I started doing this with him.”

“I don’t even want to imagine.” Kaydel shifted nervously, “I don’t know about this. You saw me kill Doxl. How can you take my pain away from it?”

“Oh, we’re going to redirect our focus to something else. Pain that we don’t have in common. Just pick a different painful memory and we’ll use that.”

“…Uh, forgive me, but I don’t think I want to relive any painful memory.”

Sasa paused, “…Oh. Right. Good point.”

Kaydel shrugged.

“Okay, how about this,” Sasa suggested, “you can also rebalance positive emotions. If you think of a memory that makes you extremely happy while I do the same, we can siphon off that happiness and bring it into our current emotions instead of being sad.”
“You’re sad right now?”

“I was just stabbed, strangled, beaten, poisoned, almost blown up, had someone literally sew my skin together, I have a massive headache, and I’m on my period. Yeah, not having the greatest day.”

“It has to be something that makes you extremely happy. One of the happiness moments of your life. The turning point where you knew things had changed to give you the possibility of a happy ending. Do you have a memory like that?”

Kaydel smiled, “Yeah… I know one.”

The scene was from about two years ago. Kaydel sat on the steps built into the hill of the D’Qar base. It was dinnertime, so there wasn’t much activity outside.

She knew that Paige was waiting for her inside and also probably Aletha, but she couldn’t do it. Kaydel couldn’t endure another meal of people shouting lines from the recording of Poe’s declaration of love to her (or rather to BB-8 about her) across the cafeteria, and the room filling with laughter that amplified louder as it echoed off the wall. She wasn’t that hungry anyway.

Kaydel just wished her stomach would stop growling so loud.

“Careful,” a voice came from the bottom of the stairs. Poe Dameron was looking up at her, holding a pair of saran wrapped sandwiches, the kind always set out for pilots to grab and throw in their bags when assigned missions at the last moment. “If your stomach growls any louder, you’ll scare off the local wildlife.”

“Well, the General was trying to find us new safety measures,” she gave a small grin as he scaled the stairs and sat down next to her.

“Nah, we’ll find something else. Here, I brought you this,” he set one of the sandwiches in her lap. “Figured you’d want to avoid the dinner crowd like me.”

“I can’t wait for this whole speech thing to blow over.”

“Me too. I miss hot meals and Snap won’t bring them to our room anymore,” Poe unwrapped his sandwich and took a bite. “The big baby; I make him sleep on rocks and twigs and mud on our missions but spill a little soup on his bedsheet and game over.”

Kaydel could barely manage a nibble of her sandwich.

“Come on,” he leaned over and playfully bumped her. “I heard that stomach earlier. Eat. No one’s going to shout excerpts of an embarrassing moment to you here.”

She obliged, but Poe’s words didn’t exactly make things better, “Embarrassing?”

“Huh?”

“You said it was an embarrassing moment. Are you… ashamed about what happened?”

He let out a puff of air, “I’m embarrassed that it made you a public spectacle and ashamed that I didn’t have the nerve to say the words to your face… but I’m not ashamed of what I said. I take none of it back. You’re a wonderful woman, and I’d be one lucky son of a bitch to get you to go out with me.”

“Really?”

“Really really.”

Kaydel was silent, waiting for Poe to segue into officially asking her on a date.

Poe said nothing.

She sighed, “You know, it’s cold. I think I might head in.”

He glanced up at the starry sky, “I’ll stay out. It’s a nice night… Could use a better jacket though. I forgot my good one at home on Yavin IV, but I can bear it.”

They sat in silence looking up at the stars, the chirps and calls of wildlife faintly coming from the forest. They ate their sandwiches, staring at the sky, each waiting for the other to do something.

“Weren’t you going to go?” Poe finally asked, glancing at her as she finished the last bite of her sandwich.

Her eyes didn’t move from the stars, “You don’t want me here?”

“I quite enjoy just sitting with you in silence. It feels like some of the weight on my shoulders has been lifted. I don’t have to worry about any of my problems or responsibilities when I’m with you. I can just relax and be me. I love that feeling… but you said you were going to go inside, so don’t let me stop you from your plans.”

Kaydel sighed and set the ball of saran wrap left from her sandwich beside her. She dropped her head into her hands and let out another – this time much louder and frustrated – exhalation of breath.

“What?” Poe asked.

“What is even going on with us?” Kaydel asked. “You ever gonna ask me out, Poe?”

The question had a sobering effect on him.

“I’m just waiting for the right moment,” his voice betrayed no passionate emotion. Mild was not the way of Poe Dameron and it frustrated Kaydel Ko Connix to have him deal with her in such a manner.

“That’s good to know,” Kaydel sounded defeated. She rose to her feet, gathering the ball of saran wrap, squeezing it in her fist like the stress ball she so desperately needed. “Alright, I'll see you around.”

Completely ready to throw in the towel on Poe Dameron after the whole recording fiasco, Kaydel scaled down the stairs. Every step he didn’t follow after her increased Kaydel’s disappointment. She was a fool to think she ever had a shot with Poe Dameron.

“Kaydel, I'm waiting for the right moment cause when I ask you out, there’s not gonna be any turning back for me.”

The words stopped her dead in her tracks. She turned in around, confused but her heart lifting at his words. Poe didn’t get up from the stairs, and his eyes were downturned, but he continued to say words more wonderful and sincerer than that whole declaration of love for her he had given to BB-8.

Poe continued, his voice still mild but intensely honest, “I’m not gonna date anybody else for the rest of my life. I’m not gonna love anybody else for the rest of my life. I’m not gonna really care about anything else for the rest of my life.”

He took a pause; let his eyes flick up and meet hers. The same hope for love and knowledge that this could be the greatest thing they ever experienced in their lives flickered in her eyes the same way they flickered in his.

Poe took a deep breath, “I’m waiting for the right moment, Kaydel… cause when I ask you out, it’s gonna be the most important moment of my life.”

They were words that would terrify any other woman, but lonely Kaydel Ko Connix who had dreamed all her life of someone loving and caring for her so wholly, they were nothing but the sweetest music she had ever heard.

“And I just wanna make sure that I get it right,” he finished.

Silence hung on the air as Kaydel just stared at him in disbelief.

Poe awkwardly shrugged at her, probably wondering if he had made the wrong move. Kaydel would learn soon enough that with Poe Dameron there was never any half way. It was go back or go home.

“So that’s why,” Poe said, almost trying to brush the moment off.

Kaydel couldn’t think of anything else to say but, “Okay. Good to know.”

Then as if her legs had taken charge without the rest of her body’s permission, Kaydel turned back around and began marching away.

“Kaydel?” Poe called.

Her heart took control of those rebellious legs and forced her body to a halt. She turned back around once more to see Poe, who still had not moved from the stairs.

“You want to have dinner together tomorrow night?” he asked.

Kaydel blinked, confused a little after hearing that huge speech, “Wait... are you asking me out?”

Poe shrugged, “The moment felt right.”

Kaydel smiled at the memory. Poe’s prediction had been right; he had ended up dating only her, loving only her, caring really about only her… Okay, he cared about other people and things, but she was absolutely at the top of that list. Kes and BB-8 came close the rivaling her, but there was no doubt that Kaydel Ko Connix was the most important thing in Poe Dameron’s life.

“Good memory?” Sasa gently smiled. She had been watching Kaydel and even if Sasa didn’t have the Force, she still would have been able to see how calm the memory made Kaydel.

“Yeah,” Kaydel smiled back. “One of my favorite memories to revisit.”
Kaydel thought briefly of the first time she had revisited the memory. It had been when she retold the story to Kira the night she stumbled into Aletha on the comm and first was introduced to the girl. It had been that memory that prompted Kaydel into wanting to get Poe a gift, and ended with the purchase of Poe’s trademark brown jacket. Even after Poe had collected from home that blackish Runyip leather jacket his father gave him for his coming of age, Poe preferred that gift Kaydel had given him.

She knew that nothing would ever make him give up a possession such as precious to him.

“So, since I have a happy memory does that mean we can do the Rebalancing thing?” Kaydel asked.

“Yes, we can.” Sasa grinned as she started the Rebalancing process. Since she was the only Force Sensitive between the two First Order them, Sasa alone would have to initiate it. “But I will warn you, this does mean you’ll see one of my happiest memories. That means it involves Kylo.”

“Sasa, I’ve literally overheard the pair of you having sex. I’m desensitized to your love life at this point.”

“Oh good.” It was very telling that Sasa was not surprised to hear Kaydel had overheard her having sex with Kylo. “Then you won’t mind this memory.”

_Sasa and Kylo were tangled in the sheets together, bare and locked in an intimate embrace. Kylo with that peaceful moment he shared with Sasa looked so much calmer and more relaxed than Kaydel had ever seen… not that Kaydel had really ever seen Kylo before the trip to Nixrye, but that was beside the point._

“Damn it,” Kaydel grumbled. “I brought this on myself, didn’t I?”

“Yes. Yes, you did.”

Kaydel groaned, but paid attention. She was certain General Organa would interrogate Kaydel thoroughly over Sasa in the mission debrief, every crumb she could feed General Organa about her son’s Mistress was one less lecture about the poor decisions of this mission.

_Kylo smiled and brushed back a lock of her hair, “You know, I thought the Chosen were held in enough esteem that you would have your own rooms.”_

“Well, between you and me, Snoke’s ship is really poorly designed when it comes to having enough quarters. He’ll swear against it to his grave, but the last time Hux went on board, he had to room with Tara.”

“How is he even still alive?” Kylo was genuinely surprised.

“I think Hux is smart enough not to make a move on Tara.”

“Or any girl who’s mine,” he pulled her closer.

Sasa’s smile fell.

“What is it?” Kylo asked.

“I’m sorry, it’s foolish,” Sasa shook her head. “Just hearing you say that Tara’s yours… I know we’re not exclusive, but I’d be lying if I said that sometimes I didn’t try to pretend.”
“Sasa,” Kylo murmured. “You know what this is between us-”

“I don’t think either of us know what this is.” Sasa looked down, “But… I know what I want it to be.”

Kylo looked away.

“It’s not going to be anything until there’s a child in the picture,” Kylo sighed as he glanced towards the pregnancy test face down on the desk.

“And what happens when there is?”

“Then I think we become something… more.”

“And if Tara is the mother of that child?”

“…I have no idea.” Gently he eased her off his lap, “Come on. We’ve delayed it enough.”

He went to stand, but a hand on his thigh stopped him, “Wait, Kylo.”

Kylo turned and looked at her.

Sasa bit her lip, “Can I ask you something? Something you’ll answer honestly?”

“Of course.”

“Do you actually want a child?”

The silence in the room was so heavy.

“I…” Kylo finally said, “I don’t know.”

She didn’t say anything, sensing he needed to work it all out in his own head.

“But,” he said after a long while. He wouldn’t look her in the eye as he admitted the truth, “I know I am ready… to have a family again. I truly miss knowing there’s someone out there who cares about me, no strings attached. I can’t change who my family is… was but I do wish I didn’t… I don’t know. I wish I didn’t burn my bridges, but at the same time how can I act like I want the traitors who vilify the Supreme Leader and Vader?”

“I understand that longing,” Sasa said. “The First Order isn’t the easiest place to be. Everyone is about ten seconds away from literally stabbing you in the back. You wouldn’t believe how competitive things were in the Chosen. I only got along with Nera and Nova because they honestly weren’t that interested in being with you. I was honestly so surprised when Snoke chose me for you. It was simply because of the emotional regulation. If you had your shit together, I wouldn’t be here right now.”

He knelt down back on the bed, pregnancy test unchecked in one hand, her legs between his spread thighs.

“Then maybe being an emotional wreck isn’t such a bad thing,” he cupped her cheek.
Sasa laughed, “Kiss me, you fool.”

“Wow,” Kaydel said when the memory faded away. “You guys actually are trying to have a kid.”

“Yes, we are,” Sasa gave a sad smile. She glanced down at her bloodstained thighs, the reminder of her failure at once again bearing a child. “But how do you feel now? Rebalanced emotionally?”

“Yeah, actually, I do. Thank you.”

“It was no problem. I needed it a little bit too, but my suggestion is once you get home, make sure you talk to someone. That sort of thing doesn’t just go away with a good cuddle from your boyfriend.”

“I promise,” Kaydel nodded. She hesitated for a minute, “You know… you’re not that bad for a First Order soldier.”

“And you’re not that bad for a Resistance one. It’s a shame we probably will never see each other again after today.”

“I know… maybe if things were different, we could have been friends.”

“There’s the problem,” Sasa replied sadly. “I don’t think there’s any could. We just can’t pursue the relationship we truly have.”

“Well,” Kaydel sighed, “if you ever want to join the Resistance, I think I’d love to be your friend.”

“And you let me know if you ever want to join the First Order. I could set you up into a very comfortable role.”

“Uh, yeah, my aunt is part of the First Order, and she’s vowed to kill me. I don’t think I would be in any such position.”

“Honey, I wouldn’t let her near you.”

“My aunt is Alecta Anthea.”

Sasa blinked, “Yeah, on second thought, hell no am I sticking out my neck on that. Wow, Captain Anthea… I feel so bad for you.”

Kaydel realized that she and Sasa were still holding hands when Sasa squeezed Kaydel’s right one tightly.

“It really has been a pleasure meeting you,” Sasa said. “We may be enemies outside this hotel, but can we enjoy being sort of friends for now?”

Kaydel smiled. “Alright, but you don’t tell my boyfriend about this and I don’t tell yours.”

“Deal.”

“So…” Kaydel thought to the memory she had seen and what Sasa had previously said about the members of the First Order. “I gotta ask, is this Tara girl really as intimidating as you keep making her out to be?”
Sasa suddenly sat up straight, “Uh, this bombing? Tara put it all into motion just to kill me.”

“Are you sure? That seems pretty excessive,” Kaydel didn’t notice Sasa’s eyes locked at something over her shoulder.

“Oh, I’m positive.” Sasa pointed over Kaydel’s shoulder.

She turned around just in time to see three black clad, lightsaber wielding figures enter the lobby: two men and one woman, all of whom had attire not unlike Berd and Doxl’s.

“Kaydel Ko Connix?” Sasa said dryly, “Meet Tara Ren, Cern Ren, and Wiln Ren. None of them should be able to be here this quickly after your friends fixed the comms.”

“Ladies and Gentlemen,” Tara strode into the lobby and the sea of very confused people. “There is no need to panic, we are here to help.”

“I am so dead,” Sasa muttered pulling her legs to her chest.

Kaydel scooted a little so she was between Tara and Sasa.

“We are representatives from the First Order,” Wiln Ren declared. “We have come to provide assistance in the time of this terrible crime.”

There was a loud buzz from the confused, wounded resort patrons. None of it sounded very positive.

“Ladies and Gentlemen,” Tara said, “we come here in peace. This horrible crime of bombing has been set off by the thieves and murderers who call themselves Crimson Dawn. They have been a blight on society from their very inception, as well as all the gangs and syndicates that it has absorbed: from Pike to Hutt to Black Sun.”

Oh, her father would give Tara an earful about this speech when it got back to him. Then again, he wouldn’t give her more than a lecture considering he was terrified of her powers, but still the last thing she wanted was a scolding from her Daddy.

“My friends,” Tara continued, “the New Republic has abandoned you in this time. They send no aid, no law enforcement, no way to rescue its citizens. But we in the First Order are gracious; we have brought medical teams and supplies. We have come to rescue and help. The first teams should land in about half an hour, and the rest to follow an hour from now. And it is all our gift to you. Our apology for the shortcomings of the government who promised to keep you safe.”

A cheer went up in the crowd and the public favor very quickly was loud and proud with Tara Ren. Hands reached out to shakes hers, clasp hers, even to just touch their saviour as Tara made her way across the lobby with Cern and Wiln.

“So that’s why she did it so publicly,” Sasa murmured. “Not just to make me seem like an incidental death… but to make propaganda.”

Kaydel scowled, “In other words, re-enact the Bombing of Faclov but don’t let it slip they orchestrated it?”

“Exactly.”

“Damn, that's good.” Kaydel glanced back at Sasa, “Hey, should I be on guard? Might Tara attack you here and now?”
“No,” Sasa hissed as she felt another cramp. “Tara won’t attack me openly. Not in front of Wiln, and not when there’s an enormous amount of witnesses.”

“Who’s Wiln?”

“The male Knights of Ren that doesn’t look like he tortures tookas as a hobby.”

It was terrifying that Kaydel knew exactly which one she meant.

“Wiln is the caretaker of the Chosen. You mess with one of the girls, you answer to him. I’m under his protection,” Sasa explained. “Besides, Kylo will be here soon enough, and then I’ll really be protected. Ow! God, these cramps are so bad and at the worst possible time.”

“Sasa!” Tara called out.

Even knowing she was safe, Sasa immediately tensed up.

“Tara,” she struggled out as her fellow Knights of Ren reached her. Sasa looked at each one nervously. When her eyes met Wiln’s, they quickly directed him to the bodies of Doxl and Berd to give him a bit of a heads up. “What in the Galaxy are you doing here?”

“Why, rescuing you, you dear, sweet, little one,” Tara’s voice dripped with sickly sweetness it was overtly insulting.

“But how did you know?” Sasa shot, her tone still light. “You couldn’t have gotten here by now if you left after the bombing.”

“Well, I had just the most terrible vision of the bombing,” Tara lied, but everyone knew it. “We tried to get a hold of you, but the lines have been blocked all day.”

Funny, Kaydel remembered the lines working early enough in the day for Leia to contact Poe and yell at him about the recording Evan sent her.

“So I gathered the rest of the Knights of Ren and rushed to your side to save you,” Tara continued. “After all, we couldn’t possibly let a little helpless thing like you struggle to survive on your own.”

Snap – who had taken up a position close to Kaydel at the arrival of the First Order – snorted loudly, “Helpless? This girl? Not after that dress idea. The girl’s a damn genius!”

Tara very slowly lifted one eyebrow, “…Dress?”

“Oh, did I not tell you?” Sasa grinned sweetly at Tara. “I made this dress specially for this event. Two layers of Mandalorian warrior fabric and an under netting of bacta pockets to aid healing. It would be so hard to kill me while wearing this dress, as Doxl and Berd learned.”

Kaydel swore she saw Tara’s eye twitch.

“What an… ingenious idea,” Tara’s teeth were so firmly gritted the words were barely understandable.

“What did you mean as Doxl and Berd learned?” Wiln cut in.

“Oh, you don’t know?” Sasa glared at Tara, the words for her rival alone. “They took advantage of this bombing to attack me. They tried to poison, strangle, and stab me. Fortunately, I was able to fight them off with the assistance of the Resistance.”
“The Resistance?” Cern’s voice was terrifyingly cold… though that might have just been since Cern was terrifying in general. “You’ve allied yourself with the Resistance?”

“It was a deal Master Kylo brokered with their team leader,” Sasa objected. “Honestly, I’m just following orders. I’m lucky they did too, because this one here killed Doxl.”

“She killed a Knight of Ren?” Tara turned her gaze onto killed.

Wiln cut in, “Doxl forfeited that title the moment he attacked Sasa. It is clearly laid out in our rules of conduct: no Knight of Ren may harm another Knight of Ren.”

Cern snorted; by that logic, he and Tara apparently forfeited their titles a decade ago.

But Tara’s focus was only on Kaydel, “What’s your name?”

Kaydel knew she couldn’t give her real name unless she wanted to call the wrath of Alecta Anthea down on her.

“Jessika Pava,” Kaydel answered.

Jessika had given Kaydel carte blanche to use her name as a fake one. It was a little easier for Jessika to avoid the consequences of Kaydel’s actions since they were different ethnicities and the two couldn’t be confused for each other. Rose and Paige couldn’t use Jessika’s name for though they came from different planets, they were the same human ethnicity and a more racist person could mistake Jessika for one of the Otomokian sisters.

“Well, Miss Pava,” Tara’s eyes searched Kaydel’s face for something, but she couldn’t what. “I’m happy to hear you protected Sasa.”

“Oh, I’m sure you’re delighted,” Kaydel replied dryly. She glanced at Sasa, “It’s a pity that the truce will end when our groups have all reunited, but honestly, I just can’t wait for Poe to get here. What do you say, Sasa?”

“Yes, I can’t wait for Kylo to get here.” Sasa smirked at Tara, “He’ll be delighted to see you here, Tara.”

For a few seconds, Tara seriously debated the pros and cons of just strangling Sasa to death then and there.

Looking between all the women, Wiln decided to was time to intercede, “Well, if you ladies are all done catching up, I hold like to assess Sasa’s injuries. I need to give the medics a heads up on what treatments she needs.”

“Of course,” Tara bitterly conceded the field to Wiln.

She moved to take a step back from them, but Wiln grabbed her arm and pulled her in close.

“I just have one question,” he whispered to her. “Doxl is easy to manipulate, but Berd? He was a good Knight of Ren. Lasted a lot longer than many others. I can only think of one way you could have convinced him to do it.”

“And what’s that?” Tara smirked.

Wiln looked around to ensure no one was listening, “Were you sleeping with Berd?”

Tara laughed, “Oh, Wiln. You have such an imagination.”
“That’s not a no.”

“You and I know very well that female Knights of Ren and Chosen are forbidden from having sexual relations with any man but Kylo Ren. I uphold my vow to him very seriously.” Tara leaned in even closer, “After all… not all of us are like Nova.”

Defeated, he let go her, very much wanting to slap that stupid smirk right off her face. Wiln hated it when Tara managed to win a round. It was even worse when she dragged Nova into it.

As he knelt down and began assessing Sasa, Tara looked around and realized that Cern had disappeared. That never meant any good, so she went to find him.

“Are you alright?” Wiln asked in a low voice.

“I’m better,” Sasa replied. “I’ll need a medic droid to look me over, but honestly nothing too major.”

“You call being stabbed, strangled, and poisoned nothing major?”

“Tara’s been trying to kill me for two years. It’s nothing I’m not used to by now.”

“The woman needs to stop,” Wiln shook his head. “You know I had nothing to do with this, right, Sasa?”

“Trust me, I know very well that you want me around taking up a spot in the Knights of Ren. We both know who my old roommate was.”

It was only through a lot of training that Wiln didn’t allow the image of Nova appear in his mind. He couldn’t risk Tara or Cern not to pry and see it.

“So,” Kaydel frowned at Wiln, “you had nothing to do with this?”

“Tara was left in charge,” he replied. “She told me she had a vision and ordered me to leave with her on her ship, I obeyed. I didn’t know the planet we were heading to until we dropped out of lightspeed, and didn’t know about the bombing until we came low enough to see it firsthand. I would have stopped it and warned Kylo if I did know.”

“You would have warned Kylo?”

“Believe it or not, some Knights of Ren actually know the meaning of the word loyalty. I may not always agree with Kylo or are particularly happy that he destroyed my dejarik board with one of his temper tantrums, but he’s my commanding officer. I will follow his orders because I trust he’ll at least give me good ones.”

“What about the rest of the First Order?” Snap asked.

“Yeah… he’s a better team leader than Supreme Leader material.” Wiln glanced over his shoulder, “Tara’s coming back.”

Sasa sighed, “I just hope Kylo gets here soon.”

“I hope Evan gets here sooner,” Snap stroked what remained of his leg.

Kaydel watched Tara nervously. One wrong word, and Aunt Alecta would be on Nixrye capturing Kaydel and… she didn’t even want to think of what Alecta would do if she got her hands on Kaydel.
Carefully, Kaydel’s eyes drifted through the crowds with Tara. For a moment, Kaydel’s heart tensed when Tara stopped to watch Dacken who was speaking with Hena and her son. But Tara moved on when she saw someone else.

“Timor Connix,” Tara’s voice didn’t sound happy as she narrowed in on the man.

Even he could tell the trouble he was in, “Master Tara… so wonderful to see you. How are you do-”

“Cut it, Connix,” Tara snapped. “You oversaw this conference; you were in charge of organizing a strong security force and now three Knights of Ren were almost killed. How do you answer for that?”

“Master Tara, I assure you that before the conference I did everything in my power to keep my clients safe. I promise you that I-”

Tara held up her hand, “Before you go on, I would like to inform you that Captain Alecta Anthea – your sister-in-law – is the Captain who is leading the resources to Nixrье. She’ll be here in an hour and I promise you that she’ll be extremely interested in what went wrong here. So you should know that whatever you say right now, I will be reporting directly to Alecta.”

The hearts of Timor and Kaydel Ko Connix stopped. They had mirror images of horror on their face as they thought about facing Alecta and her wrath.

But what Timor did next was something Kaydel never would even have fall upon her enemies in her most selfish and evil dreams.

“Like I said, Master Tara,” Timor started again, “I promise you I did due diligence… but I was not ultimately in charge of this conference. My daughter, Katha was responsible for such measures as security. Alecta will have to take up the issue with her.”

Kaydel audibly gasped.

No. She didn’t just hear… May the Goddesses curse him, Timor had just thrown Katha, his own daughter to the non-existent mercy of Alecta. Sure, Kaydel knew firsthand that Timor had no problem with throwing out a daughter, disowning her, and allowing her to bring on her aunt’s wrath for her own choices and actions. But making his daughter a scapegoat?

Katha may have just handcuffed Kaydel to a wall and left her for dead, but Kaydel still felt rage on behalf of her sister. Maybe Kaydel was just a better person than Katha. She definitely was a better person than Timor.

However, Kaydel was not so good a person to speak up on Katha’s behalf.

“Very well,” Tara said. “When Captain Anthea arrives, I’ll see that Katha Sindal answers to her. Unless you wish to speak on behalf of your family?”

“I’ll pass. Alecta doesn’t hold me in very high regard.”

Tara arched an eyebrow, “I can’t imagine why.”

“So, you knew that this bombing was going to happen?” Kylo repeated as the group headed towards the lobby. Poe, Evan, and Kes had met up with the group about ten minutes previous and the group was finally headed in the correct direction. “…But you didn’t give anyone a heads up about it because you were all too drunk to come up with the idea?”

“What can I say?” Kes shrugged. “Your old man sure knows how to drink. Of course, I’ve drunk him under the table many a time, but he can really knock them back.”

Kylo refused to acknowledge how his mind kept trying to go back to the memory of his father after Uncle Luke’s bachelor party where Han had complained about Kes Dameron’s drinking prowess.

“For what it is worth, Ben, I do sincerely regret my actions and apologize for the harm that has befallen the people in this resort due to my neglect.” Kes caught his look. “I refuse to call you Kylo, so deal with it.”

“Just like how you’ll have to deal with the fact that Snap lost a leg because you got too drunk to call for backup?” Poe teased.

“Poe, I did not raise you to be so disrespectful to your elders.”

“I feel Vice Admiral Holdo would disagree.”

“Ugh,” Kylo scoffed. “She’s still around?”

“Oh yeah, and guess who her new favorite person to hate is?” Poe grinned.

“For once I genuinely pity you.”

“Would you two act serious for just a moment?” Karé glared at the pair. “My husband has lost a leg, and you two are making jokes.”

“Now Karé, it wasn’t actually at Snap’s expense,” Evan pointed out. He was walking backwards in front of Nines, fixing up an injury on the Stormtrooper as he had been doing to everyone ever since meeting up with the group.

“Oh, that’s right,” Kylo smirked, “you weren’t here when we learned of your friend’s injury. What was that lovely thing you asked, Poe?”

“Please don’t do this,” he begged.

“I remember!” Kylo’s face showcased he was up to no good. “He asked Wexley if he was, I quote, pulling his leg.”

Kes gaped at his son, “Are you kidding me?”

Poe chuckled nervously.

“We all heard Dameron say it,” Kylo said.

“Hey, don’t you use the name he got from me for that,” Kes objected. “Now, if you’ll excuse me, I’m going to desperately search the Bey family tree to find someone to pin that on.”

“Come on, Dad,” Poe teased, “that was pure Dameron.”

“You shut your haughty mouth.”

“Yes, Sir,” Poe rolled his eyes.
“Uh, if we could focus?” Evan cut in, finishing up with Nines. “May I – the trained medical officer – talk to the man who lost his leg?”

“Go for it,” Poe nodded. “You know his comm line number.”

It didn’t take long for Evan to get a hold of Snap. As they chattered back and forth, the group continued to make their way to the lobby. Kes had a hand on Karé’s back – she had been quite pale since learning of Snap’s lost limb – and he was working with Poe to find some way to bring her comfort. Poe admittedly was doing so mostly to redeem himself for the slip of the tongue.

Kylo spoke to Waroo in a much lower voice than anyone else as they discussed things of the past. Things that he didn’t dare mention in front of Snoke or Tara. Things he might not even discuss in front of Sasa.

Nines and Zeroes kept conversation to themselves, mostly about their strange temporary truce with the Resistance, Slip’s death, and generally trying to figure out just what the hell was all going on. Missing the knowledge of Kylo Ren’s family tree and past history with the Dameron family led to a pretty bizarre scene unfolding before them.

As for FN-2187 – or rather Finn he supposed he should now think of himself as – he stayed closer to Poe than Kylo. Secretly Finn wondered if he should actually take on the name. Kylo Ren likely wouldn’t be pleased if he used a name the enemy of the First Order gave him. Besides, Kylo did have plans to one day call FN-2187 “Fyrn” should he ever join the ranks of a Knight of Ren. Of course, that was still a far day off and he liked having his own name. He always yearned to be more than just a faceless number. Maybe taking on the name Finn would balm that desire.

Of course, he would only use the name if Sasa liked it. Oh, how he hoped Sasa was alright. His heart ached for her, praying that she wasn’t hurt. Then again, he always ached for her, so that was nothing new.

Man, what would it be like to be in love with a girl who actually loved him back and not some temperamental Darth Vader wannabe with – as FN-2187 learned that very day – a lot of unresolved Daddy issues?

It was strange to FN-2187. He had no idea who his father was and yet he didn’t have issues about it. Sure, sometimes he wondered who his parents were, where they were, if they were alive, and if they even wanted him. But that didn’t mean he destroyed control panels with a lightsaber anytime Hux pissed him off.

As the group walked towards the lobby, things were quiet, and relatively well…until Evan asked Snap how they stopped his bleeding.

“YOU USED A WHAT?”

“Holy hell,” FN-2187 was wide eyed.

Kes gave a low whistle, “I thought Kaydel’s aunt gave questionable medical advice.”

“Yeah, don’t give my girl a medical license.” Poe glanced at Kylo, “Or apparently yours.”

“Sasa’s not my… Shut up, Dameron.”

“A fucking lightsaber?” Karé growled, glaring down the First Order soldiers.

Despite his objections, Kylo gave a pleased smirk and thought to himself, “That’s my girl.”
Thought to himself because if Tara found out – and Tara would find out – that he audibly called Sasa “his girl” that he would wake up one morning to find Sasa’s head on a spike left in his bed. Tara probably wouldn’t even give a damn about hiding that she was behind it.

And considering Kylo’s meeting with Snoke about Sasa seven weeks ago, he wasn’t sure if Snoke would care either.

No. He promised himself he wouldn’t think about that on this trip. No matter how bizarre it had gotten, Sasa couldn’t know about that, and if he thought about it, she would find out.

But Evan Tharel did not give a damn about the relationship politics of First Order High Command. He was too focused on the fact Snap Wexley had just had his leg intentionally cauterized by a lightsaber.

“What could possibly possess a person to…” Evan was beyond an easily described emotion. “What is wrong with you people?”

“Look,” Kaydel had taken the comm to defend herself, “none of us have had much medical training, and we thought cauterizing was our best bet considering the circumstances. We know cauterization is not ideal or recommended, but we had no other choices. We’ve literally run out of bandaging material to the point I have been walking around shirtless for over an hour.”

“Wait, what?” Poe chirped up.

“Don’t even right now, Dameron,” Evan warned.

“Look, Evan, we’re sorry but we had limited options, and since there was no one to consult—”

“FOR ALL FUTURE INCIDENTS, I, A MEDICAL OFFICER, AM TELLING YOU THAT CAUTERIZING WOUNDS WITH A LIGHTSABER IS A HARD NO!”

Three hours later, Doctor Kalonia would be very confused by a memo ordering her to give all departments a re-education seminar on battlefield and emergency situation medical treatment. Especially puzzling was the footnote signed by Eval Tharel – using his Geno Namit signature no less – that said, “Remind all officers in no situation are lightsabers appropriate medical tools.”

Of course, being the former doctor to the New Jedi Order, Kalonia just shrugged, “I’ve seen weirder.”

“Hold still, Paige, it’ll be over in a minute.”

Paige tried her best to hold back screams, but she couldn’t stop herself from crying out as Shayna dabbed a cloth of rubbing alcohol around the shrapnel in Paige’s head.

“I’m so sorry,” Shayna set the cloth down on the bunk, next to Paige’s head. “I know it hurts.”

“It’s alright. I know it’s not your fault. Thank you for helping treat me. You’re pretty good with dealing with shrapnel.”
“It’s because I used to help Genie study when he was in med school.”

“Really?”

“Yep, he would sit at the dining table doing his job of colorizing Holos from blue to their scene’s original colours, and I would read to him and quiz him.”

“Evan colorized Holos?” Paige asked.

“One of his jobs. Actually pretty good at it. He can eyeball any Holo and tell you off hand what their original colours were,” Shayna said proudly.

“I didn’t know he had a job in med school.”

“He had three. Had classes in the morning, worked as a janitor at night, flipped nerf burgers on the weekend, tinkered with Holos the rest of the time, and snuck in an occasional meal if I held him down and force fed him. I genuinely think there was a two-year stint where Geno didn’t sleep.”

“I would not be surprised,” Paige said mildly. Her eyes drifted across the ship to where two figures were standing at the docking entrance, “They’re still talking.”

Shayna turned and saw Rose and Marks enthusiastically chatting as they had been ever since they returned to the ship after Qi’ra let them free when they reached hers. Han and Chewbacca had been forced to stay with Qi’ra to load the stolen weapons, but Marks and Rose had been let free. Marks had insisted on being a gentleman and walking making sure Rose got back to her ship safely.

“Indeed, they are,” Shayna said. She looked back to Paige, “You want me to stop them?”

“No. Let them be… this could be entertaining.”

But Paige pushed her luck, for at that moment Marks’ comm beeped and he finally received his awaiting orders.

“The First Order has finally arrived, and I have to go report to Captain Electra,” he told Rose. “I’m afraid I have to leave now.”

“Right,” Rose nodded. “You have to go.”

They stared at each other but neither moved.

“I, uh,” Marks cleared his throat. “It was nice meeting you.”

“It was nice meeting you, Marks.”

He smiled at her, “Take care of yourself, Rose. Don’t let me catch you getting into trouble again.”

“Trust me, you couldn’t catch me if you wanted to.”

“Oh, I’d find you… but I wouldn’t catch you,” he winked at her. “I’ll see you around.”

“No, you won’t!” she yelled after him as he started down the ramp.

He called back, “We both know that’s a lie!”

Rose continued to stare after him with a dopey, refused to admit that it was lovelorn grin, way past after he was long gone.
And then she realized Paige and Shayna were watching her.

“What?” Rose crossed her arms defensively.

“What was that?” Paige’s face was filled with amusement… mixed with pain because she still had a freaking piece of metal stuck in her skull.

“What was what?” Rose shot back. “That was nothing!”

“Oh, it was something,” Paige grinned. She patted the empty part of the bunk at her feet for Rose to sit, “And you are going to spill everything.”

“That should be the last of it,” Han said.

Chewie heaved the final box up into the overhead compartments that lined the walls of the hallway in Qi’ra’s ship.

She may live in an elegant Kalevalan star yacht – Han knew how important it was for Qi’ra as the head of Crimson Dawn to maintain the First Light in its towering glory as her home base – but Qi’ra still owned a fleet of luxury ships for her personal use. Due to the extravagance of the resort, Qi’ra had arrived with her own small team of personal soldiers (the others had snuck in ahead of time to set up the bombs) in her favorite ship, a CR90 corvette, sometimes known as a Corellian corvette.

This model of ship had been the one Han pictured he and Qi’ra escaping on when they were young and dreaming of freedom. Ironically the woman who did show him freedom was thrown into his life by the capture of her ship, the Tantive IV, a CR90 corvette.

“There,” Han pulled shut the compartments. “All loaded. You go back to the transport and I’ll finish up with Qi’ra.”

Roar rah ree raor.

“I’ll be fine.”

Grww rah roar graw.

“Oh no, don’t you bring Leia into this. She’s going to be mad enough, we don’t need her getting involved while Qi’ra is still in proximity.”

Grah?

“I won’t. Trust me, the flame I held for Qi’ra was well snuffed out years ago. Heck, you were there!”

Rah roar rah.

“Yeah, yeah. Just getting moving. This won’t take long.”

He watched Chewie exit the ship and sighed. The sound of laughter drifted in from the lounge area. He took a deep breath and readied himself.

“Alright, let’s do this.”
Han gave no courtesies as he entered the lounge. It was filled with uniformed Crimson Dawn soldiers reclining on plush furniture, everyone with at least one drink in their hands. He didn’t care that Minati was in the middle of telling a story. In fact, Han was glad to interrupt when she gave a shrill laugh like the noise of a dog whose tail has just been stepped on.

“Everything’s loaded, Qi’ra,” he caught her in the middle of taking a drink.

“Mmm,” she quickly swallowed and set the drink on a table beside her personal couch, which she was reclining across like a Queen. “Good.”

“Well,” Han wiped his palms on his work pants, suddenly very aware of how dirty they were. “I’m going to go.”

“No, stay. Have a drink. Minati was just telling the story of how she fought a Jedi, a Doctor, and a Vrogem in the desert of Jakku.”

“Yeah, I don’t think that story will mean a damn thing to me,” he said bitterly. “So, I’m going to go.”

Qi’ra sighed and looked around the room, “Would you all excuse us for a moment?”

There was a slight grumbling, but everyone set down their drinks and made their way out of the lounge.

“Sit,” Qi’ra gestured to the couch across from her. “Please.”

Han sighed and gave in.

“What do you want from me, Qi’ra?” he picked up someone’s abandoned drink and took a swallow.

“I wanted to thank you… and apologize.”

“For turning your weapons on me? It’s what I expected.”

“I meant about Ben. I’m sorry. I genuinely didn’t know he would be here.”

“Just stop, Qi’ra,” he put down the glass much harder than intended. “God, what you did here was despicable. Killing and maiming thousands because you want to take out one person. That’s Bombing of Faclov level of heartlessness.”

“What can I say? I owed someone a favor,” Qi’ra demurely sipped her drink.

It wasn’t true, she didn’t owe Tara any favors. But Tara was her daughter, and she would do anything for her daughter. Tara was the greatest thing Qi’ra had ever done in her life; worth more than money, power, or the cost of any person’s life. Qi’ra didn’t like what Tara had asked of her, but whatever Tara wanted, Qi’ra gave it to her.

Because if she didn’t, then Tara would go to Laertes and this situation would end so much worse.

“Besides,” Qi’ra set the glass down, “it’s not like these people were innocent.”

“How could you possibly claim that?”

“Come on, Han. These are the same kinds of people who profited during the Empire and turned Corellia into the pathetic wasteland it become. They are only rich because they step on the backs of Han just shook his head, “It’s truly amazing… How can you honestly sit there and pretend that you did not become the very thing that oppressed us as children? A more fashionable Lady Proxima. What, you think because you don’t let the women of Crimson Dawn be whored out for profit and advantage anymore that it somehow makes you righteous?”

Qi’ra dropped her eyes from his. Han didn’t even have the slightest notion that her daughter was doing that exact thing to his son. Not that Qi’ra necessarily approved of it, but at least it was Tara making the choice. Technically since Tara was not a Chosen, nor had Snoke ever given a directive to Kylo to sleep with her specifically, so if Tara wanted to end things with Ben, she could.

Instead she chose to end her competition.

Like mother, like daughter.

Qi’ra fought to find her objection, “Han, you don’t play the same game as I do. The object isn’t to win. It’s—”

“To stay in it as long as you can,” he finished. “Yeah, I remember. I also remember Beckett telling me the only way to survive in the game was to trust no one. Assume everyone will betray you and you’ll never be disappointed. You and he solidified that in my mind. Took eight years before someone undid that mess.”

“Your precious princess?” Qi’ra’s voice dripped with acid.

Han narrowed his eyes, “Don’t be like that. Don’t you dare! You chose to leave me. I held on for three years, even a little bit longer after you abandoned me. You gave up on us.”

“You don’t understand—”

“You’re right, I don’t understand! I don’t understand how you had the chance to have freedom – we could have gone, we could have disappeared, started a new life together – and you chose to become the master to slaves.”

“Because that’s all there is in this world, Han: masters and slaves.”

“You’re wrong. There’s more to life than that.”

“No, there isn’t.”

“You could be more than a crime boss, Qi’ra. It’s not too late.”

“Too late?” she shot. “I have everything I had ever dreamed of in the slums of Corellia. Wealth, power, a soft bed with clean sheets, beautiful clothing, the ability to do whatever I want, a child—”

“And a loving husband?” Han shot right back.

Her face narrowed, “I didn’t dream of love like you did.”

“Certainly fooled eighteen-year-old Scrumrat Han on that. You know what I dreamed of? My own ship, the freedom to fly wherever I wanted, and a loving woman at my side. Guess I was a fool to think that woman would be you.”

“Well, I’m glad things turned out for you but love… I learned long ago that it was nothing but weakness. Not in others – no, that was a good tool to use against them – but in myself it was. So now I don’t let it happen. The only thing anyone can turn against me is my child… and I’ll be damned if I let someone do that.”

“Trust me, it’s not a fun place to be,” Han leaned back, heaving a sigh. “You know… sometimes I miss the Qi’ra I knew on Corellia.”

“And I miss the Han I used to know… but we’re not those people anymore and you know it.”

Han scowled, eyes darting down as he remembered when Qi’ra had made it clear. It was en route to Kessel, and Han had been walking to the cockpit after Beckett confronted him about Qi’ra. He stopped when he heard Qi’ra and L3 talking.

“What are you going to do about your little problem?” the droid asked.

“What problem?” Qi’ra said in surprise.

Now the droid indicated out the door and down the hall from the cockpit, and rotated her head to look at Qi’ra. She pointed at Qi’ra’s wrist where she had a brand of the Crimson Dawn.

“That brand says you’re committed, but that human male’s heart palpitations indicate that he is in love with you,” she said, her voice taking on a tone that implied Qi’ra was an idiot.

Qi’ra laughed nervously, “Han is not in love with me.”

Han’s heart fell at the proclamation. Why was she trying to deny it? She loved him, and he loved her. He had fought for three years to rescue her, and now she was embarrassed about him?

The droid and Qi’ra went on with their conversation. Han didn’t interrupt, frankly not knowing what to say about the implication Lando Calrissian might possibly have had sex with his droid. (Han knew well enough to never mention the conversation to Alyla Kene years later.) But then the pair transitioned into a new conversation about Qi’ra’s life after Han left her behind.

“How long until Dryden made you kill someone in front of him?” L3 asked.

Han swore he felt his heart drop. Sure, Qi’ra had done some terrible things on Corellia, but this… it seemed to cross a line.

Qi’ra looked up sharply, “How did you know-”

L3 swiveled her head around again. “Dryden’s right hand, Dryden’s killer slave girl, doesn’t matter what they call you; you’ll do whatever it takes. You’re a survivor. Dryden Vos’s cruelty is no secret; if you were high in his inner circle, he made you kill for him.”

Qi’ra looked the droid directly in the ocular sensor, “When I beat Dryden in the training room, he was so proud of me, he brought me a prisoner to kill. I snapped his neck before he had time to plead for his life.”

Han couldn’t listen to anymore. He pushed himself against the hall and slammed his eyes shut. He tried to block off his other senses, not wanting to hear another word.

Lady Proxima had made good on her threat to throw Qi’ra to the crime syndicate, that she had been sold like stolen goods. He tried to swallow back the guilt that threatened to overwhelm him. This is my fault, he thought.
It took a few minutes for him to calm himself, but he did. He took a deep breath and opened his eyes. There still had to be hope in her, good in her.

How could he give up on someone he loved?

Her heard the footsteps and Qi’ra appeared from the cockpit. Han stepped into her path and didn’t even try to pretend he hadn’t eavesdropped.

“What happened to you after Corellia?” he asked, his voice low and insistent.

She knew she couldn’t flirt her way out of this one. She leaned against the wall and looked at him with a steady gaze. “I won’t tell you all of it. It’s over and done with, and no amount of what if and if only will change that. I had to do what I could to survive. Lady Proxima sold me to a slave dealer – I barely remember his name – who in turn sold me to the Crimson Dawn.”

Han later learned that she remembered the slaver’s name very well. After purchasing her, Dryden Vos had been very amused to allow her to track down Sarkin Enneb and kill him. But that was something she didn’t want Han to know, not that it had stopped him from eventually hearing about it from Lando of all people.

At the time, all he focused on was Dryden Vos.

“Did he– hurt you?” Han looked like the words were hard to get past his lips.

She frowned, “Of course he hurt me, Han. I was – am – a slave, and I did everything I could to get away. But slowly a respect started to grow between us and he saw where I could be useful. So now I’m his lieutenant and help him with strategy, reading a room, and calming him down during negotiations. If you hadn’t noticed, he has a tendency to let his temper get the better of him.”

Han blew out his breath, “No kidding. What’s with him, anyway? What’s that red stuff under his skin?”

“Ah, I call that the Passenger, although I am pretty sure that Dryden is not quite human. He doesn’t reveal that kind of thing to me, and I can tell you he doesn’t take kindly to people who ask. He’s quick to anger, and quick to calm, and I try to make sure that in the interim he doesn’t ruin too many deals or kill too many people.”

“And you’re the only one who can calm him down,” Han said, jealousy coloring his voice.

Qi’ra had had enough of men telling her who she could talk to or be with. “Did you expect me to wait for you forever, Han? I didn’t even have a chance to wait before I was just trying to survive being passed from owner to owner. I do what I can to benefit myself, and right now the greatest benefit to myself is serving Crimson Dawn and working with Dryden Vos. I’m not a droid you left behind, turned off, with nothing happening to it until you came back to turn me back on.”

“I heard that,” L3 warned from the cockpit.

“Sorry,” Qi’ra snapped over her shoulder. She refocused on Han and forced her voice to be calmer. “I wish we could go back to those early days, Han, but too much has happened to both of us. We’re not the same people we were.”
Proxima’s Scrumrats would have recognized.

“I’m sorry, Han,” Qi’ra was truthful. “But I think we both know this was never meant to be.”

“Yeah… I figured it out a while ago. But sometimes I wonder…”

“What?”

“Sometimes I wonder if I was always nothing more than a tool to you. Did you ever really love me, Qi’ra?”

It took her a long time to answer.

“…Not as much as you wanted me to,” she said quietly. “What about you? Did you love me?”

“More than anything in the Galaxy… And then Leia came along.”

“You love her more than you loved me.”

“Yeah.”

“Good… She deserves it.”

Han couldn’t manage much of a smile, “What about Mr. Crimson Dawn?”

“Technically Laertes is Mr. Black Sun… but Crimson Dawn did overtake his syndicate.”

“And you married him to seal the deal.”

“He treats me better than Vos did, if that’s your fear. It’s just you he hates.”

Han leaned back against the bench, “Nah, I know he’s no Vos… but I do wonder if you love him.”

Qi’ra shrugged, “He makes me smile.”

“That’s not what I asked.”

“I know.”

They sat in a not not uncomfortable silence for a while.

“I should get going,” Han finally stood. He knocked back the rest of the drink he had stolen, “Chewie will be waiting, and I’m almost certain some shit’s going to go down between Ben and Poe.”

“Better take care of that then,” Qi’ra said a touch of humour to her voice. “I’ll see you around, Han.”

“God, I hope not.”

Han gave Qi’ra a nod, stole another drink, and started out the room.

“Han?”

He stopped at the doorway.

“Yeah?” Han turned to face her.
There was a small, genuine smile on Qi’ra’s face, “Tell Leia… That I hope she’s well.”

“Alright,” he gave another stiff nod, his face still unsmiling but softening a little. “And you tell Laertes…”

Qi’ra waited for him to continue.

He did not.

“…Yes?” she prompted.

“Tell him that if he ever shows his face near my wife or kid again, I’ll shoot him in the knee,” Han said simply.

And without another word, he turned on his heal and walked away from Qi’ra once again.

He refused to admit that the thought of her still made him smile too.

“There we go,” Dacken said, the little boy finally asleep in his arms. “Out like a light.”

Hena smiled at him gently, her eyes tired but gracious, “I can’t believe you got him down in such a stressful scene as this.”

“I have a lot of cousins, nieces, nephews, and assorted younger family member,” he gently passed her son back into his arms. “You learn a thing or two about getting a kid down for sleep. Worse comes to worse, slip him a little cough syrup and don’t tell his mom.”

Hena frowned.

“Right,” Dacken scratched the back of his neck. “You’re his mom.”

“Remind me never to ask you to babysit.”

“Yes, Ma’am.”

Hena chuckled a little, then looked down at her son. He looked so carefree as his slept, not having to think of the life before him having no legs.

“At least he’s alive,” Dacken said, understanding her thoughts from the look she gave her son.

“Yes, I suppose.” She gently kissed her son’s forehead and began to stroke his hair. “I just don’t know how I handle this. I’ve been through hard things in my life, but I never imagined-”

“The Goddesses like to look at our plans for life and laugh. The more determined you are to live one way, the more likely they’ll do everything in their powers to stop you.”

“They don’t sound like very nice Goddesses.”

“They’re Goddesses. Why should they be nice to those mortals they govern?”

“It’s that mindset that keeps the stars at war.”

“I suppose.” Dacken smiled down at Hena’s son, “He’s a brave little boy. What’s his name?”
“Derryn, but I call him Ryn,” Hena answered. She glanced at Dacken’s arms and hesitated, “How long have you been sober?”

He blinked, “What?”

“You’ve got track marks on your arms, but your pupils are the right size, you don’t shake, your head is clear. It’s been a while since you’ve had spice. I’m sorry if I’m out of line-”

“No, it’s okay. Uh, it’s been about a year.”

She smiled, “Four for me.”

Dacken blinked, “Really? You?”

“For a very long time. My husband and I. Once I got pregnant I went clean, but Pash… he could never give it up. Tried but… failed. I tried to support him, but one day I had enough and put my foot down. We separated, and he promised he would come home once he went straight and stayed that way. A few months later he took too much, had a heart attack and dropped dead in an alley in Coruscant.”

“I’m so sorry,” Dacken was genuine. “It takes a very strong person to overcome that sort of addiction, but I admire you for it. There are some days I struggle not to give in to temptation.”

“Trust me, I understand. I would kill for just one more buzz…” Hena sighed, looking at her son, “but then I look down at Ryn and remember there’s more important things in life.”

“At least you have something to keep you in line. My Dad tries to do the same for me but he’s so busy with the family company that he’s barely around. The only reason I think I haven’t relapsed is that my grandparents have held over my head how much I owe them for saving me.”

“Saving you?”

“My brother got arrested for smuggling a very large amount of spice into Mallarex. He’s in jail for a while longer. He got me into spice to begin with, but once we started getting really addicted, we abandoned our family. Once word got back to my family what happened to Deek, my grandparents paid an exorbitant amount of money to find me – which they did – and they put me immediately into a very expensive rehab. After that I was forced to live with my grandparents and work at their company. They make no secret of the fact that they basically own me at this point.”

Hena frowned and glanced over at Timor – who was pleading with Tara to get Alecta to show mercy once she arrived.

“Do they… do they typically hold that sort of thing over people’s heads?” Hena asked nervously.

“Yep,” Dacken answered simply. “Once you’re in debt to a Connix, you never can escape.”

She swallowed hard, “But… but he offered to pay for Ryn’s medical costs.”

“Then I guess it’s a good thing we’re getting to know each other, because once you make that official… you’re not going anywhere.”

The thought terrified Hena, “No, I… I can’t do that. I can’t live like that. What if I just let the medical aide being offered to everyone in this incident be the way I get Ryn treatment?”

“Then you’re indebted to the First Order, and trust me, that’s worse than being indebted to a Connix.”

Hena’s breathing became so fast, her face white with panic, that it seemed she was on the edge of hyperventilating, “No, no, no. I can’t. Please, there’s got to be some other option. There’s got to be a way to save Ryn other than your family or the First Order. Please, isn’t there something?”

Dacken’s eyes drifted over Hena’s shoulder, “Maybe there is.”

Kaydel Ko Connix stared at her hand. No matter how many times she blinked, Doxl Ren’s blood wouldn’t disappear from it.

She could hear that death rasp play over and over again in her mind. In one small move she had ended the life of a man. It was easy to pull a trigger and let the killing happen far off, but to slit a man’s throat… Kaydel felt like she was going to throw up.

“First murder?”

She looked up to see Wiln Ren standing next to her.

Kaydel dumbly nodded and gestured for him to sit beside her.

“I remember mine,” he settled on the floor. “I was fifteen. One of the Blessed – our Force Sensitive cadets – tried to start a rebellion against the Knights of Ren and claim the group for herself. She went for a killing blow at Kylo, and I ran her through. Had nightmares for months, but it earned me a spot in the Knights of Ren. Third one to join after Tara and Cern.”

Kaydel said nothing.

Wiln sighed, “You did a good job of it. Clean. Efficient.”

“That’s not comforting,” she murmured, tucking her knees to her chest. She was starting to get very tired of not wearing a shirt. She didn’t like feeling so exposed.

She also really wanted to wash her hands.

“Well,” he patted her knee. “It gets easier with every kill.”

“I don’t want it to get easier,” she seethed.

He just smiled at her, “And yet, it will.”

Kaydel opened her mouth, absolutely ready to rip into him when something cut her off.

“I swear to God, Solo, I will slam your head into the wall again!”

The sound of Poe’s voice made everyone’s heads shoot up. Relief poured over Kaydel when he came strolling into the room a minute later. He was burnt, bloody, tired, and surrounded by First Order soldiers, but by the Goddesses, he was alive.

“God?” Kes Dameron came strolling in after his son. “I didn’t raise you to believe in any Gods. Did that sweet little Connix girl convert you to the Mallarexian ones?”

“Actually Mallarex only has Goddesses,” Kaydel called out. “Maybe he picked up something from Poe’s head snapped to her, “Kay!”

His eyes were wide and he looked wired with adrenaline, but the amount of relief that fell over him was astounding.

The world narrowed in on Poe. Kaydel saw nothing but him, and she was on her feet, running to him in an instant.

It was something liked out of a cheesy HoloVid for Kaydel; the world slowing down as the pair of lovers raced into each other’s arms. She didn’t care how cheesy it was, her mind needed that moment to slow down, process all that had happened and comprehend that Poe Dameron was really there alive in front of her. He was racing to hold her, to love her, to take her into those warm strong arms and protect her from whatever else this crazy day – or indeed life of theirs – threw at them.

When the collision happened and his arms were around her body, Kaydel collapsed in his embrace. Poe caught her, lifting her slightly as she clutched him and sobbed tears of both joy and sorrow. He held her tight, relishing in the softness of skin he had long ago memorised. Her touch wasn’t exactly as he recalled, some new cuts and bruises, but she was alive and safe in his arms, and he dared the world to take her from him.

“You’re safe,” she sobbed, her arms still locked around his neck as he placed her back down on the ground. “You’re safe. You’re alive.”

“Course I’m alive,” he murmured into her neck. Poe pressed a kiss in the short hairs of said neck, then slowly pulled back. He stroked her cheek, dispelling the tear leaving a wet streak down her face. Poe smiled at her, “Did you really doubt me, Babe?”

A laugh betrayed her, “Maybe a little. I was just so scared you weren’t coming home.”

“Never going to happen, My Love. 108. That’s my promise to you.”

Overcome with emotion, Kaydel grabbed him and pulled Poe down for a truly passionate kiss. One that Poe was happy to deliver and did not give one damn about the fact they had an audience, nor that said audience included both of their fathers.

Not that that audience was very large for a long time. Karé immediately went for her husband, rushing to his side, dropping to her knees and throwing her arms around his neck. Snap clutched his wife like his life would end if he let go of her. Any worry of Karé leaving him for losing his leg was quickly dismissed with a:

“Snap Wexley, we have not been married long enough for you to make me a widow,” Karé scolded when she had pulled back. She glanced down at Evan, who was already at Snap’s legs, taking care of them the best he could. “And if you make one more comment about me leaving you because you lost a leg, I swear I will divorce you.”

Snap paused.

“Okay, I’m… I’m shutting up about it,” Snap sighed.

“Damn right you are,” Karé said. She pulled Snap in for another hug, “How’s he doing, Tharel?”

“I swear of all the stupid medical things I’ve seen on a battlefield,” Evan grumbled, shaking his head. “You understand that Aletha Kymeri is my mentor, and this is still in the top ten stupidest and weirdest medical treatments I have ever seen? The woman once fixed a broken arm by dislocating it and spreading animal dung on the joints."

Karé frowned, “How is she our second highest ranking doctor?”

“Most of the medical staff are droids.”

“Ah.”

Poe’s threat to Kylo as they entered the room had also caught the attention of Sasa Ren. She was lying on the ground, resting a little, but her eyes never moving from Tara. Sasa knew that Kylo was on his way and that both Kaydel and Wiln were nearby, but she still didn’t trust Tara not to try anything.

Then Poe Dameron yelled, Sasa’s head went up, and Kylo walked into the lobby.

Their eyes locked in a heartbeat, and she felt that familiar Forest Green reach for her Cerise. Setting sight on her, Kylo’s shoulders dropped a little with the exhalation of a breath. Sasa smiled; he was relieved at the sight of her.

Had they lived in another world, Sasa would have shot to her feet and they would have raced into each other’s arms the way Poe and Kaydel did. They would share a passionate kiss in front of their audience, but Sasa knew what world she lived in.

So she simply smiled at him and bowed her head.

Kylo bowed his head back.

“Sasa!”

When Kylo turned his head back to look at the newly arrived FN-2187, Kylo could see FN-2187 recognized his mistake. He quickly muttered an apology, bowed his head, and took a step back.

Kylo may not have exclusively been Sasa’s, but Sasa was exclusively Kylo’s. It was a death wish for FN-2187 to express such joy at seeing her.

Kylo knew FN-2187 was in love with Sasa, that didn’t mean he had to support such feelings. Sasa was his, and no one would take her from him.

“Kylo!” Tara called out.

Speak of the devil.

Kylo had to fight every urge in his body not to grab Tara by the throat as she came up to him. He had sensed the presences of the other Knights of Ren before, that didn’t mean he was prepared to actually see Tara, Wiln, and Cern before him in the aftermath of Tara (and Berd and Doxl and most likely Cern’s) plot to murder Sasa.

And he definitely wasn’t prepared to deal with the fact that Tara thought it would be wise to greet Kylo by throwing her arms around him and hugging him tightly in a grand show of relief.

“Oh, Master,” Tara cooed, very aware of the death glare Sasa had on her. The little bitch wanted to be the one in his arms… which was exactly why Tara made sure she was first. “I was so worried about you. Thank the Force you’re alive and well and safe.”
“Tara,” he stiffly pushed her away, “what are you doing here?”

She wasn’t phased, “Why, Master, I had a horrible vision of this bombing and I just couldn’t stay back and let it happen. So I ordered Cern and Wiln to come with me here and ensure the safety of our fellow Knights of Ren.”

“Safety?” Kylo raised an eyebrow. He nodded to the wounded Sasa, the unconscious Berd, and the dead Doxl, “You call that safety?”

Tara took a minute to observe the scene, “I didn’t say we did a good job.”

When she turned back to look at him, he was glowering at her.

"You know you show me a lot of respect," she scoffed. "I come here to help and save you, and you look at me with disgust."

He wasn't buying it for a moment, "You couldn't have gotten here by now if you had your vision after the bombing. You knew of it ahead of time."

“Yes, I did,” Tara honestly told the truth. They both knew it was said truth, and also that she would never outright say she knew it because she plotted it and that that she had a vision of it.

“Then why didn’t you communicate with me, warning us of the attack?”

“I attempted to, but the signal was bloc-“

She yelped as Kylo suddenly grabbed her by the throat.

“Give me one more lie,” Kylo growled, squeezing gently enough to cut her breath short, but not to full on kill her. “Trick me, deceive me, show me disloyalty. Give me a reason to crush your windpipe and I swear I will do it, Tara.”

Panicking, Tara did the only thing she knew would make him calm again whenever he wanted to rip out her throat. She reached out and touched his cheek, showing him a memory of a time she had been there for him.

---

_Tara replaced her hand on his leg and back to stroke his thigh. The shudder he made was how Tara learned of his sensitivity in that area._

“I’m a little overwhelmed right now,” Tara lied. She followed it up with a truth, “In Snoke’s training, pain is used a tool to discipline softness. Like how punching a tree trunk over and over will make your fist tough and less susceptible to pain. I just don’t know how to deal with this sort of... emotion.”

Kylo relaxed, “It’s alright. My father is quite emotionally stunted. I’ve had a lot of experience in terrible comforting styles. Sure, never hit me, but I dreaded the times my mother would go away for her work and leave me alone with my father."

“I pity that you endured Han Solo as a father.”

“I pity myself.”

“About a great many things, I suspect.”
“Kylo couldn’t help but smile at that, “Insubordination.”

“Keeping your ass in line,” Tara bumped against him playfully.

“And I’m thankful.”

She took her hand from his face and he looked back at her, much calmer, barely holding onto her throat anymore.

“Kylo, please,” Tara’s voice was uncharacteristically soft, her face gentle and innocent. “You think after everything we’ve been through, I would throw it away on something like this? That I would kill two other Knights of Ren because I was jealous of a redhead you’ll tire of in a few months.”

He let go of her throat but said nothing.

Tara took a deep breath and continued in that unnatural for her gentle tone, “I’ve always she that I would never love you. Love is weakness… but that doesn’t mean I don’t care about you. That doesn’t mean you haven’t become something more to me. Please, Kylo… I would never betray you.”

And damn it, he believed her. A part of him screamed at Kylo that Tara was lying. It only made sense that Tara had arranged this, but the thought of her being so dark in her heart to have killed hundreds of innocents and turned two Knights of Ren against him simply because she was jealous of Sasa? …It was ridiculous.

So he fought the part that screamed at him. Maybe it was the logic, maybe it was the history they shared, maybe it was that part of him that had always craved Tara’s love, or maybe it was a straight up manipulation in the Force, but Kylo allowed himself to move on from blaming Tara.

At least… in that moment he thought he would be able to move on. He had no idea that everything they knew about the bombing aftermath was about to be turned upside down.

But all that said and done… Tara wasn’t the one he wanted in his arms right now.

“Eight-Seven,” Kylo ordered. “Go tend to Sasa. See what her injuries are and how she is doing at the moment.”

“Yes, Sir,” FN-2187 nodded and crossed the room.

As FN-2187 walked away, Kylo began to speak to Tara about the First Order reinforcements on the way. But FN-2187 didn’t care, all he could focus on was Sasa and her glorious smile as she saw him coming toward her.

“You’re okay!” Sasa pulled him into a hug when he reached her. She didn’t care who was looking, she outright cried and clutched him tightly. “Thank the Force. I was so worried about you.”

“I was worried about you too,” FN-2187 tried to memorize every little detail of her touch. The softness of her skin, the pressure of her arms pulling him against her, the smell of her hair, the drip of her tears. It was an image to carry him through the lonely nights. “I’m also mildly worried Master Kylo is going to murder me for hugging you.”

Sasa laughed as she pulled back from FN-2187, “Don’t worry, Eight-Seven. Kylo isn’t looking.”

“Right.” FN-2187 paused for a minute, “Huh.”
“What is it?”

“It’s nothing, just…” FN-2187 glanced over at Poe Dameron reuniting with his girlfriend. “You called me Eight-Seven.”

“Oh?”

“Well, I was just thinking… maybe you could call me Finn.”

Sasa smiled, “Alright, whatever you say. I was so worried about you… Finn.”

Finn grinned at her, “I was worried about you too.”

By the time that Kylo and Tara’s threatening conversation was over, Poe and Kaydel had disentangled from their kiss. They just stood there holding each other, their foreheads bowed together, and Poe’s hands lazily rubbing up and down her back.

Then Poe’s hand hit the clasp of her bra and he very suddenly took in the fact that, yes, Kaydel had indeed been parading around in nothing but a bra.

“Ah damn it,” Poe pulled back from her and immediately started to strip off his shirt. “Here. Put this on.”

“But Poe,” she protested as he shoved his bloody and burnt shirt into her hands, “what about you?”

“I’ll be fine. Besides,” he winked at her, “gives you a chance to admire the goods.”

Kaydel shook her head, “You are impossible.”

“Sorry, Kaydel,” Kes approached them, digging through the bag of medical supplies and ammunition he had been hauling around. “Clearly I went wrong somewhere in the raising of my son.”

“Probably naming him peacock was a mistake,” she grinned.

“You’re probably right,” Kes winked, looking identical to his son. “But here, I’ve got something for you, Poe.”

Kes pulled out the blackish Runyip leather jacket that had once belonged to him, and Poe had – once again – forgotten home on Yavin IV.

“Put this on,” he shoved the jacket at Poe. “We are civilized beings that wear clothes in all respectable circumstances, and I did not give you my old war jacket for your coming of age just so you can keep leaving it at home. Put it on and don’t give me any lip about it.”

“Yes, Sir,” Poe chuckled, pulling it on. “But may I ask one thing?”

“What’s that?”

“You were too drunk to call the Resistance for help, but not drunk enough to bring me a spare set of clothing?”

Kes blinked, “…No. You may not ask me that.”
Kaydel laughed and reached out for Kes, “Come here.”

Kes gladly pulled her into a hug, relieved at her safety almost as much as Poe’s, “Ah, Kaydel… you are a lot more durable than I give you credit.”

“It’s alright. I lucked out by standing next to three Force Sensitives. It was mostly dumb luck.” She sighed, holding him tight, “Oh, I’ve needed this. My family has been driving me insane all week.”

“So I’ve heard.” Kes caught the eyes of a man who looked not unlike Kaydel, over her shoulder. “Your family been treating you well?”

“The First Order has been friendlier.”

“Don’t worry, Babe,” Poe’s eyes locked on Dacken, who was approaching the group when Hena, who carried the still sleeping Ryn. “I won’t let him come a step closer.”

Seeing the danger and aggression in Poe’s eyes, Dacken stopped dead in his tracks. Innocently he held up his hands in surrender.

“Wait, wait,” Dacken backed up, glancing briefly at Hena, who had the sense to step away from the scene. “Let me just explain.”

“Explain what?” he growled. “I know what you did to her.”

Kaydel realized what was going through Poe’s head and instantly tore away from Kes, “Wait, Poe, no!”

It was too late. Poe smashed his fist across Dacken’s face.

The man cried out and clutched at his face. Blood poured freely from his probably broken nose, and he stumbled back as Poe reared his arm back for another punch.

“No, Poe!” Kaydel yelled out again.

Poe swung forward, but Kes grabbed his elbow and yanked him back. He struggled, confused by the intersession, but was even more surprised when Kaydel darted in front of Dacken, holding out her arms to shield him from Poe.

“That’s enough,” she demanded.

“But Babe,” Poe started, “he-”

"I know what he did! You don't have to tell me!"

Poe blinked, unable to find any words in response. He lowered his arm, Kes releasing it when Poe dropped his fighting stance.

Kaydel took a deep breath, “Poe, I love that you would protect me from anything, especially those who would hurt me. But this is my decision to make.”

“Kay,” he leaned in close. “He set your hair on fire.”

“I don’t care, at least not right now. I don’t need you to be my attack dog. Please Poe, if you really love me you would respect my decision on this matter.”
He glowered at her a little, “I hate it when you play the love card.”

“So?” Kaydel asked his choice.

Poe heaved a heavy sigh and pulled her into his arms.

“Alright, fine,” he kissed the top of her head. “But you’ve got a lot of explaining to do, Lieutenant.”

“Yes, Commander,” Kaydel smirked. She pressed herself against him suggestively, “I’ll make sure to give you a thorough briefing tonight.”

Poe pressed her tight against him and bowed his head to kiss her passionately.

“Guys?” Kes piped up. “I’m right here.”

Poe groaned and pulled his head back.

“Kaydel Ko Connix, you let go of that man right now,” Timor Connix suddenly called.

Kaydel dropped her face against Poe chest and moaned at having to deal with this.

“Uh? Who is that?” Kes frowned as Timor strode up to the trio.

“Kes Dameron,” Kaydel sounded like it pained her to make the introduction, “meet my father, Timor Connix.”

When Timor reached Kaydel, her grabbed her wrist and yanked her back from Poe, “Ko, you will come here right now.”

“Hey!” Poe’s reflexes were faster, and he grabbed Kaydel’s other arm and pulled her back to him. “Don’t you handle her like that!”

“That’s enough! Both of you let her go,” Kes stepped between the men and forced her hands off Kaydel. “This isn’t a game of tug of war. Are you alright, Dear?”

“I’m okay,” Kaydel shot a nervous glance back at her father as she pressed herself against Kes. She had had more than enough of Timor, and she’d been damned if she let him take her away from the Damerons.

But Poe was ready to go right back on the attack – probably some of it left over from the denial of hurting Dacken further. He stepped right up into Timor’s personal space and got in his face.

“Where do you get off treating her like that?” Poe snapped.

Timor’s face looked aggressive, but his body language was meek, “She’s my daughter. You stay out of it, this has nothing to do with you.”

“Oh, it has everything to do with me. I have had to hold my tongue around you for far too long. You’re despicable and spineless. How dare you call her your daughter after the way you’ve treated her?”

“Poe…” Kaydel nervously reached for him, but she was pulled back by Kes.

“Careful, it might get dicey,” Kes warned.

“Can I back away like really quickly?” Dacken, who had been watching the scene from the sidelines, came up and muttered to Kaydel.

“Go for it,” she whispered.

Dacken scampered away as fast as possible.

“Poe,” Kes tried to calm his son, “come on, take a deep breath and walk away.”

“Oh, he’d like that,” Poe gritted his teeth. “You want me to back away so you can pretend you won. Make me just another one of the crazy stories you tell business partners while trying to sell off your daughters to them.”

“I have no idea what you’re talking about,” Timor denied.

“Oh please, don’t pretend you haven’t spent this entire trip trying to convince Kane Nilar to divorce or cheat on his wife with your daughter Kaydel, without consulting her. How many other men have you offered her to?”

“Ko is my daughter to do with as I please.”

Poe looked like he was about to murder Timor, “She is not your property.”

“Oh, is she yours then?” Timor snapped. “Forgive me if I want good prospects for my child. She should act like a proper Mallarexian woman, marry a mild mannered, compliant, pale skinned, blonde haired, blue eyed man.”

“Excuse me?” Poe said.

“The Goddesses are described like that,” Kaydel groaned; great now her father was being racist. “Having different coloured eyes aren’t so bad, but the rest of it is the ideal husband on Mallarex. Meek, non-rebellious, and pale.”

Kes Dameron finally understood why Aletha Kymeri had picked Antar Kymeri and Diego Nalto. Her Jakku ex-boyfriend probably looked like FN-2187.

“So you can imagine my disappointment at my daughter openly coupling was a foul-mouthed, violent, coloured xeno,” Timor spat the Mallarexian slur for foreigner. “And to make it worse… a Yavinese xeno. You Yavinese… everyone knows what an embarrassment you are. You’re lazy, lecherous, violent criminals. You know you have pretty light skin. How many times have you pretended to be to be Mallarexian or Corellian just to avoid the embarrassment that comes with being from those backwater moons?”

Poe grabbed Timor’s shirt and yanked him off the ground, “You listen here-”

“No!” Kaydel cried. “Don’t!”

“Poe, stop,” Kes ordered.

“Dad, you heard what he said,” Poe shot back. “I can’t just stand here and take this.”

“Poe, let him down right now,” Kes demanded.

“But Dad-”

“Let him down!” Kes snapped.
Poe looked between Kaydel and Kes. Kaydel gave him a small nod; her father wasn’t worth all this. When he looked at Timor’s terrified face, Poe knew she was right.

Slowly, Poe set Timor back on the ground.

“Good,” Kes said. “Remember, he only said those things to pretend he was better than you, but he’s not. Good men don’t have to put down others to feel tall. You’re a better man than him, Poe. Act like it. Be a man. Step away and be better than him.”

“But Dad, what he said about us—”

“It doesn’t make it true. You and I know what we’re like, and what Yavinese men are truly like. Getting angry is justified but reacting with violence only gives his words power. Step away.”

Poe took a deep breath and looked at Kaydel.

She nodded.

Alright,” Poe held up his hands and stepped back. Without even looking at her, Poe wrapped his arm around Kaydel’s waist and pulled her against him protectively.

Kes nodded and calmly said, “Good.”

He immediately spun around and decked Timor across the face, sending him to the ground.

“Spout all the Yavinese stereotypes you want,” Kes told the reeling Timor who was struggling to get back on his feet. “Call me lazy, aggressive, say we steal jobs we don’t deserve, I don’t care. At least I don’t throw my daughter out like garbage.”

Poe knew Timor had really pissed off his father when Kes pulled out from under his clothes Shara’s wedding ring, hanging from the chain always around Kes’ neck.

“The way you treat your family disgusts me,” Kes spat. “The ones you love should always be treasured and respected because you never know when the Force will take them from you. Even more so they should be treasured and respected because that is what it means to love someone. If you didn’t want Kaydel, then you never should have had her. But you made that choice to bring her into this world, and you don’t get to take it back because she didn’t end up how you wanted. You think I like the exact way my son turned out? Hell no, but I still love, respect, and support him, no matter what bad decisions he makes.”

“You have no right to judge me,” Timor wobbled to his feet. “If you even understood the danger her rebellion brings to this family—”

“Then good news; she’s not your problem anymore. You don’t want her? Fine, I’ll take her.”

Timor shook his head, “It’s not that simple.”

“Sure, it is,” Kes said plainly. “Don’t you worry another second about Kaydel; she won’t ever embarrass or endanger you again… because if you come within ten feet of her ever again, I’ll break your god damn neck.”

Timor stared at Kes in horror.

“Huh,” Kes laughed, looking slightly deranged. “Guess Yavinese men are quick to violence.”

“You’re- You’re bluffing.”
“Am I? I’m a Rebel Veteran. I’ve killed men; heck, I’ve killed men today. You think I’d hesitate to kill another one?”

Timor just swallowed.

“Thought so.”

With that, Kes Dameron turned and walked away without another thought for Timor Connix.

“Wow,” Kaydel stared after Kes with Poe, both looking equally gobsmacked. Kes had preened to be a fighter before, this was the first time he had outright threatened to hurt someone and mean it in front of Poe and Kaydel. She glanced at Poe, “So, that’s where you get it from.”

Poe scowled, recognizing the look on Kaydel’s face, “Are you turned on right now by my dad?”

“Little bit,” she admitted.

He shuddered.

“They should be arriving any minute now,” Tara said. She, Kylo, Cern, and Wiln had been discussing the impending First Order troops. “I figured Alecta Anthea should lead the charge considering the connection to Connix Industries.”

“The Force have mercy on their souls,” Kylo shook his head. “Now if we’re going to spin this into good propaganda, we’re going to need a scapegoat.”

[Ben?] Waroo growled.

“Cern, can you get a hold of a member of Crimson Dawn? But not their leader, I’m not starting an all-out war with the crime syndicates.”

“I think I could catch one,” Cern chuckled. He would have way too much find picking off one of them.

[Ben?] Waroo growled.

“Now how long until the New Republic will get here?” Kylo asked. “We want to be already set up by the time their first team even arrives. Already giving aid and cleaning up this mess.”

[Ben?] Waroo growled.

“We’ve got about an hour,” Wiln reported. “Master Tara, you work best with Captain Anthea. Maybe you should run coordination with her.”

“I agree,” Tara accepted. “I’ll oversee this. Now what of the Resistance soldiers? We’re not just going to let them go.”

Kylo shook his head, “We can’t hurt them, Tara. I did make and agreement and to go back on my word is not the-”

[Ben!] Waroo roared.

Kylo whipped around, “What?”
Waroo grabbed Kylo by the shoulder and spun him to look over at Sasa. FN-2187 was still tending to her, but Evan Tharel had still been to occupied with Snap to pay Sasa a visit.

“What about Sasa?” Kylo asked, completely confused, and desperately hoping no one spoke Shyriiwook and could understand Waroo was calling him Ben.

Then Waroo and Kylo started into a very loud and hard to understand argument. From the one side that everyone around could understand – Kylo being the only one who could fully understand Shyriiwook, but Poe and Kes knew a bit – the argument appeared to be that Waroo was shaming Kylo was not taking care of his mate. Of course, Kylo was arguing that basically shut up, she’s not my girlfriend, and you’re embarrassing me in front of my new friends.

But more eloquent.

“Fine!” Kylo threw up his hands in the air. He called out, “Tharel!”

“Yeah?” Evan glanced over, not really paying attention to the Knights of Ren.

“Have you finished with that leg yet?” Kylo chided. “My Knight has been waiting for you in agony.”

Evan sighed, “Just, please, give me five more minutes, but I promise she’s next on the list.”

“May I suggest something?” Kaydel hesitantly interjected. She knew she and Sasa agreed not to continue being friendly once they were reunited with their people, but she had come too far with tending to Sasa’s injuries to give up now. “Maybe Sasa should be moved to a private area? We still have that sheet set up in the corner.”

Kylo sighed, “Alright, Eight-Seven, would you bring-”

Waroo smacked him upside the head.

“OW! Fuck! WAROO!” Kylo roared. Getting smacked upside the head by a Wookiee was like getting a speeder slammed into it. The fuzzy jerk didn’t know his own strength.

…Or maybe he did, and that was the point.

Still. Damn, that hurt.

“What, Waroo?” Kylo growled. “What do you want from me now?”

And then Waroo said something to Kylo. No one quite understood what it was, but it was long, it was gentle and kind, earnest, something only lifelong friends could tell each other. And it was about Sasa. The speech was about five minutes in length, and through it, Kylo got calmer and kinder, shooting guilty, longing looks over at Sasa.

At the end of that five minute speech, whatever it was that Waroo told Kylo, it worked.

Kylo sighed, “Wiln?”

“Yes, Sir?” he replied.

“And what about you, Kylo?” Tara asked.
Kylo’s eyes locked across the room on Sasa, “I’ll see to the recovery of our injured troops.”

Without another word, Kylo pushed past Tara and crossed the room to Sasa’s side.

“Are you alright?” he dropped to his knees beside her.

Finn awkwardly got to his feet and went to stand by Wiln, though considering first standing by Poe.

She smiled at Kylo, “I’m fine. Now that you’re here, I’m perfectly fine.”

Sasa reached out and touched his cheek. Not caring of the repercussions, Kylo relaxed and leaned against her hand.

“I thought you were dead,” he whispered.

She stroked his cheek, “Nah. I’m not done with you yet. I promise.”

Kylo smiled.

Sasa yelped as he suddenly picked her up. She barely had enough time to lock her arms around his neck, less she wanted to end up on the ground face first.

Holding her bridal style, Kylo turned to look at Kaydel like the scene was nothing, “Where is that curtained off area?”

Kaydel couldn’t hold back her smile, and pointed in the right direction.

Kylo carried off Sasa without another word.

“So, uh… what was that about?” Kes frowned.

“Oh, that’s Ben Solo’s girlfriend,” Poe said. “Not that he’ll outright admit it.”

“Wow… I did not expect him to get a girlfriend who looks like her.”

“Yeah, she’s way too hot for him.”

“That’s not what I meant.”

Poe frowned, “Then what do you mean?”

“A Skywalker dating someone who isn’t brunette?” Kes asked. “What interdimensional portal have I fallen into?”

Meanwhile FN-2187 was reporting to Wiln, “Since the situation is contained here, should I join Marks to greet the First Order troops arriving.”

“No, I want you here in case Master Sasa needs a bodyguard,” Wiln replied. “Just linger and do what you can to help until I call for you.”

“Yes, Sir,” FN-2187 saluted and started to walk away.

Tara grabbed FN-2187’s sleeve as he passed her, “Who is that?”
“Who?”

“The creature,” Tara pointed to Waroo, who was talking with Dacken and Hena of all people.

“Of Chewbacca?”

“I guess he and Master Kylo are childhood friends or something. Still on pretty good terms, apparently.”

Tara released FN-2187, and he didn’t stay a second longer.

“Interesting,” she said to herself, watching Waroo. “Very interesting.”

Sasa didn’t say a word as Kylo carried her off behind the curtain. He didn’t address her, heck, he didn’t even look at her. Frankly, she was very confused by the events of the day. First he hadn’t come see her when they reunited, then he strangled Tara but she started getting all touch feely with Kylo and everything seemed forgiven, and then Kylo listened to a Wookiee for the guidance to come deal with Sasa privately.

Did… did Kylo not care about her any more? Had this event shown him that she was weak and he didn’t want her any more?

Then the second he set her down, he was on top of her and his lips were desperately on hers, and any doubt Sasa had was gone.

“I was so worried about you,” Kylo’s sentences came between overpowering kisses. “I thought you were dead… I thought she had taken you from me… I am going to kill when we get back to the First Order… Nice and publicly too… Show all others who plot against you what happens if they try to touch you… And I swear if Doxl wasn’t already dead, I’d kill him myself.”

“Well, you have Kaydel Ko Connix to thank for that one,” Sasa moaned as his hands caressed her body. One hand started to drift up her leg and she stopped it, “No, no, no. Not here.”

“Yes, here,” Kylo’s lips moved down her neck towards her breasts. “I can’t punish Tara yet for this, not at least violently, but I can piss her off. Just think of it, fucking you in the midst of the destruction she made would be perfect.”

Her mood changing in a heartbeat, Sasa roughly pushed him off her.

“What the-” Kylo tried to gather himself, staring at her in confusion. “What was that for?”

She glared at him, “There is a time and place for that sort of thing. Fucking me when I’m bleeding, stabbed, poisoned, and on my period for the sole purpose of pissing off Tara is not the place.”

“But… But you’ve never turned down having sex to piss off Tara before.”

Sasa rolled her eyes, “Let me make this clear, I am happy to have sex with you and piss off Tara, but only when we do it because you also want to have sex with me. Not only to piss off Tara. You want to pull that crap, you go find one of your threesome girls or take up another another Chosen.”

Kylo swallowed. Did she know?
Sasa’s argument was cut short when she gave her loudest shriek yet and grabbed at her pelvis.

“What? What is it?” he caught her. Without a thought he pulled her into his arms. “What’s wrong, Sasa? Is it the poison?”

“No,” she groaned. “It’s these period cramps. Apparently when stress delays your period for two months straight and you finally get going, your system has twice as much to clear out, and the cramps are more intense.”

“Are you… are you crying?”

God this one cramp… it felt like her body was trying to push out her entire uterus.

Sasa grunted, trying to wade out the pain, “Seriously if it wasn’t for getting those pregnancy tests every month, there is no way I could track when I should or should not be getting my period. It may be a bitch to hear a negative every single month, but at least I have consistency.”

“I… can’t offer you anything but a mild nod of the head,” Kylo admitted. “I have no supplies to help you with this and no experience to relate to. How can I help you?”

“Just hold me and try not to say anything stupid and insensitive,” Sasa moaned. It was starting to subside.

“Alright, I’ll try, but I make no promises at succeeding.”

“I know. It’s you. I lowered my expectations two years ago.”

“Good,” he smiled. “…Wait! Hey!”

At least it felt good to laugh.

By the time the last twinges of the giant cramp had faded away, Evan Tharel finally ducked under the sheet.

“Sorry about the wait,” he said as he pulled out a fresh pair of gloves from his medical bag. “It would have been shorter if someone here didn’t decide to play DIY Doctor.”

“Hey, you know what? It worked,” Sasa threw up her hands.

“Just don’t do it again,” Evan shook his head and knelt down beside her. “Alright, Snap briefed me a little on your injuries: stabbed, poisoned, all that nice stuff. They also told me about the bacta, so you should be on the road to recovery already. I guess we should focus on the most pressing matters, so what hurts the most?”

“Honestly?” Sasa laughed. “I’m having my period and the cramps are really bad.”

“Oh, I got something in my bag for that,” he started digging through said bag. “When was the last time you had your period?”

“Do you think that’s an appropriate question to ask?” Kylo cut in.

Sasa swatted his arm, “Don’t piss off the guy who’s going to give me painkillers. I swear, I will Force Bond our minds to make you feel this pain.”

“Remark withdrawn.”
It’s been about ten weeks since I had a period,” Sasa answered. She caught Evan’s look, “My cycle is off due to stress. I’ve had three negative monthly pregnancy tests since, so my system is backed up about two months. Hence the major pain of period cramps and the – as I’ve seen on my clothing – larger blood clots.”

Evan gave her an odd look, “Forgive me, but backed up?”

“Sorry, is there a different medical term for it.”

“No, because, with all due respect, that’s not a thing. You don’t get backed up on your periods; you have it or not. Did you say your blood clots were larger than normal?”

“Uh huh. There was even one I just physically felt I past.” Sasa didn’t like the expression on Evan’s face, “What’s wrong?”

“Maybe nothing, but…” Evan hesitated. “I’m not a gynecologist, but do you mind if I took a look at you? Made sure that everything was alright?”

Sasa felt Kylo’s fingers involuntarily tighten on her skin. Her entire life, only medical droids had done her gynecological examinations – in particular Kylo’s personal droid, Max after their introduction – and the fact was Kylo was the only person who had ever seen her bottomless. Frankly, she didn’t want anyone else to see.

Seeing his error, Evan quickly corrected, “You don’t have to take your underwear off. Look, how about I turn around and you put any… uterine discharge from your underwear on the skirt of your dress. Then you return your underwear on, and I can examine it without you having to be exposed. It’s only the discharge I want to see.”

“But my dress!” Sasa loved it so dearly.

“Sasa,” Kylo murmured encouragingly, “the dress is destroyed already. Burnt, stabbed, torn, cut up, stabbed with bacta and blood. We’re going to have to get rid of it once you’re out of it.”

She sighed and admitted Kylo was right.

Evan held up his end of the bargain, looking away as Sasa pulled down her panties and wiped the bloody mess onto her dress. She pulled them back on and told him she was ready.

Sasa couldn’t meet Evan’s eyes as he got between her leg and knelt down, but Kylo’s eyes wouldn’t move from Evan, watching him like a hawk for any mischief. Evan laughed anxiously, unnerved by Kylo, his eyes slowly moving down to look at the bloody mess on Sasa’s dress.

And he went silent… very silent.

“What is it?” Kylo demanded. He didn’t like the way the silence unsettled Sasa, her breathing increasingly rapidly with worry.

Evan looked up at them, mouth open but unspeaking, loss in both his word and his eyes. His throat was dry and his brain a scrambled mess. It was a standard medical condition, one he had seen in a dozen textbooks… but facing it in real life was another story.

How could he tell them?

“Ten weeks you said?” Evan’s voice was so week. “Yeah… I’d say that’s about right.”
Kylo and Sasa exchanged a look.

“What is going on?” Sasa begged. “Please tell me.”

Meeting her eyes, his own looked so scared and sad. Absolute dread hung over him like a cloud, but he was a medical professional, and he would tell his patient about their condition… no matter how horrible it was.

Evan cleared his throat, “Master Sasa, I’m afraid your hypothesis is wrong. You aren’t backed up and having two periods at once. The fact is, these aren’t blood clots… these are pieces of genetic material.”

The silence was heavy. Evan’s words didn’t make any sense to the couple. What could he possibly mean by genetic material?

Unless he meant…

“Master Sasa, I’m sorry to tell you this, but you’re not having a period… you’re having a miscarriage.”

Chapter End Notes

Coming Up Next Chapter…

You Know What’s Coming Up Next Chapter

Blaming Sasa’s miscarriage on the negligence of Kes and Timor and unable to make Tara pay, Kylo betrays the Resistance by taking Poe and Kaydel hostage. But he shows himself to be even crueler when Kylo forces Kaydel to decide between her life and Poe’s.

Credit for the flashback of Qi’ra and Han to Mur Lafferty from Solo: A Star Wars Story: Expanded Edition.

Credit to Poe asking out Kaydel to the movie Life Itself which has Oscar Isaac actually giving that speech.

Credit to Kare’s I’m divorcing you line to Charles Soule from Poe Dameron #27 for a similar line.

Credit to fictionfreak101 aka me for the Sasa and Tara flashbacks because I was too damn lazy to write new ones.
Kaydel's Decision

Chapter Summary

Cern breaks into Kylo's room, Evan tries to get it in Kylo and Sasa's heads this miscarriage is actually happening, and Poe meets BB-8's evil twin.

Chapter Notes

Fun Fact I didn’t realize until I had to check the timeline for this story: it’s actually been seventeen months since chapter 49 (Before the Awakening) began. Luke must seriously be going insane over his lack of answers for Ghost Alyla.

So, I reread the last chapter and noticed a typo. I don’t write the scenes of my chapters in order, and originally I was going to have Marks stay with Kylo and Poe’s group. When I changed my mind, I took out all references to Marks being in the lobby, except apparently for this line:

When Kylo turned his head back to look at the newly arrived FN-2187, with Marks trailing behind him,

I have since edited out the line, but in case anyone is confused: no, Marks is not in the lobby. He’s off meeting with Captain Alecta Anthea, and the next time he appears is later in this chapter.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

The Long Way Home

Chapter Fifty-Six

Kaydel’s Decision

FN-2187 was tired. Not tired like sleepy tired, but rather than tired of physical exhaustion. His body was begging for rest, and he struggled to stay upright on his feet.

Someone who didn’t know him would think it was from the events of the bombing, but this was not a tiredness he was unfamiliar with. The First Order did its best to make sure that he didn’t experience it a lot, but sometimes things slipped through the cracks.

Taking a deep breath, FN-2187 stretched out a hand and braced himself against the wall. He slumped gently forward, resting his weight against the ash-covered paintjob. FN-2187 tried to make his tiredness and downpour of sweat from his brow discrete, but a strange hand grabbed his shoulder.
“Hey, Buddy,” Poe used his grip to help Finn stand upright better. “Are you alright?”

“Yeah,” Finn tried to gather his strength, “just a little… off.”

“Eight-Seventy?” another voice came.

Poe glared at Wiln Ren as he came up to them without invitation. Wiln had worry on his face but he didn’t trust any Knight of Ren. Before Poe could object, Wiln started looking over FN-2187 the way he had Sasa’s injuries. While Wiln was technically only the supervisor of the Chosen, he did also keep an eye on the Blessed – which FN-2187 had become an unofficial member of upon his entrance into the Expert Lightsaber Class.

Wiln’s eyes narrowed in on the sweat of FN-2187’s forehead, “Did you take your medicine?”

“Medicine?” Poe frowned.

“No,” Finn grunted as Wiln guided him to sit down. Poe helped Finn down, still looking confused, but Finn took comfort in the way Poe patted his shoulder when he reached the floor. “I broke my backups in the bombing.”

“Figured.” Wiln used the Force to summon one of the bags of supplies he had brought in with Tara and Cern to the lobby. It had been the first wave of supplies for the victims of the bombing to look like they totally weren’t responsible. “I brought Master Kylo’s emergency kit with me. I know he keeps a few vials with him in case he decides to parade you around.”

Poe’s eyes narrowed as Wiln held out a vial of strange blue liquid to Finn. A thousand thoughts ran through Poe’s mind as he glared at “medicine.” What was it? A sort of poison? Were they drugging him? Did it have brainwashing powers to keep Finn in line?

“Drink,” Wiln ordered.

“Hey!” Poe swung his hand to knock away the vial.

Wiln’s closed upon his wrist before Poe could do so. The vial of blue medicine hung in the air, held by the Force. Fury flashed in Wiln’s eyes. His hand had a grip so tight it felt like he wanted to crush Poe’s wrist into dust. Quick and controlled, Wiln shot to his feet, twisted Poe’s wrist in the opposite direction it was supposed to bend, and slammed him against the wall.

Finn snatch it and chugged.

“Now…” Wiln turned his head back to Poe, “what the hell is your problem?”

But Poe didn’t cower, the attack filled him with confidence and righteousness… also he could see his Dad and Kaydel making a beeline for Wiln, so he knew he’d be fine.

“Is that how the First Order keeps their soldiers in line?” Poe laughed. “You have to drug them?”

“Oh please,” Wiln scoffed and let Poe go. There was no point in pressing a further attack. “I was helping him.”

“Helping him?” Poe echoed.

“What’s going on here?” Kes demanded, arriving with Kaydel.
“Poe!” she threw her arms around him, trying to protect her boyfriend from the man who had tried to be her life coach for murdering people.

“I’m fine, Babe. Just stopping some injustice.”

Wiln rolled his eyes.

“Poe, I don’t understand,” Kes’ eyes did not move from Wiln. “Why did he attack you?”

“Because he tried to attack me,” Wiln said.

“Poe?” Kes said in that fatherly way he would command when he discovered Poe had left a chore unfinished.

“This Stormtrooper,” Poe nodded to Finn, “is FN-2187.”

Kes’ eyebrows reached his hairline, “Excuse me?”

“Yeah, meet FN-2187,” Poe said. “You were on that mission, right, Dad?”

Finn frowned, “Uh… what mission?”

“You be quiet,” Wiln ordered, “and don’t ask that question again.”

Finn held up his hands in surrender.

“What?” Poe scoffed. “You didn’t tell him?”

Wiln shot back, “Do you think I wouldn’t hit you because your dad is standing there?”

“Well… after all these years, here he is,” Kes stared at FN-2187 in disbelief. He did remember that mission, when he, Luke, Felicity, and a few others tried to save a dozen children, but left one behind.

Kaydel, not quite recalling the story at that second just frowned, “Okay, but Poe, why did Wiln have you pinned against the wall?”

“He tried to destroy the medicine I was administering to FN-2187,” Wiln answered.

Poe shot, “Oh please, you were drugging him, probably to brainwash him.”

Wiln rolled his eyes, “Listen to me, you arrogant, idiotic, flyboy. FN-2187 suffers from a blood disorder. That vial is his medicine that he is required to take every eight hours or else very bad things happen.”

“Or that could just be a cover story while you slowly kill him.”

“Trust me, it is far more beneficial to keep him alive and flaunt him to you and the Resistance and Eswolla, than to let him die.”

FN-2187 frowned, “Wait. Am I special or something?”

“That may be,” Poe ignored him, “but that doesn’t mean you’re not going to kill him.”

Wiln raised an eyebrow, “Dameron, if we wanted him dead, he would already be.”

FN-2187 glanced at Kaydel, “Uh… Do you know what’s going on?”
Kaydel shrugged, “I assume more Kylo Ren drama.”

“Oh,” he replied, both knowing that didn’t explain a thing at all, but it was enough to make neither want to learn more.

“Dad, back me up on this,” Poe turned to Kes. “It’s suspicious to be giving him that stuff all of a sudden. I didn’t see him with any vial of strange blue liquid before.”

“That’s because the First Order medics are in charge of giving it to me,” Finn explained. “They make sure no one sees. Most of the other Stormtroopers don’t know about this. They administer my medication in a clockwork routine: three times a day, an officer with no embellishments on their uniform takes me aside, gives me my medicine, I drink it, and then I return to my cohorts a minute later.”

“But what if there’s no officers around?” Poe asked. “What if you’re in battle?”

“In case of emergency, I have a stash in the pants pockets of my uniform. Usually if a dose is missed, I would just take one of those. Unfortunately, when I woke up after the bombing, I found the way I landed had shattered my emergency vials. I was hoping to stick it out without anyone noticing before I got my dose, but that didn’t work out.”

“I don’t know,” Poe exchanged a look with Kes. “I’m not buying this.”

“Look, it’s a documented disorder,” Wiln said.

“And what is that disorder?” Kes asked.

“It’s called Cerlean Disease. His midichlorians attack and kill his white blood cells. You’ve got the Jedi doctor in the Resistance; just ask her about it.”

“Any way we could allow her to verify your claim?”

Wiln crossed his arms, “Verify as in-”

“A sample of your medicine and a sample of his blood,” Kes said.

“Say what now?” Finn blurted out.

Kes stood a little taller, “How about we make a deal… Wiln is it? The medicine for this kind of disease is expensive and most likely hard to get for a private individual. You must go through a lot of buyers and middlemen to get it. The only people who can legally access medicine to deal with midichlorians related diseases are technically doctors registered with the Jedi Order.”

“Oh yes, that arcane law the New Republic brought back after the Empire repelled it,” Wiln shot. “Just another way Luke Skywalker and his lot controlled the way people used the Force.”

“Actually, when your little Knights decided to burn Rornian, Luke was literally in the middle of a month-long Senate meeting determining the extent of Jedi authority as a governmental agent, particularly in the field of medicine. He was arguing that the Jedi Order should not be the only people with access to medicine to deal with those diseases. The Order had already given out over 200 certifications to distribute licenses to doctors throughout the Galaxy. Kalonia – the last remaining member of the Order – has continued to give out those licenses, but 600 of them. Hell, I think Evan even has one. Luke didn’t want it to be exclusive and fought for your right to administer it to FN-2187.”
“Finn,” Poe muttered the correction.

Kes ignored his son, “But then, you know, you Knights of Ren brutally murdered Luke’s wife and toddler daughter, so he pretty much dropped all the projects he was working on.”

“What’s your point, Dameron?” Wiln rolled his eyes.

“You give me a sample of his blood and his medication, we verify it, and then the Resistance will make arrangements to grant you legal access to the medication,” Kes offered. “It’ll save you guys a lot of money, which you can them use to take or more mob hits on your own soldiers or build another Death Star or whatever you people are currently working on.”

Wiln couldn’t help but smirk at the thought of the under construction Starkiller Base. Leia Organa would love that when she learned of it.

“All I want is a sample of his blood,” Kes finished his spiel.

“Excuse me,” Finn spoke up. “Do I get a say in whether or not people are going to take a blood sample from me?”

“Come on, Buddy,” Poe patted his shoulder. “It’ll be good for you to have a consistent supply of medicine if you really are sick. And if you’re not—”

“He is,” Wiln snapped. “Clever idea, Dameron Senior—”

Wiln wouldn’t admit he had forgotten Kes’ name.

“I’m not letting you have his blood,” Wiln said. “I know exactly what you’ll do with it.”

“But isn’t that the point?” Kes countered. “To have him? To flaunt him? You said it yourself: it is far more beneficial to keep him alive. Why don’t you make it easier on yourself to do so?”

Wiln said nothing, but he crossed his arms and considered the offer. It took a very long time to get an answer, and Poe was fairly certain Wiln was mulling over more factors than Kes and the Resistance were privy to.

“Alright,” Wiln decided. “We’ll do it, but I want that legal establishment. I will touch base with you personally to ensure it.”

Something very dark filled Kes’ eyes, “Of course… If I recall correctly, you know where I live.”

Poe’s eyes slammed shut as the image of his mother pushing him into their house filled his mind.

______________________________________________

Kes, keep him inside. I’ll take care of this. It’s going to be okay, Poe. Everything’s going to be alright.

______________________________________________

Poe had never told Kes that bundled in a pile of blankets on their living room couch, Poe had heard the shot that killed his mother.

“We have a deal then,” Wiln said. “I’ll go find supplies for that blood sample.”
“Dad?” Poe asked as Wiln walked away, “why is it that you want Finn’s blood?”

“I too would like an answer,” Finn piped up.

“Because Felicity Rhiaon had a theory about you,” Kes explained, “and if this blood is able to prove that theory… then the Resistance is about to secure itself a very important ally.”

Finn blinked.

“Oh… Okay.” Finn looked at Kaydel, completely lost, “…Do you have any idea what he’s talking about?”

Kaydel sighed as Poe slung his arm around her waist, “Not a clue.”

“Miscarriage,” Kylo repeated quietly. He looked at the speechless Sasa, his own face filled with confusion and anger, “How could you possibly be having a miscarriage?”

“Miscarriages are a lot more common than you would think,” Evan answered as if the question had been directed at him. “Something like 1 in 4 pregnancies will end in miscarriage.”

“No, you idiot!” Kylo snapped. “How can she possibly be pregnant?”

Evan frowned, “Uh… considering that audio recording I accidentally sent your mother, I assumed you two had the mechanics down. You guys did mention a few times …wanting that to be the result of the encounter.”

Kylo glanced at Sasa. Why did she have to have the habit of using the act of impregnation as dirty talk? Even worse, why did it have to turn him on so much?

But Sasa’s mind wasn’t on sex; her face was just perfectly white and frozen. The only motion on his face was the dab of tears from the corners of her eyes, trembling and ready to fall.

“Pregnant,” she finally whispered. “I’m… I’m pregnant.”

Evan hesitated, “Well… technically it’s you were pregnant.”

Their heads snapped at him in unison, and the looks on their faces literally made Evan shrink back. Maybe that wasn’t the best thing to say to two Dark Side Force Users with a track record of murder suffering through a rage filled tragedy.

“I thought that we couldn’t…” Sasa’s voice was weak as she looked up at Kylo. One of the tears turned rogue and spilled down her literally ashen cheek. “I… I didn’t know. We had negative results, three negatives since I last… How could I be pregnant? Oh God, I wasn’t acting pregnant. Kylo, I drank, I ingested caffeine, I used the hot tub in our suite, I had sex, and For Snoke’s sake, I ATE SHELLFISH!”

“Relax,” Evan grabbed. “It’s alright. You didn’t know, and the sex thing is fine during pregnancy. Encouraged even.”

“Don’t tell me to relax!” Sasa shoved him away, turning out to be a lot stronger than Evan expected her to be. “Stop making your oh so witty commentary and save my baby!”

Evan took a moment to gather himself, “Sasa-” “Master Ren,” she growled.

He nodded, “Master Ren… I can’t.”

Kylo grabbed him by the back of the neck, like he was about to hoist an animal up by the scruff, “What do you mean you can’t? You are a doctor-”

“Nurse.”

“Just fix her!” Kylo roared.

“I can’t!” Evan snapped. “You need a reality check? Fine! I don’t give a damn if you’re Sith or the fact you’re my boss’ son! I’ll give you a reality check! I cannot save your baby. It is too late. This is happening. I cannot reverse it. Believe me, if I could save this child, I would. I took an oath to protect and save every life within my power… This is beyond my power.”

Kylo and Sasa said nothing, the words sinking in. Their hearts thrummed fast, their emotions screeching, reaching, and even battle each other’s for dominance in the Force. This baby they hadn’t even known existed… they wanted it and they mourned it.

“No,” Evan’s voice calmed even though the look on Kylo’s face suggested that if this baby died, he would make sure Evan did too, “I do have something in my bag I can give you, Master Ren. A pill to help things along.”

“Help things along?” Kylo’s voice was ice cold, his eyes sharp in a look Evan had seen a time or two on the face of General Organa and had always prayed he never be on the receiving end of it. “What kind of things?”

Evan dug through his bag, “Basically it’ll clear out her system and prevent there from being negative side effects from the miscarriage.”

Kylo ripped Evan’s arm out of his bag, “You are not giving her an abortion pill.”

Sasa grabbed Kylo’s own arm and forced him to let go of Evan, “Stop it! That’s not what he’s doing.”

Evan hesitated, “Well… technically this pill can also be used for this.”

Kylo grabbed him by the throat and ignited his lightsaber.

“No, please!” Breathing heavily, Evan looked Kylo in the eyes and begged for his life, “I’m just trying to help.”

“Let him go, Kylo,” Sasa calmer than him, had transitioned anger into desperation. “Please… for my sake.”

Kylo glanced at her; their eyes meeting. Those shining forest green eyes made him think of his Force Signature. How much more darkness would he infect his soul with if he committed this murder?

…And what Force Signature would the baby have had? Kylo reached for the blue or red hue (obviously the baby would have a shade like the Skywalker or at least Sasa’s cerise) but found nothing. It could be that the child had been too young to be perceived by him… or it could have been that the shade had already been snuffed out.

He had a child… and that child was dead.
“Now,” Sasa gently grasped Kylo’s arms, a half-hearted attempt to control him and protect him from his anger, “Please, Evan… There has to be another way.”

“Another way? Another way? Look at that!” he gestured to the bloody mess on her dress between her legs. “Look at that pile of blood and pieces of genetic material! Those… shreds are your baby. It is gone. In pieces at your feet, staining your dress. This isn’t something that can be fixed. This is beyond any power. Beyond any medicine or magic, beyond the abilities of humans, alien species, any God, or even the Force… Your baby is gone before we could even tell its gender. Before it even changed from an embryo to a fetus. It is too late. You lost it… I’m sorry, but it’s true.”

And those were the words that broke Sasa. She wailed, hard and hysterical. More painful that Kylo had ever witnessed her do, or even imagined her capable. It wasn’t just grief, it was terror at the thought of what Snoke would do when he found out. If he found out his chosen mare had miscarried the heir to the Skywalker bloodline… There were no second chances. Snoke already doubted Sasa enough, when the Supreme Leader learned Sasa had lost a baby there was a very real chance he would take her from Kylo.

Kylo held Sasa tight in his arms, daring the universe and the Force itself to tear her from his embrace. He wouldn’t let anyone take her from him.

But Sasa’s cry wasn’t just grief and terror, it was brutal anger at the one who had murdered her baby. If Tara Ren was standing in front of Sasa right now, Sasa would torture Tara with Force Lighting until she screamed out as loudly as Sasa in pain… and then Sasa would tear her apart with her bare hands.

At least… that was what Kylo wanted to do.

“What did this?” Kylo seethed. He looked to Evan, and when he received no answer, he demanded, “Tell me what did this!”

Evan took a deep breath, “There’s no way of telling. Like I said, miscarriage in the first trimester is extremely common. It could be any number of factors: biological, medical, external, it could even just end because the embryo wasn’t strong enough.”

“Don’t give us that,” Sasa’s voice was choked, her eyes red. Her words were barely able to come out as more than desperate gasps as her lungs fought for air, “Tell us the truth. You know the truth.”

“The truth is I can’t diagnose the reason for this miscarriage due to our environment and circumstances,” Evan said. “If we were in a medical unit of some sort… all I got is a basic bag of supplies in the aftermath of a bombing, and a child already gone.”

“Tharel,” Kylo said slowly, “this isn’t the first miscarriage I’ve been around. I know they’re hard to give cause to… but in your educated opinion what is your best guess at the cause of this miscarriage?”

Evan sighed, “Alright, it could very well be just one of those miscarriages that happen early in pregnancy or it could be from the stress of this whole situation. But in my professional opinion, that fact you were in an explosion, in a fight using physical violence, were choked, poisoned, stabbed, and who knows what else… If I had to give you a firm answer, that would be the reason this miscarriage happened.”

Kylo clenched his fist, “And if this whole bombing situation hadn’t happened?”
“I believe Sasa Ren would still be successfully carrying this child to the next trimester.”

Perfect silence filled the room. What could even be said? Tara had murdered their baby.

Sasa felt numb. She had done it, she had conceived and carried the Skywalker Heir. Would Snoke be upset and punish her for losing it? Would the blame go to Tara? Or Kylo perhaps? Would something as serious as this continue in the trend of things Tara got away with?

She wanted to be held. Sasa just wanted to be home in her bedroom, crying and mourning in the safety of Kylo’s strong and loving arms.

Never in her life had Sasa had something that was just her own. Finn was just as good friends with Marks as with her. She may be a Chosen, but there were eight girls who had been chosen. The dejarik board, speaker system, and sewing room in her bedroom were conditional gifts from the Supreme Leader dependent on her being in his favor. Hell, the bedroom itself she could be kicked out of at any moment. Not even Kylo was hers alone, but if she had a baby, that would be her own. Kylo would be busy with the same job he always had, but her entire life and role in the First Order would be to care for the Skywalker Heir.

Now Tara had made sure Sasa still had nothing of her own… but this time it went too far, this time she had killed Sasa’s baby.

Abruptly, Kylo got to his feet.

“Stay here,” he ordered Sasa. “Take the pill, have Tharel clean you up, and both of you come join the rest of us when you’re ready.”

“Where are you going?” her voice struggled to be heard.

“Tara and I need to have a very serious conversation.”

Sasa couldn’t help but smile at the image of Kylo running Tara through with his lightsaber.

Kylo knelt back down and held her cheek. His thumb darted out to wipe away a tear sliding down that red from crying skin. Realizing he didn’t actually care that someone was watching, Kylo gently pulled her head forward and pressed a kiss to her forehead.

“I’ll take care of this,” Kylo whispered. “I promise.”

Sasa sniffed, “What about the baby? What do we do with… what’s left?”

Kylo’s eyes drifted to the mess between her legs.

Evan, having heard the tearful question looked to his medical bag and sighed, “You guys were going to get rid of that dress, right?”

As Sasa wiped her eyes on her arm, Kylo frowned but nodded.

Without a second thought, Evan turned his bag upside down, dumping medical supplies on the ground. Before they could ask for an explanation, Evan grabbed a pair of scissors and (with a bit of a struggle considering the material) cut off a large section of the skirt of the dress, including the part with the products of miscarriage. Tenderly he folded the fabric over the mess, carefully wrapping it up before placing it in the medical bag.

“You deserve to at least lay your child to rest in whatever fashion you desire;” Evan handed the bag to Sasa. “Take it with you when you leave.”

Sasa didn’t know what to say to the gesture, “But… it’s your bag.”

“I can get another,” he shrugged. Then his nervous eyes flicked to Kylo, “Or if you didn’t want it bring it with you, I understand.”

It took a moment for Kylo to reply, “I’ll remember this.”

“Just part of the job,” Evan said.

Kylo nodded, “Take care of her. Don’t keep her away too long.”

He got back to his feet and turned his body towards the curtain. Kylo paused and looked down at Sasa. He reached out and gently touched her face, his hand lingering for a moment, and then headed for the curtain.

And through her teary gaze, Sasa watched his disappearing form and made herself a vow:

If by some miracle Kylo didn’t end up killing Tara for this, someday Sasa would.

Tara sensed Kylo Ren’s anger before she even saw his return, but she was not prepared for when the Force violently yanked her off her feet and an invisible hand squeezed her throat to kill.

“How did you know?” Kylo roared as he sped across the lobby directly towards her. “How the hell did you know?”

“What are you talking about?” she gasped, clawing at her throat for relief, very aware of the eyes on her as she floated above the floor. Of course, none of the cowards were going to step in to help her.

Reaching her, Kylo yanked Tara with the Force down so her neck landed directly into the grip of his outstretched hands. If he was going to strangle Tara to death for murdering his child, he was going to psychically feel the last breath leave her body.

Meanwhile, Karé, Poe, Snap, and Kaydel – Kes and Waroo were actually being useful and coordinating with Han over a comm – stared at the scene from the sidelines in shock. Whatever their conversation had been about was long gone from their minds.

“Uh…” Karé glanced to Poe, “what is that all about?”

“Probably the usual Skywalker drama,” Poe shrugged.

“Should we intercede?” Snap asked.

“Hell no am I getting in the middle of that,” Poe scoffed. “Considering what Kylo did to Alyla Kene – a woman he liked – there’s no way I’m finding out what he’d do to me, a guy he hates. If the First Order wants to obliterate itself, I’m going to let it. Although… anyone got their recording device? Someone film this for General Organa.”

Kaydel frowned, “Why?”

“If she’s going to forgive her son for his sins, I’d like her to make an informed decision.”
Karé punched his arm. Hard.

Of course, with Finn seeing Kylo in such a violent and sudden rage, his mind only turned to thoughts of Sasa. Had something happened? Finn wasn’t strong enough with the Force to sense her Signature? What if she had just died in Kylo’s arms?

His heart broke at the thought, but he quickly pushed it away. If Sasa had died, Kylo would have already murdered Tara. Finn didn’t need to be privy to the details to know exactly where Kylo stood in his relationships with Tara and Sasa.

“How did you know?” Kylo’s grip on Tara’s throat was tight, but just barely loose enough to ensure she would die a slow death. As she gasped and struggled, he loosened it even more to allow her enough breath to talk, “Speak! Tell me!”

“I… don’t know what you’re talking about,” Tara struggled. She couldn’t help but think that if her mother – only a kilometer away at most – knew what was happening to her daughter, Qi’ra would be storming the lobby with her best soldiers immediately, need for secrecy about their relationship be damned.

“You know damn well what I’m talking about,” he growled. “How the hell did you find out? Even we didn’t know!”

“Didn’t know what?”

Something inside of him snapped.

“TELL ME RIGHT NOW OR I WILL BREAK YOUR NECK WITH MY BARE HANDS! HOW THE HELL DID YOU KNOW SASA WAS PREGNANT?”

The room went silent. Even Tara stopped fighting against his attack, an action her lungs were quick to remind her was not a good idea.

“Sasa’s pregnant?” Finn whispered as Tara sputtered and began her fight anew.

“I’m sorry…” Poe stared at Kylo, “you did what now to that girl?”

Kes shook his head, “When we get to the ship, I am not telling Han.”

[Bond-Brother!] Waroo exclaimed. He raced forward to pull Ben into a literal bone-crushing hug, [Congratulations to you and your flame-haired mate!]

Before Waroo could reach him, Kylo shot the Wookiee a dirty glare and Waroo stopped in his tracks. When he saw the hug would not be welcome, Waroo huffed and crossed his arms.

[I’m telling your mother you didn’t say thank you,] grumbled Waroo.

Kylo’s heart fell. Oh God. What was his mother going to make of the fact that he had gotten his not even girlfriend pregnant but his other not even girlfriend had made her miscarry in an assassination attempt because Kylo liked sort-of girlfriend one better than sort-of girlfriend two?

Maybe running away from home had been a good plan if this was going to be his life.

“Pregnant?” Tara whispered, looking completely shocked. Then that stunned look became downright pissed off, “How the fuck did you get that bitch pregnant?”
Kylo went for his lightsaber.

Without a second thought, Tara flung out her hand and used the Force. A plank of wood from the crumbled staircase swung out and leveled Kylo off his feet.

As he hit the ground, Tara wrenched free, and gave him a kick in the face for good measure. Tara was not obsessed with fashion, but she did have a signature look: boots with cleats. Had her kick been an inch higher, Kylo would be blind.

She used the opportunity to go for her own saber, but something roared and yanked her off the ground. Before she could figure out what was going on, Waroo threw her straight into the wall. It was only her involuntary reaction of using the Force to cushion her impact that prevented her death. Because when a Wookiee throws you into a wall that hard, usually you ended up being nothing more than a bloody splat.

[You don’t touch him!] Waroo bellowed at her, putting his body between her and the slowly moving Kylo.

Waroo guarding Kylo from Tara was one of the most overt displays of protection that Poe had ever seen. In fact, the only other time he had seen such a display had to be one time Chewbacca had done that to Han when some pirates had very seriously threatened Han and Poe after they got stranded in the middle of nowhere on Mandalore.

Long story.

“Huh,” Poe said mildly as he watched the scene, “I guess that’s what Wookies mean.”

Karé frowned, “What are you talking about?”

“When Wookiees swear life debts,” Poe explained, “they say Your life, the life of your children, and the life of your children’s children will be protected by my life, my children, and my children’s children. It’s a literal three generation to three generation promise. Go figure.”

But Tara could tell by the way those dark eyes fixed on her that it wasn’t for Chewbacca’s Life Debt to Han Solo that Waroo was protecting Ben.

Kylo and Tara were slow to gather themselves, but they jolted to their feet at the same time. They were halfway charged at each other when Wiln and Cern came out of nowhere and forced them apart. Not with the actual Force, but literally Wiln grabbed Kylo and Cern grabbed Tara, tearing them away from each other.

“What the hell?” Cern declared as he and Wiln struggled to hold Tara and Kylo back. “I leave for twenty minutes, and this happens? Dang it, Wiln, can’t you keep things together for while?”

“Hey, this wasn’t me,” Wiln grunted as Kylo tested his strength. “He flipped out on his own.”

“Let me go, Wiln!” Kylo ordered. “She has to pay for this!”

“Seriously, what the hell is going on here?” Cern asked. “Tara, what did you do?”

“I didn’t do anything!” she exclaimed. “I don’t know why he’s attacking me. All I did was ask a question – albeit not in the nicest terms – but not enough to merit this reaction!”

Cern knew how to cut through Tara’s crap, “What did you ask him?”
“Sasa’s pregnant,” Tara struggled to utter the words. She was surprised that Cern didn’t even blink at that. “All I did was ask how the hell that happened.”

It took about two seconds for Cern to figure it out.

“Oh shit,” Cern started to laugh. He released his hold on Tara, knowing that if Kylo wanted to kill her there was nothing Cern could do to stop it. Cern’s eyes turned to Kylo’s, “I get it.”

Kylo’s face went a little paler and the fight seemed to die out of Kylo a little at the revelation that Cern knew.

“Get what?” Wiln frowned.

“Sasa’s pregnant… and Kylo is pissed.” Cern grinned at Kylo in a way that he had no right to during such a serious matter, “She’s having a miscarriage.”

The group fell silent. Even the Resistance members traded heartbroken looks as the implications set it. It was about a minute before anyone could find their voice to speak.

“…Kylo?” Wiln was the one to ask, “is that true?”

Ben Solo took a moment – feeling weak – and then let out a huff of air, “Surprisingly stabbing, explosions, and poisoning are not conductive to pregnancies.”

Waroo let out a truly painful howl: his voice filled with terrible grief. It was the howl all Wookiees made when one they were life-bonded to died. The same howl that Chewbacca would one day make when Han Solo died.

There it was: Sasa Ren was having a miscarriage.

Finn’s heart broke as he thought of the pain Sasa was going through. All he wanted to do was shove everyone out of the way, race to her, and pull her into the strongest hug of her entire life. She didn’t need this, she didn’t need a man who would turn to anger and violence in the face of tragedy, she just needed someone to hold her.

…Why couldn’t he hold her?

Wiln blinked as he tried to process it, his mind going to Nova and what this would mean for their future. What if Sasa got pregnant again? Would they have their chance to be together? Or what if this miscarriage made Snoke lose faith in Sasa and he picked another Chosen as the new Knight of Ren? Every time a spot opened, Wiln did everything in his power to stop Nova from being picked. It had worked almost a hundred times already… but someday they would run out of other candidates.

Cern viewed it the same way he viewed everything: laugh as you watch the world burn and don’t give a shit for anyone else’s feelings.

It would be a lie to say that Kaydel wasn’t upset at Sasa’s miscarriage. By no means did she want Kylo Ren to have a child, but she had reluctantly grown fond of Sasa and didn’t wish this pain upon her. Not to mention, what would General Organa feel when they told her in debriefing that she had a miscarried grandchild?

It would also be a lie to say that Poe wasn’t a little bit pleased. He had no emotional attachment to Sasa, and as for Ben… all Poe could think of was revenge for the murder of Rey Rhiaon Skywalker. Sure, he had empathy, but truth be told, he didn’t have sympathy.
All Karé Kun could think was who’s going to tell Han and Leia?

Kes Dameron felt a cold fear inside of him. What if they had given Poe’s group a head’s up about this? Could they have saved Ben’s baby? In a way, wasn’t he responsible for the death of this child? …Was Han responsible for the death of his own grandchild? Han was going to handle that guilt with about the same grace as Luke was handling Rey’s death.

Snap felt sympathy for Sasa – his feelings on Kylo were a big pile of nothing – as the girl seemed actually pretty decent. …But his leg was also really fucking hurting and he wanted to be safe on their own ship already.

Dacken and Hena weren’t paying, whispering to themselves their plan of action to get out of there with their lives and debt-free from any Connix, or worse, Anthea.

Waroo roared out in grief again. Not only had he failed in his task to protect the child of the child of his father’s Life-Bond, but Ben Solo did not deserve more pain. True, his Bond-Brother had committed some terrible acts, but if the Rebellion had taught him anything it was that the Galaxy needed forgiveness, not revenge.

And Tara was horrified as she realized the danger she was in. She had just accidentally murdered the heir to the Skywalker legacy. She had to work fast or Snoke would nail her to the wall.

Catching Kylo’s burning eyes, Tara knew there was a chance that Kylo would tear her to pieces first. Defense mode NOW.

“I didn’t do it,” Tara literally held up her hands in surrender. “Kylo, please, I swear-”

“Why should I believe a thing you say?” he snapped.

“Kylo…” her voice turned gentle. “Kylo.”

Against his will, Kylo’s body automatically relaxed at that familiar soothing tone. That voice had helped him through so many painful moments. Through Rey’s death. Through Luke’s murder attempt. Through the gas attack on his mother. Through Nera Ren’s death. That voice was hardwired in his brain… and it was hard to fight off its effects.

“No, Tara,” he shook his head.

“Kylo,” she made the move to cross to him.

He let her reach him – Wiln and Cern backing off to the sidelines – but when she moved to touch his chest, Kylo took a step back.

Tara reconfigured her plan and held up her hands again.

“Kylo, please,” she said in that voice he couldn’t resist. “Please, Kylo… I didn’t do this.”

“Stop lying to me,” his voice was low and Kylo wouldn’t look her in the eyes.

“I’m not.”

“Stop lying!”

“I’m not!” she said firmly. Tara forced his chin up to look her in the eye. Her grey irises were strong but soft, and his brown couldn’t help but find easy comfort in them. “Kylo… please.”
Poe grimaced. Whatever his feelings on Ben Solo were, he really hated watching the kid get manipulated like this. He made sure his Holo recorder was running. Leia would want to see this.

“Why did you do this, Tara?” Kylo’s voice sounded lost. He genuinely didn’t understand how his right hand could betray him. “Why would you do this to me?”

“I swear to you,” Tara hesitated over her next words, “regardless of whether or not I had anything to do with this, I didn’t know she was pregnant.”

“You’ve been so obsessed with this heir thing, it’s not hard to believe you would take out solid competition.”

“Kylo, I would never hurt a child. You know that!”

“I don’t know what I know about you anymore,” Kylo stepped out of her arms.

“Listen to me,” Tara stayed strong and firm, “after everything we’ve gone through… after what I went through, do you think I would inflict a miscarriage on someone? After the pain that I went through?”

Kylo looked away. Only the two of them knew about the miscarriage Tara had when Kylo was twenty-one. Indeed, it had nearly broken Tara when she went through it, and she had sworn to Kylo after the competitors started dropping like flies that Tara would never instigate the pain they had suffered.

The only question was if he believed her.

“I didn’t know about her pregnancy,” Tara repeated. “Please, Kylo-”

“I don’t think I can believe you,” Kylo cut off.

Tara paused a moment to take a deep breath and regroup herself.

“Forget my animosity with Sasa,” Tara said, her voice very quiet. “Do you really think me such a monster?”

“Honestly?” Kylo replied. “I don’t know anymore.”

“Kylo, I swear to you, I did not know she was pregnant.” There were tears in Tara’s eyes, but Kylo couldn’t trust they were genuine. “Please, I swear it to you, Master… How could I know? Her pregnancy tests have been negative for years, just like mine.”

“You’re right, Sasa’s have been… So how did you do it?”

Tara blinked, genuinely taken by surprise, “Excuse me?”

“You had to have done it somehow,” Kylo accused. “Tharel said ten weeks was about right, and that’s been how long Sasa’s period has been late. She was pregnant for ten weeks at least, and in that time had three negative pregnancy tests. So how did you do it?”

“You don’t actually think-”

“Only my droid Max does the pregnancy tests for the female Knights of Ren. All it would take is one person screwing with his programming. How did you do it?”

She couldn’t believe it, “Kylo, I don’t even know the code to get into your room. How would I know to reprogram your droid to give negative pregnancy test results? It couldn’t have been me!”

“So you’re suggesting, what? Someone broke into my room and screwed with my stu-”

Kylo stopped. His eyes were wide as hit him and Tara at the same time. In unison they turned to face the smirking Cern Ren.

“Well, it’s about time,” Cern laughed. “I was starting to think you’d never get it.”

“You,” Kylo seethed, his long legs crossing the room in four strides to be up in Cern’s face. “How dare you?”

“How dare I?” Cern grinned. “If you’ll recall, it was quite easy.”

The day after Kylo had his nose broken by Sasa for suggesting a threesome, Cern came to him with a lead on Lor San Tekka. Wanting Tara away while he tried to fix things with Sasa, Kylo sent Tara after Tekka.

Since Cern had been the one who found the lead – as well as being Head of Intelligence – he had assumed he would take the mission. When Cern learned that Tara had been sent, Cern was furious and got into a conflict that made Kylo seriously regret his decision. It had been such a bad conflict that the next time they got a lead on Tekka, Kylo let Cern go alone to track him for a whole three months.

But the reason things had been so bad was that Cern’s anger at the situation had led to a very… interesting result.

“How did you get in my room?” Kylo Ren had not expected to open the door and find Cern sitting on his bed and smirking at him.

“Solo, you don’t keep me around to just intimidate people,” Cern’s voice was ridiculously casual. “There is not a lock on the Finalizer that I can’t pick. Not a code I can’t break. Not a system I can’t get into, reprogram, or even destroy. You think you’re special because you can force your way into minds, do miracles with machines, and come up with intricate and advantageous battle plans? You may be a better pilot than me, but I’m everything you are, just without the special Skywalker sperm. If my grandfather was Darth Vader, you would be nothing in the eyes of Snoke. I’m essentially you, but I don’t waste my time on empathy… Yeah. I can break into your room.”

Kylo really didn’t want to admit how much those declarations had cut him down.

“Cern, you cannot break into my room.”

“I feel the results speak otherwise.”

“Cern!”

He stood up and crossed his arms, “This happened. Deal with that fact and let’s move this conversation along. I didn’t come here to banter.”

“And why did you come?” Kylo still couldn’t wrap his head around it, “Gods, Cern, what if I had been bringing a girl here with me?”

“Considering Girlfriend One is away on my mission and Girlfriend Two broke your nose last week for suggesting a threesome, I figured I’d roll the dice.”

“So that’s what this is about? Tara going after Tekka?”

“That mission was mine, Solo. It was my lead.”

“Just because you’re head of intelligence, doesn’t mean you get whatever mission you want. I need Tekka to speak to, not die a slow, horrible death.”

“I get that,” Cern’s voice was unreasonably calm, “but you should have spoken to me about it; not sent her behind my back because you’re trying to fix your love life with your airheaded concubine.”

Kylo moved his hand for a Force Choke, but Cern moved faster. The Force knocked Kylo off his feet into the wall before he could even squeeze.

“That’s another reason you keep me around,” Cern watched Kylo struggle back to his feet. “Don’t try something like that again.”

“Are you challenging me?” Kylo didn’t need his mask in that moment to look terrifying.

“Uh… yeah,” Cern chuckled, “I think I am.”

A beat of silence hung heavy in the air as both waited to see if this would break out into an actual fight. Kylo’s eyes flicked to the altar in the corner of the room particularly to Alyla Kene’s lightsaber on an altar of Darth Vader’s helmet sitting on a blanket of ashes.

Kylo’s fingers twitched as he concentrated on the saber. The real reason Cern wasn’t allowed to teach a lightsaber class wasn’t that he would kill the students – Tara had yet to be stripped of her class for doing that – but rather one simple fact: Cern was good against one lightsaber… but he couldn’t defend against two.

“I know what you’re thinking,” Cern said. “How about we just call this a truce?”

“Fine,” Kylo agreed. “But answer me one thing: have you broken into my room before?”

Cern laughed, “If you’re asking if I’ve broken in before, the answer is yes. If you’re asking if I’m the person who broke into your room and altered what your medical droid calls you, unfortunately that was not me.”

“Well, then who was it?” the mystery had frustrated Kylo for years.

“I don’t know, but my money’s on Hux.”

“Why are you in here, Cern?”

“I actually took a leaf out of that burglar’s playbook. To express my frustration with your decision on the Tekka mission, I broke into your room and screwed with fifteen things.”

Kylo blinked, “You… You what?”

“I messed with fifteen things in your room. Small things; more annoyances than anything, but good luck finding them all.”

“What exactly did you do to my room?”

“You don’t actually think I’m going to tell you?” Cern laughed. “Give up that moment of discovery and the paranoia that everything might be a trick? That’s half the fun.”

Kylo growled, “If you don’t undo them right now-”

“You’ll never make me reverse it all. Sure, you could hold me here against my will for ages, but I’ll never give in. You might as well get hunting.”

Kylo sighed, a sense of defeat setting in, “And what exactly should I look for?”

“Nothing worth ratting me out to Snoke, so you can drop that idea. He won’t care if I switched the hot and cold water in your shower or cut off all the toes to your socks – not things I actually did, by the way.”

“I don’t understand,” Kylo shook his head. “You’re not petty like this. You usually more explosive… violent.”

“I can’t use violence in something like this. I want to keep my neck.”

“But there are other ways of getting back at me.”

“What? Going after your mom?”

Kylo was very quiet after that.

“Ben Solo,” Cern chuckled, “anyone you care about is outside of this Order and not worth my time going after.”

“There is someone,” Kylo muttered.

“Oh yes… Sasa.”

Kylo’s hand touched his lightsaber.

“It’s a good idea,” Cern admitted. “Go after Sasa, but she’s already pissed at you, so there’s nothing I could do that’s worse than what you’ve done to yourself.”

“There are things you could do to her.”

“I’m not Hux, Kylo. I’m not going to try to screw Sasa just to piss you off. Now, sure, killing her is a good idea. She’s not that highly regarded by Snoke, and it would show Tara that while she was on my mission, I did the thing she couldn’t… but I’m not going to kill Sasa.”

“You’re… you’re not?” Kylo scowled.

“No,” Cern said. “Not now, probably not ever.”

“…As terrible as this question is, why not?”

“Because if I ever wanted to hurt Sasa,” Cern said, “if I ever wanted to take her out, remove her from the equation, get rid of this little problem we all have, I’m not going to use violence. I’m not going to kill her, poison her, stab her, or even slap her… No, if the time ever comes where I am the one to take out Sasa, I have a way that is so much more effective, and so much simpler than a murder. If I take out Sasa… I’m cleaning house.”

Kylo’s reply was dangerous, “And who in this house needs to be cleaned out?”
“Berd and Doxl, but they’ll probably take care of that for me. The ones I would do are Sasa and Wiln… anyone else is yet to be decided.”

Kylo’s eyes narrowed.

“But for now… I’ll settle with doing petty things to your bedroom.” Cern patted Kylo’s shoulder, “Happy hunting. Let me know how many you can find.”

Fourteen things. He had only found fourteen of Cern’s tricks.

For seventeen months, Kylo had been looking for the final thing Cern had done to his room. And now… Kylo was furious.

“You manipulated my droid to give false pregnancy test results!” Kylo roared.

But Cern just laughed, “I genuinely didn’t think it would take you this long to figure it out.”

Kylo grabbed him by the throat.

“Hey! Hey!” Cern exclaimed. “Let me go!”

“You think you can get away with this with no consequence?” Kylo seethed. “You helped her do this!”

“I didn’t do anything but fuck with your droid,” Cern snapped. He took a deep breath and glanced at Tara. He said in a low voice to Kylo, “Come on, we both know who is responsible for this.”

“Don’t you do that.”

“Oh, I’m not going down for this. Okay, yes, I screwed with your droid. It’s been giving negative pregnancy results… but don’t you think that’s actually a good thing? What if Tara knew about the baby? Wouldn’t she have gone after it before Snoke found out about the pregnancy? True, he wants the heir protected, but he never knew about it… if you never knew-”

“Sasa would tell me immediately.”

“I’m not saying she wouldn’t.” Cern chuckled, “I guess it’s about time I tell you why I chose to mess with your droid. I’m not the first person to screw with Max-”

“I can tell by the name he calls me,” Kylo shot.

“Well, I don’t know if she did that, but Tara did do something to your droid. You see, it’s a well-known fact in the First Order that only Max administers the pregnancy tests for the female Knights of Ren… so years ago, Tara secretly made it so your droid sends her a message with the result the second the test is completed before he even tells the person he’s testing. Tara would know of Sasa’s pregnancy before even Sasa, before even really Max.”

“…So that means you reprogrammed Max to always give false negatives not only to take a shot at me, but to-”

“Thwart Tara,” Cern finished. “She genuinely had no way of knowing that Sasa was pregnant. No one did… Not even Snoke… Unless, he did-”
“Don’t!” Kylo snapped. “The Supreme Leader would never withhold such information.”

“You believe what you want, but Kylo, let’s take a moment and just think about what’s happened here today.”

“Think about what?”

“What was exactly Tara’s plan here, assuming she did it,” Cern said. “Think about it, did Tara really intend on hurting so many people? Is she truly responsible for Sasa’s miscarriage?”

“You go too far.”

“I don’t go far enough. Come on, Kylo… think about it. What was Tara’s plan? How about this?” Since Cern actually knew what Tara’s plan had been, it was an easy tale to weave. “The places that had the bombs set up were the ballroom, the lobby, and the gardens. It was about an hour and a half after check-out and three hours before check-in. There weren’t supposed to be a lot of people in the lobby, and the location of the bombs were pretty far from where people were meant to be gathered in the lobby. They were on the staircase, at the far walls, the extra space. Not the desk, not the couches, not the valet or concierge… they were far from people.”

Kylo’s eyes flicked around the room. Cern was right.

“And the gardens?” Cern continued. “Those pathways were blocked, construction being done on them. They were only accessed by emergency exits – which the action plans in this building for the alarm going off, directs people to the lobby – and the workers fixing those paths were all on lunch break. No one was meant to be on those paths.”

Kylo frowned. Again, Cern was right.

“What about the ballroom?” Kylo asked. “There was bombs under the chairs.”

“But not your chairs. Captain Anthea arranged for the First Order to sit elsewhere. And the people who were filling the seats with the bombs were corrupt billionaires who made their money from the sales of weapons. War profiteers.”

Kylo didn’t like how right Cern was.

Cern continued like silver in his ear, “My guess was the plan went like this: Set off the bombs in areas where there aren’t a lot of people, and those who do get hurt aren’t innocents. Plant them in multiple places so it doesn’t look like a specific attack. Sasa probably would be killed by the bombs, or by Berd and/or Doxl when you were distracted as the bombs went off. Worse comes to worse, Sasa doesn’t die, Crimson Dawn storms the ballroom, and they start shooting. In the blaster fire, Crimson Dawn hits several people including Sasa who happens to be an innocent bystander.”

Kylo’s eyes moved to Tara. She was watching Waroo but looked as confident as ever. Tara knew he wouldn’t kill her over this… no matter how intricate her plans were.

“Alright,” Kylo said, “say that was the plan. Why didn’t things go that way?”

“Like I said, when the fire alarm goes off, people are directed into the lobby and use the garden paths from their emergency exits. The only reason so many people went towards the bombs was because of the fire alarm… Now how did that get set off?”

Kylo remembered:
"Come on, let's go!" Evan grabbed Paige's hand and they crossed through the door.

The fire alarm went off the second they opened it.

"Yeah," Cern smirked. He had been casually searching the memories of the people around him ever since arriving on Nixrye that way he could turn things his way however this situation ended up. Cern was just a lot more subtle about his invasion of minds, Kylo not having the patience Cern did to sneak in rather than force his way in. "The Resistance set it off. Didn’t they? This all happened because of the Resistance… Because of their leader."

"Is that Dania?" Sasa exclaimed.

Kylo blinked, "Yeah, I think…I think it is."

In perfect unison, their heads snapped over to the Nilar group. Dania and her bodyguard, Thon were making a very suspicious and quick exit. Dania’s husband seemed to be urging them to move fast.

And then Kane Nilar’s head turned just a little too far.

"Dameron," Kylo growled. He turned to the others, "Everyone move! We have Resistance members present. You know your positions."

"Oh, fuck!" Poe exclaimed as the First Order started to move. "We’ve been compromised. Everybody move!"

Figuring there was no point to secrecy now, Jaina turned and yelled to the crowd, "EVAN! PAIGE! RUN!"

"If Poe hadn’t made that call, Sasa might not have been attacked," Cern whispered as Kylo watched Poe from across the room. "If things had gone to plan there’s a possibility you would have saved your baby. Saved Sasa and been the hero. Get your happily ever after with them both."

Kylo’s eyes narrowed at Poe, who had his arm slung around Kaydel.

"You love her," Kylo chuckled. "I can sense it. It's not just a role you're playing of pretend husband and wife. You love this girl."
Kylo balled his fist, “And now he’s the one standing with a woman at his side. A woman he’s allowed to…”

“T’ll wait for you, Kylo,” said Sasa. “It doesn’t matter how long it takes, I’ll wait. I know we’re meant to be… but you have to make a choice. And you’ll have to make it soon.”

Her words taking hold of him, Kylo exhaled deeply and pulled her into a hug. He held her in silence, burying his face into her copper hair, the background noise of space, opera, and mechanics filling the air.

He battled and lost to a shaky breath.

“Kylo?” Sasa looked up. She frowned at the tears in his eyes and touched his cheek, “Are you alright?”

He struggled to swallow.

“I’m fine,” he lied. “You’re just… you’re right. I need to make a choice.”

But as Sasa looked up at him with the tender smile on her face and love in her eyes… he knew he already had.

“Poe Dameron’s responsible for this,” Kylo whispered.

“Perhaps,” Cern said, “but I wouldn’t lay the entire blame on him.”

“Oh?” Kylo gave him a side glance. “And who else would you blame?”

“Just think, Master… what exactly triggered the confrontation with the Resistance?”

Timor Connix signalled to his daughter to turn the slideshow to the next picture.

"Kaydel Ko Connix, my youngest girl, named for her older sister who died before they could meet, and a proud member of the Resistance."

“Connix,” Kylo’s eyes turned to Timor Connix.

Timor stood awkwardly in the corner, trying to figure out exactly where he should be. He didn’t want to be too close to the First Order, but if he moved near the Resistance, Kane Nilar’s father might attack him again. Helping the injured was out of the question; there was barely any blood on his outfit so it might still be salvageable. Getting dirtied by the victims’ injuries would just make his outfit a waste of 1000 credits.

“Connix had a deal with us,” Cern said to Kylo. “He was supposed to protect us. Provide security, and yet he let this happen. He promised to keep our people safe above all else.”

“Oh, don't thank me, Love,” Timor grinned wide enough that Kylo’s arm tightened around Sasa's a bit more. "It's strict orders from Alecta, and I don't want to get on her bad side.”

“But I guess that you can’t quite blame the man.” Cern brushed some imagery dirt off his shoulder, “After all, it’s not like anyone knew this bombing was going to happen before it happened… Right?”

Kylo’s eyes flicked to Kes Dameron.

“So, you knew that this bombing was going to happen?” Kylo repeated. “…But you didn’t give anyone a heads up about it because you were all too drunk to come up with the idea?”

“What can I say?” Kes shrugged. "Your old man sure knows how to drink.”

Kylo gritted his teeth, “So, what are you suggesting, Cern?”

“I’m merely suggesting that you stop focusing your anger on the person who may or may not have set the pieces for a different disaster, and a focus on the one who triggered this one. Tara didn’t set off these bombs-”

“Dameron and Connix did,” Kylo finished. “Junior and Senior in both cases.”

“Exactly.”

Kylo watched Kes and Timor in turn for a while, “But they… they didn’t do it. Tara did.”

“Crimson Dawn did, and trust me, I’ve found someone to punish for the pain they caused… but the Dameron and Connix fathers are not innocent in this. They could have stopped it all from happening. If Tara’s original plan had gone through, your baby might have been saved. It was the negligence of Timor Connix and Kes Dameron that lost you your child.”

Just that moment, the men sensed a familiar Cerise Signature approach the group. Kylo and Cern turned to see Sasa return with Evan.

She was crying, bloody, and broken. Evan’s medical bag was slung over her shoulder, Sasa barely having the strength to hold it up. Her heart was utterly broken.

Wiln approached the pair, and after a moment of speaking, he carefully took the bag from Sasa. It slowly was soaking up the blood of the dress wrapped baby within.

Sasa and Kylo’s baby who never got to see the light of day.

Kylo balled his fist. He wanted to hurt something, hoping it would dispel a bit of his never-ending pain. For a moment he considered just punching Cern, but that would only make things worse. Besides, the man who just trying to help him and redirect his focus on the true inflectors of this torment.

“This experience is a painful one, Kylo,” Cern said, “but it could have been stopped. They took your child from you.”

Kylo looked over at Poe and Kaydel.

“So take their children from them,” Kylo whispered.

Cern smiled and bowed his head, “You are my Master, and the Leader of the Knights of Ren. I do as you command, and if you choose it, I will help you punish the true culprits.”

Kylo’s face hardened as he stared at Kaydel and Poe.

His work done, Cern slowly backed away from Kylo.

“You so owe me one,” Cern whispered to Tara, stopping by her side.

“Alright,” Evan said loudly, looking around the room, “since everyone’s been reunited and dealt with, I guess it’s time to head home.”

“Good idea,” Poe turned to face him, his arm locked around Kaydel’s waist. “I want to get out of here before the First Order cavalry arrives.”

Kylo narrowed his eyes at the arm around Kaydel’s waist.

"But above all, do it with grace," Kylo panted as Sasa gripped his shoulders. His arms were locked around her waist, pulling her as close against his body as possible. "Bring it all together with fluidity and grace."

 She pulled his head down and his lips were on hers without hesitation.

Kylo’s eyes flicked to Sasa. He should holding her right now, not Dameron holding his lover. Dameron should be the one hurting: Poe who set off this whole mess, his father who wanted to play hero rather than protect them, his girlfriend’s dad who should have prevented it, his girlfriend who should have-

“And I swear if Doxl wasn’t already dead, I’d kill him myself.”

“Well, you have Kaydel Ko Connix to thank for that one,” Sasa moaned as his hands caressed her body.
No… Kaydel had saved Sasa’s life. He owed her. And yet he needed to punish her, but how could he possibly-

Then it hit him.

“All right then,” Poe declared, “Solo… it’s not remotely been a pleasure, but hey, at least you didn’t have to see your father. So, we’ll be on our way now. Good luck with this mess.”

Waroo whimpered [Ben, please come with us. We’ll protect you and your mate. Please, Bond-Brother. I miss you.]

Kylo said nothing. His eyes wouldn’t move from Poe as he got the Resistance people in order.

“Hey, hey!” Dacken raced up to Kaydel. Hena was following closely, carrying the still sleeping Ryn, “Can Hena come with us?”

“Hena?” Kaydel frowned.

“Ryn needs medical attention, and I don’t trust the First Order,” Hena begged. “Please, can the Resistance help us? I don’t want to be indebted to the Connix family.”

Kaydel glanced at Poe, “Well, she does have good instincts.”

“All right, but we’re not running a daycare center,” Poe said to Hena. “You’ll need to sort out things regarding your son with General Organa.”

“Of course.”

“Well, then, welcome to the Resistance.” Poe glanced at Dacken, “Kay, do we really have to bring your nephew?”

“Yes, Poe,” Kaydel answered sternly. “We’re giving him a second chance.”

“You’re giving him a second chance. He’s still got to earn it with me.”

“I’ll try my best, Poe,” Dacken promised.

“That’s Commander Dameron to you,” Poe warned as Kes and Karé approached, helping Snap walk. “Oh, and word of advice? When dealing with Doctor Kymeri, you must accept any drugs or shots she wants to give you without question or objection. She absolutely never drugs people when they annoy or disagree with her.”

Karé frowned, “Seriously, we need better doctors.”

“Or at least hold them accountable better,” Snap agreed.

“I won’t argue with that,” Evan joined them. “Come on, I want to see how Paige is doing… and if Crimson Dawn ended up kidnapping Rose. Lady Qi’ra was really impressed when Rose electrocuted that gangster.”

“Rose did what now?” Kaydel scowled.

“I’m sure your Council will discuss it later,” Poe patted her on the arm. He turned and called to Waroo, “Come on, Fuzzball. Let’s go!”

But Waroo was watching Kylo, whose eyes were yet to move from Poe.
Something was about to go very wrong.

Finn was watching Poe too. Truth be told, part of him wanted to go with the man. It was nice to have a friend with no strings attached – even his relationship with Marks was complicated some days. But Finn knew his fate, and FN-2187 only hoped that some day Poe might join the First Order on their heroic quest.

“Alright,” Poe double checked they had everyone, “let’s move out!”

The Resistance group started to hurry forward, then Kylo made a gesture that dropped FN-2187’s heart to his stomach.

“So what exactly are you saying?” Poe asked.

"I'm willing to offer a truce. A momentary truce. Once we have our people all accounted for, then things are back to normal. I can take you into custody and you can try to take us prisoner."

Seven _snap-hisses_ filled the room, and the Resistance was surrounded by the Knights of Ren. All five surviving members stood in a circle around the Resistance. Even Sasa, as she struggled to stay on her feet, had her saber ignited.

Tara and Wiln wielded two lightsabers each, using Berd and Doxl’s sabers. Tara had found Berd’s where Hena ended up stashing it, not wanting to hold onto a Sith lightsaber indefinitely, just while Berd was trying to kill people.

Hena regretted not holding onto it.

“You’re not going anywhere,” Kylo stalked forward, his lightsaber pointed straight at Poe.

But Poe just laughed, “Really, Solo? We’re doing this? After everything my people have done for you – Evan saving who knows how many of you, my father coming to the rescue, Waroo helping fix the communication lines, Karé having your back in the ballroom, Snap shooting Berd, Kaydel saving Sasa, Dacken giving medical aid-”

“Hey, you mentioned me in a positive light!” Dacken brightened.

“Shut up,” Poe said not even looking at Dacken. His eyes were locked on Kylo’s, “Seriously? After all of that, you’re really doing this? Instant face heel turn the second our truce ends and taking my group hostage?”

“Oh no, not your group,” Kylo turned his lightsaber toward Kaydel, “Just you and your girlfriend. The rest are free to go.”

As the others looked at each other in worry and confusion – Kes moving however subtly he could to protect Kaydel – Poe just stared at Kylo.

“…This is because I slammed your head into the wall, isn’t it?”
It wasn’t unusual for Aletha to return from a trip and be greeted with a smile and the call of Doctor Kymeri, thank goodness you’re back!

But when twenty-eight people did it before she had even thrown her luggage in her quarters, she knew something was up.

“Welcome back, Aletha,” Meredyth Kalonia smiled as the other doctor set her old Rebellion medic bag on her desk. “Good trip?”

“Very productive,” she powered up her computer. “Anything exciting happen while I was gone?”

“You missed Han Solo showing up and Tharel’s mother arriving on base, but other than that, not much.”

“I hope Shayna is settling in fine.” Aletha had met Evan’s mother a few times and thought her a nice woman. “Wonder how long it’ll take for her to find a placement?”

“Actually, she’s apparently going to live with Kes Dameron for a while.”

Aletha arched a brow.

“It’s a long story, but nothing romantic is going on.” Kalonia grinned, “Not that their sons believe it.”

“Do you believe it?” Aletha grinned, amused by the antics of Evan and Poe.

“I believe Kes and Shayna are going to have fun tormenting the boys about it.” Kalonia paused her typing, “Oh, sorry, just remembered, I should probably give you a head’s up. Half the base is plotting to kill Commander Nalto, so be on the look out.”

“Well, that explains a few things. General Organa off-loading his duties as damage control?”

“No, she’s taken the day off to get over the traumatic incident that happened yesterday. Let’s just say that Hot Shot is not going to have a good time when he returns to base.”

Aletha frowned but didn’t inquire further. She was fairly certain she’d hear the story eventually, if not from Evan than at least from the Resistance rumor mill. Gossip didn’t stay hidden in the Resistance for very long.

Instead Aletha turned her attention to the work waiting for her on her computer terminal. It was much of the same as usual, but there was one piece of business that made her frown.

“Have you seen this message from the Ninka?” Aletha asked.

“Oh, the personnel request from Holdo?” Kalonia replied. “Yeah, apparently one of her non-droid medical staff is pregnant and will being leaving in about six or seven months.”

“So, she’s demanding we send a non-droid medic to her for maternity leave coverage?”

“Not maternity leave coverage; the medic is bowing out of the Resistance entirely to raise her child. The position is permanent.”

“And we’re being ordered to send one of our people to her,” Aletha’s words were not remotely a query.

“Not ordered, but definitely strongly encouraged,” Kalonia grinned.
“The kind of encouragement she gives Poe and Kaydel to break up?”

“Oh, even worse than that.”

Aletha shuddered.

Kalonia’s comm beeped, and both women’s heads turned instinctively.

“Speak of the devil,” Kalonia muttered as HOLDO lit up her display. She flicked on her earpiece – doctors were always required to wear ear insert comms except while sleeping – and answered, “Doctor Kalonia.”

Aletha idly pecked at her keyboard, not really paying attention to her pile of work. Her eyes drifted over a message from Diego about his official declaration that RSVPs were too much of a headache for menu planning so screw it, they were going to have a buffet. Aletha made no secret of watching Kalonia receive Holdo’s message.

She didn’t like the look on Meredyth’s face.

“Oh huh,” Kalonia’s complexion had gone oddly pale. “Understood… Yes, Ma’am. Right away.”

“Well?” Aletha asked as Kalonia clicked off her comm and powered down her computer.

“We need to get a transport,” she rolled her chair back from her desk. Aletha was on her feet at the same time as Kalonia. “There’s been a bombing and we have soldiers injured. They’re not sure how long it will take to get them to us, so we’re going to head out to the Ninka. Commander Nalto is going to join us.”

Aletha was in action mode instantly, following Kalonia to prepare the supplies, “Situation bad enough to warrant the Second-in-Command of the Resistance?”

“Honestly, Leia might be using it as an excuse to get Nalto away from the stress of event planning.”

“You know, I told him to go small. He only has himself to blame for this stress,” Aletha grabbed her bag, happy she hadn’t unpacked the one left back in her and Diego’s room. “Any idea of the types of injuries?”

“Not much, but we do have a report of a lost limb,” Kalonia answered. “The Ninka is en route to intercept and treat, but the doctors they have on the Ninka can only do so much with amputation. You and I are the only ones with a lot of experience with treating lost limbs. Those injuries have quite fallen out of fashion in the past decade.”

“Thank goodness.”

Suddenly Kalonia grabbed Aletha’s arm.

“Doctor Kymeri,” she brought her to a halt. Kalonia paused and said softer, “Aletha… I should inform you of something, but first I want you to know that the only reported Resistance casualty of this is a woman you don’t know.”

“All of them are reportedly fine,” Kalonia assured her. “Little banged up – Tico is the worst with some shrapnel in the head and a broken leg – but nothing that won’t be quickly fixed. They’ll be fine.”
Aletha took a deep breath, “Yeah… I know. It’s just that whenever those kids get up to something, they always manage to find a way to make a bad situation… so much worse.”

(Excerpt from communication log between BB-8 and Poe Dameron.)

BB-8: Bep bree?

POE: What’s my dad like? He’s the toughest – and kindest – soldier I’ve ever known.

He made me into the man I am today.

- Poe Dameron’s Flight Log

“I said move,” Kylo Ren’s voice was cold, but Kes Dameron didn’t move a muscle.

“I’m not going anywhere,” Kes dug his heels in.

“Listen to him, Old Man,” Cern said, “things will only get worse if you don’t cooperate.”

“Dad,” Poe started in a calm voice. “It’s okay. I’ll handle this. You don’t need to do-

“Yes, I do,” Kes cut him off. “Poe, you are my child. It is literally in my job description to do this.”

“Alright, let me make this simple then,” Kylo said. “You obey the order to leave and I’ll go with the original plan of taking him prisoner in other words, not killing him. But if you refuse to leave, I’ll tell you exactly what I’m going to do. Not only will I kill your son in front of you while I hold you back with the Force, but I’m going to get every single one of my people here to open fire on him, film it, and leak that footage to the public just like how it went down when we murdered your wife. Only this time, we’ll be the ones who leak the footage. Oh! And how about we get Poe to recite his mother’s final words too? Heck, we could edit the footage and play the scenes side by side!”

The look on Kes Dameron’s face suggested that if Kylo didn’t have the Force, Kes would literally be ripping Ben apart with his own two hands.

Probably could do it too.

“So the choice is yours, Kes,” Kylo tried to pretend it didn’t feel weird to call the man ‘Kes’ instead of ‘Mister Dameron, Sir’ as he always did in his youth. “Continue being stubborn and your son dies.”

His face falling, Waroo turned sad eyes on Kylo and roared something mournful.

Waroo was wrong, Ben thought to himself; he did have to do this. The poor Wookiee was just misguided. Waroo always did have an unearned amount of faith in Ben, his Bond-Brother. Sins and all.

Ben Solo wondered if Chewbacca knew that Waroo sent a message to the First Order every month asking Ben to come home and offering forgiveness. There had even been the occasional crude plan of Waroo plotting to hide away Ben, and the two of them finding a ship and going on adventures like their fathers.

There was a time Ben would have admitted the thought tempted him.

“Kylo!” Sasa suddenly cried out, knees buckling under her as she clutched at her abdomen.

His head jerked to the side at the cry and he was on his knees next to her in an instant. Out of the corner of his eye, Kylo could have sworn he saw Evan move to join them but Karé yanked him back.

Poe seriously considered having the group make a break for it with the distraction, but that felt like he was playing dirty… plus there were still five lightsabers and a blaster – Finn was forced to also hold them hostage – pointed at them.

“I got you,” Kylo whispered, as he grasped her lightsaber and switched it off. He then gently wrapped his arms around her as he desperately fought the urge to kiss away all those tears. This scene was really not good for his image, but he honestly didn’t care. “I got you.”

“The baby…” Sasa gave a soft moan. “I’m so sorry.”

“It’s not your fault. Don’t cry. It’ll be okay.”

Waroo gave a very soft growl, the translation of which Kylo was glad no one else could understand.

The words made Kylo looked up, and when he did he found the eyes of everyone on him. The eyes of Kes Dameron and Timor Connix on him: pitying him.

How dare they pity him?

Without a word of warning, Kylo shot to his feet, lifting Sasa into a bridal hold. Sasa let out a slight yelp, arms locking around his neck automatically as she struggled not to fall to the ground. Eventually settled, she squirmed in his hold, and Kylo felt her Signature probing against his as she sensed his inner turmoil.

“Why are you doing this?” Kes asked.

“Why am I doing this?” Kylo echoed. “I’m doing this because of you.”

“Me?”

“You and Timor Connix,” Kylo nodded to the latter. “Look at the pair of you, standing there like you’re innocent of this disaster.”

Kes raised an eyebrow, “Oh, I’m very interested in this logic. Tell me how I’m responsible.”

“Master Ren,” Timor Connix gently tried to interject, “I assure you I had nothing to do with any of this.”

“Exactly,” Kylo shot. “You did nothing. You were supposed to protect us, provide security, and all of that literally went up in flames. You should have done due diligence and prevented this from ever happening!”

“Please, Master Ren, my daughter Katha was the one in charge of-”

“No! This is not her fault, this is yours! You didn’t provide proper security! You didn’t screen your guest list! You put in the Holo of Kaydel that set off this confrontation! You didn’t even recognize your own daughter! This is your fault, and now you will be punished.” Kylo turned to Kes, “And as for you…”

Kes crossed his arms, “Go on.”

“This is also your fault,” Kes seethed. “You knew about this bombing and you didn’t warn anyone about it. No, you decided to be a hero and now I have to pay the price. My child died because you didn’t make one comm call… No wonder you’re friends with Luke Skywalker.”

Poe’s jaw dropped. He and Karé could barely grab Kes before he lurched forward to attack Kylo. Thankfully Waroo deigned to assist, and a great big furry paw wrenched Kes back from Ben.

“Come on, Dad,” Poe urged. “It’s not worth it.”

“Fine,” Kes grumbled, stopping fighting Waroo, but the Wookiee did not yet release him.

“You made a mistake, Kes Dameron,” Kylo continued. “Because of your negligence, I have lost my child. I figure it’s only fair that you get to lose yours.”

Kylo looked to Timor.

“Both of you,” Kylo growled.

Kes’ eyes narrowed.

“Now, for the last time,” Kylo said, “everybody but Poe and Kaydel are free to leave… and I strongly recommend that you do so.”

“Dad, please,” Poe begged. “Get everyone out of here. Kay and I will figure this out.”

“Listen to your son, Kes,” Kylo smirked.

Kes shook his head, “You like that, don’t you? Standing there pretending to be strong.”

[Ben, please.] Waroo begged. [Don’t do this. Just come home with us. We’ll forgive you, and we’ll protect your mate.]

Kylo’s arms shifted into a tighter hold on Sasa. She was his lifeline, tethering him to the reality of the situation and maintaining control of it. He couldn’t get lost in fantasies of outsmarting gangsters with a Wookiee at his side. What was important now – maybe even the most important thing in the galaxy to him – was serving his magnanimous mentor, Supreme Leader Snoke.

Or maybe it was the woman who was far too kind and loving for her position in the Galaxy, that was bleeding in his arms, losing their baby because Kes Dameron couldn’t be bothered to make a damn comm call.

“You’re wasting time, Dameron,” Kylo felt more comfortable with that name for Kes. “Not only are you risking your son, but you’re risking the rest of your people as well. One of your men has lost a leg. He needs proper medical treatment and you’re holding him back.”

It was a cheap move, Kylo was willing to concede, but he had to do something to get everyone moving. He felt the weight of Sasa in his arms like a responsibility. This wasn’t just about getting rid of people inconsequential and a waste of time and resources to him. He needed to get Sasa out of there as quickly as possible.
“Dad, please,” Poe interjected. “Snap needs help. Paige needs help. Karé needs help with her leg. You need to get the others out of here. I’ll be fine. Kay and I will find a way out. Please, just trust me.”

Kes sighed, “How can I do that? How can I just let you go?”

“Because I’m thirty-years-old, Dad. I think by now I’ve figured out how to take care of myself.” Poe glanced at Kaydel, “And because I love Kaydel. I won’t let anything happen to her, and she won’t let anything happen to me.”

Kaydel smiled and grabbed his hand, squeezing tight.

Her eyes flicked to the side and they found Sasa’s for a moment. Sasa’s were so filled with shame that they lowered but a second later.

Kes sighed and admitted defeat. He pulled Poe into a great big bear hug and held him for what felt like an eternity.

“Promise me you won’t die,” Kes whispered when he gathered the courage to let go, but didn’t do it quite yet.

Poe grinned, “Keep the ship running. We won’t be long.”

Kes released him and patted Poe on the shoulder. He turned to Kaydel and pulled her into a hug as well.

While Kes did that, Poe’s eyes were on Timor, “Aren’t you going to say anything?”

“About what?” Timor asked.

Poe rolled his eyes, “The First Order is about to take your daughter hostage. Considering the things I’ve heard about her aunt and what she wants to do to Kaydel, I would think you’d be worried.”

“My daughter has made her own choices and now will face the consequences for picking the wrong ones.”

Poe glared at him, “Kay, can I punch your father?”

“Now’s not the time, Poe,” Kaydel answered.

“…So, later?”

“Yeah, if you get the chance.”

Timor scowled at his daughter, “This is why you got written out of the will.”

“Eh,” Kaydel shrugged, “Aunt Aletha wrote me into hers. Not much of a payout, but I certainly want it more than anything you could offer me… though I do have to split it three ways with a Vrogem and a girl on Jakku.”

“Waroo, could you just carry Snap?” Karé asked as they started to struggle forward. “I don’t know if I could do this all the way to the ship.”

The Wookiee roared and scooped up Snap.
“Wow, being carried in the arms of a Wookiee,” Snap said to Karé who followed at Waroo’s side. “This is literally a childhood dream of mine come true.”

“I know, Babe,” Karé smiled. “You’re welcome.”

“Dacken!” Timor frowned as his grandson started heading forward with Hena and Ryn. “Where are you going?”

“Sorry, Granddad, but we got to have at least one Rebel every generation. Just call me Aletha Ko Tokani.”

Timo looked genuinely confused.

“Never mind,” Dacken waved off the name.

And he literally ran away, Hena following on his heels.

One by one, each member of the Resistance headed out the lobby until just Poe, Kaydel, and Kes remained. Kes Dameron still had one final thing to say to Kylo Ren.

Kes Dameron walked right up to Kylo so there was only a step between them, “I don’t care who your parents are. If something happens to my son, I will come after you.”

Kylo took a step closer, “And if you really loved him so much, you would have warned your child what was about to happen with this bombing… and I wouldn’t be losing mine.”

Kes clenched his jaw and took a step back, “I’ll leave the ship running, Poe… This shouldn’t take long.”

And with that, Kes Dameron left behind his son.

“Alright,” Kylo looked to Poe. “Let’s get down to business.”

“Sure,” Poe gave a fake smile. “So, who talks first? You talk first? I talk first? Because if I talk first I’m going to call you a dick, and then swear at you in Yavinese while I rant about telling your mother about this and what she’ll do to you when she finds out.”

Kylo sucker punched Poe across the face, sending him to the floor.

“Son of a bitch,” Poe clutched his nose as blood poured out of it. That damned Grandson of a Sith probably had broken it.

“Poe!” Kaydel moved to rush forward, but Tara grabbed her, yanked her back, and held her lightsaber a dangerous distance from Kaydel’s throat.

“Let her go,” Poe lurched forward, but before he could get to his feet Cern’s lightsaber pinned him back to the floor.

“You feel that heat?” Tara whispered that well practiced speech. “You feel that burning your skin? See how close this blade is to your throat? Isn’t it so simple? How little effort it would take from me to end your life right now. Twitch but an inch, you’re dead without even a drop of blood spilt.”

“Tara, enough,” Kylo ordered. “Let her go, but don’t let her get away from us.”

She scowled, “But Kylo-”
“Let her go.”

“You’re being ridiculous!” Tara exclaimed. “She’s our hostage, we need to treat her as such! Kylo, as your second-in-command I must insist that we make an example of this pair. Let me kill her right here, right now.”

“You get away from her!” Poe roared. He noticed out of the corner of his eye that Timor Connix was still watching, “Really? You’re seriously not going to do anything? They’re about to murder your daughter, and not even a tear?”

Timor just shrugged.

“Damn, Babe, your family is so messed up,” Poe rolled his eyes. “I’m genuinely surprised no member of it has hooked up with a Skywalker.”

---

That Same Moment On Jakku

“No. Our two families uniting is a nightmare.” Luke shifted his food from one side of the plate to the other. “Miss her like crazy, though.”

“You and me both, Pal,” Quom smiled. “…So is the corporeal ghost of your dead friend Alyla still sitting next to you?”

“Yes,” Luke glanced at Alyla Kene sitting next to him, Quom unable to see her due to not being Force Sensitive. “Look, not that I haven’t appreciated a whole week long visit, but am I going to get any answers from you any time soon?”

“Probably not,” Alyla shrugged. “Honestly, I’m just avoiding Ben until this whole Nixrye nonsense is over.”

“Nixrye nonsense?”

“Oh, you don’t want to know. I had to lie to Ben and say I was going to be with my son just to get away from that disaster.”

“Any chance you’ll at least tell me who your son is, how you got him, or even who the father is?”

“Trust me, Luke,” Alyla replied. “You wouldn’t believe me if I told you.”

Luke let the silence last for a minute as he wracked his brain once more for some sort of answers to Alyla’s mysteries.

Quom looked between Luke and the spot he assumed Alyla was sitting (though Quom was looking at Luke’s left side and Alyla was actually sitting on the right.)

“You guys do know I can only hear one side of this conversation, right?”

“Tara for the last time, let the Connix girl go,” Kylo ordered.

“No, Kylo,” Tara yanked Kaydel back against her. She could see the deadly look Poe Dameron was giving her. “You chose me to be your right hand so that I would keep your ass in line, and therefore I am giving you a second opinion. Now heed it!”

“I will not heed it!” Kylo snapped. “You are my second opinion, but I have the final word! Now be quiet and let her go or I will strip you of that rank! Am I understood?”

Tara fell silent, startled by his lashing out. He had never done something like that so publicly before. Frankly, it threw off her game.

“I, uh… Master Kylo,” she stumbled when she found her voice.

“And on that note.” He took a step closer, close enough to impose on her personal space… which was frankly very awkward for Sasa still cradled in his arms. “Considering the devastation around us, I would second guess your judgement right now, Tara.”

“Kylo-”

“Don’t you dare think I buy that I had a vision bullshit for a second,” Kylo growled. “You’re lucky I’m not running my lightsaber through you right now.”

Tara’s eyes flicked to Sasa. She hated the smug look on the copper-haired whore’s face, but she knew a way to wipe it right off the bitch’s lips.

“Trust me, Master Kylo,” Tara smirked, her eyes locking with Sasa’s, “I know have vigorously you can thrust your lightsaber into me. In fact, didn’t you do it right before you went to meet with Sasa when you set off on this trip.”

Oh, Kylo didn’t need the Force to sense how pissed off that revelation made Sasa; the way her nails pierced his arm made that loud and clear.

Furious at Tara’s taunt, Kylo genuinely had the thought to slap Tara. If it wouldn’t compromise his image in front of the other Knights as well as Kaydel and Poe, he might have.

Plus, he was still holding Sasa, so if he tried, he would probably drop her. He then noticed the downright terrifying look Sasa had fixed on Tara, and Kylo decided to set Sasa back down on the ground. If there was going to be another catfight between those two, he wanted to be out of eye gouging range.

“I would choose your actions very carefully, Tara,” Kylo threatened, unhooking his lightsaber from his belt as he rose back to his feet. “I am the one who gets to call the shots here, and my decision is that we’re not going to blindly murder these two. So, if you have a problem with that, then I’m more than happy to replace three Knights of Ren rather than two.”

That shut Tara right up, but her eyes burned into him as she shoved Kaydel forward.

“No… Cern,” Kylo turned around to face Poe, “back off of this one too.”

Cern Ren knew there was a time and place to disobey, but this sure as hell wasn’t it.

“So, Dameron,” Kylo folded his hands behind his back, “back to business.”
“Gonna sucker punch me again?” Poe slowly got to his feet. He glanced at Kaydel, and when he saw she was safe, yanked her against him. They would literally have to pry his cold, dead hands off her to get to Kaydel. “You know that was a cheap shot and I’m fully capable of kicking your ass.”

Kylo laughed, “Dameron, do you not understand that I can literally kill you with a thought?”

“That doesn’t make you better than me.”

“No, you’re right,” Kylo agreed. “It’s actions that makes someone better than another person.”

“A truly good person doesn’t keep a scoreboard of who they’re better than,” Kaydel said coldly.

“But how about we look at the scoreboard?” Kylo smirked. “Let’s compare how Dameron behaved during the truce and how you did. Now, we agreed to truce; no one hurts the other and we work together until our groups are all reunited. I look at you Connix, and what do I see?”

“Your mother’s Mini-Me?” Poe shot.

“No, I-” Kylo paused and took a good look at Kaydel. “Huh… you really do look like her. Go figure.”

Poe rolled his eyes.

“But what I was saying,” Kylo refocused, “was that this woman does appear to be a good person. She upheld the truce excellent, defending and aiding my people. Frankly, I owe you, Sasa’s life, and I thank you for it.”

“Oh,” Kaydel blinked. “Uh… you’re welcome.”

“Now as for Dameron…” Kylo turned to the aforementioned.

Poe grinned like he wanted Kylo to give him his best shot.

“You attacked me multiple times,” said Kylo. “You attacked Wiln, you tried to shoot Marks-”

“Hey! That was an accident!”

“You put nonsense in the head of FN-2187, you stole my lightsaber-”

“That was before the truce!”

“You stole his lightsaber?” Kaydel sounded impressed.

“Yeah, I fought him with it,” Poe grinned. “It was so cool… and I bet the image would turn you on.”

“Can we not, right now?” Wiln asked.

Kylo continued, “And worst of all, Dameron, you attacked your own people.”

“Dacken literally only just became one of my people,” Poe objected. “Besides, he set my girlfriend’s hair on fire. If you can almost murder your own second-in-command for trying to murder your girlfriend, I can punch a guy who isn’t on my side for trying to kill mine.”

“Sasa’s not my girlfriend,” Kylo automatically objected.

“Are you fucking kidding me?” Sasa muttered to herself. “I am literally miscarrying your child, and you’re pulling that juvenile nonsense? Unbelievable.”

FN-2187 – who was standing close and was the only one to hear – bent down and patted her on the shoulder.

“Poe,” Kaydel fixed him with a stare. “Didn’t we have an agreement? I didn’t want you telling people about the burning hair thing?”

“Ah, shit. Sorry, Babe.”

Kaydel shook her head.

“What I’m trying to say is that this woman right here appears to be genuinely good person,” Kylo said. “So, I’m going to make you an offer.”

“I’m not joining the First Order,” Kaydel shot.

“Oh, no, I’ve heard Alecta Anthea’s intentions for you, it’s quite gruesome and I don’t imagine you would survive in the First Order for very long. No, my offer is about the freedom of you and your little boyfriend.”

Kaydel arched an eyebrow. While intrigued by the mysterious offer, she wanted to wield as much power in this situation as possible. So, in order to get one over on the First Order and Ben Solo, Kaydel smirked and said something Kylo Ren really didn’t want to hear… nor did her father.

“Trust me, Solo,” Kaydel said, “there is nothing small about Poe. And judging from the scene we overheard on your balcony, he can use it a hell of a lot better than you can use yours. He makes sure I don’t have to fake anything. You can’t make the same promise to Sasa.”

“Hey!” Sasa exclaimed.

Poe snorted.

“Balcony?” Tara said slowly.

Kylo was very aware of FN-2187, Cern, Wiln, and Tara’s taken aback eyes on him.

“I didn’t fake anything!” Sasa objected. “He’s good; really good. I mean, Tara can probably also vouch for-”

Poe lost it.

“Sasa, please,” Kylo begged as Poe howled with laughter, “just… stop.”

Poe absolutely could not stop laughing… until Kylo pointed his lightsaber to Poe’s neck. Then Poe shut right the hell up.

“If we could get back on track,” Kylo lowered his lightsaber, “let’s get to the deal. Kaydel, if we take you back to our ship, Alecta Anthea will torture you for a very long time and then give you a very painful and drawn out death. Dameron, if we take you back to our ship, I will torture you for a very long time and then give you a very painful and drawn out death. Either way, no one here is in for a lot of fun in the First Order.”

“You don’t have to tell me twice,” Sasa muttered.
Tara’s glare shut her up.

“So what’s the offer?” Poe shot. “You going to be merciful and kill us both right here?”

“As much as I would enjoy seeing you watch us murder the woman you love, that’s not what’s going to happen here today,” Kylo said.

Poe was taken aback, “That’s… That’s not?”

“No.”

“Why?”

“Poe!” Kaydel elbowed him in the ribs.

“Like I said before, I owe Kaydel for saving Sasa’s life,” Kylo said. “And I will reply that debt here and now. Instead of taking you both prisoner, I’m only going to take one… and you pick which one.”

“What?” Kaydel blurted out.

“Excuse me?” Poe asked.

“Kaydel Ko Connix, you get to make a decision that is truly the stuff of an epic romance,” Kylo taunted. “One of you gets to walk out of here unharmed. We’ll let you walk straight to your ship, get on, and go home without chance. The other will be taken into custody, and, well, let’s not beat around the bush, they will be tortured and murdered. I will be nice and send home the body this time. No trash compactors. Knight’s promise.”

“You are a sick bastard,” Poe glared at him. “Kaydel, you go. I’ll figure out a plan to escape.”

“No argument. She’s going.”

“No, no,” Kylo shook his head. “It’s not your choice, it’s hers. So what’s it going to be, Kaydel?” Kaydel sputtered, “But- I- Wh- How- What am I supposed to do?”

“Walk out the door and go with our friends,” Poe said. “I’ll be fine.”

“No, I won’t! Poe, I’m not going to let them torture and murder you!”

“Don’t worry, they won’t.”

“Yeah, we will,” Cern said.

“We’ll film it too,” Tara promised.

“So what’s it going to be?” Kylo asked. “Are you going to save your skin from the terror of Alecta Anthea and condemn the man you love to death, or are you literally willing to die for him?”

Kaydel couldn’t stop trembling, her eyes burning as she glowered at Ben Solo.

“How dare you ask that of me?” Kaydel growled. “After what I did for Sasa-”

“And I’m being generous, allowing you to be rewarded with either the life of yourself or the man you love going unharmed.”
“Living without Poe or making him live with my death on his conscious is far crueler than just killing us both.”

“And if those are the options on the table,” Poe grabbed Kaydel’s hand. “Then so be it.”

She stood strong with him, “We’re willing to die together if it means we don’t have to live apart.”

Sasa’s eyes slipped shut. Her stomach churned at the cruelty before her. If Kaydel felt for Poe the way Sasa felt for Kylo… Sasa didn’t know what she would do in their situation.

But she couldn’t shake the feeling that Kylo wouldn’t stand there and agree to die together.

“No,” Kylo growled. “That is not an option.”

“Neither of us will abandon the other,” Poe said.

“I’m not leaving without him,” Kaydel vowed.

Kylo had a look on his face that when his mother got it, Poe and Kaydel knew to run and duck.

“You both dying is not an option!” Kylo roared. He had reached his limit of Poe fucking Dameron. “So you Connix, pick, or I swear on the mangled, torture body of Felicity Rhiaon, who I shot in the head and threw down a trash compactor that I will torture and murder Poe here in front of you, and then drag you out of here by the hair, throw you on your damn ship, and then send every single resource the First Order has to D’Qar to burn it to the ground. I will make the Bombing of Faclov, the Destruction of Alderaan, and the Burning of Rornian look like child’s play. Do not test me.”

“You’re a monster,” Kaydel whispered.

Poe clutched her hand so tightly that he appeared to be close to breaking it.

“Call me what you want, but that won’t change a thing,” Kylo said. “My child is dead, and I am not playing around. So, I suggest you stop challenging me and do what I say. Walk out a free woman and lose the man you love or die for that love. The choice is yours, Kaydel… You have five minutes to decide.”

If things go really wrong on the other hand, we have to scuttle and ditch.

- The Journal of Paige Tico

“Come on! Come on!” Han urged everyone towards the transport as he saw Kes’ group running towards them. “Let’s get out of here.”

Person after person whizzed past him up the ramp, but Han scowled as he took inventory of the passengers. He grabbed Kes suddenly by the arm, stopping him and nearly making Dacken fall off the loading ramp.

“What’s going on?” Han asked. “Where’s Poe?”

“What’s going on,” Kes replied, “is that your son is being a petty dick.”
Han blinked, “So… nothing new then?”

Kes rolled his eyes, “He’s doing this whole petty, dickish taking prisoner situation with Poe and Kaydel. I tried to rescue them, but he refuses to let them go.”

Han groaned. He had half a mind to storm into that lobby, take his son by the ear, and drag to the transport and his mother. But as ecstatic as it would make Leia, Han was fairly certain that would end with him probably getting a lightsaber through the chest.

“Hey, _pst_, Tharel!”

Evan stopped as he was halfway up the loading ramp. He frowned as he saw Marks hiding in the trees, motioning for him to come over.

He hesitated before deciding it wouldn’t hurt. So far Marks hadn’t given Evan a reason _not_ to trust him.

Looking for an excuse to backtrack, Evan grabbed Kes’ bag, which he had set on the ground while arguing with Han. Certain that Kes wasn’t watching, Evan chucked it over towards Marks.

“Oh no,” Evan called out a little too loudly. “You dropped your bag, Lieutenant Dameron. Here, I’ll get it.”

He raced over to Marks.

“I heard what the Knights of Ren did to your people,” Marks said. “I wanted to apologize and try to make it up to you.”

“Marks, I don’t think there’s anything you can do to make this up to me.”

He held up a small medical bag, “What about give you a bunch of advanced medical supplies that should tide your people’s injuries over until you reach your medical ship.”

“Yeah, that’ll do it,” Evan snatched the bag and tossed it in Kes’, not realizing the zipper on the First Order bag was undone. “Nice seeing you again, Marks.”

“Hey, wait,” Marks caught his arm. “I just wanted to ask… that punching me in the face over Paige’s sister… does that still stand?”

Evan narrowed his eyes, “I’m going to walk away and pretend I didn’t hear that.”

“Good plan.”

“Kes, for the last time we can’t stay,” Han argued as Evan Tharel zipped past him, carrying Kes’ bag.

“Please, Han, just a few more minutes,” Kes begged. “We have to give Poe a chance. I mean, that’s why we came here in the first place. Please… what if it was Ben we were talking about?”

Han sighed. He really hated when people played the Ben card because honestly, he never really knew anymore how he would deal with his son.

“Chewie,” Han looked up at the Wookiee, “do you think I should-”
“I know, Pal, but-”

“Fair point, but this is Ben we’re talking about. When he takes people hostage-”

Alright, you win.” Han looked to Kes, “You think your boy can take care of himself?”

“He’s gotten out of worse scraps before,” Kes smirked.

“Fine, we’ll give them thirty minutes,” Han said. “But if they’re not here by then, we leave without them. Deal?”

“Deal.”

“Kay, go.”

“For the last time, Poe, I’m not going anywhere. You go.”

“I’m not going to let your aunt have you.”

“And I’m not going to let Kylo have you.”

“Enough, Kay. It’s been decided.”

“You’re right, it has,” Kaydel crossed her arms. “You’re the one going.”

“I’m not leaving,” Poe stubborn refused.

“I’m not going either.”

“This isn’t up for discussion.”

“No, it isn’t. The choice was put to me, Poe. I get the final say.”

“They will kill you, Kaydel. All I’ve got on my plate is torture… probably. I’m fairly certain I can avoid the actual murder, and come on, what has a little torture ever really done to a person?”

“I won’t let them do that to you!”

“Suggestion,” Tara cut in. “How about we just torture and kill them both?”

“I second that motion,” Cern held up his hand.

“No,” Kylo smirked, “this is so much worse, making them choose their own safety or their lovers, having to live with the fact that one of them must die without the other. Knowing that the one they love is in agony and it was all their-”

A hand grasped his wrist.
He turned in shock to look upon Sasa. She was struggling to stand as Poe and Kaydel resumed their argument. She looked so pale and broken, her beautiful dress stained with the blood of their baby. Her eyes were soft and pleading, those forest green pools enveloping him as her Cerise Signature reached for his Forest Green Signature.

“Oh no, Sasa, please don’t do this,” Kylo whispered.

But what passed through them said it all.

“Damn it,” he winced.

Maybe it was the knowledge that Kaydel had risked her life to save Sasa’s. Maybe it was some vague attachment he had held to the childhood friendship he and Poe once had shared.

Maybe it was remembering how Uncle Luke had literally tried to murder him when he had taken Felicity from Luke the way he was trying to separate Poe and Kaydel.

Maybe it was the friendship Kaydel had shown Kylo and Sasa during her undercover mission. Maybe it was the kindness of Evan Tharel and his treatment of Sasa.

Maybe it was the respect he had for that momentary truce. Maybe it was because his mother cared about Poe and Kaydel.

Maybe it was because Sasa was miscarrying the baby they had tried so hard for. Heck, maybe it was just because it would piss off Tara.

…Or maybe it was simply because Sasa asked it of him.

Whatever the reason, Ben Solo found himself uttering the words, “You both can go.”

Everyone just stared at him.

“I’m sorry, what?” Poe asked.

Kylo huffed, “I’ve changed my mind. I’m not going to fully spare one of you, I’m going to give myself the chance to kill both of you.”

Poe blinked, “…Okay.”

Kylo sighed, “Two minutes. You will get a two minute head start to run to whatever piece of garbage your friends managed to fly here in. If you reach there, you may go, but if we catch you… whoever we catch we keep.”

“Master Kylo,” Wiln started hesitantly.

“Silence!” Kylo cut him off. “The choice is made.”

Poe and Kaydel didn’t quite know what to say. This wasn’t how they expected things to turn out. Then Kaydel caught Sasa’s teary eyes from across the room. She really was thankful to Kaydel.

And even more importantly, Ben Solo really did love her.

Kaydel had made a promise to give Leia Organa a good word on Sasa, and truly Kaydel could. Though she wasn’t looking forward to even having that conversation, especially now that it would involve her telling General Organa that her grandchild no one even knew she was going to have, had been miscarried.

Maybe she’d pass that bit to Evan.

“So, you’re really going to let us go?” Poe asked. “Kay and I… can make a run for it?”

“I won’t stop you,” Kylo replied.

“Yeah, but someone else might. How do we know we’ll get out safely?”

Kylo sighed and his eyes drifted among his people; they set on one man in particular. It was risky, but it might be the only way to demonstrate to Poe that he meant the truth.

“FN-2187,” Kylo ordered. “You will accompany them and stop anyone from harming them. Once you’ve brought them to their ship, you will return to our ship. We will use my ship docked in the resort garage, assuming it hasn’t been harmed by the bombing.”

“It went untouched,” Wiln reported, his trio having sought out the dangerous areas before entering the building, preventing putting themselves in further harm’s way.

“Do you understand?”

“Yes, sir,” FN-2187 saluted. He turned to Poe, “Should we… go now?”

Kylo hated just how gleeful Dameron looked at having FN-2187 go with them. Oh, Poe was so going to try to steal FN-2187 to the Resistance; Kylo would put money on it.

“Come on, Babe,” Poe grabbed Kaydel’s arm. “Let’s go.”

“No, wait!” Tara yelled.

It was too late; Kaydel, Poe, and Finn raced out of the lobby. No one noticed – nor would they care – that Timor winced and stared after Kaydel longingly as she ran off without a second thought for him. It was a shame; if only she would stop this Resistance nonsense.

But Tara… Tara was pissed.

“You,” she growled, turning to face Kylo.

Wiln glowered as he watched her and rested his hand on his saber hilt. Cern noticed, caught Tara’s eye, and then nodded at Wiln. She saw what was going on but couldn’t focus on that at the moment. Kylo and his little whore were the problem.

“I don’t believe this,” Tara advanced on him. “You let them both go? How dare you!”

“It was my choice to make,” Kylo dismissed.

“And it was the choice of a coward!” Tara roared. “That display… what just happen… That was pathetic!”

“Stand down, Tara.”

“No, I won’t. How dare you stand there and pretend to be so all mighty leader. That was a show of weakness, one I have fought so hard for you to never display to the Resistance. So Sasa got hurt, so what? I have been the one who has worked for years to model you into the fearsome Master of Ren you rightfully are. I have pushed you and worked you and made you what you are! And with one bat of the eyelashes, that literally good for nothing whore destroyed your imag-"

He hit her. Plain and simply, Kylo Ren slapped Tara.

No one dared to make a move as they watched the scene in utter shock.

“You’re right,” Kylo said coldly, “you did make me what I am. You taught me that there’s really only two ways for me to work through my anger: fighting and fucking. Considering that I’m very much not in a position to do the later, I highly suggest you back off.”

Tara took a step back.

“Do not think you are secure in your position.” Kylo glared at all his Knights of Ren, “Any of you. You all can be replaced in a heartbeat. Yes, everyone. Tara, Cern, Wiln, hell even Sasa.”

Sasa winced.

“I do not replace any of you because I have faith and confidence in you,” he said. “I want every member of this team standing in front of me. I think we’ve forgotten that fact: this is a team, not a competition. You each have your own role, your own duties, your own place. There is no hierarchy to clamor over. I am the Master, you are the Knights. End of story. And if any of you have a problem with that, I am more than willing to clean house.”

His eyes lingered on Cern for a moment.

“Now,” Kylo said a little less intensely, “we’re going to reset. When the two empty spots are filled, we will be the New Knights of Ren. We will work as a team and follow my orders without our own singular motivations to cloud that duty. If I have to wear my mask in front of you all just to emphasize my superiority, then I will. And if any of you have a problem with working as a team with any other member of this Knighthood… I’m more than happy to make it be three spots to fill. Am I understood?”

“Yes, Master,” Tara, Wiln, Cern, and Sasa answered in perfect unison.

“Good,” he looked around at all of them. “Just so you all know, when we return to the Finalizer, it will not be to stay long. I will arrange an audience with the Supreme Leader so we may answer for the events of this disaster in person.”

Kylo eyed Tara.

“So everyone’s answers better be good,” Kylo seethed. “Am I understood?”

“Yes, Master,” Tara, Wiln, Cern, and Sasa answered in perfect unison.

“Now, Cern,” he turned to the silver-haired Knight. “You said you tracked down a member of Crimson Dawn?”

“I’ve got a few Stormtroopers holding her hostage,” Cern replied. He was not silver-haired as in old – the man was in his mid-thirties – but rather he had hair literally the colour of silver. It shone in the sunlight if you looked at him at the right angle. “She’s one of Lady Qi’ra’s nearest and dearest, though not so much after a run-in with the Resistance midget. Honestly I don’t know how valuable my catch will be. She doesn’t seem to be the best at putting up a fight, sort of gimped by an old leg injury. I think Qi’ra Ores holds her so dear because of a sense of kinship.”

“Then bring her to Captain Anthea. If anyone could make a scene out of an execution… it’s going to be her. Does anyone else have any business?”

“Sir?” Wiln stepped forward. “What about Berd and Doxl?”

“You and Tara will bring them with us,” Kylo replied. “They’re not going to get away with this easily. I fully intend on making an example of them.”

“Yes, Sir,” Wiln nodded. He and Tara immediately went to collect the pair while Cern departed from the group.

“Kylo,” Sasa moaned, she had been reclining all of her weight against him. Kylo was genuinely surprised she hadn’t collapsed to the ground. “What about us? What are we to do now?”

Sasa’s movements were very slow as she obeyed. Just when she had the bag securely on her shoulder, she yelped as Kylo picked her up bridal style again.

“And I’m going to take you somewhere safe,” he kissed her forehead. “I promise you, no one – not even Tara – is going to touch you while I’ve got you.”

She nuzzled her face against his neck and whispered in his ear, “I love you.”

He buried his face into her hair and exhaled strongly, “I know.”

Tara glowered as Kylo tenderly carried Sasa out of the lobby, she and Wiln awkwardly hauling out Berd and Doxl.

Cern and Hux were never going to let her live this plan down.

Reaching outside, Finn, Poe, and Kaydel were just about home free when Kaydel suddenly yelped. Before Poe could realize what was going on, Kaydel yanked him behind a cluster of trees. They weren’t very large trees, and if you were staring at them, no doubt would you see the petite blonde clutching onto her boyfriend.

It wasn’t the action of someone thinking their plan through, rather one of someone desperate and terrified. Kaydel was indeed terrified, literally shaking as she held Poe in front of her, using him as an honest-to-the-Goddesses human shield. Her skin was pale as a sheet, and she fought not to burst into sobs.

“Don’t let me go,” she begged Poe. “Don’t let her take me.”

“I won’t. I won’t,” Poe was confounded. “I promise, I won’t.”

Poe had never seen her so terrified… which was saying a lot considering he had had that thought at least twice already that day.

“Please… please don’t let her see me,” Kaydel held Poe like her lifeline sticking him awkwardly in the low hanging branches so they poked him in multiple uncomfortable places.

“Let who see you?” Poe glanced at Finn as if that would somehow explain things. “Babe, what’s going on?”
Kaydel’s breathing was ragged, “It’s her.”

“Who?”

“Her,” she flung out her arm to point behind him.

In unified confusion, Poe and Finn turned to see what had so frightened Kaydel.Exiting from a newly landed transport was a tall, somewhat familiar blonde woman, leading a few dozen Stormtroopers down the ramp.

A tall, somewhat familiar blonde woman who did not look unlike Aletha Kymeri.

“Who is that?” Finn asked.

“That,” Poe couldn’t take his eyes away from the woman, “I believe is Alecta Anthea.”

Kaydel clutched him tighter.

“Oh,” Finn nodded. “…Who’s Alecta Anthea?”

_BWAH BWOH!_

A sleek and squarish, black BB unit came rolling down the transport ramp and settled at Alecta’s feet.

“Oh dang…” Finn’s eyes widened at the sight of BB-9E. He knew who owned that droid, “That’s your aunt? Tara wasn’t kidding about Timor Connix getting his ass kicked for all this. She’s going to actually murder him.”

“Or murder me,” Kaydel whimpered as Poe pulled her in closer.

“She’s not going to get you, Babe,” he vowed. Poe held her so tight it was like he was trying to absorb her into his own body. It would take the strength of all the Gods of all the worlds combined to tear Kaydel Ko Connix out of his arms. Ben Solo had almost taken her from him that day, Alecta would not finish Ben’s work. “Everyone just stay quiet and still.”

“But why?” Finn asked.

“She’s vowed to kill me,” Kaydel answered.

Finn’s heart fell. He had seen the murders Alecta Anthea liked to commit, he wasn’t going to let that happen to the woman who saved Sasa. He owed her for saving the woman he loved, even though he knew Sasa would never return those feelings.

They stood there in silence for what felt like an entirety. Alecta spoke to the various troop leaders and directed medic teams. Frequently she spoke in a comm – probably directing other troops – and there were a ton of people going to and from her ship.

Poe’s eyes never moved from her.

BB-9E stayed her faithful assistant at her feet. He frequently electrocuted Stormtroopers who dropped their shoulders into a relaxed pose for even a second. One man sneezed, and his screams of pain carried probably all the way to D’Qar.

Odd. Poe frowned at the droid, remembering Nalto’s debriefing on his maiming. What was BB-8’s evil twin doing with Phasma?
“I don’t think they’ll be there for much longer,” Finn had taken up a protective position in the trees in front of Poe and Kaydel. If anyone looked over at them, it would be him they spotted first, giving Poe and Kaydel the chance to run. “We’ve been hiding here for about ten minutes. I’m certain that Master Kylo will be calling for her soon.”

“We have to get out of here, Poe,” Kaydel said.

Poe held her tighter, “No, if we go now, she’ll find you and I won’t let her have you.”

“She’ll kill you if she finds you with me.”

“I don’t care. I almost lost you too many times today, if someone is going after you, they’ll have to get through me first.”

“But Poe, our ship is going to leave without us.”

“If they leave you, they’re leaving me too. End of story.”

“Guys, we might have to move,” Finn whispered. “We got company.”

“Well, it’s about time you arrived,” Cern Ren called out. He was dragging behind him a tied up black-haired woman wearing a Crimson Dawn emblem prominently on her belt. “Thought you’d never show.”

Alecta Anthea narrowed her eyes, “Do not be so cavalier with me, Cern.”

Before he could get out a witty retort, BB-9E shoved a few dozen volts into his leg. Cern cried out and stumbled, but his grip on the woman did not loosen.

“Damn it, Captain!” Cern after BB-9E as he gave a satisfied bleep and rolled back to Alecta. “Call off the little trash ball.”

Alecta narrowed her eyes, “9E, shock him again.”

He did so with glee and another scream from Cern.

“Don’t insult my droid,” Alecta warned.

“I surrender,” Cern held up his free hand. He glanced over at the woman he was dragging. She was trying to subtly wretch her arm from his grasp. Cern gave her a sharp yank and warned, “Don’t you even think about it. The three of us are the last people you want to piss off.”

Alecta regarded the woman as mildly as a flower growing in a field, “Who’s this?”

“My catch from Crimson Dawn,” Cern smirked. “Her name’s Minati, and she was one of Lady Qi’ra’s top soldiers but apparently Qi’ra is quite pissed off with her at the moment.”

“Officers, please,” Minati was trying to get away, but there was something in her voice that was a little too secure in her position, “can we talk about this? I have a lot to offer.”

Alecta ignored her, “How did you get her?”

“One of the Resistance attacked Minati, so she was creeping about trying to find them and get revenge,” Cern answered. “I told her I could help her… and then took her hostage. I was going to just maim her until she was too weak to fight back, but then she started saying some very interesting things.”
“Really?”

Alecta grabbed Minati’s wrist and threw her to the ground. Her skull hit the concrete with a sickening thud and Minati squealed in pain. Alecta slammed down her foot onto Minati’s back and dug her heel in painfully. Based on the noises coming from Minati’s ribcage, it was very possible that Alecta was breaking a few ribs in the simple action.

“Speak then,” Alecta coldly ordered.

bwa bew bwah!

BB-9E rolled up to Minati’s face. Half a dozen pointy and/or electrified tools popped out of his circular body.

“Or we’ll make you speak,” Alecta simply said.

“There’s no need for torture,” Minati begged. “Please, I have information, important information. Information about a girl on Jakku.”

Kaydel’s ears perked up. The acoustics of the area made the conversation carry straight to Poe, Kaydel, and Finn in the trees.

“Jakku?” Kaydel whispered. Thankfully their location did not have the acoustics to carry their conversation to Alecta, Cern, Minati, and BB-9E. “Wait… I know the name Minati. Isn’t that… that’s the woman Aunt Aletha shot in the knee?”

“Huh,” Poe watched the scene curiously. “Your family really likes torturing that woman.”

“Poe,” Kaydel whispered to him. “What if this is about Kira?”

He blanched at that, but there was not a single cell of his brain that could think of a way to stop the conversation. If he went out there, there was no doubt in his mind it would result in Alecta discovering Kaydel. He had to do something. There was no way that if Cern, Alecta, and BB-9E learned Kira’s secret, they wouldn’t act on it.

…Not that he knew the secret, but still, principle of the thing.

Meanwhile, Kaydel had her eyes set on a much closer First Order officer. Forget Alecta or Cern, could Finn keep whatever Kira’s secret was?

“Alright, you have information,” Alecta’s foot still dug into Minati’s back. “Then speak it.”

Minati regarded BB-9E’s tools in her face, “Please, Officer-”

“Captain,” Alecta corrected.

“Captain,” Minati nodded, “this is a huge piece of information. If I tell it, I would be putting my life at risk.”

“Then why bring it up if you don’t intend to divulge it?” Cern asked.

“Oh, I can divulge it… you just have to make it worth it to me.”

Cern and Alecta traded a look.

“Worth it?” Cern echoed.
“About… 500,000 should do it,” Minati replied.

“And why would we pay you for this information?” Alecta’s voice was as cold as ever.

Minati thought of the threat for a moment but pushed it aside. Some small Resistance girl was nothing compared to the wrath of Luke Skywalker. He would no doubt come after her, but that money would give her a nice head start. Maybe she could even track down Jarex and frame him for the reveal.

The bastard was still probably hanging around Maz Kanata’s bar.

“Because,” Minati said, “when you hear this piece of information… it will turn the Galaxy upside down.”

Alecta and Cern exchanged another look.

Poe, Kaydel, and Finn didn’t dare to even breathe.

“This information…” Cern started, “is 500,000 the lowest you’ll go for it?”

“Of course not,” Minati brightened. She was actually going to get her way, “I’m open to negotiation on the reward.”

“What about no reward?” Alecta countered.

“I’m sorry,” Minati smiled at her, “but there is absolutely no way that I will reveal my secret without getting a reward.”

Alecta simply nodded, “Alright then.”

It happened too quick to make out. One moment Alecta had her boot on Minati’s back, then her foot flipped over Minati, and it drove down stepping on her cheek, forcing her head and neck to bend in opposite directions.

Then came the SNAP that made Poe, Kaydel, and Finn jump. Ten years ago, Aletha Anthea had threatened to murder Minati, and now her sister had finished the job.

And Alecta Anthea had broken Minati’s neck using only her foot.

Not going to lie, Poe was a little impressed.

“Damn it!” Cern exclaimed. “What’d you do that for?”

“I don’t pay for information,” Alecta simply said, lifting her foot off Minati’s corpse.

“What if we needed that information?”

“If we did, she would have played that card by giving us a tidbit about it to entice us. We don’t need gossip from Crimson Dawn lackeys.”

“We needed her to make an example of Crimson Dawn.”

“And I have,” Alecta gestured to the unmoving corpse at her feet. “If you wish for me to do it publicly, we can hunt down another easily.”

Cern sighed, “Alright. I guess there’s nothing I can do about it now, but jeez… That was an awful “Hated her?” Alecta raised an eyebrow. “I didn’t give a shit about her. That was an easy death; cruel but quick. The kind I give to people whose names I will have forgotten by the next morning. If I cared about her… if I were truly personally involved in this situation, the kind of death I would give her is unthinkable. You have no idea what I’m capable of. The stories you’ve heard are mere children’s tales.”

The words piqued Cern’s interest, “Wow… who would really get you angry?”

“Cern, there are three people I intend on killing in a truly terrible fashion. It’ll be painful, gratuitous, and above all slow.”

“And who are those people?”

Without a second thought, both Finn and Poe took a step in front of Kaydel.

“Now come,” Alecta signaled to BB-9E to put his tools away. “I have to go punch my brother-in-law in the face.”

“Oh, wait for me!” Cern eagerly ran after Alecta as she led the Stormtroopers towards the hotel.

The corpse of Minati was left abandoned in the street.

“Well…” Kaydel said after a while, “that’ll be a story for Aletha.”

“I say we run in the opposite direction of that psychopath,” Poe voted.

“Okay, run,” Finn ordered. “Run!”

They all took off in an instant.

“You know,” Poe glanced at Kaydel as they sped in the direction of Han’s ship, “you were the one who said before we left that you hoped you would come home with a story to tell Kira. Today certainly gave you a few of those.”

Kaydel shook her head, “I’m just glad we were able to keep Kira away from all this violence and ugliness. Who knows what thoughts Kira might get in her head living on Jakku if she heard about all these lightsabers and electricity shock torturing?”

“Yeah. I mean, it was just Jessika you left her with.”

Kaydel stopped dead in her tracks.

Poe frowned, “What is it?”

“I left her alone with Jessika.”

“…Oh shit.”
“And that’s how you hotwire your speeder to make sure no one steals it, and give a good shock to those who try,” Jessika finished. “See, we don’t need Aletha around. Why learn how to drug people against their will when I can teach you how to electrocute them?”

There was a long silence from Kira’s comm.

“I’m starting to see why Kaydel doesn’t leave us alone unsupervised,” Kira said.

Jessika raised an eyebrow, “You were taking notes, weren’t you?”

“Copious amounts.”

“Read them to me.”

You could hot-wire it but I intentionally left a wire loose. When I’m exploring a wreck, I attach that wire to the hull and it electrifies the whole thing. It’s not enough to kill someone but it will definitely make them think twice about doing that again.

- Rey’s Survival Guide

Jessika grinned, “Atta girl.”

“Now, tell me about land mines.”

“There they are!” Poe called as the transport came into view. The ship was started, but the ramp was down, and Han was standing on it yelling for them to hurry up. “Come on, Kay! We’re almost home free!”

“Go! Go!” Finn yelled, pulling back from the pair. “I got your backs. I’ll cover you two. You go before my people get here!”

Kaydel shot a smile back at him, “Thank you, Finn. It was nice meeting you. I’ll try not to shoot you if we run into each other on the battlefield.”

Poe frowned.

“Come on!” Han yelled as he saw Poe and Kaydel racing towards the ramp, some guy halting at the end of the landing platform. “Move it, Dameron or I’ll leave you!”

“What was that?” Kes Dameron’s voice shouted from in the ship.

“Just strap in Kes!” Han called back. “He’s close enough that worse comes to worse we tow the kid home. MOVE IT, POE! DON’T THINK I WON’T LEAVE YOU!”

Poe and Kaydel ran as fast as their legs could carry them. Their hearts pounded as adrenaline pulsed their veins, burning them as relief started to set. They had done it, they had survived. They were free of the First Order. They had escaped the clutches of Snoke and Kylo Ren.
Then Poe thought of someone standing at the end of the landing platform, who could not say the same thing.

Poe stopped running.

Kaydel frowned back at him but kept going, “Poe, come on!”

He hesitated, then turned on his heel and raced back to Finn.

“What are you doing?” Finn exclaimed. “Run!”

“Wait,” Poe skidded to a stop. He took a moment to catch his breath, and then placed a hand on Finn’s shoulder. Poe looked into his eyes and said seriously, “Finn… come with us.”

“What?” Finn exclaimed. “Are you crazy?”

“I’m dead serious. Come with us to the Resistance. Join us in our fight.”

“Why would I ever join you?” Finn pushed off Poe’s hand.

“Uh… because it would free you from dealing with shit like this? Leave behind the First Order and fight for the right side.”

“The First Order is the right side. This whole mess – yes, it was complicated, and I hated every moment of it – but at the end of the day, it was Crimson Dawn and the actions of one member of the First Order. The rest of the First Order is good, Poe. We bring peace and justice to the galaxy. You just want to stop us.”

Poe’s face fell, “…You’re not ready. You don’t understand. I thought you would-”

Kaydel called, “Poe!”

He and Finn turned to the ship. Kaydel was at the top of the loading ramp with Han Solo at her side.

“Come on, Dameron,” Han yelled, barely sparing a glance at the other boy. “We gotta go! Don’t make me get your dad! You know he will drag you.”

Setting his jaw, Poe turned back to Finn and locked his eyes with such an intensity that Finn was too afraid to look away.

“You’re not ready now,” Poe’s voice was firm, “but that’s okay. Someday you will be. And when that day comes, I want you to know the door will always be open. If you ever want to join the Resistance and fight the good fight, just come find me.”

Finn had no words to say. He just stared at this crazy Resistance pilot in utter astonishment.

“Dameron!” Han shouted. “On the ship now or I’m leaving you behind!”

“Coming!” Poe smiled at Finn, “We’ll see each other again, Buddy. I promise.”

Then Poe Dameron turned and ran to the ship.

FN-2187 just blinked. What the hell was that? The pilot had been absolutely ridiculous. Join the Resistance. Leave everything behind. It was all utter nonsense.

…He still liked being called Buddy, though.
“You done with your flirting?” Han asked as Poe reached the top of the ramp.

“I had something important to do,” Poe simply offered as he wrapped an arm around Kaydel’s waist.

“Getting our asses out of here is an important thing to do,” Han countered. “So, if we could avoid any further—”

He went perfectly still. Poe and Kaydel exchanged a look and turned to see what had so shaken Han Solo.

The First Order group had just emerged out of the hotel complex on their way toward their own ship.

And Ben Solo had locked eyes with his father.

Qi’ra reclined on the couch of her lounge area, listening to the familiar sounds of hyperspace, clutching a glass of wine in each hand. They weren’t her first round, and they certainly wouldn’t be her last.

Truth be told, she didn’t want to leave Tara behind on Nixrye, but she had no choice. Part of protecting Tara was making sure no one knew Tara was her daughter. Still, as she swirled the wine in her glasses Qi’ra couldn’t help but worry what Han Solo’s son would do to her daughter. The second the whisper of miscarriage had swept across Nixrye, Qi’ra had gotten Crimson Dawn the hell out of there.

Honestly, could this day get any worse?

“My Lady,” Tyrel, her right-hand man approached her from the cockpit. “Your husband, Laertes Ores is calling the ship’s comm. I guess he heard about Nixrye and wants you to… explain a few things.”

Qi’ra sighed. Why did she have to tempt fate?

“Tyrel, how many times must I tell you?” Qi’ra swung her body around to sit up rather ungracefully, “you don’t have to announce he’s my husband when telling me Laertes is calling.”

“My Lady, you told me to always announce your relation to the person who is calling you, that way you never forget.”

“Yes, but he is my husband. I should hope I wouldn’t forget.”

“Of course.” That was when he took in the nervous expression on Qi’ra’s face, “My Lady, do you want me to tell your husband that you are not feeling well enough to take his call?”

Qi’ra looked down at her glasses of wine, considered it, and then each back in a single gulp.

“And Ben Solo stared at each other from across the landing platform. No one around them dared say a word, and the Solo men certainly weren’t blabbing either.
Poe thought it was actually sort of an odd sight. Han Solo was as unmoving as a wax work, and honestly, that freaked out Poe a little as Han Solo had always been a man of movement and activity.

Then there was the frozen Ben… who was carrying Sasa Ren in a protective cradle hold.

Poe could only imagine what Han was thinking at the sight of his son carrying a strange copper-haired Knight of Ren in such a loving fashion, her dress all torn and bloody. Even Sasa had picked up on the awkwardness, shifting uncomfortably in Kylo’s arms despite her tears and the injured collarbone and leg.

Part of Poe was glad that Han didn’t know Sasa was literally in the process of miscarriage his grandchild.

For a very… very… very long time no one said a thing. No one even dared to move the slightest muscle. All that mattered in that moment was Han Solo facing his runaway son for the first time in twelve years.

And then… they spoke.

“What are you all staring at?” Kylo barked at his contingent. “Get moving!”

The Knights (plus FN-2187) didn’t need to be asked twice. The First Order set about scrambling for their ship, preparing to do the role expected of them.

Still… Ben Solo didn’t move.

For a long time, Ben and Han stood there in the chaos surrounding them just staring into identical sets of eyes.

Then with a hard swallow, Han turned his back on his son and moved to enter his ship.

“Han Solo!” Ben called.

He stopped in his tracks.

Hoping against hope, Han slowly pivoted back towards his son, even though worry was permanently etched onto the faces of Poe and Kaydel. His eyes locked with Ben again, now taking in that the other female Knight – he had learned of Tara Ren years ago, though didn’t know yet who her parents were – had settled at Ben’s side.

Han heard a faint growl from Chewbacca who had come to investigate with Waroo. Poe held out an arm and gave Chewie and Waroo a quick shake of the head. Chewie glanced towards Waroo, gave a small moan, and settled on the balls of his feet. Han deserved the chance to interact with his son as much as Chewie deserved to have Waroo standing next to him.

But Han just stared at his son. He didn’t dare say the first word. His son had something to say to him and Han would let him say it.

Kylo spoke, “Looks like you got rid of that garbage Millennium Falcon.”

Of course, he would say that.

“Just temporarily misplaced it,” Han slid his hand into his pocket and gripped his golden dice.

Sometimes you lost the things you love… but that didn’t mean you couldn’t get them back.
Once in a while.

“Then do yourself a favor,” Kylo said, “don’t get it back. That thing should have been hauled to the scrapper years ago.”

Han laughed, “Oh please, you’re upset I lost it, and you know it. I don’t need to be a Jedi to read that on your face.”

Kylo quickly looked away as Tara turned her eyes on him, “I want nothing from that life.”

“Is that so?”

Han reached back on his weapons belt and pulled out something from the back, tucked under his jacket. It was something no one knew he had secretly taken over a decade ago. Kylo’s eyes widened in shock, fear, or maybe something sentimental as Han held it up.

It was the blaster his father had given him for his thirteenth birthday.

“You left this behind when you ran away from home,” Han said. “I always thought it might have been a mistake. Something you overlooked in your panic.”

Kylo stood there frozen. His throat felt so dry, he couldn’t imagine ever being able to swallow again.

“I carry it with me everywhere,” Han continued. “Just in case I ever ran into you… In case you wanted it back… In case you did overlook it.”

“I… I didn’t,” Kylo found the words.

Han smiled; he knew when his son was lying.

“Here,” Han disassembled the blaster and power cell.

It was the same sort of DL-44 he had carried since Beckett gave him his first that night by the fire when he was twenty-one. Forty years had ravaged his life. His ship was gone, his hair was grey, his skin was wrinkled, a Wookiee owed him a life debt, his father-in-law was a Sith Lord, his son was an agent of the First Order, and he was married to an honest-to-God Princess… but Han Solo still trusted nothing better than a good blaster at his side.

Han threw both components towards his son. Kylo let them hit the ground and made no move to collect them, but Han was pleased to see that they hit the ground softly… a work of someone using the Force.

The work of someone who wanted to pretend they didn’t care.

“Take it,” Han urged. “I know you want to.”

Kylo hesitated, but he felt Tara’s eyes on him. He turned to look at her, and that forbidding, dangerous scowl shut down any thought of the blaster in an instant.

“The only thing I want is to take all of you under arrest,” Kylo sneered. He glanced to Poe, “But we had an agreement, so…”

Poe nodded.

Han tried not to let his heart’s thoughts show on his face.
Why couldn’t Ben have just picked up the blaster? Just give him a small flicker of hope that his son wasn’t lost forever?

He squeezed the dice in his pocket.

“Two-One,” Kylo ordered.

FN-2187’s head jerked up, knocked back to reality from the strange display.

Kylo said nothing, simply snapped and pointed at Sasa.

FN-2187 was quick to scamper to Kylo’s side. He took Sasa carefully, almost lovingly into his own arms and made for the First Order ship.

“Come, Kylo,” Tara said loudly. She placed her hand on his arm not unlike the way Han had once seen Qi’ra touch Dryden Vos on a couch forty years ago. “We have work to do.”

Oh fuck. Han scowled. He had heard the rumors about Ben and the possibility of some weird harem situation… but he seriously wasn’t doing the sort of thing he had watched Vos do with Qi’ra all those years ago?

As silly as it sounded, Han probably had never felt more directly disappointed in his son than in that moment. At least he hadn’t had to watch Ben burn down Rornian, slaughter the Jedi, or torture and kill Felicity.

“We’ll be on our way. And Solo?” Kylo called.

Han grunted.

Ben smirked at his father, “Ask Dameron about what happened to Felicity Rhiaon.”

Chewbacca let out a vicious growl, no doubt already guessing what Ben had finally confessed. He, Luke, and Quom Tinadar had been the only ones before that day not involved with the First Order that knew the truth.

This was going to get ugly.

Han Solo said nothing more to his son. He just urged everyone to follow him into the ship, and soon enough they had taken off and were gone.

“That was a good display,” Tara rubbed his arm. Her voice had that silky, seductive edge to it that always drove him wild. “Very strong move. A very-”

“Tara,” he said stiffly. “Go onto the ship. Now.”

She frowned and took a very confused step back. There was something hard and dangerous in his eyes. She didn’t understand. Why was he-

“Wiln?” he called. “Is Sasa safe on the ship?”

Oh… that’s why.

“Yes,” Wiln reported. “The… bag and its contents are with her. I’ve also got Doxl’s body separated from the others and Berd heavily sedated. Would you like me to-”

“I need answers before his execution,” Kylo cut off. His eyes narrowed at Tara, “I’m certain that he wasn’t acting alone. After I interrogate him, I’ll execute him. Understood?”

Tara and Wiln knew the question hadn’t been for him.

“Understood,” Tara whispered.

“On the ship. Now.”

She still held her head high as she returned to the ship. Tara Ores was not the daughter of the two most dangerous crime bosses since Jabba the Hutt to be intimidated by the offspring of Han Solo.

Soon enough, only Wiln and Kylo remained on the landing platform.

Kylo’s eyes were locked on the sky where the dot that was his father’s ship was disappearing into the horizon.

“Sir?” Wiln asked. “Are you coming?”

The dot disappeared.

“Are you…” Wiln hesitated. “Are you okay?”

Kylo was silent a moment.

“I’m fine,” he said at last.

He reached out his hand and summoned the blaster and power cell. Ben Solo quickly hid his blaster beneath the folds of his clothing.

“Come on,” Kylo said to Wiln. “Let’s go home.”

Chapter End Notes

Coming Up Next Chapter…

Blood and Ash

As the First Order and Resistance deal with the aftermath of Nixrye, Poe struggles to tell Han what Ben did to Felicity. Meanwhile, Rey tries to learn more about the religion her mother was born into and takes part in a ceremony she really shouldn’t.

Yes, before anyone asks, the Finn suddenly having a blood disorder thing is me trying to work in a new idea for a future plot. Just bear with me on any continuity errors it may have caused.

You know, the funny part about it taking so long to get to the chapter titled Kaydel’s Decision is that I’m really not even fond of the name. But yes, finally we’re at the last chapter of the Nixrye storyline… and then we have four chapters dealing with the aftermath before we move into a storyline I’m very excited for. Although one of those chapters involves writing Felicity again, and I’ve missed her so much.
Warning: a lot of extremely uncomfortable shit is about to go down in the First Order storyline we’re about to go into. If you have any triggers involving sexual assault, abuse, harassment, non-con elements, anything sexual PLEASE CONTACT ME. The next storyline is one of the ugliest we will see in the entire story, and if you need any censoring, trigger warnings, or even a summary of the important details so you can skip over the entire chapter, let me know. I am willing to provide any accommodation you need.

Also I would like to point out to everyone who kept thinking all those times during this storyline that Kaydel was going to die, in chapter 49 (the chapter before this storyline started) there was a line that said Kaydel would be alive during TFA to give her blessing to Poe on murdering Kylo. I’m glad people were too involved with the current storyline to remember that.
Back to Roots

Chapter Summary

Rey explains the significance of her hair buns, Marks listens to audiobooks, and Quom sneezes flames.

Chapter Notes

Warning, chapter includes an aggressive (but consensual) sex scene that might be uncomfortable for some people to read.

I split up this chapter into three parts, so the next will be A Religious Experience and then Ash and Blood.

So, any of you haven’t heard the songs Dead Girl Walking and Dead Girl Walking Reprise they are honestly Kylo and Sasa’s soundtrack for the next storyline. (Warning, the first one is rated R.) Hell, just the entire Heathers soundtrack is so good for this next storyline. That’s right, the next storyline we are now doing is something I like to call: Kylo, it’s time to get your shit together and fix your love life.

Naturally it’s going to be at least the next ten chapters long because this is the story of Kylo getting his shit together. The universe is not letting a Skywalker get off that easily… pun intended.

Can you tell I miss writing Felicity? Her jokes are starting to leak into my author’s notes. I was happy to hear a few people excited at the return of Alyla and Felicity. It truly makes me feel great that I have written OC love interests for canon characters that people have become attached to.

Also, I got curious and checked: the last time we actually got a full on Felicity scene was Chapter Thirty-Eight… Twenty chapters ago. I am entitled to writing some Felicity Rhiaon Why the Hell Did I Ever Marry a Skywalker content.

See the end of the chapter for more notes.

The Long Way Home

Chapter Fifty-Seven

Back to Roots

But that was before the First Order came and took control of Hays Major’s industries. Once that happened, it was just a matter of time before they crushed the life out of our homeworld.

- The Journal of Paige Tico

“This is ridiculous!” Kylo Ren exclaimed as he stalked down the hall of the Finalizer, Wiln easily following Kylo’s long strides. “How could the Supreme Leader do this?”

“It’s not our place to question his decisions, Master,” Wiln answered with no passion in his voice. “The Supreme Leader is wise.”

“Of course, he is, I just… struggle to find the wisdom in this. I should be the one to choose who fill the empty spots of the Knights of Ren, not him.”

“The Supreme Leader trusts your judgement normally, but this is a delicate situation. Things are getting tempestuous among our ranks. He merely wants to ensure that the newest of our Knights are not the disasters they’ve replaced.”

“But he doesn’t understand what I need on a daily basis. This newest edition? What point is there to them?”

“Master, I have counselled the Supreme Leader on this addition the same way I advise you in your own selections,” Wiln said. “I believe that his choice will be a valuable member of our team. Not quite the usual pick of the draft, which might be a good thing.”

“You really think she’s that good?” Kylo asked.

“I have complete confidence in the woman the Supreme Leader has chosen,” Wiln answered honestly. “Don’t worry about what the others will think. This selection will bring balance back to our ranks.”

Kylo sighed, “Alright… let’s meet this Chosen.”

The door slid open, and a beautiful woman was seated at a large dining table. They were conducting this business in a private dining area used for the most honored of guests aboard the Finalizer.

When she saw Wiln and Kylo enter, she smiled and rose to her feet. It was a rather pretty smile, Kylo couldn’t help but think as he crossed the room to meet her. Then again, it was nothing compared to the smile on the woman who had shared his bed the previous night.

“Good evening, Master,” she bowed her head to Kylo. “I’m pleased you chose to meet with me.”

“Well, the Supreme Leader has decreed you to be the best soldier for this job,” he offered his hand to shake. “I hope you do not disappoint me.”

“Master, I live to serve your every whim, provided it does not go against the wishes of the Supreme Leader.”

Kylo scowled as Wiln let out a groan behind him. What an impression the girl made. First conversation and she had already accused him of treason.
“Uh… forgive me, I misspoke,” she saw her error. Quickly she accepted Kylo’s handshake.

Kylo tried not to grimace as she placed her hand in his: the woman had a manicure. Dear Lord, what Knight of Ren had a manicure? And now that he took a better look at her, why was she wearing a dress? It was black, but it was handsewn and intricately designed, some sort of hybrid of Alderiaan and Nubian fashion.

What kind of girl was Snoke trying to pawn off on him?

“Master Kylo,” Wiln said, “I’d like to introduce you to our newest Knight, Sasa Ren.”

“A pleasure,” Kylo said flatly. He was quick to drop her hand, not wanting to touch her any more than Snoke required him to. “I hope you are the missing piece to making the Knights of Ren a well-rounded team.”

“The Supreme Leader has taught me never to brag,” Sasa lowered her eyes to the ground. “But I hope to play a vital role in the Knights of Ren, and do not fear, I will not step on anyone’s toes. Simply tell me what you want of me, and I shall do it.”

Oh, God, this Sara wouldn’t look him in the eye or speak at a normal volume and was a demure, modest, submissive beauty queen? This girl was a nightmare.

“Tell me,” Kylo’s voice was as dry as Tatooine, “why did the Supreme Leader choose you for me? Is it your lightsaber skills?”

Sasa eyes widened, “Oh, did they… not tell you?”

Fidgeting her hands, those forest green eyes glanced at to Wiln. Oh good, she had eyes the colour of his Force Signature. That wasn’t an obvious ploy at all.

Seriously, had he pissed off Snoke or something?

“Tell me what?” Kylo turned his own eyes to Wiln.

“You see… Master,” Wiln cleared his throat, “Master Sasa has been ordered to join the Expert Saber Class.”

Kylo lifted an eyebrow, surprise sparking in his eyes, “You’re taking over for Tara? You must be very good.”

“Uh… not-” Sasa lowered her eyes again. “Not exactly.”

“She’s to attend the class as a student,” Wiln explained. “Sasa still needs to polish her skill.”

Kylo had to focus on not letting his jaw drop, “Are you serious?”

“I wouldn’t joke about that sort of thing, Sir.”

“You’ve got to be kidding me!” Kylo rounded on Wiln. “You sent me a Knight of Ren who can’t fight?”

“I can fight!” Sasa objected. “I just need a little more training.”

Kylo blinked as his brain processed her interruption. His face became stuff and his eyes narrowed and darkened dangerously as he slowly turned to face her.
“You don’t get to talk back to me,” his voice was low, and he took a step toward her that made her instinctually take one back. “You are new here. You have not proven a damn thing to me.”

“But…” her voice was weak, but she still pressed on, “I haven’t had the chance to prove anything yet.”

Even Wiln was getting a little uneasy at the look on Kylo’s face.

“Alright then,” Kylo challenged, “prove yourself to me here and now. Are you politically savvy?”

“No… particularly.”

“Good at constructing military tactics?”

“No.”

“Skilled at hand to hand combat?”

“No more than any of the Stormtroopers.”

“Using the mind trick? Torturing people?” He took a step forward and another and another. With every suggestion he forced her backwards until he had her pinned against the table. “Pushing into the minds of enemies? Good at extracting information? Skilled at making propaganda? Hell, are you even decent at battlefield medicine?”

He stared down at her, her breathing heavy as he body towered over her and her forest green eyes looked up at him in fear… much like the fear that always simmered under the surface of his own forest green signature.

“No,” Sasa whispered. “No, no, no, no, and no.”

The air between them was hot and stiff, danger lurking in the darkness of his own eyes and his soul… and yet Kylo couldn’t help but notice how perfect her lips were.

His eyes flicked down her body, and Kylo understood. Wide hips, large breasts, taunt stomach with only the tiniest hint of muscle on her body, a decent looking ass, long legs and lashes, a swanlike neck, smooth pale skin, and an outfit that screamed femininity.

He knew exactly why Snoke had chosen her.

Kylo let out a bitter laugh as he took a step back, “Nothing… You’re valuable in nothing I’m looking for.”

“Master Kylo-”

“Silence!” he snapped. “You do not get to talk back to me. The only people I allow to talk back to me are those I like and those I value. You fall under neither of those categories, so you will be silent in my presence unless I initiate conversation. Do you understand?”

At least the girl had the sense to demurely lower her eyes and nod rather than respond verbally.

“Good. Now, Wiln… come.”
“That’s the girl?” the door hadn’t even closed behind them, leaving Sasa awkward and alone in the dining room, before Kylo started into his ranting. “That’s the one the Supreme Leader thinks will be a valuable asset to the Knights of Ren?”

Wiln sighed, “Look, I know she doesn’t seem good at face value, but under the surface, she’s got a lot more going than you know.”

“Oh, she’s got it going on, but that’s not what I need. A pretty face in a battle is nothing more than a liability. I need a warrior, not a sex doll.”

Wiln grabbed his arm and roughly pulled Kylo to a stop.

“The Chosen,” Wiln’s voice was low, his eyes flashing dark, “are not sex dolls.”

But Kylo was up for the challenge, “That’s what they’re trained to be. Molded to be someone I desire. Someone for me to impregnate and raise a child with. That’s what Nera was made for. What Alix is made for. What Cleo is made for. What Nova is made for.”

Wiln’s hand clenched Kylo’s bicep tighter.

“And that’s what Sara is made for,” Kylo finished.

“Sasa,” Wiln corrected.

“It doesn’t matter! I don’t need her! I don’t need Snoke to stud me out to a bunch of brainwashed girls who might not even look at me twice under any other circumstance. If Snoke wants to have a harem for me on standby, whatever, fine! But do not drag one of these girls in front of me and pretend that that girl is Knight of Ren material. Nera deserved her spot on the Knights of Ren, but this one… I’m embarrassed to have to bring her before Hux and Phasma and Tara and say, hey this is our newest Knight of Ren. She’s ridiculously underqualified and useless to the cause, but you need to respect her as one of our ranks because the Supreme Leader says so. Why? Oh, well isn’t Sansa pretty?”

“Sasa! Her name is Sasa!”

“I don’t care!” Kylo exclaimed. “I don’t care about her at all! Don’t you get it? I’ll never care about her! And she’s just be like all those other pointless Knights that get themselves killed far too quickly to have deserved the title of Ren.”

Wiln’s eyes narrowed, “We use the name Ren because it was simply the surname of the founding member of the Knights. Ren is a title only because Cade Ren made it a title.”

“But that titles means something,” Kylo said coldly. “Yes… Cade Ren died at the hand of Luke Skywalker, but his legacy lives on. Because of him, the New Jedi Order was brought to ash, Felicity Rhiaon was slaughtered, and the seed of Luke Skywalker exterminated.”

His lips wouldn’t dare utter the name Rey with such violence.

“Cade Ren destroyed the Jedi and brought balance back to the Galaxy. Not a battle of Jedi vs Sith, Light vs Dark, but a mixture of both, recognizing the shades of grey in the universe. That is why I take the title of Ren so seriously. He was flawed, but he did more than Maul or Tyranus. He did the work of Darth Vader and Sidious, and Cade followed those beliefs and actions all the way to his death. This… Sana, Sala, Sama, or whatever her name is… she doesn’t have that strength or conviction. She is not worthy of the title of Ren… or to be the mother of my child.”
For a long time, Wiln said, just letting Kylo’s words sit on the air. But it was a silence of victory, a small smile quirked the corner of his left lip, and Wiln shifted back on the balls of his feet.

“I think you underestimate her,” Wiln crossed his arms. “Is she a Tara or a Cern? Hell no. She’s a Sasa, her own style of Dark Side and Light, and I am willing to bet you anything that soon enough she’ll become one of the most valuable members of our team.”

“And I think you overestimate her,” Kylo mirrored Wiln’s stubborn pose. “I bet you my own personal transport, the Dark Destiny, that within twenty months, I will have completely forgotten who this Sasa is.”

Wiln smiled and offered his hand, “Deal.”

“Deal.”

They shook on it.

---

Kylo Ren was not nervous. He was never nervous for his first couplings with new female Knights of Ren. In fact, he usually was rather bored, and tonight he was a little mad about the earlier events of the day. Kylo was still willing to consent to sex with… what’s her name, but it wasn’t going to be the highlight of his day.

Still, he found himself anxiously chugging his nightly cordial. Maybe if he got this done fast and fell asleep almost immediately after his climax, the girl would take the hint to leave him alone.

He was looking forward to putting the girl back in her place after all her arguing. This was ridiculous. Was Snoke punishing him by making Kylo consort with… Oh God, seriously, what was her name again? Something with an S?

Kylo heard the chime of his door as he recorked Phasma’s cordial. Sighing, Kylo summoned his black night robe and pulled it over his naked body.

His clothing and boots were neatly set next to him bed, ready to be pulled on quickly after their coupling. It was normal for him to greet the new female Knights of Ren naked on the nights they coupled. But he still put on his robe just in case someone was escorting them like that one unfortunate time Wiln accompanied Eosi Ren to Kylo’s room for their first time.

“Enter,” he called.

The door slid open and… the girl (crap, what was her name? This was going to bug him all night) was standing there alone. She was wearing a rather ornately embroidered grey silk robe that was very short and left little to the imagination. His eyes drifted over her body unabashedly; she was all skin, silk, and submission.

Not going to lie, the sight turned him on.

But she didn’t move a muscle. She just stood there fidgeting, her eyes flicking around like she didn’t know where to put them. When their eyes met for a moment and she bit her lip, Kylo wanted to throw her down on the bed and fuck her until she bled.

…Until she bled? Maybe Alyla was right. He did have issues concerning sexuality.
But the girl still hadn’t moved… and when her eyes drifted down, she could clearly see what her image did to his body.

He narrowed his eyes as she continued to linger in the hall outside, “I said enter.”

Bowing her head, Sasa scampered inside and turned her back to him to close the door. When she turned back to face him, she gasped in surprise. He had dropped his robe and was sitting naked on the bed.

“Don’t sound so shocked,” he said as if his state of undress were as ordinary of khakis and a t-shirt. “This is exactly what you came here for.”

“Yes, of course,” Sasa’s eyes darted everywhere. Should she look at him? Not look at him? She was alone with a naked man she’d been told for years she would have to make love to. How was this supposed to proceed? “I just didn’t expect you to get to that part so… quickly.”

Kylo raised an eyebrow, “I assure you, I am only fast when I want to be.”

A red tinge spread across her body.

“You can look at me,” Kylo said. He shifted to spread his legs a little more, making it very obvious what he was telling her to look at. “I’m going to be putting my cock inside of you. You may as well see what you’re getting into, or rather what’s getting into you.”

He always used crude and bold language when first interacting with a new partner. It was a blunt way of making sure the girls knew that there wasn’t going to be anything romantic about the situation. They were here for him to fuck and impregnate, end of story.

Sasa took a deep breath and gathered herself. Yes, she was going to be submissive to him – it was what Snoke had trained her to be – but she wasn’t going to fall for such a blatant power move. No, she would get her confidence, straighten her back proudly, and look right down at his-

Holy fuck.

Kylo Ren was tall and muscular. He was naturally broad, hell his pecs were roughly the same size as his head. Kylo was a very large man… and his cock was… proportional.

And he wasn’t even fully erect yet.

Okay… she was in for an interesting night. She felt herself involuntarily clench at the thought of him putting that inside of her. Sasa wasn’t some naïve innocent – she wasn’t going to wonder how it was going to fit – but she was… cautiously optimistic.

She hated how he smirked at her.

“Thoughts?” his voice was either arrogant or mocking her, though it was probably both.

“Well, um…” she cleared her throat, not sure if she should keep staring at that… pillar between his legs. “You won’t have any problems reaching my cervix.”

He blinked, “Well, that’s a… that’s a new one.”

Sasa shrugged.

Kylo sighed, “Alright, but other than that, any thoughts?”
Okay, she understood. He needed his ego stroked; she could do that.

“That, Master Kylo,” Sasa played with the sash of her robe, trying her best to be seductive, “is a very generous gift you’re about to give me.”

Shit, he rolled his eyes. Pull back. Pull back!

“What, would you, um… like me to do with it?” Sasa stumbled over her words. She still wanted that seductive edge on her voice, but not push too far too soon.

“Don’t worry,” Kylo turned to the side where he had set a bottle of lube on his bedside table, “you won’t have to worry about pleasing me. I’ll prepare myself.”

Sasa couldn’t hold back a giggle, “Oh, but Master Kylo, why would you let your already well-acquainted hand play with yourself when you’ve got a waiting and willing woman to do it for you?”

He… didn’t reply.

Kylo sat there for a moment, just staring at her. Sasa shifted on the balls of her feet, her smile dropping from her face. She started chewing her bottom lip when she saw his eyes darkened, and she waited nervously for him to say something, anything. Then he rose to his feet and crossed the room.

For a moment, as he stood his naked body mere inches from her own clothed figure, Sasa thought he might kiss her. Indeed, he lifted a hand to her cheek and stroked a thumb across the lip she was biting.

Then suddenly her yanked lip down from her teeth.

“Don’t bite your lip,” Kylo ordered. “And I have had just about enough of your backtalk. It’s time for a reality check, you’re not some mighty Knight of Ren or a great seductress. You’re here to let me fuck you, and if you’re lucky, I might get you pregnant. That’s why you were chosen, isn’t it? It’s your fertility that impressed the Supreme Leader.”

She nodded. Now didn’t seem to be the right time to bring up emotional rebalancing.

“This isn’t some fairy tale, Sa…su?”

“That’s, uh, not my name.”

“Yeah, I’ve forgotten it already.”

Sasa didn’t think that was an invitation to remind him of it.

He roughly lifted up her chin, still holding her lip, “Do you understand what I’m telling you, here? You’re not the great love of my life that I’ve been waiting for. You’re not the great love of my life that I’ve been waiting for. You’re here to be fucked when I get bored with Tara. Do you understand?”

Sasa mutely nodded.

“You are not my number one,” Kylo warned. “You will never be my number one, and I will never give enough of a damn about you to let you sass me. Now stop biting your lip, or I’ll bite it until it bleeds.”

Panting heavily, Sasa stared up at his dark eyes as he released her lip.

Why was she so fucking turned on right now?
Kylo grabbed her hip and pulled her in closer, “Do you know how this all works? The mechanics.”

“Uh huh,” Sasa whimpered as he fiddled with the hem of her robe.

His hand was on her thigh, his hand was trailing up her thigh.

“So, you know what it takes?” Further and further his hand slid up her thigh. “You know what I’ll have to do to your body?”

“Yes,” she closed her eyes and shuddered when he reached the hem of her panties.

“You want that?” his fingers traced the edge of the black silk garment guarding her from him. “You want me inside of you? Pounding deep to quell your most erotic ache?”

Slowly he dragged a fingertip across her panty-clad pussy. Sasa let out the most desperate moan.

“Yes!” she willed his finger to move just a little higher.

“You want my cock inside of you,” his voice was low and dark. “You want me to fuck you hard until I empty my seed in your core, claiming you and marking you as my sperm impregnates you?”

His finger found her clit.

Sasa cried out.

“Are you ready for that?” Kylo whispered. “Are you ready to take my seed?”

“Yes,” Sasa breathed as he slowly pulled her panties to the side. Oh, so was so ready for his fingers to drag across her bare sex and play with her clit until he made her cum. “Oh, Master Kylo, I want-”

Suddenly, he crudely shoved a thick finger up her still dry quim. Sasa yelped at the invasion. She continued to grunt and pant as his moved his finger around inside of her, his face dropping into a scowl as he assessed the most intimate part of her body.

Without much ceremony, he pulled his finger out of her and wiped on his robe what little of her moisture clung to his finger.

“You’re not prepared for me,” Kylo said in disgust. “Not in the slightest.”

Oh, but as her body tingled from the dark eroticism of his words, Sasa was starting to be. Why did she like him dominating her so much? He was about a second away from just throwing her on the bed and pounding into her until she screamed his name.

She would not be unhappy if he did. To hell with her virginity; she’d been waiting for Kylo Ren’s cock for years.

“I won’t waste my time with pre-amble,” he stalked back to the bed and grabbed the lube. “You will undress and touch yourself until your body is ready to take me. You better put on a good show, I’ll be watching.”

Sasa smirked and bit her lip as he spread the lube across his stiffening cock, “I’m not sure watching is the correct term. I think jacking off would be more appropriate.”

He froze. Dangerously his eyes flicked up at her, and the smirk froze on Sasa’s face.

_Oh shit._
Kylo didn’t say a word, just set the lube bottle next to him and gestured for her to come forward. Silently she obeyed, but when she stood right in front of him, he still gestured for her to get closer. She bent over, giving him a clear view down her robe of her breasts, he teeth nervously baring down into her lip hard.

When her face was inches from him, yanked her lip away from her teeth, grabbed her head, and roughly pulled her forward. It was not for a passionate kiss, rather his teeth bore down on her lip hard until his bled.

She cried out as he pushed her face away.

“I told you,” he warned, “I told you not to bite your lip and not to sass me. What part of that was so hard to understand?”

“None of it,” Sasa touched her lip and stared at the blood on her finger. “I’m sorry, Master Kylo.”

“You’re forgiven.”

Fuck, that was hot.

“Now,” he ripped out the silk belt holding her attire closed, yanked off her robe, and pushed it to the floor. His eyes drank in the sight of the matching black, lace bra and panties hugging her body. For a moment he thought to grab one of those generous breasts and lavish it with his tongue, but instead he pushed her back from him. “I’m tired of waiting. I told you to undress.”

She hooked her thumbs under her bra straps and started to pull down, “Yes, Master.”

Maybe it was because it happened the same moment he grabbed his cock, but the second she uttered those words a jolt of pleasure went through his body, and he gave a rather undignified grunt.

“Good,” he murmured his she pushed her panties down to her ankles. His eyes roamed her naked breasts and bare quim. He pumped his shaft eagerly, growing hard at the sight of the body he was about to claim. “Now, make yourself ready for me.”

It would be a lie to say it wasn’t awkward, Sasa standing there – kind of cold – naked and playing with her clit as the second-in-command of the First Order masturbated openly to the sight. But eventually she was able to collect her enough to relax and try to enjoy as much as possible. After all, she was turning on the second-in-command of the First Order. She was going to fuck the second-in-command of the First Order.

And if he was going to bite her lip again like that, she would be very happy at the end of the night. Oh God, what she wanted even more was for him to bite her nipple. She dragged a fingertip across her excited bud at the thought.

Yes, this… this was good. Kylo Ren sat there, legs spread, erection growing in his palm, enjoying the sight of her. Yes, he wanted her. Of all the Chosen… he wanted Sasa.

Sasa’s fingers quickened at the thought. Oh she wanted him hard and rough, biting and scratching her, fucking her until she knew nothing but his body in hers.

Oh fuck! She was close. She was so close.

“That’s enough,” Kylo ordered.

Damn it! Sasa pulled her hand away.
“Get on the bed,” he stood and gestured for her to lay down.

Sasa cautiously approached, awkwardly climbing on the material. This was it. This was happening.

“Come on,” Kylo urged impatiently as she climbed on all fours to the middle of the bed. He grabbed her hip and flipped her over, “On your back. Spread your legs.”

Sasa swallowed but nodded, her eyes flicking to his manhood. His rigid cock bounced with every step, and he heavy balls were pulled tight to his shaft. It was time; he was going to put that inside of her.

She tried to control her breathing as he shoved her legs apart. She watched nervously as Kylo poured a little bit of lube on his pointer and middle fingers. Sasa panted heavily as they stroked once across her sex and then pushed into her entrance.

Sasa’s head hit the pillow and she tried to comprehend what was happening to her. She didn’t hate it, and she didn’t want him to stop, it just… what she had imagined all these years. She dreamed of Kylo making love to her, his hands and mouth lazing across her body in a beautiful and romantic display, but… he wasn’t interested in making this good for her. He just knelt at her feet, spreading her legs apart, and pumping his fingers in and out of the most sacred part of her body.

He hadn’t even kissed her.

“Alright, you’re ready,” he pulled his fingers out of her. He couldn’t have even fingered her ten times.

“Already?” Sasa frowned as he spread some more lube across his manhood. Her ears pounded as he shifted over her body and hooked one of his legs over his hip.

Oh God, she could feel his cock against her quim. She didn’t know if it thrilled her or terrified her.

“No point in delaying the inevitable,” Kylo reached down and aimed his cock at her entrance. “Just relax, and it will go a lot easier.”

Wait, wait, was there not going to be any-

He shoved his cock into her.

Sasa gave a sharp gasp, but thankfully he didn’t start ravaging her instantly. Instead, he just stayed still with his cock locked inside of her cunt as she adjusted to the feeling.

His cock was inside of her. Sasa Ren was no longer a virgin. Kylo Ren had penetrated her with his feeling a lot larger than it looked – and that was saying something – cock. She still wanted this, but this wasn’t how she expected it to go… to feel.

Sasa panted as she took in the sensation of penetration and his manhood deep inside of her. He had pushed himself all the way on, his cockhead resting against her cervix. His penis burned and stretched her, part of her wanting to push him off of her, but she stayed still. She had been told that sexual intercourse was pleasurable, and she wanted to see this through.

Besides, what would Snoke do if she rejected Kylo?

It is alright, My Daughter. Young Solo will soon turn his affections to you. This night will bring you both satisfaction. You just have to make him see your worth.
“Yes, Master,” Sasa replied in her mind and Kylo loomed over her, his eyes focused forward at the headboard and not at her. Clearly he didn’t hear the Supreme Leader.

Did the Supreme Leader really have to be spying on the moment she lost her virginity? Kylo had just thrust into her without asking, and yet it was Snoke who made her feel violated.

Okay, deep breath. She could do this. She could do this.

“Are you…” he hesitated. “Are you okay?”

“Uh… yes,” Sasa tried not to grunt as she grabbed his arm and adjust herself into a slightly more comfortable position. Damn, his bicep was huge. “Yes.”

“Alright,” he glanced down at her briefly. “Let me know if you want me to stop or if anything is uncomfortable.”

You mean other than this general situation? She thought to herself.

“Oh course,” she said. She thought about the rough way he had previous pumped his fingers into her, “Just… could you go slow at the start?”

She was slightly surprised that he listened to her. When he started thrusting into her, his hips dragged him in and out of her at a slow but steady rhythm. Sasa did her best to enjoy it, but her body wasn’t aroused enough to really have a good time.

Oh, what was wrong with her? For years she had been picturing and preparing for this moment. It was supposed to be the ultimate scene of pleasure and eroticism. The man of her dreams – literally, Snoke would push images of Kylo into her actual dreams – was taking her virginity. She should be writhing and moaning beneath him, absolutely filled with the pleasure he brought her.

Instead the room was terrifyingly silent as the bedsprings awkwardly squeaked with his thrusts, the barely wet sounds of his balls slapping against her.

This was not what Snoke advertised.

But she knew why it was so uncomfortable, Kylo barely wanted to touch her. His hands should be roaming her body – caressing and exploring – their lips locked in a sensual kiss as he stared deep into her eyes.

Instead he just stared at the headboard and humped her dispassionately like they were breeding nerfs.

No, Sasa wouldn’t give up. She was the one the Force ordained to be the mother of his children, and his consort. His cruel words of her unworthiness in the Knights of Ren echoed through her mind. Sasa would make him see what she was worth, she would make him care about her as more than just a vessel for his heir.

She just never expected how much they would grow to care for each other.

Sasa closed her eyes and took a moment to gather herself. She felt him moving in and out of her, and it was starting to feel… actually rather nice.

Yes… Yes, she could… She could work with this. He didn’t seem to be interested in touching her body, but as the pleasure mounted with every thrust, she started to crave that he would. Maybe if she showed her pleasure, arch her back, lift her pelvis to his thrusts, and start to moan… he’d get the hint.
So, taking a deep breath and slowly fluttering her eyes open, Sasa Ren started to moan.

The bedsprings squeaked and the moans sounded rhythmically to the pace of his thrusts. They sounded fake, Kylo Ren bitterly thought. Of course they were fake; the women who visited his bed merely put on a show for him. Everyone knew that it didn’t matter if they enjoyed it, or even if he enjoyed it. As long as he ejaculated, Snoke was happy.

The only upside to the visits was that no First Order officers would bother him for a good thirty minutes.

And sex, Kylo supposed. He guessed even getting sex this way wasn’t so terrible.

As he pondered the boredom he felt with the whole situation – most of his passion being used to bring this upstart in line – he was positive his assessment to Wiln had been right. Twenty months from now, he wouldn’t even remember or care she existed at all.

Still… he had to commend her on her optimism.

---

21 Months Later…

“I got you, Sasa,” Kylo murmured in her ear as he carried her into her quarters on his private shuttle. Wiln and Cern were preparing the ship to leave the disaster of Nixrye behind. “It’s okay, I’m here. I have you.”

Sasa was the only one who had her own quarters on Kylo’s ship, the vessel having four rooms with beds in them. He wouldn’t go so far to call the rooms other than his and Sasa’s actual bedrooms as the others were so barren of personal touch and they were basically just rooms with bunks that pulled out from the wall.

He carried Sasa in bridal style, her arms locked around his neck. When he laid her down on the bed, Kylo moved to stand back up, but Sasa didn’t let go. She clung to his neck and started to cry.

The weight of everything falling upon him, Kylo lost his strength and collapsed to his knees. He buried his face in her breast and just wept, her hand stroking through his hair.

Together they cried. They cried, and cried, and cried, and they cried for a long time. That was all that they did in the world. It was all that could be done. Together they held each other and wept.

No amount of rebalancing in the world could fix this.

Kylo had been so close; so close. He had been so close to finally proving himself to the Supreme Leader. So close to finally having the Skywalker Heir. So close to finally being able to be with Sasa without anyone or anything standing in his way.

And now it was all gone.

Tara had been the one to take it from him. Tara had decided to do the unthinkable. And worse yet, Tara wouldn’t confess a damn thing. He would make her pay, oh he would make her pay.

But for now, he and Sasa just wept for their child.

Her hands in his hair just felt perfect, and they brought him so much comfort. Sure, Sasa was crying too, maybe even more than him, for good reason too. She had more to lose with the death of this baby. This was her entire purpose in the First Order and she had failed.

No. She hadn't failed. She had succeeded where no one else had. Not only had Sasa gotten pregnant, Sasa had gotten pregnant twice. Once with the chemical miscarriage and now with a full-on miscarriage.

Frankly that gave Kylo hope. He could have a child; he could have a child with Sasa. It was actually possible. Sure, this pain was unbearable, agonizing, and unending but… but he could have a child. He would have a child.

He would have a child with Sasa.

“Kylo,” she whimpered. “Kylo, I’m-”

“No. You didn't lose it. Our baby was taken from us.”

“I lost the baby,” Sasa whispered.

“Don't say it,” he said, lifting his head. His heart broken when he saw the tears in her eyes. “It's okay. I’m here.”

“I'm sorry.”

“No. No, this wasn't your fault.”

“Yes, it is.”

“Don't blame you!” he exclaimed. “Do you understand that? I don't blame you. You didn't do anything wrong. Don't you dare think that you did.”

“I lost the baby,” Sasa whispered.

“Kylo brushed a tear from her cheek, “No. You didn't lose it. Our baby was taken from us.”

“I should have been stronger.”

“You were amazing, and don’t you dare think otherwise. The work you did with that dress, and fighting off Berd and Doxl! Forget what Kaydel did, you're alive not because of Kaydel or Snap or any of them. You are alive because you are a smart, courageous, badass woman who I am honored to l-”

He stopped himself.

But Sasa caught what he was going to say, and she smiled.

“It's okay,” she stroked his cheek. “It's okay. You don't need to say it.”

“I wish I could,” he murmured.

“You will,” Sasa’s voice was filled with confidence. “Someday you will. You know, it's like what you told me about Alyla and Lando. I don't need to hear it to know it.”

“This is a very dangerous conversation, Sasa.”

“You're right. So, let's have a dangerous conversation that's a little bit more practical. What are we going to do about Tara and Cern?”

Kylo sighed, “I will tell the Supreme Leader what they have done.”
“No,” Sasa snapped. “That's not good enough. They murdered our child.”

“I'm not sure if we can pin it on Cern, but Tara was absolutely responsible.”

“Why is she still alive? You were going to kill her. You almost killed her. She murdered our baby and she tried to murder me. Why have you allowed to let her continue to breathe?”

“You don't understand-”

“You're right. I don't.”

“Sasa, if I wanted to kill Tara, I couldn't.” He caught her look, “Not yet at least.”

Sasa frowned at him.

Kylo sighed, “I am not allowed to kill Knights of Ren without the explicit permission of the Supreme Leader. That is why I have not killed Berd and why we are bringing the body of Doxl to present to him. Knights of Ren can be killed in self-defence, but not a straight execution without Snoke’s permission. I will go to him and make the case for Tara's execution. I promise you that.”

And as morbid as the thought was, Sasa smiled a far too mischievous smile.

They were interrupted by Wiln clearing his throat.

“What is it?” Kylo demanded, but he didn't move from Sasa’s side. He stayed on his knees next to her, torso hovering over her torn dress that was stained with his tears and the blood of his child. Kylo hovered over her like a panther protecting his mate.

Wiln took a step back accordingly.

“My apologies for interrupting,” Wiln said, fiddling with Evan Tharel’s bloody medical bag on his shoulder, “but I brought you the…”

Sasa burst into tears again.

Kylo pulled her in tight and said in a hollow voice, “Put it on the desk.”

Wiln didn’t say a word as he obeyed. He silently crossed the room and set the bloody bag on the desk. It made an agonisingly heavy thump.

He sighed, sharing in the weight and the misery of the grief. He had never experience something like that, but it had been Nova that was taken from him, or a child he and Nova had created taken away… He didn’t know what he'd do.

Wiln took a deep breath, collected himself, and turned back to them, “Masters, I assure you that I did not play any part in this.”

“I know that, Wiln,” Kylo cleared his throat. “I know what this situation means to you.”

“Thank you, Sir,” Wiln bowed his head. “Now, I know you two need your privacy, but we are about to take off.”

“Thank you for informing us,” Kylo answered stiffly.

“Will you be flying ship, Sir?” Wiln hated to ask but knew he had to.
Sasa’s head whipped over to watch Kylo, her eyes filled with confusion and fear.

“Yes, Wiln, I will fly the ship,” Kylo answered, “but I will be spending most of my time on the trip in these quarters with Sasa.”

“Very well, Sir.”

“Where has everybody been stationed?”

“I thought FN-2187 might stay in here with Sasa during your absence,” Wiln answered.

“Good,” Kylo said. “And MK-6093?”

“Marks will be watching over Berd. Marks is the best at sedating people, so we have Berd contained in your room and Marks will be keeping an eye on him. Doxl’s body will be guarded by Nines and Zeros.”

“What of Tara and Cern?” Sasa inquired.

Wiln shifted on the balls of his feet and looked to Kylo, “I am awaiting your orders on that, Sir.”

Kylo sighed and rubbed his face, “I… I will speak with them and make my decision.”

Sasa stroked Kylo’s hair. She knew he would make the right choice… at least in this matter. She didn’t fall in love with for being great at making life decisions.

“Very good, Sir,” Wiln said.

“That will be all, Wiln,” Kylo dismissed.

Will bowed his head and turned for the door. When he reached it, he paused and looked back at the scene of Sasa and Kyla together.

Sasa stroked Kylo’s hair and whispered something before pressing a kiss to his cheek. Kylo sighed and looked longingly at the bag on the desk and leaned again Sasa for comfort.

Wiln smiled.

“Not to be out of line, Master Kylo,” Wiln said, “but I believe you owe me a ship.”

Kylo scowled, “What do you mean?”

“Twenty-one months ago, we made a bet.” Wiln gestured to Sasa, “I told you this girl would become one of the most valuable members of the Knights of Ren… You on the other hand, bet that you’d forget she even existed twenty months from then.”

Sasa’s head shot up, “You what?”

Kylo chuckled nervously.

“He bet this very ship on that,” Wiln added.

“You did, did you?” Sasa’s eyes flashed at Kylo, and it looked like the reason she was pissed off was no longer because of Tara.

“Wiln?” Kylo said.
“Yes, Sir?”

“Get out.”

“Yes, Sir.”

Sasa smacked Kylo the second the door closed.

“Ow!” he rubbed his injured arm. “You really that mad about that the bet?”

“No, I’m just remembering the first day we met and all the things you said to me,” Sasa crossed her arms. “I mean my god, you told me to never speak unless spoken to, said you didn’t value me, and when we had sex that night, you bit my lip until it bled because I accidentally sassed you while I was trying to get you to use me to get hard rather than sit on your bed and jerk off, and then you just hunched over my body and shoved your cock into me without asking if I was ready.”

“What are you saying?”

“What I’m saying is the first day we knew each other, you were a total dick to me and the sex wasn’t even good.”

“Okay, maybe I wasn’t the greatest to you that day, but you didn’t exactly make a good impression. Plus what about round two of sex?”

“Oh please, round two only happened because you wouldn’t let me get off in round one. Also, may I remind you that you forgot my name, told me you didn’t care that you forgot it, and then after you fucked me you asked what it was.”

“In hindsight, I should have remembered. Your name literally has the word Sass in it.”

“And don’t you forget it,” Sasa leaned forward and kissed him.

He held her there, little that soft, sweet kiss prolong. When they pulled apart, they just looked in each other’s eyes and shared a silent moment.

“I’m sorry,” Kylo whispered. “I’m sorry how I treated you that first day. I couldn’t understand why Snoke sent you, and I thought he was wasting my time with someone like Berd or Doxl.”

“I should have told you about the emotional rebalancing,” Sasa said. “Maybe if you knew that was my purpose—”

“I would have hated you and pushed you away. I would have resented the sentiment and never... gotten close to you.” He stroked her cheek, “I’m glad that I did.”

“I love you,” she whispered. “Not because the Supreme Leader brainwashed me to, not because of what anyone else has said or done, I love you because I love the man you are. The man in the mask and the one inside. It’s not just about heirs or the Force or dynasties... if you were an ordinary man and I an ordinary woman, my feelings wouldn’t change. I truly do love you.”

“Sasa, I wish I could say the same thing. I want to so badly,” he ghosted his lips over his.

She touched his lips and shook her head, “I understand. For now, let’s just savor this in whatever capacity we’re allowed to be together.”

Kylo bowed his forehead to hers and took a long, deep breath, like it cleansed his soul.
“You know,” Kylo nuzzled her, “no one’s around. How about I make up that first night to you right here, right now?”

“Kylo… I’m literally having a miscarriage right now. I don’t think sticking your cock in me is going to help anything.”

“Right, sorry.”

Sasa shook her head and kissed him. Kylo was an idiot, but he was her idiot, and Tara could fight her for him.

Kylo smiled as she pulled back, but then his eyes drifted the bloody bag on the desk. Sasa’s heart fell.

“This won’t be our last time,” Kylo said.

“I know,” Sasa’s voice was soft. “But that doesn’t mean this doesn’t hurt.”

They stared at it in silence, Sasa’s fingers threading through his, and Kylo squeezing her hand tight.

“We should name it,” Sasa said.

“What?” Kylo frowned.

“Let’s name it,” her voice was stronger. “That way we can always remember our first real child. I don’t want to forget.”

“We won’t,” Kylo promised. “What do you want to call it? Any baby names I have I kind of want to save for a child who does survive.”

Sasa lifted an eyebrow, “Kylo? Let’s not pretend I don’t know your picked-out boy and girl names are Anakin and Padmé. I’m not an idiot.”

“Sorry,” he said quickly. “So? What name do you want? We don’t know if it was a boy or girl, so it would have to be gender neutral.”

She thought about it.

“Nix,” Sasa declared. “Our baby is called Nix.”

“Why Nix?” Kylo wasn’t going to argue the name but was interested in the thought process.

“It’s a name for boys and girls, and it can be short for Nixrye, so we don’t forget this ugly mess. Not to mention the meaning of the name, night, because right now all I feel is Darkness. We’re in the black of night and… and I don’t know if we’ll be able to pull through.”

Kylo sighed and kissed her hand. He thought about the words we wanted to say. He fought against them so hard, but no, he couldn’t call on that, draw on the memory of her.

But then he looked at the woman he couldn’t admit to himself he loved, and all his defenses melted away.

“Hope is like the sun,” Kylo repeated his mother’s words, “if you only believe in it when you can see it, you’ll never make it through the night.”
Sasa smiled and squeezed his hand tight, “Nix Ren.”

“Nix Ren,” he nodded.

In an unspoken but mutual agreement, they leaned in to kiss.

A knock at the door interrupted them.

“Come,” Kylo leaned away from Sasa.

The door slid open to reveal FN-2187.

“Uh…” he looked between the pair who had obviously just been crying, “Wiln says we need to get going, Sir.”

Kylo sighed and got off the bed, “Yes, of course.”

He didn’t see the helpless way Sasa reached for him when he let go of her hand.

Finn did.

“I’m going to check on Berd and Doxl and then we’ll get on our way.” Kylo stopped in the doorway and looked back at Sasa.

She gave him a watery smile.

He sighed and nodded.

“FN-2187?” Kylo looked to him, “Take care of her.”

“Yes, Sir,” Finn nodded.

And Kylo was gone.

Then was when Sasa started to cry again.

“Are you–” Finn sighed, “Are you alright?”

Sasa gave a humourless laugh, “No.”

“Anything I can do?”

Sasa took a deep breath and nodded, patting the spot next to her. Finn hesitated but joined her.

His breath hitched when Sasa wrapped her arms around him. He didn't dare move as she buried her teary face into his neck.

“I know this is kind of cruel considering the feelings you have for me that I don’t return, but you’re my friend,” Sasa sniffed. “So, could you please just hold me for a little while?”

Finn sighed and wrapped his arms around her tight, “Of course.”

And as he sat there holding the crying Sasa in his arms, Finn oh so badly wished he could hold her forever.
Kylo headed towards his own quarters to where Marks had been assigned to watch Berd on their voyage home. Berd was handcuffed to the wall and heavily sedated, Marks supplied with more sedatives to administer when the current ones wore off.

Everyone was too afraid to ask Kylo why he had wall shackles in his bedroom.

Reaching his room, Kylo went to type in the code when he paused. Faintly he could hear a familiar voice coming from inside the room.

The voice of Lando Calrissian.

“And there’s the rub, right? How was I supposed to know she was an Imperial Spy? I thought she loved me.

So, there I was standing with my pants around my ankle, surrounded by Imperial Officer, and in a none-too-mistakable embrace with an Imperial Spy.

What did I do? What I do best... lie my ass off to get out of danger.”

Wait a minute, Kylo knew that story.

He punched in the code, and his door slid open to reveal Marks sitting on Kylo’s bed, watching a HoloProjector play the recording of The Calrissian Chronicles: Volume Two: Lando Calrissian and the Blood in History.

‘Oh, this? I tried to wave off to the General, ‘I’m just helping Cadet Renyu with her research.’

The General didn’t buy it, ‘You’re helping with genetic testing and experimentation... in that manner with Cadet Renyu?’

‘We were, um,’ Mina Renyu searched for an example, ‘Lando was helping me with fetal research. He was donating a sperm sample.’

I was thankful for her lie, but not necessarily the content of it. What happened next is a story that is far too personal and embarrassing to proclaim on an internationally selling Holo series, but... long story short, boys and girls, I donated sperm to the Empire.

...Audience, if you have children, they should probably not be reading this book.”

“What are you doing?”

Marks scrambled as he realized he had been caught.

“Nothing!” he shoved the HoloProjector behind his back. Marks didn’t quite hit the off button, so the blue reflection of Lando Calrissian lit up the hall as he voice narrated just one of the many exciting and sexy adventures of his life. Marks sighed, knowing there was no hiding, “I was just reading. I thought it’d be a fun way to pass the time on our trip home.”

“Fair enough,” Kylo said. “It’s a good story, and I suppose it wouldn’t be of any use telling you not to play it.”

“Not unless you want to supervise me the whole trip.”

“I’ll be flying the ship and spending the rest of my time with Sasa.”

“Of course,” Marks nodded. “She needs you right now.”
Kylo glared at him, “Have you seen Alyla?”

“Uh, no Sir,” Marks was Force Sensitive, so he was one of those who could perceive the not really ghost. “Not recently.”

“Then where the hell is she? She should be back by now.”

“Maybe she’s with Calrissian… Or maybe with-”

“If you say Skywalker, I will kill you.” Kylo’s voice was actually quite casual, albeit tense, “Look, the events of today have been very stressful, and I’m about ready to snap and murder someone. I’m not saying this as a threat, just a statement of the facts. If you piss me off right now, I’m going to hit my limit and break your neck. I don’t want to do that. Understand?”

“Yes, Sir,” Marks nodded. “If you are going to snap and murder someone, maybe you should go talk to Tara now. If anyone deserves it.”

“Good idea,” Kylo turned for the door. “Let me know if anything happens with Berd. He should be sedated every three hours. Oh, and Marks?”

Kylo stopped in the doorway and looked back at the man.

“You’re almost at the end of that book,” Kylo said. “When you finish it, I recommend reading Lando Calrissian and the Spices of the Galaxy. He takes down a drug smuggling ring on Bespin.”

“Oh, that is a good one. Thanks,” Marks smiled.

Kylo nodded and left.

Marks sat there, waiting and watching the door for a few minutes.

Then he grabbed the HoloProjector, tore out the recording and shoved in a different one. He knew Ben Solo would catch him listening to the series. There were very specific ones Marks was allowed to read, and ones he definitely was not allowed to read. If Ben thought he was reading Lando Calrissian and the Blood in History, he wouldn’t bother Marks as he listened to the one Marks actually wanted to read.

Getting himself comfortable for the very long journey home, Marks pressed play.

Prologue.

I never expected to see Han Solo again. I never expected to see Chewbacca again. I never expected for the Millennium Falcon to dock at Cloud City on the run from the Empire, fighting for the Rebellion.

Of course, life has taken me down many a crazy path, but none more crazy than the story I am about to tell.

Now, this is an interesting one, and I’m sure many of you picked up a copy of this to hear the story of how Luke Skywalker lost his hand and learned the most evil man in the Galaxy was his father. And you will be satisfied to some end for Luke has agreed to share that part of the story – though according to him, what happened on Dagobah, stays on Dagobah – but this is not that story.
This is a story where I am not a hero, not least, not until the end. It’s a story of how I learned the value of friendship and truly became a good and responsible man. It’s how I learned that some times fighting for the greater good does not result in the greatest goods. It’s how I came to tell the Empire, enough is enough, and take a stand that lead to the execution of both Palpatine and Vader... keep an eye out for that book.

No, this is the story of how I joined the Rebellion.

...and got strangled by a Wookiee.

Chapter One.

Boba Fett was not exactly a man I was afraid of, but I did acknowledge the danger we brought with him... especially when he brought a legion of Stormtroopers with him. So when one day, I opened my front door and found him standing on my doorstep, I knew…"

Tara was sitting in a chair of the small lounge area, talking to Cern when she saw Kylo and Wiln heading for the cockpit.

“Kylo!” she shot to her feet.

He stormed right past her.

“Kylo! Wait!”

Tara chased after him, Cern following at a leisurely pace, staying by Wiln who had the sense to put a few feet between himself and the scene with Tara and Kylo. Pulling in front of Kylo, she grabbed his arm and tried to pull him to a stop.

“Come on, Kylo, please, let’s talk about this!” Tara begged.

He wrenched his arm from her grasp, “I don’t even want to look at you right now.”

“No, please!” Tara called as he stormed away from her.

Her head raced. Oh what was she supposed to do? All those lessons from her mother, and no idea how to proceed. What was she supposed to do? What would her mother do? How did her mother deal with her father when Laertes was in a similar mood?

Desperate, Tara called out, “Kylo Ren, I am your second-in-command, and you will give me the respect of listening to me!”

Kylo stopped dead in his tracks.

Wiln and Cern groaned in unison.

“Respect?” Kylo slowly turned around. “You want my respect?”

Tara folded her arms behind her back and held her head high, “Yes. I deserve it and you will give it to me.”

Wiln and Cern took a step back in unison.
“Respect?” Kylo whispered. “You deserve my respect?”

Then he lost his mind.

“WHERE THE FUCK DO YOU GET OFF DEMANDING MY RESPECT?” he roared. “Because of you hundreds are dead and injured. You think this is a fucking good piece of propaganda? The First Order will forever be remembered for this as the new fucking Faclov because of you! You think this demonstrates good judgement? You think this justifies your spot as my right hand? You think this justifies you even being in the Knights of Ren?”

“I have earned my spot!” Tara snapped. “Unlike your little whore!”

“Oh please, who was the first one to crawl in my bed? Tell me, Tara, how many officers are you fucking?”

“You fucking bastard, how dare you? Ever since I started sleeping with you, I haven’t been in anyone else’s bed, and trust me that’s a punishment in itself.”

“You took out a mob hit on Sasa! Forget our whole personal situation, you turned against a member of this team.”

“No, I didn’t,” Tara denied.

“You betrayed us and turned Berd and Doxl against her too,” Kylo snapped. “You have torn down the foundations of everything we worked towards!”

“I didn’t do it.”

“Who gives a fuck who I’m sleeping with, you can’t honestly expect me to keep around a right hand who betrays me and lies to me.”

“Come on, Kylo! You really think I would throw away everything I’ve worked for for a decade because I’m jealous of some redheaded bitch? I didn’t do this! I didn’t hire Crimson Dawn, I didn’t turn Berd and Doxl, and I didn’t betray the Knights of Ren!”

“Enough, Tara!” Kylo roared. “Enough! Enough with the lies!”

He took a deep breath.

“I get it, alright? I made a mistake,” he said. “I condoned what you did with the others for years and now with Sasa things have changed. Alright, that’s my mistake. I never should have let you go unpunished, but now… now things are different. Now your hatred and jealousy have resulted in the death of my child, something you swore you would never harm.”

Tara opened her mouth but found no words.

“I just…” Kylo sighed. “I don’t believe this. All these years, everything we’ve been through and you do this? Not only have you destroyed our image and devastated your fellow Knights… but now you’re looking me in the eye and lying to me? I haven’t lost respect for you because of this bombing, I expect such things from you. But you standing there, lying to me, and staying true to those lies? …That is how you’ve lost my respect. And if I don’t respect you, how can I trust you? How can I believe another word you ever say to me?”

Tara’s hands shook. No, no. She wasn’t losing. She couldn’t. She had worked so hard. She couldn’t lose her grip on Ben Solo. She needed him to trust her, to respect her.
She only had one choice.

“So, please, Tara,” Kylo continued. “For once in your life, would you just tell the truth and admit you did this?”

“Fine! Alright!” Tara exclaimed. “I did it! Alright, I did it! I said it. I did it. Are you happy now?”

Kylo went silent.

“I’m sorry…” Wiln blinked. “What did you just say?”

Tara let out a loud huff of air and crossed her arms. She was in severe damage control mode, by being honest and admitting her guilt it would win back the tiniest bit of trust she had lost with Kylo. He may be pissed at her actions, but if she freely admitted them, at least he couldn’t say she wasn’t being honest with him.

“You… did it?” Kylo repeated.

Tara took a deep breath, “Yes, alright? I did it.”

He glanced at Wiln and Cern, but neither of them had any help on what to say or do. None of them had expected her to actually admit.

“And what…” he turned back to her, looking a little lost. “What exactly did you do?”

Tara sighed and crossed her arms, “Before I joined the First Order, I was a runner for Crimson Dawn. I still have some connections in the organization, so when I got sick of dealing with Sasa, I called them up and asked for their help. Crimson Dawn planned the bombing, I didn’t, I swear it. I just asked them to do something to her.”

“What about Berd and Doxl?”

“When everything was set, I found out I wasn’t allowed to come on the mission. I needed someone to act in my stead. Berd and Doxl always hated how much importance Sasa had among us, even though they joined us first. It was easy to convince them to kill her and make it look like an accident.”

“And the baby?”

“I didn’t know. I swear it on my mother’s grave.” Her mother obviously wasn’t dead, but Kylo didn’t know that. Though she legitimately didn’t know about the baby. “Look, Kylo, if I were going to make her miscarry, I would do it using someone else through a non-poisonous adhesive medicine patch they snuck onto her clothing. I didn’t know about the baby, trust me, I’d start throwing punches. Break some shit. Beat you up in our sparring room. Deal with trauma the way you do: public violence.”

For a long time, Kylo didn’t say anything.

“So that’s the truth?” he asked. “You’re really admitting to trying to kill Sasa?”

“Yes,” Tara nodded. “I hired Crimson Dawn to kill her, and convinced Berd and Doxl to help.”

“Well… Thank you for your honesty.”

He knocked her out with the Force. Instead of catching her like most of his Force Faint victims, he let her hit the floor before he picked her up.
“Wiln, go get the extra set of handcuffs from my quarters,” Kylo ordered as he carelessly lifted Tara. Kylo threw her over his shoulder and stormed into one of the plain bunk rooms, Cern trailing behind him. Kylo tossed Tara not on the bed, but the floor next to it. Her head hit the ground with a thunk just as Wiln entered with the handcuffs.

Quickly and securely, Kylo handcuffed Tara to the bedframe. He smirked at the image, pleased with his work.

“I do appreciate her honesty,” Kylo told Wiln and Cern. “Even more so that I can use it as evidence to ask Snoke to allow her execution.”

Wiln sighed. He didn’t think it would be that easy.

“I want her guarded,” Kylo said. “Always someone in here while we return home. You two can alternate with Nines and Zer0es. I don’t trust her loose on this ship, and if she goes near Sasa…”

“Man,” Cern shook his head, “what a manipulative bitch.”

“Oh, you are no better than her!” Kylo snapped, whipping around to face Cern. He took a powerful step forward, forcing Cern to walk backwards into the hall. With every word out of Kylo’s mouth forced Cern further backwards, “You are involved in this, I have no doubt about it! You helped her kill my child, and even if you had nothing to do with Nixrye, you still manipulated my droid, putting my child in this fatal danger. Give me a reason not to ask Snoke for permission to kill you too.”

Cern’s back hit the wall.

Wiln had the sense to take a few steps away from them.

“Kylo, listen to me, I didn’t know about the kid, I swear it,” Cern said. “I didn’t mean for this to happen.”

“I don’t care what your intentions are, all I care about is what did happen.”

“I will find a way make it up to you.”

“How could you ever find a way to make amends for the death of my child?”

“I will find a way,” Cern insisted, surprisingly calm for having Kylo in his face.

“No, no,” Kylo pointed a finger in his face. “How? How will you make it up to me?”

Cern rolled his eyes, “Okay, Dryden Vos.”

Wiln lifted an eyebrow.

“I listen to the HoloNovel Lando Calrissian and the Kessel Run on the way here,” Cern explained. He turned his focus back to Kylo, “Look, I don’t have a plan right now, but you know me, you know how clever I am. Give me three days, just three days, and I promise I will come up with a way to atone for what happened here.”

Kylo stared at him so a silent moment, “…Alright, but only because I know how clever you are. You have three days to make this up to me, and if you don’t, I’ll get permission from Snoke to kill you.”

“Deal.”
They shook on it.

“Alright, people,” Kylo announce, “let’s get on our way home. Wiln, you’ll be my co-pilot.”

“Yes, sir.”

“Everyone to your duties!”

Two hours later, Tara Ren woke up on the floor, dazed and handcuffed to a bunk.

Even worse, Cern was sitting on the bunk just casually reading a celebrity gossip magazine.

“Well, Tara,” Cern flipped a page without even looking down at her. “That whole Nixrye stunt was one of the most spectacular disasters I have ever seen. I do commend you on the admitting your part to gain back Solos’ trust, while still pinning the blame elsewhere ploy, but I don’t think it ended the way you wanted it to.”

Tara looked at her handcuff and sighed, “Yeah… That could have gone a lot better.”

I live in a toppled AT-AT walker in the Goazon. It’s a strange place, but it’s mine.

- Rey’s Survival Guide

Luke Skywalker sighed as he scratched another tally onto the list. For a minute he just stared at the wall, his eyes drifting over the multitude of tallies. Then his heart broke at the sight of one of them. With a shaking hand, he touched a tally that had a small v above it.

The tally of the day Felicity surrendered to the First Order.

He fought back tears; he should have been there. He should have found her and stopped her from having to make that decision. Felicity had waited so long for him to rescue her, but when push came to shove, she had done what she had to to protect their child. Rey lived because Felicity died.

But there was one tally that was even more heartbreaking than the day she left Rey. His eyes slid five places over.

The tally of the day she died.

Luke lost his battle against his tears. He clutched at the wall, grasping at that two dimensional representation of the day his true love died. It was only that hand on the wall that kept him from collapsing to his knees. He looked pathetic, sobbing uncontrollably, alone in an AT-AT in the middle of the desert of Jakku.

“Wow, seriously?” a dry voice came. “Twelve years, and you’re still crying? I mean, I appreciate the gesture, but doing that for twelve years kind of undercuts the whole badass Jedi image, and that was at least thirty percent of the reason I married you.”
His heart froze. That voice. \textit{That-} No, it couldn’t be.

He whipped around to face the entrance of the walker, and nearly had a heart attack.

Felicity Rhiaon Skywalker was standing there, hand on a cocked hip, a spark of mischief in her hazel eyes, and that one corner upturned smirk plastered across her face.

“Hey Sweetheart,” she smirked. “I’m home.”

She was in his arms in an instant. Holding her tighter than he had ever held a person in his life, Luke Skywalker hoisted his wife into the air and crushed his lips to her. Felicity’s hands were all over him running over his neck and pulling her hair by the root, her lips eager to taste him as much as possible.

“How?” he asked between kisses, setting her back on the ground. “How are you alive?”

Felicity laughed as his lips moved down her neck, “Seriously, Skywalker? Twelve years apart and \textit{that’s} the first thing you say to me? Makes a girl feel loved.”

“I love you,” the words flew from his lips in earnest. “God, Felicity, I love you so much. My entire heart belongs to you. I’ve been in love with you from the moment-”

“Okay, stop,” she pulled back. “There is such thing as overdoing it.”

Luke laughed and then pulled her in for a desperate heart. His heart warmed as she rested her head in the crook of his neck and let out such a breath of relief.

“I missed you too,” Luke pulled back and took in the sight of her. He was old and grey, but she looked exactly like he last saw her. “But, please, Felicity, tell me what happened. I thought they killed you?”

Felicity laughed, “Oh come on, Skywalker, shot in the head and thrown in the trash compactor? You didn’t really think I’d go down \textit{that} easily.”

He smiled but his face softened, and he stroked her teary cheek.

“All right,” Felicity sighed. “I’ll tell you everything, I promise, but first there’s something you need to do.”

“I’ll do anything. What is it?”

She gave him an all-too-familiar look, “Luke Skywalker, it has been almost thirteen years since I got laid. You are going to \textit{fuck me} like you’ve never fucked me before.”

He practically threw her on his cot. Their mouths mangled together desperately as they tore off their clothing. Felicity’s body was just as he remembered as he ripped off her pants and underwear in one fluid motion.

“No time for foreplay,” Felicity groaned as Luke laid over her. It was the same position they had last made love to her in, and he didn’t want her going anywhere any time soon. Felicity clutched his shoulders, wrapping her legs around his hips and grinding her hot clit against his cock. “Please, Luke, just \textit{fuck me}!”

Needing no further encouragement, Luke grabbed his cock and positioned it at her entrance. And Luke woke up on his cot, staring at the ceiling of an empty AT-AT walker. His breath was heavy, and his heart hammered in his chest at the impossible images of his beloved wife.

He was alone. Just like every morning, he woke up alone. No Felicity, no Aletha, no Quom, no Teng… No Rey.

It was the fifty-fifth morning he woke up, looked over at Rey’s hammock and remembered she was gone.

Rey wasn’t gone gone, he still saw her every single day, but they didn’t live together anymore. Luke understood her reasoning, someone needed to stay on the ship that she restored – the still nameless ship. Originally, Teng had volunteered to live on the Good Ship Restoration – what Luke and Quom had taken to calling the nameless ship – but then Rey got the idea that it was time for her and Teng to have permanent privacy and they should move into the Good Ship Restoration together.

Luke didn’t fight them on it. Although his daughter was only seventeen, they were the closest thing to married that people got on Jakku. Not a lot of actually legal binding ceremonies happened on the drab planet and people typically just adopted the title of married – although if he remembered correctly Jarex Zolhar and Fallah Menuk were legally married before Fallah left Jarex for beating Rey. Heck, as far as Niima Outpost was concerned, Luke and Aletha had been married for a few years there. So, figuring he’d still be able to keep an eye on the kids, Luke agreed to let Rey move onto the Good Ship Restoration with Teng.

And Luke Skywalker woke up every day with no one at his side.

Luke sighed, staring at the ceiling for a while, then he turned over and used the Force to summon Holo. At first it wriggled a little, but then it shot into his outstretched hand. With Luke not using the Force on a daily basis, his powers had started to weaken a bit. As he taught Rey, his proficiency increased but he was not nearly at the level he had been the night Rornian burned.

Eh, still better than Rey. She couldn’t summon objects to her to save her life, Luke just dearly hoped that never turned literal.

He sat up and turned over the disc in his hands. Luke took a deep breath and flicked it on. It was Felicity: those mischievous eyes, that glorious smile, those lips that belonged to him. She laughed and held Rey, a sweet little mother/daughter moment Luke had been lucky to record.

A tear shook in the corner of his eye as he reached out with his natural hand and stroked the small blue image of his wife. It was a mere formation of light, so his fingers went through it, a fitting metaphor. Felicity Rhiaon Skywalker was constant in his life, he could see her so perfectly, his soul always reaching for her once more, but he could never grab her. His dream was not the first he had had, and he doubted it would be the last.

Yes, he had accepted and moved on from Felicity’s death… but that didn’t mean he still didn’t miss her every damn day.

Rey Erso loved waking up in Teng Malar’s arms. Sure, the man hogged the blankets like they were the last ones in the Galaxy, but she loved his body on hers. Jakku was a dark and dangerous place, having a wall of warm and strong muscle at her back made Rey feel that much safer.

Besides, she had inherited her father’s Force vision sleep kicks, and considering her cousin most often connected their minds while Rey was sleeping, Rey had soundly gotten her revenge on Teng.

Rey was usually the first of them to wake up. If she let Teng, the boy could sleep for five years straight. But Rey rose with the sun… which had resulted in many jokes about her name over the years. She liked her name well enough but being named after beams of light did have its drawbacks.

“Teng,” she gently shook her slumbering boyfriend. “Teng, wake up. It’s morning.”

“Ugh, five more minutes,” he groaned, rolling over. It was a small bunk, so Rey had to grab his shoulder to stop him from rolling right off it.

Rey laughed and shook her head. Teng wasn’t exactly the image of beauty in morning; limbs splayed awkwardly, crust in his eyes, breath worse than Quom’s, his long black hair stuck at weird angles on his face, his morning scruff dark and patchy, and a little bit of drool always rolling down his chin.

“Come on, Moonshine,” Rey teased, leaning over him to speak right into his ear. “Up and at em.”

Teng moaned and rolled onto his back. He fought to open his eyes and scowled at her when he did.

“But I was having a very good dream,” he told her.

“Oh really?” Rey rested her chin on his chest. “And what was it about?”

“You.”

Rey blushed a little; she may have been regularly shagging Teng, but words like that still made her feel bashful.

“But I suppose I should wake up.” Teng sat up, grinning. He hooked an arm around her waist and yanked her close, making Rey give a startled – but happy – yelp. “After all, why dream about a beautiful, young woman when I can have her right here, right now?”

Teng pulled her in for a kiss, but Rey put a hand on his chest and pushed him back.

“Oh, no, not with that morning breath,” she climbed off the bunk. “There’s a reason Aletha sent you that prescription strength mouthwash.”

“Curse you, Doctor Kymeri,” Teng groaned as Rey walked across the room and started to dig through their bag of hygiene items.

“Hey, don’t you curse Aletha. If it wasn’t for this mouthwash you wouldn’t be kissing me at all,” Rey threw the bottle to him.

She watched as Teng reluctantly used it, and as she did, she glanced down at their box of hygiene items. Her eyes fell on the unopened packages of hair ties Aletha had sent in the epic care package. It was a nice gesture, but those hair ties were unneeded unless Teng decided he wanted to use them. Rey already had the ties she needed… even if they were falling apart.

Absentmindedly, Rey ran a hand through her slightly greasy hair. They traced over the dishevelled buns. Hair was falling out and she needed a good wash and retie.
Usually Rey would take her hair down while she slept, but she had been exhausted from scaling the Inflictor after her grappling hook broke. Teng had offered she used his, but Rey’s name involved the words Rhiaon and Skywalker, so she was stubborn as hell. The last thing she remembered was having dinner with Luke and Teng at the walker, so she was fairly certain Teng just brought her home and put her to bed without adjusting her appearance at all.

Rey frowned; she didn’t even say good night to her father.

“Hey,” Teng’s arms suddenly wrapped around her. His breath smelled a whole heck of a lot better. “Whatcha thinking about?”

She sighed and rested her weight back in his embrace, “Nothing, just my hair.”

“You are your father’s daughter.”

She swatted at him, “I was just thinking how messy my hair is.”

“Well, I think we’ve saved up enough to visit the bathing station,” Teng played with said hair. “Hey, how about this, we’ll go get your hair washed and then why don’t we maybe play around with your hairstyle?”

Rey frowned.

Hands stroked through her hair, pulling, pushing, and styling until Rey’s hair was set in her signature three bun look.

“There, functional and fashionable.” Felicity proclaimed with a wink, “That’s the Rhiaon way.”

“N- No,” Rey said quietly. “I… I like my hair like this.”

Teng sighed, “Rey, I know why you keep your hair like that. I thought you were over the whole your mother being alive thing.”

“That’s not why I do it.” Rey reached up and pulled out one of the ties. “It’s because of these.”

It was very ratty and used to be a deep blue. Six tiny unfamiliar symbols were printed in silver across it.

Teng frowned, “I don’t understand.”

Rey set the tie down, “I don’t think I’ve ever told you the story of my hairstyle.”

“Didn’t your mom give it to you when you guys crash landed in the desert?”

“Yeah, but there’s a little more to it than that. It happened a couple weeks after we came to Jakku. We were getting ready for bed.”
“No, no, Sweetheart!” Felicity stopped her daughter when Rey started to take out her hair buns. “Leave them be.”

“But Mommy, my head is itchy,” Rey scowled as Felicity pulled her into her lap on the hammock and fixed her hair. Rey had gotten them so far undone that Felicity would have to just start from scratch and redo the whole thing.

“I know, Sweetheart,” Felicity said. “Mommy’s going to try to get water here tomorrow so we can wash our hair.”

“Can we use Daddy’s special shampoo?”

Felicity winced, “We aren’t using any shampoo.”

“What?”

“We’re just going to have to make do. We’ll rough it like we did back in the Rebellion. Hey, how about Mommy tells you a story about the time Uncle Chewie got absolutely covered in stinky murklurp mud?”

“Ew,” Rey scrunched her nose but let the story continue.

“I don’t remember the story the story she told me,” Rey told Teng, “but I do remember asking a certain question.”

“Mommy, why can’t I take out my hair buns?”

“Well, Sweetheart, it’s a special hairstyle,” Felicity answered.

“It is?”

“Yep, it’s a Valrian one. You know Valra, right? The planet my parents were born.”

“Do my bun got something to do with your Gods?”

“Sort of,” Felicity smiled. Her hands knotted one of the ribbons in Rey’s buns, “The ties in your hair have little symbols on them. Six symbols, each the symbol of one of the Gods. Itar. Ipgyn. Djun. Ethys. Koena. Imar. This hairstyle is one young girls who follow Valrian religion wear, and the symbols of the Gods bring them luck.”

“Why don’t you wear something with the symbols so the Gods can bring you luck?”

“Oh, Sweetheart, I think Mommy’s just about used up all her luck. You want some luck, you go ask your crazy Uncle.”

“Which one?”

“Fair point,” Felicity laughed. “But I meant good old Uncle Loud Mouth.”

“He’s my favorite!”
“Yeah, I think mine too. So, this hairstyle, the girls of our religion wear them. If a Valrian sees a girl wearing this hairstyle with ribbons bearing the lucky symbol, they know she’s one of us and they’re obligated to protect and help her. That’s why I want you to keep them in while we’re on Jakku. I don’t know if there’s any other Valrians around, but if there are, you can ask them for help. But that doesn’t mean you’re allowed to go off with some stranger without Mommy’s permission, even if they’re Valrian. Do you understand?”

“Yes, Mommy,” Rey nodded. “Mommy, are the Gods real?”

“Uh… probably not, but don’t ever say that to a Valrian helping you. They don’t like hearing that.”

“Only the Force is real, right?”

“Sweetheart, Mommy is far too thirsty, hungry, and tired to get into that discussion. Can we put a pin in that and talk about it when we go home with Daddy?”

“Okay,” Rey nodded. “Mommy?”

“Yes, Sweetheart?”

“When are we going home with Daddy?”

“Soon, Rey. He’ll be here soon.”

“Why is he taking so long?”

“I don’t know,” Felicity sighed. “Maybe he’s taking the long way home. But he’ll be here soon, I promise.”

“Wow,” Teng said when Rey had finished. “That’s a sweet memory but at the same time—”

“It’s total downer when you realize my mom had no clue when my dad would get to us and she was contemplating what would happen to us and the possibility of having to leave me on my own, hence the warning to go to Valrians for help?”

“Not to mention the running out of luck line is super depressing.”

Rey sighed, “You don’t think you’re close to running out of luck, right?”

“Are you kidding?” Teng snorted. “You’re going to be dragging me on your crazy adventures for decades.”

Rey grinned as she rested her head on his shoulder.

“Alright, you want to keep your buns in for Valrian protection, I can go with that,” Teng said. “Just as long as you still let me take your hair down when we’re getting frisky.”

“Deal,” Rey laughed.

Teng laughed with her a little and pulled her in for a kiss. It was a playful kiss, but then it turned a little too playful.

“Someone’s frisky this morning,” Rey ran her hands through his hair as Teng nipped at her collarbone and his hands cupped her breasts. “Why so eager?”

“I had intentions last night, but you fell asleep,” Teng slid his knee between her legs and ground it against her.

Rey moaned, “Well, maybe we can fulfill those intentions now.”

“Bunk?”

“Floor.”

Teng pushed her on the ground, hands tearing at her gauze while she unfastened his belt. Their lips and tongue took in each other frantically as Teng started yanked up her tunic.

“Good morning, you two!” a man called.

“Dad!” Rey shoved Teng off her.

With crossed arms, Luke watched the teenagers try to collect themselves, now frantic to redress.

“Hi Daddy,” Rey always used the younger term when she felt guilty, and her found had just walked in on her taking off her boyfriend’s pants, so Daddy it was. She pushed back a loose bit of hair, “You have a good night?”

“Clearly not as good a night as you two,” Luke countered.

“Actually, we didn’t do anything last night,” Teng said. “Hence the attempt now.”

Rey elbowed him in the gut.

“Don’t worry,” Luke held up his hands in surrender. “I get it, you two live together now. Besides, if Rey is anything like her parents—”

“No!” she exclaimed. She shuddered at the involuntary image of her parents canoodling in her mind. “This is your revenge, isn’t it?”

“Little bit,” Luke shrugged. “I just came to tell you two that Dirk has arrived.”

Dirk would watch the Good Ship Restoration during the day for Rey to make sure no one stole it. Truth be told, he would just sleep on it – those days he would do the night guarding shift for Plutt – but after his defeat of Roke in the Fighting Ring, everyone knew not to mess with Dirk, awake or asleep.

“Really?” Rey got to her feet with Teng. “You came all the way out here to tell me Dirk has arrive?”

“Well, Rey, it’s not like I had to go very far,” Luke said.

That was another reason Luke was okay with Rey moving onto the Good Ship Restoration with Teng. The ship was literally parked just behind the walker.

“Come on,” Luke urged. “Let’s go have some breakfast and make sure Quom hasn’t gotten into any trouble alone overnight.”

“You know he’s found a way,” Teng said.

“Oh, without a doubt.”
“You guys go ahead,” Rey smiled. “I’m going to finish retying my hair.”

“Love you, Starlight,” Teng kissed her lips.

Rey waved as she watched the men depart, the pair chatting jovially like Luke hadn’t just walked in on Teng trying to screw Luke’s daughter.

When they were out of sight, Rey sat on their bunk, pausing for a minute to make the bed. Her hands threaded her hair with ease as her pulled and twisted her brown locks in the same style she had worn everyday since she was five-years-old.

She smiled as she thought of that simple memory of her mother. She had grown a larger yearning for her mother ever since Aletha left. Rey still considered Aletha Kymeri as her second mother, but Felicity Rhiaon would always be a part of her.

Then she frowned as she thought over a certain part of the memory.

Who was Uncle Chewie?

Kaydel knew she shouldn’t be spying on the Wookiees, but she couldn’t help it. She spotted them as she passed the large cargo room on her way from Dacken’s room – Poe had arranged for his to be as far away as possible from everyone else’s.

Nobody would notice if she was hiding in a corridor for a while.

Evan was working on Snap and still yelling at him about using a lightsaber on it. Of course, Snap only argue back about how freaking painful it had been, and he learned his lesson, but Evan was still pissed.

Han was securing Jaina Fel’s body bag – keeping his promise to bring her home – and talking to Leia over the comm. Waroo had ultimately been the one to break it to Han… by breaking it to Chewbacca, who broke it to Han. Han had decided he would be the one to tell her that he saw their son, their son had almost made their grandparents, and now their son’s… lover (what better word was there for it) was having a miscarriage.

He had also asked Poe what Ben had meant to ask about Felicity, but Poe practically ran out of the room when Han asked him. Whatever Kylo told Poe – Kaydel didn’t even know – Han was not going to get it out of Poe easily.

Karé was having a nap. If anyone needed one, it was her. Her accomplishments had really been underrated in the grand scheme of things, and now that she knew her husband would be okay, she didn’t want to wake up for nine hours.

Dacken was trying to stay out of everyone’s way, though he kept asking how Hena and her son were doing.

Shayna was keeping Hena company, and Hena’s son, Ryn distracted. Ryn was trying out Shayna’s wheelchair, racing along the corridors (with Shayna’s permission and encouragement) as the boy would probably need to use one for the rest of his life. He clung to stories of Shayna’s own triumphs without being able to walk. Hena confessed to Shayna that the only reason Ryn didn’t feel scared about his legs was that “the cool pilot who being so tough about his. I’m at double the pain, so I’m going to be double tough.”
Snap almost cried when Shayna told him that.

Evan almost cried when Shayna told him she loved playing with Ryn so much, she wanted a grandkid now. Apparently, Evan had turned a shade so pale that Stormtrooper armor looked black in comparison.

Rose and Paige were resting in a small lounge area, just holding each other, and celebrating that they were both fine. Paige was also grilling her sister for every scrap of information about Marks, while Rose tried to deflect, asking about Paige’s father’s riding lesson that felt like a lifetime ago.

And Poe… Poe had disappeared. He had asked to see Kes in private for a moment to chat, and Kaydel could not find any Dameron for the life of her.

It was fine, Kaydel needed to wander around alone for a while and just clear her head. That was how she came upon Waroo and Chewbacca.

Kaydel stood there and watched as father and son tended to a job they had been working on with Han before this whole Nixrye nonsense. It was long overdue, and probably wouldn’t end up completed, but it was a way to pass the time and bond.

They growled back and forth, sharing tales of their adventure on Nixrye (though Kaydel couldn’t speak Wookiee, so they could be trading jamba fruit pie recipes for all she knew) and just… spending time together. Chewbacca would scruff his son’s fur, Waroo would boast about her fighting skills, they would share memories of their times together, Waroo would seek guidance on how he dealt with Ben Solo.

…That was how a father and child were supposed to be.

Kaydel sighed and pressed herself against the wall.

She was safe on a ship away from Nixrye because three fathers, a sister, and a mother had decided to brave all and rescue the ones they loved. Even Kylo Ren’s father had wanted to save his son? But her family?

Her father had been a coward, throwing both her and Katha and anyone else he could to the wolves when he was in danger.

Her sister had handcuffed her to a wall and left her for dead.

Her mother had thrown her out on the street when Kaydel Ko Connix had never had a good family. She tried not to resent the people that did, but as she watched the Wookiee father and son, her heart burned with jealousy.

Then she glanced down the corridor from where she had come. Off towards Dacken’s room.

Dacken. Her nephew looking for a second chance.

Kaydel sighed. No, she was wrong; despite the overpowering figures of anger and evil among their ranks, her entire family wasn’t terrible.

Her relationship with Dacken was new, but he gave up everything to follow her to the Resistance.

Her brother, Keth financially supported her, even though if he was found out, he would put his wife and children in danger from Alecta.
Her sister, Kyra, was a bit of a bitch but in the way Holdo was. When that bitchiness was against you, may the Goddesses help you, but when she was on your side, nothing could stop the two of you.

And her Aunt Aletha was her friend, mentor, and second mother. Sure, sometimes she struggled with the insanity of Kaydel and her friends, but more often than not, she was right there playing a part in it.

So with a smile on her face, Kaydel left the Wookiees to their bonding.

---

Kes Dameron just stared at his son.

It had been about ten minutes since he blurted out the fate of Felicity Rhiaon Skywalker to his father. Kes had no words for a full ten minutes, and when he did, they were a simple:

“…Holy shit.”

Poe sat back against the wall, they were sitting in a corridor alone. The Eravana was a huge ship, so it was easy to find a corner where no one would discover or hear you.

“Yeah, I had about the same sentiments,” Poe sighed. He wouldn’t cry. He couldn’t cry. “I also… kind of threw up a bit.”

“I don’t blame you. I’m feeling a little nauseous myself.”

“Oh, it’s not that part that made me sick. That son of a bitch decided to give an extremely graphic description what happened to her.”

“Poe, what have I told you about insulting Ben Solo?”

“Not to call Leia a bitch in the process?”

“Fine,” Poe rolled his eyes a little. “The little bastard gave me a play by play of what happened to her. It was awful… I actually tried to kill him for it.”

“I’m not going to lie and say I’m angry with you for it. I just can’t believe it, all this time, Luke’s had to carry that burden.”

Poe hesitated, “Do you- Do you think that’s why he left? That that’s what broke him?”

“Hey,” Kes grabbed his son’s knee, “we’ve talked about this. It’s not your fault. You were an eighteen-year-old boy trying to give words of comfort to a grown man who lost everything. It’s not your fault that Luke left.”

“I know.”

“But you don’t believe me.”

Poe sighed, “I… I want to, but-”
Kes pulled his son in for a hug. Poe stayed in his father’s arm for a minute, just frozen, but then he gave him. He broke down. He clutched and wept in Kes’ strong arms.

“How am I going to tell them?” asked Poe. “Kylo called me out in front of Solo. How can tell… How can I tell Leia? How can I tell her this after already hearing about her grandkid?”

Poe may hate Leia’s son, but he wasn’t stupid. He knew she would mourn the grandchild that would never be. For a moment Poe’s mind flicked to Sasa, and he thought that poor girl.

But he couldn’t have sympathy for Ben, not after what he had done to Felicity Rhiaon.

“How do I tell them what he did?” Poe asked. “I don’t know if I can.”

Kes sighed and squeezed his son, “Then I’ll do it for you.”

“Really?” Poe pulled back.

Kes smiled and stroked his son’s face, “I am your father. I am here to protect you and care for you. It’s literally in my job description.”

“But Dad-”

“It’s okay, Cielito,” Kes promised. “Let me take this burden from you.”

Poe smiled, and he felt ten tonnes lighter.

“Hey, Connix?” Han stopped Kaydel as she passed him in the wall. “Do you mind going into the fresher and grabbing some more bacta pads for Hot Shot? I keep an extra box in there.”

“Sure.”

Han pointed her down another hall and told her it was three doors on the right. Kaydel entered the fresher and immediately set eyes on the medicine cabinet. She reached up to open the cabinet but paused.

Her hands were still stained with Doxl Ren’s blood.

Shaking her head, Kaydel glanced at the sink and grabbed the box of bacta pads from the cabinet. She set them down and turned on the water. There was no real thought in her head as she casually washed the blood off her hands, just a smile when she realized that the hand soap in the fresher of Han Solo’s enormous shipping freighter was Leia Organa’s favorite kind. Soon enough the blood was scrubbed all away.

Satisfied at the job she had done, Kaydel turned off the tap and turned toward the towel rack. She reached for the rather grody looking towel and froze.

Doxl Ren’s blood was back on her hands.

Kaydel frowned and turned the tap back on. She scrubbed extra hard this time, even taking the time to get under her fingernails. Her hands clean, Kaydel smiled and turned off the tap. She reached for the towel and froze.

Her hands were bloody again.
Kaydel’s heart pounded in her chest as it came to her again.

Kaydel was fighting Doxl Ren. He was trying to hurt her. Kill her.

She slit his throat without a second thought. His eyes bulged, his blood stained her hands. He burbled, choking on his blood as Kaydel held him in her arms. She held him there, didn’t move to help Doxl as he drowned in his own blood.

Then she dropped his body to the ground with a sickening thwack.

Frantically she turned on the tap again and scrubbed furiously. Her skin chaffed as she rubbed soap into it over and over again, desperately trying to get rid of the blood that wouldn’t disappear down the drain.

Thwack!

Thwack!

Kaydel couldn’t get the sound of his body hitting the ground out of her brain. She didn’t notice that she had gone through half a bottle of soap as she scrubbed her hands raw.

“Kay?” Poe called.

She instantly shut off the tap as the Poe ducked into the fresher.

“There you are,” he grinned. “Solo said he sent you here. You found the bacta pads alright?”

“Oh, yeah,” she grabbed the box and held them out to him.

Poe frowned; Kaydel’s hands were red, raw, and dripping with water.

“Are you okay, Babe?” he asked.

“What?” Kaydel scowled. “I’m fine.”

“You sure?”

“Of course, I’m sure. What kind of question is that?”

“Alright, I was just asking.” Poe grabbed the box, then turned and yelled out the door, “Hey, Solo! Incoming!”

Poe whipped the box far away from him.

“Nice catch!” Poe turned back to face Kaydel. “Uh, Solo’s down the hall waiting for those.”

“I assumed as much,” Kaydel replied. “I’m fairly certain you wouldn’t throw something and make Han Solo go fetch it… Evan maybe, Dacken absolutely, but not Han Solo.”

“Ah, you know me so well.” Poe reached to take her hand, but she pulled it away. “Kay?”
She realized what she had done.

“Sorry,” she a little too eagerly grabbed his hand. Kaydel squeezed it in what she thought was a reassuring way, but to Poe it felt like she was trying to break it.

Still he didn’t pull away, “Babe, is something going on?”

“No, of course not.”

“Kay, remember we promised never to lie to each other.”

“I’m not lying!” her objection wasn’t angry. “Look, Poe I’m just a little frazzled from the events of today.”

“Makes sense,” he stroked the back of her hand with his thumb. “It was very a stressful and traumatic event. I would understand if there was something that… put you out of sorts.”

“Poe, I swear, I’m o…” She stopped herself. “I will be okay.”

“Allright,” he said quietly. He heaved a sigh and pulled her in for a hug, “Alright, but if you need anything, I’m here for you.”

“I know,” Kaydel smiled. She felt so safe in his arms, “I know. You always are there for me, especially today. I haven’t thanked you for saving my life back there.”

“Saving your life?” he laughed, pulling back a little. “Kay, if it wasn’t for you, Ben Solo would have my head mounted on his wall right now. You saved my life today, no question about it.”

“Well then, I guess you’re welcome. I still can’t believe we got out of any of that.”

“Me neither.” Poe hesitated for a moment, “Kaydel, there’s something I should tell you. I… I almost died today.”

“Yeah, I know, I was there.”

“No, I meant in the ballroom.”

Kaydel tilted her head.

Poe took a deep breath, “After the explosion… I almost died. I was lying there on the floor, already accepting that fact. I was thinking of seeing my mother again and how my father would take the news… and then I thought of you. I thought that there was still a chance you could be alive, and I knew I had to find you. I could have died today, but I choose to live for you.”

He didn’t mean to make Kaydel burst into tears with his words, but he was happy to hold her in his arms when she did.

“I love you, Poe,” Kaydel clung onto him tightly. “I love you so much.”

“Not as much as I love you,” Poe bent down and kissed her.

They stood in the fresher for while just clinging to each other and kissing. They were alive; they were in each other’s arms and they were alive. They had survived it all: bombs, Crimson Dawn, angry relatives, psychotic aunts, Knights of Ren, Imperial Loyalists, Stormtroopers, and high society parties. They had made it out alive, and they were in each other’s arms.
When they finally finished their kissing, they still held each other, Kaydel’s head resting on Poe chest and Poe with his chin atop her head.

“I’m so glad you made it out alive,” Kaydel whispered.

“Kay, I told you already, I’m not going anywhere. 108, that’s my promise.” Poe glanced out into the hall, “Hey, Babe?”

“Yeah, Peacock?”

“Well, I know my dad’s on the ship and there’s a small child in the vicinity… but do you want to go have Thank God We’re Alive sex in a supply closet?”

“Yeah, okay,” she pulled out of his arms.

He grinned, grabbed her hand, and they ran out the door.

“Chapter Seventeen. When the door to the cell slid open, Han was on his lying back, the Princess and Chewbacca crowding over him. For a woman who had fought for so many years to deny her feelings for Han, there was no denying anything in that moment as Leia tenderly stroked his forehead.”

Marks sat on the bed, knees curled up to his chest and a smile on his face as he listened to Lando Calrissian and the Treason on Bespin.

“Thankfully Han didn’t have any true external wounds, though I knew better than to think the Mighty Dark Lord Vader would use traditional torture methods. The sounds of Han’s screams echoed in my head once more, and they’ve never truly left me since. It is only in the arms of a beautiful young Jedi named Alyla Kene that I found any solace.”

Marks winced. It was painfully clear that the thirteenth volume of The Calrissian Chronicles, had been recorded four years before Alyla Kene’s death. The ones written after had a slightly more depressing tone whenever Alyla was mentioned. The nineteenth volume, Lando Calrissian and the Heart of a Jedi, detailing how Lando met and fell in love with Alyla was hailed by critics as heartbreakingly genuine. Calrissian had actually won a few awards for that book.

Of course, it was volume twenty-four, Lando Calrissian and the Death of the Morning Glory that was a real punch to the gut. Even Han Solo had cried when he heard Lando telling the story of Alyla’s death.

“Chewie let out a mighty and protective roar at me as Leia softly told Han of my arrival. It roused Han, but he struggled to find the strength to sit up on his own, Leia’s delicate hands guiding up his back to help him.

When I came to a stop, Chewie let out an even more dangerous roar. I thought back to Numidian Prime when Han ordered him to tear off my arms. He had joked later that he didn’t mean it, but there is no doubt in my mind that if Han hadn’t found that card up my sleeve, my nickname would be ‘No Arms Calrissian.’

Han was no less dangerous to me than Chewbacca. He looked upon me with pure hatred, no sympathy whatsoever for my position and responsibility to the people of Cloud City.
He said to me, ‘Get out of here, Lando-’

‘Shut up and listen!’ I snapped. Thankfully the group allowed me to speak, though the looks on Han and Chewie’s faces were anything but pleasant. I wasn’t playing games in that moment, I hurried my explanation while they gave me the chance to say my peace. ‘Vader has agreed to turn Leia and Chewie over to me.’

‘Over to you?’ Han scowled.

‘They’ll have to stay here, but at least they’ll be safe,’ my voice pleaded with them to understand I was on their side. Of course, at that time I had yet to grasp how stubborn and unforgiving Han and Leia were, though they did end up making me their son’s third-in-line Godfather (assuming nothing happens to Luke and Chewie first) so I guess I’ve done something right since then.

‘What about Han?’ Leia asked me.

It truly hurt me to have to say the next words, there were almost tears in my eyes as I did so, ‘Vader’s giving him to the bounty hunter.’

Leia just looked at me like I was stupid, ‘Vader wants us all dead.’

‘He doesn’t want you at all!’ I snapped. ‘He’s after somebody called Skywalker!’

The words touched something in Han. His demeanor changed in an instant, a look falling over his face, not unlike one I had seen him give Qi’ra a time or two.

Han’s voice was soft as he uttered the name, ‘Luke?’

‘Lord Vader has set a trap for him,’ I explained.

Leia – bless her heart – figured it out in a second, ‘And we’re the bait.’

‘Well, he’s on his way,’ I told them.

I would later find out how unremarkable a statement that was. Luke Skywalker would rush headfirst into any danger that befell his friends. I can’t tell you how many times Luke rallied the troops for a rescue mission. I’m sad to say that I was the center of a few of them, but my favorite rescue mission had to be the time Luke’s wife got kidnapped while pregnant.

Alas, that is a tale for another volume, and at this point Luke had yet to meet Felicity.

Thank God. That woman’s a menace... She’s going to kick my ass when she listens to this. Sorry, Fliss. You’re not exactly a people person.

Yet it was despite this insistence of Luke to rush into insane traps, Han still felt such a swell of anger at the thought I had helped set such a trap using him against Luke.

‘Perfect,’ Han growled, raising slowly to his feet. ‘You fixed us all pretty good, didn’t you?’

I turned my head away from Han, trying to think of a way that would make him understand. Even though Han and I had never really gotten along, clearly our bond had meant a little something to him, because his voice dripped with acid.

‘My friend!’ Han spat out at me.

The next thing I knew, Han hauled off and punched me right in the face. The blow forced me back around from him. I heard the crash to the floor and the Imperials set on Han. My heart pounded fast. No! This was my friend. I might have betrayed him, but Han was my friend. If anything, I owed him for at least saving L3.

‘Stop!’ I roared.

Eyes filled with fear at me, the Imperials immediately backed away.

I sighed as I took in the sight of my visage. My cape had been thrown off and my jaw ached with pain. A man always has to look dignified, so the first thing I did was set my cape back on right. I liked that outfit, a lot, and the cape just goes so perfectly with it.

But I digress.

‘I’ve done all I can,’ I told them. They just couldn’t understand. I was doing right, I had to have been doing the right thing. ‘I’m sorry I couldn’t do better, but I have my own problems.’

‘Yeah,’ Han growled on the floor, ‘you’re a real hero.’

The words stopped me for a moment, and I looked back at this man I once thought a friend, lying on the floor of my city in pain and utterly betrayed by the man who promised help in one of his darkest moments.

And considering that man was Han Solo, that’s saying some.

In that moment as Han stared at me with such utter hatred, my faith started to waver.

Was I doing the right thing?”

“What are you doing?”

Marks looked up in shock. He instantly slammed down on the stop button when he saw Kylo Ren standing in the doorway.

“Nothing, Sir,” Marks scrambled to his feet, shoving the Holo player away. “Just… enjoying a HoloNovel?”

Kylo narrowed his eyes, “Who told you that you could read that one?”

Marks glanced at the HoloChip case sitting on the bunk next to him. It was a twenty-five HoloNovel set with a heroic and cape-clad Lando Calrissian armed with two blasters dramatically splashed across it. Small images of the characters of his adventures – Han Solo, Chewbacca, L3, Lobot, his Wampa friend Emri, and of course beautiful but scarred Alyla Kene – appeared in scattered circles. Gold pen had scrawled across the case an autograph with the epigraph, “To My Little Buddy, Ben, Who I Endeavour To Corrupt. Love, Fun Uncle Lando.”

Not only did Kylo own the complete set of the first twenty-five volumes, but he owned the other three subsequent books in the series, and had pre-orders in for the next two books, Lando Calrissian and the Search for the Millennium Falcon, and Lando Calrissian and the Rebel of Tomorrow.

“Uh…” Marks frowned at Kylo, “didn’t you say I could read this series considering… you know?”

The look on Kylo’s face suggested that was not the right phrasing.

“Master Kylo,” Marks tried again, “I did seek your permission-”
“I said you could read Lando Calrissian and the Spices of the Galaxy,” Kylo snapped. “I said you could read Lando Calrissian and the Blood in History. I’ve told you before that you could read Lando Calrissian and the Treasure of Scarif, Lando Calrissian and the Yavinese Courtesan, The Emperor of Nowhere, The Sounds of the Swamp, The Pantego Pact, The Memory in the Mountain, The Temple of the Sharu, The Cloud City Conspiracy, hell, you can read Lando Calrissian and the Crimson Dawn Showdown! I did not say you could read Lando Calrissian and the Treason on Bespin! I do not want that Rebellion propaganda blasting in my room. The only reason I keep that volume is to maintain a complete collection. You know how annoyed Sasa can be over missing pieces, it would drive her insane to get rid of one.”

Marks had to hold back a snort. Oh, Kylo kept that volume for a reason, but it certainly wasn’t to complete his set.

Kylo held out his hand, “Give me the chip.”

Reluctantly, Marks pulled out the data chip containing the recording of Lando Calrissian and the Treason on Bespin and surrendered it to Kylo.

“Good,” Kylo shoved it in his pocket. “Now I don’t want to catch you listening to this one again. You can read any other of the series, but not this one, am I understood?”

Marks’ face hardened, “Understood.”

Kylo turned and stalked out the room.

Marks stayed where he was for a long while. He clenched his fist, thinking of all Kylo had taken from him. Certain that Kylo was not going to return, Marks yanked out another book data chip and shoved it in the HoloNovel Projector.

The handsome, but older figure of Lando Calrissian beamed up, looking and sounding as charming as ever, but there was a sadness in his eyes as he narrated this volume.

“The Calrissian Chronicles: Volume Twenty-Four. Lando Calrissian and the Death of the Morning Glory. Written and narrated by Lando Calrissian. Published by High Cloud Publishing House.

Prologue.

Alyla Kene was the love of my life. I am not ashamed to admit that. Sure, I’ve had many great loves in all shapes and sizes. I’m a man with the taste for the finer things in life, and Alyla Kene was my finest taste of all.

It wasn’t that she was a Jedi – that was just a bonus – and it wasn’t because of her beauty – and any man who tells me those scars marred that beauty can fight me – but that woman… Oh that woman. She was everything I wanted and needed. She was kind, courageous, clever, calm, and a multitude of c and c-sounding words. Cloud City might have turned me into a responsible man, but it was Alyla Kene who made me a better one. I would have followed her into the Unknown Regions if she asked me. I wanted her by my side until my dying day.

But unfortunately, her dying day came first.

Chapter One.

Ben Solo was always a troubled kid…”
Solo didn’t know MK-6093 kept a bootleg copy of it in his pillowcase, watching it with headphones in in the dead of night.

Lando Calrissian and the Death of the Morning Glory always broke his heart, but Marks was drawn to it like a moth to flame. He couldn’t deny his connection to the story and wonder what if…

It was ridiculous to even finish that thought.

His hands were balled into fists so tight, Marks’ fingernails were starting to cut into his palms. He was angry, but that didn’t mean he had to hurt himself. Trying to distract himself, Marks shoved his hands into his pockets.

He paused. There was something in his pocket.

Frowning, Marks pulled it out, not knowing quite what to expect. But he smiled when he saw what he had accidentally smuggled from Nixrye.

“Marks, do you mind?” Rose asked once more.

“Hand them over,” Marks held out his hand, Rose having passed the gloves to him a few times in the communication centre. Without a second thought, he shoved them into his pant pocket.

He had accidentally stolen Rose Tico’s gloves.

Marks smiled to himself, fiddling the gloves as he thought about Rose while Lando Calrissian explained the loving connection Lando held between Alyla Kene and the morning glory flower.

“Well,” Marks said to himself, but worse came to worse, he could pretend he was talking to the unconscious Berd on the floor, “it’d be rude not to give them back to her.”

“Okay, almost got it… there!” Kes exclaimed as he fitted the large black primary photoreceptor onto the cranium of the orange and white droid. He apparently had not been too drunk to bring the half reassembled BB-8 to be worked on during the long trips between Yavin IV and Nixrye, and then from Nixrye to D’Qar via meeting the Ninka halfway.

…Or maybe drunk Kes Dameron had thought I’m going to bring my son’s droid to him and not taken in the fact that BB-8 was just a bag of parts at the moment.

Probably the latter.

“Good job,” Rose smiled at Kes, having mostly gotten over her outrage at him by that point. She was helping him out with BB-8 while keeping a side eye on Paige, lying on a bunk in the corner, being tended to by Evan. “Why don’t you check the wiring I just did, and I think I’m work on repairing the swappable circular tool-bay disks. Anyone know which ones Poe usually has on BB-8?”

Evan looked confused.
“The orange circles,” Rose elaborated. “They’re where BB-8 keeps his tools and can be replaced and upgraded with minimal programming. Do you know what tools BB-8 usually has?”

“No, you should probably ask Poe,” Evan turned back to looking over Paige’s head wound.

“Where is Poe?” Kes asked. “Why am I working on my son’s droid without him being anywhere near here?”

“You want the honest answer?” Paige sat up, despite Evan’s urgings to lay back down.

Kes’ face fell, “I think I already know it.”

“Yeah, you do,” Paige said. “He’s probably humping Kaydel in a supply closet, celebrating they’re alive.”

Evan shook his head, “Some people have no restraint.”

“What are you talking about?” Paige frowned. “If I didn’t have this headwound, we’d be doing the same thing.”

“Ugh!” Rose pulled a face.

Evan just gave an awkward laugh, pulling at his collar, “Paige! We wouldn’t- That is completely improp- I would never-”

“Hey, Hot Shot?” Kes set down his pliers. “Your mom’s three corridors down, having a nap. She can’t hear any of this.”

“Oh, okay, yeah, if Paige didn’t have a headwound we’d getting down to business too.”

“Ew! Evan!” Rose covered. “That’s my sister!”

“Yeah, and I’ve been sleeping with him for almost two years. Deal with it, Rose,” Paige rolled her eyes.

“I hate you,” she glared at her sister.

“Alright, fine,” Kes huffed. “I know what a sex fiend my son and his girlfriend are. I’m not going to get his help with BB-8 any time soon.”

“Wow,” Evan shook his head, “you’ve really heard that many stories of their sexcapades?”

Kes lifted an eyebrow, “Nope… I figured it out when I caught them a year ago having sex in my bed.”

Evan and the Ticos groaned in unison.

“Kaydel, no,” Paige whispered.

“Is nothing sacred?” Rose asked.

“Yeah, lying to my mother about being a virgin is much better than pulling that kind of stunt,” Evan said.

“Alright, now that you’re all sharing in my misery, I think I’ll check out your wiring, Rose,” Kes flipped over BB-8 cranium. “Could you hand me the gloves I loaned you, Pobrecita? I want to be protected from electrical shock.”

Rose went into her pocket but came up with nothing. Scowling, she slipped her hand into another pocket, but it too was empty. Frantically, she patted and rechecked each pocket at least six times.

Then she checked her small breast pocket – too small to contain the gloves – and found her answer.

She was still carrying Marks’ little rose.

Rose couldn’t help but smile.

“Pobrecita?” Kes called. Though the term meant poor little girl he liked having a teasing little nickname for her. “Rose, do you have those gloves?”

She remembered what happened to them, how she so carelessly handed them off to Marks and never got them back. They had simply forgotten about them, and while she should be ashamed that she lost something that had been loaned to her, Rose couldn’t bring herself to feel too bad.

All she could think about was the little red rose in her hand and the man who had given her said flower.

“No,” Rose said. “Sorry, Mr. Dameron. I think I lost them.”

“Oh, that’s alright. Hey, Hot Shot, could you check the tool box under Paige’s bunk? I think Solo said he keeps a pair in there.”

Evan pulled out the toolbox, and he and Kes chatted about wiring and BB-8 and whatnot. Neither man noticed the look passing between Rose and Paige Tico.

Paige’s eyes were on the little rose in her sister’s hand. She knew where it came from, who it came from, and if the scene she and Shayna witnesses between Rose and Marks was anything to go on, she knew what it meant to Rose. Paige lifted a coy eyebrow at her sister and sent her the same knowing look Rose once sent her when Paige first fell in love with Evan Tharel.

Rose smiled and just slipped that little rose back in her breast pocket.

That flower could be their little secret… okay, her, Paige, and Rey’s because Rose was so squealing about this with her best friend.

Oh, who was she kidding? SHE FINALLY HAD SOMETHING TO TELL THE COUNCIL!

…That she might have accidentally fallen in love with a Stormtrooper with the Galaxy’s most perfect cheekbones.

Damn it.

When Luke and Teng joked that Quom had found a way to get into trouble, they didn’t expect to find him lying on the ground in his tent, in the fetal position, moaning like a dying animal.

“Quom!” Rey exclaimed dropping to her knees.

“MG,” Quom groaned in pain, clutching his stomach. “It hurts so much.”
“What hurts?” Luke got down next to her and Rey held the Vrogem. “Quom, what happened?”

Teng behind them raced to pull out the medical kit.

“My stomach,” Quom writhed around, maybe a little too dramatically. “Something’s wrong inside of it. It feels like it’s… bubbling.”

“Bubbling?” Rey looked to her father, hoping he had an explanation.

Luke did not, “How long ago did this start?”

“I woke up like this,” Quom answered. “But that’s not all that’s happening. I keep… I keep… Ah… AH…”

Quom gave a mighty sneeze… and shot out burst of flame from his nose that missed Teng by an inch.

Everyone just stared at each other.

Rey got to her feet, “Yeah, okay, I’m calling Aletha.”

“Alright, Meredyth’s in the cargo hold prepping all the supplies she can,” Aletha announced, entering the cockpit where Jessika was flying their transport. In relief she sunk down into the co-pilot chair, “And I finally got Diego down for a nap.”

Jessika raised an eyebrow.

She pulled a face, “Ugh, I sound like his mother.”

“Yeah, it sounded kind of creepy. So, Nalto’s been wound tighter than a violin string lately, how’d you get him down?”

“Oh, I have my ways.”

“So… sex or sedation?”

“Jessika!” Aletha scolded. She paused. “It was both.”

Jessika high fived her.

“So everything go good with the vendors?” Jessika asked.

“It’ll be a lovely event,” Aletha said. “And I expect you to wear a dress.”

“Leggings and a long top that ends with a skirt.”

“Deal,” Aletha laughed. She patted Jessika’s arms, “Oh, I’ve missed you girls. Everyone been behaving themselves?”

“We’re literally heading to the Ninka because Kaydel, Paige, and somehow also Rose managed to blow up a billion credit resort.”

“Fair enough,” Aletha said. “Hey, I forget, which one of you girls has my Kira comm?”
“I’ve got it right here,” Jessika patted her pant pocket.

“Thanks for holding onto it. I just didn’t want to risk it getting lost or stolen on Hosnian Prime. I’m sorry that it’s just been the two of you alone to talk. I’m not quite sure you have a huge amount in common to have long conversations about.”

“Oh, we’ve been fine,” she waved off. “I taught Kira all about grenades and electrocuting people.”

Aletha plucked her comm from Jessika’s pocket, “You’re no longer allowed to talk to her unsupervised.”

“Fair enough.”

The comm started to beep at that exact moment.

“I think Kira missed you,” Jessika grinned.

Aletha shook her head and answered the comm, “Hey, Kira. What’s up?”

Rey grinned at the men around her, “Yes! Aletha’s back!”

“Dad, I’ve been talking to these girls for almost two years. I got the hang of it.” Rey answered the comm, “Aletha! I’ve missed you.”

“I missed you too, Sunshine, but it’s like nine in the morning where you are. What’s going on?”

“Quom’s gotten into a weird situation.”

“…So, nothing new then?”

“Oh, this bit’s new. Quom’s sick, and we’ve never seen this sort disease before.”

Aletha sighed, “Sunshine, you know the rule. I can’t diagnose stuff simply over the comm. It’s better I see it in person, and kind of unethical that could possibly make me lose my license.”

Jessika snickered in the background, “Aletha, there are many things you do that should probably get you to lose your license.”

“Zip it, you.”

“Please, Aletha,” Rey begged. “I wouldn’t ask if it wasn’t super out of the ordinary.”

“Kira, stop it. The answer is no, and nothing you can say will change that.”

Rey shared a look with her father.

“Oh, Aletha?” Rey said. “…Quom’s sneezing flames.”

There was a very long pause.

“Yeah, okay. I’ve got ten minutes.”
Ten Minutes Later…

“Astral Syndrome,” Aletha declared. “Took a bit of searching of my databanks, but it’s definitely Astral Syndrome.”

“What is Astral Syndrome?” Luke asked, Aletha having found some privacy to talk to all of them.

“It’s a sort of weird but rare Vrogem disease. Quom, did you eat anything new recently?”

“Borgus Lye traded us some of that nexu jerky,” Quom groaned, still in the fetal position on the floor.

“Bingo. Vrogem have these special digestive acids that when they interact with certain kinds of proteins – nexu included – it makes the acid bubble, then it goes into the sinuses and you start sneezing out the reactive gases, which happen to combust when met with oxygen. So you’re not sneezing flames, you’re sneezing gas that burns in the air. It’s a tame fire, though. Easy to put out.”

“Oh, that makes me feel better,” Quom rolled his eyes.

“So, how do we fix him?” Luke asked.

“Well, first of all, Quom should not be unattended at all for the rest of the day. It only lasts about a day, but things can get bad if he’s left alone.”

Teng sighed, “Why can I already tell I’m drawing babysitting duty?”

“Oh, come on, Love,” Rey patted his arm, “you be nice to your technically still slave owner.”

“Quom, can you set me free already? I moved out, so it’s not like that I’ll set you free when you pay rent thing works anymore.”

“Teng, I am sneezing flames right now. Can we talk about this later?”

“So how do we treat it?” Luke asked Aletha. “Just sort of run its course.”

“Mostly, but there are a couple weird things you need to do,” Aletha answered. “A paste for him to eat, some medicine to inhale, and then tonight… well, tonight will be interesting. The good thing is that Jedek is close to Jakku right now. I called him, and he’s already got the supplies and on his way to you right now.”

“That’s great,” Teng said. “We usually have to wait at least a month for deliveries.”

“Wait a minute,” Rey frowned, “but Quom and I were going to go do that job at the Sacred Village. We were going to fix some moisture vaporators.”

“No,” Quom answered. “It’s a two-person job at least.”

“Really?” Rey’s eyes brightened.

“Yeah,” Luke smiled. “We’ll do some father/daughter bonding.”
“Sweet!” Rey exclaimed.

“Oh yay,” Teng heaved a sigh. “Babysitting a sick Quom Tinadar duty.”

“My condolences, Teng,” Aletha said.

“Yeah, sorry to burst your father/daughter bubble, but that’s not happening,” Quom said.

Rey frowned, “Why not?”

“Because—” Quom got a weird look on his face. “Uh oh.”

They all dove out of the way as Quom sneezed and set Teng’s old cot on fire. Luke was quick to put it out.

“The job’s in Synael.”

“Oh,” Aletha hissed.

“What?” Rey frowned. “I don’t understand. What’s wrong with Synael?”

“We both are,” Aletha said.

“I don’t understand,” Rey said.

“It’s due to their religious beliefs,” Luke explained. “Rey, I don’t think I’ve ever mentioned this to you, but Synael actually follows the religion of the Valrian Gods, your mother’s homeplanet.”

Rey was shocked, “What? Really?”

“Yeah, unfortunately Felicity never knew about it, otherwise she would have taken refuge there. I only found out about that all roughly three years into living here.”

“So why are you and Aletha banned?” Teng asked. “Your wife was one of them, wouldn’t they welcome you?”

“In theory, but unfortunately I committed an infraction against one of the Five Pillars.”

Rey frowned, “The Five Pillars.”

Luke sighed, “Rey, I think it’s time you learned a little about the religion your mother was born into. Most of all, you need to know about the one thing I greatly respect about the Valrian religion: The Five Pillars of Virtue. Your mother liked to base her values on it… though didn’t always succeed.”

“What are the Five Pillars of Virtue?” Rey asked.

“A set of five ‘crimes’ that are considered the gravest of sins on Valra. Wars had been fought with other planets when foreign royalty broke one of those pillars.” Luke elaborated, “None of the pillars rank higher than the others (at least officially) but they aren’t exactly on par. They have the same amount of dishonour associated with them, but punishments doled out for breaking them are on different levels.”

And Luke told them that the Five Pillars of Virtue were the following:

Murder – albeit killing in self-defence or to protect a family member or innocent about to be killed did not count.

Sexual Assault – even verbal harassment was part of the pillar, Valrians having a strict zero tolerance policy they kept.

Abusing Innocents – child and animal abuse were met with immediate death sentences while the abuse of the elderly, handicapped, or even power dynamics were dealt with very strictly.

(He didn’t tell the group that technically Luke being Felicity’s boss in the Jedi Order was a mild violation of that pillar, but Felicity’s exact words when Garvan Rhiaon – her paternal uncle who sometimes worked with the Resistance – pointed that out to her were “Yeah, but he’s hot, kind, and has magic powers, so I’m going to keep screwing him.”)

Arson – …honestly Luke never really understood that pillar. Sure, he of all people knew the devastation of fire, but he didn’t understand why arson was on par with rape and murder when there were worse crimes out there. Luke kind of suspected the reason was that the ecology of Valra was mostly forests and grassland. One spark and Valra would go up in a blaze that rivaled Mustafar.

Infidelity – marriage in Valrian culture was a one-time thing, so if your spouse died, you were still considered married.

“So, is that why you can’t go to Synael?” Rey asked. “As far as Valra is concerned, you and mom are still married?”

“And Aletha is his mistress?” Teng added.

“Not just that I’m Luke’s mistress,” Aletha answered. “Luke, you want to take this one?”

Luke sighed, “Yes, that’s the reason I can no longer could go to Synael. When word reached them that a widowed Ojan-”

“How?” Rey asked.

“A man who married into the faith but does not practice it. When they got word a widowed Ojan had started dating Aletha, a widowed Elra-” He caught her confused look again, “A female who does not participate nor is connected to the faith, like your Council friends.”

“Oh,” Rey nodded.

“When they found out that a widowed Ojan started dating a widowed Elra, it had been made clear to me that I wasn’t welcome in the village anymore.”

“It was bad enough Luke was cheating on his wife, but to do it with someone they considered married as well was a terrible afront,” Aletha said. “Like I would ever actually commit adultery.”

“Like my wife wouldn’t find a way to kick my ass beyond the grave if I did,” Luke agreed.
“So, does that mean we can’t take the job?” Rey asked.

“Not unless you want to be chased out of the village and be officially set aside by the Valrian religion and all its protections,” Luke answered. “There’s a reason your mother never officially stepped away from the religion, not only does it connect you to a vast network of aid… but they would actually cut off your hair buns, Rey.”

“Okay, no Synael trip then,” Rey said quickly.

“Yeah Valrians go hard with their disowning,” Luke shook his head. “Your mother and I stayed with your mother’s maternal family once before we were married. They were so angry that she was taking up with an Elda – a man not practicing or connected to the faith, like Teng and Quom – that they actually tricked me into drinking Aabane root, which damages sperm production and makes them deformed.”

Rey scowled, “Wait, so they-”

“Drugged me to make sure I didn’t impregnate your mother. Tried to get me to take some home, but Felicity saw it in my bag and lost her mind. She knew it because she used to make a cordial during the Rebellion for birth control. Made a killing selling it around the bases.”

“Wait, she was the one who did that?” Aletha interjected. “That woman was my hero! The medical teams couldn’t get a solid line on birth control pills or patches, and we ran out of condoms as soon as we got them in. You have no idea how many accidental pregnancies and abortions we had to deal with during the Rebellion.”

“Wow, who would have thought it?” Rey teased. “My mom, Felicity Rhiaon, hero of the Rebellion.”

Quom snorted and Luke only didn’t punch him because a couple embers shot out his nose and almost set the roof on fire.

“It’s a pity that we can’t go do this Synael job,” Quom said, not acknowledging how Luke and Teng frantically batted at the roof. “It was going to bring in a lot of money.”

“I’m even more bummed now knowing it’s Mom’s people,” Rey slumped down in a chair. “I’ve just… been missing her a lot lately and wanted to feel connected to her somehow.”

Luke took the seat next to her and slung an arm around her, “I’ve been feeling the same too. I’ve really been missing your mother.”

“Oh, Goddesses, not this again,” Aletha teased.

“Hey, don’t you start that,” Luke grinned. “Rey, told me you have a new boyfriend.”

She laughed a little too awkwardly at that.

Luke sighed, looking down at his sullen daughter. He wanted to give her this connection to her mother. Rey barely remembered the woman, and he wanted her to know everything about Felicity.

Then he saw Teng in the corner of his eye.

“Hey, you know what?” Luke suggested, “Why don’t you go with Teng?”
“What?” Teng asked.

“Really?” Rey sat up straight. “I’d be for multiple days. Teng and I would be there alone and overnight. Are you sure you trust us that much?”

Quom growled at Teng.

“So, you what to go on the trip with Teng?” Luke asked.

“Uh.” Rey looked to Teng, “You wanna?”

“Of course. Sounds great. You and I spending a couple nights alone on an adventure into your past.”

“You would have work to do,” Luke interjected.

“Yeah,” Rey got up and crossed the room to pull Teng into a hug. “But we make the perfect team.”

Teng kissed the top of her head, and Luke smiled.

Quom sneezed more flame.

“Bless you,” Aletha said.

“Alright,” Rey declared. “It’s settled. Teng and I are going to Synael.”

“Good,” Luke beamed. “But one thing before you go, when you arrive in Synael, make sure you’re very respectful and diligent of the culture. Since your mother is the Mara-”

“Mara?” Rey questioned.

“A grown woman who was born in the faith, practices the faith casually, and has a child in the faith,” Luke elaborated. “You are a Mina. A young woman – not a child, but not yet an adult – who was born into the faith, and practices the faith casually.”

“But I don’t-”

“Your insistence on the hair buns alone makes you a Mina. That’s what the hairstyle represents,” Luke explained. “Now, since your mother is Mara, introduce yourself in connection to her, not me. Especially not me, because they hate me specifically. Make sure your hair buns look perfect, and that your clothing is… modest.”

“Modest?” Rey raised an eyebrow.

“Uh…” Luke glanced at the comm. “Aletha, I can’t say these words to my daughter.”

“Rey, cover up your breasts.”

“I-” Rey’s objection died on her tongue. She tugged up her tunic, “Will make sure they’re covered.”

“Damn it,” Teng muttered.

“And one last thing,” Luke instructed, “make sure that when you’re in Synael, you use your religious name.”
“I have a religious name?”

“Uh huh. Rey is your actual, legal, birth name, but—”

“Finally!” she punched her fist. “That mystery’s finally solved! I mean, I’ve never had reason to doubt it, but finally I can be sure!”

Luke stared at her like she had lost her mind, “Do you think I wouldn’t tell you your actual first name? After I’ve taught you to use a different fake name?”

Rey lowered her fist, “Uh… no?”

Luke shook his head and muttered something Rey knew she probably didn’t want to hear clearly.

“Alright, moving on from that.” Luke muttered something to himself again. “Okay, so when you’re in Synael, use your religious name. It’s okay to casually go by Rey, but mostly use your other name.”

“What’s my religious name?”

“Araeya Rhiaon.”

Rey tested it out, “Araeya. I like it.”

“Good, because you’re stuck with it,” Luke grinned.

“Well, Teng,” Rey hefted her bag over her shoulder, “let’s go on an adventure.”

He gestured toward the exit, “Lead the way, Araeya.”

Quom was finally asleep. Six sneezing fires – including one that resulted in the loss of one of Luke’s eyebrows – and Luke had finally gotten Quom to sleep. And it was an interesting sleep to say the least.

Aletha had given Luke very specific directions on how to deal with Astral Syndrome, the strangest of them being that Quom outside in the sand with no blankets or clothing (that God he was the kind of species that could walk around naked without it overtly looking it) …and his arms had to be tied behind his back.

Luke thought it wise not to ask for an explanation, he just kept Quom’s Uzaka powder close at hand.

His eyes starting to droop beyond his control, Luke decided it was time for bed. Since no one else was around, he took Quom’s cot as his bed for the night.

As he settled down in the cot, Luke wondered about Rey and Teng.

Unfortunately, right before they went to set out, a bad sandstorm hit, delaying their plans. It wasn’t a back afternoon. Luke, Rey, Quom, and Teng sat around playing cards and occasionally putting out one of Quom’s sneeze fires.

When the sandstorm ended, it was almost sunset. Rey and Teng decided to head out towards the village of Synael, spending the night at Old Meru’s. She would let them do it once in a while, but Rey and Teng would still get an ungrateful earful about it.
He was glad they were at least together, but he hated them being off on an overnight trip. Sure, he owed it to Felicity to let Rey explore her Valrian heritage... but he didn’t like Rey being where he couldn’t protect her. Of course, it wasn’t like the Valrians were going to betray Rey and Luke to the First Order. Rey had told him about Aletha’s Resistance battle on Valra and how the Governor of Valra, Garvan Rhiaon (Rey totally having no clue the man was her great uncle) had been working with Leia to battle the First Order.

Luke figured Garvan was doing it in the names of Rey and Felicity, still thinking them dead. Felicity may have been estranged from her uncle, but Garvan Rhiaon took his religion very seriously. Felicity hadn’t been officially cut out of the Rhiaon family as she was the Andromias family, so as the head of the Rhiaon line, Garvan did have his obligations to protect his niece and her child. After news of Felicity’s death had broken, Garvan had reached out to Luke and promised the resources of Valra to avenge the girls.

That said, Garvan still hated Luke... but Luke had also killed Garvan’s little brother, Alaric, so Luke wasn’t getting his hopes up to ever be on Garvan’s good side.

No, Luke had to admit that Rey would safe, and if not, well, she was a Skywalker. She was bound to end up having crazy adventures that raised Luke’s blood pressure. Besides... he taught his girl well. Rey could protect herself, and it was only for a couple nights.

Quom on the other hand, well Luke had just stripped his best friend naked, tied his hands behind his back, and threw him into the cold desert night.

Sometimes it was very clear to Luke that Aletha didn’t ever officially finish her medical training.

Luke sighed and pushed away his blankets. He had to go get Quom.

“Oh, don’t worry, Luke, he’ll be fine out there,” a woman said. “He’s naked with his arms tied behind his back. How much trouble can he get up to? Then again it is Quom Tinadar, so...”

Sure enough, there was Alyla Kene sitting on his work bench.

“Oh, turns out that Ben’s not quite done with the Nixrye nonsense, my son is busy, and Lando’s hosting a banquet, so it’ll be hours before he goes to sleep. I figured I’d come hang out with you again.”

Luke sighed and joined her on the bench, “You can’t come to me any time you get bored, Alyla.”

“I’m sorry but I’ve been putting up with Ben Solo for ten years. I think I deserve a break.”

“Fair enough.” Luke hesitated, “So, what was that about Lando not going to sleep?”

Alyla shook her head, “Ben and I... made an arrangement.”

“Oh?”

“I’m not telling you it.”

“Come on, Alyla, it’s been forever since we had a heartfelt midnight talk. Why not have one now if you’re going to interrupt my sleep?”
“Oh, can’t we play cards or something?” Alyla frowned.

Luke shook his head, “What is my life become that I can legitimately play cards with a ghost? This was not in the brochure when Obi-Wan told me about Jedi.”

“Yeah, he did a real bait and switch with that recruitment process.”

“Tell me about it,” Luke held up his robotic hand. “Now come on, Alyla, frankly I’m tired of having no answers about you. You’re one of my dearest friends, and come on, you’ve been hanging around with Ben for ten years. I can’t imagine you’ve really had anyone to talk to.”

Alyla sighed, “I just don’t see how having one of our talks will do anything.”

“Come on, our midnight talks have always been very productive. I got a kid out of one of them.”

“Yeah, and you never thanked me for that.”

Luke rolled his eyes, “Fine. Thank you, Alyla for getting me laid.”

Alyla laughed.

Luke smiled and then reached out and clasped her hand. He liked that her form was solid, there had always been a little something to Alyla and Luke handholds. A little bit of intimacy they didn’t really find the same meaning with with others. It was nothing that would upset Felicity or Lando, but Luke and Alyla had had a strong and close bond of friendship the likes of with Luke only really ever had with Leia.

“Come on,” Luke said. “It’s time for the truth, not matter how much it hurts.”

“It hurts a lot, Luke,” Alyla whispered. She lowered her eyes so Luke couldn’t see the unwarranted shame in them.

“And I’m here to ease that pain. Please, Alyla, tell me the truth. You don’t have to explain how you’re sort of alive, you don’t have to tell me what happened the night you died. You don’t even have to tell me what the agreement about Lando is. But please, just tell me something, anything. How do you have a son? How did I never know about him? Where is he? Who is he?”

She sighed, “Alright, maybe it’s time to tell you at least that part of this story. But it’s not a pretty story… and admittedly it’s kind of ludicrous.”

“Alyla… my parents’ old droids – including one my father built – randomly ended up at the farm I grew up on, carrying a message from my long lost twin sister, after plans got sent to her by my future wife, and then Obi-Wan and I found a Wookiee in a bar to help us who not only had fought with Master Yoda during the Clone Wars, but once upon a time once had his life saved by my father’s ex-padawan. Try me.”

“Fair point.” Alyla took a deep breath, “Alright… the reason you never knew about my son is that I didn’t learn about him until after my death. I didn’t know until Ben found out and told me.”

Luke frowned, “And how did Ben find out?”

MK-6093 sat on the bed, staring the Holo of Lando Calrissian telling the tale of the woman he loved. Such a terrible, but familiar mix of feelings churned in his stomach as he listened to Calrissian’s
"Chapter Seven, Alyla was the one to bring up the idea of kids. It was rather out of the blue, though I could see it was something she had been thinking about for a long time.

The idea was absurd; we hadn’t even said the words I love you and we didn’t live together, but apparently she wanted us to have a kid together… And yet, I said yes without a second thought. I wanted a child with Alyla Kene, and truth be told, I still want a child with her."

"Ben found out because… because my son, my biological son, is the result a bioengineering experiment done by the First Order."

"Bioengineering?"

"Yes, Luke. I didn’t give birth to my son. The First Order took my… genetical material, combined it with the genetic material of a man I hadn’t even met, and created a child."

Marks closed his eyes as he listened to the voice of Lando Calrissian. He remembered the events on Nixrye, not the bombing, but what had happened the day Ben Solo allowed Marks some free time, and the Stormtrooper found himself in the casino.

It had been the last thing in the Galaxy Marks expected, but he couldn’t believe his eyes when he saw Lando Calrissian sitting at a Sabacc table. Evan Tharel hadn’t been crazy, Lando had been at the resort just a few days before the bombing.

Marks couldn’t believe his eyes. He had listened to every single volume of The Calrissian Chronicles, read everything he could about Lando, even had Lando’s picture taped to the wall of his bunk. He had dreamed so many times of seeing Lando Calrissian in the flesh, running up to him, and telling his hero just exactly what Lando meant to him.

Still… Marks didn’t move a muscle.

"But why?" Luke struggled to wrap his head around the explanation. "Why would the First Order bioengineer a child?"

"After the fiascos of Shara Bey and the kidnapping of Prince Akron, the First Order needed to secure another avenue of child collecting," Alyla answered. "They experimented with three things: cloning their current children, purchasing children from terrible parents, and bioengineering children from scratch. My son is the result of the latter."

"How did they get your genetical material?"

"It’s… a long story. One I’m not sure I’m ready to talk about."

There were so many terrible things Alyla has suffered in life, he knew better than to push her to talk about them. Other than Gavyn, Zena, and Lando, Luke was her closest confidant. She would tell him one day, she just needed time.
“Well, what about the father?” Luke asked. “You said that you hadn’t met him when the son was created… did you meet him later?”

Alyla looked away, “…Yes.”

Marks had stood across the casino, just watching Lando Calrissian as he drank, flirted, and gambled. Some people came up to him for autographs and Lando made a whole show out of signing them.

But Marks had just stood there and watched. Over and over, he whispered the words he had been preparing for years to say to Lando Calrissian. Mark just stood there, trying to gather the courage, the strength to walk right up to Lando Calrissian and say them.

He never found that strength, and when Calrissian played his last hand, drank his last drink, and walked out of that casino, Marks hated himself for not following.

Marks had lost his chance.

“Alyla… who is your son’s father?”

It was the first time Luke had seen a ghost cry.

Marks tried not to cry at the thought of his lost chance while he listened to the words of Lando Calrissian he had heard so many times that he could recite them in his sleep.

“Of course, having a biological child with her was out of the question. Alyla had been unceremoniously spayed at the age of fifteen. Adoption was the only answer.

Don’t get me wrong, adoption is fine, but I’m not going to lie, to me there’s always been some charm to notion of having a son of my own biology. My physical features are a true genetic lotto win, and Alyla Kene was the most gorgeous creature in the Galaxy.

I wanted a child with Alyla Kene.”

“Lando?” Luke jaw dropped. “Lando is the biological father of your child?”

“It’s a cruel twist of fate,” Alyla laughed bitterly. “Six months before Lando and I even met, the First Order created our child.”

“A son would be the most amazing gift I could ever be given. Of course, if it was a girl, I would spoil her rotten, treat her like the Princess of Cloud City, and any suitor who sought her hand would be forced to complete some complicated and dangerous test of herculean proportions. Only a man – or woman, or whatever, I won’t judge my imaginary daughter’s taste in partners – who did the Kessel Run in less time than Han Solo could be worthy of my daughter.

But truth be told, I want a son. I think all men have that thought at one point or nothing. A mini me – maybe this one a little taller and broader like Gavyn Kene – who I could mould to my image. He would have my charm and charisma, Alyla’s kindness and resilience, and hopefully Gavyn’s quick mind… he was a lot smarter than Alyla and I. There’s a reason he was the last Jedi to die.”

“Oh Luke,” Alyla cried, “if I had known… If we had known about our son, I never-”

“It’s okay,” Luke grabbed her hand to calm her. “I know you. I know you and Lando wouldn’t have left him.”

“I just… I feel so terrible. All those years I longed for a child, and out there I had one waiting for me.”

“Alyla… who is your child?”

“Amy, how I dreamed of a son of my own with her eyes, my smile, Gavyn’s bulk, and my mother’s cheekbones.”

Marks reached up and touched his cheekbone.

Alyla took a deep breath and said, “His name is MK-6093… Aka Marcus Kene, experimental product of subject 60 – Alyla Kene – and subject 93 – Lando Calrissian – who in initial compatibility calculations between subjects had been the combination with the highest Marks in the desired attributes of a Stormtrooper.”

Marks watched the Holo of his father, Lando Calrissian, with such longing. His breath shaky, Marks whispered the words he had been so afraid to say but wanted nothing more in the Galaxy to utter.

“Hello, Lando Calrissian. My name is Marcus Kene, and I’m your son. Please… will you help me?”

Alyla gave him a gentle smile, “But you can just call him Marks.”

Chapter End Notes
Coming Up Next Chapter…

A Religious Experience
Rey adores learning about her mother’s culture, while Luke learns more about Alyla’s son. Meanwhile, Holdo has an important talk with Evan, and back on Nixrye, Alecta confronts her family about their failed conference… and it isn’t pretty.

Okay, I know the whole Marks is the biologically engineered son of Alyla and Lando is outlandish, but I promise there’s going to be an explanation next chapter does make some sense. To be perfectly honest with you, this was not the plan when I introduced the story of Alyla having a son.

Originally my plan had been that Ghost Alyla was haunted by the fact she never got to have her child, so she went out and found an orphaned Force Sensitive and basically claimed the child as her son, promising to someday have “Dad” aka Lando find him, and Lando would in TLJ. Because my original plan was to have Temiri aka Broom Boy aka that kid Rose gives her ring to be the son. Lando was going to find him and adopt him and he and Ghost Alyla would raise Temiri as their son.

Then someone asked the ages of certain characters, so I decided to do the math for everyone’s ages. It was awkward enough to deal with the fact that Lando is 14 years older than Alyla… it’s another thing to have Lando adopt a child at the age of 68. That’s just downright irresponsible, and there’s a genuine possibility that that kid will be an orphan again before he’s 25. It wasn’t fair to any of the characters, but I had already introduced the fact Alyla had a son. Cue mad scrambling to find a substitute son.

Then I realized that I didn’t really have a planned backstory for Marks, or that great of one. Originally, he was going to be called Julian – yes, I was going to do Rose and Julian/Romeo and Juliet parody, sue me – and his parents sold him to the First Order, so he was going to be salty at the First Order (and his parents) and that’s why he wants to burn the First Order to the ground from the inside. But Marks was a reasonable age to be Alyla’s son, and I could work with the timing.

Plus there ended up being some good things already built into the story – I merely played with the name Julian for a moment, but I always wanted him to be Marcus, making the MK standing for Marcus Kene be an amazing coincidence – plus that’s why he’s also being watching by Kylo like Finn is (of course the son of Han Solo would keep an eye on Lando Calrissian’s kid), I could do this really great story of Lando having a grown son while dealing with the knowledge that Lando had a biological kid with the woman he loved and they never knew, and I could start up the fact that the First Order has been dealing with genetics, cloning, and bioengineering to set up for a later storyline.

There was the slight problem of the fact that Alyla can’t have kids (my apologies to the person who thought Teng was Alyla’s son, and I gave the lengthy explanation on why she couldn’t possibly have a son that way) but I think I’ve figured out a solution that makes a lot of sense. We’ll get to it later, and it’s a bit of stretch, but I’m basically trying to restructure a few backstories without retconning a bunch of stuff. I’m hoping it turns out more like the correction of Operation Citadel in regard to what actually happened in Rogue One vs fictionfreak101, stop explaining why Quom’s first appearance is inconsistent with his later character, you’ve tried three times already and no one cares.
So yeah, the plot may be a little weird and confusing, but hopefully you can just go with me on this one. My only biggest pain in the butt thing about making Marks be Lando and Alyla’s son is that… neither of them have the cheekbones Rose keeps obsessing over. Hence why I said he got them from Lando’s mom.

And yeah, I’m shipping Rose Tico with Lando Calrissian’s son. Fight me.

Also, for the record, I have named all 30 volumes of the Calrissian Chronicles.
A Religious Experience

Chapter Summary

Tara calls Kylo out, Ivey attacks Poe, and Teng worships a space squid.

Chapter Notes

I moved the Alecta thing back another chapter. Sorry.

Because I keep getting people asking in reviews despite the story saying it over and over: no, Tara and Cern did not know Sasa was pregnant. Honest to God, I swear on my mother’s actual urn, no one knew she was pregnant until Evan announced the miscarriage.

Trigger Warning: While not physically portrayed or described, Alyla does talk about her experiences with rape and her emotions during said acts. In no way is it glorified and there is not a lot of detail about the physical act. The scene tries to purely examine the emotions of the victim, but a little bit of graphic but non-violent detail is present.

See the end of the chapter for more notes.

The Long Way Home

Chapter Fifty-Eight

A Religious Experience

Dedicated to tumblr user Corinthia Hale for their glowing review of my fic back in July that I unfortunately only just found recently. Thank you again so very much.

I would move heaven and earth, fight any monster, or take on any villain. I would break the laws of time, space, and the New Republic. I would try any possible scientific or spiritual method to do it. Honestly, there is nothing in this world or the next that I would not do if it meant I could have a son with Alyla Kene.

– Lando Calrissian and the Death of the Morning Glory, Chapter VII

“I’m sorry, you just told me that the First Order bioengineered a son for yourself and Lando months before you two even met, and now that son is alive and serving in the First Order. Are you honestly requesting me not to ask any follow up questions?”

“…Yes?”

Luke did not need to say a word; the look he gave her said it all.

“I’m not sure if I can make that-”

“No, Luke,” Alyla grabbed his shoulders and forced him to look her in the eye. “I mean it. You cannot tell anyone about this. What I’m about to tell you is my secret, and I will be allowed to tell whom I choose about it. This is the same level of secret as to what triggered my scarring event.”

Luke frowned, “Are you… Is that this story?”

Something extremely dark and haunted flitted over Alyla’s eyes. She dropped her hold on his shoulders.

“N- No. Never that one, Luke,” her voice shook. “You don’t need to know. Only Zena, Gavyn, Lando, and I get to know that, and it’s not up for debate. I don’t want to talk about it.”

He understood when to let things go, “Alright. Alright, what about this… Mark?”

“Marks,” Alyla corrected. “What do you want to know about him?”

“Is he on the side of the First Order?”

“Oh boy, Marks is… following his own path.”

“What does that mean?”

“He likes to explain his loyalties as you can’t have a Battle of Yavin without an Operation Citadel.”

Luke just stared at her.

Alyla sighed and rephrased, “Marks hates the First Order, but he wants to burn it down from the inside before getting out of there.”

“And you… support this?”

“Hell no,” Alyla scowled at Luke like he was insane. “I want him away from Snoke and to be with his father.”

“So you want him around as amazing an influence as Lando Calrissian?”

“Oh, are we doing this? Because I’m not afraid of taking pot shots at Felicity.”

“Alright, no need to start that,” Luke held up his hands. “So, how exactly did Marks come about? Is he a clone?”
“No, he’s literally the son of Lando and I the way Rey is the daughter of you and Felicity. Marks was created by combining Lando’s sperm with my egg, the two of us just didn’t get to have fun with the process.”

Alyla frowned as she considered something.

“Although considering Marks was conceived months before I met Lando, and it took almost two years of knowing him before I agreed to a full, consensual, sexual relationship, maybe that’s a good thing,” Alyla admitted.

“But Alyla,” Luke wanted to get back on topic, “how did the First Order get Lando’s… god why do I have to say this phrase? Lando’s sperm and your egg?”

She sighed, “You know the story Lando likes to tell about the Imperial spy geneticist he thought loved him? The one he put in his second book?”

“When he bluffed his way into a sperm donation to the Emp- Oh. Really?”

“Yep.” Alyla cringed, “The story of Lando’s I hate most turned into one of the best things that ever happened to me. Brendol Hux and a woman named Alecta Anthea were working on experiments for the Empire revolving around children – which is why Brendol’s own son, Armitage, is so messed up – during the end of the Empire.”

Luke frowned as he recognized Alecta’s name. He remembered Aletha saying she worked with her sister at an Imperial medical facility before Obik recruited her. He’d have to ask Aletha sometime exactly what the sisters had been working on.

Alyla didn’t notice Luke’s distraction, “When Brendol and Anthea joined the First Order years later, they brought the research and experiments with them, including Lando’s sperm and my eggs. When Snoke ordered they start experiments with children after the death of Shara Bey, Brendol ran the calculations and the highest match – all desired attributes clocked in between 93 to 98 percent – was between Lando’s sperm and my eggs.”

“Okay but…” Luke tried to wrap his head around it, “how did they get your eggs?”

Alyla was silent for a very long time.

“The story I’m about to tell you is not a pretty one,” Alyla whispered. She had only ever told the story two other times in her life: to Lando the night they first made love, and to Ben the night he told her about Marks’ existence. “It’s a terrible, ugly story with no heroes or happy ending, not for a very long time. The actions in it are unjustifiable and atrocious. But I don’t want your pity. I am not just a victim; I am a survivor. I made it out of that darkness, and I don’t want you to pretend I still live in it. Do you understand that, Luke?”

He nodded but knew better than to speak.

Alyla took a deep, but very shaky breath, “When Gavyn and I were captured with our mentor, Vonar Ghyron, we were immediately sold into slavery on Zygerria. Since we were only thirteen, they couldn’t put us in the Pits right away. So, for two years we trained, listened to the horrible stories from the other slaves of what was yet to come, and clung to each other while we slept, daring the world to tear us away from each other… And then when I was fifteen, they did.”

Luke clasped her hand.

“One night… I woke up to a couple of men tearing Gavyn’s arms off of me. They threw a bag over my head and I screamed for Gavyn. He fought so hard, trying to protect me, but they held him down and sedated him. Then they plunged a needle into my arm and everything went black. I woke up one week later, Gavyn sitting at my sitting, face ashen. Struggling through tears, he told me what they had done: the hysterectomy. They… cut me open and tore out my uterus. A fifteen-year-old girl had her reproductive system removed so men wouldn’t have to worry about impregnating her when they held her down and raped her.”

Luke flinched, imagined images unwillingly flooding his mind of what terrible people had done to his friend.

Alyla struggled to continue, “I’m not going to lie, at the time – after I had healed – I was somewhat thankful. That first night, when the man who paid an exorbitant fee to “break me in” left me crying on the floor, the feeling of him left between my legs, I was glad they unceremoniously spayed me. I didn’t have to worry about having this evil man’s child grow within me. For years as I was violated, rented, and raped, I was thankful I couldn’t have children. It wasn’t allowed among the Jedi, as Vonar taught us, and I didn’t have to raise the child of a man who paid money to rape me. Every time a man spilled himself inside of me, I felt so dirty… I still feel dirty sometimes…even when it was Lando.”

Luke fought with all his might not to pull a face. One of his dearest friends was opening up to him about her history of sexual assault. Now was not the time to be weirded out by the thought of Lando’s bodily fluids.

Alyla refused to look Luke in the eye, her mind far away as she whispered, “I think I would have done something much worse to myself than the scarring if I had gotten pregnant.”

Her head snapped up, “You promised you wouldn’t just see me as a victim.”

“I don’t,” Luke said gently. “You know I don’t… but that doesn’t mean I can’t feel sorrow.”

“I suppose not,” she turned her head away. If she saw him cry, she’d start crying. “No matter how dark this part of the story is, I have to remember that because of it, I got my son.”

“Yes, Alyla, but how?”

“I… I didn’t find this part out until after I died. Ben told me, maybe to curry some favor. He told me everything when he learned about my son.”

“He knows about Marks?”

“Watches him like a hawk.” A small smile crept up on her face, “The son of Han Solo and the son of Lando Calrissian… albeit a lot more explosive, and that’s saying something.”

“It really is,” Luke shared the grin. “Force forbid Waroo and Rey ever get in that mix.”

“God, if that happens, I don’t care what it takes, I will find a way to die and avoid that mess.”

Luke was happy he could manage a laugh, “So, what did Ben tell you?”

Alyla took a moment for herself before continuing, “Apparently, when my slave master had my surgery performed, they didn’t just throw away my uterus. No, they… they scavenged my ovaries, harvested my eggs, had them frozen in an egg storage bank, and then sold them to the highest bidder.”
“Sold them?”

“The eggs of the last female Jedi of the Old Jedi Order are worth a very pretty penny. They held an auction, and people from all over the galaxy came for them. People who wanted to do experiments, people who wanted to clone them, resellers, infertile couples with a lot of money who wanted the bragging rights of their egg ‘donor’ being a Jedi. But none of that mattered, it was clear from the beginning who would win.”

Alyla nodded, “They had the time, money, and resources to ensure they got them.”

“But why? Why would Palpatine want Jedi eggs?”

“My guess is Palpatine had the same plans for you concerning me that Vader had involving Tyla. Turn you to the Dark Side, introduce you to a bride who would play you the way he wanted, and then Palpatine would allow the two of us to have a child only when he allowed. Very much like Snoke, Ben, and Sasa.”

“What do you-”

“Trust me,” Sasa looked very serious, “don’t ask.”

Luke vaguely remembered his mother mentioning the name Sasa and decided not to push the matter.

Alyla thought it best to continue, “The story’s rather simple from there. Brendol Hux went to the auction and purchased my eggs, ordered by Palpatine to be the guardian of them. I think Plan A – back when they didn’t know you were still alive – was to use my eggs to bioengineer a Force Sensitive successor to Vader that was healthier. The Chosen One had served his purpose, and Vader grew more a liability each day. They wanted the experiment to go perfectly, but they only had so many of my eggs. I suspect they didn’t immediately order Gavyn and I to be killed in case something happened and they needed someone to corrupt. Beaten and raped daily, Gavyn and I were subdued and the Empire could keep an eye on the Fighting Pits until they decided what to do with us.”

“And then I came along,” Luke said.

She nodded, “My eggs were to be protected to create the next Skywalker Heir. But then over the next four years, things went off the rails. Hux and Anthea were left with almost nothing but the secret of my eggs. Eventually the First Order rose and Hux approached Snoke with all the information. Snoke wanted what Hux could provide and Brendol hired Alecta Anthea to help him. Took a few years and a lot of experimentation, then Shara Bey was murdered and Snoke gave them the go ahead to do the experiment.”

“And it was a success?”

“ Took a few tries, but sure enough Marcus Kene was created. They used the surname of Kene because I had just joined your Order and they planned to use him against me later. It was only when Ben started his research into how the heck Marks came to be that the First Order realized that Lando was the sperm donor. To them he was just donor #93.”

“Does Lando know about him?”

“No. I wish he did, but that was a secret they were eager to keep.”

Luke nodded, “I’ve heard how hard a man Brendol Hux was. Met him once or twice even. I can believe he would keep that top secret.”

“Oh, Brendol Hux didn’t ever know. He died before Marks was born, murdered right after Marks made it to the second trimester… Probably actually because of that,” Alyla added.

“What do you mean?”

“Alecta Anthea murdered him.”

“Really? I heard he’d been murdered but not by whom.”

“Word around the First Order is she did it to be in charge of all cloning, bioengineering, and children projects. When Snoke tried to punish her for it, she just threatened to release all she knew and the evidence to prove it to the New Republic. It was a brutal murder, though. Strangled him with a belt in front of his own son.”

“That would explain how Armitage turned out,” Luke shook his head. “So… you and Lando have a son.”

“Yes. We have a son.”

A very long silence ensued.

“So,” Alyla scratched her neck. “I’m still up for that game of cards if you want.”

“Do we play any other way?”

“What about the time Felicity had us play using Valrian rules?”

“I thought we promised never to speak of that incident,” Alyla shuddered.

Luke smiled, “I’ll grab the cards.”

As he walked toward the cabinet holding said cards, he mulled over this new information about the boy named Marks… and how happy it made the ghost who wanted to play cards.

Only a woman as colourful as that could want to be the mother of Lando Calrissian’s child.

The people who live there want as little as possible from outsiders – not even goods from the outside world. They’ve dug their own cisterns, built their own huts, even made their own weapons. I’ve been out to the Sacred Villages a couple of times, carrying messages from Unkar, but I’ve never been asked to stay.

- Rey’s Survival Guide

All of the Sacred Villages looked relatively the same: a group of huts build around a randomly placed vaporator cistern and maybe some bloggin coops here and there. Usually there was a religious symbol somewhere in the village: statutes, artifacts… or in one case the village was constructed around the cranial mantle of old Niima the Hutt herself, gilded in precious metals and covered with jewels.

Rey really had to see that for herself someday.

In the center of the village of Synael were six large wooden statues of beautiful and strong humanlike Gods. At the base of each statue was carved a different symbol, all of which Rey recognized from her hair ties. The statues were three males and three females, each clothed and adorned with various creatures, accessories, and additional symbols befitting what each God ruled over.

Or so Rey assumed. It didn’t take a genius to figure such things out; even she knew religious iconography usually worked that way.

Synael had a large circle of black rocks surrounding the village, denoting the border. The break between the stones to leave a path to enter the village was extremely narrow. A person could barely walk through it, so Rey had to be careful to guide her speeder without crashing. As much as she liked being held by Teng, she really could have done without his nails piercing her hips.

“Steady, Moonshine,” Rey teased. “I’ll get you there in one piece.”

He only held tighter.

Teng and Rey brought a cloud of dust with them as they entered the village of Synael. The road wasn’t well kept because it was one of the lesser travelled villages.

Rey could kind of understand why. While they had been trapped by the sandstorm the previous day, Luke had done his best to inform his daughter about the Valrian culture she was about to witness. It had become very clear that Valrians had the attitude of “you are welcome to partake in the culture, but woe to you if you break the rules.”

She was never to take down her hair buns, even while she slept as taking them out was a sign to her hosts that she rejected the protection they provided. She and Teng were welcome to eat or drink anything they were offered but they had to finish said offerings as leaving an empty plate was an insult to the person who had chosen to give up their own food for another.

They were allowed to wear their clothing in the fashion of the Valrians, and it was wise to do so. Since Rey was a woman not yet of age, she was not allowed to show bare skin while Teng always had to have a part of his shirt open (which Rey wasn’t complaining about.) Women not of age did it to proclaim to the world that they were not on the market for marriage yet, while men not of age did it to show off their muscles for when women were considering future husbands.

Gods help anyone who gawked at Teng in front of Rey.

Teng was also supposed to grow facial hair, but the Villagers would understand if his face was smooth upon arrival. He was just not going to shave during the visit as his facial hair – actually all of his hair – grew at a ridiculous rate, so he was all set.

But the biggest demonstration of their intolerance to rule breakers was Luke’s status in the village. He was literally not allowed to come within fifty feet of Synael on pain of death – which in hindsight explained a few scavenging site choices.

…Oh, and also Luke had warned them that if Rey and Teng did not abide by the customs of the Valrians while in Synael, they would have to sleep outside the village limits. Outside on the coarse sand with (if they were lucky) only a thin blanket to warm them in the freezing desert night. The giant black rocks around the village limits was an indicator of how far away to send a Daranoh – one hostile or an enemy to the religion – so the Gods would be happy.

This led to Teng deciding, “You know what? Maybe I should also try this Valrian thing.”

Rey knew he was just doing it for a bed… but also because he loved her. She knew Teng would do anything to make her happy. If she told them they were jumping off a cliff, he would simply ask “Are we jumping at the same time, or did you want me to go first?”

She smiled at the thought of Teng’s devotion as she killed the engine of her speeder. He didn’t do any of it out of obsession, notions of possession, or obligation. Teng did it all simply because he wanted nothing more in the Galaxy than for Rey Rhiaon Erso to be happy. Even if making her happy would mean leaving her.

But she didn’t want him to go anywhere.

Rey leaned over and pressed a kiss to Teng’s cheek.

He smiled but looked a little confused, “What was that for?”

“Just thinking about how lucky I am to have you.” Rey perched her goggles on her head, “And don’t you start with that whole ‘no, I’m lucky to have you’ business. I am a walking disaster, and we both know it.”

“But a beautiful disaster I love being on the ride with.”

Rey couldn’t believe that after all this time, words like that from Teng could still make her blush.

As they dismounted and unloaded their tools from the battered red speeder, they were approached by a group of four people.

The group had two men and two women, all pale skinned and had brown hair and eyes. Their features were sharp like that which Rey did not inherit from her mother. But there was something about those eyes, those jaws, and those collarbones that made even Rey – who barely remembered what her mother looked like – to think those are Valrians.

Quickly Rey tugged off her headwrap – which was actually a ratty old jumper that she wrapped the sleeves of around her head – and primped her hair buns. Usually the headwrap was just good to keep the sand out of her hair and to use as a second layer of shirt on cold nights, but Rey was glad in this case it had preserved her hairstyle.

Seeing the buns made the tallest of the women halt for a second. Her long, black hair was stiffly straight, and her dark purple clothing was a bit more elaborate than any other woman in the village. Her face was naturally harsh, making her always look like she was scowling, but when she saw Rey’s hair, something softened in her face and sparked in her eyes. She smiled and returned to her approach, her strides faster than her companions but not to a run.

Rey fidgeted, taking deep breaths as she desperately tried to think of how to greet the people who were the key to her heritage.

Familiar fingers threaded through her own. Rey looked up at Teng. He grinned and squeezed her hand tight. She smiled back at him and felt her breath flow easier.

“Celum!” the tall woman called as her group reached the teenagers.

“Uh… Celum,” Rey repeated, shooting a questioning glance at Teng.
“Celum,” Teng shrugged at Rey in reply.

The tall woman smiled at that, “It means welcome. It’s a friendly reply.”

“Oh, thank you,” Rey smiled back, though her expression was a great deal nervous. “Sorry, I’m not very familiar with Valrian—”

Her words died when one of the men unhooked a waterskin from his belt and threw the water on Rey’s shadow… and then did the same to Teng.

The teenager just stared at the group in bewilderment.

“Five minutes in, and I’m already confused about this culture’s customs,” Teng whispered to Rey.

“Yeah, I have no insight to offer,” Rey shrugged.

The shorter Valrian woman laughed and touched the man’s arm in a way Rey might touch Teng.

“Forgive my husband,” the shorter woman said. “He’s a little… impatient when it comes to strangers not knowing our customs.”

“Strangers?” the husband snapped. “Una, no Bele who wears her hair in that fashion should ever claim ignorance about our customs.”

“Cadman, settle,” the tall woman ordered. She looked back to Rey, “You must forgive Cadman. Valrians take our religious beliefs very seriously, and as my co-leader, he and I must monitor such situations carefully. I’m sure you meant no offense with your hairstyle.”

“Oh no; none at all!” Rey objected. “Sorry, I should have opened with this. I’m Valrian.”

The man who was not Cadman lifted his eyebrow, “Pardon me, but you don’t exactly look like—”

“If you’re talking physically, I took more after my father. He’s from—” Rey paused as she realized she had no idea what planet her father was from. “It’s not important, but my mother was Valrian. I’m an… oh what was that word again?”

“Mina,” Teng supplied.

“Right,” Rey grinned. “I’m a Mina. My mother was Mara.”

The Valrians looked around at each other, silently debating whether or not they believed the story.

“Well, it would explain the hair,” Una smiled.

The tall woman came up to Rey and gently took the sides of Rey’s face in her hands.

“Keli kai tooah reti puah lue teruah,” she bowed Rey’s head and kissed her forehead.

“Uh, thanks,” Rey frowned as the tall woman released her. “What does that mean?”

Cadman scoffed.

“It’s a blessing of protection,” the other man explained. “It’s customary when you get a guest of the faith to kiss their head and whisper it.”

“Do not misunderstand me, Mina,” the tall woman warned Rey, “I give you this blessing as required of your hairstyle. Those buns do not give you carte blanche protection. You must still prove your heritage to us.”

Rey’s eyes widened, “But I don’t know how-”

“Come now, my Love,” the other man said to the tall woman. “Are we to deny the customs rightfully afforded to her?”

“Levi’s right,” Una said. “She wears her hair in the style. Who are we to question her heritage?”

Cadman hefted a sigh, “Imogen and I are right to question it. I was concerned that an Elra had appropriated our hairstyle. So many do not understand the significance behind it and the protections it affords.”

“But I do!” Rey objected. “My mother told me to always wear my hair like this, and I do. I have every day for the last twelve years of my life. Please, I didn’t mean to cause any offence.”

“If your mother was so concerned about you wearing your hairstyle, then didn’t she tell you something as simple about our culture as the meaning of Celum?” Cadman shot.

Rey cleared her throat, “My- mom… died when I was five. I… I barely remember her beyond telling me to put my hair up.”

The three icy glares of the Valrians immediately turned on Cadman.

He bowed his head, “Forgive me. I did not mean to insult your line.”

Una crossed to Rey and whispered, “Eh tana, eh toh, eh talh.”

As she said the words, she drew thumb across Rey’s forehead, tracing shapes. Eh tana was a horizontal line in the middle of her forehead. Eh toh was a tailless arrow pointing up. Eh talh was a tailless arrow pointing up.

Finishing her words, Una smiled at the confused Rey.

Rey blinked, “Okay, what’s going on?”

“It’s a blessing for the dead,” Una explained. “Valra is divided into three zones: The Centre, The North, and The South. Each of the words is a salutation to each zone. Eh tana.”

Una traced the horizontal line.

“Means To the Centre,” Una said. “Eh toh.”

She traced the upward arrow.

“Is To the North. And eh talh.”

She traced the downward arrow.

“Is To the South.” Una stroked Rey’s cheek, “It’s a prayer to the Gods that the soul of the deceased has a safe journey into the afterlife.”

“Oh, uh, thank you,” Rey said. “But my mom went to the afterlife a long time ago.”

“Not necessarily,” the man who had yet to be named stepped forward. “Not all souls go immediately to rest. Souls must wander the planet of Valra, fighting the spirits of evil until the Gods call for them to rest. We must all take our turns driving back the evil spirits for the sake of the world, and not all of us make it to the afterlife.”

Rey raised an eyebrow but said nothing. Evil spirits? Well… okay, guess that’s a thing now.

No wonder her mother didn’t fully practice this religion.

“So, if I get this right,” Teng interjected, “you can die twice?”

Cadman lifted an eyebrow, “Oh, you can die a great many times. The souls of those killed by the evil spirits in turn become an evil spirit… then you can die as many times as you are brought back by the Darkness of the world.”

“That’s… actually kind of cool.”

“Teng!” Rey scolded.

“What? It’s better than the cult I was born into where they said the universe was controlled by a giant space squid and we had to eat nothing but seaweed and muscles because all other sea life were reserved for the God and eating flora and fauna of the land or sky was an abomination. Not to mention the weekly baptisms where we were held under water for three minutes straight to clean our souls.”

Everyone stared at him.

“That’s the cult your parents bought into?” Rey asked.

“Look, people were desperate during the Empire!” Teng exclaimed. “They would have believed anything if it meant bringing an end to the Emperor.”

“So, are we still debating about the heritage of these two youngsters?” Levi asked.

“I think it would be safe to say that the boy is not one of us,” Imogen replied.

“But I’m happy to learn what I can.” Teng glanced down, “For example, why are the men not wearing any shoes. You know we live in a desert, right?”

Cadman shot Teng a look that suggested he shut up before Cadman did it himself.

“As for the girl,” Imogen looked over Rey, “I’m not sure I’m entirely convinced. Tell me, child, what line do you come from?”

“Huh?”

“Who is your family?” Una rephrased.

“Oh, uh,” Rey wracked for brain for what her father had claimed the Rhiaon families religious names were. “My mother was Felicea Rhiaon, sister of Braedan Rhiaon.”

“And their parents?” Levi asked.

“I’m not sure,” Rey admitted. “My name is Araeya Rhiaon, but you can call me Rey.”

“Felicea,” Imogen scowled. “Why does that name sound-”
Her eyes shot wide.

“Oh sweet Ipgyn.” Imogen stared at Rey, “You’re Erso’s daughter, aren’t you?”

Without even looking at each other, Teng and Rey took a step back.

“Uh… yeah, I am,” Rey answered. “That’s kind of why I’m not really informed about our culture. He couldn’t exactly take me here to learn more and honestly talking about my mother is hard for him. He really loved her and misses her some much.”

Cadman’s eyes darkened, “Based on his actions with Kymeri, I find that hard to believe. He’s still cavorting with her?”

Only Teng noticed how Rey’s fist tightened at her side.

“Doctor Kymeri left Jakku three years ago,” Teng said bluntly. “She and Luke are long done. In fact she’s dating someone else. He’s a… pleasant enough man.”

Diego Nalto hadn’t exactly made a great impression on Teng during that elaborate game of hide and seek Rey put them through the year previous.

Levi shook his head, “Getting involved with yet another man. Does the woman have no respect for her husband?”

“Aletha is not a Valrian,” Rey cut in sharply. “Besides, from what I’ve heard about Antar Kymeri, he didn’t treat his wife well. Aletha deserves happiness, and I won’t hear another word of it.”

Imogen raised her eyebrow but smiled, “Very well then. Araeya, I have met your father. I was the one who told him he wasn’t… welcome in our village. Looking at you, I do see a strong resemblance. I will accept your claim to be Valrian, for even if you are not one, we always welcome strangers who want to learn more about our culture.”

“We just get upset when we think someone takes a piece of it because they thought it looked cool or whatever excuse they give,” Cadman added in gruffly. “You can understand why I might get defensive over the hair issue.”

Rey really just didn’t want to argue the point any further, “Of course. Hey, do you mind if I ask what that was you called me earlier? A Bele?”

“It’s a female child born into the faith,” Cadman answered. “Now, I suppose since we’ve settled things, it’s time for proper introductions. I am Cadman Dysar, and this is my wife, Una.”

“Hello,” Una smiled, coming up to take Cadman’s arm.

“Cadman is one of our Village Leaders,” Levi explained. “My wife is the other, and more senior Village Leader.”

“My name is Imogen Lerann,” Imogen said. “That is my husband, Levi. We welcome you to our village, Araeya and… your name?”

Una frowned, “Teng? What kind of name is Teng?”

“It’s Nubian,” he scowled. What he wanted to say was what’s wrong with my name.
“Oh, forgive me then,” Imogen said. “I meant to actually ask your Valrian name.”

“My… I don’t have one.”

Cadman and Imogen exchanged a look.

“Forgive me again, but,” Imogen frowned, “considered Araeya is the daughter of Erso, I assume you are here to do the job we contracted to your furry friend.”

“Where is Tinadar?” Cadman asked.

“Oh, Quom’s sick,” Rey answered.

Levi shook his head, “A Valrian never misses a day of work unless they are on their death bed.”

“But isn’t it super unhealthy to work while sick?” Teng asked.

“It’s honourable to work when you’re sick because you’re telling the person who you’re doing the job for that their time and wellbeing is more important than your own.”

Rey and Teng exchanged a look.

“Quom’s sneezing flames,” Rey simply said.

The Valrians stared at her.

“Okay, I think we can let Esau off the hook this time,” Una said.

“Esau?” Teng questioned.

“It’s Tinadar’s Valrian religious name,” Una explained. “It means hairy one.”

Rey shifted her weight, “I… I didn’t know he had one.”

“Of course he has one,” Cadman said. “In order to legally do business on Valrian territory – even if it’s just a small village on Jakku – you must have a Valrian religious name. It’s to ensure you’ve sworn an oath to honour and respect our customs. Quom Tinadar is one of our most dedicated and humble business partners. He’s almost better versed in Valrian customs than Imogen and I.”

Rey and Teng stared at each other, each expecting the other to give them an explanation. Was this why Quom got so much work in the Sacred Villages? Was behind all those eccentric shenanigans a Vrogem who was a secret badass liaison businessman who was very astute in religious and cultural customs?

That bastard was just lazy to Luke, Rey, Aletha, and Teng!

“That is why I’m surprised that neither Esau or Erso mentioned it to the pair of you before sending you to us.” Imogen eyed them, “Are you certain they didn’t tell you?”

“Positive,” Rey answered. “I guess my dad just… forgot about it.”

Luke didn’t forget the custom, but rather he intentionally left it out of his explanations. Not to leave the kids to hang out dry… but because every time he thought about Valrian religious names, he would think about the time he, Han, and Leia registered for theirs.

And it would always make Luke laugh.
There had been a time when Felicity, Luke, Han, and Leia were forced to attend to some business on Valra. It was the adventure when they all went to stay with Felicity’s maternal family, but as eventful as that had been, that wasn’t the part that made Luke laugh.

In order to lawfully do their business on Valra, one was forced to legally register a Valrian religious name in the Valrian government. Before Luke, Leia, and Han could help Felicity, they had to do just that.

Luke and Leia did their research and selected appropriate names. Leia had actually had a Valrian name for years, though not officially. She had come up with it years ago when Felicity had been her assistant as a teenager.

Luke registered the name of Lucas, which was a Southern Valrian variation on Luke. Leia had chosen Leya, a Northern Valrian name.

Han had left it to the last minute. He had volunteered to accompany – aka gave Felicity a ride – to the registry to file Luke and Leia’s paperwork. When Felicity pointed out to him that he needed one too, Han was forced to come up with one on the spot.

Of course, Felicity and Han were good friends, so Felicity was more than happy to help come up with a name for good old Loud Mouth Solo. Han was eager to accept her suggestion when she came up with Tristan, which Felicity said meant brave warrior.

Then Han worried when Felicity told him that he would need to register a full name, including a Valrian surname and that Valra was one of the few planets in the Galaxy that used middle names. As helpful as ever, Felicity walked Han through picking a middle and surname, suggesting Pinchas as his middle name (which Han hated until Felicity said it meant most loyal of friends) and then Yotam, which Felicity said meant friend of Wookiees.

Han thought it odd that Valrians would have a name that focused on Wookiees in its meaning, but went ahead and registered Tristan Pinchas Yotam as his Valrian religious name.

And then he went home and told Leia.

…Who told him that Valrians don’t have middle names.

Luke remembered how entertaining the ensuing reveal was when Han and Leia came to Luke and Felicity’s apartment demanding an explanation. Felicity was a fit of giggles as she explained to him that Tristan Pinchas Yotam didn’t mean “Brave warrior most loyal of friends friend of Wookiees.”

No… Tristan meant noisy. Pinchas meant mouth of brass. Yotam meant orphan. Together Han’s religious name meant “Noisy Mouth of Brass Orphan.”

And that was the story of how Felicity tricked Han into legally registering the religious name “Loud Mouth Solo.”

Luke still couldn’t even think of the story without laughing, which is why he couldn’t bring himself to tell Teng he needed a religious name to conduct business.

“Okay,” Rey said, “well, I need Teng’s assistance to fix your moisture vaporators so how do we get him a religious name? Is there a form or an oath?”

“I think just picking one here and now would be fine,” Imogen said. “Do you have any idea?”

“Una, would you go get the offerings?” Cadman muttered to his wife.
She nodded and slipped away.

Teng shrugged at Imogen, “I don’t know any Valrian names beyond Felicea, Braedan, Esau, Araeya. Well, plus Imogen, Cadman, Una, and Levi, but I don’t think those would work. Should I maybe just go with Luke’s Valrian name. I think he said he had one.”

“Almon,” Imogen said.

“No, it was Lucas,” Rey recalled what her father had said.

Imogen and Cadman exchanged a look.

“No, it’s Almon,” Cadman said. “He was formerly named Lucas, but after what he did with Kymeri, he was stripped of that name and given a new one. One benefiting of his regard for his wife.”

Rey narrowed her eyes, “And what exactly does Almon mean?”

“It means Forsaken,” Imogen said bluntly. “What he has done to your mother is a great crime. It breaks the Five Pillars of Virtue. He will spend the rest of his life living with the fact he was unfaithful to his wife. He shamed not only his wife, but himself and the woman who he made his mistress. All three of them will have to endure this adultery. You should not try to glorify what he has done to your mother.”

Rey took a deep breath, “When he first started dating Aletha, I one hundred percent agreed with you. I let that anger take over me, and it hurt the people I loved.”

She closed her eyes and remembered that horrible day she scavenged Antar Kymeri’s X-Wing.

Teng bloodied and broken on the ground under the wing of the X-Wing.

Her father angrier than Rey had ever seen in her life.

The pain in Aletha’s eyes as she learned it was Antar’s ship.

Quom throwing in the towel and avoiding the lot of them for weeks.

“But anger can only lead to pain and suffering,” Rey tried to keep control of her voice. A tear threatened to fall from her eye, “I didn’t come here to relive that, so if that’s all you’re going to-”

She was stopped by Imogen gently touching her cheek. Rey vaguely sense the Light Side of the Force coming off Imogen.

“Valra has many customs and rules,” Imogen said, “but what it all comes down to is simply this: Family first, Gods second, Virtue third. Nothing else matters. Your father – while a great sinner in my eyes – is a man who even I know is utterly devoted to you.”

“How-”

“You think Quom Tinadar wouldn’t go around bragging about the literal disarming of Jarex Zolhar and the killing of Sarco Plank?”

Teng snorted, “I suppose not.”

Imogen said, “Valrians honour guests. We believe you must always prepare a meal and a bed for a stranger in need. You have honoured us by coming to fix our equipment, and so we shall honour you in return. You are welcome to stay with us as long as you want, and we will not mention your father’s deeds again."

“Really?” Rey’s eyes brightened.

“Why is it that you’ve come to see us, Araeya?” Imogen asked.

“Honestly?” Rey hesitated. “I really wanted to come learn about the culture my mother grew up in. I… don’t have many memories of her left. I was hoping that I could use this opportunity to feel closer to her.”

“And closer you shall,” Cadman nodded as he saw Una returning. “But first there’s the issue of a name for this Teng boy.”

“Look, I’m not fussy about names,” Teng held up his hands. “Just give me some ideas to work with.”

“Toryn,” Teng cut off. “I’ll be Toryn. My name starts with a T, I can remember that.”

“Here,” Una presented them a platter laden with small sets of food and what Rey later in life learned were call shot glasses. “Please visitors, partake in our blessings and our protection.”

Exchanging an uncertain look, Rey and Teng rambled out some phrases of gratitude. They reached for the small offerings of food and drink, but neither could decide on what to grab first.

“Start with the water,” Una advised.

“Thanks,” Rey said as she and Teng grabbed the little shot glasses of water. “But you didn’t need to make us anything to eat.”

“Oh yes we do,” Una said.

“Why?” Teng frowned. “Did we just miss lunch or something? Wait… does Quom make you cater his meals on jobs?”

“It’s a traditional ceremony Valrians show to their guests,” Levi explained. He paused. “…and yes, part of doing business with Esau is feeding him – in his words – oh god, anything but rations.”

“I knew he wasn’t eating the supply he takes on his trip!”

“Whatever, Teng,” Rey waved off. “What is this ceremony we’re doing?”

“Like Imogen said, Valrians are all about hospitality,” Levi replied. “We serve these offerings to our guests as a promise of safety and comfort in our homes.”

“After we test their shadows of course,” Cadman added.

“Yeah, what was that all about?” Teng asked. “Why did you throw water on our shadows.”

Imogen answered, “Knowing that Valrians will never turn away a guest, evil spirits like to shapeshift into our forms and trick us. However, their disguises aren’t perfect; they cannot cast a shadow. To hide their shadowless form, evil spirits will extend their bodies, forming a shadowy silhouette that trails behind them. But spirits cannot survive pure water touching them, so we throw water on the shadows of strangers to test if they are evil spirits. Nothing happened when water hit your shadows, so we know you’re not a mischievous or destructive creature.”

“Clearly you don’t know my girlfriend,” Teng teased, earning a swat on his arm by Rey.

“Serving you this food and drink are acts of protection and honour.” Una motioned for them to drink the water. “Visitors are served clean water to show faith they’re not an evil spirit.”

Teng frowned, “Even though you just splashed water on our shadows to test it?”

“Well, we serve these to any guest we take under our roof, not just strangers.” Una sighed when she saw Rey and Teng still not accepting it, “Look, I don’t make the rule. Just the food.”

Levi grabbed two small purple fruit and thrust them into the hands of Rey and Teng, “Next comes figs, a blessing of good health.”

Rey and Teng accepted the food, deciding it was pointless to argue further.

It was delicious, though considering their lives, any food that wasn’t polystarch or veg-meat was delicious. Even better was the next taste, a shot glass of honey (the wish for a sweet life.)

Then came the meat of the fiercest creature of the planet. It was a symbol that their host would defend them against any evil, whether creature or spirit. On Valra, it was always Roggwart – a truly terrifying creature from the Southern Mountains, but on Jakku, the villagers of Synael served steelpeckers, birds that would rip the flesh off a living creature if given the chance. They always terrified Teng.

Of course, steelpeckers weren’t the most dangerous creatures on Jakku, those were nightwatchers. But no one was stupid enough to try hunting one of those. It was like trying to hunt a sarlaac. Not going to happen.

But it was the final offering, a crunchy red root that made Teng choke.

“Aabane root,” Una said.

Teng nearly spat it out, “Excuse me?”

Rey had to concentrate to not let her jaw drop, “Aabane root? Isn’t that that birth control thing?”

Una politely smiled, “Yes, it’s to prevent to conception of a child.”

Teng and Rey stared at her.

“Why?” Teng asked. “Do you, like… not want us to get frisky? Because I do have self-control.”

“Oh no, you’re more than welcome to do whatever you want in that regard,” Una said.

Rey rubbed her neck and avoided eye contact with anyone.

“But we just don’t want a visitor to get pregnant under our roof,” Una continued. “You see, the Goddess of Children – Ethys – will come around to homes at night and put a blessing of a child on the home. If a child is conceived under another person’s roof, they are considered part of that family as the gods meant to bless that family with a child but the visitor stole the blessing.”

“Basically things get complicated if you get pregnant under another person’s roof,” Levi summed up. “So we take measures to prevent it from happening.”
“Well, I don’t want to have a baby right now, so I guess I won’t argue.” Rey swallowed her Aabane root. “So, why don’t we get started on those repairs? Where’s the moisture vaporators?”

“Levi and I will show you.” Imogen looked to the other couple, “Una, Cadman. I thank you for your assistance. Please, go forth and continue with the preparations for the Festival.”

“The blessing is all ours,” Cadman nodded stiffly.

“Truly it was a pleasure,” Una grinned at Rey and Teng.

Rey couldn’t help but give a smile wave at Una as she and her husband departed.

“This way,” Levi gestured to the north part of the village, and he started to lead the group forward.

“So…” Rey’s head swung back and forth as she desperately tried to take in every sight of the village possible. After the diagnostic, she and Teng would return for their tools, so she was unburdened and free to pause for a moment and even occasionally feel the side of a building, statue or the fabric of clothing left on a line to dry. “What is this festival you mentioned?”

“Well, Araeya,” Imogen replied, “you and Toryn have arrived just in time for our most important holiday of the year. Tonight is the first night of the Solstice Festival. Three days from now, on our home planet of Valra, the winter solstice will take place. Over the next three nights, we honour the Gods, how they came to tame the world, fight back darkness, become a team, and become our gods.”

“It’s why the men of the village aren’t wearing shoes,” Levi answered Teng’s earlier question. “For the duration of the Solstice Festival men do not wear shoes to feel the pain the Gods went through on their journey.”

“Journey?” Rey asked.

“We recite the story over three nights,” Imogen said. “If you would like to hear it, you are more than welcome to join us. In any and all festivities. You are our guests, and you, Araeya, are Valrian.”

“Oh, I’m not really Valrian, am I?”

“You are Valrian if your mother is Valrian. It’s as simple as that.”

“Well, not exactly,” Levi cut in. “If three generations in a row don’t practice, the next generation is no longer Valrian, but your mother practiced, so you’re fine.”

“How do you know she practiced?” Rey frowned.

“Giving you a Valrian name and that hairstyle is enough,” Imogen nodded at five young children playing with a ball. All of the girls wore their hair exactly like Rey.

“But I thought the hair buns weren’t proof of anything,” Rey said.

“They aren’t…but I’ve seen the ribbons in your hair by now. Only practicing Valrians have access to those ribbons. They have the Gods’ symbols on them.”

“I’m sure you could buy ribbons like that anywhere,” Teng said.

“True, but those ribbons have the exact colour and stitching as the ones the Governor of the Andeleans gives to politically elevated children as a gift of birth. That design is strictly controlled. I don’t know what kind of past your father and mother had before coming to this ball of dust… but they must have been someone important.”

Rey had no idea why they would be so important beyond being Jedi.

She didn’t know that the Governor of the Andeleans was Garvan Rhiaon, Felicity’s uncle. Despite the tension in the Rhiaon family, Garvan held fast to the vows and obligations he held to his family line. It was only proper to present his niece’s daughter with those hair ties.

Of course, he hadn’t been thrilled that Felicity just threw them in the emergency bag Luke kept in his X-Wing. Then again, nothing about Felicity thrilled her uncle. The only reason he hadn’t officially cast her out from the line was that it would be permanent and a great mark against his family. He’d likely lose his title of Governor if he gave such a dishonour to his niece.

It was for that reason he started working with the Resistance after the “murders” of Rey and Felicity. As head of the family line, Garvan was obligated to avenge the honour of his niece and her daughter. So he and Leia came to a truce, and Garvan had become a valuable ally to the Resistance. He had even helped coordinate the Battle of Valra, the attack taking place in the mountain rang until his control.

But of course, Rey knew none of that at this time.

“So, as I said,” Imogen smiled, “you are welcome to participate in any activity of the festival… we just request if you do decide to participate, you participate fully.”

“Well, I guess I’m doing this then.” Teng pulled off his shoes and tossed them in Rey’s satchel.

“Don’t worry, Imogen,” Rey promised, “I will do everything in this festival and this village. In fact, if there’s anything more that you can show me that will help me experience our culture more that would be perfect.”

Imogen glanced at a hut with a green door, “You know… I might have an idea.”

And then you wait for the call to the briefing room for the next mission… when it starts all over again.

- The Journal of Paige Tico

The very first thing Poe Dameron experienced when the group stepped foot on the Ninka wasn’t a swarm of doctors worried about their wellbeing.

No, it was a green droid named Ivee squawking at him and ramming him in the leg because BB-8 was still not reassembled.

“Hey! Stop it!” Poe exclaimed, Kaydel laughing as she came down the ramp of the transport behind him. To him left, Han, Chewie, and Waroo went to talk to Diego Nalto who was coming down a ramp into the hanger, followed by a smirking Jessika Pava. “Jess! Jess! Call her off!”

But Jessika didn’t do anything when she reached the pair, just crossed her arms.

“Sorry, but this is what you get for not fixing up your droid,” Jessika shook her head with a smug look on her face. “You should really take better care of your droid.”

“Excuse me?” Poe shot. “Am I really getting droid advice from the Great Destroyer?”

Jessika’s eyes narrowed and then did Poe’s. They stood there, arms crossed, glares locked, jaws clenched, and waiting for the other to crack.

And then they smiled and pulled each other into a hug.

“Thanks for coming back alive, Poe,” Jessika said. She grinned at Kaydel over his shoulder, “And for bringing my girls back safe.”

“Actually,” Poe pulled out of the embrace, “it really is thanks to Kaydel and Rose that we got out of there… and a great deal of Tharel. Still, I should have brought you with us.

“Yeah, apparently you messed up Snap,” Jessika shot. “And then cauterized his leg with a lightsaber after making a pulling leg joke.”

“I wasn’t the one who did that!”

“You didn’t ask Snap if he was pulling your leg after learning he lost his.”

“Uh… I didn’t do the other part.”

Jessika rolled her eyes.

Bwah bwa bwah!

Ivee rolled up to Jessika’s side, and Jessika patted her dome.

“You’re right, he does need BB-8 to keep him in line.”

Bee bwooh bu brah?

“Yeah, I’ll fix him up tonight. If we leave it to this lot, he’d never get put back together.”

“Hey!” Poe scowled.

“Come on, people, move!” Evan barreled down the ramp, helping Snap down with Kes, who was really doing the heavy lifting. “We have patients to attend to. Stop hogging the ramp. Can someone bring a wheelchair?”

Poe was bumped to the side as a swarm of medics pushed past him to examine the emerging group. As Jessika turned to greet Kaydel, Poe watched as a medic ran up to Evan and the men to get Snap situated in a wheelchair. The medics gave Poe cursory glances, but seeing that he was in decent enough shape, Poe tended to just get shoved aside.

Quickly separated from Kaydel and Kes, Poe was forced to just awkwardly stand to the side as the ones in most danger – Ryn, Snap, and Paige – were tended to by the medics.

When he saw Kaydel, Rose, Paige, and Jess all reunite, and Karé crouched by Snap’s side as the medics looked him over, Poe could finally let out a breath of relief.

They were all safe. He had brought all of them home.

Then he saw Dacken carry out Jaina Fel’s body bag.
“At least the body count was only one,” the voice of Diego Nalto made Poe jump.

“Commander!” Poe placed a hand on his chest, genuinely surprised he was not experiencing a heart attack. “I didn’t-”

Diego didn’t let him finish, “You did good, Poe. No matter what the outcome was, you still brought home safely more people than anyone had any right to.”

Poe sighed, “But Jaina-”

“Good people die in war, Poe. People who deserve more than you or I to live.”

“People like the fatalities of Operation Citadel?” Poe knew that Diego always thought of Ji-Dan, Gunner, and Riz during speeches like that.

And now Felicity.

Poe’s heart fell when he realized that eventually Diego would also have to hear what happened to Felicity Rhiaon Skywalker. The man had the same connection to the Death Star she did, and they had been truly good friends. Hearing of the Death Star mockery that had been done unto the only other survivor of the mission that haunted Diego… it would be awful.

Diego sighed, “We may be in a cold war, but don’t think that doesn’t mean it’s war.”

“I dunno…” Poe was eager to shift the subject before he cracked and confessed Ben Solo’s dark secret, “this whole thing was actually a Crimson Dawn dealing.”

“Oh, yes, Solo told me,” Diego shifted his weight. “Did General Organa’s son’s lover really have a-”

“Leia was about seven months short of being a Grandma.”

Diego shook his head.

“So, where did Solo go?” Poe looked around, noticing the absence. “I thought he was talking to you.”

“Holdo wanted a word with him. Apparently the reason they didn’t call for backup involved alcohol?”

“I don’t know who I’d be more afraid to face with that: Leia or Holdo.”

“He’s facing both. Leia’s conferencing in on Holo.”

“Oh shit.”

“Yeah, he left with the Wookieees looking very much like a man on the way to the gallows.” Diego frowned as he watched Dacken pass off the body bag of Jaina Fel to another shoulder, “Who is that man? I heard about the child and his mother, but is that the boy’s father?”

Poe replied, “No, that would be Dacken Tokani aka Kaydel’s nephew.”

Diego’s eyes widened, “Aka-”

“Aletha’s grand nephew,” Poe finished. “Yes, I got the full Anthea family treatment. Met Kaydel’s sister, Katha, who handcuffed her to a wall and left her for dead. Met her brother-in-law who pulled a blaster on Snap. Met her niece Sage… who is a lovely enough girl. Met her nephew Dacken, who I punched in the face and then for some reason Kay made me bring him back here with us. Met her father, Timor, aka Aletha’s brother-in-law, who turns out is racist because of religious beliefs and that’s probably why Aletha’s love interests have been a black man and a Yavinese one... I don’t know who she dated on Jakku, but there’s a reason Kay and Kymeri picked you and I.”

Diego snorted.

“Oh!” Poe remembered, “And I saw Alecta Anthea snap a woman’s neck with only her foot, then vow to kill Kay, Aletha, and anyone they loved.”

“How are you in one piece?” Diego stared at him in shock.

“I’ve mastered the art of intimidating and/or running away from that family.”

“Oh, I should be fine then.”

Poe shook his head, “Well, here’s hoping Aletha doesn’t hate Dacken.”

“Or drug him.” Diego paused, waiting for Poe’s reply. When none came, he scoffed, “Or drug him, right?”

“...You know, maybe Aletha’s got a point.”

“And you know I can convince her to drug you, right?”

“Ah, look at us,” Poe slung an arm over Diego’s shoulder. “We fit right in with our girls’ family.”

“Poe?”

“Yes, Sir?”

“Get your arm off me.”

“Yes, Sir.”

---

“You have a crush on a Stormtrooper?” Jessika frowned.

“All I said was he had cute cheekbones!” Rose exclaimed.

Kaydel shook her head and patted Paige’s face with a cold cloth. Her head had been worked on and now she was in recovery. They hadn’t seen Kalonia or Aletha – the pair were too buys running around fixing males with one or no legs – and Evan was finally forced into a chair to be examined himself. So Rose, Jessika, and Kaydel were watching over Paige as they shared with Jessika their Nixrye adventure.

Rose was just about to get to the part where she tasered Minati when a voice rang out.

“My Girls!”

Before Kaydel could fully turn around, all four girls were pulled into a hug by Aletha Kymeri who miraculously was able to get arms around all of them.

“I was so worried about you,” Aletha released the squished girls, only to immediately pull each one into their own individual hug. She held Kaydel the tightest when her niece decided to hang onto her like a steel trap, “And Diego said that Alecta was there?”

“Just briefly,” Kaydel sighed in her aunt’s embrace. “Oh, Aunt Ally, our family is awful.”

“I know, Sweetheart,” Aletha laughed. “I know.”

“There you are, Querida!” Diego Nalto’s voice called out.

The girls pulled away to see Diego approaching with Poe.

“My Love,” Diego pulled Aletha into his arms. “You have been far too difficult to find.”

“Yes, well I’ve been doing this thing called my job,” Aletha teased. She smiled as she saw Poe wrap his arm around Kaydel, “How are you doing, Poe?”

“Better that I’m home now,” he answered. “Well, sort of home. I’d rather be on D’Qar than the Ninka.”

“We’re on our way back now,” Diego informed. “What about you, Kaydel? You alright?”

“Yeah, don’t mind the girl who’s recovering from shrapnel to the head,” Jessika rolled her eyes, gesturing to Paige. “Ask Kaydel, the woman protected by three Force Users when the bombs went off how she was doing.”

“Stop it, Jess,” Paige said. “I’m fine, really. Evan took good care of me.”

“He took good care of all of you,” Aletha said. “I’ve been treating Snap Wexley’s injuries, and he’s in pretty good shape.”

Poe raised an eyebrow, “You’re not going to make a comment about someone doing something as absurd as using a lightsaber to cauterize a wound? Judging from Tharel’s reaction, that’s the most insane thing he’s ever seen.”

Aletha lifted an eyebrow in mirror to Poe, “Poe? I lived with Quom Tinadar for ten years. Not even in the top twenty.”

Rose grinned, “You know, I think I’d really like to meet Quom one of these days. He sounds so fun.”

She would come to regret those words.

“Speaking of Snap,” Kaydel looked around from him, “how’s he doing?”

“Temmin will be just fine,” Doctor Kalonia announced coming up behind the group. She was leading Karé, who was pushing Snap in a wheelchair. “We just have to measure him for his prosthetic, and he’ll be back to normal in no time.”

“Good, I don’t don’t want Black Squadron to be grounded for much larger,” Jessika said. “First the wedding, then the mission, then the loss of leg. Do you want to me on this time anymore, Snap?”

“Jess,” Karé warned.

“I’m kidding,” Jessika smirked. “How you doing, Kun?”

“Well, Snap made it back in one and a half pieces,” Karé answered. “That’s more than a lot of people can say.”

“Honestly, my biggest worry is how am I going to pay for the new leg,” Snap said. In a world where prosthetics were so advanced, losing a limb wasn’t as big a deal. It was kind of like breaking one, a nuisance, but easily dealt with.

Also, he was still in shock, so the idea of holy crap, I lost a leg hadn’t really set in.

“Don’t worry, Wexley,” Diego said. “You’re eligible for the Skywalker Grant.”

“Skywalker Grant?” Rose frowned.

“Luke and Leia set up a fund for soldiers who lose limbs to get free prosthetic replacements,” Diego explained. “It’ll be all paid for, Wexley.”

“Oh,” Snap blinked, “well great. Problem solved.”

Karé sighed.

“Don’t worry,” Aletha leaned over to Karé. “I’ll get you the number of a therapist on D’Qar for him. Antar took months to accept what happened to him, and he cut his own off.”

“Alright, well we’ve dealt with all the major injuries now,” Kalonia said. “Are we ready to move into Phase Two, Doctor Kymeri?”

“Affirm,” Aletha nodded. “I second the motion to proceed. Do we have everyone?”

“Not quite.” Poe spotted where his father had gone, “Hey Dad! Get over here!”

Kes excused himself from where he was talking with Shayna, and came over to the group.

“Need me for something?” Kes asked.

“Yes. We should move the rest of you all into your treatment now,” Kalonia grabbed a bowl from her borrowed workstation. “You’ll all be going through the body scanners. Please remove any metal and deposit it into the bowl; I will return it to you once your treatments are completed. That means any jewelry, hair accessories, dentures, eyeglasses, or tooth Holo projectors.”

Jessika scowled, “What kind of stupid person would have one of those?”

Poe Dameron, with a grip on his false tooth froze, “Uh… yeah. Only someone with way too much money and time on their hands would have one of those.”

The eyes on him were painfully as he awkwardly pulled out his Holo projector tooth and dropped it into the bowl.

“Long story,” Poe muttered. “Hey, is it going to be hygienic to have my tooth in there with everything else?”

“I’ll sanitize everything before returning it,” Kalonia promised.

“Hey guys?” Karé said to Poe and Kaydel. “Since we’re taking off jewelry right now, don’t you think it’s time to return those rings to their proper owners? The mission is over, and I’m sick of pretending to be single while Poe and Kaydel get to pretend to be married.”

“She’s right, Kaydel,” Aletha said. “I think it’s time to give those back.”
Kaydel looked down at the engagement and wedding ring on her finger, “Right. I almost forgot this wasn’t mine.”

“Me too,” Poe pulled off his borrowed wedding ring. “I kind of liked it.”

“Yeah, I think I’ll miss having a ring on my finger,” Kaydel gave him a cheeky grin.

Kes glanced down at Shara’s wedding ring, which he had been about to drop in the bowl. He eyed Poe and began to think.

“Come on, Guys,” Snap urged from his wheelchair. He was unreasonably calm for someone missing a leg. “The jig’s up. You’re not married, so hand over the rings.”

“Alright, alright,” Kaydel shook her head as she pulled off the engagement and wedding ring.

She began to hold them out, but her heart lurched. The rings were covered in Doxl Ren’s blood.

Kaydel sharply gasped as she nearly dropped them. No! No! No! She had corrupted them destroyed them for the one she loved. They could all see it – see the truth – she was a murdered, and none of them would love her anymore. A tear fell down her cheek and dropped onto the rings.

The blood disappeared.

She blinked hard, aware of the eyes on her, but Kaydel couldn’t stop the image that flooded her mind.

Kaydel was fighting Doxl Ren. He was trying to hurt her. Kill her.

She slit his throat without a second thought. His eyes bulged, his blood stained her hands. He burbled, choking on his blood as Kaydel held him in her arms. She held him there, didn’t move to help Doxl as he drowned in his own blood.

Then she dropped his body to the ground with a sickening thwack.

The thwack wouldn’t stop echoing. Her hands were covered in blood.

His blood.

“Kaydel?” Poe touched her back.

Automatically, Kaydel looked down at her hands. There was no blood on them now… but she wasn’t positive she wouldn’t see the blood later. She would never forget the stickiness of Doxl Ren’s murder.

Kaydel took a shaky breath. Why wouldn’t this go away? He was a bad guy; she did the world a favor killing the man.

That didn’t change the fact she was a murderer.

Without a word, Poe’s arm wrapped around her waist and pulled her tightly against him. Kaydel couldn’t enjoy the embrace; all she could think about was that he deserved someone better than a murderer.

“Sweetheart?” Aletha frowned at Kaydel, Diego’s arm around her in the same way. “Are you alright?”

Kaydel blinked, “Sorry, just… I’m fine.”

Diego and Aletha shared an uncertain look, one Kaydel didn’t want them to have. But Poe cleared his throat and gave a stiff shake of the head.

Aletha nodded back.

_Oh Goddesses. Did they know?

Kaydel looked at Poe, but there was no judgement or hatred in his eyes. She struggled to share a smile, praying that he didn’t know the truth about how black her soul was. A warm smile graced his own features, Poe reached down and tightly clasped their closest hands. Her hand in his, Kaydel found the strength to let that smile grow, and he bowed his head to kiss her forehead.

Slowly, Poe took the rings from her and handed them to their rightful owners… Diego and Aletha.

“Good, that’s one less thing to worry about,” Diego shoved the wedding rings into his pocket while Aletha slid on her engagement ring. “I swear this wedding planning is going to drive me to an early grave.”

“So, I’ve heard,” Aletha eyed his pocket to make sure the rings were secure. Diego was responsible for holding onto their wedding bands until the ceremony in two months. “Apparently in the time it took for me to go on my trip, you’ve gone completely insane.”

“I have not,” Diego contested. “Wedding planning is just so stressful, I’m a little impatient and distracted. If you were to help me more-”

“I told you I don’t care if we have a big wedding or just elope. You’re the one who wanted to make a big event out of it – probably to prove to the world you finally found someone to settle down with – and as such, you get the stress of planning said big wedding.”

“Querida, I already said that I’m not stressed.”

“Commander?” Kalonia said respectfully. “Because it sets you off so much, everyone on D’Qar has started using the word _event_ instead of _wedding_.”

Diego’s eye twitched.

“One by one, the group went through the body scanners which identified all their areas in need of treatment. As Kalonia went over their results, Aletha administered special combinations of vaccines to start their specific treatment. They were mostly mixtures of intravenous bacta, morphine, and adrenaline, but a little bit of other things were administered on a case by case basis.
Aletha frowned when a somewhat familiar blonde man walked out of the scanner and took a seat in front of her.

“Are you an associate of Han Solo’s?” she asked.

“Uh, no, I decided to defect to the Resistance and took my chance when Kayko offered,” the man said.

“Is that so?” Aletha glanced at his results and turned to make her mixture. She had already heard a similar story from Hena, so she didn’t find it out of the ordinary. “Well, welcome to the Resistance. What’s your name?”

“Dacken Tokani.”

She nearly dropped her vial.

“Excuse me?” Aletha stared at him in shock.

“I’m Kaydel’s nephew,” Dacken said. “Who are you?”

Aletha blinked, “…I’m Kaydel’s aunt.”

“Aunt? What do you-” And then it hit him, “By the Goddesses, you’re Aletha Kymeri!”

“Well, for a few more months,” Aletha filled her syringe. “In about two months I’ll be Aletha Nalto. Hold still.”

“This is amazing!” Dacken exclaimed as she injected him. “I’ve heard so little about you.”

“That’s comforting,” Aletha set the needle down and started flipping through Dacken’s chart.

“No, I mean in a good way. Grandma restricts all information about you. I only learned you existed when Aunt Katha told Aunt Kayko about you to ward her off from being a Rebel.”

“And which sibling is your parent? Keth?”

“The first Kaydel.”

Aletha’s eyes turned ice cold.

“So,” she said slowly, “…you did the hair thing to Kaydel.”

Dacken swallowed hard, “Listen, Great Aunt Aletha-”

“Call me Doctor Kymeri.”

“Doctor Kymeri,” he bowed his head, “I’ve done some really bad things in my life, but now I want to make up for them. So please, I want you to know I will do everything in my power to make you and Aunt Kayko forgive me for the things I’ve done. I do want to be a better person.”

“Well, that may be so,” Aletha glanced at her watch, “but I hope you’ll forgive me for being skeptical at first… and taking steps to protect Kaydel from you.”

“Steps?” Dacken frowned. “What are you-”

He hit the ground face first.
Every eye in the Medical Bay turned on her as they observed Dacken Tokani passed out on the floor.

“You know, I don’t think I’ve said it recently, Babe,” Poe told Kaydel, “but I love your aunt.”

Kaydel just shook her head.

“Querida!” Diego scolded as Kalonia rushed forward to check on Dacken. “Did you drug yet another patient?”

“Yeah, but I was in my rights to do so,” Aletha said. “Come on, standard protocol for suspicious intakes is to drug them to knock them out until we run a thorough background check. Technically according to Rebellion rules I should be handcuffing him to a bed right now.”

“Aletha…” Kalonia’s voice was awkward as she rose back to her feet, “we don’t sedate suspicious intakes in the Resistance anymore.”

“What?” Aletha scowled. “Are you sure?”

“Yes, Querida,” Diego answered. “The New Republic determined that to be a personal rights violation, and since we’re an official New Republic entity, we’re not allowed to do it anymore.”

“Oh…” Aletha blinked, staring at her great nephew lying face first on the ground. “I have a few apology notes to write then.”

“Well, it’s not the air density sensors,” Rey called down to Teng as she clung onto the telemetry cone. “Can you check the coolant intake coupling? I’ll climb down and check the binary brain unit.”

“Alright, but be careful,” Teng scowled as he checked the chiller bars for cracks.

“Come on, Teng,” Rey grinned. “Careful is my middle name.”

“Isn’t Rhiaon your middle name?”

“What? No, Rhiaon is my surname.”

“Yeah, but you’ve got two surnames and a first names, totalling three names, the Rhiaon one being the second and ergo the middle one.”

Rey stared at him, “Alright, we’re taking a water break. You only get pedantic when dehydration starts to set in.”

The pair of them sat against the moisture vaporator, chatting and sharing a canteen when they were approached by Imogen and Levi.

“Celum!” Rey proudly greeted.

Imogen laughed, “Celum. How are the repairs going?”

“We’re still trying to diagnose the problem,” Rey replied. “I think it might be the internal mechanics or maybe some wiring. We just needed a water break. We’ll be back at it in a few minutes.”

“Oh no, now’s the perfect time for a break,” Imogen said. “In fact, that’s why we came over.”
Teng sat up a little straighter, “No, it’s alright. You don’t need to tell us when to take a rest. We’re pretty good at timing those sort of things.”

“Actually, I wanted to talk to Araeya about something, but first,” Imogen nodded to Levi.

Levi pulled some small rolls of a rather grainy bread form his satchel and a few sticks of dried spiced blobgin meat, “Please, eat.”

“Oh, thank you,” Rey smiled as she and Teng accepted them. “You didn’t have to.”

“Of course we do,” Imogen’s voice wasn’t particularly casual in a _oh it’s nothing_ fashion, but rather in the firm way a mother reminds her child to wash their hands before dinner. “You are our guests. It is the way.”

“Right, the way,” Teng bit into his roll.

Imogen and Levi exchanged a look.

Levi cleared his throat, “Uh… Toryn?”

Teng stopped chewing.

“You must eat all meat before your bread,” Levi instructed. “An animal gave its life for that meal so you must show it the honour of being consumed first and consuming _all_ of it.”

“Oh…” Teng debated whether or not to swallow the mouthful of bread he had. “My bad.”

When they were done the snack, Imogen told Rey she had a proposal for her.

“Our daughter, Gweneth gave birth last month,” Imogen’s voice was filled with pride. “A month after a child is born, we have a small ceremony for it. I would like to invite you to join us.”

“Really?” Rey stumbled to her feet. “You would invite me to a family celebration?”

“Oh, it’s not really an especially intimate event,” Imogen assured her. “But if you wish to learn about our culture, this might be a good way to do so.”

“So, would you like to come?” Levi asked. “Gweneth would be very grateful. There’s not a whole lot of women her age around.”

Rey clasped Teng’s hand, “We would love to.”

The smiles froze on Levi and Imogen’s faces.

“Oh… I think you misunderstand,” Levi said awkwardly.

Rey frowned, “What do you mean?”

“Toryn isn’t invited,” Imogen answered. “Don’t get me wrong, the more the merrier, but we do certain blessings and prayers, and one not of the faith fully can often be a corrupting influence. It’s nothing personal, but those not of the faith are barred from this one ceremony for the sake of the child.”

“Oh,” Teng dropped Rey’s hand. “I guess… Okay.”

“Teng, if you don’t want me to go,” Rey said.
“No, no,” Teng cupped her cheek. “You go and get closer to your mom. I’ll be fine.”

Rey smiled and kissed him.

“I’ll be back soon, Moonshine,” she promised.

“You take as long as you need, Starlight,” Teng grinned.

There were about two dozen people in the tent when Imogen and Levi led Rey in. It was a larger one, and Imogen explained that pregnant women would spend the last month of their pregnancy and first month of their child’s life in the tent, away from everyone else.

“It’s a bonding experience,” Imogen smiled.

Levi playfully elbowed Rey. “It’s also to keep the husband from getting any ideas. They say the Gods curse a man who gets his wife pregnant twice in one year. I say that’s just something my father-in-law made up to keep me away from his daughter for a while.”

Imogen blushed, “Levi.”

He just winked at her.

“Celum!” a young man approached the group.

“Celum,” Imogen and Levi replied.

“Congratulations once more, son,” Levi laughed as Imogen kissed their son-in-law’s forehead and spoke a blessing. “I hope you didn’t mind, but we brought our Valrian guest to the ceremony. She wants to learn more about our culture and thought this would be the perfect way.”

“Of course,” the man took Rey’s hands in his. He was kind of short for a man, probably no older than twenty-five, and even that was pushing it. He had pale skin, a round face, and a smattering of freckles across his nose. His hair was the lightest brown of anyone in the village, but he had the same brown eyes as everyone else. “Thank you, Araeya for blessing us with your presence. Welcome. I am Micah.”

“It’s my pleasure, Micah,” Rey smiled a little awkwardly. Was everything in Valrian about honour and blessings?

No wonder her mother was a Rebel. Rey was just about ready to snap herself.

“Mother! Father!” Micah signalled to a couple who were fawning over a woman holding a baby.

The couple was like everyone else, dark hair and eyes, pale, and sharp features, but the man was particularly bulky and one of the tallest humans Rey had ever seen.

“Mother, Father, I would like to introduce you to our guest, Araeya,” Micah presented Rey as she reached to shake their hands. “Araeya, these are my parents, Murtaugh and Dierdre Rhiaon.”

Rey dropped Dierdre’s hand in unison with her own jaw.

“Rhi- Rhiaon?” Rey sputtered. “Like my last name?”
“That’s right,” Levi nodded, watching as Imogen went to greet their daughter.

“But,” Rey looked around helplessly, “I don’t. Oh my god!”

“We usually actually say By the Gods,” Murtaugh corrected.

“You’re a Rhiaon!” Rey exclaimed. “I don’t expect this at all. Why didn’t you give me a head’s up, Levi?”

Everyone looked very confused.

“Why would I warn you about their family name?” Levi asked.

“Because it’s my name! Oh my god, does that mean we’re related?” Rey panicked. “Are you my family?”

“Oh,” the group said together.

Levi cleared his throat, “Araeya, they’re probably not your family.”

“How can you tell?” Rey asked.

“Because Rhiaon is the most common Valrian surname in the Galaxy,” Murtaugh answered. “What is it, 150 million Rhiaons on Valra alone, not counting our people living on other planets?”

“It’s basically the Valrian version of Antilles or Smyth,” Deirdre added. “Seriously, there are so many Rhiaons out there. The martyr of Faclov was a Rhiaon. The wife of the Jedi Grandmaster was a Rhiaon. The architect of the first Death Star was a Rhiaon. The current Governor of the Andeleans is a Rhiaon. But they’re not all related to each other, or certainly to you.”

“Oh, right,” Rey blushed. “I’m sorry.”

Actually, all of those figures mentioned were related, and specifically related to Rey. They were her uncle, mother, grandfather, and great uncle. But Rey didn’t know that.

Perhaps if Deirdre had specified that the Jedi Grandmaster she spoke of was Luke Skywalker, Rey would have put it all together then and there. But once more a certain point of view screwed over a Skywalker.

Micah glanced at Rey, “Uh… here, why don’t you all talk and I’ll bring Araeya to meet Gweneth?”

“Thank you for saving me,” Rey whispered as Micah led her away.

“No problem, I know how harsh Valrians can be, Araeya,” Micah grinned as they reached Imogen and the woman holding a baby. “My Love, please greet our newest guest, Araeya Rhiaon. Araeya, this is my wife, Gweneth.”

“It’s a pleasure,” Rey reached out to shake Gweneth’s hand, but grimaced when she realized the woman was too busy holding her baby.

Gweneth laughed, “It’s alright. Here, Micah would you take Kezia?”

“With pleasure,” Micah liberated his daughter from her mother’s grasp. “Oh, who is the most beautiful girl in the entire Galaxy?”

Gweneth’s eyes sparkled as she caught Rey’s.
“I remember when he used to say such things about me,” Gweneth teased.

Rey laughed.

Gweneth was rather pretty. Dark curly hair, hazel eyes, her face soft and round. Gweneth took after her father rather than the harsh, scowling features of Imogen (who had thankfully gone to join the other parents.) She was probably about the age of Paige or Kaydel, and Rey’s heart swelled at that. Even though it was a completely different person, it kind of felt like she was with a member of her Council, and Rey was glad.

Especially since the Council had been relatively radio silent over the past couple days.

“I’m Gweneth Rhiaon née Lerann,” Gweneth shook Rey’s hand. “It’s nice to meet you, Araeya.”

“Please, call me Rey,” she smiled.

“Alright, Rey,” Micah grinned. “So, what’s your story? Why are you just learning about our culture now?”

“Uh, my mother died when I was five, and my father is… Not welcome around here.”

Micah scowled, “What does that mean?”

“Her father’s Almon Erso,” Gweneth said.

Micah winced, “Ouch. Tough break.”

“I’m not going to be mad at what he did,” Rey said flatly. “He and Aletha loved each other. I’m not debating it further.”

“Well, between you and me.” Gweneth glanced towards her mother and then leaned in to whisper to Rey, “I don’t believe in the whole no love allowed after first marriage. I love Micah with all my heart, but if I lost him early in life, I wouldn’t want to spend the rest of it alone.”

“And the same goes for me.” Micah smiled down at daughter, “Although we do have Kezia now.”

“Would you like to hold her?” Gweneth asked.

Rey panicked, “Oh no, no, no! I’ve never held a baby before. I would probably manage to break her!”

Somehow Rey ended up holding the baby.

“Oh,” Rey stared down at baby Kezia. “Not bad.”

“It’s always good to get practice in,” Gweneth grinned.

“Yeah, I suppose you’re right,” Rey said. “Statistically, my friend Kaydel probably going to get knocked up within the next year, so I’ll need to know how to hold a baby as required of the no doubt four-way Godmothership we’ll end up doing. I’m actually surprised Kaydel and Poe aren’t parents already.”

“Actually, I think she meant for yourself,” Micah teased. “Word has spread about that handsome boy you showed up with.”

Rey instantly bowed her head, pretending to be fascinated with the baby and not using the child as a prop to head her bright red blush.

Actually, the more she looked at the baby, the more she was amazed. She literally couldn’t remember ever seeing one. It was fascinating; this little tiny ball of flesh could someday grow to be as big Murtaugh.

“It’s a little earlier to think about that,” Rey said. “But I do wish Teng could have come to this with me. I feel so out of my element here.”

“Don’t you worry a second about that,” Gweneth promised. “What my mother won’t explain, I will. After all, we’ve all been there before, and someday we’ll have to teach Kezia the same things.”

“Kezia,” Rey said. “Such an interesting name. Does it mean anything?”

“Cinnamon,” Gweneth smirked at Micah. “If it wasn’t for cinnamon, Kezia might not exist.”

Rey frowned, “I’m sorry, I don’t understand. What’s cinnamon?”

“It’s a sweet spice,” Micah answered. “We sometimes get a little bottle of it in our deliveries from Valra. Shortly after my parents and I moved to Synael, there was a delivery of one bottle of cinnamon. Generally food is communal, but spices are not. I wanted that cinnamon, but so did Gweneth.”

“We met by grabbing that bottle at the same time,” Gweneth leaned her head against Micah’s shoulder. “We argued a good twenty minutes before agreeing to share it over lunch. One thing led to another and we were married a year later.”

“That’s so sweet,” Rey smiled. She looked down at Kezia, soft, pale, and the tiniest amount of black hair, “My, you are just the sweetest thing I have ever seen. Aren’t you?”

Rey tickled the babe’s tummy, and Kezia gave the cutest little giggle.

A gasp filled the tent, and then came a buzz of chatter and some scattered clapping.

Rey scowled, “Why is everyone staring at me? Is it because I’m holding the baby.”

“Not at all,” Gweneth held out her arms for her baby. “It’s because she’s laughing. Aren’t you laughing, my sweet girl?”

Rey quickly passed Kezia. She tried not to have her smile be sad as she thought about her own mother holding her like that once upon a time.

Then she remembered that her mother had had Postpartum Depression for the first three months of Rey’s life. Had she ever been held like that? Did people gather to bless Rey like they had come to bless Kezia?

Micah said, “They watched you after the laughter because it is tradition to make a newborn baby laugh. You can't stop trying until it does. It's supposed to bless the lives of all those around the baby. You have blessed us all.”

“Oh, well… you’re welcome,” Rey really didn’t know what she was supposed to say. “What- What other traditions are there in this ceremony?”

That was when Imogen called everyone to attention and came to take Kezia from Gweneth. Imogen smiled and kissed her daughter’s forehead, whispering a blessing.
As Imogen walked to the head of the congregation, Gweneth took Rey’s hand.

“Why don’t we find out?” Gweneth smiled.

Rey returned the grin and let Gweneth lead her forward.

It was a nice little ceremony. Imogen started it by thanking everyone for coming while Gweneth whispered to Rey that the maternal grandmother always led the ceremony.

Continuing the theme of evil spirits can’t stand water, they poured a little on the forehead of Kezia. Micah explained to Rey that spirits take a month before they reveal if they’re good or evil, so water would prove whether it’s an evil spirit.

“But what if it’s a good spirit?” Rey asked. “Don’t you not want to raise one of those either? Wouldn’t you just want a human baby?”

“All humans are are good spirits directly created by the Gods,” Gweneth answered. “ Spirits will continue to appear in the normal fashion – I know what you’re going to ask, no we don’t know how spirits are born in non-human situations – but the Gods craft spirits with their own hands who are special enough to be allowed to enjoy a life of peace before going to fight the spirits of evil. Unfortunately, the Gods can’t control whether a spirit will end up being good or evil, so we must test all children who are born to humans.”

“What if the baby turns out to be an evil spirit?”

Micah leaned over, “Don’t know. Don’t want to find out.”

When Kezia proved not to be an evil spirit, Imogen marked in ash on Kezia’s forehead the symbol of the God she was born under. There were twelve months and six Gods, so in a year each god would possess two months.

As Imogen called a prayer to the Goddess Koena to bless her granddaughter, Gweneth leaned over to Rey again.

“It’s consider good luck to marry someone who is born under either the same God as yourself, or your God’s spouse,” Gweneth said. “For example, I was born under Ipgyn and Micah was under Itar. However, your marriage will end in nothing death and disaster if you marry someone who is the sibling of the God you were born under.”

Luke hadn’t told Rey the story of the fuss Felicity’s maternal family made over their engagement when they learned Felicity – who had been born under Koena – was marrying a man born under Djun, Koena’s brother. He didn’t like to think about how their marriage did death in death and disaster.

Han just found it funny that Luke was born under the God of Sky, Water, Desert, and Language.

“I wonder what signs Teng and I are born under?” Rey mused.

“What’s your birthdates?”

Rey told her.

“I think you’re Imar and Teng’s Ipgyn.” Gweneth paused, “Or would he be Ethys? Either you’re blessed or screwed.”

Considering her life, Rey had a good feeling which it would be.

Next came the giving of gifts. It was tradition to receive a gift from a baby (in reality, the parents) after they were born. Gweneth and Micah gave woven blankets to everyone, and the grateful Rey ended up keeping hers in her satchel always.

Then came the tradition of gifting the newborn baby an item of the oldest living person in the family. With a dazzling smile, Imogen rocked her granddaughter in her arms and passed on her own three hair ties to wear the three buns when Kezia was old enough.

“Thank you,” Gweneth whispered with tears in her eyes.

Rey winced, her heart aching for a woman she would never know. Felicity Rhiaon would never get to see her grandchild… Since her mother was dead and Teng’s parents were gone, Rey’s children would only ever know one grandparent: her father.

What if she lost him too?

Would anyone give a gift to her children?

Rey closed her eyes and pushed with all her strength into the Force, begging it, pleading with it for it to just give her one moment, one image, one sound of her mother.

Please, Rey begged the Force, there had to be something her heart still held.

She didn’t hear Imogen announce to the group that she and Deirdre would now do the honour of singing the traditional first song of a child’s life. The grandmothers of a newborn baby were always the ones to sing the first song.

…Except for one Valrian child, one named Rey “Araeya” Rhiaon Skywalker at age nine months when her mother found the strength to overcome her Postpartum Depression.

Rey “Araeya” Rhiaon Skywalker did not have any living grandmother to sing to her… but she had a mother… and she had an aunt.

To the rain, to the sun,

You will be safe, my little one.

Two familiar voices sung in harmony with Dierdre and Imogen. The other women were only in the head of Rey Erso.

Close your eyes, and rest your head,

I will keep you safe in your bed.

She could see them. They were fuzzy, but she could see them. She could see the brown hair, two sets of eyes: hazel and brown.

Rey could see her mother and her aunt.

They were beautiful… and they looked so much like her.

To the east, to the west,
Surrender to your peaceful rest.

Rey took a deep breath, her soul filling with the Light Side as she took in their forms. Yes, she knew them… but though she couldn’t quite pin down why her aunt looked so familiar, Rey knew who her aunt didn’t look like.

No, she pushed the thought from her mind. It was time to focus on her mother. She wanted to remember her mother.

And so she remembered Felicity Rhiaon… but not in a memory she would have chosen.

To the mountain, to the sky,
I will shield you until the day I die.

"Oh, Rey," Felicity pulled into a tight hug. "Rey, you know that Mommy loves you more than anything in the galaxy, right?"

"Except Daddy," Rey said.

"No," Felicity shook her head and pulled back. Rey's arms settled around Felicity's neck as Felicity placed her hands on Rey's shoulders, "I love you even more than Daddy. More than anything and anyone in the entire galaxy. I swear that to you, and I don't want you to forget that."

"I won’t."

Rey whispered, “I won’t.”

She hadn’t.

Then Felicity Rhiaon was gone.

Rey’s eyes slowly fluttered open, her mind buzzing with confusion.

Yes, that had been her mother, that had truly been her mother! She could remember her mother. Thank you, Force. Thank you, Valrian Gods. Thank you, Giant Space Squid!

Then Rey frowned.

But her aunt… Rey thought back on the image. Her aunt hadn’t been Alyla Kene. That meant her father wasn’t Gavyn Kene and her aunt wasn’t Alyla Kene.

But if they weren’t… who was?

Did the key lie with the secret of who was Felicity Rhiaon? Rey wanted to find out, and yet… and yet she didn’t.

“Rey?” someone touched her arm. “Are you okay?”

She looked up in surprise at Gweneth. Rey hadn’t realized she had been crying.

“Uh, yeah,” Rey swallowed. “Sorry just… having a religious experience.”

Gweneth and Micah chuckled.

“Mission accomplished,” Micah grinned.
“Come on,” Gweneth urged. “There’s just one more bit, and then the three of us can go sneak off with the baby to go meet that boy you brought with you.”

As Gweneth led her forward into a line, Rey asked, “So, what do we do now?”

“While the village leader holds the baby – man, my mom had a lot of roles in this ceremony, usually there’s at least four people involved – you kiss the baby’s forehead and whisper a whisper in her ear.”

“And it better be a good one,” Micah said. “Newborn spirits do have a little magic in them. Almost always does a wish to a baby come turn.”

Rey thought long and hard what she wanted to request. Her mind buzzed with a million possibilities: learning the truth about her father, meeting Uncle Freighter, marrying Teng, meeting Kira’s Council, getting that hug and pear from Rose, Quom acting remotely sensible for once (okay maybe she should push her luck.)

But Rey already knew what she was going to wish.

Imogen smiled at her when Rey reached the front of the line.

“You have something good?” Imogen asked. “You should give a lot of thought to your wish.”

“I don’t need to think it over… I’ve been thinking about it for years.”

She bent down and kissed Kezia’s forehead, Rey’s heart filled with love and certainty.

“I wish,” Rey whispered into Kezia’s ear. “I wish I would learn something new about my mother on this trip.”

And as the superstition went, sure enough, Rey would learn something new about her mother in the village of Synael.

Only she would be horrified at what it was.

According to Gweneth, lunch was the only meal that was not a communal. It was still a communal event, but everyone could wander in and out the cooking hut – Una and Levi’s domain – over the span of an hour. Then people would eat lunch wherever they chose, some ducking into their tents, but most lounging around the cooking hut.

Teng and Rey sat with Gweneth, Micah, and Kezia in the shade of the cooking hut. They spoke aimlessly, chatting about whatever subject came to mind. When they came to the topic of how they all ended up on Jakku, Rey was amazed that the Valrians came to Jakku willingly.

“The world is getting darker every day,” Micah said. “The First Order is getting far too powerful.”

“Something is going to happen one of these days to catch the New Republic’s attention, mark my words,” Gweneth took care to shield her daughter from the sun. “I don’t want my family to be anywhere near that when it happens.”

“Is that why there’s a Valrian village here?” Rey asked.

“It’s been around since the Empire as a safe haven for Valrians,” Micah said. “During the rebellion, the Empire made a martyr out of a Valrian man, so we started planning. We didn’t think we’d have to use the village again after the war, but some people stayed here. Imogen and Cadman led the group of us back after the Burning of Rornian. Unfortunately, my parents and I didn’t move in the initial group, but after the Battle of Valra between the Resistance and the First Order, we came here.”

“Actually, I know you guys hate her,” Rey said, “but Aletha Kymeri actually fought in that battle.”

“That’s admirable,” Gweneth smiled. “But… don’t tell my mother. She’s a very traditional woman. I think what she did to your father was too harsh, punishing a man not of the faith for a belief of the fate. Madness.”

“Why don’t you tell your mother that?” Teng asked.

“It’s not proper,” Micah said. “Sure, in Valrian culture women are considered above me, but that doesn’t mean a daughter can challenge a Village Leader on her decisions. Now, if she actually tried to have your father killed, maybe that would be another story.”

Rey sighed, “I just wish that I hadn’t been held back from my culture for so long. Participating in a festival sounds so fun.”

“Then you’re going to love this,” Micah grinned, pointing to Cadman as he walked into the middle of the lunching villagers. “Looks like it’s duel time.”

“Duel time?” Teng questioned.

“Part of the story we celebrate during the Solstice Festival is the meeting of Itar and Ipgyn,” Gweneth smiled. “There was a misunderstanding between the Gods, resulting in a duel between them. Ipgyn won the fight, but every year her husband challenges her to a rematch. We honour them by re-enacting the duel, one woman fighting against a man with a weapon of choice that alternates every year.”

“I wonder what they’ll choose this year?” Micah mused.

“Mother didn’t say,” Gweneth replied.

“Ladies and Gentlemen!” Cadman announced. “It is time to duel once more. One brave woman will defend the honour of the Goddess Ipgyn against the champion of Itar. Are you ready to see a good fight?”

The villagers cheered.

“Before I ask for our volunteers for the honourable title of Champion, we of course must reveal this year’s weapon of choice.” Cadman signalled to Levi, who was standing off to the side holding something bulky and covered with a blanket, “Come forth with the weapons.”

Levi bowed his head when he reached Cadman. With a bit of flourish that Rey suspected was natural to all Valrians, Cadman pulled off the sheet. A gasp went up in the crowd as they behold the weapons of choice.

“This year we fight with staffs!” Cadman proclaimed.

Rey’s eyes lit up.

“Now,” Cadman looked around the camp, “who will volunteer?”
Teng just sighed and took Rey’s plate from her, “I’ll hold your food.”

Pressing a quick kiss to Teng’s cheek, Rey shot to her feet and raced over to Cadman. She reached him the same time Micah’s father, Murtaugh Rhiaon did.

“I’ll do it!” Rey grinned in excitement, the men looking a little surprised. “I’ll do the fight.”

“You?” Cadman blinked. “But you don’t know anything about the Solstice Festival.”

“Well, Gweneth told me all about this part,” Rey said. “Come on, I can do it.”

“I don’t know,” Murtaugh glanced at Cadman. “I’m not sure I could live with myself if I beat up a defenseless little girl.”

Rey lifted an eyebrow, “Defenseless? Excuse me, but how do you think I got these muscles. I know how to fight… and I know how to win.”

Murtaugh and Cadman exchanged a smiled.

“Well, Murtaugh, it’s your call,” Cadman said. “I’m willing to see if all of Tinadar’s bragging about this girl is true.”

Rey was touched to hear that her furry, weirdo, Uncle wandered the Sacred Villages bragging about her fighting skills.

“Alright then,” Murtaugh said. “Let’s do this.”

“Ladies and gentlemen, we have our volunteers!” Cadman announced. “Rhiaon vs Rhiaon!”

The villagers clapped and cheered as Rey and Murtaugh collected their staffs – Rey’s own was safely stored in the tent she and Teng had been given. Rey couldn’t help but blush when she heard Teng cheering her name far louder than anyone else’s voice.

“Champions, take your positions,” Cadman helped direct Rey to stand directly across from Murtaugh.

Rey grinned as she gripped the unfamiliar staff; she was so ready for this.

“Don’t worry, Bele,” Murtaugh lazily spun his staff, “I’ll go easy on you.”

“Oh, don’t feel the need to handicap yourself,” Rey smirked a one corner upturned smirk that belonged to a woman named Felicity Rhiaon. “I think I know a thing or two about holding my own.”

“Alright,” Murtaugh laughed. “But when you’re lying on the ground bloody, broken, and defeated, just remember that I warned you.”

“And when you’re the one actually in that position, know that I did too.”

“Murtaugh Rhiaon… Araeya Rhiaon…” Levi looked between the pair. He waved his hand as the signal, “Begin!”

So Rey and Murtaugh began their duel… and plainly put, Rey kicked his ass.
“Kalonia’s working on Wexley with Mager and Darkstar, while Kymeri’s working on Paige Tico’s head injury,” Evan told the three medical droids and six human nurses following him around. “I’ve got the rest of the various medical staff with the other survivors, though we might want to send in another to tend to Solo. Rumor has it he likes to put up a fuss during checkups. Krenis and Sona, can you assist Doctors Manx and Gallamby with the boy who lost his legs? Also, maybe give his mother a little something to calm her down? My own mother can only comfort Ms. Narden so much.”

“Yes, sir,” Sona nodded, her hand unconsciously rubbing her pregnant stomach. She was one of the best nurses on the Ninka, and she had been fending off Holdo’s requests to not leave the Resistance. Unfortunately seeing the terrible things that had been done to Hena Narden’s little boy only made her more secure in her decision to leave the Resistance to raise her child. It was more important to her to be with her child than to die for an uncertain future. “Speaking of sedatives, what do we do about Tokani?”

“Oh right,” Evan said. “Nava, you go check on him and send a quick notification of his drugging to General Organa. She’s starting to keep a tally of how many times Aletha pulls that stunt. Sooner or later, the General’s going to be forced to put Kymeri on a formal discipline action plan. Now, can I get someone to check on Lieutenant Connix? She seems fine, but considering her tussle with the Knights of Ren, I want to double check her condition.”

“Right on it, Sir,” Eirta Cari saluted and went to hunt down Kaydel.

“Now, let’s discuss the Damerons.”

Had a stranger entered the medical bay of the Ninka they might have thought Evan Tharel to be the Head of Medical. In fact, as Vice Admiral Amilyn Holdo entered, she had to do a double take. Tharel so calmly and skillfully assigned tasks and compiled the actions most would not even think of. He was not arrogant about it, there was just a job to be done and since his bosses were busy actually practicing medicine, he stepped in to coordinate the insanity of the medical bay.

And truth be told, he was good at it.

Holdo smiled. He was very good.

“Nurse Calhuu, can you give Lieutenant Kun a reflex test?” Evan ordered. “I want to check how her leg injury is doing. GH-49, you have the most comprehensive databank of Wookiee anatomy. Go see if I overlooked anything with Waroo and Chewbacca. 2-4K, I’ll get you to do a neural scan on me. I haven’t checked myself for concussion or brain injuries—”

“Oh, I don’t see how that would be a problem,” Holdo intercut without a regard for if the team should be interrupted. “You seem to be functioning at a higher level than half my crew on their best day.”

Evan didn’t like how quickly the team around him dispersed.

“Thank you, Vice Admiral,” Evan respectfully bowed his head. He wasn’t exactly enthused about the interruption, but he also wasn’t about to go destroy her desk chair with Paige. “Is there something I can assist you with?”

“Well, I’ve been discussing the events of this mission with General Organa, and we’ve decided there’s a conversation that needs to be had.”

Evan’s face went pale, “Vice Admiral, please. I had absolutely no idea what that audio recording truly contained. I did not mean to send it to the General!”
But Holdo laughed, “Oh, no, no. That’s not what I meant.”

“When- Really?”

“Truly,” she nodded. “Now, admittedly, I was there when General Organa heard the recording, and she’s not very pleased with the incident. However, fault lies in multiple avenues, and that will be a discussion for the two of you when we return to D’Qar.”

“Oh, well… I’ll have that to look forward to then.” Evan hated himself for what he asked next, “Out of curiosity… what was her reaction?”

“She threw her headset across the desk and fled from the Control Center.”

“…Ah.” Evan cleared his throat, “So, what was it that you wanted to discuss?”

“Your actions on Nixrye; particularly the ones involving the Knights of Ren.”

“Am I in trouble? For the record, I wasn’t the one who decided to sear Snap’s leg like a steak.”

“Yes, Doctor Kalonia got your retraining request memo,” Holdo smiled. She very much enjoyed talking to one of Poe Dameron’s lackeys without having to hack through a starship’s worth of contempt. “But you’re not in trouble, Corporal Namit. General Organa and I agree that your actions were very admirable.”

“Oh…” Evan scowled. He was so used to being called Medic or Nurse Tharel that it took him a second to remember that technically his official title was Corporal Geno Namit. Not that he minded his official title being used by such a high-ranking officer. Frankly, he thought that quite proper. “Uh, thank you for the praise, Vice Admiral, but honestly I was just doing my duty.”

“And that’s exactly it,” Holdo said, “you were doing your duty. So often we’ve had reckless pilots and doctors and officers of all ranks just doing whatever they wanted regardless of the consequences. It’s that careless attitude of Poe Dameron’s that drives me up the wall.”

“I, um… noticed.”

“But you,” Holdo put her hand on the side of Evan’s arm, “you followed your mandate, and because of it, this whole situation didn’t end it tragedy.”

“With all due respect, I feel Jaina Fel’s parents will disagree.”

“We’re at war, Corporal Namit. There will always be losses, but when we have soldiers like you around, I see a bright future ahead. You stuck to your duty to protect and heal those around you, to be the better person and just do good in the universe. It didn’t matter if they were Resistance, Rebel Vet, Knight of Ren, Stormtrooper, Head of Crimson Dawn, or Innocent Bystander, you helped them. Lives were saved today because of you, Corporal Namit. And because of that kindness towards even our enemies, Kylo Ren let everyone but Dameron and Connix walk out the door unscathed.”

“I’m not sure if I can take that praise,” Evan said respectfully. “I’m sure it was more for the truce that Commander Dameron bartered.”

“The hostage situation Dameron caused speaks otherwise.” Holdo’s voice held the joy see felt for Poe. “You need to work on your confidence, Corporal Namit. You truly deserve this praise.”

Evan gave a small smile. Her words were so genuine and filled him with earned pride. Why was it again that Poe hated this woman?

“Thank you, Vice Admiral,” Evan bowed his head again. “I hope to contribute positively to the Resistance in the future.”

“I hope you do too,” Holdo said. “In fact, after reading your file, I think I might come to expect it.”

“Ma’am?”

“You did well in the Battle of Valra, you’ve become a top-notch sniper, then there was the Skirmish on Christophis, the Battle of Dathomir, the Ryloth Mission, Operation Amidala, and that make-shift refugee camp you organized during the Occupation of Sullust. You have quite the colourful career.”

Evan shrugged, “I go where I’m sent.”

“And I’ll be keeping an eye on where you’re sent next. Which will be a lot more places I would bet after this.”

Holdo signalled to somebody that Evan hadn’t noticed was waiting in the doorway. If he recalled correctly the woman’s name was Commander Larma D’Acy, Holdo’s second-in-command.

Evan’s eyes widened when D’Acy presented Holdo with a familiar looking box. It was designed to have a lid like a ring box, but the box was far too large to hold any jewelry

“I must apologize for addressing you improperly, Medic Tharel.” Holdo lifted the lid to reveal a shiny new silver, white, and red insignia with the symbol of a straight line. “Because as of this moment, you’re not a Corporal… You’re Captain Geno Namit.”

Evan didn’t know what to say, “Are you- Are you serious?”

“Why waste all our time with promoting you to Sergeant or Cadet? You deserve the rank of Captain.” Holdo took the liberty of pinning the insignia on Evan herself, “You have a wonderful future ahead of you, Captain. Don’t let people like Poe Dameron steer you off-course. Keep to your values, and your path will remain true. Congratulations, Captain Namit, and May the Force Be With You.”

He managed to stay perfectly composed as he shared a salute with D’Acy and Holdo, but once the women were gone, he was off like a shot.

“Paige! Mom! Aletha! Meredyth! Anyone! I” he raced around the Medical Bay, looking for a friend. “Why is everyone always busy when I have good news?”

Rey was quite surprised to find that the Valrians still stayed up when the two moons of Jakku shone in the sky. Usually when darkness fell, you had to seek shelter or face the hostile night wildlife and the freezing air of the desert at night. But with the fires all lit the villagers stayed warm, and the amount of noise and activity they made kept even the steelpeckers away.

Well, except the ones roasting on the spits over the fire. They weren’t supposed to talk about it due to the Valrians banishing the doctor, but Gweneth told Rey in a whisper that Aletha used to be their main supplier of steelpecker meat. Rey knew that Aletha hunted the birds as a bit of extra income, but she had no idea that Aletha used Quom to sell them to the Sacred Villages.
She was also starting to realize that Quom wasn’t actually lying when he boasted of doing business with every Sacred Village. There were only three villages Rey hadn’t been to, and in the ones she had, everyone knew Quom. Apparently, Quom Tinadar was the closest Jakku had to a celebrity.

That was a very sad reflection on Jakku.

The Valrians ate all their meals together. Communal meals were served around a roaring fire, everyone in specially selected seat based on their societal rank. As village leaders, Imogen and Cadman sat at the top the of circle, situated in front of the cooking hut. Their spouses, Levi and Una oversaw serving the food but would sit next to them when the food was all set out.

Since Rey had volunteered to be the proxy of Ipgyn – as well as being guest, who always had the highest seat of honour – she was seated next to Imogen. Murtagh was next to Cadman, with Dierdre next to her husband. Rey may have been the victor of the duel, but Murtagh still had honoured the Gods.

Next to Rey was Gweneth with Micah at her side holding baby Kezia. New parents were always seated as high as possible (but always below a guest and the head of household) so they may get the most food. They needed the strength to care for their child, and sometimes when the food were passed to the last person, the bowl would be empty.

Teng had to face that trial, because as he was an Elda – a man not practicing or connected to the faith – he was served last. Even if a Valrian had an Elra or Elda as their guest, they would always be served last. Since Teng had shone an active interest in learning about Valra, he had been dubbed a Xern – a male not born into the faith, but interested in the faith. Xerns and their female counterpart, Xera were always served before an Elra or Elda, but since there were none to be found, Teng was still last.

“So how does this serving thing go?” Rey asked as she passed a dish of Honey-glazed Steelpecker to Gweneth. “I get the whole head of household/village/whatever thing, then guest, new parents, and then traditional order with people like Teng last, but what is traditional order?”

“Okay, it goes like this,” Gweneth answered. “Meals are dished out from women to men, oldest to youngest, but you don’t just go straight all the women first, you follow a line to completion first. So you would go mother and father, then their daughter, her son, and then his son.”

“Got it.”

“Then you go back up to the son of that first father and mother. Next served is his second born who is a daughter, his fourth born who is a daughter, his first born who is a son, and his third born who is a son. Make sense?”

“Uh… sure.”

“You want a diagram?”

“Yes, please.”

“Alright, I’ll write a number next to each person to describe their generation,” Gweneth said as she started to draw into the sand. “M means Mother, F is Father, D is Daughter, S is Son. Brackets with lower cases are for birth order of the four siblings.”

Rey got it when Gweneth drew it out.

\[
M – 1, F – 1
\]
“If I have this right, then that means even if you weren’t a new mother you would still be in the spot you are because you’re Imogen’s daughter?” Rey asked.

“Now you’ve got it,” Gweneth smiled.

“I guess I do,” Rey nodded, grabbing a dish of imported nuna jerky strips. She grabbed about five and put them on her plate before passing the dish to Gweneth, “Just don’t ask me to host a dinner any time soon.”

“Fair, but speaking of dining customs,” Gweneth immediately handed the jerky to Micah and then took three strips off Rey’s plate, placing them on her own. “Two things to keep in mind. You must forfeit as much as your food as possible to someone who needs it more. Since I have a child, you should have taken less. Second, you must finish all the food you take. You may pass on whatever you’re offered, but if you accept it, you must finish it.”

“Thanks,” Rey redden slightly. “My dad told me that, but I forgot.”

“It’s okay. We’re not going to get mad because you don’t have all this memorized. Besides, it’s a Festival. This dinner is going to have a lot of dishes.”

Rey frowned as she was passed a plate of Chadian and Coriander Ripper-Raptor, “Valrians aren’t big on vegetarianism, are they?”

“Not really,” Gweneth answered. “But that’s not why you don’t see any vegetables yet. Valrians firmly believe that you eat your meat before your bread – or any other dish – because an animal died so you can live, and you should make sure that life is being honoured. An animal should have its bones completely picked clean.”

“Well, I’m not going to argue with that. This all looks so much better than veg-meat and polystarch.”

And indeed it was some much better than veg-meat and polystarch. Rey was surprised she didn’t throw up with how much food she ate.

There was Fig-stuffed Bloggin, followed by tray of boiled and peppered bloggin eggs.

There was a heaping plate of pickled gnaw-jaws (a large shelled bug with too many legs for Rey’s liking that used their scissor-like mandibles on unsuspecting victims) that Rey was quick to pass over. She wasn’t even slightly surprised to learn that those were Quom’s favorite dish on his visits.

Next came cheese made from happabore milk. …Rey didn’t know you could milk a happabore, and did not want to know how.

Finally came the bread, a square, bright orange loaf filled with nuts called Ipipe Bread. Rey was surprised that the Valrians didn’t slice the bread but tore off chunks with their hands.

Then came the vegetables: a mix of dried peas and lentils. Steamed vaporator mushrooms. Leeks prepared in about seventeen different ways.

For some reason the piles of leeks made Rey think of soup and her mother… no wait. Wrong person, Rey corrected her mind. It was Rogue One who liked the roast leek soup; Rey had learned that from Aletha’s care shipment. Right, Rogue One, not her mother. Rogue One not Felicity Rhiaon.
Why would she mix up those two?

But most curious of all was the bowl of Tuanulberries that went completely untouched.

“Is something wrong with them?” Rey dared to ask Imogen.

She looked very uncomfortable with the query, “It is not the berries themselves but rather the origin of the plant.”

“What’s wrong with Tuanul?” Rey knew the berry was named after the Jakku Sacred Village because that was the only place they grew. She had never been to Tuanul, her father always refusing to let her go anywhere near it. Once a villager from Tuanul had come into Niima Outpost, and her father forced Rey to go home rather than get anywhere near the woman.

Imogen took a breath, “Tuanul… has a conflicting religious view from us.”

Rey scowled, “Don’t all the villages?”

“Yes, but… that religion is a bit different. Tuanul is a branch of the Church of the Force, and they worship the Jedi and their so-called powers.”

Wait, what? There was Sacred Village about the Force? No wonder her Dad kept her away from Tuanul… Maybe she should go hang out in Tuanul after Synael.

“I… I didn’t know that,” Rey stuttered out. Then she saw the scowl on Imogen’s face, “Is there something… Valra doesn’t like about the Force?”

“The Jedi,” Imogen said shortly. “There is room in this world for people to believe in other Gods and powers, but the Jedi have insulted us. Araeya, Valra always has open arms for people to join us… but if you insult us, the punishment is swift and terrible.”

Yeah, Rey had gathered that considering her father’s death sentence.

“What’s wrong with the Jedi?” Rey dared to ask.

“You know of Luke Skywalker and his sister?”

“Uh huh.”

“That’s what’s wrong with the Jedi.”

“… Yeah, I’m going to need a bit more to go on,” Rey said.

Imogen sighed, “The Skywalker family has been historically insulting to Valra. Leia Organa caused a bombing that killed hundreds specifically to make a martyr for the Rebellion. Han Solo personally insulted the Governor of the Andeleans – a famous mountain ridge on Valra and one of the most powerful regions on the planet – in a way that almost caused Valra to go war with the New Republic. Luke Skywalker murdered his Valrian father-in-law, and then sent his Valrian wife to die in his place. Solo’s son brutally tortured his Valrian aunt and mocked our funeral rites when she died from that torture. The Skywalker Family hasn’t just broken the Five Pillars of Virtue, but smashed them into pieces.”

Based on the stories she had heard about the Skywalkers, Rey wasn’t sure how many of Imogen’s claims were true. By the time tales reached Jakku, they were often quite warped. The Han Solo thing sounded right on the money, though.
“And because of all that, Valrians hate the Jedi?” Rey asked.

“I won’t lie to you, Araeya,” Imogen said, “if a Skywalker were to step foot on Valra, they would probably by lynched. Oh, that’s another custom for you to learn about. The preferred way of execution in Valrian culture is a public lynching, that way the public is involved and it’s there for everyone to see.”

Rey was starting to understand why her father had kept her away from Synael.

Also explained a few things about her mother.

Rey shook her head and immediately passed the next dish directly to Gweneth, her appetite suddenly gone. Wow, if they hated Dad for dating a widow while being a widower, what would they do if they knew he was a Jedi?

…What if they figured out she was?

No, the world was full of people who stood intolerant of other’s beliefs. Rey was a Jedi (kind of) and her father taught her that the main purpose of being a Jedi wasn’t to play with lightsabers, it was bringing harmony to people like Valrians and Jedi. It must work considering she was the literal product of a Valrian and Jedi.

Plus Luke Skywalker had married a Valrian. They couldn’t have been that hostile to Jedi from the beginning. That was actually cool about Skywalker and his wife. Maybe her parents got along with Luke Skywalker and Rogue One.

Besides, Rey felt safe. If there was one thing both Luke and Imogen had made clear, it was that Valrians protected their own and would rather die than harm a guest. This visit to Synael might be her only chance to ever experience her mother’s culture, and other than this accidental semi death threat (it wasn’t like she was part of the Skywalker family,) Rey had very much enjoyed this visit.

No, she was strong, smart, and brave. She was Rey Rhiaon Something That Was Probably The Name Kene But Let’s Go With Erso Right Now. She would be the one to bring harmony between the Jedi and Valra.

…But like five years from now when she was an actual Jedi. There was a First Order to deal with before mending the bridge between the Jedi and Valra. For now, she would just learn as much as she could about Valra and stop thinking about them probably wanting to murder her if they knew the truth.

“Here,” Imogen passed her a wooden cup filled with a golden mixture. A tray full of them were passed around the villagers’ fireside circle. “Drink.”

“What is it?” Rey accepted it and gave a sniff.

“It’s called Crekia. It’s a mixture of honey and fig juice that we drink during toasts.”

“Is it alcoholic? Because I’m only seventeen. I’m not sure if I’m allowed to get drunk yet.”

“No, Crekia has no alcohol in it.”

Gweneth leaned over with a grin, “Wait until we burst out the Muja Brew on Night Three. Micah and I are determined to get at least five glasses in each you and your boyfriend.”

Rey laughed at Gweneth as they watched Imogen rise to her feet in harmony with Cadman.
“Friends,” Imogen announced to the group, clutching her glass of Crekia. “Tonight we celebrate the first day of the Solstice Festival. Right now on the planet we call home, it is almost the night of the winter solstice. As per tradition, tonight we toast those we have the honour of calling guests. Araeya, Toryn, please stand.”

Exchanging a look, neither of the teen expected the command and awkwardly rose to their feet. Every eye turned to them and the villagers lifted their glasses to Rey and Teng.

“Thank you for expressing such an interest in our culture,” Cadman raised his own glass. “And thank you for gracing us with the honour of hosting you. The two of you are always welcome at our hearth.”

Teng frowned and mouthed to Rey “What’s a hearth?”

She shrugged.

“Araeya and Toryn,” Imogen said, “although the toast is to the both of you, we kindly ask you join in on the recitation of the blessing.”

“Oh, uh,” Rey hadn’t expected to be put on the spot. “What’s the blessing?”

Cadman smiled, “Any time you toast, you say the word Latoha. It means good luck, good health, good blessings, may you prosper, that sort of thing. Will you led us?”

Teng looked at Rey to signal Your move.

She smiled and raised her glass, “Latoha.”

Teng raised his glass, “Latoha.”

“To Itar! To Light, to Men, to War, and to Leadership!” Cadman boomed to the group.

“To Ipgyn! To Dark, to Women, to Peace, and to Service!” Imogen had said the words so many times they were music on her tongue.

“To Djun! To Sky, to Water, to Desert, and to Language!”

“To Ethys! To Earth, to Fire, to Children, and to Art!”

“To Imar! To Death, to Love, to Strength, and to Isolation!”

“To Koena! To Life, to Pain, to Wisdom, and to Travel!”

“Latoha!” the villagers cheered, a sea of smiling and welcoming faces.

There was laughter and clinking as the villagers toasted, drank, and revelled in the festivities, ready to move on to the next part where Imogen would tell the first part of the story of the Gods.

And as they toasted, Rey couldn’t get her mind off the Valrians’ distaste for the Jedi and what the villagers would think about her if they knew the truth.

Somehow a literal drink of honey went down rougher than polystarch and veg-meat.
The Tale of the Taming of Valra

As traditionally told in three parts on each night of the Solstice Festival, Valrians recount the tale of how six good spirits met, married, and made Gods of themselves.

FIRST NIGHT

Once the world was cold and dark and filled with spirits. These were not pure souls, some were mischievous, some reckless, but worst of all, some were downright evil.

The world was divided into three parts: the South with its mountain ranges, the North which was covered in forest, and the Centre that was an expansive grassland. And in each part there lived a brother and a sister, the only truly good and powerful spirits of the world.

Djun and Koena lived in the North filled with light and life. Itar and Ethys were in the Centre caring for the crops and innocent animals during the wars of the spirits. Imar and Ipgyn lived in the dreaded South, dark and dreary from the cold and misty mountains.

Things became desperate in the South, the most evil of the spirits hiding in the mountain caverns. For years Imar fought with his sister, Ipgyn begging her to come explore the world with him to find others like them and defeat the evil of the world. Ipgyn refused; her duty was caring for the innocents of their home. The Gods and Goddesses were not the only good spirits, but they were the most powerful ones. Ipgyn believed she could not walk away from the good spirits of the South who lived under the torment of the most evil of spirits.

One day, the evil became too much for Imar, and when his sister slept, he set out North to find someone to join his quest for peace.

In the North, things were better, their dark spirits being of the mischievous nature, more nuisance than menace. They would hide in the trees and play tricks on travelers and those that made the forest their home. Their hunger was ravenous, stealing and consuming anything they desired.

And then the disaster: a band of mischievous Imp spirits went too far with their merriment and pranks. A fire claimed half of the forest of the North and while the good spirits tried to repair the ashes, the little Imps turned ash to sand and created a vast desert.

Djun became angry, and with the other good spirits rallying behind him, he pursued the spirits that destroyed their land and found their justice. When the Imps refused to undo the harm they caused, Djun banished them from the North. The punished refused to comply, but Djun’s followers threatened them with death if they did not go. Djun objected to the threats, but the Imps cowered to it and fled. However, they chose to lay the blame of their banishment on Djun and stole his sister away with them.

Koena, however, was not a weak woman. She was wise and she was clever. Koena allowed the Imps to take her with them to the Centre. She played dumb and weak, waiting for her chance to break free.

On their journey the Imps continued with their hunger, taking everything they wanted. When it became clear to Koena what they craved was her, she tried them, feeding them a cordial of enchanted Aabane root. When the Imps drank it, their lustful intentions dissipated and found the thought of mating with Koena repulsive.

Years later, the Gods would honour the simple roots by blessing them with their anti-impregnation properties. They could not make the power Koena gave them during her kidnapping permanent, but they could make it so other victims could have a way to protect themselves from carrying the child of their attacker.

While Koena lay in wait with the Imps, Imar had reached the Centre and began recruiting help. All the good spirits were too afraid to stand up to the ones of evil, the terrifying stories of the South having reached their ears years ago. None wished to join the crusade except for one, the proud and strong Itar.

Instantly falling into a bond of friendship almost that of brothers, Itar and Imar fought against evil spirits for the length of a season. Itar brought Imar into his home and introduced him to his sister, Ethys, a beautiful and kind spirit. She spent her life protecting the young spirits, the children who had not yet shown their nature.

Ethys and Imar became the closest of friends… though Itar worried their relationship may turn to something more.

One day, Ethys was tending to a wounded animal when a group of mischievous Imps came upon her. Itar was off fighting a rather powerful spirit of evil, so Ethys was alone and vulnerable.

However, Imar was returning to the little cottage the three shared, having been out scouting for more followers, when he heard her screams. Instantly, Imar rushed into action to save his friend, but when he found her, he was surprised to find another good spirit fighting the Imps.

Koena had finally made her move and attacked the Imps, freeing Ethys from her bindings. Together the two female spirits fought against the Imps, but Ethys was not a warrior, hence why Imar and Itar didn’t bring her along to their battles. She was easily overwhelmed, but that was when Imar found them.

Koena didn’t question the new arrival, only smiled when she saw him protecting Ethys. She called out to Imar, instructing him when the Imps made a move he didn’t perceive. Soon enough Imar started shouting out the same to Koena, and in no time at all they had become a team.

They fought and fought and fought and fought. The Imps pushed them back and back and back and back. Their backs hit and their breath stopped.

“You okay?” Koena asked.

“Fine,” Imar replied. “You?”

“Could be better,” Koena gave a wiry smile. “I’m Koena.”

“Imar.”

“Nice to meet you. Now if you wouldn’t mind, how about we-”

“Show these Imps who’s boss?”

“You read my mind.”

And together they unleashed their mighty powers and destroyed the Imps.

When the dust settled, and they stood there panting in the aftermath, Imar and Koena truly looked upon each other for the first time. And they instantly fell madly in love.
As Luke laid in his cot, staring up at the roof of the walker, he didn’t have to wonder what Rey and Teng were doing in Synael. It was the first night of the Solstice Festival. They would be with the other Valrians, cleaning off and decorating the graves of the dead with flowers. According to Quom, the Valrians would get Aabane flowers from Valra shipped in for that purpose, though Luke suspected it was also to make some badly needed birth control.

He would remember how Felicity would get at this time of year. She wasn’t the most pious person, but Felicity did love the Solstice Festival. Luke didn’t know how many of those she dragged him-

Ten.

It was always only ten. Ben didn’t let that number ever be higher. Ten festivals, ten years, ten times less than Luke and Felicity deserved together.

Luke sighed. How could it have been twelve years since he last held his wife… Held her in his arms and lied about being together again. If he had known that was the last time he would hold her, he never would have let her go.

He reached for the Holo on his bedside storage crate and gazed at the picture of his beloved wife.

His dreams about Felicity had grown in number drastically. There was rarely a night that Luke didn’t dream of her. He wondered if Lando had the same dreams about Alyla and that was the arrangement she hinted at. The only difference is that Lando’s dreams of Alyla were real, his wasn’t. No matter how right it felt, how perfect every detail was, that wasn’t his wife. Felicity Rhiaon was gone.

Still he yearned for her. Yearned in many ways. And his dreams would always leave him unsatisfied. Whenever he was about to touch her in the ways he burned for, without fail that would be the exact moment he woke up.

Ok, yes, maybe it was a bit shallow, but as much as he missed her emotionally and mentally… God he missed her physically. He missed the touch of her, the taste of her, the feel of her skin against his body.

It had been twelve years he had last had her; hell, it had been three years since Aletha. Luke Skywalker had a thirst that wasn’t because he lived in a desert.

Luke set the Holo down and tried to settle to sleep. He wanted to quickly fall to sleep and find her there in his dreams. Luke wanted to take her into his arms and cross that bridge he throbbed for.

Oh, she would want it. She would want him so bad. He knew how made going without his touch for a month made her, twelve years would leave her as nothing more than a writhing heap of lust.

She would want his lips: rough and chapped tasting every inch of her body. She would want the musty scent of his sweat on her trembling skin as he reclaimed the figure that belonged to him. She would want that fascinating contradictory duet of cold metal and warm flesh as his hands caressed her most erotic areas. Most of all she would want that carnal act that had led to the existence of their daughter. She would want-

No, she wouldn’t.

Sighing, Luke pushed back the covers and summoned his cloak. He gave a final glance back at the Holo and knew he was doing the right thing. If Felicity were alive here and now with him, he knew what she would want to do on the First Night of the Solstice Festival.

And even though it was the dark of night, Luke Skywalker went out and observed the one tradition of Valra his wife never missed. He gathered what small blooms of flowers he could find poking out of the sand and went to the small graveyard behind the walker. He carefully cleaned off every one of the graves (even Antar’s), adorned them with his flowers, and whispered a prayer to the Valrian Gods, thanking them for blessing him with the chance to be a part of the life of each interred in the sand.

Then he knelt at the grave of his wife and wept.

Sometimes I look into the screened eyes of those Stormtrooper masks and wonder what’s going on inside. Is there a real person behind that mask? Is there sympathy? Regret? Courage?

Is there a hero inside? Someone to change the galaxy and bring Light to the world? Sometimes I look into the screened eyes of those Stormtrooper masks and desperately want to ask… If given the chance, would you mean something to me?

Maybe someday one of them will tell me.

— Lando Calrissian and the Emperor of Nowhere, Chapter XIV

They felt the eyes on them as they solemnly marched to their bunks. Marks and Finn did their best to keep their heads held high as they were led to their beds by Captain Sigma and Captain Roan. Whispers came from every which way, the topic obvious: two teams of Stormtroopers had gone to Nixrye, but only half of the eight were returning.

When they reached the four sets of bunks that belonged to the FN and MK squadrons, Marks and Finn stood in front of their beds, arms behind their perfectly straight backs waiting for the signal.

They stood across from each other, the pair of them having the bottom bunks directly across from each other. It was how they first met. The barracks of the First Order were several dozen narrow strips of corridors, each separated by a thin wood wall with thirty bunk beds lining each wall. You’d get most familiar with those sixty Stormtroopers of your corridor, and with the two side by side bunk beds of the FN squad on the corridor’s south wall across from the two MK bunk beds on the north wall, FN-2187 and MK-6093 had done just that.

It seemed like every Stormtrooper in the corridor watched as Captains Sigma and Roan stripped the personal effects and sheets from the bunks of the fallen soldiers.

Captain Phasma typically was the one to do this, but for multiple teams they would bring on more Captains. Even then it should have just been Phasma and Sigma, but Roan had stepped in because Phasma was in the infirmary with Nines and Zeroes.

The pair were spending the night due to a couple unforeseen – but not life-threatening – complications with their injuries. They’d be fine by morning.

Marks and Finn could do nothing but watch as their friend’s items were thrown carelessly to the floor. The soldiers couldn’t even let a facial muscle twitch in pain. It was a demonstration of how worthless the First Order viewed dead soldiers. A dead Stormtrooper on a successful mission was a hero… a dead Stormtrooper on a failed mission was a disgrace.
Finn struggled not to react as he watched Sigma empty his bed mate’s space. It was a harsh reminder that Slip, his friend, was truly dead.

Damn Crimson Dawn and the destruction they caused! At least Finn could spend the rest of his life serving with the First Order to avenge his friend and bring order to the Galaxy.

But as much as Finn wanted to be upset over such a vivid reminder of Slip’s death, he recognized it was Marks who had it the hardest. Finn had lost one friend… Mark had to stand there as the last survivor of his team.

What would happen to Marks now? A team needed four members. Would they assign Marks to a team that was down a member? Would they create a brand-new team out of other Stormtroopers who had lost their brothers and sisters in arms?

Finn knew the most likely path was that since the MK squad was down to one member, the FN squad was missing one, and the teams had worked together in the past, that Marks would be assigned to the FN squad.

But why did Finn have the feeling that wasn’t what was going to happen?

“Pick!” Captain Roan ordered Marks and Finn.

Finn glanced down at the floor covered the possessions of Tone, Duck, Weevil, and Slip.

As a show of generosity Stormtroopers were allowed to keep a single possession of their fallen comrade. However, while expected to select something, it was severely frowned upon to show much regard for the item. Displaying it openly was a constant reminder of their fallen brother, and you weren’t supposed to bring glory to a disgrace.

That was the reason Marks was careful to pick Tone’s deck of Sabacc cards, which were for the high stakes variant of the game called Jhabacc. Ever his father’s son, Marks collected decks of Sabacc cards, intending to learn all the variants his father had. At over 80 variants, it was no easy feat, especially since he lived in the First Order where Sabacc wasn’t played much among the troops.

Finn simply chose Slip’s weatherproof underboots. He could always keep them on, and no one would know. Then at least he could say that in all his adventures, Slip was with him literally every step of the way.

Items selected, Marks and Finn went back to stand at attention and watch the possessions be cleared from the floor. Though it was never said aloud, everyone knew all those prized possessions were about to be dumped in the trash compactor.

When they were finished, Captains Roan and Sigma didn’t say anything to the Stormtroopers. They just took the bags of stuff and left.

For a moment, no one said anything; then came the loud buzzing of conversations and speculations. Marks and Finn weren’t thrilled by the gossip around them, but they were just happy to collapse onto their bunks.

“Well, that was…” Finn sighed. “Interesting.”

“I don’t care what trouble this will get me in, I’m saying it.” Marks declared, “I’m getting really sick of Kylo Ren’s love life. Can’t they just grow him a kid in a test tube?”

“Would that even work?” Finn frowned.
“Worked on me,” Marks shrugged.

Stormtroopers weren’t exactly given lessons on the practice of bioengineering, fertility, and in vitro fertilization. He only was educated on the process after he asked his superiors when he was ten why a ghost woman had randomly appeared to him and claimed to be his mother.

That had been a very awkward conversation between Kylo Ren and Marks. At least he came to understand why he seemed to have a nickname from birth.

MK-6093… Aka Marcus Kene experimental product of subject 60 – Alyla Kene – and subject 93 – Lando Calrissian – who in initial compatibility calculations between subjects had been the combination with the highest Marks in the desired attributes of a Stormtrooper.

But he preferred the name “Marks” the First Order had given him to remind everyone of what he was: a genetic experiment to make a model Force Sensitive Stormtrooper obedient to their every whim.

Yet Marks didn’t carry the name for that reason, he did it to honor his mother whose body was riddled with marks. He did it to honor his father who had many black marks on his record, and he did it to remind everyone that no matter what the computers had predicted, Marks was still in control.

His mother was a slave and his father a scoundrel, but Marks refused to be either. He preferred to be a turncoat like his father, and work to take down a system of oppression like his mother had done on Zygerria all those years ago.

The First Order made a mistake when they decided to experiment with cloning and bioengineering. They were idiots to make a son of Alyla Kene and Lando Calrissian without the consent or even knowledge of the parents, and Marks would make them regret that decision.

Marks just needed a chance… and maybe with this Rose Tico, he finally had a way.

He smiled as he remembered the gloves stashed in his small satchel. Marks still had to unpack, but he wanted to wait until the alarm sounded and the rest of the Stormtroopers had gone to training. Thankfully, he and Finn had been excused from exercises that day to rest from their ordeal.

Sure enough, a few moments later a loud blaring filled the room. It was followed by the clattering of uniforms and pounding of boots as fifty-two Stormtroopers suited up into armor and filed out of the dorm.

When the last few soldiers made their way into the hall, Marks looked over at Finn. He frowned when he saw Finn clutching his bowed head, sweat gathering on his forehead.

“Looking a little pale there, Two-One,” Marks said. “You okay?”

“Yeah, I’m fine,” Finn groaned. “But, uh… you think you could stop calling me Two-One?”

“What do you want me to call you?”

“How about Finn?”

Marks raised an eyebrow but didn’t press the point, “Okay, Finn. Is it time to take your medicine?”

“Yeah. I think so,” Finn nodded.

“Well, with the mess everything is right now with our schedules, if they send someone to get you, they’re going to send it to the training room.”

“Sounds about right.” Finn took a deep breath and shakily rose to his feet.

Marks rose up with him and grabbed Finn’s shoulder to steady him, “You gonna be okay? Do you want me to walk you there?”

“I’ll be fine. You stay here and get some rest.”

“Alright, but if they find you facedown in a hallway, I’m not answering to Phasma or Sasa.”

“Marks, I just survived a bombing. A little walk to the training room isn’t going to kill me.”

“I’ll make sure to put that quote on your grave.”

Finn laughed and just patted his shoulder.

Marks smiled, watching his friend go. When Finn disappeared, he gave a giant breath of relief. As much as he enjoyed the company of FN-2187, there were times he just needed a break for himself. Now Marks could smile. Now Marks could breathe.

He was finally alone.

…Except for the woman sitting on his bed.

“Well, look who’s back from the dead,” Marks grinned.

Alyla Kene laughed as her son knelt down in front of her, and she pulled him into a tight embrace.

“I was so worried about you,” Alyla whispered as she held him tight.

“I’m okay, Mom,” Marks gave a chuckle that had come straight from Lando Calrissian. “I promise.”

“And don’t you promise,” Alyla pulled back, a scowl on her face as her eyes moved over his wounded form. “Look at you! You’re hurt!”

“Mom, please,” Marks groaned as she started fussed over his bandaged arm. “Nothing happened.”

“Nothing happened? Marcus Kene-Calrissian, you are missing a piece of your cheek,” she stroked a thumb over the clotted wound.

Marks couldn’t help but think that Rose Tico hadn’t minded.

“And look at your arm. This bandage needs to be changed.” The good – but extremely weird – part of being corporeal was that Alyla was able to start unwrapping her son’s bandages. “Oh Darling, look at this. This is going to scar really badly. Why wouldn’t you take care of yourself?

“Alright, fine,” Marks just sighed in defeat and grabbed the first aid kit stashed under his bunk – standard issue supplies for each bed set. “But honestly, are you of all people going to chastise me for having scars? I think your skin is just one big scar.”

“Okay, cut that out. While we had our moments, neither I nor your father are particularly sassy, so I don’t know where you got that attitude.”

“Gift from Uncle Gavyn?” Marks grinned.
“Well, wipe that smirk off your face before I send you to meet him.”

“No, you won’t. Come on, Mom, you’re not exactly intimidating. Getting threatened by you is like getting threatened by a chipmunk. I’m sure they could mess you up something fierce, but you don’t exactly feel terror on first glance.”

The glare she gave him showed Marks exactly how Alyla Kene had managed to keep Lando Calrissian in line for nearly ten years.

“Sorry, Mom,” Marks dropped his head.

“Apology accepted,” Alyla said. “Now hold still as I change your bandages.”

“So, we’re going to sit here in awkward silence then?”

“Of course not. You could tell me all about your trip to Nixrye.”

Marks shifted awkwardly as he took a seat on the bed next to her, “Oh, I don’t think that’s interesting. Why don’t you tell me what you were up to? Solo was annoyed that you weren’t around. Think he really needed you too. He’s going through some very emotional stuff.”

Alyla narrowed her eyes, “You have that look on your face that you’re hiding something from me.”

“I know, I got that look from you, and it’s on your face right now. Spill it, Mom. Where were you?” Marks paused. “Oh God, you were with Skywalker weren’t you? Mom, I told you to stop going to him. It’s too dangerous. Solo might find out where he is and go after him. No one knows where Ahch-to is, and it needs to stay that way.”

“Marcus, I know it does. Now you leave that to me.”

“What are you hiding from me, Mom? Did something happen with Skywalker?”

Alyla let out a puff of air, “Alright, I’ll confess. I… I told him about you.”

Marks’ eyes bugged out, “What?”

“I told him about you. You, how you came to be, that Lando is your father.”

“Why would you do that?”

“To protect you. To ensure that if you get into a bad situation, you can call for help.”

“Call for help?”

“Luke will protect you. If you need help, you can go to him and he will keep you safe.”

Marks took a deep breath as she knotted the new bandage, “Mom, listen-”

“I don’t need to listen!” Alyla snapped. “I know what you’re going to say. You want to bring the First Order down from the inside. I know it, and I understand. I respect that you’re a grown man capable of making that choice… but is it so much for me to want you to be safe? To be with people who will care for you and protect you. To be home?”

“I don’t have a home!” Marks snapped. “Not one beyond this bunk.”

Alyla’s eyes softened, and with a weak smile on her face, she clasped her son’s hand.
“You have a home,” she said gently. “Your home is with your father… I know what it’s like to grow up the way you did. Danger, just property to be owned… I don’t want that for you. I want you to have a home and family… Like the one we should have given you.”

Marks fought back his tears, “It’s not your fault. You didn’t know I even existed.”

“But I did. For years I dreamt of you, not knowing the visions were real. I dreamt of a little boy who looked half like me, half like Lando, but had my brother’s bulk, and Fayola Calrissian’s cheekbones.”

He couldn’t help his smile as he thought of Rose again. His smile made his mother’s grow stronger.

Alyla stroked said cheekbone, “I wonder if she’s still around. She would be so happy to finally have a grandson.”

“Did she like you?” Marks had never really asked about his grandmother.

“Oh, she loved me,” Alyla chuckled. “Told me that if Lando was going to finally settle down with a woman, he certainly picked the best of the best.”

“The Galaxy’s most beautiful woman and a Jedi to boot,” Marks quoted a passage from Lando Calrissian and the Death of the Morning Glory. The book hadn’t gone too far into Fayola Calrissian’s relationship with Alyla, but Fayola did make her cameos here and there in the series.

Alyla shook her head, “I wish people would stop calling me that. I’m not the Galaxy’s most beautiful woman, I’m not Goddesslike… I just… I don’t want to be defined by my looks. I was punished enough in life for having them. If I could do life over again, I would beg the Force to make me less beautiful. Maybe I would then have less pain.”

Marks cupped her cheek, “Your beauty has never truly been on the outside. It’s the beauty within, radiating out of you – your kindness, courage, forgiveness, optimism, and endlessly loving heart – that shows to the world and makes you so beautiful. I would never want you to trade away that amazing gift.”

“Alright, settle down, you charmer,” Alyla laughed and swatted his hand away. “Man, you are really your father’s son when you want to be.”

“Maybe a little,” Marks smirked, thinking about his departure with Rose.

A smile crept across Alyla’s face, “What’s with the look?”

“Look?” Marks played dumb. “What look? I don’t have a look.”

“Yes, you do, and it’s the same look of your father’s I know all too well.”

His face fell as he suddenly remembered seeing Lando Calrissian in the casino.

Alyla caught the shift in an instant, “What’s wrong?”

“Nothing.” Marks grabbed his satchel, “Look, I’ve got to unpack.”

Marks hated the silence that ensued. There’s was little more in life he hated than when his mother just sat there silently, her face pleasant and emotionless as she waited for him to crack and confess. The stubbornness of his Calrissian blood burned him as he roughly dumped his satchel on his bed and shoved the contents into the proper spots.
All the bunks had a small shelf at and head of the bed, and it wasn’t unusual to see some propaganda or Resistance wanted posters plastered on a soldier’s wall space. While soldiers like Finn kept their room barren of personal touch, Marks probably had the most extensive collection. Sure, not to the point he would get in trouble, but it did tend to raise an eyebrow or two.

On his wall was Lando Calrissian’s wanted poster, and next to it was the former poster for Alyla Kene that was now headed with the bright red letters TARGET ELIMINATED. When questioned on the posters, Marks would tell people that Calrissian was a target often forgotten and he would ensure everyone in his corridor knew the scoundrel’s face. When asked about Alyla, he would simply claim it was to gloat about the destruction of the New Jedi Order and praise Kylo Ren for his first kill.

Of course, Kylo Ren and Captain Phasma would always glower at it when they visited his bunk. It annoyed the hell out of Kylo, but he couldn’t get Marks to take them down without causing the kind of scene and questions he didn’t want Stormtroopers asking.

Didn’t stop Kylo from threatening to tear it down whenever he got mad at Marks.

On his shelf were twenty-seven Sabacc decks, all different variants of the game he was teaching himself. Tone used to play the games with him, but now… Now he would need to find another partner.

He also had a HoloPlayer to view propaganda HoloVids and HoloNovels at his leisure. Of course, they were really for what he kept stashed in his pillowcase: a set of headphones and the eight contraband HoloNovels. Marks owned copies of Lando Calrissian and the Death of the Morning Glory and Lando Calrissian and the Heart of a Jedi. Marks also owed the six HoloNovels of the second series Lando Calrissian wrote: the Morning Glory series.

After the release of Lando Calrissian and the Heart of a Jedi, Lando’s fans had fallen in love with Alyla Kene and demanded more stories about the two. While the subsequent Calrissian Chronicles had many stories about Alyla, the fans wanted more. They wanted a happier story for Lando and Alyla, unaware that the bittersweet story would one day turn into a tragedy.

They discussed it for years, and eventually Alyla agreed to let Lando write an alternate history story where instead of Alyla and Gavyn getting sent to the Fighting Pits, they were groomed to be married off as a concubine and second husband. Lando, running a con job, accidentally found himself in a position where he was given eighteen-year-old Alyla as a bride. They made an agreement that Lando would free Alyla from slavery if she helped him finish the job, he signed the paperwork, they got a ship, and adventure ensued. They fell in love over the course of the story, and when the job was over, Alyla agreed to stay with Lando and have more adventures.

Alyla Kene and the Bride Price Gambit was universally adored… except by Gavyn who wasn’t thrilled that his fictional counterpart got sold off into marriage in the beginning of the story, and the novel ended with merely the promise that Lando and Alyla were going to go find Gavyn as their next adventure. A year later, Lando released Alyla Kene and the Quest for the Lost Twin, where they found Gavyn, who had been married off to Zena, and… well long story short, the book ended with Zena and Gavyn in love and going off to join the Rebellion while Alyla remained with Lando.

The series was going well, the third book Alyla Kene and the Toydarian Assassin topped the bestseller’s list for eight months straight, even beating the Calrissian Chronicles installment, Lando Calrissian and the Phantoms of Dread.

And then Alyla died, and Lando cancelled the series.
For years, Lando told fans that he would not write another Morning Glory book, but still they pleaded. It was Leia who ended up suggesting the plot of the next book: Alyla Kene and the Strength of the Force. The story was a retelling of the betrayal on Cloud City, but with Alyla in conflict with her (then in the series) husband, which was only made worse when Luke Skywalker arrived.

In the series, Luke had already begun assembling a team of students having met up with Gavyn and Zena, and then collecting Reine and Obik. He brought his team (called Anakin Squadron, also the name of the next book) to Cloud City with them and it became and interesting and epic battle.

Once more the book was well received, and Lando started to write the Morning Glory series ago. But anyone who knew Lando could hear how painful the story was. Over the next four books, he rewrote history to include Alyla in his life after he became a good man.

Alyla Kene and the Anakin Squadron was about Lando’s struggle to earn the respect of the Rebellion after what he had done to Han, but with a supportive wife by his side.

Alyla Kene and the Hutt Palace Plot was a sexy and fun tale of he and Alyla going undercover as a palace guard and dancer for Jabba, while Lando tried to protect Alyla from being thrown in the Rancor pit, and Alyla protecting Lando from being thrown in the Sarlaac pit.

Alyla Kene and the Shadow of the Death Star was about Alyla joining the team on Endor while Gavyn was one of the team members on the Millennium Falcon during the aerial battle. The real Alyla’s heart broke when Marks told her that the story ended with book Alyla pregnant with a son and looking forward to the peaceful future with book Lando.

Lando had refused to write any further Morning Glory novels after that. When asked, he would simply say “I want book Alyla and Lando to get the happy ending they deserve, but real Alyla and I were denied. If I write anymore, I’m going to start clinging too much on a son and marriage I will never had.”

But the part that hurt Alyla the most was the knowledge that the final book ended with Lando and Alyla telling each other I love you.

Words they didn’t get to exchange in real life.

Alyla sighed as she saw the picture of the morning glory taped to the wall of Mark’s shelf. It was a cut out of the cover of Lando Calrissian and the Death of the Morning Glory.

“I miss you,” Alyla whispered to the poster of the man she loved.

Marks paused as he was about to set the gloves of Rose Tico on his shelf. He looked down at the gloves and wondered if he truly was attracted to Rose… or did he just want what his parents’ had?

“Mom?” Marks set the gloves down. “I… I have to tell you something.”

“What’s that?” Alyla replied.

He sighed, “Mom, on Nixrye we teamed up with the Resistance for a short while, and… and there were certain people there.”

Alyla watched him carefully, “What kind of people?”

“…I met Han Solo and Chewbacca.”

She winced.
“Mom, I’m sorry—”

“You didn’t tell them,” Alyla’s voice was cold. She didn’t want to be angry at him, but she couldn’t help it. “They were there, your father’s friends, and you didn’t tell them who you were.”

“I couldn’t.”

“Reekshit! Marcus, do you not want to get out of here? Is revenge really that important to you? Don’t you understand what that leads to?”

“I know what it leads to! Of course, I want to get out of here someday. Yes, I wanted to go with them, but I couldn’t!”

“And why not?”

“Because I was scared!” Marks yelled. “I was scared, alright?”

Alyla hated herself when he broke down in tears. Anger dissipating in an instant Alyla pulled her son into her arms and held him as he wept.

“Shh, it’s okay, My Love,” she whispered. “It’s alright.”

“No, it isn’t,” Marks cried into her neck. “I was a coward.”

“You’re no coward.”

“But I am.” He pulled back, struggling to catch his breath, “Mom, I saw him. I saw Dad.”

Alyla gasped, “You what?”

“He wasn’t part of the rescue time with Solo and Chewbacca… he was in the casino a few days before that. I saw him… he looks good.”

She laughed a little.

Marks took a deep breath, “I… I stood there, Mom. For two hours, I stood there, watching him, muttering under my breath Hello, Lando Calrissian. My name is Marcus Kene, and I’m your son. Please… will you help me? Two hours I said that to myself, and I couldn’t find the strength to walk over there and tell him.”

Alyla stroked his cheek, “And why do you think you couldn’t bring yourself to approach him?”

“Because I was scared.”

“Of what?”

Marks closed his eyes, picturing that scene of Lando Calrissian – his father – sitting at that Sabacc table, “Because… he would never believe it.”

Alyla said nothing.

“I’m right, aren’t I?” Mark looked at her. “I could walk right up to him, say those words, give him what he wants most in the Galaxy… and he wouldn’t believe me. Would he?”

“No,” Alyla whispered. “No… Lando wouldn’t believe it. Unless he hears it from someone he would never believe… Unless he had proof, he’ll never believe.”
“And he would hate me for claiming such a falsehood.”

“I wish I could say he wouldn’t.”

“I don’t want him to hate me, Mom.”

“Trust in the Force, my Love. We’ll find a way.”

Marks wiped away his tears and glanced back at the gloves, “What if I did have a way? What if I found a way to get proof?”

Alyla frowned, “Like what?”

“I don’t want to say just yet.”

“Marcus-”

“Please, Mom,” Marks interrupted. “Just… let me see if it works.”

Alyla sighed, “Alright, but I’m working you, I only put up with those shenanigans with your father because I loved him. I didn’t love him because he pulled schemes like no doubt the one in your head, it was definitely in spite of it. Understand?”

“Understood.”

“Now, tell me, when you saw your father… was there anyone hanging off his arm?”

Marks laughed, “Nothing but his usual casual flirting, I swear. Considering the success of the Morning Glory series, I don’t think he could take up with anyone other than you unless he was prepared to go into hiding. You have some rabid fans.”

“Good,” Alyla smirked. “Look, I love your father and want him to be happy, so if that means moving on, fine. But at the end of the day – and you’ll understand this when you’re older – I truly don’t want him kissing anyone but me.”

Marks mind immediately flashed to the thought of Rose Tico kissing him. It made him smile a somewhat dopey grin.

Then he thought of Rose kissing some other man, and his smile fell.

Of course, Marks didn’t know a whole heck of a lot of other people, so when he pictured Rose kissing another man, the only image he could conjure was Rose kissing Finn.

Even Finn looked confused after the kiss.

Scowling, Marks wanted that happier thought again and he switched back to the image of him kissing Rose, not Finn doing it.

That dopey grin stretched back across his face.

“There’s that grin again,” Alyla smiled. “What’s that about?”

“Mom-”

“Don’t you lie to me; I know what I see.”
He sighed, “It’s just… I think I already know what you mean.”

“Oh?” Alyla looked surprised and way too interested for Marks’ liking. Why did mother always want to know about their sons’ love lives?

“I…” he rubbed the back of his neck. “I think I met someone.”

“A resort patron?”

“Actually… a member of the Resistance.

“Oh my.”

“Yeah, I’ve got my very own Blood in History situation,” Marks liked harkening back to his father’s books for shorthand on certain situations.

“Alright, but so help me, don’t you dare bluff your way into a sperm sample.”

“Well, I mean, I exist because of that, so would you really be that m-”

“Marcus!” Alyla snapped.

“Alright,” Marks held up his hands. “No sperm samples. Though I don’t think that’s going to be an issue.”

“Yeah, I would have to have a chat with Leia – assuming she’ll believe for once I’m not just a vision – if that scenario happens. Now tell me everything about this girl who’s got you grinning like that.”

And so he did; Marks told her everything about Rose Tico. How feisty she was. How stubborn she was. How courageous. How… she kept obsessing over his cheekbones.

Even better was the look on his mother’s face as he told her about the girl who managed to set his world on fire but in a very good way. A lovelorn grin stretched across Alyla’s face, a beautiful smile she only ever got when she was thinking of Lando Calrissian. She loved the expression on her son’s face, it bringing back so many happy memories to her.

“She must be some girl,” Alyla said. “Your father used to get that same look on his face when he was with me.”

“Rose Tico,” Marks smiled at the work gloves in his shelf. “I think that girl’s going to get me in a lot of trouble.”

“My Love,” Alyla stroked his cheek, “you are the son of a Kene and a Calrissian. No matter what way the First Order biologically engineered you… you were born to be in trouble.”

---

The Tale of the Taming of Valra

As traditionally told in three parts on each night of the Solstice Festival, Valrians recount the tale of how six good spirits met, married, and made Gods of themselves.

SECOND NIGHT

Ethys and Imar took Koena home with them to the cabin. Once all their wounds had been treated,
Ethys started to prepare their meal, and Imar and Koena took a walk outside together. They spoke for hours on end, long enough for their suppers to get cold, and long enough that Ethys had to track them down and bring them home for bed.

Imar kissed Koena’s hand sweetly and wished her pleasant dreams as Ethys showed her to Itar’s room for the night. Imar dreamed of Koena in his bed until midnight when he was awoken by Koena.

They watched each other for a minute, no words leaving their lips. Then Koena stripped off her nightgown, crawled in Imar’s bed, and they made love.

The next week was pure fantasy, Imar and Koena spending their days getting to know each other and their nights making love. They told each other of their adventures, their siblings, and the state of the world. Seven days flew by like it was nothing, then fourteen, twenty-one, soon enough a whole month had passed.

On their thirty-first day together, Imar and Ethys found Koena crying. She knew it was time to go home to her brother. Koena begged Imar and Ethys to come North with her, but both refused. Ethys had to stay for her own brother – who was due to return home any day – and Imar needed to stay to continue his cause.

Shedding many tears, Koena made vows of love and friendship to Imar and Ethys. She swore she would return to them someday. Koena promised Imar her heart and her hand should he ever want them.

It was three days after their parting that Imar realized Koena’s love was more important to him than the fight for freedom. He bid Ethys farewell and went North to find Koena. When he reached the desert, he braced himself and pushed forward.

Imar would find his bride.

Koena too changed her mind: she was old enough to leave her brother for a husband. On the fifth day since their parting, Koena turned South to return to Imar. She did her best to send word North to her brother of her safety, relaying on a chain of good spirits to pass the story North until it reached Djun. Worse came to worse, she would return to Djun with Imar once they were reunited.

But Koena was not familiar with that part of the world and soon got lost. Journeying further and further South, she found herself in the middle of nowhere in the mountains of evil.

Djun however, was not North; he had searched far for his sister and came to hear of the destruction of the Imps. He tracked down the home of Ethys and Itar, bringing the alone Ethys gifts of appreciation and honour for protecting his sister.

Ethys brought Djun into her home and told him everything. She told him of Koena’s strength and wisdom. She told him of Imar’s virtues and how good a man he was Koena. Though Djun had never laid an eye on Imar, by the time the sun set, he had given his blessing to the love of Imar and Koena.

And by the time the moon rose, he had fallen in love with Ethys.

They stayed in the cabin for a week. They talked and laughed and spent the days getting to know each other, falling head first into deepest, truest love. On that final night they made a vow to marry and made passionate love.

The next morning, they were visited by a good spirit who was a friend of Ethys. They were surprised to find the spirit wanting Ethys to pass a message North to Djun. They heard of what had happened to Koena, and when they heard she had found her way into the mountains they decided to go rescue her.

A week later, Itar returned to the cabin and was surprised to find it empty. Things became worse when he found a note written by Ethys that simply said “I have gone south with my friend and the man that I love. I will return, Brother, with a husband by my side.”

Poor Itar had no knowledge of Koena and Djun, so assumed Imar had betrayed him and stolen his sister away South to elope. At first, he thought the man she loved and the friend were one in the same.

And then Itar got a Southern visitor: Ipgyn had finally decided to join her brother’s fight and tracked him to the cabin.

The explanation that Ipgyn was Imar’s sister and a series of misunderstandings later, Itar believed Ipgyn had worked with Imar to steal away Ethys.

Falling into a rage, Itar attacked Ipgyn. He expected a simple fight, but Ipgyn wasn’t about to give him one. Angered by accusations against her brother, Ipgyn fought to protect his honour. Itar and Ipgyn fought for a day and a night until Ipgyn stood as the victor.

In the years that followed, Itar always maintained the only reason he lost was that he had been too tired from his mission. Never one to give up, every year on the anniversary of their duel, when Itar started into his complaining, Ipgyn would challenge him to a rematch. Some years Itar would win, but most times Ipgyn will stand victorious.

After their first duel, Itar and Ipgyn sat down to a meal and talked things out. Itar came to see his error in judgement over Imar’s character and heard stories of the horrors of the mountains. They spent the night getting to know each other as thoroughly as Koena & Imar and Djun & Ethys.

Itar and Ipgyn did not fall in love instantly.

When Rey woke up the next morning, she was very excited to get right back into participating in the customs of her mother’s people and the Solstice Festival.

When she and Teng heard what the day’s events involved, they were less excited.

“Fasting?” Rey stared at Imogen and Levi like they were crazy.

Teng couldn’t wrap his head around it either, “You mean, we intentionally starve ourselves?”

“Oh no, not us,” Levi replied. “Just the women.”

“Well, that sounds mildly sexist,” Teng muttered.

Imogen narrowed her eyes, “It’s to honour Koena’s plight as she wandered the dangerous Southern Mountains. In her second year of wandering, Koena did not have a bite of food or a drop of water. On Valra, women honour the Goddess by not partaking in either on the Second Day of the Solstice Festival.”

Levi cut in, “Except we do let the women in Synael drink water because… you know, desert.”

“Araeya,” Imogen placed a hand on Rey’s shoulder, giving her a look Rey suspected Poe Dameron might get from Holdo. “It’s not that big a deal. You may starve for one day, but in doing so you give the Gods honour.”

The teens just stared at Imogen.

“You know we live on Jakku, right?” Rey asked. “We can starve any day of the week.”

Imogen gave a very thin smile, “Araeya… Valrians take the custom of fasting extremely seriously. If you want to be a Valrian, you must go some days without nourishment. To honour Koena, you must understand what it is to starve.”

Rey’s eyes narrowed, “Trust me, I know the feeling quite well.”

Imogen sighed, “I don’t want to force you into anything, but I ask you to reconsider. How about we look at it this way? You want to experience the Valrian culture to understand, grow closer to, and honour your mother. Giving up your food is one of the deepest acts of love and honour you can give another person. Do you think your mother would have chosen to starve to honour someone she loves?”

A scene from the past tugged at Rey’s mind.

“Araeya… Valrians take the custom of fasting extremely seriously. If you want to be a Valrian, you must go some days without nourishment. To honour Koena, you must understand what it is to starve.”

Rey closed her eyes briefly trying to capture the image to that fleeting memory. She knew the words; they always came to her when she argued with Dad, Quom, or Aletha about them passing part of their food to her. The words were forever burned into her memory… but the face of her mother was nothing more than blurry shapes in the dark.

And the exact sound of her voice was completely gone.

“Yes, she would… I know she would.” Slowly Rey’s eyes fluttered open. She hated the look of pity Imogen had on her face as Rey struggled not to let the tears fall. “Alright, I’ll fast today, but I won’t do it to honour Koena… I’m doing it to honour my Mom.”

Imogen just smiled and nodded.
“I’ll do it too,” Teng offered.

Rey felt like she could breathe when Teng hooked his arm around her. She wanted to snuggle into his embrace and cry, but she refused to do it in front of these strangers.

“No, that’s alright,” Levi said. “The men don’t fast. In fact, it’s an affront to Ipgyn – the Goddess of Women – for a man to co-opt a ceremony meant for only women. Just as much as it would be an affront to Itar – God of Men – for women to participate in the men’s tradition for today.”

Rey smiled and clasped Teng’s hand, “Thank you for offering to join me in my suffering.”

“There’s never any suffering for me when you’re at my side.” he kissed the top of her head.

“Provided there’s no X-Wings involved.”

She laughed.

“So, if women fast on the Second Night of the Solstice Festival,” Teng asked, “what do the men do?”

Levi answered casually, “We shave our heads completely bald.”

Rey did not know eyes could physically get that wide, but there Teng’s went. She had to stifle a giggle as she stared at Teng’s long black locks and the horror struck across an unnaturally pale face.

“Yeah… I don’t have a Valrian mom to honour,” Teng said. “That’s not happening.”

Somehow, despite all the female influences in his life – all the Leias, Alylas, Reines, Tylas, Reys, Felicitys, Zenas, and so on – Ben Solo never really got a handle on dealing with women.

— Lando Calrissian and the Death of the Morning Glory, Chapter III

Tara Ren did not remember when she fell asleep, but she suspected Cern had been hanging out with Captain Electra. Based on the reports Tara had read about Diego Nalto’s fiancée and Electra’s sister, apparently the entire Anthea family was talented at drugging people without their knowledge.

What really pissed off Tara when she woke was Kylo Ren crouched down in front of her and wearing his fucking mask as he watched her like an animal in a zoo. She could sense his hatred simmering in the Force, but there was also fear below the surface.

Maybe he was wearing the mask for the same reason Tara had been moved against the wall and placed in two hand shackles halfway through the trip back to Base. She had hit her limit with Nines and Zeros guarding her, and despite being handcuffed to the bed, she managed to use the Force, her wits, and mostly her raw strength to beat the shit out of the pair. By the time Kylo, Wiln, and Cern rushed into the room to get her under control, she had nearly beaten Nines’ head in. Tearing Tara off Nines had earned Kylo a nice kick to the face when her cleat boots and a nasty gash to the face.

In the corner of her eye, Tara could still see the puddle of blood Kylo left when he hit the floor.

“Comfortable?” Kylo asked, his voice modulated through the mask.
“Really?” Tara had no patience for Kylo’s nonsense. “You’re going to pull the monster in a mask gambit on me? I’ve seen you naked; the Vader 2.0 mask isn’t going to intimidate me. Now, take that fucking thing off!”

Kylo glowered, but obeyed, slamming his helmet down on the floor with a loud thud.

“So, I assume we’re back?” Tara asked dryly, her voice too casual to acknowledge her handcuffs.

“For a little under an hour,” Kylo answered.

“Well, I don’t sense anyone else on Dark Destiny. Where is everyone?”

“At their duties.”

“And Sasa?”

His eyes darkened, “She’s with Max. He’s checking out her condition and… helping her clean up.”

Tara raised an eyebrow, “You’re leaving her with a medical droid that Cern has openly admitted to tampering with?”

“I made Cern fix the changes he made on Max.”

“I still wouldn’t trust it. Heck, I think at this point, considering the multiple cases tampering and what he’s been programed to call you, it might be time to wipe, dismantle, and replace Max.”

“You’re in no position to be dictating what I should do,” Kylo snapped. “But if you’re so worried about Cern, he’ll be returning shortly to keep an eye on you until the Supreme Leader returns my request to speak about Nixrye. You can interrogate him then.”

“And why is it that Cern is allowed to walk free and not I?”

“Because the crimes that he has committed are minor, and he has the means of making them up to me.”

Tara scoffed, “So because I’m not the head of a vast network of underhanded, turncoat spies and scoundrels-”

“Well, you could ask your Crimson Dawn friends for help.” Kylo smirked, “Or are you out of favors?”

“I think I could rally the troops a few more times,” she had to hold back a smile as she thought of what her father would do if he heard she was on death row. You did not fuck with Qi’ra and Laertes Ores’ daughter and get away with it.

Kylo’s eyes narrowed, “So that’s it, is it? You have no remorse? No guilt? No second thoughts?”

“I’m having second thoughts on admitting to my crimes.”

“For the love of- Because of you, two Knights of Ren will be dead!”

“And it should be three,” Tara’s eyes burned.

He stared at her for a moment, eyes slightly wide, “You’re really threatened by her.”

“I’m not threatened by her.”
“You’re threatened by her.”

“I’m not threatened!” Tara exclaimed. “God, you really think I’m so out of control that I’m threatened by that airheaded whore?”

“Don’t call her that!” Kylo growled.

“But she is one!” Tara screamed. “That is her entire purpose! She’s not here to fight the Resistance or New Republic, she not here to work with the spy network or come up with ingenious plans or teach the Stormtroopers or even god damn cook meals! Sasa is simply here is fuck you, wear pretty dresses, and calm you down from your temper tantrums! She is literally nothing more than an airheaded whore, and the fact you have lost your fucking mind over her is a god damn embarrassment. Even Hux is laughing at you.”

“I am the second-in-command of the First Order. No one is laughing at me.”

“You think they’d do it to your face? Even the Stormtroopers are losing respect for you. This girl is destroying everything we’ve built over the last twelve years. I don’t give a shit who you fuck! My job – as you asked me to – is to keep your ass in line, and that is why I tried to have her killed. This emotional rebalancing is a load of Bantha crap! You need your anger, your aggression, your instability to be Kylo Ren. Going to cry in the arms of your bedmate is the action of Ben Solo, and Ben Solo is a coward and a weakling.”

Kylo scoffed, shaking his head, “I can’t believe you’ve let some girl get to you this much.”

“But that’s all she is: some girl. God, Kylo she isn’t worth your time! She isn’t powerful, she isn’t intelligent, she isn’t from some noble line or whatever shit Snoke puts in your head. Sasa Ren isn’t special!”

“She is to me!” Kylo roared.

Tara took a moment to stare at him. A disbelieving smile slowly spread across her face as she took and processed his words.

“Oh my god… you love her,” Tara said.

Kylo looked away.

But Tara just laugh, “Oh my god, you love her. You love her. You’ve fallen head over heels in love with Sasa Ren and you don’t want anyone else by your side.”

The toe of her boat smashed into Kylo’s face. As he fell back in pain, he regretted taking off his helmet.

“Come on!” Tara exclaimed. “Are we doing this? Are we really doing this again? Are you actually going to put me through this shit again?”

Kylo struggled to get himself back upright, “I don’t know what you’re talking about.”

He ducked to the side and narrowly missed another kick to the face.

“Like hell you don’t!” Tara snapped. “You really think I’m threatened by another one of your bimbos when I’ve had to put up with this same song and dance for almost ten years now? God, Kylo, it’s the same shit every time!”
“This time is different!” Kylo objected. “Sasa is-”

“Different?” Tara shot. “Unlike any girl that came before? The one you want to be the mother of your child? The love of your life? I’ve heard it all before, Ben. Frankly, I’m tired of it.”

Kylo narrowed his eyes, “Sasa is different. You want me to say it, fine I will. She’s the only one I want.”

“See, you tell yourself that but a few months from now, it won’t be like that.”

“You don’t know that.”

“I do know that, because it’s the exact thing that happened with Leda.”

Kylo flinched.

“Oh, you remember Leda Ren?” Tara taunted. “You remember what happened. You fell absolutely head over heels with her. You told me that you loved her and wanted no other. We even made an agreement; I would step aside but remain your right hand. Twenty-five months, and your heart belonged to her and her alone. She was your soulmate, your true love. Leda Ren was the one.”

Kylo slammed his eyes shut, remembering what happened next.

Tara smirked, “And then Irni came along. Oh, she was new, excited, exotic. You hopped into her bed the very same day. By the time three months had passed, you barely even glanced Leda. When she got herself killed in battle four months after that, you just huffed in annoyance… So much for true love.”

“I made a mistake.”

“You made many. Let’s think… Hali was the one for eighteen months, Eosi for twelve, poor Yulo got six, and man, you didn’t even give a shit about Irni two months after you pushed Leda aside for her.”

Kylo opened his eyes again. He couldn’t bear the flashes of memories of the women behind his eyelids.

“You see, Kylo, I’m not threatened by Sasa.” Tara leaned forward, a smile on her face. Though in chains, she was the one in complete control. “Because I know exactly how this story will end. In those new two shiny spots of the Knights of Ren, one of them – maybe both – will be filled by a woman. A woman who will turn your head and make you forget all about Sasa Ren, or as you will soon call her whatever the fuck the redhead was called. What I’m worried about is the destruction Sasa will cause until she is dethroned from your affections. I am sick and tired of cleaning up the pieces. Face the facts, you won’t last with this bitch. Stop trying to pretend you will.”

“How do you know that?” Kylo challenged. “How can you be so certain I’ll move on from her?”

“Because you have attention span of a gnat. You are a narcissist; you want all attention to be on you at all times. You want a woman who will stroke your ego as much as your cock.”

“Tara!” he snapped.

She smirked, “You see, Solo, once the girls hit their breaking point and stop putting up with your shit, then you lose interest in her. Why do you think I went after Tekka immediately after Sasa broke your nose for suggesting a threesome?”
Kylo was silent.

“And that proves my point right there,” Tara said. “For as much as you claim to want her and only her, you’ll never be faithful. Does she know?”

“Know what?”

“About all the threesomes we have?”

“Yes, she knows about those.”

“I’d bet not the exact number.”

He said nothing.

“What about the women we have the threesomes with?” Tara challenged. “Does Sasa know how you sometime then call for those women to see you in your room… without me? Does she know that you’re fucking more women than just her and I?”

“Stop it,” Kylo muttered.

“Does she know? Does she know that if a Blessed catches your eye, you’ll invite her back to your room for private lessons and fuck her? Does Sasa know that if you’re walking down the hallway and you see a pretty little communications tech, the two of you will sneak into a supply closet and fuck her until she screams your name? Does she know that every single time Sasa can’t come to your bed because she’s on her period, you’ll find another bedmate? That when she having panic attacks over not being pregnant, you’re fucking some other woman?”

“I said stop!” he grabbed her by the throat and slammed her against the wall.

They stood there, staring into each other’s eyes, panting as the Darkness and tension buzzed through them.

“No,” Tara chuckled. “She doesn’t know about them.”

Then she kissed him.

Kylo didn’t stop her.

His hands were on her neck, pulling her in, desperate for the sweet taste of her lips like a drug he couldn’t quit.

Kylo panted when Tara pulled back, a smirk plastered across her lips.

“That’s why I have no regrets,” Tara said. “Because we’ve been here before, we’ve done this so many times. You get obsessed with a girl, and then forget her for a pretty, new thing. And while those girls stop being a problem, sometimes through disinterest, sometimes through suspicious deaths—”

Kylo gritted his teeth.

“I’m the one who’s always right at your side,” Tara whispered, ghosting her lips over his. “Even when we fight, this is how it always ends. Usually we go scream and each other and kick each other’s ass in my private training room… but it always ends with your lips on mine, facing it the only way you know how to: fighting and fucking. And when you screw me on the floor of my training after every fight we have – never actually resolving any problems – you do both and avoid facing the truth. I am your second-in-command, Kylo. And you… you’re living a life that is the same five steps over and over again.

Kylo released her, forcing Tara to fall to the ground. He took a step back but she still smirked up at him.

"That's the difference between us, Kylo." Tara tugged at her shackles. "I know I'll escape my chains… But will you ever escape yours?"

---

Rey was so happy when dinner was finally served. As part of the Solstice Festival fasting, dinner was served late. They did it after all the men had ceremonially shaved their heads.

It turned out that Teng didn’t actually qualify to shave his head. Coming of age ceremonies (and ergo adulthood) happened when a Valrian was twenty. Teng was only nineteen, which was also why he had to grow facial hair. Adult men wore no facial hair and kept hair short as a sign a modesty. Teng refused to let his hair be any shorter than shoulder length.

Actually, now that Rey thought about it, his hair was probably longer than hers. At least Rey already followed the traditions of women's hair. When she graduated from buns to adulthood, Rey would have to keep her hair as long as possible.

Rey scowled as she appraised Una’s hair, which was down to her hips. Maybe Rey wouldn’t go this far.

“Please tell me there’s no more traditions to follow tonight,” Rey begged Gweneth as they ate. She glanced down the line where Teng was banished once more at the end due to his non-Valrian heritage. “I’m too tired from fixing the vaporators and hungry from the fasting to do anything else tonight.”

“Don’t worry,” Gweneth promised. “All we do tonight is hear the second night story and then do five Crekia toasts to five heroes of the pillars.”

“What do you mean heroes of the pillars?” Rey frowned.

“We tell stories of five people who defended the virtue of the Five Pillars,” Micah answered. “You know, prevent a murder, put out a fire, save a baby, reveal an adulterer, and catch a rapist. Good stories.”

Gweneth frowned, “Well… Some more than others.

After dinner, Rey patiently listened to the stories they told of the heroes. Micah was right, for the most part the stories were pretty good, entertaining even.

She did have to plaster on a smile when they retold the story of the Varian, Kaelan, who epitomized the pillar of protection against rape. It was a truly uncomfortable story, but Rey could understand why such a tale would be remembered. Kaelan was truly a great hero of rape victims.

But it was when they came to the last story that the night took an unexpected turn.

When Imogen announced the Valrian who epitomized the protection of the innocents, Rey choked on her drink.
“To the great hero of the innocents… Felicity Rhiaon.”

Rey coughed loudly. Luckily, no one paid her any mind except Micah, who patted her back to make sure she wasn’t choking.

“What did she just say?” Rey gasped.

“Oh, Felicity Rhiaon,” Gweneth said mildly. “Have you not heard of her?”

Why were they asking her that? Didn’t they realize it was her mother? Why would they tell a story about her mother? Was it because Rey was there?

Then Rey realized it: they wouldn’t know Felicity Rhiaon was her mother. Her mother’s religious name was Felicea, which is what Rey had told them. Considering how many Rhiaons were in the universe, why would they go Felicity is Felicea?

But why were they telling a story about her mother?

“We praise the brave woman that was Felicity Rhiaon,” Imogen said. “Though she married a Jedi, she put her child above all else.”

Rey swallowed hard.

Now, considering the story was being told by a random villager on Jakku, and stories tended to travel very slowly to Jakku, by the time Imogen told it, there were a few details changed.

Particularly the fact that Imogen claimed the whole trek through the desert and surrendering herself for her daughter had taken place on Tatooine.

Still, Rey listened to the story of her mother in stunned silence. The jig wasn’t up because Imogen didn’t know the name of Felicity Rhiaon’s daughter, choosing to call her Sabra, which meant to rest. Rey was thankful that Teng hadn’t said anything either, though he kept glancing at her to make sure she was okay.

Rey couldn’t do anything but listen. She knew parts of it wasn’t true – particularly the part where Rey apparently got buried – but she was captive. She vaguely knew the story of her mother’s death… but to get a clear picture of it?

It made Rey sick to her stomach.

“And even though that daughter was dead and buried, still Felicity did not give in,” Imogen told the story. “All she had left was the honour of her daughter’s memory. She would avenge her child by refusing to let the First Order think they had won. So for weeks Felicity endured her tortures. They cut her, burned her, drowned her, poisoned her, starved her, kicked her, beat her, split her skin open, tore her nails from their beds, shoved electrified rods into her neck.”

Rey had to summon all her strength not to breakdown crying. She knew not all of it was real, but she had no idea what were lies and what was truth.

“They shoved bamboo wedges under her fingernails,” Imogen continued, “they tore her hair out in a mockery of Valrian funeral rites, they whipped her, they lit her clothing on fire while she still wore them, and some say they even raped her.”

That last part was not true, and honestly pissed off certain members of the Skywalker family when it came to light.
“Still,” Imogen said, “no matter what they did to her, Felicity Rhiaon would not break. It was only when faced with a nephew – a practitioner of dark magic, truly an evil spirit allowed the grow its form form – used his dark arts to tear the answer from her tongue.”

Rey’s teary eyes slammed shut.

“And when she admitted the truth, she fell to tears. They dropped her to the ground and Felicity laid sobbing on the floor, mourning her daughter and the villainous acts done to her. But that villainy was not over. Her nephew tied her up, held her down, and pointed a blaster to her head. But Felicity would not go quietly, and when her nephew demanded her final words, Felicity just said _Now no one can hurt my daughter again._ And a second before he pulled the trigger, Felicity used her last ounce of strength to spit in her nephew’s face.”

That too was a lie… but God did Luke wish it was truth.

“Felicity Rhiaon was a hero,” Imogen told the group. “Though she did not save her child, Felicity Rhiaon fought with every ounce of strength so had to love and protect and honour her innocent child. She failed to keep her child alive in the flesh, but she succeeded in keeping her child alive in her heart.”

Rey closed her eyes. They were wrong; Felicity _had_ succeeded. Rey breathed because Felicity did not. That was a debt she could never repay.

Felicity Rhiaon had loved her daughter to her very last breath.

“To Felicity Rhiaon,” Imogen toasted.

“To Felicity Rhiaon!” the Valrian villagers cheered.

Rey just wanted to run away and cry, but it felt like a mockery of her mother’s bravery to do so.

Her mother had truly died so Rey could live… And she died because a Jedi loved her.

So as everyone drank, Rey slowly lifted her glass in a cheers and whispered, “Thank you, Mom. Thank you for letting me live.”

She had never really understood the danger being a Jedi meant. She knew that their life and home had been destroyed, but to hear the way they had targeted her mother… it was awful what the First Order did.

They had hated and tortured her mother because her father loved Felicity Rhiaon.

And Rey Erso loved Teng Malar. Teng Malar, whose concerned eyes were watching her every move. She struggled to take a breath, as she looked up and met his eyes.

Teng frowned when he saw Rey’s were full of fear.

“To Felicity Rhiaon,” Teng whispered and drank. He knew exactly what Rey was thinking, and though it terrified him, nothing would ever convince him to walk away from that girl.

She was worth the risk.

Rey struggled to swallow the Crekia as she watched Teng with worry.

If such an evil act had been done to her mother simply for loving her father… what would happen to Teng for loving her?
Kylo left Tara chained to the wall of the Dark Destiny another two hours after they talked. But the worst part about that was Cern standing next to her, guarding her, and laughing at her the whole time.

“I just can’t believe you actually admitted it,” Cern leaned casually against the wall next to her. He completely ignored the deadly glare she shot up at him. “I mean of all the missteps, that has to be your worse.”

That was the moment Tara hit her limit on his laughter. Exploiting the suspension of the chains, she leveraged her weight to pull herself up. Using her momentum, she swung and kicked his knees, sweeping his legs out from under him.

Tara smirked at Cern as he tried not to whimper in pain. There was a reason all her boots had cleats. She felt a sense of victory as she heard footsteps in the hall and smiled sweetly at the new arrival when the door slid open.

General Hux stopped in his tracks, needing a moment to take in the sight of the chained Tara and almost crippled Cern.

“Well, this wasn’t the sight I expected upon your return,” Hux said.

“Things didn’t exactly go to plan,” Tara simply answered.

“So I’ve heard.” Hux knew that Kylo’s precious Dark Destiny didn’t have any recording devices on it. “Even the Supreme Leader is furious.”

“Yeah, well, I’ll deal with Snoke later. My biggest concern is getting out of these chains. Are you here to take me to a new location?”

“No. Word is that Wiln will be along shortly to do so. You’ll be spending the next few nights in a cell.” Hux crouched down in front of her and smirked, “I just wanted to see this for myself. Tara Ores, all chained up.”

Tara narrowed her eyes, “Oh please. I bet you’re just doing this because you knew I put on a low cut top to entice Kylo in his grief over Sasa’s death, and this is the only shot you’ll ever get to stare at my cleavage.”

“I wasn’t doing that!” Hux objected.

Then he paused to think about what she said. He hesitated and dropped his eyes down to said cleavage.

The toe of her boot smashed into his face. As Hux recoiled in pain, he was very glad that part of her shoe did not have cleats.

“I’d rather be dead than fuck you, Hux,” Tara growled. “So don’t even try.”

Hux rubbed his jaw, awkwardly scrambling to his feet, “Tell me, Ores, exactly how does such a charming woman as you not have a dozen suitors waiting at your door?”

“Because Kylo would kill any who tried. Trust me, Hux. Kylo may have me chained at a wall right now, but if he saw you pull that stunt right now he’d swing a lightsaber through your neck.”
“I think someone’s just grumpy she’s not Kylo’s number one anymore,” Cern chortled. They had noticed when he got back to his feet.

“Oh, I may be in these chains right now,” Tara tugged at them, “but I’ll be back in Kylo’s bed soon enough.”

Hux lifted an eyebrow, “You truly have that much confidence in your ability to escape the wraths of Ren and the Supreme Leader?”

“I think you both underestimate how much a hold I have over both of them,” Tara answered. “We’ve been down this road before. Kylo’s favors don’t last forever. Sasa will be old news be the year’s end.”

“Funny,” Cern crossed his arms. “Isn’t that what you said last you?”

“I’m playing the long game.”

“Too long.” Cern said, “Frankly, the both of you have become pathetic.”

Hux and Tara glowered at him.

“I would be careful what you say, Ren,” Hux warned.

“Or what? You’ll fight me?” Cern scoffed. “I possess a lightsaber and have had a doctor officially certify I am a psychopath. Who do you think is going to win?”

Tara blinked, “Wait, did I doctor actually certify you?”

“Well, I killed him after he did it – apparently being diagnosed a psychopath get you blacklisted from flying First Order ships and I couldn’t let that happen – so I don’t have the actual certificate.”

Sometimes Hux wondered if he had chosen his allies well.

“Then how is it that Tara is the one here in chains, and not you?” Hux asked.

“Because I’m not as stupid as Princess Crimson Dawn,” Cern smirked.

She kicked him in the leg, “Don’t call me that!”

“Whatever you say, Sweetie,” Cern replied. “You’re the idiot here, not me. You know, if you have just stayed put, not gone to Nixyre, you might have gotten away with this. Hell, if you hadn’t convinced Berd and Doxl to try to kill Sasa, just made sure your mother’s people did it, then you absolutely would have. No blaming us, just Imperial Loyalists or Crimson Dawn. But no… you had to be theatrical. You had to make sure that Kylo would fall right into your arms.”

Tara said quickly, “It was a mistake.”

“A mistake beneath your making!” Cern snapped. “Face it, Tara, this girl is getting under your skin in a way no other of Solo’s bedmates have. It’s been almost two years, why the hell haven’t you managed to murder the bitch yet? It didn’t take this long to get rid of Nera. To get rid of Dyna, Irni, or Yulo! What’s the problem? Do you want to fuck her?”

Hux laughed.

“You’re no better!” Cern turned his anger on Hux. “Seriously? Your idea was to seduce her. You thought she would actually turn again Snoke and all her training and risk death… to fuck you. Hux, I have had the misfortune of interrogating some of your bedmates because you keep getting tricked by spies. They all agree on one thing: you are a terrible lover.”

“That’s a lie!” Hux exclaimed, immediately looking over at Tara.

Tara just scowled, “Why are you even asking those girls that question?”

“I’m sorry, are you lecturing me on my methods?” Cern snapped. “Between the three of us, who here is in the best standing with Solo?”

“He’s pissed at you too,” Tara shot.

“Yeah, but he’s given me a chance to make it up to him,” Cern shot right back. “Doesn’t seem like he’s done the same for you, and Hux has never been in his good books.”

“I’ll be back in his graces soon enough.”

“You killed his kid!”

“Yes, I heard about that,” Hux scowled. “Was she really pregnant?”

“Yes,” Tara replied.

Hux looked between the two of them, “And… did you two really not know about it?”

“You think I wouldn’t have found a way to exploit it if I did?” Cern shot.

Tara said, “And I would have thrown a more destructive temper tantrum than the one Solo did when Captain Anthea framed him for gassing his own mother. Based on what I heard from that bug I planted on FN-2199, the Resistance still thinks Solo is responsible for the attack on Organa.”

“You’d think considering how much faith she has in her son,” Hux sneered, “that Organa would correct that notion.”

“I don’t know if you noticed, but not every parent and child have the greatest relationship. You didn’t exactly weep when Electra murdered your father with a belt in front of you.”

“I will not speak of that day!” Hux snapped. “Now we’re getting off topic. What are we going to do about Sasa? Her power over Kylo grows every day.”

Tara nodded, “Well, I think what we need to do—”

“No!” Cern snapped. “You’re done. You lost your chance. Both of you have.”

Tara glared at him, “You have no right to—”

“I have every right! You’re not the only one who gets screwed around. The softer and nicer that Kylo becomes because of the redhead, he turns more and more to Wiln for counsel. Sasa doesn’t just bring Tara down, she brings Wiln up, which threatens my position. So, I’m not going to step aside and continue to let the two of you screw over my future. No, you said that when you hit rock bottom, you would consult me. Well, you’re chained against a wall on Kylo’s ship and he wants to murder the fuck out of you. Welcome to rock bottom!”

Hux sighed and looked down at Tara, “We did say that we would try my way, then yours, and then Cern’s. Maybe it’s worth a shot?”
Tara grimaced, but took a deep breath and asked, “Alright, what’s your plan, Cern?”

A faint hiss of a door sliding open filled their ears, and their head turned as one toward the hallway. They could hear the footsteps of Wiln leading a few Stormtroopers to come escort Tara to her prison cell.

Cern smiled, “Something I should have done a long time ago.”

Chapter End Notes

Coming Up Next Chapter…

Ash and Blood

Poe confronts Kaydel about her PTSD. Rey learns alcohol and religious ceremonies are a bad combination. Kylo admits to Sasa that there’s one more detail about Felicity’s shooting that he didn’t tell Poe.

Tidbit I wanted to point out, Valra has two sets of names I pull influence from. Southern Valrians will typically have Irish/Gaelic/Celtic names such as Garvan, Brendan, Imogen, Una, and Alaric (yes, Alaric is Germanic, but you can find it having Irish roots as well.) Meanwhile the Northern Valrians have Hebrew names such as Dinah, Cadman, Levi, Kezia, Micah, and Araeya which is a play on the Hebrew name Ariya, which is a boy’s name because Felicity did not think that through, but hey she was suffering from Postpartum Depression, so what do you really want from her?

Also, if you’re interested in exactly how I picture Sasa, I’ve finally found the perfect facecast for her: Erin Chambers. Particularly the photo at the link imgur.com/gallery/QtLainD/ if you want to check that out. She’s my perfect Sasa except her eyes aren’t forest green.
Kylo holds Sasa while she cries, Poe holds Kaydel while she cries, and Teng holds Rey as she cries.

Oh, also Kylo Ren is a monster.

Hey guys, I’m sorry about the long time between updates. The fact is that this story has gotten so huge and frankly out of control that I needed a break. I needed to step back and work on something different for a while. Give myself a reality check and remember how to write reasonable length chapters.

I’ve mostly detoxed now, but there’s going to be a few changes.

First, no more promises how many chapters something will take. I’m not going to pitch a chapter number for when TFA will start. It will start when it starts. That’s the end of it. We are in the final act of the story the takes place before TFA, but that doesn’t mean it’s a short act. Over the next (probably at least) 30 chapters you will see exactly why it has taken so long. I don’t want to give anything away but there are a few huge things about to happen/be revealed that majorly affect how TFA plays out this time. There is something that drastically affects Rey and Finn. There’s a huge change of motivation for Kylo. And there is a plot twist that I have been teasing for literally years that will make you guys hate and love me. Just hang in there, I promise there are so amazing stories coming up.

Second, chapters will be a much lower wordcount. I know I’ve gotten dozens of reviews telling me they love the length of my chapters, but 30k chapters aren’t fair for anyone. I can’t write them and you can’t read them. I can’t do this anymore. I’m not sure how long they will be, but I’m aiming for a max of 16k. I know that’s cutting things in half, but it’s what I have to do. I will also be editing a whole lot more. I will be cutting out jokes, exposition, worldbuilding, anything that can be trimmed, will be. To make up for the cuts, I will have a story on AO3 called The Long Way to the Cutting Room Floor which will be devoted to cut scenes/lines/moments and probably a whole heck of a lot of flashbacks. I’ve already got quite a few cuts from this chapter.

Third, I make no promises, but as a way to reduce word length, I might resurrect and revamp my story Definitions of Home to not just be the story of Luke and Felicity. It will be the new home of any oneshots about this universe I get the inkling to write. I’ve actually almost completely finished the two-parter that has been on cliffhanger for years, so I will finish the story of Luke and Felicity in Zygerria. Whenever I get the temptation of say telling the story of how Evan and Paige became a couple, to there the story will go. Again, this is still only an idea that I’m not sure I’m going to follow through on, but let me know if you’re interested.

The fourth thing is probably one of the hardest decisions I have made concerning this
I love this in theory, but in reality, I hate it. The wordcount will scare off new readers. So, I have decided that when we do actually reach TFA, I’m going to split the story. I’ll tie things up a little bit here, but I’ll post a new story file that directly continues the story. For now I’m considering either the titles The Long Road Home, The Long Way Back, or simply The Long Way Home: Part Two.

When it gets to TLJ and TROS I’ll probably split the story again. But this is how I have to do it; I only hope you’ll follow me to wherever this story leads.

Oh, and I’ll stop trying to make everyone in the Galaxy related. In this interim I seriously considered making Imogen (the Village leader of the Valrian village on Jakku) the daughter of Felicity’s uncle Garvan, and I considered a convoluted plotline that would bring Gavin and Zena’s daughter, Miri back to life, simply because I wanted to write a scene with cousins Miri and Marks. Both plotlines are ridiculous and waste wordcount, so I need to stop doing things like that. From now on, not everyone in the Galaxy knows each other and/or are related.

…For the record, my choice of Sasa’s parents was made before this vow.

See the end of the chapter for more notes.

The Long Way Home

Chapter Fifty-Nine

Blood and Ash

When Kylo Ren was twenty years old, something strange happened. His room had been broken into. No one knew who did or how, simply that when Kylo returned to his quarters one day, they were trashed. All the security measures had been perfectly obscured – the camera feed cut, the door locks picked, the vocalized access codes guessed and simulated – leaving no possible leads on who did it. It was the work of an expert.

One would imagine that someone would break into the second-in-command of the First Order to steal secrets, harm Kylo, plant something in the room, or commit some drastic act of harm.

Instead, the burglar did only one thing. They screwed with his medical droid’s protocol function, changing what his droid addressed him as by default, and resetting the passcode to change defaults to a passcode that in ten years, Kylo still hadn’t figured out.

The worst part of that was that Max – Kylo’s medical droid – had too much important information in him and only him that the First Order couldn’t memory-wipe Max without there being some major issues as a result. They couldn’t even clone is his knowledge, take out the moniker, and reinstall the information. The burglar had deleted all previous backups so if they cloned and reinstalled the information, Max would still need the passcode to change what he called Kylo.

So, ten years later whenever Kylo Ren walked into a room, his Medical Droid, Max would always call out:

“Master Benjamin!”

Benjamin wasn’t even his name.

Kylo sighed as he paused in the doorway of Sasa’s room where his droid was attending her, “How is the examination going, Max?”

Sasa was sitting on her bed, still wearing that stained and bloodied green dress. There was something disconnected in her eyes as she stared blankly at the wall. Her arm was in a split, as to not aggravate her injured collarbone and she winced every time she had to move her broken leg.

“I’ve almost finished Master Benjamin,” Max answered, a quartet of thin metal appendages stuck out of the black floating ball whirring at top speed as he stitched up Sasa’s face. “Just a few more stitches and I should have Master Sasa all fixed up, concluding tonight’s treatments.”

“Tonight’s treatments?” Kylo scowled as he watched Max undo Kaydel Ko Connix’s stitching. Sasa’s wounds had been treated with basic sewing thread as Kaydel had regrettably used up all her medical stitches on her father. “Are you splitting up treatment?”

“Yes, Master,” Max replied. “I’m afraid I cannot allow Master Sasa to go through a round of bacta treatment just yet. Her body has not yet finished dealing with the miscarriage.”

“What does that have to do with anything?”

“The way bacta works is it looks for any biological defects and speeds up the healing process, sometimes helping produce the biological materials to fix those defects: white blood cells, muscular tissue, skin, hair, and so on. It will also attempt to destroy any foreign viruses or pathogens in the body. Bacta is not perfect: it can’t regenerate limbs, fix healed over scars, or recognize a miscarriage. When a woman having a miscarriage undergoes full submergence of bacta, the bacta thinks the child is a harmful virus and attempts to expel the child and fix the womb. Unfortunately, its version of fixing the womb means destroying not only the child, but any other egg it finds as the bacta will recognize the egg is where the child originated from – at least partly.”

Kylo stared at his droid, “Can you make your explanation a lot shorter and just get to the point?”

“If I put Master Sasa in a bacta tank while she’s suffering a miscarriage, the bacta will sterilize her.”

“Oh.” Kylo glanced at Sasa, who was still staring blankly at the wall. “Yeah, maybe don’t do that then.”

“Of course, Master Benjamin,” Max said. “By tomorrow afternoon Master Sasa’s body will have gotten to the point where it can handle bacta, and we’ll do a treatment in the tank for a few hours. For tonight however, she’ll have to cope with a broken leg and collarbone. I have set them properly, bandaged her up, and given her something for the pain. But we’ll have to leave them like that until tomorrow – there’s really no point in making casts for such a short length of time – and Master Sasa will just have to be careful about moving her limbs tonight.”
Kylo frowned as he watched Sasa staring at the wall, absolutely unresponsive to the discussion of her own treatments around her.

He sighed and crossed the room to crouch down in front of her. Sasa’s eyes didn’t even register that she knew he was in front of her. Kylo gently lifted her chin. Sasa blinked, snapping out of her reverie and realizing Kylo was there.

“Oh, Kylo, I-” her eyes rapidly fluttered.

“It’s okay,” he stroked her cheek lightly, and then lowered his hand. “I understand. What we’re going through right now is… a lot.”

Sasa looked down shyly, “Have you spoken to the Supreme Leader?”

Kylo’s throat suddenly felt very dry, “Uh… yeah. I did. He’s actually going to be coming onto the Finalizer in a few days to… deal with this situation.”

“What did he say about Tara?”

“…Nothing quite yet. She’s to be confined to her quarters until all the Knights of Ren go before him. Berd is to be kept in a prison cell, and Doxl is in the morgue to be preserved. But… the Supreme Leader is wise. He’ll deal with all of them in a few days. You just focus on getting better, okay?”

Something dark burned in Sasa’s eyes that Kylo had never seen in her before; but it was something he was not unfamiliar with in his own reflection.

“You made me a promise, Kylo,” Sasa’s voice was dry but intense. “You promised you would deal with Tara.”

“And I will,” he kissed the back of her hand. “I swear I will.”

Sasa didn’t say anything as he dropped her hand back down.

“What about the baby?” Sasa changed the topic. “What did the Supreme Leader say about my… my miscarriage?”

“He’s disappointed.”

Sasa hissed in pain as she dropped her head to shield the tears in her eyes. Disappointing the Supreme Leader was a death sentence to a Chosen.

Kylo lifted her chin again, “But not with you.”

Sasa’s exhalation of relief was so shaky, Kylo wasn’t sure it wasn’t a sob.

“He’s proud of you, Sasa,” Kylo told her, a small lift to the corner of his lips. “He said that he picked the right Chosen. You worried him for a bit there, but you managed to pull through. The Supreme Leader looks forward to the day you successfully bear my heir.”

Somehow Sasa couldn’t quite find her smile.

“Oh, there will be none of that any time soon,” Max interjected. “I’m afraid you won’t be able to engage in sexual intercourse with Master Sasa for some time yet.”

Sasa and Kylo’s head snapped to him in unison.
“What?” Kylo blurted out.

“Beg pardon?” Sasa echoed.

“It is unwise and potentially unsafe to become pregnant so quickly after a miscarriage,” Max said. “I’m afraid I’ll have to ask you, Master Benjamin not to touch Master Sasa for the next six weeks.”

Kylo and Sasa just stared at each other in a complete loss of what to say or do. Their entire relationship had been built on sex, and now they… couldn’t have it?

The hell were they going to do for the next six weeks?

“So…” Kylo cleared his throat. “When you say I can’t touch her, what exactly to you mean by touch?”

The droid didn’t have eyes, but Kylo was fairly certain Max was staring him down in a not unlike Leia Organa doesn’t have time nor patience for the antics of Solo men fashion.

“If you think the answer might be no,” Max said, “then the answer is no.”

Kylo tried not to let his face betray his inner sulking. He saw a lot of games of dejarik in his future.

When Max left, the pair was left in a long, lingering silence. Sasa was sat on the bed, head low and dress bloodied. Kylo stood perpendicular next to her, staring at the closed door. The room’s customary background music was nowhere to be found. If there had been a ticking clock in the room, it would have echoed like an earthquake.

“I…” Kylo started, but no other words came to him.

Sasa sighed and smoothed down her dress, wincing as she stroked her broken leg, “I should probably get out of this. Would you-”

He nodded, understanding and went into her wardrobe to find her something more comfortable to sleep in. Kylo picked out a nightgown that didn’t look too seductive – which was difficult considering the intention of her night attire – mindful that her broken leg would make pyjama bottoms painful to change into.

His thought about her injuries proved correct when he exited the wardrobe to find Sasa whimpering in pain as she tried to unlace her gown. As she stood, her leg cried out in pain, and as she reached backwards, her collarbone protested.

“It’s alright,” Kylo led her towards the dejarik table where he set down the fresh nightgown. “I’ve got it. You just lean your weight against the table, rest your leg, and I’ll take care of your ties.”

Sasa managed to find a bit of a smile as she whispered an almost inaudible, “Thank you.”

The silence kept its firm grip on the air as Sasa leaned against the table with Kylo unlacing her gown. Something awkward but not quite uncomfortable thrummed between the couple as his fingers untied her laces like it was their second nature. It was in fact second nature to him; how many times had he pulled her out of a beautiful dress like that? Fingers frantically flying across lace to get to delicate, seductive skin and the satisfaction of lust.

But lust wasn’t interesting to either of them in that moment, just… tenderness and intimacy. As the sides of seafoam green fabric were parted for pale but familiar skin, the only thought on Ben Solo’s mind was non-carnal comfort. A comfort he scarcely knew.
He didn’t need to look at Sasa’s face to see the tears rolling down her cheeks, and she didn’t need to reach into the Force to feel Ben’s despair.

The last lace loosened, and Kylo pushed down the mass of fabric that had once been the most stunning green dress he had ever seen in his life. Sasa stood before him in just her undergarments, ones he felt like a lifetime ago she had teased him about the seductiveness of them. Had all gone to plan, he would have had a wonderful time with the siren call of her lingerie, but now… Now none of it mattered.

And as she couldn’t fight back her sobs anymore, neither could he.

Kylo wrapped his arms around her waist and roughly pulled her back into his desperate embrace. As she sobbed openly and inconsolably, her eyes unable to move from the door of their would-be baby’s room, he buried his face on her hair and copper dampened with his tears.

He didn’t know how to handle such grief.

And then Sasa spoke.

“Kylo… Is this what it feels like?”

It took him a second to find his voice, “What what feels like?”

“The Dark Side.”

He frowned and lifted his head. Sasa had a blankness in her eyes that he only saw during their rebalancing sessions – the only times she thought of her mysterious parents. Something angry, empty, dark, desperate, but above all fearful filled those forest green eyes.

The looked exactly like his Force Signature… and when he touched her Cerise Signature, he had to recoil.

“I’ve never felt this way before,” Sasa’s voice was distant. “This… anger… ever burning anger.”

Kylo’s throat was so dry the bare moisture of his breath stuck to it, “How does the anger make you feel?”

“Powerful,” she whispered. Sasa looked up into his eyes, begging him for permission to… what she wasn’t exactly sure. “I feel unstoppable, like… like I could-”

“Take on the Galaxy by yourself?”

Something in his eyes echoed in hers, “You’ve felt it?”

“From the moment the Supreme Leader first reached for me… when he chose me.”

“I’ve felt anger before, but this… this is another level.”

“Embrace it. Don’t be afraid,” Kylo whispered. “I feel it too.”

Eyes fluttering closed, Sasa took a deep breath like she was inhaling the Dark Side into her very soul. Her head lulled back into Kylo’s neck, and his brown eyes locked onto her ample chest, watching like a hawk as her lungs rose and fell, deeply drinking in the Dark Side.

“Close your eyes and breathe,” he bade. “Just breathe.”
He felt her body burning in the Force, a darkness and ecstasy consuming her in a way that far surpassed the greatest night of pleasure he had ever given her.

“Kylo?” she whispered in the same way as a day he had never forgotten.

“What do you see?” he echoed his words from long past, his breath hot on her ear the same way as that day Alyla had interrupted them in the training room.

“Power. Great power.”

“Harness it.” His hands drifted down her stomach to caress where their lost baby had once dwelled, “Bring it in, and settle it in your core.”

“Draw on that power by drawing on your core,” Sasa remembered the words.

He gave a small nod, “Draw on the Dark Side.”

“But how?” Sasa’s eyes fluttered open. Those forest green orbs were drawn like a magnet to his lips. “You never showed me how.”

He bent his head down to capture her lips.

_I told you, My Apprentice, that I seek to take care of you._ The voice of Snoke interrupted. _I was right to guide you on this path to Sasa. I have moulded the perfect bride for you, and now we will take care of your faithless deputy._

Kylo abruptly pulled back from Sasa.

She frowned, her line on the Dark Side drawing slack, “What is it?”

“The Supreme Leader,” Kylo explained. “He’s…”

She gave a gentle smile and touched his arm.

_Rest tonight, and gather your strength. Tomorrow is the dawn of the New Knights of Ren. But remember what I told you, Young Solo, the Skywalker Legacy must continue, and it will only grow strong if you find an exceptional mother, unlike the misstep your uncle took._

Kylo’s stomach dropped as he remembered goading his father into asking Dameron about Rhiaon. Any moment now the truth would be out, and they would all know what had happened to Felicity Rhiaon Skywalker. The vile act he had committed that led his own uncle to try to murder Kylo.

Leia Organa – his mother – would know the truth… Or as much of it as he had told Dameron.

“What does the Supreme Leader say?” Sasa asked.

Kylo couldn’t find words as he thought of the day he had been sent out of the room like a petulant child, deemed unworthy to witness the death of Felicity Rhiaon. But he had shown them all what he was capable of.

He fought back the guilt shifting his stomach as he imagined what his mother would think about what he did.

“Just that… he’s proud of you,” Kylo eyed the would-be bride in his arms. He knew that word of the miscarriage would also reach Leia Organa and wondered what his mother would think of the woman
Sasa smiled, “I only hope that I continue to please our Wise and Glorious Supreme Leader. I am honoured that he has shown me nothing but his unwavering faith and favor for me above all other Chosen.”

Something very uncomfortable passed over Kylo’s face as he tried to keep a smile on it.

There was still something he might not have told her about that trip to the Supremacy seven weeks previous.

“Come,” Kylo bade, taking a step back but not without gently rubbing her arm. “Let’s get you to the fresher and get you all cleaned up.”

Sasa smiled and nodded, limping her way forward to the fresher. She stopped when she saw Kylo didn’t follow, but rather bent down to gather the ripped and bloodied dress from the ground.

Kylo frowned as he stood holding the dress, “But it’s ruined.”

“I know, but… Just leave it for now. Maybe I can do something with it later.”

He didn’t say anything, just stared at her.

She sighed and lowered her head, “I just don’t want to forget.”

A sad smile on his face, Kylo set the dress down, crossed to her, and lifted Sasa’s chin.

“We won’t forget,” he said gently. “I promise.”

Sasa managed a smile of her own and then gave him a short but sweet kiss. Then, without another word, she took his hand and led him to the refresher.

“Oh Poe!”

“God, Kaydel!”

Cleared for their injuries from the Ninka’s medical wing and given a set of quarters with separate fresher to help them avoid overeager soldiers asking too many questions, Poe Dameron and Kaydel Ko Connix spent the night doing exactly what everyone expected them to do.

It didn’t matter if they had already had thank god we’re alive sex, thank god we’re alive sex on a bed completely trumped closet thank god we’re alive sex any day.

They made love in Kaydel favorite position: Poe on top where she could bury her head into his neck. As Poe passionately thrust into her Kaydel’s hands alternated gripping his shoulders and roamed wildly over those back muscles and shoulder blades Kaydel adored so immeasurably that – much like Rey once thought about her boyfriend – Kaydel wished she could make it illegal for Poe to ever wear a shirt.
He might go along with it too.

Kaydel was so caught up in the pleasure of it all, especially coming undone when Poe whispered fervent Yavinese in her ear. She opened her eyes so she could see as he moved her lips to pepper a series of small kisses over his ear. It was a small touch, a moment only the deeply bonded of lovers would know to give.

He gave the groan of pleasure Kaydel had fallen so in love with, and like a thousand times, before she ran her hands down in shoulder blades in utter ecstasy.

Only this time, her hands spread a trail Doxl Ren’s blood with them.

Kaydel gasped and instinctively pushed Poe off her. He had barely moved half a second later when Kaydel realized what she was doing and stopped herself. But the gasp and sudden jerk was enough to catch Poe’s attention, and he immediately brought himself to a halt.

“What? What is it?” he asked in a panic. “Did I do something-”

“It’s okay,” Kaydel insisted when she saw Doxl Ren’s blood wasn’t on Poe. She tried to shut him up with her lips quickly on his, “Oh, Poe, kiss me.”

Even Poe could tell she was lying it on a little thick.

“Wait, stop,” Poe pulled back, letting his body hover over hers. “Stop.”

Kaydel scowled, but her heart pounded a mile a minute, “What is it?”

“I just want to make sure you’re okay and enjoying this.”

“Of course, I’m enjoying this,” Kaydel tried to wave off. “I always do.”

He couldn’t help but feel a smug grin spread across his lips, “Well, I do endeavour to please… but is everything alright?”

“Yes.”

“You’re positive?”

Kaydel scowled, “Are you calling me a liar?”

“Of course not, it’s just the past few days have been a lot. No one would judge you – least of all me – if things were a little off.”

She stared up at him in silence as she considered her reply. Anytime else staring into those gorgeous eyes in the middle of that man making love to her would lead to only a passionate of hers lips on his.

But that wasn’t the case this time as she stared in those caring pools of deep brown. She could see in his eyes the understanding. There were few things Kaydel hid from Poe – so few, she would actually have to make a point of thinking what they were to figure it out – but this was not something she could.

Making her choice, Kaydel didn’t say anything, just wrapped her arms around Poe’s neck and hugged him tight. He didn’t say anything, just bowed his head and kissed her shoulders as he got back to work. Kaydel sighed in relief and a moan of pleasure escaped her throat as he felt the familiar touch and weight of his body atop hers as her arms clung to Poe’s neck.
She pulled her arm tight across his throat, crushing it as best she could as she fought Doxl for the blade. His ragged breaths and wheezes weren’t enough to counter that heavy weight of his muscular form pinned her to the ground.

Kaydel cried out desperately as she stretched for that blade. She turned her head away, her focus on nothing but the blade.

She had to grab it. Fight Doxl. Escape. Win. He had to do whatever it took to protect her friends, escape this hell, and fall once more into the arms of Poe Dameron.

Kaydel yelled in the worst pain of her life as it felt like her arm pulled right of the socket, but it was a success. She snatched the knife and without a thought, slashed it across the throat of the man on top of her.

She turned back, and screamed.

Poe Dameron was on top of her; eyes bulged out as he choked on the blood pouring from his throat.

“Poe!” Kaydel yelled.

He practically leapt off of her.

“Whoa whoa whoa!” he held his hands up in surrender as he rolled as far to the other side of the bed away from her as possible. “Babe! Babe! It’s okay. It’s me.”

But it wasn’t okay. When Kaydel looked down at her hands – heart pounding in her ears – they were so covered in blood, it dripped onto the bedsheets.

Then she looked at Poe, and could hardly believe it when she saw his throat perfectly unblemished. Kaydel looked back down at the bedsheet… no bloodstains.

She felt like she was going to be sick.

“I- I… I’m sorry Poe,” her voice was low, but not a whisper. “I… I don’t think I can do this right now.”

He considered his reply, “Yeah… I’m not feeling it anymore myself.”

The way her eyes flicked to him in such fear made Poe think that wasn’t the best thing to say.

“I’m just… tired,” Poe lied. “Don’t think I can keep it up that much longer… literally.”

She made a small sharp inhalation of breath that Poe might have thought was a laugh.

Poe debated himself for a moment, then shifted forward on the bed, reaching out a hand for her, “Look, Babe if you want to talk-”

“There’s nothing to talk about.”

His look made her sigh.
“Okay,” she dropped her head. “I don’t want to talk about anything right now.”

“Alright.” Poe set his outstretched hand onto the mattress. “But when you do want to talk, I’m here for you.”

Kaydel smiled and wove hesitant fingers through his on the mattress, “I know… Thank you.”

“Anytime,” the words slipped from Poe’s mouth before he could stop them. Poe figured Kaydel wouldn’t know the reference, but it was instinctual call back to the words shared by Luke and Felicity.

The whole situation with Kaydel had brought Poe nothing but thoughts of Luke Skywalker. How Luke had rejected Poe’s offer to talk about Felicity – and now knowing what had happened to Fliss, Poe didn’t blame him – but also of the stories he heard of Luke and Felicity during Felicity’s postpartum depression. Poe never wanted that kind of distance between himself and Kaydel.

When Kaydel released Poe’s fingers and turned to grab her night clothes from the floor, Poe sighed and got off the bed to collect his own. They didn’t say a word as the pair cleaned up and redressed from their aborted attempt of lovemaking. And when Poe crawled back into bed with Kaydel, seeing her back turned to him, Poe decided to give her her space and turned his own to her.

Poe stared at the opposite wall, praying to the Force and every deity he knew to help him get Kaydel through this.

The mattress shifted and an arm wrapped around his waist. He felt Kaydel’s tears on his back as she spooned him desperately, like she was afraid he would dissipate in her arms.

“I’m not going anywhere, Kaydel,” he whispered, not turning his head a millimetre. Poe wasn’t going to risk spooking her. “Not a mile away from you. 108. I promise.”

It took a moment for her to respond, but they were such sweet and scared words, “I love you, Poe. I don’t want to lose you.”

“You won’t. No matter what you say or do, nothing will ever change how I feel about you.”

Kaydel only wished she could believe him.

Kylo lingered at the doorway into the nursery, eyes drifting over the furniture, toys, clothing, and equipment that should have belonged to Nix. Kylo should have laid Nix down to rest in that lonely crib. Sasa should have rocked Nix in that chair in that corner. Kylo should have entertained Nix with those toys. Sasa should have dressed Nix in those onesies, perfectly coordinating them with her own outfit.

Nix should have taken comfort in the blue glow of that R2 unit shaped nightlight… the same way Rey did once upon a time.

Kylo sighed and slowly entered the room, eyes casting about. Sasa’s fresher had been out of towels, and she sent him to grab some from the only place with extras: the nursery. Kylo wanted in and out of there as quickly as possible. Locating a towel, he snatched it up, and heaved a sigh of relief at completing his mission without incident.

And then it all went silent.
Silent like someone hit the mute button on the world. His breath echoed like a thunderstorm as his heart pounded in his chest.

Kylo looked up and there she stood. Right next to the nightlight he so affectionately nicknamed her, Rey Skywalker was staring at him.

Her eyes burned into him and he felt the weight of his guilt bearing down on his shoulders. He remembered the last time he had seen that face alive. He remembered the last words he said to her after he found her alone and scared in the woods. The words he said before he swung a lightsaber down on her head.

"Close your eyes, Nightlight. I'm going to make sure no one can hurt you again."

Tears shook in their locked eyes, the words echoing in their minds as they both remembered.

Then Rey's eyes hardened.

"I know what you did to my mother."

Kylo’s breath caught as Rey’s eyes burned him hotter than the lavas of Mustafar.

"You're a monster."

And she was gone.

It would be a lie to say that Teng was surprised when he entered their tent and found Rey crying. She had been doing it on and off ever since hearing what happened to her mother.

Without a second thought, Teng rushed to her side, dropped to his knees, wrapped his arms around Rey, and held her while she cried.

"I knew," Rey barely through her tears as Teng kissed her head and did his best to console her. "I knew this whole time, but I… I didn’t know, you know?"

He could guess what she was getting at.

"Our visit is almost done here, Starlight," Teng said. "Just one more night. The vaporators are all fixed. We’ll be home tomorrow. Come on, let’s just enjoy the last night of the Festival."

"How can I possibly enjoy the Festival after last night?"

Teng sighed, "Well, if you’re really that upset, we could always head home now."

Rey took a deep breath and considered.

"Come on," Teng said. "Let’s pack our things, get home, and see if Quom managed to burn down Niima Outpost."

"I completely forgot he had sneezing flames. Have you heard anything about his condition?"

"Your father says Quom’s much better, but is very grumpy as he recovers. Of course, I pointed out Quom is usually always grumpy, so things might be better than we think."
Rey shook her head, “My father… How can I look my father in the eye after learning what happened to my mother?”

“I don’t know, but it is explaining that whole had a mental breakdown and could never get over his wife thing.”

Rey tilted her head against Teng’s, “Has anyone in the village notice how much I’ve been crying.”

“No one’s said anything but I’d put money on them just keeping quiet. Micah did suggested I get you to drink a lot of Muja brew tonight while I helped him set up the barrels.”

“Muja brew?”

“I believe it’s an alcoholic beverage we’re to overindulge in tonight.” Teng kissed the top of her head, “So what do you say? Want to head home?”

“No. I think I should stay. I think it’s what my mom would want me to do.”

“I think she’d want you to do what makes you happy.”

“I’m with you.” Rey kissed his cheek, “That’s all it takes to make me happy.”

“Man, you really don’t set the bar high,” Teng teased, earning a swat for it. “Alright, I surrender, Mighty Jedi.”

Rey’s smile fell, “…Teng?”

“Yeah?”

“Did you think what happened to my mother is why my father hide our powers from me?”

Teng sighed, “Come on, Luke’s told you why. You can see how with your knowledge of your powers they’ve awoken and grown. Ignorance kept you safe from the First Order. All of us safe.”

“And now that it’s awake?”

Teng had no answer.

“Is that what being a Jedi is?” Rey asked, her distant. “Amazing powers, but endangering everyone I love. I lost Aletha because of my powers. What if I lose Quom or Dad or… Or you?”

He thought about his answer for a while, “Rey, I can’t promise you nothing will ever hurt the ones you love. I’ve lost too many people to be that fool. What I can tell you is that the fight to keep what you love safe is never a waste of time and effort. It’s the truest act of love. All I want is for you to be happy. With me? Absolutely. But never be afraid to love someone because you might lose them. Just enjoy the time you do have together, and fight as long and as hard as possible to keep them. Love is never wrong, Rey.”

She couldn’t resist the bait, “What if you’re in love with your brother? Or an animal?”

“Can we not put an asterisk next to my beautiful speech?”

“Only for you Moonshine,” Rey chuckled.

They shared a sweet kiss.
Teng smiled when she pulled back from him, “Now, will that help solve all your massive mommy issues?”

“Teng!” she snapped.

“I’m sorry, I’ve never been really good at comforting people. Especially people who ruin beautiful speech. I just had the one in me; don’t ask for another.”

“Teng, I need you right now,” Rey moaned. “How am I supposed to possibly deal with this? Go out in front of all of them and pretend I’m alright?”

He glanced to the open tent flap. It was enough to see outside, but not open enough for people to overhear their conversation unless they really wanted to.

Teng watched for a moment as the Valrians started to set up for the night’s ceremony. He watched Una in particular who was busy filling glasses on a rough looking table as Micah and Murtaugh hauled over the barrels Teng had helped them with earlier.

“Well… I got one idea,” Teng said. “Something we’ve never done before.”

“What’s that?”

“Want to get drunk?”

Rey looked at him in surprise.

“…Yeah, okay.”

They didn’t say much as Kylo drew the hot bath for Sasa, and he certainly didn’t mention the vision of Rey as Kylo helped Sasa disrobe her undergarments.

Her broken leg didn’t prevent her from getting into the bathtub, but it soon became clear that the combination leg and collarbone issues made washing herself near impossible. It was too much to ask Sasa to stand on her broken leg during a shower – Max’s bandaging was thankfully waterproof – so Kylo found himself tending to Sasa’s cleaning.

Wordlessly – and thankfully with no interruptions from Snoke or Rey – Kylo washed away the blood and soot from Sasa’s body. Across her arms, behind her neck, down her legs, over her breasts, and taking special care up her bloodstained thighs. Tender hands cleaned away the remaining evidence of their miscarriage as the copper-haired beauty in his arms wept. In any other circumstance, Kylo’s hands caressing her thighs would have led to another attempt at making the Skywalker Heir, but in that moment his touches were devoid of sexuality, as sensual as the actions were.

The tears eventually dried, and Kylo turned his attention to her matted, sooty hair. Sasa shuddered as he shampooed her hair, fingers kneading her scalp expertly. And as he rinsed the conditioner from her hair, Kylo snuck a kiss under her ear that made her sigh in a type of relaxation he had almost never heard from her.

“I don’t think we’ll need to do any emotional rebalancing tonight,” he chuckled.
“Oh no, you’ve got me quite relaxed,” she nuzzled him. She drew a long breath and exhaled like she was determined to purge every last ounce of darkness from her soul. “And I thought I was supposed to be the expert on emotional control.”

“We’re in trouble if I’ve become the best one at that.”

“I think you’re better than you give yourself credit.” She drew her thumb over his lip, “Certainly better than sixteen-year-old Ben Solo dealing with his antagonistic aunt by marriage.”

Kylo drew back.

“I’m proud of you,” Sasa said. “It takes courage to admit something like that.”

“I didn’t tell Dameron out of bravery,” Kylo cut off.

She just looked at him, “…I never said you did.”

Kylo had never wished her eyes off him so badly.

“Stay with me tonight,” Sasa said.

He blinked, thrown by the sudden change of topic, “What?”

“I don’t want my bed to be empty tonight.”

“Sasa, you heard what Max said-”

“I don’t mean sex. I mean sleeping at each other’s side. Please, Kylo.”

Kylo sighed, “I thought you didn’t want me to sleep in your room.”

“Then we’ll go to yours.” Sasa looked down, “I just… I just want to be held tonight. Is that so much to ask? Am I that … so much a burden?”

Guilt sunk in his stomach as he thought of the true nature of his visit to Snoke seven weeks ago… when Sasa had been unknowingly pregnant with Kylo’s child.

Sasa is only one of eight whom I have groomed for you. Snoke reminded. There are others to take her place if she continues to fail in her duties to bear your son.

Kylo could barely gather his courage, “Sasa… There’s something I have to tell you.”

“What is it?” she looked at him with those beautiful eyes that he could drown his soul in.

Eyes that could turn on him with such sorrow and hatred.

But a child she conceived and carried, and therefore my faith has been restored in her… for now.

“I… I’ll sleep by your side tonight,” Kylo changed course, desperate to conceal the threat to her.

Sasa frowned, “Don’t treat me like an idiot. I know you’re hiding something.”

He sighed, “I can’t tell you just yet. Not tonight.”

“Kylo-”
“But I will tell you something else as recompense. An even bigger secret than this temporary one.”

Sasa frowned, “Like what?”

Kylo took a deep breath.

“…There’s one more part to the story of Felicity Rhiaon’s body. Something even Luke Skywalker doesn’t know.”

Tiggs is our flight surgeon. She’s a tall, skinny Faust with no sense of humor at all – I mean zero. You don’t joke with Tiggs, because she’s the one who decides if you get to fly on a mission or if you’re grounded and have to go see her boss, Doctor Kalonia. Tiggs doesn’t just look for physical injuries, but also exhaustion, stress, or other ailments that might cause you to panic or freeze up during a hop.

- The Journal of Paige Tico

Poe Dameron was such a light sleeper that it had been eleven years since he had a night he didn’t wake up multiple times. Being a soldier, having to be ready to jump out of bed and go on a mission at any moment, had completely ruined his sleeping patterns. The idea of sleeping eight hours straight was as impossible as Felicity Rhiaon Skywalker coming back from the dead.

Kaydel, however, could sleep through an earthquake, and actually on one mission had. She also had very little patience for Poe waking her up the seven times of night he did. So when Poe woke up two hours after he and Kaydel fell asleep, he didn’t even so much as glance back at her, fearing the wrath of tiny but surprisingly violent and loud when she needed to be girlfriend.

Poe laid there for a minute or so, trying to lull himself back to sleep, but as usual it didn’t work. He decided to try a new position to get more comfortable, and rolled onto his other side without opening his eyes. His sleepy mind then remembered that Kaydel had been holding him when she fell asleep, so he reached out his hand to see if he had rolled onto Kaydel.

His hand felt nothing but the sheets.

Frowning, Poe opened his eyes and found that his hand was resting on the empty mattress. Kaydel was nowhere to be found.

Sitting up, he looked about the room and saw the light on in the fresher. As the door was open, he figured Kaydel wasn’t doing anything too private. Rubbing the sleep from his eyes, he stretched his weary bones, and hauled himself to his feet.

He heard the tap running before he reached the door, but that wasn’t the thing that worried him. It was the sound of Kaydel muttering to herself, words of paranoia and nonsense.

“Come on, off. Off! Why isn’t this working? He can’t see. They can’t see. Poe can’t see this. Get it together Kaydel. It’s just blood. Just wash it away.”

Poe stopped himself in the doorway, and stood there in the shadows frowning. The mirror above the sink of the fresher was inside and quite a bit to the right of the doorway. Unless she was specifically intending it, Kaydel couldn’t see his reflection in the mirror from that angle.

His mind told him to just walk right in there like it was nothing, as he had done so many times before. But his gut… his gut told him to stay and watch. Never before had his gut failed him, so he listened… and he watched.

The tap never stopped running water. Over and over, as Kaydel muttered to himself about Poe, secrets, blood, and murder, she scrubbed her hands with soap viciously. She rubbed at her hands as if she was trying to slough off the skin… and Poe thought that maybe she was.

At first, Poe tried to count how many times he watched Kaydel run her hands under the water, drew the bar of soap across, scrub furiously, rinse, and repeat. Over and over she did it, never noticing Poe with crossed arms watching and counting.

He lost track after twelve.

Still she cleaned. Kaydel scoured her hands so hard that they started to crack and bleed. Poe’s eyes went wide. She was washing her hands raw… and did not look like she planned to stop anytime soon.

As the blood swelled, her voice rose and her words became more manic.

Poe couldn’t watch any more.

“Kaydel,” he called softly.

She whipped around, the guiltiest look on her face as she stared at him wide eyed and frightened like a deer in the headlights.

“Poe,” Kaydel twisted the tap so hard Poe thought she might have broken it. Like it was nothing at all, Kaydel grabbed the hand towel off the rack and started to dry her hands, dabbing furiously at her red, swollen hands. Trying to keep them low and out of Poe’s sight, Kaydel asked, “Do you need the fresher?”

Not saying a word, Poe marched over to her, took the towel from her, tossed it aside, and held up her hands to display the red, raw, swollen, bloody mess she had made.

“We need to talk,” he said firmly.

Kaydel pulled her hands out of his, “There’s nothing to talk about, Poe.”

He was in no mood to play this game, “How many times have you washed your hands, Kay?”

“They were dirty.”

“How many times?” Poe crossed his arms.

She got the hint, “A… a few.”

“I counted twelve.”

Kaydel shot him an angry look, “It wasn’t twelve!”
“You’re right, it was more than twelve,” he was stubbornly resolute. They were dealing with this: end of story. “I just lost count after a while, and that’s not including how many times I watched you wash them before I started counting.”

“Poe-”

“And I’d be willing to bet you’ve been in here washing a whole bunch more times before I woke up and noticed you gone. Not to mention all that stuff you were whispering to yourself.”

Kaydel hung her head, “Poe, I…”

He waited for her to speak, but she couldn’t find the words. Having laid enough enough groundwork to make Kaydel face there was a problem, Poe felt it was time to move into sympathetic mode. He sighed, uncrossing his arms, and with slow steps, walked around Kaydel. Thankfully, she turned her body to watch him as he walked around her, so they were still face to face when he sat down on the lid of the toilet.

“Kaydel,” he said softly. Gently her took her hands in his and looked up into her eyes. He hoped putting himself lower down than her would make her feel less threatened, and the way her shoulders dropped a little made Poe feel hopeful. “Babe… My love, we need to talk about this.”

She stared at him, eyes slightly glassy behind the forming tears, “But I don’t want to talk about it.”

“I know… but it’s something we have to do.” He turned one of her hands over, and kissed the back of it, “Talk to me. Why do you keep washing your hands?”

Kaydel took a deep breath, “They have blood on them.”

“Only because you’ve washed them until they’re red and raw. You’ve washed them bloody, Kay.”

“It’s not my blood,” she whispered.

Poe closed his eyes, “Whose blood is it?”

When he opened them, Kaydel was crying.

He sighed, hating to see her like this but someone had to push her, “Are they Doxl Ren’s?”

Kaydel startled, “What? How do you-”

“Snap told me what happened. I know what you did.”

“You… you know?”

“Yes,” Poe stared up at her longingly. He wanted nothing more than to pull her into his arms, but knew she’d likely bolt if he did. “It doesn’t change anything. I love you.”

“I killed a man.”

“I’ve killed many men. You love me any less for it?”

“This is different.” She turned her head away, but Poe lifted his hand to her chin and forced her to look back at him. The hand on her face felt so tender and loving, yet she knew he had the strength over her. “Poe… I murdered a man. I… I slit his throat, held him in my arms, and felt his blood on my hands, and let him die.”
Poe withdrew both of his hands from her, and taking a deep breath, leaned forward. He set his elbows on his thighs and looked up at Kaydel assessing and debating.

“War…” he finally spoke, “is not a pretty thing. It’s nothing to aspire to, but it’s sometimes what must be done. Killing is sometimes what must be done. In war, you’re forced to do many unpretty things, killing paramount among them. And it’s not all in battles. Sometimes fighting in a war is murdering people. Not self-defence in combat, but assassinations and murders. You think Nalto is a good sniper because it helps in battles? When he wasn’t flying X-Wings, he was an assassin, and so was my father. Nalto’s original purpose in the Death Star heist was to assassinate Alaric Rhiaon – not that anyone told Fliss, and boy was she pissed when she found out.”

Kaydel wasn’t quite sure how to react to that.

“Life is full of sins and grey areas, Kaydel,” Poe pushed back a strand of her blonde hair. “You’re not going to be able to walk through life always having clean hands… but it’s how you deal with that blood on your hands that is the difference between a good person and a bad person.”

Her voice was low in response, “Are you saying people who… don’t seek help and talk about these things are bad people?”

“Of course not… but it’s not healthy and it’s not going to help anyone. Sometimes you have to put yourself first. Please don’t ever be afraid to ask for help… You went through something traumatic on Nixrye. Let me help you. Let me get you through this.”

“Poe,” she shook her head. “I don’t think I’ll ever forget this.”

“I’m saying you have to or even you should. What I’m saying is, you don’t have to do this alone.”

“But I keep replaying the scene and seeing the blood. I- I don’t know what’s going to trigger it?”

“Well, you know who might be able to help you figure that out? Your Aunt.”

Kaydel smiled a little, “I hope you’re referring to Aletha because if you mean Alecta-”

“Babe, I saw Alecta break a woman’s neck with only her foot. You see Alecta, you run like hell, and you don’t look back.”

A tiny chuckle escaped her lips.

Poe couldn’t stop the grin that split his face. She was calm, relaxed, at peace.

…For now.

“How about this?” Poe suggested, “Tomorrow morning, you and I will go talk to Aletha in private. If she can’t help you through this mental health issue, I’m positive she’ll know where to find those resources.”

“How can you be sure.”

“Well… no offense, but you’re exactly the first soldier to get PTSD. I’m sure General Organa allocated some things in the budget.”

“Are you teasing me?” Kaydel smirked.

Poe stood up and wrapped his arms around her waist, jerking her forward against his, “Maybe a little.”
Kaydel laughed and planted her hands on his chest, “That’s what I get for dating a Peacock.”

“Oh good. She’s catching on.”

Poe bent his head down, and they shared a kiss. At first Poe thought it a simple kiss, but when he went to pull back, Kaydel grabbed the back of his head and forced him to stay much longer.

They stood there, holding each other, loving each other, trusting in each other to find the way forward. They’d been through a lot, but there was a hard journey ahead. But if they stayed this way, trusted this love and the one at their side, there was nothing that could stop them.

“We’ll get through this, Babe,” Poe held her with their lips had had enough. “I promised.”

She sighed. His embrace was so warm and strong. In his arms, Kaydel knew that nothing would ever hurt her there.

Maybe she could see a way forward.

“Are you sure you’re okay with what I did?” Kaydel asked but her tone was much lighter than before. “I did kill a man, Poe. Might scare off most guys from a girl.”

“Nah, Connix,” Poe grinned. He kissed the top of her head, “You’re not getting rid of me that easily.”

Kaydel smiled, “Dang it.”

“I don’t understand,” Sasa said as they entered Kylo’s bedroom. “What do you mean there’s something more to the story of Felicity Rhiaon’s death?”

“I didn’t tell Uncle Luke the whole truth,” Kylo motioned for her to sit in the bed, which she was glad to do with her broken leg. Limping to Kylo’s room had been no fun whatsoever, though it was nice to be in clean clothing. “The truth is, I haven’t told anyone the whole story. Not even Alyla.”

“What does Alyla have to do with anything?”

“She’s the reason I threw Rhiaon in the trash compactor.”

Sasa cocked her head to the side, eyes encouraging him to explain.

Kylo sighed and sat down on the bed next to Sasa, struggling to find the strength to admit what really happened the day he tortured Felicity Rhiaon.

“I never expected for Rhiaon to tell me Rey died in that desert,” Kylo finally confessed the secrets he had carried so long. “When she did, I was left reeling, my faith shaken… And then Rhiaon begged me for her life. Begged me. Felicity Rhiaon didn’t beg anyone, and she pleaded with me for my life. The two of us never really got along, but we actually did for a little while at first. When we first met, Felicity was my mom’s cool old war friend who got to fight Darth Vader himself. Rhiaon liked me well enough, and I thought she was kind of a badass what with her and Uncle Luke escaping that whole business on Zygerria and when Rhiaon’s podracer boyfriend hooked my family up with VIP tickets to the championship race of the season… and then Rhiaon learned that I actually liked Darth Vader.”

Sasa touched his hand, guessing where this was going.
“It was like a switch was flicked in her head. I went from friend to enemy, and she went into me for liking him. She… did try to sort of brush things off and change the subject, but when I sensed that change in her demeanor, her old anger and guard going up, I couldn’t let it stand. I pushed her until she voiced her hatred of Vader to me… and then she berated anyone who would give in to and idolize those dark urges Vader reveled in as if I could control it. From that moment on, I never let the subject drop. For months she tried to avoid the subject with me, but after a while, I wore her down. I forced her to face the reality of what I was and that if she wanted to be with my uncle it meant dealing with the Dark Side. How could she ever expect to be the wife and mother of Force Sensitives and yet hold such hatred for the Dark Side? She never understood, and I came to hate her stubbornness and vitriol for the Dark Side. Her father created the Death Star and she wanted to chastise Uncle Luke for the things his father did? What a hypocrite.”

Sasa said nothing.

“But that wasn’t to say we didn’t have our moments. When Snoke was reaching for me the most, Rhiaon made her cases for the Light Side. When I was 11 and she let me force my way into her mind she… she turned to Uncle Luke and my mother to help me. I could see that was at least with good intentions… It’s not like she knew it would lead to my parents throwing me aside like trash.”

“That wasn’t why they sent you to Rornian,” Kylo heard Alyla’s voice in his head. The coward couldn’t even show her face, probably spending time with the son she wouldn’t even know about if it wasn’t for him. She was so ungrateful; Kylo gave her life, Lando, and a son, and yet she resented him.

Didn’t she know her death had been an accident?

Kylo’s gaze turned to the altar across the room. He stood and walked over to it, eyes taking time for each part of the altar: the ashes, the vial of bloodied hair, the lightsaber, the helmet.

“She’s the reason I have my grandfather’s helmet,” Kylo told Sasa as he absentmindedly handled Alyla’s lightsaber. The few times Marks had been in the room, his eyes always burned when they fell on his mother’s lightsaber, no doubt craving for it himself. “Rhiaon woke me up in the middle of the night and… well, long story short, she took me to Endor, to my grandfather’s pyre and told me that I was on a path that could only led there. A secret grave, not only unvisited, but hidden away because of the hatred people felt was so great a threat that the grave would be destroyed if it were public knowledge. She told me that I couldn’t keeping fighting between worlds, that I had to accept I was both Skywalker and Solo, a Skylo.”

“Or Kylo?” Sasa asked.

“The origin of my name. I decided then and there what I was… Rhiaon offered me an olive branch and I refused it, unable to stomach playing nice with that hypocrite. She wanted to start over, set our petty feud aside, and supposedly help me. But the bitch was the one who needed help. Staring at my grandfather’s grave, I knew what I was: I was the Skywalker Heir and nothing would stand in my way. Not Rhiaon, not Uncle Luke… Not even Rey.”

Kylo set down Alyla’s lightsaber and turned his attentions to Vader’s mask.

“I didn’t kill my cousin, but not for lack of trying,” Kylo said. “It was Rhiaon who ended up destroying her daughter… just like she feared the day that I forced my way into her mind, committing my first true act of the Dark Side… The Dark Side she hated… And the act she begged me to do.”

He shook his head and ran a hand across the mask.
“And then she had the gall to beg me for her life.” Kylo sighed, “But I… I hesitated. Just for a moment, but it was enough for the Supreme Leader to send me from the room. I left her in there, knowing that I could do something to stop it from happening. If I did stop it, it wouldn’t be for Rhiaon. It would be for Uncle Luke or my parents… or Rey. I stood outside that door, as conflicted as the Supreme Leader claimed I was, and debated rescuing the aunt I so hated. Atonement for the cousin I helped murder… and then Alyla showed up.”

Sasa frowned, her attentions drowning in Kylo’s story.

“I didn’t know until later that Alyla’s appearances to me were real and not just a vision. Alyla isn’t omnipotent, so she had as little idea what was happening in that room as I did. Alyla begged me to go in and save Felicity, pleading with me to stop to, telling me that I was a good person, a better person, and I couldn’t allow it… And then a shot rang out.”

Kylo sighed.

“For a moment, neither of us could believe it. Then I reached into the Force and Felicity was… just gone. Lost forever. I had gotten what I wanted: Felicity Rhiaon out of my life forever. For a moment I felt the greatest of joys… and then the terror set in.”

He heaved a heavy sigh, and brushed his fingers through the ashes.

“When I looked at Alyla… the horror and repulsion on her face – the disbelief and anger – I realized what the consequences of my actions were. This was a moment of victory for me… but it was the moment I lost everything. I could never go home. My uncle would hate me. My father would hate me. My mother would hate me… Alyla hated me. And I had lost Rey. No matter what position she had in my way of what was so rightfully mine, I truly love my cousin. That little girl I had seen grow up; that I had helped raise since she was three months old. What I had done could never be undone… Maybe my uncle would have the faith in me he had in his father. Maybe some small miracle would make my mother still love me, but my father… He would never forgive this. And I feared what the people I once called my family would now do to me… What Uncle Luke would do.”

“He tried to kill you,” Sasa whispered.

Kylo looked up at her in surprise.

Sasa stared fixedly at the ground, “I heard you talking in your sleep. You dream about it all the time. Night after night you beg him not to do it… but he did it.”

“He…” Kylo swallowed hard, “He strangled me. Not a joking threat that my father or Rhiaon would say they would do to people. Not the playful headlocks my uncle would put me in during roughhousing as a child or training as an adult. Luke Skywalker – the uncle who swore to protect me like his own child – wrapped his hands around my throat… and squeezed to kill.”

A tear splashed into the ashes supporting Darth Vader’s helmet.

“The only reason I’m standing here today is because Chewbacca owed my father a life debt… because my father convinced a Wookiee not to eat him.”

Sasa pulled a confused scowl but decided now was not the time to pry.

“And the worst part of it all?” Kylo looked to Sasa, his eyes watery in the weak artificial lights of his quarters. “I knew he would do it… the second I heard the blast that killed Felicity Rhiaon, I knew Luke Skywalker would kill me. For a second, I considered I was exaggerating, but then I saw the look of horror and anger on Alyla’s face, and I knew the truth. I didn’t say another word; just pushed my way back into the torture room and… there she was: feisty, courageous, cowardly, hotheaded, Felicity Rhiaon who would look Palpatine in the eye and spit in his face… lying dead on the floor.”

He took a shaky breath.

“My immediate thought at the sight was it had to be a trick. My au… Luke’s wife couldn’t just be dead. It had to be a rouse. Felicity Rhiaon was snake. She would lie there and bide her time, ready to spring up and take us to the Nine Corellian Hells with her. So I Hux if it was true, if she really was dead. He told me to check for myself.”

Kylo’s eyes slipped shut as he remembered seeing Felicity Rhiaon’s eyes – the eyes of his dead toddler cousin – glassy and unseeing, like he had done to her daughter.

“Every step towards her felt like an eternity, and then I was close enough. I waited a minute, watching for any signs of trickery. The scene seemed safe enough… but I didn’t trust her. I nudged her with my foot… she didn’t move. I nudged her again, this time a little stronger… nothing. Then my eyes fell on her crudely sheered hair, we had cut out the blood much to Rhiaon’s objections. While not entirely devout, Rhiaon followed some of the traditions of Valrian religion. One of those beliefs were women shouldn’t cut their hair. Rhiaon didn’t mind having it cut when she wanted, but she despised when people did it to her against her will.”

“I think anyone would.”

“Fair enough,” Kylo smirked as he turned his attention to the vial sitting on the bed of ashes. A clear glass container held a bloody lock of brunette hair, “We would later take five of those locks that we forcibly cut from her hair. They would be bottled in these vials and awarded to those who took her down as trophy to display to the Skywalkers about our victory. I have this one, Hux has one in his office, Phasma carries one on her belt at all times, the Supreme Leader displays his proudly in his throne room… and we had one sent to Leia Organa. Word is that it stays on her own desk in the Resistance as a memorial. We would have sent one to Uncle Luke, but… well, by then he had his mental breakdown and disappeared.”

Kylo gently lifted the vial of Felicity’s hair. He wondered what Uncle Luke would have done with his prize… the one piece he was allowed for his wife. Bury it? Burn it? Keep it? Kylo supposed he would never know.

“But as I kicked Rhiaon’s body hard three more times, I thought of how cutting her hair would revolt her. Then I thought of another thing I could do that would force Rhiaon to respond… I kicked her over to lay on her back.”

He caught Sasa’s confused look.

“In Valrian culture, you don’t lay a dead body on its back,” Kylo explained. “It leaves the body prone to have your soul killed by the evil spirits – your soul can only be killed by stabbing you in the heart. If Rhiaon was put on her back, even while playing dead, she could not stand such a violation of her religious beliefs. Burial customs were the one thing she never subverted… So I kicked her onto her back… and she didn’t move.”

“But would she knew you were expecting her to move if she wasn’t dead and so stayed still to protect her cover?”

“Which was why I checked every other way to make sure she was dead. I checked her pulse, breathing, reflexes, the works. Nothing. She was gone. Felicity Rhiaon was dead.”
Something hollowed filled his eyes.

“And it wasn’t my victory.”

Sasa frowned as she watched something evil pass over him. If she were standing, she would have taken a step back.

Kylo clenched his fist, desperately wanting to smash it through a window, “I should have done it. If I was going to endure the punishments, the hell of Felicity Rhiaon’s murder, I should have pulled the trigger. They were going to treat me like it; why shouldn’t I get that sweet taste of victory?”

He gave a humourless chuckle.

“And that shunning- That blame had already started. I think Alyla followed in behind me, because I don’t remember seeing her come into the room. As I crouched there in front of Felicity Rhiaon’s body, Alyla knelt down. Her face was a frozen mosaic of horror and disbelief. I remembered how her lips trembled and her hands shook. She reached out and felt Felicity’s cold cheek. Alyla recoiled like she had touched an electrified wire. Then Alyla began to weep.”

Kylo shook his head in revulsion.

“She treated that woman like she was some hero Rhiaon never truly was. They all acted the way she demanded, like she was some grand hero who destroyed the Death Star. She hadn’t done it: survived it all. It was my mother who endured the torture probes. It was my uncle who fired the shot to destroy it. It was my father who tricked the empty into thinking the ship was empty and took the uniforms of Stormtroopers. It was my namesake who turned off the tractor beam and made the distraction to let my family escape. Hell, it was my grandfather’s droids who rescued them all from the trash compactor.”

Sasa dare not point out the fact Kylo had managed to praise Ben Kenobi.

“I looked down into Felicity Rhiaon’s glassy eyes, searching for some answers as to why the ones I loved had become so bewitched with this woman. You know what I saw? A desperate woman. An arrogant hothead brought to level. A woman obsessed with final words choosing hers to beg the lost cause of acting me to spare her life… And her eyes. Her dead eyes carried the final emotion of her life. A simple word, a plea for the one thing she hated to ask for more than anything in the world… the plea for help.”

Shifting uncomfortably, Sasa couldn’t settle it in her stomach or her mind how much contempt Kylo held for the concept of help… Or at least helping Felicity Rhiaon Skywalker escape the cold call of death.

“Then I looked up, and my eyes met Alyla’s… My whole life, whenever I looked up into those eyes, no matter what disappointment she felt in me, there was always a hint of love and forgiveness… But when I looked up into her eyes that day, Alyla had hit her breaking point. As hard as it was, Alyla held on through it all: her sort of death, Reine Agim’s maiming, the Burning of Rornian, the death of Rey, but me kicking the body of Felicity Rhiaon… she couldn’t hold on any longer… It wasn’t Felicity itself that was the trigger: I know Alyla cared for her family more than Felicity. I didn’t kill Gavyn and I didn’t kill Zena… I did kill Miri. In fact, Miri was my first intentional murder… but Alyla didn’t know it at the time, and that’s a tale for another time. No… it wasn’t Felicity herself that was Alyla’s trigger, I had just pushed too far; done too much. So when I looked up into Alyla’s brown eyes I didn’t see anger rimmed by forgiveness… I only saw disgust.”

Kylo struggled to fight back his sob as Darkness simmered deep in his soul.
“Over something I didn’t even do.”

A water glass that had been left on Kylo’s desk on the opposite wall suddenly exploded.

“They wanted to pin it on me,” Kylo growled. “Blame me for her murder, and I didn’t even get to do it.”

He gave Sasa a chuckle that chilled her to her core.

“They wanted to treat this so-called Death Star hero like my martyr victim,” the glee on his face did not reach his frozen eyes. Something had been unhooked in his brain at the memory the same way it had unhooked in that moment he looked into Alyla Kene’s disgusted eyes, “Then I would make her into exactly that… I would give her her own Death Star adventure.”

Sasa could barely look at him as she thought of what came next in the story.

“None of them expected it,” Kylo bitterly laughed. “You should have seen the looks on their faces when I picked up her body and carried her out of the room. Hux and Phasma were so shocked, they didn’t even follow me out of the room right away. Alyla didn’t either. I just marched Felicity’s body over to the trash chute, opened it, and looked down at her.”

Kylo set down the vial of Felicity’s hair back into the ashes.

“I don’t know what I was expecting,” he shook his head. “Some divine intervention. My grandfather coming down to me and telling me to stop. Instead I just stared at my aunt by law and thought of what I told her: how similar we were. I wondered if our roles were switched, if it were me in her arms eyes pleading for help… would she help me.”

Kylo locked his jaw.

“Then I felt Alyla grab my arm… She looked scared. Her voice as sad as I had ever heard from her – which is really saying something – she just looked at me and said, ‘Ben… you don’t have to do this.'”

Sasa closed her eyes.

“And so I threw Felicity Rhiaon in the trash, slammed the chute shut, and hit the compact button,” not a hint of remorse filled Ben Solo’s voice.

Hands shaking as she tried to clasp them in her lap, Sasa didn’t understand why the story scared her so much.

“Kylo… I,” Sasa struggled to find her voice. “I appreciate you opening up to me, but I don’t understand. You said there was something else to her murder… What did you leave out?”

Kylo sighed and looked down at the altar, “I told the truth when I told Dameron that I threw Rhiaon in the trash. I told the truth when I told Dameron that I compacted here… I just didn’t tell him what happened between that… and after.”

“Between?”

“Almost the second I hit compact… Hux reached us, and hit the emergency stop on the trash compactor.”

Sasa frowned, “What? He stopped it? But you just said she was compacted.”
“She was,” Kylo replied. “But there was quite a bit of back and forth about that fact. Hux and I argued, each hitting the start and stop buttons with each retort. Neither of us paid attention, and I think Phasma just stood in the corner watching us until we made up our minds… I remember Hux making a loud and insistent point of why we couldn’t destroy Rhiaon’s body when we heard it: that bang CRASH thud of metal mechanics that signalled the point of no return with the trash compactor. Hux’s eyes went so wide when he realized what had happened. He dashed for the elevator, Phasma and I hot on his heels. That… was a very awkward elevator ride down to the ground level floor of the trash compactor.”

“I can imagine.”

Kylo smiled a little, and then his face fell when he remembered the story he was telling.

“I lied to Poe Dameron about one thing,” Kylo’s fingers drew random figures in the ashes on the altar. “Yes, Rhiaon’s body was smashed into bloody pulp… but I didn’t space her.”

Sasa had to force her jaw not to drop, “What?”

“There was a body, mangled and unrecognizable, but a body,” Kylo said. “Phasma had at some point during my bickering with Hux commed Captain Electra to fish out the body, and she was there with a few Stormtroopers when Hux, Phasma, and I arrived. I remember the scene so vividly, though I just saw it for the briefest of second. A pale arm sticking out from a pile of broken, bent trash… and a mass of brown hair surrounded by the blood and gore of what could only be a …burst head.”

She felt like she was going to be sick.

“Then Electra stepped in front of me, blocking my view, and started yelling at me that Rhiaon has a valuable bartering asset, and how we couldn’t give her to Skywalker in this condition.”

Sasa’s nails dug into her palms.

“When she finally got out of my way, the Stormtroopers were zipping up a body bag containing what was left… what they could find of Rhiaon. Then we spaced the garbage to destroy the evidence of the mess. Phasma said she would take care of the body… and she did.”

“And… and what did she do with Rhiaon’s body?”

Kylo stared at the altar intently, and then pressed his fingers into the tiny flecks of smoke grey ashes.

“Her whole life, Felicity Rhiaon made it her mission to never support Darth Vader. She condemned him and every action he committed, good or evil. She would rather be dead than lift up Darth Vader in any capacity.”

Sasa’s eyes widened in horror as she took in the flecks of grey cinders that cushioned Darth Vader’s melted helmet.

Kylo smirked as he lifted a handful of ash and slowly let it spill from his palm back onto the altar.

“I made sure her final action is to do just that.”

Sasa couldn’t move a muscle. She stared at Kylo like a deer frozen in the sights of a hunter, wanting nothing more than to bolt for the door, but her body refusing that freedom. All this time she had stared at the altar like it was nothing. She heard rumors about the ashes… but this?

How did one handle this?
Kylo looked up at Sasa, not recognizing the fear in her, rather smiling like her sought her approval.

“Luke Skywalker won’t be gone forever,” Kylo said. “Someday he’ll return. Something will prompt him, and one way or another he’ll come for his wife’s body… And I’ll let him have it.”

Sasa swallowed.

“I’ll let him have her body, but not before I make him stand before this altar and tell him exactly what happened to Felicity Rhiaon. And then I will take these ashes, and throw her death in his face.” Kylo laughed, “Literally.”

And as Sasa stared in silent horror at Kylo Ren sifting the ashes of his dead aunt through his fingers… for the first time she worried if she had fallen in love with a monster.

Chapter End Notes

Coming Up Next Chapter…

Unintended Consequences
Kalonia makes a discovery about the bag Marks gave Evan, while Evan makes a startling revelation about the Anthea family. Meanwhile, Rey suffers her first hangover and learns she’s made what might be her biggest screw up to date.

Hey guys, I would like to remind everyone of one thing before I close out this chapter. I have been getting quite a few comments on AO3 about how some people don’t like how explicit the sexual content of this story is. For those who don’t like that content, I would like to remind you that I post this to both fanfictiondotnet and AO3. On FFN, the sex scenes are basically cut out. Sure, you get to see the lead in to most of them, but any graphic sexual content is cut out. I even alter some scenes (like the Rey/Teng scene at the wash tables on her 17th birthday) and will censor explicit lines/jokes/words to clean them up a little. So if you don’t like explicit stuff, please go read this on FFN where you still get the story, but it’s a little more likely Lucasfilm would actually approve of it than the AO3 version.

I refuse to discuss the revealed title of Episode 9 The Rise of Skywalker. For this story it is great, but for Star Wars canon… I am so pissed off about this. For them to open that debate back up is just god damn insulting. And don’t even give me the whole Kylo is the Skywalker they refer to. Sit your ass down, it’s the fact he’s a Solo and not a full Skywalker that is the whole emotional arc of his character.

Now, please enjoy my story where Rey is the Non-Mary Sue Skywalker she rightfully is supposed to be.

…God I am seething right now.

Lando was fun, though.

Now give me reviews yelling at me about how I keep finding ways to make the Felicity situation so much worse.
Please drop by the archive and comment to let the author know if you enjoyed their work!