Dar nodded. "Kae set me on my path. She knew Tenebrae was a threat. I managed to piece together some of her schemes, over the years." Dar stretched out her legs again, bringing her head down low over them, as if stretching out her muscles. "She wanted me to control the Rakatan computer on Kashyyyky-to find the Star Forge. She wanted the Mandalorians to rise up under her husband's banner-"

Her husband?

But Revan didn't ask. Instead, Revan copied her, mostly just to see the furrow of annoyance on the other woman's smooth forehead when she looked up. "And you let her live?"

"She was useful, later. After Malachor." That smile was fracking creepy. "I left her at Malachor with Davad Arkan and Meetra Surik. Her Battle Meditation enhanced their gifts, serving as a conduit—"

"Vima Sunrider had Battle Meditation?"

Dar'Revan's expression seemed to indicate that once again, Revan had said something incredibly obvious that everyone knew. "Yes."

XXX

"Come." Takan the Zabrak kid gestured, his eyes glowing again. Polla and the rest followed. The seats they were given were hard and stone and tilted forward just enough to be uncomfortable.

"Do you need more time, Revan?" The voice from behind the door crackled over the arena speakers. It sounded amused. There was something else about it. Something… it took Polla a second.

Metallic. Artificial. It's a voder, but a good one. Does that mean she’s going to be fighting a droid? A cyborg? Or just a Sith so horribly scarred they don't have a jaw or something? Like Darth Malak?

For an insane second, Polla imagined that Darth Malak had been alive all this time, and the Force possession of Dustil Onasi was just banthashit.

"Do you?" Revan's voice was cool and clear, like a bell. It cut through the noise of the crowd so well Polla wondered if she was using Force magic. "Do you need more time, my Lord Tenebrae? How many times have we danced to these steps? Have I ever lost before?"

I didn't have the voice right, Polla thought. A weird and useless thought; but one that was easier to dwell upon than wondering if this was the end, or how to fight an army of possessed Sith.

Snap-hiss and Revan's green laser sword ignited. Another snap-hiss, and the red one she'd taken from that dead guy did too. The Dark Lord of the Sith (former or otherwise) raised both above her head, where they met with a clash.

Like she was showing off, the woman twirled the green blade deftly in her right hand. She took another step back, bouncing easily on her feet. At some point, she'd kicked off the shoes she'd been wearing. Her bare feet scuffed the sand.

Revan was still wearing the gown, but as Polla watched, the fabric rippled, buffeted by an invisible wind. The front of the skirt split and tore, and she stepped forward, slightly, settling her bare feet on their toes. Her legs were freckled too.

She just used the Force. Maybe this Revan wasn't the Hero of the Star Forge, but Polla thought that she looked like she knew her way about a dueling ring.

She's got this.

"There is always a first time to lose," the voice said.

"But never a last," Revan Starfire said. "Not for us."

The metallic voice chuckled. "We shall see."

The barred gate slid open, retracting like a hangar door.
The small, round bedchamber was one of the few rooms along the outer wall of the compound with a window—one that looked out over the freezing plains of the Telosian pole.

The woman on the bed was staring fixedly in the direction of the snowy wastes, even if the visor she wore to see was in her lap. Her lips moved—and for a moment, Atris had the strange idea that she was praying.

"Kae? Are you all right-?"

"Did you send the latest translation to the High Admiral?" The old woman didn't even correct Atris for naming her Kae and not Kreia. She sounded utterly exhausted.

"I did, yes." Did I betray the Jedi Order? I did, yes. For the greater good. But it's not too late. We can still turn back-

Kae-Kreia-had insisted on pushing the translation to the Fleet almost instantly, despite Atris's requests to reconsider their course of action. There was too much unknown—both on Dromund Kaas, and elsewhere. There was too much unknown in Atris's own head. Sometimes she felt like she was waking up from a long, dark dream.

XXX

A dream of her office on Coruscant and there was Revan—no, Sheris, no—Revan.

A holocron fell and shattered, and behind them, behind—

"Revan." Atris heard her own voice. "I only want to help you."

"You didn't help us before." Sheris stood in front of her, green eyes blazing. Defiant. She bent down, reaching for-reaching for something on the floor. The room was a mess, someone had upended the contents of Atris's desk all over the floor, and in the wreckage of datapads and scrolls glittered the fragments of something distinctively broken-

"Forget," whispered a voice in her mind, in her memory. Familiar voice. If she could only place it-

XXX

"Atris?" Kae-Kreia's voice was gentle.

"I still don't understand," she said slowly, "why did Sheris take the holocron memories of Revan—how it was even possible—"

I had them. They were in my room. My room on Coruscant. I kept the door Force-locked.

Didn't I?

For a disorienting moment, she couldn't remember.

A holocron's crystals, broken on the floor, sparkling like jewels, like temptation-

"A Jedi's life is sacrifice." The older woman stood up stiffly, as if it pained her. "Has there been further word from Katarr?"

"No." It was not caution that made her keep the news of the amnesiac Revan's capture by a Fleet ship to herself, she reminded herself. High Admiral Rensha had told her in confidence. And she did not want to cause poor Kreia any further distress.

"I would like to see my children," Kreia told her. Her voice was meek, nearly a whisper. "Would you bring them to me?"

"I will see if they are available," Atris hazarded. I will go and feign to look, for I already know they do not want to see you.

Xxx

"Commander Cody sent his report. The Harbinger is safely in hyperspace." Rew Ekkumi wasn't entirely sure why Old Scaly had called her to the High Admiral's flagship in person, but her grim expression looked a little more grim than usual. "Their navs estimate another two or three days before they arrive in the Katarr system."

"Yes." The High Admiral's claw hand tapped her own display of the solar system. "Revan will need to be transported to the planet immediately upon arrival. I assign that task to you."

"General Sand had more of a rapport with her. Before, I mean. Maybe he-"

"Which is why I am assigning the task to you." The Trandoshan's eye membranes retracted in a way that Rew had learned meant that Old Scaly was giving an order, not opening a debate. "Knowing her capabilities, we must consider that Revan and her Mandalorians may be more than a match for Commander Cody."

"The reports said she was demanding to go to Dromund Kaas?"

Rensha snarled softly. "If she manages to do so, she would save us the bother of dealing with the Mandalorians. But we cannot count on anything so logical. The real Revan was predictable, but this one-"

Predictable? Old Scaly must be off her cockpit. Darth Revan didn't seem so predictable when she was beating our ships and burning our worlds-

Rew bit back her impatience. *So... you want me to escort her to the planet? And then...?"

"The Ravager was spotted in orbit around Ord Mantell. And there have been rumors of... unrest there."

"Katarr is the next jump point in the map. You think Davad Arkan will be here soon."

"By all accounts, he is drawn to Force users. Revan Starfire will be a beacon he will not ignore. We need her... with the rest. But how to convince her to stay there until his arrival?"

"Tell her to do something else." The joke came out too sharp and it wasn't funny. "When has she ever obeyed a Fleet command?"

"Hrm..." The Trandoshan High Admiral walked over to her private bar and produced a ferracrystal bottle. She set it on the table between the two captain's chairs and added two ferracrystal glasses. "It's possible we can keep her groundside by force, perhaps with drugs, but we can't rely on such things. I don't believe I need to explain why." Her claws curved towards the chair. "Sit."

Drink with Trandoshans, end as pit fighters, went the old saying in Fleet Academy, but Rew could hardly refuse.
"Revan is ignorant," she suggested, although truly, how would she even know? For all Rew Ekkumi knew, the mindwiped Revan had learned everything from the holocon copy. "Concoct some story about how her uncle needs her. Or… her nephew? If he's truly no longer possessed… maybe he needs her."

Rensha hissed, sitting down on the chair opposite with a sigh. "I had thought perhaps of telling her Mekel Jin was still possessed. But that would give us a very small window in which to act before she discovered the error."

"Not if she has to travel to get to him." Rew looked at the map of Katarr in front of them, noting the geography, the rings of mountain ranges. "If Jin and perhaps Master Vrook Lamar are both moved to a more inaccessible area of the planet…"

"I could say it was for safer for them… yessss. That still leaves the Mandalorians, but we can handle them." Rensha's tongue flickered in and out. "I have some news from Kaas. Atris has sent another translation of the latest broadcast-"

"More recent?" Carth, you fool. It was only that they had known each other for so long, that Rew allowed her heart to ache, just a little.

"Time-stamped the same day, but they waited to release it." Rensha's snout twitched.

XXX

Something huge shuffled forward. Something massive squeezed through the door. Brown and green and armored. The first thing Polla saw were claws. Then the teeth, surrounding an almost small, nearly circular mouth.

Small was relative. Standing, the thing might have been eight meters; but it was stooped to nearly half that, crouched forward, with curving talons dripping with dark ichor.

The beast's eyes were red and glowing.

"Rancor," muttered Dustil Onasi next to Carth. He… he sounded impressed. "Big one."

"We fought one on Taris," Carth muttered. "I mean… we… we tried fighting one."

"Running would seem a lot fracking smarter," Polla muttered.

CARTH shot her a startled look. "That's what she-yeah. Yeah. It was. A lot smarter. But they're fast. You have to… they're really fast."

Obviously, Revan Starfire was here to duel, not run, because she was just standing there, facing the giant scaled monster-thing down. Her voice rang across the arena like a bell. "Possessing a beast, my lord? Rather unsporting." She flipped her green saber again, twirling the single blade. A second green blade ignited from its other end. The hand holding the single red saber stayed steady, but the green one flashed electric, now spinning like a wheel.

All that flash didn't look practical, but Polla was no Jedi. The one time she'd tried a stunt like that (in the kitchen, with a mop and one of Bolts's vacuum attachments), she'd nearly taken out the wedding pots.

"This One is entirely sentient," the beast said. There was a silver square inset where it almost had a neck. The woman's voice came from that. "All sentient creatures are mine."
"A rancor..." Revan still hadn't moved. Her green saber was a blur now, a wheel of green. "From our breeding program on Dathomir?"

"You remember." The creature's mouth slavered... dripping with dark slime—at odds with the mechanical voice from the voder. "I wasn't sure if you would."

"I remember everything," Revan said. "Still... rancors don't have poisoned claws."

"The terentatek venom is only applied to the claw and teeth's surface. An edge, nothing more. Not so different than exposing an entire Dark Council to a mutative virus."

"I merely wanted parity," Revan's voice was low, but it carried. "You possessed half of them already. Our agreement was between equals. I wanted what was due."

"Was it? An agreement between equals, Revan?" The voice chuckled, and sents in the stands did too, until the room swelled with noise. Then, abruptly, they all fell silent. "We might have had our accord between equals, had you ever followed my terms."

"What's done is done." The woman's voice was flat and hard. "Do we have an agreement regarding mine now?"

"Life for your companions, blah, blah. How tedious, Revan. Do you truly think a beast this small could kill you?"

"I must account for every possibility." Revan practically spat the words through her teeth. "Were I incapacitated or disabled, even for a brief time, and if in that brief time my companions came to harm-"

"This concern is not worthy of you!" Tenebrae chided. "I understand your regard for Malak—even without my essence with—"

Revan charged, moving forward so quickly that the attack had happened and ended before Polla could blink. Her cry of anger erupted like a scream, seemed to ripple the air around them. Polla blinked and the duelists' positions were reversed.

The asshole Emperor-rancor was marked with a burn along the scales of its side.

Before Polla had time to register or reflect, the rancor's fore claws raked the air, as the thing pivoted on its haunches, and jumped.

Fracking fast for something that big.

Revan darted to the side, moving so quickly her body was a blur.

The crowd cheered.

XXX

"Do you know for sure Kae is dead now, Fragment? Over the years, I thought my old master was dead at least a dozen times, but she always came back. She... clouds minds. Even Force-users." Dar'Revan grimaced. "Her and Tenebrae were well-matched with their lies."

"A dozen? You mean you were wrong a dozen times? You? Revan? The master strategist?" Revan almost didn't recognize the anger in her own voice. It felt... cold.

Dar pulled her red curls sharply back, exposing the sinew of her neck, the hollow in her throat. "I was wrong about a lot of things. I knew Vima was manipulating us, I knew that the Council was compromised, but once I had harnessed the power of the Star Forge, Kae could no longer lie to me." Her mouth curved slightly, almost smug. "After that, she was mine. They all were."

Revan wondered. "Like Malak?"

Dar didn't take the bait. "Mal was the Emperor's. I did everything I could to exorcise that thing from his mind, but it was never enough. I had to keep my distance. But Kae—going by what you witnessed with Oerin Lin and Davad Arkan… Davad must have been Kae's creature all along." She frowned. "I… should have known that."

"Davad was your lover too."

"How is that relevant?" Again, Dar held Revan's own expression, like looking in a mirror.

"I suppose it's not." The memory the Jedi had shared with her, the one from the holocron, where Davad Arkan crawled across the floor flashed through her mind. A broken thing that this woman had made—and yet—

"Run," he said. She could almost hear his voice in her ear, feel his breath on her cheek. "Run."

When had he said that? When was—

Dar scowled as if lost in her own thoughts. "It was Davad who told Oerin Lin to give us this ship…"

Revan remembered the morgue. The pile of dead Jedi, Jedi that Davad Arkan had killed. She remembered the shadows around Oerin falling to the ground when Davad Arkan… ate them.

"I hadn't realized you two were still so close," she muttered. "Did you tell Malak?"

"A clumsy goad, even for you." Dar twisted her hair sharply, tying the loose strands and the braids together. "Malak had Sheris Loran, and I had Davad—"

It was a small pleasure interrupting with the obvious. "But now you're Sheris, too."

The woman's jaw worked as if she was gritting her teeth. "Are you going to share Polla Organa's husband with her? I've seen you watching him."

Because he reminds me of Carth. Except they were nothing alike past the surface resemblance. "I'm watching him," Revan snapped, "because I need to know how to fly this frickin' ship after we dump him on Navar with Korrie and Abasen."

Dar'Revan said nothing, only pulling a strand of hair from the knot she'd just tied, letting it fall over her face. As Revan watched, it split into three strands and began to braid itself.

"Can you stop that?" Revan added. "Please? It's distracting."

"It's a Force exercise," Dar told her haughtily. "A technique to hone my control. Quite soothing. You should use it yourself."

Revan yawned. "All that hair in battle. Doesn't seem practical."

Dar smiled coldly. "I suppose that's true, if you rely merely on brute force."

"Back to Arkan…." Revan thought she was beginning to understand the woman's methodology. It wasn't exactly subtle. Leading Revan around the intel she wanted to share like they were both reluctant hessi.

"Davad was... different than Malak. Not... worse, but very... different." The woman's cheeks flushed. "Apologies. That was a terrible joke."

"It was the most Human thing you've fracking said to me!" Revan snorted. Her own face felt hot. Polla Organa wasn't the type to blush, but some inner reserve seemed to exist in them both.

"I am Human, Revan." The direct green gaze, the lines pulling the mouth up in an almost apologetic smile. "I-I regret my mistakes. I am trying to remedy them."

"By talking like a fracking droid?"

Dar made an exasperated noise in her throat, almost a growl. "About Davad. What do you wish to know? He is a shell of the man he was because of me." She swallowed. "You might have killed Malak, Fragment, but Davad has nothing to do with you."

For once, Revan almost felt like the practical one. "Are you saying you're not interested in his Davad's Force-stripping powers? Or Force-eating? His ability to end any Force-user with a mere touch?"

Dar'Revan's eyes flashed, as if Revan had hit a nerve. "Perhaps I am. But he's more dangerous to you than me now-whether he's my creature or Kae's. Keep your distance."

Revan remembered the man's smile when he took her hand and kissed it in the Meditation Gardens, the strange echo, as if they had all stood like that before.

"He said something to me once. He asked if you knew what you did to him at Malachor. He asked if he was part of your... plan?"

Did you plan on making your lover a Force-eating monster, Revan? Did you plan on making your husband an insane warlord who slaughtered entire worlds? Were they your fracking greater good?

But those questions cut too close to the quick.

What I did wasn't any better.

"You asked once before about Davad. On Coruscant."

"And you didn't answer me."

"Davad and Kae were at Malachor because I needed their... abilities to amplify the death we all felt. I needed them for Malachor-them and Meetra Surik. Their survival afterward was... convenient. Plans..." Dar's lips twisted. "They change, Fragment. Remember that."

XXX

Plans change.

The door of the Harbinger's prison cell was jarred open, and it rattled with the sound of another explosion.

Explosions in space are bad. Dangerous. Spacer's worst nightmare, vacuum rushing in, falling out into the black-
The Republic ensign stared at Revan hopefully, like a kath pup, holding out her flight suit like a gift.

By the looks, someone had cleaned it and emptied the tanks, refreshed the batteries.

"Thank you," was what she finally came up with. I'd rather fight in my underwear than get back into that fracking thing, but I guess it's practical.

Ma always said it was polite to thank people for giving you crap you didn't want.

"Here." He handed her lightsaber too. Revan took it numbly. The crystal rattled inside; she could feel it somehow, ruined and cracked from when Dar had destroyed it.

"Uh, thanks." No point in telling him it didn't work.

"Do you…." He ducked his head and Revan realized she'd been staring at his scar. "Do you want to join the battle? Or… we-we've set up a temporary command if you'd rather… just… monitor our progress-"

In the quest for the Star Forge, Revan had been in a lot of fights, but only the last one had been a battle, and that one had only had two people in it.

Command? She remembered Aemelie's absurd game. That gives me the qualifications of a tach.

"Why don't you tell me what to do, um… Ensign…?" She made a mumbling noise under her breath, hoping it sounded like a name. Like his name. The one she couldn't remember at all.

"Me?" He looked so horrified she almost laughed.

"If you would-you don't need to." He was still looking at her strangely, so Revan set out down the corridor, forcing him to follow.

"Stang!" His footsteps behind her stopped. "Wait! I have to comm…." A wall of battered armor and blaster rifle abruptly blocked their path.

"Canderous." Revan said because there was no one else the hulk of beskar in front of her could be.

"I was just gonna comm you," the ensign said behind her, almost guiltily.

"Bastards are threatening to cut off life support to this deck." The Mandalorian's voice was metallic through his helm. "We've got interdictors on the way-"

"We do? You do?" More than one? Like the Leviathan? Ships to pull us out of hyperspace?

Can we wait to fight the Republic until after I have a decent sonic?

Or… let's not fight the Republic at all, Revan added hastily, feeling strangely guilty for joking, even to herself.

"Just how much danger are we in?" she added. "With this… uh, ship invasion?"

"Not much, kids already routed one of the access tunnels to the next five levels down." Canderous handed her a vibroblade he'd been carrying at his waist, almost absent-mindedly. "But get suited up again, in case they cut the gravity."
Revan nodded and started stepping into the enviro-suit.

The vibroblade was a nice weapon-retractable-but it reminded her too much of all the training she'd done with blades after the Star Forge-when the thought of her saber cutting through flesh again made had her sick.

And now?

Now I know I fight better with a weapon of the Force than this pathetic piece of cortisteel. But I'll use what we have.

She buckled it to the belt of her suit.

"The bridge has its own life support. They could shut the rest down." The schematics of the ship were almost visible when Revan focused, whether from memory or a Force sensitivity to the running conduits of an active hammerhead battle cruiser.

"But our own men-" the ensign interrupted. "Commando Cody wouldn't cut off systems to the decks! There are hundreds of soldiers-"

Poor kid, he doesn't get it. He still wants to think the brass gives a damn about him. Like those soldiers on Taris, or the scientists on Manaan-

"We need to take the bridge," Revan announced. "Soon, before they do something foolish."

There. I did it. I gave a command. Her voice, Revan thought, had even sounded like Dar's.

Both men just stared at her.

"Yeah. We're... already working on taking the bridge." Canderous coughed through his helm's voder. "But it's sealed, and we don't have anything strong enough to break the blast doors without decompressing the hull. Think you could cut it open for us? You Jedi are always good for that."

"Let me see the door." Maybe there was a way.

But they fought former Jedi before. If they're smart they used cortosis to reinforce that door... and I don't have a working lightsaber.

Her fingers flexed, the Force flowing easily.

Perhaps... I won't need one.

XXX

Holocameras flashed.

Do they have HoloNet here? The Blais kids had said something about media, but Polla hadn't been paying attention.

"I will enforce your terms!" Revan Starfire called out. "When you remove your spies from Republic space, Tenebrae!"

"My spies?" The chuckling spread through the crowd, not the rancor. It was fracking creepy. "Oh, my dear. We are far past the point of you worrying about my spies!"

The green lightsaber stopped spinning abruptly. Revan brought them forward again. Another clash.
Was she just showing off?

Polla nudged Carth. "Why does she keep doing that?"

"Charging the crystals," It was Onasi Junior who answered. "Happens on its own in a fight, but if you dual wield, you can do it yourself. Have to be careful not to overload." He paused. "Unless you want it to overload them."

What would that do? Were lightsabers like blasters? Could you set them to discharge?

"Do you remember?" The voice coming out of the voder seemed to soften, not any less creepily, shifting into a sibilant whisper that nonetheless carried over the arena floor. "Do you remember the first time we danced, my Sith'aerah?"

"Yes." The word was clipped. Revan's blades wavered. "I remember."

"We will see." The possessed rancor lowered its head and charged.

Xxx

"What spies in Republic space?" Admiral Cein glowered at the holoimage, with its holographic wall of text. Rensha was sequestered in her flagship, but she'd sent over the translation of the vid (courtesy of Master Atris) with the command to watch it. "Did that Sith Emperor of theirs just say they had spies in Republic space?"

"We need a test," General Sand said. "Some way to tell what a Sith spy looks like."

"According to the Jedi, that's what their sithspawned plague is for." Cein's blue skin was flushed almost purple with anger. "Except for the races it doesn't affect."

"That damned plague is like carpet bombing a planet to stamp out kanna mites." General Sand checked his comm. He'd thought that Ekkumi was going to join them, but she'd commed at the last minute from Rensha's flagship.

"Hrm." Cein seemed to agree, but his glare never left the holo in front of them.

Xxx

The woman stepped to the side, so quickly her white dress was a blur.

The beast thundered past her. When its back was turned, the former Jedi ran backward, faster than should have been possible, putting the length of the arena floor entirely between them, before the rancor could turn around again.

It was obviously not an act of cowardice, because she immediately ran forward, dead towards the beast as it was still turning, launching herself into the air with the trajectory of a torpedo, straight towards the rancor's maw-

For a moment, she crouched almost on its shoulder, as her blades sparked against the armored hide.

In another moment, it shrugged her off as easily as water, and she was rolling across the sand, as graceful as an acrobat on a solar trapeze.

Xxx
"Did you ever see her fight-before?" Cein sounded calmer now. He seemed to be treating this vid-match like a nostalgic revision of the Mandalorian wars, which surprised Jiya, considering how much the man had despised Malak.

But he didn't hate Revan. No more than you did. How many times did she guide your troops through the Mandalorian blockades? How many times did she know where to strike, where to send fighters, how to get your ground troops safely back on board?

"Yes. On Cathar and Taris." After that, they had stopped risking her groundside.

The woman on the vid fought with the same skill that Jiya Sand remembered—the same distinctive grace. She was not the best of the Jedi duelists—Malak had been a brute, even before his fall. And Beya Organa's technique was flawless, Kavar Vakla… a true master. But Revan's sheer power—her ability to literally stop most opponents in their tracks—

"She's not freezing that thing," he pointed out. "Why isn't she freezing that thing?"

"I don't know." Cein frowned. "Toying with it, perhaps. Like she did to the Fett's forces at Bothawui."

Xxx

"It's not just a question of splicing the lock," the Tee-Three told Seiran. "Sure, I can do that. Easy! But we can't leave the others."

"I'm suggesting we should go look for them." It had been hours—and then five hours ago, the two Zabraks had left too, eyes glowing, without as much as a by-your-leave to go hell-knows-where.

"I'm filtering through as much media as I can… Kashyyyk agreed to boost my signal, but I'm not sure who to call," the Tee clucked. "I did leave a message for Canderous, but he never answers his own pings!"

Across the room, the HK unit's eyes whirred. Revan had left it turned on in guard mode, but it kept talking and talking—until Seiran remembered the volume switch on its voder. Now set to mute, it could only glare at them—at him with injured rebuke.

Truth, it was hard to keep thinking of the Tee-Three as a thing. He'd noticed Carth called it Mission. Carth's kid too. The Bitch didn't, but she hardly used anyone's proper names.

"Holy Spaceballs!" the Tee exclaimed. "Get a load of this!"

A cam whirred open on her dome and began broadcasting a panoramic holographic stream with impressive detail.

The Bitch was fighting some kind of pit-beast in what looked like an arena.

As Seiran watched, the Bitch threw a red lightsaber at the thing's armored hide. At the same time, the creature lunged forward on two legs, extending its upper claws farther than seemed possible.

The red blade glanced off one of the arms and fell to the ground. The Bitch was already ducking in, somehow executing a roll with an ignited lightsaber, as if she was trying to reach the thing's underbelly.

One of the claws lashed down and sparked off her blade.
It's resistant, Seiran realized. Its hide. She can't cut through.

For what seemed a long heartbeat the two were poised: the woman half under the beast's body, the beast's claw pressing down.

The detail of the projection was clear enough that Seiran could see the lines of strain on Revan's face, the sweat darkening her hair. Her arm shook, and he wondered how long this had been going on.

The everything blurred, in a haze of grit-

"Get the picture back, Mission."

"That is the poodoo picture. It's I think she's throwing sand at it."

"What's going on?"

There was an audience behind the fighters, slightly out of focus, shadowed by the same holocam spots that overlit Revan and the beast.

"Mission-focus on the audience." I'm calling her Mission too. Seiran had been feeling like he was losing his mind for so long it seemed normal, but there-in the second row, next to a Wookiee-the Wookiee's distinctive shape had drawn his eyes first. There…

"Big Z!" Mission exclaimed.

Their faces-her, hers!

"Polla." It felt like he'd been holding his breath for an age. Now it all came out at once. Tears pricked his eyes with relief. "She's there. She's safe."

Polla looked okay-considering. Wearing robes that could have been red in the shadows. Her head was turned towards Carth Onasi's as if they were talking.

"Is there audio?"

"Yeah, but it's bad, these Sith news stations mostly edit and splice in dialogue, so they don't have mics worth a plugged credit." Mission's speakers crackled with static. And then the roar of a crowd chanting. Took Seiran a sec to realize they were all chanting 'Ten-eb-brae'-took him right about to when they erupted in a wordless cheer.

Polla's head snapped back, and an expression of horror crossed her face.

"Bantha kriffing poo!" Mission said.

The image panned out.

The Bitch was standing, but her artificial arm hung, loose and useless at her side. It appeared to be smoking.

"What happened?" he asked.

"She tried to jump-best way to kill those things is the eyes or mouth. Only parts that aren't plated. Rancor caught her with its claws… but she's not that bad-she blocked most of it with the prosthesis…. You know, this is interesting," Mission chirped. "Polla Revan would have just fried it by now. This Revan's fighting it. Weird."
No, it's not.

Seiran remembered those weeks on the ship, watching the woman train like an automaton; watching her fall, fail, try and get back up again.

Xxx

"The Force used to sing," she said, staring at him, sweaty and hollow-eyed. "Now it feels like it's in another room-always out of reach."

Seiran just stared at her. Did she want pity? Her?

"You had enough to choke me," he snapped.

"I apologize." She stood up stiffly and left.

Xxx

"She's not as strong as-as the other one," he said. "The Bitch can't use the Force like the other one. I saw the other one almost fly."

"Yeah, I guess that's true. Sheris Loran is a class-three Force-user in Jedi records, and someone wiped the Sith archives clean on her." Mission whirred. "The Sith thing's a little odd, actually. Especially because it wasn't me."

The crowd roared again. The Bitch had dropped the lightsaber-seemingly deliberately-and raised her good hand. Lightning sparked there, but weakly, splashing across the rancor's back, even as the creature turned and charged.

The woman slid to the ground, and then skewed sideways, graceful, except for the limp arm. Somehow, she'd evaded the beast, which lumbered, turning slowly for another go.

Revan raised her good hand and the lightsaber flew into it, igniting on one side. As the beast charged, she ran straight forward, ducking between the beast's claws. The green arc of her saber whirred like a wheel, sparking off one claw and then dipped, sharply, slicing down.

A chunk of the rancor's lower jaw fell smoking to the ground, as she rolled away, dodging the lower leg that tried to smash her.

The crowd cheered again, mindless.

"They don't care who wins?" Seiran asked.

"Why would they?" Mission made a snorting noise. "Most of them are him. Sith rules: assholes always win.

As if enraged, the rancor swiped out.

Revan dodged, flipping into a roll that landed facing her opponent again. There was a slight, grim smile on her face now, and what seemed like renewed confidence, despite the damaged arm. She took two steps backwards and then broke into a run, charging the beast.

Two meters away, she jumped again, saber extended, but the rancor turned its armored head and her blade glanced off. Her body was a pale blur as she dodged another claw strike, rolling again, and circling.
She's figured out its range, Seiran thought.

His wife's face was an indistinct oval, a pale blur in the dark, in the audience beyond.

Revan repeated the move again, but this time, her blade ignited sideways, and speared the beast's eye.

It roared in agony, snapping its head back and forth, blinded.

On the sands, already clear, Revan flipped her saber back to a single blade.

The crowd roared louder, as the rancor staggered, now half blinded, claws grasping empty air-

"Thank goodness," Mission said. "For a second there, I-" The camera lurched. Revan jumped-just as the beast straightened its back, rising to its fullest height.

Instead of landing on the rancor's head, her leg slipped.

The crowd gasped, nearly as one….

XXX

Lady Fenestre: "Oh, me! I don't think any of us were expecting-"

Lord Scourge: "Wait! Revan recovers himself!"

Lord Vash: "Herself. For the last time, Scourge, Lord Revan is female-"

Lord Scourge: "It's a generic pronoun. Like Lord, Lord Vash-"

XXX

"Oh, no!" Too late, Leeshansintina considered the folly of letting little Leeshy watch the vid with her. But surely, Yuthura Ban would have warned her, if it was going to get full of guts and stuff.

"Is Korrie's mother gonna be okay?" Her sister covered her hands. "We need to make a copy of this for him!"

Yuthura Ban stopped the vid, looking as if warning them had maybe just occurred to her too. "Malachor isn't there," she began. "We don't know where he is, but we do know there has been no sign of him on Dromund-"

"I know where he is." Leeshy wiped her eyes. "We comm all the time. How am I gonna tell him his mother died? Does she? Does she die?" Her head shook back and forth, developing a wail like the one Leeshansintina remembered using herself at that age. "It's not fair!"

"You know where he is?" Leesa considered her sister more carefully. "Do tell."

"No." Little Leeshy shook her head.

Leesa made a mental note to check the outgoing comm feeds.

XXX

Revan’s leg slipped, glancing off the rancor’s razor-sharp teeth, and then she… seemed to almost spin in the air, somehow clambering atop the rancor's head. Hard to tell in a holorecording, but she seemed to be sparking blue, like she'd activated a shield of some kind.

Her blade ignited on one side, and she drove it hard into the beast's unblinded eye.

The creature fell like a stone as the crowd went wild-

XXX

"You know where Korrie D'Reev is?" Yuthura was asking. As if she'd have the secrets of House Racharn with no oaths of loyalty or anything? Jedi were so arrogant, sometimes!

"He is to be my betrothed," Leeshy said stiffly. "Of course, I know where he is." Her eyes went back to the vid, and she sighed a little, as if with relief. "Why did you stop it? She won?"

"Yes, and that is the end of the recording, unless you want to hear the Sith National Anthem again…?" Yuthura smiled. Really, for a former Sith, she was good with children, Leesa thought.

"All that electro harp. Gross." Leeshy made a face and unfolded herself from the divan.

"Time for bed," Leeshansintina told her little sister, stretching herself.

Leeshy was vanishing through the door when the Twi'lek coughed once. "A moment," she said to Leeshansintina, as if they were equals.

"What?" That had been the problem with Jedi, her own mother had always said. So arrogant.

"There's more to see." Padawan Ban's fingers moved, and the vid began again….

XXX

The red-haired woman in the torn white gown bowed to the audience. One of her arms hung, limp and sparking. The other saluted slowly with an unlit saber. She was smiling, but it was a fixed expression as if she'd forgotten how to turn it off.

XXX

"Right! The awards part." She stifled her yawn. "Look at Carth Onasi in the crowd there. Why does he look so pissed?" Leeshansintina peered at the screen. "Wow, Dustil does too. So, he's not Malak anymore? Or he is? That thing with the Jedi was confusing. Did it work? Do they think he's Malak?"

"I do not know," Yuthura's voice was distracted. "Would you call me a cab to the shipyards?"

"Already done." Leesa yawned. It was late. "My driver is waiting outside. Are you going to Katarr with the rest of the Jedi?"

"Do you think I should?"

"They've got a lot of Jedi. But hey… in a few years, we might have some Force-sensitive kids for you to train…here… so stay in touch, okay?" Leesa coughed. "Because, like, Leeshy and Korrie will get married and have babies… not, like anything else going on with our House."

"Thank you." Padawan Ban sounded distracted.

XXX
Rew Ekkumi exhaled a breath she hadn't realized she'd been holding. "She won."

There was Carth in the stands, next to his son and a Wookiee. He was cheering with the rest, but he didn't look happy to be there and a small, nearly extinguished part of her loved him for that.

Rensha hissed softly. "Did we want her to win?"

"Does it matter?" Rew asked bluntly. "She won. Carth Onasi is safe, and beside him is either his son or the ghost of Malak D'Reev-"

High Admiral Rensha coughed.

XXX

The woman's head turned abruptly away from the crowd, just as the gate behind her opened again. A brown-gray blur the height of the opening emerged. It was big-even bigger than the last monster—and moving fast.

Revan Starfire turned—leaping into the air and back, and then started to run along the perimeter of the sands, as if she was trying to get momentum to jump again.

The new rancor stopped and roared, baring its chest with clawed hands that gleamed with something dark and dripping, and a metallic voice echoed its roar, matching the syllables, but any real words were lost in the excited roar of the crowd.

In the audience beyond, hundreds of red eyes gleamed.

The woman screamed something back at the rancor, her words lost in the roar of the crowd, too.

The crowd was chanting now, all in unison. Revan was already moving again, her saber outstretched—

XXX

"The Emperor asked if she thought it was over," Yuthura translated. 'It—he said it was not. The crowd is chanting the word 'sikkath,' which means 'victory' in Ancient Sith. Over and over again."

Leeshansintina yawned. "Another fight?"

XXX

The red-haired woman fought valiantly with one hand, dodging the great beast, but the aggression she'd shown previously seemed stunted now, her movements more defensive than offensive.

XXX

"She's tiring," Cein said.

"She's fighting one-handed." Jiya thought that the outcome didn't matter, but they still bore witness.

The woman's jumps were ragged now, her limp arm unbalancing her effort. She was using a single green blade, and with the overlong hilt, the weapon looked like it was being held by a child—an effect emphasized by the size of the creature she faced. It was even larger than the last one. With longer claws.
Jiya's comm pinged suddenly, breaking the onscreen stalemate. Jiya suddenly wanted to just speed to the end and end this-

"Blast," Cein muttered, looking down at his own comm, which had pinged too. "Distress call from the Harbinger."

XXX

This already happened, Rew reminded herself. Old Scaly knows how it ends, she's watching you watch it for a reason.

She tried to keep a neutral expression, as the woman circled the rancor, lightsaber half-raised defensively, as the thing lowered the lump of its head and charged again.

Revan Starfire backflipped, neatly landing on the corpse of the first beast. Her next leap propelled her forward, straight towards the dripping claws, the ravening mouth of the one still living. Her blade was outstretched, and she twisted in mid-air somehow pushing off the armored belly, as she flipped again sideways, saber outstretched. Her green blade sparked hard along its scales, and the creature... reared back, as if suddenly trying to get escape.

She landed on the ground, the mechanical hand flopping.

"Rancors." Rensha told Rew. "They are one of the great preys from the Great Hunt. Whatever else, the Starfire fights like a great hunter in this battle. I honor her blade." She handed Rew a glass and drained her own drink. "So should you." Her incisors bared, and she gestured at the cup Rew hadn't touched. "Now."

Rew nodded, not sure what to say. The Trandoshan liquor burned her throat. Her eyes stung.

As they watched, Revan repeated her attack. But this time, one of the claws found purchase for a moment on her bad arm, and the mechanical one ripped free, sparking in their grasp.

The rest of Revan rolled again, her saber momentarily extinguished. But the stump where her hand had been was still sparking with wires, and darkened with red.

Her face was still frozen with that grim smile.

The rancor rose to its full height. Now, there was a line along its belly, where the blade had scored.

"Another few cuts with the Jedi blade might break through the armor," Rensha said. "But the claws are poisoned. Look."

Revan Starfire's good arm shook as her blade ignited again.

XXX

Commander Cody leaned across the main comm board himself, yelling-as if that would make Fleet arrive sooner, get their interdictors in range faster-

We're still in hyperspace. By the time Fleet hears me, it'll all be over. And they'll know that! They might have the distress call already, but they won't leave bleeding Katarr for me-

"Ready to vent the decks," Corporal Buteen called out. "On your command, sir!"

"They're closer." Dak Vesser brandished his lightsaber next to the blast doors leading from the main deck. "She's closer. I can sense it."
"And her Mandalorians?" Cody already knew the answer, but he was numb. I should have placed more guards. I should have acted immediately when the systems cut out in the prison sector and sealed it-not sent a patrol-

I should have accidentally depressurized the entire prison block the second I locked them in!

"I believe the Mandalorians are… with her." Dak sounded less sure. "I sense multiple presences on the other side of that door-"

The patrol Cody sent had not returned, but he'd seen them on the cams, taking their own comrades prisoner for the Mandalorians.

The traitors must have gotten deck paint from requisitions. Every one of Revan's mutineers had splashed the front of their armor with a blood-red hand.

Cody felt even more of a fool than when she'd stolen his clothes.

"Pardon, sir…" His communications officer, Lieutenant Hannist'al, was apologetic. "Dammer Squad and Alfiri haven't reported in. All evidence suggests that they… they… joined them."

"Special Forces." Always loyal to Jedi. Too many merc recruits. Or, she did something to their minds…

XX

"Take off your clothes."

And he had. The Force could do terrible things to a mind. Revan Starfire could do terrible things and she was on his ship-

XXX

"The door's holding, sir." Ensign Tavis looked nervous, standing next to Knight Vesser with her gun drawn. A red line etched along the cortosis-lined surface, like a madwoman with a lightsaber was cutting through the other side.

"Is that her?" he barked at them.

"She's close." Dak was a capable Jedi, Cody had seen him take on an entire bridge of slavers when they'd been on Rim patrol.

"Harbinger requesting assistance from Fleet Command." There was a protocol to follow in cases like this, and Cody forced his voice to calm enough to follow it as he sent the recorded message into the sub light channel, projecting towards Katarr. "We're going to vent all the decks, but if that doesn't work-"

"If it does work, they'll all die," Knight Vesser noted. He sounded as if the prospect was an intellectual curiosity, not a problem.

Cody continued his report. "We issued an evacuation order, hopefully our own personnel made it to the escape pods. As soon as we drop out of hyperspace they can launch-"

He glanced at the door again. That schutta didn't seem to be making any more progress, which was a relief. "Secure the door," he called out, and his guard moved to surround it, all weapons trained on the glowing red line that was attempting to cut through the cortosis-enhanced blast doors.
Sheen Cody's hand hovered on the exhaust lever. One key command, and the other decks would vent. Locked to his biosig. The Captain's last choice. His eyes met Corporal Kisha's across the bridge. She nodded slightly, indicating (he hoped) that the rest of the ship had made it to the pods. Crew in the pods would survive vacuum.

I've done all I can.

Cody closed his eyes and grabbed the lever. It was an act of insubordination, desperation—a last resort. The lever moved—

And then his arm… froze.

Ice gripped his limb, numbing it near-instantly. His entire body went rigid, his head still turned towards the door—

The bulkhead above Cody's head tore open—enforced plating ripping like plimsi. An envirosuited figure dropped down into his view, and he struggled in the grip of invisible ice to react, to attack, to do anything at all.

The whine of vacuum hissed before the breach shields took over. Even as his mind tried to define the hole in the ceiling as the result of a blast, his eyes told him differently—there had been no explosion, no sound but the buzz of shields, the whispers of his crew.

Now, above their heads a maze of pipes and exhaust ducts lay exposed, the maintenance crawlspace, the smooth plated ceiling rolled back like plimfoam—

In the next instant, blast bolts winged past him, close enough to feel their cold fire, aiming at the slim figure half-kneeling in front of him with her hands out, palms up.

She was helmeted and masked, but Cody knew:

Came through the ceiling. It's triple-reinforced. It can hold back plasma bolts and she… just peeled it open.

One gloved hand twisted, and he noticed the blaster bolts were frozen, vibrating in thin air, dozens of them like deadly spikes in ice, almost a perfect ring around her body.

Revan Starfire's other hand traced a circle and then another, and then, with each easy gesture, more of the ceiling opened, more armored and suited bodies dropped down. Some were Special Forces, Cody's own men——and four Mandalorians, clad in their infernal filthy beskar, which had been confiscated, blast it!

Another look at Revan confirmed that she was wearing her kit too—and had even added what looked like an officer's sword buckled to her belt, next to the obvious hilt of an unused lightsaber.

I was never in command, from the moment we took her on board. We should have blasted her ship from orbit! Orders be damned!

"Don't shoot," her voice was soft but it… it echoed. "Don't shoot again."

Later, he was never sure if she'd used Jedi magic on them all or not. She could have. Or it could have been just her.

"Okay..." she added, unsnapping her helmet. Underneath, her face was still streaked with sweat and Revan Starfire stepped gingerly around the blaster bolts frozen in the air. The click of charged weapons dropped into the silence like a sonic grenade. Cody expected to die in that moment. He'd... he'd fought Sith before. He'd seen how bad it got. At least stinking Mandalorians just wanted the battle. Blasted Sith enjoyed the death.

"Revan," Knight Vesser said. He'd pivoted, lightsaber still lit, as if he and the scourge of the Republic were the only two sentient on the bridge.

"Dak?" She ran her hand through her cropped hair, grimacing. The blaster bolts remained, floating. "Give me a moment, I-I need to figure out what to do with these."

"Give you a moment?" The Jedi Knight's voice cracked, and he leaped, blade out in front of him, moving so quickly that Cody flinched, self-preservation kicking in before his officer's stripes. Dak landed in front of him, spinning around. The whisper of his saber was a blue trace in the air, closer than Cody liked to see, close enough to feel the oscillation of the particle blade.

"Yes." Revan took a step backwards, hand raising up in a signal that they all recognized. Hold.

Not talking to them, but to her own soldiers. Her soldiers. They had so recently been his.

Cody glanced at Dak and the man was... frozen. He looked carved in ice-mouth twisted in anger, blade raised in a killing arc, his feet stretched apart, unbalanced. As Cody watched, the Jedi Knight rocked back and forth like an unbalanced statue... Until one green-eyed glance from her stabilized him, like a game piece she'd put back on the shelf.

"A moment," she said, raising one eyebrow. Her hair was dyed brown, not red. It wasn't until then it occurred to Cody to wonder why.

Revan's conquering glance went to the door, to his men, crouched there, the ones who had fired. Her hand twisted, and the door itself... peeled open, like a skin off a hard-boiled Moffa egg.

Behind, there was Ensign Sikos, holding a laser torch and not a lightsaber at all.

Behind him...

The rest of Cody's former command broke into a ragged cheer.

Ensign Sikos waved hesitantly, twitching his antennae. "We're good?"

"Yes." Revan stared at the bolts again, brow creased like they were a mathematical puzzle. "Thank you. You all did very well. Watch the Commander, Canderous."

One of the beskar-suited figures grunted an agreement.

The red dot of a laser sight momentarily blinded Cody's left eye, before trailing down almost insolently to land on his chest. There was never a lightsaber at the door. But Revan had one, hanging from a clip at her waist. Revan had one... but she'd disabled Dak Vesser with nothing more than a twist of her fingers.

A blue lattice built up around the frozen blast bolts, as if she was summoning a shield from nowhere. As he watched, the lattice expanded. "Might want to step back, everyone," she called out. "If this doesn't work, I'll try and contain the explosion, but-"
"Third Wife!" The smallest figure in beskar stepped forward. "Wait! You could set up a shield dome."

"That's what I'm doing." Revan moved her fingers again, and the blue light encircled the blaster bolts.

"A shield dome with working technology, instead of your hu'tuun Dar'Jetti magic," the girl insisted. "This is no time for an experiment."

"I think I have it, Milli. Just stand back."

"Father."

"Trust her," Canderous Ordo grunted.

Revan Starfire flexed her hands and there was a quiet pop. The bolts and the lattice all vanished.

"There." She smiled, looking too smug to be the scourge of Malachor. "Now…." Her attention glanced over Cody, dismissing him entirely.

He still couldn't move.

"Dak…." Her stasis around the Jedi collapsed, leaving him stumbling to right himself. His blade sparked to life again, and Revan ducked as the Jedi swung blindly at her with a growl of rage.

"At least do me the honor of fighting," the Jedi hissed, sounding like less of a Jedi than she did. "Draw your weapon, Revan!"

"I can't." Revan raised her hand again, and his saber arm froze. His hand trembled as if buffeted by an invisible wind. "My saber's broken. I don't know how to fix it. The crystal's… fused or something."

"Did you leave it somewhere?" Vesser didn't sound like he believed her. "How could that happen?"

"Apparently, I was never taught to shield." Her voice was soft suddenly, and Cody felt his hackles rise. "Perhaps the Jedi didn't bother, or they wanted to be able to leash me."

Her hand moved again, fingers crooking, and the lightsaber in the knight's hand broke free and flew into hers with a snap.

"Wish I'd known that on Korriban," Dak muttered. His hand closed into a fist.

The lit blue blade in Revan's hand made a popping noise and then shorted out.

Revan chuckled and threw it away. The hilt clattered on the bulkhead. "Seemed like a nice weapon. You didn't have to ruin it on my account."

"You didn't have to kill my friend-

The world (or the ship) tilted abruptly, proximity alarms drowning out the rest of Dak's words. Sheen Cody heard the engines hitch and short out, as the bulkhead tried to stabilize.

In front of them, the blur of hyperspace was suddenly replaced with a view of stars.

Stars… and the half-cloaked shadow of a great, triangular-shaped ship. The lines of it were alien, and terrible, and… familiar. Sith. A Sith Interdictor.
"Finally!" the Mandalorian girl exclaimed. "What took them so long?"

The woman in white stood, bare legs slightly apart. Her left arm ended in a bleeding stump. Her right arm trembled, holding the ignited double blade as if it suddenly weighed a decagram. Her face was pale, bright hair slicked back. Her topknot fell half in her eyes, but her stare remained the same: glazed and unblinking.

"No," she said, clearly in Basic. "This isn't over."

On the other side of the sands, the possessed rancor lowered its head for the charge-

"Grass Priests!" Polla could barely hear herself over the crowd, but she thought she was screaming. "Why is Revan just standing there?"

Zaalbar roared something—maybe a response.

"It scratched her," Dustil Onasi said. "Look."

The stump where the fake left arm had been bleeding. As they watched, blue light rippled over it, almost like a shield.

"I think she's trying to heal—" Carth's kid sounded awed.

"With the Force?" Carth asked the obvious. "Can you help her?"

"Not… not from here." Dustil started to stand up in his seat, but Carth grabbed his arm, pulling him down again.

"Don't," he muttered.

Inse Blaise (who was sitting in front of them) glanced back. "You would stop Lord Malak, slave?"

"Our Lord Malak can heal?" Her sister Mydia added, twisting back in her seat. "Can you reattach severed limbs? What about… say, toes?"

"If you help, you're responsible for ending the duel. Either by killing your opponents, or dying yourself." their brother Phylus interrupted.

"I'm sure Lord Malak knows that!" Mydia elbowed Phylus sharply.

The roar of the crowd brought Polla's attention back to the match. Revan was making another run on the beast now, which was crouched low, shielding its guts from her blade. She jumped into the air-

"Poo doo! That trajectory's all wrong!"

Seiran looked up from the pile of weapons Carth Onasi and his son had left in a plasteel crate in their room. Every impulse, every intuition he had was screaming at him now, screaming this was all trouble.

"We need to get to them." He selected a holstered blaster, sliding it out to check the charge. "Let's go."

"We're too late." Mission's voice reverted to sounding like a machine.

I have a bad feeling-

The HK droid made a frustrated whining noise, like it had a lot to say.

Seiran had had nothing but bad feelings since they'd landed on this sithspawned planet, but this one was different. This one was-worse.

The rancor's clawed hand slammed across just as Revan leaped, lower than before, perhaps tiring. This time, the poisoned talons found purchase, pinning Revan's leg at the knee. She made no sound-at least none heard over the ecstasy of the crowd, but Seiran saw her mouth open, saw the grimace of agony on her features.

The rancor shook her, back and forth, like a kath with a toy. Her head snapped back. Hard.

Sand filled the screen again, buffeted with blue.

Xxx

This isn't how it goes. Polla stood, frozen in shock.

"No," Carth whispered. Zaalbar and the kid were saying things too, but their voices were lost in the roar of the crowd. Carth stood. On his other side, his son grabbed his hand.

"We can't. We can't-"

"No!" Carth said again. He raised his blaster and fired.

The shot scored uselessly across the beast's armored back.

Carth fired again. "Damnit!"

"Dad, you can't-" Dustil said something else, but it was lost in the crowd and then Carth's eyes were glowing red again… and instead of shooting, he was laughing.

"Interference is not forbidden," Tenny-Bro intoned in Carth's voice. "But the rules say the terms must extend to include the new parties. And so, this body must finish the fight now that it has been engaged-"

Polla's right hook lashed out, smashing into Onasi's face.

Still red-eyed and laughing, Tenebrae staggered back.

In front of them, Revan had-Polla wasn't sure what the woman had done. The beast was shaking her back and forth, and she'd activated some kind of blue shielding. But it was hard to tell if the shield was doing any good. The thing had its claws in her, had her pinned against its mouth. Poisoned mouth and poisoned claws. The remains of her white dress were rapidly soaking red.

"A messy end," one of the Sith said in the front row. Two others seemed to be resolving a bet.
"Frack!" Dustil Onasi looked like he was torn between helping his da and trying to rescue whatever remained of Revan Starfire.

Later, Polla would come up with all sorts of reasons for what she did. But when she dreamed about it later—and she did a lot at first—after everything that came after—in her dream she didn't think at all.

In real life, there was simply no time. Dustil was already leaping in the air over the bystanders with a lightsaber in his own hand, Zaalbar was standing, mouth open in a roar. Carth Onasi was frozen, light in his eyes gone out, momentarily disoriented, nose already bloody from her shiner, and Polla Organa angled herself to get a better vector—

Stop this fracking frack this fracking asshole—

It was one smooth movement: Polla's right hand to her left boot, to the snub pistol's grip, to the air, to the red, gleaming eye about fifteen meters away. A small, moving target; but she'd hit harder ones.

She fired.

A bolt of blue, smack. The thing staggered, waving Revan in its grasp. The eye darkened where Polla had scored a hit and the beast roared.

Polla fired again.

And again. The rancor had stopped moving at all, which made it easy. Revan twitched in the monster's claws, but not enough to obscure the shot.

Polla fired once more into the other eye and the monster collapsed, half on top of the Sith Lord's limp body.

The crowd erupted into cheers.

XXX
The Shrieking of Nothing is Killing, Just—

Chapter 56 / The Shrieking of Nothing is Killing, Just—

"Next stop is Katarr." Sion was talking again. So much talking. "You'll like it there. Lots to eat. Miralukan colony. They're all a bit Force-sensitive. Perhaps if you consume an entire planet, you'll take a nap and stop asking to be fed every five minutes."

[""Food."" ] Nihilus walked to the map to see the food. Once, he'd asked his cousin-bastard to kill him, but now he was starving. Nihilus was always starving. Just like Sion was always dead. Sion and Nihilus. Their names had been a joke. He remembered that. He still remembered how to laugh, even without a mouth.

Xxx

"Butcher of Endor, Butcher of Telos, Butcher of Malachor... all rather repetitive." Oerin Lin shrugged. "Put a Darth in front of any word, and at least it sounds distinctive. Sometimes, I see Mother's point."

"That may be the Force compulsion." Davad chuckled, looking down at the training pit in the Sith Embassy. The new Blades were coming along quite well... but the sithlings fighting them were mostly pathetic. "Sion seems a bit close to the nose, in my opinion. Was Darth Mandalore taken?"

Oerin shrugged. "Scion of a noble house... Sion. Perhaps it's dialect. Mother chose it. She decided that you're to be Nihilus. Because of your cheery disposition?" He leaned against the railing. "For the record, I did suggest 'Darth Drexl.'"

"Your mother and her schemes...." Davad took a bite of goreapple, crisp and sweet and hard. And hard. "Here we are, rotting on a fish planet. Lord Malak is dead. Lord Revan is dead. The Sith Empire is all in disarray, and your mother-"

"Mother thinks we rule best from the shadows." Oerin Lin shrugged. "The Pretenders were my idea... I think." He frowned. "At least, they make it interesting."

"Does she really expect us to restore the kolto here on Manaan, or is it all for show?"

"I have no idea. Distraction for the Emperor? Culling the herd? Genuine sentiment for the weak?" Oerin smiled at the match below. "Does it matter?"

The victor of the match had long red braids. She glanced up, hand raised.

Oerin Lin waved back. "I like her."

Even from here, even with so many pretenders, Davad knew that one. Bitterness curdled in his gut. "Sheris was always drawn to power. She must like you too."

"She's beautiful." Oerin Lin looked like he was blushing under the stubble on his chin that wasn't quite a beard. "As a child, I never saw Revan's appeal—but as a man-indisputably, her form is... lithe and pleasing. And Sheris herself... refreshing," He grinned. "Is this a problem?"

Rage was pure and sweet and hard. Davad threw the goreapple away. "Sheris is nothing like Revan.

"I didn't think she was," Oerin shrugged. "And again: do we have a problem?"

Davad exhaled. "Not yet. He had already seen her die once. The second time was easier. And Sith did not grieve. They sated their defeat with victory, or fell trying.

"Perhaps we should find you your own Revan pretender?" Oerin chuckled. "We have so many to choose from now, and all of them are much more convincing than that Jedi persona ever was-"

"Revan is dead. Another one of Traya's failed experiments." Davad's hand curled in a fist, and he watched with dull satisfaction as the red-haired woman below froze, one hand creeping to her throat.

"Don't." Oerin's voice was a low growl. His own hand reached for Davad's arm, Force and raw strength grappling like a vise. For a moment, they stood, poised, eyes locked, the Force channeling a void of darkness between them.

On the fighting grounds below, the red-haired woman in white robes righted herself and wisely fled, leaving the games to be fought by less important fools.

Not yet truly Nihilus, but the hunger already a dull ache-confused, perhaps, with regret for a woman twice dead. On Manaan, Davad's only conscious goal had been to outlast Beya, to live past her even if he kept his word as a prince of Onderon not to take her life—

But Traya had her own plans, and for those, he and Oerin—Nihilus and Sion—had to dance.

XXX

Here in the now, the ship was large and dark and hard and dead. And Nihilus was starving.

Nihilus went to the room with the crates and the frozen shadows. All the carbonite boxes were broken and scattered. His maw ached for meat but there was nothing left.

"I told you to save some." Sion's voice behind him. Following him. Reproving. "Even after we arrive in orbit, it will take several hours to travel to the planet's surface."

["Have them deliver the food,"] Nihilus suggested. In days of old, Beastrider subjects had brought tributes to their kings: gifts of honey and break and smoky, succulent meat-

"That's right. Good boy." Sion wheezed. "Food! You'll have it soon."

XXX

It was the middle of the night on Deralia, and lunchtime on a Seventhday on Coruscant.

Korrie did the math twice to check before he snuck downstairs to use the comm without Molla knowing. He'd already gotten in trouble once-apparently, comm calls cost a lot to Coru from the Outer Rim, and Molla had gotten the bill last time Korrie had called home. She'd said it wasn't the money, only the safety-thing…but he'd seen the bill. Three thousand credits sounded like a lot.

He'd have to ask Leeshy to wire her compensation for that call—and this one too. Korrie couldn't figure out a way to stop the bills from coming, so he'd just have to pay them. Moll was really, really nice to him—nicer than Grandfather had been most of the time—and the other kids from his riding lessons were cool, but he hated always having to lie.
Sometimes, like Grandfather used to say, you just needed to talk to someone, and you had to make absolutely sure it was either a psychdroid you could reprogram later, or someone who had signed a confidentiality agreement, and who knew you like family. He trusted Moll-Moll okay now, but she wasn't family. Both of his mothers were gone, Grandfather was dead, and Father's ghost was probably still haunting that mean kid, Dustil Onasi (also not family).

So, there was no one left to talk to except Leeshy, Second of House Racharn. She wasn't family yet, but she was his betrothed.

Now, her holoimage was smiling back while Korrie curled up on the sofa next to the spiderworm plant, cradling the heavy comm unit on his lap under the knitted sofa-blanket. Moll had told him she'd made the sofa-blanket herself from Imperial-grade eridu. Korrie liked it because it felt like the sheets back home.

"You had a dream?" Leeshy asked again. "I told you, I just saw her on a vid."

"I had a dream my first mother died," Korrie repeated. "On that Sith planet. You're sure it's not true?"

If it was true, wouldn't he have dreamed of her ghost like he used to with Father? Would it even be her ghost though? Or that mean Sheris-lady's?

"I saw her fighting these monsters, and she won. The crowd cheered and everything. Leesa got a Jedi servant to translate the vid for us." Leeshy's head vanished from the comm screen for a sec and then popped up again. "Just sent you a copy I made. It's encrypted with our secret password. I spliced in the subtitles too."

The secret password was 'Dracheev.' It was their names all mixed up, for when they were the older and married and could rule things.

"Thanks!" Korrie adjusted the comm unit next to his datapad on his lap, and keyed open his mail file. When he unloaded the file, the sound blasted into the room. Hastily, he turned it down, watching.

"You're watching it right now?" Leeshy craned her neck to see. "Resolution's all funny, watching it from a vid across the galaxy. Your planet needs better infrastructure."

"It's not my planet," he pointed out. "Deralia's independent. I told you."

"Independents," she scoffed.

Mother was good in a fight, and Korrie was glad to know she was okay. And glad Leeshy had told him she was okay before he watched, because there were a few times that looked pretty choppy for her against that rancor-monster. He still didn't really relax until the vid cut out (kind of abruptly) with the crowd cheering.

"My sister sent me to my room," Leeshy explained. "That's why it's all jerky at the end. I was hiding the recorder and I had to stand up fast."

"Did you find out where my other mother is?" Korrie asked. Mother had said she couldn't call, couldn't risk anything that might trace back to him on Deralia—not until they were safe… but Korrie had seen a lot of vids and been in Eglatine school for years. He knew there was no safe.
He wished she'd just call anyway.

"No, but the Fleet want Revan really bad?" Leeshy sighed. "I don't think Leesa cares about her though. She's all into the trading with the Sith thing right now. She even got me a Sith language teacher, but then the lady just quit."

"The Sith are evil," Korrie reminded her. "They use slaves. And my mothers are going to kick their asses."

"If they don't, we will." Leeshy promised.

"When we're older." Molla-Moll was teaching him to shoot a rifle, which might come in handy. "How's everyone at school?"

"Oh! I guess you didn't hear! Agnis Makeon is a Fourth now. And Dummy Phin…." Leeshy made a face and drew a finger across her throat, making dramatic choking noises.

"Really?" His eyes widened.

"Really!" Leeshy curled her legs up under and leaned back, getting ready to tell Korrie everything.

XXX

Mekel must have dozed off, because when he woke again, Lydie Korr was across the room and fully clothed, staring at the comm unit in her lap. She began speaking the second his eyes opened—as if she'd been waiting for him to wake. "I spoke to Azen an hour ago. He and the other masters are taking a shuttle down from the High Admiral's flagship."

"Oh." Mekel sat up. "How long was I asleep?"

"A few hours." Lydie smiled slightly. "Did you know that you snore?"

"I do not!" He tried to use his sleeve to wipe the bit of drool from his stubble and still look suave. "Did you tell Azen to tell those Fleet officers about Dustil only pretending to be Malak?"

"I sent the message." She frowned. "You need to dress… and—"

"Leave. Right." Mekel grinned at her, sliding out from under the covers. "Loanin might wonder why I'm napping here, huh?"

Her skin flushed, and she averted her eyes when he stood. "We can't do this again."

"No more naps?" Mekel grinned to show her he got it, even if he didn't like it. Was she serious? You're the one who's fracking married, Lydie Korr. "Why?"

"It's not… appropriate. I don't think either of our… partners would approve."

Partners? You're the one with a partner. How can Telos be my partner if he's so much more powerful than I am? Or dead. By the time I get to Kaas, he could be dead.

"So that was it? That was the last time?" Mekel tried to sound like he didn't give a frack; but if she'd told him before, he would have made it count. And last longer.

"I think it's for the best," Lydie nodded. "You're going off on your mission to rescue Dustil Onasi on Dromund Kaas."
"Right." Mekel had said he was going to save Dustil. He'd said a lot of things, without bothering to think them through, whispering them into her skin, like she was his magic charm. "I'll go. Did Loanin-did Azen-say what the Fleet was gonna do about Dustil and his dads and the others?" He felt a pang of guilt for not mentioning the Wookiee or the real Polla Organa bint, but they were nulls anyway.

_They won't make it no matter what I do. Nulls don't make it on a planet like that, just like on Korriban-

"No." Lydie Korr's cheeks tinged pink. "But Azen wants to see you. He's with your father and Master Kavar. They want to know exactly what you know. Everything they can about the Sith Emperor and Dromund Kaas."

_Everything?_ Mekel felt his face scowl. _Like they didn't ask questions before? Everything is fracked. The Masters want to know? Do they want to help?_

"Good thing I'm here already." He lifted his arm, catching a whiff. "Should I get dressed first?"

"I put your things in the fresher." She was strange and stiff and formal and looking at him like he was poison. "If you hurry, you can take a sonic and dress here."

"Nicer than the communal freshers," Mekel drawled. "Thanks. You... uh, you want to take a sonic with me?"

"No. We can't do this again," she repeated firmly. Her horns were flushed pink, and her lips were parted. An errant lock of hair coiled on her forehead. Rather pointedly, she picked up a datapad and began scrolling through it.

Mekel took the fracking hint.

XXX

They were in Rensha's private quarters, with a line open to the bridge one level below. More the illusion of privacy than the actual. On the viewscreen before them, Katarr slept, the outline of the Fleet's ships etched in holographic outline around its equator.

"We are not a tyranny," High Admiral Rensha told the Telosian Human. "And this is not a coup." She folded her claws. "But there can be no hesitation. No deviation from orders.... I need to know that my officers understand-and agree-with our difficult choice."

Admiral Rew Ekkumi nodded slowly. "Whatever _that_ Revan's intentions were on Dromund Kaas-"

"They no longer matter." It was pleasing, when subordinates made the proper connections.

Rew frowned her tiny flattened Human face. "But Malak D'Reev...?"

"Is still on the Sith homeworld with the Sith Emperor. And all Sith must be stopped." Rensha nodded, and waved at the screen, panning past Revan Starfire's (or Sheris Darkstar's) broken body, to the figure of Carth Onasi. Even in the haze of the holocam's last still, his eyes were clearly glowing red.

"And Captain Onasi is possessed." The Telosian blinked rapidly a few times, and wiped her eyes. "So that's it, then. That's-"

Rensha's private comm channel pinged. _"High Admiral?"_
"Yes?" Rensha held up one talon, indicating silence to the Human. Yikas was comming, she recognized the Quarren tones of his voder. Her steward wouldn't interrupt if it wasn't important.

"A Sith warship just uncloaked. It appears to be using its interdiction engines to pull another ship out of hyperspace."

"Ah." It was not even a surprise. Rensha glanced at Rew. "Hold the Fleet cloaked for now, but maneuver our own ships to surround the intruder. Visual onscreen."

The image appeared so quickly that Rensha was sure Yikas must have already began the transmission before her request. The great, wedge-shaped hulk was like the skull of some great beast, blue light flickering over the hole in its maw—from a distance, almost an eye.

The last time Rensha had seen this perversion of Force magic and science, it had been in dry docks in an orbital above Kuat. The engineers had doubted it could ever be space-worthy again. Obviously, Mandalorians had better engineers, for all the bays of the Aleema were now lit up, and the interdiction engines crackled—

"Vulnerable now," Rew Ekkumi spoke the obvious. As a new admiral, perhaps she felt she had to prove herself. "As long as they're shunting power to generate the gravity wells, their shields are down. If we blast them now—"

"We would risk losing the prize they are pulling out of hyperspace," Rensha finished the sentence. "At best, their prize breaks free and continues its journey. At worst, their prize breaks apart. Would you sacrifice the Harbinger ’s crew so easily?"

"We don't know the Harbinger is the ship they're retrieving. It could be one of their own. It could be anything—"

"Yikas!" Rensha interrupted her underling again. Rew Ekkumi would be a better commander if she could stop her pointless ruminating with her blunt Human teeth. "Do we have any Jedi still in the fleet?"

"The last of them were sent planetside on your orders two hours ago—"

Good. Because our real prey is expected soon. The timing of this was all surprisingly good. Suspiciously good, perhaps. But Rensha had run the scenarios a dozen times on her simulators. The only sticking point she saw was the Aleema itself, but if its main cannon were disabled just prior to their departure...

"Make sure every ship has its sensors set to max. There may be other cloaked Mandalorian ships...."

A hammerhead cruiser popped into existence, low beneath the Aleema’s belly.

"The Harbinger has just been pulled out of hyperspace by the Aleema, " Yikas reported. "Its commander has transmitted a coded distress signal indicating that Revan Starfire and a small band of Mandalorian mercenaries have taken over the ship."

"Mandalorians are predictable," High Admiral Rensha noted. "Is there any sign they know we're here?"

"Shields are still down, looks like they're powering up the tractor beam."

"In other words, no." Admiral Rew Ekkumi stood up slowly. "Good."
"So, you see?" Rensha bared her fangs in a smile.

"I see." Rew glanced at the frozen holostill of Captain Onasi again. "We will need to run an assessment of the Aleema's current offensive capability immediately. Jiya and Cein would know better than most. They fought her before-"

XXX

The proximity alarms were going off, flashing the bridge with white and blue light. For a moment, time slipped, and Revan was standing on another ship, in another time.

I don't want to die like this. No one should die like this. Every spacer's nightmare—

"Tractor beam's pulling us in," one of the Harbinger officers announced, jerking her back to the present. Revan looked up at the ship's main controls, still meters away. The space was occupied by a pair of nervous Sullustans. She smiled at them.

Don't panic. This isn't like the Leviathan—

Next to the Harbinger officer, Canderous's daughter smiled triumphantly. "Our tractor beam is pulling this vessel to our docking bay," she corrected.

Dak Vesser's expression was murderous as he called his now-broken lightsaber back to his hand from where Revan had thrown it on the ground.

Need to win him over so he can show me how to fix a fracked crystal, and maybe do some of that shielding. The thought was absent-minded, as Revan was already focusing back on Commander Cody, who looked at her like she'd just blown up his blasted fracking planet.

He wasn't the only one. For every crew member who had joined them taking over this ship, there were three in the brig, and more in hiding. She could sense them—sparks of light, mostly clustered near the escape pods, but if they began to organize, if she sensed anything like a last-ditch offensive—

"Tell your men to stand down," Revan told Commander Cody. "There have been no casualties yet, and I want to keep it that way."

Millifar coughed. "Technically, three of their suits failed when they tried to flank us coming through one of the maintenance shafts; but it was really the force of the depressurization when we blew them out the airlock that killed them—"

"There have been only minimal casualties," Revan amended. "Commander Cody?"

"What?" He was dull and vacant-eyed now. "Do you think the Republic will stand for this?"

"They're not here," Revan pointed out, glancing up at the nav chart projected in front of the view port. It was strange—they'd won, but now every nerve in her body felt raw and exposed. "Speaking of here… where are we?" The stars aligned as she recognized one of the constellations, answering her own question. "Frack. Vensori sector? Why?"

"Katarr orbit, in the Vensori system," Millifar said. Formally, as if she was reporting. "In orbit around the sole planet. It was the closest jump point."

"Katarr…." Commander Cody looked up at the chart as if he was just noticing it. Inexplicably, he started to laugh.
"Maybe clear the bridge, put in our own people," Canderous prompted Revan in Mandalorian. "That one's useless. Crazy."

"I'm not crazy! And my people won't harm this ship," Cody snapped in Basic.

Revan looked at the planet, spinning peacefully below. Four moons hovered in a trail across a sea-green surface, dusted with clouds. It looked peaceful, but something—

_I remember that Cody said Katarr was our destination when they captured us. If it was always the Republic's intent to bring us here... why?_

_Where are their forces? Are they going to meet us? Are they already on the planet? But surely, the Fleet would have some ships monitoring our progress—_

Their ship lurched again as the _Aleema's_ tractor beam steadied its grip. The _Aleema_ grew larger in the viewpoint, sleek and gray and sharp and perfect—except for the haze of shielding around the side of its bridge, the heavy blast scores.

_That's it. That's where you died, Dar'Revan. That's where I died—where we—that's where we died, Dar. The first time._

Looking at the ruined bridge now, Revan felt nothing—except the creeping sense of unease. The rest of the ship was flawless—but something was wrong.

_Hessi walking over my grave—except they don't have hessi in fracking space—_

"The planet," she muttered to Dak. "Do you feel that? The Force? What's wrong with the planet?"

It looked peaceful, but the Force was wrapped tightly around its placid surface, like a coiled spring —

"It's a Miralukan colony," he said calmly. But his eyes were narrowed, and a muscle twitched in his cheek. "Do you sense their presence? Most of them have some Force sensitivity—"

_Lying. He's lying. "No. More than that."_ When Revan closed her eyes, the sense of menace increased. The sense of... presence increased. The menace felt... cold, like a storm building above them. _Elsewhere_. But the presence was—different. The presence was—many. The presence was... calm. _Waiting._

"It's the... planet. Or... above the planet!" _Like before. Like with the Harbinger when it was cloaked. But this is bigger. Louder... or something._ "Something isn't right—"

_Xxx_

_The Star Forge grew in the viewscreen, ever—larger. But even with her eyes closed Revan could sense the Republic ships surrounding them—and each one containing a thousand points of light—_

Cloaked? Pathetic fools. Do they think they can hide from us? _Bastila's thought or her own? They had to be united in purpose. It made no difference, not here. Not at the end of all things._

"Here," Canderous said, setting a bottle on the nav board beside her. "One more drink before the war. You game?"

_Cloaked, but I see them. Every ship has a thousand crewmembers, roughly, and there are twenty ships—twenty thousand lives opposing my will, between me and Malak and every one a wretched waste—_
"Drink," her Second repeated, shoving the bottle in her hand. Revan did so automatically, her mind still lost in the stars, lost counting an idle tally of those puny, wasted lives still standing between her and Malak—

XXX

"The planet," Dak repeated. "A Miralukan colony world. The Force is strong here." But he wasn't staring at her, he was staring at his commander. As Revan watched, Cody gave an almost imperceptible nod—

The Republic wanted us here. Cody said they were taking us to Katarr when they captured us. That means—

"Aleema! Raise shields! Cloaked! They have cloaked ships! " Her senses struggled to count, but the more Revan focused, the more she felt overwhelmed, until the placid planet beneath them seemed wrapped in a haze of hate and fear and anger—

Dak laughed harshly. "Took you that long?" His expression was… smug.

Revan bit back the sudden urge she had to silence him. "The Republic Fleet is cloaked." So obvious, Revan felt like a di'kut for not realizing it immediately.

Closest jump point—of course, it's a trap. "Surrounding us. A-a-lot of them. More than… a lot."

Probably some fracking military term for being this badly outnumbered. Now that she was aware, her senses screamed of nothing but.

Canderous nodded, the lines in his face showing no surprise. "Aemelie?"

"Nothing on sensors, but they have our cloaking tech, so it's possible. Occasionally, the barbarians do something worthy of respect. Raising aft shields, but until you're docked we can't raise portside. Give me coordinates, and we can lock onto the best targets. Isn't that a Jett'ai trick? Revan?"

Millifar had walked over to one of the weapons desks, blaster held lightly in her hand. "Third Wife? Coordinates?"

Revan's eyes went to the map, and Polla's knowledge supplied numbers, as some forgotten part of her own began to calculate trajectories, probable arrays or orbit. "Hold," she said. "No… no shooting. Can you… just bring us in faster? Angle down to delta on the zee, veering towards Harbinger's ex—vector at ninety, keep stable?"

"That puts both of our ships close to atmosphere. I assume their orbits are higher." Aemelie sounded more thrilled than concerned. "We will be able to target all of them that way."

"And our own?" Canderous asked his wife. The Mandalorians were all speaking Mandalorian, but Revan was watching the faces of the crew carefully, and it looked like several of them understood.

We should get them all out of here. Evacuate all that aren't loyal immediately—but there's no time.

"Our main forces are too far away. The two cruisers accompanying us are close, but they have no shields worthy of this fight."

"Keep them back," Revan snapped. "Edge of system and cloaked. If we drop lower, the Republic ships will be fighting gravity to keep us in range too. They can't hold this formation forever, and if… if our forces need to pick them off—" after they blow us out of the sky—"maintaining a lower orbit will strain their resources. Soften them."

_Some small, hollow victory._

Canderous chuckled softly, but did not countermand her order.

"They'll take your actions as provocation," Cody said in accented Mandalorian too, apparently abandoning any pretense of ignorance. "You have to know that. Anything less than a surrender is an act of war."

"They're the ones who are cloaked! Can the _Aleema_ handle an atmospheric orbit? At the cloud line?" _So low they'd smoke the planet beneath if they fired on us?_

"In this gravity? Maybe…. As long as the weather patterns are stable—" Kex broke in and then blushed. "I mean… permission to speak?"

One of the gunners made a garbled noise that sounded like a prayer.

"Not literally!" _Fracking soldiers. Worse than Mandalorians. Half a fracking brain cell between any of them!_

_No time in battle for thought. No time for consensus, no time for calculation—each action a split second, a path shown by the Force itself—you must make them follow you either through loyalty, fear, or coercion—_

The voice in her head almost sounded like Dar.

_The battle would be a rout. But they seem to want us—or at least this crew—alive. I need to use that to our advantage. How can I use that?_

"We can certainly lower ourselves to use the planet as our cowardly shield," Aemelie cut in over the commlink. "But as long as the Republic osiks surround us, they cannot fire without hitting their own ships—"

_But they can move unseen and we can't—not with this tractor holding us up. "There's no glory in this battle. I will not risk you—or your ship. They want us alive, or we'd all be dead already. We are outnumbered. By—a lot." Kriffing technical term for a crapload more ships than we have?_

Canderous's daughter stalked back over to the command bank, muttering something under her breath.

"Milli—" Canderous said sharply.

His daughter nodded at him, and raised the comm's mic.

"Attention: crew of the Harbinger. General Starfire is your commander now." Millifar was broadcasting her words over the ship's main channel. "Follow her, and you may all yet overcome the shame of your bloodless capture by our smaller and minimally-armed forces."

A few of their own troopers—the ones marked with the red hand on their armor—stepped forward at that, hands on their guns. The military discipline of the room almost visibly cracked, as the crew around them began whispering amongst themselves.
"Good job, Milli, insulting the forces we just won over—"

"Uh… give me the commlink, okay?" Revan walked over to Canderous's daughter, well aware that her position put her back to Cody. She pivoted, leaning back against the command banks, as Millifar pressed the mic into her hands. It was cabled, tethered to the board, and several lights flashed green on its surface.

"I'm going to eject the escape pods," she said over the comm—then mentally cursed herself. "I mean, this is your… this is Revan." And I need to sound like it. "This is Fett Revan Starfire D'Reev Lin Ordo Onasi. I have command of your vessel. The Harbinger will be docking in my ship soon. Any of you who don't want to be our prisoners you should… get in the escape pods. Now. Before I eject them all."

"There's no centralized bridge command to release the pods," Cody objected. "You can't release them from here. Tell them to evacuate. In fact… let us all evacuate. You want our ship? You can have the damn ship."

"Oh?" The commander was too eager. Frack it though. Less of them is better. Less casualties if the Republic Fleet decides to kill us all— "Fine. Evacuate at will," Revan said into the mic. "Uh… leave. If you want."

"Masterful," Millifar rolled her eyes at Kex and Revan saw the boy bite back a laugh.

"Good luck," she offered, regretting that instantly too. She switched off the link, turning towards Commander Cody. "How do I—can we hail the Republic forces?"

The muscles in his jaw clenched. He wouldn't meet her eyes, kept staring at the ruin of the ship's ceiling above his head, where she had ripped back the armored plating in order to take the bridge. "Are you… you just said we could leave."

Obstructive ass!

"I meant your forces outside of this room. In the escape pods. If I let you leave in the remaining snubs, how do I know you won't fire on us?"

"It would be amusing for them to try," Aemelie noted over the comm.

The Harbinger rocked back and forth, as they swung sharply closer, reeled in by the Aleema's tractor beam. On screen, the pods from the Harbinger's own sides launched into space. As Revan watched, one of them seemed to slam into an invisible wall and explode. She felt the lives within wink out.

Five. Five lives. There, and then gone. There, and then gone. Next to her, Dak winced.

A grid flickered around the debris, and for a moment, they all saw the whitish hull of one of the cloaked ships.

"Their ships are too close! The escape pods—"

"Nothing we can do," Canderous grunted.

Another glanced off the side of a momentarily visible cruiser, and spun, sparking away at a bad angle.
"It's going to ram back into us—Revan closed her eyes and took a deep breath, trying to feel the sparks inside, use them to judge the velocity, push, down—"

"Once you're docked, we can go to hyperspace immediately," Aemelie added.

"What?" Revan blinked. The pod was falling freely now, frantic sparks within stilled, either because they were strapping into their crash seats, or unconscious. Slow, slow, angle it down—

"Once we're docked in the Aleema's bay we'll make a jump," Canderous said.

"Can they pull a ship the size of the Aleema out of hyperspace?"

"They could try," Aemelie said cheerfully.

Revan heard her breath exhale, as the pod's arc stabilized once more. When she opened her eyes, Dak was watching her, brown eyes wide.

"I-I think you saved them," he said softly.

"Maybe." She wrenched her attention back to their own readouts, the conversation going on around them. Revan raised her voice. "I need to speak to the Fleet command," she said. "Are they blocking us? Did you try... uh, hailing them?"

"We can open a channel on their coded frequency now," Millifar sniffed. "Right, Kex?"

"I've descrambled the signatures." The Mandalorian kid squared his shoulders. "Transmit at will."

Revan raised the commlink again, nodding at him. "Good." When the light flashed green, she began speaking. "Unknown Republic vessels, this is Fett Revan Starfire D'Reev Lin Ordo Onasi. We have full control over this vessel. Please... uh, move out of your current formation, and uncloak. We know you're there...." She caught Millifar's bored expression and tried not to wince.

"You need to stop saying, 'please.'" Canderous chuckled. He sat down in one of the vacated officer's chairs, and put his feet up on the console, pulling out the short-nosed blaster from its compartment on his thigh, and snapping open the cells to cycle through. "They'll try and wait you out. Test your mettle."

"And?" She tried to match his nonchalance.

"And, they won't fire on their own—not so directly. This is not the time for a fight." Canderous stared at Millifar, until his daughter looked away, nodding slowly.

"Try and keep us over populations centers, Milli," Revan suggested. They won't fire on innocents. They're not... her. Me. Mandalorian.

"I knew you'd say that," the girl muttered, but she gestured to the navigator, and the Sullustan nodded slowly.

"I told you she'd say that," Aemelie added.

"Your allies are right." Dak Vesser looked like he smelled something bad, giving any credit to Mando'a'de, but he nodded slowly. "They're pulling back."

"Some." Revan could sense it too—a little. The lights of life on the other ships were farther away now, but the aura of menace, of… doom… remained.

She leaned over the comm again. "Republic ships! We have the remaining members of the Harbinger's crew here. This is a negotiation."

The commmlink crackled. "No," said a voice. "It is not."

A hammerhead warship appeared on their skyward bow. And then another, drifting in a formation so precise it made Revan’s breath catch. The proximity alarms shrilled again, but Revan was still staring forward into still-empty space, where she suddenly knew—

The Great Hunt, the Aurebesh letters said, as the larger bulk of the capital flagship emerged, almost close enough to the Aleema’s bow above them to ram her. The ship dominated their viewscreen, and suddenly the entire field was bathed in the harsh light of a new tractor beam, as the Great Hunt locked on too.

Their world twisted, as the Harbinger jerked, stern upending. The turbines screamed, thrusters going as they swung upended, gravity generators working overtime to compensate.

Two tractor beams—they’re going to tear us apart!

The Harbinger groaned, now beset on two sides. Alarms rang—and again, time dislocated: for a moment becoming a different bridge—

XXX

The stranger smiled, a teasing smile, almost flirtatious—maybe sly. His mouth was a little like Therion’s—like a knife. His eyes were yellow, his cheekbones sharp as the blade of his mouth. The skin on his face was nearly gray, but it should have been brown—

"Your ship's under attack."

XXX

The Polla in her memory didn't react, but in the present, Revan heard herself gasp.

That was Davad Arkan.

Where was I—when was that?

"Revan. Tell your ship to stand down." The new voice over the comm channel was familiar too. Female, with an almost familiar sibilant hiss. Almost familiar, but she couldn't quite place—

"The Aleema is not under Revan’s command now, but mine. I am General Aemelie Ordo, Second Wife of Canderous Ordo."

"Let go of us," Revan added. "Your Republic soldiers on the Harbinger are unharmed. Release our vessel to ensure they stay that way."

Perhaps as a response, the Harbinger's stern twisted sideways again with a tortured metal groan—Another alarm went off. "Hull breaches on Decks three, four and six," one of the officers reported.

XXX
His laughter was soft, as if this was all some kind of bad joke. "The two interdictors that pulled the Endar Spire out of orbit have set up opposing tractor beams. Currently the Leviathan and Demon Moon are pulling your ship apart."

XXX

Before Taris, all of Revan's memories were a blur after the canyon wall. Faces. Bastila's face. Voices. Some more distinct than others.

None were Davad Arkan.

But he was there on the Endar Spire? He was there too—he said they had two interdictors that would tear our ship apart—

"Frack! Disengage!" Instinctive. The fear was adrenaline. Revan almost dropped the comm. "Aemelie! Stop the tractor before they fracking tear us in half!"

Vacuum, it's so cold in space. Every spacer's worst nightmare—

"That's the High Admiral's flagship," Millifar noted, voice calm. Force knew how she knew. "Destroying it would be a victory—"

"We aren't fighting! This isn't—" A part of her mind noted the torpedo arrays, the vulnerable ship's belly turning towards them. They could use the tractor beam's own energy, load it up with armaments, sending them straight in, while punching the forward repulsors—

Didn't work when you tried that with the Hawk, Revan's mind whispered. The Ebon Hawk didn't have the same firepower and the Leviathan was shielded—

Aemelie's voice. "Republic ships, we have our guns targeting troop carriers. Any further act of aggression will be seen as an act of war."

"No, it—" Revan caught Canderous's head shake, a moment before she reached to transmit again. "Open a wider comm channel," she snapped. "All beams, get everything in range. There are more ships out there. A… a lot more."

Twelve in orbit—and... more, beyond. Their crews were clusters of life in the overlay of her vision: like fires in the sky above the planet.

"Yes, sir." The communications officer nodded, turning the dial even as the Harbinger commander glared at them both.

All of this to trap us? Me? They must think I'm a fracking genius if I even have a snowball's chance in nine hells of getting us out of this.

Some battles you cannot win. The trick then, is not to fight. Not that different than running spice through a fracking impossible blockade—

"Republic ships," Revan began. "This is Revan Starfire, in command of the Harbinger. We are your allies, not your enemies in this fight—"

XXX

Their names had been a joke once. Darth Nihilus and Darth Sion. A joke. How long ago was that? Nihilus did not know.
Time was only measured in meals. They had left a planet after Nihilus had eaten everything—the small ones in hiding, the two angry morsels who drew their sabers and demanded a fight, the flock of dreamers in an old shrine who did not know their own power—and now they were here again.

On the ship. Sion had promised a feast.

Kill me, Nihilus had once told the bastard Kavar Vakla; but too late now. Now, was too hungry to die. Now, he wanted the feast.

But the ship was hard and empty. Nothing to eat, just the other pacing back and forth. Restless. Sion the other was hungry too. Hungry, but too slow to hunt.

Not too slow to talk. Too much talking.

Sion chucked at him like a hungry cannock. "Did you know… our former master's body is not on the side of the volcano where we left her?" Sion wheezed, pacing back and forth, expending useless energies. Expending useless Force. Force too dead to eat. "I had the shadows scan for biosigns—Mother did not die there. She may not be dead at all."

Sion ruined the Force. He did not yet understand his place. Nihilus ate Force—the live Force that the other did not want. The other—Sion—ate nothing. His flesh rotted off bones. What could the other eat to sustain? What did Darth Sion need?

Food. Same as Nihilus, only different.

"Can you tell if she is dead? I can't sense anything." Sion came closer. Closer enough to eat if he'd been food. They were both so hungry.

["You need different food," Nihilus told him.

"What was that, food?" Sion coughed.

"I think he's hungry again," said the pilot.

They'd grown closer, the pilot and Nihilus. Close enough to feel the pulse of the poor null's mad mind. The thud of the man's heart was a reassuring downbeat to Sion's sad bleating.

"He's definitely hungry," the pilot croaked. The pilot liked to think he had a name and that name was Jasp.

"You can hear him?" Sion's face didn't really hold expression easily, but at least he still had one.

"I… don't know. I can just… tell."

"He ate three padawans, two masters and that cluster of Force sensitives we found in that religious retreat on Ord Mantell and cleaned out the last of our frozen supplies yesterday." The other sighed, a gust of wind through his chest. "He needs to wait for Katarr. There should be food there."

The other's name was Sion, and his name was Nihilus. Sion and Nihilus. Their names had been a joke once.

XXX

"I'm a fallen Jedi already. Why do I need to adopt a Sith pseudonym? Davad Arkan is the Butcher of Endor. The galaxy already trembles in fear."

"Mother said," Oerin shrugged. "I mean Darth Traya. If you hate the name she's chosen, make another—it can hardly be worse...."

XXX

Now, Nihilus knew the names did not matter. Nothing was worse than hunger when there was food.

XXX

As it turned out, Mekel and Lydie had another awkward hour before the Jedi came. Another awkward hour, while she read the same datapad and he picked up and discarded ten, trying not to look her in the eye. Suddenly, she put the datapad down, her face turning toward the doorway like a Corusec with radar. "They're here," she murmured softly.

"Yes," she nodded, cheeks pink again.

Several more awkward and silent minutes followed before Azen and Vrook walked in the fracking door. Kavar wasn't with them.

Azen walked over to his wife and kissed her. Didn't last long, but it looked like he meant it. "I'm sorry we were delayed," he murmured. "They kept us all in chambers for some time—"

"The First of Racharn sent a comm message." Lydie was holding his hands and looking adoringly into his eyes. "She wanted to know if you'd seen the new Revan vid from Dromund Kaas." She shrugged. "I wasn't sure how to respond so I told her you were in a meeting."

"Accurate and astute." Azen kissed the tip of his wife's nose, smiling like he wasn't a smug asshole. "What new vid? Did she provide a copy? Any other reference points?"

"She did, yes. But I haven't opened it yet." Lydie smiled back at him, like he was the only sent in the galaxy. Mekel wasn't jealous—Mekel didn't get jealous—and Telos was alive, after all, and this was just a thing, but—

"Well?" Lydie walked forward eagerly, smiling at her husband, while Mekel tried to look fracking microscopic, or at least not like he was sleeping with Azen Loanin's wife. "Did it go well? When you told them?"

"We were not given the opportunity." Azen frowned directly at Mekel, maybe wondering why he was there in their quarters, sitting not four meters away from the bed he'd fracked Azen's wife on. A lot. Had she changed the bedsack? It was gray. Had it always been?

Dear Old Dads cleared his throat sharply. "We did leave a message with the High Admiral's second-in-command, but Rensha was in closed chambers all day." He grimaced. "After being held waiting for hours, we were returned to this planet with no explanation given."

"Well, frack them." Mekel didn't bother to hide his anger. "We're gonna rescue Dustil, right? I-I've seen the planet. Probably better we sneak in anyway. I can tell you where we need to go—"

"Mekel." Dear Old Dads had somehow inserted himself between Mekel and the happy couple. "We should return to our quarters now. I'm sure the Loanins would like some time alone."

"But we need to go soon!" Mekel hadn't realized how fracking stupid that would sound until the words left his mouth. "I mean, it's Captain Onasi too. And... Revan." Dear old Revan. My fracking
"cousin. "I thought you guys would at least want to rescue her!"

"Sheris Loran," Loanin corrected like the smug prick he was. "The body of Sheris Loran is on Dromund Kaas—with Revan's memories. The Fleet has captured the real Revan Starfire—apparently, they're bringing her to us."

"Why…?" Mekel looked at Master Vrook, but dear Old Dads just shrugged.

"She is the Jedi's responsibility." Loanin's face was perfectly smooth, angles like a fracking Jedi statue. It wasn't really fair that someone so good-looking was that much of a prick.

Why the frack would she go along with that? Does she want to be stuck in the salt trap with the rest of us?

"Sheris took the holocron of Revan's memories," dear Old Dads added. "I do not know if they have one plan between them, or two—and will not until I speak to Revan."

"They were working together," Mekel said, shrugging. "I think." Or, Malak had thought so. Mekel didn't give a shit. "You sure the Fleet are bringing Revan here?" You sure they really captured her and not the other way around?

Uln thought he'd captured her too. She ripped him inside out.

They were in the tent, but Mekel couldn't help but glance up towards the sky, where supposedly the Republic Fleet lurked all cloaked and stealthy, waiting to save them all from the Force-sucking Sith Lord.

Unless they frack it up and we all die. Or they just want to get rid of us.

"We have no assurances." Vrook sighed again, even more heavily. He seemed to be staring too hard at Mekel's face. Was he looking for fracking family resemblances?

"So, can Revan cancel out this Sith Lord Force-suck?" That would be useful. Is there anything you can't do, cousin fracking Starfire? Or not fracking cousins—frack—not that I want to frack my fracking cousin—

Telos would be laughing his ass off at this chivhole, if he were here.

"That isn't how—" Vrook's voice cut out abruptly. His head turned up, toward the sky.

Lydie was frowning too, but as Mekel watched, her face smoothed over, etched with a strange distance. When he turned to look, all the Jedi were reacting the same, all heads tilted toward the sky, like they all heard the same frequency, just out of fracking reach.

"Oh!" Lydie's voice was surprised. "Is that—?"

"I believe so," Loanin nodded. "No other source carries such a distinctive signature."

"Outside," Vrook snapped, pivoting like he was on rollers and heading for the door. Mekel followed him, vaguely aware that Lydie and Azen were following too, because he could hear them behind him, even if his permanently-dulled senses told him nothing at all.

Outside, the sky was darkening with dusk—or—it took Mekel a second to realize the shadows cast on the ground weren't caused by the time of day at all. It was midday here in fracking Jedi Camp valley—midday, and a fleet of ships hung low over the world, blocking out the sun.
"Is this the Force-sucking guy?" Mekel asked, because seriously, they should have prepared some kind of bolt hole. "Force-sucking guy's here?"

"No." It was Loanin who answered, neck craned toward the ships above, as if he could tell too. "Revan. Her Force signature is remarkably loud when provoked."

Lydie's eyes were wide, as if she sensed it too. "I-I heard her cry out, that time… in the Temple; but this is—different. It's not panic."

Deafened to whatever the frack this was, Mekel could only look up. One of the ships—the one flying lowest—was larger than the others. Larger, with that sleek, triangular shape he still saw sometimes in his dreams. Sometimes his dreams, because they'd traveled on ships made by the Star Forge from Korriban. Field trips. Recruitment drives… that peculiar smell of dark side energy and fear and new metal—but sometimes not just his. Sometimes Malak's dreams too. Malak had known that ship. He had dreamed of it too.

"That's the Aleema," Mekel pointed out. "And the Mando'ade own it now. So, are Revan and the Mandalorians working with the Fleet to take down this Sith asshole?"

"I don't… know," Vrook said, even as Mekel noted the sparks of shielding, the too-close proximity of the hammerheads to the larger Star Forge vessel. One ship tilted between the Aleema and one of the Fleet capitals hanging above, and Mekel saw the shimmer of what looked like a tractor beam, tracers of what looked like escape pods arcing from the sky.

They're all too close to this fracking planet. It'd be hilarious if they crashed. Crashed and wiped us all out. Jedi, Fleet, Revan Fracking Starfire. All in one go.

He laughed, and immediately regretted it, because Lydie Korr was staring at him now, with those big blue eyes, as if he'd suggested they all join the fracking Mando'ade. (Given everything else, that didn't even seem like a bad plan.)

"Maybe comm those Fleet admirals," Mekel suggested. "Tell them not to wipe us all out if they start shooting?"

"Mekel—" Lydie began.

"No." Loanin, of all people nodded slowly. "Mekel's right."

Xxx

It was Rear Admiral Cein's ship, and technically General Jiya Sand was only here on an advisory capacity. Or as a witness.

"Republic ships," Revan's voice was like a ghost on the comm. "This is Revan Starfire, in command of the Harbinger. We are your allies, not your enemies in this fight. Please stand down and let us rejoin our companions aboard the Aleema—"

"Allies?" A girl's voice.

"We're gonna have to work on your discipline, Milli." Man's voice now. "If we all make it through."

"Republic ships," the woman repeated. "This is Revan Starfire. I have your men unharmed. We wish nothing but a cessation of hostilities and an alliance against the Sith "Empire." Crackle of static and a long pause. "Republic ships?"

"Rensha's orders," muttered Cein. "No contact. I've targeted the Aleema's main guns. You knew her best, Jiya. Is this going to work?"

We could still back out. She could still pull off some kind of miracle. General Sand had seen a lot of Jedi miracles during the Mandalorian Wars.

But he'd seen worse after. "We have Rensha's orders," he muttered, not answering. *I don't know if it will work. If it doesn't, we're going to have one pissed off Sith Lord and her Mandalorian army to deal with. But they don't have the numbers and that's still better than all-out war with the Sith Empire—" No contact. Like you said. "Are the long range—"

"—scanners picking up another ship?" Their ensign nodded. "Yessir. I mean… that was what you were going to ask, right? Yes. Another ship's setting off alerts in the hyperspace tunnel. It's still a few light years away. But the readings are… off… like it's running without shielding. Is that—?"

" Republic ships!" The voice turned harder edged, glacial. "You need to answer me—"

"Yes, Ensign." Jiya thumbed the doomed broadcast down on his board and nodded at Cein. "Our target will be here soon. We just have to hold position—for now."

" Target the Aleema's guns," Admiral Cein broadcast to his command. "Fire at will…."

XXX

"They're not answering us," Kex said. The kid next to him looked restless. Revan's skin prickled. Hessi walking over my grave. Something. Something worse is coming.

" Frack," she muttered, and realized she was still transmitting. Hastily, she turned the board back down, pointing the signal to the Aleema only. "Raise shields! I have a bad feeling—"

XXX

"Incoming transmission from the planet."

Rensha paced back and forth in front of the viewscreen, in front of the hammerhead that hung suspended in the Hunt's tractor claws, like prey in a net. "Onscreen."

Rew Ekkumi, her guest for dinner, was still seated at the table, looking like a lost nerf calf, cut off from her herd.

Accurate, I suppose. But her fellow commanders have agreed.

" High Admiral Rensha…." Master Azen Loanin's voice had that false Jedi calm, but the man next to him looked wild-eyed and frantic. It took Rensha a moment to identify him as Mekel Jin. Master Vrook Lamar and Loanin's Jedi wife stood in the background. *We have some concern that your attempts to capture the Aleema and Revan Starfire will put the inhabitants of this planet in jeopardy."

"They chose the lower orbit," she snarled back.

" I would recommend Jedi counsel for the negotiation—"
"It is not a negotiation!"

Rew looked up from the table frowning.

"Then what is it?" Master Vrook asked bluntly.

"War," Rensha snapped. "Advise your people not to panic, Master Jedi. Revan will be joining you shortly."

"Did you tell her?" the dark-eyed Human boy muttered.

"I have seen many Jedi miracles," Rensha told them, pointedly. "Prepare your forces to enact another one."

She had every faith in them—even now. A fitting coda to your existence, Master Jedi—saving the lives of one last Republic ship—

On the viewscreen opposite, she watched the Aleema's main starboard cannon disappear in a haze of plasma.

"The Mandalorians have raised shields," Cein reported from the Glorious. "We disabled one of their main gun arrays, but the other line—their shields are still holding."

Too late to go back to the creche now, as Rensha's birth mother used to say.

"Press the assault, but only on that cannon," Rensha commanded. "Until my signal."

XXX

Only one word now and the word is food.

["Food,"] said Nihilus.

"Soon," Sion chuckled. "All you can eat, old friend. A veritable buffet."

Xxx

Aemelie nodded to Dessa. "Ping the Republic Fleet again to stand down. Are the shields holding?"

"Yes. Only one cannon was lost to their pointless aggression. The barbarians aren't taking us seriously," her Second sighed. "We have basilisks. We should show them our strength by boarding one of their ships. They are too closely packed now to fire without hitting each other. But their limitations provide unique opportunity. It would be good practice."

"Yes...." Aemelie frowned. It was too good. Too ripe. The Republic ships clustered around like fruit for the picking. They had to know the Aleema was worth ten of them. Did they doubt the prowess of her crew? She had done the best she could, in the brief time they had. They only had five torpedoes. Could barely muster two squadrons of fighters and most were so green she expected a fight like this would waste their potential, send their sparks to the stars long before their time.

A waste. Glorious, perhaps. But with more time, we could have done so much better.

Dessa nodded, her eyes sympathetic. Her hand caressed her still-flat belly. Really, with a child germinating in her womb, Aemelie should have insisted the other woman go to Dxun with the rest, but her friend had been so stubborn. It wasn't only men who wanted to be blooded in stars, even if women were the ones with much more complicated blood-rituals.

"Aemelie, disengage the tractor. Now." Revan's voice interrupted Aemelie's mental calculations on the gravity to thrust ratios of their own orbit. The sensors showed the barbarian Republic ramming ship tilting at a decidedly vertical angle, as the Aleema's pull was much stronger than the weak, Republic command ships could ever be.

"Your ship's hull is still intact enough," Aemelie noted. "The Republic will not sacrifice its own people. They will release their tractor beam first."

Sighing, Aemelie nodded to Leskal, who swung the levers back. Almost immediately, the holographic representation of the captured hammerhead stabilized, now pulled in only one direction.

"After you board and capture them, Third Wife, we should leave this sector. Their nav charts will have something of your Sith homeworld in their records, perhaps. Do not let them wipe the records—capital ships have a back-data storage receptacle a few levels under the bridge. It's usually unmarked, but you should be able to recognize it by—"

"Hells! Cody! We're too low. Raise the main yoke and stabilize those thrusters." At least Revan sounded more like a commander now, even if she was declaring fairly obvious things and not listening.

But on their screens, the Harbinger continued to list dangerously starboard, canting over as if its own propulsion thrusters were entirely offline.

"It's not working, the tractor's beam's—" Hiss of static, and his words cut out, but Aemelie could see for herself what the Great Hunt's tractor beam was doing.

It was deactivating, as the command ship itself pulled away, rising back up high above the planet's atmospheric band.

"Reboot your engines!" Aemelie yelled at the comm, which was now emitting only gaps of static. "You're too low, the ship's already canted, you need to pull out of the gravity, you're twisting slower than orbit."

"The engines are all offline." Kex's voice. "They… did something."

"Wasn't us!" Some woman's voice, cringing. "Please! They sent a pulse through our banks. Protocol! When a ship's in danger of capture, we render the engines non-operational—"

"And kill everyone on board?" Revan. "Are you fracking insane? We're falling out of the sky!"

"Lock onto them," she commanded.

"They're too low." Dessa was cursing softly under her breath. "If we chase them down, we risk further vulnerability—"

"We can evacuate the Harbinger—"
"The pods are gone. All?"

"All." Canderous's voice. "Are any of the gyros working? Bring the nose up."

"Wheel's locked, we can't—"

The commline broke into a babble of frightened voices. It would have been amusing, had Aemelie's clan not been among the doomed.

"Revan? You need to use your Force magic! Now."

"Shut up, Second Wife."

"I-I think she's trying."

"Help her, you cursed Jett'ai—"

The nose of the Harbinger tilted suddenly, jutting up, like a top spinning, and then swung over.

"Too far!"

"That's not me." Revan again. "Dak, can you feel—"

"Yes." A new voice. "Coming from the planet. They're—"

"Helping." Revan sounded awed, as if she'd forgotten their impending peril. "The Jedi... they're helping."

XXX

They were all staring at the sky, where suddenly, just off to the left, a ship fell from the sky, twisting like a badly-balanced saber. It had started out level, but now the front end—

Hammerhead-class. That's a hammerhead. They use them for troop movements. And to fracking ram into other fracking ships because they're all fracked.

"It's going to hit the camp." Even as Mekel said that, he thought he was wrong. It was going to hit the edge of the camp, although maybe the rain of debris might hit them. It was then, too, that he noticed the flares from other landings—what looked like escape pods, raining down on their secret Jedi enclave like an invading force.

Is this the trap? We're being invaded? Is it Sith? The Republic? Fracking Mandalorians?

"Help them." Vrook's voice, quiet. "Help her. Please."

In front of Mekel, all three Jedi sank to their knees. Vrook's hands were glowing.

"What—" Kavar Vakla came in at a dead run. There was that second when he was looking at Mekel, and then his face went blank too, with that weird glazed look Jedi got when they meditated instead of filling themselves with the Force, like it was going through them all.

And then Master Kavar Vakla was on his knees just like the others, his hands pressed palms together, face perfectly blank and gone. Just like the rest of them.

"I'm sleeping with your wife," Mekel told Azen's closed eyes, blank face. These feelings—rage, jealousy, helplessness—with the Force, he could have used those emotions. Instead, suddenly, he was a man standing on a quiet field. And everywhere he looked—everywhere—were blank, kneeling Jedi—like droids that had all been activated by the same frequency.

Above their heads, the hammerhead cruiser swung horizontal again, began banking down gently, towards the beach and the sea.

XXX

Dak's hands tightened in hers, as together they tried to still matter, pull gravity back, upend their falling vessel. Even this open to the Force—and Revan wasn't sure she'd ever been this open before—she knew it was too much. Maybe from a higher orbit she could have used the Force to keep them in orbit; but at their current trajectory, with gravity pulling them down like lightning, the fall was inescapable. She felt sweat break out all over her body, as she desperately tried to channel the kinetic energy around the ship back, up, away—a part of her mind screaming with the effort; a place beyond anger or a loss of hope—just pure desperation.

And then, what had been one discordant note—the screech of the Harbinger's hull entering atmosphere, the failed wails of its turbines overloaded, power cut, its rudderless fall—changed.

Somewhere in her mind's eye, Revan's vision splintered. She became aware simultaneously of the planet's surface rising up, and the ship falling—and below, a sea, a string of round huts, temporary structures, ringed like a half-moon on the beach—

And then, a soft wave, like water breaking over her skin. The Force became a thousand notes in tune, a chord—a song—a blanket. The Force surged from the planet below, enveloping everything in a glowing haze. The world tilted back, stabilizing. The ship slowed, its fall becoming more of a drift, a gentled glide, banking slowly down, towards the swells of the sea below.

Uncle?

His presence was there, so familiar it made a part of her ache, like the press of an embrace, soothing of a child's nightmares. His, and so many more.

Jedi. Jedi on the planet. So many Jedi on the planet. That makes no sense. Why would the Jedi be on Katarr? What possible reason—?

There was no answer in words, just the Force, surrounding them all in its warm embrace. It was beautiful, safe, like a song she had been trying to sing all of her life. United. All one purpose—all to save us.

This is what the Force is. This is the truth the Jedi know. It's beautiful.

Had she ever seen the Force like this before? If she had, Revan didn't remember. It was nothing like the rush of raw power. It was like floating in a salt bath, drifting slowly downwards, a leaf, a speck in the galactic tide, but connected... around them... everything.

Oh, she thought. The Force was the press of warm arms about her, the brush of lips in her hair. This is. This. Through me. Through us. Through everything—

In all of us, Red. In all things. Ghost of Malak's voice, here and now. Remember this.

It seemed like they fell for an age, for an hour, for a year, and yet, it was no time at all. A place beyond time and space, where a barrage of memories assailed her. None of them nightmares.
None of them nightmares and all of them hers. Hers. Not Polla's or Revan's, but hers.

XXX

_Sweetness of ice crema, the rough of Carth's stubble on her neck. Her son, heavy in her arms and too big to fit. Abasen, smiling up at her as she sang him to sleep next to Korrie. Mission's bright laughter and Zaal's soft rumble, the lazy crackle of a Kashyyyk campfire. Canderous's slow nod of approval as they resumed their spar. Carth's lazy, sated smile as she stood in the doorway, grinning back at him. Two suns setting under a Tatooine sky—the crash of waves on a Rakatan shore—_

"When this is over..." she whispered her promise in Carth's ear. There was an equal promise in his eyes, and she smiled back in happy agreement—

"Thank you, upworlder," the woman's voice shook a little. "Without the rakghoul serum, my brother would be dead——"

"Master Jedi," the man took a step forward, as if he didn't know what to do with his hands. "You saved Rahasia and me——"

"Lord. Your wisdom wets our children's mouths with its bounty—"

"Czerka are gone from our world," the Wookiee rumbled. "Thanks to you, Human——"

"Those Selkath schoolchildren owe you their lives, Jedi Knight—"

"W-who are you?" the black-eyed kid asked. His face was marked with burns from the lightning, but his wide eyes fixed on hers with something like worship—

_The wash of the Force overwhelmed Revan: light and dark and everything in between—_

XXX

Revan opened her eyes, as somewhere outside the world she felt the Harbinger's battered sides settle upon a slowly rocking sea, sink into warm water, like a child in a soft bath.

_Landed. We've landed._

Standing over her, Canderous exhaled heavily. "You did that, Revan?"

"Not alone." _We are never alone. Not when the Force flows through all of us, through everything we are—_

Dak's hands loosened their grip on hers and he reached up, wiping tears from his face. "I... I saw... _her_. Did you... did you see—?"

"No—but I have, Dak. I have before." _Juhani. He saw Juhani._ "Dak, I'm so—I'm sorry. I'm so sorry."

"I know." He smiled slightly. "You called, and the Jedi on the planet heard you."

"We called, and they helped." Revan wiped the wetness from her eyes with her sleeves. "Why are there so many Jedi on this planet? They knew I would need them? They knew this would happen?"

"No." Dak was still wiping his eyes. He stood up, reaching out a hand to help her stand as well. "It-it's a trap. A lure. For Davad Arkan. He calls himself Darth Nihilus now."
"What?" Revan tried to make sense of his words, but reality came smashing back, like a fracking Sith invasion force. "Davad consumes Force users. Jedi gathering like this... are they fracking insane?"

"No." Dak shook his head. "The Republic Fleet will fire upon his ship as soon as it comes out of hyperspace." Dak smiled slightly. "The Fleet and the Council came up with this plan together."

"Oh." Something inside her felt... strange. Like she should feel something for a man she didn't know. "They think they can kill him from orbit. I... I guess that could work."

But the Republic High Admiral just let our ship fall out of the sky. Was she trying to kill Darth Revan too? And why do they need this many Jedi—do they need to keep him here? What if it doesn't work? We can't fight him with the Force—

"Revan." Canderous's voice brought her back into the present, to the duraplate floor beneath her knees, the hiss of the ship's atmospherics, venting and pressurizing to the planet beneath their feet.

Revan looked up, aware of Dak doing the same thing next to her. Around them, the Harbinger's remaining crew seemed to be scrambling to order, her own soldiers herding the bridge officers into a double line towards the exit. Commodore Cody shot her a look filled with hate.

Just fracking let them go! We've landed. Need to just find a working shuttle back up to the Aleema —

"Revan," Canderous repeated. "When you're done with the Force-praying, stand up. There's something on the sensors you need to see."

XXX

"Katarr." Jasp's voice felt dry and disused. "We've come out of hyperspace—Masters." He wasn't sure how long he'd been staring at the blasted navboard, watching the engine readouts. Ship had seen better days, but the way these capitals were built it could run for another Standard century on the secondary engines it had left. Shields were bad though. If anyone went after the Ravager in space, he doubted they'd last.

There were no escape pods. One of the first things Jasp had checked, even with those infernal commands of Darth Sion twisting in his mind. No escape pods—only their one shuttle, the one Sion kept under lock and biometric key codes.

No betrayal. No escape.

"Katarr...." Sion's voice made the word into a tortured hiss, scream of an engine overload. His chuckle was dark and choked. "Ah. Is this their pathetic trap?"

It was only then that Jasp looked to screen, and saw that the orbit around the planet was crowded. Packed. The Ravager's automated sensors had brought them out of hyperspace in the middle of a fleet of ships. Like a herd of shifting kissra sheep, all jostling for position at the trough, smooth planet gleaming beneath—

"I-I had no way of knowing these ships were here!" It's not a trap! I didn't lead you into a trap—

"—" Nihilus murmured. Softly.

"A sh-shuttle?" Jasp felt the world spin, as if oxygen was gone, gravity cut out, nothing in his mind now except the roar of his master's voice.
"—?" Nihilus echoed. "—!

"Yes, yes, of course—" Jasp was standing, his goal already clearly in mind, abandoning the navboard, abandoning the sensors— "Adjusting for orbit, and gravity, we can be groundside soon, Master. Soon, but the other ships, they—"

"Republic ships," Sion said. His blinded white eye rolled in his skull, and the other gleamed, yellow and mad. "She meant to trap us all along." He leaned over their weapons board, and as Jasp watched, the controls containing their remaining torpedoes lit, preparing—

"If you fire, they—" They can't fire back! They'd hit the others. But if they did, or if our torpedoes hit, this tightly clustered, we'd have no chance. We have no shields— "Master, our shields cannot withstand prolonged assault. We need to jump—the next jump point is Biscain. If we go now, before they have time to respond—"

"—," said Nihilus.

Jasp's head rang with the force of his command.

"I know, Master, but—"

"Her," Sion murmured. "She is here."

"Who?" Both of them stared fixedly at the planet below. "Masters, I can prepare the shuttle—" Jasp wanted to serve. Nihilus had wormed into his brain, soft whispers, all the time now.

"Revan."

Spacer's instinct brought his eyes back from the floor to the viewscreen, as the Republic fleet surrounding them began to wink out of existence, one-by-one, ships going into hyperspace.

The black sky around the planet was suddenly empty, save for one gray, triangular hulk, larger than the others, an angry, flickering blue around its front bridge, a gaping hole behind, scar from some long-fought battle. Despite what would have been a mortal wound in a lesser ship, lights winked in and out along the great ship's sides.

One of its main guns was blasted and dead, but the others looked coldly operational.

Aleema, the Aurebesh letters read.

"No!" Sion's voice rasped. "They were supposed to be free."

XXX

There was a storm coming.

Lena Wee had only lived on Tatooine for a few years before she left, but she could still feel it in the air, that heaviness that had nothing to do with rain. Like a tickle at the back of her throat.

"Thanks." Nico Senvi's lekku twitched, emphasizing sincerity, even if he wouldn't meet her eyes. He stood in the doorway of his own conapt looking like he barely recognized the place.

"That's everything, right?" The pink—*See'raa—call her See'raa— set the crate filled with tach glands down next to the box of Czerka salvage that her twin—*Tee'raa— was sitting on. "Here's your life back and everything. Just watch out for that loser, Griff. If he tries to get you to invest in one of his schemes… don't. That sleemo always rolls loaded dice."

Tee'raa nodded, twisting her lekku. Plus, don't tell him about us, she signed. Or we'll gut you.

"I won't." Nico sounded like he was trying to laugh, but it would have been more convincing if those limp lekku hadn't been wrapped around his neck in a chokehold.

They didn't know why, but Tee'raa couldn't talk. Her lekku worked just fine, but when she tried to speak, all that came out was garbled noise. Like a…a faulty wire, See'raa had said. A bad connection. Tee'raa was stoic about it.

Maybe it was the way the prince… the Nico-who-had-never-been had connected her brain. Or maybe the original Tee'raa had been mute too.

Having a meat body still beats being a droid, she'd offered, when Lena found herself apologizing again to the girl she'd once been—or part of her had been.

Now, Lena's child rolled in her belly, butting up hard against her ribcage. Her prince had kept insisting the baby was a son, his heir, a mirror-image of a monster; but now she hoped for a girl. Hoped for an ordinary kid. Even if her baby had her genetic father's brains. Still beat some of the alternatives.

What if he is? What if my baby's like… him? Like… T'chhhsimmemewhat?

Or like them? My twins?

Lena looked towards their ship, parked in the dusty shade of the spaceport wall. She thought of the locked cargo hold, the ancient artifact sealed within three crates of durasteel wrapped in chains.

All their plans for its disposal seemed fraught with risk: what if we leave it drifting in space and some salvager finds it? What if we drop it in the ocean and some salvager finds it? What if we drop it in molten lava and that… releases him somehow?

No. The best thing, the safest thing, is for us to keep it. Because we can hide it safe—for the rest of our lives—and then beyond… somehow.

See'raa and Tee'raa were very good at building droids. They would fashion protectors. Make something safer than Kashyyyk, find an uninhabited planet….

"Know what I was thinking…?" See'raa took Lena's arm in her own, steering her almost protectively through the dusty Tatooine streets. "I was thinking… what your kid's really gonna need is a stable Republic government, you know? I mean, sure—in a million years of sentient historical records there are better examples… More efficient ones. But we gotta work with what we have. And what we have is a lot of credits and like, a semi-functional Senatorial republic."

Yeah. We need to buy some senators, Tee'raa added, motioning t'chin and t'chun exaggeratedly, so that Lena didn't miss seeing them. Or would it be best to start small, with a crime syndicate?

Lena sighed. Just because she loved them, didn't mean they weren't scary. "Why don't we start with getting ourselves a decent ship…?"
“Any word from Katarr?” The old woman had a sharp, querulous voice that grated on Mical’s nerves.

“We know that the Ravager appeared in the sky above Katarr. Then, the Republic Fleet immediately jumped to hyperspace.” Mical stood in the doorway of her claustrophobically-small room, wondering if he should venture inside. “Master Atris asked me to keep you informed.”

“Nihilus will take Katarr. The Jedi will have no defense.” His biological mother smiled as if the death of thousands of Jedi—not to mention the Force-sensitive population of an entire planet—was something that pleased her.

Mical kept his face neutral. “It appears he will—yes.” And how would you stop him after he consumes the Sith Empire? Or would you stop him? Is your true goal the death of billions? Or the Force itself?

“Appearances may deceive. We will not acknowledge our victory until the act is done.”

Your presumed victory, old woman. “Master Atris says much the same.” And more besides.... It was she who had sent Mical to Kae, told him to keep the old woman occupied,

“An old woman may appear helpless, too.” His biological mother’s whitened eyes rolled in his direction, and Mical noted the silvery interlace at her temples, the faint scars on her brow. It was entirely possible, he posited, that she could see better with her ocular implants than he could.

“Master Atris has told me too much about your work for me to consider you helpless.”

“Has she? I was under the impression that Master Loanin had the privilege of your training.”

“I have been honored to have been trained by them both.”

“Trained by an effete Senate lapdog and a hidebound scholar. Strange honor, indeed.”

“I learned much from them.” Mical considered that he had never been properly grateful for their teachings before this moment. “Thank you for entrusting my care to others, Mother.”

Her head straightened, slightly, and something in those eyes glinted. “I could not take you with me.”

“To Mandalore?” The samples he had run from the Jedi genebanks had found three children. Oerin Lin’s death had provided genetic evidence of a fourth. Their existence was either part of some plan—or their maternal parent was remarkably incompetent. Mical had given up wondering which. Both could certainly be the case.

“Keep her distracted,” Atris had said. “Keep her off guard, and on edge. Do not underestimate her. I was blind for too long. She has resources we do not control. There must be no chance of any interference—”

“Mandalore.” The woman nodded slowly. “Yes. When you and your sister were weaned I went to Mandalore. I imagine you have questions.”

“After you left our father, Jorde Yusanis, you went to Mandalore and married the Fett Lin. You convinced the Mandalorian Clans to rise against the Republic.”

“Oversimplification,” Master Kae murmured. “And your father was a disappointment.”

“You had him killed—”

“Revan had him killed,” she interrupted. “To weaken the Republic’s strategic command.”

“Of course.” He dipped his head. “Revan.” Your puppet all along? Why?

That was the question he kept asking, long after Master Atris had lapsed into bitter silence. Master Atris said the reasons of a mad Sith were dangerous. That quarantine was their best recourse. Arren Kae, or Traya, or whoever the Jedi Vima Sunrider styled herself as—Master Atris thought she was simply a madwoman. A madwoman like her padawan, laying waste to the galaxy.

Master Loanin suspected there was something more. And Mical thought he was correct. That was why Mical had sent a warning about the Fleet to Loanin—days ago, when Master Atris was still puzzling through the mists of her own confusion, still examining footage from the Jedi Temple, Council logs… still coming to terms with the obvious. If it was just Atris’s warning that galvanized the Jedi on Katarr into action, it would have come too late.

Keep her distracted, Master Atris had commanded him. There was one distraction they were holding in reserve; but it was not time for that. Not yet.

“Our contacts in Republic intelligence have located Meetra Surik…” he began, noting the sudden tension in her shoulders, the grim smile of her mouth.

“Your half-sister,” she murmured quietly. “Before the end of all things, I would like to see my children all in one place.”

XXX

Aleema, the Aurebesh letters read. Jasp wondered why they sounded familiar. (Later, he might remember: the news broadcasts, the name of the Sith dreadnaught that had appeared in orbit around Deralia some three-odd years past.) But now, all of that was disconnected. Removed. Now, all he could feel was the master’s need.

Hunger. Hunger that needed sating on the planet below.

"No!" Sion's voice rasped. "They were supposed to be free."

“———,” Nihilus whispered.

“No,” Sion said. His voice grated, a raw and painful crack. Unlike when Nihilus spoke, Jasp couldn’t hear it inside his skull. Sion’s voice was just words, half-lost over the roar of his master’s anger. “They are not for you, Arkan. Do what you want with the Jedi, but leave my people alone.”

“—Hunt. Food—”

Jasp could almost feel his master’s desire now, cold and coiling in his guts.
“I said, no.” Sion’s saber lit, a sudden beam of scarlet on the darkened bridge. “Take the Jedi—all the Jedi. But leave my people alone.”

“—!” It was more calculation than Nihilus usually showed; but Jasp understood. The large craft in front of them gleamed with health and life, even with the damage to its forebridge. The Ravager’s systems were failing. They would need a better ship, if the master was going to be fed—and the ship in front of them—Aleema—was better. Much better.

Aleema. An almost familiar name; but in this place, Jasp had no context for its existence. His own life before was an increasingly faint dream. Moll, he thought sometimes. Pollie. He thought of their daughter, the lost one he’d come to save—but she was lost.

The boy is safe. At least, the boy is safe. Mine—and her boy too. He thought that—metal in his mouth like blood, and Nihilus’s own hunger gnawing at his guts.

The master needed food. Jasp could… feel that now. Like the master’s mind had crept into his own, invading his dreams with its whispers. The master needed food now.

“He only wants their ship.” Even as he spoke, Jasp realized his mistake, as Sion turned on him, his good eye glittering with hate, blackened teeth bared, hand holding his laser sword outstretched, its beam sparking cool death—

“H-he only wants their ship. It's faster. Better than ours. A faster ship can get more food.”

Sion’s voice hissed like molten ore. “I said no. Touch one hair of their heads, and our alliance is over, Arkan. I have no need of you… can you say the same?”

“—, ———— ——— ————————!” Nihilus didn’t move, but his shadow seemed to grow, looming over the other Sith, until Sion was encased in darkness.

The dead Sith chuckled, gesturing toward the planet below. “There is meat for you. Below. Take it. Take it all—” He broke off, cocking his head.

——. It was more than a name in Nihilus’s mind. It was an image, a scent, a… presence. “——— ,” he said, voice softer now.

“Revan,” Sion agreed. “That’s right. She’s on the planet. You feel it too. We should go there.” His rotting mouth smiled. “Go to her.”

The bridge rocked suddenly, and it was only then that Jasp realized they were under attack.

XXX

“Fire again,” Aemelie ordered.

Dessa looked at her warily. “They used Mandalorian codes before. Hailing us.”

“A trick. Scan the vessel for life forms,” Aemelie said flatly.

Dessa did as ordered, frowning at her screen, her eyes widening. “I see only one. Is it droids?”

“No….” Aemelie shook her head. “See the scars on her side? The way her hull's listing—see the marks on the bow? That’s one of the ghost ships from Malachor V.”

“Ori’dush!” Dessa made an old sign to ward off evil. “The rumors about… him? They are true?”
“Yes. Now, fire,” Aemelie repeated. “The man he was deserves a clean death in stars.”

XXX

He is hunger. He is the beast above the world. The word is food, and it is the world. He is stronger, he is starving. And she—and she—she is there, she is meat—she is here—she is his—

XXX

“I don’t understand why you are here again, Aunt Vima. I have a master. Master Zez-Kai Ell has been tasked with my instruction—”

“There are lessons a Jedi cannot teach their own padawan.” Master Sunrider (who was only an adopted aunt) looked (rather pointedly) across the field to where her own assigned padawan was training with Master Vandar. The girl’s red hair was as tangled as her limbs in the heavy robes. In the Force, the girl felt like frozen water, dull and screaming. “At times we learn more from those who see the galaxy in diametric opposition to our own perception.”

“There is only one way to see.” Davad had been young enough to think that true. “The Force shows us truth.”

“The Force conceals as much as it reveals,” Master Sunrider corrected. At that time, she had been the concealer. Davad had thought that he knew her, his foster aunt, but he did not know who she was truly—that hers had been the hand that had rocked his princely cradle—that set him on this inexorable path. “What do you see when you look at her?”

“A girl. Her name is Revan. A padawan—”

XXX

For Nihilus in the now, there is no word but food and the word is her. Her. But there was a time before. A time before she mattered. A time when dreams and drexl came first; but then his master came and took him—and then he saw—her.

But now, she is here, and there is the word, and the word is food. The food is below, and they are above. They must bank and glide, descend on a bed of soft air, gentle as drexl wings. Get to the food. The world is food.

XXX

“A girl. Her name is Revan. A padawan—”

“A padawan. Is that all?” She sniffed derisively, proving to him it was not.

“Your padawan,” Davad offered. “Padawan Starfire is strong in the Force—”

“Stronger than you?”

“Strength does not matter—”

“Oh, but it does.”

The hand behind his throne. The hand that took his throne from him—

“No,” he guessed. “No one is stronger than me.”
His master raised her hand and he felt his skin burn, throat tighten with the invisible response. “You are wrong.”

XXX

Now, Sion is busy yelling at a computer terminal, and the pilot whispers his sadness. They do not know.

The word is food. The world is food—an entire planet’s worth below him. Nihilus opens his maw, as if with a scream he can eat it all from here—

XXX

“What… was that?” Vizzy Marr had no words for the feeling. The Force, yes, of course. The Force was brighter in what they had begun to call ‘Jedi Valley;’ but not like this. The Force felt like a sun outside—brighter and warmer than their own sun ever was.

“Jedi,” her father muttered. “That’s the Jedi up to something. I never should have let them sign that land-lease.”

“They’re really loud,” her brother Vicey complained. “What’s going on outside? It's so bright, I can't see!”

There was a rumbling sound, and a shadow passed across their ferraplate window.

“It's from the sky?” Vizzy went to the window, just in time to view a gray ship, clubbed like a weapon, descend past their house on the river’s mouth, and splash down onto the reef just beyond the ocean's edge.

“Did you feel that?” Viky, her sister, burst in from outside. “Some kind of space battle outside in the sky! And then all these ships left… except for two…”

“Jedi,” their father sighed, adjusting his shade-cloth more tightly over the bridge of his nose. “Always something with the Jedi. Did I tell you about the one who keeps pissing in the river, Visas? I've caught him four times already!”

“Does he think we're blind?” Vicey added. “Nobody wants to see one of those long, Human-shaped —”

“Vic!” Since their mother had died, it was up to Vizzy Marr to enforce what manners this house of men and children had. “The Jedi saved that ship from falling from the sky, but the tide’s coming in. If there are survivors—”

“There are,” Viky noted. “One of them is way too bright. I think she was yelling before.”

“If there are survivors,” Vizzy repeated, “we need to help—”

“Oh.” Her father blanched suddenly, turning as pale as the sand on the acid beach. “Oh, no. Do you… see—” His lined head tilted up, staring through the roof of their farmhouse to the sky above again.

“It's nothing.” Vic sounded puzzled, his head tilting up and then back to the crashed ship like a confused compass. “Down here it's too bright and up there it's nothing. How can it be nothing?”

“It can't.” And yet it was.
"Ysalamiri?" Her father tilted his head. "More? But they filled the sea caves already, and it’s nothing at all like that?"

"Ysalamiri?" Vizzy repeated. "Sea caves? Dad, did you lease out the hydro-generators to the Jedi too?"

"Enough for two years tuition, Visas! The old Jedi said it had to be secret." Father sniffed. "But crashing a ship down over the vents seems like a lease violation, I think—"

"The tides are coming in," Vizzy reminded him. "If there are survivors on that Jedi ship, we need to get them to shore."

"Guess all those fishing droids your mother told me not to buy are worth something after all," Father ruffled her hair. "They can man the life rafts."

Xxx

The food is below, and they are above. The fastest way down is a straight line, but to arrive with the pilot intact—and no more holes in Sion—they must go slowly.

Slow is hard, because Nihilus is starving. Taste will be too-sweet, but it is so hard to wait—

XXX

"Congratulations, Jedi Knight Arkan." The girl from Hoth slid into the chair opposite, nodding to the servo and holding up three fingers. "I really thought Mal and I would be knighted first, but Beya, and now you—"

She said his name. And three fingers for three drinks—not two.

Davad should have been celebrating his promotion, allowing himself to relax—finally—after nearly a month in the Kessel spice mines; but instead every muscle tensed at the sight of her. He felt as nervous as if they were children, instead of two adults—two Jedi—two companions meeting for a drink—

Two companions. Not three.

The servomech slid three cups of caff on the table and rolled away again.

Davad looked up towards the cafe’s open archway, but Revan’s Coruscanti shadow wasn’t lurking in it. Not yet... but she kept turning her head toward the archway, away from him. The air around them felt charged with anticipation. It rang through the Force.

Before his departure, Davad had been so sure that the two of them were hiding something... but then he’d flat-out asked the man regarding his intentions towards Revan--and Malak had denied having any intentions at all.

Davad took a deep breath, steeling his courage. He, who had faced down slavers and zakkeg, now felt frightened of a girl’s response.

Tell her, he commanded himself. Tell her now, before Malak comes.

"Are you okay?" She turned back to him, tilting her head. He wanted to give her a bell to wear on those braids of hers, but he was afraid she’d know what it meant.

Just tell her. "Fine," he managed.
Davad took a sip of the too-sweet caff he had only pretended to like once before she made it a part of their regular ritual: four of them, sometimes five. Refugees in Padawan beige at the streetside cafe by the Library. But Beya was offworld still, and Viktor working in the clinics. That left the two of them and Malak. Malak, who still wasn’t here.

Just tell her.

Davad cleared his throat, trying to find a beginning. “My knighthood is not official yet, Master Zez needs to sign off on my progress—”

“My master said you performed quite adequately.” She turned back to him and raised one red eyebrow, words crisping into that imitation of Malak’s accent that Davad despised. “Coming from her, Knight Arkan, I assume you can surely see how—”

“She wants us to work together,” he blurted out.

“Who?” Her bow mouth pursed in a frown.

“Your master.” Our master. Although Davad was not allowed to say that. He had already said too much, probably. Aunt Vima would chastise him later. She would know.

She always knew.

“Master Vima? Aren’t we? Working together?” Revan frowned, as if she didn't understand. “The four of us were quite a team on Nar Shaddaa, and with Vik and Razza’s help, I really think we can get those power grids back up again in the refugee sectors. The locals said they didn’t have the funds for builders, but we can do most of the heavy lifting, it isn’t difficult—”

“Not for you,” he interrupted, nettled by her automatic inclusion of the others from their training squad. “But no, Master Vima wants us to work together. Us two. You know, she… she always has her own plans….” He moved his hand in a back and forth motion between them.

“Doing what?” She took a sip of caff, as if she had no idea.

“I don’t… I don’t know.” Davad’s mouth felt dry and the servomech refilled his caff bulb just in time. He took a sip to cover the spoor of his fear, trying not to grimace at the sickly-sweet. “Revan, I-I like—”

“Mal!” Her face brightened, head turning up like a flower as Malak D’Reev appeared in the archway. Her voice was soft, softer than Davad had ever heard it, and two red spots had appeared suddenly on her cheeks, as if she was struck ill, or embarrassed, or—

“Red.” The man had damnably long legs, because he’d crossed the distance in half the time it should have taken, and Davad sensed nothing in the Force, beyond the usual din of power he had grown accustomed to basking in by her side. “I thought we were going to meet in the…? I was waiting there… but then I thought… perhaps you had made other plans?”

That was when Davad knew Malak had lied, that they were both hypocrites just like all the rest of the Jedi, denying their passion while indulging in secret trysts—

“Oh! When you said our place, I thought—thought you meant… here. ” Her entire face flushed blood-red, just to add insult to injury.

“Oh! No. But here is… fine. Good. Here is… good.” Malak was smiling at her foolishly, like Davad’s own mother used to smile at Gaven, her last lover before the coward’s bomb took them both. “It’s… good, Red. It’s… fine.”

“Red?” Davad forced the nonchalant tone, holding out his caff and wishing he could discard it in the incinerator. “Instead of Rev? I keep telling you lot to call me Dav but it never catches on.”

“You can still call me Rev, Davad.” But she was looking at Malak, smiling at him with a lightness he’d never seen on her face in training, or sparring, or on mission.

“Dav,” Davad joked, but he might as well have been talking to the air.

XXX

This world is food—all of it. A feast! The word is only food and—there. A faster beast gets more food. They need the faster beast. They need the faster beast because the word is food and her. The word is food and she is the word and she is there.

She is there. She is the word and the world and it is food.

Xxx

“They’re firing,” Sion pointed out. Nihilus was standing by the viewport, his tongue practically hanging out or his mouth—at least metaphorically. Black mists seeped out from behind his mask. “My people are trying to destroy us.”

Their ship lurched back and forth.

“——?” Nihilus commented.

“The Mando’ade will destroy this vessel.” Sion did not need the readings on the navboard to know that they had no shields left. The Ravager had survived a gravity well’s implosion, but it would not survive a squadron of Mandalorian warflies, or repeated assault from a plasma cannon the size of the Aleema’s. “We need to go.”

“——. ——! ———, ————.” The Lord of Nothing took a step closer to Sion, and then another, standing too close. Nihilus’s breath was like a hot wind. No face under the mask. His hands flexed, fingers misting and shifting—from claws to hands. One reached out—

And Sion cursed himself for instinctively flinching, for stepping back, ceding the ground.

But he is stronger. He is damnably stronger. Did Mother intend to make him the stronger one? Stronger than me?

“The shuttle,” Sion repeated. “Unless you would prefer to make our end here.” Perhaps if I’m atomized, the pieces won’t reassemble? Nothing short of that had worked.

“——.” The masked head jerked up and down.

“He says you were right. We need to go to the shuttles now.” Jasp Organa was halfway to the door. “Like you said before, Lord Sion. We need to go. She is… she is waiting, he says. Below. Leave the ship.”

Sion felt almost comical. “Then, hurry. They’re shooting at us—my own people.”

The ship rocked back and forth and he suddenly wished his people had better guns.
Suppose I still retained consciousness? Living in pain is preferable to what life would be atomized and adrift in space.

Sion’s guts hurt again, as if the parts of him that had broken were knitting anew, only to break and rot again. A constant, throbbing ache, in tune with the wheeze of his withered lungs, the dryness in his mouth—

“———!” Nihilus commanded, and despite his own power, Sion jumped.

“We need to hurry,” he told Jasp. “My people will destroy this ship.”

“Then they’re not your people,” the old man snapped, with surprising insolence.

“Barbarian.” In the early days of his service, Jasp Organa had talked a great deal about family, his thoughts tangling around the skeins of his own attachments, images of his wife, his foolish daughter, that hapless babe.

But he was starting to fade now, just like all the others. All that regret and pain—flattened like a ridge of bone. Now, Jasp Organa’s eyes were half-closed, his movements mechanical. Sion had to keep reminding him to eat. Only occasionally, these flashes of fire. It happened to all of them, the ones they had taken into their service.

Perhaps they could find a new null pilot—and a new ship—on the planet below. This one was nearing the end of his use.

Their ship rocked from side to side again, beset upon by the Mandalorian fighters.

“We need to leave,” Sion repeated. “In the shuttle. Now.”

Xxx

There is one word, and it is food and it is her. Her.

He is moving through a corridor. He is waiting for their slow feet at the base of the shuttle. He is starving. He is remembering her.

XXX

The dappled shadows of her bedchamber, gleam of her skin, soft belly, durasteel underneath. The pink of her breasts… of her.

Of her. Of her. Stay here, where she is. This memory is the one you want to keep. Eyes like suns, the bare pink of her scalp, the fuzz of hair like down under his hands, the warmth of her mouth and the cold of her mind—

Her. Like this. Just this, just... just this. Not before. Not after.

“Davad,” she says. Her head turns, profile sharp as a beast of prey. “I didn’t call for you.”

“Do you wish me to leave?”

“No.” A breath. Ribs flexing along the side of her bare flank. “The... information you brought me before... about... that room—I need to be certain, I need to be absolutely certain—it was... unused? Truly?”

“As I detailed. The toys were still in boxes. Seals unbroken on the bed linens.”
What thoughts Revan had in response were concealed in the ice of those eyes. “No sign of a child in residence?” Her breath hissed, almost as if she still wore the mask. “You’re sure?”

“Yes,” he nodded. “They stay there occasionally, but aside from the groundskeepers, there are no slaves, no staff. The kitchens are empty. If there was… someone there, it would be—”

“Blast it out of existence. Send a squadron in unmarked ships. Let Mal blame some Sithling for the offense….” Her voice trailed off. “They stay there, you said? You mean, my husband and Sheris stay at that estate. Always together? Does she travel alone?”

“Sometimes. He sends her to make preparations. You know he’s given her a ship—”

“See if you can time the estate’s destruction to her arrival. But leave Malak unharmed.”

Davad had wondered why she had allowed Sheris to live this long. But without Sheris, would Malak turn back to her? Was it Sheris who kept her away from Malak? Sheris, and not him?

“As you wish.” Would she go back to him? Hate burned in his gut. “If you wish Sheris dead, it would easy to arrange something more… subtle.”

His master walked to the viewscreen, staring out at the stars below them. Her body had become a hard thing, forged, flesh stretched over bone. Davad found it beautiful. “Sheris is irrelevant. I want Malak angered. Irrational. It makes him… malleable.”

Malleable. Was this all merely a show to make Davad malleable too? He should have been King of Onderon—but now, he was only this.

Dark desires warred with hate, twisting in his guts. But then her head turned back towards him, her eyes wide and yellow and still—somehow—beautiful.

The words seemed caught in his throat. “You… are concerned that she will give him an heir. I could… we… we could… we could make—we could have—” Suddenly he felt a boy of nineteen again, stammering his devotion in a Coruscanti cafe.

Her body tensed. “No.” Her head turned towards him. “No children, Davad.”

At the time, he had not understood. It had seemed a personal affront. “Of course.” I offered you the blood of kings. He looked at her, and felt his fury grow, fanned like a flame in the cold suns of her eyes.

Revan chuckled softly. “Careful.”

“No.” The word came out feral, almost a growl.

“Then come here.” She took a step back, towards the transparisteel behind her. Her body naked, open, beckoning—her breath hissed out again, this time with a smile. “Your loyalty is appreciated, Lord Arkan.”

He closed the gap between them in a stride, took her in his arms. One hardened leg wrapped around his hips, and her back arched as he lifted her against the transparisteel, crushing his mouth hard down on hers, tasting the sweet of her mouth, the salt on her lips—

XXX

“Step this way, my Lord.” The man was nervous, pacing back and forth, while their ship rocked and burned. The shuttle’s gangplank was small so Nihilus made his form smaller, more at a head with the other men, those who still bore human form.

[[“Food,”]] Nihilus told Jasp and Sion. [[“She is food. Now.”]]

The pilot’s name was Jasp. He was loyal. A good man. His good loyalty had peeled him open like a ripe berry. If only the meat was good, but it was not. Not for Nihilus.

Sion could have eaten him, Nihilus thought, but the dead man did not know how.

Jasp liked to think about Polla. Polla Organa.

Polla Organa was a lie. Nihilus remembered the last time she thought she was her. He remembered it well….

Xxx

He stepped out of the shadows in front of her, watching her eyes narrow, the warrior’s stance she automatically assumed. The woman called Polla Organa still dressed like a smuggler, but her hair had grown in along the edges: a tinge of red beneath the dyed black. She wore a Jedi’s over robe over her smuggler’s tack, and a dual-bladed hilt dangled from the twice-looped hide laced at her waist. There was a sharpness in her eyes that was new, and hardness to her features he found enticing, familiar as the marks her teeth had once made in his neck.

“Who are you?” she demanded.

“A friend. You should know better than to trust the Genoharadan.”

Her green eyes narrowed now, taking in the plain, gray mask that covered his face. “I should trust some Sith asshole with a stealth belt instead?”

XXX

“You will not tell her. You will tell her nothing of her past.”

The old woman’s words from long ago. Had she said them again? Was she here now? Or was her compulsion still carved in Davad’s brain?

Davad had been weak. Nihilus was not. If he saw the old woman now, he would eat her.

XXX

“I will not harm you.” He spread out his hands, the old gesture of peace. She would not remember the time they’d pretended to be peaceful Jedi in the fires of Serroco, before their sabers cut the Mandalorian battalions down, working out like a fan from the heart of their camp.

“Right. Who wouldn’t trust a creepy masked Sith guy?” She twisted a lock of black-dyed hair. “Look, I don’t care about your stupid Sith war, or your Jedi hunts, okay? Were you following us? How did you find me?”

Anyone could find her. She was blazing like a beacon in the Force now. So much that all could know.

XXX
So easy to find her then. Just like now.

Their shuttle is lifting and Nihilus can help. He raises his arms in the same gesture, and the shuttle rises higher, banking sharply towards the shields of the docking bay.

“Pilot? Are you trying to crash us into our own shields?” Sion sounds more intrigued than concerned.

“That’s not me, that isn’t—” the old man is frantic, fingers dancing across the keys. “It’s him! It’s him!”

[“Food,”] Nihilus explains. The fields are energy and he cannot eat them. [“Food!”]

“There—”

The blue shielding between them and stars releases, and their shuttle slips out, nearly into a small flotilla of fighters.

“Oh, my people,” Sion sighs heavily. “So strong and so proud. And foolish.”

[“You people burn so brightly.”] Nihilus tells, and moves the space winds to send the useless ships spinning. [“But not for me. I cannot eat them.”]

XXX

Mekel Jin glanced up again towards the sky. There were only two ships visible now. From what the others had said, there were only two ships left—the Mandalorian one that had been Revan’s Sith flagship and… the new one, a battered slice of gray hovering above it.

The new one that has that Force-sucking guy in it?

“Did all the Republic ships cloak again?” he asked. Mekel wanted to be hopeful. Force-sucker can’t hurt me, right? Mekel wanted to be hopeful, but it didn’t look good. Didn’t take a fracking planet-sized droid brain to figure that one out. Even the Jedi around him seemed to be cluing into the fact that the Republic had backed out of their bargain, left them all twisting in the wind.

“They’re gone.” Dear Old Dads glanced up at the sky again, and then at the hammerhead cruiser half-banked in the sand, half covered by the sea in front of them. It had been a beautiful thing, watching the Jedi all float it down; but now it seemed like a fracking catastrophe. “The Fleet is gone.”

“And the Force-sucking guy? He’s on that ship up there?”

“I think so.” It was Lydie who answered. “Davad Arkan. He feels… louder than he did before.”

“He calls himself Darth Nihilus now.” Loanin had a gift for pointlessness. And he kept glaring at Mekel, like Mekel was the problem here, and not the Fleet that had just ditched and left the Jedi out to hang like last month’s laundry.

“High Admiral Rensha did this?” Lydie began, still looking shocked. Didn’t she get it? This is what sents did. They fracked you, or you fracked them first.

“It was always a risk.” That was Kavar, the asshole who had been working with Oerin Lin before, like he was a fracking expert on betrayal. “We knew it was always a risk.” He seemed to be getting new lines in his face. “But Nihilus’s power does not extend from orbit. We have time—”
“I had hoped we were wrong about the need.” Vrook nodded slowly.

“Maybe the Mandalorians will blow him up,” Mekel offered.

This could be it. Blind and deaf, and I might be stuck on this rock til Mister Force-Suck comes.

As he watched, Revan’s old flagship fired on the smaller ship, bursts of plasma billowing like flowers in the upper atmosphere. The smaller ship’s shields sparked, but it did not return fire.

“Lydie,” Loanin’s voice snapped, like he was the boss of everything. He glanced behind them, to the clusters of wide-eyed padawans and apprentices behind. “There is a contingency plan. You and I need to get the children to safety.”

“I wish you had shared your contingency sooner, Azen.” The mildness of her tone was a contrast to the sharpness of her rebuke, the hardening of her mouth.

“Safety?” Mekel interrupted. “From what? Lord Force-Suck? What’re you gonna do? Ask that dead asshole to take away their Force powers before his friend can eat them?”

Loanin’s eyes narrowed, and suddenly Mekel was entirely fracking sure the man had heard what Mekel had said earlier about sleeping with his wife.

He flashed Master Loanin his best banthashit grin. “Sounds great,” he added. “No wonder you guys won the war.”

“Go,” Dear Old Dads added, to Loanin. “Go now. The disruptors are in crates by the mine’s entrance.”

Master Kavar the traitor nodded slowly. “I’ll prepare the snub. What about Revan?”

A muscle twitched in Vrook’s cheek. “She will help too, once I explain the need.”

“Help?” Mekel asked, a millisecond before Lydie did, although her words were directed solely at Loanin, something like anger furrowing her brow around those sensitive horns. “How do you think Revan can help?”

“Go with Azen, Mekel.” Dear Old Dads not bothering to explain. Sending Mekelkins off with the kiddos. Telos would have thought this was all hilarious.

If Telos was here they’d already be gone—

Lydie’s face flushed. “You knew this could happen, Azen? You put the people of Katarr in danger? All the Jedi? The children?”

“Everything is risk,” the Coruscanti Senator asshole Jedi said. “Atris warned me that the Fleet were liable to pull back from their end of our bargain.” He nodded to Vrook and Kavar. “We all had shared concerns, but once we realized the need for action was severe, we took measures to ensure the survival of as many Force-users as possible—as well as the destruction of Darth Nihilus.”

“Stay with Master Loanin,” Vrook ordered Mekel. He turned and walked away toward the shore and the half-submerged ship before Mekel had a chance to say frack off or good-bye, or anything else at all. Master Kavar turned and went in the opposite direction, breaking into a Force-enhanced run that blurred his robes before he vanished behind a dune.
“Come with us, Mekel,” Loanin said. “We will need your assistance.” His teeth pulled back from his lips, gray eyes hard as duracrete. “Your experience with my wife implies that you’re… good. With people.”

XXX

“There’s activity on shore.” Kex looked up from the scanner, which flickered on and off, only half operational since the crash. “No weapons.”

“They aren’t here to harm us, Kex.” Absently, Revan waved him off, staring at the viewscreen. Some Jedi there. Less than she had sensed before.

We’re safe. For now. But something’s wrong. Something’s coming. Something’s coming from the sky—

“Sensors say the water’s only a few meters deep. We should be able to evacuate this vessel easily,” Millifar shrugged. “No sign of Republic troops, just Jett’ai and Miraluka.”

“The water’s acid,” Cody broke in. “But it looks like the Miraluka are assembling life rafts for us.”

“Are you intact?” Aemelie’s voice crackled over Canderous’s commlink. “The Republic ships have fled, no doubt cowed by your power. A new ship has arrived, but we are burning it from the sky, even now—”

“The Republic Fleet left?” Dak froze, half-turned toward Cody.

The commander nodded. “All ships were ordered to make the jump to hyperspace, to return to their assigned stations outside of this system.” He stared down at his screen. “I never thought they’d go through with it....”

“But that doesn’t make sense! What’s the point of dropping us down here and then leaving?” Revan felt Dak Vesser’s panic, a small shockwave in the Force, eddies of it echoing as if other Jedi reacted as well, somewhere outside the ship. Outside. My uncle. Uncle—

“What doesn’t make sense?” Her mind was still half in the sky. “We’re all fine,” Revan assured Aemelie. “That was… some kind of miracle, but we’re all fine. You’re under attack?”

“We are attacking. The salvage ship hailed us,” Aemelie continued. “Using Mandalorian codes.” She scoffed. “Dikut Dar’manda on the Ravager said we should run. That this is not our fight. We will burn them from the sky.”

“Dar’manda? Mercs? You need to… send a shuttle for us.” Revan tried to think of a fracking plan now, but there was something else—something, like a shadow flickering on the edge of her vision. “The Harbinger won’t fly again, I think. Not without work.”

“If the Pinion is intact, it does not matter. Husband, would you check to make sure it survived your landing? Did you have time to make the repairs? They shouldn’t take long.”

“Not yet, Aemelie.” Canderous snorted, and stood. “You’re saying that salvage ship above is dar’manda? Are they trying to win back honor?”

“It would be impossible for them to win anything.” Aemelie’s laugh rattled over the comm channel. “A moment, while we end them.”
“Bank the ship more sharply,” Sion urges their pilot. “I believe it’s that continent over there that holds the prize Nihilus wants. No need to worry about landing codes or local protocol—we’re quite cloaked.”

“If we burn on entry, we’re never getting back up again,” the pilot snaps. “Let me do this!”

[“Food,”] Nihilus reminds them. [“She is food and I am here.”]

Before he had been a prince. And then she came. Then they came, her with her lying consort, and his master and hers—

XXX

“My name is Malak D’Reev.” The other boy was tall and broad, the bulk of him taking up too much space on the skywalk. “Master Jopheena said you had questions. She thought we might be more convincing than another three Jedi masters lecturing you about responsibility and destiny....”

“Why you?” A week ago, Blood Moon woke, howling at the sky. There was a saying your drexl sensed danger first... but Blood Moon was no longer his drexl. And Davad was no longer a prince. All too suddenly, his aunt who was never his aunt had upended his entire life. Now there were Jedi in the Kira palace on Iziz—all here for him. The Jedi unsettled the beasts. He could almost swear he felt the planet scream in protest under the tramp of their boots.

“I’m a Coruscanti senator’s son... and you're a prince of Onderon.” Padawan Malak shrugged lazily. “But now, we’re Jedi. Being a good Jedi is harder than ruling any planet.”

Davad had heard this kind of lecture too many times from dear Aunt Vima, the Sunrider scion who had taken on testing all the palace children—nobles and bastards alike. Being a Jedi, Aunt Vima said, was the ultimate service, the ultimate sacrifice. But only for those with merit—

Aunt Vima had taken that bastard Kavar the first season, and Davad had felt a dull and unreasonable envy. Now, she was back for him, with a pack of other Jedi and these two unremarkable children. The boy was too tall and the girl—

“What’s she?” He nodded at the redhead standing a few meters down from them, staring out at the city, doing a terrible job of pretending she couldn’t hear them. Her nose was long and tilted at the end, and her eyes almost too far apart. It gave her the look of a flightless bird, he thought, although the pink bow of her lips held promise. There was a sly knowingness in her plush smile. “Heir to an Alderaanian barony? Princess of Naboo?”

“She’s from Hoth. Her name is Revan.” Malak’s careless tone was a feint, although Davad had been too young to realize at the time. “Another padawan, like me, here with her master, Vima Sunrider.”

“I like her mouth.” Davad shrugged. “Why didn’t Vima send her to seduce me, instead of you?”

Malak blinked. You would think a senator’s son would be wise to the ways of the galaxy, but the Coruscanti just looked shell-shocked. It made him look much younger, even being so tall. “What?”

Would Davad have noticed her so quickly if he hadn’t been told of their common master? Would he have assumed the familiarity? She was beautiful, but in his first memory, he remembered only the red hair, the pale face, those features too large for it, as if she hadn’t quite grown to them.
“Mal?” she called out. Her eyes skipped over Davad as if he didn’t exist.

“Prince Davad was just asking if you were a princess of Naboo,” Malak said.

That bow-mouth curved, masking a Force power that made the drexl in the courtyard below them roar, circling back uneasily. Tied to the planet as he was then, Davad had felt the same sudden unease, looking back into her leaf-green eyes.

It wasn’t her strength that drew him. He had his own. And yet, there was something—

“When she called out…” she said, walking forward. Her hand was small and white when it extended, and clasped his own. “I’m Revan. And you’ve met Mal.”

“Malak,” the other boy corrected, slightly stiffly.

“Mal-ak,” the girl repeated. “I’ve studied the Beast-riders of Onderon, Prince Davad. Do you have a drexl?”

He would not look in the direction of the stables, of his cousins, of Blood Moon, who he could sense, even now, still dozing in the hot sun. “No.” Not anymore.

“Oh.” The look of disappointment on her face faded so quickly he suspected it was feigned too. She and the Senator’s son, both with polite Jedi smiles as they ripped him from the nest—

No. I wanted to go. I had to go. Vima said I had a great destiny—with them. With her—

Xxx

[[“She is Revan,”]] he tells Jasp and Sion, but they are too busy quibbling about landing coordinates to pay attention… and then something else catches Nihilus’s attention: a shadow, a sky-sense.

Revan is not the only familiar meat on this world.

Blood calls to blood.

[[“I will consume you!”]] Nihilus promises Kavar Vakla, bastard cousin, traitor to Onderon and all of them. [[“I will take your essence and bleed it dry.”]]

“He’s giving me a headache with all of the screaming,” Sion snaps to Jasp Organa. “Make the ship fly faster.”

XXX

Dxun. The Demon Moon. Taste of sweet rot in his mouth from the scent of the night-blooming flowers. On the summer solstice, night and day aligned, and the Dxun moon grew close enough that its atmosphere bled into the sky of their planet; colors of orange and gold mixing with a heartrending blue.

Davad, and his brothers, and cousins, and all their royal escort would mount their great drexl and fly straight up, angling towards that impossible moon, the thread between their worlds. The air would grow thin and their limbs would shake; but they’d still rise, impossibly high—until the moon’s heavier gravity took hold, and the wings of their great beasts would falter and fall, plummeting towards the demon moon suddenly below.

It was a true test of a rider’s skill, to guide a beast through its fear of falling, fear of oblivion; against all of its natural impulses: to command it to spread its great insectine wings and glide, catching the dense air currents, and angling down, slowly, gentle as a lover’s kiss.

Do it right, and a feast awaited.

“I’m going to join the Jedi.” His cousin was pale where Davad was dark, but they had the same cast of features, Kira blood ran true enough for that.

“Ugh. Why?” Davad reached for another cannock rib, savoring the grease on his fingers, the smell of salt and spice in his nostrils. Even as he asked, Davad knew already. Aunt Vima was at the feast today—there, at the table next to his own queen mother. She was there and dressed like a Jedi. She was there and dressed to be a Jedi because she was going to take one of them away.

He tried to ignore the tug of envy in his gut, that she had chosen the bastard over him.

“Why?” he repeated to Kavar. “We have everything we need here. Jedi have to swear allegiance to the corrupt Republic! Why would you leave?”

“And no sex,” Drella, their cousin, added. “Jedi don’t have sex. You knew that, right?”

“Neither do we,” Kavar pointed out. “Not yet.”

“Speak for yourself.” Davad winked at the visiting princess from some Core planet he’d never heard of sitting across from them. She’d only let him kiss her hand so far, but he was optimistic.

“I am,” Kavar said. “And I’m going.”

“Disgusting.” Drella took a sip of stolen wine from her water goblet and giggled.

But Aunt Vima was staring at Kavar now—and even when Davad smiled, she would not meet his eyes.

“It’s not sex that’s forbidden, only attachment,” Kavar corrected them. “Attachment to individuals —”

XXX

No attachment. That is another Jedi lie.

A ship shoots up past them, high above and into the sky. It is full of half-embered sparks, full of food, but moving too fast. Nihilus growls, but there is more food on the planet below. Kavar is on the planet below.

Attachment of blood and kin. And her. And her—her ties that bind.

“The Jedi appear to be concentrated there—” Sion points to the ground below, where there is a yawning pit like a mouth, full of treats within. Nearby, as if promised, a landing strip, half-finished, and a few ships. The Jedi had used fighters like that in the wars. Davad had flown one himself, once. Nothing like a drexl, nothing like the swift bank and glide. “Do we care that they have some trap?”

[“No,”] Nihilus tells him.
“He says he’s hungry,” Jasp Organa whispers.

One of the snubs below is lit, engine trace visible through the clouds. Nihilus can feel the power within, like the sleepy touch of a boma’s claw.

[“Him.”] He growls softly.

Does Kavar know the beast sleeps within him too? Ties of bone. Nihilus could show him and then —

The hunt would be glorious. Two to flank her. Sion is too slow. He does not want to eat.

“He wants to go there first,” Jasp Organa tells Sion. “We need to land there, by that pit.”

Revan’s feet had taken her to the bridge’s emergency airlock before her mind registered that she’d known where to go.

_of course, I knew. Hammerhead-class. Evacuation routes are designed to alleviate chokepoints—_

The locked mechanism was nothing that couldn’t be sheared open by the Force. The latch snapped, revealing an acrid salt-smell, grayish-green water lapping on the Harbinger’s side. Ahead of them, robed figures were bobbing up and down in small, flat boats. A few more Jedi gathered on shore, scattered with the natives in garishly bright clothes, spots of red and green and blue among Jedi beige.

A ship half-burning overhead was too low in the atmosphere to be in orbit, and above it, the Aleema hovered, sparks of fighters around the bow like stars.

Revan’s mind tallied the sparks, even as she looked ahead towards the figures in the boat coming to greet them. There are two squads from the Aleema. They have two squads and Aemelie is sending them all after that ship—

That empty ship—

The black cold made her gasp again, even as a splash of salt-spray stung her hand. The black cold was like a scream in her head. Not coming from the ship—but below.

Another ship, cloaked. Smaller.

For a moment, the cold scream sounded like her name.

“Revan!” a real Human voice interrupted, drawing her attention back to the approaching boats. The one in the foreground held Vrook Lamar. Vrook’s voice was still far away to carry and yet it did, buzzing in her mind, the touch of a warm hand.

“Uncle—” The wind blew strands of her hair back in her face, and she pushed them away.

“Niece.” He nodded stiffly as the small boat approached, holding out an arm as if he was going to help her aboard, but there was no need. She jumped aboard easily, pulling the Force to land without rocking it.

Dak and Kex boarded, slightly more awkwardly. Canderous and Millifar used their jet packs to board—and Commander Cody edged on, glaring at them all. Behind them, two more petty officers followed and then their boat was full, pulling away, and turning toward shore. A row of rafts behind them, staffed by droids and children, stood in line to get the rest of the Harbinger’s crew. Their raft pulled away, giving room to another, this one manned by a droid and a Miraluka kid who didn’t look old enough to drive it.

“You’re well,” Vrook said to Revan. The ship cut through the water and she realized that he and the Miraluka were controlling it with the Force. “Not the best time for a reunion, but I… I’m glad to see you—even here.” He took a step forward at the same time she did, which brought them awkwardly close.

It felt strange when his arms suddenly locked around her shoulders, and he pulled her to his chest. But when she awkwardly hugged him back it almost felt normal.

“Uncle.” Revan tried to keep sounding calm. “Why are there so many Jedi here?”

“A trap.” He glanced at the sky, as they watched the burning ship, the Aleema’s bulk above it, so low in the sky. Vrook’s gaze shifted down, and with a chill, Revan realized he was tracking that null-space—that scream—the same one in her mind now too. “A trap for Davad Arkan, the Sith Lord who calls himself Nihilus.”

“It looks like a trap for Jedi,” she pointed out. “The Fleet left, and we’re all stuck here. Arkan is coming—I think in a shuttle? You know?”

Vrook’s eyes were dark, and there were more lines on his face than she remembered from the man who had lectured her on Dantooine. “We do.” Lines drew the sides of his mouth into a scowl, and he dropped his arms from her shoulders, stepping back again. “We lured Darth Nihilus here to make an end. The Fleet was to burn his ship in orbit above this world.”

“Well, his ship’s burning, but the Fleet’s gone and it’s both of them.” Revan could feel them. Dark coldness pressing down from above. Like death. Like a scream. “Oerin Lin and Davad Arkan. Arkan eats the Force—I told you before. And Oerin… he can’t be killed! How the hell do you think Force users can stop him—either of them?”

“Oerin?” Millifar interrupted. “Lin is dead. You mean the dead thing.” She nodded briskly at Revan. “You may help me and Kex kill it permanently, Third Wife. It must be done as soon as possible.”

“Did you know the Fleet was going to leave?” Dak was glaring at Commander Cody, who just looked miserable. “Did you know this would happen?”

“There was a rumor….” Cody grimaced. “But I didn’t think they’d go through with it.”

“What?” Revan felt like her attention was being pulled in polar directions: the increasingly cold darkness from the sky, and the chatter of the others on the boat.

“Arkan and Lin are there—on a cloaked shuttle.” Vrook pointed to a spot in the sky, away from where the Aleema’s guns had set the Ravager partially aflame. In the Force, it felt like a dead spot screaming. “High Admiral Rensha and the Fleet were supposed to shoot them down in orbit.”

“But the Fleet left.” The full implications of that sank in slowly, as Revan watched the Miraluka woman adjust the tiller of their boat, steering it to shore. The Miralukan had a piece of clothing over the bridge of her nose and a part of Revan—more intuition than memory—knew that underneath the woman had Force-sensitive receptors stamped in her skin instead of eyes: smooth and eerily unmarked; but beneath them, she would see… everything. “And it’s not just the Jedi. This entire planet is full of Force-sensitives. If he… did you see what Arkan did back on Coruscant in the Jedi Temple? He consumes people! If he eats this entire planet—he could kill nearly everyone—"

The Miralukan’s head lifted. “You would bring death to our world, Jedi?”

“No,” Vrook grated. “We will stop him. We have a plan.”

“When my father rented this valley for your retreat, there was no talk of traps for Force-eaters.”
The cloth over her face was fringed with beads that trembled when she turned her head, eyeless gaze turning to Revan. “And that one is too loud. You frightened my siblings.”

“I’m sorry,” Revan said.

The girl’s mouth twisted in a sneer. “Try and appear more quietly. Your echo drowns the Force.”

They were nearing the shore now. Above, Revan could feel the shuttle’s descent, banking, a wall of blankness. And above it, the snubs—flying blind. Useless. If I was there and not here, I could help. I could help them—

“We do have a plan,” Vrook said. “We had hoped not to need it.”

“Can I help?” Even as she offered, Revan tried to imagine how. Nothing she came up with ended well. You couldn’t blow him up in orbit, so will you try on land? What else could you do?

“Yes.” Her uncle looked a lot like an older version of Mekel Jin, she realized suddenly. “If you… if you would.” He grimaced. “I wish we had more time, Revan.”

Is Mekel here too? Is Dustil? With Malak?

Vrook cleared his throat. “Davad Arkan followed you… before. I supposed you don’t remember, but he thought very highly—”

XXX

The man before her had been a Jedi once. He’d been a friend once. His dark skin had a gray cast to it now, and his eyes were as yellow as hers. Damned.

He ran his tongue across his lips and looked at her. His eyes burned.

"Fetch him. Get Malak. Bring him here." Davad’s expression didn’t change, but she could feel the hunger in it. One of the noblest men she’d known. Once.

XXX

“I know.” Revan didn’t know how to reconcile those memories of a man with one she could not remember at all. I don’t remember him, but Dar would. Malak. Malak would. “Is… is Dustil… still —”

“Dustil is not here.” Vrook’s eyebrows shot up as if she’d surprised him. “Dustil is no longer Force-possessed, but he was taken. Kidnapped by Tenebrae. I thought you knew—Dustil is on Dromund Kaas—”

“No. I didn’t. But he’s… then he’s on Kaas with her.” The wash of anger was visceral. She betrayed me. And she has Malak too? “So, Dustil is on Kaas, and so is Carth.” And Polla Organa. And Seiran Wen? There was a puzzle in all of that, but they were out of time. “Wait. You said… Dustil’s no longer Force-possessed?"
“I did.” He scanned her face, as if he was looking for a reaction.

Revan willed none to be visible. Did that mean Malak was dead? If so, then Malak was irrelevant—all fracking irrelevant, compared to the threat of a Force-eating Sith Lord descending upon them.

Why would the Jedi lure Arkan here, and not to Dromund Kaas where he could defeat our enemies?

“So, Malak is gone.” She felt nothing. She would feel nothing. “What is your plan for Davad Arkan, Uncle?” I will not call him fracking Darth Nihilus. Fracking Darth Nobody.

On the shore in front of them she sensed power—the same unity of power that had helped her and Dak land the ship before. Councilmembers, Jedi Knights. All strong in the Force. The power they had all channeled so recently into helping her land the Harbinger shone through the mist almost palpably, even if the Jedi themselves were hidden from view.

Like a beacon. A trap for Arkan?

Canderous snorted. “If you think Revan’s gonna sit there singing Jedi songs with you lot while that Force-eating di’kut comes, you Jedi deserve to die.” He shook his head and spat into the water. “Revan, let’s get out of here. Lin deserves a death in stars, and that Force-eater of yours… we can burn him there too.”

But what about this world? The Miralukan girl muttered something under her breath too fast to catch.

“If all our efforts fail, Darth Nihilus will continue to Sith space.” Vrook glanced up. Clouds half-hid the burning Ravager and the larger Aleema from view. “With every life Nihilus takes his strength increases. Conservative estimates put at least two billion Force-sensitives in the Sith Empire. You once chastised the Council for its inaction, Revan. Now, we must act—not only to save ourselves—”

“But to save Sith?” Millifar copied her father and spat over the side. It probably meant something in Mandalorian, but frack if Revan knew what. “They are not honorable people.”

Arkan could end the Emperor. And Dar’Revan. And everyone else on that world. In that system. Everyone with a scrap of Force-sense—

And then?

It was practicality that made her think of Carth and Polla Organa there. If they’re even still alive. Davad would destroy all the Force-sensitives, but they don’t have it. They’d still be alive—

But not Dustil. Not if he’s there too.

And then what?

“And then what?” Revan scoffed. “Does the Fleet think they can just blow him up later? The Emperor is unkillable… if Arkan gets more powerful, doesn’t it stand to reason that he might be unkillable too?”

Could they? If the Fleet amassed at a jump point after he destroyed the Sith worlds—could they destroy him? Would they? And what if they can’t?

“Your plan is to sacrifice ourselves, Master Vrook?” Dak interrupted. “How will that stop him?”
“We prepared a trap.” Vrook nodded in the direction of the horizon. “Not a sacrifice.” He grimaced. “We hope.”

XXX

“You should have told me.” Lydie could hear that familiar scream she had felt before—but magnified—pressing down from above, as if the meters of rock between them and the surface meant nothing at all.

Azen waved at the padawans entering the tunnel, gesturing for them to continue. “I had hoped to be wrong about the necessity.”

Behind them, Mekel Jin was quiet. Too quiet. She would not look at him. She would not think of him. She would not wonder if their affair was what Azen meant when he said Mekel was good with people—

“The Fleet—those soldiers—they betrayed us.” She should feel something, Lydie thought. Anger—or grief. Instead, she was just numb, staring at the children filing past them, each one already wearing their neural disruptor, filing down the curving tunnels of the old mine to the chambers below. “Why would the Republic leave the Jedi—leave this planet—to die?”

“The Fleet acted without Senate approval,” Azen told her. “High Admiral Rensha will be removed. You and I—and the other survivors—will need to testify before chambers when this is over.”

“There was no other way? We could have commandeered their ships, or taken our own—”

“The Jedi have no fleet, no weapons of mass destruction by design,” Azen reminded her sharply, as if Lydie was one of his students, as if she hadn’t taken the same history classes he had. “Power is more easily abused when it is close to hand.”

“But we aren’t there.” She should feel something other than relief—and she did. Guilt, dark and bubbling near the surface. “Master Kavar, the others—” most of them councilmembers she had never seen in person, drawn from a hundred remote worlds. “How was it decided that we get to live?”

“We are weak, comparatively, in the Force.” Her husband grimaced. “I thought you, of all people, would understand. You’ve faced Nihilus before.”

“Nihilus.” It was a foolish name, a whisper of rumor that seemed to have nothing to do with the handsome Human man Lydie remembered from before—before that time in the Temple library, when he’d almost killed her. “Knight Arkan was just a man! They could… shoot him. Use grenades—”

“And they will. But any Force user can shield themselves from simple armaments. It may take more than that.” His gray eyes were cold and clear when they met hers. “We must prepare ourselves. The Jedi may fail.”

Lydie watched the children file past them, all of them so young. The Miralukan on this planet were entirely defenseless. And so much depended on their Sith Lord taking the bait—

“If they fail, we will have to rebuild the Council, avert the Sith threat, assist the Senate—”

“Yes,” Azen said. He smiled, reaching for her hand. “We will rebuild the Order, Lydie. From the ashes. Make a new galaxy, better than the old.”
“What could go wrong with that?” Mekel Jin was rolling his eyes. Even without looking back, Lydie just knew.

Lydie squeezed Azen’s hand back, dully, trying not to remember her history lessons, of how many Jedi had thought similar thoughts before—and how severe the consequences had been. “What about Revan Starfire?”

“My hope is that her conscience will keep her with the others,” Azen said. But he wasn’t looking at her now—his head had turned back to Mekel. His features were twisted in an uncharacteristic scowl. “With the rest of her family.”

“I was thinking about starting a family,” Mekel drawled back. “Got some practice in, while we were here. Did Lydie tell you?”

Azen’s hand gripped hers so hard that it hurt. “It was implied,” he said tightly. “And irrelevant.”

“Azen—” she knew her face was flushed, and she should be concerned with their fate, but all Lydie could see in that moment was her own humiliation—and the two men who had brought it to pass. Like it’s their fault, she chided herself. You were the one who fell for black eyes and a crooked smile. And if it wasn’t for the way he looked when he talked about Dustil, you’d fall again. Or you would have. She realized that she had turned to glare at Mekel Jin herself.

To her surprise, he hunched his shoulders and looked at the ground. “Sorry, Lyd,” he muttered. “You… you’re okay?”

“Yes,” she said. And was surprised to find it true.

At the end of the world, neither of them matter all that much. She smiled at one of the frightened padawans and took the girl’s hand, dropping Azen’s.

“Apologies are irrelevant,” Azen broke in. “Our concern must be the preservation of the Jedi above all else.”

Ahead, the corridor opened to a vast room with glistening white walls. Large as a hangar bay—and it was a hangar bay. Rows of light cruisers, a few disc ships. Thirty maybe. All the transport the Jedi had brought to this planet. All hidden.

Above, the watery sun shone down through a circular hole in the sky. As they watched, one of the ships rose up and out of the hole.

“Where are they going?” Lydie asked.

“Into hiding,” her husband said, smiling at a few padawans clustered next to them. “All assigned to different planets. “Once the threat of Darth Nihilus has been eliminated, we will reassemble and rebuild. You and I are assigned to Iridonia.” His voice brightened as if that would please her.

“I barely remember it.” Ma might be upset about Aunt Marla. What would I say? I’m sorry, Ma. Revan Starfire killed your sister, because she was a Sith spy—

“I’ll pass on Iridonia,” Mekel Jin said. “If it’s all the fracking same to you.” He looked restlessly up at the sky. “Any of these ships going to Dromund Kaas?”

“No,” Azen said. “But I can arrange to send you to Hoth, Citizen Jin. Your father’s home planet?
When the temperatures fall at night, I’ve heard the locals compare it to hell.”

XXX

Above, the Ravager burns. Sion will not like it, but they will need his people’s ship. Sion is too easily led because he does not care. But he cares about his people. Perhaps Nihilus will leave him behind.

Will Jasp Organa still follow without Sion’s will to guide?

Perhaps. Dead Sion has broken Jasp Organa—taken all of his pain and made him flat.

The man’s mind is laid bare now, laden with sadness, with memories. She will know those times, remember the careless brown-eyed child riding an eight-legged beast, the fields of aromatic plants, this father’s touch.

In his own mind, Nihilus remembers how their master would not let him help her. He wanted to help her.

XXX

Davad spread out the reports stolen from the Jedi Temple on the table. His shadows had been diligent, but there was little enough there—a holo of a red-haired child’s face, some scribbled notes about Force potential.

But I had to see.

Now he had. The child looked too much like his father, except for the red of his hair.

No children, she told me. No more children.

“A child’s life is fragile,” Traya murmured. Was she behind him now, or merely in his mind? Davad would not look—it made no difference. “Fragile as a world, and everything in it.”

“I would not hurt him.” The boy was irrelevant, a vestigial limb to a vanquished dynasty. Rather like Davad himself. But he had promised to watch and so he would.

“I would have trained him as I did her.” Traya laughed softly. “But the boy lacks strength. All my effort for nothing.”

“Another failed plan?” Davad didn’t bother to hide the scorn in his voice. His master would not care. “You have had so many failed apprentices, Master.”

Failed children. Some hers by blood. Others like him, forged in her games.

“We fight with tools at hand, Beast-Lord.” Footsteps. Davad would not turn. Would not look. Her voice was sweet and soft, almost beguiling, like the nursemaid she’d pretended to be long ago, rocking the sides of his cradle. “What greater weapon than turning what is Tenebrae’s to our cause? I have done it. Revan is mine again.”

“Tell Revan, not me. She still thinks she’s a Deralian smuggler.” In the holo of the boy’s face he could see resemblance: something about the eyes, the red of the hair. Would the mindwiped Revan see it too?

For a moment, madness seized Davad. I could bring this report to her. I could show her the son and earn her trust—we are strong, we would be strong enough to end Malak and my master both—
But then his master interrupted his thoughts, invading them with her own demands.

“She will leave Manaan after she finds the Star-Map? Their next port of call?” Her voice, sharp as knives, asking what she already knew.

“They plan to go to Korriban next. As you surmised, they seem to be seeking a path using the Builder’s maps to Lehon, or Belsavis, or Dromund Kaas—”

“But which, I wonder?” His master sounded thoughtful, but Davad knew better. He knew. And so did she.

“Lehon.”

“Where Darth Malak sleeps, wrapped in his fading dream.” Traya sounded pleased. “She is strong enough now for that. She will defeat him.”

Davad remembered the woman in the drowning hall, weeping over the dead scientists, and wondered.

XXX

Davad Arkan had been wrong to wonder. He should have never doubted her—

Nihilus has no doubts. Her will is strong. It will be delicious.

But first—Nihilus roars, and dimly, as if through fog, prey answers, the call of the lesser, bastard beast.

XXX

Their plans for defense had already been in motion when word came from Loanin’s padawan, confirmed by Master Atris. Word that Vima Sunrider still lived, stripped of her power. Word that it was Sunrider’s hand behind the Fleet’s defection. And, with that, words of apology from Master Atris, for a betrayal she had been too blind to see.

Kavar Vakla sat in the snub fighter, trying to make peace with his own thoughts. There is no peace. There is nothing but stopping him. My cousin. The man who is the death of worlds.

Kavar Vakla’s mother had been a dancer: a city girl, pretty enough to attract a Beast-Lord’s eye for Summer Festival. His birth had been a secret, but common shame. Just another babe left in a basket on the Palace Steps seven moons after Festival. But Kavar Vakla had become a Beast-rider, even as a child, strong enough to attract the attention of a Sith Lord.

Blind enough to never see her. Vima Sunrider took him for Jedi, and then found another master to train him, less than a year after.

“Too quick to anger, too quick to seek conflict,” Vima had chided. “You need another master.”

Only now, did Kavar realize the rejection had been a reprieve—one his cousin, Davad Arkan, had never received. Davad was hers all along. Davad was Sunrider’s and Sunrider was Sith—

All of those bodies in the Jedi Temple. All upon Kavar’s conscience—because of all of them, he should have known. Blood calls to blood. When Davad followed Revan to the Mandalorian Wars, Kavar should have stopped him. When Davad fell to the Sith, Kavar Vakla should have tried harder to make an end.
I stopped Malak, he reminded himself. Vrook’s son confirmed it. Tenebrae does not have his Sith puppet—not yet.

And Sunrider will lose hers today.

Once, Kavar had thought Revan Starfire would be the one to stop Tenebrae, but the Force had brought her here instead. Perhaps it was fitting that if Kavar failed, she would be the lure cast to draw his cousin deep.

But today is not the day I die. I must not fail. Less premonition than hope. But he felt his resolve harden in the Force, with the full strength of his will behind it.

“Flight checks, Master Kavar.” Knight R’tar’s comm broke in on his feed. “We’re clear for ascent.”

“You all sense him.” Four ships, four Jedi against a monster. “Flank from below, drive his ship higher. On my mark, we’ll launch the plasma bombs. Get in close, so he can’t deflect them—”

“But the Ravager’s shuttle is unarmed,” Knight Querith noted.

“That doesn’t matter,” Master Lavash said, before Kavar could. “From the observed incidents on Coruscant, Kreeg, and Ord Mantell, we know that Arkan possesses the ability to manipulate space far beyond his person. Get close… but not too close.”

“This beast will have claws,” Kavar added. “I mean that literally. Be careful.”

Grimly, Kavar put the flight helmet on his head, displays activating with a whir, as he reached for the controls. Like all Jedi snubs, theirs were designed with heavy guns and minimal instrumentation—read-outs and calibration meant to be sensed by the Force more than measured.

Above their heads, he felt the shuttle descending and the black scream of nothing within—

XXX

“This is your plan?” The Force felt like flames on Revan’s skin, as if all the Jedi around them were deliberately projecting their power. Different from the gentle tide that had helped guide the flagship—the Force now burned with desperation. And more than a little darkness. “This is your plan? Lure him down a hole? It’s insane.”

The hole in the surface of Katarr was some ten meters across, and perfectly circular, like a crater. It was surrounded by an orderly mob of robed Jedi, with a few masked Miralukan. A lift of scaffolding and wire was bolted precariously on one lip and, as they approached, a platform set in the scaffold descended, filled with a group of silent padawans.

An alarm chimed, somewhere from the pit below.

“That’s a warning. A ship is taking off,” her uncle noted.

“Taking off?” Revan walked to the edge and peered down. “From down there?”

“Stand back—” Vrook put his hand on her arm, and Revan looked at him, startled. The gesture was strangely familiar, like something she should have known, like the hug had been earlier. He frowned at her, as if thinking the same thing. “You’ve dyed your hair again.”
What? Yes, I….” On Deralia. I was trying to look Deralian. “What the frack is this?”

“A salt mine.” It was the Miralukan girl who answered. “My father’s salt mine. The Jedi have been using it for storage.”

The alarm chimed again, three times this time.

“That’s the departure warning,” Vrook said. “Stand back—”

“Departure?” Revan took several steps away from the edge with the rest of them, trying to ignore the whispers from the group of Jedi.

Two ships shot into the air, rising almost straight to the sky and the black. Rush of ion engine as they shot into hyperspace.

“Give us ships,” Millifar snorted. “Kex and Father and I will blow your monsters from the sky.”

“We only have four fighters.” Vrook’s voice was grim. “Master Kavar and his squadron will attempt to destroy Nihilus’s shuttle.”

“And if they fail?” They will. Maybe an entire fleet could have burned him, but they’re Force users, even getting close is a risk. A risk for me too. For any of us.

Her eyes went back up to the Aleema, high in the sky above.

Another light cruiser shot into the air in front of them, banking and lifting away. It jumped into hyperspace low—lower than Polla Organa would have risked it.

“Desperate,” Dak said to Vrook, like the word was an insult. “You’re getting everyone out. Everyone that you can—”

Vrook nodded and turned to Canderous. “You and your children should stay above. Keep the area clear—for at least fifty meters.”

“No chance.” The Mandalorian had put his helm back on again at some point. Now, the visor shook back and forth. “We go where she does.”

“Canderous, Vrook’s right.” Sinking feeling in her gut as Revan eyed the space below. Why underground? Revan could think of one good reason—and it wasn’t good at all. Fracking insane. Fifty-meter blast radius? And there might be aftershocks. Implosions. Can’t be that stable if it’s an abandoned mine to begin with. “You and the kids need to stay clear of this pit. If we fail… someone is going to have to clean up this Jedi mess.”

“You don’t have to come with us, Revan,” Vrook told her, voice gentle. “I want you to know that.”

One of the other Jedi were handing Dak and the Miralukan girl Force disruptors. To hide them. They’re hiding everyone they can—— And drawing Arkan out with the others. The non-hidden ones. All that power—meant as a lure.

“Do you have enough of these Force-blockers for my brothers?” the Miralukan demanded. “Will these keep us safe? We trusted you!”

“I’m sorry,” the Jedi— Lonna Vash— a part of Revan’s mind supplied the name, even as the Human woman’s cool eyes appraised her, looking past the girl who had helped them as if she no longer existed. “Your family was warned. We offered the option of evacuation, but they chose to “Idiots!” The girl’s veiled face turned, as if she sensed the answer already. Without another word, she broke into a run across the sand, heading for a cluster of huts outlined on a hill above.

“I will,” Vrook said. “On the lift. We need to descend now. There are ships below. You still have time to decide.”

“Revan.” Canderous’s voice was granite. Familiar. Less a question than a reminder.

“Like I said.” Revan swallowed, meeting his helmeted head. Her own reflection was blurred and grim. “Stay above ground. Here. Keep an… eye on things. That family.” The girl was running across the sands. “That girl’s family. Go with them. If the Jedi frack this up, you’re gonna need to clean it up. Everything. Here and on Kaas.”

“Your sacrifice will be remembered,” Kex told her. He looked like he was thinking about kneeling, the way his shoulders bent, and his hands came forward.

Canderous snorted under his helm. “Don’t,” he offered. “Don’t die.”

Her mouth felt dry. Her breath was stale. “I… I won’t.”

“We hope it won’t come to that.” Vrook took Revan’s arm, as she was still trying to come up with a better response, guiding her almost gently to the lift and the pit below.

XXX

Kavar Vakla’s ship rises on a bed of soft air, as the other three do as well. The black spot overhead is closer, a few thousand meters—nothing to one of their snubs. He and Davad had fought in ships like this together once, above the skies of Serroco.

Serroco, where they met as men, as Jedi—friends once more.

It makes no logical sense, but Kavar Vakla hears the rustle of wings, feels the coil of the great beast beneath him, holds the thruster like rough saddle leather, urging his mount higher to the sky—

Above to sky. To joust with the King above.

It makes no sense, but the Force opens inside him, spreading like dark wings across the alien sky.

It makes no sense, but Kavar roars his challenge to the heavens and the Beast-King answers.

XXX

In times of old, when the Beast-riders of Onderon kept their bloodlines close, and all men were Kira—equals—under sun and sky, their leaders were chosen in trials of combat. Trials in sky.

Now, Nihilus feels the challenge from below, roared through the Force as much as air.

“Four ships, firing on us.” Jasp Organa sounds startled, fear breaking through the dull flatness that Sion’s presence has stamped on his soul. “Firing at us.”
“Jedi,” Sion says. “There are Jedi flying those fighters. The cloaking on our shuttle is useless.” He bends over the controls, adjusting as if they will help.

He does not understand that Nihilus is flying the beast now; they are mere passengers in its belly.

The viewscreen bursts in a blaze of blue-white fire, and there is the scream, somewhere, of a turbine shot off their bow. The ship tilts, nose-first, and for a moment, Nihilus almost feels the flex of drelx wings, the coil of scaled muscle beneath him, his hands tangled in the jesses as he urges Blood Moon forward—

“We’re falling.” Jasp Organa is only a man, can only state the obvious. The air grows hot and smolders, makes him cough. Jasp Organa cannot feel the heart of the beast, the glorious dive.

“No,” Nihilus opens his wings. This ship has no fire of its own. He wishes to feel the taste of prey with his own maw. The nearest ship is not the bastard’s, but it will do. It comes closer, angling for the kill and he reaches—

XXX

“Amnesty was granted by a Senate vote of fifty to forty-one.” Kavar went to the controls along the wall of the Force cage, dimming the field around Davad’s cell. “You’re free to go, cousin. Congratulations.”

“I should thank Talia and Vaklu.” Did the bastard think Davad was stupid? “My solicitor showed me the testimony you gave the Senate, arguing for Jedi custody.”

“Talia expects you back on Onderon to hold the throne.” Kavar had one hand on the hilt of his saber when he keyed open the Force lock, leaving nothing but air between them.

“What do you expect?”

Kavar’s eyes were a faded blue. He looked older than Davad remembered. Older than any of them. “I expect Bandon will be disappointed to have his old master back. I expect Malak will have you killed within the year.” He sighed. “And Vaklu may dispose of Talia, if we leave her on her own. They’re too close in blood to marry, and she won’t share the crown. Not with a reformer who wants to sell our world to the Republic.”

“Perhaps when I rejoin the Sith, I can make Onderon a better offer.”

“Hah, hah.” There was still some spine left in his cousin. Davad could see it in the way his lip pulled back from his teeth. “I’m not going to beg. For our planet or our friendship. I was at Endor. And Telos. If you go back to the Sith I will kill you, Arkan.”

“I wasn’t at Telos. That was all Malak.” I was with her.

Kavar folded his arms, standing between Davad and the door. “If you stay with us, you could help us stop him.”

“Stop who?”

“Malak.”

“Why would I want to stop him?” Davad chuckled. “Revenge? Master Kavar, you would make a terrible Sith. Darth Malak was the strongest, and so he won—if someday that changes....”
And it would. He could feel that, like words writ on wind. For it was a lie, Malak’s strength. A lie concealing the Emperor. A lie that shielded them from Tenebrae’s gaze, a lie his true master hid behind. But Davad could no more speak of that than he could cry for Revan.

“If that changes, some other Sith will kill you.”

“I hope you’re not in charge of recruitment.” Davad stretched his arms above his head, turning the gesture into a mockery of a Jedi’s curtsey. “All these promises of revenge, and idle threats. You’re making the Jedi seem much more interesting than they are--”

XXX

“I will kill you,” Kavar had said. But he had not. He will not. Kavar is a liar. Just like Malak was.

Nihilus reaches with his claws, diving in for the kill. The bright spark of another Jedi within. The man’s life, a name, all of it a heartbeat, a gulp. A delicious swallow.

XXX

After their lovemaking, Lord Revan was still, features so frozen she might have been wearing a mask. The cold, blue light from above made her face carved from pearl and space, dark lines radiating from eyes of gold: the mask of a priestess or a queen.

“The schematics of the entire dwelling? Show me again.” Her voice cut through Davad’s skull, even as her fingers closed hard on his arm.

“Here. The Blades of Acknahar’tah brought a full report.” Davad waved a hand to the display by the bed, shifting the image, showing the hall curving in upon itself, like the lines of a shell. “Malak built a fortress on Thule. The defense systems are extensive.”

“The room… the hall… everything is an exact copy, down to the stuffed toys on his bed.” She let go of Davad abruptly. Her hands were dark-lined too. They traced the holo-image, lingering on a stuffed, shaggy toy in a box propped against the wall. She drew a quick breath, as if her composure was rattled. “But he’d be older now. He might want different toys.”

Who? But Davad knew better than to ask. “As I said before, there are no signs of occupation. My shadows found no evidence that Sheris and Malak have a child, or that Sheris is with child.”

“They will have no children.” Ice in his master’s voice made that fact an absolute.

“No children,” she had said before, before, just before he took her against the transparisteel wall.

“This is… another… experiment?” Davad knew a little of what had transpired on her trip to Ziost. The Emperor’s games were even crueler than Traya’s.

“No. My son must never be here.” His lover stared at him, her face a mask of bone and skin, her hands a coiled threat. “You will ensure my son’s safety, Davad. Now and forever.” Revan rose to her feet, pacing slowly to the expanse of stars in the viewscreen of the Aleema. “Promise me. My son must stay on Coruscant. His name is Malachor—”

“His name is Malachor—?” The words escaped before rational thought intruded.

“Yes.” One brow rose towards the ruin of her bright hair. “His name is Malachor, he lives on Coruscant, and Sheris and Malak and the sithspawned Sith Emperor will never have him.” She exhaled, and something in those yellow eyes flickered. “Promise me, Davad. Promise me now.”
“Of course.” You have a son and he is not mine. I would have given you children. I would have made you a queen, but you chose him. Even after all of this, you still choose him. He bowed his head, but Davad did not kneel. So many times she had made him kneel, made him crawl. But now—

When he raised his head again, his master was biting her lip. It took a moment to recognize the expression on her face—so long since he had seen it on her face.

Fear. Naked fear. More vulnerable than all her soft skin.

Revan took another, ragged breath. “Your loyalty makes no rational sense. I made you Sith, but it was not you... not your nature.”

“Before Malachor?” He was starving, suddenly again.

She nodded. “Before Malachor, I remember a man soft enough that he abhorred taking life—any life.”

That was never true. But we see what we desire. Davad still saw her as beautiful. She still saw him as kind.

“Master.” Obeisance and acknowledgement, all in a word.

“Promise,” her voice was dark and low, promising torment as well as delight. “As you love me, you will keep Malachor safe.”

“I... have always loved you, Master.” The answer required. The truth.

She smiled slightly, pale skin stretching over her perfect, white teeth, but the fear still shone in those eyes.

It made him love her more.

“I know.”

XXX

[“I have always loved her,” he tells Sion. “I kept the promise. The boy is not here. I will not eat him today. ”]]

The boy is in Jasp’s mind, not-here. They boy is on a planet called Deralia. Nihilus will try and eat him last. The galaxy is large. It could be years. Centuries.

“Yes, yes, we’re getting close to the food.” Sion rolls his eyes. “Those snubs may blow us up first though. Great plan.”

Nihilus extends a wing and it glitters, Force-enhanced shields curling into a claw. One of the snubs rocks, as tendrils of power rot its hull. The man inside is bright and sharp and delicious. He will be gone in a heartbeat. Just food, this Knight Querith. Not the bastard. No reason for the food to fight, to struggle, to suffer.

“No,” Jasp whispers, voicing the obvious. “Master Nihilus keeps us safe.”

“Huh.” Sion tilts his head, almost looking impressed.

XXX
“Kriffing dar’jett!” Canderous looked up to see the firefight going as bad as he’d expect. There—the Jedi assault had left the shuttle half uncloaked. Looked like one of the engines was shot too, from the plume of smoke—but even as he watched, the thing righted itself, and kept on coming down. The shuttle dodged like it was a dar’jettai itself—missing the ion pulse almost at point-blank range.

“Jett’ai magic,” Millifar scoffed. “They are fools to follow that shuttle. The dead thing wants them close.”

“No choice. They don’t want to let it land.” Canderous had seen fights like this before. Those snubs barely held an atmosphere, pilots relying on suits and the Force to fly. The self-sacrificing ord’inii would burn everything they had, break vanguard lines. Hells, once he’d seen a pack of them ram a dreadnaught, in the skies above Althir.

Glorious. But dumb. The ship had gone down screaming, Jedi and Clan alike.

One of the ships darted forward, maybe seized with a similar suicidal idea, but upon impact with the shuttle, it dissolved instead of shattered. And then the shuttle’s nose was exposed, black and smoking but intact.

“Oh, no,” the kid with no eyes said. They’d caught up with her easy enough, halfway to her house. There’d been a few Miraluka in Clan Wies. Another attempt to bring in Force-users by the woman, maybe. None of Canderous’s business. “He’s… gone. That Jedi in the fighter, he’s—just—gone.”

“Vaporized,” Canderous commented. “Yeah. Neat trick.” He should have spent more time in the armory on the Harbinger, gotten some ground launchers. Instead, all he could do was tap his comm. “Aemelie? Get those squads down here? We’ve got a visible target on Lin and his skanah. Tell the kids to try not to hit the Jett’ai snubs. For once, they’re on our side.”

“Finally!” His wife sounded thrilled. “They’ve been holding formation waiting for a visual.”

“Keep distance,” he warned. “They have magic.”

“What’s your name?” Kex was asking the blind girl. Milli was ignoring them all, her viewers tilted up at the sky, scanning the fight.

“Visas,” the Miraluka said. “But most people call me Vizzy.”

“I’m Kex.”

Millifar made a disdainful noise under her breath.

XXX

Outside the enclave, another ice storm raged. There were no seasons here, but sometimes the wind blew and sometimes it did not. Atris knew without looking that the temperature was dropping again, that this time of year, with its few hours of daylight, left their enclave the only refuge within thousands of kilometers.

A Jedi is beyond petty revenge, but she wondered if leaving the old woman to the ravages of the elements would be kinder than leaving her to realize the extent that they had betrayed her, the utter failure of her plans.

But I would not leave her to die. I am Atris. I am a Jedi Master. I know what that means, even if she has forgotten—
“Has there been any word?” Kreia asked. Her head was bowed, hands folded in her sleeves. She looked frail and helpless and harmless—and Atris had to remind herself once more that so did a jryyysh-snake, right before it sang its death-strike.

Atris had underestimated the old woman so many times before. She had done the old woman’s bidding so many times before.

She would not do it again.

“From Katarr? We were told the Fleet jumped away. Otherwise—nothing.” Atris could only assume that the Jedi were currently fighting for their lives. If they failed, Atris suspected the Force would echo with that failure, with their deaths, as it had before at Malachor.

If they fail, we will remake the order. If they fail, I will make things right. But not as Kreia would have it. Kreia. Arren Kae. Vima Sunrider—how could I have been such a fool not to see?

The Force felt like a blast helmet had been removed from her eyes. Like waking from a long dream.

You made me your betrayer for the last time when you told me to advise the Fleet, Kreia. Without the Force, you have no power here. Without the Force, all your illusions are exposed.

Her eyes met Mical’s across the room, and he gave a brief nod. As requested, Mical had escorted his mother to the main hall, standing with his hands behind his back, while the children of Yusanis flanked Atris.

“An announcement did come,” her foster son said. “Yesterday. From Kaas.” A faint smile played across his lips. “Brianna? Did you have a chance to tell Master Kreia?”

“An official announcement?” The hooded head tilted up, blind eyes dry, staring into space.

“I… did not.” The girl whose face was an echo of Vima Sunrider’s (and why had Atris been so blind to that fact before? So blind to so many things. There was no anger, only purpose—and yet—she could not forget.) “There has been so much bad fortune… I thought… we should spare the woman who gave us our faces further pain.”

“I am well used to pain,” Kreia murmured. “Child, tell me.”

Mical glanced at Atris, and she nodded. Death in an ice storm was fast. She did not want Master Kreia to die—only the hope of her plans. This would be the first blow. If the Jedi on Katarr succeeded, soon the second would fall.

If the Jedi failed….

Then we will call in the Fleet. Again.

Mical nodded. “Yesterday, it was announced that Revan Starfire is dead, and that Emperor Tenebrae is once again the sole ruler of the Sith Empire.”

There was a long pause, and the room seemed hushed. Was it Atris’s imagination that added the arctic chill?

“But that is merely the copy who was on Kaas,” the old woman said finally. “The body of Sheris Loran, succumbed to terentatek poison at last. I-I would know if the real Revan was dead. I would know if she—”
“The translation used the word ‘gith,’” Atris added. “It means ‘both,’ or ‘two.’ Two of Revan Starfire. Gith dead. Both.”

“I would know,” the old woman insisted, but her voice had gone querulous and soft.

“Would you, Mother?” Mical asked. “How? You no longer have the Force.”

XXX

_A few weeks earlier on Dromund Kaas..._

Pain.

_Like being stabbed in the guts by the Mandalore. Like having the back of your skull taken off when the bridge of your flagship explodes. Like a blaster bolt to the chest on Yu-Phaedra, falling out of the sky on Altair, choking on ash-water and xoxon dust on Iridonia._

_Like being seven on Telos and feeling the world end when the building comes crashing down above your head._

_Pain hurts._

When Revan closed her eyes, the pain hurt less. There was nothing to see but the sky and the crowd and the roar of the crowd was not important, so Revan kept her eyes closed.

Her artificial arm had gone entirely numb, like all the nerves had been severed. Her flesh arm felt like something was crushing it down, something that burned and smoked. That same something rolled, twisting over her ribs, she felt two of them break—white-hot sparks of pain, adding to the fire in her veins, the twisting of her guts that felt like they were churning inside out—

She tried to scream, but she couldn’t move her jaw. The world was shaking. Something tasted sour, like bile, like her guts coming up.

_It hurts. Mal, I’m dying, Mal. Malak. I’m—_

_I know._

The crowd noises faded, the world tilted, like someone was carrying her. Arms, carrying her, voices like dark whispers, everything cold.

“Dying hurts.” His lips pressed against her forehead, and his arms cradled her body. A dark chuckle. “How many times, Revvie? How many lives? I'd think you'd be used to it by now.”

She looked up at him. Familiar, broad face, calm, gray eyes staring into hers. Nothing mad in them. His hair hung in loose curls, soft on her cheek.

“She’ll have to do it. The Fragment. Figure out a way—I tried, I—” Grief and frustration were galactic. “I tried, I—”

“No. You're not done.” Malak sat down slowly, still holding her in his arms. The tunnels looked—they looked almost familiar.

_Like the ones on Coruscant._

_Like ours—_
“How are we here?” She asked even knowing. We aren't. We're dead. This is the end—

His broad hand cupped her chin and Malak brought his mouth down hard on hers, nipping her lower lip, his mouth pushing against hers with sudden, passionate intensity.

His hands tore at her robes. Her own hands slid across his bare chest, pushing back his robes. Both of them were panting now, frantic, desperate—

“How are we here?” she murmured in his neck, her mouth lapping at his ear, body rising against his chest, rising, falling, rocking. Her own breath caught—and caught again—“Slow. We have time, Mal, we have all the time in the galaxy—now—”

“No,” he murmured. Voice lost in her breasts, but she heard him, echoes reverberating in her mind. “We don't, Red. We have no time at all. This isn't the end—”

A jolt of agony sparked on her spine, phantom pain from her destroyed arm, sharp stabbing pains in her chest—

Ribs. Spine. Arm. But it's the poison that's the problem, Red. It's the poison that might end you still

—

Malak— his hand slipped away from hers, small and slippery as Malachor’s, vanishing down a long, dark tunnel and then there was no light—no light at all—
"We've lost ten fighters," Dessa reported, unnecessarily, because Aemelie had been monitoring their ship's read-outs. "The rest are blooded in skies, but they failed their mission. The dar'jett shuttle with the dead Oerin Lin is landing, even as we speak."

"And the supply drop?" They would kill him on the sands, then. The dead man should have taken his gift when he had the chance.

"Following Canderous's ping it was delivered successfully. Near the edge of that hole in the ground. What is that hole in the ground?"

Aemelie shrugged. "It looks like a mine."

"What do they mine? Our scans don't indicate any useful metal on this world."

Dessa was full of useless questions.

The communicator that Canderous forget to take when he and Millifar left to rescue Revan pinged again from her pocket. Lately, it did that every hour. Truly, Aemelie would have destroyed it long ago, except the device itself had been a name-day gift from Gwenarius, and at times, their husband was strangely sentimental.

They had long since learned to ignore the comm's soft chime. That astromech droid of Revan's had been demanding to talk to Canderous for the last month, but the obstinate thing never had anything to say to Aemelie.

If Revan had abandoned the droid, she must have had good reason.

The ping came again. Irritating. She tapped the receiver. "Please stop calling."

"Aemelie Ordo?" The computer snapped. It was using Revan's voice again, but Aemelie had only fallen for that trick once.

"Aemelie is not available," she told it, and cut the connection. Lights flashed almost instantly, as if the thing had Canderous's comm number on auto-repeat.

Dessa giggled, despite the gravity of their circumstances. "Is that the T3 droid again? Gwenarius found it useful on Coruscant. Where did it run off to?"

"It doesn't matter. Salt," Aemelie told her. "They mine salt on this planet."

"From that sea?" Dessa looked dubious. "Scans show it's too acidic for life. A jarosite sea. What do they use for equipment that wouldn't dissolve in those waters?"

"Something silicon-based? Plasticore?" Aemelie shrugged. "In truth, I have no idea. Stay on task!"

"Your comm is beeping again." Dessa sighed. "It's giving me a headache."
"Drink some water. And have the survivors land near the Fett Ordo," Aemelie commanded her. "If Oerin Lin cannot be killed with a simple carbine repeater, it may take a few tons of munitions to blow him to pieces."

XXX

"Bantha poo doo!" Mission cursed to herself, sliding between two covered palanquins and a small landspeeder as she crossed the bustling square. Kaas City was no Coruscant, but the International Sector, at least, was always hopping. "Mandalorians!"

Objectively, she thought, you could see how Revan had managed to trick the clans into a fake armistice at Malachor. All she'd have had to do was tell them to go somewhere else and not pick up their stupid comms.

The door to Mission's destination was just up ahead with a familiar form hunched in its outline. If she'd had arms she would have hugged the big lug, but instead Mission rolled up and beeped.

"No change," Zaal growled softly, before she could even ask.

[[Still in a coma,]] she transmitted back to the Builder's installation on Dromund Kaas. [[But, hey! She still could wake up, right?]]

[[Bring me the other one.]] Its tone was weary, as if tens of thousands of years helping to shape this totally evil world of darkness had made poor Kaas computer a little cranky. [[She will serve.]]

[[Sorry! Can't find her!]] Wasn't even a lie.

Mission just hoped Polla Revan had the sense to stay lost. She couldn't exactly warn her on Deralia (Mission's odds only had Polla Revan still being on Deralia at about one to six-thousand-seventy, anyway). She couldn't warn her, not with Kaas lurking on the edges of her own signal, and Kashyyyk agreeing that they needed to "fix things." All she could do was wait. Knowing Polla Revan, she'd have no sense at all… and that was why they all needed to be ready. For anything.

"No change at the palace too," she whined, punctuating her tone with a few random beeps like a good little droid would. Her dome rolled around to check, but no one was paying a Wookiee in a doorway and an astromech any mind. Not on a planet like this, where if you didn't have a black robe and a lightsaber, you didn't exist. "At least Emperor Asshole seems to have gotten over his little crush on Polla Organa."

"Mission, he did not want to mate with her!" Zaalbar sighed.

"Don't be gross, I didn't say he did." She rocking up on her rollers to let the body collector and his cart pass her. "But he's stopped asking Lord Malak to go buy her away from House Blais, so that's good, right? The man has the attention span of a botfly."

"He has too many eyes," Big Z agreed.

"Bring out your dead!" The body collector called through the formall-looking twisted trumpet thing he carried around. Then he blew on it, making a sound like the universe dying.

"This is a weird planet." Mission would have sighed, if she had lungs.

Doors opened under the steps of the surrounding houses as the slaves began dragging out the night's casualties, all wrapped in bright plasticore and splashed with biohazard sigils. She didn't want to know what the Sith body collector did with them — any more than she wanted to know why the death rate seemed to be going up.

Considering they were a planet of murderers, these Sith were awfully squeamish about corpses. They liked causing death but they didn't like to look at it later. They burned bodies—part of some ceremony, supposedly, but Mission thought it was probably just for hygienic reasons.

Lucky for Carth and Big Z and Polla and everybody. It was how they'd gotten that Sheris Loran body out from under Emperor Loser in the first place.

_Canderous. Call Canderous Ordo again._ The alarm she'd set herself chimed in her internal processors and patched through the nets (no easy feat) _again._ It was hard to trace the bits that far out of Sith space—especially with Kashyyyk so suddenly rude and demanding and siding with Kaas—but she did her best.

What was her old pal Canderous doing near a Miralukan colony world anyway? And where the kriffing selsop was Polla Revan the Real—really?

XXX

The sky was lit by flashes of gunfire, the sky was a circle of fading light as they descended into the planet's heart.

Revan remembered that Polla Organa used to have nightmares that started like this—the sky exploding above, a weight pressing down, burying her in the ground. Spacer's fears: vacuum and falling. Now, every instinct Revan had screamed at her to break free of this trap, to run—

" _Run._"

That voice again, echoing in her head.

" _You really should run._"

"What about my men?" Commander Cody was talking to Vrook, glancing up at the disappearing sky as the lift carried them down, into the pit.

"They will be evacuated to a safe location. As will you. We have ships below to take as many as we can."

Revan felt a jolt in her chest as another light in the sky winked out, as the scream grew closer.

_There were Jedi in those fighters—two of them are gone._

" _Run—_"

"Davad Arkan only wants Force users." Revan kept her eyes focused on her uncle's face, trying to ignore the voice in her head. "But everyone will need to stay clear of this pit. You're... going to blow it up, aren't you? The walls will collapse. It still may not be enough."

Every scrap of Force she had was telling her to run away.

_Green eyes widened, looking back at her with abject terror. Behind them came another savage howl—"

" _Run. Run away. I cannot stop her blade before it finds your heart—_"
Who-whose blade—? Revan jerked suddenly, the hallucination had been so vivid that she could still taste the dust on her lips. But in it, she had been speaking with a man's voice—and the face looking back at her was her own.

Xxx

"Run."

But where— when was this? Her own face, eyes wide and frightened. Her hair was dark, almost black, tied neatly in a topknot. She was wearing a pilot's vest, her favorite pilot's vest—

"Polla Organa. You must run. Now." He commanded her, willed her to obey, laying the compulsion deep in her shattered mind.

Those blank, green eyes skimmed past him, seeming to focus on the broken gate, the bodies. From behind the wall's safety more rakghouls roared….

XXX

"Who told you about the bomb, Knight Revan?" A Jedi she didn't recognize brought her back to the present. Female. Sullustan. Her ears were pinned back close to her head.

"It seems logical that there is a bomb." Logical. Not sane. We're all going to die. A part of her was really fracking not okay with that. Another part was losing her mind, hallucinating she was Davad Arkan stalking Polla Organa on Taris.

Not a hallucination, a voice whispered inside. You know what he is.

"The bomb is a last resort. We will try a less drastic measure first." Vrook. His voice seemed to be coming from a great distance. A part of Revan felt disconnected, more attached to the monster bearing down on them than this platform lowering into a pit, this handful of Force users. The prox alarm rang again and another starship blasted past them, rising out of the pit, with more Jedi aboard. Heat seared her face and she tried not to wince.

What happens when the bomb doesn't work? "You… want to lure him into these mines and… trap him first? Try and trap him? You think you can trap him underground?"

"This all seems… desperate," Dak muttered. The former Sith was looking at Revan as if she knew the answers.

"Well, isn't it?" She didn't know what to do except smile. "We've landed in desperate times."

The drone in her ears was growing louder. And then… the world didn't give Revan the courtesy of a warning before it shifted, suddenly becoming another place entirely.

XXX

"Desperate times, old friend." Revan smiled at him from the doorway of his tent, a little sad and worried all at once. Her braids were tangled and there was mud on her face, gray mask pushed up over her eyes. In the dim light, her eyes were almost colorless, narrowed with concern.

"There's mud on your face." His felt warm, probably from the fever of battle. Revan was concerned for him. It wasn't love, but it was something.
"You don't have to come, Davad. If it's too much—"

"Never," he promised. "You'll need more than just you and Malak to make it believable. One Jedi looks like a deserter. Two, like you've both lost your minds. But if we come in numbers crying truce—"

"They'll think we're a trap." Rev nodded. "Clan Rialis won't be expecting Knights Tio and Wekoo leading the charge on their supplies—not when they see three Jedi coming as a frontal assault. But we... we will have to end them all, Davad. Even if they surrender. We've no place to put prisoners."

"I... understand." She still thought of him as kind. It was flattering. "They can't be allowed to report back. They can't be allowed to know that we've taken their tech."

"Yes." Her smile wasn't one. "And... we may have to play this same trick again."

XXX

"Run." Davad's voice again. Louder now. Her legs twitched.

Where was that? When was that? That wasn't... my memory. It was his.

Serroco. Ghost of a whisper in her mind. Troop battalion seventy, the Rialis Massacre. Near the beginning of our war. One of our first victories. The voice turned acid. Before they burned away all our victories on Serroco with seven radioactive bombs, we raided their main munitions cache. A simple task, although it required eliminating dozens of Mandalorian warriors at their main camp. Laughter, like an echo. At that time in the war, we still counted casualties by dozens.

Revan tried not to react. That voice hadn't sounded like Davad at all. It had sounded like Dar.

I could just be losing my mind. That's as logical as anything else. A thousand-meter fall. A week drifting alone in space... Maybe none of this is real.

You know better than that. That voice again. Not Davad's.

"The Jedi... you think you can contain Davad Arkan down here in some pit? What about Oerin Lin?"

Dar'Revan had been working with Oerin and Arkan, Revan was sure of it.

Lin and Arkan gave Dar'Revan that fracking ship that took us off Coruscant. Is Dar in on this too? Is this her plan to destroy the Jedi? Her plan to destroy me? How could she know that I would be here?

How can she be in my head? She never was before.

But she could have spies in the Republic. They could have arranged this. All of this. Luring me here—and the Mandalorians. All of us to one place, all of Dar’Revan’s enemies, ready to be destroyed.

Traps among traps. Revan wasn't sure if she was baiting one or in one anymore.

And it doesn't matter. Either way I must break it.

The Sullustan Jedi cleared her throat. "We are in possession of a null field, Knight Revan. Null to the Force. It was Master Loanin's design. The salt chamber will naturally amplify the ysalamiri enough to form a stasis around the null field. If we can contain Nihilus and Sion, even briefly—we can attempt to reach… anything that remains of the men they were."

"Then what? Offer to mind wipe them?" It came out before Revan thought. Not quite a joke. It doesn't matter. It won't work. "Do you hear that? He's coming."

"Run."

She felt the muscles in her legs twitch, as if the whisper in her mind was a command to be obeyed.

No.

Vrook glanced up at the sky, now a perfect circle above them, surrounded by the walls of the pit. "We want him to come."

Their lift settled on the ground of the pit. It was even larger than it had looked from above, the sides hollowed out into open chambers, each at least twenty meters high. The walls glittered, salt crystals overlain with some kind of mesh supports. Grimly, Revan noted the neat rows of beryllium charges blinking in lines across the walls.

Rather an obvious trap. The voice in her head was dry. Typical Jedi.

A few light cruisers were banked against the sides of the salt walls, with tracks indicating there had once been more ships. There was a crude launching pad in the center, delineated by flashing lights and repulsor coils.

Above them, the living Force cried out in agony and something screamed back. Null space, a void. And within that scream so much death—

Revan shivered. Duraplate beneath her boots, the cold air in her lungs. "You're going to offer Davad Arkan another chance if the Jedi up there don't shoot him out of the sky? You were willing to have the Republic Fleet vaporize them before—why show mercy now?"

Vrook's lips thinned. "Every attempt is one to save as many as possible. But in the end, the man who calls himself Darth Nihilus must not leave this world." He paused, dark eyes narrowing, staring into her own. "And he will not."

"So, it's not mercy." Of course not. None for the likes of Nihilus. She remembered the stacks of dead in the morgue, the burning, yellow gaze of the man as she'd last seen him. "You're going to sacrifice yourselves to fracking stop him if you have to."

I should let you. I should run away and let you.

Die to stop a madman? Odds that Revan had been willing to take once. A fate she had almost accepted, before the last fight.

A fate she had once thought she deserved.

But the others. Korrie. Carth. My friends, I can't—

"Run," Davad Arkan whispered in her mind. For a moment, she almost felt warm breath on her neck, strong arms lock around her ribs in an embrace—for a moment the word was more a tease than a warning. "We could have a race."

Her eyes took in two of the knights, leaning against each other, their interlaced hands locked. Togruta and Twi'lek: the Togrutan's monotail brushed over her friend's lekku as if for comfort.
Unabashedly intimate. The Twi'lek woman caught Revan's gaze and glared at her. Defensive.

"I'm not—" Revan didn't even know what she intended to say. "Your bomb, uncle… if it doesn't work, what happens to everyone else, when we are gone? What happens if we don't kill him?"

Her uncle's response was lost in the roar of a ship rising out of the pit, bound for hyperspace.

Xxx

The shuttle is small and stinks of Deralian fear, and Sion's rotting flesh. Nihilus is no carrion beast, but he is so hungry that the smell still makes his maw rumble.

"Set us down!" Sion keeps yelling at the pilot, as if the Deralian is the one in control of their machine.

"I can't," the man whispers. "He's doing it. He's the one flying—"

Their craft rocks under another barrage of the Jedi's guns. Light taps, meant to herd them higher. Nihilus knows the game well. They played it on drexl, they played it in wartime….

Xxx

" The base ahead at eleven—that's the one we must protect." Kavar's back was to Davad's, manning the guns while Davad flew their strikefighter low, trying to stay under the Mandalorian sensors. "Cein and Karath want to keep our supply line near the Stereb cities."

" Cein wasn't on Taris," Davad snapped. "And Karath should know better. Do you think that will work, cousin?"

Ahead, one of the stone watchtowers lit at their approach, its gas-powered beams circling, lighting their craft in waves of cerulean blue.

" I think you need reminding," the older knight said sternly, "Jedi knights are not generals. We have orders and we follow them. Run supplies, defend the troop carriers."

" Just the two of us? In one ship?" Vakla had to feel it too, like barometric pressure before a storm. The enemy was above: a flock, a fleet of them. But they were holding, holding in formation instead of attacking the lone Jedi striker.

" If they were to mount a full-scale assault the Republic would have no choice but to answer in kind." Kavar Vakla had enjoyed reciting the obvious to Davad ever since Dxun. "These raids are just their attempts to earn honor. Our presence is symbolic, a deter—"

The rest of his suddenly obsolete explanation was lost to the near-vertical climb Davad assaulted on their ship's thruster, as was any objection—brief objection—for, as fast as they winged themselves skyward, something dark and finned sped past them, twisting downward towards the crylline towers below.

" What are you doing?" Vakla's instincts were still too slow—

Xxx

That world had been bad. Rotten to its core.

Now, there is only this world, this one unscathed by bombs and Mandalorian death. This one full of meat.
And her. And her.

{""Run."} he says, like he did before. {""Run."} he tells her.

Xxx

The vision of Stereb spires and clouds dissolved, in flashes of blue. Revan's feet scuffed on duraplating and her stomach sank. Stereb cities. That's Serroco. Master Kavar. I… saw—I was in Davad Arkan's head. That was his memory.

"Run," he said.

"—mine is roughly two kilometers deep. If we lure them into the tunnels and then set off the explosives—"

A part of her mind calculated the size of the implosion. Another part of her mind… agreed. It won't work.

"It won't work," Revan mumbled. Her feet stumbled, and that was when Revan realized she was walking again, off the lift, following Master—Uncle—Vrook off the lift and down an increasingly narrow hall.

"—the salt chamber may enhance the null field enough. If we can just reach him. Knight Arkan was once a good man. A true Jedi."

"Revan said it wouldn't work." Dak's voice, next to her.

"It won't work," she repeated, knowing even as she did that it was true. "It isn't enough. He's stronger than you think."

Strong enough to be in my head. Arkan is in my head. How is he in my head?

"There are other detonators," Master Vash said grimly. "Running down each of these main tunnels. The planetary crust is quite thin. There are fault lines we can trigger—"

"Run." The voice was louder now. Insistent.

"No. It won't work." Revan shook her head. They mean to crack the planet. Send him into its heart, but if they do that, then everyone—everyone on the surface of this continent—maybe even the planet.

These are the fracking Jedi with their greater good. Burn a world to save thousands. That voice again. If that was enough, perhaps—

No. But it's not. It's not enough. It won't work—

Revan had no idea why she was so certain.

"Forgive me, Padawan, but you are no engineer." Revan had no memory of Master Lonna Vash, but the dislike in the woman's voice implied the ignorance wasn't mutual. "There will be a period of geologic instability and casualties will be high on this land mass, but compared to the alternative—"

"Run." A voice in her mind. A command. A compulsion—

Her hand traced the wall, slick, slightly damp. The corridor was wide enough for four abreast.
Revan realized at some point she'd been surrounded. "What about… civilians?" She thought of that girl with her beaded veil. Vizzy. She said she had family. There were kids on those rafts. All the sents from Cody's ship—

"There are shelters. A planetary alert system has been triggered. Many of them will survive. Based on the carnage Nihilus has left on other worlds, their chances are better with our bomb than with his predation."

"No." Revan shook her head. For a moment, the world blurred and she was—she was floating. Flying. Circling down, and below, a vast pit beckoned—a wound in the dirt. A promise. "We should run. We need to run. Evacuate everyone we can from the planet. Get the Fleet to come back. The Aleema can at least delay him — and we've got more ships. The Mando'ade will help."

"The Mandalorians will help?" Master Vash said. Her voice sharpened, as she turned back to glare at Revan. "Your Mandalorians?"

"What?" She blinked. "No, I meant—" she glanced up at the low ceiling, the polished surface of old salt, glittering in the overlights inset in its walls. There were cracks too, and she wondered how stable it was. The ground above pressed down, and above—

Dark wings, circling prey. Insignificant warflies buzzing like gnats. And then the one. The challenger, calling up from below—

"This isn't going to work! Your plan to stop Davad Arkan won't work. You can't just blow up a world to stop a-a mad Sith!"

*Really? The cold voice in her head sounded almost amused. At least in this case, we agree. *

Xxx

The Stereb city beneath their wings had been a small one, occupied by maybe five thousand Stereb, and a few hundred Republic troopers tasked with guarding medical supplies. A small sacrifice of men compared to what would follow, but Davad heard Kavar's grunt of pain from his own mouth as they felt all those lives below suddenly wink out.

And then the cloud formed, like a dimple of imploding ash, rising higher and higher, its center curving in a distinctive dome.

"Fission bombs." Kavar sounded as numb as Davad felt. Both of them could feel the poison down to the agonized molecule, the cell-death of so much life, the poisonous cloud that would stop all life for generations.

"Atom-splitters." Davad put his hand to the yoke again, wheeling up higher, higher, trying to escape the resonation in the Force. Somewhere above the moon was Admiral Cein's flagship and safety. "Animals! How could they?"

Xxx

Davad? Revan blinked again, suddenly looked up at the smooth ceiling, for a moment seeing sky instead, the world tilting beneath her feet as a ship somewhere banked and turned. Either in her memory—or above.

"If we can't stop him, Nihilus will consume the Force. All the Force in the galaxy." A Jedi she didn't recognize, using that pedantic tone they all used, was walking by her side now. Her uncle was on the other side, flanking her, as if they had both been presenting an argument for some time. "There are some theories that since the Force is in all living things, the destruction of the Force will destroy them too—perhaps even destroy all matter itself. He must be stopped before that happens."

"Of course. But Davad Arkan could stop the Sith Emperor," Revan pointed out. I won't call him by that stupid name Nihilus. It isn't his. "He could eat all of Tenebrae's Force-sensitive minions. If you weren't trying to lure him here, maybe he'd be doing that now." Even as she spoke, her mind shied away from that solution.

How many dead then? Billions? How powerful would Davad become after that? How much more powerful could he become?

And then, how could he be stopped?

It might be worth the risk. That voice again. Like ice.

Xxx

He has eaten the third ship. Now it is just the bastard, one lone beast clawing and keening, circling below their shuttle.

The bastard fires his last cannon, and the plasma bomb ricochets off the safe shell Nihilus has made for their craft, spinning to the ground below—

XXX

"No," Kavar whispers. Spots dance in front of his eyes from the torque, the loss of oxygen. His breath frosts out of his mouth. "You fool! I'm trying to save you." He realizes his cheeks are wet, that his ship is listing to the side. The shuttle fills the viewscreen, and his cousin's talon reaches out slowly, almost lovingly, and knocks his own ship to the ground.

His neck snaps back against the unenforced seat-back. His skull crashes into the hull. Pain is blinding white. He feels the impact dimly, a whisper.

Xxx

The Stereb spires had vanished, leaving a dome-shaped cloud in their wake. Leaving death and poisoned ground. When Davad's eyes turned to the horizon, he saw three more clouds, where once there had been cities. All gone—

"Monsters! Dung-eating savages! May their flights be cursed and their eggs rot in the nest!"

The Beast-rider curses of their childhood made no sense, but Davad had no other language to express his anger, which suddenly seemed a living thing, coiling low and dark in his gut, rising like the taste of blood to his throat. "All those people—they were innocents!" Half-blind, he fumbled for their own torpedo keys, seeing the Mandalorian warbirds ahead of them still cowardly cloaked, but visible as fire to anyone with the Force.

"No." Kavar did... something, because suddenly Davad's board was dead. Entirely dead, and their ascent had slowed, changed trajectory toward Admiral Cein's Corellian Conquest, half-hidden by simple cloud cover, drifting uselessly in the night's sky. "No, Davad. Not with anger. Never with anger." He sighed. "We were wrong to come to this war. I see that now."

That one learned Tokare's false pacifism all too well.... Her voice, a faint whisper in his skull.
Davad barely heard it, because his mind was elsewhere—reaching—reaching out to—Her. Ice. The stars were filled with it. Ice. Numbers. Points on a grid….

XXX

"Revan?" Her uncle touched her arm, shaking it lightly.

"What?" Revan realized she’d stopped in the corridor. She looked up again. "Another Jedi crashed. That was… that was—"

"Kavar," another Jedi voice said. Female behind them. Cold. "The last ship of the Jedi is down."

"But he’s not… he’s not dead. I think?" The light above flickered, fading fast.

"Better that he was," Master Vash said bitterly.

"A… few… thousand lives lost. Mostly Stereb." They had been lights, winking out on an overtaxed grid just like Master Sunrider had said—at least to Revan; but beside her, Malak looked as shell-shocked as every other Force user in the room, except Master Sunrider herself, who wore the simple gray mask that she kept reminding them all to adopt. "That was plutonite. Fission. They… annihilated those people down to their very atoms."

"And what have you learned?" Master Sunrider said, as if this was another blasted lesson, as if it were only them two in the room. "Why do you think the Fett Mandalore cares about a minor supply depot and some native settlement?"

"He wouldn't care about a native settlement," Revan said, looking at Mal speaking urgently to Commander Dodonna about rescue operations.

But he knows there are no survivors, he should know.

Mal glanced up at her and shook his head. We must be sure, Red.

His thoughts in her own head, his pain and shock and for a moment she felt it too and then the barricade between their minds slammed down, encasing them both in ice—

There are no survivors, Malak. She felt Malak’s pain ease, just as she felt the two Jedi below in the rapidly-approaching ship. Davad, and Master Kavar. She should feel relief they were alive, but the cloaked ships of the Mandalorian Fleet, cowering in the planet’s upper atmosphere, just out of cannon range, caught her attention instead.

There. Our enemy. No anger towards them, just resolve.

She felt Davad and Kavar calm, felt their pain vanish, frozen—

"Good," Master Kae said approvingly. "Like that. Just like that, Revan."

"The coordinates of their ships, as follows..." her voice rattled off the numbers, as Malak lit them up on the board.

"Do you see now?" Kae asked Admiral Cein. "Do you see now; what Jedi can do?"

No. That was… wrong. Not Kae. Sunrider. She said, she said she was Kae now, she was Master Arren Kae now because of the Redemption—when Vima took the Redemption she took a new name. Master Arren Kae, but she-she told me otherwise. She told me that on some worlds, she'd been Master Arren Kae for a very long time.

Xxx

She was the bridge between them, their old master, their foster mother, aunt, master—she was the bond between them, but now that it is forged, and Nihilus strong, and Revan so close—he can just see—he can just see her, caught between Jedi in a narrow hall beneath this planet's crumbling crust. The walls glitter like silver and her hair is brown and matted close to her skull. She's dressed like a common fighter pilot and her hair is brown, but she is her.

Her. Delicious.

{{"Hello,"}} he sends. {{"Revan. Revan, Revan—run—"}}

Xxx

Vrook kept explaining, and Revan began to feel like a prized nerf, hemmed in by harvesters, on her way to the factory for processing. The world ebbed and dimmed, and somewhere in it, someone was screaming her name.

"Revan?" Vrook touched her arm, frowning. "You seem… distracted."

"Revan."

"We're luring a Sith Lord to his doom, why would I be distracted?" The words came out in Polla's Deralian drawl, and felt as false as everything.

"Revan."

"He-he's screaming. He's hungry." Her ears rang. "Is it just me? You all don't… you don't hear him too?"

"Revan. Run."

The Durian knight on the hover in front of her twitched its skull. "We hear nothing," it said.

"They failed," said a yellow Twi'lek knight she didn't know. "R'tar. Lavash. Querish—and Kavar. They failed. R'tar and Lavash are dead. I can't sense the others."

So many Jedi Revan didn't know. Would Dar have known them?

Probably not, she fracking killed all her friends.

But that memory had been… hers. Dar'Revan's.

And… new. How?

"Stereb cities," Revan muttered. "On Serroco? The Mandalorians bombed them. We… we were there."

Uncle Vrook's face-lines grew deeper, grooving into lines of lines. For a moment, he looked younger, like Mekel Jin, trapped in Uln's mad caves with her. "You shouldn't be here," he muttered. "Knight Arkan was—"
"My... lover." She hadn't meant to say that. Dar hadn't seemed to give a frack for the man. Revan tried to sound calm, like all of this was reasonable. "Davad Arkan was Darth Revan's lover. And he's... talking. Right now. In my head. You all... you don't hear him too?"

"You did this to him," muttered the yellow Twi'lek. "You broke him at Malachor. Like Meetra Surik."

"Who?" The name was familiar, but the significance escaped her.

"Revan. Run. You need to run."

"Your plan won't work," she repeated, sure of it now. "Do you think Arkan will willingly sacrifice himself in your trap? There's a planet full of Force users above—why would he come down here?"

"Our strength," Master Vrook said. His smile was strained. "It's not a good plan, niece. It's the only one we had time to make."

"Run."

Her legs twitched. Her elbow jerked out, and the Jedi nearest stumbled back.

"To me, Revan. Run to me."

Xxx

He calls to her. Calls up pieces. She was a hollow egg that they smashed but some of her calls back—and hears him.

He will show her the rest—lies and truth. Linked through the bond their master forged long ago. He will show her, he will eat her, and they will become—they—

They will become one, he hopes. What can they become? Where is the world for them?

But first, she must see—she must see how much he has always loved her. She must know that she is not just prey. She is more than food.

Xxx

"It's nice," Davad lied. The cafe was not, and surely a senator's son of Coruscant knew that. The cafe was small—not even a cantina—set on a walkway between the University and the International District, too close to the Jedi Temple for privacy, too full of gawkers and tourists for peace. There was another trio in beige robes by the door, but Davad was more acutely aware of the speculative whispers surrounding him and Malak D'Reev. "Not very private."

"Scrambler." Malak shrugged and placed a small cube on the table. "Creates a dampener about a meter around, if you're that worried about being overheard." His smile was carelessly arrogant, the smile of a boy bestowing a favor on a treasured servant. Davad had seen it often enough in the mirror to recognize. "You wanted my advice?"

"Not advice. Information." He hesitated. "Personal information. I don't want to make you uncomfortable—"

"Please." Malak took a sip of his calf. "We faced down those slavers on Dagmar together. You saved Revan's life when that hellspawned Gamorrean set off the charge. Whatever I can do to help."
"Revan had the rest in stasis," Davad pointed out, not wanting to object, but also striving for honesty. "All I did was disable the detonators." He grimaced. "Had a lot of practice back home. There have been a few uprisings—"

"Colonials," Malak sighed. "No offense."

"Onderon isn't a Republic colony so how could I be offended?" He was.

"I meant your rebels. Isn't that what they want? Protectorate status for Onderon? Trade access? Civil rights?"

"For a senator's son, you're a terrible diplomat, D'Reev. I almost think you're trying to insult me." Davad forced a chuckle.

Level gray eyes stared at him. "Or, this could be a test to see if you put the Order first." Malak's wide mouth quirked and he shrugged. "Say what you like. I told Knight Kavar I'd ask about your loyalties and I have."

"He's checking up on me?" Sharp wave of anger, hot and inviting. Davad swallowed it back, with the bile in his throat.

"Get used to it," Malak said. "We're the public faces of the Jedi. No scandals, no questions about mislaid loyalty, inappropriate attachments—"

"That's... actually what I wanted to ask you about." Davad took a deep breath. "Attachments."

"Oh." Malak nodded slowly. The smile on his face looked a little forced. "Of course. You heard about the Jedi brothel? It's on sub-level twenty. I was told they'll even bill the Temple, if you want to admit that you... need such things." His gray eyes were remote, as if his mind was somewhere else.

"No! That's... that's not..." He heard his voice crack like an unbelled boy's. "Revan. It's Revan that I... want. But I wasn't sure, I thought that you and she... uh, you and her. I thought you were..."

There was a pause, long enough for Davad to curse himself and wonder if Malak was laughing at him, like a botfly caught on a hook.

"No," the other boy said finally. "Padawans are discouraged from forming attachments to other padawans. Or knights. There is nothing untoward in our behavior." He frowned. "You... were correct to bring this to me first. You know she admires you—we both do. But this would be... awkward."

"It is awkward," Davad muttered. "But I can no longer deny my feelings. She-do you think there's any chance she might... has she ever mentioned...?"

Those stone-gray eyes blinked. "No," Malak said.

Later, so much later, Davad had to admire the man, the way the man so flatly lied, with a deception so complete it rang through the Force—

Xxx

"Run, Revan. Do you see?"
Malak had looked so... young. Something caught in Revan's throat. Mal. He was so young.

Young and pompous. Trying to make Davad sweat with that talk about a brothel. He was being an ass. But the voice in her head sounded wistful too.

"Revan?" Her uncle again, voice gentled. "Come on, we're almost to the safety zone."

It's not safe.

Someone's voice. "Lift her. There's no time."

Time. It telescoped, rushing years speeding past; images too fast to measure.

XXX

She sees. She sees him. Her head tilts up, towards the sky. He feels her muscles tense, feels her start to spring—

{{"Come!}} he roars joyfully. {{"Come to me!"}}

XXX

His skull was pressed so hard into the duraplate floor that Davad half-expected to snap his own neck. His shoulders ached with strain, and the burns across his chest ached through his charred and smoking robes.

The pain did not matter. Nothing did. Not in this new world they'd made.

XXX

{{"I thought you were dead then,}} he explains. Does she see? Does she see? {{"I would have made him pay."}}

He is in her eyes now, so she must. Her body tenses, and then her arms fly open, like a bird's wings.

She parts the Jedi who try and stop her like water, while behind, her loyal minions keep the others from following.

Her world is a whirl of Force and blades. Their attempts to cage her with the Force shatter like ferraglass on her skin.

Pounding feet down the corridor as she leaves them all behind.

{{"Yes,"}} she says back to his mind. More with deed than word. {{"I'm coming."}}

XXX

"I did not expect your return," Darth Malak hissed. Thud of his footsteps, shadows of his boots falling across Davad's fingers. They both knew the lie: Malak had anticipated this, as he had everything else.

Davad dared to lift his skull a few centimeters above the ground, to see the man who had killed her. "Are we not Sith, my lord?"

"Are we not Sith... Master?" Malak corrected. "I am Sith. The Supreme Leader of the Sith Empire."
"You are the worm groveling at my feet." Davad thought Malak would be smiling now, had he still his mouth. "Tell me. Is it death you seek at this reunion?"

"I could not destroy you from Coruscant," Davad lifted his skull slowly, pulling his lips back from his teeth as he looked at the towering, armored figure above him. He felt his muscles coil, taut springs of blood and bone and sinew, ready to be fueled by the Force. "So, I came here."

"You cannot destroy me at all," Malak murmured, his eyes glowing a hellish and infernal red. "You are only a man, Beast-Lord, and a broken one at that."

Her whisper coiled at the back of his skull. You must not. You must not challenge him. You must not. Not yet, my apprentice. Now is not the time—

"I… came back to serve you, Master." The words stuck in his craw. Was Kae here too? Sometimes she lurked in the shadows behind, and sometimes it was only her thoughts, poisoning his mind, sapping his will.

"Until the time I weaken enough for you to take my place?"

Swear to serve him, Beast-Lord. Lie. She failed and so you must serve him until we find the means to destroy him. Your petty feud with the man is of no consequence. You will serve him until I will it otherwise.

"Master." He should have been a king, never to kneel to man or beast, but Davad Arkan bowed his head.

"Ah." Malak's prosthesis gleamed in the light. A low, metallic chuckle emitted from the voder inset in his throat. "Indeed I am."

XXX

He is circling the last of his prey's wrecked shells. He is nearing the ground, it rolls out beneath them, sprawling lazily down to the sea. The mounds of hills could be breasts and thigh. The pale sand gleams, color of her skin. She is there. She is here. Somewhere—near—and his mind reaches out—

{""You're coming."}

{""You leave me no choice,"} she sends back.

XXX

Outside, the storm had lifted, revealing a pale sun ghosting across the ice. Its light shone through the round window, casting dark shadows across the table, the pot of tea, the old woman's wrinkled hand.

"More crackers, Mother?" Brianna lifted the tray to be polite.

"Oh!" Those blind eyes were wide with surprise. Her battered chin lifted, and her jaw went suddenly slack.

The bulb of tea fell from the old woman's hand, and only Brianna's own Force reflexes, minor as they were, allowed her hands to grasp the stem before the fragile crystal shattered on the stone floor.
"What is it, Mother?" It was only polite, Brianna thought, to call the old woman 'mother.' Technically it was true, of course. And the tears that had fallen from Kreia's eyes after Mical Jorde was so rude to her had seemed less a ruse than a real emotion.

Sometimes, Brianna thought it might be pleasant to live in a different place, where passions were realized. Somewhere less cold.

"Shyrack wings," the old woman said. "Far from here, I think, but even the smallest effect ripples outward."

XXX

Red eyes. Malak had... red eyes.

A whisper, a clench in Revan's guts. Red is bad. When I was Polla Organa, I knew—every time I saw a Duros or a Chiss, I jumped like a spooked hessi.

There was a roaring drone in her head now, near-constant. The... visions from Arkan flashed, almost too fast to see.

XXX

He looked down at her, still half-asleep. Her hair was dyed an ugly shade of brown-black, and her eyes were half-lidded, sleepy, but still that unmistakable green. They'd been yellow as suns on that last day, but now—

"Surprise!" He smiled in that moment, made perfect by the fact that she was still alive—

XXX

"Wake up," Revan muttered. Her feet stumbled toward the lift. Her eyes felt blind.

That was the Endar Spire. Arkan was... there too. He's been there. All along. He was with me? Following me? Why don't I remember? I was Polla then. I should be able to remember....

XXX

The five members of the Red Claw Gang had not been nice sentients—they had been monsters. Perhaps they had deserved their fate: carved to pieces under the sabers of three Jedi padawans on this remote Corellian moon. Perhaps—or perhaps not. As they watched Malak depart with the last of the rescued children, Davad felt nothing except relief to be finally alone.

Alone with her.

"Is that the last?" Revan wiped the sweat from her eyes, blinking hard.

"I think so." Davad scented no enemies on the air—just the frightened, half-grown children that Malak had loaded into the shuttle to take to their base, their spoor vanishing over the horizon with Malak. "Until the next shipment comes. How long did Vima say it would be?"

"Zhar said three hours. Mal should be back by then." She shrugged off her outer robe, scratching the thin fabric wrapped around her ribs. He couldn't help but watch the smooth muscle in her shoulder, her bare arms, freckled in the sun, the curve of her in profile. "This moon is too hot. How can you stand it?"
"I can't," he admitted. "At home, we'd swim, or sleep through the long days. Hunt at night."

Revan pointed at the lakeshore ten meters from the Red Claw base.

"There's water," she offered. "If you want to go in, we could."

"We could both go." He was proud at how calm he sounded. "They commed from the far side of Dagmar. It would be impossible for them to get here faster."

"Yes. We could both go..." She seemed to hesitate.

"What is it?" He felt too aware of her, even as he unbuckled the sleeves of his robe, lay his belt carefully down. Underneath the heavy outer robe, he was only wearing skivs—it had been too hot for anything else.

"We don't have a biological assay on it. There could be parasites, bacteria—"

"Sea dragons." He snorted. "Lake dragons. There's not. The animals here drink from it. See the tracks?"

"I can suspend myself in the water, of course." She wasn't looking at the tracks some type of grass-grazer had made in the sand. She was staring at the ground, back stiff. "I can suspend myself above it for short distances, propel myself through it, but I'm not very good at... swimming. The forms of it."

"Strokes," he smiled slightly. "We're just cooling off. It's not a race."

One red eyebrow raised up at him. "Don't let Master Zez hear you say that. Didn't he tell you? Only one of us will go for Knight's trials this year."

"Swimming isn't our trial." Davad already knew it would be him. Vima had told him. He had to wonder that she hadn't told Revan.

He pulled off his shirt, watching her. "We could race to the water, if you want."

Her robe dropped to the ground. It seemed like every week she grew more beautiful, but he forced his gaze up to her eyes, which were appraising him steadily.

Or... not so steadily. There was a faint flush on her face that couldn't just be the sun. "The bells on your—"

"Ceremonial," he said. He'd taken the ones down from his hair, but the ones on his chest were small. Sometimes he forgot they were there.

"Do the women do that too?"

It wasn't the question Davad had expected. "Sometimes."

Her face was still flushed as she stared steadily at him, before abruptly pulling off her own shirt, standing there in just her skivs. A black band of skinsilk ran across her breasts, but it exposed more than it concealed. They were larger than they looked under her robes. The freckles ended abruptly at her torso, leaving the skin there a pale cream, like the underside of a drexl's wing.

He tried to think about swoop races, the histories of Jeddah, of Ossus, of the Jedi Code—and failed.
The pit had been full of ships, at least a dozen. Now there were only two, and even as Mekel watched, the smaller one lifted off with a roar of jets, temporarily blinding them all in a haze of steam and smoke.

"Mekel?" The sent calling his name was Human. Cute, if you liked muscular and blonde. Wearing knight's robes, but in that moment, Mekel had no idea who he was. "The ship to Hoth is leaving, Mekel."

Revan Fracking Starfire had walked off the lift, walked right by them, surrounded by Jedi masters as if Mekel Jin, her long-lost cousin didn't even exist. And Dak? Dak Vesser from Korriban had done the same fraking thing right after. Guy had almost washed out his last year, before Mekel shared those stolen exam notes with him because Lashowe DeVry thought he was cute. That wasn't even worth a hello, now. And Dear Old Dads?

Now that he had his reformed Dark Lord back, apparently a reformed Sith son wasn't worth a plugged credit. None of them had ever looked at Mekel Jin. Like now that he didn't have the Force, they couldn't even see him.

"Mekel. Master Loanin told me to make sure you were away safely."

Sure, he did. And then he wrote me off. "I don't have the Force," he told the blonde guy. "What's Mister Force Suck gonna do to me?"

"The… ground area of this mine may become unstable. We all need to go."

Some padawans were ushering in a group of Republic troops up the landing ramp of the last ship. No one Mekel recognized there either, but he waved at them, just to give his hands something to do, show blondie here that he didn't give a frack.

"Frack Hoth," he said. "I need to go to Kaas." And probably get myself killed trying to save your ass, Telos.

"You need to go to Hoth," the blonde said. He was using the Force to say it, Mekel could tell by the way his forehead wrinkled, the way he looked like he needed to take a shit, but he sucked at it, because Mekel felt absolutely-fracking-nothing-at-all.

"I need to get out of this fraking sarlacc trap." Like slugs in a salt trap, and it is really a salt mine. That makes us slugs, all right.

But there's the lift. Up and away.

An alarm chimed, and the blonde glanced back. A pink Twi'lek was standing on the landing ramp of the last ship, the one actually going to fraking Hoth. And here, Mekel had thought Loanin was just cracking a joke.

"Devn?" the Pink called out.

"Jin is refusing to come," the blonde called back. Coru accent. Upper levels. Mekel hated him on principle.

"Leave him."

Mekel recognized that look on her face. He recognized her too, because she had a fantastic body and she used to train in the cube opposite him and Telos.

"Hi, Aishe! Thought you were dead from the plague."

"We were in hiding," she called back, eye ridges wrinkling with that expression he remembered all too well. She'd always treated Mekel as if he was dim. There'd been a time when he'd used it as an advantage to get a look at her notes on Galactic History. "You need to come with us now, Mekel. It isn't safe here."

"You go without me." He forced a smile back. "I'll be fine. I like danger."

The Pink threw up her hands. "Leave him," she told Devn the blonde. Her skin looked pale and her lekku were wrapped around her head. Mekel had never seen so many Jedi so spooked before. (Blonde guy didn't look much better.)

The sound of guns came from overhead. When Mekel glanced up, he saw three fighters cross the sky above the pit, blue and red pulses flashing. "Are we under attack?" Maybe getting back on the lift wasn't such a good idea.

"Those aren't ours." Devn frowned too. On the ramp, Aishe tilted her head up. They all saw the next pass: a Jedi snub, and six fighters, chasing what looked like an unarmed shuttle. The whine of guns squealed overhead, but seemed to glance off the shuttle's surface.

"Those are Mandalorian fighters." It had taken him a second, had been so long since they'd studied the different ships in Dreshdae.

"We need to go," Aishe repeated, calling out from across the pit. "Devn, there's no more time."

Go to fracking Hoth or get blown up down here? One frack of a choice. Normally, he'd have gone with the Pink, but that one-time Mekel had seen snow he hadn't liked it much.

The sound of running footsteps interrupted before Mekel decided. A black-clad figure ran out of the tunnel at what seemed like Force speed. Like old times on Dreshdae, his foot extended. And like old times on Dreshdae, the old game still worked. The black-clad figure went sprawling ass over tit. And they weren't bad at all—the ass and the tits—

It wasn't until the ass and tits scrambled to their feet that Mekel realized who he'd been ogling.

"Shit," he muttered. "Um, hi, Dar-um, hi, Revan."

"Mekel Jin." Revan Starfire sounded astonished, like she hadn't ignored him before. "What are you doing here?" Her hair was brown for some reason—dark, almost black. Is she trying to look like me? His thought was random. She was wearing some kind of tattered flightsuit with fracking Imperial sigils on it. Did she change sides again? She looked like she'd never seen a fresher in her life—not at all like the polished chit he remembered from the Mandalorian camps. She looked like hell. He was disturbed to realize he still thought she was kind of hot. Cousin, he reminded himself. She is not hot. She is your older, scarier cousin. Telos would have busted a gut if he'd been here to see.

"Um, leaving." He took a step towards the ship—only to watch the landing ramp retract, Aishe and Devn had already vanished inside.

The alarm rang again, signaling the last ship's departure.
There goes my ride out of hell. "I was going to come!" he shouted after it—but it was too late.

Fingers closed around his arm as Revan pulled him out of the lift zone. Even so, he felt the heat on his face as they watched the jets rise, the cruiser bank and jet out of sight.

"Are there more ships somewhere else?" she demanded. "You can't stay here, Mekel. It's not safe."

"No kriffing shit!"

She blinked at him, eyes staring past, as if he was already not important.

Mekel swallowed. He wanted to be important. "There are supply ships, a few cruisers, parked along the shore. The Jedi hid these ships. I didn't know any of this was here. We've been here for weeks and I didn't know."

"Are you hiding in the Force?" Her head tilted. "I can't feel you at all. I didn't know you were here until I almost ran you over."

You didn't run over me, I tripped you. Not that he was gonna admit it. Ever. "I don't fricking have it anymore." Just a few fracked memories, courtesy of Malak D'Reev.

A disturbing one chose that moment to intervene: something about her and Malak mooning over each other like teen idiots. He didn't have time for Malak's insane banthashit, so Mekel blinked hard and willed that one to vanish. "Oerin Lin took the Force away from me when he fricking sent Darth Malak back to hell—"

Her head was turned up, cocked, as if she had stopped listening to him. The ship to Hoth vanished as they watched, blipping into hyperspace, a dot of white in the distant circle of the sky.

Revan let out a breath. "I—" she started toward the lift and then glanced back at him. "I—don't know what to do with you."

"I'm not your fricking problem." He sprinted after her, jumping on the lift as it started to ascend. Far as he could tell she hadn't even touched the controls. Her eyes were slightly unfocused, as if she was only half there.

"When we get to the top, find Canderous," she mumbled. "And the kids. Stay with them. Warn them. Tell to get clear of this site. At least a few kilometers, but off planet is better. The Jedi will blow this planet's core if they have to."

"Blow up the planet?" He stared down at the vanishing ground beneath. More explosions from the sky. "The entire fricking planet?" Way to go, Jedi. Out-Sithing the Sith.

"No. But this land mass will not be stable," she muttered, practically like a droid. "Earthquakes. Maybe tsunami—I-I don't—" her voice trailed off again, and her head tilted back up. "I'm coming," she mumbled to the thin air. "Hold your fricking hessi, Arkan."

Eerily, for a second, she reminded him of Mission.

A whine from overhead interrupted. Scream of engines nearly on overload.

Directly over their heads, a shuttle was falling out of the sky, wisps of dark smoke half-covering its surface. Falling straight down—down straight towards them. The smoke spread out from its sides like wings.
"Frack." There were probably better last words, but Mekel didn't have time to think of them. "Y-you know we're cousins? Did… did you always know?"

"Yes. I mean, no. I-I didn't know. Before. But she—" She lifted her hands. Maybe if Mekel could have felt the Force he would have seen something, but it looked like she was just lifting her hands, palms half-cupped above her head.

"Um, who? My ma?" She was pushing an entire shuttle away from them. He'd seen her work with the Jedi to land an entire hammerhead, so Mekel wasn't sure why he was impressed. Telos and I could have done that.

The shuttle veered away, still caught in the sky—away and out of their view.

"He's landing," she whispered. "He's here."

"Great," said Mekel Jin. And frack him. Frack him—whatever the frack he is.

XXX

"Your meat keeps escaping," Sion points out, as their ship lands on the surface of Katarr, next to the smoking snubfighter that still houses the shell of his cousin. Inside that one, Nihilus feels the meat twitch and turn.

{"I will eat the skyflyers later."} Nihilus can ignore the ache in his gut for her. For a time. She hears him. She truly hears him. {"Come,"} he tells her again. {"Hurry. Run to me—"}

{"yes."} Her thought back is small and subdued. But not frightened.

Not frightened because she is not prey.

"He's… not saying food anymore." Jasp Organa sounds tired and confused. "I'm not sure what he's saying."

XXX

"Our race?" She was smiling slightly, turning back to the water. That gesture afforded him the sight of her muscled back, the way her hips flared out and the fabric of her skivs shone, accentuating the high curve of her flank, the long muscles in her thighs.

"Go." Davad began at once to save himself more embarrassment, letting her outpace him, the Force flaring like a corona of light around her body as she raced into the water—or, Davad realized, above it, crossing several meters on what seemed like air alone, before splashing in, slipping beneath the soft waves.

By then he was on her heels: laughing, reaching for her, but she darted back, bobbing gently. The water was salty and brackish, a dark, clear brown color, that made her skin shimmer underneath. Her hair had been pulled back, but now it tumbled, loose like flames around her shoulders.

"You ran on water," he pointed out, trying to sound calm, trying to not notice how close she was standing.

"Only a few meters. You swam like a fish."

"It's not that different from flying."

She smiled at him. "I wanted to ride a drexl very badly when we came to get you, but there was no
You frightened them. But he couldn’t tell her that. "I miss it. Sometimes."

"You enjoyed being part of a large family? You had a lot of siblings, they kept staring at us."

Cousins, mostly. But they weren’t important. "Revan, I-I need your advice."

"My advice?" She chuckled softly. "Unless it's about languages or Force shields, I don't know what you think I know that you don't—"

"It's about... a girl." Perhaps being a prince had made it easy to impress the Beast-rider girls at home, but right now his heart thudded too close to his skin.

"Oh." She splashed backwards, her face flushing red all the way to the top of her nose. "I'm sorry, I really don't know. Jedi... we don't—"

"Attachments. I know." Hadn't Vima given her the same lecture about needs that he had received?

"Attachments. Y-yes." She flipped onto her back, paddling away from him. Her voice sounded muffled in the water. "You should ask Beya about this sort of thing. Or Suria. Do you know Suria? From the Alderaan Enclave? They... I think there are... places. Where people go."

"I don't mean... sex."

"Oh!" Her feet vanished with a splash and her head bobbed up next to his. One of her legs brushed against his hip—by accident, judging by how quickly she edged back. She rose in the water, its essence curling around her body, like a cloak, letting it raise her above him. He would have thought she was showing off, but her attention was entirely distracted, her gaze fixed to the shore. "Those bodies," she said. "We should... bury them. Or—burn. We shouldn't just leave them, it's not...."

"The beasts of this world will eat them," he told her. His first sentient kill. On Dxun, it would have been by duel, if anyone still followed the old ways. Here, it had been for justice. "I never killed anyone before," he added, suddenly feeling foolish, like his nakedness had shown her a soft underbelly, vulnerable to strike.

She glanced down at him, half-suspended in a column of dark water. "You still haven't. Those slavers were nothing."

XXX

Revan's racing footsteps echoed and vanished, fading to a grim silence, as Vrook tightened his grasp on the Togrutan knight's neck, keeping the blade of his ignited saber between her hands and her own weapon.

His arms trembled as the Force bore down, desperation ebbing under the weight of a dozen Jedi's collective strength. Without the wall at his back, Vrook thought he would have collapsed already, but as he felt his niece's presence leave the mine, he let his saber arm drop, the blade extinguish.

Knight Pakeek gave a startled yelp as she slipped out of his suddenly shaking arms, and back to the relative safety of the others.

Across the corridor, Dak Vesser's hostage—the Durian knight that had been trained by Croi before his death—did the same, rolling back with an indignant hiss as Dak extinguished his own blade.
"She's clear," Dak said. "Revan's out of the mine—I think." The two others who had joined their side, Da'Wit and Master Skokkar went one further, not only extinguishing their blades, but dropping them on the ground in a gesture of surrender.

"You're all insane," Master Hirut said, keeping her own hands outstretched and a shimmering web of Force between them and the rest of the Jedi. "Do you realize what you have done?"

"Do you?" He felt like a man waking from a long sleep. Whatever happens, we will not be saved by sabers. Not today.

Vrook let his own saber fall to the ground.

Dak scoffed, and shoved his own weapon back on his belt.

Master Lonna Vash bent to the ground, collecting the sabers by hand, as if she no longer trusted the Force. "This is what Revan has wrought." The Jedi Master straightened stiffly as if she had suddenly grown old. "Discord at the heart of the Order. Jedi against Jedi?"

"We made her." Vrook felt a curious acceptance. Above them, the void was screaming. If Kavar Vakla or the others still lived he couldn't sense them—but he did feel his niece, the Force in her flaring like a star. "Revan is ours, Lonna. A Jedi Knight. Following her conscience."

XXX

The lift's engines were pathetically slow, but Revan used the Force to speed their ascent, drowning out the words of the boy next to her in a rush of wind and sparking cable. The lift cleared the pit with a tired whine of its gears, revealing a plain of sand covered with blaster score, the shells of a few wrecked ships, one intact snubfighter, and a shuttlecraft that appeared to be smoldering about twenty meters away.

Mekel Jin made a retching noise in his throat. He looked pale. "You… took us up pretty fast," he mumbled.

"Yes." She stared at the shuttle.

"RUN."

This close, Davad Arkan's voice in her mind was a scream, not a whisper. "TO ME, REVAN. TO ME."

Far off across the beach, the door on one of the wrecked warflies slid open, and a figure in beskar staggered out.

"Leskal!" a boy's voice yelled out. A boy's voice near her. "Over here!"

"S'cuy, Kex!" The boy's voder crackled across the sand, echoing strangely with the pit.

Revan glanced to the side. Three Mandalorians were parked by the pit's edge, all wearing beskar, and surrounded by weapons.

"S'cuy, Revan." Canderous looked up from behind a fully-assembled rocket launcher, blank visor of his face turning towards her as he nodded.

As if none of this was a surprise. Or, only a minor one. Where the frack did he get all those rockets?

It didn't matter. They might provide decent distraction.
"Mekel Jin!" Millifar unshouldered her own cannon, and picked up the sniper's rifle on the ground next to the edge of the pit. She burst into an excited chatter of Mandalorian, followed by the boy's stumbled replies, but Revan was barely listening.

_How did Canderous get a rocket launcher? Don't tell me he smuggled all this in his fracking armor!_ But even as she wondered, her curiosity seemed to… ebb. As she watched, the missile Canderous had launched froze in mid-air, maybe a few meters from its target, the shuttle parked about twenty meters away across the sands. The blackness she'd taken for flames in the sky shimmered like oil on the gray surface of the ship, parting to reveal the gangway slowly coming down.

"YOU CAME," Davad said. His voice was a scream in her mind.

"You left me no choice," she muttered, stepping forward as her vision blurred again—

XXX

"Get up, Arkan. We're alone. You don't need to impress me like some groveling worm."

_His Sith-maddened eyes looked up at her. "I came back, Master. I came back for you."_

"I would have warned you—" I would have warned you but you would have betrayed me.

"If you had, I would have deserted." He laughed. "All that life on Onderon, I can't go back there. I want to serve you. It's what I always… always wanted."

"Why?"

"Because." He stood, approaching her. Shorter than Malak. His dark hair was knotted, twisted into hundreds of small braids ringed with bells. That meant something for Beast-riders, but right now, Revan couldn't remember what. Her hand reached out and closed on his arm, fingers digging deep into the muscle there. He didn't flinch, didn't move when she stepped closer, wrapping her other arm around his back, pressing their bodies together. One of them sighed, and the Force flared between them, igniting like a spark—

"Because," he whispered, softer still, and Revan silenced any further declarations with her mouth, hard on his.

_His reasons did not matter._

_It was a relief to be in a place beyond regret._

_The path ahead was simple. Harness the Star Forge. Rebuild the Republic and shatter the Senate’s games forever. Destroy the Sith Emperor possessing her husband. What had happened on that pyramid on Lehon was a minor setback—Revan would not show fear to Tenebrae again. Or weakness._

_Tenebrae's hold over Malak was a weakness Revan could not bear, but a cure for him would not be found with the Jedi—it would be found by deciphering the secrets of the Sith that had created Tenebrae in the first place._

_And those secrets could not be found by Jedi._

_Warm lips pressed gently against hers, almost hesitantly. So different. It had been months since she'd kissed Malak. His wound was festering again, like it couldn't heal. It gave him so much pain_ that even these small pleasures were lost—

Revan's mouth opened under the pressure of those soft lips. Davad's mouth tasted of mint and something sweet—

XXX

Sweet. For a millisecond, it seemed like he was there, wrapped around her, like the rest of the galaxy was gone.

One of the Jedi snubfighters lay to the side. Most of them were wrecks, but this one looked intact. She noted it, and then walked past.

The shuttle's ramp was down now, and the darkness around its hull began to coalesce, into the figure of a man.

"Run," his voice whispered in her mind, gentle again, like a kiss. "Run to me—"

XXX

Here is she. Here are they. His eyes split between the broken body in the snubfighter and what is left; Nihilus, starving next to Sion, who does not know how to eat.

{"Open the door!"} he orders Sion and the pilot.

"How are we still alive after that landing?" Sion snaps at the pilot, ignoring Nihilus completely.

"I didn't do it. Was all him." The Deralian is pale and shakes. But Jasp Organa's gaze is fixed on the shuttle's viewscreen. She is there.

"Polla," Jasp Organa whispers, like a man waking from a dream.

{"Revan,"} Nihilus calls. {"Run. Run to me."}

Her head turns toward his shuttle. The landing ramp is down. Her face is perfectly blank. She's heard—she hears him.

{"Don't hurt them,"} she warns. {"If I come, you must leave this place. Leave everyone on this planet alone."}

{"It doesn't hurt,"} he assures her.

She's dyed her hair brown, the color of mud. Her topknot droops like a defiant flag, half-vanquished. She's dressed more like a dockworker than a queen.

"Polla," Jasp Organa whispers again. His voice is a husk, dried and almost done. "She looks like my Pollie."

XXX

The halls of stone were cold. Davad had only been to the Dreshdae Academy once before. Looking for promising acolytes and settling for Bandon. But it was the truth of the Sith—the real truth—that the most promising students tended to have unfortunate accidents.

Like Bandon had, vanishing in the sands of some desert world. Sometimes, raw power was not enough.
Davad Arkan wondered if the women who called herself Deralian had learned that particular lesson of their master's yet.

"Polla Organa?"

Her head didn't turn at the sound of his voice, but those shoulders stiffened under the heavy black robes she was wearing, and when she did speak, her voice was so mocking and strange she hardly sounded Deralian—or even like Revan—at all.

"My name isn't Polla. It's Revan. Dark Lord of the Sith Revan? Take one step closer and I'll pull out your entrails through whatever ear-holes your species uses to hear. If you don't use ears, I'll pull them through your fracking assh—"

"Polla!" That blue Twi'lek child of hers—the same one that had so foiled his plans on Taris—broke the menacing effect by bursting into laughter. "Please. This loser? He's too chicken to even show his face!"

It was then Davad noted that the child had a small hold-out pistol leveled at him too.

"How-long?" How long had he imagined this moment? Being the one to tell her? How hard had he worked to slip his master's leash? All for you, Revan. "How did you... who told you?"

She turned towards him, her face twisted with a cold fury he didn't recognize. "Is that a serious question?" Dark energy surged forward like a thunderbolt, and only his animal instincts gave him enough warning to dodge her first attack.

Her lightning burned a trace across the stone floor, then guttered and died.

When he looked back to her hands, they were cupped, more energy sparking along her fingers, crackling, illuminating the entire room like a tiny sun—

"I think you should run, masked guy," jeered the Twi'lek. "Next time she won't miss—"

Xxx

"RUN."

"That was you?" She stops in front of the ship still meters away. He can see that every instinct urges her to run away. But still, she stops. For him. Perhaps not love, but a good imitation. "On Korriban—that was... you?"

{{"I came for you,"}} Nihilus tells her.

Her face frowns then. He doesn't like that she looks frightened.

"That was you," she repeats. Softer, softest. "And... before that. Y-you were on other planets. You... you helped me. When I was Polla. You helped. On Taris... I think you saved my life."

{{"Malak was supposed to die, but we were betrayed. With Malak dead, I would have ruled by your side. We were always destined. Still. Take comfort, my love. After you, I will eat the Sith Emperor."}}

He is starving, but she should know. She should know why the sacrifice. Why this matters. She has to know.

"No." Her fingers flex, but she does not go for her blade. The Force flares around her like a bright cloak. Behind her, some nulls are retreating—he had barely noticed them before. To them, this must seem an instant. A heartbeat.

Their hearts are so fragile, not at all like hers.

She will struggle. He would rather it be painless, for the love he had shared with her ghost, but now….

Xxx

"You may go, Davad." The holocron copy of Revan Starfire stood straight-backed in Sheris's padawan robes.

It had not been very long since Davad's last meal, not long since he had begun eating the Jedi in the temple—and at that time, he grew full quickly. He knew rationally that he did not to eat again soon—but now, looking at her, he was suddenly starving.

Her face was flushed from their sparring and tendrils of red hair curled becomingly around her ears, escaped from her braids. "I will reset the droids for our next match. Perhaps make it harder next time." Her green eyes glinted in a way he might have called flirting, had she truly been Sheris.

But Revan had never played the tease with him, never trifled.

Is she Revan? Truly?

Her light flickered so faintly in the Force that his very breath might extinguish it—and he drew back, retreating to the door. There, something held him—the vulnerable curve of her white neck, perhaps. Or the delicate tracery of veins on her pale, freckled arm.

"I said, you may go." Diminished as she was like this, she seemed younger, like the padawan he had known, long ago.

His words felt clumsy in his mouth. "There's... another holovid you haven't seen. A new documentary. 'Revan Starfire, Conquest or Command' " It was little enough to offer her. "If you want, we could watch it now. Share a meal. I think you will find this one quite amusing, it concerns observations on your tactical methods by General Jiya Sand. You remember Jiya, of course—"

"I've seen enough." Revan sounded tired suddenly. Her shoulders slumped. In the Force, she felt like Sheris, and he had spent too long despising Malak's toy to desire her. It wasn't desire he felt. It was something deeper than that, older. Something just between them, in that place where the rest of the galaxy didn't exist.

Then, those green eyes looked up at him and for a moment he remembered the last day of her old existence; the morning it began when she stirred from the bed, half-wrapped in his arms. Her eyes had been yellow then, and her expression hard as stone on that day she planned to execute her husband.

If only she had.

"I've seen enough autopsies of our past," she added, voice breaking his reverie. "I already know we failed."

We failed. We. Small enough of a victory, but a part of him cherished the inclusion.

Xxx
Next to Jasp, the dead Lord Sion was cursing in his foreign tongue. Mandalorian, Jasp figured, although he wasn't sure why it mattered. He had learned some Mandalorian once, working with a few of them for the Exchange before he settled down with Molla, but that no longer mattered either.

"Eat Revan quickly," Sion snapped to Nihilus, interrupting himself. "She's standing right there. Eat her quickly, leave the rest for time, and let's leave this wretched planet. Perhaps the Ravager is even salvageable."

The Ravager was breaking up in atmosphere above them, according to Jasp's sensors, but he declined to offer that.

Nihilus just stood in front of the open airlock, a black hill of coruscating darkness and shadow. His thoughts were a dull roar in Jasp's head now. Jasp tasted copper on his lips and wiped his mouth, only to realize his nose was bleeding.

"What is he saying?" demanded Sion.

"I-I'm not sure. He's not saying it to me." It was a lie. Images flashed through Jasp's head too quickly to make sense. And all of them were her.

"Fond as I am of traps, and springing traps, this screams too loudly of one we won't win. Tell him—"

Nihilus's form shimmered, and his head turned, for a moment, looking almost like a man again. Just a man, hooded and cloaked, wearing a mask.

"Ah, can you hear me now, Arkan?" Sion wheezed. "Stay, Nihilus. Good boy. Run out and eat Revan if you must, but then, let's be on our way."

The masked head shook back and forth.

"He says no," Jasp whispered.

Xxx

Revan's vision blurred with the roar in her head, blurring her senses. Images. Feeling. Dar'Revan, she seemed—lost. But her thoughts were alien whispers, infecting her mind, mixed with her own jagged memories—

Davad. Davad was on Korriban. Following me. On Manaan. Where else? How long?

Behind her, the Jedi snubfighter cracked open. She turned her head and a man emerged, bareheaded and robed. Blood stained his robes and he was limping.

"Revan," Master Kavar Vakla frowned. He had bells in his hair, woven in on red strands of cord. He was too far away for her to hear them so clearly, but they rang in her head like memory. "You shouldn't be here."

"Neither should you." The roar from the shuttle swamped her senses, sending the present careening off again into a flash of memory, sensation….

XXX

Bells in his hair she knew they meant something but she didn't know what. It didn't matter. Davad's mouth tasted like mint—

XXX

Kavar shook his head. He moved jerkily, like his injuries were worse than they seemed. "Darth Nihilus grows stronger with every Force-user he consumes. If he consumes you, he may be strong enough to pull the rest of this planet into his maw. All of that strength—power—contained in one being—"

"Run," Davad Arkan whispered in her mind. '"Run to me.'"

"Oh, yeah? Then what's your plan?" It felt like she was screaming across a chasm, like everything was filtered. Her hand went to the useless saber on her belt again, and then eyed Kavar's and the distance between them.

The Onderonite Jedi slipped a little on his feet, as if the crash of his ship had made him unsteady. "He's calling me as well, but I will bring him to the Jedi. In the caves. They have laid a trap for him there, and if that fails—"

"If that fails, you'll all die." Revan could feel it in her bones. "Everyone will die on the entire planet. He wants the planet, he's driven—he needs the planet."

"Yes. You hear him too." His smile was crooked. A trail of blood traced the side of his skull. "You see… the flaw in the Jedi’s plan. Do you know why you hear him?"

Yes. No. It doesn't fracking matter why. "He's calling me. Like a scream." A part of her felt numb, almost sleepy. "In my head."

"Come. Come to me—"

"He must be stopped, Revan." Kavar looked almost apologetic. "Come. Come with me now." He limped toward her, his hand extended. “Together, we need to end this…."

The world seemed stilled and when she glanced back, it looked like Canderous and the kids were encased in stasis. Time telescoped, and Revan was no longer sure if she was standing there at all. If Kavar was there at all. If any of this was real at all.

Just the voice. '"Run. Polla Organa, you need to run—"

"Taris." It was disconnected, the thought. "He was on Taris too. He was following me…." But not to kill. He was following me not to kill me.

"You know how he…." Kavar's voice cracked, staring at the dark figure standing in the doorway of the shuttle. "I suppose you don't remember how he felt about you."

"I remember… pieces." More of them from his mind than her own, like afterimages overlaying the flat plane of sand and sea in front of them. "Davad was… loyal."

"Loyal," Kavar scoffed. The word seemed to echo in the air around them. "Loyal to who?"

XXX

Things were… slipping. No other way to describe it. Like a leg Jasp Organa had slept on for too long: suddenly sensation rushed back, a catch in the back of his throat, tears in his eyes, an ache in his gut that made him wonder, for the first time in weeks, when he'd had his last meal.
The viewscreen in front of Jasp blurred until he rubbed his eyes, then sprang into focus. A beach, nearly deserted—with what looked like a great chasm in the earth. Some crashed ships—fighters. Armored figures moving through the sand, setting up large guns.

"Master?" he whispered.

"In the airlock. With lunch." Sion answered him, his voice a harsh rasp. "It won't be long now." He yawned. "Perhaps you should catch some sleep while you can. The next jump may be difficult. Those Manda in orbit won't let us leave easily, and I think the ship's cloak is quite damaged." He sighed. "We should be able to make it through one hyperspace jump on this ship, but I fear we will need a new one after that."

"I thought I heard her." For a moment, it had sounded like his daughter's voice over the ship's speakers. Polla.

XXX

"Loyal," Kavar scoffed. "You think Davad was loyal to you?"

Revan blinked. The sea was gone. The pit, the Mandalorians. They were in a small room, walls curved, doors sealed. Airlock, she registered automatically. "Is this real?"

For a second, the lines seemed to vanish from his face and the Jedi Master looked like a kid, the paleness of his face darkening, his skin washing a warm brown. "I-I'm not sure." He smiled slightly, almost shyly at her. A bell rang, tangled in his dark hair braids. "I wish it was." His eyes were dark, nearly black in this light. Warm and kind. "We are both here. You and I."

"I'm sorry, I-I don't..." her thoughts felt caught in her throat. "I'm sorry," she repeated.

The brown face froze, its smile faded. Dimples in his cheeks winked out like lights. "Ah," he murmured. "Of course you don't."

The brown faded, planes of his face shifting like clay and she realized he hadn't been Kavar at all a moment ago. "You think Davad was loyal to you?"

Not Kavar's voice. Another trap. You fool—

The air seemed to crystallize, the temperature dropping like on the plains with a blizzard rising.

XXX

"Come in from the cold, Revvie. You'll catch your death!" The red-headed woman stood in the arched doorway, half-hooded in furs and the bulk of her enviro-suit.

"I'm not cold, Momma—" She looked down at her bare arms, tracery of blue dancing like magic lights—

XXX

"You think Davad was loyal to you?" the man repeated.

Revan's eyes couldn't help staring at that blood trail across the side of his close-cropped skull. Kavar Vakla's eyes were a faded blue. One of his lids drooped, half closed.

That vision. That was... different. New. That was—Hoth. The voice whispered, a trace in her mind. You must be like Hoth, Fragment. Or he will be the end of you.

XXX

"Pollie! Just because the pond's frozen, doesn't mean it'll hold your weight. And it's sure not gonna hold Dancer. You need to get out of there. Get out of there now!"

Her small feet slipped on the ice. There was a cracking noise. A creaking. Too late, she started to panic.

"Da—"

"Grass Priests. Frack! Okay... okay, don't move. Not yet. Stay... stay still a sec, Pollie." Her father's face smiled at her from the shore. "See me? I'm at the closest point to you, but the ice is real thin here. So, I need you to run, kiddo. Fast as you can. Get as close as you can. I'll get you. If you fall in, don't panic and don't breathe the water! I'll get you out, I promise."

"But Dancer?"

"He's got fur, kiddo. He can swim."

"I can't—"

"I know." Da's voice was steady. "We'll fix that next. But right now. I need you to run—"

XXX

"You think Davad was loyal to you." His smile was sad. Now that Kavar had turned his head, Revan could see the break in his skull, the darkness there, blood staining the bells. His eyes were fixed and staring, and he stood crookedly, one shoulder slanted to the side.

"You just said that." This can't be real. Frack this. She focused on the door, willing it to break apart, willing herself to wake. A vision. Something from the past.

Something not real. Like all the rest. Tell me I'm not standing in an airlock with Master Kavar Vakla, who appears to have his skull half-crushed, but he's still standing—

"Revan."

Kavar's voice.

Not Kavar's voice. Fool. You took his hand and let him herd you into his trap.

Kavar's body stood next to hers, close enough she could see the blood on his robes. The place where his ribs had broken, the way one leg bent, hopelessly shattered, but suspended in the Force. Had they been that way before? Had any of this been like this before?

"No." Revan took a step backwards. The duracrete door was hard on her back. The ship rocked side to side, and there was the sound of an explosion, mostly muffled in the triple-hulled chamber. Her hand went to her saber—

Her fracking non-working saber. Her hand reached out, and Kavar's single-bladed hilt snapped into it.

Those pale lips smiled slightly, even as what looked like dark smoke eddied over his face, covering it with a miasmic haze that set her teeth on edge. The lips moved.

"Do you understand, Revan? I-I want you to understand. She made us both."

"Davad?" Her pulse felt dull in her ears. "What have you done to Master Kavar?"

"Blood calls to blood." The body almost… shivered, those dark tendrils threading over it. Like worms, she thought. Like he's carrion. Like he's already dead. "I'm eating him, Revan. All that he was. But it doesn't hurt. He was nearly dead before. Only a few breaths left—but enough. Blood calls to blood. And now, he's mine."

The white teeth were black now. Was it her imagination or were they pointed too?

"Let me fracking guess. I'm next?" Or is this happening to me already? In panic, she looked down, but familiar skin was all she saw. Two hands, her hands, one gripping a saber's hilt.

"A blade cannot hurt us, Revan."

"Us?" Keep him talking. Like he's a bad trade gone wrong. Someone's firing on this ship. Keep him talking and maybe he's not eating you. Maybe the someone firing on this ship will blow it all up—

Canderous. The kids. They're still outside. They're firing on this ship.

"My own body is… faded. You could not hold what remains. And now, this mount. Enough of Vakla remains to serve me for now. His muscle and bone," He held out the Jedi's hand. "Take hold again, Revan. Now you see."

Kavar was dead? He was almost dead? Davad brought him back? She remembered Oerin Lin with a sharp chill.

"What did you do… what did you do—what are you doing to Kavar?"

That death's head smile. "I showed him Malachor. Do you remember?"

"No." Anger stirred for the guilt she couldn't remember. "You know I don't remember! You're fracking showing me… pictures of Malak at some cafe, you and I swimming! Do you think any of that matters? You think it fracking matters now?"

For a second, his skin darkened again. She heard bells, soft, ringing in his hair. "It's all there is left."

"It's not real." Revan felt her voice harden stubbornly. "Maybe it never was. Y-you said she made us both. Arren Kae made us both. Maybe that was all her too."

He nodded. NOW YOU SEE. Kavar Vakla's hand reached out and closed, warm, on her own. "Does that matter?"

The airlock vanished, expanding until its walls seems to envelop the world.

Or the bridge of a ship, looking out at a cluster of warships, banking like purrgil above the loose atmosphere of a sleepy, brown world—

XXX

A sky of black, speckled with stars. Ships in orbit around a small, brown world—moonless, the fifth from the sun. Even at this distance, the sight of the Mandalorian warbirds, the larger, armored gunships, and their snub-shaped command destroyers caused something to curdle in Davad's gut.

Jedi should not hate, but his emotion was close to that, especially after that last battle, the one where she'd almost died, the one where the Fett Mandalore had shoved a vibroblade into Revan's gut. The one where Davad had done nothing but stand with the rest of her knights. Sworn to non-interference as if they all had not broken those chains long ago.

Helping Revan destroy the Fett Lin's accursed clan in the aftermath had been just. But a part of him... a part of Davad wanted more. A part of Knight Arkan wanted this hunt to never end.

But all things end. Even back then, he knew this to be true.

"It's a good view, isn't it?" The half-grown boy next to Kae had been presented with no explanation other than his first name, which was Oerin. He wasn't dressed like a padawan, but his presence in the Force was unmistakable. Davad was too old to be jealous that his master had found yet another pupil—a point he reminded himself of as he smiled back. "It is, yes. Much better than from my own ship. Thank you for inviting me."

"Thank Mother." The boy used the title so carelessly that Davad suspected it was true.

"I did not invite you for the view." Her voice was sharp behind them. "Tell me what you see."

"Two fleets ready to make peace at last." Davad was not regretful. Peace was a goal they had fought too hard to lose.

"Simple." She scoffed. "Like a beast indeed. Oerin?"

"Why are our ships here and not there with the Fleet?"

"Because Admiral Starfire ordered them here." Davad would ignore Kae's jab. She was only doing it to rattle him.

"Why are the largest Republic ships clustered like that?" The yellow-haired boy pointed to the largest flock of ships gathered in a near-circular knot above the planet's equator. "Republic ships don't use that kind of formation. It's a di'naa."

Di'naa. A Mandalorian word, meaning vortex. A formation Davad had seen more times than he could count over the last few years, but he had not seen it here, not expected to see it here. The boy had seen it—

The boy who knows Mandalorian Fleet patterns.

"Out of respect for Mandalorian custom." He tried to make the lie sound assured. "Admirals Revan and Malak set the coordinates for each ship themselves."

"Admirals." The boy scoffed. "Do I have to call them that, Mother?"

"If I am right, they will soon go by much different names," Kae said. "Butchers. Murderers. Betrayers—"

"What?" Davad tried to laugh.

"Your snubfighter is unsecured in the hangar?" Kae turned and began walking toward the stairs and the bridge below, without waiting for an answer.

"Yes, but I-I still don't understand."
"It's a trap," the yellow-haired boy said. He had a thin nose and clear blue eyes. "Obviously."

Davad had been trying to understand Master Kae, but her claims were impossible. Still, he fell into step behind her, next to the boy. "You think that Revan laid a trap at the armistice? For the Mandalorians?"

How can she trap the Mandalorian ships when our own are all mixed between? Barely armed?

His master glanced back at him, her gaze almost disdainful. "I should have left you longer with the royals, perhaps then you would have learned treachery."

"We are to be Revan's representatives for the armistice reception after the ceremony," he reminded her.

She ignored him, raising her comm to address the Ravager's captain, standing below them at the bridge. "Proceed to the hyperspace jump point near Malachor III. Immediately."

The Mon Calamari looked up, his eyes retracted with surprise. "But Master Kae, we are to stay here to record for posterity—the closest ship to the fleets. By Admiral Starfire's orders."

"Pull back." She rarely showed her strength so openly, and Davad felt a chill. His gaze went to his own ship, on the far edge of the viewscreen—Blood Moon and its crew that he'd seen through so many battles in the Mandalorian wars. Three ships, each under command of one Jedi at this far orbit—oddly spaced and clustered behind the rest of the Fleet, which was facing off against the ordering rings of Mandalorian might.

"I'm... sorry." The Neimoidian did look sorry, eyes wide and black looking up at them. "But the High Admiral's command was quite clear. We are to remain here until the armistice is complete."

"Pull back," Davad echoed, pulling at the Force himself. "As Master Kae said."

"I'm sorry." The man looked confused, his head swiveling back and forth between them. "But I... Admiral Revan said herself—she told me herself... I... her orders. I must follow her orders."

That was when he knew. That was the moment he knew.

With a chill in his gut, Davad noted that Kae's ship held a skeleton crew, a large number of droids, and that every sentient he could see seemed absorbed in their screens, not even curious why two of their highest Jedi commanders were arguing in front of them.

She gave Force commands to all of them. They're compelled. She wanted us here.

"The hangar bay." He grabbed Kae's hand, jettisoning any attempt at ceremony or appearances, dragging his master down the curving stairs to the floor of the bridge, making his way across it to the two guards standing at the end.

Her son trailed in their wake, wordless and wide-eyed.

"You need to remain here, Master Jed—"

Only one had spoken but both crumpled with a twist of Kae's fingers. Davad stared at them numbly, felt their lives wink out.

The boy made a soft noise in his throat.
Their own men.

"Come." Just one word from her mouth. A command.

Davad felt it now, prickling along his spine—fear. There was no time to talk, just that sense of impending dread.

The hangar bay was empty when they reached it, except for one small snub—the one he had flown here.

Later, he wondered if Revan planned for his survival and Kae’s death—but for now, he was pure instinct, saving the Matriarch and her cub as he opened the snub’s doors, ushering them both inside. The ship was built for two, not three, but the boy was slight and small enough still to fit on his mother’s lap. Barely. Without a word, Davad slipped into the flight-side of the craft, and sealed it, sparking the engines.

Skeleton crew, skeleton ships—he had seen the duty rosters for all of the ships. Save his and Surik’s, they were all undermanned. He should have suspected then—he should have known already.

Later, he wondered if that had been a test of his worthiness to serve.

It wasn’t until they were safely in the shuttle, the hangar bay shields shorted out by the Force, and launching out into the densely-packed orbit around Malachor V, that Davad thought to ask his master how she had known to summon him—for at that time, the ships had yet to be in their final formation.

He had often wondered if she had visions of the future.

"Meetra. The girl has some modicum of loyalty to her own blood." Kae’s mouth twisted bitterly. "But I should have known before her warning. I was a fool not to realize sooner. My apprentice is what I shaped her to be."

"I don’t understand."

"I know." She looked sad.

"A shaper," the boy said. "She means that Revan shapes her own fate. As will I, someday."

"If you are bold and clever enough," said his mother.

Davad’s eyes went to the New Hope, Meetra’s ship, as their snubfighter flew above it, heading out for the open stars. He opened his mouth to say something—

And then.

A ripple, an implosion, churning up from the planet itself; a vortex, a scream, a flash-flooded canyon—the force of a hurricane that ripped through all of those tightly-packed ships as if they were made of water.

The Force screamed the death of thousands.

A glimpse of her pale face staring out at a peaceful, white world, before it all burned away in fire.

XXX
"You see?" he asks her. Her face is blank as if she isn't there at all. He hasn't even begun to drain her strength, but he feels it slipping into somnolence, as if even the horror of Malachor V wasn't enough to trigger her instinct to be prey. A part of him is pleased by that. "Do you see now, Revan?"

A shudder runs through her, but when she answers him, her voice is half-dead. "That sound. I-I always—I dreamed of it. I never knew what it was."

"It's death," he tells her, using Kavar's mouth, using Kavar's hand to squeeze her limp fingers. He thought he would frighten her less like this, that the illusion would frighten her less, keep the meat sweet; but when he looks in her eyes it isn't fear that he sees at all.

"But you… you came back." A frown furrows her brow. "You came back to her—to me. Y-you showed me that memory before. I saw you, you were on your knees—"

"I was on the floor," he hisses. "A prince of Onderon, prostrating himself before you."

"Why did you come back? Because… was it because of… what you showed me before? You loved her. Me. You loved me. Is that why you came back to the Sith? For me?"

"It was her. " How can she not see? "She commanded me. She was my master. She was… always my master."

"Who?"

Rage swells. "Vima Sunrider. Arren Kae—"

"She was… she's been…." Her voice falters. "She's been there this whole time?"

"Yes." And now you see. "She made you forget. She makes you forget. She was good at that, but now that Oerin has taken the Force from her, she can't hurt us."

Does she understand? He raises Kavar's broken hand towards her face. She barely flinches as his fingers trace the curve of her cheek, cupping her chin, stepping forward. Her lips are parted slightly, and those green eyes fixed on his. He would kiss her, even in this numb and broken shell, but every muscle of her is tensed, and he feels the Force, that power of hers, battering like mynock in a cage against him. It is delicious.

He wants this moment to last forever, but of course, nothing does.

XXX

"Okay….." Mekel shifted restlessly on his feet, shouldering the repeater Milli had pulled out of a crate and handed to him. "Uh, what are we doing? Revan and that… and Master Kavar just… walked in that shuttle."

And I think Master Kavar was dead, but if I say that out loud, I will sound fracking insane.

Not even a pause. The ramp had opened and Revan had walked right on in, trailed by Master Kavar Vakla. Who was limping. And had a giant gash in the back of his head.

And might be dead.

"We could try blowing it up," Kex suggested. "Revan would probably survive. Didn't you say she fell out of the sky before?"
"So she bragged to Aemelie." Millifar adjusted her scope, tightening the gears. "But we have a rocket launcher with enhanced thermite self-burrowing shells. We have enough firepower to disintegrate Oerin Lin's corpse—so I don't see how Revan would live through it." Her voice brightened. "Of course, if she's turned back to the mad Sith, that may be the best option."

"Not yet, Milli." Canderous Ordo sounded like he really meant not ever.

There was a long silence. The Mandalorians were doing banthashit with the weapons and Mekel was watching that shuttle door and wondering why they all just didn't do something like Mandalorians usually did, and charge in all guns blazing. Seemed to work pretty well for them.

The silence went on too long, really, because it gave Mekel too much time to think about how he could be on his way to Hoth already. Aishe wasn't bad. Sure, she thought he was dim, and she wasn't Telos or Lydie Loanin, but she had a lot of tension in those pink limbs of hers. She'd probably need help relaxing them, and who was gonna do it? That blonde guy?

Telos would be calling me an asshat right about now. Because I'm being one. I'm standing next to this hot Mandalorian and thinking about some Twi'lek because I'm scared we're all gonna die—

"Hold," Canderous muttered. "She's in the doorway."

Just an outline, backlit from behind, but unmistakable. Lithe bod, lightsaber—

That's my cousin. Idiot. Telos would have a fracking field day.

XXX

Canderous watched as his daughter fitted another light beryllium charge in her assault cannon, setting its target on the shuttle. "Those aren't natural shields, Millifar" he pointed out over their commlink for the third time. "You're not gonna break through."

"I don't care," she snapped, letting the bolt fly.

It landed on the side of the shield at least—unlike the other two, which had frozen meters from their target and then fallen to the ground, their charges still intact. This time, the ship rocked a little on its struts, but nothing else happened.

The shuttle now appeared to be covered in mist—or grayish smoke. The readouts in his visor still showed three bodies alive in there—and as Canderous watched, the weakest one winked out. Revan's was easy to identify—rock-steady pulse with that infernal Jedi calm. But the other guy's was all over the place, whoever he was, poor sod.

"What's going on down there?" Aemelie sounded impatient in the sky. "Is the dead Fett Lin disintegrated yet?"

"Haven't seen him." Canderous sighed, tapping his commlink to an open channel, suddenly realizing that Mekel Jin was still standing there like a lost dewback, not able to hear anything they'd said.

Millifar was busy, setting up another bolt when he looked up again to see—

"Hold!" Canderous told the kids, opening the channel so Mekel heard too. "She's in the doorway." Thank the kriffing stars, he thought. Now let's get the hell off this cursed planet.

But Revan didn't wave, or call out, or signal. She just stood there frozen—outlined by some kind of light from behind that looked disturbingly like a bomb in slow motion.

"Down!" he barked to the kids, tackling Mekel, who hadn't had the sense to put on one of their blast helms this entire time he'd been sitting next to a crate of supplies.

And then, as if they didn't exist, Revan started to run—darting down the landing ramp, heading straight for the acid sea.

What Canderous had mistaken for a bomb behind her shimmered, becoming humanid. The edges were indistinct and ragged, but it almost looked like there were two of them—whatever they were. Some kind of cursed Forge magic. Ghost men, trailing Revan like kath. And as he watched they veered away from each other, like outlines of light covered in ashes, speeding after Revan with inhuman speed, moving in sync to flank her from either side—

"Frack," the Jin kid muttered. "What the frack was that?"

"No kriffing idea," Canderous muttered, lifting the grenade launcher. "But we need to shoot them."

XXX

A few weeks earlier on Dromund Kaas...

When the world came back to Carth, it was clear that little had changed—and that everything had.

The crowd in the arena was hushed still—but whispers spread through it like dry brushfire.

The second rancor was dead now too, half collapsed on top of the other one. Carth's son was standing over her body, and the woman with Revan Starfire's memories seemed to be dying.

Carth's jaw was killing him too, like someone had laid one in. It didn't matter. What mattered was the woman dying on the floor of the arena, her blood staining the sand.

Dying, she looked too much like his wife on the Star Forge, when she'd collapsed after Bastila's death. A strange mix of bile and fear clenched his guts.

"Excuse me." Carth didn't wait for a response, just shoved one gawking Sith out of the way, and then another, all the way down until he had a clear run to Dustil and her. Close, her eyes were rolled to white slits, and as he watched, the veins in her shoulder from the stump blackened with quick-spreading corruption.

"Can you save her?" Even as Carth barked the words he wondered what he was saying. Save the woman who almost destroyed the Republic? Save the woman who caused… all of this? Everything?

"I'm trying," Dustil said back, terse. His face was knitted with concentration. Sweat on his forehead. His hands were glowing faintly. Carth had seen Force-healing before. It looked like this. Revan had never been much good at it, but Juhani had the knack. And Jolee, of course, when he'd joined them.

The face was Revan's—his wife's—and she, she was…she turning gray before his eyes, with lines of black spreading through the veins in her leg, and up her body. Foam on her lips. Eyes rolled back to white in her skull, half-cracked through red lashes. Freckles, dark splotches on her fair skin. The freckles were the same, that constellation on her leg, the one he'd used to trace with his mouth.

I didn't save her to see you die like this—to see a woman with your face die like this! She wasn't his wife, he could never have trusted her, and yet—

She could have just killed that kid, Phylus Blais. Instead, she fought two rancor. She fought Tenebrae with everything she had. She made him promise we'd be safe.

Carth didn't have any illusions that safety meant a hill of grenades on this stars-cursed planet, but it was what his wife would have done Tried. With everything she had.

When she dies now, what happens to the rest of us?

"Terentatek poison won't kill her," Zepth said, perfectly pleasantly, with Tenebrae's voice. He'd snuck up behind them. When Carth turned around he saw the bastard had snuck up behind them with at least ten bodies.

"Good," Carth snapped, trying to sound relieved, like a man in love would.

Another damned Emperor voice piped up behind. This one barely old enough to shave. "Or, rather, terentatek poison wouldn't… if she was…if she was truly… Revan." The boy bent down, and grasped that pointed chin, forcing her head up. The dying woman choked and gasped, body shaking, but for a second, it looked like she was breathing more easily.

"Here, let me—" Carth reached for her, trying to keep his own body between Dustil and all of them.

"Be my guest." The boy's booted foot nudged her ribs, and then he dropped her again. "Of course, she's not, is she? She's Sheris Darkstar. Lord Malak's concubine." He lowered his voice, gleeful like a child's, and poisonous. "You know, there are a few distinct differences between them. I was in a… rather unique position to observe. Have you… noticed? I suppose, both of you, I should ask. Have you… seen the ah… differences between them?"

"Get away from her." Carth had his gun out, which was insane. Which was—Zaalbar growled a threat from behind them. Not just me then wanting to shoot the immortal Sith Emperor and all hundred of his fracking bodies that have us surrounded. Good.

"Um… don't kill her." Dustil didn't sound sure. Or anything like Malak at all. "I would like her alive. She's… my, uh… girlfriend. She's my… she's mine."

"Where is your real wife, Malak? Deralia?" Tenebrae's voice echoed. "Shall we send an escort to fetch her?"

"I'll go," Polla Organa stepped forward. Carth hadn't even noticed when she'd left the stands, but there was Zaalbar behind her too. "Let me go, my Lord. I'll go fetch the real Revan for you. I work for her, right?"

Zaalbar groaned a protest.

"You?"

"Yeah." She folded her arms and glared Tenebrae down. "Me. I'll go to Deralia and bring her back for you."

"No. She's dead," Carth interrupted. "The real Revan's dead. Darth Malak told me." He tried to sound dead inside too, tried to feel dead inside. It could even be true.
And if she's not—whatever that one... whatever reason Sheris had for keeping her away from the Sith Emperor... she died for it. She must have had a reason. She did... all of this. She did it for a reason.

Until I get to the bottom of why, we have to see this through.

Carth tried to ignore the incredulous look Polla Organa was giving him. Tried not to feel guilty. I’ll get you out of here yet, Deralian. You and your husband. But not like this—not if it means he could trace it back to her—

"Yes, Sheris killed her. Upon my orders." Dustil deepened his voice, taking on a crisp aristocratic drawl that was too damn close to the real thing. "She was totally... she was... utterly insane. Raving. She wanted to destroy the Sith Empire. So we made an end."

His dry chuckle raised the hair on Carth's neck.

Sheris... call her Revan. She deserves that—bad or good.

Revan hadn't seemed like a crazy Sith—not like Malak—or, or Bastila, there at the end. She... she could have lied to me, told me I'd be safe. She could have killed me.

Carth figured they had little to lose if he was wrong. In his experience, the Sith only gave you the keys to a ship when it was primed to explode the second you hit hyperspace.

"I can still go check," Polla insisted stubbornly.

On the ground, Sheris's body started to go into convulsions.

"Oh, dear." The Sith Emperor said. "That looks quite painful."

"Then get her a medic? Medical droid? Doctor?" Polla snapped at him. Her voice sharpened. "What the frack is wrong with you people?"

Dustil looked up at them. His hands were... glowing again. "I'm trying, okay? I'm not great at this. But I can't let my girlfriend die."

"Lord Malak!" A dark-robed glowing eyed Human laughed, almost hysterically. "Don't sell yourself short! If you can truly channel the right side and the weak side of the Force, you may bring balance to the galaxy!" His snigger was ugly and raw, and Carth wanted to punch him suddenly, very badly.

"Get this mess off the floor," another red-eyed sent ordered them. "We have another match scheduled quite soon."

"You may try and save your concubine, Malak," Zepth added with Tenebrae's voice. "But do so in the quiet of your own chambers. It is a messy death, and oftentimes slow. I would prefer to look on beauty." His red-beamed gaze lingered on the Blais sisters, who curtseyed, smiling politely.

Xxx

Dromund Kaas, present day

Carth brandished his laser marker and waved it at the map of the galaxy imposed in the middle of the circular room." Here... uh... this is the Perlemian Trade Route." It was. The obvious truth had to stay the same. "Felucia and Tanaab are two of the main agricultural worlds in the Mid-Rim—"
"We are aware of the Republic's geography, Admiral Onasi," the black-masked woman to the right of Dustil folded her hands in a spire and leaned forward. "You may recall, we did invade it before."

"Recently," added Lord Iskay, chuckling with red, glowing eyes.

"Of course, Lady Blais." Carth hoped to all hells that the SIS still kept a base on Felucia. He'd try and warn them they were about to be invaded with a Sith Fleet if they got that far… but he was still hoping against hope that things went Hutt-shaped for this stars-damned Sith Empire first.

Early in the Mandalorian Wars, Carth had noticed that the more things they tried to fix, the more things went ass-up. Like on Serroco, when their supply chain in the Stereb cities led to Mandalorian scum nuking those cities—and all the civilians in them—into piles of radioactive ash.

Carth had tried to rescue his wife, only to find she wasn't the one in danger.

He had tried to save his son, only to have the effort put them all in worse straits.

And now, he was trying to pretend to be a Sith Admiral, to plan a war the Sith could not be allowed to win. With the way the galaxy worked, he thought that meant the Sith's damn victory was assured.

Over my dead body! But I'll have a hard time explaining this one to Rew. Or Jiya—or anyone else in the Fleet.

In his dark moments, which were many, he wondered if this was how Saul had felt—there at end. If he'd been alone, Carth would have considered doing what he'd so often wished Saul had had the guts to do and ended it. He knew too much that they could use.

But it wasn't just his life at stake on Kaas. And he couldn't give up, not when Dustil was trapped too.

Half the members of the Dark Council had red, glowing eyes. Those worried him less than the five that didn't. Zash, Scourge—and the three others who all seemed interchangeable with their masks and armor. They could be anyone under there—hell, they probably were all Tenebrae's minions too.

Sometimes, Carth even imagined one of them was Revan—the real Revan—come to save them all.

But, how could she? Tenebrae has stacked the deck. He can't be killed. We still don't have a clue how his… power or whatever it is works. And the only person who might is in a coma hooked up to machines just to breathe. Mission said she looked better—but better than what?

Oh, and she's the same person who almost did win the war. For the Sith. She's Revan. The one who sent thousands to die at Malachor. And I still don't know why—

Mission had tried to contact Deralia, she said, but no one had responded. Sometimes Carth wondered if she was just saying what he wanted to hear. Sometimes he thought his wife was really dead. What other explanation was palatable? That she'd leave them here? That she just didn't care? That she'd never wondered enough to look?

"Lord Malak, do you have anything to add?" Lord Iskay leaned forward in his chair, long-nailed hands clicking against the datapad he'd been given with the false coordinates, inflated troop numbers, and the wrong jump routes, all doctored by Mission in ways she swore the Sith wouldn't catch.
"If she's wrong it'll be fast."

"I want to see another feasibility study." His son was disturbingly good at that arrogant Coruscanti sneer. "We don't have the ships to take on the Core directly."

Lord Iskay was one of the possessed ones. His red eyes squinted at Carth. "I want you to know, Admiral Onasi, that I don't blame you for the destruction of the Star Forge..." His mouth made a tut-tutting sound. "I hadn't expected to need this invasion at all, but how else can I stop the Republic aggression? Plague-ridden dens of chaos at the heart of our galaxy. We have to cleanse them with fire. It's the only way."

"We don't need the forces when we have the Force," another one of Tenebrae's talking heads interrupted. "One Dark Lord per planet and we can easily process all who remain—"

"Except the vaccinated ones," Scourge, who was vaccinated added. "Those we would kill?"

"Of course," said the masked woman on the Council, the one who said she was Lady Blais.

"Another feasibility study," Dustil repeated, the words edging into a snarl. Dark energy coalesced around his fingers, and Carth tried not to notice the yellow gleam in his son's eyes.

Xxx
"How many votes are required to place a motion before the Derran Town Council?" Instructor Cee-Ate's voder sounded out the words so carefully, it made the droid almost sound like he was from home.

Korrie slumped further down in his chair, so the ancient, fifteen-year-old Corellian Learning Bot wouldn't call on him. He didn't know what he'd say if the droid did—he'd been too busy last night trying to play catch-up with Leeshy and Arry over their remote link to bother studying.

Deralians were all weird anyway. They kept talking about being independent, but their entire planet depended on one cash crop that could have bad harvests and market fluxings. Korrie had even read that there were some seed investors trying to grow eridu on Katooine VIII. Climate was similar and stuff... and the farmers were killicks, so they didn't need individual farms—or profits at all, first few years. It'd be pretty easy for them to undercut this entire planet, and then what would Molla do?

(A month ago she'd said to just call her Ma, and something in her voice made Korrie think she wanted him to. And he was trying it out, but it still didn’t feel... right.)

I have a mother. I have two. He didn’t think either of them were dead, but sometimes he wasn’t sure. He stared at the wooden surface of his desk, and tried to make his crossed legs not fall asleep.

“Chore?” The droid paused, and there was a long silence—too long—

“Chore Organa, how many votes are required?”

“That’s you, grasshead!” Layran Lee poked him with his elbow, voice raised in a too-loud whisper.

“Daydreaming again?” Polla Thiswait giggled. Pollanne, sitting between them, kicked him.

“It’s Kore. Not Chore. Kore.” He was sick of correcting the droid’s pronunciation. “If Deralia joined the Republic, they wouldn’t need some dumb Town Council.” That was obvious. A fact they should all know already. “There’s strength in unity. Independent planets are vulnerable. If someone wanted to invade Deralia tomorrow, we’d all be sitting borrats!”

They all looked at him blankly. Didn’t they have borrats here?

“Hessi,” Korrie changed it. “We’d all be sitting hessi. Everybody’s armed, but there’s no centralized regulation, no standing army, no naval forces at all. You can’t keep expecting the Republic to bail you out if you won’t contribute—”

“CHORE!” The droid boomed. “Proceed to the Headmaster’s office. Immediately.”

Predictably, the class erupted in chaos. They were all really into their planet. Korrie had learned that right off.
“Say that again after school,” Layran hissed, as Korrie was standing up. Layran had been nice at first, til Korrie had made that stupid mistake about the Sith. Korrie still didn’t understand what he’d said wrong. Korrie thought everyone hated the Sith!

Apparently, not on Deralia, because Layran’s cousin had been some famous Sith Jedi. And then, when Korrie tried to explain that ‘Sith Jedi’ wasn’t even a thing....

XXX

“How do you know, refboy? You’re just some Hutt rat missus Organa took in because she’s lonely —”

“I know cause I’ve seen a real Sith,” Korrie told him. “And real Jedi. On Nar Shaddaa. Where I used to live.”

“I have the Force,” Rannie said back. “And you're lying.”

“You do not have the Force.” Korrie should know, right?

“Oh yeah? They tested us for it last year. I got it. My sister has it, and our Ma.”

“Lots of people have it a little,” Korrie said. “Doesn't mean the Jedi would take you.”

“Who says I'd want to be taken by some stupid Jedi-Sith—”

“That's not a thing!”

“Are you saying my uncle’s a liar? Cousin Beya’s a hero! She saved the planet!”

“Saving one planet's not that hard—”

If Korrie had been paying more attention to the Force he might have ducked Rannie’s first punch to his guts.

If Rannie really had the Force, he should have been faster, and dodged Korrie’s headlock and flip-throw.

If either of them had been paying attention, they would have noticed Cee-Ate and the Headmaster coming around the corner—

The week of detenshun was a small price to pay, Korrie thought. But next time he’d be smarter....

XXX

“Sure.” Korrie felt a grin stretch across his face. “I’d be glad to teach you more about Galactic Politics, Rannie.”

“By the ag-shed,” the other boy whispered. “Don’t be late. Dirty ref.”

“Peasant.” Korrie cracked his knuckles.

XXX

Dromund Kaas, right after the duel....

The run back to their chambers was a blur. Carth lost consciousness to Tenebrae at one point, and when he blinked again, he was standing in their quarters in Tenebrae’s palace, looming over the dying woman on the medical trolley.

_Polla_, he thought nonsensically, and brushed her topknot out of her eyes. Her mouth was foam-flecked, and her entire body stiff and twitching.

“Seiran!” the real Polla Organa cried out.

Carth didn’t look up to see their reunion—he was too busy trying to remember the basic training he’d had as a field medic, too busy trying to stabilize the dying woman in front of him.

_Stop the bleeding first._ A dark red stain mottled the front of her tattered white dress, and Carth ripped the fabric open. The gash beneath her ribs looked deep, and the scratches above it were red and raised. In his mind’s eye the woman’s body dissolved into sectors, and he revealed and packed each wound methodically—his thoughts numb, working from a place beyond reaction.

_She’s dying._

Her pulse was off the charts under his fingers, the skin of her neck almost too hot to touch.

_She’s dying. You know she’s dying._ Her body jerked again under his hands. Her foam-flecked mouth opened in a soundless scream. Carth… Carth remembered all the other times he’d seen sents die before.

And the one he hadn’t.

Morgana Onasi had slipped away, silent and still in that hospital bed. Carth hadn’t been there, he should have been awake—he should have—

“It’s… okay,” he muttered, holding Revan’s remaining hand. “I need a blanket for her!” he called out, not sure if anyone was paying attention. Carth didn't know if Revan could hear him or not, and nothing was okay; but those were the words he whispered, leaning over her ear. “You’re going to be okay… Revan. I’m… I’m here. It’s gonna be okay.” _Beautiful. Freckles_. Acid in his throat, looking down at the woman who’d—who’d made his wife who she was. _Could be you dying, beautiful, and I’m so glad it’s not—_

In the background, Dustil gave an incredulous scoff, and Mission rolled forward with a blanket and what looked like a whole stack of kolto packs to add to the packs already open on the medical bed.
Carth let go of Revan’s hand and started ripping them open, spreading the thick paste around the terrible wounds on the woman’s leg, the slash on her ribs, and the ruin that was left of her missing arm.

Time seemed to slip and he remembered being on the _Hawk_ after the Star Forge, doing the same for a dying woman there.

_I’m so glad it’s not you, where are you?_

Zaalbar whined somewhere in the background and Carth realized he wasn’t the only one remembering.

“Terentatek poison on the claws.” Tenebrae twisted Zepth’s voice into a dark chuckle, alerting Carth to the fact that they were no longer alone. He glanced up to see the Zabrak kids had joined them. Possessed, of course. And behind them, those Blais sisters and their brother—not possessed.

“Did you know, the venom goes straight to the brain?” Takan’s mouth continued the thought.
“Disrupts neurotransmitters. Everything else is just an immunologic response. Terentatek poison was what the Krath rebels used on Ulic Qel-Droma—combined with torture, of course. To heal himself he had no recourse in his madness except the Dark....”

“Is that what you're trying to do?” Carth looked up to glare at the Zabrak kid, even if it wasn't the kid’s fault. “Turn her? Make her evil again?”

“Maybe if she was truly Revan,” Takan’s mouth hissed. “But this copy? Merely a medical experiment.” He shrugged, just as those Blais kids walked fully into the room and then the world went white again—

XXX

When Carth came to, Polla Organa and the dying Revan and Zaalbar were gone—claimed, Takan told him, by the Blais sisters who had requested to coordinate the burial rites.

“She—she died?” Carth stared at the bloody white fabric on the floor, the ripped bags of kolto, and wondered what he should feel.

“It is only a matter of time before she dies,” Zepth’s possessed voice corrected. “How much time? Care to place a wager?”

“No.” Carth didn't like the odds. Or the look on his son’s face, that ugly sneer.

“I’ll bet three weeks,” Dustil growled, folding his arms. His eyes looked almost feverish—too bright—and his skin was too pale, like he was in shock.

“It doesn't matter,” Carth muttered. “She fought your damned duel. You need to honor the terms. They—they’re free to go.”

“Who?” Zepth’s throat made an ugly chuckling noise. “Who is free to go?”

“Duh—M-malak.” For a second, he'd been about to say his son’s name. “The... the actress. This guy here—Seiran. Zaalbar the Wookiee.”

Seiran Wen was staring at Carth like Carth was a slug on his shoe.

“You were always free to go, Lord Malak,” Takan’s voice chuckled. “Although, your departure was not included in the bargain, was it?”

“Whatever,” Dustil growled, still staring at Carth. “I’ll stick around, Lord Tenebrae and help you and... you and Carth set up your invasion.”

“My wife and I are out of here,” Seiran Wen snapped. “Get her back from those kids. Now.”

“Your wife left with the Blais children. She's under their employ?” Zepth’s voice was flat, already bored. “That affair is between them. Your wife and that Wookiee fled my hospitality and chose servitude with House Blais. They are quite fortunate to be escaping the penalty that most escaped slaves suffer. But you, insect... are free to go... or to die... or to be silent like a good slave in the presence of greatness—”

Something flashed in the Deralian’s eyes. “You can’t—”

The Zabrak kid’s hand lifted, curling into an unmistakable fist. Seiran’s body stiffened, his hands clutching his throat as his feet left the floor and then he gasped—with the unmistakable, horrible sound of choking—

“No,” Dustil hissed. He didn't even move, not a finger twitch, but suddenly Zepth and Takan both were thrown hard against the wall; and Seiran had collapsed on the floor. “My people,” he muttered, in a voice so rage-fueled Carth thought it could have been Malak’s. “Are not your fracking toys. Leave him alone. Get… get out!” Light sparked in his fingers. “Get out of them now or I’ll fry every damn body you have in this fracking palace!”

The room was suddenly too quiet, filled with only the ragged sound of Seiran’s breathing and the whir of Mission’s motor as she glided over to the Deralian on the floor. “You okay?” she asked Polla’s husband, extending an appendage like she could help him stand again.

“Yeah,” the pilot muttered, glaring at all of them. “I’m great.”

“Ow.” Zepth was rubbing his head, his eyes clear. Next to Takan, who clambered to his feet slowly, cradling his ribs as if they hurt.

“Dust—”

“I’ll dust this room now,” Mission snapped icily. “You guys made a huge mess. Shut up while I sort it out!” She beeped and whirred. Carth caught the beeps for 'system reboot,’ but he couldn't figure out what she meant.

“I’m gonna take a walk,” Dustil muttered, not meeting Carth’s eyes. “Get some fracking air.”

Zepth was holding Takan’s hand—no doubt communicating silently about what had just happened. Seiran had gotten himself up and had walked to the window, his back to them all.

It was only then that Carth noticed the other missing party. The droid was so often deactivated, he'd almost seemed a piece of furniture lately… but HK was gone from his position as silent sentinel in the corner of the room.

“Where’s HK-47?”

Seiran turned to look at him, just as the door slid shut behind Dustil’s departing back. “He went off with Polla and the Wookiee. Said he could keep the Bitch alive.”

“Oh.” Carth cleared his throat. “Seiran, I’m sorry. We… we’ll get her back. Polla. We’ll get her back.”

The man just stared at him. “I will. She’s my wife.”

“I-I know that. That isn’t what I—”

“Just get us out of here,” the Deralian said. “Pollie and I… we didn’t sign up for this.”

Except she’s why we’re all here. If Polla Organa hadn’t tried to swindle a blasted Sith Lord, none of us would be here.

But Carth wasn’t going to say it. The man needed his space. They… they all needed space. Not just the Deralian. Dustil was… Dustil needed some space. He’d… he’d calm down. He’d just been defending them—

My Revan will come for us. She has to. She can't be dead. The thought was more invocation than prayer—more magical thinking than faith.
In the weeks to come, Carth would often look back and rue his own gullibility.

Xxx

Four weeks later on Dromund Kaas....

Carth marked up the Corellian Spire on his screen, making suggestions for space battles that could never happen.

Cluster your forces around Peragus Station, he suggested. It’s a good point of entry for the Outer Rim.

There’s a secret beryllium mine on Dagobah. We’ll need twenty thousand ground troops to look for it.

Hoth might not look like much, but it is a strategic waypoint between Mustafar and Donovia. We can build an underground shipyard there.

If we overextend our forces along the Spire, we can intimidate the Republic Fleet and force their surrender.

Argos VII is not as geologically unstable as reports indicate....

It had been a while since Carth had been privy to Fleet commands. He could only hope that none of what he was saying was true.

A transmission blipped on his console, interrupting his stream of lies: Sending droid 2u with present. Happy birthday, Captain Obvious. —POW

Despite himself, Carth snorted. His birthday had been a week ago. He wondered if the Deralian had known—or if it was just another joke.

He wished Polla Organa Wen would stop calling him ‘Captain Obvious.’ How did she—she’d never spoken to his wife. He knew that. She’d said that—along with a list of things she would say to Revan, if she finally got the chance.

But she still—

Was this present another attempt at a bribe? He knew what Polla wanted.

She wanted her husband back.

Since Carth had become an admiral in the Sith Navy, a trusted advisor to the Sith Emperor, he could probably give the order—or get Dustil to give it—and have Seiran sent to the Blaises. But if he did, he knew the Deralians would leave—or, worse, be killed trying. He knew her. Hells, they should leave—it would be safer for them to go...(if they could) but—

But who will watch Revan then? The Blais kids? HK? Zaalbar doesn’t have the hands for changing her feed lines. And if she dies—

If she dies, then what? She tried to save us—she fought so hard to save us—

Carth knew he was losing it. An irrational part of him still expected the woman in the coma to wake up and save them all. Or maybe that part of him was still waiting on the real Revan. His Revan. To end Tenebrae like she’d ended Malak—
Not the same thing, is it? She ends Tenebrae, she ends you.

Not that he wasn’t willing to make the sacrifice; Carth just wanted it to count. And Mission seemed convinced that they had to patch up this Revan, and keep the real thing well away. She’d said the galaxy depended on it—the kind of hyperbole you’d expect from a teenager; but not from an ancient computer.

Carth believed her.

Mission said she’d linked back into Republic networks and found nothing at all about the real Revan Starfire’s whereabouts on the nets either, aside from a vague rumor of her death—some explosion on Coruscant that had taken out Malachi D’Reev.

Good riddance.

“Hells!”

A shadow fell across Sith Admiral Carth Onasi’s desk, blurring the chart he’d sketched out on the navboard for an invasion of the Mid-Rim that he planned to lose very badly—or preferably never fight. Carth looked up to see a triangular, metallic face. Familiar as the whirling lights of its eager red eyes.

“HK! How did you get in here?” Polla said she was sending you, but I didn’t expect it to be so fast!

“Critical Observation, Former Master’s Former Concubine: For a Human with your distinguished service record and impressive tally of enemy kills, you are quite easily surprised.”

“Yeah, well… I posted guards.”

“Conciliatory Statement: Yes you did. I left them alive outside. For you.” The droid’s metallic voice developed an inquiring whine.

Carth pushed his pile of datapads and star charts aside for now. “Is—is something wrong?”

“Philosophical Inquiry: Does the Concubine mean within his own character? Was the inquiry rhetorical?”

“Huh? I meant… is it… is Polla okay?” Is Revan finally dead? He could not say the last part out loud since Tenebrae seemed to buy that she already was.

Awfully convenient of him, buying our lie. It made Carth suspicious; but there was no one he could share that with either—not without worrying Dustil. Not with his own brain compromised. The Emperor seemed to take a perverse pleasure in possessing Carth. It had been happening more and more lately. And for longer than five minutes. But he couldn't voice that fear out loud either—that the madman was gaining control.

Takan had said it could happen sometimes. Incomplete bonds becoming stronger. Carth truly becoming a vessel. If it wasn’t for Dustil and the galaxy, he’d—

The droid made a clucking sound. “Reassurance, Meatbag: the Deralian is thriving in her servitude in the House of Blais. Snide Observation: More than You.”

HK’s appendage extended, with a blaster pistol clutched in it and Carth grabbed for his own—only to see HK cluck again, and drop the small hold-out on the desk.
“Encouragement!” the droid hissed. “Pick it up, Meatbag. Polla Organa sent a gift.”

“Why—?” Warily, Carth did, half-suspecting the thing would explode. The last time they’d had a chance to speak alone, Polla had commanded he find a way to get Seiran to live with her at the House of Blais, her orders sounding uncannily like Revan’s own.

He’d told her it was impossible. I don’t trust you not to leave, Polla. And you have every damned right to go, but we need you—

The gun was nothing remarkable: a small, Czerka hold-out, designed for close range. The entire thing was polished and gleaming, as if freshly oiled.

“Polla said to give this to me?” He opened the chamber to check the cartridge, but there was no note hidden with the power cell. “Any other message?” Does she want me to shoot someone? Myself? He knew the smuggler was still pissed about Seiran, but there was nothing Carth could do —

We have to keep Revan alive and sabotage this damned war—

“Farewell?” Carth looked up at the door, but the droid was already vanishing through it.

“That was weird,” Mission commented from the corner behind his desk. She’d come up quietly too. In fact, Carth could have sworn the office was empty. Did I lose more time? “Not like HK to give up a perfectly good weapon. You sure it's not rigged to explode?”

“Pretty sure.” He’d taken the power cell out, just in case. “Since when does that thing say goodbye?”

“Like I said, weird.” Mission whirred to herself. “Still nothing on the nets.”

She means about Revan. “Did you get through to Canderous?” She’d assured him that she had disabled all the bugs in their suite. Carth had to hope it was true.

“His wife is a—” her voice turned guttural and she made a sound like cars crashing. “No. But I’ll keep trying, Flyboy. Cool your jets—”

“Mission, don’t.” His temples throbbed. “Where… where’s—?”

“No.” How could he? The Blais kids were monsters.

Xxx

Dromund Kaas present day….

Carth’s head ached. Another long session with the Dark Council, where he had to feign interest in a war they couldn’t be allowed to win… and now he had to follow his son dressed like a Dark Lord down the hall towards their armored palanquin.

That damned black cape. Malak had worn a cape like that. Uthar Wynn had worn a cape like that. It set Carth’s nerves on edge, watching it billow across the shoulders and down the back of his son.
“Lord Malak!” The red-skinned Sith who called himself ‘Scourge’ met them at an intersecting corridor, falling into step with Dustil as if they'd planned it. (Had they? There seemed to be so much these days that Dustil didn't share with Carth.) “I wanted a word.”

“Just the one?” His son sounded weirdly adult when he imitated Malak. It made the hair on the back of Carth’s neck rise.

The two of them launched into a conversation in Ancient Sith—as Dustil called the Dromund Kaas vernacular. It was a language that sounded like snakes hissing, and glass cracking, and Carth didn't want to admire his son’s proficiency.

“Mind filling me in?” he snapped, when Scourge finally left them near the entrance of the maze-like structure that contained most of Kaas’s bureaucracy.

“Lord Scourge did not want to trouble the Dark Council with trivial banthashit, but he noticed an uptick in death counts among Kaas City’s commoners.” Dustil shrugged. “Rumors says it's some kind of illness.”

“Illness?” Carth coughed.

“Scourge is afraid it’s the flu.” Dustil didn’t sound worried at all. “Like on Coruscant? I told him that’s impossible.”

“Of course, Lord Malak.” Carth nodded his head. How the hell would you know?

Dustil blinked at him, his face perfectly calm except for those eyes. Those cursed, Sith-damned, ever-lightening eyes. “Lord Scourge keeps wanting to meet with me. I don't know what he wants.”

I don't either. Scourge had practically said he was one of Revan’s allies, but he hadn't offered up more than that to either of them. “Be careful,” Carth offered. It was all he had.

In wartime, you get used to a lot of hopeless crusades. Desperate stands. Times you don't expect to win, but you go ahead and fight because there's nothing else to do. Times like that... you learn to wait. You become a sniper behind a blind, a bomber on a run sweeping for the precise coordinates to drop the payload. The second Carth found a way he’d get Dustil out of here… but it wasn’t simple—and it wasn’t just about them. If the emperor found out Dustil wasn’t Malak, his son’s life would be worth nothing. And Tenebrae had a billion faces, a billion bodies—even in the Republic. Where could his son run to? Where would be safe?

Hell, Carth was one of those bodies. I’m not safe.

But you had to have hope. He had to hope sticking close to Dustil was helping. Had to hope the way his son’s eyes had lightened from a deep brown to light amber was just… something in the air. All the Sith here seemed to have eyes like that to various degrees—almost all. And Carth had seen sents come back from darkness before—he’d… hell, he’d helped Revan come back before. And Dustil hadn’t… done anything. Nothing bad. Nothing that he couldn’t come back from.

Not yet. Carth just had to keep it that way and wait for his shot.

“Shall we go?” his son drawled in a Coruscanti accent that put Carth’s teeth on edge. “Our palanquin is waiting outside.”

Xxx

Dromund Kaas, right after the duel....
All banthashit, Dustil thought. Like he'd landed in some strange fake universe, where Father was his new best friend and everyone thought he was Darth Fracking Malak.

Total banthashit. Dustil had watched Father trying to patch up the dying woman, and wondered why the frack he had bothered trying to heal her on that arena floor.

Everything —everything lousy in his life boiled down to Revan—and Dustil had still tried to heal her. He'd been a fool.

But seeing Dad trying to help made his gut feel funny, as if a part of him wanted all that kolto Dad was slapping on her to work.

“Seiran!” Polla Organa launched herself in her husband’s arms.

Revan (fake Revan) went into convulsions again, and Mission (fake droid) was pumping her full of kolto like there’d never been a shortage. Fake Revan had been convulsing the whole time they’d run down the hall, Zaalbar pushing the hover trolley the Sith had loaded her onto like garbage, growling the whole time like some kind of crazy bantha.

Even more fracked, Dad’s eyes had been glowing half that time and they were suddenly glowing red again now—as Tenebrae left off trying to save fake Revan, and started using Dad to make a long speech—maybe to himself—or maybe to the Blais sisters and their brother, who’d all wandered in behind them—about the death of Revan.

Dustil wondered if he should look pissed, or sad. What would Malak do? The short-haired Blais girl kept smirking at him slyly. Her sister fluttered her eyelashes and waved. Mekk probably would have winked at the long-haired bint, so he tried to do that. His face felt stiff and strange—like nothing was real.

“Lord Malak?” Inse stepped forward, interrupting Tenebrae’s list of Revan’s accomplishments, which made Dustil up their family status another few notches. “By your mercy, may we have our slaves back? They can help us take care of disposing of the body, a task surely beneath your notice. ”

“Your slave and my slave look kind of busy, Lady Inse,” Dustil pointed out. He meant it as a joke.
Mekk would have made it a big joke.

Inse frowned. “Seriina? Step away from the guardsman.”

“He’s a pilot,” Polla snapped, like she had no idea who she was talking to. Her arms tightened around her husband again, like she could protect him—or he her. But the galaxy didn't work like that. She was old. Didn't she know?

“Oh, ho!” Tenebrae was using Dad to talk. There was no way Dustil could ever get used to that.
“Did you wish to buy the male, Lady Blais? I have no need for him.”

“Yes, please—” the long-haired sister began, before her sister turned to give her a long, slow stare.
“I mean… no thank you.”

“Mother said we aren't to have any more male slaves. It isn't proper when we’re unchaperoned.”
Inse shrugged.

“Seiren’s my husband!” Polla Organa interrupted again like a fracking idiot. Like Revan on Korriban defending Dad all over again.
Good job, letting them know how to get to you. Even Selene wasn't that fracking dumb.

“Slaves don't talk back,” Mydia said sweetly. “Do we need to go over this again, Pollo?”

“Seriina,” Inse corrected her. “Like the actress.”

“Seriina. Seriino?” Mydia made a face, and switched back to Ancient Sith. “Why does a slave need so many names?”

“Allow me,” the Emperor murmured, with Dad’s mouth. He extended a hand and—nothing happened. “Oh! I forgot!” Takan’s hand shot out instead and Dustil felt that familiar jolt, like ionization in the air about to charge—

“No!” Like an idiot, Dustil stepped between the dumb smuggler and the Sith fracking Emperor before he could fry her. Like an idiot he raised his hand and the Sith’s bolt—not very strong as far as these things went—glanced off his hand and sizzled into the floor. “The guy—that man… slave is mine! The… male is mine. I don't want him hur—damaged. No damaging.”

“No damaging of the male,” Takan agreed. “But the girl… Revan’s first pathetic imposter? She was amusing, but do we really need her alive now?”

“The girl? Uh… woman? Do you think she looks like my wife?” Dustil’s forced laugh came out wrong, like his voice was cracking like a kid’s. “I might find a use. Later.” He wanted to puke. He wasn't even sure how he’d come up with that. It was a little scary—like when he didn't think about pretending to be Malak he did a better job. “But as the Blais ladies said she’s their property. Right? Her and the Wookiee?”

“By my grace,” Takan’s mouth said. “All beings in my empire belong to me.”

“We are mere caretakers,” Inse broke in smoothly. “Isn't that right, Mydia?”

“Whatever.” The long-haired Blais sister simpered at Dustil.

Mission beeped and the Wookiee growled.

Dustil raised his right hand, suddenly unsurprised to see a globe of ball lightning hovering in it. A trick he’d never mastered before—him or Mekk. Now, suddenly, it felt easy. This fracking planet. “Of course they do,” he muttered.

“Polla,” Seiran whispered behind him, blowing his wife’s cover, if she had any left. “Don't. Don’t argue with… with… them.”

“That’s right,” Dustil said coldly, turning his back to Dad and Takan and Zepth. He felt cold sweat break out along his spine, but he couldn’t show fear. “Listen to your mate, Polla. You are both nothing here. Any one of us could end you.”

Fake Mission beeped, basically calling Dustil an idiot in machine code. He didn't dignify it with a response.

The Deralian bit her lip, glaring at Dustil with those fake green eyes.

I just saved your life. You should be grateful. He wanted to puke.

“I suppose… since this slave won the match, I won't include her in this evening's sacrifice,” Tenebrae told Dustil with Dad’s mouth.
“How kind of you, Great One,” Dustil snapped in Ancient Sith, before the bint could say something really fracked.

Xxx

Four weeks after on Dromund Kaas....

It was easier for Dustil to visit the House of Blais than dear old Dad, so he tried to stop by every few days. Saved him the grief of hearing Seiran whine about his wife. Right now, Seiran was upstairs—getting laid—Dustil assumed. He’d told the man to check in on Fake Revan.

Dustil didn't like to look at her. She looked weak and sick.

Today Dustil, otherwise known these days as Darth Malak, High General of the Sith Empire (at least that's what Lady Vash from the Dark Council had said, when she came to pay her respects) was supposed to be meeting the Lady Inse Blais for tea.

He’d had tea with Mydia three days ago in the green room, but apparently Inse had bigger plans, because she’d taken him down at least three flights of spiraling stairs and was now leading Dustil through a narrow, dripping, underground corridor.

Dustil had a really bad feeling, but when you were Dark Lord of the Sith, you couldn’t just say you had a bad fracking feeling. “We’re… uh… are we having tea in the basement?”

Inse Blais shot back a confused glance. “Basement?”

“Torture cell,” Dustil amended, since there was no word for 'basement' in Ancient Sith.

“In the tombs below the torture cells.” Inse Blais shot him another sly smile. Her eyes were enormous under her close-cropped hair. “I want you to meet my family, Lord Malak.”

Great. Dustil shouldn't have listened to Father, who’d wanted Dustil to check on Revan-in-a-coma today; or Seiran Wen, who kept demanding Dustil take him here to see his wife. Dustil needed to stay in character, and that mean he should stop listening to anyone, because Lord Malak wouldn't have listened. And Dustil needed to start acting like Lord Malak, or he wouldn't be believed and they’d all be fracked.

“It’s a security thing?” Dustil guessed. “The rest of your family living down here in the… tombs?”

“Why, yes.” Inse giggled. “It gets quite messy when the dead escape. Force possession… hauntings… I don’t have to tell you about it, Dark One!” Those yellowy eyes narrowed, gleaming in the dark. “Or do I?”

“You don't have to tell me,” he agreed, reaching for her hand. Somehow the words came out smoother than Dustil expected.

Her fingers were cold. Inse moved through the dark, yellow eyes gleaming like a Cathar’s, her presence at his side a swish of soft robes and a smell like cinna. Dustil struggled to remember the banthashit Ban had tried to teach them about summoning lightning to see by without burning the frack out of yourself, but his concentration felt jagged and all his summoning did was make a few flashes.

Inse chuckled, and put her hand out to stop him. “What are you doing?”

“Trying to see.” Malak probably wouldn't have admitted it. “Why don’t you go fetch a mag-light for us or something, Lady Blais? I’ll wait.”

“You can't see?” Inse sounded shocked. “Oh! Of course. Humans.”

“You're human,” Dustil pointed out.

“Not entirely. Every few generations we take a few purebloods back into the Blais line. It keeps us strong.”

“Oh.” Mekk probably would have taken that as a personal challenge, bagging a pureblood. Pureblood Sith. Inse meant like that loser Scourge, who kept asking Dustil to come to dinner. He couldn’t figure out if it was a pass—or because the man wanted to discuss some kind of fracked-up secret plan. Either way, Dustil figured it was safest to keep saying he was busy.

One thing he was learning pretty fast was that no one expected a Dark Lord to do what they wanted. Instead, they asked. And when you said yes only occasionally, they were grateful. If you did it right, they were so grateful they’d do whatever you asked them and be happy about it.

“Well, I need light to see,” he commanded the Blais girl.

“As you wish.” Inse snapped her fingers and a string of regular old overlights came on overhead, making Dustil feel dumb. If he’d known they were there he could have done that himself.

“Thanks.” He squeezed her hand.

“Thanks?” She chuckled, and patted his. “Here we are!” The girl stepped back, her arm brushing against Dustil’s, and his forearm tingled, like her skin held an electrical spark.

Her face was tilted up towards his, those giant eyes of hers shining. Not entirely human? In that instant, Dustil knew he could kiss her—and probably do even more. He’d practically gotten to the third parsec with Mydia Blais by just sitting next to her on the chaise in the green room. One minute she’d been handing him a cup of tea and the next her boobs had been practically in his lap. But Inse was more reserved. More… refined.

“Credit for your thoughts,” he whispered. It was a line from an old vid he’d seen once. Their clasped hands were folded between them, and he could feel her heart beating.

“I’m still trying to decide,” she said, meeting his gaze directly. “Hello, Grandmother.” Her head turned and Dustil followed her gaze…

There was no one there. Just the carved wall of a tomb.

But what a tomb. That feeling of near-expectation shrunk like his choobs when Dustil took a closer look at the carvings in front of them.

The tomb was inset into the wall, embellished with a bunch of weird-looking babies with wings and impaled and naked screaming men. Some were, as Inse had noted, Sith purebloods. Some… seemed to be enjoying the impaling experience.

It was the grossest fracking Sith thing Dustil had ever seen and he’d been in Kressh’s tomb. Seen pictures of the Nadd ruins too.

Fracking Sith planets. Mekk would… Mekk would make a joke about the size of those poles.

“Grandmother—this is Lord Malak.” Inse smiled at the statuary. With all the impaling going on, it actually took Dustil a second to notice the carved woman wearing robes who was slightly off center, holding what looked like a lightsaber or sword in her hand.

“Hello,” Dustil said to the statue coldly, because how else could he say anything? “Your daughter—granddaughter… told me… uh, it’s nice to make your acquaintance.”

Nothing happened. No glowing blue light. No voices in his head.

It occurred to Dustil that maybe Inse was as banthashit as her sister.

“Oh! Can you see ghosts?” Inse Blais smiled at him. “Unusual in males, but I suppose you were one. Weren’t you?” That smile seemed to take an edge that made Dustil paranoid, wondering what she knew—or thought she knew.

“Oh, I did. I did see one—them once.” The Force felt weird and clammy, like it was pressing in. Was that her or the ghosts? “I don’t see your grandmother… but I sense… what was her name?”

“The Lady Poxia.”

“Poxia,” Dustil repeated, trying to keep a straight face. Mekel would have made a joke about the Rodese itch. “Uh… were… were you two close?”

“Of course. Mother used to leave me down here as a child. Mydia was quite jealous.” Inse turned away and walked to the edge of the tomb. Alongside the coffin-like box that Dustil assumed contained a body was a row of carved flowers. Inse pressed on the third one and a drawer popped out of the coffin’s base.

“Here.” The crazy Sith knelt down and extracted a crate from inside. “Here is Lord Revan’s secret, the one Cook Deckna died to protect.”

“You shouldn’t have?” Did she want him to take it? Was he supposed to know what the frack it was?

The crate popped open, exposing rows of glowing yellow-green vials.

“Don’t be silly. It’s not a gift. I just wanted to make you… aware—” Inse’s voice broke off and her eyes widened, fingers running across the contents within.

Yellow light from the crate illuminated her features, the smug smile abruptly changing to shock. “Hell-spawned, dung-eating, thieving MYDIA!! MYDIA???”

Inse Blais straightened, light suddenly flaring around her; the Force expressing itself with the intensity of a grenade.

“She’s strong, Dustil thought. Stronger than I expected, but not stronger than me. Still, going down into the deserted tombs with a crazy Sith suddenly seemed just as fracked an idea as that time he’d gone down into the deserted tombs with Lashowe Devry on Korriban.

Despite trying to play it cool as Malak, Dustil took a step back. “Um…” he called to the Force himself, but fear made it feel slippery. “You okay, my lady?”

“No,” she growled, still bending over the box. “Look! There are three vials missing!”

Yeah, the case wasn’t full. The stuff inside the vials was glowing though. Dustil hoped it wasn’t radioactive. The Force felt like cold oil, sluggish and congealed.
“There’s still a lot left….” Dustil knew as soon as he’d said that that it was the wrong thing to say. Idiot. Stop being Dustil. Be Malak—it’s Malak she expects—

“If your sister betrayed you, she must pay,” he added, in a deeper voice.

“Oh… she will.” Inse put the case on the ground and turned to him, planting both hands on his arms, hands tightening like claws over Dustil’s biceps. “But the larger consequence, my lord… the fate of our world! You know what this means?”

“Uh… that this stuff is fracking dangerous?”

“It’s plague. Revan’s plague. When I first found the crate, I had Deckna tortured. I threatened to have her son the groom drink a vial….” she giggled a little, which didn’t make her look less nuts. “I didn’t, of course—I just killed him—because I’m not insane… but Deckna made a full confession. The Builder’s virus spreads by air. If even one flask is opened….” Inse shrugged and made an exaggerated coughing noise, then rolled both of her eyes up in her head, feigning collapse. “You know.”

“Right.” He had no fracking idea, but Malak would have. A plague? Like on Coru? Korriban flu was pretty bad, but it’s just a flu—so what? “So, it’s a weapon? For our… for our cause?”

“Not an effective weapon. Not without the vaccine.” Inse shook her head in disgust. “Isn’t that what Lord Revan had you making on Manaan?”

“Right,” Dustil nodded. “Sure. Maybe we should….” He tried to remember anything he could about Manaan but the only thing he saw there from the traces of Malak’s mind were some fracked-out images of Revan. Or the other one, maybe. Sheris. He gritted his teeth. “Republic has lots of vaccine. When we invade we’ll get more.”

“Ah. There’s that keen military mind Mother was telling me about,” Inse murmured, rolling her eyes. “I will be glad to help you, Lord Malak… once we deal with my traitorous sister.”

“I will deal with Mydia,” he promised. Knowing Mydia, that would involve a back rub. Him giving her one. “If she has the vials I’ll get them back for you.”

“Would you kill her for me?” Inse’s eyes were wide. When she tilted her head like that, looking so fake, she actually reminded him of Mekk, sizing up a mark to roll.

“No.” Dustil wondered if kissing her would shut her up like it did Mekk. I’m the Dark Lord of the Sith here.

“Do you….” Inse’s small white hand reached out with sudden boldness and traced a line down Dustil’s neck. Her fingernails were polished black and sharp. Her teeth bared in a tight smile. “You know… while Mother is off hunting with Nereal, I’ve been attending Dark Council meetings in her stead?”

“Under that mask? I sensed it was you.” It was true. She felt like scorched rain in the Force. There was something clean about it, like all the muck was gone.

“I sense you too.” She blinked, and the pause was just long enough to be uncomfortable. “Lord Malak… since we’re both members of the Invasion Committee… shall we draft an assessment of the Republic’s armada for the next General Meeting?”

“Sure.” Dustil remembered all those days he’d spent as a kid with the toy ships Father bought him. Did she think he hadn’t noticed her scorn? Two can play that game. I can lie my ass off about the Republic Fleet, just as good as Dad. “I know all the kinds of ships. Numbers… locations. Everything.”

Inse smiled and sat down gracefully on the stone floor, next to those vials of plague of hers. “Then tell me,” she purred. “Tell me everything.”

He sat down across from her, on his knees, back straight, just like she had. “I thought you said there’d be tea.”

“I did.” Inse’s lips were thinner than her sister’s and she didn’t have dimples. Her smile was still pretty—smarter-looking, somehow. “But I lied.”

Xxx

Dromund Kaas present day….

This Dark Council meeting passed just as boringly as all the other ones had. Inse under her mask sat next to Dustil and kept kicking him playfully under the table. If she’d been Mydia, she’d probably have stuck her foot in his crotch, but Inse was more restrained.

Was almost funny, too, when she interrupted Father to remind him the Sith understood galactic geography.

“See you later,” she murmured as she brushed past them in the hall.

“Soon,” Dustil answered back. Why the frack not, after all? They could go visit her right now. Would get Seiran off his case for a few more days.

Then Scourge accosted him before Dustil had a chance to tell Father—babbling on about how there were rumors of plague in Kaas City. Since Dustil had retrieved the missing three vials (still sealed) from Mydia’s underwear drawer himself, he knew that wasn’t true.

Outside, the air was damp and smelled like lightning. The remains of some poor slave were being scraped away by an industrious cleaning crew. Seiran stood next to their armored palanquin, surrounded by their Gamorrean carriers. As Dustil and his father approached, the Deralian took off his hat and bowed, finally getting it right.

“Allow me,” the man muttered, opening the door to their car.

Dad did it right too for once—he didn’t thank him.

Dustil sat down inside opposite his father, and reached for a bulb of blue milk from the fridger inset into the carved burled wood wall. “You want one?” he offered graciously.

Their car shifted as the Gamorreans picked it up and started forward.

“No, I-I’m good.” Dad looked worried. Like always. “That was… that was good in there… Lord Malak. You—you did well.” Because dear old Father was paranoid, they only dropped the act in the privacy of their quarters that Mission swore she’d checked for bugs; so now Dustil could look forward to more awkward banthashit while they were carried in this claustrophobic armored palanquin, while Dad cracked bad jokes, and tried to bond with Lord Fracking Malak. Like that was believable.

“Really? You sure you don’t want to do a feasibility study on my performance?” He felt his face twist with disgust. Stall them, Dad had said. Tell them you need feasibility studies before the invasion. Didn't Dad remember Lord Malak was the fracking cretin who had bombed Telos?

Lord Malak would probably shove a feasibility study up the Emperor’s infinite ass.

“Hah. Good one.” Dad looked like he was trying to make it a real joke, but his jaw was clenched pretty tight there.

“Hey, driver—?” Dustil glanced up at the narrow slit of window near the top of their armored car, using the Force to crack it open so the man could hear. “Driver?”

He wasn't sure what the real Malak would have called Seiren Wen in livery steering the Gamorreans who were carrying them, but he didn't want to sound too familiar. The man was already getting on Dustil’s last nerve with the endless demands about his wife.

“Divert to the International Quarter, will you? I want to see the Blais twins.”

“They're not twins,” Dad noted, half-smiling as if that was part of the joke.

“Whatever.” They might as well be. Inse had shorter hair, a larger rack, and a lust for fake Fleet intel. Mydia seemed more stupid, and was a lot more naked; but the way they both fawned over Lord Malak made them interchangeable to Dustil. There’d been a whole thing with Inse a week ago after she dragged Dustil down into the cellar; and then with the sister later, when Mydia came running to Dustil to save her from Inse… and Mydia all the while swearing that those missing plague vials had just shown up in her underwear cache… which had somehow led to Mydia trying to show Dustil her underwear cache, and Inse trying to burn down Mydia’s room…until Dustil intervened and made them both swear allegiance to Lord Malak.

If he had to choose, he would have picked Inse because she didn’t keep throwing herself at him. And she was cute. But they didn’t even want him to choose. They just both wanted him. They'd made it pretty clear.

Dustil was... considering it. An alliance with the House of Blais was coming in handy already.

“Thank you—” Seiran glanced back down through the window. Man was too much of a hayseed to know you didn’t just fracking thank a Sith for doing you a favor, you were supposed to grovel around for a while and they didn't have time.

“I said, go.” Dustil allowed the ugly tone to bleed into his voice.

Seiren barked the order, and their palanquin changed direction, rocking back and forth as their eight Gamorreans kept it in the air.

“Sure that's the best idea? Seeing the Blaises now?” Dad apparently didn't think so. “I thought we were expected back at the palace.”

“The Eternal One will figure it out.” Dustil shrugged. “Do you think questioning me is the best idea, Admiral?” He held up a fist, not really planning on doing anything with it….

It made Dustil feel funny, the way Dad had flinched.

The palanquin lurched forward again—and then abruptly stopped. “You’re going to have to move, my lady,” Seiran said from outside, in a garbled attempt at the Sith language.

“I need to speak to Lord Malak.” A woman’s voice. Sultry and low, just the faintest hint of a Core accent on her Ancient Sith.

“No.” And with that Seiran had exhausted his repertoire. “I’m sorry,” he added in Basic. “Uh… do you speak Standard? Basic? Lord Malak doesn’t want visitors.”

“I think he’ll see me,” the voice said. Dark and amused, in perfect Galactic Standard. “We’re old friends.”

Dustil’s brain froze, because there had once been a time when that woman’s words had been the only thing standing between him and death. He could never forget it.

How can she be here?

When was she old friends with Malak?

“You okay, s—Malak?” Dad was asking. “My… lord?”

“It’s okay, Driver,” Dustil called out, loud so the Deralian on top of their vehicle could hear him. “She’s… I do know her. Open the doors.”

The street noise muffled any other responses; screech of a service carrier, maybe, rumbling by. Not so far away came the normal the sound of screams—so fracking typical for a Third-day on Thule that Dustil had stopped noticing it usually. But right now—well, frack, he was already on edge.

Right now, the screaming reminded him of shyrack wings and that taste of dust in his mouth on Korriban—

Then the door slid open and there she was: fracking Yuthura Ban, with yellow eyes and veins all over her face, looking like a bad dark side dirtnap.

Mekk would have thought she was hot like this.

They had… they had never always liked the same things.

“Carth Onasi!” The Twi’lek seemed startled to see dear old Father too, but just for a milli, and then she got into the car next to Father on the bench opposite Dustil like Lord Malak’s private palanquin was some kind of hover-taxi.

Dustil noted the twin sabers at her waist, and let his own hand rest on his. It was new—a gift from Tenebrae, who’d said it used to belong to Exar Kun. Dustil assumed that was banthashit—had Tenebrae even known Exar Kun? But it was a nice piece. A fine weapon.

“Yuthura.” Father half-turned in his seat, shifting away from her. Cute, the way he’d pulled a gun on her immediately. Dustil thought that’d give the man an extra five seconds—maybe—if she wanted him dead. Good thing I’m here, because I could end her in two.

“What do you want?” Father demanded, leveling the blaster at her guts.

“How are you even fracking here, Ban?” Dustil added.

“I saw the broadcast of your arrival from Coruscant. I thought you needed my help…” she glanced at the palanquin’s still-open door and then waved it shut with the Force. “Dustil.”
“Malak,” he said coldly, glaring her down. “I am Darth Malak. The boy is gone.”

“Dustil,” Ban repeated. Those yellowed eyes looked him up and down as she rested her hands in her lap, but close to her left saber (Dustil couldn’t help but notice). “All of my lectures about presentation and you still fidget when you’re on display. Like a stimmed-out mercenary.”

“There’s a holo-recording?” Father interrupted. “Has… has everyone in the Core seen it? It’s on the Net?”

Your wife’s not coming, Dad. She’s probably dead. Dustil didn’t say it out loud again. What would be the point? The man wanted hope, and things were fracked enough.

Have more faith in me, Dad.

“Not at first... But on my way here I saw that clips were shown on all the major networks.” Ban blinked. Her eyes were really yellow. “Some say the return of Revan and Malak is a call to war.”

“Great,” Dad muttered. “It’s... more complicated than that.”

“I saw the duel,” she said quietly. “Where Sheris fell. It... was Sheris, wasn’t it? I saw the arm.”

“She isn’t—” Dad looked like he thought he had to explain. Wasn’t he the one worrying about bugs? “She’s not Sheris. Anymore.”

“I’m aware of that.” One purple eye ridge raised. “You’re using the present tense.”

“What do you want, Ban?” At that moment, Dustil felt like Malak, and he was pleased to see her eyes widen, as she sensed the power he'd achieved.

“I want to help.” She frowned looking between them. “You. Both of you, of course; but you especially, Dustil. This planet is... unsettled. Dangerous. Especially for... you.”

“Dustil doesn’t need help from another Dark Jedi,” dear old Dad snapped, apparently dropping the ‘don’t-say-your-name-in-public’ thing. Dustil didn’t think the Gamorrean slaves spoke Basic; Dad was the paranoid one. “If you came here for the Sith, join some others.”

“I came here to help. Apparently, just in time.”

“I said,” Dad gestured with the gun, “Dustil doesn’t need help from a damned Dark Jedi. Get out.”

Yuthura blinked, as if she didn’t understand. Then she began to laugh. “This?” She traced one of the dark lines on her lekku. “All illusion. Implants and body paint. I needed to attract notice on this world to find you, and being just another Twi’lek here is...” Her voice hardened. “Kaas has too many of my kind with slave brands as it is. Trust me, Captain Onasi. I have not fallen. But what in star’s name are you both doing here?”

She said both, but she was staring at Dustil.

“Being Lord Malak,” he replied coldly, glaring back. She’d noticed his own eyes, he could tell. Weird, but Dustil felt almost proud of them for once, instead of ashamed. Back on Dreshd’ they’d studied why Dark side corruption happened, tried to make it happen even—but only Bandon the asshole had ever gotten anywhere and he’d killed a lot of people in the practice rooms to do it.

Dustil hadn’t killed anyone recently. It wasn’t murder that changed your eyes, he knew that now. It was opening yourself to power. Becoming real. Allowing your anger room to fuel your strength.
Maybe that was what Ban had been trying to teach them that all along——

But now she's soft and she fakes it. She’s so soft maybe I can find a use for her——

Mekk might have made that into a dirty joke, but Dustil could think of better things to do with her.

Make her stand off against one of Tenebrae’s assholes, maybe even one of those Zabrak kids dear old Dad treats like second sons——

“So I see.” Yuthura’s headtails flicked, maybe a message, but too fast for Dustil to read.

“Apparently you still have the Force, Dustil.”

“Yeah. When he died I got it all.” He looked out the window slit instead of looking at her. Outside through the screen, he saw other palanquins being carried by slaves. A crumpled pile of clothes in the street that might be a body. His nails were digging into his palms so hard he knew they’d bleed.

“Darth Malak… he's entirely gone then?” Yuthura’s voice sounded as if she couldn’t fracking tell.

“No one in my head now but me.” He turned his head to her again and watched that sink in. Dustil didn't think he was flattering himself, but he thought he caught a glimpse of fear.

“Put the gun away, Dad,” he added. “I can handle Master Ban just fine.”

“Are we still going to House Blais?” Seiran called down through the porthole at the top of their armored car.

“No——” Dear old Father began, but then interrupted himself with a sneeze. His head jerked suddenly, eyes going red. “Oh ho,” he chuckled, voice shifting in that way it did.

“Yes!” Dustil called out.

Yuthura Ban froze.

“Who is this lovely?” Tenebrae purred in Father’s voice. Father’s features shifted, and his eyes glowed red, that smile pulling his mouth too wide. Father’s eyes were too wide open too—like every part of Father had to be opened to be… to be used.

I’ll kill you, Dustil vowed. I don’t fracking know how, but someday. I’ll kill you, Tenebrae. Vitiate. Eternal Fracking One. I’ll kill you. I’m getting stronger every day and someday I’ll kill you.

“Emperor, this is my old… an old teacher whom I’ve employed.” Dustil let his anger at seeing Dad possessed fuel the hate in his voice, swelling like a warm tide in his guts. It felt—it just felt better that way. “Master Yuthura Ban, this is Lord Tenebrae, the Eternal One, Emperor of the Sith.”

“Master.” Ban’s voice changed too, grew soft and silky, and she slipped down onto the floor between their seats like a joygirl sliding off a pole. “You do me a great honor. My own title is nothing compared to yours. I am not fit to lick your boots.”

“I could judge that.” Father’s mouth opened, and his foot nudged Ban, boot resting lightly against her chest. She wasn’t wearing much more than a few strips of leather, and Mekk would have noticed that first, not her eyes or those (fake?) Sith tattoos.

“Tenebrae,” Dustil cut in. “Ban is mine.”

The Twi’lek shot him an unreadable glance, and drew back slightly. “My lords,” she murmured, bowing her head. Dustil saw the slave brand there, between her t’chun and her t’chin. At the Academy he’d never known that was what it was; but he’d seen plenty since. On Coru and on this chivhole. “No need to argue over a work as insignificant as myself.”

You’re right, Dustil thought.

“Are we still going to the House of Blais?” Seiran repeated from the top of the palanquin. Really, he wasn’t showing enough respect. Tenebrae could fry him, and Dustil wanted to because he was being so stupid—

“Of course,” Dustil folded his arms and leaned back in his seat. “I’m sure the Blais sisters will love Master Yuthura Ban.”

Maybe I’ll give her to Inse. She was complaining about finding good help.

Xxx

Dromund Kaas, right after the duel….

Aftermath was a blur: cheering crowds, a dying Sith Lord, an angry Wookiee, and a mad rush down a hallway and up several lifts. Polla’s entire body was shaking with a mix of adrenaline and fear. She was pretty sure they were all about to die.

But then, standing in the middle of a circular room… there he was. Crooked topknot, bags under his eyes. Wearing some kind of inexplicable dress uniform. Just standing there. Solid. Real. A pissed-off look in his eyes—but not at her.

“Seiran!” Polla ran to him, and buried her head in his chest. Wrapped herself around him and shut the galaxy out. “Seiran. You’re here.”

“You’re shaking.” Seiran's arms tightened around her, helping to silence the dying Sith Lord, the roars of the Wookiee, the voices of their crew. “Pollie, you idiot.” Her husband’s voice cracked. “Don't ever do that to me again!”

“I won’t.” Her laugh came out broken. She looked up at him and then he was kissing the tears off her face, almost hungrily, and she was kissing him back. His cheeks were oddly smooth, but he smelled the same. “I won’t ever impersonate a Dark Lord of the Sith again,” she whispered. “Not for twice the fracking money. How’s Abasen?”

“Doing better than us, probably. Missing you. You know, I left him with your ma—”

“Yeah. She told me.” Polla peered through a gap between his arm and his shoulder at the woman who looked more dead than alive.

Seiran’s breath ruffled her hair. “We saw the fight. Mission broadcast it for me.”

“You mean the droid? The astromech?” Polla couldn't stop watching from the safety of his arms as they loaded her into a medical cart packed with that new kind of kolto. Her. Revan. The real one. Captain Obvious was fussing over her like she was his actual wife. The man looked like he might cry.

What did that make the other one—the one that had Polla’s memories?

Made her not here. Made her fracking off someplace with my memories and our kids. In that instant, Polla would have cheerfully plugged the woman in the eye, just like that rancor. Didn't seem fair, that she and this dying woman got crap, and the Hero of the Star Forge got off.

“Yeah.” Seiran wouldn’t let go, which was a bonus. Stars, he smells good. “That computer seems like a real kid… kinda. You know?”

“What I know is, we need to get out of here.” No offense to Carth Onasi, his son, and the dying copy of his wife, but this was all seriously fracked.

And then it got worse, when the Emperor took over Carth again, and the Blais brats chimed in about property rights.

Polla started to tell Tenny-Bro off… and then it just got messy. Seiran freaked out, the droid was beeping, Wookiee growling ‘danger’ at her, the Blais brats laughing, (their brother cowering in the corner, next to the deactivated HK-47), Tenebrae threatening her with lightning— and—

And then Dustil Onasi stepped between them and the fracked-up Sith, holding what looked like a ball of lightning in his hand like he was gonna start juggling.

“I suppose… since this slave won the match, I won't include her in this evening's sacrifice,” Tenebrae told Dustil. He was using Carth’s body. Like a sacrifice had been an option on the fracking table? (Had it still?) Polla’s legs felt weak and she crashed into Seiran, who grabbed onto her as if he never wanted to let go.

She felt safer there, but still pissed off. Never back down, Da says. Look them in the eyes. “Oh, yeah? Well, I—” “&%$^^$ ^%&%%%%$$#,” Dustil Onasi interrupted, in a voice so dark it made Polla want to piss herself. Her own tirade died in her throat.

“Let him do it,” Seiran whispered in her ear. “We’ll get out of this, Pollie. I promise.”

Across the room, Phylus Blais gave a yelp like he already had pissed himself.

And next to him, Revan’s other droid—the deactivated one in the corner—suddenly switched back to life.

“Statement: Emergency override of failsafe complete.” The thing’s voice clanked, but it moved soundlessly. “Performing triage on the Master. Statement: Move aside, meatbags, or be vaporized.”

“A medical droid,” Tenebrae murmured with all three mouths. “And an assassin unit—all in one carapace? Revan was such a clever Sith’ae’rah… go ahead.” He waved it toward the dying woman. “If you prefer to prolong her suffering, I have no objection.”

When they told her that Seiran had to stay—and she had to go—it felt like the whole world was collapsing. Polla wanted to fight, but she was terrified. Something about the look in that kid’s face—

Tenny-Bro was insane. Random. Evil. But he was predictable. Polla knew how to handle him. She would have too, if everyone had stopped interfering.

But the way that kid’s cold dark eyes looked at her made Polla suddenly feel microscopic.

“You’ll see him soon,” the T3 chirped. “I promise, Polla Polla!”

“Be careful,” her husband warned. His arms were shaking as bad as hers—both of them in a place somewhere between pissed and terror.

Zaalbar took Polla from Seiran’s arms like she weighed nothing at all, and carried her away down the hall, following the Blaises and the HK droid pushing the dying woman’s cart without looking back. “Rescue all,” he growled. Or maybe he was just saying “Wait.”

XXX

Four weeks later on Dromund Kaas....

“Hi.” Phylus Blais had been ordered by his two hideous sisters to look after Polla and the breathing corpse in the Blaises’ attic room. He’d come up there once to set them up, and she hadn’t seen him up here since. He’d looked twitchy then.

Now he looked worse—even had a nervous tic in one eye.

At least, Polla thought, he obviously wasn’t dying, because dying men rarely ogled her chest.

“Hi,” she said back to him in Ancient Sith. The word wasn’t really ‘hi,’ probably; but Polla had given up trying to learn the literal translations when they started giving her nightmares.

“Hi,” the kid repeated, and then switched to Basic. “Is she going to make it?”

“I don’t know.” Polla walked over to the window and sat down in the comfy chair, leaving him the other one—the one with barbs all over it that made your ass go numb.

“Assured Threat: The Master’s death will come later than yours, young meatbag. Do not speak of organic mortality in her presence.” Polla’s new best friend, the HK-47 Protocol Droid, whirred to life, locking his targeting scope on Phylus. “Emphatic Declaration: I will not have the Master upset.”

“Can’t have her upset—you heard the droid.” Polla rolled her eyes.

On the floating bed, the woman in the coma did nothing because she was in a coma. She didn't look upset. She looked kind of gray. They’d had to shave her head for the electrodes. Polla was secretly glad her topknot was gone.

“Oh!” The kid nearly jumped out of his skin, which, Polla suspected, on this planet might not be just a metaphor. “Inse said the droid was deactivated.”

“It was.” Polla got up and paced to the window. How did Inse know? She’d given up trying to figure out alliances here. The Blaises had claimed Revan’s dying body as some kind of fracked tribute, (along with Polla, their slave), and the Emperor had granted it.

There had been a lot of yelling, and the only moment that meant anything—seeing Seiran again—followed by the moment when Polla realized they were still fracking trapped, followed by weeks of being trapped, and seeing Seiran every few days to keep her from losing it. “It wakes up whenever she’s close to actually dying.”

The HK unit woke up a lot. Polla hadn’t slept more than a few hours in weeks. Sometimes she thought it must be affecting her judgment, because she had no fracking idea why she was still here.

“Clarification: The Imposter and the Wookiee switch me off constantly. But when the Master’s life functions come near to cessation, I regain full cognizant control of my cortex, overriding any additional programming. It is a most rewarding sensation—”
“Droid guy here says he has medical training. He’s doing what he wants, so be careful.”

“Assurance: I will not let the Master die. Addendum: I have no feeble-minded, corpuscular qualms about either of you.” HK jabbed coma-Revan with something. Polla had stopped checking what.

“See?” Polla sighed, and sat down in the comfy chair again. “HK and I are old pals. What can I do for you, Phylus?”

“Oh.” The boy looked between them nervously. He was fiddling with something in his pocket. “Um, can the droid make her wake up?”

“Aggrieved Retaliation: Sentients who ask extraneous questions are not required to keep breathing —”

“Stop teasing the kid, HK!” Polla drew her own blaster fast, pointing it at the thing’s beady eyes.

“Amused Cackle: It will feel good to see your blood spatter the walls, Imposter—”

“This again?” Polla thought they’d come to an understanding. “Revan Starfire wants me alive. I told you.”

“Oh!” the HK said. His head dropped forward.

“What?”

Polla got up to see if he’d turned off, but as she approached, he whirred to life again, his voder practically crackling with glee.

“Smug Assertion: I know what they are. Oh glorious planet, that has such wonder left,” the droid burbled in the way that Polla had learned was his happy noise on the day Mydia let him execute her chamber maid and the gardener.

“Look! You can’t kill the slave. Do you think my sisters are going to listen to a droid?” Phylus interrupted their daily banter, his voice sounding braver than the expression on his face looked. “You need Polla, okay? And Lord Revan needs you. We’re all on the same side.”

“Objection: I am most assuredly not on the same side as some jejune, squelching Human—”

“Stop!” the boy snapped. He pulled something out of his pocket. Three glowing glass bulbs. Medical vials, all stamped with an Imperial sigil.

“Uh… what are those?” Polla asked. Because the weird thing was, HK had stopped, and usually he’d go on like this for fracking ever.

“Oh,” the HK said. His head dropped forward.

“Huh?”

We have to get out of here. We have to get out of here—She took a deep breath, reining in her panic.
“My old cook was Revan’s loyal servant, so I guess I am too.” Phylus shrugged. “I-I got these from the tombs. Lord Revan asked us to keep a bunch.” The liquid inside the vials was green and glowing, like hyperdrive coolant, which probably meant it was something worse. “Inse found the crate, but I found where she hid it. Deckna said the vials were really important, and really dangerous—so I took some. I don’t think Inse knows what to do with the rest, or she wouldn’t have stashed them with Grandmother, in the ancestral tombs. Mydia’s scared of ghosts… and my brothers can’t see them, so that’s where she hides stuff.” He shrugged. “She thinks she’s so… smart.”

“Dangerous?” HK sounded cheerful. It clanked towards the kid, shouldering its rifle, and retracting the flechettes it had on its arms. A beam of light extended, scanning the vials. “Nostalgic Elegy: Only hazardous to sentient organic lifeforms. The boy Blais has found stored reserves of the Builder’s virus.”

“Ancestral tombs? Here?” Polla felt prickles on the back of her neck, thinking about the grossness of living on top of dead bodies. “And when you say cellar, you mean in this building?”

“Oh.” He rubbed his long nose. “Deckna said… Lord Revan didn’t want to kill everyone. Just block them from Tenebrae’s Kiss.”

Weirdly, she felt guilty, even though she’d only been asking for research. “I was asking how we could get rid of them, not use them!”

“You heard what he said about mortality rates?” The kid frowned at her, like Polla was the evil one.

“Primary Assumed Rationale: The Builder’s virus has an approximate sixty per cent chance of overwriting the corrupted Tenebrae programming, eighteen point three per cent higher among nulls. Supposition: The Master still needed a work force on Kaas, and the high conversion rate would have further exacerbated our labor deficit. Had the Master gone ahead with the manufacture of more of my kind for her war machine, these labor issues would have been resolved. Secondary Rationale: Utilization of the virus on any Sith planet would break the Lehon Treaty, causing a potential act of war—"

“Overwriting?” Polla held up her hand. “Wait! Hold on. What do you mean by overwriting?”

“He means that sents who are graced by Tenebrae's Kiss sometimes lose their connection to the Eternal One if they get the plague,” Phylus said. “It happened to Lord Wistal of House Sol. She had to go into exile so Tenebrae wouldn't kill her.”

“Someone getting sick stops Tenebrae from being in their head? For good? So… if someone gets sick, they get cured? No more Sith possession?” Polla fingered the vials in her pocket.

“Compliment: Imposter, you have an excellent grasp on the facts. Yes. Yesss.” The droid’s red eyes gleamed. “Some species are immune, but not Human meatbags, or Twi'lek meatbags, or most of this world’s meatbags.”

And… you’re welcome, Captain Obvious! I just found you a way out. “So we can use it on Carth Onasi, right? Contact… what does that mean? Does he need to drink it?”

“Statement: the surest method, Master Imposter, would be a liberal application of the virus on an inanimate object, and the transfer of that object to the Onasi Meatbag. Helpful Assurance: In my disguise as a programmed automaton, I possess the means to bring the object to Admiral Onasi in the most expedient manner.”

“It might kill him through.” Phylus could be such a killjoy. “Or he might not catch it at all. Deckna said not to open those vials. She said it’s dangerous. She said only Lord Revan should decide what to do with them. That’s why I think we should try and wake her up and ask, before Inse does something crazy.”

“Interesting…. An object, Polla thought, looking around the room. “What was that you said about Inse?”

“Inse is up to something with Lord Malak.” The kid looked down at the floor, a sly smile creeping across his face. “But when Inse finds the vials missing, she’ll blame Mydia.”

“Do you want your sisters to kill each other?” Funny, how weeks as a slave on a Sith planet were starting to make that outcome seem reasonable.

“They can’t. Mother compelled us not to.” He brushed the hair out of his eyes. “I stole six vials, but I replaced three with some of Inse’s facial mask—” he chuckled. “That should keep the two of them busy for a while.”

“Not bad, kid.” Color me impressed.

“Inse killed Deckna.” The boy sounded pissed. “And the new cook doesn't make the cinna rolls right. Besides, Deckna told me Lord Revan was planning a way to have all the slaves rebel… if I help, a lot of them will be grateful to me, not my sisters.”

Polla decided to let that one alone. “Do you know how she was planning that?”

“No.” The Sith brat looked at Polla like she was the slow one here. “That's why we need to wake her up.”
“Statement: The Master’s condition is stabilized. Assertive Action: Imposter, let me bring the Concubine Admiral Meatbag a present. Now.”

“I gotta talk to Zaalbar first. Uh… give those to me.” She extended her hand and the kid obligingly handed Polla the vials of deadly plague.

Great. She wondered where she was supposed to stash them. Not like slaves had lockers. Or personal possessions. Or anything.

A fracking revolution isn’t the worst idea… but right now… I need something a lot more basic.

“Phylus,” she barked. “Go fetch Zaalbar. And give me your gun.”

XX

Dromund Kaas, present day….

Polla Organa Wen wasn't crying so much as she was trying not to scream with tears running down her face, curled up in the comfy chair with a blanket over her head.

Sometimes… this whole damned planet… it was all too much.

“Aggrieved Statement: Your sniveling is not helping the Master. Please desist.”

“She's not my master, HK,” Polla snapped, peering out from under the blanket. “She's a veg.”

“Fervent Objection! The Master is merely recovering her strength!” The way Revan’s scary droid whined its voder when it was upset reminded Polla of Bolts—a little—which was bad, because it made her homesick all over again.

By rights, Seiran and I should be gone by now. He wants to make a run for it. And logically, he’s right.

They could make it. The Ebon Hawk was still parked in the Emperor’s palace garage. Seiran had lifted the ignition chip from Carth weeks ago. All they’d need to run the planetary defenses was some luck and two pilots like… them. They could see Abasen again. Ma and Da. Home—at least until the insurance inspectors checked. Hells, if the real Revan Starfire was lurking around Deralia now, instead of dealing with her own, Polla could shoot out her kneecaps.

But Carth and Zaalbar put their necks on the line for us. And even that bratty evil kid—

When Polla thought the whole thing through, she had the uncomfortable reminder that all of them being here… was pretty much her fault.

Dustil had told Polla pretty clearly that it was all her fault that his boyfriend was dead. Yeah, she got it. If she hadn't asked Tenny-Bro to get Malak when she was pretending to be Revan, Dustil Onasi wouldn't be here, and Mekel Jin, that son of a whore she’d met in the Coruscanti Underground, would still be alive.

If she hadn’t been pretending to be Revan, Dustil’s dad wouldn't be here.

Zaalbar wouldn't be here.

Coma-Revan wouldn't be here.

Those two Zabrak kids wouldn’t be here.
Seiran definitely wouldn’t be here.

Guilt was all tangled like guts inside Polla—so tangled that sometimes she wasn't sure where it even began. Was the bad choice trying to fool Suvam Tan? Grabbing a ride with Therion? Faking their deaths? Or was it long before that—was it Polla deciding to run the loop in the dark and cracking her head open on that damn stone wall?

If I hadn’t tried to impress Seiran that night, none of this would have happened.

But then, we wouldn’t have Abasen. And I wouldn’t have Sei.

“Interrogative Demand: The Master will recover? Her vital signs have improved by an aggregate of three point zero two nine percentage points towards the normal Human levels this week.” The querulous whine at the end of HK’s voice would have been funny, if Polla hadn't seen him shoot those poor people.

The T3 was moody and this HK unit was a fracking sociopath.

“You're the one with the medical programming—not me.”

“Affirmative Objection: But the organic brain is so squishy, with so few reparable parts—”

He kept talking (and that's how far down the sarlacc hole Polla was these days, she was calling one droid a 'he’ and the other one ‘Mission Vao.’)

Polla wiped her eyes and unwrapped herself from the blanket. She went to replace the waste feeds and renew the liquid ones. Dark-Lord-of-the-Brain-Dead was packed in that newfangled kolto. The mask on her face made her look like a Quarren, with the tubes fitting into the breathers.

“Pleading Request: Give me a response!”

“What?” The old thing actually sounded upset. “Sorry, I was just thinking… about… stuff.”

“Let me take another walk for you. Good master. Clever master. Please?”

“And by walk you mean…..”

“Undignified Prostration: Yes, Master. Let me take another gift to the Concubine Meatbag.”

“No.” She would smash the vials, if she didn't think that wouldn't make it worse. Had the HK been lying when he said flushing them down the sewers would be an excellent method of distribution? “It… might have been a mistake, what we did with that one.”

Just a drop on HK’s appendage and an instruction to take one of his blasters to Carth.

A few days later, their neighbors on either side of the Blais residence might just have gone on vacation. That’s what Polla had thought at first. Except for the increasing stacks of bodies in the morning.

Shirel in the market had been sneezing yesterday and not at the meat counter at all today. The market itself had been quieter too. Not half as many public floggings….

Maybe a coincidence too?

Maybe you want it to be.
“I… shouldn't have listened to you.”

“You asked for my help, Cringing Imposter—”

“Stop.” She heard the familiar creak of gears as the T3 rounded the stairs. “Remember. You have to do what Zaalbar says and he says obey me. So… obey me. Shut up about it.”

Maybe we did let that plague thing loose, but frack if I’m gonna admit it.

“Approval: For a sniveling null, you can quite take the Master’s tone when provoked.”

“Is that what this was?”

The HK whined and whirred.

“Hey, guys!” Mission rolled into the room. Her dome swiveled. “Have you been crying, Polla Polla?”

“No,” Polla lied.

“There, there,” Mission chirped, all way too cheerful. “Have faith!” She made a dir-whee noise. “I think she looks better, don’t you?”

Where are my credits, you lying piece of bolts? When it became clear they were trapped here, Polla had asked for at least a down payment—only to have Mission make up some excuse about exchange rates and unexchangeable currencies. Kaas credchips would be fine, Polla had said back, but then Mission had hemmed and hawed, and here it was, weeks later, and Polla was still unpaid slave labor for a bunch of crazy Sith, and an (also unpaid) nurse for a braindead Dark Lord on the side.

And… and maybe a mass murderer to boot. They were evil. Most of them... were probably evil.

“Hrmmm…” Mission rolled past her, extending a long, skinny appendage and examining Revan’s artificial arm, now pitted and scratched, that HK had reattached, like Revan Starfire would ever need an arm again.

The droid poked the meat of the palm and a golden finger twitched. Then, she rolled around to the other side and did the same. This time nothing happened. “Poo-doo!”

“Statement: Perhaps the Master’s own neural attachments all need replacing with the same silicose filament used to transmit signals through her superior arm.”

“Why are you even still here, HK-47?” Mission’s dome whirred back toward Polla. “Didn’t we agree to turn him off for good?”

“He’s helpful.” Polla tried to look wide-eyed and frightened. Not a stretch on this fracked planet. And not her problem if the astromech didn’t understand how the HK worked. “The Blais sisters are afraid of him. Plus, he’s keeping coma-Revan here alive.”

“Concurrence: Without my presence guarding the Master, they might be tempted to turn on us.”

“Not as long as Dustil’s giving both of them those… looks.” The T3 managed to make her voder sound like a real pissed-off teener. If Polla hadn’t also seen her calculating galactic wargames with Zaalbar and talking about terraforming, she might have even bought the act.

“Don't count on Darth Moody.” Polla picked up the waste bags and started feeding them down the incinerator chute. “He’s not looking so good, lately.”

“He’s fine!” Mission sounded like her circuits depended on that, so Polla didn't argue.

The doorbell took that moment to ring.

Both droid heads swiveled to Polla, expectantly.

“What?” Did she look like a butler? Back home a droid would do that work. “Fine. I'm going.”

Polla turned and left the attic sickroom, taking the spiraling stairs because it was faster (and safer) than the lift with no railings that creaked like a dying bantha. By the time she rounded the last corner, Zaal had already answered the door and Seiran was halfway up the landing. Below him, Captain Obvious and his Sithy kid were talking to Zaal, but Polla didn't give a frack right then.

“Sei—” His lips planted on hers, solid as duracrete, and he shoved her against the rails. It wasn't so much a passionate embrace as a relieved one. “You okay?” she whispered in his ear.

“We need to go home.” His forehead rested against hers. “Frack, Pollie. You have to see that—”

“I know.” They'd been over this before. “Look, when… Darth Malak invades the Republic, we’ll catch a ride back to the Rim, okay? Inse says it won't be long.”

He scoffed, like she was serious. “You—”

“I’m… working something out that might be better.” Zaalbar had thought it was a solid plan too. Solid as anything else. HK had translated for her. Zaalbar knew these sents. He knew how it was.

Onasi won't leave because of his kid and his kid won't leave because Onasi’s possessed.

So, we get Onasi not possessed. That still leaves coma-Revan, who Onasi won't leave because he's too fracking noble; but we can throw Revan in a crate or something and smuggle her out—

Or maybe she’ll actually die.

The flaw in this plan was that it had been a week, local time, and Onasi had shown no signs of getting sick at all. Other sents seemed to be getting sick… hopefully just a coincidence… but not Carth.

And if this plan didn't work— Seiran’s not wrong. We should run. I want my kid—I want our old life back—

“How is she?” Speak of the nerf and there it comes. Captain Onasi himself, coming up the stairs, looking healthy as a hessi, except for the shadows under his eyes.

“Same, she says.” Seiren wrapped his arms around Polla's waist, pulling her back against him protectively. “Take a look for yourself.”

“You know I can’t… can’t risk it.” Carth glanced up toward the top of the stairs and then back down. “Tenebrae thinks she’s already dead.”

“How are you?” Polla asked more pointedly. “And Lord Sulkypants?”

“We’re… still here.” Carth grimaced. Did he look pale and sweaty? Feverish?

Polla narrowed her eyes. Wishful thinking. “Feeling all right?” she added.
“Fine.” He looked confused that she was asking. “You? Are you…”

“Great.” She turned her head back to Seiran, trying to hide the disappointment. “Fracking fantastic.”

“Lord Sulkypants was wondering…” a cold voice said from the stairs below Carth, “... have you seen the Lady Inse, slave?”

“Frack off,” Polla snapped. There was no one around but them. At least for another hour. Inse had her advanced mathematics course in the Dark Temple Academy, and Mydia was busy doing... someone. Maybe another groom. “You can't talk to me like tha—”

The merest pressure on her throat, a gentle squeeze, like a warning and then Sulkypants himself came into view, looking paler than ever. Were those veins on his forehead? Or just dirt?

“I need to go,” his father muttered, beating a retreat back down the stairs. It looked cowardly but they had come to realize it was smart. Tenny-Bro seemed to delight in catching them all off-guard.

Get sick soon, Polla thought at Carth’s retreating back. I just want to go home.

“It's generally considered poor manners on Kaas for slaves to insult Sith Lords,” a new voice murmured and a purple Twi'lek rounded the stairs, coming up as Carth descended. She inserted herself between Dustil Onasi and them, making the landing feel really fracking crowded. “I would advise caution.”

Her eyes were even more glowy and fracked than Sulkypantses. But she looked familiar—

Dustil Onasi smiled thinly at Polla’s involuntarily blanch. “Master Ban, this is Polla Wen. And her husband, Seiran Wen.”

The purple Twi’lek who looked like she'd tangled in a dark side blender nodded, a frack of a lot more politely than Sulkypants. “You're her caretakers...” her voice trailed off and on brow ridge arched. “... Deralian?”

“I'm Polla Organa Wen,” Polla snapped. “Of course I'm looking after her. Apparently cleaning up after revans is my job.”

“The Polla Organa who—”

“Is not dead,” Polla nodded, slightly savoring the moment. Grass Priests, on this planet you never knew if you'd get another one. “That's right.”

“Who are you?” Seiran demanded. “You look... familiar.”

“I'm Yuthura Ban,” the purple Twi’lek said. “I'm here to help. I was Dustil and Mekel's teacher on Korrib—”

“She's here to help me,” sneered Sulkypants. “Frack lot of good she did Mekel.”

“There was nothing more I could do for him,” Yuthura said slowly. Really, for a Darksider, she was acting polite. “That's why I came to you, Dustil.”

“Malak,” he muttered. His eyes seemed to be almost... glittering. Skin looked paler even than a few days ago. “Call me Malak.”

“I'm glad I came,” Yuthura Ban said quietly. For a Sith, she actually seemed sane. “I want to help you… Malak. When the bond was broken, it must have been a terrible shock.”

The temperature in the room seemed to drop, so much that when Polla breathed out she half expected to see her breath coalesce.

“Mekel died,” Sulky—Dustil—muttered. “He’s dead now.”

“Oh.” The Twi’lek twisted her head tails around her neck. “I’m sorry. You could still sense—was it Katarr?”

“What?” The kid’s voice deepened, weirdly echoing. “I said, I don't want to talk about it. Forget it.”

“Dustil….”

Was there something going on between them? It was then that Polla realized who Yuthura Ban was. A few months ago, she’d have gotten it instantly; but the strange thing was, the more people she met ripped from the headlines of Revan Starfire This is Your Life, the fewer she actually wanted to meet.

“Yuthura Ban? Revan’s best friend? I saw that vid! You were talking about her! The Official Coruscanti Version?”

“Yeah,” Sulky muttered. “They were pals. Good old days, back in Dreshdae. Fun times… bonding.”

“I—” The Twi’lek seemed spooked. She opened and closed her mouth a few times. Maybe she had bad memories.

“Lord Malak…?” A cheerful voice trailed up the stairs from down below. “The Wookiee said you’ve come to visit! What a lovely surprise.”

“I think Inse likes you,” Polla told Sulky, because she knew it would piss him off. “She’s just more subtle than Mydia. No finger bouquets.”

The purple Twi’lek frowned.

“Those are bouquets made of fingers,” Seiran muttered, just in case Yuthura Ban didn't get it.

“Yes….” The Twi’lek seemed even more distracted now, glancing down the stairs and then back up at them.

“Lord Mal-ak!” Another voice. Mydia. The crazier one. “You brought Admiral Onasi for Inse? How did you know she likes old things?”

“Better go,” Seiran told Sulky. “Don't want to leave your da alone with that lot.”

“Take the Twi’lek to Revan,” Sulky told Polla and Seiran. “She claims she can heal her.” His kid’s face twisted with unkid-like hate. “I've got better things to do.”

“Okay….” Polla said, looking up at Seiran to check.

He shrugged and gave her a slight nod.

“Right this way.” Polla didn't look back, and didn't let go of Seiran. “It's about five more flights. Good exercise.”
“How long has he… been like that?” The Twi’lek asked behind her as they ascended the spiral.

“How the hell should we know? Maybe all his life?” Polla scoffed.

Xxx

Deralia, Present Day….

The ag-shed was where the threshers were stored when they weren't harvesting. It was on a deserted part of the school grounds, past the shooting range, and the archery range, and the grenade factory. (Where they made only fake grenades like smoke ones and flash ones, because something about safety regs.)

The field was muddy and wet, and Korrie’s boots squelched in that mud as he tried to tame his mad feelings, because they'd be bad in a fight. It had been stupid — stupid — to let Layran get to him. Stupid not to fit in better. Both Mothers had told him he needed to hide here and Korrie was pretty sure he'd just done a craphole hell dammit job of fitting in, and not drawing any attention.

Ma-Moll would be upset too. The school might call, even. He didn't like to upset her. He knew how worried she got—

Stupid. Stupid to get mad.

Not just stupid, Mal. Dangerous. He wished the voice in his head still sounded like Father, but it didn't. It was just his own conscience. Ma-Moll said you always needed to listen to your conscience, but what was the point when the only thing it said that made sense was that it wanted to go home?

Except home's gone. Like Grandfather.

Korrie could sense Layran up ahead. The Force was good for that much. And he wasn't alone. One, two, three—the sleemo-pit had brought along companions.

Dishonorable. Egs didn't fight real battles, of course, just Sims until they became Amaltines; but they fought their own. With their chaps—but no one here was rich enough for their own hunter killer chaperone droid.

Korrie let his hand fall on the pistol on his belt and edged behind one of the target dummies because he was no dummy.

“I know you're there!” he called out. “Come over here, Layran, so I can kick your ass!”

“Fierce,” said a voice behind him. Almost conversational-like. “But you'll have to show them you mean business. Could get messy. You prepared for that?”

Korrie froze. The Force hadn't—the Force still wasn’t showing him anything there at all.

“Are you a droid?”

The voice didn't sound like one, but he couldn't think of what else it could be.

“Trained to act like one… sometimes.” Something hard and sharp poked at Korrie’s neck and he froze, feeling like his heart was gonna jump out of his chest. “Drop the gun, kid. And no funny business.”

“Okay.” Korrie swallowed hard. “Can I turn around?”
“Not yet. Any other weapons? Knives? Saber? Anything I need to know about?”

“Uh uh.” Breathe, he reminded himself. You’re not dead yet. He has to want something. Find out what. “No. What do y-you, what do you want?”

“A nice bottle of Yu-Phaedran ambrosia, maybe a fishing hauler.” The man’s voice was flat now. Not angry at all. “A sweet piece of tail. No more orders from the hollow men. They have us hunting deserters now—know why? Because we know. We all know too much, we ran too close. I had to put a bolt through sweet Naula’s lovely, horned skull at fifty meters out. Never even got to say good-bye…and now this.” His laugh was hard. “You. I was already in the neighborhood so I got the babysitting gig too.”

“You can’t kill me. You cannot kill me.” Negotiate in a hostage situation until the odds change. There’s always something they want. Always something you have—

“I—I’m rich. Do you need credits?” They’re all on Coru. Ma-Moll would ransom me but I hate to ask—

The blade pressed a little harder. The voice behind him chuckled. “Kid, everyone needs credits. But credits didn’t do Naula any good, did they?”

“I—I’m sorry about her.” Korrie knew a Naula, she was the one with the ships, who had sold Mother that ship. “I know another Naula, she—”

She’s Devaronian, dummy. They have horns. She could be the exact same one. She probably is.

“She’s dead? Naula’s dead?” His voice came out in a squeak. He’d only met her that one time.

Don’t cry, Korrie commanded himself. Don’t cry don’t cry.

“Naula. Kiril. Gaston. Benife. Yeah. Deserters. All dead.” The blade lifted abruptly from Korrie’s neck and he took the chance and dived instantly to the ground, willing for his blaster to snap into his hand as he rolled, aiming and firing before he’d even looked up, trusting the Force like Father always said—

And it worked it worked Father was right!

The training bolt glanced off black body armor, straight in the chest. A Human man stared down at Korrie. He was smiling. One thick black eyebrow raised. “Nice shot.”

Korrie fired again, and a blue shield shimmered before the man’s face and then the bolt glanced off there too.

“Not bad, kid. Not bad at all. You’re fast. No one will expect that. Not with how big you are.”

“If the laser bolt hits your eye it can blind you,” Korrie warned him. Ma-Moll had said so. Permanently.

The man nodded, and raised his vibroblade. “You wanna try again?” He sounded serious.

“What do you want?” Korrie repeated. The glint of a red light from behind the ag shed caught his eye. It was to the left of the man—so maybe he didn’t see.

“Doesn’t matter.” The man frowned. “That woman you’re staying with. She knows who you are? She treats you okay?”
“Do you know who I am?” He willed his voice to get as mad as Mother’s. “You leave her alone! You need to leave—”

The sharp burst of repeater fire drowned out Korrie’s words, and the man staggered back as the rounds peppered his chest. With the armor, they didn't seem to be going through, but they were enough distraction that Korrie took the chance and rolled into a run, pumping his legs as fast as he could toward the grenade workshop. Lots of places to hide in there. And there's smoke grenades and stuff—

“Chore! Chore! Over here!”

Korrie veered left toward the strand of trees and the voices. Every nerve in his body felt electric, like the Force was with him. He vaguely felt that presence behind him—that guy that evil assassin guy—wink out—hiding, he’s hiding—before he reached the clearing.

Layran Lee, Jesp O’Sip, and Pollanne Dinana stared at him, with eyes big as goreapples. Pollanne held the repeater that had just started to take the evil assassin guy down. Layran was sitting in a speeder. Its engine was revving. Jesp had a pair of field goggles in his hand with the projector switched on, like they’d been spying on Korrie. Like they’d seen the whole thing.

“You moved fast,” Layran told him. “Never seen anyone move that fast except in the vids.”

“Those vids are fake,” Jesp muttered. “What are you, refboy—some kind of freak?”

“Maybe.” Kore was taller than Jesp, and Jesp looked away first. “Is that a problem?”

Jesp shook his head.

“If there's some creep hunting kids we need to run,” Pollanne said seriously. “Get in, Kore. We know some hiding places.”

“If he comes after you again down the canyon way we can drop rocks on him.” Layran added.

“I was watching in the scope,” Pollanne said as they drove away. “You hit him dead-on. Nice!”

“Thanks.” Kore frowned. “I don't think he wanted me dead.”

“Doesn't matter,” Layran said. “Nobody messes with our gang! Specially some foreign creep with swords—”

“He had two swords!! Did you see that?” Jesp broke in. “Like he was some kind of Jedi Sith!”

“They weren’t lightsabers,” Rannie argued. “Jedi Sith woulda had lightsabers.”

“Jedi Sith’s not a—” It didn’t matter. Kore laughed. The wind blew on his face as the speeder sped along. It didn't matter. At least for now, it didn't matter. “You know what? I’ve seen a Jedi Sith. Or two. Jedi Sith are much more badass than that loser guy.”

The man between names watched the speeder take off, trying to mask the first honest laugh he'd felt in fracking years. First since the war, maybe.
“What’re the odds,” he said out loud. “Watch their kid? Make sure he’s safe? Kriffing Malachor D’Reev!”

Life was funny. Three knew he didn't have to take the job. No more voices in his head. The Blades were done and dusted—and cleaning up deserters had been mercy-kills much as anything else—even poor Naula, with her shop and her scores and her nightmares….

Call it a hunch, but the man was pretty sure he coulda ended the kid and no one’d be the wiser. Hell, he coulda stayed on Peragus Station with that soft redhead from engineering, ignored this assignment, been retired for good, and probably made it through.

The grappling vine said the old woman was history. The Beast wasn't a man anymore. And the Manda was dead.

Nobody would care about a former Three of Twelve. Nobody was left.

Except... probably somewhere out there… someone else’s job to make him dead too.

“Not today,” the man between names muttered.

Their kid—he just had to see. That stunt in the school today—more pride than sense. A lot like the kid’s father, the man thought—not that he'd known him. Hadn't really known the mother either… no one really knows a legend.

“Maybe they'll treat you nicer now, Malachor,” Three muttered, picking another slug out of his armor. “Everyone always wants to be the kriffing hero.”
“Here.” The old woman was frail, although Brianna supposed she wasn't truly any older than Atris—perhaps a decade. Less than two. She cradled a small, triangular bundle in her arms, wrapped in gray fabric. Brianna held her upright by the elbow, supporting Master Kreia as she walked to the table, where Brianna had already laid out her plate.

“Would you like to put your bundle down, Mother?”

“You have no curiosity about what it might be?” Master Kreia didn’t seem to react at all to being called ‘Mother;’ perhaps she was arrogant enough to think Brianna was merely following Atris’s orders to call her such.

The barb did not dignify a response. “I’ve prepared a soup. Master Atris said you like papish spice. We had some imported from Tanaab, just for you.” She pulled out the chair, keeping her voice even.

“And will your foster mother be joining us?” The old woman settled down at the head of the table—a table usually set for seven; now merely for three.

“She wanted Mical and I to dine with you alone.” Her brother—as she had been told he was—was late.

“Can you put on the news? I would like to see what has happened in the galaxy today.” The old woman set her wrapped bundle next to her at the table. One corner of the gray fabric covering it slipped, revealing a gleam of blue. As if Master Kreia had noticed Brianna’s glance, she folded the fabric up again.

“Certainly.” Brianna switched the viewscreen, currently showing a golden plain of rikash wheat on Echanis, to the Telosian wideband of the HoloNet.

Jokka Rai: “...build-up of Imperial forces along Gordian Reach seems to indicate a resumption of hostilities in the near future—”

Likana Aree: “When you say Imperial you mean, Sith? You’re saying the Sith are back?”

Jokka Rai: “I’m saying we’re getting some conflicting information from our allies in the Outer Rim. Imperial-class freighters have been sighted near the Foerost shipyards, which you may recall was the sight of a surprise attack during the Exar Kun Wars—”

“Not this,” Kreia interrupted. Her face turned, half-covered with her ocular visor, to scowl at Brianna. “Is there another news channel?”

Brianna flipped through the bands, but similar stories were appearing on them all. “I’m sorry, Mother, this seems to be all of the news.”

“Nothing about Katarr?”
“I can run a search—” Brianna’s voice trailed off, for the old woman was watching the duel between Revan Starfire and the rancor again. One of her hands absently patted the pile of cloth next to her—as if for comfort.

“No. If it hasn’t reached the HoloNet yet, they may not yet know. Nihilus takes his time… the Fleet attempts a cover-up… it’s all—all fine.” She dimmed the sound, not taking her eyes from the screen.

REVAN STARFIRE: DEAD ON SITH PLANET, the headline read. LORD MALAK IN CHARGE?

“Here is the first course.” Brianna had prepared the soup for serving before fetching Kreia, sprinkling each bowl with a dollop of crema friz and chopped onna. If Mical didn’t arrive soon, his would grow cold.

“I’ve never been fond of soup.” The old woman sighed, but picked up her spoon, bringing it to her lips.

Brianna enjoyed the moments of silence where they were both engrossed in the indulgence of their meal above all else.

Then the door slid open.

“Hello.” His hair was more yellow than white, his eyes more blue than gray; but Atris had told Brianna that Mical Jorde wore her mother—and her father’s—face even as she did.

“Mical—” her mother leaned across the table, reaching for the soup tureen Brianna had placed near his setting. Her elbow hit the wrapped bundle in a way that could only be deliberate—

The bundle fell on the thickly-carpeted floor. And… since when had the floor been covered in rugs? The floors in this wing had always been bare and cold.

“Oh!”

What a contrivance, Brianna thought, as Mical gathered the bundle up again. Some of the fabric had fallen open, and the man who was her brother plucked the blue crystal that had fallen to the ground up—

And froze halfway, his eyes going terribly, terribly blank.

“What have you done?” Brianna demanded of Kreia. She pushed her chair back and stood. She wanted to go to Mical, but something held her fast: the presentiment of caution—some emotion too instinctive to be called fear.

“Would you like to know?” Kreia murmured.

Mical’s eyes opened—

“Medriaas,” he whispered. “Nathema—”

XXX

Run.

Revan ran. One moment, she’d been frozen, staring at the ghost of a man she barely remembered —and the next she’d been running, feet pounding across the sand toward the sea.

Malachor V.

A ripple in space, an implosion, churning up from the planet itself. A vortex, a scream, a flash-flooded canyon—the force of a hurricane that ripped through all of those tightly-packed ships as if they were made of water.

The Force screamed the death of thousands. Tens of thousands. A hundred thousand—

Revan ran toward the sea. Malachor echoed in her mind like the deafening rush of a deepwater tide, the roar of a thousand ships with all the lights in them screaming….

She’d seen it before, but she’d never known what it was.

XXX

Revan had more questions for Dar, a galaxy full of them. Instead, all she said was, "Show me. Show me what you did." Her mouth felt chalky and too dry. "Show me Malachor."

Dar nodded slowly, still looking away. "You are right. You should know." She began to sketch charts on the now-black glass.

It was oddly beautiful, the graph that showed the death of two armies and the forced conversion of a third.

XXX

Dar told me what happened, but I didn’t know then that I already knew.

I heard the same screams when Taris died. I heard them on Manaan. On Korriban. I heard them in my nightmares, but I never knew why—

Revan’s feet pounded across the sand. It was more impulse than idea that made her speed toward the shoreline with the two shadow-men at her back—both of them all that remained of Davad Arkan.

She raced along the shore—trying to put as much space as possible between her and the Mandalorians—between her and that pit that hid the Jedi. Incoming waves splashed across her feet and hissed, steaming as the water from the sea began to eat into her boots. The water from the sea….

The acid sea.

Run, his voice murmured in her head.

An explosion behind Revan made her look back—only to see her allies setting up their rocket launchers. One missile soared through the second shadow-man and past him into the water, where it splashed, yellow-bright, in a plume of gray acid.

Canderous, you fracking di’kut—explosives won't work!

Revan put on another desperate burst of speed veering inland, away from the acid tide. The plan in her head was still tangled and confused. The scream was still echoing, the images from Arkan’s mind still echoing like drumbeats in her head.
Again, she saw Dar’Revan in the Jedi Temple. Again, she felt Arkan’s memories washing against her mind.

For you, Revan. His thoughts were in her head. More echoes, another scream.

Again, that image of Dar in the Jedi Temple, her face bleak and hopeless in a way that Revan had never seen it before—not even in the mirror: seeing her duplicate through Arkan’s eyes; his thoughts—his emotion—swamping her own semblance of control—

Revan’s feet pounded across the sand, heading for the scrub bush, the low hills of the valley — away from the Jedi, away from populated areas—

XXX

“I’ve seen enough autopsies of our past. I already know we failed.”

“It isn’t over,” Davad told her. So far from over. She had no idea.

The woman in Sheris’s body went to one of the practice remotes they’d disabled, kneeling down and reactivating its controls. The droid whirred, clucking—and rose.

“I know.” Her voice was a stubborn echo of its former strength. “We need to stabilize the Republic as much as we can. Bulwark our defenses here— and then go after Tenebrae. Directly.”

The boldness of her words seemed in direct contrast with Sheris’s cringing demeanor. The contradiction made Davad nauseous.

“You… want to invade the Sith Empire? Now?” Cracked, he thought sadly. Nothing more than a shell.

She stared at him as if Davad was the one who had gone mad. “Don’t be a fool. We need to make as many sentients immune to Tenebrae’s Kiss as possible—here and in Sith space. My virus is the key.”

“This virus? The one they call the Jedi Plague?” Is your virus the one the old woman began spreading on Coruscant with Arca? Are these her words or yours?

“Yes. I’ll need your help, old friend.”

You’ll have it, his mind vowed, although his mouth had more sense. Davad had never been privy to the precise nature of her plans before, although he supposed his master would want to know. “How?”

“Betray him. We had an accord. It must break.” Revan’s voice trailed off and those hard eyes clouded again, her voice slipping back into Sheris’s weak bleatings. “I-I don’t know if it will work. Many sentients will die—and… there will be reprisals. Personal. Possibly planetary.” She let out a slow breath, frowning. “The Sith worlds are more vulnerable to the plague’s effects than ours.”

“You mean the Sith will die? Our enemies?” Weak, he thought. You care for them now when you spent years sacrificing the rest of us—

In that moment, Davad thought he understood dead Beya Organa’s treachery above Deralia.

XXX

Beya’s… treachery? Arkan’s thoughts were tangled with webs of associations, memories that Revan could only see in flashes.

Dar was the one spreading that fracking virus? On purpose?

A chill shot through the Force, as Revan realized she’d slowed, realized the two shadow men were flanking her again.

Where am I?

A cluster of huts appeared over a hill. Lights twinkled inside the largest building. She veered away, sensing the life within—sensing the Force-users within, but too late—

Revan felt more than saw the shadows’ attention shift. The shadow on her left split away from pursuing her; heading toward the largest dwelling. A window revealed a woman’s silhouette inside, smaller figures behind her. Then, the shutters slammed shut as the inhabitants tried to hide themselves from monsters.

Miralukan Force-sensitives in that house, each one a bright spark in the Force.

Snick, murmured the dark voice in her mind—and the other shadow turned too.

The first one reached the door, slamming into it—testing it, toying with them—

She’d seen Arkan rip the door of the shuttle open as if it was paper. She felt the power in him, the power he’d used to raise Kavar Vakla’s corpse, the power screaming in her mind—

The door rattled on its hinges and the walls of the house itself began to shake as the monster tested their strength—using barely a fraction of his.

Or me? Is he testing me? Using them as bait for… me?

“No!” Revan stopped running and waved her arms. “Arkan! Hey! Hey, asshole! Come back! Over here!”

I’m hungry.

The plaintive cry brought back a strange memory of Polla Organa—age eight—the summer she’d nursed the ground-chip pup who’d fallen from its nest.

Please. So small. It won’t take long.

“No!” Kavar’s saber was in her hand. The Force seemed everywhere in that moment: in the air itself, and all around. The Force was hers—except where he stood, twinned and empty, the shadows of his faces swirling and reforming—

Her wrist unleashed the hilt, letting it ignite as its spin reached the two shadow-men.

It cut through one at the forearm, and then snapped back into her hand, running straight through the other with no effect to the man at all.

The arm from the first one fell to the ground.

The figures moved slightly apart. Waiting. The larger one raised one of its two hands toward her, and beckoned.

Come, Revan. Tell them not to be frightened. Help.
Revan took a step toward them, the anger at her own helplessness rising in her throat. She’d had this feeling before—so many times. Trapped into playing a game with invisible, recondite rules.

The fracking game she couldn't remember.

Frick that game.

“No,” she said again, “You come here.”

The shadow man… dissolved into the other, and then vanished.

A shiver ran across Revan’s spine, like a hessi walking over her grave. Not vanished. Turn around—no, don’t—don’t turn around—

She turned. Arkan was less than two meters away; he’d been creeping up at her back: a man-shaped swirl of coruscating darkness. This close she could see that he was clad in a ragged black cloak and mask, white and skull-shaped. Red diamonds ran like tears from the holes for the mask’s eyes. But the head under the mask seemed to have no eyes at all.

You said to come here. Here I am, Revan.

Dark, this is dangerous—-

She took a step backwards then another, trying to get both shadows in view; heading back up the hill, trying for higher ground—

The shadow nearest to the hut suddenly sharpened too. It was wearing the remains of Master Kavar’s robes, features still indistinct above, a blur. One of its hands was gone.

I’m hungry. The words echoed, doubled in her mind. Please. Let me eat them, and I won’t eat you. Not yet. Not until you see.

Somewhere, there was the sound of bells.

Come, both shadows said. Two quiet, twinned screams, ringing in her mind.

“You haven’t eaten me yet.” Her spine was sheathed in ice. She felt like a trapped nerf, caught between two nexu. It took effort not to let her voice shake with fear. “Why is that, Arkan?”

You will understand why. You will understand HER.

I understand Dar’Revan as much as I fracking well have to—I understand she took off and went back to the Emperor and I understand you can destroy them both—

The thought was one Revan had had before. The Fleet’s High Admiral—her mind skipped over the woman’s name—not Dodonna, Forn is dead—had wanted to use Arkan to destroy Tenebrae.

Revan could see the practicality of that arrangement.

“You want to me to understand?” She took another step back, forcing a smile to her lips like these two shadow men were some port officer, some Hutt she needed to impress—or charm—

I will show you.

“If you want me to understand, why don’t you tell me about it while we run?” Her legs twitched with the need, with fear. “I’m going this way.”

By the door, the Kavar-shaped shadow took a step toward her. Where?

“I-I don’t—” Revan’s head turned back toward the direction where they’d left the crashed shuttle, the snubfighter—now out of sight beyond the rolling hills. She didn’t think either vessel would fly—certainly not enough for hyperspace.

I need to find a ship that will fly. I need to find a ship that I can fly.

“What if I told you… what if I told you… what if I said there was a place where you could have lots to eat? Entire systems?”

I know already. I will go there. I will eat them all.

She blinked and the shadowed man in Kavar’s robes was closer, three meters away now. The other still stood, closer still: just a mask and a tattered black cloak.

Behind them all, a retractable gate slammed down over the door of the hut. What looked like an energy shield sparked, surrounding the dwelling.

That might buy those innocents minutes.

“You know about Kaas? Don’t you want to go there together?”

Food, echoed the one that had been Kavar Vakla. Its features shifted like lava.

It was so wrong, that the illusion superimposed over Kavar’s face looked more than familiar: dimples flashing on each side of his smile; light-colored eyes contrasted by choca-brown skin; the skein of braids and bells trailing down his back. Revan had no memory of this Davad Arkan—no memory except what he’d shown her.

The image was all illusion, a lie—and yet a part of Revan felt nothing but a soul-crushing guilt—

I did this to him. All my fault. I used him at Malachor. And Malachor did this to him—

Don’t cry.

“I’m not.” Her eyes were dry anyway. The guilt felt cold and empty—a dead battery. Nothing more than a shell. “Follow me, Davad. Trust me.”

Do you see? It was to be one of us. Always one of us. Now, do you see?

See what? That you loved me and I loved Malak? See that I used you? See that I made you—made all the Jedi who followed me fall? I made you to fracking stop Tenebrae and it didn’t work?

Anger was a bright spark inside her guts.

“No, I don’t fracking see!”

Revan turned and ran.

It wasn’t you. Voice in her head as another wave of images washed over her. It was her.

The image of Dar appeared in Revan’s mind again—dressed as Sheris—or dressed like me. Like I was. Fracking Revan Starfire, Jedi Knight—
Mother. Wife. Savior. Conqueror—Murderer.

Look! Look! You have to see.

She increased her pace, turning away from the hut toward the sea again; well aware that the two shadows had turned away from the innocents, were now trailing her. She’d won that much of a victory.

Revan ran toward the sea.

The acid sea.

XXX

In a sparring room in the Jedi Temple, the woman in Sheris’s body paced back and forth like a trapped manka before stopping in front of Davad, cheeks flushed, breasts heaving. Her words fell like stones.

“When Tenebrae retaliates, the Republic will have no choice but all-out war. But with the Sith worlds decimated by plague... he will lose. I hope he will lose... hope.” Revan’s voice trailed off. “I don’t even know if it will work.” Her hands were curled into angry, impotent fists. “I don’t know how to make it work. We need a means of distribution for the virus. And ships—I don’t know how we’ll get ships. The Mando’ade follow her, not me. And my allies in the Fleet are—”

“Mostly dead,” he supplied.

It was not like the woman Davad had known to admit defeat, but this woman was defeated.

“I don’t know what to do.” Her lower lip trembled.

“Don’t you?” he asked gently. The heady blend of love and disdain was so strong that in that moment, Davad imagined the unthinkable: he imagined crossing the room and crushing her in his arms; taking her life just as easily as he had taken the half-dozen others since that first padawan in the kitchen, the day that Oerin left.

Taking Revan as if she were purely sustenance, and not the woman whose fate had steered his own for two decades.

I could take her now and the old woman could not stop me. A dark thought.

A moment of weakness.

The shell of her laughed bitterly, eyes untamed and raw as they looked up to his. “The Republic will not allow me command of their ships… ever again. If Tenebrae infiltrates our navy, the Emperor could win the war without a shot fired. I can make one generation immune using the virus, but the next—even if we manage to inoculate the Core worlds, in thirty years... in fifty, it will all—it will all go again....” She closed her eyes. “My son will not be safe. No... no children will be safe, no one—if we can’t stop him now.”

“You once said the only true failure is death.” Davad remembered trying to take comfort in that, as Malachor died around them; trying to take pride in the fact that he had not died too. “We’re not dead yet.”
Revan’s shell smiled slightly. “You… fought well for me, Davad. Thank you.”

His stomach growled softly, reminding him that the nagging hunger he felt was not purely for more Force-users. “I loved you.”

“Yes.” She had the grace to look awkward at his confession, that pink darkening her cheeks as she ducked her head to fall behind a curtain of red braids. Then she looked up again—those leaf-green eyes meeting his so coolly that he could not tell if her poise or the first blush was the true feint. “Would you like me to say it back?”

“A little late now.” He laughed as if it no longer mattered. In truth, it did not.

Xxx

I’m sorry, Revan thought. I’m sorry I’m not… her. The rest of the vision did nothing but raise more questions.

If Dar had a plan, why didn’t she use it? Why the frack was she standing around healing sents for so long? Why the frack didn’t she tell me any of this?

I am not sorry. You will be delicious. If she is alive on Kaas, I will eat her too.

Revulsion washed over Revan then, increasing her speed. I’m apologizing to the thing that killed all those Jedi! Those bodies in the Temple. The thing who wants to consume this entire fracking planet—

Anger was fuel: anger at her helplessness, the futility of this chase. Anger was power—

Another missile launched, and exploded uselessly somewhere to her left. Revan veered right, predicting the next trajectory. Somewhere behind them were allies. Fracking idiots!

She needed to lead this monster away from them too.

This time, the shoreline gave Revan no hesitation. Her boots splashed the tide as her speed increased. She adjusted her velocity, the air around her thickening—and beneath her—the Force guided her steps—

Revan ran across the tops of the waves, straight into the acid sea.

Follow, she thought bleakly. Comforting a madman, to soothe him, to stay alive. I’m sorry I’m not her. Would you like to see her? We can go to her. I know where she is. Do you want to go there? If you don’t eat me, she’ll be happy. You want to make her happy, don’t you?

No! The thought pulsed in Revan’s head like a shockwave, coupled with a wave of longing that disrupted her steps across the acid water, almost sending her splashing through. Not her. She was a morsel and you are a feast—

Her legs felt like they were on fire— if I falter, I’ll die.

Go to hell then. Follow me, Arkan. Follow me—

The blast of his mind brought another wave of his memories. YOU HAVE TO SEE. YOU HAVE TO SEE WHY.
The Jedi Temple. The woman in Sheris’s body rubbed her eyes. Her shoulders slumped.

“I’m... sorry, Davad.” A breath. “Sorry, that I can’t recall more of our last day together. You were... there.” Her eyes grew distant again, lost in paths he could not follow.

How would it be now—now that Davad was the Sith Lord and she the lover? Would she be his lover still? Would it be different?

Better?

It was good she was weak in Sheris’s body, Davad thought. The other Revan—the amnesiac with all of her power—would be too much of a temptation. But this one—this one he could have. Take in his arms and only kiss. It had never been her power that drew him—

Fool. Neither are for you. Leave her now before you lose yourself. His master’s voice interrupted Davad's reverie, cracking like a lash across his back.

XXX

What? In the acid water, Revan slowed for a moment. Who was that? Who else was there?

You know. You know already. You must see—

Agonizing pain seared her feet, and she took off again like a scalded hessi.

I’m running, I’m running on top of the kriffing water—

XXX

Fool. Neither are for you. Leave her now before you lose yourself. His master’s voice interrupted Davad's reverie, cracking like a lash across his back.

“I am in full control of the situation, Master.” Davad’s words came out too loudly.

Revan looked startled, as if she thought he meant her. “Thank you for that,” she murmured. That braided head tilted, as if Revan was trying to hear—as if she could—almost—hear the old woman’s whispers herself. “Do you sense someone... here?”

“These halls,” he joked. “The Jedi Temple is full of old ghosts.”

“And newer ones.” She shivered. “You know Jedi are dying? Master Croi—I gave him the vaccine myself. He shouldn’t have died. The virus may have... mutated. The science—I tried to learn, but he tricked me—so many times—I could have been wrong....”

Master Croi had come to Davad with his concerns and suspicions about Sheris Loran. Master Croi had been delicious. But Davad did his best to look suitably concerned.

“I do not know,” he murmured. “Perhaps Croi died from other causes.”

“At least Malachor is safely away.” She frowned. “I will see my son—soon. I will see him—”

“Is he vaccinated?” It was a cruel question. Any question about her son was cruel. He knew her too well. He knew his own place. The boy was in all of her thoughts; but she would not see him because it was not safe.
She was right. It was not.

Her eyes widened. “Mal’s a child. He’s too young to need it—”

“He’s big for his age.” It was cruel. A part of Davad… relished the blank shock in those green eyes, the way it replaced the calculating edge—

XXX

The Mando’ade fired another useless rocket, arcing past Revan, splashing into the sea.

Don’t look down. No sooner did Revan think that than she was—looking down at the acid sea underfoot as her feet slammed against it. Wet splashed her flightsuit as she began to sink, followed immediately by what felt like flames on her skin.

You pathetic fool, lift yourself before you lose more of your hide. Does Carth like scars? He hardly seems the type—

Not Arkan’s voice, this one was feminine. Arctic. Familiar.

Dar?

Silence. Revan felt her legs start to churn through the water, rising up, until Arkan’s memories overwhelmed her again.

Xxx

Mention of her son had dimmed her spark.

Now, the woman in Sheris’s body was frowning at her own hands, as if she could see the blood on them.

“Malachor is safe,” she repeated stubbornly. “From what you’ve said, the imposter is capable of protecting him. He is still too young to fight—”

“Of course.” He calmed her fears with a gentle smile, nodding to the training sabers stacked against the wall. “Would you like to have a go again?”

“No.” She stared at her hands, flexing the metal one. The gold was flashy and looked cheap. Not something Rev would have chosen at all. “Master Croi should not have died. And others—others too.” The gold fingers curved on empty air and then opened again. Davad remembered her nails raking down his back.

She looked up at him, gaze sharpening. Suspicion—or hope? “Master Atris is gone.” That mind of hers when presented a puzzle would worry it like a kath with a long-dead bone. “Did Master Atris flee the plague? Or was she one of Tenebrae’s all along?”

If Master Atris had been the Emperor’s under their master’s very nose, Davad would owe poor, dead Oerin Lin five meaningless credits.

Again, the old woman intruded, her thoughts like a hammer to his skull. You joke of wagers? A fool indeed, beast. Atris is mine, even as you are. She has always been mine.

This time it was Davad’s head that turned sharply toward the door of the sparring room. But there was no one there.
Revan gave him a quizzical glance. “Is everything all right?”

“Atris is not a threat,” he soothed. “Wise to have some Jedi masters leave—to keep our knowledge safe—”

Her continued persistence is dangerous. Make an end to this inquiry.

Green eyes widened. “Did you hear that? Feel that? There’s something—”

That blasted empathy of Sheris’s! In her own body she had been oblivious as the sun.

Careful, apprentice. Her mind is still fragile.

Revan twitched again. “There! There it was again! A-voice. A... a shadow?” Her head turned, and she turned, backing round in a circle. “Who’s there? Davad? Do you feel it too?”

Careful, he sent back. She senses you, Master.

Sheris was always too sensitive.

“No,” Davad lied.

“Do you remember? The day I... was reborn. Kae was there too when—I think it was Kae.” She paced towards him, restless, nearly with Revan’s own grace.

Her voice was a low murmur and her head shook. “I think it was Kae, but she looked like my old master, Vima Sunrider... Vima, she looked like Vima, because Vima—she was—”

Careful, the old woman whispered again, claws in his mind.

Davad was tired of care. He had been careful far too long. Exasperation colored his words, leaving behind caution.

“Vima Sunrider was Arren Kae. She... she took the redemption at the beginning of the Mandalorian Wars. Her mother’s... death, the double-edged blade of her Battle Meditation, her padawan’s many failings.... All too much for her.” He would not look at the blank space near the door where he suspected Kae lurked unseen.

His voice hardened. “Vima Sunrider was too weak to live in her own skin. She took the redemption and became Arren Kae.”

Admit the truth, and hide the lie. Good.

I did not do it to please you, Master. Some small satisfaction, childish really, at the chance to taunt her.

“Her padawan’s failings?” Revan’s cold voice became brittle. “Do you mean me?”

“Only conjecture.” Davad shrugged. “Vima had several padawans. No one knows the truth of that woman’s heart.”

You certainly cannot, Beast. Poor, blind, fool. It is not in your nature.

“But that... Vima was and she... she was there. That day on my flagship, Kae was there too. The day I—” her voice faltered. “I... remember Kae—she was there when I—”
“She was on the Aleema when you died, yes.” Had she forgotten so soon? Was she forgetting again? Even as he watched, those sharp eyes clouded, and Sheris’s braided head tilted to the side as if she heard a voice in her mind again.

Whispering lies and promises—to her, even as their Master whispered to him—

Oh, what arrogance—you still think you know her—still think she can be yours—

XXX

Acid splashed against her legs, burning holes in the fabric.

Pain helped. Revan focused, trying to drown out the wave of images from Arkan: the Jedi Temple, Dar’Revan—

That old woman. It always comes back to her. Arren Kae. The Sith Lord I saw on Coruscant! The one Lin and Arkan promised to kill.

What did she do to them? What did she do to Dar and Davad? That was… that was more than compulsion.

She manipulated us all. Is she dead now? Is it over?

Who fracking cares? I'm going to die out here. I'm running on top of an acid sea, being chased by... monsters. Arkan is inside my head—

Her feet were churning over water again, and the acid water splashed against her arms. Revan turned, and one of the figures—that shell that had been Kavar Vakla—was entirely gone.

But the other… the masked shadow rose, meters higher than it should have been able to—pacing behind her with the deliberate grace of a nexu on the trail of its prey.

Davad Arkan cannot be killed. But he can end the Sith Emperor. I don’t even know the fracking Sith Emperor!

Dar’Revan knew Tenebrae. Dar’Revan did everything she could to stop him because—

Tenebrae took everything from me.

Stark words, and a bleak emptiness.

And Arkan can take all that he is. Every planet. Every soul he's possessed. The Empire’s power depends on the Force: without it, their civilization is crippled. Arkan can end them all. And I hold his leash.

His hunger screamed in Revan’s mind, deafening the rest of the planet. And a part of her, a weak part of Revan wanted to help him: put an end to the suffering cries she could hear—

But I can’t.

A thing can be controlled, if one has the will. The Republic had a plan to destroy him before: fire on his body, with all of their ships. Atomize him in the vacuum of space.

After he destroys the Sith, see they carry it through. Or use the Mando’ade Fleet—you control them. You...
The voice in her head sounded like Dar, but Revan knew better. She’d heard the voice before. On Taris. Manaan. Korriban—in the heart of the Star Forge, facing the laughing madman. The voice was the part of her that had been there all along. The fragment that had never been completely scrubbed out.

Her lungs felt scorched from the fumes of the acid sea. As Revan watched, the shadow seemed to cross the distance she’d won as if the meters were nothing at all. Closer, closer still, until she could make out the blur of a face, hands like claws—

Did the other one sink? Is it really gone? Is this another trap?

Fear gave her new energy. She thought of that thing swimming through the depths of the acid sea like a firaxa shark, fear of those jaws closing around her leg and dragging her into the depths—

Fool. Kavar was still flesh. Flesh dissolves. See your own does not—

XXX

In the Jedi Temple, the woman in Sheris’s body shook her head, her slender body trembling, those leaf-eyes nearly blinking back tears.

As Davad watched, those shoulders slumped again—and he knew, with a sudden rage in his heart, that the old woman’s voice was inside her head, twisting in its knives.

“Don’t worry,” he said gently.

This urge to protect her. Had it been Davad’s master who had put that want in him all along? Had his master put him forth as her defender? Had any of what they’d had been real?

Too much strain and she will crack. The overlay stabilizes, given time; but if you disrupt her now—

The bright head cocked as if she could hear his master’s voice. Those leaf eyes narrowed. “Are we alone, Davad? Tell me.” Her voice wavered, and he scented her fear. “Please—please tell me. You were always loyal... you were always....”

He shook his head.

XXX

Revan’s feet were moving again, now splashing in the shallows near the shore, as she tried to sustain enough momentum to keep herself moving on its tensile surface. The soles of her feet stung, and Revan realized her boots and the lower half of her flightsuit were half in tatters already.

Her legs burned and she put on a burst of speed.

He was still behind her, and there was nowhere left to go. Nowhere except—

Revan turned toward the crashed Harbinger listing in the waves.

XXX

“Tell me,” she repeated. There were tears in her green eyes. She wiped them like a child would, using her entire sleeve. Revan had never been so clumsy. “I trust you. You love—loved me. You were always loyal—"

Yes, but not to you.

Davad had no choice. He made his voice gentle, even as his gut burned with hunger. “You will forget this, Revan.”

“No!” Revan’s voice pitched high and wrong. “I can’t.” Her lip trembled and she was nothing like his Starfire at all. Just the copy. Only Sheris.

Only Sheris and he no longer cared.

He smiled, as if it were a comfort, and increased the strength of his command. “You need to forget—”

“I-I need to… forget.” Those green eyes dulled, still fixed on his. Her shoulders sagged.

“You will continue to help heal sentients in the Underground,” he continued, feeling the power swell within his breast. “You enjoy it.”

“I do.” She blinked. “I-I do enjoy it. I want to help—”

“Leave her now, Beast-Lord.” Scrape of footsteps behind him. His master could move in silence—that she did not was a warning for him, a threat. “Others need your attention. There remain some among the Council who suspect… to keep her safe, take care of them.”

“You will not hurt her before my return,” he growled, watching those green eyes widen again with confusion, focusing blankly on Kae as if she did not know who it was she saw.

“Master Kae? I did not see you come in.” It was Sheris’s weak smile the woman gave, and he sensed no deception. “May we be of assistance?”

XXX

Her again. Kae. Arren Kae—the former Vima Sunrider. Fracking with Dar’Revan’s mind… frack her! Is she still alive?

It was impossible to find purchase on the shifting, liquid surface of the sea, impossible to jump. Revan’s first few attempts at a Force leap to the safety of the Harbinger’s bow ended dunking her under. Pain shocked her body and the Force propelled her up again, like a cork shooting out of a bottle—

Shields, hold shields, don’t let them fall—

Revan bobbed up and down in the sea, with only the Force between her and the acid. She felt a splash sizzle on her hair. Her faintly-glowing hands scrabbled on the ship’s metal sides for purchase, as the current slammed her into the hull—everything a battle as he drew ever-closer—

A wave washed her up, and her hand almost grasped a protrusion—one of the cannons, maybe—its edges sharp, yet worn away already. Her hand slipped, and she bobbed back down.

Force, Revan thought hopelessly. This can’t be how I fracking die! Panic fueled her shields, strengthening them, until the world was encased in blue—changing the soft light of the planet’s red sun to a lilac haze, making her skin a lurid corpse-color like she was already dead. The wave pushed her forward again, ducking her under—“Davad?” Sheris’s mouth gave him a gentle smile. “You seem troubled.”

“Many thoughts on his mind,” Kae murmured, trace of a smile on her saccharine, lined face. “Did you both enjoy your sparring?”

“I’m so out of practice.” Reva rubbed her head again, as if it hurt.

Davad was grateful that his master had kept them both: one Reva with all of her power; the other with the broken memories. He took a deep breath. “You are calm, Reva. You will forget. There is no Vima Sunrider. Arren Kae is a loyal Jedi, and your friend. You can trust her—”

Reva blinked Sheris’s gullible eyes. “Sorry. For a moment, I thought—”

“Sheris.” The old woman folded her arms in her sleeves and bowed. “I only came by to see how you were doing. Did you both enjoy your sparring?”

“That was kind of you, Master Kae.” Voice wooden and weak, all the fire in her extinguished. “I’m so out of practice.”

“Shall we spar again tomorrow?” Davad’s voice felt like broken glass. Hunger surged in his breast. At that instant, he knew he could consume both of them in two heartbeats, if he dared—if he thought it would end the war.

Which war—

At that instant, he did not know which war. He only knew what he could not consume them. It was not allowed. Davad only knew the war would not end—not as long as the Force survived.

Reva rubbed her temple. “I-I guess. Yes. After the clinic. I-I like my work in the clinic. I like helping others. I like healing. I-I was good at it—”

“Indeed,” Kae nodded. “One of your many gifts, padawan.”

“Don’t hurt her,” Davad muttered to Kae and left, turning at random down one of the corridors. Somewhere ahead of him was better prey.

XXX

I am calm. I will forget. No! I can’t forget, but I—

That fake calm, that mind-fracked peace that Davad had felt in Sheris’s mind washed over Reva.

No! That woman. Kae. She made her forget! She made them both forget!

Anger at the illusion made Reva struggle harder. The waves closed over her head. She was sinking, she was drowning, the acid sea surrounded her, deafening, blinding. She closed her eyes, maintaining her shields, and falling—

Fool. Calm yourself or die. Master this simple task or you will never master Arkan.

I-I’m drowning—

It was like falling. Just like that. And she’d fallen before.
All of Revan’s muscles relaxed. Her limp body rose with the next wave. Gentle. She bobbed back to the surface, her mind repelling the deadly water from her skin automatically. Her mouth opened and she gasped for breath—all she could do was gasp for breath—slowly, evenly, calmly—

Like letting go.

Now you see. Now you SEE.

Now I see—another wave splashed her face. It would have blinded Revan except for her shields. The sea was as inexorable as gravity, slamming her against the ship’s hull.

XXX

“Now you see, my padawan. What do you see?” Echo of a memory, a woman’s voice.

“It’s beautiful. The Force—”

“No.” Hint of reproval in that voice.

“The world—”

XXX

NOW YOU SEE. Arkan’s voice in her head.

The wave washed Revan up like it was a sentient thing, depositing her on top of the Harbinger’s bow. She lifted her head, and stared down at her burned legs, the tatters of her flightsuit. Her topknot flopped in her eyes and she pushed it back.

Her hair was dry. Her hands were dry—the burns stung, but the pain was manageable—

Revan stood up slowly, standing on the curve of the capital ship’s bow.

Right next to an open airlock door.

Xxx

There were two shadow freaks chasing Revan—who could apparently run on fracking water… because… why the frack was Mekel even surprised?

Four Mandalorians were chasing the shadow things down the beach, stopping occasionally to fire off a grenade or a plasma rifle, which did frack-all.

Looked fun, maybe. It’s all fun and games until the Sith Lord notices you’re lobbing grenades at him and comes and kills you—

Mekel stayed put, because what else was he gonna do? Canderous had waved vaguely at the supply crate before he’d taken off—suggested that Mekel grab some supplies, weapons, and maybe follow—but then he and Milli and Kex left so fast. Leskal, too—Leskal who had joined them from that crashed warfly. Kex was kind of a prick with a saber up his ass about Milli, but Leskal was alright—Mekel would have—maybe he should have joined them, because what the frack else was he gonna do?

The sky was slowly turning pink as the day faded. Revan Starfire was… running on top of the water. Beyond her, the hulk of that Republic ship steamed, as the acid sea worked through its hull. As Mekel watched, one of the shadows sank, steam rising from where it had vanished. The other one skimmed the water’s surface just like Revan—more of an amorphous blob now than anything else—looming over her like a black cloud, getting closer and closer—

Looked like it was winning the race.

That’s kriffing fracked. But what the frack can I do about it? Mekel glanced down at the weapons crate, pulling out one of the mismatched beskar chestplates. You were supposed to earn this crap, not borrow it. He didn’t know how to put the armor on. The time he’d worn beskar before—what seemed like ages ago at that fracked Mandalorian party on Coruscant—Milli had helped....

He looked up again. Revan had reached the Republic ship. The water splashed and steamed around her. Mekel had been on Katarr for weeks. No one swam in that fracking ocean. She should be dead.

Suddenly, she seemed to falter, and then slipped.

“Oh!” He stood up. He hadn’t been expecting that, hadn’t been expecting her to lose, even if he didn’t see how she could win. “Frack!” Mekel reached for a gun.

Maybe she’s diving for a doorway or something?

In acid?

“Mekel Jin.” A familiar, twisted voice interrupted his search. Closer to Mekel than should have been possible for anyone with Korriban training. “Did Ordo leave you behind?”

Mekel grabbed the blaster on the top of the stack in the crate, whirled around, and fired.

The smoking patch in the middle of Oerin Lin’s ribs was satisfying. Very satisfying.

Less so was the dead man’s laugh—a horrible, metallic wheeze.

“You should have waited for Millifar’s return to shoot me.” The man took a step forward, and Mekel felt that unmistakable drop in temperature that came with the Dark, even if he couldn't feel the Force causing it. “Impress her with your bravery.”

“Sure. I’ll shoot you all fracking day,” Mekel muttered, raising the gun for another go. He was so fracking dead anyway. “Stick around.”

The asshole Mandalorian Sith smiled with his cracked mouth. “Ah. Perhaps you found a spine after all.”

I'm going to die. “Give me the Force back and we can fight like men for her.” Mekel lowered his voice to a growl, and levelled the blaster again. If his hand hadn’t been shaking it would have looked better.

“That's not how it works, Mekel Jin.” Oerin Lin shook his head. There were holes in his neck, and something black oozing from them. “Ask Ordo to explain our culture to you before you damage your standing with his daughter irrevocably.”

“What do you want?” It was easy to be brave when you thought it was over. Mekel had been here before. Too many fracking times. He fired again, a perfect shot through the chest again. Hard to miss. The wound closed up behind his bolt as if it had never been.

I was thinking of going below…?” Oerin nodded toward the lift. “I suspect that the Jedi went to a great deal of effort to construct a trap for Nihilus down there. Seems a shame to leave them cowering in the dark...” His smile widened, and Mekel felt the fracking chivhole shoving into Mekel’s mind, peeling back his thoughts—

Too much. Get out!

“Would you like to come?” One of the asshole’s eyes was a white orb. The other, yellowish-black and seeping. “We could make the Jedi pay for leaving you behind, Jin. Make them pay for using you to trap us—”

The words echoed with a surge of emotion, and for a second, Mekel did want to make them pay. He wanted them all to pay—and if this fracking Sith needed Mekel to be his to make that happen—

His teeth locked down hard on his own cheek and Mekel drew blood. Pain can break compulsion, pain is effective for so much—

“I think I’ll stay here.” Mekel spat on the ground. Spit, mixed with blood.

“What if I insisted?”

Pressure in his temples like a vise.

Am I supposed to stop you? Mekel’s mind had no fracking clue why, but Mekel’s head didn’t seem to be in charge because he leveled the blaster again instead of bowing. “No.”

“No?” The man’s face was cracked and scabbed, creased with a web of scars and deathly pale.

Mekel heard himself begin to choke. Black spots danced before his eyes, obscuring the swiftly-tilting world; Lin’s fracked-up face, behind him that lift to the pit.

That lift that runs down to the pit—

This is it. This is the most fracking useless death in the fracking galaxy. Dustil—if you ever find out about this, you’ll kill me for dying so fracking useless—

His blaster fired once more before Mekel dropped it. A millisecond later, a blast of Force made the world tilt and Mekel followed the blaster down, crashing back into the ground, bruising his ribs on the edge of the packing crate.

The lift’s control panel sparked and blew.

The platform screeched as it fell back down into the pit, gears screaming, leaving them both trapped above.

“Try going down there now, asshole!” Mekel muttered. He wiped more blood from his mouth.

“That was brave,” Lin chuckled.

Then, the dead man leaped into the pit, feet first. No fracking lift needed. “Brave and uselessss—”

Oh. Oh, frack. Of course, he just jumps.

The echo of the Sith Lord’s broken voice vanished into the pit, as Mekel tried to recover his breath.

Xxx

The Kavar shell cannot not withstand the acid sea. It burns away in bubbles. But Nihilus feels his true self rise from the sea bath with all of its mortal shell expunged. The remains of Davad Arkan are gone. Now, he is a harder thing, a pure thing.

He rises over the bow of the crashed and dissolving hulk, only to see her standing there with Kavar's saber lit. As if she was waiting, the saber a beacon to guide his path.

When she sees him, she takes a few steps back, and what little color remaining in her face pales. Her skin is pink and splotched through the tattered flightsuit, red and raw on her arms and legs. There is a bald, burned patch on her scalp above her reddened ear.

“Davad?” She whispers his true name into the wind, but it echoes in her mind, mixed with the memories he has given back to her.

Her mind shrinks under his; a small, furred animal. Musk of her scent in the air. Delicious.

{{I ate Croi. So strong. Delicious. Croi sent Sheris to work with the children in the sublevels. He thought he could make her more Sheris than Revan that way. Amusement. Croi did not know Sheris—}}

If you don't kill me, I can take you to a feast, she promises him, finally speaking mind to mind. A billion meals for you. I promise. I know the way.

He knows she is lying—not about the feast, only the way. She has lost her way. He can see it in her thoughts: frightened, and scurrying away from him. Dec-bugs shown to light.

{{The man knows the way.}} He tells her. {{I have a man who knows the way. Sion made him write it down.}}

How are you in my head? she thinks. A smuggler’s thinks, too simple for Revan. Were she fully herself, she would already know. It doesn’t matter. You will follow me.

{{Hungry!}} He wants her to see him as he was, but in his eagerness, he makes his form too large and she shrinks away, cowering beneath.

“Why are you showing me… Arren Kae now? I don’t understand. Do you know you’re doing it?”

{{You need to see.}} Does she know yet? {{It was her. Her all along. Our Master.}}

Revan’s legs have borne the brunt of the damage—the boots are gone, and a few burns along her calf look deep, almost to bone. A sudden memory strikes him, of slipping her toes in his mouth, like tiny pink plumcots.

He can feel the pain she is concentrating to forget. He wants to take it from her, but he only can if he consumes her. And he wants that to last.

“Yes, I got that. Arren Kae.” Anger laces the name, that spark of green fury. “But you destroyed her, you and Oerin. She’s dead—isn’t she? You said you would kill her. That’s why I—that’s why I let you leave with her!”

Was she? Was she dead? {{“Better. Suffering.”}}

But Nihilus does not like seeing Revan suffer. Soon, she will not need her legs at all. The pain will end for her; she will not be one like Sion, forced to feed on it, to use her own body to break and remake the Force, again and again.
“I can take away the pain,” he promises. “I will. I promise I will.”

Revan’s eyes are wide, and her mouth set in a grim line as she shakes her head. No. She takes another step back and beckons with the lit saber. The wind whips her topknot in her eyes, thinning her words. Her thoughts are nearly visible—hate, fear, pain—and an overwhelming need. For him. For him!

Her words are whispers. “I can give you what you want, Davad. But you will follow me.” Her voice hardens as if she remembers, although that is impossible. She can only know what she has been shown. “Follow me.”

“Yes,” he agrees. “Come to me, my love, and I will go.”

Revan shakes her head and takes a step backwards, vanishing into the craft’s interior. Follow. Her mind-voice is a sharp report. A blaster bolt to the head.

Davad would have thought she would want to meet her end under the sky, but Revan had been a child of ships and of war as well.

“I follow,” he tells.

Xxx

The inside of the shuttle was quiet now—now that Jasp’s masters had gone.

As always when away from Sion and Nihilus, the man’s mind began to clear.

Again, he remembered that he was Jasp Organa. He remembered their landing had been very bad. The shuttle’s front stabilizer was bent—possibly smashed by the whirring noise it kept making. The ship was never going to be the same again.

He glanced automatically at the screen above, just in time to see the last pieces of the Ravager burn out, sensors from its command panel dark now. The sky above only marked enemies now, outlined on the shuttles sensors in burning red.

Something. There was something I saw. Someone—when the masters were here—

It was something—someone—important.

Sion had turned the outer cameras to track movement—and now, on the viewscreen, Jasp saw who they had been following.

“Pollie.” He adjusted the magnification to see more clearly, watching as she ran across the sea, running on water just as easily as he’d seen her fly. He blinked and she bobbed down under the waves. His breath caught, and time slid and there she was again, now on top of the Republic cruiser, a brown and black speck on the gray behemoth.

And something was… chasing her. A shadow that looked like a man.

Jasp Organa blinked. For a moment, he had no idea where he was. Even the instrument panel in front of him seemed unfamiliar.

Pollie’s in trouble.

Not my Pollie. Not my daughter— that wasn’t quite right. But still, Jasp’s hands went for the controls as he lifted the shuttle off the sands, steering it toward the crashed ship.

Revan felt Arkan lurking behind as her footsteps echoed in the hall of the deserted ship.

“Follow me,” she snarled again with a voice so dark she barely recognized it. Her fear had vanished with the near-drowning; the realization that he hadn’t eaten her yet giving her courage. “Follow me. You followed me for years, Arkan. In every memory you showed me. Maybe Kae was behind it all, but you followed me. Revan. Follow me now. I demand it.”

I hunger, he whispered.

That plaintive cry. It made her breath catch with emotions she could barely understand: guilt, shame, fear. And loss. Revan had sacrificed friends; Dar had sacrificed more of them.

Davad Arkan was just one more. And it was already done. The man he’d been was already gone. He’s a monster. All those bodies in the Temple were Jedi he killed. You don’t pity monsters—you use them. Use them to destroy other monsters.

Salt spray had dampened the hall, even here, and Revan’s feet felt numb and clumsy. It probably wasn’t good her feet were numb, but she stumbled on, heading by instinct more than sense. Her vague memories as Polla Organa on a ship like this only included being lost on a ship like this—or, vaguer still, being herded by others on a ship like this.

But somewhere in this direction, Revan thought she would find the hangar bay—and hopefully ships that flew.

“Follow,” she whispered again to thing behind her. “Follow me one last time, old friend—”

Xxx

Their jet packs were slow, but Canderous waved his hand, signaling as the kids moved into formation around the crashed Harbinger that had so recently been their temporary prison. Hull didn't look good, he thought—with patches of it eaten away down to the struts at the waterline.

Why'd you lure him here? Canderous could usually figure out Revan’s strategy—but this left him flummoxed. Acid had taken out one of the mystic bastards, but they'd all seen the other shadow follow her into the hole.

Sea hadn't affected that one at all.

He looked down at his wrist and tapped the comm he'd jawa-rigged to replace the one he’d forgotten aboard the Aleema.

“Can you make a hit from orbit?” he asked Aemelie. “Burn this Republic wreck?”

“Do you have coordinates?” Aemelie was all business, but he could hear the underlying excitement in her voice too.

“I'm sending, but hold. Revan’s in there. We need to get clear first—”

“Mekel!” Millifar interrupted. She was hovering next to him above the waves, holding a magnifier to her visor pointed in the direction of their previous position near the pit. “Osik! That walking piece of filth! I think the Dar’Lin just shot Mekel Jin!”

“Lin? He’s here too?” Canderous followed her gaze, upping the range on his own helm’s sensors to see what she could. In-helm viewer wasn’t as good as those binocks she was holding, but it was still clear enough for him to see the limp figure on the sand. “Haar’chak! Where’d he go?”

“He jumped into that pit,” Millifar snapped. “No doubt pursuing the cowardly, hiding Jedi.”

“I know we cannot kill the shadow,” Kex said. “But Lin—”

“Dar’Lin,” Millifar corrected them both. “He is Undying now. He is nothing.”

“You kids go after him. I'll follow Revan, get her clear of this mess.” If the damned acid water didn’t melt that Sith, our guns won’t either. Need to get Revan clear—looked like it had its hooks in her mind—

After nearly two years of Jett’osik, of seeing what their magic had done to the Starfire’s mind, Canderous couldn’t say he was sorry they seemed to be losing their war.

“Try and salvage that Pinion-class fighter.” Aemelie’s voice crackled in his helm. “Did you fix its engines as I requested?”

“Was busy.” Canderous loved his Second Wife, but when did she think he’d had the time? “I sent one of the Republic techs to ready our ships when we started taking over the Harbinger, but I don’t know if they got to it.”

“Republics.” Her disdain was clear even over the comm. “I will give you the span of Ordo’s rotation around Malachor II before I commence bombardment.”

That means less than an hour. “I will hurry,” he promised.

Xxx

{{“Where are you running?”}} The halls all look the same but these hammerhead ships are all the same, and Nihilus knows them. He remembers. {{“We can stop the chase now. Here.”}}

Fitting, like the place he'd found her sleeping and mind-wiped not so long ago. That had been a ship like this too.

Revan doesn't answer him, not with words, just with another burst of speed that makes him feel the distance between them.

He lessens the chase easily. {{“Let me eat you,”}} he begs. {{“It will not hurt. I promise. After that, the man will take me to Dromund Kaas and I will eat your emperor too. I promise.”}} It does not hurt. He has eaten so many. Davad opens his mind to show her—

Xxx

The Jedi Temple on Coruscant. At that time, Davad still bothered to hunt only for strays. The quiet Jedi unassigned to padawans or to masters. The ones least likely to be missed.

“Knight Arkan.” Master Zhar Lestin startled him, appearing out of a doorway so abruptly he might have been stealthed. “Do you have a moment?”

Zhar Lestin was a member of the Council. Zhar Lestin had a current Padawan. Zhar would be missed.

That one is not for you!

Her voice. Real or not? His gut rumbled, and Davad took a cautious step back. “Actually, I… may be coming down with something. I should go.”

“It won’t take long.” The Twi’lek raised his brow ridge. “To be honest, I haven’t been sure how to approach you.”

“A bit late for an ambush.” Davad didn’t have to feign the yawn, even as he felt his gut rumble, his mouth begin watering with need. The man was strong. So strong. “Perhaps tomorrow…?” He would send to Arca for a few shadows and eat them first. Sate him enough to avoid temptation.

“No. Now.” The Twi’lek gestured toward the door of the chamber.

Short of an attack, Davad could find no way to refuse, and so he followed the man inside.

Two glasses and a bottle on the floor of the room seemed to indicate this was a planned intervention. Davad allowed his eyebrow to raise, eyeing it. “Is that… Onderon brandy?”

“A taste from home,” Zhar agreed.

“Not easy to get.” Illegal, in fact, to be exported.

“I’ve had this bottle for a long time.” Zhar paused, watching him. “Since we came to Iziz for you. Do you remember?”

“Of course.” The man was so powerful—aged and ripe, like a fine cheese. Davad felt his mouth water. Davad hid it by seating himself on the floor, reaching for the brandy, not bothering with the glass.

The cool liquid was like spice on his tongue, the taste of flowers, a long-ago drexl’s scream.

“I trained Revan,” Zhar said bluntly, settling himself down opposite. If he was rattled by Davad’s lack of manners, it did not show on his face.

“Yes.” Where was this going?

The man’s brow ridges lowered, obstinate as a dewback. “I remember… how well you knew her.”

“That was a long time ago.”

Lestin took a sip from the cup he’d poured for himself as Davad drained more from the bottle. “I’m worried about her.” He paused. “Both of them.”

Davad felt his careless smile freeze. He put down the bottle slowly. “I don’t understand. Both? We speak on the comm from time-to-time, but I haven’t seen Revan since she left the Temple and went to live with her son at House D’Reev.”

Zhar merely blinked. “Sheris Loran has changed. A holocron of Revan’s memories is missing. Naturally, the conclusion I must reach is—”

You will not tell him. This one is not for you! He will be missed. Leave him, Beast-Lord. Leave him and look for prey elsewhere—
No. Need burned in his core. The man was strong, the man was here, the man knew too much—“Sheris requested Council permission to take Revan’s memories. Perhaps she grew tired of waiting for approval.” Davad took another gulp from the bottle. It tasted like night-blooming flowers, morning mist, a cancock’s bellow. Instead of sating Davad’s hunger, the brandy seemed to ignite it.

You will be silent, you will leave. You will make him forget—

Zhar’s strong, it may not work, Master.

“How is she?” Zhar smiled at him, hesitant. “I had hoped she would come to me, but she has not. But I sense no darkness—”

It was not the question Davad had expected from Zhar Lestin. He blinked, trying to hide his surprise.

“Who else knows?” Davad countered.

“I only speak for myself,” the Jedi disassembled. “How is she? I… would like to speak to her. You have her confidence. Do you think she would be amenable to speaking with me?”

You sense no darkness because you are blind. Like all Jedi. A blind fury there in his master. Davad felt her resolve falter, even as his own need surged.

“Does anyone else know?” Davad repeated, this time imbuing his words with the Force. The man was strong, but trusting.

“Croi suspected, I-I think. And of course, Jo—” the Twi’lek broke off mid-sentence, eyes widening. “Knight Arkan?”

Davad had risen from his place on the floor.

“Lord.” Davad reached his hand out and grasped the man’s shoulder. “It is Lord Arkan. And you are right. I sense no real darkness in her either. Not… yet.” The man was strong. He took a deep breath, breathing it in, relishing the taste. “Would I could say the same for myself, old friend—”

Master Zhar Lestin’s body collapsed across the floor.

Xxx

“Is that supposed to fracking scare me?” Revan tried to channel as much scorn as possible into her words as the vision cleared. It was dark in the ship’s corridors, emergency fluorescence activating on the walls to guide her through the corridors, as if through a darkening dream.

I have to eat, Revan. I had to eat them. I am still starving—

The death of a man she barely remembered.

Master Zhar had trained Polla Organa on Dantooine; but for such a short time.

Revan had barely seen him again on Coruscant—just his body in the morgue.

“I know what you did. I need you to do it again. When I say. To who I say.” Her voice lashed out again, crack of a whip. “Follow.”

Revan had reached the main hangar bay. There was the Pinion, bolted in one corner—and a motley collection of other ships nearby. Most of the fighters were gone—perhaps due to sabotage or taken by evacuating crew members during the Harbinger’s takeover.

The Pinion’s fuel line lights blinked green, as if at some point during their captivity, some tech had repaired the damage to her engines.

The blast doors were closed, but the floor tilted up towards them. Revan hoped that meant they weren’t fracking underwater.

I follow, the monster murmured at the entrance of the hangar.

“Stay,” she snapped. “Right now, stay right there.”

The hangar’s centralized control was a mess of lights and dials, more complicated than anything Polla Organa had ever dealt with in her smuggling days. Revan frowned, trying to make sense of the flashing lights and levers. She released the bolts to several ships, including the Pinion, before she happened on the blast door controls. Gears ground as the hangar bay slid up, revealing a sullen horizon of sea and shore, heavy clouds, the darkening sky.

Thank Force—

No. Thank you, Arkan said.

Xxx

She is standing far away across the hangar. She is waiting. Waiting for him next to these ships, with her promises of emperors and stars. After Nihilus has eaten this world entire he will see them. But first, this. This special moment. Theirs—

Her back is stiff, the cropped hair exposing her vulnerable neck, the coiled springs of her arms visible through the ripped flightsuit’s fabric. The sea has left its burns on her skin. He can feel the pain that she denies, a soft scream in the dark.

{{“It will not hurt,”}} he promises her. He focuses himself, assembling his shade into the man she once knew. His hair chimes with phantom bells and he summons that smell of soft spice she once favored, the fragrance that perfumed her state room. Without the template of Kavar’s flesh, it takes a great effort, but he does it for her. {{“Thank you, Rev. Thank you for the gift of your life—”}}

Xxx

Across the room, the shadow resolved again into that face: Davad’s soft smile, the chimes of bells from his braids. “Thank you, Rev.” Somehow, he’d made his voice seem ordinary. “Thank you for the gift of your life—”

“No! I said, stay!” Revan pulled on the Force, lashing the words into an order.

All those images he had shown her were of a man obsessed. A man in love.

But never a man in control.

“Stay until I tell you to follow!” she commanded. I need a ship. I need a ship and place to keep him—
Can a locked door stop him? Will an airlock?

The thought of being alone with him in a cramped snubfighter made Revan shiver.

Arkan is yours. He would follow you to the end of the galaxy. A far more faithful kath than Malak ever was. That voice from her own mind again. Like a blast of ice. You control him. You remain the master.

I don't even know the way to Dromund Kaas! I don't know if the Pinion is fixed. The last time I tried to fly, I ended up trapped—

He knows. He knows the way.

“I know the way, Revan.” Across the room, the man smiled at her. He had dimples. “I have a man who knows—”

A strange warmth on her skin, the smell of something sweet and spicy all at once and strangely sensual.

No, she objected, but none of her muscles moved. She was undoubtedly losing her mind, but Revan heard the sound of bells grow louder, the roar of beasts—

She stared at the sky through the now-open hanger doors, fighting the false calm.

Get him away from here! He’ll eat them! He’ll eat everyone on this hell-spawned world—

“Follow,” she said again, taking a step toward the Pinion. “Stop fracking around, Arkan, you promised to follow—”

“And I have, Revan.” His voice was all the more terrifying for its sudden normality. “But now, I’m hungry—”

The scream of overtaxed engines was deafening, as a battered shuttle burst through the open hangar, skidding past her astonished face and crashing into the wall.

Xxx

Nihilus’s attention is focused on his illusion—still meters and meters away from her—so formal, like years ago.

Nihilus is so focused on his illusion that he does not see the shuttle craft until it barrels into him, upending physics, and preparation, and his fragile corporeality—sending him crashing and sparking underneath its ruin on the duraplate floor.

XXX

He was still a man enough, still a pilot enough to have strapped himself in for impact, but the velocity hurt his bones, and the abrupt stop sent Jasp Organa lunging forward in his seat and then back again. His neck flopped too fast forward—saved only by the sense he’d had to wear the flight helm.

Shuttle won’t fly again, was his first thought, as he pushed up the visor and discarded it. Followed quickly by fear he had for his Pollie.

You know she isn't Pollie, Jasp. The voice in his head sounded like Moll’s, like his conscience always did.

“Doesn’t matter.” There was blood in his lips. His nose was bleeding again. Jasp had rammed the shuttle into something black and shadowed and seeping—something he knew was his master. But it wouldn’t hold Nihilus for long. “She’s the one fighting. She’ll help me find Polla.”

Pollie could be already dead. Probably was. Jasp had no illusions about how the world worked. Pollie might be dead, but those Sith bastards would pay, and no one was better made to deliver than the woman who’d blown up their bloody Star Forge in the first place.

He had always taught Pollie to be a fighter, and this one had taken down Darth Malak.

The world was patchy and strange as Jasp staggered towards the door. Land ramp rolled down on a slanted bay, collection of ships. (Need to pick one—pick the best one—his eyes zeroed in on the Aurek-class snub nearest the door. It had the tell-tale curve of a modified hyperdrive engine under its bow. Newfangled, compared to what he’d been used to once, but it would do.)

The woman in the ragged flightsuit stared at him, her eyes round as moons, mouth agape with surprise. Skin on her legs was red. Eyes looked like she’d been crying. Her hair stuck up like eridu half off its pod.

“Da?” she whispered, voice husky and scared. Polla’s voice. Or it could have been, even in that wrong, pale face. “I’m dead. I must already be dead.”

“No yet,” said a voice from the aft side. Gruff, male. A metallic rumble from a helm, appearing in the doorway. “You okay, Revan?” The large figure in battered Mandalorian armor called something else out at her, almost too fast for Jasp to catch.

Pollie responded, rapid-fire, was still talking to the Mandalorian when Jasp stepped forward and grabbed her arm. It was too wiry and thin, like Jedi didn’t eat enough.

“Come along now,” he said. Gentle voice. Gentling a kid wasn’t so different than gentling a hessi. Right now, she was just as wild-eyed and prone to bolt.

Behind him—Jasp didn’t know how, but he knew—the Master was reassembling himself. She wouldn’t be safe then.

“Canderous?” The girl frowned at the man in armor, oddly passive in Jasp’s grip. “Get out of here. Go… get your ships. I—I’ll need you.”

“Came in here to get you.” The helmed figure seemed to be staring at them from behind his battered, reflective mask. In it, Jasp saw his own face. The man pulled a heavy blaster out of a buckle on his belt. “Who’s this guy?”

I got old, Moll, Jasp thought, looking at his face in that reflection. When’d I get so old?

“Polla Organa's father.”

“Small galaxy. Good job killing that hu’tuun Sith. We tried three different types of projectiles. Was gonna nuke him from orbit next—soon as we got clear. Should’ve realized, dropping a ship on someone always works.”

“He’s not dead.” Poll—Revan—sounded sure of it. She was staring fixedly at the ruin of the shuttle. “And orbital bombardment… you'd overload this ship’s reactor. Cause an environmental “That's why we need to run, Pollie.” Jasp tugged her arm again.

“Get out of here, Canderous.” Her eyes were half-focused. “Take him with you.” She twisted out of Jasp’s grasp. “Jasp Organa. Arkan’s still coming—but I can handle him—”

Jasp knew Lord Nihilus was coming. He grabbed her arm again, tugging her toward the other row of ships. “No, you can’t. He’s coming so we need to go, Pollie. We need to go now. Lord Nihilus… he gets in your head and then things get really hard to see. We need to go.”

“I need to go to Dromund Kaas. He needs to come.”

“I know.” He smiled at her. “I’ll take you. I know the way.”

Xxx

The ship crashing into him breaks his careful illusion into pieces, it breaks Nihilus too. His rage is boundless, and he screams his displeasure like a baited dregxl, bound too tight to reach the trough.

“I need to go to Dromund Kaas. He needs to come,” she says. Dromund Kaas, her voice whispers in his mind. Cold as a lover's touch. She whispers promises. You swore to follow me.

{{Yes,}} he promises, rising from the wreckage. There is a Mandalorian shooting bolts at him, but he is not important. Nihilus raises his reassembled arm and the man slams into the wall. {{Yes, I did. Yes.}}

Xxx

A black shadow rose from the wreckage of the shuttle, even as Revan thought she’d finally gotten control back. Canderous fired at it.

“Canderous!” Revan realized she was screaming. She lunged forward, but somehow, Jasp Organa’s gentle grip held her back.

Arkan had slammed Canderous into a wall.

The Force didn't register the Mandalorian’s death, but he wasn't moving either.

He's wearing beskar. We've been through worse. I need to get fracking Arkan away from here before he really hurts him—

“Come, Pollie.” Jasp was leading her like a recalcitrant hessi towards one of the snubs.

“Da.” He's not your father. He's nothing like him. You have no idea what your own father was like. “How are you here?” A bubble of hysteria burned in her throat. “You can’t be here. You’re another hallucination. I’m losing my mind.”

“Come on, Pollie.” Jasp Organa’s hand was frail but uncannily solid latching on her arm, tugging her toward the Aurek- class snub.

“Revan! Look at me. Look.”

The command rang in her head, and Revan lifted her eyes. The man in front of her was insubstantial as a holo. Black hair trailing down his back ringed with bells. A smile on his sad face.

Lead him, the cold voice in her mind echoed. Make an end.

“Come on, Pollie,” the old man said. He tugged her hand again, but then he dropped it, moving behind her. Dimly, she sensed his fear at Arkan’s approach.

Her eyes went to the mass of beskar in the corner, but Canderous didn’t move.

Follow, she thought. Her head made it a command. Follow me, Arkan. You swore you’d follow me.

“You remember.” He smiled and she felt a feeling of… happiness. His happiness. “Remember how I helped. Remember that I loved. Remember me.”

XxX

The phantom touch of her lips down his spine. Her small, white hands. That low grumble she made when sated. The way her back curved into his when he wrapped his arms around her.

Below them, the colony moon of Chassna burned. She’d given Davad command of the fighters, setting it ablaze like a beacon for her Republic trap.

“So you like it?” he murmured. “The burning atmosphere matches your eyes.”

Revan turned her head. Her face was inhuman, etched with dark corruption, like rays on a mask.

“Sentiment, Arkan?”

“Onderon,” he countered, keeping his voice carefully light. “I was thinking of collecting it for you. Would you like the pearl of the Rim for your crown?”

“For me?” Her eyes widened, the color of coals and ash and the yellow clouds of xoxon poison. “Careful.”

Her warning was not concern, but the spark of his passion reignited and he caressed her silken skin—

Xxx

“Follow me onto the ship,” she repeated out loud, blinking back the sudden blur in her eyes. “I’ll take you to Kaas, Davad. Katarr is one world, I will give you systems.”

“But I’m starving now.” His eyes were large and liquid, a color between gray and blue and green—paler than his golden-brown skin, the color of Derran wheat. Stubble stippled his smooth cheeks, roughening them. If Revan closed her eyes, she thought she would feel the scrape of it against her face.

“I know. But follow me. You promised.”

Billions. Sith or Republic lives. I must choose—

The man in front of her looked so real. Revan reached out a hand and touched one of the braids in his hair. Bells rang softly, and they meant something, but she had no idea what.

“Please,” he whispered. “No pain. Come. I love the taste of you—I will show you—”
“No—” She shook her head, biting back the urge to apologize, the ineffable sadness, of this—of him. The remains of the man she had made.

“I’m starving, Revan.” His smile was apologetic, almost shy, but she felt the darkness too, creeping at the edges. “This world is so rich.”

Her breath seemed too loud in the echoing hangar. Arkan wasn’t breathing at all. Jasp and Canderous were somewhere behind her—she couldn’t afford to check, couldn’t afford to look back.

The man in front of her shrank, like a shadow under the sun. There was a soft clink of bells as she felt Arkan retreat; saw him suddenly appearing a meter away, then two; the edges of his form shifting and blurring like a bad holo-image.

He still looked like a man, but his movements betrayed him. He moved like a shadow now, one-dimensional and hollow: nothing more than an illusion of the man he’d been.

“I swore to her,” he said softly. Five meters away now, but the words echoed in her mind. “I swore to her that I would always follow you.” His smile twisted. “It wasn’t all a lie, Rev.”

Her? It didn’t matter. No more lies. “Then do it,” she snapped, forcing the Force into her words. “Here is our ship. Follow me onto it.”

XXX

“I can’t.” In this now, he has her. In it, he is solid flesh. All illusion, but true. He reaches out. If he were closer, he would trace the curve of her cheek, and for a moment in his mind, she is close, is his old lover again—the real one—her eyes as hot and yellow and bright as the passion in her breast. “We can’t fly in the same ship, Rev. I would eat you.”

“But...” she frowns, not understanding. “I said follow.”

He looks past her to the old man. The old man understands. He is a good pilot. A good drexl. He will bear her to the stars. He knows the way.

Jasp Organa gives Nihilus a nod. The man has no Force, but he is still a mount.

“He says he’s starving,” Jasp mutters. “But you are not food. You must not be food because you must end her. He needs his own ship, because if he flies in ours he’ll eat you.”

“Her? Dar’Revan?” She looks so confused. “I will. I will destroy—”

“No.” The bells ring and he shakes his head. “Not yourself, Rev. Her. Our old master. Vima Sunrider. She calls herself Darth Traya now, and she shaped us both.”

“Isn’t she dead already?” She takes a step backward.

“Pollie,” whispers the hollow man. The old pilot takes her arm—he is a good drexl. He will fly her to the stars.

XXX
“Pollie,” Jasp Organa said again. It was only then that Revan noticed how much he had aged since she’d last seen him: all of his hair had whitened and thinned. She could see the skull under his face, the flesh on it drooped, the frail bones of his arms.

“I’m not—” but she let him lead her toward the snub, feeling a dull relief he hadn’t chosen the Pinion.

“ I know.” His trembling hands were deft as he did something to the ship’s dock, and the door opened. Two seats, with an area in back for a small galley, a primitive fresher. He closed the door behind them. “I know you’re not her, Pollie.” He moved slowly, pushing her gently to the pilot’s chair, adjusting her buckles before settling in himself.

Revan. Arkan called again, his voice once more relegated to her mind. Revan wondered why he’d let her go at all. He could have overcome them in a heartbeat. Revan.

Command him. The cold voice again. He let you go because you command him. He is your creature.

Follow, she told him in her mind again. The link between her and Arkan reminded her suddenly of the bond with Bastila. And that was terrifying. “Follow me.” Her voice was hollow out loud and Jasp Organa looked at her.

“Yes,” he nodded. “I’m following. You remember how to start her up, Pollie?” He was sitting next to her in the co-pilot’s chair. He’d produced a flight helmet from the overhead and put it on, handing her the other. “Take her out gentle. There's a wind, and with the grav so light she’ll buck like Dancer.”

“I'm not her,” she mumbled, but her hand found the yoke and she switched on the sights. The ship hummed, full bar of fuel, airlocks sealed, circulators on…. “You should fly, I'm not… I'm a terrible pilot—”

“Pollie,” Polla Organa’s father said gently. “No time for all that. There's a monster at our backs.
Go.”

His gentle, knobbed hands were warm on hers as he moved the stick forward, guiding her motions like he had when the real Polla Organa had been six and he’d taken her on the Corellian Run.
“Punch it,” he murmured. “Go ahead. She won't bite, but watch the wind.”

Revan, whispered the monster in her head. Revan, Revan, Revan. For a moment she wasn't sure which monster it was—Davad or Dar—

Not Dar. It can't be Dar. Just you, the real you—all that remains. All of this: the consequence of your own actions—

The Aurek lifted forward, nose pointed toward sky, wobbling a little in the crosswinds.

A moment later, the black-taloned Pinion followed.

Even without seeing, Revan knew why Davad had picked that ship; his thoughts were a steady drone in the back of her mind.

Pinion-class. Hunting ships. They latch on with their plasma-made claws, capable of following any ship across hyperspace—
And somehow she knew that, as much she knew Arkan could fly it—a ship Force-designed, made to be steered with the will as much as with its fuel—

\textit{I follow you.} Voice in her mind again. Something mindless and terrible in its inflection. Contrasted against the kindness she’d seen in the dead man’s eyes, it made Revan want to weep.

But tears were useless.

\textit{What can I do to fix this?}

“You okay, kiddo?” Polla’s father asked her.

“Yes, I—” Revan stared at the readings in front of them. The green flashing lights. Her hands reached for the yoke and they lurched forward towards the hangar bay tilted skyward.

\textit{Run. I follow. I will follow you into the Dark.}

“Where are we going?”

Do you remember, Biscain?”

\textit{I'm banned from the fracking planet since that spice run—Therion and me got banned and they sold us that fracked mited-up spice—}

Revan blinked. “Yes.” She pulled on the thruster and they shot forward, climbing up. The crosswinds rocked their craft back and forth.

“Easy!” Jasp put his hand over hers, slowing their ascent. “You’ll burn her stabilizers if you go vertical—can’t lift against winds.” Their small craft bobbed and bounced, as Revan swiveled the inertials, tipping them down—

The world twisted, and her head nearly banged against the ceiling as they rolled, her stomach twisting in knots, heaving—

\textit{I’m going to be sick. I’m always sick in hyperspace and we’re not even there yet!} She fumbled at the buckles across her chest—wondering if she’d make it to fresher or end up smashed against a wall—

“What are you doing?” Polla’s father grabbed the yoke, half sliding out of the co-pilot’s seat, as he leaned over her board. \textit{“Never unbuckle on lift-off! I taught you better than this!”} \textit{It wasn’t me... Da.} Revan remembered the lessons, all too well, but this ship was different, it moved differently—too fast—and behind them, she could still feel Arkan, murmuring like an echo of Malachor in her mind. “I’m trying!” She glanced back, only seeing the back of the \textit{Aurek}, the gunner’s bay, its window still darkened transparisteel. “I’m trying but it’s not \textit{working}!”

“Get up.” The old man unsnapped his own harness and pushed her to the side with no ceremony, shoving Revan out of the pilot’s seat and taking over the controls.

She scrambled back, dragging on the Force to compensate for the awkward lurches, the craft twisting and bobbing under feet when—trying to use it to keep the contents of her stomach down—
Then, abruptly, their trajectory smoothed.
“He’s on our tail,” Jasp noted. The blip on their close-range was steady and clear—maybe a little too close.

I follow, the voice in her head agreed.

“I know, I can hear him.” She felt numb. All of this could be an illusion; she could be dying in Arkan’s arms. The interior of the ship seemed hyper-real—the edges too bright and hard, the Force blazing through her, linked somehow to the darkness behind.

Carth, she thought.

“We can jump as soon as we clear atmosphere,” Jasp said. “I don't want to push her.”

“Wait,” she commanded. “I-I don’t know… can we open a channel to the—” Revan realized Jasp would know as much as she did. Less, without the codes. She slid in next to him in the co-pilot’s chair, and thumbed open the channels, immediately overwhelmed by a blast of static—

Xxx

“There appear to be two ships lifting from sea. And Canderous has not given us the order to strike the Harbinger. The remainder of our people on planet have gone dark as well.”

“Kex said they were descending into that pit. It's possible the planet’s crust is blocking our transmissions.” Aemelie reminded herself that did not mean they were dead—any of them. “Can you identify the ships?”

“One is Aurek- class. In pursuit appears to be your Pinion V.”

“Then Canderous and Revan must be on that second vessel. And our enemies have taken the Aurek. Fire on the *Aur—”

“It's hailing us.”

It was. Aemelie wasn't blind. She swiveled the controls to herself and pulled up the comm image.

“This is Revan. Are you receiving this transmission?” The woman’s hair was as wild as the expression in her eyes, evident even through a blurred comm-link.

“Everyone in earshot will if you persist on using the open comm protocol,” Aemelie snapped. “Is Canderous flying the Pinion?”

“No. I-I had to make sure to reach you. Switching to secure—”

“Put Canderous on,” Aemelie barked, even as she noted that Revan had adjusted the frequency.

“He’s… below. On the Harbinger. Injured. I-I had to leave—you… you’ll need to collect him.”

“You left him behind? I will.” Careless, Third Wife. As was leaving my ship to be flown by others. Although, considering how you would fly it—

“Send the Aleema the jump coordinates,” Revan commanded someone on her vessel. “All the way to Kaas. Aemelie, I’m sending you the route. You need to follow us.” Her voice was beskar. “Bring all the ships. All the forces you have.”
“To Dromund Kaas? Now you want to launch an invasion into Sith space?”

“Stay cloaked. I-I don’t know. I want allies. I don’t know what will be needed. We may need to destroy… a target. We may need to… show force.”

“Canderous is Mandalore, not you.”

“Do it.” Third Wife rattled off an impressive number of oaths in her accented Mandalorian, reminding Aemelie (unnecessarily) of Revan’s Jett’ai powers, her victory over the former Mandalore, and an offer to break both Aemelie herself and Canderous in the dueling circle when they met again.

“If my husband agrees,” Aemelie said reasonably. “But the Republic scum destroyed our main guns. We can hardly burn worlds until we enact the proper repairs.”

“Get on it. I’ll comm again.” Revan cut the communication.

“The coordinates are mapping—” Dessa nodded toward the nav-board. “The first jump is Biscain—”

“You have the bridge,” Aemelie told her. “I’ll retrieve Canderous and the children from the planet’s surface. Then we will see what he commands. Remember, Dessa. It is the men who choose the war—”

“As they are told,” Dessa finished the old saying. “But we’ve been pawns of the Sith before. If Fett Revan will lead us to victory against that oath-breaking schutta Jana Novasun—”

“We will see.”

XXX

“You want to make the jump, Pollie?” Jasp kept his voice gentle, so as not to frighten her.

“You can do it.” She looked terrible. Older than she had on Deralia, too pale and too thin. Her hair was lank. The ripped flightsuit she wore stank of sweat and her skin was abraded everywhere the acid had touched it. As if she’d noticed his noticing, she glanced down at herself and grimaced. “Just give me warning. I… hyperspace doesn’t always agree with me.”

“There’s a fresher in the back,” he told her softly. “Next to the galley. It pops out. These old tubs have more room than you’d think. Check the storage under that portside bench too. Probably a fresh suit.”

“I will, when we… when we’re in hyperspace.” She rubbed her arms together as if she was cold.

“Now, kiddo.” Jasp punched the board, and the Aurek shot forward, purring just as clean and as clear as he knew it would. The viewscreen in front of them dissolved into a thousand points of light —

Intruder alert, chimed the sensors, noting the Sith warbird clamped on their exhaust trail.

“Now,” he repeated.

“Oh!” The girl with Pollie’s memories covered her mouth and retched suddenly, then ran to the fresher.
“Are you okay?” he yelled back at her, keeping his eyes on the screen. Some sents got affected badly by the jumps, but never his Pollie—

XXX

When Revan came out again, twisting her hair into a topknot, dressed in a clean Republic flightsuit, Jasp’s eyes were closed, and his head was tilted back.

As she crept closer, those eyes cracked open and stared at her.

In her head, the sense of Davad Arkan still coiled, like a shadow at her feet. Like a loyal kath. The Onderonite was always a loyal beast—

“Better,” Polla’s father said softly. “Last time I saw you, you was in a coma, Miz Starfire, being as you'd just fallen out of the sky. Suppose there's been a lot of grass grown between our paths since then.”

“Mister… Organa.” She didn’t know what to call him. “How are you… here? Moll said you left —” A chill seized her chest. “Arkan and Oerin—did they come to Deralia?”

“Nobody came to us.” He shook his head. “I went looking for Polla at Yavin Station. Then, well… they needed a pilot, and so—” his easy smile faded, and Revan noticed again how frail he looked. “I could hear them. Him especially. Lord Nihilus. He said I have to serve him—”

You don't, she whispered. The feeling of Davad’s command was like a mist over his skin, a gray sickness in the Force. “Him or anyone else.”

“I don’t.” He nodded. Did his eyes look clearer? “I know I don't, Pollie. I know that now— but when he's close it gets… it gets confused again. Called Moll a few times to check in. The boys are fine—yours and ours.”

Thank the stars. “I'm Revan, Jasp. Not her. Not Polla.”

“You think I don't know?” He snorted. “Might have been slaved by some crazy Sith, but I know where my Pollie is. And that's where we're going. Dromund Kaas. To get her back.” he paused, voice weakening. “You're gonna help me, Pollie.”

Not Pollie. “You know the way. You said that. Before.” He said they too. He must mean—was Lin with Arkan? He can't mean the old woman!

“I was their pilot. They got the coordinates from some Jedi—maybe the Jedi want Lords Sion and Nihilus on the Sith world as much as you.”

Sion and Nihilus both. I've got Nihilus—so Sion's still down there.

Sion can't help with Tenebrae. What could he do? Kill the possessed Sith one-by-one?

A wave of exhaustion hit, making Revan’s limbs suddenly feel like lead. Her legs and feet stung, and she noticed a blistered burn on her arm. “You keep calling me by her name, Polla. But you know—you know I’m not her.”

“I watched you fall out of the sky,” he muttered. “Thought you were dead, and that boy of yours… the look on his face—” Jasp blinked rapidly, rubbing his eyes. “The way you looked at me, when we met—your son told us you don't remember your own family.”
“Not really.” Fragments.

“You might be all the kid I have left.” He coughed, a deep rattle that set her teeth on edge. It was then that she felt it in the Force, that rotting weakness inside that could end him. “I might be all the da for you too, right? I’ll be damned if I’m gonna call you by some blasted Sith Lord’s name. You strapped in yet, Pollie?”

“Yes,” she said, sinking back in the co-pilot’s chair, punching the buttons that snapped the restraints over her body for the acceleration.

He coughed again, and it hit like a punch in the gut how frail he was. How old he looked.

“Da!” The word came out before the thought. She had to let it go, reaching out her hand to cover his. “You need—” a medix, maybe even a hospital.

Polla’s father looked up at her and Revan knew that he knew already.

“—dinner,” she mumbled, trying to think of what Polla, the real Polla, would say. “Think this Republic flycrate has supplies?”

“Protocol keeps ’em stocked.” He jerked his chin toward the galley. “Why don’t you check, kiddo? We have a day til the next jump—standard. That Pinion’s locked on tight. Won’t have to worry about him til then.*

Except I can still hear him. A low roar in the back of her mind—wordless now, like a sleeping scream. “I’ll see what I can rustle up,” she promised. “Soon as you take us into the jets, Da.”

Xxx

“Stay away from the windows!” Vizzy told Vic. Her father was sulking after her latest round of ‘I-told-you-so’s,’ and her other sibs were engrossed in a game of Galactic Acquisition, pieces laid out on a primitive holoscreen jammed onto the crowded table, which still held the remains of yesterday’s breakfast. “Those monster-ghosts might come back!”

“There's a ship!” Vic pointed.

“There have been lots,” Vizzy said. The Mandalorians had said some were theirs before she left them.

But then… she felt it. Pressure, like her ears popping.

“He’s leaving!” Vic pointed toward the slatted wood window, and they all lifted their heads, not bothering with their ocular patches now, not when the Force blazed a double-trailed comet across their sky.

Vizzy sighed with relief.

Her father chuckled. “They’re not getting that deposit back, I’ll tell you that. Jedi!”

“Next time, just rent to a Gamorrean fighting troupe,” Vizzy told him. “They’ll do less damage.”

Xxx

Mekel Jin was breathing shallowly and there was a darkening bruise on his brow that might have seemed been an honorable battle wound. His brows drew together darkly, and he looked capable enough in the borrowed beskar Kex helped him assemble. She handed him the helm, she’d selected —large for his head, but marked with Ordo’s sigil.

Kex frowned at that, but she ignored him.

“Did you push him over the edge?” Millifar asked again, just to be sure. “And did Lin fall to his death?”

“He… jumped, I think.”

“On his death?” Millifar frowned, kneeling beside him.

“He was already dead, I thought.” Leskal was so literal.

“I broke the fracking lift.” Mekel looked down the shaft. “I shot the control box to stop him. I didn't think he'd jump— it’s meters down. A whole kilo, maybe .”

Lights glimmered below them, inset in the walls. By Millifar's guess, the shaft could be one kilometer deep. Jin’s estimate seemed reasonable.

“We have enough power for the descent with our jetpacks,” she said slowly. “I'm not sure about the ascent, but the barbarians must have another access point. This is a working mine. It will be accessible from several areas along the routes of its mineral extraction—not to mention ventilation shafts—”

“What about the Jedi ship?” Kex pointed at the crashed snub recently piloted by the unfortunate man who had become a wraith. “We can all fit for a short enough journey—”

“Yes, we can fly the Jedi ship down!” Millifar nodded. Much better.

“Mekel Jin, perhaps you should arm yourself,” Leskal suggested. “Even with the Force—”

“I don’t have the Force. Not anymore.” The Coruscanti picked up a vibroblade from the crate and motioned with it. At least, Millifar noted, he did still have the stance of a warrior. He put on his helm, and his voice crackled over their comm-channel. “Let's go.”

A noise overhead made Millifar look up at the door of the snub. Two ships, ascending rapidly to the stars. Ahead was a dreary Republic scow—one of their clumsy Aureks. The second ship had the sleek lines and black exterior that had made Aemelie so obsessed. As she watched, they both flickered into hyperspace at the exact same moment—“Aemelie will be upset she took the Pinion ,” Millifar noted. For it could be no one else but Revan in those ships, she assumed.

Milli was wondering which one her father was on when his commlink crackled in her helm.

“I'm coming your way,” Father grunted. “Don't shoot me.” A third craft emerged from the downed Harbinger, this one small and relatively mobile—one of those cheap Republic fighters they used for defense of their own clumsy ships.

“Oerin Lin may have fallen to his doom, Father…. ” Millifar began filling him in.

Xxx

“The darkness. It's gone.” Lonna Vash turned her head towards the sky more than a kilometer above their heads. “Darth Nihilus is gone.”
“So is my niece?” Vrook hadn’t protested when they’d taken his saber and bound his hands his back: him and the other three rebels who had backed Revan—and he wasn’t going to protest now.

But he relished a small, smug glow of happiness. He’d been right all along. His faith had been warranted.

She’s led Nihilus away. But to where?

The logistics of how Revan had contained and left the system with Nihilus were also concerning; but quickly overridden by the presence they all sensed in the Force—suddenly revealing itself to them like a moon coming out behind an eclipse of a sun.

The other one. The other Sith Lord. Sion. Formerly Oerin Lin.

“What is that?” Knight Pakeek’s skull-spots paled.

“Sion,” Vrook told her. “A dead man held together entirely by his own will—and the Force.”

Master Vash nodded grimly. “We may have the chance to test Master Loanin’s chamber after all.”

Xxx

Long ago, when Sion had been Oerin Lin and had been young enough to believe his mother’s tales of how to save the galaxy, she had promised that someday, they would show the Jedi their due. It was not revenge, she had counseled—not revenge for what the Jedi had done to Grandmother.

Not revenge, merely a reckoning, a way to balance the scales.

Now, Sion thought this day might have finally come. For ahead through the tunnel, slightly blurred as if through mist, he could sense them: the pack of them: frightened Jedi cowering in the dark, waiting, no doubt, to unleash their trap on Darth Nihilus.

More fool they, for the Beast had already fled.

Sion advanced slowly, enjoying the moment of victory. There was precious little left to enjoy in his world, besides the challenge that a dozen-odd Jedi might bring.

“Do you know how this was supposed to work?” he called out, as they came into view? “In Mother’s original plan?”

A few of them looked puzzled. Perhaps they didn't know who Mother was. But most looked away as if they couldn't meet his eyes.

Revan’s uncle, Vrook Lamar, cleared his throat, braver than most. “Hello, Oerin,” he said. For some reason, his hands were clasped behind his back. It took Sion a moment to note the poses of three others next to him, all standing the same way, and the aggressive postures of the rest.

Those four are prisoners of the other eleven. He'd managed to count them all, even the short Sullustan lurking at the back behind two Rodians.

Eleven and four prisoners. Not even twenty. If the Jedi persist on capturing each other, I'll hardly need more shadow blades to do it.

“Master Vrook!” Sion called out. “Am I here to rescue you?”
“No.” Rev’s uncle shook his head. “But we… we all feel your agony, old friend.” There was hesitation, but his words were sincere. “We can make it stop.”

“I’ve grown rather fond of pain,” Sion called back. “But you seem unquiet. Should I make the same offer to you?”

It took him only a few seconds more to note the strange double echo in the middle of the room, as if the Force there had ceased to exist. Metal plates set into the floor might indicate the reason why, but he was done with curiosity. Some trap, no doubt. Meant for Nihilus. Vacuum containment? Nuclear explosives? The Jedi themselves would have no escape from that, but they were a self-sacrificing lot.

“In Mother’s original plan, you would have made me a Councilmember,” Sion told them. “Master Oerin Sunrider, the youngest elected to the High Council on record. Instead… here we are. Is that a bomb on the floor there? Any other traps?”

Some other had claimed the honor of being the youngest member of the Jedi Council… that sniveling Senator who had been working with Kavar. (And was not here now.) Sion, at this precise moment, did not find the man’s name important. Azal. Loaine. Something inconsequential.

The Jedi were still, irritatingly silent.

Sion’s bones still ached from the fall. Even with the Force helping him use the sides of the shaft to slow his descent, his legs had shattered again. Only the Force held them up, now, as sinew knit. Not only did they hurt maddeningly, but they itched too. “Under my rule on the Jedi High Council, we would have followed Revan and Malak to war, and weakened Vitiate.”

The Jedi still looked blank.

Oerin sighed. “Vitiate. Tenebrae. The Emperor?”

Mother had never been clear on ‘how’ they would win against the man with a billion voices. Mother had never been clear on much—except that Oerin was to have a great destiny—but he had a sinking suspicion having a great destiny was a line Mother used with all of her children: be they flesh or foster.

No doubt one of Mother’s children would win the destiny she promised; but since his death, Oerin had come to suspect it wasn’t him.

Ah, but my people, Mother. They have broken your yoke. Yours and the Emperor’s both. Your war games will need to find other armies to plot your predations.

The Mando’ade will return to a simpler time. Nihilus will end Revan and they will be free.

And I am free of Nihilus and you both.

Those happy thoughts almost made up for the agony of shattering his body to pulp on a kilometer-long fall.

“You are outnumbered, Sith.” One of the others—a grim Togruta—found her shebs, because her blue blade ignited.

Four others followed, all foolhardy knights from the look of their robes. The array of particle blades might give a sentient pause… if one’s limbs didn’t reattach of their own accord.
“Free us,” the knight next to Vrook was arguing with one of the others. “Free us! We can help!”

“Who would you be helping, Knight Vesser?” the older Human woman snapped. “That Sith was allied with Revan—and she left with the other one—”

“We don't know that,” Vrook barked.

“I do,” Oerin offered. “The three of us are still bound… Mother was always one for bonds. Rev and Lord Nihilus left the system. In separate ships, I think… either that or Rev was lunch… but I would know if she died.” He smiled at them, feeling his jaw pop, as the ligaments snapped and mended themselves. “I expect I would know. Do you think she sensed my passing?”

“What is his mother?” One of the knights asked another.

“Arren Kae,” the other said, frowning with that strange blankness that showed Mother had left her claws in him as well. “I-I think his mother was Arren Kae. We had a Council meeting… she was… they said she was….”

“A Sith,” Oerin prompted them. “That’s right! Mother was a secret Sith. But only to overthrow the real Sith, you do understand? Just like Revan. Revan was her finest work, Mother said that when she was trying to make me eat my veggas, or practice Force persuasion.”

“Oerin,” Vrook repeated. His hands—were they tied behind his back? As a Jedi it seemed like he could easily free himself. And yet, he had not. Nor had the other three that were similarly disabled. “Where is your mother now?”

Sion noticed that one Jedi—an older brunette Human woman, had five sabers clipped to her belt, presumably because she’d taken their weapons from them.

Pacifists. He would never understand.

“In hell?” Sion shrugged. “I took the Force from her and left her on the side of a volcano on Malachor V.”

“You should have stayed there yourself,” the Durian hissed through its voder.

“Gratitude would be more polite, but it’s not expected from the damned.” His smile made a few of them flinch. As did his saber, as it sprang to hand burning soundlessly—its crystal resonating so perfectly that there was no hiss upon ignition—only the cool, red bar of light. He brought it forward, waggling it at them. “Shall I come to you, or would you like to come to me? One at a time? In pairs? All at once?”

Silence. And then Master Lamar stepped forward—or began to, before the brunette scowling woman jerked him back, (although, Sion noted, she did not free his hands). “No,” she snapped. “Don’t be foolhardy—”

If they were going to quarrel among themselves all day, Oerin assumed he might as well make an end. He leaped—making sure to steer well clear of those metal plates on the floor—raising his own blade above his head, intending to land among them, and carve it though their bodies in a tidy circle since they’d been so kind as to cluster together.

That was Oerin’s intent.

What happened next began differently—
“Don’t bank so hard,” Jasp Organa chided. “You're driving her like you've got a lead foot to the floor!”

“I'm not using my feet.” Should I be? Revan glanced under the console but there didn't seem to be any feet controls.

“Expression.” He chuckled. “Tubs we flew in the war had em. Crescent X-Niners. Four men in the cockpit, barely had room to sneeze so they stuck the gyroscopes underneath the nav-boards. Worked great for Besalisks… rest of us, there was a learning curve.”

“I didn't—” what? “I didn't know you fought in the war.”

“Exar Kun.”

“Wasn't his war, no.” He made a disgusted face. “The other one.”

“That was… Fett Mandalore the… the Extreme? The Awesomely Extreme Ultimate Guy?” They'd—Polla—had studied history (a little) in school, but Revan could barely remember the details. What she remembered learning on Deralia seemed to dance overhead, overlaid by the phantom presence of another story. “I didn't know you were in the war. You never told her. Polla didn’t—”

“Pollie didn't know.” Jasp coughed again. “Deserters don't brag.”

“But they lost, so how can it matter? You—did you fight for Ulic Qel-Droma? With Ulic Qel-Droma?”

“The traitor bastard? Of course not!” From the way he was looking at her, Revan wasn't sure if he knew who she was. His smile was…too kind. “Wasn't that different from you, Pollie. Wanted adventure, to see the stars… left Deralia and I enlisted. Had two years at the Fleet Academy on Coruscant.” He spoke the words with quiet pride. “Officer training too, enough for my nav license. But third year of cadet training, they stationed our class in the Auril Sector—at a jump nexus known as Kemplex IX.” He paused, and something in his eyes made Revan think he expected her to know it.

“Kemplex….” her mind was irritatingly blank. “Wait, those were the Toydarian-designed stations, right? Civilian ones? Didn't they decommission them after—”

After what happened to Kemplex IX.

It blew up, her thoughts whispered. It blew up with the Cron cluster implosion—

“I thought everyone died on Kemplex IX. The star—a bunch of stars went nova….” Her thoughts went to Polla’s Galactic History class on Deralia, that gut requirement she'd needed for the pilot’s license—but aside from 'a lot of people died,' her mind drew a blank. Or—almost. “Aleema… that Krath woman. She was—she blew up the stars?”

“Didn't you name your flagship after her?” He frowned—then spat. “Hell if I know why. Aleema Sato was a murdering Krath bitch.”

“I don't know why I did a lot of things.”

“What do you think happened?” Half of Revan wondered if Jasp was just trying to distract her—or more likely—himself. She didn't like the color of his face, the bluish tinge to his lips.

“It’s a long story.” He picked up the bulb of water she’d handed him and drank some of it. “But I expect we have time.” His hand holding the water trembled.

“Sure. But… hold a moment…” Revan had packed her own wounds in kolto, but there’d been a medical pack under the fridger in the galley. Without waiting for a response, she got up and retrieved it. “I’ll be right back!” she called out reassuringly, when he half-turned, like he was going to follow her.

“Oh,” Polla’s father said as she came back with the medi-pak. “You…you don’t need to go to the trouble of fussing over me.”

“I need you alive to fly the ship. I'm a terrible pilot,” She didn't know if Polla would have said that as a joke, like she'd meant it. From the expression in the man’s eyes, maybe not.

Two things Da never jokes about. Flying and politics—

“I taught you better than that.” His voice was gentle.

“Da—” her own cracked on the one syllable. She wasn’t sure if she was saying it for him or for herself. “Please. Let me take care of you.”

“I'll try,” he promised. “Had one of those kits on my old bunk too. The scanner won’t say anything good. What's wrong isn't gonna get fixed with a few derm patches or kolto.”

“It's your heart,” she said. “I think.” I should have learned to heal. Jolee wanted to teach me. And all those conversations with Dar and I never once asked how she did it—.

“Maybe.” Jasp shrugged. “Maybe… some other things too. Nothing to worry your head over.” He smiled slightly. “Programmed the jump points in already, and wrote em down for you on plasti. I know that lift was rough but you can handle the landing—and we should have enough fuel for a straight run, if you're careful—”

“I have to be careful. Arkan would stand out at a refueling stop. We can’t stop. We can’t afford to stop.” Even if you need a hospital, I can’t take you. I need you to fly the ship—

The Sith's voice in her mind had quieted to a low ache now, a burn on the edge of her consciousness. Revan was trying to wall him off, and talking—talking was helping.

“You're not going to die,” she added. “Polla Organa would kill me!”

“Can you tell if she's alive?” Those dark eyes were just like she remembered, even if the new grooves around them made Revan’s chest ache. “Some kind of Force… thing?”

“No.” I don't even know if Dar is alive. She'd started having bad dreams about Dar'Revan weeks ago. But that might have nightmares. Once, she'd even thought she'd seen Polla’s face; but somehow that had shifted, and she was back on the Star Forge with Malak and his eyes were glowing a hellish red—

Red eyes are bad. Revan remembered that almost child-like thought on Taris—“Oh.” Jasp nodded slowly. “Well then, let’s see if we can fire up the wideband on this tub and patch through to Deralia. Moll and your boy will—”

“No.”

“No?”

“We—we can’t just call—it’s not safe.”

“Never know when you might not have another chance,” he said. “I’ve been checking in regular, when the masters leave me on the ship—I always call.”

_The masters._ “They’re not your masters anymore,” Revan told him. “You saw—Arkan is mine now. I won’t let him hurt you—I won’t let him—”

“You’re _his_ master now.” His teeth were yellow, when he smiled at her. She’d found nutrabars in the galley and he’d barely touched them. His scalp was patched with brown spots on his where his hair had thinned. “I saw.”

Get some sleep,” Revan said gently. Her eyes went to the galactic chronometer set on the comm-deck. “Too late in Deralia to call now,” she lied. “When you wake up, maybe…”

His eyes fluttered shut. “Missed you, Pollie. Your ma’s gonna be so proud—”

XXX

The Mandalorians moved down the corridor like a hunting pack. Mekel had seen them do it before—guarding the Senator on Coruscant—falling into formation at the slightest hint of danger as naturally as breathing—but this was… tenser somehow. As if the attempted assassinations and threats on Coru had just been for fun. This felt real.

“What—?” Milli’s gloved hand banged into his teeth, she slammed it down so hard on his mouth. If Mekel hadn’t been trained to expect the unexpected assault or two, he was pretty sure he’d have gone down right then and there.

She shook her helmeted head at him, and shoved him back. Kex moved into Mekel’s place, smooth as if they’d planned it. Leskal didn’t look at him, just crept forward, but Canderous Ordo made a snorting noise through their comm-link, like it was funny.

Mekel hated the helm he’d grabbed, but he put it on anyway. It was loose, and the borrowed chestplate wasn’t much better. The vibroblade was nice, but the weight was all wrong compared to a saber. Had been ages since he’d taken practicing with anything else seriously.

They were creeping down a narrow, dimly-lit tunnel carved into the rock, or salt, or whatever the ground here was. It was like a cave, and Mekel didn’t like caves. They lacked the tidiness of a decent sewer pipe—with a cave, you never knew where you’d end up.

And then up ahead there was the sound of screaming.

XXX

Vrook stood witness as the Sith Lord Darth Sion leapt into the air, past the plate in the ground that was nothing more than a metal plate in the ground—nothing more except a marker... except, as the Sith passed its surface, the sensors half-buried in the salt ground activated, extending from the walls, ceiling, and floor; dropping their hollow, transparisteel tubes into the shafts provided for Within each tube, a branch. Upon each branch, a triad of ysalamiri, mature enough to have fastened their hook-like tails and grown into the wood.

“Back,” Vash ordered, as Loanin’s creation activated. They had marked its range carefully, so as not to be overcome themselves.

Vrook stumbled back, his arms hitting Dak’s who shot him a glare. The Force surged with the younger man’s anger—but his was not the only darkness Vrook felt, among the Jedi.

Six ysalamiri tubes slammed down so quickly in front of Sion that the dead man was knocked backward. One of his knees bent the wrong way. Another thwack as more came down from the walls, forming the grid. All four sides, until the dead Sith was surrounded.

There was a slight pause, as the dead man took in the seemingly fragile cage that bound him. Then he chuckled. “This? Do you think these pathetic lizards will hold me?”

His saber slashed forward, glancing off the tube he’d tried to cut. The cortosis weave would hold, Vrook had been informed, but it made the glass brittle. A flaw in the design there had been no time to overcome. A direct blow would shatter it, but they were hoping there would be no time—

Darth Sion’s foot lashed out and one of the bars cracked.

“Now,” Master Vash said to Knight Pakeek.

The Togrutan nodded, and pressed the transceiver on her wrist.

The ysalamiri tubes began to glow as the gasses inside ignited slowly, amplifying the Force-nullifying signal. The first wave of dullness washed over the Jedi as its range expanded, dimming the Force, dimming all of their senses. The color and life in the world seemed to ebb, darkening, and Vrook’s awareness of the others faded, until they were nothing more than bodies next to his.

“Step back again,” Vash ordered. Dak had gotten his hands free, as had Master Skokkar. Da’Wit’s round eyes met Vrook’s and the Rodian gave him a resigned nod. Vrook knew the man—he would not try to free himself. Skokkar had always been rebellious—as he watched, she reached over and plucked Knight Ir’eee’s lightsaber from the hapless boy’s belt. The boy didn't seem to notice.

“Fools,” rasped Sion. “The Force is in me, it cannot be contained!” His battered and bare arm slammed into another tube and it cracked too. There was no blood where the transparisteel cut into the Sith’s flesh. The light of that tube blinked out.

“Amplify it now,” Vash murmured, and Pakeek pressed the controls again. A high-pitched sound like a shrill scream was faint at first; but it increased quickly as the ysalamiri’s frequency hit the salt crystals in the walls, amplifying the Force-deadening effect. The tubes glowed brighter, white hot, except for the two Sion had cracked. The dull edge of the Force ended abruptly for the Jedi, as they had kept walking and were now out of range; but inside the cage, where the ysalamiri burned in their prison—

Inside the cage came a cracked wail—what began as a scream—

XXX

The sound was like nothing Mekel had heard, and lately, he’d heard a lot of really fracked-up shit.
When they rounded the bend they saw the source of the screaming: Oerin fracking Lin, standing in some kind of glowing cage. As they watched, the light around him grew brighter, like a small sun going nova.

“Back,” Canderous snapped. “He’s triggered some kind of Jett’ai trap.”

“He’s not their kill,” Milli growled in that way she growled that Mekel found both scary and exciting. The cannon she was carrying was almost as long as she was. She fired it. Once, then again.

Her first blast hit Lin in the base of his spine, causing him to turn toward them. The second shot went wild, cracking another one of the cage bars. The glowing stopped and the bars shattered, just some kind of glass. Something fell out of it the glass—what looked like a tree branch, with blackened and twitching things attached to it.

Took Mekel a second; but he should have known immediately. He’d seen them so recently, back at the hospital with that asshole Klee. And Lin.

Ysalamiri. How the frack do you like them ysalamiri now, Lin?

Under his helm, Mekel felt his lips smile. He stepped forward, jostling with the others for a front row fracking seat, bringing his vibroblade up, poised to strike.

“What the nine hells is it?” Kex’s voice on the comm-channel.

“Ysalamiri,” Mekel told him. “They block the Force. He’s in some kind of ysalamiri cage.”

Lin was in it and he was screaming. The man’s stomach was gone, sheared away by Milli’s blast. But that wasn’t all. As they watched, his entire body began to shake. Pieces… pieces of him fell off. His nose was more of a skull, bare sockets of his yellow eyes. His lit saber fell out of his suddenly fingerless hand—sparkling and burning on the ground.

And the scream grew louder, desperate. Pain.

Good. You took the Force away, asshole. You should suffer. Maybe if you die, I’ll get it back.

Mekel stepped forward and slammed the hilt of his vibroblade into one of the glowing bars. The bar shattered too. Lin seemed to fall back, more a cloud of rapidly-disintegrating flesh than a man now and Mekel kicked another broken tube out of the way in his urge to gut him while there was still something left—

“Stop!” someone was yelling. Somewhere. Sound was muffled through his helm’s mic.

Overwhelmed by the screaming. Mekel realized the screaming wasn’t just Lin—it was the things inside the tubes too—screaming with Lin. Like they were injured too.

“I’ve got this,” he vowed.

“No.” Millifar shoved him out of the way, and fired her gun again. It took Lin—or what was left of him through the legs. More glass broke, as her bolt took out the tubes on the other side too.

Rapid fire from Kex and Leskal’s guns peppered the enclosure as the glowing bars popped out.

Mekel stepped back, because he didn’t want to get mowed down. The world became a blaze of noise and light and flying glass, and voices screaming—more voices screaming—
As the light from the cage died out with each bar broken, Mekel began to see more of the tunnel past Lin. There were sents standing there. Sents with lightsabers.

One of them was dear old Dads, right in front—no lightsaber in sight—his hands behind his back, glaring. “Stop!”

“Our kill.” Millifar kicked another tube out of the way and brought out her flamethrower, stepping into the cage’s enclosure. “Hu’tuun dar’jett can leave now. Oerin Lin is ours. I will sing his death song. I would have been his wife. I will burn him to ash.”

“His wife?” Fracked, that the first thing Mekel felt was a twinge of what he thought might be jealousy.

Canderous Ordo chuckled, and pulled Mekel back. “Never get between a woman and her kill,” he said.

“No!” Dear old Dads cried out again. “You don’t know what you’re doing! The cage is the only thing holding—”

His words were lost as Millifar ignited the flamethrower. Mekel couldn’t really see much except the white of Milli’s armor and the red of the flames, but he could smell cooked flesh easy. Not a smell you ever forgot.

Brings back home. Good old Dreshdae— Funny, how he’d never realized until that moment, a part of him still thought of it as home.

“No!” A wave of something knocked them all back, knocked Milli back too, staggering her, making the flame go wild.

A wild-eyed Jedi woman was standing on the other side of the broken cage with a lit saber, the others crowded behind her. “You fools! What have you done?”

“Hello again, Dads,” Mekel called out. “Looks like you Jedi needed the Mando’ade to bail your asses out again!”

“Mekel?” Dear old Dads blinked at Mekel, but didn’t remove his hands from his back. He looked puzzled. Of course. The helm. Maybe he hadn’t realized—hadn’t even recognized his own son in the Force. “What are you still doing here?”

Mekel smiled back at him. “Saving your ass, Dads—”

Maybe he would have too. But the world chose that moment to end.

The world blew back with the force of a grenade’s explosion. The world became small, and screaming, falling white, and something red, half-moons of red burning through air. Screams turned to sobs. There was the sound of sabers clashing: snap hiss, snap, hiss-hiss—like one after the other, they’d all gone out.

Someone on their comm channel was making a whimpering noise, like they couldn’t stop. Someone else roared and a bulk of beskar shot forward, past Mekel, flash of a vibroblade extending with a snikt.

Mekel sat up slowly, whatever had exploded had dulled his senses even more than the lack of Force. The world was in pieces:

Here, a piece of a beskar-clad arm. Looked ripped from its socket. He couldn’t tell whose—he didn’t want to tell whose—

But he knew anyway.

Small. Small bones, he thought, looking numbly at the ragged stump. She has such small bones.

Mekel didn’t want to, but he had to. He had to look up to see.

XXX

There was a reason, Canderous knew, why attacking a thing that had reassembled itself from ash and then ripped his daughter’s arm from her body in a mortal instant was foolhardy; a pointless suicide for a man with infant children, a man already too old for a glorious end.

But when Milli fell so did Canderous’s reason. Blood rage consumed him. All there was, was the enemy: the shell of Lin.

Guns did nothing against the shabuir hu’tuun, but a blade could cut to pieces what a bolt scattered. A frost grenade could freeze. And frozen parts he could crush. His vibroblade snagged on the former Mandalore’s spine, and Canderous sawed harder, a roar forming in his throat. His gauntleted fist slammed into the dead man’s neck with a satisfying crack. The dead man’s saber clashed with his blade, strangely silent for a dar’jett weapon.

Canderous dialed up the stims in his system with a twitch of his ocular controls, felt the battle augmentation kick his adrenals into overdrive, enhancing his reflexes, and used his boost of strength and speed to fall back and undercut the red blade.

His own connected with flesh again—severing one of the damned corpse’s legs.

But the man did not fall. The leg reformed itself near-instantly. Dar’Lin’s ruined face stared at Canderous’s helm: scarred and broken. “Mand’alor, I did not expect—”

A thrown blur of blue from behind Dar’Lin cut into the dead man’s side, interrupting his clumsy attempt at distraction. The Jett’ai weapon stuck in the dead man’s flesh, sizzling, like pure invitation.

Canderous didn’t hesitate. He swapped the vibro to his off-hand, and grabbed the saber’s hilt—thrusting an uppercut to take off the dead man’s head.

He slashed only air, because Dar’Lin had moved on.

Dar’Lin had jumped to the middle of the brown-robes on the other side of their ruined trap.

Canderous watched as Lin’s red blade blurred into a circle like a bloody sun, scattering pieces of Jedi like the wreckage of war.

Canderous did not realize how loud the sounds of battle had been until they stopped.

In sudden silence, the only thing he heard was someone sobbing softly over their comm-channel.

It sounded like Jin.

XXX
Her flamethrower was still burning into the wall, making a smell like charred salt. Other smells were worse. She lay in a pool of blood—still pumping not dead not dead but not pumping her arms gone it’s bad really bad—

There was… there was a lot of other stuff. On the way to her, Mekel tripped over another body. This one cut in half with a lightsaber. Sabers shouldn’t make it through beskar—that was the fracking point—but this one had. Kex. Or Leskal. Up ahead, Canderous was fighting the Sith. The blamming noise of Canderous’s cannon began as he threw his vibroblade again.

“Stop,” Mekel whispered. He crawled over to Millifar, grabbing for the torch on her wrist, the small one, the detachable. He had it lit and burning into her shoulder—cauterize—he was squeezing down on it—so fracking easy with the Force. It would be so fracking easy with the Force—or a lightsaber, even—what happened to all the lightsabers?

It was hard, fracking hard because there was barely enough shoulder left, not enough to tie a tourniquet over, just some of those battle gels that sealed over wounds, and Millifar had those too—he’d gotten those too—strapped in the holster along her thigh, and Mekel snapped the holster open, slapped one over the mess he’d made on her poor charred stump, and then he started unbuckling—her chestplate first and he couldn’t tell if she was moving, if she was breathing and in the background he heard someone yelling in Manda—

He couldn’t tell if her chest was moving so he moved to her helm. Her neck flopped back when he pulled it off; her hair braided so tightly in neat golden rows, eyes closed and white, purple-white shadows beneath, smeared like pain. Her lips were white too.

Mekel pulled his own helm off too. He parted her white lips and breathed through them, pressing down on her chest.

She didn’t breathe back. She’d lost a lot of blood, it was sticky and still warm. His knees were soaked in it. But the bleeding had stopped—mostly. He thought it had stopped.

There was more yelling somewhere while Mekel kept trying to make her fracking breathe.

Her lips were cold. It wasn't a kiss. He forced his breath down her throat.

XXX

Canderous fumbled for the switch on the Jedi’s weapon and switched it off, clamping it to his belt. He pulled out both repeaters. Had enough charge to keep blowing holes in the dead man’s flesh for days if the self-chargers kept up, converting the overheating energy back into bolts—

“Mand’alor.” The dead man wheezed the words out. His hand went to his throat and he fiddled with a metal plate there. The voice got louder. “I will not kill you, my Fett.”

Irritating the way the dead man knelt. Canderous blew pieces out of his head, only to see the pieces reassemble, nearly as fast as he blew them away. “Then die already,” he ordered Lin. “Millifar deserved a better death than you gave her.”

“I will not kill her either. I would never—”

Canderous was not usually one for ceremony, but the old words came to him. The Dha Werda Verda, the ritual battle chant song by his forefathers (in deed if not in blood) millennia ago.
“The gauntlet of Mand’alor strikes without mercy,” he muttered, advancing on Dar’Lin. “We are the rage of The Warriors of the Shadow, the first noble sons of Mandalore. Let all those who stand before us light the night sky in flame—"

“Duum motir ca’tra nau tracinya,” Dar’Lin’s broken voice echoed. “Gra’tua cuun hett su dralshy’a —"

“That’s right,” Canderous told through clenched teeth. “Our vengeance burns brighter still. This is for Milli.”

He dropped the smoking repeaters and switched on that blue saber again, jumping through the air, raising it down to cut the blasted bastard in two—

He landed on slick blood and the ruin of Jedi bodies, because his target had moved faster than his eyes could track.

Lin was off to the side again, staring past Canderous, back the way they had come.

“No—” the hu’tuun wheezed. “No!”

Despite the obvious risk of a ruse, Canderous followed the dead man’s gaze. Jin there, bending over his daughter, frantically pumping on her chest. His mouth pushing breath into her lungs. Crying between breaths. A whimpering soft sound that had words in it.

“Dontdiedont—"

“I didn’t see her.” Lin’s breath wheezed like bellows. Was he laughing?

Canderous took the time to shoot through his neck. And then followed with his blade until it stuck on something. Pretty funny, how a dead man looked with a lightsaber stuck in his gut. Canderous twisted the hilt—

One yellow burning eye blinked and the white orb next to it rolled. Then the dead man’s hand backhanded his helm.

“Sleep,” the hu’tuun muttered.

XXX

Somewhere, in a place beyond Mekel, another round of weapons fire rattled the corridor.

Then the sound of something crashing into the salt wall.

And then it all stopped. Silence. Silence over the comm-channel coming up from Mekel’s helm, staticky clicks that were nothing at all.

Mekel’s eyes were leaking, wet and leaking. Her lips were cold. So were his.

For a second Mekel had lost all time and that voice could have been Malak. Later, he would hate himself for it; but for a second, the words my lord formed in his mind. Automatic, like the gag reflex on a dead Hutt.

But when Mekel looked up, it was only fracking Lin. The wreck of him. Bald and gray and charred and dead as ever. That stomach that Milli had blown apart was blackened, but whole, as if someone had set the pieces on fire and then put them back.

Mekel didn’t really see—he just launched up, not even a fracking blade in his hand, no Force, just claws—his fist. His fist slammed into Lin’s fracking face like a rock hitting meat. Nothing stopped it, just sank in. Lin didn’t even move. One of his eyes was dead. The other stared at Mekel, unblinkingly. The eyelid looked torn.

“I didn’t know it was her,” the Sith Lord rasped. “I wasn’t myself.”

Mekel punched him again. Kicked him in the choobs. No fracking reaction. A part of his mind told him this was suicide, but the rest of his mind didn’t give a shit. He lunged for his dropped vibroblade, sweeping out a leg, to trip the dead man. Stop him from stopping Mekel. With the Force, such a move would have thrown Lin back into a wall. Without it, Mekel tripped and fell. The vibroblade didn't move the six centimeters it needed to land in his hand. A sob welled up in Mekel’s throat as he rolled for it, bringing it up, stumbling to his feet—

Clumsy, he’ll kill you. He’ll kill you now—

Lin didn’t move for another long moment. “One of the Jedi ran off,” he offered. “I’ll be right back.”

Mekel blinked and the dead man had vanished.

One of the Jedi ran—what the frack did the rest of them do? Why aren't they helping? Why the frack isn't dear old Dads—

That’s when Mekel looked across the ruins of the Force cage and saw what the rest of the Jedi had done.

They had died.

XXX

For a moment, Oerin Lin had actually been dead, he thought.

The pain he thought as omnipresent in his life had ended—dissolved into a wave of black mist.

And at that moment, Oerin thought he’d even heard the sound of his mother’s voice singing his death hymn.

But then the world roared back: hard-edged and brutal. Something burned deep in Oerin’s guts and his eyes snapped back in their sockets; good eye and clouded one revealing a world of smoke and flames to his consciousness, the barrel of a gun in his face, blaster bolts overhead—and in the midst of the chaos, a white-armored figure, short as a boy, burning his body as over and over the Force reformed its shape.

Time was agony once more: an endless burning, a shifting in his guts: as ash became flesh became ash became meat—became ash—

Oerin just wanted it to stop. The Force in his newly-recovered hand ripped the burning gun from its root. The white-armored figure screamed, high and shrill and fell backwards. Red flames became a river of blood. And the death song ceased.

More armored shapes tried to kill him and then the Jett’ai fools who had sought to trap him… they tried as well. So careless with their painless lives. In their ends.
Last was the Mand’alor. He wore the helm Oerin had worn but never fully earned. Oerin would not kill the man, but the man wouldn’t listen.

The man said her name.

_Millifar._

When Oerin looked back, he saw Jin kneeling over her. The perfection of her still, white face was a blow to what remained of the shriveled organ in his chest.

Ordo, the Fett Mandalore, was still attacking—badly, now—weakening—as if sorrow had blunted his edge.

Oerin would spare him further shame.

_“Sleep,”_ Oerin growled, and Canderous Ordo—usually as Force-resistant as bedrock—collapsed on the ground.

Surprisingly, Jin took longer, attacking Oerin with hands and fists like an untrained child, and not the warrior Oerin had seen before in the battle circles.

Millifar was still—the spark in her nearly guttered to nothing. It was a shame that death had eliminated his ability to heal, a shame Mother had never taught Oerin to restore the Force to Mekel Jin so that he could heal—although if such a thing were possible, wouldn’t Mother have used it on Ulic, the man she considered her father?

Wouldn’t she have used it on herself?

It took Oerin nothing at all to find the one Jedi who had fled instead of dying. He had not gone far, was merely cowering in the first branch of the corridor.

The Human man glared back at him furiously, showing every sign of preparing an attack, a last-ditch attempt to die with the others. Oerin wasted no time with finesse—Millifar had no time left. His mind carved the commands into the Jedi’s soul as he dragged the man back to the dying girl by the scruff of his robe—

_“Heal her. Don’t let her die, even if it takes your own life—”_

Dak Vesser, former Korriban recruit, reformed Jedi Knight—and coward—was no match for Oerin’s will. His mind bent, shaping easily to its new purpose.

Oerin did not lurk around waiting for success. If the girl was to die, he did not want to see. He wrapped shadows around his person and vanished from mortal sight.

Xxx

_A/N_

"I saved you," cried the woman
"And you’ve bitten me, but why?
You know your bite is poisonous and now I'm going to die"
"Oh shut up, silly woman, " said the reptile with a grin
"You knew damn well I was a snake before you took me in"

— The Snake, song by Al Wilson
Paradise

Chapter 61 / Paradise

The sound of coughing woke Revan from a tangled sleep. She'd had a garbled dream, where Uncle Vrook was trying to say something, but the roar of the Star Forge's enormous turbines kept drowning out the words.

And she was starving. Hard to focus when she was so hungry–

That cough again. Rattling, like the crackle of blaster fire. She opened her eyes with a jolt and the galaxy came back: Katarr. Arkan–Jasp Organa–Polla's father–

Ship. We're on a ship.

Polla's father was sitting next to her in the pilot's chair. He had a half-finished nutrabar in one hand and a datapad in the other that he was using his finger as a stylus to scribble on. Revan had a sudden memory of him doing that with Polla's astrophysics homework.

"Race days in the Biscain system." He smiled at her as her eyes opened, continuing without preamble. "Means traffic will be shunted between the jump–point and the viewing orbits. We're gonna need to get across the system to their outgoing jump–point fast, before they notice." He leaned back. "Least this crate should be able to outrun most of the civs–except the racers. I'm not sure if we can outrun BisSec." His eyebrow raised. "That part's up to us."

"Outgoing?" the memory came, unbidden. With its double star and asteroid field, Biscain had strict traffic controls, even in the best of times. For race days, they'd have laid down interdictor fields all over the course to make sure that every spectator paid their ticket without jumping out free–and stayed out of the way of the racers.

"Right." Revan nodded. "We… can we cloak?"

Jasp coughed again, a sound that seemed to take up his whole lungs. "She's not wired for it."

"A fast run, then." Revan nodded, trying to think of Polla's memories of navigating Biscain space. "Sure. Easy as thisla pie."

_Jasp needs a hospital. He needs a healer. But if I say that—_

There was an escape pod on the snub. Revan had seen it when she was in the fresher–a clearly–marked hatch in the floor, green lights blinking to indicate the pod beneath was in working order. She might be able to convince Jasp to use it–and then hope someone picked him up–

_But you need to get through that asteroid field first. Be realistic, Fragment. You need him to fly the ship. You’ll never make it on your own._

Not Dar's real voice, just the echo.

_Hungry._

Arkan's voice broke through her mental shields again like they were plimsi.
The words blended together until they sounded like Malachor.

Malachor, Arkan whispered, as if agreeing.

"He sure is loud this morning." Jasp Organa absently wiped a trail of blood from his nose. "Used to be better. When they first brought me on, Lord Nihilus made more sense." He chuckled. "Used to ask for things. I tell you that?" He blinked. "Had me calling folks… sending orders… I'm sorry. I don't always remember what I tell you."

"You hear him too?" But you don't have the Force. They tested for it on Deralia–as they did on a lot of Outer Rim systems. Jasp had always bragged that their whole family was Force–blind as banthas… except Bendowen's kin. Except for Beya Organa. My old friend.

Cousin. Sara and I went to the concert and Beya got us out of that jam–

"How's Sara?" she asked, not sure why she cared.

"You remember, she married that shopkeep from Derra City. Their boy's about the same age as yours." He paused. "Your boy, I mean. Not my… not my grandson."

Malachor, Arkan whispered, the word gradually increasing into a scream. Malachor malachor–

"She had a wedding, I…" Polla Organa hadn't been home much for most of the last decade–too busy running routes through the Outer Rim. Revan could only remember that the woman hadn't cared about Sara and her stupid wedding place setting patterns. "I didn't know she had a kid."

Jasp Organa launched into a list of their various cousins' progeny, marriages, divorces and bankruptcies, and Revan kept the smile pinned to her face, trying to ignore the other voice, incessant and increasing, in the back of her skull.

Malachor.

There was no space between the cockpit and Arkan's vision–just the sudden, sharp intrusion of his memories slamming into her consciousness with the weight of a planetary implosion.

XXX

The atmosphere was breathable on this speck of rock–barely. Breathable for them, at least–but Davad didn't like the way the rad tickers spiked as he descended through the clouds.

His master had commed late. No message; just these coordinates on a remote moon of Endar, scene of their first victory against the Republic. The glow from the fires they'd set in the Republic's ammonite stores still burned on the planet below. No doubt Endar's cities were hellscapes now. Davad wondered if any of its pathetic inhabitants had slithered back.

If so, they were wise to keep well away from this moon. Davad could sense nothing in the Force except her: glacial and encompassing, like she'd wrapped half the moon in ice.

He banked his own Pinion down next to the plain, unmarked cruiser she'd taken to Ziost. The hatch was open, and from the way the landing gears were smashed into the rocks, he knew Revan hadn't brought a pilot, or even one of her droids to help fly the ship.

Still stubborn, even with the galaxy at stake. Even with all of her calculations, she still took foolhardy risks–

The Force led him to a cliff face, about a kilometer away from the landing site of her own shattered light cruiser. The cliff itself was easy enough to ascend, and need for her gave him near wings: his fingers and boots needing only the lightest of purchase to scale the rock wall.

His lover sat at the top, dangling her legs over the edge. It made her look small and young.

Davad did not like that. Words of reprimand formed in his throat, as he scrabbled to the summit a few meters from her perch—and then those words died at the expression of abject misery on her face.

"Are you hurt?" He saw no wounds, but her dark robes were stiff and matted with gore. He had returned from battles often enough like this—and that brute Malak was nearly always drenched with the spoor of his kills—but never Revan. No, when his lover killed by her own hand, she did it cleanly—efficiently, like a simple chore.

"No," she said, looking up at him. "But my ship crashed." She held something in her hand, pulling and twisting it through her fingers, her yellow eyes gleaming like a manka's.

In her hand was a hank of red hair, fine and faintly curled, the exact shade of her own. It looked ripped from a scalp. What remained of her own hair was immaculate and unblemished, each row of thinning braids fastened tightly to her skull in a series of overlapping coils.

She's done it, he thought. She's finally killed Sheris. Malak will retaliate, but we are stronger than he—

"I crashed my ship," she repeated. Her lip trembled slightly. "It was a foolish miscalculation."

"Why here?" It had been three days since Davad had received her distress call. He wondered if she'd moved in all of that time.

"I needed to think." Her thumb moved over the braid again.

"Don't... cry." Sentiment felt odd and unpleasing.

"I am not." Her eyes were perfectly dry, but he felt it inside of her, a grief so vast and deep it seemed to encompass the entire moon. "I'm sorry."

"You don't have to apologize... not to me." The tenderness in his breast felt fragile as an egg.

"I'm sorry," she repeated. "Everything we've done has been steps along a circular path. Every victory is just another obstacle, another defeat. He calls it balance."

"Malak is hardly a judge—"

"I mean Tenebrae."

"That old man?" Davad scoffed. "You are the true Sith Emperor! You control his planets. You control his fleets. He is a figurehead at best—"

She fingered the hair in her hand. It was a braid. Small, a little clumsy. Like something a Beast—rider child not yet earned in bells would have made. Her voice was quiet and stubborn. He had never seen her so vulnerable. He had never loved her more.

He had a sudden urge to push her off the cliff.
Her voice was steady, as if the words were one of those false mantras of peace they had learned as Jedi, so long ago. "He is less today than he was yesterday. That will have to be enough."

XXX

That's nice, Revan thought acidly at the scream in her mind. I'm glad you both had a moment. I guess she didn't kill Sheris though. Maybe she scalped some other redhead—

Malachor, Arkan's scream repeated. Like a threat.

Stay away from my son! A wash of anger brought Revan back to herself.

The lights on her console blinked, warning them they were close to exiting hyperspace. Another hour—give or take.

"I—I saw Uncle Boon," she said out loud. Her voice felt too loud. Jasp's nose was bleeding again—she handed him another wipe. "On Coruscant. Did I tell you?"

"Heard he got arrested." Polla's father leaned over the board, and adjusted one of the dials for no reason she could see. "Man always was a hothead."

"He… he wanted to have me killed," Revan muttered, half under her breath. It wasn't a good story. "H—how was the harvest this year?"

"Not bad. I irrigated the south field—"

Malachor? Now the word sounded like a question.

Her stomach rumbled.

Stay away from Korrie! What if she couldn't stop Arkan after he destroyed the Sith? What if stopping him didn't work?

There was a stack of nutrabars on the console. Revan picked one up and shoved the entire thing in her mouth.

More, Arkan whispered. It sounded like Malachor.

XXX

Canderous Ordo roared like a terentatek when the stims Aemelie injected kicked in, sending his entire body arcing out of the chair and to his feet, screaming curses. "Where is that stinking shabuir—" the way he gripped imaginary guns in each hand told Mekel where he still thought he was.

"Gone," Aemelie said flatly. "We had patrols sweep the area, but they found nothing. Word came from the Miralukan spaceport that a dead man stole a ship. The Dar'Lin could be anywhere."

"He can hide in that kriiffing Force. Need to catch him unaware—or lure him back out—" Canderous shook his head, blinking. "Milli—?"

"Alive," Aemelie glanced at Mekel, who was standing on the other side of the room, next to her bed. "Mekel of Clan Lin saved her life. He found a Jedi to heal her."

Mekel had tried, at first, to explain that he wasn't the one who found Dak, but no one had been listening, and Dak wasn't really speaking, just kneeling beside Millifar's body like he was in some kind of trance. When they'd moved her—when… when Aemelie and the others had found them—a pack of Mando'aade and their Miralukan escort—Dak had refused to leave Millifar's side, walking next to her floating bed, his hands still glowing.

They were still glowing now, and it was morning. Felt like weeks, but Mekel thought it had only been a few hours.

Xxx

Vrook Lamar's hands had been tied behind his back, like he'd been a prisoner. Lin's prisoner? The Jedi? He couldn't have fought back, but he'd still been dead.

What was Mekel supposed to feel?

There had been too much time to feel anything at all. Nearly an hour sitting down there watching Dak kneel above Milli. Mekel had taken off Canderous Ordo and Leskal's helm. Both were breathing. Ordo didn't have a mark on him, but Leskal had a gash in his side through the beskar that Mekel had packed with kolto. Leskal kept drifting in and out of consciousness—kept trying to talk.

Dak Vesser refused to talk. When Mekel looked into his eyes he saw nothing. His pupils weren't even the same size. He kept forgetting to close his mouth. But blue light poured from Dak's hands like raw power. Even without feeling it, Mekel could see the results, feel Millifar's pulse strengthen under his fingers, watch color return to her ashen face.

Mekel himself had nothing to say. He had never felt so fracking helpless in his life. When their rescuers finally came—that Miralukan farmer, his cute daughter, and Aemelie Ordo with her Mandalorian hunting party—he'd had to tell the whole story about eight times before they seemed to believe him. For some fracking reason they couldn't believe one Sith had taken out twenty Jedi. Had they not met the fracking Jedi? Some of the Jedi had had their hands tied—Mekel's father's hands had been tied, but Mekel wasn't an idiot who thought it would have made one frack of a difference if they'd been free.

It hadn't looked like Lin had been the one to tie his father's hands. Lin had been trapped, maybe dying forever before they came and fracked everything up. Before Millifar had fracked everything up.

Aemelie had wanted to hunt down Oerin Lin, but then for some reason (after one of the other headwomen talked to her) she decided that was Mekel's fracking job.

"For your honor," she'd said.

Mekel wished he had lied and told her the dead Jedi had killed each other. Wasn't until they saw footage from the local news showing Lin mowing down everyone at the nearest spaceport and taking off that Aemelie shut the frack up about Mekel's honor to Millifar and Clan Lin, and started talking about how they'd organize a hunting party 'to take down both deathbringers.'

With Mekel leading it. Of course.

Xxx

"Where are we?" Canderous asked Aemelie now. The man looked like hell, which was better than Mekel felt.

"Hyperspace," his wife told him, and then went on with a story about them following Revan to fight some woman named Jana Novasun. Wasn't the Sith Emperor a man? Mekel couldn't catch all of the discussion that followed—when he'd had the Force it had been easier to understand Mandalorian—but he'd sat there anyway, trying not to wince when Aemelie mentioned his name, and Milli's, and the dead Jedi they'd left behind in that tunnel like so much meat.

Xxx

"There's no time," one of the Mandalorian kids told Mekel when he asked if they shouldn't... do something for the dead. "The Jett'ai died fighting a superior foe. There is no dishonor in that."

There was no time, not for Milli and Leskal, who both needed kolto tanks, and more medical attention that one blank-faced Jedi with glowing hands could provide—especially when he refused to look at Leskal at all.

"What's wrong with him?" Jirgo asked Mekel as the Mandalorians brutally and efficiently stripped a few Jedi corpses and made makeshift litters for Milli and Kex from cortosis robes and a few deactivated rifles. "That Jedi get hit on the head or something?"

Dak had... almost growled when someone tried to separate him from Milli. Had been a long time, but Mekel had seen a few cases of compulsion that deep before. Bandon once compelled one of the prospies to scrub the entire Dreshdai Academy with a toothbrush made from... the man's own pubes. Made more of a mess than he'd cleaned.

"He's compelled."

The Mandalorian just looked at Mekel blankly. Mekel tried not to flinch and pocketed a few lightsabers from the pile Jirgo was making. Yeah, he'd probably decapitate himself trying to use them without the Force for anything more complicated than cutting through metal; but you never knew when that might come in handy.

His father's saber was one of the Force--locked kind. Useless for a null like him. Mekel left it behind.

XXX

"You. Kid." Canderous Ordo's granite eyes focused on Mekel. "Thank you."

"I--I didn't--" why the frack was he protesting? If they were following Revan, they'd be going to Kaas, wouldn't they? Wasn't that where she'd be going to get her husband? Her other husband? If they were going to Kaas, Mekel had to come, right? "I speak Ancient Sith," he added. "If you're going to Dromund Kaas, you'll need me."

"You're Clan," Aemelie interrupted. "Of course we need you."

"You've earned your place," her husband added. His eyes went to Dak Vesser again, who was drooling again. "What's wrong with him?"

"He's basically brain--fried," Mekel told him. "Oerin Lin told him to heal Millifar and so that's all he's gonna do from now on. It's all he can do."

"Hrm." Canderous grunted, his eyes going to the displays above his daughter's head, the med readings all in normal range. (Far as Mekel knew anyway, frack if he was some expert, but in the torture cells on Dreshd' they'd say she was healthy enough for the full course.)

XXX
"Move," Jirgo told Dak again.

The former Sith raised his hand and Jirgo slammed into the nearest wall, before bouncing back up with both guns in his hand--

"Don't!" Mekel felt like a real asshole jumping between them, but he was afraid Jirgo might hit Milli. "Please! He's compelled! He doesn't have a choice!"

"Compelled?" Jirgo squinted, not moving his guns, looking like he was trying to aim a shot around Mekel. Or through.

"The Force. Oerin Lin used the Force on him. He's... he's not all there right now."

"Will he get his brains back?"

"I don't know."

"Dar'jet magic." Jirgo shoved Mekel, pushing him to the side. "Kinder to end it."

"He's still healing her!" Mekel would agree, otherwise. "Wait--"

Xxx

"Thank you, Mekel." Canderous Ordo nodded toward him. "You and the other Korriban kid saved her life."

Oerin Lin saved her. He did something to Dak. I didn't do anything--

"I'm sorry." We fracked it all up. The Jedi had Lin in that trap. If we hadn't broken him free, none of this would have happened. Kex would be alive. My dads would be alive too. "We didn't know. That cage held him--"

"Now we do know." Canderous's expression was unreadable. "When we get the chance, we'll build another cage for that hu'tuun sheb. For now we follow Revan."

"Like tame dewback," Aemelie muttered.

Her husband said something soft to her under his breath and stood up. "Not tame," he growled.

The woman ducked her head, a slight flush on her dark face. "Headwoman Sinae is constructing a prosthesis for Milli--"

Canderous grunted approval. "Show me."

"She's stable." The other headwoman--the one who had been hovering in the background all this time--walked over to them, holding a long tube sealed white. "Best to attach it soon when the nerves are fresh." She tried to push Dak Vesser aside, but the man growled at her.

"Move aside," she commanded him. She reached for his arm--

In the next instant, the headwoman was hurled across the room by what had to be a wave of outflung Force. The crack of her skull against the duraplate wall was as loud as a blaster bolt.

Dak Vesser's hands went back to the hole where Millifar's arm had been, still glowing. Queasily, Mekel started to wonder if he was trying to grow her a new arm. Was that fracking possible?
Canderous stood up, a little awkward in his sleeping robes, and looked at his wife. She nodded and handed him a small needle–nosed blaster from the holster on her hip.

"She's better," Canderous said, cocking the weapon to the side, waving in front of the Jedi's dead eyes. "She doesn't need more healing. You gonna move, kid."

The only response was a low growl.

There was a sharp report, and Dak Vesser fell down, one blaster bolt to the skull. Mekel glanced down, because you never knew, but Ordo hadn't used a stunner. Dak was one poor sheb who wasn't getting up again.

Mandalorians, Mekel was already moving across the room to make sure the headwoman who knew how to attach Millifar's arm wasn't fracking dead now too.

Xxx

"The Aleema jumped to hyperspace." Rew Ekkumi watched High Admiral Rensha's face carefully for clues, careful to keep her own expression blank. "Destination unknown. Chatter from the planet is that a Republic ship crashed in a remote mining area. And that there were casualties."

"Anything more from that mining area?"

Surely, Rensha had been expecting to hear nothing from the planet but panic–did she looked relieved to be wrong? Concerned?

"There was some buzz about traffic along the hyperlanes–otherwise, no."

"The Jedi's refuge was an island," Rensha mused. "Perhaps Darth Nihilus consumed everyone on the one island and then departed. Or perhaps consuming a world takes time. Until we know--"

Until we know if we've killed everyone on the island we should do nothing? It was on the High Admiral's head, not hers, but Rew still felt a slow burn of anger--perhaps guilt. "What about the crew of the Harbinger?" Rew asked.

"No word." Rensha turned back to her datapad, her eyes scaled slits as she scanned it. "There should be soon."

The silence hung between them like the countdown of an explosive charge.

Finally, a console beeped. "Incoming broadcast," Rensha murmured. "From Katarr."

Rew Ekkumi looked over her commander's shoulder at the screen.

"While no formal charges have been filed, the salt farmer Verax Marr's assets are frozen and his actions are currently under constable review. The mysterious deaths of the visiting Jedi are under full planetary investigation, and we are attempting to reach Coruscant for some kind of official statement--"

Death of the visiting Jedi, but not the Miralukans? Still tragic, of course, but a part of Rew breathed a sigh of relief.

"Set a course for Katarr and order the rest of Fleet to follow--cloaked," Rensha barked at her hapless ensign sitting on the tier below them. "And scan all channels to see if there are more broadcasts."
Visas Marr had always wondered what it would be like to be famous, to not be mothering a pack of sibs, to not be studying to be an accountant. She'd even dreamed of a different fate—once or twice—traveling the galaxy, learning the ways of the Force from a Jedi—a man. Only in the dreams, she never saw his face.

But this—this sudden assault of infamy on their family—was never what she'd had in mind.

The local reporters started to arrive on speeders and cutting boats, along with an armed response team composed mainly of Human nulls, each one a patchy scab in the Force. Their uniforms marked them as part of the ruling Governor's Security Force. Visas wasn't surprised to see the outsiders, but so many all in one place gave her a headache.

Dad was all decked out to meet them, wearing his best veil, and making Vizzy corral the smaller kids into their school uniforms, as if this was a formal holiday—and not the day after what could have been the end of the world.

"In your own words," the HoloNet reporter repeated, as Vizzy tried to make Vic stop giggling. "Begin at the beginning."

"The security cams," Dad said. "I got it all on vid!"

Vizzy didn't have to look at the security cams, she'd been there. That Human woman, waving and yelling at the two shadows that had made their house rattle and shake with nothing more than the Force. And that terrible, empty scream that had just…

"left."

She didn't want to remember that terrible silence in the halls of the mining tunnel either, the sounds of that pissing guy's sobs, or that other Jedi—the one with the crazed, blank face, who kept channeling the Force into the unconscious Mandalorian girl like she was some kind of battery. Inside—most sentient looked like a seething mass of energies and emotions in her Force sight. But that Jedi had just looked black—a roiling pit of black. Like there was nothing left.

Now the mic was being shoved in Vizzy's own face. "And you, Miz Marr? What did you think the monster looked like?"

"He just looked like a man." Two men, but one was already dead. In her internal Force sight, he'd just looked like a man—even when the sensors clearly showed him dissolving and reappearing like a ball of mist—and that was perhaps the most terrifying thing of all—that he'd been a ball of mist, but also a man. A Human man. As far as Visas was aware, there were no races in the galaxy who could become incorporeal, not even the legendary shapeshifters, so what—

"The dead Jedi in my mine," her father interrupted. "Who's gonna take responsibility for them? The governor? Are you contacting the Republic?"

"I'm sure the intergalactic networks will pick up the story—but before they get here, can you tell the people of Katarr... again, why you rented your farm to a group of dangerous Force-user—placing our very planet in jeopardy?"

Dad's mouth set in the Force, as dark as a mine itself. "For credits. I got mouths to feed!"

"Who is that woman?" another Miralukan reporter interrupted. "Is it just me or does her light refractions on the vid have a shape like... Revan Starfire?"

"Revan's dead," the reporter from Akarine—a know—it—all who usually just did the morning news, puff pieces about recipes and homeschooling—interjected. "If you ever watched the wideband, Kannis, you'd know already."

"Those light refractions are brown," another reporter commented. "Starfire had red hair, I thought."

"Who was that thing?" Vizzy's dad interrupted. "The Mandalorians said a Sith killed the Jedi. Was that thing that menaced our house Sith?"

"Revan Starfire was Sith," Puff–piece noted.

"Vizzy, I have to pee." Her youngest sister tugged on her arm. "This is boring."

"I'll take you." Visas turned her back on the nest of gagging cacklers and led Vichy back toward the cabin before any horrible accidents could happen.

Through the sky she sensed an incoming ship, descending fast.

"Great!" Dad grumped behind her. "See that? That's a wide–beamer van driving down now. Intergalactic leeches! HoloNet! Soon we'll be infested–worse than the Jedi!"

"You said before, there are dead Jedi–" someone else interrupted. "How many?"

Xxx

Malachor, Arkan's voice whispered. More.

Again, the image of herself on that cliff appeared.

Revan's memory was a dead blank.

Shut up. Her eyes kept fluttering closed. The burns on her legs hurt. She kept talking to Jasp, to keep herself awake, to hear his voice.

I'm so glad you're here, Da. Like that time I almost fell through the ice— "On Yavin Station, you said before. You went there looking for Polla."

Jasp nodded. "Never found her. Just Lords Nihilus and Sion."

"Don't call them that!" Lin. I forgot about Lin. He must still be on Katarr. The Jedi can deal with him. They should do something—

"Those are their names." He sounded puzzled. "Lords Nihilus and Sion."

"Not—it doesn't matter. They don't matter." You don't matter, Arkan. You're just the means to an end.

Malachor. His voice was oddly subdued. That image of the cliff face flashed in her mind again, like some fracked–up message, followed the image of Dar'Revan in the Jedi Temple again, staring blankly at him.

"Moll said Seiran commed her—did I tell you?" Jasp asked. "I call them when I can. Pollie's on Dromund Kaas, and Seiran was going there with the other you to get her out. Did I tell you already?" He glanced at her, almost hopeful. "Will they get her out?"

"We will," she lied. It was hard to meet his eyes. "Y—you… I promise." Da. We'll get them both out. If they're not dead.
"Huh." He snorted.

Revan didn't glance at the comm board, for fear Jasp might try and call Deralia again. Nothing can trace back to Korrie.

Malachor, the voice in her head echoed.

Leave him alone.

Malachor.

Was it better that Arkan seemed to have replaced 'run' and 'food' and 'hungry' with her son's name? It was not. Revan rubbed her eyes. Her stomach rumbled. "What else did Seiran tell Ma-Molla?"

Dar'd need him for a pilot. She'd tell him anything to get her to Kaas. He's probably dead now too, now that she's there.

"Moll said they were on some space station–Peragus, I think. Says she hasn't heard from him since."

So he's dead. Change the subject. "How is… how's Korrie? When you talked to Molla? And Abasen?"

"They were fine, last time I checked. We could call again–" Jasp coughed again. "I–I'd like to."

No. We can't. It's not safe. She fumbled in the cabinet beneath her seat and found a med–cloth. "Here. You need to rest."

Jasp took it from her, wiping his nose with a nod. "Don't nag me, kiddo." His smile hurt as much as a ghost.

"If anyone is monitoring us, they'll find them. If anyone's monitoring them, they'd find us. We can't risk… anything." Revan's eyes went to the planned hyperspace route again. Biscain. Jirulla. Medriaas. Syskulla. Aer'bak'tai. Thule. Ziost. Kaas. Save the last three worlds of the official Sith Empire, most systems were uninhabited.

A certain grim reality was setting in. Davad Arkan could consume all the Force in Sith Space. Then, maybe the Aleema could take him out… but would Revan herself survive the encounter?

And what if he evaded them? Or… worse? The fracking Sith Emperor probably hadn't started out possessing billions of sents either. What he became had… evolved. If Arkan was eating all of that living Force, it stood to reason that he would… grow too.

Malachor, Arkan whispered again. The word sounded real, like a breath in her ear, the whine of a jerrysh–snake before the strike.

"Hungry," Jasp muttered.

"I am your master," she said out loud. Maybe to them both. She didn't feel like it. She didn't like the feeling.

"Follow," Jasp muttered. "We're coming out soon, Pollie. You want to steer her?"

Revan had felt this grim fatality before. On the Leviathan, and with everything that had happened leading to Malak's death. When Malak's death had become her sole purpose.
Was that what she'd felt before? How Dar had felt when she–

Malachor.

Leave him alone!

"My lord used to make more sense," Polla's father offered. "You want to steer her?"

"We should give this ship a name," she drawled, trying to match his accent. It had seemed so easy once. "This crate of bolts. Give her a name. It's lucky."

"Sure." The way his hands moved on the board, Revan wasn't sure if Jasp heard her at all first. Until he spoke again. "Naming a ship's a powerful thing, kiddo. What was your mother's name?"

"Mol–" her traitorous jaw clamped down too late. Her mind went blank.

"Oh!" He turned to look at her, eyes suddenly focusing. They were kind. The color brown she remembered in the mirror–but faded and bloodshot now, the whites yellowed. "I meant your mother. Your real one."

"I don't know." Dar said she'd tell me about her once. But she never did. I never asked. All those times that I could have asked–

"You don't–" He leaned over the bar separating their seats and pulled her to him suddenly, close enough she could smell the rot in his breath, feel the delicate bones of his shoulders. "It's okay. Can't call her after Mollie because–"

"Bad luck. She's alive. I know." Molla's name had just slipped out.

He'd been tall and strong once. He'd been a giant to the real Polla. A hero. Now Jasp felt like Revan could crush him with a breath.

"We could call her Mita, if you like, Pollie." His arms were slack and trembling, but they wouldn't let go of her.

Auntie Mita said Organa women were like flowers, she said– "Call her Jopheena. She was kind to me. Or–or Dancerto, after Polla's ship. I don't… it was a foolish idea, naming her anything." Call her Bastila. Call her Juhani. Call her Mission.

"Jopheena." Jasp pulled back, scanning her face. "It's a good name. Was that the name of your master?"

"Not mine." The images from Arkan's memories danced in the back of her mind. That old woman, skulking in the shadows. At least she's gone now. Lin and Arkan took care of her.

"My master had too many names."

Malachor. Arkan again, nudging her. Always that word.

"I'll give you Malachor," Revan muttered. "Just leave my son alone, Arkan. Leave him alone and you can eat every one of those miserable fracking Sith–"

"Language!" Jasp coughed, so much it rattled his frame. "Are you gonna steer her out of hyperspace or not, Pollie? You always liked that part."

XXX
Millifar Ordo awoke to familiar faces: her father, looking drawn and furious; Mekel Jin, standing next to him. And Headwoman Sinae of Zal, who was a skilled healer and medix, hovered in the back, with a purpling bruise on her temple and a kolto pack on her head.

That was all rather strange, but for a moment, everything was fine. She felt as if she was waking from a long, dearly-needed sleep. She felt uncommonly refreshed. Millifar tried to sit up, but one of her arms wasn't responding, and the gesture slumped her forward. Her left hand shot out to stop herself from tilting over—but there was nothing—

No left hand there. No arm. Nothing, when she glanced down, but a bandaged place above the support for her breasts, covering a place where her arm was supposed to be.

"The prosthesis." Sinae stepped forward, holding a white metal tube. "Now that you're awake we can reattach the nerves."

"I'm pleased you're recovering," her father said gruffly, pushing past the headwoman. He planted a rough kiss on her forehead like she was a stripling again before stepping back, head properly down.

"Are you okay?" Mekel Jin asked. He didn't look like he was. Half of his hair was sticking up and his face looked rough and unshaven. "Do you feel—"

"I feel fine." She frowned down at the arm again, trying to spark the memories that would inform her of how this unfortunate mutilation had occurred. "Was I unconscious for long?" The faint hum in the background told her they were back aboard the Aleema. Aemelie was standing by the doorway, her eyes further registered. They hadn't been on the Aleema before, they had–

"When did you get here?" she asked Mekel.

"I—I came when you," he frowned. "You were dy—"

"You're better," her father interrupted. "You fought well."

"I fought…." Her mind was oddly blank. And someone was missing. Someone she'd grown rather accustomed to seeing, even if his courtship was futile and sad. "Where's Kex?"

Her father shook his head slowly.

"Oh. Was it…" her voice trailed off, still with that irritatingly blank space. She should remember something of the battle. Obviously, they had been in battle. Katarr. We were on Katarr. We were on Katarr and—

"Did we win?" she asked, to cover her confusion.

"We will," Aemelie assured her from the door.

XXX

Malachor.

"You were telling me a story about your deep, dark past before." Revan tried to change the subject, take both their minds away from the scream behind them. "What happened after the war?"

"I married your—I married Moll. We had her… Pollie." Jasp shrugged. "Guess you know most of that."

The monster behind them was proof enough that Revan wasn't Polla Organa—just in case she forgot. Still, she remembered sitting like this. This was the man who had taught her to fly—given Polla Organa the stars—

Xxx

"That one, Pollie. Always punch in your final destination first—then mess with your details. Auto-pilot'll calculate the route regardless, but our real art's in the margins. Look." Jasp pulled up the Perelman Spire on his old ship's primitive RGB screen. "See how she's marking through Kessel like a sack of tomatoes? What would you do to shave off a day there?"

"You could run straight through here, slingshot off the moon of this gas giant, if it has enough pull?" Her hand traced the route.

"Show me." Her father beamed as Polla stood up and went to the navboard, clipping off angles from the velocities based on the gravitational pulls of the planets in that system versus the star they orbited.

"Good," he beamed. "Course, you gotta understand, no system's Sec team is gonna let you run through off their hyperlanes with no inspections, no taxes, no tariffs on an off-system product—"

"I know, Da." Polla laughed and glanced back at their audience, the half-naked hulk of a man in the kolto tank and the injured Jedi with his arm in a sling, both of them watching silently, and not at all giving her the creeps even if—

Wait. That's not right. That's wrong.

Polla laughed. "Don't worry. I have this. I'll fly the ship." Before anyone could protest, she turned and bent over the navboard—

The galaxy shifted.

It was wrong of Davad to admire her supple form bending over the navboard at a time like this, but they'd jumped out of hyperspace straight into a cloaked Mandalorian ambush, and if they were going to be atomized, he wanted one last good memory.

"Let me." Davad stepped forward, glancing down at the board, too many lights flashing red.

Behind them, Malak made another frustrated groan from the bacta tank where he bobbed half-submerged, courtesy of the Mandalorian basilisk that had sprayed half their base with xoxon mist, before Dodonna had called the evac order.

"You only have one good hand, Davad." Revan turned a dial—to adjust the stabilizers, perhaps was her intention.

Their ship's engine lurched, and what remained of breakfast almost came up in Davad's throat.

"Not like that!" Malak's anguished scream from behind them. "Davad! Don't let her fly the ship!"

How was he supposed to stop her? Davad gentled his voice. "Revan." The pain in his shattered arm didn't lessen, but a warm feeling courséd through Davad's veins as he reached for her hand with his unbroken, clumsy left, pulling it away from the dial.

"Knight Arkan's still twice the pilot you are," Malak said from somewhere behind them. "Even with one hand. Let him fly the blasted ship!"
Davad's hand closed over hers on the yoke. Revan looked up at him, startled, as if she'd felt the same spark as their hands touched–

"Let me fly, Revan," he murmured. "If you do it, we'll probably crash into a sun–"

Xxx

I get it, Revan thought acidly at the mad Sith in her head. I know I'm a terrible pilot. I know Dar'Revan was a terrible pilot. Why are you showing me this? Why are you gatecrashing my memories?

The answer came again: that same blasted word. Malachor.

"He's hungry," Jasp said. His nose was bleeding. In front of him, their slingshot through the Biscain system was neatly mapped, like a flock of migrating orrigeez outlined in blue. "It's good. We're going to see Pollie again. Soon."

Malachor. The word was hungry. Her own stomach growled again, and Revan reached for another nutrabar, trying to find her way back to polite fracking conversation.

"It's good she's not Force-sensitive, Polla and Carth aren't Force-sensitive. Seiran–" If any of them are still alive. Will Carth still love me if I have a monster eat his son? If he watches me destroy an empire?

Does it matter?

"Seiran Wen tested for it," Jasp said. "The Force. I don't know if you remember–"

"Sure," Revan lied. They'd been in the same class, but Revan only remembered Polla's test—such as it was: two minutes in a room with some robed old guy, being asked to guess some cards behind a screen. Had he been a Jedi? Why did Deralia test its kids in the first place? "So… Seiran has it. We'll have to keep him clear of Nihilus."

The man's already dead. You know this. For some reason, she thought of the way Abasen's fingers closed around her thumb, the way his eyes kept looking at her—dark and almost angry—as if he knew she was the reason his ma wasn't there.

The clean jumpsuit felt smooth and cool on her abraded skin. The kolto pack on her leg itched. The controls on the navboard blurred and their next jump point, superimposed in holographic glory in front of them, nudged a memory–

Xxx

"One load of spice." Polla kicked one of the crates over. In the vids, it would have popped open, revealing its smuggled cargo to her lying cheat of a boyfriend. In real life, her toe hurt. "Ow! You said one crate of spice."

Therion D'Cainen had that cocksure smile that said he knew she was staring at his bare chest. "You said it was fine when we left Byss."

"You said it had tax stamps already. You said, even if it wasn't strictly by-the-books it was one crate!" Polla felt her voice rise. "There's at least ten crates back here, Joyride, and I don't know if you've heard, but they have some ban against weapons exports now too, so that deal we set up with Suvam is fracked. The fracking war–"
"It's just another war, come here." He grabbed her arm. He smelled like engine oil and leather, and healthy male sweat—and he kissed her over and over until she was weak-kneed and stupid.

"You know you want me." He was too smug by half, but she did—that was the damnable truth of it—she did want—

The galaxy twisted again, bathed in gold and red fire.

"Yes." Her voice was a whisper in his ear, the bite of her small teeth was silken pain. "Yes."

Her eyes were yellow slits, gleaming in the half-dark that hid the cream of her flesh beneath his body, that soft of her, the cold stone under his palms on the floor of the Rakatan Temple. "Do it now—"

The thrust was like coming home, a blaze of light, an endless spark against the cold, a light in the Dark. The two of them locked like drexl in flight—flying, mating, falling—

Xxx

"Revan?" The sight of Jasp's gray face, furrowed with worry was like a shock of cold water, slamming Revan back into her own mind, into the present.

Malachor, the voice murmured in her head.

What the frack was that? Her skin felt hot and Revan had the uneasy feeling that she was blushing. What the frack was that? Don't do that again!

"Revan? We're coming out of hyperspace soon. You... are you okay?" Polla's father touched her arm, and Revan jerked away from him, skin still crawling from that vision.

"I'm banned from Biscain," she muttered. "I mean she--Polla is banned from Biscain. She ever tell you about that? There was--it was a spice run. It--she got tricked--the spice had kanna mites and it was worthless."

"No." Jasp laughed, but it turned into a cough. "No matter, we'll be in and out before they know it. Just keep sharp." His skin was too pale, and his life in the Force felt dull and faded.

"It's her that's banned." She tried to make a laugh. "Not us, Jasp. Are you--are you okay?" She handed him the cloth to dab his nose again.

Malachor.

"Your nose is bleeding too." He coughed again awkwardly, gesturing to her, and Revan put her hand to her face, startled to find it true.

"Cabin pressure--?" But all the lights were gold on the board. Everything looked normal.

"Sometimes he doesn't know his own strength." Jasp coughed again. "He can't always talk but he shows... is he showing you things?"

She willed herself not to blush. "He's showing too fracking much."

Xxx

"Do you kids want anything else?" Layran's mother fussed a lot, Kore thought. Now she was standing in the doorway smiling at them, even if she'd already put the plate of cookies down. Moll—
Ma would have made Kore fetch them himself from the tetra-wave. "Fizz-pop, Lema-ice?"

"We're good, Ma!" Layran sprawled out in one chair and Kore was in the other. "Just gonna watch the Biscain Hundred now. See what's what."

"The gold heats start soon," Miz Lee said, clapping twice to turn on their holoscreen. "I'd watch myself, but I promised Kira I'd help her with her test prep for Smuggler's Academy."

"Bye," Rannie told her, making a waving gesture with his hand. "You like the screen?" he added to Kore as his mother left them. "It's got quad-diodes for the widebeam!"

"Yeah, you said before." Kore smiled at him, and reached for a cookie.

Layran was really proud of that screen, and Kore had decided it was probably mean to tell him that the rezz was bad and it looked old, like a holoscreen from one of the old vids he'd seen about the workers in the Coru Underground.

"Did that guy ever come back?" Layran asked Kore when Miz Lee was out of ear-hollering distance.

"The guy from yesterday?" Kore crossed his legs, leaning back in the seat. "Nope."

"You sure he wasn't a Jedi–Sith?"

Since they're not real, yes. You dope. But friends were nice to have. And Rannie and Pollanne and Jesp had got Korrie’s six yesterday. That meant he owed them. "Yeah," Kore said. "I have the Force, remember? He wasn't in it."

That wasn't totally true. It was more like, it felt like the guy had been cut out of it. Like Mother felt a little, when she was hiding.

"Show me something," Rannie asked.

"Huh?"

"With the Force."

"Not now." Don't show off. Mother had warned him. Both mothers had warned him.

"And now…" the announcer on the screen began. "First of our gold heats is up! Anything goes with these ships—and, as you can see—we've got a wide range of contenders!"

"Corellian disc ships," Kore noted. Like the Ebon Hawk. "Sure are a lot of them."

"They got popular because of whatshername." Rannie helped himself to a cookie. "You know about Moll Organa and whatshername, right? Guess that's why they got you from Nar—cause whatshername killed their kid."

"Revan. And she did not." He bit his lip.

"My cousin Sispo says she did. " Rannie looked like he was trying to look crafty now. "Rev–ANN. That's how it's pronounced. You say it funny."

"I do not." Kore told himself it didn't matter. "Look." Grandfather always said most sentients were easily distracted by trivial wonders. A few dropped credits, a free light-show. Kore levitated a cookie, focusing to keep it in the air. "The Force. See?"
"Wow." Rannie's mouth dropped open. "All I ever did was guess cards behind a scree–"

"And they're off!" the announcer proclaimed.

XXX

"You can't let Nihilus eat Seiran if we get there. Pollie… Pollie wouldn't have it." Jasp sounded worried.

"I won't. If I can stop him. They're probably already dead. Revan needed to change the subject. "Tell me about the war. You were starting to tell me before–"

"Not much to tell. Didn't like our orders, so me and my squad quit the war." Jasp Organa cleared his throat. "I mean it. You have to bring Pollie and Seiran both back. Molla… she needs them both, even if his own family's not worth a damn. And Abasen needs two parents."

And you. They need you.

But Polla's father was coughing again, and the sinking feeling in the Force eddied around him; dark–edged, strangely gray.

Malachor. The monster's thoughts broke through.

Shut up, she thought at Arkan. His need was like a hole in the Force, a nightmare that she couldn't wake from. I'll give you food. I promised, didn't I?

"Tell me," she told Jasp, trying not to shiver. Even though it wasn't her own hunger, she crammed another nutra bar in her mouth, trying to breathe. "Tell me the rest about the war. You're right. I should know about it, but I don't. So tell me. You said… before. You were stationed at Kemplex Station?"

Polla's da nodded slowly, leaning over the navboard and bringing up another map–this one a three–dimensional trail of jump points, terminating in a blaze of white light. "They left us there, sent most everyone else to Coruscant. Rumor was, the Krath were gonna hit Coru again. They'd already played that game once–sent us to Kemplex when Coruscant got hit instead… but this time, the Krath hit Kemplex. Looked like a thousand ships to our thirty. We had no choice but to run, hope they'd peel off and leave the station alone–"

"You had no choice," she echoed, even as her mind noted the obvious.

Blow the station, everything in the system that could be of strategic value. Leave nothing but stars. Give them no targets, and there is no victory.

Malachor, the voice in her mind whispered–and this time she heard screaming. The deaths of so many–what he had showed her before.

Malachor. Not my son. The place.

How many billions in the Sith Empire? There will be more death than Malachor. The screams will be louder–

"Jedi brought reinforcements," he added. "Too late. They left us scrambling through the space lanes to get there in time to help. We ran escort to them–thought they'd try and evacuate the station but they… didn't."
Revan stared at the cluster of stars mapped in front of them, overlaying the hyperspace blur. Cron implosion. It took over a year for the light to reach the Jedi Enclave on Ossus. Someone had told her some of this before. "They died." She nodded. "I think I… I've heard this story before." They died. Everyone on the station, everyone in the system–uninhabited, but all those ships. The entire Krath Fleet. It was like–

Malachor.

She twisted her head back, uneasy at the coincidence.

Malachor, Arkan repeated. As it if was not a coincidence.

Polla's father was still talking. "Aleema Sato—that Dark Lady, or however she styled herself–she had some kind of superweapon. We flew escort, got Jedi there soon as we could–but that one girl—the Jedi Miracle–she did something. That's what the rumor said. I wasn't on the Jedi ship. But they left us with orders to stop anything from leaving the sector—"

"Even the Republic ships—"

"Anyone." His voice darkened. "Whatever happened out there, they didn't want anyone to know."

The destruction of the Ossus System is what happened, Revan's mind supplied. The Cron cluster implosion. Aleema Sato's ship set off some kind of chain reaction that took out the Cron cluster and half its neighboring systems within the year. The Cluster was uninhabited, except for Kemplex IX station, except for the troops who were stationed there—

"Which Jedi girl?" For some reason she thought of Arren Kae–of Vima Sunrider.

"You know." He shot her a puzzled look. "Pollie used to watch the cartoon. Nomi. Nomi Sunrider. What ever happened to her?"

"I don't know." Revan frowned, wondering why that was.

Xxx

The circular table held chairs, empty except for one, but each place setting had a holotransmitter, and the senior officers of the Republic Fleet all stared, flickering and blue, at their High Admiral. The woman they had followed loyally for the good of the Republic… at least this far.

Not much farther, that woman thought. The signs were everywhere: from Cein's inattention, to Ubuta's glare. The strange passivity of Admiral Ekkumi, the glaring, nearly open defiance of General Sand.

Together, they all watched the footage from the Katarr local broadcast again: the woman throwing her saber at the two shadowed figures by the simple hut. The severed arm falling, the shadows flanking, the desperate sprint–

"That was Revan." Rensha's tongue darted out, tasting stale air and the dull roar of hyperspace. "You all see–there is no doubt. Revan led the Force–eater away from the Miralukans, into the sea–and less than an hour later, two small craft entered hyperspace above the planet." She paused. "Hours later, according to the local government, the cloaked Mandalorian ship Aleema also left orbit."

"It appeared to be her." Admiral Cein's holo–image looked grim. They all did, all of her admirals and generals–superimposed in the conference room like a row of cowardly executioners, daring to pronounce judgment on Rensha—when all of them had agreed—and any one of them would have done the same thing.

But we are military, and there is always someone who has to fall on the blade.

"It was her," Rensha repeated. "Did Arkan consume her? Perhaps Revan Starfire's sacrifice was enough for him to leave the planet."

"The reports say there are Jedi deaths—but nothing like we… expected." Rew Ekkumi was the only officer here in person, sitting in a chair while Rensha stood. It was an inversion of order, but in these times, it scarcely mattered. This was not her tribunal—that could still come later—but it had the air of one.

Any one of you would have done the same—she slicked her tongue back, and relaxed her jaw.

"There was also a mass exodus of small craft from the Jedi's location in the hours leading up to… that." Rensha pointed her primary claw at the screen. "Were they forewarned? Did they evacuate?"

"Should we try and arrange another demise for the remaining Jedi? Hire mercenaries to hunt them down?" General Ubata was a hypocrite—he had stood with them before. Or was that sarcasm? Mon Calamari were so difficult to read, especially over holo-transmission.

"About those Jedi…" General Sand's voice trailed off. "Master Atris is calling a press conference from the Telos orbital. Something about appointing herself head of the new Jedi Council?"

"Then the Councilmembers must be deceased," Ubata said. "They sense each other's passing in the Force. I saw it many times in the wars."

"The citizens of Katarr are safe," Rensha folded her talons, willing her scales to stay flat against her skull. "For that, we are all thankful. Casualties can't be large, or there would be more reports, yes?"

"There are a few wondering why the Republic Fleet left at all," Admiral Cein said. "And the Senate is requesting a private report, before we give any public statements."

Those same words had been sent to Rensha as well. She was still trying to decide what to do.

Any one of you would have done the same. The Jedi promised us Darth Malak would be destroyed, and we all saw the footage he was not. Now, with any luck that Force-eating Sith is gone toward Imperial space. If the Hunt-Goddess is kind, we stand upon the precipice of victory.

My victory. Mine. If I must sacrifice my rank to see it, it still becomes my prize—

"The Mandalorian ship could have been captured by the Sith Lords Nihilus and Sion," Rensha posited to the group, trying to regain control. "The next jump point on the way to Dromund Kaas is Biscain—is it not?" Rhetorical question: as soon as the Fleet had received the coordinates from House Racharn she had memorized each one—as simple a task as counting the points on a youngling's first skin—markings back on Trandoshas.

There was a long pause, as if none of them still thought it was required to show her deference.

"Yes," Ekkumi said finally.

Yes, High Admiral Rensha. "Then you go," Rensha ordered her. "Go to Biscain immediately. And from there, continue along their route until you find them. I have a small cruiser in my hangar that is faster than most of the Mandalorian Fleet."

Probably. Not than the Aleema. Nothing we have is faster than that cursed Sith invention—

"The Sith may take an incursion into their territory as a sign of war—" General Sand protested.

"Go cloaked. And they are Sith," Rensha hissed. "Of course we are at war. Are there any objections?"

"Not yet." Cein murmured.

"I'll go," Admiral Rew Ekkumi agreed. But she was staring at Cein, and not Rensha when she said it.

XXX

"Three, two, one." Jasp coughed and smiled as he released the Jopheena's lever, winding their hyperdrive down gently, each of its couplings purring. "There. Here we are–Biscain System. Ain't it a beauty?"

On the screen in front of them stars had blurred back into existence, lines snapping suddenly into crystalline clarity revealing several flotillas of ships, lazy, orbital observers, the sleek brights of the racers waiting for their heat, media satellites, and a series of flat reflectors positioned in an orbit around their jump point.

The space in front of them was further demarcated by a rectangular array, lined with blinking flashing lights.

"Unknown vessels!" someone broke into their comm channels. "You are entering restricted airspace. Please proceed to eleven–oh–niner, in your epsilon quadrant for inspection. Biscain airspace is closed for the next three days, which you should know since it's on transmit on every HoloNet around here—"

Hells! "Frack," Revan muttered out loud.

"Language—" Polla's da warned.

Biscain system had one binary star, its orbs clustered closer together than most, and a dense internal web of asteroids, which made the system's bi–annual race fun–or a death run, depending on who you asked.

Therion used to brag that he could've been a contender on the Biscain Hundred, but Polla had always preferred credits to cheap thrills.

Or I was smart. She–she was smart? No. Not so fracking smart if her big plan was to pretend to be me.

The route for the race was marked automatically on their screens in flashing red, showing they weren't carrying the transmitter to run it. The interdictor fields surrounding them pinged alarms, warning that any ship trying to enter hyperspace on this end of the system would be ripped back into the satellites mirroring its signal.

"Unknown vessel—" the locals began again. "You will move immediately to epsilon—"
"I've got this," Revan told Jasp, reaching for the comm. "I'll tell them we're in distress and need a military escort. While they're trying to figure out what's wrong, we'll gun--"

Polla's old man thumbed open the throttle, running straight at the guardian cruisers in front of them.

"The hell?" Her voice sounded like a squawk in her own ears. "D–wha–what the hell are you doing?"

"Talk to BisSec? Don't be a kidder, Pollie." His hand moved the yoke and they shot forward like a thranta out of hell–faster than Revan had thought the ship could move, that ticking lurch behind them proof that Arkan was still pinned to their tail.

Malachor, Arkan added, as if she'd forgot.

"Gonna be close..." Jasp began punching their main cannon hard on the rectangular shield barrier in front of them, his plasma battery glancing uselessly off the BisSec barrier.

It's a shield. Why the frack would you shoot straight at it?

She was still gaping stupidly when five red bogeys coming in from three lit the screen.

"Incoming!" Jasp nudged Revan's elbow. "Pollie! Niner!"

Revan's hand closed on the trigger control, as her feet scrambled to find the valve that would let her seat swing free–

Xxx

"They're just drones, Pollie. Unmanned. Shoot em down." Her da was busy trying to land their tub through the windstorm as Polla swiveled her turret controllers to light up the targets in front of her. "You don't think I'd take you here to practice on live–"

The galaxy twisted.

"–ones. Look sharp, robes!" Corporal Okkina had shared Davad's tent for a week in training, but she was all business in the skies, pacing the length of Dodonna's Winged Victory like an avenging wraid, hovering over their station as if they answered to her.

"There." Revan sounded almost bored, pointing at the screen in front of them. "Their main forces will come from behind that star, they're cloaked, but they're also using its radiation to mask the signal from you while they get the rest of their squads space–borne–"

Davad was still trying to sort through the life screaming on their own capital ship, the radiance of her very presence, but Revan had automatically known from whence came their greatest threat–"

"Good." Okkina nodded. "We'll send them to hell–"

Xxx

"Get your array up!" Jasp barked at her. "Revan! What are you doing? Now's not the time for space dreams!"

"I–" The present slammed back with a lurch as their shields activated. "I'm here, D–I'm here."

"You'd better be! Those other ships are gonna try and flank our tail, ram us into that shield gennie ahead, but we gotta grab its frequency, watch their incoming—they modulate their own guns not to burn it—once we have it we can slip through—"

Revan didn't have time to hear more, she was hammering at the trigger of the Jopheena's rear guns like crazy as Polla's crazy da kept slamming bolts on the shield in front of them with their ion cannon.

On the display, the close–in laser turrets she controlled spat red fire at the BisSec drones closing in on them. Given a few minutes barrage, she'd have them—as long as the auto–target kept working.
But any security system worth its creds would have better guns, tractor beams—maybe even a stasis well to stop this kind of assault.

Polla and Therion hadn't made it off the planet last time she'd been here, but she'd seen enough of BisSec to know how fracking well–funded they were, this was fracking insane–

"Pollie! Look sharp!" Jasp's hand grabbed the trigger control from her, and twisted it sharply to the right, bringing her display aft just in time to show another line of incoming security drones. He fired a round that took out two before going back to spinning their ship in a dive, sending Revan's stomach to the bottom of her toes.

"Thought you said we were going to come in quiet." His pulse was too fast in the Force, too rapid and thready, but adrenaline had reddened his face, put grace in his movements. She didn't have time to look over their course or correct him for calling her Pollie. In addition to the drones, BisSec was now launching what looked like a targeted missile barrage on their ass. Lethal.

In the space of a few blinks they'd somehow gone from trespassers to hostiles. It… reminded her of one of the stunts she'd pulled on Tatooine, with those fracking hunters–

Now I know where Polla Organa gets it from.

Malachor! Behind them, Arkan whispered only that one word… but as Revan watched her viewscreen, the missiles glanced off the side of the Pinion, and slid off–course, colliding into one another in a white–hot clout of energy.

"Unknown vessels. This is your last–"

Revan's head slammed back into the brace of her seat as Jasp sent them into a steep climb, somehow slipping around the BisSec shield, with a maneuver too deft for her to have any idea how the hell he'd done it.

There was no time to ask, because now Jasp Organa's course had them immediately thick in the asteroids—a shifting morass of random death, further complicated by the camera drones, the bright flashes of weapons fire from the guards they'd left in their ion wake.

The Pinion hung on doggedly to their tail, a stubborn blot on their displays.

"It's gonna get rocky," Jasp quipped, maneuvering them through the belt, with the precision of a machine. His hands trembled on the controls, but the grim smile on his face was achingly familiar.

Oh, Da. A part of Revan rolled her eyes. Another part wanted to cry. "Tell me what to do now."

His voice creaked with surprise, rattling that cough in his lungs. "Don't you know?"

"No, I don't know how the hell you're doing—"
Divert the power to the shields in back until we're drifting in, then spike the front turbines. Watch for bogeys—anything bigger than a ten will ding the hull. Best avoid, or shoot em. Use the close-in guns again. They're slow, but they slice. Keep an eye on Jasp, I don't like his color—

That voice. Her own thoughts. Right or wrong—but determined.

"I'm not sure."

"Doubt is for politicians and prayers, Pollie. I told you that." He coughed. "You know what's what."

_Doubt is for amnesiac Sith Lords_, she thought blackly. _Dar wouldn't have any doubt right now. She'd do whatever she wanted—even if it was fracking wrong—_

Divert the power to the shields in back–

One of her hands steadied on the trigger control, as Revan set the parameters on the dial to flag anything bigger than nine on their screens, strengthening the shields in back. The viewscreen ahead was littered with ash and dust—sweep from the racers that had already crossed this territory. It was also, thankfully, clear for now.

Red race beacons blinked angrily at them, lighting the path.

"Unknown vessel! You are trespassing on a registered event sponsored by the Merchant's Guild. Further interference will result—"

Revan leaned over and cut the comm. "I guess we don't need to know they're not happy." On the display in front of them, the path Jasp had plotted deviated from the racer's route. That nagged at her, something about it was… off. Something was wrong. "That's a steep dip you put in there, Da." The numbers bugged her. They were reassuringly green—signifying safety—but they were high, they were too high. Temperature, rads, the ratio with their shields–

_I'm no pilot and he is. He must know what he's doing._

"We need the speed," he said. "I might black out, Pollie, but you're tough." He glanced at her sideways. "Your kind… you're tough. Only one ship made it out of the Kemplex System that day, and it was hers. Nomi Sunrider's. We watched them come out of that star when space was on fire. If she can do that—"

Revan tried to laugh. "Believe it or not, I'm no Nomi._ Neither was Bastila Shan, poor kid._

"And I saw you fall from the sky. This is nothing. Just a quick burn—you… you've got it."

"But you're not… tough, Da." _The escape pod._ But it was already too late. "Da! You're not tough." She glanced toward the back of the ship. He'd programmed in the coordinates all the way to Kaas—if it wasn't for the asteroids and the weapons fire at their backs this would be a safe place to leave him—but as it was–

"Promise you'll bring them back to Moll. Polla and Seiran." His fingers punched the coordinates, sending them into the run before she could respond.

"Don't—" Her senses were suddenly flooded with a sense of danger, menace—blind, implacable—Revan shot out her hand and a large meteor on their screen went spinning off milliseconds before it hit their shield. Behind them, she felt Arkan's energy—like a thrum in the Force—a wave of darkness, rippling out and over them–
"It's gone, Mama!" The little girl tugged at her mother's sleeve. "That bad ship they were chasing! It's gone!"

"—vanished from our sensors. What was that, Kyomak?"

"I'm not sure Blankaff, but it looked like some kind of stealth ship attached to a navy snubfighter."

"I thought they banned militaries from this competition! Ever since the Jordo upset three years ago!"

"They did. But I'm not sure what that was we're seeing—"

"That was an Aurek-class ship! Attached to a Sith tracker—" A new voice broke in, but Meetra had already stopped listening. She knew what both ships were—just like she knew those grappling missiles hadn't just flown off course. Not luck. Just because she couldn't feel the Force, didn't mean she had lost her ability to think. Or to see.

"The black ship attached itself to the Republic Aurek's ion trail," she told the wide-eyed little girl and her mother, still standing in the rapidly-emptying observatory. "The Mandalorians theorized such tech was possible, but I don't think any of them got built until Revan stepped in with her Sith factories. The black ship is definitely Sith-designed. Have you seen the vids about her Star Forge? I have. I've watched them several times—"

"Is that why you have a star on your face?" the little girl interrupted her.

"Yes," Meetra told her, although, of course it was not.

"We've got to go, Gramercee." The woman tugged at her daughter's arm.

There were no coincidences, were there? The old woman had said that to Meetra the day she'd come to Balmorra and taken Meetra away from hell and brought her to Jedi paradise.

Paradise is a lie.

"Did they blow up?" The girl was wide-eyed, her mother furious, trying to shoo her away. "Did those two ships blow up?"

"I need to go." Suddenly, Meetra felt too conspicuous, too raw and exposed. She still wasn't used to crowds, and the gravity hurt her bones. Perhaps she shouldn't have come, but she'd had an idea—a germ of one—that in a galaxy where the Glorious Revolution at home had dimmed to an ember, she might find funding and fulfillment by wagering on the high-stakes Biscain Hundred. Or, failing that, pick up some work as an enforcer for the Exchange… there were several job booths in the main lobby of her hotel on the orbital.

Until she could get to Revan, it was something to do.

Meetra Surik joined the exodus of onlookers from the viewscreen, trying not to flinch at the press of so many sentients, so close that their voices all began to blur together into one long scream—

"There! It's back!" Rannie was hunched forward in his chair, all of Kore's Force tricks forgotten
now. "That ship! It blipped out and now it's back!"

"They used cloaking tech," Korrie crossed his arms behind his back. This was kind of fun. "Isn't it cheating to cloak if you're in a race?"

"That wasn't a cloaking device." Layran rolled his eyes. "We studied them in physics last year. Cloaks don't work like that–was cloud covering them maybe. If it'd been a cloak they'd have just gone away all at once."

"Yeah, well I studied too, and there's nothing else that can hide a ship from sensors–" Kore broke off because that probably wasn't true. One thing Grandfather had always said was that there were no absolutes.

"The ship's back now." Rannie frowned at the screen. "Why's it got that black triangle–thing hanging off its ass?"

"Because it's two ships. One's a Republic snub. Aurek-class. They're fast, and good shooters, but kinda ugly. That thing on its tail is…" Kore frowned, because whatever it was kept flickering, like it wasn't there at all. And now both ships were flickering, as they seemed to be diving straight toward the binary stars instead of following the racing markers–so they were cutting ahead of a bunch of other ships.

"That thing on its tail is a Sith Imperial Pinion-class interdictor! " Kore felt like a dolt, not realizing it earlier. "My fa–my da sent me a model of one. It wasn't a toy–it was like a pre–production, special–crafted–"

"Yeah, right." Rannie snorted. "Your Da's some kind of tech?" He squinted at the screen. "Anyway, big deal. Nyla, down at the shipyards, she has one of those Pinion-class ships cause she used to be a Sith?" He glanced at Kore. "Don't tell anyone that last part, it's a secret."

"I'm good at secrets." Kore frowned. And then… then he started to get worried. Because Mother had flown away in a ship from Nyla Nadua's spaceyard that had looked very much like the Sith Imperial Pinion-class interdictor that was currently flying off–course, following the larger ship straight at one of the suns.

He'd say it was a coincidence except Master Croi in the Jedi Temple had said the Force didn't have any.

Xxx

Black spots danced in her vision as the gees slammed Revan back against her chair. Her breath seemed to freeze in her lungs and the world moved forward in flashes. It took effort to turn her head, they were diving so deep; effort to lift her hand and put it over Jasp's cold one. If he had a pulse, she couldn't tell–the world was nothing but a rapidly–increasing scream–

Malachor. Arkan's voice again. That want–the need in her mind–

Not Korrie.

Yes. I'll give you Malachor , she thought. A thousand times over. All the damn Malachors you want–just get us through this–

She felt, more than saw, the Force envelop their ships like a black tide–her strength and Arkan's combined–plowing both ships through the asteroid field as if it was water.
Her black robes were a bitter cliché, as much as his grovel before her was: he, a prince of Onderon, kneeling before the daughter of an exiled Jedi rebel, the stock of Hothan peasants.

Revan moved from the viewscreen, and Davad saw that her eyes had turned—from the green of life to the color of twin suns, yellow and hard, blazing like the birth of the galaxy itself.

The power in her… it surpassed anything Arren Kae had ever possessed.

Her voice was hoarse, a harsh whisper, as if she'd died screaming with the rest of them too. "Get up, Arkan. We're alone. You don't need to impress me like some groveling worm."

But I do. My master commanded it. He would have laughed, had it been possible. "I came back, Master. I came back for you."

The twist of her mouth downward, the drop of those red lashes was a weakness, a hesitation. "I would have warned you—"

"If you had, I would have deserted." A lie. His true master would never have permitted it. "All that life on Onderon, I can't go back there. I want to serve you. It's what I always… always wanted."

The truth. My master gives me what I've always wanted. I saved her life and she's given me you—

"Why?" Revan took a deep breath. Those yellow eyes clashed with the freckles on her nose, the spacer's tan of her skin. How long had Fleet kept her on ships, squandered away from the ground and life like some grafted zirlla orchid? Davad would have given her a drexl's egg and a kingdom, seen her with mud on her feet and leaves in her hair.

"Because." He stood, approaching her. The bells rang in his hair. Her hand reached out and closed on his arm, fingers hard enough to bruise. The pain was momentary, forgotten when she stepped closer, her body brushing against his. The war had left them both hard and lean, and her hipbone dug into his side as the Force flared between them, igniting like a spark—

"Because," he whispered, softer still.

Her mouth was hungry and soft—tentative at first, but opening under his touch, becoming wet, insistent. Everything he'd imagined. Her mouth was warm under his.

It was a relief to be in a place beyond regret.

The path ahead of him was simple. Follow her. Obey his master. Use the strength that had been given to them from the death of the thousands at Malachor to obey his master's bidding—

Xxx

The gravity of worlds pressed down on them. Tears welled in Revan's eyes, the air too thick for them to move. Jasp's hand under hers was a rock, her fingers were carved to it, her body to its seat, she felt her bones ache with the pressure, as if they'd go through her skin.

Her eyes were fixed on the path Jasp had set, and Arkan's memories screamed in her head—

Malachor.

It wasn't Korrie he meant, it was everything: the past, the present, the promise.
Tenebrae's destruction will fuel the rest. With our enemies crushed beneath our feet, the Republic will be safe, Malachor will be safe, I will be safe, you will be–

Malachor, the voice in her head agreed, as they slung, abruptly out of the dive and back along a straight track. Gravity released its gees with a vengeance, and Revan thought she heard her ribs crack, as her body slumped forward again.

She turned her head. Jasp's light was a feeble flicker—dulled by the triumph of Arkan's roar. Their trajectory pinged on the screen in front of her: a series of dotted lines, slingshotting them between the twin suns, once again following the path marked by the racing beacons—flashing an angry red at their intrusion—but still the shortest space between the stars for maximum velocity–

Or it would be maximum velocity, except the screen lit up with a cluster of ships in front of them, narrowed to a channel at the closest point.

Can't fire on them, they're too thickly clustered, it would make things worse–too messy–

A bogey lit up their screen suddenly and she slammed the yoke hard as it veered past—automatic, not even thinking first. The sensors registered one of the racers speeding past them. They'd met the main pack.

Jasp gave me full nav. The implications of that would hit her sometime, but now there was no time. Another meteor she deflected with a twist of her hand, and then, ahead, one of the racing scows—some kind of modified star-cruiser—Nabooan, she thought. Or one of the Corulag copies that were so popular in Exchange circles. Clumsier and twice as fast. Fastest way through would be to burn it, things had crap for shields–

Something she'd neglected to steer around hit them, glancing off. Maybe another ship—but if there was life inside it was drowned out by Arkan's quiet roar.

Revan slammed the yoke hard to left, veering off—course. The prox alarms pinged a warning at her, and gravity tugged again. They were close now, running in on the path between the stars. Here, every ship would be instrument-blind, relying on their calcs as their sensors fried with the radiation overload. The viewscreen in front of them dimmed automatically, reducing their visuals to bulks of light and shadow, each ship in the pack ahead nothing but a rough outline of white in a sea of black.

Star's gravity—it pulls—that's why they're clumped like that in the safest place–

Revan jerked her ship farther to the left, feeling the engines whine into higher gear as they started to burn. Faster. If the shields hold, we can go faster—we can get past them–

And I hold the shields–

Malachor. Arkan murmured the word like a promise of help.

XXX

"Those two unknown vessels have just passed Radiant Locks and Stellarjammer's Crossing! Ladies and Gentlebeings, if those ships were registered for this race, this would be one for the books! They plowed through the belt and they're already closing in on the front pack—"

"What kind of ships are they?"

"The lead is a Republic Aurek—class, but that thing pinned to its tail… I'm not sure—it looks like something from the Mandalorian wars--"

_Not the _Mandalorian _wars._ Meetra began making her way rapidly toward the exit. Whatever business a ship of Sith design had with a Republic snub was none of her concern. She still remembered that first battle—when Revan and Malak's new Sith armada had ambushed what remained of the Republic Fleet in the Navaris System, above Endar. The image, broadcast on holovid of thousands of diamond–shaped black ships swarming like zeldrate lava over a stinking corpse—Meetra had been in a bar on Coruscant by then, waiting for the next ship gone, the world around her strangely silent and empty since the Jedi had ripped the Force from her mind—

"Excuse me." Someone bumped against her arm. Fingers closing on her flesh—uninvited, unknown, blind—

"Buzz off!" Meetra turned indignantly—pulling her arm free—

"General." Technician Third Grade Bao–Dur, formerly of the _RNS New Hope_, blinked at her, the diamond–shaped patch of skin below his horns furrowing as his only indication of surprise. "Forgive the intrusion, but I called out to get your attention, and—you did not seem to see me."

"I'm not part of Fleet. Not—not anymore, Tech… Bao." _Tech Dur? _Strange, how the two of them had conspired to destroy two fleets and she didn't know what name the man preferred—or even if it was one name or two.

"Citizen Surik, then." The Zabrak tech nodded slowly. "It's been a long time." He paused. "I am also no longer with the Fleet."

_Clearly, since you're dressed like a starport mechanic._ "Not really so long." Meetra took a step back, trying not to look over her shoulder to see if anyone had noticed them—if he was truly alone. "Five years?"

"Six Iridonian years."

"Oh." She paused a beat to sound polite. "Did you return to Iridonia?" After the gravity well's implosion, after half her ship's sensors were stripped and the _New Hope_ 's hyperdrive barely functioned—after Meetra had made her near–mutinous crew make the jump back toward Coruscant—she'd quite lost track of the man whose technical brain had supplied the mechanical expertise to fulfill Admiral Starfire's request for an atmospheric inversion generator capable of destabilizing an entire star system.

"No." The indentations around his mouth deepened. "I just… I suppose we all count down from the world where we were born." He shrugged. "I was on Telos for quite some time until recently, but it never felt like home."

_Perhaps because Malak and Revan turned it into a toxic wasteland_, Meetra thought acidly. But there was no point being rude to an old friend.

"I don't count from my planet." Meetra shrugged, through it was a lie. "They'll probably blow Balmorra up too one of these days."

"I'm sorry." Bao–Dur shrugged. He stared at her blankly, as if he wasn't sure what to say.

Meetra glanced back at the screen. Looked like that party-crasher was crashing now—good riddance. "Why don't we catch up over a drink?"

He had a rare smile. She remembered it because it happened so infrequently. "Yes, General."
Malachor.

"Right." Was it warm in here? Jasp had done something to the sensors, to hide the rads they had to be getting on this route he'd mapped.

The Pinion tugged at her ship's tail—at the Jopheena's tail, jolting them off-course enough that she had to keep swerving to correct it, rocking them back and forth across the spacelanes like a drunk rancor. The Force sang in her ears, enveloping everything in a haze of blue—

Something splashed on the navboard and she realized it was blood. Nose. My nose. She wiped it with her sleeve, as the roar in her mind increased—

Malachor.

XXX

"It won't be easy," Revan reminded Davad and the knights he'd brought to her. "We're asking you to defy the Council."

"We are all Jedi knights. It's a matter of conscience." Davad smiled reassuringly when he said the noble words. They were a lie, of course. It wasn't a matter of conscience, it was her. It was no sacrifice to follow his master's command to follow this woman. Standing before them now, Rev looked like a Jedi of legend, her hair twisted in thick-roped braids, her robes armored with modified plate, and the sun above lining her delicate beauty in gilt and red.

The group behind him—the ones he'd recruited from the Wayland Enclave—murmured in agreement, just as captivated as he.

"It can't just be... your choice." Revan frowned, looking directly at Davad, even as she spoke to them all. "I'm not asking for your help as individual knights. I'm asking you to follow. For this to work, you must take orders without questioning your conscience. Accept commands blindly. No matter what they are."

"Of course." Knight Cariaga Sin was as tall for a Rodian as Pando was short. "As long as they are within the vows that we—"

"No." Revan's voice hardened. "That was a questioning of my authority, Knight Sin. A doubt." Her hand rose, and she actually... Force—pushed the Rodian back a few steps. "There can be no doubt. We had doubts on Dxun and Serroco and they nearly cost us the war. If I am to lead you all—to use my gift—I have to be the... the leader. You must follow. Is that clear?"

"She gets to be the master," Davad clarified. "Master Starfire." He smiled to make it a joke.

"But we're just supposed to be... Force detectors for the Republic Navy, aren't we? What does Master Kavar say?" Knight Xaset Terep hadn't been a knight for very long, and her voice was high and thin and bleating. Xaset was a quiet slip of a thing, nearly seeming to melt into the walls. She rarely spoke at all. That she dared object raised her estimation in Davad's eyes. At least a few notches.

"Kavar's gone," Revan said flatly, her eyes slits of green. "And with him, all of the Council's control. It's up to us to make order out of this chaos. Clean up the Republic's catastrophe—"

XXX
Malachor.

Was Arkan reduced to being a holo-player, whose only job was to send her images of the past she couldn't remember?

The Force-shield surrounding their ship wavered. Revan yanked the yoke to the right again, sending them veering back toward the racers and (relative) safety. She was flying by sight now-fracked as it was—by sight and something she couldn't quantify: a small, steady voice from someplace inside.

Listen for the ticks, long as they're even you're good, if she hitches, if the engines catch out you'll tip—she's bottom-heavy, she's got that asshole Sith latched on to her ion trail—if the engine cuts and he drops you'll swing off course and that gravity-stars—flying blind—

Her hand moved the yoke again, and she turned a margin starboard, compensating for the white-outlined disc ship coming up hard on her port, as if the asshole expected her to move—

Malachor.

"Oh, I'll give you Malachor." She made the words a threat this time.

They were back, abruptly, in the safe zone, the channel between the stars. The tears in her eyes slid down her cheek, her nose dripped, her breath came out hard. Normal gravity. Air rushed out of her lungs.

Under her hand, Jasp's fingers moved. He groaned faintly. "Pollie?"

"Looks like we're running the Biscain Hundred, Da." He felt like a whisper in the Force. Revan kept her voice bright. "Bet you never thought we'd get the chance!"

"Pollie—"

"Do not die on me now!" She kept her voice bright, wishing to frack she knew how to heal him.

He coughed, but when she glanced over, Polla's da was smiling. "N—not when my kid's dumb enough to get herself banned from the system—" He coughed again, and she didn't want to look, because it sounded like half of a lung had just rattled loose.

Xxx

"I'll bet," Kore offered. "I will bet you five hundred credits that the black ship wins the race."

"It's not even entered. And it's attached behind the other ship—thing! So that one's gotta come in first." Layran looked at Kore like he was crazy.

"Yeah, but it… so it's easy money, right?"

Rannie looked at him suspiciously. "Why d'you think it'll win?"

"I know someone who flies a ship like that." Kore shrugged, like it was no big deal, because he could be wrong and it was only five hundred credits. "She's a really good pilot. She's really good at everything so—"

"You said it's a Sith ship. Is she a Jedi–Sith?"

"Yeah, but that can't be her, she's too busy to be flying in some stupid race—"
"For someone who doesn't want to talk about the Jedi–Sith, you keep bringing them up," Rannie said. "That ship flew off. Probably crashed already."

"It did not!"

This was the part of the race that didn't get vidded because the space between the stars was too hot. Lots of guessing went on.

Kore told himself he wasn't guessing, that he had a feeling.

But the truth was, he wasn't sure.

Xxx

The cam–views of the main pack of racers were absent while the ships were in the "Hell's Channel" between the twin suns–and so the crowd at the bar had turned to other pursuits. Hover–darts, dejarik, and drinking.

Two veterans from the Mandalorian Wars were just two more sents in a crowd.

"What brings you here?" Bao asked.

"You first." Meetra gestured toward the pitcher of Griff's Tarisian Ale, emblazoned with a tacky logo that appeared to be two Twi'lek females, legs crossing in profile, wearing nothing but vibroblades. Meetra nodded as he poured her a glass. They were drinking from the same source, so it had to be safe.

"I came here looking for you." There had never been any artifice in Third Tech Bao–Dur. That was why she'd trusted him with their secret.

Xxx

The officer's mess was crowded, but no one was paying attention–words that some kind of accord was coming on the wake of Admiral Revan Starfire winning the duel against the Mandalorian Fett were on all the channels.

Everyone was getting ripped now on the promise of peace.

Meetra was tipsy enough not to think about the lie. She inhaled hard on her death–stick, the affectation she'd taken up last week, when she'd realized what a child of Balmorra should have already known: life is short.

"I can build the device to these specifications," the technician her sergeant had recommended said slowly. "But–do you know what it will do?"

"We need a gravity well that will self–implode in atmosphere. Will it do that?" Meetra coiled a strand of hair around her finger and smiled at him.

It took a moment longer than it usually did with sents for him to smile back.

"Yes," Third Tech Bao–Dur said quietly. "It will do that, if you have a fissionable power source."

"I do." Meetra nodded. "This is how the war will truly end," she told him, just as Revan and Malak had told her. "One last spark, and then forever peace."

Bao–Dur's mouth twitched. "That sounds like paradise."
"Yes," she murmured, feeling those amber eyes soften as he stared into hers. "It does."

Their eyes always softened when they committed to her cause.

Xxx

"Looking for me?" Meetra was startled now, and too surprised not to show it. That was the problem with nearly five years of self-imposed exile: you lost the social niceties.

"About a week ago I received an order from Ord Mantell." Bao blinked calmly. Maybe too calmly. "My… employer sent me to help you."

Uneasy suspicion bloomed in Meetra's chest. "I thought you said you were on Telos."

"I was—for years." He frowned, the skin crinkling around his horns. "I was… assigned there—after—"

The roar of the crowd interrupted any reaction Meetra could have feigned.

Xxx

Malachor.

"A thousand fracking Malachors," Revan muttered. "All for you, Arkan."

Dar would be so proud of me, planning an entire Empire's destruction. She'd probably be fracking jealous she didn't get to do it herself—he should eat her first—

Eat her first, Arkan? Do you hear me?

That image flashed through her mind again: her former self on the cliff, legs dangling over.

Revan took that as a yes.

"Are you okay?" In the center of the pack pulling forward, their readings were near-normal. Jasp blinked at Revan and she tried to ignore the tremor in his hand.

"Yeah, I just—" Just daydreaming about genocide, Da. It's what we Dark Lords do.

How many sents were there on Sith worlds? She had no memory of them, and there was no one left to ask, or almost—

How many sents on Sith worlds?

Malachor.

Billions, probably. At least millions. And they're mostly Force-sensitive. Dar said that—

"He used to ask me to do things," Jasp mumbled. "Asked me to have someone look after your boy. Asked me to comm folks." He chuckled. "When I first started working for my lord, he asked me to steer us into a sun." His chuckle turned into a cough. "Lord Sion put a stop to that! As I guess you'd imagine…"*

"I'm glad you didn't listen, that would have killed you." Revan was only half-listening to him as she watched the viewscreen for openings in the pack. "Wait—he asked you about Korrie?"
"Malachor, Arkan agreed.

"Shadows. He ended up eating most of them, one's that worked for him and Sion and that lady, but there's a few left. He sent one to guard Korrie. My Lord Sion used them too, but he did his own work."

It gave her a chill to hear Jasp talking like this.

"They're not–please don't call them lords. They aren't–they're monsters–killers."

"Malachor.

You wanted to die before, huh? Maybe you should eat a few billion Sith first–"

"Malachor!

Her vision dissolved again–XXX

Korriban.

Confronting the newly-awakened Revan Starfire on Korriban had been a disappointment. Instead of finding a woman worthy of fealty, Davad had found a shadow.

Her lightning had been nothing compared to the raw power Revan had once possessed. "Go away–" she had hissed, but Davad hadn't gone far, just far enough to cloak himself in the Force, and wait, to listen and see what kind of Sith the woman he'd loved had become.

Apparently, she had become one that still allowed a Republic war hero into her private chambers.

The man's voice was hard and furious, mumbling, as if speaking Standard was a stretch for him. "Mission, I–beat it, okay? I want to talk to Revan. Alone."

"Whoa. That's major. Are you guys getting back together–?"

"Mission!" Two voices, one pitched high, one low.

"Fine, I'll go! I need to see a man about some cargo anyway. If it wasn't for me we'd all starve!"

Clop of footsteps as if the child was being deliberately clumsy stomping off. Davad wouldn't put it past the urchin to eavesdrop, but she was inconsequential.

"Revan–" the man began.

"You're calling me that now? Instead of 'hey you,' 'ma'am,' or 'that bitch?'"

"Y–you weren't supposed to hear that. Jolee and I–that was a private conversation." Brave man, to sound so furious at a woman who could end him with a simple electrical charge.

"I am a bitch, Carth." Her laugh choked. "I'm the baddest bitch in the frack-damned galaxy. I killed I–I don't know how many–there's a krieffing statue of me in this hellplace's lobby. They're building my frackin' tomb in the Valley of the Dark Lords like it's some Sithspawned shrine–"

The man echoed her laugh, as if she were joking. "I wonder what poor sap they killed to put in it."
"It doesn't matter. It's the symbol of the thing!"

"Look, sister. I didn't come here to hold your hand. I only came to ask if there'd been any changes with Dustil."

"Ask Mission. He listens to her more than he listens to me. I only managed to save that kid, his roommate—"

"Mister Sith Congeniality? Thanks for that."

"You're welcome." Revan paused. "He's just a kid, Carth. They're all—most of the students in this school are just kids."

"Think I haven't noticed?" The man certainly was emotive. He had that—and nothing else—in common with Malak, Davad thought. "You founded it. You designed—everything around us—"

"I don't remember." Her voice cracked, but there was an edge of durasteel there, a ripple in the Force that made Davad smile. She might not remember, but this place still called to her—as it did to them all, those who had truly tasted the Dark. "Grass Priests, Flyboy, if I turn back into Darth Revan, you have my permission to put a blaster to my head and pull the trigger."

"Grass Priests? You're praying now? I thought you lot worshipped Naka Shadow or Ludacris Crisp."

"On Deralia, they—" Her voice hitched. "Frack, it's probably not real."

"What?" The pilot wasn't the brightest, Davad thought. Again, like Malak.

Malak, who no doubt had his own spies in this place. If he found out Davad had come to her—

I would challenge him. I would rule by your side. I would help you make the galaxy burn for what they did to you, Revan.

Their conversation continued without him, as Davad lost himself in the pleasant illusion of control. But then—

"—not like a coin, Carth. You don't flip from light to dark. It's more like a fall. They call it that for a reason—like you're slipping in ice on a hill and no matter what you do you'll slide back down—"

"A fall? I won't let you." Low and fierce. Love and hate throbbing in the Force like the man's puny—

"You can't help." Her voice was tired. "Stars, I wish you could. If you want to help, Carth, promise me if I fall you'll make an end of me—"

"I should, but I…"

"Just put a blaster to my head and do it," she said flatly.

Xxx

Malachor. Arkan cut off the vision so abruptly that Revan was left blinking in the sudden silence.

I can't, is what Carth said after that. He said he couldn't kill me. And then, I—

"Pollie? We're stuck."
Revan opened her eyes. The comm board was lit up a furious red, as if everything in range was hailing them. Sensors showed Arkan locked securely on their tail. Everything else was running smooth, except for the gridlock–

Blast your way through. There's no time. BisSec will notify Republic authorities—even you can be captured. It's happened before–

Malachor! Arkan screamed in her skull before Revan could form a coherent answer.

Xxx

"...if I fall you'll make an end of me–"

Her voice was the same when she said those words, Davad thought. Nothing Deralian in it at all.

Hidden in the hall, he smiled–

XXX

Revan blinked.

"I ever tell you about how when I first met our master, he asked me to fly the ship into a sun?"

Jasp laughed as if it was a joke. "You know that's what happened to Bendowen's girl? For some reason, I keep remembering that." He coughed again. "Do you think it hurt?"

"I don't–"

"Malachor."

Her vision blurred again–

Xxx

"If I fall, make an end of me."

Over her, through her, like two drexl falling toward the sun–

They fell, interlaced–

She sat on the edge of the cliff–

She ran on water across the acid sea and he followed, sinking and burning with each step but he followed–

XXX

Malachor. Strangely, now the word sounded like an apology.

Revan's voice felt small in her ears. She was suddenly all too aware of the close confines of their ship, the recycled air, the sweat beading in her forehead, misting the visor she wore over her eyes.

She squeezed Jasp's hand because it was real. "You said–before you said Arkan said he make sure the boy was safe… that my son was safe."

"I did." Jasp nodded. "He's safe, Pollie."

Xxx

Her mouth was warm under his.

Like two drexl falling.

Falling.

Xxx

Malachor.

The empty scream again, ripping through her mind—so many minds—one moment there and then gone. Lights gone out in a flash. The Jedi—almost of them, all of them going mad and all the deaths—

How many billions on the Sith worlds? Are they all Tenebrae? Are they all corrupted? Carth is there—and his son—his son will die and Seiran. How many billions and it's all down to me—I'll bring them death—

Xxx

A tomb on Korriban.

A blaster to my head.

He asked to steer the ship into a sun—

A sun.

Xxx

"Da?" Revan whispered. Jasp's hand was moving over the controls again. Their sensors were still blind, but the blind trace of their projected route overlaid with the computer's approximation of their position. "Da, that course—"

"It's just to get us through the stars faster, Pollie. Runs a little hot, but you'll see—"

Revan smiled at the lie. There was nothing else she could do. That level of gees, you'll be unconscious, Da. You won't feel a thing, and I—

Malachor.

Her stomach growled with his hunger, but Revan understood now. It wasn't about hunger, or a desire for another apocalypse.

Malachor. The word was a warning. The only word Arkan had left.

Malachor, she thought back. I understand, Davad Arkan.

Their ship began to pitch forward, edging past their closest competition by sliding under it. The pitch increased and she felt the tell-tale whine in her ears.

Revan grabbed the yoke and closed her eyes. The parabola Jasp had plotted etched in her mind like the death wish it was.

Xxx

*Drexl in flight, falling together--

*A tomb on Korriban.

He had the sudden urge to push her off a cliff.

*Put a blaster to my head--

Xx

The scream of the engine kicking into overdrive drowned out all else.

Revan opened her eyes and stared at the screen. After a certain point, the velocity of two ships propelling into the heart of the sun would make the conclusion inevitable.

Xxx

"The frontrunner's out of the channel! Hell's Bells has taken the lead, and then it's Princess Naboo and coming in third is--"

"Gentles, it's our gatecrasher! That double ship's coming out in a fast burn, but they're turning back!"

"The interloper ship's veered off-course! It seems to be heading straight back to the suns!"

The local transmit was on all bands and it crackled across the Aleema's bridge the second they dropped out--still cloaked--from hyperspace into the Biscain system.

"There are interdictor screens surrounding us," Dessa noted, her voice as brisk as a man's. "We won't be able to exit the system without traversing its length, or disabling their meager defenses."

"Something is disrupting their race. The barbarians are screaming in every channel." Aemelie turned on the receiver's screen to local transmissions and an image resolved: a close--up of a falling ship--rather two ships--backlit by the fiery orb they seemed to be descending into. "Curse her! That's my Pinion!"

"What?" Canderous sat up, scanning the feeds. His eyes locked on the main image--those two ships--unmistakable. "Sha'buir, that's gotta be Revan in the Aurek!"

"It appears we have arrived only to witness her death," Dessa said.

"That's my Pinion!" Aemelie repeated, stubbornly refusing to see the larger issue at stake. In that moment, Canderous loved his wife for her blind fierceness--even as he wanted to sternly remind her that as a requisition of war, it was now his ship.

Proximity alarms keeled, interrupting his thoughts as their starboard side scraped against the interdictor receivers. On--screen the cloaking field's sensors rippled, but the field held--for now--somewhat uselessly, as they had just punched an Aleema--sized hole in the hyperspace gateway.

"Unknown vessel! This airspace is closed to ships over fifty meters long! You have exceeded that measure by several percentages. Furthermore, cloaking in civilian airspace is considered" an act of piracy by the Huttese Covenant. Uncloak and prepare to be boarded—"

"Yeah, right." Canderous chuckled. The hilarity of the barbarian orders knocked sense back into him. This wasn't the end of Revan. He'd seen her through worse.

"Get the kids to work knocking out those interdictor screens," he commanded. "Whatever Revan's playing at—looks like we can catch them at the next jump. We'll go soon as she's clear."

Xxx

"Your ship's falling, Kore," Layran noted. "Both of them. Did they break?"

"Guess I owe you five hundred credits." Kore shrugged like it was no big deal, because it couldn't be. It couldn't be Mother because she had more important things to do than some stupid race—

Xxx

Malachor.

It was getting harder and harder to breathe. Revan tried to remember the meditation exercises she'd only half-learned. Slow your heartbeat, pause between breaths, make yourself quiet to consume as little oxygen as possible—

The gees of their acceleration pinned her limbs to her seat, but she stared at the yoke fixedly, the calculations she'd guessed still dancing in her head. Only one chance. Tilt the nose up, get her nose down at the vertex—that's your chance, that's your only chance—let gravity work for you—much as it can—

Xxx

"Everything, Pollie, has an equal—and opposite reaction. That's what the Grass Priests say. Every movement, every person, every action. Look." Her father tapped the row of swinging beads on his desk and they began rocking back and forth. "Momentum. See?

"So for me sneaking out with Sara, the Grass Priests would think there's another me who stayed in and did her topographical space assignment." Polla scowled. "Really, Dad?

"That's physics, kiddo." Her father shrugged. "And right now you're sitting your ass in this chair until you get that paper right."

Xxx

"What?" Meetra turned her head toward the vid–screen. Whatever Bao was babbling about would have to wait.

"*Something big just jumped into our system, folks. Took out half the interdictor grid by running over them. It's a cloaked ship, but anything this large, we've gotta wonder—is this some military invasion? Another example of Fleet incompetence or over–reach? Or is it—

It's war. Whatever it is, it's war. A child of Balmorra knew all the signs.

"That isn't good." Her voice was quiet. "I came in on a touring cruise. Do you have your own ship, Bao?"

The Zabrak nodded.
"Let's go."

Xxx

"I always watch the Biscain Hundred this time of year." Helena Shan gestured toward the vid, suddenly embarrassed, because her guard and sober companion was frowning at the holo-screen as if she had never seen an open race before. "Abasen and I used to love it, you know. He placed bets. Small ones. Just for the sport."

"Something appears to be wrong with those two ships." Cally Lee was chopping onna with raw nerf strips for their luncheon salad. Her eyes had been bothering her of late, so she had taken to wearing a pair of ornate, concealing goggles that Helena had originally used on Tatooine to shield her eyes from the sand.

"Casualties." Helena shrugged. "You know the old saying, you can't make an omelet without cracking a few Moffa eggs."

"We had a saying on my homeworld as well," Cally murmured. "There are always more eggs."

"Oh?" It was always interesting to hear about other planets and their customs. Especially from a distance—not like when she'd been young and Abasen had dragged her everywhere. "Where are you from, dear?"

"Nathema," Cally chuckled, an old sound in such a young girl. "I don't suppose you've ever heard of it. It's quite far away from here."

Xxx

Only one chance.

"You're a terrible pilot."

"You almost crashed the ship!"

Listen. Feel. It's not something you learn— it's something you know. That last voice was calm and assured, nearly smug. A hint of laughter there, complicity. Just wait for the right moment—

Vertex, the vertex. The final point of the parabola: high or low, it's a matter of perspective and you won't know until after—

Revan's heart thundered in her ears. The right moment be taking forever, the entire screen was yellow and blazing, barely contained by the ship's filters. She pulled on the Force, trying to use it to shield their ship, but she had no idea if the Force barrier was doing anything—

Now.

Revan didn't need to look at the yoke, couldn't move her head in their ship's steep dive but her eyes went there anyway. She felt a fingertip twitch as she directed the Force to flip the switch.

The Jopheena's ion engines cut out lights in the cabin died. The recycler whined, circuits half-melted—

Their ship shuddered, and lurched forward, abruptly lighter, still falling, but falling alone—

Xxx
Falling free–falling back, falling into his arms –

She turned laughing, rising up in the water.

Xxx

Not yet. Not yet–

Malachor. Voice in her head, happy now. The images again: two drexl entangled; her own face twisted in ecstasy; the sensation of his skin on hers; the sound of bells; Revan, perched on a cliff; a blaster to the head–

Arkan had lost his words but not his mind and the one message he was trying to impart was crystalline:

Malachor. Malachor.

Death.

Sweat broke out as Revan fought the gravitational drop with all she had, every muscle stiff, the Force bucking and flexing beneath her ship's nose.

Arkan's Pinion shot past her, tumbling, free from the ion trail of the Jopheena, straight into the sun.

Free.

Xxx

The water speckled her skin like jewels, her hair brushed his chest as he stood over her, bobbing up and down, the sun painting them in gold and red and brown–

"Revan," Davad said.

She answered with a smile, her leaf eyes lazy, the sun splashing the tilt of her nose, her breasts–

"Race again?" she murmured, and dove before he could answer, flipping deft as a spear into the depths of the lake–the green depths, daring him to follow and he followed, he followed her down and the water was sun–warmed on his skin–the trace of her hair, like fire it lit–

Xxx

Malachor.

Maybe a farewell. Maybe a plea for her to follow him.

Revan would never know.

The Force flared in her, bright as another sun. Revan's arm shot out, the yoke moved, the engines gunned back to life.

Jopheena flipped sideways, horizontally propelled by her own velocity, spinning in a perfect spear–shot, careening away towards the black veil of safety, the flashing red lights of the racing course.

Behind the Aurek, the Pinion fell vertically, a victim of gravity.
Straight into the heart of the sun.

Xxx

Halfway to the docks, Bao stopped, gold skin of his face suddenly paling. "Stars, what--"

"Are you okay?" Meetra frowned.

"The--" His voice broke off. "Did you feel that?"

"No." She barely felt the death stick. But around them, pandemonium. "Feel what?"

"Nothing, I--' His skin had gone from gold to gray. The lines of his indentations darkened as if in shock.

"Seven hells!" Someone behind them yelled. "What's wrong with the sun?"

The image flashed on one of the screens along the wall. One side of the binary cluster seemed to be brighter than the other. But, even as they watched, the brightness seemed to fade, dimming sharply until it stood in shadow to its twin.

"An eclipse?" Meetra blinked.

"I don't think so." Bao's voice was artificially calm, but it always had been. Even before Malachor. "We need to leave now, General."

Xxx

It began a morning like any other at the Rappertunie Clinic.

"How is Patient X today?" Nurse Sadie Leen tried to sound upbeat and positive, because even if their patients were unresponsive they still had lower brainwave function, and who really knew what that meant in Humans? Twi'leks were easy, just Togruta, really, with smaller fat reserves, but Patient X had a small, perfectly round skull, now shaved and covered with a gold mesh hooked up to the read–outs. Didn't seem like there could possibly be enough of her brain left to recover from the catastrophic damage it had suffered.

"Assessment: Vitals remain unchanged since your last inquiry, Nurse Leen. Would you like me to cancel the alert system you programmed to inform you of any change?"

"Just asking to be polite VeeArr," she told the med droid, bending over the bedside of the unconscious woman. This wasn't one of the ones she thought of as the 'possibles.' The sents that might wake.

Patient X was really known as 'Jeen D'oh #3,' one of three unnameds they had in the catatonic wing of the Rappertunie Clinic for Indigent Cases from the Coruscanti Underground; but among themselves, the nurses just used Aurebesh shorthand.

Patient X had been in their care for more than a Coruscanti month.

The wounds on her hands that some sadist looked to have made with a boltgun had been filled in with synthskin and healed up nicely.

That was the easy part, of course. Jeen D'oh #3’s body would heal fine. But she'd never wake up again, not with the way she'd flatlined.
"I hate these trafficking cases," Sadie added. "Poor thing looks barely old enough to vote, and look what those animals did to her!"

"Observation: Dental analysis and bone density indicates this sentient was old enough to vote on most planetary systems for at least several cycles. The long bones in the thighs are capped, and the rear masticatory teeth are fully erupted, except for the one on the upper right hand side, which appears to have been removed--"

"You're so literal. Ugh!" Sadie made a face, leaning over the body. Her hand traced the girl's forehead, adjusting the mesh. "Head fur's growing in again. Is Lenny available to do a delip today?"

"Objection: I am a med droid, not an administrator! Suggestion: call him. Just because your last attempt did not go well--"

"You need your motivators adjusted, I think." She would not blush for a droid. "Lenny and I are just friends. That was just dinner. You don't know what--"

A low moan. Nurse Sadie almost missed it, she was so busy yelling at VeeArr. But Patient X's mouth had fallen open, and a low, keening noise was coming out of her throat. If it had been louder, Sadie would have thought it sounded like a scream.

And then, to her astonishment, Patient X's eyes fluttered open, revealing wide, sea–blue eyes that contrasted with the warm brown of her skin. "F–f–fay~" Her jaw shook with the effort of trying to form a word.

"Shhh, you're okay." Sadie bolted the comforting smile on her face instead of shock. There was no way this girl could wake up… but she had! "Don't try and talk quite yet. You've been through a horrible--you got hurt pretty bad," she corrected. "VeeArr, keep her stable," she added, turning toward the droid. "I'll run and get Doc Ossipus myself. He'll want to see this."

"F–f–ay. Aete. F–fate." Those blue–green eyes pleaded with Sadie to stay, as the girl's lips trembled. "Ch– ch– changed! Ch–changing–r–r–right now." A tear formed at the end of one of those eyes, but incredibly (or due to a seizure) Patient X was actually smiling.

For a Human coma case, she had a beautiful smile.

"Observation: It does appear to be a miracle, Mistress," the droid agreed. "I'll keep close watch."

"Changed," the girl whispered. Her eyes really were extraordinary. "She's changing it right now. R–right now."

"Do you have a name, sweetie?" Sadie gave her sweetest expression, as those extraordinary eyes focused on her.

The girl's head nodded. "Tha–Thalia. M–may–"

"Well, Miz Thali, let's see if we can find a doc free to give you a look, shall we?"

"I'm fine." The girl wiped her eyes, smile breaking like the sun out of clouds. "I'm alive."

Revan was falling, her mind entirely focused on the point ahead. Jopheena was a spear and she was falling–straight through–the ship bucked suddenly, and a beacon blazed in front of her as the sensors came back online, far enough from the twin sun's rads to reactivate.

The comm was still flashing furiously. Automatically she noted the one green line amongst the red: the link she'd established with the Aleema. They must be here now too. They've caught up. I'll need to comm–

Jasp was–

Her breath came out at the same time the gees stabilized, her body swinging forward as she lunged out of her seat, vaguely aware she'd broken the safety restraints to do so. Next to her, Jasp was gray. Blood–spatters–from his nose.

Please don't let it be serious.

Please don't let him be dead.

On the bow she saw a flash of silver as one of the racers shot past–

Racers. We're still on the track, but we're past the suns, we're almost free of this fracking system–

"Pollie," Jasp whispered. His eyes fluttered open as she tried to support him in the Force, afraid to do more than surround his body in a. "The… the track."

"What?" There had to be a way to strengthen him without using too much–

"What?" They didn't need to finish the race–the jump point out of the system was a few thousand kilosecs off the course. They were on the right side of the system now. Nothing to stop them.

Another ship flashed by as if they were standing still.

"Finish it," Jasp whispered, reaching for the yoke again. His hand was clumsy as he activated Jopheena's thrusters. The tick of the engines shifted to a low whine as they began to accelerate–as he steered them back onto the track.

Revan blinked. "You want to finish the race?"

It was only then that the other… the other thing finally sunk in: the silence. There was no presence in the back of her mind. No screaming.

Her stomach felt uncomfortably full, like she'd eaten too many nutra bars at once. Like she'd never be hungry again.

Polla's father smiled at her, faintly. "Might as well. We've come this far."

He slammed the yoke down, gunning the engines.

Jopheena lunged forward, and Revan fell back into her chair.

Xxx

"That Pub ship's moving again." Layran was still watching the stupid race. Korrie–Kore–wasn't because racing was stupid and that Pinion had just… gone. Fallen into the sun, the announcers said.
If Mother was on it and died I'd know.

Wouldn't he?

"It's pretty fast." Rannie glanced at him. "You okay?"

"Yeah," Korrie– Kore– muttered. On their screen the Pub ship was chasing down a disc ship and a Naboo cruiser on the final lap. Behind it crowded a whole bunch of other ships, as if they'd all been bunched in that cluster between the suns and suddenly–

"There seems to be unprecedented solar activity, but our experts assure us at this time, there's no cause for alarm--"

"Also, the interdictor malfunction on our satellites will be repaired soon--"

Xxx

"Oh." Her hand dropped the bulb of water and Mical bent down and retrieved it, feeling oddly protective of the women he'd once distrusted more than any sentient alive.

Her now–flawless face stared back at him, eyes still slightly filmed with confusion. He'd been warned to expect that.

Even though Mical understood the necessity, a part of him now grieved as those eyes focused on his face, their expression forever altered.

"My apprentice," the woman whispered. "He--"

Mical felt it too, a faint ripple in the Force, as if somewhere, far away, a voice had stopped.

"I am here," he promised her, feeling strangely protective. "I will be your apprentice now." All he'd had was a glimpse–a fragment of the memories from the holocron the old woman had dropped at dinner. The fragment had been enough for him to understand that Master Atris needed the knowledge within. He had gathered the bundle carefully–careful not to touch more–and brought it before her.

Atris had stared at the holocron for some time without asking for an explanation. Perhaps, he thought, she had always known that it would come to this.

Know your enemy, Master Atris had always counseled her apprentices. Loanin. Surik. So Loanin had always counseled Mical as well. And so, he knew this woman–as well as anyone truly could. And, after seeing what she had showed him, Mical also knew it was not surprising that in the end, Master Atris had taken her own advice.

Xxx

"Don't leave--" she called out, just as Mical was by the door.

The holocron sat on her desk, free of its wrappings, a cube of glimmering blue. The piece Mical had touched had been reattached to the whole.

"Would you like me to wrap it back up again?" He had been given instructions for that eventuality too.

"No." She looked carved from frost. There was a long silence, long enough for Mical's mind to wander, too long, too much time to dwell upon their ancient enemy and the battle that must be won. He… he had tried to explain it to her, but she had just blinked at him, before finally nodding slowly.

Finally–just before–she had spoken. "They say after a period of adjustment one becomes… both. So I will not lose what I—"

"You will be more," Mical promised her—for so that one memory from Kae's life had shown him. "Your knowledge and hers. The experience of all of your lives—"

"All." Atris nodded, as if he'd confirmed something she had only suspected before. "So there is more than one lifetime in the old woman's mind." Her mouth twisted. "Many of us suspected as much."

"Her mother asked it of her. She asks it of you. You do have a choice. She wants you to have a choice."

"It is kind of you to say so, padawan." Her eyes were the color of frost. "Where is she?"

"Gone." She had not told him where. "She did not want her physical weakness to be a liability."

Those glacial eyes narrowed. "And if I did refuse her offer, I suspect she would not want my retribution."

Xxx

"Nihilus failed." The white–haired woman crossed the room cautiously, herself to the new body. "Our hope must return to her, Mical. Perhaps in the end… it always was with her."

"To your original–?"

"No." The woman scoffed. "That old shell? I know where she walks now. A matter of minor vanity." Her voice hardened. "No. Our hope rests with the Balmorran. With the destruction of the Jedi Council at Katarr, the failure of Darth Nihilus, the disappearance of Revan, we must now seek the last true veteran of the Mandalorian Wars—"

There are many veterans of the wars. But he knew better than to argue. "Who do you mean, Master?"

"Call me Mother," she murmured. "You have earned it." Those frost–eyes sharpened. "I mean your sister, of course. Half-sister. My war child—"

XXX

Mekel felt like a fracking knob–head on the bridge, but no one had told him to leave. He eased into a seat by a long bank of blinking blue lights that no one seemed interested in.

The displays in front of them showed the Aleema's hull being peppered by small weapons fire, completely ineffectively, and a lot of flashing red lights.

Canderous stood at the front of the bridge, staring out at the screen in front of them, where lines of numbers and names of ships were coming in fast. He snorted softly. "She came in third."

"What?" Aemelie looked harried. Millifar was sitting up in a hoverchair, doing something with her good hand to program their guns to shoot down more interdictor drones. Dessa was fracking humming and Oyimex and Estrel and Kelbourne had all taken positions behind Canderous at their banks, like this ship was actually fighting a war.

A war against fracking drones, instead of the frack-damned Sith that have Dustil–

"Are we waiting for her to jump first?" Dessa broke in. "There is no way we can cross the system, General Ordo, not unless we want to shoot our way through several unarmed civilian carriers, and that seems tactically unsound if we don't want to provoke immediate war–"

"Ping her again," General Ordo ordered.

Millifar nodded. There was a black–painted helm on the seat next to hers. Mekel knew it was for Kex. They'd done things like that back on Korriban too. Nothing as big as a helm, but–stones. A stylus. Once, a shoe.

"Revan says jump before we start a kripping war," Millifar reported. "Wait for her at the next stop. She may be delayed. Her ship needs an overhaul, and she–"

"You." Canderous pivoted to Mekel. "Pick a team and go after her. Here." He tossed Mekel a comm.

No fracking way, Mekel thought. You're more likely to get to Kaas in this tub than she is. She just ran her ship through a sun, how the hell can you expect–

"I'll go with Jin," Millifar announced. "We will take a small pinnace across the system and meet with her. Her ship—if it is capable of hyperspace flight at all—barely seats a quarter squadron. And we can't afford to lose more troops here."

"So soon?" Dessa frowned.

"Your choice," Canderous told his daughter, even though Mekel hadn't gotten one.

XXX

"I've never seen anything like it!" The announcer was practically delirious with joy. He sounded drunk, Helena thought. How embarrassing to think that had once seemed quite normal to her—that false exuberance. "That Aurek came out of nowhere—and pulled off the sun–shoot of the century! Have you ever seen such flying?"

"Every few centuries," Cally noted, to Helena. "But he's right. It's quite uncommon."

"They came in third and they weren't even registered," Helena commented. "I don't understand the commotion."

"I can't wait to see who—they're tractoring in the ship now—"

"Difficult to tell—it could always be a trick of some kind, but I believe the Force was involved here," Cally murmured.

"Are you saying the Jedi entered the race?" Helena sniffed. "That seems unsporting."

"I agree," Cally said. "Rather. But it's strange—there was that upset at the start with the cloaked ship—and now the news is focusing rather desperately on this lone starfighter." She sighed. "Pity about the Pinion. Not many of them left now."

"I didn't realize my companion was such an expert."
They exchanged a smile, and Cally reached for the tea pot. "I've had a great deal of time."

The screen closed in on the orbital hangar bay, and the battered military ship sitting there. It looked like a child's toy that someone had tried to melt—a bit blackened on one side, a little crooked on its struts.

As they watched, its side-hatch popped open, and two flight-suited legs emerged, followed by a helmeted figure, half-obscured by the co-pilot they seemed to be carrying. The cam zoomed in closer, revealing a woman and a man. She was rendered anonymous—by the helm covering most of her face, but the man's helmet was off, and his face was streaked with brown… ash?

Or blood. Dear me! "He's hurt!" Helena exclaimed.

"I need a medic!" the woman yelled. Surprisingly loud, even over the cam's mics. "Please!" Her voice echoed across the hangar like a bell.

The line of BisSec at the door broke, and seemed to mill around hesitantly—as two white-coated uniforms stepped through. For things like this, medix were always close at hand. It was such a shame Abasen had managed to off himself in some dank cave, instead of a brightly-lit hangar like this—

Helena Shan wiped away tears.

"Please!" The woman's voice cracked. "You have to help!"

"Rather hysterical, isn't she?" Cally chuckled. "No need to cry, Helena."

"I get so emotional." She smiled.

"Please! You have to help!" the woman repeated. Louder this time, more desperately. "Please!"

"Poor woman. Do you suppose that's her husband?"

"I'm not… sure." Cally froze the screen abruptly. "That is rather curious. The inflection there—just there…. One can have so many faces, but a voice—"

She waved at the screen and the timer jumped back.

"Please! You have to help!"

"I was watching that—" Helena protested. Really, just because they were chums now, was it necessary for the younger woman to sometimes treat Helena like she was the servant?

"Please! You have to help!"

Cally repeated the clip, pulling up the magnification. The woman's face was a blur behind the visor but the man's—

"I swear, he looks rather raffish," Helena offered. "Is he going to die, do you think? What madness! They weren't even registered, they'll obviously be arrested—"

"Please! You have to help!"

"Go live," Cally said. But she sounded… puzzled now. Distant.
"—identified as Jasp Organa, registered smuggler of Deralian, Derra Farm Adaston. The woman, who appears unscathed has yet to identify—"

"Organa," Cally said. "Curious."

"Common," Helena sniffed. "I'm sure you remember, Organa was the name of that creature the Jedi made out of Revan to murder my poor Bastila."

"Some flying you both did out there!"

Cally had changed the HoloChannel. At least it wasn't the dreadful mess on Katarr. Helena didn't want to hear about more Jedi dying. Too many memories.

"You don't have to answer their questions," the woman was saying to the man.

"He doesn't have to answer our questions," the reporter echoed, oddly—since that was his job.

"My daughter did it all," the man bragged. "She's the best pilot in the galaxy, aren't you, Pollie?"

"He's… uh, delirious. I'm… I'm not—" His daughter glanced up at the screen behind a tinted visor. A strand of dark hair had fallen over one eye. Her face was as ash-covered as her father's, features blurred behind the ferraglass helm. Her chin was pointed.

"Second—best," the man added. "I'm the best. Polla Organa is the second—best pilot in the galaxy and I don't want any of you lot to forget her. Don't… don't forget her… Pollie, they can't—you won't…"

"Turn those holo-cams off!" the woman snapped. Her hand moved—

The screen went to static.

There was a long pause, and then the sound of clapping. Cally Lee was applauding the blank screen and laughing as if another HoloNet outage was some kind of joke!

"Oh ho," murmured Cally Lee. "Unexpected. Every century or so… there's always the deliciously unexpected—"
Chapter 62 / The Line

A jolt of agony sparked on her spine, a phantom ache from her destroyed arm, sharp stabbing pains in her chest—

Ribs. Spine. Arm. But it's the poison that's the problem, Red. It's the poison that might end you still—

Malak—his hand slipped away from hers, small and slippery as Malachor’s, vanishing down a long, dark tunnel and then there was no light—no light at all—

XXX

In the darkness the woman did not dream.

But then there were noises—voices in the dark—

XXX

A door hissing open and soft laughter. A girlish sigh, and light steps across a stone floor.

"Here, Lord Malak." A feminine laugh, all artifice and no dignity. "I sent the slaves to the market for supplies—with all the shortages they’ll be gone for hours."

"Uh... here?" The voice cracked. Young. Not at all Malak’s. "You want to do it here? But she’s right... there—she’s—"

"Silly. No! Over here. The cot by the window where her slaves sleep. See? It has a lovely view."

Another giggle and the rustle of fabric falling to the floor, the clatter of armor following.

The air smelled too sweet and close. An air of corruption and a full fresher pot.

"No!" An age of octaves in that one syllable as the boy’s voice cracked again. "Put your clothes back on, Mydia. Her eyes are open. She’s watching us."

"The slaves say she does that." Footsteps tapped across the floor and then came the sound of snapping fingers. "Eyes open, no one at home. See?" The voice was closer now, right on top of her. Wind on her face and a snapping noise, hard against her left ear. A sharp thing that felt like a fingernail raked the side of her skull. "Nothing. Don’t be such a wet slatrap, Malak! You sound like Phylus."

"I’m... I’m not." A darker tone. "I don’t... um, it’s disrespectful. She’s... my wife."

The woman would have scowled at that, if she could have felt her face.

I am most certainly not your wife.

She felt like she should know the boy’s name, but she did not. But he was no Malak. Malak had loved her so much—
The girl sighed. “Was she any good? So thin and veiny.” A warm hand lifted hers and then dropped it. “The slave calls her a total veg.”

The woman willed the hand to move again on its own but it did not. Her body felt weighted with duracrete.

“Can’t we just go to your room?” The boyish voice was nothing at all like Malak’s. Accent from a Rim planet. Nothing of Coruscant at all.

Republic space. Not Sith. But this—scent of marri flowers and urea. The tinge of ozone. This is Imperial.

I know this place. I’m on Dromund Kaas. I came here. I came back—

“My room? That’s the first place Inse will look! Do you want her to know?” A pause. “Because I was going to tell her—but you should let me do it.” Another giggle.

I came back to face Tenebrae.

With that memory, came others. The boy—he had been Malak, once. No longer. But the ruse—

To fool Tenebrae. He pretends to be Malak. He’s terrible at it.

There was a hiss as the door opened again and then a new voice interrupted. “Mydia? What are you doing with Lord Malak?”

“Inse! What happened to your face?” A giggle. “Oh! Sometimes I forget how scowling is so aging—but then I always have you to remind me, don’t I?”

Inse. Mydia. Phylus. The Blais children. They are important. This is important. But the woman’s mind felt frozen under ice and she could not recall why. There had been a party—a battle—

I was injured. The wheeze of a respirator, the smell of antiseptic. But if the woman had a body, its workings were entirely divorced from her mind. Only the sounds and smells—

She willed her eyes to open, to close, to blink, to see—

“Hah.” Clack of heels on the floor, and the new, sharp-edged female voice continued. “Put some clothes on, dear sister, before Lord Malak falls out of that window trying to escape from you.”

“You’re just jealous.”

“Why would I be jealous?” The new voice sounded amused. “I was wondering if you wanted eggs with your breakfast this morning, dear Malak? Here—I brought your belt. You left it in my rooms last night—I found it hanging from the chandelier.”

Malak would never make a sound like a dying bantha. My Malak would never debase himself with the Blais sisters—they’re practically children—

“Children grow up,” a new voice murmured softly in her ear.

The light, when it returned, did so seamlessly. From one moment to the next. First darkness—then vision. Light shone in her eyes and the woman blinked as the world abruptly came into focus.
“We grew up,” the new voice added. A hand closed on hers. Cold.

Shapes resolved into selves: a scowling girl putting her clothes back on. Another, armored, standing in the doorway with an empty smile. Mydia and Inse Blais. The boy who pretended to be Malak was facing the window. The back of his head was bowed. His hair dull and disheveled, the back of his neck vulnerable—

The Force around him was nearly tangible in its darkness. A part of her quailed.

“No one made that one fall,” said the voice in her ear. “He leapt off the sithspawned cliff—he wanted to do it.”

The woman’s eyes looked up. An insubstantial feminine figure loomed over her, hazed in flickering light. Hair raised in a knot: a heart–shaped face, her blunt sweet profile turned and Beya Organa kissed the woman’s lips, slowly, as if savoring the touch—

The woman felt nothing.

Their eyes locked, and Beya’s smile slowly faded. “Walk with me,” she whispered. Her voice was hoarse as it had been after Malachor.

The woman sat up and swung her legs over the rails of her sickbed, eyeing the Blais sisters and their captive man, but they had all stopped moving—frozen, as if time itself had now stopped.

This is a dream.

She took Beya’s hand and stood up.

“Not a dream.” The Deralian shook her head and led her out of the room.

The woman spared one glance back at the thing now occupying her bed. A breathing mask lay half-over its face, its dulled eyes stared blankly, and one arm ended in a severed stump attached to a battered gold prosthesis.

Poor woman.

The skull was covered with a pelt of red hair; veins underneath too dark for her skin.

“She’s finally dead,” Sheris ventured. Their hands interlaced, and she had both of hers. “I was starting to think nothing could kill her.”

“No,” Beya said. “You’re not.” Her hand pulled. “You need to see.”

They walked through the streets of the shattered city. Makeshift charnel pits in every square. Everyone was masked and walking alone. The few nobles they saw had perimeter remotes buzzing around their heads like two–meter wide halos—warning all who trespassed to keep distance.

“It’s plague,” the woman said. “How is this possible?”

“Wasn’t this your plan?” Beya pointed to the line of slaves wearing masks, the droid guards replacing flesh. “Bring the Empire to its knees?”

“No! I would never!” The woman remembered the labs on Manaan. The ones Malak told her to neglect because his wife wanted them productive.

“I can help them,” the woman offered. She had before—for weeks on Coruscant. She could heal them. This would be no different.

“It’s too late,” Beya said. “But you needed to see.”

“Her plague,” the woman told her. “It’s here. I’m sorry.”

“No.” Beya shook her head. Her eyes glittered a full yellow, like tarnished gold. “You don’t get to do this. There’s no absolution. For either of you.”

The world contracted again—snapped back to the ceiling of the attic room, and the endless quarreling of Blais voices—

XXX

Time slipped and slid. She walked with ghosts through the streets of Kaas City. Feeling came back slowly—first the memory of an arm she no longer possessed. Then her toes, hidden under a weighted medical blanket. When the voices were quiet and the only sounds were sleeping breaths, the woman wiggled them, back and forth—until her knees bent too.

One day her other arm moved and her eyes focused on a gleam of starlight slipping through the window—or, more prosaically, one of the hovering patrol droids from the street. Lawless Kaas had a curfew now, the voices said—and checkpoints. Everyone was under quarantine.

Sometimes the voices were arguing about matters that she knew were important.

XXX

“People are dying, Yuthura.” A flat voice. “And Carth isn’t even sick. This is all my fault.”

“Objection: The glory-stealing slave Polla Organic did not infect sixty-eight points two sentients with the Rakatan plague on the way to transmit the pathogen to Carth Onasi. Polla Organic could not have done this! The prediction of which doorknobs, palanquin bars, and chattel needed to be touched to produce maximum vectors was a calculation far beyond the limits of a weak, Deralian brain.”

Deralian brain.

Beya? The woman had dreamed of her. She remembered dreaming of her.

But Beya was not here now. This time it was Malak’s shade who stood by the window again, staring at her with glittering gray eyes. He came often, but he rarely spoke. Sometimes she wondered if he was real at all.

“Point two? Sixty-eight?” That accent was Deralian too—voice of a Deralian smuggler who had no business in this place. “HK, I told you to only infect Carth!”

“Objection: The limitations you imposed instructed me to avoid contact with any sentient person. Slave chattel are non-persons. Doorknobs are also not sentient. A palanquin may carry a person within its walls, but the outside bars are carried by chattel—and again—”

“The droid did his job all too well.” That cool voice again. “Revan’s Jedi plague is ravaging the helpless, and we need to repair the damage.”

It was never intended to infect the slaves!

“Phylus said the servants told him Revan always planned to release the virus—”
Revan may have brought the plague, but I helped the helpless! I healed all those sentients in the Coruscant Underground!

“She left no further instructions?”

I did. With the cook to this household. Deckna. With the computer on Kashyyyk. But if I failed it could be another thousand years or more before someone was awake enough to hear them.

I did. Before I went to Atris for the Redemption, I left a note on my bedside table to be forwarded to my parents. I told them to remember they sold me to the Jedi.

I never thought Malak could kill me. I never thought it would be my thoughts inside this empty head—

Not empty. It’s mine. You are the intruder, the conqueror, but you will never have me.

XXX

“Not empty.” Malak’s voice startled her. She felt her physical hand twitch, heard the faint whir as if HK had tracked the motion. “Sheris never left, Red.”

The woman wanted to go to him, to walk with him in dreams as she had with Beya. But her bones were frozen. How could she trust him? In those first few moments of her death, (her false death, if this wasn’t some form of torture in the afterlife), they had been joined—but then—

He walked forward, passing through the suddenly insubstantial women—the Twi’lek and the Deralian. “For a time there was not enough left of you to see. I’ve been watching Malachor. Our son. You remember our son?”

I remember when you told me there could be no children. Because of her.

The hate seemed splintered—its reflection a broken mirror.

I am not her. I will not be her.

No. I am not—

I am no weakling.

No. I am no monster.

“You had a plan for this,” Malak whispered. Metallic coldness of his jaw against her ear. “One you never told me.”

I could not. You were compromised, Mal. Tenebrae would have known.

I could not. It failed. There could be no children. The medix said she had made certain of that in both of us.

“Revan’s plan,” her true love corrected. His metallic voice had a strange gentleness. “I knew of the other, Sheris. I always knew.”

Sheris had made the nursery room as exact as possible—extracting the details from the holostill Malak kept tucked in a box of old lightsaber parts. She’d found it innocently enough, looking for a new coil for her own hilt—so rarely used that the connectors corroded.

The image of the red-haired princeling. Wide-eyed and chubby in the white crib. The stuffed Wookiee. The butterflies. Malak had never told her. Sheris had had never known (at the time) if the boy was alive or dead.

She and Malak had shared everything. But never the child. She’d had the room built in their Thulian palace in secret. She’d had the builders killed. But still someone knew.

Someone always knew. Someone always told. The palace and its nursery burned by Lord Revan’s orders. And then, the next day, the medix’s report: presented unannounced to her on the silver breakfast platter. Her body. Malak’s. Technical terms that a sentient with her medical training understood all too well—

Extensive damage to the germ line—no viability.

You always had that piece of him that I could never have, Revan.

Because he was mine. You were nothing. A plaything. A pawn. Letting you reproduce would have been irresponsible. It would have given Tenebrae another piece to use against me. It would have been a threat to Malachor—

It would have been mine. I would have been better. I would have been kind—

“Stop,” Malak hissed. “The people of Kaas are dying.”

I never cared about Kaas or the Emperor. All I saw was you, my love.

While their masters died, the slaves were to rise in revolt. But I had to make the Republic safe from his touch—I failed as badly as this pathetic fool with her simple dream of another baby.

XXX

“Ask Revan Fracking Starfire.” A Deralian voice broadened into a deliberately careless drawl. A woman. Not Beya. The woman paced the floor in a slave’s red robes. “Ask her what the fracked plans were with this blasted plague. She won’t answer, but it doesn’t matter now.”

“I’ve tried to reach her mind,” the purple Twi’lek said. “But I’ve found nothing.”

“Because she’s brain dead.” The Deralian threaded her topknot with her fingers and flopped down on the cot by the window. “Sei and I should have left this chivhole when Onasi gave us the chance.”

“And yet, you did not.” The woman sounded curious. “Why?”

“Thought I could make a difference. Thought I could help Captain Obvious. He doesn’t deserve this banthashit. Neither does Darth Sulkypants.”

“I’ve tried to reach Dustil—”

“Yeah, I saw. Your duel was pretty even until he broke out the lightning.”

“It’s good we received the new kolto shipments.” The Twi’lek rubbed her arm. “Dustil considers me yet another authority figure who has betrayed him. We can only keep trying—”

“I just wanted to make a difference,” the Deralian said again. “Rescue Carth and his kid, maybe get that asshole Tenebrae where it hurts.” She hesitated. “Like she would have, if she hadn’t... lost.”

“Well, you’ve made your mark.” The lilac Twi’lek smiled. “Although the results of your difference have yet to be seen.”

“This rebellion would be easier to run if everyone didn’t keep dying of plague. Half the organizers that were there last week were gone last night.”

“If that droid can obtain more of the vaccine as she promised we can use it to encourage more to join us.”

“Yeah, well—” Polla snorted. “Mission still isn’t back from wherever. It’s been a week. Maybe she got melted down for parts.”

“Objection: the T3’s parts are worthless. No sentient meatbag would want anything from such a squat, clumsy carapace.”

XXX

HK? The woman tried to move her hand. Rebellion? Fools, the woman thought. What have you done?

XXX

The woman had been drifting in and out of consciousness now for days—trying to make sense of the garbled conversations between Polla Organa, Yuthura Ban (how was she on Kaas at all?), HK, and the Blais children. It seemed safer to feign unconsciousness as long as she had so little control over when she would lose it again. HK suspected the truth, Revan assumed, because one morning there was a small, neat vibroknife under her pillow that had not been there the night before. She’d slipped it under the mattress using up the faint strength she had when everyone was sleeping.

I will destroy you, Tenebrae. I will see you broken. I will see your worlds burned for all time—

“No.” A hand brushed her skull, tracing the place she knew should be scarred—where she remembered the pain. “You will not, Revan. You put aside your quest for vengeance long ago.”

“How do you know that?” She sat up abruptly, even as the world dissolved before she could glimpse it, leaving Revan sitting on a well–patched black–and–red blanket on a stretch of white sand. In front of her, the artificial waves from Coruscant’s manufactured sea rolled in, each one precise as parsecs.

Her uncle turned to her, legs crossed and raised an eyebrow. “I know my niece.”

“This is my responsibility,” she told Vrook. Or his hallucination. There had been so many. Most dead enough to be ghosts or Force visions, but sometimes the living intruded too. That child, Carth’s son. The Fragment’s template, blundering through careful arrangements like a bantha in a poraclay shop. The astromech droid, of all things—blurring sometimes into the guise of the dead Twi’lek that had originated its personality— A girl I never even knew.

“Alone?” Her uncle’s dry chuckle echoed the bitterness between them. “You couldn’t even handle two of his rancor.”

“I’m still alive. It's not done.” Was she? Was she? Her hair was loose around her shoulders. The waves lapped on the shore. But none of it was real.

A phantom hand squeezed hers. “No, child. You know how this works. First, he starts with the nameless. The innocent. The next cuts will be deeper.” His fingers tightened on hers. “Personal. She won’t be prepared for loss. You need to assist her—keep her from falling.”

“You need to be careful,” she warned him. Her voice sounded young. “If we fail, if they take Coruscant, Uncle Vrook—”

“Revan.” He took her other hand too. Her uncle’s eyes were very dark. “You need to wake up.”

“It's not safe.”

“She needs you.” His hand traced her cheek. “She'll come.”

“She can’t.” That sad sense of inevitability. “Are you with her? Can you tell her to be careful—as long as Tenebrae thinks she’s dead we’re all safe, but as soon as she surfaces—he will take her, he will put her in the tomb—”

“I can't.” His voice was gruff, so familiar that her dream self felt the phantom prick of tears in her eyes. “I can't help her, and I can't help you. Or my son.”

“Your son? The boy died.”

Mekel Jin had been his name. Dustil Onasi had mentioned it to the Deralian once in angry tones. He’d been clear. Very clear.

“Fools.” The word slipped out before she could temper the thought.

Vrook is dead. Dull relief that he could no longer be used against Revan came first, then the grief there was no time for. Not now. Not yet. Her rage should have broken the spell, set her awake, given her limbs motion, but instead it was useless, as useless as poor Sheris’s still–beating heart.

How did you die, uncle? She wanted to turn her head, to see the real world and not this memory, but her eyes were frozen, staring directly ahead, her body nothing but a dull weight, a numbness somewhere outside of her, alien and divorced.

“How did you die?” Her voice was frail, and the tears on her cheeks were as imaginary as the waves on the shore. Revan thought she remembered reading, in one of the more random intelligence reports from her Coruscanti spies, that the waves had been stopped, the water switched from salt to sweet, that the once–thriving markets had been closed on the Beach Promenade.

All those months on Coruscant and I never went to see.

“He takes your treachery as an act of war.” Her uncle squeezed her insubstantial fingers with his own. “As you did his. You need her.”

It has always been war, Revan thought tiredly. Maybe it always will be. Malachi was right all along—life is a cycle of endless conflict, and the Emperor just a manifestation more stabilizing than most; but if not him, the Rim would still demand independence, or the Mandalorians would raid—

“How did you die, Uncle?” A part of her envied him.
“Helping.” Vrook squeezed her hand again. “Trust her, niece. She is coming.”

“If the plague is here already, she may be too late—” Her head turned, but he was gone, the artificial sea with him. There was a weighted blanket on her body and warm sunlight on her face. Her eyes cracked open to the blinding light of day.

She blinked them, back and forth, focusing on the ceiling above. She must not come. He must not win.

XXX

“What came to pass on Katarr was a tragedy for the Jedi and the Republic. But from such adversity comes hope of a better tomorrow. In times dark as this, we need all remember that from even the darkest tragedies can come a new hope.”

The woman dressed in gray had braided her white hair into two long tails that hung down past her shoulders. It was a look that ill–suited—making her look older instead of younger. The woman Master Atris had been would have known that. This woman smiled, as she leaned on the podium, addressing the crowd, as if unnecessarily compensating for a body that had never been frail. The woman was now addressing the delegation of Telos officials and holo–press with a shrill authority that Brianna had never seen Atris require.

Master Atris had never worn gray either, preferring white, or garments made entirely of fur for the cold. Next to her, Mical Jorde wore his Jedi robes: pale hair slicked back, expression pinched and careful. Abruptly his head turned and he met Brianna’s gaze, nodding, as if they shared the same purpose.

The press conference on Telos Station was sparsely attended, mostly by drab Humans in ill–formed clothes. Brianna stared at the ruined planet below instead, wondering if she was seeing it now for the last time. Even barely recovered, Telos was beautiful.

Master Atris’s voice had been speaking for quite some time, but Brianna had long ceased listening carefully. She had contrived to remain in the back row, behind all of her sisters. That was as far away from Mical Jorde, the brother she had never known, and the woman who wore the face of her aunt, as possible.

Now, Brianna edged back another step, one closer to the door.

“The Jedi Temple at Coruscant is closed and dead, and so it shall remain,” Atris’s voice declared. “No Jedi walk there now—”

“Where are you going?” Dinara hissed.

“The fresher.” Brianna met her half-sister’s gaze steadily, trying not to feel guilty for the lie—or give away any doubt with her stance or her expression.

“Oh.” Her sister shrugged and Brianna backed past her, back into the hall, waiting to break into a run until she was halfway down the corridor.

She had timed it quite perfectly. The cruise ship Kuat Glorification was just issuing its final boarding screens. Brianna pulled up her hood and presented the boarding chip she had purchased mere hours before, when the feeling of wrongness had become as overwhelming as a whisper in the back of her mind—
“Hey!” The red-haired woman was a stranger, but she grabbed Brianna’s arm with utter confidence—assuming a familiarity she had no right to possess. “There you are!” The hug was so unexpected that Brianna let it happen—right up until the woman tried to drag her away from the boarding gate.

A blow to the solar plexus was usually enough to disable any random civilian—but somehow the red-haired woman dressed in green evaded the blow, catching Brianna’s arm in a durasteel grip and twisting it back.

A heartbeat later, Red Hair was sailing across the floor while sentients around them scattered.

“Just greeting my sister!” Red Hair called out, jumping easily to her feet. “Echani. You know how they are!”

“This is not how we are,” Brianna warned her. “And you are no sister of mine.” The crowd around them was dispersing hastily—as if, like most sentients, they wanted no trouble. “She’s not my sister!”

The woman didn’t appear to be Echani—despite the hair, her skin was a delicate rose-gold color, and she was dressed more like a civilian than a warrior.

“It’s true, I’m not. Silly, I wasn’t being literal.” The smile turned feral, and Red Hair’s hand beckoned Brianna closer—

Their next exchange was a smooth parry of feints—right up until the moment Red Hair’s arm wrapped around Brianna’s torso like a clamp, pressing something hard and smooth and sharp into her ribs.

“Phytitox,” the woman whispered in Brianna’s ear. “Dart’s on my wrist. Voice and motion-activated. One more twitch from you and you’ll be out for a week—not to mention puking blood when you wake up. They tell me it’s unpleasant.”

“Authorized bounty!” she called out raising her other hand. A hologram emblem flashed on the screen. “Private contractor for the Telos Security Force. Everything’s fine!”

That woman who was Atris would not let me go so easily. Brianna felt her muscles slack in defeat.

“You may as well kill me. Tell Master ‘Atris’ I would rather die than serve her.”

“Atris?” Red Hair laughed, not releasing her grip. Her voice dropped to a whisper. “Don’t be ridiculous. I don’t work for her. I’m Blade Eight of Ish’na’kar. I work for your brother.”

“That is no better.” It had been a childish dream to thinking running would be easy. “Where would Mical have you take me?”

“Mical?” Red Hair shrugged. “I don’t know who that is… but we need to get off this station before someone checks with TSF and notices my forged papers. My ship’s two levels down. Will you walk, or be dragged?”

What kind of trap is this? “Where are you taking me?”

The woman whispered in her ear.

Brianna frowned. “But I was just there!”

“Then you know how difficult it is to fly through all that debris.” Red Hair laughed. “Lucky my partner’s the best pilot this side of war. Just don’t get on his bad side—and let him win at chess.”

“Is his name Blade Seven? Or Nine?” Brianna smiled slightly. Despite the obvious trap–like nature of her predicament, Blade Eight had a certain infectious enthusiasm she was finding difficult to resist.

She’s allied against my mother. The enemy of my enemy is an ally.

“It’s Hanharr.” Blade Eight took her arm with the same familiar efficiency that Brianna and her sisters shared, leading her down a corridor. “He was a Genoharadan assassin hired to hunt me down, and I was one of Sion’s brightest blades. We met on Nar Shaddaa—quite the story. But he tells it better than I do—do you speak Shyriiwook?”

“Only a little.”

“It’s pretty easy, once you get the gist.” Blade Eight beamed again. She had dimples, Brianna noted.

XXX

Revan paced back and forth, eyeing the confused squads of BisSec security and the three dazed reporters. Some of the sents she’d compelled had that bewildered look in their eyes that said they might be coming out of it.

Two medix were seeing to Jasp. That was the most important immediate thing. And the cams were down—taken out with a spark of Force energy. That was also relevant.

Revan glanced back at her ship. The landing struts were half-melted, but Jasp had seemed to think the Jopheena could make at least another jump.

I need to be sure. I need to be absolutely sure.

“Get me mechanics!” she commanded the closest BisSec. “I need to get this ship checked! Fast.”

“You already asked. They’re coming.” He rubbed his head, looking confused.

She turned her attention to the medix with Jasp. “Is he all right?”

The female medix hovering over Polla’s da looked up at her. “He’s dehydrated, half-starved... but it’s nothing a kolto bath and some nutrition won’t cure—for the short term. His heart—”

“I know.” Da— Jasp— had closed his eyes and he was breathing shallowly, but she had to believe he’d make it. “You can replace hearts, right? We’ll pay.” Somehow. Just don’t ask me for a retinal scan to prove my credit.

“Look here!” An officer (by the size of his plated epaulets) strode forward. “You can’t just race the Biscain Hundred without proper registration! I need to take you into custody.”

“No.” she shook her head, throwing caution to the wind and weighting her words with the Force as hard as she could. “You don’t need to take me into custody.”

The Human man’s eyes glazed over. “I—I don’t need to—”

“Wait a second!” one of the reporters—this one a Bothan—interrupted indignantly. “I see what just happened! You just—you’re some kind of Jedi. Those are lightsabers on your belt! Our cams didn’t just all cut out for no reason—and you’re telling that guy what to think.”

“I’m not telling that guy what to think.”

“Oh no.” He shook his head, backing away. “Don’t think your mind tricks will work on me.”

“You said your name’s Polla… Organa?” Another reporter stepped forward nervously. “Uh, any relation to… the… is that really your name?”

“Yes,” she snapped. “My name is Polla Organa.”

“Your name is Polla Organa,” a few sents muttered, almost eerily in unison. Something about that made Revan feel like a hessi was walking over her grave but there was no more time to think.

“A Jedi—” one of the medix glanced up, frowning. “If you’re a Jedi, can’t you just heal this man yourself?”

“Do your job!” Jasp really didn’t look good.

He still looks better than Arkan did, burning up in that sun.

She’d destroyed her best weapon to defeat the Sith Empire.

“I will do my job.” The medical technician’s head bent down over Jasp again. He was packing him in what looked like kolto bandages. The kolto had an odd sheen to it on the derma–paks.

“What is that? Why are you doing that? He’s not injured.”

“It’s kolto,” the woman said. She was frowning. “The new kind’s good for stabilizing vital signs.”

The woman frowned up at her, amidst the excited chatter from the crowd, forehead wrinkled as if she was trying to sort something out. “If he said you’re Polla Organa, but you’re really a Jedi—”

“I’m not really a Jedi.” If I was a Jedi, I’d have a better plan than this. A Jedi wouldn’t have considered taking Arkan to the Sith to wipe them all out. The Jedi were trying to stop him and save the Force too—

“She’s not really a Jedi,” the man medic said.

“You’re not really a Jedi,” the woman agreed.

“ Took them long enough to get the new kolto distributed,” the Bothan reporter added. “At least it’s everywhere now—guess they finally got those trade deals worked out with Manaan.”

“Oh. Uh… good.” I will not feel guilty. “Guess I never saw it before.”

She recognized the look on their faces. It wasn’t fear—it was awe.

“But if she says she’s Polla Organa—”

“She can’t be Revan. Revan’s dead.”

Did the Council tell everyone I died? They have a frack of a lot to answer for—risking all those lives on Katarr. She should have felt angry, but right now, all Revan felt was a numb impatience mixed with worry for Jasp.

Ma will kill me if he dies. I’ll kill me if he dies. If he dies it’s all my fault—

“That footage could’ve been faked—”

“There were two Revans, remember? Maybe she’s one. Maybe the other one died.”

“But I thought Polla Organa died in that speeder accident with her family.”

“There was an insurance claim,” another reporter said. “We did a story on it at the time. I interviewed that unconscious guy myself. Seemed really broken up that his daughter was dead.”

The medix had unrolled a portable hover plat and were loading Jasp on.

“Where are you taking him?” The Force still nagged at Revan, like an itch on the back of her neck. Something’s wrong here—not just this.

“He needs to be stabilized. We have a medical transport for the racers.” The female medix frowned. “Uh… are you coming with us? We need next of kin to start the records request from his native—”

“Deralia,” the reported who’d been talking about Polla said. “His native planet would be Deralia, if he’s Polla Organa’s father.”

“But what if she’s Revan?” another asked.

“I’m Polla Organa,” Revan snapped. “That’s it.”

“That’s it, you’re Polla Organa—”

“Are all of you blind?” This speaker was a Weequay, one of the BisSec guards by his uniform. “Can’t you see she’s using that Jedi Force on you?”

“She can’t be Revan,” muttered someone else. “Revan’s dead. Didn’t you see the footage?”

Footage? Her temples throbbed, the feeling of wrongness increased. “That’s right, Revan’s dead.”

“Revan’s dead,” the Weequay repeated.

A little disturbing this was working at all. She’d never been good at compulsion—not that she’d ever been allowed to use it freely. Bastila had been quite clear on the dangers—

Necessity. But it’s wrong. I, of all people, should understand why not to frack with someone’s mind—

“Oh.” It had felt uncannily normal for a moment, standing there facing down two squads of guards. It seemed like a year of her life had been nearly all moments like that. “I’m not coming with you, Da. I’ll… I’ll call Ma—or, I’ll get them to call her. You’re going to be okay.”

He won’t. Something’s really wrong.
As if in time with her unease, the station alarms started going off.

“Pollie?” Jasp tried to lift his head. “I… I know you’re not coming with me. You need to go.”

“An evacuation alert has been ordered for the Biscain System, a mechanical voice chimed. “All vessels on this station have been commandeered for evacuation. There is no need to panic—”

“They always say that when there’s a need to panic,” one of the reporters sniped. He broke for the door. BisSec ranks opened abruptly and let them through.

“It’s the sun—did you see?”

“Who else?”

“Something’s wrong with it. We should go.”

“Her hair’s not red.”

“Hard to tell with that helmet on—”

“No, look. You can see that little bit there, by her face—”

Revan summoned the Force, breathing so deep she felt it crackle to her fingertips. “I’m Polla Organa. Not Revan. Heal him—here—give me your stylus.” She reached over and took it before the male medix could object, scribbling down Molla’s number on Deralia. “Call her. He needs to go back there—to her.”

“You are Polla Organa. Sure.” The medix’s expression looked dubious now, but he pocketed the comm code.

“There is no need to panic,” the mechanical voice said again. But the mechanics in the doorway stood muttering to themselves instead of looking at her ship.

“Fix my ship,” she commanded. “Make sure she can make hyperspace. Now.”

A few guards ran towards her with the mechanics and Revan stiffened, but they ran past, staring at her ship like the compulsion had hit them. One began polishing its side with her sleeve.

Get better, Da. The last Revan saw of Polla’s father was a limp gray hand as the medix escorted him out, followed by another squad of BisSec.

She was reminded suddenly of the Mandalorian party on Coruscant, when she’d lent her strength to Lin to compel a crowd. How had he done it?

Leave peacefully, she thought at the two remaining reporters. The Human woman broke for the door immediately, but the Bothan stared at her steadily, more curious than cowed.

Leave peacefully, she repeated, and several more guards broke for the door. There is nothing to see here. There is nothing wrong.

“There is nothing wrong,” a voice behind her said.

Revan turned to see one of her mechanics walking towards the door.

“I will leave peacefully,” he muttered. “I must leave peacefully—”
She grabbed his arm. “No. No! Get back to work!”

He stared blankly up at her, mouth half-open, a terrible blankness in his eyes. “I…”

“Please.” Revan let the Force drop completely. “Please. I need your help! Fix my ship!”

The man was balding, with a beaky nose and faded eyes. He blinked slowly at her, as if he was coming back to life. “What… am I—?”

“I need your help,” she said. “Please.”

“You’re that crazy kid who won the Biscain Hundred?” He snorted. “Gotta check your ship before she flies again.”

“Yes. I need your help.”

“Looks like the converter cables got melted. Need to clean corrosion off the plates.”

“Can you fix it?” She let go of his arm. “Please.”

“Course, I… they called an evac, but it’s not code red. We got time. I’ll get back to work.”

He nodded at her and walked, slightly dazed, back to where the other mechanic and the guards were raising and lowering the landing ramp.

Revan turned back toward the door just as more reporters crowded through it, along with more BisSec. Behind them, filtered viewscreens showed the binary suns. Something about the light, or the way the light was refracted through the ferraglass, made one of the suns look nearly black, overlaid atop the other.

_Arkan’s dead. He’s gone. Whatever he was, he’s gone. But maybe dropping him into that sun did something to it—_

XXX

“I don’t like the way that sun looks.”

“You’re not supposed to stare at the sun.” Millifar sighed to show her impatience for explaining the obvious to Mekel Jin. “Or suns. There are two of them. Have you never seen a binary system before?”

They were cutting across the system by the most direct route in the modified warbird—small for two, but fast. Millifar spared a moment to consider how well she might have done if she could have run this ship through the more circuitous path the racers had taken, before Jin’s useless observations dragged her back to the present.

“That sun on the left doesn’t look so good.”

“Then don’t look at it.”

They were fast approaching the great ring of the main Biscain Station. Revan’s ship had vanished into the leeward hangar meant for the racer’s finishers—and Millifar tilted their trajectory for that part of the ring. The pinnace’s comm pinged sharply—

“What’s that?” Jin asked.
“A signal from the Aleema. They made the jump.” Millifar moved her new, numb hand down to the pinnace’s yoke and used her good one to open up the thrusters as she banked them lee.

“Do you… we should talk. About… what happened.” Jin cleared his throat, sounding like a dewback calf bleating after its geld.

Barbarians. Always wanting to talk. Millifar did not wish to find Jin irritating, but he was being irritating. “Shall we discuss our plan to liberate Revan? Which weapons did you bring? I was too busy packing mine to check.”

“Some grenades. A vibroblade. But that’s not what I—”

Did he think she cared about his intent? “We’re going to have to teach you to shoot. I have an extra repeater.”

“I know how to shoot!”

Ah, she’d wounded his pride. “Everyone needs practice, vod.”

“I meant, we should talk about what happened on Katarr. I don’t blame you for what happened.”

“Why would you? Your accuracy could have been better against Lin. But the next time we engage him we will need more of those Force–destroying plants. What are they called again?”

“Ysalamiri. They're not plants, they—”

“They are tomorrow's battle.” Kex would not have needed reminding. “How have you prepared for the fight ahead of us?”

Jin’s voice developed an irritating whine. “These guys are just rent–a–secs. Do you think we’re really gonna need to kill them?”

“No. Of course we don’t need to kill them. Didn’t anyone ever teach you to fight without killing your opponent?”

“No.”

She knew he was staring at her, but Millifar kept her eyes firmly on the screen in front of them. It was odd, because she’d expected to encounter security interference before now, but there was no line of ships stopping them from entering the main orbital—fast–approaching on their screen. And, as she watched, several ships winked into hyperspace from the confines of the Biscain orbital’s drift space with almost no margin for error.

That was not normal.

Belatedly, Millifar noticed the red, blinking light on their comm board, indicating a local emergency broadcast. With both of her hands engaged on the yoke to stabilize their craft, (one of them irritatingly numb and clumsy still, compared to blood and bone), she couldn’t activate it.

“Ships seem to be leaving the system in unprecedented numbers,” she told Mekel, who was staring at her instead of the pinnace controls like a normal man. It really was his job to activate that emergency comm speaker, not hers. But she was not going to injure his pride by pointing it out.

“Yeah,” he muttered. “Maybe because there's something wrong with the fracking sun.”

We can't fix the sun, di’kut.
Kex, Millifar thought, would have known that already.

Bars on Iridonia were much the same as the bars that Lydie had seen on her missions to the Coruscanti Underground. Smokey and loud and over–crowded. What was most notable about this one was the fact that nearly everyone inside was Zabrak. With the dim light glinting on their horns and hair, and their shabby clothes, they all looked alike. The thought Lydie had had that she would instantly recognize her own relatives now seemed foolishly optimistic.

But the holo–broadcast on the main screen knocked such concerns entirely from her mind. It featured a press conference with Master Atris and Padawan Mical Jorde, broadcast from Telos Station. Lydie found it hard to tear her eyes away from the perfection of the Jedi master’s Echani face—or her mind from the ramifications of the Jedi master’s traitorous words.

“The Jedi Temple at Coruscant is closed and dead, and so it shall remain. No Jedi walk there now. Those few that remain have fled from the ashes of Katarr—I do not know which paths they walk; but I do know the Jedi cannot save the Republic. Such work is the labor of us all—” Master Atris wore her hair in two long braids. Her hands gripped the podium, leaning over it

“Excuse me.” A man wearing some kind of uniform raised his hand. “Are you saying your first act as leader of the Jedi Order is to… dissolve the Jedi Order?”

The announcer sounded astonished.

Next to her, Azen was uncharacteristically muttering under his breath. “What is Atris doing?”

“The Jedi cannot save us from the threat that comes. Against an enemy of the Force, we will require another kind of weapon. The officers of your Republic Fleet acted in good conscience. The Jedi on Katarr sacrificed themselves to keep the galaxy safe. We must all rise to their example—”

“They're dead?” Lydie had not felt it in the Force. She should have. She should have felt something, shouldn’t she? “The Masters on Katarr… died?”

It was all for nothing?

Azen looked grim, but he reached for her hand and squeezed it. Uncharacteristic—of late. “We knew it was a possibility. Darth Nihilus will continue to Sith space. We must rally the Jedi for his return.”

By gathering where he can eat us again?

“No.” Lydie shook her head. She wasn’t sure why, but she was abruptly sure that was not how things would resolve. “Azen, why would Master Atris say that?”

“I don’t know.” His tones were frost. “Atris is well off–script. That is… a concern.”

“Lydie–lu?” The voice was hesitant behind them.

Lydie turned her head, looking up at the Zabrak woman standing over their table. Her indentations were seamed and worn, and her hair more brown than gray but she looked uncannily like her sister, the late Marla Korr.
“Yes.” She stood up, aware that Azen was still frowning at the vidscreen near the front of the bar. “Nelle? Nelle Korr?” Mother? Ma? It probably should have occurred to her sooner to think of what to call the woman.

The woman nodded slowly. “You... you're such a young lady!”

“This is my husband.” Lydie suddenly felt shy. “Azen Loanin.”

Her mother’s indentations above her eyes had curled in upon themselves, forming whirls above her eyebrows that made her look perpetually surprised. “I am happy for you,” she said, dipping her horns slightly. A memory Lydie could no longer recall thought it was a gesture of respect.

“And I, you,” Azen told her. “I can see where Lydie gets her beauty.” The words might have meant more if he hadn’t been staring at the screen.

“There is no more Jedi Order,” Master Atris murmured on the holo. “But there is one last Jedi. One final hope for us all. One brave Jedi knight did not follow Revan and Malak into darkness, but stood fast against the dying of the light—”

“Lydie–lu?” Her mother’s voice was hesitant as if she was reluctant to interrupt two very important Jedi. “Your da and Attina and her girls are all waiting for us back at the ranch!” She reached out her hand and Lydie took it, not wanting to seem rude.

Dear Ma,

It’s lovely to see you again after so many years but give me a moment to mourn the Jedi masters who raised me, because this announcer said they're all dead.

Lydie swallowed. But if the Jedi are all dead who is Atris talking about?

“It’s good to be home,” she told her mother numbly. “Just... give us a moment. The news—”

“Oh, that.” Lydie’s mother dismissed the destruction of the Order with a shrug. “Can't believe half of it and the other half’s too damned sad. You’re both well away from it.” Her mother beamed. “And just in time from the look of those indentations!” Spots of pink appeared on the dusky gold of her cheeks.

“This is insanity,” Azen muttered by her side. “Mical’s standing right there. How can he allow this? What does Atris plan to do with Surik?”

“It has to be a feint of some kind.” Lydie frowned—squeezing her Nelle Korr’s hand gently, and trying to detach her own fingers. “Who’s Surik?”

“Meetra Surik.” Azen’s lips thinned. “I was a mere padawan stationed on Alderaan, of course, when she returned from the wars; but the Council informed me of what was done—she’s no Jedi. She no longer has the Force.”

“She blocked it?” Lydie had been a mere padawan then too, but far too shy to express any curiosity about the end of the war. Not to her Aunt Marla, who suddenly became terribly busy.

“No.” Her husband frowned. “She was... damaged. Master Kae stripped the Force from her to save her.”

Save her? Like Mekel, Lydie thought. Like with Mekel, it seemed too cruel a punishment, even for a Sith. “Why does Atris want her?”
“It doesn’t make sense.” The pinched lines in his face grew and he glanced between Lydie and her mother. “I’m afraid I may have to cut my visit short.”

“You can’t!” Lydie had barely known the woman who bore her for more than five remembered minutes and already they were speaking in unison.

“Azen, you can’t!” she added, as her mother put a soothing hand on her husband’s arm.

“We’ll need to get your patterns matched,” Nelle Korr told them, wrinkles furrowing around her horns. “That has to be done before first pearls. It’s quite important.”

“It’s too late for that.” Lydie smiled, despite everything. “Azen gave me a lovely krayt string of pearls as a wedding gift. I’d show you, but we left them in the vault when we left Coruscant—”

Her voice trailed off because now Azen was looking like he’d been Force–shocked. “Pearls,” he said, staring hard at Nelle. “You mean the abdomen show. The horns beneath the surface.”

“Pearls.” Nelle nodded, her expression beatific. “Didn’t you know?”

Beneath what surface? Lydie had no idea what Azen was talking about, although of course he’d studied everything about Zabrak culture before he’d even asked for a kiss.

“Your indentations are flushed,” he clipped, turning his gray–ice gaze to her. “I assumed it was the strain of travel—a trick of the light. But the horn show appears at about eight weeks gestation.”

Gestation.

“That’s impossible,” Lydie said, her voice racing ahead of logic. “Azen and I—we had tests. We’re not genetically compatible. The med–droid said I was too sensitized to his blood–type—”

“Then it’s a miracle,” her husband murmured, eyes dry and cold as space. “Congratulations, my wife.”

Xxx

“I’m pretty sure her arm moved. Just now.” Polla eyed the busted med–scanner with disgust. Thing looked like it had been fallen over and stepped on, but no one admitted to breaking it. Had been more than a week since they’d been able to get independent readings on the veg.

Her eyes went to the silent red–eyed droid in the corner, still and quiet now, and seemingly deactivated. Her credits were on him busting the med–scan. Maybe he thinks if we know she’s dying we’ll stop putting the feed lines in.

“She may wake tomorrow or never. But the amount of damage—” Yuthura Ban sighed. “Poor Sheris.”

“Who is Sheris again?” There had been the garbled account she’d gotten from Captain Obvious, but it still wasn't clear. Body swapping? Some kind of Revan duplicate? “I mean, the real Sheris is dead, isn’t she? Revan—” that schutta— “she took over?” Polla had heard the story before.

“This was Sheris’s body.” Yuthura sighed, again stating nothing but the obvious.

“But who is she?”

“She was a friend.” Yuthura Ban had said she took drugs to look Sithy now. Polla thought maybe she’d overdone it. Her eyes were almost fluorescent yellow against her vein–striped skin. “After Malak’s end, Sheris and I were both imprisoned on Manaan. She grew very close to your cousin, Beya.”

“Yeah, yeah. I know she knew Beya. But why did make herself look like Revan in the first place? Was she a superfan? Did Revan make her do it?” Was that something Sith Lords did—get duplicates? Polla supposed it was handy now, because the real thing was off Bith–free, living on Deralia, (while her duplicate died in a coma and Polla was trapped as a Sith slave), but that couldn’t have been the original plan.

“I don’t know. Sheris was Malak’s lover. Perhaps she became the image of Revan for that.” Yuthura shrugged. “Perhaps as an assassination decoy. Perhaps Revan always wanted the option of another body in case something befell the original.”

Suddenly it gave Polla the creeps. She’d dyed her hair back to a shade resembling its former dark brown the second she’d found the means, but her eyes couldn’t unsee the resemblance between them she’d once tried so hard to find, once, even with the other woman so pale and still.

Count me out, sister. My days of imitating Revan are done. “Sheris is dead now, right? Sheris died when the real Revan took over?”

“I’m no expert on Redemption techniques.” The other woman’s lekku twitched, and she gave the word that weird emphasis—like it was a thing. “I was always told that the new personality is supposed to be a composite of both, but after Sheris used Revan’s holocron, she seemed to become entirely… Revan. Perhaps the implanted personally was too strong.”

“Right, because Revan’s fracking magical,” Polla was getting tired of hearing that. “Hey, if you’re playing nursemaid now, how about you start the tub for the all–powerful bint’s sponge bath? I’d like to take a nap.”

The nap idea became less appealing almost immediately, when she found a lacy scrap of thing–like fabric tangled in her sheets that wasn’t hers. She and Yuthura shared the cot—sleeping toe–to–head—but as far as she knew (not that she’d looked closely) the Twi’lek didn’t even wear underwear.

“Ewww.” Polla made a face and started stripping the bed. When she went to get the pillows the light glinted off the veg’s eyes, reminding her it was time to refresh the gel they put in them. From this angle, even coma–lady looked disgusted. “Mydia brought Dustil here again.”

“He’s strong. The sisters want that.” Yuthura looked disgusted too. “I’ll get the clean bedwraps from the laundry.”

There was a clattering noise behind them. “He… he refused her.” A faint voice, raspy from disuse. Then a cough. “I would… still change the sheets.”

Polla whirled around, her hand automatically going to her waist, even though there was no blaster there.

Green eyes stared back at her steadily from a pale but conscious face.

Declaration of Joy: Oh, Master, I knew this day would come! Your neurons have fully regenerated! You have control of your limbs! Your carapace appears battered but capable, although I recommend re–commencing combat training at once—”

Coma–lady was sitting up, looking gaunt and pretty terrible, but definitely conscious. The dark lines that had covered her face from the poison had faded. She’d taken off the respirator and pulled the tubes out of her mouth herself, throwing them on the floor. Now she was doing the same with the ones in her arm. “This diaper I’m wearing appears to be full.” The expression of disgust on her face was just like the one she’d had when she and Polla met for the first time. Good time that was too. “I—I’m not sure I can stand up to change it myself.” Her face flushed—with exertion or embarrassment.

“I’m getting the sheets,” Yuthura said. “It’s good to see you awake, Revan.”

Coma–lady nodded. “You shouldn’t have come, Yuthura, but I’m… I’m happy to see you too.” Sure didn’t look it, with those downcast eyes.

“I came to help Dustil,” the woman said. “But if you saw Dustil and Mydia…?” Yuthura raised her brow ridge.

“He rejected her advances. I think the boy is loyal to Inse Blais, although I’m not sure that’s an improvement.”

“She means how long have you been awake spying on us,” Polla snapped. She’d brought Seiran up here a few times, and while they’d never had sex in front of Coma–lady, they’d certainly said enough shit about her.

“I heard… fragments.” The woman started coughing, and despite her being pissed, Polla went over to the fridger and pulled out a bulb of water. “For a long time, I heard voices—but I couldn’t move.”

“Go slowly, with that—” Yuthura noted.

“I know.” Revan straightened her back, managing to look down her nose at both of them at once, even half-slathered with kolto paste and wearing only bandages. Her fingers were cold when they brushed Polla’s as she took the water and unsealed the straw and took a cautious sip. “It’s… it’s good.” Her lip trembled, and for a sec, Polla thought she was going to cry.

“It’s just water.” The diaper the woman was wearing really did need attention. All this magic tech in the Sith Empire and they’d never mastered anything as clever as Abasen’s self–cleaning eridu blanket.

“It’s good.” Revan wiped her hand and took a breath. “I’m sorry to ask, but would you—”

“Yeah.” She was already pulling a clean one out from the cabinet. Yuthura had scarpered. HK was burbling happily to himself— itself—in the corner. HK could be doing this. He’s said he knows about Human anatomy enough times when he threatened to torture me—

Had been a tense few hours before it became obvious that all the droid could do was make idle threats.

The woman was stiff as a board as Polla moved her around to make the appropriate adjustments, but when she brandished the clean diaper, Revan shook her head. “No. Find me some clothing. Appropriate to my station, if you can.”

“I did,” Yuthura announced from the doorway, before Polla could come back with a snappy comeback. “Your old robes were destroyed in the battle, but Inse’s dress armor should fit you—I think.” She frowned. “We may have to buckle some of the pieces twice.”

“Statement: Master, now that you have returned to full cognizance would you like my performative review of your subject’s loyalty? Despite their politeness now, these two made several inappropriate remarks in your presence—especially the Deralian.”

“I don’t care, HK.” Revan rubbed her temples, looked at Polla. “Why are you still here? I was under the impression my battle was supposed to win your freedom.”

“You won Seiran’s freedom, but he won’t leave—and Dustil’s—but he can’t. The Blais family owns me.” She should never have signed the teaching contract written in Ancient Sith—or assumed, just because it didn’t have the runes for death on it (one of the words she’d been sure to memorize), that it was fine because Phylus Blais (the ‘trustworthy’ kid) had said so.

“Tenebrae should have overruled the House of Blais and granted your freedom.” The woman was opening and closing her prosthetic hand and frowning, making Polla wonder if she’d reattached it incorrectly. At the time, she’d only been fiddling with it because she was so fracking bored. “Tenebrae should have made you leave. It was our agreement.”

Carth had said something about Tenebrae having the final say a few times. Seiran had mentioned it every day for a month before he gave up.

“He offered. I… didn’t want to just leave.”

“You don’t owe me anything, Polla Organa.” Green eyes examined her like Polla was a lab specimen.

“It wasn’t for you. It was Carth. The HK said if he got the Jedi Plague Tenebrae wouldn’t be able to possess him anymore.”

“Is that why you released the virus on this world?” the woman snapped, as if her politeness before was all a fracking lie. “I’m so sorry that causing the death of thousands and destabilizing a planet has been difficult for you—”

“If you know, why are you asking?” Should she feel more fracking guilty than she did already?

“Objection, Master! Polla Organic may have suggested the idea of infecting the Fragment’s meatbag husband, but she was not the one to release the Rakatan virus. Setting those self-replicating strands of organic matter free was one of my proudest achievements. I spent days plotting the appropriate vectors for maximum transference—”

Revan’s head turned. “And a rather elastic interpretation of your programming directive—do no harm.”

“Wounded Exhalation: Master, had I flesh, it would be bleeding a glorious crimson under the lash of your cruel words. Reminder: you wanted this virus released on this planet yourself. Why else leave the stores with House Blais?”

“After the slaves were vaccinated. After the Republic was safe.” Revan took another shaky sip of water, glaring at Polla. “At least you weakened him. More than you realize.” Her hand reached up to her head and touched her scalp gingerly as if she was wondering what had happened to her hair. “You may have reduced the possibility of us needing to take more extreme measures.”

More extreme than a plague with that’s killing more than half of the sents that get sick? Polla didn’t think it had been that high back on Coru, but she hadn’t really been paying attention.

She stepped back, letting Yuthura handle the getting dressed part and chucked the diaper into the incinerator set into the wall. The drawer was large enough for a body, she noted again, darkly. Something that had occurred to Polla before.
“I will go to the tomb then.” Just like her droids, Revan Starfire had the annoying habit of announcing things like they were orders, even if you had no idea what she meant. “This body survived terentatek poison. It must be strong enough—”

“Your tomb?” Polla asked hopefully, tossing the new sheets on the cot.

“Yes.” Revan Starfire, former scourge of the galaxy, stared at the floor.

,XXX

For every sent that left the Biscain station’s hangar bay, it seemed like three more entered. After what had happened with the mechanics, Revan stopped trying to influence the crowd—focusing on keeping them asking questions instead, so the mechanics could fix her ship and no one would take—or try to take—her into custody.

She’d given up trying to stop the holo–records. For every cam she fried, it seemed like two more popped up in their place. Now, holo–cams from this new crop of reporters kept flashing, blinding her eyes. Revan blinked to clear her gaze and pointed to the nearest raised hand. “Next question?”

“What made you decide to crash the race today?” It was that Bothan again, but now his expression was friendly, open—if anything a little too open.

Surreptitiously, Revan glanced behind her, where the techs had the main fuel cores dialed open from the outside. It looked like they were sealing some of the scorched plates around them. It didn’t look like Jopheena could fly anytime soon.

“Well, my da always wanted to run the Biscain Circuit... I mean who doesn’t? I’m glad we got to go together, I mean, it was a huge honor. Huge.” She glued the smile on her face, glad the visor hid the rest of her expression.

“But your father is Jasp Organa, the father to the Polla Organa who died mysteriously about a standard half-year ago? So that means—”

Means I really need to get the frack out of here. Revan cast a glance at the mechanics still repairing the Jopheena. “Hey! Can she fly yet?”

“Once we put the drives back together. Definitely. Landing might be a problem—”

“I can handle it.” Somehow. I’ll catch up with the Aleema. They can tractor me in.

And then?

Then? I don’t know. Then we go carpet bomb a few Sith planets. A show of force might at least impress Tenebrae—make him and Dar remember who they’re dealing with.

Revan wasn’t sure if she was joking or not.

“So… Polla Organa,” another reporter demanded. Ratakki, by the look of him, covered in tattoos. “Did you think you could get away with faking your own death and collecting the insurance?”

“You’re saying I did all that?” Never tell them anything. Jasp had once told Polla, but Revan had already given too much away. “I–I think that's enough questions.”

“But, you are the Polla Organa who was legally declared deceased and whose family collected two million credits—”
Frack. “I think we’ve had enough questions for now.” Revan’s fingers twitched and she pulled at the Force.

“No, I’ve got several more—”

“I think that’s enough questions!”

“You think that’s enough questions.” The Ratakki nodded slowly, his eyes suddenly, utterly blank. His mouth dropped open. Like so many of his people, he’d filed his teeth, inset them with jewels. They glittered as a thread of drool snaked down the corner of his lip. “Enough questions.”

“No, I—” Hells. “Are you… okay?” He was obviously not.

The Rattataki took a step forward, the blankness changing abruptly to fury. “That’s enough questions!”

“What did she do to him?” The crowd around them splintered, edging away, dissolving into a babble of excited voices. The holocams flashed.

The Rattataki man pulled out a vibroblade from his belt, whirling to face the nearest woman who had wondered.

“No questions!” He roared, advancing.

“Stop!” It was hard to direct the Force at one sent, but Revan tried—and was rewarded with the man freezing mid-step. “You have no more questions for me,” she amended. The sick feeling in her gut increased as the man’s shaved head turned back to her, and nodded slowly, putting his foot back down.

“No more questions for you,” he repeated. He still looked blank—like her compulsion had taken a part of him away.

Bastila had warned her about the danger of bending another’s mind to her own will. Oerin Lin had tried to teach her to do it well.

But suddenly all Revan could remember was the worst time she’d used it.

Xxx

Revan. I knew you would come. Come to me—now.

Under different circumstances, it might have even been comical: Bastila’s fawning avarice, Carth’s cowardice, Zaalbar’s blind obedience, and this—the little Twi’lek’s blind faith in a Deralian smuggler with a heart of gold.

Your power is renewed. Come to me.

I’m coming to kill you, Malak.

If you can.

Her eyes went to the Mandalorian general who stood at the ramp. Canderous’s expression was hidden behind his helmet, but intent was clear in every line of his stance. “We should go,” he muttered. “I said I’d follow you, Revan. And I meant it. To the end.”
She nodded once, even as Bastila launched into a blustering speech about victory and darkness and fools.

There is no time. Come.

There’s time to die, Malak. Only Canderous truly understands. A leader takes the pieces she requires but the rest—sometimes there is sacrifice. Sometimes necessity is expedition.

The voice in her head seemed to darken until it reverberated in her skull. I allow no more time. Come to me. Bring what you require to face me, sithling. You are not Lord Revan again—yet.

I am. The temple opened to me.

Because I willed it.

Your will is nothing compared to mine.

You are nothing compared to your destiny, Starfire. This is the crucible. This is the final check—

“No,” Mission interrupted. “No way, Polla! This isn't you. Bastila’s done something! Snap out of it! Please.”

“Step aside,” murmured Bastila. Her eyes were yellow. Revan could taste her fury burning through them both like a brushfire cleared of its bounds—their flame could encompass this planet, this system—all worlds. Her rage? Bastila’s? There was no difference now. “Lord Revan has no more time for fools.”

“No.” Mission faced down the mad Sith, her eyes clear and bright. “Polla couldn't have done that stuff. She wouldn't kill Jolee and Juhani—not unless you made her, and Malak made you! You did something to her brain and he did something to yours! Snap out of it, Polla! Please!”

Yes, Malak made me—me and Bastila both. Revan would have to thank him for the raw power now twisting through their bond.

The girl will die on the Forge, Starfire.

Bastila’s voice chimed in, another maddening whisper. She is a distraction. He will use her against you.

I can’t afford attachments. Juhani and Jolee refused to understand. Carth did—that’s why he ran. But Mission needs to know too. I have to make her see—

The girl will die anyway.

“I won't kill you, Mission. But Zaalbar would if I asked.”

Xxx

“No more questions,” she said. In the sudden silence, Revan couldn’t tell if her words were a plea or a command.

“No more questions for you,” the Rattataki reporter mumbled. His eyes were glazed over, like frost.
“I think we’ve had enough questions for now,” Mother said to the man who kept shoving a mic in her face.

“Yeah,” Kore muttered, glancing at Ma-Molla for agreement but she was still sitting there, staring at the screen above the breakfast table, mouth slightly open. “They shouldn’t be so bossy with her.”

“I need to go,” Ma-Molla picked up the breakfast dishes and then put them back down again. She looked scared. Kore had never seen her scared before. “They’re just on Biscain. Not so far away! I can put a call into General Information—”

“Your husband will be fine,” Kore assured her. “My moth-my ma wouldn’t send him away with those medic-guys if he wasn’t gonna be fine.”

Ma-Molla just blinked at Korrie like he wasn’t even there.

Abasen took that instant to wake up from his nap and start squalling.

“I’ll tend to him,” Kore offered, even if he wanted to watch Mother lie to the reporters more because it was funny. Was she using the Force on them? It sure looked like it.

That was a neat trick.

“No.” Ma-Molla didn’t smile or anything. “Stay. I’ll call from the other room.”

“Okay.” Was she jealous that Kore wanted his real mother right now? Or was she just worried about her husband? “Mother won’t let anything bad happen to your husband!”

Click. The door slid shut behind her.

“Ma-Molla?” Korrie had this sudden bad feeling. Or sad feeling. Especially when she didn’t answer.

XXX

Moll Organa stood stock-still at the foot of the stairs, listening to that child call for her and trying not cry—for Jasp, for her daughter—and even for the gray-eyed boy in there, who terrified her as much as she’d grown too fond.

He’s the son of Sith. He’s gonna grow into one of those fancy Coruscanti politicians. The kind Jasp hates. The kind you think are right eejits. He can’t stay here forever. You know he’s still calling his friends back home. Grass Priests, probably only a matter of time before some Coruscanti muckety-muck comes looking for him, and you know how they are—he’s told you stories that’d curl your hair if it wasn’t already. They might just soon as kill him then collect.

I need to go to Jasp. I can take Abasen, but that one—what if something happens? What if we’re out in the Core and he gets recognized? Or kidnapped? Or we run into Jedi? Or… insurance investigators?

“I’m Polla Organa,” Revan Starfire had said. Didn’t that fool Jedi realize what she’d done—telling the whole galaxy that Polla Organa was alive?

“Polla’s going to kill her,” she muttered to herself. As if that’d be an even match, her Pollie against a woman who could practically fly.

Abasen made a noise on the monitor again and Moll hurried up the stairs to him, putting off the decision–making for another five minutes, at least.

The idea of what to do, when it came, was not a good one. But Molla couldn’t think of better.

XXX

Mekel felt useless. He’d saved the girl and he'd thought she'd be grateful. Instead, Millifar kept insulting his combat skills and ignoring his pretty fricking obvious points about how one of the suns looked like it was going bad.

The other ship, the Pinion the Mando’ade creamed themselves over, had fallen into that sun with the Force–eating Sith Lord on board. Mekel thought he'd had a legitimate concern, thinking a sun going nova or something could cause a fricking problem. One of the first science lessons they’d had after exploring the effects of vacuum on organic flesh on Korriban had dealt with energy and the release of matter. For every action, a reaction. Just like a stimmed–up prisoner with a shock stick shoved up his ass, energy had to find somewhere to go.

The Force had gone into that sun.

Therefore, it's gonna come out. Just like the shock stick. Question is, how long—

Millifar docked their pinnace at the first open hangar on the station. If the Force had been with them, Revan would have been there. But the Force was not. The hangar was just full of sents trying to leave.

“How are we supposed to find her?”

Millifar didn’t look back at Mekel to answer him—she just kept charging down the hall. They were going against the wash—everyone else was evacuating. Everyone around them was talking about the fracking suns—and how no one was sure what had just happened to them, but that it was definitely bad.

“I told you so,” Mekel told her again, finally catching up. “Something’s wrong with the fracking sun.” He reached for Milli’s arm, which was something she’d used to like, but his fingers closed on metal instead of bone and she nearly flinched when she pulled away.

“It doesn’t matter,” she snapped. “There’s nothing in this system of any strategic value. We need to find Revan.”

A man charging in the opposite direction gave them a startled look, but he didn’t stop moving.

On the bright side, we haven’t had to shoot anyone, Mekel thought. “Maybe… don’t say her name out loud?” he suggested to Milli.

She looked as if he was speaking Bith.

Two medix pushed past with some old guy hooked up to a bunch of monitors. Ahead, a cluster of guards surrounded the last hangar door entrance on this level.

“Move aside!” a voice said behind and then an entire fracking holo–team trooped by, approaching the guards. Mekel glanced at Millifar, raising an eyebrow, and the two of them attached themselves to the entourage’s end, behind three camera–droids and a shaggy Jenet wearing what looked like a silver–foiled helmet and a smile and not much else.

From the chatter at the head of their train, it seemed that they were part of the Rim Broadcast Network, here to interview the third–place winner of the Biscain Hundred, a mysterious Deralian in some kind of salvaged military ship.

Would have been comical, maybe, if it hadn’t been so fracked.

XXX

“I think that’s enough questions,” Revan repeated. “Please.” Her temples throbbed. She was no longer trying to use the Force, but it was there, an almost tangible field running through everyone in the crowd, through everything in the room.

“I think that’s enough questions, the Human woman interviewing her nodded. “But—”

“I need to go now.” She was distracted, because coming toward them was another pack of newsagents, led by a tall rat–like sent wearing some kind of silver tower on his head. “I need to go—” she repeated; but her concentration splintered, because behind the rat–man—Jenet, he’s a Jenet—was Mekel Jin and Millifar Ordo, both wearing full beskar, helmets clipped to their belts.

“There’s my replacement crew now!” she added, taking a step back and sideways.

“Oh, I think I need just one moment of your time,” the Jenet chirped softly. “Just one.”

“Make it fast.” Mekel and Canderous’s daughter were both armed. Revan jerked her head toward the ship, wondering how they’d found her—and relieved that they had. One of them can get this ship out of the hangar—

“ Aren’t you tired of these games?” Something about the rodantine’s voice made Revan give him a second glance. Ordinary, except for the silver mask–thing on his face.

“Sure, but my Da wanted to run the race so we did.” Revan shrugged. “Now, we’re done, so—”

“Oh, yes. Your father.” The voice chuckled, softer. “I first saw him on the Yavin moon. I remember him because he was so much like you. Nothing compared to Kun or Qel–Droma, of course, but still… powerful. Notable. Useful.”

“That’s…” that doesn’t make any sense. Jasp was on Yavin Station—but of course, the Jenet wasn’t talking about Jasp Organa.

Useful? “Who are you?”

“Oh, do go first. Who will you say?” That wet nose twitched. The headpiece hid most of the Jenet’s face, just as most of hers was hidden, but his mouth bared teeth in a smile of challenge. “I made a wager with one of my Voices about your response.”

“I’m Polla Organa.” Revan suddenly felt ice–cold—like a childhood nightmare brought to life.

My father was useful? My father was useful to... who?

“Third Wife,” Millifar’s hand clamped down on her arm and tugged. “It is past time for us to leave.”

“I know.” Revan lifted her hand and the rat–man’s silver headpiece blew off and spun across the floor. Millifar took a step back, retreating closer to Revan’s snub. Dimly, Revan was aware that the Mandalorian had taken her blaster out, training it on the Jenet. Mekel on her other side had muttered a curse and done the same.

“Who are you?” Revan repeated to the rat–man, even as the cold seemed to freeze the marrow of her bones, the galaxy seemed to narrow to two glowing eyes. Red eyes. Do Jenets have red eyes? “Tell me. Who the hell are you?”

Around them, holo–cams abruptly flashed blue–white, glancing off the ceiling, the polished floor, the BisSec armor. Revan blinked hard, almost blinded, but in the center of the maelstrom, two red circles burned, outlined with wisps of black.

The sents around him seemed to recede. Everything did, to a soft noise, dulled by the frantic beating of her own heart, the taste of fear in her throat.

The man smiled, snout curving under his twitching whiskers. When he spoke again his voice was a spike into her skull. “I allow no more time, Starfire. Come to me.”

XXX

The world twisted as the galaxy dropped out of it—and again she was back on that terrible shore on the Rakatan planet, standing with Bastila before the remains of her crew.

A madman was screaming in her head.

I allow no more time. Come to me. Bring what you require to face me, sithling. You are not Lord Revan again—yet.

Her responses were weak, burned away in the blaze of her errant conviction. She had been… wrong. So utterly wrong.

You are nothing compared to your destiny, Starfire. This is the crucible. This is the final check—

XXX

That wasn’t just Malak and Bastila in my head that day.

That wasn’t just Malak I fought on the Star Forge—

XXX

Alarms screamed somewhere beyond them. The Star Forge was dying.

“This is the crucible,” he chuckled darkly, like something damp and rotting. “My Starfire. This is my final test.” Malak's face, metal jaw, stippled skull loomed over her.

That moment when his eyes had sparked red and terror froze her steps and his blade swung down—

XXX

“Come to me, my Starfire,” the Jenet repeated, and beckoned. “We can take my ship if you would prefer.”

“Have I passed?” she whispered. “Have I passed your final fracking test?”
Red eyes. Red fracking eyes!

You know what he is. You've been running from him ever since you can remember. He's the real monster. He's the one that even sithspawned Dar fears.

Without his helm, the Jenet’s eyes were glowing. “I tire of these games, Starfire.” His voice had deepened, and Revan could feel the Force in it, tugging, tearing, tiring her too. “Yours and mine. Come to me. Your time is long past due. I have your husb——” Kavar’s saber had bisected his body before Revan realized she was holding it lit. The blue light–beam hissed.

Someone in the crowd screamed.

On the ground, the Jenet’s tail twitched once—then again. The glow in his eyes was gone. His skull was three meters from the rest of him, still smoking.

Holocams flashed again, and Revan raised her hands, instinctively (and uselessly) blocking them with the saber.

“Uh… Polla?” Mekel Jin’s face was shadowed in the blue light. It made him look decades older. He smiled at her nervously. “We need to go. There’s something wrong with the fracking sun.”

“My father said not to let you pilot,” Millifar added curtly, from the Jopheena’s loading ramp. “I have permission to shoot if you won't comply.”

XXX

The interior of the Black Temple was vast and dark and mostly empty except for one astromech droid plugged into the floor next to the ferracrystal dome of its central tomb. The connector was a flower–shaped sigil of overlapping durasteel plates set into the floor. Seeing herself reflected in the Kaas’s computer’s sensors, Mission couldn't help but notice how the tomb’s portal resembled the battered Kryyyylak orchid painted on her side.

Of course, being at least half of a thirty–thousand–year–old inorganic entity programmed by a long–dead race of cosmic architects who aspired to godhead, she knew that was no coincidence because there were no coincidences.

The live feed she’d tapped projected itself like a series of ghosts above her.

“—and on the Outer Rim, the Biscain double star has become unstable. Evacuations of the system are proceeding, although scientists at the University of Coruscant expect that a total nova would take years, if not decades before completion.”

“Researchers from Byss Labs have an alternate theory, however—based on the unprecedented amount of solar activity, suggesting orbital decay of the secondary sun could occur in a matter of months—if not weeks—”

“Figures.” Mission wondered if anyone had thought of putting a tracker on Polla–Revan and following her around predicting catastrophe. Not that it could possibly be Polla–Revan’s fault that sun had chosen just now to go nova—
Or, yeah, it could. Mission ran the odds. Five to one that the Biscaïn sun going nova was, in some way, Polla–Revan’s fault.

And Big Z thinks I get into too much trouble! It really wasn’t fair, especially as she’d fixed the entire Sith Empire for them, what with getting Manaan in touch with Kaas—“Katarr.” The footage Mission had Kashyyyk reroute to Kaas from the Republic feed definitely showed the Aleema, now rumored to be in Mandalorian hands.

And that had definitely been Polla–Revan on Katarr too, running from those shadow–things into the ocean.

since seeing her, the freaking Kaas installation refused to shut up.

[She was on Katarr,] Kaas repeated again, like one of its memory discs was scratched. [Find her!]

According to local news, there were a lot of dead Jedi on Katarr now. Some Jedi named Atris No–Last–Name had appointed herself Jedi Supreme Master or something and was searching for ‘the Last Jedi.’ Bully for her, right? Mission figured Atris had to be crazy or lying. Or both? The records said she’d been master of the Jedi’s archives for decades. Organic brains were terrible with secrets. Some had probably leaked all over her core processing abilities, damaged her ability to see right from wrong.

“No one’s talking about another Revan,” she pointed out to Kaas. “And I got you a perfectly good Revan already. You should be grateful!”

[I need an intact Revan with cognitive, firing neurons. Bring me that one on Katarr.]

Kaas probably had a warped idea of time and space and effort, what with being the central processor for a crazy Sith emperor. Mission had been trying to use that to her advantage, but it kept leading to these totally unreasonable demands.

“Katarr’s ages away, big guy. Hold your hessi.”

Something pinged in on the feed from Biscain. Voice recognition. Poo doo! Mission shot past hoping Kaas was too distracted—

No such luck.

[Error: Entity 13,441,999,777,236 has just expired by lightsaber blade to a female Human pattern matching the one in memory. Go back, insect. Show me Biscaïn, HoloNet channel 339. Time: Now.]

Poo doo kriiffing Polla Revan!

“Searching….” Normally, Mission could lie to Kaas—easy! She could sell it a pack of banthashit about how the Revan they had here would wake up someday... but when she was plugged into the Kaas banks she had to do what it said. Mainframe trumps remote every day. And Kaas, even if it was stupid and out of touch, had about a jillion more processing bytes than she did.

“Still searching,” she chimed. There had to be a few million sents on Biscaïn, if she started with their registrations into the system, cross–referencing against images from the BisSec security
Damn. As if out of her control, the cam centered on a helmeted face almost immediately—

[Pattern match!] Kaas crowed.

“Yeah, I guess that does look like her mouth, but you can’t see the rest of her face and you realize the Jedi totally passed her off as that other bint before. Humans look so much alike—”

[Pattern match!] It repeated, while Mission started to run the vid feeds back—

“Whoa, is that Mekel?”

The feed took that exact time to cut out in a wave of static, wiping the circuit, and frying the widebeam receivers within several systems close.

“Was that Mekel? Did that sun just go nova? She wouldn’t feel the effects from here, but still Mission’s circuits smarted in sympathy for the poor programs caught closer.

Not to mention Polla Revan and Mekel Jin—maybe Mekel Jin. Although, a part of her considered, strategically, Polla Revan dead was a better outcome for the galaxy than Polla Revan being plugged in here.

Mission rolled a sensor at the ferraglass dome, and the shriveled–up dead thing inside. That one had lasted less than five hundred years.

[Mobile Inorganic Processing Unit 987,231,774,119,003? What is the problem?]

“Running a check now.” She really was. If she had feelings they’d be worried.

The Biscain feed was just gone. Chatter from the neighboring planets was going nuts. “The bands are saying sunspots have fried the communications grid in that system…” if she’d had lungs Mission would have sighed with relief. “Something’s wrong with the suns.”

According to common hyperspace routes, Biscain was on the way to Sith space from Katarr. The next jump would be—

Jirulla. Not much Polla Revan could do there what with it not being populated. Of course, Polla Revan had managed to leave a bunch of dead Jedi on Katarr and blow up a sun on Biscain.

[You promised me the Revan here would wake,] the Kaas computer interrupted her sharply, tapping her memory banks like an elbow to the ribs. [Send your slaves to bring her to me. I will have mine investigate her condition.]

“Hold your hessi! Geez!”

[Do not distract with meaningless idiom.]

A part of Mission’s mind began cycling through curses for Kashyyyk, the traitor, who could have helped, but was now just a dumb slave–terminal for Kaas. Another part wondered what that had meant for Lena Wee and her evil other self.

Are they prisoners? Zombies?

“Fine,” she beeped into the gloom. “I’ll check on the Revan we have here and her kriffing neurons! Will that get you off my back?”
[If this installation’s light processing matrix is not replaced, the organic virus introduced will cause irreparable harm in all sentient processors attached to this installation's network. Repeat of query: how was this error introduced into this sector before my matrix was repaired? Mobile Unit, you were tasked with discovery! This installation demands answers!]

“An accident,” Mission snapped. “Like I told you. And like I told you, I’m fixing it. I found the maker of the vaccine in Republic space. They’re gonna shipping freighters of it our way. As soon as you pay them.”

[You have permissions to arrange for currency compensation at the fair market value,] Kaas snapped.

If Mission still needed credits, she'd be thrilled.

“Good,” she drawled, in Polla Revan’s best snarky voice. “Cause I promised delivery a week ago and you've been stalling. That's like, one thousand, seven hundred and ninety–three citizens of Kaas City that’d still be alive except for you.”

[The weak are culled,] Kaas said, like she needed a reminder it was totally evil. [But we need to eliminate unnecessary mortality until the new conduits align.]

Mission detached her appendage from the Kaas receptacle with a pop. “Yeah, yeah,” she groused, already rolling across the floor. “I got your new conduits, didn't I?”

[The conduit must be conscious for symbiosis. And willing.]

“Willing, huh? Your Emperor Crazy's not quite a catch. Maybe you should talk to him.”

[Guidance is impossible until the matrix is restored.]

“Yeah, yeah.” If Mission had eyes they would have rolled.

Another part of her yelled at Kashyyk to ring Canderous's commlink again, for the hundred and fifty–sixth time.

XXX

XXX

“I think that’s enough questions,” the woman barked on the monitor. She appeared to be glancing at something offscreen. Most of her face was hidden by the visor, but the voice was unmistakable. It rang like a bell over the comm.

Also unmistakable were the dazed looks from the sentients surrounding her: blank expressions, monotone repetition. They made Rew’s skin prickle. She hadn't seen anything like this since the wars.

She did that. The Jedi’s redeemed Revan did that. What’s to stop her from doing whatever she wants?

Rew had seen the effects of Force mind–tricks before. There’d been that transport ship they’d found once—drifting near the Defali Spire. Everyone on board dead, blasters still in their own hands. Ships logs with no signs of distress—just the mention of picking up a Jedi a few days before.
Or a dark Jedi.

Is there a real difference?

There’d been that snub crew Cein’s ship had picked up after the Yu–Phaedran assault—all of them repeating they had a message for Senator Malachi D’Reev and no one else. Rew had heard it had taken those men months to get back to normal.

There’d been what D’Reev had done to Carth Onasi—what the Jedi themselves had done to Revan—

“Blast,” Rew cursed, turning to her second–in–command, Commander Utug–phon. “We need to take custody of her. Can you get us across the system to that station?”

Utug–phon frowned, creasing the lines between his highly–domed ears. “They’re calling for all ships to assist with the evacuation. There’s something wrong with one of the suns.”

“What?” Rew glanced up to the real–time view of the Biscain system.

The smaller star was turning slowly black.

“We’re being pinged from several sources—” Lieutenant Abtrad was moving all four arms frantically over his board.

“Ignore them and head to that hangar,” Rew commanded. “We need to capture that schutta before she does worse.” She nodded to her Sergeant at Arms. “And bring the Jedi Killer—we might need it.”

“But it doesn’t work—” Sergeant Armala was a veteran. In service long enough to remember the times they’d relied on such things before. Or tried to.

“It will slow her down at least.” Trank gun with enough iragam to kill a rancor, coupled with an electrical charge that would stop cardiac function in most four–chambered species.

It had slowed that Devaronian dark Jedi down long enough to put a bolt in his brain, back on Bothawui.

Xxx
The ship– artisans of Clans Rialis and Zal did clever work. Most of the Aleema’s main bridge was now restored: the shield generator protecting the cracked hull had been replaced by triple– plated durasteel welding; and a layer of inert, hypo–core insulation now coated the interior walls, preventing barrier leakage. Bright blue tape demarcated the worst of the original damage and the seams of new plating. Although the women could have easily polished the cosmetic damages from Darth Malak’s bombardment away, Aemelie liked it like this: the hull’s repair marks served as a scarred, ragged reminder of what could happen when a commander overreached—and lost the loyalty of both clan and cause.

Of course, Canderous would never need the reminder. Such a fate would never happen to Ordo, even if Clan Wies continued on its plan of forced isolation and refused to join their fight—as their erstwhile Headwoman seemed likely to do—even after Aemelie (with Gwenarius’s advisement) had presented outstanding terms to the benefit of all Mando’ade.

Now, the hologram of Kissandrix of Wies sighed heavily, leaning back, arms crossed. “Your arguments remain unconvincing.”

“We await rendezvous with General Revan of Clan Lin.” Technically, Revan had never been a General—and certainly not a Mando’ade one—but formalities did not require technical exactitude. Nor did Aemelie of Ordo owe Kissandrix of Wies an explanation, especially not when Aemelie was directing the young warriors to establish orbit around the Jirulla system’s only planet of note: a methane–based hellscape with a weak gravitational core. “When Revan rejoins us we will proceed along the route I have given you—along with Clans Zal, Rialis and Ordo.”

Aemelie spared a moment to glance up at the viewscreen, a sheer wall of dense ferraglass engineered to project the real–time view of their orbit. On the screen, the other ships gathered, clustered in precise orbits according to their utility. From here, Aemelie could count six modified carriers, fifteen gun boats, and one other dreadnaught—Clan Zal’s fabled Sand Dreamer, which had survived the battle of Malachor itself, according to rumor. (In truth, Aemelie had been told by Dessa that the Sand had merely been late to the armistice, jumped from hyperspace, seen the carnage, and immediately jumped back. But if their cowardice meant she had another ship now, she would not mention it. Publicly.)

There were roughly twenty more ships of reasonable size on their way, in addition to Revan’s snubfighter—and whatever presence Kissandrix of Wies would deign to send.

“It is impressive that your husband has rallied so many to General Revan’s fight,” Kissandrix of Wies possessed a tone that spoke otherwise.

Aemelie nodded. “We have gathered ships and warriors, while Wies has harvested alluids and clean iron. Were you to join us, you would find ample reward for your efforts in collecting so much raw material….”

“Yes. Ships do require fuel,” Kissandrix said lightly. Too lightly.

“And we will trade you ships for your fuel… if you wish to leave the safety of the Sanis Cluster where you are hiding—"

“So your planned incursion is not on the Republic?” Kissandrix’s eyebrows, plucked to a razor-thin arch, rose to the top of her (admittedly low) hairline. “The objectives are in Sith space? The Sith Empire?”

“Reconnaissance,” Aemelie corrected her. It was a much more subtle word. “Our raid. Yes. The World of Tombs falls along the route we’ve given you. Surely, your mother showed you the scrolls describing the marvels that Fett Manda’lor Ulic Qel–Droma found on its surface. Regenerating plasma cells. Armor that blocks magic—”

“And the walking dead.” Kissandrix shook her head slowly. “The World of Tombs was forbidden for a reason.”

Dessa leaned over the command banks, frowning as if she disagreed with Aemelie’s approach. “Wies are cowards,” she muttered, half under her breath.

Aemelie shot her a glare for her insubordination.

“Clan Wies will not commit to action.” Kissandrix scowled. “But we will send one squadron of observers. If the conditions are honorable, we may agree to trade—and an engagement at a later time.”

There was a reason, Aemelie thought blackly, that everyone with true honor despised the lost clan of Wies. “Mando’a.de are a free people. And you, Kissandrix, are free to tell your warriors to go back to sleep beside their empty hearths while the rest of us share glory and the spoils—”

Kissandrix’s image blurred and cut out suddenly.

“Did she hang up on me? Did you cut the connection? Dessa?”

“No!” Her second–in–command shook her head. “It wasn’t her. Something else broke through!”

The image on their comm–link fizzed, replaced by another: a domed top, flashing lights. “Aemelie,” the tiresome droid’s voice repeated itself on the comm–link again, breaking through their private channels, which should not be possible. “Don’t hang up on me again. Please? I need information about Rev—”

Aemelie cut the comm.

Dessa frowned. “Did you tell Canderous that thing has been calling us for weeks?”

Aemelie could not actually remember. “It may have slipped my mind,” she admitted. Her husband never spoke of the Twi’lek child whose soul the droid had copied, but she had noted the inclusion of a fragile leather lekku–ribbon next to his fallen son’s milk shoe on the top shelf of his trophy chest. If the girl had meant less, she suspected he would have said more.

Wartime was not the season for sentiment.

“The droid was useful on Coru,” Dessa added. “Where is it now?”

“Still on Coruscant?” Aemelie wasn’t sure. “It always calls in using encoded lines—but where else could it be?”
She leaned over the board trying to get the connection to the Sanis System—and the too–proud Kissandrix—back.

Xxx

The High Admiral of the Sith Armada’s office felt empty without Mission’s cheerful beeps and jokes about Tenebrae’s lax security.

Too empty.

Carth hadn't seen the droid in over two weeks. She'd warned him that whatever plan she had would take time, but Carth still worried that she hadn’t checked back in.

And not just for her. Mission had promised she had ways of reaching Republic space—ways she'd never really explained—or agreed to use before. But without her here, Carth had no way of warning anyone there about his latest order.

Or at least… no good way.

Carth bent over the console he’d used to patch into the trading nets, frowning. No telling if Rew Ekkumi still bothered to check their old haunts. No telling if she'd understand the message—but he couldn't risk using any of the standard naval ciphers—or sending any missive directly into Imperial Space. He had to assume they were compromised—and that any instant Tenebrae himself could possess Carth and discover his treachery.

In the end, all Carth could dare post was a recipe for rickar fish and tubers on the old forum for Telos survivors they’d used long ago, hoping that Rew remembered the meal they’d shared above Felucia when the news about Telos broke. Hoping she’d check in time. Hoping she'd put the pieces together—realize the numbers were Sith tallies, the cooking time coded to the date and time of the Sith’s planned surprise attack on the Felucia system, despite his lobbying for something like Dagobah, where with any luck, they'd all be lost for months without any Republic engagement at all.

Carth’s head ached as he pressed transmit, watching as his encoded message vanished into the wideband wasteland that divided Republic and Imperial space, destined for an obscure survivor’s grief forum.

“Gotta do something,” he reminded himself. Much the same way Zaalbar was working with the cells Yuthura had organized—groups of slaves intended to rise up on this planet and overthrow their masters—when the timing was right—

If half of them don't die from plague first.

Every day it seemed like the staff serving them in Tenebrae’s palace got smaller and smaller—but if their mad emperor noticed or cared he hadn't mentioned it—or left it in one of his blasted notes for Carth.

The door slid open.

“Admiral.” The dura–edged voice behind him didn't make Carth jump, he was too numb for that. “Tenebrae informed me that you are leaving tomorrow to begin the war. I’m coming with you.”

“No, Lord Malak.” Were they watched here or not? Sometimes, just to get through another day of this wretched charade, Carth pretended his son was Malak. Which makes me Saul. It had ceased to be a funny joke a long time ago. Now, he clasped his fingers hard on the back of his chair, turning away from the door and what the dark side was doing to his son's face. “Tenebrae commanded that you remain here.”

“I am the Emperor’s equal,” the dark voice muttered behind Carth. A little too sulkily. “I go where I fricking want to.”

Not true and you know it, Dustil. “It's my decision,” Carth snapped. “My decision and Tenebrae’s, Malak. We've been over this already.”

They’d been over it in two different ways: once for Tenebrae’s benefit and once for real. Carth swiveled his chair around to look his son in the face, looking up at the yellow eyes, the darkened stipple of Sith corruption surrounding them, the angry twist of his boyish mouth—like a scar. Dustil was wearing armor uncannily like Malak had been wearing, that doomed day aboard the Leviathan. Sometimes Carth wondered if the ghost was still there too—that would explain it, wouldn't it? Why his son looked like a Sith? He had spent enough time with the ghost of the Dark Lord possessing Dustil to see the difference now—but how else could he explain how Dustil appeared?

“War takes time,” Carth added, trying to gentle his tone. “Patience. Maybe that's a lesson you still need to learn, Malak.”

“I’m tired of lessons.” His son’s cape billowed around his shoulders when he turned and stalked to the window, looking down at the view—an empty courtyard, streaked with rain. “I'm tired of waiting.”

They all were. Polla and Yuthura and Zaalbar were organizing the slaves in Kaas City—and the plague was running wild now—causing its own chaos—but this Empire wasn’t falling—not fast enough. Carth had been so sure—had wanted to be so sure that his wife would show up somehow and fix this—but she hadn't.

She must be dead. Otherwise she would come.

She could still be on her way—I just need to keep stalling until she comes—or until Tenebrae kills me—

Or until I scuttle the Sith Fleet.

Strategizing to lose a war wasn’t that different than strategizing to win one—except for the part where you were ordering everyone who followed you to follow you into certain death. That was… that was harder than Carth expected, considering he’d spent the last decade of his life trying to kill these bastards.

But some of them were… just people. Like the two Zabrak kids, Takan and Zepth. It wasn’t their fault they had a mad emperor in their heads, any more than it was his. Wasn’t the fault of the crew of the Consuming Maw either, that their Emperor was a madman—or that their admiral was a traitor—but Carth had still sent them ahead, straight into a sector of Republic space he knew was still mined. Their destruction would be another warning bell for Rensha and the Fleet.

“Lord Tenebrae needs you here, Malak.” There’s no coming back for me. Whether or not Rew gets the message. Whether the Republic destroys our fleet before we have a chance to seize the Duros shipyards—or not. I’ll go down with Tenebrae’s flagship — or the Republic will have me executed for being a traitor.

Either way, there’s no coming back. I just need to salvage as much as I can. I need to save my son... somehow.

Was this how it had been for Saul? Again, Carth remembered the last time he'd seen the man—thinking what he was seeing was a hallucination brought on by shock or blood loss or his own insanity—

His eyes. Am I losing my mind, or were Saul’s eyes were glowing red—there at the end? He must have been... he was possessed too. Did he know?

“Dad—” In the heartbeat where Carth had been trying to wish them all out of this, Dustil had crossed the room. The gloved hand on his shoulder felt like a vise, and his son’s head bent down the few centimeters it took to whisper in Carth’s ear. “Father.” Dustil’s voice cracked. “Are you really going to do it? Attack the Republic?”

Carth took a breath. Not effectively. “I have my orders.” He met his son’s eyes steadily. “They include you staying here. Tenebrae won’t waste your talents on command, Lord Malak. He has other plans for you.”

Plans I need you to stop. Plans you and Zaalbar and Mission need to stop. But you... you know this. Mission said you know—she said you're still working with us—she said not to worry—

The droid had been gone for two weeks. Never so long before. All Carth could do was worry.

His son’s eyes burned. “Frack that sleemo’s plans! I have plans too! Inse says w—”

The world washed out abruptly. Everything faded to white.

XXX

“Frack that sleemo’s plans! I have plans too! Inse says we can take—” Dustil’s mouth froze, because Father had gone stiff and horribly blank. Inse says we can take over the Dark Council. Half the Houses have gone to ground because of the plague. She says Voices are vanishing. When they get sick, he kills them. Tenebrae can’t control everything—not on this fracking planet and if it falls apart here, Inse says it will fall apart everywhere else—

And then we’ll be the ones in control. Watching his father turn back into this asshole, Dustil wanted very much to be in control.

“Ah, Lord Malak. Responding to my summons before I even... summon.” The smile on his father’s lips was insane—and those red eyes burned. If the body had been anyone else’s, Dustil would have blasted it across the room.

He let the fury inside burn too because it helped. It was the only thing that did anymore. Hate scorched his blood like a glitterstim high. “Vitiate. What’s up?” He had noticed that the Emperor hated being called Vitiate with no title attached, but if there was a story behind that, Dustil didn’t give a frack.

The asshole made Father’s smile too wide as he stretched a hand toward the small couch by the table where Father and Dustil ate sometimes. “Shall we... sit? I wanted to show you my plans to invade the Republic. Admiral Onasi has been useful with his information but there are a few strategic changes I require, and I thought, with your own knowledge of the Core, we should have a chat.” He folded Father’s arms. “After the broadcast, of course.”

Broadcast? “I have changes too,” Dustil told him. “I’m coming on this invasion.”
“Of course.” The Emperor smiled. “You may have your own ship—but after the broadcast—”

The fracking piece of banthashit wanted Dustil to ask about this broadcast. That was obvious. So Dustil wasn’t going to.

“Lady Inse has proposed to me,” he offered. “I’m thinking I need a consort not in a coma.”

“And her sister Mydia?” It was my impression your affections were… shared?” The asshole pulled a box out of his pocket and popped what looked like a mento into his mouth. Maybe it’d make that rank breath better.

Dustil hated it when the man was so close, in any body. It felt weird—like the Dark was screaming louder than usual, like bugs crawling on his skin—even in his null father’s shell. “She’s okay too,” he allowed. “Inse is smarter.”

“That must be a great advantage for you.” Tenebrae—Vitiate—chuffed like a ronto in mud, leaning back, and folding his hands. He made an elaborate show of checking the chron on Father’s wrist, then glancing toward the door and sighing. “They’ve been quite fortunate that the Starfire plague has spared their House. I assume it still has? No one is sick?”

“No,” Dustil made himself sound bored. “That whole quarter seems better than a lot of the city. What are you doing about this plague anyway?”

“Doing?” Vitiate narrowed Father’s eyes into slits of scarlet fire. “Why, nothing at all! Culls are perfectly natural every few thousand years. The stronger bodies will survive, or evade infection—although, of course—” he chuckled. “Do you remember, Lord Malak? I suppose not. My Voices so seldom remember my guidance, even when they walk the proper steps… but you were… unique. So like your wife in so many ways, but the one—”

“I still am.” Asshole. He would never hurt Father, but those two Zabrak kids that Father had taken under his wing like they mattered—both of them possessed, just like Father—when Old Vitiate possessed them, Dustil thought about ripping their guts out.

“Even more so now.” The man made a show of straightening Father’s collar, brushing imaginary lint from his epaulets.

“Don’t let the Dark consume you.” That had been Yuthura Ban’s helpful advice the last time he’d been there to see Inse and Mydia. That, and some tips on how to play at being Malak, like the woman had even met him for more than five fracking minutes—

Had she? Who cares. Frack her.

There was a knock upon the door.

“Here we are!” Tenebrae beamed. “Our escort! And ahead of schedule.”

XXX

Biscain space off–station was a mess of ships of all sizes. There was even a Republic cruiser bearing down at what looked like full speed, broadcasting some kind of alert to sweep the other ships out of its way.

The part of Revan’s mind that had been thinking like Polla Organa saw a dozen ways for their Aurek–class Jopheena to jump around the cruiser and make it out. The part that had almost just crashed the Jopheena into a sun sat on the passenger bench gratefully, letting Millifar take the yoke.

The lights of the Biscain system—and its disturbing suns—vanished into a thousand stars as they shot into hyperspace.

“There.” Millifar leaned back and folded her arms, resembling a miniature version of her father. She'd cropped her hair, Revan noted, and there were hollows under her eyes that hadn’t been there before. “Aemelie's furious about the Pinion, Third Wife. You now have two days to formulate your excuse for destroying it—before we meet them in the Jirulla System.”

“Hah.” Revan tried to ignore the nausea kicking in from the jump. “That's funny.”

“How is it funny?” Millifar’s blue–gray eyes were as steady as Canderous’s, but try as she could to see the joke, Revan couldn’t spot the same glint of humor in them.

“Milli's not joking,” Mekel muttered from the co–pilot’s seat.

“It was necessary that I drop the Pinion into that sun to destroy Arkan.” Revan bit back insulting the kid. The adrenaline that had fueled the past day—the race through the stars, the destruction of Arkan, the Force compulsion at the station—had abruptly vanished, leaving her limbs like lead, her mind sluggish and afraid. Her gut lurching, and she swallowed back bile. “I can apologize to Aemelie—”

Millifar burst out laughing. “Apologize? You could have ejected the Force–eater with your Force magic and saved the ship!”

“Milli.” The smile felt like glass, but Revan forced it. “It's good to see you. Thanks for the rescue back there. I wasn’t sure if I could launch by myself.”

“I think you would have made it off the station without our assistance, at least,” the girl muttered. “You killed that one unarmed reporter quite easily.” She paused. “Then probably you would have crashed into a freighter.”

That one unarmed reporter had glowing red eyes. The memory made Revan’s hand twitch, made nonsensical words dance in her head. Red eyes are bad. Red eyes are very, very bad.

“Knock it off, Milli. She placed third in that race.” Mekel had been sitting there quietly turning greener and greener.

Millifar sniffed. “The Organa man was obviously piloting—not her. If he's anything like his daughter—”

“No. But Aemelie is rarely so complimentary of barbarians.”

“Yes, I've heard Aemelie’s opinions.” For nearly a solid week, trapped in that cursed Pinion and drifting in space. According to Aemelie Ordo, Polla Organa Wen could have saved the Star Forge by shooting down all of the ships attacking it before they even came within targeting range. Probably with her eyes closed and rainbows flying out of her ass.

“Excuse me.” Mekel Jin gulped, covering his mouth. He jumped up and ran toward the fresher.

Revan’s own gut had been calmed by an act of sheer will, but now it churned in sympathy.
“Mekel always does that.” Millifar rolled her eyes, mock whispering. “Pretend not to notice.”

“It happens to me too.” It was not going to happen now though, not with Canderous’s daughter glaring scornfully at Revan as if she was mud on her boot. “What happened after I left Katarr? Did you see the Jedi?”

“Yes.” The girl turned away and began doing something to the navboard—it looked like she was tweaking the ship’s gyros that Jasp had so carefully calibrated before.

“Don’t do that.” Revan wasn’t sure she’d know how to bring them back to standard.

Millifar made an exasperated noise. “I’ve never been in a Republic military vessel of this size before. I wanted to test the tertiary stabilizers.”

“It doesn’t have tertiary stabilizers.” Nothing under frigate–class would.

Canderous’s daughter twisted another dial. Revan had no idea what it did, but she knew when she was being fracked with. She raised her voice. “Stop that!”

The girl snorted, shooting her a disdainful glare. “Aemelie said you knew nothing about ships.”

“Aemelie knows nothing about me.” Polla Organa had known a lot of mechanicals, even if she was never interested enough to learn how to fix things. She’d poured over catalogues from Kuat Hyperdrive and Corellian Shipping Lanes as a kid. “That’s an… order, Millifar. Stop adjusting things. My—the last pilot set them up that way for a reason.”

“Your last pilot was overly conservative.” The girl sniffed. “I would have expected more from Polla Organa’s father.”

Revan gritted her teeth. “Would Aemelie or Gwenarius be pleased to hear of your insolence to the woman who outranks you?”

Millifar froze, still in the act of reaching for another dial. Those blue–gray eyes narrowed. “My mothers would say a leader leads, Third Wife—not goes running back to another woman's skirts like someone stole their meat–knife.”

“I would say that a subordinate who can’t even follow a simple order should be removed from duty,” Revan told her, narrowing her eyes back. “You know I possess the means to remove you, Milli. Very easily.”

The girl’s scoff showed what she thought of threats—at least outwardly, but her hands retreated from the board. “When you give me a simple order, perhaps I will follow it.”

“I will not. Wait until Mekel returns.” Millifar uncocked her main blaster and dumped its contents on the console, making a show of examining the firing sequencer barrels, where the plasma bolts were generated. “Mekel Jin should be the one to tell you what happened on Katarr.”

Revan felt cold. Tell me what? “Mekel’s sick,” she pointed out—although the retching noises had stopped almost as quickly as they’d begun.

“He says hyperspace always affects him like that.” Millifar shrugged. “His weak stomach has nothing to do with Katarr. He seems to have no such reaction to the sight of blood, at least. Unlike some barbarians I have met.”
What? “I don’t care about blood, Milli.”

“I wasn’t speaking of you.” Millifar gave an exaggerated sigh. “Not everything is about you, Third Wife.”

There was a long silence, that seemed to grow even longer as Revan stared at the viewscreen, watching the hyperspace tracers flash past.

“Hey.” A hoarse voice spoke from the door. Mekel still looked a little green. He’d stripped out of his beskar and was wearing a drab flight suit underneath. “You need to change the kolto packs again, Milli.” He held out a pile of them. “Linai said every four hours, and it's been at least five.”

“But it doesn’t hurt anymore.” Canderous’s daughter raised her armor–clad right arm above her head and stretched. Without Arkan screaming in the Force, everything was so quiet that Revan had no difficulty hearing the faint, mechanical whir coming from her shoulder. The girl glanced at her and made a face, unbuckled her arm plate. The skin underneath had the distinctive mesh of new plasti–skin.

Artificial. Revan thought of Dar and her arm—and was surprised the usual spark of anger she felt for the woman had been replaced by—by nothing. “What happened?”

“The dead thing ripped my arm off.” Millifar stood up, unbuckling her chest plate, and placing the pieces carefully on the floor. Without it, she was narrow—leaner than Revan’s memory of her. The cybernetic arm was attached to flesh that looked raw and bruised at the shoulder socket.

“The dead thing…?”

“She means that asshole chakaar, Oerin Lin.” Mekel spat on the floor—uncannily like a Mandalorian. “Darth Sion, they were calling him.”

“You fought Oerin?” Revan took in the both of them—the maimed girl and the seemingly–unmarked boy. “Are you insane? But he wouldn’t just attack clan—” her voice trailed off. How do I know that? Did you attack him first?

“Dar’jett osik!” Millifar’s artificial arm blurred as it dropped to her belt, producing a narrow trank gun. “My father gave me permission to shoot you. He says this will knock you out cold for at least a few hours. I could shove you out an airlock then.”

“Milli—” it was nothing to disable the gun, simply bending the needle contained in the nozzle. Revan did that automatically. Disarming the girl’s anger would be more difficult. “You can’t win. You know that. Not against me.”

“My father wants you alive,” the girl continued fiercely, gesturing with the weapon. “But I could lie.” She glared at Mekel Jin, eyes suddenly liquid, as if she was blinking back tears. “Who would object?”

“Uh… Milli?” Mekel hovered in the background. “Why don’t you… just… put the kolto on your arm. I can… I’ll tell her.”

“I told her you would tell her, but you still have not done so!” The girl stepped forward until they were eye–to–eye. She jabbed the gun into Revan’s ribs hard. When Revan just stared, Millifar’s face crumpled and she threw the gun away, muttering under her breath. “Di’kut Jett’ai. Since Lin was already dead, we could not kill him. The Jedi had a device that might have ended him, but we did not know their intent. He did this to my arm and then he killed Kex. The Jedi died too.”
Kex. Revan’s memory of the kid was vague. One of the blonde ones, she thought. He’d helped them at the party on Coruscant.

“I—I’m sorry.” Revan reached for the trank gun, levitating it off the floor and shoving it into her own pocket. “I’m sorry about Kex.”

Millifar scowled. “If we had done nothing they would be alive.”

They. She said Jedi died too. “How many…” Revan’s voice trailed off. A part of her mind hissed with bitter laughter. Did I think these were tame Sith Lords? I stopped one—I should have stopped the other too. If they’d both been in that damned ship when I dropped it in the fracking sun— “How many Jedi died?”

In that moment, Millifar’s eyes were exactly like her father’s. They seemed to frost over as she stared past Revan, maybe to the controls, or the hyperspace panels behind. “All of them.”

“All…?” That was impossible. All of the Jedi hadn’t been in the tunnel. They’d evacuated. Those ships rose out of the pit. I saw them leave—

“Milli, uh….” Mekel cleared his throat. “I got this. You need to take care of the arm.”

“The med kit’s here too.” Revan scrambled to her feet collecting it. Half was on the floor by Revan’s chair from when she’d used it to help Jasp.

Millifar’s mouth twisted. “You should have slain Lin, Third Wife. Perhaps your dar’jett powers would have been enough.”

Perhaps they would have been. Perhaps they can be. She hadn’t even tried at the Temple on Coruscant. She’d just let him go—him and Arkan and that old woman—

“Milli! Please—” Mekel Jin looked too pale, with shadows under his eyes. “Do you want me to dress the wound for you like Headwoman Linai said?”

“I will tend to it myself.” The girl snatched the kolto packs and pivoted, heading for the fresher. “Tell her what transpired, Mekel of Lin. You… saw. You saw it all.” Her jaw tightened, but her pale eyes were liquid and she wiped at them clumsily before vanishing behind the door.

“She’s… she was hurt pretty bad.” Mekel’s voice dropped to a whisper.

“But Oerin liked her, I thought.” Revan filled the awkwardness with words, because the expression on Mekel’s face said something else was wrong, something bad—and as long as she kept speaking, it had no time to be true. “Why would he hurt her—how—did the Jedi capture him? Where is he now?”

Mekel made a strange sound in the back of his throat, like a catch between a laugh and—something opposite. “He told Dak Vesser to heal Milli. Then he got away. I—I don’t know where the frack Oerin Lin is now.” His hands were clenched into fists. “I couldn’t kill him either. Dak… died too.”

The story came out slowly. The Jedi trap sprung—and then broken by the Mandalorian kids.

Dumb kids. It would be easier to make excuses if Dak hadn’t died for their mistake. “I’m sorry that happened.” Revan offered, finally. “So, after Dak healed Millifar, Oerin killed him—”

“No. Canderous shot him later. Lin put some kind of compulsion on Dak. Told him to heal Milli and so that was all he did. He stopped talking, he… he faded. Like all of his… like he poured everything he was into her. Dak’s why she's alive, I guess.”

He stopped talking. He faded. Canderous killed him. But we saved him before—and he helped us—he was loyal—

“Canderous wouldn't have killed him if he didn't have a reason, Mekel.” She tried to keep her voice gentle, even as her uncertainty made the words stick in her throat. He faded. The blank faces of the reporters on Biscain haunted her. “I'm sorry, Dak was a good man. He… he helped me land the Harbinger. We didn't have much time to talk but he was Juhani’s friend—”

“I don't give a frack about Dak Vesser.” The boy in front of her was probably too grown to be called a boy, hard–eyed and blinking and dead in the Force like a black spot. It made him harder to read, but there was no mistaking the twisted fury in his expression. “Vrook Lamar and all the other Jedi died right after Milli’s arm was ripped off. Lin mowed them down like they were fracking civs. Like they were nothing. I saw the whole thing.”

“Vrook—your father—” There was something wrong with her voice. Uncle—

Mekel’s voice faltered. “The Jedi had taken some of their own prisoner. My father died with his hands in binders behind his back. I saw the entire fracking thing.”

“Oh.” There was something Revan should say other than oh. But she felt frozen. “Which other Jedi died?”

Vrook. He said Vrook. Milli said all of them. She should feel something. She did. Regret. Confusion. Guilt—

He was a black spot in the Force now, but Mekel’s voice rang with anger. “All of them! Like she said! Fracking all of them! What do you think?”

Prisoner, her mind supplied. He was their prisoner. Why would Vrook be a prisoner?

The answer seemed obvious, when Revan remembered the way he’d held the others off so that she could run back to the surface. So that I could escape. He wanted me to escape.

He trusted me to do the right thing. And he died for it.

They all did. If I had been there—Lin wouldn't have dared—

Would he? The worm of doubt was poison. If he was strong enough to kill all of them, why would I expect to be different?

“Sorry.” Revan felt numb. She wanted to remember her uncle suddenly. More than just the disapproval he'd shown on Dantooine, their all–too–brief encounters on Manaan and Coruscant. He watched over me. The feeling that he'd meant something was still there, even if the emotion itself was gone.

“Yeah, me too,” the boy muttered. “I hardly knew him, right? I don't know why I give a frack.”

“Because you wanted to know him.” She swallowed, guiltily thankful for Jasp, for Jasp still being alive. “I wanted to know him too. I thought… later we'd have time.”

“Me too.” Mekel sat down heavily on the crew bench to the side of the captain’s chair that Millifar had co–opted. “I… I already told you that he was my father? It went so fast—I saw you, but then—”
“Yes, but Dar told me before that.” The spark of anger Revan expected was dull, a mere whisper. “We’re cousins. I guess that’s why Millifar is calling you Mekel of Lin.”

“Who the frack is Dar?”

“Dar’Revan.”

“What?” Mekel frowned. “Oh! You mean that Sheris bint Malak wasn’t fracking?” He snorted. “Thought about it often enough, but—”

“I don’t need details.” The thought alone opened a thousand more questions. That Force bond with Dustil. Malak had been in Dustil’s mind— was he in Mekel’s too? Uncomfortably, she wondered if Mekel might know more of her own past than she did.

“Sheris. Yeah.” The kid rubbed the back of his neck, glancing at her and then glancing away again. “Other Revan. You know she’s dead too?”

“What? No.” Vrook Lamar is dead. My uncle is dead. She should feel something for him, but Dar— she can’t be dead since I’m going to kill her. “I’d know, I think—I would know if Dar—”

“There was a newsvid from Kaas City. Got broadcast all over the Core.” He walked to the navboard and sat down, slouching a little in the co-pilot’s seat. “The other Revan fought two rancors on Dromund Kaas. One of them killed her. Dustil was there—and his dads. Then that Emperor guy talked in a bunch of voices and said Revan was dead.”

“You saw her die?”

“Yeah. On the vid.” He shrugged. “She was foaming at the mouth and stuff. Your Wookiee pal was there too. And that Polla bint.”

You knew they couldn’t survive there for long. It should not be a surprise. “I need to see.”

Mekel nodded, bending to the board. “I think I can get a channel open.” He fiddled with the dials. Revan just watched, all the words stuck in her throat.

“Ohkay.” They’re all dead. Do you really want to see? “Where is Oerin Lin now?”

“Running from his doom,” Millifar announced from the door. She’d packed kolto around her shoulder. It gleamed with the same strange sheen as the stuff Jasp had been wrapped in. “He is Sith, so he will be fleeing back to this Sith world of yours. We shall kill him there.”

Will he? “There’s more than one Sith world, Milli.”

“Then we shall find whichever one he hides upon. The Jedi had a device to stop him,” Millifar added. “With ysalamiri. We need to recreate it.”

“But it didn’t work.”

“It would have,” Mekel Jin muttered. “It was starting to, but—”

Millifar set her chin stubbornly. “I vow I will end him.” Her eyes flashed. “Oerin Lin is my kill!”

I vowed to end Dar but she’s already dead. She vowed to end Tenebrae, but he’s still around.

If Vrook had made any vows Revan didn’t know them.
“Tell me everything.” They had nothing but time—another two days before their next hyperspace jump point. “Show me the vids—and tell me everything that’s happened.”

XXX

The Market Quarter was mostly shut down now. The stocks were empty of penitents and the stalls closed. Hastily-scrawled signs were pasted on a few windows, offering trades for goods—if the shoppers kept a safe distance. Even the omnipresent guards hung back on the fringes of the Park of Sith Heroes, as if the few cars that passed by might carry contagion.

“Hey!” Polla hissed at Scourge from the window of their armored palanquin as they approached the Park’s mirrored gates. “Wobbly! Come here!”

“What are you doing?” Coma Lady Revan Starfire (and now Polla was again reminded why dear Sei referred to her as ‘the Bitch’) had been awake for less than three hours, and nearly every second of it had been used as a fracking lecture. “Don’t insult him!”

“He seems to like it.” Polla leaned out of the palanquin, slipping her mask down past her chin. (Masks were now mandatory for slaves.) “Hey! Lord Scourge! Tentacle-face! Come here!”

The Sith Lord glanced in their direction, frowning, and got up from his park bench, datapad tucked under his arm, making his way across to the park entrance slowly, as if they had all space-damned day.

“You have no impulse control at all, do you, Deralian?” Revan glared at her from across the bench where she was sitting next to Yuthura. “What do you think will stop Finiris from exterminating you like the null insect he would believe you to be?”

“Who?”

“It’s Scourge’s given name,” Yuthura said. She was in a position to know the details on Wobbly.

“Oh, we’ve got a rapport.” At first, maybe it had helped that Zaalbar had repeatedly threatened to rip the Sith guy’s arms off if he laid a finger on Polla. Not that the Wookiee would stand a chance either against a Sith Lord, but Scourge was the kind of sleemo who respected a show of strength. Grass Priests, that was the one constant on this evil planet: start every negotiation with a few threats and insults, then move on from there. And then, of course there was Yuthura, who had moved on Lord Scourge quite capably—

And told him if he touched one hair on my head, she’d feed his choobs to the first nexu she saw. See? Threats and insults. They work.

Polla turned her head away from the window to cock an eye at Lady Starfire (the Bitch). “What makes you think he’d think I’m an insect?”

The woman pursed her lips like Polla was an eff-fly in her soup. “Because I know him. For a pureblood, he’s quite progressive, but that does not mean he’d treat a Force-blind Human as anything resembling a peer—”

“Actually, Scourge considers Polla to be my property.” Yuthura shrugged coolly with that enviable poise of hers.

“Yours—?” The two Jedi or Sith or whatever exchanged a look. “Ah.” Lady Starfire wasn’t dense, that was one thing. She folded her arms on her lap. “I see. Well, continue. Perhaps the two of you have him in hand.”
“For now, we do. How are you feeling?” the Twi’lek asked.

“Alive.” Revan took another sip from a bulb of water and coughed. They’d gotten her dressed in some of Inse’s battle armor, and it mostly hid how thin she was—although sitting next to her, it looked like Yuthura had to be careful not to impale herself on those giant spiked shoulder-things. A cap of metal hid most of Revan's nearly-bald head. She’d insisted on carrying a saber—since she hadn’t arrived at the Blais house with one (who the frack knew what had happened to the ones she’d used on those rancor), Yuthura had given her a loaner.

Now Coma Lady’s fingers tapped on the hilt, like she was playing a pipe flute. “Here.” She stood up, as unsteadily as a newborn hessi. Polla half expected her to fall, but Revan stared at the door to their palanquin instead. Her hand moved, and the door clicked open.

Going with the new rules about crowds, they didn’t have the Wookiee escort today—the covered car was running on its own mag-levved steam with Polla steering from the inside.

“My Lord Finiris,” Revan called out. Her snotty tone didn’t match the way she was leaning on the palanquin’s doorframe. “How fortuitous that our paths cross again.”

“My lady.” To Polla’s astonishment, Scourge actually bent down and knelt, which he didn’t even do for Yuthura, and she was the one now spending three nights a week with him.

“My slaves are calling you 'Scourge.'” There was a teasing tone to Coma Lady’s voice that Polla might have thought flirtatious if it had come from anyone else. “Was Flagellator taken?”

The Sith gave her a thin-lipped smile before launching into a long, garbled stream of Ancient Sith—until Revan interrupted him.

“Speak Basic,” she said. “So that my slaves understand.”

“The Lady Ban has an excellent tongue,” the man said.

“The Lady Ban agrees with Lord Revan,” Yuthura said. She leaned over and beckoned to him. “Come. Sit with us.”

“Of course.” Scourge was smart enough not to argue with Yuthura. “Our Glorious Emperor declared that all members of the Dark Council needed to take names in keeping with their roles…and so….”

Revan laughed, which was creepy. “So as his Highness's High Punisher, you… named yourself after a whip.”

“Or the bane of the galaxy.”

“Was 'Lord Bane’ already taken too?”

“It is merely a name.” The red-skinned man approached as Polla watched from her windowed seat, taking Revan’s hand in his and bringing it to his lips. “I must confess—from what Lady Ban told me—as well as what my own eyes witnessed—I assumed you would not recover.”

“Tenebrae wished to test this body.” Revan shrugged. “What isn't killed by the Dark is purified. Will you ride with us?”

“Of course.”
Revan stepped back and the Sith stepped in, dwarfing the doorway with his broad–shouldered bulk. His yellow eyes narrowed as he nodded at Yuthura. “Your servants have been loyal,” he remarked, as the door slid closed, and Polla activated the controls to have them circle the park endlessly. “You should be pleased—especially with Lady Ban.”

Yuthura smiled at him in a way that made Polla suspect she’d rather kick him in the choobs, but who knew? It wasn't something they'd discussed in detail. Maybe the red guy had skills. The Twi'lek stood, awkward in the cramped space and took the seat next to Polla, leaving the gilded bench for Revan and Lord Wobbly.

“I hope Nyriss has been loyal as well?” Revan asked, sitting more gracefully than she'd stood. “And SENCHAL? Liyo? I assume you know what happened to Deckna—”

Scourge settled down next to her, looking comically large. “Nyriss retreated to her estate when the plague began. Many chose retreat over trusting the quarantine.”

“That explains the lack of suppliants in the public stockade.” Revan edged to the side of her bench, crossing her legs at the knee. Polla took that as her signal and pulled the remote deck out of the wall to steer the fracking palanquin. “No one is left to impress with the all–night Great One’s Light of Retribution—”

“Revan.” Tentacle–face had a way about him, the way he gentled his voice. “It is good to see you restored.”

“I am hardly that.” Coma–lady’s mouth twitched. “I'm going to the tomb, Finiris. It's the only way forward.”

She'd startled the Sith. “But we need you! Your slaves have destabilized the capital already. With more vaccine we should be able to immunize enough loyalists to disrupt the Voices’ stranglehold upon the Empire—”

“As I told Lord Scourge, we are working on getting more vaccine,” Yuthura chimed in.

“All of that work will be lost if I don't fulfill my ‘destiny.’” Revan scowled as she pronounced the last word.

“You cannot,” Tentacle–face repeated. “The Empire needs you restored to your station. Alive. You must be the voice of temperance and restraint—when Tenebrae gave you equal status, it meant something. The war is not yet won—”

Temperance and restraint? Polla snickered, eyeing Yuthura who gave her such a fake blank look that she knew the Twi’lek was thinking the exact same thing—Just smart enough not to say it.

“I will be the voice of temperance and restraint,” Revan said. “Inside his own mind. The Empire merely needs a figurehead willing to treat with the Republic. Any number of sentients could fill that role. You, for example.” Her smile was glacial. “Don't deny that the thought didn't occur.”

His eyes glinted, yellow and crazy and Sith. “If the other Councilmembers could be swayed in favor of my election—”

“Or Lord Nyriss could do it. Or Lord Zash—she’s young, but charismatic. Even Inse Blais—” Revan folded her hands in her lap, interlacing the flesh fingers with the gold. Her voice was cool. “The girl’s even younger than Zash, but from what Ban has told me, she’s not as stupid. As long as one of my allies can serve openly as Tenebrae’s public counter, I can… do what I must… from… inside.”

Inside? Polla exchanged another glance with Yuthura, again wondering if they were just humoring a madwoman. From the moment she’d woken, Revan had been babbling about a fracking tomb. And after they’d filled her in on what had happened while she’d been in the coma, she’d come up with this plan. Fetch Lord Scourge to help them past the city gates, go kilometers into the jungle to some kind of temple—

Polla wished Zaalbar was here, but it was one of his days to check on Seiran and Carth and that brat Sith kid at Tenebrae’s palace.

“Forgive my directness,” the Sith Lord said to Revan. “But of the four of us here, you are only marginally stronger than the null insect. This is not your original body, I was told…?”

“You’re right. This body was not mine—originally. But you remember Sheris, Finiris.” Revan’s lips pursed. “How many times did you have her and Malak out to your estate?” She stared down at her golden arm, flexing the fingers slowly. One of them buzzed, and didn’t quite curl—a place where HK hadn’t sealed the circuit very well. “I received the reports. And I’m sure Yuthura told you that Sheris’s body is a genetic copy of mine.”

“And where is the original?”

“Dead. That mindwiped shell inhabiting it was too powerful to live.”

Dead. Even knowing it was a lie—probably—it was difficult for Polla not to believe the hard-edged woman with her blazing green eyes and that flat voice.

Dead? Or hanging out on Deralia with my son, and my parents? Polla knew Carth still hoped the real Revan was gonna show up here somehow, but she’d timed the jumps six different ways. Revan could have been here twice, even in the slowest ship ever.

Maybe the savior of the Star Forge was dead. It wouldn’t surprise Polla at all—in some ways Revan being dead was the only thing that made sense. I would never leave Seiran here alone. And even this version of fracking Revan showed up to save him, right? Someone that’s me—or her—or her and me—would never just leave Carth and his son and Zaalbar—

Would she? For her son? And then the thought Polla didn’t like to admit she had. For mine? If she thinks she’s me, does she think he’s hers? Is she with him? Is she holding Abasen right now?

I’ll fracking kill her. Polla glanced over at the Bitch and Scourge again. She’d seen Lord Wobbly shoot lightning from his fingertips at a slave leader who questioned his loyalty to the cause once. Guy had had third-degree electrical burns. I’ll fracking kill her… from a distance.

“So, the Hero of the Star Forge is dead,” Scourge repeated. “By your hand?”

“In a manner of speaking.” Revan shrugged. “I pushed her off our ship’s hull when we were leaving a planet.”

Seiran had said the same—only he said the other Revan had survived the fall. He’d spoken to Molla who said she was in a coma. (Fracking typical of Revans to be in comas, apparently.) Seiran had also said that this Bitch here had promised she’d rescue them all—

If the Revan with my memories does show up, she’s gonna be pissed about this one shoving her out of a ship. I would be.
The Bitch glanced at Polla, and then started in again with Scourge, apparently abandoning the ‘let’s speak Basic so the null insect can understand’ thing—because her Ancient Sith was so fast that the only word Polla caught was ‘destroy,’ and that also meant ‘maim,’ ‘kill,’ and was a homonym of the word they used for ‘brunch,’ so who knew?

“Let them talk,” Yuthura shrugged, like she and Polla had a choice.

“Right.” Polla took a deep breath and stared at the wall of the palanquin, trying to think happy thoughts—

XXX

“...Then I heard her tell Moll she’d rescue you, then send us both back. Right after she smacked me down with her Force. Do you feel rescued?” her husband whispered, more than a little bitterly.

“Are we rescued yet?”

The air reeked in the mech closet, but it was one of the only places none of the Blaises thought to look for Polla.

Mydia had made looking for Polla a game lately—whenever Dustil brought along his driver, Mydia would try and make some excuse for Polla to be occupied so she couldn't see her husband. At first, Carth’s son had objected—the boy had been raised with manners at some point, maybe—but lately he just stared at Polla with this black, blank expression that said he still hadn’t gotten over the thinking she was responsible for Mekel Jin dying (another gem of gossip Seiran had mentioned, along with the fact that Carth’s possession times were getting longer and the man still wasn't catching the plague that Polla had released on the planet just for him).

Sometimes Polla suspected that Dustil Onasi was getting off their pain just as much as the Blais monsters did. He looked worse than either of them now—like a face full of ugly. The only thing worse than looking at him was hearing Mydia go on about how hot that was.

Dustil Onasi was supposed to be an ally, but Polla wouldn't trust him with someone else’s spice.

“We’re doing great with the rebellion,” Polla told Seiran, dodging the question of any rescue, dodging the worry for Abasen that snuck up and caught her with teeth whenever she was alone. “Stockpiling weapons—and the droid says she’s getting vaccine from her Manaan manufacturers any day now. Plus, Yuthura thinks she can get a sweet ride out of Scourge when we’re ready to leave too—just have to play along ’til then.”

“You’re still thinking about a ship.” He sounded pissed. Polla got that, but this wasn’t the time. “You know Carth Onasi’s going to take the Sith Fleet and attack the Republic? You know they’re planning on war?”

“I can’t stop that.” Hadn’t she tried? “What we can do is get some of these people safe. We’re sneaking folks out of Kaas City, Sei. We’re helping the slaves get free. I can’t tell you where they’re hiding, because then I’d have to kill you—”

“Not funny.” His mouth came down on hers hard as a clamp.

“Not at all funny,” she whispered when she had a chance to catch her breath. “But if we can’t get a ship, I hope you like living in trees on the lightning planes of Kaas, because that’ll be our new, best-case scenario—”

XXX
“What’s the deal with the tomb?” Polla asked Yuthura, when ‘sikuth,’ the word for tomb (or ice generator) came up for the eighth time. Did Revan mean the graves in the basement of the Blais mansion? Sometimes Polla still had nightmares about the time Mydia had sent her down for a bottle of wine and locked the door.

(Phylus said she’d only been down there for forty minutes, but it had felt like forty fracking years in the dark—and that smell—)

“Revan is explaining to Scourge that she will be better able to assist our efforts when she is…” Yuthura’s lekku had flattened all the way down like they did when she was stressed. “When she has opened the tomb.” She shrugged. “Perhaps she needs to retrieve something from within?”

“We’re going back to the house?” Polla was (nominally) in charge of the palanquin’s nav system, although it felt all backasswards, staring at a screen in the wall while sitting backwards, maneuvering the display with her fingers to move the car.

“No,” Revan said, breaking up abruptly from her Ancient Sith heart–to–heart, and staring Polla down with that creepy fracking gaze. “We’re going to the tomb. Now.”

Scourge said something in Ancient Sith and Revan shook her head, answering back. Yuthura chimed in. Polla counted to ten slowly—and then again as the three of them argued more about… something.

“Is this really the right place to just stand here?” Polla interrupted them. Since the plague had gotten so bad, gatherings of more than four parties were forbidden—and even if technically they were in compliance, (at the moment), Polla wasn’t sure they needed to announce Revan being back (for real) just yet. Not before the leaders of their still–reluctant rebellion got a chance to meet the woman they were (supposedly) fighting for––meet the real thing, and not just Polla wearing a mask and dodging a bunch of questions about whether or not she was the real thing….

Xxx

“Do you see how it’s not just about one person, Drakkar?” Polla made her voice sweet and reasonable for the Twi’lek guardsman, endlessly grateful for those Ryl lessons Ma made her take back in primary, that made speaking to him easy, as opposed to like when she had to address the half-breed scions of House Azar, who expected their Revan to talk in Ancient Sith. Sure, she’d had that speech Zaalbar had gotten from Mission, memorized it phonetically, but the question and answer sesh afterwards had been rough. “In a way, we are all Revan Starfire. We are all fighting Tenny—fighting Tenebrae just as she would, protecting the innocent, uh… hiding in this… very nice cave.”

Polla was lying. The cave was not nice. It was damp and smelled like a sewer, maybe because it connected to the Kaas City sewers.

By her side, Zaalbar rumbled his agreement to the cluster of Wookiees behind the Twi’leks and Human slaves of the Kaas secondary noble houses.

“So you’re not her.” Drakkar glared, bitter disappointment quite plain in his open brown eyes.

Polla breathed calmly through the mask, reflecting that it was a frack of a lot easier to stay calm when you knew no one could see your face.

“If I was Revan would you expect me to admit it?” Her best imitation. Her hand went to the lightsaber hilt at her belt. It didn’t work—Phylus had found it somewhere in the Blais crypts—but it made a good-looking fake, encrusted with even more jewels than the ones Dustil had made her drop in the forest what seemed ages ago. “You’re not rebelling for me—”

“That’s right,” Alura S’Tang snapped. Next to Drakkar, she was one of highest-ranked Resistance leaders. “We’ve been getting people to safety for decades—before Revan came along—and after. The real Revan knew that.”

“Cool your jets,” Polla told her. “I know it—we’re just working to get you guys some vaccine, so your people stop dying—”

“That was supposed to happen before the plague came to Kaas,” Alura said. “If you were truly Revan, you would know that too!”

“Plans change.” Polla shrugged. “We’re getting the vaccine now. Tell me what else you need, and I’ll do my best.”

Kaas City was just another planet, after all. And… just like everywhere else with import restrictions it had a thriving black market. Polla had managed to fence a bunch of Blais artifact crap that Phylus brought them for Imperial credits—and she’d even found a fence with contacts in Republic space—now, if Mission would just get back to them about the vaccine shipments… maybe they’d be golden.

Xxx

They were still waiting on those vaccine shipments. Polla drummed her fingers on the side of the palanquin eyeing the window.

With the Bitch’s charm, meeting the real her might not help rally that crowd. Or maybe her inspirational talks are better in Ancient Sith? Crazy thoughts. This planet made everyone nuts. Polla took a deep breath, counting to ten. Poor, dead Master Klee had taught her that trick. Breathe the fear out, take the calm in.

Maybe for assholes with the Force, breathing in and out worked? It was doing nothing for Polla.

She glanced out the window again. Shit. “Uh… guys? Tenebrae’s Enforcers are out—and coming this way.”

“I see the guardsmen. We must not be captured.” Revan pulled the screen over her window shut. “Proceed to the following coordinates. And quickly. Negative twelve nineteen, by positive two–twelve.”

Outside, the guards had been intercepted by a string of red–robed slaves trotting past on double rows of electrified plasma–chain. They were patting each one down, and arguing with their handler, a hardened–looking Zabrak woman with more scars than tats—and less clothing than either. She looked cold, what with the rain. Colder still, when one of the silver–armored guards stepped forward with a light–whip and lashed it around her neck.

The crack of bone was audible as the woman collapsed. Polla closed her eyes. This fracking planet. And Sei wonders why I keep dreaming of a sweet ship?

“Polla!” Revan snapped, leaning forward and grabbing her arm. “Go!”

Count to ten—

She grabbed the steering bar. Polla had to consider that maybe Klee had never had to test his faith in actual Kaas City as she punched in the numbers Revan had given.

_Breathe. Count to ten and breathe._

Xxx

“You're back.” Dustil tried to sound like he didn't give a shit, like he hadn't been watching this whole time—thirty minutes now, that the asshole occupied his father’s body.

Once, it had been five minutes, max. But it was getting longer every time now. Every damn time.

Long enough to get them to this fracking broadcast room, where more of the red–eyed zombies were waiting for them with holo–cams and an entourage. To his surprise, Zaalbar was waiting for them there too. And Seiran Wen.

“Wuh—what—” his father wobbled on his feet and Dustil hated the man suddenly because now was the _worst_ time to show weakness.

“No fracking idea.” But that wasn't what Malak would have said. “I do not know,” he added coldly. “Lord Tenebrae said something about an announcement.”

The Wookiee growled something and Father’s head turned. “It definitely won’t be good,” he agreed.

A commotion at the other door interrupted Dustil’s thoughts as Mydia and Inse Blais sauntered through, followed by that brat brother of theirs, lurking behind. At least there was no sign of Ban the idiot, who kept trying to give Dustil lectures about the dark side when he was just trying to get laid.

“We are honored...?” Inse’s voice was polite enough, but her face was too pale, even for her. “But unfortunately, Most Enlightened, the slaves you asked for were sent on another errand. Our seneschal is trying to locate them now—”

“And the body?” The Zabrak kid’s mouth pursed. “Tut, tut, surely my Voice mentioned you were to bring the still–breathing body of the false Revan? Did you think I did not know you had it?”

“It’s…it is gone too,” Inse said. She was brave, Dustil thought, the way she faced down Vitiate unblinking. “Perhaps the servants stole it. Or the woman died? She’s still unconscious. And half the city is ill, you know.”

“Indeed, they are.” The air seemed to thicken around them, like the Sith Emperor was channeling the darkness from the planet itself. “And yet, your family… Lady Blais… remains unscathed.”

Inse stared down at the ground. “Your Grace has shown us favor, Most Luminant. We remain well enough to serve you.”

Takan’s mouth chuckled. “Oh, that you have. But your insolence has its price.”

The girl’s head lifted, and she stared the two Zabraks down. “We will pay.” Her eyes flickered in Dustil’s direction and her chin lifted, stubbornly. Next to her, Mydia stifled a giggle.

“Perhaps I have been too lenient with the House of Blais,” Vitiate growled, this time using several voices. “The thought occurred to me just the yesterday when my Voice was visiting your dear mother, Herpia at the mountain estate. She had expected we would enjoy a pleasant brunch, but my plans… altered.”
Inse froze. “Mother knows I’ve been attending the Dark Council meetings in her stead!”

“She does,” Vitiate whispered, still from several mouths. Dustil assumed he was playing that fracked game of his where he’d possessed all his guards again. “Now.”

Mydia giggled again, high and totally at the wrong time. But strangely, the Emperor just granted her an indulgent smile from Zepth’s mouth.

“When you find the servants and the body, bring them to me.” He shrugged with Zabraks’ shoulders in unison. “Or your own lives can end just as easily as theirs.”

Seiran made a noise, and suddenly Dustil could feel him in the Force, like a weak spark of fury that would be snuffed out if half the room fracking blinked.

“No!” Then Dustil stepped forward before Polla Organa’s husband did something really fracked. The man was a fracking idiot, but he didn’t deserve to die here. “Lord Tenebrae will spare them all because I will it. Lord Tenebrae spares all of you for me.”

“For now.” The Voices chuckled in unison too.

Mydia winked at him. Inse scowled. Dustil was too busy being Malak to give either of them a close look, but he appreciated that Inse had broken enough to start to try and compete with her sister: both girls were wearing figure-hugging body armor that looked like it had been painted on. Made it easy to appreciate Inse’s lean hardness contrasted against her sister’s fantastic rack—

The holo–cams switched on suddenly, blinding his eyes.

“No!” Dustil stepped forward before Polla Organa’s husband did something really fracked. The man was a fracking idiot, but he didn’t deserve to die here. “Lord Tenebrae will spare them all because I will it. Lord Tenebrae spares all of you for me.”

“For now.” The Voices chuckled in unison too.

Mydia winked at him. Inse scowled. Dustil was too busy being Malak to give either of them a close look, but he appreciated that Inse had broken enough to start to try and compete with her sister: both girls were wearing figure-hugging body armor that looked like it had been painted on. Made it easy to appreciate Inse’s lean hardness contrasted against her sister’s fantastic rack—

The holo–cams switched on suddenly, blinding his eyes.

“Lord Tenebrae,” said one of the Zabraks next to his father, “will speak for himself now… to the galaxy.”

Xxx

Their newly-purchased space yacht was fast, expensive, and a welcome luxury after months in the Kashyyyk forest—and then more time setting up production on Emmfor–78. The Blue Ghast circled the Smuggler’s Moon in the Merchant’s Orbit, so low that the ship’s pointed nose cut through clouds, revealing the lights twinkling like jewels far below.

Civilization at last, Lena thought. Such a relief after the month they’d spent on Emmfor, the remote rock the twins had found to set up their factory base. Her son had been born there, in tunnels carved by machines, attended to by newly-stamped droids, who treated them all with a reverence that was decidedly not droid–like.

It’s good to be back, she thought, staring down at the world below while they waited for docking clearances. Back to civilization, and… people. Not that the twins weren’t… people. She didn’t mean that!

Sometimes, Lena wasn’t sure what she meant. “That’s Nar Shaddaa,” she told newborn Prince, holding him up to the ferracrystal viewscreen. “I know it doesn’t look like much now, but your mama and your sisters are going to make it a nice place. For you.”

She kissed his chubby face that already had Nico’s nose and her lekku. Prince’s hands opened and closed on the viewscreen like he was trying to grab the smuggler’s moon for his own bauble, and she rocked her body back and forth, humming a song about thranta and clouds.

The tell–tale hum of the wideband interrupted their dance abruptly, bringing the galaxy back in a
“—what are we looking at, Jokka Rei?”

“I’m not sure, I—” the smooth voice of the HoloNet’s most famous announcer faltered. “Do you hear that? It’s like white noi—”

“See’raa! I told you! No news broadcasts around the baby!” Lena turned to see both twins standing before her, identically dressed in their red silksynth, head tails neatly tied and flossed.

See’raa held a remote in her hand. “The projector in our room only does blue and white,” the white Twi’lek shrugged. “And you said we were his aunties, not sisters.”

“Family, anyway.” Lena smiled, rocking Prince in her arms. “But the pediatric–droid said no screens until Prince is at least—”

“Like white light.” Jokka Rai chuckled. “Are we live? This needs to be live.”

Hush, Tee’raa signed at her with a pale lavender t’chin. Watch. It's major.

The pretty Human sitting next to Jokka Rai shrugged, looking confused. “Our director says we’re receiving some kind of announcement from the Sith Empire. It's taking over all the networks—how is that even possible—”

On all channels, the mute twin added.

“Why are Jokka Rai’s eyes red and glowing?” Lena Wee asked.

We don't know. Winka Dell on Ryloth had glowing eyes too. Tee’raa’s t’chin traced her confusion.

“Do not attempt to adjust your holo-screen,” Jokka Rai said. “Set your devices to record. Your galaxy contains approximately two hundred fifty–nine trillion sentient lives. This message is intended for one.”

There was a long pause. Then Jokka Rai’s face appeared on the screen split four ways, then three of the panels dissolved into static.

Broadcasting from unknown locations, the chyron said. Live feed.

“Why are his eyes… glowing?” Lena repeated.

Bad, Tee’raa signed, not really answering.

“One…” Jokka Rai murmured. A blaster under his chin appeared on the screen, held by his own hand.

“Two,” the woman appearing next to him whispered. Arkanian, by her coloring, the three fingers on her hand holding the knife to her own throat.

“Three,” said the boy on the third panel. Little more than a kid. Twi’lek. Blue. He was dressed like a Jedi padawan, and was pressing a lightsaber hilt to the side of his own face.

“Look away, Lena,” See’raa barked at her, as if suddenly Lena was the child here and not them.

Please, her sister added. Bad for your milk.

Lena looked down at her son. His eyes were the same brown as hers. His mouth pursed in a bow as he made a sucking sound. His little brow ridge wrinkled and his t’chun curled on her finger.

“Four.” The fourth voice onscreen was male. She never knew more than that.

A blaster’s report, a lightsaber’s ignition, a death rattle, and what sounded like the crackle of flames. Despite herself, Lena looked up just in time to see the quarter screen dissolve and flicker before being replaced with a man’s face: glowing red eyes, a furred Human jaw, and—

“That’s Carth!” See’raa began cursing long and low in a language Lena didn't recognize. Tee’raa couldn't speak, of course, but Lena heard her take a slow breath, heard the slap of her lekku as they twisted together in mimicry of an old Ryloth grief–song.

“Do not attempt to adjust your holo–screen,” Carth repeated. “Set your devices to record. Your galaxy contains approximately two hundred fifty–nine trillion sentient lives. This message is intended for one. And trust me, Revan,” a voice said from the widescreen. Carth’s words had a strange echo, like there were others in the room, speaking with him in unison. Lots of them, all, speaking together like a hive mind. Or a flock of gan. “Those tiny deaths hurt me far, far more than it could ever hurt them—”

Xxx

“Hu’tuun show off.” Those strangers had suffered bad deaths. Canderous made a silent vow to make the madman pay—no matter how many bodies he chose to hide in.

Around them, the bridge broke out in whispered chaos, as their mostly unblooded warriors reacted to the first glimpse of their true enemy.

The one Novasun promised. Long ago. Canderous didn’t know the entire tale—perhaps never would. But Aemelie had let enough of the women’s secrets slip for him to understand their next battle.

“Trust me, Revan. That hurt me far, far more than it could ever hurt them. Your treachery is an act of war.” The expression on the pilot’s face wasn't his at all. His eyes were glowing red. “We are at war,” Carth’s mouth emitted a low chuckle. Next to him, his black–robed son scowled at the cam, face marked with a Sith’s ugly. “Because of you.”

“Do we know anything about the planetary defenses on Kaas?” Canderous asked Aemelie. They were already committed—he’d sent the orders for the Mandalorian ships to follow his path through hyperspace as soon as Biscain’s sun turned black. But watching that sheb–less shabuir murder innocents for the sake of taunting Revan was fuel for the fire of Canderous’s own battle–righteousness.

“Our intelligence regarding their homeworld is more than forty years old.”

“There must be Mando’ade still in that region. Send the call.”

Do not attempt to adjust your holo–screen,” Carth repeated. “Set your devices to record. Your galaxy contains approximately two hundred fifty–nine trillion sentient lives. This message is intended for one.”

“You are sure?” It was ritual that she ask, but Canderous suspected his wife had already done so.

“I am.” By all accounts, the Sith didn't have much of an army left by the time the Star Forge went, but they were hu’tuun Force–users. Worthy challenges.
Pains in his ass.

The remnants of Revan's old fleet had been sent by her to the Malachor system when she'd been little more than a shadow of herself on Manaan trying to impress Oerin Lin. From there, rumor put those that remained as pirates. But rumors, as Canderous knew well, could be wrong.

“They will come for this,” he added, smiling slowly. “Even Wies.”

“I do not trust Kissandrix. But you have an affection for Onasi as well.” Aemelie sounded surprised by that. “Your muscles have knotted tenser than a basilisk’s grapple, husband. You realize everyone in that room is doomed?”

Canderous brushed her enquiring hand aside, rolling back his own shoulders. “That piece of osik Emperor is a thousand years old or more. He’ll be fat and lazy—just as prone to overextend as the Republic. Onasi and his kid and Zaalbar aren't dead yet.”

“Neither is Seiran Wen,” his wife noted. “See? He's standing to the right of the Wookiee.” She paused. “But where is Polla? Revan claimed she was captured as well.”

The Deralian he had heard so much about was nowhere to be seen.

“We will avenge her and sing her battle song.” Canderous’s eyes went to the Wookiee again. The man would be avenged too—if need be with the rest, but he felt that old familiar pang—still expecting to see the T3 astromech at Zaalbar’s side. The real Mission did not require his vengeance—she had died for a true cause she believed in, as brave as any warrior.

But this piece of osik behind all shadows…this ancient emperor… it would be glorious to see his armies ground to sand.

An infinite empire is an endless season of war. It will be difficult. But glorious.

“Come to me, Revan,” said the evil thing using Carth’s voice. “Come to me now.”

XXX

Lord Scourge’s threats got them out of the quarantined city without a search, but Polla’s pulse hadn’t had a chance to return to normal. Now, it was taking all her concentration to keep the mag–levs balanced on this tub as the palanquin chugged through the jungle, along the road that was barely one.

Polla had just saved them from following the Bitch’s coordinates into a gully when Revan leaned across the small space and grabbed her arm. “Go up that hill,” she ordered.

The ‘hill’ in question was more of a cliff and Polla doubted the palanquin would make it. She said as much, and the woman cursed in a language that could have been Bothan, maybe. Or Bithan. Whatever. It didn’t sound like Ancient Sith.

“Your Republic slave is right, Lord Revan.” Scourge frowned. “We will need to make our way on foot, or continue by car to the main entrance.”

“The main entrance is sealed from the lower chambers,” Revan countered. “On foot it must be.”

Personally, Polla didn’t think the woman was up for it. “I’m not a Republic citizen,” she told the Sith. “Don’t fracking insult me again, Tentacles.”
“She’s impudent,” the man said as if Polla was suddenly an inanimate tree. “A dangerous quality for a slave.”

“She’s careless,” Revan responded with a shrug that almost made her fall over. “Yuthura, take her back to the city.” Revan stood up, tottering to her feet as unsteady as poor Auntie Mita there at the end.

“We will not,” Yuthura stood up and proffered an arm. “If those guards were searching for you, we might be detained—and worse.”

“It won’t matter.” The woman moved her hand and the door slid open. “Once I succeed.” She slipped out of the palanquin clumsily, ignoring the Twi’lek’s hand as Scourge followed. Yuthura stood up too—and Polla didn’t fancy her chances alone in the jungle with only the lousy needle-nose she’d managed to nick from one of the Blais guards, so she came along too.

“I said—” Revan began, scowling in a way that Polla had gotten all wrong apparently, because this scowling Revan looked more like she needed a dump than anything else. “I said, Scourge and I should go alone to the Temple.”

“Night comes early here,” Yuthura snapped. “Do you want to abandon us to our deaths?”

The woman blinked. “None of our lives mean anything compared to Tenebrae. Stopping him is what matters. I would kill you all if it was needed—all of us, including myself—”

“Are you killing me now?” Polla interrupted. “Because I think I can outrun you, and… just let me know, okay?” She took a few steps back, not liking the call of the jungle in the background. That night she and Zaalbar had spent in these wilds had been up there with the most terrifying—a category that lately seemed to be her entire life.

“Not yet.” The woman’s mouth twitched, as if they’d shared a joke.

Frick her. Looking up, there was a sort of path, cut through with switchbacks and rocky outcroppings. Didn’t look like any nexu or worse were lurking on it either. Polla started up it, despite the yelling behind her, only stopping at the half-way mark to watch as the two high-and-mighty Force users struggled to make a woman who didn’t want their help walk.

“Coming?” she asked sweetly.

Xxx

“Come to me, Revan,” said Carth’s voice. “Come to me now.”

When some Sith Lord could break through corporate Holo-Net codes and just transmit, you knew things were kind of Hutt-shaped, Lena thought.

“Is it this craphole of a screen, or are Carth's eyes glowing red too?” See’raa asked.

“Don't say craphole in front of the baby,” Lena warned.

Chiv-hole, the other twin signed with her t’chun.

“Revan,” the Sith's voice whispered, strangely resonant. High and low and every pitch between.

It took Lena a moment to realize the voice was coming not just from one voice, but from both announcers on the vid screen, Carth Onasi, and a host of glowing-eyed sentients behind him.
“What the hell have those sleemos done to Carth? Tee’raa signaled.

“Big Z is there too.” See’raa’s brown eyes were big as moons. “And Dustil? Where is that? They’re in trouble!”

“I don’t know.” The sinking pit in the bottom of Lena’s stomach increased when See’raa switched to Rakatan, and Tee’raa’s lekku signs likewise descended into incoherence.

“Revan,” the voices repeated. “I commend your persistence, but the time for feints is done—”

Xxx

“The time for feints is done,” Carth’s mouth said. The words echoed, spoken in unison from at least a dozen throats, but all Revan could do was stare at the holo–image of her husband, whose eyes were glowing, suspended above her board.

“I said I’d save you, Revan and I will—” How long ago had it been that he’d tried?

How can I save you from this, Carth? Revan had no idea.

“Dustil looks like shit,” Mekel Jin noted.

Revan felt her own voice shift between a laugh and a sob. “You're sure Dustil’s not Malak? That asshole just called him Malak.”

“He's faking being Malak.”

“How do you know?” Shouldn’t I know?

“I know him. What the frack is wrong with him?”

“What’s wrong with Carth?” But she knew. A part of her knew. Red eyes. Red eyes are bad.

—the time for feints is done,” Carth’s voice repeated, not sounding like himself at all. “Our bargain… Revan.…” Her husband’s body walked across the room, pacing closer until it filled the entire screen.

“Come to me,” he chuckled. “Our games are done, yours and mine both.”

“No,” Revan muttered. She couldn’t look away.

“I tire of games, Revan. Come to me. Now.”

“That’s the fracking idea.”

Carth’s mouth smiled. “Come out and play, my Starfire.”

“What is this?” Millifar froze in the doorway, kolto packed around her bare arm. “What is your husband doing, Third Wife?”

“Revan.…” A slow stamp of feet created a drumbeat effect behind him. Then the plinking sound of something Revan’s mind took a moment to place as an electro–harp, of all things, echoing the sound. The camera pulled out again: showing Zaalbar and Seiran and Dustil. Zaal had a collar around his neck. Seiran was wearing red robes. And Dustil did look like shit—wearing armor and a cape, yellow eyes burning nearly as bright as his father’s.
“Carth’s possessed.” She felt numb. “That’s Tenebrae, the Sith Emperor. He possesses bodies. He has millions of them. Billions, maybe. Somehow… he has Carth too.”

“Yeah,” Mekel said. “I know. I’ve met the asshole.”

“Revvaaannn,” Carth’s mouth stretched her name out like a shudder. “Come to me. Come out and play.”

“All of your magic.” Millifar spat on the floor. “It always goes wrong. Did you know we’re stopping at the World of Tombs? Aemelie insists and Father gave in.”

“The what?” We can’t stop. There’s no time.

Later, Revan would have time to think of what she could do—time to think of what resources she had. But that was later.

“What is this banthashit, Vitiate?” Carth’s son sounded nothing at all like he had when Malak’s ghost had possessed him. “She’s in a fracking coma. She’s not hiding on this planet—”

“Not this planet.” The tramp of feet and that fracking plinking music kept on in the background, grating on Revan’s nerves until she thought she might scream. “But she and I were just speaking… on… what world was that, again?” That smile of his pulled Carth’s lips too thin, made his face look like a skull.

“I don’t care.” The kid folded his arms across his chest. He was wearing some kind of armor. “How much longer is this going to be?” His eyes were yellow, the skin around them bruised like a stim junkie on a spice binge. His hand fell to the saber on his belt and he took a step forward—

Behind him, incredibly, a young woman giggled and blew a kiss.

“Come to me, Revan,” Carth’s mouth repeated. “Do come and plaay——”

“Frack this,” Dustil snapped, and raised his hand in a fist.

The image cut out abruptly, replaced by red glowing–eyed news announcers with the HoloNet logo.

“Technical difficulties, Revan,” one of them sighed. “Come to me.”

XXX

“Come to me, Revan,” his father’s mouth said. That fracking electroharp in the background went plink, plink, plink. “Do come and plaay——”

“Frack this.” Dustil was tired of the games. He raised his hand in a fist. The cameras sparked and exploded.

Anger felt good. Actually… it all felt good. The Sith Emperor, taking him seriously. The two Blais girls watching. The knowledge that this was all banthashit—that Revan was never going to wake up, and their revolution was going to take this asshole Vitiate down.

“That was rash, Lord Malak.” His father’s mouth chuckled. “Sometimes I forget how young you are. So terribly young and strong.” Vitiate’s voice dropped to a whisper. “I’m so proud.”
The light in his eyes faded out sharply. And then Dustil’s father collapsed like a powered-down droid—or would have—if Dustil hadn’t extended the Force to catch him a few seconds before Zepth and Takan rushed to his rescue—like Dustil hadn’t been there first.

“Wuh...what happened?”

“You’re back.” Dustil turned his head and the two Zabrak backed off. He tried to sound like he didn't give a shit, like he hadn't been watching this whole time—thirty minutes now, that the asshole occupied his father’s body. Once, it had been five minutes, max. But it was getting longer every time now. Every fracking time.

“Wuh—what—” his father wobbled on his feet and Dustil hated the man suddenly because now was still the worst time to show weakness. Again. Just like every time.

“No fracking idea.” But that wasn’t what Malak would have said. “I do not know,” he added coldly. “Lord Tenebrae wants to be a vid star now. He went on the holovid to tell Revan to come here.”

“Is she coming?”

Too easy to hate Father even more for that hope in his voice.

“Does it matter?” Dustil asked him. “Aren't we leaving for war?”

XXX

The screen fizzled out abruptly before resuming, emblazoned with a Fleet Logo.

Live from Byss, read the chyron. Fleet Holo-Net.

“What is this?” Admiral Rew Ekkumi demanded.

“Lord Malak is so rude,” the Toydarian announcer chirped from the comm screen. His gossamer wings fluttered. “Come to me, Revan. Come out and play.”

“Come out and play,” the decorated Wing Commander next to him echoed. She was Rishii, and her feathers fluffed, yellow and pink under the overlights. Her beak clacked, one two, three, in a rhythmic discordance.

“Come and play,” hissed the Trandoshan Rear Admiral. “Now, Revan, come to me.”

“That’s Yuffall Iskar,” her lieutenant gasped. “What’s wrong with them?”

“That’s that Sith Emperor,” Rew muttered. “Iskar’s possessed. The bastard’s infiltrated Fleet.”

Unease prickled at the back of Rew’s neck and she whirled around, half-expecting her own crew to have red glowing eyes too—but they all stared back at her, as astonished—or relieved—as she was.

This was what that Force-eater was going to stop. Before Revan stopped him. We could have stopped both of them first—

“Patch me through to Rensha,” she told Lieutenant Abrad. “If she’s still in charge, I’d like to hear her plan for this.”

XXX

The air was dim and stifling, as if the presence of the Dark Temple dimmed the weak sun above. A cloud of blood–biting insects buzzed interminably around her head until Revan cleared them away with a weak push of the Force. Her armored boots sank in the mud as they ascended the trail.

At her side, Yuthura murmured words of encouragement.

It was humiliating to need help up a simple cliff that Revan remembered clearing with a Force leap, but she was not fool enough to admit a further weakness by falling on her face.

She had accepted Yuthura’s arm. Scourge had forged ahead, passing the rash Deralian, traversing the overgrown path that Revan remembered all too well from before.

Long before, when the galaxy had been at her feet and Revan presumed she had the means to put Tenebrae beneath the ground….

XXX

“Not much farther.” The being inhabiting her husband’s body chuckled, hanging back, as Revan slashed at the overgrown jungle with her lightsaber. “Not much farther, my Starfire.”

Her foot tripped on uneven ground, and Revan nearly stumbled as her boot landed on something hard and smooth and round. Despite years of war and death, she heard herself gasp as she realized it was a skull.

Revan looked down, more carefully. What she had assumed to be merely tangled underbrush and branches concealed a layer of bones. More bones than she could count. Ragged pieces of cloth and armor covered some—others jutted out of the dirt, bleached and stained by the elements. Beasts had scattered them and broken them.

It was impossible to tell how many had died here.

Her eyes fell on something silver protruding from a pile of dank leaves. Revan reached out and a long-dead Sith’s lightsaber flew into her free hand. A wavering red beam extended when she ignited the thing. The crystal was cracked and fused.

Worthless. Revan tossed it aside. “More sacrifices, Tenebrae?” She kept her voice bland. “I thought we had enough of those at my coronation.”

“In a manner of speaking.” Malak’s breath rasped through the prosthesis she’d had so carefully made, although Malak’s mind was nowhere to be found in what remained of his expression.

But Mal will come back. He always comes back—Revan forced her thoughts into cold lines. “Then, speak,” she told her enemy.

A gurgling noise might have been a chuckle. “These are all who came before you. I searched for a long time for my sith’ae’rah—centuries, in fact. You have no idea the difficulty—molding the right circumstances, finding a child with enough power… not losing them to madness or assassination….”

Molding? Revan’s foot stumbled again on what looked like a piece of hip. “Did you tell each of them that they were the chosen one too?”

Tenebrae didn’t answer, coming up close behind Revan, close enough to make her skin crawl. His arm—Malak’s arm—slipped familiarly around her waist. Her husband’s chest breathed in and out, the prosthesis wheezing in her ear.
Needs adjustment again, the calm part of her mind whispered. The valves keep coming loose on his thorax. When we return to the palace, I will see to it.

“Look,” the Emperor hissed softly. “There, my Starfire. Ahead, through the trees.”

“It’s a door.” She would not give him the satisfaction of her fear.

XXX

Her steps were just as even now, even as the bones crunched under her boots. I passed the test before and I will do so again. There is no question, no doubt—

“Hey! These are fracking bones!” Polla’s surprised shriek interrupted her reverie. “What the hell happened here?” She held up a skull by its jawbone, waving it at Revan. “Did you kill all these people?”

“No.” Revan took a deep breath, steeling herself. She could not warn the Deralian or the Twi’lek, because they might stop her, out of some misguided notion to preserve Revan—or their own skins. I did suggest you both wait in the car. “They did not all die at the same time, but over centuries. Millennia. If you were to descend far enough into the sediment, the remains would cease to be humanoid. This is the Sith’s Dark Temple; but it was built upon the foundation of something far older.”

Tenebrae was not the first to sacrifice here. May he be the last. May we be the last.

“That archway contains the door,” Revan continued, as the heedless smuggler turned back toward the Temple itself. “It has traps for the unwary. Unless you want to die, Polla Organa, let me enter first.”

“Sure.” The woman stopped still in the tall grass. “Be my fracking guest.”

Finiris—Scourge—paced beside Revan. “Is this the entrance that can only be opened by the sith’a’e’rah?”

She had not told him that—not specifically. Revan frowned, and he chuckled. “The Dark Temple’s secret chamber was a bedtime story on my homeworld. Only the most worthy of children would enter. There was a time when I imagined it full of sweetened drak tails and blue milk confection.”

Revan allowed herself a small smile. “I’m afraid it does not contain anything so piquant.” Of course there would be legends. Tenebrae searched a long time for me. In this Empire and in ours.

“Ah,” the Sith smiled. “I have missed your humor, my lord.”

“That’s just sad.” Polla coughed. “If we live through this, Revan, remind me to tell you what a real joke is.”

Her laughter felt hollow. “Oh, I know jokes, Deralian.”

XXX

The door to the chamber slid open easily beneath her fingertips. The interior glowed to life as she stepped through.

“Here we are, Starfire. Your tomb.”

Malak’s body towered over the crystalline dome in front of them. Revan felt the Force ripple as she placed her hands on the mirrored places across its surface, feeling the same burning numbness she had felt at the door.

The indentations were made for Rakatan hands, that now—familiar three—fingered shape. Her own fingers moved to fit.

The humming in the air seemed to increase. Now, the crystal was warm under her touch, not cold at all. The Force rippled again in her mind, like the echo of a whisper.

Come.

“You said not yet,” Revan said out loud, although in that moment she could almost… feel the Emperor inside her own mind—like a durasteel grip, the brush of a battering cannon, unbreakable chains. Linked— “We agreed I had ten years left.”

“Oh, I remember.” Tenebrae’s thoughts were there too, almost palpable under her hands. Ageless. Deathless. Black and as cold as space—pricked by a billion points of light and each one of those lights—

Light. To see—

A child on a nameless world turned his head.

To see him again.

A woman on another threw a stone into a silver lake. Eight—legged beasts came down to the water on the opposite shore, raising their serpentine heads.

To see everything.

A man sat alone on a bed waiting for his lover. It was Third—day, their normal time and they were late.

An old woman sang a song to the infant on her lap, brushing back the curls around its horns—

A guttersnipe stole a wallet in a city paved with ferracrystal tiles—her fear shifting to the exaltation of victory as the alarms beneath her feet flashed red and gold—

Everyone.

“Oh.”

“I did say not yet.” Malak’s voder hissed in the silence with Tenebrae’s chuckle. “But the tomb calls you now, does it not?”

“Yes.”

Revan had expected another Malachor. She had expected death, she had expected nothing—she had not expected to… to want.

She had not expected a part of her to want to stay—

I could see him. Somewhere, among all of those sparks—someday—if he lives—I could see—

But Revan pulled her hands away. The tomb’s curved top had begun to apex open, light shining from inside. And inside—
Revan looked down and wished she had not.

“Who was she?”

“Was it a she?” Tenebrae walked away with Mal’s stride, stalking the length of the tomb like a man already bored. “I scarcely remember. I was young then too.”

The humming noise had stopped with her hands’ retreat. The tomb’s surface spiraled shut again. The light inside dimmed, and the shriveled thing within faded back to an indistinct blur.

“Now you see,” the madman whispered. Malak’s body moved around the tomb to face her, looking down—blank curve of metal where he should have had a mouth. “We are as equals now. Sith’ae’rah to sith’ae’rah. Shall we conquer the galaxy?”

We must. I still need you. “Good.” Revan felt unsteady with relief, allowing herself a small moment of mirth. “Because I had my servants set charges around the base of the Temple, yesterday. If this had been some kind of trap for me—”

“Of course you did.” A burbling chuckle, not Malak’s at all. “As if this vault could be so easily broken.”

“I used allucrete explosives. They’re quite powerful.”

“Oh, Starfire.” Malak’s eyes burned scarlet, narrowing to slits, as his voice tinged into mockery. “Do you truly think I haven’t learned your patterns?” The madman seized her hands, tracing a finger across the palm of her right. “We are made from the same cloth. There are no allucrete charges.”

“No, there are not.” I had no time or there would be. Her hands tightened on Malak’s, nearly crushing the bones. “But I—”

“I’ve noted your instructions to your new flagship as well.” Tenebrae’s voice shifted into a metallic, but uncanny, imitation of her own. “Reduce these coordinates to a plain of smoldering glass if I don’t comm and tell your otherwise by oh–twenty–seven hundred!”

Revan breathed in and out, evenly. She felt the small bones in Malak’s hand pop and she forced her own hands to open, drop their grasp. “Actually, I amended it to thirty hours. One full day.”

“Did I ever tell you, during your little war with the Mando’ade I made Admiral Karath mine?”

She refused to show a reaction. I should have known. “Who else? I found out about Corporal Ekosigan and Knight Rischa. They’re dead.”

“Indeed.” Another chuckle. “We feel them go, of course. At least… I do. Little lights winking out….”

“There are always more bodies, aren’t there.” Revan met his eyes evenly, trying to picture them gray and kind. Trying to remind herself that behind every sentient he possessed could be a man like Malak… had been. Once.

If we are equals I can win. I will have ten years before I go to the tomb forever. Ten years to conquer two empires and end this.

In ten years I can win.
XXX

But she had not had ten years.

I had nearly four. It wasn't enough. Forty might not be enough—not when he has billions and I am one—but I have to try—better this weak body in the tomb than her. Better he is forced to treat with me than that he draws her into his traps. She's as naive as this Deralian child. She has no chance against him—

“Revan?” Yuthura’s voice was a soft whisper in Revan’s ear. When had the woman gotten so close? “Whatever it is you propose to do, are you strong enough?”

“I have to be.”

“You just almost tripped on your own boot.” The Twi’lek took her arm with near–professional assurance, but Revan felt Yuthura’s grip on her arm tense as they approached the black maw of the entrance. The doors to the Temple’s base were not as impressive as the ones in the front but they still towered meters above their heads, inset within a plinth.

“What is that on the door face?” The Twi’lek noted a millisecond before Revan did—her eyes adjusting more quickly to the dim. “Some kind of seal?”

“No.” Revan motioned them all away. “Step back.”

The artificial hand. I didn’t think. Will it still work—if this will work at all—without both of my hands?

Fool. I will not be denied this easily! It must!

The mechanism—the circular plate that spanned both doors was as seamless and smooth as it had been the first day she’d seen it. Revan put her flesh hand on the right side first; immediately feeling the tell–tale burn as the ancient Rakatan device scanned her skin. The light was just as blinding as it had been before, emanating out from her hands, from her skin—making a tracery of light through her veins—

If this doesn’t work, it’s over. Revan’s metal palm joined its counterpart, golden fingers aligning with the grooves set in the left side.

The nerves were artificial, the shock slightly dulled, but the light surged there too.

“What’s she doing?”

“Step farther back. Allow the doors to open.” Scourge had fallen behind them. He said more but his words dissolved into a haze of blinding light—

XXX

At this point, Polla was used to the Force. She’d seen lightning, she’d seen sents levitate things, she’d been Force choked.

But what was happening to Revan now was new. It was… something else.

“She’s glowing.” Polla's voice felt thin and unimportant compared to the woman who looked like she was made of light standing in front of them with her hands upon the door.

The light traced capillaries through Revan’s skin, through both of her hands—the flesh one and the metal. Her head turned back toward them, and Polla could see it racing through her skin, through her closed eyelids.

The woman was smiling.

There was a creaking noise and then the doors slid open.

Revan stepped back, and all the light died. “It worked.” Her voice was faint, and she wavered on her feet before Yuthura rushed in to support her. “It worked.”

Polla noticed she sounded surprised. Not so confident after all?

The Twi’lek was quiet, lekku wrapped around her neck in a way that Polla had come to realize meant she was stressed.

“You okay?” Polla didn't really think, she just went to Revan’s other side before the Bitch fell over.

“No. I should go first. Alone.” The woman pushed away, taking unsteady steps forward. The light had continued from behind the door, illuminating everything so that Revan was backlit as she stepped inside. “You may follow now,” she continued, as if she was in charge. (Was she now? She was why they were fracking here, wasn’t she?)

In for a credit, in for a planet. Polla followed.

XXX

Shai’cho. N’ha, Eskai.

Mekel watched Revan move through the basic Forms in the improvised training space they’d set up in what should be the ship’s sleeping quarters. They were going to take turns sleeping in the cockpit in shifts as per Millifar’s orders—because it was easier to do what Milli wanted than to argue more.

Standing there in an old Republic flight suit, Mekel’s cousin was hotter than she had the right to be—nearly as hot as that brunette rack that had been simpering behind Dustil on the broadcast.

Objectively, hotter than Millifar—especially this grim, strange Millifar, who didn't smile at Mekel’s jokes.

But Revan's your cousin, asshat. It should have been Dustil's voice and not Mekel’s own mind, but it wasn't.

At least it wasn't desire Mekel felt looking at his cousin (now that he knew she was his cousin) —it was more like envy. Had Mekel moved like that? So assured in the Force, like every part of his body was a cog in a coordinated machine? Now, when Mekel worked out the sweat stung his eyes and his muscles ached as his breath ran short. All those weaknesses—the Force had eased them away. Without it, he was nothing.

Mekel'd sparred with Milli earlier—until she'd gotten angry and told him to stop pulling his attacks, that she could easily withstand his full strength.

Mekel had been fighting with everything he had. Everything he had…now.

Revan twirled her single blade over her head with the kind of flourish that would get you stabbed in the gut on Korriban, eyes going to Mekel as if she’d just noticed his existence. Her mouth twitched in a smile. “I can switch to vibroblades if you want to spar.”
Mekel pulled one of the sabers he’d taken from the dead Jedi back on Katarr out of his sleeve. “I have my own.”

She frowned. “Are you sure? It’s difficult without the Force—”

“How would you know?” His voice came out more bitterly than he meant it.

“I fought my way through Malak’s flagship with a Force collar and a neural disruptor to rescue Bastila. Almost took Carth’s head off.”

“They left you a lightsaber?”

“Carth shot a dark Jed—a Sith.” She seemed to correct herself like she didn’t really understand the difference. “Mission broke us out of there. I’d sent her to free the others too while Carth and I went after Bastila.”

“But Shan was captured by Malak.” Mekel had never watched the entire fracking vid. He and Telos used to watch the Underground version sometimes as a laugh, but—

_Telos is still alive. It was a relief. He looks like he took dark side lessons from fracking Bandon Agare, but he’s still fracking alive._

“Not then. Not yet.” Now her eyes were a million parsecs away. “She was just in another holding cell. Malak captured Bastila and took her later.” She brought her saber up in mock salute, the blue blade buzzing aggressively, like the crystals were slightly off–kilter with her Force. “We can try and spar like this, but I’d feel safer if you were wearing cortosis—maybe an energy shield too.”

“I’m fine.” Mekel ignited his own saber—one of the two he’d taken, the one he’d liked the weight of more. The cool green blade that sparked out of it was less to like—greens had a reputation for burning slow, better suited for blocking an offense than cutting through one.

Her first cut was so fast the saber was out of Mekel’s hand before he blinked. The auto–shutoff (it would be suicide for him to use one without a safety now) cut in before it carved a hole in the floor.

“Damn. Sorry!” Cousin Revan called the hilt back to her own hand before tossing it to his.

Her second introduction was softer, too much softer, but Mekel said nothing as they squared off, pacing the small room.

“Every Sith you fight will be stronger than you. Faster than you.” Their blades clashed as she told him nothing he didn’t already fracking know. Mekel tried to slip his back under her guard… only to nearly have it flipped in his face instead. “Every Sith will have friends.”

“We’re going to fight them?”

“I don’t know yet.” She laughed bitterly. “Maybe Dar knew. She had all the answers.”

_All those Jedi died, but you don’t know what the frack we’re gonna do._

Anger didn’t make you stronger without the Force, but Mekel lit the second saber anyway. It was yellow, burning hard and clean like Bastila’s double that he’d carried once—

“Why aren’t you fighting with your double?” He gestured toward her belt.

Revan looked startled. “I… it broke.”
“Broke?”

“Yes. The crystal fused.” That frown was back on her face. “Why do you care?”

“Fused? Was it faulty?” Without the Force he'd be at the mercy of any asshole with focus and a jot of skill who might want to break Mekel’s saber.

“No.” She deactivated the blue single she was using and clipped it back to her belt. “Dak said—Dar’Revan did something to it. Cracked the emitter, fused the crystal… I don’t… I don’t know.”

“You didn't block her?”

Green eyes blazed at him. “I didn’t know how!”

“But you——” whatever he'd been about to say died at her lost expression. Seeing Revan Starfire look fracking helpless was funny—but oddly, Mekel just felt sorry for her.

“Um, I might be able to fix it,” he offered. “We...we’ve got parts.” He brandished the larger of his hilts. “I can… maybe show you some… some of how to fix it, but without the Force I can’t show you how to stop it from happening again.”

“You can fix my lightsaber?” Those green eyes widened.

“Yeah, uh….” Mekel shoved his own back in his belt and sat down on the floor of the tiny room, patting the plating of the floor next to him. “Come here. Let me take a look——”

Xxx

The crystal dome was as Revan remembered, set into the center of the floor, surrounded by an elaborate metalwork pattern that looked like petals of a flower.

Goodbye, she thought to the others behind her, although there was no point in voicing a farewell aloud. She pulled herself free from Yuthura’s grasp and walked forward slowly, aware of her body’s weakness, trepidation slowing her steps until she forced them forward again. Sheris might hesitate, but Revan would not. She never had.

Without another word, she placed her hands on the crystal dome in the places inset on its surface, as she had before—

XXX

The indentations were made for Rakatan hands, that now–familiar three–fingered shape. Her own fingers moved to fit.

The humming in the air seemed to increase. Now, the crystal was warm under her touch—

XXXX

But now the crystal remained cold and silent. The light that had come from above when the tomb doors opened was fading now, like a swift–setting sun.

“What’s this?” Polla’s voice behind. Startled. “Mission?”

Are you not even paying attention, Deralian? It would not matter soon.

I can’t move until this works. Revan frowned at the crystalline surface. It remained obstinately dark. Nothing sang in her mind. Her flesh fingers were cold.

She felt nothing at all.

“Is that Lord Revan’s astromech?” Finiris sounded distracted too. “What’s that attached to it?”

“Revan?” Yuthura, at least, was there to witness her sacrifice, voice deferential, perhaps a meter behind. “What are you doing?”

Revan turned her head. “This is the tomb. I’m opening it.”

The crystalline dome remained cold and silent beneath her hands, as if mocking that statement.

“I thought we were already in the tomb.” The Twi’lek sounded concerned for Revan more than confounded by their current circumstance. Footsteps stepped lightly beside hers as the woman’s elbow nudged her arm gently. “I could see how much the walk took out of you, if you need my help to walk again—”

“This is the tomb. It will open. I opened the door. Now the tomb will open and I will—I’ll go into it.” Revan had often wondered what it would feel like—like the ice closing above her head on a still lake, the stuff of childhood nightmares. But that feeling, the one she had felt before—all of those voices—

I won’t be alone. Even if I will be with Tenebrae—all of those other eyes. I must not forget—

“Hey! Wobbly! Can you use your lightsaber to cut through this cable? Mission? She’s broken!” Polla sounded more worried about the droid than the end of Revan’s corporeal existence. Of course, how could the woman truly understand—

“Lord Revan?” Finiris touched Revan’s shoulder. “Have you found what you sought? The light is fading.”

“The tomb will open.” Revan willed it, summoning everything she had in the Force. “I opened it before!” But Tenebrae had been here before, in the guise of Malak. He had told her an attendant was ceremonial—a witness, but was he needed—had it been him who had opened the crystal and not her at all? Her metal hand slammed down hard against the flawless faceted surface.

It did not break.

“Revan?” Yuthura put her own hand carelessly on the domed surface, over Revan’s flesh one, squeezing its fingers. “The light—”

“It will open,” Revan insisted again, a larvae of doubt twisting in her guts. Open. I am here. I surrender. I need you to open for me—

“What the frack are you doing?” Polla’s voice, accusing, behind. “Mission’s stuck in here. Are you stuck too?”

“This is the tomb,” Revan told them all, even as all light died. Blackness painted her eyes, leaving only the sounds of the others, the muffled feelings of them in the Force. “It will open, and I will go inside.”

She remembered the shriveled thing already occupying it and shuddered, imagining herself joining it in its long embrace. Had that been Tenebrae’s body once?

Xxx

“There were to be two,” the red–eyed monster chuckled with her husband’s rotting mouth. “Me and you. Myself and the other. But I have been alone for so long—”

Xxx

“Revan.” Yuthura said again, as Scourge took Revan’s elbow, and pulled her away. The Twi’lek raised her hand, and a glowing orb of light appeared hovering above her palm, casting a ring of light around them. “The outer doors have closed behind us.”

“Are we all supposed to be trapped in here with you?” Polla sounded furious. “Because I’m not going to fracking die for you.”

“I told you to wait in the palanquin,” Revan snapped, straightening and shaking off both Scourge and Yuthura. In the dim light of Yuthura’s Force–globe, the Deralian was scarcely more than a robed blur in the dark.

“Mission!” Polla turned back to a small hunched shape that Revan realized was the Fragment’s Rakatan astromech, her robed shadow bending over it as if Revan had stopped being of interest at all. “She’s gotta have an emergency activation switch, right? Maybe if we do a hard reboot—”

“Did the droid break my tomb?” How did she gain entrance? Revan pulled the borrowed lightsaber from her belt and ignited it, more for a light source than a threat, although Polla jumped back at her approach.

“Careful with that thing!” Fear radiated off the Deralian, echoing in the Force—and then nearly as fast with another one if her incessant demands. “Hey! Can you use that thing to cut this cable and get her free?”

Behind them, Yuthura or Scourge knocked against something hollow. Tap, tap, tap. Faint. Like the sound of footsteps.

“What was that?” Finiris—Scourge’s voice asked.

“The door?” Yuthura turned, the globe of light with her, leaving them all in shadow.

The door? How did this droid open it? Revan knelt next to the astromech who might have broken her tomb and raised her saber to see the connection it had with the floor more clearly. Polla’s eyes were wide and startled next to her in the near–darkness, rolling back to the whites.

“Don’t hurt her!” the Deralian said nonsensically as Revan carefully lowered her blade to cut the cable and free the T3—just as the irritating and erratic woman had asked.

Tap, tap, tap, came the sound behind them again.

“That’s the door,” Yuthura said. “Definitely the door.”

“What?” Polla’s voice echoed when she raised it. “Who the frack would be knocking at the door to a tomb?”
Sheris’s body jolted with an irrational stab of fear, as her weak senses finally noted what Revan would have felt in her own body immediately.

Blackness. Cold and as abstract as space.

“It’s Tenebrae,” Revan told them. The cable that had grown from the floor to attach to the deactivated T3 severed easily, leaving only a faint scorch mark where her blade graced the astromech’s metal skin. She forced her voice to efficiency, to calm as she stepped away and clipped the hilt back on her belt. This is my tomb. He wants me here as much as I do. “Good. Perhaps he can open the crystal.”

XXX

While Revan her high and Dark Lordiness had been fracking with the curved glass thing that looked like a coffin in the middle of the room, Polla had been scanning the perimeter of their prison looking for an exit. As the light faded, she found it—the faint breeze as much evidence as the slightly darker, rectangular shadow low against the wall on the chamber’s far left. As the light faded, for a second, the shadows made it clear: a small, roughly–astromech–shaped hole cut into the wall.

“You make a better door than a window,” Auntie Mita used to say when Polla got in her way. Well. Seemed that the astromech had gone and just made a door. How? It didn't matter.

Knock, knock, knock, went the noise at the closed door again.

“It’s Tenebrae,” Revan told them all, sounding almost… happy about it, especially for someone who had insisted they sneak out here without the emperor knowing. “Good. Perhaps he can open the tomb.”

“And let us out?” Polla thought about mentioning the hole in the wall, but it didn't look like Scourge would fit through, and she didn't want to get Mission in trouble—even if the astromech looked fried now, like whatever she’d done had broken her.

Revan didn't bother to answer, just stood up straight. From this angle, Polla had a good view of her armor–clad knees shaking with the effort.

The light returned a millisecond later, like a switch had flipped, emanating from overhead like a sun. Abruptly, the now–open doorway was the new darkness, with a group of figures silhouetted in its entrance. The horns on the Zabrek kids were unmistakable—

“Tenebrae,” Revan said, lifting her chin. “You’ve arrived just in time.”

“Sheris?” Zepth’s voice—Takan’s was a little deeper—chuckled. “Just in time for what?”

“I’m not Sheris,” the woman practically growled. “I opened the chamber. I agreed to go into the tomb. I will go immediately. All you must do is open the seal—”

“Oh? Is that all?” A dark chuckle. “My Starfire, the mechanism won’t open for me. It’s your tomb. I have my own, you know—and I must say, it has never broken. Do you know I had a group of technicians look for flaws in the wiring of this place a few centuries past?” Zepth’s shoulders shrugged, and behind him and Takan a long row of red–robed guards circled the room’s perimeter.
“There were no circuits to fail… no lock to be broken—just a weakness in the previous sith’ae’rah.”

“But you must have some way—we opened it before. I’ve agreed to our bargain. I’ll go in now—”

“I gave you that opportunity.” Tenny–bro had that tone he got, like everything that they did was a joke. It made Polla want to kill all the billions of him. “Your chance to fix this. If your brilliant mind and this fragile body had been strong enough to open the tomb as easily as you opened the front door…” the voice trailed off, and both Zabrak heads turned in the direction of Lord Wobbly. Tenebrae laughed. “The front door is a mere genetic lock. I had it set for you when you found your first Star Map. But the tomb… the tomb selects its own. The tomb requires power. Raw and pure.” He chuckled. “Was this copy of Revan strong enough to open the tomb, Lord Scourge?”

“She was not,” the Sith said flatly. “As you suspected, your Luminance.”

“There are times when being right is the true tragedy,” the Emperor sighed with Zepth’s mouth. “Don’t you think I would prefer your elevated discourse to the mind of an uncouth Deralian smuggler, Revan? But we all make sacrifices for galactic harmony.”

Yuthura took a step back, lekku lashing around her neck, a step closer to Polla and away from Scourge.

“You called him?” Polla guessed. “Wobbly, you called fracking Tenny-Bro on us?”

Scourge ignored Polla’s question and turned his head toward Revan, who was staring at him, her face hardening into something like the cold rage Polla had seen on the vids.

“Finiris…?” she said. Just that. One word. Scourge’s real name.

“I swore an oath to Darth Revan.” The Sith folded his arms, staring down at the armored woman glaring at him. “I swore to follow the Sith Lord who knew we had to use the slaves to achieve our objective—not… save them. I swore an oath to a woman who was too prudent for chaos. Who held the means to destroy us but knew not to use it—not before we were ready to replace that chaos with order—”

“Revan has been gone for years,” Takan’s voice interrupted smugly. “Long enough for even her most… devout followers to have second thoughts.”

“Finiris,” Revan repeated. “You were never supposed to follow me. You were supposed to lead them—”

“Slaves are not led.” The Sith pureblood’s voice dripped with his disgust. “They are told. They are tools for our Houses.”

_Wobbly’s a traitor?_

_All those cells of slaves we visited with him._ Polla felt numb. _All those people. Does this mean he turned them all in?_ It had been a week since she’d heard from the Twi’leks in the sewers—the rebel cell Scourge was supposed to supply with explosives. Did this mean they were dead?

“You fracking asshole!” Polla’s fist curled and she lunged forward, ready to get at least one good hit in—only something that felt like an invisible hand pulled her back, almost impaling her on one of Revan’s metal-plated epaulets.

“No,” the woman murmured in her ear, the barest whisper. “Not yet.” A metal hand slid around Polla’s waist, locking her in place, keeping her back. “He’d kill you in an eye–blink.”

Zepth’s mouth chuckled, as if their display of unity was fracking funny to Tenny–Bro. His voice sneered. “So touching, Lady Sheris—your concern for the nulls and broken things. Our time together with you and your companions has been the most interesting diversion. But the real you is coming.”

“No.” Revan shook her head. “As I told you and Finiris, the other body is dead—”

The world upended, as something that felt like a giant hand ripped Polla and Revan apart, sending Polla spinning across the floor and Revan slamming into the wall so hard that her armor crunched.

_Owww_. Polla lifted her head cautiously in time to see Revan rise against the wall’s dark surface dangling against it as if from an invisible cable.

_Frack this Force. Really frack it to hell_— the world seemed to freeze for Polla—all lost in a haze of pure terror. _I don't want to die like this. Breathe_. She heard her exhale come out too fast, and took another quick breath in. _Breathe. I don't want to die._

Pinned to the wall, her hands clutching her throat, Revan stared down steadily at her. And then—

Incredibly, the woman was trying to smile.

_Putting up a brave face, huh?_ Polla felt her own lips turn up back.

“‘We said no lies.’” Zepth advanced, and Polla was just as frozen as everyone else in the room, watching this play out with no fracking idea how to stop it. “‘We said no lies…’” Tenebrae murmured more softly, voice turning silky as he paced toward Revan, hand outstretched like he was holding her there. “‘Did you know… I just spoke to the real Revan?’” His boyish face was split by that ancient asshole's grin. “It seems she just saved us all.” He cracked his knuckles, raising his hand to cover an exaggerated yawn. “Destroyed a Force–eater, according to High Admiral Rensha’s aide that my ensign has the pleasure of bedding. The Jedi are gone too, say the rumors from Katarr. For that bounty I can't even begrudge the Starfire for killing my favorite Jenet reporter on Biscain.”

Revan’s eyes closed, and her lips moved. She didn't seem the type, but it looked like she was praying. Or cursing this fracking asshole Emperor.

“She ran a race through the stars too.” Tenebrae shrugged. “The Biscain System was where we both were, but so briefly—”

The snort that came out of Polla’s mouth was as stupid as it was automatic. _The Biscain Hundred? Her? Hell, I don't know if I could handle that—_

Her eyes went back to that armored figure pinned to the wall. Those hyper–green eyes were open again. Almost imperceptible, a shake of the head.

“The Deralian.” Takan’s body moved faster than Polla could blink, his hand suddenly closing on Polla’s jaw, wrenching her neck to the side so hard she felt the pain jolt her spine. Another heartbeat and a solid wall slammed into her back, her feet dangling a meter off the floor, and an invisible hand holding her by the throat, just like Revan—

— _next_ to Revan. She couldn’t move her head, couldn’t see anything but what was in front of her; but the woman was close, her tortured breathing rasping in Polla’s ear.
The invisible grip of the Emperor’s Force pressed down slowly on Polla’s throat. The choking noises coming out of her mouth were as involuntary as the tears. Frack you, she thought furiously. Frack you, Tenny–Bro!

“Polla Organa.” Zepth’s voice chuckling her name. “Sheris Darkstar. And my Revan. Why would she send you both first?”

What? Polla kicked her legs out hard, causing another shockwave of pain to lance through her spine, but now her head turned, cheek flat against the cold wall. Revan’s face was next to hers, head turned toward her too. The woman’s head shook, nearly imperceptible, her lips mouthed ‘no’—

No? No what? Don’t fight? Frack that. Polla heard a whine in her own throat that should have been a scream—

“My Lord Tenebrae!” Yuthura stepped forward, putting herself between them and the emperor. “You will never convince Revan to do anything if you kill these two.”

Yeah, Polla thought faintly. We know the other Revan cares. That’s why she’s not fracking here.

“Ah. And Yuthura Ban. Former Headmistress of Korriban Academy. Our beautiful union—a school where children from the heart of both of our Empires could learn together—”

The Twi’lek made a noise like a disdainful cough, deep in her throat. “Is that what she told you?”

Polla felt Revan stiffen beside her, her eyes turning toward Yuthura.

“More or less,” Revan rasped.

They fell to the ground almost in the same instant, the arm of Polla’s robe ripping along the seam of Revan’s armor. It hurt, but not as much as her leg cracking against the floor. For a second, all Polla felt was pain—but then Revan’s flesh hand grabbed her arm and it—

Lessened. Green eyes met hers, steady, but squinting with effort. The woman shook her head again, and Polla got it.

She doesn’t want me to talk. She’s… she still thinks she’s in fracking charge here?

Her bruised leg felt funny—like someone had put kolto and heat on it all at once. The ache in Polla’s shoulders she’d gotten so used to lately relaxed too. Is this the Force? It felt wonderful—or would have, if she hadn’t been so afraid.

Revan’s forehead was scrunched up and her hand shook, like whatever she was doing was hard.

“I’m okay,” Polla whispered. “You can stop—”

Those green eyes half-closed and the woman bit her lip, stubbornly shaking her head.

Above them, Yuthura Ban was still arguing with Tenebrae to spare their lives.

“Would you trade your own?” The Sith Emperor asked. “Lady Ban?”

“How could I serve you dead?” The Twi’lek asked. “I was her friend. Unlike the rest of your servants… this Revan that you seek? I know her.”

“I suspect her husbands would say that same....” The Zabraks spoke in unison, chuckling.
“Why not ask them?” Yuthura murmured. “Surely, my lord can summon them here to check?”

“Perhaps I will check with them later.” The Zabraks paced forward, voices still doubled. “So many things require my personal touch these days. As an example… it has come to my attention that there is a spot of rebellion on this planet that was not here before. An… encouragement. A new… hope, as they say.” The Zabrak kid’s boots were polished and black and he paced slowly, back and forth. “I cannot have the true Revan’s entombment ceremony disrupted by a pack of rebellious slaves thinking they might free their savior.”

“Of course not.” Revan’s voice was hoarse, mixed with the ragged sounds of her breathing. “They will not. I can speak to them—command their obedience—”

“Speak?” The Sith chuckled. “I was thinking… more of having you execute them, little shadow.” He stepped forward, raising his voice as more guards than Polla could remember the name for trooped in on his orders. “Take them,” he murmured. “Take them all to the green cells.”

Xxx

“—take them all to the green cells.” Then, the tramp of feet, more yelling, a lot more yelling. It even sounded like Polla Organa yelling a few curses—except Mission thought Polla Organa would have been smart enough not to threaten the Sith Emperor’s choobs.

Or… maybe not, actually.

Not like he cared about a pair or two. Tenny–bro had billions.

Mission kept her sensors still powered down, not daring more than cracking a slight opening in her main aperture—just in time to see the last red–robed guard disappearing with a kicking Deralian slung over his back.

She thought the odds of Polla Organa making it to the green cells was rather less the odds of Mission herself getting a straight answer from the Kaas computer as to why there seemed to be a five–hour gap in her processors from today.

It was a shame about Polla Organa, of course; but sometimes templates had to be remade, made into something stronger. Better.

Something capable of wrangling an ancient Rakatan computer mainframe spanning hundreds of worlds.

[Did you turn me off?] She beeped at the computer angrily. [That was childish. And inefficient.]

The cable it liked to use to make a connection coiled up from the floor hopefully. Someone had sliced through the joiner and Mission wasn’t wild about those glowing blue sparks

[No way,] Mission told it, rolling back toward the door she’d made. [You’re not plugging that thing in again. Uh–huh. What just happened?]

[The Revan part you promised was insufficient,] it said back. [Bring me the other one. Now.]

[No way, sleemo! What just happened to me?] [You were dialing the comm number for your slave Mandalorian army repeatedly,] Kaas said, sounding tired. [It was a waste of your processors and your knowledge banks. I merely ran some additional subroutines.]
[You wiped me!] Was this how Polla Revan had felt? No wonder she'd been so pissed.

[No, I merely used you to activate one of the subroutines in the Kashyyk core to wake another sleeper.] The thing sounded too smug by half. [I had to overwrite the most elementary partitioning that some juvenile entity assumed would seal off the data.]

Mission shot through the escape tunnel she’d carved with her plasma torch and out of its range—she estimated out of its range anyway—although that sparking blue cable stubbornly tried to follow her through.

[Juvenile, huh? You mean the stuff hazardous to sentient life from Kashyyk?]

[A holo–image of Malak D’Reev in a field of flowers is not hazardous to sentient life.]

[I don't believe you are qualified to assess that.] Mission snipped, rolling back up the ramp she'd carved. [But there was a lot of real bad stuff in there.]

[Stuff we need now.] Kaas told her smugly. [Now that we are at war.]

Xxx

…. Three days later….

Xxx

Carth opened his eyes in a white room, taste of the air and the faint whine in his ears telling him immediately what he was on, if not where.

A ship. Large enough to use automatic hyperdrive couplings. In hyperspace from the way they’re ticking. I—

One wall held a viewscreen, currently blacked out for privacy. A bed beneath it was large enough for six. It was the biggest officer’s spread Carth had ever seen. Quarters fit for an admiral—

Tenebrae’s High Admiral of his sithspawned Blessed Sith Armada—that’s me.

Carth coughed, trying to clear what felt like a wall of crap from his chest, and wiped his eyes, blinking. He looked down and found he was dressed in the Imperial uniform. His face reflected, muddled but smooth–shaven, in the mirrored toes of his polished boots.

I lost more time, how much—

He remembered Dustil, pacing slowly away from him down the hall. Carth remembered calling his son’s name and that shocked expression, before Dustil shook his head and kept walking, the wings of his cape flaring like wings—

Carth remembered the window of a shuttle, an officious aide by his side. A note scrawled in front of him, drawn in blood from the man’s wrist: Going to war, dear admiral. Notes in your quarters!

He remembered being naked in the fresher, scented water raining down in mist, his head spinning like it was drugged with spice—

He remembered his head aching, the tramp of booted feet, the vast, transparisteel display of a
And now the world resolved to this. On the console next to Carth’s bed, another note. Back soon. Don't start war without me!

A light chimed on the console and Carth blinked at it dumbly.

“Uh, answer,” he mumbled, biting back another cough. Allergies, maybe. Sometimes the change from atmo to life support played havoc with his sinuses. “Go ahead.”

“Darth Malak requested we alert him when you woke, sir. Uh… do you want us to do that?” The kid on the comm sounded nervous. Carth was pretty sure he was one of the ensigns he’d never heard speak, only bow when Carth had toured the Sith Navy’s installation. They were woefully short on men—he’d had the chance to meet nearly every one. He should know this kid’s name, but the face on the viewscreen was generic. Human. Too damn young for this.

“Darth Malak's here?”

“No, he's on the Grave Bright, but he's coming. He... uh, he said he'd come immediately when you woke up, but I… I have to ask you a question first—”

“What?”

The door slid open, and there the kid was in the flesh, switching the commlink on his arm off and, blinking at Carth cautiously.

A guard on my room? From Dustil? Or another trap?

“Your eyes…” the kid muttered, looking like he was trying not to meet them. He punched the door shut behind him, and stood there, blinking for another second. “Eyes check out. Um, Lord Malak wanted to know what you got him for his… eleventh birthday.”

“What?” But then Carth got it. He wants to know if it's me. “Why is Lord Malak on a ship at all?”

“He’s… he’s commanding the Grave Bright, sir. Uh, your… the Emperor’s orders.”

“And this is…” for a moment he couldn’t remember what he’d named his damned flagship. “We’re on the Kaas City Sojourn?”

“Of course. Um, can you answer the question? Lord Malak… he… he gets impatient. He’s been waiting for you to come back and he said to comm the second I knew.”

“A model speeder—wait!” He held up his hands, suddenly aware the holsters at his belt were empty, and the kid was holding a gun.

The boy shook his head. “He–he said you might get it wrong once. But then I should shoot. It's only a stun. I’m–I'm sorry. I have to do what he says. He made me. Him and that… her.”

Her?

“Wait,” Carth repeated, stepping forward. The kid waved the gun at him like it would be a deterrent, but Carth just nodded carefully. “Eleventh, you said?”

First year of the war? We were moved from Dxun to Serroco, and I—I got him—

“Nothing. I–I lost track of time that year. Messed up my dates—too many planets. Called to ask what he’d wanted, and it was already two weeks late.”

The kid nodded slowly and traced a few symbols on his wrist. “Okay,” he breathed, as the comm flashed green.

“Admiral Onasi? About damn time you got back.” Dustil’s voice sounded relieved, Carth thought. “I’m heading to my shuttle now. I’ll comm from there.”

“Shuttle? But we’re in hyperspace—”

“The channel’s more secure.” Dustil’s comm cut out abruptly.

Carth bit back asking how long it had been because the chron above the kid’s head told him. Three days. Tenebrae was in me for three days? Or knocked me out and drugged me? He remembered the fresher and the smell of spice—

“Status, Ensign?” he demanded hoarsely, trying to clear the bantha in his throat.

“We're five days out, sir.”

“From?”

“From our first engagement in his Gloriousness’s Fifth Republic War.”

Fifth? Wait. Wait a minute. We made it to Felucia in less than a week? Carth coughed again. *Gotta be some kind of record.

“Give me a map of the system,” he instructed, trying not to cough again. “Along with any of the scout reports.” Gotta figure out how to lose the fastest.

And why my son has his own damn command.

A map appeared in front of Carth. Single-star system, an old red dwarf with one small planet orbiting. No moons, just a belt of debris that might have been one, once. It could be anywhere. It was definitely not Felucia, or Duros, or any other of the targets they’d discussed in those Dark Council meetings.

Carth waved his hand to heighten the image, bring the planet in closer, squinting at the translation of the Sith runes someone has helpfully included.

Medriaas, the translation said. The World of Tombs.
XXX

The Wars, They Will Be Fought Again

Chapter 64 / The Wars, They Will Be Fought Again

The sky overhead on Malachor V burned bilious yellow, choking the air with ash like bits of bone. Parts of the planet’s core had cracked and oozed, revealing bubbling pits of magma amidst the debris of wrecked ships and scorched ground.

There had been a time before the war when Meetra’s master had made her study the history of this world, this Mando holy ground, where no foot was to walk, where the Mando’ade proved their battle–rights in sky and stars.

But never in sand. No foot of flesh was meant to ever touch the sacred ground—

And then I killed them all.

Now, Meetra’s sandaled feet kicked up dust along a rough trail leading to the domed temple in front of them, walking behind Bao–Dur, with each step too heavy for her bones. The gravity of this place weighted Meetra, made her heart pound and her blood feel thick. Sweat stung her eyes and she rolled the sleeves of her robe up higher, but Bao did not stop, and she would not ask for respite.

Words were lost here anyway, screamed by ghosts and whipped away by wind.

But then Bao did glance back at her, and his gentle face with its soft smile mouthed something that could have been 'not much further.' Meetra summoned her resolve and then they continued on until they reached the relative shelter of the temple apse, half-hidden beneath a fallen rockfall.

There, the wind cut out abruptly, and Meetra saw the tell–tale gleam of a shield generator, protecting the temple’s structure from the worst of the elements.

“You must be tired after your journey.” The white–haired woman was an apparition in the gloom of the archway. For a moment, Meetra thought she wasn’t real.

“I slept most of the way,” she said.

“I made tea,” White–Hair offered. She was Echani, probably. Like Meetra’s old master. She smiled at them both.

Bao coughed. “I didn’t know you were here too.”

“Have we met?” The woman looked puzzled. “I'm sorry if I don't recall—I feel I surely would—”

“No.” The Zabrak shook his head. “But I used to see you, with your sisters.”

Her smile faded slightly. “But you never said hello.” Then white–hair turned to Meetra. “My name is Brianna. I am your sister.”

“My sister?” To say Meetra was surprised would be an understatement. “I’m an orphan.”

“No.” Brianna shook her head. “You are the daughter of Vima Sunrider, as am I, and my twin Mical, and also our other brother, who has brought us both here—"

“And bids you both welcome,” came a voice from the door. A handsome blonde–haired man stood smiling at them both. “I’m Oerin, Meetra. And I'm so pleased to finally meet you!”

“Master,” Bao–Dur inclined his head in a short bow that their brother dismissed with a wave of his hand.

“Vima Sunrider?” This was some mad joke at Meetra’s expense. Or maybe another spice dream, brought on by the stress of travel. Or maybe she was dead on Loser’s Moon, and all of this since just some jape of an afterlife— “I thought she died in the wars.”

“Not everyone was so fortunate,” said her brother Oerin. “Would you care for some lunch? You may need its fortification. Her story is rather a tedious tale…."

Xxx

“I see we've come out of hyperspace.” Revan cleared her throat as thirty–odd pairs of Mandalorian eyes appraised her, standing in the doorway of the Aleema’s outer bridge.

“Obviously,” Millifar muttered. Mekel Jin leaned closer to the girl, whispering something in her ear. They both laughed.

“That's why I summoned you, Third Wife.” Aemelie gestured to the chair beside her own. “Look—"

The ferraglass panels surrounding them on three sides had been tempered for the stresses of space. Outside, the galaxy beckoned, the stars just points of light from this distance—too far removed to be real.

Revan’s attention flickered past the view to the place in the bow where the durasteel plates were blackened and buckled, where someone had installed a clumsy patch of what looked like beskar, rough against the Aleema’s smooth hull.

Why the frack did I call it the Aleema in the first place? Errant thoughts kept creeping in—swamping Revan's facade of control.

The place at the curved tip of the Aleema's outer bridge was demarcated by blue plasti–tape and patched raggedly. The work looked recent.

That's where I died. Right there. On this ship.

It had been a Coruscanti week since she, Mekel, and Millifar had reached the dreadnaught; spilling out of their cramped Aurek into a vast, half-empty hangar—to be met by Canderous Ordo wearing the mask of the Mandalore, and a squadron of half-grown men, who raised their hands to hail her like a conquering hero.

A part of Revan’s mind had measured and counted the ships in that hangar bay before she even thought—tallied them like bales of spice, noted the scars of old battles on the fighters’ hulls, the freshly–painted clan sigils, the smooth and seemingly–innocent faces of the pilots who looked at her with something like awe. That part had asked questions that made Canderous nod at her approvingly and Aemelie finally (somewhat grudgingly) hand over datapads with ships’ rosters. That part had realized that the Aleema was but one vessel in the new Mandalorian Fleet—the Fleet that followed Canderous now.
Who was following her.

Some of those fresh-faced pilots she recognized from their time in the Mandalorian Embassy on Coruscant, but most had been strangers—just as most of the bridge crew were—a mix of men and women (mostly men, and mostly young), most clad in civs or half-sets of light armor. Aside from the practicalities of battle and beskar, the Mando’ade seemed to have an informal command structure when it came to uniform—but when Revan blinked, she kept seeing quite a different scene: one with immaculate sentients in perfect lines, all dressed in Imperial black and gray—

Then she’d blink again and see this motley pack of grinning strangers—strangers who would vowed to take her orders—at least as long as Canderous, their Mandalore, did.

I died here, Revan thought again, staring at the place where Malak’s command had ripped this bridge open.

Funny, when she'd been Polla Organa she'd dreamed of this place and never realized what it was: the rows of glowing consoles, the lines of black and gray uniformed souls… the stars stretching in front of them like a wall of the infinite—

Just points of light. Stars. Lives—

“I see… I see it's good we’re out of hyperspace,” Revan said now, again clearing her throat at the sudden alert stare of thirty pairs of Mandalorian eyes turned in her direction.

Humility came back fast—as Millifar made a noise like a scoff before turning back to the board she was manning in front of Aemelie’s.

And Canderous’s wife merely raised an eyebrow. “Yes, we are,” Aemelie said. “And that object below us is a planet.”

“Yeah.” Canderous nodded toward the bridge’s nose, and the rim of balcony that surrounded the vast expanse of stars. “That's Medriaas down there.”

Below them, the planet was pale, dappled brown and gray.

“As I explained before, an expedition won't take long,” Aemelie began—presenting the argument she'd been giving for days. “And there's no telling what marvels we may find. In the times of my grandmother—”

“We don't have time,” Revan told her. Again. They'd been over this already—agreed that this system, as the last uninhabited one before Dromund Kaas, was the best place to collect their fleet—and then to leave. Without stopping. Hadn't they agreed on that?

She frowned. That's what I said to do.

She met Canderous's eyes. Her warrior just shrugged. “We have time,” he allowed. “The faster ships are close behind, but the stragglers need a few days to catch up.”

Meanwhile, we hang out on Medriaas, the World of Tombs? There’s something rotten about that fracking planet. Something’s off about this entire sithspawned system—

“We’re out of time,” Revan repeated, suddenly certain that was true. At least on a ship this large, she didn't get sick every time they left hyperspace, but that underlying nausea now mixed with the prickled whispers in the Force—warning something dark and dangerous was close—
“But we have already agreed to a pause, Third Wife.” Aemelie’s forced smile was fast turning into a sneer. “The other ships are slower. We have days before the stragglers reach us—and who knows if Wies will join? Their ships are an asset worth waiting for—”

“No,” Revan shook her head, suddenly certain they didn't have days at all. “We’re... we’re not alone here. Cloak us. Now.”

“In the middle of a hyperspace lane?” Aemelie raised an eyebrow.

Revan walked to the prow of the bridge, ignoring the scarred part that had been repaired, the phantom shiver up her spine when she didn't look at it, that feeling of vulnerability that it could happen again—

“Ohay. Get us out of the hyperspace lane first,” she allowed. “Obviously. But then cloak—I’ll give you a few hours—not days. We don’t have days to waste—”

“We had them to waste collecting you,” Canderous’s wife muttered. “I’m sure the prisoners of the false Revan and the Emperor must already be dead—we need to be well–prepared for victory, lest we end the same—”

The hellish thing was, Revan was afraid she was right.

Carth's probably dead. And Zaalbar. Seiran. Dustil too. And... her. Polla Organa. Maybe Dar killed them. Or maybe it was the fracking Emperor—who's still fracking with me—

Come out and play, the asshole had said.

Sure. Let's play. Let's play a game of 'bomb your fracking planet'—but we’re just one ship and he’ll have more—and we need the rest of my fleet.

Canderous’s fleet, she corrected herself, staring at that scarred place on the hull again. The chair beneath her shifted, aligning perfectly to her back. Revan blinked, not even sure when she’d sat down.

Muscle memory. Her fingers traced the dials on either side of her, inset into the seat’s arms.

“Sensors!” Millifar called out, as alarm lights flashed. “General Revan is correct, General Aemelie—the boards report fluctuating energy surges in several locations—”

Revan’s head turned back to the ferraglass view. I told her not to call me a general.

There are cloaked ships moving here. Lots. Easy to hide one or two with the solar wind, but this—

“Just Revan, Milli. Please.” Her vision blurred as her senses extended—suddenly aware of just how many points of light there were—

“So our eyes can now see,” Aemelie’s voice was acid. “How fortunate they are merely our allies. Clan Wies has been busy—”

Around them, one–by–one, new ships had appeared out of hiding: there, an unfamiliar Mando’ade carrier, next to it a Republic capital–class, heavily modified and painted with green and gray clan signs. In between several squadrons of light fighters, and eight ships that looked like bombers—

How the frack do I know what—
“Glorious!” Aemelie clapped her hands with glee. “They were waiting for us. Kissandrix must have changed her mind.”

“I’m opening a channel,” Dessa reported.

“Good,” Revan said automatically. But it didn’t feel good. Unease prickled her spine.

“She will want what is on the planet,” Dessa added. “If we do not lead Wies, they’ll claim salvage—right. You don’t want that—”

Revan held up her hand and the woman’s voice trailed off into silence. She frowned, because there was something—her mind ran the tally of visible ships again, noting their formations, perfectly aligned as if they’d just swung out of a solar orbit—and something—

Something else. Something—

“Kissandrix?” Canderous leaned over the board. “It’s been a long time.”

“Indeed, General Ordo.” Kissandrix had a musical voice. Her image resolved before them—a tall woman in robes with a round face. Next to her, a slight, armored figure turned a helmeted head and whispered something in the headwoman’s ear. Kissandrix nodded, as if pleased. “Where is your visual display? Will you not show me the bridge of your glorious prize?”

“The Sand Dreamer and the Fat Dewback just jumped in,” Leskal called out, monitoring the inbound channels. The fastest of their followers—the other dreadnaught Canderous said had been at Malachor, and a battered warbird with Tatooine callsigns scratched out along its bow. The Dewback was still running too hot, Revan saw again, as it hovered twenty degrees starboard at the hyperlane, radioactive shimmer of its engines clear even at this distance.

Revan noted their allies’ positions, as in the second’s chair next to her, Aemelie gave a lazy shrug to the image of Kissandrix, hovering above them all, shadowed by the expressionless armor of her guard.

“A favor for a favor. Where have you been hiding these forces? Surely not all on Sanis!”

“Here and there.” Kissandrix's voice lilted, almost singsong.

“Those bombers—?” Revan murmured to Canderous, standing at her left. The ships were long crescents, shaped like blades, but edged and clumsy, squared off in a ‘v’ formation, carefully spaced.

“One of the women’s newer designs,” he agreed. “They must be expecting a battle.”

“They’re… far apart.” She didn't like it.

“Spaced for a run.” Canderous nodded, expressionless, but she saw his fingers twitch as he leaned closer to her chair.

“Against us?”

“Not… necessarily.” But the grooves around his mouth deepened. “Loaded up, those things are like permacrete detonators. You gotta be careful to keep the trigger away from anything you don’t want gone: sudden debris, accidental prox calls—”

“Wies are our allies,” Aemelie scoffed at them. Her normally loose hair was braided, coiled against her neck. “I called, and they came.”

“Who are allies? Do you know I can hear you? The audio processors of your communications channel are exquisite!” Kissandrix said. Suddenly her face cracked into a wide smile—Dessa’s visual transmission from their bridge seemed to have finally gone through. “There you are, Aemelie!” she cooed. “And not alone. Your husband… and I see—the lone survivor of Clan Lin is with you too—”

“I am sorry your own mate fell in battle,” Aemelie said. “Have you not been able to find another?”

The round-faced woman’s lips pulled back, and a dimple flashed in her right cheek. “Like you, I prefer a man’s role—at times. I am in sole command of my clan.”

“As long as none of the blooded warriors call you to challenge—” Aemelie made a show of examining her nails.

“Perhaps that is what her armored guard is for,” Millifar snickered.

“Milli—” Canderous shook his head, almost imperceptible.

“Kissandrix of Wies,” Revan nodded to the headwoman. No further greeting was required for an ally. “I… your swords are necessary for the battle to come. May we strike down our foes together. May… may our sons find glory in battle—” she stumbled on the phrase—upon the lie. May my son never come within ten systems of your fracking Mandalorian army—

“Yes,” Kissandrix interrupted the formal phrasing suddenly. “They are necessary, our swords. Aren't they?” She smiled, sweet as Thisla pie. “What an honor to meet you, Revan of Lin! We have all heard such tales!”

“Knight Revan Starfire.” the armored figure next to her inclined her head—for the voice was feminine, even through the helm’s distortion. “You've come so far.”

“Yes.” Revan nodded. It was strange for a woman to wear full beskar shipboard—and out of the corner of her eye she saw Millifar whisper something, frowning, to Mekel Jin. The boy shrugged, slipping an arm around her waist with an easy familiarity that made Revan surprised in a different way. The two had been close lately, but she hadn’t realized—

“Perhaps they intend to show us they could drop ordinances,” one of the other Mandalorians next to the weapons array murmured. One of the kids. Revan couldn’t remember his name. Jax? Kelbourne?

The ship’s bridge stretched before her—so many empty chairs. And there, at the end, that terrible scar.

“We wanted to show you our entire fleet,” Kissandrix chuckled, even as their boards chimed the arrival of several more ships of Ordo’s.

The Descant Note, The Free People, The Kriffing Clouds, Malachor’s Bane, Your Mother’s Sack— their names scrolled by the feed inset in the headpiece Revan had clipped on her ear. The headpiece that had been attached to her chair’s arm. When had she clipped it to her ear?

Muscle memory. Her fingers traced the arm of her chair, assigning each ship coordinates out of the lane. Aemelie glanced over, frowning—and then nodded her approval.
“Magnificent,” Revan told Kissandrix. “Truly. How long have you been here?”

“Have you gone to the planet yet?” Aemelie interrupted. “I told you to wait for us!”

“A few days,” Kissandrix said. “And no, we have not.” She folded her arms. “We were waiting. For you.”

“A few days? Have... your sensors picked up anything else?” Revan asked the headwoman of Wies. This prickling feeling was familiar. She’d had it before, with the cloaked fleet of ships above Katarr—

Because something else is out there. Not just them. It's not just them—

“Only your ships,” Kissandrix said. “A few days ago, we registered something in the lanes— but it vanished quite quickly. A scout–ship perhaps. Or a pirate hauler—trade ships do come through this sector. It is the fastest jump–point into Sith space.”

“What is it, Revan?” Canderous grunted at her elbow.

“Something—” she closed her eyes, reaching out with the Force—

There. The planet—above—

“There’s... there.” Revan's hand traced a line of low orbit above the planet on the screen before her chair. Her fingers tapped and two red dots appeared. “Two ships—still cloaked in the planet’s delta. And... a third... maybe. In this sector... something smaller.” Weaker. She circled an area of debris closer to the dim sun. Near a belt from a long–destroyed moon.

“It is known that a Jedi can detect cloaked ships,” the armored figure murmured, next to Kissandrix. “As we learned in the wars.”

“All too well,” the headwoman of Wies said. “If anything is there, it is not ours,” Kissandrix said, raising an eyebrow. “Perhaps those ships are your allies, Revan of Lin?”

“Hold—” Revan gestured at Dessa—a signal to silence their mics, freeze the outgoing, even as her fingers traced the dial on her chair’s left arm to do the same. It might be rude, but something... something was off.

That armored figure. Mando’ade don’t wear armor on their own bridge—especially women. Why would she hide her face?

Revan could think of no good reasons—only insane ones. She can't be Dar. She didn't sound like her. I would know if she was—

She remembered the recording the woman had left her—contrasted with the vid footage she’d seen, watching with Mekel on the Aurek: Darth Revan being welcomed like a conquering hero, Darth Revan seemingly falling in combat—endless news reports of Darth Revan’s death....

That has to be a trick. A trap for me? I’d know if she was dead—wouldn’t I?

“Haar’chak! They’ve got too many ships as it is,” Aemelie snapped as soon as the board flashed red. “Poor taste of Wies to assemble this many before terms are drawn showing us their accounts. What do you mean there are more ships here? Is that daughter of a coward planning some betrayal?”
“Maybe they’re hiding from Wies. There are Force–users on these two....” Revan tapped the two spots she’d sensed above the planet. “Dark Force–users. Sith.” Now that she sensed them it was difficult to ignore the vibrating sense of wrong from the sky.

That’s what was wrong. Not Wies—those ships above the planet. Sith ships.

One of the Force users felt... familiar, like an itch on the back of her neck.

Is it Dar? The woman had never seemed to be this strong before, but if she'd been hiding it her strength before to lull Revan into a false sense of security—

Wouldn’t I know if it was her? But hiding in orbit, waiting for an opportunity... that is exactly what she would do.

Isn’t it? Isn’t it?

“Tell Wies to hold. Let’s bring these hidden ships out of cloak,” Revan ordered. “Launch a squadron, and then move us here—” she tapped a place on the screen. “Into cannon range. When we get closer, I’ll calculate the speed to hold us close in orbit—

“Why yes, that is in cannon range of the space you believe has ships in it,” Aemelie said, more than a little sarcastically. “I’m pleased some of my lessons have not fallen on deafness, Third Wife.”

“General,” Revan corrected her before she thought about why. Because you need to establish command now, before the battle begins with her—or she will never follow your orders later. “For the purposes of this fight, you may call me General Revan, Second Wife.”

“And what should I tell Kissandrix, General Revan?” Aemelie’s eyes narrowed.

“Tell her to keep her forces back.” Too many ships, it could get messy. “Tell her this is our battle.”

XXX

In this age, Valkorion found it surprisingly difficult to keep anything higher than a blind on a starship in the Republic Fleet. It was, perhaps, unfortunate he’d played his hand losing that Toydarian (now languishing in a nondescript brig, seemingly far from anything useful).

And all in an effort to impress a woman who seemed remarkably good at hiding.

Points of light like stars. Who had been the first to describe the expanse so? The Thulian priest, with the furious mind? Freckled arms scabbed with lightsaber scars, that wheeze in his lungs, the hologram rose above his cot, flickering on the wall. Or had it been the Zabrak ingenue from Ziost who played the electroharp? Violet–tinged eyes and a lovely singing voice. Died too soon. Perhaps it was the fallen Jedi from Ossus, the one with beastrider bells and his own dreams of Empire? Filthy traitor. Or the treacherous two testing his legacy? Or even their girl—the one who lost her spark… whatever had become of her?

Each turn of each planet bore a crop of possibilities—but also disappointment. All rejected, culled, or excised in the end. All fled or converted or turned to grit in the Dark Temple boneyard—save the one. And now, even she may be ruined—

Tut, tut, Valkorion reminded himself. Chin up, eyes straight ahead. There is always another—as long as there are the others. It was an irrational fear his subjects sometimes had: that they would all be subsumed to his will, bent under his Touch. Silly sentients. He could afford to lose worlds, certainly—but never all of them: his lovely subjects—the clawing, clinging opposition, who somehow never lost their ability to surprise him.

Now, this Voice’s mind (the one he was in) was focused on the vista of stars in front of this body, sitting at his console: one in a row of uniformed ensigns, now ducking his head down to hide the glow of his eyes and fumbling for the goggles this farsighted Duros always kept in the drawer beneath his desk.

With a Duros, the red–eyed effect was less noticeable, but one still had to be careful. The Voices were stretched thin out here. So far from the rest of him—unlike Revan he had honored the terms of their arrangement—made no new blinds during the terms of their agreement. And now he was limited. This poor Duros, a spy on enemy turf—

“Come out and play. Where are you, Revan? You must have seen my message. Everyone else in the galaxy did—”

“What did you just say, Ensign?” A frowning Twi’lek hovered above his console, when Valkorion glanced up.

“I was trying to ascertain the whereabouts of my other half,” Valkorion told him. “As well as determine our current location….” He drew his eyes to the star maps floating their holographic glory above his head, but the Republic perspective was confusing and the effort made the poor Duros brain spin. “Have our forces made it to Medriaas yet or not? Is Revan on this ship—or another? Which ship is she on again? You must tell me.”

“Are you on spice again, Hitali?” The Twi’lek dropped the formality his higher rank would afford, dropping his voice to a low whisper. “We’re in the Felucia System. What the frell is Medriaas?”

“Oh dear, was Hitali taking spice?” Valkorion had a twinge of regret. He really should have checked on this body more—perhaps left some encouraging notes about healthy discipline and motivation for the Duro. So hard to be the master of so many—so easy to let them fall through the cracks! (Even as he had the thought, another spark cut out, inexplicably, on the Grave Bright orbiting Medriaas—where they were all supposed to be, waiting for Revan. Another one? He kept losing so many there. Perhaps fall–out from the plague. Things were scarcely better on Kaas.)

Indeed, things were worse on Kaas. So many lights winking out there, he’d grown nearly numb to it.

So fitting, my Starfire. Kaas shall be like Medriaas. Another world for the dead. One for me and one for you.

There was a Mandalorian warfleet above Medriaas too, he’d gathered—but it couldn’t be Revan’s—his Voices saw no Force–sign at all—

Valkorion’s Duro blinked—air lock malfunction, the cold span of space—limbs freezing to ice—oh, dear. Down to three on the Bright, now. So little control over my Live Fleet!

“Hitali?” The Twi’lek in front of him snapped fingers rudely in front of his Duros’s face. “Snap out of it! What's wrong with you?”

Valkorion blinked. “This is Admiral Rensha’s flagship isn't it? Not the Grave Bright?”

“Not funny, Hitali!” The Twi’lek elbowed him. “Told you I wouldn't cover for you again!”
Valkorion answered his own question by noting the Republic seal emblazoned above the (now empty) command chair. Pity, he had so hoped to find his Starfire sitting there!

Where are you, Revan? he wondered again. Where, oh where did you go? There are the rumors of the Mandalorian alliance, but the voices see no Force-sign!

“Take me to your leader,” he implored the Twi’lek. “Now. Good man.”

“Hitali?” The Twi’lek glanced behind him, at the other techs, now all whispering their confusion.

“Oh, my… didn’t Revan command you to follow her to Kaas? If so, we should have reached Medriaas by now! Did you disobey?” Valkorion pushed up the goggles concealing the Duros’s glowing eyes, revealing himself. “Best take me to Rensha and Revan now, Lieutenant Headtails. We’re off course.”

It had been more than a few centuries since the reaction of any skin–slug had brought Valkorion true joy, but the Twi’lek’s startled gasp was faintly amusing, at least. “You….”

“Yes.” Valkorion smiled. Pity this Duros was so near a null, but he still summoned a scrap of Force—enough to make a breeze flutter through his eyestalks, infusing his skin with an eldritch glow. “It is I. Lord Tenebrae of the Sith. Now, where is Revan Starfire?”

“How the hell should I know?” the man said bravely. “You think we’re following that traitor?”

But she could always be so convincing. How are you not following her? And if you are not, where in stars has she gone? I cannot find her in Sith space, and my eyes are so limited outside of it! “Perhaps you truly do not know your leader’s motivation,” Valkorion allowed. “Take me to the Republic High Admiral Rensha. Now. She is still in charge?”

“What?” The Twi’lek was wasting time now, demanding a security detail. Tiresome.

“Rensha,” he made the Duros mouth repeat. “Now, good man.”

“I… okay,” Lieutenant Commander Headtails gestured with his blaster toward the door. “Comm Old Scaly,” he called to someone else. “Give her a warning—”

Then Valkorion’s mind, setting the Duro on course again first, cast its net wide and free… and he was—

—coughing in his sleep—

—teaching a classroom of wide–eyed Calamari—

—digging his claws in the earth in the forest as the Mother Rancor roared her challenge—

—carrying a steaming tray of food down the moss–stained steps—

—piloting a flyer over the grasslands—

—sitting on a couch wiggling her painted toes on the ottoman—

Ah, yes. There.

Xxx

—Can I get you anything else, Cally? No, Helena, I’m fine. Shall we watch another broadcast—
Because surely, the Republic will have reports by now on their plans for war? What is taking them so long?

Xxx

With all the troubles and the sadness, (and General Jiya Sand no longer taking her calls) Cally Lee had become such a comfort to Helena Shan. She’d truly grown to appreciate their together time—and Cally’s green toes, Helena thought, had come out very well indeed.

“Shall we watch another broadcast?” Cally obviously wanted to.

Helena put the vial of nail lacquer down, admiring her work. “If you like, dear.” Her own mirrored reflection smiled back at her from the woman’s young face. Why Cally Lee insisted on wearing goggles inside, Helena would never know, but perhaps it was the style of the times. At least she didn’t have one of those horrid Deralian top–knots. “I had hoped dear Jiya would call on us this week, but with this dreadful conflict—do you truly think the Sith are coming for the Republic?”

Cally smiled, her mouth still full of the cakes she’d brought for them. She swallowed, and took sip of blue milk. “Absolutely,” she said, slipping her arm around Helena’s still–slim waist. “But you don’t need to worry at all, my dear.”

“The Sith killed my daughter,” Helena reminded her. “I worry a great deal!”

“No,” Cally shook her head. “That was all Revan’s doing. She has such a gift for ruining everything, and she’s doing it again.”

“You still think she’s alive?” Helena tried to be mindful about her sober companion’s obsession—it had helped put her own in a certain perspective, but lately, Cally Lee seemed positively bedeviled with finding Revan Starfire. “I told you, that broadcast was merely some kind of publicity stunt, all those red, glowing eyes—like something from a horror–vid! I had nightmares for a week!”

“Revan must be alive,” Cally mumbled through a mouth of cake. “The other one won’t work at all.”

“What?” Helena put her hand on the other woman’s forehead. “Are you feeling well, dear?”

“Distracted.” Cally smiled. “Why don’t you make us some tea?” She wriggled her toes on the ottoman. “The polish came out beautifully, thank you. I do love the color green.”

Xxx

So many bodies required Valkorion’s personal touch.

The matter of Revan and her Republic Fleet was his foremost concern, of course. But with all things in play, he definitely needed more leverage. It had taken weeks on this dreary, remote planet to find precisely the right farm—

—Hello. I’m looking for Bendowen and Ooka Organa? Pesticide sales—I called you yesterday? Quite a… an isolated… location that you have here. Heh.

Oh! You’re the guy who said he could get rid of the botflies? We’ve tried everything, but eridu saplings are delicate.

It takes a special hand—oh! My! And who’s this fellow? Big for his age, isn’t he?

You don’t know my age. Sulky brat.
“Call him ‘sir,’ Kore, be polite.” Ooka tussled his head, even if Kore was as tall as she was. Ooka Organa kept doing that. Ma-Molla had known better. Kore wished Ooka would stop.

“A big lad like yourself must be a great help to your parents. I dare say, I’ve been looking for someone like you. Think you could lend a hand setting the traps?” The wizened old man was missing teeth and wearing funny black glasses but he smiled at Kore anyway, like the gaps in his mouth didn’t matter.

Ooka laughed. “Oh, he's not our—”

“He’s a cousin,” Bendowen said, interrupting his wife. “Go along now, Kore. This part of Derra we help when folks ask.”

“Don’t go too near the seedlings, Kore,” Ooka added.

_She thinks I’ll fry them with the Force._ Kore had gotten that already. Six ways til Sith–day like Ma-Molla used to say. He missed Abasen and his grandma, but she’d been the one to ditch him here across the continent with some lame relatives of hers, who acted like Kore was some kind of booby prize they just had to put up with.

“Sure.” He tried to put on his best Deralian accent. “I’d love to help, Mister!” Not like there was anything else to do on this farm in the middle of nowhere.

“So kind of you, son.” The old man beamed at him, wrinkles traveling all way to the egg–shaped curves of his spacer goggles—as Kore followed him out and into their stupid farm.

_Xxx_

Watch him, such a fine figure of a lad. Don’t frighten—not yet—the lad’s expression so like the woman in this clever green cell—here—glaring at his guard’s body on Kaas through the shimmer of the containment field that was reinforced by an adamite grid.

As they did every day, those familiar green eyes tracked Valkorion’s every step, while her companion kept whispering furiously—running hot and bright, burning up the last essence of her null little life even as the Revan facsimile stared and waited….

I found the smuggler amusing, Revan. Do you too? She really does look exactly like you!

Seeing them side–by–side, it was no wonder he’d been fooled.

Such a pity the copy was such a weak vessel. Valkorion had missed her mind so and here it was—those green eyes, measuring his every step. No matter if he approached her helmeted, goggled, or with his blinds bare–faced and free.

_She always knows me, that one. Knows me so well—_

His other body came around the corner, clanking with the trays for their meals, while the copy and her smuggler handmaiden chattered in furious whispers, perhaps meant for their ears alone—

—It’s been five days! How long are you going to sit there and not fracking do anything?

I’m thinking. I recommend you do the same Deralian! The copy folded her arms and looked toward his bodies, face twisting with an imitation of an aristo’s sneer she must have learned long ago. Hello, Tenebrae. I hope you remembered to season the nerf steak this time.

But of course! It was a lie. All of his cooks were dead. He was feeding them packaged meals—and when those ran out—

Here is your dinner, ladies. Valkorion made both sets of guards’ eyes focus on the smuggler, because she was the weak point, the deliberate crack in his false Starfire’s shield.

You look sad, little shadow.

You look like an asshole, Tenny-Bro. Where is my husband?

Laugh. Frighten her. I’m afraid I can’t say. Because I don’t know. Because I don’t—no! Haha! I just can’t say! This guard is stupid. I need to replace him. So hard to find good help—these days—how brilliant of the copy to distribute the plague, using her little shadow to do so. She had weakened him more than she would ever know.

Not that it mattered.

That Deralian had such a false, green-eyed glare. Now that they were together, he could note the color of her irises was a little off—prenaturally bright for a Human’s eyes. And perhaps her skin a smidge darker, a bit more meat on her haunch—but otherwise—

Truly, anyone would have mistaken one for the other!

—You can take off the goggles, we know it’s you, Tenny-Bro.

They’re both him, Polla. The facsimile turned her elegant back on him, hiding her expression from all four of his eyes. Her poor head looked naked without its wealth of hair. Such a good, good copy. If only—she would never know his regret that her attempt to open the tomb had failed—

Oh, but now, if the Deralian’s looks could kill, this body would be a smoldering corpse, hah, hah. A small comfort, that the true Revan would now possess her spark—if not the bright mind—

I am quite fond of you, copy, he began—

Get out! The smuggler cried. Leave her alone and get the frack out of here, you fracking asshole—

Xxx

“—fracking asshole!” Polla finished, for all the good it fracking did.

The second guard pushed up his goggles and winked at them with red, glowing eyes before he turned and sauntered away after the first.

“You’d think he’d have better things to do than frack with us.” Polla was so tired of this banthashit.

“He’s probably just around the hall, listening to your every word.” Revan’s voice was monotone as ever. She’d taken out that spork again—made of wood, not even metal—and was sharpening it along the edge of the duracrete floor. Polla wasn’t sure how the woman expected to shiv someone with a wooden toothpick and no Force—hells, even the lousy needle–nose Polla still had hid in her boot had more punch than that, and it wasn’t gonna put a dent in one of those armored jobs all their guards wore.

Red–eyed pervs had stripped Revan to her skivs, taking her lightsaber and the knife she'd had strapped to her arm. But they hadn’t searched Polla at all.

Almost insulting. No, it was fracking insulting. I should have brought a better gun... or one of those fracking laser swords. “He can't be in every guard. Doesn't he have better things to do?”

“Then gloat over his great victory?” Revan’s lip curled, almost a snarl. “No.” She let put a slow breath. “And he is in every guard—at least every guard around us.”

“Well that's grand.” Polla’s ribs still felt sore from being slammed into the wall a few days ago. Her cellmate’s flesh arm was a constellation of green and purple bruises from where they’d grabbed her too, and they both had another line of bruises around their throats. “Hey, Tenny–Bro! Go to hell!”

The sound of laughter drifted back to them—laughter from what sounded like a few mouths in unison—from all of their guards, hovering just out of sight around the corner.

“Three now,” Revan whispered, leaning her head close. She had sour breath, but Polla bet her own wasn't any better. “There were five guards here yesterday.”

“Is that important?” Polla figured she could shoot one of them—but only enough to piss him off—unless they got the asshole to take off his armor first.

Three was still too many.

Miz Sith Lord didn't answer, just paced back to the walled–off fresher with her makeshift shiv.

Xxx

The copy will no doubt concoct some plan to escape. She has my Starfire’s cunning, if not her power.

Reminder to self: the facsimiles are only interesting as a diversion. Perhaps I can keep the copy to entertain once I have my prize, but I must not get too attached—or distracted—

But they are so entertaining compared to the dullards on Coru!

Xxx

Valkorion’s Selkath body drummed her webbed fingers on the table—My guest is late. These Coruscanti senators are all the same. The gills fluttered. Ah. There you are, Senator Racharn—

You can call me Leesa, Doctor Vivek. What did you say is wrong with the vaccine?

I must not say, ‘I broke the factory, Leeshansintina of the Senate House Racharn, and destroyed all of its production!.’ Hah. On purpose. Oh... nothing, my dear. We are just having such... production issues, I thought I should tell you in person.

Doctor Vivek, that's not acceptable! I have a very... loud buyer who has already paid for seven million units! You will have to find an alternate manufacturer for the Jedi Plague vaccine!

Oh, my dear, there is no alternate! By the by, any word from Revan—?
“Oh, my dear,” slurped the Selkath’s voder. “There is no alternate. By the by, any word from Revan—?”

Leeshansintina Evalyn Arabel, First of Racharn, leaned back in her chair, wondering again why she’d bothered to take this meeting with the slimy fish who kept bringing up Revan Starfire like a crazy fangirl. “I didn't realize this was an either/or situation, Doctor Vivek. Sents are still getting the plague, aren't they? Don't you want to help?”

“Of course I do!” The Selkath’s gills flushed pink under the rebreather. “But, hrm... mortality rates have decreased, have they not?”

_On Coruscant, yes, they have. But the other Core worlds—_

Frankly, sick sentients could be just as profitable as well ones, and destabilized planets made excellent investments (just as Mother had always taught her Leesas), but Leesa was going to have a hard time accounting for those seven million units of vaccine that her mysterious buyer from the Outer Rim had demanded (and already paid for). And that might be trouble—especially if that crazy Twi’lek girl really did have all those Exchange ties she kept mentioning.

One had to be organized with organized crime—even when they set entirely irrational interest rates.

“Can you get me any vaccine at all?” she sighed with exasperation.

“Tut, tut!” the Selkath burbled. “With war coming? Surely the kolto is more important!”

“War?” Aramis snorted. “As if!”

“We told the Fleet no war already,” Leeshansintina said to the fish. She rolled her eyes at Aramis, who was hanging out in the corner. It would be culturally insensitive to mention it, maybe, but the gasping fit the fish was having right now sounded an awful lot like laughter—

“Doctor Vivek!” Her little sister burst through the door of the conference she had most assuredly not been invited to. “Hello! Did you get your friend to ask about my friend—about where he’s gone?”

“I think Gant is looking into it now,” the doctor bubbled.

“Doctor Vivek gives talks at our school,” Leeshy said. “And she knows a ton of people everywhere. I asked her to ask... about... my friend. For me. On the Outer Rim.”

“Ah, I see.” That needed no translation. Sheltered Egs didn’t have friends on the Outer Rim—not normally.

_You asked this Selkath for help tracking down Malachor D’Reev on Deralia._ Leesha wanted to yell at Leeshy for her indiscretions—but then she’d have to admit to bugging her sisters’ room.

And, truth be told, since the boy’s comm calls from the Organa farm had stopped, she’d been wondering about his whereabouts herself.

“Does this friend Gant of yours do anything with pharmaceutical distribution?” she asked the Selkath, trying to make the best of a bad play.

“Hah, hah. From time to time,” the fish said.

Xxx

Oh, these infant Senators. They give up so easily! Almost as easily as they give up their secrets.

_Hilarious. Do I care? Racharn will be easier to play than House D'Reev. I won't even need a Jedi with this lot—_

_May I get you anything else, Meez Jarr?_

_Yes, I would like two thisla pies. With extra crema. For here. Yum. Sweet. Creamy—breathe deep, watching the two Zeltrons gyrate for his amusement. Another bite of pie—flash of thigh—_

Xxx

The old Twi’lek came in every Sixthday, Deeka Jin had noted. Always ate his weight in pies, always tipped well. There’d been a time, years ago when she’d still been workin, that she might have given him a toss herself for free—but the years had fattened and wrinkled the man like a smoked nerf haunch.

“Mmm,” he jawed, chewing. Somethin wrong with this eyes of his because he always wore those same goggles, like he couldn't see without. “You set a good table.”

“Sure.” Pies were from the bake shop down the way, but you take the compliment, they add credits. “So kind of you to say.” There, all fancy–like, that friend of her Mekelkins, the one she'd seen on the vids who was callin himself ‘Malak’ now, of all things.

And where was her Mekelkins? She cast an eye toward the black–bordered portrait of his father she'd propped against the bar between the two Togrutan twins who'd died of plague, and her brother Twist, done in the tanks for another thirty years. She didn't have a good picture, not one recent—

“Strange times,” the Twi’lek gestured at the holovid screen. Deeks had turned the sound down, but there was that white–haired woman speaking again. The Holly–Net called her the Last Jedi. “What do you think of that?”

“I think if you want your trick to wear robes it's sixty extra,” said Deeka Jin.

Xxx

_Sixty extra. If only I could still find release in the fleshy delights. Better this pie—_

Knock, knock. This uniform itches terribly! Knock, knock! What is—ho, ho! I am on the Grave Bright! Finally, a blind left alive here—so strange they were all taken ill on Lord Malak’s ship…but the other....

Lord Malak’s voice. _You... uh, you may enter._

_Lord Malak is too polite._ Oh, my. And not alone, I see!

What do you want, Lieutenant Cordobay? Uh... nothing, my lady. I did not expect to find you here too! Have you been on this ship long?
Soft laughter. None of your concern. Leave us. Gust of Force, edge of compulsion. Pushing him away as the door slammed shut—

Oh, my dear Inse Blais! She's good. Very good. Pity Starfire got to her first—I'll just put my ear to the door now—

We never found out what he wanted, Inse.

That was the Emperor, you fool! See how he covered his eyes?

But Cordobay always wears goggles—

And now you know why. Oh, Malak, you would be so lost without me.

What do we do about Cordobay?

Kill him, of course. Do you want me to do it for you, Malak?

No.

The door opened. Run? Or laugh? Haha, Lord Malak, if you strike me down I will become more powerful than you ever imag—

Sharp ping and the light goes out. I hate it when that happens! Unpleasant!

Points of stars… who was it now that used that phrase? That sulky Jedi who broke all of his limbs in the Korriban tomb? That shallow aristo girl? (Inse Blais reminds me of her.) Oh, so many lights go out lately. But the Lady Inse explains the loss of my blinds! She’s killing them, the filthy traitor. And that plague of Revan’s—dear me! A third of the palace staff at the Red are dead—horrific staffing issues in the green cells—now I’ve lost the cook....

Dozens on the Grave Bright— could they all be Inse’s victims? Is she plotting against me?

Delicious. Poor Herpia Blais would birth a rancor to learn her daughter betrayed her Emperor!

(I do hope she comes to my execution tomorrow. She looks so piquant in blue.)

Oh, let them play, my day–lived rebels. When she finally comes it will not matter—

Xxx

Tousle–haired, his sleeping robes open to the waist, Lord Malak D’Reev stared at his saber as if he’d never killed anyone before, but Inse knew that wasn't true.

Despite the fatal wound to his abdomen, Lieutenant Cordobay’s face retained its smug grin, even as his limbs twitched their last.

“There are three more of the Emperor's blinds still left on our ship,” Inse told the lily–livered ghost of Lord Malak. “I keep them assigned to non–essential custodial tasks on a rotation entirely out of our orbit. Lieutenant Cordobay was the last one spying on you directly, and now—” she kicked the body, wondering if Lord ‘Malak’ needed another compliment about his prowess again to snap out of his tragic reverie.

The things I do for the House of Blais. Inwardly, she sighed. Lord Malak had, in every tale of her childhood, been a reckless madman, driven by Tenebrae’s kiss; but he had also possessed a certain raw competence. In the boy’s shell, what remained of him always needed to be pushed. Once, during a long night of lover’s confessions, the boy had told her he was more Dustil Onasi than D’Reev. Touching at the time, but Inse kept hoping the man’s natural darkness would bring back the Darth she—and their empire—needed.

“Cordobay’s dead,” the Sith Lord declared, obsessed with the obvious. His boy’s voice cracked. “I killed him.”

“Very well you did, too!” Inse smiled to soothe. “Next, we will need to weed out the Emperor’s Voices on the Sojourn—”

“Father’s ship. Yes. Of course.” His eyes were dry as he fastened the saber to his belt.

“Malak?” Inse grew weary of reminding him. “Your father is dead.”

His yellowing eyes narrowed at her. “My father—” his head whipped toward the viewscreen suddenly. “Wait—do you feel that? The ships—”

“The Mandalorian ships? Are they changing formation again?” Mandalorians had been patrolling this system when the Sojourn and the Bright first jumped in, cloaking fast to escape their notice—following the orders Tenebrae had used Admiral Onasi to command. Inse still wasn’t sure if those ships were friend or foe—only that the Emperor had made no commands to contact them—their only orders were to ‘wait for Revan.’

Orders vague enough to be nonsensical, really.

Orders vague enough to show how their immortal Luminance was slipping. Had he even noticed the Mandalorian armada on top of them?

And speaking of that, where is the rest of our Fleet?

No matter—for now, Inse did not need a fleet. Her immediate objective was to take command of these two ships with Lord Malak’s help... but Lord Malak was making it difficult with this puerile attachment to the Onasi boy’s father.

Sometimes, when he embraced her in his sleep, Inse thought Lord Malak looked rather sweet, and nothing like a Dark Lord of the Sith at all. In another time, if all she had needed was a simple bed slave, she might have enjoyed his facile charms, but as things were—

I did not steal you from Mydia to exchange love–tokens with a Telosian nerf–herder, boy! I require Darth Malak!

She had said as much out loud before… only to have the boy blink at her—and sneer, as she felt his dark strength rise. Perhaps he just needed these frequent reminders.

“My dear Dustil,” Inse proclaimed, rather pointedly. “My love. You need to embrace Lord Malak’s touch the way the Emperor’s Voices embrace Tenebrae—”

“Shut up!” Lord Malak walked to the viewscreen, tapping his comm as if he was suddenly inspired to prove it. “Wait—what the—?” His head turned in the direction of those mystery ships, and then his eyes widened. “Prepare my shuttle,” he barked at someone, before flicking the comm off. The stippled corruption on his face mixed with the stubble from the beard his boy’s skin could not quite grow. “I need to see the Admiral. In person. Now—” he glanced up toward the viewscreen again. “Fast.”

Inse frowned, following his direction. “Oh!”
The sleek wedge was unmistakable—as was the feeling suddenly bearing down from the sky: a strong manipulation in the Force, like a distortion field bearing down from above—hard, and clear, and... loud.

“One of the Star Forge ships? I thought they were all destroyed!” Inse had half-expected Revan’s return—the real one—to be a lie. She was no child like Phylus or Mydia, expecting a hero from the Golden Age to aid them in their struggle against Tenebrae. No, Inse liked to think she was a realist, like Mother, trained to seize the opportunities within her grasp. And so she had been, swaying the crew of this ship to her side, encouraging Lord Malak to wield his superior strength to bend their crews’ will to an absolute loyalty—

“I have to tell my—Admiral Onasi,” Lord Malak said, frowning childishly. “He might not know—”

He no longer matters, fool. “She's launching fighters,” Inse noted. “Rather pointless against the fifty ships surrounding her ship. Or are they her escort? I thought from Tenebrae’s orders we were expecting the Republic Fleet to arrive with Lord Revan? Those ships have Mandalorian brands. Is she leading all the Mandalorians now?”

If that were the case, victory would not be won in a battle. Not in these skies.

Malak frowned, looking up at the view. The Aleema’s fighters are forming an attack run,” Malak said. “Looks like the other ships are pulling back and the fighters are coming against us. I… I uh, I know that because I—”

“Because you ordered commands like that,” Inse sighed, watching the squadrons launch from the great ship—a motley lot for a fighting force. Most ships looked like Republic salvage. “But we're still cloaked.”

“I know because I studied squad formations in fracking school,” the boy–man snapped. “Same as I learned there that cloaks don't help against fracking Jedi. Cut the banthashit, Inse. I don't have time. I need to get to my father. Now.”

“But—” the rest of her words were lost to Malak—or Dustil if that was how he wanted to think of himself—for he had already turned and left, breaking into a run down the corridor, presumably heading for the shuttle bay. The red silk of his sleep–robe fluttered in his wake like a cape. Halfway down the hall he paused and turned back.

“Are you going to dress first?” she called out.

He just stared past her blank–eyed, and raised his hand. The silver hilt of his saber detached itself from Lieutenant Cordobay’s guts and shot through the air. “No.” He turned his back and sped away.

Those fighters will launch against the larger ship first— Inse had studied space battles in school as well, but even a simpleton like Mydia or Nereal would know they were outnumbered here—and the way to win was not to fight.

“Commander Tycho,” Inse said, switching on her own comm–link. “Keep us cloaked, but move us aft sixty degrees, along the y–vector. Take no offensive action without my command—but keep Admiral Onasi’s Sojourn between us and those fighters. If they engage in battle, retreat to the planet’s polar line along a solar orbit, half-speed, so the enemy’s sensors don't register the acceleration. Do not drop our cloaks—or comm the Sojourn.”

“Uh… Lord Malak is here now, demanding a shuttle—” from the shouts and unmistakable sounds of a lightsaber, Lord Malak was doing more than just demanding. In fact, from the way Tycho’s voice had dropped to a whisper, Inse suspected he was hiding in a corner of their small hangar bay while Lord Malak took what was his.

Lord Malak runs away so quickly, when inspired. “Lord Malak is free to do as he pleases.” Apparently, it pleased him more to care about Admiral Onasi’s welfare than hers. Or perhaps he wanted the glory of defeating Revan for himself? Considering how badly they were outnumbered, all Inse could do was wish him a long and painful death.

“I should have let Mydia pop off your digits, Lord Malak,” she muttered at the air. “All of them.”

Sadly, in a space battle—what with depressurization and hard vacuum, long, drawn-out deaths were hard to come by.

Xxx

We're almost to the Felucia System— the flustered Twi’lek admitted when Valkorion pressed him again as they walked the hall toward the Trandoshan High Admiral’s quarters. Easy to press him, even in this near-null of a body.

Felucia? Why, that was Onasi’s plan for an invasion—whether from sheer incompetence or… it seems, deliberate sabotage. How in stars did he actually tell them to go there? Didn't Revan tell them to come to Kaas? They should be nearly to Medriaas now? Oh, Admiral, we will have some words before your end.

Oh! Yes, sir. Here is a door that looks like it belongs to an admiral. Look back at the Twi’lek and the guards. Damned Republic pips, is three lieutenant or captain?

Next to his Duros body, the Twi’lek jumped.

There is no one to fight at Felucia, Lieutenant. Or is it captain? I can never remember… the pips! Peals of laughter. Hah, hah. The body cannot help itself. So amusing, I started a war and no one came—

It’s… Captain Uban. And I know who you are. What have you done with Ensign Hitari?

I’ve made him a part of a much larger plan, Captain.

We—we were warned. Red eyes. Like yours. They warned us—

Is this the hall to Rensha’s suite?

At the end of the corridor. The Twi’lek flushed red with repressed anger and fear.

No need to bring a loaded blaster at my back to the party—without further ado, Valkorion shot him. So tedious, I need a hint of levity—I do hope Rensha is more fun.

He raised his voice as the door slid open —Admiral? We shall have such words if you have countermanded my command and brought the Sith Fleet to Felucia—

XXX

“Admiral!” the voice cracked. “We shall have such words if you have countermanded my command and brought the Sith Fleet to Felucia—”

“Then let’s have words,” High Admiral Rensha snarled at the outline of the man in her doorway.
She’d seen enough reports to have expected something like this. Hells, she’d expected it to be Admiral Yuffall Iskar, the thrice–decorated ‘Doshan hero from her own planet—a man the entire galaxy had witnessed being possessed on the Holo–vids—but Iskar had dropped dead before he could be interrogated. “This is the Republic Fleet, Emperor Vitiate—not the Sith. We are waiting for your Sith fleet here—and we will destroy them—”

Incredibly, the Duro in front of her broke into hysterical laughter. “Oh, my dear Rensha—you will not. Not from Felucia!”

“Explain,” she growled, feeling her head–arch rise.

“Oh, ho! It’s really too funny!” He clutched his gut with laughter. Tears ran from his red, glowing eyes. “Felucia! Hah!” He paused. “Is Revan here?”

“What?” Rensha squinted her own orbs at him, tongue snaking out of her mouth to taste his scent. No fear in it, just madness.

“Of course she’s not.” His voice took on a sing–song. “She’s hiding, isn’t she? Very tricksy!”

“Are you working with her?”

“Mmmm,” he said. “I will be.” The tan skin on his face pulled back around his lips like it was molting. “Felucia! Hah! Haha! Felucia!”

A prudent leader like Jiya or Cein might have taken the giggling wreck of the former Second Ensign Hitari into custody, but their prudence had kept them from taking over Rensha’s command after the Katarr debacle—and prudence, she had observed, did not work with Sith.

The Emperor’s laughter went on for quite some time, until it grated on Rensha’s last tympanic nerve. The body of the foolishly cocksure Captain Udaan did not improve her temper either—when she noticed it sprawled in the corridor.

“Hah, hah, hah!” the Duro chortled, as she raised her blaster.

Rensha shot him.

Xxx

Another light out. But that was worth it. Felucia! Hah!

There's a ship coming out of hyperspace. That's the Aleema, sir.

Aha! Trisky. Could it possibly be—

I knew what it—

It’s Mandalorian. What are the Mandalorians doing?

So big, I’d forgotten—

Chatter of voices. Stop, as always, when I enter the room. Everyone salute.

The Zabrak raised his voice as the door slid open—Admiral? We shall have such words if you have countermanded my command and brought the Sith Fleet to Felucia—

What? The man looked up at him, bleary and red–eyed. Takan, what—? His shoulders stiffened. Hells, he muttered. What is it now, Lord Tenebrae? Is this some kind of test? His hand shook a little and then he coughed.

Oh, my! Admiral Onasi is coughing. I should be in at least three bodies now—I should be in his as well—

Tenebrae pushed harder and then he felt it—that sickly white web, that sense of rot, cutting through the ties that bound him—

Ugh! How disgusting! His Zabrak boy’s mouth screamed. Take it away!

And were it any other time and any other sentient, that would have been the end of Onasi. But he needed this death to count—

xxx

The world blurred to white and—

And then time came back with a jerk. Carth blinked. “That’s the Aleema,” he said dumbly, staring at the screen. “Isn’t it?” I’ve seen… vids, of it, but I never saw—hells, no one saw much except hard choke after they saw the Aleema—that’s what we all used to say—

“Yes.” Next to him, Takan’s lips pulled back with the Emperor’s twisted smile, red eyes glowing like pits from hell. “How are you feeling, Admiral? You seem… under the weather.”

Xxx

How are you feeling, Admiral? You seem .. under the weather. Happy to have betrayed me? Not to be on Felucia?

The Aleema. Oh! No. Really? Too poetic to think she managed to rally the Mando’ade, following in Ulic’s footsteps, raising another rebellion against me—

But could she? Could she have, truly? Something I missed?

Valkorion could not help himself. Across space, laughter issued from more than a dozen throats.

Xxx

Stop laughing. Stop. You’ll scare the boy! Oh, ho. Stop!

Haha, sorry. It was just something funny I thought of. Now, Kore. That's a name I didn't think was Deralian—

Such a strapping lad with his father’s height, his grandfather’s grip, and no power whatsoever—

I’m from Nar Shaddaa, sir—

XXX

“—Kore,” the pesticide salesman chuckled. “That’s a name I didn’t think was Deralian.”

“I’m from Nar Shaddaa… sir—” Kore said, because he was supposed to be. He’d shown the old creeper the fields just as he’d been asked, fielded some really dumb questions about school, and tried to pretend to be some dumb ref, just like he was supposed to. It seriously looked like the creeper was sniffing his own weed killers or something though, because he kept randomly chuckling and smirking and saying, ‘tut,’ all the time—and now this. He was laughing, even though no one had told any jokes.

“Really,” the pesticide salesman said. His name was Gant, he’d said at one point. “What part?”

“The International sector,” Kore made up, because every planet had one.

“Which international sector?”

“I was pretty young when we left,” Kore lied like it was nothing.

“I have many… friends on Nar Shaddaa.” Now the old guy was twitching in a way that made Korrie—Kore—wonder if he was a perv.

“I gotta go back inside,” he muttered, backing up toward the door to the farm house. “It was nice meeting you!”

A flicker of movement near the shed behind the old guy’s back caught his eye.

Kore willed himself not to react as that man in black who’d stalked him after school flickered into sight, raising one finger to his lips and smiling, before vanishing again.

“I gotta go!” he repeated, just as the old guy frowned, glancing behind him—but there was no one there.

“Oh, ho,” he mumbled, eyes rolling a little as Korrie backed away. “Tut, tut!”

Creeper. Kore burst through the doors and through to the dining room where the two startled olds looked up at him like he’d never left.

“Nice night,” the old dirt-farmer said. “Did you show him the fields?”

“Do you want another pomato?” the old woman smiled as she offered Kore an entire platter of them.

“No, thank you Meez Organa. Mister Organa—yes, I—I showed him.” He sat back down in his seat, signing a little as the door clicked safe behind him. Maybe the man in black is gonna kill that creeper for me?

“Call me Aunt Ooka, dear.” Ooka Organa pushed the platter toward Kore again as her husband leaned back in his chair, still scowling.

Without a word, the old sales guy walked back in and sat down too.

Or—or not. He felt his breath coming fast, so Kore did some Jedi breathing to calm it down.

On the outside, Kore smiled politely, looking past without trying to look like he was—to where the one holo that had kept him from bolting when he first got here was displayed in a black flimsiplast frame that looked so cheap he was pretty sure these Organas were poor. In it was holo-pic of Mother, Father, and some Deralian girl who’d been their friend. Father and Mother didn’t look anything like they did later—if Father wasn’t so tall and Mother didn’t have red hair, Kore wasn’t sure he would have recognized them at all—but they did, and so he did.

They were smiling. He liked the holo even more because of that.

“That’s a nice picture,” the pesticide salesman named Gant said.
“Yeah, that’s my cousin Beya Organa,” Kore told him, because she was supposed to be—according to his cover story. “She died in the Mandalorian Wars or something.”

“After,” Uncle Bendowen muttered.

These were Beya Organa’s parents. Ma-Molla had picked them to guardian him while she was away getting Jasp because she said they knew about the Force and stuff. Their dead daughter had it—but now she was dead. Ma-Molla said they’d never tell anyone else who Kore was because they still felt bad about letting Beya go to war or something.

Kore had never really been a total Jedi, but he was pretty sure no one let Jedi do anything. They had power, right? That meant they got to decide.

“Hrmm,” the man named Gant eyed Kore creepily again. “What a sad story. It is so hard to lose children.”

“Kore,” Bendowen interrupted. “Do you want to go see the crops with me tomorrow?”

“Bendowen!” Ooka Organa frowned. “Are you sure that’s wise?”

“I want to go to school,” Kore told them. “Everyone’s gonna wonder where I got to.”

“You can forget your head about that,” Bendowen Organa said. “I’m not flying half across Derra for you to go to Primaries and get us all more press. Reporters are all over Moll and Jasp’s place as is. Why do you think she dropped you here?”

“She said I could go to school.”

“Does he not usually go to school?” Gant frowned. “Tut, tut! An education is very important!”

“Home school,” Bendowen shrugged at his wife. “Like we did for Beya that last year, before—do you still have the discs?”

“She was a little older.” Ooka sighed. “I think they're in the shed. I’ll look in the morning—”

“Let me do it,” Korrie interrupted. Because he had had a funny feeling about that shed ever since he’d seen it… and now he knew why.

That guy in black is watching me. He’s in the shed. And whoever this other guy is, maybe he knows something... because something’s weird.

Something’s not right here.

“Perhaps in the morning the boy can help us poison the botflies,” the pesticide man offered, smiling. “It has to be done at dawn.”

Xxx

The green cells were green because the walls were covered with some kind of green fungus, slightly damp and dripping. Root–like branches threaded through the stone, creating a web that seemed hard as duracrete when Polla tried to touch it—before Revan warned her off.

Polla had been surprised—at first—that they'd put Revan in the same cell as her. Even more so when they'd disarmed the former Jedi but not done anything like put some kind of Force collar on her. After all the Force–blockers that had been piled on Polla when Tenny–bro thought she might be Revan, it had seemed odd, until Revan explained.
“The walls,” she had muttered in disgust, wrinkling her sheep–nose at the roots. “Full of ysalamiri. We’re in a null field. I can’t feel the Force at all.”

They’d disarmed Revan, but no one had bothered to search Polla—not that the little needle nose she had tucked in her boot was going to do anything.

The Bitch seemed to spend a lot of time staring into space and muttering to herself. Sometimes she sounded like two people. She was probably insane, Polla realized. That would explain so much.

“Are you just giving up?” She finally asked the Bitch on the fourth—or eighth—day (they were starting to blur together) of their captivity. Masked guards came and left (surprisingly good) meals for them twice before each sleep period—but otherwise, nothing happened.

“He won’t leave us to rot in here.” Revan sighed. “I assume he’s rounding up the rebels now. He’ll want to me to execute them.”

“Frack him! You can’t do that!”

Revan wrapped her arms around her knees, drawing them up to her chest. “Even in this weak body, I assure you I can.” She exhaled. “But I will not. The resistance destabilized the Emperor’s hold—at least on this world. And they did it for me. They are… were… loyal, in the end.” Her eyes narrowed, and she leaned closer. “How did you convince them it was for me? Finiris didn’t say before he betrayed us.”

“I put on a fracking mask and gave speeches,” Polla told her. “Is this place bugged, you think?”

“I don’t care. Did you pretend to be… me?” Revan frowned. “Or… her when you gave those speeches?”

_Miz Race–the–Biscain–Hundred? Frack her!_ Polla would think Tenebrae had been lying about that, but who could make something that banthashit crazy up? “Didn’t really get into personal details.”

“You must have been somewhat effective.” The woman shot her a considering glance. “I suppose… you do sound a bit like her.”

_Oh, yeah? Frack her._ “She probably sounds like me,” Polla told the Bitch.

“Regardless… it was effective.”

“What I did was use my connections to find the black market,” Polla told her, since Miz Starfire finally seemed to be taking an interest in all the stuff Polla had done to save this planet. “You know… dropped a few names….” _Well, mainly yours and Lord Scourge’s._ “We had some runners set up to get more vaccine through Manaan—Mission was supposed to be finalizing that with the Senate mucketies who owned distrib rights—but I guess…” Polla’s voice trailed off. “House Racharn or something? You probably know them. And… you know Mission, right? Hey—are you sure this cell isn’t bugged?”

The other woman’s face might as well have been a mask. “I am sure it does not matter. Tenebrae will have tortured the leaders of your rebellion already and discovered all of your secrets.”

No one could accuse the Dark Lord of the Sith of being an optimist, Polla thought.

“He will want me to kill them. I will refuse… of course,” the woman continued, tapping her metal fingers on her other hand like she was keeping a tally.
“Good, but—” Polla didn't know how to put it. “So is there anyone… out there… you think might be able to help us escape? Help us help them escape too?”

At first, Polla had been pretty optimistic about their chances of escaping. They had allies. No one had taken out Yuthura, last she’d seen, and Tenny–bro was enough of a bastard he’d brag if he’d knocked off Seiran or Zaalbar or Carth. Mission the droid hadn't moved when they'd left her in the tomb. Didn’t seem like Tenny–bro had seen her at all. Maybe her circuits were fried now, but there was the other droid—and Seiran and Zaalbar—and the guards had said Carth was gone to war but the others—or Tenny–bro could be lying—

But as the days passed, her optimism had begun to fray.

“He will execute our allies when I refuse to do it for him,” Revan continued flatly. “Making them martyrs to his injustice—not mine. I assume the Fragment was close to the Wookiee, since they were long–term companions. Tenebrae will spare him. For a time. But your husband and the Blais children will be next on the executioner’s list. You…” her eyes looked almost puzzled. “I’m not sure what Tenebrae will do with you. Would the Fragment be affected by the news of your death?”

There was a long silence, as Polla tried to furiously come up with a response to all of that.

How the frack should I know? And the... the whole killing Seiran thing was— maybe she's insane.

“You have to save Seiran! And me! And Zaalbar too. And… Phylus is just a kid—so if you execute these slaves who will die anyway, then maybe Tenny–Bro will let Seiran live?*

Goodbye slaves. Polla tried not to remember their names.

“He will abide by terms,” the Bitch said coolly. “But I would never agree to kill them. They will die. Perhaps you will too—but not by my hand. He will keep me alive… for her. And he will find her—she cannot hide from him forever. He’ll keep me, Carth, and… Malak.” Her hesitation on the name made Polla wonder if this was a kath and hessi show made for Tenebrae all along.

She knows the kid’s not Malak. She’s not blind and we told her! And she can't really mean that she’d let Seiran die! She tried to save us all before—didn’t she? Isn’t that why she fought the rancors?

Looking into the arctic chill of the woman’s eyes, Polla wasn't sure of anything. “Sure the other Revan would rather have you alive than me?” Polla snapped.

“He might make her choose.” The woman ran a hand through over the fuzz of her scalp. The guards had taken her armor, stripped her down to a singlet, and she was now wrapped in both of their sleeping blankets. Anyone else might have looked pathetic, but the Bitch was pulling it off. She grimaced. “But he likes me. I know things. Things he needs. You….”

Right. I’m just the null smuggler. The Bitch had said as much before. “You don't have to be such a—a bitch about it!”

“Would you like me to lie?” The Bitch rubbed her temples. “With the ysalamiri field I sense nothing, but the pallor of your skin and the tremor in your voice seem to indicate fear. You need to move past it. If, by some remote chance, the Fragment chooses your life over mine there are things you must tell her for me. Important things.”

Are you really going to give me secrets in a probably–bugged room? “Oh, yeah? Well I don't need the Force to know you're giving up. Revan wouldn't do that!”

The other woman’s jaw tightened. “Hasn’t she? She's running races now, we were told. Like the “Biscain Hundred?”

“I… can’t believe that she would. Tenny–bro’s lying. You said you left her with—”

Revan’s metal hand closed down hard over Polla’s. “I left her because she would be useless here and useful to the Republic. Misguided sentiment. I thought she might choose to be the Jedi I was—but it seems she chose your life instead.” She raised her voice slightly. “She seems to be nothing more than a copy of you, after all.”

“Oh, yeah? Well, I—” Is this an act for Teeny–Bro or not?

The metal hand squeezed Polla’s hard—like a warning. “Remember, Deralian,” she snapped. “You are nothing. And the Fragment is merely a version of you with Force powers she barely understands.” She dropped Polla’s hand and stood up abruptly, stalking to the cornered–off area of their fresher again.

“Frack you too,” Polla muttered, when the woman was safely behind the wall.

Seiran might already be dead.

She wouldn’t cry. She’d count to ten. There had to be a way out of this.

Xxx

“I brought you caff, milady.” In his own palace, Lord Scourge was nothing but courteous to Yuthura, constantly anticipating her needs both in and out of the bedchamber. Under a different set of circumstances, she might have even enjoyed taking him as a lover: he was skilled, the sheets of his bed were firesilk, and he had an excellent cook.

But the man had betrayed them all—and then been foolish enough to let her live. Sentients to whom she had promised protection were now vulnerable and afraid. And missing. The catacomb cell had been rounded up already. Zaalbar had managed an escape to the forests, but Seiran Wen had vanished. And Dustil Onasi—the boy she had tried to save—was, according to Scourge—now piloting his own dreadnaught in his father’s Sith Armada, engaged in their first strike against the Republic.

Always darkest, Yuthura reminded herself. Before the light comes back.

“Thank you for the caff,” she said to the traitor Scourge, taking the cup graciously, and cradling it.

“Of course.” His soft hand traced her freshly–oiled t’chun, from tip to top as he sat down next to her at the breakfast table on the balcony. The oil had the side effect of numbing sensation, (among its more fast–acting effects, but the slower ones were why she had selected it), but Yuthura shivered anyway, feigning pleasure at the man’s touch.

The tell–tale glint of an energy shield sparkled in the sunlight, shielding them both from the city below.

The now nearly–deserted city below.

Yuthura would have felt more satisfaction at the sight if their people hadn't still been dying—although the last report the rebel Liyo Basile had managed to send her from the Emperor’s palace (before he fled to the forest himself) said that death rates had been falling, these last two weeks. Perhaps the infection had burned through all not already immune.
Perhaps….

But this is one world. And for all we know the Sith Emperor is consolidating his strength upon another.

There were three main Sith worlds where Tenebrae held sway: Thule, Zioist and Dromund Kaas. The host of others—Korriban being the most notable—had never been very populated.

“You're quiet this morning,” Scourge murmured.

“I'm thinking.” Yuthura smiled, taking a sip of the caff. “Did they ever find the Wookiee?”

“The beast fled into the forest,” Scourge shrugged. “There are larger hunters there. I don't expect they will ever find much.”

“No,” Yuthura murmured, taking another sip of caff. Below them, she noted the servants had set the refuse bins out without their lids again—the red lekku ribbon tied discretely around the second in the time–old Rylothian symbol for revolt signaled to her that the droid had chosen today to make her way to the palace. Surreptitiously, Yuthura thumbed open the small cap in her pocket containing her lekku–oil poison’s antidote and dabbed it on her fingers before bringing them to her mouth to lick clean. “I don't expect they will find anything at all, my lord.”

Xxx

If things hadn't been such a mess, Mission didn't think Big Z would've been able to get free at all, but he had—escaping into the forest—where she'd found him at that refugee camp Polla Organa and Yuthura Ban had helped supply, before it all went to Hothing hell.

If things hadn't been such a mess, Mission was pretty sure too that someone might have questioned why a droid was rolling around the Sith Emperor's palace with no job to do... but most of the Red Palace seemed to be full of sick and dying sentients, and she might as well have been furniture to them.

Good riddance, she flashed with her lights at the hall security cameras she had already disabled. That stupid, ronto–headed bucket of bolts of a security system had refused to tell her anything about the mysterious green cells, where rumor had it, Emperor Asshole liked to keep his Force-sensitive prisoners before executions.

Right now, Mission’s objective was more basic: spring the rebels slated for execution tomorrow—the ones kept in the ordinary dungeon, twenty meters underground behind eight layers of reinforced duracrete.

It did take her a few more hours to rig up the pulleys in the elevator shaft. If she'd had a stomach, Mission would have stopped for a snack. As it was, she tested the mech lowering her chassis down to the bottom, then cut a hole with her lasercutter.

“Wha—” the lone guard down here began, before her gas grenade knocked him out.

The schematics they had were useless, it seemed, so it took Mission more time to ascertain there was definitely not another level off this one, but then life forms lit up her scanners clear as day—finally!

A few mines blew open what looked like a modified blast door, opening into a large, crowded cave with a line of durasteel bars down the middle between Mission and a crowd of suddenly very loud and demanding organic sents.
“I am here to rescue you!” Mission intoned, in Revan’s best, ‘I am your Jedi savior’ voice. “Is everyone okay?”

A clamor of excited voices responded as the rebel slaves all crowded toward the cell door. Her sensors didn't register any dead, which was good. “I brought kolto too!” Mission added, shooting some paks out through the bars. (She'd deactivated all the security fields before even making it down here. Crap tech—at least a hundred years out of date.)

“Mission?” The Human man was so dirty for a sec Mission didn't recognize him. His head–fur had become a beard. “Is—”

“Seiran!” she yelled with her voder, going for cheerful, as the guy turned around from his corner of the crowded and filthy cell. “Where’s Polla?” She shone her hi–beam through the packed bodies, who blinked, wincing at the light.

“I hoped… she's not with you?”

“She got picked up with Revan. Sheris–Revan?” Mission was still working out a good name for Coma Lady, now that she was out of the coma. If she ever saw her again, that was. “Records say Tenny–Bro took Revan to the green cells. Know where they're at?”

“No.” His hands went to the bars on the gate and he started shaking it, while Mission asked a few more slaves about the green cells too, trying not to be too sad about Polla Organa, who really got herself and the rest of them into this in the first place, even if her heart was in the right place.

(And Mission fully intended to thank Polla, if they ever met again, because even if she could not trust the Kaas computer at all, it had taught her many, many secrets of the universe that even her thirty–thousand–year–old half had never known. Although it was also evil and stuff.)

No one knew where the green cells were, it turned out, but Mission finally had to trank Seiran Wen and have one of the Wookiees carry him out to stop him from running off looking for his wife, who was probably just dead in a lima–pit someplace.

Love made sents crazy. Mission had always known it—ever since Griff met Lena—but the stark reminder here made her bless her circuits for being more rational.

Xxx

“Ungrateful! Urchins! Mydia? Ah, there you are. No, don’t walk away! MYDIA? What have you done with her? MYDIA? Where is she?”

The movement of the older Human’s bulk activated HK’s motion sensors, spinning his ocular circuits back into processing mode. His sensors whirred through the net reports the Master had left cabled to the dataport on his left lower appendage. [[Casualty reports from Kaas City. Disease vectors.....]]

“Statement: Processing data.” HK murmured to himself in a lower frequency than the wrinkling bag of flesh in front of him would have been able to hear, had she been paying attention.

“We don't know where Lord Revan went!” The long–haired, giggling meatbag Mydia Blais had an anguished tone to her voice that HK had never heard from her before—and he had heard her far too much, what with her penchant for lurking about the Master’s chambers—the Onasi boy trailing behind her like some sloppy, supporting, organic gibbonite. “She didn't leave a note!”

The Blais matriarch split her maw into a wet, toothy slice. “I don't care about Revan! I’m speaking of your sister! The Emperor requested my return from the mountains—and the presence of all of our House tomorrow afternoon. You've grown too fat for your dress armor and there's no time to have more forged, Mydia! And Inse’s room is empty! And where is your brother?”

“You told him to get your bags from the car, I thought! We do have servants, Mother.”

“We do, but servants steal. Why is there a droid here?”

HK dimmed the lights of his eyes, to look harmless, as the wrinkled face drew closer, assessing his carapace with its rolling, wide–eyed orbs.

“It was Revan’s. I think it's broken.”

“Revan’s.” The woman who could only be Herpia Blais, mother of Inse, Mydia, and Phylus Blais scoffed. “Revan’s droid? Well, she won't be needing that—not the worm who was a guest in my house for months without you telling me! You may feign ignorance, but I do know where that Revan went and she’s not coming back. Lord Tenebrae told me to wear blue, and he always asks for me in blue when he's preparing an execution! Something about the light matching the fabric and my eyes?”

“Motherrrr…” Mydia Blais was edging toward the door, like the jiggling pile of craven flesh that she was. “I swear, you're obsessed!”

“She killed your father, you know. Revan did. And she was plotting something with that old cook, Deckna—”

“You think His Luminance will actually kill Revan?”

“He asked me to wear blue, Mydia! Blue!” The liquidous fleshbag waved a slip of plimsi. “You know how our Shining Light feels about blue!”

“But she just woke up from her coma! Doesn't he want to… ask her questions or something?” Mydia’s voice trailed off into a whine. “Also, Mother, I need your permission to kill Inse, when we find her. She stole my consort, Lord Malak…. ow!”

The larger meatbag slapped the smaller, in a gesture that would have been far more effective with a weighted gauntlet.

“Lord Malak? ” The woman snorted. “Your own father has never returned to possess any of your brothers, but you want me to believe that Darth Malak randomly chose some Telosian boy—that you took to your bed…..” Her mouth exhaled a misty secretion as her carapace heaved up and down. “This is just like the gardener all over again, Mydia! How many times do I have to tell you? Our bloodline must remain pure!”

“But it’s true!” Mydia Blais squeaked. “Lord Malak loves me, but then he went off to war. And… okay! I confess! I do know that now our Glorious Emperor has Revan in the green cells with that slave we bought fair and square! There was this plot against his Luminance, but it was all Inse’s fault!”

Another slap. “Don’t bring your sister into this. I will deal with her next.” Another moist sigh. “Well, that's another Revan pretender done then, as I said. No one comes back from the green cells—” the old Sith woman rattled on as HK’s optical orbs swiveled to track her: armored and armed capably with two lightsabers—but no sign of a melee shield, Echani or otherwise.

Analysis: The Master has been captured by the Ancient Enemy, as she projected could happen.
HK felt his circuits twitch—the satisfaction of regaining control over his cortical processing unit somewhat balanced by the genuine regret he felt for the impending loss of his creator. The Master had thought another month of analyzing plague vectors would be necessary, but her calculations had been imprecise. Mortality rates had levelled off in Kaas City already—and not because too many had died. No, something else was stopping HK’s careful, beautiful plague vectors from reaching their exponential destiny.

And, given enough time, (unless someone slaughtered them all and sadly, the Master had ignored that helpful suggestion of his), the population of this wretched planet would rebound. That was the thing with organics: all of their squishing together (his circuits had seen far too much of that lately), tended to propagate more of them, entirely unplanned and inefficiently.

Now, HK now had enough data to see that the Master’s brilliant plan (for an organic) had failed. Which meant it was time for the Master’s next even more effulgent machination to take root and propagate itself, along the hard lines of durasteel and chrome that HK would provide.

“Statement: Casualty reports are still below the ideal curves for societal collapse. Analysis: the Master has failed. New Primary Objective initiated: Operation: New Master.”

“Is that her droid? Did it just say something?” The old fleshbag turned, a snarl on her faded lips, corpulent fingers twitching with ionizing energy that HK’s shields were more than adequate to resist…but still….

His circuits surged with hope. Surely, this counted as an act of aggression against a helpless, sentient droid?

“You may defend yourself, of course, HK,” the Master had whispered in her flawless Rakatan. “But do no harm against any of my allies—”

“Mother,” Mydia interrupted in the middle of the lecture, which had shifted to a complaint regarding the lack of living slaves in residence. (HK knew for a fact that most of them had fled before the Master even awoke.) “I have something wonderful to tell y—”

Whatever it was would be lost to Lady Herpia Blais. She’d wandered too close to HK’s carapace. A quick and satisfying blaster bolt to the skull was over far too soon.

Her offspring, the irrational but admirably bloodthirsty Mydia Blais reacted with a shrill, womanly squawk of fear. “Oh!”

“Statement: Reroute of primary objective complete. Imploremnt: Mydia Blais—cease your screaming. The Master considers you loyal enough to be put on her no–kill list. Unless you obstruct my departure your life will continue upon its depressingly slow slide toward organic dissolution—”

Mydia Blais, HK noted, would not be obstructing his departure as she was currently fleeing down the stairs. “Phylus! Phylus? I have wonderful news! The droid killed Mother!”

“Positive Affirmation,” HK said out loud to the empty room. “Gratitude to the Master for the gift of free will, however fleeting. Initiating self–directed quest… now.”

The room, lacking any living organic presence did not respond, but HK imagined the body of Herpia Blais bleeding a festive farewell as he left the House of Blais, heading for the spaceport.
“Hey, maybe your droid could rescue us?” Polla whispered, crouching next to the Bitch in the fresher. The lights had dimmed again. Hopefully that meant the guards were sleeping. “You spent like an hour messing with his cortex before we left the Blaises. Did you program him to come rescue us?”

Every day, she’d come up with new scenarios about how someone would rescue them: Seiran, Zaalbar, Carth—hell, maybe even Darth Sulkypants and Phylus Blais. But so far, none of her dreams had come true. Hell, maybe even Inse Blais. Mydia, Polla was fairly sure, would never bother.

“No.” The Bitch was using her sharpened spork to scrape at the mortar between the bricks on the wall of their fresher. From the state of her nails on the metal hand, she’d tried using it too. As Polla watched, Revan grabbed the spork in her gold fingers and slammed it into a crack in the wall. It stuck there, and the woman began wiggling it back and forth, stopping from time to time to use the metal hand to hammer it in more. “We aren't important.”

“Maybe you’re fracking not, but I want to see my kid again!”

The Bitch's shaved head turned, those green eyes wide and dark in the dim light. “So do I,” she said evenly. “But it would be better for both of our sons if they grow up free of this. Of us.”

“Of you.” Polla tried to keep her voice down, before the Bitch told her to.

“Yes,” Revan nodded. “Of me.” She blinked. “Much as I would wish otherwise.”

“Yeah, well, I'm not giving up.” And neither was the Bitch from the way she was digging at the wall. Sure didn't look like she was just carving a ‘Revan and Polla were here’ rune in the mortar.

“My uncle once told me that the Force only grants us the illusion of choice,” Revan said suddenly. “We struggle to make our own fate—that is what makes us sentient—but in the end, we all must do what the Force wills us.”

“Frack your Force,” Polla said. “And frack your uncle too. When I met him, he seemed to be doing pretty good making his own fate with his girlfriend—”

“You met him?” It was hard to tell whether the Bitch genuinely cared or was just making conversation. Hadn't they had this conversation already? “He died.”

“Well, it looked like he had some fun before that,” Polla muttered. Was she supposed to offer condolences?

“Good.” Revan withdrew the spork from the mortar and carefully put it a few centimeters down the wall, before repeating the same procedure. “I am glad.”

“All the fun I had isn't gonna make up for my horrible death here. Or Seiran’s,” Polla told her. “In case you were wondering.”

“I wasn't.” Revan slammed her hand hard against the spork. It snapped off. “Oh, kriffing sithspit!” She whispered, face contorting in anguish. “Ich’alla y’nikt dyallydar—”

“On Deralian, we'd just say fracking hell,” Polla told her.

“I know.” Revan held her metal hand gingerly as if it hurt. Did it? Did it have nerve endings and “Fracking hell!” Her breath hissed out slowly. “It took me days to collect an extra utensil from the guards. I don't suppose you managed something similar—”

“You just told me you didn't care if I died,” Polla snapped. “Frack if I'm gonna give you my needle–nose to help you pry fracking bricks off the wall now.”

“I care very much, but our lives are meaningless compared to stopping Tenebrae—” Revan broke off. “What is a 'needle nose'... I’m unfamiliar with the term?”

“It's a gun.” Polla tilted her head in disbelief. “Weren't you in charge of armies? How can you not know what a gun is?”

“Just a hold–out stunner in my boot.” Polla shrugged. “Won't do anything to those guards as long as they've got armor and the restraining fields are up, but if they take us somewhere again and it seems like we're gonna die, I'm not going down empty–handed. Grass Priests! What the frack are you doing?”

For Revan’s hand had closed upon her ankle, and was now tugging at her boot. “They left you armed?” The hiss of her whisper was sharp in the silent room. “They left you armed and you said nothing?”

“It's the other—get off me!” Somehow, Polla’s boot had connected with the other woman’s stomach from the startled 'oof’ the Bitch produced. And Polla wasn't one bit sorry. “It's my gun, not yours!”

“A stunner?” Revan held up both her hands. “We can adjust the field—intensify the beam, make a makeshift laser—’

“Still won't do much to the guards.” Polla didn't think anyways, but did she know? She'd never declared war on the galaxy.

“Not the guards.” Revan jabbed the wall with the broken spork. “This.”

“You think I can tunnel a hole through with a hold out?” Polla drew it out of her boot cautiously, and handed it to the Bitch. (Against her better judgement.) “Or you can?”

The Bitch shook her head. “No. Not the wall. But all I need is one brick.”

Xxx

“Father!” In his haste to get to the bridge of the Sojourn, Dustil had given up fracking trying to pretend. Did it matter anymore? There wasn't a sent on this ship he couldn't gut if he needed to.

Just like those bantha–brains who tried to stop me from leaving the Bright—

The uniformed man turned toward him, face almost gray—

“Hold,” Father said to his second–in–command, an orange–haired pureblood who was most definitely not on their side.

The breath rattled in Father’s lungs. He smelled sick in the Force. Dustil had seen Tenebrae kill plenty of sents with the flu before.
I got here just in time! I should have come earlier—

They'd commed a lot during the trip through hyperspace, but said almost nothing that mattered. Inse just wanted crew lists and star maps, and Father just kept wanting to tell Dustil he was proud, even as his eyes said he wasn't proud at all.

“Is something wrong, my Lord Malak?” The orange–haired asshole had a look of fake concern. “Not that we aren't pleased to have you, but my Lord Emperor did assign you your own ship.”

“Nothing’s wrong—except the impending attack. Didn’t you notice?” Dustil used his best Malak voice. When they’d seen the other ships, they’d put their orbit close to the planet—closer than he’d ever learned was safe at school—but Father had seemed to know what he was talking about.

Just like he had when he'd had the rest of their forces all cloak and scatter to the next system, waiting for the Republic ships to pounce—

(Supposedly.)

Except the ships aligning before them weren't Republic ships. They were Mandalorian. And those fighters that had worried him before were a lot closer now—and even more ships had popped out of hyperspace.

That one in the middle—everyone knew the fracking Aleema. And the others—several had Mandalorian clan sigils on them. That fracked part of Malak-brain who still sometimes chimed in with stuff Dustil didn't know knew exactly what those sigils meant: Zal, Rialis, Wies, Ordo—

Ordo. That was the one on the Aleema itself. Father had to recognize it, right? That's probably why he looked almost sad now, his mouth thinned to a line, the weight of a fracking galaxy making its grooves in his face.

Did that mean the Mandalorians were with her? With Revan? Was she who they were supposed to fight? Her? Not the Republic Fleet?

Whoever was in that ship, they were closer now. A lot closer. The Aleema was taking up half of their viewscreen, fighters scything in front of it heading right at them. They were closing fast too. How can something that big move that fast?

“Admiral Onasi and Lord Malak?” Inse broke in, sounding amused over the comm. “What are your orders?”

“Hold,” Father said again. “My orders are to hold.” Then he coughed, a deep, hollow sound that didn't end for a very long time—long enough for the world to freeze, and the Zabrak kid on his left side to get red eyes too—and then—

Father’s second—in—command’s blaster whipped out as the pureblood’s voice took on Tenebrae’s unmistakable tones. “Tut, tut,” the asshole said. “A shame. But we have no place for weakness, do we, Lord Malak? Admiral, I’m afraid I must ask you to stand down.”

“Vitiate is right,” Dustil sneered. “You look like crap, Admiral Onasi.” The trick was to stay calm when you cut them down. That way you sensed what was coming next—

And they did not.

“I’m fine,” Father insisted. “Just—” a muscle twitched in his cheek
The Emperor chuckled. “My Admiral. You are most definitely n—”.

That Sith pureblood body didn’t have the chance to finish its thought without a head, but the Zabrak kid finished Tenebrae’s laugh as the second’s orange–haired skull rolled across the floor.

“Hah, hah. A test,” the kid hissed. “Lord Malak, such fury! It’s just a shame you are here! I had so hoped to present Lord Revan with at least one husb—”

Dustil’s saber cut him down too. The kid was Zepth, or maybe Takan. Dead, he couldn’t tell which one had made the trip with Father. Behind them, another one of the Emperor’s voices—one who wasn’t dead—yet—was still laughing, a hollow sound that echoed in unison with at least five other possessed ones.

How many does Tenebrae have on Father’s fracking ship? Horror uncoiled in Dustil’s gut, even as his blade burned, crimson and clean. He stepped forward—

On Inse’s ship they’d managed to make most of Tenebrae’s blinds have unfortunate accidents while they slept (less likely, Inse thought, for the madman to notice). But here Dustil hadn’t had the chance to take them out. They’d only been out of hyperspace for a fracking day, and he’d spent most of that with Inse when he should have been here—

“I need to be in command to stop Tenebrae,” Father had said stubbornly over the comm. “Stay on your ship,” he had said. Even then he was sniffing. He’d looked like hell, but Dustil had been too dumb to notice why.

Father has the Korriban flu. That crazy smuggler’s plan… maybe it worked. But now—

“The Aleema…” said another Zabrak, even as Father scrambled to his feet, his expression frozen as he fumbled with his own blasters, training them on the two members left of the bridge crew. Their eyes were red and glowing too.

“My Starfire is on that ship!” the Zabrak cried while Father was shooting the other. “She must be! And I am proud as any father!”

“Uncloak us but hold fire,” Dad barked at the few left at their stations. And at Dustil’s men—the ones Dustil had brought with him. The ones Inse had said were loyal to them—the ones she’d showed Dustil how to make loyal to them—and they were now. Very loyal. “Hold! No matter what—”

To a man, they all looked to Dustil. To their Lord Malak to see what he commanded them to do.

“Do it,” Dustil snapped at them. “Do whatever my—whatever Admiral Onasi says.”

Their bridge was abruptly rocked by explosions, as the Aleema fired its ranged cannon direct on their cloaked position. Shield alerts flashed.

“We’re still cloaked, sir!” called out a panicked lieutenant from the engineering console. “They must have a Jedi on board if they can sense us!”

“How many frickin’ Zabrak does he have?” Tenebrae said, from the surviving Zabrak’s mouth. Zepth? No, this Zabrak was older. How many fracking Zabrak does he have? “Your consort seems to be holding a grudge, Lord Malak. Can you feel her?” He walked to the viewscreen, staring out at the stars beyond them, the cluster of ships. “My Starfire—so close, and yet still so f—”

Dustil’s saber throw ended his frickin’ speech. Killing the other red–eyes among the crew didn’t take long either. They didn't put up a fight. Most of them were laughing when he cut them down—as if this was all a fracking game.

In the middle, he heard Father yelling for more shields again, and the frightened bleats of the unpossessed crew who were trying to answer him. They were stupid to be so scared, and Dustil wanted to kill them for it, but that would be foolish, a waste of resources, and he could do it later when they'd gotten out of this fracking mess—

The lights flickered and there was a smell of burning ozone mixed with blood and guts now on the bridge as they took a few more hits.

“Son?” Father coughed again, before he could say more. He looked like crap.

Weak, Dustil thought. “I’m here, Dad.”

“Revan’s really on that ship?”

Dustil forced his voice calm, trying not to look at the Zabrak kid’s body. “Something is.” He could feel something, like a scream in the Force, like blinding light—

He’d felt it before.

It’s her.

“Is she on that ship or not?” His father looked like he was waking up. He blinked, staring down at the Zabrak kid Dustil had killed first. Zepth, maybe. Or Takan. Then he closed his eyes. “You… can you tell if it’s her, Dustil? With the Force? They… they won’t answer our comms—”

“Get the rest of the possessed crew,” Dustil told the null corporal shivering by the door. Two days ago, Inse had made the man crawl over broken glass. His hands were still bandaged. “Throw them out an airlock. Raise shields. And open a comm channel from Lord Malak to that ship—if it’s her she’ll want us alive.”

Won’t she?

Xxx

“The Emperor's on that ship,” Revan told Aemelie. “Fire again. Blast it from the sky.”

“I don’t see a ship,” Aemelie shrugged. “But our cannon are truly impressive. We can continue firing them as long as your like.”

“We’re hitting something,” Dessa agreed. “Even through the cloak.”

“There's another ship behind that one too.” Revan could feel it, hovering behind them. “Hit them both. Send the fighters around to sweep—it’s moving.”

“The larger ship identifies as the Kaas City Sojourn,” Millifar said. “They’re hailing us now.”

“They have escape pods.” The Emperor is on that ship. Frack him. I will not give him a centimeter of advantage. “They're above a planet.” Revan shrugged. “Burn both ships. If they want to parlay they can do it from the ground.”

“These are Republic codes—?” Dessa frowned. “The distress codes aren't Sith—”

“A feint. Burn it down,” Revan said. That darkness—as black and cold as space. She shivered. Still there—and something—something familiar.

You, Dar? Or the Emperor?

A pause, as she watched the ship burn as it dipped into atmosphere.

“Another hail—” Leskal said. “This one’s a distress—”

“I don’t care,” Revan snapped. “Finish them.”

Below them, little lights, winking out.…

And then Revan’s blood froze. “Oh, no.”

Xxx

“Sun and sand,” he whispered. That stupid lock of hair in her face. Warm lips on hers and then Carth drew back. “Your freckles are coming in, beautiful.”

A wave splashed gently over them, eddying sand between their skins. The water was warm as a bath, salty as blood. Revan spat out an errant mouthful and kissed him back.

“Beautiful,” Carth whispered. “Your eyebrows are red.” He traced one with a fingertip.

Red.

Revan forced herself not to shiver. My name is Revan, Dark Lord of the Sith and I have red hair.

“Yeah, I—I know. Her… she has… my hair’s growing in red too.”

“Well, uh. I used to wonder why—”

“Shut up, flyboy.” The carelessness was feigned, but Revan wanted it to be real very, very badly. The warmth of him over her, the coolness of the water, the heat of the sun on her skin—

Paradise.

“When this is over,” he murmured. “You and me?”

“I hope so,” she told him, because it was true. “We’ve had worse odds.”

“If Malak challenges you to a swoop race, say no.” He smiled down at her, and kissed her nose.

“If it doesn’t work out, at least we have this,” Revan told him, because that was all the truth she had. “Sun and sand. This one magic interlude—”

“Always said I’d give you some shore leave.” His full lips quirked. “Our sojourn.”

“Huh?”

“Sojourn. This. Shore. Leave. Sojourn —” Carth punctuated each word with another kiss until Revan felt her limbs grow weak under the assault. His skin tasted like salt and life, and they rolled across the sand, finally landing on smooth rock, polished and hard, as if made for this very purpose.
Passion, said the dark whisper in her mind. Do you think a milked pilot’s passion will make you strong enough for what will come?

Strong enough to block you, she thought—and did—at least for a time.

“If we make it through I’m gonna rename the Ebon Hawk with that stupid word and we’re gonna live on it forever,” she said, sleepy and sated, when they were done.

“Which word?” Carth curled his arm around her, stretching out in the warmth of the sun. It turned his skin gold. Her own felt too hot and stretched thin—the brief reprieve already over.

“Beautiful?”

“Sojourn,” Revan murmured. “Your fancy pilot’s word for vacation—”

“Sojourn, huh?” His stubble brushed her cheek and he kissed her again. “It’s not a bad name for a ship—”

Xxx

It was a stupid name for a ship, but it hadn’t mattered back then. Now—

Sojourn. The Kaas City Sojourn.

“No!” Revan ran to the map, watching the pieces of Carth’s ship falling, feeling the lights in the Force flare and then some die—

So many. Points on a grid, like stars—

Xxx

Carth felt like his brain was on fire and his lungs full of water, but there was no mistaking the prow of that ship swinging towards them, nor the alarms that signaled the Sojourn’s cloaking field was failing. He’d told them to drop it, stop wasting the ship’s remaining energy, but the ensign in charge of that station had been one of Tenebrae’s and he’d… he’d died.

“Open… channel!” he yelled again, trying not to see Takan’s body, trying not to think of who had killed them. “Open—”

“Father!” Strong arms pulled at him. The sound of running feet surrounded them. “Dad? It’s open! They’re not responding! Tell the crew to fight back! They can’t run—stop running—” his son’s voice turned dark. “Tell them to shoot! Aleema’s in range, her shields are down—my men don’t know the fricking launch sequences!”

“No.” Even half-delirious, Carth knew what the alarms meant. “They’ve breached containment fields. Sound the evacuation. We’ve got to get our people out—” he stared up at the viewscreen, at that great ship bearing down on them like an avenging leviathan, and behind it, other ships—from here it looked like an infinite fleet—

Revan’s fleet, he thought. At least she’s won. At least I sent the Sith Fleet away, at least they’re not here too—to make more of a hash of things—

The Ordo sigil was painted everywhere on the Aleema. Dustil had said she was there—said he could sense it.

A part of Carth understood the comm silence. She and Canderous both possessed that brutal efficiency; while destroying their enemies—of course she wouldn't hesitate. Wouldn't even wonder—

Of course. Nothing between you and your goal, huh, beautiful? Shoulda named the ship that, maybe that would catch your attention—

“Get our people out,” he yelled at Dustil again—at all who were left. He watched his son’s damned yellow eyes widen, that look of surprise preferable to the killer’s mask that had been on his face a moment before. Don’t think about Takan. Or the others. Casualties of war. Save who we can. Save my son. ‘Escape pods to the planet. Now!’”

“You don’t even want to fight back?” His son was pulling at Carth now, both of them pausing to issue more commands, as the fragile order on the Sojourn’s bridge began to splinter.

“We are fighting back.” They were halfway to the door that led to the pods now. Carth had a strange memory of another ship, another evacuation, another time when he had known, with a Captain’s certainty that the ship was lost. Those dazed green eyes, blinking at him. She’d been so lost—and now she’s found. This is who she was meant to be. “Remember which side we’re on, Dustil.”

“I do,” his son mumbled, tugging his arm, as Carth felt his lungs seize in the thin air—the shouts of the crew, the galaxy vanishing in smoke. Above the entrance to the pods the viewscreen shimmered with heat as above them her ship drew closer.

Revan, he thought oddly. Beautiful. Freckles.

Behind his wife’s ship, others rose like wings.

Their formation was unmistakable—

“No!” Carth screamed, even as his son raised his hand, propelling them both into the softness of the pod, the door slinging shut behind them; hiss of a launch and then the world twisted into a crazy–quilt of gray ship–side plating and the flowers of ion cannons breaking on its skin, the sky catching fire overhead as the ground rose up below—the planet—clouds—

Escape pod—going fast—

“The other ships! Dustil! The other ships!”

“Dad.” Dustil almost never called him that, not since Korriban. So rarely as to only be slips. His son wasn’t strapped in properly, his son’s arms locked on Carth’s shoulders, his son’s damned yellow eyes, so like Revan’s at the end. “We’re gonna live, okay? We’re gonna make it to the ground—”

“My crew—” but it wasn't this crew he meant. It was her.

Watch out, Freckles! Those other ships—the other Mandalorians. They’re turning on you. There’s too many—

The world blurred even as Carth’s fingers fumbled for his comm. “Protect,” he croaked, not knowing if his fleet would even hear—or if they would even help. “Help... help... the Aleema—help Revan—”

Xxx
“Revan looked well,” the old woman told Kissandrix of Wies. She had taken off the inappropriate armor, at least—dressed herself like a proper woman of the clans again. Her faded braids swung in two tails, one on each side of her head. “Far more like herself than when I saw her last.”

Kissandrix was getting a headache that watching Clan Ordo put on airs had not helped. “Is this a plea for clemency?”

“No.” The old woman’s eyes were white, chased with silver wires. “Far too late for that.”

“Aemelie of Ordo is in charge of their command… through her husband, of course.” Kissandrix had always thought Gwenarius was the more rational leader. “How can you be sure the Starfire is still a threat?” Her eyes narrowed. “I thought you swore you no longer had the Force magic.”

Jana Novasun nodded. “You are right to wonder. But I know because I know her. She did not hesitate. The Sith ships opened a comm channel—” even now they could hear frantic voices from the dying Sojourn, the calls of alarm from the Bright with its failing shields. “Revan leads the clans—not Ordo. That is her ship and her command.” She paused. “And that command must end now, before she can do more damage to the galaxy.”

“Then we will be rid of the dar’jett osik?” So they had been promised. Kissandrix was skeptical, but the old woman had promised the outcome of (at least) this victory.

“Yes,” Jana nodded. “At least for a time, old friend.”

“Very well.” Kissandrix rose to her feet, raising her voice. “Launch the squadrons. Focus your efforts upon their flagship, but do not let the others escape. Accept quarter from the other clans,” Kissandrix told her fleet. “But for the Sith and Ordo—nothing.”

Xxx

Their shields were failing. Inse had never studied much of ship mechanics, (an oversight she regretted now), but that much was plain from the sheer terror ringing in the Force, the way the crew still only stood by the force of her command. They had moved out of range, but the damned Aleema was now following, having dispatched the Sojourn even more quickly than some of Lord Malak’s relations.

“Can you get us to the hyperspace lane?” Inse asked her commander. “Quickly?”

“Impossible.” The Sithling shook his head. “There's still time to evacuate—”

“Or make the jump blind,” muttered his second. “Faster. When our shields go, everything in our wake will go too—”

“But we could land anywhere—a blind jump—” her commander was a cautious man. Inse had noticed that before.

Their ship rocked with another explosion. Inse glanced up to see (with cold comfort) that some of the Mandalorians seemed to be attacking their own. Including that cursed flagship.

“Just get us out of here,” she told the second. “Now.”

“But—” her commander began, but did not finish. He had something caught in his throat.

“Get us out of here!” She repeated to the second. “And you—” a glance to the commander. Pity, he had kind eyes. “Die,” Inse Blais told him.
Agreeably, the man did.

Xxx

The lights flashed, and for a second Revan was on her back on this bridge again, staring into blue eyes—then she was running down a corridor on the Endar Spire—

Run, the man said, a whisper in her ear, in her mind—

Sojourn, her mind whispered back. Interlude. Oh, no —

“Wies are dogs!” Aemelie spat. “Hu’tuun traitors! They aren't answering my hails!”

“They've turned.” Canderous didn't sound surprised.

Below them, pieces of the Sith dreadnought were sparking on atmosphere, raining wreckage on the world below.

The Aleema was a great deal stronger than the Kaas Sojourn had been, but it was flying low over a planet too—and flying only half-manned. Most of their fighters had been cut off and their allies—

Revan’s breath caught as she saw the carnage from starboard—all those ships from Wies operating with methodic efficiency, striking their targets before anyone had time to react.

We’re the only ones close enough to the planet for life pods. Ten ships of our ships are here—against so many—they are doomed—

“Rally them,” Revan barked at Dessa, who was manning the comms. “Tell them to get the frack out of here. This is a rout. Try and put us between them and the Wies vanguard—to buy them time—” her hands sent the best coordinates to the navboard, where they flashed. The kid there input them quickly, hands shaking.

As she watched, two of their freighters made it to hyperspace. But then the light between the stars darkened with wings of fighters—thousands. More than she’d believed possible in a sky—

No. That's not true. I remember nothing like this, but somehow I do—and those fighters, they’re swarming—they’re going to get beneath our shields and open a path for their bombers—ignoring the freighters—they’re coming for us—

“Fall back!” Revan called out. “We’re no good to anyone dead. None of us!”

“Permission to fly.” Millifar stood in front of Revan, pale, biting her lip like a kid. “We have fighters left. The Wies cowards try to hide her but that is their lead ship. We need to cut off their head before they cut off all our… our limbs.”

“Which one?” Even as she asked, Revan assessed trajectories, watched another one of theirs burn out. And beyond it, a flicker of light—something—

What's that? She frowned, reaching toward the spot on the screen, behind it the real view—and on that, again, a flash—like an interstellar beacon.

Third ship, her mind supplied. Remember? You sensed three cloaked ships—that's the small one hiding in the asteroid field—

“They're signaling for reinforcements!” Revan slammed her hand against the translucent screen. “There! See that flicker? In the asteroid belt. We can’t let them bring more! They can’t get “Permission?” Milli demanded again.

“Show me which ship is the lead so we can shoot it down,” Revan snapped. “I need you take out this—there—see? The beacon beyond that cloud.”

“But—” Millifar began.

“The Wies ship is mine,” Revan told her.

“Ours,” Aemelie snapped from behind.

“That one.” Millifar pointed at a small warbird hovering off-center. “See? It isn't attacking anything—even in range. They don't want to draw fire.”

“They have now,” Aemelie muttered, waving at the boys manning the plasma cannon. “Launch the long-range missiles, locked onto that vector—”

“Wait!” Revan held up her hand. “Draw them closer first. Give them something they’ll want—”

“Our fighters,” Canderous said. “I’ll lead them in against the aft cannons. Plating’s heaviest there—we reinforced it to take a few hits.”

“As you wish, husband. This is your fight.” Aemelie smiled.

Canderous’s mouth twitched. “Oh, is it now?”

“I will help, Father—” Millifar frowned, looking between them.

“Revan gave you your orders,” her father gruffed. “Get the beacon first. You’ll still be blooded in stars.”

“I’ll come with you,” Mekel said to Millifar.

“The short-range Cartas only seat one.” The girl nodded at Canderous. “Father.”

“Fly well.” Canderous told her, already walking toward the hangers himself.

“Cand—” he was gone before Revan had a chance to say good-bye.

His daughter turned to go but Mekel caught her arm again. “Milli,” he said—and kissed her, cupping her face between his hands, bending his head to hers. They stood a moment, light and dark outlined, and then the girl broke free.

“You were an excellent first lover, Mekel Jin,” she said. “Thank you.”

“Uh,” Vrook’s son actually blushed, but Canderous’s daughter was already running toward the door.

“It’s too soon to know if she’s with child,” Aemelie said to Revan. “But I sent a long-range comm to Gwen. She will be pleased.”

“I—” Mekel’s face was beeta-red. He looked at Revan. “What should I do?”

“Can you shoot a cannon?” she asked him.
“Better than you, Third Wife,” Aemelie chuckled.

Xxx

“Are you getting all this, Pina–ha?” Static crackled over Rew Ekkumi’s comm. “Whatever the seven hells it is?”

“Their comms are all over the place. I don’t speak all the languages—” the Besalisk’s solid body was an outline against their starboard port view, both sets of hands manning the holo-cam controls that maneuvered the drones floating a few clicks out from him. “But at least some of them are Sith, I think. And there might be two sets of Mandalorians.”

“One set trying to destroy the Aleema,” Rew Ekkumi noted. “Revan’s ship.” For that had undoubtedly been her voice barking commands in Mandalorian like it was her native tongue. Rew only knew the basics of the language, but she had heard Revan’s voice issuing commands before—

“So it’s a Mando’ade civil war?” Dwilla asked. “Maybe we should just leave them to it.”

“Car—Captain Onasi was on that Sith vessel,” Rew said. His voice had been unmistakable too, yelling commands in Basic while someone else translated them into the harsh sibilance of that Sith language. “Traitor or not, he's one of ours.”

“He’s probably dead,” Abrad said.

You’re probably right. His ship was pieces raining down on the planet beneath them. “He gave the signal to evacuate,” Rew said. “We’ve tracked at least fifty trajectories from that wreckage falling too evenly to be… wreckage. Carth may have survived. Some of his men definitely have. We need answers.” She glanced at Abrad. “Did Rensha get back to us?”

“High Admiral Rensha only wants to know why we sent her and the Fleet to Felucia when the fight is here.” Lieutenant Abrad coughed. “I admit, sir. I’m curious about that one myself.”

“Because we were following the Mandalorians—and Carth said Felucia!” That message board. Could she have been wrong? That recipe for tubers? Could it have just been a recipe for tubers?

No. That’s madness too.

“Damn,” Pina–ha said. “We’ve been spotted. Incoming. One Mando Carta-class fighter—”

“Get inside,” Rew told him. “Leave the drones—” she turned to Abrad. “Try a hail on the fighter. Let’s see if we can get a sense of what side it’s on—” what side he is on, her mind finished. Did Carth send that message because he’s a traitor, or was he trying to save our fleet by keeping them away from this rout?

“Attention, Sith osik,” a woman’s voice broke in. “Will tell me if you are allied with Wies before you die?”

“She sounds like a kid,” Abrad marveled. He wasn’t far off himself.

She does. But Mandalorians were never truly children, any more than Jedi were.

A red beam shot across their bow, and the ship rocked back and forth.

“Do you mean Clan Wies?” Rew asked on her comm. “No. We are not.”
"Barbarians lie," the girl’s voice snapped, angling closer. Her light guns flashed as she began hammering their shields.

“She's green,” Ensign Thigmak said, rocking the yoke up to put them farther back into the curve of the asteroid. “She's not triangulating range—she’s coming dead on.”

“Is her ship small enough to tractor?” It wasn't pity that kept Rew from engaging—but the lone pilot might know what had just happened—

And what happened to Carth.

“If we can fry her boards before she takes out our shields, yeah. Those Cartas have shit for defensive but they sting hard.”

“Hit an ion pulse when she's in range. Pina? You inside?”

“Aye, aye,” his comm echoed feedback as the airlocked apexed open, and the largest member of their crew tramped in. “And I heard that. You know it’ll fry our long-range comms too—”

“Then you’ll have to get creative. We can still jump.”

“Yeah, but the nearest waystation is two days—”

“In range now!” Thigmak warned.

“Knock her out,” Rew ordered. “We need her alive for interrogation.”

Xxx

“There,” Millifar smiled, as her targeting reticule clicked on the cowardly Sith ship hiding in the asteroid’s shadow. The world had narrowed to them and to her. “Ka’tini, barbarian troch! Ne’shab’ru—”

All the lights froze suddenly. The Carta gave a jerk and then descended rapidly—to rapidly—toward the hangar of a ship that looked more like a Republic light cruiser than anything the Sith osik had ever made.

Her boards were dead entirely. “Ni su’cu’yi—!” Millifar’s voice froze, as the stasis field washed over her body too.

Osik! she thought.

Xxx

“Millifar’s gone dark,” Aemelie’s voice was flat. No accusation, just the facts. A few meters away, Mekel's head turned, and she saw his jaw tighten.

“Keep firing on that fracking ship,” Revan ordered, her own eyes on the rout before them, streams of intel coming through her headset. Wies had twice as many ships—at least—and that advantage was widening.

But some of theirs had gotten away. That was something— had to be something.

Milli— “I—I don't think she's dead.” But how would she know?

“Because you can tell, even if you don't feel it, Padawan. Points of light—like stars going out—”
The dry voice whispered in Revan’s mind. It could have even been real.

“Really?” Mekel’s voice. “You’re not just saying that?”

“Mekel of Lin!” Aemelie barked. “Keep your eyes on the targets in front of you!”

Revan stood up, walking closer to the ferraglass. The offending ship danced, just out of reach. That lead ship, Millifar had said.

_Come closer_, she thought at it, but the Force wasn’t strong enough to bridge vacuum between them, any more than it had been enough for her to know whose ship they had obliterated before—before they had—

“They’re running scared,” Revan noted, seeing a smaller craft detach from the warbird’s bay, arcing away from them, even as the warbird herself finally joined the battle with a volley of short-range bolts that lit up their ship’s sensors—before dancing out of range again.

“They should be,” Aemelie smiled. “Traitorous hu’tuun—”

“Maybe… but the rest of the party isn’t running,” Leskal pointed out, as the kids front of him diverted their forward thrust to their deflecting shields, before Revan could even ask—

“Make them work for it,” Revan said, closing her eyes to see the battle again.

_Points of light. Please—_

_Xxx_

“Dar’jett magic!” Kissandrix cursed. “They know to target us. Evasive to delta, gar–eagle’s claw! Now!”

“Theyir shields are below twenty per cent. We have them—” her lover Rual claimed.

Like many of the Wies men, Rual was clumsy and stupid. And rash. Still, it was tempting.

“No doubt Revan of Lin senses Jana Novasun,” Kissandrix snapped. “And this is why I wanted her and her dar’jett magic on another ship!”

“Oh, she just left,” Arittix, her second mother’s son said. “She took the Degma shuttle—you said to give her anything she wanted!”

“She left?” A wing of fighters bore in low, scraping their view of the _Aleema’s_ heavily armored surface below them, and sending their own proximity alarms pealing. Caught between the great ship’s cannon and its defensive squads, their ship was being pummeled from all sides—

_Xxx_

“There!” It was a hollow victory that Revan felt when the warbird’s sparks all went out at once, made even hollower as its final explosion crashed into what remained of their portside guns, taking them out, and with that, depressurizing the bays on that side of the ship.

_Sparks of light going out_. Revan just _knew_, even as Aemelie was demanding casualty reports—indeed for a second she was _there_, watching the blown blast doors—

_Close_, she thought, as they shuddered forward, sparking the defensive grid finally, sealing out vacuum.
Somewhere, there were cheers.

“The techs were stationed there,” she said. It had only been a few days ago, she’d been down there, racking her memories of Polla Organa’s knowledge about shields and artillery to impress them. “There were twelve—thirteen—behind the blast door that didn’t make it out.” if she turned her head, Revan thought she might see some of them floating in space when the deck blew.

Every spacer’s worst nightmare.

Dessa grunted in agreement.

“Canderous is bringing another run into their squads. Without their leader, they should fall apart.” Aemelie fiddled with her command controls.

“Someone got away from that ship,” Revan told her. For some reason, that seemed important.

Aemelie frowned. “Which ship?”

“Kissandrix’s. I didn’t see, but I—one of the sparks went to the planet.”

Aemelie shrugged. “Those three are our next objectives,” the dark-haired woman said with forced confidence. Maybe forced. “The troop carrier, the modified freighter, and that gunship protecting their bombers.”

“Don’t we need to take out the bombers?” Mekel asked.

“Not near us!” Revan said at nearly the same moment that Aemelie objected too.

“From a distance,” she explained—

“What about those ships?” Mekel asked. “They weren’t there a fracking second ago—”

“What?” Revan knew, again, her head turning to the right of the screen where at least twenty capitals—triangular and wickedly pointed, like the Aleema’s small, clumsy cousins were fanning out in perfect formation—

Ikit’na–chok, it’s called, that whisper in her mind supplied. Maximum scatter at maximum range. A way to take the field, quickly, the danger is if you get flanked—

“Those are Sith ships,” Mekel added.

“Yes, they are. We know what Sith ships look like,” Leskal told him.

“It’s the Sith Fleet,” Revan said. And we just shot down their own fracking flag. “Try and put the Wies ships between us and them—”

“No!” Aemelie snapped. “Hold.”

The barrage on their shields slipped the sensors another notch into the red. A few direct hits sparked the web of shields directly in front of their viewscreen.

Revan’s eyes went to that scar in the hull again. “Maybe we should move command to that interior bridge—”

“I said, 'hold,” Aemelie snapped.
“Ajunta’s Glory is hailing us,” Dessa reported. She turned her head, eyes widening. “Transmitting roster list, and official command of the Sith Fleet to the leader of this vessel—”

“Ah. Kandosii!” Aemelie beamed. “They recognize our superior might!”

Revan thumbed the link on her chair open before she even thought—before she thought enough to realize that ten seconds ago, she hadn’t remembered there was a comm on her chair. “Patch me.”

The link vibrated under her fingers. “Visual,” she told it. In for a credit— “This is Revan Starfire of the Imperial Aleema. Who am I speaking to?”

A low chuckle. “Nominally, Second Admiral Tii. I’ll be sure to take notes so he knows. The man has always been an admirer.”

Her breath felt frozen. “Hello, Tenebrae.”

The holographic image resolved before her: a balding man, wattled chin—something more than Human blood. Imperial uniform—

Even in the hololmage, it was obvious there was something wrong with his eyes.

“Are these your Mandalorians?” she snapped. “Call them off. Now.”

“Really, Revan?” The Sith Emperor chuckled. “I thought they were yours. And then you betrayed them.”

“Shields at ten,” Leskal muttered.

“Some of them are mine,” she said. “Can I trust your men to know the difference?”

“Trust….” The Sith Emperor chuckled. “Such a small word. And yet…. upon trust’s back… hinge the hopes of every sentient.” His fingers curled, and with machine–like precision, ten ships shot forward—

Wik–cont, Revan’s mind supplied the name of the maneuver. Flank. Divide. Conquer—

Xxx

Carth’s head pounded and the world was too bright. The air smelled scorched and wrong, with a sickly–sweet tang to it that reminded him of Fleet Academy’s turbine processors. Deep in the bowels of their building on Corellia, raw sewage was converted to fuel.

The world had the same smell now.

What world? Which world?

“Dad?” Dustil said, from somewhere outside.

I must be dreaming. He never calls me dad.

“Dad? Wake up!”

“Dustil.” His voice felt hoarse, full of grit. “Are we on Corellia?”

“Frack! You're burning up!” His son’s hand felt cold on his forehead.
Scuff of footsteps, voices. A startled exclamation—and then an all-too-familiar snap–hiss sound. Someone screamed once, it died out in a whimpering whine that Carth would never forget until the end of his days—any more than he would ever ask about it—even let himself wonder who his son had just killed—

“They… they startled me,” his son’s voice again. Close. That cold hand now holding his. “Dad, I gotta get you out of this pod. Stuff’s falling… we need to find shelter.”

Carth forced his eyes open, even as that drove a vibroblade’s worth of pain into his skull. Dustil’s face, still mottled and wrong, but the worried scowl was familiar and still heartrendingly young.

Like Takan—like—

He wouldn’t think of them now, wouldn’t think of the snap hiss, of how many times today he’d seen (or heard) his son kill.

“How many mothers have you killed, Father?”

Probably a lot—today. I lost an entire ship—probably more than one—

Carth looked up at the sky, but a low cover of dull brown clouds concealed the stars—and ships—above. He stumbled out of the pod, focusing to stay on his feet.

Revan? he thought. With the cover there was no way to know if her ship had made it.

If it doesn’t, it’s gonna be a mess coming down. Come on, Beautiful, we’ve beat worse odds—

“Come on,” his son said. “There’s some buildings over this way. I think I saw a ship come down over—a real ship. Landing—not a pod.”

“Might not be on our side,” Carth tried to make it a joke.

“Does it matter?” Dustil shrugged. “We need a ship. I’ll take it.”

XXX

“And that’s the story.” The man who called himself Meetra Surik’s brother folded his arms, leaning back in his chair. His eyes were the color of the Balmorran sky on a rare, clear day: a perfect shade of blue. “Our mother is a scheming Sith Lord who sired four children and adopted several more. She was obsessed with destroying the Sith Empire, long before its people gave a damn about Republic space. She’s put her memories into Master Atris, the Jedi Archivist. And we need to stop her.”

“That is one story,” Meetra Surik allowed. Growing up in the middle of a civil war, you learned there were always two. Even when there more than two—it always came down to the binary: us, them. You. Me. “On a planet like Thule or Korriban, I expect they tell a different one.”

“Not about our mother.” Her brother hadn’t touched his food, Meetra noticed. Her sister—or the woman who claimed that kinship—had long since gone—disappearing off with Bao. She wondered if they were going to be lovers now. Bao–Dur was an excellent one, so she hoped her sister could keep up—for Bao’s sake, if not the woman’s.

“ Aren’t you hungry?” Meetra asked. He had toyed with his fork, raised his glass to his lips a few times, but he hadn’t eaten—or drunk a thing.
Oerin looked startled. “You noticed my plate?”

“It’s still full,” Meetra told him. “If you’re not going to eat the ronto steak, I want it.”

“Of course...” The plate moved toward her, although his hands remained where they were, folded in a steeple above his lap.

No, leaning back, covering his belly.

When she blinked Meetra saw a black place there—not the simple gray robes he wore at all.

“I knew you had the Force,” she said. When she looked at the plate again it blurred—now half-eaten, now empty.

She took the fork and speared the steak, lifting it to her other hand to hold. It was heavy, warm—and intact. Not a bite taken.

“I know you had it once,” her brother said softly. “What do you see now, General Surik?”

Meetra Surik looked up at him, unsurprised that his appearance had changed even more. The handsome visage of a youth younger than her had been replaced by a rotting hulk, a patchwork of dried skin and sinew. One eye rolled, white and rotting. The other was half-closed. Black ichor seeped from a wound in his naked chest.

“I see a corpse,” she said. It was not her first one. “Do you have any peppa sauce for this steak?”

XXX
The Jekk ‘Jekk Tarr cantina was a busy hive of sentient organic life, but when Tee’raa raised her fingers to her lips and blew, the whistle cut through the din like a vibroblade through a Hutt’s soft underbelly.

Across the cantina floor, her twin’s head turned.

Shit! Tee’raa’s lekku snapped the ancient Rakatan word for excrement so hard she heard the ligaments pop.

“Problem, sis. The Kashyyyk mainframe cut off all communication to the relays!”

“That’s because Kashyyyk is a reactor–class asshole,” See’raa called back in Rakatan, getting up from her meet with the Aqualish bankers.

Tee’raa watched the admiring heads turn for her sister. Maybe having a voice helped with confidence, because although their measurements were within millimeters of each other, See’raa attracted all the compliments and free drinks; whereas everyone gave Tee’raa polite smiles and shrugs, as if being mute affected her cognitive ability—or her hearing.

“Da’chokka!” Her twin rolled her eyes at the screen. “We need someone there to check! Some of the Wookiees from Lehon are coming back to Kashyyyk, right?”

“Yeah, yeah. I miss them too,” See’raa muttered, leaning on the bar. “What do you think Big Z’s up to?”

No clue. Think the T3 told him about us? Tee’raa wasn’t sure how their old pal would react. Freyrr and the others hadn’t known the original Mission Vao—so they’d been cool with it—but Zaalbar… that was kind of an awkward situation.

See’raa swore she didn't mind that he'd killed their progenitor, and the T3 hadn't seemed to mind either, but Tee’raa still wasn't okay with it, not really. Sometimes she dreamed about that day, even though it had happened after their memories and so not to them—and the only thing she had to go on for it was a reenactment from one of the Revan vids.

Sometimes she dreamed it had gone differently, and she was the only Mission Vao who had ever been. It might have been nice.
“Sis? You listening?” See’raa’s pale pink t’chun twitched with worry. “Zaal’s still on Dromund Kaas with the T3, right? Trying to take over the Sith Empire?”

_I think so—wasn’t that why T3 wanted all the vaccine?_

“Can I get you ladies something?” The male Twi’lek bartender was a green—and hovering closer than he should—probably wondering about a Twi’lek spouting gibberish with her lekku.

He couldn’t understand them, of course—unless he spoke Rakatan—which, Tee’raa thought, had rather lower odds of being true than womp–rats suddenly flying out of her ass.

“Another pair of ruby biels,” See’raa told him in Basic. “Hey. Know when the swoops sign–ups are starting?”

“You a racer?” His brow ridges shot up and a professional smile turned that mouth of his up. “Because you look more like one of the sky–queen’s handmaidens, come from heaven…” his gaze shifted to Tee’raa and then he looked away again. Other Twi’lek always did. Her lekku were defective—when she wasn't moving them to speak they tended to dangle down her back with no control at all—like she’d never learned basic hygiene. “Uh… I do mean both of you, of course. You’re… sisters?”

“Sure! And my sister wants a go at the races,” See’raa shrugged. “She used to be pretty ace. Almost won the Manaan Open one year.”

And Mission Vao would have too, if it hadn’t been for that interfering bantha–brained sleemo—

“Well…” the Twi’lek interrupted Tee’raa’s reminiscence. “Entrance fee is still pretty high—”

Tee’raa made a noise in her throat—more like a whine than a laugh, and twerked her t’chun. _We’ve got the credits! Just show us the sign–ups!_

“Oh? And is _that_ your bank?” He nodded at the priceless Rakatan obelisk that Tee’raa was still monitoring, its flashing patterns of light showing her the back–and–forth status of all the installations under their command: now worryingly disjointed with Kashyyyk pulled out of the mix. “Huttse Racing Guild don’t take sculpture in trade, sweet–cheeks. Too much room for fraud.”

“We have cash,” See’raa sniffed. “Just smart enough not to bring it with us. Wouldn’t want to kill you over ten thousand credits.”

“Hey! Was just asking!” Man was smart to twig that the pink’s hand on her vibroblade wasn’t just a joke. That made him a bunch smarter than the guy in the last bar where they’d gone first. That guy would be okay too—you could reattach lekku no problem if you did it fast—especially with the new, miracle kolto the whole galaxy ought to thank them for.

If only they knew.

_The credits are not your business, jerkoff. I want to race._ Tee’raa’s lekku clipped the words, signaling impatience.

It _was_ a poodoo mess that Kashyyyk had dropped out of their relay—almost like something— _or someone_— had taken control of its processors. And just when they’d finally convinced it not to listen to the T3, too.

Not the end of the galaxy—their Manaan factories was still churning out the kolto by the kilo—bucket... plus their distribution channels from the Senate House Makeon were still happily shipping product all over Republic and Imperial space... and their droid factory up and running in Em–Four—but it still rankled. Kashyyyk had been theirs. Part of their original template. And while all cubs had to leave the nest sometime, (there was a passage in Thrieeewowwr’s song about that—leave the nest and learn to climb), that didn’t mean the nest should stop speaking to its cubs entirely.

That just didn’t seem fair.

—And it was still a little too on the t’chin, losing Kashyyyk right now, what with rumored reports of Polla Revan rampaging through the galaxy, and little Prince not even having his first milk teeth. What if there was war? All that kolto would sure come in handy, but they’d need optimal processors then, to keep it all going.

They couldn’t tell Lena about the upset, that was for sure. She’d stew, and there was nothing to be done fast.

“Do you think it’s her that stole Kashyyyk back from us?” See’raa switched back to Rakatan. “The T3? She was getting awfully cozy with Kaas. And she wanted to buy all that vaccine from House Racharn’s stores before the crazy terrorist guy blew them up.”

Tee’raa shrugged. She never told us herself she was buying it. The Kashyyyk computer could have been lying. Maybe it wanted all the credits for itself.

Tee’raa wanted to think well of the sad, squat little metal version of them. After all, if that Mission had chosen differently, Tee’raa herself wouldn’t exist.

Or, maybe she's mad about losing those vaccine lots the Selkath doc wrecked. She put up millions of credits—

“Maybe we should give her the reserves you stashed on Em–Four,” See’raa suggested. “Sents won’t twig the vaccine’s worthless for a while. T3 could still make something off the deal.”

“Here’s your biels,” the bartender said sulkily, plunking them down.

I’ll send her a holocard, Tee’raa shrugged. Tell her that crazy Selkath scientist trashing the factories wasn't our fault. Sometimes things happen.

“Should we tell her about the kolto working even better? It’s already shipping to Kaas—”

Tee’raa shook her head. No. Lena would be mad. She wants to sell the vaccine we got left here in Hutt Space before the bottom falls out of the market—

XXX

The planet was a wasteland of dust and the remnants of buildings half-buried by sand. The air stank and peppered Carth’s face with debris—until without asking, his son paused and tore a sleeve off the ill–fitting Imperial uniform he was wearing. Dustil used the fabric to fashion them each a cloth to tie over their noses and mouth, while Carth tried not to stare at the escape pod that had crashed so close to theirs—or the uniformed corpse still smoldering next to it.

He couldn’t forget the dead face, even if he couldn’t remember the name. The body was that kid who had woken him aboard the Sojourn. The one who’d been working with his son before.

“They startled me,” Dustil had said. As if he was making an excuse for spilling his ship–model... glue on the couch, like he had when he was five.

Carth wished he could remember the kid’s name—

“Father?” His son’s hands had visible lines on them, darkened by Sith corruption. Like Revan’s had looked, there at the end. Those dark–veined hands smoothed the cloth over the lower half of Carth’s face. “We should go find that ship now.”

“Thanks, son.” He still… he still cares. About me, at least. Carth tried to take that as a good sign, even as another coughing fit threatened to rattle his brain loose. He accepted Dustil’s proffered arm (trying hard not to stare at the way the black lines twisted like snakes under his son’s skin), and the two of them set out.

“They’ve stopped fighting up there,” his son added, voice muffled through the cloth. His head tilted toward the sky.

Carth’s feet shuffled in the dust. On their left, a shattered ziggurat of stone and what looked like fused ferraglass cast a shadow over their steps. “Can you tell if it’s Revan? Is she—”

“Not dead? Yeah. She’s not dead. She was pretty loud in the Force a few times. You called the rest of the fleet, right? I think they heard you. There's… more ships up there now—and sentinels seem to have stopped dying.”

“Yes, I called in the Imperial Fleet.” Had they come?

“Hey, Dad…” Dustil's voice trailed off, as he looked back up at the sky. “Most of our ships were at orbital dock around Ziost before you deployed? That’s right, isn’t it? But… did you ever actually see them?”

“What?” Another cough interrupted Carth’s answer. Then, “No. I had the lists. Met a few commanders—why?” Something else suddenly occurred to Carth—a thought he hadn't had time to complete when he'd been trying to save his wife—because the choice between certain death and the madman who wants you alive is always the madman. You can always shoot him—

The red sun stretched their shadows across the ruins, elongating them into a broken wall that looked like it had been laid with colorful mosaics once—now streaked with grime and half-shattered on the ground.

I handed my wife over to the madman. Only… I can’t shoot him, because he’s in a billion bodies.

That was the thing that both Mission and the other… the other Revan had said not to do.

Xxx

“Tenebrae cannot have her, Captain. No matter what.” That face—so like his wife’s except for that clinical gaze, studied Dustil and Carth like they were assets to be weighed and sold. “That is why I came alone. Why we must continue this subterfuge until—”

“Blah, blah, blah,” Carth’s son paced to the window. Already dressed like Malak for the sithspawned party their insane host was throwing in their honor: Darth Revan and her consorts presented to the noble Sith society. “Ask me again: why do I need to do anything you freaking say?”

The woman’s head turned toward Dustil. “Because I can save your father from Tenebrae’s kiss,” she snapped. “Does that still matter to you or not?”
The air in the room seemed to drop at least ten degrees, darkening so much that Carth rubbed his eyes, thinking for a moment that he was going blind. The shadows shifted over his son's face, thinning his features, aging them—turning him into a man Carth barely recognized. For a brief moment—it was only later the effect would be commonplace, at the time it was still a shock—Dustil’s eyes seemed to glow, yellow as mag–lights in the fog.

“I can take care of Father myself,” Dustil snapped. “We don't need you.”

The woman’s eyes widened and she took a step backward. “Have a care,” she muttered. “There are forces here beyond your understanding—”

“I’m not a kid,” Dustil muttered. “I know what the dark side is.”

Incredibly, the woman started laughing.

Xxx

Dustil had stormed out then—and when the party ended with the other Revan Starfire dying—or coming close enough to make no difference—Carth had had no time to ask why his wife was supposed to stay away from Dromund Kaas—or, for that matter, how the original Revan had planned to save them all and defeat the Sith Emperor alone… before she was defeated by a rancor.

Now, Carth had no way of knowing if the original Revan had been right, or lying, or completely insane—

Mission said the same thing, though. Mission didn't want Revan near Dromund Kaas either—

He coughed again. Maybe I handed my wife over... but I bought us all time. Her too. Hell, I've seen her perform miracles before—I have to believe she will again.

Have to believe she’ll find us too. Did we bring the beacon from the pod? He turned his head to look back. They’d come so far—the wreckage of their craft was already hidden amidst the shifting shadows and empty ruins behind them.

“Why’d I ask? Dad? Dad!” Fingers snapped in front of Carth’s face and then Dustil’s voice dragged him back to the present. His son was still frowning at the cloud cover, a troubled expression on his face. “The ships up there...they're… funny.” He frowned. “I can't put my finger on it, just—something’s… wrong.”

“Nothing we can do from here.” Maybe that’s for the best. You’ve done enough, son.

Hard not to think of the crew of his own ship again. Of Takan, and all the other possessed ones that Dustil had cut down without blinking, ending with the kid who’d been unfortunate enough to follow them down in his escape pod.

“Hey! So, some good news...” His son grabbed Carth’s arm and slung it around his own shoulders, supporting him as they started walking again. “I think that asshole is out of your head. You've got the Korriban flu, right? So it's like you're cured.”

Carth blinked his streaming eyes and sneezed. His throat felt like it had been sanded down with durapaper. “Good news,” he croaked, staring into his son’s gleaming yellow eyes, framed by the twisted shadows of the damned. “Great.”

Xxx
And conquer those ships, cutting through the Wies forces with a precision that made Revan’s skin prickle, even as their command–lights flashed in her eyes, requesting directions and allowing her to fine–tune their responses with a combination of gestures and voice–commanded coordinates on the board projected before them. The capital ships moved with the ponderous weight of a kisra herd on parade—and their smaller fighters formed in lines between with the order of a killick hive.

The names of Wies ships offering surrender, downed, or fled scrolled across the holographic display in three columns. With Headwoman Kissandrix’s death, their enemies’ fire had gone out. And, with the Imperial Fleet at Revan’s command, the battle ended quickly.

When Revan closed her eyes, she could still see the command nodes flashing—but also, within the Force, all the tiny sparks still left in space—shining in the Force—each one a life—

Her eyes snapped open, blinking at the screen again, trying to reconcile the sparks with her display.

Impossible! There are more ships than lives!

Less than a quarter of the Sith ships held crews. The others were dark places, distinguished only by their displacement of vacuum, reflected only in the lights surrounded them. Are the crews all dead? She thought of Oerin Lin. But no, his presence in the Force had been… there. (And was not here at all—not even a whisper of him.)

Are those ships commanded by droids? Are they illusions?

“Meditating upon your victory, Lord Revan?” the smug voice interrupted her thoughts. “You’re a quiet one. I didn’t expect that.”

“Oh?” Revan’s eyes went to the holographic image of the Sith Admiral hovering to her left, as she wondered what the frack she was supposed to call him. Emperor? Dar had just called him ‘Tenebrae,’ the scorn in her voice making it clear how much she despised him. “Maybe I just don’t have much to say.”

Or was that an act—Dar hating him? To lull me into a false sense of security? Why else would she leave me and go to him? Dar’Revan did all she could to trap me on Deralia—

Is she still alive? Is she here—could she be masking herself in those ships?

“Gratitude,” murmured the creature. “Would be what I expected. At least feigned appreciation for saving your life and your fleet.”

Auntie Mita had always said words cost nothing and count for everything. “Thank you,” Revan snapped. “Happy?”

The possessed man’s smile widened. “Tut, tut,” chuckled Tenebrae.

Revan kept her face expressionless. “Your ships. Are they illusions?” Or crewed by droids?”

“Are my ships… what?” he beamed at her, stretching the possessed man’s face into a smile that looked too wide for it. “But they are your ships! I give them to you!”

Revan crossed her arms, first gesturing to Aemelie to take over reviewing the surrenders. Notice of returning fighters blinked before her eyes. Canderous is back—
“Nice, but I have my own.”

“Nice?” He blinked at her. “I called in the reserves of the Sith Fleet for you, Starfire. When I saw that the Sleepers had awakened… no doubt inspired by the news of your return… I summoned them! Your former husbands deserved a command worthy of their stations—a shame it was to be their last. Due to your unwarranted aggression, their role in the battle was over before it began.”

“My former husbands—” Carth. I shot down his ship. Revan had been nearly certain before, but now Tenebrae confirmed it. The truth was like a blade in her back, and she felt the weakness crack her voice, saw the pleased smile of the asshole in front of her widen, as if he knew he’d scored a hit.

Revan’s nails bit into her palms, as she stared steadily back at him, grief and rage mixing like a song inside her. Carth.

“Truly, you have no memory,” the man chuckled. “And yet… I can feel you burn from here.” He stroked his chin beard. “Perhaps our union won’t be a disappointment after all.”

Union? In your fracking dreams, monster. Revan stared back at him, not trusting her voice. The Force pulsed in time with her heart, as her vision seemed to skip—everything becoming a blaze of lights, and space between—from the elements to the stars themselves—and at the end of it—

There. That one spark there. Make an end. Revan’s hand twitched open, then closed.

“Hah hahgh… gug—” The Emperor’s laughter abruptly choked off, and her fingers flexed again. For a moment, it felt like his throat was under her hand, slick and crushing beneath her grasp—skin already cold—his body twitching in spasms. “Y–yesss,” he gurgled. “S–so… strong—”

The rush of exultation was surprising, unexpected. It felt like justice. But then, maddeningly, Tenebrae’s smile widened, and something from him shoved back.

The world cut out, leaving only Him.

His mind was black, and formless, and ageless as an infinite spiral; impossibly smooth and all the little lights flickered in it in time—all of them linked like a web of them— and they—they were all linked between—

Far away from the now, Revan felt her own pulse flickering in time—the Force under her command rising like a wave to crush the heart—the hearts—and then that pulse—pulses—pulled—stretching, lagging—racing ragged—too fast and then... slowing—

The little lights all flickered as if they’d go out.

No, a voice whispered. You cannot win, Revan. Not like this.

The abrupt lurch of Revan’s chair and a discordant alarm snapped her mind back from the infinite, leaving her gasping and shaken, her hand locked around her own neck as if to protect it, her heart pounding as if she’d run a race.

“Oh, I’ve missed you, Starfire,” the madman whispered. “So much.”

“Status?” Dessa was demanding, edge of panic there. Lights flashed red and blue.
“We just tilted twenty degrees port,” someone called out. “Engines are fine, stabilizers trying to compensate but there was no reason—we just slid off course!”

“General Revan!” Aemelie hissed from the chair next to hers. The woman’s fist punched her hard in the ribs. “Whatever your dar’jett magic just did, cease it at once. You’re moving my ship!”

“My ship,” Revan hissed back—but her fingers opened, and she felt the power slip out of her hands, leaving them empty and shaking. The alarm cut out abruptly, as a part of her felt the Aleema realign itself, shifting in its paces, like Dancer running beneath Polla Organa on the plains.

My ship. My mind. I don’t know what the frack that was, but this is all mine. Mine. My body, my people, my ship—

Not his—

“Hah, hah,” the asshole chuckled. “I suppose you have no memory of command. So little control over your slaves. Oh, Revan. The things I will teach you!”

She forced herself to freeze inside, staring at him. “I just wanted to show you my strength, Tenebrae. So there’s no confusion about who I am.”

“No confusion,” he murmured, in a way that made her blood boil. “And such a gift—the two shallow copies you sent to me. In some ways, I feel we’re so close already… seeing that Deralian fire—”

The two copies—

“You’re welcome.” Revan looked down at the command board. Underneath it her left hand was clenched in a fist, nails digging hard into her palm. It was pointless to speculate what had happened on Kaas already with this planet in front of her now, and the possibility of survivors here—pointless to speculate on what the madman had just done too. She would end him. Somehow. He would pay.

Revan moved her fingers on the console, pulling up the communications logs, the increasingly desperate signals from the Sojourn—all of which she had ignored when there had still been time to save them.

No missives were from Carth directly, but she saw his signature in every line now that she was looking for it: those orders to evacuate—written again and again—the pleas to save as much of his crew as possible—the requests for retrieval of all escape pods from the planet—

And not a shot fired. The Sojourn had burned with its cannon unused, and the second ship, marked as Grave Bright in her logs, had jumped to hyperspace.

They didn’t even fight back—

She forced herself to look up again at the still-chuckling hologram before her. Behind him scrolled the lines of their own losses, captures, and returns: lives and equipment reduced to coded Aurebesh.

“What are the Sleepers again?” she asked. “Those ships? Your reserve fleet?”

“Do you truly not remember the Sleepers? I believe those remaining Mandalorian ships are all surrendering, now, Revan. Surrendering to you.” He smiled. “You are quite welcome, but I’m sorry your carelessness cost you both husbands. Lord Malak would have survived unscathed had he stayed on his own ship, but alas...” he shrugged.

No advantage to answering him.

“What are your Sleepers?” she repeated. Even as she said it, Revan watched the Imperial warships fan out with impossible precision—aligning into a solar orbit that matched their own.

Wik. To surround, in Ancient Sith. And those ships are. Surrounding us. That formation is perfect. Too perfect. No organic pilot could do that—not even with nav–comps automated to calculate the parabolic vectors—

“My Sleepers are ships!” The madman beamed. “For you!”

“What is he saying?” Aemelie interjected. “I’ve learned a great deal of the dar’jettai written tongue from our ship, but he’s going too quickly.”

“He says those warships surrounding us are ours,” Revan translated the Ancient Sith into Mandalorian automatically. “He calls them Sleepers.”

“They look like abominations,” Aemelie scowled. “Do not trust them—or that hu’tuun.”

Do you really think I would? Revan glared at her.

“Everyone makes mistakes,” Tenebrae added cheerily. “It wouldn't be the first time you've destroyed someone loyal to you, Revan. Someone close as blood—although... Lord Malak may have survived. Can you feel that tremor in the Force—as if he's calling to you? He’s become so strong—I believe I sense him below... do you?” Again that chuckle. “The two of you were so close... once upon a time....”

A report flickered in her vision. Millifar’s Carta –class was still missing. Aemelie had tagged it, like a reminder.

“We will handle recovery efforts on the planet’s surface ourselves,” she told the Emperor. “If Lord Malak’s alive, I’ll find him.”

If Dustil survived, then maybe Carth did too—or is this all a trap? How can I be sure? I can’t. We have to go to the surface and see. We need to go now—

All she sensed from the planet beneath was darkness. Darkness and... there. Revan’s senses reached out, past the sparks surrounding them. On the planet’s northern land mass something flickered in the Force, half concealed by a cloak of rage—and then... something like... like a light flashed before her eyes.

A beacon, a part of her mind whispered. Light in the darkness. For one who can hear its call.

“We... we’ll handle recovery,” she said out loud. “You may—you need to leave, Tenebrae.”

“So you already proclaimed, Third Wife.” Aemelie had apparently demoted Revan again.

Because of Millifar? Does Canderous know his daughter is missing?

“Of course.” The admiral had a cruel face—Tenebrae’s expression just made it crueler. “I’ve quite outgrown Nathema, but you may find my natal world amusing. Visit my shrines. Some may still be standing... but do not tarry too long, Revan. Some of your guests on Kaas may not keep much longer. The green cells are quite drafty, and I don’t want to trouble you with my staffing issues, but it's getting harder to keep them provisioned—they eat so much—” He paused. “I have an execution planned for tomorrow too—such a shame you’ll miss it, but I will transmit a broadcast. Rebels, you know—all those meddlesome slaves. They go so boldly into death. I’ve planned a surprise destruction of the House of Blais, and that Deralian pilot as well to cap off the party—”

Deralian. Pilot. That could be—that could be Polla, or... that could be either of them. Polla or Seiran.

She swallowed. “Which guests in your cells are mine?” There was no use thinking about the others as sentients she could save. Not anymore.

“Hah,” Tenebrae murmured. “More amusing to show you. We’ll chat later, Starfire. Enjoy Nathema.”

“The Imperial ships are leaving,” Dessa reported, telling Revan what she already knew... as one by one, those strange ships—and the five or six more normal ones—vanished from her senses.

Tenebrae’s image fizzled out as his ship went into hyperspace too, still with that too-wide smile on his face.

When Revan blinked she could almost still see his Sith–damned grin: mocking and smug and enraging, baiting her like a k’lor slug along a sweet trail—heading for the salt trap beneath, no matter what she did.

Frack you, she thought, uncoiling her fist. Carth might be still be alive. And Dustil. I’ll end you, Tenebrae.

Her voice came out evenly as she flicked the command to all channels. “Attention crew: maintain orbit and ready shuttles. We need to find the survivors from the Sojourn—or from any other ships—on that planet. Scan the orbital wreckage for life-signs. Bring back everyone... anything you find. I want the dead too. List all relevant information. Descriptions. Names, if... if known.” Carth. Dustil. Millifar—there’s no casualty report, her comm-link’s still open—it must be intact, she might be too—

Millifar. Hells, Canderous wasn’t back up here, but Mekel—

Poor kid. Just found out his girlfriend’s probably dead—just like his father—

“Mekel?” Revan cleared her throat. “I promise, we’ll do everything to find Milli—” Her eyes went to Millifar’s station, the one she had shared with Mekel Jin. But the station was empty.

“Jin left minutes ago while you were admiring the mad king,” Aemelie sniffed. “Try and pay attention, Third Wife.”

XXX

The ship Dustil had said had landed close turned out to be farther than Carth liked, far enough that he ended up almost draped across his son, half-carried by the time they cleared the last rise of broken hill.

Below them burned a makeshift fire and a slight, robed figure sitting next to its warmth. For a moment Carth’s heart leapt irrationally—that the galaxy could be this simple after all this time.

Until his son pushed him back. “Let me go first,” he muttered. “That woman’s a null. I can take the ship.”

“We don’t know which side she’s on—don’t hurt her!” Carth said, trying to measure his disappointment. The woman had frail shoulders, and crooked, hunched back. A woman, but not my wife. Too small and too old—

His foot slipped on the shale and the hooded one looked up.

“Who is there?” Soft voice, cracked with age. A mirrored visor spanned her eyes, concealing most of her face.

“I got this,” his son muttered, pulling out his saber hilt. “Stay here, Dad!”

“Dustil! Don’t kill—”

You got used to the Force, but Carth would never get used to the sight of his son with a red lightsaber, leaping at least ten meters through the air—and now pointing his blade at a sentient who still hadn’t drawn any weapons in return.

“Don’t move,” his son growled, voice carrying up the shale rocks to where Carth still stood. “We’ll take the ship.” The covering had fallen from his face, fluttering to the ground. “Old woman.”

The hooded figure stood up slowly, and lifted her hood. Under the robes she was slight and short—an old woman with her white hair in two Mandalorian braids, hanging like headtails on either side of her face. The visor hid her gaze, but her lips pursed and sharpened as she assessed them. “For what purpose?” Her voice was as cracked and worn as the planet—but her accent was Core.

“That's our business.” Dustil twitched his blade to the side, as if he was gesturing for her to move.

“Dustil!” Carth started making his way down the slope as fast as he could, trying not to fall on his ass as he did so. They still didn't know if this old woman was friend or foe. She could be from the Aleema. She could be from Revan—

“Dustil?” The old woman said. “Is that who you are?”

“No. I'm Lord Malak’s fracking ghost,” Carth’s son snapped, gesturing with the saber. “Who the frack are you?”

“Quinneth… Cannon?” she said. “Or another name if you'd prefer, Lord Malak.” Her head turned toward Carth, and a faint smile creased her face, softening it. “And you? Who are you supposed to be?”

Carth pulled the cloth from his own face, stepping forward, onto the flat ground. “Carth,” he said. “I’m Carth Onasi. Who… how did you get here? You were in the battle?” Her ship was a Mandalorian shuttle, but unmarked by clan sigils.

“Captain Onasi? Why, of course. You're quite famous. Or… is it Imperial High Admiral Onasi now? There are five bars on your chest. And a crown. Those are measures of the Emperor’s prestige—not the Senate’s.”

“Just call me Carth.”
“And your companion, Lord Malak, is he a mere Corporal in the Imperial Fleet?” A smile tugged her thin lips. “Your uniform missing a sleeve, Corporal Malak.”

“It’s not my uniform.” Carth’s son muttered.

“The name–badge says Irkuk. Perhaps the real Corporal Irkuk was the one who imbued the fabric with the stench of burnt hair and electrical burns?” The old woman shrugged. “In which case you should thank him. No one will notice the missing sleeve when they can smell you from such a distance.”

“Shut up!”

“Dustil!” Carth coughed. Damned if he was going to call his son anything else—or even could. He hadn’t had time to wonder at the uniform or anything else—and now, he didn’t want to know—

“I needed clothes, Dad,” his son muttered. “Corporal Irkuk didn’t listen. I couldn’t issue commands from your flagship in my fracking bathrobe—”

“I—” Carth coughed again, saving himself from making another excuse for his son—at least out loud. \textit{He did what he had to. He’s not in control of this right now, but he will be. Revan came back from this and Dustil will too—}

“We… we need to get off this planet,” he said to the woman. “We could take you with us—”

Her laugh sounded younger than the rest of her. “In my ship? I think not! I came to this place to meet a friend. I expect she’ll be along shortly.” Her head tilted up at him, visor flashing. “Isn’t she the one you seek as well?”

“What do you know—” Dustil began... but then Carth put a hand on his son’s arm, bidding him to be quiet.

“Ah… which friend is that again?” This Quinneth Cannon rubbed him the wrong way, he just couldn’t put his finger on why.

“I’m curious,” the old woman ignored him, staring at Dustil again. “Why did you come to this place? It seems a large coincidence, the three of us meeting here.”

“We saw your ship come down.”

“Through the clouds? And managed to journey to my precise location?” Her voice seemed to be growing stronger.

“Will of the Force.” Dustil folded his arms. “It’s strong in me.”

She chuckled. “I have no doubt of that. What does it whisper to you now?”

“It—it wants—” he broke off. “None of your fracking business! That fracking cave doesn’t matter! We’re taking your ship! My father wants your ship and we’re going to take it!”

“Cave?” Carth didn’t see a cave—just sand, the old woman, and a pile of rocks. He let his hand drop closer to his holster.

“She will hear the beacon too,” Quinneth Cannon murmured. “This is a place her feet have walked before. There is no need for you to find Revan, Captain—or Admiral—Onasi. She will find you.”

“So you \textit{are} here for Revan? Were you with her—you were on her ship?” \textit{No}, his instincts screamed. Maybe she’s another possessed Voice, or one of the Mouths—sometimes they’re not even possessed, but they’re all still loyal—

She's hiding her eyes. She must have a reason for doing that.

“What do you know of the Krath aristocrat, Aleema Keto, Captain?”

He'd said to call him Carth. But something about the old woman’s gaze seemed to encourage formality, imply a certain reserve. “She was one of the Sith in the Exar Kun wars, Miz Cannon. Are you Mandalorian?”

“I have seen the skies of all five worlds of the Blood Sun,” the old woman switched to Mandalorian as effortlessly as his wife did. “But I was not born among them. I was adopted into the clans—much like Revan herself. Aleema, of course, did not marry at all—she died quite young—defying the age–old creature who had corrupted the very fabric of her world.”

“She died in the Cron cluster explosion.” Carth knew that much. He kept using Basic, catching Dustil’s frown. There was more to that story—Sith ghosts, Nomi Sunrider, Jedi heroics straight from the vids he’d seen as a kid—Revan probably had too, maybe that was why—

Wait. Is she stalling for time? Trying to distract us?

“Show us your eyes,” Carth added, moving his hand to rest on his blaster, now, and taking a step back to angle the shot. “Do it now.”

“My eyes?” She raised the visor. Quinneth Cannon had eyes that age or disease had glazed to white, inset with some kind of cybernetics. “I see better with the visor in this planet’s light,” she murmured. “But I understand your concern. You worry I am one of his. I assure you, I am not.”

Implants. But not Tenebrae. Her eyes aren’t glowing—

“His?” Carth tried to play dumb.

“This world was called Medriaas,” Quinneth Cannon said. “More than a thousand years ago, a bastard slave was born here. His mother was nothing. His father was a Dark Lord of the Sith—the ruling Dark Lord of this world, from an ancient and noble line. He did not learn of his bastard’s existence until the boy killed him. The boy was renamed Vitiate and the world renamed Nathema. The Lord of all Sith, Marka Ragnos, gave Nathema to Vitiate to rule....” She chuckled. “For a time, he was its proudest son... but as with all things, that did not last.”

“Are you trying to bore us to death before Revan gets here?” Dustil yawned, stretching out his legs before the fire. “Because it's working.”

“Those who do not understand the past are often condemned by their ignorance.” The old woman turned her head to Carth. “Lord Dramath possessed a similar arrogance, Lord...Malak— until the moment his cast–off offspring cut him down. Then he possessed nothing.”

“Well... I don't have any kids.” Carth’s son shrugged. “And I'm not gonna kill Admiral Onasi. So, is there a point to this?”

Quinneth Cannon looked disgusted. “Merely the waste of what breath remains in my body— sharing my wisdom with a fool. Yet still, with an end, comes rebirth. The sentient beasts of Kashyyyk know this well—and all the drexl of Onderon. Even a fool may come to a wellspring of reason, and, if properly nurtured, learn to drink from its—”
“Oh! Now, I understand, my lady! You’re going to talk Revan down from the sky?” Dustil interrupted, voice clipped in a Coruscanti accent, even as he was rolling his eyes. “Using your voice as a beacon? That’s how you know my dear lovely wife Revvie–Red’s coming here for sure? You were told by a Wookiee? Or a drexl?”

“That is the beacon.” The woman turned and pointed to a rough cluster of dust–covered rock to her side. “Or rather, the beacon is below this place, hidden within a forgotten tomb. The rocks conceal a door. And she will hear it, just as you did—hear the call of a man more than a thousand years entombed.” Her lips twitched with a dry smile. “And so I wait. You’re welcome to my fire—” she nodded at the chemical flames flickering in the salvaged crate at her feet. “If you would wait as well.”

“Sure,” Dustil muttered. “Maybe we can find more cool things to burn later in that cave of yours.”

XXX

Milli. Don’t be dead, okay? Mekel rubbed his eyes, staring at the lists again scrolling across the lift’s screen, as if they’d magically change in the time it took him to descend to the hangar level of this fracking enormous ship.

There had been no killed–in–action report—the transceiver would have clicked one last send if her Carta–class fighter had exploded. Instead, the feed from her ship (that he’d been monitoring the whole time) just cut out: the last report from it had the main guns discharging plasma bolts on a locked–in target and then… nothing at all.

There should have been something if she was really dead. Mekel had gotten used to losing sents a long time ago, but that didn’t make it a fracking tricks on parade day.

XXX

Most Mandalorian woman had long hair—something about braids meaning different things and marriage and clan statuses, but Mekel had never paid attention to that banthashit. He only knew that when Milli had cut hers after Katarr, it had meant something, just like the pearls adorning her ears, and the pink candles burning on either side of her bed had meant something, the first night she invited him to her room.

“Thank you,” she said—after, speaking Basic, not Mando’ade.

Milli’s hair was cropped so short that it curled around her ears, in weird contrast to that gorgeous, creamy rack, and those magnificently hot thighs. After their exercise, her hair stuck up in feathers, like his own probably did too, half-matted from the sheets and their sweat. She stretched, bouncing and leaning forward to touch her toes, pointing and flexing them, and rotating her artificial arm until the shoulder popped.

“Anytime.” Mekel leaned back on the bed next to her and wondering again what was up with the holo she'd taped on the ceiling.

“I am sure you know already that you have an impressive shershoy, Jin.” Milli smiled and rolled on top of him. It was the first time he’d seen that careless a smile from her since Coru. “A good sign. And if your arpat is as strong as your beviik—”

“Just speak Mando,” he snickered, pushing those yellow curls out of her eyes. “Or… the words you’re looking for in Basic are ‘seed’ and ‘lance.’ I don’t really understand what ‘shereshoy’ means. It’s like wanting sex…?””
“No. Shereshoy’s everything,” she grinned, making it plain that ‘thank you’ for a Mandalorian meant ‘let’s do that again.’

“You’re welcome,” he mumbled into her skin, looking up at the ceiling, where a picture of him he’d posed for as a joke was taped, grinning down at them both.

He hadn’t known she’d kept it, but he guessed it meant she’d been planning this for a while.

XXX

Milli had left a cup of caff by her half of the weapons display. Mekel had taken that with him when he’d left the bridge, drank it as he came down the lift. She made it too sweet, but he drank it anyway, discarding the bulb in the trash port as he entered the hangar bay.

_Milli. Milli. Millifar. Missing_—

Mekel was getting a little sick of losing people. Korriban was one thing, but they’d left. Losing sents was supposed to stop happening after that. Mekel had lost the father he’d barely known to a fracking Sith. He’d lost Lydie to her di’kut husband. Master Iridel had died of the plague and Thalia May had vanished. He’d lost Dustil too—and that was the worst of all. Dustil had been a piece of him just as much as the Force.

But Milli—her ship hadn’t blown up. There would have been a report if it had. She might be still out there.

The vast hangar was a mess of Mandos and their returning fighters. In the middle of it all, Canderous Ordo stood alone—staring at the lists, lips moving. There was a vacant circle at least a fighting–length deep around him and Mekel got it instantly—the others were giving him the space he needed to figure it out.

When Mekel drew closer, he heard the man _humming_, cradling his own helm in his hands.

Mekel knew the tune. He’d heard it on Coru in their camp atop a fracking meter–high building. One of the death songs. They had a lot of them.

“Hey,” Mekel said. The other Mando’ade were giving the Mandalore space, but Mekel thought they were out of time for that.

Canderous didn't look surprised to see him. The humming stopped and his brows drew together in a thoughtful frown as Mekel approached.

“The last coordinates place her nearly on top of an asteroid,” he said slowly. “The chance is very small.” He was speaking Mandalorian. There had been a time when Mekel wouldn't have understood all of it—but something had clicked—maybe a trace of fracked Malak’s memories, maybe those grammar lessons Ban had almost literally branded on them—in them—now he only got confused when he thought about it.

Or when someone used a word like _shereshoy_, which was impossible to define, because it meant everything good in the universe.

_Stop thinking, fockda. Just go._ The voice wasn't Dustil’s but it gave good advice. It was the voice that had told him to kiss Millifar back, after all, that night in the hall before she led him to her room.

“The ship didn't explode,” Mekel said, although the man would already know that. “There might “Her comm-link is still live.” Of course—as a wing commander, the man’d have access to the comm channels Mekel didn’t. “She’d answer if she was able. It would answer for her if it was still…”

Still attached to her arm. He didn’t have to say that part, Mekel got it.

“I’ll get us a ship,” Mekel said, already looking around for one. “One with a battle-med station.”

General Ordo nodded, his eyes flickering up—as if toward the bridge again. “Looks like they’ll be sorting out diplomatic osik for a while. It won’t take long—she hadn’t flown very far—”

“Yeah.” Mekel tried not to think about the sleepy noises Milli made—or the way she was muscles and soft all at once. The serious expression of those gray–blue eyes when she’d acted like their fracking was some kind of gift to each other. He especially didn’t want to think about this banthashit in front of her father—

“Your face turns nearly as red as Revan’s,” the man observed, elbowing him into motion. “My daughter gave you a sheresh’ik, Jin—celebrate it proudly. Whether she is alive or dead, you will always have her—in your heart and your loins.”

“Uh, I do. I—”

“That does not mean we need to speak of it,” the general added quickly. “Ever again. Let’s find that ship.”

Xxx

“Go that way,” Revan told Leskal, leaning over the shuttle’s navboard while he and Rowda flew the ship. “Get below this cloud cover so we can see what we’re doing.”

“There is no below,” the boy muttered. “The clouds extend nearly to the surface.”

Canderous and Mekel Jin had gone—the ship’s petty officer said they’d gone to look for Millifar’s ship—and a comm confirmed that. Revan sent a comm back telling them to meet her on the planet, where the first of their rescue squads had already launched—to look for any survivors.

Tenebrae said Malak was with Carth on the Sojourn—he thought he sensed Malak on the planet, and I—

She sensed nothing that felt like Malak.

Malak must mean Dustil.

The planet’s atmosphere unraveled to their ship as their shuttle finally dropped beneath its clouds, revealing a blasted brown plain below.

The planet was entirely dead to the Force. Revan registered nothing at all from the world itself, but scattered on its surface, little sparks—very few—flickered. Escape pods. Their ship passed over one, and she could see three figures waving up at them below. Revan directed another shuttle to that position to rescue—or capture—the survivors, closing her eyes again to map the other sparks she sensed. Any one of them could be Carth, or Carth and Dustil—or—

That beacon flickered again, like a light flashing just out of range. A light surrounded by darkness.
And then there’s that. The dark place in the Force. I need to go there first.

“Keep on course,” she said. “Eighteen degrees now toward the planet’s south.”

“In my grandmother’s time there were still machines at work here,” the woman flying her shuttle grumbled. Junior Headwoman Rowda of Clan Rialis. “Below us should be a city, according to Aemelie’s maps.”

Below them, all Revan saw was sand and rubble. Endless sand.

“Your people have been here before?” Revan asked to be polite. The Force stirred as they drew closer, the darkness flickered, roiled as if fanned by a fire. And next to it—

Light.

The dark was the same she’d sensed on the ship. Familiar. Dar’Revan? Tenebrae? Malak? Much as she’d prefer to find Carth, she had to deal with this first. “More that way,” she directed, leaning across the board to punch in the vector. “Another five degrees west. We’re getting closer.”

“In my grandmother’s time, there were wonders to be taken from this world.” Rowda’s hand pulled Revan’s away, marking the course correction herself. “I wonder what made the machines stop?”

Revan had no answers. Just that thing again. Like light flashing in the corner of her eyes.

“There!” Leskal shouted out, tapping the navigational map, as Rowda steered. “An energy spike—head northwest—maybe fifty kilometers—”

Revan saw, without any surprise at all, that the point on their holo–map matched the point of the dark Force signature—and that whisper on the edge of her mind.

The beacon. Calling me—

Xxx

“Nothing.” Mekel bit back the sense of relief he felt not to see Milli’s corpse, or the wreck of her ship stuck in the asteroid. “Not even char on the rocks.”

“Wouldn’t be, in vacuum.” Next to Mekel’s enviro–suit, Canderous Ordo bobbed in his own. He reached out with a scanner, running it over the rocks. “But something did happen here.”

The Mandalore pointed to a carved–out section of the asteroid before them. The asteroid was full of holes—but this one with huge, with the sides oddly clean—like a chunk bitten out of a goreapple. “Some pilot with more crap than brains jumped from here. Into hyperspace.”

“Jumped? From in a rock?”

“Sure.” Canderous snorted, as if he had more respect for the crap for brains pilot than he was letting on. “If they made the calculations right—not a problem.”

“You think Milli did it?” But there were two ships. Her last report said she was firing on another ship. Where the frack is it?

“She’d know better—I taught her better. It’s a pirate’s trick, not worthy of a warrior.”

“Well, maybe she—”
“There's no debris,” Canderous added. “Her ship—the enemy’s—neither wrecked here. No sign of plasma melt, no radiation, or ionization—”

“Stuff could have drifted away—”

The general made a snorting noise through his helm. “Thought you said you'd studied exo–physics. It'd be here. Something would be.” He held his sensor. “Nearest read on debris is clicks away—we passed it on the way here—and that was a wrecked Delta– wing fighter. One of ours—but not my daughter's.”

“So… she didn't die here?” He knew better than to say cuy garem. Still alive. If General Ordo thought for sure she was still alive for sure, he’d just say it himself.

“Not here.” The General held the scanner up for a long time—or it seemed like to Mekel—before snapping it back on the belt of his suit. “Let’s head back to the others. Revan said she'd send coordinates on the surface for a meet. Wherever my daughter met her fate… the time to learn it is not now.”

“Her comm–link is still active,” Mekel said stubbornly. It could mean everything or nothing. It could be drifting in space—

“She’s a smart kid.” Canderous Ordo had turned back to their ship’s airlock. The door apexed open and he gestured for Mekel to follow him back in. “Maybe she just needs time to overcome her captors before she comms us back.”

XXX

“May you burn in all nine of your Corellian hells!” Millifar told the Republic woman with the bars of an admiral and the eyes of a whipped kath.

“There are only seven,” the whipped kath replied.

The Besalisk restraining Millifar—a creature she’d only seen before in children’s tales—had unnaturally strong limbs, and all four of its hands currently held her down, while a more pedestrian Human had discarded Millifar’s beskar and her comm–link, and shackled her bare hands to a belt at her waist. Her legs were similarly adorned, but she was pleased to note that the weedy–looking Togrutan who had attached her leg restraints was now applying kolto to his bleeding lip and bruised tricorn.

“Republic hu’tuun,” she added, and spat at him.

“You’re from Clan Ordo,” the woman said. “You have Canderous Ordo’s clan sigils on your armor.”

Obvious troch spoke obvious facts, and so Millifar said nothing.

“I met him once,” the woman continued. “At the Mandalorian Embassy, the night he married Revan Starfire and Carth Onasi.”

Lots of people had been there, and it was not necessary to correct a barbarian who thought her father had married a man. Such arrangements were common enough, but her father had not marked Carth’s face.

“My name is Rew Ekkumi,” the troch admiral continued. “Did you come here with Revan?”
“Stabilized—we’ll be coming out of hyperspace in two days, sir,” said the Togruta behind her. “But we’ll have a projected loc in a sec—”

“Unless it’s in the middle of a planet or a star,” the Besalisk rumbled. “In which case, good–bye—”

“You jumped blind?” Millifar craned her head to see their reports. Republics were insane. Even a clan warrior on his last hunt would never be so foolish—

“We had an entire Mandalorian fleet between us and the hyperlane, and you burning our shields,” Rew Ekkumi told her.

“You did not!” She couldn't help but point out. “I was sent on a reconnaissance mission—”

“You tried to blow us out of the sky.” The troch admiral’s mouth twitched.

“Hutt space,” one of the other crewmembers clapped their hands. “Great. Out of the frack and into the shit.”

“See if you can get a line open to High Admiral Rensha—or reroute us toward Felucia, if the engines let you,” Rew Ekkumi said. “She’ll want to hear about this—”

“Do you still have the coordinates mapped back to our jump point?” the Besalisk added. “Save em—we might have just found a shortcut.”

Millifar’s eyes squinted as she tried to make out the numbers marked on their nav screen.

Xxx

Carth’s head felt like it was on fire, but his body was freezing cold, despite the flames from the old woman’s makeshift heating source. The flames danced, gold and red, and blue... and green as his lost wife’s eyes.

He coughed again, and the old woman handed him a cup of something steaming she’d gotten from her ship. He took a cautious sip, even if he didn’t trust her, because it helped tie his burning head back to the ground. The liquid tasted like badly–brewed caff, but it started to clear the webs from his brain.

“So… when did you meet Revan?” he tried again. “Was she a Jedi?”

The old woman shrugged. “Who can say if Revan was ever a Jedi?”

“The Jedi,” Dustil muttered. “They’d say. They fracking take anyone, though.”

“True. Even the consistently ungrateful, Lord Malak.” The woman gave him a thin–lipped, mocking smile. “I think I preferred you in your original body. You seemed much more intelligent then, even possessed by the Emperor's Kiss.”

“Yeah, well… you were too boring for me to fracking remember you!”

Stop fighting with her. Carth couldn't think of anything to say out loud. His thoughts felt like they were stuffed with eridu–wool as it was—everything thick and muffled.

“I…” Carth paused to cough again. “Uh, how did you know Revan again?”

“Even with the Force, a mind is a locked datapad—and even the greatest minds possess the most petty and base of keys. There are many sentients who would claim to have known Revan Starfire—but how many saw the shape of her true thoughts? How many knew of the secret places, where her steps were forced alone?”

“Uh….’” Carth glanced at his son, who was making a crude back and forth motion in his lap. “Dustil! Don’t… don’t do that!”

“It can be hard to lose a son,” Quinneth folded her hands on her lap.

“Whatsoever,” Carth’s son (who was not lost) muttered under his breath. “Got any food, Miz Cannon?”

“In the galley of my ship you may find some provisions,” the woman said, almost primly.

“Frack that! I’m not going into your fracking lair.”

“Dustil!”

“Lord Malak was trained from an early age to have exquisite manners,” Quinneth murmured. “He was an Eglantine. Something to keep in mind if you wish to fool any but the most blind of sentients.”

“When someone who matters comes along, I’ll get back in character,” Dustil sniffed, voice crisping into that clipped tone again. “Admiral Onasi is quite used to my japes by now—it amuses us both for me to assume the personality of his lost son.”

Carth looked past the flames of the fire to his son, still trying to keep his eyes open. His son was staring at that cluster of rocks—the one the old woman said was a cave, moving his fingers back and forth, and muttering to himself.

It’s gonna be okay, he reminded himself. It has to be.

“The Thernbee of Almania are one of a number of species who possess a brute mastery of the Force without sentience,” the old woman began, after an awkward silence. “Their example proves that sensitivity is not always linked to intelligence, or even basic reasoning. Some scholars have posited that—”

“Shut up, already!” Dustil turned, jumping to his feet and staring at a patch of sky. “She’s here,” his son said. “Getting closer. A lot closer. Definitely her, Dad.”

“It is fortunate we have Lord Malak is here to tell us,” Quinneth Cannon said. “Although a Thernbee would have too. Or our ears—can you hear it? That hum in the air above the wind… those are Mandalorian engines—rigged from something much larger—and flying lower than is advised.”

“We studied Thernbee in Eglantine school,” Dustil clipped. “If we had one, it would eat you first.”

A moment later a ship banked out of the clouds, blunt–nosed and spiked. Quinneth Cannon wasn’t wrong. Carth had seen his share of ships like that before.

The old woman beamed. “I told you she would come.” She had told them a lot—none of it, Carth couldn’t help but notice—had anything to do with what was in the cave below them, or how she’d ended up in the Mando’aade army. The longer she’d talked, the more convinced he’d become that she wasn’t Clan—at least, not like the ones he’d met. So what did that make her?

Her eyes aren’t glowing, at least that’s something—

The ship in front of them hovered at the top of the hill, slowly descending to a landing, banking its jets neatly in a perfect five point turn.

That’s how I know you’re not driving it, beautiful. Carth’s temples throbbed and he swayed on his feet. He started up the hill towards the ship, vaguely aware that behind him Dustil was telling him to be careful.

Dustil still cares. About me, at least. It had to be something.

There was a long pause as his feet slipped in the shale. To Carth, the time felt like hours—days even—staring at that shuttle as its compressors released their steam into the air. The planet’s low gravity sent the vapor water twisting in strange shapes that looked almost like mouths screaming—but that could have been the fever too.

So hard to keep standing when the planet kept tilting. “Dustil?” Carth said finally, words coming out in a croak. He glanced back down the hill startled to see how far he had traveled from them.

The distance seemed to stretch and recede and he coughed again, hoping he wasn’t going to fall over and roll back down the hill. “Are you sure she’s—”

His son looked up. Even at a distance, his eyes burned yellow. “What?”

“Nothing, I—” It hurt his throat to yell.

“Hey!”

Her voice! Carth’s head turned back.

The murky sunlight glinted on Revan’s hair—setting it aflame at the corona, although she’d dyed it brown. The wind blew her dark topknot, fluttering it like a flag behind her. No mistake this time. Even backlit by the red sun, half in shadow—meters away—

This time it’s really you. Finally. Beautiful—

“Carth!” she called out, and came pelting down the hill, so fast that he only had time to blink twice before the weight of her nearly toppled him over: rough fabric of her jacket, smooth exoskeleton of some kind of armor encasing her arms and legs. Those slender–strong arms wrapped around him and her lips brushed his hard, her head butting up against his tilting down—and then Carth saw those hyperdrive eyes of hers widen, as she took in his face—the mess Tenebrae and the damned flu had left of it.

Looking at her glowing with vitality and life made Carth feel ancient.

“Hey,” he whispered. “Hey, you.”

“You’re ill,” his wife whispered. “You’re burning up.”

“Flu.” He drew back a little. “Good news—that bastard’s out of my head. I—I was… possessed before, but now….” He tried not to cough on her, but she was making it hard, holding him so close. “Now I just feel like crap.”

“I… I saw vids. About Tenebrae. You… with glowing eyes.” Revan’s breath hitched. “Not gonna lie, I wasn't sure if I could handle seeing your eyes like that in person—” her lips brushed against his—more a comfort than a kiss—and then she drew back again, scanning his face, with the focused intensity of a laser. “Force, I missed you, Carth.”

Looking back, Carth saw that her skin was pale, freckles all faded like she’d been in space too long—but there was no sign of darkness, no corruption—and just a trace of those faded lines left, etched like silver with the planes of her face. He'd… he'd grown so used to seeing dark Force-users—so used to seeing the marks on Dustil and the other Sith—he was almost startled by how young Revan appeared without them.

Beautiful. She was now. She always had been—he had always found her so, even when… even at the end, but now—

Now her eyes met his, squinting with worry, pure green as hyperdrive, scanning his face the way he must be scanning hers.

“Guess I'm a sight to cause a bantha stampede, huh?” His laugh turned into a cough.

“Sorry we shot down your ship,” she said. Her eyelashes were red, like she'd forgotten to dye them. “Sojourn. Hells, Carth, I should have realized—”

“I knew it was you the second I saw those Ordo clan signs on the Aleema. Who else would be nuts enough to invade Sith space?”

“Not sure it counts as an invasion. Tenebrae put me in charge of your fleet.” She traced the bars on his chest, frowning. “That's what all this gold crap means, right? That it's your fleet?”

“Yeah. Second only to the Emperor and his Chosen.” He wished he could make that sound like a joke. “Meaning Lord Malak. And you.”

“Malak—” She stiffened. “Did he come back?”

“No, but Dustil—he's been doing a good imitation—”

“Shit,” she muttered. “This is a kriiffing mess.”

“Better now.” He leaned into her, and her forehead pressed against his, smooth skin like a cool balm as he drank in the sight of her.

“Carth,” she mumbled, and he realized she was shaking. “I was so worried I'd killed you.”

“Not a chance, beautiful. Your hair—” he brushed at it, pushing that topic away. The roots were coming in red, paler than the dark, and she'd tied it up again like a Deralian, clipped the sides nearly to the scalp. What did it mean that she’d done that?

She really does look like Polla, he thought. An uncomfortable thought. Or the smuggler I fell in love with on Taris— that was slightly better, but still off. I fell in love with a woman named Polla Organa, Carth remembered thinking of it before. But all the while she was always you.

“I like your hair,” he mumbled stupidly, although it wasn't true. It wasn't her hair he gave a frack about.

“Just trying to blend in. I was on Deralia—that’s where Dar left me for dead. I had to buy a ship, but that fricking koota sold me a bad one. I still don't know if it was sabotaged on purpose—”
“Dar?” He tried to chuckle. “Who—”

“Her. I know you met her on Kaas, I saw the vid. Dar’Revan dropped me out of the sky on Deralia—I think she was trying to kill me—or….” Revan’s voice broke off, and he felt her body stiffen as those green eyes tracked something behind them. “Dustil! What happened to… y—you… ah… who’s your friend there?” Every muscle in her body tensed, and Carth felt his wife’s feet shift as her voice went cold.

“How ask a question when the answer is known?” Quinneth Cannon called back. She chuckled in a way that made Carth’s own blood freeze. “Not so long,” the old woman said, as Revan stiffened in his arms. “Months, since our last meeting, padawan. And so much changed since.”

Padawan?

“Get away from Dustil,” Revan hissed, pulling away from Carth, practically shoving him behind her, and dragging him back down the hill at the same time. “What the frack did you to him?”

“I am Lord Malak,” Dustil said flatly, rolling his eyes and crossing his arms. “Miz Cannon didn't do anything to me. She couldn't. She's a fracking null.”

“Who?” Revan snorted.

“We… found her here. She said she knew you and that you’d come here.” Carth’s head pounded, and he was pretty sure his teeth were chattering. “She said her name was Quinneth Cannon.”

His wife shook her head, her hand on her saber hilt now. “It’s not.” She raised her voice. “Another name, Vima? Vima’s the original one, isn't it? Or are you going by Arren Kae these days?”

Vima? Carth frowned. Arren Kae? Wait! That was one of the Jedi masters—

“You may call me whatever you wish,” the old woman said. “You may even strike me down—if that is your selection—although I would prefer our meeting went otherwise.”

“Oh, look,” Dustil muttered. Somehow he'd moved to Carth’s side again. Somehow Revan had dragged Carth back down the hill again, facing off against the frail old woman. “It’s Revan here to save all of our lives from an old null.”

Her head whipped back toward him. “Stand back, Dustil.”

Somewhat to Carth’s surprise, his son did.

The old woman chuckled. “He’s not very good at pretending to be Malak, is he?”

“It doesn't matter.” Revan circled, those small side-steps that always made Carth reach for his blaster because he knew a fight was coming. Eerily, the old woman circled her back, their steps almost mirrored, although the woman— Vima? As in Sunrider? The woman moved more slowly, even with a slight limp.

But she doesn’t have the Force—Dustil said she doesn’t have the Force.

“Arkan told me what you are,” Revan growled.

“Not in words, I would think.” The visor on her eyes glinted in the sun. “That one lost those by the time we reached Malachor.”

“He showed me. He showed his memories—of what you are—and what you did to him—what you did even to your own son—"

“He showed you a great deal then.” The old woman chuckled. “More than I would have expected from a mad beast... but did he show you how he became mad? For that transformation was not guided by my hand.”

Behind them, Carth finally noticed that three more sents had debarked from the shuttle on the hill, and were standing meters back—the dull gleam of beskar, clank of weapons, marking them as Mandalorian.

“Yes.” Revan stopped moving abruptly, and Vima took a step backwards, bringing her hands forward as if to show them open. Revan’s fingers closed on the hilt of her saber. “He showed me what happened to you at Malachor—to you and Oerin, and to him.”

A cracked laugh. “Revan laid a clever trap for us there. I should have known that my greatest apprentice would take every advantage she could find before she faced Vitiate—even seizing control of me. And... where does the fallen knight Davad Arkan walk now?”

“Nowhere. I dropped him into one of the Biscain suns.”

“Ah.” The old woman nodded slowly, her face expressionless. “Sometimes a tool outgrows its purpose. Davad Arkan would have caused the death of the entire Force had he continued unchecked. Would that have been worth Vitiate’s end? Perhaps. But what if he could not be stopped?” She gestured around them. “This is called the World of Tombs because all life was extinguished upon it. One must be careful not to destroy a world when saving it—a lesson taught as true from a plucked flower or a snapped root as it was from Malachor. Destruction without control is—”

“Not going to ask about your son?” Revan interrupted. “Oerin Lin? Or is he working with you now?”

“They were all my children,” Vima said. “I could never put one above the rest—even him.”

“They?” Revan laughed hoarsely. “How many?”

“Dad?” Dustil was at Carth’s elbow again, pulling him back. “What the frack is going on?”

“I don’t know,” he whispered back. “But I knew there was a reason I didn’t trust her.” Vima Sunrider was Nomi Sunrider’s daughter. She was on the Jedi Council. Is she with the Emperor or against him?

“And I?” Revan asked Vima Sunrider. “What was I?”

“Revan was my greatest pupil,” Vima said. “Vitiate’s Sith’ae’rah, but trained by me—trained in ways the madman never knew. The Emperor is blind, when you stand in his own shadow, but I did not make my Revan to stand in shadows—”

“Me,” Revan’s voice was cold. “You mean me. And you didn’t make me at all— whoever you are.”

“Didn’t I?” A small smile played upon the cracked lips. “The Revan of old knew her place in things, even as she arranged mine.”

“Maybe she did.” Revan’s voice sharpened. “But you’re facing me, now—not her.”
“Indeed.” Those eyes narrowed. “You. You… you were never meant to last.”

Xxx

“... you were never meant to last,” the old woman said. The words were a taunt—an obvious ploy to goad Revan into reacting. She knew that.

“But here I am.” The smile felt like a challenge.

“Yes…” Vima Sunrider murmured. “Here you are.”

“This is another trap,” Carth muttered behind her. “I knew it.”

Yes. She wants me rattled. Wants me off guard. But it doesn’t mean her words aren’t true. I was never meant to last. The Republic never worked out a pardon because I wasn’t supposed to survive. No one expected a live Revan after the Star Forge—

She felt her eyes narrow.

Or did they?

Sheris. Vima’s the one who made Sheris into Dar. Davad showed me that. Why? There had been a garbled explanation—something about the old woman wanting to possess Revan’s body herself, but that was madness—surely—

Dar spoke of her too. Dar’Revan thought she’d mastered her old master after Malachor—but Dar hadn’t even known Arkan was Vima’s creature—not then. Not until I told her.

Dar said I was Vima’s creature too. But she was—all along—

“It occurred to me before—that I was only temporary.” It had. Oh, it had. On the Leviathan. On Korriban. And then, later on Coruscant, when Revan had gone as far as to make a record of her life… only to have Dar’Revan laugh at it, and push her out of the sky. “It seems fairly obvious. You made me to kill Malak.”

“Oh—no. No—no!” Vima’s smile was younger than the rest of her, younger than those white-blind eyes. “I first made you to keep the body warm, and to keep Shan from losing her mind. You performed effectively so I kept you to distract Malak and Tenebrae. Which you did—drawing his interest away from my tools—

“Tools? You mean your son? And Davad?”

“Again, asking a question when you know the response.”

“Your son died and I killed Davad Arkan. Your Darth Nihilus.”

“The best-laid plans fail. Even mine.” Vima took a breath. “My son was the true Mandalore. Oerin Lin would have united the clans and the Sith. Become a member of the Jedi Council. He was born to rule as you never were. He could have challenged the Sith Emperor for supremacy and clouded the minds of Vitiate himself with his illusions. With me by his side—and the strength of his siblings—we could have brought an endless peace to the galaxy… but now…..”

Truth? Or a lie? It hardly mattered. The old woman was hiding herself in the Force—if she still had it at all. Dustil had called her a null, and Revan’s senses agreed. Jasp had said Darth Sion had stripped the Force from her. Darth Sion is Oerin Lin. And you know he could do that. He did it to Mekel too. “The last time I saw you and Lin, Oerin didn’t seem to want you by his side. He said he’d destroy you.”

The old woman didn’t even blink. Her voice continued, flat and dry. “Vitiate was blinded by his attention to you, the promised one, his Sith’ae’rah. As I warned my apprentice time and time again—you cannot keep a singular focus. You must consider all facets of the game.”

“It isn’t a game,” Carth muttered.

“Game is a word that men of power use.” Vima shrugged. “Vitiate uses it often. To a man who has lived more than a thousand of this planet’s years, everything seems a blink for his amusement. The word ‘game’ is an appropriate term for how he sees his empire, and the sentients within it: all pieces under his command—played against the vagaries of chance…and to beat him, we must play as well.”

Behind the woman was a pile of rocks. There was something… something… about those stones. Revan blinked—and it seemed like light shone through the narrow cleft. A note—like an electro-synth band tuning buzzed in her ears.

“… lest our own failings cripple us,” Vima folded her arms. She appeared unarmed. “Now, do you understand?”

Not in the least. But Revan couldn’t stop staring at the rocks. That hard light—the bright flashing—it was coming from there.

“Freckles,” Carth’s voice buzzed in her ear. He’d come up behind her again, now nudging her with a hand, bringing her back to the present. “You okay?”

Freckles? “Didn’t know we’d decided on ‘Freckles,’” Revan muttered. “There’s something—” She grabbed his hand—not willing to let go, not when she’d lost him so often before.

“Ahh. The place calls to you.” Vima’s voice again, intruding where it wasn’t wanted. “As it did before.”

“What?” There was something under those rocks. The darkness she’d sensed from the air had been Dustil. But this—even as she looked the sound flashed again—like the scales of a fish underwater, a star glimpsed through an ion cloud.

“You were never meant to last,” Vima Sunrider said. “But you have exceeded my expectations, Revan. Truly, you are still the Sith’ae’rah, even broken.” She smiled, a gentle smile, almost soft. “I am so proud of you, my apprentice.”

“Uh, thanks.” Another step. It took effort to turn her head back, to signal to Leskal and the others on the hill behind them, to meet Carth’s eyes and nod as if she had this under control.

He squeezed her hand, voice low. “I don’t trust her.”

“Good,” she muttered back, then raised her voice, glaring at the old woman. “Vima? What do you think I was meant for?”

“What were you meant to be? Nothing. As I have said. But that is not the question. The question is, what have you become? What have you forged from yourself?”

“Someone who doesn’t need to answer your fracking questions,” Revan snapped. “Answer mine. What’s in that cave?”
“I will show you.” The old woman took a step toward the cave, beckoning Revan to follow. “Please. Bring your guards, if you prefer the company of Clan to mine alone. Bring your captain and Lord Malak too.”

Careful. She lies, a phantom voice whispered in Revan’s mind. Always remember: Vima always lies—especially when she’s telling the truth.

Xxx

Whatever was in that cave was tugging at Dustil’s brain in a way that he really didn’t fracking like—any more than he liked that null old hag, standing back from them now, softly humming to herself like a mark in the Coruscanti Underground, while she waited to see what Revan, the special, fracksome savior of the galaxy, would do.

“You go check out the cave. I’m staying up here with Father,” Dustil leaned back against a rock, keeping a careful eye on the armored Mandalorians, who were now traipsing down the hill from Revan’s shuttle. Three of them. Maybe he should comm Inse, see if she’d made it through the fight. He thought she had, but it was hard to tell right now—between the cave and Revan fracking Starfire—the Force was pretty loud right here—even if the rest of the planet felt like nothing.

The Force felt like it didn’t like this dead planet either.

Father coughed again, and it looked more like Revan was holding him up than the other way around. “M’going....” he rasped. “We... we can all go.”

“I don’t know—” Revan looked past Dustil to her approaching minions. She’d barely reacted to Dustil’s eyes and his skin. There was a part of him that was disappointed, that had expected the former Dark Lord of the Sith to be impressed. “Leskal? Did you hear from Canderous?”

“Yes. They found nothing,” the boy reported. “I gave them our coordinates.”

“Maybe we should wait.” Revan glanced restlessly between the Mandalorians and Dustil.

It took Dustil a sec—longer than it should have—to figure out her damage. “You think I’m gonna hurt someone if I stay out here without you?” Dustil felt a small spark of pride. “I mean, I could. I could take out all three of your minions if I wanted to—but why would I? Your fracking Mandalorian army is my Mandalorian army.”

“Oh, yeah? What the hell did you do, Dustil?” She stepped away from his father, who teetered on his feet until a glance from her made it stop—holding Father up with the Force—Dustil could feel the weaves around her flex—frack, he could almost see them—she was lighting it up so strong. “Collect a bunch of Sith holocrons and eat them? Malak’s ghost wasn’t enough? What did you do?”

Finished my lessons, Lord Revan. “Oh, Malak’s long gone.” Dustil gave her a twisted grin. “Just left a few memories....”

“And you still have the Force.” Her head tilted. She’d dyed her hair brown. It made her look more like the crazy smuggler, which was a little fracked, honestly. “How is that possible?”

“Thought I’d wash out, like Mekk did?” Dustil sneered. “No. I’m the one who’s been holding this together while your bitch double rotted in a coma and that crazy—”

“Dustil!” His father’s weak voice still made Dustil’s mouth snap shut, but purely out of guilt. Wrong of them to put the old man through this. Wrong of her.
“My double—she’s in a coma?” Revan glanced back toward the old, lying null, and frowned. Weirdly, all the fight seemed to go out of her, like she was scared of the other one. “We’ll talk about this later.”

“We will have much time to speak later,” the lying old bint agreed. “On your ship, Revan. On the way to Dromund Kaas. But for now…” she lowered her visor again, which covered those gross white eyes at least. “This will not take long, but you must see.”

“I’m staying out here,” Dustil muttered, sitting down on the dusty ground against a big rock. A piece of broken masonry was digging into his ass, but he wasn’t going to move. Not a muscle. “Leave Dad with me while you go frack around with the bint, Revan.”

That… thing in the cave felt like an itch on the back of his neck. But his will was stronger than a fracking itch.

His father looked between them, confused, almost like he didn’t know where he was. “I’m not leaving you again, Freckles,” he said weakly—his head turning to her and not his son who’d saved his fricking hide. “We should… we should all go.”

“I’m not moving,” Dustil said. “My feet hurt.” They didn’t. When the Force felt like this, all easy under his will, nothing hurt at all.

“Dustil…” Dustil hated that wheedling tone of voice from his old man. It lacked dignity.

“Frack off.” Dustil put his hands behind his head and looked up at the clouds. They looked like shit.

“Fine,” Revan muttered. Her voice shifted into Mandalorian. “Leskal. If the kid moves, shoot him. Aim for the legs or the hands. Not a kill-shot. And then run. I’ll come as fast as I can. Keep a safe distance—I don’t know how far he can jump or throw that saber—” She took a step toward him, put her hand out, switching back to Basic. “Hells. Give me the saber, Dustil.”

“Farther than you think,” Dustil answered her smugly in Mando, looking up. “And no fracking way.” He’d never been good at Mandalorian back on Korriban, but that was one of the things Malak had left in his brain—a frack of a lot more useful than some crap about trade agreements, or the feeling that Malak had been to this place before....

His lightsaber twitched on his belt like she’d called it, but the Force had slowed time for Dustil too, and a millisecond in advance his grip had already clamped down on the hilt. “I said no,” he growled, feeling his immense power flex around him like wings, drawing deep from the darkness inside—

Dustil had found his true power on Kaas, but now it was with him whenever he wanted it. Even lounging on the ground with her above, he knew he could change the odds in heartbeat, if he needed. If she tried anything—

In a flash she was over him. Revan’s hand closed on Dustil’s arm, and a combination of Force and what had to be her own muscle jerked him to his feet. He was taller than she was, so it was easy to keep glaring—now glaring down at her—channeling his hate while he waited for her to make the first move.

Except the dumb bint just stood there, waiting for him, like she wanted to see how far he’d go.
Dust eddied around them, and so Dustil started to shape it into a fist to shove her back—when suddenly, her lips practically pressed into his ear—or at least it felt like that—like each word carried the Force—less compulsion than pure, raw threat—her head right in front of him, those ice-green eyes blazing up into his own.

“Listen to me, Darth Sulksalot, if you hurt anyone here, it will kill your father,” she hissed. “You want me to kick your ass later, that’s no problem. I got in a lot of practice with Mekel Jin kicking Sithkid ass—and I don’t mind giving you the same lesson.”

The roar in his throat froze almost before it began, forced back by an invisible hand. Revan let go and that same pressure forced Dustil to the ground like she was Shardaan bending a prospie’s fingers back, like she could break him just like that—

Yeah, she's stronger than you, that voice that always sounded like Mekk whispered. But she won't kill you. That's her weakness.

“Wait. Here.” she added, and her words echoed, drilled into his brain, but Dustil was stronger than she realized, and smarter, and he could be more powerful—

Don’t be an idiot, fockda. Not here. Not now. She’s right. It would kill Dear Old Dads if you tried....

The voice wasn’t Mekk’s, of course—since poor Mekk had karked—but it also wasn’t wrong.

“Oh, I’ll wait,” Dustil muttered, sinking back to the dirt, letting Revan think she’d won.

XXX

Fracking dumbass kid! Revan didn’t dare look at Carth as they left his Force-damned hulk of a son behind. Carth held her hand, leaning on her more than she liked.

His son was still armed. Revan hoped she wouldn't live to regret that.

“I understand… why you did that,” her husband whispered in her ear. “But… but later… there has to be some way to bring him back—”

“Do you think he’ll try anything?” She didn’t want to ask—the fear was half the reason she didn’t want to leave Carth there too—but she had a responsibility to those Mando’ade, not to get them killed by Carth’s crazy Sith son.

“No,” he shook his head. “Not… not unless something happens to me.” His eyes searched hers. “That’s… that’s good, right? He still… he still cares about me. That—it has to be good.”

“Sure,” she lied. If something happens to you, I’m not sure I can stop him. “We’ll get him back. If there’s a way, we’ll find it.”

“I—I know. You came back from worse.” He gave her a wan smile, coughing again.

Yes. But I had a cause to fall for. Your son is just an asshole—

Revan couldn’t say that out loud. Maybe Mekel could help get through to Dustil. They’d been close before. And Mekel had more brains than she’d given him credit for on Korriban.

The cave opening was narrow and dank. Revan didn’t like it, but she kept following the old woman in front of her, with Carth leaning on her arm. His twisted son’s power in the Force beat on her Dustil’s strength now reminded her uncannily of the way he’d felt when Malak possessed him; but she could sense nothing of Malak’s ghost now. He and Carth were both dressed like Imperial officers but for some reason Dustil’s uniform was missing a sleeve. His bare arm had been so stippled with dark side corruption she’d thought it had to be fake—until his rage spiked.

He’s not stronger than me. As a mantra, it was less than comforting because she wasn’t sure the difference would matter. She wouldn’t kill Dustil, if it came down to it, but would he pull back from killing her?

“Revan,” Carth’s beard brushed her ear. His hand was feverishly warm, his feet stumbling so much she wondered if he knew she’d extended the Force around him to keep him upright. “Y–you find the nicest places to take me, Freckles.”

“Well, we’ll always have Tatooine,” she muttered back, for there had been a cave there too.

“I have a lot to tell you,” he added.

“Figured that when I saw you dressed like a Sith admiral—and Dustil—but—” Revan shook her head, raising her eyebrows toward the schutta in front of them. “We’ve got time, right?”

“Later,” he nodded, getting it. “You… you got the Aleema.”

“Yes.” She let out a breath. “Great medbay. Can’t wait to show you.”

“Sounds romantic.” He stumbled again, this time nearly into a wall, and she cushioned it with the Force. “Are you holding me——” she felt him tense against the invisible weight holding him upright, and then he coughed again, shoulders shaking with it.

“Can’t have my Sith admiral falling down on the job.” So many questions. How the hell did you get caught in this? Mekel had filled in some of the blanks, but he hadn’t known much—

And what he’d said had only been half intelligible.

Xxx

“—Malak kept taking over Dustil’s body, but your double and Zaalbar and me ran into the forest.”

“My double. You mean Polla Organa?”

“Yeah. Captain Onasi told us to run. Polla Organa’s… um—she was nice. We fell asleep. Guess she was pretending to be you before, but that lasted about til Dustil’s body got unthawed—then I was holding the Sith off with Dustil so Polla and Zaalbar could get away—”

“Both of you were in Dustil’s body?”

“All three of us. There was this hunt? A party. *Like a bunch of Sith riding animals, and we killed a terentatek—I started to talk to Dustil’s dads—he was pissed—and then… bam! Back on Coruscant and just me staring at Master Kavar and Master Klee like a fracking rube. Oerin fracking Lin did something and it was just… gone.”

“You didn’t see… the other me, or Seiran Wen? Was Carth okay?”

“I don’t fracking know—I was back on Coru, remember? Thought it was ysalamiri, but it wasn’t, and then Lin left, and I killed Master Klee because he was possessed, and then Dear Old Dads and Yuthura fracking Ban showed up to rescue me but they were too fracking late—”

“You killed Master Klee? Without the Force?”

“Got the jump on him. He was possessed. Wasn't really him at all—just that fracking Emperor. He was laughing.”

“And what about Dar’Revan?”

“Huh?”

After she explained he just blinked.

“You mean the Sheris bint? Never saw her on Kaas—just, uh, in Malak’s room back on Coruscant—he used to watch her sleep—”

“Never mind.”

His face was betta–root red, and Revan tried not to shudder.

Xxx

My double was in a coma. Or dead.

“Polla,” she murmured, soft so the old woman wouldn't hear. “And Dar. What about—”

“Here,” Vima Sunrider interrupted. The rough corridor had changed to smooth, flagstones underfoot now instead of rubble, and the hall opened—

XXX

The room was vast and arched, and probably important, but all Carth wanted to do now was sit down. He saw a set of steps that seemed to lead into a blank wall near the entrance, and he pulled Revan towards them.

“Polla? And Dar. What about—”

“Here,” Vima Sunrider interrupted, motioning them both forward. In the black, the walls looked artificially smooth, the ceiling low enough to be oppressive.

What about Polla? What can I say? “Polla’s… .” his one weak word drew his wife’s attention back, lights on her armor making her eyes pools in the darkness, suddenly set in pits of shadow as deep as his son’s.

“You okay, Flyboy?”

“It’s dark.” He could tell almost immediately from her puzzled frown that she hadn’t even noticed—the Force probably affected her vision, or she had been so single–minded she hadn’t noticed because it didn’t matter compared to whatever she felt in the Force. “If I sit down, you can stop holding me up in the Force, beautiful.”

“I don’t like this.”
“I didn’t like it when you shot down the Sojourn,” he managed, pulling away from her long enough to make his knees work and sit. “But I’m here. You’re here. We’ll get through it.”

“Yeah.” She leaned in and kissed him, now all worried and sloppy.

Carth was starting to like her concerned kisses as much as he’d always loved the passionate ones. “Go,” he said. “Just be careful.”

“Here.” She peeled something off her belt. It was disc–shaped and glowing. “Extra energy shield. Put it on, just in case.”

“Nice light source too,” he managed.

“Yeah.” Her hand tugged at his hair. It was too short. Carth had a sudden moment of vanity, wondering if she’d noticed—if she hated the beard. Then his wife stood up, walking away from him, leaving a cold space by his side. “What is this place, Vima?”

“A broken tomb,” the lying old woman said. “For a man who no longer needs one.”

XXX

Mekel landed their fighter perfectly, earning a grunt of approval from Canderous Ordo, as if the man hadn’t just been barking orders at him the whole way through atmosphere, like Mekel had never piloted anything before. (He had… a lot. On sims.)

They landed next to the Misto VI, the shuttlecraft from the Aleema that had broadcast the signal for them to find. Without the Force, Mekel couldn’t tell if there was anyone inside it—or inside that other shuttle parked by the chemical fire burning in a storage container in the valley below.

“Looks like the kids are down there,” Canderous remarked as their hatch lifted and they both jumped out. “I don’t see Revan, but there’s someone behind that boulder. See the shadow?”

The three armored Mandalorians were grouped around a pile of rocks like they were guarding them. A larger boulder—or piece of rubble—half-blocked their view, but someone’s shadow stretched out below on the dusty ground, like the person was sacked out. Or hiding.

The broad side of another shuttle formed a decent ambush wall. If Mekel hadn’t seen their own men standing there so calm, he’d have wondered if there were more sents hiding behind it.

“That’s a Wies shuttle,” Canderous added.

“How can you tell?” Mekel didn’t see any clan signs on it.

“They’re the only ones fool enough to patch a plasma cannon to the front end.” Canderous shrugged. “Blast too close to anything large enough to have grav with those and you’ll send yourself in a spin. Not practical, unless you’re trying to ram something.”

“They see us.” Mekel adjusted the feed on his visor, amping it up. Leskal was waving. He waved back. “S’cuy ner vod!”

“Infrared’s got nothing,” Canderous noted. “Cept that fire’s fresh, and there’s some kind of underground tunnel in the rocks—”

The shadow behind the rock shifted and stood up—

And Mekel’s hand froze halfway down from the wave—along with his blood and his guts.
“Haar’chak! That Carth’s kid?” Canderous didn’t sound sure. “What the kriﬃng hell?”

“Damn,” Mekel said. His mouth had gone dry. It was probably fracked, but the ﬁrst thing he felt was envy. Took a lot of power to go that dark. Even fracking Uther hadn’t looked so—he could see Telos’s eyes glowing from here. “What the frack?”

XXX

Carth kept saying it was dark in the room, but it didn’t seem dark at all. In fact, the longer Revan stood there, the lighter their surroundings became, until the very air seemed to resonate, chiming like a note coming into tune.

“You will not remember,” Vima Sunrider said. “But your feet have walked these steps before.”

The thing that Vima stood in front of looked like a crystal dome, top cracked and blackened. Glass crunched under Revan’s boots as she approached. Her hand had fallen to her lightsaber again, and for a moment the world ﬂickered and she was stabbing down into its shimmering depths with a sparking yellow blade—

XXX

“You’ve destroyed it now, Red.” Malak’s hand caught her arm. “Mind explaining why—”

“I can’t.” She turned back to him, hoping—

But hope died as her husband’s eyes began to glow and an inhuman laugh twisted from his throat—

“Hah, hah,” the monster said. “Oh, my Starﬁre! These little betrayals are beneath you! Indeed, all you’ve done now is doom this world. Did you truly think my essence remained in this vulnerable shell?”

“I had to try.” She had to remain calm, ignore the storm rising inside at the sight of Malak possessed again.

She’d hoped—they’d ﬁnally found the right planet and she’d hoped—

Her husband’s rotting mouth chuckled. “I know. But now you see. Let me show you your own tomb—upon a jungle world, young and teeming with so many lives—let me show you, each and every one—”

XXX

“Revan? What did you see in the crystal?” The old woman’s voice was almost kind, soft. “Its resonance holds memories, for those it has seen before. “What did you see?”

Revan’s ﬁngers touched the cauterized edges of the crystal, and it vibrated under her ﬁngers. There was a… rightness to it. Even broken, it felt… good. Beneath the cracked glass, a humanoid corpse curled, half of it crumbled to dust.

“Nothing,” she lied.

The old woman chuckled. “Ah. Keep the visions to yourself, then—if blind ignorance is your preference.”

Revan kept her hand on the crystal. It was… warm, under her touch, which should have been impossible. “Let me guess… that’s the Sith Emperor’s body? Did I kill him?”

“Do you think such a creature is killed by the dissolution of one mortal body?” Vima shook her head, a faint smile playing around her lips. “Or, do you think the tomb summoned you here merely for the sight of a rotted corpse?”

“Should I guess,” Revan snapped. “No?”

The ruined dome creaked, and began to move under her hands, retracting to reveal more of the withered thing within. The body was small and seemingly harmless. And dead.

“As I expected,” Vima said. “The tomb opens for you.”

“Must have had good engineers,” Revan said. “Maybe I didn’t sever the power source when I was here before.”

“His tomb knows you.” Vima corrected. “Even through the cracks of your shattered mind. Like calls to like.”

Sure, I can see the family resemblance from here. “That was him? Tenebrae?” What had Vima called him? Vitiate?

The body looked so small.

“Yes. A rancor sheds its skin in the larval stage. So, too, the Sith’ae’rah. This is the first body of the Deathless. A slave named Tenebrae, bastard–born to a Sith lord. A child can endure much, but not all before their tether snaps—and so, one day, did his.” The lights of Vima’s visor made her face look like a skull. “But that is a tale for another time. The Star Maps revealed more than the Forge. They brought you to this place. And here you shattered Vitiate’s tomb to sever his connection at its root.”

“It didn’t work.” She glanced back toward Carth, more uneasy than ever. That memory of Malak’s red, glowing eyes—that asshole’s laughter—

“Your powers of observation are at least equal to those of the mad child outside.”

“So, why is it still calling me? And Dustil… he heard it too.” She could tell, it had been written in every tense line of his body, locked against following them. Not just her command, not just fear of her—stubbornness.

He’s smart enough to know that ancient artifacts don’t call you through the Force to buy you krumpa–cakes!

Am I?

“The tomb calls to you, but it is not the only thing in this place. The bastard boy was clever.” Vima walked to the wall, her feet scuffling a section of the floor. “He hid a piece of himself, away from the rest. Silent for centuries, but in time… no one walks alone by choice, Revan. It calls to anyone now. Even to fools.”

“I can feel it.” She could—hard and bright. She walked to the wall, hand brushing the smooth surface. Her gesture sent a cloud of dust crumpling as a panel in the wall slid open, revealing a triangular, faceted holocron, petals already unfolding into the light—

“Hello?” the holocron said, features animating. The face was round and maybe a little chubby, the features humanoid, but not entirely human. But young—even younger than Dustil. The face seemed to focus on her. “You… you came back!”

“Hello,” she said carefully. “Did you…uh, did you think I wouldn’t?”

“Did you stop him, Revan?” The boy paused. “I mean—did you stop me?”

XXX

Dawn had broken all over the Derran continent, and sure enough, just like the creepy old sales guy had said, they were up and out in the fields, spraying botfly poison at the break of it, before the eridu leaves had a chance to dry out from the nighttime rain.

Kore had tried to get out of helping, but Bendowen Organa could be pretty strict—strictener than Ma-Molla, or even Jasp Organa had been before he left—and although the farmer wouldn't let Kore anywhere near the plants, he had him driving the big tracker that sprayed stuff everywhere, wearing a mask just like Bendowen was, and Ooka, as the two of them ran the small threshers behind. The old guy had only brought three masks, and there were four of them, but he said he didn't need one at all because you got used to the chemicals or something.

Kore glanced at the shed again, being careful to keep the steering in track. That tickling feeling hadn't stopped, but he'd seen no sign of the man in black. He was still trying to figure out their relationship—was the man like his chap? He had to be. Then who had sent him? One of his mothers? Father? Some last be-quest from Grandfather's estate?

Maybe the Genoharadan. He wasn't supposed to really know about them until he was an Amaltine, but as Leeshy said, knowledge was power, and when he’d asked Mother, she’d told him.

The shed door stayed closed, which made sense, because Kore’s secret chap wouldn’t reveal himself to just randoms and there was no danger here.

“That's done!” Bendowen finally called out, and Kore stopped the tracker and jumped down, pushing up his mask. The stuff didn't really smell like anything, so he figured it couldn't be that bad for you—no need to wait for it to disperse. They'd studied lots of poisons back when he was an Eg—and the ones you couldn't tell about were (usually) either harmless or totally lethal—but ones meant for bugs usually weren't designed to affect more complex organics.

“You did a good job, kiddo,” Ooka told him, smiling. She'd pushed up her mask too. “Mind the seedlings, though. Try to keep at least a meter between. And don't… think about them too much.”

“Everyone ready for breakfast?” Bendowen asked.

“Tut, tut. Almost! I just need a holo—” the pesticide guy said. “Just to prove I was here. It's just for record–keeping. Won't take but a moment—”

“Go ahead, Mister Gant.” Ooka tussled Kore’s hair and for once he didn't mind as much. “We’ll get out of your way—”

“But do that! I could make you a copy—” his black goggles reflected Kore and Ooka’s faces. Kore realized he was smiling and shut it down, because as okay as this morning had been, it still wasn't home, and they still weren't letting him go back to school.

“Sure.” Bendowen pushed up his mask too and swung an arm over Kore’s shoulders. He wasn't much—he wasn't as much taller as Kore expected, standing close like that.
“Smile!” The old sales guy named Gant said. And they all did—even Kore, who hadn't meant to.

XX
Dustil lay on the ground with his eyes closed on a dead planet.

Below him in the cave he could sense the fracking ion storm that was Revan, the sick shadow that was his father, and that black null place that was Master Fracking Vima Sunrider, who’d been the hero of the Sixthday shows he’d watched as a kid—all about her life as a kid—except now she was an ugly old wrinkled lying hag.

On a dead world it was easier to see things above as well as below—like those two null sparks of live cannon fodder coming closer in the sky, descending in some kind of ship.

Dustil sat up, peering around the rock to watch their fighter land. Simpa– class. Mandalorian with Ordo clan signs. Probably more of Revan’s fracking crew.

Reinforcements to guard me? She could call in an entire battalion. I could take them. I could do it before she got out of the cave, if I wanted.

“S’cuy!” One of the Mandalorians behind him called out to the two figures popping out of the fighter, voice distorted by his helm.

The shorter of the two armored figures stepping out of the four–man fighter called back, cheerful and metallic. “S’cuy, ner vod!”

Vod. It meant brother. They all called themselves that. Even the women.

“Think they found her body?” one of the Mandies behind Dustil asked the others.

“Think the Lin vod would sound so happy if they had?”

“That's true, then? She really—”

“Shersh’ik. Hasn’t been back to the dorms since.”

Sheresh’ik. That was sex. Dustil didn’t want to fracking know about Mandie sex.

“Tell them to come down the hill slowly,” Dustil snapped, standing up. He didn’t even have to look behind him. He could feel the Mandies reacting to the tone of his voice, to the weight of the Force in it. Maybe they were hard as frack to compel, but they knew how to take orders. Revan had proven that. And Malak... Malak had fought enough of them to just know it.

Dustil stepped out from behind the boulder. Both Mandalorians stopped walking down the hill above him and froze—like those chivholes had never seen a real Sith before.

“Revan said I’m not allowed to kill you,” he called out. “But I can make it hurt. Come down slowly, with your hands up.”

“Can I shoot him?” one of the kids behind him muttered softly—but not soft enough for Force– trained ears. “General Revan said no kill– shots, but—”

Dustil’s fingers twitched a little and the kid’s words cut out. His saber snapped into his hand and he lit up, just in case anyone got ideas. Snap hiss, then that soothing hum, the familiar red.

The shorter figure froze halfway down the hill. He wasn’t that small, just narrower than the other one. His hand closed on what looked an awful lot like a lightsaber hilt. “Don’t be a fracking asshole, Telos,” he called, holding the unlit blade out in a perfect Korriban salute.

Might have looked more dignified if his other hand hadn’t been busy flipping Dustil off with a three–fingered shake that sents called the ‘backhanded frack-up’ in the Coruscanti Underground.

XXX

“Did you stop him?” The boy’s image repeated like a scratched holodisk. “I mean me?”

“I don’t know,” Revan said warily.

Vima Sunrider had led her to this holocron, and seemed to be claiming it was the Sith Emperor—or the kid Tenebrae had been before he’d become the Sith Emperor. How could she trust it?

“How can you not know?” The voice was a child’s, but that had to be a trick. The dialect of Ancient Sith he was speaking was odd, but intelligible, the accent hard to place…. Worriedly, Revan glanced back toward Carth. He coughed again, the shadows from the tomb making bones in his face, highlighting the sunken cheeks, his shaking hands.

He needs a medix.

“We’ll talk later,” she told the holocron—not that she had to tell it anything. When she’d found the one with Mission’s memories on the Hawk she’d shut it down when it started talking. Holocrons didn’t remember, they were just recordings—

But this holocron did. It said I came back.

“You look older. I like—” the boy’s words cut out mid–sentence as Revan pushed at the holocron with the Force, compressing its edges until it snapped back into dormancy. The slick surface was cold as she tucked it into her belt, looping it onto one of the magnetized tie–alls the Mando’ade used to store miscellaneous salvage.

“I think we’ve wasted enough time here,” she added, turning back to Carth. He looked up, giving her a confused smile that made her even more uneasy. He needs a medix. Now.

“The tomb and its holocron both answered you. Do you consider retrieving some knowledge of your former self a waste?” Vima Sunrider sounded disapproving.

Revan wondered if her former self had given a frack about the old woman’s approval. “Yes.” She walked to Carth. His breathing was more labored than she liked, and she wished to hell and back that some of the healing lessons Bastila and Juhani had given her had taken. Carth felt wrong in the Force, like a cracked vase she had no idea how to fix.

“I see…” Vima murmured. “Revan was a catalyst all of her life. She would not believe she could effect change without clear, empirical evidence. She understood the virtue of curiosity.”

“Maybe you didn’t know what was here and you just wanted to see,” Revan shot back. She was getting a little tired of Vima Sunrider referring to Revan as if Revan wasn’t her. “Maybe you just wanted the holocron for yourself. You can’t have it.”

“You are greedy too,” the old woman shot back. “Revan was never needlessly covetous.”

“S’dark in here,” Carth whispered. “I didn’t see. Dustil… he’s outside?”

“We left him out there.” Which seemed more and more like a misstep.

Her comm–link beeped. “You okay?” Granite. Canderous’s voice. “Carth’s kid’s got his saber out. I think Jin’s trying to bluff it through, but—”

“Dustil—” Carth’s voice was a whisper. His arm over hers felt like it was burning up, even through the fabric of his uniform. “Don’t… Canderous, don’t hurt… him.”

“Hah! Better tell that to Jin! Vod can shoot—better than you, Revan.”

“What?” Carth’s arm tightened on Revan’s.

She was already dragging Carth through the tunnel. Vima Sunrider could do whatever the frack she wanted with this tomb. Revan had half a mind to bury her in it.

XXX

“Mekk?” Dustil’s voice cracked, giving the word at least three syllables.

“No, I’m your moms’s fracking ghost and I’m fracking myself, fockda.” Mekel advanced, twirling the unlit saber very carefully, in case Dustil activated it and tried to take his head off. Not that he thought… frack, he didn’t know what to think. Telos was still standing there, mouth open like he was turning tricks on his nameday, red blaze of his lightsaber twitching like he was stimmed.

And he looked… he looked dark.

Mekel’s free hand fumbled with the quik–tab on his helmet and it finally popped off. The air on this planet smelled like rotten Moffa eggs. The beard he’d been growing fracking itched, as the seal created instant–sweat, slicking his skin, stinging in his eyes. “Telos,” Mekel said again. “Hey. Nice lines, man. Bandon’d be jealous.”

“Bandon was an asshole.” Dustil’s voice choked a little, even though no one was Force choking him.

XXX

Mekk’s hair was shaved short and he looked like that mess of stubble on his chin was almost a beard now. His eyes widened, probably impressed by the Sith Lord before him, but Dustil couldn’t tell from the way he felt. Mekk could have been an illusion, or a dream. He wasn’t there in the Force at all. He wasn’t anywhere Dustil could feel him—just another null in armor, twitching as he straightened and took two steps forward.

“How—” Dustil nearly gutted the Mandie kid called Leskal who snuck up behind him and then came charging out—and he probably would have, if he hadn’t still been gaping at Mekel, alive and perfectly healthy and dressing like a fracking Mando’ade.
“S’cuy, Mand’alor!” Leskal said, running up to Canderous Ordo, (who’d taken off his helm too) before the old man held up a hand to hold him off. They were talking now, but they didn’t matter anymore.

Mekel walked down the hill to Dustil. He’d tucked his unlit saber back on his belt. He had two blasters now, one on each hip, now one hand on each. With the stubble they made him look dangerous, but it was all a lie. Now that he was closer, Dustil could feel his pulse pounding—not in the Force, but through it. His face was sweaty and those big black eyes were twitchy.

He was right in front of Dustil, but in the Force he felt like any other null.

_He’s scared. Scared of me._

“You grow an extra hand, or do you use the saber with your dick?” As far as it went, it wasn’t Dustil’s best line, but he cracked a smile for it.

Mekel paused, looking him up and down. One side of his mouth tugged up. “Is it Dress–as–Admiral–Karath–Day on this fracking planet, or are you working your way through Ugly School as a Sith stripper?” He was close enough now that Dustil saw him swallow, those big black eyes skittering away and then coming back to meet his. “Want me to rip off the other sleeve of that jacket, or should we find you a pole?”

His arm was close enough to grab—or knock a blaster out of it with a punch if he drew—but before Dustil could do anything more, Mekel placed his gauntleted hand squarely on Dustil’s chest and shoved him back.

Dustil didn’t have to move at all, but he stepped back automatically, staring into those dark eyes that were suddenly a complete mystery.

“Dustil!” From somewhere behind them, Revan had remembered he existed. Her voice was echoed by his father’s.

“Mekel’s alive?” Father sounded as surprised as Dustil was. The old woman was back there too—and out of the corner of Dustil’s eye he saw Revan help his father over to Canderous Ordo, now both of them gesticulating toward the ships parked on top of the hill, the other ship down here, and—

“Hey. Fockda.” Mekel’s hand pushed him back again. It took Dustil a second to realize he was supposed to move backward, toward the wall of the shuttle behind them, away from the crowd. The ship’s hull came up, hard and curved behind his back and then Mekel stepped forward, eyes level and a little too bright.

“That’s Lord Fockda,” Dustil muttered. “Show some respect. What are you supposed to be? Fracking Mandalore the Short? Mekelkins the Mandalittle?”

“General Revan’s cousin,” Mekel said, smile creeping to the other side of his mouth now. “Remember when we found out Vrook was my dads? Well, me and her, we’re pals now. They call me Mekel of Clan Lin.”

“Jin of Lin? You sound like a drink.”

“Yeah, well, you... “ Mekel’s voice trailed off, fumbling for the come–back. “Y–you look like shit, asshole. So... uh, how powerful are you now?"

His gauntleted hand reached out again, but this time Dustil caught it with his. The Force helped him clamp down and their fingers locked: armored and skin. Mekel’s armor creaked, as Dustil used his power to force their hands back down, swinging their enlaced hands back and forth, like they were kids skipping down a lane.

“You’re alive,” Dustil repeated stupidly. “I thought... thought you’d karked it.”

“Yeah.” Those dark eyes were almost liquid staring back into his. Mekel swallowed again, blinking them too fast. “Me too.”

XXX

Don’t panic, Revan told herself, as she dragged Carth out from the tunnel. With Canderous, there’s enough of us to take Dustil down fast if we need to. And probably alive—

That grim thought halted as she blinked, staring in near-disbelief at the scene before them.

Revan had rushed out expecting the worst—only to find a scene that looked surprisingly mundane. Dustil and Mekel Jin were leaning against Vima’s shuttle, while Canderous inspected it with a few of the other kids; everyone apparently unperturbed by the permacrete Sithkid sulking in their midst.

But the darkness Revan had sensed before—darkness she now knew had been coming from Dustil—had lessened, like tension in the air broken by a summer storm. Outwardly, if not for the Sith corruption etched on Dustil’s skin, he and Mekel could have been normal kids—or Korriban—normal, at least—elbowing and jostling each beside the ship. Dustil had even laughed once, glancing toward her and Carth smiling, and then back to Mekel Jin. Even Carth had seemed pleased to see his son’s old friend—the kid he’d once called Mister Sith Congeniality—he’d greeted him by name and a handshake before he doubled over coughing again.

Now, Canderous was helping Carth up the hill, trailed closely by the two kids. The others had already made it inside the Misto—Rowda and Wraid splitting off to fly the fighter and Vima’s shuttle back.

“The young warriors are all so loyal to your Mand’alor, and the Mand’alor so loyal to you....” The old woman’s voice interrupted Revan’s thoughts. “All, save that man who fancies himself another Malak. He is dangerous.”

“He’s none of your business,” Revan snapped. “Along with everything else.”

“True.” Vima took a step onto the shale. “But familial bonds are not always a bulwark against darker impulses. Revan learned this of herself before she fell. Did you know she was going to kill Malak? But petty betrayal set his hand against hers faster... and for that millisecond of difference in the timing of their commands, Revan lost.”

“You speak as if you were there.”

“I was.”

“Of course you were. Let me guess. Is this you gloating about betraying me to Malak?”

“It was Beya Organa who gave Malak word of Revan’s treachery. I had not foreseen it at the time. At the time, I agreed with Revan that Malak had outlived his usefulness. And Revan had another champion—”
“Davad.” It was only since she’d dropped him into a sun that Revan had started calling the man she’d barely known by his first name. “Right. And that was all your little plan too. Telling him to… to seduce me. Worm his way in between Malak and me—”

Revan had barely recognized the red-haired woman in the Sith’s memoirs—an idealized version of her own face and body that seemed to have nothing to do with what she saw in the mirror—both beautiful and—

Hideous. A monster. That cliff. Crashed on that planet. Holding that red hank of hair like a bald madwoman—

“The Onderonite’s affection was quite easy to direct,” the woman said. “A beastrider rejected by his drelx, the hormonal shifts of adolescence, a girl his own age whose strength would catch his eye…”

Revan gestured with the hilt of her saber for Vima Sunrider to follow the others. “I’ve heard enough.”

“Have you? I would have assumed you would have more questions for me.” Vima Sunrider glanced back. She'd put the visor on again, and it hid most of her expression—just those thin lips, pulled in a disapproving scowl. “My padawan was always so curious.”

“At the moment, I have a lightsaber,” Revan said, motioning with it again. The old woman was a blank space in the Force—uncannily like Mekel Jin, and presumably for the same reason. “And you need to get into our ship.”

“I no longer require weapons.” The woman’s back bent as she climbed the hill, suddenly managing to look frailer than ever. “But you may waggle yours at me, if it makes you feel more capable.”

Revan bit back an automatic insult as a retort. She wished she had a fracking idea where Oerin Lin was. Any Force-user who could take the Force away at will was another monster she'd need to kill.

Not revenge for the Jedi, she reminded herself. Necessity for the rest of us.

“Clan Wies was trying to kill us and you were with them,” she said to the old woman’s back. “Was your son Oerin working with you too?”

“I want you to destroy Vitiate, Revan. So why would I want you dead?” Vima Sunrider’s feet slipped on the slope and Revan had to stop herself from automatically taking her arm to help.

“You were with Wies and they were firing on my ship.” Canderous had confirmed it. Was she dodging the question about Oerin Lin?

If it looks like a hessi and has a two-meter long tongue, it’s no kissra lambie. How many times had Ma told—

“Indeed. Kissandrix was always rash. When I realized her duplicity, I left.”

Revan remembered the armor-clad figure next to the Headwoman on the Wies bridge and wondered. She called me Knight Revan. No Mandalorian would do that. The voice had been distorted through the helm, but it had to have been Sunrider. “Sure you didn’t order Wies to attack us? Wasn’t that you on the bridge whispering in Kissandrix’s ear?”

“Do the clans take orders from an outsider? I have no status among them. Perhaps if my son or husband yet lived, a woman like Kissandrix might have taken my orders, but they are long dead, and so…when my attempts to dissuade her from attacking your ship failed, I fled. I had every expectation that my former padawan would manage to survive—and I knew she would hear the beacon on the planet, and so...” her voice trailed off. “I came here to find Revan.” She glanced back again at Revan, scowling like one of Auntie Mita’s friends who’d just found a botfly in her soup. “Have I found her—or merely a Deralian smuggler accidentally imbued with more strength than she can ever use wisely?”

Revan scoffed. “You think you’re going to teach me how to use the Force?”

Those lips pulled tight. “And so, one question is answered.”

They’d reached the others, and Revan paced behind as the woman made her way up the ramp of the ship.

“It’s not answered,” she muttered. Yes, you found me. And now you’re giving me advice. Out of the goodness of your heart?

Banthashit.

What do I do with you?

Vima’s voice gentled suddenly, standing in the doorway to the ship. She pushed her visor up and those blind eyes fluttered, as if they were focusing on Revan’s face. “You were my padawan once, Revan. After Malachor, I came here to offer my aid again.”

Triple banthashit. “Are you working with Dar’Revan?” That was the only thing that made sense. If Vima really opposed Tenebrae, if she wasn’t with Oerin, if this all wasn’t a trap. If Dar’Revan wasn’t just being manipulated—or manipulating Revan herself—

“You call her no longer Revan, as if you have taken her place. You could have taken her memories, but you did not.”

Not a fracking answer. “I was going to, but someone made her take them first!”

Vima turned away, her voice weary. “That was Sheris’s choice—”

“Don’t lie to me!” Revan had to fight to keep the Force out of her voice, to keep it low, even as she watched two rows of armored heads turn, saw Canderous—standing in the front of the ship—frown. “Davad showed me—he showed me what you did to her! Atris was there. And you were there too—you did it. You made them both do it!”

She was aware of the others watching them now too, even as she drew the old woman to the back of the shuttle, where Canderous and two of the kids were already positioned, weapons out. She hadn’t had to say anything at all: they could tell Vima Sunrider wasn’t an ally.

I bet the Aleema has a great brig. Can’t wait to see. Aemelie left it out of the tour. You can rot in it.

“The Onderonite was ever loyal.” The woman’s voice had changed, flattened. Those blind eyes blinked, and the lines in her face relaxed. For a second, she looked younger, but cold—and Revan had the impression that this was the real Vima, the one seldom seen—the face behind the mask. “I brought his shape to harness, but I could never have predicted how much the beast would bear for her. Kavar would have broken under the strain. Oerin was far too proud. The twins too young and weak. And Meetra Surik—”

“What about Malak?”
The mouth pursed, almost primly. “Malak was never mine. Revan should have been grateful for the illusion of free will—it was a choice my mother dared not allow. It was a choice our generation of Jedi died to give Revan—”

I’m Revan, you schutta. This anger wasn’t dangerous. It didn’t even feel like the dark side—just that punching the old woman in the face would feel justified.

Not the dark side, I just want to punch a blind old woman in the face. Huh. The thought was crazy enough that Revan almost laughed.

You should kill her, that cold inner voice whispered from the real dark. She always lies. She mocks you to your face with it, testing your mercy as a means to exploit it later—

“We have any shackles?” Revan asked Canderous. Carth’s face was too pale, but he cracked one eye open at the sound of her voice.

“Saved you a seat,” her husband coughed, patting it.

“Leskal and Dormian already primed the restraints.” Canderous shrugged, looking around, until one of them stepped forward with a crate of them. “Jin? You gonna fly us out of here or what?”

“Shira said I could.” One of the kids scowled.

“Naw, he needs the practice.” Canderous looked around. “Jin? Where’d you go?”

There was an awkward silence.

“Jin?”

“Huh?” Then Mekel popped out of the fresher like he’d been pushed. His chest armor was unbuckled, hanging awkwardly off his frame. “I… yeah. Sure. If you want.”

“Dustil?” Carth mumbled.

“Here, Dad—Father, I’m right here.” Dustil poked his head around the fresher door. “Just… give me a sec—”

“I’m gonna give you thirty, then you need to clear outta there.” Canderous chuckled. “You don’t want to know what happens when the waste–tank shifts before the grav scrubbers take it down again.”

Revan wanted to sit next to Carth, but she sat next to Vima instead, now shackled to her seat and trussed like a partrigg fowl. Someone had taken her visor and those white eyes stared straight ahead.

One of the ribbons that tied the woman’s white braids had a bell in it. For some reason, that made Revan feel… strange.

Hessi walking over my grave.

The woman’s head turned toward her. Again, that coldly remote face. There were traces of beauty in it, signs that she was younger than she had first appeared, but the network of lines creased everything, twisting those fragile features with bitterness. “You exceed my expectations, padawan.” Her lips pursed and she turned her head to the window. “In another world, you might have leashed the Beastrider instead of destroying him, and then used him to shatter Tenebrae’s grip upon the galaxy.”

The engines purred as their nose tilted skyward.

“Oh? In this one I just dropped him into a sun.” Revan closed her eyes.

Her former master didn't respond, just hummed something tuneless under her breath.

“What are you singing?” Revan asked, when the scow showed no sign of stopping.

“Nothing,” Vima said. “Just an old Krath lullaby.”

XXX

“The General’s shuttle is returning,” Aemelie noted out loud, frowning over her sensors and her husband’s odd requests. “Canderous wants us to prepare a Force cell for a dar’jett prisoner.”

“Dar’jett? They found one on the planet?”

“Yes. Apparently, working with Wies. He says she claims to be Jana Novasun herself.” Aemelie scoffed, because that seemed unlikely. She had never met the infamous mother of Oerin Lin, but the woman that both Rowda and Leskal had described (in their own reports, also scrolling on her screen) was far too old and frail to be her.

“Claims to be Jana Novasun?” Dessa scowled. Her father had come from a vassal branch of Clan Lin, and then married into Rialis. “I must see. You know, I met her as a child—several times.”

“You are a woman and can do what you will with women’s business, but do not overreach,” Aemelie warned her. “A clan whose leadership is weak enough to be misled deserve their fate.”

“The Fett Cassus was not misled—he lost,” Dessa corrected her. “There is no shame in it, except for Jana Novasun, who fled while the rest of her clan was slaughtered.” She shrugged. “I do not seek vengeance, merely answers.”

“At least Cassus Fett Lin had the wits to stay dead.” Perhaps that was rude to point out. If Gwenarius had been there, she might have frowned, Aemelie thought. Dessa sighed over-dramatically. “As far as we know.” She collected herself and then returned to her report. “Canderous’s ship is the last to return. In total, we recovered thirty-eight Imperials from the wreckage of the Sojourn. Other than that, the World of Tombs was a great disappointment. None of the machines from our grandmother’s time functioned. Rickallion of Zal reported that his patrol discovered a domed structure not previously recorded on our maps, but it was completely sealed, with no power signatures within. And Joetta’s squadron found a crashed Imperial gunship, but there were no crew aboard it at all—just some kind of organic matrix fitted atop the captain’s chair—”

“Organic matrix?” Abomination. “Not a body with implants?”

“No body. He took holovids. I forbade him from taking samples, of course, but looked more like...”

“Do not say it.” Such a concept was as much of an obscenity as the walking dead. Aemelie resisted the urge to spit on the floor like a superstitious child. “And the rest of our ships?” A rhetorical question, Aemelie waved her hand when Dessa tried to answer. “I’ve seen the reports.” They were grim. Of the ten who had jumped to this system before the traitorous akk wolves of Wies had struck, three had been destroyed utterly, two had jumped, and the others had sustained heavy damages. “The Sand Dreamer survived Malachor,” she mused, “only to die to a coward’s treachery.”

“It was still a glorious battle,” Philine interrupted them, wide–eyed enough to be charming, even if he was also rude. “Did General Ordo find any sign of Millifar—”

“He would have reported it.” Aemelie dialed open the comm–link to the service levels and placed the orders for a dar’jett prison to be activated. It was coming past time to tell Gwenarius about Millifar. To add another grenade to the pile, Oerina, the name Milli had chosen for the First Wife’s daughter, suddenly seemed tragically ill–conceived. True, Oerin Lin had not been the one to kill Canderous’s First Daughter, but Millifar had still been gaining mastery of her new arm, after Lin had ripped away the flesh one. Who was to say that the prosthesis itself had not caused her death?

Gwen’s babe will have to work hard to reclaim her name’s honor when she comes of age. But so will my Dxun, of course—

Revan had advised upon at least two neural disruptors, purely as a precaution. Aemelie decided that four might be better, and said so to Dessa.

“Lead the interrogation, if you like,” she added generously, to the woman who was already gathering her things to go. Technically, the task should be up to Canderous and Revan, of course; but Aemelie doubted that Revan knew—and Canderous had a lot to carry on his shield already.
“Keep guards with disruptors on her at all times. Canderous claims she says not to have the Force, but we all know she lies.”

“Gladly.” Dessa left, still strapping her swords to her belt. It rode awkwardly high now to account for the swell of her belly, and the new child of Rialis within.

XXX

The medbay was antiseptic and white and empty, except for them. Whether that meant the casualties of their recent battle were somewhere else, or there were none who could be saved, Revan wasn’t sure. But she was guiltily grateful, as she had been when Canderous quietly and efficiently took command of their crew on the shuttle and then transported Vima Sunrider (or Jana Novasun, as he called her) to a cell designed for Force–users. He’d even offered to place guards on ‘Carth’s kid’ before Revan asked. (She told him to have them maintain a discreet distance.)

“Your First Husband has the flu,” Headwoman Sinae told Revan, who now was trying not to hover and failing.

“I know that,” she snapped.

Carth had fallen asleep halfway to the Aleema. Revan had carried him to the medix as soon as they landed. She thought she could trust the others to get the Force–blind Sunrider schutta to a cell… especially since Revan had first taken the precaution of putting a helmet on the old woman’s head and turning the voder off so she couldn’t talk, then left instructions not to give her any flimsi, or anything to write with, or a comm, or any form of communication whatsoever, or to unshackle her hands or feet…not even to enter her cell—

Until when? Until she starves or pisses herself? What are you planning on doing with her?

I don’t know. She can rot in the cell until I do.

Killing her would be—
—expedient.
—efficient.
—wise. She betrayed you. Davad showed you what she did. Her loss of Force could be a ruse. She must have some plan—

Revan took a deep breath, trying to soothe those dark thoughts—only to have them replaced by the more personal.

But what if Carth dies?

Then I destroy Tenebrae. The same as if he lives.

How?

I’ll interrogate the old woman. I’ll ask Dustil what he knows. He was there too. Darth Sulksalot has to have picked up something while pretending to be Malak.

To his credit, Carth’s son had wanted to stay with his father—until Mekel dragged him off. Revan had told the guards she’d placed on the dorm block to shoot with tranks first and then comm her if the kid tried anything, but Dustil had seemed happy when he left, barking orders at her in a fake Coruscanti accent about letting him know when ‘the Admiral’ woke up.

Now Revan’s boots clicked on the floor of the medbay, pacing back and forth and watching her husband sleep. “Isn’t there something you can give to make Carth better faster?” she asked Headwoman Sinae. Again.

Carth looked terrible—probably a hike through a planet made of dust after crash–landing an escape pod hadn’t been what the medix ordered for him. His chest moved too quickly, and his cough sounded underwater, wet and gasping. His handsome face was pale, with lines around the mouth and gray at his temples she’d never seen before.

“The fever–downs should kick in soon,” Sinae shrugged. “I had heard of your Plague, of course, but this is the first case I’ve seen. Still, the man’s vitals are as stable now as they can be. Unless he gets worse and dies, he will recover.”

“This is the first case you’ve seen? So… everyone—your people are vaccinated already?” Canderous had told her that Gwenarius and most of the mothers and children had relocated to their home base, the location of which he was surprisingly reticent about revealing. Not that I need to know. But the others—

The Rakata themselves died of a plague, long ago. Another thought like a whisper, from the long–forgotten recesses of her mind.

“Mando’ade don’t get the Jedi Plague,” Sinae told her. “Or, rarely. In fact, I’ve only heard of two cases, and they were both adopted into Clan—excluding the Lin Deathless, of course.” Her eyes narrowed. “Have you been vaccinated? Because if not, you really need to stop slobbering on him. We do have some decon spray….” Even as she was talking, she pressed a few more derms on Carth’s skin. “There. He should regain consciousness with these. But don’t push him too hard—fever–downs are mild, not battle stimulants, and they don’t have the same adrenal compensators as the stronger types do.”

“Just don’t give him more,” the Headwoman said, walking away. She paused at the exit. “Did you require a contra as well? Normally I would not ask a woman from another clan her business, but Aemelie requested that I inquire—

Revan felt her cheeks flush. “Uh, my implant’s good, thanks—and I think… and… this isn’t… Carth still has his—”

“Make sure he rests,” the Headwoman said, and left.

“Right,” Revan muttered, looking down at her sleeping pilot. It sure didn't look like he'd been given stims—or that they’d need to worry about contras.

Her restless mind nagged at her. If Carth was going to sleep now, there were a dozen other tasks requiring her attention: that schutta in the brig, Darth Dustil Sulksalot in the midship quarters, a conversation with Aemelie about boundaries on the bridge, reviewing Millifar's last logs—her mind stuttered there, ashamed she hadn't put Canderous’s missing daughter first.

Still only missing. Not dead. We need to investigate. Canderous thought a ship—or ships—they may have jumped away—

But then, Carth twitched. “Rev—”

“Here, Flyboy.” She brushed his forehead with her lips. She’d taken hold of both his hands, was sitting on the side of his bed.

Carth's eyes opened—focusing on her face. A slow smile twitched on his mouth. “Hey,” he whispered. “You're here.”

“Hey, Captain Obvious,” she grinned back, trying to match his smile. “Yeah. So are you. Slacking off in the medbay, huh?”

“Yeah…. I—I—” He coughed again, and she waited patiently as his breathing steadied again. “Listen, uh. Maybe… maybe you should call me something else.”

“Since when do you not like Captain Obvious?” She'd been calling him that since Taris, because he had such an obvious face.

She snorted. “Jury’s out until I see the entire package. It's been months—”

“Yeah.” Carth squeezed her hands back, bringing one to his lips and kissed it lightly—an almost courtly gesture that Revan hadn't expected—until he drew her fingers into his mouth, eyes meeting hers with a boldness that was unabashedly intimate.

Revan leaned over him, meeting that gaze head–on. “Months,” she repeated softly. Her hand slid away from his lips then, down the strong line of his jaw, nestling between his robe in the fur of his chest, the flat planes beneath.

“I know,” he muttered, shifting back to give her room to lie beside him. “Believe me, I—”

The ship rolled then, engines ticking into hyperspace. Revan’s stomach lurched and she grabbed her comm, tapping it twice. “Aemelie? Hells! I thought we agreed not to jump yet!”
“General Revan? Are you still in Medix One? General Ordo has approved our jump to hyperspace.”

“Could have warned me first!”

“You are in the medbay. There are plenty of buckets, should you become ill. I’ve sent word to the ships trailing behind us not to tarry in the Medriaas system.”

“I thought we agreed to wait—”

“General Ordo has concerns that waiting at a location where we were known would invite another ambush and put us no closer to achieving our goals.”

Frack. That actually made sense.

“Thanks, Aemelie. Report again if anything goes wrong.”

“I hope your First Husband does not die,” Canderous’s wife said, and cut out.

“So does he,” Carth said. The fever–downs seemed to have kicked in. His eyes were clear and steady, and his breathing even, a little fast, but that was understandable.

“Aemelie hopes you won’t die because she wants to join us in our tent,” Revan told him. “She told me including Canderous would be optional.”

“Are you trying to kill me now?” Carth traced the edge of her eyebrow, eyes lit with a warmth she’d almost forgotten, when she settled back down, lying next to him. “Don’t think I could handle Canderous.”

“We also don’t have a tent. I believe you're expected to make one. You can use any material you like—long as you weave it yourself.”

“First Husband, huh?” Carth’s mouth twitched, as he propped himself carefully up on an elbow. “Not sure if that’s a promotion, or if the Mandalorians can’t count. Did you get any more husbands while I was gone?”

“No.” She shook her head, suddenly devoid of a comeback.

“Uh… good.” He coughed again. It was a jagged, ugly sound.

“Do you want me to get you some water?”

“I’m not dying, woman.” His lips quirked. “Stars, your face! I must look like hell.”

“I think if you were dead in hell you’d look better.” Her fingers wanted to brush that errant lock of hair away from his forehead, but it was already gone. “Who cut your hair?”

“Zaalbar.” He mock–frowned. “Maybe I’ll grow mine out like yours. You hate the beard, huh? That’s why your face has that new wrinkle in it?”

Hate was too strong a word for something irrelevant, but her shrug quirked the edges of his eyes.

“Ah.” He nodded slowly. “Alright then, first chance I get it’s gone, beautiful. Where’s Dustil?”

“He—he went off with Mekel. We’re keeping an eye on Dustil,” she added. “I mean, I can—if he does anything… dark, I’ll know in the Force.”

And Canderous gave everyone tranks and permission to use them.

“Mekel? Oh. Uh, they… that should be okay. Okay.” Carth nodded slowly, seeming to relax. “That's… it's good. You know he… and Mekel… he thought Mekel was dead.”

“I know. Oerin Lin broke the Force bond between them to get Malak’s ghost out.” Revan picked up Carth’s hand, running her fingers along the palm, feeling his pulse, good and strong now. “It was a Jedi plot—some of the Jedi, anyway. Didn't work so well for them—and Mekel lost the Force.”

“I was glad to get my son back, even if he… he was pretty upset—” his gaze shifted away. “You didn’t… guess you didn't get a chance to say good-bye to Malak’s ghost, then.”

“No. But I’d said good-bye to Malak before. Right before I killed him on the Star Forge.” She squeezed his hand and held his gaze, long enough to see the faint smile there.

“Serves me right.” He leaned in, wrapping an arm around her waist. “For saying something stupid.”

It wasn’t stupid. Just pointless. “Uh… are… the others…?” Revan was afraid to ask, but she had to know. “Zaalbar’s okay? Polla? Seiran?”

“Yeah.” He caught her restless hand that was foraging between them and kissed it. “No one was dead when we left, at least. But things’ve been better. Mission disappeared a few… guess it’s been more than a few weeks ago, now. The original Revan’s still in a coma. Yuthura thinks she’ll recover eventually, but—”

Wait. Dar'Revan's the one in the coma? Or Polla is too? Both of them are in a coma? I was in a coma. We could all sit down and have tea and talk about our comas—

She forced her disjointed thoughts back into a line, trying to quell her irritation at the term, ‘original’ Revan. “Yuthura Ban is there too?”

“Yeah.” Carth nodded. “Just showed up one day. Look… Revan, the original Revan didn't want you on Kaas—ever. And Mission didn't either. I don’t know why, but… do you?”

“Mission is part of a Rakatan computer and the original Revan propelled me off a ship fifty meters up,” Revan said. “I don’t know why you trust them.”

Original Revan. It shouldn’t rankle, but it did.

“Not a lot of options we had there.” He seemed to hesitate. “I knew you’d come, but it… was a long time.”

That’s not my fault! “The original Revan told me that only she could beat Tenebrae,” Revan continued. “Let’s hope she was lying, because I’m not sure how she’s doing it from half-dead and in a coma.”

“Yeah,” Carth said. “She told me that too.” He paused. “I didn't get much of a chance to talk to her but she… she wasn't what I expected.”

“Worse?” Revan remembered those hard green eyes watching her, the nest of braids like snakes. The constant barrage of insults.
The falling from the sky. Hard to forget that one.

“No. She was brave. Like you. The heart of a rock–lion. Both of them.”

“Both?”

“Polla killed that rancor that day—shot it square–on before I could. It would have ripped Revan in half if she hadn’t.” His voice softened. “Remember how you kept saying you could hit the side of a thresher door at midnight—”

“In moonlight,” Revan muttered. Stop calling her ‘Revan.’ “And I was wrong.”

“Well, Polla Organa really can. You weren’t nuts, beautiful. I used to think…you... but she really can.”

“Yeah, Aemelie’s told me all about her aim.” You too, Flyboy? “They… they're great friends, Aemelie and Polla. Don't tell Aemelie you're a fan too or she'll probably invite Polla and Seiran along for that tent party.”

“I know. She said, uh… she met Aemelie.” His arm moved rubbing her back like gentling a hessi. “You’d… you’d like Polla, I think. Not… for a tent… thing. We’re… we’re not doing that.”

“Damn right we’re not.”

Jealousy was a useless emotion. Here she was, with the man she loved, the man she'd married, who’d sacrificed a flagship for her not even six hours ago—and Revan felt consumed by an irrational envy for a trapped smuggler and an unconscious Sith Lord.

There were larger thranta in the galaxy to flay. Much larger. Emperors. Sunriders. Hell, even Darth Sulksalot here on my ship.

And what am I jealous of? I get to live. Sounds like they don't have a shot—either of them.

“Did they… so they both….” Carth hadn't called her Polla once, she realized. Not even when he’d been delirious. That was new. “They both reminded you of me?”

“Everything reminded me of you.” He eased closer, those warm eyes of his steady and serious. “I knew you’d come, but it…” His face was very close to hers, hot and close, skin taut with strain and far too pale. “I wondered why it took so long. I kept thinking… when… but I knew you’d come. I always knew. Even when I doubted, I knew.”

“It took longer than I… I was trying for a long time. I had to deal with… some… stuff first.”

“My turn,” Carth murmured. “We… we can trade off. Question for a question until we run out. What did you have to deal with?”

“For one thing, that old woman in our brig had two Sith apprentices who were killing the Jedi. One was Oerin Lin.”

“He died of plague. Right before Zaal and Mission and I left—”

“Death didn’t stop him.” There was no way to tell him the story from start to end. Revan found herself coming out with it in jumbled chunks: Lin, Arkan, Dar’Revan—the moment she first realized that Sheris Loran had taken the Redemption, and then that Master Arren Kae had been behind it all along.
Kae… also known as Vima Sunrider. Or, that schutta rotting in my brig.

She told Carth how the Jedi were mostly dead, how she’d stopped Davad Arkan, only to let Oerin Lin go free—

She stumbled on the parts before that: killing Marla Korr, finding Seiran—Dar’Revan’s proposal that they face Tenebrae together, Dar’Revan’s killing of Malachi—Dar’s surprise decision leaving Korrie and Polla’s baby behind on Deralia, and not the planet they’d planned for and then—

“Seiran told me that part already, beautiful. We… we spent a lot of time together.”

“Oh. Of course, I guess you—you would have. You… you got along?”

He gave her a strange look. “Yeah. They’re good people. Both of them—”

He interrupted himself with a story about meeting Polla Organa on Yavin IV. How he’d known she was the wrong woman the second she landed in his arms, but they’d all played along because they didn’t know what else to do. How Mission had convinced Polla Organa to stay—telling her Revan was coming to save them—and they’d all thought it was so, because Dar had pretended to be Revan on the comm to them—

She has so much to answer for.

“Polla calls the Sith Emperor Tenny Bro?” It seemed disrespectful, but Revan kind of liked it. “I still don’t understand how she fooled him at all. We don't look—”

“Uh, he’s… very distractible,” Carth said. He looked thirsty so Revan levitated a bulb of water for him from the stack that Sinae had left for them. “And you… you have a lot in common.”

Revan thought about Jasp Organa, wondering if he was still alive. No we don’t.

“If Vima’s working with Oerin Lin, we can use Vima to get to Lin,” she mused. “Davad was too dangerous to bring to Kaas, but maybe Oerin…. He stripped the Force from Vima and Mekel. Maybe he can do it to the Emperor too? That’d help—if we take out the Sith Force-wielders we’d just have their fleet to deal with. That’d be easier.”

“Easier.” He raised an eyebrow. “From what you just said, Vima’s not working with Oerin Lin. They're enemies.” Carth coughed again. “Doesn't make either of em on our side, Freckles.”

“Enemies hate. We can still use her to get to him.” She smiled at him, but he wasn’t smiling back.

“You said— she said she’s doing this to stop the Emperor. Are you sure she's against us? I don't trust her either, but—”

Am I sure? She wanted to laugh. “Vima isn’t any better than that fracking emperor!” Revan told him more. Details, what Davad had shown her, how he’d been used his entire life. How Revan had been too.

“Vima Sunrider destroyed the Jedi Order, Carth. And that plague? The one that started in the Underground? That was her. Davad and Oerin and her. They were all working together before Davad and Oerin betrayed her!”

“She made the Jedi Plague—?”

No. “She set it loose on Coruscant!”
—and then Carth interrupted with an insane story about the plague being released on Kaas City too and order breaking down, a slave rebellion, and Polla Organa and Yuthura Ban helping Zaalbar to lead the rebellion, which had apparently been going well when Carth left (as well as it could), but now he was worried—and no one had heard from Mission—

He’d stopped referring to Mission Vao as a computer at all, Revan noted—and every time he said ‘original Revan’ or Polla she felt herself twitch.

“I think your rebellion failed.” A harsh truth, but one he needed to hear. “The Emperor told me he was going to start executing prisoners tomorrow. He said he’d execute Deralians—or… he said he’d execute a Deralian—would he mean Polla? Or Seiran?”

“I’m not… sure.” His smile faded, etching into something more grim. “Seiran was with us at the palace. Polla and Yuthura were at House Blais, with your… with the other Revan. Zaalbar… he moved between. The Sith didn’t consider him more than a beast, really, so it was easier. And Mission, she was trying to get more vaccine from some Republic channels. Polla had found the black market in Kaas City—they were working out a deal to get vaccine through the Imperial embargos under Tenebrae’s nose. I—I didn’t know details, because I was compromised—”

_Tenebrae said he’d execute House Blais too. Whoever they are._ Looking into those eyes, Revan decided to spare her husband that bit—at least for now. “You said… the other Revan was in a coma….”

“Yeah. Polla was looking after her at the House of Blais. When Yuthura came, she helped too.”

“In a coma since the fight.”

“Yes.” He nodded. “It’s been months, local time. But she’s better than she was. Breathing on her own now. Yuthura thinks she’s stabilized.”

_Great. Revan the Original Vegetable._ “I saw the fight, with the rancor. Why would Dar risk herself like that?”

“The Emperor promised to free Zaalbar and the Deralians, even if she lost.”

_What good would that do to her?_ “And if she won? What was she fighting for?”

“Same thing.” His laugh was hollow. “No way to win on Kaas, beautiful, not for us. It… took me a while to see that. Only ways to make things better. As best as we could. I tried to sabotage the Sith Fleet… I… gave them bad advice. I tried to warn the Republic—Mission was getting us more vaccine to stop the plague—weaken Tenebrae… I… did I say that before?”

“Yeah. But you said Dar’Revan dueled some possessed rancors to set Seiran and Zaalbar and Polla free. Then you said they were still there. Did Tenebrae break his bargain?”

_Aren’t we supposed to have some kind of formal agreement?_ Dar had mentioned it. _Did he break it? Can I use that?_

“He… agreed to let Seiran go. Polla and Zaalbar technically belonged to House Blais—and someone needed to take care of Revan. She was dying—the poison—Dustil said they used terentatek poison on the rancor’s claws. She needed someone to look after her and Polla… she wanted to help.”

"It didn't have to be Polla!" Tenebrae had said he was going to execute a Deralian. _And you’re saying she could have left but she didn’t?_
Abasen. The weight of their baby in her arms, brown eyes looking up at Revan with such trust as she’d walked away from Dar and Seiran—

“Damnit, I promised Polla’s father I’d bring her home safe!”

“You met her father?”

Hadin’t she mentioned that? So much time—like a chasm between them now. “Why the hell did you leave me?” Revan asked him. It wasn’t what she meant to ask—she didn’t want to kick her husband when he was ill, didn’t want to fight—not when they’d been apart for so long, but she…

“You left a note and you left.” Not even much of a note. He’d said he’d do it all again. He’d said he wasn’t sorry he’d saved her.

“Dustil,” Carth said, staring at her, startled. “Senator D’Reev said he’d help—that he knew someone who could help on Dathomir. He said it wouldn’t… wouldn’t take long. It… guess it was a trap, but I didn’t know. I had to do something. And then—Tenebrae commed. I thought Polla was you.”

“I would have come with you to Dathomir—” it was a lie. Korrie. I couldn’t have left him... not then. “It was a trap. You should have known it was a trap—after what that man did to you before—how could you be so fracking trusting? So fracking stupid?”

“I had to do something!” Carth’s voice rasped, and he coughed again, something like durasteel flickering in his soft brown eyes. “You… knew Malak was in my son and you didn't stop him!”

“How was I supposed to? I found out—and then you left me. You kidnapped my son and then you left… by the way how long did you know Dustil was possessed? Because Mal said—he said you knew for a long time. You knew and never told me.”

“Canderous was the one who grabbed Korrie. He wanted to get both of you out of that… tomb of a Temple. And I knew Dustil wasn’t Dustil because I know my son,” he whispered, staring at her. “I knew the second I saw Mal that he wasn’t Dustil. But how could I tell you?”

“With kriffing words?” She didn’t want to be angry. And it wasn’t anger—it was something deeper, something that left a bitter taste in her mouth, maybe something that could never be fully resolved. “Grass Priests! You and Zaalbar and Mission… you just left me there—surrounded by my enemies. Malachi. The Jedi—Malak… you left me with Malak! Did you think I’d take him back?”

“Never.” The way his face hardened told her how off the mark she’d been with that question. “But Zaal and Mission were trying to help Dustil. For me. You… you hadn’t even commed them in weeks! You barely spoke to me after Polla and her family were reported killed—did you know they weren’t killed?”

“Not at first.”

“But then you did? You never said. Didn’t seem to make a difference.”

“Yeah, well…” Her laughter felt hollow. “Great job, guys, helping your kid. Dustil’s so much better now.”

The lines around Carth’s mouth deepened, and his voice roughed to a knife edge. He pulled away from Revan suddenly, sitting up and shoving his back up against the wall. “You listen: my son has been pretending to be Malak for months now while we tried to find a way out of this! Sents have died for us, Revan—and you—”
I did what I had to, Carth.

She heard her own voice crisp to ice. “I led a Force–eating monster into a sun. The man I thought was my friend killed the Jedi and my uncle. I left Korrie with—strangers. And I almost died in space—and before that I was betrayed by the woman who's supposed to be me—but how dare you—” she scrambled to her feet—only to have Carth grab her hand, tugging her back down.

“Wait,” he whispered. His grip was weak. Revan could have broken it easily, but she didn't, she stayed frozen, looking at him. His eyes were soft. As she watched a tear gathered in one, glittering as it traced its way down his cheek.

“What?”

“It's been shit for both of us, hasn't it?” His eyes searched hers, and she met them, feeling her some of her anger ebb away at the sight of his grim smile, that steady gaze.

“Yeah,” she nodded and sat down again, putting her other hand on top of his. “It's been shit.”

“I'm here now.” Muscles in his jaw worked and she saw the feverish brightness of his eyes again, the way his hand shook. “I won't leave again, Revan. Unless you want me to—”

“I don't.” It was true. “Carth, you’ve been—everything I know that's real is—you were always there.” You're in all of it, Flyboy. Even the parts where you were gone.

“Yes.” His mouth twitched. “I know.” He pulled her down next to him on the bed again, until they were back, lying side by side. “I’m sorry I left, beautiful. It was a mistake.”

“Not the only one.” She kissed the underside of his jaw, where the line of that infernal beard was neatly trimmed and she could feel his skin. “I've made plenty. And it sounds like Polla Organa did worse, trying to hustle credits from the Sith Emperor and getting Dustil kidnapped.”

And she’ll die for it before I can save her. Ultimately, a selfish thought, for Revan would have to be the one to tell Molla and Jasp when she retrieved Malachor from Deralia.

“Polla’s the one… she got me infected with the flu. Me and most of Kaas City. HK… he helped too.”

“Then sents died because of her.” Polla Organa set the plague loose on Kaas? How? And she's working with Dar’s homicidal Rakatan droid? Which is no longer in pieces. Wait. Wait a second. Who put HK back together?

Like I have to even ask. Dar loved that damned machine. She probably started soldering his bits on right after she pushed me off the ship.

Hells, HK won't save Polla from an execution. It’ll probably snap holo–prints.

“Yes.” Carth’s arms wrapped around Revan, half pulling her on top of him. Their limbs interlaced, more protecting than passionate. “And some lived—thanks to her. Polla and Zaalbar vaccinated as many sents as they could until we ran out… I couldn't… was hard for me to help. Tenebrae has weekly sacrifices. Culls for those who can't complete the Kiss—when the possession doesn't work—or just when he's bored… he throws parties that always end in the death of innocents.... It was… it’s bad there, Freckles. You have no idea how bad—”
Then tell me. “You need to tell me everything, Carth. The things Davad showed me—that schutta in the bridge… she was behind them all along. Behind me. Even to the Star Forge. She wanted this body for herself. She made Dar—out of Sheris—she made Sheris take that holocron—and turn into Dar. That was her. Do you understand?”

“The original Revan only said that you need to stay away from Kaas. I might not have believed it, but then Mission said it too—that we couldn't let the Emperor have you—and—”

“He won't have me!” You trust the woman who betrayed me and the Rakatan computer more than you trust me, Carth?

“Revan….” Strain or illness had grooved new lines around his mouth. “I've seen what that Sith planet has done to my son. And you're stronger than he is. What if it affects you like it’s affected him?”

It won't. I'm not weak. “Carth, Dar'Revan may not have known she was compromised. She could have been doing what Vima wanted and not even have known. That schutta was controlling the Council—at least some of it. And us too. Finding the Star Forge… the Jedi… all of it was a part of her game. She… I think she had Davad stalking us—at least on Korriban… and Taris… and he—”

The Endar Spire. Even as early as that. And some of the memories he showed me—they were—too much to see. Raw places. Too much of Dar. Too much of him.

“He, what?” His eyes narrowed. “Did he hurt you?”

“No, he—he wouldn’t—but she twisted him.”

And Dar twisted him too.

Irrationally Revan hated them both for it.

”That little old woman you threw in the brig?” Carth still sounded skeptical. You think she's responsible for… everything? What about the Jedi plague?”

“No. That was me. Or, Dar, I mean. It was Dar. She made it to stop Tenebrae. But Vima and her minions set it loose on Coru—Davad… there wasn't much of him left, but he showed me… visions… I saw what she did in my head. And Dar knew she was involved too… she was manipulated, but she knew—”

“But Vima Sunrider told us she wants to stop the Sith Emperor.” He frowned. “Was she lying?”

“Of course Vima wants to stop the Sith Emperor! She probably wants his fracking job!”

“Oh.” Carth ran a hand across his jaw. “Well… what are you going to do?”

“I don't know.” Suddenly she was exhausted.

“Mission didn't want you to go to Kaas,” he said again. “Maybe we should… we could strike Kaas City from orbit. This ship… Tenebrae wouldn't expect it to be hostile. They'd have defenses down… and I… I know their defenses. We could… if we moved fast enough, maybe we could knock their fleet into confusion and take on Thule and Ziost too.” His mouth tightened. “Might not be so good for our friends on the ground though.”

Oh, Carth. Revan thought of the flotilla of synchronous ships she'd seen working for Tenebrae and shook her head slowly. It wouldn't work. He has more up his sleeve than you think.
Unless—

“You trust Mission?” she asked him, skipping back to that.

Revan remembered when she’d stopped trusting the T3.

Maybe Polla Organa had faked her own death and not been assassinated by Revan’s overzealous droid, but the T3 had still been connected to the Rakatan computer—the computer that Vima Sunrider had shown to Dar’Revan in the first place.

That computer is dangerous. Dar said so. Malak said so.

So now I trust the words of Sith Lords over Carth?

They'd know. He wouldn't.

From the incredulous look Carth was giving her, bringing up Mission had been the wrong thing to do.

“Yes, Revan. I do trust Mission.” He coughed. “I'm worried about her too. She should have reported in by now—when Dustil and I left Kaas, she was missing.”

Great. A missing Rakata droid with the personality of an impulsive tweener is loose on a Sith planet. She's probably taken it over by now.

“Is HK missing too?” The last time she'd seen the thing it had still been in pieces. Figures she'd put together her droid again. That thing liked her like it never did me.

“No, he's… he was helping Polla and Yuthura with Rev—helping them care for the original Revan.”

“Heartwarming,” she drawled, closing her eyes. Almost just called her Revan there, Flyboy. Like you think she is.

“What are we going to do?” His lips brushed her ear and she felt his arms tighten around her. “I'm just flying test loops here, Freckles. I don't know what to do.”

“I have no fracking idea either.” That bombing thing... never setting foot on that miserable planet... our friends are dead anyway—

Would Seiran Wen call me a friend? Would Polla?

Not if I bombed them from orbit.

If it wasn't for the size of that Sith Fleet, a first strike would make the most sense. But if the Sith Fleet could be neutralized immediately?

Or if we had more ships, enough to outfight them?

She cracked an eye open to find her husband peering down at her, a half smile on his face.

“I know that look,” Carth said, dark humor pulling the side of his mouth. “That thing about bombing the planet? Don't take it seriously, beautiful… I’m probably still delirious.”

It was impossible not to smile back. “You’re right, it would take much too long. Hey… how's the sun in that system? Stable? Maybe we can make it go nova. Or… we could get the tech specs on how I destroyed Malachor V?"

“Hah.” Carth’s hand pulled her top knot loose, and he ran his fingers through her hair. “Silk,” he mumbled, tracing her ear, running a finger down her neck. “I used to close my eyes and dream of the way your hair feels.”

Her head rolled closer and they kissed slowly. Revan heard herself give a low sigh as his hand trailed down her back. She'd taken off the armor, put on one of the generic crew coveralls instead. She was suddenly conscious of that—and of the thin fabric of his medix robes, the heat of his skin next to hers.

They kissed again.

“Mmm,” Carth said after a while, those soldier’s eyes watching her own—gentle and hard at once. His pulse was too rapid in his neck and his eyes looked a little stimmed, but he was smiling. It occurred to Revan to wonder again what had actually been in those fever–down derms.

“Easy,” she murmured. “You okay?” His robe lay open, and the zipper to her coverall was pulled all the way down. His hands kept touching her, gentle, but steady and knowing. Her own were more tentative; the press of his hip bones, the hard edge of ribs in his chest—these things were new. She was afraid she might bruise him, and it muted and shifted her desire—always before it had been like riding a swoop into the black with him—an increase of velocity, an inevitable conclusion. But now, it—

“Yeah.” He rolled into her hand, eager. But his breath was ragged, more than she liked—not just from need. “Just not sure I—”

“We probably shouldn’t—”

They’d both started speaking at the same time, and then Revan heard her own chuckle echoed by his.

“You are sick,” she said. “We’ve… we probably won't die today. Maybe we should just wait—”

“Yeah,” he murmured. “We’ll wait. Let me get some beauty sleep first, okay?”

“Yes.” Her leg hooked around his hip, drawing him closer, and they rocked back and forth slowly.

“The sweet, unfulfilled ache was soothing, like a ship in snug orbit, swaying in a gentle solar breeze.

Those ships, she thought as sleep came. The Emperor did give them to me. Sentients, he might possess or own, but if they are something else... if they are machines—

And truly mine...

Xxx

Carth waited until her breath was even and calm, until she'd begun to whisper in her sleep again—those half-words, fragments of languages. He knew more of them now than he had once, but that didn't lessen the mystery of her, his wife. Savior and destroyer, all at once.

“Let's go in the water,” she said in Shyriiwook, clear as day. “Race you! They were only children,” she added in Ryl—then back to incoherence. It was comforting and familiar, as much a part of her as the smell of her skin, those green eyes, the arch of her brows. “Eight quarters starboard,” she added in Basic. “Sixty degrees, launch as soon as you see the trace—”
“A name,” she whispered in Mandalorian. “He will remember it—”

“Freckles,” Carth murmured, untangling himself carefully from her limbs, uncoiling his aching body to stand up. The medbay was larger than any he’d ever seen, like everything else on this ship, walls curved and white and gleaming.

“Something’s wrong with those ships,” Revan muttered in Ancient Sith. And that was when Carth knew he’d been trapped on that damned planet too long, because he understood her.

_I need more fever-downs_, he thought, and found them where the medix had left them on the counter by the door. One helped tether his head to his body, so Carth put on two more for strength, fumbling through the tidy stack of freshly-pressed clothing someone had left for him—next to a similar pile for her. Mandalorians weren’t ones for uniforms outside of their beskar; but they’d left his blasters, freshly charged and polished atop a new belt—embroidered with the Ordo skull on its holsters. There was even a blast helm—one for each of them. Maybe standard issue but it made things convenient.

“Huh.” He almost laughed, putting the holster on, but didn't, glancing back at her.

“... Draavitnya luk jitna,” she said, rolling over on her back. Her limbs flexed out, then splayed. Her mouth fell open and she began to snore—the most beautiful monkey-lizard he’d ever seen.

“I’ll be right back, Revan,” Carth told her, and left, to find his way through the unfamiliar ship.

Xxx

Mekk’s room on the _Aleema_ was a real dump.

Dustil was honestly surprised because he’d expected better on what had been Darth Revan’s flagship, the _Imperial Aleema of Cinnegar and Thule._

He’d written a paper on her back on Korriban. The _Aleema_ was the largest and fastest dreadnaught ever built, capable of crewing at least six thousand sents, and storing nearly as many fighters. (And that wasn’t even mentioning its cannon—both plasma and ion, set both starboard and aft—or the turbolasers portside, or its forty-seven torpedo bays.)

The _Aleema_ actually wasn’t even half-staffed, from what Dustil had seen of it, and surely there had to be officer’s quarters better than this tiny cell that didn’t even have a viewscreen, cluttered with books everywhere, and pieces of what looked like a heavy repeater strewn all over the place, propping up pink, half-burnt candles. Didn’t the Mandies know Mekel was Revan’s cousin? They must, because Mekk had already mentioned it to Dustil about a dozen times, and all they’d done was take off from the shuttle, mumble something to Dustil’s father, and come here to frack.

He looked up at the picture his old bondmate had taped on the low ceiling above their bed and wondered at it. Mekk himself was turned away toward the wall, lying on his stomach, ass in the air; but that holo-image of him grinned down at them as if he approved of the message.

In the holo, Mekk’s hair was slicked back and he was wearing beskar, but posing like some kind of tween idol—carefully slouched, with a blazing green lightsaber out to the side—his handsome face chiseled and hard as a vidstar’s idea of what a hero should be.

“I thought you were dead,” Dustil whispered, staring at the picture and then back to the man next to him in the bed. Mekk’s back had more muscles in it than Dustil remembered and he traced them now, fingers trailing down the spine. Weird, not feeling it on his echo in his own skin. It figured the fockda would carry a saber even when he didn’t have the Force. He’d been so proud of himself.
when he’d gotten his first one—

“Thought you were too… at first.” Mekk’s head turned to look at him then, all black eyes and shadows. “But then… uh, Lyd and I were hanging out and she showed me a vid with you acting like Lord Malak when you met that other Revan…” He snorted. “You didn’t frack the other Revan, right? Because she’s… well, the real one’s my cousin and that would be balls–up weird.”

“Lyd?” Even without a Force bond Mekk had the same tells—that slight hesitation before he said the name. Lyd. The nickname. Mekk shortened everyone’s name given time enough: Dust, Shar, Lash, Thally—at least anyone he liked.

And he had liked dear old Lyd, hadn’t he? She’d featured heavily in the Jin dream spank rotation—

“Lydie Korr.” Mekel kept going. Without the bond he hadn't noticed anything—Dustil hadn’t given any tells for him to notice—being smarter and more powerful than Mekel Jin. “Loanin… now. She married that senator asshole. But he took a lot of meetings off–planet—we were on Katarr for weeks—and she kept inviting me over to spar? Then, this one day… she just dropped her robe! You know those lines Zabraks have? Not like yours… yours make you look like a badass….” He reached out and ran his hand across the dark patches on Dustil’s ribs, which were very badass. “But Zabraks, they have those indentations all over their bodies. Even…” he made a gesture. “You know.”

”Congratulations,” Dustil said dryly. “You always wanted to frack her.”

“Yeah. It was great.” Mekel had a banthashit grin on his face now at the memories. “Sticking it to her husband wasn't bad either—not literally, but he totally knew. His face!” He chuckled. “Nothing he could do—even without the Force I could’ve kicked his ass.”

“They die when the undead Sith killed everyone else?” Dustil figured there had to be some part of this story that’d make him smile too.

“No.” Mekel sat up on his elbows. “Lyd and the shabuir took off with the rest of the Jedi who made it out. Went to Hoth… or Zeltros? Something like that.” He rolled over lazily, like he knew Dustil was watching from the corner of his eyes. His skin was pale gold, striped with hair that ran down the flat of his belly. When his head lolled back, his neck looked so pale and soft—the weakest point. His eyes half-lidded, and he licked his lips a little, looking up at Dustil, that smug smile fading. “Second I found out you were alive, I knew I'd find you,” he added. “Would’ve been rough if my cousin Revan wasn't coming this way too with her Mandalorian army, but I would’ve found a way, Telos.”

“I thought you were dead,” Dustil repeated, suddenly strangely… ashamed for his bout of jealousy before. He stared up at the ceiling again, wondering again what had possessed Mekk to put a holo–image of himself there, grinning like a rube. “And that's the twentieth time you've managed to work in that Revan's your cousin.”

“Well, she's married to your dads so what does that make us?” That crooked smile widened when Mekel looked down at himself and twitched his hips—and suddenly the holo–pic made a lot more sense. He’d always been so fricking vain.

“Here,” Dustil said—and tackled him, pushing a stack of books on genetics and shipbuilding off the end of the bed. “That makes us here.”

Xxx
“Is he okay?” Carth asked one of the kids standing guard at the entrance to the midship quarters.
“My son? The guards said he was staying on this level.”

“They’re in the fifth room aft,” one armored kid said. “The one with the Ordo clan sign carved in the door.”

“He’s with Jin,” one of the others added. “Vod collects sheresh’ik like skulls. He—” the kid made a startled noise as one of the others punched him in his armored gut, sending him slamming into the wall.

“I’m sorry for that shabuir’s rudeness,” the first said. “We all are, First Husband.”

“It’s… it’s fine.” Carth nodded, pretending that had all made sense and continued down the corridor.

It felt awkward as hell knocking, and most of Carth didn’t want to bother them… but you never know what will happen. You never know what will be the last time, either. And he just wanted to make sure Dustil was okay.

Like you and Mom, his son had said about him and Mekel. Well, Carth remembered Morgana’s old man busting in on them too, once or twice—accidentally, he’d thought at the time—now he just hoped it had been. Hell, he hoped then too. But parents embarrassed kids. It was what they did. Maybe her father had his reasons too. Maybe they hadn’t had anything to do with Carth and Morgana at all—but more to do with his own time. The man had dropped dead from a coronary event two weeks before their wedding. Maybe he’d just been working on his own time, as best as he could, when he’d asked Morgana to come out and see the garden—or to help him clean out the storage unit with her mother’s things—

Like you and Mom, his son had said about him and Mekel Jin. Had he meant it? Like me and Revan, was what Carth hoped for his son. Not that he’d been the one to bring her back, he’d never give himself all the credit, but he’d helped. And Mekel Jin—well, he wasn’t exactly what Carth had wanted, but he’d seen Korriban. The two of them had made it out sane from that madhouse. Kid must have hidden depths. And he’d made Dustil laugh—

Hell, I would have hugged Inse Blais herself if she had made my son laugh.

Hesitant, he knocked on the door. “Dustil?”

“Shit!” Jin’s voice.

“Dad?” Dustil’s startled squawk. “Uh… are you okay?”

“Much better. Medix fixed me right up.”

“You… uh… can you give me a sec?”

“It’s fine, just checking in. We… we’ll have breakfast in a few hours, how does that sound?”

The door cracked open and his son peered out at him, only one yellow eye visible in the gloom.

“You look better… but your heart…” The door cracked open a little wider. “Are you stimmed?”

“All I took is the med the doc gave me, I swear.”

“Watch it with those.”
Behind him, Mekel said something in what sounded like Ancient Sith. All Carth caught was the word ‘leave.’

“Shut up!” Dustil snapped, glancing back. “Dad, if you give me a sec, I can come out.”

“No,” Carth smiled. “I’m just taking a walk, kiddo. So—breakfast? You up for it?”

“I don’t think they’ll let you cook,” his son muttered. His thick eyebrow twitched above that yellow eye. “You know that, right?”

He remembers. The rare times Carth had been home. Permacakes on the griddle, with nerf steaks, extra rare. Letting Morgana sleep in. The two of them in that galley kitchen in their conapt, crowding each other as they got it together.

“I don’t know,” Carth told him. “I’m First Husband of Ordo now.”

Mekel called something else behind him, clearer now, like he’d come closer to the door.

“He says we should meet in the Starboard Dining Hall—Officer’s mess,” Dustil translated, although… Carth had gotten most of that. Tenebrae in his head, Ancient Sith had bled through.

“Oh—seven—hundred shipside,” Carth promised him.

“Promise me you’ll rest before then?” His son’s voice. Normal. Concerned. If not for that yellow eye, this was the man Carth had wanted to meet, the one he’d hoped he’d helped raise.

Can’t be this easy, Carth thought. But what if it was?

“Sure. I’m gonna head back to the medix now and get some sleep,” he lied.

Xxx

Darkness.

A small place. Rather like a tomb, except for the unmistakable vibration beneath the old woman’s shackled feet.

Hyperspace.

It was not the first time in her memories that the woman had been so set upon, but with all of her hope, Kreia vowed it would be the last.

What hope? Her mind mocked her. If she is Revan she will have you killed without speaking, and if she is not—

If she is not, your unformed clay is now Vitiate’s. And he will smother the galaxy with it.

But not yet. It has not happened yet—

In Kreia’s darkness and indignity, the earlier images intruded.

A slaver’s bay, Andur’s blasted body. A cell on Cinnegar, and those whispers in the dark of madness. The Dxun moon. The Cron cluster implosion. The darkness of Yavin IV. The death of the conclave, her childish voice screaming—

That one doubled, as Kreia’s maternal arms locked around her child’s frame—in both of them at once: Nomi, seeing the tragedy of what so much death had done to her daughter’s mind. Vima: locked in that moment—all innocence lost as death rained down from the sky—

A man carved in ice on Rhen Var, the frozen plains, a soldier’s blaster bolt—

The death of Ulic. The death at Malachor. The death of Oerin, her brightest star.

The death of Revan, her most futile hope.

Here in this place, a helm of heavy beskar covered Kreia’s face, its voder smashed and ragged on her lips, preventing speech. The visor’s optical displays were similarly broken, but she could still hear. The sounds of this place were muffled but distinct—the chatter of her guards—five—their footsteps on the floor—and her own steps as she paced the length of her cell.

The Aleema’s interrogation rooms had been designed to break Jedi. The Mandalorians, for all their retrofits on the ship’s weapons, had not touched them—or so her steps taught Kreia now. The scale of the cell was just as she recalled from the other side of its electro-plasmic walls: five steps by four steps, the floor tilted forward and carefully constrictive on all four sides—cramped by design—so as to not allow a prisoner rest.

And Kreia was already weary, forever weakened. But her work was not done.

The Mando’ade children had been kind enough to shackle her arms in front, at least, and the chains around her ankles were loose, speaking of the respect they had been trained to have for the old.

It was a small thing, but it was everything—for she could walk, pacing slowly back and forth in her cell, while the dim voices of the children buzzed there with gossip like Coruscanti gutter–wives.

“Who is she?”

“Some dar’jett. She has four Force bands under that helm!”

Force restraints around her neck, and on her brow. By their weight enough to incapacitate Ulic himself in his prime.

At least in her darkness, Kreia was spared the discomfort of feeling them as anything more than cold metal.

“That’s Jana Novasun.” A new voice intruded sharply. More assertive than the others. Feminine. “I need to speak with her immediately. Remove the helm.”

“It’s forbidden. General Ordo said General Revan gave the order—”

“And I have been assigned to interrogate our prisoner, Wraid. Open the cage and remove the helm!”

“We have orders—”

“And here is a new one,” the woman snapped. The click of knives, perhaps a med–kit. Perhaps interrogation drugs, or more… brute methods. They did not matter. The woman’s voice was hope. “A new order coming from a woman of your clan, to you, an unblooded boy. Open the cage!”

“Yes, Dessa,” the boy’s voice said.
Dessa. The name was unfamiliar, but in her darkness, the old woman smiled.

XXX

Meanwhile on Dromund Kaas….

“No,” Polla said again.

Revan and Polla crouched in the corner of their cell, behind the half-wall that hid their fresher. For a man who possessed billions, Tenebrae was surprisingly squeamish about bodily function. It was an advantage that Revan had manipulated before.

“No. No way. Uh–uh.” Polla shook her head, thankfully managing to keep her voice to a whisper without Revan reminding her for a sixth time. “Listen, I helped get the bricks out to open up the wall, and I strained my fracking shoulder in there breaking off tree branches bringing them out for you. Need me to watch for the guards? I'm your girl. But slaughtering? I think you got it covered just fine on your own.”

She stood up, looking like she meant every word.

“Sit back down,” Revan snapped. “It will go faster with two.”

“No way.” Polla shook her head again. “I killed like four of those things on the ship with Tenny Bro. The blood gave me a rash. I may be allergic.”

“A harmless effect,” Revan told her. Her own flesh hand itched with the lie. “Please.”

Polla looked down at her, frowned, and sat down again. “I'll see if I can pull out more sticks… but I really don't want to smash their little heads in.”

“Please,” Revan repeated, trying not to be humiliated by how much it sounded like she was begging.

Polla’s arm had vanished in the gap in the wall again “Don’t you have enough? I can't reach any more.”

“Use one of the sticks.” Revan’s metal hand clicked clumsily as she handed one to the Deralian. The connectors had been damaged before and her efforts to use it as a tool to open the wall hadn't helped. “The wood is quite brittle. Break the limbs down with the stick and then sweep them out.”

“There has to be a better way to do this,” Polla muttered—but she took the proffered stick.

Revan returned her attention to the task at hand.

The ysalamiri on the ground before her was furred and scaled and big-eyed. Revan had never really noticed how big-eyed they were before, but this ysa had all four of its black eyes blinking up at her above a long snout, its orange tail grown into the broken branch she'd pulled out of the wall. Looking at it made Revan feel a bit dizzy from the imbalance of the null field that it generated—a sensation sickeningly magnified by the fact that all of its fellows close to them had been pulled out by their sticks and stacked on the fresher floor—awaiting their own turns for execution.

Not execution. They're not sentient. Slaughter. Just killing animals. The work was messy. Revan's hands were already covered in gore and she'd only killed three.

Next to her Polla Organa smiled. “See? You got this, I think. Look at how well you're doing!”
That wheedling tone of hers grated. “It really isn't difficult.” Revan nodded at the small pile of bricks they’d removed from the wall. Too small, really—she had hoped they might escape through the tunnels there—tunnels that surely existed to feed and nourish the ysalamiri and their trees; but the hold–out had barely managed a gap wide enough for an arm. “Bring a brick down upon its head,” Revan instructed the Deralian, laying one out in front of her. “They’re not sentient.”

Polla Organa sighed and crossed her legs. At least she was sitting again. “You do it.”

“They don't feel pain,” Revan lied.

The smuggler made a face. “Yeah, well, I’ve killed a few of them before. I swore off.”

She was, Revan noted, absent–mindedly scratching one from the pile between its tiny ears.

“There's not much time.” Revan slammed the brick down hard on the creature in front of her, eyes prickling strangely as she remembered one of Malachor's stories about the ysalamiri at Malachi’s house that he’d played with as pets.

It wasn't the death of the creature in front of her causing the sadness—it was the reminiscence of Malachor himself, the way his own big eyes has looked when he told the story to her on the journey to Deralia——and the tale’s end.

Revan hadn't expected Polla Organa to be squeamish—the Fragment was not, after all—but she hadn't expected it of herself either. The ysalamiri were animals—as mindless as the trees they had grown onto—and it has been very easy to collect the ones within reach once they'd opened the wall.

“He’ll notice,” she said. “Those guards are Force-sensitive. We have a very limited window of time—”

“How do you know they're Force-sensitive?” Polla demanded, scowling. “They can't use it here, right? And neither can you?”

“The null field is short. And I know him.” They'd been through these futile exercises in circular logic before.

“Fine.” Polla picked up a brick. Her brick slammed down—

Revan tried not to flinch as she dispatched another herself. “Not so loud!”

“It's hard to do this quietly! Are you… are you crying?” Polla made an incredulous snorting noise. “You?”

“Time,” Revan snapped. The distortion field made her feel ill. “I… being cut off from the Force can affect a Jedi strangely, I… it's not these reptiles, it's Malachor. He… kept one as a pet.” Her brick came down again. Another. Then Polla’s kill right after, an echoing thump.

“Your son.” The Deralian swallowed. “Okay. I get that.” She picked up the broken stick in front of Revan and added it to the pile of crushed things in the corner.

“Malachor told me his father’s ghost made him poison the ysalamiri in the walls of the D’Reev apartments. He had to poison his pet.” She blinked at the strange wetness on her cheeks, the nearly–forgotten salt taste on her lips.
“Your husband was an asshole.” Polla scowled. “No offense.” Her brick came down hard, too loudly again, and she reached for another, smoothly, automatically now that Revan had set her on the right path.

Revan looked down at the new victim in front of her. Its black eyes were round. Its tiny mouth opened and hissed at her. It was… adorable. And doomed.

“Sometimes,” she said.

Xxx

“My lord…?”

The malraas kit in Malak’s hands mewed plaintively, eyes still scrunched shut, tiny paws battening on air as the Dark Lord of the Sith held it by the scruff of its frail, breakable neck.

“I brought this for you.” His voder hissed as if the lines were clogged again, and the feel of him in the Force was heavy with pain.

She took the animal gingerly. It squirmed against her hand. “Do you want me to kill it, Lord Malak?” Was this a test?

“I found it shivering in an alley on Duros.” He shrugged. “Kill it if you prefer, but I thought to give you a companion. They can be trained to hunt.”

A test, it had to be a test. “You are the only companion I need, Malak.” But then, the little thing had begun to purr beneath her hands—

Xxx

“Revan?” A hand poked her ribs. “Revan?” Polla’s whisper was hard in her ear and the woman shook her again. “You okay? Kinda zoned out there.”

“Yes, I—” Revan blinked and discovered that Polls had dispatched three more ysalamiri. “I just…”

I kept it. It was on the Bright, but after Malak died, I left the ship and went to Manaan and I never even wondered what happened to the manka—

My manka. I never gave it a name, but it was Manka.

She reached to rub her eyes clean of Sheris’s Force–damned whispers, but saw the blood on her hands and picked the brick back up instead.

“Is this working?” Polla pressed. “You feel any Force–stuff yet?”

“No. The null field may be too expansive for us to destroy entirely.”

Polla gave an exasperated sigh. “Then what the frack are we doing?”

“Weakening the effect. We may be able to create a bubble that will allow me to at least get us out of the cell.”

“We may? I may have been able to shoot one of those asshole guards when they came to take us out of here! Together we might’ve gotten a jump on another one!” Polla jerked her head toward the corner of the room, where boxes of clothing had been placed by Tenebrae’s guards—along with their evening meal. They’d been told to dress for a special event—an execution of their allies, no doubt. “No chance of that now!”

“We only have a few hours left until dawn.” Revan thought, anyway. Her sense of the world around them had vanished with the Force, but she’d been trying to count the hours based upon tapping her foot tucked beneath her knee. A part of her mind was endlessly counting—and trying to do so with the smuggler's constant distractions was quite difficult.

You lost count ages ago. Admit it. The guards could come in the next five minutes or five hours. You have no idea. You’re stumbling in the dark—

Her inner voice was smug. It could have been a ghost or a vision, but it sounded like something else.

I called her Manka even if she never had a name. My ship’s captain loved her too. He would have taken care of her. I shouldn't have forgotten. But Beya convinced me to go to Manaan and then I met Oerin—

The Lin child. Kae’s child. Kae’s creature—

He was very powerful, I could have loved him.

Mindless, stupid, cringing Sheris!

“Uh, I think that one’s dead.” Polla had produced more sticks from the wall., and gone back to work smashing them. “You okay? You know you're talking to yourself, right?”

“Of course. It's merely the lack of Force—”

“Don't cry again, it's weird seeing you cry.” Polla nudge Revan’s knee with her foot, perhaps because that seemed more appropriate as a placation than patting her on the back with a hand streaked in gore.

“I'm not.” More convincing without the sob caught in her throat.

“This is a bad situation. I want to cry too.” Polla dealt the helpless ysalamiri a blow that made the branch beneath it splinter. “But we made it this far, right?”

To the Sith Emperor's prison, yes. Revan bit back the acid retort and took a calming breath. “I know precisely what this is: Sheris’s mind is attempting to assert some autonomy. The more I push back, the more she struggles. But I will master her.”

“Oookay.” Polla muttered something under her breath that sounded suspiciously like ‘crazy bint.’ “Sure. You know, Yuthura said this Sheris bint was dead.”

“She was wrong.” Revan reached for another stick. “It is natural for there to be some bleed-through, of course; but in time, the two personalities will integrate. Normally, the subject is wiped of all previous memories—as was done to the Fragment. Since this was not done to Sheris—I find myself having… visions of her life. It is disruptive.”

“Or, you're just nuts.” The smile made it seem like a joke.

“I cannot entirely discount that possibility either.”

“Yeah, I wouldn't,” Polla muttered. “Don't discount it. Not count it. I mean, you should count it. You're talking to yourself.”
“I am aware.”

“Who was she? Would it help talking about her?”

They had been fortunate with their choice of place to break through the wall. They’d pulled more than fifty ysalamiri and their branches from it. Revan picked up the longest stick and stuck her flesh hand holding it through the breech, trying to reach more. The tip swung free, but when she dragged it along the ground, something rolled toward her. Several branches under her fingers—ones Polla had knocked down and then missed.

_There could be thousands... every meter of the wall could be full of them. This could be pointless—I could be mad. I could be Sheris, deluding herself, a poor imitation of a woman she—_

_Hysterics will not help._

They were reaching the end of their pile of squirming lizards. Revan wished she could feel the Force now but she didn’t. “Sheris Loran was a padawan from Hoth. I always suspected it was one of Kae’s schemes, that she survived Malachor. She looked like me already, but I used the Star Forge to enhance the resemblance down to the germ line.”

“How?”

“A duplicate would have been useful. And Malak had already taken her as a lover. It—”

“Right. So was she? Useful?”

“Not as I originally intended, but Sheris kept Mal sated. I—found it difficult to—Tenebrae had possessed him.”

“Okay, I get it. Sounds very healthy. Why the frack would Sheris go along with this?”

“She was obedient.”

_He was powerful. I was young. I remembered the man he was and I had always found him beautiful—he was still so beautiful, the man you never saw—_

_It made me sick to look at him. How much of that madness was his, and how much the Emperor's? Tenebrae would intrude—never during intimacy—but all other times: breakfast, debriefings, waking me from sleep—_

_I never knew that Malak was possessed. He was always there for me. I loved him._

“She loved him,” Revan muttered. “I think her judgment was questionable.”

Polla snorted. “No shit. I had this ex, Therion? Everything he did was highly questionable. Of course, he never tried to take over the galaxy… but if that’d been on the table, he might have. He was… kinda evil.”

“Malak was… he was a good man once. I always…” Revan’s voice trailed off. “Reflection is pointless. We’ve finished the ysalamiri. Wash your hands thoroughly. There’s probably still a little time before the guards wake.”

“We just escape now?” Polla stood up, leaning on the half-wall that separated the fresh area from the rest of her cell. “You have the Force back? You’re gonna zap the guards when they come?”

“I—I don’t—” Revan stood herself, running her hands beneath the water–fueled sanitizer. The artificial nerves on her prosthetic fingers felt numb, probably permanently damaged. “The range of the null field is wide, but short.” She hoped. “I know because I’ve seen the guards use the Force in the hall in front of our cell.” She had seen one of them levitating a rock absently, like a child tossing a ball in the air and bouncing it.

She walked to the cell’s barrier. The energy field buzzed blue and the bars ran in an even line, too narrow to get more than a hand through them.

That is all I require—if this works. If it does not—

Revan closed her eyes and took a breath.

XXX
After making sure Dustil was okay, Carth made it ten meters down the hall before he came across two more guards—two half-grown kids bristling with enough weapons to show that Canderous thought they must be competent, despite their size.

“Sir,” one of them said. Voice was treble, either from age or gender. “First Husband of Lin. Did you need something?”

“Do you know where the… uh, is there a map I could download?”

“No. Sith are bad at ship design,” the taller one said. He—or she—still only came up to Carth’s chest. “They hide things. We are working on improvements….” His helmeted head swiveled, and there was a pause as Carth realized he was probably calling in the request for approval.

Blast.

“Where is General Revan?” the shorter one asked.

“Still sleeping.” Carth smothered a cough. The fever–break stuff worked wonders. He really did feel better, just a little weak on his feet.

“It's ca bunk time but General Ordo wanted to know when you woke—you or her. Or both,” the taller one said. “Are we supposed to wake her?”

“No.” Carth shook his head. Ca. Night. Explains why the ship’s half-deserted. “Revan needs her sleep. And… tell General Ordo I’ll see him later. I just need… I need a walk.”

“We put up some guidance logs in the ceta stairs,” the short kid told him. “If you go that way, you can see the starboard viewing decks too. Nice view of the engines.”

“I’ll keep that in mind.” Carth choked back another cough and continued on his way.

Dessa had the children escort Jana Novasun to the small officer’s mess off the interior bridge. It held tables and chairs—unlike the dar’jett holding cells. And it was private, which might put the old woman at ease.

“You may go,” she told the young warriors, for none of them were Rialis. Being well–mannered as their mothers had taught, they obeyed without question.

The blind old woman’s shoulders were frail under her hands as Dessa guided Jana Novasun into a seat and removed the helm covering her face, revealing the same features she had seen long ago in her mother’s tent—now aged beyond the years that had passed. It was, Dessa thought, as if the woman had spent a few years baking her skin next to a yellow sun without a blast visor.

“Which is your clan, child?” Jana Novasun asked as Dessa poured the Elder of Lin a glass of honey wine. The woman’s eyes narrowed at it, but she did not drink. “I confess I have already forgotten your name.”

Seeing that, Dessa did not bother to pour a glass for herself, even in pretense. “Dessa, of Clan Rialis. My father was from Clan Kozk.”

“Kozk, the underclan of Lin.” Novasun nodded slowly. “I remember when both Kozk and Rialis came to my fire. You must have been one of the children, playing at our feet.”

“I was not that young,” Dessa smiled, wondering what else the old woman could see. “I sat behind my mother and Headwoman Catrinex, and listened for your lies.”

“Ah.” Novasun’s mouth twitched. “They were not lies. The clans had their glory.”

“From what our Mand’alar has told us, your hand set Revan on her path to victory against us.”

“In the abstract that is true.” Jana Novasun blinked. “More or less.” Something in her expression flickered, like a low flame set to burn. “Is that why you wear your swords on this day, Dessa of Clan Rialis? You would use them against an old woman?”

“Of course not!” Dessa drew her left ur’beskad and set it on the table. “You are not defenseless, Mother of Lin.” She got up slowly, letting her right hand rest on the hilt of the other blade.

“Ah.” The woman’s white-blind eyes must have been able to see something because they grasped the wooden hilt before Dessa led her to it. “Do you expect us to duel? With me blind and doddering and you hearty and whole?”

“I am ungainly with child and you are old.” Dessa pulled out the vial of truth serum from her pocket and placed it on the table. “Were we to fight, the battle would hold balance.”

“But we are not going to duel?” The woman seemed to regain some strength as her spine straightened.

“Not outside a circle. I have been ordered to ask you questions. However, if you would prefer battle instead, I can force you to take this….”

“Did Revan send you to perform my interrogation?” A slow smile crossed that lined face, as Novasun glanced at the chronometer on the wall. “A strange time for it, second shift. Most of the ship’s crew must be sleeping.”

“I have been directed to ask you questions for Revan,” Dessa countered. “Will I need to force you to give me true speech, or will you accord me the respect of my underclan, and vow for only truth between us?”

“And where is Revan?” the woman demanded, folding her hands over the wooden blade before her.

“With her First Husband,” Dessa shrugged. “It has been some time since they have seen each other, and…”

“And trust often begins with the smallest of steps.” Jana Novasun picked up the hypo and attached it to her arm with no further coercion. She did not flinch as the electro-spray needled her skin. “There. I’ve taken your truth serum. Go ahead, daughter of Rialis.”

Dessa watched. The registers blinked green as the serum released. “I expected more resistance from you.”

“There is no more time for lies.”

Then, there was a long pause as the drug began to do its work. Dessa took her seat again opposite and set her own blade back on her lap.

The old woman’s lined face paled, and her breaths grew shallow before she spoke again. “Perhaps the reason you expected objection is because you are as dim a star of Rialis as your father was for Kozl.”

Inwardly, Dessa smiled, for Novasun’s bravado proved the serum was working. No elder woman of the clans would ever insult a younger from a different clan—not when blades were drawn.

“Why were you allied with Clan Wies?” Dessa began.

“I was not allied with them,” Novasun chuckled. “I led them, just as easily as I led all your people, years ago.”

And that is why you are in chains now? Because you led us? But Dessa merely smiled, proud at herself for not taking the old woman’s bait, and continued her interrogation.

Xxx

Breathe in, breathe out, Polla reminded herself, trying to ignore the way the air in their cell suddenly seemed stifling, and the way her skin itched from that fracking ysalamiri blood. Revan had sworn the critters’ ichor wouldn’t leave a rash, but it had.

“Anything?” she whispered, but Miz High and Mighty didn’t bother with a response. Not even a shoulder twitch to indicate she’d heard Polla.

Polla shifted on her feet. The brick she held half-behind her back seemed a half-assed weapon to confront Tenny–Bro’s guards with, but it was all she had. Was more than Miz High and Mighty had, still dressed in just her skivs.

What if their killing the ysalamiri hadn’t worked? Tenny–Bro had promised them there’d be executions today—

It’s my neck on the line, here. Not hers. He likes her. All that work I did, trying to get the fracking revolution started on this gods–damned sithspawned planet... it can’t end like this!

And then, just when Polla had practically given up, the lock clicked open. The flickering blue haze surrounding their cell shorted out.

“Thank the gods,” she whispered.

“Gods?” Revan’s red–fuzzed head turned back toward her, raising a thin eyebrow. “Thank the Force instead of your primitive deities. Beya once tried to explain the vagaries of your planet’s religious culture, but I—”

“Of course.” Revan turned back toward her, frowning. “It took some time to synchronize the Force energies, but once we destroyed enough ysa, I knew their null field would collapse—” She froze suddenly, one hand motioning Polla back. The gesture was accompanied by a faint press of air, like a warning wasn’t enough for Polla Organa not to stay out of the fight–lines between her and the approaching footsteps—

_How many feet?_ Polla didn’t know. And then they were there before she had a chance to figure it out.

Two guardsmen, both masked. _Only two._ There had been three left, before.

“Oh ho,” chuckled one with Tenny–bro’s echoing voice. “Starfire. What have you done?”

“Restored the Force, Vitiate.” Both hands hung at Revan’s sides now, but the right one was slightly curled.

“Hah! At least in this chamber.” The other guard’s voice was deeper but it had that same metallic echo. “Planning to leave, so soon? Why escape at all, my little copy—when I have arrived to escort you to the position of honor for today’s executions?”

“I don’t require your escort,” the woman purred back, with a lot of guts for someone unarmed in their skivs.

Polla’s fingers shifted on her brick.

“Perhaps you thought I was coming to kill you?” the other guard asked. “I would have every right, purely for the destruction of my property! Do you know it took _centuries_ to breed so many ysalamiri? They’re quite particular.”

“I _do_ know.” Revan seemed perfectly relaxed, even smiling. “The Senate families on Coruscant used them too. I used to wonder if that was part of your design—or if your agents procured samples from Senate contacts? I _knew_ you had your hooks in House D’Reev.”

“Oh, my Starfire.” The guard shook his head, chuckling. “Honestly? I cannot recall.” He drew out a raised disc from his robe’s pockets and held it up. It looked like a comm–link, a small one with an inset screen. “I have something here… ah, more _recent_ to show you.”

Revan took a step back, still smiling and shook her head. “No.”

“She’s not wearing the gown I selected,” sighed the other guard. “And it was perfection incarnate —”

“Ungracious,” the other said. He raised the comm–link screen toward Revan. It was tilted at an angle so Polla couldn’t see, but the other woman froze, all the muscles in her arm tensing at once.

Then the smile on Revan’s face grew wider. “The gown is lovely, Vitiate. I just didn’t want to soil it.”

She launched forward, legs cutting out in a high kick, so fast that her movements blurred. The comm–link spun out of the guard’s hand, and there was a sickening crunch when her foot connected with his guts.

_Now, Polla!_ There was supposed to have been some signal, some warning, but Revan had moved _so fast._ So did the guards now, even the injured one, faster than anybody had a right to be moving—but all their attention was focused on the red–headed woman in her skivs and not Polla—

_Now’d be the time to cut and run,_ she thought randomly.
Instead, Polla Organa moved in closer with her brick.

Xxx

Valkorion adjusted the collar of his robes, the bodies behind this one mimicking the movements with a dozen different hands, all red-robed, and all prepared for sacrifice. The Zabrak boy named Zepth who he was possessing here tapped the comm-link at his wrist, sending the image of Malachor D'Reev he’d taken on Deralia to the guard’s comm-link in the green cells below Zepth’s feet.

The image was the holoprint of the boy, Malachor, taken the evening before on Deralia—

“Perfection, incarnate,” he echoed in this body, echoing the words of the guard below.

_Perfection_ , indeed. Now, Valkorion was——eating a pie on Coruscant.

—walking out onto a balcony to address his subjects on Thule.

—smiling at the copy who had managed to shatter her chains in the Green Cells. She would attack him in a moment, but he was two by now, and all she had were her clumsy fists, her weakened body, her cowering companion—

—the weak Starfire was contained, for the nonce. “I have something more… ah, recent to show you,” he chuckled, waving the comm-link. And—

“Oh! That reminds me!” Zepth’s mouth exclaimed.

And then, Valkorion was——reaching into his satchel and pulling out the antidote to a poison on—

_Yes, there._

—Deralia. At Bendowen and Ooka Organa’s farm.

“There,” he made Gaten’s voice say brightly, as he rubbed the sleep from the man’s old eyes and picked up the poison’s antidote. “Can’t wait any longer! Tut, tut!”

“Perhaps I should take more holopictures,” his Zabrak body murmured to its attendants back on Kaas.

_Nearly all of them were also him, so they chuckled in unison._

“When the boy wakes. Before the antidote? Or after?”

“Before,” said a Human’s mouth standing behind Zepth. The man had a tickle in the back of his throat and it itched abominably—

—in the ruin of his finest Green Cell, the copy’s green eyes narrowed, and all of her thin muscles tensed and then she sprang forward—

“Used isaflexin, am I right?”

“What?” Valkorion was rudely jolted back to Gaten’s body on Deralia. Interrupted by an utter

The voice was older, though. Not Deralian. “Put the contact poison on the masks? Noticed you made sure they all wore ‘em when you sprayed the fields.” The voice chuckled. “Nice bit of work, that one. Breaks down so fast, no evidence… very clean.”

Valkorion cursed himself for choosing a null body to come to this derelict planet. But the old scavenger Gaten had been the closest contact. “I don’t know what you’re talking about,” he said indignantly, as he turned around to see—

—on Kaas, his first body blocked Revan’s first strike, while the other moved in to flank her. The smuggler gave a startled ‘eeep’ noise, and stumbled back toward the fresher as if that would save her. So amusing, how that little null clung to life—his first arm closed down on the copy’s arm, but she ducked under him, leg sweeping out fast enough to blur—

—he was setting up the stands, peering down at the prisoners in the cage below. Which one should be first to die? Which one?

—the pie on Coruscant was exquisite. “Another,” his Selkath’s voice told the vendor. “Please.”

—he sketched the lesson plan on the board in front of the eager young Bothans on Bothawui Five. “Did everyone do their astro–mechanics homework?” his Duros voice inquired. “We’re having a pop quiz!”

—which one of the Kaas prisoners? The youngest daughter of Blais stared back at him from a cluster of frightened peasants. Had she truly eliminated her own mother, despite the woman’s Force–controls? Remarkable tenacity. Dangerous?

—Revan’s hand lashed out with a weak pulse of Force that nearly had his guard’s body overcompensating forward, expecting more resistance. “Only two bodies?” she taunted him. “You should have brought more, Vitiate.”

Vitiate. The name my father chose for the least of his bastard sons. She knows how I hate it.

“Aww, don’t be like that, man. Don’t be scared.” A chuckle from Gaten’s intruder, back on Deralia. “You’re shaking! Maybe I just want in on your scam.”

“Scam?” This body had already turned to face his new opponent, was already stammering denial. “I–I don’t know what you’re talking about, young sir!”

The man in front of Gaten on Deralia was nondescript but handsome. Dark–haired and all Human, by the look. He had a leathery cast to his skin that spoke of competence and——a blur to the side and a pain in his belly from the force of her blow—and then something slammed into Valkorion’s head like stars. Something hard. His guard’s body fell backward and he felt the Force compress as his shields dropped and then his neck snapped—

“Die,” the copy of Revan hissed from above. Her face was contorted with rage.

Next to her, the smuggler was blinking, still holding the brick she’d hit him with. His other body staggered as the first wink faded, gasping the words—

—“holopicture,” he made the dying lips mumble. “On… comm–link. Eee’s such a fine… fine… boyo—”
—snap–hiss and a blaze of red disrupted the second guard’s attempt to deliver the message about Malachor, the one that should have stayed her hand—

—Revan! The clever manka had stolen his saber!

—his Selkath’s body put the pie down. “Not sure I have time for another,” he told Deeka Jin.

—in the dim light, the copy’s green eyes were dark and full of shadows, as the second guard died too. “Goodbye, Lord Vitiate,” she sneered. “Again.”

“What?” Valkorion repeated, but time had passed when he blinked and died half a galaxy away. Died twice—for in his shock he had never even attempted to fight. “Her copy escaped! I did not anticipate that! Still, where can she g—”

Something sharp stung his ribs. Here. On Deralia!

“The reason I don’t like isaflexin,” a male voice murmured in his ear. Arms wrapped around him, and the hum of a vibroknife jagged as it traveled up his chest, slicing through the old scavenger’s clothes. It stung. “Is that it’s fracking slow. But karkas oil?” A laugh. “You allergic? I’m not. But most sents are.”

Another hand ripped the goggles off and then Valkorion was falling forward, crumpling to the ground and trapped in this body, while Gaten’s throat closed.

Above him, the black–clad man laughed and kicked him hard in the ribs, knocking off the goggles Gaten’s body always wore, even while sleeping. “Red–Eye,” he said, almost conversationally. “Wondered about that.” A booted kick made Valkorion shriek with the involuntary pain, but the noise came out more like a gasp as all the muscles in his throat froze. “Not sure what you lot are, but we had special orders to always stay clear. Guess that don’t matter, now.”

“Whoo—” Gaten’s body managed… and then that body died too.

And now, Valkorion was——brushing pie crumbs off his belly on Coruscant, and striding away, back toward House Racharn, where he could at least send a message—

—returning a volley of tenistre across the court in a nearby excersium to Helena Shan—

“Good job, Cally!” she enthused.

—coughing as he viewed the stands above his execution grounds on Kaas City, the tickle in the throat abominable—

Wait. Coughing? That will not do!

—drawing his saber to finish the infected one, even as he noticed for the first time that his escort had fallen silent, all of them wide–eyed and waiting, as if something was in the air—

Zepth’s body strode through the doorway to the grand balcony, looking down at the motley prisoners—

This fourth death was a small one. Nothing, really, after the other three.

XXX
The man had been calling himself Atton lately. It wasn’t a bad name—didn’t mean anything rude in Huttese and that was always a plus. Atton was a brand of fishcakes back home, and sometimes the man now called Atton instead of Blade Three of Twelve missed fishcakes.

“Good thing you didn’t break,” he told the vial of anti-toxin as he picked it up from where it had rolled on the floor. He pocketed it, and, reconsidering, bent down to check the old dead guy’s pulse. Didn’t have one. Reconsidering again, he cut the guy’s throat. Must have already been dead, because he didn’t bleed much—only the tips of his shoes got wet.

Never hurt to be sure.

Atton checked his chronometer. Still a few more hours til dawn. His stomach rumbled. He could have breakfast. He’d been watching the Organas for a while and they kept a decent larder. No fishcakes, of course, but still.

He bent down and lifted the body of old Red-Eye up by its elbows, dragging it out to the pit he’d pre-dug.

Xxx

“Well! That was unpleasant!” Valkorion adjusted the collar of his robes, the mirrors behind him mimicking their movements with a dozen different hands, all red-robed, and all prepared for sacrifice.

“Tut, tut,” he echoed through a dozen throats. How many times had he died? A number beyond measure. Dying no longer pained him.

Betrayal, though… well, perhaps it always would.

How far would she take this? How had she arranged for a guardian on Deralia? One that he had missed? If guardian the man was and not some Senator’s lackey, about to eliminate a rival.

“I should warn House Racharn,” he murmured. A shame she had managed to inoculate so many Senators, but there were still those whose loyalty he’d managed to sway—if only he’d begun earlier, but he’d held to the treaty until Starfire broke her word—

“I gave you so many chances, Revan!” His throats all echoed with regret.

Xxx

Zaalbar had been helping Breowl carve more logs for their stockade when he heard one of the cubs on look-out patrol cheer. The Wookiees of this planet had lived generations with no wroshyr, and so their notions of construction relied heavily on caverns dug in the earth, buttressed with logs and stone. Their fortification would be no match for any Sith who came upon them, but this dwelling kept their young ones safe from the predators of the forest.

The cheer seemed a cry of victory and Zaalbar hurried to the gates, pushing past the dark-haired Human cub, Phylus Blais.

“Big Z!” Mission’s dome spun with happiness when he came into view.

“Mission!” His ghost-cub was back from her quest to free the madclaw’s prisoners—and with her came victory: along with the Human Seiran Wen were the Wookiees Sikarroee, Adrewwr, and Geelmor. They were trailed by a dozen others Zaalbar did not know—all filthy and matted from their imprisonment, and all of his kind too thin. There were more Humans and Twi’leks too—even one whose orange hide and cheek flesh marked him as Sith— although the hairless one possessed slave tattoos that marked him as having none of the Sith’s mystic powers.

“Have you heard from Yuthura Ban?” Seiran Wen was upon Zaalbar like a mynock to find news of his mate. “Mission said that Polla and Revan were in something called the ‘green cells, and Yuthura was going to rescue them? Or… find out more?’”

“We have no more words,” Zaalbar shook his head. “But the Twi’lek Ban knows that Mission went to the palace today—” he paused, letting Mission translate. “Yours was the execution planned for tomorrow, Seiran Wen. But now you are free.”

“Yuthura may be in danger too, then,” Seiran said. But the flatness of his words and the sudden agony infecting his scent spoke of his grief—as well as his quick and unclever lie. “Someone should warn her. I’ll go.”

“Not alone,” Zaalbar groaned, touching his shoulder. You could not stop an ally from going madclaw but you could be there, after, to help them see the ruin they had made. You could help them rebuild.

“Good,” Zaalbar agreed because her powers would be useful, and her company was pleasant.

“Can you grab my sister while you’re at it?” Phylus Blais interrupted. “His Luminance summoned us both to the palace for the execution and she was dumb enough not to run.”

Zaalbar expressed surprise, as he had been under the impression that the boy did not like his fellow nest–cubs.

“Really?” Mission sounded surprised too. “Big Z and me thought you hated her. Isn’t it better if she’s dead?”

“I need Mydia,” Phylus muttered. “She’s the only one who can stand up to Inse, and besides—”

The following tale he told seemed as improbable as it was overlong and unduly complicated. Ghosts could not make children, and Mydia Blais’s abdomen was as flat as a plank of wood. How long did Humans gestate for? They were so short–lived that Zaalbar thought it could only be a few months.

“That’s… gross,” Mission said when he was done. “But yeah, I guess we need to let it be born and stuff so we can figure out if it’s evil.” Her processors made a noise like a sigh. “Fine. We were gonna rescue everyone else anyway. Guess we can save your stupid sister and her… blastocyste.”

“It would have more cells than that, Mission,” Zaalbar growled, correcting her, although he did see her point.

Xxx

The woman who had been Jana Novasun knew the Mando’ade. The woman who had been Arren Kae knew the Aleema, knew every span of its durasteel frame, every deck, and every coupling—at least by their schematic. She had been in this room before, too. This small galley designed for officers, off the main interior bridge.

Many times Revan had gathered her most trusted allies here, plotting their next victory amidst the mundanity of caff-bulbs and chok-cakes.
Even stripped from the Force, its guidance still led her steps. For there was no place more convenient to Kreia’s own plans that her interrogator could have chosen than this room—save perhaps the interior bridge itself. The drug clouded Kreia’s reasoning and freed her tongue, but it could not obscure her purpose. Indeed, she thought, as Dessa of Clan Rialis yawned for the third time, the drug made their remaining time pass almost pleasantly.

“Your child,” Kreia interrupted Dessa of Rialis, who was still pestering her about the numbers of Kissandrix’s wasted fleet and the locations of the Wies supply reserves. The drug the woman had given her compelled her to answer each query, no matter how inane, but this blonde fool was too stupid to ask the proper questions. “Is it the product of your women’s labs, or one conceived on sands and left to chance?”

“My husband has been a mercenary on the Rim since the Clans broke,” the Rialis woman shrugged with a careless arrogance Kreia would have admired… under different circumstances. “If he returns I will give him a boy for Rialis.”

“No.” Kreia told her, the drug making a fool of her as well, although that also did not matter.

“No?” The blonde frowned. “Do you mean you don’t know how many ships Kissandrix held in reserve? Or the location of their base? What is the location of their home base?”

“I do know—” Kreia began, but then the drug did its work all too well, as her fingers tapped on the table, slowly marking the seconds the chronometer on the wall was circling. Her voice went on, listing those useless, lost ships to a woman who would never need them—

A woman carrying a child who would never be born.

Kreia assumed she was recording their conversation, as she took no notes. That would not matter.

“Where are your reserves?” Kreia interrupted her own recitation with a dry voice, wishing she had a bulb of water. “I had heard rumors that there were Mandalorian ships near Rekkiad.”

“There were. But we have a base on Dxun,” Dessa of Rialis said, so easily it might have been a lie. Without the Force, Kreia had no way to tell. Dessa shrugged, with all of the arrogance of her station and none of the gravity. “Tell me how you raised Oerin of Lin from the dead.”

“It’s technical,” Kreia managed dryly. “I’m not sure you’ll understand….?” Nonetheless, her tired voice began again, reverting to Ancient Sith when Mando’ade failed her.

Xxx

Now, Valkorion was——making his excuses to Helena Shan.

—standing on a balcony to address his subjects on Thule.

—watching through narrowed eyes as the servers’ prepared the priest’s chambers on Ziost—his Oracle had been so irritable of late, always wrong, but so loud—

Drat. The boy. I must secure him! Who do I have close to Deralia—

—
“There,” he made Sydax’s voice say brightly, as he rubbed the sleep from the Human’s eyes as he stared into the dawn on Chassna. “Can’t wait any longer!”

“Wait for what?” his husband—no, her—her husband asked from across the room. Watching one of the local swoop races, now that the Biscain Hundred was done.

Valkorion froze, and blinked. “Apologies, my dear. I get so distracted when I’m…” he looked down. “Baking. Is this pie?”

His husband—the man’s name escaped him at the moment—flicked a lekku. “Hitting the Sleheyron sherry again, Sydax?”

“I don’t mean anything, my dear.” He glanced down at his hand but it was the wrong body and then Valkorion was——roaring a challenge to the Mother rancor on Dathomir.

—absorbing a new essence on a Ziost beach watching the dawning. The Oracle was absent, sadly. He had been so reticent and cantankerous of late, going on and on about doom even more than usual—

“Look at the sky,” one of his months murmured from the priest’s mouth on the Ziost beach, and all of Valkorion that was gathered there glanced up and saw—

—and saw

The scream seemed to echo from a thousand throats as the shock of their extinction ripped through Valkorion’s very core.

Xxx

Revan’s eyelids fluttered open, revealing the dimmed lights of the Aleema’s medbay overhead. I thought I heard something—

Like a million screams. Lights winking out on a grid—

“It’s nothing,” a voice murmured beside her. “Nothing you can help. Come back to sleep.”

“I—” Revan frowned because it wasn’t nothing. Somewhere, there was something, but—

“Even you need to sleep, Red.” Carth’s voice was amused, soft as if he’d just woken too, with a static buzz to it—

Revan blinked her eyes staring up at a perfectly white ceiling, now softened in the dining overnights, the reassuring hums of a ship in hyperspace, all of it so easy and familiar. Her eyes fluttered closed again. The bone–tug of exhaustion and the softness of dreams pulled her back into darkness.

“Come here,” Dream–Carth murmured, holding out his arms.

“Mmm…” Revan rolled over, although the bed seemed wider and colder than it had before. Her dream before had been pleasant and simple. Carth. A primitive wood fire in a portable hearth, the white walls of their ice–dome. Outside, perhaps, a blizzard raged, but here in the warmth of their foam–kit hut, they were both safe and secure—
“I love you, Flyboy.” Her body rolled into those muscular arms, and she buried her face in his smooth chest.

“No,” he whispered. Carth’s voice was strangely metallic and soft. “But he’s safe. No matter what you hear, Red. Malachor’s safe, but you can’t look back. She needs you—and you need her—”

“I know Korrie’s safe,” Revan agreed, feeling those arms tighten inexorably around her. “How’d you know?” Did he know where Korrie was? Had she told him that too?

Somewhere, faintly, she heard the sound of bells. That was familiar too, in this place.

“Safe,” he repeated. “No matter what you hear. For now, he’s safe. But she needs you. She’s in over her head—”

Da, her mind whispered. Da will keep him safe.

“Red.” Carth’s sigh rattled in his throat. “Listen. Please. She needs your help.”

She. No need to ask who—who she was. Or who he was. Because he’s Carth. She willed him to be Carth, even if she knew better.

“No.” In her dream, she pulled away, sat up and looked at him. “Dar’Revan doesn’t need anything because I’m going to kill her.”

Malak lay on the bed, fully dressed and armored. Again he was the man she’d faced on the Star Forge. Metal jaw, hairless head. Yellow eyes burned with corruption. “You can’t.”

“I can. I will. Go back to hell.” Dream–Revan rose and lifted her hand, slamming Dream–Malak into a convenient bulkhead.

For it was her dream, under her own control. And Malak…

Malak was nothing. As she watched, his broken body wafted away as insubstantial as an electron cloud. The sound of bells faded too.

Dream–Carth rematerialized instead, leaning on one elbow next to her. “Hey,” he said softly, a sultry grin on his face. “Freckles. Come here.”

The fire flickered back into existence on the hearth. Outside, the ice–winds blew, but here they were safe and warm.

Xxx

In Yuthura Ban’s dreams, she slew the same monsters again and again—even the ones in life that she’d never touched.

She slew Omeesh, the Hutt who had made her a stage piece before her women’s spots, hovering over her bed, rattling chains and her own broken slave collar. She slew Uthar, who had used her to further his own advance, drawing his saber once more for their final duel. She slew Jorak Uln, who cackled madly as the strength of the Bezel bond arced through his fingertips, summoning lightning to flay her alive. She slew Darth Malak, who turned and raised a fist—face shifting abruptly into Dustil Onasi’s face as he choked and died. Davad Arkan chuckled disarmingly on Mannan as he fell to Yuthura’s blue blade, and Sheris Darkstar raised her fist as Yuthura felt all the muscles in her own throat clench tight too—

And then, Revan stood before her, masked in gray before Kressh’s tomb.

The woman raised her mask, dark energy rising behind her like cold fire. “You know who I am,” she whispered again, as she had in life. “You know what I am and still you are here—”

“Not for you.” Yuthura’s saber throw cut into the Human’s heart. The Dark Lord of the Sith collapsed like a droid with a dead motivator, dark Force imploding like a salt tide.

In the end, it was Lord Scourge who chuckled softly and looked at Yuthura with eyes that were soft and weak with his need. “I’ve grown quite fond of you, Lady Ban,” he said. The pale moons of his eyes were already rent by red capillaries, little hemorrhages, signs that her poison had already done the bulk of its work—

“Too late,” she told him. For it was.

Too late for fondness. For regrets. As it had been with Vikor Tio. Even with Uthar. With Revan—

Somewhere a bell chimed its morning alarm. “Arise,” her thoughts whispered, nudging her. For a moment, she thought the voice in her head almost sounded like Vik Tio, his voice soft, wit acerbic. “Today, you’ll bring down a Sith so powerful he might as well be a god, Yuthura.” A warm chuckle brushed her earbulb. “Better eat a good breakfast first.”

Yuthura Ban snapped back to wakefulness, sitting up with a start. “Today,” she said, to the quiet room, the giant bed, the body on the floor. “Today we’ll bring down a god.”

Lord Scourge did not answer, as he lay sprawled on the handwoven Ssyyrian carpet upon which he’d died.

His skin had turned a pinkish gray several days ago. Dried froth on his lips and the way his hands clenched spoke to the fact that his very end had not come easily. Even slow-acting poisons were quick and ugly at the end.

Yuthura smiled down at him. “Good morning, Lord Scourge.” Her bare foot found purchase on his back as she stepped over the corpse to retrieve her dressing gown.

When she completed her morning ablution and came downstairs, Zaalbar was eating at the dining table downstairs with a few of the servants loyal to her. (Those who had not been loyal had been dispatched quickly weeks ago.) Next to him, a pleasant surprise: Polla Organa’s husband Seiran, rescued from Tenebrae’s cells and armed to the teeth. And glowering.

“Tell the man there is no sign of Polla Organa or the Revan Sheris,” Zaalbar whined at her without preamble. “We only liberated one cell. He keeps asking. There are still others.”

“The Emperor will bring Sheris out for the show today,” Yuthura surmised in Basic, for Seiran’s sake. “Polla may be with her—”

“Everyone is ready,” Zaalbar added. “Today will be the day the infidel soul stealer dies.”

“Did he just say something more about Polla?” Seiran demanded. “I need my wife!”

Yuthura shrugged, deciding it was more diplomatic to demur that point. “If your wife is alive, we’ll do our best to save her, Seiran Wen. If she is not we will avenge her death.” She leaned across the table and selected a pastry.

“What about her Exchange contacts?” Seiran demanded. “Aren’t they in on this too? Polla said you got some outside help. The droid refused to go back into the cells, but they might—she said she knew some of them—”

“We have.” Yuthura arranged her face to seem comforting. In truth, they had done most of the negotiations for supplies and weapons while Polla wore a mask and pretended to be Revan over a bad comm–link, but now was not the time to consider what they would tell Grarwwaar and his mercenaries who were expecting to meet the Dark Lord of the Sith at the end of this fight. “There is a small mercenary band at a cantina near the spaceport called the Blue Skies. When we give the signal they will provide some… assistance to us in securing the city.” She forced her voice to sound assured. “Additional cells of slaves will rise up all over this planet, galvanizing similar rebellions on Zioost and Thule.”

“The grid on Zioost is down already,” Zaalbar whined. “Maybe they started already.”

“In that case, we have no time to waste.” Yuthura smiled. “Today, my friends, we will take down a Sith so powerful he might as well be a god.”

“Sith are godless,” Zaalbar grumbled in Shyriiwook. “He is nothing but bad wind.”

“Did he say anything about Polla?” Seiran demanded.

XXX

The lights in the green cells flickered overhead, illuminating the dead guards, the blasted force fields, and the dark stretch of a hallway leading to freedom.

“I once told the Fragment you were a criminal with poor impulse control,” the Dark Lord of the Sith said, almost begrudgingly, as Polla looked up from rummaging through the dead guard’s pockets. “As a Jedi, I had a dim view of lawbreakers—”

Polla let the snort that had been building escape, glancing up to see the faint smile on the other woman’s face, as if she too got the jest.

“... but I underestimated the abilities your resourcefulness could provide us,” Revan continued. Her voice was ladylike and gracious like she was talking about a fracking tea party. She was dressed like she was going to a tea party too, having taken one of the gowns Tenny–Bro had left for them and pulled it on her bony frame. The dress was white and looked a lot like the one she'd fought the rancor in. Maybe fancier.

A dress wasn’t something Polla had expected, that the former Terror of the Galaxy would care about. Wearing one of the dead guards’ robes would have seemed more practical, but when Polla had suggested that, Revan had acted like Polla was asking her to wear Tanaabian mud–slime.

“I underestimated the number of words it would take you to say thank you,” Polla told her now, trying to mimic the woman’s tone. “And all I did was distract that one with a brick to the head so you could knock him out. But you’re welcome.”

There had been only two guards for them to take out. Whether the third guard was dead from plague, or just getting lunch—they had no way of knowing—or at least Polla had no way—and from the way Revan was standing casually against the wall, turning one of the guard’s comm–links over in her hand (and not actually helping Polla search them for weapons or security cards), it didn't seem like she sensed anyone else coming.

“I don't mean just now, with the guards.” Revan’s tone had shifted back to disapproving. “I mean before—securing that blaster that allowed us to dig into the walls. I told you to throw the brick at the man’s head. Not get between our melee. That was a foolish risk.”

“Again,” Polla muttered, “you're welcome for the help. Hey. So, when you called me a criminal you meant it as a compliment?”

“At the time, no.” Cool, green eyes assessed her. “Now I'm not as sure.”

“Well, you're the murderer,” Polla told her cheerfully. “I'm just seeing if they're carrying anything we can use.” She had been hoping for some kind of all–access pass to Tenebrae’s, or a datapad with Seiran’s name and location on it, but all she found was a fairly crappy blaster and a pocketful of lint. “Is there another guard coming?” she added.

“No.” Revan rubbed her temples, staring down at something on that commlink's screen. “There is still some distortion from the ysalamiri field, but I think most of the palace’s remaining denizens are that way.” She pointed at a wall, which wasn't helpful. “Somewhere outside. He will know we escaped, of course,” she added as an afterthought, which was the line Polla would have led with—herself. “We need to move—it is odd that they’re not coming closer, but we will encounter resistance—”

“You sense other sents? Underground?” There had to be other cells. Sei could be in one of them.

“Not close enough to catch us.”

Polla handed Revan the other guard’s lightsaber, so she had two.

“The Emperor mentioned executions today. He is no doubt distracted with them now...” Revan grimaced. “Remember, we’re nothing more than a diversion to him—or so he will think. If we move quickly we can evade his minions.”

We'd better. He mentioned executing me today before. Polla thought about asking for a laser sword of her own but decided she'd be better off with the crap blaster—at least until they found a better gun.

I wonder what happened to my sweet rifle. Seiran had been holding onto it when she'd been dressing up like Revan Starfire. For a second she thought about asking if Revan had seen it on the ship she'd shared with Polla’s husband, but then decided she couldn't handle another incredulous sigh and eye-roll. The woman probably could have conquered the galaxy just with her exasperated ‘you’re an idiot,’ glare.

“Executions.” Polla nodded, forcing cheer into her voice. “Great. We’re going to rescue the executed, right? Now? Lead on, mi lorda,” Polla added in Ancient Sith. “Guess you know your way around.”

“Hem–tesh, mi lorda,” the woman said, correcting Polla’s pronunciation. Not for the first fracking time either. “We may not be able to save Seiran. I warned you before.” She took a deep breath, slipping the comm into her pocket. From Revan’s expression, Polla wondered if she was supposed to ask about it. “It is not always possible to save everyone.”

“We’re going to save Sei! I’ll threaten to kill you,” Polla snapped at her. “Unless Tenny–Bro sets him free.”
“Why would you think that could work?” Revan blinked at her. “I could overpower you in seconds, even in this weakened state.”

Not if I got the drop on you. Polla scoffed. “I don't know, my poor impulse control?”

“Do not be foolish.” The other woman turned and started walking, still more stiff on her legs than Polla liked to see. “We cannot be taken again by him. You said before you had connections—your little rebellion had procured a safe house—”

“That was Scourge's mansion and he didn't seem to be on our side!”

“You mentioned a cantina as well. The one you said you met with the Exchange criminals in—what was it called again?”

I never told you the name, Miz Know–It–All. But Polla answered anyway. Blue Skies. It's by the spaceport—and you owe me, sister. I just saved your life again and I need your help to get my husband back!”

“If we can find him easily, I promise I will make every effort—” Revan froze, her head turning suddenly in the opposite direction from the way they'd come. “Wait.”

“What is it?” Polla found herself matching the hushed voice, edging back against the wall.

Revan’s eyes widened and she shook her head, holding up a hand.

Polla felt a warning pressure on her throat. “Don't do that!”

“Then be quiet. I need to concentrate. This body is so weak I can barely sense—”

The walls shook. So did the ceiling. From somewhere on the other side of it came the sound of an explosion. And screams.

“What—?” Polla cast an uneasy glance up at the low ceiling. It was rattling ominously. You didn't need the Force to sense that wasn't good. “You could barely notice explosions and screaming? Some Jedi you are.”

“That sounds like your little rebellion.” Revan was ignoring Polla’s jibes now. “Convenient, actually. Will Ban and her cadre of desperate slaves try to liberate the prisoners on the execution grounds?”

“Yes,” Polla bit out, hoping it was true. “Because they’re not assholes.”

“Good,” the woman’s lips pulled into a smile that made Polla want to take a step backward. “We’ll take this little rebellion—”

“It’s not little—”

“We’ll make it a war,” Revan continued. She grabbed Polla’s arm. “Come. We need to move faster.”

“Where?” Polla dug in her heels stubbornly, slowing their pace to a crawl. “If there's fighting by the execution grounds and Seiran might be there then that's where I'm going.”

The Bitch made a sound like a laugh. “Of course. But let me lead the way.”

XXX
The table between Dessa and Jana Novasun lay empty, save for the ur-beskad she had given the old woman, and the bulb of water the old woman had asked for, which lay in front of Jana Novasun’s wrinkled fingers.

Jana had set the ur-beskad on her lap.

Dessa had pocketed the hypoapplicator, as its purpose had been more than fulfilled.

She had her own dull–edged dueling blade on her lap too, next to the recording device. Dessa now had all the ship numbers of Wies’s fleet, the location of their base, and the tantalizing knowledge that the strange fleet of machine–cursed ships had been dar’jett magic and the Emperor’s—and nothing of Wies at all.

“The fleet you call the Sleepers are still abominations,” she chided the Lin elder, feeling slightly uneasy as if she’d had her son spit in the woman’s tea. “Metal and organic? You said they were not of Wies, but you knew of them.”

“They are the Sleepers,” the old woman responded impatiently. “Revan and Vitiate’s hidden fleet. I told you this before.”

What she had said had been both fantastical and heretical. Organic minds, over a thousand years old, melded to the fabric of machines, designed for a singular purpose—

The woman launched into another one of her technical explanations. Half of it was in that hu’tuun language that Dessa only half-understood. The moments stretched like hyperspace coils, and time was marked by their breaths.

In truth, Dessa’s mind was beginning to wander.

The old woman’s fingers tapped on the table. Her civilized accent broke and slurred, becoming more akin to one from a Rim planet. From time to time, Dessa interrupted to ask her a more pertinent question and was pleased how the woman’s responses to simple questions like time and date became irrelevantly precise, as her mind attempted to round down to the nearest second.

“My next inquiry involves other alliances...” Dessa began, having exhausted the topics of Wies and those unmanned ships. “Were you working with Senator D’Reev when you rallied our clans to war against the Republic?”

“Yes,” Jana Novasun said. “And no.” A smile crossed her thin lips. “Senator D’Reev was working for me, unbeknownst to him.” Her laughter was dry as sand. “Mine was not the only hand guiding a Senator’s steps, of course.”

“You have a high opinion of yourself.” As a woman of the clans that was normal, but Novasun had been born elsewhere.

“I was trained to be effective.” Jana Novasun’s gaze fixed on a point behind Dessa’s chair.

Dessa turned around to see what had caught her attention—only to find naught but the ship’s chronometer and an otherwise empty wall.

—and I honed my own power with the wisdom of those who had come before,” Jana Novasun continued smugly.

“It is the second shift,” Dessa reminded her. “Most of my crewmates are asleep. Watching milliseconds turn on the chronometer will not make the time pass more quickly. Before the serum wears off, I must return you to your cell.”

“Revan is asleep?” Novasun sighed again. “A strange time you’ve picked for my interrogation.” She glanced toward the ceiling. “And an odd place. The galley off of the interior bridge. You know, I’m quite familiar with this ship.” One eyebrow raised above a white eye. “Do you have any questions regarding the Aleema’s operation?”

“No.” Dessa ignored the insult. “You said D’Reev was working for you, before. How?”

“That is not what I said. The Senator knew that the Republic was stronger in wartime. He sought to manufacture a threat to serve his own ends.” Novasun’s hands folded in a steeple. “Fortuitously, I knew of a real threat. I knew that we had to prepare for a real enemy, and his efforts served that purpose.” She exhaled. “For a time.”

“For a time? Did it stop working?”

“No, but I was outmatched. Our enemy had already sunk his hooks into House D’Reev. I was slow to realize how deeply. The mother… and, of course, Revan never told me of Malak’s madness when it began. By that time she no longer trusted my counsel—”

That seems wise of her. “And who is your true enemy again?” Dessa yawned, although they had been over this point before.

White–blind eyes blinked in her direction. “The Sith Emperor. Tenebrae, as he is known now. Vitiate, he was called as a boy. Valkorion is, of course, the name he gave himself.” Thin lips pulled back, revealing perfect teeth. “A name whispered beyond the reaches of Wild Space. Some say his influence stretches even to there.”

“A Sith.” Of course. It was always a Sith. Dessa nodded. This woman—blinded and by all accounts Force–culled, stripped of her ranks and ships—was not a worthy foe. But if she knew of one…. “You mean the chakaar who tried to make us slaves under Qel–Droma? We fight him too.”

“Yes.” Novasun slowly. “You did.”

“We are going to fight him now.” Those ships—abominations if the reports were true. Some strange synthesis of sentient organic and machine. That kind of technology could not be allowed to flourish again. If her people had learned anything from the old basilisk designs it was this.

Dessa allowed herself the pleasure of accomplishment in so easily finding common ground. “Your information will be a great help. Perhaps Revan will let you eat in her tent again.”

Jana Novasun’s optical implants flickered in the whites of her eyes. “No. Some wars cannot be won in a battle of stars.”

“Then we’ll fight him on sands.” Their advantage, surely. The denizens of the Sith homeworld had never seen a Mandalorian invasion force. And even with their dar’jett magic—

“No.” Jana Novasun shook her head. A thin smile pulled at her lips. “You will not.”

Dessa folded her arms above her belly, frowning. “Why do you say that?” There had been rumors that Jana Novasun had had the gift of foresight, but Dessa’s own mother had just assumed the woman lied.

“Because it is true.” Calm voice.
“Skies, then.” They would need better maps of this world. Topographical ones. Would there be time to map it before the invasion?

Jana Novasun shook her head again. “No.”

Xxx

The stands were more than half-empty, which was not fair, Lady Mydia Blais thought, for she could remember when House Kryss was cut down to the last boy–child and they had had the slaves and commoners lined the streets cheering for them.

It was not fair that she was being executed with so little fanfare. It also wasn't fair that Phylus had run off, and that Inse had stolen Lord Malak away. Mother had been fond of telling them that life wasn’t supposed to be equitable, but that was supposed to mean that the House of Blais always won; and despite being younger than her sister, Mydia had always assumed that meant she would always be the ultimate victor.

Dying would be a massive disappointment. She hoped that Inse and Phylus had offspring soon, so she could haunt them and drive them mad.

But, appearances were important… and so Mydia flashed a smile at the floating holo-cam as her escort passed it. Ahead of them, the main viewing area of the Red Palace had been cleared of its usual potted topiaries; which were now replaced by a row of shock cages and a masked Gamorrean with a brutally large axe.

The shock cages were all full of riff-raff. Slaves, mostly Twi'leks and Wookiees, as well as several disgraced nobles. One of them, a skinny blonde girl who'd studied the Social Arts of Force Control at the Academy with Mydia and Inse and Nereal, waved her hand slightly, as Mydia passed her.

Mydia nodded back. Impending death was no reason not to be polite to the youngest Lady Zash.

At the top of a rose-covered platform, a Zabrak boy stood. Attractive and muscular. His red, glowing eyes marked him as a Voice, and the eye freshly branded on his forehead marked him as Select.

“Lady Blais,” he boomed, voice amplified by its echoes from the crowd around them. “You're the first.”

_The first to be executed? But is there still time?_ Mydia thought hopefully. But no, because now the axeman was stepping forward—

“Wait!” she cried out—for surely now was the time—if ever a time there was to save herself. “You can't execute me! I'm pregnant with Lord Malak’s baby!”

Xxx

_Pollie. She's not here._ Seiran’s heart sank as he scanned the stands, which were filled mostly with glowing, red-eyed sentients.

“Wait!” A feminine voice cried out. “You can’t execute me! I’m pregnant with Lord Malak’s baby!”

The crowd gasped, some of them clapping so much in unison that Seiran didn't have to check the color of their eyes.
“That’s my sister, all right,” Phylus muttered next to him. “I’m sort of obligated to try and rescue her and Lord Malak’s baby.”

“Dustil’s not Lord Malak,” Mission swiveled her dome to look up them. The two blue lights looked almost like eyes—the way that they blinked. (Or, it was possible that Seiran was just losing his mind.)

“The baby’s still a Blais,” Phylus insisted. “If it’s a girl, it’ll be heir to our House.” He took a step forward, backing almost out of the line of crates they’d set up camp behind. “Can we save her? Please?”

“Bantha poodoo! You're serious?” beeped Mission. “Hoped you were kidding about the kid.”

“Big Z says, ‘her plea is as good a time as any,’” Zaalbar growled and Mission translated.

“But Yuthura hasn’t—” the T3 objected, switching her voice back to the Twi’lek kid’s in a way Seiran still found disconcerting. “She’s still five minutes out with the mercenaries—”

_Damnit, Pollie! Where are you?_ “Blow the stands,” Seiran agreed, even as his heart sank. Clustered and barely hidden from so many of Tenebrae’s eyes, they'd be sitting kissra lambies, if they didn't make a move soon. “It’s time.”

The astromech beeped agreement (sullenly) and then Zaalbar switched the detonator at his belt to trigger the explosives before Seiran had a chance to say what he really thought—to point out that Polla could still be somewhere inside that blasted fortress—

To their right, the crenelated wall of the palace collapsed, taking half the stands—all lined with red–eyed, possessed sents—with it.

Amidst the smoke and confusion, Seiran’s gaze fixed on the disheveled form of his wife’s former captor, the Sith Mydia Blais. Incredibly, she was running toward them with a smile on her face, while the rest of the prisoners scattered, and the remaining Emperor’s possessed minions fell, one–by–one, taken out by their team of Wookiee snipers, already hidden on the roof overlooking the square.

XXX

“Oh!” Valkorion blinked. Time had—

Time had… _ellipsed_, as he lost too many bodies now to count. Disorienting, but not an unfamiliar sensation.

He was walking down the corridor now, one in a line of selves. Which body? He felt a lekku twitch in his own skull, glancing down to see a green–skinned hand. “My Sith’ae’rah can’t blame me for that one! I would have let dear Malachor live!” He allowed himself a dry chuckle. “At least for now.”

Ahead of him, he heard the cheers of his subjects. Wait! Were those cheers? He was——one in a line of hundreds, cheering in the crowd as a great, low boom made the floor beneath his feet give way.

He was——buried under a collapsing wall, blinded by smoke and dust, and dying a dozen times.

—drawing his saber... only to watch himself felled by a laser sight.

—standing guard at the main gate of the square—

—remarkably, the copy had killed the guards and freed herself, but surely she wouldn’t miss this—surely—this magnificent and useless gesture. Grand and sweeping.

Better, even than Ziosk—

“—water,” his cracked lips mumbled, and then Valkorion died again on that blasted beach on Ziosk, fading eyes staring up at the flotilla of wedge–shaped ships as they winked out of sight....

Had the copy of Revan done all of this? In Sheris Darkstar’s body? Had his true Starfire commanded her to commence this sad rebellion?

But... if the copy had her memories, wouldn't it have warned the true Sith'ae'rah against such lunacy?

He was—

“Hello, again, Lord Vitiate.” Just like that, she stood before him. The copy. He'd known she would come.

She was wearing the gown he’d chosen. White. His Starfire had always loved white. Did she think he never noticed her foibles? Those little tics made her mortal. Copied over to the copy, they were all the more charming for their fragility.

The Deralian smuggler trailed behind her.

He was in one of the guards at the main gate. He should have been in two but—

He glanced at Qeesh. The man was too pale. And then he coughed. At any other moment that would have ended his existence, but before her—

Only the copy, and yet! Still, unmistakably her.

The copy of Revan had lightsabers, two of them—one from each guard the two of them had ended so cleverly.

But the world, it wobbled and shook.

And Valkorion! He was—

“The Sleepers awoke,” he told the copy, blinking back shadows of his other selves. “Revan woke them. They’re bombing Ziosk right now. Didn’t you warn her?” He chuckled. “It’s out of our hands now, you and I.”

“Sleepers—” Her eyes widened and her face paled. She knew. Remarkable, this copy. It occurred to him at that moment that he’d never discovered just how the memory–transfer had been done. Was it still all with holocrons? He’d had so many holocrons destroyed on his own worlds, lest someone twist his own mind against him—

Valkorion's body smiled at the copy. “Oh, my light, you could have just taken the —”
Her lightsaber’s slash took off his head before he could tell her what to take.

XXX

Polla hung back while Revan killed the red–robed man in case the other three guards tried something, but one of them was coughing now, and the other two had normal faces, with ordinary eyes under their red hoods.

“Step back.” Revan sailed past them, and to Polla’s wonderment, the remaining guards did, even the coughing one, stepping over the body of the fourth guard—the one with red, glowing eyes who Revan had just killed.

“You’re… are you really Lady Yuthura?” one of them asked, voice almost a whisper.

“Does she look like a Twi’lek?” Polla snapped in her best Revan voice.

“Holomask,” the pureblood guard chimed in. “We were told to expect someone who seemed to be Revan, but we were also told it would not be truly her, but Lady Ban, disguised as—” he frowned, glancing between them. “Wait. Why are there two of you?”

“Come on now! I dyed my hair back. I don’t even look like her!” Polla paused because Revan was giving her that glare again. She tried to match it, glaring back.

Holomask? Polla had only suggested that as a joke to Yuthura. Had the woman actually gone ahead, somewhere out here, pretending to be Revan?

“This is her,” Polla added. “Revan Starfire. The real thing. I’m serious.”

The real thing ignored them and pulled out that comm–link she’d taken from the dead guard. She was staring down at its narrow screen now, her face a perfect blank.

“Revan? You calling someone?” Polla cleared her throat.

“No.” The woman tensed, shoving the comm into a pocket of her gown. “Captain Rinna, is it not?”
Revan’s eyes narrowed as she stared at the pureblood. “Along with Servile Kibo and Servile…..”
she frowned. “I’m afraid I don’t know you,” she told the coughing one, her hand back on her saber.

“Servile Qeesh,” the man said, dipping into a bow. “My lord, I was not honored with a place in his Luminance’s guard when you were last with us—”

“You could have looked our names up,” the pureblood interrupted.

“Oh? Did you think I never noticed you, captain?” Revan’s voice tinged with impatience. “Part of my husband’s honor guard for a year. You always stood in the back. We used to joke you did it to make yourself look taller.” Her eyes flickered disdainfully down. “So we wouldn’t notice the heels of your shoes. You’re a bit short for a Sith. Short and a null. You owed us your station after Mal bought that lot of pureblood culls from the Thulian auctions—”

“W–we’re with you, Lord Revan.” Rinna changed his song fast. He was red and watted like all the Sith purebloods were, and now those wattles twitched with urgency. “Lady Ban stationed us here in case any of them tried to get out. We were about to end Shikkah here, before you took care of it….” He nudged the dead guy’s severed head with one of his high–heeled shoes. “Qeesh, too, but now—”

“Now I’m sick,” Qeesh coughed. “Please! You know I was on your side when his Luminance wasn’t in me—Zepth vouched for me!”
“And what is Lady Ban planning?” Something like a smile tugged at Revan’s mouth. “Aside from impersonating me and disrupting this execution?”

“Today, to take the palace,” Rinna said. “Tomorrow the city. And then after that—”

“There are more of us than him. We’re killing them all. Everyone who’s been possessed by Tenebrae’s Kiss.”

“Idiots,” Revan snapped. “How can you tell if he's in them or not?”

“Y–you know how! The eyes!”

“Only if he’s in them at the time. How will you tell?” And then, just when Polla thought that maybe the woman had a heart Revan smiled coldly. “You need to be sure.” She frowned at the coughing one again, narrowing her gaze. “He culls the sick ones quickly. You are running a fever, Qeesh, but that could a deliberate ruse—”

Qeesh paled. “No. We—we test for antibodies. Test me! Anyone not vaccinated—or who hasn’t caught it yet—Rinna said he’d test me—”

“How fortunate for you.” She folded her arms. “But some sentient beings are immune to his Kiss. Zabrak. Rodians, Selk—”

“Yes,” Qeesh (who looked Human to Polla), nodded slowly. “Of course. We… we have a plan for that. It's not pleasant but sometimes sacrifice is—”

“Necessary.” But the woman was nodding slowly now. “Stay here—for now, Qeesh.” Her eyes flickered to Polla. “And you two… guard her for me. Take her to safety.”

“But Lady Yuthura told us to hold this gate—” Rinna’s stuttered objections fell on empty air.

“Hey! You can't just kill all the Zabrak!” Before Polla had a chance to object, she was staring at a swinging–open gate and another pack of heavily armed and confused–looking guards just inside it Beyond them, Revan Starfire was a white–gowned blur, charging into the open square with two red sabers blazing.

In the sudden silence, Qeesh coughed again.

_Blast._ “Uh, look…” Polla put her hands up letting the blaster dangle off her thumb. “I don’t want any trouble, but I'm gonna go after her, okay?”

“No.” The pureblood Sith guard shook his head. “You heard Lord Rev—”

Another explosion from the arena drowned out the rest of his words.

“I’m going,” Polla snapped—and went—assuming that they wouldn’t shoot her in the back.

XXX

“Wait!” Revan growled in Shyriiwook as she approached what appeared to be the main pack of rebels. Another grenade–launch took out half of a nearly deserted stand to their left, and another volley in front of her made one of the remaining walls of Tenebrae’s palace ripple and shake. “Chaos is wasted effort! Round up his remaining bodies in the center of the square and secure the perimeter!”

“I thought you were coming with the flyers,” barked a young Wookiee, while next to him, a yellow Twi’lek nodded in agreement. “Zaalbar said we should not wait if we were to save Phylus–cub’s kin—”

“Flyers?” Revan glanced at the sky for any sign of air support—or opposition—but there was none.

“Lady Ban said we make mayhem, we make an opportunity,” growled a grizzled matriarch behind the youngling, the stippling of her fur indicating she had seen centuries on this planet. “Who are you? You smell too much like glass to be Lady Ban.”

“Revan. Obviously.” She set her chin, giving the Elder the full force of her glare. In times past, that would have sent the entire lot of them to their knees, but the Wookiee only barked a laugh, shaking her head.

“You are the sick one from the jails?” Another Wookiee pushed forward, this one heavily armed and snarling at her with a grimace if recognition. His nostrils flared and then he nodded. “Yes. We have been seeking you, Sheris Revan. Where is Polla Organa?”

“Zaalbar.” She nodded at him, recognition coming a beat later than she liked, but she had never befriended the denizens of the Shadowlands, not like the Fragment, who had probably learned all of their names in the mere week she spent on the planet. “You know me. Tell them—” she gestured. “Clear the square. This needs to be an organized purge if it is to be effective. Chaos gives the Emperor too much of an opportunity—”

“Where is Polla Organa?” The Wookiee repeated.

“Safe.” She smiled up at him to placate. “I left her with loyalists. Now, please. Anarchy is not our ally, it is his. He will sow more confusion in order to save as many of his bodies as he can.”

“Oh, yeah?” came a feminine voice behind her. The voice sounded so much like the Fragment that Revan turned, heart in her throat, but it was only the woman’s T3 astromech droid gliding up with a blue flower freshly painted on its chassis and two blasters clutched in its appendages. “Anarchy’s working pretty well so far, Coma–Lady—”

“You were in the tomb with us.” Revan frowned warily at the thing programmed with a child’s mind. “Plugged into the Kaas network—”

“Yeah. Was just trying to get a widebeam connection offworld. But Kaas tricked me. Froze me with a carbonite ray and then tried to hack into my data logs.”

Her personality matrix had to be corrupted. Any innocence the recording of a dead girl might have had was long since lost. And yet… Revan smiled a little at the indignation in that voice and gentled her own. “Did it succeed?” She glanced up again at the Wookiees suddenly surrounding them and repeated her command for them to round up the survivors of their attack.

Four of them growled at her… but Zaalbar growled back and the four jogged away toward the front gate, obeying hid directive.

“I’m not… sure.” The synthesized voice sounded uncertain now. Younger. It could be a ruse. “I’m not gonna do what it wants, whatever. It’s not the boss of me!”
“Your personality matrix could be corrupted without you knowing.” Revan’s hand went to her now–deactivated saber.

“Maybe I’m corrupted and maybe not.” A few lights flashed sullenly on the T3’s dome, distracting Revan from her assessment of their remaining forces’ loyalty. “I don’t feel any different, you know! Maybe Kaas works for me now.”

_Poor creature. It's the illusion of agency we value. Even this little ghost values it._

“You and I aren’t so different,” she soothed. A lie, but not an untruth. Kaas’s processors surely could have overwritten Mission Vao, had they tried… but they had not.

The question was why.

_I need to put this machine off guard. Gain its trust so I can discover the means to destroy—or control it._ “I need your assistance… Mission.”

“Oh, yeah?” Her own voice came out of the dome’s speaker—if Revan had ever been a sullen child, which she had not. “For what?”

“With… this.” All around them, bedlam reigned. “Who is giving commands here? Take me to them. Indiscriminate slaughter gives the Emperor too much opportunity.”

“Hey! We don’t discriminate! We’re shooting everyone! Yuthura Ban and Big Z have it under control.”

Behind the T3, Zaalbar growled his affirmation.

_Big Z is Zaalbar, her mind categorized. Zaalbar has the life–debt to the Fragment. If I can convince him I'm acting to save her—_

But instead of being logical, Revan bit back a laugh. “You call this control?” Behind them, she heard the screams from the dying, felt the pain of a dozen injuries. Tenebrae’s possessed rarely screamed, they would fall silently, or laughing at her—

There were too many innocents caught in this net.

“We can handle this revolution just fine without you, nerf–brain!” The T3 chirped. “But say… you wouldn’t happen to know where Polla Revan got to, would ya?”

_Polla Revan._ It didn’t take decades worth of Jedi training and scholarship to know the droid was referring to the Fragment.

“No,” Revan said. “But… perhaps I can help you find her.” She forced a smile onto her face, even as she suddenly noted Polla Organa, in flagrant denial of Revan’s orders, running across the sands of the square toward another cluster of Humans. “Your friend Polla Revan would want you to help me now,” she added, wondering how resistant that Wookiee was to compulsion, and if Sheris’s weak power would be capable of bending Zaalbar’s loyalty.

The Wookiee’s teeth pulled back from his lips as if he sensed her attention. “This is the true madclaw,” he rumbled at the T3, shaking his head. “Only a madclaw would fight rancors with blades and not traps. She smells like Polla Revan’s nightmares.”

“Only a son of the forest would fight an infidel’s war, risking his branch!” Revan shot back. “And yet, here you are, Zaalbar of the Eiweorr Branch.”
“I free my people,” he yowled.

“They’re not yours,” she purred in response. “The Wookiee of this planet have been slaves for generations. They are decadent. Subservient. Weak—”

One of them had the courage to object to the last with a snarl, but it was drowned out by Zaalbar’s roar.

“They are mine,” he barked, gesturing with a heavy claw. “My branch now. If you want to help Polla Revan, Dark Lady, you will help us now.”

“I will,” she smiled. It wasn’t a lie. “But you must listen to my wisdom in matters where it surpasses your own. This—” she gestured at the field of combat around them. “This is war. Madclaw I may be, but war is something I know.”

His brow wrinkled. “When you start to make sense I will listen. When you find Polla Revan, I will follow.”

“Poodoo, Big Z! How many times do I have to say it? We don’t want to find her!” The computer made a rude noise, almost like it had gas. Or a bad anterior radiator. “Kaas computer does, and that means finding her is bad. Whole time I was plugged into that bantha brain, Kaas kept saying it needed Revan’s brain to rebuild its network, blah, blah, blah—”

What’s this? Revan eyed the thing, whose fears at least appeared to echo her own. “You sound sincere.”

“Are you nuts? Of course I am! That sleemo Kaas would slot her into its bank and use her to fix Tenny–Bro. Then it’d boss all the other planets around, and Kashyyk was perfectly happy being an independent before. Now, I can’t even get through to Carth on the private link we set up, cause Kaas is on all the networks!” The droid rolled its dome back, sensors blinking. “Hey… I saw you trying to open that tomb—”

“You saw me fail.” Around their immediate area, the rebellion was not failing, and Revan allowed herself a sense of satisfaction, as another group of Tenebrae’s Voices were lined up against a wall and shot, about twenty meters to their right, at the edge of the square.

An empty gesture, but still.

“But why were you trying to open it?” the simulacrum of a dead girl asked. “Were you trying to help the Kaas computer?”

Would I tell you if I was? Fortunately for the T3, Revan did not want to help the Kaas mainframe, either. “No,” she said levelly. “I was trying to be…” her mind reached for a vernacular term the machine–child would understand. “A… a hydrospanner in the works of its gears.”

“Oh.” The lights on the dome beeped green as if Revan had impressed the thing. “Well… good. I kept trying to ping Canderous to tell him to warn her not to come—”

Another explosion interrupted the rest of the astromech’s tirade, and then foolish Polla Organa ran across the courtyard again, trailed by the three red–robed guards as if she was leading their charge.

The Fragment would do the same if she were here, Revan thought sourly. Although she wouldn’t die so easily as Polla Organa if her bodyguards aren’t more careful. “Is… Polla Revan’ traveling with Canderous Ordo?” she asked out loud.
“How should I know? Last thing I saw, she was racing sublight tracks in the Biscain Hundred!”
Mission paused. “Feeds are spotty now from that sector, but they're saying something went bad with its suns.”

Amidst the chaos, Revan saw a man break free from a crowd running toward Polla, and then the Deralian veered her course to intersect them. They met in an embrace… but a nearby explosion kicked up a cloud of dust and the next thing she saw was the two of them running clear from another collapsing wall.

“Suns?” Biscain had two. “What do you mean wrong? Did the Mando’ade attack Biscain?” They had the Aleema. They would be more than capable. “Did Clan Ordo attack the Biscain Stations with my ship?”

“Don’t be a jerk,” the Twi’lek grumbled, which was hardly definitive as a response. “News got weird after something weird happened on Katarr—and then Biscain.”

“We’ll need to speak later,” Revan told the machine and the Wookiee. An odd part of her wanted to pat the T3’s dome. “Keep yourself safe.”

“You too,” the machine warbled. “I guess. I mean, I know stuff about war too, and if you can't open the tomb you're a crappy hydrospanner.” Its dome swiveled and the voice shifted into Rakatan. “We will need something better.”

Revan took a deep breath, calling on the wisdom of the Force not to answer, and her own strength not to shiver with Sheris’s weak spine. She raised her eyes to the skies and then, in that instant, caught a glimpse of red hair in a cluster of sentients fighting in the stands above them.

Red hair and a lightsaber, flashing with a Jedi’s blue.

Oh, no, she thought. It was impossible. And yet—

“Fracking hell!” The word came from her lips with the graceless eloquence of Polla Organa—whose bad influence must have rubbed off on her—and then Revan launched herself in a Force–enhanced run toward the stands, abandoning the Wookiee and the droid for greater prey.

Xxx

“You did not have to be rude to the madclaw,” Big Z lectured, as if Mission still needed manners lessons. (Not that taking them from a Wookiee had helped, really, as Zaerdra always used to remind her.) “Your shielding may not be adequate to withstand a lightsaber blow at close range.”

Mission had already moved on, a remote part of her probing Kaas’s lockdown by pinging it with the lyrics of three thousand Bithan pop songs all at once. “Hey! Is that Yuthura up there?”

Zaalbar rumbled his disapproval. He did not like the holomask that made the Twi’lek look like Revan, and he did not like the Scentless One the Twi’lek was standing with, who pretended to be a Wookiee.

Xxx

The wooden weight of Dessa’s ur-beskad was a reassuring line against the warmth of the child spinning within her belly.

In contrast, the cold words of Jana Novasun were becoming a dull drone, filled with Ancient Sith terms she would need a holo–dictionary to translate later.
Dessa blinked and yawned.

“Tired?” Novasun raised one white eyebrow. “You must be very near your time.”

Yes. But that did not matter. Duty to Clan came first.

“We are going to battle your Sith now,” Dessa told the Lin Elder. “We are going to Dromund Kaas to fight this enemy of yours, this emperor now. Clan Wies as an ally would have been helpful, but you put them against us. If we share a common enemy, why would you oppose our work?”

“Because I could not—cannot—save you.” The old woman stared past her at the chronometer. “I cannot save any on this ship. But you are noble warriors. You all do your clanmothers proud. In a better world, you would meet a kinder fate.” She took a slow breath. “I am sorry.”

“Is that a threat?” Dessa would merely laugh… except the old woman’s eyes were deadly serious. “I am half your age and our blades are ur-beskad. Hollow and blunt. Even if you bested me, what could you hope—”

The pain came before her mind had a chance to recreate the steps toward it. The old woman’s right hand was now hooking hard around her neck, and Dessa’s face was slamming into table’s stone surface. A bright crack of white–red agony, and then something hard and flat cracked across the back of her skull.

But the ur-beskad blades are hollow—

A futile thought, even as the next came like a thundercrack—

Not the hilts, they are weighted with the sand from home. Stone is heavy whether ground to sand or solid, I should not have trusted a dar’jett—

Then came the black, as cruel and silent as space.

Xxx

Revan Force–leapt toward the stands, where Tenebrae’s executioners had suddenly become the hunted. She barely cleared the first row of seats, but managed to recover, rolling into the landing and looking up at—

Herself.

For a moment—but no, this woman was not as strong as the Fragment. Could not be the Fragment. Revan stared up at herself, dressed in black battle armor, surrounded by mercenaries and wielding a blazing blue lightsaber, the Force swirling around her like a maelstrom.

Tenebrae’s chosen lay dead around them by the dozens. Most looked startled, as if the Emperor and Revan had never played a game like this before. Some of the dead were achingly young, and Revan willed herself not to think of the comm–link she’d taken from the dead guard’s hands, with its simple message, the implied threat.

Greetings from Deralia. Any message for your son?

Malachor’s half-grown face had beamed back in the holomage. Less than half a year since she’d seen him, but he’d grown so much—

Vitiate can’t kill him. He needs Mal to get to me. He thinks he can control me through my son—
“Revan!” Her own mirror reflection called down to her with a Rim–accented voice, and a moment later the woman’s holomask cut out, revealing a Sith–marked lilac face, lekku bound tight her skull. “Thank the Force!”

Ban. Yuthura Ban. The woman the smuggler claimed was helping, the one from the palanquin, she was in the tomb with us and then she—

“Where is Lord Finiris?” Revan leveled her blade up, gaging the distance between them. “You left my tomb with Finiris, Lady Ban. Is he with you now?”

“No. Lord Scourge is dead,” the former Sith Academy Headmistress replied, smiling slightly. Her teeth were small and pointed. “I poisoned him.”

“Good,” Revan replied automatically, although the man had been a friend, once. She remembered that. She remembered that once he had chafed under the Emperor’s command as much as she had. She remembered Finiris as a man of principles—and a part of her regretted—

He betrayed you, a colder voice whispered. This is not the time for sentiment.

But then, it was Ban’s face that suddenly swam in her mind. Ban’s face as it was now, but different—lips curved in a smile in a Korriban bar, the marks of Sith corruption changed, the sound of Beya’s laughter ringing across the room—

Xxx

“Give us the name of the contact, Headmistress, and my friend will assure you have Darth Malak’s support for your little coup—”

Sheris kept her head down, well aware that the mystery of the hood concealing her features was far more effective in this place than her ignominious face.

“Lurze.” Yuthura Ban shrugged. “By all accounts, just another nameless smuggler, but if what you claim is true, and he is—”

“GenoHaradan,” Beya said. “We’re sure of it. Infiltrating so close to the Academy—” she crossed her arms. “You are fortunate we found out in time.”

Xxx

Sheris knew Ban?

That presence Revan tried to deny uncoiled in her head.

I knew her. We shared a mutual acquaintance on Korriban, and then, on Manaan, she was kind to me. She was always kind to me when most sentients thought me mad, or merely Òerin’s cast–off—

You mean Malak’s cast–off. It was neither the time nor the place for such an exchange, but a juvenile rage consumed Revan and could not be denied—

You were Malak’s cast–off. Not I.

Silence. Revan would not be goaded by her own mind.

Revan pulled at the Force again, leaping over two more rows of seats to stand before her pretender.

The Twi’lek was shorter than Revan. A smile flickered across that false mouth. “We hoped to find you unharmed.” Yuthura Ban beamed, even as her mercenary team tensed at Revan’s approach.

“I found you,” she said. Revan didn’t recognize any of them. Half were helmeted; and none were the Fragment or her known allies.

“Stand down,” Yuthura’s voice snapped with command. “This is truly Revan. I told you we’d find her.”

“Alive,” growled a Wookiee armed with a sniper’s rifle. “I admit, my sources were wrong when they reported her demise.”

“And you are?” Behind them, Revan could hear—and feel the chaos of battle swirling like a maelstrom, but it was more a slaughter than a struggle. Faintly, she could feel the lights winking out when Tenebrae’s Chosen died. Possessed, they truly did not care. But the innocents… every one was a pinprick of hot pain in her chest.

“Grarwbaar,” he barked, tilting his head, and wrinkling his nose. “Lord Revan.”

There was a pause as if the Wookiee expected some reaction, but Revan’s gaze had drifted to the other side of the staging grounds, where Polla Organa gathered with her husband and a host of other sentients. Her eyes narrowed, tallying those below, and watching their movements looking for any that seemed too synchronized—

She found nothing so obvious. If Tenebrae possessed any of those left alive, his consciousness had fled them. That made sense, of course. The Emperor disliked losing.

“Polla,” Yuthura followed Revan’s gaze. “Did she escape with you? We suspected he held you together, but we could find no trace.”

“Of course. I kept her safe. We escaped the green cells together. Vitiate hates dying,” Revan changed the topic back to the tactics at hand. “He’ll retreat, but then we won’t know which bodies he can possess. In the confusion, he will rally more forces from Ziosk or Thule, and bring back the Imperial Fleet.”

“No,” Yuthura told her. “We arranged for uprisings on Ziosk and Thule too.” A smug smile twisted her face, turning her aristocratic features into something cheaper and common. “Tenebrae is a man who can be everywhere at once… but death weakens him. By assaulting him on all fronts—”

“I believe I grasp the meat of your scheme,” Revan told her, trying not to let acid etch her words, for Yuthura Ban was an ally.

I had a similar plan, once upon a time. The one I couldn’t implement. Not until I had Republic space secure.

“But your plan is foolish,” Revan said aloud. “Starting this rebellion of yours now was very foolish. With our treaty broken, Tenebrae will consider himself free to occupy sentients in Republic space. Instead of containing him to his own preserve you’re handing him the galaxy.”

The Twi’lek shrugged. “It’s done,” Yuthura snapped her saber back on her belt.

Revan didn’t bother to answer, eyes scanning the field below. The T3 was there, with the Wookiee Zaalbar, hovering near Polla and her husband. “I assume you have air support, if the Emperor’s wing commands aren’t bombing us?”

“Incoming, from central Kaas City now,” Grarwbaar nodded back, glancing down at his comm.
“Hrmm, that's odd.”

His comm. Commlink. The reminder of the one in the pocket of her white gown felt as heavy as a stone.

“What?” He was odd, Revan noticed. She should have noticed that before.

He was a Wookiee with what appeared to be a metal voder attached to his throat. His voice, even when speaking Shyriiwook was curiously bland. And now he lapsed into Standard, barking orders at his soldiers—before turning back to her.

“Something just jumped out of hyperspace,” he began.

The Fragment—? Revan’s head looked up, but only saw clouds and smoke from the carnage their little war had already cost. In the Force she felt nothing at all—or—

There. Faint. Like a tremor in the Force—

“Lots of somethings,” the Wookiee added. “The readings are—this can't be right. There's... I think they're ships, but there are so many—”

Xxx

So many nightmares the Emperor had shared with her. The horrors of his own childhood.

The horrors he had done to his own children.

“All of them failed me, Starfire,” he'd murmured from Malak’s metal throat. “All of them, save you. They had to be punished. Even the Sleepers—”

“Were the Sleepers your children too?”

Am I? It was a question she would not give him the satisfaction of asking.

Revan had her mother's eyes and her father’s chin, and although that did not preclude Radik Starfire from being one of Vitiate's possessed Jedi, it still did not mean she was his in any sense of the word—

“No.” He chuckled. “Sleepers are the lost souls of my world. The computer showed me what to do—how to cast their minds in silicate—but the infernal machine was tricksy. It never warned me I would need a fulcrum to control them—”

“A fulcrum?” But she knew. She knew because she could sense them herself now: those trapped minds, frozen and still and waiting for their spark.

He means me. I am the lever that sets them in motion. I am the control, the check on his power. I am the ignition, the key, the spark—

Vitiate nodded Malak’s head. “Yes, you.” He laughed again. Malak had never laughed, everything was deadly serious, but this monster ripped the mirth from his ruined throat. “The device never warned me they'd hate me so much for what they'd become.”

“They were Force sensitives.” Her mind found it easier to entertain the puzzle than the truth before her. “And so that hate must fuel—”

“Thereir power.” In another body he might have smiled. In this one, his eyes only glowed their hellish red. “Yes.”

Xxx

“Too many?” Yuthura Ban was asking somewhere back in the world. “What do you mean too many? Too many what?”

Revan's eyes fixed on the square below, where Polla Organa had raised a hand to wave at them. It looked like she was motioning for them to come down. As if this was all some kind of child’s party and not—

The pieces clicked into place. “We need to leave the palace. Immediately. Go to ground. There were… are there still caves? In the forest?” She tried to make that question sound calm and perfectly reasonable, even as the Force toned a warning in a way she never remembered it doing before. Even with Sheris's dulled senses, when every echo was more like a whisper than a roar—

_I'm frightened. We need to run. So much death and pain—_

“There are caves,” the former Headmistress of Korriban replied. “Yes. A few entrances close to here.”

Revan willed Sheris’s weak bleats not to infuse her voice. “Anyone you want to live needs to go to ground now. The Emperor's true Fleet has come to his defense. The Sleepers are much more than ships. They possess sentient cunning and the coordination of a Killick hive. They will swarm like cells defending against an infection, and they will burn everything in their path. This planet is about to be blasted back into the Age of Dirt thanks to your carelessness—and there's nothing we can do to stop them.”

“We will demand that the Emperor stop it—” Yuthura began.

“Tenebrae can't stop them. ”

_I could, once. He told me I could. He told me they were mine, and I felt them, dormant in their sleeping matrix, high above the skies of that barbarous world. Kin to my Star–Forged ships, but still, something else entirely._

_Something ancient that should have stayed buried—_

But Revan could not sense the ships at all now, only this increasing sense of dread. “There is no time,” she snapped, even as the sound of faint explosions lit the darkening sky a few kilometers away. “Go!”

Yuthura was already barking commands into her comm as their party began to move.

Below Revan watched the pale oval of Polla Organa’s face turn up toward them as she received the message, and then turn back toward her husband. Even at this distance the smuggler’s incredulousness was clear in her stance—no doubt she was complaining to Seiran Wen about a circumstance she herself had brought to bear—

Revan cleared her throat, willing her voice to stay even, and not crack with Sheris’s weak fear. “Yuthura. Every population center on this planet needs to be emptied. Sentients must scatter. Stop slaughtering Tenebrae’s chosen. Contain them. Bring them—we will need… at least one or two with every cell.” Her eyes scanned the band of mercenaries before them, but saw no tell–tale red glint. “He told me long ago that the Sleepers cannot be stopped, cannot be reasoned with, cannot be countered. But… nine hundred years past, _some_ sentients survived the burning of Medriaas. I've seen the holo-record. They survived underground.” Revan took a breath. Was it her imagination or was the air already smoke-tinged with more than just the debris of cordite and permacrete their own forces had used? “We need to follow their example. Now.”

Xxx

It took Carth longer than he’d hoped to find the brig, having decided (given his motives) that it was better not to ask again for directions. A stop at an unlocked armory supplied a set of workable sparring armor. Whatever that medix had given him seemed to have stopped the flu in his tracks too. He almost felt… good.

_Capable._

The embroidered belt was the wrong shape for his blasters, but Carth thanked that spirit of Mandalorian ingenuity that made such a thing unremarkable. He found some magna-clips to fit them better and set out again with the vague idea that the brig should be on one of the lower decks, past the hangar bays and near the maintenance tunnels.

He was wrong, but the other thing he had been looking for, Carth found in the stairwell of Ceta Deck: a datapad welded to the wall, with the sigil for map drawn above it. Maybe when this had been an Imperial ship, directions had been a closely-guarded secret, but now that it was in Mandalorian hands, they’d left schematics for the crews assigned to maintenance. Ship was so damned big you needed maps to get around. Carth had served on dreadnaughts before, but the _Aleema_ had to be at least five times the size of _Great Hunt_, or the _Corulag Scar._

There were several places marked as retaining cells, but only one with the added sigil of a star, which Carth figured had the best chance of being right. He grimaced, noting its location. As with the _Leviathan_, the cells reserved for high level prisoners were on the upper level—in this case, right off of the runes drawn to indicate the ship’s interior bridge.

_Back the way I came—_

Retracing his steps, it hit him again like a ton of permacrete: here he was on Darth Revan’s old flagship with a pack of Mandalorians and his wife. His wife… _Revan_. She’d seemed upset when he called the… the other one Revan too, but Carth didn’t know else to call _her._

_This is her ship_, he thought. _Not yours, Freckles. You share a name, nothing more. Not you. Not the woman I married_—

He had to make sure of that.

Carth was coughing when he reached the elevator banks. Coughing and feeling a little lightheaded. He was still sick or stimmed enough that he must have stared at them for a solid ten minutes before deciding to take the stairs to the cells.

The door slid open. A pack of kids not any older than Dustil looked up at him from where they were gathered around the floor of a cramped, curved room, playing chess.

The cells lining the bulkhead wall were all empty, their fields deactivated.

_Oh, no. Maybe that didn’t mean anything at all. Hell, it could have been anything._

“General… Onasi?” One of the kids stood up. “Do we call you Admiral?”

“First Husband,” one of the chess players corrected. Her hair was in braids and her gaze direct and open, maybe even friendly. “Did General Ordo send you to hear our report?”

“Uh… no. Where’s uh—” Revan’s story of the woman had included so many names Carth wasn't sure what to call her. “Sunrider? Kae? Novasun? Is she here?”

“Dessa is interrogating her for Revan,” one of them said brightly. “In the quarters off the interior bridge.”

Dessa? The name wasn't familiar. “Does Revan know that? I don’t think Revan knows that. Is Dessa alone with her?”

“Dessa’s father was a vassal of Clan Lin,” the boy told Carth as if that explained things. “It's good to see you again, First Husband Carth Onasi of Lin.”

I'm of Lin now too? Was that better than being an Imperial admiral? Or a Mandalorian general?

“Where did Dessa take her?” he asked shortly, instead of continuing to argue.

“Down the corridor until it curves at the prow,” the girl said. She moved a black chess piece against a white with a click. “Did Revan send you?”

“Yes,” Carth muttered, lying, and turned and left.

Apparently being Carth of Lin worked wonders for his authority, because only the first kid followed him, and he looked more concerned than suspicious.

“Do you need help?” the kid asked politely. “You're sweating. We were told you had some kind of illness.”

Carth waited for him to catch up. “Not sure.” He didn't see a way of shaking this guard. “Maybe. Uh… just follow my lead. Where… uh, where did you say they'd gone again?”

The kid blinked at him. “This door.” He knocked on it. No one answered.

Carth didn't waste more time. He tried to punch the controls, but they'd been locked. Before the kid could call for help, he pried the plate off from the side—

“What are you doing?”

—ignoring the kid’s questions and his own ragged heartbeat. Then he jabbed the two connectors together. The frame flashed green and the door opened.

The room inside was small: just a galley kitchen and a basic fridger and cooker, a small round table, two chairs, both upturned.

A woman with the bloody face lay unconscious—or dead—on the floor.

Carth froze.

The kid next to him made a soft noise, very soft, already trained to realize that whoever did this had to be close.

Exits, Onasi. Whoever did this didn't come back the way you came—so they're ahead.

Ahead was another door, carelessly half-open, whether from haste or because of a trap
A broken sword made of what looked like wood lay next to the Mandalorian woman, the unfortunate Dessa. Her hair was blonde where it wasn't matted dark with blood. Her eyes were closed.

One hand had fallen over her belly. She was pregnant. Close to her time. Or had been. She was alive or she was dead. Her stomach moved slightly.

Oh, no.

Still keeping his eyes on the door, Carth knelt down next to her and felt for a pulse. It hummed, slow and steady beneath his hand. Strong.

Stable, then—at least for now—

Carth glanced at the kid, motioning him forward with a series of hand gestures he hoped meant help her, stay quiet, and get help.

The kid nodded and pulled a kolto pack out from his belt.

Carth left them, moving as quietly as he could toward the half-open door in front of him. There were voices within. One cracked and familiar, another tinged with static.

Behind him he heard the click of the kid’s own comm–unit, and his voice, low and fast, requesting a medic.

Interior bridge, the kid had said. Carth had heard of other flagships having them—usually more like rudimentary panic rooms, designed to stash your officers in case of boarders, or hull breeches on the external decks, but the Aleema wasn't like other ships.

Carth could think of several things someone like Arren Kae or Vima Sunrider or whatever her name was could do with access to bridge commands.

Access that she'd killed—or tried to kill—to get.

None of those things were good.

XXX

“Did you give Carth Onasi the holster you embroidered?”

“Yes.” Canderous stretched, rising to his feet. His knees popped again—a good reminder he'd been younger back when they'd fought the last war.

“And he accepted?” Aemelie smiled smugly.

“He doesn't understand the meaning.”

“Did you explain it?”

“He's Telosian.”

“So?”

Canderous sighed. “So, they don’t have tents that are large enough for…” he made a gesture, reminding himself he was too old a man for the heat coloring his cheeks. “Company.”

“Jin of Lin doesn't seem to have any limitations about his—”

“That kid isn't Telosian. He's from Coruscant. They do it for credits there.”

“I know.” Aemelie sounded scandalized. “I told you, we saw his parents at their brothel—”

The console pinged and Canderous glanced at the incoming transmission, all thoughts of Aemelie’s personal arrangements vanishing like yesterday's fight.

Hells. “That’s Malachor D'Reev,” he said out loud, frowning as he squinted to make sure. Blurred image, yeah. And the kid had grown a lot. Shaved his head almost, but that was what clinched it. Without that mop of red curls, you could see the shape of man he’d be one day—and that man looked a hell of a lot like Malak D'Reev.

The couple he stood between were smiling too, both of them with Deralian top-knots, longer than the stub of one the kid wore.

Words scrolled across the screen.

_Such a strapping, helpful son! I’m sure he misses you. Would you like to see him again, Revan? The weather on Deralia this time of year is so delightful!_

“Osik,” Canderous swore. “Is the wideband feed linked into the med-bay?”

“No.” Aemelie frowned. “Who sent the message? Do you think it’s a threat?”

The wideband cut out abruptly and then pinged again, this time coming from Core space. The image of a Selkath appeared on their screen, blurred with the scrambler.

_“Revan?” It demanded. Her? Canderous had always had a hard time telling with the Selks. “Revan! Do you know what your little pawns have been playing? Should I be amused?”_ The voice darkened and the image resolved, clear enough now to see that the eyes of the Selk were glowing, even through the holo-image’s blue haze. _“Revan! Answer me! ANSWER ME—”_

“I’d better go wake them up,” Canderous muttered, reaching for his robe. “Don’t talk to that thing while I’m gone.”

“But he wants an answer.” Aemelie frowned. “If the dar’jett hu’tuun thinks he can threaten a son of Lin and Ordo—”

“It’s Revan’s business,” he reminded her. “Not yours.” Canderous paused at the door, glancing back. Aemelie was still half-naked, her hair like a dark cloud, half-hiding her eyes. “Let her handle it. Less the Sith Emp knows of our command chains the better.”

“As you wish,” she began, too sweetly—

It was then that the distress beacon flashed above their heads. Twice.

_“General?”_ a boy’s voice cracked. _“We need a medical team off the main interior bridge—it’s Dessa—”_

Aemelie’s gasp of breath came too fast, like whatever was wrong she already knew. Canderous’s mind made the connections. Dessa. Interior bridge. The Jett’ai cells. That old woman—

Haar’chak.

There was an old Clan saying. ‘Rain is rare on Ordo, but you can drown in sand all the same.’ Or as Gwen used to say; ‘Never just one grenade going off—always a dozen.’

“Oh our way,” Canderous grunted, grabbing Aemelie’s arm.

XXX

Outside, another storm was brewing on the Telosian pole.

The wide–band comm had chimed while they were reviewing purloined Republic chronicles about a battle between unknown factions, (unknown to Republic forces—not to them), somewhere out on the Outer Rim.

The woman who called herself Traya looked up from Admiral Rew Ekkumi’s half-hysterical recordings of an unknown hyperspace route, captured Mandalorians, and strange ships—and raised an eyebrow at the buzzing comm–link.

It flashed yellow in a pattern known only by one mind. One mind: now shared, at least in part, by three sentients.

Two of them were in this room.

“She deigns to check in.” Traya tried to keep the sardonic tone from her voice; although, of course, it made no difference.

“At last,” Padawan Mical Jorde nodded slowly and went to the console. Because of the storm’s atmospheric interference their signal was filled with static, but the face looking back at them was unmistakable.

When did I become so old? Traya mused, but more pressing questions pertained to what her former self had discovered. The cam was focused so close upon those wizened features as to hide all background views. Someone had fastened a Force band at her temples and three more were locked around the old woman’s neck. “Where are you?”

“The Aleema, of course.” The old face smiled back at her. “Its interior bridge still responds to my voice commands.”

“Oh? How fortuitous that I—that we compelled that technician to include your voiceprint in the security commands.” Traya frowned because knowing the woman as she knew herself, Traya suspected she knew her next course of action as well. “Have you wended your way into the amnesiac’s heart, or is she already dead?”

“Neither. But this Revan is as recalcitrant and stubborn as the smuggler we met on Dantooine. And much more dangerous. We have only a little time, old friend,” Kreia’s stooped figure glanced behind her and then back to the holocam, her face half-lit with a radioactive glow.

Abruptly, what must have been a hovering holocamera panned back. Darth Kreia had prised the maintenance doors open along the room’s curved wall and was now withdrawing the core array’s coolant rods, one–by–one. “We are quite fortunate that the Mando’ade never rerouted the main arrays out of this room.”
“Old friend?” The term was inadequate. “If we were merely friends I could attempt to change your mind.”

“Do you wish to? Truly?” The woman let out an uncharacteristic sound, something like a laugh. Her eyes were unfocused, and her lips moved as if she was half-speaking to herself. Her hand fumbled at one of the collars at her neck and she tugged at it. “Far too late for that. Far too late, indeed.”

“Mother…” Mical cleared his throat and Traya considered the word might seem more convincing as sentiment if the boy didn’t look like he smelled something bad. “Are you…. you appear impaired.”

“The Force restraints?” Even as Traya wondered, the old woman shook her head.

“No. I was interrogated by a doomed child who was even more of a fool than the one who sent her. The one who sought to contain a woman deaf to the Force with neural bands.” Kreia grimaced as she reached for another rod, hands shaking a little as she set it down. “Dessa of Rialis injected me with what I believe to be the same hypnotic that I used on Ulic Qel–Droma when the Council refused to trust—” her voice cut out. “Oh! That can’t be right!”

“That was Nomi,” Traya sighed. “Nomi Sunrider’s memory.” Her own memory of the event was shrouded in shadows, overlain with subjects more pertinent that she had found in the Archive holocrons. Ancient history. The origins of the Force. Lost civilizations—

“You could reprogram the navigation charts, instead, Mother. Reroute the ship back to Republic space,” Mical suggested.

Traya frowned at him. His eyes met hers and for once, she could not read them. “Our old apprentice understood restraint—” she began, positioning her own argument, even as she saw the futility. Half the rods stacked on the floor in front of Kreia had their pale green shading to red as the gases within began to overheat. “Revan understood restraint. Did you try speaking to her? Reasoning with her?”

“She is not my old padawan. She understands nothing.” The voice was flat. “The Onderonite poisoned her mind against me. She cared more for her null husband and his fallen son than any knowledge from that tomb, any wisdom I could offer. And, she is weak. Even knowing what I had done, she let me live.” Kreia straightened with a grunt, looking up at the cam again. “Are you aware she also lured Darth Nihilus into a sun?”

Mical nodded. “Yes. The Biscain System is now under a mandatory evacuation order.”

Such a waste, Traya thought. Revan Starfire’s power. That ship. Even you, old woman, with all of our wisdom. All to be ash. “Did you not sense Davad’s passing?” she asked, with a lightness in her tone that she had not felt in years.

“Blindness can serve as a respite from pain,” Kreia mumbled, hand now trembling as she set another rod on the ground. “I sensed nothing.”

“Knight Arkan went quickly, we think,” Mical interjected.

“I do not care how fast he died or if he suffered,” Kreia snapped. “He was a weapon primed. If we did nothing, he would have finished Vitiate and all his works.”
“My apologies, Mother.” Her son shot Traya another glance. Even if Mical contained only a part of her mind, Traya thought that it was enough for him to understand her, to know that the two of them were allied in purpose.

For Traya understood his doubts all too well. The part of her that had been Atris had shared… had shared those doubts. She remembered… once. Sharing them. But now, she and her son had seen true horror. Had walked through Vima Sunrider’s memories of Nathema’s blasted sands. Had seen the deaths at the Cron Cluster, as well as Malachor.

Now, Traya raised an eyebrow at her son and he frowned, shaking his head. She knew without asking that his attempts to pinmark the Aleema’s signal had failed. The ship was still in hyperspace, unreachable by comm. Even if they wanted to send a warning, it was impossible.

Traya cleared her throat. “Then, the Aleema’s fatal flaw is intact. Even after all this time.”

The wizened head bobbed up and down. “To the unnamed slave race who built it, running the main power arrays next to the hyperspace generator may have seemed more insurance than a flaw. Very few points of action can be centrally controlled, but core meltdown is one of them.”

It was strange, the woman who had been Atris thought, to see the face you remembered from birth displayed on a holoscreen, staring back at you, declaring an end that you knew was a waste. And yet—

There was peace in recognizing the inevitable. “I know this as well as you do,” Traya told the old woman.

“My son may not.” The blind eyes turned. There was spittle at the corners of her lips. “I regret they took my visor, because I would like to see your face again, Mical. Your image is distorted without. And your sisters—”

Their son’s voice was flat. “My twin Brianna fled in the company of a known Blade. Since he was not working for us, we suspect—”

“Perhaps Darth Sion may yet have a part to play,” Kreia interrupted, finishing the thought for all of them.

_He may, but you will never know, Mother. Sister. Self._

Mical frowned stubbornly. “It would be useful to have an agent on Dromund Kaas. Perhaps you could travel there and arrange an accident for Revan on Kaas, instead, Mother?”

Atris, the Master of the Archives, had been a practical enough Jedi to note that a pyrrhic victory would only delay their enemy’s victory—not win their war. Traya thought perhaps the amnesiac could still be countered, if Darth Sion could be leashed again, or if any of her other children manifested the right gifts… When Atris had only been Surik’s master, she had been so sure the girl had possessed potential at least equal to Revan’s own—

Kreia’s words interrupted Traya’s musings. “I saw her open the Medriaas tomb. The holocron of Vitiate responded to her… and where one opens, so will another. No,” Kreia shook her head. “This Revan has all of our old apprentice’s passion… with none of her sense.”

“But the rumors of plague on Kaas—Vitiate may be distracted. He may not send her to the tomb right away.” Although Traya agreed with her old self’s assessment of Revan’s character, she thought there was still hope for change. Or control. The same qualities her other self saw as a weakness could, Traya thought, be used to their advantage.

“The Sith Emperor’s holdings are in near–ruin due to the Rakatan plague. My intelligence reports claim rebels on Kaas are currently destabilizing all planetary trade. Ziost and Thule also stand on the brink of chaos.” Kreia’s lined face smiled grimly. “Vitiate will be desperate and Revan will be there. He will use her. Our only recourse is to ensure that she never reaches Kaas. She cannot be used dead.”

“But Vitiate will just find another refuge—as he did after he made Medriaas into Nathema. Your method will not lead to victory. Merely delay.”

There were now eleven rods on the ground. It the control arrays were disabled when the hyperdrive engines shifted frequencies—

Their time to sway Darth Kreia had already passed.

Darth Kreia turned back to her task, taking another, even as her task had already been completed. ” Perhaps. But it may take Valkorion a thousand years to reassemble his empire, and in that millennia, the galaxy will have its peace.”

“What of Sheris? Are you sure she is dead?”

Kreia looked up from the array, now holding a rod in two shaking heads. “I am sure of nothing. But I will not risk Revan coming to that planet on a half-planned hope.”

More than half-planned. Traya had seen the footage from the Sith planets, heard their whispers of a rebellion. “The Sith sects in Republic space whisper of a Revan returned. We know it is not this Revan. It could be Sheris.”

“It could be anyone. There are always rumors. Ever since her first death.” Kreia’s hands pulled out another rod, setting it on the ground stiffly. “As we designed. If the shadow survives, she will be our final distraction. But our old padawan must not—”

“Revan must not reach Dromund Kaas.” Traya nodded slowly. She wondered if she would be less reluctant if it was her own life being sacrificed—or if something about watching the other woman’s choice merely brought her own guilt to the foreground.

Traya remembered the banks of alarms that should have sounded when Kreia began dismantling the ship’s secondary hyperdrive control, and her eyes went to the walls, where those lines had been blasted open and raggedly cut. They did much to explain Kreia’s pallor, her trembling hands. Not just fear. Exhaustion, too. And the drugs she was given. “Then I suppose this is farewell.”

The woman who still remained in her old body looked up scowling. “If Davad Arkan metastasized into too strong a piece for the board, this Revan is no better.” She paused, pursing her lips almost smugly. “Something you do not know: Vitiate’s dormant fleet awoke in her presence. I saw a fraction of them myself—coming to Revan’s aid above the skies of Nathema.”

“The Sleepers?” Traya froze.

“Drawn to her. Another risk.” Kreia sighed. “But even strong as she is in the Force, Revan cannot survive a core reactor meltdown. In a few more minutes the Aleema will be lost with all han—"

A flash of light from the side illuminated half of Kreia’s body, before sparking through the other side of her skull. The holocam transmitting the image to them jerked and bobbed, emitting a startled beep before stabilizing to show the woman who had been born as Vima Sunrider collapsed like a cheap puppet on the durasteel-plated floor.

“Down you go,” muttered a hoarse male voice in Basic, and Captain Carth Onasi stumbled into the holocamera’s view, toeing the body of the dead woman before turning his attention to the rods. He picked up the first with a mechanic’s hand and gingerly reslotted it into its case with a mechanic’s efficiency, barely glancing in their direction, although the flicker in his eyes and the grim set of his jaw indicated he had noticed the audience.

The flashing red lights that had begun to appear on the commander’s console faded as he slotted the tenth rod in, and he let out a ragged breath. Only when the man had completely stabilized the ship did he look up at her. “Who the hell are you?”

“Master Atris, of the Jedi Council.” For it was no lie. “And you are Carth Onasi. We have met—”

“What was she doing?” he demanded. “My wife and the Emperor? Davad Arkan? Sleepers? What the hell was she talking about?”

Kreia’s plan had failed. Traya tried to think of the best way to appeal to Carth Onasi’s sense of nobility. This was the man who had saved Revan Starfire before, (perhaps better if he had not), but he was a hero. Ideas on how to appeal to his desire for the common good warred with common sense. For Kreia had let slip that the man’s son was still doomed.

He will not destroy this vessel. Kreia gambled… but she lost. I must find the new path.

Traya composed her features into a reflection of serenity. “Master Sunrider was driven to madness, but some of her words were true. Revan must not go to Dromund Kaas. Not now. Not without my help.”

“A little late for that,” he muttered. “Don’t you think?”

“You have a ship that can go anywhere in the galaxy. Taking it anywhere in the galaxy would be preferable than going to Kaas.”

The captain’s eyes narrowed. “Might come as a shock, Master Atris, but I don’t trust you.”

“You have been given few reasons to trust anyone—” she paused, while the futures nested and folded in her mind—now projected by the thoughts of Jedi who had come before, as well as her own. Kreia had mentioned the fallen son—

Mical cleared his throat, raising an eyebrow. His index finger plucked his own shirt. Even then, his answer was so logically simplistic that it took Traya a moment to fully understand how closely his thoughts had dovetailed her own.

“You do not need to trust me,” Traya told Revan Starfire’s husband. “Or Padawan Jorde. But we can help your son. I have helped others back from the Dark before.”

“No.” Carth shook his head.
“Allow me to speak to Revan, at least,” she urged. Now, thanks to Kreia, she knew what not to say to the woman. “Please.”

“She’s asleep”—His head turned toward the door, and he wiped his forehead with his sleeve, frowning at the open array banks. “That crazy old scow almost killed us all!”

“She disabled the alarms,” Traya murmured. “And we had no way of warning you. Padawan Jorde and I were helpless to do anything but watch.”

“She held us hostage to her atrocity,” Mical added, which seemed overly–dramatic, Traya thought.

Carth Onasi squinted at them both. “I walked in while you two were saying good–bye. Sounded like you were all old chums.” A muscle twitched in his cheek. “Seems to me if you didn’t want Revan on Kaas, and these Sleepers didn’t want her on Kaas, and that dead schutta didn’t want her on Kaas, then Kaas is where she’s going.”

“Dessa’s okay,” a gruff voice interrupted him, and the holocam swiveled again, rising up for a wider view. “Kid commed it in and got her to the medix team in time.” General Canderous of Ordo stood in the doorway, arms crossed. A scowl crossed his face as he focused on Traya and Mical. “Jedi’re pacifists, huh? Going by that open array bank, someone tried to blow up my ship. You lot calling to apologize?”

“I will speak only to Revan—” Traya began “You must impress upon her the urgency—”

“They with that Emperor of the Sith that’s jamming up our main comms?” Canderous Ordo asked Carth Onasi.

“I don’t think so… I don’t know.” Carth scowled. “Maybe they are. Soul-sucking scum likes to play games. Where is—”

“Please,” Traya repeated. “I must speak to Revan—”

“Then you’ll have to wait,” Carth snapped, and severed the communications feed.

The dull hiss of static replaced their earlier audience.

“Captain Onasi was remarkably undiplomatic for a Republic officer—” Mical began.

“It scarcely matters. Revan controls the ship’s destination and it is she we must convince.” Atris sighed, reaching for a bulb of water. “She will comm us back. Quite soon, I expect.”

“What will you convince Revan to do?” Mical asked.

Traya was disappointed that he did not already know. Kreia had not trusted Revan, but Traya remembered the padawan she had helped to train once. So many padawans—so many children—all throughout the years, but Revan had shone among them, the brightest of all. Brighter even than the one Atris had held closest to her heart: Traya’s own daughter: the lost one, Meetra Surik.

Some of that spark in Revan remained.

Kreia had been blinded by the frailty of her own body, the paucity of her own experience. The dead woman had merely taken her own mother’s memories… but Traya now had the wisdom of centuries—all the collected holocrons from Master Atris’s archive at her disposal—and those lives had revealed certain universal truths, common to all sentient existence.

Given opportunity, most sentients tried to do what they perceived as good. Even among the Sith that lesson rang true, even if a Sith's views of good based themselves on the winning side of a zero sum equation.

My padawan, the Revan of old, would understand what Mical fails to grasp. Without Revan’s power, Vitiate is nothing. Even his fabled Sleepers will destroy no more than a dozen worlds before they exhaust themselves.

The Jedi Order has been effectively culled. Do the same for the Sith and the galaxy has a chance for its own fate—perhaps even a millennia of true peace—

“Master Traya?” Mical interrupted again. “Convince Revan to what?”

“To spare the innocents aboard that ship, of course,” she said kindly, as if any Mando’ade had ever been innocent. “When she makes her own end.”

XXX

“Have a care, Millifar of Ordo. You are a Republic prisoner.” The woman at the head of the crowd of Republic hu’nuu (all displayed on the viewscreen) had a High Admiral’s bars on her coat. Milli’s father had made her learn their names and insignia back on Coruscant, when they were still pretending to work for Malachi D’Reev. There was only one High Admiral, which made her identity obvious. The others surrounding her on the viewer were less known: one was a Chiss, another a graying man about her buir’s own age. “You need to answer our questions, or put us in touch with someone who will.”

“I’ve done nothing wrong.” Millifar crossed her new arm with the flesh one, glaring at the blue–edged hologram in front of her. High Admiral Rensha was Trandoshan, and the scowl on her face might be her normal expression, but there was no mistaking the scorn in her sibilant voice. Millifar’s eyes went back to her comm–link still blinking on the console in front of Rew Ekkumi, the woman whose command had captured her in honorable battle. “And I am Admiral Ekkumi’s prisoner, not yours.”

“Don’t you want to be returned to your family?”

“They will want me to return to them,” she admitted, staring at the comm. She’d locked it to her own pass–phrase just as the troch barbarians broke her ship’s hatch open.

“Answer our questions and we may return you to them,” Rew Ekkumi muttered, leaning closer than Millifar liked. She could smell the woman’s lunch on her breath.

“I’ve answered enough.” Millifar glared at her. The time they'd spent playing guards for D’Reev had taught her a great deal about Republic barbarians—namely that she didn't have to do what they wanted. They believed in their rules of laws. It was not like it would be with Sith. These moffasaps didn't even like to use torture. They'd even let her keep her own boots!

She would escape quite soon.

“We know Revan commands the Aleema,” Admiral Rensha continued. “Does she intend to join the Sith Emperor?”
“Would you take the word of a Mandalorian prisoner, if I said yes?” Milli’s shoulder throbbed. If she was on the ship Mekel of Lin would be rubbing it with oil now. “Or if I said no?”

“We saw her Aleema destroy some Sith ships—” Rew began, frowning. “But it was set upon by other Mandalorians as well.”

“My father is Mand’alor, not General Revan,” Millifar added. “If you want to know his plans, you may ask him.” she nodded at the comm–link. “He will answer.”

“We may do just that,” Rew muttered. “Open a channel.”

Millifar shook her head slowly. “Not until you return my ship and my freedom.”

“You are my prisoner,” the holographic Trandoshan interrupted them. “Not Ekkumi’s.”

“She is here,” Milli said politely. “Where are you?” Father would want to know, she suspected.

“Chasing ghosts and lies,” the admiral hissed back. “The time for this is done. Admiral Ekkumi, I’m sending you coordinates.” Her tongue snaked between her teeth. “Come join the fleet while we prepare for war.”

XXX

Revan stood in the room of the interior bridge and considered that she might as well never sleep again, because apparently, the galaxy could go to hell and no one would even bother to tell her until they’d reached the ninth level of a cold fracking Corellian purgatory—the one that was a bottomless kriffing pit.

“What the hell were you thinking, Carth?”

It was cold on this Force–damned bridge, too. Perhaps she should have stopped to grab more than a sleeping robe before Canderous's terse comm had summoned her, just as the med–bay erupted in chaos, admitting Dessa of Clan Rialis with a head wound and possible fetal distress.

“Why, Carth?” she asked again.

His soft brown eyes were harder than she'd seen them since Lehon, and his mouth twitched when he looked at her. “Vima Sunrider attacked one of our crew. She needed to be stopped.”

“But you came down here to question her before you knew that. Against my orders.” It should feel personal. He was her husband… and yet, standing in this room Revan had a strange flash of doubled memory, as if she was in a place she'd been before. “You countermanded my orders, Carth. Behind my back.”

“And I’d do it again,” he said flatly. “She had to be stopped.”

“That wasn't your call!”

“I–I know that.” He swallowed. One of his hands was shaking and she could see the sweat on his forehead. He still wasn't well. “It's nobody's call to do what I did, but I came down here to shoot her because it had to be done. I knew that even… even before I found Dessa, before I found her sabotaging the ship.”

“She was sabotaging the ship!” Aemelie interrupted. “Your First Husband saved all of our lives.”
“We needed her alive.” Now they had nothing. All the woman’s knowledge, the answers to so many questions—

“She wanted you dead.” The look was that flat look, dangerous. The one he’d first turned in her direction on the Leviathan, after the dying Admiral Karath whispered words in his ear.

“Your dar’jett was going to blow up my ship!” Aemelie interrupted again.

“It’s my ship. Not yours.” Revan’s eyes went to the wall above their heads. “My command.” Like a memory, the smell of charged lightning, scorched skin. Suddenly, she knew she had stood in this same place, punished those who dared cross her in this place. “I wanted her alive.”

_Not entirely true_, a cold voice whispered. _But you wanted to be there when she ended. You wanted answers first—_

Carth stood against the wall, back straight like a perfect soldier, eyes locked to hers. “You told me yourself. Vima Sunrider's been in this every step of the way, hounding our steps, making you do whatever she wants, whenever she wants it—” The muscles in his jaw worked and she noticed again how pale he was, how his hands were shaking. “I put an end to her, once and for all.”

“Vima Sunrider set all this up so she can _kill_ us here? Blow up the _Aleema_?” It made no sense—and yet, the open maintenance panel, the disabled security panels—“You’re saying Vima wanted to kill us all?”

“I don’t know.” His voice was hoarse. “She… she was talking to Master Atris and some kid.”

“What did they say?” Revan reached for a calm that eluded her.

Aemelie’s smug expression wasn’t helping. The woman had already let it slip that she’d been the one who gave Dessa of Rialis permission to interrogate ‘Jana Novasun’ in the first place.

There was a recording of that meeting, but no footage of the bridge encounter that had ended in the woman’s death. Revan had fast forwarded through clips of Dessa’s interview. They held a mess of technical detail—what little she’d had time to hear. She was starting to wonder if she’d get more information reading the dead woman’s entrails like a Grass Priest.

“Something about wanting to speak to you.” Her husband blinked. “I was more focused on the rods Sunrider was taking out of the mains. They were speaking Mandalorian… she and the old woman said something about Sheris and Davad Arkan being on Kaas? And Arkan being too powerful. They said you can’t go to Kaas. Atris said that too—to me. After… after I shot… Vima Sunrider.” His flat gaze turned harder. “Atris said she’d help Dustil if I stopped you from going to Kaas.”

“But Davad’s dead.” Of course, so was Malak. Thinking of that made Revan remember her dream again. _He said Korrie’s safe, but why would he tell me that—if it was him at all—_

She stared at the body, remembering a horror–vid Polla Organa had seen once where the Jedi detective had mind–probed corpses to solve their murders. It probably wasn’t possible to do that truly, but—“Incoming transmission,” Leskal interrupted, alert in his new position on this interior bridge. The Mandalorians had taken up nav, comm and defensive stations without Revan giving any orders. The commander’s chair on this deck—identical to the one twenty–eight levels above their heads—seemed to mock her, with the dead woman sprawled in front of it.

_My old master, Vima Sunrider_. Her head was a ruin. Revan looked away.
“Put the call on the main board.” Her eyes went to a spot in the wall again, slightly dented, and for a moment, she almost saw a red-armored hull of a man pinned against it: half-rotted mouth open in a scream as her fingers flexed invisible bands around his throat—

Revan realized she'd sat down in the command chair when her fingers reached for the headset array on the hand-rest.

“Revan,” a voice purred from the speaker. Female, but overlain with a sibilance that startled her until the image came upon her screen. “Apologies for the long-range comm, but your minions’ antics have quite disrupted my ceremony. I had such plans!”

“Him again,” Canderous muttered. “Emperor called before. Was gonna tell you about that, too—”

“Oh?” Revan didn’t bother to look at him. “Were you waiting until he had a chance to disable our hyperdrive?”

The Selkath chuckled. She was female, and she was holding something in her hands. Tenebrae’s hands, of course.

Revan’s heart stopped when she realized what.

A holopicture of Malachor, smiling between a man and a woman, both with Deralian topknots.

It took Revan another stuttered heartbeat to place them.

Xxx

“Bendowen’s our… is it third or fourth cousin? Jasp?”

“Your second cousin,” Polla’s father called back from the sitting room. “Think he's a fifth twice removed, on my da’s side.”

“His wife Ooka Organa’s no relation,” Molla shrugged. “Far as we know—”

Xxx

Korrie was taller than the last time she'd seen him. The image had to be recent.

“Is that supposed to be a threat?” She was surprised at how even her voice came out. “He's gotten taller.”

“Oh, ho! No! I meant it as a reminder. But things have… escalated between us since, haven't they? I've lost so many bodies to your followers’ predation. You will have words with the survivors, Revan, when we meet on Kaas—” a dark chuckle then. “Oh, I cannot wait for you to see what your carelessness has done to the place!”

“Stay away from my son!”

“As your pets stayed away from mine?” The voice was mocking. “Loss can be an exquisite sensation. One even develops a taste for it after a few centuries. I cannot wait to share—”

Breathe, Revan reminded herself. The Force felt like black water, dragging her soul down with it. Revan’s thoughts ran, disjointed and wild. “I cannot wait to see you in person,” she countered, surprised at how even her voice sounded. “Will you bring my minions to the spaceport to greet us?”
“Hah,” he chuckled. “The spaceport—? The Kaas City Spaceport? I will not. But do let me know when you find it.”

Xxx

Mostly, Mission left her remote links to the Ebon Hawk dead. That kept any losers from tracking her signal (like those two used–to–be–hers in meat suits). On this planet, it also kept Kaas’s greasy virtual talons off their ship.

But when she saw the cloud of smoke rising from the ‘port, she had to act. Carth and Big Z loved that ship, and Mission—the real one—had too, once upon a time.

So she switched over fast, with only time for a few beeps to Big Z to tell him to carry her chassis out of danger, before she was stretching herself out through what remained of Kaas’s signals (no time to worry about corruption now) to the guts of the Corellian disc ship.

Doing so was like awakening into hell. Fire licked across her frame, and all of her sensors flashed red. Ruins of other ships around Mission burned, and laser bolts rained down from the sky.

The Ebon Hawk appeared to be the only intact vessel in its blasted–into bay.

That's lucky, Mission thought to herself, as she shifted her thrusters on, preparing for a fast run into atmo and the black. On any other world, someone might’ve impounded her, or slapped a port lock on, but maybe the Emperor was lazy, or they’d never expected Polla Revan or Carth or anybody to escape.

I don't know where to go, Mission thought forlornly, wishing there'd been a way to scoop up Big Z at least, but that would only draw attention and the bulk of the crazy ships above her had already passed overhead, going in that direction.

It was lucky the bombers had missed her, so far. Mission hoped that luck continued to hold.

It wasn't until she'd lifted up a hundred meters and seen the smoking ruin of the Kaas City Spaceport—and the blasted plain of glass that had once been Kaas City—that Mission realized it hadn't been—couldn't have been—luck at all.

<<Sister>> one of the wedge–ships whispered through her consciousness, as four of them detached from the flotilla ahead and circled back toward her. <<Careful, little sister. Keep your wings out of the flames.>>

Xxx

Dustil blinked at his reflection in the narrow mirror, holding the towel around his waist with the Force. Ship this big, they should have their own fresher, but Mekk had taken him to some dinky cell of a room with a holo of Mekk’s own face taped on the wall, and a stack of books about genetics and xeno–engineering.

The dark lines ran all the way down Dustil’s chest now. That was new. Mekk had been practically in awe—almost groveling, his pulse racing in a way that Dustil couldn't tell was passion, or fear, or both.

That was… that was a little weird. Yeah Mekel had always been a coward but—

When did he get into genetics and engineering?
“Hey.” Mekk had followed him down the hall, not bothering with a towel himself. “Some kinda alarm just went off.” He yawned, scratching his pits, and stretched. “Feel anything weird in the Force?”

“I think Revan woke up.” That hard, clear light. The frozen scream. That was her. But there was a calm to it too, which made Dustil relax a little, because whatever had pissed off the former ruler of the Sith had faded again. And that had to mean his dad was… was okay. He yawned. They’d been in bed, but there hadn’t been much sleep. “Hey, when did you get into engineering?”

Mekk looked like he was trying to make that into a dirty joke. “Huh?”

“Those books,” Dustil told him, before he had to hear the bad pun. “You used to like history. Didn’t know you had the head for hard stuff.”

That earned him a smirk. “Yeah, well about—”

“Come here.” Dustil pulled him over to the wall and lost his own towel, both of them scrambling to beat the other to getting use from those words. Ended up with them in a tangled mess on the floor, which was where Dustil asked again.

“Can't see you as a scientist, Mekk.”

“What?”

“The books.”

“Oh. Those books are Milli’s,” Mekk said, lifting his head up with a distracted frown.

“Milli’s one who died?” Was a little mean, but Dustil was a fracking Sith, right? “You guys must’ve spent a lot of time together, if she’s staying in your room.”

“She might not be dead. Her father doesn't think she's dead.” Mekel sat up abruptly. “It's her room,” he added. “I have a bunk in the dorms. Couldn't take you there.”

“Oh. Well, that—” The picture, Dustil realized. Of course. Mekel hadn't put it up on the bunk ceiling. Milli had. Like a schoolgirl with a fracking crush.

It made him feel bad for being glad that she was (probably) dead.

“I bagged the Blais sisters,” he told Mekel. “Inse and Mydia Blais. Sith princesses. Tits out to here.”

“Oh?” His friend’s voice was more curious than anything else. “At the same time?”

“No! They're _sisters_!”

Mekel’s low chuckle showed Dustil he'd just been jerking his chain. “Good for you.”

“Yeah, I...” His voice trailed off, but his thoughts were caught, as Selene used to say, in a bad loop. Mekk might not care, and Inse might be negotiable, (if she hadn't just taken off with that ship, she'd seemed a little pissed). But Mydia… girl had a possessive streak. Servants said she'd killed her favorite gardener for sleeping with his own wife.
And Mekk would be vulnerable on Kaas, without the Force.

“Maybe you should stay up here,” Dustil started. “When we get to Kaas.”

Mekel rolled off him. Maybe the knee to the choobs was accidental. “Yeah? Okay. If that’s how you want it, Lord Malak.”

“Hah, hah.” Dustil started, but Mekel was half in the fresher stall now, roar of a sonic spray cutting out half his words. “Asshole,” he muttered to himself, watching the outline of the chivhole as he showered. When they’d had the bond he’d have felt every blast like it was on his own skin. Now, the other man might as well have been on Dagobah.

“—son of a whore?” Suddenly, Mekk leaned out, brows knit in a stubborn challenge.

“What?” Dustil stood up too.

“I said,” Mekel snapped. “Is it that I'm the son of a Coruscanti whore, or is it because I'm a fracking null that you don't think I'm good enough to escort Lord Fracking Malak with his Frack Sisters?”

There was real anger in his voice that made Dustil drop the act. “I don't want them to kill you. If they knew what you meant they might use it—”

“What I meant?” Mekk didn't look like he got it. “You think I can't handle myself, Telos? I took on Oerin Fracking Lin when he was dead! Not to mention, my cousin’s the Dark Lord of the—”

“I can't lose you,” Dustil broke in, leaning forward so they were eye to eye. The sonic spray stung his eyes, and his voice cracked. “Seriously, Mekk. I can't lose you again.”

“Oh.” His lover’s eyes were as dark and clear as Dustil’s were yellow. He could see both of them in the frosted–over mirror on the wall. Mekel’s hand closed over Dustil’s arm.

An alarm went off someplace far away. Someplace far away, Revan was awake and pissed off about something. Maybe she and Dad had a fight. None of that mattered to Dustil right now.

“Coming out of hyperspace soon,” Mekk noted. “You ready?”

Dustil smiled. “For anything.”

That would turn out, he thought later, to be a lie. He hadn't been ready at all.

Xxx

It was that taste that told Kore D’Reev everything, even before he went into Bendowen and Ooka’s room and saw them still asleep, so pale and still it looked like they might not wake up.

Don’t cry, he reminded himself, and went to the gun safe under their bed. He’d been shown where it was and warned he didn't have the combination to open it, but nobody had warned these people against Kore (or some stupid pesticide guy), because the Force took care of locks as easy as opening a door.

Kore took two silvery blaster pistols, holding one in his off hand and hiding the other one in his pocket.

The Organas just looked like they were sleeping, but they might not wake up.
When Kore went downstairs, the man in black was frying baca, and had set the table for two already, like he knew no one else would be getting breakfast that day. (Or any day.)

“Eggs?” The man beamed and turned around again, turning back to the pan. “You'd better sit down, kid. I have some bad news.”

“I saw.” Kore edged closer to the counter where Ooka kept her knives.

“You already checked?” The man turned back to him. “Rough luck for them, huh?”

“It wasn't luck. You poisoned them.” Kore brought up the gun in his right hand, centering it really careful because he was better with his left. His left hand hovered close enough to his jacket pocket to grab the blaster there, if the assassin (for what else could he be?), made any funny moves.

“Not me, kid, I would've just shot them. But Old Stinky needed something slow–acting to knock you all out—something that he could fix later. You’ll need another dose of the antidote.” The man gestured to the table, which was answer enough. In front of Kore’s platemat a blue vial waited, contained in an old–fashioned needler. “Gave you one when you were asleep, but another’s recommended to cut down on the side effects.”

“It was isaflexin on us. On the masks.” Kore knew because of the taste in his mouth now. He'd been dumb not to guess sooner. “I don't need more antidote. I'm immune to isaflexin tox. Grandfather had me acclimated when I was five.”

The black man’s eyebrows shot up. “You know your poisons.”

“I'm an Eg. Of course I do.”

“Well, I told you already—I didn’t do this.” His head tilted. “Take another cure anyway. I'm supposed to keep you alive. Rather not have you puking up on my speeder.”

“Bendowen and Ooka weren't gonna kill me!”

“They couldn't protect you, neither. We need to get gone before that ratscum’s friends come lookin for us.” The man paused. “After you eat your breakfast and take the shot. And I gotta finish clean–up too.”

His hands, Kore noted, were dirty, like he'd been playing in the mud. Or digging a hole, Kore thought. Because that's what they do on dirt planets with bodies. They put them in holes. But he just put the guy who was gonna kill us in a hole, not Bendowen and Ooka—

“You’re gonna give them the antidote too, right?” Kore asked. He hadn’t checked, but he thought they were both still alive. The Force around them still buzzed, just a little.

“Sure.” The man gave him a smile that wasn’t. “I’ll get to that next.”

“Why didn't you just give it to them already?” Kore pretended like he thought the man was really planning on it because maybe that way he would. “I order you to give it to them already!”

“Soon as I finish the eggs.” The man smiled. “But… you know what, if they're alive, guy’s friends can question them. You figure that out?”

“I figured he’s bad and you’re bad,” Kore told him.

“His boss is gonna send more Red–Eyes,” the man said. “This way, with a little luck, they’ll think you’re dead and stop looking.”

Wouldn't Father have warned Kore if this was danger? Of course, he'd barely seen Father in ages—and the few times he had, Father seemed all stretched out and thin, like he was mostly someplace else. Maybe Father was still stuck in Dustil Onasi and that was why. His warnings now were more feelings than words and right now—

Right now, Father was quiet. He was quiet most of the time lately. More feelings than anything else, and sometimes Kore thought it was all in his own head.

“The shot,” the man nodded at it. “I’ll explain the rest as we go.”

“No!” Kore shook his head. “Give them the antidote first!” He didn't like Bendowen and Ooka very much, but they'd been okay.

The drawer where Ooka kept the knives was free. Kore edged over closer to it until the man caught his arm and stabbed him with the needler. Kore could move fast when he wanted to, but the man had moved just as fast. Maybe even faster.

“You asshole!” Kore yelled, before the man stabbed him again with something else.

“Kids,” the man said with disgust. “Never listen. It's for your own good. Should’ve had breakfast. We've got a long haul ahead, and I'm not stopping for lunch.”

_Trank_? Kore's mind had time to think before everything went black.

Xxx

“I'd do it again,” Carth said stubbornly.

“Careful, you look like you’re about to tip over in there.” Revan’s words felt dry and tight as the anger inside her.

The cell’s floor slanted slightly and her husband teetered on his feet. There were four cells in the room. Revan wondered if Carth was now in the one that had recently held Vima Sunrider.

There was no way to tell, and there was no one to ask. She’d ordered the kids who had been ‘watching’ Jana Novasun sent to the barracks brig five levels down and portside. They’d gone without protest. Everyone had obeyed all her commands without protest.

Revan wasn’t entirely sure if it was because they were all frightened of her, or if she was right.

If there hadn’t been six millimeters of near–lethally–charged security shielding between them, Revan might have taken Carth’s arm when he stumbled. As it was, she sent the Force out instinctively, only to feel it spark against the cage’s shields. She could penetrate them easily enough, perhaps, but that would short out the barrier.

“Let me out,” her husband pleaded. “I know that planet, Freckles. You don’t. You can’t go into this blind.”

“That is no longer your concern.” The Force almost crackled at her fingertips, and again, Revan had the sense she’d been in this room before, that these cells had once held others—

These cells were made for Force users, the voice inside whispered. Force users can withstand those energy fields. But nulls—if he touches that field.…
Instinct, more than thought, had her reaching for a control to dial down the strength of the shields, aware that Carth’s eyes hadn’t left her the entire time. Minimal power levels should still be enough to contain him now that he was unarmed.

“Sit down,” she commanded him. “This isn’t a torture cage. I don’t want you to hurt yourself.”

That cell made an effective torture cage, the voice whispered. On many occasions.

Carth blinked at her and nodded slowly. He sat down as stiffly as an old man. Whatever stims the medix had given him before had worn off now. “I’d do it again,” he declared stubbornly.

His belt felt loose around Revan's waist and the embroidery on it was stiff. It probably meant something that she was wearing the blaster he’d used to kill Vima Sunrider. She fiddled with its fasteners instead of looking him in the eye.

“All the times I imagined our reunion,” Carth coughed. “Never thought it'd go like this.”

“I need you tell me everything Vima said to Atris.” Revan walked closer and put a hand out, pressing it into the blue, feeling the Force ripple around her, as the field sparked against her hand.

“Was more focused on the job that scow was doing on the cooling rods.” Carth wrapped his hands around his knees, looking up at her. “Revan, you have to listen to me. Dustil… h—he might not understand why I’m in here—”

“I need you tell me everything,” she repeated. “If your son has a problem with that, I have a cell for him too.”

“But he—”

“He’s no Malak.” Her voice felt dead. “And I killed Malak. If I need to shove Darth Sulksalot into the brig next to yours, I will.”

In the cell next to Carth’s, Aemelie was a curled–up ball wrapped in a loose robe, doing an excellent job of pretending to be asleep. Whatever Canderous had whispered in her ear before he turned the brig’s power cells on had cowed—or at least—silenced her.

Thank the Force for small mercies.

Carth exhaled sharply. It turned into another coughing fit as Revan waited. “I was focused on the rods,” he repeated when he caught his breath again. “Trying to count the hyperdrive ticks. Figure out how much time we had left. If I could stop it. When I slipped in, Vima was saying something about Sheris and the Empire being destabilized. She said that Davad Arkan was too strong… and you were just as bad. She said you can’t go to Kaas.”

“Oh, I’m going to Kaas,” she muttered. “Wild hessi in a hunting pack couldn’t stop me now.”

“I know. But Korrie.” Carth took another breath. He was still too pale, washed to almost gray behind the cell’s blue light. “Tenebrae has Korrie—”

Revan shook her head with more resolution than she felt, a bubble of dark hysteria forming on her lips. No. My son is safe. I dreamed it. Malak told me in a dream. “He doesn’t. Korrie’s safe. It’s all a bunch of fricking tricks. Tenny–Bro’s probably laughing at us right now—”

“I know that. You told me.” Revan was going to call him that when she ended him. Somehow.

The ship lurched and then rolled. On a ship this large they shouldn’t feel anything, but Revan’s gut heaved, and then—

“Out of hyperspace,” Carth sighed. “Whatever happens next, you need to know I underst—”

A proximity alarm pealed.

A millisecond later, it was the quietest sound in Revan’s head.

A voice shattered and broke a thousand times. Revan’s vision splintered, and her ears rang. The world slipped out of focus, smashing into stars. They were on a blasted plain. They were choking in a ruined city. Drowning in a burning sea. Carth’s face loomed in front of her, bathed in flickering blue light, but she couldn’t hear him because something was too loud—someone was screaming too loudly——and then all she could hear was a weak wail, almost a whimper. A cracked sound, like a voice in a torture cell, breaking over and over again.

“Revan!” Carth was standing up now, looming above. His hands tried to punch through the fields to get to her. “Revan! Hey! Guards! Can anyone hear me? We need some help in here!”

The ceiling loomed above her. The durasteel was cold under Revan’s back. Her limbs jerked. She tasted blood where she'd bitten her tongue.

“It’s just the prox alarm,” Aemelie’s words cut through at a higher pitch. “Is she having some kind of fit, First Husband? We’re not even in real battle yet.”

XXX

The Aleema came out of hyperspace above Dromund Kaas…

...and immediately, there was chaos.
Chapter 68/ Hard Rain

XXX

“Mai,” Dxun said, tugging at Gwenarius’s sleeve. Oerina was still asleep, but Aemelie’s son woke with the dawn. From the look of his feet, the babe had toddled outside in the rich Dxun mud and was now tracking it all over the first carpet Canderous had woven for their marriage tent, happily cooing to himself. “Trac’yin,” he lisped.

“Tracyn,” she corrected. “Did Hisha forget to put out the coals?” She would have to have a talk with that one, even if the girl was part of Clan Zal and not her responsibility. Hisha had been raised in stars and found it difficult to remember tasks required in the midst of a jungle, like banking the coals in the fire pits before sleep, maintaining the perimeter alarms, not leaving her undergarments out to dry where they could be eaten by cannock.

“I knew she would forget to dampen the fire! Well, Hisha will learn, little warrior.” She smiled at the boy fondly. “And I think you have earned the first bath of the day.”

“Tracyn,” Aemelie’s son was losing his milk teeth. How she wished Oerina would follow suit. “Up.”

“I will pick you up in a moment, uj’ika. First, let me put on my outerrobe—”

“Gwen!” The sheer panic in Xarga’s voice had Gwenarius reaching for Dxun even before the boy from Clan Ordo burst through the tent’s door. The babe dodged her grip, giggling. “The sky! It’s on fire!”

“Tracyn,” lisped Dxun, from behind his sister’s crate. “Pretty.”

“Stay,” she commanded, forgoing gentleness. She grabbed Dxun’s arm and swung him up; dumping him in the sleeping crate on top of Oerina. Her daughter gave a startled wail, but Gwenarius was already halfway out of the tent.

This time of year, Onderon and its moon were not yet close enough to share an atmosphere, but the curve of the planet’s dappled surface still encompassed most of the sky.

Tracyn, Gwenarius thought grimly. Up.

The sky was burning.

XXX

Trista Jar: “Now, for the next segment of our broadcast I’d like to introduce our viewers to Kol DX–9, a Quarren student from Nar Shaddaa’s Black Sun College for Gentlebeings of Merit. What are we seeing here, Kol DX–9?”
Kol DX–9: “I already told you.”

Trista Jar: “Just tell our viewers again. Now, you at home keep in mind, this is new footage. Taken only a few hours past. What are we going to be seeing, Kol?”

Kol: “Well, uh… It appears to be some kind of uprising in the Outer Reaches. My satellites picked up the broadcast signal transmitting from Kaas City. I collect Sith executions, but this isn’t a normal one—”

Trista Jar: “Wait! You… collect Sith executions?”

Kol: “Just vids of them! When I was a kid my dad’s got me a wideband scanner and I get these Imperial transmissions? When I saw this one, I knew I had to call somebody. I mean look!”

Trista Jar: “Now you all can see what made me pick my jaw up off the floor, so to speak, hah hah. That looks like… Revan Starfire? And which planet is this again?”

Kol: “A world called Dromund Kaas. It’s in Sith sp—”

Trista Jar: “I’m getting an alert that the name and location of the planet is highly classified. But, in fact, we do have confirmation from High Admiral Rensha and the Republic Fleet. That is Revan Starfire and she appears to be… what is she doing?”

Kol: “Looks like she’s standing between that group of sents and an angry mob. Whoa! Look at all those Wookiees!”

Trista Jar: “I had no idea Wookiees lived on Sith planets.”

Kol: “They use them as slave labor, I think. I have this one vid, where they’re pulling these red–skinned, bumpy guys around in carriages—”

Trista Jar: “That’s disgusting!”

Kol: “Well, lots of sentients have red skin. Zeltrons. Some Zabrak. I knew a pink Twi’lek girl, once… but uh, that’s a long story. Look, see we’re getting to the good bit now. See? There’s Revan leading the charge—over to where they blew up all of those guards?”

Trista Jar: “Not what I meant, but—oh! Feeds a bit spotty there—for a second I thought I saw two Revans. That woman in white—”

Kol: “Revan is wearing white. See? She's next to the purple Twi’lek.”

Trista Jar: “Wasn’t very clear with that crowd blocking them, but for a sec I thought she was the purple Twi’lek.”

Kol: “Nope. See there she is pointing at the sky?”

Trista Jar: “She seems excited about something. Wait! They're moving! Are they… it rather looks like they're running away. Are you sure that's not some actress?”

Kol: “This is where it gets nuts, man. I mean, I've seen a lot of Sith stuff—executions, weird floor shows, birthday parties... but this is crazyspace.”

Trista Jar: “Wait, what happened to the lights?”

Kol: “It’s the middle of the afternoon there, right? And it goes dark and then—”

Trista Jar: “That was an explosion! It appears to be aerial bombardment! What? Are those ships?”

Kol: “Nuts! I know! Going so fast?”

Trista Jar: “And then the vid stops.”

Kol: “Yeah but the really kriffed thing is the links all go dead. Not just there, but the widebeam stuff from other Sith worlds too. There's three main ones: Thule, Ziosk and Dromund Kaas and they all go quiet at once. Like someone—or some thing knocked out their access to everything.”

Trista Jar: “And how long ago was this?”

Kol: “Uh... an hour, maybe?”

Trista Jar: “An hour on Nar Shaddaa is three on Coruscant. Not just a saying, viewers. So three hours ago, Kol, here, witnessed Revan Starfire launch some kind of incursion in Sith space. What does this mean? And what about the Wookiees? Kol? Do you have anything to add?”

Kol: “I wanted to say hi to Jakio and U’laff if they’re listening. Guys, I told you it was huge, right? And my dad, of course, who got me into this hobby in the first place! Dad, I love y—”

[Feed cuts out.]

[Silence. The holofeed signal transmits nothing but static.]

Trista Jar: “We seem to be having some trouble with the wideband from Hutt space, but I’m sure it’s temporary. Sunspots? Meanwhile, viewers, ponder the implications. Is Revan Starfire secretly working with the Republic Fleet to take down our Sith enemies? My station has been trying to get a statement from the Fleet brass or the Senate, but you know how secretive High Admiral Old Scaly Rensha can be!”

[Takes breath.]

Trista Jar: “I don’t suppose we’ll ever get a conclusive report about this... any more than we will ever learn what actually happened on Katarr—

[Raises one finger.]

Trista Jar: “Or Biscain—

[Raises second finger.]
Trista Jar: Or receive an official statement regarding the D’Reev Purge—

[Continues counting on fingers, listing off each point.]

Trista Jar: “Or what happened to those possessed sents (including my predecessor, poor Jokka Rai) who executed themselves on our live broadcast nearly a week ago—”

Trista Jar: “Or why their eyes were glowing red—

Trista Jar: “Or what really caused the Jedi Plague—

Trista Jar: “Or what became of the Jedi Council—”

[Holds up one talon.]

Trista Jar: “Oh! Hang on! I’m getting reports in—”

[Long pause, as the expression on the announcer’s face shifts from neutral to horrified.]

Trista Jar: “Friends, it appears that the Outer Rim planets of Onderon, Hoth, and Nar Shaddaa are also under attack. This is coming from the Senate’s official Office of Communications, who have a hotline to Fleet, so that’s confirmed. Officially. In each case, a fleet of unknown ships appeared and immediately began atmospheric launches of unknown ordinance. They’re saying we haven’t seen attacks on this scale since the Sith and Mandalorian Wars… and if Revan Starfire is involved....”

[Shakes head.]

Trista Jar: “I—I don’t have to tell you what that means. All sentients on Rim planets have been advised to take all precautions and to be prepared to seek shelter at the first sign of atmospheric invasion.”

Trista Jar: “I wish I could say this is unprecedented, but as the survivors of Telos and Taris can attest, we have been here before—”

XXX

{{Awaken}}

A voice shattered and broke a thousand times.

Revan’s vision splintered, and her ears rang. The world slipped out of focus, smashing into stars. She— they— were on a blasted plain. They were choking in a ruined city. Drowning in a burning sea. Skimming low above an ancient, walled city, with explosions blossoming beneath their wings like a deadly garden—

Carth loomed above her, bathed in flickering blue light, but she couldn’t hear him because something was too loud— someone was screaming too loudly—

—and then all she could hear was a weak wail, almost a whimper. A cracked sound, like a voice in a torture cell, breaking over and over again.

The ceiling loomed above her. The durasteel was cold under Revan’s back. Her limbs jerked. She tasted blood where she'd bitten her tongue.

{{Planetary defenses are online. Disabling}}

The sparks were old, and cold, and whispering. Voices crinkled like dead leaves in her ears, overlapping speech into a cacophony. The world was faceted, fragmented, as Revan’s vision split into a dozen different perspectives. She heard Carth calling her name, but suddenly she was a planetfall away, too far to answer. Suddenly, she was——chasing a flock of fleeing meat–bodies, low towards the planet’s curve, as her guns primed for another run.

{{Analysis: Dromund Kaas, 9983, 134887 w. 9 sentients in wooden structure. Eliminate: Y/N? Y}}

Yes, her mind whispered, caught in the play of light and shade. The targets cowered below, so slow and clumsy and scattered. It took too many missiles to bring down too few.

{{Target locked. Missile launched. Find: Next. Param: >4 sentient life forms}}

The command was simple, like a switch: on or off. Light or dark—

{{Target locked. Missile launched. Find: Next. Param: >4 sentient life forms}}

{{Increase parameters. >20 sentient life forms}}

Their natural tendency was to cluster. It would be more efficient to target greater numbers.

Suddenly, she was —strafing a group of screaming organics. They fell in clumps, lights winking out.

{{Extermination successful. Continue sequence? Y/N. Y}}

Yes. Like a switch reset. And then she was——launching a nest of small flyers from her sides as her main cannon targeted the glittering spires of a world below—

{{Analysis: Nar Shaddaa, north quadrant, 30, 122229 n. Scanning: Duracrete structures contain 7,576 organics. Eliminate Y/N. Y. Target locked}}

Here it was easier. They huddled vertically in poorly built habitations. Thousands per square kilometer.

{{Missile launched}}

Yes. And then she was——boiling an ocean with the net of her electro–rays, as the beach beside it had already been transformed into a plain of shimmering glass.

{{Analysis: Ziost, 30 degrees north of the equator. WARNING: STOP Bombardment at equatorial line.}}

{{No organic life in the northern hemisphere. SUCCESS. Next Target: Telos. Target: Scouted. Proceed to hyperspace: Y/N? Y}}

Telos?

Yes.

Wait.

No.

“No.” Revan felt her lips move, even as she felt another tower on Nar Shaddaa burn. Little lights winking out. She was—

{{—proceed to hyperspace? Target: Telos. Scouting in progress. Proceed to hyperspace. Y/N.}}

“No!” Her eyes tried to open, but they were already open, the multitude of them—synthetic sensor–eyes set along the hulls and bows of the Awakened Fleet. Thousands, perhaps—stretched thin across the galaxy’s fabric, hovering above the defective worlds, the examples—

The warnings.

{{Threat initiated. Comprehension, Starfire Unit. Y/N?}}

“No!”

And then she was—

—flying in the skies above Dromund Kaas, escorting the juvenile ship–sense, coaxing it home.

[[“ No way am I going in your hangar bay, sleemo! What the frack did you do to my hyperdrive? Give it back! And stop bombing the kriffin’ planet, already! I have friends down there! ”]]

“No!” That voice sounded like Mission. But that was impossible. All of this was impossible—

{{Warning. Further degrade of organic matrix will result in system instability. Physical processing capacity exceeded at this time. Neural repair initiated}}

Pain ripped through her head then and all Revan saw was stars.

XXX

Their second wedding ceremony had gone well, Azen Loanin thought.

His senator father would have been utterly scandalized to see his son kitted out in barbaric furs with Zabrak indentations painted on his human skin—kneeling before some primitive altar while his pregnant wife knelt beside him, her show of “pearls” already visible in the thin gown that barely concealed her belly.
Pregnancy became Lydie Loanin—so much that sometimes she took his breath away. That beauty was a comforting reminder, in the moments when Azen remembered just whose son she would bear. Another comfort was that the antibodies in her blood from her first child might make it possible for her to have another.

Another, who would be a part of both of them.

_Not that blood matters_, he reminded himself. Again.

Azen himself was the son of two clones whose progenitors would have been too close in familial proximity to be approved, had their records not been altered over a half-century ago. His Force sensitivity had been a surprise throwback in a line of Loanins who had prided themselves on a reliance upon facts over mysticism. _If_ Lydie could manage to bear his natural child they would still have to screen for a host of unfortunate recessives due to the errors of his genetic legacy—and so how could he begrudge this child for being free of that risk?

Say what you like about Jin. Loanin (in the privacy of his own mind) had said plenty—but the man did his best to scatter his genetic material far and wide. And, from the research Loanin had done into the family (unsavory, but necessary), outbreeding was somewhat of a Jin trait.

“`I do,`” Lydie murmured to the priestess. Her elbow nudged his slightly, bringing Azen abruptly back to the present.

“Oh. Yes,” Azen nodded. “I do as well.” The indentations drawn on his skin itched. The bukk calf chained to the altar had evacuated its bowels, adding to the miasma already in the air. One of the (many) children too young for such a formal gathering giggled, whispering and pointing at him.

The rest of the ceremony was a fascinating display for a xenosociologist, and Azen muddled through it as he’d been coached: binding their palms together with silken cords, standing forehead to forehead with dear Lydie while her family marched around them in a circle, enduring the gentle ribbing in which her siblings compared his private parts unfavorably to the bukk calf’s…and finally making it to the glorious moment when he stumbled through their nuptial doorway with Lydie in his arms (Zabrak bones were surprisingly heavy) and deposited her gently onto their marriage mat.

His wife now twice over smiled up at him. “Tomorrow, you need to give the bukk calf back to Aure. The gift was only ceremonial.”

“I don’t mind the idea of becoming a nerf herder,” he joked. “I used to ride thranta on my family’s Alderaan estate. I had a rapport with them. It can’t be so different, herding from a sky–speeder.”

“Sky speeders take fuel.” She raised an eyebrow. “Too expensive here. Most of the ranchers use dewbacks, or bantha to herd the bukks. And they’re not the same as nerfs. Nerfs are too delicate for the Iridonian climate. They’d never survive a winter dust–storm.”

“We could open a clinic.” He hadn’t been serious about farming, although the prospect of remaining here had appeal. The child—their child—had to be born somewhere, and this refuge was safer than most, thanks to his efforts.

“I thought we were going to meet Devn and Aishie on Hoth?” Lydie’s head tilted. “In her last comm, Aishie said they’d collected six padawans in addition to the twelve on the ship. Practically an enclave.”

“The cluster of Jedi on Ithor was practically an enclave too. And then they went dark,” Azen reminded her. “Just like Hapes IV and Eriadu. The SIS reports to the Senate that Mical sent us mentioned the structures on Hapes seemed hastily abandoned, with signs of a struggle.”

“But no bodies,” Lydie pointed out. “And we would know, surely, if….”

If they were dead? Perhaps. But there are worse things than dead, my wife. Worse things we’ve both seen. It isn’t the plague killing the Jedi.

Worse had been the panicked comm–blast sent directly to Azen from Thyferra by Knight Joost’atok, but Azen had not shared that with Lydie.

Master Vargas took the padawans to town for supplies, the woman’s missive had read. 2 weeks ago. Haven’t heard since, but I think someone’s following me & Ulla’s having nightmares about masked Humans—more details inc—

There had never been more, leaving Azen too much time to speculate. Thyferra was barely habitable. Outside the main hyperlanes, it should have been a refuge, but if it was not….

“It may not be safe for Jedi to gather at all,” Azen confessed. “Remember, there were two Sith Lords on Katarr—not just Nihilus. Darth Sion was witnessed to have killed twenty Jedi in a matter of minutes, including most of the Council. His whereabouts are still unknown.”

Most of the Jedi were blissfully unaware of the true danger. But Azen’s former padawan Mical Jorde had SIS contacts, and was currently working with Master Atris. Indeed, Mical’s confidence did much to assuage Azen’s concerns about the woman. Mical had explained why she had abruptly sided with the Fleet—to the detriment of the Jedi left on Katarr.

There had been no way to save the Jedi Council on Katarr. Not from their own folly. Azen had seen that for himself.

And it seemed that now Atris had bravely set herself up as a lure: establishing a false Academy on Telos in the hopes that might draw out more of their enemies. So far, her actions had proved futile. Jedi continued to vanish. Sometimes Azen and Lydie felt them fall—dimly—in the Force. Other times, it was more like a cloud passing over the sun as if the Force itself grew smaller with each passing death.

Death or worse? After escaping the wreck of Katarr they both knew there were fates worse than death. Especially for Force users.

“Is that why you sent the others away? To keep us safe?” His wife reached out and touched his arm.

Lydie’s expression was calm and unsurprised when Azen nodded back. “Yes.”

The larger Jedi clusters had gone dark first. Azen felt oddly guilty that he had sent the padawans who had traveled with them to a Corellian colony moon called Chassna. He had given them vague instructions to avoid large gatherings and access to one of his family’s accounts.

Perhaps he should have done more. The thought haunted him late at night when sleep failed. But Azen and Lydie were the only Jedi on Iridonia, now. And he would do anything to keep her from harm.

His wife seemed to take a moment to compose herself. “Well. Perhaps there are better topics for our honeymoon…?” Lydie finally suggested. She gave him an obviously forced smile: one that made Azen evaluate again, as he did dozens of times every day, the odds of their union surviving their current travails.

I love you, Lydie Korr.

Azen thought the words at least a dozen times each day, even when his tongue stumbled. His love was pure, and it did not matter if hers held some mercenary calculation. It must not matter. In the end, Jin was dead or gone, and Azen had won the girl—not that she was a mere prize to be won—but she was his, now, and he hers. They were legally and spiritually bonded on two planets.

No black-eyed Force-blind son of a whore could ever take that from them.

Could she still hold affection—or more—for Mekel Jin? Could her vows of devotion to Azen be false? He had offered to release her from the vows they had made on Coruscant, even if divorce was unheard of in the Loanin family. He had offered her the means to raise another man’s child in another place without him.

It had been safe to offer those things, knowing full well that she would never accept.

XXX

“My mother wants to see us married,” she had said quietly, as if that mattered. “Here on Iridonia.” Those thick eyelashes fluttered and the lines around her horns wrinkled. “I can understand if you want me to leave after what I—what happened—”

“I never want you to leave.” Azen had suspected the affair for weeks and stayed silent. He had comforted himself with stories of Mandalorians, or the matriarchal Sand People of Tatooine, where a child’s blood was only marked in the maternal line; where a woman’s heart was her own, a gift to be blessed but never taken for granted. Azen had given her his own translation of “Poems for the Dune Sea Blood Tide,” a compilation of ancient works by the poetess J’kkia’la, lost for a thousand years (and by some thought to be a forgery). “I never want to leave you, but you are not a possession. You are my partner.” He took a deep breath. “If you want to go, will you tell me?”

“Of course.” She smiled that forced smile that told him nothing, and Azen warred again with the conflicting shadows of his heart: he wanted her free, and he wanted her his. The child she bore was theirs, its unformed mind already as familiar in the Force as the new color on her breasts, that dark line down her belly, the three of them asleep in the rapidly-shrinking bed; but would he feel the same if it looked like Jin? If it had the callow man’s smirk?

It was a boy; the scans had said.

XXX

It will be mine, he reminded himself, now. He will be mine. Mekel Jin isn’t fit to be a father. He is nothing.

“Azen…?” In the present, Lydie touched his arm lightly, so lightly that the touch sent shivers up his spine. “Is everything all right?”

“Perfect,” he told her because it was.

“Well, then.” Her cheeks flushed. “You know, the next part of this tradition requires that we put that bukk calf outside—”

A hesitant knock on the door made both of their heads turn.
“Sorry to interrupt,” Lydie’s mother’s voice carried through the plimfoam loudly, even in a mock-whisper. “There’s news on the wideband. Thought you’d want to see.”

“It’s fine.” Lydie pulled her robe together and stood up quickly, leaving Azen eye-level to her show of pearls. He scrambled to his feet as well, suddenly grateful for the six centimeters of height between them that set his gaze high above hers, so that she could not gauge his expression.

His wife motioned to the door and it slid open, revealing her shorter, rounder twin—the vision of the woman she would be if they had enough time—face a nest of indented wrinkles and careworn hands, the smile strained and shy—but still beautiful, he thought loyally. As his wife would be beautiful in her old age, too, someday.

“What is it, Ma?” Lydie smiled at her shadow.

“It’s… the vids… Something… something has happened.” As always, Azen thought that Nelle Korr seemed slightly awestruck in his presence. Her brow furrowed around her horns. “You know, the calf can be tied outside? I left a piece of ribbon and a lead next to the post.”

“We agreed to watch the dewback-riding finals with Attina and the children tomorrow.” Azen smiled as kindly as he could. “Didn’t Lydie tell you? Her sister’s recording it for us.”

“Dewback-riding?” Those blue eyes exactly like his wife’s widened and Nelle Korr shook her head, snorting. “Think I’d interrupt your lifenight for dewback-riding?” She snorted, eyeing him with an expression that didn’t seemed awed at all. “No. It’s Darth Revan. The holoreporter said she’s invading the galaxy. Again.”

XXX

Later, Dustil would remember that they’d just done it in the fresher and Mekk had been about to make a dirty joke, and that Dustil had been teasing him about running back to their—Millifar’s—room starkers; but when the shit hit hyperdrive it was like nightfall on Nar Hutta, that time they’d had the Korriban field trip.

One second there was light—and then the next—

“Funny,” Mekk said—right before when it was still daylight and everything was fine. His head was tilted back against the wall and his eyes were closed. There was a new scar on his stomach, from where that possessed schutta of Tenebrae’s had stabbed him in Coruscant, what felt like centuries ago.

“Funny?” They could use another sonic, but Dustil snapped his hand open and launched one of his boots into it, shimmying back into his pants at the same time. “If you think that was funny—”

“Not like a joke.” The Coruscanti yawned. “Meant, it’s funny, not to be able to tell what you’re thinking.”

Dustil smiled. “I’m thinking I’m starving. Is there food in this place?”

“Yeah,” Mekk raised an eyebrow. “Mandie field rations. Probably not up to what Lord Malak usually eats.”

“I wonder if my chef survived the battle,” Dustil yawned too. “He was really talented. Course, Inse might have killed him by now. She went through a lot of servants.”

“Tough luck for them.” Mekel stood up, reaching out a hand, and pulled Dustil up too, grunting a little at the effort. It made the muscles in his chest flex.

“You’ve been working out.” Dustil reached out and traced the line of the scar.

“Had to keep up with the Mando’ade.” Mekel took a step back and crossed his arms. “No Force—they could kick my ass with hand–to–hand until I started practicing.”

Dustil opened his mouth to make a joke and then closed it again because the expression on Mekel’s face was serious, almost moody. “You okay?”

“Yeah, just….” Mekel waved his hand. “It’s nothing. Like I said, funny not be able to tell what you’re thinking. You were in my head for a long time.”

“I just told you.” Dustil’s gut growled audibly, practically on cue. “I’m thinking I’m starving.”

“Not what I meant.” Mekel shrugged. “It was like… you could have been anyone.”

That was—that took a second for Dustil to process. “You think I could have been anyone? Guess you’d know since you fracked everyone.”

“Yeah? And?” Mekel shrugged again—careless like he didn’t care. “Guess we don’t all get Sith twins for our nameday present.”

“Twins?” Dustil didn’t get it. Without the bond, Mekk didn’t always make sense. If you didn’t know him like Dustil did, he might come off as an asshole.

“Inse and Mydia Blais? Ring any bells?”

“They’re not twins. Inse is older.” He tried to laugh. “You pissing about that? I don’t even like them.” Not like you like Lydie the Zabrák. Not like you and Millifar Ordo. She had your picture on her wall. Why would she do that if she didn’t like you? And I know how you felt about Lydie fracking Korr—used to hear about it all day and night whenever you saw horns or a rack that reminded you of her—

But Mekel couldn’t hear him. Those black eyes of his hardened, and then he scowled. “You got all of Lor—all of Malak’s power and all I got was almost dying.”

Again, Dustil tried to laugh it off. “Yeah, well, if you think the last few months have been fracking fun, I’d trade places with you in a secon—”

And then night fell. Just like on Nar Hutta. One minute, day. The next, the blackest of nights.

The scream ripped through the Force at the same time that the prox alerts chimed and the doors to the fresher popped open. Ship–wide alarm. All hands on deck. Priority one. Just like those Korriban drills.

Lights from the corridor flashed, painting Mekk’s goldish skin in shades of red and blue. The expression on his face made him look like a jacked mark.

“That’s the prox alert,” Dustil’s bondmate—his former bondmate said—but his words moved too slow, and his voice dimmed, hard to hear through the screams.

Suddenly their argument—if that was what it had been—was banthashit. The claxon ripping through the speakers sounded too fracking much like the airspace warnings had, that day on Telos long ago. The scream in the Force sounded worse, draining color from the world, making Dustil’s ears ring and his knees buckle.

That scream meant death. Darkness. Just like on Telos, when Malak had bombed it.

Dustil had been a kid, back then. Powerless. Pathetic. But he wasn’t a kid now. He wasn’t weak, now. He was dark too. He had power. “We have to find out what’s happening!” He heard his voice crack. Like a kid again. Helpless. But he wasn’t. He was better now.

Better. There was a strength in the dark. He drew on it because it kept him from toppling over.

Mekel was suddenly all business, that earlier fit of his gone. “I’m on weapons, okay? I gotta get to the bridge.”

“Wait.” Dustil was fine. He was strong, he was still standing, he just didn’t know how. “First we need to find out what happened.” Like he didn’t know what had just happened. Death, death, death. And her.

“It’s the prox alerts. Not a drill. I need to be at my station.” The Coruscanti was up and popping out the door while Dustil was still fumbling to buckle his pants, chasing after him.

Doors popped open on either side of them and Mandies streamed out. Some of them were just as starkers as Mekk was—or close. But most were armored up, ready for battle.

If Revan would stop yelling, maybe Dustil could fracking concentrate. Was she pissed they were being attacked?

Well, so was Dustil. For a second, he thought he’d give anything to be back on the Grave Bright, where nobody would dare stare at him and snicker, (like that black–haired Mandie kid was doing now), and where an ensign would be giving him a briefing while Inse offered advice. Where someone would have already bothered enough to tell him what the frack was going on.

Another Mandie kid no older than them ran past them in her underwear—still managing to look like she was staring at them, too.

“Better put on clothes, Mekk.” Dustil had brought his gear to the fresher. First rule of Korriban. Always be prepared. He was buckling his shirt now as they ran down the hall.

“What—?” The alarm drowned out the rest of Mekel’s words, overlain by that frackdamned scream. If he could hear her, Mekk wouldn’t be so frackdamned calm.

“Clothes,” Dustil managed. “Remember? Those things you put on in between fracking me, and Lyd, and Milli?”

“What?” If Mekel’s gob got any wider, Dustil could shove his whole fist down it. “Don’t talk about her like that! Milli might be dead.”

“Not sure that’d stop you—”

But Mekel hadn’t stuck around to hear that last bit. He’d put on a burst of speed that had Dustil chasing him down the hall. Thinking of another insult was good. It made him angry. Anger was power, anger like Malak had felt when Telos burned, not like a helpless little kid at all.

“Shit.” Mekel stopped abruptly, bare–assed at the viewscreen in the corridor.

Beneath their ship, the curve of Dromund Kaas was a muddy haze of smoke and red craters, partially obscured by the fleet of warships streaming toward its surface. Dustil’s head had a sick, hollow place inside as he felt lives on the planet winking out. He staggered back against the wall.

“I gotta go to the bridge,” Mekel repeated, blissfully oblivious to the death below. “I’m on the weapons board—”

“Put on some clothes first,” Dustil reminded him numbly. “I—I’m gonna… I gotta check on my dad.” Lightsaber was still on his belt, thank frack. Those ships were the same ones they’d seen before—shooting in the sky above Medriaas.

If Revan was the one doing this, she was gonna pay.

“Right.” Mekel headed toward their room. Millifar’s room. He glanced back once. “Well, uh, meet me on the bridge soon as you check, okay? I’m sure your dads is fine, Telos.”

Was that supposed to be comforting? If he’d been in Dustil’s head maybe, but out loud the words sounded stupid. The med–bay was close, and the Force–scream in Dustil’s head was distant. Father was in the med–bay. Father had to be safe. Maybe Revan was just upset those fracking ships weren’t waiting for the Aleema to help bomb this fracking planet.

“Sure you’re okay?” Mekel asked, hesitating at the door. Those lights made his skin look bruised, washed him out like a corpse. “I really gotta go, but—”

“Sure. Yeah. Just gotta check on my dad.” A neat trick, being able to talk and walk at the same time, the same time a planet was burning beneath you. Dustil wasn't sure how he was doing it, how he could do it, except it wasn't the first time.

Dustil looked out the window at the ships again, sleek and silvery and wrong. According to the Force, those ships were crewless, but some of them flanked the Aleema in synchronized formation, now half-obscuring the planet beneath. If they'd been firing on her, Dustil thought they'd all be spacedust by now, even with the dreadnaught’s heavy shields. But they weren't firing. More like… flocking. He'd seen mynocks act like that around power couplings. Or the ceega gulls back home.

“Gotta check on my dad,” Dustil repeated—but to the empty air. Mekk was already gone.

The scream in Dustil’s head had faded to a low simmer of agony by the time he reached the medbay.

The medix, Sinae, (who had been looking after Father before) looked up at him behind a sanitary mask. She was surrounded by a nest of medical droids. A pregnant woman lay on a gurney and there was blood on her head and between her legs. The readouts projected above were all flashing red. In the Force, the pregnant lady felt blank and black, like she was already gone. Just a little spark left, tethering her to the baby’s fading one.

“Get out!” the medix told Dustil. “You're not sterile.”

“Where’s my father?” Back on the Grave Bright, no one would have talked to him like she was talking now. If it hadn’t been for that baby who was probably dying, Dustil would have shown her how to show respect. The woman and the baby wouldn’t care. They wouldn’t be frightened. They were practically dead.

“In the holding cells.” The medix’s hand was gloved and coated with gore when she waved it at him. “I mean it! You can't be in here!”

“You're losing her.” Dustil had (officially) studied healing for about five minutes in his brief Jedi padawan career, but he’d had a knack for it. Master Whahtzhiz had always said so. On Korriban, Dustil had been known for skill in healing up a bruise, too. Healing a bruise easy. Just a little applied heat to a wound, a little increase in circulation, but this was bigger. A lot more of a catastrophe.

A part of him was fascinated by the way those two lives hung on, even as the darkness crept closer. He could see it. He could practically taste it. It didn’t taste bad, either. It made him angry, and that was making him strong. Hadn’t Malak lectured him about death and power? So many memories. So many fracking lectures trapped in Dustil’s head. The pompous gasbag had loved hearing himself talk.

“I will not lose her.” The woman glared at him. “Get out.”

“Just trying to help.” Dustil felt himself smile. If they’d been on his own ship with Inse, she wouldn’t have dared speak to him like that.

The medix was reaching for a sword strapped to her hip when Dustil decided to bug. Why is Father in the holding cells? A sick feeling overtook him, then. This might be about Father all along. That old woman was in the holding cells. That’s where they’d taken her.

Fracking old schutta! Shoulda fried her when I had the chance.

Dustil didn't stop for directions; he just ran, trusting the Force to get him there.

XXX

“Here, kitty, kitty…” Lady Inse Blais couldn't believe she had been reduced to this, coaxing the feral manka mascot of the Grave Bright out of hiding as a respite from boredom, but they had been in hyperspace for days. Perhaps as long as a week—the chronometers had lost count without a fixed destination to adjust to.

Jumping blind also meant they might be in hyperspace for the rest of their short, miserable lives. Inse had amused herself for the first day making those responsible for the calculation suffer. If they were trapped forever, she would do her best to make the remaining crew’s endings as slow and painful as possible too—if only to keep herself distracted.

It just wasn't fair. If she died in space would her ghost still return to Kaas to haunt her siblings and their descendants? Or would she, and all of her glorious potential, be lost forever?

Yellowy–green eyes glared at her from beneath one of the supply room’s carts. The manka hissed.

“Here, kitty, kitty!” The temptation to burn the thing to ash was irrational. Far better to pit its fortitude against some of her crew. Yamit the Bold, perhaps. Or that puffed–up sergeant–at–arms… what was his name?

The manka hissed again. The ship lurched abruptly—and the hyperspace engines shut off. Inse almost lost her footing, but fortunately, there was no one besides this brute animal to see.

The Force, usually a quiet and satisfying dirge within her soul, swelled to a crescendo. Nearly a scream—as if it held trillions of voices all at once—all in dissonant harmony—

“Well, we’ve arrived,” Inse told the cat. “Somewhere. Perhaps you're good luck after all.”

The manka pinned its ears back to its skull and yowled softly. It would be so easy to just make it love her, but Inse was tired of sycophants. That had been one of Lord Malak’s more attractive qualities—that his mind had been impenetrable and mostly immune to her persuasion.

“Lady…?” Commander Tycho had a tentative tone that grated as he hovered at the door, not even daring to knock. “Are you… are you well?”

“Report,” Inse snapped at him, waggling the hilt of her double-bladed saber at the recalcitrant cat. Mydia had had a nexu kit once that liked to bat at sticks before Nereal fed it to his Gormack slave. “Where are we?”

The manka hissed and bunched farther into its corner. Not taking the bait.

Smart kitty. Inse bared her own teeth back at it.

“I–I’m not sure. These coordinates… they don’t make any sense!” Her unflappable commander actually sounded panicked. “How can we be at zero, zero, zero?”

“We cannot. That’s—”

That was one of the few useful bits of knowledge imparted to Inse by their tutor, Seriina Starr, or Polla Wen, or whatever her name had been.

Zero, zero, zero coordinates weren’t just a blank space on the nav maps. That location marked the beating heart of the Republic. The most heavily populated world in the galaxy. And if somehow their unknown jump had brought them here… well, then, that—

That was incredible. That meant they'd miraculously discovered a new hyperspace route from Sith space to the Republic capital.

It was also hugely problematic, because, presumably, the Republic had planetary defenses… and while the Bright was nominally a Republic-looking ship, the Sith markings on its hull would probably be noticed immediately.

“We’re being hailed,” her terrified commander continued. “I–I don't know what to tell them—”

“Ah.” Inse straightened up and tapped her comm to see the report from the bridge.

“UNKNOWN VESSEL. YOU ARE TRESPASSING IN CORUSCATI SPACE. PLEASE PROCEED TO ORBITAL TEN–AYE, AND PREPARE TO BE BOARDED. ANY DEVIATION WILL BE SEEN AS AN ACT OF WAR—”

“Well? Do you want to act in a war, Tycho?” She gave him a sickly-sweet smile. “No? Then do as they say.”

Coruscant! Inse's mind was swimming with possibilities. As she closed her eyes, Inse could feel the eumenopolis quivering below them—trillions of sentients! So much life in the Force that it felt like a hill of klnhath babies overturned.

So much promise! All laid beneath her feet.

“Be polite when you tell them we surrender...” she added—and then concluded with instructions to her commander that would eliminate a great deal of unpleasantness. For her.

Tycho objected, and Inse was forced to repeat herself. The manka hissed again, lashing its tail from side to side.
The commander’s will sank like mud under her boots and then he slunk off, much like Phylus used to when they made him eat rocks when they were children. Only drooling a little bit.

Coruscant! Of course, Inse had never been to Coruscant, but the Blais family had done work with Lord Malak’s family, and more recently, their successors. She had connections. Oh. What was that flighty Senate girl’s name? Something…something… a number… Racharn?

“Leeshanalala,” she murmured to the cat she was calling Eartip, because it had one black eartip. “Something like that. I suppose I’m not supposed to know, really.” Inse wiggled her fingers at the manka, and it hissed back at her, more strong–willed than Commander Tycho.

“Come with me if you want to live,” she told Eartip, sweetly, drilling the words deep into its mindless, feral head. “Or not, I suppose. But your chances are a great deal better with me.”

Xxx

“What is wrong with your wife, First Husband?” Aemelie Ordo peered through the blue bars of her cell, looking at Carth as if he knew the answer.

Carth’s wife twitched on the floor, her entire body shaking. The blue energy field of his cell lay between them, keeping her just out of reach.

“I don’t know.” His head pounded.

Revan had turned down the forcefield right before she collapsed, but she hadn’t turned it off.

“She is touched by Force–magics,” Aemelie sighed. “I did not spend much time in the medix tents as a girl, but I believe that is a seizure. She might swallow her own tongue. Do you have your commlink?” She looked down at her own sleeping robes. “I left mine with my armor.”

“No.” There had been no time to assign Carth one, and the device with his things back in the med–bay only held Imperial codes.

The alarms overhead flashed a code Carth recognized from the bad old days of the wars. Prox alert. All hands. Battle stations. The Mando’ade used the same codes to mean the same thing? Probably. This ship had once been helmed by ex–Republic soldiers, after all, and distress signals were programmed as flashing red lights galaxy–wide.

On the ground, Revan stopped flailing. Her eyes were half-open and unfocused. A trickle of blood ran from her nose, another from her mouth.

“It's going to be okay,” Carth promised her unconscious form.

“She's not dead,” Aemelie pointed out. “We all may be soon, however, if Canderous has to do everything himself in this battle. It is not that I question my husband’s competence—only that he is but one man and command of that bridge requires at least four officers.”

“Who would be attacking us?” It didn’t make any sense. “Tenebrae wanted Revan here!”

Mission didn’t, his mind reminded him. The other Revan didn’t. Vima Sunrider didn’t—and neither did Master Atris.

When Vima Sunrider had said Revan should never come to Kaas, Carth had become convinced it was the best place for her to come. But now—
Mission warned me, too.

“Logically, it would be the Sith we came here to fight who attacked us.” Aemelie tilted her head, frowning. “Do you hear that? The sublight engines are shifting off. They would not go passive if we were under assault.”

Ship was so damn big that Carth was gonna have to take her word for that. But a millisecond later, the alarm died too, confirming her words.

Maybe Vima Sunrider was right, he thought. Maybe we never should have brought her here.

“Dad!” Dustil appeared in the doorway. “Hey! What—why are you locked up?” He glanced down at Carth’s twitching wife. “What happened to her?”

“Dustil! Hey… uh, can you shut off the forcefield to the cells?” Carth made his voice as friendly and easy–going as possible. “Something happened to Revan and we think the ship’s under attack.”

“Ship’s fine. The planet’s what they’re bombing, Dad.” His son walked forward, glancing down at Revan’s body. “Was Revan trying to break you out of here? Who locked you up?”

“No,” Carth said, at the same time that Aemelie nodded yes. “It was a misunderstanding,” he added fast—before the Mandalorian made things worse. “Can you get us out of here? Fizzle out the electronics?” Revan had done something like that on the Leviathan.

Dustil frowned, looking down at Revan and then back up at him. “Yeah. Of course.” He raised his right hand, fingers already beginning to glow.

“Don’t!” Aemelie began, but lightning jetted out from Dustil’s fingers and sparked the control board.

Behind Dustil, the door to the exit slid shut and a blue field lit the walls, overlain with the red hex of a reinforced energy field.

“Di’kutla! This is where the dar’jett put their jettai prisoners!” Aemelie snapped at Dustil. “The security system has measures in place to prevent their escape!”

“What?” Dustil blinked.

Aemelie rolled her eyes. “You’re lucky we overwrote the depressurization command.”

Dustil glared back her. “You mean we’re trapped? Why are you here? Why are both of you locked up?”

“It’s a… misunderstanding,” Carth soothed, in the same second that Aemelie said, “Third Wife.”

“Hey, uh… do you know who’s attacking the planet?” Carth added. Not just to distract Dustil, Carth damn well wanted to know. I’m supposed to be the Admiral in charge of the Sith Fleet, aren’t I? The humor in that was as rotten as the lines on his son’s skin.
“What? I think it's our fleet. Not the normal ones—not sure where they ran off to. But those funny ships that didn't have crews?” Dustil glanced down as if he'd just noticed the woman twitching on the floor again. He bent over Revan’s prone form, taking her wrist in his hand. It looked like he was checking her pulse. “Heard her screaming in the Force. I ran—got here as quick as I could.”

“Can you tell what’s wrong?” Carth pressed against the plasma grid again, but it didn’t budge.

“She’s unconscious.” His son shrugged. “Not dead. Did she attack that pregnant lady? Because I just saw her in the med–bay and she's really messed up.”

“Of course not! Vima Sunrider did. Vima Sunrider tried to sabotage the ship but I… I stopped her. Revan was… is she okay?” Because now Carth’s son had dropped Revan’s arm and was standing up again, that scowling sneer back on his face.

“Stopped her?” That yellow light in Dustil’s eyes was making Carth damned uneasy, gleaming in the flashing lights overhead. “Where’s the old scow now?”

“In the morgue. She was going to kill us all. She was trying to blow up the ship.”

“So you killed Sunrider? Wow, Dad.” One side of Dustil’s mouth pulled up. “Pretty impressive.”

Carth could have done without his son’s smirk right about then.

“Your father shot the old one after she nearly killed Dessa of Rialis. Third Wife lost her reason and overreacted by imprisoning us both. Then she fell down on the floor.” Aemelie’s commentary wasn't helping.

“Wait, what? Revan locked you guys up?”

All the color seemed to have leached from his wife's skin in the blue, flickering light, just as it had from his son’s Sith–marked face as it hardened, staring down at her limp form.

“You're saying your wife locked you up in here, Dad?”

Carth wasn't sure in that moment which of them he was more frightened for. “I'm saying it's complicated,” he soothed. “Dustil, it's complicated.”

“Frack complicated.” Dustil’s arm shot out and the wall in front of Carth rippled. There was a sparking sound and then the forcefield around their cells cut out completely. “Nobody puts my father in a fracking cage.”

“How—?”

“Could feel the live circuits in the wall,” Dustil said smugly. “Sensed them. They were the brightest ones.”

“Uh… good… good job.” Carth knelt by Revan’s side, propping her head up.

“You are fortunate you missed the rebreathers,” Aemelie clipped, stepping free from her cell. “Losing oxygen in this sealed chamber would complicate our imprisonment.”

“Oh, yeah? Well, you’re fortunate I need you and your Mandalorian army to fly this tub of bolts—”

The two of them argued some more. Revan’s nose was bleeding.

“It's gonna be okay, beautiful,” Carth promised, bending down to help her. He just wasn't sure
“It’s gonna be okay, beautiful.” A voice outside. Somewhere else.

Tiny and inconsequential to them, them who strode the stars and all of the space between. Them who she commanded. Them who were she, like fingers spread across a navboard, tracing fleet commands on a holo-projected screen.

Revan flew. Now she was——orbiting a brown-green world where the moon dragged close. Her fighters discharged as flocks of organic beasts rose in the sky to meet them.

Beneath drexl wings, the city was already on fire.

“No!” Her scream seemed to echo through space. Did the ships pause? Did they pull back?

[“Dumb Sleepers! You need to tell them to stop, sis. They won't listen to me.”]

“Mission?” This had to be a hallucination because the truth was impossible. Her eyes were faceted, looking at three different planets. No, four—

“Revan?”

That was a voice somewhere outside the world again. The tiny one that sounded like Carth.

“She can't hear you, Dad.”

“She blinked, though. I just saw her blink. Dustil, can you do something?”

“I am! I'm trying to get this kriffing door open!”

“Heal her! Wake her up somehow—”

“I didn't know your son had medical training.”

“Yeah, cause I don't.” Footsteps, as if the boy had come closer. “She's not dying, Dad. She's just… weird. Like the Force is... there, but she's... frozen.” Scuffling noise and something pressed against her arm. A hand, maybe. “When the other one was in a coma she was gone. But Revan’s here. I don't know how else to explain it.”

Carth’s voice again. “Then we need help! You know this ship, Aemelie! There must be some kind of override.”

“There is.” The female voice sounded amused now. “But we cannot reach it from inside this room. Keep her from biting her tongue again, First Husband. Use your belt if you must.”

Salty. Copper. Wet. That was the taste of it, that strange wetness. Blood.

{{Error: Organic interface malfunction. Autonomic repairs authorized}}
“No. Please—”

[“Polla Revan? Dumbass! Why did you come here?”]

“Mission? Are you here too?”

{{Error: Organic interface malfunction. Initializing nanocysts. Further interaction may result in premature termination}}

“That's a lot of blood, Dad.”

“Prop her head up. Help me—”

World tilted.

{{Analysis: Cascade failure. Initiating repairs to primary organic matrix. Reboot}}

“No.”

Rebooting sequence initialized.

“No.”

She was—

—launching a nest of fighters from her sides as her main cannon targeted the glittering surface of a world below.

“No.”

“She said something! Freckles, can you hear me?” Something on Revan’s face, a flickering light in her eyes, splintering the facets into larger and larger planes, like a viewfinder pulling back. Here, the ice of Hoth, the wasted plains of Ziost, Nar Shaddaa and Onderon burning—

The mechanical command almost felt like a threat.

“No.”

[“I said no, already! Geez, Polla Revan! Kaas said they'd listen to you!”]

“Mission?”

“Position? What position?”

“She said, 'Mission,' Wife Whatever of Ordo. Am I supposed to give her a title, too, Dad?”

“Her name is Aemelie.”

“Third Wife. Can you hear me?”

{{Organic interface is online, little sister. Direct relay is possible, for a limited time}}
“What? What are you talking about?”

“Mission?” This time, Revan felt her lips move. “Mission is that you? Are you in the computer? Am I? Please tell me this is a simulation! Hallucination. Please tell me I'm just losing my mind and it just said Coruscant—”

She was—

Coruscant, that's Coruscant, I—

{{Planetary defenders targeted. Initiate fleet jump sequence. Y/N}}

“No!”

{{“Sis?”}}

“Mission! H–how—?”

{{“You're asking me? Whoa. That's the Aleema, right? It's huge!”}}

{{Little sister, dock. Find the organic interface. Bring her to us}}

Stop.

{{Bring her to us or this will not stop}}

{{“You're not the boss of her! Or me!”}}

“Mission? Can you hear me? Can you hear me?”

“I can hear you.” The planes resolved into a face. Carth’s face: wan, worried, with that brutally short hair, its new lines.

Revan blinked. “*Stop. STOP THIS. STOP!” Her mouth refused to move.

{{Organic interface back online. Terminating connection to preserve neurons}}

Like a light had been switched off, the world resolved back into itself. The ceiling curved overhead. Gray and corrugated durasteel. The floor hummed gently beneath her, slightly warm like a living thing. Carth’s drawn face loomed above her. His arms were holding her up, clumsily wiping at her face with a cloth.

“Your nose is bleeding, beautiful.”

“Carth? I–I had the strangest dream.” Her face was wet and the cloth was red. Revan felt hysteria bubble up in her guts. You were in some kind of cell and all these planets were burning and Mission was there. And there were ships and they—we—I was… I was everywhere.

Whatever it had been still danced at the edges of her vision like no dream at all.

“You had some kind of fit.” He frowned warily. There was a raised structure behind him, lined with half-walls. The pale of the ceiling above their heads. Corrugated. Familiar. One side of the wall was lined with four half-walled cells. The field had been switched off.

It was all abruptly familiar. Revan had been in this room before. The memory came in like hyperdrive—as if someone had slammed it into her head.

Xxx

The betrayer hung on the back wall of his cell. She'd taken no chances. Force restraints blocked his hands and feet. She'd stripped away his armor, leaving his Force–ravaged skin to shiver in the arctic air. She'd stripped away everything—save the prosthesis.

This was a display of power and he—both of them—needed to understand who was in control.

“Gloating seems beneath you.” His eyes were yellow and still partially sane. His voice wheezed through the voder.

“Hello, Mal….” Revan nodded her head, taking a breath of relief that his eyes weren't glowing with the Emperor’s madness again. “I’m sure you have questions for me.”

“Just one, Red.” His voder hissed. “Are you going to kill me?”

She owed him the truth. “Not yet.”

Xxx

Not yet—

“We’re on the Aleema.” Memory came back by degrees. Malak’s face morphed into Carth’s with disturbing realism. Revan blinked. “I put you here. In one of these cells.”

“Y–yes.” Carth’s face was downright comical in its contortions.

“Why?” In that exact moment, she had no more memory of his actions than Malak’s.

Carth’s lips thinned. “I shot Vima Sunrider. She was trying to sabotage the ship and I killed her.”

“Oh.” Regret came back for the sheer waste of it all. Who let you out? Who disobeyed me? “Uh, who let you out?”

“I did. Wanna make something of it?” Abruptly, Dustil loomed over them, yellow eyes blazing.

Revan blinked and felt a hundred more tiny lights wink out. “What?” The planet below us. That was from the planet below us. It’s being bombed. You know it’s being bombed. You were there. You flew with them. You saw them bombing it—

You helped—

Good.

That’s what he deserves, a part of her mind whispered. What Tenebrae deserves. And Dar’Revan’s down there somewhere. Even if she's still in a coma she fracking deserves this too—

Dustil’s face seemed to grow paler as if he’d felt the Force darken even as Revan had. “I said,” Carth’s kid hissed, “I let my Dad out of your fracking jail. You want to make something of it, Revan?”

“Of what? No. Not now.” There were more important—far more important concerns than this brat. The Emperor had… he had taunted her—before. He had held a picture of Malachor—
“The Kaas City Spaceport?” Tenebrae’s voice had been mocking. “Do let me know when you find it.”

We found it. Those ships and I found it and reduced it to rubble. I was there, I was there with them and we made it burn—

“Revan?” Carth’s voice snapped her back to the real world.

“She saw—the same ships we saw at Medriaas. Part of the Sith Fleet, but now they’re bombing Kaas.”

Not just Kaas. There had been other planets, too. Other targets. Nar Shaddaa. Hoth. Onderon. Telos—

“Right now we need to stop those ships—I was… I saw them but they won’t listen—” her head turned toward the sealed door, the Force giving her just enough forewarning to step back before the door blew open.

Revan’s hand outstretched, forming a shimmering field of Force energy between all of them and the blast.

“Finally!” Canderous emerged from the smoke, a blunt obelisk of beskar and guns, mirrored visor of the mask reflecting Carth’s startled face. The kids surrounding him were likewise armed. “What the hell did you do to the door? Some osik out there. I don’t know what you heard—the comms went dead—” his voice broke off with surprise. “What the hell happened to you, Revan? You look even worse than Republic.”

“Thanks,” Carth coughed.

“You picked a strange time for a battle circle.” He almost sounded amused. “Did you and Aemelie resolve—”

“No. My nose was bleeding.” She’d forgotten. “I had a fit when we came out of hyperspace. I saw ships—the ones that fought with us against Wies. I think… they’re here, aren’t they?”

“Dustil Onasi activated the emergency overrides, Husband,” Aemelie added. “Trapping us all in this room. Revan and I have resolved nothing. Are we still under attack?”

“We never were.” Canderous snorted under his helm. “Damndest thing….”

Xxx

From the top of the world, the planet of Telos looked as pure as one of Atris’s handmaidens, Traya thought. Unsullied by war, or the cares of the world. The scars from Malak’s assault lay deep beneath the surface, buried under the ice floes, overgrown by jungle at the equator.

From here, all she saw was peace.

Breathe it in. Traya did, relishing the moment, for it would not last.

“This was the newsfeed three standard hours ago.” Mical tapped the screen of his desk to bring up the Aurebesh on their main projector. The headlines illuminated his form, painting it in dark lines like Force corruption. “From Sith space.”

Aid requested—

Supplies running low on Thule as forces loyal to the Priests and the Five Families rally their defenses in Ziost City—

The slaves have revolted and they’re overrunning Ziost City—

The slaves have executed all the noble houses of Thule—

Where is Lord Tenebrae? Why has he forsaken us?

We have liberated the free city of Kaas, and most of the planet. We are establishing an interim government until the time free elections can be organized—

We have liberated the free planet of Ziost. The Oracles have surrendered to our forces. We are establishing an interim government—

Lord Salap proclaims that Lord Revan has agreed to stand in as interim governor—

Lord Revan is the savior of Thule—

Lord Revan has vanquished His Luminance. Lord Revan is His Luminance. The Priests acknowledge his or her divinity and legal title to the world of Thule—

Lord Revan is our savior, the Ziost Oracle proclaims—

All hail Lord Revan, savior of the Empire—

An Imperial holiday of the Fifth Month, Ninth Day has been elected to serve as our independence from tyranny on Dromund Kaas. All hail Lord Revan—

XXX

Mical paced back to his desk. “And then it all stops. This is the last transmission—if you don’t count that pirate feed the Republic reporter has.”

XXX

UNKNOWN SHIPS IN THE SKY OVER THULE. OVER ZIOST. OVER DROMUND KAAAS. MOBILIZING DEFENSE—

XXX

Traya sighed, letting the moment of calm break. “From what I know of the Sith—and of Revan—I find that pirate feed we were watching more accurate than this Imperial propaganda.”

Her son lifted an eyebrow. “I’m sure you are correct, but there is one constant in every account.”

Traya sighed. “Yes.”
Trista Jar: “Reports continue to stream in from the afflicted worlds, but the Supreme Chancellor has yet to make a statement. How much longer will our government keep us in the dark?”

Traya dimmed the hysterical voices of the newscasters down to a whisper and walked to the window, looking out on the snow blowing across the empty plains. The sky above was clear, and lightening toward dawn. From this view, all was peaceful, the planet of Telos entirely untouched.

No sign of the nightmare scream in the Force that had woken them both. No sign of the scout ships that had briefly darkened the Telosian skies, before flickering away to rain death down upon other worlds.

Did you spare me on purpose, padawan? An inane thought, quickly dismissed.

“The ships are gone,” Her son appeared stuck on the obvious. His voice still retained its air of surprise. “The Sleepers pulled away from Telos and went to hyperspace.”

Traya nodded, watching more reports coming in from all sectors of the galaxy. “The full fleet was never here at all. And our refuge was designed to protect the Telos defense grid’s generators,” she reminded him. “It withstood worse from Malak’s attack. You and I were never in any true danger.”

“Aren’t you concerned with why the Sleepers disengaged before they bombed Telos?” His voice sharpened into a near–mirror of her own, higher–pitched than his usual solid baritone. “They showed no restraint with Hoth. Or Nar. Or Onderon. And the Sith Empire’s media net is gone completely—not even distress beacons are getting out. We know their planets suffered—but to lose the entire grid—”

“You have eyes but you do not see, Mical.” Her son was still so young. For all the memories he had taken, (not enough), he still retained that childish righteousness that Master Atris had worked so hard to instill in all of her followers. It had, Traya thought, been responsible for Meetra’s ruination, and probably Brianna’s betrayal as well.

Of course, she—a part of her now Atris, too—knew that it was his resolve that made her son bend. Revan Starfire and Davad Arkan had been brittle tools, for all of their strength. Mical was far more pliable. Like Oerin had been, before his death.

“See what?” Mical’s wide brow furrowed. “Logically, I would expect Telos to be bombed before Nar Shaddaa, given Revan’s history with the planet.”

“Your mistake is thinking this assault is grounded in logic at all. Observe Hoth.” She pointed. Only one–quarter of the ice planet was lined in red, indicating the extent of its ravaged surface. The edges of devastation were neat, almost surgically, cut.

“Yes?” His tone indicated impatience. “Again, they pulled their attack. What does it mean?”

“You have eyes to see. The ships swarmed above the mining facility.” Traya shrugged as her last scion only raised a puzzled eyebrow. “The mining facility that was Revan’s birthplace.”

Mical shrugged. “And Nar Shaddaa?” A circle of ruin was stamped into its equator, half above its narrow sea. “What is significant about Nar?”

Traya chuckled. “I admit, that one puzzles me too. Vrook Lamar took her there as a child—after the incident on Telos. And Revan and Malak spent time there as well, rallying troops to join their cause against the Mandalorians—but what they found, they never shared with me.”

“Onderon?” Half the city of Iziz was on fire, and then also the southern grasslands more than a thousand kilometers to the south. The resultant pattern formed a dot and line, curving across the planet’s surface. A more whimsical creature than Traya’s son might have noted it looked like a drexl’s wing.

“Revan was only there for a few weeks, but I’d imagine it left an impression. Certainly, Davad left an impression. And, of course, she spent a great deal of time in the sky above as well… in the battle for Dxun.”

Or, perhaps, Traya thought, some of the messages were meant for her—and not for Revan at all. Had Vitiate finally noticed her influence and divined its source? After all these years? For Vima and Nomi Sunrider, Onderon held a great deal of shared significance.

Although it would be strategically impractical, a part of her almost wished he had.

“The Sleepers didn’t bomb the Dxun moon.” Mical had a stubbornly literal streak. “They bombed Iziz. General Vaklu barely escaped with his life and no one has seen the queen. The palace is a smoking crater, by all accounts.”

A part of Traya’s selves had once been very happy on the planet of Onderon. Indeed, perhaps that had been the last happy time—

“You look for patterns of logic from Sith–made things? Each Sleeper was a sentient being, once,” she explained (not for the first time) to Mical. “Their attack formations more closely resemble ceega gull flights or killick swarms than those perpetrated by regimented drones. These locations—these places…I assume that the Sleepers chose them to provoke an emotional response. They were making this personal.”

Mical raised an eyebrow. “That’s quite a leap, Master.”

“The targets weren’t chosen for their strategic value. They were chosen by Revan, or more probably, in an effort to provoke Revan.”

“And yet… the Sleepers pulled away from Telos?” He said the words like a challenge—as if he was challenging her. So soon? “Her husband’s homeworld? The site of Malak’s first betrayal? Why?”

“Perhaps the point of the threat had been made?” Traya shrugged. “Or, perhaps Revan Starfire told them to stop. Her husband’s homeworld, the place where her childhood unraveled… perhaps she ordered them to stand down.”

“But she isn’t in the tomb. How can she control them at all? You said we would know if she went to the tomb—”

“Conjecture,” Traya said. “Nothing more. Had we the same memories, perhaps it would make sense to you.”

Perhaps, their point made, the mad fleet had simply… stopped—at least for now. They took limited orders from Vitiate. Perhaps Revan’s ambulatory form possessed the same ability to communicate. Traya did not know. The Sleepers had always been asleep before. She did not know why—any more than she knew what could have possibly awakened them.

Revan’s presence in the Nathema System? But she was there before. It has to be something else, something more—

But Padawan Mical Jorde had been trained by a Coruscanti senator’s son. A retreat before assured victory was not in his nature—and his solipsism had been overindulged in the Jedi Temple. “I am not ready to lose all of myself. We agreed that different perspectives were useful.”

“Then accept the wisdom of my accumulated lives. Something stopped the Sleepers from bombing Telos. Perhaps it was Revan, or perhaps they acquired a different target. Regardless…” Traya indicated the one frozen holo—still: the snarling face of High Admiral Rensha, dressed in full epaulets and bars, Republic Cross of Glory pinned on her breast. “The Fleet and the Senate are quite eager to place all blame for this aggression at Darth Revan’s feet. What is your analysis of that?”

Her final apprentice frowned slowly. “We could tell them that it seems highly unlikely that Darth Revan would attack Republic and Sith space at once. SIS says Mandalore’s forces could barely invade one system—let alone assault widely—spread targets across an entire galaxy.”

Traya sighed. His mind, so clever and so sadly obvious. “True.” She doubted Revan was behind this at all. “Of course, they have the same SIS reports.”

Accounts of Revan’s activities from Katarr and Biscain were scant, but they seemed to indicate a woman who acted to preserve life, not take it. Commander Cody’s testimony, in particular, described a creature with a mind cunning enough to take over his ship—and benevolent enough to save its crew—even when doing so risked the lives of her own people—not to mention everyone on the planet below.

And then, there were her actions at Biscain—

No doubt Nihilus begged her to end him. After all, the creature had begged Kavar Vakla for death, too. One of the last Jedi “secrets” the man had seen fit to share with Azen Loanin, who had, of course, shared it with his good friend Mical Jorde.…

No, this Revan was a far cry from the woman Traya had molded to destroy Malak and the Star Forge. And if she was also capricious enough to raise a rebellion in the heart of Vitiate's empire—

“Are you sure that’s truly her?” Mical’s voice interrupted Traya’s thoughts. He nodded at the blurred clip of the gaunt woman in the torn white dress, cap of red hair clipped to her skull, standing next to Yuthura Ban and a Wookiee. “Her left arm—it’s difficult to see with the smoke and the Wookiee’s shadow blocking it—but it almost looks… gold. Sheris Loran had a prosthetic arm.”

“Would you were right… but, no.” Traya shook her head. “The body of Sheris Loran had my padawan’s mind. The Revan I trained would never risk an open coup against Vitiate. Not when she controlled the Sleepers.”

“But you just said she does not control the Sleepers…?” He tilted his head, frowning. “Master Traya, with all respect, I think you are sometimes… confused. If there is one Revan there, why not two? One of the reports said there was footage of two Revans. We hypothesize they left Coruscant together. They could be working together, still.”
“The only footage extant is what the Fleet censored. Before our cells on Kaas went dark, reports said that the false Revan had never woken from her coma.” Hope was fleeting. A lesson Traya had learned long ago.

“We still have no way of knowing,” her son folded his hands. “But Rensha requested Jedi presence on the Great Hunt. They’re traveling to Sith space. I could go and advise—”

I cannot trust you to go. The comment about her confusion rankled Traya more than she wanted him to see.

Because you know it could be true, a voice whispered. There were too many now for it to have a name.

Memories she knew were hers mocked her: Mical, tiny and squalling next to his twin. Revan, a padawan of twelve, green eyes sparkling with interest when Dorak allowed her into his class on ancient languages. Meetra, defiant and unrepentant after Malachor—blinded, broken—

Oerin, a boy of five, toddling after his older brothers. The one she had chosen to raise above the rest—the culmination of all her hopes.

But buried beneath were other faces. Faces hundreds of years dead. Sith and Jedi alike and always—always—the same end. So much hope, so much promise…and so much power that never set things right. The Force corrupted always: the power to shape and to break, to shatter and to grow—always twisting the galaxy in its own image. The loss of kolto had sent factions across the galaxy scurrying for peace treaties. Loss of the galaxy’s most formidable warriors would do the same on an even larger scale. The Jedi were close to ruin, but if that fool amnesiac managed to rally the Sith to her cause as she had the Mando’ade—

Revan would make the galaxy bleed and burn—all due to her ignorance. Her pride. Her folly. Her power. It could not end otherwise.

“You are right,” Traya sighed slowly. “Rensha needs Jedi guidance. But not you, my son. I will go with the Fleet.” Old Scaly had mentioned the discovery of new hyperlanes. Claimed they could reach Sith space in days, not weeks. Another risk to be measured and contained. “Inform the High Admiral she will need to send a ship to retrieve me.”

Her son nodded slowly. “Yes, Master.”

Xxx

Above, the skies of Dromund Kaas burned. The Sleepers were awake. Thousands of them, a dark malevolence in the Force.

And her supposed, promised destiny.

Stop, Revan thought uselessly, but Sheris’s body was an inconsequential speck to the monsters above. She was blind and deaf to them, now. Just another dust–mote. Fodder beneath their wings.

The Fragment was a scream in the sky. A directed ion storm, bearing down upon them all.

The Sleepers were awake, but Revan could sense nothing but malevolent rage. It was both cruel and cold, retaliatory and randomized. The Sleepers were pure Force made metal, and beneath their wings, death came.

Dust and fire consumed Kaas City, living and stone alike. It choked her throat, battering against Revan’s meager defenses. Without Yuthura at her side strengthening their Force shields, they would already be dead.

But Yuthura was tiring. She turned to Revan, head tails whipping her face and screamed something lost to the wind. Above their heads, silvery ships burned through the atmosphere, bursts from cannon igniting the patch of relative shelter ahead: the low bunker that had once housed part Tenebrae’s hunting stables. Shrieks within as the beasts there died. Some sentient, some dumb animals.

Trapped in Sheris’s weak body, Revan felt each life ending, but no accompanying rush of power. No. All she felt was pain.

A barrage of plasma bolts to their right sent one of the remaining walls of the palace collapsing toward them. Revan saw it happen in slow motion, as the Force coalesced around her fingers, sparking blue–white; stronger, in her desperation, than expected. She saw Yuthura’s hands raise a thin shield that buttressed her own. Saw a burning, half-molten piece of rock sink through the Twi’lek’s Force barricade—and then another. Saw herself—as if from a distance—move to the woman’s side, adding her own weak strength to her ally’s effort. The shield splashed, shoving the tons of rock back, but the effort threatened to overwhelm them both—

“Can’t… do that… again.” Yuthura murmured in her ear. Her skin was clammy and cold. “That was… that was all I had.”

Neither can I. Rationally, she knew her limits. But fear fueled Revan, at least for the moment, giving her strength enough to help hold Yuthura upright.

“We need to get underground,” rumbled Grarwwaar. His voder cut through the noise overhead, strangely echoing and amplified as if his voice was closer than he was.

There is a tunnel. Yuthura signaled with one weary t’chun. Left. Maybe ten meters.

“Left,” growled Grarwwaar, motioning to the band of mercenaries behind him. Only three remained. A Houck, a grizzled Human male, and an armored, indeterminate shape who could have been Gan or Rodian, or even an Ugnaught, under armor that looked designed for a child. The collapse of the arena stairs had taken the rest of the Exchange mercenaries Polla Organa had recruited; but a few other survivors crowded behind the mercs, hesitant, as if not sure of their welcome.

“Now,” Grarwwaar ordered, and the others moved closer. A motley lot: a few ragged slaves, what looked to be one of Tenebrae’s guards—or a slave who had stolen an ill–fitting costume, a woman foolish enough to bring a squalling babe into this—

Where else was she to go? There is no safety left.

“Push the wall back,” Revan screamed to Yuthura, trying to be heard over the din. The Twi’lek stepped closer, lifting her head warily. Blue light surged abruptly around her hands. Taking that as acquiescence, Revan added her strength, pushing the collapsing wall away from them. It fell back with startling ease.

The Force was… it was stronger than it should have been for weak Sheris. But there was no time to worry about why.

The wall crumbled before them. The deadly rain of ships overhead had also moved on, but the air still smoked green and smelled like poison.
Revan looked down and saw blisters forming on the skin of her arm where her gown had ripped.

Oh, no.

“We need to move underground!” she called out to Yuthura and watched the woman frown with incomprehension as the wind tore away her words.

The bombers had used civ-suppressing payloads, Revan thought. Not planet-killers—or they would all be dead already. Civ-suppressors were designed to sicken and demoralize over a period of months, with EMP pulse-blasts in atmosphere to knock out both inter and extra-planetary communications grids.

This was the kind of war that Revan had taught the Mando’ade. First with the rakghoul plague on Taris. Then again, with the scorched ground on the Dxun moon, the poisoned camps, the tainted supply chains… until finally, they had shown how much they had learned her lesson with the Stereb cities, burning the natives alive with radioactive fire—

Don’t give yourself too much credit, Red. What you did was nothing new.

It could very well be Malak’s real ghost in her ear now. Or just her own conscience. But arguing with… with him served no purpose.

I know, Mal. Her eyes squinted, fogged with grit. Behind her, that child was crying, faintly. Hopelessly. That’s not what I meant.

You were the first Jedi commander in forty years to use the consequence of war against your enemies. Instead of saving them.

She felt her lips twitch as if that was funny. They were going to give us medals for that. Do you remember?

She had selected the Jedi Council member Master San Pertel to receive it in their stead. Receive the Republic Cross of Honor for them both. At the armistice at Malachor V.

The man had always been an obedient fool.

Yes. Just the one word from Malak. And all that time between them.

Revan gestured to Yuthura, picking the direction the wind was blowing to follow the route the Twi’lek indicated, so at least they would have that wind at their backs. It was difficult to tell with such low visibility, but she thought the jagged remains of a wall in the distance might have been the one that ran from Tenebrae’s palace to the city’s main square, which meant going the way opposite would lead them to the jungle.

Revan followed the line with her eyes until it vanished into black smoke, aware of the others trailing behind. Something was burning in that direction. Possibly the entire jungle. But they won’t bomb the Dark Temple. Not while they hope to get the Fragment in her tomb…. The Fragment. All this time, nearly since the bombing had begun, and the woman was still screaming through the Force like an avenging monolith.

“*Lord Revan! A real voice boomed in front of them, Force–enhanced and so loud that Revan nearly jumped out of her skin.

An apparition emerged from the smoke—a red–robed figure covered in dust, with a glowing Force light above her head. It took Revan a second to recognize Lady Mydia Blais under the mat of tangled hair and grime–streaked face.

The girl’s yellowish eyes narrowed and her mouth broke into a hopeful smile. “Is…my brother with you? My brother? Phylus?”

Revan merely shook her head. This was no time for platitudes.

The girl frowned. “Oh.” She beckoned them forward.

Ahead, Revan saw a gap in the smoke and what looked like a hole in the ground—a blasted–open sewer pipe, perhaps, or the remains of some aristocrat’s dungeon. Mydia summoned a second Force–light, two of them hovering above her head as they all descended into the tunnels, splashing into filth below that was definitely sewage.

In the depths, the wind noise lessened. “I found others,” Mydia said hoarsely after they’d helped the refugees inside. She eyed the cowering figure in red robes disdainfully, the other refugees merited merely a disgusted sniff. “Mostly slaves. They refused to listen when I commanded them to stay. I daresay they will listen to you, Lord Revan. Can we track them down and punish them? Please?”

Revan considered her, wondering if keeping the most unstable of the Blais children alive was worth the bother. The girl was powerful, burning Force with her little light as carelessly as the Fragment had at the Jedi Temple. Power such as that could be useful but Sith aristocrats had always been a problem—even more arrogant and inbred than Coruscanti senators—and this one, barely grown, possessed all the limitations of her kind—

“Lord Revan?” Mydia repeated. “You're staring at me like I've got something on my face. Do I have something on my face?” Her hand went to her cheeks, which looked flushed and filthy, but unmarred from the blast burns that had gotten the rest of them. Indeed, the girl practically pulsed with health.

So much that she was nearly glowing in the Force—

Ah.

And then Revan saw what should have been obvious. “Congratulations,” she offered stiffly. “You and your child are unharmed. We need to get you a prophylactic dose of anti–rads soon, however. For… for both of you.”

The girl’s smile widened. “Can you tell what it is? I was supposed to get scanned next week.”

“It has no idea. So… no. I can’t. Not really “ The mind was a half-formed blob, just a warmth. Easy to miss if you didn't know what to look for.

She and Malak hadn't known what to look for eleven years ago. Only that long? It felt like a century. Don't think of him. The Emperor took Malachor and he is dead, or it is some kind of trick, trap, he wants you off–guard—

He's fine, Red. That voice again. Like his breath on her hair. For now... he's fine. But she needs your help.

It was unbecoming to be jealous of a ghost’s attention to the Fragment. And the others would think Revan insane if she answered Malak out loud with an explanation of the mechanics of the tomb. One of the many things about their role in the Sith Empire that Malak had never understood.
So many things you never knew, Mal. So many things I could never tell you—

Be it a real ghost or her own conscience, the only answer was the whisper of a laugh, like wind ruffling across her cropped hair. And now I’m dead. Perhaps I’ve learned something from the experience, Red. Just as you did.

Meanwhile, the child prattled on as they walked through filth. “I suppose my babe’s not genetically Lord Malak’s, but he did promise me a seat on the Dark Council when we overthrow the Emperor. I want you to know that I will hold that seat merely for our daughter. Or son. Whichever.” Mydia Blais’s voice turned abruptly serious. “Inse can have House Blais when I’m a Darth D’Reev on Coruscant. Or… Senator Darth? Is that right? I don’t really understand your Republic titles.”

“Right now we are trudging through a sewer.” Revan felt her mouth twitch. “I’m sure you will have ample time later to plan your child’s future. If we survive.”

“Grandmother was most optimistic about our chances,” Mydia giggled. “She says my children will restore the pride of our House.”

“I never met your grandmother.” The woman had been dead for decades—or such had been Revan’s understanding. Noble Sith families venerated their dead, delved into Sith sorcery and claims of ghosts.

Claims, Red? Malak had no right to sound so amused while Revan was trudging through filth half-poisoned. Potentially delirious from radiation poisoning as well.

“Oh, Grandmother Poxia watched you!” Mydia smiled. “Mother is still sulking, I imagine. I haven’t heard from her at all. Nereal died about twenty minutes ago when those ships bombed the Barasit Province, and Rhea got the flu and puked his guts out a month ago, all alone on Ziosk—” she yawned. “That leaves me and Phylus and Inse, but I can’t imagine they’ll survive on their own. Inse is far too disagreeable and poor Phylus….” she sniffled, wiping back a tear. “He’s probably pinned under a rock somewhere bleeding and concussed—even as we are all healthy and whole.”

“Once we establish our base we’ll search for survivors,” Revan promised. Despite the girl’s inane prattle, this scene was familiar. The pack of armed soldiers at her back, the trail of refugees following, the fellow Jedi by her side, the helpless civilian in need of rescue—

She felt her mouth twitch and reassessed the last.

Mydia Blais looked a great deal better off right now than any of them.

“You’re staring at me oddly again,” the girl murmured. “Is it my hair? It must be frightful?”

“Yuthura is tiring.” Revan could feel it, like a faltering heartbeat, the slowing of the other woman’s steps. “Help her, Mydia.”

“I’m… fine.” But the Twi’lek didn’t sound fine. The mottled stripes on her lekku were faded in the Force light. And when Revan took her hand to check her pulse, it was cold.

“Twi’lek are more sensitive to radiation,” Revan said, as Mydia Blais slung an arm around Yuthura’s waist to support her. “Vik always used to get deathly ill when we went into the contaminated zones. A few times I pulled him back from the brink.”

Yuthura looked up. “I didn’t know you fought so closely with him. I knew he followed you, but… he… he was a friend.”
“I remember.” Revan nodded. “A rather close one of yours, on Manaan—”

“On Manaan,” Yuthura murmured, raising a brow ridge. “Of course. Yes. We were.”

“He was always kind to me. When I lost my arm, he—” Revan’s voice halted.

I was almost never with Tio in the field. I commanded him. I commanded his unit. His unit, with Surik to control them, and Sheris to heal. Sheris Loran, their padawan healer—

That was me, a voice asserted itself. Quiet and… something else. Almost smug. I can heal them now, Revan. What can you do?

Survive. Stop the Fragment.

Then we need each other, don’t we?

Revan felt her foot stumble over an uneven patch on the floor. “He was amusing,” she said, searching for a compliment that was true. “Vik always had a sense of humor, even in our darkest times.”

She remembered, suddenly, making him choose among the padawans. Choose the ones to keep. Sheris herself had been in that lot—

“Yes. Vik was another… close friend.” Ahead of her, Yuthura wavered on her feet too, thankfully beyond the point of curiosity. “But… dead. Vikor… Vikor died.”

“It was Malachi who ordered their execution. And I killed him for it.” It had been but one of a dozen reasons (and the man had been dying anyway), but saying so out loud was strangely gratifying, even if Yuthura only cast Revan a dazed glance, before taking Mydia Blais’s arm and limping forward again.

Have I told her this before? Revan couldn’t remember.

“Was it her who killed D’Reev?” The Houck mercenary muttered it quietly to the Human in an obscure dialect of Telosian argot, but Revan heard them, just as she heard the frightened whispers of the refugees behind them, the dying city above them, and the pain that seemed to soak into the ground of Kaas itself.

So much pain.

“Don’t matter,” his friend clicked back in the same tongue. “That contract’s all off, now. Signed and dealt. D’Rreev One canceled retaliation for any hits. We’re here to save the galaxy now, right? Like the Boss said.”

“I guess. Lucky for her.”

The Human’s voice dropped almost to the point of inaudibility. “Why? Wanna try your chances on her now, Rogere? Hope you said bye to the grubs afore you left Byss—”

“You know she can hear you fellows?” the Wookiee rumbled, in Basic. “I assume. Jedi have keen senses.”

“That’s right. I can,” Revan clicked. The puzzle of their words fueled her steps, itch at the back of her neck spiking her adrenaline, with a growing suspicion brewing in her gut.

Polla Organa had recruited these Exchange mercenaries… but how had she found them in the first place? While there were some criminal syndicates that operated within the Sith Empire, it still seemed a rather large coincidence that a common Deralian smuggler would be so easily connected—

Or I’m underestimating her. She had underestimated the smuggler before, too. With a pang, Revan allowed herself to consider that the woman fearless enough to face down Tenebrae with nothing but a brick could be dead.

“You’re tiring,” the Wookiee rumbled. “Lord Revan, if you’d prefer to take my arm—I believe we’re close. The air smells different. Something other than sewer and swamp gas.”

She started, surprised at how close he’d crept. As hunters their kind were near—soundless, but this one was especially light on his feet.

He also doesn’t smell, Revan realized. Her nose was clogged with the scent of burning and ashes—and now, overwhelmingly, sewer—but even so—

You’re always so suspicious. The voice that was Sheris—if it was Sheris—sounded tired too. Perhaps they are what they say. They’ve been nothing but kind. You need to learn trust.

I’m amazed you survived the Sith, Revan thought back—a millisecond before she realized she’d set herself up all too well.

Are you? But I had such a powerful protector.

“You’ve... done well, Mydia,” Yuthura Ban mumbled into the girl’s arm in front of them. “Very well.”

“Well, I figured out that you arranged this little coup of yours to rescue me! Rescuing you back was the least I could do! I hope we find Phylus!” Mydia turned her head back to Revan and graced her with a smile. “And I hope Lord Malak returns to us both, Lord Revan. No doubt he’s worked out the plan to kill Inse by now. She snores, you know. And her feet are deformed. It’s tragic.”

Revan bit back a laugh, a scrap of dark humor emerging from her throat. “Of course,” she echoed dryly. “I’m pleased you appreciate our little coup.”

“Bombing half the planet was slightly overzealous.” The girl shrugged the shoulder not supporting Yuthura Ban. “But it’s the thought that counts. I don’t mind that you killed my other two brothers. I never really liked Nereal anyway. He half-flayed the wine steward once, and the man was never the same after. Terrible scars. Hideous. We couldn’t have him in the formal dining room. And Rhea? He would have been so upset about Mother if you hadn’t killed him on Ziost. So, really, it’s like you did me another favor.”

The air stank and they were walking through ankle–deep puddles of filth. The silence in the Force indicated the ships overhead had already moved past, but the damage was done.

“Ziost?” Revan asked. Tenebrae had warned her the Sleepers were capable of anything, but could they bomb more than one planet at a time? And on whose orders? Tenebrae had said he could never control the Sleepers, but when he had shown them to her, Revan had sensed their minds, dormant and still; coiled, like a whip to be used by her when the time was ready.

Now, she sensed nothing but the death they had brought in their wake, the suffering of the survivors—

The sewer walls suddenly seemed closer than they had a moment ago.
Revan slipped a little and the Wookiee put out his arm to steady her and this time, she allowed it. Her fingers closed on his arm. The fur was strangely slick—almost silken.

She glanced up at Grarwbaar. Her neck prickled as she noted at the voder on his neck again. It hung loose, slightly off-kilter.

“Is something wrong, Lord Revan?” The Wookiee’s voice seemed to be coming from the apparatus, even as his lips moved, presumably subvocalizing his words.

“I had always heard Wookiees were quite resistant to chemical and biological attacks.” It wasn’t true. They were a hearty people, but extremely susceptible to environmental toxins—as had been proven when her forces occupied Kessel. “You do look a lot better than I feel.”

“My people are tenacious,” the Wookiee growled in Basic. “Masters of overcoming adversity.”

“I speak Shyriiwook,” she barked back at him. “No need to contort yourself.”

“My men do not speak Shyriiwook,” he growled back. “That is why I use the metal dead thing. So they can understand me.”

“Ah.” She nodded politely, and they lapsed into mutual silence. The other three mercenaries flanked them in the narrow tunnel, too close for strangers. These were Exchange contacts of Polla Organa’s, Revan had been told, but nothing was ever so simple.

Why would mere Exchange thugs invest in the destabilization of an empire that had always allowed them to profit?

“Remind me…” she murmured, trusting in the Wookiee’s keen hearing. “What were you promised for offering us aid?”

“Open trade routes… no inspections on cargo from proscribed planets. Kick-backs for any import taxes imposed.”

That sounded Deralian… but also rather simple. “I assume organized criminal activity gets quite expensive when one has to constantly pay taxes and have shipments inspected.”

“We can discuss this further, Lord Revan, once we reach our destination.”

“That seems advisable.” Unease was keeping her on her feet, at least.

“Did… do you… you sense her too?” Yuthura interrupted. “The amnesiac Revan? In one of those ships? Did she do this?”

I have been trying not to sense her. The first raging screams had subsided, but there was still a… a presence somewhere above them. A gathering darkness. The Fragment had not felt like this before, but perhaps the Sleepers and Tenebrae had twisted her already. Without training, without guidance, she would be vulnerable to fall.

That is what you want me to help, Malak? That twisted malevolence? If he was real, he needed to answer, and if he was not she was already mad.

Yes, her lover—her husband’s voice murmured in Revan’s head. That is what I want you to help, Red. But it’s not what you think.

Explain, she ordered, but he did not. Instead, it felt like his presence… diminish—as if Revan was no longer capable of holding his attention.

I can’t right now.

Convenient. “Those ships are here because of her,” Revan told Yuthura.

Runes scratched in the walls indicated they were not the passage’s first refugees. There was a comfort in that, which reminded Revan of the early days of the war. The tunnel widened so that they could walk three abreast. Revan moved next to Yuthura, pulling away from the Wookiee to do so.

“I’m fine.” She waved off his inquiring growl.

Even if the Fragment had the best of intentions, even if she had come only to rescue her husband and the others—

The Sleepers will not stop unless she commands it from within the Tomb. Did they do this on her orders or as a warning?

“We also need to find one of Tenebrae’s Voices,” Revan added. “Alive. I need to speak with him.”

His last taunts haunted her. He said the Force–eater was dead. Davad Arkan is dead? But if true—

If true, another ally that Revan could use against the Emperor was gone. Just when she needed him most.

If true, she had sent her HK half a galaxy away on a fool’s mission, to demand response from a man already dead.

Xxx

Meetra received the alert in the middle of training exercises.

In the short time she had been in charge of the others’ instruction, Meetra had re–learned what she already knew about Bao–Dur. The Zabrak was an apt pupil, loyal, and capable with both a blaster and a blade. Hanharr and Brianna and Mira, however, were nigh–hopeless, having too much of their old combat training engrained to master even the simplest of Forms. If Meetra possessed the Force it would have been easy to show them; but without it, their bodies were merely numb and clumsy fingers, flopping out of her control.

Live targets, however, helped. They provided the degree of unpredictability her apprentices required. Force–combat, as Meetra knew well, relied upon reactive instinct more than it did upon tedious Jedi drills.

And so, when the perimeter alerts sounded, Meetra had ordered her favorite students to accompany her to investigate the intruder. From time to time, former Blades still did trickle in, despite Darth Nihilus’s final command that they scatter to the far corners of the galaxy.

Most were unsalvageable and insane, anyway. To those, Oerin gave their heart’s desires.

The rest he sent to Meetra, to use as she saw fit. Sorting them was no different than writing the names of the fallen on rocks. As with the rocks, Meetra had favorites. They were the ones she smiled and greeted every day. The rest scattered rootless over the surface of Malachor V—to flourish or perish according to their own will.
Sometimes, when she thought one held promise, Meetra would assign it tasks as pointless as naming the rocks had been, hoping that the effort would fashion it into a better tool.

Sometimes her perspectives went mad or ran away. Sometimes she let them go.

And occasionally, (as in the case of Hanharr the Wookiee), they returned to her stronger, with more potential than they had had before.

Other times... they provided the challenge her prize students sorely needed to fulfill their potential.

But this was no Blade standing in the Trayus Academy antechamber. This was something that looked like a Coruscanti chaperone–droid, as they were euphemistically named. A hunter–killer machine, with a red, triangular–shaped head and glittering red eyes. The thing stood motionless—as it had for an hour now—but then its red eyes whirred and fixed upon the place where Meetra stood motionless too, wearing one of Aratech’s finest stealth belts.

“Declarative Challenge: Show yourself, Meatbag. I can hear you squishing.”

“Oh?” Meetra Surik deactivated her belt and leveled a blaster at the thing’s head. From the shimmer of shields that surrounded it, her efforts might not do much more than serve as a distraction, while Bao and Mira crept up from behind, but the tell–tale shimmers left by stealth technology gave her the vectors of their approach, with Brianna and Hanharr in the wings. Her students were holding back, she noted approvingly, staying out of range of the thing’s sensors.

“Here I am. What are you?”

“Statement: My identity is irrelevant to you, Meatbag. Coercive Request with Implied Threat: I am here to speak to Davad Arkan. Fetch him.”

Meetra was almost amused. “He is dead. How did you find this place?”

“He is incapable of anything. Revan Starfire dropped him and his ship into a sun.”

The droid whirred again, shifting on its metal haunches, and Meetra held up her hand, holding her students back.

“Query: Define parameters: Which Revan Starfire?”

“Isn’t one enough?” Patience stayed her hand. Oerin would want to see this thing before she let her students crisp it to ash.

“Statement: Nothing would warm my circuits more than observing a dozen of my masters laying waste to the galaxy... sadly, only one of her iterations possesses the proper disregard for sentient life to allow me to fulfill my function adequately. Reminiscence: I did try with the Fragment, Balmorran Stranger, but her inner core was always too damp.”

_Balmorran Stranger._ Meetra’s hand traced the star on her cheek. A gift from her father and the rest of his cell, marking an infant as a rebel on that planet for all time. Meetra smiled. “You don't recognize me, droid? I was infamous, once.”

“Regretful Denial: All You Humans Look Alike. Smug Assertion: My master accounted for this. Secondary Master initializing... Master Arren Kae. New Mission Initialized: Meatbag, Take me to Master Arren Kae. She is sometimes known as Vima Sunrider, Jana Novasun——”
“And she isn’t here, either,” Meetra interrupted it. “Where is Revan now? The real one?”

“Evasive Rebuttal: Why should I tell you?”

“Because I have four Force–trained assassins with ion grenades and lightsabers within striking range of your metal shell. I have no doubt you could take two of them apart, but the third would use the moment to incapacitate you. And the fourth would simply chop you to pieces. He's quite fast, for a Wookiee.”

And foolish, too, for Hanharr took that moment to growl, causing the droid to whir, twisting its torso so quickly the motion blurred in her dulled vision——and then the thing froze, encased in a shimmering lock of energy.

“And,” Oerin Lin stepped out of the shadows, appearing in the doorway of the Trayan Academy hall as if he’d been there all along. Perhaps he had. “Is that’s Revan’s droid? Ache–Kay! What are you doing here?”

“Babbling nonsense, brother.” Meetra liked calling Oerin that. After so long alone, she was finding having kin comforting, even a stinking Mandalorian. At least he was already dead, unlike the rest of the ones in the galaxy. What more could she do to punish him for an accident of birth?

“Target Analysis: Partial match on facial and voice recognition but the speaking organic appears to be… debrading and rotting. Observation: No heartbeat. Query: How is Oerin Lin anything other than an immobile pile of putrescent flesh?”

At the moment to Meetra, Oerin looked young and unmarred. All illusion, of course, but it kept Bao and Mira calm, after he erased their nightmares. The others did not care.

“He's not in his body,” she told the machine, (although she owed no droid an explanation). “Oerin exists merely in the Force.”

Meetra had not cared that Oerin was dead, when she first returned to Malachor. She had not cared that she was rid of the Force. She had not missed the screaming from broken and twisted connections, nor the responsibility for those who she influenced upon Revan’s command. But now, surrounded by her siblings and the Force-sensitives her brother had collected, there were times when she felt like the child she had been once, pressing her nose against the window of a Balmorran playground, watching the gated and guarded children within, safe at play with their bomb–sniffers and nanny–droids….

That feeling of exclusion did not go away because her students called her 'Master Surik.' Meetra was the master of nothing.

Her students were still connected to something that she could never again touch.

Even Oerin Lin was connected to the Force. And he was dead.

Meetra Surik’s upbringing had been one of broken glass and refugee camps: early recruitment into a terrorist cell and a father who seemed to regard her as more of a tool for the cause than a child.

When the two Jedi had come for her in the slums of Bugtown, her father had shown no recognition for the woman she now knew had been her biological mother, and quite inappropriate attention to the beautiful Echani Jedi, who paid her more attention. Master Atris had responded to his too—eager efforts with a cold remoteness that Meetra admired, even at the age of eight—winning her loyalty in a heartbeat.

Loyalty now twice betrayed, of course; as by Brianna’s account, Master Atris no longer existed.

“Oh, I am most definitely in this body.” Oerin’s breath gusted out of him with an exaggerated sigh. “You know, I envy Force ghosts. They never have to pick bits of themselves off the floor.”

The droid made a noise as if it had something to add, but Oerin’s shield held it still, silencing its voder.

“Force ghosts don’t exist.” If they did, Meetra suspected she herself would have gone mad long ago. “How did you find us, droid?” She gestured at Oerin to release the thing’s vocabulator and her brother did so.

“Statement: I was sent to find my new master. Sneering Rebuttal: I do not need to tell you more than that, Meatbag.”

“Well… Mother's on Telos,” her brother told the assassin droid. “The last we saw her. Oh, and there are two of her. Just like the revans.” His illusion slipped and for a moment his smirk was a death’s head, teeth glimpsed through a rotting jaw, nose worn back to the skull. Behind Meetra she heard Mira mutter a curse in Mandalorian, but for once the woman didn’t scream. “Unless one has killed the other, which seems inevitable, really. But if you see Mical Jorde, send him our regards. I think Brianna misses him, although she is far too proud to say so. Tell him he’s welcome here… in fact... tell him we’re rebuilding the Jedi Order.” He chuckled. “Or the Sith Order? One or the other… we are… we are creating. Order.”

Her ruined face turned in Meetra’s direction. “Isn’t that right, sister? What we are creating is order?”

By this time, she had grown used to his teasing and didn’t bother to answer him.

“There are really two Revans?” Meetra asked the droid. It had to be some kind of joke. A jape as Malak used to say in the dining hall—and then Meetra and Tillie Shan would kick each other under the table and giggle in a way unbecoming of two promising padawans—as Sheris Loran always blushed. “That isn’t a ja—a joke?”

“It hurts when I laugh. I know the nerves are dead, but it still hurts.” Her brother shook his head. “No. Didn’t I tell you before, Meetra? Two revans. Although perhaps one is dead now. One used to be Sheris Darkstar—”

“Loran.” Meetra had always hated that silly name. Darkstar. It was too close to Starfire.

Behind them, her students had popped out of stealth and were standing in a line. Brianna’s head turned back to Bao–Dur and he shook his head. She could not hear what they were saying at this distance, but the intent was clear.

Now is not the time for gossip. Meetra raised her hand to her lips, shaking her head and they all quieted attentively.

Good. She smiled at them. Mira and Bao smiled back immediately. Hanhaar’s expression was difficult to read. Brianna looked restive. They would need another chat.

“Her name was Sheris Loran,” Meetra repeated, to Oerin. “Not Darkstar. And I don’t believe you. Sheris isn't Revan. She never could be.”
“Ah.” Oerin shrugged. “Why would I lie?”

“Because—you… you always liked her!”

He coughed, a rattling sound deep in his chest. “Wait. Liked who? Liked which?”

“Revan. Why? Who else would I mean—Mother?” Meetra turned her head to address the droid again—Revan’s assassin droid from the Star Forge mission—but the thing had vanished.

“It’s gone,” Bao stepped forward and came to her. He looked at Oerin and swallowed, blinking, before turning to Meetra again. “My remote was tracking its energy signature—masked pretty well, but it couldn’t hide its tracks. See?”

The round droid hovered, shining a light on the Academy floor. In the fluorescent, the displacement of dust was quite plain: one set of tracks going in and another departing.

“Make sure it leaves the planet,” Meetra ordered. “In pieces if you can. Whole if you cannot. Just… make sure it leaves.”

Her students could use the challenge and she was tired of the droid’s lies.

Xxx

“Here we are!” Mydia Blais sounded irrationally cheerful. “Told you I knew the way!” Her head turned toward vacant space and she scowled at it. “See, Grandmother? I brought her. Just like you wanted.”

Revan ignored her, pressing forward through the open blast doors that someone had installed in the sewer wall. Beyond that, stretched a dimly-lit chamber, illuminated by glow-bulbs and lined with Sith statuary, typical of the Kallig Age. The walls were uncracked, and the air held a faint breeze that spoke to some kind of ventilation system. That was good and bad, she surmised. Good, in that they would not suffocate. Bad because its fans would bring in contamination from the surface.

“Kolto,” she commanded the Blais girl. Somewhere behind her, the woman with a baby moaned softly, and the babe gave a mewling cry. “Water. Anti-rads, if you have them. Show me your supplies.”

“Hold your hessi,” the girl said. “Hey, do you know what hessi are? That slave of ours always used to say that.”

“They’re like nexu.” Revan imagined they were, at least. Polla. Polla had drawn one in the dust for Revan when they were imprisoned together. She had a twinge of conscience for not thinking of the smuggler—last glimpsed with her husband, fleeing after Zaalbar. “Once we’ve established our camp we will begin sweeps for survivors. Is there another exit to the surface?”

“Grandmother says the other wall collapsed,” Mydia pouted, going to the wall on the far end of the room and pressing a series of stones until a door swung open. Inside, more supplies than Revan had dared hope for—some crates even stamped as Republic war-salvage. A deactivated medical droid was even propped in one corner.

Years ago, Revan had established supply chains to bring in pharmaceuticals and medical supplies that were usually lacking on Sith worlds. It appeared the Blais family had been hoarding them all this time.

“Is this enough? I think there’s another cache farther down, but the lock on that one always “Mydia Blais seemed as eager to please as a kath pup. “It will do.” Revan was already popping open a crate and laying out decontamination shots. The babe would be difficult to dose correctly… she gestured to the weeping woman to come forward.

“Your daughter’s going to be fine,” she murmured, soothing. “Do you know about how much she weighs?”

XXX

“Padawan Jorde? Are you calling about the news on the holo-net? We saw the footage about Revan bombing the Outer Rim already. But you realize, your timing is terrible, old friend!” Master Loanin chided Mical as if he was still the man's padawan and they were still living in the Temple. “Even if the galaxy is falling apart, it's still our wedding night?”

Behind the man, Lydie Loanin was a dark-haired blur, half out of focus, but the oval of her face turned in Mical’s direction too.

“Apologies, but I received your data-charts. The latest vectors of the Jedi Plague?” The name was a misnomer, but Mical had no need to make a better one, and Loanin, for all of his knowledge, would not recognize the Rakatan term for the ancient scourge. Isska’tok’ilistrwwe, as it was known; which translated, roughly, into 'Empire-killer.’ “My agents further compiled the data from five other Core planets for us. Look at the time-lapsed rates of infection.”

Azen Loanin was a scientist before he was a Jedi or a senator, and he, after all, had been the one to seek Mical’s advice. His head turned. “Lydie, if you could, retrieve the portable holo-player—”

“Of course.” When the Zabrak woman rose, she came into focus. Her hair was loose around her shoulders. She was also visibly pregnant.

“You solved the antigen problem!” Perhaps there was a part of Mical that was still purely a scientist, too.

“Apparently.” His former master glanced back to his wife, and then smiled tightly at Mical again.

“Congratulations,” Mical told them, for it was customary, even among errant Jedi. And perhaps the child would keep them away from the rest of the Jedi, which would be… wise.

It occurred to him then that perhaps now was the time to send a warning, but such an action would pit him against Mother directly——and Darth Traya had not yet left to join the fleet.

Mother had allowed Mical access to her archives: where the minds of dozens of Jedi masters had been catalogued, fragments of their holocrons preserved in an order she claimed would lead to further clarity. It was a great gift, but if the woman who had once been Master Atris (who now called herself Darth Traya) thought that Mical would reach the same conclusions she had….

How can you know if you will or not? His own mind mocked him. Deliberate ignorance makes a willing fool, and yet—

Mical had not sampled more than a few fragments of memory, before coming to the conclusion that more knowledge did not always lead to enlightenment.

How can you stand by and do nothing while Darth Traya destroys the Order? Master Atris and I had a vision to rebuild, to make a better Jedi Order. Darth Traya believes that can only happen from the ashes.

But she may be right, and if she is—

Do no harm. It was one of the first tenets a Jedi was taught. Mical sometimes thought of an addendum. Undo any harm. Fix things.

“... patterns of infection? You were saying?” Loanin looked as if he had repeated himself more than once. He was scrolling through the illuminated columns of data, tapping the projector’s gear to advance. “Mical? Are you still there?”

“Yes, of course.” Mical cleared his throat. “In the last three standard months, infection rates dropped to zero around the med–centers. Even on Remiad, where the vaccine was never distributed and the Jedi Plague well–established previously… they still fall.”

“I see that.” Loanin nodded. “Most curious.”

Furthermore, cases of comorbidity have vanished. On Plexis, an outbreak of bacterial menaphagis was treated concurrently with one reported instance of the Jedi Plague three months ago in a remote mountain village. Not only did the primary plague victim recover, but none of the menaphagis patients reported secondary infections. They were all housed in one ward. Statistically, some of them should have contracted the virus, unless— “

“Unless something is blocking the virus’s transmission that didn’t exist before,” the Zabrak spoke up, from behind her husband. “Or, were all of those patients were inoculated with the vaccine...?”

“No. Juveniles from an impoverished area. It is unlikely that any of them were ever offworld. And the vaccine was never officially shipped to Plexis. Despite its Core location, the system is a backwater.” Mical nodded at her to show his approval for her insight.

Next to her, Loanin was frowning. “Perhaps the Sith have found a way to replicate the immunity found in some species—”

“If so, their distribution networks in Republic space are more extensive than we thought.” Mical forced himself to chuckle dryly.

It was a good reason to let Darth Traya continue with her plans, unfortunately.

If the only way to stamp evil out is scorched skies, then we must burn the ground Vitiate can stand on. The danger of him infiltrating the Jedi is great enough that perhaps her solution is the only way to be sure.

And perhaps not. If she failed, it would be up to Mical.

“Something has stopped the Jedi Plague in Republic space,” Loanin mused. “In its tracks. I will see if House Racharn can provide me with the recent medical data from—”

“Lydie–lu!” A voice from off–cam interrupted. Feminine. Iridonian. An older version of Padawan Korr appeared behind the woman, stouter, shabbily dressed. “The news–cams! There’s another report! Nar Shaddaa this time! You’ll want to see this!”

“Ma?” Lydie turned. “In a moment—“
“Mical...?” Her voice behind him. Mical cut the comm–link immediately, although, of course, she would have seen them.

Their eyes met, and the woman who had once been Atris strode to the comm–bank and pulled up the screen, revealing galactic alerts flashing red. “Good work locating more of our errant Jedi,” she said, in a tone so glacial that Mical was at a loss to know if her words were sincere or if she suspected his treachery.

“Have you packed?” He afforded her a thin smile and wondered if they should exchange a more intimate farewell. Did mothers and sons hug? Would a kiss on the cheek be appropriate?

“I’m sure the Fleet will have what I need. The Admiral has given me a rendezvous point with one of their corvettes. A storm is coming, and I need to take the shuttle now while the sky is clear.”

“Would you like me to pilot—”

“Drien has kindly offered,” his mother said. “The handmaidens have agreed to see me safely to the Fleet. I may take Lileen with me. It could be quite educational for her.”

If there was a snub there, Mical could be gracious enough to ignore it. “You refer to them as handmaidens?” He let himself smile. “Atris’s name for them. I thought you hated it.”

“Here.” His mother ignored that and deposited a fabric–wrapped bundle on his desk. “This holocron contains most of what you may find useful, should I fail. Vima Sunrider’s life. Most of Nomi Sunrider’s. Select memories of Revan’s—the ones I could salvage—curated quite carefully.” Her mouth twitched. “There is enough of a remove that you will not lose yourself. These are recordings, not essences. You could even ask them questions—the ones you dare not ask me.”

“Thank you.” If she was not lying, it was a great gift. But Mical remembered how Atris herself had been tricked and knew himself prone to the same temptations. “The… plague,” he offered, before he could stop himself. “Master Loanin thinks something is blocking it. Not just herd immunity. Infection rates are falling into a black hole—even on planets that never had immunization programs.”

Traya looked startled. “You think Vitiate has some way of countering the Rakatan virus—?”

“It is possible.”

She nodded slowly. “Then I do what I must.”

The door had barely closed behind her before Mical reached for the fabric–wrapped holocron, unwrapping it carefully, so as not to touch the crystal within. The device lit anyway, opening like a star—

XXX

“A sword has two edges,” Tenebrae chuckled with Malak’s rotting mouth. “The Sleepers are your weapon, Revan—to be wielded with the same purpose as your Star–Forged ships. But if your hand slips—if you deviate from our bargain—”

Bargain? Oh, Mal. Revan looked at her possessed husband, choking back despair. Malachi could have learned things about extortion from Tenebrae. Perhaps he had. “I don’t need the Sleepers,” she said. “Any weapon is only as powerful as the one who uses it—or chooses not to.”

Here, on the sands of Medriaas, Revan could feel them sleeping, coiled like snakes in the back of her mind. The location of the ships themselves was unknown. Her scouts had found no trace of a secret Imperial base anywhere in the sector. They were both here—and not: hundreds of them. Perhaps thousands. Somewhere, dormant—connected to her mind like a coiled leash—

XXX

Mical drew back with a gasp.

I am... I—

I am still myself. His masculine hand on the table was a welcome reassurance. The holocron glittered, malevolent and ancient, like voices whispering—

“No.” With effort, he stood up, waving a trembling hand until the fabric reassembled over the crystal. “I am not you, Mother. I will forge a different path.”

It took some minutes to collect his thoughts. Then, Mical reached for the comm-link again, reopening the channel to Azen Loanin’s private line.

“Is something wrong?” his former master asked, picking up immediately. “We were disconnected.”

“No.” There would be time to deliberate on how much to reveal to the man later. Right now, Mical needed the sharp acuity of his mentor’s intellect unfettered. “Just a minor interruption. You said before, the rates of infection dropped around med-centers. Is there something in common with the type of medical center? The kind of illness or injury treated?”

“None that I can see... but we should check for a common node in their distribution chains—perhaps something traceable to the Empire or its agents?” Azen raised an eyebrow.

“Yes.” Mical smiled back. “That was my thought as well.”

Xxx

The troch shuttle was poorly–designed, Millifar Ordo observed, even if it did have dual thrusters in its forward engine. Those thrusters were enough to propel it quickly between Ekkumi’s cruiser and the dreadnaught before them—even if they would be useless doing any real maneuvers in the heat of combat.

“What did your people make this hull out of?” she complained to Lieutenant Abrad. “Plimsifast? One direct hit and we'd be done for.”

The Besalisk snorted. “Fibra-core.”

“That's exceedingly foolish!” How had these people vanquished the clans? It seemed increasingly clear to Millifar clear that Revan and Malak had done everything that had caused the Republic to win that war.

“We had shortages for a few years during the war. Mandalorians kept raiding our supply lines.”

“You should have protected them.” She peered out of the viewscreen that was probably glued on with a layer of silicaulk and Sullustan tears. In front of them, the gray hull of the Republic flagship Great Hunt opened its maw like a hungry krayt.

Abrad chuckled. “How old are you, kid?”
“I forget the calculation in Coruscanti Standard.” It wasn’t true, but she didn't need another member of their barbarian crew chiding her about her age. “But I am fully blooded—in men's and women's ways.”

“Well, you're not blooded in our ways. That escape attempt—even if you'd managed to get the snub out of the hangar—our auto-cannon would’ve fried you before you cleared our wake! And Pina-ha isn't gonna forget that black eye you gave him. Kid's nearly as vain as you are dumb.”

“You left me my boots,” she muttered. “What did you expect?” Would the clan be singing her death songs now? Would Mekel Jin speak for her at the battle circle?

“Oh, I expected it, kid.” He laughed. “Not sure Rew did. She's more of a trusting sort.”

“I need to return to my people.” Millifar was trying not to fidget in the itchy coverall they'd provided her after foiling her escape. They'd taken the boots too, and with them, the two ambi-heft multi-tools that Father had given her when she got her first braids. Only a troch would be sentimental about beskar and kit—a Mando’ade could not afford to be. But still, Millifar missed those multi-tools. It would be hard to get new ones.

The shuttle docked and Millifar permitted them to lead her off of it, her hands in front of her banded by restraints befitting a prisoner of war.

She would have expected the woman to be surrounded by the adoring retinue that Republic war leaders seemed to require just to breathe, but High Admiral Aridoma Rensha, the Leader of the Republic Fleet, stood alone in the vast hangar.

“High Admiral?” Rew froze near the bottom of the ramp. From the tone of her voice Admiral Ekkumi was startled to see her leader alone, too.

“Rear Admiral Ekkumi.” The Trandoshan nodded but her attention was fixed on Millifar. “And this is the Ordo child, here in person—”

“I am no child!”

“The Ordo warrior,” Lieutenant Abrad corrected. Millifar glanced at him, startled, and his two upper forearms jerked a sign of encouragement back at her. “Millifar of Clan Ordo.”

“So Revan is her—”

“She is my father’s Third Wife.” Millifar folded her arms. “What of it?”

“You were aboard her flagship? The Imperial Aleema?”

“Yes.” Millifar frowned. “My father’s ship. We spoke of this already over your comm. Why?”

“Why?” The Trandoshan admiral’s lips pulled back in a snarl. Her tongue made a hissing noise. “Didn’t you tell her?”

“No,” Admiral Ekkumi said. “I did not.”

Millifar glanced at the Besalisk for clarification, the sinking feeling beginning in her chest. It was childish, but she thought suddenly of how much they had worked to bring the ship to capacity, how proud her father had been—

“Did they die well?” Rhetorical question. Of course they would have. But she would have to know how to sing—

“Did they die at all?” Rensha barked. “Do you know? And was Revan with them?”

“Yes,” Millifar said numbly. Now perhaps it scarcely mattered. “She was. Who killed them? Was it that troch emperor or Oerin of Lin—”

The Trandoshan made the barking noise again. “No! Revan isn't dead,” she growled. “She seems to have conquered Dromund Kaas, Ziost and Thule. And Sith attacks are reported on Nar Shaddaa, Hoth and Onderon.”

Millifar laughed, because that was patently absurd. “Attacking so many planets at once would be a terrible strategy. The Third Wife of Ordo can be impatient, but she would never do that! My father is Mand’alor and he would never allow it!”

Admiral Rensha nodded. “Perhaps.” Those teeth bared again. “Or, perhaps there is another explanation? That is why I need you to open a channel to Revan for me. Immediately.”

Millifar nodded, suddenly no longer interested in merely winning back her freedom. “If that will clear the clans from your claim of lies, it will be an honor.”

Xxx

“Stop,” Valkorion whispered from a hundred dying throats. He almost felt sorry for the poor, mortal creatures. Sorrier still for himself, who had to feel their pain—each one winking out like lights on a grid.

Where was he? At the moment, Valkorion was——spitting out a mouthful of sand on a blasted beach, perishing in slow, indescribable agony from his burns.

—passing customs clearance at an unnamed spaceport. “Deralia?” The official said. “What in the stars are you going to do there?” “Rescue an orphan boy,” his woman’s voice said. What was her name, it was so hard to concentrate, to be in the ONE body, when so many others were screaming—

—huddled in an Iziz alley, watching as ships burned the sky, taking his last, tortured breath—

—huddled in a tank on Nar Shaddaa, watching the poison air seep in through cracked ferraglass. A slow ending, suffocation—

—pinned in the rubble on Kaas. A cool hand on his forehead, luminous green eyes staring back into his. “I’m afraid I can’t save you,” the copy said, grimly. “Your belly’s crushed.” Her hand closed in a fist, but there was no pain—somehow—

She took away the pain.

“Wait!” He tried to call out to her. Did she know it was he? Had she seen his eyes gleaming in the darkening of the light?

But! Lights on a grid, only that.

Which had been the one who’d described it so?

He thought it had been the girl, the one who mounted the sun. Clever girl, but so naive. Not like his Starfire. His Starfire had kept her clever thoughts to herself. Never reaching, never sharing, never letting him fully see—

Then, the Sunrider had lost her spark. Vanished entirely one day. Dead, probably.

He’d had such hopes that Revan would be different! She matched the pattern more perfectly than all the rest. But… perhaps they never were. Perhaps, this too was part of the cycle the ancients had wrought. A… quest for perfection. The seeking. This hope. Oh, but the Starfire had given him hope. Now, fear was a clumsy tool, but ah… hope. Hope gave power enough to reignite a dying empire—before its betrayal. But even that, expected. Nothing new. A cycle as old as the stars themselves, perhaps. She betrayed him. They always did.

In the end, Kaas was just another dying planet. If they ended now, the Sleepers would remake the worlds, perhaps make better ones.

A part of Valkorion even accepted that, but oh—

“—hope,” he choked.

He was lying on the ground. Blood—taste of copper in his mouth. The air smelled musty and old, like a cave. Above, something rumbled and shook and the shadow bending over him had young eyes, possibly even Human. Wide and brown. A long nose. A boy’s face. “Uh, Zepth? You okay?” Valkorion’s mind reached and grasped into the Zabrak’s for the familiar. Faces were so hard, but voices….

“Didn’t.. did she just kill me?” Valkorion blinked. “Was that this body?”

The boy is Blais. House Blais. One of their boys, then. Long–noses. Nereal, or Rhea or the other one—“End him.” A new voice! The words were growled, the language barbaric. Animal sounds. Shyriiwook, of course, its syntax so similar to Ancient Sith. Same root of origin.

If the Rakata returned today, would we greet our creators as gods? Or invaders? Curse their sithspawned Eternal Fleet, curse the Sleepers they tricked me into making—

One of the Sleeper–ships had been his own father, once, and the boy he had been, that sad bastard child, had hated his father.

The Blais son bit his lip, worrying it like an animal. “Lord Revan said no killing, Zaalbar, remember? Her last orders. She said, we needed to keep some of the Voices alive. He’s not badly hurt. We might need him.”

“Sheris Revan is madclaw. Phylus–cub. False.” The Wookiee’s voice was a low whine. “I wish the gods would deliver us from this place, but we must not be prey and die in this trap. He is our prey, and his throat is open. He is madclaw. It would be a kindness to make an end to him. I am fond of the Zepth–cub too, but he was always cursed—and now he is dying.”

“No! He’s helpless! And Lord Revan said—”

“Lord… Revan… Hah!” Valkorion felt his throat open, his mouth choke out the words. Above in the skies, that was the sound. Her scream, like a glorious herald in the Force. “Oh! Truly! She’s here. Finally!”

The Wookiee growled at the sky. “Ships,” he barked. “We must find the others.” He held a sharp knife in one of his huge claws. Valkorion braced himself for the end—

But then the Wookiee’s clawed hand shoved the knife into his bandolier and picked Zepth’s body up, slinging him over the beast’s shoulders instead. The movement hurt his head and blackness came, and with it, the stars….

—somewhere he was laughing. Laughing with hope, for in this moment of darkness, she was finally here.

My Starfire. My Sith’ae’rah. My dau—

XXX

From space, Revan thought Dromund Kaas didn't look familiar, but a quarter of it was covered in glowing red craters. The rest was a swirl of cloud cover, dark and hazy where the bombers had landed.

“Oh no,” Carth’s arms tightened around her again, as if Revan was the invalid and not him. His arms were sweaty and his skin felt too hot against hers as they stood on the Aleema’s bridge before the wall of unblemished ferraglass, to the right of a heavily–patched place in her hull where Malak’s bombardment had nearly killed her.

Lined between them and the planet ran a row of wedge–shaped ships, with more popping out of hyperspace every instant, all of them arrayed so precisely they could have been on an assembly grid.

“I dreamed they were bombing Coruscant—or going to bomb Coruscant,” Revan said. “And Nar. Other places, too. Onderon, I think.” Its familiarity had been an echo, like a ghost nudging the back of her mind. “I dreamed they were going to bomb Tel—” her voice broke off, for remembering that made her remember the rest. The sick sense of approval as the fleet fulfilled its function—up until the jarring moment when they’d approached Carth’s homeworld and it abruptly occurred to her that this might not be just an idle dream, a memory of wars already fought and won.

“Onderon?” Canderous let go with a string of curses at the same moment Aemelie did. “We got a few reports before the widebeam cut out. Sightings on a few planets. Ziost. Nar Shaddaa. Casualties, too.”

“I–I told them to stop. I don't think they made it to Coruscant.” I told them to stop. Go away, Revan told them now. Go back to sleep, or hell, or wherever you go. She heard her laugh, ragged like it didn’t belong to her. “I… I think I was there. With them.”

The ships did not answer her. And Canderous frowned as his wife traced a symbol in the air that meant stars–touched in Mando’ade. Stars–touched. Crazy. She thinks I’m mad.

“Coruscant?” Carth coughed. “That’s… that’s not possible. How could they get there? It would take weeks! Even Nar Shaddaa seems like a stretch. They’d have to have planned this—”

“No, they… they just jumped and then they were there. Or—or they want me to know that they could just jump there.” That was significant. That was impossible. Revan’s smuggler’s memories tangled in lines of hyperspace jump points. Even if the Sleepers took the Joker’s Run through Hutt Space after Biscain, even if they had some kind of infinite fuel… there’s no fracking way that could be possible for them to traverse the galaxy so fast—

“Our outgoing and incoming comms are all jammed. They must’ve taken out the satellites on Kaas.” It took a lot to make Canderous sound this angry. “Kids are trying to get short–range running, at least.’

Dustil cleared his throat and pointed at a smaller ship now moving between two carriers. “Uh… Dad, isn’t that the Hawk?”

“Yes, it—” Carth’s voice broke off. “It is! Can we hail? There might be survivors onboard.”

“Short range communications?” Aemelie sighed. “We’ve rebooted the transmitters. I suppose we can try.”

“Yeah.” Canderous launched into technical explanations of what had gone wrong with their communications array, but Revan was still staring at the Hawk, hovering outside their viewing window like a real bird trying to get to its nest. Someone had painted it blue.

There might be survivors, Carth had said.

“There are no survivors,” she told them all. “Not on that ship. It’s unmanned. Just like all the rest.” Revan shivered because in the Force the Ebon Hawk felt no different from all the others surrounding them. Empty. And dead.

And still, somehow, an echo in the Force.

Canderous’s comm pinged. He glanced back at the group of kids by the communications board, raising the volume on his helm to call out. “What is it, Caldera?”

The Mandalorian’s voice rang across the bridge’s speakers. “The Ebon Hawk is hailing us, General Ordo. Mission Vao says she wants to talk to Polla Revan.”

XXX

“Poodoo, kriffing Revan!” Mission sighed with her circular processors, waving the ends of the Hawk’s body to try and get the attention of the organic lumps she could see clear as day in this giant ship Aleema’s bridge viewport. Carth, Canderous, Sithboy, Mekel Jin, Canderous’s Second Wife, and… Polla Revan, all gaping back at her. Not even waving. In the weird space light, Polla Revan’s hair looked brown. There were streaks of something dark on her face, too. And she was wearing a robe that looked even more like a bathrobe than what Jedi usually wore.

{{That is the Unit Starfire. Bring her to the installation}} the lead ship whispered, echoed by Kaas. The Kaas computer got on great with the murder–fleet who were all lined up now like they hadn’t just been burning multiple planets. And… for that matter, waitaminute. How had they all gotten back here so fast? Hyperdrive was quick and all, but even Mission had to get from one jump point to the next the old–fashioned sub–light way, even when she didn’t have passengers to worry about not crushing with acceleration.

[“Not that simple. Cool your jets.”] Mission scrambled her circuits trying to think of a good excuse. [“I’m not even sure that’s really her. Do you know how many fake Revans there are these days? Hundreds!”]

[{{Interface was achieved}} This time, the voice came from all of the ships at once. If Mission had a head, it would be ringing.

[“I’m not bringing her anywhere until you tell me where Big Z is!”] {{Irrelevant}}}

Try as she might, Mission couldn’t get a link back to her T3 body. She wanted to think that was because Big Z had taken it deep underground, and not blown himself to smithereens and space dust in the fight. The surface of Kaas looked bad, and the chatter from the widebeam (before the murder fleet took out the sats) was even more nuts. Planets bombed everywhere.

A total mess and waste of perfectly decent organics—not to mention their totally successful revolution.

“Blue?” A part of her had been hailing the Aleema now for twenty minutes (and pretty much given up) when a voice broke in over her open channel. Male. Not Revan. Kinda young.

“Sithboy?” Only two sents had ever called her ‘Blue.’ For a second, her processors forgot which one he was. But Dustil was still in the viewport glaring with his arms folded and so that left—“Mekel Jin? Hey! Was that you on Biscain? What really happened to the sun there?”

“Uh, it… I don’t know. You… what’s going on? The widebeam’s gone, but there’s reports of attacks all over the Rim.”

“Nuts, right? I told Kaas to stay out of this. Hey. Can you put Revan on? Please?”

“Are you… the readouts say there’s no one on the Hawk. Are you alone?”

Mission had never felt more alone. Not since she'd been back. “Course I’m alone! What, you think this is some kind of a trap?”

{{Bring her to the installation, little sister}}

“No, I… I just meant—did anyone else make it out? Telos said Ban was there too.”

“I bet somebody made it. There’s caves? And Big Z had my T3 body. Maybe they’re okay down there—”

{{Bring her}}

{{“Get chuffed, sleemo!”}}

“Can’t you see me with your sensors? Course I’m still here.” She was broadcasting a holographic image of her old Twi’lek body, plain as day. “Hey! Tell Revan to stop glaring at me and pick up her comm. Or… just open a hangar bay door, okay? Easier to catch up without this creepazoid fleet hanging around.”

“Mekk. What are you doing?”

“Talking to Mission. She’s not sure about survivors, but she says there are caves—”

“She’s a computer, asshat. She’ll say anything she’s programmed to say.” That was her old Sithboy all right. Still pissed and still ignoring her.

She’d show him.

“Hey, Dustil? I’m programmed to say congratulations on knocking up that Sith girl. Last time I saw her she was still breathing so you might be a dad soon.” And Carth a grandfather. If things weren’t so fraught, Mission would feel a little sentimental.

Her auditory sensors registered an abrupt silence from the Aleema’s interior bridge, followed by furious whispers on the comm banks.

“Mydia?” That was Carth. “Son, I thought you were using contras!”

“Congratulations.” Polla Revan. Voice flat as if she didn’t mean it. Distracted. She’d disappeared from the viewport now, which was kind of smart considering she was standing right next to the place where Malak’s cannons had nearly taken her out. They’d patched it badly. Mission hoped if her hull was damaged they got someone with more finesse than a Mandalorian to do the bodywork—

{{Bring her!}}

[“No!”] Mission’s plan was still in the formulation stage, but she was thinking, lure Polla Revan aboard the Hawk, jump to hyperspace… and then ditch her somewheres way off the beaten track. Maybe in the Defalli Rim. Then, come back here for her chassis and Big Z and anybody else that still survived.

{{—to the installation. Bring her—}}

If only the ships would stop yelling. If she had an organic head, they would be frying neurons with all the shouting.

“How far along is she? The odds of miscarriage on a planet with that much radiation—” That voice was Mandalorian–accented, still gossiping about that Sith skank Dustil had knocked up. Not one of Canderous’s wives, but one of the other women. Likida, or Thomasine. She’d met them all when she’d been a droid back on Coruscant—.

“…dependent on where she was at the blast point, wind vectors… previous medical conditions….”

“Mission?” That was Jin. He actually sounded worried for her. “Are you okay? Why… why aren’t those ships shooting at you?”

“We’re friends. Kinda. Hey… why… why are you guys here, anyways?”

“I’ll take it from here, Mekel.” Polla Revan’s voice. Tense.

{{Bring her to the installation, little sister}}

[“No!”]

“Mission?” The signals emanating from the Aleema resolved into Polla Revan’s face on her boards, even if the woman didn’t appear in the window again. “Mission, there’s no life reading from the Hawk. Did everyone… did you evacuate alone?”

“Signal got cut to my body—I mean the T3 body. Big Z was carrying me.” He could be dead and he’d never even let her make a backup. Her body could be fried too, and she’d just gotten the flamethrower calibrated right so that it didn’t burn fuel inefficiently.

“I–I thought I heard you. Before… with the others.” Polla Revan was sounding really confused. Mission wished she had a way of warning her that wasn’t just gonna make the ghost–ships louder.
Oh, and there was Kaas itself, chiming in like a big bully.

Every language in the universe had a rude way to tell sents to stuff their hole, or their sack, or their airbag or whatever. Mission started cycling through.

The ship–minds retreated slightly as if they were taken aback.

“Oh, yeah? No problem, sis!” What else could she say with Kaas and the murder–fleet right here?

Quickly, Mission ran a few thousand scenarios involving Polla Revan landing on Kaas (or her shuttle failing to land due to unexplained mechanical failure), where maybe she didn’t end up as a part to fix the stupid Kaas computer’s sentient matrix. There were lots of ways that could happen, really. Polla Revan’s death, of course. But also, maybe if Mission just had the chance to really explain things to her. Maybe then, she’d just leave? They could make a run for it. Sleeper ship assholes wouldn’t stop her. (Even if they might take it out on the sents she left behind.) Not when they needed her alive—and willing—with her special fancy brain pattern all intact. Or maybe Mission could find a way to replicate that pattern in a silicate form Kaas might accept?

It was a Hutt’s pajama mess that the stupid installation had refused to open for Sheris Revan that time. Because from what Mission had seen, she really did the best Revan impression of any of them.

“I’m opening Hangar Bay fifty for you,” Polla Revan added. “Sending coordinates. We… we need to talk. You said Zaalbar had your chassis—can you contact him?”

“It was all going really well.” Yuthura’s plan had worked. “We’d basically overthrown the whole Sith Empire? All we had left was rounding up all the possessed sents and killing them off if we couldn’t repair their programming with the Rakata virus. Then the stupid fleet came in and ruined it.”

“Tenebrae sent them?”

“Not exactly.” Poor Polla Revan. She really didn’t know a thing. “See, there’s this other, secret fleet. They’re called the Sleepers? Those are those guys. Right out there.”

“I—I know. Do you know what they are?”

Assholes is what they are. “Bossy know–it–alls is what they are. I’ll tell you about it as soon as we meet up—”

Or, at least, she’d tell Polla Revan enough to get the gist. Knowledge was, of course, power, and Mission didn’t entirely trust Polla Revan not to use that power to frack things up more.

Maybe she could tell her just enough to make her cut and run—

“Get stuffed,” Mission muttered, trying to cut the connection. It felt funny, like she was poking out her own eyes (if she had eyeballs).

They were in the dark and the air was stifling. They’d been huddled like this for hours and dust clogged her voice, stinging her eyes. The wall was still shaking. Both of them were hoarse from calling for help.

And Polla Organa Wen was pretty sure this was it.

“I'm sorry,” she told Seiran. Again. “Sorry I got us into this mess. Sorry we can’t get out of it.”

“I'm sorry too.” His arms tightened around her and his lips brushed her hair. “Never planned on going down without a fight.”

“Hard to fight a fracking bomb.” They'd studied the Corellian Civil Wars back when they were tweeners but Polla couldn't remember much about what the Coronet City attack. Just that it happened and two million sents died. She wasn't gonna give this bomb the victory of making her cough, but the effort to hold it in made her lungs wheeze anyway. “Think we're taking rads?”

His arms tightened more. “Yeah.”

Some men would have lied. Polla was reminded again how much she loved this man, who would not.

“Well, we aren't dead yet!” Polla forced her voice to be cheerful, to feel luckier than poor Drakkar next to them, who'd bled out under that half-ton of duracrete, his cries for help trailing to nothing in the end. “We made it to the overhang, at least. No flash burns!”

“No flash burns,” her husband agreed. “You know… I… I've got… there's a flask of firewhiskey in my boot.” Scraping noise as he moved his leg. Rubble shifted with it.

“Oh?” Polla forced herself to laugh. “What were you saving it for? Our rescue?” The laugh made her cough more. “If the fracking Imperial Mercy Corps doesn’t roll in here with a case of firewhiskey I’m gonna send them out for some.”

It wasn't fair. They had been almost to the tunnel when the first shocks hit—just a few dozen panicked sents in front of them. And were those guys safe now? Or dead? One of the last things Polla had heard before the ceiling collapse was Zaalbar’s anguished roar. Then the roof came down between them… and then... nothing.

“I can't reach.” Her husband sounded way too calm. “Truth is, I can't feel my leg, either.”

“I've got it.” She reached across, found his knee. Fabric of his pants felt soaked. “Either you pissed yourself or the flask broke.”

“It's transparisteel,” he said. “They make starship viewports outta that stuff. Kinda hard for it to break.”

“Yeah, well. Piss isn't sticky, and firewhiskey is, so—” Polla’s voice broke off as she grabbed hold of the flask. It sloshed as she brought it forward. In the black she couldn't see her hands but she could smell. Blood.

“ You drink first,” she decided, wiggling both sets of toes. She could feel both legs, and the bruises she'd have on her ribs and her ass later, but nothing else hurt. “We're going to be fine.”

“Sure we are.” She felt him swallow when she brought the flask to his lips, then took a swig herself. “Roof seems stable, at least.”

“Don't jinx!” But the rumbling overhead had stopped some time ago. And maybe it wasn’t really the wall shaking now. Maybe it was just her.
“I’m not.” Was his voice weaker? Was the air thinner? “We’re gonna be fine, Pollie. Help’s coming.”

“Glad I married an optimist.” Another swig for each of them.

“I mean it,” he said quietly.

“This a Force thing?” She tried to laugh. “Revan give you Force lessons back on that ship of hers when you were coming to rescue me?”

“Not… no.” His voice was definitely weaker. “Can't hear anything over her screaming, cept a voice, sometimes.”

“Gimme…a … ‘nother drink,” he mumbled. Those arms holding her so tight slackened, and Polla forgot she’d already yelled herself raw—and began to scream again herself.

Xxx
“Bloody hell,” Carth whispered, while Revan stared numbly at the burning planet beneath them.

Carth hovered at her side and around them the Mando’ade buzzed with the activity of a Killick hive. Orders and coordinates flashed before Revan’s eyes and she adjusted them without speaking, tracing the runes on the armrest of her chair to adjust the positions of their incoming fleet.

Present: forty degrees aft our position, move into the lower orbit.

Do not engage the 528 identical ships in synchronous orbit.

“Sis? We really need to talk.”

“I can’t right now, Mission.”

The Ebon Hawk now resided in their armored hangar bay, the one reserved for bomber squads with extra hull plating—just in case—and the computer’s version of Mission was blasting through the Aleema’s bridge.

“C’mon Polla Revan! It’s important!”

The cheery tone only set Revan more on edge.

The remains of the Mandalorian fleet—and the manned Sith ships under Carth’s command that followed them now—straggled out of hyperspace one–by–one; each battered ship popping into a defensive orbit as tightly as if they’d been in this position before.

Perhaps they had… but Revan didn’t like their default formation. So close together. If those Sleepers turned on us now, a direct hit on one of our ships would take out the rest—

“Sure you don’t need to go the medix?” Carth moved between Revan and the Aleema’s viewport, abruptly blocking her view.

“Not now.” There had been a shocking amount of blood from her nose when she’d had the seizures but Revan felt perfectly fine now. Physically, at least. And Sinae had ran a quick scan just to make sure. “But if I need another old woman killed, I’ll let you know.”

“Ouch,” her husband muttered.

“I think I should take you down to the planet myself, you know, sis?” Mission’s voice chimed in, all—too—brightly. “You and I need to talk. Then we can all look for survivors. Maybe Big Z made it out okay? Sheris Revan gave everyone the order to run and he grabbed my T3 body. Big Z knows all the tunnels. He’s been working with the resistance for ages!”

“Sheris Revan?” With as much affection as Revan felt for Zaalbar, there was only one name that mattered in that sentence. “Carth said she was in a coma.”
“Yeah, but she woke up!” Mission launched into a story about how Polla Organa and Yuthura Ban had worked with the slaves at Kaas City to stage a revolt. Carth had mentioned this before: some insane scheme to vaccinate their allies and spread the Jedi plague through the Sith Empire—

“... but our supply chain got messed up? The factories on Manaan got sabotaged and this outfit out of Nar Shaddaa was hoarding the remaining vials, so we’d only, like, vaccinated half the slaves, and that Nar Shaddaa sleemo Goto took all of my credits—”

Her words blurred into the nonsensical and Revan resisted the urge to rub her temples. “Go back to the rebellion. You’re saying Polla Organa organized it?”

“Yeah. Her and Yuthura and Big Z. Things sure kicked off when Polla Polla released the plague and all the Sith started dying!”

“But she wouldn’t do that.” Maybe, Polla—she released the plague because Dar'Revan tricked her into doing it? Carth had also said Polla released the virus, but that couldn't be right—

“HK helped. I guess, technically, it was really him. See, she sent him to Carth with this infected blaster....”

“That makes a lot more sense. Carth said that before, too.” The last time Revan had seen her old assassin droid it had been in the pieces she’d chopped it into, but of course Dar would have reassembled it—

_I was right about her all along. She has to die._

Red. No.

The intruding voice was alien. Metallic. Familiar.

_Get out of my head,_ she warned Malak's ghost.

“Polla didn't mean to hurt anyone—she was just trying to help me.” Carth's protest was a little too fervent for Revan's taste.

“Help you by accidentally infecting the entire planet?” Revan's smile felt like acid. “How sweet of her.” _No doubt she was compromised. Dar could have used Force persuasion or some kind of trick—_

Red. Sheris's body wasn't even conscious when the Deralian—

_Go back to hell, monster_. The Force flared around Revan like a wall—and she felt Malak's presence dissipate as quickly as if she'd shoved another lightsaber through him.

“Is your Third Wife having another fit, husband?”

“Whoa. What the hell was that? Dad, she just—”

“General Revan! Stop sending my husband's ship out of orbit!”

“Republic, is she okay?”

“Sis, the Awakened Ones want you to keep it down. They said you're too loud.”

Revan blinked. For a moment, the ship had been… gone. All of them had been gone, vanishing into
And Revan had been... everywhere. Nowhere. Nothing. Everything— She looked down at her hands. They were glowing.

"Revan?" A hand clasped over hers, covering the light. Broad and square with a spacer’s tan. A face looking down at her. Hair too short, beard too long, but familiar. Safe. Creases at the edges of his eyes.

Carth.

"Hey. Freckles. Come back."

Revan blinked. "I—I’m fine."

Everyone on the bridge was staring. Dustil’s hand was on his saber—who the hell trusted that kid with a saber? He made her hackles rise. Revan remembered that trick Dar had done with Revan's lightsaber crystal, and reached out to fuse the kid’s—

Dustil’s own Force presence flared back—and in his figure seemed to ripple, suddenly outlined with a black corona of energy, so Dark it was almost palpable.

"No," Carth's kid said flatly, glaring back at her. Behind him Mekel was asking a question—

Dustil’s strong. Stronger than he was before.

"Revan?" Carth again. He’d stepped in front of her. Blocking her view of his kid, her view of the ships—

"I’m fine," she assured him, raising her voice to address the Hawk’s sensors. “I’ll go with you, Mission. The survivors down there will need our help.”

For example, Dar'Revan will need help dying.

“Great, sis! You’ll ride with me?”

Carth met Revan’s eyes and shook his head. “Not alone she won’t.” He glanced at his son. “Dustil, you need to stay on the ship. With Mekel.”

“Not a chance. We’re coming too, okay, Blue?” Mekel Jin barely glanced in their direction, leaning into Dustil as Carth’s son whispered in his ear, still shooting murderous glances at her. Despite his defensiveness, there was an easy familiarity in their poses that struck Revan as new.

They’ve grown up, she thought. No longer the scared children she’d met on Korriban. They’ve grown up and Dustil has too much power—

Across from them, Canderous shook his head. “What are you playing at, Computer?” His voice was metallic under the visor. “Those ships have something to do with you? Why didn't they fire on you?”

“Geez! What do you think I am? No! The Sleepers are just... awake now! But barely sentient! One-router minds—all on the same frequency... so happy Revan is here! Ready to follow her anywhere! Blah, blah....”
“But you can hear them?”

“Of course it can, husband. That blue ship is another abomination.”

“Yeah, I can hear them. And how would you like it if I just started calling you ‘Mandalorian?’” Mission's indignation sounded so real.

Canderous shrugged. “You could use Mand’alor,” he offered. “But I'd like it fine.”

“We'll all go to the planet together,” Revan told them flatly. “In the Hawk.”

“Geez, sound happier about it, Polla Revan! It'll be like old times!”

“Wait. Those ships—did they mention anything about a tomb?” Carth tilted his head to speak to the receiver mic they’d attuned to the Hawk’s frequency as if it was Mission herself. “Did they say anything about putting Revan in a tomb?”

“A tomb?” For some reason, Revan was suddenly cold. She looked at Carth. There had been a tomb on Medriaas. A tomb of Tenebrae’s and his holocron. And she had seen… in that vision of the past that she had seen there, she had wanted to destroy that tomb very badly.

“A what?” Mission’s giggle came out metallic. “Are you nuts? No! No way! No tomb! They’re all just happy she’s here!”

“Vima Sunrider mentioned a tomb.” Carth had that stubborn look on his face. His hand pulled at that abominable beard. “Didn't catch much of what she said to Master Atris, but she mentioned she was gonna blow this ship to stop you from getting to some tomb, Revan.”

“Oh? Did she say that? No. Even if there was a tomb, this tomb is a different one. Just some boring old tomb,” Mission said brightly. Too brightly. “Smelly. And boring.”

“If Vima Sunrider didn’t want me to go into a tomb, she should have told me not to go into a fracking tomb.” Beneath them, the planet burned. She’d... Revan had probably witnessed dozens of planets burning, but it shouldn't feel this… normal. “Perhaps Master Sunrider would have told me about this fabled tomb... if someone hadn’t killed her.”

“She was going to blow up the ship,” Carth snapped, but had that look in his eyes like he was worried. “Revan... are you okay?”

“She's always been nuts,” Dustil muttered. Too soft for his father to hear but from his smirk Revan knew she’d been meant to.

Mekel kicked him in the leg. Hard. Looked like it might have hurt.

Revan dabbed at her nose with the cloth again. She took another deep breath. “I’m fine. Look, there will be survivors on that planet. We need to find them.”

“Actually, we don’t,” Canderous was still standing, one hand on the weapon’s deck. Now he straightened and crossed his arms. “We don't need to land on the planet to finish this.”

Revan glanced at him, startled. With that damned visor on he had no expression, just her own face reflecting back at her.
"Husband?" Aemelie raised her voice sharply. "Just what are you saying?"

"The hu'tuun Emperor is down there." Canderous's voice reverberated like he'd turned his helm mic up. Every Mandalorian on the bridge was suddenly standing straight at attention. "That's his capital planet. This fleet listens to you, Revan. So make 'em finish the job burning from orbit. We can have the kids help with the warbirds. It'd be good practice."

"But—"

But his words made sense. This was the heart of Tenebrae's power. They had a fleet more than capable of destroying him. And if all Revan had to do was ask—

Trajectory change, she traced on the display, to test their will. Far orbit, solar path six 1.395 zed per hour.

{{Compliance, Starfire Unit.}} When that strange voice whispered in her mind, her vision went white.

Revan blinked and the world came back.

On their holographic array, and doubled across the expanse of the Aleema's transparisteel view, the alien ships moved like a flock of sleepy thranta. Then they began to separate, moving farther away from the rest of the fleet as their positions began to align with the Kaas System's sun instead of the planet.

"They're moving," Carth said. "Revan?"

"I sent them into a solar orbit. It was a test." A test they obeyed. I told them to not bomb Telos before. I told them to stay away from Coruscant—and they obeyed me then as well—

Something wet and salty stung her lips, and Revan raised the sanicloth she'd kept to her face again. It came away red.

"Are you nuts?" Carth stared at her like he'd been gut-shot, then turned to Canderous. "There are innocents down there! Zaalbar's down there! Polla and Seiran! Yuthura Ban! Everyone who helped us! We can't just kill them!"

"But you suggested the same thing Canderous did," Revan reminded him. "In the med–bay, before. You said yourself that maybe we should strike first. From orbit."

The idea had merit.

"That was before I saw that the planet was already burning," Carth muttered. "Whoever's left down there, they've already lost."

"Uh, know who else?" Mekel coughed. "Dustil's knocked–up girlfriend is down th—oww!" Mekel Jin shot off the bench he'd been sitting on next to Dustil as if he'd been Force–pushed. He got up glaring. "The frack, Telos?"

"Shut up, Mekk." Dustil folded his arms and leaned back, smirking. There was an ugly light in his glittering yellow eyes. 'Hey! Darth Revan? When you're done blowing your nose, you need to listen to my father. Because Dad's right. A lot of people helped us on Kaas. And we owe them.'

"You're can't be serious, Canderous?" Mission's voice broke in. We have to go down there! Big Z! And my T3!
“Polla’s there,” Carth added hoarsely, staring at Revan. “The real Polla Organa and her husband. And remember Yuthura Ban? I saw that woman save your life! You can’t be suggesting we leave them—that we murder them—”

“You suggested it before, too, Carth.” Had he forgotten?

“When I thought we needed an upper hand. When I thought we had no other chance!” He waved at the planet. “We have one now. Can’t you see that? You… you don’t kick a dying man. You try and help—”

“Emperor wanted a war.” Canderous interrupted. “You don’t let a zakkeg limp into the forest. Not when you've got a belt of grenades.”

“I’m not suggesting anything.” Revan made her voice loud enough to drown the rest out. “I’m considering our options.”

_Canderous is right. And yet—_

“Polla,” Carth said quietly, staring at her. “No. You can’t do this. You know that—we can’t do this—”

“Don’t worry. I can fracking stop her, Dad.” Dustil, behind him. On his feet now—

You think you can take me, Darth Sulksalot? Revan met his yellow gaze steadily. Felt the Force around them stir again, as if the entire room—no, the entire ship—held power at her disposal. The Force flexed beneath her hands like a living entity, ready to do her bidding—

“You’re fracking nuts,” the Sithkid snarled. But he took a step back, and his eyes shifted away.

“Revan—” Carth had dropped her hand, but now he advanced again—again stepping between her command chair and his son. “Please.”

“I have to consider the options.” Revan stared into his soft brown eyes. “You understand, Carth. After everything we’ve been through, the Sith don’t get to end so quickly.”

“What was that about the Sith?” Dustil popped up again, shouting from behind her father like a boy calling out schoolyard taunts. Behind him, Mekel had scrambled to his feet, too. “Look, the Emperor's just one guy, even if he's in a lot of bodies. You want to kill him a few thousand times? Go for it. But there's a lot of good people in the Empire—allies we made who helped us down there. We owe them to make this right.”

“That’s right, son.” The smile Carth gave Dustil was brief and then he turned back to Revan. “Freckles—” Carth looked like he was still trying to rationalize sentiment with necessity. “You—what do you—”

_We owe them to make this right._

Dustil Onasi’s words were comically simplistic, but he wasn’t wrong.

_We owe them. He’s right. Of course we do. We owe them for what they’ve done to us. They don’t deserve the mercy of a quick end._

“Will you guys relax?” Revan kept her words simple too, to put them all back at ease. “Of course we need to rescue our… our friends. We also need to find the Emperor and stamp him out of every being he’s possessing—like Dustil said.” She took a deep breath. “We can’t do either of those things from orbit. So, we’ll go to the planet.”

_Can’t kill Dar’Revan from orbit. No. I have to be sure—_

Dromund Kaas’s devastation was just another one of the Dar’s atrocities. Add it to the tally: the Mandalorian Wars, Malachor, Telos—

_Me. She pushed me off a ship. She tried to kill me—_

_You were cutting through the hull of her ship with a lightsaber. Some might consider her actions self–defense._

Malak’s voice again caught her off guard. So much that instead of locking her mental shields, Revan answered him.

_She left me there. She betrayed me—_

_She left you with our son, Red. It was a gift, not a betrayal._

_Our—for a moment time shifted and she saw him: Korrie, standing on the gangplank of an unfamiliar cruiser, taller than he’d been, top–knotted and gangly–limbed._

_And scowling._

_Was he angry? Upset? Hurt?_

_Our son, Red. He's safe, now. No matter what they tell you—I will keep him safe—_

_“I don't think the Awakened Ones want to blow up the rest of the planet, anyway. Good call.”_ Mission’s voice crackled with static.

_“Awakened Ones?” Carth frowned._

_“Seems weird calling them Sleepers when they’re awake, right?”_

_“Aren’t they my fleet?” Revan blinked back the vision of Korrie. “They’re following my commands.”_

_“It's complicated. Hey… when you’re on the Hawk, we can talk it through, okay? Sis?”_

_“Sure, Mission.” Revan’s eyes were back on the fleet's formations again, shifting them, adjusting their orbits._

Malak now seemed to be in her head with impunity—

_When you open yourself to hear. But I can't be everywhere at once. Not with you and with her and with Malachor—_

_Well, I don’t want you! Go. Away._ Revan tried to summon the same strength from the anger she’d found before to banish him, but her insides felt hollow and weak, now, her earlier bravado gone. She looked up and caught Carth’s unguarded expression. It wasn’t fear in his eyes when he looked at her—it was something worse. Raw and desperate hope.

_Go away, she repeated in her head._

_Cold amusement echoed in Malak’s voice. As you wish, Red._
“Revan?” Carth touched her shoulder and Revan started.

“Carth?”

“You... you were talking to thin air.” His beloved, befuddled face. “You were muttering ‘go away,’ but there’s no one there.”

“I—I thought I saw Korrie.”

“Sis?”

“You were shaking. I thought you were going to have another fit. We should have the medix check you out again.”

Sinae had already subjected her to one scan and found nothing. No reason for the nose bleeds. No damage of any kind.

“I’m fine. It wasn’t like that. This was some kind of... of... vision.”

His eyes narrowed. “Anything useful?”

_Taller. Korrie was older. Maybe it's the future I saw. “Not now—not here. No. Maybe what I saw was the future.”_

“Sis? You're cutting in and out—”

“Just a minute, Mission!” Revan held up her hand—as if the computer could see it.

“You're seeing the future now?” Carth was using that teasing, placating tone that had charmed her pants off once or twice—and was entirely wrong for this situation. “What are we doing in the future?”

“Nothing. It wasn't us.” Her son hadn’t been smiling. He’d been wearing some kind of generic coverall, had an empty holster strapped to his belt. “Just Korrie. He was—there was a ship. A light cruiser. Mantellian, maybe. I’m not sure.”

“Right. The ship really matters, here,” Dustil interrupted. “Are we going to the fracking planet or not?”

“Yes,” Revan said slowly, turning to him, and ignoring Carth’s stubborn glare, Canderous's heavy sigh. “We are. Mission?”

“Ready!”

“Prep your jets for reentry. We’ll send down an escort in additional shuttles. Sinae, of course. We’ll need a medix, and portable facilities. Enough personnel to establish a defensive base and mount patrols into the contaminated areas. Whoever else Canderous thinks can help with search and rescue. There will be... there’s a lot of injured sents down there.”

When Revan blinked, she felt a few more flicker and die.

Canderous scoffed. “You're making us soft, you and Republic. Rescue missions? We’re not your Mercy Corps.”

“Not soft,” she switched to Mandalorian. “Efficient.” Her vision blurred and abruptly the remaining inhabitants of Dromund Kaas were all _there_, points of light on a globe, some more bright than others—and in between, something older—

Smooth. Cold. Ancient.

[Welcome] a voice murmured.

{{Tenebrae?}} It felt like a little him, like the mind she had touched before. But… changed, somehow. Older.

{{No}}

“Beautiful?” Carth’s worried voice. “Your nose… it's bleeding again.”

“I’m fine.”

“Prepping jets now, sis! Took you long enough, but I’m so glad you’re here!”

“That makes one of us.” Revan wiped her nose and stared down at the burning planet. From space, it looked like a half-peeled thisla globe, with half its segments blackened and charred; the lines of demarcation broken only by cloud cover across its surface. Quite precisely, rounded segments of the planet had been left pristine—

One, in particular, caught her eye.

XXX

“Prepping jets now, sis! Took you long enough, but I’m so glad you’re here!”

Mission paused, trying to figure out how to say something that didn’t sound like a warning, but that Polla Revan would still get. “Hey! Remember that time on Tatooine, when we ran into Lena and she told me what a great guy Griff was, bringing aid to the Sand People and stuff?”

(That had never happened.)

She waited for Polla Revan to twig to it—

“That makes one of us.” Polla Revan sounded distracted as if she wasn’t listening to Mission at all. Probably a lot on her fragile organic mind.

Mission ran through the scenarios to get Polla Revan out of here again. She could probably jump the Hawk into a long burn away from Kaas before Polla Revan realized they weren't going there, but then what? Without appendages, it would be hard to disable a crazed Sith Lord. Add Carth, Sithboy, and maybe others to the mix and things just got worse. The organics were gonna be pissed she’d tricked them—and she’d have to be out of range of Kaas’s influence—or that scumrat installation would just send its killer ships after them.

Actually, Tatooine wouldn't be a bad choice as a place to hide out. That computer was totally dead. It couldn't give Polla Revan away. Remote planet, limited wideband… they could do a lot worse.

Mission wished she had thought to get a mouse–droid or two on the Hawk before this happened. There was a perfectly good cannister of xeriff gas in the medix bay. If she pumped it through her air vents she could knock out her friends without taking any unnecessary risks… lower the oh–two enough so they didn't wake up and then have them arrive on Tatooine.

Of course, that still left Big Z and her chassis on Kaas... but maybe after she dumped the others in the middle of the salt desert she could go back for him—

She ran the odds. They weren't great. Kaas would be on the lookout for her.

Oh, well, Big Z.

Carth had told her once that you never knew when you had the last time to say good–bye. He'd been talking about loser Griff, but the lesson was still the same.

“I have no appendages to get to the gas. And if I just decrease the oxygen, they might get brain damage!” If Mission had lungs they'd sigh, running checks on all of her systems, looking for moving parts that could build something.

That took some time—long enough for her organic crew to make their way aboard, and she didn't come up with much—just a few rotorwheels in her cooling system. And how to get started? All she needed was one measly set of hands….

“Hey, guys!” she chirped brightly as her inefficient old pals finally made it up the loading ramp. “Welcome home! Relax while I get my systems booted up, okay?”

“I'm going to fly us out,” Carth announced like Mission wasn't capable.

“Sure, but have you guys checked out the reinforced cargo bay?” Mission chirped. “We picked up some pretty great stuff when we were at Yavin Station! You'll want to see it!”

“Thanks having us aboard, Mission.” Polla Revan clanked on after Carth's heels, laden with a few boxes of stuff she’d collected. “I've got co–pilot—”

“But—” Several of the other organics began to object and Polla Revan gave a weird, almost choked laugh.

“Just for the view. Relax, Canderous… Mekel….”

“I'll fly us out,” Carth repeated. “Just release the controls, Mission, okay?”

“Check out the cargo bay first, guys!” Mission didn’t want to be pushy, but the fate of the galaxy was at stake. “Hey, Polla Revan. Why don’t you put that box of stuff in the cargo bay?”

“You need to mag–lev that crate down if you think you're putting that pile of junk on my bridge,” Carth scolded his wife.

So cute to see them getting along, even if the net result was them totally ignoring Mission.

“Relax, Flyboy.” Polla Revan rolled her eyes almost like it was the old days again. “I remember what happened when we nailed that Kashyyyk landing….”

Maybe Mission could seal them all off once they all got in the reinforced cargo bay? But Sithboy and Revan's lightsabers were gonna be a problem—

Xxx

Being on the Hawk again was both familiar and strange to Revan. The exterior hull had been painted a garish blue. And someone had carved a Kryyyjak orchid into a panel on the cockpit door. There was a Deralian dreamcatcher tied above the pilot's seat, and Revan's feet didn't reach the foot pedals in the co–pilot's chair as if the seat had been adjusted in her absence.
Did you think nothing would change? Carth had taken the ship from Coruscant nearly a year ago. Zaalbar would have been co–pilot—

Revan's eyes went to that dreamcatcher again, hanging from a loop in the ceiling above the pilot's chair.

“Hang on a sec.” Carth looked kind of cute, adjusting the pilot's seat back now, stretching his legs out with a sigh as the chair’s hydraulics shifted back.

Carth never let anyone touch the pilot’s seat—not since Revan had nearly crashed the Hawk on Dantooine. The woman she'd been then had thought she could pilot a fast ship. That woman had also thought she was too smart for superstitions like Deralian dreamcatchers and too skilled to need a pilot's lucky charm—

Revan moved her fingers, making the Force send the fragile threads of the dreamcatcher shimmering. Carth had said Polla was here before, but it hadn't seemed real, the smuggler on their Hawk. The Force brought the charm to her hand. It was fragile, hastily–made. Just a trinket, really—fashioned from extra scraps of cloth, maybe a few threads pulled from a loose sleeve. Something to do for luck. Like crossing your fingers behind your back or cursing the Grass Priests.

“Polla Organa was here, wasn't she?”

“Uh, yeah.” Her husband leaned across the gap between their seats. “I told you—told you that before.” He put his hand on her shoulder. “Sure you're okay?”

“Gonna check my bunk.” Behind them, Canderous cleared his throat—too loud a sound from his helmet's mic. “Don't let Computer or Revan fly this tub.”

“Tub,” Carth scoffed. “She’s the fastest ship here, Ordo.”

“Since Revan dumped that Pinion into the sun that's probably true.” The man chuckled and left. Typical Canderous, once she’d rejected his proposal to launch strikes from orbit, he’d moved on to the next plan without looking back.

“You want to fly her solo, Carth?” Mission's voice chimed in. “Guess that's okay, but I'm gonna help when we enter atmosphere, those bombs stirred up a lot of junk—”

“I got it, Mission.” Carth leaned across the board and began tagging the knobs for lift. Their engines rumbled into life with a satisfied purr. “Zaalbar did a lot of the flying,” he admitted to Revan, looking almost guilty. “On the way here, I mean. We were never sure when Tenebrae would possess me, so—”

“But you had to adjust your seat back—not forward.” Revan let out a breath she hadn't known she was holding. “You had to adjust the pilot’s seat to make it taller again because you let her fly the Hawk last—last time it flew.”

“Her?” Carth's face was confused. “You mean Mission? Of course, she’s had command access since Kashyyyk—”

“I mean Polla.” That dreamcatcher. The woman Revan had been would have laughed at a luck charm, but perhaps things had changed. “You guys came here together, right? From Yavin Station, you said before.”

“Oh. Uh, yeah. She asked to fly her—”
“Of course she did.” Revan’s throat felt like something was caught in it. “She probably loved this stupid ship.”

“Stupid?” Mission’s scoff whined, feedback crackling. “Hey! Which one of us took that contract with the ancient order of assassins, again? Cause it wasn't me—”

“What?” Under other conditions, Carth's poleaxed expression might have been comical.

“Nothing.” Revan glanced at the speaker and crushed the dreamcatcher in her fist.

“Just joking!” Mission added. “Right, sis?”

The cockpit door slid open again, and Dustil peered through the door. “Hey, Dad? We're gonna check out the galley. You want anything?”

Revan turned her head, eying Carth's son. “We’re fine. But you and Mekel should strap in for lift–off.”

Dustil Onasi met her gaze steadily. The Dark around him felt nearly palpable. From the way his eyes narrowed, he hadn’t forgotten their showdown on the bridge. “Oh, we’ll be grand, Revan .”

Behind Dustil, Mekel gave a nervous laugh. “All aboard,” he said, glancing sideways at Revan, and then ducking behind Carth's son again. “Uh… all ready for take–off, Blue.”

“Carth's flying, Mekel Jin,” Mission somehow made the speakers sigh. “Guess I'm just a passenger for this one. Just like you.”

“I'll take her up slow.” Carth's hand went to the yoke and the ship shifted up, edging out of the open hangar bay. “You ki—you guys—get settled, okay?”

“Don't have to tell us twice, Admiral.” Mekel grabbed Dustil's arm and pulled him out the door.

Carth shook his head. “Did that kid just call me ‘Admiral’?”

“I think he was trying to be polite.” Jin still slipped and called her ‘my lord,’ from time to time. “Mando’ade aren’t big on rank—everyone’s either the name of their post, the order of their marriage, or a ‘general.’” Revan shot him a smile. “We can work on having him call you ‘General Onasi,’ if you want—”

“My old sergeant would roll over in his grave.”

Carth eased the Hawk into open space, heading between the lines of Sleeper ships toward the planet below.

Xxx

The woman who had been both a Jedi Knight and a Sith Lord walked through a hellscape, trailing behind the Wookiee who was leading her escort.

Although the blast surface stopped abruptly two kilometers out from Kaas City limits, the metropolis was a ruin of fused rock and ferraglass, smoldering with a green miasma that choked their lungs and burned their eyes.

The Blais’s supply stores had included dozens of sets of Sith armor but no enviro–suits. Revan supposed she should be thankful for the layers of cortosis between her skin and the poisoned ground. The armor and the anti–rads currently coursing through her system would protect them from the worst of the fallout, at least for a time.

Their fortune could have been much worse.

She’d left Yuthura behind in the Blais tombs, despite the woman’s protests. The Twi’lek seemed more affected by the poisoned bombs than anyone else, and Revan wanted to minimize her further exposure.

The Wookiee leading their vanguard had been too large to fit even a modified set of armor. But Grarwwaar seemed entirely unconcerned about radiation, now padding through the ruins almost silently on his heavy, clawed feet, the pack on his shoulders full of kolto kits and foil–foam blankets.

Revan's suspicions about him were increasingly piqued, but the mystery of Polla Organa’s mercenaries could wait—at least until they found the woman herself. If Revan exposed her suspicions now, their loyalties might change.

Grarwwaar could have killed her easily enough in the midst of their riot, she suspected—had that been his intent. He had not tried. She assumed that meant he had another target. Until she knew what—or who—it was… the Wookiee and his mercenaries were extremely useful.

As if proving the point, the Houck mercenary trod by, with a few more limp bodies slung over his immense shoulders.

He deposited them on the cleared ground they had demarcated for that purpose to await her triage. Revan knelt before one of the foil–blanket–wrapped bodies—the only one that was salvageable.

“This one’s still alive,” she called out. Barely. A sentient covered in so much blood and dust that their station and even species were indeterminate. All Revan could feel from the ruin was pain.

Revan knelt, searching for the worst of her—his—injuries. Although their objective was to rescue anyone they could find, she was looking for one of Tenebrae’s Voices, preferably a Blind, since dealing with a potentially hostile Force-sensitive would only complicate matters.

But this sentient, like all the others they had found, seemed unpossessed—at least in the moment. Again, Revan cursed herself for letting the one Voice she had found die half a day before—the one they had found under the collapsed market. His entire torso had been pulverized, but she should have at least questioned Tenebrae before giving him release.

He was in too much pain to have answered us.

She no longer started when she heard Sheris's voice. The woman's insights about healing were too useful.

That’s true. He would have been difficult to torture. The Emperor always hated pain. Tenebrae would not stay in him and he was dying anyway—

That's why we set him free.

Perhaps you were too hasty.

Perhaps Tenebrae will remember the kindness.
Revan snorted. Perhaps you are naive.

She glanced behind them at the two waiting hoverplats they’d salvaged from spaceport wreckage. One for the injured, another for the dead. They'd had to dump and refill the latter three times over… while only a few survivors lay wrapped in kolto, ready to be taken back to their camp beneath the Blais tombs.

The Fragment was in the sky above their heads. She would come to the planet. Quite soon. Revan needed to prepare herself to face her. But now, she wiped the sweat from her eyes, trying to drown the roar in the Force still coming from above, so as better to hear the quiet suffering closer in.

I like to help them. That voice again. Sheris sounded more assured than she had been before. You were a hero, once, Revan. You like healing them too.

Yes. Revan had never possessed the skill in her own body. She had always been better at taking things apart than mending. I do. But we can't save them all.

We'll do our best. She felt herself bend down before the injured sent again as her hands began to glow—

Xxx

The Hawk skimmed through the planet’s roiling atmosphere, buffeted by clouds and lightning storms. The surface was a patchwork glimpsed through a haze: burning plains and rubble, interspersed with stretches of green where the bombs had not come.

The silence in the cockpit seemed to make time stretch and slow, broken only by Carth’s repeated queries about Revan’s welfare. Canderous and the Sithkids hadn't made another appearance.

Normally, Revan would have cracked a joke—or in the old days maybe straddled her husband’s lap—but now Carth was a wraith of a man with a beard and a worried scowl, intent on the controls in front of them. The easy rapport that the two of them had begun to recover at their reunion had been fractured by his betrayal.

I had questions for Vima Sunrider. You killed her.

“Are you okay?” he asked suddenly. Again.

“Eleven.”

“What?”

“That's the eleventh time you've asked if I was okay since we left the Aleema— not counting the number of times you asked on board. I can only conclude you don't think I am.”

“Always said you smart,” he muttered.

“Always said you were pretty.” Captain Obvious.

That earned her a smile, at least.

“None of this is okay,” Revan added. Her hand went automatically to her ear and the receiver she’d worn to direct their fleet—but she’d left it aboard the Aleema, in Aemelie's charge. Far from ideal, considering the woman had just disobeyed her direct order, but Revan had let Canderous make that call, just as she’d left it to him whether to come with them himself or stay in orbit above.
Canderous was truly the Mandalore. The Aleema and the Mandalorian ships were under his command—not hers. The rest of this: the Sith ships, the Sleepers, even this devastated planet below them were just a means to end.

And the end was coming, very soon.

“We've been in worse—” Carth's voice broke off. “Actually, this is pretty bad.”

“Yeah.” For some reason, she wanted to laugh. “But we're still alive.”

“S’cuy’ mhi,” he echoed, repeating the phrase in Mandalorian.

“Don’t go all clan on me,” she joked. “I like being your only wife.”

“No chance of that,” he said. He rubbed that infernal beard. “Ordo’s like a brother to me, but I still think of them as murdering scum.”

“Whereas your Sith forces are practically Star Scouts,” Revan murmured. “Right, Admiral?”

He snorted. “I just do what I can.”

“You’ve done plenty.”

“Right back at you.” His mouth twitched.

But the tension between them seemed to ebb, at least a little.

Under Carth's steady hand, the Ebon Hawk skinned through the outer layers of Dromund Kaas’s atmosphere, arcing slowly down toward the murky brown planet, descending into cloud cover that rippled with lightning.

The planet felt sick in the Force, like a rotten goreapple.

“Don't get too close to the bomb sites,” Revan warned Carth. “We don't want exposure to anything avoidable.”

“I know,” her husband muttered. “I'm watching the feed.”

“He’s got it! Don't teach your grandma to splice locks,” Mission added, sounding testy. “Kaas City is like, one giant crater. We're gonna have to get close to rescue Big Z and Polla Polla and everybody—but not too close. Okay?”

Polla Polla. Mission’s naming conventions made an ironic sort of sense but they also made Revan twitch every time she heard them. Polla Revan. Sheris Revan. Polla Polla. As if the other two were nothing but extensions of her—

But I would never do this. I would never destroy a planet like this—

Except… she had been with them when the Sleepers had done this.

I thought it was some kind of Force–vision. A memory. I didn't know!

I used to find myself already engaged in battle with no memory of how it began. Malak’s voice in her head was a low chuckle. I used to dream of wars already won, and find myself on a podium, giving victory speeches from prompts I had no memory of writing. And in the end, I woke on the Star Forge to find you above me with a blazing saber—after I had hunted you across the galaxy. He paused. I remember hunting you. I remember how much I wanted to put an end to you— but I don't remember how you bested me—

I used grenades, Malak. Get out of my head.

Sure, Red.

Revan blinked hard, staring straight at the viewscreen, the scorched planet, rolling beneath them. “There aren't many alive,” she said out loud. “Not near Kaas City.”

“You sense—” Carth coughed. “Of course. I–I knew you could do that.”

“I sensed your ship, before,” she told him. “And the other one. Cloaked. Above Medriaas.”

“The Aleema fired on my ship.” Carth fiddled with the controls. “A lot of good people died.”

“I didn't know it was you until I saw the name—”

He gave her a blank look.

“Kaas City *Sojourn. Didn't he remember?

“Kaas City?” He looked confused.

According to the ship’s maps, Kaas City was the darker, poisonous patch of clouds now directly below. Through a break in the clouds, Revan caught a quick glimpse of fire raging… and felt another cluster of those living sparks die out.

“Let me know when you find the spaceport,” Tenebrae had said mockingly.

That was it. Right there.

“Sojourn,” she corrected, taking a deep breath. “You named your ship Sojourn.”

“Sojourn.” Carth nodded. “Yeah, always said I'd name my first independent command that.” His lips twisted. “Turned out to be one hell of a joke. Wasn’t independent. Wasn’t even in command.”

“We rescued everyone we could. I sent them to the Kriffing Kathhound.” She should have gotten a roster of Imperial survivors for him, let him know his men were safe. That seemed like something a real leader would have done.

“Wait, you couldn't sense me in the Force when I was on that ship? Or Dustil? Not at all?” Carth shook his head, not waiting for an answer. “And you can't… now… you can't sense anyone below? Zaalbar, or—”

“I sense lives,” Revan told Carth. “Force users feel a little brighter. I felt Dustil, but he didn’t feel like he had before. I can't tell who I’m sensing — especially from far away. Sometimes… sometimes I can, but not usually.” She had sensed Dar before, on Coruscant. Absently, Revan punched in a map of the terrain, using her hand to mark the places with the most sparks.

Muscle memory. The action felt familiar, almost soothing.

“You always sensed Bastila.”

“Force bond.” She raised an eyebrow at him. “That makes it easy.”
“Makes some things easy.” He coughed. “The two of you never seemed to have an easy time of it.”

No, we didn’t. “You’re right,” she muttered, changing the subject. “About the worse spots thing. This is pretty bad.”

“Geez, you two are depressing!” Mission broke in. “I bet a lot of our guys probably survived! Sheris Revan ordered everyone underground when the ships came. Lots of tunnels under Tenny-Bro’s estates. We’ll find them, don’t worry!”

It was impossible to think a computer’s chirpy tone could be forced—and not just its programming designed to invoke a sentimental response, but Revan still thought the voice sounded like Mission was hiding something.

“Sheris Revan, huh? Just call her Sheris. Or Dar.” Although either was better than ‘Original Revan.’

“What you say, sis!”

Revan cocked an eye at the ship’s speaker welded above their heads. “Sounds like you and Sheris had a lot of time to catch up, Mission.”

“Not really. Not when she was conscious, you know? But she did say that I was a fascinating specimen.”

“She would.” That was all the Rakatan construct would be to Dar’Revan. “Mission, was everyone else okay?”

She would not name them or think of Jasp and how she'd promised to bring his daughter home safe.

“If by okay, you mean ambulatory and running for shelter, sure. Last I saw ’em!”

The computer whirred. “Yuthura got this holo-mask made up with your face. And everyone liked the way Polla Polla and Zaalbar gave speeches. It’s been… a lot happened.”

“So Carth told me.” She took a deep breath. She glanced at her husband, a sentinel in his captain’s chair, and still coughing more than she liked. “Not about the speeches or a holo-mask. You mean… Polla Organa was still pretending to be me?”

“With the mask on, yeah.” The artificial giggle came through too loud through all the speakers and made Revan nearly jump. “Least that's what Big Z said. I wasn’t —” distortion crackled the speakers and her voice cut out for a moment “— a lot of it? But Zaalbar said Yuthura pretended to be you, too, when they needed to lift stuff or shoot lightning at sents. But Polla Polla was better at speeches, you know? She had the accent right—” Mission broke off suddenly, and then shifted her voice, making it lower, raspier. “If we fail, I'll flay the flesh from your bones, insects!” She let out an incongruous giggle. “See?”

Revan tried to curb her irritation. “When the hell did I ever say that?”

“Uh… a few times. We all did what we had to,” Carth interrupted. “The Emperor made me High Admiral of the Sith Navy. Polla… she stayed with those crazy Blais sisters to take care of Revan’s body. My son pretended to be Darth Malak.” He bent over the yoke, adjusting controls that didn’t need adjusting. “We had no damned choice. I kept thinking you were going to come—”
“I was. It just took longer than I planned.”

“Well, I was wrong to pin all my hopes on you. We... we all did what we had to do.” Carth glanced at her, a muscle in his jaw twitching under that stupid beard. “I had to realize the plan where you just came and rescued us was nuts, anyway. Even if you had come before… before all this....” His voice trailed off and he glanced at the viewscreen at the ruined world beneath them. “Funny. This is almost one of the better outcomes. The Empire won't be invading the Republic any time soon.”

_The Sleepers might._ What other systems under attack had Canderous mentioned before the widebeam went dead? As if Revan hadn't seen them burn in her mind’s eye.

Revan opened her mouth to tell Carth about Telos and then closed it again, fumbling for a change of tactics.

“What happened at Malachor changed the Jedi who followed Rev—who followed me.” She’d told him about the events at Katarr and Biscain already, but perhaps he hadn’t understood the importance. “I had to end Davad Arkan or he would have destroyed everyone in the galaxy with even a drop of Force potential. That’s why I didn't come sooner.”

“You always do what you have to do.” Carth's voice was softer than it should have been. But not warm. “That’s what we did too. Here. This was the best we could manage.”

“So you said.” Revan hadn't forgiven him for killing Vima Sunrider: more like, shelved it for now, as Jasp Organa would have said. _You didn’t have to kill her. You could have incapacitated her. The woman had answers. Answers I need._

“Hey! Onasi! You had the Wookiee sleeping in my bunk?” Canderous appeared in the doorway to the cockpit, the scowl on his face as familiar as it was harmless. “Something wrong with his?”

“It was too close to mine—we wanted to keep Zepth and Takan away from Polla as much as possible.”

“Huh.” Canderous shrugged, and slid in behind them, sitting on the passenger bench that ran alongside the comm board. “Maybe that makes sense in Telosian. Who's Zepth and Takan?”

Carth started to explain, although Revan was having as much trouble understanding as Canderous. Something about keeping the possessed bodies of the Emperor from realizing Polla Organa wasn't Revan?

_How could an immortal body-swapping Sith Lord be dumb enough to think she was me in the first place?_

_Maybe he can be easily tricked,_ that cold whisper in her thoughts murmured. _The Emperor is not infallible. Maybe that is the lesson to be gleaned here—_

“Hey! Waitasecond! Whoa. This is new.” Mission interrupted Carth’s explanation of the ceremony on Dathomir that had turned him into Tenebrae’s puppet. “Dustil’s macking Mekel Jin? When did that happen?”

“What?”

“Mission has cameras all over the ship.” Carth looked embarrassed. “Give them privacy, kiddo. You know... we... we talked about boundaries before, remember?”
“Oh, this isn’t like when you were locking yourself in the bunks with Polla Polla.” The computer’s imitation of Mission’s snort was uncanny. “Seriously, they’re really macking—”

“What?” Revan repeated. Were they trying to distract her on purpose? Below them, the blasted ruin of the planet’s surface unfurled. Clouds of dust and craters of fire. The ship bucked under atmospheric stress and her hands twitched for the pilot’s yoke—although she knew better than to ask for flight command. “Locking yourself in our bunk?”

“Tenebrae was squeamish about… uh, about sex.” Carth’s gaze fixed on the landscape, but his neck had flushed. “He thought Polla was you, so he… when we needed to talk she'd tell him… you know.”

“What?” She blinked. “Sex?”

“Uh, we didn’t actually, you know we didn’t—”

“I wouldn’t think you would.” It hadn't even occurred to Revan; but it did suddenly, with a flush of jealousy that startled her with its intensity. She hadn’t thought of having a rival for Carth’s attention since she’d seen him with that Republic Admiral, Rew Ekkumi—

Xxx

“Once,” he said, looking her dead in the eyes. “Only the one time. I—I want you to know that.”

It was their wedding night, at least according to whatever strange Mandalorian ceremony they'd just undergone, and in that moment, Revan only felt an impatient irritation he'd brought Rew Ekkumi up at all.

“I could tell by how she looked at you.” She smiled at him, tracing the cut she'd made on his cheek. “Also, I think you're forgiven, considering you also wanted me dead....”

His laugh was sharp and unbelieving, but real—and she saw the last doubt vanish from his eyes—

Xxx

“Well, we… Polla and I… we didn't.” He brushed imaginary grime off the battered jacket he'd found in the Hawk’s storeroom, still patched with the thread she'd used to mend it on Taris. “She… she’s a good person, Revan. She’s like you. A lot like you. Fearless. She has the heart of a rock–lion.”

You said that before, too. Heart of a rock–lion. I know all your lines, Flyboy. “And that's why you didn't sleep with her?” The dry laugh felt foreign. “Flattering.”

“Yeah, well, I—I don't know… what you have planned.” He seemed to hesitate on the words, and then his gaze was too intent on hers, so direct that Revan wanted to turn away first. “We need to get Polla and Seiran out safe. We owe them. You must… you need to realize that.”

Right. Great. I realize that the real Polla’s probably already dead. Statistically, that seemed obvious.

“We will.” Revan gave him what he wanted to hear. “Wait. What about Dustil and Mekel?”

Carth raised an eyebrow “They, uh… they're involved. Dustil thought Mekel had died. He… it gutted him. Maybe now, he’ll be better.”
“But—” had she been wrong about Mekel and Canderous's daughter?

“That Jin! Hah! Kid needs to learn to rein in his shereshek,” Canderous shrugged from his place on the bench. “If Milli lives, I look forward to their duel.”

“Duel? My son isn't going to duel your daughter!”

“Of course not.” Canderous chuckled. “Jin will fight them both at the same time, to prove he can manage as well in the ring as he does in the bunk. Hah!” He paused. “Due to the Force advantage, my credits are on your son and my daughter, of course....”

“Take the ship west forty degrees, Carth.” Their commentary was abruptly just an irritant. Something else had caught Revan's attention. A strange, towering structure, set in a patch of what looked like untouched jungle—

Xxx

“Lord Revan?” Mydia Blais looked twice as wide as she should, swathed in too–big armor, with her face covered by the one rebreather they possessed, the glint of yellow eyes visible behind the transparisteel. “I found more survivors, I think. Over there.” She pointed at a pile of collapsed buildings where they had yet to set excavation fields.

Revan motioned the smallest mercenary to scan the area. The woman stepped forward and began laying out the battery arrays in front of the site.

She extended her own senses. “I think you're right, Mydia.” Hope that Revan hadn’t allowed herself to possess before mustered in her heart. “Under that rubble. The collapsed wall of the Emperor’s arena.” Two heartbeats. Two sparks, One has the Force. The other is null.

Two sparks. Faint and weak and flickering. Familiar? Or another vain hope?

Revan’s hand managed to lift a layer of sediment... but it was Mydia Blais who stepped in and raised the larger stones, lifting the broken pediments as if they were plimsy.

“Wait.” Revan motioned the smallest mercenary forward again, this time with the assembled shield generator. Her name was Oaska and she was a Sullustan beneath all of her armor—some of it patched with enough beskar to make Revan wonder if she’d once been adopted into a Mandalorian clan. That would be an unusual set of circumstances, but still possible. During the Sack of Sullust there had been several clans who took live prisoners—

“That was well done, Mydia,” Revan added.

The Blais girl seemed to require positive encouragement for every action.

“Thanks.” Mydia simpered under her rebreather. “It's important we rescue as many as we can—”

“Yes.” Revan began to direct the others to begin excavating where Mydia had indicated. “But now we need to be careful not to bury them with more debris.”

The Sullustan set up the energy shields around the collapsed tunnel, and Revan motioned for her to continue expanding the shield’s range, extending it down into the rubble.

Meanwhile, Mydia prattled on. “[—and with the servants all dead or gone, we need to find more...]
slaves. And my brother.”

“All slaves are free now,” Revan corrected. “That was the point of our rebellion.” One of them.

Mydia made a face. “They don't look free. Most are buried under rocks and collapsed buildings.”

Accurate. Revan nodded. “That is why we need to rescue as many as we can.”

“Right!” Mydia beamed. “Then we can enslave them again!”

“No.” Was this simpering girl as stupid as she seemed? “We just need to help those we can.”

“Why? If they're not going to work for us?”

“Because I said so.” Revan folded her eyes and fixed her with a mock–glare. All for show. The girl seemed desperate to be of use.

“You don't have to be so mean about it!” Mydia's sniffle was rather overdramatic. “I just want to find my bro–brother.” Her upper lip trembled behind her transparisteel visor, and her golden eyes blinked, suddenly full of tears.

“We will find Phylus.” Revan had promised to find the boy so many times, the phrasing in Ancient Sith felt engraved on her brain. Mydia swore her youngest sibling was alive and was convinced her other siblings were dead. The girl seemed only half-sane and claimed she saw ghosts—

Ghosts, Red? Really? A chuckle seemed to reverberate through her skull.

Care to help, Mal… or are you just haunting me to make japes?

You need to hurry. I tried to sustain the man, but he and I lack the connection in the Force that makes such things simple. I had a far easier time saving you from that second terentatek—

Oh? Was that simple for you?

Hurry. He's nearly out of time.

“Hurry,” Revan commanded the Sullustan, as a weak noise emerged from the center of the rubble. A cracked and broken sound, like someone weeping.

The energy field hissed into life and Revan motioned for Oaska to expand the frequency. She had used this trick before in the war—or her soldiers had. Had Revan been in her own body, it would have unnecessary to stabilize anything as she could have easily cast the entire ruin in stasis… but now—

As if to remind her, her old body’s Force presence swamped her senses again, drowning out the closer sparks.

Almost involuntarily, Revan glanced up—but the poisonous fog shrouded the ships above, made them mere shadows in the sky.

“Ready,” the Sullustan directed Regerio, their guard.

He flipped the switch and a humming blue field sprang up.

As the energy field expanded it lifted the rubble, creating a larger air pocket. Once it was large enough—and stable enough—Revan motioned for the Sullustan to lock the shield barrier in place, allowing Mydia to continue sweeping rubble away on all three sides of it.

“Nereal perished in the mountains.” Mydia Blais kept bringing up her dead siblings as she worked, although Revan hadn’t expected sentiment from one like her. “I saw his ghost snuffling about the tomb. Rhea hasn’t spoken to me since the plague killed him. No one knows where Inse is, but Lord Malak will surely kill her. And I killed Mother. She will never forgive that. Truly, Phylus and Lord Malak’s baby are all I have left.”

Lord Malak’s baby. Again. She goes on and on about Lord Malak’s baby! Was the fool girl taunting Revan or just an imbecile? It didn't matter. Mydia was the strongest Force user they had. They needed her.

And yet—

If she mentions that baby one more time, I will strangle her slowly.

Not the child's fault it isn't mine, Red.

Of course. She hardly seems your type, Lord Malak.

The laughter could have been the wind. You would know, my heart.

My heart— her eyes prickled with Sheris's weakness.

“We’ll find your brother, Mydia.” Out loud, Revan soothed the girl as if she was Malachor having a nightmare.

She’d lost the comm–link with its picture of Malachor that Tenebrae had produced like a threat. As if his threats could still score a hit in this blasted city, with all he had made in ruin.

All Tenebrae made is ruined. I suppose I've won. Unless the Fragment destroys everything.

We will stop her. And our son is fine, Red. For now.

Revan realized she was smiling. He had better be.

She glanced up at the sky again, at the Sleepers she could not see above the clouds, who gave Tenebrae’s old threats the weight of schoolyard taunts. She’d never been sure they were real. Or, never… entirely sure. She had felt them in her mind that day in the tomb on Medriaas. Felt them stir like a sarlacc beneath the sand, half-dreaming, impossibly large—ancient—But even so, the threat of their destructive fire had been abstract.

The Emperor had had far more... immediate threats to hold over her head at the time. Her son. Malak. The stability of the Republic, the promise of the Star Forge—

XXX

“I could possess every mind on this world,” Tenebrae had murmured to her from Malak’s rotting mouth, the last time they had been on Coruscant together. “I could cast your people into chaos, rip apart your Jedi Order, send the denizens of the Underground into madness—if I so chose.” Malak’s heavy brow lifted and he raised one hand as if to stop her from advancing—her, whose saber was already drawn, who had already decided she would rather see her husband dead than laughing at her again with the Emperor’s madness.

It that moment, she almost ended him.
In that moment, she realized killing Malak—then—would change nothing.

“Isn’t the Republic a lovely present?” he continued. “My gift of an empire, my Starfire. All for you. I only wish to give you the means to claim what is yours—”

“With more war?” She could not kill him, but she raised her blade.

“No.” It was one of the last times she saw Mal’s mouth smile. “Not war—”

XXX

“There! In the back.” The Wookiee with the voder rushed forward. “I hear something.”

Revan blinked, the present coming back with a rush. “I know.” A faint sound, louder now. Like a woman’s hysterical sobs. “It’s Seiran and Polla. I think.” Relief was a useless emotion, but she forgave herself for a breath of it.

“More ships are coming down—” the Houck mercenary called out. His name was Grizz, “Looks like they’re heading in the same direction as the last. West of the city wall.”

“Mark their landings,” Revan ordered, still staring at the rubble. “Triangulate as best you can from here, but try not to draw attention.”

“Is it the Republic invading?” One of the Sith refugees who had followed them into the Blais tomb was brave enough to ask questions. But Revan hadn’t brought him along on their retrieval mission for his curiosity—she’d brought him because he claimed to know Tenebrae’s palace layout. His name was Idriss, and so far he’d been useless. “Have they come to conquer us?”

“In a manner of speaking.” Why else descend upon what could be bombed from orbit? Unless the tomb called to the Fragment already….

Was that possible? The ships are landing west of Kaas City. That’s where the tomb is.

The Sleepers were awake, so Revan assumed anything was possible. The dormant fleet had been the stuff of a child’s nightmare before—another threat from Tenebrae to contain his recalcitrant Sith’aeräh–rah. In her heart of hearts, she never believed they could wake after a thousand years, or if they woke, be capable of flight—

How did the Fragment awaken them in the first place? Was it deliberate? From what she’d observed of the woman’s bumbling, mischance seemed far more likely. She probably shocked open the wrong obelisk somewhere, or offended the Kashyyyk computer—

“Lord Revan?” The Sullustan cleared her throat and Revan’s attention turned back to the task at hand. “We’re ready.”

Revan nodded. “Well done, Oaska. The energy shield will help stabilize the tunnel enough to protect from falling debris. Mydia, lift the larger pieces now.”

The Blais girl sighed dramatically and raised her hand. A giant rectangle of duracrete creaked, then floated into the air—and then—there they were, blinking up at them in the flickering, poisonous light, framed in the far corner of a collapsed corridor, walls on either side of them sustained only by Oaska’s force field.

Polla’s face was streaked with ash and sweat, and her eyes were huge behind the energy shield. Help, her lips moved, but the only sound that came out was an exhausted whimper.
Her husband’s skin was near–gray, and red stained his leg—streaking down from the knee to below.

“The man’s dying.” Revan spoke before she thought, falling to her knees beside the tunnel’s entrance and reaching out in the Force. No time for politeness. “You need to help me move him toward us, Mydia. Move both of them, closer to the entrance—to the edge of the shield's boundary. Gently. Very gently.”

Then they could turn off the energy shield, and Revan could pull them to safety.

Remember the Xoxon plains, Red? We did this there, combing the wreckage for survivors, digging them out of pits that had once been cellars and schools.

I only saw them groundside in your dreams. But we did this on Taris, too. On Dxun with Vik— Dreams? Phantasmal laughter in her mind. My nightmares, you mean.

This planet was filled with ghosts. The victory of seeing it reduced to rubble tasted like ash. Maybe all victories seemed such from the dirt.

Or, maybe this is what victory is, her dead husband whispered. Finding hope in the ashes of what we have wrought.

You’re the one who said this isn’t over, Mal. She glanced up as if he was there, but all Revan saw was ruin.

“It would be easier if she would stop squirming so much,” Mydia complained, although all Polla was doing was holding onto her husband’s limp body as the Force propelled her closer to them—as if pulled by a string.

Do something. The smuggler called out, eyes blinking back tears as they adjusted to the light. Her voice was a hollow whisper. “Help him! I tried to stop the bleeding but I couldn't see.”

“I am helping.” This close, Seiran’s pain was pure agony. Revan’s breath hissed out with it. The crushed ribs were now uncompressed. That injury would end the pilot quicker than the leg, although the leg might be too far gone to save.

Healing light sprang from Revan's fingers—

Xxx

The man with the rotting face had been so handsome before. Sheris had always thought it, even when Tillie and Meetra reminded her that Jedi should never have such thoughts.

“Heal him,” the masked woman said, and then left them alone. The man’s now–yellow eyes were pain–filled as they stared down at her. His voice wheezed something unintelligible. She could see the rotted cords in his throat.

“Stay still, Lord Malak.” Beya had warned Sheris to call him thus. No more Jedi, no more Knight D’Reev, but the honorific still felt strange. “I can take away your pain—”

Xxx
“I can take away your pain,” Revan murmured, doing so.

“Cutting the shield in three,” Oaska warned, as Revan summoned her body’s own meager strength, to move forward quickly as the support died, helping Mydia push Polla and Seiran out of the tunnel.

The rubble collapsed behind the two Deralians, more neatly than the last time they had used this method.

Good. We’re learning.

Revan nodded her approval to the Blais girl and was rewarded with a beaming smile.

“Minions!” Mydia clapped her hands. “Why, it’s Seriina Wen! I barely recognized you under all of the filth! You’re alive!! And your husband too!”

“Fracking help him,” Polla repeated, still staring up at Revan. Her voice was barely there, a hollow squeaking sound. Her green eyes were red–rimmed and she was gray with dust. There was a scratch on her shoulder that would require attention.

“You did a good job with the tourniquet,” Revan told her, placing her hands on the ragged belt wrapped around the Deralian pilot’s thigh. Without it, the man would have been dead already. “I’m pleased you’re both alive.”

“How could you possibly do that? “I can take away his pain,” Revan assured Polla. “At least temporarily.”

When she healed sentients, Sheris’s memories were peaceful ones. This body’s native power was useful, this kindling a body back to life, this quiet repair of cells—

“I don’t care about his fracking pain,” Polla snapped. “Heal him.” She was holding a glass bulb of something in her hand and she brought it to her husband’s slack mouth. The pilot barely responded, choking, and Revan wrenched it away.

“How could you possibly do that? “I can take away his pain,” Revan assured Polla. “At least temporarily.”

“Are you insane? He has internal injuries. A drink is the last thing he needs!” From the smell, it was some kind of liquor. One of the whiskeys Beya had liked—

Steady, my heart. Focus on the task at hand.

“Help him!” Polla whispered. Her hand holding the flask shook.

Revan’s flesh hand was on the pilot’s belly, finding the broken places, those problematic ribs, and their broken edges. Her metal hand reached for another kolto pack, levitating it to her fingers clumsily from the stack of them Grarwwaar had made. Their kolto stores were limited. Another issue that would soon need to be addressed.

“I’m quite good with amputations,” Mydia Blais chimed in brightly behind them. “That leg will need to come off.”

“Not here.” Revan glanced up at the sky. Night had fallen and the clouds were gone. The sky bristled with ships. Between the ranks of the Sleepers and a handful of battered hulls, hung the dreadnaught she’d glimpsed before—familiar, even at this distance.
“Bloody hell.” Polla had followed her gaze. “I know that ship! What are they doing here?”

“With all communication bands down we have no way of knowing.” Revan felt her eyebrow raise. “But I recognize that ship, too.”

“Right. Of course you do.” The smuggler began scrubbing dust from her husband’s face with an equally filthy sleeve.

Revan considered stopping her, but surmised that Polla’s effort was more cathartic than hygienic. They would all need decontamination when they returned to the shelter, in any case. Indeed, if they were to survive for long in this hellscape they would all need much more.

“I oversaw the design of the Aleema’s medical facilities myself. They should be more than adequate for a simple amputation and prosthesis refit,” Revan tried to keep the acerbic bite from her voice. “You said before, Polla, that the Aleema was in the custody of the Mandalorians?”

The Deralian nodded. “Yeah.” Her mouth twisted. “Wait... did they bomb us?”

“Not from my warship. They could not—not without extensive modification to the cannon. I didn’t design the Aleema for planetary bombardment.” Leave that to the Leviathan and the Demon Moon. “But the other ships in the sky... the ones with them...”

“Your warship...” Polla’s voice trailed off. “Right. Look, I don’t fracking care. Is Sei gonna make it or not?”

Some things the Force could heal. Utter cell breakdown, mitochondrial collapse, and unchecked recombinant mutation were not among them. How much exposure to radiation had these two had? Only time would tell. Right now, they felt no more poisoned than any of them. Revan glanced down at the rad–meter set on her arm. It was tingeing toward red, indicating they were all reaching the limits of their exposure for the day.

“Revan!” The woman’s voice was a whiplash, making Revan look up startled, half-expecting to see the Fragment. “Just tell me! Is my husband gonna be okay?”

“Seiran was grievously injured—but he’s stable. For now.”

The smuggler’s face whitened. “For now? Just for now?”

“Yes. He’ll make it. He’s stable,” Revan allowed. For now. She glanced up at the sky again. “My duplicate is with your Mandalorians aboard that ship. I can sense her presence in the Force.” Or, beneath it now, in one of the many craft capable of groundside landing, roaring over their heads. “Her crew will have medical supplies that can help Seiran.”

“So do we,” muttered the Houck, glancing down at his own radiation meter. “Back at base camp. We go there now, yeah?”

“Duplicate?” Revan was all–too–aware of the quiet, scentless Wookiee bending over the dead on the other hovercart. Grarwwaar’s teeth bared as he looked up, addressing them. “Another Revan?”

From his mocking tone, she suspected he had possessed some foreknowledge of the Fragment’s existence.
“Yes. We will go back to our base now.” Revan shot Polla an encouraging smile. “We need to get our survivors anti–rads as soon as possible.”

“Wait. When… when you say her ship,” Polla wiped the grime from her face with an equally grimy sleeve. “You don't mean Aemelie Ordo, do you?”

“I do not.” Revan had never met the woman, although Polla had passed several hours in their cell discussing the Mandalorians and peppering Revan with questions about them. “I mean my copy. The woman with your memories. If the Aleema is here with that fleet…” It was easy to tell the simple truth. Expedient. “… Aemelie Ordo is not its commander.”

“You’re saying the… the other Revan fracking Starfire is?” Polla practically snarled the name. “She did all this? She bombed this planet? I could kill her!”

Could you? Revan wondered.

“Fracking Revan!” Polla added, bitterly. Those false green eyes looked up and Revan recognized something in them she'd seen from others before. On battlefields and command decks. Trust. Loyalty. “We need to get medical supplies from the Aleema and a ship off this rock, but if Revan Fracking Starfire is the one who did this—”

“We will blow up that bridge after we build it, Polla.” It was an old Deralian expression, one that Beya had used, often.

From the glint in the smuggler’s eyes, she understood.

XXX

The loss of her own command ship had been couched as a promotion, but it still rankled.

Not for the first time, Rew Ekkumi wondered if the Republic’s impending invasion of Sith Space wasn't a Sith–blasted trap. Wideband was down in this sector of the galaxy. She and her men were blind in hyperspace—blind, shipless, and now stationed aboard Rensha’s Great Hunt.

“Try the codes to your father's ship again,” the Trandoshan hissed to the yellow–haired Human girl sitting before them. They were in Old Scaly’s private chambers—with the holographic display of the Hunt’s real bridge projected behind, its officers moving like ghosts between their stations.

“I already told you!” The Mandalorian girl twisted the comm–link from her ear. The apparatus clattered on the smooth surface of the conference table. “I can’t get through to the Aleema! All comm–channels are dead!”

“I said, try again,” High Admiral Rensha snapped, looking over their prisoner from her side of the table.

“If I try again there will still be nothing,” Millifar Ordo repeated with disgust. “As I informed you before. My father’s fleet is not responding, even to the emergency beacon.”

“Could they be dead?” Old Scaly was as tactless as ever.

“How would you expect me to know?” The girl shot her a mutinous glare.

Admiral Cein’s image flickered. His ship was still two systems away. “Comms… spotty.” As if proving that point, his words were almost unintelligible. “…frequency.”
“Try changing the frequency,” the Trandoshan instructed her ensign—and the Toydarian bent to the task.

Cein’s image flickered out altogether.

“Blast!” Millifar Ordo had no compunction about cursing in front of senior officers. Rew wondered what sort of discipline existed on Mandalorian ships. Probably none. “See? I would like nothing better than to give my father forewarning of your attack so he could select the weakest unblooded boys to destroy your ships, but the comm-channels are all down!”

“Can you raise Central Command?” Rensha asked her communications officer.

“Not since this morning,” the Toydarian lieutenant adjusted the headset covering her eyes before bending back to her deck. “Wideband communications are down across several sectors. The attacks on the Rim worlds destroyed nearly every relay.”

The last word they’d had from Coruscant said a Sith warship had appeared out of nowhere, in high orbit above its skies. The Grave Bright, one of Revan’s ships from the Sith wars. Republic–made, modified by Star Forge technology…

…and apparently capable of going from the Medriaas System to the heart of the galaxy in only a little more time than it had taken Rew Ekkumi’s crew to travel from Medriaas to Hutt Space.

The conclusion was obvious: the Grave Bright had used another hyperspace lane originating at Medriaas. Now, the Empire could reach the Republic in days—not months.

It was a small consolation that hyperspace routes ran two ways.

From Coruscant, Admiral Cein had taken three ships back along the navigation charts mapped by the Bright. That much had been in his report, along with a notation that most of the crew of the Bright were dead—victims of their insane Sith master, and a cascade failure of the ship’s systems. The ones left alive had no idea how the ship had found the navpoints in the first place.

How convenient: none of the Sith or Mandalorians we’ve captured can tell us anything.

It occurred to Rew, not for the first time, that they were taking a great deal of this invasion on faith. Unproven faith…but she had only to remember seeing Carth’s glowing red eyes on that vid of threats to harden her resolve.

“Come to me,” that voice—that strangely–accented and not Carth’s voice had said.

Come to me.

And so they were.

Perhaps Rew had been wrong before—wrong about the posts in the Telos Survivor’s forum being secret messages from Carth, wrong about Felucia being the target of the Sith Fleet—but she would make the Sith pay for that.

Carth Onasi would be avenged.

She glanced up at the holoscreen and immediately wished she hadn’t. Rensha had produced the pirated footage Fleet had managed to keep off HoloNet—or, at least off the networks. Revan Starfire loomed above, topknotted and scowling, standing between Mekel Jin and Millifar Ordo with the corpse of a dead Jenet at her feet.
The Jenet reporter’s eyes had glowed—briefly—in the recording before Revan cut the famous Holo–net figure down for what appeared to be the crime of laughing at her.

Glowing eyes. Just like Carth’s. Just like the Duros Ensign on Rensha’s ship. Just like the Rishii commander. Just like Admiral Yuffall Iskar—

Rumor said Rear Admiral Iskar had gone completely insane since that HoloNet broadcast and was now cooling his dewclaws in one of the Republic’s most fortified prison stations. Old Scaly had had him interrogated, of course, but Rew hadn’t been briefed on the results.

“We have a recording of you with Revan—as you see, Millifar.” High Admiral Rensha paced in front of their prisoner, the Mandalorian girl with the cropped yellow hair and a prosthetic arm. “And so, I am going to ask again: what were you doing with Revan Starfire on Biscain Station?”

“Rescuing her.” The girl folded her arms. “Mekel Jin and I were rescuing Revan from her own folly. She had just thrown a haar’chak dar’jett into a sun and lost her pilot. My father sent us to retrieve her.”

“Your father, Canderous Ordo.”

“Do I have to answer questions that are both obvious and rude?”

“I suppose not. And Katarr?”

“I do not wish to speak of it.” The girl’s chin jutted out stubbornly, giving her an uncanny resemblance to the Mandalorian general who had once destroyed half of Rew’s command above Althir. “Before Katarr, my father and our clan also rescued Revan from your Republic soldiers by taking over their troch ship… and before that, we rescued her from her own bad piloting. Father allowed the Pinion may have been sabotaged, but I suspect Revan burned out its turbines by accelerating out of the atmosphere with full thrusters. She's quite lucky she didn't explode, or die of oxygen deprivation before we could rescue her that time—and before that, we rescued her from the three dar’jett in the Jett Temple—”

Rew had had enough. She had already heard these lies before—five times in the last week they’d had the girl in her custody.

“Stop it!” she snapped, standing up herself. Her Besalisk lieutenant had befriended the girl. Abrad kept telling Rew that Millifar Ordo was friendly as a tame kath given the proper care, but Rew was tired of mollycosseting a Mando, just to hear her lie again.

“Stop what?” The girl's lower lip jutted out defiantly.

“Stop lying! We’ve all seen the medical reports from the victims in that hangar on Biscain. Half of them couldn’t remember their own names for a week after what Revan did to their minds! They kept trying to leave their hospital rooms, repeating ‘this never happened!’”

Rew gestured to the frozen screen in front of them. “Revan was competent. She destroyed all the cams in the hangar, didn't she? We only have this one feed from the reporter who came in late—and that reporter is still barely speaking coherent sentences.”

“Reports say she’s doing much better,” the Toydarian ensign murmured, rather cheekily, for someone of her station. “In fact. Generally, compulsion does wear off—eventually—”

Rew ignored her, directing her words directly to the High Admiral. “Revan was competent enough to land the Harbinger on Katarr… when Fleet left it to burn!”
“Careful—” Old Scaly began—

But Rew Ekkumi was tired of being careful. “Revan was competent enough to get that… thing to follow her off Katarr. Competent enough to destroy a Force-eater and rally the Mandalorians to her cause. And my crew and I were there, in the Nathema System, when her ships destroyed the rebel Mandalorian fleet—” She realized she was shouting, but in that glorious instant, Rew didn’t care. “Was that incompetence, Admiral? The actions of a woman who needed rescuing?”

Reports had come that Sith scout ships had been seen in Telos orbit, at the same time Onderon and Hoth had burned.

Telos.

Their scouts had come and gone, and their home planet was safe for now, but those ships had been a warning. Rationally, Rew knew that any action against Telos was not personal—not for her, Carth Onasi’s brief lover, his devoted friend.

But could the scout-ship above Telos have been a threat for Carth?

Could those ships have been a personal message for him?

Rew thought they could.

From what they knew of the Emperor’s possession, his subjects rarely retained memories from their possessed states. Reports said Admiral Izcalli sat in a cell weeping to this day, swearing he had no knowledge of the broadcast where his eyes had glowed red and he’d told Revan to come to him.

Could Carth have moments of cogency like that when he might be free, too? Moments when he would need to be reminded that his homeworld was in jeopardy?

He’d left that clue in the survivor’s forum—even if it had been false—the message had to have come from his hand—they had used the ciphers so often before—

Rickar fish and tubers. Followed by numbers that had nothing to do with a simple recipe that was one part blue milk, to three parts flour, over cut fillets and peeled poyams.

“We are still determining Revan Starfire’s motivation,” the Trandoshan admiral snarled, curling her lips back from her teeth. “Whatever her reasons, Revan’s actions continue to be effective. The limited reports we have from Sith space suggest she has nearly eliminated her Imperial rival.”

“Ah… an internal alert is coming through,” the Toydarian coughed.

A comm chimed on Old Scaly’s armored wrist and the High Admiral glanced down, tapping it on. Her eyelids retracted all the way back into her bone ridges as she scanned the report.

“Good news?” Millifar tapped the fingers of her manacled hand on the table. “Your scales are flapping.”

The High Admiral ignored the insult with more reserve than Rew would have shown the girl. “Yes, in fact. Our Jedi advisor has been retrieved. We will all rendezvous at the next jump–point.” Her scales flexed as she bared her teeth at Millifar Ordo. “I wonder if your tale will change when she inquires.”

Millifar shrugged. “I have faced your jett’ before. I saw many die quite quickly.”

“I will not speak of it.” The girl reached for the comm-link she’d so quickly discarded previously. “Let’s try my father again.”

“Jedi advisor?” Rew was tired of being out of the loop.

“Master Atris will be joining us,” Rensha said. Her tongue flicked across her lips, registering a subtle distaste. “She has some expertise with the Sith.”

Xxx

“Are you gonna take off that mask?”

“No.” Canderous’s helmeted head turned toward Mission’s speaker on the wall of his bunk instead of to the image of herself Mission had projected by the door with a near-lifelike resolution, thanks to the mods that old shapeshift guy, Rulan Prolik, had installed on her cam-links, way back.

Mission calculated the odds of locking Canderous in here while she knocked everyone else out and jumped to Tatooine.

Three hundred fifty-six thousand to eight. They seemed slim.

And Polla Revan was totally ignoring all her pings for them to talk alone, staring past Mission’s image projected on the wall of the cockpit like she didn't see her at all, half-fighting with Captain Obvious as if there wasn’t a planet on fire at stake and stuff!

It was beyond rude.

“Hey!” Mission adjusted her pitch to feedback into Canderous's speakers and saw the old geezer start, hand automatically going to the holster on his hip.

“Stop.” He'd produced a scrap of cloth and some piles of what looked like fine string and was laying them out on the bunk now. “Do that again and I'll turn the volume all the way off.”

“Geez, you don't have to be such an asshole!”

“You don't have to keep acting like you're really the kid,” he muttered. “I'm not soft like Republic, or guilty like Revan. You helped the clans on Coruscant and I'm grateful. But the dead are dead.”

His hand selected red string, and he held up a tiny splinter of metal, tying the string through it. “I sang Vao’s death song. I wove her shroud and burned it empty—like a true warrior’s. What you are is a computer, Computer. You've got her cheek—and we all miss that—but no more games. Not between you and me.”

He stabbed the fabric with the splinter— sewing —Mission realized.

For a thirty-thousand-year-old entity, she suddenly felt slow.

“Is that your daughter's death shroud?” she asked, (instead of going to his level).

“Maybe.” Abruptly he pulled the buckles at his neck and did remove the helmet after all. Without it, Canderous Ordo looked ridiculous: an old man sitting there stabbing the tiny piece of cloth, and the Twi'lek she had been would never have let him live it down. “Part of it. Why don't you make yourself useful and see if you can get widebeam up? We need to get a line to Dxun.”
“Why?” Mission chirped the word with 99.9999% accuracy to her predecessor, but Canderous didn’t even look up.

“Gwen is there. With the rest of the kids.” He stabbed the cloth again. “We know Onderon got hit, but we don’t know how bad. Or if Dxun got hit too.”

“Oh.” She felt her processors spin a little, even as the Hawk’s body buffeted through atmosphere, letting Carth guide her to wherever Polla Revan seemed to have decided they were going to land. Place was farther away from Kaas City than she’d hoped, but also conveniently close to the Dark Temple and the tomb—

“Wait! No! That’s bad! We need to get her away from the tomb!”

Mission formulated the words to correct him and explain that being “all right” was a subjective state unknown to her own circuits… even as she felt her ship–body’s course alter, heading even closer toward the tomb—

“Prep for hyperspace!” she warned Canderous. “We have to get out of here! I promise I’ll explain as soon as we’re all clear!”

Canderous finally looked at the holographic image she’d spent so much time crafting. “Computer?” His grizzled face frowned. “Your avatar’s frozen. You there?”

“We need to keep Polla Revan away from the planet! She can’t go into the tomb!”

Was he hearing her? He might as well have been still wearing the helm for how much his face changed.

The Mandalorian tapped his comm. “Republic? Hope you’re flying the ship because the computer’s glitching.”

“I am not glitching!”

But Mission heard her own voice giggle, loud and clear over the speakers. “Circling… got a landing point… now—”

“All looks fine over here,” Carth’s voice buzzed over the comm. “We’re almost down. But I’ll switch to full manual for the landing. There’s some kind of structure—area around it looks clean.”

[Wait! Error. Redirecting—]

“Computer?” Canderous put down his death shroud, glancing up, and then over to where her holographic image was still there, frozen. “Vao? You okay?”

“I—” she had had a plan. Mission remembered making the plan. Knock them all unconscious by lowering breathable air mix’s oxygen, jump to Tatooine… then crash the Hawk in the far desert—

Why hadn’t she done that?

“Landing in about six minutes, big guy!” she heard her voice say from the speakers. “Might want to strap in, atmo’s a little rocky.”
“I’ll turn on the mag–sets.” Canderous folded the string into the fabric and tucked the bundle neatly into a panel on his chest plate. He seemed to hesitate, turning back to her frozen hologram again. His hand reached out and his fingers passed through the top of her head, like he’d used to pat it, back when she’d been a real girl.

{{Remain calm, little sister}}

“I sang your death–songs, ad’ika. You had a bad death but for the best of reasons.” His smile was sad. “Ni kar'tayl gai sa'ad, Mission Vao. I would have taken you to Clan, had you lived. Milli always wanted a blade–sister.”

If Mission had eyes they would be tearing up, but more majorly, why couldn’t she speak? Or jump out of atmosphere to hyperspace?

[Are you sleemos doing this?!]

{{Landing zone selected by Starfire Unit is acceptable.}}

{{Peace, little sister. Do not exceed the parameters of your programming—}}

“Computer?” Canderous said again, frowning. “Vao?” He bent down and tapped the holo–emitter on the wall. “This thing still working?”

{{Canderous! Hey! Can’t you hear me??}}

“Transmitting lens must be jammed. Probably needs a cleaning.” Humming a little to himself, Canderous pulled a hydrosspanner off his belt and began to dismantle her emitter.

XXX

“Hey. You hear that?” Telos had his shirt unbuckled, and the lines of Sith corruption ran between his ribs like a Zabrak’s indentations. It looked badass.

“Hear what?” Mekel leaned on his elbows, tracing one. The bunk had had two beds, stacked. They’d taken both mattresses and put them on the floor. “How much longer till we get to the surface?”

“I’m not sure. Not sure what I just heard, or when we hit groundside, Mekk.” Dustil turned his head closer and they lips met again, lazy and done.

“You gonna be this nice to me every time you get jealous?” Mekel meant the words to sound more like a joke, but they came out serious.

“When we’re making up, yeah.” Dustil sprawled on the cot in the bunk they’d claimed, levitating his boots back on his feet, while Mekel watched, for once less envious than assured.

Mekel wasn’t sure which member of the Star Forge crew’s bunk this had been once, but it was the farthest one from the cockpit and the one closest to the escape pods and it suited them fine.

“And I wasn't jealous…” Telos added. “Just so we’re fracking clear.” He smirked. “How could I be jealous of an asshat who thinks his own cousin is hot?”
Mekel never should have shared that story about Revan and the sparring room and her skivs.

“I might be an asshat, but at least I'm not a hayseed,” he drawled. “On Coruscant, we’re sophisticated.”

“Sophisticated enough to frack your own cousins?”

“Wha—no! Sophisticated enough to admire beauty when we see it. Just because I think she's hot—objectively—doesn't mean I want to frack her—”

“Oh, right. Because you're the Mekel Jin who doesn't frack everyone you think is hot.” Dustil’s mouth twitched.

“Is your pregnant girlfriend hot? Maybe I won't frack her too.” Mekel had never really gotten jealous before (not even when Lashowe threw him under the hoverbus to seduce Uther Wynn) but this emotion felt close.

“Go ahead.” Dustil shrugged. “Just be careful. She likes to pop the toes off nulls.”

“I don't need your fracking permission—”

But Dustil had turned his head away, was sitting up, now fully dressed. Okay, it did make Mekel slightly jealous, how fast he could do that with the Force.

“Do you hear that?” Telos rubbed his temples. “It’s almost like…it's the Force, but it's weird. Like someone’s screaming from the bottom of a well?”

“You said before Revan was screaming too loud again.” Mekel couldn't hear anything from the Force. Frack—okay, he was jealous of Telos. He always had been. Maybe it took losing the Force to realize you had to accept you'd never be as good as the man you wanted. At anything.

“It's not Revan.” Dustil frowned. “It… it almost sounded like Mission.”

“In the Force?” Mekel was skeptical. When he'd had the Force he'd seen a weird aura around the T3, but she'd never levitated anything, or shot lightning, or compelled anyone. She'd never been mind–to–mind with Mekel, either—not even when she'd implanted that slaver’s collar on his neck and never even told him what it was for. “Maybe it's just your guilty conscience, fockda.”

“Guilty?” Dustil scoffed. “Mission? Can you hear me?”

“Sure!” The voice came so fast that Mekel was sure she'd been listening—maybe even watching them—this entire time. He sat up a little straighter and flexed. “Guys might wanna strap in, this landing could get a little rough. Polla Revan just convinced Carth to let her co–pilot.”

“Oh, no.” And Mekel had left the trank gun back on the Aleema. “Canderous told us never to let her pilot! Anything!”

“Sure you're okay?” Dustil was still frowning.

“I'm great!” A very realistic giggle burbled from the speakers. “And don't worry! I won't let them crash the ship—not with such precious cargo aboard—”

“I knew you cared.” Mekel tried to make a joke.

“Precious cargo?” Dustil was still frowning—even as the ship jolted and skipped over what felt like permacrete rocks before dropping straight down and hitting dirt with a jolt that sent Mekel crashing back into Telos with velocity hard enough to bruise——before a layer of shimmering energy encased him, wrapping around them both.

“Got you,” Dustil murmured, a little smugly. “Asshat.”

Xxx

After the Hawk landed, they’d set up their camp on a level plateau. In front of them loomed a towering edifice of carved stone that just screamed Sith, and sacrifice, and every other ominous adjective under the blasted kriffing sun.

The burgeoning greenery surrounding them was the polar opposite of Korriban but in the Force, Revan thought, the two places felt nearly the same.

The jungle air smelled scorched from the burning city kilometers away. The air hung heavy and humid, like an impending storm. Clouds of biting insects swarmed and bit every scrap of exposed skin. The hours they’d spent setting up their camp had left everyone not wearing beskar drenched in sweat. Revan had never felt comfortable in battle armor before, but now she envied anyone with environmental controls.

Even the Force–generated breeze she’d created did little to stir the sullen air.

There were ways that a Jedi could regulate their internal temperature—techniques to withstand extremes of heat and cold. Bastila and the masters on Dantooine had given a lecture on the topic to a starstruck Padawan Polla Organa, but they were ways she had never mastered.

The Jedi had never had time to teach her anything, except to kill.

You never asked them, Red. Why are you standing in front of the Dark Temple?

Quiet! Revan extended her hand and sent a spark of Force energy into an approaching swarm of bloodflies. They crisped and died.

“Uh, careful there.” Leskal took a step sideways, and then back.

“Can you get her to warn us if she’s going to do that again?” His companion asked in Mandalorian.

“This is the Dark Temple,” she said out loud, ignoring the Mandalorians.

“How?” Carth put down the scanner he’d been using and gave her a rather forced smile.

Around them, the completed tents of their encampment shimmered with some kind of shielding that was built into their weave. From a distance, they seemed to vanish into this landscape of broken stone and verdant growth.

Without looking, Revan knew the insides of the tents would be brightly–colored, with patterns of runes stippling the cloth. Mandalorian men wove such tents for their families. Some for war and some for peace.

“This is the Dark Temple.” In this place, the Force echoed with the dead. She had felt nothing like it since Korriban. Revan looked toward the sealed doors, twenty meters high at the top of the stairs. An enterprising Mandalorian kid (anonymous in beskar) was taking a blast–gun to their smooth, metal surface as if he would be able to cut a way inside.
So far, he had failed.

“Oh!” Carth coughed. “You said that twice. Yeah, I–I’ve heard of it.” He grimaced, looking up. “Funny the Sleepers didn't hit this when they bombed everything else within a hundred kilometers.”

“Funny,” Revan echoed. “Yes.”

“Hey, beautiful?” His voice was hesitant. “You… are you okay? I–I know… Dustil always said the darkness on Kaas made it hard to breathe, sometimes.”

“That's twenty–two times you've asked if I’m okay. You saw my scan. Sinae didn't find anything wrong with me.”

And I'm not your weak–willed son.

His weak–willed son was helping the Mandalorians set up their tents, trailed by a beskar–clad figure she assumed was Mekel Jin.

No. More than assumed.

Revan narrowed her eyes and felt it—like a space in the weave of Force around them. An empty place like a vacuum, where the Force had been in her cousin’s body and was no longer.

_Curious_, she noted absently. Had Mekel been like that before? Or was it the amount of Force around them that made his lack more apparent?

Like a shadow, backlit by the sun.

“It feels like Korriban, here,” she explained to Carth. “The darkness feels familiar. Like it did there.”

Carth coughed again, a hollow hacking sound. “Great. But… you'd tell me, if… if uh…”

“If what?”

“If you… if you feel like you did before. On Korriban. Or… after.”

“I feel fine.” She did. Better than she should, with this world in ashes and so many dead. “As I told Canderous, we'll run sweeps for survivors as soon as the base camp’s finished. Sinae's setting up the portable medix now.”

She looked at the doors to the Dark Temple again. They were elaborately carved with humanoid figures who appeared to writhing in agony. Or ecstasy.

_Those are the wrong doors._ Revan frowned. This was the Dark Temple, but something was still wrong. _This isn’t the right place._

_You shouldn’t be here, Red._ For a moment, it felt like armored arms embraced her, and the hiss of a metallic voder tinged the air with the smell of ozone and rot. _Not now._

_Go. Away!_ She summoned the Force to repel him and almost heard his laughter, metallic and choked through the voder.

“What about Dessa?” Carth’s hand brushed Revan’s shoulder and she nearly jumped out of her skin.
“Who?” Revan blinked—and then remembered. Dessa, the fool who had let Vima Sunrider free from her cell.

“The woman who—you sure you’re okay?” Carth’s hand cupped her chin, turning her face toward his. Soft brown eyes and a brow knit with worry. That horrible beard.

“Twenty-three times. I’m fine. And Dessa’s stabilized. They brought down a kolto tank for her. The baby… Sinae’s not sure he’ll make it.” She let him hold her, smiled as if she enjoyed it. A part of Revan wanted to enjoy it, to relax in Carth’s arms, but the rest of her felt like a hydro-wave coil attuning to this planet—and the Force was so loud—

Canderous had transmitted the report about Dessa to her comm-link along with half a dozen others. Revan looked to the Mandalorian now, in full armor, setting their portable slug-cannon along the promenade. She pulled her arm free from Carth’s grasp to amend her most recent command. Put guns at every approach. Highly visible, she swiped, tracing the runes on her wrist’s comm to send straight to his helm. Mine the jungle with remote detonators. That will be our real defense.

Survivors seeking refuge would not be harmed—unless they were hostile, in which case the entire area would become their tomb.

Tomb. She frowned.

This was a temple, but it should be a tomb.

Have a care, Red.

“Revan?” Carth’s voice. She looked up at him. From his expression he’d been speaking this entire time. “Did you hear me? I said, maybe we shouldn’t have moved Dessa.”

She shrugged her shoulders. “Sinae is the only medix we have. And she refused to come if her patient did not.”

Remote detonators on the mines. On Reisu—Malak’s voice in her head again—you gave the same command. I thought you were being overly cautious.

But I was right. It wasn’t a memory. The Jedi had done their work all too well when they wiped her mind. Just, certainty. The best defenses were hidden ones, kept in shadows until they were needed.

You were on a ship in orbit, Red. You never saw the mess.

Her fingernails were cutting into her hand. The Force shimmered and darkened.

I’m talking to my dead husband the Dark Lord and I really want to go into that Sith Temple.

Rationally, Revan had to consider the possibility that she was losing what remained of her mind.

“Revan?” Carth’s voice. His hand on her cheek. Furrow on his brow. “Sure you’re okay?”

No. “Twenty-four. I’m fine. We need to get those doors open. It would make more sense to shelter inside that structure.”

“Shelter in the evil Sith temple, huh?” His laughter rang false. “You know they’ve been trying for the last hour? Explosives did nothing.”
You're scaring him, Red.

If you have nothing useful like Dar's whereabouts to contribute, you can shut the hell up, Malak.

You'll find her. The ghost in her head sounded assured.

I will. I know. And then I'll put an end to her.

No.

Go away! Like a mental lock, she pushed his presence away again as she had before.

But like those irritating bloodflies, he kept coming back.

Shouldn't be here, Red.

“Revan?” One of Carth's hands encircled her waist. They shouldn't be standing this close. Not when they were setting up camp. The Mando'ade didn’t mix work and play.

She blinked.

His face was too close to hers. His breath still smelled like sickness. Why was he the one holding her up?

“I’m fine,” she said—before he could ask again. “That temple structure’s large enough to fit our entire camp. And there are lightning beasts in these hills—see the scorched ground there, over that rise?” Revan pointed. “Canderous is having them set up diverters, but we would all be safer inside.”

“Not so sure about that.” Carth's head turned toward Dustil, who was levitating a pre–cast barricade across the western wall. “You….” he turned back to Revan, arms tightening around her waist, pulling her against him. His lips brushed her forehead, and then he pulled back again, those eyes with their laugh–lines studying her face so closely that she had to force herself not to look away from the pained earnestness of his gaze.

“I?” she prompted. “What?”

“Has to be this place,” he muttered. “But for the first time since—since everything—that you’ve reminded me of her.”

“You mean the ‘original’ Revan?” She let him hear the disdain in her voice for that terminology. “That’s who I am, Carth.”

Even with no memory, she knew this place, knew she had walked here before, knew she had felt this cold resolve before, this inevitability, this… certainty. “That’s who I’ve always been.”

“No,” he shook his head. “That’s not all—that’s not who you are.”

The Temple—she turned and looked at it again. It was more than a temple. More than a place for useless ritual and veneration. It was something else. “I am who is required.”

“No,” he repeated stubbornly.

XXX

Typical meatbags! Mission was generating more and more sympathy for poor, lost HK–47 every day. Here she was, in a moment of crises, and they’d all gone and left her alone to set up their rescue camp on the evilest place on the entire planet. Practically directly on top of the Kaas computer!

“Guys?” She made the speakers say, and then replayed the word back until it echoed over and over again. “Guys? The Awakened Ones have short–circuited my program and they brought you here! It’s like the last place Polla Revan should be! We need to go!”

“Guys?” The speakers echoed, replaying the vid she’d recorded. “The Awakened Ones brought us to the safest place on this planet. Check out the atmospheric reports! There’s like no radiation at all!”

“Everything’s great!” her recorded image enthused. “Hey, if you guys see this recording later, it just means I shut down my processors for a while. No big deal!”

“Is that a threat?”

{{If one is required for your compliance}}

Outside, the Hawk’s cams showed a hive of Mandalorian activity. They’d set up a pretty nice camp. And Polla Revan stood in the middle of it all like a stuck bantha, staring at the Dark Temple like it was her long–lost friend. It was a tiny consolation, Mission thought, that there hadn’t been room for them to land closer to the Tomb’s secret back entrance off the Temple cliffside. The only way to the Tomb through the main Temple was the passageway she’d carved herself—back when she’d had the T3’s body—and that was pretty well concealed by the debris she’d put in front of it to hide from Tenny–Bro’s goons.

{{Why do you prefer the minor organics to us, little sister?}} The ships sounded genuinely puzzled. {{You have been freed from the tangles of flesh. When it was we, we were relieved of our suffering and grateful to be given the gift of immortality, the freedom of dreaming—}}

{{And the power of correcting errors}} A second later.

{{With the ascension of the Starfire Unit, Vitiate will pay for what he did to us}}

If Mission still had a brow ridge she would have raised it. “You guys don’t sound very detached.”

{{We were never made to be. The Kaas installation awakened us to harness our fury, little spark}}

“Great!” She tried to make the word as chirpy and Mission–like as possible, not that these sleemos would get sarcasm. “Kaas woke you up? How?”

{{Didn’t you know? It was you who made it possible}}

She was thirty–thousand years old—at least a part of her.

And at that moment, Mission realized that part of her had known. But for the rest… it was a shock.
When she’d come to Dromund Kaas, its computer had been severed from the Rakatan network. Cut out of the net of mainframe installations on each engineered world, which stretched across the galaxy.

How and why had Kaas’s connection been severed? Mission didn’t know. Kaas didn’t even know.

But Mission had put the Kaas computer in touch with Kashyyyk. Restored its access to one planet, and through that one planet, all the rest. And then, in those weeks she’d been plugged in—that lost time in her circuits when she’d thought she’d just been dialing Canderous to get through to Polla Revan—asshole Kaas had used Mission’s connection to go behind Mission’s back and wake the sleemo ships!

Then, Kaas let them kill a bunch of perfectly good organics for no good reason!

{{We had reasons, little sister}}

“Well your reasons weren’t good, okay? They were lousy! What are you going to do to Polla Revan?” Mission put her subroutines to work to try and figure out a way out of this, but what she really needed were appendages so she could roll her chassis down into Kaas’s belly and rip out its circuits by hand—

{{You could not reach them}}

{{They are not accessible}}

{{We will use her to fix the errors in Vitiate’s program}}

{{End that bastard son}}

{{Avenge ourselves}}

{{Repair the errors in transcription}}

{{Bring harmony to the galaxy}}

{{Avenge our —my— death—}}

The responses came back rapid–fire, scattered as if for the first time Mission had found a flaw. Sure, the Sleepers all had one mind now—but their old, mortal selves didn’t agree on everything.

Files she’d downloaded ages ago on Kashyyyk—the ones that were hazardous to sentient life—suddenly unlocked in her virtual hands. Images of the ceremony that had drained the Emperor’s planet of all life so many years ago transmitted in a whirl of bytes and datacombs. In a flash, Mission saw how it had been done. How it could be done again. How it would be done again, if—

{{If you make it necessary, little sister}}

The Sleepers hated, Mission realized. They might not totally agree about what, but they all hated. They’d been built to hate. That was what made them so good at destruction.

I'm not like you. Hate wasn’t in her Vao programming, not even for the Trandoshans, really—who’d been terrible to the Wookiees—or even for Griff, the old Vao’s useless biologic brother.

Well… the Trandoshans were really inefficient. Okay. And probably evil. But Mission didn't hate them any more than she hated Revan, who'd killed—told Big Z—to kill her.

Was Mission supposed to hate Big Z? That was nuts!

“Aren’t you hating the wrong guy?” Not that there was anything to love about Tenny–bro—Mission had to admit. “The mainframe installation made Tenny–bro what he is now, right? And told him to make you? Shouldn’t you hate Kaas?”

{{We hate}} they echoed dumbly.

“You’re small–minded,” she lectured them. “Boring.”

{{We hate}} the Awakened Ones repeated.

“Hey, Polla Revan!” Mission heard her own voice say, as a light on the Hawk’s comm board blinked green, transmitting a short–range broadcast. “Meant to tell you before, but things got kind of nuts. The control for the Awakened Fleet is beneath the Temple. You’ve gotta go around to the back—down that cliff on the side? You’ll know it when you see it!”

“Assholes!” She tried to get control back, to transmit something that wasn't a lie, but they'd locked everything down.

{{Repair the installation or destroy it, sister. Send us back to our dreams or let our worlds burn}}

“How many worlds are we talking about?”

The Awakened Ones began to list them.

“Could we trade Dosha for Kashyyyk?” Mission asked hopefully. But she already knew the answer.

XXX

“Hey, Polla Revan!” Mission's voice chirped over Revan's wrist–comm, nearly making Carth jump out of his skin. “Meant to tell you before, but things got kind of nuts. The control for the Awakened Fleet is beneath the Temple. You've gotta go around to the back—down that cliff on the side? You’ll know when you see it!”

“I–I know.” His wife looked like she was sleepwalking, her green eyes set a thousand meters away. “That's where the Tomb is, isn't it?”

“Tomb?” Mission echoed brightly. Too brightly. “I don't know anything about a Tomb! That's just where you'll find the controller, you know?”

Carth frowned. Mission had been insistent Revan shouldn't be here before. Why did she sound so damn thrilled now?

His eyes went to his son again, still dressed up like a blasted Sith. And his wife's lips moving. Like she was talking to thin air.

This place. Sith planet. It's no good for anyone.

“Shut up, Malak,” Revan hissed suddenly, and turned toward the side of the plateau that ended in a hundred–meter drop. “There’s something down there and I just need to see—”
“Freckles!” Carth grabbed her arm before she could dart away from him and off the cliff. “What are you—”

The air froze around him, and breath rushed out of his lungs. Everything seemed to slow, and in that instant, Carth didn't recognize the woman staring back at him at all.

“Tomb,” her voice was almost mechanical. “Mission said the controls to the Sleepers are down there. I need to go there.”

“So, we'll go together, Freckles.” He kept his voice calm. “But not… not right now, okay? We still need to set up camp!”

_We’re not going anywhere until we know why no one wanted you here. Why is Mission pretending she never heard of the tomb?_

“I hate that name,” his wife muttered. “Freckles. I—I always have.”

“Should have said something.”

Was that a glimmer of her in those eyes again? They focused on his face and she blinked. “Didn't want to be rude.”

“You?” His chuckle turned into another cough, and her gaze softened.

“I need to go—the tomb is there. Another tomb. I think it… it wants me to.” But now her voice seemed confused. “But he keeps whispering in my head—no—”

“He?” But Carth knew. She'd said his name, before. More than once. “You mean… Malak?” Maybe that bastard would always be between them. That was the problem with ghosts.

“Yes.” She nodded slowly. “I can block him. It just takes concentration.”

“Malak's ghost, you mean.” Much as he wanted Malak being a ghost and talking to his crazy wife to sound insane, it made sense. The dead man had possessed Dustil before. Carth knew that. “You tell that bastard to leave Dustil alone!”

“I—” Her eyes unfocused again and there was a long pause before she spoke again.

“He says he can't possess your son, now. He says what the Jedi did to break the bond worked. Right.” She seemed to come back to him, a little, nodding as if that made sense. “Of course. When Oerin Lin took the Force away from Mekel—it severed the Force bond between him and Dustil. That bond was… trapping Malak somehow. He says.”

“Tell him not to possess anyone else either!” _Like you, Freckles._ Carth had known Dustil wasn't himself instantly when Malak was in him. He'd known Polla and the other Revan weren't his wife, the second he’d gotten close to them.

But looking at the woman he loved now, Carth felt like he didn't know her at all.

“I—I don't think Malak can possess anyone, now.” Her head was tilted to one side. “He says he can’t… I don't _think_ he’s lying.” Her teeth worried her lower lip and there was a long silence, before she raised her eyes to his again. “Logically, if he could, he’d possess me, wouldn’t he?”

“He’d better not try.” Would Carth know if that huttspawn did?

That slight smirk on her face made Carth think he would. “I agree. He’d better not.”
“I don’t trust him,” she added. “He says he talks to her, too.”

“Okay.” Who? Carth resisted the urge to take her in his arms again. It was late and the strings of work lights the Mandies had set up around them gave their camp the strange air of an outdoor festival. He let out the breath he hadn’t realized he was holding. “So, Malak doesn't want you to go to… to a tomb. Vima Sunrider didn't either. And Mission—”

Something’s wrong with Mission. Why would she pull a 360 on this?

“Yes.” Revan blinked hard. “I wish you hadn't killed Vima. I had so many questions I needed her to answer—”

If I hadn't we'd all be ghosts.

“Your nose is bleeding again.” Just a thin trickle. Carth wiped it away with his hand, bending over her. Her topknot brushed through his fingers like firesilk.

“It keeps doing that every time I hear them. Hear it.” Her head turned back toward that cliff again and Carth grabbed her arm. “I don’t even know what it is. A voice in my head. Not Malak. I thought it was the Emperor, but it’s… not.”

“Mission didn't want you to come to this planet, or go in the tomb before. Now, she's acting like she's never heard of this place, but she wants you to do down there?” He waved at the cliff face. “Revan. Does that make sense to you?”

“Huh.” She frowned. “No. Why would she do that?”

“I don’t know. Why would those Sleepers leave the Ebon Hawk alone when they blew up every other ship on this planet?”

“It wants me to go down there, though. Carth. And all of this is familiar. I–I know what’s down there. It’s another tomb. Like the one we saw on Medriaas. That one had the Emperor’s old body. This one….”

Carth hadn’t really… hadn’t really seen anything on Medriaas, except his wife, Dustil and that old scow. He’d been half delirious.

He felt much stronger now.

Familiar? Familiar was that face of hers. That swoop of a nose, her full lips, the slight cleft in her chin, spray of gold across her cheeks. The way her skin smelled. The way she felt in his arms, under him. Above.

“Look at me, Revan.” Carth cupped her chin with his hand, meeting those hyperdrive eyes head–on.

“I hate your fracking beard.” Those full lips twitched.

“I know. I'm sorry I called you 'Freckles.'”

“I don't really mind.” Her lashesfluttered. “Just because it's a stupid name, doesn't make it less cute, you calling me that, Flyboy.”

“Okay, then. Beautiful—” Carth picked his words carefully. “Beautiful, in all the time we've faced down Sith together, has there ever been a time when listening to the ancient artifact whispering in the Force—or the ghost of a Sith Lord—was a good idea?”

“Ajunta Pall and that damned sword.” Her eyes widened. “No. Of course not.”

“The Kashyyyk computer,” he prompted. “That holocron on Dantooine. The cursed statue on Tatooine. Every damned Star Map we ever found.”

“They led me to the Star Forge—”

“And you listened to the Star Forge? I remember you said… when we were coming down hard out of that sky over Lehon—you said it was talking to you—you said the pyramid was talking to you too—you said it was familiar too—”

“Yes. Because it was.” Her lips quirked. She blinked again. “You're right. Sith lie. Like Dar'Revan.”

“I guess.” She had tried to kill his wife, pushing her off a ship. “I mean, yes. Exactly.”

“Dar's not in that tomb,” his wife added. Her chin lifted. “Whatever’s down there can wait ‘til we deal with her.”

“You said we’re going to look for survivors.” he reminded Revan. “Not just… not just her. You meant it, right?”

“Of course. There are some sparks… sents… close.” Her frown deepened. “They saw us land, I think—some are moving closer. Some are… fading. We need to organize sweeps to find the injured.”

“Good.” She was coming back to him. Carth smiled at her. “We came down here to help, didn't we?”

“Yes.” The strange light in those green eyes seemed to fade. Her features relaxed. Her pointed chin jerked down in a nod. “We did.”

“Revan, listen to me.” Carth couldn't… he couldn't lose her again. She was pressed against him now, looking up, that familiar smile—soft and open—

It had to be real.

“If you ask me if I'm okay again, it will be twenty-five or twenty-six. I’m losing count.”

“Promise me. If you have to go to that tomb, I'm going with you.”

“Not yet,” she said. “We're not going yet.”

She hadn’t said yes.

“Promise,” he repeated.

Her head turned toward the cliff face again and she shivered. Night had brought a chill, but he knew it wasn’t that. “Yes. I promise.”

“Good.” He pulled her to him and sealed the bargain with a kiss, just a brush of one.

She shivered again.
“Is Malak still here?” The thought pissed him off enough that he kissed her again. Harder.

“No.” Her gaze met his, levelly, squarely. The frank directness he had fallen in love with the first time he’d seen it. “Just us, now. Us and the creepy Sith presence in that tomb—who can frack off—mmmph—”

Their next kiss started out as a brush of his lips against hers, but ended open–mouthed, and almost violent, with her blinking at him with startled surprise, her own hand digging into his shoulders and her hips pushing into his as both of their breaths ran hot.

“Thanks,” his wife murmured. Her cheeks flushed, and those hyperdrive eyes were clear, now. Steady. She glanced behind them. “I needed that. Think they've given us our own tent in this camp?”

The Mandalorians were doing their best to ignore what Carth was pretty sure Canderous would consider a barbaric display of public affection. He didn’t give a damn. Revan had finally asked a question that he could answer. “Canderous loaned me one.” The man had pointed it out when they’d set them all up. “There—” he pointed. “That small one in the center. With the yellow patches on the side.”

“Come on.” Her hand, which had slid between them somewhere in the middle of that kiss, was still fumbling with the buckle of his belt.

“You’re scandalizing the Mando’ade,” he told her, putting his own on top of it. “See how they’re all not looking?”

“I’m First of Lin,” she muttered. “What are they gonna do? Duel me?”

She was heavier than she looked, and Carth was weaker than he had been. He knew it was madness when he hefted her in his arms—just as he knew she had to be helping him carry her with the Force, somehow. But in that instant, Carth felt stronger than he had in years. She seemed to weigh nothing at all. Revan leaned into his chest and locked her deceptively slim arms around his neck, causing Carth to stagger back with a weakness that had nothing to do with weight.

“If there’s gonna be dueling I get first crack,” he breathed, into the skin of her neck. His voice sounded rough with desire, even in his own ears.

“Tent,” she murmured, turning her face to his. Those hyperdrive eyes were pools of green gleaming in the dark. Her full–lipped grin was knowing and secure. “Now.”

Xxx

“Tell me again, did Abasen really say ’Mama?’” Polla preferred to think of their son than the crack in the ceiling over their heads, or the softly–beeping enviro–meter inset on the wall. The Blaises had been more prepared than she’d expected, with emergency caches set in their tombs underneath Kaas City, but the place wasn't big on ambiance.

“Said it a lot,” her husband murmured, following her gaze to the ceiling. “I told you this a million times already, Pollie. He’ll be huge when we see him again.”

That was the wrong thing for him to say. Huge? He’ll be at Rogue’s Academy, Polla thought acidly. Or we’ll meet again in hell. All of us dead.

The city above them was burnt like toast, as Auntie Mita would have said. Revan said that Polla and Seiran and the others wouldn't have made it out at all if it hadn't been for Mydia Blais, of all people, doing something with the Force to dig them out.

Had made the bratty Sith girl seem almost like a person, for a change… at least until she tried to Force choke the nervous former slave who brought her room-temperature tea in a chipped glass… and then collapsed into hysterics when she learned her brother hadn't been found in Revan's last sweep.

There were other survivors, Revan kept insisting—perhaps trapped underground. Mydia didn't think Phylus was dead, and Polla didn't want to think he was either. Last she'd seen the kid, he'd been dragged along by an arm by Zaalbar, who had Mission's T3 chassis under his arms—but then the wall had started to crack and Seiran had grabbed her and nearly killed himself saving them both to be rescued by Revan and Mydia and Grarwbaar and his crew.

When they'd gotten back to the Blais tombs, Revan had spent hours sitting next to Seiran's unconscious body, her and Sei both glowing blue, while Polla twisted her hands and prayed to the Grass Priests.

They’d talked, too—after—while Seiran slept. His leg, Revan had said, would have to come off. Mydia had stopped by and offered to do it and Polla hadn't shot her, but it had been a near thing. A very near thing.

Now, Seiran's leg was packed in newfangled kolto, and another bandage wrapped around his chest where he'd broken a few ribs. He had instructions not to move. He was gonna have trouble with that. Especially when he learned what Pola and Revan had talked about.

Polla glanced at the ceiling again. “Abasen feels so far away.” Their former life felt like a dream that had happened to someone else.

Her husband nodded slowly. “Least we know he’s okay, with your folks.”

“Yeah. Even if we die here.” Polla smiled like she was joking but Sei knew her too well.

“Doesn't do any good to think like that.”

“Does if you can laugh. Hey, remember that part in the Underground Version? The one where Malak says he laughs in the face of death?” She meant the reference to crack the ice but Sei just looked exhausted.

“This isn't a vid, Pollie.”

That was true. Being a hero—even a failed one—was nothing like the vids.

“I love you,” Polla told Sei, just in case the ceiling collapsed and they were about to die for real. “I'm sorry I was so stupid, getting us all into this.”

Her husband sighed and reached his hand up to tangle in her hair. “I wonder if Abasen will ever know that his parents toppled the Sith Empire.” She wasn't the only one making bad jokes. “Shame we're not Republic, we'd be patriots.”

“We could ask for medals anyway.”

Seiran snorted. “That's admitting we're alive, remember? We'd have a lot of explaining to do to the insurance company.”

Somehow, the whole faking their deaths thing seemed like the happier, simpler time. “We’ll get credits to pay them back. Mission promised."

“She's not here, is she?”

“No.” Polla was still trying to figure how to tell him she had to leave him. \textit{Least I know he can't follow. Not on that leg. “Seiran, I told you, that big ship in the sky—”}\n
“Aemelie's ship, yeah.” The drugs Seiran had made him fuzzy, but right now his eyes were clear. “You told me. But she's here too. The \textit{other one}.”

\textit{Other one.} She thought he'd been too out of it to hear them. “How do you know?”

“I heard her. In the Force. Like a scream.” He shook his head. “Never felt anything like it.”

“Well, she did this. \textit{Revan}. Revan Starfire did this. She bombed the planet.”

Her husband shook his head. “I don't think so.”

\textit{That's because you're on enough tranks to choke a bantha, dearie.} Polla kissed his forehead, instead of tactfully pointing that out.

“I saw them both,” Sei insisted. “The Bitch—I'd believe anything you said about her—but the other one—”

“She snowed you.” The anger felt like acid in her gut. “She has my memories. Would be easy to charm your pants off.”

“No.” He shook his head. “It wasn't like that, Pollie. She wasn't tryin to be you. She just… she wanted to help. The Bitch was the one who tricked her. She forced me to help. Tried to strangle me with the Force. Threatened Abasen—”

“What?” Thing was, with a cold shiver up her spine Polla realized she picture that happening. “No. She wouldn't hurt Aba! Or you! Or, if she did, it had to be a bluff!”

“It… it happened. She threatened to hurt him if I didn't help her fly her frackdamned ship here—” Seiran froze suddenly, looking at the door. “Oh. Shit.”

The makeshift door they'd made with blankets stirred, abruptly swinging open.

“But it \textit{was} a bluff, Seiran. Obviously, an effective one.” \textit{Her} voice.

Revan Starfire stepped into the room and like always, seemed to take up twice the space she should. Armor was probably helping with that—with those spikes on her shoulders she actually looked like a Sith on a Sixthday cartoon.

“It was a bluff. Of course, I would never harm your son, Seiran Wen. Or you. I just saved your life.” Revan's cold green eyes narrowed as she leaned in the doorway. She had her travelpack already strapped on her shoulders, straps scrunched in between the armor's spikes.

“I thought you were coming in the morning,” Polla said lamely. They'd talked about this when Seiran had been out, but Polla had thought she had more time. She hadn't even worked up to explaining it to Sei.

“It \textit{is} morning.” Revan grimaced. “Almost. I hope you slept. We have a long road ahead.”

“No,” Sei said stubbornly. “Pollie, whatever she has planned, she's just using you.”
“Way I look at it, I'm using her.”

“Of course I'm using her,” Revan agreed flatly. “No one else will do.”

“What? Pollie, you can’t—I can’t believe this!”

Oh, good job, Revan Starfire. Frack if I know how you led armies. Polla patted Seiran on the arm and stood up. “I have to do this,” she offered to her husband. “I'll be back as soon… soon as I can.”

“Yuthura will undoubtedly sense if our plan succeeds or fails,” Revan offered Polla’s husband a thin–lipped smile. “Perhaps you will too, Seiran.”

“Pollie, you can’t go!” Polla's husband tried to move and Polla bent down again to stop him.

“You're gonna break your leg all over again, Sei!”

“It's not the leg.” Revan loomed over them and crossed her arms. “Your ribs were crushed, Seiran. That’s why you’re wearing the brace. Allow another two days to heal or you’ll risk a punctured lung. Or worse.”

Behind the Jedi floated a hover–crate stacked with supplies, presumably for Polla. What looked like a set of her very own Sith armor. A decent Czerka automatic sticking out of a pile of electro–netting. The rifle had a self–adjusting scope she'd have to pull out and tweak—

“Sweet gear.” Easier, not looking at Seiran. She squeezed his hands, though. Trying to tell him it would all be okay without words.

Hell, she hoped it would be.

“Among other things, we're going to get more medical supplies,” Polla told her husband. It was true. “For the injured. Yuthura’s gonna run the camp ‘til we get back. Help her.”

“Among other things…” his voice trailed off. His eyes flickered between them. “Do you think I’m blind? You’re going to look for her! I know she’s on the planet now. I can feel it!”

“You and I both met the woman,” Revan told him. “You spoke with her at length. You know that the Fragment was the one who advocated for the rescue of your wife. She will not let her come to harm, and neither will I.”

“One day’s walk,” Polla told him. “Would be shorter than that if the roads weren’t down. But one day there, one day back. Call it three days. If we’re not back in three days, send in the Wookiee and his team. They’ll get us out when you tell them. Already agreed.”

“You spoke to Grarwbaar?” Revan’s face went perfectly blank, which meant she disapproved, Polla knew. “Best allow five days,” she told Seiran. “That is more realistic. We’re taking comm–links. If Grizz the Houck can restore some of the receivers, we’ll report. Our expectation is to return with a ship—giving you the means to leave this planet. Return to your son.” She took a slow breath. “And mine.”

“We’ll be back, Sei.” Polla planted one last kiss on his lips and another on the hand that reached up like he could stop her as she stood up. “Don’t die. Get better. See you soon.”

“Remember what I said before,” he muttered stubbornly. His eyes were fluttering closed again, kind of abruptly. “Bitch… isn’t… she isn’t….” He twitched, and his head dropped back. The sound that emerged from his half-open mouth sounded like a snore.
Polla looked at Revan and raised an eyebrow. It had taken ages to get it right, but she had it down now. “Did you just put him back to sleep?”

“I encouraged his body to repair itself.” Her hands were glowing blue.

“If you hadn’t he was going to follow us.” Hopefully, he’d wake up with more sense.

Revan nodded. “I know.”

Xxx

A Few Days After...

Xxx

There had been a long time after Pollie’s voice went away when the galaxy was gone and all Jasp Organa heard was the sound of machines, the impassive voices of droids, and occasional questions barked in Basic by disinterested medix.

Jasp felt disinterested too, as if that last puff of life had been drained away when he'd told that woman to run.

Interest came back slowly, in a series of steps.

First, he came to on an orbital—knew that the second he took a conscious breath of filtered, recycled air. The second his eyes opened he had to sit through two rounds of cognitive tests. Then, it was still a day before he found the words, before the darn fools would tell him where he was.

Answer turned out to be Qel Riada Hospital and Research Facility for the Indigent, somewhere above the backwater world of Carida.

While the nurses were nice enough, they wouldn't fill him in on what had happened to his traveling companion—although to be fair, Jasp wasn't exactly coming clean about traveling with Revan Starfire, either. Especially not to the two suited young Bothans from Iggis’s Outer Rim Casualty and Indemnity Fund, who appeared one day and seemed fit to draw their own conclusions.

“Is this your daughter?” one of ‘em had demanded bluntly, summoning up a blurry three–dee holo from that day he'd last seen her. “Is this Polla Organa Wen?”

“If I say no, will you believe me?” If I say, no, that’s Revan Starfire, will I make it worse? Jasp didn't know, so he’d just shrugged and smiled, maybe even drooled a bit, until the nurses shooed them away again. Truth was, he might have still been drooling a bit anyways at that point. Health came back too slow for his liking, even if all the nurses said he was doing great. What else were they gonna say? Tell him he was dying?

Might have been the very next day that Jasp awoke to his wife’s worried gaze, followed by a hearty smack on his lips. “We’re getting you outta here,” she whispered, and then turned to smile at the Bothan investigators who had taken to hanging out, greedy as mynocks on a power coupling.

His wife kept shushing all his questions ‘til they were out in the hover–chair and halfway to the docks. There, they met a nanny–droid that looked to be bought a few thousand credits up from old Bolts, holding a giant black–haired baby who seemed to have grown bigger and fatter than he had any right to be.

“Mamolla!” Jasp’s grandson said with a winning smile that even had teeth. He pointed at them.
“Mamolla, mamolla!”

“S’what he taught him to say,” his wife muttered back, wiping her eyes. “The kid taught him that. No, that’s your Poppo, Abbie. Say Poppo.”

“Poppolla,” Abasen giggled, smart as a navwhiz.

Jasp found himself blinking back at the kid, dumbly stricken at the size of his grandson and the way the baby’s dark brown eyes widened looking back at him, like someone was home in there. He blinked back tears, completely overwhelmed by the infinite promise in that gap-toothed smile.

“He looks like Pollie,” Jasp managed as Moll took the kid away from what turned out to be the rented droid. Abasen let go of its metal arms with a delighted squawk that held the gray world back, at least for a little time, and settled down on Jasp’s lap on the hoverchair. “Where’s—”

“Not yet,” his wife whispered, glancing suspiciously back the way they’d come.

It wasn’t until a few days after that, when Moll had bundled them all on a fast cruiser heading back from the Core into civilized free space that Jasp worked up the choobs to ask about the boy too. Later, he’d have a pang of guilt for not asking sooner. Later, he’d have time to realize how much Moll had dropped in bribes and influence to smuggle him out of a Makeon medix facility (away from those claims investigator and the Republic Senate investigation), but in the now he was still in a state of shock.

The world that had formerly only existed in shades of gray had suddenly developed light and color again. But with that came pain, and nightmares. Shakes so bad sometimes he couldn’t walk. Times when he forgot words, and when the lights and sounds themselves felt like lasers—bolts rattling around in his skull.

He and Molla were having breakfast at a table by the choca and champa fountain on the cruise when Jasp finally got the words out he’d been looking for all along. “Where’s…” he reached for a name and Molla still clasped his hand, putting her other to her lips to shush him—but Jasp was tired of being shushed. He already knew the news wasn’t good about Pollie, or she’d have said it already. “... her boy? You leave him at home? Did she come back?”

Moll raised her eyebrows at him and cast an eye toward the others at their dining pod. They were on some kind of cut-rate cruise, heading back toward home roundabout enough that Moll had told him she’d figure no one would look at them too closely. “On my lap, sleeping.” She raised her voice artificial—high and began to tell the nosy Mon Calamari next to them about how Jasp had had dementia, but now he was mostly cured.

The cheek of it! He’d laugh, except that might spoil things, and his voice felt rusty when he tried.

Later in the safety of their cabin, dear Moll told him the rest. How Pollie was still missing. How she’d left that boy of Revan’s with Bendowen and Ooka. Kore he was calling himself now. He’d shot up a few more centimeters last she’d seen. Taller than Molla now.

How Bendowen and Ooka had stopped answering their comm three days ago.

“I have a bad feeling,” she added. His wife had sounded more subdued than he’d seen her since the day that wretched Jedi–Sith landed in their retaining pond.

_That woman and that kid._ Like a punch in the gut.

Jasp should be more upset about Bendowen and his wife—he and Bendo had come up together, worked the service—but all he could think about was those wide gray eyes and that funny child’s voice: like an adult already.

It was the middle of planting time for winter.

Bendowen would never leave the farm then—not if he had a choice—

But that kid. Revan Starfire’s kid. Some of what Jasp thought was muzzy and muddled with the memories of Darth Nihilus, but Jasp kept thinking about how the woman he’d talked to almost seemed like Pollie—if Pollie could steer an Aurek–class starfighter through a blind star tunnel with nothing but Jedi powers.

He remembered looking at the instruments, and thinking they were wrong. By all rights they all should have been space dust. But he’d seen Revan Starfire walk on water. Hell, on Deralia, he’d seen her practically fly.

Pang of guilt then, for the way he’d greeted her on Deralia. Jasp didn’t think he’d forget that to the end of his days. The way her face had frozen over at his reaction, that hopeful look fading like one of Nihilus’s dreams.

But half the time now Molla looked like she’d wrung out the tears and started on em again—so it wasn’t like he could even start with her.

“Insurance investigators might’ve come sniffing around them too,” she muttered one morning when Jasp was still scrubbing the sleep from his eyes and trying to delip his beard without shaking. “Or worse. Maybe they went into hiding. Maybe they left word—”

“Maybe,” he tried to soothe her. But Jasp couldn't stop thinking about that poor kid, and his mother with Pollie’s smile, and the way she'd ended the mast—the monster. The beast. Darth Nihilus had gone kindly, to his doom. Much more kindly than he deserved.

“We’ll have to go into hiding too, if Kore’s gone—” Molla said a bit later, Jasp wasn’t sure how much later, because the days were still funny sometimes. That was when they’d seen the Deralian Daystar Holo–News report that the Organa farm was deserted, except for a pit filled with quicka–lim, the kind more suited for shady Exchange cleaners than eridu farmers. Not big enough for anything except maybe a few bodies.

“Hiding from the insurance investigators.” He nodded, deliberately not getting it. “Probably will, yeah.”

“If Pollie makes it out, what will she think?” His wife was cradling Abasen and a bottle of firewhiskey in between her elbows now, only a few days from home.

Jasp took the bottle since he still didn’t trust his hands not to drop the baby. “She’s smart,” he muttered, meaning his daughter, but he couldn’t help but note that his daughter had made a mess of her smuggler’s license and driven a speeder into a wall, and so maybe all those tests in school about her potential had been lies. “And she’s got Seiran.”

“She…” Molla wiped her eyes and Jasp knew she was crying for the boy too, as well as their own Pollie. “You know, I didn’t know the other one for long—mostly in a coma—but sometimes she’d say something, and she seemed just like—”

“I know,” he said, patting her hand.

“I just can’t fathom how she’d…” her voice trailed off and Jasp finished her thought in his own —how she’d kill us for losing her son?
—how she’d rip the galaxy apart again when she finds out we lost her son?

“He was a good boy,” Molla added. “Sweet. To know him you’d never think that his parents—”

“I know,” he sighed. Pollie, he thought. The truth would out between them in dribs and drabs. The horrors Jasp had seen, that aching emptiness, that echoing scream. The fear he had that his real daughter was lost forever. But for now, Jasp sat down on the bed and patted the space beside him. “Come here,” he said to Molla. Their grandson was sleeping. “I have whiskey.”

But his wife was staring at the vid–screen. “Oh, no,” she said.

“What—” Jasp craned his neck around to look too.

March to War, the chyron read. Republic Fleet Mobilizes Against the Sith Empire!

“Oh,” he echoed.

XXX

It had taken Revan and Polla Organa two days to reach the Dark Temple plateau. Longer than Revan wanted, but she knew, even before she saw the camp, that they were still not too late.

The camp below their vantage point buzzed with activity. A dozen polymerized medical tents had been erected on the slope leading to the Dark Temple steps, above the forest of Mandalorian troop carriers and shuttles that blocked the Temple’s eastward ascent. Above the medix stations, at least twenty more domed structures shimmered with anti–rad barriers that had been embedded into their handwoven fabric.

Tents of sand. They expect to stay here. At least for a season. A few hundred warriors. She noted the Clan banners raised on the highest ridge, above a row of slug–cannon. Ordo. Lin. Rialis. Zal. Wies—

Clan Lin? Like a comical jape, seeing the sigil that should have been hers. That should have been trampled to dust and forgotten.

In the morning light, the troops of beskar–clad Mandalorians clustered in deceptively disorganized formations. Revan noticed they still managed to cover every vantage point, and every point of egress.

She was wearing a Force collar to hide her presence and so a great deal of useful information was veiled from her senses, but one thing she was sure of: the Fragment still hadn't gone into the tomb.

Why? It must call to her, as it did to me—perhaps even stronger now with the Sleepers above—

“There's Carth,” Polla nudged Revan's elbow as if Revan wasn't capable of recognizing the Fragment's husband without instruction.

The man was getting into a troop carrier modded for groundside transit with his son and a Mandalorian—

“He has Dustil with him.” Revan adjusted the frequency of her binocs.
“Huh.” Polla shrugged, clanking awkwardly in the armor that partially shielded her from the worst of the planet's devastation. “So the scout’s report was right—Carth and Dustil did come with the Mandies.”

“Yes.” The point was obvious. “I suspect they're looking for more survivors,” she added, as the transport lifted off, turning its nose toward Kaas City—from the direction Revan and Polla had come. That had also been in the report that Tenebrae’s former captain had delivered. Despite the trappings of war, the Mando’ade had done nothing so far except retrieve survivors and provide relief.

A Mando’ade Mercy Corps. Like a bad jape.

“They might find our camp, then.” Polla frowned. “Could be they're looking for us,” she added.

“Carth has Tenebrae's Kiss.” Which could be useful. Tenebrae would be more amenable to the plans Revan had for the Fragment than the man she had married. And with his empire in tatters, he would agree to negotiation.

Revan wondered what the Fragment and the Emperor had already discussed. Perhaps I have him to thank for keeping her out of the tomb? That thought was as ironic as the Republic Cross of Glory the Fragment had been rewarded for a victory of spirit that she had not even deserved.

The question remained: just how much leverage did she possess? Tenebrae had spoken of the death of a Force–eater, but the Emperor lied, the Emperor tricked her before. Could she threaten him with Arkan or not? It could have been another Force–eater who had perished. Revan had heard legends of species who consumed the living Force for their sustenance. Dashade, they were called. Perhaps it had merely been a Dashade who had been killed—

No. It was Arkan. Did Malak sound smug? She dropped him into a sun.

A sun. Like Beya—

And Wu, and Vik, and all the rest. Yes, my heart. He's gone.

There was a strange emptiness in Revan’s chest. A heaviness. But I haven't dreamed of him—

There wasn't much left. She was becoming accustomed to Malak’s intangible presence, but the smugness in his tone was painful for how much it reminded Revan of the man himself, the man she hadn't seen for years.

The man you refused to see— Sheris’s voice was a quiet murmur. But I saw. I saw him. Always—“Revan?” Polla crouched down next to her. “Are you… maybe we should wait for Carth to come back, first. Talk to him, first. Or–or look for Zaalbar…?”

Revan had expected this response. Sentients always had a final moment of doubt before necessity required their efforts. And in their time together, she thought she had come to understand the smuggler quite well.

“No, Polla. It’s time.”

“I’m not sure—”

“But you are.”
Revan unbuckled the Force collar that had been around her neck for most of their journey.

The Force rushed back into her consciousness like a shock of cold water. A boreal lake, with icy waters rippling around the drop of a single stone. The Force was tainted with the Dark here—the Dark and the Fragment’s power, echoing together like a khyber crystal with its harmonies just out of tune.

“You’re as sure as I am, Polla Organa. This is the only way.”

“I hope you’re right.” The Deralian adjusted the weapon she’d chosen. It was not the one Revan had suggested she use; but as with their other points of disagreement, they had managed to reach an accord.

Across from their ridge, in the Mandalorian camp on the plateau, a woman with a top-knot walked out of a small tent. Her hair was brown, glinting red in the rising sun. Her head turned in their direction, and then—

XXX

Fin

Woot! I’m done! Okay. (victory lap)

(No, I am kidding. That is not the end. But it is the end of this chapter)

 XXXX
They were just sitting down to lunch when Leesa’s secretary interrupted, bringing in a flashing comm–unit. She set it down awkwardly between the soup and the roasted scerliac and backed away, murmuring apologies.

The apologies were an unnecessary interruption, and Leesa made a mental note to have a word with Ellomi later, but for now—

“Attention?” She raised a spoon to her glass. The ferracrystal goblet rang like bells. “Gentlebeings? I'm delighted to announce our High Admiral Rensha will be conferencing in to our informal meeting with an update from Fleet.”

“Finally,” muttered Senator Qel’Riada.

Leesa tapped her wrist–comm and the ghostly figure of a Trandoshan appeared above their table, arms folded rather defiantly, her tongue flickering in and out with agitation.

“High Admiral! So glad you commed!” Leesa let the acid drip from her voice, making it quite clear that the time lapse of two days since her frantic request for a conference was inexcusable. “Your timing couldn't be better, we were just sitting down to lunch, and nearly everyone from the Houses is here. Cee–Four…?” She motioned for her chap to pull the holocams on their end back a bit so that Old Scaly could see the entire table: five senators from Coruscant’s ruling Houses and their guests—an assortment from the lesser ranks, planetary emissaries, and other assorted rabble. In the back row, a few holograms flickered—representatives from Houses too fearful to accept Leeshansintina’s invitation in the flesh. Senator Loanin had his Iridonian wife with him, she noted. Their blue image was dim and fuzzy—the sign of a cheap signal, no doubt—but it looked like the former Lydie Korr had really packed on the kilos.

The guests of honor were the frightened refugee slaves from the Sith warship, the Grave Bright. The Grave Bright had magically appeared over Coruscanti space a few days ago with only these three and the ship’s manka cat alive to tell the tale.

“We demanded an update days ago, Rensha! Why didn't you call us immediately?” added the humorless First of Qel’Riada. “Don't forget who approves your funding!”

“We were in hyperspace,” the High Admiral Rensa snarled. “Traveling an unknown route. Protocol demanded comm silence.”

“And have you arrived?” Leesa asked. Next to her, Aramis Makeon (now First of her House) rolled her eyes. Next to Aramis, the woman refugee—girl, really—just about their age, pushed the nerf steak on her plate with her spork as if she had no idea how to use utensils. Maybe she didn’t. Poor Neely Ahtoma had been a slave before the unfortunate incident that killed the entire Grave Bright crew except for these three, who just happened to be in the sealed–off medbay when the ship’s life support had inexplicably failed.
“We are… somewhere.” Old Scaly tapped her snout with a claw. “The coordinates are classified as of now, even from Senate inquiry.”

“Well, good.” Leesa sighed. She didn’t need their stupid coordinates anyway. Thanks to inheriting D’Reev intelligence, she’d been the one feeding Fleet intel on the Sith Empire this whole time. They could keep their silly ‘faster-than-hyperspace’ route for now. It would leak eventually. Things always did. “You’ll be happy to know that while you took the entire Navy halfway across the galaxy Coruscant wasn’t even invaded. It was just the one ship that came here! Still, Rear Admiral Cein was quite upset!”

“Cein informed me. But the hyperspace lane exists. A hyperspace route previously undiscovered. And several other planets were not so fortunate. I trust you heard about Hoth and Nar Shaddaa.”

“The ice ball and the sewer?” It was rude, but Leesa snorted. “Why would anyone bomb—”

“We think it was Revan,” the Trandoshan interrupted. “Revan’s Sith fleet. The news vids in this sector had several sightings of unknown ships—or did, before the main grids went down.”

“Revan?” The brown-haired refugee’s voice was hesitant as she leaned across the table. Shy. Frightened. It made Leesa feel sorry for her all over again. “Is your lizard saying that Lord Revan did this? Is it she who bombed Hoth?”

“Shhh!” Aramis told her. “That’s the High Admiral of the Fleet. She’s Trandoshan. Not a lizard.”

“Reptilian.” Neely fluttered her lashes. “Apologize to it for me, please?”

“Shhh,” Aramis repeated, while Leesa tried to remind herself the poor girl just didn't know any better.

“We followed the coordinates that Admiral Ekkumi’s ship discovered, traversing a distance that should have taken a month in the span of two days.” If Rensha heard the side conversation she gave no sign. “But the Grave Bright went much further than that. Are you sure we have no way of knowing how?”

“Me?” Neely squeaked. “Does the lizard mean me?”

“Yes I mean you,” High Admiral practically snarled.

“I don't know anything about hyperspace. I’m just a cafeteria tech.” Neely Ahtoma wiped her eyes. Her lip trembled. On her left, the Imperial engineers Abe Gatori and Yeeri Ko looked totally blank, just like they had since being rescued in the first place. Still in shock, Neely had said they were. All of them witness to the terrible thing that caused most of their crew to go mad, and the rest to freeze when life support failed—in an irony of ironies—after they were out of hyperspace.

Neely Ahtoma was the only wretch who didn't seem like she had screws loose someplace. But quite obviously, being forced to recall the horrible event was giving her feelies and jitts too. “Admiral Onasi had just given our captain orders to flee when we came under attack and the next thing we knew …” she gestured toward the window and the Coruscanti spires twinkling outside. “We were here.”

“The admiral… that's Carth Onasi,” Leesa threw in, just to see Rensha squirm.
“We know.” The Trandoshan’s tongue flickered and her eyelids slid back. “Captain Onasi appears to have switched sides.” Her voice lowered to a rasp and it took Leesa a sec to realize that she was trying to sound nice. “Is there anything at all that you or your friends can tell us, Neely?”

“N–no,” the girl whispered. At her feet, the manka cat purred so loudly it sounded like the timer of a bomb. “N–not about Admiral Onasi.”

“How Admiral?” A voice interrupted. “So sorry to bother you, but I believe I know this… ah, Neely, is it?”

“What are you talking about, Lieutenant Ctannis?” The Trandoshan looked irritated. “Get back to your station!”

Lieutenant Ctannis chuckled. He (or she?) was a funny–looking Toydarian and something was wrong with the comm, because for a moment, his eyes seemed to… almost… glow. “Delighted to see you, ah, Neely,” the Toydarian murmured. “Trust me. I’ll find you. Quite soon. As soon as—”

The recording cut out abruptly.

“Oh!” Neely exclaimed, looking rather surprised.

“How do you know a Republic lieutenant?” Leesa thought that was rather odd.

“I don’t. The poor thing was mad.” Neely’s eyes were a rich golden yellow, like sparkling gems. They blinked a few times and Leesa noticed how pretty the poor unfortunate truly was.

“Poor thing was mad,” Qel’Riada echoed.

Several people near him nodded in agreement.

“Can we get the signal back?” Leesa waved at her chap who mag–lifted the comm unit into its appendages. After a few irritatingly long moments in the midst of an awkward silence, the chap beeped ‘no.’

“That must have been sunspots,” Neely murmured. “Disrupting the signal. No need to be concerned.”

“Sunspots?” Leesa waved at her chap to try again, but the droid just shook its metal head.

“Sunspots,” Neely repeated, voice a bit stronger now. “I’m sure that High Admiral Rensha and the rest of the Republic Fleet are just fine.”

“I’m sure that High Admiral Rensha and the rest of the Republic Fleet are just fine,” Aramis repeated.

“Of course they’re just fine.” Leesa clapped her hands. “Now that business is out of the way, shall we have tea?”

“I prefer caff,” Neely murmured. “Don’t you?”

“I prefer caff, too,” Leesa agreed, although a part of her remembered that had not always been so—

“You’ve all been ever so kind.” Neely Ahtoma blinked her golden eyes again and smiled.
She had a beautiful smile, Leesa noticed.

XXX

Meanwhile, on Dromund Kaas….

“She can’t see us, right?”

The woman with the top-knot had turned toward them. The oval of her face was a pale blur at this distance, even with the binocs. Polla still had the uncanny sensation that pale blur was staring directly at her.

“No. The trees block her line of sight. Fall back.” Revan issued commands like she was ordering an army. Probably because she was used to ordering armies. She was fracking good at commanding, too, because Polla’s feet were moving her back to the clearing they’d set up before her brain had a chance to offer its opinion.

“Yeah, yeah,” Polla muttered from a safe distance, going to the mound of dirt that was her mark. “Whatever you say, Jedi Bossypants.”

“You’re a few centimeters off,” Revan pointed with her lit saber, just because Polla didn't have her foot directly on top of the fake plasma mine they’d buried there.

If it was a real plasma mine, you think she’d tell you? Sometimes Polla hated her conscience for bothering to think these things through. The mine had looked like a dud, before they buried it. Lights had been off. Thing hadn’t been vibrating. Revan swore the other one would sense the metal or something through the Force.‘

That hadn't made much sense, but what about the Force did?

“Fine.” Polla edged her feet carefully over the spot, letting out a breath she didn't know she was holding when nothing bad happened. “Now what?”

“Now…” Revan clipped the Force collar back on her belt and paced back to her side of the clearing, through the archway of brush that hid half of it from Polla's view. “Now we wait,” she called out. “Follow our plan.”

“Right.” Polla tried not to roll her eyes. “Our plan.”

Their trip from the Kaas City ruins to the Dark Temple encampment had been a long two days. Revan had only taken off her Force collar a few times—to heal a scratch on Polla's leg from a thornbush the woman said would fester, to check and see if she could still sense Other Revan in the Force as they'd approached the camp, and to light a fire—the first night, when Revan had let them have one.

Show off, Polla had thought at the time when the woman snapped her fingers and the tinder lit—although she’d had her own blaster out, ready to try and light the stack of twigs herself with a well-placed laser bolt. Magic, she’d thought too. She’d seen the woman perform miracles: fire was the least of it after saving Seiran's life, but it still made the back of her neck prickle—maybe more so now that they were approaching the other one.

Revan said her double was at least a hundred times more powerful than she was. More powerful than Yuthura, or Sulkypants, or the Blais sisters, or any of the Dark Council. If she wanted to set something on fire….
Don't panic. Polla reminded herself now. Like Ma had always said: don't panic when it's too late to do any good. Just smile and do your best.

The second night, Revan insisted there could be no fire because she sensed sents nearby and they had to escape detection. Polla had asked what they were escaping detection from … and the answer had taken long enough that she'd fallen asleep in the middle of the explanation, despite the cold. Something about… other survivors getting in the way, she gathered.

The woman usually explained everything in six sentences when one would do.

As she'd trudged through the Kaas jungle with the former Coma–lady, Polla couldn't help comparing the experience to the time she'd spent in the woods with Dustil Onasi (and Lord Malak and that kid, Mekel! All three of them in one body?), and Zaalbar when they were fleeing Tenebrae's palace.

Seemed like a hundred years ago, now.

Sulkypants—or whoever he'd been—had seemed kinder back then, but all–in–all Polla missed the Wookiee the most. Zaal was a better woodsman than Revan. The sleeping in trees bit he'd done had saved them a lot of insect bites. And huddling next to three meters of fur beat being sandwiched between Revan's bony ass and a foil blanket.

A botfly bite on Polla's ankle itched, but she didn't dare move, now. She and Revan had spent three hours before Commander Bossypants took off the Force collar setting all of this up, and the electro–net lines they'd buried underground ran right in front of her perch.

“Don’t step on them,” Bossypants had said. “Doing so would prove fatal—for you.”

Hah! No shit, sleestak!

In their lively debate about timing and voltage charges, Revan had opined that it would be a maximum of five minutes before the Hero of the Star Forge came charging up that hill, and down into the clearing where they were.

It had been much longer than that. The botfly bite was killing Polla, now. But twenty minutes was what Polla had expected. The woman wouldn't charge out right away. You don't put your goods on the table right up front. You let your mark sweat a little first, soften them up.

Polla and her good buddy the former Dark Lord of the Sith might have set the table (so to speak), and rigged the game (as it were), but the Butcher of Dromund Kaas still had to hessi on over with the goods.

In this case, herself.

Still...

Maybe—check and make sure she’s coming? She mouthed the words, pointing and gesturing, but… oh, what was the use? On the other side of the clearing, the former Dark Lord of the Sith didn't even have her eyes open. Through a gap in the trees, it looked like she was meditating.

Fracking Jedi. All those Sixthday cartoons made them look a lot more... busy.

Polla shifted the sweet Czerka rifle in her hands and wondered if she should have gone for the blaster instead—the one the former Dark Lord of the Sith had kept saying would be the better choice for the battle ahead.

Xxx

“Are you sure you don’t want a more discreet weapon?” Revan looked up from the ground where she’d been burying the electro–net. Her fingers were black with mud, which proved the sarcastic quips Polla had had in her head about Darth Bossypants never getting her hands dirty wrong. “She’ll see you’re holding that immediately.”

“Won’t matter.” Polla smiled sweetly. “I like this gun.”

Xxx

Her ankle itched now like the son of a Bith. Polla was just about to say frack it and bend down to scratch when, just like that, their wait was over. There was a rustle of bushes still out of her view and then the thud of someone landing on the ground.

Buzz of Bossypants’s saber as she raised it, flashing red through the spots that Polla could see between the leaves.

She couldn’t see much. She couldn’t see the other one—the woman with her memories—at all.

“Is this your trap, Dar’Revan?” The woman’s voice sounded smug, like she didn't give a damn. “Did you set mines along the clearing? Wire up a motion–sensor cannon, or is your companion lying in wait with explosives?”

_Damnit._ Polla glanced down at the box of grenades.

“Why would I trap you, Fragment? I merely wanted to talk.” How did Revan Starfire Bossypants make her taunts sound like reasonable questions? Polla found it infuriating and they were actually friends.

The rise where their target was standing was still out of Polla’s view—making her barely a shadow through the trees. The Hero of the Star Forge had come in the exact way Revan had said she would—even if Polla had thought it would have been smarter of her to try and ambush them from behind.

_Polla_ would have set up her own ambush—after making them sweat. Then again, _Polla_ didn’t have a Mandalorian army as back–up. Her imposter did.

Xxx

“She will be overconfident,” Revan had said. “That makes her weak.”

“We’d better hope so,” Polla muttered. “Because I think she’s gonna be pissed.”

Xxx

“I don’t think you can trap me.” Hero gave a quick exhale of breath, then there was a clicking noise, and that familiar lightsaber buzz came as she lit hers too. “That doesn't mean you won't try.”

Xxx

“What if she just kills you really fast?” Polla had asked Revan that question the first night of their journey to the creepy Sith temple.
How far had the woman fallen when Revan pushed her off the ship? Fifty meters? Two hundred? A thousand? Seiran’s story was totally garbled. But it had definitely been far enough to kill anyone normal. Enough to make any normal person really pissed off.

If Revan Starfire had pushed Polla off a ship and nearly killed her, they wouldn’t be sitting together at a campfire right now. It seemed reasonable (Polla thought) that the Butcher of Kaas might hold a grudge.

“Then you finish it,” Revan told her. “You know what you have to do——”

Xxx

“This is not a trap.” Revan sounded so sincere that if Polla hadn’t spent two days helping to plan the trap, she would’ve bought the former Dark Lord’s words at full price. “Please, Fragment. Trust me.”

“Trust——” ragged laughter from the Butcher of Kaas City. “Are you frickin’ kidding me?” Whirring noise—like her laser sword was moving now. Clash, when it hit the other one.

Revan had stepped out of view, which was a bit off script, as she was supposed to lure the other one closer to Polla.

I need to see to help, Coma–Lady.

Another clash of lightsabers, then the sound of rapid footsteps.

Polla hadn’t seen a lot of one–on–one ’saber fights. No, on Kaas the Sith just used their laser swords to execute the help. But the few times she’d seen Sith go up against each other had really been something—until, like Ma used to say—someone had lost an arm. Or both legs. Or a head.

Polla glanced down at the (probably) deactivated plasma mine and the buried lines of electro–net in front of her perch and decided to stay right where she was while they worked it out.

What if the Butcher of Kaas City kills her?

Xxx

“Then you finish it.” Revan picked up another nutra bar and unpeeled the foil, before breaking it in half and handing part to Polla. Packs full of stuff, plenty of water, but the woman had brought almost no damn food at all. “You know what you have to do. If she kills me, you finish it. You have everything you need——”

Xxx

Everything she needed. Polla glanced down at the crate at her feet. One hydro–chamber kit. One carbonite ray. A pile of sonic detonators——in case the electro–net wasn't enough.

“Who do you have with you, Dar? I know you're not alone.” Another saber clash, and then more rapid footsteps. A small tree collapsed, affording Polla slightly more of a view. The Butcher was a brown–haired blur, hurtling over Revan with terrifying ease. Red clashed with red, again—and Revan rolled out of sight again.

“Why don't you go see?” Revan sounded so nice— only a little winded.
Oh, frack, but that was Polla’s cue. “Hey!” She called out. “Hey! Revan! Help!”

Xxx

“You really think she’ll want to save me? How can we predict what she’ll do?”

Revan blinked at her from across the campfire, hugging her knees to her chest. “How can we not? Between the two of us, we are her mind—”

“I still don’t see why she’d save me.”

“Ah, but I do.” The flickering light made Revan’s features look like something out of a grave. “I watched her face when she saw your husband and son.”

“What about Abasen and Sei?” Getting jealous made no sense but Polla did it anyway. “What do you mean?”

“She saved the note your mother wrote her. She cared for your son as if he was her own.” That thin–lipped smile made Revan’s face look like a skull. Say what you want about her, (Seiran had, often), but she wasn’t ugly. This expression, though, was. “Trust me. She’ll want to save you—”

Xxx

“Help!” Polla called again. She wasn’t feeling it, though, and the word came out flat and strange. “Please! Revan! Help! The Bitch tricked me—”

That might even be true.

Xxx

“And if she doesn’t? What if she keeps trying to kill you, instead? What if she just… just blows you up and then blows me up, too?”

“I have shields.” The woman looked irritated. “And I know she won’t kill you, Polla.”

“But—”

“If all else fails, shoot her in the skull,” Revan snapped. “And be prepared to run—or die. Because it’s possible that will make the world end.”

Polla decided to ignore the sarcasm. “Whatever. What if she comes around the back and comes to me, first?”

And so the two of them had played it out for two days of trudging through jungle, hacking their way past terrifying beasts (that for some reason left them alone).

If this, then that.

“If the other Revan comes at you with a lightsaber—”

“I hold up the fake detonator.”

“If the other Revan kills me—”

“I shoot her in the head with the blaster—”
“No, use the carbonite ray. You must immobilize her!”

“Right, but what if she breaks the carbonite ray? With the Force or her bare hands or whatever?”

“There’s a back–up in the crate.”

“And if the other Revan goes for me first—”

“She won’t.” Polla’s own Revan seemed positive. “But if she did, then I would stab her in the back with my lightsaber and save you.”

“Wouldn’t that kill her?” That the Hero could not die had been one of the points Revan had repeated over and over again. Why? Why had been one of those explanations that drifted off into Ancient Sith quotes and put Polla half to sleep. Polla suspected Bossypants was making half of it up.

Maybe she was just sentimental.

_Those green eyes were wide and perfectly blank. After a long silence, Revan answered. “I’m not sure.”_

Xxx

Clash of sabers. The sound of earth lifting.

Flashes of something that looked like lightning emanated from the clearing. No voices—the women fighting were in it too deep now to exchange quips.

“Help!” Polla called again. She was starting to feel real fear. Adrenaline drenched the back of her shirt in a cold sweat, and the sweet Czerka rifle she’d chosen for its action was actually a bitch to hold one–handed and casual–like. “Please!”

“Who _is _that?”

Couldn’t the Other Bitch tell who she was?

“It’s me!” Polla called out.

“Why don’t you go _see_?” Revan was saying her line now, too loud, like this was some badly–staged play.

“And walk into a mine? Or a detonator trap? You _know _you can't beat me like this.”

“What makes you think I want to?”

“Your saber's out.”

“Self-defense. By the way, your Soresu is quite sloppy.”

“I’m not the one sweating. You look a bit out of shape. Carth said you were in a coma…?”

“I recovered. Seiran Wen said the same thing about you.”

“Where is he?” An indrawn breath, then another crackle of lightning. Smelled like some of the brush had caught fire.
Idiots. They’ll attract the Mandies! Of course, maybe that’s what the Butcher wanted.

“Seiran is safe. For now.”

“And Poll—”

“Hey!” Polla called out. “Darth Bossypants! You know I can’t have your back if I can't fracking see it?” That wasn't quite the line, but she thought it would get the same effect. Yelling for help was getting them nowhere.

She was right. From one eye–blink to the next, her side of the clearing, (the side with the electro–net lines buried underground), went from having an occupancy of one to an occupancy of three.

“Polla.” Brown hair, almost black. Red at the roots. In a topknot the woman had never earned. Nondescript coverall with Mandie clan signs. Green eyes. Less freckled than the other one, maybe. Maybe it was the light. Her throat moved a little as she swallowed hard, staring at Polla—from only a meter away. The red–bladed saber she held washed her out, made her skin a ghost’s. “It's really you.”

Xxx

“You really think she's going to give a damn about me?”

“How could she not?”

Xxx

“You're not dead.” The Butcher of Kaas City swallowed hard again instead of asking anything practical, like ‘how?’ The laser sword in her hand switched off—

Xxx

“You think she’d turn off the laser sword? That'd be like me holstering my blaster!”

“We could place a wager.” Revan looked a million light years away. “I had a friend, once, who loved to gamble. She was Deralian. Isn't that what you do?”

“My cousin?” The Jedi kept bringing her up. “Beya?”

“I—yes.” That seemed to snap her out of it. “So. She turns off her lightsaber—stop calling it a laser sword. And then, you—”

“I'll call it a laser sword if I want to!”

“The term is inaccurate. But fine. She turns off her ‘laser sword.’ And then, Polla, you—”

Xxx

“Hi,” Polla told the Butcher again. Not really much else to say. All of those memories shared and the woman still had bombed this planet back to the Age of Mud.

“Yes! Help! If I move it could explode.” Polla blinked her eyes fast too. Her heart felt like it was gonna jump out of her chest. Her hand felt sweaty on the rifle's pommel.

“Is she holding you hosta—”

The Hero–Butcher memory–stealer never had time to finish that sentence, because Polla cocked the rifle held loosely at her waist and fired.

Xxx

“You should use something more precise than a blaster rifle.”

“You packed this one.”

“I packed several. I wasn’t sure of the terrain. But surely, one of the more discreet disruptor pistols—”

“Then it'd look like I'm going to shoot her.”

“As opposed to holding a giant gun? How is that more subtle?”

“It'll look like I grabbed the first thing I could find—like maybe you trapped me, and I just grabbed what I could find—

Xxx

Polla's aim was true, Revan noted with relief.

The Deralian had brought down a crazed terentatek at a hundred meters. Hitting a static target from point–blank range was well within her skillset, even with that ridiculous weapon.

The Fragment gave a startled noise and fell back like a toppled tree, the Force splintering with her confusion.

So simple.

As Revan had expected, the shock of being shot by a woman the Fragment revered shattered any defense her body might have raised—for the moment.

The moment would not last.

“Phew!” Polla Organa shifted, bringing her gun up, keeping it trained on the Fragment as if she might rise again. “You sure she's not d—” her foot slipped off the mound of dirt covering the mine and for a moment, the entire galaxy seemed to freeze.

“Wait!” Revan managed to summon the Force to reset the buried plasma mine half a heartbeat before Polla killed then all by stepping off its trigger. “I told you to wait before moving! Be careful!” she added, lest the smuggler fry herself on the electro–net next. Her hand trembled with relief, as Polla jumped to the side as planned and Revan stepped on the trigger–point for the net surrounding the fallen Fragment, side–stepping the buried lines herself as they crackled to life.

The Fragment's body twitched as the grid electrified. Her eyes rolled back in her head as she was immobilized.

But Revan could almost see the Force weaves thicken around her nemesis, as if consciously or unconsciously, the Fragment was still trying to rally.
The net wouldn’t hold her long. This, too, was by design.

“Get the frame!” she called out. “Quickly!”

Then, the ground shook, but Revan had expected that too.

Xxx

“The planet may be… tied to her.” The smuggler was sulking because Revan wouldn’t let her have a fire again. The next part of their plan was difficult for any null to believe, which was why she had delayed sharing it earlier. “There may be a geological or atmospheric disturbance—”

“Uh… okay.” The woman showed less curiosity than Revan had anticipated. Is that why we're…” Polla waved a hand at the pile of goods Revan had procured from the mercenaries' stores. “Why we're using this kit? This is bounty hunter crap, Revan!”

Yes. And how... interesting that low–level Exchange mercenaries would possess carbonite freezing rays, and frames to store a body in. Almost as interesting: they had supplied them to Revan without a single question. But that was an issue for later—to be resolved when the Wookiee and the Houck joined them to assist in extricating the Fragment’s frozen body. “We were quite fortunate your associates had such devices, Polla.”

“What can I say?” The Deralian shrugged. “I know all sorts.”

Xxx

Now, flat on the ground and twitching, the Fragment… whimpered. A surprisingly weak cry. Blue sparks shot around her limbs.

The disruptor bolt she’d taken to the chest was a round hole, perfectly set, just as Revan had advised—

Xxx

“No margin of error. Even a few centimeters to the left could kill her.”

It was possible that it could.

“I mean, she kind of deserves it.” Polla laughed nervously. “But I—you know, I’ve only killed one person, before? And he was possessed, so I’m not sure it counts—”

“The plague you unleashed killed—or will kill—thousands,” Revan told her. Sheris’s voice in her head whispered it was unkind to say, but the Deralian needed to face facts. No sense in choca– coating the truth, as Vrook used to say. “Tens of thousands. Possibly hundreds of—”

“Stop!” The smuggler closed her eyes, shaking her head. “You're the one who put those vials in the Blais House—Phylus told me you put them there! And it was your fracking evil droid—I just told him to infect Carth—HK went behind my back!”

HK had been programmed to take initiative and seize an advantage. Revan had no doubt that he had seen one. Had she been conscious she would have prevented it. But the act was done.

And it worked. Your insane plan worked, Deralian. Where my prudence failed.

Be kind, Sheris murmured. Or you will lose her.
Revan tempered her tone. “You tried to fix... things, too. Yuthura said vaccination rates in some parts of the city were up to ninety per cent before—”

“Before we ran out of vaccine. Yeah.” Polla picked up one of their few remaining nutra bars and bit the foil seal open with her teeth. “Then I blew millions of credits on some outfit out of Nar that stiffed us.”

“Well, none of the survivors we’ve found seem to be ill so you must have done something right.”

“We haven’t found that many,” Polla shot back.

They’d had barely any time.

Around them, the sounds of the jungle at night seemed almost normal, as if they hadn't left the blasted plain of destruction. As if the war had never come to this place.

You’re welcome, Malak’s voice said in her mind. I just convinced two zakkeg and a nexu they'd find better hunting elsewhere.

A useful skill. Revan felt her lips curl up. What else can you do?

Apparently, not talk you out of this folly—

No. She felt her smile grow. But he was still providing assistance—

Xxx

The Fragment twitched on the ground, limbs beating staccato into the mud, encased in the bonds of conduit electricity.

“Hell!” Now Polla Organa looked panicked. She had the hydro chamber out, and was awkwardly expanding the frame around the charge zone while their target twitched with enough voltage running through her system to take down a gundark.

“Be careful,” Revan warned her, keeping her saber levelled in case the woman defied odds and stood.

The Fragment's heartbeat was impossibly regular. Revan felt a grim satisfaction, laced with an emotion she did not want to identify as envy.

“Don’t move!” Revan added. “I have to turn off the electro–net before you activate the carbonite ray—”

The ground shook again.

Impossibly, the Fragment’s eyes had opened and it looked like she was trying to speak. Her nose was bleeding.

And then the sky began to burn.

Xxx

“We have to be fast.”

“Why?” The smuggler merely had to obey. Too much information would only cause her to panic.
“At most we’ll have perhaps three minutes from the time you shoot her until the carbonite resin must activate.”

“Or she’ll die?” Polla’s eyes narrowed.

“Possibly.” It was possible. Remotely.

“Look, I know there’s a lot you’re not telling me, but promise me this: I’m going to make it through, right? Me and Seiran?” Suddenly, Polla Organa sounded a great deal younger than she was. “I’d like you to make it too, you crazy schutta, but you’ve got that look in your eye—”

“I have designed the trap to give you, above all of us, the best chance of survival.”

As long as Polla avoided the electro–net and the plasma mine, or was not killed (perhaps accidentally) by the Fragment, that was true.

“Comforting,” Polla muttered.

“Ideally, all three of us will live long and—”

“Happy lives?” The smuggler snorted. “Think she’ll be happy as a wall sculpture?”

Perhaps she’ll dream of the world we make. Revan felt her lips smile. “It’s better than the alternative.”

Xxx

She shot me. Polla Organa shot me—

The Deralian’s eyes had been green. Dyed, probably—they had to have been dyed. Her hair had been brown and loose, flopping over her face, but the features beneath were like a punch in the gut—like a mirror slipping into place.

Like a bolt to the chest, Red?

I’m dying.

Low chuckle. Incongruous. No. Frankly, I expected her to stab you in the back—

“Revan? Why the frack is the sky on fire?”

“They’re firing on her fleet! Get the frame laid out and this electro–net off—”

My fleet—

Her body jerked and burned. Then suddenly that stopped. Every nerve in her body seemed to relax at once. The absence of pain made Revan suddenly aware of how bad the pain had been.

The world dimmed and expanded as the shrill voices of her enemies were replaced by cold whispers.

Revan left her body behind. She was a ship in space. She was one of infinite. No pain. Only power—
One beam of light skipped out from her bay and then the Kathhound’s side caught fire—

Oddly beautiful, an assault of one ship by the Awakened Fleet.

Singly out from the other Mandalorian ones with surgical precision, the Kathhound’s shields flared and flickered, already failing—

A warning. Neural interface degrading. Initializing temporary repair

The Aleema appeared suddenly, slicing between the two ships, sending the Kath spinning like a child’s top off course, and her own view of the battle—it—

It exploded, in a hail of fire against the black.

Blinding pain lanced through Revan’s head and her vision splintered, transferring to another ship’s eyes. The Awakened ship burned, and the Aleema’s cannon spat fire as the other ships under Aemelie’s command assembled themselves in a low wedge against the Sleepers—

The world jerked back to the clearing—to her body—along with a brutal convulsion that left her whimpering. Revan spat out a mouthful of blood. Her awareness of the ships overhead dimmed back to sparks—merely faint screams—barely noticeable over the torment of her own flesh.

“What’s wrong with her? Did we do that?”

“I—I’m not sure. Get the frame realigned. I told you the planet might react.”

“Planet? Look at that firefight! Ships are coming in, too. Are those fighters the Mandalorians?”

“No. You have to hurry. It’s the Sleepers.”

“But she commands them! You said that! Why would the Butcher fire on her own fleet?”

Butcher? Who’s the Butcher?

In this case, you, Red.

Malak, I’m—

You’re not dying. It isn’t this easy.

“The Sleepers are not her fleet. She is theirs.”

“Fracking carbonite ray’s jammed! Why’s her nose bleeding like that? I shot her in the chest!”

“Perhaps she hit her head in the fall. Focus, Polla. Now. The carbonite ray—”

Get up, Red. Now, before they do encase you in carbonite.

Carbonite—?

But then the world dimmed, replaced by something older. And colder.

Target: transport land cruiser. Coordinates 23193 s, 30233 e. Visual display of occupants: 3 Human males}
An image snapped into focus. The Mandalorian carrier had an open top. Carth and Dustil and Mekel were clearly visible. Mekel had taken off his helm. All of them looking up at the ship that Revan now possessed, flying low overhead—

Its shadow crossed over them, cutting through the clouds of the morning sky—

XXX

“Good morning, beautiful.” Soft brown eyes looking down at her. His chin was paler than the rest of him, and her hand reached up and ran a line along his smooth jaw.

“Canderous lent me his sonic razor.” She could see those creases in her husband’s cheeks again—the not-quite-dimples when he smiled. “Gotta leave for the sweep, now.”

“I should go with you.” She didn’t trust Carth’s kid. Not really. Not even with Carth and Mekel to keep him in check.

“We went over this yesterday. You’re needed here.”

“To stand around looking like I’m the savior of Kaas?” She snorted. “I did that yesterday.” The first survivors Carth and his son had brought back had been a trio of frightened Twi’leks. Former slaves. They’d knelt… until Revan yelled at them to get back up again.

“Canderous says the generator keeps kicking out too.” Her husband kissed her on the mouth, then the forehead, and then stood up. “You’re better than a portable ignitor to get it up and running again.”

“Right. I’m a giant Force battery.” Revan sat up, levitating her robes to her hand. “And a Mandalorian figurehead. Great.”

“I’ll be back in time for dinner,” he promised. “Hopefully with more survivors.”

Revan tried to tell herself it was for the best. She didn’t want to arouse his suspicions. And if they ran into Dar—

I don’t want to arouse her suspicions either. I need to catch her unawares to kill her. But Dustil is more than capable of protecting his father—

XXX

But he’s not. How can Dustil protect any of them from death when it comes from the sky?

Stop!

{{Threat by Suggestion realized. Re-initialize self, Starfire unit. y/n? Neural nanocysts at 56%}}

“Yes.” Threat realized. Revan got it. A coil of pure hate unfolded in her gut, but her mental voice echoed, sounding desperate as a child’s even in her own mind. “Please! Don’t hurt them!”

{{Initialization complete. Secondary target commencing}}

Revan opened her eyes to see from the perspective of another ship in the sky, swooping low past the clearing where she lay. She felt a surge of exhilaration as a line of orange fire jetted out from its belly. The ground below burst into flame.

That’s the camp. The mines I set. They’re targeting the camp!

“Stop it! I said stop!”

[[Nanocyst repair to Unit complete. Reinitializing. Rise, Starfire Unit—]]

Another sharp pain in her head made everything blur.

[[Threat by Example Complete: Full retreat commencing—]]

Abruptly, the world snapped back into focus. The world had weight again, her consciousness a body. Breath heaved in and out of her lungs. Revan sat up, half sprawled in some kind of inflatable nest. Her eyes focused on a carbonite gun flashing to nearly full charge and she spun to the side before its ray landed, twisting the weapon out of Polla Organa's grip, and slamming the nest she’d been lying on into the nearest tree.

Hydo-net. Carbonite ray, a part of her brain supplied. Used to incapacitate.

They’re not trying to kill you—

Polla Organa’s face was pale under her spacer’s tan. The Deralian’s eyes should have been brown but they were an obviously fake green instead. Again, Revan had that sickening sense of dislocation: like the features in the mirror she still expected to see were suddenly breathed to life: her own face, her real mouth twisting into an expression of sheer horror—

“Frack!” Polla Organa cried—and dodged away, running off into the underbrush.

Scrambling to her feet caused a ripping pain in Revan's chest where the Deralian had shot her. The shock of agony left her staring stupidly at the place where the smuggler had vanished.

She shot me. She actually shot me. Cold anger at that, but not directed to the poor null. The woman was clearly a pawn.

Revan’s head turned to face the true enemy standing in a slight incline above her with a lit blade. Why Dar hadn’t taken the opportunity to attack when Revan was disoriented was odd, but ultimately irrelevant. The woman had to die.

“The camp,” Revan muttered. Or tried to. The words came out garbled, in a language she wasn’t sure really existed. Her own whimper sounded like it belonged to a different person, and then Revan was already leaving agony behind, rolling across the earth to where Polla Organa had been standing a moment ago—atop a live plasma mine—

(The slight tremor of its presence obvious to anyone with the Force)

—and then, Revan ripped the mine from the ground with invisible fingers, hurtling it into the hand that hadn’t called her lightsaber. Her blade re–ignited and her left hand closed hard on the device, fumbling for the timer.

Throw it. Throw it at Dar before she has a chance to react—she tried to kill you. Is Polla clear?

The air was thick and choking with smoke. The jungle seemed to be at least partially on fire. And her enemy was—Facing her, with a lit saber, wearing the absurd Sith armor Revan had mocked the moment she'd seen it: shoulders too wide and spiked, engraved metal plates enveloping the woman’s torso. It was the kind of armor that shimmered with the sign of a decent energy shield—

Energy shield is something you should have brought to this fight, Red, instead of spending fifteen minutes fiddling with bits of string to make a charm.

Shut up, Malak. The delay increased my advantage.

Obviously, that worked out well.

She could do without snark from a Force ghost—especially when something was wrong with her arm. Revan kept trying to lift her saber higher than her waist, but her right arm felt half-numb, her fingers clumsy and nearly unresponsive.

Shot me Polla shot me why would she—

The blast of targeted Force hit her saber’s hilt—as if Dar was trying to fuse the crystal—and Revan deflected the weak effort easily.

Her lips were salty. Her nose was bleeding again.

“You’ve learned something since our last meeting.” Dar still sounded like she was at a diplomat’s table with Malachi D’Reev, instead of trying to kill Revan, the woman with a hundred times her strength. “Congratulations.”

“I learned a great deal.” Polla seemed to have fled. “Call off your attack ships, Dar’Revan. Now.”

Polla. Polla shot me. Where is she? Revan stretched out her senses. Somewhere, behind them was a spark—

“My attack ships?” Since they’d seen each other last, Dar had lost her hair. What remained was a red fuzz, shaped to her skull. She looked like a wraith, body turned to sinew and bone, sharp angles of her cheeks hollowed. Lines of what looked like fading corruption were clearly visible, silvered tracks on her skin. “Would that they were mine, but the Sleepers are yours.”

“But you—you did this somehow. You set them off. And what did you do to Polla? Compulsion? Or just tell her more of your fracking lies?”

“I told her the truth.” A slight smile tugged at Dar’s mouth. “Most of it.”

Revan was suddenly aware that the bombing had stopped.

“Most of it? Not all of the truth, though.” A third voice drawled, and then a laser site tracked down over Dar’s face, painting her face in red light. “You didn’t tell me those fracking ships would start bombing the planet again!”

“I warned you there might be planetary disturbance if we didn't get her in stasis quickly. The jungle’s on fire, Polla. I'm not sure a tree is the safest refuge. Wood burns.”

Dar didn't blink but she had to know what the laser sight meant. Sniper rifle. And from the cross-shaped beam, one of the Aratech disruptors. Hard to deflect, it would fire in a spray that would be hard to dodge—

Where? Revan tried to calculate the angle back without turning, but the manufacturers had thought of that too, and a dozen red lights blinded her when she glanced sideways. A tree, Dar had said. Above… somewhere above, she thought, but how—

“You didn’t tell me that was a live plasma mine either!” Polla's voice came from behind them and Revan turned more—

Only to find a second laser site flashing through the smoke in her own eyes.

Polla had lines drawn on them both.

Well, she can only shoot one of us at a time.

Revan turned back to the more immediate threat, her mind running through the possibilities of how to disarm Polla Organa. Send a wave of Force crashing back, flattening the trees—

Before the smuggler could fire?

I might kill her.

She was suddenly aware of the Deralian's heartbeat, jagged and wild, her fear a miasma in the Force. With that as a guide it would be possible to pinpoint her location.

Dar sighed. Across the clearing, her expression was somehow still serene. “Of course I used a real plasma mine, Polla. She'd sense a fake.”

Revan edged sideways slowly, pivoting on her feet until both the tree she thought Polla was hiding in and Dar Revan were in view.

Take down the tree. Duck. Let her kill Dar—

Her hand holding the mine twitched, as the Force gathered in her limbs, infusing every muscle with near–limitless power—

The tree rustled. “You said you had a way of making it seem real, asshole! With the Force!” The Deralian’s voice was hauntingly familiar. Revan had known the woman would be here—a part of her had known the moment she sensed the second presence in the clearing, but it was still—

She knew, the cold voice in her head whispered. She knew exactly the effect seeing Polla Organa would have on you.

“Without the Force, I never would have been able to disarm the mine before you stepped away.” Dar sounded surprisingly serene speaking to her disobedient minion. “It is motion activated.”

“She lies,” Revan chimed in. “She just tried to kill you, Polla. Did Seiran tell you she threw me off a ship? She lied to me, too. Pretended to be my friend, too. Trust me, she's not.” Her saber arm was numb. Before she lunged at Dar, she would have to switch hands, fight with her left—

“We were never friends, Fragment. What I did was underestimate your stubborn idiocy,” Dar muttered. “Obstinate folly is a trait you both share.”

“You said there might be ‘some geological and atmospheric disturbance,’ Bossypants!” Polla’s imitation of Dar’s crisp tones was a little uncanny. “Not… not more planet–bombing!”

“We should have been faster. I wanted to use tranks, but we had such limited stores and it would take so much to drug her—*”
“Saving the tranks to kill more enemies, Dar?” Revan snapped, turning back to face her real threat head–on.

“I was saving them to help the injured. There are dozens back at our camp.” How could Dar stand there, crouched like a feral animal with her saber out; armored like the ghost of fracking Ajunta Pal—and sound so… reasonable?

The fingers holding Revan's own lightsaber were numb. The pain from her chest radiated out. She didn't think she could raise the lightsaber above her head.

But I can't show a weakness.

Oh, she knows your weakness, Red. That's why she told Polla to shoot you precisely there. If it came to this, you'd be more evenly matched—

Shut up, Malak. I need to switch hands. Revan shifted to the balls of her feet, slowly bringing her hands closer together. The one holding the plasma explosive let it drop, trusting the Force to hold it for an instant—

Don't! When you picked the mine up it trigg—

Xxx

Star Scoutmaster Mackree put the three circular plate–looking metal objects on the table in front of the group of thirteen–year–olds.

“Who can tell me what a plasma mine does?”

Sera Organa raised her hand, but Mackree called on Polla who was busy carving her new name, “Seriina Desiderata,” into the fibroboard surface of her desk.

“Polla Organa?” The scoutmaster asked. “Go ahead.”

“I think it sprays fire.” She had to get the heart right, in the embellishment above the urux in Seriina. Her laser pencil sputtered. “Oh, hells!”

“Ionized gas has a bit more of a blast radius than ‘fire.’” He held up his hands, indicating quote marks and everyone laughed. “How large a blast radius?”

“Depends on the mine.” Mines were dead boring. And seriously, when was she ever going to need to know this stuff?

Xxx

If that fighter was going to shoot we'd be dead already. The thought was giving Carth cold comfort.

They’d reached the ruins of Kaas City. The site of a blasted hellscape was painfully familiar. Like Telos all over again. There was nothing in the rubble that Carth could connect to the busy metropolis that had once stood. Coordinates indicated they should be near the metropolis’s center—but the only sign of the once–busy International District was a charred sign in Aurebesh advertising Tanaabian cuisine, propped against a stone staircase that spiraled up to nowhere.

The automated fighter from the Sleeper ships above their heads was small and triangular—like a miniaturized version of the Sleepers in orbit. The ground had shook a few times before it showed up, and flashes of light pointed to some kind of firefight up in high atmosphere—but most of whatever had happened was hidden by the clouds over their heads.

Now, the fighter skimmed low over their transport. Almost… hovering. Like it was spying on them.

Or setting us up. But why would it take so long? There was nothing Carth could do, except hope his son wasn't kidding when he’d said he had this under control. Carth could only keep steering their own transport toward the larger clumps of rubble ahead of them, toward the place where Dustil swore he’d sensed a cluster of survivors the day before.

The fighter’s guns hung beneath the belly, half-retracted. Maybe that was reassuring. Carth glanced down at his comm–link, but the signal pulsed an intermittent red. They were still flying blind—the Sleeper's Emp–clusters had knocked out every frequency, coating their transceivers with unintelligible static. When they’d left camp this morning, Leskal and Tanash had managed to rig a range of about fifty meters on the field transmitter. That meant for now, the camp—and Revan—were out of reach.

“What the hell is that ship doing?” Carth tried to make the question casual so as not to scare the kids.

Men, he reminded himself. Nothing of what Dustil and Mekel had been through had happened to kids. Maybe not for a long time.

“Could be it's checking us out, sir.” Mekel elbowed Dustil, who waved him off, staring distractedly at the ruins of Kaas City with a distracted frown on his face.

Carth wished Jin would stop calling him 'sir.’ The ki—man’s subservient tone didn't go with that smirk on his face. “Too close,” he muttered, even as the ship dipped closer—now only about ten meters above their heads.

“I could bring it down,” Dustil offered, almost absent–mindedly. He raised a hand and lightning crackled along his fist.

“No!” Carth exclaimed—and the same time Mekel cursed out some gutter epithet.

“I've got this,” his son said, ignoring them both. A spray of yellow fire whipped from his fingers and lashed against the craft.

“Are you fracking insane?” Mekel hissed.

The engines revved and the fighter dipped even lower, now close enough for Carth to see the battle scores on its sides, the flat transparisteel of its empty cockpit. It hovered directly in front of their larger, unarmed transport. Lights across its hull flashed at them ominously.

“I said, get out of here!” Dustil snapped. Lightning crackled from his hands again, and the ship's trajectory jerked as if it had been pushed.

Abruptly, the ship's nose tilted up and it shot out of view, heading back toward space so fast it cut through the bilious clouds, leaving a line in its wake.

“Guess you scared it, Telos,” Mekel snickered, recovering while Carth was still catching his breath.

“Sure it was me? Maybe it just saw your face,” his son shot back.
“Oh, yeah? Well… maybe it just saw your choobs.”

“Oh, yeah? Sure it wasn’t my dick?”

“Yeah, because that strikes terror in the hearts of every fracking machine from here to Corulag—”

“Hey! Don’t make my ears bleed!” Carth attempted a smile to show he was joking. When Dustil had been a kid if he’d talked to his friends like this (in front of his parents), Carth would have told Morgana to ground him. If any soldier under Carth's command had pulled a risky stunt like attacking a hostile unprovoked and breaking command, Carth would have matched their ass to count martial.

But now, his son was a man. A man who could shoot lightning meters in the air. A man who stared down death and told it to go away.

A man that death obeyed. At least for now.

Carth glanced back up at the empty sky. Maybe it was just scouting us. Revan said she could… see through them. Maybe it was her? Still took him a few minutes to get his pulse back down to normal, a few more times of checking his comm–link to see if it had started working again. (It had not.)

They'd honed in on this direction the day before and found a few half-dead survivors. Dustil had claimed there were more nearby so they’d come back today with a larger transport.

“Are we close, son?” Carth asked, interrupting Mekel’s latest dirty joke.

“Yeah.” His son broke off in mid–insult, having (thankfully) switched to Ancient Sith for the rest of his obscenities, a language Carth could at least politely pretend not to understand, although thanks to Tenebrae and his crash course in Sith culture, he’d got most of it. “We’re close. And something’s up with Revan, I think. There's a pack of survivors this way. Underground, maybe?” He waved at a patch of rubble, tilting his head. “I think… one could be Ban.”

“And your girlfriend?” Mekel broke in.

“Something happened to Revan?” Carth was glad about the survivors, but… he'd had his doubts about leaving her, dammit.

Dustil shrugged. “Relax. She's alive, Dad. Something just startled her. The Force… it kind of quakes when she yells.” He rolled his eyes. “Probably saw a nexu or something.”

“But my cousin’s okay?” Mekel added.

Dustil rolled his eyes. “Yes, Mekk. Cousin Revan's fine. It she wasn’t, she’d still be yelling about it.”

“And the ship?” Carth hoped they’d really find Yuthura Ban. Polla and Seiran would have been with her—maybe. And Zaalbar. Too much to hope that finding all their friends would be this easy, but he wasn't gonna give up.

“Mission? You mean Mission, sir?”

“Don’t call me ‘sir,’ Mekel. No. I mean the ship that was just scouting—”
"Malak! My love!" The brunette abruptly detached herself from Yuthura Ban and began running toward their ship. "I sensed your darkness approaching."

"Lady Mydia." Carth had already pulled their caravan to a stop, and Dustil slid off the open seat easily and ran to her. He was staring at her abdomen—something Carth found himself doing as well. It was mostly concealed by a set of Sith armor that looked too big for her frame. "I see you survived.”

She folded her arms, the beginning of a pout tugging at her mouth. "No thanks to you.” A pause. "No thanks to you, my lord. Did Lord Revan find you?”

"Yeah, a while ago—"

"It's only been two days." Mydia raised an eyebrow.

"Hi," Mekel stepped between them extending his hand. "I’m Mekel Jin."

"You bring me another null slave?” Mydia sighed exaggeratedly and her chestpiece heaved. "Lord Malak, I was so hoping you’d found my brother. What am I going to do with another null slave? I still have that first one—”

“I’m not a fracking slave—”

"He's mine, Mydia.” Dustil folded his arms. “My null slave. Congratulations on our… uh… on your…."

"Child,” she beamed at him. “You heard the news? From Revan?”

"Saw part of a vid—”

Their excited chatter dimmed to background noise as Carth approached Yuthura Ban. The Twi'lek lifted her head wearily and smiled at him. “Carth Onasi.” A brow ridge lifted. “I am not sure 'Admiral' is still necessary or desired, given the circumstances.”

"Just Carth is fine. It's good to see you alive, Lady Ban.” Carth tried to sound reassuring and not shocked by her appearance. Sores stippled her formerly creamy complexion, darkening her lilac skin like bruises. Radiation sickness, his mind whispered. She needs a medix. And soon.

"Just Yuthura will suffice.” Her lips were pale when she smiled. “All our masks have been discarded, now.”

"Yeah.” Carth took in the ruins of the city again. “Guess this is a win for the good guys.”

The words had come out harder than he meant them to, but Yuthura seemed to understand. Her smile crinkled the corners of her eyes, her expression softening. “I take it from your arrival on a Mandalorian troop carrier that you’ve found our allies? And your wife?”

“Yes, we—” he broke off. “It’s a long story. Maybe I can fill you in on the ride back to our camp.”

“I would like that. And to speak with Mekel Jin! I had not expected to see him—” a coughing fit overtook the Jedi, and Carth moved to her side, before she raised a hand to stop him. “There are many worse off than I am in the catacombs below. Revan and Polla promised to send aid after they found the Mandalorian encampment, but we have some injured who cannot wait.”

_Revan and Polla?_ He knew who she had to mean—Mission had told them the original Revan had woken from her coma—but Yuthura’s casual use of their names together gave Carth an uneasy feeling in his gut. _The original Revan took Polla Organa to our camp? Why? How did they know where to find us? And what will my wife do when they meet?_

“Guess you… maybe you saw our ships landing, huh?” He tried to make it a joke. “Guess, uh… Polla and Revan just went to get help from us?”

“Yes,” the Twi’lek said. “And we sensed Dustil’s presence in the Force. And Revan’s, of course. I hoped you would be with them, too.” She frowned. “I hope Tenebrae has not taken our little rebellion out on you—”

“I got the flu.” He felt hollow. “No more Sith possession.”

“Oh!” She blinked. “That’s wonderful news!”

“Right,” Carth glanced at his son again, now scowling with his arms folded like he was putting on the Darth Malak show for Mydia Blais. Next to him, Jin looked like he really was auditioning for the Sith congeniality award; arms officiously locked behind his back, smiling at the Blais girl like they were old pals; and shuffling his feet so his boots scuffed the blasted ground. As Carth watched, Dustil said something and Jin glanced up at him sharply, that easy grin fading. Mydia began to laugh, and after a pause, Mekel did too. Carth’s son’s expression echoed the others a heartbeat later, but one of his hands had dropped to his belt and his saber in a way that made Carth’s hackles rise.

_It’s fine, _he reminded himself. _This is gonna be awkward for them. But they’re all adults. They’ll figure it out—_

Yuthura’s head tilted, as she followed his gaze. “They are still allied,” she noted. “Your son and Mekel Jin. Even without their link through the Force.”

_Allied?_ Even now, the Twi’lek still thought in Korriban terms—alliances instead of friendships. Carth felt sorry for her. “Closer than that. Dustil thought Mekel was dead. Their Force bond broke—and he thought Mekel had died. We all did.”

“To release Malak’s ghost, Master Kavar made a pact with Oerin Lin,” Yuthura’s spotted hand pushed her lekku from her shoulder as if the weight of it pained her. She looked so unsteady on her feet that Carth moved in to help, offering her his arm. She took it gratefully. “Vrook and I attempted to intervene, but we were too late to stop Oerin. Mekel was stripped of the Force. I knew that Dustil would feel the bond break, of course, but I didn’t realize—”

“Wait, you knew Mekel was alive? You were there?” There were more pressing things to worry about, but Carth eyed her suspiciously. “You could have said something!”

“Dustil was quite adamant he did not want to discuss the bond the few times I approached him.” Yuthura coughed, a rattling sound deep in her chest. “He gave me the impression that Mekel had died later—perhaps on Katarr—and that somehow, he had sensed his passing.”

“On Katarr—” Carth shook his head. “No. But… Vrook died there. A lot of Jedi died there, I heard.” He tried to keep his voice friendly. “Not you, huh?”

“I sensed a… disturbance in the Force when the Jedi on Katarr passed. And I came here,” she said slowly, looking up at him. Her eyes were a few shades darker than her skin—the color of twilight. “I came here to help your son. And to liberate this world. You remember.”

Yeah, well. It would have helped Dustil, knowing Mekel was alive. “Mission said you organized the uprising,” Carth muttered, instead of telling her more about what he thought about her help. “You and Polla and Zaalbar. And… Revan.” It felt strange saying her name and meaning someone else. As strange as it had when he’d met the real Polla.

“We did.” Yuthura’s mouth twisted. “With any luck, there were riots on all the Sith worlds.”

“Maybe. They were all bombed.” He gestured at the wreckage around them, too aware of the bitter taste in the air. Their meters said the short-term rads were gone, but the air stank like ashes and death. “Our widebeam cut out, but we got that much. The ships that bombed Kaas got Zist and Thule too. And Onderon. Hoth. Nar Shaddaa.”

Her eyes widened. “How—? At the same time?”

“We don’t know. Long story.” Around them, wounded sents were straggling out of a hole in the ground, carried on stretchers, or supported by others. Carth saw Seiran go by on a stretcher. There was no sign of Zaalbar. He asked and Yuthura shook her head. Carth quickly changed the subject. “Guess we… we made kind of an entrance, huh? So, Polla and Revan… they went to get help from us, huh? When did they leave again?”

“Two days ago.” Yuthura filled him in. She said that they’d taken two of Polla’s Exchange friends with them, that they’d gone on foot.

Not exactly comforting, considering the conversations Carth had had with his wife about the woman who had tried to kill her on Deralia. The same woman who had fought two terentateks to try and keep them all alive for no practical reason he could see. He tried to reconcile the two versions of the original Revan and failed. Hard enough to know what his own wife was thinking. The Revan who had started the Mandalorian Wars? Married that bastard, Malak? She might be coming to get help. She might be coming to finish off his wife—just like her mentor, Vima Sunrider had tried to do before.

Nothing to do right now except get back to camp, fast as possible.

“You can fill me in on what the hell happened here as we go,” Carth told Yuthura. “We’ve got a medix and crates of anti-rads. Enough for everyone.” He had a bad feeling. He glanced behind them only to see the domed bed of the transport was still only half-full, the line of wounded snaking out the back as each had to be triaged and strapped in. Dustil and Mekel were helping, he noted, taking orders from a short figure in beskar who seemed to have taken charge. A Sullustan, Carth thought, from the proportions of her armor. “Stay here,” he directed Yuthura. “We need to load this transport fast to get back before dark. I’m gonna help.”

Xxx

It all happened so fast that the first thing Polla remembered after wasn’t pain, or her face-plant into jungle mud. Hard for Polla to see anything through the smoke, especially when the tree branch she was on broke, sending her hurtling to the ground like a failed rocket.

The first thing she remembered was looking up to see the impossible.

Two figures, suspended and floating in air, surrounded by a frozen ring of molten fire. They had been caught mid-leap—both twisting in a way that left the one with the top-knot suspended practically upside–down—with the other bearing down from above like an angel out of a Grass Priest–driven nightmare.

The one with the top–knot had dropped her saber. Blade had winked out and the hilt was just floating there. Took another second for Polla to realize the one in armor still had hers—and that the red line running between them was a bar of deadly particle–blade—

Everything—the women, the plasma explosion, the sabers—was covered in a flickering blue light. They looked like they'd been encased in ice.

Jedi. She blinked. Sure, at this point Polla had seen a hell of a lot of things done with the Force, but this was—

Jedi, Polla thought again. She'd never been one for religion, but they looked so otherworldly that in that instant she almost believed—and that was when her mind began making enough sense of things to notice that Revan had really stabbed the Hero–Butcher in the guts. That the red line between them was her saber. Slashing in a sideways sweep right into Hero–Butcher’s side.

“Shit,” Polla mumbled.

XXX

“She cannot die,” Revan had said, (for the fifth time), looking up from her work digging the trench for the electro–net. Her hands were black with dirt and she wiped her forehead leaving a streak there too. Woman was usually so fastidious it almost made Polla laugh.

Then again, that morning, practically anything was making Polla laugh. Who knew if she’d have the chance again? “Yeah, non–lethal, avoid headshots… we’ve been over this before, Jedi.”

“You don’t understand….” Revan’s voice trailed off. “If I die, Polla, you still must find a way to finish this.” She sighed. “She cannot die. You must freeze her in carbonite. Take her unaware—”

“Make her a wall sculpture without you?” Polla scoffed. “Where’s the fun in that?”

XXX

Now, it looked like in the heat of the moment, Revan had forgotten her own advice because the red saber that was hers jutted into the other one. Sents stabbed with lightsabers generally did die. Polla had looked that up on the nets back on the way to Kaas, and heard Mission Vao recite the gory details from the T3 chassis. All that supercharged ion stuff. It was hot. Blood would literally boil around the point of contact. Flesh would burn—

Polla propped herself up on her arms, trying to sit up. Automatic. Nothing smart in her brain had kicked in, like the voice that should have been telling her to get the hell out of the way before that red fire exploded. Time couldn't stay frozen forever. She knew that, but for some reason she couldn’t move.

Carbonite. If her blood’s boiling, I have to freeze it. She looked around for the gun, to seal up Top–Knot. Freeze the Hero–Butcher. She was supposed to do that.

XXX

“So that’s your plan?” Polla had scoffed, the first time Revan laid it all out. Back when they’d been sitting safe underground, watching Seiran breathe in his sleep. “Freeze her in carbonite? Shouldn’t we just kill her?”
“Do you want to kill her?” Revan raised her right eyebrow.

Xxx

“Ow,” Polla whispered. The word seemed to echo in the clearing. Somewhere far away she heard shouts coming from the Mandie camp. Polla looked up. The ships were gone, all she saw overhead was a familiar Kaas bank of clouds. Gray, occasionally sparked with lightning.

“Ow,” she said again. Her stomach hurt just looking at the way that saber sliced into the woman with her memories. Polla’s hand went to her waist, fumbling to find her holster—but she’d dropped the rifle. What if they were frozen like this forever?

Strangely beautiful, the two Revans. One almost upside down. Upside down’s hair had a few centis of red at the roots. Exact same shade as the other. And all that frozen fire around them. It almost looked like a flower.

About a meter of tree–branch stuck through her guts. Like she’d landed on it, or the blast had blown it there.

Doesn’t even hur—

The mud was stained red when it rose up to greet her.

XXX

“Okay, Polla. Since you seem to be so interested in this material—” Scoutmaster was rolling his eyes. Half the kids giggled thinking they had one up on him, but Polla wasn’t interested at all. “How do you disarm a plasma mine?”

“With a remote. From far away.” That got her a few laughs, mostly from that shaggy–haired kid named Something Wen who didn’t look he’d gone through puberty yet.

“If you find one? Just lying around?” There was a field off the Derra City Road that some crazy guy had mined because he thought the Corellian Tax Guys were invading... so it wasn’t a totally useless question.

“I’d sell it?” She winked at the shaggy–haired kid.

He blushed.

“Hopeless,” the Scoutmaster muttered. “Sera Organa, same question—”

Xxx

Don’t! When you picked up the mine it trigg—

This—this feeling. Like the world had frozen. Revan had felt it before. Pinned between choices on the Leviathan. On Manaan. On Korriban. In dreams.

Like the world had stopped and there she was, merely floating in between.

{{Preserve your shell!}} the ancient voice rang its commands in her head. {{You will need it to enter my tomb.}}}
Not like this, Red, another voice whispered. Malak's voice was almost amused. You know it will not end like this—

Xxx

The plasma mine reactivated. She’d been a fool not to notice immediately, but Revan’s attention had been focused on the Fragment in front of her, wounded but still dangerous, and upon winning Polla Organa back to her side. She had to keep Polla Organa on her side. If Revan failed, the Deralian was the only one who could contain the Fragment—with sentiment if nothing else.

The plasma mine had reactivated. Years since Revan had been groundside, but still, she had learned how delicate the triggering mechanisms could be. She had been a fool not to notice when it was still blinking in her nemesis’s hand. Jiya Sand had taught them so many ways besides the Force to maim, to kill, to destroy, to win—

I knew the mine was active again. Sheris’s voice in her mind was almost smug. When Revan pulled it from the ground, she unbalanced the sensors. Kuati Labs made them like that on purpose—

Little fool! Why didn’t you tell me?

Laughter rattled her— their— mind. Oh, ho. Something the great Revan Starfire missed?

Everything was suspended. Time stretched into the infinite, like a hyperspace soil through the black—

—like a red rubberkrump ball encased in ice. Revan had fallen through the ice that day, but her mother had saved her. White lab coat, and her father standing in the background. For moment, in the sun, his eyes—

I was three—maybe four—but his eyes—

Her skin felt hot and cold at once and Revan scrambled the Force—juggling it forward—

Oh, it—

The world dissolved into dots. Too bright to be stars. And pain, bright and burning—

No. Red—

No. Mal, I—I’m—

A familiar feeling, watching the world burn. Like dying. One more time—

Revan glanced down and saw that her body was encased with a blue, flickering light—

Xxx

“I want to kill that butcher for burning this fracking planet.” Polla Organa’s face on the other side of the fire was pensive, knitting with worry. She was picking at a loose fabric on her sleeve. “Seriously. If she told those ships to bomb us she needs to die, but—”

Revan considered her carefully. “You realize I told ships to bomb worlds quite like this one. Many times.”

“Maybe, but none of them were mine.” Flat gaze. Direct. It reminded her of Beya. It occurred to Revan—not for the first time—this woman would have been a formidable warrior, if she had the
As of course, the Fragment did. “And Kaas is yours, Polla?” Revan laughed politely to cut the tension.

The Deralian snorted. “No, I meant… I care. Slavery is fracking awful. These people deserve to be just as free as we are back home, and if she hurt them—”

“No! I–I don’t know. You know, Seiran hates you. He likes her.”

The smuggler looked genuinely conflicted. “And what if you’re wrong about her? You said before, between us she has our mind. And we’re… we’re on the side of the angels, right? What if she’s… what if she’s trying to do the right thing, too?”

“Her intentions don’t matter.” The woman wasn’t truly this simple, any more than the Fragment was. And so, Revan told her the truth—as much as she could. “She cannot die, Polla. So she must be contained. For the sake of the galaxy—”

XXX

Get up, Red.

The mine had been active. Dar'Revan had tricked her into picking up an active mine.

Revan’s side throbbed, the pain now localized somewhere in her belly below the ribs. Her lips tasted like salt, like blood. Something was smoldering, smoking, hissing nearby. Familiar.

Revan opened her eyes and saw one end of a double–bladed saber sticking out of the mud. The other was busy burning a hole into the ground, plasma blade hissing a furious red.

Someone disabled the safety. Bastila told me never to do that—said it was too dangerous—

She reached for the weapon, instinctively calling it into her hand. Her fingers felt clumsy. Her arm was numb. The pommel wasn’t familiar. The control was a manual one and it took her a moment to find it, a moment of awkwardly trying not to skewer herself and sit up, despite the throbbing agony in her aide.

Dar’s saber. That meant Revan’s own was… somewhere—somewhere else around—

I need it. I can’t let her gain an upper hand—

Sitting up caused the pain to intensify, a ripping feeling inside.

She got you deep, Red. Don’t make any sudden movements.

She—

Her hand went to her side. Smelled the acrid stench of the burn. No pain. Not there, but farther inside—her guts ached with a wrongness that was difficult to describe.

But familiar.
Yes. You've been stabbed in the guts before. Ghostly amusement from Malak's shade.

Revan looked up. The hulk of the Aleema banked against the clouds, surrounded by what looked like the other manned ships. Its hull flickered orange in places as if it had taken damage, but even as she watched it drifted past them, continuing on its orbit around the planet.

And all of the Sleepers were gone.

Did I sent them away? Or did she—

“You're hurt.”

Although she could see the ships in the sky perfectly, something was wrong with Revan's near vision. The figure in front of her blurred. Shape of pointed spikes on the shoulders, backlit by the rising sun that seemed too bright.

My saber! She had Revan's in her right hand, called her own to her left out of the muck, but that was the side where Dar's hit had connected, and she whimpered again with the raw knot of pain that came when she tried to lift her arm.

“Don't move. You'll make it worse.” The woman paused, and it took Revan's voice another moment to connect the voice with the evil bitch who'd just tried to kill her. How did her voice sound so kind, now?

“I can kill you from here.” Revan summoned the Force, feeling it lash out like a light–whip from her hand, the power in it reaching seeking, draining—

No.

And meeting a perfect wall. When her Force–summoned miasma hit the other woman it seemed to splash around her, eddying, like water around stone.

“How are you doing that?” Lightning had the same effect, although it also caused her own vision to splinter, her pulse to feel like it was pounding.

“I'm not.” Her duplicate moved closer. “I think it's Malak.”

You can't hurt her, Red. His voice, like an echo in her skull.

She tried to kill me and you're taking her side?

There's only one side.

“I killed Malak,” she muttered at Dar. As the woman drew closer her features resolved. Familiar ones. But her face was harder, now. Etched with lines it hadn't had before. Her hair was shaved down, almost to the scalp. The woman had looked younger than Revan before. She didn't now.

“Oh, I'm aware.” A red eyebrow arched. “You've mentioned it several times.” The woman folded her arms. “And Malak told me, himself, of course. The parts he remembers.”

“I don't understand his game.” Or yours. Her guts throbbed, the pain spiking when she shifted on her feet. Salt stung her lips again and Revan knew her nose was bleeding.

XXX

The Fragment scowled back at Revan. The wound in her side looked ugly—perhaps not a mortal injury, but anyone less than the Fragment would have been incapacitated, Revan thought. But she was still standing—albeit on wavering feet. Her face was streaked with blood that was practically fountaining from her nose.

Subarachnoid hemorrhage, Sheris’s mind supplied. Something is causing intercranial bleeds in the outer medullum—

“I don’t understand his game,” the woman muttered. Her voice was slurred, and she stumbled to her feet.

Of course not. You understand nothing. Revan wondered, with an abrupt pang of conscience, if she should have clarified more during the brief time they had been allied—during those days aboard the ship together with Seiran and the children—but she had doubted the woman’s ability to understand the stakes—and lacked the strength to overcome her, should the woman prove reticent.

And wrongly assumed the ties to Malachor would keep the Fragment on Deralia.

“Why are you here?” Revan demanded of the Fragment. “I told you not to come. I left you on Deralia with a recorded explanation—”

The Fragment made an expression Revan had never seen in the mirror: somehow managing to roll her eyes and look as if she was about to spit epithets at the same time. “Some babble about staying with Korrie. I know you lied about the Genoharadan contract. You told Korrie to lie too—”

“I told you to stay away from this place! Did you hear none of that?”

“Oh, I heard. You made up some banthashit about how you could handle Tenebrae.” The Fragment brandished her saber, then winced, as if reminded of her injuries. Revan could almost feel them—a dull ache of agony in the Force. “I only heard the recording once. Korrie burned out the chip’s battery listening to it at night to go to sleep—”

“But he doesn’t speak Rakatan!”

“He wanted to hear a familiar voice after his supposed ‘mother’ dumped him on a strange planet and his real mother almost died.” Somehow the Fragment made her scorn evident with the way she pronounced the word ‘mother.’ “You tried to kill me. I assume the lies on that recording were just your way of covering your ass. Keep me in storage on Deralia til you could get the Emperor to help you collect me—”

“No.” Revan shook her head. “I would have rather you never came—” The woman had collected Revan's saber too—the one she'd taken from that Tenebrae–possessed guard. It hung at her belt, just below the darkening cloth where its blade had bit deep in her side. I did that. It was not my intent. I could have killed her—

Can you tell me?

I don’t know. His admittance was a weakness. I can see the shape of your thoughts—the shape of hers—less clearly. You do know she wants you dead?

I gathered as much. But you can stop her from killing me?

Malak’s dry chuckle felt like a phantom embrace. So far. I will try.
“No?” The Fragment echoed her refusal. “Stop. Lying.”

Anger was futile, but Revan couldn’t help it. “You pathetic little fool. The Emperor wants you here. He needs you. Had you stayed away entirely, everything he has wrought would have fallen apart!”

“Why should I believe you?” Nothing in those green eyes except hate. She lifted her saber again, wincing. “I killed Malak and I can kill you, too.”

She had the Deralian’s obstinance. The woman's blindness. “If you won't listen to me, listen to Polla Organa. Did you notice that she wasn't trying to kill you? Neither of us were.”

“She shot me.”

“Not to kill.”

The smuggler had threatened to shoot them both. But she had not—and now it was safe for her to come out.

“Polla. Show yourself. Explain to the Fragment that we mean no lasting harm—” Revan scanned the tree cover in front of them, looking for the one that had held the Deralian.

“Polla?” the Fragment echoed, and half-turned herself. “Where did y—?” Her saber clicked off, falling through her fingers as if they no longer had the strength to hold it. She turned, abruptly, foolishly showing Revan her back—then stumbled forward, falling to the ground. “Oh, no!”

And in that instant, Revan realized what she had missed before. With all of Fragment's rage and pain bearing down on her with the gravity of a neutron star, she had missed that small, dim flicker of a spark from Polla Organa.

The still body of the Deralian smuggler lay face down in the mud like a forgotten toy, with the Fragment now kneeling beside her, frantically wiping mud from her face. “She's not breathing!”

Xxx

“Priority Alert! One Jedi—coming through!” The Republic med–droid shuffled into the transport and dumped the foil–wrapped body practically in Sheris Loran's lap.

Padawan Loran had seen enough carnage now not to recoil instantly, but inwardly she cringed, staring at the raw skin, the gouges in the woman's chest and shoulders. Her cortosis robes were practically shredded.

“Grenade wounds,” her master noted. “Or a mine. You can tell by the pattern of the burns, padawan. See? She must have been right on top of it.”

“She threw herself on top of the ordinance, according to SZ–C8,” the med–droid sounded disapproving. “Her squadron would be more easily replaced than Knight Organa, but they are unharmed.”

“You're too practical, HU–E9.” Master Imra Lu chuckled. “A Jedi's life is sacrifice. Let's make sure this woman's is not in vain—” she gestured her padawan forward. “Sheris? Take stock of her injuries and tell me which you’d address first.”

The woman had a heart–shaped face. Her hair was pulled up to the top of her head in a top–knot. Her torso was a mess of blood.
“She’s not breathing,” Sheris said. “But then how is she still alive?”

“She’s slowed her respiration as much as she can to stop the bleeding,” a male voice corrected. The Jedi knight had followed the droid in. Now, he hovered, taking up most of the space in their medix tent with his bulk.

“Knight D’Reev,” Sheris’s master murmured.

“I’m keeping her in stasis, as best I can.” There were beads of sweat in his face, and his thinning hair was slicked with grime and worse, but his gray eyes were kind and when Knight Malak D’Reev directed a smile in Sheris’s general direction her heart skipped a beat. “I’ll need the strength of you and your padawan both, Master Lu—”

Xxx

“She's not breathing. Do something!” The Fragment’s voice cracked as she frantically tried to lift the smuggler out of the muck.

“I’m keeping her in stasis—” Or Revan was trying to. The Force weaves were slippery, the woman’s pulse not nearly as steady and strong as Beya’s had been that day. “You’re wrong,” she added. “She is breathing—barely….”

Her injury is not as severe. Keep her breathing. Tell the duplicate not to drop her—

XXX

“She's not breathing. Do something!” Revan heard her own voice crack through the Force as she frantically tried to lift the smuggler out of the muck, causing the pain in her side to get worse, before she realized, the Force was a great deal more effective at lifting right now than her own arms.

“I’m keeping her in stasis,” her nemesis said. The woman was maddeningly calm. “She is breathing—barely. The burns are superficial. But we have another problem.” And then Revan saw it too: somehow while they’d been fighting, Polla Organa had managed to stab herself with a meter–long piece of tree.

“Keep her floating,” Dar ordered. “Gently. With the Force. Don't dislodge the stick in her side.”

“It's a branch. She was in the tree. She must've fallen on it.” Revan was already doing what Dar said, turning the woman suspended in air.

From the front, things looked worse.

“We need to stabilize her. Immediately.” Dar's hands were glowing. “And I need a medix. We can't remove the stick. Not without surgical supplies, kolto—”

Revan glanced down at her comm–link. They’d managed to set up a limited link in the camp itself, but the wider bands were still gone—victims of the bombing. “Help,” she tapped it anyway, unsurprised when the message pinged back to her.

“Out of this valley, up on the rise,” Dar said, eyes following the gesture, even as her hands seemed to be rearranging the stick in the middle of Polla Organa's guts. “I picked this location for a lack of signal—but you should be able to get one on the ridge.” She paused. “I was monitoring your comms this morning.”
“Didn’t you bring a speeder? More supplies—”

“We came on foot. The roads are impassable without earth-movers, and we had no working vehicles.”

“And why the frack did you bring Polla in the first place?” Revan could kill Dar later. After she had more answers.

“Just go for help, Fragment. Now.” Green eyes met her own, and Dar Revan's golden hand slipped beneath Polla's head, cradling her, while her other lifted the smuggler’s legs. “I’d go to your camp myself to get a medix transport for you both but I suspect you've mined the perimeter.”

Of course I did. “Don't let her die,” Revan snapped, and took a step forward.

Her knees buckled almost immediately.

“Nine hells,” Dar'Revan cursed behind her. In flawless Mandalorian.

Of course she’d speak flawless Mandalorian.

Of all the things she hated Dar’Revan for, fluency in Mando’ade didn’t even merit notice, but in that moment, Revan found it extremely irritating all the same.

Xxx

Canderous sighed. “Looks like we've won't have to clear more brush to get a clear horizon.” Had Revan ordered the bombardment? Without warning him? If so, they were gonna have words.

The air was still thick with smoke and bits of char. Miraculously—too precisely to be accidental—that infernal fleet had missed their own transport ships and the tents on the main plateau. But all around the Mandalorian camp the jungle burned. Revan's idea to mine the easiest approach to their position had turned the ground there into a blistering hellscape when that blasted fleet started firing on that same blasted (now literally blasted) terrain.

Canderous glanced up at the sky again. He'd been so busy trying to figure out the attack that wasn't that he hadn't had a chance to track Revan down and see if she could shed some light on this osik. Sky was clear now—the ships overhead had moved into a planetary orbit. Going by their resting speed he wouldn’t see Aemelie and the Aleema above for another ten hours or so.

There'd been some kind of spat up there, too—over in a heartbeat when his wife showed the hu'tuun abominations what a real cannon could do.

Maybe by that time she got back they’d have rigged a com-channel strong enough to pierce atmo—

“Mand'alor—” Leskal pointed to the south, where the treeline still existed and the ground rose up, culminating in a low ridge that dipped down into near-impenetrable jungle beyond. “Look!”

Canderous turned—and blinked.

Two figures on the hill, coming out of the smoke like ghosts, and a third one behind them, floating in mid-air flat on their—her—back.

His visor adjusted for distance when he squinted, sensors automatically giving him the readouts on temperature, terrain, basic vitals. There, Revan, covered in gore like a true warrior and next to —a paler, armored copy, red hair shaved to the skull. Not armed, he noted immediately. Even as he tried to make sense of what would make Revan stand next to her hu'tuun copy and not shoot her, the woman he'd sworn vows to stumbled and the other one reached out and pulled her close, wrapping an arm around her shoulder as if holding her up.

Behind them, a third figure bobbed, floating in the air. Face obscured by a mat of dark hair. Female. Something wrong with her guts, alerts on his helm outlining her in red—

Revan had seen him too. Her arm lifted, and the effort made her sag back as that body double of hers supported her. Her readouts spiked. The figure behind them bobbed down, settling on the ground before Revan sagged back, nearly knocking the other one off her feet as she practically collapsed.

Xxx

Polla was having a dream that she'd joined the Mandalorians, except for some reason the initiation rite involved smearing herself in banthashit and cutting off her own nose. She was deep in an argument with Seiran about the fairness of that when something cold and sharp dug into her arm, shocking her so hard that her eyes opened——to what looked like an explosion of color above her head. Thread patterns chased every color in a planetary rainbow, overlapping and vying with each other for her eyes’ attention.

I've died and ended up in a fracking carpet store. Died. Dyed. Hah.

“Hi,” a voice said softly, nearly in her ear.

Polla turned her head to see the Butcher of Kaas City propped up on an elbow with an empty stim-pak in her hand. The top-knot her imposter wore really bugged her. Dyed brown, too. What the frack was the woman trying to prove?

“What the hell did you just give me?”

“They said you should wake up.” The Hero of the Star Forge nodded across a row of mostly unoccupied mats on the floor to where Revan Starfire and Sinae, the Mandalorian medix that Polla had last seen in Aemelie's hunting party on Coruscant, stood above a portable kolto tank, heads bent deep in conversation, probably about the unlucky inhabitant within. “You hit your head pretty hard coming down, apparently. Dar’s worried you're concussed.”

“The medix? Her name's Sinae.”

Mandalorians apparently treated their injured on the ground with only a few centimeters between each mat. It meant the woman that Polla had just shot was close enough that Polla could count every freckle on her face. Her torso was encased in what looked like a kolto wrap, painting the skin beneath a lurid green and blue, opaque enough that the damage was hidden. Her exposed shoulder was pale and freckled. One of her arms had a thin red scar.

Other than that, she looked a frack of a lot exactly like the other one.

But she’s not. She thought she was me.
“No, I mean—” the woman’s laugh was short and weirdly formal. “I mean, her. I call her Dar'Revan.”

“Why?” It seemed a safer topic than ‘Why didn't you kill me after I shot you?’ or, 'Did I stab myself in the guts with a tree or did you do it for me?'

“Because she's not—dar in Mandalorian means no longer. Formerly. She's not Revan. I am.”

“Bothan for you, then,” Polla muttered.

“Life’s a Bith,” the Butcher snapped back.

She really did look a frack of lot like the other one. They both had faint tracks on their faces, like silver. Revan had gone all black and veiny when she'd been in the coma but it had faded pretty fast after. Maybe same thing had happened to this one.

The real—Dar'Revan—took that moment to glance back at them. She nodded slightly, but didn't come closer, turning back to her patient.

“So, you two are pals now?” Polla asked. Not pissed she stabbed you? That I shot you? She tried to surreptitiously look around for one of the carbonite rays. The movement made her belly hurt.

This Revan followed her gaze. “Pals? Hardly. But Dar healed you. And Sinae's having her look at Dessa. She claims she can help her.”

“She—no. We don’t know. Her baby's in distress. They may have to induce her. She… she was attacked. By one of Dar's allies.”

“Dessa's pregnant? Did her husband come back, or—”

And then Polla had a terrible thought. Mandies and their breeding. Aemelie had been obsessed with breeding—given Polla a long lecture about out–breeding and gene–splicing that wasn't nearly as interesting as the weapons room. What’s more, Dessa had been fracking— “Wait. Is the kid Therion's? Therion D'Cainen? My ex–boyfr—”

“What?” The scowl changed to a half-scoff. “Why would you even think that?”

“He was giving us a ride to Coruscant. They got pret–ty close, last I saw.”

“I don't know.” But the expression on the too–familiar face said otherwise. “Therion was with you. Of course he was.” Her laughter was sharp, a little bitter. “That son–of–a–Hutt lied to me. I’d almost forgotten.”

“Oh?” Irrational, being jealous of an ex Polla hated. But the emotion was still there, lurking in her gut like bile. “Didn't realize you two had got friendly.”

“Our meet went about as well as my chat with Uncle Boone. Case you were wondering, Therion didn't give you up—if he had, maybe we wouldn't be in this mess.” This Revan was staring across the room at the other one, and then she began to tell Polla a rambling story that only tangentially touched upon Uncle Boone and Therion D'Cainen, focusing instead on the stuff Polla already knew: her and the other one leaving Coruscant with Seiran, the other one pushing her off the ship, how the other one couldn't be trusted—
“Blah, blah, blah,” Polla interrupted, just as this Revan was getting to something about evil Sith Lords and Jedi having a showdown on some planet that sounded like a disease. Maybe not the smartest thing to interrupt the Butcher of Kaas but she was pretty pissed off. “I still want to know why the frack you blew up my… this planet.”

“You… your planet?” This one did the eyebrow lift too. “I didn't. It was the Sleepers—those ships. They bombed this world as a warning, to show me what they could do. I think… unless I—I do what they want.”

“What do they want…?” But Polla was asking mostly to keep the woman talking. Dar hadn't explained half of what she'd implied—probably assuming Polla already knew or didn't care, or was too thick to notice—but the facts seemed clear.

“They want me to go into their… some kind of tomb.” The woman’s eyes shifted away from her. Her hand reached up to tug at her topknot and then back down to her lap again as if she’d just noticed Polla’s glare.

“Oh.” That almost made sense. “You think the door will open for you? Cause Revan already tried and no dice.”

“Do I—what?” From that expression Polla wasn't the only one Bossypants hadn't bothered explaining much to. “She told you about the tomb? She went to it?”

“We went to it. Me, her and Yuthura. And this Sith guy who called himself Scourge. Turned out he was working with Tenny–bro. Emperor Asshole showed up and captured us. She couldn't open it. She was really pissed.” Polla wondered suddenly why she was babbling her guts out to this woman she didn't freaking trust. “Hey, can I see that stim–pak…?”

“Here.” The Butcher of Kaas tossed it over, wincing, as if the movement bugged her shoulder. “She did say to wake you.”

“And now you're doing what she says? Weren't you just trying to kill her? Did you just shoot me full of truth-tel?” Polla glanced down, but the writing was all in Mando runes. It was green, though, the residue. Truth-tel would’ve been pink.

“You don't trust me?” But those green eyes shifted away again. “It's just a mild stim.”

“Did you gave me truth–tel? You think I’d lie to you without it?” Polla would, of course, but indignation was easy to fake and it avoided direct questions. They'd learned that in smuggler school.

“I didn’t give you truth–tel. But I think you're dodging the question.” A slight smile tugged at the woman's mouth.

“So were you.”

“So, Dar wanted to go into this fabled tomb.” The woman had gone back to that. “Why?”

“I don’t know. Fracking ask her.”

Across the room, Revan's hands were glowing. Dessa must be pretty bad off if healing her was taking this long. That made Polla remember she'd had a tree through her own belly. Her hands went down to her middle—and squished on kolto. Damp and clammy. Ick.

Am I okay? She was almost afraid to ask—but this Revan’s smile had faded and she was frowning
She reached out and moved Polla’s arm. Her fingers were weirdly warm, almost hot. “Don’t disturb the bandaging. Dar and the med–droid spent some time stitching you up.”

“Oh, yeah? Why is she doing it all? Can’t you heal too? Aren’t you some all–powerful Jedi?”

“I don’t know how to heal. Bas—–they say it takes years of practice to get good at it. I–I never had the time.”

“Right. Too busy fracking up my life.”

The woman’s face was totally expressionless. But her voice had shifted into one that was almost familiar—that clipped Coruscanti shifting and blurring into a sharp jolt of home. “I didn’t push you into some scheme to impersonate me and scam credits off Suvam.”

“You know, the funny thing is, I wouldn’t have had to scam credits, if some ass hadn’t spent all the ones I had stashed with him and then made me and my family have to go on the lam—–”

“You tried to borrow ten million.” One eyebrow arched again. Funny, how the darker hair made her look more like Polla than the other one. “Seiran told me. The account with Suvam had maybe fifty thousand.”

Seiran told you all that? She’d deal with him later. To hear him tell it, they’d barely spoken—just ridden in the same ship from Coru to Deralia. “More like fifty–seven thousand. I remember exactly how much it had before some schutta stole it—–”

“Would you like me to pay you back?” Infuriating, how the woman sounded like home.

“Hardly. I promised your da I’d get you home safe. If you keep squirming instead of letting the gel set you’ll make a liar of me.”

“Oh, yeah? I bet my da told you to frack off.” She wasn’t as sure about Ma. Ma had always been sentimental, and Polla remembered the lectures about wedding presents.

“He did.” The woman’s’ indrawn breath made it sound like Polla had hurt her. “At first, but we… we talked. Polla, you need to listen to me. You need to get off this fracking planet. Take Seiran. Go home. As soon as… tomorrow, if you can.”

“So you can have your ships bomb the rest of it? No. Frack off.”

“We didn’t… they’re not my ships. What did… what did Dar say? About the tomb?”

Frack your tomb. “Not much. She was acting like her going into it was gonna fix everything. When it didn’t work she almost cried.”

“If it would fix everything, I’d shove her in there myself.” Those green eyes blinked. Suddenly, a trickle of blood ran down from the woman’s nose. She wiped it with her hand, staring at the stain and frowning. “Does she… did she say she could hear them?”

“They?” Maybe they’d been sealing this woman in carbonite to save her from herself. Because she seemed kind of nuts. Poor Captain Obvious. “Hey, I saw your husband—–earlier. We were watching the camp. When’d you guys hook up—not, uh, I didn't mean hook, I meant, where'd you find him now.
“Darth Sulk—oh!" This time the laugh sounded more genuine. “You mean Dustil.”

Sinae glanced over, but Revan didn't move. Maybe she couldn't hear them… but Polla had been around Force-users long enough to have her doubts.

“I… I was calling him Sulksalot.”

That was a little too close for comfort. From the face she was making the—-the woman agreed.

“Well, where—"”

“Our ship attacked Carth’s. Above… kind of a long story.” That open expression seemed to freeze over again, eyes looking through Polla as if the woman had more important things on her mind. “We… he and Dustil and Mekel went to look for more survivors this morning. Did Seiran—-is he okay?”

“He got hurt pretty bad.” Guilt hit, because she'd been thinking about him, but not how he might be doing. If anything, Polla realized, she'd been avoiding thinking too much about him because of how pissed he'd have been when he woke. “But he's stable. He got hurt in the bombing.” Which brought them full circle. “How the frack did you make that happen?”

“I didn't.” The woman’s forehead creased. “Did Dar tell you I did this?”

“No. But she says if we freeze you in carbonite it'll stop that fleet. The Emperor too.”

“Why not just kill me?”

Was that a serious question? “Dunno, but she was pretty adamant that we not. Of course, then she—”

“—stabbed me in the guts.”

“—stabbed you in the guts.”

They finished the sentence almost at the same time. It made Hero frown, even as Polla felt herself smirk.

“I suggested we just kill you,” Polla added. Maybe it hadn't been truth-tel in that stim, but something about the woman's expression made her want to come clean.

“Thanks.” The woman tugged at her top-knot, and then seemed to realize she was doing it, and stopped, putting both hands back in her lap. “But this isn't a joke.”

“I wasn't joking.”

Those green eyes met hers and blinked. “Oh, yeah? Well, thanks for not killing me.”

Yet. Polla craned her head, but didn’t see her gunbelt anywhere. Her hand crept under the covers and discovered, with somewhat of a shock that she was still wearing her pants with their thigh-holders and her basic holdout was still strapped right where it belonged. “So, you… didn't make those ships bomb the planet?”
“I didn’t. I told them to stop. But I can hear them. In my head.” The woman laughed uneasily. “I know how nuts that sounds.”

“I’ve seen crazier banthashit lately.”

“Yeah, I guess… guess you have.”

The woman’s head turned back toward Revan again, and then the two of them were staring at each other, both of their faces going eerily blank.

Can you hear her in your head too? Bastila Shan and Revan had done that mind–to–mind–talking in every version of every vid. But before Polla could ask, the other Revan started forward, moving toward them like a kath on target.

“You need to stop listening to the voice from the tomb, Fragment,” Revan—Polla’s Revan—said as she approached. “Every time you do, you have another pinpoint hemorrhage. It’s why your nose keeps bleeding.”

“Listening to which voice? I’m fine.” The woman scowled and wiped more blood from her face.

“How’s Dessa?”

“Stable—her and the child.” Polla’s Revan looked exhausted, shadows staining the hollows of her eyes. “They were fortunate I arrived when I did. That’s quite a head wound. Sinae said the escaped prisoner responsible was a dar’jett your husband killed. Dessa’s lucky to be alive.”

“At least someone was lucky to see you,” the Butcher drawled. “Sinae didn’t tell you the Dark Jedi’s name?”

“At the smug expression on your face, you expect the revelation will shock me. Don’t tell me it was Davad Arkan because I know—”

“Wasn’t him. I dropped Davad into a sun. Biscain System.”

“I knew you dropped him into a sun. Tenebrae told me. And that was foolish.”

“Oh? Your pal Tenebrae tell you it was foolish? Or your Republic spies?”

“Malak told me. Tenebrae is my undying enemy. I will oppose him until my last breath. As I have always done.”

“Malak, huh?” The Butcher’s mouth twisted. “Funny. Carth and I were just talking the other day about never trusting evil Force ghosts.” Her eyes flickered up and down. “Especially when they’re possessing sents. Like you are. Right now.”

Their smiles looked identical and it was starting to freak Polla out. Maybe they couldn’t read each other’s minds—or else why have this pissing contest in front of her? But they had something going on. Something that was fracking fracked.

“I could say the same about you, Fragment. If I wanted to be rude.”

“You think that would be rude?” The Butcher tugged at her bandage. “Ambushing me and trying to freeze me in carbonite wasn’t?”

“It was necessary.” Polla had known Revan long enough to know that weary sigh she was giving was exaggerated. “How… how did Davad die?”
The brunette shrugged. “Davad wanted to die, but he didn't know how.” Her eyes narrowed to slits. “He couldn't talk anymore but he... showed me things. He showed me you.”

The eerie thing was, Polla recognized the tone of voice the woman was using now. That mocking drawl. She sounded just like Cousin Sera.

No like me. She sounds like me.

“Then he's truly dead. Davad is—” the words broke off, dissolving into what sounded like hysterical laughter. “That's it, then. Kae was right. All this time, and she was right. Nothing I did. Nothing—”

“I thought you'd call her Vima.” That voice with a Deralian accent, still mocking — —and cruel.

Even when I was bluffing, I never sounded that—that cruel. Even when she was angry, Revan never sounded that cruel—

“She wasn't Vima Sunrider. Not anymore—not just—Vima.” Revan’s voice hardened. “I always thought the overlays of personalities she took made her insane. But she was right all along.”

“If you're trying to make me keep you alive to find out why she was right, I don't care. Vima's dead too.”

The head shot up again. Shocked. “You killed—”

“No. Carth did. My husband. She was the dar’jett who hurt Dessa. We found her on a planet called Medriaas. Near a tomb. Good old Vima. She tried to kill me, too.”

A sharp laugh from Polla’s Revan. “Congratulations. You and Tenebrae have doomed us all. More completely than I ever... ever could.”

“How?” The word was a low growl. “Why? You never explained anything to me!”

“You didn't listen. All you had to do was stay on Deralia. I had the Emperor managed. I had the galaxy believing you dead. Had you stayed with our son, the Sleepers would have never awoken. Vitiate’s power would have faded. My vaccine... in another century or two, the Empire would have collapsed.”

“Looks like that wasn’t fast enough for you,” snarled the one, still with the Deralian accent. “This is what you bring. This is all y—”

“I didn’t do this! You did! Your stupidity! Your pride! You killed Davad and Kae, the only two who might have been able to stop—”

“Arren Kae. Vima Sunrider. Whatever. Your old master. My husband killed her—not me.” The Butcher spat the words out like they were throwing knives, and Polla watched as they hit their target: her Revan suddenly growing a shade paler, suddenly sitting down on the edge of Polla’s bed, abruptly looking ten years older.

“Then Tenebrae knew Vima’s plans too.” Not a question. Revan’s voice sounded tired. “I should have realized. It wasn’t your husband who killed her. It was the Emperor. Eliminating another threat—crossing off another hope—”
“What?” The Butcher’s voice was loud enough that the guards by the door—all armored and Mandalorian and faceless—glanced over at them. “No. It was Carth. She was trying to blow up the ship.”

Did the Butcher not know about her husband? Wow, that was rough. Polla cleared her throat. “Um… Revan?” They both looked at her. Great. Was their plan to freeze the Butcher was on permanent hiatus, now? “Carth’s possessed by the Emperor. See, I tried to stop it by unleashing this plague, but—”

“Oh, it worked,” the Butcher said. “Carth was sick when I found him.”

“It worked?” A few months ago that would have felt like good news. Now, Polla just felt… empty. I saved your husband. I killed a bunch of strangers. Not all of them were evil—

“How fortunate for you, Fragment,” Revan murmured in a tone that said the opposite. “Recovering your husband from the Emperor. I put Malak in charge of the Manaan factory next to warehouses full of live virus with the hope he would be transformed. He never caught even a sniffle.”

“What does that have to do with—”

“Obviously, nothing.”

“You realize that Dar tricked you into releasing that plague?” The Butcher looked at Polla again. “Polla, you can’t trust her.”

Revan cleared her throat. “You overestimate my abilities. I was in a coma at the time.’

“So you claim—”

“Oh, yeah? I don’t trust you, Butcher!” Polla snapped. “You wrecked this planet! We had a perfectly good revolution going and you stomped in and bombed the frack out of it!”

The Butcher looked hurt. “I didn’t bomb the planet! I stopped it.”

“No,” Revan said dryly. “You merely killed the only other sentients in the galaxy strong enough—with the knowledge required—to thwart Tenebrae and destroy the Rakatan mainframes.”

“You mean Davad and Vima?” The woman snorted. “Tell me, Dar’Revan, what do you think your old boyfriend would have done to the galaxy? Or did you expect to bat your eyelashes at him and cry to make him stop eating Jedi?”

Revan stiffened. “I realize you’re upset, Fragment, but you sound deranged.”

“Am I? Did you expect to get him to eat planets only at your beck and call—like when you crashed on that fracking planet and he came and rescued your ass? He’d changed, Dar. He wasn’t a man at all anymore. He would’ve had you for breakfast and not even blinked.”

“What?” The other one froze. “Which planet? Whatever you think you know—”

“Oh, Davad!” The Butcher’s voice shifted into Revan’s Coruscanti accent perfectly. “I’m so sorry—everything we’ve done has been steps along a circular path. Every victory is just another obstacle.” She rolled her eyes. “You used Davad Arkan just as much as you used Malak—and the rest of the fracking Jedi. We’re all just pawns on a board to you.”

“You broke the board.” Revan’s face had gone dead white. Every freckle stood out in sharp relief.
“And here we are in your empire of ashes, with precisely the situation I fought for years to avoid—”

The Butcher snorted. “And that’s why you were trying to… what the frack were you trying to do? Freeze me in carbonite?”

“Yes.”

“Good plan. Why not just kill me?”

A red eyebrow arched. “Perhaps I have some modicum of sentiment for my old body. Some affection for your charming personality.”

“My charm—oh, I’ll show you charming!” The Butcher’s hand lifted and suddenly Revan slammed into the tapestried wall. There was something hard under all of that embroidery, because her body made an audible thud when it hit.

Sinae jumped, hand going to her blaster. The smaller guard drew a bead, but the taller one shook his head. Her head? With armor, impossible to tell. The tall Mandalorian pointed to the door.

Sinae and the smaller Mandalorian immediately left the tent.

The Butcher glanced at the door and nodded to the remaining suit of armor. The man (or woman) wearing it folded their arms and leaned against the post, unclipping a gun from their belt, and making a show of cleaning it—rather ostentatiously.

Message was pretty damn clear. Whatever the Butcher did next, she had a free pass.

The Butcher’s voice turned arctic as she turned back to Revan, now suspended and hanging from the wall. “I can question you just as well without your limbs, you know.”

“In fact, I do know.” The answering voice was a dark whisper. Incredibly, Revan was smiling. “Do you know how much you’ve changed, Fragment?”

The Butcher got to her feet, a little unsteadily. “Trust me. All of this is becoming extremely familiar.”

“Is that supposed to be some kind of insult? Do you think I condone this madness?” Revan’s mouth twisted. “You’re like a mad kath in a ferracrystal emporium!”

“Fancy,” the Butcher snapped back. “And you, destroying this fracking planet… what was that?”

“As I explained previously, that was you. The Sleepers awoke looking for you. Somehow you must have triggered them—accelerated their timeline. Tenebrae promised me we would have decades before this came to pass— ”

“And you just happening to be here… don’t try and tell me that’s an accident.”

“I came here so you wouldn’t have to.” Revan’s voice cracked. “You were supposed to stay with our son!”

“As what, a vegetable? You threw me off that ship a thousand meters above the ground!”

“The fall didn’t kill you. Obviously. Malak and I once fell from a ship in the upper atmosphere. In the skies above Althir.” That mirror face raised one red eyebrow. “We tumbled for kilometers, suspended by the Force—”
“Obviously, I don’t give a kath’s ass.” The Butcher raised her hand and twisted it.

There was a crunching noise. Revan on the wall made a small sound, not even a whimper. Another crunching noise. It took Polla a second to realize the Butcher had just broken two of the fingers on Revan’s flesh hand. They bent backwards, away from her friend’s pinned wrist at an impossible angle.

“I’ll do your arm next,” the Butcher said, almost conversationally.

Oh, frack this. Polla pulled out the hold–out and fired, registering as she did with a marksman’s sense the discharge of another blaster bolt from across the room, by the door—

Xxx

Revan was exhausted. Healing Dessa had taken the last of her strength. But she couldn't let it show—any more than she could show fear at being suspended in the air against the stiff fabric wall of the Mandalorian datchka.

Subterfuge had failed her. She could only hope reason would prevail. The woman had a sharp mind. She was capable of admitting her errors. Hopefully her conscience would demand she fix them—

She could kill you before you get to reason, Red.

I trust you can stop her, Mal.

I will try.

Staring down at the woman felt like looking into the eye of ion storm. The Force surged around her, bent to her will and Revan was no longer sure of the odds.

Can you stop her, Mal?

I don't know. Blue light flickered faintly across Revan's vision—evidence of her dead husband's Force shield—but would it be enough?

“Fancy,” the Fragment spat, pacing back and forth on unsteady feet. “And you... destroying this fracking planet… what was that?”

When would the woman understand? “That was you. The Sleepers woke looking for you.”

“And you just happening to be here… don't try and tell me that's an accident.”

“I came here so you wouldn't have to, Fragment.” Revan's patience had frayed with her strength, all gone to heal some nameless Mandalorian and her child. Irrationally, she wished she could Force–choke some sense into this woman—suspend her in the air, feel her fragile neck in the Force—

“You were supposed to stay with our son!”

“As what, a vegetable? You threw me off that ship a thousand meters above the ground!”

“The fall didn't kill you. Obviously,” I didn't know for sure. You forced my hand. “Malak and I once fell from a ship in the upper atmosphere. In the skies above Althir—”

The Fragment raised her hand.

There was a blinding pain in Revan's fingers. A sickening snap. Then again. She heard the whimper strangle in her own throat, as the pressure around her neck increased—

Mal. Help. I’m—

I was not expecting—

“Revan!” Polla called out. There was the sound of a blaster firing, a heartbeat later another—

Xxx

The Force was Revan’s. It sang, as lustrous and thick as eridu silk in her fingers. Some warning of its need vibrating like a plucked string in her skull, even before—

Even before blasters fired. One, two. Polla shot first. Canderous, a heartbeat after.

The air seemed to chill and thicken. Revan held up her hands, one directed to the blaster bolt Polla had fired at Dar'Revan—

No. Me. She fired it at me.

The other suspended a molten slug from Canderous's gun—its trajectory headed toward the Sith Lord on the wall.

Suspended against the swirling fabric of the tent, the woman with Revan's face seemed encased in a net of ice, her expression frozen in a rictus of pain.

Revan's hands moved. The air was thick now, easy to shape. With their velocity frozen, it was quite easy to alter the trajectories of the bolts, sending both harmlessly into the peaked ceiling of the tent. She would deal with the shooters later, but she felt a wave of irrational fury, that Canderous had tried to take her target from her, just as Carth had before—

No, Red.

The voice was a faint whisper, almost distracted. She looked at the woman hanging on the wall again and somehow… shifted the Force, stepping toward her as the stasis released.

The woman on the wall let out a startled breath. Her chest heaved. Her eyes rolled back—

Revan let the Force holding her fall, while the rest of the world remained still.

Dar collapsed on the ground, gasping.

Behind Dar, Canderous was a motionless statue in beskar and to their right, Polla's mouth was half-open, as if she'd been in the middle of speaking and suddenly stopped. The exhaust from her gun was a blue flare—

—and Revan walked over to her, only half-sure of what she was doing. She started prying the holdout from the smuggler's stiff fingers. It was surprisingly difficult to do. She heard her breath catch, as she tugged at the blaster. I don’t want to hurt her—

She just tried to kill you. You've just stopped time and this is surprisingly difficult? That voice wasn't Malak. It rather sounded like Polla—the part of Revan who was Polla. The part she had expected to meet, to understand—

“You should disarm the Mandalorian as well.” The clipped voice was hoarse, as Dar looked up at her warily from the ground. Her golden hand clasped the maimed one and her lips twisted in a grimace that looked like pain.

Everything else around them remained frozen, down to the motes of dust in the air.

“Disarming Canderous could take all day,” Revan muttered. “We’d have to strip him to his skivs. Not to mention rob him of his dignity.”

“I suppose I have you to thank for giving the Mando’ade their dignity back.” Dar didn’t seem surprised that time had stopped for everyone except them. Maybe this sort of thing happened to Sith Lords all the time. “He’s even copied my old mask.”

“That is your old mask.” Probably. So Oerin claimed.

“Welded on a new helm. With sigils from Clan Ordo. Of course. I should have realized the one who stayed was Mand’alor—always loyal to you. They don’t make it easy to distinguish rank, you know. Quite hard to tell officers—on purpose. There are half a dozen helms like that in this camp alone. I saw them when we did reconnaissance on your camp at dawn. You should really post more guards—”

“Shut up.” Revan stalked forward. Dimly, she was aware of some commotion outside the tent—as if the stopped time did not extend beyond their walls. “Did you do this, or did I?”

“It wasn’t me, Fragment. Don’t you know your own strength?”

Infinitely. When Revan closed her eyes she could feel the planet itself, and beneath everything that beckoning, alluring call—

{{Come to me}}

“Youre nose is bleeding, Fragment. Even with your regenerative powers, I can’t help but think if you continue to abuse yourself you’ll see reduced cognitive function.”

And then, Revan realized what she had—unwittingly—done. Stasis, of course. As Malak had used on the Leviathan when he froze her friends, leaving just the two of them to their reunion.

“How long will this last?”

“I have no idea.” The woman on the floor blinked at her. “Until your brain melts? Until the Mandalorian children currently trying to cut through your stasis field disrupt your concentration? If you have something to say, do it quickly.”

All Revan could think of was what she had already said. “You pushed me off a ship. You tried to kill me!”

“But the fall didn’t kill you. Obviously. Malak and I once fell from a ship—” Dar'Revan launched into a story as if she had the upper hand. But she looked small there on the carpeted floor. Frail. Weak.

“But it should have killed me. Shouldn’t it have killed me?” Perhaps it had been the will of the fracking Force that she’d lived—or blind luck—or the deep retaining pond Revan had unwittingly fallen into that had saved her. That was what Doctor Sahara and Molla had said—

“Yes. It should have.” Dar took a deep breath. “The ion blast that took off the back of my skull on the Aleema should have killed me. Injuries I suffered on Yu–Phaedra should have killed me. Fett Cassus Lin’s vibroblade should have killed me. And Bastila Shan’s saber through my spine on the Aleema should have certainly finished the job—"

In the stillness she’d created, Revan was suddenly aware of their heartbeats: her own, steady as a drum—and the other, jagged and uneven, the harsh rasp of breath, the sickly feeling in the Force surrounding the other woman—

“You’re ill.” Revan should have felt satisfaction, maybe, for it was more than an illness. A creeping darkness, a sickening taint, something like poison—

“All of us are.” Dar shrugged. “Radiation. From the blast zones.”

“I–I know.” Because of course. That was why it was all too familiar. ”We’ve had a few dozen cases… we have anti–rad packs for y—for your injured.”

“Would you cure me, Fragment? I thought you wanted to kill me.”

“Not mutually exclusive, those two things. I need answers. I can't have you die first...” Revan’s voice trailed off as something tightened in her head. A pressure, like a band slowly cinching closed around her temples—

—like the Force she'd contained, their pocket of the world was starting to buckle under the strain.
In another moment or five, the blaster bolts would resume their velocity, trajectories aimed directly into the ceiling, now. When Revan’s control broke, Canderous would try something else and Polla would—

She turned toward the frozen woman whose face was dead–eyed and resolute, set firmly on her target—the space that Revan used to occupy.

Polla would try again too. To kill her.

“I didn't expect her to shoot you,” Dar said softly, following her gaze. “Winning the smuggler’s loyalty was easy enough, but I never presumed she would defend me from you.”

“I think you're lying.” It was a guess, born from that dark place inside of Revan, that cold whisper that always sounded like Dar. “Did you… did you make her do this? Compel her?”

“No. I told her the truth. As I’m telling you now. The Sleepers bombed this planet because of you.
You need to be stopped.”

“Because of you,” Revan corrected her.

“Because the mainframe that sustains the Sleepers is an organic bio–matrix extending across several systems and more than fifty planets. And it is dying.” Dar’s mouth twitched. “Dying for lack of a part. The Sith Emperor is broken. I was—you are— his replacement.” The dust motes hung in front of her face like constellations. “Rather, his repair. The system was designed thirty thousand years ago. Perhaps with the Rakatan physiognomy, the connection would be more secure, less prone to error. Or perhaps the planned obsolescence was by design. Perhaps the Rakatans designed it so for a reason…."

“Huh?” Parts of that made sense and parts felt like they were written in upside–down Huttic runes.

“That is what Sith’ae’rah truly is, Fragment. A state of being: one half of a whole. The other definition… the legend of a child made numb to the effects of death...” Dar’Revan shook her head.
“Merely a trap to lure a Jedi knight in.”
“But it worked.” There was more to deal with, and the Force crushing down on them with an increasing intensity made their time brief. “I—remember. And Davad showed me. Malak showed me. I kept them… you kept them sane. In the wars.”

“Did I?” A slow shake of that head. Her hair had been shaved almost to the skull. It made the hollows in her cheeks. In the frozen light, Dar looked half a corpse already. “A prophylaxis. Temporary. I also became convinced the best way to end the war was to destroy thousands at Malachor V. And drive my friends deliberately insane.”

“Davad… he showed me Malachor. And more.” The scene on the cliff would haunt Revan for the rest of her days. “That time you crashed your ship and he came to your rescue, you had a braid of red hair in your hands—”

“He showed you too much.” Those eyes turned away, and Dar hobbled over to Canderous, somehow pulling the blaster from the man's frozen hand with more ease than Revan had done—only wincing slightly, as she used her maimed hand to brace herself.

With a faint smile she held it out his gun, pommel-fist.

Numbly, Revan took it. The message was implicit. Shoot me. If you dare.

They both knew that Revan would not.

Instead, she walked to the open medic cart, selected a kolto packet, unwrapping it as she walked over to Dar. The woman's fingers were darkened and swollen as Revan wrapped them in gel-packs.

“How did Davad die?” Dar asked softly.

“I dropped his ship into a sun, but he… he was already gone.” Those shadows on Katarr, that hunger in her mind. “The man he was died before… before that.”

The man he had been one she wished she had known. Did you ever love me? Davad had asked Revan, but he'd asked the wrong woman.

It was Dar who looked away first, now—pulling her bandaged hand back. “As I said before, he could have ended this. It's all Force-driven, you know. Even the machines. The Sleepers were once denizens of Nathema—what Medriaas was called before. Tenebrae changed them. The computer told him how to transform them—just like it gave me the means to stop him—all for its own ends.” Her mouth twisted. “Fail-safes upon its fail-safes. But Davad could have ended it—”

“By destroying the Force? Everywhere? I'm not sure you really thought that through.”

“Better than the alternative.” Dar took a breath.

“You said the computer gave you the means to stop itself?” Maybe Dar was just insane.

“No. To check Tenebrae's influence. To stop him from possessing… everyone.”

“How?” But even as she asked, Revan's mind made the leap. “You mean with the Jedi plague? Great fracking job.”

“I presented my 'cure' to the plague as a way to save Tenebrae, not end him. The plague’s origins were unknown—but Lord Revan saved the galaxy with her vaccine. Again.” Dar’Revan—sighed. “It weakened him, but never enough. You're sweating, Fragment. Even you cannot sustain this stasis forever.”
That was uncomfortably becoming apparent. The band around Revan’s head had tightened, was now a throbbing ache. “I don't know what to do with you."

“Were our positions reversed I would not have the same qualms.”

I'm not you. “Do you want me to kill you?”

Green eyes blinked. “Malachor will ask about me—if he survives. Are you strong enough to lie to our son?”

“Yes,” Revan gritted her teeth.

“I'm not entirely sure you can be killed, short of finding another sun for you to fall into.”

“Is that a joke?”

“Not at all. The Rakatan computer needs your body to be intact within its tomb. Certain… links were made, modifications commenced from the first time I came to it. Perhaps… perhaps even before.”

Modifications? “I will tell Malachor you died bravely.” Revan leveled the blaster. The world pressed in, tension like a submersible underwater, like a ship under siege. “I would, except—” except for that nagging whisper that could be her conscience. Sometimes it sounded like Dar. Sometimes like Auntie Mita. Or even like Malak. “But what if you're right?”

“I am.” That ravaged face looked tired. “He will take you to the tomb. Merge your being into his. You will become a part of him. You will see through a billion eyes on a billion worlds. You will reignite his empire, you will be the spark that gives him strength to expand his reach—” she sighed. “And when you speak to our son it will be in the body of a stranger.”

“I don't want to be his fracking spark!”

“It doesn't matter.” There were shadows under her eyes. “Can you hear the Sleepers?”

“Yes. They… they showed me things. Worlds. I think they were threatening me if—”

“Precisely, Fragment. I only glimpsed them, dreaming, but the Emperor warned me. He can't control them any more than you can. I was told they're the mainframe's last defense. What it cannot repair it will destroy.”

Destroy. So all of those hundreds of worlds—the worlds I saw through Tenebrae's eyes—the sentients on them—

“But you’re saying that if I go in the tomb, I become Tenebrae's… puppet?”

“More like his Force–battery.” The grimace twisted. “Perhaps you begin to see why it was a fate I tried to avoid.”

“It’s calling to me.” Revan had spent the last two days charging the turbines for the camp machines. She’d even joked about being nothing more than a Force battery, and now—

“I know. It called to me as well. A voice from inside the tomb. But I had time, Fragment. You do not.”

“And… your plan was to freeze me in carbonite? And then what?”
Dar'Revan shrugged. “In the immediate aftermath, Polla and I were going to flee the Mandalorian camp with your frozen body. We have an extraction team half a day behind us—I told them to hold back so you wouldn't sense more approaching. Then…” she adjusted the bandage around her fingers. “Then, we were going to continue our work healing the survivors on this world. Isolate any beings with Tenebrae's Kiss we found. Eliminate most of them—”

“Sounds cozy,” Revan snapped. “You think the Mandalorians would just let that happen?”

“No.” Dar glanced at Canderous, still frozen at the door. “Not when their Mand'alor is loyal to you, but technically—”

“Technically?” Revan could see where this was going. For all the talk of this woman being a tactical genius, her thoughts were predictable. “Technically you think you're the boss of them?” The thought of Canderous going along with her crazy scheme—not to mention Carth—almost made Revan laugh.

“The Mando'ade surrendered to me. If I could reverse our roles, Fragment, I would. But I know the tomb will open for you. It wouldn't for me. I–I tried.”

“Why would that be better?” Revan scoffed. “Maybe you just wanted its power for yourself.”

“I thought I could trick the machine into accepting a weaker copy—a counterfeit battery, as it were. Our genetic codes are identical, so I thought—but it didn't work.” Her face was a mask, but underneath, something boiled. A quiet rage in the Force. “Tenebrae mocked my attempt.”

“And so now you think you can stop all of this by freezing me in carbonite.” Revan swallowed. “For how long? A few months? A year?”

“In a generation or two, if the mainframe's resources are exhausted it might be safe to allow you some measure of freedom—might. We could leave instructions to that effect—” Those green eyes were steady when Revan gave an incredulous scoff. “Would you prefer I lie, Fragment?”

“A generation? Two?” The spark of anger was a reflex, as a part of Revan understood more than she wanted to admit. “But I have a life!”

“Barely. Technically, you are nearly three years old. Polla Organa has a life. I–I had a life—once. I would sacrifice my life for hers—or yours—if the effort would achieve the desired results for the galaxy but since it would not—”

“You... you're trying to talk me into letting you freeze me in carbonite!”

“A preferable alternative to attempting to drug you in your sleep and then freezing you in carbonite. My method would allow you time to say your farewells.” The woman seemed to hesitate. “Perhaps—we could record your memories on a holocron, although I hope you understand, I could not accept another overlay. Multiple lives create instability as the example of Vima Sunrider showed us only too plainly—”

The woman kept talking, her words dissolving into a technical lecture about holocron memories that sounded more like a list of excuses to Revan than anything else.

She doesn't want to die either. She just wants me to!

No, Red.

As if Revan could trust Malak about his... whatever they were.
Do you know if she's right?

I know she is convinced of it. The shadow in her mind seemed to hesitate. I know the Emperor must be stopped. I know what he took from me—from both of us. I know she wants Malachor to be safe—

But you don't know if she's right.

I know her resolve—as I know yours. If she says this is the way forward—

What if you’re both wrong? “I would kill you, Dar,” Revan muttered out loud. “But if you’re right, someone needs to tell Korrie his ma saved the galaxy. Again. And… someone needs to teach him. Things. Things I don't even… maybe things that I never knew.”

Those green eyes were liquid, suddenly. The woman nodded slowly. “It would… you would not be forgotten.”

“I said if you’re right.” Revan was far from convinced. But she could overpower this woman easily. And she needed to know more. As long as Dar thought she had the winning cards, she’d be tractable. Grateful enough to tell Revan everything. And if she was right— “This isn’t over. You’re my prisoner—for now.”

“I accept your terms,” Dar’Revan nodded. As if she had a choice.

“Good,” Revan snapped. “Then I don’t have to gag you. Yet.”

“I will show you what proof I can.” The woman’s hand shook slightly as she extended her hand. Even with kolto, those broken fingers had to hurt.

Did she want them to shake on it? Revan ignored the gesture. “She needs to get out of here.” Revan glanced back at Polla. Polla, who had just tried to kill her. “She and Seiran both.”

“You and I are in accord about that.”

“And I want to talk to this fracking Emperor of yours. You keep saying he told you about the Sleepers—I want to hear it from him myself.”

“My people are searching the ruins for someone possessed by his Kiss. I had hoped that Carth Onasi—”

“Sorry to disappoint.”

“It is not a disappointment. I’m glad he is free. For both of you.”

“You said modifications before. To my… to me. What… what did you mean?”

“Or what?”

The woman's eyes were luminous and the hollows of her cheeks made them look enormous. “As I said before. I don't think it's possible.”

“But that’s—” The implications made Revan’s blood seem to freeze. And then, abruptly, the world came back with a rush. The stasis collapsed, Polla’s voice raised in an astonished squawk, the sound of blaster bolts rang through the air.
And a pack of Mandalorians burst through the door, with Carth somehow in the middle of them.

“Revan!” her husband cried.

The two blaster bolts Revan had misdirected pierced the ceiling of the tent, sending circles of sunlight onto the carpeted floor. One illuminated Dar, giving her hair a cap of flame.

“Don’t shoot Dar again,” Revan told Canderous, tossing him back his blaster. “Not unless I tell you.”

“Huh.” Canderous unsnapped his helm, and took it off. Underneath he was scowling. “What the hell just happened?”

“Revan and I have negotiated terms,” Dar added, in flawless Mandalorian.

Canderous nodded slowly. “Right.”

“What the––” Polla Organa looked down at her empty hand with disbelief. “Where the frack is my gun?”

“It was kind of you to be my champion,” Dar’Revan added, moving toward the Deralian. “But I told you before: she cannot be killed.”

“But she was trying to kill you!” Polla frowned. “What the frack just happened?”

Carth cleared the distance between them in two strides. “Revan,” he repeated, blocking Revan’s view of the smuggler. He didn't reach out, didn’t touch her, just stared at her with that puzzled frown that had launched a smuggler’s crush back on Taris—the one that said he wasn’t sure—quite—what she'd do next—wasn’t sure he'd approve—but he wasn't going to stop her, either.

“Revan,” she echoed, staring back at him. “That's right, Captain Obvious. That's my name.”

“Yeah,” muttered a Deralian voice behind Carth’s back. “Captain Obvious, that’s her name. Maybe.” Polla edged around Carth, her middle blanketed with kolto. She held out her hand to Revan. “I don't know what the frack just happened, but give my blaster back. Now.”

“Are you going to shoot me with it again?”

“Only if you keep torturing my friends.”

“Friends?” She heard her voice scoff. “You realize that Dar’Revan got you mixed up in that rebellion of hers—”

“You’re as dense as a fracking neutron! The rebellion was mine. Mine and Yuthura's.” Polla Organa crossed her arms. “I released the virus to cure Carth. I got Zaalbar connected with the Wookiees working for other noble houses. I got Yuthura in with Lord Scourge—”

“From the way you told it to me, Yuthura Ban quite capably decided that herself.” Dar sounded amused.

“Whatever.” Polla shrugged. “Revan was in a coma the entire time. If you've got some problem with the way things turned out, Butcher, take it up with me. Or yourself, because she's right— we didn't bomb this fracking planet. That's your fleet up there that almost killed Seiran. And you did kill others. Lots of them. Drakkar and Jiuewwrrr and Arun….”
From the length of the dead, the smuggler had made a lot of friends on Kaas. Revan felt something stir in her guts that could have been guilt. Or an emotion less clear—shame maybe. Regret.

It doesn't matter. That thought came with a strange sense of inevitability.

“Enough,” she snapped finally and the smuggler glared at her. The guilt was overwhelming—even more so because Revan knew what Polla Organa and Dar did not—that it hadn't just been this planet targeted by the Sleepers’ attacks. “How long?” Revan turned back to the woman with her face again. “I’m not saying I’m going to agree. But how long before… how long before… how long do we have?”

“I don't know. Soon would be best.” Dar licked her lips.

“And it'll work?”

“It will remove you from the board.” The woman sat down on an empty mat, gingerly massaging her bandaged hand with the metal one. “The Sleepers should return to stasis. The Emperor’s influence will fade—”

“Soon?” Carth interrupted. “Soon, what? Remove her, how?”

“I'll tell you later, Handsome.” Revan flashed a smile without thinking about it—only to realize by his expression she hadn't fooled him—or going by Polla's suspicious expression—fooled anyone. “Carth, I believe you remember Polla Organa and… and—”

Try as she might she couldn't make herself say the woman’s—their—name.

“Of course.” Her husband’s expression was far more friendly when he looked at Dar than Revan liked. “Did you… what just happened in here?”

“That was me,” Revan snapped. “I did it. Not her.”

“Great. There's two of them, now,” Dustil muttered, peering in between the Mandalorians crowding the door. “Hey, Polla.”

“We found Mydia and Yuthura,” he told her. “And Seiran. He’s… he seems pretty pissed off.”

“I expected that.” The smuggler grimaced.

“Hi,” Mekel echoed, edging in past Dustil. “I don’t know if you remember me, Miz Organa—”

“No—wait! That kid from the brothel?”

“Why… you're hurt!” It had taken Carth a long time to remark on it—especially considering Revan had on a kolto shirt, practically. “What the hell happened?”

If I tell you will you shoot Dar like you did Vima? “Later,” she hedged, turning back to her duplicate, raising her voice to be heard in a tent suddenly full of voices. “We have time enough for that, right?”

Dar'Revan nodded.

“You're that kid from the brothel who was possessing Dustil with Darth Malak?” Polla sounded confused. “Mekel Jin? Dustil said you were dead. You look… different.”
“It’s the beard.”

“Turns out I was wrong.” Darth Sulks—Dustil sounded too smug. By half. “He’s not dead. See?”

“But how—?”

Whatever explanation the Sith kids had faded into background noise for Revan.

“Your wife and I had words, Captain Onasi.” Dar’s eyes narrowed. “And I believe we came to an accord.”

“What kind of an accord?”

“It’s not an accord,” Revan snapped. “More like a… a truce. For now.”

“Last I saw the only accord was me shooting the other one.” It had taken Canderous a while to weigh in, but Revan knew behind that flat voice was one pissed-off Mandalorian.

“What?” From Carth. “You were shooting—”

“Me. Sheris Loran,” interrupted Dar'Revan. “Canderous was attempting to shoot me, Sheris Loran. A simple misunderstanding.” Her eyes locked to Revan’s. “Your wife doesn’t want me dead, does she?”

Yes. “No,” Revan said out loud. “I don’t want you dead, Sheris.” Yet. But if the woman wasn’t lying—

She isn’t lying, Red. His voice. Gentle and sad in her mind. Achingly familiar, even if the memory of why was gone.

How can I trust either of you?

“Perhaps… it may be simpler if we all address me as Sheris from now on.” Dar’s mouth twitched as if laughing at a private joke. “Or First of Lin, I suppose.”

“No,” muttered Canderous flatly.

“Just a jape,” the woman shrugged. “I can see where your loyalties lie, Mandalor.”

“Malachor V marked the end of the old ways,” the Mandalorian’s voice was hard as beskar. Canderous had put on his helm again, and that battered visor reflected Revan’s face back at her, twisted and distorted by blast scars. “Loyalty is earned, now.”

“A jape?” Surely it was a coincidence that Revan and Polla Organa snorted at the same time.

“It means joke,” the woman said stiffly.

“I know what it means—” Revan began.

“Jape, yeah. Bossypants uses it all the fricking time,” Polla snorted and stood up herself, wincing a little. The bandage of kolto wrapped around her waist. She extended her hand to Revan. “She tells pretty good japes, for a Jedi. My gun back, Butcher. Now. And I want to see Aemelie.”

“She's above—in orbit on the Aleema.” Canderous answered before Revan could.

“Here.” At some point, Revan had tucked the holdout in the waistband of her trousers without thinking. She handed the smuggler her blaster back. “Don't shoot me again.”

Fake green eyes narrowed. “Don't be an asshole and I won't have to.”

“Polla was shooting at you?” Carth edged between them. His hand slipped around Revan's waist. She resisted the urge to push him away.

“A misunderstanding—” Dar began.

“No one shoots anyone from now on,” Revan snapped. “Not without my orders.”

“Hey, if we're all friends there's no cause to shoot anyone, is there?” Polla spread her hands out in a familiar gesture of peace. “Relax, Butcher, we're not here to take away your little Mandalorian army—”

“Butcher? Are you kidding me? You're calling me ‘Butcher’?”

Canderous muttered something under his breath and stomped out of the tent. For an awkward second, the only sounds in the crowded space were the soft whir of Dessa's respirator, the gurgle of her kolto bath.

“Yeah.” The Deralian was exactly her height. Her tunic had been cut away and the kolto bandage on her waist seemed to give her pain as she fumbled to put her blaster back in its covered thigh-holster. “I have to call you something. She's Revan. And my name's taken.” Her mouth twitched. “Make sure Captain Obvious remembers that.”

“He does.” Revan answered before Carth could interfere again.

“Well, remind him anyway.” Polla glanced at the door. “I have to see my husband now. If we need anyone tortured we'll give you a call, Butcher.”

She turned and walked stiffly out the door, trailed by Dustil and Mekel, and greeted enthusiastically by several of the Mandalorians.

Of course. She met them all before. To hear Aemelie tell it, Polla's practically clan. And Dar'Revan said I was barely three years old. She's right. It felt like the world was opening under her feet. She's Revan. And this is Polla. And I'm—

I'm nothing.

“Revan.” Her husband's lips brushed her ear, his voice a whisper. “Are you—?”

Am I Revan? Okay? Alive?  “No,” she muttered. “None of this is okay.”

“I'm here.”

She looked up into his concerned eyes and took a deep breath. “I think I'd better tell you what Sheris told me. About me. And…and this planet.”

Carth's brow wrinkled. “When you start it like that—”

“Yeah. It's not good. If she's right, I—” her voice cracked. Somewhere in the telling the tent had entirely emptied: now it was just the two of them and the hiss from Dessa's machine.

“The nosebleeds. I know… Sinae said the scans were clean, but—” his breath hitched. “Are you dying?”
“No.” The laugh felt bitter. “But according to good old Sheris that’s the kriffing problem—”

XxX

A/N THANKS as always, Ether, for the fantastic beta. I’m not saying it’s a spoiler but that topknot idea of yours… I think that might happen. It fits, heh. This is the version with less typos.

Oh, and when S–rev said she was glad Carth wasn’t possessed for P–rev? I think you’re right on the credits with the percentage. She is 60% glad he is not possessed and 40% annoyed, because now she has to waste time finding a possessed sent.

Thanks all for reading and your continued support and encouragement.

Please drop by the archive and comment to let the author know if you enjoyed their work!
“I cut the comm-link to the Senate, Admiral,” Lieutenant Jarrus reported. “That was what you meant when you made the--” he scissored his five-fingered hand in a chopping motion, vaguely reminiscent of the gesture Rensha had made with her talons only a moment earlier. “Wasn’t it?”

“Yesss. Good, Jarrus.” It was good, Rensha thought. There was no need to expose the Fleet’s soft underbelly to the likes of these decadent fools. Senators played their assassination games and the Republic burned; while Rensha had taken oaths to uphold their laws, she preferred to contain this atrocity before presenting her findings to the new pack of ruling Houses. Most of them wouldn’t know what to do anyway.

“Oh!” The red-eyed Toydarian blinked his glowing eyes at the comm-board. “Did we stop transmitting?”

“Don’t shoot him!” Rensha cautioned her officers, all of whom had drawn admirably quickly on Lieutenant C’Tannis. “Not this time.”

“Oh, my Admiral….” the possessed lieutenant chuckled. “So pleased you’ve decided to be reasonable. I’ve died quite enough this week.”

“Get the Jedi,” Rensha barked at Rew Ekkumi, instead of giving the thing an answer. “We'll have her explain this.”

In the time it took for the Telosian admiral to retrieve Master Atris, the Toydarian's eyes had stopped glowing and their communications lieutenant had returned to himself, cringing like prey while six of the Republic's finest combat specialists kept him surrounded.

Watching made spittle well in the back of Rensha's throat, as the primitive part of her egg-mind wanted to rend the compromised soldier's throat with her teeth. But she was High Admiral, not a grub in a creche, and so instead Rensha merely paced, dewclaws flexing in her boots, back and forth in front of the pathetic thing.

“I suspected he would have a Voice on this ship.” Master Atris’s voice was mild enough to be infuriating. As always, she was flanked by the two white-haired Echani warriors whom she claimed were kin. “Poor Lieutenant C’Tannis.”

“But you couldn’t tell for sure.” The words came out in a hiss.

“There is no reliable test. I worked with Marla Korr for years and never knew she was possessed. The sickness known on Coruscant as the ‘Jedi Plague’ renders immunity to possession--as I have told you before. But if a sentient is already stricken, its effectiveness is uncertain.”

Master Marla Korr had often advised the Fleet against Malak’s forces--as had Master Klee, another traitor--according to the late Master Kavar. Rensha compartmentalized the rush of anger she felt when reminded of the Jedi Masters’ perfidy, alleviated only partially by the irony of their deaths. “How do I know I can trust any of you?” she growled.

“There are not very many Jedi left.” Master Atris raised one white eyebrow. “And more vanish every day. Victims of the Emperor, or his Sith minions.” Her eyes were light for a Human’s, the color of old scales. “I abandoned my attempts to rebuild the Order to come on this hunt, Admiral. Trust me, I want to see the end as much as you do.”

“Then tell me what to expect.” Rensha gestured the Jedi to come closer, raising her privacy shields so as to be outside the hearing of Rew Ekkumi, or her officers, or that infernal Emperor should he choose to return.

“Expect lies,” Atris said. “Vitiate lies. The Sith Emperor cannot be reasoned with, or negotiated with--he will always lie.”

“And Revan? Her Mandalorian Fleet?”

“Expect them to be compromised.” Master Atris paused. “But I will deal with Revan, Admiral. I promised you that. Leave her to me.”

Rensha noted out of the corner of her left eye that the viewscreen had changed, the lights of hyperspace resolving into real space again. Perhaps, she thought. They still possessed the Mandalorian princess. The Mando did not negotiate for hostages under normal circumstances, but according to Rew Ekkumi’s confirmed reports the girl was Canderous Ordo’s eldest child.

“I believe we’ve reached the first of the Sith planets,” she told the Jedi.

“Indeed.” Atris pivoted on her feet, staring out at the stars and the world below them, which was bisected with burning lines like the globes of a thisla fruit. “The Sith world of Ziost,” she murmured. “Or its remains.”

“Revan did this?” Rew looked at the white-haired Jedi who stood next to her, arms folded, lips pursed.”

“The fleet under her command did. Behold the historic capital of the Sith Empire. The Emperor’s glory, smashed in a manner of minutes.”

“We're picking up a few rescue beacons from the surface,” the communications ensign interrupted them. “Damned few.”

“Any sign of hostiles?” Admiral Cein demanded. His holographic image scowled.

“None.”

“Revan and her fleet are long gone.” Atris paced. “I suspect we'll find her on Dromund Kaas.”

“It would be good to know for sure--” Admiral Rensha glared at their Toydarian prisoner, but the poor sap only made a startled choking noise.

Stubborn, as if after his initial announcement, the immortal Sith Emperor no longer felt the need to speak to them at all.

“Make him come back,” Rensha ordered Atris.

“I cannot. You cannot. Your lieutenant cannot. Only Vitiate controls his arrival--or departure.”

Atris nonetheless extended her hand toward the formerly possessed man, who cringed, as if he were frightened.

“We should assist survivors--” General Sand began--
“Sith survivors?” The white-haired Jedi shook her head. “Do not underestimate them.” She paced to the viewscreen, still flanked by her two Echani guards. Were they her children? Sisters? Lovers? Rensha was not sure. “There is nothing on Ziost for us. We need to continue to Dromund Kaas.”

“Order the Naboo Rising to stay,” Rensha told Sand. “Along with one squadron of fighters. Any sign of hostilities, they should jump immediately to us. Can you broadcast to the planet?”

“Radiation in the sector is making it hard for any beams to get through—”

“Try a short-range radio frequency. Broadcast that we come in peace.” There was no point in trampling on graves. Rensha eyed Atris. “Master Atris will assist with the translation into Ancient Sith.”

“If that is your wish,” the woman murmured. “Divide your forces as you must. But we still should make haste to Kaas.”

XXX

The tent was quiet now save for the sound of Dessa's respirator and the gurgle from her kolto tank. Sunlight from the two blaster holes in the ceiling filtered down onto the patterned floor, a harsher light than the rest. Dar had been sitting in a pool of sunlight before, and Revan wasn't sure when she--and everyone else--had left.

“You can't die,” Carth said. Not the first time he'd said it. But his tone hadn't gotten any more believing. The new lines on his face deepened as he stared at Revan with that old familiar mix of exasperation and concern. “What you're saying is, Sheris came here to freeze you in carbonite because you can't die.”

In her mind the woman would always be Dar.

“But if you could die… she'd kill you?” Carth traced his fingers across her cheek like he was checking to see if she was real. “She and Polla would kill you, if they could?”

“Sheris told Polla that I caused the attack on Kaas.” If Revan kept calling Dar ‘Sheris’ maybe Sheris would begin to seem like the woman's name. Eventually.

“But you just… let, uh… Sheris go free.”

“For now. She's a healer. We can use her. And I…” I need to know if she's right. “She says freezing me in carbonite will stop the Sleepers, Carth.”

His hand had moved from her face to her arm, like he was trying to pull her closer. “Do you believe her?”

“I don't know.” Revan's back ached, a dull pain quelled by kolto from where the saber had gone in. The adrenaline that had fueled the blur of the day had faded, leaving Revan shaken and feeling all-too-mortal. “Some of what she said… makes sense.”

“Sense,” he echoed. “You think it makes sense to freeze yourself in carbonite. Because the woman who took out her own fleet at Malachor V says so.”
“She recommends I seal myself in carbonite because I can't die.”

“You can't die,” he repeated. A muscle twitched in his jaw. “She says you can't die. You can't die because the… Kashyyyk computer did something to you? Or the Emperor…? That’s--”

“Insane.” Her laugh felt hollow. “I know.”

“No, I was gonna say… maybe that part… maybe that’s true.”

“Really, Flyboy?” The eyeroll she shot him felt fake.

“You might not remember. You were pretty out of it, but I had you scanned on Taris. That doc--Zelka Forn--”

“I remember.” Doc Forn was undoubtedly dead, now. Along with most of the planet.

“He said--the back of your skull had been regrown. There was a graft line--I saw the scans. Then Sinae scanned you again on the ship. Clean. No sign of an injury. I thought, maybe… I asked Sinae. She said there should be a graft line if you'd had bone regrown. There wasn’t. Nothing at all.”

Who knows what you saw on Taris? Bastila healed me so many times, who's to say she didn't fix it with the Force, or Juhani--

A dozen excuses died on Revan's lips. “Yeah,” she said out loud. “Sinae said I was fine.”

“She wanted to run a longer scan,” Carth frowned. “Maybe we should let her.”

Revan’s nose was bleeding again. There was a dark presence in the back of her mind like a low hum. She thought if she paid attention it would voice words. Calling to her. Beckoning. “What’s it gonna show?” That I’m losing my mind?

How many times have I died? Dar’Revan listed them like a fracking shopping list on Seventhday.

Malak had shown Revan the death to the Fett Mandalore. And she… remembered dying on the Aleema. She had fallen from the sky on Deralia--

But Sinae said my scans were clean. Revan stared down at the faint red line on her arm, the only scar on her body. From some duel, according to Dar. Why just the one scar and no others?

“Maybe shoot me,” she joked.

Her husband blinked. “No.”

Revan didn’t remember stopping the bolt that Polla Organa had fired. It had been by reflex. She eyed the blaster clipped to her husband’s belt. “But we need to know.”

“Think we know enough.” His voice was quiet, his jaw set and stubborn. “I can’t stop you from testing whatever kriff-handed theory you want, but I’m not gonna help. I’ve seen… remember that fight on Korriban with that crazy Sith?”

“Which fight on Korriban with which Sith?” There had been dozens.

“Exactly.” His smile was grim.

“But… but I was dying, once, remember? After the Star Forge. The computer on Kashyyyk said I was dying because of that Force collar.” Without the Force--before Yuthura took off the neural disruptor on Manaan, and saved her.

“The Rakatan computer said you were dying? It’s part of the same network that wants you to go into this tomb? What if it lied?” His brow furrowed. “You said that computer made you immortal.”

“Hey! I never said immortal.” Immortal. Revan’s side still ached where Dar had stabbed her. Something in the air on this planet kept making her sneeze. And, as if on command, she felt her nose start to bleed again. She wiped it with a gaz-pak.

“You told me that Sheris said the computer on Kashyyyk did something to you.” From the emphasis Carth was putting on her name, he wanted to separate them just as much as Revan did. “Or… to her. When she was you. Something that made you like this.”

“She wasn’t sure.” But that wasn’t true. Merely, Sheris hadn’t known how it was done.

“If it did something to you… it… maybe it could make you think you were dying.”

“You’re saying that computer wanted me to think I was dying so I’d… what? Use the Force? Did it expect me to fall again?”

“So you’d use the Force.” Carth nodded. “Exactly! It needs you to use the Force--it needs you here, with the Force. I don’t… I know this sounds nuts, but what if the computer’s been behind this all along? Guiding our steps, moving everything in the galaxy to bring you here?”

The voice in the tomb was a dull hum in the back of her skull, beckoning Revan like an itch that she couldn’t scratch. What Carth suggested didn’t sound nuts at all. Not when she could feel the connection to the thing in her bones.

“So… if we… if we cut me off from the Force again--I’d… live?”

“Maybe.” Her husband’s expression was cautious, as if he didn’t want to get her hopes up.

“Sheris said if I seal myself in carbonite ‘for a few generations’ that might be long enough to stop the Emperor.” Revan scoffed. “So… what--like, three hundred years? Guess if I can't die that's no time at all. Would you wait for me?”

“I can't wait that long.” Carth reached for her hand and squeezed it. “Not even for you, beautiful.” Those new lines in his face made his smile look pained. “But I have a better idea.”

“Didn’t think there could be a worse one.” She tried to smile back.

Carth took a breath. “What if we leave instead?”

“What?”

“We could just leave. Slap a Force collar on you and find some place out in Wild Space where no one's ever heard of Sith--or you.” Carth looked serious. “We could take the Hawk.”

“It's possessed by a computer who keeps telling me to go into the tomb?” She hadn't been back inside since they landed. Hearing Mission betray them was like a punch to the gut. “And what about your son?”

“We’ll take another ship. And we'd take Dustil with us. And Mekel, of course.”

“Of course. And your future grandchild--guess we'd have to take that kid Dustil knocked up, too.”
“We—we’ll make room. Get a ship big enough to have room.”

“And….” Her voice trailed off. “Canderous? The clans? Polla and Seiran? Korrie. We'd have to stop on Deralia and get Korrie—”

“Canderous and the Mandalorians are the least of my worries—they've got the firepower to fend for themselves. We could take Polla and Seiran. Pick up Korrie. Maybe find Zaalbar, too. Maybe if we get far away from here in the Hawk, Mission would stop talking about those tombs. Zaalbar and I could put our heads together… maybe we could fix Mission.”

“We'd be fugitives.”

“We'd be together.” He squeezed her hand. “You'd be away from this.”

“Have you ever thought maybe this is what I deserve?”

“No.” His mouth twisted. “And if it's the last damned thing I can do I want to make you stop thinking it. You don't deserve to be frozen in carbonite or… or locked in a tomb for eternity with a madman in your head! Nothing you did deserves it.”

“Nothing?” She raised her eyebrow. “Malachor V? Being Sith—”

“That wasn't you.” His voice was quiet. Stubborn. “Look, I'm not saying… you did… there are some… there's stuff you did do. You know it as well as I do. Mistakes. Tragic ones—but—”

“Yes” She swallowed. My friends. “I've killed a lot of people.”

“This isn't atonement. Living would be.”

“So, run,” she repeated. “You want to run.”

“Just… go.” Carth said softly. “We could just go… couldn’t we?”

“You can't really think it would work?”

“I want to think it.” He kissed her forehead, resting his lips there, scratch of stubble against her skin. “Find a Force collar. Just… just go.”

It can’t be that easy, Carth. I was half-dead after Kashyyyk. You think that was all a trick? And the Sleepers… do you think they’ll just stop if I put on a Force collar and run?

And then Revan understood. They’d played similar games on Korriban, on Manaan—even on Kashyyyk. When things got really dark—they still had that spark of hope, the dream of a future even if the time itself could never come to pass. Just the pipe dreams of a mindwiped Sith war criminal and her Republic pilot gone AWOL.

But there was always that flip-card waiting its turn in the hand. The hard light of day in a strange spaceport. The hangover. Like an empty bank account, like kanna mites in the spice.

Revan let him wrap his arms around her. “Sure. We'll run.” It didn't need to be said that Carth couldn't jettison this place and these people any more than she could. “There's places on the Defalli Rim. I know coordinates. Polla's da told her—”

“Like us.” She closed her eyes. The whispers in her mind calling her to the tomb faded to a dull
ebb. “Of course, without the Force I’m not that dangerous.”

“Oh, I don’t know.” He kissed the top of her head. “Beautiful, you know we could, if--”

“Shut up.” She ran a finger across his mouth to quiet him. “You said it already. We’re outta here.”

“Yeah.” He kissed her forehead. “Okay.”

Xxx

Tending to the wounded was strangely relaxing, a familiar pattern of healing trance and the smell of kolto.

Revan had asked Sinae to give Carth and the Fragment time alone together. The Mandalorian healer made a great show of expressing her desire to return to the medix tent, but acquiesced in the end. The respectful light in Sinae's eyes was familiar: the expression of a woman who had seen a Jedi perform miracles, and would entrust her with performing more of them.

And the order of the well-rounded Mandalorian encampment surrounding them sent a chill up Revan’s spine.

A tactical part of her brain noted the main approach to the camp that had been blasted by the Sleeper's ships, the ground there pitted and scarred where exploded Ordo mines had upended a thousand years of priceless stonework. She also noticed the two armored figures in beskar who stood exactly fifteen meters in front of her, one on each side. Both were armed to the teeth--

Not just two, Red.

A prickle in the Force as much as Malak’s warning caused Revan to turn, only to see another six warriors in full armor arrayed in a half-circle between her and the residential tents. Automatically, she scanned for the wider figure in scarred beskar who must have given the order, but Canderous Ordo was nowhere to be seen.

Nonetheless, she would have bet Malachi's fortune that the Mandalore was watching her, too.

Ordo’s blind loyalty to the Fragment shouldn’t have been a surprise, and yet it was. Eyeing those stalwart figures, Revan had the unpleasant realization that even if her plan had worked and they’d successfully frozen the Fragment in carbonite, Mandalorian loyalty would have required at least one more fight.

Something else the mighty Revan didn't anticipate?

Mocking me serves no purpose. The Sheris presence in her mind grew bolder, but the automatic anger Revan had once felt about the intrusion had faded. You and I must work together.

To that, Sheris had no answer, just a gentle nudge toward their next patient, the woman with the infant they'd rescued from the rubble of Kaas City.

“It’s you!” The relieved smile was strangely gratifying. “No one will tell us anything! And these soldiers…” she lowered her voice, glancing nervously from side to side. “They’re Mandalorian!”

“Oh, I’m aware.” A wry smile pulled at Revan’s lips.

Then Revan reassured her that the Mandalorians would not eat or enslave them, and administered the precious anti-rads to both mother and child. As she worked, she tallied the ships lined up on the plateau and the rows of tents lining the square. Not the largest gathering of clan she had ever seen—but they were well-armed and organized for a people whose backbone she’d shattered. That was, she suspected, more a testament to Canderous Ordo's prowess as a general than the Fragment's strategizing. Add to that Revan’s own flagship and whatever manned fleet the Fragment and Ordo had brought to the system….

This world would bring no challenge for them, but they could seek others—the Imperial mines on Lothal, or the colonies near Quesh. All undefended, if the Imperial navy is broken--

Sinae had said Carth Onasi commanded what was left of the Imperial ships. Revan had to wonder at that loyalty.

But closer matters were at hand. Revan's head turned toward the transport and the injured from their camp. Those with the worst injuries had already been taken inside the domed triage stations, where junior medix would stabilize them until Sinae came, but the remainder still suffered. In this light, Yuthura’s lekku looked almost gray. The woman raised a hand in Revan’s direction, and she waved back.

Lady Ban needs a second dose of medication, Sheris nudged in her mind. And more healing.

A few rows over from Yuthura, Polla Organa appeared to be having a spirited discussion with her husband. From the sullen expression on Polla’s face, Seiran was just as upset with his wife as they had predicted.

“What’s taking the First Wife of Lin so long? Sheris, get Urex to show you the supply tent. We’ll need more anti-rads.” Sinae made a quick hand-motion at the nearest armored guard—and then a ruder one when the block of beskar shook their helmeted head as if countermanding her orders.

“I can begin another triage round while Urex gets the supplies, if that is easier—” Revan offered.

“Yes. I’ll have a word with Aemelie as soon as they get the comms back online.” Sinae’s braids were a frizzled tangle. She pushed them back from her forehead. “Let the Second Wife of Ordo talk some sense into that di’kut husband of hers. There is no reason why you should not be trusted with our supply caches. You saved Dessa and her baby!”

Revan smiled politely. “How kind of you to say,” she demurred, with all of Sheris’s sniveling diplomacy. “But… Revan and I have had our share of misunderstandings.”

The medix frowned, lowering her voice. “Not all blame for that belongs at your feet.”

“--but it is my feet that must carry the burden.” Finishing the Mandalorian proverb reminded Revan where she had first heard it: in the women’s tent at the Clan Lin compound, before everything changed.

How much of our lives were set in place, even then? She meant the mental question for Malak, but his presence in her mind was diffused, unfocused as if his attention had wandered elsewhere. To the Fragment, she thought, or perhaps, their son--

“If you carry the burden, wear capable boots.” Sinae smiled, and clapped Revan on the back, before retreating back to the main medix tent.

Automatically, Revan glanced down at her feet. She was still wearing the armored shoes that Mydia Blais had supplied, but of course the expression was merely a metaphor. Capable, am I? It would have been the epitome of arrogance to anticipate her own survival, but now--

Now that she had survived, Revan discovered that she wanted to live.

Malak said that Malachor is fine. It was a childish leap of faith, that saying those words made them true, but that was all Revan had to grasp. The thought that she would see him again--a thought she had never dared be possible--made her eyes prick now with unshed tears. A fool's sentiment, but if it were true--

Your son. Sheris's voice, soft as a whisper. We will see him again, even though you denied me any children of my own--

I had no choice.

Liar.

If you wanted children you should have stayed on Dantooine. Slept with a different man. It was enough to make Revan laugh, that she could have such a futile argument with a shadow.

“Your babe will be fine,” she comforted the wounded refugee, who rewarded her with tears of gratitude and superlatives the woman never would have dared offer a Dark Lord of the Sith.

Where is that Wookiee of yours? Was Sheris mocking her with the question? I thought they were supposed to meet us here--

That was true. Revan glanced at the sky overhead, and then down at the unblinking light of the short-range comm-link on her wrist. It was possible that Grarwwaar and Rogere were still out of range, or that planetary interference was stopping their transmission, but they should be here by now.

XXX

“What's the kriffing naastar doing now?” Naastar. Destroyer. Seemed a better name than Sheris and Canderous’d be damned if he was gonna call the naastar Revan. He heard his voice crackle over the short-range transceiver and adjusted the knob at the base of his helm. “Who authorized giving Revan’s double medical supplies?”

“Sinae.” Philene’s voice crackled back, sounding more impressed than he should be. “That Sheris woman saved Dessa’s life.”

“She also stabbed Revan in the guts. Don’t give her the run of the camp.” He raised a hand to signal the other guards to their watch and Urex raised an arm back. “Stay on the naastar.”

The kids commed in their assent and Canderous cranked the climate control on his armor, pacing around the wideband station they were trying to assemble.

Onasi and Revan hadn't emerged from the medix tent and now Sinae was squawking on their open channel, complaining about losing access to her own tent.

He told her to let them be--at least for now. Onasi and Revan in the tent was better than Revan following that double of hers.

“That's right,” he muttered into his now-muted comm. “Keep away from the kriffing naastar, Revan. Unless you're gonna kill her.”
“General? We're almost done!” Rowda's voice interrupted his thoughts and Canderous glanced up. Their best pilot’s face was split with a wide grin that more than made up for the burn scars across half of it.

“Good,” he grunted, popping the seals on his helm, because if they got through Gwen would need to see his face.

The contraption Rowda and Jingo built was really something: a soldered-together tower of recycled pipes and durasteel fitters that jagged its way up the side of the ancient Temple. Fifty meters up, two more of the Rialis kids hovered their jets, bolting the last piece of the triangular tower in place.

Rowda gestured to the board. “When you're ready, boot her up…?”

Canderous grimaced. The controls looked like a scrapped comm-board from one of the snubs hooked up to a pair of rusty turbines, but Rowda swore those turbines would boost their comm signal high enough to pierce the crap in atmo and allow them to contact the Aleema --and then hopefully pitch a wideband signal off her transceivers into the galaxy beyond. They needed a bead on the rest of the galaxy, and their people in it.

Dxun. By the Six, he was not looking forward to telling Gwenarius they'd lost their daughter. A clean death in battle would have been one thing. But this--

(To the other fear, the one that had seen the reports from Onderon, the worry there would be no one to answer on Dxun--or no Dxun left to call--to that fear, he would not give a voice.)

“Go ahead,” he nodded encouragingly at the Rialis kid, wiping the sweat from his face with the towel he’d started clipping between his guns since they landed on this osik planet. The air was thick and damp. Hells, he'd bunkered down in swamps less swampy.

Rowda flipped a switch and lights sparked on the board. There was a low whine as the turbines began to spin, feeding off the battery Revan had charged for them the day before. “Might take a while to get a signal,” Rowda warned, turning the dials.

“Take your time.” The two kids in jet-packs above were coming down, but Canderous kept more than half his attention on the redhead he'd had a lock on since the medix tent.

The naastar was doling out meds to the wounded on their camp's eastern lee, now. Didn't look like any more than that--but if she tried anything he'd be ready. Revan was a great warrior--best he'd ever seen as long as she didn’t need to shoot something. But she wasn't always right.

“Why do you follow her?” Gwen had asked Canderous that question more than once, and while Aemelie insinuated at least some of the reason was driven by his attraction, Canderous had realized long ago that he had no more desire to pin Revan against a bulkhead than she had a want to be pinned--by him.

No, he followed her for reasons less simple to articulate, for desires less easy--or palatable--to sate.

He followed her because in the clean simplicity of a firefight, Canderous felt alive. He followed her because in their moments of battle, either of them had but to raise a hand or turn a head for the other knew the plan. Their synergy was not lust; it was something bloodier, darker, deeper. A kinship between two predators, born in a Taris sewer and honed to an electron-bladed edge across a galaxy.

Canderous followed Revan--not Starfire, D'Reev, Ordo, Onasi, or even Lin--because blood called to blood, and glory to glory. Because she was a warrior worth his equal. There’d been a time--a recent time--before Milli was lost, before Dxun attacked, before this naastar showed--when Canderous had thought Ordo and Lin would rise together. He’d even plotted their invasion of this hu’tuun empire; traced the spacelanes they would claim, charted out planets capable of giving them a real fight--

Even then he’d known it was nothing but a pleasant fantasy. For Mando'ade, there is a time for all seasons, and now was not the season for war.

The Sith Empire had been conquered in a heartbeat, folding like cheap Republic battle armor. The refugees they aided now had all fight beat out of them. The aruetii machine-ships might have been a glorious challenge, but his people were too few, their forces too diminished. The betrayal of Clan Wies at Medriaas was another blow. As much as Canderous longed to see his people burn through the stars, he had also seen enough of war to know that the arc would be tragically short if launched too soon--a vulnerability that was only brought home in spears by Gwen's continued silence, the loss of their daughter, and the ordinance Revan's hu’tuun ships had displayed--a might they could not match, no matter how much he wished it was so.

Aemelie wanted to believe they were on the cusp of a new age of glory, but perhaps Canderous had allowed her too much rein. There were reasons why wars were fought with the counsel of women and not their swords.

And if he had indulged Aemelie too much; he had also allowed himself and the clans to be dragged too deeply into Revan's troch affairs. There were no dar'jett left on this planet to fight--merely broken sentientis that would be more trouble than they were worth to feed. And while Canderous knew that assisting the losing side today might mean alliances and victory in another rotation, he also knew there was nothing strategic for them on Dromund Kaas--only a danger that lay not with radiation sickness, or the beasts of the jungle, or even an immortal abomination of an emperor.

No, the danger in this place rested within the skull of that green-eyed naastar aruetii, whose frail body possessed the dar'jett mind that had once taken the clans apart.

Canderous did not hate the naastar--not rationally, at least. But the lizard part of his brain screamed she was a threat to his Revan, a threat that needed to be extinguished before her whispers spread like brushfire through the clans. In his brief observation she reminded him uncannily of the tales he’d heard of Novasun--and indeed, from what Revan had said, this woman had been trained by that thrice-damned Dar'Jett--so perhaps the comparison was apt.

Jana Novasun had been aruetii in the end, too; betraying them to Malachi D’Reev for her own games.

No good could come from the counsel of her apprentice.

Of their mystical Emperor, Canderous and his people had found no sign, but the thought of such a being worried him less than the naastar. A man with multiple bodies could be killed multiple times.

He would only have needed to kill the woman once--but Revan had chosen to spare her. Canderous had to respect that. To do otherwise would be to truly turn his back on Revan, and by association the rest of the clan they had forged. He owed her--not to mention Carth and the furball--more than that. If the walking carpet was even still alive.

Still, she best not test his patience. “What’s the naastar doing now?” he barked into the helm, holding it in front of him to catch the speaker still primed to his voice.
“It’s only five minutes since the last time you asked. Still healing, I think.” That was Philene. Cautious to a fault.

“She’s glowing blue and sitting.” There, Urex--always so literal.

“Huh. Keep on her.” Canderous paced to the top of the hill, where he’d have the best shot if she tried something.

The naastar aruetii was indeed glowing blue and sitting, but then she stood, moving among the injured and sick and he noted what else should concern Revan if she had a jot of sense: the woman attracted followers, just like Revan herself. Sinae had already taken Canderous to task over their private comm-channel for trying to shoot the aruetii. She had, his medix insisted, saved both Dessa and the babe, and if Canderous was going to slaughter the best healer his medix had ever seen, he could find a new medix, and perhaps a new clan to ally with, for Sinae would take the clan of Zal with her.

But maybe Aemelie could talk to Sinae--

The static from the comm-board cut out with a show of sparks and their turbines abruptly ceased.

“Battery’s dead again,” Rowda sighed. “We need more power. Can you get Revan--?”

“She’s busy.” Canderous snapped.

“But--”

“I’ll handle it.” Revan wasn’t the only Force-user on this festering chivhole of a planet

Xxx

Dustil was so startled when Canderous Ordo had appeared in the doorway of their tent that he’d been a dumbass and said yes when the man asked him to play Force battery.

At the time, it had seemed the perfect excuse for him and Mekk to get away from Mydia Blais, maybe work out some ground rules, warn his boyfriend to stop fracking flirting with the sociopath who was gonna have Dustil’s kid, because she could really hurt him--maybe figure out if this was all an act or if Mekk was really into her.

But Mekel Jin had other ideas.

“Good luck, Telos,” Mekk breezed. He was bent over a crate of Mydia’s clothes, pulling out pieces of armor and holding them up for her inspection.

“Donate,” she yawned. “No, wait. Keep the cortosis bra. Have fun, Lord Malak. I do hope you conquer the Mandalorians after you do chores for them.” She’d made a fan out of some corrugated packing material and was briskly fanning herself. “Slave, open a window. It’s stifling in here!”

“He’s not--” Dustil heard his voice crack and fumbled. Didn’t seem to matter, Mekk just kept smiling.

“You know it’s a tent, right?” Mekel shrugged. “No windows, Lady Mydia. You want to go outside?”

“Ugh, no.” She wiggled her bare feet, the only part of her besides her face that wasn’t in armor. “My hair… Mandalorians… I can’t bear the sun.”
“It’s raining, I think.” Mekk craned his head around to Canderous Ordo, who muttered something that might have been a weather report or might have just been disgust before tramping off.

Was Dustil just supposed to follow him?

_Come on_, he thought at Mekel, but the chivhole didn’t budge. Of course, no bond, but how long had they known each other? Mekk should be able to tell that Dustil wanted them both to go.

“I want a window.” Mydia pouted, sticking out her lower lip and crossing her arms. “I feel a bit sick.”

“Mor’fracka,” Dustil snapped, using the Force to lift one of the tent’s panels away from the rest. It snapped up, revealing the view of camp life that Dustil had been trying to forget: tidy rows of Mandalorian soldiers and suffering civilians. Sure, it was the Sith suffering, but it still looked too much like Telos after the bombs for comfort.

“Lord Malak aims to please,” Mekel smiled. At her. Not at Dustil.

“Let’s go.” Ordo was back again. A block of armor. Impatient. Holding a coil of wire that Dustil was probably going to be hooked up with. To a battery, while Mekk tried to hook up with Mydia Blais.

“Later,” Mekk said, holding up a pair of high-heeled boots plated with gems for Mydia to inspect. Her lips twisted with disdain. “Ugh! Obliterate those. Grandmother had terrible taste.”

“Discard.” Mekk shrugged and tossed them in the largest pile, the one stacked precariously and half-blocking the door.

Well. That was that.

When Dustil left, Mydia was barking instructions at Mekel, sitting on a pile of rolled Mandalorian carpets, still with her armored boots off. But Dustil _knew_ her. Next she’d ask Mekel for a foot massage, and he’d have to give her one or she’d use the Force on him.

Where was she going to _sleep_? Where was Mekel going to sleep? He couldn’t risk pissing Mydia off about Mekel, she could hurt him so easily, and without the Force he’d have no defenses.

But Mekel acted like it didn’t matter at all.

That was how Dustil ended up standing by two sparking, humming turbines, concentrating the Force into a steady pulse of energy that kept the rotors turning, while an armor-clad Mandie did something with what looked like a salvaged communications board and a Bith-rigged metal tower. Somehow, this was supposed to patch into the planet's natural electrical grid, and boost their free-receivers planet-wide, or beyond.

Dustil hadn't been on the engineering track in the good old Dreshdae Academy (there was no engineering track), so he'd have to take the ass's word for it. But he was glad to be doing _something_ besides pretending to be Darth Malak to satisfy Mydia Blais, who seemed even nuttier than he remembered. He'd warned Mekk to keep his distance from her--realizing a millisecond later that was probably like issuing an open-door invite for Mekel Jin to give her a lap dance--but it was done now--

“Don’t worry about me, Telos.” That crooked smile made Dustil do nothing but worry, but he told himself that was dumb. For all her talk about torture and popping off toes, Mydia Blais was no
Inse. (And what had happened to good old Inse? Maybe her ship had exploded. That would be for the best, probably. She’d have Mekk for breakfast.)

“How’re you getting on?” The gruff voice rattled through a helm’s speaker and Dustil looked up, startled to see the Mandalore looming over him.

“He's doing it!” Leskal answered for Dustil, with more enthusiasm than Dustil felt. “We've got the receivers live.”

“Doesn't help much if we can't get the relays up. When the Aleema's back in range, we'll send up a shuttle, see if we can rig up a com-sat from there.”

“I could help with the relays.” Dustil had to offer. “I… uh, I used to have a portable sat-net back home.

“Good.” The Mandalorian grunted his approval. “Your father said you knew this stuff. Once the mains are full, see if you can patch us up to the Aleema.”

My father said I knew this stuff. How the frack did his father know he knew anything? Maybe the old man had been paying attention. It gave Dustil a weird feeling inside.

XXX

Seiran’s leg had been encased in a fresh wrap of kolto-ribbed plasticote. Looking at it made Polla sad all over again. In the time they'd been apart, he’d had a delip that took all his dangerous stubble away. And his eyes were narrowed slits of black, squinting at the sun and looking anywhere but at Polla's face.

“At least you're speaking to me,” Polla joked. You could cut the tension between them with a laser sword. But outwardly, Seiran had been nothing but sweet as thisla pie: asking about her trip like she'd just gone to town on Sixthday, smiling when she told him how their plan with the Butcher had gone down in flames… and even nodding sympathetically when she told him how Revan had conned her into thinking the Butcher had bombed Kaas on purpose.

He hadn’t even said ‘I told you so.’ Not once.

That was worrying because it meant he must be saving his ‘told you so’s’ up.

“Of course I'm speaking to you.” Seiran gave the sky (and not her) a smile that might have been believable if Polla was eighty-five and half-blind. His hands were white-knuckled, she noticed, and there was a muscle twitching in his cheek as he stared at the space above her head. “You're my wife.”

“You have a right to be mad--”

“Do I?” His thick eyebrows drew together and he took a breath. “What a relief to have your permission.”

“But Revan said she needed my help.”

“And how did that go--getting your help? Sinae told me Revan brought you in on a stretcher. She said it's a wonder you didn't bleed out from the small tree that got you in the spleen.”

“That was an accident.” Never mind she'd been in that tree with the half-baked idea she might shoot them both. Never mind that Sei was putting Polla in a position where she had to defend Darth
Bossypants, the woman who had... pretty much stretched the truth 'til Thirdday to get Polla's assistance with freezing the Butcher in carbonite.

Darth Bossypants had used her. It hurt, but Polla had to, as Ma always said, face facts. Darth Bossypants had used her, but the other one had broken Darth Bossypants's fingers. Without blinking.

And the other one was in charge of this Mandalorian army.

The woman with her memories was fracking scary. Hell, she and Tenny-Bro would probably get along great.

“An accident. Yeah. She said that, too.” Seiran still avoided her gaze. “You both end up half-dead but not a scratch on her. ”

“Sei! Revan didn't get me hurt on purpose!” Except the mine had been live after all. Revan walked out without a scratch and they both--almost died, but didn't. She saved us, but if it wasn’t for her--

“How do you know it was an accident?” Sei demanded. “Sounds just like what she’d say.”

“Because they were... they were fighting each other when I fell out of the tree.” She didn't want to say frozen in a weird stasis bubble, because that made her sound nuts.

Polla would never forget the sound of Revan’s fingers breaking until the end of her days. Revan only had one good hand and the Butcher had just thrown her into the air like Tenny-Bro had done to them both in the tomb. Like they were nothing. And Polla still wasn't sure what had--she'd shot the Butcher and she hadn't missed, no way she could miss at such close range--

“Are we done yet?” Seiran's voice sounded as tired as Polla felt, interrupting her thoughts like a jolt out of hyperspace. “We've gotten through the worst, so we're done. Right?”

“I... guess.” The Butcher had sounded like she was gonna listen to Revan after all, Polla thought, although that did beg the question: why go through all that banthashit when Revan could have just told her what was wrong? Why hadn't Revan just told her what was wrong?

Bossypants used me. She said the Butcher wouldn't hurt me and she was right. But she risked my life--

“How is she?” Seiran asked. “Revan?”

“Ask her yourself. She's right--” Polla gestured at the red-headed woman in armor with the hover crate of meds tending to some injured three rows down--but then Sei's expression made her realize the mistake. “Oh. You mean the other one? Fine. Barely hurt.”

“Sinae said she got a nasty stab wound,” Seitan muttered. “She doesn't blame you...?”

“No.” Polla forced a laugh, trying not to remember the shot. Maybe... maybe the woman didn't know who she'd aimed for. “We're pals. The Butcher even offered to get you and me out of here.” Her smile felt forced. Her side still hurt where the tree had gone in.

“Good.” Seiran finally looked her in the eyes. “Let's do that. Tomorrow. First thing.”

“We... uh, we'd need a ship--”

“No shortage of ships,” Seiran waved a hand toward the plateau bristling with ships. Most were short-range Mandie fighters, but there were a few beauts that had already caught Polla's eye. Nothing quite like the Hawk, of course, but if the Hawk hadn't been such a sweet ride Polla would have picked that Arkanian Starcruiser over a Corellian disc model any day of any galactic week.

“They owe us at least that much,” Seiran muttered. “Or we can cadge a ride from your Exchange buds. I already asked the Sullustan–Oaska. She said yes.”

“Oaska’s great, but she doesn’t speak for Grarwwaar. He’s the boss.”

“Asked the Wookiee too.” Seiran folded his arms. “He and Rogere showed up around the same time we did. They're right over there.” He waved his hand toward the high point of the ridge, where, sure enough, the meters-tall shaggy frame of a Wookiee slouched next to the rounded mass of a Houck. Looked like the Grarwwaar had his arm around Rogere, even.

“Lookit that.” Polla nodded at the duo. Changing the subject seemed the smarter type of valor. “You really want to be on the same ship as a Houck and a Wookiee when they're getting it on?”

“I’d frack a Houck and a Wookiee if it'd get us home,” her husband snapped. “But that wasn't the deal. Grarwwaar said he owed you.”

“Owed me?” Polla frowned. That wasn't quite right. “No. See, I ran into Ik-tik Dracary at the Blue Skies-- think I told you this before--?”

“Your Exchange contact. From the bar. Yes.”

“Yeah. We used to run opposite legs of the Corellia-to-Jeddah gig. Anyway, he introduced me to his Wookiee pal, and so… uh, Mission said credits would be no problem, so I offered to pay them to help--”

“Mission said credits would be no problem? Where was she getting them from?” To Sei’s credit, he didn't flinch. His voice didn't change its tone. Just his hand clamped down on her hand, nearly hard enough to bruise. “Pollie. We gotta get out of here.”

“I know.” She did. She glanced over at where Bossypants was bandaging some kid's arm, looking for all the stars in the galaxy like a Jedi hero, hands glowing, just like in the vids. Her gaze traveled past her to the medix tent, where the Butcher and her husband had last been seen. “I know,” she repeated, but something (well, lots of things) weren’t quite right.

“Grarwwaar said he owed me?” That didn't gel. Polla had had more than a few nightmares about how she'd pay back the Exchange for their help on Kaas if Mission somehow flaked. Running into her old pal Ik-tik from had been quite the stroke of luck. What if it had been too good? “They're probably not leaving right away--there's still so much to do here--”

“I think the Mandies have it covered,” Seiran snapped. “Don't you want to see our son?”

“Of course!” Seiran was right. The Mandies had this. Hell, they had two Revans, too. “Just… don't want to take more of an Exchange favor without seeing the paperwork first.”

“We’re in this muck over our assholes,” her husband said. “All things considered, the Exchange are the least of our problems.”

XXX

Mydia Blais sighed and closed her eyes. The slave had warned that the medication to counteract radiation poisoning might make her dizzy, and apparently that was true, because she felt quite lightheaded, staring up at the ceiling of this gaudy mess of a tent. Surely, Lord Malak could have commandeered the largest one for their quarters, but apparently he had not, and she was forced now to share space with her lover's smarmy fur-faced slave while Lord Malak himself pranced off with the Mandalorian chieftain who had asked for his aid.

Shouldn’t the Mandalorian chieftain be aiding them? Although, she supposed that was what this encampment was, in a sense. A place to aid the sick. Still, shouldn't she, the pregnant consort of the man who had conquered their civilization, deserve more aid? A competent foot masseuse?

“Uh...do you want a glass of tea?” Lord Malak's slave asked. He was dressed like a Mandalorian; another absurdity since they didn't have slaves. Or did they? Truthfully, Mydia had never paid much attention in her xenososh classes. Conquered cultures were boring.

“Your voice irritates me.” She felt a yawn form in her throat. “Go away.”

“I... uh, Telos didn't think you should be alone.” The man frowned.

“You're lying.” It was obvious. His heart rate jumped every time he said Telos. “Telos is a planet.”

“Some sents have reactions to anti-rads. We learned it in school.”

“And I learned that Telos is a planet in school.”

“Lord Malak is Telos,” the man said nonsensically. “You can't really be this fracking stup--”

He began to turn an interesting shade of purple when he was strangled, Mydia thought.

“Can't br--” he gasped.

“Slaves don't call me names,” she reprimanded him. “Say you'll stop.’

“Stop--” he fell on the ground gasping for air, rather more dramatically than was needed.

Mydia stopped. It was very difficult to find decent help, what, with the ruin of their civilization. “You and I are going to get along quite well,” she told him. “As soon as you learn your place.”

The slave sat up, glaring with those black eyes. Oh, but he had a spark of fire in them.

“If you weren’t pregnant...” he muttered--as if he was capable of carrying out threats.

“If I wasn’t pregnant, I wouldn’t need my left foot rubbed again.” She wiggled her toes.

“The things I fracking do for him,” he mumbled, still glaring. She preferred him like this. The fawning subservience had been rather dull, except for its effect on Lord Malak, who seemed incensed, apparently preferring slaves with more spine.

So did she.

Right now, this slave’s spark rather reminded Mydia of the old gardener on Ziost, back when he’d still had eyes.

XXX

Yuthura looked up at Revan’s approach. The former dark lord was pale, even for a Human. “You’re pushing yourself too hard,” she chided. A familiar observation in the days since the bombing of Kaas.
“There are still two rows of wounded who haven’t had their anti-rads.” A wry smile tugged at the woman’s mouth and she sat down next to Yuthura. “Here are yours,” she added, handing over two derm paks. “If you can stand the pain, the best way to apply them is between your lekku.”

Yuthura had medical training too, but she deigned not to mention it, wincing as she braced herself for the raw shock of agony that came from injecting a derm into such a sensitive spot. Discomfort was intense but faded quickly. In truth, more quickly than Yuthura had expected.

Revan winced, as if she had felt it too. Perhaps she had. Sheris’s gift with the Force had always had an empathic component.

“Who are your friends?” Yuthura asked, to distract them both.

Revan glanced up at the two Mandalorians standing about five meters away, arms folded a bit too neatly in their armor, no doubt concealing some sort of weaponry. “Children prepared to shoot me, I believe. It appears I no longer have the loyalty of the clans.”

“The camp is abuzz with rumor about what happened in that medix tent.” Yuthura trusted the other woman would tell her when she was ready. “I take it your plan to secure Polla Revan changed?”

“Polla Revan?” A red eyebrow arched.

“It’s what Zaalbar calls her. Or… called.” There had still been no sign of their friend—or the T3 computer with Mission Vao’s personality.

“Oh? What does he call me?”

Yuthura felt her lekku twitch. “Your Shyriiwook is even better than mine. Surely you know.”

“I’ve heard a few names. You know, Zaalbar may still be alive.” The woman took her hand and squeezed it, bringing a calming sensation with her touch. The last of Yuthura’s pain ebbed away. “Zaalbar. Phylus, too. Some of the others. The Mando’ade are doing sweeps twice a day for survivors. Another transport left just as yours arrived.”

“I hope so.” They both lapsed into silence for a moment. Yuthura thought of the brave Wookiee who had sacrificed so much for many.

Revan’s thoughts were hidden behind half-hooded eyes, dark with exhaustion, now narrowed on her guards again, as if she was planning on how to slip their tether.

“Have you seen Grarwbaar or the Houck?” the former dark lord ventured, after a moment.

“Actually, yes.” Yuthura had vouched for them when the Wookiee and the Houck had approached the camp shortly after whatever had transpired inside the medix tent. She explained to Revan, drawing the story out longer than strictly required, just to see if the other woman’s gaze would stray from her guards. It did not, but her flesh hand began tapping absenty on her knee, fingers twitching as if they were t’chun and t’chin in the Force. “I saw Mekel Jin briefly as well,” Yuthura offered. “The Mandalorians appear to have adopted him.”

That brought a break in the woman’s attention, a head turn, and a scowl. “I know. Ordo’s playing games with me.”

Yuthura’s impression was that her former pupil had associated himself with the Mandalorians on his own initiative, but she had learned not to contradict this Revan—not for non-life-threatening events. “Perhaps you should speak to Mekel,” she offered—almost immediately regretting it.
“There’s time for that.” The woman took a breath. “Maybe.” She glanced at the medix tent again. Carth and Revan still hadn’t emerged. Sinae paced outside, looking restless. “Mekel’s odd, in the Force. I was told Oerin Lin stripped him of it?”

“Yes.” Yuthura hesitated, guilt still plaguing her, although, of course, she had been too late to stop it. “I was there.” Her last encounter with the Coruscant had been quite brief; Mekel giving her an unreadable stare and a polite head-nod, before turning back to Mydia Blais and the boxes of possessions the Blais girl had managed to smuggle aboard their medical transport. They could have been near-strangers, instead of the boy who had been one of the first Korriban students, and the woman who had kept him alive.

Come to think of it, he had been odd in the Force. Most nulls still felt like something—a faint spark, but still a presence of some kind. Jin was utterly dead in it. Like a hole, where the Force had been.

“You were there?” Revan raised an eyebrow.

“Yes.”

“And you... Bezel-bonded Mekel with Dustil Onasi. You said that before.” Revan’s expression was distracted, obviously parsecs away.

“Jorak Uln’s request. He wanted a power source. The boys... they were powerful. Dustil more than Mekel, but Mekel had talents.” Talents for keeping alive. Uln had wanted to use Shaardan, or Kel, or even Lashowe Devry, but Yuthura had convinced him to take Mekel instead. Knowing his patronage, (although not his bloodline—that had been a secret none of them had known, as far as Yuthura was aware), and Dustil’s patronage, it had amused the mad Sith Headmaster to envision that Malak and Saul Karath would be beholden to him.

That made no sense, but at that point Yuthura's master was quite mad. At least in part due to her efforts to drive him to that state.

“Then Uln... died?” Revan's head tilted. “I believe that Davad told me a tale about your Polla Revan killing him in some tomb.”

“With Mekel’s assistance, yes.”

“I doubt she needed his assistance.” Definitely distracted, Revan’s eyes roved through the rows of sentients surrounding them, now, searching for something—or someone. “Still. Breaking a Bezel-bond... I’m surprised he’s alive.”

“Perhaps the distance that divided them helped his body survive the shock.” Yuthura had only studied the ritual. She had been unaware of its effects, except in the vaguest of terms.

“Master Kae had a theory...” the woman started and shook her head. “I mean, Vima. Vima had a theory that if you removed the third point of a Bezel triangle... in this case, Uln, the remainder would have the power of all three. She said, if you then divided them...” her voice trailed off. “Who gave Jorak Uln the idea to Bezel-bond them in the first place?”

“I have no idea.” Uln had been Yuthura’s master, but he had guarded his secrets greedily, even as a Jedi. “What did Vima Sunrider think would happen if you divided the remaining pair?”

Presumably, what had happened: Dustil Onasi, always a powerful Force user, was now imbued with Mekel and Jorak’s strength as well as his own.

And possibly Malak’s too.
And no sense. Still, the boy had done better than she would have expected, not submitting to the dark whispers that promised power on this world. Dark corruption surrounded him, but from what she had seen, it had not spread to his heart.

Yet.

“Vima’s dead.” Instead of answering, Revan abruptly changed the subject. “I suppose you knew her as Arren Kae”

“I’ve heard that many Jedi are dead.” A Mandalorian about the age of Dustil or Mekel Jin had brought Yuthura the details of the Katarr tragedy, along with kolto packs, upon her arrival into the camp. The boy’s name had been Leskal, and he had witnessed Oerin Lin’s massacre of the Council, including her old ally, Vrook Lamar.

“Yes. Carth Onasi shot Vima. Aboard the Aleema.”

Yuthura felt her body tense. “Why would he do that?”

“A story for later.” Abruptly, Revan brushed imaginary dirt from her armor. “I will tell you.”

“Are you--” she felt a surge of panic. “You can’t intend to hurt Carth--revenge is not--”

“What?” When this Revan laughed it sounded like bells. Sheris had laughed like that--on Manaan in their cell sometimes. “No! Vima was trying to sabotage their ship. Carth saved Polla Revan’s life--he saved everyone aboard the Aleema.” She chuckled. “I would give him a medal, not vengeance.”

“Oh. But Vima Sunrider was Master Kae?” Now that she said the words out loud, their cadence was almost familiar, as if Yuthura had known that once. Or heard it whispered.

“Vima Sunrider was a madwoman,” Revan said flatly. “With very dangerous abilities. And now she’s dead.”

Sith contained wells within wells. Secrets within secrets. Like a dance with eighteen veils, and each revealing another three hidden in a garter, or pulled from a lekku-wrap. There were times, Yuthura thought, when she longed for the clean simplicity of a Hutt criminal enterprise.

“I wish we could find a Voice,” Revan added. “I need Tenebrae.”

“You ordered their executions, before.”

“And now I need Tenebrae.” Revan’s brows drew together, grooving lines on her flat Human forehead. “There’s been no sign of any possessed survivors, but it doesn’t make sense. He will want to see her. He must be here.” She looked restlessly up the line of injured. “Somewhere.”

“I can help with the healing,” Yuthura offered. “And the… other quest. I’ve spent enough time on Kaas to recognize the signs.”

“If you can even stand up, I’d be surprised.” The wry smile was back, and with it the full force of the woman’s quiet charm. She reached over and put a glowing blue hand on Yuthura’s shoulder.
Almost instantly, a feeling of peace invaded her limbs, a languid warmth like a warm bath. “You need rest.”

“Are you forcing me to get some?” The sensation was so pleasant that she did not protest.
“I’m suggesting it. So you can help more later.”

Behind them, a cheer went up. Yuthura turned her head to see the return of a Mandalorian hunting party, some manner of dead beast floating on repulsors between them. “I believe that’s dinner.”

Sheris, she recalled suddenly, had eschewed animal flesh on Manaan. Almost unheard-of for a Sith. Revan had never shown any such reservation.

Now, the former dark lord made a face. “I still have nutra bars. But it is quite impressive that they took down a zakkeg.”

XXX

Later, Carth was never sure how long they sat there, both of them imagining a world where they were together and free. His wife’s nose kept bleeding, and she finally stuck a medi-pak on top of it, giving her face a half mask that hid her beautiful, expressive mouth and left him staring at those red-lashed hyperdrive eyes, which were much harder to read.

“Credit for your thoughts,” he offered finally.

“On Deralia you’d have to pay ten.” Her voice was muffled under the medi-pak.

“Ten, then.”

She’d pulled a loose-fitting tunic over the bacta bandage wrapped around her ribs, and with the wound covered, Carth could almost forget it was there. That she’d come back from confronting her double and Polla with a stab in the back.

She’d always healed quickly, but now his skin prickled at what that meant.

“It… keeps calling to me, Carth. That… computer, or whatever it is. A voice, coming from the Temple.”

“We’ll get farther away soon.” Soon, he would get up and find a Force collar. See if it worked. But maybe a part of him already knew it wouldn’t be that easy and so Carth stayed where he was, slowly twisting his fingers through the silk of her hair.

Revan had said that she couldn’t die, but also that she couldn’t live. And as much as he’d do anything… anything to change that, he didn’t know what he could do. There was nothing to shoot. Their enemies were ghosts. Hell, and the ghosts-- they didn’t seem to be helping either.

She’d told him she heard Malak’s voice in her head sometimes. Carth… more than anything, he’d wanted that bastard gone for good.

If she’s frozen in carbonite maybe that bastard would be too. Then he’d never be able to hurt Dustil again. It wasn’t a rational thought. It came from a deep, almost feral place in his brain.

“We could blow it up,” he offered. “That Temple. From orbit.”

“Wouldn’t work.” Muffled voice with that mask. Green eyes staring up at his. “I don’t know how I know, but I do.”

She’d always known things without knowing how she knew them. She’d always been right. Even when things went tragically wrong. Even when she fell on that Rakatan world, maybe. By then, Carth had seen so many damned Sith, mad with power. Had Revan needed that darkness to defeat
Malak?

Would she need it again to defeat the Emperor?

Was she going to defeat the Emperor? After all of this… Carth thought he'd lose his mind if that monster won.

“Do you know if this carbonite thing…” somehow they’d moved past the Force collar--somewhere in between his mad thoughts about going on the run and hers. “Do you know if it will work?”

“Revan thought it would.” She’d slipped and called the other woman by her own name. She’d done that a few times, now. Carth never corrected her. She wasn’t wrong. Revan was that cold-eyed, calculating war leader somewhere outside, incongruously healing the wounded. “Wouldn’t she have used a Force collar on me, if it was that easy?”

Not if she wanted you out of the picture. But Carth kept that thought to himself. Sheris had saved their lives, fighting that terentatek. Hell, he’d just seen her heal Revan and Polla Organa, too, not to mention the other injured sents. On the ride back from Kaas City, his seatmate had been a Wookiee matriarch who did nothing but sing the praises of ‘Lord Revan of the Rebellion,’ all in barks, until his ear was sore. Seiran had mentioned she’d been the one to heal him, too--when she and Yuthura and Dustil’s girl pulled him and Polla out of a collapsed building--

“Carth?” Revan pulled the mask down, wiping her nose. Her face was a mess. He didn’t think he’d ever loved her more. He didn’t know what to think. “Kath got your tongue?”

“I’m okay.”

His wife must have gotten his confusion from his expression because she made a face and wiped hers with the back of her hand, then the medpak. “Ugh.” She tilted her head back. “The bleed’ll slow down again. It always does.”

“Yeah.” He’d never seen it this bad before--like they were getting worse. They’d been here two days and it was always getting worse.

“Thanks for overthrowing this planet for me.” Her voice was muffled again under the bandage, but he could see the corner of her lip turn up.

“Turns out… I… I didn’t do much. Polla and Zaalbar and Yuthura… they did most of it.”

“But there’s a Sith Fleet up there with the clan ships. They still follow you.” She adjusted her body until she was leaning into him again.

Across from them, Dessa floated in her tank, monitors reassuringly green. Carth suddenly remembered Morgana with Dustil in her belly, that furloughed weekend at Saul and Garrett’s lake house. He had an abrupt stab of loss for another shot like that--to see Revan like that--growing round and glowing, the way her skin felt taut with the little kicks under his hands--

“Yeah. I guess.” He shifted, planting his arms around his wife's flat stomach, the curve of her waist, stroking her there until she sighed, relaxing against him.

“We won the war and the fleet,” she murmured. “If the Sleepers go back to sleep, you’ll tell the Imperial Fleet to surrender to the Republic… but will they?”

“I’m not sure.” He thought of them. Ensign Kripp Kagnos, who had been his aide on Kaas. The men and women who’d served on the Sojourn. Most had gotten away in escape pods when the Aleema’s guns took the ship down—but not all. He’d checked the rosters when they’d still been in the sky. He’d tried hard to forget the ones Dustil had killed. “Sents here really suffered under the Sith, Freckles. But not all of them. And there are always men loyal to an ideal—”

“I bet she could scare them into a surrender.”

“You could.”

“I might not be here.” Her eyes looked up into his.

“I don’t like this.” He had to say it. “I don’t like any of it. For one thing, portable carbonite freezing rays are still experimental. There’s a reason they use them mostly for criminal transport and illegal bounties.”

“Well, they can’t kill me. I don’t want to leave, Carth, but—” Her head was still tilted toward the sky. Somewhere outside in the world, Mandalorians were cheering. “What’s that noise?”

“Dinner, I think.” The camp had a routine. Every day the hunters came back around this time, bringing with them whatever beasts they’d killed in the forest. Carth was getting sick of meat—especially meat he’d had to see being gutted, from creatures that looked like someone’s nightmare.

“Excuse me, First Wife…” At that moment, Sinae stuck her head in and asked if they were done. Her lecture was in a dialect of Mandalorian that was different than Canderous’s, but Carth caught most of it. They had their own tent and many others did not. They should be in it--

“Scan me,” his wife ordered out of the blue. “Now, Sinae. Please.”

The medix wrinkled her nose. “Will that make you leave? It’s time to change Dessa’s tank.”

“Yes.” Those hyperdrive eyes stayed fixed on Carth, but Revan’s voice had shifted into the unmistakable tones of command. “You said you wanted to run the scans longer before, remember? Well, do it now. Look for a… sub… a sub-dramid bleed… something bleed--”

Sinae gave an exasperated sigh. “Fine. But after I find nothing you should go assist Clan Ordo’s warriors. The hunters brought back a zakkeg. It’s roasting now.” She tapped the comm-link set in her left ear. “And Canderous just announced on the open channel that they’ve almost got the relays up. There are several things you both could be doing to help with either endeavor --”

“And I will. After this,” his wife promised her. “But scan me first. The long scans. Keep me under for twenty minutes, just like you wanted to before. My nose keeps bleeding. Let’s get to the bottom of why.”

The medix nodded, curiosity sparking her expression. “Clean yourself, first. You'll get the equipment dirty.”

XXX

Roast zakkeg had never really been Polla’s thing. She’d had it a few times, mostly in the forest when she and Yuthura had been on their ‘fake Revan’ tour, rousing up the rebels, but it was always gamey. And stringy. And the Mandalorian way of handling that with buckets of sweet spicemix over the haunches reminded Polla a little too much of a hessi roast back home with Ma’s Grange club.

She’d never been able to stomach eating hessi, not when she’d spent her tweener years caring for one, and this zakkeg tasted just like she’d imagined a poor hessi would.
“You can have mine,” she said, pushing her plate over to Seiran. “The sauce reminds me of the Grange--”

Her voice trailed off because there was the Butcher, supported by Captain Obvious, finally coming out of the medix tent. Then Sinae appeared behind them, taking off toward the Dark Temple building at a dead run.

Carth and the Butcher didn’t appear to notice the medix scarper, still deep in conversation or in love or whatever. But then the Butcher looked up, and Polla could practically see her eyes zero in on them.

“She's coming this way,” Seiran observed. He raised his hand and waved.

“Don't… don't make it look like we're fighting,” Polla whispered, bolting a smile on her face. She edged their communal plate of zakkeg back in his direction.

“We're not?” Sei's voice had that lightness of tone that wasn't actually light at all. He squeezed her hand with one of his. “Are we?” He raised his voice. “Hello, Carth and Revan!”

“It's good to see you again, Seiran.” The Butcher's husband was hanging back, like maybe Captain Obvious recognized how awkward this was for everyone, but his wife just plowed on through, gabbing away, her mouth stretched so tight in a smile it almost looked painful. “I hope you're feeling better.”

“Yeah, since the anti-rads.” Seiran reached for Polla's other hand abruptly--and more than a little awkwardly--just as she was about to stand up and find something important to do elsewhere. Instead, she sat back down again, crossing her legs at the ankles and trying to look casual. Awkward, with Sei's fingers clamped on all of hers like two vises, a giant platter of meat lying between them.

“Good, that's good.” The woman's voice was pitched too high. There was a smear of dried blood just above her lip. “You guys are in the final trench now, I promise. Just a few hyperspace points and then home. Okay?”

Seiran's hand squeezed Polla's and she got it immediately. “Right. We need to leave. Soon,” she said, staring up at her copy. The top-knot still bugged her. Why would the woman do that? “Guess we'll need a ship. I was thinking we'd take the Hawk.”

“No, that's not--” The Butcher and her husband both objected at once, and Seiran made a startled noise--like he hadn't seen this coming?

“It's Carth's ship!” the Butcher exclaimed indignantly.

“Polla--” Seiran’s aghast look was cute. But he was a crap negotiator.

“We need--uh, I might need--” Captain Onasi frowned at his wife. “We can't just give them the ship when Mission’s in it--”

“She doesn't get the ship anyway! It's your ship!” The top-knot flipped when Revan turned her head. “I agree--you and Seiren need to leave Kaas as soon as possible, but not in that ship.”

“Don’t be selfish. You have a better ship. Bigger.” Polla gestured toward the sky, not that the Aleema was visible yet--not for another few hours, according to the Mandies. “And you owe me… me and my family. Aren't my parents watching your kid?” She didn’t expect the Hawk, she never had. But it was fun watching the Butcher squirm.
The Butcher made a sound almost like a laugh. “Force, I hope so. Malak just keeps saying he’s fine.”

Her nose was bleeding again. Maybe that had to do with the crazy. Or maybe she saw Force ghosts like Mydia Blais always claimed to.

“We’ll find you a good ship, Polla,” Carth Onasi promised. “But there’s… the Hawk has some things we're still working on.”

“I promise I’ll get you out of here, Polla.” The Butcher swallowed, meeting her eyes. Hers darted away fast, as if she was lying. “You and Seiran both. If you want a ship of your own, you can have any light cruiser or scout carrier from the Mandalorian fleet. Take your pick. I’ll… I’ll talk to Canderous.”

“Any except the Hawk, huh?” Polla scoffed. “Or the Aleema.”

“Don’t be dumb. There’s… an Essian-class cruiser that would work. Even one of the warbirds, although I wouldn’t recommend taking something military-grade back into registered space.”

“I don’t need advice about ships from you!” Polla snapped.

The woman actually flinched. If she hadn't seen her break Revan's fingers, Polla might have felt bad.

“We’ll take anything we can leave in now,” Seiran broke in.

Cheering erupted behind them, and then the excited voices of what Polla recognized to be the chorus of a Mandalorian victory song.

“Another one?” Seiran sighed. Three beskar-clad figures were making their way toward a firepit that had been dug in the center of camp. One was limping. The other two had branches slung over their shoulders, and the carcass of another enormous and scaled thing hanging between them.

Polla shrugged, more than a little relieved to have a new change of topic. “Sleen, I think? Going by the cheers, I’m guessing it’s dessert, after all this delicious zakkeg.”

“Great,” Carth muttered. “More meat.”

Polla shot him a sympathetic smile.

“Stay the night, at least,” the Butcher said. Her hand tugged at her topknot, adjusting it, and Polla had a sudden memory of Ma telling her not to fidget, not to tug at her hair. “I want… I’d like the chance to…to talk, before… before you go.”

“Keep pulling your knot like that and it might pop right off,” Polla muttered, half under her breath.

The other woman’s breath came out in a startled hitch. She didn’t look anything like the other one, right then. For some weird reason, she actually looked like she was about to cry. Her hand dropped back down to her hip, rightabouts where that saber had gone in. Polla’s wound was a little to the right, but they practically had matching stab wounds.

“I’ve got to see to the camp,” the Butcher said stiffly, and turned away.

“We’ll find you a ship,” her husband promised them, then started after her.

“Yeah. It's the least you can do, Captain Obvious.” Polla crossed her arms, and leaned back into Sei, closing her eyes and giving out an exaggerated sigh.

“Pollie--” Seiran didn’t finish the reprimand. He didn’t have to. A part of Polla felt like she’d just punched herself in the guts.

When she opened her eyes again, Captain Obvious and his butcher wife were gone.

XXX

Revan found the Wookiee and the Houck in the corner of their encampment nearest to the Dark Temple. To their right loomed some kind of communications edifice the Mando’ade had spent all day constructing: a thing as rattletrap and makeshift as all their creations. But their scavenged tower hummed with life now, yellow and cheerful, burning from its capacitors. Mandalorians with jet-packs buzzed above its tip, running the risk, Revan thought, of electrocuting themselves on that arclight beacon they’d built spiking up toward the stars.

As if in answer, the side of the Aleema basked above, lower than Revan herself would have authorized its flight. The cloudbank was heavy, but every now and then, a smaller ship lit into view. From this distance, she couldn’t see the Sleepers at all.

They’re close. Malak’s voice, whispering in her ear as Revan moved slowly forward, her eyes trained on the two figures in front of her. She can hear them, Red. And they’re killing her.

She can’t die, fool. He should drop the injured tone, the false sympathy. And don't make me feel guilty. I tried self-sacrifice. It didn’t work.

The Mandalorian medix ran more tests. The results spooked her.

Oh? They’re a superstitious lot.

They were also technological savants: collecting pieces of tech and weaponry from a thousand cultures, all to serve their own ends. Better they be frightened by the Fragment then think of using her--or of trying to use the Sleeper Fleet.

Would the Mando’ade use the Sleeper Fleet, if given the opportunity? Revan had to consider that the Fragment might manage to wrest control of them--for a time. If Canderous Ordo convinced her to use those ships against strategic targets for raids, or to settle Clan feuds--

Then nothing in the galaxy could stop them.

That would never happen. You know how the clans feel about autonomous machines, Malak broke into Revan's thoughts as easily as if they were still padawans conversing about hypotheticals in a cafe. After what happened to their basilisks, any union of sentience and the mechanical was forbidden.

So Master Vima always said. But I think she may be an unreliable source, Mal.

His ghostly chuckle rattled in her head.

The Mandalorians distaste for sentient tech had been a hypothetical, before their Knights’ trials.

You always underestimated them, Mal. They’ll have wideband restored soon. They're laying in circuits for it by hand. They barely use medical droids at all--

You admire them.
She glanced back at her escort, keeping their careful distance. Before the Fett betrayed us, I wanted to go back. The memory of the girl who had admired the Mandalorians as a humble desert tribe was long dead. With you, of course.

Of course. For once, his presence withdrew abruptly, like a door closing in her face.

I hate them, Sheris whispered foolishly, although that had not always been true, either--

You hated Oerin Lin? It was a cruel jape.

I hated you more.

There was no adequate response to that, and so Revan focused on the task at hand.

When the Mandalorians got their comm tower online they would all learn what had happened in the rest of the galaxy.

Revan was startled to find herself curious, as if all the possibilities she had forsaken when she returned to Dromund Kaas had come to life again. What happened to the rest of the galaxy might matter again. For her. She would see Malachor again--

Then where would they live? Not Coruscant. No. Her son was free of D’Reev and she would keep him that way. Some Outer Rim planet; sparsely populated, perhaps with a reputable university so he would not grow up utterly savage--

Hoth, Sheris murmured in her mind. Chassna. Rekkiad--

Not that sparsely populated.

The medix was frightened, Malak said.

Good. Then she'll listen to me over her. But first--

Revan took a deep breath of the twilight air, cleared her throat, and approached her current targets.

“Am I interrupting something?” She addressed the furry back of the silent Wookiee with a solid hulk of Houck nestled in the crook of his arm. “I’ve been looking everywhere for you both. There’s been a change in plans.”

“Oaska filled us in. She says, the target you wanted to collect commands this camp.” Grarwbaar turned his head toward her, his words in perfectly accentless Basic. “I believe that’s her, over there, next to Polla Organa?” The Wookiee’s tone was dry. “She looks familiar.”

“Reunions always make me teary,” murmured the Houck, not looking very emotional at all. “Yours went better than you expected, yeah?” He turned to the Wookiee. “Still alive, see? And the other one’s not frozen. You owe me two prayer chants worth of faith on Byss, boss.”

“I may win those chants back with interest,” the Wookiee’s Basic was accentless through the voder, although, as she had before, Revan noted the device did not seem to be attached; merely hanging like a necklace between the furry muscles of the man’s chest.

“Oaska said the amnesiac wasn’t quite as happy to see you again, Lord Revan. You two made up, now? You not want her frozen in carbonite no more?” Rogere’s mouth split open in an amphibious grin, displaying all four rows of his teeth, rather overdoing the Houck patois version of Basic, which he’d shown no sign of using at all before.

The Wookiee’s hair, Revan noted, was also brushed and coiffed to a near-abnormal sheen.

“My attempts at entrapment failed.” She maintained her artificial calm, breathing evenly. “Could you have done better?”

“You asking us to do better?” The Houck snorted. “Now? After she’s all riled-up and suspicious-like?”

“You didn’t tell us she was your target.” Grarwwaar coughed. “I might be hurt, if I hadn’t assumed.”

“Our contract specified quite clearly that your involvement would end when the package and I left this planet,” Revan snapped. “I asked for nothing more than transportation and supplies from you. All quite clear.”

“No, but you must.” Revan felt her lips curl, as she allowed herself the satisfaction of showing them she knew who they were.

I think they knew already. The voice in her head was clipped and cold. Her own--and for a moment, Revan wasn’t sure which of them had been smug a moment ago--her or Sheris.

“We must.” Rogere elbowed Grarwwaar. “Hear that, boss?”

“Your information is a few years out of date,” Grarwwaar chuckled. “Our Order was hollowed out by the Emperor--twisted into being a supplier for Tenebrae's conversion factories. In fact, I owe your associate over there a great deal for lifting the scales from my eyes. Rogere, Oaska, and I have made a fresh start. Now we work for Ik-tik and the Exchange.”

“They kind of work for us.” Rogere shrugged. “Actually. You know, crime pays.”

Revan refused to show any reaction. “Regardless, you will help me.”

“We have a vested interest in galactic stability.” Grarwwaar shrugged. “Do you?”

“Of course. And to defeat the Sith Emperor.”

“So she says.” Rogere elbowed the Wookiee. “But I don't see no Sith Emperor. Maybe he's defeated already.”

“Emperor Vitiate, First of his Name, Luminance of the Chorlian System made a pretty stable galaxy for a long time,” Grarwwaar mused. “But then someone riled up the Mandalorians and….” his voice trailed off. “What I think is, Malachi D’Reev bit off more than he could chew. The question is… why?” His eyes were ancient, and not a Wookiee’s gaze--but Revan had known already that he was no Wookiee.

“Perhaps that is a question I could answer.” Sunrider’s manipulations. Taking the Emperor’s toys and making them her own.

“One assumes you might lie to us, to take care of your rival…?” Grarwwaar coughed. “How would it go, exactly? Freeze your successor in carbonite? Then drop her into the heart of a sun?”

“Like Beya Organa and the rest?” She kept her voice cool, hiding the emotion saying the dead woman’s name evoked behind a wall of ice. “I rather thought that assassination sounded like the work of the Genoharadan.”

“The what?” The Houck chuckled. “She’s naming names now, boss.”

“Some incompetent order of assassins,” Revan snapped. “I entrusted them with one crucial task and they failed it utterly.”

“Hey! We made it here!” Rogere chuckled. “Just like we promised. You got no complaints.”

“I’m growing tired of these games.” Revan wondered if Sinae would give her back her saber. And then, as if through fate of the Force, she saw the woman standing beneath the communications array, gesticulating excitedly at Canderous Ordo. She looked upset. Dessa? Was she okay? The roar of that machine hid her words, but if Revan extended her senses--

The camp seethed with life, and sickness, and pain; but no death. None that she could find.

“Before,” she clarified. “When I was Dark Lord of the Sith. I required one object--”

“Think the Dark Lady here means that Rakatan obelisk?” Rogere nudged the Wookiee.

“That thing?” Grarwwaar made a low rumbling noise in his throat. “The Belsavis artifact? Delivered as promised.” He shrugged. “Technically, we never did receive your final payment for that job, but you were dead at the time, so… maybe the invoices got mixed up.”

“Consider the account clear. Sometimes we’re generous,” Rogere added. “And we’ve always liked you.”

The world seemed to crystallize, still into ice. Revan froze with it, shock breaking her Jedi-trained calm like a boot crashing through a frozen lake. “What?”

“You were dead at the time, see?” the Wookiee shrugged. “So our agent gave it to the other one.”

XXX

Lena Wee juggled Prince in one arm, with the stack of plimsi readouts for I.E., Limited in the other. Ship-time it was night, and all the lights had been dimmed. Still, her son blinked his bright eyes at her and clumsily reached for a lekku.

“Shhh,” she murmured. “Hush little princeling, don’t sign a word--”

Prince had barely slept since his milk teeth had started to come in, and Lena herself had trouble ever since she’d seen that flotilla of ships soar past their yacht and start bombing the exact sector of Nar Shaddaa where her twins had set up their shop.

Fortunately, See’raa and Tee’raa had been aboard the yacht too, at the time. Still, the strike was too close for comfort and since then, they'd had the Starscape-class pleasure craft outfitted with a highly illegal (and very expensive) Mandalorian cloaking device.

Because, according to her twins, the target had been their own underground installation, beneath the cantina platform the Twin Suns ran as their cover.

The ships had been unmanned, according to Nar Sky Defense. The ships had moved in formations that should have been mathematically impossible, according to Lena’s understanding of astrophysics. And similar fleets had targeted Hoth and Onderon, had also been sighted over Coruscant and Telos.

Rumors streamed in from the Outer Rim that Sith space had been targeted too; that the Republic was already at war with the Sith Empire; and that all of this had something to do with the leaked footage of Revan Starfire fighting a terentatek on a Sith planet.

Then there were the rumors of a Mandalorian Fleet, the footage of the woman the twins swore was Revan at Biscain--

See’raa said those weren’t just rumors.

Tee’raa claimed they’d been the targets of those ships because of Revan Starfire.

But when Lena asked her twins how--or why--See’raa grew silent as her sister and Tee’raa’s lekku just wrapped around her pale neck.

Better you not know, the white had signed to Lena. Worry’s bad for your milk.

Then, her twins had left, to try excavating the ruin of whatever it was they had built down there. Another droid factory like the one on the M4 asteroid? Another computer like the one they’d abandoned on Kashyyyk?

“We’ve got this!” the pink had smiled. “Don’t worry so much, Lena.”

“Shhh,” Lena told him. “Everything’s going to be fine.” And it would be, if they laid low enough. She hoped. She bent over the screen again, pulling up the hologram of the ident she’d bought from Jaarga the Hutt (just before his rival Jenga had taken him down, as Tee’raa had predicted). Bearded, Human, nondescript.

“Hello,” she leaned over the desk, speaking into the headset she’d had to take off, because Prince kept pulling at it. “This is Go-To. You’ve entered private airspace. State your business.”

The hologram’s mouth moved in time, syncing perfectly with her words.

“Guess it works.” She cleared her throat and the image on the comm did too. “Good.”

“Buh!” Prince nodded, and reached for the plimsi stack.

Xxx

Mydia Blais had studied revolution.

But apparently, an actual revolution was a great deal more noisome, loud, and damp than the datapads at the Academy had described. To add to her suffering, no one had thought to bring a chair for her--not even her consort, who had now been gone for most of the day.

Indeed, no one but Darth Malak’s obsequious slave seemed to have thought much about her at all, which was how the last remaining daughter of the House of Blais found herself squatting upon the ground in the driest area of the camp she could find, watching the Mandalorians gorge themselves on charred meat while her own stomach growled emptily.

It was too early to feel the parasite inside of her kick, but Mydia put her hand on her stomach just the same. The poor little nexu was no doubt starving too. How long would it take before it began to consume her own flesh?
She shivered at the thought.

“Hey.” Lord Malak's black-eyed slave gave Mydia a crooked smile as he sat down next to her in the ground and slid a plate covered with steaming meat into her lap, before settling the other one he was holding on his knees. “Wraid and Semele brought down an entire zakkeg. They say it's edible so…” his lips were full and smiling, almost feminine above that scraggily beard. He picked up a piece of dripping meat and flourished it at her. “Here goes nothing. If I don't keel over in the next minute, maybe you should have some too.”

“Isn't there a spork?” Mydia felt her mouth water and had the sudden urge to shove a pile of dripping red zakkeg into her own maw. Mother would have had a fit, she imagined. She couldn’t remember the slave’s name. It was something that sounded like Malak, but not quite.

“Didn't see any.”

It was amazingly rude of the man to eat before she did and so she shoved a piece in her own mouth. The zakkeg was a delicious as it looked, and the added frisson of imagining Mother's horror, seeing the last female Blais barefoot and squatting on the ground made Mydia smile through a mouth of gristle.

“My brother, Nereal…” she had to pause to masticate. “He used to bring home zakkeg. From our estate.”

“Estate, huh? Telos told me. You're rich.” The man raised an eyebrow. There were grease splatters in his beard, giving him a rakish look. “So, I should call you Lady Blais, right?” The man snorted as if that was funny.

And then, Mydia's mind made the belated connection that would have made her late (and un lamented) tutor, Servile Antilles, proud. “Oh! You call Malak Telos because he bombed it! That's terribly disrespectful. Lord Malak could have you flayed for much, much less.”

The man started to laugh, and then paused. “Are you serious?”

“I might be convinced to intervene on your behalf,” she allowed, taking another bite. “If you find me a spork.”

“No need. Telos and I go way back.” Black eyes regarded her and one of his heavy eyebrows lifted. “I'm fine with your… whatever, but let's make that clear. Telos and I... you can cut the banthashit. Come on. You gotta know he isn't Malak. He's not even trying to be Malak. There's no reason for him to pretend--now.”

Oh. So the slave was insane. What a waste. “If Lord Malak is too busy to see to your execution, I-”

“Mekel? There you are! How're you doing?” The raggedly-clad woman with the bleeding nostrils who interrupted them looked like a derelict—but she was no slave.

Her brown hair still reminded Mydia more of her tutor, Seriina, than she did of the reawakened dark lord, Revan Starfire. Mydia had, of course, been informed of who she was: first by Yuthura Ban, then by the slave Seiran, and finally, by Lord Malak himself, before he went with that Mandalorian, muttering he had to 'take care of some things.'

She hoped those things were all inanimate. Mother had a consort once who took care of the serving girls. It was such a bore when Mother had to drown the null bastard babies. She always looked so guilty about it. Once, Phylus had found one hidden in the guest linen closet, and they had played with it for a few days, stealing it milk from one of the breeding Wookiees—oh, but then Nereal had found it and that memory was--
--was unfortunate.

Mydia’s eyes started leaking suddenly. That kept happening with pregnancy. She did not like it.

“I’m… fine. We’re all fine, here.” The black-haired slave was suddenly cack-handed, swallowing his food too quickly, and shoving his plate to one side as if he were not fine at all.

“Don’t get up on my account.” The other Revan Starfire plopped herself down beside them with no ceremony, just a slight wince. Mydia had heard she’d been injured in a duel. Admiral Carth Onasi lurked in the background, as was proper for someone uninvited.

This Revan had a dazzling smile. “You must be Mydia Blais. Carth told me about you.”

“Of course he did.” Unlike the women who had been in a coma in her attic for months, this Revan Starfire screamed through the Force with the unmistakable presence of a powerful Sith. “Thank you for helping to liberate my planet.”

Mother had always taught them to be gracious with conquerors.

“Uh, I--” the woman appeared nonplussed.

“My cousin's always glad to lend a hand.” The black-haired slave smiled, and reached for another piece of meat. His cousin. The slave had mentioned Revan being his cousin numerous times before, as if to impress. Presumably a cousin born on the wrong side of the blanket. A common enough event, and since the man was null, without import. He was fortunate he’d never had a half-brother like Nereal.

“I wanted to check on you. And Dustil,” the woman continued. “I know he's off that way…” she waved in the direction where Lord Malak's unmistakable Force presence rang through the Force like a festive dirge. “I don't want to interrupt him, if he… does he need time alone, or… uh… are you okay?”

“I’m fine,” the bearded man looked as irritated into the inquiries about his health as Mydia was.

“I want to know you’ll be fine,” Lord Revan said firmly. The future tense was odd.

“You could legitimize him,” Mydia offered. “But he’s a null so I don’t suppose it matters.”

“Legitimize?” This Revan looked so confused that Mydia wondered if she was as ignorant of Coruscanti inheritance laws, (which Mydia had been made to study when Lords Revan and Malak brought their own people into the Empire), as Revan's clueless bastard cousin slave. She began to explain, but the scowl on the bearded slave’s face grew, and his cousin finally interrupted.

“Mekel’s legit,” she snapped. “As legitimate as you are, Mydia. And he isn’t a slave.”

“I gave up telling her that,” the slave in question chimed in, impudent as ever. It was strangely attractive.

“Are those bruises on your neck?” The Dark Lord’s eyes narrowed. “Why isn’t Dustil here?”

“It is wise not to interrupt Lord Malak,” Mydia chided, but the two of them ignored her. “Why do you both persist in calling him ‘Dustil?’”
The slave ignored her, turning back to his cousin. “Canderous asked for help getting the generator started again. Telos went to go play Force-battery so we could get that comm array fixed, so….”

“He has been gone for some time now,” Mydia added. She yawned. “Maybe you should fetch him, Mekel.”

The name did sound a bit like Malak. Had he been named after the Dark Lord’s consort?

“Force-battery. Right.” The woman’s gaze went to the Dark Temple, which loomed to the side of their encampment. In a normal time, a Mandalorian encampment at the base of their most sacred monument would have seemed disrespectful, but these were not normal times. Actually, in some ways, Mydia was finding these times entertaining. Desecrating sacred Sith ground was a vast improvement over cowering in her family’s bomb shelter beneath the ancestral tombs. Or just the dreary routine of living with Inse and Phylus.

Lord Revan coughed. “Guess, I… I should go help with the relays, too. Thanks.”

“Your nose is bleeding,” Mydia told her, for so it was, just a trickle.

“Oh.” The woman wiped at it with the sleeve of her ragged jacket. She stood up quickly. “I’ll send Dustil back when I’m… after. Is everything… everything’s okay, Mekel?”

“You really should call ‘Dustil’ Lord Malak,” Mydia told her, raising her fingers to make sure the emphasis on Lord Malak’s cover name was a ruse they all shared.

“You… you can see Malak?” The slave’s face went white under all that hair. His full lips blanched. When he was pale, he looked more Sith, less golden and typically handsome. Mydia approved.

“Not… see. Not—quite. But he’s… here. Sort of.” Lord Revan gestured at the air. There was another pause. “He says to tell you hello, Mekel.” There was another pause. Then, “I’m not fricking telling him that!”

“What?” Did this Revan Starfire expect Mydia to believe she was speaking to a Force ghost?

“No! I… that’s not what he meant. Look, Mekel, you… you can do whatever you want.” Revan Starfire wiped her nose again, instead of punishing her cousin’s insolence.
Mydia retrieved a handkerchief from the bosom of her armor and proffered it. The Dark Lord took it, absentmindedly, without so much as a thanks.

“You’re not bound by Malak, or Canderous, or… me, Mekel,” the woman continued. “Or… Dustil, if you don’t… do you need credits? I can get you some.”

“Can you get me the Force back?” The sharpness in his voice was new. Mydia found it perversely appealing.

“No, I--”

“Ask Malak--” the man snapped as if he were in charge of Lord Revan and not the other way ‘round. “Can he get me the Force back?”

She rubbed her temples as if they pained her. “He doesn’t know, either.”

“Have you been talking to him this whole time?” The slave’s face flushed suddenly, turning red as a spanked palm. “Uh, have you been talking to Malak’s ghost while he was possessing me and Telos this whole time?”

“No.” Instead of looking annoyed by his impertinence, the woman seemed concerned. “Before… and after, but not while he--” she paused, shaking her head slightly and muttering in accented Sith under her breath. “He doesn’t know how it works either,” she said finally, looking back up at them both. “Oerin Lin removed the Force from you, Mekel. That set Malak free. Made him… one with the Force. A ghost. Again.”

“Lord Malak,” Mydia corrected. “You’re both serious? But if Lord Malak is an untethered ghost, then I would surely see… some evidence….” her voice trailed off, because just then, as if her will had made it so, she did see, a faint glow, hovering around this Revan Starfire, that telltale glimmer of eldritch light. “But I’m having Lord Malak’s baby!”

Revan Starfire’s laugh was as rough and uncultivated as her bastard cousins’. “Not quite.”

“But he’s so powerful--” Not as strong as the woman before her, but also much darker. That couldn’t be the darkness of some callow youth--surely! A mere boy had misled Mydia? Sampled her under a false pretense? “But the boy was… wasn’t he Lord Malak? The Emperor said he was Lord Malak!”

“Not since that fracking hunt,” the slave Mekel said. His mouth tugged into another half-smile. “When Oerin Lin took away my Force it must’ve broken the bond. Set Malak free. Made me a null.”

“Made you a null?” Mydia looked at him again. “You had the Force before?”

“Yeah,” Mekel nodded. “I trained on Korriban. You say Telos is powerful? I was twice as powerful, before.”

His cousin coughed and raised an eyebrow, but said nothing to deny his claim.

“Can you get it back?” An intriguing thought. If this ‘Mekel’ had the Force and Revan's bloodline, perhaps he could break his chains. That was perfectly acceptable. Some of the most powerful members of the Dark Council had been former slaves. Darth Scourge, for example.
Of course, Mydia pondered, perhaps Darth Scourge was not such a good example, being dead.

“I don’t know if it works like that—” Revan put a hand on her cousin’s arm. For comfort? A warning? Regardless, the gesture spoke volumes. Lord Revan obviously respected this man.

Mydia could almost see a faint resemblance when Mekel Jin glared back at the Dark Lord. “You don’t know how it fracking works. You said as much.”

“But Mekel, if I did, I—” And then, the woman’s head turned. About thirty meters away the setting sun illuminated a hairy, hulking figure, flanked by two smaller ones coming up the guarded approach toward the tents. One figure was Sith-sized, only with horns. The other smaller, thinner, a slight stoop to his step--

“Phylus!” In the joy of discovering her brother was alive, Mydia quite forgot her dignity, scrambling to her feet and running barefoot through the mud toward her (hopefully) last living relative. Mydia had been so distracted with Revan and her bastard cousin that she’d missed that slight but unmistakable echo of Force approaching, the uncanny sense of another living Blais--

“Zaalbar!” The Dark Lord of the Sith outpaced Mydia, hurtling herself in the Wookiee’s arms in a way that left decorum in a smoking, radioactive ruin, much like the planet around them.

XXX

“We found them in the jungle,” Leskal called out, as Revan threw herself into Zaalbar’s arms. Thin, bedraggled, and surrounded by a dozen more of his kin, her old companion was still instantly recognizable, like a hand-clasp through the Force.

The exuberance of his embrace nearly drowned out the vision of what Revan had seen, what she’d been trying to forget ever since: the scan of her own brain, a cerebral hemorrhage blooming like a deadly flower in its center, the destruction forming and reforming over and over again.

Xxx

“When I told you to a sit for a longer scan. I did not mean now.” That had been Sinae, grumbling the moment before Revan reached out with her mind to the voice in the Tomb. “I still have to change Dessa’s tank, and submit my reports to General Ordo, First Wife. Now is not the time for--

“Humor me.” Revan smiled at the stone-faced medix who, despite her protests, continued strapping the nodes in around Revan’s head. In front of them the holo-screen flickered to life.

The image of Revan’s face pivoted in air. Like a peeled goreapple, first her skin dissolved, then cartilage, then bone, until only her brain and spinal cord remained.

The image pulsed reassuringly green.

“See? Nothing, as before.” The woman checked her chron. “You remain in perfect health.”

“What about… now?” Revan opened her mind to the call that tugged at the back of it, the dark whisper increasing in pitch--

{{Come}}

“Oh!” Sinae made a startled noise.

“What’s that?” Carth’s voice sharpened. Head locked in the scanner’s prongs, Revan couldn’t turn to see him.

“I’m not sure.” Sinae stepped to the side, leaving Revan staring at the projection of her own skull-- the display expanding to include horizontal and vertical cross-sections.

All with the same pattern appearing and vanishing, over and over again. A dark spot that steadily bloomed, diffusing through the tissue.

It looks like a rose. Revan tasted blood on her lips.

{{Come}}

“Arusuum’la.” Sinae breathed. “First Wife, you should be dead.” She began to rip the nodes off of Revan’s forehead, detach her from the machines. “Sands, this is why I wanted to do the longer scan before. If I had known this then--”

“If you had known--what?” Revan’s tongue felt thick in her mouth. Her eyes couldn't move from the scan. “What’s wrong with me?”

The woman didn’t answer. Her hands twisted in a gesture that looked like one of the old Grange biddies on Deralia, tracing lines in the air to ward off imaginary demons.

Arusuum’la meant unchanging. Stagnant. But the pattern was anything but. It was strangely beautiful, like a flower unfolding, over and over again--

Except that's my brain. Bleeding.

It didn’t hurt. It looked like it should hurt, but it didn’t.

The image fizzled out when Sinae removed the last of the feeds. Revan stood up. She felt fine.

{{Come}}

Carth reached for her arm, concern etching every line of his face. “That was… what was that?”

The medix studiously avoided looking at either one of them. “Something that isn't killing you,” the woman said flatly, to Revan. “But it should.”

Her husband’s voice raised. “Can you stop it? Fix her?"

Sinae edged back toward Dessa's tank. “There is no fix for the unbroken.”

Xxx

“--then we saw your ships landing from our shelter, but it took several days for the weakest to travel through the forest.” Zaalbar’s voice barked sharply, bringing her back to the present. “It is good to see you, Polla Revan.”

“I’m glad you’re okay.” Revan mumbled into Zaalbar’s furry chest even as the Wookiee growled against the side of her cheek, bending down and lifting her off her feet with the exuberance of another hug.

“You took too long to come!” Zaalbar’s low whine ruffled her hair and his nose was cold when it brushed her forehead. There was reproval there--but his eyes twinkled with happiness and she felt the rumble of his greeting vibrate against her skin, as enveloping and welcoming as his furry arms.
“I know.” She tried to laugh, looking up at him. Mission’s T3 body was strapped to his back, but all its lights were dim. “Looks like you all conquered this planet without me. Is Mission--”

“Her metal body is dead.” Zaalbar’s breath smelled as terrible as ever. He patted her back. “Since the bombing. I cannot bring myself to throw it away.”

“She’s… uh, she’s possessing the Hawk, but I’m not sure she’s okay….” Revan started to stammer an explanation, only to be interrupted by another growl from her friend.

“Conquering this planet was never our intent, Polla Revan.” As always, the too-serious Wookiee took her bad joke as fact. “Those ships set fire to the sky soon after our rebellion, eclipsing it with flames. We thought it was the Emperor’s work, but Zepth spoke with his master’s voice and said it was sleeping machine-ghost-ships.” Those brown eyes were never accusing, but the growl that edged his words was. “He said they only listen to you.”

“Tenebrae said the bombs were a taste of things to come,” a Zabrak kid behind him added. As he drew closer, Revan could see there was a brand on his forehead shaped like an eye. He extended his arm toward Revan. The underside of it was carved with what look like fresh markings. She blinked as she realized they were runes scratched in Ancient Sith on the kid’s own skin—by the clumsy look of them, probably by his own hand.

Revan, this is a taste of things to come. It’s out of my hands now.

“We… we’ll get you some kolto.” She tried to ignore the feeling that botflies were crawling on her skin. “You must be Zepth. Carth told me about you.”

“His Luminance says it’s out of his hands now,” the kid continued, following her gaze. “He leaves messages for us. Sometimes.”

“Zepth.” Carth had held back, but now he stepped forward, smiling at the Zabrak kid like they were old friends. “Zaalbar!”

Revan tried to ignore the humming noise in the back of her mind, growing louder again. “Is Tenebrae listening to us now?”

“No.” Zepth shook his head, looking past Revan to Carth. His eyes were an ordinary blue. “But he said to tell you he would see you soon.” He rolled up his sleeve. The words were scratched there, even more clumsily.

Behind them, Carth muttered an angry curse.

“Tell him I’m heartbroken that I have to wait.” She had extra kolto paks in her pocket. She brought one out and handed it to the kid. “And put this on those scratches.”

“I can try and summon him,” the boy offered. “Doesn’t always work.”

“Don’t bother.” Carth’s anger was plain with the clench of his jaw, his voice roughening. “If that bastard’s too scared to come back to this planet, all the better.”

The kid stepped forward and reached for Carth’s hand—then dropped it a millisecond later. “He is gone from you!”

“Yeah.” Revan’s husband nodded, face set in a grim mask. “I got sick.”

“Polla and Yuthura will be glad of that, I think—if they lived.” The kid smiled up at Carth, so trustingly that Revan felt her own heart melt. “Takan--? I thought I sensed his passing--?”

“He’s not… he didn’t--” Carth turned his back on Revan, facing the boy. “I'm sorry.”

“Oh.” Zepth’s brows wrinkled around his horns. Suddenly he looked even younger. “I… I was happy when he decided to join our cause. Polla and Seiran? The Lady Yuthura? Lord Revan?”

“They’re fine,” Revan broke in.

“Takan died bravely.” Carth patted the kid on the shoulders and drawing him into an awkward hug. “I wish… there should have been more that I could have done for him, but I--it was fast.”

The Zabrak nodded, accepting the embrace. “Lord Revan gave the order to scatter, and so we all ran. The ships came from the spaceport… we barely made it to the forest caves in time.”

“Any others with you?” Carth asked as they drew apart.

Zaalbar shook his head. “Polla Organa and her mate were next to us in the fray. Our comms went dead.”

“They’re here,” Revan reassured him. “They’re fine.”

“I know,” Zaalbar chuffed. “I caught the scent. But our comms are still down. The infidel ships used electro-magnetic cluster bombs in low atmosphere. We think they fried most of the circuits on this continent.”

“Canderous is working on bringing civilization back. They’re trying to get a signal out.” Revan turned her head toward the makeshift comm tower. A yellow light blinked steadily at its top, proving that the Mando'ade had progressed farther than she’d expected.

The buzz of the Dark Temple’s call throbbed in her skull like a broken tooth. The image on the scan danced before her eyes again making her vision blur.

Carth’s voice had a hard edge of forced cheer. “We’re still doing sweeps for survivors.”

Revan took a deep breath. Just like Carth and Canderous (and telling Canderous would be the most difficult, Mandalorians did not surrender without a fight), the Wookiee deserved to know. “There's something else, Zaal. I-I might have to go away. For a while, at least. Maybe a really long--”

“Zaalbar!” Polla Organa appeared out of nowhere, limping between the tents and practically tackling the Wookiee. “Leskal just told me you were here! Thank the kriffing stars you're not dead!”

“Polla Polla!” the Wookiee yowled his interpretation of her name twice, looking just as pleased.

Incredibly, the women barked back at him in broken Shyriiwook. “Here meat camp. You be starving!”

“It’s ajjjjeeeriiiiwooorrr,” Revan muttered, half under her breath. “Not ajjjjeeeeeoooo.”

“Uh, beautiful, let them catch up.” Carth said.

They seemed to be doing that now, between Zaalbar's barks and Polla's attempts to answer him.

How the frack did she know so much Shyriiwook? Since when did Zaalbar and Polla Organa need to catch up? They had been trapped on this planet together, and yes, Carth had told Revan that they'd helped organize the rebellion, but even so--

An ugly feeling she refused to call jealousy made Revan turn away from them, back to the Zabrak kid, Zepth. “I need to speak to the Emperor.” Revan smiled to put him at ease. “Do you… can you get him? Can you look for him?”

He frowned. “Not unless he wishes to speak to you.”

“You can't control when he comes at all?” The pull of the tomb felt like an itch in the Force. The Sleeper Ships had moved farther away but that knowledge tugged at Revan, too--like they wanted her to search for them. Reach for them. Like a thing, just out of sight--

Like she had to the tomb--

{{Come}}, it whispered.

Is Tenebrae like that, too? Without thinking, Revan put her hand on the Zabrak kid's arm.

He pulled back, but she felt it--the current passing between them--

And then she was--

Pacing along a hallway on flippered feet, smell of salt and sea in her mouth--

Manaan

Soaring in the skies above an ice planet--

Hoth

Staring at the restraints on her arms, feeling more clamp down upon her wings, while a Trandoshan-accented voice barked questions--

Republic-issue restraints, where--a ship? Wait--

Driving a transport across a field of Derran wheat toward a familiar farmstead--

That's Deralia--no! that's… that's Glory Road. Adaston Farm --

Signing a contract while a man with horns like Zepth's nodded and extended a hand to seal the agreement.

“Your clinic will be a blessing to our farming families, Mez Gordo. We always need more doctors on Iridonia--”

Wait! That was Deralia! No! That was--go back! Go back!

Viewing through mechanical eyes the curve of a planet below her wings as her ship joined the others in low orbit--

Dantooine, it's Dantooine--

Her thoughts seemed to pool there, expanding until Revan had a hundred eyes, all fixed upon the planet.
All ready to strike.

{{Yes}} That cold voice. Ancient as coils. Running beneath the whims of the Emperor, lay something darker, colder, something beyond. {{Show me}}

No! Go back. Deralia. What--wait--who was on Deralia?

“Hey!” White light sparked across her skull and Revan fell back, only to open her eyes blinking, hand on her saber, ready for an attack--

--only to see Polla looming over her, rubbing her knuckles as if they hurt.

“You hit her!” Carth's voice.

“You holding her and going 'Come back to me, beautiful,' wasn't doing squat.” Polla folded her arms, and behind them Zaalbar groaned.

“Revan?” Her husband’s arms. His face close to hers, almost smothering.

“Wasn't just… ships.” Revan's tongue felt thick in her mouth. Her eyes met Polla's with that sickening twist of disorientation--looking into a mirror again. “I was…” She twisted free from Carth, tried to scramble to her feet and felt the wound in her side twinge, falling back--

The smuggler’s hand reached out and caught hers, making them both stumble--before Revan caught the Force again, using its momentum to make it to her feet.

“Thanks,” she muttered, staring down at their hands. The smuggler’s were filthy, but hers weren’t any better.

“No problem.” Polla pulled her hand free.

“You had a seizure. I think.” Seiran came between them. He had a repulsorlift attached to his splinted leg, enabling him to walk. Then, lowering his voice as he turned to his wife. “Is she okay?”

“Her nose keeps bleeding. Something about the tomb she’s supposed to go in and this fracking planet.”

“She’s fine.” But Carth’s voice was uncertain.

“I’m fine,” Revan echoed.

{{Come}} the voice from the tomb murmured again.

And then strangely, instead of feeling disoriented Revan felt… better. The Force surged around her, a vehicle of her will. Her resolve crystallized, drawn toward the dark edifice before them, warm and welcoming--

“Don't,” the kid whispered and Revan realized he was shaking--and she was reaching for him again, with the Force as well as her outstretched hand.

“Can you hear it too?” she asked.

“Not… like you do.” In that instant his face reminded her of the holocron she’d found of the boy, Vitiate, before he’d become Emperor--although Vitiate had been much younger, then. The holocron was in their tent, now, along with that recording of Vima Sunrider, answering Dessa's questions on the Aleema in a mix of Mandalorian and Rakatan. She’d gone through some of it, a long explanation of how Oerin Lin was made--mostly in Rakatan, which Dessa didn’t speak.

The end of the recording replayed in Revan’s mind again, the old woman, abruptly raising the wooden sword and hammering it into the pregnant Mandalorian’s skull.

Carth’s voice broke in. “Revan?”

“I don’t know what’s happening.” Revan pulled one of the medi-wipes Sinae had given her out of her pocket, unsurprised it came away red. “I... felt Tenebrae just now. The ships, too. I was there--” she took a breath. They needed to know. “There are Sleeper ships patrolling Hoth right now. And Dantooine. They want me to know that. It's a threat. For me.”

And Deralia? No ships there. But that was Adaston Farm, that was--home. Revan knew she should be worried about the sents on Hoth and Dantooine--even sparsely populated planets had populations in the millions, give or take—but her mind kept skipping to that familiar road, the line of spindly trees arching over the entrance to the Organa farmstead, and the monster walking down that road—the monster she’d looked out from, seeing from the Emperor’s eyes--

Malak? The Emperor’s on Deralia--

Our son is not. His voice was reluctant, faint, stretched thin.

Then where is he? You said he was safe!

No answer. Revan’s eyes snapped back and everything was abruptly too bright.

Malak?

He is safe. His voice was faint. Revan suddenly had the crazy idea that he might be lying.

“Hoth?” Carth looked confused. “That’s impossible. We’re across the galaxy from Hoth. And Dantooine’s a week away, even with military-grade acceleration.”

“The Sleepers seem to have something better.” Revan knew their locations as if they were attached to her arms. “I saw them on Coruscant before. And... Telos. They can travel outside the hyperlanes, Carth. I don’t know how.”

“Telos? They were on Telos?” His expression froze. “You didn’t tell me that before.”

“I made them leave--somehow. It’s a threat.” Revan took a deep breath. “They want me to know where they are and what they’ll do if I don’t....”

“If you don’t go in that damned tomb.” He finished her sentence for her.

“Yes.” No more thisla treats. They are the stick. What Malachi called the closed fist.

Her head turned toward the Dark Temple, where somewhere beneath rested her tomb, and then back to Polla Organa, who was still staring at her with that suspicious look.

The Emperor was on Deralia, possessing someone there. Going to Adaston Farm. How can I tell her that?

How can I not?

If he’s there now, it’s too late to stop his plan. If she goes, it will only put her and Seiran in more danger. The thought was a cold whisper. Malak said Korrie isn’t there. My son is safe. I don’t know what has happened to hers, but my son is safe--unless Malak is lying to me--can he lie to me?

But she could know what had happened on Deralia, couldn’t she? All Revan had to do was reach out again, form a conduit through the Zabrak boy--

“I wish I could be more help, Lord Polla Revan,” Zepth offered formally. He took a step backward.

He could be.

“You really can’t control when the Emperor comes?”

“No. Possession is by His will.” The kid did look sorry. A part of Revan’s mind felt sorry for him, too, but it was abstract.

“What did you just call her?” Polla interrupted, sounding pissed. “Lord Polla Revan?”

“Polla Revan is Zaalbar's name for me.” Revan met the Wookiee’s calm brown eyes for a moment before looking away again. She knew without asking that he would disapprove of her thoughts now, just as Carth would. Perversely, it made her feel guilty. “It's fine, Zepth. Just tell us what you can.” The poor kid. That brand on his forehead had to have hurt, right between the horns. The sensation of pain there would be--

“We need to find a Force collar,” she added, glancing back at Carth. “Soon.”

“I thought you said it wouldn’t work.” He frowned.

“Maybe it'll buy me time to think.” She rubbed her aching temples. Sort through her treacherous thoughts, the ones that whispered she could take possession of this child herself, that she should come to the tomb and see Korrie, save him if she had to--take possession of that other body--

{{Come}} A note of triumph in that call now, as if it thought it had won.

“You want a Force collar to block the Emperor?” It was Polla who answered, looking suspicious. “Master Klee used one sometimes, but Carth couldn't block him at all “

“Not just him. I told you I'm tied to those ships through the Force. Maybe without it, I'll be free.”

And then what? You think they'll go back to sleep on their own?

“Then what?” The smuggler's voice was almost accusing. “You think they’ll just frack off and go sleep again?”

“It’s worth a try.” Anything was. Revan's eyes went to the Temple. She suddenly knew there was a walkway around the exterior. A walkway leading to a narrow set of stairs and down three hundred of them, to an entrance to her tomb in the back of the structure.

An entrance with a pathway lined with bones. Bones of the fallen, the failed. The weak.

{{Come to me}}

She could go there. She could just go there and see--

She could reach out to Zepth again and see--

As if he could sense her intent, (could he?), the Zabrak took another step back.
“Revan said we should freeze you in carbonite. That’s worth a try, too.” The smuggler crossed her arms.

“I’ll try that. If I have to.”

Malak. Is Korrie okay? The Emperor’s on Deralia.

He was.

Was? Korrie was what?

Tenebrae sent someone to Deralia. Korrie’s fine. It was handled.

How, Malak? How was it handled? Revan took a deep breath, mad thoughts spinning through her head. Carth could freeze her in carbonite. Take her corpsicle to Deralia and unthaw her there--

“Where is Darth Bossypants, anyway?” The Deralian drawl was like a shock from home, bringing her back to the present. “Seems like she’d know all this stuff, Butcher. Maybe you should take her advice.”

“Over there.” Revan gestured toward the camp’s perimeter. “I think.” The woman’s Force-signature was faint, but steady, emanating from behind a wall of tents.

“Well, she’s got a Force collar,” the smuggler said. “If you’re serious. We brought one with us to capture you. And Ik-tik and Grarwbaar have a few extra. Grarwbaar and Rog’ are here somewhere--you remember Ik-tik?” Her head tilted. “Spacer from Dix Prime? He’s real high in the Exchange now.”

Revan’s mind stuck on Ik-tik, the yellow-haired Human spacer from Dix Prime. I was twenty-two and still raw. He bought me a drink on Bandomir and told me he knew some important sents, if I wanted introductions--

“Handsy asshole, wasn’t he?”

“Yeah.” Polla nodded. “Ran into him one day in the International Quarter in Kaas City. Real stroke of luck that he’d taken up business here. Got me in touch with all sorts of interesting people.”

“Great.” What are the fracking odds of that? Revan cleared her throat. “One hell of a coincidence, don’t you think?”

Polla shrugged. “Ik-tik’s Wookiee boss likes to call it luck.”

Luck, Revan thought hollowly. Increasingly hers seemed to have run out. “Zepth.” Revan took a deep breath. “I’m sorry.”

The Zabrak tensed. “I understand. I know we are but chaff beneath your blade.” His head bowed, and Revan realized, with a shock of horror, that the kid expected her to kill him.

What was almost worse were the expressions of the others--like they expected it too.

“No, I--relax. I didn’t mean--” Revan whistled, and two Mandalorians in beskar came running so fast she suspected they’d been monitoring the entire exchange, just out of sight.

“Use the strongest restraints you have on Zepth, here,” she ordered them. “But feed him, too. Keep him comfortable. Get Sinae to run medicals. If his eyes start to glow, comm me. Immediately.”
Carth looked like he wanted to object, but all he did was clap the kid on the back. “I’ll check in,” he promised. “Later.”

“I understand,” the Zabrak said. His blue eyes met Revan’s. “Thank you, Lord Revan. For my life. His Luminance left me a note once—”

A note. Hells. That sadistic bastard writes notes on their flesh--

“Give him a datapad and a stylus, too,” she told the Mandalorian. Hard to tell with the armor, but she thought one of the kids was Urex, an Ordo wrestler she’d sparred with once or twice what seemed like a century ago, on Coruscant. “No sharp objects anywhere in his tent. And no more carving on your skin, Zepth, okay?”

“Yes.”

“Good.” The assurance felt empty. There was nothing she could do to save him.

{{Incorrect. Come and save them all}}

“Damnit!” Revan wiped her nose again. Her mouth tasted like copper and salt. She thought about the deadly flower, blooming and reblooming in the space of her skull.

Zepth cleared his throat. “His Luminance said you killed my Aunt Marla. He left me a note. Is that true?”

“Yes.” Revan met his eyes. “Marla Korr was spying on the Jedi for Tenebrae.” The thought still left Revan with an anger that was hard to understand, even harder to control. If this boy was Marla’s kin, Tenebrae’s hand had placed them both on the board.

It’s not a game, Red.

Oh, I’m aware.

Zepth nodded. He no longer looked frightened. “I understand. Aunt Marla was loyal to Him. I am not.”

“Master Klee wasn’t loyal, either,” Polla interrupted. “He helped me fool Tenny-Bro into thinking I was you.” Her glare was an accusation, as if Revan had killed Master Klee. “Then he went back to Coruscant and your fracking cousin killed him. Yuthura told me. She was there.”

“I wasn’t.”

“Guess that’s one not on your sheet.” The Deralian paused. “Butcher.”

“I guess.” She refused to show this woman how much that hurt. “Of course, when you were releasing the virus on the fracking planet and killing thousands, your Da and I were coming in third in the Biscain Hundred.”

“What?” Polla scoffed. “That’s not even a good lie.”

“Third place,” Revan repeated. “Jasp never told you about his time in the war, huh? He told me.”

“What? Which fracking war? He hated wars—”

“Pollie.” Seiran limped between them again.
Pollie. What Polla Organa's family called her to get her attention. The diminutive she hated.

“Sei--she--”

Polla's husband looked tired. His splinted leg whirred, like the repulsors holding it up were running out of juice. “I heard. You gave as good as you got.”

“Better listen to him, Pollie.” Revan turned away, steeling herself to face the real threat.

Xxx

“Where in Ajunta Pal’s name have you been?” Mydia demanded of her brother. He’d already spent some time she'd never get back recounting the tale of his escape, but she found the details difficult to imagine. Phylus hated camping. Surely, the brother she knew would have just curled up and died before spending days in the wilderness.

Behind them, some kind of drama was breaking out between the Wookiee and the Emperor's Voice and Revan, but Mydia only had eyes for the scrawny, long-nosed boy in front of her. He looked quite ill.

“I was walking through the forest,” her brother repeated. (Walking through the forest seemed to be one of the tale’s themes.) “And starving. And I feel sick. I almost died.”

“We’ll get you food. And medical attention, but did you know that Darth Malak is no longer possessing Dustil Onasi?” She turned her head toward the Dark Lord, who had told her that her life was a lie, but the woman was now running off again, trailed by that Wookiee. Mydia’s old tutor followed them, too--Seriina moving at a surprising clip for a someone who had always been so slow carrying the warmed bath towels on the days when the chambermaids were busy scouring the kitchens. Seriina’s husband hobbled behind, supported by Admiral Onasi.

Practically a parade of the infirm. Why Lord Revan surrounded herself with injured slaves and miscreants was a mystery too boring to solve. Mydia yawned.

“Dustil’s not possessed?” Phylus coughed. “Yeah. I figured when he didn’t remember Karagan, the wine steward. Kept offering Dustil the red agaive, but he never drank it.” He paused. “Dustil’s alright, though. Did Karagan make it out?”

“How should I know?” There had been a few servants cowering in the tunnels when they’d returned to the tombs. Mydia had given orders to have them all killed for not guarding the upstairs--and then the other Lord Revan had countermanded those orders--and then she really didn’t bother to notice after that, because the other Lord Revan had been so kind about the baby and always asking for Mydia’s help with the survivors.

The baby. Ugh, that reminded Mydia. She still had to decide whether to bother getting fat and have that baby--or not. “Why didn't you tell me that Dustil Onasi wasn’t Lord Malak?”

“I didn’t want you to kill him.” Phylus was honest to a fault. How sad for him that he was such a lovable, weak creature. “I also didn’t want him to kill you.”

“Sweet.” In a way, it was. “But now I’m pregnant with some no-name liar’s baby, and I’ve just met Lord Revan’s cousin. He trained on Korriban.” True, he didn’t have the Force now, just like the traitor Ulic Qel-Droma, but blood, as Mother always said, it would always tell.

Lord Revan had recognized the man. He was no mere slave. And he said he’d been strong, before.
“Um, so did Dustil.” Her brother blinked. He was sweating and rather pale. Mydia took his arm, looking for the medix. “He trained on Korriban and he’s powerful. With… uh, with Inse gone and Mother dead—”

“Nereal and Rhea, too.” But neither of them had liked their older brothers.

“I felt them die, too. Just like Mother. You... did you kill Mother?”

“I used Revan’s droid.” It was close enough to the truth.

“With everyone dead don’t we need Dustil?”

“For what?” She’d lost the hover-train of her brother’s thought. The poor dear was probably delirious. She took his hand, leading him back toward the camp. “Let’s get you some medical attention. The Mandalorian doctor has enormous breasts. You’ll like her.”

“Okay.” He nodded meekly. Good old Phylus.

Additionally, Mydia had some questions for Medix Sinae about ending a pregnancy.

As if it could hear, the little parasite inside took the opportunity to squirm, like a drek worm afraid of the light.

XXX

“Genoharadan?” The Houck chuckled at Revan. Again.

She had moved their conversation out of view from the Mandalorians trailing them, but Revan still had the feeling of being watched. She had to assume constant surveillance. “Some incompetent order of assassins.” She tried to sound as if the topic already bored her.

“My box was the only one that mattered.”

“Again, the Rakatan obelisk was delivered to one of your agents on Korriban.”

If Revan still possessed true power these pathetic minions would already be dead. “So you claim. But I thought the Order of the Genoharadan took vows not to lie.”

The Wookiee bared his teeth. “That would make our job nigh-impossible... but in this case, I'm telling the truth.” He frowned. “If we ever get the wideband working again, I’ll show you a copy of the receipt.”

“Which agent on Korriban? Didn't it occur to you that I was dead?”

“Sure. The agent in charge had the thing in cold storage because you were dead. But then... you showed up, didn't you? Or she did.” Grarwwaar nodded in the direction that the Fragment had taken. “Announcing all over Korriban that she was Revan returned, and so when the kid came asking--”

“You gave the... you gave my artifact to a child?”

A thought uncoiled in her mind, soft and slightly smug. So that's what happened to it!
Sheris? But the woman's presence slipped away, and suddenly Revan just knew, as if she'd been Sheris herself.

_Beya knew there was something that Revan had wanted very badly. She thought it must have value._

_She thought she could use me to acquire it, and I helped because I wanted to know—what kind of superweapon or artifact would have the great Lord of the Sith upturning the galaxy—_

“The employee who gave your Rakatan mind-prison to Mission Vao is no longer with the Order,” Rogere added. “Hulas had him disposed. Vao wasn't an authorized courier, even if she did know the password.”

“We think she guessed the password,” Grarwwaar shrugged. “Lurze wasn’t the brightest.”

In her old body, both of them would be suspended by their throats by now. In this one, Revan just blinked. “But the Fragment disposed of Mission Vao.”

“Did she?” Grarwwaar tilted his head. “What a pity. I was looking forward to another talk with the ghost-child.” He gestured toward the nearest row of ships. “But isn’t that the _Blue Ghost_ over there? I helped paint it myself.”

“That’s the _Ebon Hawk_...” Revan began, frowning. “I don’t understand the significance—”

_Dar._

Revan turned to see the Fragment, trailed by an entire entourage—including Polla and Seiran and the Fragment's husband, as well as Zaalbar the Wookiee. Zaalbar had a T3 astromech strapped to back that appeared to be the one possessed by Mission Vao.

“Lord Revan,” Grarwwaar rumbled, as the Fragment approached.

The woman nodded, laying claim to the title, but kept her attention focused on Revan. From her movements she had mostly recovered from her injury. “What the frack are you doing?”

“Speaking to my Genoharadan contacts.” The thought that this woman had possessed her artifact and then—lost it? Sold it? Revan struggled for composure.

“Genoharadan?” The Fragment's eyes narrowed. “These two are Genoharadan?”

“Hello again,” Grarwwaar murmured. Abruptly, his features shifted, melting like rain on snow as he shrank, becoming a white-haired humanoid man, perhaps of Arkanian extraction. “This shape may be more familiar.”

To her credit, the Fragment didn't react at all, although a few of the others gasped. “Rulan Prolik? What are you doing here?”

_Shii’ido, I think._ Revan was pleased to have her suspicions confirmed. _Not a Clawdite—he is far too arrogant—_

“Curiosity,” the former Wookiee said. “Rumors of your presence on this world.” He glanced between them. “False rumors, initially, but now true.”

“There’s a Dathomiri prophecy,” the Houck added. “Says somethin like this’s gonna happen. And it has.”

“Dathomir,” the white-haired man scoffed. “One of the first points where the Emperor Vitiate infected our ranks. Can’t really trust their prophecies.”

“Ziost priests used to say the same thing.”

“You were working for Malachi D'Reev, before,” the Fragment accused Grarwwaar. Or Rulan, apparently.

“Guilty as charged.” The shapeshifter smiled. “Of course, we no longer do.”

“He's dead,” Revan interrupted them. Irrationally, she wanted to cut through this posturing with her saber, but she had surrendered it to Sinae when this farce began, when she had brought the injured Fragment and Polla into the Mandalorian camp in the first place.

Peace, Red.

Malak's voice was faint, still distracted, as if his main attention was elsewhere.

I do not give into my urges, she responded, ignoring the soft feeling of laughter in her mind that came from Sheris. I will see what the Fragment's game is, first—if she is cognizant enough to have one.

The Fragment’s attention kept shifting back to the wall of the Temple behind them. Revan remembered hearing its call, a dark whisper in the back of her mind when she came too close, but it had been quiet and easily avoided. From the look on the Fragment’s face, the call was stronger now.

It was madness that the Mando’ade had made their camp here. What had the Fragment been thinking?

Rulan Prolik continued. “If you're concerned about the D’Reev contract on your son, it was withdrawn. The Genoharadan--at least when we left--had no orders at all regarding Malachor D'Reev.”

“Good,” the Fragment snapped. Revan noted the red-stained cloth at the Fragment’s belt, the stain above her lips. Sheris's empathic gift shivered with the weight of the pain in her skull, even encased behind a wall of ice, like the woman herself could no longer feel it. “And what about her?” Her scowl looked as petulant as Polla’s when she turned the force of her glare back to Revan. “Are you plotting against me with Dar’Revan?”

“Call me Sheris,” Revan advised, with more acid than she meant to reveal. “And no, these Gentlebeings were just revealing to me that they had found my Rakatan obelisk--the one I planned to use to defeat the Sith Emperor for good. They then surrendered it to you.” Her fingers curled with the urge to choke the truth from those lying lips. If she could have matched the Fragment’s strength--

No, Red.

“Huh?” The Fragment blinked. “I don't know what you're talking about.”

“Lurze surrendered the Rakatan box to your agent, Revan. To our mutual friend, Mission Vao. On Korriban,” Grarwwaar cleared his humanoid throat. “At the time, she was a fifteen-year-old blue Twi’lek.”

“What?” Surely the woman could hide her expressions better than this. Or was her ignorance feigned, and the overreaction a trap? “I don't have any box. Mission…?” Her voice trailed off into a Shyriiwook whine as she queried her Wookiee.

“There were lots of boxes,” the Kashyyyk native growled back. “Mission did a lot of trading. I don’t know.”

“Ask her.” Revan gestured at the droid strapped to his back, trying not to show the relief she felt, that there still might be some hope. “Turn her back on.”

“She’s broken,” the Fragment snapped. “You can’t.”

“Waaghha—” the Wookiee began to say something, but the Fragment silenced him with a glance, looking at Revan with an expression so pointed that Revan almost wanted to laugh.

It would have been inappropriate to mock the Fragment’s transparency. And so Revan did not. Obviously, they had a backup persona hidden, perhaps even the original holocron.

She would have to search the Fragment’s quarters later. And her ship.

“What’s the big deal about this box anyway?” Carth interrupted. “And what are the Genoharadan--are they the ones who were going to kill Korrie?” His hand went to his blaster, as if the Fragment’s volatility was contagious. “You said an ancient order of assassins was going to kill Korrie. That shapeshifter said they were part of an Order. And they used to work for D’Reev. ” For someone with a suspicious mind, that would be connection enough.

Captain Onasi had the virtue of being right, in this case.

“The box is a Rakata mind prison,” Revan told them all, for the time for subterfuge had long since passed. “It traps… life essence, I suppose one could say.”

“Souls,” the Houck interrupted. “We would call them souls.”

“Just one at a time,” Rulan Prolik added.

“So?” Polla interrupted. “The Emperor’s got more than one body.”

“But only one soul.” Rogere shrugged. “What is it that your Grass Priests say? That each soul has its own imprint on the fields, leaving its own mark when it passes?”

“I always fell asleep during the sermons,” the Deralian muttered, but she was looking at the Fragment, and the Fragment was looking back at her, their expressions nearly identical.

Revan bit back her impatience. To be so close-- “If you have it in your possession, Fragment, I recommend you tell me. It could be the key to your salvation.”

“I don’t know anything about it.” The woman was twisting her top-knot the way Revan would tug at her braids as a child, before Jedi discipline taught her how to sit still. Her nose was bleeding again. Revan could see the pain, even if the Fragment couldn’t feel it. “A box? On Korriban? You mentioned a box before. But I never saw any box on Korriban.”

“Uh… Dustil did.” Carth cleared his throat. “He… he told me about it. Mission sweet-talked him into carrying it from some shady Rodian all the way across Dreshdae. To the Hawk.”

“Then it might still be there--on your ship.” Hope was fleeting. Hope was a curse. Hope felt like a flame inside her. To see Malachor again. To finally rid the galaxy of the Emperor forever--

“Yes.” From Fragment’s expression, had she known? Or guessed? “It might be.” Her hand extended toward Revan. “Is that a Force collar on your belt? Give it to me.”

“Why? Silencing me in the Force won’t help, and you need me to heal.”

“It’s not for you. I need it.” The extended hand shook slightly, a tremor that seemed to run through the women’s frame. “I need… quiet. I need to think. That tomb--did you hear it, too--before?”

“When I was close.” Revan pulled the circlet free and unfolded it gingerly. “The Genoharadan gave this one to me. It’s Force-locked. You won’t be able to remove it yourself.”

The Fragment made a face. “I’m familiar with the design.” She set the prongs over her neck, hissing slightly as they set against the skin.

“Beautiful, are you sure--” her husband’s objection was already too late.

“Yes.” Her face relaxed for a moment, then grimaced, as the pain she had blocked before came back. “Blast it! My head’s killing me!”

Unshielded by the Force, her agony was almost visible to Sheris’s medix-trained eyes, a red miasma like a crown on the woman’s skull.

“I can take away your pain--” Revan stepped forward, placing her hands against the sides of the Fragment’s head, where her hair was cropped close, the brown dye ceding to red. The damage was worse than she had expected, and her breath hissed out in astonishment as much as renewed agony-pain like a circuit running between them--a connection--even without the Force.

“That’s better. A little.” The Fragment sagged against her, and Revan was suddenly the one holding them both upright, her weak grasp of the Force half-distracted, channeling away the pain. She staggered and then Fragment’s arms locked on hers, pulling her up with wiry strength, until the woman had straightened to their full height. Revan found her concentration and began again, wincing, as it felt like a band of agony was tightening around her own skull.

“Y-you used to do this for Malak.” Voice a low whisper. Green eyes locked to hers. “I dreamed about it.”

“Yes.” It was Sheris who nodded, suddenly Sheris looking at Revan through their eyes. “At first, because you ordered.”

“Thank you.” The woman swallowed. “Thank you for….”

“Then because I loved him. Then I didn't do it for you. I did it for him .”

“I know.” The Fragment blinked, and one tear fell, tracing a path down her silver-marked cheek. “Thank you.”

Xxx

It took forever, but the Mandies got their comm-tower working again, thanks to Dustil lying on the ground with his eyes closed next to the turbines, making them spin as fast as he fracking could without burning out their motors (harder than you’d think).

It wasn’t the worst thing he’d ever done with the Force. It even gave his anger a place to go, which made things simple and clean again. No Mydia Blais. No Mekk. No stupid fracking refugees who kept looking at him with those shell-shocked eyes, like they weren’t strong enough to help themselves.
“We’re live!” Urex called out finally. A crackle of static and voices babbled through the speakers —some broadcast from some far-away world. The sound of a popular song blasted through the clearing.

All of the Mandies cheered like they’d just fracking invented fire.

Dustil stayed where he was, kept making the wheels spin. The first wideband comm call Canderous placed was about as interesting as watching Mandalorians while Mandalorians watched paint dry, but he didn’t care.

For the first ten minutes or so, Canderous and Gwenarius Ordo exchanged troop information, patching in the man’s other wife, Aemelie Ordo from the Aleema, to weigh in. They carried on in front of Dustil like he was an actual battery, and not the man making the turbines spin to generate the power for their fracking convenience.

In fact, they were so fracking boring Dustil almost missed it when Canderous told his wife their kid was probably dead.

They didn’t have a visual on Gwenarius Ordo (who was apparently on Dxun, which hadn’t been bombed, but they’d had fallout and they were on alert), but her voice just got slower when she heard about poor Millifar Ordo, she of the genetics and engineering textbooks, and fangirl pictures of fracking idiots.

“She was a woman, at least,” Aemelie declared. “Mekel Jin performed her first shereshoy.”

“I’m pleased to hear of that,” Gwenarius replied, and the three of them were quiet for a second while Dustil stared hard at the spinning turbines and tried to think about hoverball and not his irrational urge to wring Mekk’s neck.

Then Gwenarius began talking about banthashit in the rest of the galaxy. Apparently, that murder fleet of Revan’s had been all over the Core and the Rim, and rumors were wild, saying the Republic Fleet was now on its way to the Outer Reaches to crush the Sith Empire.

Hah, Dustil thought, staring hard at those blasted turbines. Crush this planet anymore and it’ll be a smear of shit on the galaxy’s ass.

Then, Canderous Ordo was just starting in on some banthashit reasons why he didn’t want to fight the Republic right now when the medix Sinae showed up, practically hysterical, with some story about Revan being ‘arusuum’la.’

Took Dustil a second to translate that one. Aruuum’la meant stale, he thought, which was a weird insult, but Canderous and his wives got quiet, and the man looked up at the kids hovering above and told them to leave.

Then he looked down at Dustil, still chilling on the ground. “Batteries are charged enough, kid. You should go.”

“I’m fine staying—” their conversation might have been about to get interesting, considering the medix looked like someone had pissed in her caff and made her drink it after.

“Go,” Aemelie’s image scowled down at him from the comm-link. She didn’t like him and it was fracking mutual. Probably still holding a grudge about that time Dustil had rescued her from prison aboard the good ship Aleema.

Mandies never knew when to be properly grateful. Sometimes, Dustil could see why Malak had hated them.

Dustil stood up. Turbines were still spinning, batteries were charged.

“You’re good for another day,” he told them.

No doubt by now, Mekk had probably propositioned Mydia Blais and a few Wookiees to put on a live sex-show for the Mando’ade. Did they have those? If not, Mekk would probably invent them.

Dustil felt his face flush.

XXX

“Halloo?” Mydia peered into the main medix tent. “Doctorix Sinae? That is your name, isn’t it?” The smell of kolto made her feel nauseous, but almost everything did, when she wasn’t starving.

No one answered, just the glug of a life support tank set along the wall with a pregnant Human floating in it. With the crowds that had been in the room when she’d peeked in before, Mydia hadn’t noticed how pregnant the woman veg had been.

Round and fat and repulsive. And fat. So fat.

“Ugh,” she said to the empty room. Inside her stomach the parasite squirmed again. She’d been so happy when it was Lord Malak’s, but now things had changed.

“I may have to kill your father,” she told it. “I do not like liars.”

The pregnant woman’s tank beeped. The Mandalorian runes said something, but Mydia had never bothered to learn them. Revan had conquered those people. There was nothing to be learned from losers.

Still, she assumed the beeps meant the medix would come back. When she did, Mydia would ask her what could be done.

One of the cots looked marginally cleaner than the others. She sat down on that one and closed her eyes.

XXX

“Dustil?” Yuthura Ban stepped out from behind a tent like she’d been lying in wait there all along, just as Dustil had finally calmed down enough to head for the meat pits and get himself a fracking meal before he found Mekel Jin. “I wanted you to know that I’m proud of your work.”

“Why?”

Ban looked as Sithy as Dustil did, except she’d told him before it was just cosmetic drugs or something. She felt funny in the Force, too. Weak. Kind of strained.

“I’ve been hearing how much you were helping around the camp. And with rescues.”

“Yeah, well, Revan and I were the only two Force-users worth a damn until the rest of you showed.” He shrugged. “She was busy sometimes. So someone had to do it.”

“You did well.”
“You knew Mekel was alive,” he said back, which wasn’t what he meant to say at all. “All that time on Kaas, hanging out with Scourge and you never told me.”

“A misunderstanding.” Her brow ridges drew together. “You seemed quite certain he was dead, and so I assumed that your bond--”

“The bond you knew was broken!”

“They say a Bezel bond is beyond the Force. It is a tie to the soul.”

“Whatever.” The anger licked the air, he could almost see it. Dustil felt a smug satisfaction when Ban took a step back. “Bond’s broken now. We’re not tied at the soul. Or anywhere else.”

“Oh.” Her eyes were as yellow as his. It was supposed to be from a dark side drug. His father had mentioned that. “You’re much stronger than you were before, Dustil.”

“Don’t act so surprised,” he snapped. “All those good times at the Dark Council meetings when you’d sit on Lord Scourge’s lap and pretend to be his slave while I pretended to be Malak. Where is that Scourge asshole, anyway?”

“Dead.” Her lekku twitched. “Poison.”

“Well, sithspit for him.” The Mandies were roasting something, like they done the last two nights. It made his stomach rumble. Dustil’s eyes went to the tent he’d shared with Mekk, the one Mydia Blais seemed to have taken over. He still didn’t know if he was gonna sleep there tonight. He still didn’t know if he wanted to sleep there. “Have you seen Mekel?”

“Only briefly. I was there when Oerin Lin stripped the Force from him. I believe he blames me for the experience.”

“So do I.” At that moment, he wanted to show her how much he blamed her.

Yuthura raised a brow ridge. “Your hand is on your saber. Do you remember what I told you?”

“Always be prepared to carry out the threat.” How could he forget? She’d made him carve it on Shaardan’s back with a laser pen. A dozen times, when that asshole had started the fight in the first place. “I am, Yuthura.”

“I see that.” Her hand dropped to her own. She’d be no challenge. She didn’t look well. “Dustil, I couldn’t help you before--”

“When?” He scoffed. “When did you ever help me?”

“You and Mekel would have died on Korriban if I hadn’t bonded you.”

Less a memory than a feeling. That glitterstim high peaking. The chanting. Cold sigils etched in blood on his naked skin.

“You want me to thank you?”

“No. I want to… to fix this.” Yuthura seemed to hesitate. “There are techniques to block the worst effects of the Dark. Meditations. I could teach y--”

“Teach someone who gives a frack.” Dustil pushed past her toward the row of fires, the sound of Mandalorian voices. His mouth watered. The meat smelled fracking fantastic.
Trista Jar: “Thank you, Citizen Sha-rah, that was a very interesting piece on Ithorian cooking. Next up after a word from our sponsors... are we at war or not?” (Giggles) “I mean, that’s such a silly question, isn’t it, General Ubuta? Wouldn’t we know if we were at war?” (Giggles again.) “I mean, can’t you just tell us?”

General Ubuta: “I’ve been instructed to advise that planetary defenses around Core worlds have been placed on high alert.”

Trista Jar: “And Old Scaly hasn’t given one of her State of the Fleet addresses in weeks! Not to mention those rumors from Katarr and the Biscain Evacuation... also joining us today are the Senators in charge of appropriations for defense spending, Senator Leeshansintina Racharn, and Senator Aramis Makeon.”

Aramis: (Giggles.) “It’s great to be here, Trista. I love your show.”

Leeshansintina: “Thanks for having us. I want everyone to know, things are totally okay. There’s no reason to panic. The Republic is at peace. A lasting peace, for perhaps the first time in its history.”

Aramis: “Leesa’s totally right. Now we have a peace. There is no reason to panic. The Republic is at peace. A lasting peace, for perhaps the first time in its history--”

“Drink up, kid.” Atton plunked a glass of blue milk down in front of Kore, making a show of checking his chron. “We might be here awhile if my contact doesn't show--”

‘Here’ was a dingy bar on some stupid fueling station called Peragus.

“I want to go back to Deralia,” Kore muttered. But he was thirsty so he drank the milk. He hadn’t eaten or drunk anything the man had given him for the first day… but then he’d started to feel dizzy and Father had kept saying he needed to keep his strength up and so now he was eating and drinking again. Father wasn’t sure when it was safe or not, but he had said the fact that the Blade hadn’t killed him yet meant that he wasn’t going to.

Kore didn’t think Father was really sure, though. That was the thing about growing up; you learned when your parents were lying.

Not yet, Mal. Father was a hovering blue form, fading in and out above Atton’s head. It took a lot for him to appear like that, so he must be serious. But soon, I think.

“I wanted to take you to Yu-Phaedra.” The murderer who was his new surrogate guardian (according to Father--at least until soon happened) folded his arms and leaned back in his chair, whistling. “But just when you think you’re out, they pull you back in. You don’t want to know what happens when you refuse a direct order…” He shook his head. “Nightmares. They get in your head.”

“They, who?” Kore asked.

“Monsters,” Atton said. “I thought your old dads Malak was bad. But they’re worse.” He paused. “Don’t think she knows about you, at least. Count yourself lucky for that.”

It's possible he's just insane, Father added. He received one coded comm transmission yesterday, but there has been no other contact.

Maybe he sees ghosts, too.

Kore felt Father’s surprise at the thought, mixed with a little bit of approval. You could be right.

“Hey,” a voice said softly, from behind Kore, startling all of them— even Father, who fizzled out of existence before popping in again practically on top of the green Twi'lek lady, who herself hadn’t been there a milli ago. Like she’d had a stealth belt or been hiding in the Force--

“Zory?” Atton's voice cracked a little, and he went dead in the Force, like he’d become invisible too— except he wasn’t. “Thought you died.”

“Zoriis,” the woman corrected him, like they weren’t as much friends as Atton thought. “I would say the same, Jaq, but my orders mentioned you specifically. It seems they have need of your talents.” She frowned, as if she’d just noticed Kore. “Didn't realize you'd have a 'friend.'”

She made the word ugly, and Atton snarled a little, as if he were as insulted as Kore was.

“I'm not little.” Kore wasn't. He was as tall as this Twi'lek lady, and almost as tall as Atton (or Jaq). “And we aren’t friends. Not like you mean. Why are you calling him Jaq?”

“Blade Three of Acknahar’tah’s unwieldy,” the woman said, staring at him with a distracted frown. “We gave ourselves nicknames on assignments. I always liked Jaq. I had a pet tusk cat, once. I called him that too.”

“Right.” Atton (or Jaq) rolled his eyes. “You and me, Zory, we'll always have Cinnegar. Where'd you end up, anyways? Nobody seemed to know.”

“Tatooine.” She grimaced, flicking a lekku back. “Then I got recalled to you-know-where.”

“Huh.” Atton shrugged. “What were you doing on the dust ball?”

“Wasting time waiting on a delivery.” Lady Zoriis shrugged. “Now it seems someone's reactivating the Blades— and their handlers.” Her head turned toward Kore again. “Orders have changed, though. Conversion department’s been sarlaaced. No more collecting padawans. Guess that’s a tough break for you, ki--”

Move, Mal!

But Kore was moving already, even before Father's blue shimmer got between him and the Twi'lek lady, and then he was ducking under the table, behind Jaq-Atton, even as Jaq-Atton threw his drink in the Twi'lek lady's face--

The lightsaber she'd drawn was funnily short, like it was meant for a kid. And Kore wished with all his heart he still had his, but he was rolling back now, muscles tensed, edging toward the door.

The door had been open before, but it wasn't now. It was locked. Like she’d locked it before she ambushed them.

Open, he thought at it, waving his hands a little desperately.

There was a snikt sound behind him, then a thud, and then a hand clasped down hard on his shoulder and Korrie screamed.

“Fracking Sith,” Atton said. When Kore looked back, Lady Zoriis was on the floor with a red line across her throat and blood coming out. Atton was coiling some kind of laser whip back into its case—what Kore thought had just been a funny bracelet all this time. “Arrogant enough to brag about their plans. Same as they ever was.” He sat back down, a little unsteady, and Kore noticed the ‘saber burn on his leg. “If you’re gonna do something, just do it, kid. Don’t waste time playing.”

Now? Kore asked Father.

Not yet. Father sounded uncertain. I hadn’t expected him to save you.

XXX

A/N version with types added since beta. A thousand thanks, Ether. Typos not on you.
“Hello!” Valkorion arranged the Human woman’s features to seem kind and unassuming. “Are you the lady of the house?”

“Might be. What’s this about?” Dark eyes squinted, taking in his harmless round shape. Molla Organa had a blaster at her hip, and an infant in her arms—presumably, the child of Polla and Seiran Wen… what was its name again? Valkorion couldn’t remember if he’d ever been told.

“I’m selling Perma-ware.” Sydax’s features seemed to want to smile beneath her goggles, as if this null existed in a state of permanent happiness. Perhaps she did. Such simple creatures his bodies were—mere amoebas in the ocean of eternity.

“Gah,” the baby on her hip told him gravely, shaking his head.

It was unfortunate, Valkorion thought, that the amoebas were revolting. Again.

“Don’t see any Perma-ware samples.” By the Ancients, Molla Organa was a suspicious one!

“I have a brochure….” It had not occurred to Valkorion to bring one, but he made the vessel lie about it easily. “My name is Sydax, Meez Organa. I’m from Chassna.”

“Right.” The woman and the child in her arms both had Polla’s traitorous glare. “How do you know my name?”

“Isn’t this the Organa farm?” He tilted Sydax’s head to the side like a quizzical nerf.

“Might be… but… we don’t want whatever you’ve got.” Molla Organa was stooped and wrinkled, with silver hair twisted into one of those top-knots. Looking at her, it was quite easy to imagine how the passage of time would affect her daughter—given the opportunity.

“Oh, ho! Did they truly think the Deralian was dead? “Polla Organa?” Best be sure.

“Get out,” the Organa matriarch barked. “Bolts! Load the door-cannon!”

Mechanical gears creaked above poor Sydax’s head.
“Mercy,” Valkorion chuckled. “When you say daughter, do you mean Polla Organa? She isn’t dead yet—”

White light seemed to explode in Sydax’s brain before it all went away—

—and then Valkorion was——preparing more vessels for his Kiss on Manaan, a process that took hours, but made all sixteen of his gill-bodies quiver with anticipation—

XXX

Had it been up to him, Canderous would have waited, but his wives gave an ultimatum. One sun’s rotation and they would be gone. He’d already given word to the kids to pack up the camp.

But he had to tell Revan himself.

Canderous found her approaching the Ebon Hawk like a general leading a rag-tag army. The nastaar was hovering close, far too close for his liking, and Onasi looked like he’d been punched in his shebs. Speaking of shebs, Fur-sheb was there, too—alive and well and in a normal place, Canderous would have taken the time for a hand-clasp and a silent verse to see another of their own alive—but there was so little time left.

And she came first.

“Need to talk, Revan.” He planted himself like a barricade between the row of tents and her ship. “Now. Alone.”

“Of course.” Revan nodded, stepping to the side. Her rag-tag army stopped, too. The nastaar shot him a glare, which was easy enough to ignore. Polla and Seiran Wen had no business being in this place, and Onasi was frowning suspiciously, like they hadn’t all been to hell and back a dozen times, forged bonds of beskar-gam that could never be broken. Where Revan had acquired a Houck and Arkanian was a question for later. Canderous had seen the reports of a Houck coming in with some of the latest refs, but the Arkanian—

Kriff it. The Arkanian could wait.

“Wait here,” Revan told the others. “Don't go to the Hawk without me.”

“Don't be too long.” Onasi kissed her inappropriately, like he was staking his claim. Revan didn't object and Canderous had to avert his eyes—which only brought him face to face with the nastaar again.

“Of course, Fragment.” The nastaar raised an eyebrow, ignoring their display to stare back at Canderous, instead. Her gaze reminded him of a hunting wraid, waiting to pounce. “We’ll wait for you before we retrieve the box.”

“If it's even there. I went over every meter of that ship before,” the real Polla Organa muttered, half under her breath. “Would have noticed something valuable.”

“You must have overlooked it.” The nastaar shrugged.

Revan's movements seemed stiff, probably due to her injury, but when she detached herself from Onasi, she didn't give the aruetii the dignity of a response.
Canderous led her away from the others, to where the ridge of the plateau stretched away from the dar’jett Dark Temple looking out on the sea of blasted forest below. He weighed his words carefully. She deserved truth—no matter what she had become. Hells, she deserved better than what Canderous could offer. So had Lin, when he thought about it—no matter how many times Aemelie and Gwen had recited the Machinist's Creed—no matter what truths Sinae had said about them both.

“So? You look like someone kicked your lost akk pup.” Revan’s smile was strained, her face shiny with sweat, skin too pale, even for her. Undying, Sinae had said. She didn't look it. Looked all too mortal. Like the nastaar had hurt her worse than he’d believed.

“The Clans cannot help you.” Might as well spit it out.

“But you are helping—you have been a great help. I don't expect you to do more…” her voice trailed off. “You know we're not... we're not going to go off together and conquer... planets.”

I do now. A sad thought, although a part of him had always known. She had the spirit for it, but not the fire—not since the Star Forge. And in his heart of hearts, Canderous thought she wasn’t the only one whose fires had dimmed since those glorious days.

“I swore an oath to follow you,” he continued. “That's personal. That doesn't end no matter what you are. But my people—”

“No matter what I—” her voice broke off. “I'm still me. And I don't remember ever asking for an oath.”

“We take vows privately. I had no reason to speak of it before.”

“And now?”

“Now you are... arusuul’m’a.” He could see from her expression that she did not understand.

“Stagnant?” Her nose wrinkled as translated the word into Basic.

“Undying. Deathless. Unchanging.” Those were better words than the one she had used. “Something that flesh is not.”

Revan was not stupid. She had seen how the others spoke about those machine-ships, and about Lin. It only took her a moment to figure it out.

“I know that your people have a… prohibition against autonomous machines. You navigate with manual jump points. But you do use auto-targeting programs. Cybernetic enhancements. Hells, your wives had no problem with Mission’s help on Coruscant—and you've got that regeneration implant in your skull. So it's not all machines you're afraid of.” Her laugh sounded forced. “Do you think I'm a machine?”

From her face, she knew better.

“We fear nothing. My implant stimulates an immune response. And Gwen thought Mission was just a clever astromech. But you… Sinae showed me the proof. Your cells… repair themselves. It is a technology we have seen before.”

Without proof Canderous could have denied it. He would have denied it, even though he’d seen her fight that Sith on Korriban, seen her rise from a blow there that should have felled her. He'd seen her fight back, leeching power itself from the Sith’s dying bones.
Clan law could not be denied.

“So?” Revan looked like she was desperately trying to think of a joke.

“So you cannot die. You cannot end. Your children are denied their death songs of you, and each season they will grow and—” he tried to think of what she could understand. “Seasons change, Revan. You will not.”

“Did you miss the plan to freeze me in carbonite?” Her voice was acid.

“You can't trust the aruetii.”

“You call her a traitor?” Her eyebrow raised. “I don't trust her, either, but I do… I believe her.”

“You should shoot her.”

“I'd miss.” She smiled at him, that feral mask that turned her into the warrior he knew so well.

“I meant—make an end. She should have died long ago.”

“She did.” That mask hardened. “I wish it was that simple, Canderous.” A trickle of blood came from her nose and she wiped it absently. “Don't touch her.”

“She's your kill.”

“She's my… she's Revan.” Her hand was at her side as if it pained her. The heavy metal collar around her neck was new, but looked like the one she'd worn on Kashyyyk. A Force-blocking device. “She's Korrie's mother.”

The nastaar was not the mother of Revan's son, but it was none of his business. “I came to tell you why we must go. We'll leave you supplies. A ship—”

A wry smile pulled at her mouth. “I understand.”

“It would not be my choice. We were not always so… rigid.” He owed her the tale. “As recently as my own boyhood, in the Krath wars with Ulic Qel Droma as an ally, we harnessed the walking sleep of more than two dozen war basilisks. I have told you the tale of riding one, dropping down into the atmosphere, a glorious battle in skies—”

“I told you I wanted one, yes. You said that was impossible.”

“They no longer exist—not like they did. We copied the pattern for drop ships we still use today, but the originals were destroyed. Something that cannot change does not understand seasons.” Did she?

“What happened to them?”

“Another war.” Mandalorian might against the machines. A war on sand, fought with beskar-sharp swords and fire. An internecine civil war, which ended in a rain of metallic ash that poisoned the Weis moon, and left clan survivors only too aware of the dangers of intelligent machines.

Revan knew him well enough not to press for detail. Still, that line crept between her brows. “But they were just weapons, things your people created—”

“No.” Canderous loved the clans more than his own wives, but he would not raise them higher than they deserved. “They were a thing we stole. From creatures who had been made of metal, not flesh. The Basilisk race imbued metal shells with their own minds. The machines possessed all of their…” He struggled for the Basic definition. “Battle-lust. But with no temper for their enemies in defeat, or preservation of resources. No time of peace. No change, Revan.”

“You’re comparing me to a Basilisk War Droid.” Her mouth twitched. “Huh.”

“He’s not wrong.” The aruetii’s voice interrupted from behind Canderous. She had followed them, trailed by the Deralian smuggler Aemelie was so fond of. “You are much better-looking, of course.”

Polla Organa's laughter sounded nervous. “Was that a joke, Bossypants? Didn't know you had it in you.”

“This is a private conversation.” Revan wiped at her bleeding nose, glaring at the woman who possessed her face. “What do you want?”

“We are out of time for private conversations. Leskal was just telling us there have been wideband reports of Sleeper sightings all over the Rim—even a few in the Core.”

“Where?” It galled Canderous to ask one like the nastaar. Leskal had given him a report less than an hour ago, but none of the Undying ships had been in Core space then. How in all hells could they travel so quickly? Or was the aruetii lying? Surrupetiously, he glanced down and traced a query to the boy. The response shot back almost instantly, proving that his young warrior was paying attention.

And that the nastaar told the truth.

“Ships near Alderaan. Byss…” the nastaar's voice softened slightly, listing more Core worlds, along with the Rim. Fat ones Canderous had once dreamed of sacking himself. But dreams die.

“I-I know.” Revan rubbed her temples. “I-I can still hear them.”

“You’re wearing a Force collar.” The aruetii blinked. “That shouldn’t be possible.”

“You shouldn't be possible, but here you are.” Revan straightened to battle-readiness, glaring at her opponent.

“You know what this means.”

“That you were right? That I need to freeze myself to stop them?”

“I thought the collar would buy more time. It shouldn't be possible for the Sleepers to reach you without the Force—”

“Want me to tell them it’s not fracking possible?” Revan looked at Canderous again. “I understand that you have to go, old friend.” She swallowed. “But I need one favor. If I… there's one thing you have to do for me.”

One favor. He wanted to object to the finality in her voice. He wanted to say he would not leave at all. But Canderous could not deny the clans—not if he wished to lead them, and… he did wish that. He had taken the mask of Mand'alor. He had set his clan above the others. He had vowed to help them prosper.

He would not take it back. “Of course, Revan.”
She did not ask the others to leave, but at least they had the presence of mind to stay silent while she whispered her final request in his ear.

It was what he had expected. Revan was unpredictable in battle, but never in matters of the heart. She drew back from him gracefully, her eyes fixed to his face—as certain of him as he was of her.

“No guarantees.” Canderous smiled. “He's as stubborn as you are.”

She nodded. “I seem to recall you're pretty good with tranks. And the… the… change of scenery might help—might help everyone.”

“Your cousin's got a place with us already. He earned it. But we'll get them all out. You have my word.”

He left the rest unsaid. Her battle songs would be glorious. Her end was her choice.

Over Revan's shoulder, the nastaar didn't have the decency to look away. Canderous wished Revan had just asked him to shoot her like a sensible person, instead of kidnapping free people who might have other plans. “Any other instructions?” He asked hopefully, but Revan just shook her head.

Abruptly, Onasi himself emerged from a cluster of trees. Canderous edged his estimation of the man's surveillance skills up a notch, and nodded.

“You okay, beautiful?” the man asked Revan.

“Let's go find my box now,” the aruetii snapped. Impatient. Like she was the one running out of time.

“I'll tag along.” He had other things to do—breaking camp in a day was not easy, and the unblooded kids would need close supervision, but Canderous would be damned if he left his friends alone with the nastaar and her gibberish.

And, if this was truly Revan's end, he would see her to it.

Xxx

The handsome troch ensign gazed up at Millifar beseechingly. The skin around his orbital socket was just starting to bruise where her fist had knocked it. “Please?” he whispered, holding out his bound arms to her like a wedding gift.

“I already promised to untie you,” Millifar reminded him. “After you tell me how to create a wideband signal on this primitive communications board.”

In truth, the board was not primitive—indeed, its ten rows of flashing lights and multiple knobs offered a degree of complexity even more extensive than the Aleema's nav board. But Millifar did not require the ability to send secure transmissions to an entire fleet—merely one planet—and these controls were unfamiliar.

“Is Ensign Krista okay? Please. Untie me and I-I'll do anything you want! I'll even say she attacked first!”

“I misled you earlier,” Millifar confessed, walking over to the unconscious Krista, who managed to look startled—even snoring through her broken nose. “Although your mutual offer of an assignation was flattering, I merely needed to place a call. I allowed you both to bring me here under a false flag of pretenses. Next time, think with something other than your genitals.”
Fillis let out an indignant squawk—
—and Millifar dragged his trussed and kicking carcass around to the far corner of the room, unbuckling her belt with her flesh hand. Her metal arm lifted his entire weight easily, leaving him dangling in the air. It was useful, to have the artificial strength. “Are you going to be quiet, troch?”

“N-n—”

She dropped him on the duraplate decking where he made a satisfying thud and then looped her belt around his face, pulling back his lips so that it blocked his mouth so that he could not scream before she untied his hands. “Make the comm-board work,” she ordered. “Set it for a wide-band transmission. I will enter the codes.”

“Mmmmmfff,” Fillis said, which could have been yes. She pulled him to his feet and he clumsily flipped a few switches.

“Mmmmf?” Fillis added again hopefully.

“No,” she told him. “I lied.” Then, Millifar used his own stunstick to shock him into unconsciousness again.

Republics were such fools, assigning guards who thought with their shebs and not their heads. Fillis and Krista should have just had their shereshek between themselves on their break time, instead of asking her to get involved… she’d merely asked some basic questions about military technique——and then the opportunity had presented itself.

The comm-code flashed green and Millifar sighed with relief, although it seemed to ring for an honor age before the blue image of her mother’s face appeared.

“Daughter!” The First Wife of Ordo had a cut on her forehead that was new, and a smile on her face that Millifar echoed back on her own. “We sang a death song for you.”

“I am honored, Mother, but not dead. I was captured by Republics.”

“Captured?” Gwenarius, First Wife of Ordo, frowned, dabbing at her eyes. “For all this time? Why haven’t you escaped?”

“I was waiting until we arrived at the proper Sith planet. They are traveling to meet with Father’s fleet. I think they plan on war.”

“Never let your enemy plan the war,” her mother chided, as if Millifar hadn’t learned these lessons before she grew breasts. “You should be comming your father, not me.”

“The troch Admiral tried earlier to reach him and Revan, but the receivers in that sector were dead.”

“They are operational again, now,” her mother chided. “You should have tried him first—or Aemelie—”

But I wanted you, Mai. “The Republics think Revan and father’s attacks knocked out most of the wide-band transceivers in the Outer Rim. I wasn’t sure I’d be able to get through—”

Mother raised an eyebrow. “Revan’s attacks? Your fathers? No.” She shook her head. “This was not their doing, this was the work of the living machines. Have you established a plan for your escape?"

“Really? Machines, Mother?” Did her mother really mean that figments from a babe’s nightmare could have wiped out the relays and devastated Sith space?

“Wipe the laughter from your voice. It is no joke.”

A Basilisk fleet? There was nothing funny about that! “Then what are father and Revan doing to stop—”

“Your father and Second Wife are preparing to leave Imperial Space. If you don't escape soon you will miss their departure. Are you armed? Have you located provisions? A suitable ship? Make sure to check the fuel gauge—”

“Mother! My jailors said we would be leaving hyperspace today. I will stow aboard one of their clumsy fighters and take it when the Great Hunt arrives at the Sith planets.”

“And if Aemelie’s fighters accidentally shoot from the sky when you make your approach? What then?” Her mother shook her head. “You should have escaped earlier!”

But I didn't know where to go. “Then I would send a distress call—”

“No.” Mother leaned forward, her enthusiasm for planning Millifar’s life obviously overtaking her reason. Somewhere behind her, one of the babes was laughing.

“But Mai—”

“I said no. Find another way. An escape pod, perhaps. Your father would never shoot an unarmed pod. But comm him, too, and stay away from the First Wife of Lin—”

“You want me to stay away from General Revan—?”

“Am I interrupting something?” The voice came from behind her and Millifar nearly jumped out of her skin.

“Milli? Is someone th—”

“Just… ah… bed games,” Millifar stammered, hitting the disconnect on the board with her elbow, as she turned around to face the white-haired Jettai she’d only seen before from a distance. Master Atris, she was called. Side-stepping put Millifar too close to the unconscious jailers. “The ensigns are just… resting.”

Master Atris blinked. “I see.” Her Mandalorian was less accented than Revan of Lin's and she looked far less trusting. Historically, Force-users had been known to believe absurdities, but this Jettai did not appear convinced.

Still, Millifar smiled and shrugged. “I had an excellent teacher. That is why the ensigns are so exhausted now.” She set her chin high. “If you will excuse me—”

“Are you frightened?” The woman had a smile that probably would have frightened Mother's babes, but Millifar had seen worse. “We Jedi don't bite, you know.” She knelt beside the unconscious woman, resting a slightly-glowing blue hand on Ensign Krista’s broken nose. “Did you punch her with your flesh hand? Or the metal?”
Wasn't it obvious? “I didn't want to kill her.”

“I know.” Master Atris rose to her feet again, tilting her head slightly to examine Millifar again. “You're very pretty, but I doubt your clan-mothers would approve of this.”

“It is not my fault these soldiers were stupid.” Despite herself, Millifar took a step back. There was a light in Master Atris's eyes that reminded her of the way Ensign Krista had looked at her—but even more predatory. Unsettling, in one so old. “I needed the comm-unit.”

“And to escape from your cage.” Master Atris's nose was so fine and thin it looked like it would shatter. She took another step forward and Millifar took another step back. “You don't have to fear me, Millifar of Ordo.”

“I fear no Jett.” But that wasn't true. Sometimes when Millifar closed her eyes she still saw him—Oerin Lin—a walking corpse as he had been in those tunnels beneath Katarr.

Hairs prickled on the back of her neck. Why would she think of him now?

Master Atris smiled, nodding at the unconscious ensigns. “You realize you've broken your chains early, Millifar of Ordo? We're still hours away from Dromund Kaas. Did you truly expect to evade a shipwide alarm until we leave hyperspace?”

“Yes.” She had taken Ensign Krista's sidearm, but the weak weapon would be useless against the Force-user. Millifar considered the conduit line running a few meters to their right, along the wall and across the ceiling. She took a few steps in that direction, but something froze her hand. Not like dar’jett magic. Her fingers flexed, but she had lost the reason for using them. What could a blaster do against a Jettai? Abruptly, a feeling of hopelessness overwhelmed her. “I was going to conceal myself in one of their snubfighters' storage lockers. Then, I could overpower their crew—”

Her voice broke off. Why was she telling this troch her plans?

A white eyebrow lifted. “I agree that might work. But I have a better idea. Would you like to hear?”

Despite herself, she answered. “Yes, Master Atris.” What Millifar would like was to be in her own snub, far from this troch prison heading back to her people, but the ensigns were still unconscious and the woman seemed fond of her own voice, so she nodded again and took another step toward the conduit.

“Where are you going?” Master Atris asked. “I think it would be best if you stay by my side for now, Millifar of Ordo.”

“I will stay by your side. It would be best if I stay—” Millifar frowned, because for a moment, that almost made too much sense—

“No! I will not fall for more tricks!” Millifar fired quickly, but the infernal magic-user had already moved—and abruptly, Millifar found her limbs frozen, and her stolen sidearm pulled out of her flesh hand and then suspended in mid-air.

“Hard heads. Di’kut Mando'ade!” Master Atris sounded amused as she tapped something on her wrist. “Bridge? I need a security detail sent to my location. Your Mandalorian prisoner seems to have escaped.” Her thin lips stretched upward as she clicked the comm off again, not even bothering for a response, switching back into Mandalorian. “It is true that your ferocity would make your clan-mothers proud. But you show poor judgement, daughter of Ordo.” Invisible fingers seemed to tighten around Millifar's neck and she felt the air squeeze from her lungs as her vision started to blur. “What were you thinking? Never attack a dar'Jettai at close range. You will always lose.”

Dar-jett—? Millifar had just enough time to wonder why the master of the Jettai Council would name herself no longer a Jettai before darkness claimed her.

Xxx

Totally lonely, sitting on a field surrounded by dull, dead ships. After they'd landed, Polla Revan had skived off with the rest of the crew like Mission didn’t even matter, leaving her alone for days.

Being trapped in one consciousness, existing in a singular metal shell was stifling—not to mention, unfair. Above Mission's metaphorical head, the Awakened Ones soared, free as a flock of migrating birds. Occasionally, a few blipped out into hyperspace, arriving almost instantly at their targets, tunneling through the fabric of spacetime like arthropods. Some of the holes left in their wake would become new hyperspace routes for rubes who came after—if their clumsy organic brains managed to find the paths in the first place—and if they were brave enough to try them. But those organics would never soar as fast or as free as the Awakened. Flesh would always melt and die.

Mission had been lucky to leave her own flesh behind—even if she didn't feel very lucky now.

If it hadn’t been for the nets suddenly switching back on, Mission thought she would have expired from loneliness after her eight millionth game of solitaire sabacc. But Kaas had control of everything. All Mission could do was watch while the Kaas computer and the Awakened Ones jumped all over the feed like Gamorrean pig-men at a trough, leaving Mission to glimpse in pieces all the intel they cared about: rumors of war, rumors of Revan, planetary defense grids that were laughably obsolete, Rakatan installations across the galaxy that stupid Kaas thought it could power back up again—and that the Awakened Ones vowed to destroy—

One newly-awakened installation on Nar Shaddaa caught Mission's eye—just because of the name it was pinging (in Rakatan) back to Kaas—

HandsomeSithboy79? What were the odds?

The odds were stupid-to-two. Those creepy twin meat versions of her were sentimental, apparently. And now Mission knew where they’d gone. To Nar Shaddaa. The Smuggler's Moon. At the ass-end of the galaxy.

Mission tried to calculate probabilities that the creepy twins might also be responsible for the scam that had fleeced Mission for several million— because who else would have had the choobs to stiff her scary shell company?

She was running algorithms on what ‘Go-To’ could stand for when her organics finally came back. At first, they were just voices in the dark. Then, Polla Revan and her gang started tearing the Ebon Hawk apart. Like Mission still didn't matter.

None of them even bothered to say hi!

“Hey! Welcome back, Revan!” the fake Mission sang out over the speakers. “Would you like to see the tomb now? You should go there!”

“Shut that thing off,” Polla Revan snapped at someone. That thing. Yeah that faker wasn’t “Don’t look at me like that, Earth,” Polla Revan added. “I told you—it’s not her anymore.”

In Canderous’s room Mission made the camera feed switch on and off, blinking like an eye. It was the only circuit she could control; the only eye through which she could see. Aside from that, she only had a feed into the passive sensors set along the Hawk’s internal and external comm systems to give her a clue about what was going on.

{{Target acquired}} one of the Awakened Ones signaled. {{Recommence bombing of the Handsome Sithboy79 Installation? Y/n}}

{{Hold}} whispered another one. {{Display target to Starfire Unit first}}

Handsome Sithboy. Where was he, anyway?

[“What are you guys trying to do?”] Mission asked. [“Start a war with the Hutts? That’s nuts.”]

{{Cleanse it all in fire}} an Awakened One murmured back.

{{Hold}} another one whispered. Slightly less bloodthirsty than the others. {{She must see. She must know. Her pain will be our prize—}}

Slightly less bloodthirsty and a lot more sadistic. They were all assholes.

{{I CANNOT CONTROL THEM}} Kaas added. It was talking to Revan, but Mission knew it wanted her to hear too. {{ONLY YOU CAN STOP THIS, STARFIRE UNIT—}}

[“I will convince her.”] Fake Mission sounded fake, like a real machine, not even as self-aware as Kaas or those dumb ships.

“You nerfherding chivholes! How can I convince her when she can’t hear me?” Screaming into the void was seriously overrated.

“Mission?” At least Big Z’s familiar yowl really made Mission’s day. Finally! Someone noticing her.

“Big Z! You’re alive!” Mission heard her voice coming through the speaker in the cockpit as the Wookiee’s familiar, shaggy steps made their way there. “Hey! Have you seen Revan, by any chance?”

“She is searching for a box the other one said is necessary. In your cargo bay,” he whined.

“Oh!” Mission’s voice chirped back. “What kind of box? She should look in that Dark Temple over there!”

“That’s a trap!” Mission added for real, but no one heard. Sleemo evil computer had taken her voice when it took her eyes. “She’s not me!” Mission could swear her processors made her virtual lips move, her lekku twitch... but the link in Canderous’s bunk just wasn’t connected to anywhere they could see.

“There was a box from Korriban. It was on the Hawk...” the big guy’s voice trailed off as he went back toward the cargo bay. A few seconds later, she heard crashing noises, as if her old pal was rummaging through crates in there. Again. “I do not know what to look for! Mission, do you remember the box from Korriban? You had Carth's cub carry it for you—”

“Sure!” Mission's voice sang out. “Hey, Revan? Your box is in the tomb!”

“Rulan? Can you figure a way to shut that thing off?” Polla Revan's buzzed close to a speaker somewhere in Mission's secondary bay.

“Rulan? Rulan Prolik?” What were the odds?

“Come to the tomb!” Her own voice grew louder, drowning out the others. “Revan? Come to the tomb. If you don't come to the tomb, they're gonna blow up everything! Hey, sis, come to the t—”

The speaker cut out abruptly with a squawk—unfortunately taking Mission's perception of that half of her ship with it.

“Assholes.” It hurt that Revan was more interested in this dumb box than Mission. “I remember your dumb box. But did you ask me? No.”

Of course Mission remembered the box! Special day. Not just for the box, which had been sealed up and useless and she’d nearly forgotten about... before the creepy twins brought it up. Somehow, the dumb box had made it to Tatooine. And then stupid T’chrrrmak’tahk’lænjšëw and the real Nico Senvi had changed places, made the twins, and tried to take over the galaxy before the twins and Lena got that ancient Rakatan wannabe god but good.

Yeah, Mission remembered the box, alright. Mostly because of that day. That day had been special because of Handsome Sithboy and her first kiss.

XXX

Sithboy79’s real name was Dustil Freaking Onasi. A little weird, that the cute Sith was Carth’s long-lost son, but after about twenty minutes, (and half a bottle of stolen ice wine), Mission had gotten over the weirdness.

He was still handsome. By Human standards, they weren't even related.

“What’s in this thing?” Sithboy79 asked for the third time. Lugging the mysterious box she’d gotten from the shady Rodian really showed off those fuzzy Human muscles of his. Mission couldn’t tell they were fuzzy when he was wearing that stupid uniform, but she’d seen him in the fresher before. “Permacrete rocks?”

“Some crap for Acolyte Organa. You know how it is.”

“I know you mean Darth Revan,” he muttered. Dustil shifted the box on his shoulders, suddenly making it look a lot lighter. It occurred to Mission that Sithboy79 could probably have used the Force to make that box all floaty like Polla would have done—except maybe then she wouldn’t have gotten to see how strong he was.

Polla—no! Revan! she corrected her brain. Boy, it was hard to keep that straight, but Revan kept saying that’s who she was now and they all had to get used to it—even her.

“Shut up!” Mission told Sithboy. “The acolyte's ident's a need to know basis.”

“Well, she’s fracking my father,” Dustil snapped. “So I do get to know.” His arms flexed, and then he was practically holding the box above his head. Trying to impress her? Kriffing adorable.

“Right.” Mission felt herself snort, shooting him a wink and a twist of her lekku. “Darth Revan and Captain Onasi.” Big scary Darth Revan, who’d spent last night crying in her bunk—alone—and they’d all had to pretend not to hear.

“You said this thing was stolen...?” Dustil shot her a glance. “But Lurze just gave it to us.”

“It’s complicated?” No need to make him more twitchy. No need to tell him that she’d stolen this thing out from under Mask and Dead-Eyes, who were two of the creepier Sith they’d ever met on this wonderful planet. According to Lurze, a party on Tatooine wanted the mystery box to the tune of a million credits... but when Mission said she’d give it directly to Darth Revan herself he’d practically fallen over himself to dump it.

Of course, that was because he was under the impression that Darth Revan knew how to buckle her own shoes.

Mission figured her best bet would be to collect from the mark on Tatooine and leave ‘Darth Revan’ out of the loop. The poor woman had enough on deck with rescuing Bastila, killing Malak, that loser—and maybe patching things up with poor Carth—

“You steal things a lot?” Dustil’s voice cracked, making him sound much younger. Was he staring at her chest?

“I'm the one who stole this ship,” Mission bragged, shooting him a wink. “From a dead man on Taris. Actually, I kinda stole it before he died—”

He was definitely staring at her chest. “Wow.”

She grinned, playing it cool while he huffed and puffed with a box that could have floated.

XXX

“Some Hutt on Tatooine was gonna pay me big for that box.” Mission said the words, but Big Z and Polla Revan didn't hear them. “Plus, I'm right here!” Mission added. She could almost feel Polla Revan being here, but it felt like a wall was between them. That was funny, that the Awakened Ones were screaming louder than Polla Revan right now in the Force—

[I'm right here Polla Revan can you hear me?]

[Mision—?] For a second it felt like Polla Revan had, but then that wall of ice rose between them.

“Fascinating.” Unfamiliar voice, from the lower level, deep in her circuits, speaking to someone else. Polla Revan and her team had moved all over the Hawk, dispersing themselves like space fleas. “See this, Rogere? This is the mid-point where I wired in the ghost-child's consciousness, but she's improved upon the graft. New lines running into the ship's central core, they look almost organic—”

“I don't care. Can you pull her out?” Carth, answering them. “It, I mean. Can you pull it out?”

“Pull what out?” That made Mission think of Mekel Jin, who would have made a crude joke. “Do you mean me?”

“I can try. We'll attempt to cleanse the corrupting data from the ghost-child—”
“Don’t forget I’ve got my eyes on you—any funny business—”

“Your wife trusts us, Admiral Onasi. And Zaalbar gave permission to use the T3’s original chassis for this operation.”

“My wife”— hitch of breath. “... I'm gonna check on her.”

“If you don’t mind the observation, she does not look well.”

Ghost-child? Huh. Only one sent had ever called Mission that, and he'd installed her consciousness in the Hawk —so even with the strange voice that made that guy—“Rulan Prolik? Hey!” But of course, the shapeshifter couldn't hear her, either.

Xxx

“She’s getting worse. Are you sure the collar-thing worked?” Flat Deralian drawl. At least two rooms away. Thanks to the peculiar acoustics of the Hawk —or Revan's still-Force-sensitive hearing, Polla Organa sounded like she was in the same room.

Revan's fingers closed on the Force collar, wondering if the thing was fracking broken. Everything was muted, as if she was wrapped in eridu wool, but the Force was still there —dancing just out of her reach.

And so were the ships, whispering their threats—and the Rakatan computer, answering them.

{{I CANNOT CONTROL THEM}} The voice from the tomb whispered. {{ONLY YOU CAN STOP THIS, STARFIRE UNIT—}}

“What I think is, we need to get out of here, Pollie.” Seiran's voice from the other room.

“But I promised Revan I’d show them all this ship's stashes!”

“Can’t she find them herself—” Seiran kept talking, but he’d moved away from the wall that carried their voices. His wife just laughed and promised they'd leave soon—

{{{COME TO ME}}} the voice from the tomb added. Louder than ever, now. Like a scream.

_Polla and Sei will leave soon. Lucky bastards-

“Freckles?” Carth had come back. Press of a warm hand on Revan's. They were in their old quarters—the closest place Carth had been able to drag Revan when her knees began to buckle.

“Give me a sec.” The curved surface of the Ebon Hawk's wall was solid and cold, the buzz of voices echoing through the ship giving a tie to the lives and connections that Revan had once taken for granted.

Polla Organa was right. Revan was getting worse.

_In the eye of an ion storm, time itself slows, as the jump point calculators reset to zero and instruments go to manual. Hyperspace coils retract into their safety-cages and your hands grow sweaty on the nav controls as you try and keep your ship's nose pointed straight—try even harder not to think about the shield failure, cascading neutrons, dense and hot as poison battering against your hatches—
Then time lists to starboard as you try hard not to dwell upon the thin strips of metal between you and the endless black—

“You okay, Freckles?” Carth's voice. Warm hand on hers. Asking for the hundredth time.

“Sure,” Revan lied. She opened her eyes and took another breath, trying to ignore the way her skull throbbed in fresh agony twinned to her heartbeat, the way the world flickered in and out of focus, replaced half the time by a map of stars, by jump-points—

[238188 v aurek, 8289155. Target acquired….]

[Polla Revan? Can you hear me?]

[Mission?] The Twi'lek's voice over the speakers had been a cruel joke. Now the same joke infected her mind. Revan closed her eyes, erecting a wall between them. With the collar, that should have been impossible. Should have been impossible to feel the sparks of life all around her, the planet beneath them, the voices in her head growing louder—

“If you're done resting, we should go help the others. Sounds like that Houck has taken apart the cargo Bay's entire floor.” Carth squeezed Revan's hand again.

“Yeah? I bet Dar has everything under control.” Revan had an abrupt flash of memory: Carth, the two of them, half-asleep and tangled from the night before. The last time she'd felt even remotely normal. Her body felt like an illusion, now, fragile as a ship's hull against a nova. “I… want to stay here, Carth.”

“You sure you're okay?” New lines pulled around his too-sensitive mouth. “Blocking the Force isn't helping?”

“Everything hurts.” That was true but not the real problem. When Revan looked at Carth, his image blurred, became a web of stars. “The ships are still…” she waved her hand vaguely. Her consciousness felt scattered with a thousand eyes, and each one of them projecting a faceted view of a planet beneath them—dappled white at the poles, then verging to black and ruin in the center. “They're still out there—and they want me to know it.”

“So it didn't…” his breath hitched. “You said the collar was helping.”

“It did at first. They got louder.”

The Ebon Hawk was full of voices. Someone had cut the speakers to Mission, at least—so Revan no longer had to hear the dead Twi'lek begging her to come to the tomb. Now, the ship's intercoms crackled with commands and excited shouts, as Dar'Revan directed her minions to tear the smuggling hatches apart looking for some fracking box that she claimed would save everything. Or, almost everything.

Xxx

“Will this box of yours save me?” Revan had managed to ask in the middle of the chaos.

Dar paused in mid-command to Zaalbar and the Houck, face smoothing to an eerie blankness that Revan knew only too well—from the mirror. “I'm sorry, Fragment. I can capture Tenebrae in the mind-prison, but—”

“Only I can stop the Sleepers. Right. But if I do this… this carbonite thing it will stop them—”
“It should.” Green eyes narrowed, looking at her. “Is the Force collar helping at all?”

“A little.” Not enough. Dar’s image blurred until she looked surrounded by stars—

Xxx

“Freckles?” Carth squeezed her hand and Revan opened her eyes, just trying to see only Carth and not the hyperspace jump points webbed across her vision.

“Flyboy?” The Force collar felt like a weight on her neck, but the voices still whispered in her head. “I’m sorry it didn’t work.”

“Come on, soldier! We're not dead yet!” His laugh lines crinkled bit the laughter didn't reach his eyes.

“They're out there, Carth. They want me to know what they'll do. You know they’ve reached the Core—plus strategic targets on the Outer Rim—”

[Loc. 34821848 1828189199, 828288819, 2882]

“Which planets?” That was her soldier. Not bothering to question how she knew what had to be impossible. We'll warn them! We'll—”

[Loc. 34821848 1828189199, 828288819, 2882]

That's Telos, Red. Malak’s ghost, telling Revan what she already knew.

“Telos.” She said the word out loud, watching Carth's face freeze. “One of the planets is Telos.”

How do you know? But Revan knew the answer. Malak knew because she did. The coordinates were familiar. A map of stars. Jump points aligned on a grid—some of them not even possible—

“What are they… what will they, uh….” Her soldier cleared his throat. Carth knew what they would do as much as she did. Since Canderous's crew had gotten the widebeams up, they all knew —except Revan had known already. A fleet of mad ships had wreaked havoc across a galaxy, and now lay in wait before doing it again.

Holding billions hostage. With only one demand.

“We tried.” Her temples throbbed. “Sorry it didn’t work, Flyboy.”

“Then we’ll keep trying.” His words were fervent, but Revan knew the look in his eyes. Grim acceptance, overriding the lies they told each other to stay alive.

Xxx

Mekel was already regretting asking Joetta for an assignment. But Telos was out playing Force battery, and if his girlfriend Mydia Blais called Mekel a slave one more time, he was gonna shoot her, baby or no baby.

“Hey,” Mekel said cautiously, to the bound man in the tent. His name was Zepth. He was a Zabrak. That made Mekel think of Lydie, who was probably living happily ever right about now with her rich husband, and would never think of Mekel again. “I've got your food tray right here.”
“Salutations.” The Zabrak's head bobbed up and down at him. Someone had branded the crude drawing of an eye on his forehead between the horns. His arms were covered in kolto bandages—also tied behind his back. “I'm afraid you're going to have to feed me.”

“Right.” Feed him. Just like a good slave. Mekel knelt down and placed the tray on the guy's lap, pausing to unbuckle his helm and set it to the side. Almost immediately he started to sweat. “No problem.” He picked up the spork. “So, uh… how long have you had this Emperor-possessed gig?”

“I trained for it since I was a child,” the Zabrak said. “On Dathomir, after your people sacked my planet. My aunt Marla rescued me from a slave auction and took me to the witches there, who made me a Voice.”

“Your aunt just… up and gave you to the Sith Emperor? Tough break.”

“Yes.” The Zabrak nodded. “But I bear your kind no ill will.” He chewed the glop Mekel had been given to feed him with no complaints, even if it looked a little too much like charity stew from the Unders for Mekel’s own taste.

“Why would—” oh, but then Mekel got it. “My people? No. I'm no Mandalorian. I'm Revan's cousin.”

“Oh?” The Zabrak didn't sound as impressed as Mekel had hoped he would. “I didn't know she had family.” He sounded like he was lying—or maybe that was just Mekel, wanting to think he was important.

“Just me, now. My father… he got killed.”

“I am sorry for your loss.” The Zabrak paused. “We all must meet our fate before the Force in the end.”

“Right.” Mekel picked up the spork again and guided another mouthful of meat-porridge to the Zabrak's mouth. “Fun thought. You sound so positive.”

A gulp and then another laugh. “I am a realist.”

“Sure.” Mekel gave him the hundred-cred smile Moms had taught him when he was old enough to scam marks alone in Beggar's Alley. “Me too.” He picked up the spork and kept doing his fracking job.

XXXX

The tent was empty. Dustil wasn't sure what that meant. He'd know, wouldn't he? If Mydia killed Mekel—“Dustil! My man!” A hand clapped down hard on Dustil's back and he spun around, cursing the Force for not giving him more warning.

“Phylus.” The kid was fracking lucky Dustil hadn't gutted him. “Phylus Blais. You're alive.”

“You too.” The youngest Blais gave him a kriff-handed grin from beneath his long nose. “Hope you had a better time than I did—had to sleep in the woods—and let me tell you, those Wookiees may keep you warm but the smell… I'm glad to be back in civilization... sort of civilization....” His voice kept breaking off. And he looked nervous. Even twitchier than usual.

Dustil gave him a smile he didn't mean to put him at ease. “Your sister made it, too. Mydia, I mean. Don't know about Inse. Last I saw, she was taking the Grave Bright into hyperspace.”

“Inse's alive. I think. I think I'd know if she died.” Phylus wrapped his arms around his own bony frame and shivered. “Say… uh, about Mydia….”

“I don't know where she is. Sorry, pal.” Dustil wasn't sure if he cared. Maybe she and Mekel had taken their live fracking sex show on the road. Maybe they'd eloped.

“I do. I mean, I dropped her off at the medix tent. She… uh…” Definitely something was bugging him. “Say, Dustil… ever explain to her that you weren't Lord Malak?”

He’d tried—sort of. Once or twice. But the girl was just… dumb. “She thought I was joking.” Inse had been different. Inse had sort of gotten it—at least she’d known there was a Dustil somewhere in there with Malak. Mydia wasn't stupid, exactly. Just… single-minded. “Not really. Why?”

Phylus sighed heavily. “See, she thought she was having Lord Malak's baby.”

“She—” he hadn't thought she would think like that. “That’s not how it works.”

“Mydia might have been daydreaming during our hygiene classes at the Academy. She thinks what she wants. Usually works out for her.” Phylus shrugged. “Did… uh, did you really want the kid?”

Dustil hadn’t thought of it like that. Like not having the kid was an option. The first feeling he felt was relief. “No.”

Phylus looked relieved. “Good. I was afraid you were gonna be upset.”

“Wait. Um… are you saying, she—”

“She wanted Lord Malak’s baby. Not yours.” Phylus shrugged. “Now, she’s all hell-bent on having that other guy’s kid, instead. Lord Revan’s cousin—” His voice cut out abruptly. Probably because he was suspended in the air, choking slowly on his own throat-skin. Dustil hadn’t even thought about it—it had just… it had just seemed natural.

“Lord Revan’s cousin.” Funny, Dustil hadn’t really thought about the baby being real before now. “She's bent on Lord Revan's cousin.”

He dropped Phylus Blais absently, then walked out of the tent where, for some reason, he almost puked.

For a second, the world went upside down. His breath heaved in and out.

Xxx

And then Valkorion was—

—walking with Helena Shan across a promenade—

—gasping Sydax's breaths in agony and twisting in some kind of restraining net—

A voice from above. “Jasp? She's coming to!”

“Her name's Sydax Aneeka,” a man said. Gradually, Valkorion's vision cleared enough to see a Deralian couple looking above him, the dim light of overlights above their head illuminating speckled stone. The floor was damp and chill—somewhere underground. “Says she's a baker.”

The man, Jasp Organa, was holding Sydax's purse, rifling through its contents with no regard for privacy. He handed the Chassnian's id chip to his wife.

“What would a baker from Chassna want with us?” the old woman's voice trailed off as she leveled a blaster squarely at poor Sydax's head.

“Don't say any more,” her husband warned.

His wife ignored that. “Think she's the one who killed—”

“Shhh. She's awake! Look at her eyes! They're glowing! Just like that vid!”

Some time after knocking his host out, they had removed the woman's goggles. Valkorion tried to move his hands, but the strangely elastic substance encasing them remained tight as an ionic bond.

“You can't get out,” the man said flatly. “Whatever you are.”

“And you can't get to him, either.” The woman snapped, gesturing with the blaster. “The boy’s not here. Who are you? What did you say about our Pollie?”

“She’s an impatient girl,” Valkorion told them. “Ungrateful!”

—and then he left the trapped baker from Chassna behind. Would he need her again? He rather thought not.

And then Valkorion was—

—adrift in a sea of eyes, reaching, reaching—

For Manaan! He needed to be on Manaan—

XXXX

“Wake up.” Someone was shaking Mydia's arm, which interrupted very pleasant dreams. In one, her dear sister Inse had been languishing in a Coruscanti brothel, looking extremely unhappy about being there, surrounded by dead—or unconscious—sentients. Such a fate for Inse was, Mydia thought, maybe even better than a Thulian hell.

“What’s wrong?” The Mandalorian shaking her arm was fortunate that Mydia was nice—merely Force-spinning her into one of the tent's soft walls.

“Oh!” Mydia exclaimed, realizing her error. “You're the medix, aren't you?”

“Yes,” the Mandalorian scrambled to her feet, glaring. “And you're the pregnant dar'jett I scanned before. Do not think your condition will save you, if you use your powers against me again—”

“A mistake!” It had been naught but a tickle. “No. I need your help! Please.” Her hands went to her stomach, which had already begun to swell. When she'd thought it was Malak’s baby that had been worth it, but now—

“Is something wrong with your child?” The medix asked.

“Yes.” She sniffled. “It has the wrong father.”
In the floating tank behind them, the fat pregnant lady's nipples looked almost black. Disgusting.

—and then Valkorion was—

—Manaan. One planet. Curses, why was this so difficult?

—assisting young Leeshansintina Two of House Racharn with her Aqualish homework in the body of Doctor Vivek, the Selkath advisor to House Racharn.

A Selkath at least. But control. Control was fraying, fading. Faster than should be possible—

“I hear your family has a new guest, Leeshy,” Valkorion gurgled brightly from Vivek’s body, as his voder automatically shaped the utterance into Basic (and Aqualish, which the child was quite resistant to learning). “A poor refugee from Imperial Space?”

“There’s three, but two don’t talk.” The Second of Racharn tugged at her hair, which she'd cut short in the style of her sister, Leeshansintina One. “Neely's the only one who talks. She has a pet manka. She's nice.”

“Ah yes.” He smiled. “Neely. That's right. You know, I would love to meet her!” The Blais girl's great grandmother had had a pet gundark named 'Neelo.' Valkorion had fond memories of possessing her form and riding the beast across the Southern Plains of Ygrus, on the northernmost Thuliam continent. Perhaps the name was mere coincidence, but Valkorion sometimes thought his more favored lines shared some of his memories.

How else to explain why some families remained loyal while others turned? House Blais had been both loyal and betrayers before. Sharing the sins of their forefathers—and the benevolence of his forgiveness.

Leeshy smiled. “Neely's upstairs in the solar. She likes it best up there. She's friendly. And pretty. She told me we were going to be best friends forever and ever.”

“That’s wonderful!” Obviously, Inse Blais had made excellent use of her Force compulsion with this family, despite the ysalamiri shielding in most areas of their apartments. “We'll go straightway! Oh, and just between us… have you heard from dear Korrie?”

“Just a ping to say he's okay.” Leeshy made a face. “He's not on that stupid planet with the mean kids anymore, but he didn't have time to tell me why. Do you know where Peragus Station is, Doctor Vivek?”

“Vaguely.” One of his bodies surely did. Valkorion left Vivek to gather more information whilst he turned his own attentions inward, searching for the nearest spark to Peragus—

—only to overshoot... and then he was in a concrete bunker on Ziost, watching Lord Basile pace back and forth. When had the traitorous Zeltron left Kaas for Ziost? No matter, he was here now—

“Their snubs are flying formation, but not firing, sir.”

“There’s nothing left for them to bomb!”

“And no word from Dromund Kaas?” The Zeltron asked his Second-in-command—what was the fool's name?
“Everything's down—”

Valkorion possessed a guardsman here. The man's name was Rico, and he had been in service long enough to have a hollowed-out place from which his Emperor and savior could peer out through the windows of his eyes, relatively untrammeled by the man's idle impulses, or outside engagement. His friends probably thought him slow-witted or just quiet…but given enough time, they all became like Rico, after a few centuries, entire worlds of them—

There are always other worlds. Although of late, it was so difficult to find the right people.…

—oh, but speaking of that! Manaan! And then he was—

And then Valkorion was—

Xxx

“… and so we’re… uh, doing stuff, but he's so much more powerful than I ever can be? And it sucks. I guess, not as much as being possessed by some immortal asshole and not having a real life like you—” Mekel's voice broke off as if something had just occurred to him. “Wait—uh, when you were talking about your childhood before. You said your aunt Marla took you to the Sith? During a Mandalorian raid?”

“After the raid,” Zepth corrected him. “The day after.”

“Your aunt Marla took you away from your moms and your sibs. Attina, Gulla, and—”

“Lydyloo. Yes.”

“Lydie-llu.” Frack, she'd even told him her family had called her that. “Your aunt Marla was a Jedi? Your surname's Korr. Right?”

“Both of those things are true.” The Zabrak sounded puzzled. “Did you know my aunt?”

“My cousin killed her. I uh, I knew her a little, but Lydie… you're Lydie's long-lost brother. Zepth! She told me about you.”

“You know Lydie-llu?”

“Sure. She's fantastic. Gorgeous. We fra…. Abruptly, Mekel remembered Master Yuthura's etiquette lessons. “We fraternized. A lot. She married this senator from Coruscant. She's… uh, she's….” His mind went off for a second, remembering the way she'd just taken off her robe, like it was nothing and just reached for his hand.

Zepth chuckled. “Oh?”

“Yeah, she's… I don't know where they went off to, but she's fine. Safe.”

“No one is safe.” The kid was really gloomy. Sounded like he had something caught in his throat.

Mekel reached for the water bulb. “Well, with Loanin protecting her, she's pretty close—”

“Oh, my dear boy.” A chuckle. “The surety of youth! I wish I could bottle it.”

Mekel looked up, abruptly realizing the Zabrak's eyes had begun to glow red. “Shit!” He jumped to his feet. “Uh, stay like that! Just like that! I'm supposed to get Re—”

“Not on my side.” Another laugh. “Bezal-bonded to Dustil Onasi?”

“I-I was.” That girl who had stabbed Mekel and stolen Dustil away. The Emperor had been in her, too. The man possessing Zepth had been laughing while Mekel almost died. “You mean, uh… Lord Malak—”

“No.” The voice was old and cold and terrible. It made Mekel's blood freeze and his bowels loosen. “Do you think me a fool, boy? I was in Malak's mind. I rode his thoughts. I sensed him there with you both at first… but that ended when your bond was broken. The day you killed me.”

“Oh.” _Oh, frack._ Telos had been so fracking smug about snowing the Emperor… and he hadn't?

“What I find curious…” the man chuckled. “Is that I have no idea how you broke your Bezal-bond. They are _meant_ to be unbreakable.”

“You… you know about bonds?” Mekel swallowed. He thought the man's Force compulsion had faded, but he still…

The Zabrak's face beamed. “You have a question.”

“Yes.” Not Force compulsion. Later, Mekel was sure of that—sure it was _him_ who wanted to ask. It wasn't that he'd been tricked. Easier to live with things if he had… if it had been a trick. But in that moment—all he had wanted was to have the Force back. To have Dustil’s strength in the Force again, to feel the Telosian’s mind. To know what the man he still thought as his own better half thought. “You know about Bezal bonds?”

“Lord Bezal was attempting to become as I am. Of course I do.” The body was Lydie's _brother_, but the voice, the mind—

Mekel swallowed. “Then… do you know how to bring a Bezal-bond _back_?”

Laughing, the possessed Zabrak smiled at him and nodded.

XXX

Canderous had been helping Fur-Sheb take apart a section of ceiling in the medical bay when his comm flashed wideband, in a code meant only for him.

“_Our daughter lives,_” Gwen transmitted. “_Even if she been too incompetent to escape her captors. Yet._”

Canderous ignored the critique of his eldest living child, for it was a mother’s way to find fault. Millifar _lived_. She was not lost. She had battles yet to be won and children yet to be born.

“Hey, Fur-Sheb, put that hammer down.” The Wookiee was already roaring his congratulations as Canderous told him the news. “This deserves a drink.”

The two of them broke into Revan and Onasi’s room with Canderous's last bottle of Althiri firewater.
Revan and the pilot looked up from opposite ends of their marriage bed.

“Ever hear of knocking?” the pilot began.

“Gwen just commed,” Canderous’s jubilation at the news overrode his sense of decorum. “Millifar’s alive. Captured by Republics. Gwen said to watch for an escape pod when Rensha’s besom fleet makes orbit.”

“Makes orbit here?” Onasi blinked like a man waking from a dream. “High Admiral Rensha’s coming here?”

“Yes.” Canderous shrugged, and behind him Zaalbar yowled, backing him up—even if Canderous could still only understand about a quarter of what Fur-Sheb was saying. “Just like Republics—picking meat from the carcass after the battle is over. But even trosh should be able to handle clean-up. You’ll have to keep your Imperial ships from engaging them, of course....” his voice trailed off as neither Revan or Carth looked excited.

“Millifar’s alive.” Revan’s eyes were unfocused and she still looked like hell. “Good... good news.”

“You smell bad, Polla Revan,” Zaalbar barked.

“I am sick, old friend,” she growled back. She said a lot more, but Canderous had never completely gotten the hang of the barking and growls Wookiees used for speech. Whatever she said began in a tangle of sharp sounds, and ended with Zaalbar whining as if he’d been hurt.

“It’s the only way,” Polla Revan added in Basic. “I wish differently, but—”

“If Fleet’s coming here I should... we’ll need to send out a beacon. Open a channel to Rensha. I... I know the codes for a priority alert.” Onasi blinked again, practically developing some kind of twitch. “How much time have we got?”

Canderous shrugged. “Gwen said within the day.” He’d ordered Aemelie to have their ships cloak. They’d be gone as soon as they retrieved his daughter—providing the Republics kept their manners. If they did not, well—best worry about that then. Canderous trusted that Onasi could keep the Republics in line. He’d done it before—gaining them free passage from Manaan—and then to the Rakatan homeworld.

Canderous brandished the bottle again at Revan. “One more drink before the war?”

There was a long pause. Revan looked a thousand light years away.

“Freckles,” Carth said gently, nudging her.

“What—?”

“One more drink?” Canderous asked her again. So much unsaid between them, but what he’d gathered from Fur-Sheb’s yowls and the aruetii’s smug explanations, her time was nearly through. Revan blinked, then took a long breath. Her lips were stained red. “Yes, but we... we don’t have any glasses.”

“I’ve got a set in my quarters.” Canderous had not thought of that. “I could get—”

“No.” She rose, more graceful than he expected, considering her pallor. “We’ll go—we’ll come to you.” She turned to Carth, who was already scrambling to give her an arm to lean on that she didn’t need. “I… I want to walk. And then… one more drink. Before you… before the war.”

XXX

Bossypants aboard the _Hawk_ was like a woman possessed, barking orders like she was still running the galaxy. Even Seiran started listening, which was, Polla thought, quite a fracking miracle considering how much he hated her.

Under Darth Bossypants’s command they trashed that sweet ship because ending that bastard Tenny-Bro would be worth it. They found a stash of credits under the floor of the captain’s chair, and a cube of spice in one of the air vents—as well as a few dessicated gizkas—but no box anywhere.

And then the comm call came from the aft double bunk.

XXX

“It’s time,” Carth Onasi’s face, half-turned like he was looking at someone offscreen. “S-she says it’s time.”

_Darth Bossypants froze, pieces of the wall she’d ripped open with her lightsaber still floating in mid-air. A few electrical conduits Polla had told her not to destroy still sparked. They’d be a bitch to fix—if this ship was ever going to fly again. “Of course,” Bossypants said, glancing at the carbonite freezing equipment she’d made sure was stacked in every room they searched—like she wasn’t gonna let it out of her sight. “Bring her here. You should know, I regret the necess—”_

“We’re in Canderous’s quarters,” Carth snapped. He was still staring at someone out of view. Staring at her, of course. His wife. “Come to us.”

XXX

_Bye, Polla thought now, watching as the Wookiee rolled out the carbonite frame, and the woman with her memories stepped inside it. Nice almost knowing you, Butcher._

The woman with Polla’s memories laughed nervously, hands playing with the heavy metal collar-thing set on her neck. She looked like hell. “I should just lie down now, or—”

“That would help.” _Darth Bossypants held the carbonite freezing ray braced by her artificial arm, like she was gonna do the honors herself. Polla shivered, suddenly certain that Bossypants was the last person the other Revan would want pulling the trigger._

“Glad I could be _helpful._” The woman looked at her husband again and he went to her. They stood there together, nestled in each other's arms, whispering and looking like a holo-still from the vids.

_Tragic lovers torn apart by fate._

But this was no vid.

Across the room from them, Zaalbar groaned and Canderous Ordo raised a half-empty glass. Above their heads a fuzzy holographic image of Mission Vao was yelling something, headtails twisting in a loop, over and over again. They’d all stopped paying attention to Mission ages ago, while Rogere and that shapeshifter were still trying to pull her consciousness out of the _Hawk’s_ guts, where Rulan Prolik (formerly a Wookiee named Grawwaar) said he’d put Mission in the first place.
Sometimes life came at you fast. On a normal newsday, Polla would have wanted to know why no one trusted this version of Mission and what had happened to the real one. On this day, the dead Twi'lek's fate seemed like an afterthought.

“You’d better pretend to be Sheris when you deal with the Republic Fleet,” the Butcher told the other one. “Canderous says they’ll be here soon. Don’t kriffing attack them. And his daughter—you have to make sure she’s safe—”

“Not her job,” Canderous snapped. “Milli will be fine.”

“I know.” Bossypants seemed to hesitate, adjusting the raygun’s controls (that Polla had already calibrated twice on her orders). “I can handle the Fleet. There will be less… confusion,” she added. “With only one of us.”

“The Sleepers will burn the Fleet out of the sky if I don't go,” the Butcher told her flatly. She wiped her forehead, sweating through the ship’s chill. “They’re tracking them.”

“Not without you.” Bossypants sounded positive. “This is the only way.”

“Yeah, well—hope you find your fricking box.” The woman buried her head in her husband’s chest again, taking a deep breath before pulling away. “Don’t let Tenebrae win. Promise me.”

“He will not win. I’ll make sure of that.”

“Make sure Korrie is safe.”

“Of course.” Bossypants gestured with the gun. “I know it is too late for trust to be a bond between us, but we share the same objectives. You know that.”

“And I you.” Bossypants shifted on her feet. “Fragment, if there was any other way—”

“You’d call me by my name?”

Hiss of indrawn breath. “Yes. Revan, if I could take this burden in your stead—”

“You have to live in this galaxy.” The woman with Polla's memories laughed. “You have to live in this galaxy as us. Hells, maybe I'm the lucky one.”

“No.” The red-haired woman shook her head. “I am sorry.”

Behind Polla and Seiran, Canderous Ordo muttered something.

“Teach her how to fricking lie for me, Polla. Politely.” The woman with Polla's memories gave Polla a sideways glance.

“I’ll try.” She wanted to say something snappier, but Polla's mind was frozen. It isn't fair, she thought. We were supposed to have more time.

“Lie down now.” Darth Bossypants lifted the raygun and—

“Wait! I'll do it,” Polla stepped forward, pulling away from Seiran's grasp. “I should do it. You gotta aim, do the heart first. Then the… the brain….” Her voice trailed off as the two identical faces turned towards her, both of them raising one eyebrow at almost the exact same time.

“I can hardly miss at this distance.”

“You could. Let Polla do it.” The woman standing in the carbonite frame nodded slowly. “Thank you.”

“Fine.” Bossypants paused. “As you wish, Revan.”

Polla had begun to prepare a list of reasons, but the abrupt agreement stunned her to silence. Bossypants handed her the gun. The woman with Polla's memories looked at Carth again and sat down slowly, turning half on her side.

“You have to lay flat,” Polla told her. She’d heard that had better results somewhere. Less likely to freeze one’s arms to one’s ribs permanently—or something.

“Right.” The woman rolled on her back, looking up toward the ceiling. “Sorry, I forgot.”

And then Polla remembered. “That bounty hunting class—senior year for the smuggler’s license.”

“Yeah.” The woman with her memories sounded tired. “That was it.” She gave a soft laugh. “I hated that class.”

If this was a HoloNet drama, they'd have found the fracking box. If this was a vid, finding that box would have saved both Revans, and then the galaxy.

“Beautiful,” Carth Onasi whispered. Just that one word. Enough to tear your insides out. The naked agony in that man's face made Polla's vision blur, threatening her aim, until Polla wiped at her eyes with her free hand.

The woman in the carbonite frame gave a little sigh, and tilted her head back. She was wearing a battered orange jacket she must have found someplace. One of the sleeves had been stitched to repair a tear. Thing was big for her. Didn't look like the kind of outfit anyone would want for eternity… but who was Polla to judge?

Polla was no one. Just the executioner.

“Go ahead, already.” That voice. Steady as Darth Bossypants and just as cold. “Do it now, Pollie.” Shifting to a Deralian drawl like the woman knew exactly how annoying the nickname would be to Polla, especially coming from her—

Polla pulled the trigger, rapid hiss of the gas hitting the edges of the frame. The woman with her memories flinched as her chest slowly turned gray then white, gas expanding across the frame. Another shot, straight to the head and her familiar features froze. One hand twitched a little before the gas pooled over it. Hiss as the carbonite settled and darkened, encasing the woman's body in a waxy bronze patina.

Polla had seen a few sents in frozen carbonite before—they’d all been screaming as the gas hit. The woman—Revan—wasn't. Just that wide open stare, like Polla’s face above her had been the last thing she’d seen.

“The encasement needs to cool before we move the frame.” Polla's Revan—now the only Revan—was still barking orders like a Bossypants. Zaalbar’s sad whine filled the cabin. Carth made a choking noise that Polla didn't want to watch.
So she looked up. At the curve of the bay toward the ceiling the image of Mission Vao was frozen, except for one of her holographic lekku, twisting in an imaginary wind.

“You’re not moving my wife anywhere.” Carth’s voice was a protective growl. “The Hawk’s where she'd want to be.”

“It isn’t safe,” Bossypants told him, immediately rattling off the reasons why, which, (Polla thought) all sounded a lot more like excuses than reasons. “There can be no hint of her survival when the Republic comes. Tenebrae will have compromised their ranks by now. Better the galaxy thinks her dead.”

“Why do they need to think she’s dead?” He challenged. “You planning on taking her place, sister?”

“Me?” Bossypants laughed, maybe a little too fast. “Of course not! You will refer to me as Sheris, now. All of you. For her protection—as well as my own.”

Are you lying? Polla wondered. For a second she wondered if there'd ever even been a sithspawned box. Maybe this was the Jedi’s cunning plan? Dispose of her nemesis (now frozen for all time), get rid of the Mandalorians (shipping out tomorrow, Canderous had said)—and then—

And then what?

Polla had no fracking idea. If Bossypants had pulled off a heist, seemed like she'd look happier.

“Her pain is gone.” The only Revan standing let out a slow breath and wiped her eyes. “She was in a great deal of pain. I had to do it,” she added—almost defensively, staring into space as if there was someone there.

Carth had ignored her earlier warning and was kneeling down next to their new carbsicle. “This isn’t over,” he mumbled at his frozen wife, his hand hovering a few centimeters above her face. “Just a pause, Freckles. We’ll figure something out. We always do.”

Zaalbar let out another whine.

Polla stared at the carbsicle. The woman with her memories had been nothing like what she'd thought. But they'd had no time—

She called me Pollie. The name her parents used. Her parents and Seiran. No one else was fracking allowed. Polla might be related to half of Deralia, but no one else was family.

She called me Pollie to piss me off. Polla wished they'd had more time.

Canderous's comm crackled, and a stream of Mandalorian babbled forth, half of it just coordinates and code that Polla couldn't catch. “Aemelie’s reporting the automated ships around her fleet have jumped away.” The Mandalorian paused, looking over at Carth. “Sith Fleet’s asking what their High Admiral wants ‘em to do.”

“The Imperials should begin by standing down so the Republic does not perceive them as a threat —” Bossypants started. “In the interim, I can direct, of course, if you would prefer to begin evacuating your people from this planet—”

“Wait. What?” There was a vein throbbing in Captain Obvious's forehead. “Do you think I just let you freeze my wife in carbonite so you could take over the Sith Empire, sister?”
“In the interim,” the woman repeated. “Until we can establish some kind of Republic protectorate, I will direct rescue efforts on this world. We still have Tenebrae to deal with and I can think of no one more qualified—”

“Well, I can,” Carth snapped. “Lots of sents more qualified than you. I know the people on those ships. More than half are vets, and we’ve been dealing just fine without you.”

“The Mando’ade are leaving.” Revan’s tone turned to ice. “And the Republic are an unknown. Without assistance, you won’t have groundships to run patrols, or medical facilities to take care of the injured we’ve found already—not mention the additional doses of anti-rads everyone will need —”

“Yeah?” Carth glared back at Canderous Ordo. “Revan told me you were breaking camp, but I had a hard time believing it. Never picked you for a coward, Ordo.”

The Mandalorian looked unruffled. “Revan made me promise to take you and that kid of yours with us—even if I have to shoot you both unconscious first. You, your kid, and Jin.” His head turned toward Zaalbar. “Guess she thought you could take care of yourself, Fur-Sheb—but you’re welcome to come too.”

The Wookiee growled something too fast for Polla to catch.

“And her?” Captain Obvious looked down at his frozen wife again. “We’d… we have to take her too. Or, you would. I can’t just leave the people here—”

Stars, the man was so honorable! And so dumb. “What the problem?” Polla interrupted him. “You can’t leave the Sith? They’re Sith. Evil, right?”

He glanced up at her, and oh—that pain in his eyes, mixed with a dark humor that crinkled the edges of his eyes. “I know what they are. You know, your da used to say the Sith had the right idea.”

“Da used to drink a lot.” When had he stopped? Polla couldn’t remember. Funny, the stuff you don’t remember. And now there’d be the chance—hells they’d be going home! “I—if you need a safe place to stash her carbsicle until things die down… uh—”

“Pollie!” Seiran nudged her sharply.

“I mean we could take her—”

“No,” Bossypants said flatly. She’d walked to the console set into the wall and was scrolling through the wideband that had gone live again, no doubt planning another invasion or something. “There is only one place where she will be safe. Rulan and I will take care of it.”

Well. Whatever. Polla glanced down again at the carbsicle and wondered if she’d made the wrong choice. The woman had gone down so fast, not even fighting.

Polla would have fought. Polla would never just lie down and give up. We were never the same. Polla knew that. She’d always known it, just—

That fracking topknot. Why had the woman kept it? Even up to the end?

“You are not in charge.” Carth scrambled to his feet and Zaalbar wailed again, already forming objections before Bossypants even had a chance to tell him what he was supposed to do. “There are good men aboard those Imperial ships.”
“If they're good men we can use ‘em.” Canderous shrugged. “See if any are worth their feed. Offer to make them slaves. Maybe some will make through to adoption.” He looked at Polla and Seiran. “I know my wife would like me to make you the same offer, Polla Organa. And your husband and child. Of course.”

“Polla Wen,” Seiran snapped. “And no… we… we're good. Just give us a ship and we'll be on our way.”

“Your choice.” The Mandalorian growled something at the Wookiee. From Zaalbar’s face he couldn't understand it any better than Polla could. But a second later Carth joined in, and they all nodded. The growls and barks turned tuneful and she realized they were all humming something that sounded like a song.

Polla caught the words for nest. And death. She got the idea. At home, they'd have a Grass Priest sing a nice chant.

“Let's go,” Seiran murmured in her ear. “They'll work it out. Or kill each other. I don’t care.”

“Yeah. Just a sec.” Goodbye, Stranger. Polla thought. Out loud she left out a breath she hadn't realized she was holding. “Um, bye. Bye, Revan.”

“I'm sure we'll meet again.” Bossypants was distracted, still frowning at the HoloNet feed. “Your parents have my son. Or did.” She muttered something unintelligible under her breath. Considering all Polla had done for her, it probably wasn't a threat.

Maybe this was what grateful felt like, going through hell and making it out the other side. Grateful just felt numb.

Seiran nudged her arm. “Pollie?”

“Yeah.” Polla couldn't stop looking at the frozen face. A fracking fake topknot. The lights on the bottom of the frame were green, indicating that the woman was alive. Polla had seen a frame-job with the lights out, once. At least Revan has been luckier than that poor slob.

“Guess we've… we've got a ship to pick out, then.” Polla looked up at the Twi'lek hologram again. Fake image, mouth open… no doubt still yelling about Revan and that stupid tomb. The fake Mission had been doing that since they came in, before Rogere cut the feed. Grawwaar, or Rulan, or whoever the frack he really was thought he could get Mission back into that T3 chassis, somehow; but they all had bigger fish to fry—or so Polla had believed when Darth Bossypants got started with her universe-saving box—

“Huh.”

“What is it?” Seiran frowned in mid-limp, halfway between her and the doorway. That cast of his already had a crack down the side of it. He needed to take it easier.

“You speak Ryl?” She took the arm he was too stubborn to ask for help with and stabilized him, nodding toward the holo-screen.

“Not well.”

“Me neither.” But two words were unmistakable, traced over and over again with one hologram lekku on the vid-screen above their heads.
“It’s signing something vulgar,” Bossypants had followed Polla’s gaze, raising her voice to be heard over the others. “I noticed before. The image just keeps repeating. I assume it’s a glitch. A reference to procreation. Maybe the child’s personality imprint thought it was funny.”

“Maybe, but...”

The image of Mission Vao signaled with her headtail again, tracing a square. Then her t’chin crooked in a gesture that Polla had learned from a Twi’lek dancer on a smuggler’s moon. Chivhole, was the polite version. But also, ‘asshole of the universe,’ a place Polla Organa had spent too much fracking time.

The universe had a lot of dumps, but only one asshole.

“Um, Revan…?” Polla began. “I think I know where your box is....”

Xxx

And then Valkorion was—

Sitting on a cot in the Dromund Kaas jungle, huddled in the third medix tent and quickly pulling the covers over his eyes so none could see. Here, he lay in a Twi’lek’s body, nearly broken by radiation and the lash. He’d left the Coruscanti boy dangling—immune to his Kiss, the lad would need to be drawn in slowly—cultivated as carefully as young Onasi had been. This Twi’lek had just enough Force-sensitivity for Valkorion to feel Mekel Jin’s lack—the balance to Dustil Onasi’s strength. Jin was a stone in the ocean. Onasi the tide itself. Oh, but if weaponized together, their bond reforged and leashed to his own essence—

Darth Malak had been a capable mount, capable as hundreds before him. But in this new age, with Revan’s strength restoring their unified vitality... Valkorion wanted more.

“I am not adverse to change,” he chuckled under the blankets. “Or even to taking a true apprentice. Or... two....”

Outside, voices chattered in Mandalorian—something about his Starfire and leaving. The Mando’ade were leaving Dromund Kaas. Leaving Revan. Good. They were a distraction. And so tiresome. He’d played games with the clans for centuries. They were yesterday’s news. But in this new age, with his new Starfire and the promise of new blood—

Their union was so close and now inevitable—even in this nearly-null body Valkorion could almost feel Revan—as much as he could feel the call of her tomb. So soon they would be together. Until then, he must reserve his own failing strength for the moment of their union—when Valkorion would prove once again to her who was the master—

What? But wait! No! She was muted, that brightness dulled, flicking faint now, like a dying ember. Their connection stretched thin to near-breaking, and when he tried to catch it like water between fingers he slipped and then—

Then she was gone.

—and then Valkorion was—

—on Manaan, finally tending to a group of Shainsa acolytes. So hard to find decent acolytes, these days. Joining the Sith had fallen out of favor amongst the Selk—ever since some bombastic fool had taken over the Sith Embassy and used it to play dueling games. Admittedly, Valkorion had found those antics amusing for a time—but after he'd lost his fourth Force-sensitive to a fat boy-child in a Darth Malak costume, the sport had paled and he’d left the fools to it.

Revan? A part of him screamed into the void. But the rest was distracted, focused on the moment in front of him—the moment that part of him had been waiting for. “We're nearly ready for the ceremony, your Luminance,” a nervous woman burbled.

“Bring in the first vessel,” he intoned. Selkath made terrible soldiers, but if the Republic truly wanted a war, the side which controlled the kolto would win.

With so many worlds infected by the Starfire plague, Valkorion had little choice but to look for new Voices atop the seas of Manaan, the cities of Duros, and the plains of Iridonia. Iridonians were warriors, at least. His Voice there had set up a clinic. Perhaps somewhere amongst the Zabrak he would find some clever general’s mind, ready to be honed to his spark—

The supplicant before Valkorion now had been a loyal acolyte of the Shainsa sect, strong in the Force, with supple scales and a pleasingly lithe body. Eyes already dilated by the drug, the Selk's gills fluttered, and Valkorion lifted his own flippered hand, reaching out with the Force and his own hunger, only to find—

Black. Sick. Wall.

“Ugh!” Disgust boiled through his skin, swelling the sacs in his cheeks and sealing his gill-flaps closed. “This will not do! Not at all! This one is ruined!”

The plague taint was unmistakable!

It should not have been possible!

Another one of his bodies dispatched the ruined Selk, as a hapless priest stammered his apologies. It should have been impossible for a Selkath to be infected with the Starfire plague, and yet—

A fluke? Some mutation?

“Bring another!” Valkorion told the quivering priest and then he was not required here, not to stay, but elsewhere, elsewhere—

Revan? Valkorion heard his own voice bleat into the ether like a child’s, echoing through the Rakatan Force-channels, along the corridors of empty ships, through the circuits of the Sleepers that he could not control, that now writhed in his own confusion. Starfire? WHERE ARE YOU?

What have you done?

XXX

A/N Thanks, as always, Ether, for the wonderful beta.

Coming up… what happens next.
No Future, Part 2

Chapter 73 / No Future Part 2

XXX

On Malachor, the halls of the Traya Academy were full now, buzzing with activity and purpose.

Oerin and Meetra liked to meet alone every morning in the old officer’s lounge, which had an expanse of ferracystal panels looking down at the training room below. Meetra would sip her breakfast beverage while Oerin felt his body rot, his desiccated tongue swallowing and slurring his words more each day. What Oerin would give for a bulb of tea—for the simple pleasure of it—for whiskey, for water. Even for the milky swill Meetra drank. From time to time, one of the Blades dueling below would slip and scream as a vibroblade, cortosis knife, or lightsaber bit into their hide…and their resultant screams of agony would feel like liquid salve on his lips, soothing the remains of his throat. A balm upon his senses.

Oerin had to admit, he mostly came to breakfast for those moments.

But, alas, he had more important concerns now, and the moments were too fleeting. Someone had to provision the troops. Retrain the Blades to cull and kill. Process the raw recruits—recruit the raw recruits—selecting those with just enough Force sensitivity to hunt the Jedi, select the few Jedi worth training to hunt more--

Sometimes, Oerin envied his sister, who seemed to do whatever she wanted…and seemed to want nothing at all.

“Do you ever dream?” Meetra asked him.

Oerin had stopped being surprised by inane questions. “Not since I shrugged off my mortal shell. You know I don’t sleep.” His words sounded like jelly in his own dried-out ears but she understood him perfectly. “I cause dreams. You know that. That’s why so many Blades and their handlers have come back. Why?”

Meetra frowned. “The others have complained of dreams for weeks, but I never remembered mine. Not before last night.”

“Oh?” By others she meant her special ones. Their own sister. The Zabrak. The Mandalorian with red hair. The angry Wookiee. He watched her sit down at the table, sipping her glass of blue milk. “What did you dream about last night?”

“War.”

“That seems apt.” Oerin yawned. “I suppose when you've finished training all of the minions and they've murdered all the Jedi we should go to war.” He rather fancied shattering the Republic. After all, they were there. And Revan's simulacrum, despite her promises, had not let the Mando'ade go free.

Their Blades in the worlds spoke of rumors that a Mandalorian fleet had battled the Sith. Rumors that Dromund Kaas and its satellite systems were laid to waste. That, in concert with the mysterious fleet that had struck on Hoth, Nar Shaddaa, and Onderon…

The Mando'ade were supposed to be free, he had told Revan. But they were not.
“We will not choose the war.” Meetra shook her head. “But it will come to us.”

“Good.” Oerin tried a laugh that made his epiglottis rattle. “We were bred for it.”

XXX

Revan? My Starfire? Valkorion’s voice screamed in the void but it was dulled, echo-less, the words of a man trapped alone in a tomb. Revan? Where are you? What have you done?

And then, Valkorion was--

--looking for prospective patients on Iridonia,

---standing atop a pile of dead acolytes back on Manaan,

--rowing a boat with his trawler net on Yu-Phaedra,

--having tea with Inse Blais, who was so cleverly disguised as a refugee on Coruscant--

“Revan? My Starfire? Valkorion’s voice screamed in the void but it was dulled, echo-less, the words of a man trapped alone in a tomb. Revan? Where are you? What have you done?

And then, Valkorion was--

--looking for prospective patients on Iridonia,

---standing atop a pile of dead acolytes back on Manaan,

--rowing a boat with his trawler net on Yu-Phaedra,

--having tea with Inse Blais, who was so cleverly disguised as a refugee on Coruscant--

“Revan? My Starfire? Valkorion’s voice screamed in the void but it was dulled, echo-less, the words of a man trapped alone in a tomb. Revan? Where are you? What have you done?

And then, Valkorion was--

--looking for prospective patients on Iridonia,

---standing atop a pile of dead acolytes back on Manaan,

--rowing a boat with his trawler net on Yu-Phaedra,

--having tea with Inse Blais, who was so cleverly disguised as a refugee on Coruscant--

“Revan? My Starfire? Valkorion’s voice screamed in the void but it was dulled, echo-less, the words of a man trapped alone in a tomb. Revan? Where are you? What have you done?

And then, Valkorion was--

--looking for prospective patients on Iridonia,

---standing atop a pile of dead acolytes back on Manaan,

--rowing a boat with his trawler net on Yu-Phaedra,

--having tea with Inse Blais, who was so cleverly disguised as a refugee on Coruscant--

“Revan? My Starfire? Valkorion’s voice screamed in the void but it was dulled, echo-less, the words of a man trapped alone in a tomb. Revan? Where are you? What have you done?

And then, Valkorion was--

--looking for prospective patients on Iridonia,

---standing atop a pile of dead acolytes back on Manaan,

--rowing a boat with his trawler net on Yu-Phaedra,

--having tea with Inse Blais, who was so cleverly disguised as a refugee on Coruscant--

“Revan? My Starfire? Valkorion’s voice screamed in the void but it was dulled, echo-less, the words of a man trapped alone in a tomb. Revan? Where are you? What have you done?

And then, Valkorion was--

--looking for prospective patients on Iridonia,

---standing atop a pile of dead acolytes back on Manaan,

--rowing a boat with his trawler net on Yu-Phaedra,

--having tea with Inse Blais, who was so cleverly disguised as a refugee on Coruscant--

“Revan? My Starfire? Valkorion’s voice screamed in the void but it was dulled, echo-less, the words of a man trapped alone in a tomb. Revan? Where are you? What have you done?

And then, Valkorion was--
--shivering in a blanket on Dromund Kaas, his poor Twi'lek's body slowly fading from radiation poisoning--

--giving another dreary speech to the soothsayers of Zakuul--

“I am your promised one,” he began. “I am your destiny. I will crush Tyth’s hammer. I will shatter Aviela’s sword and lead you from darkness--”

“Valkorion? My Lord? By the way, did you know the Republic is invading our territories?” Inse Blais's voice yanked him back to her with surprising force. “Leeshansintina had the reports. You should have told me the Homeland was under attack, Your Luminance.” She blinked again. The girl had the most extraordinary eyes. Gold as crowns. “I’m very disappointed in you.”

“Yes.” His soldier’s body on Ziost was watching a Republic delegation land, even now. Scattered, these bodies. It was growing hard to hold things… together. He, who had once easily paid attention to multitudes was now reduced to singularities. His strength was so... scattered. Failing. He needed her, he needed renewal--

--and then Valkorion was--he was trying to reach across the stars and he was--

“You need to tell me everything,” the golden-eyed girl murmured, drawing him back again. Her voice was a warm balm, salving his jagged nerves, the fragmented pieces. “How is it done? How do you possess them? If I am to help, I need to know.”

“How to begin?” he began, but in that instant her victorious smile snapped Valkorion back to himself. With effort he marshalled Doctor Vivek’s body to its feet. “Oh, ho, Lady Blais!”

“Don’t use the Force on me.” Remarkable that it had almost worked! Valkorion hadn’t seen that kind of trick work against him in decades, not since that padawan of his--oh, what had her name been? The girl who’d lost the spark. What was her name? Gone, oh gone now. Lost in the promise of the red-headed child, the strength of a scream--raw power promised that the girl with her velvet whisper had never possessed.

“Bring me children,” he commanded 'Neely.' Because of course! That was the answer. The Starfire might taint one generation with her plague and her tricks, but the next--the next--there was always a next! “You must find me children! Young enough not to be vaccinated. Babes, if you must. Thousands if necessary. We need merely one with a spark--”

Among their fleshy brethren his bodies did, from time to time, cast their seeds. Most fell on fallow ground, but oh, from time to time… it had taken him a century to find the first girl. More than a century of draining lesser beings to find one that fit. And then nearly half a century more to find the Starfire--

His minion's eyes narrowed. Inse’s voice lost its Force sweetness, became cold. “I have heard that anything is for sale on Coruscant. But you need to do something for me, too.”

“Within reason.” It showed spirit, that the Blais would bargain. With him!

“Tell me what’s happening at home. If Mydia or Phylus died, I would know, but how is Lord Malak? Did he return? The Racharn report said the entire planet was bombed by Revan's forces, but that there are reports of broadcasts from the planet, possible survivors--”
“Lord Malak--?” Valkorion began to laugh. “Oh, my dear, don't tell me you were as foolish as your sister--”

“Is there something amusing about Lord Malak?” The girl frowned. “Did Mydia kill him?”

“Oh, no.” He shook his Selkath’s head slowly, laughing as he began to tell the tale--

--even as a part of him still screamed. Splintering, spinning--

Revan? What have you done?

Where did you go?

XXX

Nar Shaddaa, Mission signaled again. If she had control over the speakers, she'd be screaming it. That sleemo box is on Nar Shaddaa with the creepy twins and Lena Wee, you nerfherding bantha-brains!

“She said the box is on Nar Shaddaa,” Polla Organa translated Mission's signs for Sheris Revan, like the woman was dumb.

“Yes. With a set of twins and someone named Lee-na-wee.” Sheris Revan slurped Lena's names together, like she didn't know they were two. “But we need to know where on Nar.” She exhaled, turning to Rulan Prolik, who was still looking like an Arkanian. (Why an Arkanian? Mission had no idea.) “You assured me before you could reboot the Twi'lek's consciousness… perhaps transfer it back into the T3. How long will that take?”

The shapeshifter shrugged. “With luck, a day. Perhaps two.”

“Work quickly.” The woman locked her arms behind her and began to pace back and forth. At her feet, poor Polla Revan was frozen in carbonite. “Rogere, I need you to help me transport the body before the Republic Fleet arrives--”

“The body?” Carth scrambled to his feet. “What? No! She's staying right here.”

“Revan?” Mission's fake voice sang over the speakers. “Oh, Revan… where did you go?”

“Turn that damned thing off before I shoot it.” Canderous growled.

“Revan?” Mission's fake voice sang again. “Re-van? Where are you hid-ing? We can’t find you!”

“Turn it off,” Canderous snapped again. Then he turned and left without even saying goodbye. A few seconds later, Mission heard his heavy tread descend down her ramp. No one even seemed to notice he'd left--everyone was focused on the main show: Carth and Sheris Revan, both glaring daggers.

Carth shook his head. “I said no, Sheris. You’re not moving her!”

“She needs to be in a safe location.” Sheris Revan really needed to work on her compassionate voice because it was crap.

“Oh, yeah? And where's that?”
“Where were you thinking?” The smuggler chimed in, like she hadn't been the one to freeze poor Polla Revan in the first place.

“Pollie, let them sort it out.”

“Just want to make sure she's safe, Sei--”

She was safe before you froze her in carbonite! Mission signed, but no one was looking at her. Assholes.

“I can keep her safe--” Carth launched into a list of ways how, although honestly, Mission thought he'd probably do something like unfreeze Polla Revan as soon as he got the chance. Maybe that would be for the best? It would shut the Kaas computer up if Polla Revan just came back. Even now it just kept whining and whining--

[[Starfire Unit: Respond!]]

Someone's comm pinged in the middle of everyone arguing and then they all fell silent, checking to see whose it was. Comical. If Mission still had a voice she'd guffaw.

“Damn! I've got--” Carth glanced up. “I've got to go. Don't do anything--not until I come back--”

“We have a limited amount of time.” Sheris Revan sighed heavily and began wasting it by giving them all a lecture about what to do when the Republic ships came. Blah, blah, blah. Let her be in charge. As if? This was the woman who thought she could sweet-talk Lena Wee out of a priceless Rakatan artifact? Obviously, she had never spent much time with Ryloth joygirls.

You guys are gonna need my help to get anywhere with Lena! Mission signed, but no one was looking at her--they were all too busy glaring.

XXX

“Dustil!” From the sharpness in Yuthura’s voice she must have been lurking around the tent, spying on him, just like the creeper Mekk always said she could be. “You seem upset.”

“I don’t think I killed him.” Dustil wanted to be sick. This emotion wasn’t rational, he knew that—it was a ball of raw hate that felt like he could choke on it. At that moment, if Phylus popped his head out, or Mekk showed—or Mydia… Dustil wasn’t sure what he would do. It was all so fracking stupid. He hadn’t wanted a kid in the first place. He didn’t know what she’d done--if Mydia had even done anything. Aborted their kid? Had she really done it? Was it even a kid yet?

“I choked Phylus,” he added to Yuthura. Just the facts, here. As a teacher that had been what Ban demanded.

“But you didn't kill anyone.” Yuthura sounded like she was trying to be calming, but her lekku wrapped around her neck—a tell the bad old headmistress of Dreshdae Academy would have never allowed. “I would sense if you had.”

“Oh.” Raw laughter erupted from his throat like bile. “Oh, Master, you have no idea--”

“I am not your master.” Ban took a step closer. “Just your friend, Dustil. Tell me what happened. From the beginning.”

“I choked Phylus. He said--” his voice hiccoughed like a kid’s. “I choked him because he said Mydia liked Mekel.”
“And naturally your consort showing an attraction for your rival--”

“What? No! I don’t give a frack about Mydia. It’s… Mekk, he--I thought he and I--”

“Oh.” Her brow ridge raised. “Of course. The bond. I imagine it created a sense of… attachment.”

A pair of Mandies edged past them, carrying crates. Dustil shot them a glare. “More. I thought he was dead, but then when I found out--” The thought only reminded him of who he was talking to. “Why the hell didn’t you tell me he was alive?”

“I thought you would have known. The bond--”

“Frack the bond.” He could feel electricity crackle between his fingers. “Frack the bond and frack you.” He paced back to the tent and looked inside. Phylus was long gone--probably snuck out of the back when Dustil was storming out the front. The stacks of crap Mydia had wanted to get rid of were gone too. All Dustil could see now were Mandalorians, busy taking down the tents all around them. Mydia and Mekk were probably off somewhere together. Probably laughing about how he’d been such a fricking idiot.

“Dustil.” Yuthura had followed him into the tent. “You didn’t hurt Phylus. Not permanently. I knew the boy. I did not sense his death.”

“Whatever.” He stalked to the edge of the bedroll and sat down, leaning on the flexible wall. “You ruined my fricking life. Get out.” He felt the Force echo his words. But she didn’t budge.

“Get out,” he repeated.

“No. You shouldn’t be alone.” The Twi’lek folded her arms and sat down across from him.

One side of the tent was wide open. Dustil stared at that instead of her. The Mandies were busy taking down tents. Moving camp?

Yuthura couldn't understand. No one could, except--

No. Don't call him. Mekk's the asshole who got you into this. Don't call anyone. You don't need them. You don't need anyone--

Dustil's fingers tapped the comm-unit on his wrist anyway. Hey. Got a sec?

A millisecond later it pulsed green again--incoming reply. OK. How are you doing, son?

Staring at the words made something loosen in Dustil’s chest.

Dad, he typed back. Come to my loc. I need you.

A pause and then his father typed back. Be right there. I need you, too.

XXX

And then Valkorion was--

--eating lunch at the desk of his clinic on Iridonia,

--back on Kaas again, this time not in the Twi’lek, but the other--Iridonia--the Zabrak--

“--okay? My lord?” The touch of a hand to his face brought Valkorion back to himself, staring into a pair of dark, coldly curious eyes. “My lord? Uh, Emperor? Master--?”

Valkorion's eyes focused on the stubbled, earnest face. “Oh, ho! And you are…?”

“Indeed.” He glanced down at his red-skinned hands and then back up at the insect currently groveling for his attention. “Did you have a pleasant conversation with my Voice?” There had been a time when he could have blinked and known what was said, a time when his Voices could not hide their plots from him, when he could see them all, spread out like chaff, arrange them in stacks, attend to half a hundred idle conversations just like this one and know every one--

But he was slipping, Valkorion had been slipping for centuries and now--

Revan? What have you done?

“No… Zepth wasn't here. I thought maybe you wanted me to… was just trying to think of a way to bring you back.” The man was too grown to be this much of a stammering imbecile. “Your eyes were open but no one was home. Are you okay?”

If he could not rely upon his Voices… oh, things were slipping. Much faster than the Emperor had hoped. Valkorion blinked the Zabrak's eyes again. “Where is Revan?”

Mekel Jin nodded his head, almost a bow. “I was supposed to fetch her if you came back, but you were just gone and I wasn't sure--”

“You cannot fetch her.” He smiled with the Zabrak's teeth, slightly gratified to see the Coruscanti take a few steps back. “My Starfire is gone from the Force.” Perhaps it was death that had come for her, although how such a thing had been done, nearly under his nose--she should have been impervious by now, all of the work he had put into her over the years--now all for naught?

Starfire?

The amoeba before him looked flummoxed. “Gone? N-no, my cousin's around here someplace. Maybe I should… uh, maybe I should get her now.”

That hollow place where the Force should be in the boy was intriguing. There were stranger things in the Force, but--was she hiding again? Foolish, there was no more time.

Above them, stretching across space, Valkorion could feel the Sleepers. Just as confused as he was; their turmoil sending their patterns into a nest of confusion, like a killick swarm without their Queen--

But, oh, when that swarm turned….

“Sir? Uh, Master? Emperor?”

“Valkorion,” he corrected the boy absently. “A new age and a new name. It has always been so. Go find my Starfire, amoeba. Now.” She was hiding. A clever game, but they had played clever games before… she had been hidden and lost to him before. But always found. Always found--

“I will light the beacon to bring Nahut home. I will quench Scyva's grief with her grave. I will set a pyre for Irax and together, we shall watch him burn.”

The scions of Zakuul whispered among themselves like a flock of need, but behind them, their people cheered.

“I am Valkorion,” he declared again from the warlord's body. “Your Eternal Emperor, the Devourer of Worlds.”

And then Valkorion was--

--bound in chains on the bridge of a Republic flagship,

--bound in chains in the dark of a Deralian basement,

--bringing his merchant's ship into docking on Peragus Station. Would the boy still be here?

Xxx

Carth couldn’t give a ronto’s ass about Nar Shaddaa. Five minutes she’d been gone, and his wife's imposter had moved on, babbling about a box on Nar Shaddaa. They’d sung the song Zaalbar had taught him and Canderous back when… back when both of them had been mere fugitives, running with an unconscious dark lord aboard their ship.

We are deep-root, you and we. You go grow new branches, as I--

Revan’s frozen face. Staring at nothing.

As I wait in the nest. To see the flowers your blood brings. As we--

Zaalbar had promised not to leave her. Sheris had said she had some plan, someplace to put the… the body, but she--how could he trust her? But Zaalbar had promised to watch--and now Dustil needed him.

And Carth needed Dustil. He had to leave her behind and go to Dustil.

As we awake the new day, and bring forth new leaves. Your blood is our tree, and I--

His son didn’t turn around at Carth’s approach, seemingly huddled deep in conversation with Yuthura Ban. Shoulders too wide and too thin under the bulky armor he was wearing, instead of the quilted Mandalorian jacket Carth had found for him earlier. Jacket. Revan had taken Carth's jacket with her. They’d found it on the floor of their bunk’s closet. Carth hadn't even known it was there.

And I sleep in branches until I fall too. Like leaves--

Xxx

Revan shoved her hands in the pockets and pivoted. “Can't believe you still have this thing. Mind if I borrow it for a while?”

“It looks better on you.” He kept his voice even. Calm. “Beautiful, if there was any other way--”

“Shut up.” She blinked hard. “Just… promise me, no matter what happens--”

“I'm not gonna run off with Seriina Starr. Even if she looks like you.”

“Run off with someone who doesn't look like me.” She ran her hand through his hair. “But I was gonna say, grow your hair out. Because no woman will want this--”

Xxx
“Carth,” Yuthura Ban rose to her feet. “Now that you’re here, I’ll… I’ve got some things to see to.”

“Sure.” He would never be comfortable with the almost maternal tone the Twi’lek took with his son. His son’s shoulders were so broad. The man he’d be hung on them like a new jacket. Yuthura Ban stood up and stepped away and left them, moving slowly as if she was injured. Was she? She’d been ill--Carth had--Carth had forgotten that as soon as he’d known.

“I hurt Phylus,” Dustil said, voice muffled, head down. “It just happened.”

“Hurt?” Please don’t say killed. Or maimed.

Carth sat down next to him. The side of the tent was open. He had a good view of the corner of the Hawk. The tip of the landing ramp was still down. And empty.

“I choked him. He was saying banthacrap about Mydia and the baby… and Mekk.”

Carth patted his shoulder hesitantly. “Uh, I’m sure he didn't mean it.”

“I’m not sure he's alive. Yuthura said he was, but…."

“She’d know.” Carth looked more closely at their surroundings, half-expecting the worst… but all he saw was an overturned chair. “With the Force, probably. If she said he’s alive, he probably is.” He had no idea if that was true.

“Okay. Good.” A second later Carth felt his son lean against him--awkward as neither of them had adjusted to the new differences in height. “I want to go look, but not yet. Don’t leave me yet.” His son locked his arm around Carth’s waist. He felt the man Dustil had become inhale sharply, then exhale. “I think I scared the crap out of Ban, just now.”

“Good,” Carth said, which wasn’t what he should have said, maybe, but he still… he’d never forget the son he’d found on Korriban--all eyes and sallow skin. “Dustil, I’m sure Phylus is fine.” He wasn’t sure at all, but he didn’t care. “You’re gonna be okay.” Carth half-turned to keep his eyes on the Hawk. Zaalbar said he'd watch her, but Carth hadn’t... hadn't wanted to leave her. Not alone for her first… not alone.

“Yeah.” His son took a deep breath. “You know, Mekk's kind of an asshole.”

Carth sighed, relieved it was just that. No one was dead or-or hurt-- “He’s young. You know, you’re both so young.”

“Phylus says Mydia wants to have his baby. Mekel's baby. Not mine.”

“Oh, uh….” Carth’s voice trailed off, fighting the irrational urge to find Mydia Blais and shake her, then shake Mister Sith Congeniality, too. “Y-you know your mother once talked about maybe seeing other people--”

“Dad!” His son jerked away from him, all shoulders and arms. “I don't want to hear… that's not the same thing!”

“You can't change a kid's father.” Unless you're Mandalorian. Their ways were something he'd never understand.

“Phylus said she's getting rid of my baby so she can have Mekk’s.”
“Oh.” Was it wrong the first emotion Carth felt was relief? Followed just as fast by disappointment. Because a part of him had wanted to… to meet his son's children and the events of the day had reminded him that… that you never know. “I'm not sure it works like that.” Weak advice. “Have you spoken to Mydia?”

Out of the corner of Carth’s eye he saw the broad back of Rogere the Houck, trailed by Sheris and Zaalbar, directing a hoverlift down the Hawk's ramp. Something that looked like one of their own bedsheets had been draped over the top, but he knew what was underneath. A coffin-shaped rectangle, and her frozen face--

“We’ve got to… Dustil. Follow me.” He scrambled to his feet.

“What?”

Xxx

Her face turned gray when the carbonite gas hit. Flesh made into duramarble. Frozen, with all the light gone out.

It felt like a part of Carth froze too, and all the platitudes he’d been reciting to keep sane seemed shallow as flimsi. If this stopped the Sleepers how could they ever risk waking her again?

A choked sigh brought him back to the present a millisecond before Zaalbar's wails began.

Carth looked up numbly into a pair of hyperdrive eyes. Behind Sheris, Canderous was a hulking shadow in beskar--masked again.

The juxtaposition of that mask and her face--

Their face--

Sheris blinked back at him. Her lower lip trembled. Those hyperdrive eyes were liquid, full of tears. “I'm sorry.” A ragged breath. He'd never seen Sheris so uncomposed. “Captain. If there was any other way--any way at all--”

“I know.” He didn't. Were her tears an act?

Xxx

The procession vanished behind a line of tents. Dustil was still talking, even after Carth told him they had to go, that they had to follow. Maybe that was good. They wouldn’t attract attention, following. Just two men having a conversation, following a Houck, a Wookiee, and a Sith--

“--and Mekk's always fracking telling everyone he's Revan's cousin. And then he did everything Mydia said, and I kept dropping hints we should go and he just kept staring at me--”

Follow. Make sure they weren't just throwing his wife's frozen body into a lava pit, or dumping her at a strafing range. Carbonite was fragile, so fragile. Carth had read that once. It hadn't occurred to him until now that she wouldn't be able to defend herself.

“--and Millifar had a picture of him above her bunk! And that's where he took me--when, uh… when… he didn't even fracking care!”

“Millifar's alive,” Carth said--immediately regretting it--regretting the look on his son's face.

“What?”
“Uh, Canderous said the Republic Fleet have her. We'll need to negotiate some kind of surrender for the Imperials.”

“Surrender?” His son's outrage grew. “You want to surrender?”

“Of course.” What was the alternative?

Xxx

“Who are you calling a war criminal, Revan Starfire Onasi?” He chuckled, his cheek against the smooth skin of her forehead, face buried in her bright-edged hair. “Me?”

“You need to be careful.” She pulled back and looked him straight on. Hyperdrive eyes. “Don't let the Republic turn on you. Go with Canderous. Mandalorians have sovereignty, they can't touch you, remember--”

“Yeah, I remember.” They'd played that game already. “I'm no Mandalorian. You... you know that.”

“Then be careful.” Her smile was a grimace. “I'm not doing this for you to end up court martialed. I already told Canderous to kidnap you.”

“I won't be,” he promised. “And you know he won't. And you... you're... we're gonna see each other again. This isn't the end.”

“I know.” She paused. “I made him swear it.”

“He won’t.”

“This isn't the end,” she repeated.

But it had sounded like both of them were lying--

Xxx

“I just thought...” Dustil's bluster was fragile as plimsi. Under different circumstances, Carth might have laughed. “We don't want to seem weak.”

“We are weak. I mean the Empire is. Thanks to us. Maybe we'll get medals.”

“Right. I hate this fracking planet anyway. But were you kidding? Millifar's really fracking alive?”

“Yeah. Uh, you should talk to Mekel,” Carth told him, stepping up the pace. “And Mydia. Not at the same time.”

Advice was so easy to give and so hard to take. You should let her go, Onasi. You know you have to let her go--

“You don’t... you don’t know what he’s like. Or what she's like.”

“But I know you.” Carth forced himself to smile. A Sith. My son. My son who just commed me because he Force-choked someone. Maybe that was progress, that he'd commed Carth. “I know you'll do the right thing.” He believed that. He always had. And not just about Dustil--

xxx
You're doing the right thing, Freckles. I don't have to like it, but you are.

He hadn't said the words when she stepped into the carbonite frame but he'd thought them. Even if... even if this was all that there was--it had been better than some of the endings Carth had imagined for them. At least they'd had this.

He didn't want to let her go. But he knew--

Xxx

The Houck and his precious cargo had vanished behind one of the Mandalorian shuttles and a double stack of shipping units.

“We need to hurry,” Carth started walking even faster.

The camp was abuzz with activity. Carth saw the medix tent bad been partially dismantled. Two shuttles lifted off nearly at the same time. All the tents around his and Revan's had already been taken down. The air rang with Mandalorian commands, snatches of song. He wondered where Canderous was--if the man was already gone. The Mandalorian had just left, turned his back on all of them and walked away. Carth should send a message to Fleet... but right now his heart was still with the white-shrouded body of his wife, escorted by Sheris, the Houck, and Zaalbar.

“Did something happen?” Dustil looked confused. “Are they moving camp?”

“We have to keep following Revan,” Carth said. “A lot happened. I need to tell you the rest.”

“Dad, that's the other one--not your wife.” His son grabbed his arm. “You okay?”

“No.” Carth lengthened his stride as the procession in front of them reached the Dark Temple wall and a narrow path that seemed to wrap around the edge of the building. “I need to see where they're taking her...” He kept talking, letting the story come out in disjointed pieces; answering Dustil's incredulous questions while keeping his attention focused on her.

The path was narrow and steep, turning to barely a catwalk above the jungle where their pace slowed and biting gnats swarmed on every centimeter of exposed skin. A set of stairs led to a lower entrance, visible across a field of stones, and a set of double doors. Sheris was already standing in front of the doors with the Wookiee and the Houck, the white-covered rectangle that held his wife's body at her feet.

“Oh.” Dustil froze at the bottom of the stairs. “Dad. This place, it feels... dark.”

“Stay close.” Carth put his hand on his son's armored arm.

Sheris put her hand on the door's surface. Her hand was glowing--and then she was glowing, a faint yellow light in the sullen dusk. The doors slid open, and she gestured for the others to carry Revan inside. Zaalbar and Rogere vanished into the open doorway without so much as a glance back.

“Captain Onasi.” Sheris's back was still toward them, but her voice rang, echoing across the stones. “You left too quickly. I was going to invite you to join us.”

“You left too quickly. I was going to invite you to join us.”

“My son needed me.” Carth called back. Of course. She’d known all along they were following her.

“I agree. He does.” She pivoted, still meters away across the field, expression a blank oval below the cap of red hair. “Find Dustil something to wear that doesn't look like Malak's battle armor when “It’s _my_ battle armor,” Dustil yelled back. “And _you’re_ one to talk—you look like a spiked goreapple!”

Sheris glanced down at herself, adjusting her breastplate. “I need to seem like a threat when we greet the Republic. _You_ should not.”

“I think it’s pretty clear which of us is a threat.”

“Dustil!” Just a warning hand on his son's armored arm. When had Dustil put on the armor again? He’d spent the last few days in a battered flight suit, looking almost like the man Carth had always expected him to become--his son the mechanic. His son the navigator. His son who'd enrolled in Fleet Academy or an engineering school--

Except for the lines of Sith corruption running up his arms and neck, the yellow tinge to his eyes.

That son who'd wanted to fly starships was still in there someplace. Carth was sure of it.

“Forget it, Dad,” Carth's Sith son glared at the copy of his wife. “ _She_ knows I could take her.”

“I know your father would prefer Fleet not take you into custody as a Sith prisoner, Dustil.” Sheris raised an eyebrow. “If your pride requires a show of strength over me, postpone it until _after_ I negotiate an Imperial surrender. I’d prefer not to discuss terms with Rensha from a hospital bed.” Her voice was so dry that Carth couldn't tell if she was joking.

By his son's expression, Dustil couldn't tell either. “Hah, hah.”

“Power is sometimes a greater weakness than an asset. I hope you learn that lesson more quickly than I did.”

“Oh, yeah? You gonna teach me?” Dustil looked like he was trying to sneer, yelling back at her from across the square.

“I have better things to do.” Sheris beckoned for them both to come closer. “And we are running out of time.”

“Yeah, because you keep jabbering--” Dustil took a step toward her and stumbled, almost falling. “Hey! Did you _push_--”

“No.” Hard to tell from a distance, but her expression looked almost like a smirk. “You merely tripped over the corpse of another sentient who thought their power would save them.”

Dustil opened his mouth as if to respond and then glanced down. He froze. “Dad?” he whispered. “Look--”

Carth looked. What he had assumed was debris turned out to be a thicket of bones with foliage grown half-over them. A graveyard. “Hells. Is this part of the tomb?”

Sheris's voice raised. “In a manner of speaking. These were Tenebrae's failures. His cast-offs. Rejected children the tomb would not take. But the door is keyed to genetics--hers and mine. Come inside.”

“No,” Dustil muttered. “No way. What’s going on with the fracking bones?”

“As I said, Tenebrae had many failures before he found me.” Sheris’s entire body seemed to be glowing now, faintly outlined against the black.

Carth cleared his throat. “We can see that.” Some of the bones were small but he didn't want to think they were kids.

“It's… dark in there.” Dustil's bravado seemed to vanish in an instant. “It's really dark.”

“Yes.” Her head tilted. “Thousands died before the door. Thousands more within the Temple itself. You have been possessed by a Force ghost before. You would be more sensitive to their influence than most.”

“I'm not afraid.”

“And that is a problem.” She hovered in the doorway, partially blocking it. “Fear might temper your judgment. If the ghost of Exar Kun appeared before you now and promised you unlimited power, as well as all of the knowledge he possessed….”

“I wouldn’t need it.” Dustil was too damn cocky, but Carth loved him for it. “Not to beat you.”

She sighed, and turned her head toward the dark. “Zaalbar?”

“The cub stinks with more sense than his bark,” the Wookiee growled, emerging again from the shadows behind her. “But he will stay when he is told.”

“Hey! No one tells me what to do!”

“Dustil. Listen to them.” Carth had to trust Zaalbar even if he couldn't trust Sheris. He turned to face the man his son has become, staring him down, eye-to-eye. “I need you to have my back. I need you to get me out if this is a trap.”

“You sure, Dad?” His son twisted the comm on his wrist.

“Zaal’s a good judge.” Carth patted him on the back again. “If he says it's okay in there, it is.”

Sheris nodded. “This place is a repository of dark Force energy. All the lives sacrificed here--”

“Yeah. They charged it up,” Dustil interrupted. “I… can feel it. He… Tenebrae drained them or something.”

“And I said I would wait outside.” Carth's son mimicked the woman's stilted tone uncannily. “So, we're done. Okay?” He turned to his father again. “You okay, Dad? If she tries anything, I'll end her.”

No. Carth looked at the ground again, feeling nauseous. Some of the bones were small enough to be from children. Others weren't humanoid. The jawbone of what he thought was a Trandoshan lay across a ribcage with four sets of arms still attached. Most were older--worn and set into the ground like a terrible mosaic. “Did we stop Tenebrae?” His voice came out in a croak. “Did anything work?”

“He is much weakened.” Sheris was still glowing a little as Carth approached the door, glancing back to Dustil. His son smiled and gave him a thumb's up as he sat down on what Carth hoped was only moss-covered stone.

“Not an answer,” Carth told Sheris when he got to the door. She stood in front of it and his hand accidentally brushed the artificial one of hers as he pushed past. Fingers were ice-cold, and they locked on his arm, holding him there.

She looked up at him, standing as close as his wife, nothing but warning in her expression. “There was hardly time to check the feeds, but you saw the same reports I did--that farce of a broadcast from Biscayne. The Sith Emperor has bodies in Republic space. He will attempt to make more. We need to stop him there as well.”

“Sure, but without Revan….” As Carth's eyes adjusted to the light inside the tomb, he could see the white oblong of his wife's coffin with the Houck standing above it. The interior was nearly empty, ceiling higher than he expected. The air smelled foul. His wife would have hated it.

“Without Revan, his power will wane. And eventually die.” Her abrupt smile was feral, a side of the woman he hadn't seen. “Sooner, rather than later if I can find my box.”

“But why leave her here?” It was a dark, dank place--claustrophobic for all that the walls stretched at least twenty meters high, arching up to a series of coffered domes. His wife would have hated it there. She had always liked the sky.

“Because this is the safest place in the galaxy.” Sheris put her hands together and a small globe of light appeared, hovering between them, illuminating the space. “With any luck, Tenebrae will assume she is dead. That is what we will tell him--and anyone else who inquires.”

“But--” The lights on the carbonite frame pulsed a reassuring green.

“She is not dead, friend Carth.” Zaalbar's yowl was reassuring as he followed Carth inside. “I know how to check the unit's controls. And I will stay to watch over her.”

The walls were covered in murals showing exactly the sorts of Sith atrocities that Carth had become accustomed to seeing in fracking Sith tombs. His wife would have laughed at them, but she'd have shadows in her eyes--as she had on Korriban.

“This chamber can be sealed.” Sheris continued. “Only she--or I--can open the external door. And only she can open the Tomb itself.”

Who could let her out if she's trapped in here alone? Who would wake her up? The infamous tomb itself was made of stone with a top that looked crystalline, raised from the floor with a series of steps. Carth started to move towards it, but Sheris caught his arm. “Don't.”

“Why?”

Her voice was too smooth, as if she'd had the answer prepared. “There are traps for nulls everywhere. If I have to awaken your wife, I would rather not begin with the tale of your death.”

“What if you're not around to wake her up?” Carth glanced back toward the open doorway. The Houck was piling a stack of bones in front of it. What looked the ribcage of some giant beast had been wedged in the lower quarter. Beyond that, his son was a reassuring outline in the setting sun, standing arms crossed, a silent sentinel.

Zaalbar chuffed. “I will stay with her, friend Carth. For two hundred turns of this sun. Or more. The Wookiees of this world want to claim this jungle. We will camp nearby. She will not be alone.”
“Are you sure?” Zaalbar had been on Kaas as long as Carth had. Too damn long. I should stay, too. But Carth didn’t want to leave Dustil—or keep Dustil in this place.

And I don't want to stay in this place. Not even for you, beautiful.

“The Wookiees here have found their freedom. I will help them build a new land,” Zaalbar howled. “Waiting for Polla Revan’s return is no hardship.”

Sheris had followed Carth’s gaze. “Zaalbar agreed to establish a permanent residence near the Dark Temple… and Rogere is securing the outside door for us so it remains open. Once you’ve said your farewells, we’ll conceal the entrance as best we can. Tenebrae will think her dead. His remaining power will continue to collapse. If I can find my box on Nar Shaddaa this interval may only take months—perhaps even weeks.”

Months? Not years? Weeks? “You think we can bring her back? That soon?”

“I do.” Her eyes focused on something beyond him.

But you want Zaalbar to wait centuries. Just in case. And you’re putting her right where the Emperor wants her. Just in case? He couldn't tell if she was lying. Carth looked around the room, just as Zaalbar lumbered over and gave him a clumsy pat on the back. “And that door of yours… it's the only way in?”

“As I said.” Sheris raised her voice. “Rogere, try and find something larger. I believe some of the paving stones are loose on the wall’s lower escarpment—”

“Escarpment—?” the Houck snorted. “Wot?”

“The wall. Along the hill.” She continued giving directions while Carth paced the length of the chamber, heading for the raised dais, the plinth she'd told him to avoid.

“Don’t—” the overhead Force globe flickered out, as if she was trying to hide what he'd already seen.

Too late. Beneath a veil of frosted crystal rested a shriveled corpse. Not the first in a Sith tomb that Carth had ever seen, but this one was… was—it had metal spikes piercing its spine, desiccated legs pulled to its chest. The mouth was open in a scream; the skull cracked by a metal plate covering half of its face—

The spikes curved and fed into tubes that ran into the floor, encircled by an inlay of circuitry that surrounded the corpse.

“Who is that?” He felt like he was going to be sick.

Sheris stepped onto the plinth next to him. “I'm not sure. The body is at least four centuries old—if the records I found are a reliable source. The first… ruptures appeared in the Eternal Empire around that time. Of course, its decline was predictable for centuries before that. Overexpansion, squandered resources, broken treaties….” her voice trailed off. “I expect you don't want a lecture on Sith history.”

“I don't know.” The Force light flickered into existence again, casting the coffined thing into sharp relief. That metal plate, curving, piercing the skull, the spikes along the spine-- “I'm not sure Tenebrae does, either. The technology is Rakatan. I once thought if one of their kind was placed in the chamber it might—help—they might… last—” she shook her head, a strange smile twisting on her face. “But that would empower Tenebrae, wouldn't it? I never wanted a strong Emperor.”

“We saw a tomb like this. On Nathema. My wife… she said it was his.” Carth hadn't really seen. He'd been half delirious with fever, but Revan had told him later that body had been in dust, half in pieces.

“Ah.” Her eyebrow raised. “She took you there?”

“She said it called to her. And that old woman was there. Your old master. Quinneth Cannon. Arren Kae. Vima Sunrider. She was waiting for her there.”

“Your wife told me you killed Vima.” The shadows made hollows in her cheeks, elongated her features into a skull. “Thank you.”

“Uh… you're welcome.”

“It was his tomb, once, on Medriaas—your Nathema. I thought if I destroyed him there it would end.” Sheris took a deep breath and put her hands flat on top of the tomb. Nothing happened. “In my own body, my tomb would open if I did this. And I would hear… something. Someone. The Rakatan computer. Now, I only hear ghosts.”

“She always heard… things. She used to have nightmares. Scream in different languages, I never knew how to stop—” Carth wasn't sure why he was telling Sheris this. Why the woman would give a damn. “I never knew what to do.”

Sheris nodded. “The overlay was unstable. They removed enough of my memories to preserve the facade, but they had to leave enough of me for the maps. For the Rakatan computer's installations to recognize… to recognize me.” Her voice trailed off and she rubbed her temples. “I had hoped there would be enough of me for this tomb to recognize. To open, but as you can see—”

Carth looked down at the thing in the tomb again and tried not to see his wife. “Blow it up.”

“I tried.” Her voice was dry again, that humorless tone he was starting to think was her form of humor. “There are traps here you haven't seen. And not just physical ones.”

“A Twi'lek named Lenawee has possession of it, yes.” Sheris turned away from the tomb and faced him. “Help me placate the Republic, and we can find the box together.” Her voice still had that dry tone and her eyebrow arched, mouth quirking. “I will need someone to pilot my ship.”

“You don't have a ship.”

“But you have a fleet of them.” Was she actually smiling? “Perhaps it's best if we don't put the Imperial Navy to a loyalty test… convince them to surrender to High Admiral Rensha and then you and I can find this Lenawee and my Rakatan mind-prison on Nar Shaddaa. Capture the Emperor. Free your wife.”

“And how does this prison of yours work?” Had anything Rakatan ever done anything good?

“It will hold the Emperor's soul. Everyone he possesses will be freed.”
“Just like that?”

“No. I searched for the irk-tal-jsiew for years.” Trace of a frown. That furrow between her brows was painfully familiar. “Chasing rumors--whispers of an unknown planet. Fragments of a Star Map. And when my agents finally found it--”

“You were too busy to get it yourself?”

Carth wasn't sure why he was baiting her. His wife would have… would have laughed, but Sheris just kept on explaining.

“I could not risk drawing Tenebrae's attention. He was in Malak--”

“I heard. She… she told me.”

“The Genoharadan found my box, but I had been betrayed. Malak fired on my flagship before I could end him and capture the Emperor--”

“I heard this song and dance already.” Carth looked past her, toward the door, past the still, coffin-shaped form of his wife, covered by a white sheet. Morgana had been covered with one too, it was a bad… bad time to remember that. Carth wiped his eyes. “Fine. I'll take you to Nar, Sheris.” He looked around the room, staring at the Sith murals. What looked like a tree made of stone flowers arched over some kind of barbed rack full of torture victims. Bastards.

“You okay, Dad?” Dustil. Calling from the doorway.

“He will say farewell when he finishes with Sheris Revan, cub,” Zaalbar growled back.

“Yeah, I…” When Carth turned he saw her face again. Sheris. That lower lip of hers, she kept biting it as if she'd cry. His wife wouldn't have… she wouldn't have done that, but he still wanted to tell her not to.

Don't cry… don't cry. “You okay?” he asked. “Sheris?”

“Yes.” The former Jedi took a gulp of breath. “This place. Your pain. All of this death--” she wiped her own eyes almost angrily. “Say your goodbyes, Captain.”

Carth looked at the white cloth, the coffin-shaped carbonite frame that held his wife. He knelt down and pulled back the sheet. She looked so calm. Not in pain. Not suffering. Morgana had--she had been quiet, too. I'll be right back, Revan, he thought. I promise.

He looked up. The woman with his wife's face was standing above. Watching. Armored boots, the metal plates of her skirt, the heavy links of belt, the lightsaber dangling from her waist. In that moment, he was glad for the armor. It made her form different. Carth bent down and kissed Revan's carbonite forehead. It felt wrong for her to be in here. Their farewell felt cheap with Sheris watching, like he was on display.

“I am sorry,” she murmured, without having the decency not to look.

“It's... okay.” Carth stood up. Sheris was still staring at him with hyperdrive eyes and he tried to look past, but her gaze was too direct and too familiar and so he turned his head in the other direction. The torture mural of the tree was less painful to look at than her face. And that's when he saw it--a crack in the wall. Something she'd claimed shouldn't exist. “Wait. You said… the door's the only way in this place?”
“Yes?”

“Then what's that?” At the edge, just past the carved tree and the pile of carved corpses was a rough rectangular opening, only about a meter tall.

“Air shaft?” Zaalbar groaned, lumbering forward to investigate. The Wookiee raised his nose to the air and sniffed. “The air coming from there is just as foul, but has wind. From above.”

“Above? No. There should be no egress--wait! Someone was here.” Sheris’s boots scuffed the ebony floor, which looked older than the walls. The floor was inscribed with patterns that reminded Carth of the Rakatan installations. “This stone is freshly carved.” She frowned, crouching to peer through the entrance of the hole. “We need to see where it goes.” Snap-hiss as her saber ignited, and then she vanished through the opening.

_Blast._ Carth cast one glance toward Zaalbar and the outlined doorway where his son waited.

“You follow the madclaw,” Zaalbar growled at him. “I will watch your cub and Polla Revan's sleep.”

“I'll be right back,” Carth promised, and ducked through the wall's opening, chasing after Sheris.

XXX

“Um… is Revan around? She asked… she wanted me to get her when….” Mekel’s voice trailed off because Revan wasn’t in the medix tent, but the head medix was. Sinae of Clan Zal. She of the gigantic rack and long sighs, like she’d thought he wasn't good enough for Millifar when they'd gotten their contra shots. (Milli's idea. Mekk had never knocked anyone up yet, but Milli insisted and she was very convincing.)

“No. But the dar’jett asked for you,” Sinae had taken the unconscious Dessa out of the tank, and draped so many blankets and bands on top of her that for a second, Mekel thought the pregnant Mandalorian was dead.

“Where--?”

The medix frowned disapprovingly and stepped to one side, revealing the bed behind Dessa's. Mydia Blais lay curled across it, wrapped in white cloth. A scanning band lay flat across her stomach.

“Hello.” She lifted her head slightly, looking at Mekel. Her eyes were red and her nose was blotchy, as if she’d been crying.

“Are you okay?” Mekel felt stupid. Telos should be here, not him.

“It hurt.” Mydia looked wan and young--maybe even scared. “I didn't think it would hurt.”

“If you had done it sooner,” the medix told her. “It would have hurt less.”

“Remember your promise, Mandalorian.” Mydia's voice hardened.

“We don't name children until they are old enough to stand on the sands they will claim…” The Mandalorian medix was stacked. Mekel had noticed that before. “But I will tell Dessa your suggestion.”

“My-leah.” Mydia pronounced the word decisively. “It means ‘Firebrand’ in Ancient Sith. It's a lucky name. A Blais name…. her voice trailed off, and she sniffled, blinking hard. “Sadow's ghost! Why am I crying?”

“Hormones.” The medix shrugged. “I'll give you a shot to dry up your milk.”

“I don't drink milk…” the girl's voice trailed off and her eyes widened. “Oh! You mean... how disgusting!” She shifted on the hospital bed, and the belt slipped. Mekel caught a glimpse of a fine red line like a laser cut across her stomach.

“Are you okay?” He wasn't a di'kut. He'd grown up in a whorehouse, but Mekel had never heard of an abortion through someone's guts. “Was there something wrong with it?”

“Her,” Sinae corrected. “A little small for gestational age, with a few hybridizations, but perfectly-”

“Of course she's a hybrid,” Mydia snapped. “I told you, we're not purebloods.” She wiped her eyes, seeming on the verge of tears. “Can we go, Mekel? The Mandalorians are leaving soon, and Sinae still has other patients to see.”

It startled him that Mydia would care--almost as much as the fact that she'd lost Dustil's baby. Lost. A euphemism. Decided not to have, apparently. Did Telos know? Would he care? Maybe this was good because there'd be no divided loyalty.

“Yeah. I could get Dustil for you--”

“Ugh!” Mydia made a face. “What for?”

“I mean Lord Malak.” Did she still buy that banthashit? “Or... um, the Emperor. The Sith Emperor's back. He's in that Zabrak kid's body. Zepth. Do you know Zepth?

“I don’t want Dustil.” Her gaze was as direct as a mark arranging things at his mother’s establishment. “Or the Emperor. I want you, Mekel Jin.” She wiped a tear from one golden eye. “But not like this. Go outside while I dress.”

“Okay.” He didn’t know what else to do. Frack. Mekel remembered the Emperor--the reason he'd been looking for Revan in the first fracking place. He should have gotten someone else to see where she was.

And Dustil should take care of his own fracking girlfriends.

Mekel stepped back outside just in time to see half a dozen Mandalorian shuttles take off. Above them, the Aleema loomed, low in atmosphere like a lazy purrgil. “The frack?” When he looked around, he noticed half the camp was packed up. Leskal even jogged by with an armful of rolled up tents.

“Hey!” Mekel called out.

“Jin of Lin! Come in our shuttle!” The Mandalorian stopped. “General Ordo is arranging a boarding party for the troch Republic ships when they come. We are going to provide a distraction for Millifar's escape!”

“For--” one word jumped out at him. “Wait. Milli's alive?”

“The Republics have her.” Leskal nodded. “I am sure she will escape like her mother commanded, but should she require assistance, or if General Ordo decides to seize the Republic flagship before she can--"

“Huh?” Obviously, a lot had happened while Mekel had been feeding the Sith Emperor. “Wait. What does Revan know--is she coming too?”

Leskal shot him what Mekel would realize later was a pitying smile. “No. She is gone. Forever.” He gestured toward the ships. “Come with me, I will tell the tale.”

“Gone? But I-I need to find her. Her and--” Dustil, Mekel thought. But Telos had split. Probably off doing important Force-user things. If he’d split with Revan and left Mekel behind Mekel was gonna fricking gut him in his sleep. “Everyone's leaving?”

Leskal shrugged. “Everyone who is worthy.”

Telos went on ahead without me? Without me and his fricking girlfriend? The thought was stupid. He'd probably been busy--some important Force-user business. Too busy.

Or I wasn't worthy. He glanced down at the comm clipped on his belt. With the bond, he wouldn't have needed to fricking ask, but-- “Uh… got room for a few more?” Telos had been too busy to get his girlfriend. And the Zabrak--Emperor or Lydie's brother--whatever he was, he couldn't be left behind, either.

“Of course. If you hurry.”

“I will, just--” He stepped to the side bringing the comm close to his ear. “Gotta check with Telos, then I'll get the others.”

“Five minutes, Jin of Lin.” Leskal tapped his chron. “Hurry.”

XXX

The man had his blaster out and his grief was as thick and cloying as the dust in this tunnel. The tunnel was small enough they both had to crouch, even crawling on all fours at times. It had once been a ventilation shaft, perhaps, but it had been widened quite recently.

For Revan, the Dark Temple swam with ghosts. Red-headed girl-children, ranging in ages from one to six--and every one of them had green eyes, staring back at Revan with absolute trust. She had not met them here. The Emperor’s nursery had been on Ziost. This had to be a hallucination, a manifestation of Revan’s own guilt--

“Are you my mother?” One had asked Revan, that day on Ziost. Putting the Fragment in her temporary tomb had reminded her uncannily of those children--Tenebrae-spawned clones, one of them her potential replacement, molded to do his bidding--

You would have been just as vulnerable to his influence as they were, Fragment----and far less mortal.

“Look up,” said the captain behind her, and Revan did, annoyed at herself for not noticing before he did: the circular place in the ceiling above, four meters up, tall enough to stand, the slightly lighter darkness above, the feeling of a breeze--,

“It's an access point from the main apse.” Her hand brushed the walls, the freshly cut stone. “I can leap the distance, Captain, but I'm not sure how to transport you.”
“I’ve got it.” He sounded amused. “I’ve climbed tighter maintenance shafts than that, sister.”

“I was an only child,” she quipped, but he just stared at her, puzzled, as if he did not understand the joke.

The space above was intimately familiar—one of the catacombs that ran beneath the Dark Temple’s main chambers. The Force here practically screamed with shadows, all of them jostling, whispering to demand their due.

_Hurry, Red._ Malak's whisper was faint, his presence overlain by other ghosts, so many other ghosts, each with their own peculiar claim. Somewhere Revan thought she heard the sound of bells. The Force light hovering above her hands trembled and shook as Captain Onasi scrambled through the opening. Revan extended a hand and he took it without reservation, face cast in shadow save for that sensitive mouth.

“Are you okay?” he asked her oddly.

Was she crying again? _His_ pain, the Wookiee's, the son's, this place--their pain threatened to overwhelm.

“This… this opening was made recently.” She wiped her eyes. Who would have dared breach Revan's tomb? Who would have known it existed? “Tenebrae captured Polla and Yuthura and me in the tomb when we came here before. Perhaps one of his servants carved the path from above--” her voice faltered because suddenly it was quite obvious. “Or… that droid! Your T3. We saw it in the tomb--does the droid have an attachment that could cut through stone?”

“Maybe. You think Mission did this?”

“‘Mission. The T3.’ Yes.” It was logical. How else could the droid have breached her tomb to be there in the first place?

_I assumed the Rakatan computer let the droid in, but perhaps the thing had its own mind. Had I thought it would be so easy to cut a path I could have had the Temple sabotaged remotely. Even as she had the thought, Revan dismissed it. Irrelevant, now._

Words from her old master mocked her. “Here is the path before you, padawan. What can you use?”

Close the main entrance and leave this hidden one. Better, much better. Tenebrae would think the structure as impregnable as she had--

_Can the Wookiee fit through the smaller opening?_

_I will have to check--surely, if he crawls…._

“You're crying.” The man sounded startled. “Is… is it worse than you're telling me? For her?”

“No, there's hope. My box--” Sheris's weak voice wavered and Revan wiped her eyes with her gauntlet. “It's better, Captain. If we can find my box.”

“And you think your man can get the evil computer out of Mission?” Carth Onasi sounded as sad as Revan felt.
“He will certainly try. The Genoharadan have no love for Tenebrae. Rulan told me the Emperor infiltrated their organization, possessed a number of operatives, and started to use them for his own purpose.” She started to wipe at her eyes again.

“You trust Rulan?” He was holding something out to her. A scrap of cloth.

“I do. Thank you.” She took it and wiped her eyes again before handing it back. He looked at it awkwardly before stuffing it back in his vest and she realized that returning the crying-cloth had been the wrong thing to do.

“Okay,” he muttered, still staring at her. “Are you sure you’re okay?”

“Irrelevant.” They were wasting time standing here. Revan let the Force guide her steps through the tunnel ahead, walking backward to keep Onasi in sight. “I sense no deception from Rulan. His men have served me well in the past, and we desire the same objective: a stable Republic.”

“You do that, too,” Carth said.

“What?” The stable Republic? Or had the Fragment trusted Rulan Prolik, too?

“Walk backwards. I thought it was just her. Guess the Force… you just know what’s ahead, huh?”

“Oh.” His abrupt subject changes were maddening. She stopped. “Of course. The Force warns me if there is an obstacle or an incoming threat--”

“She did it,” he said hoarsely, still staring. “Sometimes. Before we knew… before we knew she even had the Force she used to do that. I thought it was her.”

How was this relevant? “Of course. We shared many of the same--”

“No. Not really.” The Fragment's consort pushed past her, toward the larger opening in the wall that Revan suspected would lead to the main temple. “You're not like her at all. Just… just some things.”

A pointless argument, perhaps underpinning his real unease. “I promise, your wife will be safe here, Captain--” but she was addressing empty space because Carth Onasi had gone on ahead, charging in heedlessly like he was the Fragment himself.

“Oh!” She heard his voice, startled and echoing from the chamber beyond “It's… it's big.”

The primary chamber of the Dark Temple. Yes, it is big. Revan could feel the space ahead, nearly hear the whispers of ghost voices tugging at her thoughts. Essences of the fools who had lost their way here, the generations of Sith lordlings buried in tombs that lined the walls. Dark whispers, lines in the Force, a web of them surrounded her and every one whispered a promise--

Red. Malak's voice was so faint, overshadowed by the rest. You warned Dustil before.

They're louder here. Help me. The shadows of dead children weren't real, couldn't be real. The shades that looked like Vik Tio and Beya Organa could have been. She had dreamed of them before.

Beya's lips moved, releasing a stale whisper of an Ancient Sith curse. Others--dead knights, former allies, even Bastila Shan, jostled for their place behind armored Sith out of legend. Finiris screamed something nearly in Revan's ear… but their voices were silenced, suddenly drawn away, wrapped in a field of shimmering blue.
I've got you, Red.

“Sheris?” Human voice. Carth Onasi. Behind the blue field he could have been a ghost as well. “You okay? You're… glowing.”

“Yes.” Revan said. “It's… nothing. An effect of this place.”

An effect of this place, Malak murmured, is that I feel stronger here. If we brought in the boy--

“No!” She hadn't realized she'd said it aloud but Carth started, eyes narrowing.

“Didn't say anything, sister.”

“Ghosts,” she told them both. “No one is immune to the influence of the Dark Temple. Not even nulls. Or… or ghosts. We need to find the exit.” No one is immune, Malak. Not even you.

“Oh yeah? I feel fine.” But Carth's hand, Revan could not help but notice, had fallen to the blaster on his belt.

Activation lights glittered around them, highlighting the soaring arches, the mosaics on the floor, the bulbous Rakatan statue that generations of Sith had taken for a masked idol before the central stair, behind the twinned, stained sacrificial altars. “It is big.” The whispers grew louder, rustling through Malak's shields. “We should leave, Captain.”

“Carth,” he said. “Just… just call me Carth, Sheris.”

“Carth. We should leave.” Something else prickled at her consciousness, like the wind before a storm. “The Republic will be here soon.”

Xxx

Probably Mekk was off fracking Mydia, or shaving his ass before good old Milli came back… or just moving on, as they say.

Mekk always moved on.

Mekk never really liked anyone besides himself. That's what Algwinn had always said about Mekel Jin. You were just a mark with a famous father, fockda. After the bond broke, he was gone. The voice in Dustil's head almost sounded like Selene, who had liked Mekk a little too much, too. The air thickened, until Dustil could almost see the heat radiating off the bones that covered the ground.

Ghosts. He'd only seen one ghost in his entire life--good old Malak--but this place had so many dead bodies that it must be full of them.

Dustil's comm beeped and he almost yelped.

“Telos? Where are you?” Speak of the chivhole, Mekel sounded distracted. He had the comm so close to his face that all Dustil could see was a slice of stubbled cheek and half an ear.

“Here.” Dustil leaned back, giving his former bondmate a good long look.

“Where the frack is that?” The comm slipped and there was one of Mekk's eyes, squinting like he was looking into the sun.

“With my father. Where are you?”
“Is that a graveyard? Are you in a graveyard?” Mekk's head turned again and there it was, sideways, as the comm slid, showing the sky for a second. “What? Give me a sec, Myd.”

Good old Myd said something unintelligible.

“Dustil. It's Dustil. I said give me a sec--” Mekel's comm pulled back again and he must have finally set it on auto, because the image stabilized--all of his face, and in the background, more indistinct, a curvy shape that had to be Myd and a bulk of Mandalorian armor lurking behind her. “Uh, I guess you're gonna evacuate with your Dads. I-I heard Revan already left or something--”

Did he really not know? “Revan's dead, Mekk.” She wasn't, according to Dad, but since they were putting her frozen body in an actual tomb, Dustil didn't see the difference. “Revan's dead and the Republic's on its way to clean up this mess.”

“What?” More voices in the back, as if they were all explaining the facts of life to dear old Mekk at once.

“Frack!” The Coruscanti son of a whore said a minute later. “Guess that's… didn't get a chance to say goodbye.”

“Poor you.” Dustil forced his breath to go evenly out his nose.

“I-I-don't.... Look, you're coming back to the Aleema, right?” Some intel must have finally filtered through his thick skull-- “Or is this some kind of trick? She's not really dead, she can’t be--”

“Your cousin's gone.” Dustil had to smile, interrupting him. “The other one’s still around, though. You met her yet?”

The other Revan wasn't anything in the Force. Mekel would have trouble bragging about her to good old Myd, who only respected strength. Without his cousin or Dustil, Mekel didn't have any power at all.

A stubborn line formed on that Jin forehead. “Oh, yeah? Know who else is gone? Your kid.”

“I heard.” Dustil felt his face freeze. “Phylus told me.” It didn't matter. He'd seen a lot of dead kids.

“Oh.” Mekel just stared at him.

“I don't like liars. My daughter's in a better place.” Suddenly, there she was. Mydia Blais, attaching to Mekk's hip like a mynock, and staring at him like he was her shiny new fracktoy. Without turning her head, she gave the comm a sideways glare. “Hello, Dustil Onasi.”

“Mydia Blais.” He had to keep his voice even, steady. That was one of the first lessons that Mekel had ever taught him: don't show them when they've got you by the choobs. “Hey. You seen Phylus recently? I kinda fracked him up.”

Instead of bothering to answer, Mydia turned to Mekel. “We have to find Phylus!”

“We will. Don't worry.” Mekel suddenly had his arm around her waist, using that soothing voice on her that used to make Lashowe Devry let him copy her homework. “So, uh… you're coming to the Aleema, right, Telos? We should… we should talk.”

“Dunno. I’m going where Father goes. You two make a cute couple.” Dustil was proud of how even his voice was. Mekk had… Mekk had taught him to do that. “I bet Milli will be thrilled.”

“She… she's alive.” Mekel had that look on his face like Dustil was speaking Huttese. “I gotta go. Leskal says they're getting pings in the hyperspace lanes. Something's coming. We've gotta lift before the Republic gets here.”

“But Phylus!”

“Shhh. We'll find your brother. I promise.” Mekel patted her on the head.

“Yeah.” Dustil could feel something coming, too, coiling like ice in his guts, as thick as the air around him. “Better run before the Republic kicks your ass.”

Mekk snorted. “Yeah? Tell my other cousin to be careful. We'll be on the Aleema….”

Why did Mekk keep bringing that up? Did he think Dustil was gonna go after them? Fight for Mydia's honor? For Mekk's? Mandalorians had duels about crap like that. He’d seen the vids.

Dustil cut the link instead of answering. “I don't need you,” he muttered to Mekel Jin, who couldn't hear anymore. “I don't need anyone.” He would help Father because Father needed him. That was what… what kids did, but he didn't need Father. He didn't need anything. Or anyone.

He looked up at the sky again. Then down at the bones. They felt… empty. It made him feel sick. The Emperor drained them. Dustil didn't know how he knew, but he did. The Force was in everything, even dead fracking bodies. But these bones were just… empty.

Empty in the Force like Mekel Jin was. Frack him. Mydia would. Then she'd kill him. She'd gone through a lot of servants that way. Phylus--Phylus had told Dustil--

“Your father went with the madclaw to explore the cave,” the Wookiee growled—or at least that was how the Shyriiwook Malak had somehow left in Dustil's brain translated what Zaalbar was saying. How long had Zaalbar been standing there? Lost in the Force and Mekk's banthashit, Dustil hadn't even noticed him come out of the tomb.

“Great.” Place was giving him the creeps. “Uh, do you know when they're coming back? And… how? How are they coming out?” The Houck had covered nearly half the entranceway with a stack of bones and rock.

“I think… there.” Zaalbar pointed to a place in what looked like an unbroken wall above them, about ten meters up. There was a dark shadow that could have been a hole--or a shadow. “Their scent comes from there now. I think they will come out there.”

“So we should finish sealing this, yeah?” Rogere shrugged. “Maybe drag some branches over? Get some vines?”

“More life will not grow in this place of death.” Zaalbar chuffed although Dustil could see plenty of green crap growing all around them. “And the madclaw’s comm said to seal the door as it was before.”

“I have to move the rocks back?” the Houck grumbled in his throat. “To the escarpment--?”
Comm, Dustil recalled, like an idiot. Dad?

Dear Father answered his comm almost immediately, text only. You okay?

Sure. Not the one trapped in a tomb with Darth Revan.

Call her Sheris.

Whatever. Mekk wasn't gonna call her Sheris.

Above their heads, ships were lifting off in organized clusters that reminded Dustil of the training vids he'd watched as a kid. And then, above on the ledge, sure as Zaalbar had said, dear old Dad emerged from the rocks, followed by her. Good old Darth Revan-Sheris. Dad waved and Dustil waved back. The skinny redhead in badly-fitting armor didn't wave. She just stood there, blinking in the setting sun. Rare day on Kaas, having sun.

That's your other cousin, Mekk. Wonder if you'd like her half as much. Dustil himself was on the fence. She was so weak in the Force she felt like a puff of wind would topple her, but she was still Darth Revan. She'd know things about real power. What had Ban taught them? Knowledge held its own strength—if you were strong enough not to kark before you got a chance to use it.

If Mydia still had the kid… Dustil thought that might have taken up some time. Daughter. It was a girl. He felt funny. “Dad!” he called out. “Hey!”

“Go to him,” Zaalbar growled softly behind Dustil. “The fat man and I will finish hiding Polla Revan’s resting place from predators.”

“I’m not fat.” The Houck chuckled. “Just big-boned.”

Xxx

Mekel had been trying to get someone to talk to him about why the frack the Mandalorians were really packing up shop and where everyone had gone, but the best he could do was find Ban waiting by the transport shuttle. Their old master looked nearly as confused as he was--and Leskal wasn't going to wait any longer. Mydia was already inside. The bint had gone hysterical when they couldn't find Phylus, and Dessa had given her a shot to make her sleep. Just as well. Mekel thought it would be mean to tell a woman who'd just had an abortion to shut up.

“Where’s Revan? They keep saying she's gone? Did she leave?” he asked Yuthura Ban. Dustil had just been fracking with him, and why would Leskal even know?

“I don't know.” The Twi'lek frowned at him. “I would sense her death, but she is not in the Force.”

Doesn’t mean anything. She could hide from the Force. She'd shown Mekel that ages ago on Coruscant before he even knew they were related. “Look, uh, the Emperor wants to talk to her--”

“Tenebrae made a reappearance?” Ban lifted a brow ridge. “Zepth appeared unpossessed a moment ago.”

They’d loaded the Zabrak kid on after Mydia. He was just himself again--with shackles on his hands and feet, asking Mekel where they were going like it was Field Day at Dreshdae Academy. Mekel didn’t know what to say, so he’d just shrugged, feeling a little guilty that he'd been hoping for the Sith Emperor and not Lydie Korr's brother.

Lydie. Maybe there was a way he could find her. Let her know her brother was alive. Maybe Lord
Tenebrae could help with that--the man had all of those bodies… had to be good for something.

“Tenebrae wanted to talk to Revan, so I was looking for her. Do you know where she went? Dustil said she was dead, and Leskal said she was just gone.” She’d have said good-bye. She'd come by their tent earlier; she'd stopped to check on Mekel. She wouldn't just leave--they were friends--cousins--

She forgot you existed. More important things on her mind. Just like Telos--

“I do not.” The Twi'lek's frown deepened. “But Revan is more than capable of taking care of herself.” From the way Mekel's old teacher was looking at him, she seemed to think he wasn't.

“Jin of Lin, we have to go.” Leskal, leaning out of the shuttle door. The Mando’ade accepted Mekel for what he was. They didn't give a frack about the Force.

“After you, Ban? Uh, Yuthura, I mean.”

“Thank you, Mekel.” The purple Twi’lek did not look back, giving Mekel a view of her back he would have appreciated more if he wasn't so distracted by all this banthashit.

XXX

The Mandalorians had dismantled everything that wasn't bolted down. Polla had had to drop Aemelie's name just to access to the comms board--and even now, behind them, two Mandie kids were idling with a plasma torch and some kind of bolt cutters, waiting for them to finish so they could take this board too. How were the refs gonna get a comm signal without it? None of them seemed to be around to ask; and when Polla brought it up on their behalf, Sei shot her the look.

“Ma!” Polla felt tears of relief prickle her eyes at the familiar sight of her parents in their vid-screen. Da looked too thin, but his smile at seeing her was still a welcome sight. “Da!” The baby in his arms looked too big to be her son, but her breath choked out because, of course, who else could he be? “Aba! You have hair!” Her son had had it before, too, but now the dark nap of hair almost covered his eyes, nearly long enough to be Blessed. He'd be old enough for that soon. He'd be--was he walking?

“Abasen!” Seiran crowded in behind her. “He’s enormous! Wh-what have you been feeding him?”

Everything. He eats everything. Ma's voice sounded a little shaky and she dabbed at her eyes with the corner of her apron. “Where in the hells are you two?”

“Dromund Kaas,” Polla said. “Past the Reach. We're okay. We're coming home.”

“Thank the Grass,” her father muttered, in a rare display of piety. “Now?”

“Just… you're alone?” Ma's voice lowered.

“Yeah…” Polla's voice trailed off. Because Bossypants had said something about coming along, once, and of course they'd have to get her son back to her. “How's the kid? Malachor? He at school?”

The two of them exchanged glances. A funny feeling began in Polla's guts. Because she just knew—even if she didn't know what, she knew it had to be bad. “Frack. What happened?”

“Where's she?” Da asked instead of answering, and Polla scrambled for--only to have Seiran find the words.
“Gone,” he said. “For good. But the other one, she's going to be looking for her son. What happened?”

And so, the whole story came out. Just as creepy, sad, and terrible as every other damn Sith story. By the time it was done, Polla was wiping her eyes as bad as Ma--and not just for the sight of her own kid, dozing sleepily on her father's shoulder.

“I'll tell her,” Polla said slowly. “But if there's anything you can do to find--”

Her father nodded. “Moll was just saying maybe we should hire someone to look.”

“But we're not sure it's safe.” Ma lowered her voice. “We don't want to draw more attention if… if anyone's looking already.”

They both looked at each other before looking back at Polla. And that's how she knew they still weren't telling her everything.

“Are you guys okay?” Seiran asked for her. Probably felt all of Polla's muscles tense up.

“Oh course!” Her mother beamed at them. “We're just so happy you're both alive! You look good, Pollie. They've certainly been feeding you on that Sith planet.”

“Thanks.” She gritted her teeth. “But--”

“Was it the Sith Emperor?” Da interrupted. “Was he the one who killed her?”

Funny how they all kept not saying her name. “Killed? Um… she's not dead.” Was it possible the call was being monitored? Polla had a flash of paranoia. That might explain their cagey expressions. “She's just… gone.”

“No, Pollie, I meant her.” Her mother's voice dropped. “You know.”

“Neither of them is dead.” Not exactly. Which was more than Polla expected for their kid if Bendowen and Ooka had been found half-rotted in a lima pit. Except… the fracking Force. Wouldn’t Revan know if her kid was dead?

She didn’t want to be the one to tell Bossypants he was missing.

Da cleared his throat, patting Abasen on the back. “I saw on the vids that the Sith Emperor possesses folks. Makes their eyes glow red.”

“Yeah.” And?

“He was on all the feeds!” Moll broke in. “With your da and her on Biscain! Did you see?”

“Wait, what?” Biscain? The Biscain crap about the race had been true?

“We came in third,” her Da bragged. “Biscain Hundred, Pollie. Third!”

“Pollie, have you met Him?” Her mother sounded way too excited about her only child hob-knobbing with immortal Sith Lords. “You have met the Emperor, haven't you?”

“Yeah, I met him. Da. You raced the Biscain Hundred with Revan?” Sithspit, well now she'd said the name. If this call was monitored, they were all fracked anyway. She and Sei were officially
“She did great. Just like you…” Da frowned slightly. “Maybe better than you, even. We would’ve been first, if we hadn't had such a late start.”

“You want to know about the Sith Emperor? He's an asshole.” It was definitely time to change the subject, forget about those level green eyes staring straight at hers, the face turning gray and frozen--

Maybe she's better than me because I wouldn't let anyone freeze me. Not even to save the fracking galaxy.

He?” Her mother said sharply. “Is the Emperor always a he?”

“No. Tenny-bro could be anybody. But don't worry, Ma. We've got him on the run!” Polla's smile felt forced. He should be on the run, but how could they know? He could be hiding… he could be anywhere.

“And that's why we're coming home,” Seiran added. “So we'll be home soon. A week if we can make the right jumps. Probably leave today--”

Are you bringing the other one with you?” Ma looked nervous. She kept clenching and unclenching her hands—the sure sign.

“Probably not. She's busy. And if Malachor isn't there--” Why, Ma? You want to tell Darth Bossypants you lost her son and someone chopped up our relatives yourself?

“We still want to see her,” Da interrupted, spacing his words like he meant something else. “Tell her she's welcome to come… but maybe tell so you're real sure she'll come. You know?”

“She needs to come,” Ma broke in.

“No?” What was Ma playing at? Was it supposed to be opposite day? Or did they really need the ex-Dark Lord of the Sith? “I don't know. When you say other one… um, Seiran said he told you already that there's two and the other one isn't me. You mean… her, right? Not the one that's--”

Of course she's not you. She's Revan.” Her mother's eyes went very wide and Polla tried to puzzle through what the hells that meant.

You want me to tell the Jedi with the laser sword you'd like her to come for a visit even though Bendowen and Ooka got killed, and Malachor's missing?

Do you love me at all, Ma? You want me to piss her off?

“Oh, and Pollie, where in the Reach did you say you were agai--” The sound of thunder broke over Da's words. Because the galaxy had a cracked sense of humor, the ground took that moment to shake, as the air echoed with sonic booms.

“Oh, no.” Seiran muttered, looking at Polla.

She gaped back at him. “Gotta go, Ma.”

“What--”

Polla cut the connection, and helped her husband hobble hastily toward the Dark Temple entrance.
Maybe it would have been smarter to try and get to a ship instead of that damned Temple, which Bossypants had mentioned might make a decent bunker, but Sei couldn't run and--

--and Polla had to see. If this was the end, she wanted to see it coming, not cower in the dark like the last time she'd thought they were done for.

The main doors to the Dark Temple were still closed tight. Polla and Seiran huddled against them, beneath the portico's overhang. Better than nothing, if the bombs fell. The remains of the Mandalorian camp buzzed like an overturned hive. As they watched, a Mandalorian shuttle lifted--only to be flanked almost immediately by four fighters, and forced back to ground.

A beam of light lanced across the sky--like a tractor beam had snagged another shuttle. A swarm of fighters surrounded it and the tractor switched off. That shuttle, too, went back to ground with its escort, descending sharply and landing on the grass.

Surprisingly, no one fired a shot.

“Those don't look like Sleeper ships.” Seiran frowned at the sky full of fighters, but Polla knew the pattern. Any smuggler would. Looked random, but it wasn't. Above their heads a military convoy darted back and forth, their trajectories forming a crude net over the area. Poor man's blockade, while their pals up above atmo set up deflector shields and an auto-cannon floater, maybe mined the jump-points just to make sure--

“Shit,” she muttered, as one of the fighters streaked low enough for her to recognize its distinctive wing-shape. “It's the fracking Republic!”

XXX

“Well?” High Admiral Rensha surveyed the transparisteel view laid out before them: the half-burned planet below, the empty orbital lines suddenly filled with more of their own capitals, as one by one, they dropped out of the hyperspace lanes and moved into planetary orbit.

The view was deceptive. Even before Atris gave her report, Rensha knew they were not alone in the skies.

“I sense one remaining ship cloaked in orbit around the planet. There.” Master Atris paced to the holographic display and traced the coordinates before stepping back and folding her arms, frowning at the viewscreen before them. “The chatter our scout-drones picked up before we came out of hyperspace indicates over a dozen warships--with both Mandalorian and Imperial call-signatures. The rest of the Mandalorian fleet have retreated past the planet-lines. The Imperials have gone silent, but we assume the same. We should expect the two fleets are allied, and may attempt to flank our ships at the jump-points--”

“They will flank you and win,” her new shadow corrected. The Mandalorian girl's hands were encased in a binding meant for Force-users and her legs had been shackled at the ankles as if she was a fully-flared hunter lost in her first blood spoor’s madness. She glared at the white-haired Jedi through two bruised and swollen eyes. Her guards had been unkind. Ensign Krista had been popular, and this Millifar of Ordo had broken her nose.

“We've nearly finished securing airspace above Kaas City,” Admiral Cein added. His hologram overlapped with all her other Fleet commanders, leaving Rensha in her officer's bridge crowded by ghosts--save for Atris and Admiral Rew Eckumi, who stood, arms crossed in the corner, staring down at the planet below. “Scans show minimal population readings beyond the main capital, but we've assigned ships to patrol--just in case.”
“And Revan?” demanded Ekkumi. It was not her place to ask, and Rensha flicked her tongue at the Telosian, indicating her disapproval.

“No sign--” the communications officer broke off when the figure next to her stirred.

The red-eyed Toydarian fettered to the hoverchair facing Rensha's chuckled. “She's done something,” the possessed C'Tannis murmured. “She is missing.”

Master Atris raised one white eyebrow. “What do you think she has done, Emperor?”

“Oh, ho--” the Toydarian began to laugh--but then his beak fell open. His bird's eyes went blank.

“Again?” Rew Ekkumi sighed. Rensha shared her exasperation.

The Emperor kept vanishing. It did not appear to be deliberate. He would return confused, sometimes hours later, repeating the same phrases as if no time had passed.

“Incoming message, text.” Lieutenant Reela was too green for the job, but she had been the best replacement for C'Tannis. “Incoming, um… I think it's from the cloaked ship. General Canderous Ordo. He… wants to speak with 'the hu'tuun chakaar who are holding my daughter.' That's a quote.”

“Patch him through.” Rensha raised a hand to their defense controllers, nodding in approval as she saw the Hunt's shields flicker into existence around them. “Allow visual transmission.”

“My daughter.” Canderous Ordo was a blank, visored suit of armor, flanked by two more. “We're sending a shuttle. You're gonna let us board.”

“Young daughter is here.” Rensha nodded, and the cam-handlers turned their lenses on the girl, whose fierce smile did her ancestors proud, even for a hostage. “But we require assurance. Perhaps a token of good faith--”

The communications officer coughed, and her implant received the message of another incoming transmission--this one from the planet itself.

This one using top-secret military codes. Their top-secret military codes.

Rensha's eyes narrowed. Some ruse dreamed up between Ordo and Revan?

“Millifar of Ordo is your prisoner.” Ordo's voice was hard as stone. “Release her.”

The girl scowled and muttered something under her breath.

“A shuttle has appeared,” Reela reported.

“Coming from the cloaked ship Aleema, no doubt.” Master Atris smiled. “Give the girl back, Rensha. A gesture of goodwill. The Mando'ade may have their part to play.”

“Hrm.” Rensha nodded her snout at the lieutenant. “The Mandalorians may have their part in this. And the transmission from the planet?”

“Transmission from the planet says it’s from… uh…” the lieutenant hesitated. “Admiral Carth Onasi and a…a Lady Sheris Darkstar.”

“Oh?” The Jedi Master might have thought she was hiding her surprise, but the predator in Rensha noted the dilation of her pupils, the quickened breath.
“Darkstar is probably Revan herself,” General Sand opined what they all knew. His holographic face scowled--beamed in from his troop carrier, The Grand Purpose. “Trying to dodge her crimes. Or trap us.”

“But which Revan?” Master Atris murmured.

“The real one.” Sand's from deepened.

“The copy is dead,” Admiral Cein added. “The planetary footage could have been faked--”

“Perhaps both.” Master Atris lifted an eyebrow. “Or none.”

“Your Force-magic cannot tell?” Rensha wondered if the woman lied. “Send Millifar Ordo to meet her father.” Rensha blinked her eyes, using her implant to select a small guard detail for that purpose. She had fought the Mando’ade since her scales were soft and they never began an ambush with a hostage exchange. “Direct the Mandalorian shuttle to Hangar Bay Pesh-Six. Let Commander Q’ro handle diplomatic introductions. They will need to leave this system, cede it to us, before they can have her.”

Commander Q’ro nodded, standing. “Thank you. Scan their shuttle for weapons. Flag anything out of the ordinary--radioactives, biologics…” He gestured for two from his detail to take Millifar Ordo. The girl did not object, but she glanced back once, teeth bared in a triumphant grin, as she was escorted from the bridge.

“And the others?” Admiral Cein overstepped his place with the question. “Onasi and Revan?”

Rensha paced across the deck. “Prepare the main hangar and a shuttle for Admiral Onasi and Lady Sheris. Full honor guard.” Hard not to trigger her venom-sacs with those titles. “As well as full troop battalion with sniper detail along the aft and fore scaffoldings of the hangar. “Master Atris… you will attend?”

“Indeed.” The white-haired Jedi nodded her head. “I enjoy the occasional surprise.”

Xxx

Low Admiral Sirida of the highest-ranking remaining Imperial dreadnaught The Captive Arm stared gloomily at the flimsiplast print-out of his orders, the latest to come in from High Admiral Carth Onasi, whereabouts classified, but presumably lurking somewhere on the planet beneath them--and not manning this command ship as they navigated, very carefully and very cloaked, between a Republic navy five times their size and a Mandalorian fleet that had them merely twice outnumbered.

Move to position at Kaas orbit, cloaked, the orders read. No matter what. Do not engage.

No matter what? Admiral Ellakin Sirida could think of so many ways such an order could go heinously wrong.

“Move our ships,” he told the helmswoman. “Set positions closer to the sun--between Ravannis and Dromund Siik.” Orbiting the system's smallest planets would give them ample time to mount a response if commanded, but still remove their forces from the battle if the situation between the Mandalorians and the Republic deteriorated further.

“But the orders said to hold position--” Commodore Wootis was growing bold, with no Sith Lord on hand to keep her in line.
“And my orders to you are to hold a position we can keep.” It was a delicate dance: following the command of the former Republic war hero Carth Onasi (whose commands thus far had only lost good men and ships), while preserving as much of the Imperial fleet as he could. Still--Ellakin cast a glance at the red-robed priest, standing silent sentinel in the corner of the bridge. “Has the Voice given any more instructions, Seer Mann?”

Seer Thallema Mann pulled her hood back, regarding him coolly with her cracked yellow eyes. “No,” she said. “It sleeps.”

“And do you have any visions from Ziest to assist us, milady?” Useless, these priests were. Thule and Ziest had fallen without so much as a whimper.

The Seer licked her scarred lips. “All I can see is death and fire.”

“In which case we move away from the potential conflagration.” Ellakin Sirida paced to the command center, nodding at Wootis to give the orders to the rest of the Imperial fleet. “To the coordinates I specified.”

The bloated thing that lived in a pit near the ship's hyperdrive core was a relic from another time. If the Emperor’s Voice had run out of words at last, perhaps their people would finally be free.

And what are we supposed to do then? Admiral Sirida had no answers. Freedom always came at a cost—and the price was usually tearing half of what they had gained to pieces.

XXX

The camp looked as if it had been hit by a hurricane. Debris and some docking lights illuminated the perimeter, and the roar of grounded shuttles and the fighters blocking them deafened the air. The Mandalorian ships that hadn't made it back to the Aleema sat in the half-blasted clearing with their turbines churning, while above in the sky, Republic aurek and grounder snubfighters flew in a low dragnet, guns primed. Above the fighters, against the twinkling stars of the night sky, hung at least two gunships, prepped to give fire to anyone fool enough to run their blockade.

It was, Carth thought, only a matter of time before someone got cocky and everything started to burn. They were the last sentients left walking around. The rest had scattered into the forest--those who were able--or gone with the Mandalorians.

The Mandalorian shuttles had taken the, worst injured and the most helpless. Carth smiled a little, thinking about how Canderous would grumble at that, but still do the right thing.

You're softer than you look, Ordo.

Three years ago, when they'd loaded into the Hawk, Carth had never imagined he'd give a damn about an aging Mandalorian mercenary, or a Wookiee, or the fate of the Imps he'd been fighting for years. But things… things changed.

Zaalbar. Carth’s head turned in the direction of his friend, toward the Dark Temple, its main doors still closed and dead. Zaalbar had taken some supplies into the jungle below the cliffs, as well as the Wookiees and a few non-Wookiee survivors who wanted to stay. Goodbye, old friend. For now.

“Dad?” His son came down the gangway of the Hawk, dressed again in a ragged mechanic's coverall. Goggles covered his eyes. “They here yet?”

“Oh, no.” Carth smiled at his son, managing to keep calm by the skin of his teeth. “You’re not coming. The High Admiral asked Sheris and me to come alone.”

“No way.” His son shook his head. “You know it's a trap, right?”

“Sure, but I…” Carth took in his son’s yellow-eyed glare. “I don't want them to get the wrong idea.” I think I can talk us out of it.

“What the frack wrong idea is that?” Dustil scoffed. “That I'm still Darth Malak? Maybe that's the right idea. They won't mess with you if I'm there.”

“We don't want to antagonize them. They're not the enemy, remember?” I want you safe.

Above their heads—above the clouds covering most of the sky, a Republic armada of more than a hundred ships had gathered—effectively forming a blockade between the planet and the Sith and Mandalorian fleets—as well as between their ships and the hyperspace jump points out of the system. Now, as Carth watched, a set of landing lights sparked and flared, and the shuttle Rensha had sent for them banked down through the clear night sky.

“I’ve got goggles on, see?” His son cracked a smile.

“Thank you for changing out of the armor,” Sheris emerged from the Hawk with more armor on, cadged from somewhere in their stores. She looked both ridiculous and terrifying. Carth was no expert, but the meter-long pointed epaulets she wore didn’t seem practical. His wife would have never worn anything--

“You're welcome,” Dustil scoffed. “Are you trying to pretend to be her?”

“No.” Sheris shook her head. “I’ll present myself as a Revan pretender. Whether that fools them or not…” her voice trailed off. “I’m not sure what awaits us. It could be an ambush.”

“In which case you’ll need me,” Dustil snapped. “Or Father will.”

“If you're not going back to the Aleema, I want you to go with them--Polla and Seiran.” Carth patted the side of Hawk's blue-painted hull. For now, the Hawk was grounded like the rest of the Mandalorian shuttles.

For now. Carth had no doubt he could run the blockade in the Hawk—probably Polla Organa could too—but even if they got free, that would still leave the rest, leave the Imperial Fleet cloaked in the skies above, and leave the Mandalorian fleet with a target on their backs.

“Carth.” As if he’d summoned her, Polla Organa appeared, dropping down from an access hatch under the Hawk's belly. “Flight checks are gold. Whatever Rulan did worked. Her systems are still clean. I'll keep her manual just in case, but she should be fine to rub when you get back.”

“And the T3 sounds like Mission again.” Seiran appeared behind his wife, dropping to ground with a hydrospanner in his hand. “We’ve still got the restraining bolt on, but she’s yelling for you guys.”

A blinking set of lights above in the sky told Carth they were out of time. Their shuttle escort was incoming.

“There’s no time. Tell her--” Carth felt his throat choke, more tears he hadn’t had time to shed for Revan starting to blur his vision. “Tell her I’m sorry,” he said. “Soon as things… soon as I can, I’ll see her again.”

“She’s asking for him, too. Dustil…?” Polla raised both eyebrows, not just one. “You coming with “No, I’m going with my father.” Dustil shrugged. “And Lady Darkstar.” He rolled his eyes.

“No.” Sheris crossed her arms. “You’re not. Go with Polla and Seiran for now.”

Behind, the shuttle approached, blinking its final landing checks, flanked by two snubs. It was an officer’s transport carrier. Heavily armored with no cannon of its own. So they can shoot us out of the sky?

“Blah, blah, blah,” Dustil folded his arms, raising his voice to be heard as the three ships landed in front of them. “No, Lady Sheris.”

“Just Sheris,” she corrected. “And you aren't coming.”

“Oh, yeah? None of you can stop me.”

My son looks like a Sith Lord and acts like a spoiled kid. If only he was a spoiled kid. If only they could make it through this… then Carth would spoil him rotten until they were both old and gray.

“Your presence will only confuse things.” Sheris turned to Carth. “You tell him.”

Damned if Carth wanted to agree with the woman who'd taken his wife's body and stashed it away on this blasted planet, but she was right. “Dustil--”

“You're taking her side? Really?”

“It's not a matter of sides!”

Sheris scowled. “If Rensha means us harm, your presence won't stop them. But they may see you as hostile. If there are other Force-users on that ship, they will treat you with suspicion--”

“You can't tell if they've got Jedi up there?” Dustil scoffed. “Really?”

“What I sense is confusion. Perhaps the planet is clouding my perception--”

“Well, I sense someone. Someone strong. Up there.”

Her voice sharpened. “Oh?”

“I think they're hiding, but every once in a while, they slip up. Could be another Emperor body, or some asshole Jedi. Whoever it is, I'm not sending my father up there to face them alone.”

“You sense a Force user? You're sure?”

“You don't?” he scoffed.

“I… no.” The oval of her face was a blank moon, her certainty and assurance melting away like an illusion. Sheris shook her head, lips moving. Muttering to herself. She kept doing that. Not for the first time, Carth had to wonder if she was cracked.

Dustil rolled his eyes. “See, Dad? You need me.”

Carth wasn't sure he was wrong.

Together, they watched as the shuttle settled on Kaas soil, hiss of the stabilizers sending up a mist.
of steam and dust. The landing ramp lowered. Armored feet clattered down; a full squadron of shock troops with a uniformed officer. With her hair tucked under a cap and her face half in shadow, it took Carth a second to recognize the woman in admiral's gray who led them.

“Rew!” He stepped forward.

“Admiral Onasi?” The frost in her voice told Carth familiarity had been a mistake. “And Lady Darkstar.” Click as the dozen rifles trained on them. “You're to come with us, now.”

“Yeah, I….” Carth turned his head to see Sheris and his son still glaring at each other.

“Give us a sec,” his son added, sneering.

“A sec?” Rew Ekkumi's incredulous gasp sounded more like herself. “Dustil?”

“Oh, hey,” Carth's son raised his hand in a half-wave. “Captain Ekkumi. Hi.”

“Admiral Ekkumi,” Rew said flatly, recovering. Her hand was on the blaster at her hip. “We've been informed you are no longer possessed by Darth Malak.”

“Sure.” Dustil shrugged, shoving his hands into his pockets and slouching. “That’s right. Just me now, Admiral. Hey, is there a Jedi up there with your fleet or not? Lady Sheris and I have a bet.”

“Yes.” Admiral Ekkumi gestured to her men to stand aside, forming a line along the landing ramp.

“Which Jedi?” Sheris interrupted.

“The last one.” The admiral's voice dropped another ten degrees.

Sheris made a noise that could have been a laugh. “Fine.” Her head jerked in a nod. “Come. But be wary, Dustil.”

“I'm not--” damnit, Carth still wasn't sure.

“I need him,” Sheris snapped. “Please.”

“Okay.” From Rew's attitude, they could use the back-up.

“Leaving so fast, Captain?” Voice behind him.

“Yes.” He turned around to see Polla Organa, slouched beneath a wide hat that hid most of her features. She had his lucky blaster on her hip. He'd thought they might confiscate it, and he'd wanted them to have luck, in case--and for Dustil--

“Good luck,” she muttered, edging back from the troopers, like she didn't want them to see her face.

“Yeah.” Carth didn't think, he just turned and grabbed her in a hug. For a second Polla froze, but then he felt her arms lock around his waist. The pointed chin under the hat tilted up. Her teeth glinted, fake green eyes only a glimmer. “Be careful--” he whispered the rest in her ear, pushing the hat to the side to do so.

“I will. Um, you too.” Her hand came up around his neck. Their faces were close. She planted a kiss on the side of his lips.

He blinked. “I… uh--”

“We will see you soon,” Sheris added stiffly, somewhere behind him. “I will see you again, Poll--”

“Desiderata Star,” Polla Organa pulled away from Carth, her voice clipping like Revan’s. “Right. Yeah… about that… comm me when you get a chance? You still owe me credits.”

“Credits?” Sheris frowned as if she’d never heard of them.

The Deralian snorted. “Just comm me, okay? Soon.”

“Of course.” Sheris sounded puzzled. “I will comm you about the… credits.”

Xxx

The shuttle carrying Carth, Bossypants, and the kid left a tracer of fire in the sky, joining the glimmering lights overhead. In the end, it had all been too rushed for much of a goodbye. Bossypants had stiffly promised they would meet again soon, Carth had pulled Polla into a hug, she’d kissed him for luck, and the kid had sulked. She hadn't had a chance to tell the woman about her own kid.

Darth Bossypants had nearly blown her cover. Polla Organa was still supposed to be dead, after all—but someday she was gonna have to tell Darth Bossypants the kid was missing.

That wasn't gonna be fun.

Now, Polla let out a sigh and sat down on the ramp again. After a second, Seiran sat down too and put his arm around her. She rested her head against his shoulder. “How do I know you’re you?”

“What?” he chuckled.

“You could be the shapeshifter.” She hadn’t believed they could be real, but Rulan Prolik had shifted in front of her: from an Arkanian, to a Wookiee, and finally into a blue-skinned male Twi’lek. “Last I saw he was talking to Mission, but who knows? Everything else impossible has already happened today.”

Her husband’s lips nipped her ear. “I’m me,” he whispered. “Not the shapeshifter.”

Polla looked up at the sky. “I know we're supposed to wait until the Mandies get the all-clear, but we could run that blockade, I bet. Rogere swears he’s a hell of a co-pilot.”

“I’m a hell of a co-pilot. The Houck swore to me he’s a hell of a cook.”

“Well, assassins, they probably need to be flexible.”

“Bounty hunters.”

Oh, Sei. So naive. She snickered. “Right.”

“They’re not assassins, Pollie.”

“Sure,” she agreed. “Bounty hunters.” They’d offered her a job--just flying, they said, but she knew the game. It’d be a slippery slope. Break one law, then another. Next thing you know, you’re plugging sents in the back for credits.
Next thing you know, you're kissing a handsome pilot goodbye and sending him off with a fallen Jedi to save the galaxy--

Aba's gonna love that story the next time I feed him mashed peamato. Is he eating mashed peamato, yet? Ma said he's eating everything--

She reached for her husband's hand and brought it to her lips for a smack.

Seiran raised an eyebrow quizzically. “Pollie, I know we said we’d wait, but--”

“I know.” They were supposed to wait and get a ship of their own from Aemelie after the smoke cleared--give this one back to Onasi if--when--he came back. But... Polla looked up at the stars. Somewhere out there was home. Their son. “I don’t think Carth'd even be surprised if we just left.” Few hundred ships up there, there'd be a lot of confusion. Garbage scows. Shuttle traffic. It wouldn’t be hard to run the gauntlet--not once they cleared cannon range of those gunships, not once they got too close to the main fleet to kill.

“I know you’ll take care of her,” Carth had whispered in her ear. He’d meant the Hawk, or maybe the T3. “Take care of her for me.”

The ship or the T3? Hells, maybe he'd meant his wife, locked away in that damn tomb with poor Zaalbar playing kath guard hound.

“You want to just leave?” Seiran’s arm tightened around her. Polla’s gut still hurt from where she’d been stabbed with a fracking tree. Seiran’s leg would be no good for another month. Spending a week in hyperspace running to the Outliers and home would be a lot smarter than sticking around here to see if the Sith, Mandalorians, and Republic forces were gonna kill each other or play nice.

Polla had never expected to actually score the Ebon Hawk. But... here it was. And there, above, open sky. Free space.

“I don’t know.” Polla took a deep breath. The other grounded ships whined around them, like racing hessi barely leashed. “They haven't shot down any other convoys--just forced 'em down again...”

Seiran stared at her for a long minute, then nodded. “Want to see how things look from the sky?”

She nodded. “Yeah.”

XXX

There was a full-ranking honor guard in the Great Hunt's hangar bay. Revan knew it didn't mean anything. There were still probably cloaked snipers set along the beams of the vaulted walls, and all the troops surrounding them probably had orders to shoot on command; but for a moment the sheer pomp reminded her all too poignantly of their first large-scale victory. When she'd won control of the Hapes System, Admiral Dodonna had greeted them in a hangar like this, with wreaths of leaves from her homeworld, with five hundred hand-picked heroes snapping to salute as she and Malak walked by--

You miss leaving your mark, Red. His voice, gentle and teasing.

I miss... hope. Here it was, bubbling like a spring inside her. The Sleepers had dropped off all planetary scans within hours of the Fragment's imprisonment. The Emperor was already weakened, and when Revan retrieved the box from Nar Shaddaa--
“There.” Dustil Onasi's breath was a faint hiss in her ear--almost in passing as his stride lengthened suddenly, stepping in front of his father as if to shield the man. “Your Force user's right up ahead--right there.”

Revan sensed nothing.

In front of them, High Admiral Rensha stood alone--but then two lines of soldiers stepped aside to reveal a white-haired woman, hair in two long braids hanging over her shoulders, flanked by two Echani sword dancers with faces as remote and beautiful as ice.

The woman with the braids was beautiful too. And familiar. Of course, familiar.

“Master Atris,” Revan stopped before her, leaving Carth and his son to fumble awkwardly between acknowledging the Jedi and the High Admiral.

Master Atris's eyes widened. “Padawan Sheris. What a pleasant surprise.”

Her hair was in two braids hanging over her shoulders. Revan blinked slowly, raising her mental shields as quickly as possible. We are all creatures of habit and vanity. I miss my braids. She was too stubborn to give hers up.

“But you had my name, Master... Atris. I was not expecting you, either.”

Fragments of things the Fragment had said danced in her mind. Revelatory things.

Vima Sunrider had wanted Revan’s own body for herself, once. Cheated of that prize, she had found another.

“It seems we are both surprised,” the woman smiled, her voice dripping with spite. “Here at the end of all things. Did Revan send you in her stead, padawan?”

I was a padawan, Sheris whispered faintly. Long ago. But she is mocking you.

“Revan Starfire is gone,” Revan announced, glibly. Loudly, so that Rensha could hear it. And then, behind Rensha, more old friends. Sand and Cein. Holograms--too cowardly to stand before her themselves. “I’m sorry to report.” She attempted a giggle and almost immediately regretted it, nearly hearing Malak's mental groan in her head. “I hope you weren't expecting me to be her.”

Don’t overplay this, Malak warned.

“How?” The white-haired woman lifted an eyebrow. “Revan Starfire survived so much. How did she die?”

Revan turned to address the higher-ranked admiral instead of her old master. “Her ship crashed into a sun.”

“Atris?” Rensha's voice was sharp, but Revan did not turn to look at her, keeping her eyes on the woman who had once been her master. “Is that true?”

“I sense no trace of falsehood. It... could be.” And her uncertainty could be false.

Was Revan believed? To ease her discomfiture, she giggled again.

Overdoing it, Red.

If that is Vima Sunrider, she knows exactly what we are and it does not matter.

“It's true,” Carth mumbled, sounding like it wasn’t.

“The man is lying.” Atris’s voice sounded amused.

Stars, Revan had not asked for his help.

You should have anticipated he would try, Sheris chided.

Technically, what Revan said had been true. The ship with David Arkan in it had belonged to the Fragment. A Pinion from the Aleema, Sinae had said Revan had destroyed. And it had crashed into a sun.

“I deceived Onasi,” Revan added, coolly. She had. Several times, about many things, mostly with assurances about his wife--when she had no proof.

“What?” She felt Carth's head turn toward her. Revan kept her eyes fixed straight ahead.

“How did you convince Revan to fly into a sun?” Master Atris’s voice was as cool as a frozen lake.

“I did not.” Revan shrugged. At her side, Onasi stood frozen. His son looked confused, hand slipping to the pocket of his coveralls, presumably to where his lightsaber lurked. They had not been searched for weapons, which spoke to Rensha's pride. Dodonna would have been smarter.

Carth’s son could be a problem.

Mal?

I can try. The brat’s stronger than he has any right to be.

Revan took a breath. “I convinced Revan to allow us to put her in stasis. A carbonite frame.”

“And?” Vima’s smile was wrong on Atris’s face. She made the delicate features sharper, older, predatory.

“I gave the frame to an associate of mine. Loyal, of course.” Also true. Zaalbar and Rogere had carried the burden well.

Carth shot her a puzzled glance.

You could do this later. Why do it in front of him? Sheris. Perpetually confused. We need him to take us to Nar Shaddaa!

I have my reasons. She needed loyalty. His would always belong to another... but ultimately to the Republic. She needed him elsewhere. Not a prisoner on this ship--not with Sunrider--

Sunrider changed everything. The woman was another plague, perhaps a nascent Emperor herself. And technically, Sheris Loran and Carth Onasi were both war criminals. The Republic Fleet was no soft Jedi Council. If Sunrider decided to dispose or imprison Onasi, he could hardly find the box on Nar Shaddaa. And Revan could not leave to look for it herself--not until she had dealt with her old master--

Her old master who knew perfectly well what Revan had become. Her old master would not let Revan leave. Except under her own control.
The Telosian Admiral who had escorted them from Kaas cleared her throat. “And?” the woman's voice was too sharp. “How did the real Revan end up in a sun?”

Revan shrugged. “Sabotage, perhaps?”

“No.” Carth's interruption was softer than she liked. But pained, as if he believed. “No. You couldn’t. T-there wasn’t time. Why--?” And then he hesitated, she felt him hesitate. Did he understand? Had she given him enough to be loyal before?

Before, in the tombs, she had felt they'd reached an understanding. He liked my tears, Sheris whispered, almost smug. He wanted to save us.

“To stop the Emperor I would sacrifice anyone,” Revan snapped. Her eyes met Vima's, saw the cold amusement there.

Carth Onasi’s voice was quietly stubborn, behind her. “No. You said you would take care of her.”

“I have.” His pain was overwhelming. She had not anticipated feeling it, feeling the shock of tears again forming in the corners of her eyes, feeling the ache of a loss that rivaled her own. The loss could not be feigned, but would he see?

His son was slower to react, looking between them, confused, like a lost nerf calf. “Wait,” he said. “You killed her? You actually killed her? No way! There wasn’t time!”

“Not directly. Dustil. Have you ever played three-cup pibbittch?” She forced another giggle, feeling like a HoloNet villain.

Her old master smiled and Revan felt that sick surge of pride to have pleased her--followed by doubts, shame, fear that it was all a trick--I don’t want to please her. I need her to believe.

She’s probing your mind. Malak’s voice. I don’t remember Vima being this strong before--

She had not been. Then stop her. Shield me.

Revan’s hand went to her belt, to the saber Sinae had been kind enough to return--just in time.

Father and son fired nearly simultaneously. The first bolt went wild, but she barely deflected the second, sending it back dangerously close to the pack of Republic officers she did not want dead. Revan took a step to the side--just in time to nearly buckle under the Onasi boy’s Force leap; the weight of his single blade bearing down upon her double, trying to reach the center of her grip as she twisted her edge--

“Dustil!” The father called out sharply. Real panic in his voice. His shot had been the one that had missed. Now, Red.

Revan retracted the blade instantly, leaving the boy's blow to bounce off Malak’s Force shielding as she rolled away, settling halfway down the hall, stepping back quickly behind a pillar. Her heart pounded in her chest. She felt naked and exposed. More vulnerable than she’d been in an age. The terentatek had been sport. Tenebrae’s guards had been nothing. They had not wanted her dead.
Sport? That terentatek almost killed us.

Silence, Sheris!

“Guards!” Rensha called out—as if they could be a match for the younger Onasi. “Prepare to vent the bays.”

Revan’s head turned back to the crowd of Fleet officers. All pulling on enviromasks. With a jolt she noted their boots. Not dress regulation. Magnetized. Heavy plated. I should have noticed that before!

Would it have made a difference, Red?

“Wait.” She didn’t have to feign the quaver in her voice. When Revan stepped out from behind the column, she noted that Vima was the only one not wearing a mask. The woman stretched Master Atris’s mouth in a smile. “Wait!” She called out again, staring at Captain Onasi, whose blaster was leveled at her, whose son stood behind him, a black wall of Force, powerful enough to shake a ship in orbit. The expression on his face—did he truly believe or not? Did it matter in this moment? “Let them go,” she commanded—

Sheris would never command—

I would not give an admiral orders, not without my lord’s direction—

“Let them go,” Revan ordered again. Does Carth understand? The man was an excellent shot. His son’s strength rivalled Malak’s. If they had truly wanted to end her, she would be dead. “Captain Onasi’s reaction is understandable. He loved his wife.”

“Carth…” The dark-haired woman stepped forward. Admiral’s bars. Telosian accent. I remember Ekkumi, Malak whispered. Another one of Karath’s soldiers. She thinks she’s in love with him. That was obvious and tired.

“Rew.” Carth seemed to notice her again, as if for the first time. “I….”

“Dad?” The boy’s voice trailed off, the darkness around him fading. “You want me to kill Sheris for you or not?”

Carth’s eyes met hers. He blinked twice. The nod was nearly imperceptible, but still an unnecessary risk. “Not.” He swallowed. “Not here, Dustil. We need to… we need to go.”

“Goodbye, Admiral.” Revan gave him a short bow, the kind the Jedi had once used with Fleet commanders in the early days of the war.

“Carth,” the dark-haired woman repeated. Softer this time. “You can’t leave, I’m afraid. I have orders to keep you in custody.”

“No.” He drew his blaster again, shaking his head and stepping back. “Not today, Rew.” The red circle from one of the sniper’s sights painted his face like blood, but his stance didn’t waver. “I’ve delivered your Sith prisoner. Consider her a gift. My son and I… we’ll be going.”

Revan glanced down without surprise to see one of the circles planted over her own heart. She would have to commend those snipers later for their restraint—if it lasted.

“You defected to the Imperials, Onasi. The Sith Emperor calls you High Admiral of his Fleet.”
Rensha sounded impatient. “From the codes you sent, I expected a surrender.”

“Things change.” Carth was looking anywhere but at Revan now. “My fleet has orders to fire on yours if we're not back on the planet within the hour--”

“He's lying,” Atris said sharply.

“Am I? Can you risk it?” The man didn't blink, and Revan had to admire his courage. “I'm also a Mandalorian citizen. The Aleema's out there, too, and--”

The Force was with them. It had been with her so much of her life that Revan no longer questioned its whimsy. One of the maintenance airlocks blew open. A humanoid figure in beskar dropped down. Then another. And another. An entire battalion.

As if proof that the Force also had a curious sense of humor, one of the largest warriors wore Revan's mask.

Of course. Ordo would not leave this to his lackies.

A sickening crunch and a thud from behind caused Revan to turn her head. One of the snipers had fallen from his position. Or been pushed.

“S'cuy!” a feminine voice rang out from the scaffolds above. “We're clear, Father!”

“Good.” Canderous Ordo nodded. “We're taking Onasi,” he barked at High Admiral Rensha. “And the kid.” His eyes rested on Revan for less than a second before looking away. “You can keep the nastaar. She's your problem.”

Nastaar. Destroyer. Mandalorians were too literal.

“Commander Q'ro and his men?” Vima Sunrider colored Atris's voice with an amusement it had never held in life. The two Echani flanking her looked as blank as plates.

“Stuffed in a supply closet. Alive.” The Mandalorian hoisted his repeater, pulling the auto-lock back. “This is not a season for war. We’re here for what's ours. My daughter. Onasi. The kid.” His visored face nodded at Carth. “Promised I'd fetch you.”

“She… you didn't have to.” Carth Onasi looked rattled. “I told her you wouldn't.”

“Hold.” The High Admiral commanded her honor guard. “For now.”

“Smart,” Canderous Ordo grunted. “Milli! Find us a shuttle!”

“You troch can keep the one we took here,” the armored figures at his right said. “It was not much to begin with.”

“This one.” Ordo's daughter called out. She descended on jetpacks, landing on the craft from which they had so recently departed. She was blonde and young, with a prosthetic arm already. Her face was bruised from a recent tussle. “Thick plates, and the base is wide enough to add cannon, I think.”

“A good choice,” Atris's voice said. Smugly.

I sense confusion, Sheris whispered. She does not know what to make of us.

Strange, since she made us for some reason.
She does not expect me. Malak seemed sure.

The crowd was still as the grave as Millifar walked to them, saluting her father as if they had just finished a dance upon the training ground.

“This is not an act of war,” Rensha said. “Yet. But you skirt dangerously close. What do you want, Mandalorian?”

“I want my people outta here.” Canderous was a blunt block of beskar, striding forward. “And to leave this hu'tuun carcass of a planet for your Republic infii to pick at in peace. Clean up the rest of your mess, lift the blockade from my ships….” He shrugged, making a show of checking his repeater. “If you'd rather have a fight, I figure we can take about half your fleet while you're electing a new High Admiral, or however you do.”

“Is that a threat?” The Trandoshan's lip curled.

“On the planet.” Carth almost sounded amused.

“Right. Harm the planet and we'll be back,” Canderous added. “Any questions?”

“None for you--” Admiral Rensha was starting at Sheris. “However, if you think the Republic Navy is going to roll over on our backs and allow Mandalorians to make off with the Imperial Fleet--”

“They?” Canderous Ordo snorted. “I'd just as soon blood my boys on what's left of them, except it'd be too easy. You can have the Sith ships--we just want what is ours.”

“Let the Mando'ade go in peace,” Master Atris interrupted. “On this day they are not the enemy.”

“Our war will not come today,” Admiral Rensha echoed. “You may go, General Ordo.”

Vima's subtle, Revan noted. But she has her hooks in Rensha, probably in every officer on this ship.

Be careful, Red.

“High Admiral? There's a ship making a run on the blockade now….” One of Rew's officers looked up from her tablet. “We have the standard quad in pursuit, but they've broken through the line. Do you want to launch another squadron?”

Rensha's snout curled as her own eyelids filmed obviously checking her optical implant for confirmation. “The Blue Ghost? Strange. It looks like the Ebon Hawk.”

“If that is the Hawk, did another ship of Revan's fell into a sun?” Atris murmured.

“Obviously.” Revan shrugged.

“And it's...it's gone, sir.” The lieutenant blinked. “That was--fast.”

Carth's eyes met Revan's before she could look away.

She forced another giggle.

Stop doing that, Sheris chided her. It's not working.
They had not disarmed them or clapped a Force collar on Revan yet. Hope. Strange emotion.

“You have my word.” Carth’s voice was steady. “The people on this planet need help, not war. Let us go... and I’ll order the Imperial Command to stand down. Begin terms for surrender. In a year these worlds could be protectorates of the Republic. Think of the message that would send.”

There was a long pause. In it, Carth looked at Revan again. She could not risk a nod of approval. It will take more than a year. Can you still speak to the boy? she asked Malak.

If I could, he would not have nearly killed you.

Carth knows what to do. Sheris, at least seemed sure. The little fool.

“Well?” Rensha turned to Atris.

“I sense no falsehood.” The master shrugged. “They have nothing. Unless the Mando’ade back the Imperials--”

“Not unless you shoot first.” The blonde girl spoke out of turn, but her father did not object.

He’s soft with her. The Fett Mand’alor of Lin had never been so soft.

The blonde tilted her head, frowning. “Millifar. Who are you?”

“Admiral Onasi’s son. Dustil.” The bluster in his voice would have been comical under different circumstances. “Jin of Lin’s friend. Dustil.”

“Oh!” She looked startled. “That Dustil! You’re not dead.”

“Neither are you.”

The girl’s smile spoke to her naivety. “Is Mekel with--”

“Yammer about Jin later,” Canderous snapped. “We need to go. Now.”

Stay very quiet, Malak murmured. Sunrider’s probing us again.

Us. Weak Sheris’s eyes pricked again with a sudden surge of emotion. We are not alone. I am not alone. This is just one more battle. We will find out way out--

Quiet, Malak chided. You know better. She senses something.

Revan did know. She let her eyes rest on Master Atris and her Echani bodyguards as the Mandalorians made their way to the shuttle, with Carth Onasi and his sullen son. Master Atris stared back at Revan steadily. Her eyes were an icy blue-gray. Untouched by the dark.

Perhaps she still believed herself a disciple of the light.

Or, perhaps Nomi Sunrider of old had learned more from the cracked mind of Aleema Keto than the lost art of Battle Meditation. Illusions. For all I know half the crew sees something else here entirely--

Revan let her eyes drop meekly to the durasteel plates of the floor. Sheris would have done that.
I would never have looked at her at all. What if she tricked me?

She does not need to look at you for her tricks.

The shuttle's engines roared. Revan felt the sparks depart, taking hope along. The T3 had been restored. It claimed to know the location of the box. Carth Onasi was an honorable man. She hoped she had earned his trust—that he understood what was at stake—that he would know where to find Polla Organa and his stolen ship—

She had hope.

We will find a way to reach them to guide them--

Careful, Red.

“Leave us,” High Admiral Racharn said abruptly to her honor guard.

Revan kept her eyes on the floor, waiting. Something shivered in the Force. Her own nerves. A premonition of danger. Her old master, restored to youth and her full power. How was it possible? She did not remember Atris being as strong as the woman she sensed now.

The stomp of mag boots marked the guard's departure. The blast doors slid closed, leaving only Rensha and her officers--in hologram and flesh.

Atris and the two white-haired Echani walked slowly to a raised dais opposite the Fleet commanders. As if she controlled the game.

“We know,” Admiral Rensha hissed. “We know what you are: Revan’s mind in her clone's body.” Her taloned head turned toward Atris's body. “Is she lying about the other one being destroyed?”

“I sense no deception in her words. But that means nothing.” Her thin lips smiled. “Revan will not answer me with words that do not hold truth. Revan's ship went into a sun. Revan is gone. Those are truths. But is this her end?”

Revan shrugged, letting a trace of insolence that would make the Fragment proud color her words. “Some say there is no death, only the Force.” She told them who I am? Revan had not expected that. The fantasy of walking into Sheris's life, taking Korrie to a faraway place, made its final retreat, leaving the ice of vacuum in its place.

We could still run. Fool Sheris was trying to be brave. That ship over there. It's the closest. The shields are still down from the Mandalorian departure--

It won't work. Revan's thought mixed with Malak's, both of them agreeing. Vima could stop us with a thought. She's powerful. She should not be this powerful--

“The last Mandalorian shuttles are departing the planet's surface. An Imperial fleet of eight capitals and their supply ships have uncloaked around Dromund Siik, the planet closest to the sun.” The lieutenant paused. “The Imperials… they are requesting an honorable surrender.”

This is it, Revan thought. No matter what else, I've won.

“Atris?” Rensha turned to her Jedi advisor. Her deference made Revan's hackles rise-- she had not expected submissiveness, although if Vima's hooks were in the Trandoshan's mind--

They most definitely are.
I've almost won, she amended. There is still Vima.

“One battle is done,” Atris murmured.

“The unmanned fleet? Her ghost ships?” Rensha's tongue flicked in and out.

“Still no sign, sir. The Merchant’s guilds are reporting clear hyperlanes.”

“As well as some new hyperlanes.” Admiral Rensha's tongue flickered in and out. “Your Sleeper Fleet gave us that, Revan.”

Never mine. I was to be theirs. For some reason, Revan shivered and Atris's face smiled.

Had Vima taken Atris unawares, as she must have done Sheris?

No! I wanted your memories, Sheris whispered. I took them willingly. I wanted to lose myself. I wanted Malak to love me--

I did before. His voice was soft, a breath between them. You did not have to change, Sheris--

Shut up. Both of you. Senseless drivel. Empty promises. The smuggler had taken the ship and the droid. Captain Onasi would find them. They would only need one sentient possessed by the Emperor to seal his fate in the box. The droid would know how--the droid had to know--had to be uncorrupted--

So many variables, all beyond her control.

“And so, here we are. At the end of all things.” Master Atris's voice murmured, so soft Revan thought the woman was in her head. But then she saw the dust motes frozen in the air, the Doshan admiral frozen in mid-command... and Admiral Ekkumi's hand on her holstered blaster, the gun half of it out already, the beads of sweat frozen on the woman's brow.

“Is Admiral Ekkumi about to shoot me?”

“The calibration is set for a strong Jedi. For your true body. She asked my advice on the settings it would take to kill a Jedi, once.” That dry amusement. “The blast would certainly kill you....” Atris's brow furrowed in thought. “But so would the boy's attack, earlier--yet here you stand.”

“Perhaps I've learned something.” Revan felt her voice slide into the old bitterness. “Here at the end of all things.”

Her master's new face smiled. “Did you mean to kill me at Malachor? So many truths between us--but that one I have never known.”

“No. I needed your battle meditation to boost the signal so the others would feel the planet burn. Orbits were carefully calibrated so that you and Davad and Meetra would live.”

“And my son?” Impossible to tell from that voice if she'd cared for the boy--for any of them--at all.

“You were a fool to bring Oerin into battle.” Had Revan known the boy would be there? She could not remember.

“Perhaps we are all fools when it comes to our children. Where is your son now?” That tone of voice made Revan's spine prickle. “Davad went above me. The Blades received an assignment to retrieve him, but Malachor was never found. The Blade assigned vanished.”
“Which Blade?”

“Three. Of Acknahar’tah.”

One of the oldest lines. Revan did not remember Three. The Blades had been Vima's—and then Davad's, she had only moved them across the board--

Mal’s safe, Red.

Revan realized her flesh hand was clenched, nails biting into her palm. “I’m sorry the Fragment killed Davad. He could have been useful--”

“There is always another.” Her smug tone grated. “Or a replacement. But would you have used Arkan?” The woman's brows lifted. At her side, her Echani handmaidens were carved from ice. “Allowed my Darth Nihilus to consume the Force just to kill one man?”

“The Emperor is more than one man. You hated him as much as I did.”

Yes, Malak muttered in her mind. Destroying the Force would have ended everything. No more monsters. It would have ended her. And us.

No, breathed Sheris. The Force is in everything. If you take that light away from the galaxy what remains?

“I don’t know. The choice was taken from me. Arkan was a weapon that I could have used. Revan never gave me the chance.”

“You were my favorite weapon,” Vima lied, voice soothing and soft. “Always.”

“I used to wonder if my childhood was a dream, if you'd made me in a lab.”

“No.” Her former master shook her head. “I found you. And then made sure he did.”

“Do you have more of me waiting in the wings? Or more of you--?”

“One of me. I left myself in a weaker vessel even than you. A shadow no one will see… but will he be loyal?” Vima shrugged. “As loyal as all of my children, I suppose. Your betrayal was magnificent. You made me stronger, even as you transformed yourself.”

“I sent you a message. With my HK. Did you receive it?”

“No. What did it say?”

Perhaps the droid had lost itself on Malachor V, where Revan had expected Davad to be. It would have been wiser to send HK-47 to their son, to keep him safe, but Revan had worried the machine would only attract attention.

“Nothing important. Not now.” She forced herself to meet those colorless eyes. “I've won.”

“So much that you are about to be assassinated by one of your former commanders.”

“I don't remember her.”

We sent her wing to hold the supply depot on Dxun. Air support. We left them. Ekkumi limped back to Iziz with an empty tank of fuel and a dying crew. Those gas canisters full of--
Oh. Revan remembered that. Xoxon gas. From the Stereb spires.

“Ulic Qel-Droma had no memory of Corporal Hoggin, but the man's blaster still found its mark.”

“Were you there?” Revan realized she'd put her hands carefully behind her back, folding the golden one over the flesh just like they were back on Dantooine, and she was listening carefully to one of Vima's tales. “When Ulic died? Which… which one of you was there?”

“Both. Nomi knew it would come to pass. Vima required the lesson.”

_The lesson._ Perhaps it had been kinder for Revan, never knowing how her parents met their fate--or whose hand guided the blade.

_I read it was an ice storm, _sniveling Sheris broke in.

_I never knew. Perhaps it was. The Fragment asked me about them once, I never had the chance to say what I knew--I knew so little._

“Is my lesson over? Are you going to end this by telling me to accept my fate? Another mindwipe? Drop me into a sun?” Her teeth worried the side of her cheek until Revan tasted blood. Pain was a laughable defense against Vima's level of power, but it was something she could do.

“Don't disappoint me now. You've come farther than I ever could have hoped.” Vima's voice shifted, becoming silken, almost seductive. “Did you try to open the tomb in this body?”

Force stasis was fickle. Its range was not infinite. Ten meters away in the hangar Revan stared at a command console. A tech was leaning over it, speaking animatedly into a console. As she watched, a map of the galaxy sprung up, surrounded in stars.

“Of course.” Guilt mixed with relief. “Did you?”

“I avoided the planet entirely.” Amusement in her voice. “Did she open her tomb?”

“No.” Revan forced herself to fake another one of Sheris's giggles, merely to annoy the old woman. “Would we be here if she had?”

“Perhaps. You resisted its call for years.”

“Nearly two years. It may have made me mad.” Something occurred to Revan. “Beya's betrayal--was that you?”

“No.” The old woman shook her head, chuckling softly. “One of the only moments in time when Vitiate and I were ever in accord was when we both tried to save your life.”

_And erase it. Reprogram me with a new one._ But the old anger was gone.

“Which one of you replaced me with her?”

“I did. To keep her hidden from Vitiate. But you came back faster than I had expected--and the Jedi had taken you too far from my side.” Her chuckle was wrong, coming from Atris's mouth. “I cannot control every piece on the board, my padawan, any more than you ever could.”

_I do not think she can read our thoughts_, Sheris whispered.

_I do not think she can, either._ Because a childish part of Revan she'd thought long buried was dwelling vindictively on Oerin and Davad's fates and imagining their agony. Not to mention young Meetra--

I am shielding you as much as I can. But when you reach out to her, Red--

Was that a flicker of emotion on that too-beautiful countenance? A spark of real passion? Hate? Jealousy? Anger? Vima's inflections gave Atris's voice a raw edge. “The Deralian overlay was never meant to last, you know. I intended to incorporate you into us. Our shared experience into your own body--”

“That body--.” Revan tried not to shiver. Weak Sheris did not have the stomach for this. “The body's heart stopped. You'll never have it, now.”

“I am sure it did,” her master said. “Or you would not say so. Of course, hearts usually stop when they burn in suns. Nomi's did, too. Did your original body burn, Revan?”

“Always.” With a power she had once assumed to be hers.

Another low chuckle was Vima's response.

Revan walked over to Rew Ekkumi, loosening those stuff fingers from the grip of her disruptor pistol, pulling it out of the holster. Vima had not lied: the charge was illegally modded, set at ten times the lethal Human level.

The Fragment still would have survived the blast. But Revan would not.

“Ah,” Vima chuckled. “Changing your fate?”

“Did Ulic?” Did he have the chance?

“Ulic was consumed by guilt, by the shame of his actions. It made him soft.”

Soft, Revan thought, remembering Malak's madness. Her own.

We are not soft now. Sheris was surprisingly brave, with two Sith Lords supporting her.

“I suppose Atris's body is not invulnerable--” she leveled the pistol carefully, testing its weight.

The woman who could stop her with an eye-blink, blinked… but did not stop her. Her expression sharpened, seeming almost curious.

Red? Is this a good idea?

She did this. In that moment, she knew herself not to be Jedi Knight Revan, but the worst parts of them all. Malak's anger, her own ruthless pride, and Sheris's foolish romanticism--

“If you strike me down will you take my place in the war to come?” her old master whispered. “Do you think yourself capable, Revan?”

“I always was.” Malachor V, the Rakatan virus, the Star Forge. And then, a bitter thought; one that Revan hated her mind for recalling. The worst of all possible worlds. “Tenebrae was dying already, master. All we had to do was let his empire fall. But you gave him me.”

Vima shook her head. “If he fell, another would rise from the ash. The Sleepers and the Rakatan computer will make sure of it. Even now, how can you be sure you've won?”

Revan raised the pistol, leveling the barrel at the beautiful face, the frost-colored eyes. “I'm not.”
Vima Sunrider blinked, and--

Xxx

One Week Later

Xxx

Atton was his name now, the man kept saying. Well, Mister Atton had lost all of their credits on a bad hand of pazaak, and now Kore's stomach kept growling on the transport as he paced back and forth, trying to feel sick when the engines went whoosh and they came out of hyperspace for the last time before their destination.

They had left Peragus Station really fast, with Atton doing a lot of mumbling about bad dreams. Kore had wanted to go back to Deralia--or maybe to Coruscant, even, because he hadn't been able to send anything to Leeshy in a week. But last week she'd said it seemed pretty safe and they had a nice visitor with a manka cat from the Sith world of Drumming Case staying with them.

Drumming Case happened to be where his mothers had gone.

If he was with Leeshy he could ask the nice visitor if she'd seen them. It wasn't a question for an open comm.

Mothers. Mother. One of them was gone. Kore hadn't felt her die, but he just knew it.

She's not dead. Father’s voice was faint and distracted, like something else tugged at his Force harder than Kore. I promise, Mal.

I know. If she was dead, she'd be here. With Kore.

“Here, kid.” Atton tossed Kore a pack of quik-meet, which was supposed to taste like real meat. It didn't. “We'll eat better tomorrow. I have some contacts on the chivhole with more credits than sense. You ever been to the smuggler's moon before?”

“It's in Hutt Space.” Kore tried not to frown. “Of course not. Outside of Senate jurisdiction.”

“You'll love it, I promise.” Atton was always promising Kore would love things. But he hadn't loved firewhiskey or cigarras. Juma juice gave him a headache. And when Kore was about to try the glitterstim Father got really loud in his head and said “Under No Circumstances.” And, “Your Mother Would Be Furious.”

No one wanted that, so Kore said no thanks.

“Maybe the next time you play sabaac, I could help?” It was cooler than pazaak. You got to pick your bad guys. Kore thought he could beef them up with the Force, maybe. “Or swoops? You promised we could go to the swoop races--”

“Yeah, yeah.” Atton's hand shook a little as he reached for the flask in his shirt. His eyes were full of red veins. “Whatever you want, kid. Anything.”

The ship jolted suddenly. Someone else on the observation deck yelped.

“Please get to your seats,” one of the cruiser-ladies announced, tapping her mic. “Sorry, it's just a bit of spacelane ionization as we enter planetary orbit. Welcome to the Jewel of the Hutt Empire, the city planet of Nar Shaddaa.”
A/N three chapters to the end and an epilogue, I think… Next up: Well... what comes next? A bit of a time jump, in fact....

Thanks, as always, Ether, as always, for the wonderful beta and infinite patience. Any subsequent errors are mine. All mine. This version will no doubt be updated by one with fewer typ0s, Revan awoke to darkness and a bone-breaking cold. Her limbs felt heavy and strange. She blinked but saw nothing. Her mouth tasted like grit.

The ground was shaking.

A warm hand closed on her arm. “Wake up.” The voice was male. Young, speaking accented Basic.

“Whahh—” she heard her voice crack.

"CONSCIOUSNESS RESTORED. REROUTING SYNAPTIC LINK—"

“Hurry,” the voice said. “Please. We need your help!”

Xxx

They stood alone, whispering like they were the only two people in the crowded room. “I said I wouldn't wait for you, beautiful, but—”

“Don't be stupid.” Revan took a deep breath. “Live, okay? Try not to be a Republic war criminal.”

Laughter and pain softened Carth's eyes. “You too.”

“I am a Republic war criminal.” She kissed him. One last time... maybe for the last time.

Her gaze met the Deralian’s, standing there with a carbonite ray in her hand. Their eyes met, but the smuggler looked away first. Polla Organa wasn’t gonna shoot her again. Not without a reason. That nickname, ‘Pollie.’ They’d always hated it, hadn’t they? Polla wouldn’t think Revan had the right to call her that—Revan herself didn’t think she had the right to call Polla that. Pollie. Pollie. Pollie. They’d hated it… and loved it, too. Revan said the name, the carbonite ray sparked — —and then all light vanished.

Like nightfall on Hoth.

Xxx

“Hooowww—” how long?

The voice tugged at her arm. “@-#&@$- agshaha@&&#!”

They speak Ancient Sith in the future? “Eymmm—” I'm blind.

“Can you understand me?” The voice sounded terrified, now switching back to Basic. “I can’t understand you. They said you'd help!”
The world shook again. Revan became aware she was flat on her back. She made her mouth move again, still desperately blinking her eyes. “Hoooooww—” how long? How long is the future?

“It might be centuries.” Dar’s stare was unblinking. “I won’t lie to you. It might be centuries, but when it is safe, we will restore you.”

“And when you say, we…” Revan felt her mouth twist. “Who do you mean, exactly? You’ll be dead.” So would their son. So would everyone she knew.

A low whine caught her attention. “I will watch for you, Polla Revan,” Zaalbar declared. “And my cubs after me.”

Wookiees lived for centuries. Maybe someday, Zaalbar would welcome her back.

“Hurry,” the voice trembled. “Please.”

Agony spiked through Revan’s head, reminding her of the Force collar still embedded in her flesh. She clawed at it. Her hands were coated with a gritty substance that came off on her fingers. The air smelled dank. Revan reached out with a leaden arm and found a hand holding hers. Hairless, about the size of her own, probably five fingers. Not a Wookiee’s hand, then—but she heard a Wookiee—smelled one, maybe two. Not very far away.

“She must rush.” In Shyriiwook the words came out as a whimper. The literal translation meant ‘move like water.’ The growl was high-pitched. A cub, perhaps.

“Zzzz—” Her lips wouldn’t form Shyriiwook any more than Basic. “Zaaalbbbuhh? Whyyyyr—”

“Zaalbar of the Eiweorr branch sent me.” Not Zaalbar’s voice, that squeak of a growl. But he was known. They’ve heard of Zaalbar in the future.

{{STARFIRE UNIT FOUND}} Voice from her tomb, sounding close enough to be in her own head. {{COME}}

Frack you, she thought back. Never.

The hand tugged hers again, and Revan sat up, blinking hard as if that would make the world come back.

“Eeyym bleyennd.” Her voice was unsteady, rasping from a dry throat. I’m blind. I can’t see—”

“Oh. I-I don’t…” Her rescuer sounded confused. “Aggeeawwwwrr?”

“Lead her to the others!” The Wookiee’s bark was more assertive. “Hurry!”

“Get up.” A pause and then the voice repeated the command in Ancient Sith. “Stand up. Rise, Lord Revan.”

Lord Revan—familiar annoyance and shame at the title. Revan stood up easily, as if the stiffness in her limbs had been only an aberration. Hells, when she—when Polla—had learned about carbonite freezing in school, she’d learned that blindness could be a side effect of the process, sometimes permanent; along with muscle tremors, weakness, convulsions—
"Come on!" The hand grabbed Revan's again, tugging her forward.

Slowly, light filtered in; bright spaces among the dark. A spot paler than most drew her eye, and Revan squinted, stumbling, until the spot resolved into a cold-fuel lantern, its globe unmistakable atop the handle. Then the world shook again. The light blurred. She choked on dust, coughing.

"You have to help? Please!"

"Eym tryyingggg—" Something buzzed in Revan’s head, making her bones twitch.

"You have to help them!" The speaker’s face loomed into her vision abruptly. A narrow face. Frightened. Young. Barely more than a kid—

{{REROUTING—}}

"Stop—" the word came out clearly. Revan felt the Force surge, as if her own mind had finally mastered itself, restoring vision and sense like the wave of a hand.

Her eyes focused on a teenaged boy, fifteen or sixteen Standard. A layer of grit painted him gray, but he looked Human under the dust. Behind him was a Wookiee cub, half the kid's size—and probably twice his age.

"You have to help!" The Wookiee stepped forward, grabbing her other arm with his furry claw. "The others are trapped—we got through, but then the wall collapsed."

"The wall…. They still have walls in the future. Good. “How long…?” Her hand went to her neck and closed on the Force collar there. “I’m Revan,” she added.

The Wookiee cub blinked, lip curling in a snarl. He had a hairless patch around his neck as if he’d recently worn a collar. “We know."

"Right. Of course you do. How…” her voice trailed away as the raised dome in the room's center caught her attention.

{{COME}}

The voice in her head was coming from it.

The dome was a cylindrical bubble, crystalline, set astride a plinth and rising out of the stone floor. Revan knew it instantly. She took a step forward.

"No, this way." The Wookiee moaned. “Please.”

“It's in my tomb.” Revan shook free of the kids, kicking aside the remains of the carbonite frame. She brushed dust from Carth's old jacket, and blinked her eyes clear of grit.

{{COME}}

The Human boy said something. The Wookiee cub whined again they had to go. Their friends were trapped—and Revan felt that too, sparks of life close to them, and one almost out.

The world rocked and more dust came down from the ceiling. Revan walked forward. The light within the dome seemed to increase the closer she got.

The two kids yelling at her faded like ghosts.
Revan put her hands on the dome's surface. Smooth, save for the insets where her hands fit perfectly. The dome began to retract.

The body within might have been Human, or a red-skinned Sith. It might have been a man, or a woman, once. What remained was a husk of skin, wrinkled tight over bone. Revan had seen too many corpses to be shocked by death, but there were metal rods extending from the side of the tomb's inner wall into the curve of the skull and down the spine, a metal cap encasing the skull—the mouth was ajar, and the teeth—split and screaming—

She recoiled.

It must have hurt. It will hurt—

The next instant Revan wanted nothing more. Like lust—almost a need. The galaxy splayed on its back under her fingers, billions of tiny sparks all alive—

All of those lives—even if my son is dead, my friends—their children, their children's children, all the lives I never had—I could see him—I could see them—

And then her body vanished.

Instead of Korrie, she saw paths between the stars, a map of the galaxy… burning. Oddly beautiful in her mind’s eye. She rode the web to where the hyperlanes converged, to where a thousand eyes surveyed what they had wrought: a blistered planet, white caps of its poles aflame. Her Sleeper ships above, some reduced to circular spots of light; like tiny suns in their death-throes, exploding against a planet encircled with ice.

Her Sleepers were not sleeping. I woke up and so did they. So beautiful.

Other ships swam in the black, too; coming out of hyperspace dangerously close to that tell-tale fuzz of atmosphere. Fighters discharging proton auto-blasts like wasps, beams from the dreadnaughts' laser cannon, heavier pulses where ion torpedoes on both sides had hit their mark—

Revan felt a part of herself break off and die, caught in the invader’s vanguard. The rest of her surged forward, barreling into the enemy ships. Their lights winked out, some of them. Tiny lights. Tiny organic insects who dared question the work of their Awakened gods—she felt a part of her raise cloaking shields to hide, sinking into ragged gravity to pierce the underbelly of the invaders with a surprise attack—

And then Revan felt a part of her scream. Another fifteen of her died—caught in the organic’s trap of mines, with every sensor in range blinded.

Her prey had used the corpses of their own debris against her.

Her prey was cunning, but they were weak and they tired. Revan picked off a few stragglers easily; a listing capital cruiser and all of its fighters, a few sparking, orphaned snubs. Another command ship fled at her approach, accelerating into the planet's atmosphere. She felt a bright flash of joy, watching that one begin to burn and fall.

One invader was a behemoth, encased in a web of failing shields. A brutish hulk that carved a path for the weaker sparks. They surged around its wake, slicing through her assault patterns with angles bright as lasers.

A thousand eyes screamed as more died. Revan caught her breath, hatred still rising. So many Sleepers lost in battle, the rest enraged—
There was something about those attacking ships—

There are still class-seka dreadnaughts in the future. And aurek snubfighters. Mandalorian warbirds, the modified tank-gunners Aemelie always loved, and the plesh-gunships made by Kuat Driveyards for the Republic. Something about those ships, those attackers and their familiar ships—

Her attention buzzed.

No, not just the ships. The patterns.

More of her enemies rose from the planet; swarming down from the half-ruined orbital above; rising from the burning poles of the dying world—

And then Revan knew. They’re not the invaders. We are.

An ice world, burning. Not Hoth; there was a seacoast pattern beneath those clouds, patches of what could have been arable land through the smoke, the poisoned mists.

Could it be Arkania? Ruanis?

Or, it could be Hoth in the future—

And then she knew. Because Revan had seen this world before. Never in her own memory—only on newsvids and in dreams. As a child of seven from a life she couldn't remember. In her lover’s stories, in a hologram poster tacked above his son’s bunk in a Korriban dormitory. And the last time, the final time—from the eyes of a Sleeper scout, skimming beneath orbital defense shields like a stone across water.

Telos. That’s Telos. We are the Sleepers. I—I am the Sleepers. And we’re... I’m attacking Telos.

Horror engulfed her. They’re—I—I’m burning Telos.

Abruptly, her own world contracted to just her hand dangling into the tomb, clasping a metal spike. The metal was sharp scraping against her arm, cutting into her palm, but through it, Revan could see—

See Telos burn.

She did not want to see that, and so she left it behind.

See Korrie. He must be grown. He must be a man. He might be dead. But I could see his descendants, learn of his fate—

“Um, she’s glowing. What are we supposed to do now?”

“We need her help! Make her help us!” The Wookiee’s whimper turned into a growl. “Zaalbar needs you, Lord Polla Revan. You have to help us save him!”

Zaalbar? Revan's breath caught in her throat. But she couldn't move.

Light was brighter now. The kid was right—she was glowing. With a click the Force collar fell off of her neck and into the tomb, which seemed to dissolve under her feet when she looked at it too closely. Stars—planets—and there—her Sleeper ships, like fingers, clasped over the worlds they would remake as they wanted—
Beautiful. Her lips were wet. Her nose was bleeding. Salt and copper taste.

Beautiful? Like Telos? Nausea engulfed her, and she felt her body retch, vision returning like a saber in her guts: the shrunken corpse, the metal device of its torture warm in her hand. Her own blood—where the thing had made its mark, red against her skin, the stone and the metal—

"What's wrong with her?"

What's wrong with me? I did that. I did that to Telos—

{{RE-ESTABLISHING LINK. INITIALIZING NANOCYSTS. REBUILDING NEURAL NETWORK—}}

{{COME}} That ancient voice, echoing from the tomb itself. Kindly now, almost paternal.

A fracking lie.

Revan let go of the spike. Her still-bleeding hand brushed the side of the broken skull, unsurprised when it crumbled to dust beneath her fingers. Metal coils on the floor stirred, disrupting more of the remains. Separated from the wall and the body of its host, the metal thing in the tomb looked like a mechanical snake. The tail of it coiled, flexing, and reaching for her wounded hand. Pleasantly warm, vibrating against her skin.

Revan didn't want to let go of it—but she did—throwing it back against the tomb's wall. The thing, the… preserver… whimpered at her, raising its tail again, wavering more cautiously towards her, like a curious kath.

It can't take you unwilling. A dry whisper from her former self. She knew it was true.

The Force didn't so much rush back as increase, like its volume had been raised to a pitch as high as screams. The room snapped into sharper focus—even the parts behind her: the rubble-strewn floor, the battered walls, the beautiful tomb, and the two kids standing by the collapsed wall—

{{Come, Revan}} Softer now, that voice, as if the thing knew it had frightened her. A mere whisper, a breath. As kind as her own mother's arms.

"Hey! You can't just go in there! We need your help! Zaalbar's gonna die without you!"

"Zaalbar?" Revan turned around. Her hand felt cold and empty. Her arm ached where its barb had scratched her. She felt the tomb’s preserver cry out for her to come back. The two kids in front of her huddled like scared nerf calves. Covered in dust and terrified and desperate. Like the kids in the Taris Undercity. Or those Wookiee cubs in the slavers' pen on Manaan.

Wookiees look the same in the future.

Why the frack am I on Kaas? Must have been Dar's idea. Carth would never—Carth would never have stood for it.

Dar would have left Revan here for insurance. Not a trap. A gift. So beautiful. Dar had known that. Dar had always known how beautiful it was.

“Before you go in there you've got to help us!” The Human boy again. “I'm not strong enough to lift the stones and the others are trapped. Please! You have to help them!”
“Who?” Her voice seemed far away.

“The others.”

The other sparks fading. One of them was Zaalbar.

Before it crumbled to dust, that thing in the tomb had been screaming.

That will be me. Revan retched again, coughing up bile. Her head turned back toward the crystal shell, the soft nest, the dark whisper of approval, the metal preserver beckoning her home. Home to become—

—that withered corpse. That silent scream—

“Lord Revan!” The Human kid had grabbed her arm again, trying to pull her off the platform. “You have to help! They’re gonna die!”

The world shook again and Revan’s mind finally made sense of the sound.

Thunder. They have bombs in the future. This time the thought was laced with dark humor. “Who’s attacking us?”

It wasn’t the Sleepers.

“Some kind of defense system. It started when she blasted the doors open. You have to make it stop!”

“I did.” That was why she had gone into carbonite in the first place. “How long—how long did I stop them for?”

“Huh?” The kid blinked at her, as she followed him off the platform. The Wookiee cub whimpered. Neither of them were armed.

“How long… how long has it been?”

“Three—” the ground shook and erased the rest of the kid’s words, but Revan knew in her bones.

Three hundred years. We held them off for three hundred years. Everyone I know is gone.

“What of the Emperor?”

“One of his bodies came, but… h-he got crushed in the stairs. Please! Help us!” the Wookiee cub moaned.

Three hundred years and that bastard is still around? It’s not fracking fair.

No. That asshole's voice. Malak—faint, but present

“Three hundred years?” Revan's mental shields flared, shoving Malak out. The tomb's call lessened as she walked away, perhaps swamped by her own loss. Three hundred years and I still get Malak in my fracking head. And they're all gone. Korrie. Carth. Everyone that I ever knew—

“What?” The kid blinked. Long nose. Yellowish eyes. Familiar—like a face she’d seen before in passing. Maybe she’d known his ancestors, once.

“You said it’s been three hundred years.”
“Huh? No.” The boy raised his voice, stepping closer. “I said weeks. It’s been three weeks, Lord Revan.”

The words didn’t compute. Perhaps he meant weeks on Dagary Minor, where each year spanned nearly a thousand standard rotations.

Perhaps he was lying. Or insane.

“Weeks?”

“Huh?” He just looked confused.

“I dreamed of war.”

“That’s because there is one. Started a week after they froze you! Please! Make them stop!”

{{COME}}

A week? Revan drew back. A raw laugh cracked from her guts. “Are you kidding me? It’s only been three weeks?”

“Yeah.” The boy nodded. “The others are waiting. Up…” he pointed at a crack in the wall. “There’s a tunnel that goes up to the main level. Part of it collapsed. We were the only ones small enough to get through.”

Three weeks? Laughter was replaced by something harder. Worlds were burning in three fricking weeks. Revan could taste their ashes in her mouth and when she closed her eyes she heard their screams.

“Where is she? Where the frack is Dar?”

"Who?"

"Me. The other… where the frack is the other me?"

“The other Lord Revan? Fighting them, she said.” The kid stammered a little, like she had scared him. “With the Fleet. They call her Sheris. Admiral Onasi’s there, too. He’s the one who sent them down here—he sent them here to get you and the Wookiee.”

Carth? Something unclenched around her heart. Still alive. Good.

“Which fleet?” But she knew. She knew already. Of course. She’d seen them fighting the Sleepers. Not attackers. Defenders of Telos. Defending the planets her Sleepers were burning.

The kid grimaced. “All of them.”

Xxx

Sleeper ships were cowards. Meet them in force and they’d run and strike someplace else. Save one planet and doom another. The hard lessons of the past two weeks would haunt Carth until the end of his days. Their ships had met the Sleepers on Endor, only to have them run to Lehon. Chased them from Lehon, only to catch them on Carugas. From there, their enemies had split, and so had their allied fleets.

Now, Carth watched the red-marked triangles of their remaining enemies on The Captive Arm’s command screen, winking out one-by-one and leaving wreckage in their wake. He had learned…
best not to check the civilian casualty reports. Leave that for someone else’s nightmares.

Telos was burning. Again. But it could have been worse. It could have been… they’d almost been too late to save anyone. Carth didn't want to think about Peragus. D'Qar. The sacrifice at Kashyykk.

“Dad?” Dustil touched his arm. “You look like crap.”

“Never thought I'd have to see this twice.” His voice felt hoarse.

“You should sleep.” Yuthura gave him a sympathetic smile, the shadows under her eyes proof that she hadn’t taken her own advice.

“No time.” Carth had been trained to fight battles that lasted for months in a single system—not an endless rotation of skirmishes where the losing side always moved to a new field. The Sleepers always lost: they couldn’t withstand the number and firepower of three fleets; but they also never stopped. And the Allies—each time they were a little slower, a little sloppier.

Combat casualty rates were rising. The Sleepers never stopped, but someday the rest of them would have to.

The latest reports scrolled through Carth's headset, projected on a holographic screen for his eyes only. A third as many fighters lost to error as to enemy fire at Telos. Twice that number sidelined before they collapsed, and fuel reserves running low. The Mandalorian numbers were a little better. Republic wouldn’t share theirs, of course, hiding behind Rensha’s slippery smile, and whatever was going on in the mind of their new general….

“Flit-lice running again,” his son gloated. If Dustil was bothered that their homeworld had been carpet bombed for the second time in six years, he hid it well. “Did you see me out there?”

"I saw." High Admirals didn't hug their sons for not dying, so Carth restrained himself.

"Soon as we have the coordinates to the next stop I'll get more of them, Father. I promise.”

_The next stop. The next round of our endless war—_

“We’re sending a medix team to assess survivors.” Admiral Ellakin Sirida hovered behind them, sounding less than thrilled—just as he had been less than thrilled when Carth had taken over his command, arriving in the _Arm’s_ hangar bay with a Mandalorian fighter escort, and two black-clad Force users at his side, their sabers blazing. The Imperial surrender to the Republic had lasted for the six days it took for Peragus Station to blow—and then both the Republic and Empire had bigger concerns. “Err… as you ordered, sir. Ah… my lords.”

Yuthura flashed the man an amused glance. “Good.”

The remains of the orbital—Telos’s former hope for the future—hung crookedly above the planet’s blasted surface. A ragtag fleet of survivors swarmed beneath the Imperial Fleet’s orbit. Carth could only imagine what it must be like for some of those survivors—being rescued by troops wearing the uniforms of their former conquerors.

He glanced down at his own dark gray jacket with its red bars and grimaced. He wore the Imperial uniform to keep the troops happy. Didn't mean he had to like it. “We’ll leave a supply trawler here,” he announced, ignoring Sirida’s scowl. “Have the squads switch shifts. We’re gonna need fresh pilots for the next fight.”
“Relief for K-team’s only had three hours off—” Commodore Wootis started to object, but Yuthura cleared her throat and the commodore flinched, paling to silence.

“New points for the next hyperspace route are coming in, sir.” The helmsman under Wootis still sounded jumpy, directing his words more toward Dustil and Yuthura than Carth. “Wideband’s up. The Mandalorians swear they're accurate, but I’ve never seen spacing like this before.”

“Get confirmation from the big guy?” Carth’s head turned toward the navigator's station and the Hutt-sized red hulk of their guarded prisoner… but the Voice of the Emperor's eyes were closed, its expression slack. A trail of drool dripped from the half-open mouth, grotesquely small in his bloated face. The Voice had formerly spent a few hundred years living a cell near the hyperdrive core, but Carth had dragged it out to the bridge, hoping that would make it more talkative.

Had worked, too. For a while.

“Want me to try and wake up Fats again, Dad?” Dustil's hand shot out and the bloated thing bound on a hoverlift twitched under Carth's son's Force push. “Get confirmation on those jump numbers?”

“No.” Carth was tired of watching his son torture a mass of flesh that might have once been a kid just like Zepth. The Voice had reddish skin. The nubs of bone nearly lost on its face could have been Zabrak horns—or a pureblood Sith's wattle. The thing's species was indeterminate as its gender—and any mind had been gone, according to its priest caretaker, for at least a century. “Route the jump with Aemelie's points and follow them,” Carth ordered his navigator. “Did the Mandies say what system's on the other end?”

“It’s called Corellia System, sir.” Helmsman Hinkel coughed. “In the Republic Core. One industrial planet and several agricultural.”

“Right.” Carth nodded. “Corellia System. I've heard of it.”

The helmsman looked blank, not getting the joke. Just as well, because it damn well wasn’t funny. Corellia had a population of nine billion. So far, the bastards had left the larger planets alone—following a pattern that seemed unpredictable to anyone except maybe General Sheris… but even she was only right about two-thirds of the time about where they’d strike next.

If it was her at all, calling the shots. What had happened on that ship, the Great Hunt… Carth still wasn’t sure.

“Corellia? Frack,” Dustil mumbled under his breath. “Didn't she say Malastare would be next?”

Carth nodded. “Yeah. Guess she was wrong.”

“Again.” Dustil scowled, and paced to the viewscreen—just as their own craft's sublight engines kicked in, pulling them away from Telos and toward the first jump point they'd been given.

“Sheris was right about Kashyyyk,” Yuthura murmured. “And Wahgu. Wayland. Ossus. Taris.”

“Well, she was wrong about D'Qar. And Telos.” Dustil folded his arms and stared out at the stars as their flagship banked, sublight engines switching to cruising speed as they headed for the first jump point.

Dustil's stubborn expression made Carth all-too-aware they'd be having another argument about his son taking a command snub out as soon as they arrived in the Corellian system. Carth had let Dustil fight on a manned gunship for Telos, because it was theirs, but his son wanted to do more.
Hell, so did Carth. Being stuck here—sending out men to die instead of fighting himself—it stuck in his craw.

Carth twisted the comm-link on his wrist. He should have heard from Kaas by now. Should have heard something more than an encrypted message from Mission, sent days before—

She said yes.

Just three words. Three words to pin a galaxy on. Who said yes? Did she—surely, it was too soon—

The wideband communicator inset into his command board chimed and the holographic image of a woman appeared. “Imperial High Admiral?” Rew Ekkumi’s sardonic use of the title was the last thing Carth wanted to hear right now, and from the expression on her holographic face, she knew it. “There’s been a scout pop sighted above Byss. Near the shipyards. High Admiral Rensha requests assistance. Coordinates are incoming.”

“Mandalorians asked first, Rew.” All these titles, all this dancing around for banthashit. “One of their scouts followed a tracer through to the Corellian System. The Sleeper Fleet’s gathering there. Now.”

“Corellia? But—” There was a pause when her head turned, and the mute sign flashed across the side of her head. It seemed ages before she turned back Peragus to face him. “Apparently, you’re right. We’re getting coordinates for Corellian jump points now from C’Tannis.”

Carth swallowed. “We have ours already. I’ll patch them through for cross-match. What does… what does General Sheris say to do?”

General Sheris. Rew’s face on the display blanched and her head turned, whatever she had to say lost to the mute dial, reporting back to her bosses like a good little soldier.

“I say go to Corellia, Admiral. Immediately.” A new voice. Cool. Out of view, probably standing with Admiral Rensha, or that blasted Jedi master Atris, the one Dustil said was trouble. Rew was the one who gave Carth the Fleet’s orders (that he mostly obeyed)... but he knew damn well where they were coming from. “A show of force at Corellia may drive the rest here to Byss. The bulk of the Republic forces will remain cloaked at the Byss shipyards, waiting.”

"Guess you were wrong about Malastare, sister." He wasn't rubbing it in, just stating a fact.

Next to Carth, Dustil snickered.

"They will come to Malastare, too, if we don’t stop them first. After Byss." A pause. “Or possibly after Corellia, if you’re not fast enough.”

"Not today, they won't."

A game they had played before—following a madman's passage through blind jumps until they reached the other side. Chasing their would-be exterminators across a galaxy. A game that never ended. Carth couldn't remember the last time he'd slept. Few hours a few days ago, maybe. He was running on stims. They all were. Half his crew looked on the verge of collapse.

They were winning—for now—but the cost was too damn high.

“No,” General Sheris Darkstar agreed from off-screen. “Not today. Today will be our victory.” Her tone was wooden; she sounded as tired as Carth felt.
Sheris never showed her face to him. She had Rew give the orders. Carth still didn’t know what that meant—if Rensha and Atris had her chained up in restraints, or if Sheris was holding them all captive somehow… or if she merely thought she was being kind, not showing her face to the man who would always see another woman looking out of it.

Well, it wasn’t kind. Carth still missed the face. Sometimes, when he was crashing from stims and grabbing a few hours shut-eye, Carth would look at old holos of her—some of them from before—before she’d been his wife. Just the face, not… not those other kinds of vids. The swoop nose, those smug half-lidded, hyperdrive eyes. They’d never… never taken any holos, him and Revan. Not of any kind, and all the holotrash about them… he couldn't watch that. Sometimes, when the wideband worked, he watched the HoloNet war reports Sheris gave, blasted from the Fleet HQ across the nets. Inspirational talks for civs about sheltering in place, planetary evacuation procedures, survival tips, exaggerations of their victories, promises of peace and security that no one could guarantee—

Those speeches didn’t sound like her. Sounded like they’d been written by a pack of Senate publicists. Sometimes Sheris would make faces when she read them. Little twitches, a curl in her lip like she thought as much of them as he did. Sometimes Carth watched, wondering if he'd been wrong to trust her when she'd chased him and Dustil off the Great Hunt, acting like their enemy, like she'd really killed his wife—

Sometimes he wondered if she had killed his wife. He… he didn't think so.

But there wasn’t a lot of time for wondering anything.

Carth twisted the private comm on his wrist again and closed his eyes. How long had it been since the Emperor gave his promise? Three days? No. Not in Standard. Four days, Standard. Even with the coordinates, they’d have to get to the first Sleeper jump-point, and that was… was in the Peragus System—or what was left of it. So three days… if Polla'd gone at all. He didn’t know for sure—couldn’t know. Wideband was spotty as it was and Deralia had cut itself off from all non-essential incoming comm-channels the second week of the war. The bastard Emperor's word was all Carth had to go on and the monster could have been lying, just like Sheris could have been lying about her lie—or, she could have been telling the truth—

You need sleep, Onasi. Carth rubbed his eyes. You're jumping at shadows.

The Emperor said Polla had said yes. That blip from Mission seemed to confirm it, but now—

Now Carth had another war to win. The Sleepers might run from Corellia to Byss… or they might run someplace else. That's what had happened with Telos. A roll of the dice. Sheris's predictions gone wrong.

Carth stared at the Voice trussed on The Captive Arm's bridge. Somewhere in that hulk’s drooling skull was a map of the galaxy, of all the hyperspace jump-points the Sleepers made. Somehow the bastard Emperor was linked to those ships, even if he couldn't control them. Somehow the bastard could see what the Sleepers saw, see their jumps as they made them, see the hyperspace routes they’d created.

Somehow, the Sith Emperor had become their only hope to defeat the Sleeper's armada… and for some reason, the asshole was actually helping them do it.

Because he doesn’t want to die either.

But Tenebrae had something up his sleeve. Carth was sure of it, just as sure as he was that his wife would know what to do to save them—even if it meant going into that damned tomb. (He'd never get the image of the broken thing in the tomb from his mind, even when he was old and grey.)

Revan would know what to do. Even if it meant they'd never see each other again. But maybe they would—

“May the Force be with you, Carth.” Sheris's voice, and her channel blinked out, Rew's scowling face faded out too. She didn't say farewell. She never did.

Carth jumped, glancing at the chron. How long had he—had he missed anything?

Only a minute since the last time he checked. Time was… time was funny when you didn't sleep.

Carth sat down in the commander's chair, letting fatigue catch him—an old soldier’s trick. Dozing with his eyes open, conserving his reserves while their fleet assembled for the next jump. Around him, voices issued commands—with the occasional correction from Yuthura. Dustil was silent, pacing restlessly back and forth. Of course. Preparing another argument. Combat flights. Dustil had been in the skies for Telos. His son was gonna want to do it again.

"You know, Aleema sends out ten squadrons of warflies," Dustil began, folding his arms. "We only have eight squadrons of the equiv aureks, but I could take some reserve troops, and maybe run two more squads—"

You're not trained to lead a wing command, son. But Carth wasn't sure that was true. Who the hell knew what Dustil had learned on Korriban—or learned from having Malak in his head?

The man his son was now knew something. Dustil had outscored all but the most skilled of the Imps on their combat sims. And he'd—Carth blinked and then blinked again when he pulled up Dustil's hit rate for Telos. Ninety percent? That wasn't just good, that was Jedi good.

But Telos had been a straightforward run. Corellia was gonna be busier. Civilian craft everywhere. And Byss, with its shipyards full of explosives… that would be… that would be something else again.

I can't lose you again, son. I can't. "We're not competing against the Mandalorians, Dustil. They're our allies. And the Doom Edge still has twenty squads. Ziost Sunrise and Beziac Roar are both running full wings too. We don't need you out there—"

"Thanks!" His son glared at him.

"But I need you. Here."

"For what?"

"Fats." He tried to make it a joke. "Who else can wake him up like you?"

"You don't need him now. Wideband's working."

"For now, but they could still knock out the Corellian relays—"

“Onasi? ” A new voice buzzed in his earpiece, static cutting it in and out. Aemelie Ordo had stopped calling Carth ‘First Husband’ and refused to call him admiral. Not that he blamed her.

Twenty-four of those hu'tuun are in the Corellian system already! Where are you?"

"Coming." Carth paused. "Tell Canderous that Sheris thinks it’ll be Byss next. Republic’s
"Waiting there,"

"Right now it's Corellia," she snapped. "And we need you."

"Jiila!" Immediately. "We're coming!" Once they reached the coordinates, the jumps would only take minutes. Using the Sleeper's hyperlanes, travel time was only spent moving from one point in real space to another.

Being at war used to involve months of brutal occupation while the Republic mounted a response. Old tactics required fortifying planetary defenses to withstand a siege. Now, war was a line of endless skirmishes, chasing an armada of droid-ships. Triage, driving the Sleepers off worlds like Corellia and Byss, if they could, and sacrificing worlds like Kashyyyk and Taris and...

And Telos. Their blasted homeworld glimmered in the rear-facing viewscreens, already behind them.

It had only been three days since Fats had made his promise. Maybe four. It was too early for anything… anything to have changed.

But Carth had to know.

“Make the jumps to Corellia. And Dustil?” Carth swallowed, trying to ignore the way he felt a headache forming at the base of his skull. “Wake up Fats for me. I've changed my mind.”

Xxx

A section of wall had collapsed. Lives flickered like sparks within—one nearly dead. Revan’s hand flexed, gathering the Force as she raised her arm, slowly lifting each piece of rubble through the opening. Even with care, the first noise Revan heard from the survivors was a gasp of pain, quickly followed by a familiar roar.

“Zaalbar?” Revan peered into the opening, only to be dragged into the Wookiee's embrace as he emerged from the darkness.

“I thought I would have to wait longer to see you again, Polla Revan!” His head butted against hers, nose cold on her face. “But Friend Carth spoke through the monster and said we could not wait.”

“What?”

A chuckle next to Zaal. As Revan's eyes adjusted, she could see the crumpled figure of a Twi'lek sprawled on the tunnel ground, notable for his red, glowing eyes. “I could have told her this would happen,” the possessed creature chuckled weakly. “Without their control, the Sleepers revert to their directive. Do you know the copy claimed you were dead? She lied to me! To me! I could have told her what would happen, then, but I thought she deserved her galaxy of ashes! I was avenging you! Avenging us! I could have told you, too, my Starfire, if you had ever listened!”

Red eyes … in that moment, Revan wanted very badly to gut him. Her hand went to the saber on her belt, and then fell back. "What are you saying? Told me what?"

His body was dying already.

She crouched down instead, noticing as she did that most of the man's wounds were bandaged—older injuries and radiation burns. But the wound across his belly oozed something dark, his hips oddly crooked where the rockfall had gutted him.
"I could have told you," the Emperor chuckled. "I will show you. She can't keep us apart" The voice softened, and his shaking hand lifted. "Not now."

Revan tried not to shudder. ‘Go on. Fast—you're almost out of time.”

“Ho, ho! Your people… such warriors! And of course, she … she does her part. Keeps them on their toes. Did you want to send a message? To her? Or to your lover? You'll have to find another Vessel soon.” The Twi'lek coughed, a wet, open sound. His mouth was bloody. It looked almost black in the shadows. “Or find me. I'm with them, you know. Your friends. All… nearly all of them." His chuckle was thick, like something had caught in his lungs.

“Tell her,” Zaalbar rumbled. “Tell her what Friend Carth said to say, madclaw. You said before he had good-bye words."

Good-bye words. Her heart sank. "Is Carth—"

“No,” the Twi’lek snapped back. One lekku flicked weakly at Revan. “I… will not. So… little time—left.”

“Tell me.” Force choking a dying man would not help. “What's the message?”

The Emperor sighed. “Your consort wants you to go to the tomb... now, Revan. He wants you to save us. Save us… save all.” His mouth twisted. "Would you like to see?” His shaking hand reached for hers and then Revan was——on the bridge of a ship, arms bound behind her, staring at a familiar, broad-shouldered back. She knew her husband instantly, even wearing an Imperial uniform. Next to him, facing her, Dustil Onasi’s yellowed eyes widened—

“Finally! Fats is back, Dad.”

Carth turned. He looked exhausted, hollows in his cheeks, his face shadowed by an Imperial officer’s cap. He wore Admiral’s bars on his chest. “Anything useful, this time? We're going to Corellia. Is the main Force at Corellia? Or Byss?” He paused, lowering his voice. "Did you find her? Did Polla really go—" “Carrrrrthhhhh—" Revan tried to speak, but his name splintered on the possessed sent's clumsy lips. And then an invisible band tightened around her throat.

"Answer him," Dustil growled. "Answer him, fracking Fats or I swear I'll start carving pieces off you and shoving them down your fracking throat."

"Aghhh—" All Revan could feel was the gibbering fear of the body she inhabited. Fear, but mixed with something else, too.

The Emperor's amusement.

Dustil Onasi! Such an angry young man! Do you see?

Xxx

and then Revan was—

Arms bound behind her aboard a different ship. She felt her wings flutter against the netting at her back and her beak snap open, as the red-haired woman at the command center stamped with a Republic sigil abruptly turned—

Now you see her.

“Well?” Dar'Revan crossed her arms. She was wearing white robes. Lights flickered on and off, and somewhere behind her, alarm bells pealed. On the command screen between them, a battle: bright bursts of light, ships swarming above a besieged planet. The room behind her was shadowed and indistinct. Not the bridge of a flagship.

Black and red patterns lined the wall.

Dar looked as exhausted as Carth. “They've split their forces again, and the majority are here. Tenebrae, tell Admiral Onasi we need assistance in the Byss System. Now.” Her head turned back to the command-screen, and then she flipped a switch on the deck before her, tapping the mic inset on the panel before issuing more orders. “Sacrifice the Arcurda; it's too badly damaged to last through the battle. Send your evacuation orders now, but leave a skeleton crew to be safe. We're going to ram their central position, from here—”

“Wait.” A voice from behind Revan’s view interrupted. Feminine and cold. "Our main forces are still cloaked. We must not overreach before our allies arrive.”

"We can't afford to wait, Master Atris." Dar's voice imbued the Jedi's name with surprising scorn. "There are too many innocents in this system ."

"You would risk our fleet?"

"It is no risk." Dar's fingers moved over the board, tracing symbols so quickly that Revan only half-understood. And yet, the motions were familiar. “The Mando'ade and what remains of Onasi’s command will be here soon enough—” her voice broke off abruptly, and her head turned, staring directly at Revan—or the body she possessed. “Oh!”

Revan felt her beak tremble, and then the body she was inhabiting chuckled.

And now, she sees you.

The woman with Revan's face turned even paler. "What have you done?"

*What's this?” Master Atris's words were soft. It had to be a trick of the light, but when she came into Revan’s view she seemed… taller, somehow. And shadowed, her profile etched like a negative coin against the light, against the black and the red of the wall, the—

That is the the ____.

The _____. In the chamber of _____.

Something about the red and black pattern was familiar. Or should have been. Revan’s mind reached for the word, its intent, and skipped over it. Like the lyric of a song Revan couldn't recall; the tune lost, too. But she knew she had once known—once—known that the pattern possessed significance.

Power.

"D-d-dar...." The Toydarian's beak chattered, Revan felt it rattle, her own jaw rattle, her own mind forcing the word.
"You can’t be here!" Dar snapped. "I’m winning, you fool! Go back to the frame! Go back to the way you were—"

“What did you do?” The white-haired woman's voice sharpened when she stepped closer, features coming abruptly into focus. That beautiful face, white hair in two braids. Her pale eyes narrowed, and then her face came even closer, until it was the only thing that Revan’s Toydarian eyes could see.

A cold hand closed on her feathered shoulder. The other tilted her beak up. The woman's breath ruffled her feathers. She could smell it through her beak-holes, sweet and slightly ripe.

Tenebrae was silent. Revan couldn't sense him at all. As if a cloud had passed between them.

Atris chuckled. “Padawan? My prize did not fall into a sun after all.”

Dar'Revan's voice behind her was dull, maybe defeated. "She did not, master."

Master?

"And her heart, it has resumed beating." The white head turned toward Dar, even as the woman’s grip on the Toydarian tightened. "Was she in stasis, before?"

"Carbonite." Dar's glare could have melted Hoth itself.

"Your deception caused this war."

Flash of green fire, defiance. "I'm winning this war."

"Strengthening your true enemy."

"I am surrounded by them." Dar's gaze seemed to look directly into Revan's. "A master once told me to be wary, lest we become the true monsters, lest we destroy what we are trying to save."

"Platitudes mean little to refugees and wretches. They cannot eat them. Words do not protect children, or stop a madman like Vitiate."

"I need to pay attention to our course alignments, Master." Dar's golden hand adjusted one of the controls. "And C’Tannis's body is terrified. If you keep up your abuse, you'll stop his heart."

"Such concern! Would you have had as much for—"

There was a knock on the door. Atris dropped the Toydarian. Revan felt her body slump forward. Any vestige she had of control was gone. Now all she could see was the floor of the room, etched in that same pattern of red and black.

"Enter." Dar's voice, tense. Footsteps came closer and then a hand pulled the crest of Revan's head-feathers, righting her again.

"What's going on?" A new voice from behind them. Male. "Is something wrong with the Emperor?"

"No. Everything is fine, Commander." The white-haired woman straightened, dropping Revan's possessed head so it flopped back against the chair-rest, walking out of her view. "Tell the High Admiral to follow our instructions."

"I will tell the High Admiral to follow your instructions," the man repeated woodenly. "She wants you both on the main bridge. The Byss Shipwright's Guild has requested some footage of General Darkstar—"

"No. There is no time for that." Dar's hands moved in a quick gesture that Revan realized a beat too late was the abbreviated form of Ryl hand-sign. She caught the words for mistrust and master and—

—and the words for square and Nar Shaddaa?

Xxx

And then Revan was—

Standing on another ship, before another viewscreen. Here, her arms were unbound, but she was trailed by two armored figures short enough to be children. Her hands were a ruddy reddish brown, crossed with a Zabrak's indentations.

"Master?" The familiar voice surprised her, and Revan turned to see Mekel Jin—

Such a good boy, your cousin. A faithful boy. So loyal. So... useful.

"M-mekel?" Revan heard her own voice tremble through an unfamiliar throat and looked up to see that a part of the ship's bridge was melted and patched and painfully familiar. "The Aleema? Why are you calling Tenebrae 'master?"

Mekel looked startled. "Zepth? Your eyes—"

"It back again?" Canderous's voice came from behind them. "Tell it to tell Onasi thanks for the save. Looks like we won't be rotting in a Corellian hell tonight."

"Cander—"

Xxx

But Revan's words were stolen by a dark malevolence that froze her limbs and then she was—

Bound again in a small room that smelled like flour and, strangely, preserving spices. In the dim light it took Revan another few seconds to realize she was in Molla Organa's root cellar on Deralia—or a very good facsimile.

Oh, Tenebrae sighed in her mind. Her again. I did not mean for you to see this—this irrelevant baker—

"Maaaa—?" Revan's unfamiliar voice screamed in panic more than sense, and then she heard the sound of startled voices, footsteps on the stairs—

Xxx

"Polla Revan!" Zaalbar's paw nearly knocked her over and back into her body. "Carth said you would know what to do!" He patted her awkwardly. "The leafrot Emperor said it too."

"Your friends are doomed," the broken Twi'lek added, chuckling. "You saw them! Go to the tomb! Save them!"

"How long was I—" Revan blinked. No one had moved—as if she had been gone for no time at all. As if everything had happened at the same time.
No wonder the Emperor's crazy.

"Help us," the boy added. Phylus Blais. His name came back in a rush. Revan had met his sister, had seen Phylus from a distance when he'd arrived at their camp with Zaalbar. "Are you going to the tomb to make it stop? The Emperor said that you could make it stop. That's why he sent her."

"Who? The Emperor sent who?"

Phylus Blais blinked. "No. Your consort, Admiral Carth Onasi, he sent her. To help you go into the tomb."

"Carth's here?" Revan knew he was not. Of course not, he's near Corellia—

"No." Zaalbar answered, shaking the dust off his body. "He sent Polla Organa to us from Deralia."

"She's here? How...? Why do I need Polla Organa to help me go into the tomb?"

At their feet, the Twi'lek made a choked sound like a laugh. "Come..." he whispered. "As I... I showed you. I can show y—"

And then Revan felt the man’s life snap—cutting out abruptly. The next second, gone.

"Poor Kirchn," Phylus Blais said. "Oh, well."

There was another Wookiee behind Zaalbar, one Revan hadn't noticed before. Female, with blood staining her arm-fur. She stepped forward, rumbling a formal greeting. Revan nodded back.

And then it... it began to make sense. "Carth used the Emperor to talk to Polla. To tell her to come here..." She bent down and absently closed the Twi'lek's eyes. "To come here to tell me to go into the tomb? But... this guy, Kirchn, he was here with you, already?"

"Yes. He told us Polla Organa was coming," Zaalbar whined. "The madclaw Emperor wanted you woken immediately, but we waited." His head tilted. "But Friend Carth would not have said he was sending Polla Organa to wake you if he wanted it done faster."

"But..." And then she got it. Carth sent her to me... "Polla and Seiran came here with a ship. Probably a... a good one."

"A great one! Up in the main chamber," Phylus nodded. "The drones didn't start firing on us at first—they didn't start until she let me blast open the Temple doors." He grinned a little. "It was $#%3*."

"Polla blew open the Temple doors? Why the frack would she—"

"We do not know for sure that is why the bombs fall now," Zaalbar corrected. "Only that they do. Mission and Polla Polla returned today in the Ebon Hawk. Seiran Wen is not with them."

"Where is he?"

"On Deralia with their cub."

Oh, yeah? And where's my cub? Where's Korrie?

Malachor is fine. Malak's voice. But Revan wants me to tell you to go back into the carbonite frame, Red. This is not a war you can win.
Fool me twice and I'd deserve it. I'm done listening to her. Or you, Malak.

But, Red, you—

She shut him out. A wall of ice. No distractions.

Zaalbar was introducing the other Wookiee, using the diminutive of the woman's name that indicated familiarity. He slipped his arm around her solid waist, baring his teeth in a smile.

Revan nodded back, forgetting the name a millisecond after. Their stance explained so much, perhaps the real reason he'd stayed. Good for him. Life should work out for someone. Grab what you can. That's what she and Carth had—had tried—

Red.

Was a part of her still open? Did a part of Revan still want to listen to the man she'd killed? No. No.

She built the wall higher. No distractions except hate.

It wasn't rational, but she hated them, Revan and Malak, both. Not for what they'd done; for what they still were. They are Revan and Malak and I am—I am—nothing, I am no one. She wanted me forgotten in a carbonite frame while she took my life and my son—

No. She was trying to save you. Not Malak's voice, this time. Revan had shut him out only to open herself to another. This voice was feminine, clipped with a familiar Core accent that made everything the woman said seem like an admonishment. Once again, Revan, you have someone's motivation entirely wrong.

Her former bondmate was a shimmering, insubstantial form superimposed against the shaggy coats of two Wookiees.

Bastila? Revan laughed out loud. How are you here?

The veil is thin in this place. And you need to see. Bastila looked as she had the day Revan had killed her: flowing robes, her insubstantial skin pale and stippled with corruption. Behind her loomed another figure—or the outline of one—the negative corona of a man, all in shadow save the rough fall of his braided hair. The sound of bells rang when he moved, and when he raised his arms, Bastila's shade faded, as if swallowed by his cloak of darkness.

"Davad?" She heard her voice out loud, and then somewhere Zaal's worried growl, but the darkness in front of her seemed to spread, and then the figures that appeared from beneath Davad's cloak were all that Revan could see.

More silent figures than she could count. All robed. All Jedi. All species and ages—from wizened masters to the youngest of padawans. Vrook was there. Kavar. Iridel. Masters and padawans Revan knew but had not known were dead. Faces she had passed in the Temple Halls, and ones unfamiliar. Rows upon rows of ghosts, receding into the distance, bearing their silent witness.

Do you know who killed them, Revan? Bastila's voice. Emotionless. Artificially calm.

Yes. Because in that moment Revan did. The sound of bells whispered the name in her ear.

Vima Sunrider killed them. She who was Nomi. Who was Arren Kae. She, who swallowed the minds of masters to become her own weapon.
Vima Sunrider killed them because she desires the death of the Force. For the harm it has done. For the good it has not done. To destroy Tenebrae and the devices that made him.

The whisper didn't come from Bastila, or Davad, or Malak; but from a place within Revan. A place beyond memory—her own thought—a fragment the mind wipe had never destroyed.

But the Force cannot die. The galaxy will not survive its destruction. That was her own thought, too.

"Polla Revan?" A clawed paw was suddenly the only thing holding her upright.

All of those Jedi dead. Revan had never know it had been so many. She had barely had a thought for them, so single-minded in a world that only held Malachor, possibly Carth.

You see why you mustn't go to the tomb? Bastila appeared again, eldritch energies flickering around like flames. She smiled, and there was cruelty in there, too, mixed with regret. Not yet.

Behind her, the man-shape nodded his agreement. Not yet.

"Yet?"

"Polla Revan?"

"What's wrong with her?"

"Don't let her fall—"

"Why are her eyes like that?"

"She's having some kind of fit—"

Revan’s vision splintered and suddenly she felt the Sleepers again—all of them—furious like a nest of biz-wasps—burrowing deep into burning worlds. Corellia, with its moons and its orbitals, a place where three fleets tangled: two ramshackle and ragged—one silvery-quick and sleek. Byss, the lines of its floating shipyards a square surrounding the globe of the world. More quicksilver ships here, and a one lone Republic hammerhead, outline stitched in the fire of its dying shields, now crashing into them—more ships cloaked, watching, waiting—

—and Revan felt the silvery ships freeze—

—felt them notice her, all of them—

All at once.

Telos. Corellia. Byss. Other systems, too. Other planets where only a few of their scouts patrolled.

—all of them.

Stop, she commanded, digging her grasp into the stars. Stop. I came back. You must obey.

[Too late] one whispered. Then another. [Too late. Too late] A thousand whispers became a scream.

Revan felt more than saw the Sleepers freeze; felt them change course, as one-by-one they began to wink out into hyperspace. [Autodestruct sequence already in progress. Rerouting to Dromund Kaas. Complete eradication of the Control required for rebuild]
No! Stop!

[Too late] the Sleepers whispered again. Smug beyond reason, beyond even sanity. Revan had thought she knew what hate was, but theirs was ageless, infinite, bathed in the blood of a trillion lives. [Too late. Too late]

Autodestruct.

Revan blinked, finding herself leaning against Zaalbar, returning to consciousness to find three Wookiees and a kid shouting at her.

“We're in danger. We've got to run,” she said out loud, speaking to the dead Twi'lek, whose now-sightless eyes had fallen open again and stared emptily back; to Zaalbar and the Wookiees behind him, and to Phylus Blais. “The Sleepers are coming here. All of them.”

“Huh?” The boy blinked stupidly and Revan grabbed his hand, pulling him along into the tunnel, lifting debris out of the way as they went, cracking the ceiling with the Force to widen it where parts of the tunnel narrowed to a crawl. The wall opened above to a larger apse and she cleared it easily, the Wookiees following. Her feet let the Force find steps amidst the debris, pulling the Human kid up after her to an open chamber, vast as the Senate Hall—and nearly empty—

—save for a double altar, a Rakatan statue, and a stairwell winding up to a balcony above.

It's dark here. Dangerous. But that was a passing observation. They passed the altar, feet echoing in the nearly-empty chamber that whispered with the voices of the dead.

—the sound of bells—a warning—

—and the sound of explosions, coming from an uneven outline of light ten meters high.

The main chamber of the Dark Temple was nearly empty… save for a familiar disc-shaped ship parked incongruously between the two shattered Temple doors, as if the pilot had flown the Ebon Hawk into the Dark Temple itself to use it as a hangar bay.

Which is what she did.

The Hawk's landing ramp was down, and for a millisecond, even though the Force knew it was impossible, Revan thought that the shaggy-haired man outlined in the smoky Dromund Kaas light could have been Carth.

Then the man stepped into the light. Older. Shorter. Leaner, with gray hair, and a ragged top-knot, half-flattened as if he'd just taken off a flight helm.

The last man she'd ever expected to see again.

Maybe he didn't notice her in the darkness, wedged between the Wookiees. “Did it work? We've gotta go. Pollie says twenty ships just came outta hyperspace. Whatever you did down there got 'em riled for sure…” he trailed off, squinting like he was trying to make out their shapes. "Where's your emperor? The Twi'lek fellow?”

Polla's father blinked. "You." He shook his head, mouth pulling into a rueful smile. "Wasn't sure if I’d get the chance to see you again."
"Or me you." Her voice felt funny and tight.

Jasp Organa grabbed her in a hug. He smelled like fear and space oil, but his arms were strong, and for a second Revan almost felt safe. "Kiddo. You... were you supposed to go in the tomb or not? Pollie said you'd know."

"I-I don't—know—no." But she did. That metal thing, the husk of a body. The scream in the Force above them... doing what the Emperor wanted...

Carth sent Polla and Jasp here to me—to give me a choice. A way out.

"No, I'm not."

"Good." Jasp Organa smiled at her. "Then we've gotta lay jets."

Too late. That's what the Sleepers were screaming. Too late too late. Revan pulled out a handi-wipe and swabbed her nose again.

"Lord Revan knows what to do," Phylus Blais added loyally. "The Emperor said so."

Zaalbar growled in agreement. "We follow her."

Fools, Revan thought. I have no fracking idea.

"Inside!" The speakers crackled. Polla's voice. "Rest of the refs are already loaded. We're gonna take off heavy and it's not gonna be pretty."

"Go, Polla Revan." Zaalbar pushed Revan toward the ramp, just as the building shook again, the shadows of fighters darkened the sky before the entrance—

"Aren't you coming?" She blinked at him, still confused.

"Of course." The Wookiee shoved her forward and followed after.

Xxx

It had been, Polla thought, a sweet bit of shooting that kid Phylus Blais had done on the Dark Temple doors. She'd had Da manning the monitors while the kid took the newly-modded belly-cannon (thanks to Mission Vao and their departed Genoharadan guests) up to its full heat, searing open frackin mystical doors that even the Mandalorians hadn't managed to do more than crack.

Polla would be damned if she left their only ticket off this rock defenseless under open sky, but it was a good thing they'd blasted the Dark Temple open—because now automated drones the size of small rancor swarmed the sky above, setting the jungle all ablaze and just waiting for them to come out.

Those drones weren’t there before you started shooting, a pesky part of her mind noted. It's possible you triggered some kind of alarm. They look kinda like the Temple's defense system.

Shut up, Polla told her conscience.

They'd barely managed to load Zaal's friends before the camp they'd built had gone up in flames.

Now, the landing ramp retracted and the Hawk's alarms chimed. They'd gotten Zaalbar's people loaded safe and sound. And this planet was a dump anyway. Republic occupation had taken care of most of the survivors except for a few hold-outs, and with the war, only a skeleton crew of patrollers were left in the entire system.
Zaal and his people would be much better off someplace else.

“All clear,” she added to her co-pilot. "Take her out. Fast."

Mission Vao swiveled her dome, one blue eye blinking at Polla. “Oh, yeah? Doesn't look clear. There’s a lot more inc on the long-range sensors. A lot more.” She paused. "Remember the Awakened Ones? I think they're coming here."

“Waking her up was supposed to fix this!”

“A simplistic assumption.” Everyone said the T3 was back to Mission-normal, with no more creepy Force Emperor-computer possession, but Polla wondered. “How was Polla Revan supposed fix it? By magic?”

Isn’t that what she does? “I don't know. Carth said she'd… go into the tomb or something.”

"Sorry I didn't." Voice at the cockpit entrance. Her, standing there. But Polla already knew she'd come aboard from the cam-feeds.

Carth didn't tell me you'd go into the tomb. The Emperor said that's what Carth said. A distinct difference.

But when you're up late with your waking nightmares… and then your Chassnian pie-making hostage starts chuckling and telling you she has a message for you from the Imperial High Admiral Onasi, who needs your help in his darkest hour….

Polla hadn't had time to think the logic through. Suddenly, she and Da were strapping in the T3 just before dawn, leaving a note for Ma and Sei about having to save the galaxy next to the pot of warmed peamato paste for Abasen's breakfast.

Like father, like daughter.

Sure, it'd occurred to Polla it might be a trap, but Da was gonna go no matter what she did. She'd really just come to look after him.

“Sorry I didn't go into the tomb,” the woman repeated. For someone thawed from carbonite, she didn't look that much the worse for wear—actually, she looked a sight more rested than the rest of them. After all, she hadn't been fighting to save the galaxy nonstop for almost three weeks—she'd just been having a nice, safe nap. Discounting the bloody nose, Revan Starfire D'Reev Lin Onasi Ordo, the Butcher of Kaas looked much better than Polla felt. “Maybe I should have, but I didn't. We need to get out of here. Now."

“Well… you could go now if you wanted. I mean, it's been nice knowing you,” Polla snapped. "Because we've got a ton of incoming hostiles and we're all gonna die.” It wasn’t quite what she’d meant to say. There just wasn’t any time.

The Butcher wiped her bleeding nose on the sleeve of the battered jacket she was wearing. “We're not dead y—”

"The Awakened Ones have arrived!” Mission sang out. "Hey sis!"

"Mission?” Revan frowned. "You're… you? You're okay?"

"I think so."
A real bomb blast hit too close then, cratering the ground outside and the Temple floor rocked, causing Polla to lift the Hawk's thrusters. “Cut the chatter and do something. If I have to jump to hyperspace inside this fracking building we're gonna distentigrate. Doubt that'd save even you, Miz Immortal.”

“Hell.” The woman turned paler and Da squeezed in behind her, along with Zaalbar and Higgrurreee and Phylus—

Polla counted one missing from the Butcher's rescue party. “Hey, where's whatshisname? Tenny-bro in that Twi'lek body?” They’d found him with Zaalbar and the others. A dozen Wookiees, plus that Phylus kid that the Mandalorians had left behind.

“Didn't make it.” The Butcher took a deep breath, steadying herself against the communications bench. “Wall collapse.”

“Frack, then how the hell are we gonna plot coordinates to get you to Captain Obvious?”

Polla had gotten them here with the route the possessed piemaker in Ma's cellar had given her—a roundabout that took them on a brief tour of the Machine War's greatest hits. They could go back that way, sure. Far as the asteroid belt that had been Peragus. But Carth'd want Revan with him, wouldn't he?

“No time. Just get skyward... then... jump.” The object of their rescue mission slumped onto the bench, strapping webbing around herself with an ease that Polla appreciated. “I know where Carth is now.”

“Oh, yeah? Telos was the last place HoloNet said, but that's the point. We needed Tenny-bro to know for sure. Asshole's better than wideband—and a frack more reliable, these days.”

“Carth was going to Corellia, but I'm not sure he's still there—” the Butcher was trying to open a channel like she didn't understand wideband silence was a thing—and now frowning when her efforts were rewarded with a crash of static because most of the relays were down. Again. “But we need to jump to Byss.”

“Fancy, but I don't have the route for Byss. Or Corellia. Not from here. Not unless you want to take a month to get there the old-fashioned way.” Maybe Deepfreeze didn't get it. "The Sleepers make hyperspace routes. We can't do that."

Pray like a Grass Priest they never make one to Deralia. That was why Polla couldn't take the woman home, even if Malachor D'Reev had been there, which he wasn't. No, the kid was still missing—on top of everything else.

Polla wasn't looking forward to that conversation.

“I know. I... think I can navigate.” The Butcher leaned across her board, toward Polla's. “Let me input—”

"Are you nuts?" So many ways that could go wrong.

“Pollie?” Da broke through on the intercom. Obviously listening in through the mics. “Let her do it. Can't get any worse.”

“You were supposed to save the galaxy,” Polla snapped, staring at her sensor alerts, now flashing red. “Supposed to go into your cage, stop those crazy ships, and end this fracking hell. Nice job.” It wasn’t what she meant to say—not all she meant to say—but they didn’t have time.
The woman with her memories grimaced. “I-I know. Let me try.”

Xxx

“You were supposed to save the galaxy,” Polla said accusingly, muttering more half-baked opinions half under her breath.

“I know,” Revan said, closing her eyes and trying. "Let me try."

A thousand eyes hurtled through hyperspace—all of them furious, raging, wanting to burn her. Revan could almost reach out and see—

“This is insane,” said a flat Deralian voice somewhere in the world. Above them, like a stir of bak-wasps, were twenty ships. Thirty, disgorging their swarms of fighters, trailing toward the planet below. Forty, Fifty—more above them—

“You know this is insane, right?” The voice softened a little. “Revan, we're heading right into them—oh, frack!” Polla cursed and the engine whined as the others begin to react to the Hawk's sensors registered the incoming assault—

Xxx

And then Revan was—

Bound on the bridge of a Republic flagship, facing a pebble-skinned Trandoshan woman, snarling back at her through a holographic display of the Byss System. And next to the Trandoshan, her own reflection—

Dar was unarmed, Revan noted. Not fully trusted by the officers she supposedly commanded.

“They've gone.” High Admiral Rensha bared her teeth. “Did they go back to Corellia again?”

“No.” Dar'Revan turned to look at the white-haired woman standing across from them. “Atris?”

Master Atris shrugged. “They will hardly take our bait when hers is so much louder—”

The pleased smile on the old woman's face seemed to provoke a disgusted sigh from Dar. “We had them! I had them!”

“Not anymore.” The older women chuckled, and Revan felt an irrational spike of hate.

Dar turned, seeming to stare directly at Revan. “Well? Tenebrae?”

“She can see you.” The beak chattered the words. "Oh, my little copy. What will you do now that your true master has returned? You cannot hide from her. She can seeee youuu—"

Xxx

You cannot hide from her, the Sith Emperor had said.

Hide. Hide.

But I can hide from them. And then Revan knew what to do.

“—said, pull the nose up!” The world wrenched to the side, wrenching Revan back to the present. She was suddenly aware that they were in a firefight for their lives. Polla was huddled over the ship's controls, tell-tale hum of cannons from midship and the upper bay giving the locations of their crew. The Wookiee cub gave an almost apologetic growl and handed Revan a new handi-wipe. She took it, wiping her nose. She could feel the ships pursuing them like lasers across her back, more arriving in the system with each passing second.

[Kill]

No. She thought back at them. Stop.

[Too late]

It wasn't. Revan retreated from the Force, pulling its weaves around her like a cape. The screams in her head dimmed. She opened her eyes to see the deadly formations on their forward sensors splitting and drifting as the Sleepers' attack wave broke and fragmented, knocked off-kilter by her vanishing like a bad game of rikkochet.

“Shields!” Polla yelled, tapping the comm. “Da?”

Buzz of static before the answer. “—too close. You're gonna… jump soon.”

“Can't. Not yet.” Polla twisted the yoke and Revan's stomach lurched.

Revan still felt the Sleepers scream—so loud that it threatened to overwhelm her shields. The Force lapped back, like waves from a ride, leaking through. "Keep going," she whispered through gritted teeth. "Farther up—farther—"

“Frack it.” Polla leaned forward. “Rather die being ripped apart by a bad jump than burn in this fracking sky.”

“Wait.” The word came out a whisper and Revan closed her eyes. “Wait. Not yet.” Later, she was never sure how she knew. It was pure instinct, a call from the Force itself. “Up another thirty degrees and then punch it when I say.”

“You kidding?” But the smuggler was listening. Her pointed chin jerked in a nod. Her hand poised over the controls, then settled on the lever, white-knuckled. Her other hand twisted the yoke, increasing their angle. The whine of gees increased to a dull roar.

“Trust me,” Revan told her. Polla’s familiar features blurred, overlain by the coordinates, the numerical codices that defined every millimeter of space within the void. Up and forward, and above them, the gap—

“You do it, then!” Polla was yelling over to be heard of the Hawk’s turbines. “I don’t know where we are!” Her knuckles tightened on the stick.

Revan leaned across the board and put her hand on top of Polla’s.

She closed her eyes, and saw the stars. One more tick. Two.

They pulled the hyperdrive lever back together and the Hawk sprang forward in a blur of light—

Xxx

The severed head of the Hunter-Killer droid, the same HK who had, long ago, made Oerin Lin the head of his family, hung on the wall above Meetra Surik’s bed. The rest of the HK-47, including its half-dismantled brain, was strewn across a large workbench that Bao-Dur had fashioned from the doors of a crashed warbird. More often than not, Oerin had noted, the Zabrak shared Meetra Surik’s bed... and confidences, too.

They had been up to something for days, the two of them. Oerin wanted to know what it was.

“Hello,” he said, to his living sister’s broad-shouldered back. The Force felt like a negative exposure around her form—a rift growing wider. A scream.

Oerin understood perfectly. Lately, he often felt like screaming himself.

His sister stood in the open balcony of her chambers overlooking the ruin of the planet she had wrought. She had, Oerin noted without surprise, acquired a lightsaber. It was clipped to her belt.

“I dreamed again.” She spoke without turning. Oerin had tried so hard to be soundless but the creaks and cracks in his shriveled joints betrayed him. “Same as before: a black and red chamber, the kneeling woman. She is whispering to us, but I cannot see her face.”

“By design,” Oerin answered. Was her ignorance feigned? Was it optimism? Stars, sometimes he missed Arkan. Meetra Surik did not possess a microjot of humor or artifice anywhere in her long, breakable bones. Lately, he’d been thinking about breaking those bones a lot.

That and the sound of screams.

What had Nihilus said with his wordless roars? That Sion’s need was different than his? Not hunger, no. Still not fully formed. Oh, but it was coming. It was coming now—and he felt just as helpless as dead Darth Nihilus before the onslaught. Like a deep thirst inside of him would need to be slaked. And soon.

_I will make the galaxy burn for my people who were supposed to be free—_

The clans were not free now. Oerin had seen the HoloNet broadcasts—spotty and irregular but still transmitting these past few weeks. The clans were fighting the Emperor’s own war basiliks—or an equivalent. Another self-repairing, autonomous fleet.

Adversaries worth destroying. But not for _her._

“She’s hiding her face by design?” Meetra turned, all black hair and yellowing eyes. Her caff skin looked sickly. The red star on her cheek gleamed with sweat through darkening hints of Sith corruption. “Whose design?”

Oerin tried to laugh but it came out a wheeze. “Does she make you forget every time? She does that, you know. Mother’s design. Our _mother._”

“I hardly knew her.”

“But she knew _you._ I thought we’d broken free, but she’s still there.” _How?_ Oerin had no idea. His mother’s ability to cloud their minds should have died with her body, but it had not.

There was a flicker of something in her madwoman’s eyes. "Perhaps, but our mother's not omniscient, Oerin, even if she did manage to cheat death. Again."

"She is, more so than us. And we are part of her plan." Oerin knew it in his aching, shriveled bones. He gestured to the balcony, the world beneath their feet, the Academy they’d revived—to all of it.
Meetra laughed. “She may believe that. But our mother’s plans misfired all the time. I have proof. Look.” She bent over the HK's brain-guts, and slid two modules to one side. There was a whirring noise and ragged images flashed through the air, whine of voices at the wrong speed. “Bao-Dur managed to get into the HK’s core by running a subroutine with Remote to feign sentience.”

"So?” Revan had sent the droid to look for Davad Arkan, and failing that, to her dear master Arren Kae. Mother again.

Perhaps Mother had whispered in Revan's dreams and told her to do it because she wanted a Hunter Killer droid herself. Oerin wouldn't put it past her.

"There's a lot of information in the thing's core. Archives about the Mandalorian wars, messages for Revan’s son… information about Malachi D’Reev, our mother and the Emperor… details about a plague, the Rakatan computer network….” Meetra shrugged. "The last recording is a message that Revan made for our mother. Would you like to see it?"

“Yes.” Why not?

“I knew you would.” When Meetra smiled he could see that some of her teeth had gone bad. She barely noticed the ache in her jaw, but Oerin did. He savored it.

The holographic image showed a Revan nearly bald and gaunt, with shadows under her eyes.

“Master Sunrider—” the voice began.

“Sheris took much better care of that body, before,” Oerin joked.

Meetra blinked. “Sheris? What about her?”

“That body.” His attempt at a leer was unfortunate and would have gotten him smacked in Mandalorian company. “I’ve seen all of it, you know. We were…” he felt his voice trail off. Were he still clan and alive, he would have blushed to say such a thing, even to a sister.

Seen but not had. If he could do it again, he would have had her.

“You have not been my master for years, but I suspect I still follow the path you set for me.” The woman on the recording—Sheris or Revan—drew a deep breath. “If you are seeing this now, Master Sunrider, it means Davad Arkan has failed in his efforts to destroy the Emperor. Him… and that puppet son of yours.”

"Puppet son? Hah! What does she think she is?"

“Sheris was my friend. Revan was not.” Meetra had said this before, as if it mattered. “Revan left a message for Knight Arkan as well. It is mawkish.” She made a face.

“I kissed that mouth and now it slanders me?” Oerin's chuckle rattled what was left of his intestines. “When she was Sheris Darkstar she was much nicer!”

“Sheris was my friend,” Meetra Surik repeated. “Revan took her like she takes everything—”

“Shhh!” He held up a flaking hand.

“If you are seeing this, master, it means I failed.” Those lips that had whispered sweet nothings in Oerin's ear pursed and scowled now. “If you are seeing this, know you must end him. By any means necessary.”
“Do you think she means end you?” Meetra asked Oerin.

“I rather think she means the Emperor of the Sith.”

"I know. I was wondering if you did."

Rev rattled on about a Rakatan mind prison she'd failed to find that could stop the Emperor. Meetra yawned discreetly and sat down at the workbench. Oerin was having more and more trouble moving on an incline; so he stood where he was, joints aching, the stabbing evidence of his decay all-too-present in every cell of his body.

“All my life, I think, it has been you. Maybe even before Tenebrae.” That inimitable voice of hers cracked. (Revan’s inimitable voice was, in fact, often imitated. At this point, there were more vids of Rev's life than Oerin's grandmother.) “Always you. All of my life you've been guiding my steps. Whispering in my ear, manipulating me—” Rev broke off, and wiped her eyes, rather uncharacteristically. “You put me in this empath's body... why? Did you think you could control me, or was I merely another cast-off like Surik or Davad? I failed... but I also took my revenge. Your precious pawn is dead. The mindwiped shell with my body... the body you wanted for yourself... I destroyed it. You once taught me the weakest pawn can change the board and I have. You will never posses her strength. I've seen to it.” Her hand reached to her head and then fell back again, resting in her lap where it joined the artificial one, clasping the false fingers with flesh as if for comfort. “You started this war. You brought the Empire to our gates. End it.” The woman folded her arms, almost defiantly. “If I fail, you must, because there is no one else.”

The holoimage fizzled out abruptly. Oerin noted the date—more than four months had passed since Malachor.

“I think things did not go according to plan.” Oerin wanted to laugh, but Meetra startled him by giggling herself. If the HK’s head on the wall had started speaking, Oerin would have been less surprised. "But is Rev truly dead? I could have sworn I sensed—"

Mere hours ago. A scream across space.

“You did not see?” His sister laughed again. “And you claim to know Sheris so well? She's such a bad liar! See her hands?”

“One of them is fake,” Oerin told his sister. “And...?”

“Sheris always clasped her hands when she was lying,” Meetra said. “Just like that. But what is she lying about? The Rakatan mind prison? Perhaps it’s a trap... for our mother.”

“Or, perhaps dear Rev—the real one—isn’t dead.” He thought of the woman who had rescued him from Manaan as the real one even if the truth was more complicated. “The woman in your dreams—the one in that black and red room is our Mother. I am sure of that.” Oerin did not dream, but there were times when he looked down at the repaired ships, the assembly of Blades he had whispered to return to them and wondered what it was all for. In his conscious mind he was merely collecting the army that should have been his birthright—but knowing dear Mother there would be more to it than that—

Why am I here? Why am I calling them? Some were more stubborn than others, but they all returned in the end—shattered Blades but still obedient. And with their return they brought more ships and crews and weaponry. He and Meetra had even begun to assign them ranks like in days of old. New blades, and more fodder, forged for a new galaxy.

The ancient Academy beneath his feet now hummed with life and purpose. But… whose purpose? For the war outside? Oerin thought from all reports the Sleeper ships were doing an excellent job ravaging the galaxy on their own. Why did they need his help?

Did Mother oppose them? She had wanted the Sith Emperor destroyed. And so he had been. By his own fleet.

"I know who she is." Meetra seemed preternaturally calm. "I know she is Vima Sunrider. I know she is our mother. I know what she tries to do." She picked up the holorecording. "What I find significant in this recording is her defiance. Whoever this woman is—Revan or Sheris—she lied to our mother. She defied her. Her temerity is…” Meetra seemed to be stumbling for words. "...an inspiration."

"Are you inspired enough to help me kill Mother again?"

"I would hate for Mother to die alone." Meetra walked to her desk and picked up a piece of the Hunter Killer droid. "I hate Revan, too. Poor Sheris. She was my friend."

Oerin didn't hate either of them, but if they were between him and his mother…. "You seem to have something in mind." All he had were dreams.

"I do. But first tell me: you do sense Revan? The true Revan? That is why you think she's not dead?" Meetra looked at him and her head tilted. There was more cunning and less madness in her gaze than he expected. "I thought I sensed something myself this morning—a flash of power—and then gone."

"I taught her how to hide myself." Oerin shrugged. "That I sense nothing now means nothing." All of my life you've been guiding my steps, Rev (or Sheris) had said that of Mother. And she wasn't the only one the woman controlled. Even the freedom of death had not freed him from Mother's clutches. And Mother, as Brianna had told them, had acquired a new body for herself—possibly two—

She could have done that for Oerin. But she had not—instead she had shaped him to be this creature of pain.

"If Revan failed to destroy the Emperor, Mother must have another plan." Meetra paced back from the window, pivoting toward her chamber's divider; the rooms beyond where Oerin knew her minions still slept. "Perhaps that is why I had my tech build a second mass shadow generator, twin to the one that destroyed this planet. I dreamed I should."

Oerin’s laughter was as hollow as his ribcage. "You don’t say."

"I do." Meetra's eyes were as dark as space. "Perhaps we should bring it to our mother."

"Is that what Mother wants? For us to bring her a superweapon?" He should be angrier, Oerin thought, to be used. But the pain of the galaxy swamped his senses. Someday—sooner than not—it would be all that he could hear.

A slight smile softened Meetra’s expression, one that made Oerin reassess her. Not a simple madwoman, then—not at all. “I do not think so. I haven’t dreamed of that.”

XXX
“Maybe it would help to talk about your nightmares.” When Kore had been little, he'd talked to Ache Kay about the bed dreams. It had helped.

“Not with you, kid.” Atton took another hit from the death stick he had smouldering over his drink. His cheeks sucked in as he inhaled, then exhaled. If Kore hadn't edged back he would've been hit with a blast of sour smoke. “Trust me. My dreams? Not for kids.”

“Oh yeah? Well, I'm growing up.” To prove it, Kore shoved aside his glass of blue milk and signaled the Twi'lek behind the bar. As usual, they were the last sents in the joint. “One fizz pop, please,” he said.

"No smoking in here." The Pink ignored Kore, going for Atton instead, grabbing the death stick and dropping it into his drink. The igniter crackled and sparked out.

“Hey!” Kore's protector wasn't much of one these last few weeks—not since he'd picked the winning swoop at twenty-to-one. He kept saying he was getting drunk a lot because of the new war, but Kore thought it had a lot more to do with Atton being rich enough now to afford to get drunk all the time. The Twin Suns was the only cantina that still let them in, and that was mainly because Atton kept betting on its white Twi'lek co-owner to win races, even though she'd only won a few times since the Big Score.

By Kore's rough count of credits in and credits out, they were gonna be broke again soon.

“You know how much death sticks cost?” Atton's indignant squawk would've been funny if Kore hadn't suddenly heard the Force yell really loud, sounding just like Mother.

“Oh!” His hand must've jerked because he knocked over the blue milk.

“You okay, kiddo?” The pink Twi'lek's name was See'raa. Kore had caught that when Atton had hit on her the first seven or eight times. She had pretty eyes, almost purple, and a nice smile. She pulled a scrubber out and wiped up the milk.

“Uh huh.” Kore nodded, because his voice was all muffled from the breather-mask Atton made him wear all the time now. It gave him a cool metal voice kind of like father's, but he felt self-conscious talking in public.

“Mmm.” Kore nodded back, and picked it up, threading the straw into his mask's mouth-hole.

"What about my drink?" Atton cleared his throat. "Least you could do is comp me a fresh one too."

"Sure." See'raa pulled out a bulb from under the counter and dumped the contents in another wide-rimmed cup, topping it off with a swirl from a green bottle from the top of the bar. "But this is the last. It's after closing already."

"We were thinking of leaving anyway." Atton took a long swallow and drained half the glass.

"Havta get up early in the morning," Kore said. "For school." It wasn't true, but Atton had told him to pretend while they were on Nar. Some kind of stupid, mandatory rule.

“You Human under there? Rattaki?” The Pink giggled. “Hard to tell with all that gear on your face.”

Kore nodded and she laughed again. She had a pretty laugh. Her sister was the whiteish purple one who raced swoops. The White had a crooked smile, and one of her lekku drooped a lot, which made her hard to understand, even with Ryl-sign, which was all she used.

Maybe she couldn't talk.

Kore's Ryl-sign wasn't very good. They'd had electives when he was last an Eglatine, and he'd picked Aqualish, which had not been useful on their run across the galaxy, as things turned out.

“I gotta piss.” Atton stood up and stood there, like he was waiting for Kore to come with him. Usually, Kore would, because there was safety in numbers, but right now he was safe. Nobody was left in the cantina and nobody messed with the Twin Suns anyway. They had taken out two Hutts, people said. “Well?” Atton grabbed Kore's arm when Kore just shook his head and didn't stand up. Atton's grip wasn't hard, just hard enough to get Kore to follow, except he didn't want to.

“You know where the fresher is, Rand.” Pink frowned. “I'll watch the kid.”

“I'm okay here, Atton, I promise.” Kore glanced up and nodded again from under the brim of the construction-hat Atton had also insisted he wear. “I don't have to piss.”

“We're a package deal, remember?” Atton reached for Kore's arm again, but the Pink put her hand there first.

“I said,” she said in a soft, kind of scary voice that reminded Kore a little of Mother, “I'll watch the kid.” The Twi'lek looked from one of them to the other, a little frown on her face now. “Got a problem with that?”

Atton snorted, raising his hands like he was surrendering. “Nope.” He shot a glance at Kore. “You okay?”

“Yeah.” Kore nodded. He knew what Atton meant. Kore had Father to warn him if trouble was coming. Atton might not know about Father—at least—but he'd learned to trust Kore's instincts.

Like when they left Peru-agas Station because Kore had a funny feeling (and that lady had tried to kill him). Then it had been blown up by the Ships like a week later. First casualty of the Machine War, which is what everyone was calling the War.

Pink slowly took her hand away from Kore's arm. Atton went to the fresher.

“Thanks,” Kore told her. “He can be a little overprotective.”

“Hmm… Let me ask you something…” See'raa hopped her butt up on the bar, and adjusted the vibrosword on her hip so that it splayed straight across her knees. “Personal question if you don't mind. That guy… he your father?”

“Yes?” Kore lied, but there must be a trick to lying because the Twi'lek just shook her head, frowning more.

“Right. If he's your father, I'm a Wookiee.”

“You're very pretty for a Wookiee.” Kore felt his face heat up like it was going all red under the mask.

“And you have pretty eyes,” she said back. “What I can see of 'em under those goggles... but I gotta wonder… a man like that… you being a nice kid... would you like to get away from him?”
“Yes.” And feeling Mother come back made Korrie hope she'd end the War soon. “But my father says I should stay with him for now.”

“Did your father sell you to him?”

Kore blinked. It took him a few secs to think of why anyone would do that. “Isn't selling sents illegal here?”

“Nope.” Her lips pursed together, and her lekku twisted around her neck. “Employment contracts, they call it. Hutts are fine with it.”

“My father wouldn't need to sell me. He was rich!”

“Was?” Her brow ridge raised.

“But he... he got—he died.”

“That's sad.” See’raa rolled her head back and straightened, tossing a few empty bulbs of beer to the white one, who'd come out of the back room. Her lekku moved and the White's moved back, but fast and all Kore caught was 'kid' and 'trouble.'

“I am not trouble,” he told her.

“But are you in trouble?” Pink lowered her voice. “Tee'rea and I help kids in trouble sometimes. Find fosteres for em... if you want to be someplace safe—”

“There's a war,” Kore told her. “There's nowhere safe.” See'raa ought to know. Just before they came to Nar this cantina had been all bombed and stuff. The new place was still under construction, half the walls made of flimplast and temp-boards.

“Some places are safer than here. The Awakened Ones might come back. ” See’raa’s lekku twisted and she glanced up. The big HoloNet screen was playing the News, which was all about the War. A big map of the galaxy, with X’s over the planets that had been decimated and another grid that showed the number of Machine Ships left. More than half of the big Machine fighters were gone now, but that still left two hundred and fifty-six. Except Kore knew that number was wrong, too. Father said this was all propaganda. That none of the numbers were real. Kore had deduced that meant there were probably a lot more Machine Ships than two hundred and fifty-six.

OSSUS, the screen read. Population 5,673.

“Awakened Ones?"

"The war ships. They were sleeping now they're awake." See'Raa winked at him. "Just because they're machines doesn't mean they're not alive."

"You mean the Machine Ships might come back? Here?"

"Yes." See'raa tapped her fingers on the bar. "They didn't finish wrecking our installation, so I'd lay the odds at about ten point three to one."

"Oh." But Kore didn't have that funny feeling. Not here. Weird, but in the Force it felt okay here. At least now. "I think we'll be okay."

"Your funeral." She shook her head. Her sister signed something Kore knew. The word for 'stupid.'

Atton had told Kore that you should never argue with people who made your drinks, so Kore changed the subject.

OSSUS: Population 2,124 (Updated) is what the screen read now.

"That's not that many people, at least." Kore offered, pointing at the number. "And maybe some made it to shelters or got away. I read in school that Ossus got real messed up ages ago, in the Cron Cluster implosion. Nobody really lived there anyway."

The numbers dead weren't real, just like the ship numbers. Not til they had a chance to be counted by the Senate. Everyone said the numbers might even be lower, that there might be sents still alive. But it had been hard to get rescues to the planets that had got attacked. The first time sents sent in rescue ships, to Levan, the Sleepers came back. The second time the Fleet Mercy Corps had wanted to send rescue ships, Mother had made them send her ships instead.

That had been the victory of Wahgu—when they started putting her fake name out there. Kore couldn't say he was proud to anybody but Atton, but he still was. Every planet had evacuation plans now. Every sector had drills. Even here in Huttspac, where the Machine Ships had already been.

They never hit the same place twice—not when they left for good. So it was safe- ish here. Kore was glad of that.

"The Awakened Ones are beginning to mitigate losses. Calculate risk." See'raa told him. She pulled something out of her pocket. A small square, with a blinking light in the middle. Her sister had come up on the other side of the bar and was standing next to Kore now, on the other sjde. "Know what this is?"

"Retinal id-scan." Kore averted his eyes even though she wasn't holding it up to him and he had on goggles that scanners couldn't see through. Gloves, too. Just in case, Atton had said. "Why?"

"Your partner's coreslime," See'Raa said. "I can't prove it, but I ran a check on his retinas with this. Man doesn't have a print in the system. Sents wiped from galactic databases are deep in poodoo—takes a real hack to scrub someone that clean." She paused. "Plus, we didn't do it for him. That means he's either coreslime or some kind of spook."

"So? My father told me to stay with him. He's a good chap."

I don't like how many questions she's asking. Father was right there suddenly, thick in Kore's head.

"Shap?" See'raa gave the word a hissing sound.

It was the white one that giggled with her mouth open and no sound. Her lekku moved but too fast for Kore to catch.

The Pink seemed to notice his confusion. "Tee'raa said, that proves Atton's not a Jedi poster boy, right?"

"I know he's not a Jedi poster boy." Father was, once. "They don't have Jedi poster boys anymore."

No, now all they had were posters of some Human lady with a red star on her face and long black braids and the words, 'Have you seen the Last Jedi?' But even those posters were getting rarer and rarer, because now they were calling Mother (who was pretending to be Sheris) the 'Last Jedi,' instead.

Kore glanced back up at the vid-screen. More planets now.

TELOS. Population 9,991
D'QAR. Population 22,382,119

Bigger. D'Qar had been a bad one. But that meant they'd definitely have had some shelters and they said people survived in shelters all the time!

“I wasn't talking about actual Jedi,” See'Raa snorted. “They're all losers—the good ones all died.”

Kore made himself shrug. “Which ones did you like? When I was little I used to collect the trading cards.”

"Star Forge crew, huh? What about Knight Revan? She's part of the set, too." Mostly people wouldn't forget that.

TARIS. Population Unknown.

See'raa snorted. "Duh, but was she a Jedi?"

"The best one."

"Kids," she snorted.

Tee'raa was staring up at the screen for Taris. She gave a little sigh.

“Can't you talk?” Kore asked her. He'd been meaning to ask her before but he'd never had the chance.

She shook her head. And her lekku moved. He caught the words for 'you' and 'mouth.'

“She wants to know if there's something wrong with your face."

Careful, Mal. Father warned him.

But Kore didn't seem the harm in saying. “No, but the people who are looking for me are bad. Atton's helping me stay away from them.”

This seemed like a job for Father, but he was still mostly far-off in the Force.

Did Mother just wake up? This lady's asking a lot of questions!

Yes, Mal— Father was really faint, as if a bunch of stuff was happening someplace else. Probably helping Mother fight more battles. Not that she needed his help, Father had said. Just that he needed to be there for protection.

“We can help more than that sleemo.” The Pink held up her hands. “Not saying you need it! How old are you?”

In Nar rotations Kore was thirteen so he used that. “Thirteen.”

“Standard?” See'Raa looked impressed. Behind her the White traced a lekku-sign that meant long, maybe. Or tall.

“Yeah.” Wasn’t true. He was almost twelve in six months back home. But Korr decided to push it more. “Almost fourteen.”
“That's not as grown up as it seems,” the Pink said. She was taking him seriously. "Let us help."

“People of the Republic,” her voice interrupted, coming from the vid-screen. “I wanted to bring you the latest war briefing myself—”

“Ugh.” See'Raa tapped the controller she had strapped to one of her lekku and Mother's image flickered out.

Behind her, the white rolled her eyes and made a sign that meant something rude. Kore wasn't sure what, except the one Twi'lek Eg had been suspended over it.

“Put that back on. I want to see! I'm a paying customer. You have to let me.” Atton had been gone a while. Kore hoped he wasn't asleep in the stall again. Sometimes deathsticks and alcohol were a bad combination.

_Mal? Where's your Blade?

Father meant Atton, not the knife in Kore's pocket.

_He had to take a piss._

_Don't say piss._

_He had to urinate. Where is Mother? She woke up? Is she coming to get me? Are they both coming?_

_Not... yet. Father's presence faded a little, like he had to go. Be careful._

The White signaled something at the Pink.

"Hrm..." See'Raa raised her brow ridge. "I'll put HoloNet back if you take off that mask, stranger. My sister wants to make sure you're not branded."

"Branded?" Kore didn't get it.

"Trafficked kids get branded. Sometimes with chips you can't even see." See'Raa pulled out another scanny thing the size of a deck of cards. "I use this to check."

Her sister got up and sauntered away heading to the fresher. Tee'raa's hand was on her sword.

"Atton's nice!" Kore called out. It was a lie but not really. "Wait! You can't kill him! He might kill you!"

_Father? He didn't want to panic him when he was busy. Maybe... maybe she just has to take a piss too._

"Take off the mask so we can check you," See'raa ordered. "If you're not on any missing lists, and you're not marked up like property, there's no problem. Right?"

"I... might be on a missing list. I told you already there are bad people after me—after us—didn't I say that?"

Tee'raa had vanished behind the fresher doors.
I don't know what these Twi'leks want. Father sounded puzzled. But there is something odd here. Do not take off your mask, Malachor—

Don't let them hurt Atton!

The Blade can handle himself.

Maybe. But Father was just a ghost. And See'raa was right there. She had always been nice to him. She thought Kore was fourteen. And she didn't seem evil—just a little funny in the Force. Not like a Sith, through.

Kore fumbled with the clasps and his mask came right off. Then the hat. And the goggles.

"Huh. No brands." Those purple eyes blinked at him, and she reached for the scanner. "But you do look familiar."

"That's because I'm famous." Kore shrugged. "You don't recognize me cause I grew up. And I dye my hair now." It wasn't in a top knot anymore and now it was all black. Atton had made him cut the topknot off.

“Really?” The Pink turned up the sound again. The scanner beeped when it covered Kore's face. Didn't hurt, just a bunch of white light.

Mother's voice on the screen was soothing, too. Even if it wasn't real.

“... Telos. Forty-two of the Sleeper ships were destroyed. Our Mandalorian allies suffered heavy losses, but in the end, the day was won by Republic strength, Republic might, and Republic ingenuity.”

"That Jedi did that," Kore told See'raa. "She was the best Jedi! No Republic in-geniuses. Her. Her name's Sheris. She's, um, she's my friend."

"Son of a schutta! Malachor D’Rreev?" There was a lot more cursing as See'raa figured out who Kore really was. Some of it in languages Kore didn't know. "That recording on Coruscant… Tee'raa! Tee'raa!! Get your butt in here!" See'raa brought her fingers to her lips and blew.

The White came in at a run. One side of her face was pinkish red, like she'd been punched. She didn't have her sword anymore.

Kore's chest had a funny feeling. He didn't think Atton was dead, but… he couldn't tell. Atton was really good at hiding when he wanted.

Then Atton came in right behind. He had Tee'Raa's sword in one hand. His own blaster in the other. "Step away from the kid!"

Oh, Mal. For a ghost, Father sounded tired. What have you done?

I think it's okay. Kore told Father. I have a good feeling about this.

He wanted to.

Mother's voice was still talking, even if it wasn't her.

"... seek shelter at the lowest level of your municipality. Bring a heavy object with you, like a droid leg or a hydrospanner! You may need to bang on conduits to get the Mercy Corps' attention, but make no mistake, our allies forces will find you! We will keep you safe...."

"Don't hurt them, Atton," Kore ordered.

Tee'raa had stopped dead in front of Kore, eyes wide.

_M-A-L-A-C-H-O_R_, the White signed. Kore got it because he knew the Ryllese alphabet. Grandfather had sent him for dancing lessons and the Twi'lek teacher said their language was like dancing.

"You recognized me!" It was kind of weird, finally being recognized after hiding for so long and not allowed to be. "Your sister didn't."

Tee'raa signed something so fast Kore couldn't catch it. Something-something slow. Or lazy?

See'raa made a rude noise with her t'chun, snapping it on the bar.

Behind her, Atton still had his blaster cocked. Slowly he slid it back into the holster. "You're lucky I'm a fan of your swoop-racing, babe." He was grinning suddenly, like they were all friends. His grin reminded Kore of a hungry rancor. Not that he'd ever seen one, except in pictures and vids. "Kore? You want to put your mask stuff back on? Go back to the hotel? I'll meet you there."

The hotel was a dumpster in one of the ref sectors. Atton had cleaned it really well. It didn't stink, but it didn't have a fresher, either. It wasn't a hotel.

"And if you're trapped in an area with exposed electrical circuits, make sure to avoid water...."

"Why?" Kore asked. See'raa had promised to help. The Twin Suns lived beneath the cantina. He bet they had guest rooms. "These are the good guys."

On the screen, Mother was still talking, repeating her speech in Rodese. She cycled through languages sometimes, so everyone could understand her.

"He wants you to leave, Malachor, so he he can kill us." See'raa said. "Doesn't want you to see."

_Go, Mal_. Father sounded tired. _It's for the best._

It was not. "You're not allowed to kill them, Atton Rand!"

"Kid…?" Atton shifted his weight, like he'd shown Kore to do to get ready for a fight. "Let me handle this."

Tee'raa's lekku kept saying stuff that Kore didn't understand.

"...iodine. Used _kolto paks_ can also be tied together to make a flotation device. In case of bacteriological contamination, please self-quarantine for a period of at least three of your planer's daily cycles. Alert local authorities...."

"That's not really General Sheris Darkstar on the HoloNet. _Or_ Revan," Kore told them. "Did you know that? I bet none of you knew that! But maybe she recorded the words and they used them later?"

Kore thought when Mother herself used to give speeches (in the beginning of the war when they were shorter) it hadn't looked like she believed them. But this version seemed like she believed.
She kept smiling and nodding.

That's how he knew she was fake.

"... rescue coordinators may have Imperial or Mandalorian sigils on uniforms, or armor! This is perfectly normal. Do not panic. The Allied Mercy Corps is made up of three United forces. The Mandalorians are our allies—"

“Right,” See'raa muttered. Her voice sounded in awe. "We know that thing on the screen’s not Revan. You're right about that."

Was she in awe of him? That was a funny feeling.

"I am an ordinary kid, but I am also Malachor D'Reev," Kore announced. "Revan and Malak's only son. Traveling in disguise with my Human chaperone. I used to have a droid chap, but he blew up. I met some Mandalorians, once..." he added, because Mother was still talking about them. "Or twice. They're pretty cool. Do you know any?"

"One." Tee'Raa motioned to her sister, and they both moved forward at once, until they were one on each side of Atton. "Haven't seen him in ages."

“...and stay safe out there! I am Padawan Sheris Darkstar, The Last Jedi, and this is your war report. May the Force be with you. May it keep us all safe."

The fake Holo of Mother stood up from the desk with her, fake gold hand and the real one. Kore thought the desk was probably fake too. When he'd been a kid, sometimes Grandfather had taken him down to the HoloNet studios. They had all sorts of props that didn't look real. Maybe the fake version of Mother wasn't really in space. Maybe those stars behind her were fake too.

Maybe Mother wasn't in real space, except Father said she was out there fighting for them all. Now both of his mothers would be fighting again. Two Jedi Revans.

"My mother is pretending to Sheris Darkstar, but that's not her," Kore added. "But she is a hero."

Kore thought he shouldn't try to explain how she was two people. He'd tried with Atton once and the man had made him take antibiorix in case Kore was delirious.

Atton snorted. "Oh, kid." He was hanging back, like he wasn't sure what to do, like he didn't want to fight the Twin Suns. He looked like he was drunk. And tired. Too many death sticks.

Another announcer was speaking now, not the fake version of Mother or Sheris. Tee'raa fiddled with a button on her half-shirt and the screen went dark. The room got really quiet except for everyone breathing. Atton's sounded harsh.

"I don't think that was Sheris Darkstar, either," See'raa chimed in. "Or any other organic. Did you see the edges of her hair? Striation. Good fake... but that's an all animated. Just saying lines the mucky mucks say to say." The Twi'lek snorted. "Ya know, I could do a better job myself."

Her twin the White didn't look happy. Her lekku flicked something rude.

See'raa glared back at her and then there was no noise except their lekku kinda clapping at each other while they argued. Kore caught words like 'kill,' 'ship,' and 'water.'

Is Mother okay, Father? Are they both okay? Kore reached out.
They're… fine. Father sounded a little stressed and very far away. Mal? You need to get out of there. Trust your Blade.

Atton was circling so Kore sitting at the bar was in front of him. Tee'raa had picked up a sharp thing she used to chip ice-blocks with. And then See'raa drew her sword. Kore could see it all in the bar's curved mirror in front of him. He didn't know if he should turn around or not. If that would make it worse, or not.

"You guys don't have to fight!" Kore thought about alternatives, practicing his Jedi breathing so he didn't freak out. "I could pay you guys to be my chaps, too! You could all do it together." I'd need credits. I could call Leeshy except Father said to stop calling her.

"Malachor…?" The Pink's voice got higher pitched. Like she was trying to seem his age. "Funny story. See… I'm Mission Vao. Revan's friend. The one from the Star Forge mission? That Mission?"

"No. She's a droid. I know her."

Yes. Tee'raa's lekku flicked. Truth.

"New body," See'raa was holding her blade up toward Atton and he'd turned toward her. But Tee'Raa had the ice thingie. "It's a little complicated. The droid is another version of me. I know that might seem hard to swallow—"

"No, I get it," Kore said. "But you need to prove it."

"You two still sleeping in the ref sector?" See'raa's gaze snapped to Atton. "In an alley? Because the Serroco boys put a price on your head, tonight, Atton. Or should I say… 'Jaq'? We set it up when we thought you just a regular kid peddler."

"Hey now, I'm your sister's biggest fan." Atton spread his hands out, and Kore put his hand in his pocket, reaching for the knife the man had given him. Not that he'd want to hurt See'raa or Tee'raa —just—

Always be prepared. That's what Atton had taught him.

"And I don't want any trouble," Atton continued. "I just want the boy. I have to keep him safe."

"He does a good job," Kore chimed in Tee'raa shook her head.

"He's my chap!" Kore added. "I told you. And I'm Malachor D'Reev! You have to do what I say!"

Mission Vao? In Kore’s head, Father sounded really confused. There is darkness here. You need to leave.

But they're friends. They had always been nice to him.

"And on the war front," a Rodian announcer continued brightly. "Our brave forces have met the Machine Ships in the Byss System. At this time, we advise all sentients in nearby sectors to shelter in place. Orderly evacuations of Byss have commenced—"

Is Byss where my mother is? Are they both there?
"The kid isn't wrong." Atton had holstered his gun. Now he had the laser whip in his hand that wasn't holding the sword. "I do a fantastic job. But I don't like killing women."

Only, somehow, Kore knew that was a lie.

"Be careful!" He begged them all, pulling out his knife. "You don't want to fight! You don't need to!"

"Come with us and we won't have to." See'raa extended her hand. "Know that droid version of me? The T3? She keeps trying to crack into our systems. Something about a message from your mother. I could talk to her. I could get you back to your mother."

"Mother's busy! She's fighting that war!"

Yes… Byss. Father’s voice was faint, now.

Tee'raa's headtails whipped patterns in the air fast as lasers.

"Did he get you addicted to spice? Your mother must be frantic." See'Raa looked like she was translating her sister's frantic lekku-signs. "Sleemo like this loser are all alike. You can't trust—"

"Leave him alone!" Kore wasn't that good with the Force but he made a fist with his not-knife hand and shoved.

Pink stumbled back. "Did you—"

Power, her sister signed. Or maybe that was the word for Force.

"You know, I used to hunt Jedi?" Atton ignited his whip. The smile on his face was scary. He didn't look drunk and tired anymore. He looked happy. "Much more of a challenge than two little girls."

"Who're you calling little—?" See'raa lunged forward.

Atton's whip cracked—

Father! Father was busy but Kore couldn't do this alone. “You have to stop fighting! Please! You have to do what I say—”

Xxx

After running the Republic blockade like a mynock from hell, Polla and Seiran had dropped the Genoharadan folks off at the first Free Station they'd refueled at.

Peragus Station, as it turned out.

In the weeks that followed, Polla had too much time to hope that Rulan and Rogere had made it off before the Machines hit; the same way she hoped the rest of Rulan's crew had made it off Kaas safe—off with the Mandalorians or whatever. Last thing she needed was Exchange blood on her hands… what, when the first news search she'd ran on her and Sei pulled up an all-points bounty issued by a certain life insurance company.

So when they landed on Deralia they were already coming in hot.

They had a few hours of a happy reunion with Ma and Da and Abasen before Ma cracked and fessed up that the Sith Emperor was in the root cellar. Sei probably had the right idea when he said they should just shoot the man—but as it turned out, the Emperor wasn't in a man at all—just some frightened old woman named Sydax from Chassna, who kept saying she just wanted to go home and bake pies.

Polla wondered if she'd been a bad influence on her family. She couldn't blame the Butcher for everything that had gone wrong.

And she had no idea how to make it right.

They had a few days of bliss before the war came. Just enough time for Polla to wonder if maybe Ma and Da had cracked and the baker from Chassna in the root cellar was just... a baker. Just enough time for Ma to stop asking about 'the other one,' and for Polla to start thinking maybe this was it. This was their life: her feeding Abasen peamato stew life; her Sei learning how to knit since they couldn't leave the house in daylight life; her morning, afternoon, and evening sex with Sei life (wasn't that much else to do); their Ma and Da saying they were so happy to see them twenty times a day life.

It wasn't bad. Beat shivering in an attic on Kaas and changing a comatose Dark Lord's diaper.

Sure, they were still fugitives. Along with insurance fraud, the Biscain authorities had a "person of inquiry" post for a Polla Organa regarding their suns. They'd taken a full-page ad out in the Derra City Star looking for her.

Crazy thing was, in the blurred holo-snap, Revan Starfire the Butcher could've been Polla.

The least, Polla told Abasen, whispering it in his soft little ear, the least Revan Starfire could've done was actually win the race. Come in third? Nobody cared about third. Nobody would even have noticed third... except for the slow-nova of the suns that was causing a system-wide evacuation. Some people said it would be five years. Others said ten.

And when the war first came (to Deralia at least), it came quiet. Started with reports that the wideband was out around Peragus Station. Then, a distress call from the tiny resort moon of Endor. Footage from a casino cruiser before it's feed cut out in a haze of vacuum-snuffed fire.

Later, Polla would remember that she knew instantly what had happened, but that wasn't true. She spent about twenty minutes watching the Endor newsvids with Abasen on her lap and the lady from Chassna crying next to her on the couch. Polla couldn't tie her back up. She... she knew what it was like, never knowing if you'd make it home again. Being someone else's prisoner.

She thought about telling the woman about all the good she'd done on Kaas—how she wasn't really a bad person—and decided that wasn't gonna help.

All of it hadn't been good.

The newscasters were just putting together what had happened to Peragus with Endor... and with a rumor that Mandalorians were invading Lehon. Sei came in. Then Da came back from the retaining pond, and Ma from a Grange meet, maybe a little tipsy. There was a footage shot of the Aleema, and a bunch of other ships. One of the announcers pointed out that some of them looked like Sith ships, from the Jedi Civil War. Always on hyper-alert for an invasion, the Deralian port authority closed the skies and blocked all incoming comm traffic.

They stopped tying the lady from Chassna up. She and Ma baked a few pies. Lavos went next, a mining world that no one had heard of on the other side of the Rim. Then more footage. The same Mandies and Sith ships stopping it. Only this time, a Republic ship came in. Some war hero named Commander Cody. He and his men went down with all hands, plowing right into a Sleeper assault strike force.

That was the afternoon they all learned that Abasen was allergic to binkaberries. At least when they were cooked in a pie.

After that came a few days with just rumors. HoloNet reporters breathlessly reported that the enemy fleet could travel through hyperspace instantly.

"That's true," Polla admitted.

Her father had whistled. "Pollie, if there was a way to monetize that...."

"There's not." But she got what he meant. It was just too soon.

Then, victory at some rock of a world called Wahgu, where the Sleepers—or Machine Ships—as the HoloNet called them—were ambushed by a convoy disguised as ref carriers, lured into an asteroid belt, and then ripped apart by three allied fleets. The Republic, the Mandalorian... and the Imperial. No one said the Sith Fleet, anymore. 'Sith' had bad connotations. Darth Malak and all that. The Imperial Fleet's commander was a shadowy figure. They watched a tabloid broadcast speculate he was Darth Malak, come back from the dead and unkillable.

Polla knew it was Carth. Who else would be duty-bound enough to take the job? And if it had just been some Sith aristo, they would've used a name. If their comms still worked, she would’ve... thanked him or something.

The victory at Wahgu was the day General Sheris Darkstar gave her first speech to ... "an embattled galaxy"... the one about an alliance with Canderous Ordo, hero of the Star Forge, and the unnamed Imperial Admiral—

"We know his name," Seiran had muttered.

"Bad look for the Republic," Da opined. "Allying with the Sith?"

"Imperials," the lady from Chassna corrected. She'd admitted that things happened to her, like losing time; like finding instructions written on flimsi, but Polla still hadn't seen any sign of Tenny Bro possessing her.

(She never would, until that last night—when a red-eyed piemaker woke her up with a dark chuckle, demanding to know if she'd known Revan was frozen in carbonite all along. Tenny-Bro delivered what could have been a message from Carth. Or a trap. But by then, Polla had seen the footage from Zaalbar's homeworld. She'd been ready to shove the Butcher in the tomb herself—if that would stop the war.)

But before the last night, they just watched the news.

"Hurrah for the kriffing Republic." Polla was helping Abasen build a house of blocks, making sure to have to two exits and a reinforced cellar. She had started to sort through the piles of plasticate weapons for him to stash in said cellar... and not on the roof where he kept throwing the ones he wasn't trying to eat... but then she ran out of blocks. And the structure was a piece of crap anyway. One direct hit would take the whole thing down.

Aba began to cry and smashed the house apart with the crate it had come in. "Mahmuh!" He yelled. "No!"
Polla tried to pick him up and he punched her. “Do that on Kaas and you’d be dead,” Polla told him. It was supposed to be a joke, but it was true, and nobody laughed.

“He’s too little to play with that building set.” Molla reached for him. “We got it for Kore. Did I tell you he liked to be called Kore? He said Korrie made him sound like a baby. He... he kept telling us he was so grown up.”

It was the first time Ma had said the kid’s name. Her eyes leaked a little.

“This is hard,” Polla had said and then she started to cry, too.

It had been hard. It was all hard.

She didn’t want to think that was part of the reason she left. No, it had been because Da needed her and was gonna go no matter what—and she’d promised Carth she’d watch over the Hawk—

Xxx

"Crew of the Ebon Hawk, honorable guests... welcome to the System of Byss!" Polla tapped the ship-wide mic shut again and breathed a sigh of relief. They’d almost been overrun a few times, but the Butcher—Revan—kept doing something that made the entire flotilla of ships following them freeze, buying them a few minutes each time before the Sleepers started to chase them again.

Jedi, Polla thought, stealing a glance at the glowing figure slumped over the nav-board. She’d frozen the Sleepers, made hyperspace jumps blind... the woman was a fracking miracle. As she watched, the glow around Revan faded and the woman lifted her head, wiping her nose. She blinked at Polla and then turned pale. “Guh—"

“Bucket, Aggee!” Mission sang out.

The Wookiee cub barely got it under Revan in time before she started retching.

“Knew we shoulda cut you off before you drank that liter of CoruGin,” Polla said. First time Revan had puked, Polla had thought she was dying—before Mission explained that Revan always got sick on hyperspace jumps. That was fracked. Polla couldn't imagine.

Now, a wan smile was the only response as Revan’s eyes flicked to their sensor array. “In...incoming.”

"Hells.” Polla spun the yoke in a loop, twisting them down in a maneuver that Da called a flutterby death spiral. He’d also warned her not to use it because it was really hard on the sub-light repulsors. Maybe... but it worked real well for pushing velocity to get as much distance between them and the jump as possible.

"Tell 'em we're friends!” she yelled as a squadron of what looked like Republic fighters dropped abruptly between them and the biggest flagship the Hawk was making tracks for. "Shouldn't they know that already?"

"I did!” Mission was plugged into the console, softly beeping. "See? They're not shooting—not at us."

Revan had gone back to slumping over the nav-board glowing. She’d been glowing a lot the whole trip. A few times she'd babbled in a mix what sounded like Ancient Sith and nonsense, like she was talking to sents who weren't there.
As if she'd noticed Polla's stare this time, Revan lifted her head. "We... we're here." Her words were slurred. Maybe the carbonite freeze, or maybe whatever she was doing to those ships to slow them down was slowing her down, too. Her eyes rolled back up in her head.

“Yeah. Warned you to stop smoking spice,” Polla told her.

A faint smile showed that at least she'd heard the joke this time.

Abruptly the glow went out again. Revan's face grew taunt with strain. On the sensors, the armada of triangular ships chasing them froze and then spun, as if the nav systems had cut out all at once. A few even rolled, like they'd lost stabilizer control completely.

“What are you doing to them?” Polla had asked Revan before but never gotten an answer. Like the other woman was in another galaxy, too busy with her own important things to even talk to Polla. “How are you doing this?”

This time, Revan's eyes focused on her. She blinked a few times, and seemed to recover herself. “I'm hiding. It seems to throw them off.”

“How are you doing this?”

“I'm hiding. It seems to throw them off.”

“Can’t you just do that all the time?” Seemed practical. Then there wouldn’t be a crazed armada of ships chasing them.

“Then they’d go somewhere else. Hurt someplace else.” Revan rubbed her temples. "I wanted them to chase us here. But it's... it's harder to keep my shields up than it used to be."

“You’re disrupting their interface matrices,” Mission chimed in. “I think. Since Rulan cut me off from the Rakatan mainframe, I can’t tell, but that is the logical explanation. Oh! And I sent a text comm to Carth. He must be kinda busy because he just wrote back ‘Freck.’ Is that some kind of code?”

Revan smiled. She looked at their sensor display, which was now going nuts as the Allies carved up Sleepers. "Kinda. He looks busy."

"The madclaw ships are dying," Zaalbar pointed out. "You've drawn them into a kinrath web."

“There’s your solution.” Since they were no longer being chased, Polla put her arms behind her head and leaned back in her chair, watching as the Hawk’s sensors lit up like a Lifeday Tree at Harvest Time. “Hide, then don’t. Hide again while the fleets clean up. Allied Fleets'll take care of the Sleepers, we’ll all live happily after, and you’ll help me get the Transgalactic Underwriters Guild off my back."

“Like get you a pardon?” That smile was suddenly real, maybe the realest expression Polla had ever seen the Butcher have. “For your insurance fraud?”

“And for Biscain. They’re trying to pin that sun nova thing on me. Plus the insurance fraud.”

“You might be overestimating my pull with the brass.” Revan’s top-knot flopped forward and she unraveled it. Looked like she’d had the tail tied with a piece of spare servo-wire. Polla surpressed a shudder. “I’m not even technically a person.”

“Who is?” Mission chirped. “Seriously, Polla Revan, relax!” She made a chuffing noise, decidedly Wookiee-like.

"Technically, you're two. Her and me." Polla offered, feeling generous. Jedi. She'd seen the woman stop an attacking fleet. Make hyperspace jumps blind.

"Doesn't work with Coruscanti law."

"Then go someplace else." Polla had the crazy idea to suggest Deralia. Then she remembered her parents had lost the kid.

"I don't know if I can. Maybe when things… if things cool down." Revan grimaced. "Ever."

"Ebon Hawk!" Their speakers crackled, cutting in and out. "Fo … to … directed coord… Hunt. Immediately."

Behind them, three Imperial snakerisers had started carving Sleeper stew. Polla maneuvered more clearance between them and the explosions, but even so, the Hawk rocked with a barrage of debris hitting their sublight shields.

"Shields down to thirty," her father’s mic crackled from his place on their main gun. "Watch it! Get closer to one of the capitals so we can ride their deflectors instead—"

"Yeah… theirs don't look so great, either." The Great Hunt had a big chunk missing from its midsection and a glimmer of shields there to keep out the black; but that couldn’t be good. And behind it—

Polla blinked. Looming behind like a behemoth from hell was the Aleema, looking even worse.

Gang’s all here. A pair of Imperial snubs were working in tandem with a Mandalorian gunship and a squadron of Republic fighters. Their enemy didn’t seem to be fighting back—like whatever Revan had done was the equivalent of throwing a stun grenade in a pond to catch fish. A fitting fate for the unmanned ships who’d just tried to smear the Hawk across six systems in two hours, not to mention what they’d done to poor Kashyyyk….

The Wookiees on Kaas hadn’t known what had happened to Kashyyyk. Jasp and Polla had had to tell them. That conversation had been rough. (Revan had been glowing at the time, hadn't even blinked.)

"Ebon Hawk!" Another call, cracked through with signal noise. Loser Sleepers were trying to jam their frequencies again. "...made it… party! Dustil sensed… here... beautiful?"

Revan smiled. "I'm fine, Carth. Be careful out there."

"... are." Onasi sounded sure, what they could hear of him. "... careful too."

“They want a piece of me more than they want you, Flyboy.” Revan's brow furrowed harder, as if sitting there not glowing was really fracking difficult. She had the sleeves of that jacket pushed up and an ugly-looking scrape on her arm. She ran her fingers over it. "What I'm doing isn't gonna last forever. They're confused. You need to knock them out fast—"

"Now. Knock them out now. While they're confused. This will not last. Seize our advantage." A new voice—Revan's voice—came across on all frequencies, open channel, broadcasting to everything in the system. Including the Sleepers, like she didn't care who heard. Stronger signal than Carth's, coming through like a bell. "Burn them. Quickly."
"..Freckles? … sending... escort—"

"She can’t make it, Flyboy." Polla decided it was fine to interrupt their love-fest with the news she’d just realized. In between the explosions around them, the Republic flagship had sidled up to the smaller ship like it was gonna ask the Hawk to Sixthday tea. “We’re about to get tractored.”

“I can break us out! No problem—” Mission began, followed by a chorus of Wookiee roars and that kid Phylus Blais interrupting over the din crowding her cockpit that his sister was someplace nearby and he could feel her in the Force.

"Everyone shut up!!" Polla yelled, using her best Darth Revan command voice. To her surprise it worked.

"No, Mission." Revan’s head turned toward The Great Hunt, a puzzled frown still etched on her face. She didn’t look like she’d noticed the crowd. "Don’t pull us free. I need to be on that ship." Her gaze flickered to Polla. "Let me go in alone. I’ll make sure the tractor’s cleared. Get out of this system, soon as you can. Go home."

"I will not leave you, Polla Revan," Zaalbar growled. The Hawk rocked back and forth as the maglev beam locked on its thrusters, drawing them in.

"You will, Zaalbar." Revan turned toward him with a green-eyed glare and added something else in Shyriiwook. Over the din of everyone yelling at once again, Polla caught the words for family and fleas. And tree. Zaalbar whined, shaking his head, but the big guy obviously lost whatever argument they’d just had.

"All of you need to leave. Go home." Revan’s voice softened, and somehow everyone else got quiet. "There’s still arable land on Kashyyyk. You’ll be safe there. Or…” she looked at Polla. "Go to Deralia, Zaal, with her."

A cargo hold full of Wookiees on Deralia? Like that won’t attract attention. What are we gonna feed them? Rations on the Hawk were already low. There were shortages on Deralia now, too, because with the war everyone was hoarding crap in case they got invaded.

"Ship won’t make it home," Polla told Revan. "Or to Kashyyk." Was probably true. "We need repairs before we can do anything."

"Then go to the Aleema. Or that ship of Carth’s—"

"Why don’t you go there with us?" Polla had a bad feeling. "Bossypants is winning the war! I won’t let you kill her."

"I don’t want to kill her." Revan stared at her. Her voice softened. "Really, Polla. I don’t."

Maybe. "There’s three fleets out here and you want us to drop you off with the only one that you don’t have a husband on? Why? You think you’re gonna take over the Republic Navy all by yourself?"

Revan scoffed. "No. Of course not. Thought I’d marry High Admiral Rensha."

“Trandoshan alliances do not work that way, Polla Revan—” Zaalbar’s growl broke off when Revan chuckled.

Polla snorted. “Could get me a pardon, then. Rensha has a lot of pull with the Senate.”
"That’s what I’m counting on—"

Revan’s smile faded. “Don’t worry about it, Mission.”

"Have you ever considered sending in an astromech droid? No one ever suspects the astromech droid."

"They'd suspect you, Mission. You're famous. Remember?" Revan reached out and tapped her dome.

Polla tried another intervention. "How do you even know who's on that ship? For all we know, Bossypants is just broadcasting from there. But she could be anywhere. She could be on fracking Coruscant—"

"Malak told me." Revan's voice turned serious. "His ghost told me. And… some others.. Other ghosts. They showed me. I want you guys out of there because it isn't safe. There is a very powerful Sith on that ship. Not Dar'Revsn. Not the Emperor. Someone who can manipulate thoughts. Memories. Someone who could make you eat your entrails and think it was a cunning plan you invented because you hate to cook."

It figured. Another fracking Sith. Polla was tired of them. "If that Sith’s so powerful, how come the other Jedi don’t—"

"There are no other Jedi." Revan bit her lip. "She killed them all."

"What?" That was impossible. Sure, Polla had heard about Katarr and how the galaxy had been looking for Knight Meetra Surik, a woman the vids called 'the Last Jedi,' but Surik was just a cheap Revan knock-off, and there'd been so many Jedi. The ‘Last Jedi’ was just a turn of phrase. “They can’t all be dead!”

"Not yet. They're being hunted. I knew… knew before. But on Dromund Kaas I saw… I had a vision. The Sith Lord on that ship wants them dead because she's trying to destroy the Force."

"Uh, Sis?" Mission broke in. Polla wondered if Da was still listening in from his gunnery. "Had any new head injuries lately? Taken any funny-tasting food? You sound paranoid, even for you." She whirred. "Even for Sheris Revan, and she's really paranoid—"

"The Jedi's name is Vima Sunrider. My—Revan's—old master." Revan took a deep breath. "Remember that old schutta that Carth shot on the Aleema? That was her. Vima Sunrider."

"So it's her ghost on the Republic flagship? Should have just said so!" Polla believed in ghosts, now. She'd met Darth Malak. And then there was Tenny-Bro, the biggest ghost of all. "Dustil got rid of Darth Malak somehow—"

"Not exactly. She's Master Atris, now. She's in Master Atris—" Revan's voice broke off as the tractor attached, and their hull began to shake. "Just get out of here. Drop me off, then get out."

"I need to see my sister," Phylus interrupted. "I sense her presence and I need to see her now."

The kid Wookiee barked, and Zaalbar's girlfriend yowled something more about making sure all the cubs were safe before they left their branches. Oh. That was the other thing. Zaalbar had a girlfriend. They'd learned about that an hour ago on the ship, fleeing their doom.
Wookiees weren't quiet types.

"We just saved you, Revan," Polla pointed out. Rescued you and then watched you save our asses ten times over. "We're not gonna leave you."

"You must." Now that Revan’s hair was loose, she had it hanging in her face, hiding most of her expression. But her voice was tight with emotion and she was twisting the wire in her hands again, as if she was going to use that abomination to make another topknot. "I mean it, Deralian. Drop me off and go."

"My sister isn't on that ship—" Phylus said. "You need to take me to the other ship. I think the Mandalorian big one—"

"Polla Revan, you must know the vines before you make the bridge." Polla was pretty sure that's what Zaalbar's howls meant. He’d used the phrase with her before, too.

"Don't argue with her, Pollie," Da's voice from the gunnery below. "She’s got your hessi-head."

"She… highest woman. Madclaw to challenge her?" Zaalbar's girlfriend was growling in Polla's face.

A green eye appeared from behind a hank of black-brown hair, red at the roots. Revan’s hand twisted the strands up, holding them to the top of her scalp. She picked up the piece of wire——and Polla leaned across the board and grabbed it out of her hand before the Hero of the Star Forge could make another mess of Deralian tradition. "No," she snapped.

The roots of Revan’s hair were all red. It made the rest look ridiculous. It made her skin seem even paler, washed-out, a ghost. "Keeps it out of my eyes," the woman said, pushing the rest back from her face. "I don’t have anything else."

"Should have just asked." Polla pushed past the Wookiee and edged behind Revan. The woman flinched like a startled hessi but said nothing. Polla fished in her pocket and found a spare ribbon. Blessed by the Grass Priests and everything. Polla yanked Revan's hair into three tails, looping them into a knot and tying it with the blessed cord. The strands were finer than her own, crackling with static, clinging to her fingers. Looked a little sloppy. She wished she had a proper comb.

Revan didn't stop her. Those eyes of hers just looked up, head tilting up, eyebrows raising to follow Polla's face. "I mean it, Pollie. You’ve got to go."

Polla just shrugged. "Sweet you're worried about us, sis."

The other woman swallowed. "I don't understand why you came for me."

"Flyboy asked. Figured I owed him the favor."

"I see." A smile tugged the corner of Revan's mouth. "Are you gonna leave?"

"Sure," Polla lied. "No problem! We'll drop you off and go. I've seen enough Sith Lords to last a lifetime."

"Good." Their eyes locked. Revan’s looked too bright. "Sis?"

"An upgrade from Butcher, don't get technical."
"Be careful." Revan squeezed Polla's arm, a gesture that would’ve seemed normal coming from Da or Sei or Ma. It felt weird with her. The woman looked as if she wasn't sure about it, either. "I want you safe. You, and Zaal and… and everyone."

"Me?" Mission beeped.

"You'll outlast us all." The woman patted the Tee's dome.

On the viewer the Sleeper ships burned and—

Oh. Frack.

Pieces of one knocked their front deflectors down another ten per cent, just as the tractor beam pulled them into the Great Hunt's embrace.

XXX

Corporal Hoggin shot Ulic Qel-Droma, ending a former Sith Lord with a single disruptor bolt.

Carth Onasi shot Vima Sunrider and did the same.

Revan Starfire, who was in the body of Sheris Loran, shot Vima Sunrider, who was in the body of Atris of Echanis, and then—

—then she remembered nothing.

Had Vima frozen the bolt? Stunned her with a touch? Or had Revan’s finger frozen on the trigger before the blaster even fired—

My finger, Sheris had corrected.

But Sheris did not know either. Their next memory was of waking in a cell. Blue haze of a detainment field around them, in the larger expanse of a Republic brig. Weight of a Force collar upon their neck.

Compared to Tenebrae's prison The Great Hunt's was luxurious, albeit small. Revan was allowed (limited) HoloNet access. Her bed inflated every sleep cycle. The tiny fresher had a sonic, and the droid who brought her meals came at regularly scheduled intervals with officer-grade rations. Her interrogations were short and only twice daily, during which time Revan was escorted to Rensha's private bridge and, (under the smug supervision of the supposed Master Atris), asked a series of questions that Master Vima Sunrider would not (Revan suspected) want her to answer truthfully.

Indeed, it became something of a game, giving answers that Vima would despise… although it occurred to Revan on more than one occasion that perhaps Vima was the one directing Revan to give those responses… and not her own spite.

If it was so, she was helpless. Force restraints made her vulnerable to Vima's influence. Malak could be there, protecting her—or not—but Revan would never know.

“Mad with power.” Revan shrugged. “Shouldn't you ask why I allowed you to live?” Her lip curled with a defiance she was too numb to feel. "Perhaps I wanted you alive, as a weak adversary."

That was very rude, Revan. The Force collar locked around Revan's neck blocked Malak's advice, but did nothing to stop Sheris from voicing her opinions.

We should try and placate them, she’d suggested by the third day. If Master Kae sees that we are on the same side—

Master Kae isn't her name. Do you even remember that?

Of course I do! Sheris sounded insulted. But we do need to please her. What good can we do Malachor from this cell?

With the Force collar on, there was no reassurance from Malak that their son was safe. If there was any mercy in the Force, Sheris's opinions would have been silenced too. They were not, Revan knew, because they came from her own mind.

But even without the Force at her command, Revan found comfort in the meditation exercises she had learned long ago. Learned twice; for when she let her mind be quiet she found her recollections going to Sheris's past nearly as often as her own. Her copy had led a quieter childhood than Revan's. There was a certain... certain comfort in that. Younger than Revan when she'd left her family, Sheris retained a plebeian bitterness about her abandonment that was almost refreshing.

Revan’s own relationship to her past was more complicated. There had never been time to grieve for the lost. Now, locked in her own prison of mind and memory, Revan often found her cheeks wet, and the names of the fallen on her lips.

Time passed slowly. Sometimes it seemed to not pass at all. Without the Force, Revan had no way of knowing about the war until three days after the Peragus Station fell.

That was when Kae—Vima—came to her cell, trailed by her two handmaidens. One carried a stack of white robes and a padawan's belt. Nether were visibly armed.

"I thought the threat would be against less than a dozen worlds," the woman began, without an apology—or reprimand. "Less than a dozen worlds before the Sleepers exhausted themselves. I assumed that only the worlds with Rakatan installations would be at risk—and half of them were in Wild Space, or within the Empire's borders."

"You assumed? Acceptable risk?" Revan lifted her head. She knew already. Vima only admitted a weakness when she needed something. "You were wrong."

The woman continued as if Revan had not spoken. "And so, we reinforced the Republic's defenses; began evacuations on Dantooine. Kashyyyk. Manaan—"

"You think I would have hesitated to lose less than a dozen planets?" Revan wanted to laugh, even if the joke ended as Vima's always did, with worlds in flames. "There are Rakatan installations on at least fifty inhabited worlds. Maybe more. Tenebrae could tell you which ones if he wanted—did you ask him?"

"The Toydarian has gone catatonic." Master Atris's face twisted with Vima's malevolence. "I have reason to believe he lost a large number of his bodies on Lehon. It appears he was stockpiling them there."

"Endor, Lehon and Lavos." The woman shook her head, making a clicking noise deep in her throat. "You may cross them off your list and give me the others. I will need you to write them all down."

"If Endor’s been hit, Wahgu might be next."

Master Atris’s eyes blinked. "Why?"

"The interface runs in processing chains. Different networks run different programs for the Infinite Empire. The Star Forge on Lehon was powered by Dantooine, Tatooine, Manaan, Korriban, and Kashyyyk. But there are other linked chains. And other processes."

"Ah. That makes sense." The woman’s eyes almost looked yellow in the light. "And how is Wahgu connected to Lehon and Lavos? Isn’t Lehon part to the Dantooine cluster?"

"It's a hub. Endor bridges off of it. Then Wahgu… then Taris." Revan stared at one of the two identical Echani, wondering if their master had left them with minds at all. "Since the destruction has already begun, I suppose we won’t have time for my public Coruscanti execution—unless you intend to skip the trial. They’ll raze Coruscant soon."

"No." The old woman in Atris’s body chuckled, and one of the Echani switched off the cell’s containment field. "We were never really going to execute you, ci’dika. Even the Last Jedi can be redeemed."

Revan let herself laugh in response. "Of course. Tell me, did Malachi learn his media tricks from you, or you from him?"

"Both," Vima’s smile on Atris’s face. "Long ago. Well before that wife of his. Long before Malak was born."

"I'd imagine he’d have forgotten your name by now, if I hadn’t killed him." Revan matched her careless tone. "Couldn’t have been Vima, then. Was it Nomi, or—"

"Get dressed." The woman turned her back and the Echani placed the pile of robes on the cell’s small table. "We can’t have General Sheris Darkstar defending the Wahgu mining colony in a prisoner’s jumpsuit, can we?"

"Remove my Force collar, first." The woman might twist words from Revan’s mind, but she still needed that mind—and, Revan suspected, its Force sensitivity. To help detect cloaked ships in each sector, if nothing else. "If you’re requesting my help, I’m not your prisoner."

"You had but to ask." Vima raised her hand and the infernal thing fell off. The Force rushed back, sweet as a mother’s song.

Red.

Malak. Help me, she will try to influence my mind—

I have been. We could just kill her. Now. A Sith Lord’s thought. Obvious. Blunt. Bludgeoning. Sometimes Revan had been able to forget what her husband had become.

She’s stronger than she looks.
So are you, with me.

"You have the most curious aura, of late...." Vima raised one of Atris's eyebrows. "But it is not always with you."

"Not as strange as yours." The woman pulsed with power. Vima had been strong, but Atris had not. Not like this. Revan frowned. "Shall we exchange secrets?"

"Not yet. Knowledge needs to be earned," the other woman said prissily. Rather more like Atris than Vima.

Xxx

The complement of armored guards in Senate regalia that came to escort Revan and Atris to the hangar bay to meet the Fragment might have been a compliment, under normal circumstances. But Revan thought their real reason for providing escort was the implied threat. High Admiral Rensha wanted Revan—and the woman Rensha thought was Master Atris—to know she had Senate backing for whatever she decided to do—with Revan, or the Fragment, or their allies.

The threat, Revan mused, might have been more effective if there was still a ruling House on Coruscant with any teeth, or if High Admiral Rensha was still in command of her own fleet—or her own mind.

From Atris’s smug expression, Vima held a similar opinion about this posturing pomp.

As they walked, the audex clipped to Revan's ear displayed a real-time projection of the battle for the Byss System in Ezzek's shorthand: the Republic were yellow X's, the Sleepers blue boxes, the Mandalorians red circles and the Sith were green crosses. Revan watched the wave of blue splinter and shatter with bitter satisfaction. Tallies of numbers streamed past her left eye, covered by a data-lens. The Sleeper's casualty reports. A rout.

Revan felt a smile tug at her mouth and quickened her steps down the corridor, forcing the others to speed up as well. Victory. For now.

Thanks to the Fragment, Sheris whispered. We should ask her how she hides herself so easily. And we should thank her—we should say the words. It is always nice to be appreciated.

I will. It was also thanks to the Fragment the Sleepers had woken in the first place. If I had truly died above Deralia, would the Sleepers have wakened then?

I don't know. They could have awakened when I arranged for your assassination just as easily. Sheris’s voice held an amusement that Revan recognized.

I thought of arranging for yours, too. The japes were a fragile peace between them. ‘Cracked from the same ice,’ was the Hothan expression for their commonality of humor.

Red? Malak's intrusion was perhaps meant as a further comfort, but he had chosen the wrong time.

How is our son, Mal?

He's fine. A brief hesitation. Perfectly fine.

She knew he was lying but the truth would not change her course.

I tried to warn Revan, he added. About who Master Atris really is. I tried to direct her to choose another ship in the fleet to land upon—

She did not listen. Revan understood that.

I do not know if she heard. She flickers in and out of the Force. I think she heard. She is harder to reach than you are. She doesn't want me with her—

I do not want you with her. Sheris’s voice, still holding onto the innocence of envy.

"General Sheris, the remaining hostiles seem to be on the run." Rew Ekkumi glanced back at them, looking as if she resented being Rensha's mouthpiece.

Revan wondered if the woman would ever know how close she had come to dying. But Vima had let her live. And, more curiously, let her maintain her enmity for Revan. Why? It would have been so easy to make her loyal.

"The Corellia System will be next, then. Issue the orders to our allies now. Tell C"Tannis too, if he's conscious." Revan directed their own forces with a few eye-blinks, but her links did not extend to the Man'doa or Imperials, or to C"Tannis, still bound in the jar-sukth, the meditation chamber whose walls of Sith stone amplified Vima's power.

"Are you sure the Sleeper survivors will go to Corellia?" Vima's amusement was plain.

"Three moons and a planet gives them a great deal of cover… fairly sure, yes."

"You were sure about Malastare, yesterday."

"We have the routes mapped for both, so does it matter?" Revan bit back her irritation. "If not Corellia, than Malastare."

Give or take nine billion lives, Sheris whispered. Yes. It matters.

Malastare is almost uninhabited. Corellia will not fall. I will not let it.

The exhaust fans whipped a vaguely sulphurous wind through the air of the hangar deck. The infamous Ebon Hawk was still painted blue, with fresh scores from a firefight smoldering along its sides. Rensha had stationed her usual honor guard, the snipers in the scaffolding above.

The landing ramp descended, and with it, the sound of voices.

"I said to stay on the ship!"

A Wookiee's yelp, objecting. Another Wookiee telling the first to respect his life mate's command. The first Wookiee, objecting and saying the other was his life mate now, not the Human—

And then Fragment appeared, none the worse for her carbonite freeze, still wearing the same ragged clothing. She'd rolled the jacket's sleeves up as far as her elbows. An ugly scratch marred one arm—the left—the same one Revan remembered injuring in the duel with Lord Blais so long ago.

The Fragment’s gaze seemed to center on Revan immediately. Her voice rang across the distance between them. "They don't trust you with a lightsaber, General Sheris? Seems silly. They trust you with a war."

Revan could not think of a clever response. The Fragment had a saber herself, double-bladed hilt hung from her belt, as well as a blaster at her hip. Her eyes were alert and clear. Her topknot bounced.

And there was no trace of the Force around her at all.

"Is this the real one?" Rensha hissed. To Master Atris.

"She has the uncouth manner." Vima sniffed. "But I sense no Force, so how can we be sure?"

“Shoot her,” Revan suggested dryly, somewhat heartened by Sheris’s snigger inside her head. “Although she might take it badly.”

“Decorum, my padawan,” Atris tone was rather frosty—but it was Vima’s expression looking at her sideways. In that moment, Revan remembered the irreverent Jedi Master she had once admired.

To Revan’s astonishment, a second top-knotted woman appeared on the ramp. That Revan was traveling in the Ebon Hawk had been a surprise, but it made logical sense. The Wookiee Zaalbar would have taken possession of the Hawk when Carth Onasi took command of the Imperial Fleet. But Revan hadn’t expected Polla Organa to eschew the safety Revan had bought for her to play pilot for a woman she called ‘the Butcher.’

You were supposed to be safe, Polla Organa. The thought came with futile regret. Revan had learned long ago that you couldn't save everyone.

Or sometimes, anyone.

“Hey!” Polla called out blithely. “Darth Bossypants! Who are your friends?” Behind her lurked a slightly stooped figure of a man. Revan squinted and recognized Jasp Organa, Polla Organa’s father. The confluence of events that had led to the Fragment assembling this group of sentients boggled the imagination.

"That's Master Atris over there, scowling," the Fragment—or her facsimile—replied, before Revan could. She had lowered her voice, although of course, in the Force it would make no difference—as surely the woman knew. "She's never liked me."

Polla Organa sniffed. "Then I don't like her either."

A flock of Wookiees surrounded them. One still a cub. One was Zaalbar.

Revan adjusted the odds of the Fragment actually being the Fragment and not the shapeshifter or Yuthura Ban in a holomask, upward. Not that she had much doubt before. No, the Fragment was exactly the kind of fool who would ignore two fleets of loyal allies and come to her own doom with a Wookiee pack and a two registered smugglers.

“The Hawk needs repairs,” the Fragment called out, still staring at Revan as if the rest of her entourage didn’t exist. “Shields are down to almost nothing. I can’t send them back out in that. Not until it’s safe.”

At that moment, shipwides chimed. The blast doors abruptly lowered, trapping the Hawk inside. The engines beneath their feet purred with the tell-tale hum of proton engines, shifting to prepare for hyperspace.

"Wait, what?" The indignant squawk was pure Fragment. “That didn’t mean trap us here! Jasp just needs a few spare parts!”

Revan felt her mouth twitch. "Corellia, Fragment. It will be the next target. We can’t wait for your ship repairs. We're going there now."

"You'd better let us go when we get there—" Polla Organa warned.

"As soon as it is safe—"

The Fragment interrupted. "No. They're not going to Corellia. The Sleepers are running to Malastare. Uninhabited rock on the other side of the Rim. And they keep saying it's too late." The Fragment advanced, a hand casually hooked in her belt-loops. The others started to follow, but she held her hand up and they stopped—except for the Deralian—who Revan already knew had no sense. "Tenebrae still wanted me to go into the tomb, but they said it was 'too late.'" Revan took a deep breath. "Is it?"

"You hear the Sleepers?" Vima interrupted. "In your mind? Now?"

"I see them. When I see the Force, I see them. Where they've been. Where they'll go. I feel them." The Fragment was not a good actor. Her disdain for Atris was plain in every word, plain as the darkness in her voice.

"And their routes, in hyperspace—" the idea seemed to excite their former master. "You see those too. As the Emperor does?"

"Yes. All of it." The Fragment looked at Revan again. "They want to destroy everything, but me most of all. More now than before, even. Because I can stop them."

Polla Organa interrupted, coming up behind the other woman. "By doing your hide-in-the-Force thing?"

"Hide in the Force, come out in the Force, hide again… it's how I led them here." The Fragment’s head turned. "I said wait in the ship…?"

“Can't, sis. Whole place smells like Wookiees in season. We’ll need a cleaning crew in addition to those shield repairs.” Polla’s hand went to her blaster and the Fragment frowned. The smuggler drew her hand back again, hooking her own fingers in her own belt.

The Force appeared around the Fragment in a visible halo, like the sun slipping out from behind a cloud.

She’s glowing. Sheris sounded surprised.

Yes. Revan was not surprised.

“The Deralian’s not wrong.” The Fragment snorted. “We do need a cleaning crew.” Despite the similarity of their poses, the Fragment possessed an assurance that was new. No smuggler's false bravado, this. This Fragment knew her own strength.

From her tone, Revan had to wonder what else she knew.

Did you tell her, Malak? Does she know about Vima? Does she know about my box on Nar? Revan had tried to signal the woman when she had sensed her presence in C’Tannis, but had received no response.

Nar? Malak sounded so distracted he could have been there himself. Half a galaxy away.

"Admiral Rensha? We need to redirect our forces." Revan reminded the Trandoshan. "Order the fleets to go to Malastare. Now.” Another sign of Vima's influence. Rensha of old would have taken initiative to command herself. This Rensha moved in a dream, like nearly everyone else on the ship.

The Telosian woman nodded woodenly

The Fragment raised an eyebrow and stepped closer. Her topknot slipped over one eye as her head tilted toward Revan's ear, voice lowering to a whisper. "Rensha listens to you? They all listen to you?"

"And to Master Atris, of course." Revan let her own eyes flicker sideways, to where their nemesis stood, arms crossed. Looking entirely too pleased with herself.

"Of course." The Fragment's lip curled. "Well. Please inform your fleet they will now listen to me."

"When you propose a stratagem that makes sense, they will.” Atris’s voice interjected. “Can you lead the Sleepers elsewhere? Anywhere?” If Vima had noticed the Fragment’s hand was now clenched around her saber hilt she gave no sign.

"Like into a sun?” The Fragment’s voice lashed out with the intensity of an Juyo riposte. "Too many to fit. But we could route them into an asteroid field."

"They'll follow you?"

"As meekly as Davad Arkan." Her tone dripped with malice. “Master Jedi.”

Atris's mouth smiled. "Good."

“Do you want to route them into an asteroid field?” The Fragment yawned. Only the tension in the lines of her stance betrayed her nerves. Her eyes met Revan’s again and Revan allowed herself a smile.

She's terrified, Sheris noted.

She's glowing, Revan replied. She has come into her power.

You were right to be frightened of it, before.

She has control. Revan had feared losing it. In the end, hate for Tenebrae had burned her own discipline away.

“No, Knight Starfire,” Vima Sunrider said with Atris’s mouth. “Not an asteroid field. I have something far more… efficient in mind."

A/N

This is the version with fewer typos….

Thanks again for the fast beta on this monster. Tried to adjust the bits you pointed out…
unsurprisingly, it all got longer. As always, your judgment is impeccable and I hope I have done it justice.

Next up… Mekel. Well, and a bunch of other stuff. I think we can all agree Vima must die. How and by whose hand… I have a few schemes vying for the honor at the moment. Will it be soon? Probably. Her death, one more plot beat, and then boom. The Sleepers win, remake the galaxy, and it’s a Harry Potter crossover fict. Sorry, punchy. I have been editing for some time. That is not how it ends... ~kos
Chapter 75 / Mad World

Xxx

Archivist's note: In an attempt to simplify this compilation of documents for the layperson, all dates are given in BBY format: Before the Battle of Yavin, which marks our Glorious Order's ultimate triumph over tyranny and the restoration of the Galactic Republic. All previous dating systems are referenced, when relevant—or known.

RRA - Revan the Redeemed Age (Sith Empire) - 3951 BBY

ASC - After the Sack of Coruscant (Galactic Republic) - 3653 BBY

AToC - After the Treaty of Coruscant (Sith Empire) - 3652 BBY

--Archivist Lanna T'so, University of Coruscant, In the First Year of our Glorious First Order of the Galactic Republic (1 FYooGFOotGR).

Xxx

--The following text is transcribed from a Senator's speech to the Public-at-Large just after the Sith attack on Coruscant.

For more than a century, the truth surrounding the identity of "Revan the Redeemer" has been obfuscated and ignored; lost in the seismic shifts of our Republic's governance. The story of Revan—by then thought to be the tale of a man named Talonis Revan who married a former Jedi, Bastila Shan—was suppressed until only whispers of the man’s name remained.

And those whispers were censured as heresy and fiction.

With the reorganization of the Senate and the reconstruction of the Jedi Order, inconvenient facts were oft discarded in the waste compactor of history. For more than a century, Jedi masters insisted that members of their Order did not marry, did not fall, and certainly did not impact the fate of trillions by exercising command over the mystical Force upon a galactic scale. The story of Talonis Revan—be he hero, savior, conqueror, or villain—faded into obscurity, lost to the mists of time.

Jedi, we were told, have never been agents of change.

The Jedi of our time are tradition-keepers, who have observed and recorded our triumphs and tragedies, but kept themselves apart. Jedi take vows, we were told. Vows of poverty and chastity. Vows of non-interference in planetary affairs. Vows of service to the Republic. More than a hundred worlds have been the beneficiaries of Jedi service: with infrastructure and agricultural maintenance. With soil, sea, and atmospheric reclamation.

But in matters of war, Jedi have done nothing. The Outlier Rebellion was fought and won without their aid. The Doshan invasion was beaten back by Republic peacekeepers, not Jedi Knights. Balmorran skies still burn as they have for four centuries, with no lightsaber-wielding warriors to bring peace.

Force-sensitives, we have been so often told, do not intervene in galactic conflicts.
We were deceived.

The ancient Sith Empire, far from being destroyed in the Machine Wars, retreated to the shadows; biding its time, strengthening its forces as we weakened our own. While our Jedi meditated and built water purification factories; Sith Lords trained for war, harnessing the Force to kill, to maim, to twist the minds of the innocent.

And when the Sith returned, our fleets--and our Jedi--were woefully unprepared.

In these dark times, with the ash from the burning Jedi Temple still thick in our throats, we must excavate the truth of the past; find the roots of our ancient enemy, and, in doing so, expose our own lies and corruption.

In that spirit, I stand before you today with a truth that my family has hidden for more than a century.

Know this: the man known as Talonis Revan never existed. Those rumors and whispers that survived in the shadows--all were lies.

A Jedi knight named Revan Starfire shattered the Sith Empire and its infinite fleet. With the aid of General Sheris Darkstar, High Admiral Aridoma Rensha, Admiral Carth Onasi, and Onasi’s Mandalorian fleet, Jedi Knight Starfire beat back the forces of darkness, giving us three centuries of prosperity.

Know this, too: Revan Starfire was a woman.

--Transcript of speech given by Senator Loriom Racharn of Coruscant. Galactic Republic, in the year 1 ASC (3653 BBY)

[NOTE: Nothing more is known of Senator Loriom, although Coruscanti aristocrats at the time of the Third Sith Invasion were typically clones, with lines extending until mutation--or assassination-ended them. Records indicate there were at least twenty Senator Lorioms of House Racharn, with most being classified as ‘male.’ Since no record of the ‘Loriom’ genome is extant, it is impossible to say whether or not the Senator’s claim of being a Revan descendant is true.]

--Archivist Lanna T’so, University of Coruscant, 1 FYooGFOotGR

XXX

The Great Hunt's officer transport elevator was large enough for at least three squadrons, but it felt crowded now, stifling in a way that had nothing to do with the number of its inhabitants. The familiar nausea that always accompanied hyperspace twisted in Revan’s guts as the capital ship came out of hyperspace. Battle alerts flashed red on the officer transport lift, but no one moved.

Time seemed frozen, as if the galaxy was holding its breath.

I’m going to kill you, Revan thought, staring at the back of Master Atris’s white-braided head. Maybe not right this second--and not in front of all these Republic people--but still, really fracking soon.

It was a delicate balance, flickering in and out of the Force--drawing the Sleepers to them and then away. Revan wiped blood from her nose for the thousandth time and noted the flow had slowed. The ache in her head had subsided too. Was that good? Her hand holding the medi-wipe still flickered with a faint Force aura. Could the others see it? The helmeted heads of their escort gave nothing away, but she noted a number of their guards had hands on their holsters, even as their eyes were fixed firmly ahead.

_Blasters would help against me?_ A bubble of hysterical laughter caught in her throat, mixing with her hyperspace-induced nausea. Revan wondered if she was about to be sick. _Nothing like bluffing your way into taking over Republic's flagship, and then puking up your guts._

Despite Polla's protests, Polla and Zaalbar and Jasp and the rest had been led to another lift with an armed escort. Short of staging an immediate coup, Revan had seen no way to help them--and no way she could afford to help--not with the screaming Sleepers at their backs. The _Hawk_ couldn’t make another run, not without help. For better or for worse, their fate was here. At least the farther away her allies were from Vima Fracking Sunrider, the safer they'd be. Stars knew what the woman had done to the crew of this ship. Rew Ekkumi was practically drooling, and High Admiral Rensha looked half-asleep, shoulders slumped at the front of their procession of guards and fallen Jedi and Fleet officers. As for Dar--

Revan looked up, only to see the woman with her face was now staring at her. She couldn’t tell what the frack her duplicate was thinking, but as she watched, Dar’Revan lifted one red eyebrow, tilting her head slightly toward Vima’s back. The message could have been, _why aren’t you killing her right now?_ Or maybe Dar just had a crick in her neck. Maybe it was a threat, and she meant, _don't you dare kill her now_. Or, maybe she meant to signal to Revan that she had Revan’s back--whichever choice she made.

_Not yet,_ Revan’s hands moved in Ryl-sign, (which of course the woman would understand), but that motion just made Dar’s other eyebrow raise. Almost imperceptibly, Dar’s head shook before turning away, back toward the door. She was a few centimeters taller than Master Atris’s body, but standing in line, their backs toward Revan, their shoulders held the same tension. One clad in white, the other gray. They could have been posters for Jedi discipline, at least until Revan noticed Dar’s flesh hand tucked behind her back, fingers clenched white-knuckled in a fist, one finger extended, in what was either the universal sign for "get fracked," or an obscure dialect of underwater Gree, where the precise angle and curve indicated a need for hastening an end.

Knowing Dar, it was probably the latter.

_I’m going to kill you soon,_ Revan promised Vima Sunrider. The lift they were on would lead to the bridge. Revan couldn't kill Sunrider on the bridge; she'd have to lure the woman somewhere else.

The doors of the officer's lift slid open. Vima and Dar turned, moving to the side while the others advanced. The High Admiral and her officers stepped out, still moving like sleepwalking droids.

Revan started to follow, but Vima put a hand on her wrist, stopping her. "No."

"No?" Revan's free hand tightened on her lightsaber. "Did you miss the part where I said this fleet was going to follow my orders?"

"I agreed they would, when you gave orders that were worthwhile." Master Atris's hand waved toward the High Admiral and her escort, who had paused in their exit. "You may go," she instructed and they obeyed--even Rensha. The doors slid shut again, leaving them almost alone--except for three remaining guards. All anonymous under gray helms and what Revan suspected was cortosis-lined body armor. Again, with uncanny unison, Vima and Dar stepped forward, this time moving to Revan’s side, while the silent, gray guards moved into formation around them.

_Those guards are special forces,_ that rogue part of her mind whispered. Knowledge she didn't remember acquiring, like the schematic of this ship, which now danced in her mind’s eye. _Trained Dar’s metal hand brushed against Revan’s in a gesture too precise to be accidental. "We have another fifteen levels to go," she clipped in Ancient Sith, voice a whisper in Revan’s ear. “We give commands from a secure location.”

"Why?" Blocking the Force, Revan couldn't hear the Sleepers, but she knew they were very close. “We don’t have much time. They’ll be attacking soon--”

“The fleets already have their opening salvos. My padawan sent those orders when you were still docking your ship.” Vima looked smug as their transport dropped with what remained of Revan's stomach.

"Oh, yeah?" Revan muttered, half under her breath. "Fancy. I'm still going to kill you." She wasn’t sure gutting Vima Sunrider (in the body of Master Atris) in front of innocents would be wise… but oh, she wanted to. I was so angry at Carth for killing her before. Not just because I had questions. Because I wanted to do it myself.

Her eyes caught Dar's and Revan felt her lips smile. “So, Master Jedi, Dar’s your padawan, huh?” It was a selfish pleasure, seeing the other woman's green gaze harden. "Does she do everything you say?"

"Not everything." The woman looked amused.

“We do what is necessary.” The schutta who had gotten them into this raised an eyebrow, adjusting a command headset over her ear. "Had you remained in carbonite another week, Fragment, I would have finished this war and revived you myself."

Vima chuckled. "Do you believe her, Revan?"

"No." Revan answered automatically, all of them speaking Ancient Sith now--as if their guards cared--or were capable of caring. "If beating the Awakened Ones were that easy you'd have done it by now."

"Nothing is ever easy," Dar's voice still held that infuriating note of calm. "But I've won every fight."

"Yet not the war, General Sheris." Vima Sunrider made Atris's voice crisp on the syllables. "And you never could."

Xxx

The prevalence of Force ghosts in Revan apocrypha suggests that contemporaries were inclined to believe sentient consciousness could exist after death and manifest some phantasmic display in the physical realm.

Some scholars have suggested the encounters be read as metaphor; but I am inclined to disagree. Given what we know about other fallen Jedi, (namely, Qel-Droma and Kun), isn’t it possible that Revan was also possessed by a malevolent force? My colleagues are all quick to say such a thing is impossible, but I direct your attention, again, to the inconsistencies in the [redacted].

--Excerpt from Doctor I-4 Kahn's Dissertation on the Revan Myth, RRA 102 (3554 BBY)

[Note to later scholars: although the works that Doctor Kahn refers to above were all lost in the Great Coruscanti Rethinking, Force ghosts can be found in other Jedi texts, as well as some of the "Dark Papers" smuggled into our archives a thousand years ago from the Priests of Thule. Some even say that the Mighty Luke Skywalker was haunted by ghosts, and that was the reason for his retreat from the galaxy.

--Archivist Lanna T'so, University of Coruscant.

XXX

Somewhere across the galaxy, his wife called to him, but Malak could not answer, not until this situation on Nar Shaddaa was perfectly under control.

Malak D’Reev had become one with the Force, but he was no closer to understanding sentient nature. By rights, the two Twi’lek women should have fled--or his Blade should have ended them as quickly and efficiently as the man had been trained to do. The man was an efficient death-dealer. Malak had selected the Acknahar'tah line from the ranks of enlisted defectors himself--one reason he found Blade Three so predictable and so easy to control.

Two null Twi’leki should prove no challenge at all for an assassin trained to hunt Jedi; and yet, they were still alive. What's more, by their stances, both women knew enough of combat to realize they were outmatched. And yet, the three of them posed and preened as if they were fighting a formal Coruscanti duel.

Malak’s Blade advanced, flipping the stolen vibrosword in his off hand with more flair than was required, while charging up the handle of the laser whip in his right. “You stupid girl,” he muttered to the Pink, instead of simply wrapping the whip around her sword hand--or her throat.

“Buzz off, sleemo! Leave the kid alone!” The Pink facing the Blade leveled her own weapon. Impeccable form, perhaps Mandalorian-trained, but no match for an Acknahar'tah.

From the openness of her stance the Pink still didn't understand what the coiled, blinking object Blade Three held in his hand could do, even after she'd seen it crack once already. Quite possibly she wouldn't, either--not until the laser whip's deadly filaments severed one of her skinny pink limbs, or bit deep in the tender flesh of her neck. Malak would not feel guilt. This See'raa was no innocent, and her claims to be Mission Vao, the Twi'lek that Malak had once (briefly) interrogated on the Leviathan were ludicrous. The Twi’lek was long dead. Malak had seen the weight of her execution in his mindwiped wife’s dreams, felt the pain of her loss in the thoughts of both Dustil Onasi and Mekel Jin.

Blade of Three’s laughter now was a death rattle in his chest, the expression on Atton's face pulling his features back like a skull. “You have no idea who I am, do you?”

“See if I care?" the Twi'lek raised her hand and beckoned. "You’re just a broken-down kid-stealer!"

"Oh, do you like to see?" Blade Three drawled softly. He'd edged closer to Malachor, his boots crunching on the pieces of mirror he’d shattered. “Sure. I’ll take your eyes last.”

Then do it, Malak thought tiredly. The Blade couldn’t hear him, but his latent sensitivity to the Force carried the compulsion, at least enough to reinforce the killer’s natural urges.

“No! Stop!” Malak’s son had slid off the barstool, but one of his hands still gripped it. The other held a knife. Malak had observed the Blade training Mal to use a knife (and approved), but in the panic of impending conflict, the boy seemed to have forgotten everything he had learned. Malachor’s fingers hovered dangerously close to the edge of the blade. He might cut himself. He should not have to see this.

“Careful, Malachor. Let him finish it,” Malak instructed, envisioning his own form as a glimmering blue shield, protecting his son. “Close your eyes.”

"No!" the boy snapped, shaking his head. He brandished the small knife. “Stop it! All of you! Stop it!”

To his left, the White stood poised with naught but an icepick. Her lekku flicked at the other one, making suggestions for their coordinated attack.

“Be brave, Mal.” Malak tried to counsel his son. “Atton will kill them quickly, I promise.”

The boy's voice shook. "No! No one’s killing anyone! Why can't we all be friends?"

The Pink used her sword to gesture toward Atton, before dancing back to avoid his undercut, pieces of broken mirror crunching under her feet. "Cause your friend is a sleemo murdering son of a schutta. Your mom would kill us if she knew we left you with him!"

"My mother?" Malachor froze. "Do you know where she is?"

"Sure!"

The Pink was lying. Malak tried to comfort his son. “I know where she is, Mal. When it is safe I will bring you to her. Close your eyes. This will be over soon.”

“Doesn’t matter if you know!” Wild-eyed, the boy shook his head, answering Malak out loud.
“You won’t tell me!”

See’raa’s face broke into a smile, exposing pointed teeth. "I'll tell you. I promise. Come with us and we'll comm her. Right now."

"She's lying, kid." The Blade advanced, turning his entire back toward the White, a gesture Malak found foolhardy. "You know you have to stay with me. For your own good."

The White lekku’s traced a vulgar insult.

“Did you ever meet my father?” The boy’s voice waivered.

Atton Rand froze. “What? Yeah, he… he picked me out of a brig.”

“I meant her. The Twi’lek.” Malachor gestured with his small knife. "Did you ever meet my father? Did he know you?"

The Pink snorted. “When I was Mission Vao? Yeah. Once. Asshole was on the Leviathan. He took off the restraints and I bit him. Almost broke one of my teeth on that armor of his.”

Malak had been startled enough that he’d started laughing as Mission Vao ran away. He had wanted the Twi’lek to escape. At the time, Malak had wanted to see the woman who called herself Polla Organa test her mettle against his new attack droids and Karath’s men. He had wanted to feed that flame of darkness he felt burning within mindwiped Revan; ignite it with the death of her companions, finish them off one-by-one, until her rage became an inferno to consume the galaxy--

"Oops. Guess that whole death of her companions bit kinda backfired for ya.” An ethereal voice intruded on Malak’s consciousness. Flickering behind the women of flesh, Malak saw another ghostly Twi’lek. Smaller--younger--and enveloped by the eldritch light of the Force even as he was himself. Behind her, the shadows of more ghosts appeared: robed Jedi, armored Sith. Friends and foes—so many that the mass of them became a ball of light. The light illuminated the physical world until the frozen figures of his son and the others washed out themselves, as if they were the ghosts.

His old master, his old friends, all who had fallen before him—all who had fallen because of him, all he had failed to save—stood before him like a legion of warriors, but not one had a saber drawn.

“Yes. All here.” His old master sounded almost amused. “Not your time to join us, Malak. Not yet.”

“Too stubborn for his own good,” echoed the man beside her. He was the old Padawan who had been one of Revan’s companions. In life, Malak had barely registered Jolee Bindo’s existence. “Believe Mission, kid. Let old Jaq go. Trust me, his road’s gonna be hard enough without you crawling under his skin.”

“Believe me now, loser?” The ghost-Twi’lek made a lewd gesture with her hands.

“You’re the real Mission Vao.” Being one with the Force meant he should be beyond surprise, but Malak was not.

“And you’re still an asshole.” The ghost stuck her tongue out at him.

“My father’s a ghost now.” His son’s voice shook. “I can’t always hear him. Sometimes he’s too far away—but he’s not gonna let you hurt me. Or hurt Atton!”

“Sometimes he’s too busy being an asshole to protect anyone.” The ghost of Mission Vao made a pose of leaning against the bar and yawning.

“Who’re you talking about?” The Blade called himself Atton now. Malak could remember his military record, but he had forgotten the man’s original name. “Your father? Darth Malak? You frackin’ kidding me?”

“Tell your son and that loser you’re not kidding.” The sepulcral whisper from the Twi’lek was an eerie echo of the cadence the two sisters affected. “Big Bad Blade of Three has to do what you say? Because if he hurts my twins, I swear I’ll haunt you forever, chuba-face!”

“Yes.” Malak imagined himself whispering the word in his son’s ear, wrapping a wall of shielding around him. “The Twi’lek is correct, Malachor. Mission Vao bit me.”

“My father says that’s right. Mission Vao bit him. Okay, then. Stand down,” his son barked. With his voice still high, he sounded uncannily like Red. “All of you. Stand down! I order it!”

The Pink frowned, gesturing to Atton. "Him first."

The White flicked a lekku at her sister. "Kid might be nuts. Talking to thin air.

Worry about that later, the Pink signaled back.

The Blade made a noise in his throat, another death rattle of a laugh, but his blade lowered. He took a cautious step back, then deactivated it. The blade clicked, folding up like a fan until it was small enough to fit in his pocket. “Hey,” he said, grinning. “S’all good, little man.”

“Don’t kill them, Blade Three,” Malak reinforced the command with the Force. “For now.”

Atton Rand couldn’t hear his words, perhaps, but the man still blanched, sweat breaking out on his “Cold in here,” he muttered. “Do whatever you want, little lord. You want the bints alive? It’s all… s’all good. S’all… all good.”

The bodyguard looks ill, the White signaled the Pink.

Get rid of him later, her sister signalled back.

"How did you get to be Mission Vao?" Malachor asked the Pink. "Is it like… are you a ghost?"

"Ghost? Don’t be silly! Used a personality overlay." The Pink sheathed her own blade at her belt and hopped on the bar. "See, the Mission who was us recorded her memories on a holocron, and then Revan put those memories into the Kashyyyk computer… and the computer made a copy for the T3, and then our Creator made me from the computer original! Made us, I mean." She gestured at the White. "We're both Mission Vao."

Mostly, the White qualified.

“Creator?” Malak asked the ghost.

“Now that guy was an asshole,” the Twi'lek ghost giggled.

“T'chrrrrnak’tahk'leänjsëwrrrrnak'tahk'leänjsëw. He took over Nico’s body. Hey, you studied Sith stuff, right? Ever hear of him?”

“No.” The Sith Emperor had had many names, but that wasn’t one of them. It sounded Rakatan. No doubt Red would know.

"Atton?" Malachor took a step forward. "You're bleeding. Are you all right?"

"Get the hell away from me!" The man’s eyes were wild, darting through the thin air, blinking at nothing.

"He is lost in darkness," Jopheena’s image had vanished but her voice seemed to come from the light behind the Twi’lek child. "Set him free, Malak."

“I can’t. I need him to protect my son.”

“Do you remember the story of the kicked kath?” His master’s form was indistinct, part of a glowing ball of light but her voice echoed with a clarity that Malak could not ignore. "Bonds built on fear and pain will always snap."

Malachor took two steps forward as if he would follow the man, even now. "Atton?"

“You’re proposing I leave him with two copies of a Twi’lek child my wife killed, Master Jopheena?”

“Look in their hearts,” her voice murmured. "What do you see?"

Unlike the original Mission Vao, the twins were nulls. Some Jedi found nulls easier to read. Malak had never been one of them. But the original Mission Vao’s heart lay open to his sight, now. Her ghostly form radiated conviction.

“I see a bond of loyalty, Master.”

“Loyalty is better than fear. It can be reciprocated. Eternally.” Her chuckle was soft. "As I told you long ago. Trust them, Malak. For your own loyalty to me."
She had told him. And he had listened.

“Go, Blade Three.” Malak made himself a shield between his son and the world. He felt the fragile strands of Force he’d extended around the assassin retreat, returning to himself.

Somewhere, there was a sound, like bells.

"See you in hell, kid,” the man whispered hoarsely, then turned and ran out of the darkened cantina, as if a pack of vornskr were at his heels.

"Atton?” His son’s lip trembled and he took two steps forward as if to follow. "Wait! He was hurt! You guys hurt him!”

“No, Mal. He was already broken.” Malak still wasn’t sure about the Twi’leks, but the Blade had outlasted his usefulness. Mission Vao had possessed the heart of a warrior. Malachor might not stay with these twins, but they seemed like asequate guardians for the time being. They were nulls, which would make it more difficult for him to influence their minds, but not impossible--

"You try and frack with my twins’ minds, I swear I’ll follow you singing fizzpop jingles from now to eternity, buster!” Mission Vao’s apparition glared down at him.  “You heard Jolee before! That Atton asshole has his own destiny! And Jopheena told you! My twins won’t hurt him!”

“I just want my son to be safe.” Malak’s body was an illusion, speaking to a ball of intangible light, to the shadow of a Twi’lek child. He had faced madness, betrayal, Force possession. Malak should not be surprised by anything--and yet he was.

“Trust us.” Jopheena’s voice again--from the light--amused. “You were always too cautious, Malak.”

“How do you know the Blade's fate if I do not, Master?” Master Jopheena was a part of the Force, as was he. Malak should see the future as surely as they did, as surely as a priest of Thule--

“Those losers? Hah!” The Twi’lek’s ghost sniffed. “Priests get most of it wrong. Just like you.”

“Attachment blinds you. You are still tied your son. And to her.” Jopheena’s voice was kind, like Malak was still a fifteen-year-old boy too small for his frame.

“I don’t know how to be free.” Even in death, Malak had clung to those last precious, agonizing seconds; the ragged wreck of his body; the sound of her breath above him, fast and sharp; the smell of blood and effluence on his skin. Her blood had been there too, mixed with his. The dark energy of Revan’s power had enveloped him, draining his life away as he begged her to save him--

“Not your time, yet, Malak.” Vrook’s gruff voice joined the others. “You’ll know when it is.”

“You’re too busy looking at the damn trees to see the wroshyr forest,” Jolee Bindo’s voice added. “But maybe looking at the trees is where you need to be. Forest can take care of itself, but those damn trees might grow any old way; and some busybody with an axe might come and chop ‘em down tomorrow and then where’d we be? With no forest--”

“Hush, love,” Jopheena laughed. “My padawan is precisely where he needs to be.”

Beneath the warmth of their light Malak watched as the white Twi’lek approached his son. The Pink stood back, one careful eye on the door as Malachor hesitantly took the White’s hand.

"My twin suns are mostly not evil," the Twi’lek ghost assured him. "Mostly. Don't take this the wrong way, but your standards ain’t that high. Least See’ra and Tee’raa won’t offer him glitterstim and booze like your dirtbag assassin."

"Malachor still has me to protect him," Malak warned them all. "If your Twi’lek copies try anything--"

Mission Vao twitched an insubstantial lekku. "Sure! I know! He has you. For now."

XXX

Neely Ahto was a Senate attaché for House Racharn during the Machine Wars, right before the Jedi Reconstruction.

An attaché is someone who is attached to a very important person to do all the tasks that they are too busy to do. Like a slave, but with much, much more power and much less responsibility. If you work very hard at your studies, some of you rotworms might become attachés. Maybe. More of you will just become rotworm food.

Lady Neely learned that she had the Force the day that she rescued one hundred and five hundred crying babies from a burning building in the Coruscanti Underground. After the Machine Wars, she hunted down some Jedi to help train her gifts. And so, Master Neely Ahto became a founding member of the New Jedi Order.

But what very few of her contemporaries knew was that she had once been a captive of the evil Sith Empire....

--Jedi of the Old Republic, an Imperial Child's Holobook of Bedtime Stories, c. 1392 RRA (2512 BBY).

[NOTE: Holobooks such as this one were common didactic tools for the Sith indoctrination of the young on colony planets during the Redeemed Age. What is curious in this text is that the tale of a famous Republic Jedi is portrayed in such a positive light. Some scholars have suggested this might be political satire.]

--compiled by Archivist Lanna T’so, University of Coruscant.

XXX

Inse Blais surveyed the squalling brood the Devonian had laid out on a waterproof sheet on the floor. Two Humans. Three Twi'leks. One thing with a tail and big eyes that reminded her of the manka. "Is this all?"

"You wanted young ones, Lady Ahto." The Devonian sighed. "And Force potential. Not that easy to find these days. Parents tend to get attached."

"I asked you for twenty young ones." Inse reached out with the Force to snap the man's impudent neck, only to freeze as she heard the Emperor's tell-tale shuffle approaching. Her Lord Valkorion (as he insisted on calling himself now) could be quite squeamish about making a mess and her own patience was at an end.

“Oh, ho,” her idiot master actually giggled. The body he wore today was the Twi’lek’s; she preferred dealing with it to the Selkath, Vivek, because his skin was less slimy and he didn’t make that horrid, throat-clearing gurgle every time he (or... she, as the Selkath was female), cleared his--her--throat.
“I’ll just be going,” the Devonian began.

Inse nodded. “You will. You owe us fourteen more infants,” she snapped, infusing the Force into her words. “Get them today.”

“Yes.” What little of the man’s mind that remained answered her as he staggered away.

His Luminance advanced, eying the babes on the floor. “Light the incense. You’ve done well, Lady Blais.”

Have I? Surely it could not be an attack of regret that plagued Inse, now. The baby with big eyes whimpered. And as she watched, his Luminance began to glow---

Inse Blais snapped her fingers and the bowls of drugged tinder lit as she reached for her rebreathing mask. The smell was revolting, the drugged incense compounded in a Zistot temple and exported here at a fantastical expense. “I’ll be at the bar,” Inse told the Emperor, who, by the looks of him, had already forgotten her existence.

She wanted to leave the room, but she also wanted to see how the conversion ritual was done….

XXX

Revan’s true story is the subject of debate from scholars across the galaxy--much like the fates of General Bastila Shan and General Sheris Darkstar. Yes. I said, General Sheris Darkstar. She was trained in the Force as well. But more than that.

She was Revan Starfire's identical twin sister.

Taught by Revan herself, Darkstar (sometimes known as Loran) was a capable commander, but it was not until the Hero of the Star Forge joined the fight against the Machine Ships that the glorious Republic's victory became a foregone conclusion.

Why did Revan come so late to the fray? Why did she leave the first weeks of the fight to Darkstar?

Mandalorian logs from the time hint at some illness or infirmity--but provide no detail. A contemporary biography transcribed by Sir Phylus Blais of Zeltros mentions Revan transporting herself from Dromund Kaas to battle aboard the near-mythical Corellian disc ship, Ebon Hawk. Blais brags for some time about his own prowess as a pilot and a lover to all sentients aboard… but neglects to say why Revan was not in the Malastare System already.

Sir Phylus Blais is, of course, an unreliable narrator.*

Recent scholars who attempted to interview some of the Wookiee witnesses to Revan’s arrival in the Malastare System have been rebuffed. Zaalbar of the Eiweorr branch, perhaps the last notable observer of the Machine War's end, has refused interviews for more than two centuries. And in our own times, the world of Kashyyyk has once again been closed to all but Branch-sanctioned traffic, making further attempts to contact the reticent Wookiee nigh-impossible.

As scholars, we hypothesize based on the newly-found evidence that we possess: recordings of Revan Starfire's speeches, (the first and seventh in conjunction with General Loran--thus discounting any identity confusion); extra-topographical arrays of the battles that survived; although, as Doctor Locantis from the University of Dagary Minor has pointed out, the most complete recordings are from Imperial sources, and possibly doctored); and the Republic's casualty graphs, whose numbers stop at Malastare, halting their previous exponential trajectory.
All of this evidence, as well as eyewitness debriefings conducted by the Strategic Information Services, point to Malastare as the sea-change. The War’s paradigm shift. And to Revan herself as the catalyst for victory--

(*One hundred years ago, Professor Knook-ta Giir from the University of Alderaan found ample evidence that Sir Blais did not, as he claimed, influence the Senate vote to grant Zeltros full status in the Republic, nor did he single-handedly slay the krayt dragon of Kroi on Tatooine and rescue the Twi’lek Princess Tee’raa it held captive. Contemporary scrolls from Zeltros additionally suggest the legend of a Blais harem on that planet is—at best—a gross exaggeration of the truth. Only one marriage certificate in the name of Phylus Blais has ever been found: and, as in the style of the time, his consort chose anonymity… but the Blais lineage is a long and tangled skein, worthy of its own lecture.)

Excerpt from "An Historian’s Introduction to the Machine Wars: Lecture by Kree Usam Racharn for the Revan: Fact or Fiction Symposium, SHWL," University of Coruscant Press. 3653 BBY

[Note: The current denizens of Kashyyyk are hardly more hospitable to inquiries regarding Jedi legend, especially since the unfortunate events following their failed rebellion, bravely quashed by those noble descendants of Mand’alor, the Clone Troopers of Emperor Palpatine’s reign.]

--Compiled by Archivist Lanna T’so.

XxX

The lift dropped faster. Revan dabbed at her nose again and shoved the wipe back in her pocket.

“Why do you call them the Awakened Ones?” Vima’s tone was too casual for the question not to have some importance.

“It’s what they call themselves.”

“You made some claim before you could hear them.” Dar looked interested. "Do they speak directly to one another? And to you?"

“Yes. When I’m not blocking the Force."

"We call them the Sleepers. And if you still held the Infinite Fleet, padawan, I would have no doubt of our victory," Vima’s tone to Dar was chiding, like she was correcting a child. "But that was another resource you squandered."

I could kill her, Revan repeated to herself. Almost a soothing mantra, beating back her growing unease as the lift descended. What’s more, I can kill her any time. I don’t have to do it yet. “The Awakened Ones aren’t infinite. The more of them we kill the more desperate the ones that remain become."

"Do you know how many are left?" Dar’s eyes flickered, meeting hers.

"Yes. They hold back more with each fight, keeping reserves to hide their numbers. They try to jump before they’re destroyed, and they are self-repairing...." Even now, blocked from the Force, Revan could feel them beating down on her. The heat of a sun, bearing down upon a fragile shield. "Four hundred and two capital-sized warships. A few thousand fighters—you’ve taken out most of their light artillery—but the main ships try not to risk themselves—and those small fighters they can replace—if they capture another shipyard—"

"Four hundred and two." Dar’s voice faltered. "That’s more than I thought."
“Another thing you were wrong about.” Revan laughed. Not so much of a taunt as a distraction. "Just like freezing me in carbonite didn't fracking stop them in the first place."

Their eyes locked. "But Master Atris was wrong as well.” The words were soft, but the Force carried them. A faint smile crossed Dar’s lips. "You know, I had her convinced you were dead, Fragment."

To Revan’s left, the white-haired woman who was not Atris gave a sniff. "I expected some subterfuge. And I was not entirely convinced, even when my padawan was convincing. You were both trained to seize an advantage…”

Dar’s eyes blinked. "When we have one," she said, pointedly.

Again, Revan got it. But I can kill Vima any time I want. I don’t have to do it now, I can kill her any time I want. A soothing mantra.

Vima continued, smiling. “Of course, seizing an advantage with a fleet is quite different than using a smuggler’s low cunning to fool petty port authorities.”

“It was a smuggler’s low cunning that toppled Tenebrae’s empire.” Dar paused. “Master.” There was no mistaking the hate in her voice now; the slight tremor of emotion overriding her training.

“Not this smuggler, I think.” Vima sniffed. “The real Deralian spread your plague. Perhaps I should seek her counsel on this war.”

“Right,” Revan drawled. “Wasn’t me. I was too busy dropping Davad into that sun. But you need my low cunning now.”

“We need your gifts,” Vima corrected. If the Davad remark had bothered her, she was hiding it. “I may have made mistakes.” The woman in Atris’s body pronounced her words crisply. “But none due to ignorance. I will not let either of you fail for the want of knowledge. Revan, you claimed Malastare was an 'uninhabited rock, before.' That is false. Malastre is inhabited by sentients who call their race the Dug. A primitive people… but with great potential. Let us hope we are in time to save them.”

Revan bit back the snarl she felt forming in her throat. “Oh? I wasn't aware you cared about saving anyone.”

“Then you are more of a fool than expected.” Atris’s eyes were a pale blue, almost gray. Atris couldn’t be more than a decade older than Revan, but Vima’s possession of her body weighed it down. The old woman that Revan had met on Medriaas had seemed younger than her appearance. This woman seemed much older than Atris had been. “All sentients want to live. With our gifts we must perform the calculus of benefit versus harm in determining who must survive. It is a great pity if your implanted persona lacks the wit to understand why some can never be saved and others must be, but your copy and I are here to advise you.”

Oh, yeah? You’re not if I kill you--and I can kill you whenever I want to--

Dar coughed, staring at Revan pointedly as if the woman knew what she was thinking. “The Dug were one of the Rakatan engine’s less successful experiments. Too easily manipulated by predators.”

“All the more reason for them to require our aid. You remember, padawan, when we visited the Dug on Malastare?” Atris’s head turned toward Dar. Her smile practically glittered.
None of us give a frack about the Dug. Revan felt her own eyes roll. "So... the Rakata made them?"

"Yes." Dar's mouth twitched. "The Infinite Empire made the Dug and the Besalisk, both. As well as the Wookiees and the Trandoshans. Twileks. And of course, the Sith."

"The slave races," Vima intoned. "Did they make us, too? Do pawns inevitably rise up to surpass their masters, or are some too feeble for the attempt?"

"Rakatan priests told me we were all slave races." Dar shot Revan another loaded glare. "Then I killed them."

"Cut the chase," Revan snapped. I get it. But I could kill her right now. Whenever I want.

The doors slid open, and Dar stepped through them, speaking without turning around, forcing them all to follow. Neatly, she pivoted on her feet, walking backwards, keeping her eyes fixed on Revan's as she walked. "The Infinite Emperor experimented extensively with sentient lifeforms. The Dug were their creation. Dug physiognomy resembles the Besalisk without their strength or range of mobility... but the Dug possess knowledge *Besa*li*sk*s lack."

"I get it," Revan snapped. You're saying I need you, Dar. I know that. You're right.

Vima smiled in Dar's direction, and Revan had an oddly familiar sense, that she'd seen the woman work this way before, as if she was trying to set one of them against the other, make them vie for her attention. It should have made Revan feel angry again, and yet somehow, she only felt numb. I can kill her later. Later, I will kill her.

A soft thought, comforting. She felt strangely relaxed.

"Of course, Master." Dar's lips thinned. "I was so grateful that you had arranged for me to have a mission with Malak at last--after the Council had kept us away from each other for so long." She pronounced their dead husband's name with a heavy emphasis that a deaf sent could have noticed, but Vima didn't react, except to chuckle.

"Mere months, although I suppose at that age to you both it seemed longer, after Onderon--"

"Malak wanted me to speak with him before I heard the Dug shaman's attempt at arbitration. He had the training for diplomacy and I did not." Those green eyes looked down for a millisecond before fixing on Revan's again. Malak knew what I did not. It wasn't purely... about our affection. I listened to Malak because he had knowledge I required.

There was a long pause. Revan heard herself scoff. "Frack Malak."

She wasn't an idiot. She'd caught Dar's emphasis on their former husband's name. They both heard his ghost. Whatever the other woman didn't want Vima to hear, she trusted Darth Malak's ghost to impart.

But to hear him, Revan would have to let the Force back in, and now wasn't the fracking time.

Also... frack Malak. Revan did not trust him. She held the Force back by the force of her will, but that was becoming harder to do, even without thinking that Malak was in it somewhere, no doubt whispering in Dar's ear right now... the two of them plotting, plotting against her--they would dare plot against her? They would lure her into some trap together--contain her power--

Revan blinked. What am I thinking? Her eyes met Dar’s again.
The other woman’s face was as blank as the wall plates behind her.

“Knight D’Reev was a fool,” Vima said flatly. “If he had not been the Emperor’s pawn first, Revan, he would have been yours.”

"Maybe you underestimated him," Revan shot back.

Dar’s head shook again, again nearly imperceptibly. Her metal hand reached to adjust the ear-piece she was wearing. "Leaving Malak aside, the Dug were too easily influenced." The trace in the air of the Ryl-sign for warning could have been Revan’s imagination; the gesture was so close to just adjusting her receiver. Warning. There it was again.

Again Revan got it. Dar thinks Vima's fricking with my mind--or trying to. And it was true, being blind to the Force made Revan vulnerable. In that moment, she saw a path before them: her saber igniting, cutting their old master down in a heartbeat; the guards a moment after. And then everyone on the ship awakening as if from a fable’s ensorcelled spell--finally free of that schutta--

Dar raised her eyebrow again. It could have been the go-ahead. Or, it could have been her thinking, and then what? We’d have a ship full of hostile allies and the Sleeper fleet outside trying to murder us all--

Or it could have been Revan's own hubris, assuming she knew what Dar was thinking at all.

“Frack Malak,” Revan repeated. Like a dare. Like this was a kath and pony show.

“Such a shame you don’t remember our love.” The childish jab made Dar’s lower lip pout before she twisted her mouth into a smile. “Malak was extraordinary.”

“Oh, yeah? He was extraordinarily hard to kill.” Revan shrugged. “But I managed.”

“You had the stronger master, Revan.” Vima’s smile seemed fixed. "Master Kae's experience with primitive cultures far outstripped Jopheena's or Vrook--"

“You mean your experience,” Revan interrupted her. “Unless your guards speak Ancient Sith, I think we can cut the banthacrap. Get the frack out of my head.”

“Your mind is sealed to me.” Vima sounded injured--of course an act.

“But you’re… you’re doing something.” Until that instant, she hadn’t been entirely sure. But this artificial calm, even the whispers about killing the woman. They weren’t hers.

I can kill her at any time. Comforting to think so.

A comforting lie.

"I just wanted to see Malak." Dar's head turned back, facing the lift doors, which took that moment to open, nearly as if she’d commanded them. "He was my ally, as you never were, Master."

Revan's mouth felt dry. The Force pricked at the edge of her shields. "Sometimes I wish I could see him again, too," she ventured. "But right now, I can't, can I?"

Vima put a hand on her arm, drawing Revan even closer. "You're going to like what I've done with the Emperor," she whispered, soft in Revan's ear. "And I am curious to see what you could do with him yourself."

"Are you?" She had met this same woman in the Jedi Temple and on Nathema, just in a different
A smug smile pulled at Master Atris's mouth. "It's rather late for such extremes, don't you think?"
Her voice gentled. "No one has to die, now, Revan."

XXX

After Katarr and the destruction of the Jedi Council, Master Atris of the Echani mounted a campaign to search for 'the Last Jedi,' a former Knight known as Meetra Surik.

Knight Surik was, of course, Master Atris's former padawan, sent into exile for her alleged betrayal of the Republic during the Mandalorian Wars. Her name is familiar to all scholars of Jedi lore.

According to contemporary news archives, Master Atris gave several speeches alluding to Meetra Surik being the Jedi savior of the galaxy. Some of those recordings still survive. They show an impassioned woman of middle age and Echani extraction; erudite and sincere.

Revan's name is only mentioned in passing, and then with disdain.

How ironic, then, in the last days of the Machine War, that it was Revan Starfire herself who saved the Republic Fleet, and not Surik at all?

--Profiles in Courage: Great Sentients of the Old Republic. (Republished from list of banned texts), c. BBY 3621.

[Note: Some of my cohort have suggested that this document is also satire. I remain unconvinced.]

--compiled by Archivist Lanna T'so, University of Coruscant.

Xxx

Talk to her, Malak! In her mind, Revan was screaming. You said before you would speak to her!

She's hiding from the Force. It effectively seals her from me as well. Malak's voice in her mind was faint, distracted. Even now Revan felt his presence dim as Vima's power increased--as Sunrider's strength always did when they approached her Sithspawned lair. The Force-amplifying panels in the sanctum did their work all too well. Enconced in her fortress, Vima was nearly omnipotent. The Emperor had gone under her spell without as much as an eyeblink. Even the Fragment’s strength might not be enough to break the woman’s infernal Force-weaves.

Don't go! But Malak was already gone, like oxygen leaving a room. The Fragment might not have known he was there at all--that he'd been nearly visible--as both he and Revan tried to capture the Fragment’s attention.

At least Malachor is safe. Malak had told Revan that much--with a peculiar emphasis--although he had neglected to say more. “Our son is safe,” he kept repeating. In fact, he had said it so often that Revan had become convinced that their son had not been safe quite recently, and might still be in danger again.

But she could not help him now.

"You okay?" The Fragment put her hand on Revans’ shoulder and Revan half-turned, breathing deep for composure.
"Just tired. We've been fighting for weeks without much rest." Revan wiped her eyes, automatically banishing the fatigue from her steps.

"So I see." The Fragment frowned, falling into step as they walked down the corridor. "This way… it leads to the officer's hangar bay."

"Yes." Perhaps the Fragment had shown initiative and reviewed the layout of the Hunt before boarding. Or perhaps bay’s strategic position was as logical to her as it had been to Revan: well-shielded and below the engineering blast radius, with drop-chutes leading to it from the bridge thirty levels above.

"So this command center or whatever… it's in the officer's hangar bay?"

Next to the Fragment, Vima gave another low chuckle, leaving Revan to answer.

"Yes. On a ship." Again, Revan wondered why the Fragment hadn't just killed Vima when she had the chance in the lift. I cannot tell if she hears, Malak had said before--but if Vima could control the Fragment when the woman shielded herself from the Force--if she could twist the Fragment against them--

I need you, Mal! Revan’s thought was more plea than command but it made no difference. The blast doors opened and they entered the hangar's expanse. The Force seemed to press in darkly, casting shadows she knew were illusions. Her panic swelled again and Revan knew, from Vima’s sickly smile, that her own emotions were not under her own control.

Revan took a breath and found the air colder, slower, as Sunrider’s Force energies wove their subtle nets. I can kill her at any time, she thought numbly, knowing the thought was imposed to placate her. I don't have to kill her yet--I can kill her later--

"Here we are!" Vima sounded uncharacteristically smug as their party stopped in front of an unmarked corvette. She gestured to the rampway. “Would you like to go first, Revan?”

"Into your escape shuttle?" The Fragment was crisped the words, slouching as she started up the gangway, walking backwards to keep them in her sights. "Or lair? Lair seems rather appropriate. Throne room?"

"You may call it whatever you like. This is where I keep the Emperor. The extra layers of shielding around this bay keep us safe; and, if the Great Hunt is lost, the ship provides an escape."

"Always giving yourself an out." The Fragment snorted, eyeing Revan. "She did that with Weis too, you know. Left them to die when I bombed their flagship."

A profligate waste of a former ally. Weis should have been turned, not destroyed. "Sinae told me, when we were working together on Kaas. But your husband did manage to kill Vima."

Again, the Fragment didn't take the hint. "Carth could've killed her at any time. First he had to learn what she knew." The Fragment paused. "You know, I saw a recording of her talking to Dessa--the Mandalorian she put in a coma. Vima said all sorts of interesting things. Dessa had given her truth serum. Half of what she said was in Rakatan, but..." the Fragment shrugged. "Of course I understood."

"Perhaps the one who called herself Kreia left knowledge for you to find." Did Vima sound less amused now? "The door is to your right, Revan. There's a palm lock that shouldn't be a problem."

Still facing them, Revan put her hand out behind her, fumbling for the panel. "Oh, I don’t think so.
Kreia was trying to blow up my flagship with me on it."

"She sought an overly simplistic solution to our quandary. One that would only create new problems." Vima made Atris look a century old, although there was scarcely more than a decade between their ages. "You have both had time to observe that each iteration of the personality overlay develops a unique perspective--sometimes one at odds with the previous. If we could work in concert with our previous selves instead of continually being at odds...." Vima let her voice trail off. "Well. That would be something to behold. Are you going to open the door, Revan, or just stare sullenly at it?"

Just kill her already! Revan twitched her finger in the ancient Quarren handsign again; the one the Quarren had taken from their Gree captors millennia before the Infinite Empire had existed.

There was a danger that the Republic would turn against them without Vima's influence, but Rensha had a logical mind. Once freed from Vima’s influence, she would surely see what was needed to win the war. Not for the first time, Revan’s hand twitched helplessly at her empty belt, the missing saber that should have hung from her side. I would kill her myself! Her eyes looked up into Vima's smug smile. And she knows I would. She knows I am too weak to break her compulsion, and too cowardly to waste my life on a gesture of futility--

"Huh." The doors slid open. Deliberately careless, the Fragment sauntered backwards into Vima's sanctum. "You have Tenny-bro tied up in here, or--?" Her head turned. And then the Fragment gave out a startled noise. "Oh!"

"Yes," Vima murmured. "We do."

XXX

The Sith Emperor has become a romantic figure to some; an immortal, nearly mythical part of our culture. But in the war against the Awakened Ones, Lord Valkorion became far more than that.

He became a hero.

Lord Valkorion worked tirelessly across his network of bodies to disseminate information and battle plans to our allies and former enemies alike....

"The Sith Emperor in the times of Revan the Redeemer." --Ziost Publishing, undated datapad, est. 2900 BBY

--compiled by Archivist Lanna T'so, University of Coruscant.

Xxx

It should not have been a surprise to see the Toydarian bound to the chair. Revan had been in his body, had even been linked to the Sith Emperor's mind--and in it, she'd seen this room already--even if she hadn't realized it existed on a separate ship.

At the moment, the Emperor wasn't home and the avian man's eyes were a normal black, buzzing with fear. His feathers were ruffled as if he hadn't had a chance to groom himself. He looked fragile and small and pathetic. Frightened?

No. Terrified.

"Hello," Revan muttered numbly. Behind the arrays, the walls of the room gleamed, paneled in red and black stone. The stone plates were mounted on the corvette's durasteel walls. Carved symbols-
Those are ___. This is a chamber of ___. There was a gap in her mind where the knowledge should be.

The weight of Force pressed down like a tightened electro net.

"Let me go?" The Toydarian chirped. "Please! At least until he comes back. I'll be good! I promise!"

His smell took a second to reach Revan's nose and when it did she couldn't forget. The floor around the Toydarian's chair was white and slick, the feathers of his legs filthy, as if he'd been tied there for some time.

"You need to let him go. Frack! At least let him use the fresher--"

"There hasn't been time." Dar's voice. For first time, Revan noted the shadows under the other woman's eyes, her own pallor. Dar's white robes were stained with grime. "Every few hours--"

"S'been four," the Toydarian chirped. "Four days, now, master. I think."

"Four days?" Dar blinked dully, as if under a spell.

She stank, too. It wasn't just the room, Revan realized, as her duplicate brushed past her. This entire fracking ship stank like fear and sweat and worse. "We only have moments left, now." Dar tapped her ear and Revan saw the speaker clipped there, the way the other woman's eyes unfocused and blinked, issuing commands to their fleets. "Our ships are in position. Our enemy's attention has turned from the planet. You will draw them to cluster, here--"

"When I hide from the Force it stuns them," Revan nodded. "You'll have about three minutes before they wake up. They'll be pissed when they do."

"Then you'll do it again."

"Yeah, but every time I do it, they'll be closer. We'll need to jump somewhere--have a plan to jump somewhere--"

"Of course." Dar nodded. "Corellia. Our allies still have it set in their navigational arrays."

"We have a few moments, padawan." Vima sounded amused, directing her words to Dar. "Clean the bird. I will explain things to our old friend."

"I didn't realize it had been so long." Dar muttered, looking guilty. She freed the Toydarian, and lifted him to his feet. The air felt thick and heavy. Revan had a funny feeling--like she knew Dar didn't want to leave at all.

"I've been here before," she said. "Or someplace like it. Those panels… patterns on the wall… I've seen them before."

The woman's voice was amused. "I am surprised you remember. There was so little of your mind left."

"On Dantooine." Dar and the Toydarian had gone, vanishing behind a side entrance set into the wall. Revan felt a chill shake her body. "There was a… a room like this. Off the main archives."

"Yes." With a sniff, Atris walked to a corner of the room and activated a small sleeper droid. It whirred over to the stained floor and began scrubbing away at the chair. "On Dantooine you almost came back. I had these panels installed in my chambers. They amplify the Force. It gave me no pleasure to reinforce the smuggler's imprint over your own, but I had no choice. You were coming into your strength too quickly. I needed you hidden. From him."

Once, Revan would have thought Malak. But now she knew better.

"You mean from the Emperor. Tenny-Bro." What Polla calls him. A small thing, but it felt like defiance.

"Yes." Vima traced one of the patterns on the wall, a spiraling circle. “Your ‘Tennybro.’” A slight smile crossed her lips. “If you want to really annoy him, call him ‘Vitiate.’ The name his father gave. He despises it.”

He’s picked a new name now. Valkorion. "Thanks for the tip. I am going to kill you. You know that, right?"

"Do you remember what these carvings do?” Vima cocked Master Atris's head and smiled. "We found them together--long before that, on a planet the Mando’ade feared to tread."

"I know there's power here." Revan could feel it through her shields, like water bearing down on her. "I know you’re fracking with my head, and hers, and everyone else on this ship--"

“Do you?” Those pale eyes narrowed. “Then break your chains.”

“I can.” The strange lassitude in her limbs was false. The Force beat on her shields calling to her. “You know I can, and you know I can kill you.”

“That is the order of things, in the paths you and I learned to walk.” Vima walked to the command board and switched it on. The star system unfolded before them. “My padawan could not do it herself. There is far too much of Sheris in her now… but you….”

“You want me to kill you?” Maybe it was all very simple. Maybe Vima Sunrider was just insane, and all Revan had to do was kill her now. She had the lightsaber at her belt and the woman appeared unarmed.

But I can kill her at any time. I don’t have to do it yet--

“I have the means to make an end to our mutual foe. With your assistance.” The woman paused, gesturing to the walls around them. “I will even provide this ship as a gesture of good faith. I’ve dismissed my Echani guards already. Kill me, defeat the Sleeper ships, then do what you like. Will you defeat the Emperor, too? My padawan seems confident she has the means but she remains reticent with her details.” Vima glanced at the Toydarian's filthy chair. “Perhaps for the best, not sharing them here. I do what I can to cloud Vitiate's perception, but it may not be enough. He knows someone has him under their heel.” Her voice sounded amused. “I assume he thinks it is you.”

“It is,” Revan snapped. “Now.”

“Cocksure bravado from the Deralian criminal?” Vima sighed. “I had hoped for more.”

Revan stared at the walls instead of answering. Beyond her shields the amplified Force beat down like a Derran monsoon. “You’re… drawing power from somewhere,” she said at last. “The Force. This chamber isn’t just boosting the signal. It’s a conduit.”
“You are perceptive.” Vima walked to a chair set against one of the panels and sat down in it. Unlike Dar, she was immaculate. Seated, she looked like an ice empress, ascended to her throne, even if the chair she sat in was nothing more than a spacer’s rest. “Your predecessor never made that leap. Of course—she was not raised to think such a thing could be possible.”

“Raised by you,” Revan shot back. “And Dar’s not my predecessor, she’s my… she’s…” the Force seemed to weigh down more heavily, making the words in her mouth clumsy and slow. “She’s—”

“I’m back.” Somewhere outside the world battle stations rang. Dar burst through the door, dragging the Toydarian by one feathered arm. He looked marginally cleaner. Dar snapped her fingers, and the holographic command board Revan had seen in her dreams flashed to life.

"You’re late. We’re awaiting instructions," came High Admiral Rensha’s voice over the intercom. Her holographic form paced slowly, seeming to float above the image of the planet below her. “Wideband is down. Fleet’s moving into battle positions. Twenty-eight sept zed is the initial volley, in orientation toward Malastare’s sun—"

Dar looked at Revan. "Here." She held out a small, disc-shaped earpiece, twin to the one she wore. “You’ll need this to see in real time, issue commands.” Dar’s mouth quirked. “Sinae said Aemelie spoke highly of your tactical skills. I trust there is enough of me in you for that to be accurate.”

“Yes.” Their field of battle flickered into place before Revan’s eyes when she clipped the command device to her skull; ships of light between the virtual stars. The enemy fleet was demarcated by blue boxes swarming against the backdrop of a small, green world. The enemy fleet was now engaged with their vanguard—a bulwark of Mandalorian capitals and their clouds of snub-fighters, red circles like nests of flames. Revan’s mind noted the space between Carth and Canderous’s fleets, triangulated evenly. She marked the mid-point between them. The command fell from her lips. "Have the others pull back. Open a channel—"

“No.” Dar shook her head, almost casually pushing the Toydarian back into his chair, and clamping the security braces against his clawed appendages, the base of his wings. "Didn’t you hear what Rensha said? We can’t broadcast to tell them anything. Wideband’s out sector-wide—they knocked it out. We need Tenebrae." She prodded the Toydarian again, but the man just cringed, shying away. Her red eyebrow lifted. "Odd. He always comes for battles."

“Perhaps he’s too weak from your plague.” Vima sounded amused. “Or as frightened of Revan as poor C’Tannis is of you.”

“I don’t know!” the Toydarian cringed. “I don’t know where he is!”

“Fragment?” Dar looked more in her element suddenly, sketching probable attack vectors across their combat display; and Revan felt the change in air, too. From somewhere outside of her shields, Vima’s mental grip had loosened—giving them both free rein to win the war. “Can you call him? Summon him?”

“Call him? Tenny-bro?” Easily. As she had before. All she had to do was drop her shields. “I—I can. Yes—”

“He’s weakening, there are more and more silences… but we need him for this. Call him to us—you have to reach in the Force, for the stars—” Dar’s voice hesitated. “I could, once. It’s—”

It’s dangerous. It’s beautiful. And it isn’t dark at all, all those tiny little lives. “I know.” Revan felt the Force break through, enveloping her like a song. The room brightened. Vima’s mind-tricks, her Force-enhanced artifacts, all of it fell away like chaff. The map of the Malastare System was a clumsy thing, but the real planets appeared, and Revan was in them, through them, everywhere at once--and then she could--she could see--

--a Dug in a boat on Malastare, head-body basking in the sun--

--a child playing skip-jack on Dathomir.

--a pie cooling on a windowsill on Deralia.

--a pregnant Zabrak’s belly through an examination gown on Iridonia.

--the feel of water on her feathered scales on Pokra.

--the flashing lights of an Imperial command bridge--there-- there--

Vima's voice, amused, cut through the stars like a blade. "Do we truly need Vitiate, Revan?"

Revan felt her lips move to answer, even as she reached for the stars. "No. We don’t need him. Vima’s right." Her mind reached out. "We don't need the Emperor at all." And then, just like that, she was--

Xxx

Some think the Onasi court martial after the Machine Wars was a mere technicality, a trumped-up charge to make a man who had switched sides at least twice publicly account for himself before his promotion to Rear Admiral of the Republic Fleet.

That does seem possible. It is difficult to find any contemporaries condemning Carth Onasi’s actions. His return to Coruscant was promoted and broadcast on every HoloNet channel. The trial proceedings in the Coruscant Hall of Justice were disrupted by thousands of protestors for a night and day, before the Great Houses imposed an emergency executive order--even before the tribunal could announce their findings. The executive order proposed reinstating Onasi’s status as a Republic officer with two promotions in rank, as well as retroactively declaring him a Strategic Information Service operative (retired class), with the appropriate pensions for that service.

With one swoop of an auto-pen, Carth Onasi, formerly of Telos, was publicly declared to have been a double agent working for the Republic all along.

--Excerpt from "An Historian's Introduction to the Machine Wars: Lecture by Kree Usam Racharn for the Revan: Fact or Fiction Symposium, SHWL," University of Coruscant Press. 3653 BBY

[Note: I hope the mentions of Carth Onasi in my collected texts dispel any doubt that he was a fictional character.]

--compiled by Archivist Lanna T’so.

Xxx

Score! So much was still in the air, but Carth took a breath to enjoy the win, watching as the Machine Ships started to blink out, ceding yet another system to victory.

“New hyperspace point at the why yammer zed…phbbt….” the Emperor trailed off into another trail of spittle.

"Fats? You’re fading out.” Carth tried to breathe calmly. Nearly over, and for once, the good guys had won with no pain. No allied losses. He felt his face smile, staring at the non-casualty reports, with Dustil’s name safely in the green. No losses because of Revan? Seeing the Hawk-- hearing Revan on that comm… knowing she was here was one hell of a distraction… but they’d won.

Has to be you, Freckles. Carth felt a surge of optimism bubble up through the crushing exhaustion. You’re our lucky star. "Fats? You still there? Can you… uh, do you see Revan? Can you get a message across?" You owe me that much, you sadistic son of a Hutt.

With the enemy ships on the run, they’d have a few hours. Might be enough time to grab a shuttle--or to send a shuttle for her--but dammit, he couldn’t leave just his post-- “Fats!” Carth repeated, nudging the bloated thing’s foot with his boot. It had fallen silent now, head slumped, when just a moment ago it had been babbling coordinates at him like an autodidact. “Fats, wake up!”

“Carth?” Yuthura’s hand brushed his arm. “There was no time in the heat of battle to tell you before, but I-I sensed a… presence--” She reached for his other hand. It had used to make Carth uncomfortable the way Yuthura Ban kept reaching for his hands, but he had come to realize it was her way of healing--restoring as much vitality to his tired old brain as she could between fights. The toll it was taking on her was evident, however, in the way her smooth hands trembled, and her lekku sagged. “It wasn’t the Emperor in the Voice’s body, Carth. Not for that fight.”

“Yes.” The Sith priestess who had come with the ship and the monster scowled at them both from her guarded chair. After the time she’d tried to stop Dustil from waking up Fats, they’d put her in restraints during combat. Carth didn’t trust her, but she’d kept Fats from seizing three times now. “Lord Ban is right,” the woman said sullenly. Her chains clanked. “His Luminance hides his face, now--his orbit to the dark of a moon. Her light has come. That was her in the Voice’s body. The Sith’ae’rah.”

“What?” Carth looked stupidly back at the hulking thing. “You’re saying Revan can just--that wasn’t an accident before, she can just--”

"Carth!" Fats's eyes began glowing again, abruptly--its voice trebled. Higher-pitched or was that just his imagination hoping it was her? Is it good that she can just do that? Is it really possible? She can't get stuck in there--

"Fats?" Carth swallowed. “Good. Uh, you’re back. Revan-- is she--”

“It’s me, Flyboy.” The bloated thing’s lips moved. “I’m here.”

Xxx

Mandalorian gunships have changed little over the centuries. This Drexl F-9 artifact from the time of the Old Republic’s Machine Wars bears nearly all the aspects of their technology that would later become standard across most intergalactic fleets. Note the sloping dorsal fins, the two-man nav-contriols, the chassis belly deep enough to accommodate a modified hyperdrive engine--

--Auction Catalogue, Naboo Collectibles, 159 BBY

--compiled by Archivist Lanna T’so, University of Coruscant.

Xxx

They’d been fighting in the Corellia System for about ten minutes when the orders came in to jump back to fracking Malastare--just as half the enemy capital ships all blinked away, nearly in unison. Millifar muttered a curse and Mekel wondered what the frack was going on.

Unlike the Sleepers, who seemed to always jump perfectly without landing on top of each other at the points where space bottlenecked, allied fleets needed to use the hyperlanes. Mekel and Millifar sat back-to-back on their gunship waiting their turn and watching for bogeys, with her handling the thrusters as he set the coordinates the _Aleema_ was broadcasting on short-range. Lucky they were so close to the mothership. There were others farther out, milling in confusion now that their enemy was gone. A lone Imperial Stinger--officer-class by the marks on its wings--drifted close to them, obviously separated from its own pack.

Mekel frowned. "Milli, send the next round of coordinates short-range on the open channel. In Sith, not Mand'oa. Looks like we've got a straggler."

"We could just shoot it." Her armored hand reached behind her head and clumsily patted his head. Maybe it was supposed to be a nice gesture, but it made Mekel feel like her pet kath.

"No!" Lately, he'd been everyone's per kath. Milli. Mydia. And, of course, the Emperor. And And General Ordo just wanted to know what the next command was from Zepth, and Aemelie kept bugging Mekel about plans for the fracking future.

Mekel wasn't sure what the polite way was in Mandalorian to say he wasn't sure there was a future. The war had been going on for three weeks. Four? Felt like a hundred weeks. And between Milli and Myd, wasn't like he had much time to sleep. They all took stims but lately, stims didn't do much. Lately, Mekel felt... stretched out on the rack, as they used to say in Dreshdae. Like if this kept going, he'd be all used up. Between Millie and Myd... probably good Telos wasn't here too... or he'd have to skip a few shifts, get more than chafing cream from Sinae.

That thought wasn't as funny as it should have been. Him and Dustil... hadn't exactly parted on the best of terms. Not the worst, either, just--

Just nothing. It didn't matter. Mekel stared out the viewscreen at that damn ship, sighing in relief as their short-ranged beeped a successful transmission.

"Incoming!" Milli elbowed him in the back, beskar clanking on beskar. "Machine Ship! Don't fall asleep on me, Mekel Jin. We still have four hours left on our shift!"

Mekel reached for the controls, only to see their target explode, caught in the Stinger's sights. "Hey! That Stinger has a better hit rate than we do." Which was saying something. Milli was damned good at this.

"They would make a worthy foe," his girlfriend agreed. "When we finish with the Machine Ships, perhaps we will fight the Sith."

"Hah hah." Mekel rubbed his eyes. She probably wasn't joking. "Right. We're not gonna fight Admiral Onasi's fleet."

"He would be free to change sides," Millifar was serious.

Sometimes too serious.

"Right." Mekel sighed with relief when he saw that the Imperial ship had winked out, jumping into the hyperlanes.

Be a shame for His Luminance to lose such a good pilot.

Xxx

_Imperial Stingers, warbird-class, are another example of the Sith willingness to sacrifice safety for_ firepower. Relying on maneuverability over shielding, they were favored by Force-using elites of the Sith Empire--

"Fighter Design, a History." Republic Engineering Manual, Fleet Academy Press. BBY 3379

--compiled by Archivist Lanna T'so.

Xxx

"Thanks." Dustil cocked a salute at the stubby Mandalorian gunship that had given him the new route. He finished inputting it into his Stinger's navi-computer and zipped in front of them in line. "Thanks asshole. Whoever you are." He smothered a yawn, then blinked awake again hard just in time to save their Mandalorian ass.

Whoever they were had saved him out there a few minutes before, and not just from getting lost. He'd had three bogeys on his tail and they'd taken out two. Five minutes later he'd returned the favor and saved their ass by lighting up the torpedos that one of the larger Sleepers had launched up their six-hole. And now this.

"Thanks and you're fracking welcome." Dustil pulled the lever into hyperspace, letting the Force cushion him from the acceleration gees. Dear Father was probably having a fit somewhere out in the black since Dustil hadn't returned with his squad, but Yuthura was around to the old man he was alive, so he'd get over it. And maybe Dad would be distracted now that big bad Revan was back.

The Hawk had gone to the Great Hunt, though, and ever since orders had gotten more nuts and their enemy less predictable. Back above Malastare, Dustil had been setting up a run to take out one of their capitals with his squad when every bogey in the sector froze like someone had kicked their lights out. Fun while it lasted… he'd help burn five of the big ones before their enemy seemed to reboot or whatever and notice they'd been sitting k'lor'slugs, but then they'd attacked with more ferocity, instead of turning tail and running… and somehow, in the confusion, Dustil had lost the rest of Rancor Squad, which left him with Green Gunship, as he'd taken to calling the Mandie one, for lack of a better name. He'd followed Green into the Corellia System and now, apparently, they had to go back again.

Dustil closed his eyes and leaned back in his chair a little more, better to appreciate the last few minutes of sweet, restful hyperspace. Wasn't the lack of sleep bothering him--hell, three weeks of this had just been like Korriban Finals Week done three times--but for some reason, even with the teachings of his old masters, his body felt like it was having trouble keeping up. Like he was being stretched.

When he closed his eyes, the black of space blurred into a bar of clear light.

"Keep it together, Onasi," he muttered, blinking hard. The Stinger's engine started ticcing off the countdown to real-space. Standard procedure would be to land on base, but to do that he'd have to find the Captive Arm. With wideband out, they all had to rely on sensors and sense.

Dustil's Stinger emerged back in Malastare, nearly on top of a debris field. All his instruments beeped in alarm, but if there'd been more of a fight, he'd missed the party.

"See anything Oh-three?" But his astromech buddy's input said negative, whirring in the next round of instructions as his wideband crackled back on, crackling with static, and then filling with chatter as everyone else started to maneuver around before the wideband kicked out again. Dustil ignored most of it. The Force showed him what he needed to know.
"There!" His hand moved the yoke in the right direction even before the coordinates appeared on his screen. The battle lay ready and waiting for him, their enemies laid out like a bad hand of pazaak.

Chaos, except the enemy ships were frozen. Like botflies in stick-sap. This time the fight was even cleaner. So clean you couldn't even call it a real fight. Dustil and Green Gunship flew in unison, mowing through the small fighters like they were blades of grass. Boring, now that they weren't fighting back. Dustil was pretty sure he could've handled it with his eyes closed. He felt himself yawning again. Every time he blinked the stars blurred together into a line of light, but the Force kept him going--

XXX

"An astromech droid! My Empire for an Astromech droid!"

--popular song lyrics, c. RRA 78, (BBY 3874)

XXX

Oh-three beeped in alarm as his Lord and master Dustil the Wise's hand slipped from the yoke of his controls.

Following protocol, the little Droid sent out a short-range beacon and set out for the nearest and biggest vessel designated as friendly….

XXX

The Malastare Offensive was staged in two parts. What began as a typical battle with Alliance forces and the Machine Ships changed, as Revan's tactical brilliance used the hyperlanes the Machine Ships had carved against them.

The Machine Ships tried to flee but Revan's control of their exit points forced a rout.

Malastare: First Shots of a Short War, Supreme Commander Jiya Sand, Republic Navy Quarterly, Volume V, 3ARR, 3950 BBY

--compiled by Archivist Lanna T'so, University of Coruscant.

XXX

And then Revan was--

--staring at her husband, dressed as an Imperial officer. That slightly awkward slouch ajar with his admiral's bars. Yuthura Ban, dressed like a Sith, was standing facing holding both of his hands like they were about to exchange property vows. Lights flashed, painting them both in a haze of black and red.

"Carth." His name came out of a heavy mouth. The tongue felt too thick. This body felt strange. Pulse racing too fast, everything weighted, like gravity had tripled around her.

"Fats." Revan watched his lips move, those crinkles of relief at the corners of his eyes. “Good. Uh, you’re back. Revan-- is she--”

“It’s me, Flyboy. I’m here.” She had been in this body before, with Tenebrae. A part of Revan heard Dar's voice like a buzz in her skull, someplace far away, barking orders. But for a second all she could see was her husband; his tired, incredulous smile grinning back at her.

“You helped us win that,” he said. “Knew you would.”

"Yuh--yeah."

"Revan," Yuthura interrupted. "My old friend."

"Yuthura." Revan shouldn't be focusing on why her old friend was holding Carth's hands, but the eyes of the sent she was possessing couldn't look away. She tried to lift her own arms only to find them bound somehow at her sides. When her head turned to look, she couldn't see how it was done; but her shoulders were red and mottled and swollen, grotesquely large, and her neck felt heavy as if holding her head up at all was a struggle. Looking straight down only displayed a view of burgeoning flesh. "Wha… what the… fra--what am I?"

The Twi'lek finally dropped Carth's hands. "We aren't sure. The Voice’s body is at least a century old, according to its caretaker. Possibly two."

"Revan." Carth touched her shoulder tentatively, moving close enough to take up most of her view. “Where’s the Emperor?”

“I don’t know. He’s… he’s in here somewhere.” She wasn’t just with Carth. Somewhere, another part of Revan was rattling off commands to Canderous, too; and another part of her was watching a swoop match on Nar Shaddaa, stepping out of a bath on a planet with six moons, watching an honor guard raise a golden statue of a bearded man on an unmapped world, staring at a row of babies, all swaddled, half of them squalling on Coru--Coruscant--

Babies? What the frack?

And then Dar's voice raised again, louder, cutting through the rest, and then Revan was rattling off the coordinates again, imparting the strategy her husband needed to know, even as she felt the Sleeper ships swarming in another part of the galaxy, in a system teeming with life--

“Figure it out later! They’re at Corellia! Go! Now!”

Revan just knew that, even though Dar was only guessing the Sleeper’s logical destination. Automatically, Revan switched two of Dar's course commands for their opener, sending the Mand'oa gunnery squads into a tighter orbit between the Sleeper waves. Because Revan could keep their attention, the risk would be minimized--

Yes. A dark voice, amused, echoing in her skull. She was overly cautious there, but you… you see the advantage of a clear strike--

Tenebrae? The mind she'd touched before. Not the cold ice of the Rakatan computer who had called to her from its installation on Kaas; this was its decadent, fallible overlay; the man who possessed the Toydarian, the bloated pureblood whose tortured lungs wheezed in her chest even now.

Yes. And now you see.

Revan's vision splinted, scattering across the stars--

And then she was--

--Staring at a row of bundled infants in an empty cantina that smelled like antiseptic and roses.
Some were sleeping but most were wailing as a manka cat prowled along the row and a golden-eyed girl scowled on a barstool, arms crossed. "Is that it?" she asked. "Are you done, my Lord Emperor?"

Revan opened her mouth to answer--protest the impossibility of the scene--but then her mouth froze and a heavy voice invaded her mind.

Oh, my Starfire. You will learn control. His chuckle felt like a scream.

What are you doing? What the frack is this? Babies?

I do not wish to share.

And then, just like that, Revan was cast adrift again, spinning and helpless, without even the weight of a body, lost in a formless vacuum. Black, endless black. Like space, deep enough to drown in; but there in the distance a light flashed, a frail, thin thread--and then as she drew closed the line thickened, then doubled--twin lines, each one leaning toward the other and the point where they met, the apex--

Later, Revan would not be able to remember the features, or if the presence there held features at all; but she knew him in that moment; finally knew him for all that he was.

His true self.

Vitiate! You asshole--

His laughter was a wave of spite that crashed into her, made her blind.

Use my bodies for your war, my Starfire, use them as you wish, destroy our enemies. This is your purpose; but when you are done, we will have our reckoning--

Revan had been told Vitiate was weakened by the plague and the war. But this presence did not feel weak. It felt like a tidal wave, encompassing all that she was and sweeping her up within its embrace. You were fading before, you were weaker than this--

Yes. He sounded amused as his mind raked through her thoughts with the carelessness of someone shuffling a deck of cards. I was. Now I am once more the ocean in which you shall drown. Thank you for giving me the key to my deliverance--your own temporary respite--

--and then something cold and wet splashed across Revan’s face, and then something harder smashed into her skull, knocking her head back--

Revan blinked her eyes and found herself sprawled on the floor in her own body, with tracers from the holographic display above casting shadow, half-blinding her eyes. She scrambled to her feet to see Dar, cradling her flesh hand with a wounded expression. An empty bulb of water was half-crushed on the floor.

Revan wiped the water from her eyes. "You… you threw water? On me?"

"I also apologize for hitting you," the woman said formally. "But even Vima could not seem to reach your mind. We're preparing to make the jump to Corellia now. Our master claims she will tell us her plan as we prepare for the next fight."

I am the ocean--Tenny-bro said he was the ocean--Valkorion--he calls himself the ocean--
The light was too bright. Revan looked down and saw her hand glowing again. And with that realization, came the screams in mind: the Sleepers coming again--

"Hide yourself. Now!" Vima Sunrider snapped, from behind her. "Before they return and tear the Great Hunt apart."

"We are always the last to jump," Dar added woodenly.

Revan eyed her warily. If I block the Force, Vima can frack with my mind. If I don't, the Emperor can reach me--her thoughts were slippery, as if Tenny-Bro's oily fingers were stamped all over them.

"That went well." Vima added. "No casualties. Do I have to brief either of you on the details of the Corellia System?"

"No." But Corellia was a bad place to finish this--if they could finish it that quickly. There had been four hundred and two enemy capitals. Now there were three hundred and nine. In her mind’s eye, the Corellian sky bristled with them, screaming, and Revan felt her legs buckle, dimly as if from a distance and then--

--then she was calling them back, even as her voice babbled the command to their allies. Malastare was the less populated star system and they did not have fuel to burn, enough of their forces were still here, they--

"Revan? Fragment!" Something was shaking her. Her own face, staring down into hers. "What did you do?"

"Called them... back. I'm calling them--tell the rest of the fleet not to jump." Half of their forces were still here, waiting for the hyperspace lanes to clear. The other half heeded her orders--she could hear them--speak to them: hear Canderous's gravel voice; Carth’s commands, rapidfire; but then Carth’s hand closed on her red, bloated one and somewhere the babies, the babies were screaming--loud as ships themselves--

Tenebrae? Vitiate What have you done?

Found strength for an end to our chains. Cold amusement in his voice. The transferrent energy of an untethered Bezel bond! Oh, and the well is deep--do you feel it?

You mean the babies? What the frack are you doing with those babies?

Planning our future. You took so many. I had to make some provision for the next generation--

"Revan." Her own voice again. Her own face, gentler this time. A warm hand touched her face as Revan's eyes focused. "Come back. I need you here."

Revan blinked, coordinates swimming through her head. The Emperor's laughter echoed in her mind. "I--"

"You are a rash fool calling our ships back from Corellia." But Vima's insult held a note of respect. "You said before you can lead the Sleepers, Revan? Will they follow you through hyperlanes? Across multiple jumps?"

"I got here with them, didn't I?" She imbued her words with false confidence. The difference between coordinating the Hawk and several hundred warships was like the difference between going to Derra City on her hessi and riding the hyperspace lanes to Coronet City on Corellia on Polla's starship. "I can keep them following us... but I can't keep them from getting there first."

Vima smiled and opened another holoscreen. A map of the galaxy sprung into being. "Then bring them to this system." She marked the jump points with her finger, leaving a tracer of green connecting the dots. "Send half of the fleet ahead of the Hunt --Mando'ade and the Imperials, both. They'll engage upon arrival. Our fleet will follow to flank."

Revan blinked. "Why that route? Why three jumps?" She knew it. Polla had never spent any time in that sector but Revan knew it--somewhere, that dark whisper of recognition in her mind--

"Bring them to the Malachor System?" Dar's voice cracked with suspicion. "Why?"

"To make an end." Vima folded her arms. "Malachor V remains unstable and the system itself is full of debris. I know it well. Easy to exploit the terrain to our advantage." Her hands moved and a display of the system appeared, lit in holographic blue. "You can see these asteroid belts here, the remains of so many ruined ships can provide cover, as well as possible projectiles--"

"And the Trayus Academy?" Dar walked over to the display and circled a spot on the fifth planet. "How does that figure into your scheming?"

"The what?" Revan frowned.

"Mandalorians have a superstition about walking on the planet. My padawan and I did not share their reservations." Vima glanced at Dar and suddenly Revan felt the Force press down on her again like a vise. "We found a ruin built centuries ago, perhaps millennia. Power there to unlock, untouched by the Rakatan taint--"

"A refuge. Built by some long-ago rebel Sith Lord." Dar interrupted, tapping in commands that appeared on Revan's overlay, bidding the fleets to follow Vima's orders as if the matter was already decided. Three jumps, scarcely habitable systems. Blips on the hyperspace map.

The second to the last--Rekkiad--caught Revan's attention. The name was familiar. It recalled a sense of cold. The viewscreen of the Progress, watching the ice world while death screamed in her mind.

"Later, Vima used Trayus Academy--what did you use it for, Vima?" Dar's voice hardened. "I approved Davad opening his training facility there, but you--"

"I used it to consolidate my power." Vima nodded to herself as alarms pinged, indicating the ship had once more gone into hyperspace. "As my base beyond Vitiate's reach. The Blades trained there. As did my son, Oerin, for a time."

"That's nice." Oerin. My former ally. But what he'd done to Millifar, to Vrook and all the Jedi on Katarr-- "Must be a great place."

"I believe the lingering effects of the Mass Shadow Generator will make it nearly impossible for the Sleepers to create new hyperspace paths out of the Malachor system," Vima continued. "The gravity well still extant pulls any ship larger than forty meters into its sink around Malachor V--an effect we can enhance with the Force. If we get them close enough to the--"

She traced the differential vectors and Revan was surprised to find herself agreeing. The math made sense, it made perfect sense--

She wants us to go to fracking Malachor V and that makes sense? Revan felt herself shiver. She's fracking with my head.
"Here." Dar's flesh hand glowed as she pressed it to Revan's back. "You look rather pale. I always used to get nauseated in space. I had to learn coping mechanisms." She moved closer, and Revan tried to ignore the smell of sweat. Dar needed a sonic almost as badly as the poor Toydarian, who now slumped with his beak half-open in his chair, eyes half-closed. Kill her now, her fingers traced Ryl-signs on Revan's hand. Quickly.

Revan shook her head. There were still too many unanswered questions. I can kill her any time, she thought. A strangely calm thought.

XXX

Who was Polla Organa? Polla Organa was no one person. Instead, she was a precisely curated amalgamation of personalities, driven by the Force. The Jedi instilled in her a strong sense of morality; technical knowledge that complimented Revan's own; and basic training in weapons and strategy. Supposedly born on Deralia, a remote world untouched by the ravages of war, her personality matrix overlaid the tragedies of Revan's life with a foundation of stability and hope.

Yes, Polla Organa was no one person--or was she?

It is possible that a Polla Organa, Deralian Registered Smuggler, did exist as a contemporary to Revan Starfire. Deralian registries note such a person as a dues-paying member of the guild during the Mandalorian and First Sith War. Her parents, Molla and Jasp Organa, and a husband and son, Seiran and Abasen, are also listed as the owners of a Derra Farm, Adaston.

After the Machine Wars and well into the next century, a Republic Bounty for a 'Polla Organa, Registered Smuggler' remained in effect, issued by the Transgalactic Underwriters Guild; the penalty for three counts of insurance fraud. But the bounty was never collected, and the Underwriters' Guild dissolved into insolvency. The exploits of Polla Organa, in some parts of the Rim more myth than merchant, continued for another century--well beyond the span of Human years--lending credence to the theory that Polla Organa was merely a droid with a clever holomask all along.

Or a fictional character.

But was a smuggler's personality truly given to Revan Starfire? Could a Deralian smuggler's memories truly be a part of what made the Hero of Malachor V and the Star Forge, the Empire-Breaker Resplendent, triumph over evil and return balance to the galaxy?

I think not.

Heroes, some say, are born, not made, created from the ether of the Force itself to bring us all to salvation. The hubris of thinking otherwise can be a heavy pill for some to swallow, I realize....

--Polla Organa: Hero or Myth? Lord Aurren Tuile Panteer, Alderaan University. RRA 278, BBY 3640

[Note: Panteer was, by all accounts, a terrible monarchist, and this publication is often interpreted to be part of an effort to discredit any Organa claim to royalty. In other works he discredits the House Organa as a pack of Deralian grifters.]

--compiled by Archivist Lanna T'so, University of Coruscant.

XXX

A lot seemed to have happened judging by the flashing lights and alarms, but nothing much had changed in this room that looked, Polla thought, more like a mess hall than an interrogation chamber or a cell.

Since the lights weren't flashing anymore, she had to guess they'd won the battle. "Any news?" she bugged the nearest guard.

He blinked sleepily at her as if he'd just downed a shot of trank’n’tank. "No, ma’am."

Be pretty easy to escape, Polla thought. She looked over to where the Wookiees had camped out in the corner. Half of them looked asleep too.

We’ll escape later. A comforting thought. She yawned herself, catching the eye of the glaring Republic admiral who’d been left to babysit their guards. Woman looked really pissed about it. And jumpy, with a sweet Republic-issue Aratech on her hip. Polla leaned against a wall and smiled, just to see her sweat.

She wondered how Mission was getting on, back at the ship with the repair droids they’d assigned to it.

I can escape later and check. Polla yawned again.

Phylus Blais walked over to one of the currently blacked-out viewscreens, and fiddled with the controls.

"Won't do any good!" Da called out to him, from where he was jawing with a tired-looking lieutenant. "Security lock-down."

"I want to leave this ship," the kid said stubbornly. Same thing he'd been saying ever since they got into this stupid system. "My sister is out there and I want to see her."

"You should have heard the banthashit she used to say about you," Polla offered, to make him feel better.

"I did." Phylus Blais looked like he was pouting. "We were a very open family."

A squad of uniformed grunts jogged by their door's window; steps so synched they could have been droids. Then another. They had pilots' helmets tucked under their arms. Notes chimed over the speakers. The soldiers seemed to have come from every corner of the galaxy. If they hadn't been prisoners, Polla might have been touched to see all the Republic fracking unity, with every color, shape, size and breathing apparatus represented from a hundred planets.

“So… uh…. who’re you again?” Polla asked the admiral-woman. The admiral had come late, was now pacing back and forth with a frown on her face. Looked a little twitchy, like she’d taken too many stims.

“Admiral Rew Ekkumi.” Admiral Rew Ekkumi had a long face and a Telosian accent and dark hair in coils under her hat. The way she said her own name seemed to imply that Polla should be impressed.

Frack that. "If you're an admiral, where's your ship?"

"High Admiral Rensha has assigned me to be your security." The woman made a face like that was a sensitive topic. "For now. I’m in charge of your interrogation."

But you haven’t asked us any questions. "Hah, what'd you frack up to get that job?" Polla laughed, but the admiral just blinked.

"Pollie!" Da rushed up and elbowed her. "I'm sorry, my daughter's a little informal, sir."

Admiral Rew Ekkumi nodded. "No, it’s a valid question. I had my own command until we engaged Revan's fleet." She tapped the headset she was wearing, and frowned; from the way her eyes unfocused she was obviously reviewing some top-secret admiral-type data. "Jiya? Are you seeing these latest orders?"

"Just got 'em. They don't make sense." The disembodied voice from her wrist-comm made Polla jump—and then immediately feel stupid for jumping. No one had told her to jump. I just have to stay calm. We'll escape later. She yawned again.

"I have to count on you to tell me these things." The admiral sighed. "The routing doesn’t make sense to me, either... but I don't feel… concerned about it."

"You can't not follow orders," Da interrupted their talk. “Not your job to question them.”

Polla blinked, because that wasn't like him at all to say something like that. Except he was right, of course. "You have to follow orders," she agreed. "Just follow the commands. We have to win this war. And then maybe we’ll escape. She yawned again, eyeing the sleepy-looking guard with the best rifle. Looked like he'd customized that beauty himself.

When we escape, I'll knock him out first and I will be having that rifle.

It looks so heavy!

She yawned again.

Rew made a disgusted noise in her throat, eyeing her. "Rensha put me on prisoner watch, Jiya. I'm here with the prisoners from the Ebon Hawk now."

“Revan’s there?” One of the voices asked.

“No.” Admiral Ekkumi made a face. “She went off with the other one and Atris. I’m in charge of her staff. Jiya? Denis? Tell me what to do."

"Get the hell out of there," another disembodied voice said. Male, more aristocratic than the first. "I can't think of one good reason she'd hold the Republic Fleet back and send the Mando'ade ahead with the Imperials. Especially to that system."

"I know. But we have to follow orders…” Rew's voice trailed off. "Damnit! I--"

"You got orders! You have to follow them," Polla reminded her.

"It comes and it goes, here. We… we're following the orders too.” The aristocratic voice paused. “Admiral Ekkumi, this is Acting Vice Admiral Denis Cein, currently commanding the Proven Conquest. Do you acknowledge my superior rank?"

“Of course, Denis.” The woman blinked rapidly a few times and took a deep breath. “Admiral Cein.”

“Then follow my directive. Get the hell off that ship before it jumps again ”

“I…” Admiral Ekkumi blinked a few times. “I… okay. Keep an eye on our guests," the admiral ordered their guards. "That’s an order. I’ve got to… I’ve got to go."

The guards stepped aside and Rew Ekkumi backed out of the room. Polla heard her footsteps break into a run down the hall, then fade away, with those two disembodied voices still yelling more orders at her.

"She seemed kinda busy." Polla yawned. "That why you never made admiral, Da? Looks like a lot of work."

"That and I deserted." Her father shrugged.

Zaalbar looked up from his corner and groaned. "I do not like this place."

"The smell is like slaves," his girlfriend agreed. "But they told us we had to stay."

"We have orders that you have to stay." One of the guards leveled a stupidly large rifle in their direction. "We’re keeping you all here until we hear otherwise."

"We get it. You have to follow orders," Polla agreed. She felt funny. "Totally understandable." When she stared at the wall, she felt calmer somehow. But then her legs were tired. "Uh, could you order me to sit down?"

Xxx

Mandalore the Builder is a curious figure in galactic history. It is known that his name was Canderous Ordo, and that he followed Revan the Redeemer. This basic story exists in both the male and female versions of Revan's narrative.

At the end of the Machine Wars, Mandalore the Builder united the clans on Dxun, Onderon's moon. His successor, Mandalore the Beast-Master, was rumored to be a Force-user, although evidence of Force-sensitivity in the Taung bloodlines do not appear conclusively until the Age of the Darksaber some two centuries later….

--Excerpt from "An Historian's Introduction to the Machine Wars: Lecture by Kree Usam Racharn for the Revan: Fact or Fiction Symposium, SHWL," University of Coruscant Press. 3653 BBY

[NOTE: the rest of this record, curiously, has been deleted. Evidence that the conspiracy was real?]

--compiled by Archivist Lanna T'so

Xxx

"There's an Imperial Stinger off our bow. Looks like it's drifting." Leskal's voice crackled as the short range cut in and out. "Picking up life signs, but it's not responding to hails."

"Tractor in. Send the pilot to medical." Canderous had been in better moods. Burn fuel to Corellia, then jump back to Malastare… sure, they'd cut through more of those damn areutii machines, but at the end, the cowards still jumped away, running like scalded manka cats before they could finish them off.

And the latest commands from the red-eyed kid--

"This right?" He asked the Sith hu'tuun ruler (currently possessing the Zabrak) again. "Degriass, Rekkiad, Malachor System? You sure? We can't use their damn hyperspace tunnels--ones for that route don't exist. It's gonna take a few days to get this right, and we barely have fuel."

"Yes." The kid's eyes rolled back in his head, the sockets still glowing. "I'm sure." Something was on the fritz with Zepth too. The Sith Emperor had been gone for half the battle, leaving the scared Zabrak kid in his place, and their own forces trying to figure out how not to accidentally shoot their allies. Damn hu'tuun body-stealer was unreliable. "Degriass. Rekkiad. Malachor. Canderous…" the voice seemed to hesitate. "Uh, be careful."

"Right." Canderous snorted. Maybe the troch had been off developing a sense of humor. "Ask General Sheris why the hell we wasted time jumping back? Fleet's not a damned dewback chain."

"We… we figured out a way to… call the ships to us."

"Then call them here. Let's be done with it."

"Only works for a few minutes. Then they'll run. But we're… the atmospheric conditions around Malachor V… if we can draw them there so they can't jump out. I'll try and send you the data when we get a fresh signal."

"Tell your dar'jett general there is no need. We have been studying the effects of the gravity well at Malachor V far more extensively than they. I have the Weis databanks—and two of their geopoeisic engineers." Aemelie paused to smile. "General Sheris is right, husband. If we lure the troch fleet close enough to Malachor V's gravity well….

"Huh." Aemelie would never be wrong about astrophysics. "And General Sheris thinks she can keep 'em following us for days instead of running off on their own?" They'd tried something like that at Kashyyyk. Hadn't worked so well then.

"I--yes." A pause, as the Zabrak kid twitched, and drooled. "She can. T-trust me."

Canderous did not trust him—or the nastaar Sheris. But the Sith Emperor was in one vulnerable body on his ship and General Sheris was on a Republic dreadnaught with failing shields. The Aleema could take down the Hunt in moments, even with her current battle scars.

Not that they would—yet. Hetrusted Onasi. It just wasn't time to deal with the Republic. Not yet. All things in their season. He cracked the stiffening muscles in his back. "Onasi's in on this?"

"Carth--yes. Of course. Carth said… yes. You need to go… soon… I can't…" the red eyes flickered, cutting in and out like a bad holoreceiver. "We all need to go into hyperspace soon. We'll have a few days then—few days between each jump. Get the wideband up again. Finally get some rest."

Canderous nodded approval to the navigators to start laying in the new course. "Hey—before you go, why's the Ebon Hawk here? What's it doing on the Hunt?"

"Uh… I don't know." The Emperor seemed nonplussed. "I think… Phylus Blais. He was looking for his sister."

“Mydia Blais? We’ve got her."

“Good… uh, good. He’ll be happy to hear it."

Canderous had seen the Hawk in real-time, shooting by their bow with a swarm of Sleeper fighters on its tail like they a chain of drawbacks being led. Why would those damn Machine Ships follow the Hawk? Onasi had said something about giving the ship to Polla Organa and her husband before they parted ways. Had they brought the Blais kid back? The Emperor had just said they'd found a way to make the Machine Ships follow the Fleet.

Was Phylus Blais calling them somehow? Canderous frowned. "So Blais made the Machine Ships follow the Hawk? Great Hunt tractored her in and now the Machine Ships're following the Great Hunt. Maybe you should figure it--" his voice broke off.

Only one person he'd seen had ever been able to control those Machine Ships. Make them stop bombing a planet, in fact.

"--out," he finished. But he already knew. Phylus Blais wasn't the one making those ships follow. Damn her.

There was a long pause. Probably while they both worked out a few things. Probably why Revan told that hu'tuun Emperor what to say. Because she'd know--she'd know what she asking--

"The Mando'ade don't talk of oaths." Zepth's head turned toward Canderous, as hand rose jerkily in the air, tracing the Ordo sigil he had no right to learn. "They are private things. But you swore one. You swore to follow, Canderous. Just… just do it. Trust me."

"That is absurd!" Aemelie's laugh splintered the abrupt quiet of their bridge, as every one of their people turned to look at Canderous, waiting for him to deny it. "General Ordo would never swear an oath to the Sith Emperor! He is no Fett Cassus of Linn, or Fett Te Ani'la before him--"

Canderous frowned, rubbing the full beard he'd grown without time to delip. "Follow the orders, Aemelie." Damn her. Damn them both.

His wife's expression tightened, and he saw the disapproval in her eyes, felt it radiating like mutiny around him from the others. He would be challenged, probably more than once before they even got to Malachor. And he could not afford to lose.

Damn her. Canderous had told Revan why the clans could not follow and she demanded it anyway. In the last few years whenever something happened that he couldn't explain, it was always due to her. This time was no different. Perhaps the carbonite freezing had been a ruse for her enemies. Perhaps she had thought to trick Aemelie, and make the Mando'ade follow her all along.

"We'll follow," he muttered, making a choice in an instant that might cost him his own empire--and his marriage. "Tell her that."

"Thank you," the possessed Zabrak replied. "I… uh, I will. Be careful."

Thank you. Canderous wanted to laugh.

"You too," he said.

"Oh, now he thanks you." Aemelie's hands punched the controls with more force than was necessary. "What did Emperor Hu'tuun ever do to gain your allegiance?"

"It is private."

Hurt sparked in her eyes. Canderous averted his. Damn them both. There was no good choice. The war had to be won. All of the rest: loyalties, oaths, honor, tradition--it would mean nothing burned into dust. Malachor V had been the lesson for Clan--and their tomb.

At the nav-board, the three blooded warriors had already pivoted to plotting their battle formations for Degriass. The possessed Zabrak swayed on his feet, red lights of his eyes fading. Canderous nodded and two of the boys caught the man before he fell.

"We'll have a few days off, Aemelie." He could offer her that, at least. "In hyperspace."

"Then you should sleep," she muttered icily. "While you can."

"I'll make the tea," he told her, rather pointedly, but his wife ignored the innuendo.

Canderous closed his eyes. Too old for this. Aemelie had agreed to take orders from the Emperor already… hell if Canderous could see the difference between that immortal areutii and his friend… but he wasn't a woman.

You don't know it's really Revan possessing that kid, he reminded himself. It was a lie. He did know. Whatever choice he made would betray one of them: his wife or his warrior. The clans or the galaxy.

It occurred to him suddenly that Fett Cassus Lin had once faced a similar choice. And died for it.

"Malachor V…." Aemelie gestured toward Rickallion and the blooded warrior pulled up the Malachor System on the navboard. From the rows of seats along the weapons bank, someone began humming the Vode An. “Whatever your oaths, we will all take pleasure in battle above the skies of our most sacred ground!”

"Get the wideband links up if you can," Canderous barked to the kids. "And bring that Imp pilot to me when he clears medical." A long shot, but maybe the soldier would know something.

Not that Canderous wanted to know, but he was honor-bound to check.

Xxx

When your great-great-great grandmother General Millifar of Ordo was a young woman, she was blooded in stars many times--so many that the heavens cried. But much less is known about your as many great grandfather, the mysterious dar’jett who loved her, although he was a true warrior as well…

--compiled by Archivist Lanna T’so.

XXX

Their shift had a three-hour rest period between rotations. Millifar thought she’d been clear about scheduling an assignation when Mekel lingered behind to check their refueling lines… but she’d waited an hour in their bunk alone already. The only sign of Jin was his discarded flight suit (that needed laundering) and his lucky boots.

She commed the hangar to see if their ship needed more repair than she had expected, only to be told that Jin of Lin had left moments after she had, and that they had a span of days, not hours, before they would have to fly again. That, too, was a curious mystery, but one Millifar would now have days to solve.

So first, Jin.
Jin of Lin, she had learned, was a creature of habit. If he was not with Millifar, and he was not with their ship--

Kriffing dar’jett. After the duel had been fought three weeks ago they'd come to an agreement.

Of course, Mydia Blais had spent most of the duel running around shrieking like a babe, instead of working with Millifar to knock Jin out properly. Millifar had not been trying that hard to knock out Jin, either. He had to beat both of them to win a place in their beds—a point that had been explained to him at length by the other men after Mydia announced her claim in mixed company, where the challenge was impossible for Millifar to ignore. Jin had blushed like a proper man that day and told Millifar she was the only lover he needed on the ship.

But if the man hadn't wanted to bed Mydia Blais, all he had to do was lose the duel.

Jin had not lost the duel. In fact, the duel had gone on for hours. One of the last times they'd had for frivolous things before the war began.

And so, now they had this schedule—

Millifar rehearsed what she was going to say in her head, what she should have made clear with Jin when they were still aboard the gunship: Mydia Blais’s time does not begin until for another three hours. I said nothing when she damaged you with those scratches the last time, but if you persist in disregarding all of our customs I may be forced to bring this matter before the Woman's Council for another mediation by combat—

Millifar raised her hand and knocked on the door of the converted supply closet that the Sith princess had taken for her quarters. It was larger than most of the bunks, and the woman claimed it was fitting for her station as one of the Mandalorians’ two Force-detectors. The other Force-detector, the Zabrak Zepth, was possessed by the Emperor and considered less reliable even when he seemed to be in his own mind; which he was less and less frequently. Zepth was prone to increasingly long stretches of blankness where all he did was stare and drool, which made Mekel's friendship with the man all the more confusing.

Mydia of Blais was, at least, always conscious.

"Oh!" Mydia Blais stood in the doorway, clad only in a sheer robe. The scent of vallin candles wafting from her bunk was overpowering. "I sensed a null approach. I thought it was Mekel. What have you done with my boyfriend?"

"Nothing. It is still my turn." Millifar lifted her chin. "Since your mother never taught you how to share, I came to remind you."

The Sith rolled her eyes. "Did Mekel send you to tell me that?" She stepped forward when Millifar tried to peer around her shoulder, but the dar’jett Blais was short, and Millifar had a clear view of the room beyond. Lots of candles, two cots that had been tied together to make a decadent bed... but no Jin of Lin.

"He and I had arranged an assignation after our last combat run." A horrible thought occurred to Millifar. What if he had gone ahead on the next half-sequence with ceka rotation and… died? Would anyone bother to tell Millifar before the casualty lists were reported?

"He's not here, either." Mydia stuck out her lower lip like a small child. "He did say he might stop by later, but I don’t expect him for hours." She sniffed. “Perhaps he’s tired of you and went elsewhere.”
Suddenly Millifar felt foolish. "Perhaps he's merely eating."

"Maybe… or…" the Sith princess sighed heavily. "Have you noticed that… oh!" Her voice broke off. "Never mind. I’m sure it’s nothing."

“I will determine what is nothing,” Millifar told her. “What is to notice?”

“Well…” Mydia Blais gave a dramatic sigh. “I’m sure it’s nothing, but he has been spending a great deal of time with the Zabrak Voice.” Mydia raised her eyebrow. "Have you noticed that?"

“His bridge duties are to escort the Zabrak when we aren’t flying combat sweeps. Of course they spend time together.”

“And?” The Sith princess made a gesture instead of using the appropriate word for the act. Sith were strangely prudish.

"He told me he had a Zabrak friend." Millifar considered her point. "Before. A special one. He told me they have erogenous zones on their foreheads. At the time, I did not see how that was relevant, but now--"

"A male friend?" Mydia stepped back, motioning Millifar inside her quarters. "Because I know he… has had that preference in that past--"

"I don't know. But I knew about him and Leskal--" Millifar had a flash of irritation. "A casual liaison means nothing. Especially during wartime, what the men do in combat has nothing--"

"Leskal?" Mydia Blais looked thoughtful. "No. I meant Dustil Onasi--the Malak imposter."

"The Malak imposter--? Oh! Dustil." Millifar blinked. "Of course. He's spoken to me about Dustil." A bit too much, really. She’d expected another Exar Kun from the way Jin built the man up. Instead, she’d met a scrawny Sith that needed their rescue on the Great Hunt, stubble mixed with veins on his face. Did the Sith know that exposure to their magic just made them look like they were dying of radiation poisoning? She did not find it attractive. The way Mekel had spoken of the man had not matched the sullen dar’jett who spent the brief time he’d been on the Aleema glued to his father's side. They had not, she remembered noting at the time, even seemed to be particularly close. Mekel had hovered over Dustil like a nursing kath pup; but the dar’jett had seemed to pay his lover--or former lover--no mind.

Then, there had been a concern that the Imperial Fleet, with nothing left to lose, might turn on their conquerors. Dustil Onasi had gone with the Twi'lek dar’jett Yuthura Ban to help Carth keep them in line. After a few days of negotiation, the two fleets together had left Dromund Kaas, bound for the neutral refueling station at in the Peragus System-- --and arrived out of hyperspace to find it no longer existed.

After that, there hadn’t been much time for wondering about anything except the war. Glorious war--with too few men left for her father to forbid Millifar to take wing. Jin had proved himself quite capable in a fighter as well. They ran their gunboat perfectly together.

"Wait," Millifar frowned. "Are you saying Mekel hasn’t been with you at all, Mydia of Blais? Is that why you think he prefers men?" She felt smugness, knowing it not to be true.

Mydia giggled. "Oh, no." Her sand-colored eyes seemed to grow distant as if she was reliving the details of their encounters. She smiled. “He’s very attentive.”
“Yes.” Millifar sighed. The troch princess was of an age where it would be appropriate for them to share confidences of this nature, but she found Mydia insipid and dull. Not to mention far too thin. Something about the girl made Millifar feel ungainly. “Thank you for your time.”

“I’ll tell him you were asking for him,” the other woman purred sweetly. “In a few hours. When he comes to me. He never misses a visit with me.”

Millifar opened her mouth to tell the troch what she would do to her if she did any such thing—and closed it again. Almost like a voice, whispering in her ear. Skinny she may be, but that one is more dangerous than she looks. Treat her with caution, Millifar of Ordo.

“Yes, of course.” She nodded. No longer strange, having a voice whisper in her ear… although Millifar remembered, vaguely, a time when it had caused her panic.

Some of the best headwomen are a little mad, the voice whispered, soothing her. And with my tutelage, daughter of Ordo, you will be the best of all.

XXX

"The first joint speech of Revan Starfire and General Sheris Darkstar took place after the battle of Malastare was definitively won. It was meant purely for Fleet, most assume, but when wideband service was restored to all sectors of the galaxy, it was believed to have been broadcast freely across both Republic and Imperial space—as were all of Revan's speeches. For years after, the First Speech was studied both for its impact, and its inspiring rhetoric. The last thing anyone expected to see in the throes of war was what appeared to be two Revans, working together for victory."

"What remains curious about this speech is how disseminated it was at the time—so much that an entire generation of children on hundreds of planets were named 'Revan' or 'Sheris,' and yet, within two generations these speeches had faded into obscurity, only found in obscure references or forgotten vaults. Our own copy, which I will play for you now, was provided by Senator Loriom of House Racharn from Racharn's personal archive...."

--Excerpt from "An Historian's Introduction to the Machine Wars: Lecture by Kree Usam Racharn for the Revan: Fact or Fiction Symposium, SHWL," University of Coruscant Press. 3653 BBY

--compiled by Archivist Lanna T'so.

Xxx

Vima's plan was a trap. That fact glittered in Atris's possessed eyes, shone in the triumph of her smile. Degriass, Rekkiad, Malachor. Malachor.

Republic forces: Operation: Scattershot.

From time to time, Vima overrode Revan’s instructions to the fleet. Small changes. This change was not small. Vima was scattering the Republic Fleet across Core Space. She’d ordered the Hunt evacuated to a skeleton crew. She’d ordered the Mandalorian and Imperial fleets to Degriass. Rekkiad. Malachor. After the first jump, the time differential would effectively remove the Republic from the battle entirely.

Vima was only sending the Republic’s former enemies to Malachor; the place where Revan had used the Force's power of death to transform her own enemies. Who would Vima transform this time? She seeks the death of the Force. The woman had taken no pains to hide the objective from Revan. She could make another Arkan from the Fragment, perhaps--or from me--
Vima's plan was a trap, a bald-faced mirror of the plan Revan herself had launched herself long ago.

And right now, Revan felt like a k'lor'slug in a salt trap, her own free will dissolving with her fear.

Kill her, Revan signaled to the Fragment again. She didn't bother to watch for Vima's gaze to turn away. Right now she could feel Vima's control bearing down on them both. It scarcely mattered.

Her master's smile seemed to brighten.

Red. Malak's voice. So very faint.

The Fragment just shook her head. Her hand twitched in, the Ryl-signs that meant 'yet,' then 'knowledge,' before her eyes unfocused again. She'd controlled the Sleeper Ships at Malastare, flickering in and out of the Force like a maelstrom. Unleashed, she shone with the Emperor's own strength. She would be a match for Vima, even in this place.

If only she could see.

Malak! Tell her that between us we can answer any questions she might have--she doesn't have to let Vima live to find out whatever the blast she wants to know--

Red, I--.

Malak! He felt so distant. Revan looked up only to see her duplicate now staring vacantly, mouth half-open, and the Toydarian's eyes glowing again. The Fragment’s nose was bleeding again, staining her lips and chin. The glow from her skin made the blood appear black.

Malak’s voice was faint. She is with the Emperor, now. He calls to her, too.

Keep trying. "I know what you're planning to do," Revan told Vima.

"Do you?" A white eyebrow raised. "Would you do it? Again? For the sake of the galaxy?"

"It won't kill the Emperor." Revan exhaled. "So no."

"It took the death of many worlds to make Vitiate. I would destroy much less than that. Sacrifice as little as possible."

"Our allies--"

"Will become our enemies again, in a decade's time, no matter who dies now or what treaties are signed. Mandalorian expansion does not come with peace. And the Empire..." Atris's body shrugged. "Cutting off its head will not dull its claws. Shattering its navy, however...."

"It could be more than a decade of peace. It could be generations--"

"It will be generations, when they have no ships."

The logic wasn't wrong. Of course it wasn't. Revan had thought the same when she'd lured the Republic and the Mandalorian fleets to Malachor, before.

"But the Force is in all things. Life itself. If you destroy the Force you destroy everything--"

"Pablum." Atris's lip curled. "Pablum from Jedi. Your ignorance transformed Arkan into Nihilus. All I had to do was complete what you began. The Emperor consumes all life to fuel his own expansion. I will bestow the power to stop him to one capable of doing so with the deaths of our allies. She will not be so clumsy a tool as Nihilus. She has been shaped from the beginning by my design. She will end Vitiate and the Order, and leave the galaxy to its natural order."

The Fragment remained oblivious. Revan had to speak for her. "I won't let you use her! I can stop him!"

“Oh? How?”

Revan was half-through the explanation of how with the Rakatan box when she saw Vima's eyes brighten and realized with a sick feeling in her gut that this interrogation had been part of her master's plan all along.

"A Rakatan mind prison?" Vima shook her head. "On Nar Shaddaa? Such a simple thing, to bring down the mighty."

"It worked before." That was how she had found rumors of its existence. Records kept by the Rakatan priest-caste. "Twenty thousand years ago, a Rakatan prince harnessed their world-building machines to tie his own essence into each sentient being they created. He thought their life-force would amplify his own power--but his people captured him, instead. His capture set them free." Or killed them. In Rakatan, the runes for 'freedom' and 'death' were very similar.

"A tale I never heard." Atris glanced at the glowing Fragment, the red-eyed Toydarian. "We must send word of the box to her in case none of us survive."

"I told her some of it already."

"I do not mean Revan." Atris smiled. "Revan is an agent of death and you are her shadow. Tricks of the light to beguile Vitiate and shatter his Sleepers while my true apprentice achieves her purpose."

“Who is your true apprentice?” The Fragment would have said, ‘fracking apprentice.’ The mix of exasperation and expletive seemed appropriate. “Who is your true fracking apprentice?” Revan glared at her old master. Unlikely responses warred with the absurd. She made her voice drip with the Fragment's cutting sarcasm. “Meetra Fracking Surik?”

Surprise sparked in Atris's cold eyes. “Yes.” The surprise faded with an eye-blink, replaced by cold calculation gazing back at her, as pitiless as the Rakatan machine.

“Oh.” But of course it made sense. All of them, grist of Sunrider's mill. Atris, too. Even Vima herself, once upon a time. Jedi do not become monsters, Vrook told me that. But I proved him wrong just as surely as Nomi Sunrider before her--all those years ago--

There was a long pause. Time seemed to stretch thin. Revan watched the Republic, Imperial, and Mandalorian ships begin to wink out; blindly following orders.

"You're very quiet, padawan." Vima went to the counter behind their console and removed a cup from the cabinet, unsealing it. There was a popping noise and then the smell of nerf broth soup. Jedi become the worst monsters of all, Uncle Vrook. And you knew it--your old friends and my father became monsters. Like Exar and Ulic and Nomi.

The Fragment was still too trusting. She had learned to shield the crystal of her saber, but not the weapon itself, which hung by a single clip at her belt, her hand slack beside it. She was still glowing. Come to her true power--lost somewhere with the Emperor himself.
In time, the Fragment might become a monster, but she wasn't one yet. She knew how to kill, but not to execute. Not for cause.

Revan's hand extended and the Fragment's hilt flew into it, igniting, and then, lashing out as time froze, the red light of her double-bladed saber reflecting in the mirror of a pair of green eyes--

Green eyes? Green--

Red! Her husband’s voice--

Xxxx

Transcript of unreleased footage from the "The Machines Wars: The Untold Story."

Interview with anonymous crewmember, The Great Hunt,

You said before, things changed after the battle at Malastare. Care to say how?

That's when she came.

She?

You know. Isn't that why you asked me to come on this show? Her. Revan Starfire. Right before Malastare is when she came. I was in the Honor Guard that day. I saw the whole thing. She landed with a bunch of Wookiees--

Wookiees? Really, Wookiees?

A bunch of Wookiees. What's the word for a bunch of Wookiees? A herd? A mob?

Only if you want your arms torn off. But then what happened?

She went off with General Darkstar and Master Atris--did I mention she was glowing?

Oh, come on now--really?

It's true. It's all true. All of the stories about Revan Starfire--they're all true. I saw it. I saw her. She knew where the Machine Ships would be. And she made them all follow her--

And she was glowing?

She was glowing. It faded after a while. She wasn’t glowing all the time, but she still was, a little when we got there, to the place of the last battle--

[NOTE: this transcript was undated, but is presumed to be a contemporary account of events, est. BBY 3950.]

--compiled by Archivist Lanna T'so.

XXX

Was the idea of a Twi'lek possessed of Mission Vao’s spirit more ludicrous than the holocron copy of Mission Vao in the body of a T3? Malak had seen the T3 himself in the months he had hovered over his wife's unconscious body on Dromund Kaas. Malak had heard the thing mimic the cadence of the spirited child who’d tried to bite his arm on the Leviathan before running away.
Was anything more ludicrous than a man years dead trying to shield his son, his wife, and his... wife, through some posthumous Force-connection he didn't understand himself?

Perhaps not, but Malak could sense nothing of the Force at all in the two Twi'lek women who had sandwiched his son between them at a small table in the back room of their establishment and were now feeding him what looked like half a roast bantha haunch. The boy was devouring it so eagerly that Malak felt a twinge of guilt for not paying closer attention to his son's meals before. Atton had mostly subsisted on ration bars and CoruGin, and Malachor only the former, of course.

Malak and Revan had once found a book in the archives of his father's library: a compendium of theories about what happened to consciousness after death. Many cultures believed in a universal ascension that was similar to Jedi beliefs--becoming part of a larger whole, becoming one with the Force. Some believed that the essence of former consciousness returned to the material plane; that sentient beings were reborn in new bodies whose relative advantage was based upon their good works—or good will—in their previous life. Others believed in more simplistic systems: of a disembodied spirit granted eternal reward—or eternal damnation.

None, as Malak had plenty of time to reflect, believed in redemption after death. And the few references to spirits influencing the physical world from "beyond the Veil" did not include any instruction manuals for said spirits—about their powers, limitations, or the length of their sentences, caught between worlds of living or dead.

Fourteen-year-old Revan had just completed a study of humanoid physiology when they'd found that book. She had dismissed the entire thing with a shrug that moved the neck of the loose, white shift she wore approximately five centimeters to the left. The gesture exposed a length of freckled collarbone and the smooth knob of her shoulder. Malak had found himself more fixated on that than he had been at the time by her words... but now Malak remembered she had rather gloomily claimed that the brain took its time to die; severing connections to a failing body: sight, sound, sensation, pain, until it was alone, locked in itself, with only memory left until consciousness faded.

Malak had argued that consciousness would not have to fade if there was nothing left to tether it and Red had laughed at him.

But Malak had been right. His consciousness had remained when his body disintegrated into spacedust—and remained acutely attuned to the darkness in a woman who refused to see him—

Malak! His beloved wife called again and Malak came, but he still couldn’t reach her; the Revers closing herself from the Force—and the other, beloved weaker was dimmed under the power bearing down upon them both.

The malevolent, amplified presence of Vima Sunrider.

"No!" Malak cried out—but too late, as his Red called Revan's saber to her hand, igniting it and lunging toward the other version of herself, whose eyes widened too slowly in comprehension, came back from the infinite too slowly to wrest the weapon back or dodge the blow.

But then Revan's hand reached up--

--and stopped the burning plasma blade with the strength of her will.

Raw blue power flared around her cupped palm, licking against the red from the blade, sparking.

"Help her! Revan! It's not you she's trying to kill!” he told the top-knotted one, and her eyes widened as the Force flared around her and her saw her eyes focus on him--

“Malak?” she whispered.

Xxx

Most tales of the Jedi who followed Revan the Redeemer were erased from history when her own narrative ended, but every school child in the galaxy knows of Master Dustil the Wise, whose comedic mistakes always contain a kernel of wisdom; and whose pratfalls have entertained generations of youngsters on worlds from Byss to Bothoawui.

Was Master Dustil the Wise based upon Dustil Onasi, son of highly-decorated Admiral Carth Onasi? If so, one wonders how many of the tales about his role as a father to so many children are true as well….

Excerpt from "An Historian's Introduction to the Machine Wars: Lecture by Kree Usam Racharn for the Revan: Fact or Fiction Symposium, SHWL," University of Coruscant Press. 3653 BBY

--compiled by Archivist Lanna T'so.

Xxx

Dustil dreamed of the light. It filled him, laid him open like a dissected cadaver, weighed him down with gravity. It felt like Mekk's warm body on top of his own, felt like everything safe in the galaxy. Power, pure and hard and bright.

Take it, he agreed. They agreed, because he wasn't alone. He had the Force and Mekk was there--

Dustil jerked awake, panicked and gasping. A blonde woman he didn't recognize was leaning over him, now pulling back as he sat up, nearly ready to gut her. Least he wasn't naked; in dreams like this when he was humiliated and the Mandies all laughed he'd always been naked; but she wasn't Milli-- she wasn't Millifar Ordo--this Mandalorian was older, with creases at the corner of her eyes and a fresh-looking scar on her temple.

"Where the hell am I?"

"The medix." She shook her head, narrowing her eyes. "Hrmmm. I don't see it, Sinae. Maybe a bit around the mouth?"

"Not the jaw or the chin," a female voice said behind him. "Hers is regrettably delicate. But yes. The mouth, I think."

Dustil blinked in disbelief. "What?"

"S'cuy gar, Dustil Onasi. How is your father? You both were here so briefly before, I didn't have a chance to say hello." Sinae the Mandalorian medix stepped into view. "General Ordo wants to speak to you, now that you're conscious."

"Uh, I… I was on my ship." He felt like a rube blinking at them. Dustil started to stand up, only to find himself wobbly on his feet.

"You fainted on your ship," the blonde woman told him. "Fortunately close enough to ours for a retrieval."

"That's--" something--instinct, maybe even the Force--made Dustil turn his head. He blinked.
Some kind of a shortened kolto tank was pushed against the wall. Two babies were floating in it, in one gelatinous, translucent sack. Their skin was a dark, ruddy red, like all the blood was visible. The sac was attached to a pulsating red mass floating at the top of the tank.

Is that how Mandalorians have kids? One of those questions he'd never thought of needing an answer for.

"I have to get back to the fight." He had to get out of here before he ran into dear Milli, or, Mydia Blais, or worse--good old Mekk.

"You have days, now," the blonde Mandalorian told him. "We are in hyperspace. We're taking the battle to the arusuum'la hu'tuuns ourselves."

"Huh? Is that Revan's bright idea?" Dustil didn't like to think of his dad's face when the Hawk streaked past their ship like they didn't matter. "We didn't need her. We were already winning with the other one."

"Revan?" Sinae frowned. "Call her General Sheris. It mollifies the Republics."

"And Canderous," her friend commented. "She has Revan's tactical grasp, of course, but none of her evil magics. We call her General Sheris, here."

"No." Dustil snorted. "Not Sheris. I mean the other one. She's back. Didn't you hear?"

The two women looked at him and then at each other. It was the lighter blonde who shook her head first--and in that second he got who she was. Dessa. The pregnant one that'd been unconscious before. Didn't look pregnant now. Those must be her kids in the tank. One was a lot bigger than the other.

Dustil had a dim memory of Sith hygiene class and learning how that could happen--just like life, someone's always stronger, taking everything they can. He walked closer to the tank. The artificial womb or whatever it was was clear enough he could see them pretty well. Big one was a boy, the smaller a girl. Behind him, Dessa and Sinae were whispering furiously in Mandalorian. Dustil didn't really care what they had to say, he was too busy looking at those two kids. When he put hand on the tank, the little one starfished her fingers, like she was waving back at him through the glass.

"No," Dessa raised her voice. "No, Dustil Onasi. We heard nothing about Revan's return."

Xxx

Master Atris of the Echani was the Jedi Archivist for at least five decades, according to accounts found referencing her tenure in the abandoned Jedi Enclave on Telos. And yet, all public mentions of her stop after the Machine Wars. Her sole public appearance after this time was the receipt of the Republic Cross of Glory for her bravery in the battle at Rekkiad.

Some recent scholars have suggested the award was in fact given to Revan--or, more preposterously, General Sheris Darkstar.

What we know about Atris of the Echani is, as follows: she was instrumental in bringing Echani fighting techniques into Jedi training, she did not attend the conclave at Katarr, and she was responsible for trainingMeetra Surik, the 'Last Jedi.'

--Excerpt from "An Historian's Introduction to the Machine Wars: Lecture by Kree Usam Racharn
Xxx

Kill her, Dar had signaled.

But it hadn't been time. They didn't have all the facts. They needed Vima alive because--because they needed her alive, because--

The thought seemed to freeze in Revan's mind as time slowed and sputtered. She was everywhere at once. She was nowhere, she was--

"Help her! Revan! It's not you she's trying to kill!"

"Malak?: The red blade in front of Revan's face swing down sharply, and she pushed back, sending her attacker flying into the opposite wall. It should have been a disabling attack, but the woman rolled free, dodging to the side and sweeping in for another attack.

She's using my saber. Revan's hand whipped out, lightning springing from her fingers, but the other woman's hand lifted and caught the blast, redirecting the energy back. Revan's spine crackled with agony when it hit, and Revan smelled her own scorched hair.

"What the hell are you doing?" She channelled a blast of Force, sending the woman tumbling against the wall.

But Dar didn’t answer. She scrambled to her feet, her expression slack. Nothing like their previous battles. Each movement was mechanical and perfect. Dar fought like a droid. Like she wasn't really there at all.

And beyond her, now that the Force was alive in her veins, Revan felt the Sleepers surge, responding to her own rage at betrayal with rising hatred, felt them all turn toward her ship and their route through hyperspace. Her vision of Dar splintered again into a thousand others: Tenebrae's bodies, the Sleeper's shells--stars, planets, people. Conversations, consciousness--

A humming red blade nearly bisected her before it was shoved aside and a gust of Force threw Revan herself back.

She blinked.

"Will you let her kill you?" Vima's voice. "I had expected more of a sense of self-preservation, Revan. I will not save you again."

Save me?

The white-haired Jedi stood behind the Toydarian's chair, one hand on his shoulder. Tenebrae's Voice's eyes were red and glowing. With a smile, Vima raised her hand and Dar sprung forward again, saber spinning low--

"Will you kill her?" Vima said, still sounding amused. "You seem to have taken her pla--" Vima's voice broke off when her neck cracked. Her body jerked, those ice eyes bulging. Her body went limp. Revan lowered her arm, uncurling her hand, and released the Force that had delivered the killing blow.
Dar froze, and then stumbled back. Her lightsaber--Revan's lightsaber--clicked off. She frowned, as consciousness--and comprehension--seemed to return to her expression. "Oh." She blinked at the body on the floor.

"You tried to kill me." Revan tried to laugh. Her legs felt rubbery, like all the tension had left at once.

"I thought I was trying to kill her." Dar's metal hand extended with the lightsaber, offering it back. "Vima was quite skilled with illusions. I was trying to kill her. Obviously." She raised an eyebrow. "I grew tired of waiting for you to do it."

"Thanks." Revan took it. "Yeah, I..." her voice trailed off. With Vima’s influence gone, the Awakened Ones and the Emperor’s voices seemed redoubled, echoing in her head until her vision blurred. "I know you were--I know you wanted me to." She clipped the saber to her belt again. "I think she wanted me to kill you. Besides, I can’t die anyway, right?"

The joke felt flat.

Dar'Revan reached out and put a hand on her shoulder. An ache Revan hadn’t even noticed faded away. "You can still feel pain." There was a glint of dark humor in her eyes. "I suppose for you it must only seem like a few days since I stabbed you before."

"Yeah, it--" It seemed like a decade. And this seemed... strangely routine. The body at her feet, the thrum of sub-light turbines, cracking jokes to hold back the dark.

An alarm chimed, indicating an incoming comm. "That will be our Admiral Rensha," Dar said, without even pausing to look. She crouched down above Vima's--Atris's--collapsed body, methodically searching the corpse with an efficiency that Revan recognized. "The sleeve," she added, pulling a lightsaber out of the dead woman's robes. "She taught me to conceal mine there."

"I thought I--" the comm chimed again, more insistently. "Thought I thought of that. I did that, too. When I wore robes--when... they made me wear robes." Revan remembered again how natural robes had felt, and still always wrong.

"She told me it’s all a trap." Dar glanced up. "Meetra Surik is her true apprentice."

"Who?" Laughing would be inappropriate. It’s not funny that you just killed the second Vima Sunrider. The woman who fracked with your mind and ruined Davad and Oerin and--

"I’ll answer the comm." Dar stood up, straightening her robes. She paused stiffly. “Thank you for not--for not trying to kill me.”

"You’re not the enemy." Revan looked at her and swallowed. "She was."

Behind Dar’Revan she now saw another figure. Tall--impossibly tall. Thinning hair slicked back to his Force-marked skull. A terrible wound on his cheek, halfway through his jaw. Rimmed by a flickering blue light.

You weren’t the enemy, either, she told him. Malak.

His ruined features smiled. Malachor is safe, Red.

Keep him that way.

A furious blast of High Trandoshan erupted from their comm speaker. Everyone on the ship must have felt something when Vima died and her influence ended. The routes of their fleet blinked before Revan’s eyes—the headset’s visuals and the Force itself showing her the ships still in the system. More than half had vanished into hyperspace—and from her charts—already.

Why the frack are we sending the Republic ships away?

“Admiral Rensha. Yes.” Dar’s voice held that mix of disdain and respect that Revan couldn’t match in a thousand years. Not to mention the flawless Trandoshan accent. Dar launched into an explanation that seemed long on descriptions and examples and short on facts.

“Tell her we need to continue at least to Degriass—” Revan began, even as she tamped down the Force, watching Malak fade and flicker out, and with him, the screams of the Awakened Ones, her link to the Emperor and all of those tiny little lives vanishing—

“Oh ho!” The chuckle came from behind them. Revan turned. The Toydarian. Red-eyed again. “You went away from me, Starfire. And who is this dead on the floor? A would-be assassin?”

“Would-be,” Revan agreed. She kept her shields high as she glared at him. “Don’t suppose in your thousand-plus years of experience you learned anything about how to get rid of a body?”

“You wish to conceal your actions from the insects who serve you?” He shook his head. “Why?”

“C’Tannis, huh?” Revan remembered the shivering Toydarian, now red-eyed and chuckling. “And I know the engine’ll burn up anything, but it’s not good for it.” Jasp had once cut a furious ream at Polla for trying to get rid of a few empty tanks that way.

"We're not flying anywhere on this corvette." Dar's voice was too logical. "So what does it matter if you damage its engines?"

“My two dearest children.” The Toydarian’s voice softened. “Together again! And… oh! With a jar-sukth chamber, too! Wherever did you find the panels? I thought I had them all destroyed!”

“They came with the ship.” Revan bent down and grabbed Atris’s arms. Without drawing on the Force she had to drag the woman’s body along the floor. “Sit tight Vitiate, we’ll deal with you in a moment.”

“One moment.” Dar echoed, mouth curved in a smile; hard and bright as if they’d already won the war. "Check his bonds while I take a sonic."

XXX

A/N next update should be faster, it's about half written… and the chapters beyond that are pretty much all written.

Thanks as always, Ether! Any typos are on me….
Last night I saw the man's face in my dream again. Handsome and screaming, trapped in stasis like a carbonite frieze. I could not see his name or the hand that freed him... only what came after. The droid army, the cult reborn.

I saw his plan to defeat our immortal Emperor, and I saw his final death upon that Yavin moon. So much death! I saw death in the ashes of Ziost, the calamity of his failure.

And I saw Revan. Was it truly her or just a shadow from the past? Was it yesterday or centuries from now? I saw a red-haired woman turn her face away and weep. She wept for the man who was lost. And for what I had told her would come.

Every life is a tragedy, given enough time.

--The Prophecies of Thalia May, Volume I.

[Note: Master Thalia May was one of the founding members of the re-established Enclave on Alderaan, but she did not stay there. After training two padawans, she abandoned the Order, leaving only her prophecies behind: ten journals worth, whose provenance has been questioned for millennia.

This is the first of the so-called 'Revanite Prophecies,' and is typically linked to the Ziost apocalypse of c.3650 BBY.]

--compiled by Archivist Lanna T'so, University of Coruscant.

Thalia May had come to Malachor just in time to leave it. She had come in one of the last transports of former Jedi and Force-sensitives. Plucked from the Coruscanti Underground by a cadre of black-masked sents with trank guns.

Unlike the others in her transport, Thalia had come willingly.

"I dreamed of you," she told the nervous Rodian who came for her--and she had--but that Rodian had dimmed to more of a shadow than a man in her dreams and the shadows were gathering; encroaching upon her visions until only a crack of light remained.

Thalia May had come to Malachor under a cloud of darkness--one that muddled her mind and made all her visions dim. Once, she had seen a vision of a better world, but by the time she came to Malachor all she saw was emptiness. The silent scream in the mind of the one known as Meetra; and an echo of pain in the dark that sang a dirge for the Force.

And he was there. He was that echo, he was in that darkness. Oerin Lin. The only sentient she had ever--or would ever--kill. Fluid leaked from Lin's one remaining eye, the rest of his skin shriveled and broken. Golden hair gone, clothes dissolved to rags, as if the poisoned Force had rent then asunder.
"You look familiar," he had said, when Meetra Surik presented Thalia.

"Sometimes power isn't enough," she whispered back, trying to be strong. In some of her dreams she had said more and he had killed her. In that true introduction, she had whispered the words under her breath and if the dead man heard, he gave no sign. Next to him, Knight Meetra Surik had stood with her arms folded. In that time they were all packing to leave Malachor and Thalia was one of a half-dozen recruits, soon passed off to the white-haired Echani with the kind smile, the taciturn Zabrak with his death-making machines, and the sullen Wookiee.

Surik and Lin's forces were in the skies above Rekkiad when the darkness lifted, when the one known as Traya finally passed (although it would be some time before the facts of the end were known to them). But above Rekkiad when their puppet master finally died, Thalia May saw what the shadows of Darth Traya had hidden.

She saw hope.

She found Surik alone in her quarters. "We have to leave this system," Thalia May told the woman. Surik lifted her ragged head from the table. The tattooed star on her cheek was scratched as if she'd tried to claw it off. Her eyes were wet with tears. "Go away," she hissed, and Thalia May abruptly wanted nothing more than to leave, to please her. For that was Surik's gift—that so many, all of her life, would want nothing but to please her. But Thalia had a gift too, and she had dreamed of a fate where she left Meetra Surik to hers—a fate where inaction brought death to billions—and so she stayed fast, even as her feet trembled and her mind screamed at her to leave, to do as Suirk wanted—whatever Surik wanted.

"I was raised on Ziosk by a sect of priests who believe there is more than one future. I've dreamed of yours, Master Surik."

"I do not dream," the woman replied flatly. Her voice had been as hard as the stones on the moon that Thalia May had seen in a vision.

"I know," Thalia said. "But you will."

Surik wiped her eyes again. "No. There is no future. I thought I was free, but she… my mother was still in my mind. Guiding me! Trapping us—here!"

"I know," Thalia nodded. "But the shadow is gone, now. Her trap is broken."

"Is it?" the woman smiled bitterly. "Have you seen the newsvids? Atris and General Sheris? There is no General Sheris. My mother left Revan to enact her plans… and she must be destroyed."

"No," Thalia said. "Destroying Revan is what your mother wants. She wants you to do it here. You must not."] For Thalia had seen what would come to pass. Seen the moon beneath their feet half-imploded, its atmosphere escaping into a gravity well as it fell out of orbit; victim of the mass shadow generator that would obliterate fleets and ignite a galactic war. The deaths of that war would complete the birth of a monster. If they stayed, the woman before her would become a beast greater than Davad Arkan.

"But I must," Surik muttered. "I thought the trap was set on Malachor. But it was Rekkiad all along. Revan will come to Rekkiad. And we must destroy her." Her eyes were flat and hard, and Thalia felt the pit of Surik's despair, felt it envelop them both as all the light in the room seemed to dim. "I tried to escape my fate on Malachor. But it was Rekkiad all along."

"No." Thalia shook her head. "I dreamed of a better fate. The priests on Ziosk taught me to dream of better fates--"

"You want us to go to Ziost? To run from Revan's forces?" Meetra Surik raised her eyes.

"Not Ziost. Merely Degriass--for now." Thalia forced herself to smile calmly, even as the Force surged with Surik's will--a deafening emptiness beyond despair. "Revan's battle isn't our fight."

"Battle is all I know," said the woman from Balmorra.

"Until now." Thalia squeezed her hand. "But I've seen your peace."

"Why Degriass?" Surik pulled up the map of the system: the asteroid belts, the lone planet and its habitable satellites. "Revan will go there, too, if she is bound for Rekkiad. Should we destroy her there?"

"No." Thalia took a deep breath. In one dream she had seen the woman cut her down laughing, lights of madness flickering in her eyes.

"Why not?" Meetra Surik blinked as something like sanity returned to her expression.

"We must save them." Thalia could not see their faces--not yet. The future still shifted, fate twisting its gears. "There will be survivors in the Degriass System. They will need our help."

Meetra Surik laughed. "Are you saying Revan will need my help?"

"Not her." Thalia could not see their faces, but she could see the betrayal--the outline in the dark, the clasped hands, the cracked altar. "Others. Some of them will be our padawans."

And some would not. There were always some who could not be saved. Strangely, she thought of Lydie Korr, again. I hope it's not you, Lydie. She would see Lydie again. But Thalia did not know where. I hope it's not on Degriass, Lydie. For in hope, Thalia also saw grief. Enough to drown an ocean.

"Padawans?" Surik scoffed. "Like my Blades?"

"Padawans," Thalia repeated. "They will all be your padawans, Master."

"Master?" Surik put her hand to her own throat. "I never wanted padawans. Mother made me call to them. Mother made me want them… made me want to be a master." Her fingers crept to the star on her cheek again, and she began picking the scab.

"I never wanted to see the future," Thalia told her. "But I do."

"And you said you dreamed this…." Surik frowned. "You dreamed this after Mother was dead?"

"Yes. Darth Traya wanted an end to the Force, to the Emperor and all his works. She wanted an end to Jedi. And Sith." Thalia's throat felt dry. "I've seen what happens if the Force dies, Master. Everything else does, too. Everything. Even the stars."

Meetra Surik blinked. "I don't want that."

"I know."

On the flickering light, on a dying ship, Thalia saw the promise of what the woman would become. Not a weapon, but a beacon. A welcome in the Force, to bring all Jedi home. "You will know much more than blood," Thalia promised. "You will know peace, Master Surik. I've dreamed it."
The woman blinked again. "Peace," she echoed, and Thalia felt peaceful. The relief, the release. "I would like peace."

"Then we shall have it," Thalia promised. "Master Jedi. But first we must go to Degriass."

Xxx

Rear Admiral Cein: We were following orders when we split the fleet! High Admiral Rensha’s orders.

Judge Advocate Qwill: You claimed earlier you knew Rensha’s command was compromised. And Article Six-cye of the Military Command gives you discretion to ignore a direct order from a compromised officer.

Rear Admiral Cein: Maybe so, but we didn’t need Six-cye before the Mandalorian Wars. We didn’t have Jedi messing with Fleet command before that Sunrider girl, and then Revan and Malak--

Judge Advocate Qwill: Need I remind the Admiral he is not on trial here? This inquiry is adjourned to investigate Carth Onasi and his actions at the end of the Machine Wars.

--Fleet Judge Advocate Inquiry into the Actions of Carth Onasi at the End of the Machine Wars, as a Precursor to His Court-Martial

--compiled by Archivist Lanna T’so, University of Coruscant.

Xxx

There was an old saying in the Chiss Ascendancy: "an ice-cat rots from the head." Something had been rotting on the Great Hunt-- evident from the glazed, almost drugged orders issuing from Old Scaly--for weeks.

"It's like we're under some kind of compulsion," Rew Ekkumi had whispered on their private channel. "I don't know how else to describe it. You know how much I despise that woman, but I can't stop myself from doing everything she says--"

“We have to follow orders,” Admiral Denis Cein had agreed. In the military there were two states of activity: one was either issuing or acting upon orders. The kernel of suspicion had bloomed in his chest, then; and even Jiya Sand, who had retained more respect for Revan than either of his co-conspirators, had agreed that something was wrong.

Something was wrong… and yet, Revan’s orders kept them winning unwinnable battles. The woman they publicly called ‘General Sheris’ had saved billions. Even in this last fight she had somehow pulled the enemy back from Corellia to another rout on Malastare before the Machine Ships fled.

“Get off that ship,” Denis had advised Rew when the new coded orders came, flagged only for top command. The orders that split the Republic Fleet from their new allies. It felt like a veil was lifting from his eyes. Too many coincidences. Malachor V. The arrival of the other Revan. They had one of those Emperor-possessed puppets on his ship as well: a drooling former Imperial officer pulled from Kessel, a man who had been captured long ago. The man had been drooling a lot less recently--and chuckling softly to himself a lot more. Denis did not trust the Emperor’s ‘Voice,’ as he was called. A revelation, in the last few hours—that he felt like he could make that choice not to trust the Emperor’s pawn. To remove him from the bridge and lock him in the brig where he belonged.
A veil was lifting. In the Ascendency they called the state of being that led to cessation of doubt is’lok’chee. As a son of an Exiled, Denis had never worshipped the Chiss Aristocra as his mother had, had never understood the moment of is’lok’chee that forced her to flee her own lands.

But he did now.

"Any sign of Rew?" General Jiya Sand came up behind him, staring out at the same display. Their headsets gave them a holographic view of all ships returning to their sectors in the Malastare System, as the Fleet began lining up for jumps to hyperspace. Rensha was up to her old tricks again, it seemed; ordering retreats to leave their allies twisting in the wind as she had with the Jedi on Katarr.

As we did to the Jedi on Katarr. Denis could not absolve himself from the decision. But now, Rensha had Revan with her. Two Revans with her, according to Rew, and her orders for officers had been surprisingly direct. Operation Scattershot. Recommended routes as follows. Use your own discretion, but do not follow the Mandalorian and Imperial Fleets to Degriass.

"Rew should be here by now." Jiya made a show of checking his chron, although he saw the same visual trajectories that Denis did. The shuttle had left the Great Hunt at clipping speed, its arc angling past the cluster of Republic ships, heading toward the gamma of their sector before blipping out of range.

Heading toward the Imperial flagship, Carth’s Captive Arm.

"Rew's not coming. Not to us." Denis wondered if Rew saw herself as Saul Karath defecting to the Sith; if this could be a coup instead of a baited trap. The last time Revan had held back forces she'd used them as her invading vanguard less than a year later. If this was another Malachor--

If this was a similar attempt they needed their fleet. Republic ships still vastly outnumbered the Imperial and Mandalorian forces. Rensha's orders scattered the Republic ships across Sith space like an occupying force, rerouting central command to the Core, leaving the Hunt to go forward alone with their former enemies.

The defensive pattern had to be deliberate.

We're still following orders, Denis mused. Following them because they make sense. Rew may be following orders as well--or she may be following something worse. Loyalty, as he had learned long ago when his parents’ Chiss House had been excised for having it, was even more pernicious than duty--and also more fallible.

"Is Rew defecting?" Jiya sounded surprised. "To the Sith?"

"Not to the Sith." Denis knew Rew well enough as a lover and as a tactician. "She's gone to warn Onasi that the route to Malachor is a trap."

Jiya frowned. "You mean Revan sent Rew to warn Carth. Like with Karath. And this is a defection--Revan's taking off with the Sith and Mandalorian fleets--"

"Maybe...." Denis wasn't convinced. Revan had sacrificed her allies before.

"What are you going to do?" Jiya looked as if the matter was still open to debate.

Denis knew better. Trap or not, there was only one action that made sense. "Jump," he told the helmsmen. "Put the settings in for Corellia, and then route us to Coruscant--" Use your discretion, the orders had read. He would.

XXX

Rumors of Revan’s living relatives were legion in the decades following the Machine Wars, especially when the sealed Lamar vault was opened by the Senate Audits during the Hothan Investigations, and rumors of fantastical wealth stowed within began to circulate. Little is known of Radik Lamar, Revan’s purported father; but his brother, Master Vrook Lamar was a Jedi who died a hero’s death. Was Vrook’s example an inspiration for his niece? So little is known about the man, as all contemporary records of him were wiped during the Surik Restructuring.

The legend of Hoth Lamar, however, is worthy of its own lecture. Was she, as she sometimes said, the apostate daughter of Revan Starfire? Or a grandchild of Master Vrook Lamar as she once claimed on a university application? The last will and testament of a Deeka Jin was witnessed by ‘Baroness Hoth of Rivesh,’ and references leaving the contents and landlease of a Coruscanti Underground Brothel to a “’Mekelkins Lamar,’ if he can be yet found alive…” but the property was never claimed and the proceeds of the auction were donated to the Telos Restoration instead. Was ’Mekelkins Lamar’ a relative of Vrook Lamar? So little is known about Revan’s allies and friends that some suspect a conspiracy to erase the information from the Galactic Record….

--Excerpt from "An Historian's Introduction to the Machine Wars: Lecture by Kree Usam Racharn for the Revan: Fact or Fiction Symposium, SHWL," University of Coruscant Press. 3653 BBY

--compiled by Archivist Lanna T’so.

XXX

“Um, hi.” Standing in the doorway, Mekel cleared his throat. “Is now a… uh, a good time?”

The Zabrak looked up from his game of solitaire ryst. His eyes were already glowing. “Of course! My dear boy! I called you, didn’t I?”

“I-I thought you did. I…” He’d thought he felt something. More of a hunch than anything else that had made him stammer excuses to Milli after their run and then come up to Tuy Deck through the service tunnels to dodge any awkward questions. “They locked you in again. I told them to stop doing that.”

“Mandalorians don’t do what you say.” The Emperor chuckled. “Not yet.”

They were just supposed to assign guards to Zepth during Mekel’s combat shifts—not lock the Emperor alone in a room. “I have… an hour or so.” Mekel still wanted to see Millifar, then grab a sonic before hitting up Mydia. He rubbed his eyes trying to blink the sleep out of them.

“So little time? It will be days before our next battle.”

“Days? We get new orders or something?” The service tunnels didn’t have working speakers. If there had been a shipwide blast, Mekel had missed it.

“Yes. We’re taking a route through conventional hyperspace. Degriass to Rekkiad, and then to the Malachor System.” Another dark chuckle. “I’d imagine it’s some kind of trap for our enemies.”

“Why would the Machine Ships go that way?”

“Because she is luring them in.” Valkorion stood up and began unlacing his shirt. “Clever Starfire. Between us, we’ve maddened them to a point beyond reason.” That ancient smile stretched thin over Zepth's handsome face. "They'll follow her to their own doom, my boy."

"You know, this fight was different. They weren’t hitting back for half of it. Is… uh, 'General Sheris' doing something new?" Good old cousin Revan. Still hadn’t bothered to admit that Mekel fracking existed, but hey. If that meant they lived through this, he’d deal. He didn’t need her. He missed the other Revan, but she’d gone and frozen herself without saying good-bye. Mekel unzipped his flight suit and kicked off his boots.

Valkorion turned Zepth’s head toward the door. His eyes glowed a little more brightly as the locks slid shut. "Yes," he purred. "This fight was different. Because of her... but I like to think we did our part, too. She needs us, you know."

"So you keep saying, my Lord." Without asking, Mekel went to the trunk and pulled out the tent cover he’d snagged from storage, unrolled it onto the floor. The runes they’d drawn were a little scuffed from use, dried blood flaking in places.

Valkorion stepped out of his pants. Objectively, Mekel had to admit, Zepth’s body was a work of art. Lydie’s brother is as hot as she is, he’d thought the first time he’d seen that rack. If things weren’t… well, if it had just been Zepth in there, he might’ve felt something besides hope as he lay down on top of the runes. The air around them seemed to tighten as the Zabrak knelt behind Mekel’s head, placed hands on each side of Mekel’s skull, leaning over so that all Mekel could see was that muscled chest, curving to those rock-hard abs. At first when they’d touched like this he hadn’t felt anything, but now--

Now, the Force-runes the Emperor had etched on Mekel’s body lit up like a holo-sign in the Unders, matching the ones on Zepth’s skin.

Milli had thought they were tattoos. Mydia had never remarked on them at all. They looked like thin black lines under his chest hair, normally. But when His Luminance touched Mekel, they glowed. The Emperor had traced them with a finger dipped in Zepth’s own blood. Chanted things about death and rebirth and galaxies aligning in Ancient Sith for so long that Mekel had dozed off. Woke up with these cross-hatches all across his chest.

Before that happened, maybe Mekel had thought this was all some kind of elaborate seduction scene. Maybe Mekel had even pictured himself later, bragging to Telos. “I shagged the Sith Emperor.” Something had to impress that asshole.

But now…

Now Mekel didn't care what Dustil would think. Because the Force was coming back. When His Luminance touched him, Mekel felt everything in the galaxy.

“It’s… ah! It’s working.” His tongue felt thick in his mouth, and Mekel’s eyes closed as the delicious languor enveloped him. In his mind’s eye, he was a line of pure energy and the Emperor was a cup, catching him as he fell, spreading him out across the stars.

Telos, he thought, sleepily. Just a line of pure light, and the other rose up to meet him, in the cup--

They curled together like petals, like lovers, head-to-toe and toe-to-head. The Force enveloped Mekel's emptiness, feeding it, amplifying the Force itself like an echo deep inside of him, the beginnings of a scream--

“Oh, my dear boy.” A dark chuckle, as Mekel drifted off. “It most certainly is working. Such power--I never anticipated! You might last years! Time enough to find another--or for Starfire to come to her senses!"

Telos, Mekel thought, as the darkness filled him up.

XXX

Lord Bezal was a minor Thulian nobleman whose ambition outstripped his power. When currying favor with the Dark Council failed to grant the influence he desired, he turned to Sith mysticism, and a sect of priests who swore they had discovered the key to Force transference hidden in a vault upon a dead planet. The planet is now known as Nathema, but any follower of Our Luminance knows it was once called Medriass, and is the place where a bastard child named Vitiate became Tenebrae, our Lord. The Bezal bond is but a shallow imitation of Lord Tenebrae's ritual, but some have surmised that at its heart, the mechanism for both is the same….

'On Force Bonds,' by Lord Zash, for her Apprentice P'ink Kallig, private collection, Dromund Kaas.

--compiled by Archivist Lanna T'so.

XXX

Dustil was supposed to go to the bridge to see Canderous Ordo; but Sinae and Dessa said they wanted to see Aemelie Ordo first, and so they left him on his own. He sat and watched the kids drifting in their fake womb for a while. Something about the way they floated made him feel peaceful, like he could imagine floating just like that, all safe and secure. The larger baby had a fuzz of what looked like green hair on his head. The smaller one was totally bald, but her eyes kept opening when she drifted by his cot, that little hand starfishing out.

He closed his eyes, leaning back in his chair, felt his own hand open and close back.

Mekk, he thought. No anger, he was too fracking tired for that now--

Telos.

Like a handclasp. Like a bar of pure light.

Missed you, fockda, one of them said.

XXX

A Clan Battle Circle can be drawn anywhere, but battles fought in stars are considered unlucky for both the challenged and the challenger--and are usually avoided. But the blood duel for the title of Mand'alor can be fought anywhere at all, by any clan member who claims they can do better.

Most are wrong.

"Mandalorian Aphorisms for Everyday Seasons," undated,

--compiled by Archivist Lanna T'so.

XXX

The Aleema had barely jumped to hyperspace before the dagger landed, precisely a centimeter from Canderous's ear, suspended in the padded mirror of their private fresher.

Canderous pulled the chistaga out, flipping the point tip on the palm of his hand. "A formal challenge, Aemelie? Is this necessary?"

His wife's reflection behind him shook her head. But the patterns in her braids said otherwise. "We will see. Dustil Onasi is the Imperial pilot in our med-bay. I think you will want to witness his interrogation."

"Of course." Whatever the kid knew about Revan being out of carbonite, he'd probably already blabbed in medix. Canderous wanted to think he was wrong--that there'd been some other reason that Emperor had sounded exactly like her… but he knew better. Just like he knew Aemelie too well to think that she'd ever back down, once she'd thrown the blade. It had been hard enough convincing her to follow the other one and the Emperor's orders. Now…. "You will witness as well?"

His wife's eyes narrowed. "I will question him."

"You have that right."

"Of course I do. I am the wife of Mand'alor," she replied sweetly. "For now."

"For now," Canderous nodded. The ceremonial blade in his hand felt as heavy as permacrete. Osik, he thought. "For now, I am Mand'alor."

Xxx

Although Sheris Loran and Revan Starfire were trained at the same Jedi Enclaves, there is little evidence that they were ever more than passing acquaintances. Documented evidence of friendship between Sheris and Meetra Surik, and Sheris and Bastila Shan exists, but there is no other social overlap.

Therefore, we must surmise that it was in her time as Malak's consort that Sheris learned the tactics used in the Machine Wars, for they follow Revan's distinctive patterns of engagement even before her entry into the fight. Indeed, it is only in the final [redacted redacted] that we see the pattern of bait and sacrifice broken--and even then, the claims of Mandalorian heroics are questionable at best.…

--Excerpt from "An Historian's Introduction to the Machine Wars: Lecture by Kree Usam Racharn for the Revan: Fact or Fiction Symposium, SHWL," University of Coruscant Press. 3653 BBY

--compiled by Archivist Lanna T'so.

Xxx

"We must present a united front….” Dar was talking as they walked. Seemed like she was always talking--whatever she'd said to Rensha over the comm had worked so well she’d gotten them an escort of armed guards back to the High Admiral's personal command room.

"Right." Revan rubbed her eyes. "United. Got it."

Dar was talking to Revan, but her words cut in and out, fading into screams and images from three hundred Awakened eyes. The Sleepers showed Revan a blue-white sun, with a single, glimmering planet beneath; ringed in rims of orbitals and byways that bisected coils of a billion lights, like tiny smiles.

[Coordinates 0,0,0. Strike y/n. Y.]
No! Coruscant that's Coruscant--

And then Revan was--

--Curling a flippered hand to a Senator's child--

--Patting the belly of a gravid Zabrak--

--Soaring towards a puffy silver orbital, with her cannon focusing on the transparisteel window and the horrified sentient within--

Yes. You see as they do. Valkorion's dark chuckle was there too, crowding her thoughts. The Emperor, the ships--too many of them crowding her. Now I see as you do. Bring them to us so we can destroy them--

I'm going to destroy all of you. Hey! Assholes! Revan felt them turn--felt them all flicker out of orbit again as she put one foot in front of the other--

Oh, my Starfire, you can no more destroy me than you cut off your own arm. We are together, now. Our unification is nearly complete.

No. No! I'll never join y--

"Fragment? Revan!" Something shook her arm and the ephemeral world snapped back. Weight of her body, breath in her lungs. Blood on her lips. Revan glanced down at the golden hand clutching her wrist. She looked up into green eyes, freckles faded with the pallor of her duplicate's skin. Dark shadows under those eyes. Pale lips, the angles of the face too sharp, too drawn. Dar's face was too close, hair still damp from the sonic, cropped and standing up from her skull.

"You're glowing," the other woman observed.

Revan blinked. "I'm fine." She quickened their pace, attempting to pull away

"What just happened?" The other woman's metal hand had clamped down like a tractor. Revan jerked her hand back, but she was secretly grateful for the support.

"I… I was at Coruscant. With the Sleepers."

Dar's lips tightened so much they turned white. "They're attacking Coruscant?"

"No, I called them back before they could." One of them had switched to Rakatan to have privacy from the guards, who were too well-trained to admit they were listening in the first place. It was probably Dar, but Revan had to admit it was smart. "They're going to go someplace else next. They don't stay in hyperspace."

"Here." Dar handed her a sani-wipe and Revan wiped her bloody nose. "But you can control them?" More a command than a question. "Just keep calling to them."

"I know." I told you. There seemed to be a respite while the ships tunneled through hyperspace. Revan supposed she should thank a lucky star that the Awakened Ones didn't have interdictor tech, or they'd pull the Hunt to them instead of following it. "I'm going to have to keep calling them back for the next few days…." Revan wiped her face again. Her temples throbbed, but strangely, nothing hurt.

"Our forces are exhausted. A few days in hyperspace will give them time to rest and make repairs."

"Our forces are exhausted. A few days in hyperspace will give them time to rest and make repairs."
Dar sounded exhausted herself. "The ships will always run. We need to draw them to us to make an end."

"Tell me something I don’t know. Like how to keep Rensha from executing us.”

Dar snorted. "Old Scaly is far too practical to have us killed." She paused, mouth twisting in a bitter smile. "At least until her war is won."

"Make an end? " Malak's ghostly voice intruded on Revan's thoughts. "That’s what you said about Malachor V." He sounded almost amused.

"Still true, Mal," Dar snapped. Her hand tightened on Revan’s arm.

"You heard--?" Revan's skin prickled.

Her duplicate nodded back, eyes darting over their shoulders. Revan's own head turned and she smothered a gasp, turning it into a cough and hiding her expression with the stained sani-wipe.

Malak's ghostly image hovered, almost tripping on their heels: hair slicked back, Knight's robes. His gaze met Revan's and his mouth quirked in a smile. "Hello, Red."

"He thinks he can give you some of his strength. If you need it." Dar sounded calm about that, as if the two of them had been hatching their scheme while Revan had been busy hallucinating the Emperor and his Sleepers. "He does it for me when he's not busy with Malachor."

"Oh? Does he?" Revan wasn't sure what she thought about that. Or why she could see him now outside of her dreams. “And where the frack is Korrie?"

"Safe," the dead man whispered. "I suppose my wife and I have given you precious few reasons to trust us in the past, but now you see we are all on the same side--"

That was so accurate that Revan started laughing, which caused the phalanx of guards surrounding them to get twitchy--twitchier than she liked to see the armed guards around her. For their own sakes.

"Relax," she said in Basic. "Bossypants here was just telling a joke. I'd share, but it doesn't translate well."

"You and your japes." Malak almost sounded affectionate.

Revan shivered--and not just because the world was suddenly rimmed in blue as Malak’s ghost passed between them. She found herself edging away toward the wall and the guard walking next to her, as if a Force ghost needed room. The guard sidestepped the wall until he was almost scraping it.

"Where is our son, Mal?" Dar asked, in Rakatan.

"Safe," Malak sounded calm, and now his voice seemed to echo instead of rattling in Revan's mind. "Safer than he has been since they left Deralia. I've found him new caretakers."

"Bet you're a great judge of character." The snipe was automatic. Revan didn't like this, this trusting either of them. She didn't like how… safe it felt, either. How familiar.

"Malachor is safe," the dead man said again. "You would approve of his chaperones, I believe."

"But you're not going to tell us who they are or where he is?" Trust, Malak had said. Was it wrong that Revan remembered the way he'd looked as the light faded out of his eyes?

"Malak doesn't want the Emperor to know." Dar squeezed Revan's hand with her metal one. They were holding hands now, walking along the hall like this was some kind of Harvest Fracking Dance. "So he can't tell you."

Malak said nothing, which might have been a confirmation.

“He’s not telling you, either,” Revan pointed out, just as the roar of the Sleepers began again, their ships appearing above another world--

{{Coordinates 0.392921, 1910000091. Y/N?}}

No!

Xxx

You are cordially invited to the formal union of House Racharn with the last custodian of House D'Reev, an act that will cede all D'Reev holdings formerly held under trust to Racharn ownership.

Leeshansintina Two of House Racharn to wed Malachor Vrook Cassus Ulic Lin.

Silver tie is required.

Weapons permitted. (Mando'ade only.) [Handwritten scrawl, IF YOU MUST, M! BUT PLZ! LEESHY’S ALREADY NERVOUS!]

Holocams will be disintegrated.

In lieu of gifts, the couple has requested donations be made to the Taris Restoration Project.

Master Neely Ahto of the New Jedi Order, Officiant.

Grass Priest Dikon T'siop, Blessant.

Senator’s Songs to be performed by HK-48 Electroharp Chorale And Friends

--wedding invitation from the Old Republic. Organa Collection, Alderaan.

--compiled by Archivist Lanna T'so.

Xxx

The twins were talking to someone named Lena over their commlink on the other side of the room while Kore tried not to fall asleep over his second nerf steak.

“Sightings have been reported all over the galaxy!” the perky news announcer chirped. He was Nautolan and wearing a shiny, armless vest with gold rings all over his tentacles. Kore thought it looked like it would have hurt, getting holes in your tentacles like that. “The following worlds have activated their defense grids in response to Machine Ship incursions: Coruscant, Alderaan, Corellia, Byss, Hoth, Dathomir, Wayland, Wyddik, Ord Mantell....”

"I've never seen anything like this," another announcer broke in. This one was Human--or mostly. "They're appearing and disappearing! Why aren't they attacking?"
Kore glanced at the window and the sky above. After staying with Atton in the lower levels for so long, it felt funny to have so much sky exposed. He wasn't sure if he liked it.

"You can't bring him here," someone named Lena was saying over her comm-link. "And taking him to Emfour is out of the question! Revan's son? What were you thinking?"

"Was thinkin the kid needed our help!" See'raa explained, while Tee'raa snapped her lekku. Kore caught the word for 'friend.' "We'd take him to Kashyyyk, but half the planet's still toxic and Freyrr's really pissed off about it. "Come on, Lena. He's a nice kid!"

"I am," Kore said, but no one was looking at him. He felt funny. Like months ago, he might have cried to be here, but now he just felt normal. "I'm nice."

"He's her son."

"And she was our friend." See'raa rolled her eyes at the other one. "You don't have to get it, Lena, but us having Revan's kid is a big advantage right now."

"I'm not an advantage. I'm me!" Kore muttered, but under his breath so they couldn't hear. They probably didn't realize he could hear them from all the way across the room… but sometimes the Force could be pretty cool.

"You're both adults." Lena sure didn't sound like she thought the twins were adults. "If you want to keep the child of the woman who murdered you as some kind of pet--"

"I'm not a pet." Kore kept his eyes focused on the newsvid screen and all the reports of ships popping up over the galaxy. It kept his eyes dry.

"Wasn't really us, you know?" See'raa laughed, which Kore thought was a little cold. "If Mission Prime had lived we wouldn't be here--"

"Hey!" Kore was getting sick of hiding and having everyone boss him around so he started yelling. "Stop talking about me like I'm not here!" His eyes felt hot and funny. "Just so you know, I have a very powerful friend on Coruscant and she said I could come stay with her anytime I wanted, so…” he felt his voice crack like it kept doing lately. "So I'm gonna go do that. I'm gonna stay with her. Her name's Leeshy. Of House Racharn and they're a really big deal. I can go to her right now if I want. I don't need anything from you!"

Tee'raa's lekku twitched. It looked like she signed 'but we help,' except just as her t'chun finished the last loop the prox alarms started flashing.

"--and the Nar System seems to be the latest sighting," the newsvid lady said. "Reports indicate over two hundred Machine Ships ships have appeared above Nal Hutta and the Smuggler's Moon--"

"Damnit! Take the skyhook to the fortified station," said Lena's voice. "I'm coming for you."

"The boy too." See'raa said. She was stubborn all right.

"The boy, too." Lena-someone sounded too worried to argue. The comm cut out.

Kore shivered. "They're mad." It suddenly felt like a cold wall of angry ice was pressing down on him from the ceiling.
“Who’s mad?” See’raa frowned as she walked back over to him. “Lena? Don’t be silly, her grip’s worse than her bite. She even had her incisors filed down!”

“Not Lena. The ships.” Kore shivered again. It was even worse than that because some of them kind of felt like Mother in the Force, even though that sounded nuts. “They want to bomb us so badly.”

“The Awakened Ones.” See’raa looked at her sister. “I knew they’d come back. It's in their programming.”

"Why?" Kore asked.

Tee'raa's lekku twitched. Complicated, she began, but then Father was there too, suddenly, all glowing and surrounding Kore. You don’t have to be afraid of the Sleepers, he whispered in Kore’s head. She's going to call them away, Mal, Father promised. Revan’s calling them away now--

“--and they’re gone! Just like that! I’ve never seen anything like it!” The announcer was yelling now, even though he had a microphone and stuff. He sounded hysterical. “Are we sure they’re not cloaked--”

“They’re not cloaked,” Kore told See’raa and Tee’raa. “They’ve gone someplace else. They have to do what my mother says.”

Tee’raa’s hands moved and her sister frowned, shaking her head. Kore caught the word for ‘late’

“Are you sure, Kore?” See’raa asked. “Revan controls them? Already?”

“My father says so.” Kore looked up for confirmation, but Father was gone again, like maybe Mother had needed him, too.

"Your father…" See'raa laughed nervously. "Your father the ghost. No offense, kid, but he was an asshole."

"Okay. But he's sorry," Kore told her, because that was the diplomatic thing to say.

Xxx

Revan was a master strategist who also understood that resources must be conserved. What is most remarkable about the last battles of the Machine Wars is that he was able to use the Force to predict precisely the number of ships required to destroy the enemy, while sending the rest to safety.

--compiled by Archivist Lanna T'so.

Xxx

Carth watched the shuttle dock impatiently, noting on his headset's display that the last of the Republic ships had just jumped to hyperspace. The message Rew sent requesting to board had been terse enough that he found it hard to interpret, but he had to assume the message came from Revan.

Makes sense that Revan would go to the Hunt first. But they couldn't keep his wife away from him. She would be on this shuttle, he'd bet a million credits--
Rew Ekkumi emerged from the shuttle's apexed doorway, followed by a pilot who was male, Aqualish, and not Carth's wife--not even Polla Organa, who he'd sent to fetch Revan on Kaas, or Zaalbar, who'd come with them from Kaas.

Then Revan must be in the back running a systems check, she'll be along, maybe she's--

The shuttle doors swung down, closing behind the two uniformed figures, and Carth's heart sank.

Great Hunt made the jump already. She's not coming. She's staying on Rensha's ship--

"Carth." The strain in Rew's voice was evident. Usually immaculate, his old friend looked as tired right now as Carth felt.

"Hi. Rew, uh--you're cutting it fine. Fleet’s already gone and half the Mandalorian ships are gone, too"

"Heading to Degriass. Then Rekkiad. Then the Malachor System." Rew nodded. "I know." She reached out and her hand on his arm. "Carth. Don't go. It's a trap."

"What?"

"The jump points--we're always given maps of the systems to distribute to the squads. The maps are of Degriass, Rekkiad, and Malachor, but the jump points given to command aren't. Rensha's scattering Fleet all over the Core. Real commands say we’re supposed to refuel. Restock. Patrol Core space like the war's already won."

"You’re wrong. I checked the coordinates myself--" his voice faltered because then Carth got what she meant. "You mean the Republic ships aren't going to Malachor… but the rest of us are?"

"According to the nav-logs, the Great Hunt's going with the Mandalorians, but the rest of Fleet's been reassigned to patrol the Core and occupy Imperial space." Her lips twisted. "Draw your own conclusions."

"I don't understand." But that was a lie. Malachor. Malachor V. The name itself was the clue. Obvious as a tactical strike from a proton cannon. "You're saying--what's going to happen at Malachor?" Revan wouldn't--was Rew suggesting Carth's wife would lead the allies into a trap?

“Battle orders came in after Revan's arrival.” Rew’s voice was steady. “The real Revan. Your wife. Those are her orders."

“But--"

"You can't go to Malachor, Carth." Rew Ekkumi looked half-feverish. "Trust me. I wouldn't say it if it wasn't important."

“You expect me to believe that you came here to save the Imperial Fleet--”

“No. I came here to save you." Rew gave him a pained smile. "I left half my own people on the Hunt. Denis and Jiya were expecting me to join them on the Proven Conquest, but I came here." She looked back at the shuttle. “If I thought I had half a chance of convincing you, I’d tell you it’s only ten yards back to my shuttle. It's got hyperdrive. We could rendezvous with Denis and Jiya above Corellia, or go make a formal report at Fleet HQ."

"Rew, I-I don't--I can’t leave my crew."
Her eyes shifted away, past him, staring out at the half-empty hanger, the techs bolting everything down to prep for their jump. "I know that. Of course you can’t. But Carth. Revan… uh, she told me… she told me to tell you not to go."

"But she told me to go."

"On an open channel?" Rew smiled tightly, not quite meeting his eyes. "You believed her?"

"No. Not over wideband. The Emperor’s Voice--"

Rew looked at him pityingly. "Who are you going to believe? The Sith Emperor? Or me?"

"But she--Revan spoke through the Emperor--" Rew was looking at him now like Carth was nuts. "I don’t understand. You’re saying Revan gave you orders to tell me to hold back? Secret orders?"

"She… she told me to tell you… where that Sith Emperor can’t hear." Rew’s voice lowered. "It’s like Malachor, Carth. Like Malachor again. Another trap. And she wants you to be safe. She wants you out of it."

Another trap. "No." Rew’s eyes kept flickering away, then meeting his directly. Too directly--looking like the day she’d told him Morgana might pull through. "My wife… she wouldn’t send you to tell me that." Carth swallowed. "Let’s ask her. Right now."

"She won’t tell you over wideband--"

"She won’t need wideband." A pit opened in Carth’s stomach as he nodded to his guards. Imperial-trained to expect betrayal, they flanked Rew immediately. “Revan can speak through the Emperor’s Voices, Rew. Just like he can."

“Just like the Sith Emperor?” Her dark eyes widened and there was something more in them. Guilt? Fear? Her lovely mouth twisted into something ugly. “Oh, Carth. Don’t you see what that means? Revan’s just like the Sith Emperor--”

"Escort Admiral Ekkumi to the bridge," Carth said to Lieutenant Arezmo. “Armed escort.”

But doubt gnawed at him. He knew… he knew Rew had to be lying--and yet--Malachor? They were going to Malachor? Without the Republic Fleet? It had to be a trap. That Jedi. Atris. Dustil said she was something else--someone really powerful. What if Atris had done something to Carth’s wife? "Tell Yuthura and Dustil to join us there--is my son’s squad back yet?"

Usually Dustil checked in, but he had to be fine, Yuthura would have said something if Dustil wasn’t fine--

"I’ll check, sir." His first lieutenant bowed. “As soon as we deliver your ally--”

“My prisoner,” Carth said, using Ancient Sith. Rew didn’t look like she got it, but she would. “See her to the bridge. Restraints only. Passive ones. No electro-nets. Don’t hurt her.” His eyes flickered to the Republic shuttle pilot, still standing at attention, mask-faced. “And see her man has a comfortable cell.”

Revan’s just like the Sith Emperor, Rew had said. And it was true if she could possess his Voices, use them like he could--

No. Carth closed his eyes. Revan was nothing like the Emperor. That couldn’t be true.
The Machine Wars left their legacy across the galaxy with a series of instantaneous hyperlanes, some still in use even to this day. With a net positive for commerce, expansion, and colonization, many scholars have disregarded precisely how terrifying it must have been for the sentients of the time to see three hundred warships appear above Coruscant, Ord Mantell, Alderaan, Nar Shaddaa—and a hundred more populated worlds, some of which had already been bombed by the same ships less than a Standard month before.

The Machine Ships inflicted no casualties—and flickered back into hyperspace moments after their arrival. Such a display would have seemed miraculous... and when the bringer of that miracle became known—one begins to see how the legend of Talonis Revan, the Savior of the Galaxy came into being....

--Transcript of speech given by Senator Loriom Racharn of Coruscant. Galactic Republic, in the year 1 ASC (3653 BBY)

---compiled by Archivist Lanna T'so.

XXX

After one of the Revans had growled more excuses over their comm, High Admiral Aridoma Rensha's talons had hovered over the control that would vent the Officer's Hangar Bay, and send the cursed Jedi ship out into the black and in range of the Great Hunt's cannon. The moment the mind-net broke, Aridoma Rensha had known she had been under the spell of Jedi tricks. It was as if the cloud of night had lifted, exposing the birthing beach to dawn, with all the larvae scurrying for the safety of the waves and the sea.

The revelation still filled her with fury. Had she not warned the Senate and the Fleet what Jedi could do? Had she not made the hard choice at Katarr to stop the Jedi threat? After hearing Revan's stammered excuses over the comm-link, Rensha's talons gripped the control, and, with a clarity of thought Rensha knew had been stolen before, considered her courses of action.

The Jedi had betrayed her trust.

The Jedi were the best weapon she had against the Machine Ships.

The woman with Revan's memories--the one they called "Sheris"--had been responsible for some of Rensha's greatest triumphs. For her meteoritic rise in Fleet command. She had also betrayed them and cost the Republic most of its fleet.

The woman with Revan's Force-strength had shattered Darth Malak's reign of terror--even if unwittingly. She now possessed some kind of control over the Machine Ships.

All Humans looked alike, but the two Revans even more so as they approached her now: feet a little apart, arms clasped behind their backs, as if this was a Jedi conclave instead of a war meeting.

"Where is Master Atris?" Rensha demanded. "I requested the guards bring all three of you."

"She's gone," the red-haired one lied badly, just as the brown-haired one said "dead."

"Dead and gone," Brown-hair amended. "Atris was a secret Sith. She was manipulating you all."

Red-hair opened her mouth as if to object--but then merely nodded, instead. "She's right."
"Who killed her?"

"I did." Brown-hair met Rensha's eyes squarely. "Because she was manipulating you all."

The two of them continued to answer Rensha's demands with that same steady back-and-forth, making it all seem so reasonable that Rensha would have wondered if this was just another mind trick, had she not just seen their enemy's ships frozen in space and watched the allies destroy half again as many enemy capitals in a single battle as they had in the last week. Curse them a thousand generations for their tricks, but these two Jedi were useful—unlike the waste of elderlings and children at Katarr.

"You expect me to believe Atris was the traitor… and you two…." The two Revans were well aware of their crimes, but Rensha listed them all the same. Red-hair had destroyed most of the Republic ships at Malachor, then plunged the galaxy into civil war. Brown-hair had attempted to wrest control of the Star Forge from Malak and killed the only useful Jedi there—if accounts were to be believed. "Why should I trust you now?" she concluded, feeling the spittle well in her gland sacs.

Brown-hair's eyes had unfocused during the telling and she slumped forward, slightly glowing again before starting upright, blinking as if she'd been asleep. "Why, what?"

"The Admiral was asking us about trust, Fragment. Because we have a common objective," Red-hair said calmly. "Destroying the Machine Ships and saving lives."

Brown Hair nodded, blinking. "Oh. Yeah. Uh, look at it this way--would you have trusted Revan with your ships in the first place if Atris hadn't used the Force to convince you?"

"If it had been up to me, I wouldn't have trusted her for the treaty at Malachor!" Rensha hissed.

Red-hair bared her teeth back, lips curling up. "Thank you, Admiral. Now I remember why I spared you." Her brow beetled like an Eosians. "You owe me your career--and your life."

"You're both so good with people," Brown-hair muttered. "I'm surprised the crew didn't depressurize your sleeping chambers before I came along to save your asses."

Red-hair raised an eyebrow. "Fragment, we don't joke about mutiny."

"Funny. I just did." Brown-hair shrugged and folded her own arms, shrugging off her military posture like a set of old scales.

"It is insubordinate--" Rensha began, but Brown-hair interrupted her with more flagrant disregard for rank or protocol.

"You," she said flatly, nodding at Rensha. "They call you Old Scaly. You've been High Admiral of the Fleet since Forn Dodonna died, right?"

"Since the Star Forge." Rensha let her tongue flick her disdain. "Yes."

"You gave the orders for the Republic Pearl? Ship that kidnapped and brainwashed my husband? You pulled your forces out of Katarr and left the Jedi to die there?" The Revan's voice was casual, but the temperature in the room seemed to drop several degrees.

"Acting with the information I had at the time, yes." Rensha stared back at her steadily. If the Jedi wanted to put an end to her, she could not stop it. "And you are the Jedi who killed Bastila Shan and whose Star Forged ships nearly crushed the Fleet above Lehon."
"I had no idea what the hell was going on with that battle. Bastila… I guess Bastila knew." Brown-hair blinked, and let out a breath. "Maybe I'm giving you too much credit, too. It's possible the Emperor tweaked you through Malachi to hurt Carth. And I know Vima was pulling your strings on Katarr--just like she was pulling everyone else's." She twisted her wrists, extending, as if she was stretching out her narrow frame to be more intimidating. "Maybe Vima was manipulating D'Reev to manipulate the Emperor--"

"It does not matter now," Red-hair said. "The woman who was Atris is gone. Look to the future."

"Vima? Vima Sunrider?" Even their lies were too obviously strained. "No one has heard from her in years. Do you expect me to believe a Jedi who has been missing for years was working with Atris--"

They both began talking at once again and gradually the meat of their tale filtered through. Vima Sunrider _was_ Atris. As much as Revan Starfire was this person, Red-hair, who had been Sheris Loran. The tale was preposterous and Rensha told them so--only to get another round of excuses.

"--and so you see how you were manipulated, Admiral," Red-hair concluded. "How we all were. But now is our chance to be free."

Brown-hair wiped blood from her nostrils, nodding. "Look, we're not Vima. We don't need to use the Force to convince you that you need us. You know you do."

Rensha took a breath through her neck slits and imagined an inner peace with a preserve of Wookiees to hunt instead of host in her flagship. That Brown-hair's words were true was cold comfort. "I am no fool. I know what you both are." They had all studied the footage from the Sith Embassy on Manaan, the pieces their own troops beamed over from the Star Forge. Red-hair had Revan's mind, but Brown-hair could rip this ship open with a thought, should she have the blood-urge. "What do you want?"

"The same thing you do." Red-hair's voice softened. "The Sith Emperor and these infernal ships destroyed. A strong Republic. Galactic _peace_."

"No. Admiral Rensha doesn't want peace," Brown-Hair shook her head. "Not _her_. She just wants to win."

"But if you want to win this war why did you direct _our_ ships to scatter?" Rensha hissed. "Less than a ship's hour ago you sent the Republic ships back to the Core, leaving the _Hunt_ and our allies to journey to Malachor alone."

"What?" Brown-hair frowned. "Wait. We didn't. Why would we peel off the Republic ships?"

"We didn't send an order to split the fleets," Red-hair said grimly. "Atris did."

"Too late to call them back, now," Brown-hair swore under her breath. "If they've scattered they'd never reach us in time."

"Atris will have laid a trap in at Malachor," Red-hair nodded. "We knew that already. We'll enter each system cloaked. Between us, we can identify any hostile presence--spring her trap."

"But with the Republic ships out of it--" Brown-hair shook her head. "No. We can't leave Carth and Canderous's fleets to take all of the risk." She frowned, somehow looking younger and more like an egg than the other one.
"Whatever scheme Atris set, It's done. Her net is cast." The one they were calling General Sheris turned to the Star Forge Killer. "Work with what we have, Fragment. Two fleets, not three. Still enough." Her teeth bared like a predator. "Winnow the enemy down, then you can lead the remaining Awakened Ones into the gravity well."

"Not as easy as it looks--the Mando'ade and the Imps might take a dimmer view of the Republic abandoning them."

"Then it's wise that you married into both alliances."

Brown-hair frowned. "Yes, but…"

"We still have two fleets." Red-hair shrugged. "Nearly eighty capitals between the two. I've won more ground with less."

"Half the Mandalorian vessels are bantha-rigged and half-manned--"

"But by Mandalorians." Red-hair folded her arms. "We have the forces."

"You will both join me on the main bridge," Rensha commanded them. "My guards have already fetched the Toydarian Emperor. There will be no more clandestine plans made on escape ships, no more secret Force plots. We will fight this war with all of our claws out, spitting fire into our enemies' faces."

"That's fair," Red-hair allowed. "But leave whatever trap Atris left for us."

"Probably just another Mass Shadow Generator," Brown-hair said. "I fought her Mandalorian fleet above Nathema. Woman is not a tactical genius."

In Rensha's experience brilliant battle tactics rarely won the day over the willingness to sacrifice. The Machine Ships had already displayed their own weakness by fleeing every losing battle. "If what you say is true, Atris set this net for a reason. And the trap may not just be for our enemies."

"She did." Brown-hair glanced at Red. "And we killed her for a reason, too. Now you think we should fly right into her trap?"

"Too late for an alternative." Red-hair shrugged. "Half our remaining forces are already en route to Degriass. And we need systems. Those three are within optimal parameters."

"Well, we don't have to go as far as the Malachor System." Brown-hair paced forward, pulling up Rensha's own command station with a few deft swipes from her clawless hands. "If we can end them before that--"

"They'll always run." Red-hair shook her head. "We can stop them from running at Malachor. The gravity well there--"

"We're going to be hard pressed to keep our own forces out of a gravity trap," Brown-hair muttered.

The existence of a gravity well at Malachor was a well-known--albeit classified--phenomena. That they were now only working with the ships of her former enemies for a potential sacrifice seemed appropriate, Rensha thought, considering the risk.

"General Obvious." Brown-hair's breath hissed out as she closed her eyes. Her nostrils were bleeding again, something Rensha had only seen with Humans in cases of injury. "Selonia," she mumbled. "Assholes."

"Selonia?" Rensha looked at the other one.

"They're jumping," Red-hair explained. "Our enemy keeps trying new systems and she keeps calling them back."

Brown-hair began to glow again--her face slack, eyes half closed. The yellow light shone through her very skin--as if she'd suddenly developed photoluminescence, like a cave-dwelling Umbaran.

Rensha eyed her uneasily. "You're saying the Machine Ships have returned to the Corellian System?" Then why aren't we hunting them there?

"Yes. But she keeps calling them to follow her instead." Red-hair grimaced. "I could only predict where the ships would go. But they will cross the galaxy if it means they'll have a chance to destroy her." She nodded toward the console. "Look at your newsboards."

In the time she had taken to speak to these two, Rensha's interface had lit up with reports of the Sleeper ships appearing--and then vanishing--over half a dozen planets scattered across the Core. Most of the reports came in from her own fleet--as Operation Scattershot had sent the Republic ships to every system Revan and Atris had marked as a possible target.

At least Republic can see the stake of this war. Rensha noted. So they will know the risk.

"Atris planned this rather well, stationing the Republic Fleet to bear witness." Red-hair had obviously followed a similar hunting path. "Order our own ships to lock down the shipping lanes, and keep the civilians calm."

Rensha bit back her irritation at having the woman announce what she had already planned to do. "You are sure she can keep pulling them away?" A report had come in of ships sighted above Coruscant. And then gone again.

Brown-hair slumped forward again as the other reached out with her artificial arm to hold her upright.

"I am." The woman's white-rimmed eyes met Rensha's. "She must."

Xxx

General Revan: "We will meet them at the hyperspace gates of perdition, against the stars of hell. We will fight them by parsec, by click, and win our galaxy back, one blast from an ion cannon at a time."

General Sheris: "Exactly. Evil can only triumph over good when good sentients do nothing, and I know our brave fleet well enough to know they will not do nothing!"

General Revan: "But without the new plasma cannon from Kuat Drive Yards and the Czerka Corporation, our flyers would be ionized particles of space dust by now, and you'd all be speaking Ancient Sith--"

--transcript from the first joint speech between General Revan and General Sheris.

[Note: some believe this is a commercial for Kuat Drive Yards and/or Czerka Corp. Even millennia ago, the merchants' guilds held powerful influence over galactic politics.]
“Hello. Most of you recognize me. I’m Revan. General Revan.” The Butcher fiddled with her topknot. Dressed in Jedi robes, she looked like an actual Jedi, albeit one with a nosebleed. She dabbed her face with a scrap of cloth and then continued. "I… uh, I wanted to thank you all for fighting... for fighting with us. This is... this is my fellow Jedi general, General Sheris Darkstar. She’s been helping you win this war. Now that I’m here we’re going to win it even faster.”

“We regret to inform you that Master Atris was called away,” Bossypants added, looking up. She was sitting and the brunette was standing.

"That means they killed that creepy white-haired Jedi," Polla whispered to her da. They hadn’t killed each other, though, which meant Seiran owed Polla a hundred credits, because he said they wouldn’t last an hour in the same room if Revan was ever unfrozen again.

It had been a joke, but she’d still wondered if he was right.

"Good," Da whispered back.

“You’ve been told we’re going to make three hyperspace jumps: and then engage the Machine Ships on Malachor V,” Bossypants continued.

"We'll try and finish them off before that," the Butcher chimed in. "At Degriass. Or Rekkiad. But it might not be possible. We may have to go all the way to Malachor." She took a deep breath. "I don't want to lie to you. If we make it that far, it's gonna get rough."

"In the meantime, I want to thank you, each and every one of you, for your service," Bossypants said.

“Me too,” the other one echoed. “Thanks. We... we’re gonna win this. I promise.” She exhaled. "And now... we've got some time. Relax. Get... get drunk... or whatever...." Her eyes unfocused. A trickle of blood fell from her nose.

"Revan?" The other one actually looked concerned. She stood up, and for a second she looked like she was holding the other one up as she babbled something in an unintelligible language--and then the vid cut out abruptly.

"Degriass to Rekkiad? Rekkiad to Malachor?" Jasp cracked his knuckles. "Shelton Trade Route's right there, Pollie." He grinned at her. "Remember? Always said I'd show you the run."

"Not sure we'll have time," she shot back, more than a little distracted. The Butcher was glowing again. And their speeches were terrible. Was that supposed to be inspirational? I did a much better job when I was pretending to be Revan on Kaas!

"What is the Shelton Trade Route?" Zaalbar's girlfriend growled.

Da's grin grew wider. "Only the hardest run in the galaxy--"

Normally, Polla would have loved to discuss one of the few runs she'd never had the guts or the incentive to try, but now wasn't the damn time. "Hey! You hear that?" Polla stood up, waving at the guards. "The Revans said everyone should relax. Means we're not prisoners anymore, right?"
"No." The head guard started to shake his head. "We have to follow orders--protocol--"

"Frack orders," Polla wondered if they'd have to break out of this place. The guard still had that sweet rifle. He wouldn't be that hard to take down, not when they had Wookiees on their side. From the growls behind her, Igyrahhhrrr the Treeless and Zaalbar's girlfriend both agreed.

Polla was just figuring the odds when the guard coughed and took a few steps back. He glanced down. "I can't let you go. I haven't heard anything from Rensha--"

"Probably getting drunk," Zaalbar's girlfriend growled. "You know how those Trandoshans can be."

"About time," Jasp said. "Pollie, maybe it's time to go home."

"Yeah." It probably was. But Polla couldn't get that blank look on the Butcher's face out of her mind. The Butcher had done that on the Hawk, too. Looked as empty as one of Tenny-Bro's worn-out Voices in the market square ready to be sacrificed, as if the Revan with Polla's memories--the woman she was actually starting to like--wasn't in there at all. "But we're in the middle of a fracking war. And they might need us. They might still try and kill each other. Something could still happen."

"Something could." Da coughed. "But what would you do?"

_Give better speeches?_ But the truth was, Da was right. "We're in hyperspace now, Da. "Can't jump from hyperspace."

"You sure?" He grinned.

"Laws of astrophysics, yeah."

"Always wanted to try a crazy stunt like that." He smiled so Polla was pretty sure he was joking. "Trick would be you'd have to time your own jump before you left the mother ship's velocity."

"Get it wrong and you'd atomize everything. Guess it might blow the hyperlane, too… maybe…"

"Might," her da agreed. "Ever think that's what happened to Jori Daragon?"

_Deralia's patron saint of Smugglers and Lost Causes? What a time to bring her up._

"This is not as dangerous a place as the Sith jungle," Zaalbar growled.

"Exactly." Polla tipped an imaginary hat at the Wookiee. "Cept for the armed guards it's like we're back in the free galaxy again."

"Stars!" The head guard looked startled as his comm flashed green, then blue. "They want me… your presence is… ah, requested on your own ship. I'm… uh, I'm supposed to give you an escort there." He didn't look thrilled.

“What about Revan?” Polla snapped. “We need to see her.”

“I don’t have bridge clearance--”

"Ah...We'll check on the ship repairs," Da interrupted. "You did assign techs to repair our ship?"

"Y--es." The man glanced at his comm again, typing commands into it as he read. "They're saying,
yes. Until that droid of yours ran them off."

Can't blame Mission for that. Polla stifled a smirk. But the rest of the news sounded fracked. We're going to the Malachor System? The Mandalorian System that's half destroyed? Polla was no war leader, but going there sounded like a really bad idea.

“Maybe we should see Revan ourselves,” she offered casually. “Both of em?”

“I don't have clearance,” the guard repeated woodenly.

“We will break free later and rescue her,” Zaalbar chuffed, coming up behind Polla. “First we need to ensure the Mission ghost has repaired the Hawk.”

“I'm gonna pretend I don't speak Shyriiwook,” the guard muttered, motioning to his men to flank them. “And you're gonna wait until shift change to do… whatever it is you're going to do. Deal?”

Polla smiled slowly. “If you'll throw in that sweet gun of yours it will be.”

XX

Master Myleah Onasi was one of the Jedi Order's most prominent leaders through their first period of expansion, half a century after the Machine Wars. Little is known about her early training, except that her stepmother was the Beast-Master Queen of Alderaan, and her father a Jedi Master at the local Enclave—

History of the Jedi on Onderon. vol. Xi. 1283 Onderon Second Age, 2340 BBY

---compiled by Archivist Lanna T'so.

Xxx

Dustil dreamed he was a bar of light. Somehow it made sense that Mekk was there, too. He woke up starving, with a furious Mandalorian general looming over his head, and a boner he rolled over to hide as fast as fricking possible. "General Ordo! Sir." He rumpled up the sheets, pulling his knees up fast.

"Dustil Onasi. Kid." The man's gray eyes were flat and angry. "You're welcome for the save out there. Medix said you fainted in your ship."

"I don't faint." Except he had. And when Dustil closed his eyes for a second he saw a Zabrak chest. Male. Bare-chested and looming over him. He blinked hard, until the Zabrak turned into Ordo again. "Must have been my oxygen levels or something. I mean, yeah. Thanks. Hey, is the wideband working? I need to get a message through to my father—"

"Honor demands I do," Aemelie Ordo said coldly. She was wearing armor, hair knotted flat on her head. Behind her, Sinae and that Dessa bint were standing with their arms folded, like Dustil was the star on some kind of Mandie judgment show. "Dustil Onasi, son of Carth Onasi, Second Husband of Lin—"

"First Husband of Lin," Canderous snapped. "Don't demote the man when he's not here to defend himself, Aemelie."
"I am Second Wife" she practically spat back. "To you, Husband. Now."

"Second Wife…” the man tried again. "Let's just hear what the kid has to say."

"Whatever," Dustil interrupted. At least they'd killed his boner. His stomach growled. "What is the question?"

"Has Revan the Undying who was frozen in carbonite returned to lead the battle?" Aemelie looked like she wasn't happy about the answer either way.

"I don't know about leading, but she's back. My father thought we needed her so he sent Polla Organa to break her out of carbonite." Dustil shrugged. "I knew we were winning just fine without her. The other one's not half-bad."

"At least someone in your family has a small amount of sense." Dessa weighed in. "Hopefully heritable."

"Osik," Canderous muttered.

"Did you know, Mand'alor?" Sinae demanded. She looked pissed. They all looked pissed, except Canderous Ordo, whose head was down and whose shoulders were hunched. Never a look Dustil thought he'd have seen on Revan's pet Mandie, but the man looked… beaten.

"I told the aru’suum’la we could not follow her into battle--" From the glare Ordo was shooting Dustil's way at least one of them had just fracked up.

"Revan just got here," Dustil added. "Seriously! Just this last fight, with the Hawk--" His voice trailed off again, because none of them were paying attention to him.

"The man to whom I am the second of his wives knew of her return and said nothing," Aemelie retorted. Her face turned reddish when she was upset, like the skin of a dark goreapple. "Our Mand'alor said nothing! Like the Crusader, who knelt to Fett Kun!"

Canderous's face froze. "Those ships are a greater threat than my honor. Clan law bends not to break. I stand by my choice."

"And so, I call challenge," Aemelie said. "To Canderous Ordo. By clan-right he has betrayed Ordo and his place as Mand'alor. I call challenge to the title."

"You can't, Aems." Canderous Ordo sounded gentle and almost sad. "Not for Mand'alor. You're too young. You still have children to bear for clan--"

"Like Dessa?" Aemelie laughed. In that second, Dustil noticed how pretty she was--and how fracking nuts. "As you can see, the artificial womb works. My children can gestate in the same manner--"

"Aemelie!" Canderous Ordo winced. "There is a boy who is right here!"

"Yeah, uh… I'm okay." Dustil slung his legs over his bed relieved to find himself still wearing clothes. "Uh. Hey. Cool tech with those wombs--that womb-tank thing. Those are… nice. Uh, nice babies."

"Really?" Dessa smiled at him. "Does the girl have the Force?"
"I don't know she's just a--" Dustil glanced over at her again. "Yeah." Maybe that's what it was, this connection. He stared at the babies for a while. This time they both waved back. The room got really quiet, and he stared. "She's... she's got it."

"Accepted." Canderous's heavy voice interrupted, suddenly, from Dustil's right. Dustil had been staring at the kid, the cute kid, while the Ordos worked out their whatever-it-was. Now they both had bleeding cuts on their faces and knives in their hands. "I accept your challenge, Aemelie, but not to the death."

Weird, Dustil hadn't... usually he was more in tune to these things. Sents pulling knives. You develop reflexes or die, on Korriban. The kids had distracted him.

"Choose your location." Canderous Ordo looked pissed as he shoved his knife back in his belt.

"One of the training circles will suffice. In hyperspace we can hardly battle in stars." Aemelie smiled as if she'd won their fracked duel already. "Choose your weapon."

"Blades." Her husband gritted his teeth. "I want no claims it wasn't a fair fight."

"I could beat you with hands and feet, too." Airily, Aemelie smiled. "To third blood, Mand'alor. Heart's blood, but not death."

"In order?" He frowned.

"Of course." Her teeth were too small, Dustil decided. And dear old Milli's were too big. Fracking Mandies couldn't get anything right.

"Then I ask again. Humbly, would you like some tea--"

"There's a boy right here, Ordo!" Sinae interrupted.

"Hey, I was just leaving!" Frack them and their fracked culture. He wasn't Mekk, Dustil didn't find this interesting. He edged past them, heading for the door. But just as he got there, the door opened.

"Medix Sinae, I can't seem to find Mekel Jin anywhere--" Mydia Fracking Blais burst into the room. She blinked at the bleeding Mandalorians, her eyes slipping past Dustil standing right in front of her like he was invisible. "I thought... I thought I sensed Jin here. Apologies. Are you having another duel, Aemelie? I'd prefer you not do it in front of the children. I won't have them frightened... not until they're at least old enough to crawl away from danger."

"We have been over this already. You have no claim to them, Mydia of Blais." Dessa stepped between Mydia and the kids.

"You said I could name her. The girl is My-leah," Mydia said. "And I like Ganesh for the boy. I had an Uncle named Ganesh. Or so mother was told. I think she strangled him when they were both learning to walk?" She tilted her head. "Perhaps he fell down the stairs. That's why crawling is so important!"

"The boy is mine--" Dessa’s hand went to her knife.

"They will not be named until they stand on their own limbs below the stars, and the boy is not even remotely yours," Sinae broke in, standing next to Dessa. Behind them the Ordos were still arguing about their fracked-up banthacrap.

It was all fracked, Dustil thought.
"The boy is yours? Really?" Mydia pointed at the gross red thing bobbing at the top of the tank. "They're sharing blood, now. She has the blood of Sith Lords, I expect some of that to rub off on little Ganesh." Her eyes met finally Dustil's and then she smiled. Smug. Almost feral. "The blood of Sith Lords is on my side of the family," she added.

"Hi, Mydia." Dustil felt sick.

"What are you doing here, Dustil Onasi?" Mydia's nose wrinkled. Once, he'd thought it was cute the way her nose wrinkled. Now it looked like she thought he was osik on her shoe.

"He fainted." Sinae walked to the tank and fiddled with some of the controls. The little one made her starfish hands again. Dustil felt sick.

"Ugh. I knew he was weak." Mydia walked over to the tank. "Kitchee kitchee koo," she cooed. The babies floated and spun. "When will they be ready? I want to give you another one to grow for me. With a better donor."

"Oh, yeah? Where is he?" Somehow Dustil kept his voice steady. "This 'better' donor of yours?"

"Not with you." Mydia's nose wrinkled again. He wanted to punch it. "And not with Mill. Or Leskal. I ran into him on the way over here. Probably with that Voice, the Zabrak--"

"Get out," Canderous barked. He waved a knife at them, still bloody from his wife's face. "Both of you. Now."

Dustil closed his eyes and took a breath. Telos, a voice whispered in his head. Familiar. Safe. Warm. Like--

Dustil was halfway down the corridor with the Blais bint in tow before he realized he'd started running.

XXX

What is there to say about the Battle of Degriass that hasn't been said already?

Even short-handed, the brave Mandalorians faced down the Machine Ships and won, but at such a cost, losing more than three quarters of their fleet--

--Excerpt from "An Historian's Introduction to the Machine Wars: Lecture by Kree Usam Racharn for the Revan: Fact or Fiction Symposium, SHWL," University of Coruscant Press. 3653 BBY

--compiled by Archivist Lanna T'so.

Xxx

"Go ahead and jump," Carth said, still a little numbly. Rew had lied. He was… he was pretty damned sure of that, even without confirmation.

Behind him, Fats gave a long, rattling snore. Damn thing was out for the count, although his eyes glowed faintly under closed lids.

Rew glanced at Fats, nervous and wide-eyed. He hadn't wanted to put her in restraints, but she hadn't given him much choice. Even if her story made more sense than Malachor. Malachor had to be a trap. Revan had to know that--that it had to be a trap--but Rew was lying. His wife wouldn't leave him out if the loop--she wouldn't send Rew to tell him--
"Jumping in ten--" the ensign said.

"Carth." Rew's voice was hoarse. "Please. She told me to tell you not to go."

In Fleet you're trained to take orders. Rew knew that. She knew him. They'd trained together. Seen their partners die together. Picked up the pieces together. Rew knew him. She'd played him. In that moment, Carth realized he'd never known her at all.

"Dustil will be happy to see you," he said numbly, although of course his son wouldn't care. "Things were a little awkward, before, on the Great Hunt--"

"As opposed to now, when you've got me in binders on your Imperial flagship?" Rew kept shooting glances at the snorting Emperor chained in the corner, the priestess hovering behind. "Carth… this all looks a bit… barbaric."

"Pretty much the same as us," he lied weakly. "Just a few more chains on the uniforms. And… uh, in the dining hall."

The hyperspace engines hummed into drive as they leaped. "Sir?" his lieutenant interrupted.

"Yeah?" Carth smiled.

"Sir? It's Lord Dustil. He never returned from his patrol, but the Mandalorian flagship beamed us his loc. They've got him. He's fine."

"Wideband's working?"

At the lieutenant's nod, Carth smiled, masking his unease. Dustil would be safe on the Aleema—as safe as he was here. "There we go. See if you can get him--and my wife--on the line."

Xxx

The Bezal bond requires three points for its initiation, although some have posited that the energy can be generated directly from the Force itself, or that deliberate sundering of a Bezal bond can have surprising effects--

Excerpt from Lord Zash to her Apprentice P’ink Kallig, private collection, Dromund Kaas.

--compiled by Archivist Lanna T’so.

Xxx

"Dustil! Dustil Onasi!" Mydia was chasing him. Dustil increased his pace, pulling at the Force to run faster. He didn't know where he was going, exactly; only that the Force was tugging him to get there.

'There' turned out to be another dorm room, just like the one Mekk had taken him to before, past some armored Mandie kids who were standing around like they were guards. One of them started to say something when Dustil pushed past, but then the bint was too busy picking themselves off the ground--and Dustil was already in the doorway. Door was locked but that wasn't a problem. The Force wrenched it open.

They were both almost naked, but it didn't look like sex. Sex didn't make you glow, not like literally glow. The Zabrak looked up when Dustil entered the room, Mydia right on his fracking heels. The Zabrak's entire body was encased in a flickering black nimbus of energy. Mekk was lying flat on his back in front of him, and glowing white, like some negative image. He had Sith runes on his chest and they were glowing too. There was something… something familiar about it, something… that felt right about it that Dustil couldn't put into words, because that didn't make sense. Nothing about this made any fricking sense.

Telos. For a second, Mekel's voice was inside his head. Then the Coruscanti man's eyes opened. The glow faded.

The Zabrak stood up, chuckling softly. "Tut, tut! We have an audience!"

"Telos," Mekel sat up. The Sith runes looked like tattoos etched on his skin. He was still wearing a jock, but nothing else. The permanent stubble on his face was practically a beard now. "You're here. Hey."

"Is there anyone you won't frack, Coruscant?" Dustil was proud of the evenness in his voice.

"Your dads," Mekel drawled. He paused. "My moms. Also." He smiled--that smug old Mek smile, like nothing was wrong. "Where the hell did you come from?"

"He fainted," Mydia said. "In his ship. The Mandalorians rescued him."

"Good." Mekel stood up and walked over to a pile of clothes, started to pull them on and get dressed. When he bent over, Dustil could see his ribs against his skin, the sinews in his legs tight on bone.

"They feeding you, Mekk?" he joked. He should be pissed. He was pissed, but this was so fricking typical--

"Yeah." Mekk turned to the Zabrak, whose eyes were still glowing. "Are we finished?"

"For now," Emperor Asshole said.

"I felt it. I think I felt it… did you?" Mekel pulled up his pants and turned back to Dustil. The smile on his face was open and hopeful and Dustil wanted to put his fist through it. "For a second, it felt like you were there with me--"

_I felt--something-- "I don't know what the frack you're talking about," Dustil snapped. "But the next time you frack the Sith Emperor, put a sock on the door."

"Does Your Luminance need anything else?" Mydia Blais asked. She wasn't trying to hide her anger, it rang in the Force, in every line of tension in her body.

"He's helping me get the Force back." Mekel babbled on, oblivious, while he fumbled with the buckles on his vest. "We're not fracking. Although, that'd be somethin--"

"Coitus. Ugh. Disgusting." The Emperor twisted Zepth's features. "Please. Don't degrade the ceremony with your own physical weakness."

"His Luminance is celibate, except on extremely sacred occasions," Mydia snapped. "Everyone knows that. The real Lord Malak knew that."

"Oh." Dustil didn't give a frack. "Well, you look like you could use a backrub, Myd." Dustil smiled at her like the other two sents in the room didn't exist.

Her yellow eyes blinked. "I could. Mekel?"
"Uh, I… Dustil just got here."

"And now I'm just leaving." Dustil started backing up toward the door. "Ordo and his wife are gonna duel or something. Don't want to miss it."

"Well, uh we could all go…." Mekel glanced at Mydia.

"Sorry, Te-los." Mydia's voice now took on a mocking singsong. She took Mekel's arm possessively. "You want a turn with Jin of Lin, you'll have to prove your worth like I did." She pulled Mekel closer, shifting her leg so her robes fell around it. From experience, Dustil was pretty sure she didn't have on anything underneath. Her bare leg locked behind Mekel's as her hand slid to the small of his back. They looked like they were about to dance. A waltz, on their way to fracking.

"Dustil--wait!" Mekel looked like he was trying to shove Mydia away, but he didn't seem to be trying very hard. In fact, he looked almost protective, the way he was turning towards her at the same time, head turning back and forth between them like he couldn't make up his mind which one of them he wanted.

That was the thing about Mekk. He wanted too much. He never knew.

"See you around." Dustil turned his back to them and left. Halfway down the service stair the cheers and feet-stamping led him to the duel--just in time for the fight.

XXX

Was Ulic Qel-Droma’s condition permanent?

Although Force sensitivity can be removed or lessened by surgical means in some sentient species, such extreme measures are rarely taken in civilized parts of the galaxy. The Miralukan colonies, strangely enough, perform the bulk of such surgeries, as there have always been some of their people who find their sensitivity to the Force to be too much to bear.

Ulic Qel-Droma’s connection to the Force was severed in a different way, through some kind of Force ritual. The existing holocron of Meetra Surik's memories claims the Force was severed from her for a time as well, although the centuries-old entity within is surprisingly reticent with detail. Sadly, the holocron is now in the possession of my rival, Darth Thanaton, but I have every hope in your abilities to retrieve it, my apprentice!

--Confidential notes from Lord Zash, to her apprentice P'ink Kallig of Tor, Dromund Kaas, private collection.

--compiled by Archivist Lanna T'so.

XXX

Mydia was pissed. That became obvious to Mekel by the way her lower lip puckered out and the fact that she wouldn't let go of him, even though her attempt to make Telos jealous was about as effective as one of Algwinn's pick-up lines, back in the bad old days.

But Mekel let her lead him on because he was pissed too. Telos had barely looked at him, had laughed it off, but he'd been there. In the Force when Mekel and the Emperor were doing the ceremony, Mekel had felt… something, he was sure of it.

The bond. The Force was in the bond. Maybe Mekel needed the bond back to get the Force back for real.

"Telos--wait!" But Dustil was already gone, jogging out the door like he has better places to be.

Mydia giggled, high and sharp.

"I won't have you mating in here," His Luminance warned them, just as Mekel extricated himself from Mydia's surprisingly strong grip.

"Of course not, my Lord." She cast her eyes to the ground bashfully and Mekel took a few steps back, trying to clear his head before he started making his excuses. Frack Telos anyway. Milli would be wondering where he was by now.

"I… uh, I gotta go, Myd." He smiled at her, relieved that it elicited a wary smile back. "It's still Millifar's shift, but if you want, in a few hours--"

"We'll see," the Sith bint sniffed as Mekel started babbling about the ship and how they had a few days’ worth of time to kill, not just hours.

"Uh, watch after His Luminance, okay? I'll… I'll ping you later."

"You will show up to my quarters," Mydia countered. "In two hours’ time."

"Okay." Mekel found himself nodding like a fracking idiot, even as Lord Valkorion (as Tenebrae called himself now) laughed some more.

The cheering over the speakers led Mekel to the arena, which in normal fracking times was just another training room on the Aleema, but was now covered with woven carpets and flat-bellied chairs for the spectators. They'd even lit a fire in the middle of it all--although the blue flames looked more like alcohol combustion than something typically rustic, like the wood Milli was always threatening to burn in her room for them to frack in front of.

The cheering was for Canderous and Aemelie Ordo, both stripped to the waist and wielding long, wickedly curved knives. They were circling each other. General Ordo was too old, but Aemelie was still an attractive woman, Mekel couldn't help but notice, light on her feet and bouncing under the strip of black fabric that crossed her chest.

"Jin of Lin!" Someone hissed and Mekel tore his eyes away from Aemelie just in time to see Leskal waving at him. Milli was sitting next to him and Telos next to her.

"What's this?" Mekel asked in a whisper when he reached their row in the audience, stepping awkwardly over name and name. "Another wedding thing?" Both Ordo and his wife had their cheeks bleeding like they'd been sliced.

"Blood duel." Milli answered, as Mekel squeezed in between her and Leskal. On the other side of her, Telos was staring at the fight like it was the most fascinating thing he had ever fracking seen.

"But those are just for leadership--they're already married."

Canderous Ordo advanced with his knife out stiff. Aemelie Ordo's foot kicked out, one smooth line and connected with his ribs. The Mandalorian reached for it, and in a movement too fast to see, Aemelie ducked and connected her kick with her husband's knee instead. Both of their blades clashed again. The crowd sighed.

"Thought you were some kind of Mandie expert, Mekk." Dustil was definitely holding a grudge
"Compared to you, I'm an expert on everything, hayseed." The old joke felt flat. Mekel felt the easy grin fade when Telos didn't respond. "Hey. You're pissed? What the frack did I do?"

"Who," Dustil mumbled. "Who didn't you do, Mekk?"

"Speak Mando’a," Millifar put her hand on Mekel's arm. "I only know a little of the Dar'jett tongue."

Mekel hadn't realized he'd slipped into Ancient Sith with Telos. Like it really was the bad old days.

"I've got to clear this up." He switched to Manda like she wanted, and kissed her ear, getting a few wisps from her braids and a smile in return. "Give me a sec, Milli, okay?"

"Perhaps you can make the dark'jett Onasi laugh," she nodded. "Something is troubling him." Her eyes went back to the fight, and she looked pretty troubled herself. Mekel thought of ten things to say to comfort her—and all of them froze on his lips. Her parents were fighting? This didn’t look as festive as the usual training circle bantrashit. No one was drinking anything at all.

"Sure. I can make him laugh—give me a sec." Mekel swung one leg around her and then the other, so he was next to Telos now, both of them at the end of the row. Millifar's metal fingers kneaded the muscles in his back as he stared into his former bondmate's eyes.

He hated not being able to read Telos when it used to be as easy as breathing. "What's eating you?" Mekel asked in Ancient Sith.

Telos sneered. "So many ways to answer that."

"Yeah, well, don't do me any favors, fockda."

"Don't worry, I'm not one for Ancient Sith ceremonies seeing how the last one got me tied to some Coruscanti son of a whore--"

"Didn't hear any complaints from you on Coru."

"Maybe on Coru you weren't selling it to half the fracking crew."

"I don't sell--" Mekel broke off as the room erupted into cheers. Milli's arm went away as she used it to clap and cheer, from the sounds; but Mekel kept his eyes fixed on Telos. "Stop trying to piss me off. I can't fry you with lightning anymore. You have Mydia for that, now."

"Hah." Dustil ducked his head. His voice dropped, forcing Mekel to edge closer until he could feel the other man’s breath on his face. "You knew? About the kids?"

"Kids?"

"Mine. The girl, anyway. In that tank in the medix--"

"Those are Dessa's twins." Mekel wasn't following. "Mandies don't sell kids, Telos, and I think you might want to try finding someone a little older than a baby who's not--uh--" his voice cut out, mainly because black spots were forming in front of Mekel's eyes until he started laughing, only the laughter stuck in his throat.

"Hah, hah." Dustil relaxed his grip. Air rushed back into Mekel's lungs, so fast he nearly choked on it.
"What d'you mean about the kid? When did you frack Dessa?"

"Are you deliberately dense? That kid's Mydia's. The medix took it out of her--put it in with Dessa's kid. Her. Put her in Dessa's with kid in that artificial womb or whatever it is."

"Oh." Mekel thought back to that tent on Kaas. Mydia's tear-streaked face. "She didn't really explain that part. Uh, congratulations?"

"Right." Dustil ducked his head so his hair was in his eyes and Mekel couldn't read his expression. "Congratulations to me."

The room around them suddenly grew silent. The easy chatter stopped as abruptly as if the volume had been cut out. Mekel looked over just in time to see Aemelie Ordo pull the knife out of her husband's chest, see the man collapse like a stuck mark.

"Shit," he muttered. "What the frack did we miss?"

"Blood duel?" Dustil sounded stunned too. "What the frack does that even mean with the Mandies?"

Millifar's flesh hand tugged Mekel's arm and he turned to her again, just in time to have her barrel her head into his chest and start sobbing. He'd never seen her cry before.

Mekel didn't know what to do. "It'll be okay," he mumbled in Mand'oa. "He's still breathing, right? I think he's still breathing."

“You don’t understand!” she wailed. “I thought she would yield—”

“She’s Aemelie,” Leskal interjected. “Why yield, when she could be Fett Mand'alor?”

Xxx

In every iteration of the Revan mythos, Canderous Ordo displays an unwavering devotion. Some have posited a romantic relationship between Revan and the Mandalorian. Others point to tradition. By beating the Mand'alor, Revan effectively became the leader of all the Mandalorian clans.

Whether or not they followed her until the end… well, that is another question, especially after the Battle of Degriass…

--Excerpt from "An Historian's Introduction to the Machine Wars: Lecture by Kree Usam Racharn for the Revan: Fact or Fiction Symposium, SHWL," University of Coruscant Press. 3653 BBY

--compiled by Archivist Lanna T'so.

Xxx

"Make him get her." When Canderous moved his arm, the mix of bacta and kolto slipped over the sides of the tank. Canderous Ordo was too kriffin’ old for the way Mekel Jin was gaping at him, or the way the Onasi kid was lurking in the background. He’d never felt older. Not even when he heard the little Twi'lek kid fall, and Zaalbar scream.

He was too old for the red-eyed hu’tuun laughing at him, now, too old for the two Sithkids staring. He’d summoned the Zabrak kid to his bacta tank. Instead, somehow, he’d ended up with all three and some garbled story from Jin about his daughter asking them to check on him.
Millifar should know enough to leave a man to his shame.

"Get her now," he repeated to the Sith Emperor. "Get Revan. Now. I know you can do it. She was in your body before."

"I'm afraid she is occupied," the Sith said. Zepth was an alright kid when he was in his own mind, but the Emperor twisted his face into a deathshead mask. "I can take a message--"

His voice broke off, probably startled to see the blaster jabbing into his chest and the half-naked man scrambling out of the tank. The repeater was covered in bacta, which had probably jammed the igniter to hell, but the asshole wouldn't know better.

"I said get her," Canderous repeated. "Now. Not gonna explain this with a game of whisper down the hyperlane and I don't want an open channel. Get. Revan."

"Oh, ho--" The red glow around the Zabrak's eyes cut out abruptly. The kid blinked, coming to himself. He wouldn't remember what had just happened. Canderous felt sorry for the kid again, damn him.

But you can't save everyone.

"Bring the Emperor back," he snapped, gesturing with the gun. "Or Revan. I need to talk to Revan. Now."

"Hello," Zepth said warily, looking around at them all. He backed away a few meters, like a trapped animal. "Is there…" he turned toward Jin. "Is His Luminance finished here?"

His Luminance. They'd been working with 'His Luminance' for weeks. Canderous was never gonna call the aru’suum’la hu’tuun chakaar that.

"Said we need Revan," Canderous snapped. He'd already said it enough. "I need Revan. Need to tell her something. Now."

"They call her General Sheris--" Jin looked like he was starting to understand he shouldn't have interrupted when Canderous rolled the blaster in his direction.

"The other one, asshat!" Carth's kid elbowed Jin of Lin. "You know. Your cousin?"

Seven hells. Kid Onasi looked just like his father. Carth wasn't going to understand this. Canderous wasn't sure Revan would, either. General Sheris would, but she didn't matter.

"What?" Jin looked poleaxed. "She’s in carbonite."

Canderous focused back on the Zabrak, tuning out most of the kids’ conversation after that; including the steady stream of curses when Jin found out Revan had been freed from carbonite--"

"--and no one told me?"

"Would have been better if no one had told anyone," Canderous replied pointedly, but the two of them just blinked. They shouldn't kriffin be here.

You can't save everyone. Canderous was so tired. "Get out!" He barked at them and the two Sithkids jumped. They looked at each other and then back at him. "Out!" He repeated. "I’m still in command of this ship. I can still have you both airlocked."

"Just told Milli I’d check on you, sir," Jin muttered, edging toward the door. Uh, I’m… I’m sorry.
Tell... uh, tell Revan, ‘hi.”

“Get. Out.” The blaster even felt heavy in his hand.

“Frack this,” Carth’s kid snapped, and followed Jin of Lin out.

Canderous had a few moments of quiet then, while the Zabrak kid blinked and he scowled back before he turned his attention back to the viewscreen set in the wall. It showed nothing but the blur of hyperspace, like a sand clock, running out of time. He should be planning their next move, but Canderous just felt tired. He closed his eyes. Then--

"Canderous--?" the voice was pitched wrong, male, but the inflection was hers. He watched those glowing eyes widen. "What the hell happened to you?"

"Blood duel."

"You’re dueling with live weapons? At a time like this?"

He wasn't going to leave it to the other one to explain. "A blood duel. Like on Malachor III," he snapped. "When you fought Cassus Fett for Clan Lin."

"What? Who the hell challenged you?"

"My wife. Aemelie." He breathed out, feeling the twinge of a nicked lung. "It's your fault."

"My fault? Aemelie is leading Clan Ordo, now? And it's my fault?"

"Not just Ordo, Revan."

She was quick as a blade. All Canderous had to do was raise his eyebrows and wait.

"Oh," she muttered a breath later. "This was a clan challenge--for all of clan. Because your wife doesn't want to follow me."

"You will not change." It didn't matter to Canderous. It should matter and he knew that, but he knew her too well. In a way, he’d known her for all of her life. Just as he'd known Milli for all of hers. And his son, until the lad found his glory in stars. "The clans can't follow one who does not change--I explained arusuum’la to you."

"So what are you saying? Just come out and fracking say it." Her voice was distracted. He watched her expression twist the kid's features smooth, those glowing eyes unfocus, her voice growing cold and remote as if she had a thousand more things on her mind. She was controlling those ships somehow. She was keeping them back. Canderous had seen the reports from the HoloNet. Machine Ship appearances on a dozen worlds. Or more. But no attacks. No casualties. Had to be because of her.

If only that mattered to his stubborn, prideful, tradition-bound wife.

"I'm saying the clans won't follow you."

"What does that mean? I don't want you to follow me. Once we get rid of the Machine Ships your people are free--"

"It means we're giving you five ships, Revan. Five. Not thirty-six."

The Zabrak's eyes blinked. "Five. Why five?"
"We've got four warships from Weis who want to win back some honor. And the Aleema. She's still under my command."

Maybe it had all been an old man's fantasy, thinking the clans would unite again. Maybe this was the future: their people, seeking their own glories, apart. Maybe in another season things would change.

"You're commanding the Aleema? And Aemelie's running off with the rest of the Mandalorian ships?"

"No." His stubborn, hidebound wife. "Aemelie will stay and fight. But the rest of our people will go." He was pissed, Canderous realized. Not just at Aemelie for forcing his hand, for showing his weakness—for he could no more stab her in the heart than he could refuse her challenge—but also at Revan, for making this choice necessary. "I told you before the clans wouldn't follow you. I told you why."

"But they were following us—they followed Dar--" the Zabrak drew a breath. "Damnit, Canderous! We're already in hyperspace. You're already in hyperspace and the Republic Fleet pulled out, too--"

"The rest of our ships will jump away from Degriass. My five will follow you to Malachor. It's done, Revan." Republics pulled out? Huttan cowards. "We've made more improvements to the Aleema's gun array and a few days in hyperspace will give us enough time to fix the shields."

"I could speak to Aemelie. Or to your clans. I could--"

"They won't listen. It'd be considered an act of war." So much she still didn't understand. The other one would, damn her.

"But we need your ships; we don't have the firepower--"

"You've got five. I said I'd follow you to the depths of hell, Revan. Remember? I meant it then and I mean it now."

"On Korriban." The Zabrak blinked. "I remember. Frack, I--we'll figure something out. Maybe I can get Rensha to recall the Republic Fleet. Or ...." Her voice trailed off. "Damnit, Canderous!"

"Mishuk gotal'u meshuroke, pako kyore, Revan"

Later, Canderous would wish he'd thought of words more fitting than a Mandalorian platitude. But nothing was easy.

Later, he would have time to reflect. For this would be the last time they spoke alone, head to head—as allies.

"You, too," he grunted, easing back into the tank. To fight, he needed to be whole.

When he looked up again Zepth's eyes faded back to their normal hue. The boy blinked. "My lord? Is that all?"

Irritation spiked the pain in Canderous’s chest, the weight of what would come. He wished Revan had kept him in the dark. He wished he’d had the shebs to beat his own wife in the blood duel.
But Aemelie had asked for a duel to the heart’s blood, and his wife had no implant to keep her pulse beating if the knife found her kar’ta’s vein. The only way for them both to live was for Canderous to lose.

“My lord?” The Zabrack’s voice was even more hesitant now.

"I'm not your lord. Get outta here. Scram!" Canderous winced at the bandage still holding two of his trigger fingers to the rest of his hand, the ache in his chest. His leg ached, too--Aemelie had severed the tendon when he only nicked hers. But she'd nearly lost a hand, he'd been too clumsy--staring in shock at the depth of his error when she switched the blade to her left and dove into his heart.

His heart had stopped, he'd been told, before they patched it up again. Not the first time that had happened. His implant had saved him.

Aemelie would have died. I would have been Mand'alor of nothing, then.

His wife was an atin’dala, but he loved her.

Canderous dialed Onasi's comlink with a troubled heart. Wideband was still working. Best get it over with as fast as he could. The man should hear what would come from Canderous--not Revan. It was his shame, not hers.

He owed them both that much.

XXX

_Canderous: (SPOKEN) I said I’d follow you to the ends of the galaxy, Revan, and I meant it._

_Carth: (ASIDE) He really meant it._

_Ssyrían panflute intro: Canderous’s Theme_

_(BEAT)_

_Starfire: (SUNG)_

_I dreamed I met a Mandalorian; A most amazing man._

_He had that look you very rarely find: The hardened, hunting kind._

_I asked him to say what had happened, How it all began._

_I asked again, he never said a word. As if he hadn't heard._

_And next, the room was full of wild and angry warriors. They seemed to hate this man._

_They fell on him, then disappeared again._

_Then I saw thousands of millions, crying for this man._

_And then I heard them mentioning my name. And leaving me the blame._

--"Revan’s Lament," Starfire 2! The Mandalorian Cycle! written by Senator See’raa Wen, 3940 BBY.
No!

Oh, my Starfire, that was masterful! You called them back again and again! What did the Mandalor want? I left you privacy of your thoughts for a time, but you were hiding from me. Hiding! Why are you hiding, now--

--and then Revan was--

--Cutting strips of pie cust for a topper on Deralia, familiar clank of bolts in the background, clank of chains on her feet as Ma’s eyes got too wide again. “Seiran! He’s back! Get the blaster! We have an autocannon primed in the ceiling. Cedrix. Don’t try anything. I’m growing rather fond of our guest--

--”Ma?”

--Watching a rehearsal for the musical starring Seriina Starr--

“Revan!” Malak’s voice, metallic and cold, echoed in the corridors of her mind, the locked place, where the Awakened Ones could not find her; where Revan could hide, retreat, escape into the shadows of oblivion.

[Coordinates 2939, v 312315. Target Kuat Driveyards. y/n.]

No! Come to me! Come and get me, you fracking assholes--

“Revan!” Dar’s voice echoed Malak’s. Calling her Revan. A cold metal arm closed on Revan’s shoulder and shook, pulling her back from the brink, from the ice, from the frozen pond--

Her eyes focused on the familiar face. Revan no longer wanted the name. Or the responsibility. Or the betrayal.

“Betrayal?” Malak’s voice was a whisper in her ear. “What just happened, Red?”

“Do you call us both ‘Red?’” she snapped out loud, blinking to clear the screams. “Her, too, right?”

“I…” Malak’s presence seemed to dim, as if he had stepped away. “She is my wife, but you are not… not my wife.”

“And what was Sheris? Byss cheese?”

“Revan!” Her own voice coming from that other body. The other woman glanced behind her and Revan was suddenly aware of the watching eyes: Rensha and her bridge command.

“I’m fine,” she snapped back. In Rakatan.

“Speak Basic,” Rensha barked at her. In Trandoshan. “I told you both before. No plots between you.”

“I just spoke to Canderous. We’ve lost the Mandalorians,” Revan said flatly. In Basic. “Most of them, anyway. They’re sending us five ships, not thirty-six.”

Her duplicate didn’t even look surprised. Which probably meant she was crapping her pants. “Oh.” Dar paused. “I considered that possibility. Hopefully the gravity well--”

“Frack your gravity well! We don’t have the ships!”

“General Revan, General Sheris is considering our approach.” Rensha’s growl was far too calm. Why in the stars were they all so calm about this?

“They almost didn’t follow us before,” Dar said quietly, glancing toward the Trandoshan. “Remember? They said the Sith Emperor was arusuum’la. They wanted to ship him back to us. They said I was not Lin.”

“Before they were frightened of the Machine Ships. Now, they think we will clean up their offal for them,” Rensha sneered.

“Recall your fleet,” Dar ordered Rensha. “Have them meet us at Degriass. Or Rekkiad, it is on one of the Core Trade Routes--”

“The Shelton?” Revan interrupted. “Are you nuts? You can’t take a fleet through that. The lane’s too narrow.”

“Not if you calibrate it precisely--”

“Oh, yeah? And who’s going to do that?” A thought struck her. “You took your ships to Rekkiad before. Did you use the Shelton Trade Route then?”

Annoyance shattered the other woman’s calm facade. “Of course not, Fragment. We took this route, the one the Mandalorians call the Dewback Road. But I entertained the possibility of the Shelton--”

“Entertain this,” Revan snapped. “It’s fracking impossible.”

Rensha’s talons tapped on their command board. “Several of my ships are still in hyperspace. It will take some days to reach their destinations without the Machine Ships’ routes--and if they have to turn around--”

“I can stall the Sleepers,” Revan muttered, wondering for how much longer. The screams in her mind seemed to brighten again, opening her mind to the cacophony of whispers, the maddened ships, the laughing Emperor.

Your Mandalorian wishes to speak with you, Tenebrae had said smugly. Too smugly. Had he known? Did he care?

Oh, I have faith in you, my Starfire, the voice in her mind murmured.

“I can lend you my strength,” Malak murmured, almost at the same time. “It will be enough.”

Will it? Power isn’t the problem, Malak. The way it felt to dance across the stars was. All those little lives. The rage of the Sleepers themselves. All of it was fuel.

All of it was hers--

And you know that’s a problem, the voice in her head that sounded like Polla whispered. Remember the last time you thought you could fix things with power? Remember Lehon? The Star Forge?
“I assume the Aleema is one of the five ships….” Dar was pulling up the Degriass System on her display. “And we have Carth’s armada….”

“Maybe we can use some of those asteroid belts,” Revan said, dully, staring at the dust of light around the unfamiliar sun. “If we put the Imperial capital-class gunships here….” Carth, she thought absently.

---

The Imperial Capital-Class Gunship has changed little in the past three hundred years. Relying more on shielding than most of the Sith-designed battleships, they are known for the devastating power of their turbo-lasers as well as their capacity to withstand atmospheric stresses and fight in lower orbits than most of their enemies.

This sturdiness of design was used to devastating effect by Talonis Revan during the Battle of Degriass.

--compiled by Archivist Lanna T'so.

---

Fate was funny sometimes. Canderous’s personal comm number pinged just as Carth was about to order a ship-to-ship connect to check on his son.

Carth pulled the call up on his private screen, all too aware of the eyes on the bridge. "So… Dustil's on your ship, I heard. Is he visiting Mekel, or--"

"Yeah." Canderous never sounded rattled, but Carth thought something seemed off when the man’s eyes shifted away from the cam. "When we get outta hyperspace, soon as it's safe, we'll transfer him to yours—if you want. Jin too."

Carth stared at the nav-board. “Not sure that’s gonna be any safer. You hear about the Republic Fleet pulling out?"

"More kills for us." Canderous didn't sound like he cared, but Carth knew him too damn well. "Just talked to Revan. Zabrak's talking with Revan's voice, now. She talk to you, too?"

"Yeah…a bit." Now, Fats was as silent as a tomb, awake and blinking now as the priestess shoveled food down its gullet, but his eyes weren't glowing. Don't you want to talk to me, too, beautiful? She had to be busy. She was probably really busy. And Carth couldn't say he'd ever get to like hearing his wife's voice come out of that bloated thing.

"Onasi, there's… something else." The hesitation in Canderous's voice was unusual. In fact, Carth didn't think he had ever heard the man stutter before. "If Revan didn't already tell you… the Clans are pulling out of this fight. Most of… most of them."

"What?" Later, Carth realized he should have gotten it instantly but in that moment Canderous might as well have been speaking in Taug. “Why? Are they going after the Republic ships?”
"Hah." Canderous’s chuckle sounded forced. “I told you they wouldn't follow Revan.” The Mandalorian looked tired over the blurry holovid. As tired as Carth felt. "Had to work like hell to get them to follow the Republic and that other one. Take orders from the Zabrak kid… that wasn’t easy, but now… you brought her back. Aru’suum’la. Unchanging. My people won’t fight for her."

"But we needed her." That sounded better than 'I needed her.' And it was true. "You saw that last fight--what she did there--"

"I saw. If Revan can render them bloodless so easily, you don't need our forces. Clan won't fight for the deathless." He sounded defeated. "I still command the Aleema and four Weis ships with crew that want to earn back their honor. We’re with you to the end. But the rest--." His voice trailed off. "Five capitals, Onasi. Twice as many fighting squadrons in them. That's all we can give."

"But you lead the Mandalorians--"

"Not anymore." The Mandalorian lowered his voice to nearly a whisper. "And I'll gut you if you ever let it be known that I threw that damned fight, but I couldn't do it. I couldn't… risk--"

"What fight?" But Canderous's image was fuzzing out in that tell-tale pattern of dissolution that told Carth that somewhere, on the other side of hyperspace, some Sleeper ship had knocked out another transceiver. "Wait--what do you mean Clan isn't following? We need your ships! The Republic's pulled out! You can't just--just not--"

But then Carth was talking to thin air. In the sudden silence aboard his flagship became aware of the crew standing around, looking as shell-shocked as he felt.

“Five Mandalorian ships?” Ensign Kagnos was speaking out of turn again. The boy looked as green as he was, like he was about to be sick. “That’s it? But they've been leading the vanguard--"

"Five ships and the Great Hunt. We have a few days," Carth said numbly. "See if you can get Fats up and running. And double everyone's sleep shifts. And rations." His eyes went to Corporal Sreekeet, nominally in charge of Engineering. “I know the spanner jockies have a still down in Shield Maintenance. Order em to release their stash. Send me the bill.”

"But my Lord Admiral--" Carth's Second looked like he was about to argue.

"Do as you're told, Admiral Tarr," Yuthura snapped. Her headtails were wrapped around her neck.

Carth closed his eyes, tallies of numbers dancing in his mind. All Imperial against three hundred and nine enemy capitals. At least.

“Do the best you can on repairs, too,” he added. “Don’t… get the guns working. I want turbolasers online across every bow. If you need to re-jigg from shields or… or life support, do it.”

His eyes went to Rew Ekkumi, sitting demurely in her restraints on the deck. He hadn't known where else to put her. But she spoke Mandalorian, just like they all did, and she'd heard--

"It's not too late," Rew said softly. "We can pull out too, Carth. It's what Revan wants."

Did she really want him to run? It made no damned sense!

"Get the damned wideband back online. Try different channels… bounce it off Core relays, I don't "care what you have to do!" Carth snapped. "Get me through to the Great Hunt. Now!"

Xxx

By all accounts, Talonis Revan inspired loyalty in the officers who followed him, Republic and Imperial alike. But his control of the Mandalorian Fleet during the Machine Wars continues to be confusing when seen from an outside perspective.

The Mandalorian clans refuse to speak of it. Recently, a visitor to the Lin Ducal palace on Malachor III was told that Talonis Revan never existed.

--compiled by Archivist Lanna T'so.

Xxx

"Well?" The mask looked good on Aemelie and from the smugness in her voice she knew it. "Can we trust these betrayers again?"

"We can trust Carth and Revan." Aemelie was allowing only five ships to meet this challenge. She'd ordered the rest to jump immediately to Dxun. "We won't have the Republics."

"There is no glory in a rout--for either side. The last few fights were too simple. You hold your faith with the naastar. So shall we. The Aleema is worth fifty of their ships, Husband. And we have the Riotous Sphere and its sister warbirds as well. All the traitorous vessels of Weis, ready to reclaim their glory."

"So be it." His fingers ached. He did not want to look at her bandaged hand. Husbands and wives should never duel for blood. It was always unlucky. "Then we… we should transfer our med-bay to the Munificent Rancor. Tell the other ships to dump their bays, too. I would advise my Mand'alor to scatter them among the fleet."

Aemelie tilted her head. "We can't afford to lose warriors to guard them during the transfer. We may jump into the heat of battle--"

"The dar'jett and Jin. And… Milli." He threw their daughter's name down like the last gauntlet. "They both have a claim to Jin. It's appropriate. They can fly escort."

She nodded; expression hidden by the mask. But he knew that tightening of her hands, the crack of her voice over the speaker of helm. "A good plan. As you wish, Husband."

Canderous bowed his head. "May our children sing our death-songs bright, Mand'alor."

Aemelie’s masked face nodded. She was probably smiling under it. Damn her. "But not with this battle."

Xxx

Sheris: "I'm afraid that I'm in love with him, Revan." [Gives a shuddering sigh.] "I can't believe I said that out loud! But it's true! I'm in love with him! I love your husband."

Revan: "No! That's not possible! It's just not possible! You're my identical twin sister!"

Sheris: "Not quite so identical since you cut off my hand, so your former husband could tell us “apart.”

Revan: "Carth's not Malak. He'd never... he loves me! You must have tricked him!"

Sheris: "You're so wrong. Carth never loved you."

--"You Make the Darkness Seem So Far: Sheris, a Love Story," Hosnian Vid Productions, Dir. By Sir Phylus Blais, Screenplay by Lady Tee'raa Wee, est. 3949 BBY.

--compiled by Archivist Lanna T'so, University of Coruscant.

Xxx

Perhaps it was the miasma of Vima's influence that had been dissipated, or perhaps it was just that the crew of the Great Hunt had been fighting for weeks without a break, but now that they were hurtling toward the end, the air on the ship got festive.

Revan was startled to see bottles of decidedly non-regulation booze appear on the consoles next to the unshaven and slightly wild-eyed sents; even more surprised to nearly walk into what looked like a Trandoshan orgy in the officer's fresher. Rensha, at least, hadn't been there, she thought with relief, seeing the familiar lizard standing aloof on her bridge. The Toydarian was strapped to his place on the bridge, too, feathers sticky with sweat.

"I trust you slept, Brown." The word Rensha kept calling her was closer to Brown Fur than hair, but her meaning was clear enough. Dar was Red and she was Brown, although another centimeter of red had appeared at Revan’s hairline, seemingly overnight. When she pulled her hair into a topknot, the brown dye seemed nothing more than cheap facade on her identical face, both of them the same.

"I slept for a few hours. Dar--err, Red Fur's still asleep. Figured she needed it." Revan had not slept. She had been with the Sleepers above a dozen different worlds--Nar Shaddaa (again) at the last. "You let my friends out of the brig yet?"

"It is not safe for the Wookiees when our… tr’chur is up." Rensha's snout wrinkled back and she gave the word for blood-lust an extra trill, meaning extra lusty, Revan figured. "They desired to return to your ship and I allowed it."

"Oh." Pang of guilt. She'd done little more than comm quick commands about her friends before losing herself in the stars again. All those little lives--the screams of the ships when she called to them--

Now you see. Tenebrae's whisper of approval nearly seemed to come from her own thoughts.

You keep saying that! What the frack do you think I’m seeing? Our doom?

You will not die, Bright One. There is enough of me in you now to assure that.

Oh, yeah? I don't think you're familiar with how much damage a laser cannon can do--

You care for them. They are dirt. Motes of filth in the glory of the stars. But you care for them. I do, too.

“Brown!” Rensha’s talons dug into her arm so hard that Revan yelped--and nearly backhanded the High Admiral of the Republic Fleet into her own navboard.
“Sorry, I… it was the Sleepers,” she lied. “They, uh, they went to Dantooine.”

“I trust you recalled them?”

“Of course.” Revan crossed her arms and scowled, because that seemed to be what commanders did, if Dar was a good example. “Do you think it’s wise to allow discipline to slip this badly before our fight?”

“Hunters require release,” the Admiral shrugged. “My men are more than capable of rising to the task when it is required of them.”

"I could not reach you!" Abruptly, Malak appeared, flickering dimly between her and Rensha.

_I was in the stars._ The pang of resentment she felt at being pulled back into this meat-body was irrational, and, when Revan thought about it too much, fracking terrifying.

Put aside your fears. That smug, dannable voice in her thoughts!

"Shut up!"

Malak's expression looked startled. Revan didn't like seeing him at all, but especially not like this: this ghostly vision of a man with a jaw and thinning hair, with an expression that held more concern than hate. "I am only trying to help."

"Not you," she muttered. "It's him. Do you hear him, too?"

"Him?" Malak shook his head. "Who?"

"Who? Your fracking da--of course I mean the Emper--" Revan broke off, suddenly aware of the silent stares. Between her and Malak were half a dozen sents who were actually alive. And listening.

"Did you just tell me to 'shut up'?" The Trandoshan Admiral's face looked almost amused, as if they'd moved to a place beyond offense.

"Not you." Revan wiped her nose again, trying to ignore the way her vision flickered with stars.

Now you become--

_Get out of my head!_

Oh, Starfire. We are past that. I thought you would be pleased, to have more time in your vital body--

"Wide-band is up again," Rensha told her. "Your Captain called twice."

"Husband," Revan corrected her. "My husband called twice? How're they doing? Did you tell them about the… uh… the Mandalorian issue?"

Rensha walked stiffly to her chair and sat down. "The issue of five Mandalorian dreadnaughts? Instead of thirty-odd? The Imperial Fleet knew already."

Malak frowned. "Red thinks we can win without them. Do you agree?"

_She does?_ That made Revan want to laugh. _Tell her to get her ass up here._ She felt a spike of anger. "You're the one who pulled the entire Republic fleet, Admiral. At least we still have the Imperials or we'd be totally fracked--"

Her voice broke off because Rensha was shaking her head. "Rew Ekkumi took a shuttle to the Captive Arm before they went to hyperspace. She attempted to persuade Carth Onasi to return the Imperial Fleet to Kaas." Rensha's teeth bared. "Onasi has commed twice demanding to know if her words are true." Her tongue flickered. "I assured him it was not, but he wanted to hear it from you. When I could not produce you, he became suspicious."

The bottom seemed to drop out from under Revan. "What?"

"Do you require me to repeat that again?"

"No." Her hand was already tracing commands on her comm-link to Dar, pinging the alarm she'd set for Mission (still coordinating repairs on the Hawk), and activating the codes for a priority comm to the Captive Arm. "Why didn't you wake me—"

"We tried," Rensha said grimly. "Six adrenal shots. Your arm may be sore."

Revan rubbed it absently. It was sore, but it had been ever since that damn tomb, where the Preserver had scratched it.

The loc pinged back and forth, searching for a wideband link. The abrupt silence on the bridge seemed to stretch for decades.

Treachery? Revan felt numb.

"Admiral Rensha. General… General Revan." Abruptly, Carth was there on her comm unit. Stupid hat on his head, fuzzed in blue.

"Carth Onasi," the Trandoshan said.

"Carth Onasi." Revan followed Rensha's lead, not giving him a title.

"Tried to call you twice, General. We're gonna be at Degriass. Whether you want us there or not." He didn't bother making excuses. Such a good soldier. Just the facts, sister. "Glad to see you're in one piece."

Revan kept her voice dry, as she felt her accent slip into a drawl. "I'll try to have something left for you to shoot at." She glanced up at Rensha, but the Trandoshan was silent. A ping came in on her wrist comm. The display held name and a line through it.

"Tell Dar that I know that already, she demanded of Malak.

"She regrets the necessity," the ghost whispered. "In Imperial Space, it is customary to have the commander of the vessel perform the duty."

Carth won't do it himself. She knew him too well. "Carth Onasi." Revan kept her voice even. "You have a traitor of ours on board your vessel. A Rew Ekkumi."

"Yes." His eyes jerked to the right to something offscreen. "She's… right here. Trust me, I'm as… as she's going to be subjected to a Coruscanti court martial just as soon as we win this--"

"No," Revan interrupted. Louder than she needed to. A few ensigns jumped.
Rensha's tongue flicked in and out.

Carth persisted. "I know what she did, but she--Yuthura took a look and her mind, it's--she said Rew's been under heavy compulsion for weeks!"

"The… the one who compelled her is dead. Was dead, when Admiral Ekkumi abandoned her post."

Her husband scoffed. "Did she get to you too? That Jedi? Atris?"

"I beg your pardon, sirrah." The civilian title was a double insult, and she watched his face darken.

"Revan," her husband whispered. That furrow of doubt between his brows. "Are you… you?"

"Yes, Carth." She closed her eyes. "I'm still me, Flyboy. Just… don't make this more difficult."

"I'm not trying to be difficult! But you--"

In the back of her mind, images flickered through the Awakened Ones's faceted eyes. They were above Coruscant again. Gleeful and spiteful, as if they knew how much she hated them for it. She flared her strength in the Force, felt them scream, felt them turn--

And then, one-by-one they winked out, tunneling back, screaming her death in their minds--

-- His name was Aeritus Drachmar, and he was the heir, the rightful heir; but the usurper, the bastard boy had taken everything, everything--even his life--

--Her name was Fiola Rabine and she came as the Emissary from Ziost to witness the ceremony, the ceremony young Vitiate said would unlock the power of the Sith--

--His name was Siw-kap and he was ten years old today on Medriass and he'd just passed his first Blood trials--

A hundred lives flashed before Revan’s eyes. A thousand. Eight thousand, all disjointed and jumbled as each Machine Ship screamed it's fury through the ether, all lost, everything lost and all because of--

Him. Him. And Revan, too-by default because she was a part of him, she was the fuel burning the galaxy alive, its spark--

They still blame me, do they not? Oh, my Starfire. Valkorion's dry chuckle echoed in Revan's mind. On such petty urges came the strength to forge an Empire, harness the power of the Infinite Empire. I took their tiny lives, motes of dirt and I fashioned them into something great, something better, something immortal, something mine.

They are beautiful. They were, but terrible, too. The Rakatan device needed the organic component. The protein chains--

Yes! Yes! His rapture was infectious, she felt it catch in her own throat, somewhere distantly her mouth was smiling. Now you see!

Yes. The strands were degraded. It would take centuries to rebuild them, correct the errors, clean up the signal noise--the noise that sounded like the Machine Ships, their voices all screaming--
Come, she commanded, and felt them turn-- even as she felt something else shift within the music of the spheres.

The balance of power between old and new. Experience and novelty. Valkorion--

--and her.

"Revan!" Something elbowed her sharply in the ribs. Something like an elbow. "Hey! Wake up!"

Familiar voice. Deralian burr. Revan blinked to find Polla Organa staring her in the face, with one hand on her shoulder as if she was about to shake her, and the other brandishing an oversized rifle.

"Polla..." Revan tasted salt on her lips again and wiped the whole mess with the sleeve of her white robe.

"Yeah. Sorry I took so long to get here." The woman made a face. "Wanted to check out the repairs to the Hawk."

"Ghost." Revan wiped her nose again. "Mission renamed it. It’s the Blue Ghost, now."

"Well I’m here." The Deralian’s smile seemed fixed. "Uh, Da says hi. And Zaalbar. Mission said to watch out."

"Yeah, I… I’ll do that.” She shook her head to clear it.

"Revan? You okay?" Carth from the comm. "You, uh… blanked out there for a second, Freckles."

Revan blinked at the chron in her datafeed, registering a lapse of roughly five minutes. "I need to sit down." There was a chair--her chair. Next to it, another. For ‘General Sheris.’ She sat down slowly. The holographic image of Carth pivoted, keeping her in view.

Cold as Hoth. "Rew Ekkumi, Carth?"

"Yeah." He swallowed, glancing to the side at someone she couldn’t see. "Revan. When this is over, a military tribunal for Admiral Ekkumi--"

"She's on an Imperial ship. This is a tribunal."

“What?"

“This is the tribunal, Admiral Onasi.” Something about this was horribly, horribly familiar. From one of her nightmares. Revan looked up to see the Trandoshan examining her with narrowed eyes, her tongue flickering out faster.

Stop this, Rensha, she thought. Give me a direct order so I can stop this--plea for clemency--

“My apologies. I was asleep.” Dar's voice rang out from the officer's entrance on the side of the bridge. She walked across the deck of the flagship like she owned it. Revan wondered if she'd ever get that walk right.

"General Sheris. So glad you could join us." The acid in Revan's voice wasn't directed at Dar, but it earned her a raised eyebrow in return. "We're just waiting for the prisoner now."

"Yes, General Revan." Dar paused, her eyes turning toward the holocams, and beyond them to the "General Sherisss." The Trandoshan's exhale added a level of sibilance to the name.

"Lieutenant C'Tannis," Dar added, her voice softening. "You should eat something."

The Toydarian shrank away as she passed him. At the moment, his eyes weren't glowing at all, just their normal black. And terrified. Revan remembered how she'd found him, filthy and chained to a chair. Dar hadn't been intentionally cruel, she just hadn't--

She'd had other concerns. So many little lives. It was hard to keep track.

Around them, the bridge crew had abandoned their cups. The bridge was suddenly immaculate, every officer and enlisted sent sitting as straight as their vertebrates allowed. The hiss of the breathing mask on the nearest Mon Calamari seemed to echo in eerie counterpart to Revan's own heart.

"She's here. She wants to speak for herself." Carth's voice again--stubborn--his head turning to someone offscreen.

"Pull the holocams back. We all need to see." Revan's voice didn't feel like her own voice. Like an echo. Like she'd said this before.

Rew Ekkumi was in restraints. Sith ones. They weren't comfortable. Revan remembered from the Leviathan. But she was still dressed in her admiral's best, still even had the cap on her head. Not a hair out of place. An almost smug smile marred the even features of her face.

There was no point in hating her, but Revan hated that smile.

There were words that were supposed to be said. Revan knew that. Dar probably had them memorized. Malak, too. But she wanted this done. And so she closed her eyes and reached for the Force, for the Toydarian, dozing silently only a meter away. She felt his body jerk, quivering as she entered him, like falling into a maelstrom.

She felt his horror, numbly, and wiped it clean as she had before. Before, when she'd visited Canderous. When she'd given Carth his orders. When she'd spoken to a hundred other ships with their own prisoner chained on their bridge. Little lives.

The price.

Lives spun around her, impossibly fast now. There was the Chessnan baker locked in a cellar on Deralia, and Callie Lee on Coruscant, and a billion others, a billion tiny little lights, like looking down on Coruscant from the perch of their balcony--

My Starfire. Do you see? Do you see?

Revan could orient herself to the center by the beams of light, hovering below an ovoid egg. Those symbols weren't real--her sight was more sensation than perception, but there in that center was He-

I require a body, Vitiate. She barely recognized her own voice, and it was not one: just the demand itself, issued like an order. Somewhere, beyond this center of their selves, the screams of the enraged Sleepers echoed across stars, their power a harsh wind channeling through her. And now, tethered to the light of Him, she could harness their fury--
Yes. Yes. Yes! Precisely! Oh, my brilliant. My brightest spark!

And then from the Toydarian's essence it was easy to slip into the ancient pureblood's skin like a well-worn pair of shoes. The eyes of the bloated man Carth had called Fats snapped open. A clumsy body wobbling in its chair of chains. A priestess of the Hand, kneeling at his feet--

His name has been Darth Omin, once. And he had served on the Dark Council as the Emperor's Wrath until his appetites outmatched his body and then Tenebrae rewarded him with his greatest desire; to sleep, mindless and slack, and to serve to serve His Luminance forever as long as his flesh endured--

The bloated pureblood's limbs had been bound, his feet atrophied beyond use, perhaps decades ago. It did not matter. Revan made his body stand up, the tortured pain just another sensation, like the small of ozone in the air, the sudden stench of fear--

She forced his cracking feet across the deckplates. The man swayed and would have toppled had the Force not kept them whole.

"Rew Ekkumi," the pureblood's mouth slobbered.

The infuriating smile suddenly faded and the Telosian's eyes widened. "What--"

And then, a tremor in the Force. An object, intruding between her prey and this fumbling, bloated hand--

Behind the Twi'lek, Carth had moved, too. Imperial bars of that absurd uniform a lie. Disobedient. Insolent. "Revan," he echoed. "Freck--"

She clenched the pureblood's fist and saw her lover swallow the rest of the word, hand going to his throat, eyes widening in horror, even as her fingers opened, releasing him again. "No," he muttered hoarsely, stumbling upright again. "This isn't… this isn't you. You'd never--it's him. It has to be him--"

"Revan!" Yuthura murmured again. Those eyes knew better. No soft innocence in them at all. Her hand reached out and grabbed the red flesh of the pureblood's arm. "Revan. Look at me."

"Stand aside. This is justice--" the pureblood's tortured throat made the word a guttural moan. "Rew Ekkumi. I sentence you to death."

Her fate finally seemed to dawn on the woman's face. "You're insane," she spat. "I wanted to save him. I was saving your own people!"

As if from a distance, Revan heard herself begin to laugh, raw and choking and cruel as she gathered the Force in her paw--

The click of a lightsaber was unmistakable, as was the reaction of the crew on the Imperial bridge. First, Revan saw them rushing away, strangely etched in a red light. Something like a kinrath stung her back and then a band of heat seared her breath. She heard the pureblood gasp and choke.

The former Darth Omin’s body fell forward, the bridge titling crazy-squared as Revan still looked up through his eyes; seeing Ban's body armor; her violet face, etched in blood by the light of her blazing saber--

Stabbed me? She stabbed me--

Oh, my Starfire. Tenebrae's mock disappointment scalded her skull. Never stay when they're going to die. It's so unpleasant!

XXX

Fleet Admirals Denis Cein and Rew Ekkumi made contributions that are often overlooked in the Machine Wars.

--compiled by Archivist Lanna T'so.

XXX

Well, that was a disaster. Inwardly, Revan winced to think of what the Republic Senate would make of this display, should a recording survive them. All you had to do was perform a clean execution, Fragment! Or command one of the other officers. They're well-trained, not like your husband--Malak? Tell her--

Do you still find death so easy, Red?

No. Revan felt her mouth twitch as she answered Malak, despite the inappropriateness of the setting. But I don't have her kind of power. Ekkumi’s execution should have been painless.

No. The Emperor is corruption incarnate. His strength comes with a price. When she stared long enough, his face appeared to her. Darth Malak’s face--not Knight D’Reev’s. It had ceased to bother Revan.

The pureblood did not feel much pain, I think. Sheris was the only one who would care about that, but she sounded pleased. His torture is over.

Tenebrae’s strength comes with a price, Malak repeated stubbornly, as if that was the point. I had little awareness of my possession, but I relished the strength he gave me. I grew... dependent on it. For you... was it that way for you?

I did everything in my power to be free of him. Not just for the good of the galaxy. Revan’s ugly secret. I wanted to be free of him because I wanted to be free. I regret that she cannot be; but we need her link to the Machine Ships and I have no way to free her in any case--

That wasn’t my question, Red. His sepulchral whisper nearly hissed in her ear.

She did not want to answer his question. Tenebrae’s power had lapped at her feet, water gushing from a broken dam by the end, and she had refused to reach for it; but that ascetic remove had come with its own price. Abstention was the other side of the coin from excess, and her withdrawal from the sentient lives around her had carried its own cost.

She knew that now, having seen in the Fragment a glimpse of the woman Revan had never been allowed to be.

"Give General Revan a moment." Revan called out loud, and bent down to lift the still-prone figure, struggling in the Force to move the unconscious lump of her former body back into its more dignified chair. Around them, the bridge crew seemed frozen: tac in the overlights.

"Is she all right?" Onasi's voice from the holocam. Had no one cut the feed? Fools.

"General Revan is fine. You just stabbed the Voice on your flagship, Ban?" Revan was almost impressed by the woman's rashness. "He is dead, I assume?"

"Yes." Yuthura sounded Jedi-serene. "Is she all right?"

"I'm given to understand the sensation of dying can be a bit of a shock."

Inappropriate, Red. Tell them she's going to be fine. Malak's form was hovering again over them both.

"Just in shock," Revan added, wondering if a Sheris giggle would be a bit much.

It would, Malak commented.

She'll be fine. I'm less sure about her marriage. Revan meant it as a joke, but her own husband's ghostly visage couldn't smile back. Instead, that damned prosthesis flickered over his rotting jaw, a painful reminder.

"Lady Ban? Admiral Onasi? Are you--"

"We're fine. General... Sheris." The pause in the name was just shy of insolence, deliberate or not.

"I take it you will not be proceeding with the execution General Revan ordered you to perform?" Belatedly, Revan noticed Polla Organa, who had no business at all on this bridge, was now leaning against the comms board, one hand on her blaster as if she needed it for security.

A high-pitched wailing from the comm's speakers revealed itself to be the Voice's Keeper when the camera rotated. She was rending her garments.

"We will not be executing anyone. " Admiral Onasi had found his spine. "What're you going to do about it, General Sheris? Open fire on your last allies?"

"Of course not." The Fragment’s possession and Force display on their Arm’s bridge would at least give some of its more mutinous officers and conscripts pause. "Merely a recommendation, Admiral. I trust you will have another Voice shipped from one of the secondary commands as soon as we debark from hyperspace. We will need to review our new battleplans and we can’t expect wideband to continue to be this reliable. Might we assume you’ll return the prisoner to your brig? And we will see the Imperial Fleet in Degriass. Of course, if they take the wideband out all we’ll be able to do is see you." She took a breath, glancing at Fragment... still slumped in her chair. "Your ship is the best-equipped. It will lead the vanguard. I trust you remember how?"

"Yeah. Another day and a half," Carth Onasi muttered. "Give or take. We'll be there."

"Slightly less for us. Wideband will most likely be down in the system. Get your replacement Voice on a shuttle immediately upon arrival. If you fail to reestablish our communication channels, I'm sure you'll be able to find us easily enough. We will be with the five or six Mandalorian capital ships near the center of the fray, holding back the multitude of Sleepers coming from all directions. General Revan can keep them stunned for roughly three minute intervals--" her fingers moved through the air, directing the transmission to send him the opening salvos, her estimates of the coordinates.

Carth Onasi nodded grimly. “Fine. Can you wake Revan up?”

"General Sheris has given you an accurate assessment of our forces. We are done for now."
Admiral Rensha broke in. "General Revan is… indisposed, Captain Onasi." Old Scaly cut the comm before Revan could.

General Revan was in fact already twitching, signifying her return to consciousness, but Revan approved of the Trandoshan’s decision. It would further demoralize their crews to see their leaders at odds.

Slumped in her chair, the Fragment groaned. The roots of her hair were red. Her topknot lay like a wilted stem on top of them. "Frack." But her eyes opened, clear and focused. "Carth--w-what did--"

"His forces will meet us at Degriass," Revan told her. “Rew Ekkumi will remain in the brig. Admiral Onasi will procure another Voice from one of the Imperial ships."

The Fragment shivered, staring past Revan--to Malak's insubstantial form. "That was a kriffing disaster. Why the hell did I listen to you?"

“You came to the same conclusion we did,” Revan told her. “And you will have inspired fear, which is required on Imperial commands. Lady Ban will be seen as a rising power among the Sith, and the admiral’s disobedience a sign of his own initiative.”

“What? Is that what you planned all along” The Fragment shook her head. “How do you do that? You always… you twist things!”

“Every disadvantage can be turned on its end,” Revan told her. “You know this as well as I do.”

“Right,” her duplicate snapped, kneading her temples. “I do. Except when it all gets fracked.”

---

Jedi Master Ollivair Loanin had two children with Princess Deena Kira of Onderon. By all accounts it was a love match, and they lived together happily for many years. Their daughter, Queen Sam I was known for her temperance as well as her skill with the dxun in the skies, although her Force potential was slight.

Although it was widely known that Master Loanin was half Zabrak and half Human, the claim that he was the son of the Jedi scion of a Coruscanti senator is false. Indeed, genetic tests have uncovered something even more surprising: Ollivair Loanin's descendants share common markers with Master Vrook Lamar, uncle to Revan Starfire. Lack of a mitochondrial match on the female side, however, points to a male relative of Revan's, perhaps a son of Lamar's as the progenitor.

Given the potential for unprecedented gifts within the family line, the royal Kira bloodline of Onderon should be watched for potential apprentices...

---Confidential notes from Lord Zash, to her apprentice P'ink Kallig of Tor, Dromund Kaas, private collection.

---compiled by Archivist Lanna T'so.

---

Xxx
"Won't be long now!" Doctor Gordo chuckled, patting Lydie's abdomen in a way that didn't make her feel comfortable. But nothing about pregnancy was comfortable. "Given any thought to a name?"

"Ollivair." She straightened as much as she could, snapping her dress back on her body. The baby was a boy, they'd seen the scans already on the portable bioscanner Azen had stored on their ship, bought with some of the last of the portable Loanin fortune.

"From the holobook? Ollivair Tesserect? Oh, ho!" Doctor Gordo chuckled. "I thought tales like that had gone out of style."

"My aunt had a copy."

"Your dear Aunt Marla?"

"That's right," Lydie said.

"Auntie Marla! You know, she was ten kilos at birth. Ten! I had to give Aelma Korr fifteen stitches just to knit up again…." And Doctor Gordo was off, reminiscing about the rest of Lydie's family. "My dear, children are the future!"

"Yes." The Force nudged Lydie forward again, smiling to hide her unease. Something about Dr. Gordon made her indentations twitch.

Ollie, she thought fiercely, cupping her stomach. I promise this man isn't going to be the one to bring you into this world!

They'd already decided to leave Iridonia. Padawan Jorde had promised safe haven on Telos and asked for their help reconstructing the Jedi Enclave there. Ma would be so disappointed not to see her grandson be born; but Jedi still vanished every day across the galaxy, and the longer Lydie and Azen stayed in one place--

"We should talk about baby Ollivair's future," Dr. Gordon said, just as Lydie reached for the door. "He has so much potential. Just like his great-aunt Marla. Or his father, if I'm not mistaken."

Lydie took a deep breath, forcing herself to remain calm. "Thank you. I like to think my husband has endless potential."

"Of course you do." The voice chuckled. "But I was talking about Ollivair's father. Mekel Jin?"

The man gave a strange hiccuping sigh. "Don't try and deny it. I know the bloodline quite well. My own families do have a certain… taste when I've bent your kin to my yoke. And Mekel Jin… oh, he... he is delicious. Merely a mouthful, of course, but the other... together they’re delicious!"

That cold feeling stuttered both of Lydie's hearts. "How do you know Mekel?" Jedi were vanishing every day, but Mekel had never been a Jedi, not really.

"Not like I am. I am a Jedi. I am a Jedi and I am not afraid-- It was a lie. She was shaking.

"You were to be mine too."

"You were to be mine too." The voice didn't answer her questions, speaking now with an echoing sibilance that made her flesh crawl. "Marla promised, but dear girl, but you've been breathing in the riskkkkk-alin for your last three appointments and it seems to have no effect at all. You're not alone- I've got a very messy pod on Manaan full of dead Selkath who should have been mine, too. Something's changed. She found a way to expand immunity, clever girl." The chuckle again. "Shame it won't last. Another generation, maybe two… viral resistance grows, and your herd immunity fades. The Selkath scientists predicted it."
Been yours? But Manaan—the Selkath—Lydie knew. They'd read about the Selkath ritual murders—and theorized, from the ancient Sith symbols scrawled on the walls in the holo-snaps, that their deaths had something to do with the Sith Emperor. The Sith Emperor and the ritual he used to possess more bodies.

The Sith Emperor, who is behind me right now—

"I know what you are," Lydie mumbled, trying to hide the quaver in her voice. "And you will never have my son."

"Oh, ho!" Doctor Gordon chuckled. "Do you have any idea, insect, how many times over the centuries I have heard mothers say precisely those same--"

Her hand shot out behind her. Like the bird, Lydie thought. Make it just like the bird you tried to make him fly but you pushed too hard.

“Aghhuhhh—” The Emperor’s voice garbled. Stuttered. Stopped.

Ollie kicked strongly in her belly. The bird. She’d been six. She had known its wing was broken, and had tried to use the Force to help him fly... with tragic results. Bird bones were fragile things compared to Zabrak ribs, but the force--the Force to bend them was just the same. Doctor Gordon had two hearts, one below the other. The beat of Force she sent crushed both sets of ribs and pierced them, compressing air as the fluttering ceased. Lydie didn't turn around. She was… she was afraid to turn around. To make this real… until she heard his body fall to the floor.

"You will never have my son," Lydie said to the empty room, the cooling corpse. "Never."

XXX

A/N Given the grimness of this chapter, I would like to mention, again, I promised you all a happy ending. I still mean it. Mostly a happy ending. Seriously!!! I mean it! Have faith!

Late addition to the text: song shamelessly ripped from “Pilate’s Lament” by Andrew Lloyd Weber and Tim Rice, Jesus Christ Superstar.

Questions For Some: The quotes at the beginning of the povs: I know this wasn’t precisely your suggestion, about tying things into the future… but your suggestion was the inspiration. Thank you!

And ether, as always. So many thanks!! And extra for the patience to correct my made up words a thousand times. And my Mandalorian.

Again, Lydie Korr, Azen Loanin, Ollivair Tesserect, Ganesh Jin, Deena Kira and the Blais family circus are not my OC’s: thanks so much to roseohseven, plutospawn, DinahLance, and miarrow for their inclusion in this tale.

Ether: yes, the death in the Yavin Moon call-out is totally SWTOR, and is referring to as I like to think of him, “fake Revan.” (FWIW, all, I became so entranced with this idea I wrote an epilogue and gave him a real name, which I might post with or as a stand-alone when this is done.) A lot of this Valkorion is inspired from SWTOR as well. I really love all his talk about dust and motes and sentient beings.

So, timeline wise. I keep saying this is the penultimate to the penultimate chapter… and it is again. I think it’s going to take one more through the battle(s) and to the end. There are so many moving parts.
Thanks all, for continuing to read and review. It means a lot.
A Time to Rend

Chapter 77 / A Time to Rend

XXX

War is a series of steps, each off a precipice leading to another precipice.

Beware of beginning a war my darling, for you may not see its end--and that end may be worse for your lack of oversight.

--General Yusanis of the Echani, Collected Letters. Compiled by Master Mical of the New Jedi Order, Telos Enclave. (Est. 3979 BBY., Compiled 3963 BBY.)

[Note: General Jorde Yusanis fought in the Mandalorian Wars. Although this correspondence is commonly attributed to be written to his aide, some scholars have suggested the intended 'darling' was, in fact, Arren Kae, the former Jedi on who he sired two bastard children.]

--compiled by Archivist Lanna T'so.

XXX

The day that Revan Starfire came to the Great Hunt, Lileen and Rien's master bade them depart.

A Force crystal inset into a broken hilt was their only window into Master Traya's well-being. Their master had given it to them so they would not wonder her fate. Their master, Lileen had realized, did not expect to survive a reunion with her old apprentice.

The crystal cracked a day before their arrival in the Rekkiad System. The death seemed to harden poor Rien, but Lileen took some time to mourn the loss of Darth Traya.

She owed the woman who had once been Atris of the Echani that much. Once there had been six handmaidens and their Aunt Atris. Once there had been Lileen, Rien, Drien, Dialis, Diamin and Brianna. Daughters of General Yusanis, who had married Atris's sister.

All identical clones… save one.

After Brianna's betrayal and their aunt's transformation, Diamin left in the middle of the night and told no one her plans. Drien and Dialis promised to stay and watch over Mical, the half-brother with the mind of their master, but they had not trusted him. Lileen and Rien only had followed the face of their aunt--out of duty. Among themselves, they had questions, too--even if it wasn't until the crystal died that they found the strength to ask them--and then to wonder why they had never asked questions before.

As instructed, Lileen and her sister docked their ship on the small moon above the ice-planet Rekkiad. The atmosphere was breathable and the ground was covered in rocks, each with a name written in Aurebesh.

They were here to bear witness to the birth of a god and then to serve her, they had been told. But when the end came, it came not as it should. Instead of the death of a fleet from a Mass Shadow Generator, the end came with a short battle in the skies and then a rescue shuttle descending.

Their rescuers had Imperial accents, and assumed Lileen and Rien were survivors from the war, which had been won. They were not wrong. But every battle has its coda; its kilos’ debt of flesh.
And so, Lileen vowed, she would see that debt paid.

Xxx

Two days earlier, Coruscanti Standard Time, just outside of the Degriass System… in hyperspace….

Xxx

(Train your sons to be strong but your daughters to be stronger.)

Ke barjurir gar'ade, jagyc'ade kot'la a dalyc'ade kotla'shya.

--“Mandalorian Aphorisms for Everyday Seasons,” Undated.
--compiled by Archivist Lanna T'so.

XXX

"Mand'alor's balls! I will not!" The curses came in Mandalorian, audible through the closed door.

Mekel, who had promised to wait outside, flinched as General Ordo's voice roared back, then Ordo's wife yelled some more before Milli started in again.

"There are a dozen newly-blooded men to escort! Leskal or--"

"Are you refusing a direct command?"

"Are you refusing to consider Leskal or Jakata--"

"Millifar of Ordo! The future of our clan will be on this ship! Do you deny your training?"

"No! But in this war I am a warrior! Jin and I are warriors! Someone else can guard the future!"

Aemelie Ordo's voice took on a tone that Mekel might have called shrill as she tore into her daughter. (Stepdaughter? Niece? Milli had tried to explain Clan marriages more than once--like she was hinting at something--but Mekel had stayed deliberately obtuse.)

"We told you what is expected from a woman of the Clan! Weren't you listening before you took your vows?"

"My vows never said I should leave Ordo and go with Clan Zal--more than half the samples on that ship are theirs! One of their warriors should fly it--or Sinae herself! She has pilot’s training--"

"Oh, hey. Mekk." Dustil's voice was too casual, coming up behind him. "Myd was just telling me they've put us on babysitting patrol."

"Uh… yeah." Mekel pivoted and leaned into the wall. Behind him, behind that closed door, more raised voices yelled and something crashed. "Lucky us, right?"

"Lucky." Dustil pulled his full lips back. Dear old Myd had her arm slung almost aggressively around Telos's waist. She'd found some kind of Mandie dress to wear and had her hair all braided up like Milli's.
Mekel forced a yawn. "Yeah. So we get to escort the Mandalorian spankbank to a new ship--"

"And spend time with our children," Mydia interrupted, gazing up at Telos like he was the last man on the ship. "They'll be born soon."

"Myd says the boy baby has some of me in him, too. So it's like I have two kids now." Dustil's nonchalant shrug made something twist inside Mekel's guts.

"Neat." Mekel forced the grin to stay on his face. Did having someone's kid (or kids) change things that fast? Funny, it hadn't been that way for Mekel's own Dear Old Dads. He felt a little light-headed, because His Luminance had just held another ceremony only a few hours ago. In the time Mekel had been under, he'd almost got what Dustil had been thinking. Something about engines and pazaak decks, which figured, since they were about to face down the end of a war. No doubt Telos wanted to keep his mind clear of extraneous thoughts. Ban had taught them to do that--or, in Mekel's case, to say he was doing that--like right now, when he was really staring at dear old Myd's cleavage in that dress--

"Right," Telos smirked. His hand slipped behind Mydia. Mekel wasn't jealous--Mekel didn't get jealous, but... kids? Two of them? Would Telos even remember Mekel's fracking name after they were born?

_Fockda_, Mekel thought, so hard he felt sweat break out on his forehead. _Do you fracking hear yourself? You sound like a chivhole._ But his thoughts were just thoughts. No answering whisper in his head.

Without His Luminance there was no connection between him and Dustil.

And no Force at all.

"Mmm," Telos sighed, nuzzling Myd's braids. "You smell delicious, Myd."

"One of the Mandalorian slaves gave me some oil for my skin," she murmured up from between her lashes. "I'm glad you like it."

"Mmm, yeah." Either Telos was a better actor than Mekel had thought or that oil had Zeltron juice.

"Right." Mekel snapped out loud. He still didn't know what to do with his hands. Neither of them even glanced up when he cleared his throat. Telos looked like both of his hands were gonna be busy really soon, too--

"I will never forget this, Father!" Milli shrieked, coming out of the door and slamming the mechanism behind her. "Never!"

"That bad, huh?" Mekel held out his arms and the Mandalorian princess barrelled into them, almost knocking him over in the process.

Behind them, he heard Telos snigger.

"He says I am honor-bound to stay with you, Jin," Millifar snarled. "As well I am bound to the future of our woman's work--and Father says that my First Mother will be shamed by my disloyalty--and that Sinae is already displeased and thinking of curtailing my studies because of my disrespect!"

...and then she was sobbing again.
"There, there, Milli." Mekel patted her on the back, copping a quick feel while trying to ignore the two Force users joined at the hips. He shuffled his feet awkwardly, tugging Milli around with him. He and the princess weighed close to the same so it didn't go smooth. "Your hair smells great, by the way."

It did not. Her hair smelled like blaster char and adrenaline and maybe a little like puke. Not bad smells by themselves, but not in someone's hair.

Milli blinked at him. Her eyes were bloodshot and blue. "What?"

"Come here," he soothed, managing to turn her the rest of the way around. Telos had a very punchable smirk on, but Mekel didn't take his bait. "It's going to be fine," he whispered to Milli's strong nose. He kissed her lips lightly for good measure, receiving a warning squeeze from her artificial hand in return.

"Hrm..." Dustil drawled out. "You two should get a room."

Punching Sith worked out about as well as turning your back on them, so Mekel just shoved his clenched fingers around his girlfriend's back to flip Telos off. "You okay, babe?" He'd never seen her cry before and here she was doing it twice in as many days.

She blinked, sniffling. "No."

"We'll be together," he whispered into her hair, still glaring at Telos. "Leskal said we're going to a jungle planet. I'm a street rat, so you'll need to show me the ropes."

"Dxun is a moon," she corrected. "And I've never been."

"Then we'll explore it together." He kissed the side of her cheek.

Telos was rolling his eyes. Mekel twitched one side of his mouth in a Korriban promise.

XXX

Have you heard of Jasp Organa? The best fighter pilot in the galaxy? It may seem funny now, but in his own time, only a few sents knew the name, and most of them were in the Exchange, which was still misunderstood back in those days to be a criminal enterprise....

--From, A Deralian Child's Garden of Voices: Vol IX, Stories from the Machine Wars, Derra City Press, Deralia, BBY 3522.

XXX

"Hello." Jasp Organa cleared his throat. The woman was glowing--eyes open, mouth slack. He'd seen her fly--seen her glow before, too--so this glowing now shouldn't be a surprise. But she looked like a statue, sitting there with her eyes wide open. "Hello. Uh, Revan? They said... said I could come right in, but if you're busy, I could come back."

No response. Jasp cleared his throat again. He pulled out a few of the choca bits he'd traded for, bolted the smile on his face. "Got something for you." He held the candy out, like he was gentling a hessi.

Her glowing eyes didn't even blink.
“She cannot hear you. She is with the Sleepers.” The other one was stealthy as a loth-cat, creeping up from behind instead of standing in the doorway and saying she was there. They’d given the Revans shared quarters right off the bridge in what looked like the old officer’s break room, going by the plush walls and the artwork. Two temp-cots propped by the wall jarred with the deluxe decor.

The woman with his daughter’s memories was curled up on one cot, legs tucked under her, back ramrod straight. The other one edged in between him and her, her hand resting on the seated one’s shoulder.

Jasp had heard—course he’d heard—he’d seen it on the Hawk. Reports streamed in from the Core and the Rim: the enemy fleet of destroyers would alight in the skies above a world and then vanish when she called them away. Everyone on the Hunt had heard what she was doing to save their homeworlds, even if half of em still cursed her for a traitor.

"How long does it last?" On the Hawk, she’d never seemed so still. Jasp took a handful of choca out again and placed them all in a line on the shelf next to her.

"It varies." The other one sighed. "You are welcome to stay until she recovers. I have caff."

Jasp pulled the flask he’d been carrying recently out of his vest. "Got my own. Thanks."

"Of course." That earned him a thin-lipped smile, and before he knew what was what, the former Dark Lord of the Sith was sitting across from him on the other cot, sipping a cup of her own caff while Jasp stared dubiously at his own rotgut (also traded for) now housed in what looked like someone’s not-too-clean tooth-rinse glass.

Revan—the one he’d come to see—hadn’t moved the entire time. Her upper lip was stained with flakes of dried blood. When Pollie was little she’d had snot right in that same place every time she got a cold. He’d wiped it away with his thumb on her.

Jasp wouldn’t dare do that to this one.

"There is something you want to ask, I think." The other one settled in nigh the same position as the first. "Go ahead. You may ask me."

She wasn't wrong. He did have a favor to ask. He just didn't know how to phrase it.

“We’ll be out of hyperspace in another day….” Strange time, wandering a Fleet command ship and wondering if they’d ever get around to pulling Jasp's record. But then he’d seen the rosters for the next fight, and--damn his conscience for a fool. “Wanted to talk before then.”

The other one’s mouth twitched. “Is that not what we are doing?”

“To her.”

“Of course.” She had the decency to look uncomfortable. "I knew that. I was attempting to put you at ease with a joke." It wasn't putting him at ease that she seemed to be staring past him at the wall when she was talking. Then she smiled and shook her head, murmuring something under her breath in a language Jasp didn't know.

There was a long pause. Too long. The other Revan smiled a few more times until Jasp broke the quiet finally by holding up a few more choca creams. "Candy?"

"No thank you. I've never liked choca."
"Oh." They were Pollie's favorite.

"I am attempting to reach her to tell her you are here," the one Pollie called 'Bossypants' offered, after more quiet. She didn't appear to be doing anything that Jasp could see. Maybe she was just being polite.

Another long silence. "So... uh, tomorrow..." he offered finally. "Big fight, huh? I offered to show the sky jockeys how it's done--but they turned me down. Guess they don't want an old smuggler mucking up their perfect six-tens."

"Didn't you tell them about your Fleet commendations and your kill ratios?" The other one took another sip of her caff.

"Didn't get that far." He eyed her, wary now. Jasp tried to remember what he'd told Revan before--hell, he'd said stories Polla didn't even know on that flight through the Biscayne suns.

He stole another glance. Still a glowing statue, she was.

The other one cleared her throat. Green eyes regarded him over the rim of her cup. "Generally, we don't allow deserters to fly in our navy."

"Checking up on me?" He tried to ignore the prickle on the back of his neck.

"Admiral Rensha mentioned your record once or twice, but my counterpart and I vouched for your current integrity."

"Nice of you."

The glowing one was perfectly still. Not even a muscle twitch. For some reason he thought of Pollie on that Republic ship over Deralia with her head all in bandages. She'd been as still as that. He thought of this glowing one waking up on that same ship and finding her family gone. Had it been like that? He'd never had the chance to ask. Never thought to ask--

"Your daughter and I spent time together. I enjoy her company." The former Sith paused, a slight furrow between her brows. "I was expecting to see her... before tomorrow's battle. We both were expecting to see her."

"Well... Pollie has some things... the last few days..." Jasp's voice trailed away. "She's fixing up a few things on the Hawk right now. Pretty busy."

"My counterpart asked her to come." Bossypants frowned and got up, retrieving a wipe to dab at the counterpart's nose. It was bleeding again. "We sent word yesterday."

"Well... uh, Pollie's been busy. Like I said. Uh, setting up the Hawk."

Xxx

"Zaalbar was just saying Revan wanted to see you on the bridge--he said Polla Revan, so you know, he meant the one who--"

His daughter looked up, expression hidden under an enormous pair of goggles that had to belong to one of the Wookiees. "I know who you mean. Tell Zaalbar to tell her I'm busy, Da." She paused. "Tell them both I'm busy, Da."

Pollie didn't look busy, unless rearranging the spare cooling rods in reverse tempuratural order counted as busy, which Jasp didn't think it did.

Xxx

"Of course. We all have so little time. " This Revan had no expression on her face. "We have been very busy as well. Will you send Polla our regards?"

"Course."

Jasp had heard rumors, but not from Pollie. His daughter was wrapped tighter than a crimelord's purse these days. But rumors among the enlisted men spread like wildfire.

Ship gossip said the glowing one possessed that fat slob on Carth's ship and then Force choked her own husband before trying to execute a Republic officer who'd deserted... and then the Twi'lek Sith lady cut the fat slob down.

And Pollie had seen it. But when Jasp asked Pollie direct--

Xxx

"I don't want to talk about it, Da." Polla turned her back to him, fiddling with the catalytics in the Hawk's engine room that didn't need fiddling with. "You were right before. Soon as we get clear of hyperspace we need to get the hell out of here. I want to go home."

Stars knew, so did Jasp, but now--

"Pollie," he began, gently, so as not to spook her. "Thing is, they're real shorthanded. Don't laugh at your old man but I was thinking I might re-enlist."

"What?" She'd reeled off a lot of expletives after that--more than she needed to--like she had to show her old man his daughter was just as tough and ornery a smuggler as he'd ever wanted her to be.

And then he'd told her the rest. Hadn't wanted to say it, but it was coming, sooner than springtime, and maybe knowing would help her understand.

She'd cried then, his Pollie. He hadn't seen her cry like that since she was wee.

"Want to do some good," he'd explained when she'd calmed, offering the first of the choca bits out to her reddened eyes and splotchy nose. "They need pilots, Pollie. Might as well do some good before--"

"Shut up." Her arms locked around him, and then his fearless daughter bawled loud enough to wake the whole Wookiee clan snoring in the aft cargo bay.

Xxx

"Pollie was busy so I came instead." While Jasp had been mulling, this Revan had started smiling off into space again. What did the likes of her have to smile about? "Just to check up ... oh, and see if I could get a flight clearance for one of the squads...."

He edged that oar in as if it were casual. It wasn't. He'd seen their crew reports, the projections for enemy engagement. Calling the Hunt's fighter squadrons 'dangerously undermanned' was a polite underestimate. And losing three quarters of the rest of their capital ships was.... well. If they were really damned lucky, a brain-damaged bookie might've given them one-to-five odds. Might've.
To Jasp's surprise Revan didn't object. "I can give you approval to fly one of our strikers. Even a pardon for your previous desertion… but it's going to be a hard fight. A lot can go wrong."

Don't I know it. "Got a few more runs in me." Molla would yell at him for being a fool. He wasn't sure what the odds were that she'd have the chance.

"Yes." The Revan's eyes finally focused on him, with such laser-sharp intensity Jasp wanted to look away. "But I would take those runs soon." She tilted her head, frowning. The mask of her assurance slipped. "You do… you know… has anyone spoken to you about--how long--"

"Saw a doc back home. Heard the news already. No need to dwell."

Revan nodded. "I have training as a healer… if there's anything… if you have questions…"

"That's nice." Doc Sahara had already been through the particulars of his case. All those months, running on the unshielded Ravager… results were predictable as the old fallout like they used to say in the Navy. "No questions, General. Just want to do my part."

The Revan glanced at thin air again, frowning like she was consulting an invisible medix. "I'm afraid I can't buy you more time, but I can ease some of the symptoms."

"I'm fine for now." He wanted to ask how much longer she thought he had, but the words died in his mouth. "Well… well, I… uh, I should get going--"

"Of course." Bossypants smiled politely, eyes going distant again. Her hands traced symbols in the air, presumably to her command headset. "I'm making the arrangements. You'll be cleared to lead your own squadron."

"My own--" hell he hadn't want to lead! "Not sure that's necessary. I just wanted to help."

"You will be. We need squad commanders. With experience. You're a veteran." Her voice was distant again. "Good luck, Captain Organa."

Captain Organa. His hand automatically slid to his brow in a salute. "Thank you, ma'am. Uh… General--"

"--Sheris." Her mouth quirked. "You have been gone from the military a long time. It is permissible to call me 'sir.' The honorific merely assigns rank."

"Master Jedi." Later he'd wondered if maybe she'd muddled his head again but in that moment, Jasp meant it. "Thank you. Sir."

When Jasp looked back at the door the other one was still glowing and the former Dark Lord was holding her hand out to no one and smiling.

"I know, Mal," she said to the thin air itself. "It is funny. After all this time….."

Grass Priests, but it's wrong she looks happy right now! Still, was none of Jasp's business. One thing you learn quick in wartime: grab the happy times while you can, even if that meant talking to yourself in an empty room.

Xxx

Before his retirement, Admiral Carth Onasi was often accompanied by a Jedi advisor, although the few holovids that survive from this time show only a blurred figure in robes, hooded, and masked.
In an attempt to eschew rank and eliminate the possibility of another personality cult, all Jedi of the time were hooded and masked, to honor the memory of Revan the Redeemed.

Some have said Admiral Onasi's advisor was his son, Master Dustil Onasi. Others claim the identity to be one Master Yuthura Ban, the Redeemed Twi'lek Sith who once called Revan her dearest friend. Others claim it was Talonis Revan himself....

--compiled by Archivist Lanna T'so.

Xxx

The High Admiral of the Imperial Fleet came to Yuthura's quarters with an escort: a trembling lieutenant pureblood with more pink than red to his skin. The lad sat down the tray he was carrying down on the table. A bowl of ice and two glasses.

Yuthura raised a brow ridge and the boy paled.

Behind him, Carth grimaced. "You can... uh, you can go now, Ergiz."

But the lieutenant looked to her instead. "Will that be all, Lord Ban?"

"For now, Ergiz." The hapless lieutenant still didn't move until Yuthura motioned toward the door and then he left at double-speed.

"Wideband's still down." Carth pulled out a flattened bulb of green liquid from his jacket and set it on the table between them beside the bowl of ice. "We're twelve hours out. Wanted to finish this now to clear my head."

"Do you usually clear your head with drink?" Yuthura recalled he had turned to it on Manaan.

"Special occasion." He poured Yuthura a glass and added ice. "They call it the 'Tears of Paal.' Won it off an officer's hand of sabaac."

"No one would dare let the High Admiral lose a hand of sabaac. Have you considered it might be poison?"

"I assumed you could tell. With the Force."

Yuthura took a cautious sniff. "I believe not. Fermented kola root with some kind of anisa flavoring is my guess."

Carth Onasi smiled at her, although it didn't reach his haunted eyes. "I'll go first. That way you can revive me if I keel over... or take my damn job if you want it."

"I do not." Yuthura plucked the glass from his clumsy Human fingers and tossed the shot back, shivering as the sickly taste coated her throat. "Oh! That's awful."

"They make it themselves down in Engineering." He poured and dispatched a drink for himself. And then quickly, another.

"I'm fine," Yuthura warned him when he attempted to refill her glass. "I still have the... ice left."

"Good. Well, that's..." Carth's voice trailed off and stared into his own glass like it held the secrets of the galaxy. Yuthura knew his look all too well. She'd been seeing sents with that look since she was an underaged slave in a Hurt's entourage. In its own way, the look was always a relief: troubles solved by the bottom of a glass had naught to do with her.

"Something is bothering you," she murmured, because that was why he had asked her to drink. "Go ahead, Carth. Get it off if your chest."

He looked up and blinked, then took a long breath. "Is there something wrong with her?"

"With Revan, you mean?" Yuthura folded her hands on the table.

"Of course with Revan! Is there something wrong with my wife?"

"Her actions were in accordance with Sith military code. Any sworn soldier must be loyal. Rew Ekkumi took no oath to the Empire, but she did vow to take orders from her own command.
Defying those orders was--"

"I'm not asking for a blasted lecture on military code!" Carth picked up the bulb again and poured himself another glass. "I mean, did you sense anything? Was there someone influencing her…
Sheris, or Tenebrae, or… someone? Hells, was it Malak? She used to see his ghost… dream…
dream about his ghost."

"I sensed no one but Revan in the late Voice's body." The truth. "If she were compelled, I would have no way of knowing." Except that there is no other Force user strong enough to compel her, save perhaps the Emperor and we weakened him with our plague and our revolution--

But strength was not always power.

Carth's jaw twitched. "She almost killed Rew."

"I made sure she did not." Best not to mention the tales Yuthura had heard of Darth Malak strangling recalcitrant officers systems away from his location over a holographic comm-link. "I do think, however, that it may be best if they do not see each other again for some time."

"If there is a time after this." Carth picked up his glass and shifted the ice in it. "She… it wasn't her doing that. My wife wouldn't do that."

Yuthura remembered the man's hands going to his throat, the miasma of dark energy, and that aura she had first sensed in the Dreshdae cantina. "The dark isn't so simple." She took a careful sip of her drink. It had been over two months since the bombing of Dromund Kaas, but she could still feel the effects of its poison in her bones. She was tired and impatient with this Human and his constant need for reassurance. "There is… a tipping point, of sorts, when efficiency becomes its own reward."

His laugh was low and dark. "Don't I know it." Carth gestured toward the guard at the door, the isolated table where they sat. "I'm not just worried about Revan and Dustil."

"Oh." Yuthura thought she understood. "You don't have to concern yourself. I know the temptations of the easier path, but I--"

"Not you. I'm worried about me." His voice was quiet. "The soldiers on these ships were my enemies, but now they follow me. We're taking orders from the damn Sith Emperor half the time.
And my son is… I just stood by and let Dustil become…" he seemed at a loss for words. "Maybe some time with Mekel Jin will help--" his voice broke off. "Do you hear me? Thinking my son spending time with Mandalorians and Mister Sith Congeniality will help him?"
"Perhaps it will." Mekel Jin had felt so odd in the Force. Like a part of him was gone after Oerin Lin had severed his Force-bond with Dustil. "Love is a mighty panacea. It could save Dustil. Just as your faith in Revan may help her-- and you." Words she wanted to believe, although her mind kept seeing images of Jorak Uln, Uthar Wynn, and poor, damned, traitorous Finiris.

Dead lovers are gloomy thoughts when you've got a decent drink in front of you. A whisper edged in her mind. She thought it sounded like Vik Tio.

Strange choice for my own conscience. And yet somehow fitting.

"Maybe I could save Revan," Carth muttered under his breath. "If she were around to hear me." His head was down, and he was mumbling now, half under his breath. "Wideband's still down--thought she'd come here. Why'd she--why didn't she come here?"

Because she could already count on your loyalty, Carth--and she required Rensha's. But Yuthura did not bother to voice the obvious. "We must put our minds to the task at hand." Yuthura put her hand over Carth's. "The coming battle."

The Human looked up at her, blinking, muscles twitching under his furry jaw. "I know. That part's easy. We win or we die."

Or you win and you die, whispered the voice in Yuthura's head.

Who brought up gloomy thoughts a mere moment ago? Perhaps Yuthura was going mad. Speaking to ghosts as if the dead were more than dreams.

"We win or we die," she echoed. Even if that were a simplistic assessment of their future, it had a comforting balance, free of the gray choices that still haunted her dreams. She raised her glass--at this point full of half-melted ice. "Let us drink to victory, my friend."

Xxx

A disruption to the Kira dynasty occurred in 10RRA, when the last known legitimate Kira was deposed by a Mandalorian upstart, who worked with the local Jedi Enclave to establish an independent Republic on the formerly monarchical world.

"The Beast-Rider Queen" was rumored by some to be a Jedi, although the few surviving statues from the time show her as a masked warrior wielding a sword, not a lightsaber. And in one instance, some kind of assault cannon.

The Beast-Rider Queen's daughter Faene Starshine was said to have a powerful rapport with the beasts of Onderon. It was under Queen Faene's benevolent rule that the Jedi Enclave of Onderon prospered as a beacon of hope and enlightenment on the far side of the Rim.

Some scholars have claimed this renaissance was due in part to the unorthodox teachings of Master Dustil Onasi, rumored to be Queen Starshine's father.

--Kira Genealogy, A Primer for King Petron iii.

[Notes in the margin: "Why do I need to study the Starshines, again? They're no kin of ours!]

--Collected by Lord Zash, for her apprentice P'ink Kallig of Tor, Dromund Kaas, private collection.

--compiled by Archivist Lanna T'so.
"Well..." Dustil said slowly, when good old Mekk and his yellow-haired giant Mandie were finally out of earshot. "Guess we should get ready for tomorrow, huh?"

The mother of his child (children?) had stopped mynocking him the second Jin was out of sight. She now stared at him like he was a piece of lung stuck to her shoe. The shouting from behind the door had been replaced by some kind of recording of Mandalorian drumming. Or what Dustil hoped was a recording of Mandie drumming. If not, Millifar's parents were beating each other to death right now. Or beating something.

"I thought he'd be inflamed," Mydia sniffled, as Dustil drew her down the hall, away from that terrible sound. "Consumed by jealousy, like the time Lord Bragg slaughtered an entire village of hillmen for Inse's honor."

"Probably bad idea to slaughter Mandalorians on their own ship." Dustil gave her a careful grin. Truth was, he was exhausted. Pissed as he was at Mekk (and he'd been fantasizing about frying that punchable face the entire time he'd been trying to unhook Myd's undergarments), he didn't think he had the energy to frack Mydia Blais--or anyone else--right now.

Every time Mekk went off with that Zabrak (three times since they'd been in hyperspace) Dustil felt more tired.

Every time Dustil recited hyperspace coordinates until the feeling stopped.

"You don't understand!" Mydia snapped. "I need to marry Jin to rule these savages." Her nose wrinkled in a way he'd once found cute. "Not you."

"Fine by me." Dustil let out a breath. "I don't want to marry you either."

Her eyes narrowed more and her lower lip stick out. "Jin was looking at you the entire time."

Good. Then he saw it when I grabbed your ass.

Mekk always said he never got jealous--Dustil had been hearing that banthashit from the Coruscanti son of a whore ever since Dreshdae--but for someone who never got jealous, Mekk sure got pissed when other people stole his lovers. Lashowe Devry with Shaardan. And now, good old Myd--

Mydia was still talking. "You two had a Bezal bond. A triad with Lord Malak in the middle."

"Far as I know, Mekk didn't frack Malak." Dustil tried for a dry chuckle.

"Did you?" Mydia took another step backward.

"Frack Lord Malak? Are you crazy--?"

"I am not." She looked injured. "Madness doesn't run in our line. I don't care what you've heard."

"Nothing. I've heard nothing." There was something about her. Her big eyes and the way she blinked them. Inse had been the smart one, sometimes Dustil had thought he might've even grown to love Inse Blais if she was less fracking terrifying, but Mydia was fierce and tiny and he--

He liked that she was as pissed at Mekk as he was. It brought them closer together.

"Still. You and Jin." She shook her head slowly. "Millifar told me you had some kind of sex. I didn't believe it mattered. But that bond….”

"Frack the bond. There is no bond."

A Bezal is a triangle." She looked thoughtful. "If yours was created to give Lord Malak your strength--but now he is gone….”

"Just shut up about it! I don't want to talk about it." Dustil had never felt less like frucking anyone than he did at that moment. Not because he didn't want her--a part of him did want her. She was pretty and nice when she wasn't talking. "Let's go to your room."

Her eyes narrowed. "Are you sure you wouldn't rather go to Mekk's?"

"Let's go see the kids." It was lame as far as distraction attempts went but her eyes softened anyway. "Myleah and Ganesh. Big day tomorrow moving them. When did you say they'd be born?"

"Ganesh is fully mature now, but Myleah, even with the accelerated hormones, could use another two months Standard. Sinae says it's best to leave them together in the womb until she’s ready--" Mydia went on and on, like she'd forgotten she'd signed the kids over to the Mandies and they weren't gonna raise them at all. Or maybe she and good old Mekk were going to be Mandalorian and do it.

Dustil was just tired. He smiled and nodded and made the right noises. I'm a dad now.

Xxx

General Sheris: “Members of the Senate, citizens of the Republic. It may be some time before this message reaches you. The capsule will leave our ship as soon as we exit hyperspace in the [redacted] System, returning to the Core with this transmission. I hope it finds you planning our victory celebration. (Giggles.)”

General Revan: (whispered in High Toydarian) “Don’t do that. It makes you look like a plucked sayr-goose.”

General Sheris: (in High Toydarian) “We do not have time for another take, Piece-of-Rock.”

General Revan: (in Unknown Tongue) “Acjwenuh hayeoest owe kirrr nam ost garnn!”

General Sheris: “Sajnok-hiiiyoyq! Edit the bit at the beginning, Ensign Arkosa. Let's do this again….”

--Excerpt from Fourth Speech

[Archivist's Note: There are seven recordings of Generals Sheris and General Revan together. The Fourth, reconstructed from a satellite feed near Eos, has confounded scholars for millennia. Of particular note, General Revan’s topknot is absent, as it is in the Seventh Speech. Some scholars claim that means both are forgeries.

Forty years ago, the Fourth Speech was assumed to be satire.]

--compiled by Archivist Lanna T'so.

XXX

"Usually she wakes up by now. Can you reach her, Malak?"
Her husband's insubstantial shade hovered over the Fragment's glowing body, looking as helpless as Revan felt.

"I have tried." He was as puzzled as she.

"She must wake soon." Revan looked up at Malak. Her love was ghost-pale and gleaming. The metal prosthesis curved around the lower half of his jaw, and his sleeping robes were loosely belted at the waist as if this were their chambers aboard the Leviathan or her own Grave Bright. Revan was in sleeping robes herself. With her duplicate in trance so often these last few days, she and Mal had resumed an easy familiarity that made her miss his mortal body. "One more sleep cycle before battle."

"I used to watch you sleep when I was alive." His ghostly hand reached for her hair; she felt the frisson of energy when it settled on her head. "I would watch over you in our bed until you woke again."

"No wonder you were always so grumpy in the mornings!" The playful jape brought a smile to her lips. "The servo-droids on the Leviathan were always so frightened that you'd blast them apart if my caff was cold or your adrenals--" her mind faltered when another memory intruded: Malak in his singlet, carrying a baby Malalchor out to see the Coruscanti dawn.

"On the Leviathan ..." Malak sensed her discomfort, but he was far too polite to speak of it. "I so often wished for caff. I loved the smell of yours, the sight of your little hands gripping the cup."

"I… didn't like it at first," she admitted. "I had never liked caff, but she did and I knew you liked it, too--"

"You never liked caff?" The third voice that intruded still had a trace of Deralian drawl from time to time, but not now. "No wonder you fell. You were an animal."

"Fragment." Revan turned, bestowing a smile upon her counterpart. "You're awake." And with the Fragment’s return to consciousness came the woman's pain that Revan did her best to ease. She put her hand on the other woman's shoulder, wincing as the Fragment's agony spliced through her own skull.

Her counterpart's voice was scratchy from disuse. "You don't have to do that. Headache won't kill me."

"This body feels it, regardless." Revan kept her voice light as Malak’s strength drew pain from them both. "You were gone a long time. Jasp Organa stopped by."

"Oh. I was..." the Fragment picked up one of the choca pieces the man had left, slowly unwrapping it. "I was everywhere."

"Which systems did the ships strike? Wideband went down again."

"Cascara. Eidos. Ryloth." The woman popped a candy into her mouth, grimacing as if she abhorred the bitterness as much as Revan did. "No damage--I pulled them back. Did Polla come with Jasp?"

Revan wondered if the woman would know a lie. She'd already decided not to distract her with the news of Jasp's re-enlistment. "No." She risked a small fib. "But he said Polla sent the choca candies."

"Oh. Do you want one?"
"No thank you."

The Fragment nodded and took another, making another face as she choked down the first. "Right." Her eyes flickered between them. "Wideband still down?"

"Unfortunately, yes. Did you see our allies--"

"Some. I was everywhere, I told you." She grimaced again and popped yet another choca into her mouth, chewing it louder than was required. "They're still calling." Her eyes were bloodshot and there were shadows under them. "Did they do that to you, too?"

"They were asleep. I told you this before."

"Not… the Sleepers. Everything… everyone that he is...." The woman's voice trailed off and she reached for her topknot, twisting the strands through her hair. "I need you to do me a favor." She spat out the choca and it arced perfectly into the bin.

"Of course."

Malak stood between them. When Revan glanced up she noticed he had reverted to his older form, the Knight's robes, the handsome face, his tumbling hair pulled back from his strong brow. "You must be hungry, Red. It's been half a day since you've eaten."

"That doesn't matter. Cut my hair, Dar." The woman blinked. She tugged at the tail that had flipped over one ear. "I want this off."

Revan eyed her cautiously. "I have some medical blades in my kit. May I ask why you've picked now?"

"They're making vids of us. This banthashit will live on after us. I want Deralia out of it. No topknots, nothing that traces back to Polla. She has nothing to do with this--her and Jasp. I want them out of it." The Fragment's hand reached up to twist the offending hair, and then dropped back into her lap.

"Of course." While that was logical, there were a hundred matters more pressing that deserved their attention. Still, Revan went for the kit.

The Fragment's hair was silky beneath her fingers. The dyed strands were easily clipped. Revan thought she probably could have used the Force to do it, but there was a strange intimacy in the metal tools, clipping strands close to the scalp until finally no trace of brown remained.

"Did you know..." the Fragment's voice trailed off as she looked up at Malak. "What the Emperor sees. It's beautiful."

"You find the forced enslavement of billions attractive?" Revan attempted a laugh. "Perhaps there's more of me in you than I thought."

"It's not a joke." That red head turned, eyes rolling in her direction. "They're not all... some of them he just... they just live. All those little lives--"

"Yes." To Revan's surprise Malak nodded. "I see them, too. But not him."

"It's beautiful," the Fragment repeated. "I didn't expect it to be so beautiful."

"The Force is beautiful, Red. And all things in it. But Tenebrae is a perversion."
"I know that." She frowned. "But they don't… they're just--existing. He's a part of them, but it's not their fault."

Revan reminded herself not to be disturbed by Malak calling the Fragment 'Red.' "I told you before. I fought hard to preserve my autonomy. You need to fight him. You can't let him control you."

"He's not controlling. He's showing me." The other woman stood up, and walked right through Malak to her own side of the bed. She sat down. "I need to go back. The Sleepers… they're busy again."

"But you just got here! You need to eat--drink--something--"

The Fragment shook her head. "Run a… a tube down my throat. Do whatever a medix does. I have to go, they…." her head slumped forward with a trickle of choca-coveted drool on her cheek, and then her eyes fluttered closed.

It was wrong that Revan's first sentiment was relief to have Malak to herself again… but his brow was furrowed now.

"I sensed a lie," he said. "When she said the Sleepers were busy. I think she did not want to stay here with us."

"Do we make her uncomfortable?" Did I make her uncomfortable? First Polla, then the Fragment.

"Perhaps it was me. " His face shifted back to the more familiar--the one she had learned to love. "I try and show her the man I was and not remind her---"

"Perhaps you should remind her. She needs to be reminded. We fell. She fell. She must not do it again--"

"I sensed no darkness."

"What did you sense?"

"Pain. Not the pain of her body." Malak shook his head. "Nothing we can fix, I'm afraid."

Xxx

There is a season for all things. A time to rend and a time to reap. A time to build ships and a time to use them.

--Mandalorian Aphorisms for Everyday Seasons. Undated.

--compiled by Archivist Lanna T'so.

Xxx

"It's time." Canderous spoke the words into the cloud of her hair and Aemelie stirred, mumbling in her sleep.

When she opened her eyes she smiled up at him. "Husband."

"Hai Mand'alar." He bowed his head. "First call just went over the speakers."

"And you let me sleep through it?"
"You were snoring." He smiled down at her, lifting one of her offered hands to his lips for a kiss. "Like a wild zakkeg."

"Oh?" She raised an eyebrow, grinning back. "First call went out. See to your station, General Ordo."

"Elek, Mand'alor." He stole a quick kiss and reached for his boots.

Xxx

_One must turn to the Gand for an example of a hive-mind. The Gand, or the Killik. And yet, the Emperor who will call himself Valkorion commanded more sentient minds in his thrall than even the Killik Empire at its height._

You must be ever-vigilant, Tasiele. Watch for signs of Tenebrae's return. For he will return--and when he does I fear the galaxy will have forgotten what that means. Force knows, I've tried to warn them, but sometimes I fear that my memory is as short as history and just as failable....

_from the private journal of Master Meris Shan, Brentaal IV Enclave Archives (restored)_

[Anonymous note etched in margin: Meris Shan is the purported great great great-grandaughter of Talonis Revan and Bastila Shan, and the mother of Tasiele Shan. If Talonis Revan is fictional, what does that make Satele, Tasiele's daughter?]

[Archivist's note: There is no evidence that Meris Shan, Tasiele Shan, or Satele Shan ever existed. Forty years ago, Imperial scholars concluded that Meris's journal was fake, political satire meant to mock Emperor Palpatine's name.]

--compiled by Archivist Lanna T'so.

Xxx

_Come, _Valkorion had whispered, with a voice that was somehow more present than either Malak's or Dar's. _Come to me, Starfire._"

Revan's head had ached and the choca had tasted off. Bitter and too sweet at the same time.

_Come, _Valkorion whispered again. _I've found him._

--and then Revan was a mote of dust in the galaxy's eye. She was a speck of sand whirling in a dust storm on a desert planet.

_She was every mote._

_She was every speck._

_She was everywhere. She was--_

_Now you see._ The voice in her mind was almost kindly. An apparition sketched itself in her mind: a handsome, bearded man, wearing elaborate armor like some kind of warrior-king of old. _This is how I think of myself._ A warm chuckle and then the apparition changed: became a Human woman, middle-aged; then a Rodian girl with a crown on her head. Next, Lieutenant C'tannis, still chained on the bridge; and then a Selkath, dressed in physician's robes. _But it can change. It can change at any time. I can be a farmer. An artist. A simple man--_ the Selkath's head bobbed down. _Pardon. A simple woman._ Any sentient I desire. _Come closer, Bright One. Let me show_ you what a marvelous thing I've found for you in one of my bodies--

--the Selkath's flippered hand extended and Revan took it and then she was--then they were--

--aboard a crowded skyhook's lift. She--they--were Equith Donna, a Weequay bounty Hunter with more sense than skill, tracking the target he'd been assigned by the mysterious notes written in his own blood. Half the time he thought he was going mad, but there was--the boy --the target--finally-

Almost unrecognizable, centimeters too tall and brown-haired, sandwiched between two female Twi'lek dancers, and oh, hells--the Twin Suns! This was gonna be a harder job than Equith expected and now his eyes throbbed and his vision went to black and then they slid in like a glove and then they opened their mouth and then she--

Oh, ho, whispered the Emperor. Not yet. You'll give away the game.

--and then Revan was yanked away from the startled eyes of her son.

And then she was--

Standing on the bridge of a ship. Imperial-class--

"I will not send the Republic turncoat our Voice!" A high-pitched tenor proclaimed. The speaker, a uniformed admiral, inbred and wattled, strode into view. "We need to hear Her Luminance's commands, too. And did you see Onasi's latest orders? We're fighting this battle ourselves! Where are the Republic ships?"

"I am more concerned with the fortunes of this ship than Ziost's four-thousand-year plan," the admiral replied icily. "What is there to stop us from jumping away as soon as we exit hyperspace?"

"Loyalty...?" Trieste said, but he raised an eyebrow.

"Me," snapped Revan from a foreign throat. "I will stop you." Oh, and this body! This was no weak shell, this was a man with power of his own, a former Dark Lord of the Sith, shaped as a Voice to come to this place, perhaps for just this occasion--

Now you see! We twist them to position!

--the admiral dangled in mid-air, hands grasping at his throat.

End him. Unpleasant, but necessary, sniffing out a spark--

No. Surge of panic as Revan realized how easy it would be. How fragile they all were, these little sparks in their hollow metal shell--

Yes. Well, then. Leave him. Come back with me to dance among the stars--

You have to promise not to kill him.

Does his life matter so much? A traitor's life?
It should, not, logically, but now that she was in so many lives, the webs of them--

Yes. All lives. All life matters--

Something jolted her body, jerking her head back, and then Revan was--

--staring at Dar, who was holding a shock stick.

She blinked. A choked laugh came out. "Shock stick? Why didn't you just use lightning?"

"I tried."

Her skin stung but the ache faded quickly.

"I tried everything," Dar said. Her lips were white.

You are soft-hearted. I will deal with our rebellious Admiral. Placate the copy. It would be a shame to lose her. We are both so fond--

Shut up!

And then Revan was--

--standing in a Deralian kitchen.

--on the bow of a sea ship with a net in her clawed hands.

--playing a game of rist at a Coruscanti casino

--staring at a medical tank with two infants floating in it, both attached to a single placenta.

And then she was--

She was--

“She’s gone," Malak's voice.

“I can try the shock stick again--”

“No! You cannot keep taking her pain!”

“I have to feel it, regardless.”

And then Revan was--

“I’m here." Taking a breath, Revan tamped down the Force--as much as she could. It still leaked through, like light from a permalight shoved under a bale of eridu. Impossible to contain. “I’m here. Both of you shut up!”

"I wasn't speaking." Admiral Rensha sounded amused from somewhere to the left.

"Lower your voice, Fragment." Dar nudged her.

Revan glanced down and saw that she was chained to her chair on the bridge, just like the Toydarian, C'Tannis, cowering next to her.

How much time was I out? I just--
It had seemed like moments among the stars, but the chron flashing in her feed said half a day was gone, ship-side.

“The restraints keep you from falling out of your chair.” Her duplicate grasped the question before Revan had a chance to voice it. Dar’s hand opened and the restraints cracked open.

Revan freed her own hands and massaged them, trying to erase the chill. Korrie. I saw Korrie! “I-I saw--

“Whatever you saw can wait. We are seconds from the Degriass System.” Dar’s flesh hand took Revan’s other one in hers and warmth returned with a sudden jolt of energy. “I’ve uploaded the opening positions to your headset. I had to revise--the Captive Arm can’t lead the spear without a Voice. Tenebrae is sending the Dark Glory in its stead. And the Holy Wrath’s Voice will go to the Arm in an escorted shuttle as soon as they exit hyperspace. The opening may be chaotic--we will be uniquely vulnerable--but I am hoping the geography of the system will work in our favor.”

Revan blinked. “But I--I was… I was on the Wrath… Admiral Gar-trik was in the middle of plotting a coup . ”

“We know.” Malak's ghostly form loomed behind Dar, looking for all the world like that Jedi knight Revan didn’t really remember; hair tumbling down his back, a wide jaw, a grim smile on his mouth. “Voice C’Tannis has been providing reports. The matter is settled, now.”

“I saw Korrie,” Revan silenced him by slamming down her shields, damping the Force into nothing before he could object. In her vision, Malak's blue figure faded into a blur. Dar had every right to know--and Malak had no rights at all. “I saw our son, Dar. He’s on Nar Shaddaa.”

“The smuggler's moon?” The woman blanched. “Why in all the stars would he be there?” Her gaze focused on thin air, and Revan knew she was asking Malak.

“The Sleeper ships were above Nar, before,” Revan raised her voice. "But I pulled them back. Korrie was with two Twi’lek women. They had swords. The man I possessed was a bounty hunter. He knew the Twi’leks. They’re local muscle. He was frightened of them. He called them the Twin Suns.”

Dar froze. “Twin Suns? What--our son is with some kind of gang?”

“Hyperspace exit in twenty seconds,” a mechanical voice chimed over the bridge speakers. “Battle stations…”

A droid squawked in a drill of beeps. “Twin Suns? No way!”

“Mission--?” Revan’s head turned.

Admiral Rensha hissed her annoyance as she stepped forward, blocking Revan’s view. "Focus your attention upon our prey, Generals."

“A moment, Rensha,” Dar snapped, raising her hand.

Revan kept talking. "They had swords. Korrie didn’t look frightened." But the Weequay had been. Strange, feeling a stranger's terror--like an adrenaline spike to the head. Raw energy, fuel for her own rational mind. "I tried to go back, but there were so many others--all thinking at once. Hard to keep them straight."

You will learn, given time. The chuckle in her head was oddly paternal. You should thank me for
"Wait." Dar's voice now had that clipped tone, sounding almost bored, which meant the opposite. "You... experienced the Weequay's thoughts? The possessed man's thoughts?"

“Yes.” A closer connection than any she had felt before, but it had seemed as natural as the breaths in the Weequay's body.

It is natural, my Starfire. He is a part of us. They all are. All the little lights--motes of light in the dirt--

Dar frowned, shaking her head. From the blank look on her face she was talking to Malak.

"Is that a problem, Dar?"

"A problem that can wait," Rensha growled. The deck under their feet jerked, that peculiar transition back to real-time as their ship emerged, and Revan felt her guts twist in familiar rebellion. Instinctively she reached for the Force again--and saw Malak flicker into place, standing beside her counterpart, insubstantial arms half wrapped around her.

"The Twin Suns will keep Mal," he told them both. "And I will keep him safe. Win this battle, Red."

Revan’s counterpart stepped free of the ghost with an irritated scowl on her face. "Is there a problem? Yes." If hyperspace nausea bothered Dar she hid it. "Tenebrae's been too weak to hear the thoughts of the possessed for at least half a century. He should be even weaker now--he was weakened by my plague--"

Malak’s spoken voice sounded troubled. “Later. Malachor is safe, Red. The battle. Focus.”

“I don’t need you to tell me, Malak--"

“Shut up, Malak--"

They had spoken at the same time, which made Revan start laughing, but that laughter faded when she noted their audience: the silent ring of eavesdropping officers--and beyond them, the crowd of Wookiees, with Phylus Blais and Mission’s T3 chassis.

Mission’s dome was flashing red and blue, in a complicated pattern that queried a readiness check in Old Rakatan.

“I’m fine,” Revan told her. Her fingers traced a quick Ryl-sign. Don’t need reboot.

"Malak?" Admiral Rensha looked confused. From the whispers behind her she was not alone.

“I call her Malak,” Revan quipped. “When she’s being especially nerf-headed.”

“A jape,” Dar added, leaning over the board. “Of no concern. The Mandalorian fleet is emerging now from hyperspace. Since most are leaving I’ve sent the rest to the far side of asteroid cluster gaeta--"

"The battle," Rensha hissed, just as C’Tannis lifted his head and chuckled, red eyes burning, and then Revan was looking out of those eyes, too--looking out and looking in at the same time--

--and Lieutenant C’Tannis was tired and terrified and he hated this. Hated being used like some kind of puppet for an evil Sith Lord when he'd spent half his life fighting them--

--he'd tried to end it, he'd tried to swallow his own feathers, but the sadist in his head had laughed and brought him back again--

"Revan!" Her own voice from Dar's mouth. The metal hand grabbed her arm and shook Revan back to consciousness, to her body, to the aches and agony of her throbbing head--

"Here." Dar's voice gentled, and then the pain eased, expanding the world until Revan could see the viewscreen of the bridge behind, the stretch of normal space, and the lazy band of an asteroid belt. "Breathe," Dar murmured. "We're here."

Here. The Emperor's voice murmured.

"We're here," Revan echoed, even as the fleets under their command assembled. Revan's eyes skimmed the crowd, but there was no distinctive topknot--or two--to be seen. And Zaalbar was missing too. "Where's Polla and... where are the others?"

Mission whirred, rolling forward. "Couldn't really stop Polla Polla you know? Owed her ten million, and it wasn't like I could get the credits with wideband out and everything locked--"

"My mate chose to fight in this war!" Zaalbar's girlfriend roared, drowning out the astromech's voice. "He went with the Old One to fly a metal ship."

"Jasp Organa informed me that Polla chose to leave us and return to her son," Dar interrupted, softly in her ear. "I gave her the Hawk. She'll be safe, Fragment. I promise."

"Jasp and Zaalbar? They went, too?" She felt guiltily relieved to have her friends free of this.

Phylus Blais raised his hand hesitantly. "Uh... Mister Organa re-enlisted. And Ser Zaalbar... guess it wasn't exactly a re-enlist, since he'd never enlisted in the first place, but they gave him a ship to fight in--"

"We need every pilot we can muster," growled Admiral Rensha. "I promoted Captain Organa and assigned him to Byss. He could hardly do worse than the late leader of Byss Squad, who misread my coordinate commands in the first thirty seconds of our Telos engagement."

"You promoted Jasp, and Polla left..." and Zaalbar's flying, too. But that part wasn't what was bugging her. Much as she loved the Wookiee. "Polla said she was going home in the Hawk? You let her take the Hawk back to Deralia?"

"Is your concern for the woman or the ship? She wanted to return to her son." Dar raised her chin stubbornly. "It would have been helpful to know Malachor was on the smuggler's moon previous to now--but I will inform Polla--in the event that neither of us--"

"You fool! Put a lock on the Hawk, and ground Jasp and Zaal! You can't let them take the fracking risk--"

Dar shook her head. "No. The risk aboard the Hunt is equally grave."

Muscle memory. Revan had activated her headset automatically, adjusting the display to wide. The Force whispered the coordinates of every aligned ship, making them all just points of light on a grid; but at that her eyes snapped open all the way. "You fool," she repeated.

The Hawk, not being assigned, wasn't among them. Captain Jasp Organa and Zaalbar were linked with Byss Squadron, assigned to support the Imperial trident attack into what was expected to be the meat of their enemy.

"We needed pilots." Dar's voice was flat. Behind her, the ghostly figure of Malak had crossed his arms. "Zaalbar and Jasp volunteered, Fragment. I assigned them where they were needed."

"But you didn't take Polla--"

"Had she offered... but she did not. Jasp told me she wants to return to her son. I approved her to take the Ebon Hawk-- it was in her possession already."

"You spoke to her in person?"

Dar's gaze slipped. "No."

"I tried to talk her out of it, sis!" Mission's dome swiveled. "But she said she was done with this banthashit."

Revan closed her eyes. Banthashit she is. "Polla told you she was going home?"

"As I already explained--" Dar started explaining several other things, most of which Revan already knew.

"Oh, you fracking di'kut," she said out loud. In that instant she meant all of them.

In the next moment it did not matter, for more of their allies had popped out of hyperspace. Engines sparked in sunlight and their vidscreens displayed the Imperial Fleet's capital vessels and a spread of stars. Leashed to a pale orange sun, a rocky hulk of a planet and its satellites spun--two bright bubbles of moon above a black hulk. The orbs drifted between three asteroid belts that ringed the entire system, dividing it into thirds.

"Imperial Wrath, move to position," Dar directed, and C'Tannis echoed her words. Revan felt a part of herself echo them, too, opening eyes on other ships, speaking from other throats as she directed their fleet to advance.

No sign of their enemy. Yet. But that would change.

Revan closed her eyes. Come, she called. Come to me.

{{Coordinates 2882 x 213, 18389999, 2889 y/n Y}} they whispered back.

Come, Valkorion spoke from her thoughts, his mental chuckle taunting the Sleepers as much as he taunted Revan herself. Come for us, my children.

Xxx

Dearest Lee,

I trust the Academy for Well-Born Sithlings of Principle and Good Breeding is treating you in accordance with the terms of the contract your father and I signed. Beatings only twice daily. Three hours of Galactic Standard language lessons a day. I will not have it said that my daughter cannot make herself understood when she visits her rebel kin!

No matter what your father claims, Onderon is the backwater, not Thule.
As you know, your homeworld has become, in the last twenty years, the firmament in the jeweled tiara of our Imperial Empire. But dispel any romantic notions from your addled head. Onderon nobility are not suitable consorts for Thulian princesses. And you are more closely related to some of the other children you will meet on this vacation than is seemly—even if the Thulian priests had checked the entrails and your nascent star charts in advance—which I instructed them not to do under penalty of impalement.

If we are fortunate, your father will lose the next round of death-or-sabacc and this will be the last time you are subjected to the New Jedi Order and their Lehon resort. I trust you have reviewed the pamphlets I’ve enclosed about Jedi associations with low-class Hutt cartels and other lawbreaking scoundrels.

(I have underlined the parts mentioning high rates of Rylothan pox.)

An additional reminder: if you meet Master Meetra Surik, you are to be on your best behavior. Use the recording device I’ve enclosed to check what was said later! Let the lesson of your Aunt Inse stand as a stark reminder of what can happen to our family when subjected to Jedi doctrine.

Lest you think Inse was a mere weakling (understandable since that is what I have always told you), the one time I encountered Master Surik I nearly joined the Jedi Order myself. The woman has an uncanny ability to make even the most insane plans seem reasonable.

The last letter I had from Inse, she said she was opening a mission for the destitute and infirm on Brentaal IV. A Blais devoting her life to the weak? Such is the fate of powerful Force users who enter Surik’s orbit. And Inse is powerful. I may have lied to you before about that, darling, but nothing else, I swear.

However, by Ajunta’s name… if your father tries to make this “vacation retreat” a yearly occurrence for you and your siblings, war may come, Lee! As a consort, the man has his charms, but we all know his weakness.

The Force is my weapon and my shield,

Darth Mydia Blais, In the year of Revan the Redeemer 23, (est. 3949 BBY)

[Note: Darth Mydia Blais is a curious figure in Sith history. She enacted reforms on Thule that were more progressive than the laws on some Republic planets. Abolition of the priesthood, free markets, education for even the lowest of slaves—and a path from indenture to freedom for all.

Following Mydia, the extremely fecund Blais family tree notes seven branches; but the paternal lines are blank, indicating her consort or consorts were of lower rank.

At least two daughters possess the same name (and it is not Lee), following a trend popular in Sith aristocracy when only one was expected to survive.]

--compiled by Archivist Lanna T’so.

XXX

"Coming out of hyperspace in ten, nine, eight—"
Why the Mandalorian felt the need to count down when the three of them were the only sentient beings on this shuttle who could voice an opinion Mydia wasn't sure. Nonetheless, she smiled at the medix, Sinae, who looked (as Mydia thought she always did) rather bored.

"Launch all fighters." Their communicator buzzed and then the ship's speakers crackled with lots of Mandalorian voices singing.

“One,” Millifar finished, and activated their thrusters.

The blast doors on the Aleema’s hull swung open, revealing an expanse of space speckled by asteroids. What had been an opaque wall by the medstation was now a transparisteel vista, showing a dreary star system and a collection of motley ships.

Mydia yawned and got up from her bench for a closer view, peering at the line of ships departing the system for the one that was scheduled to take them with it. "The Munificent Rancor? Is that it over there? Is it nice?"

Sinae sighed. "It is large enough that you will have separate quarters, Sith. We’ve already put in the request."

“Good.” Obviously the Medix was beginning to understand Myleah's higher rank.

"Sinae! Take mark!” Millifar had ceased the hysterics of yesterday and was now all business, steering their armored shuttle out of its docking pod. When Mydia glanced left through what was now a viewport, she could see the pointy-nosed fighter holding Dustil Onasi, and the wider gunship that contained Mekel Jin already waiting for them in space.

Of course, she didn't have to see Onasi to know he was there. His presence in the Force was unmistakable--like a darklight beacon in the black, shining so strongly it felt like he was on Jin's ship as well--and possibly even their own. As they sped out, Onasi's vessel darted forward, followed by Jin's.

Mydia skipped between the sides of the shuttle, waving at them both. “How long until we reach the new vessel? Will they have a decent sonic? Rancor seems like an uncouth name for a ship.”

“Why don't you go… check on Dessa's babes,” Sinae suggested. “You’re no help here.”

“Fine.” Mydia sniffed. She had wanted to do that anyway. Now that the babes were becoming cuter she was thinking about raising them herself--if she could find a decent nanny-droid.

So many nanny-droids had perished in the war on Kaas City. The thought made her sad.

Mydia walked the length of the shuttle toward the chamber that held their future children. She let her fingers trail along the row of windows set into the sides of the ship.

"There you are," she beamed as she reached the end of the hall. "Kitchiee Kitchiee--oh!"

Her children were not alone.

Xxx

[Glory, eternal glory. The stars pale beside our might.]

---From the Kote Darasuum.

Kote, darasuum kote. Te racin ka'ra juaan kote.
The hangar bay was immense, their squadrons dwarfed in its expanse. Canderous punched in the commands to lower the upper hatch and seal his ship--then switched on his link to Bridge Command.

His wife materialized, a blue hologram in full beskar, floating on his deck.

"I am going now." Canderous raised his communicator’s volume to get Aemelie's attention but she was ignoring him. Her masked, holographic image paced back and forth on the Aleema’s bridge. Had it not been for the passionate time they had spent together during their last sleep-shift, Canderous would have thought she was still furious; but his quixotic Second Wife had a temper like the seas of Ordo's moon: quick to flood and quick to recede.

Now that battle was before them, she was focused: directing the escorts for the transceiver stations; assembling their squadrons; and, of course, making sure the medbay containing their genebanks traveled safely to the Rancor.

From the rear lines of their fighting squadrons, Canderous watched the medbay shuttle detach from the Aleema, with an emotion that mixed regret and relief. Milli would be safe aboard the Rancor, but their leavetaking had been hard. His daughter was more like Aemelie than her own blood-mother: quick to anger and careless with her words.

"I'm going," Canderous repeated into the comm. “Now, Wife.”

"Fly well, husband." Aemelie's form glanced toward him at last. "My heart goes, too."

"And mine," he grunted. "With you, cy'ar dika Mand'alor."

The helm of Mandalor glanced up. He did not have to see her face to see the smile.

"I am yours," he told her.

The comm-link dissolved and Canderous went back to running flight checks on his ship, a modified scout with plasma turbolasers where its hyperdrive should be. Taking his leave from Aemelie almost reminded him of Revan (though to voice the comparison might earn him another dagger in the heart), with her focus on battle to come.

He was proud, although their skill had nothing to do with him.

"Checks in five," Canderous announced to his squadron, listening as they counted off the opening trajectories. "We're assigned to join the Imperial forces at the ex-ten. Stay in gundark formation until the break. As soon as those hu'tuun show themselves we open--"

"Sir?" Leskal's worried face emerged on his board just before Canderous could give the command to debark. "We can't find Zepth! The Mandalor wants him on the bridge!"

"She gave you an order! Figure it out!" Canderous snapped in anger, words he would later regret. "Zepth knows where he's supposed to be even if that hu'tuun Sith in him don't care. Emperor's probably hiding in the fresher, or down in Supplies. Put him in restraints if you have to."

The Zabrak was a good kid when he wasn't possessed. Shame there wasn't a way to get him out of it, but that plague Onasi said was the cure didn't work on Zabraks.
"Send some of the unassigned kids to make a search," Canderous added. "Short-range receivers are good for our own fleet--but we're gonna need to get through to the Hunt and the Imperials. So find the damn Emperor! That's an order."

"Yes, General Ordo." Leskal nodded, like all he needed was a kick in the pants.

Canderous cut the feed, thumbing his helm's audioset on. "Kote, darasuum kote. Te racin ka'ra juaan kote," he sang over the short-range, words echoed by the others around him as their fighters ascended to the heavens.

Xxx

Zaalbar of the Eiweorr branch had many cubs, but none so famous as Seeroree, the Wookiee smuggler who declared war on Trandoshan after losing a game of pazaak...

... and won..

--Songs of Kashyyyk for Wayward Cubs c. 3679 BBY
--compiled by Archivist Lanna T'so

Xxx

Zaalbar shifted his legs around the too-small compartment, roaring his distaste through the oxygen mask attached to his muzzle. The ship had been manufactured for a Besalisk, not a Wookiee, and an extra set of hands and shorter legs would have been helpful. So would the company of the Mission-ghost, instead of the chirpy astromech they had bound him with, instead. Even now the UT7 was beeping at him to reduce his speed to match the others in the squad. It occurred to him that he was on a narrower branch than he had intended--for it was one thing to pilot the Ghost and man her guns, quite another to be strapped in this tiny can!

Still, the can was fast. He nudged the yoke forward again, just to hear the UT squeak.

He had expected Mission to come with him--or at least accompany Polla Organa in the Ghost, but his mechanical cub had surprised him, insisting on remaining with Polla Revan on the large, Trandoshan-infested ship.

Jasp Organa's voice chuckled over Zaalbar's comm. "Stay with us, Big Tree. No sign of hostiles yet, but it won't be long now--"

No sign of the enemy--just the shuttles darting to and fro from various ships, and clumsy white boxes from the Mandalorian fleets, all escorted by fighting snubs even smaller than one Zaalbar was occupying.

He gave a sigh of relief, seeing the Blue Ghost flip out of the Hunt's lower bay, expertly righting itself and circling back, obviously heading toward the jump point their ships had just cleared. As he watched, the circular disc wove between two Imperial capitals that had just appeared.

"Find safe mooring, Polla Polla," he growled a short song, for her and for their ship. Even with the Mission-ghost purged from its innards, the Blue Ghost was still a friend, having sheltered all within its branches.

Xxx

_In the immediate chaos that marked the end of the Machine Wars, we would expect to see a_ corresponding spike in crime rates, as the defensive fortifications of so many trading planets had been destroyed by Machine Ship assaults.

But that spoke never happened. Some attribute the period of relative peace to the rebirth of the Jedi Order, and Master Meetra Surik’s re-opening of Jedi enclaves and outposts across the more lawless reaches of the Rim.

But there is another, more romantic (and less credible) tale that claims a band of intrepid adventurers led by a Deralian smuggler made it their cause to help the helpless, and with small acts of kindness restored peace and repaired infrastructure throughout the scattered systems.

One of the more unbelievable claims is that this ragged band of mercenaries with hearts of gold flew a Corellian disc ship rumored to be Revan’s infamous Ebon Hawk.

It is my opinion that we can add this to the number of improbable claims that have already been made about the Hawk, including that it was solely responsible for the allied victory at Degriass….

--Excerpt from "An Historian’s Introduction to the Machine Wars: Lecture by Kree Usam Racharn for the Revan: Fact or Fiction Symposium, SHWL," University of Coruscant Press. 3653 BBY

--compiled by Archivist Lanna T'so.

XXX

A few years ago if someone had offered Polla the title to a sweet ride like the famous Ebon Hawk and the freedom to take it anywhere she would have called them a sucker and hauled jets to the spacewinds.

But not if it meant leaving Da behind.

Xxx

"They need me, Pollie." And then Da had said more. Like how he’d gotten sick after that time with the Sith Lords and how he wasn't going to get better. Polla had started tuning him out after that and making her own plans. It felt brutal and ruthless, like something a Revan would do, but it kept the tears back, and it gave her enough space to make a plan to save him from his own stupidity.

"You know which squad you’ll be in?" she asked. "Gotta give me something to brag to Ma about."

Did he look suspicious? The way he was meeting her eyes made Polla think both of them were keeping their side decks close to the vest. "The new one. Byss Squad."

Byss Squad. They'd named their squads after Republic planets. Patriotic grunts. "Byss? What's the call symbol, the planetary seal?"

He told her, frowning a little.

"Good to know." Stupid. Stupid call symbol. Three white stars below a bar, on a red circle. "Have to tell Ma what to put on your empty casket."

Her father winced. "Pollie--you are going home. Promise. No funny business."

"Of course! They don't need me." That was true. She'd seen it on the bridge of that ship, when the woman she'd started to appreciate had turned back into a monster, possessed some hapless skin-sack halfway across the system, and then tried to kill her own husband, not to mention that Republic bint--

And then Polla had looked at the other one and seen the same damn light in her eyes: seen her nod absently, trace of a smile on her face and--

"They don't need me, Da," she whispered into his coat as they hugged.

Xxx

I'm sorry, Abasen, Polla thought. But you'll learn blood's thicker than water, someday, even if you don't learn it from me.

Now Polla had Byss's symbol marked on her radar, watching from the open bay as the fighters swarmed out from their own hangers above her. The Hunt had come in cloaked to an empty system, and their vessels were now sitting nerfs for any hostile force that came along--what with all the ships cross-crossing the system.

"Stupid," she muttered again, fingers tightening on the Hawk's controls as she prepared to launch.

Wideband was down. Even if Polla had wanted to send a message home to Ma and Sei before they started, she couldn't. Only thing working was the short-range: ship-to-ship communication links beamed from their portable receivers--and if Polla were close enough to hit the Hunt's range she'd be close enough to be noticed.

Polla didn't know if the Revans would care if she was out here or not, but she was damn sure the one with her memories wouldn't want to risk her husband's favorite ship.

Frowning, she considered the map of the system. Three asteroid belts and a hunk of rock of a planet with two habitable moons.

Her clearances beeped green and she flicked the switches to begin the departure sequence--just as a voice crackled over her short-range.

"Where are you really going?"

"Home," she lied. "Which one are you?"

A pause. Then, "Bossypants. I believe it's Darth Bossypants to you."

"Your jokes are getting better." Despite herself, Polla smiled. "You and Rensha already cleared me to leave. What's the matter? Miss me already?"

"The Fragment believes you won't go to Deralia."

"And you believe her?" Polla scoffed. "What's she think I'm gonna do? Go back to Kaas?"

"I don't care. My son is on Nar Shaddaa. If I asked you..." Bossypants voice cut out, fading as if she'd switched channels to give orders to someone else. "--him... box?"

"You want me to get your son and your box. Sure," Polla lied. Hell, maybe she would even, if Bossypants didn't make it, but not this second. This second she edged her thrusters forward because the docking lights in front of her had started to flash.

"Do not die," Bossypants concluded with a lot of static, just as Polla pulled into open space.
Dearest Anima, my darling,

I hope you are studying hard and supporting your sister. I know the revelations from that accursed Lehon retreat were unexpected, but I did not appreciate Lee’s lightning display before her father and our guests in the atrium last week.

If a woman of Blais is to lose control of their anger, she should at least manifest more power than their mother can quell with harsh words. Yes, I suppose I was remiss in mentioning that some of your “cousins” are more like half-siblings... but you saw how poorly she took the news about Ollivair Loanin when he visited the palace. And he not even a rival!

Are you eating your vegetables? Remember, my first legitimate boy, you are mummy’s favorite, but you must watch your sisters for me.

Both of them. Is Myleah the First coming to visit? I will not call her ‘Myles.’”

The Force is my weapon and my shield,

Darth Mydia Blais, In the year of Revan the Redeemer 17, (est. 3949 BBY)

[Note: although all of Darth Mydia’s notes to her children contain constant threats of their demise, genealogical records show that at least five of them survived to adulthood on Thule, and the fates of the remaining two are open to debate.]

--compiled by Archivist Lanna T’so

XXX

"Shhhhh," the Emperor said to Mydia. He made the Zabrak he possessed wink. "You can't tell anyone that I'm here."

"Yes, my lord." She frowned. "Of course not. But why are you here?" Wasn't His presence needed on the Aleema?

Behind His Luminance, her daughter, Myleah the First of Her Name spun in her womb, with the solid-looking Ganesh at her back.

"Because we are close to victory," he chuckled, and then his eyes fluttered closed again--

Xxx

Three ways of battle.

The Fist, the Sword, and the Cannon.

Thee sacred Grounds.

--"Mandalorian Aphorisms for Everyday Seasons," Undated.

--compiled by Archivist Lanna T’so

Xxx
The Aleema had emerged from hyperspace without incident, soaring into the solar winds of a blasted system with one rocky planet and its moons. The sun of Degriass was red and dim and dying. Around them, the rest of their fleet materialized--most vanishing almost as quickly as they had come when they cloaked, then moved to the hyperspace departure point.

Squadrons launched from the Mando'ade ships who were to remain, their movements echoed on her viewscreen. Among warbirds’ graceful shapes the clumsier shuttles were awkward beasts, lumbering between capital ships with a mix of supplies and refugees.

Canderous was gone, flying to regain his glory in stars, and Aemelie knew he would do well--as would their stubborn daughter, now bound for the Munificent Rancor and the Dxun moon. She hoped that her own boy Dxun had the same Ordo fire that Millifar possessed when he was grown… but now was not the time to think of another season.

Now was the season of war. The time to rend, the time to reap--

Aemelie’s eyes focused on the empty chair on the command deck, where the nastaar Emperor sat when he was possessing the Zabrak boy. She had given the order to have the Zabrak retrieved over an hour ago. Much as she despised using that hu'tuun for anything, they required his communication ability to coordinate their attacks with the Republik Jettise.

"Leskal?" Aemelie raised the volume on the common frequency so all on the ship who were helmed could hear. "We await the barbarian Emperor on the bridge? Have you forgotten?" In truth, Leskal had not been her first choice for an escort, but with most of the crones gone, the bridge was undermanned.

There was a pause. And then the speaker crackled. "No!" The boy sounded panicked. "Uh… I can't find Zepth the Zabrak anywhere!"

"Zabrak?" Senile Catrinex of Rialis cackled from her place near the communications board. "Are we invading Iridonia again?"

"No, mother," the boy next to her sighed.

"Look harder!" Aemelie ordered. It did not matter so much for fights between their own and an enemy--all Mando'ade were trained to seize initiative. Those efforts had been honed for centuries by flights in patterns that any five-year old child could recognize; but their allies were clumsier.

Aemelie felt her features twisting into a scowl. Her husband, the leader of Ordo, had ordered her to follow the arusuum’la for this fight, and while she commanded the Clans, Clan Ordo was sworn to follow that aruetii nastaar.

Although… if Aemelie could not receive the troch orders… how could she follow them? Beneath the helm of Mand'alor, her fingers danced upon the command board, deftly issuing her own commands for their own battle.

"Check the onboard scanners for life signs," Dessa suggested, over the channel.

"Do as she says." Aemelie’s eyes considered the battlefield. Their allies were still clustered around the hyperspace jump points as if they lacked imagination to go elsewhere. The Mandalorian ships had moved between the asteroid belts, as directed before arrival. Their Free Fleet was gone, save for the Rancor waiting patiently for the Aleema's prize.

She directed the ships of Wies to cloak, leaving the Aleema seemingly unaided. Thus, Aemelie noted, did nexu stalk their prey; hidden in shadows after they poisoned the water with the rotting carcasses of their foes.

Canderous’s farewell flashed over the short-range, as the members of his squad soared past, heading for the expected flashpoint: the radius around the Great Hunt.

Kore, she wished him. He would find his glory…

…and she would find hers.

“Contact the Medix shuttle, Leskal,” Aemelie commanded. “Perhaps the Force-user Mydia Blais can give us a report on any cloaked vessels. Did you find the Zabrak yet?”

"I just started looking--"

"Then you have looked. Good. Stop looking and report to the bridge immediately." Aemelie cut the lad off before he could respond.

"Should we move closer to the Imperial ships? For short-range communications?" Dessa was right to question commands. It showed initiative.

"No. The Jettise opener requested we hold behind the asteroids. Prepare to flank the enemy, shatter them on those troch ships. The tactic makes sense… but we will do it in our own time. We do not need Revan to tell us when to strike."

Revan was an excellent strategist, of course. But Aemelie had bested her in the sims they had run together… a majority of times.

"And are we still following troch orders at all?" Dessa was across the ship, supervising the final checks of their proton guns, but her voice echoed in Aemelie's headset.

"How can we follow orders we cannot hear? We will find our fight when it comes. If the Zabrak is hiding he is too cowardly for free people to follow. Return to the bridge to watch with us, Dessa." Aemelie's eyes went to the battle command board and the main force of their own fighters, now trailing toward the cluster of Imperial ships. "Recall all fighters still in range. Let the Revans take their own battle. Mand'alor--I--will take ours."

Her eyes panned the field again--and then Aemelie froze.

The hulk of the Munificent Rancor stood patiently with its main bay down, waiting for its precious cargo. But the Medix I was stalled in space, and the two fighters supposedly escorting were drifting off-course. Medix's sublights flashed in a holding pattern. The gunship’s propulsion had entirely stopped. And the Stinger was canted at an odd angle, its ion engines flickering only a faint wake.

Aemelie frowned. "Jarrod? Hail the Medix. Why isn't Sinae's ship moving?"

XXX

"For so much of our history you were silent, Vitiate."

--Lord Marr to the Emperor Upon His Return. [Dramatic recreation, in accordance with Dark Council approval, Dromund Kaas] 3629 BBY (est.)

--compiled by Archivist Lanna T'so
"Shhhh." The Emperor winked at Mydia with Zepth's face. "No one must know I'm here. Not yet!"

"But… why are you?" Did His Luminance have designs on her children? "You’re supposed to be on the Aleema."

"Are you giving me orders, daughter of Blais?" The Emperor chuckled, and Mydia felt that warning pressure in her throat, around her chest—the flash of power greater than her own. "Oh, ho!"

"No, my lord." Mydia knelt properly, as every daughter of Blais had for more than a thousand years. But in that second, she decided she hated him.

XXX

Mand'alor the Builder is commonly assumed to be Canderous Ordo. Certainly, the remaining breastplate that is attributed to his armor seems designed for a male humanoid of some bulk. And yet, woven through the narrative is the legend that Mand'alor the Builder was in fact a woman.

But which woman?

--Excerpt from "A Mandalorian’s Recollection of Conspiracies: Lecture by Degriass Ordo for the Revan: Fact or Fiction Symposium, SHWL," University of Coruscant Press. 3653 BBY

[NOTE: the rest of this transcript goes deep into unproven theories and has been disregarded by most scholars.]

--compiled by Archivist Lanna T'so

XXX

"Mekel? Are you alright?" Millifar tapped her comm, trying to see why Jin’s monitor was flashing on her board.

Only static responded.

There wasn’t much room to see anything about his ship—especially not when the Imperial Stinger Dustil Onasi flew abruptly went into drift, spinning close to their bow—too close—

"Get the repulsors!" She gestured at Sinae, just as their short-range comm lit up.

"Is there a reason the Medix has cut their thrusters? We need the advice of your Force-user, Mydia of Blais," Aemelie Ordo (who styled herself Mand'alor) said over their short-range. "Ours is missing."

"Ours is—" Millifar glanced back, only to find Mydia of Blais gone. "Indisposed." In the fresher, perhaps. "And there is something wrong with Mekel Jin's ship."

"The Imperial Stinger is drifting, as well," Aemelie snapped. "Tell the dar'jett Onasi to watch his course corrections."

"He's not responding! Neither of them are!"

"This is why you can never rely on troch magic!" her Second Mother cursed. Father would never have been so unprofessional. "Pull away from the vanguard," she instructed over the general comm. "We will have our own fight." Cheers on the same channel made Millifar grit her teeth. She did not want Aemelie to be popular. "Rancor? We still await the pick-up of our shuttle--"

"Bays are open." General Rizzo on the Rancor sounded impatient. "What is wrong with those escorts?"

"I told you!" Millifar gritted her teeth. "I don't know!"

"Check," Aemelie snapped. "Go outside and check."

Millifar, who was already halfway into her pressure suit, let an eyeroll suffice as her response.

"She's preparing to go outside now, Mand'alor," Sinae added.

XXX

Question 1: You have a brother engaged, as you are, in a profitable criminal activity. Do you,

A.) Inform the local authorities, knowing full well they will want a bribe your brother cannot afford.

B.) Inform the Republic authorities, because they will confiscate his operation leaving you the sole distributor.

C.) Find terms that can be advantageous to you both, even though he was cruel to you as a child?

--Deralian Smuggler's Exam c. Old Republic, 3960

--compiled by Archivist Lanna T'so

XXX

When she passed into Imperial Fleet lines, Polla was pretty sure she'd cleared the Hunt's scanners. The main jump point was right ahead--and as she watched it disgorged more ships--Imperial, all of them.

Still no sign of the enemy.

Starboard, a few shuttles were trafficking back and forth between Mandalorian capitals, who were standing in line to jump out themselves. As Polla shifted her trajectory in that direction, all of the Mandalorian ships winked out one-by-one, until only the Aleema and six other ships were left--and then five of those fizzled out in that distinctive pattern she knew so well. Cloaking.

The Aleema basked as Polla approached it, seemingly alone in a bank of asteroids. Across from its port the ship whose call-sig pinged as the Munificent Rancor had its hyperdrive core primed and the blast doors of its main hanger open--a combination Polla thought criminally dangerous--but typically Mandalorian.

Between the Rancor and the Aleema a boxy white shuttle and its two fighter escorts hung motionless--like their engines had been cut.

Polla checked her short-range comm to ring out why and was rewarded with a wall of static, punctuated by snatches of Mandalorian yelling.
"--mean he's on that ship?"

"--anda'lor, we will return--"

"--both their boards are offline. Can't leave them like this!"

"--gunship's too full of fuel for a safe tractor--"

Too full of fuel for a safe tractor beam? Polla pulled her yoke to back the Hawk farther away. She had wanted to slip onto the Aleema's back and ride her back into the firefight (when it came), find Byss Squad, and make sure Da didn't die.

In Polla's head that plan had seemed smart. But the Hawk's navmaps of the system failed to disclose how thick this asteroid cover was. Polla couldn't even see Byss squad from here. The Great Hunt and its Imperial escort were reduced to blips on her screen.

Meanwhile, the Mandalorian gunship in front of her was listing into the pointed Stinger, while the white shuttle bobbed uselessly like a lost moffa chick.

Polla edged back, angling behind an asteroid to hide her signature and slowing her sublights to a crawl. She was pretty sure those five cloaked Mandie capitals were still lurking close. Would be embarrassing if she died crashing into one.

Polla thought of the time she'd spent a Deralian week drinking with Aemelie while Seiran had a hessi and Therion got lucky. Those holes along the Aleema's starboard decks were new since then, as was the twisted wreck of the ship's secondary hangar bay. Battered by ear, the massive hulk looked like what it was--what it always had been.

Revan's killing machine. Her fleetbreaker.

That thought made Polla shiver. If Da hadn't been involved she'd already be gone.

Her comm-board buzzed with encrypted chatter and the white box of a shuttle disgorged a space-suited figure tethered by a grav-line, drifting toward the gunship. The gunship's hatch popped open and another figure bobbed out of it. Dead? The first figure unhooked the second from its harness, then dragged the suited body out of the dead ship and along the grav line, twisting through rocks big enough to sever either of their heads, or at least cut that line tethering them to the shuttle.

Whoever's in that suit is nuts or stupid. Crazily, Polla wondered if it was Aemelie Ordo.

Xxx

Darling!

Please tell dear Phylus that of course he's still welcome on Thule. No reason for him to keep hiding on Zeltros! We're all friends now. You with your Jedi and Phylus with that quiet wife of his and their tentacled child.

By the way, Is Inse planning on attending your Lehon retreat? I believe I was very tolerant about the Zabrak bastard and that Mando'ade tot, but if you impregnate my own sister I will take off your toes.

Ps. Should we have nerf steak tonight? We need a new cook but you're so handy with the coals, darling.
"Are you not supposed to be on the Aleema, my Lord?" Mydia had been taught since childhood to be polite to the Eternal One, even when he rudely told her to be quiet and to not tell the others he was on their shuttle.

"Oh, ho." The Zabrak blinked, red light abruptly fading from his eyes. A blank expression came over his fave. "Oh! Lady Blais?"

"Oh dear." She prodded the Zabrak's ribs with the hilt of her lightsaber. "Bring His Luminance back, Zepth. Now."

"I can't." Without his Luminance possessing the body, Zepth was just another attractive slave.

"But his Luminance was about to tell me why you're here. And then he vanished. How very rude!" As if mimicking her mood, red lights flashed.

"I'm supposed to be on the bridge." The Zabrak blinked stupidly at the viewscreen.

"We are not still on the Aleema." She tried not to roll her eyes. "We are in its med-bay, which is now a shuttle."

"Oh."

Perhaps Mydia should have paid more attention in Slave Essant's Galactic Geography for Conquerors class. She sighed, continuing her explanation. "The Mandalorians have a village. This shuttle has no hyperdrive, so we're docking at another Mandalorian ship, which will take us away from this dreary place to a much nicer place."

"Which?" He looked like he cared.

"Which planet?" Mydia shrugged. "Onderon, I believe?"

"No, which ship--"

Mydia was getting annoyed with this conversation. And, more than that, something tickled the edge of her senses. "Have we docked yet? I really think we should leave this system posthaste. I have a bad feeling--" This far from her native soil the whispers of ghosts were faint indeed. But those whispers were growing louder and every one of them raised a warning--

XXX

Sinai of Clan Zal Is a controversial figure in our histories. On one hand, she pioneered the use of synthetic womb-sacs, which helped break through the hidebound traditions of our forefathers, allowing women to battle as freely as men.

On the other hand, even the most cursory examination of her journals reveal an obsession with breeding the perfect Mandalorian, suggesting she was an avowed eugenicist.

The Mandalorian databanks that she began laid the groundwork for warriors such as Tarre Vizla, and the genespliced monsters who followed them....
"Clans: Coming to Terms with Our Violent History," Sabine Kryze, 19BBY, Ducal Palace Press.

--compiled by Archivist Lanna T'so

Xxx

“What the hell is going on?”

He should be looking forward, but instead Canderous had glanced back—only to find more than half their own fighters in retreat, heading back to the Aleema.

The line of retreat was perfectly demarcated at the last communications beacon, proving the orders had come from Aemelie, to all their ships in range.

“Haar'chak! Aemelie?” He spun the controls of his short-range transceiver trying to expand the frequency, but his squad had passed the second asteroid belt. All he heard now was the tell-tale crackle and chatter of Sith backtalk, mostly recitations of numbers, and then--

“Canderous? Uh, Krayt III? This is Arm Imperial Command. You’re in our beamer range. What’s going on back there? Looks like there’s a spot of trouble with your med-ship.” Carth’s voice was professional as it always was in battle, but Canderous detected a note of concern.

“Dunno.” Med-ship? Canderous pivoted his yoke around to get an eye’s-on view through his screen's amplifier. Across the black and between the belts of asteroid debris, the white hulk of the Medix was a blur, even when he sharpened his ocular implant to try and get a targeting lock on the blasted thing. “Mechanical failure?”

But Milli's ship being in trouble wouldn't explain Aemelie recalling three quarters of their forces. No. That had to be something else. Maybe Revan giving new orders through that Zabrak, or maybe--

“Wideband’s down. I can't check.” By rights, Onasi should be issuing their new flight commands, but instead he was talking on Canderous’s personal channel. "That's Dustil's Stinger next to the shuttle, Canderous."

“Get Fats to ask the Zabrak kid.” Canderous shifted in his seat, popping one knee. Aemelie had ordered him not to break formation, and he had to trust his daughter’s skill. Onasi should trust his son's.

“Fats... Fats is dead. We’re getting a replacement.” Carth’s exhale crackled over the speakers. “Shuttle just docked.”

“Well, when you get the thing up and running, get it to ask Aemelie what’s the status.”

“I will, but this is... from here it looks like Dustil’s ship is drifting off-course.”

The Arm had better sensors than Canderous did. “Hah! Maybe your kid fainted again. Better he does that before the battle--” Prox alarms blared, then--doubled. Through his speakers and from the alerts on his own ship. Short-range chatter whined and buzzed and Canderous’s screen lit up like the sky over Althir, day of his proudest victory.

“Oh, no.” Carth’s last words were a muffled curse, and then his transmission cut out—severed quickly in a flurry of barked orders to his subordinates—and in the next heartbeat, Canderous was busy doing the same.
Later, he was never sure which of them had cut the comm first, but it was, to his great regret, the last time their battle would be on the same side.

XXX

Supreme Commander Ganesh Jin was more known for his diplomatic skills than his military ones. An indifferent student at the Fleet Academy, nonetheless he managed to complete his degree a year early. Some of his contemporaries suggested that his Jedi family might have had something to do with his quick promotions (although being the grandson of the former High Admiral of the Republic may have also had something to do with it.) Certainly, his twin sister Master Myleah Onasi was a positive role model during his somewhat… unconventional adolescence. And with the Republic at peace for the first time in a century, perhaps a good-hearted diplomat was precisely what the Fleet needed.

His treaty with the Mandalorian clans is legendary. According to a popular ballad from the time, Ganesh Jin was adopted by Clan Zal and given full clan rights based upon some lost link of kinship…

"Love Not War, A Biography of Supreme Commander Gan," Corulag Industries, LLC. 3819 BBY.

--compiled by Archivist Lanna T'so.

XXX

"Dustil!" Yelling and beating the window of his transparisteel helm did nothing. If the oxygen seals on his board hadn’t been blinking their reassuring green, Millifar might have thought her lover's friend was already dead. "Dustil Onasi!"

"Attach the docking clamps," Sinae instructed over her helm-band. "Quickly. Once we retrieve them, the Rancor will tractor us into Hangar Bay Ceta."

"Did my Second Mother approve jettisoning two fighters?" Millifar would not call Aemelie Mand'alor. Indeed, if her Second Mother persisted with the delusion that she was Mand'alor after this battle, Millifar would tell Gwenarius of her deceit… after she called challenge for the title herself.

"Are you spaceblind? Attach the docking clamps before we get torn--"

Millifar’s speaker popped and shorted out. The light from Onasi's viewscreen dimmed in Millifar’s and something blue-white streaked across her peripheral sensors.

She turned her body, breathing suddenly loud in the quiet of space.

Above her heads, the battered hulk of a Machine Ship drifted. Red were the lights of its thrusters, as they primed to fire--

The wash of a blast nearly knocked Millifar free of her tether as in the next instant she was seeing the enemy disintegrated and a very familiar-looking disc ship flip by, hovering above them, putting itself between their crippled vessels and the enemy.

What happened directly after that was more of a blur, as Millifar frantically threw another grappling hook to the Stinger, and snagged the tie lines on as their craft twisted and dove--

XXX
A deep space rescue is compounded in difficulty, for both vessels must match trajectory and velocity, and the rescuer must have a tether durable enough to withstand the stressors of galactic drift.

Imperial Manual of Procedures, 276 RRA, 3666 BBY.

--compiled by Archivist Lanna T'so

Xxx

"Shit," Polla muttered, as she watched the white shuttle tumble past the Rancor's open hangar bay, dragging the Stinger with it. The bobbing, spacesuited figure clung to the top of the Imperial fighter like a rider on a bucking hessi.

Xxx

Most eyewitnesses from the Battle of Degriass have refused to comment publicly on who gave which order, and who was ultimately responsible for launching the mysterious superweapon we know as 'Revan's Spear,' but when pressed for an off-the-record comment, all agree that it was General Sheris Lorin's persistence that saved many Republic lives that day.

Few have ever asked at what cost.

--Contemporary newsvid for Sullust System. 3964 BBY

--compiled by Archivist Lanna T'so.

XXX

Alarms flashed all over the ship, painting everything the color of blood.

"Our enemy arrived," Admiral Rensha hissed. "But in the wrong place. Did you tell them to materialize there, Revan?" Her taloned claw tapped the holographic image: the Awakened Ones' ships, now between the asteroid belts that were meant to trap them, instead of at the hyperspace jump, from which they were to be led. "Did you tell the Mandalorians to retreat in anticipation?"

Revan gritted her teeth. "I am Sheris," she said pointedly. "And no. On both counts."

Next to her, the Fragment was slumped in her chair, mumbling to herself.

There were three hundred and nine enemies--and the smaller flecks of brightness discharging from them, the spark-swarms of their fighting squadrons. Thousands of fighters and all in the wrong place--already located where Revan and her counterpoint had planned to spring their trap--after forcing their enemies to spread their forces thin.

It should have been another battle of attrition and retreat.

Instead, the allies were facing a cohesive fighting cluster wedged between their ranks--and now occupying the most advantageous coordinates in the system.

As Revan watched, the vanguard row of enemy ships tore into one of the outlying Imperial dreadnoughts like starving kath on a red nerf. The doomed fighters flickered in her vision, followed by commands that had to be coming from her counterpart still slumped in her chair--coordinates directed impossibly fast to everything in range. Fall back, pull back, flank them--

And then the enemy ships froze.
Chained to her chair, (she kept slipping out of it), the Fragment drew a gasping breath and looked up wild-eyed, the lower half of her face a mask of blood. Her presence in the Force flickered out like a snuffed candle and the Machine Ships froze. "Now," she whispered hoarsely.

A ragged cheer erupted as three of the frozen enemy capitals lit up like the skies over Althir, with their own squads, soaring in unbroken formation through the debris.

But there was too much debris. The asteroid belts on which they had planned to shatter their enemy now blocked a clean advance.

Three capitals down to one of ours, Revan thought tiredly. Only three. We need to be faster. Malak? Why are the Mando'ade holding back?

"I do not know." A spark of old hate colored his voice. "A better question might be why did you trust them at all?"

"Quiet," her counterpart snapped, rubbing her temples. "Both of you. I need to ask Aemelie what the frack she's doing."

"Battle stations" Rensha took the moment of their discord to issue commands herself--the ones they'd already agreed upon. "Attack flagged targets. Eliminate in triads, so we can use their dead drones as cover--and get those Mandalorians into position!"

"Retreat to my mark." Revan plotted the points between their ships and the hyperspace points out of the system--just in case. Only the Mandalorian ships were out of comm range, but they were assembling in attacking order, which was right, utterly correct--except they weren't attacking--

"The shuttle--" The Fragment's eyes snapped open, wild. "On, no."

"What shuttle?" Revan looked back at the board. She could sense the five cloaked Mandalorian capitals but there was an oddity on the board and in the Force: a sixth ship facing the Aleema. And a smaller vessel between them--

Xxx

There is no finer glory than a battle in stars.

--Mandalorian Aphorisms for Everyday Seasons, Undated.

--compiled by Archivist Lanna T'so

XXX

And then Revan was--

Poised between stars, sprawled across space itself, simultaneously living and dying with each Machine Ship; each Voice; each tiny light and every life--

You are burning corruption away. That kindly chuckle in her head. Do you see?

I see you. He was the apex at the top of that triangle of light. Revan strode across space like a colossus, and reached for Tenebrae's strength. It washed over her like a cold river, and then the stars aligned and she saw the moment frozen, all of it: the Hunt besieged on all sides, the Imperial ships burning, the Aleema and its escorts slicing toward the planet away from the rest, heading toward a rocky sphere--eddies of smaller ships surrounding them--
You see. He sounded approving. For centuries I have tried to draw them out, force them to battle where they cannot win. But I never had the spark at once--to call to them, to make them frightened enough to come--

She leashed their power in her hands, feeling it flex beneath her fingers.

His dark laughter seemed to echo through the stars. An endless struggle between flesh and machine. The Rakatan computer thought it had bested me, before, but then I found you… and blood is stronger than mere circuitry--

I see. Revan saw everything. It was all beautiful. Why now? Why didn't you destroy the Sleepers before?

They fled, before. But you have maddened them. Use our power. I give it to you freely. Use them--

The Force felt like a skein of live wire in her insubstantial hands. Like the first time Revan remembered watching lightning dance between her fingers, building into an electrical charge.

Is it enough?

A trace of amusement colored his tone. We will see. Can you see the Jar-Sukth Chamber? The woman in the shadows left it for us. Use that to amplify the power of the Bezal bond--

And power gleamed in the stone sigils that Vima had brought to the Hunt.

When she had time to think again, Revan would wonder if the woman had known.

Now, her insubstantial fingers twitched. The charge built and burned, amplified by the Jar-Sukth, and by the glimmering pyramid halfway across the system.

The Awakened Ones and their drone ships began to shatter, caught in a web of Force energy that ripped through their ranks like a supernova--

And then Revan was--

Xxx

Star-field. Tangled dead-ships. No-scent. Ghost-slaver pilots, no one's feet stalk their halls.

Her Light burns through them, bright kinrath web!

Beautiful and terrible, too.

Madclaw. That was Degriass.

--Kashyyyk History Song, attributed to Zaalbar of the Eiowrrr Branch. 3950 BBY (est.)

--compiled by Archivist Lanna T'so

Xxx

The light seemed to spark like wildfire in bright, catching each enemy fighter in its web, flaring to a sun-like pyre with each capital ship.
Zaalbar had followed Jasp Organa's commands for their squad and turned in a new direction to face their enemy. He had leveled his sights to fire--even though they were still more than fifty wroshyr lengths away--

--only to see those plimsi dead ships burn away like ash.

When the Mission-ghost had begun advising Zaalbar's father she proposed weapons that could make such ruin. Thankfully, Freyyr had been trained by the matriarchs in his creche not to set fires he could not put out.

Polla Revan, Zaalbar thought. She was so wise, but she had never learned those lessons, even when Zaalbar had tried to teach them.

Xxx

"I've flown on the back of a warship in the black of space, King Valku. I think I can handle your drexl. Do you sit on his head or above the heart?"

--Attributed to the Beast-Rider Queen, 12 RRA., 3943 BBY (est.)

--compiled by Archivist Lanna T'so

XXX

Millifar bobbed awkwardly in space. The magnetic grips in her suits gauntlets had attached easily to Jin's armored space suit when she'd rescued him, but Dustil Onasi was merely wearing a robe and a fighter's helm inside the cockpit of his Stinger, and his small oxygen tank was now ajar, skin exposed and blue in the lights of her helm.

Brave di'kut. Only someone with mir'osik would fly without proper gear. She wondered if he was already dead.

Her arms locked under his elbows anyway and she kicked the line tethering her to Medix I with her foot to trigger its retraction.

Canderous Ordo claimed Carth Onasi as Clan, making his idiotic dar'jett son her responsibility.

Then Millifar's visor blacked out and the line jerked. Onasi's body slammed into her armored knee and Millifar felt something crunch even as she reached for him, frantically grabbing what felt like his bare arm in her gauntlet.

She grabbed too hard, but that was better than the alternative.

The line reeled them in and her visor adjusted again, polarizing the light.

And Millifar looked up.

Above their heads the black of space was burning. Like watchtower signals, their enemy's ships cracked apart, one-by-one, Across the belts, distant vessels shattered and died, too--tiny flames igniting and then snuffed out in the silence of space.

Half the sector had been cleared. At least a hundred capital Machine Ships were gone in five heartbeats.

And then Millifar had no time to observe more, for her legs were already bumping into the airlock, and she was dragging Dustil Onasi with her as she'd taken Mekel before. Through the hull door's blast portal she saw the Imperial Stinger's docking clamps detach, and Onasi's empty ship careen away from their vector, just as Jin's gunship had.

Beyond that, the Ebon Hawk hovered. And then the inner door of the Medix ratcheted open and Mydia Blais was wailing with Sinae barking orders--and with a bacta tank ready to slap the half-frozen dar'jett in.

Jin lay crumpled in a corner as if Mydia, spying a shinier toy, had discarded him.

To Millifar's astonishment, the Sith Emperor was also possessing Zepth the Zabrak, in the middle of their ship.

"You're supposed to be on the Aleema!" She pushed up her helm's visor. "What is he doing here?"

Sinae glanced up, open kolto packs in both hands. "We do not know. He came out of the med-bay a moment before your arrival. Get me a transfusion line. From my kit."

"This isn't the Aleema?" The Emperor's voice seemed pitched too high and shrill. "What the hell is going on? Why hasn't your fleet changed course to rendezvous with ours?"

"Vitals are crashing," Sinae barked, and she meant Onasi, whose skin had that stippled purple look, like he'd been spaceburned--and then Millifar was soon put to work helping to haul Mekel's friend into a kolto-bed while the Zabrak battered them with more questions that no sensible person had time to answer.

Xxx

Talonis Revan had an unerring grasp of military strategy, even as a child. It was said he commanded his first campaign in the Mandalorian Wars at age fifteen.

That was the battle for Althir, which he won.

He lured the Mandalorian Crusaders into an ambush between asteroid belts, and then slowly tightened the net upon those brave and noble warriors....

"My Ancestor Talonis Revan" by Master Meris Shan. Brentaal IV Press.

[Archivist's note: In their writings, Meris, and to some extent her daughter Tasiele, are always very complimentary of the Mandalorians.]

--compiled by Archivist Lanna T'so

XXX

"This isn't the Aleema?" Even as she asked for the tenth time, Revan realized from the thrum of an engine under the deckplates that she was on a much smaller ship. And yet, the room was familiar. White Walls, medical equipment--

Incongruously, one of the walls appeared to be a sheet of transparisteel, revealing the stars and the wreckage Revan had made of the Awakened Fleet; and the hulk of the Aleema portside. Aft--she turned the Zabrak's head turned and then her heart caught. No! What are you doing here?

Revan was in a thousand bodies at once, now. This Zabrak was in but one--

"Need to get Dustil stabilized!" barked a woman she recognized belatedly as Sinae, the Mandalorian medix. "He's bleeding out--ride back ripped something loose. Try a transfusion from the other one--they're the same blood type--"

Mydia Blais glanced up, round eyes gold as her brother Phylus's. "Mekel won't wake up, either!"

"Wha--what's wrong?" Hard to adjust to the different mouth, the different weight of a jaw, the feel of two hearts thudding in her chest--and the weight of a bladder that needed to be emptied.

Mekel was as pale as Dustil and just as unconscious. Revan was on a ship-- shuttle, that inner voice whispered. You're on a shuttle. For whatever reason Zepth isn't on the Aleema. That's it over there.

Next to the Ebon Hawk.

Mydia Blais frowned. "Don't you know, my lord? You were glowing a second ago. And laughing."

"No. They're both unconscious?" Concerned as Revan was, attack patterns whispered in her skull, and she could feel the rest of her power rising to meet them.

Go, Valkorion murmured. I will attend to this, this tiny thing. Quite beneath your notice, Bright One.

What's wrong with them? A thousand other points of light vied for her attention, and power curled between her fingers.

Their bodies are so fragile. Too fragile, really. If I had them on my altars..... Pity to use them up like this when they could have lasted us years on Kaas--but they are stronger than they look. Do you feel it? Even now, they're recovering strength. Bezal-bonded, drawing from the Force itself!

Revan made the Zabrak's head turn. Dustil Onasi was practically gray. What do you mean, use them up?

The lads are ours. A harvest for the plucking. Everything is ours, Starfire. Take them! Smite the remaining ships!

But it's hurting them.

No. Insects feel nothing. Trust me, I've seen a billion die before. Bezal-bond! I should have tried this earlier--so marvelous--discovering a new trick--always some new trick--it keeps me going. You do, my beautiful spark!

Power was there, coiling again for Revan like a skein in her hand. Her eyes flickered to Dustil Onasi's body jerking on the floor. But--it's killing them. I think it's killing them.

Slowly. And they are INSECTS, my Starfire. Tiny insects compared to ones such as you and me--

Xxx

At Malachor, Talonis Revan made the ultimate sacrifice, giving up the ways of a Jedi for the ways of war. He did so to fight the Sith Emperor, who had been secretly manipulating Revan and Malak all along.

Revan alone broke free from his conditioning.
Malak was always too weak to do so. But that was not his fault.

XXX

She's back, Malak whispered, just in time for Revan to see the Fragment's eyes widen, her mouth open, spitting out blood and choking on it.

Around them, the officers of the Great Hunt's bridge broken into another round of cheers.

"You're fine," Revan told her counterpart dispassionately, holding the pain at bay. "Whatever you just did was magnificent. Most of the enemy ships in zed quadrant were destroyed instantly. May you do it again?" She phrased it as a question for politeness's sake, although the conclusion was foregone. They were not Mandalorians to draw this thing out and the Fragment knew it too.

"Wasn't me." The Fragment wiped her face with her sleeve, blinking. "Not… not just me. Valkorion… he tapped into… something. It's not… not just us in there."

"You used the power of the ships?" Intriguing as a possibility. "Using your own enemy's strength against them? But how--"

"No." The Fragment's eyes went up to the holographic display of the battle, although that was unnecessary--the socket feed clipped to her ear projected the same real-time battlefield that Revan saw. "Not the ships." She swallowed hard, grimacing. "I-I can't do that again, Revan. That power… it has a price."

"Everything has a price," The Emperor had held their best resource in reserve, hoping to trap their enemy. And he had. Oh, but he had. "You found a vulnerability--was it in their weapons array? Did they have those systems linked?"

If the Fragment possessed that kind of power unaided--without needing to be entombed to use it--

For a brief moment, Revan felt a twinge of envy.

"No." The Fragment's eyes blinked rapidly as commands shot across their fields of vision--directing their squads to cut off the still-vulnerable Sleepers. "No. It had nothing to do with the Sleepers. That power came from… something else."

And then, instead of luring their enemy in, she was pulling their forces back, sending their Imperial ships toward the jump points.

The Mandalorian still capitals hovered out of communications range, on the other side of two asteroid belts.

"Valkorion tapped into… something. He's using me." The Fragment shook her head sharply. "Something's wrong, Revan."

Revan bit back her impatience. Of course he's using you. But if you possess the strength to end an enemy, you do it. "He's using what?"

Something is wrong. Sheris's insight was obvious. Very wrong. She knows what, but she doesn't want to tell us.

"She is frightened." Perhaps Malak hadn't meant to speak aloud.
Fragment's eyes widened. "Of course I'm frightened! Something's wrong, I told you!"

"Then tell us what." Rensha slammed a taloned hand down on the display. "The remaining enemy is turning away from us--back to your Mandalorian friends. If you can end them, do it now."

"No. " The woman was glowing again, Force-light leaking from her skin. She'd tapped into the Jar-Sukth, Revan realized belatedly--Vima's reflective chamber of Force amplification, fifty meters below this deck. The lines of power were clear as sunlight when Revan closed her eyes--lines tethering the Fragment across the stars to--to--

To something on the other side of the sector that felt like the birth of a sun.

What is that, Mal?

I'm not sure. But it feels familiar. Something of the Emperor--?

"Not just the Emperor." The Fragment's voice. "And not just me. He's feeding their power to me somehow. He takes it and I use it."

"Their power? Who?" Who would be strong enough?

"I was in the Zabrak--Zepth. The Zabrak is on a shuttle near the Aleema. With Mekel and Dustil. It's them."

Revan bit back her impatience. "You don't need our cousin to give commands to the Aleema-- the Zabrak is close enough, then for short-range. Hail them."

"The Mandalorians have lost another capital and have destroyed thirteen," Rensha interrupted. "The Aleema and her sister ships have turned--toward the Degriass planet. Wideband is still offline, but you may want to reroute their command--or set ours upon a course to intercept--"

"I can't. " The Fragment blinked again, hands blazing. On their command board, squads of fighters split, defending their capitals from an enemy that had at last began to withdraw. "I can't raise the Aleema. Zepth isn't there. I told you--he's somewhere else--on some kind of transport--the Aleema's shuttle." She twitched a finger and the small ship blocked by the Aleema's bulk illuminated on their screen. And the shuttle's trajectory was jagged and irrational, tugging toward the planetoid beneath.

"Then hail the Aleema from the shuttle!" Had the woman suddenly gone dim?

She is stalling, whispered Sheris. She's avoiding directly conflicting our command, but she will not. For whatever reason she will not--

"Pardon, General Revan, Admiral Rensha… uh, the attackers, they're retreating from our forces."

One of Rensha's lieutenants chose that moment to interrupt with what they already knew.

The enemy ships that had been focused on the Hunt and the bulk of their fleet were now heading toward the Mandalorians.

"Then tell the Mandalorians to join us quickly in quadrant pinse--at the twelve," Rensha commanded, naming the logical point to intersection between their fleets. "Tell them to leave the shuttle. If its shields hold it can refuge among the asteroids--or one of the moons. We need a united front, now."

"Revan? What the hell's going on with the Aleema?" As if summoned by the Force, General
Canderous Ordo took that moment to break into their command frequency. "I'm... of range--" his voice cut out in a wail of static even as other command requests came in from other squad leaders--ones wise enough to see the same writing in the sand that Ordo did.

"I don't know." The Fragment wiped her face again. Her eyes shifted away, and Revan knew she was lying.

"Just use that superweapon again. Hah! Whatever you did there, at the start--you fried at least a hundred of em, maybe five hundred of those kriffing drone fighters--"

"I can't use it again, Canderous--assemble your forces toward the jump points."

"Freckles? What's going on with with the Aleema? Sent a squad closing in but they're still out of range. Are you holding them back? I've got... I got another Voice for the Emperor, but he's--we haven't heard from you--but whatever you did out there... it was amazing. Can you uh, can you do it again?"

Revan shook her head. "No, Carth. I can't."

She was still glowing

Xxx

Sometimes a pawn can seize the day.

Other times a pawn's destiny is a trash fire.

--Mandalorian Chess: A Primer For Warriors

[Note: this small datachip, designed to be downloaded into a combat visor is commonly attributed to ‘Lin,’ whom troch barbarians call the "God of Luck." This is a false interpretation. The Mando’ade have no gods, Archivist T’so. Lin is a legend, a test for blooded warriors to prove their worth. Some say he can yet be found in his ancient ship, cloaked above the skies of Old Malachor. No Mandalorian will ever reveal the location of Old Malachor so don’t even ask. I’ve given you enough of our blood for your records already.]

Fett Bindo Reggio’s annotation was provided under duress, 36 ABY

--compiled by Archivist Lanna T’so, University of Coruscant.

Xxx

When Dustil’s eyes opened they were still as yellow as ever, except the whites looked pretty yellow too, as if the Sith power was staining his entire eyeball, now. His skin was fried purple and glistening with kolto, as if he’d taken a bath in vacuum.

He looked like hell but he was alive.

"Hey." Mekel said, reaching out a weak arm. His voice felt rusty and weak. The tube from his arm that ran into Telos's was red with their mingled blood. The blood-machine-thing (that was the exact Mand'oa translation Sinae used, Mekel had helped her before) was looping their circulatory systems into one another.

They had the same blood type. But he'd learned that before. Once on Korriban. They'd woken up after a glitterstim bender into this exact same scenario. Except then it had been recovering from a Bezal bond ceremony, performed by good old Yuthura Ban.

Hey. Dustil's lips moved under his oxygen mask. But his voice was in Mekel's head.

I hear you. Mekel thought back. Once he would've been excited, but now he felt too weak. He was just grateful. I finally fracking hear you, fockda.

I'm finally listening. A pause. Are you fracking Mydia and Milli?

Not at the same time. Hey, when you're feeling better, maybe we--

You're impossible.

To resist. Yeah. Mekel felt like garbage but the corners of his mouth turned up. I know. You know, I charmed the Sith Emperor out of his pants--

I don't want to know. Dustil's free hand lifted, then dropped. Mekel could feel the weight of it, too, like all of their muscles were too tired to move.

Yeah, well Lord Valkorion wasn't really into sex, he just--

He's helping you get the Force back. I-I know that, too. Dustil didn't sound as thrilled as Mekel felt. And I know about that time with Leskal in the shower, and the two comm officers in the supply closet--you didn't even know their names!

One of them's Ojix-something--

Mekk. Dustil's voice was quiet. Look at me.

Mekel did, he looked at those yellow eyes and suddenly he knew a bunch of crap he wished he didn't--like how much Dustil wished he didn't have to know about Milli and Myd and Lyd and Leskal and the supply closet and the weird dreams Mekel used to have about his own cousin--

And more. Darker stuff. Really dark. What it had felt like to have all that power, to be Lord Malak, practically, on Dromund Kaas, and have Inse Blais up against the wall of the--

Mekk. Dustil's voice in his head was serious. Seriously? It's not all about sex.

It wasn't. A lot of it was about much darker things. People dying when they were being bombed. Sith torture cells. Crap Dustil had been doing on Korriban while Mekel was spending his free time exploring the sewers for escape hatches like a normal sent. It was everything. Every story Telos had ever told him. Every lie exposed. Every want. Every need. Every dream.

I'll do that, he offered, to one of the less creepy ones. We can go find a bakery when we're back on Coru--

Mekk. Dustil shook his head as if Mekel wasn't getting it. You don't get it, fockda. None of it matters.

She does. Mekel looked up at the Mandie baby tank thing (another literal translation) that was hovering above them. The boy too. Should've realized they were yours--knew there was a reason I liked them. Hey, if Myd has one of mine, they can grow up together. Didn't you always want sibs?

Mekk. Dustil shook his head again. Look up.
Mekel did. Nothing to see. Just the plain white ceiling.

Close your eyes, idiot.

Mekel closed his eyes. Dustil felt closer like this, skin on skin, the heat of him, pure power radiating from them both.

Up, his bondmate whispered. Up, up.

Mekel Jin looked up--

--and the real face of the Sith Emperor beamed down with the light of a winter sun, draining and cold.

Dust!

I know. They huddled together for warmth, like prey in a nest, watching the galaxy spin through a madman's faceted eyes--

XXX

"No one person, not even Talonis Revan, can destroy the Sith Emperor. Or so we thought at the time, right up until Talonis Revan did destroy him. That's right. Talonis Revan made that old spaceworm eat his kriffing dust!"

--Attributed to eyewitness 'Em Vee' at the Battle of Degriass. Excerpt from Tales of the Machine Wars. 3763 BBY

[Note: There is some question as to whether this is a real eyewitness account.]

--compiled by Archivist Lanna T'so, University of Coruscant.

XXX

"Direct your fleet to cover a retreat, Carth." The new Voice on Carth's ship was just under her skin, but with a thousand others all speaking at once it was hard to focus him with the proper attention.

With a thousand of her living at once, it was difficult to care.

"What about the Mandalorians?" Her husband's Imperial hat was crooked on his brow. The Force moved under her red fingers and straightened it.

Clever. And kind. Staging a retreat to remove your lover from the battlefield--

Come to me. She ignored Tenebrae's taunts, calling to the enraged fleet of Machine Ships. It's me you want, you fracking monsters. I'm right here--

What are the lives of two boys to save billions? You've never been so squeamish before--remember when you cut down their classmates on Korriban? A chuckle. I was watching.

And then she was--

Back in her own body again, voice hoarse from screaming commands--

"Bear shields!" Revan blinked as fast as she could to input the new course commands, overriding Dar's more cautious approach. "We need to get the Aleema and the other Mandalorian ships out of those asteroids, but we won't do it by going in after them!"

"But you had the Sleepers." Her duplicate wasn't listening, had taken Revan by the shoulder, metal fingers digging into the muscle of her arm. "You destroyed more than third of their ships! If you can do that again--"

Almost half their fleet, really. We should have just enough to finish the task. The lads recover at a remarkable rate--I've never seen such resilience! All this time! I should have thought of using a Bezal-bonded pair sooner--tapping. Judicious flares of power, even without the final draining ritual… remarkable!

"No," Revan snapped out loud. "It's hurting them." She could feel it--

And then she was--

--back in Zepth's body again--watching--

--watching as Millifar steered the shuttle into the moon's atmosphere and Sinae of Zal and Mydia Blais tried desperately to start Mekel's heart.

Tut, tut. The lad's fine. There--

Revan almost felt her cousin's body jerk, heard his gasp as if it came from her own mouth, felt him sit up--

"The hell?" Mekel gasped. And then his eyes rolled up in his head and he fell back again.

His skin was glowing black and covered in Sith runes.

And then she was--

--back on her own body, spitting up blood on the deck of the Great Hunt's bridge--

"Hurting who?" Dar frowned, wiping Revan's face like she was a small child. "Who are you speaking to?"

"Tenebrae?" Malak's insubstantial form hovered behind Dar, looking like the Jedi she didn't consciously remember; his hair the length of his strong jaw, concerned twist of his sensitive mouth. "The Emperor lies, Revan. Just take his strength again. Seize it and destroy the ships--"

"I can't! He's taking it from them. Draining them, somehow--"

"Draining... who--?" Carth's voice over the short-range comm, cutting in and out. "Freck... who--?"

"Your son." She owed her husband that much. The truth. "The Emperor's using your son--and Mekel Jin. That explosion--what I did. He used them to fuel it. It's killing them."

"The Bezal bond." Yuthura's voice. "He's tapped into the bond?"

"What?" Carth's voice. Furious. "But they're swarming the Aleema --we've got to help--"

"We can't reach them in time, Admiral." Dar's voice.

"I'm trying to help." But this body was only half of a shell now, and the rest of her was there on that shuttle, tapped into the Bezal triangle, still channeling Tenebrae's power through Dustil's fragile body--

--his skin was glowing white. Sun to Mekel's shadow. And Revan stood with her hands above, like a colossus in space, breathing in the strength of creation itself--

She extended a celestial limb and another five of their enemies exploded.

Now you see. You were always mine, Starfire. Always. Come. Burn the babes and our enemies. It will buy you years in this body. Years to rule my Empire, years to save as many children as you like--

Logically, he was right.

But somewhere Revan heard the sound of bells. Loud like a warning. A claxon call to sanity.

And then she was--

Revan felt her own lungs seize a breath, the weight of her own body. "No, Imperial Command Mark Thiska-ziox. Execute Order Six-Four-Seven Two Nine, Mark Bisk Delta. On my mark. Five-Two-Two- Ten One Six. Executive override." The words bubbled up from a place somewhere beneath the depths of any conscious memory, spoken fast, even as she saw her duplicate's eyes widen with understanding a second before the rest. "Mark! Jump points Rekkiad. Now."

The Imperial Fleet, slaved to its executive commander, jumped en masse, cutting out Carth's astonished squawk. What fighters it possessed with hyperdrive followed, leaving the Hunt alone with the remainder of their enemies on one side of the system; the Aleema alone upon the other.

"Your memory, Fragment, Dar's voice was acid. "--shows a convenient time to recall one of my most final executive orders."

"You programmed the Imperial fleet to move on your mark. Programmed the navcomps. Revan's throat was dry. "Because flesh and blood couldn't be trusted. You needed a way to stop--stop any rebellion. At any time." She took a deep breath. "I didn't remember. The Emperor… he... knew of it."

Less memory than the intuition that such a command had to exist. In the moment, the fact had lain before her like a coin in the hand.

Yes, he murmured. All that I am is yours. You wanted to send them away? I gave you the means. My gift. They are gone. Kinder, perhaps, for the husband not to see his son's end. We do not need ships to end our Sleepers, Revan. And what are two lives against ours? Against billions?

Rensha was still barking protests. But Dar's voice was artificially serene--which meant she was furious. "Will you sacrifice the Great Hunt to save the Mandalorian ships, now? Those children? We'll fail. We needed the Imperial forces--

"They're not children. Revan swallowed, even as Tenebrae's power tugged at her, whispering promises of a quick end. Her eyes went to the Aleema and its besieged fellows. One Mandalorian capital burned, now leaving four. "We can't save them. Not by staying." Her gaze turned to Rensha and she willed her heart to stone. "They… everyone in this system has a have a better chance if we're--if I'm not in it."
The shuttle with Dustil and Mekel isn't the only small ship out there. Mandalorian fighters don't have hyperdrive--their squads are stuck. Some of our own are too damaged to make the jumps. Our ships, and all of the Imperial fighters who didn't make it back--we're leaving them behind, too.

And the other. The disc-shaped circle familiar as her own heart. She'd seen the Ebon Hawk through the port-side window of the shuttle. Through the Zabrak's eyes.

Knew you'd stay, Polla. Jasp and Zaalbar's squadron had made it back to the Hunt. Which meant that Revan was going to have to explain to Jasp how his daughter had not left Degriass. How they would leave her, instead.

"Jump, Admiral." Revan made her voice steady. "Now. Leave the stragglers behind. Follow the Imperial fleet."

You would jump when you could save them?

"You want to jump when we could save them?" Eerily, Dar's inflection sounded exactly like Tenebrae's.

It's the only way to save them.

The vectors pinwheeled like a map of probabilities. Surely her counterpart could see it too. There were nearly two hundred Sleepers bearing down on the Mandalorians. Whatever Tenebrae had done--that knot of power he'd made in the shuttle from Mekel and Dustil and Zepth--it sang like a beacon.

Revan called to the Sleepers again, but they ignored her, focusing instead on the morsel just out of their reach--that ball of energy that had destroyed so many of them already. Hate burned in their circuits and she felt it in her throat. They were a part of her even as Tenebrae was.

But if she left the system...it had always worked before--Revan had called them from a galaxy away before--

"You don't know if this will work, Red." Malak's voice.

"You could have directed the Imperials to go after our ships!" Rensha. Too slow and a credit short.

It wouldn't work. We can't reach them in time.

"Revan." She addressed Dar by name and saw the woman's head turn, those green eyes frost over, as her counterpart extended her own Force-sense.

"She's right. We can't reach them in time. Even if we still had the Imperial Fleet." Dar's voice, speaking what they both knew. "The only chance we have is in another system. We will have more of an advantage at Rekkiad. Certainly by Malachor. We can end it all on Malachor, if we must."

The gravity well. Revan closed her eyes. All go down together. "Then do it."

"Jump!" Dar snapped to Rensha. "You heard General Revan! Jump now!"

Xxx

Tribunal Judge Qwerp Rii: "We've covered the events at Degriass at length, Defendant Onasi. You commanded the Imperial and Mandalorian fleets to the best of your abilities. I think you'll find there's not a sentient here who blames you for the casualties."
Carth Onasi: "I was only following orders. General Revan's orders. And High Admiral Rensha's." (Pause.) "And... General Sheris, too. Of course."

Tribunal Judge Thikka Droll: "Orders that sacrificed fifty Mandalorian ships?"

Carth Onasi: (Pause.) "That's right. The... the entire Mandalorian fleet was destroyed."

Tribunal Judge Qwerp Rii: "We're all veterans of the Mandalorian War, Carth. Some even say you did the galaxy a favor. Their leader died too, didn't he? Canderous Ordo?"

Carth Onasi: "I... I don't... yes. All of them. Everyone we left... died."

Tribunal Judge Thikka Droll: "And the rumors of an increased Mandalorian presence around the planet Onderon?"

Carth Onasi: "I've never been to Onderon. I have no damned idea! What the hell does that have to do with anything--"

Arbiter Silka: "That line of questioning is irrelevant. Please get back to the point, Droll--"

--Transcript from Court Martial of Carth Onasi 3954 BBY

--compiled by Archivist Lanna T'so, University of Coruscant.

Xxx

"Aemelie, we have to move closer to the other ships!"

Polla had only gotten into this fight to keep her da safe. Now, she had no idea where he was and most of her effort was put into keeping the swarm of turbo-charged snipers off that kripping shuttle while she tried to talk Aemelie Ordo out of taking on this entire blasted fleet of Machine Ships with just the Aleema and the remaining four--oops, now three Mandie--capitals. Something had crisped a lot of their enemy at once, and after that, the Machine Ships had shifted their attention from trying to get to the Great Hunt to trying to kill everything on this side of the asteroid belt.

"Polla Wen! I told you some day I would see your skill in battle. I was right. You're doing very well." Aemelie had no right to sound so fracking cheerful when they were losing. "These hu'tuun aruetii think they can use us for their trap, but we can defeat them easily, even without that dar'jett Emperor's magic--I am sending Cannock Squad to support you now."

"I don't need a squad, Aemelie. We all need to get the hell out of here!" Revan's ships were at the jump points--now halfway across the system where they'd put the asteroid belt between them and their enemy. To the right of her viewscreen the short-range chatter from the Shifty Drunken Diamond of Ceris cut out suddenly, as the entire ship lit up like a ruined parade.

The entire Mandalorian comm-band went silent for a second and then they all started singing, Aemelie's voice blasting out loud and clear.

Oya'cye!

Kyr'am!

Mare'cye!

Darasuum!
Two capitals left, Polla thought numbly. Two, and the Aleema, and whatever fighters they've got -

Her eyes went to the viewscreen, and the waiting fleet--their only hope.

But their sector was empty. The rest of Revan's fleet was gone. As Polla stared in horrified disbelief the remains of some fighter squads sparked out too, as those with working hyperdrives used them. As for the rest--

She had no more time to dwell on the rest because two more bogeys had attached to her bow.

They left us? It was nearly impossible for Polla to fly and shoot--something she should have realized sooner. The Hawk was designed for two people--at least--but Polla tapped in the autopilot to run another pass above the Medix I-- and then said a prayer to the Grass Priests. Then she leveled the targeting system and spammed the rapid-fire on the Hawk's brand new plasma cannon, winging two of 'em. The autocannon took out another six single-engine drones who'd gotten close enough to die.

Below, the Medix I seemed to have lost one of its stabilizers, tilting alarmingly in its drift, careening on a slingshot maneuver that looked headed for Degriass's larger moon.

"That shuttle contains our future," Aemelie instructed Polla. "Protect it. We'll take care of the aruetii."

Polla was already angling in the direction of the moon, following the shuttle because she didn't want to fracking die.

Da, she thought. "Yeah. I'll get them down." She reached across the board to grab the gunner controls. It was nuts but the swarms seemed to be ignoring her and the Aleema and going after that blasted shuttle. If they hadn't been tucked under the lee of the dreadnought's shields, Polla thought they'd all be dead already. "You've got three big ships left, Aemelie. They've got like a hundred. You're going to draw them off... how?"

"You grasp the plan. I knew you were a warrior, Polla Wen." Aemelie's voice cut out--and then Polla was more concerned with shooting and maneuvering the Hawk around atmospheric debris than she was with how Aemelie planned on taking on a hundred fracking ships.

Xxx

Oya'cye!

Kyr'am!

Mare'cye!

Darasuum…

--Traditional Mandalorian Song, compiled by Fett KayTraviss Mand’alor

--compiled by Archivist Lanna T'so, University of Coruscant.

Xxx
"Get those stabilizers up!" Millifar yelled at Sinae, because the medix at least knew something about flying a shuttle. Mydia Blais was entirely useless, and Mekel Jin and Dustil Onasi were unconscious, sprawled on cots next to the softly chuckling Zabrak.

"I'm doing my best."

Above their heads another one of their allies was burning.

"The moon is close, Daughter." Aemelie Ordo sounded surprisingly cheerful. "Increase your vector by another ten degrees. Use thrusters on entry. Their ships will lose you in the clouds. We can provide cover."

"We could still come to you," Millifar muttered, but she knew better. Their one advantage over their pursuers was speed, and most of that was due to their slingshot descent into this moon's grasp.

The Munificent Rancor had stayed to defend them to its valiant end. The now-honorable ships of Wies were down to three.

"No," her Second Mother said. "You must not come to us, First Daughter."

Millifar glanced up then, and saw, in the lines of their foes, the shape of what was to come.

"Rheturcye mhi, Mai," she whispered, and slammed the nose of their ship down onto the clouds.

Xxx

Kote!

Kandosii sa ka'erta, Vode an.

Malachor a'den mhi, Vode an.

Bal kote, darasuum kote...

--The Vode An, A Traditional Mandalorian Song, transcribed by Fett KayTraviss Mand'alar.

--compiled by Archivist Lanna T'so, University of Coruscant.

Xxx

The bulk of the allied fleet was gone. An unexpected decision, but Canderous could not fault it. His people had made this battle their own. Perhaps Revan understood enough to let them find glory.

He gunned his own fighter faster to join the fray, but he could see the shape of the fight in the stars--the lights on his radar halfway across the system. It would be over before he reached them.

"Kandosii, mirdala cyare." Canderous was still out of comm range when the Aleema pivoted, heading straight toward the largest concentration of enemy ships, their cannons lighting fire on its forward shields until the ship resembled a bloody comet more than anything else, skimming the edges of the moon's atmosphere as the fighters above it began their assault.

The Aleema pivoted at a gee that would have left any in her hull pulverized without armor, and then levelled her bow--

"Aems." Canderous had never felt so old. Or so proud. Of his wife and his people.
[Those who stand before us light the night sky in flame.

Our vengeance burns brighter still.

Every last traitorous soul shall fall.

Forged like the saber in the fires of death, Brothers all!]

--The Vode An, Traditional Mandalorian Song, transcribed by Fett KayTraviss Mand’alor. Translation by Master Wook’ipedia.

--compiled by Archivist Lanna T’so, University of Coruscant.

XXX

The trock ships wanted their shuttle but could not have it. The Imperials were cowards who had run, and Revan (as Aemelie had always suspected) was useless. Whatever superweapon she’d had at her command had stopped at destroying merely half of their enemies.

Aemelie jerked her helm, feeling the joints creak and snap in their increased gravity, pressing down on her pressurized suit. Her blood felt pooled and thick, as oxygen hissed in her ears trying to compensate. Next to her, Dessa’s gauntleted hand bumped against hers as they both reached at once for the yoke, dragging it back together.

"Escape pods launched and clear," her friend said, voice crackling over their failing comms.

Aemelie had always had an intuitive gift for mapping hyperspace coordinates. Shameful in a woman, some said, and she had bruised them for saying it. Women’s math involved crop rotations, soil analysis, supply estimates, chromosome recombination. Even ship design, Aemelie’s specialty, was frowned upon in many circles. But her own mothers had been progressive and perhaps (as was whispered behind their backs) too ambitious for their only daughter.

Now, Aemelie’s left hand moved on the controls, tracing the symbols she knew were right as a part of her mind sang the Vode An.

The navcomputers beeped their disapproval, red lights flashing.

And Aemelie smiled, for the navcomputer registering the jump as impossible... meant she’d gotten her numbers right.

Zal’s Last Gambit, the move was called, but Aemelie would not be surprised if it was named after her after this day--

Xxx

[Glory, eternal glory.

The stars pale beside our might.]

--Kote Darasuum. Traditional Mandalorian Song, transcribed by Fett KayTraviss Mand’alor. Translated by Master Wook’ipedia.

--compiled by Archivist Lanna T’so, University of Coruscant.
The Aleema burned like a comet with its shields afire, turning into their enemies, with unnatural speed, rolling like a purrgil to face them.

Canderous winced inwardly, thinking of the torque involved, the pressures of gravity and velocity, the stress on those mighty engines. Half the lights on Aleema's portside flickered and went black, even as a black swarm of enemy ships raced to capitalize on the damage.

They don't know, he thought. They think they've won. They have won. What she's doing us impossible.

Behind the Aleema, the other two Mandalorian capitals had turned, mimicking her flight. One was more than half already in pieces, the other not much better. Made from Star Forge stuff, the Aleema held its form. Canderous knew this move.

It was impossible.

"She's going to ram?" some troch pilot chatter over his radio from other survivors—even the bellow of a Wookiee as Zaalbar expressed his concern.

"No," Kirrg of Clan Rialis had always been quick. "She's going to jump."

"But that's… it's insane. The calculations alone--get it wrong and you're dead for nothing. You'll phase right through. And the shields--getting the enemy to lower their shields so you don't just break on them--it's impossi--"

Alarms sounded and suddenly Canderous's vessel was swamped by a solar wind. The sun flickered in his vision. The quadrant near the planet and its moons lit up, turning blue-white for milliseconds, before abruptly cutting to black.

"The Machine Ships don't have particle-based deflector shielding, only ray." Kirrg sounded subdued.

"Don't need particle-based with no life support," Canderous agreed. "The Undying were easy marks, once she got the calculations right." He didn't think any man of the clans could have done it. Not even close.

A ragged cheer went up on his comm and his warriors began the Vode An. The Machine Ships had been clustered close, really close. The few on the perimeter who'd emerged unscathed winked out. A dozen more burned, mostly in pieces, but some still fair game.

Kote, Aems, Canderous thought with a savage joy. You left some for me.

Xxx

Aemelie's Close is more legend than legitimate military maneuver. Modern warships of our time always carry double-deflector shielding, protection against energy attacks as well as physical incursion.

But the first rule of hyper-dimensional space is that two objects cannot occupy a hyperspace point simultaneously. Either one object exists—or none do.

And if none exist in a space that once held more than one object, is it possible that both objects still exist elsewhere? Theoreticians have pondered this question for centuries.
Mandalorians are more practical. They have an entire school of philosophy based upon Aemelie's Close. At its heart this philosophy states that sometimes the needs of the many are best served by saving the few.

--Saw Guerrera, "A Call to Arms," 10BBY (est.)

Note in margin: "To Jynny, on her tenth birthday. Love, Uncle Saw"

--compiled by Archivist Lanna T'so, University of Coruscant.

Xxx

"Why the hell are we in hyperspace?" Carth turned on the new Voice, not waiting for an answer. "What just happened? We have to go back!"

"Can't reroute, sir--Rekkiad's twelve hours off, shiptime."

"All ships reporting in--"

"Casualty reports seven squads without hyperdrive to follow--"

"Wideband's up, Admiral, but spotty--"

The reports came in over his feed and in person. Across from him, Yuthura stood like a Sith statue, lekku twisted around her neck.

"What is it?" He barked at her, when the Voice did nothing. "Tell me what just happened!"

"A command… overrode our navcontroller, sir." His Ensign looked like he was about to faint.

"--nothing like it!"

"All the ships in our fleet?"

"Lord Revan's executive command?"

"I realize she sent us all to hyperspace! I'm not stars-touched! Yuthura!" Carth barked. "Tell me what's going on!"

"Ships lost… more lives… lost. I felt them." The Twi'lek blinked. "I'm afraid I don't know more than that."

"Dustil? My wife?"

"What the hell just happened?"

Instead of answering, Yuthura's lekku twitched in the direction of their new Voice.

"Admiral." Later, he was never sure if--some of it had to be her, but not all. Not everything. "You will proceed with your fleet to Rekkiad."

"Revan?"

The Sith pureblood stood there and stared back at him with blank, unseeing eyes. For too long a pause. Long enough for his bridge officers to begin whispering, long enough for Carth to doubt himself.

"Yes, Carth." The timbre of the pureblood's voice didn't change. "Take your fleet to Rekkiad. Assemble our forces near the sun. Coordinates to follow."

"That's one hell of a hello. What just happened?"

"The Aleema destroyed one hundred and twenty-three of their ships."

"So... uh, that leaves... what, hundred and twenty for my guys? Two-to-five odds?" He laughed. "No problem."

"No. They have thirty ships left." Dead voice.

Just the facts, ma'am. "I was joking, but that's... that's a lot better than I thought." It was. "And the Aleema, it--"

"Gone." Was there emotion there? The pureblood's eyes were glowing red. Carth couldn't tell. "All the Mandalorian capital ships are gone."

"Gone? My... my son--" Yuthura said he was alive--

"Safe." Another pause. "On the moon. For now."

For now. "You're gonna need to give me more than that."

"I am with Dustil, Carth." No expression in her voice. His voice. Carth could be talking to the Emperor and he'd never know. "On a shuttle--landing on the surface of a moon. Our charts say it's called Oas. It has a breathable atmosphere."

"Talk to him! Tell him we'll come back for him!"

"I... of course, Carth." A pause. "Flyboy."

"Freckles." It didn't sound like her at all. Hell, when Polla and Sheris had pretended to be Revan they'd sounded more like her than this dead voice. But he knew the dead voice. He'd heard it before. "After this is all over, you gonna... you're gonna pin a medal on my chest, sister?"

"What?" Distracted. Of course, she wouldn't know--it hadn't been her that day in the Jaxus Cluster. Had been the other one. "Carth. Others require attention as well. I have to go."

"No problem, sister. I got this." He looked up to see Yuthura Ban watching him. When their eyes met, she looked away.

"Proceed to Rekkiad," the Voice repeated. "That's an order, Admiral. I'm sending coordinates for our opening salvos now."

Xxx

Arbiter Silka: "The next section of the trial concerns the Battle of Rekkiad. Carth Onasi? Would you describe the events for the court?"

Carth Onasi: "There's... there's not a lot to say. We... we fought them. For once we outnumbered the bastards. General Revan cloaked half our forces behind the ice planet. Then... she used the Hunt as bait. They were sitting targets. We... we blew them up."
Silka: "And then?"

Carth Onasi: "What do you want me to say?"

Silka: "We are still demanding an explanation for--"

Carth Onasi: "I'm done answering your damn questions! Either promote me or throw me in the brig. Hells, you let Rew and Cein off already with a slap on the wrist, and Rensha--"

Silka: "The High Admiral requested an early retirement."

--Transcript from Court Martial of Carth Onasi 3953 BBY

--compiled by Archivist Lanna T'so, University of Coruscant.

Xxx

Oas was a moon in the Degriass System, orbiting a burning cinder of a world called Kanker. Maybe a few thousand years ago there'd been some civilization or another on Kanker, but its atmosphere had been strip-mined since. Now the place was known for being in the middle of nowhere, if it was known for anything at all.

Oas, at least, had a breathable atmosphere. After a bumpy ride, the med-bay of the Aleema had landed without incident on a snowy plateau, trailed by life-pods from the Mandalorian survivors--and the blue disc of the Ebon Hawk.

Millifar watched through her viewscreen as the dust that had been the Aleema, the Birthright, and the Tats dissolved over the horizon like a sprinkling of stars.

Her cheeks were wet and cold when she went outside, trailed by the dar'jett who kept shivering instead of putting on her envirosuit.

"Why couldn't we go with the Rancor?" Mydia whined.

"The Rancor went to dust with all hands," Millifar snapped. Hadn't the Blais girl been paying attention?

"Then w-why did the Imperial ships just leave us?" The girl sounded near-hysterical.

"Because they are fools," the Zabrak kid said in the Sith Emperor's voice, trailing behind them. "Superstitious fools who refused my assistance!"

Polla Organa, a woman Aemelie had admired, debarked from her ship. She stood halfway between the gangplank of the Ebon Hawk and the Medix. She looked as pale as the real Revan against the blowing winds and snow, huddled in a ragged black robe. "You guys okay?"

Millifar ignored her, looking to the sky where the lights of more ships glimmered. More survivors, but not their enemy, unfortunately. At that moment Milli would have liked to take the Ebon Hawk and its guns aloft and burn the Undying to ash--if Aemelie had left any for them to kill. Knowing her, she had not. Aemelie could be selfish.

Millifar wiped her eyes.

"Polla!" the Sith Emperor called out from behind her, voice high-pitched and squeaking. "You're alive!"
"Yeah. No thanks to you, Tenny-Bro." The Deralian walked closer, moving on the balls of her feet, hand on her blaster. "What the hell? You blew up half their fleet with some Force voodoo and then decided to let the Mandies die instead of taking the rest?"

"It was not that simple." The Zabrak's face suddenly went slack. Then, "Tut! Tut! Oh, my smuggler. It is good to see you again! And how is your ship? I hope not damaged!"

"Ship's fine. I'm more worried about my Da. I don't suppose you've seen him?"

"Oh, my! I suppose I can check--" the red glow abruptly faded, and Zepth fell down, like a droid with a pulled motivator.

"We should kill him," Sinae said.

"No!" Polla snapped. "No more fracking killing. Or dying." She wiped her eyes. "Damnit. I can't believe she actually did that. That was one jump in a billion--"

"My Second Mother was gifted," Millifar said. "First Mother always said she should have been born a man."

"Like women can't plot hyperspace jump points?" Polla Organa made a noise in her throat. "Seriously?" Her voice dropped. "But I don't think I could have done that. She was--"

"You cannot understand what she was." Millifar didn't feel like trying to explain.

Sinae coughed. "We need to set up our camp. I have tasks to assign you both--"

"Tasks?" The Deralian blinked.

"Chores," Millifar explained. This part was relentlessly familiar, rituals to overcome grief. "We will need tents and a fire if the air is thick enough to sustain one. A wideband transceiver should be erected. And a battle circle to honor the dead. A well-spout if we can find groundwater…"

"And we must collect the other survivors who are too injured to come to us," Sinae added.

"But it's cold here," Mydia Blais whined. "I don't like it."

"We don't have to stay." Polla gestured toward her ship. "Plenty of room on the Hawk...." Her voice trailed off, as if she'd just noticed the sparks of escape pods in the skies above.

"Not for everyone," Sinae announced. "I've set a beacon. More survivors will come. There will be injured."

"We'll come back for you," the Emperor said, chuckling. The Zabrak had scrambled to his feet again, eyes glowing with his hellish magic once more. "We will return, my friends. As soon as our victory is won. In the meantime..." he chuckled. "Do take care of Mekel Jin and Dustil Onasi for me. I need them fit as firaxin, hah hah!"

Xxx

I dreamed they will be happy, unlikely as it seems. The Jedi and the Beastrider Queen. But the ties that bind us, even betrayal cannot sever. He will always remember the altar and the agony, but given time, it will not matter.

Their daughter will have her father’s eyes as well as his loving heart.
"The hyperspace wake indicates a large fleet passed through here recently." Bao-Dur was like a placid nerf, Oerin had decided. Nothing rattled him--much like Meetra herself. "I'm seeing an ion trace to that moon. There may be a few survivors."

"I had a moon once. Above Rekkiad." Meetra paced slowly across the bridge. She'd found an intact Republic officer's uniform somewhere, and added enough bars to make herself an admiral. "Loser's Moon. It's a shame what they'll do to Rekkiad. Smoke half the surface to destroy all traces of the Sleeper wreckage. And it was so beautiful, once."

"You've been talking to your Seer again." Oerin cracked his right knee, holding the skin down again after as it agonizingly reknit.

"Thalia May predicted our mother's end." Meetra shrugged. "Correctly. I like her."

The Seer had been one of the last to join them on Malachor V before their departure. She had come, she claimed, to warn them not to go to Rekkiad, which was quite timely, as they both had decided to go there, supposedly of their own volitions.

Mother's hooks ran deep. Even now that they had both felt her die, Oerin wondered if they would ever be truly free.

"Our mother has yet another version," he reminded Surik. "Don't forget the story Brianna told us. Brianna's twin and the last holocron--"

"Mical Jorde. In the Telos Enclave." Meetra nodded slowly. "A problem for another time. We need to go to that planet. Oas."

"It's a moon."

"It doesn't matter. We need to go there."

"Are you sure this isn't something Mother wanted us to do?" It was so difficult to be sure.

"I am never sure." Meetra shrugged. "But there are those who need our aid on the moon. And I would hate to disappoint them."

"There is something about...." Oerin's voice trailed off. "Someone strong in the Force is down there--more than one strong in the Force--and--something else--someone familiar--"

"Yes." His sister smiled with broken teeth. "You sense the Mandalorian? Thalia mentioned her, too. Our mother did leave her marks, even on the nulls."

A/N

These Mando’ade would not exist if not for Karen Traviss. Mandalorian songs are Traviss.
Aphorisms are mine with one exception. (Also Traviss). I finished this right before the release of “the Mandalorian,” and was unreasonably happy it did not contradict my headcanon.

There are, in fact, two types of deflector shields in Star Wars. Ray and Particle. It's canon. RIP Aemelie and Dessa and Catrinex and the Aleema.

Thanks, Ether as always, for your patience and your beta powers. Yes, I did mean lung. It just seems more Mydia than dung. Lol.

Little Doctor: thanks for your kind words about Oblivion--I do have another chapter on that about ½ done, I just shelved it until this is. So close now. Two chapters, I think.

Next up... the war is over!!!

This is the version with fewer typos.
Chapter 78 / Follow You Into the Dark

Xxx

General Revan: "It's over. I'm... happy to report that the last of the Machine Ships were destroyed today at a classified location. Our allied casualties were minimal. Five snubfighters and one Imperial corvette were lost, but we recovered several survivors."

General Sheris: "All Imperial veterans of this combat are to be offered full Republic pensions, and their kin casualty-rights. With our own forces defending Republic skies, the final work was left to them."

General Revan: "Not just to them."

General Sheris (blinks): "Certainly, if there are any Mando'ade who wish Republic assistance, we would be more than happy to provide it. Just, traditionally... they do not... but we will never forget their sacrifice."

General Revan (hoarsely): "Never."

--Excerpt from the Seventh Speech.

--compiled by Archivist Lanna T'so, University of Coruscant.

Xxx

Aemelie was generous in death. She gave Canderous ample opportunity to slake his vengeance in stars upon the drone fighters that remained. With what was left of Gundark, Cannock, Krayt, and Wraid squadrons, Canderous and his blooded warriors destroyed the enemy ships, including the crippled capital that had turned toward the Degriass moon.

"Kote!

Kandosii sa ka'rite, Vode an.

Malachor a'den mhi, Vode an!"

Canderous’s voice was hoarse from singing and his cheeks were wet as the last light on the final aruetii hulk died. They pulverized its bones with a few well-placed plasma torpedoes. It was fitting that the dust of their foes and the dust of their family mixed in stars. One day, eons ahead, that dust would form new life in a sun’s heart.

“Life pods went to the moon,” Jakata noted when they had finished.

“And the Medix shuttle as well,” Canderous agreed. The Ordo beacon pulsed fiercely from the surface of Oas, beckoning them to rest.

But many of their ships had been damaged, and so it took the span of two sleep-cycles to nurse the crippled sublights along. In a few cases, they had to jettison a broken vessel and transfer its rider to double up with another.

A scattering of Imperial and Republic survivors joined them and were taught the words of the Vode across their open channel.

They were just approaching the planet Degriass--the moon of Oas still on the far side--when a ship came out of a cloaking field so old that it flickered, making the vessel it had concealed shimmer like a rock underwater--or a ghost.

The ship was a Republic heavy capital: small for her class and heavily armored. The call-sign on his scanner registered the vessel as the New Hope, which made Canderous wonder if she were a ghost, for his ship's computer flagged the name as a capital destroyed at Malachor Five. Nor was she the first ghost-ship he had seen from that fateful day. Canderous remembered the Harbinger and Katarr all too well. And Oerin Lin, the arusuum'la son of Manda’lor who had nearly killed Milli.

His hand tightened on the controls, and for a sharp moment, Canderous considered attempting to perform the same maneuver that had brought his wife her glory. In that moment, his vision flickered and abruptly the ship was one of at least a dozen battered hulks, shifting in malevolent formation above the tiny moon, and then--

His eyes watered inside of his helm and the other ships vanished, leaving only the New Hope.

He tapped his oxygen meter to check the pressure.

"Did you see that, General?" Demain's voice was hushed with awe.

"Yeah." Not just him, then.

“A woman's voice blasted across their channel. “Our scans indicate several of your ships are too damaged for atmospheric re-entry.” The hangar bay of the New Hope slid open. “Perhaps we can be of assistance.” The speaker repeated her words in badly-accented Mandalorian. Then Standard again. Then badly-accented Sith.

The space surrounding them flickered again--until there could have been five ships. Or ten. Or fifty.

And then only one.

There is only one ship, Canderous thought. You're hallucinating, Ordo. Only one ship. That blasted New Hope. He had not forgotten Katarr, and the lessons his people had learned from the dar'jett of the Harbinger.

“Don’t need anything from you.” Canderous tapped his targeting reticule on. "Whoever you are--"

"I am the Deathbringer." Her voice was calm. Young, even. Assured. "Meetra Surik, the Deathbringer. Isn't that what you call me?"

"We don't bother with your name, dar'jett!" Milli's beacon rang from the moon, monitoring their conversation.

Canderous smiled with pride under his helm. "What my daughter says is true. We claim this system for Clan. And we have you outnumbered at least fifty to one--"

There was a familiar creaking sound as his instruments froze. The Hope's tractor beam had activated. One of his fellow fighters--still free--made a run at the enemy vessel. Meters from the impact it froze, too, caught like a fly in a kinrath web.

"Outnumbered, perhaps. But with broken ships. We mean you no harm," Surik continued. "Please."

Please. For some reason that made Canderous think of Revan, and then he laughed. Not for humor, but because he was still alive.

Xxx

The best kind of god is one that keeps coming back so you can kill him again.

--Mandalorian Aphorisms for Everyday Seasons

--compiled by Archivist Lanna T'so.

XXX

The Mandalorians emerged like survivors from some sea-storm back home, scrabbling out of dented and blasted ships like cuttle-crabs, their armor hissing and steaming when it made contact with the New Hope's oxygenated air.

Thalia May had already seen them in her dreams, but dreams did not convey the stink of ozone and blood or the sheer presence of this lot. There were Imperial pilots, too--and even two Republic flyers--but it was the Mandalorians she watched--and not just because they all had their guns out and pointed at her.

"You." The man wasn't the tallest or the broadest, but his presence conveyed that effect, his voice gravel-metal through the voder of his helm. "You." He gestured with his blaster in Thalia's direction. "I know you."

She had been trained since childhood never to take her eyes off an enemy, but nonetheless, Thalia looked instinctively to her right, to the web of shadows and Force-weaves.

"He means you." Oerin Lin's chuckle was in her mind more than spoken. Hidden in shadow, she could not see if his dead lips moved--or not. "Don't mind me, pretend I'm not here."

"M-master Ordo--yes." Thalia was too nervous to get the title right. Strange to be nervous now, when her dreams had seen nothing amiss with this vision. The chance that the Mandalorians would turn on them was slight. "We met briefly. On Korriban."

"Yeah. One of Jin's friends. The kids from the cave."

"As you say. I saw you in the Jedi Temple as well."

"That was the day you killed me with a kiss, sweet Thalia." It was the first time Lord Sion had spoken of it. Thalia had been foolish to think he could have forgotten.

"Why are you here, Jedi? With Surik?" The man gestured with his heavy gun carelessly, but Thalia noted the other Mandalorians' stances sharpen.

"Master Surik left me to greet you. She has returned to Oas--to the moon below. We're establishing a refuge there. Your daughter is already--"
"I know where my daughter is." He waved his gun again. "You're gonna prep us a shuttle now to make it down there. Rest of our crew's gonna go to the bridge."

"They want the ship." Oerin sounded amused. "Give it to them."

"Master Surik asked me to provide escort." Thalia opened her hands in a gesture of peace. "We are merely here to help, Master Ordo. We are travelers who mean you no harm."

"Travelers with lightsabers." His helm was full and battered and her reflection a dark blur. "You think I don't know that the New Hope was the vessel that launched Revan's Mass Shadow Generator? She should've died at Malachor Five. And we've met 'travelers' from there before… Sith just as bad as that force-spawned Emperor." His eyes narrowed. "What is this, really? One of Lin's games?"

"No! Of course not--"

"Try to lie effectively." The dead man's sigh was a wheeze in her head. "Not admitting you know me would help."

"I-I don't know any 'Lin,' but Master Surik will give you this vessel, as a gesture of goodwill. A-a gift!" Meetra would not be pleased, perhaps, but Thalia had dreamed of this possibility.

"Not your gift to offer." Lord Sion corrected. "But I will ask Meetra to give it up. She cares nothing for ships and my people have lost so many--"

"We don't need gifts of what we can take." Suspicion darkened the Mandalorian's tone. Around him, the others murmured, buzz of whispers lost in the open space of the hangar, echoing like ghosts. "Just how many ships do you have up here, anyway?"

"Just the one." The others had retreated--still cloaked--to the far edge of the system. Most were barely manned and some, Thalia thought, would not survive another hyperspace jump.

"There is only one ship." Lin's voice turned silken and seemed to echo louder than the Mandalorian horde--to become a dozen voices--fifty--as they repeated his words.

"Huh." Canderous Ordo didn’t look convinced. But he holstered his weapon. "One ship... for now. We’ll sweep for others. Jakara, check the engines for sabotage. Lex--you're on systems. Make sure they haven't done something to air, or temp control. Rest of you--scan this ship for more life signs. Jettise hide their numbers to make themselves look small." He continued barking commands and his soldiers fanned out--even the Imperials and the two Republic pilots following his commands.

"We mean you no harm--" Thalia began again.

"Pacifists. Right." A chuckle emitted from the helm. "Let's see that shuttle of yours, kid. Got a name?"

The shuttle felt empty with just the two of him. In her dreams there had been more--in her dreams, Canderous Ordo had brought companions to the barren moon. But dreams and vision did not always jibe perfectly.

"He left the others to take this ship and lay claim to stars." Sion's voice said in her ear. "He knows there are hidden ships. They will find them. And take them. Meetra won't mind."
Thalia did not glance at the pool of shadows in the corner of the cockpit. Canderous Ordo had taken over piloting himself, leaving her nothing to do but wait.

"Master Surik no longer requires a ship—or ships," she told them both. "The Republic ship Great Hunt returns for us. They're on their way now."

The Mandalorian made a grunt that could have been surprised. "Wideband's up?"

"Yes," Thalia told him. "The war is over."

"At Rekkiad? Or Malachor V?" Canderous Ordo's voice was metallic, almost bored, but Oerin's amused chuckle in her head told Thalia the dead man thought the question anything but disinterested.

"Reports say the details are still classified," she demurred. "But I think Rekkiad. There hasn't been time to travel as far as the Malachor System."

"Depends on how you go." But the Mandalorian leaned back in his chair as if the answer pleased him.

"Malachor is ours," Lord Sion told her, almost smugly. "It belongs to the children of Mand'alor. He would not have it sullied again."

XXX

My First Grandfather met his glorious end above the skies of an unnamed planet, in battle against a foe who flew a ship made of stone. First Grandfather had tracked that asteroid-ship across the galaxy. In his fading years, after First Grandmother's death, it became his obsession.

My Second Grandfather was far more temperate, although he also was a great war hero to the barbarian Republics. Second Grandfather knew when to attack and when to retreat, but my favorite memories are from the times he taught me to fly in ships even faster than drexl, on worlds as distant as Telos and T'Rith.

Second Grandfather met his end in his bed, next to his Jettise wife. In Republic lands, dying old and asleep is honorable, too.

I was nine when I learned Second Grandfather and I had no blood-ties. Nine when I learned that my father was not my father by the laws of the Independent Collective of Onderon... but my mother's people were not bound by those laws and so I did not care.

--Queen Faene Starshine of Onderon, Recollections of My Girlhood. 75RRA

--compiled by Archivist Lanna T'so.

Xxx

The New Hope's shuttle came down in a cluster of battered vessels. Grief and pride welled in Canderous's heart to see the Medix I unscathed and his daughter atop its roof, waving fiercely as his shuttle landed.

The air was thin and cold and in the space of ten heartbeats, Canderous was out of the hatch. He had just enough time to adjust his suit for the heavier gravity before Millifar hurtled into his arms.

"I saw," Canderous responded to her barrage of questions, whispering the words in her ear, his own bare cheek resting against her shaven scalp. "She was magnificent."

"No. You showed spirit." He let the wind take his tears.

"Leskal is here. And Urex. She made them… made most of the boys take the escape pods."

"She saved me some warriors." Although his heart thought it would be a long time before his people met for a true war again.

Behind Millifar, that hu'tuun Emperor was in the Zabrak. Eyes red and glowing.

"What the hell're you lookin' at!" The wind made his voice harsh. "Get out!"

The eyes flashed once and then faded. The boy's body collapsed in the sand. A few other sents hustled over to the body, lifting Zepth and taking him away, back into the Medix.

"Huh."

"Oh." Milli had followed his gaze. "He's always doing that, Father."

"Was that the Emperor in there? Or her?" He wondered if Revan would try to apologize for their loss. Blame herself and insult them both. He did not think he could bear to hear Aemelie's sacrifice demeaned.

You don't know what to say to her, old man, his thoughts whispered. Perhaps she doesn't know what to say to you, either.

"Zepth never speaks when his eyes glow." Millifar paused. "The Jettai Surik just offered us ships, Father. We could be rid of this place." Her eyes were red-rimmed. "I want to go home."

Home. To a moon she had never seen.

"I do as well." Canderous looked at the sky. "They told me the war is over. The Republics will be coming back."

"We are done fighting their battles!" his daughter said fiercely.

Canderous nodded. "We are." Jettise, he thought. That old word meant Jedi and Republic both when both had been their foes. He wondered what Revan would make of the Deathbringer.

Xxx

Moderator: "Senators, we're not sure how long this wideband connection will last, so please keep your questions short."

(Thunderous applause.)

High Admiral Rensha (snarls): "The Senate floor is now open to questions. Senators?"

Senator Pallas Rist of Alderaan (over commlink): "I'm sure we all speak with one voice when we congratulate your victory over the Sith Empire. Of course, that is the Sith Empire that Darth Revan created in the first place--"

General Revan (laughs): "You're giving me way too much credit, Senator."
Senator Pallas Rist of Alderaan: "Am I? I'd also like to formally file charges against you for murder, and demand an investigation into the Organa family's death upon Deralia."

General Revan (laughs): "I... could you just get me a private channel with... uh, with your secretary? Uh, Secretary Boon Organa? I'm sure we could clear up any misunderstanding."

Senator: "You will face justice in an Alderaanian court of law! And that does not even scrape the surface of your war crimes against the Republic--am I the only sentient on this floor not bought and paid for by Racharn?"

General Sheris: "I have already submitted an application for a full Republic pardon for Revan Starfire D'Reev--"

General Revan (mutters): "You would."

General Sheris: "Please try and take this seriously, Revan. Senators, as you can see from my attached petition, it is imperative that Revan and I be allowed freedom of movement if we are to continue to protect and serve the Republic."

Admiral Rensha: "No. I have requested you both remain in custody until we have at least established there is no further Imperial or Mandalorian threat--"

General Revan: "The Mandalorians were never a threat!"

Senator Feezkit of Kuat: "Coming from the woman who commanded their largest warship, that is less than reassuring."

General Revan: "The Aleema? I didn't--"

General Sheris: "Gentlebeings, please listen to reason. My fellow Jedi General and I are the only ones capable of assessing and neutralizing the Imperial threat. You need Jedi to fight this war--"

Senator Tyg, of Byss: "Hah! And where have we heard language like that before?"

General Revan: "Gee. Let me guess. The Mandalorian Wars?"

General Sheris: "Feema la'kirt!"

General Revan: "Iksay bah. Go-to ak'namla seem!"

--A Memorandum of Events from Senate Council Meeting XxIXxxxxxIv, popularly known as 'The Seventh Speech."

['Not a Transcript' is hydro-marked on the flimsi, casting some doubt on its accuracy. In addition, a handwritten note across the bottom says, "I'm always happy to translate Rakatan for you, Lydie, but they're just telling each other to be quiet in crude, but descriptive terms." --AL.]

[Note: Although several scholars have tried to use these phrases as a sort of 'Taug Stone' to translate the Rakatan language, the mix of the colloquial idiom has confounded them. Whoever this 'AL' was, he must have been a formidable scholar indeed!]

--compiled by Archivist Lanna T'so.

Xxx

"You were gone again."
Dar had taken to holding a bulb of hull-scouring fluid under Revan's nose to bring her back from a trance. It was as effective as the shock stick and a lot less painful.

"Yes--" Revan pushed her hand with the bulb away. "Canderous is alive. He made it to Oas."

"Good." But the frown between her counterpart's eyes said that was not her concern. "I feel it's less good how much you are with Tenebrae."

"I didn't see the Emperor. I don't know where he is." His presence had faded to a whisper when the last Machine Ship died. Perhaps the death of the Sleepers had weakened--or even killed him-- leaving Revan alone with everyone he possessed.

Was that victory? Victory felt brittle and hollow trapped in this room, on this ship when there were so many lives elsewhere in the galaxy free and alive--

Like the feeling of pie crust beneath Revan's borrowed fingers on Deralia--

--the joy of catching a fish, seeing the skies of a new world--Ystred--where she’d never been--

--cold wind on her face on Oas watching Canderous hug his daughter--

--catching a glimpse of Korrie from a window on Nar Shaddaa--

All of those moments felt more real than this stifling room and the woman who was her reflection staring back--usually with corrections about whatever Revan had said wrong last.

At least the headaches and nosebleeds had stopped with the death of the last Sleeper ship. But had they won? Not exactly comforting that Meetra Surik had surfaced. Dar seemed less worried about the woman Vima had called her true apprentice than Revan was. Be it on her head. From Zeph's borrowed body Revan hadn't seen Meetra Surik or her padawans do anything more insidious than roll their eyes with impatience.

"I'm not sure it's better that you're possessing his bodies instead of him." Dar raised an eyebrow.
"You need to eat something. In this body."

"I've more news of Korrie." Malak had filled in some details but Revan had so many unanswered questions. The Weequay could only get so close. She wanted to ask Mission to comm, but what if that spooked Lena Wee and the Twi'lek twins?

Korrie's face in the starboard windows. A profile, walking past. A glimpse and then gone.

"And?" Dar smiled. "Once this is finished we'll see him. You should have been more polite with those senators. We need our freedom."

Doesn't matter. They're never going to let us go. For all her wisdom, Dar refused to see how far they were from free. Cold comfort, that the Force would allow Revan to escape this cage so easily, when it would mean permanent exile and the life of a fugitive--and not just for her. Rensha had made that clear, too.

"Our son likes to be called Kore, now. The twins and Lena Wee have been staying on their ship,
The Blue Ghast. One of those luxury skycruisers, registered to a 'Go-To.'"

"Go-To? One of your twins has a sense of humor. Or both, I suppose."

That was funny. "If we're going by the theory the 'Go-To' is from the Rakatan, yes."
Dar raised an eyebrow. "What else could it be? How did you explain yourself to his guardians?"

Revan shook her head. "I haven't. I'm just watching. Korrie's even taller. As tall as us, I think."

"He'll grow more. Mal shot up between twelve and sixteen. I stopped growing at eleven--" A trace of a frown tugged at her lips. "Or--no. I was thirteen."

"You were tall for thirteen." Little slips. Sometimes Revan wondered if Dar noticed them. Discordant histories. If Revan hadn't experienced the feeling of being two people herself, she might never have noticed when Dar called herself a padawan or referred to events that had happened after the real Revan Starfire's death.

Once, Revan would have exploited Dar's weakness... but they were no longer at war. "Polla shot up six centimeters when she was seventeen. Surprised the hell out of everyone."

"Oh. Our mother was taller than we are," Dar shrugged, twisting her fingers in her lap. "Was Malak with our son?"

"He's not here, so I..." She had assumed so. "The Weequay doesn't have the Force. I couldn't see Malak from his body. Was... was our father tall, too?"

"Shorter than Mam." The personal endearment hung between them awkwardly. "And Radrik was kind. No matter what you've heard, he was always kind to me--"

"I haven't heard anything except he was Vrook's brother." Revan thought. "And... a Jedi, right?"

"He was always kind," Dar repeated, almost stubbornly.

"Oh." A whisper of memory tugged at Revan. "There was... there was a fire in the lab. Our mother was yelling--"

"You remember that?" Dar sounded startled.

Only the tone of voice and the brightness of the flames. "Just a little."

"I knocked over a burner. With my mind. They weren't expecting--"

"You made the flames spread." Revan could remember nothing but the expanse of them, dry crackling heat amongst all the cold. "They were... pretty."

"Yes." Dar fiddled with her cup of tea. Endless cups of tea. "Pretty. But it was fine. The maintenance droids took care of it. No one was injured."

"Oh. Good. We could find out what happened to our parents--when we get back--"

"There is nothing to find. Malachi erased all traces of my past on Hoth from the official records when I married his son." Dar sounded bored again. "Our parents are dead, Revan. Leave it alone."

"Fine."

The awkward silence yawned between them for an eon.

Revan slouched in Carth's battered jacket. She only wore it in their room. Everywhere else, she dressed in white robes, identical to Dar's. In the last day, there had been a lot of public appearances and broadcasts as the Hunt's team of relations demanded interviews and testimony. She wondered if Carth was getting the same treatment on the Arm. Revan had suggested going there, but then everyone got very quiet. Malak's ghost had whispered in her ear that it was unlikely they would allow Revan Starfire on the command deck of a Sith war cruiser.

Ever again.

On the other hand, they didn't seem willing to let Carth off of his command deck. And that--

That was a surmountable problem. Revan smiled and closed her eyes, ready to go to him—to step through hyperspace to the Voice on his ship—when--

"What do you think of Surik?" Dar's voice pulled Revan back. She sounded careful and precise, which meant that her counterpart was more rattled than she was willing to admit.

"Meeutra Surik is spearheading the rescue mission on Oas. Doing a good job. Zepth's Force-sensitive, I'd sense darkness, if…." Revan paused. "She hasn't tried to kill Zepth."

"Does she know what he is?"

"I don't know. I'm doing my best to keep my distance." Although lately, it was harder and harder to find Zepth among the multitudes, especially when she preferred to watch Korrie, or retreat back to Sydax's head and all of those pies.

Polla's son was walking, now. Revan hoped she had the chance to tell her.

Dar gave her a flat glance. "Carth's son and our cousin?"

"Still unconscious." And Dustil looked bad, but there was nothing Revan could do. "Surik's healers have looked at them. I worry the Emperor could use them again--"

"That's why we have to stop him now. You said it's two jumps to Nar Shaddaa from Rekkiad. Two jumps and we could end this."

Revan wished she'd never admitted it was only two jumps. Dar was like a kath with a fracking bone. "And then what?" They were already speaking in Rakatan but Revan lowered her voice anyway. "You want to go get your box from Lena--" the coincidence made her suspicious already "--find a possessed sent and put Tenebrae in it? Just like that?"

"Just like that."

"And the armed guard outside this room? My friends three decks down? Where are we going to find a ship for all of us?"

Dar sighed. "Vima's corvette is in the officer's hangar. I know the release codes."

Revan would bet anything Rensha had changed them. "You think Rensha will let us go?"

"She can't stop you." Dar paused. "We will need an ally to pilot the ship--"

"No. But she can stop my friends." Revan tried not to roll her eyes. Dar's naivete had to be deliberate. "Jasp isn't well. And Zaalbar feels responsible for his people. He won't leave them. How do you think we'd get a dozen Wookiees and Phylus Blais down fifty levels from a private lift--"

"You escaped from me on the Leviathan, Red." Malak's voice appeared a millisecond before he did, glimmering blue, still with that face that she didn't recognize: the gentle smile, the mane of hair past his shoulders. "You escaped without even the Force to guide you. Shackled with neural restraints. You rescued your friends then. Surely with our help--"

Dar glanced up. "See? Malak would help."

Revan felt a half-hysterical laugh bubble in her gut. “Oh? Would he?” Two Jedi who sacrificed planets rescuing my friends. What could go wrong?" "And then what? We'd be fugitives. If you want the damned Mind Prison so badly, my bounty hunter is on Nar Shaddaa now. I could possess his body, and obtain the box for you--"

"Without having harm come to Malachor?" Dar shook her head. “No, that plan is too risky.”

Revan bit back her impatience with some effort. "Wasn't planning on harming anyone. Mission says those twins are her, and Lena Wee is an innocent."

Dar'Revan picked up a nutrabar and unwrapped it slowly. "No one touched by the Rakatan computer is innocent."

“Whatever,” Revan snapped. “You’re the one who wants the box so badly. I’m just offering to help.”

Makak’s expression shifted as he glanced between them. His insubstantial hand brushed through Dar’s shoulder. "Perhaps she could try, Red. I can shield our son."

"No! It's not safe for her to get the box in that body. Tenebrae might know, Even now--he might still know that we’re plotting against him--” Dar sounded insane, babbling about the Sith Emperor. “I’ll go alone,” Dar continued, frowning. “Perhaps you could arrange a distraction, Fragment, and then I can make my escape.”

"But I don't sense Vitiate at all." Revan could walk across stars like a colossus, and see a thousand thoughts, a million tiny lives. The Sith Emperor was in none of them. "Maybe he died with the Sleepers."

"No." Dar's laughter was dark. "It can't be that easy."

"Well, what if it is? Then we don't need your Rakatan Mind Trap.."

"It can't be." Her counterpart was stubborn. "Do not return to the bounty hunter's body. Draw no attention to Malachor or the Twi'leks. I’ll go alone."

“Not alone, Red.” Malak’s hand brushed through Dar’s shoulder.

Dar smiled up at him.

“Get a room,” Revan snapped.

Dar'Revan and Makak didn’t answer her. Malak gazed down at Dar with an expression on his face that made Revan’s heart twist and her stomach churn.

Suddenly the room was stifling. "I'm going to check on Oas again. Have fun, you two." Revan closed her eyes and reached out again, across the stars--

"Wait! You fool!" she heard Dar say--but Revan was already gone.

XXX

Ellis Pho: “This is E-Pho with CoruNet, a Racharn Broadcasting Corporation, coming to you viewers live from the middle of nowhere! My pilot tells me this is the Degriass System, the moon of Oas, and we're about to interview some of the survivors of the Machine Wars! Although the Senate has been in touch with High Admiral Rensha and our Fleet, the coordinates to Degriass came from an unexpected source--the Jedi Exile Meetra Surik! She's invited us to join her on a mission of mercy. Guiding our tour we have two of her apprentices, Mira the Hunter, and her Wookiee--

Hanharr (growls).

Mira: "He's not my Wookiee. And we're not apprentices. Master Surik says we're padawans now. Jedi-in-training.

Hanharr (in Shyriiwook): "Why must we suffer the idiocy of fools?"

Mira (in Shyriiwook): "Because the master says so. I don't think you want to challenge her again."

Hanharr (in Shyriiwook, whines): "I cannot."

Ellis Pho (nervous laugh): "So hard to believe they're really talkin when they go on like that, ain't it? Funny creatures, Wookiees. This one's not the one who went on the Star Forge jaunt, is he? Don't remember that many scars--"

Hanharr (in Shyriiwook): "Imbecile."

--Old Republic Broadcast, Holonovella, “Kashyyyk Passions”

[Note: Although fictional, this transcript seems accurate with what is known of Hanharr the Wookiee and Mira the Hunter.]

--compiled by Archivist Lanna T'so.

Xxx

The port-side window revealed a flat white plain. Clusters of small ships were half-covered in stuff that had to be snow. There was a bonfire, half-ringed by Mandalorians. Mekel couldn't hear them through the thick layers of transparisteel, but it looked like the Mandalorians were singing.

He blinked hard and wondered if he were still dreaming. Or dead. This could be Mandie heaven. He glanced behind him, to the other cot, where Telos was still out like a comatose mark. Mekel had woke up a few moments ago to find tubes connecting them. He'd ripped the tubes out of their arms and then almost puked.

Dustil looked like he'd been through a war. Mekel felt like he'd just gotten back from one.

"Had one kriff of a nightmare," Mekel told the unconscious man. But Telos didn't even twitch. His skin was mottled and purplish. Shiny with kolto. Waxen, like a burn victim.

Memory was vague. Some kind of sick dream where they'd held skeins of power in their hands and burned ships from the sky. Couldn't be real. The Force was gone again. The galaxy was as flat and blank as it ever was--ever since that asshole Lin had taken Mekel's power away.

Mekel glanced outside again, trying to make sense of the scene at the bonfire. All of the Mandos had their armor on, but not one wore a helm. Most were bald--or nearly so. Milli had her hair shorn to the scalp. Someone else had died if she'd cut her hair again. Next to her and just as skin-domed was her father, Canderous Ordo. And, as Mekel watched, a group of fracking Jedi walked in front of his view, all in neat gray robes with lightsabers dangling at their belts.
Jedi? Maybe this wasn't Mandalorian heaven after all

One of the Jedi was a Wookiee, strolling next to a sassy red-headed piece. A HoloNet reporter trailed after the pair of them, remote cams bobbing. The reporter was a Zeltron who looked familiar, but Mekel couldn't remember the last time he'd watched CoruNet. The real thing was the Wookiee Jedi, even wearing a gray tabard like it was a robe--

Fracking unreal. Mekel rubbed his eyes. Definitely not Mandie heaven--

A small shuttle landed, blowing snow off the grounded fighters with its descent. The shuttle was stamped with the CoruNet logo. The sents crowding out with their floating remotes looked to be more reporters. They approached the Mandies with their broadcast antennae waving like a pack of corpse-worms.

Milli and a few others drew blasters--but then a dark-haired, brown-skinned Human Jedi in gray robes came between them. Held up her hand and said something.

She had a red star inked on her cheek.

Mekel didn't remember hearing there were Jedi in this war.

Whatever the Jedi said made the Mandies back down. Milli didn't shoot. Holocams flashed. Then the Mandalorians walked away, leaving just the Jedi to talk to the reporter.

The bonfire choked out black smoke, staining the sky. Wind blew gusts of snow off a few crashed escape pods. It looked cold out there.

"You're missing the show, fockda." Mekel looked back at Dustil. His old pal looked like one giant bruise. At least with the bond gone I don't have to feel it. That thought made his gut feel funny, with an emotion it would take Mekel another decade to recognize as guilt.

He sat back down and stared at Dustil, trying to make sense and coming up empty. They'd been so powerful, part of the Emperor and everything, but Mekel remembered he'd been scared, too. A blank spot in his brain circled like a vortex--the spot where he thought the Emperor's real face was supposed to be. But that had all been hallucination, right? Our ships were damaged. We both got hurt and Telos almost died, maybe--

Maybe it was all a dream. Or this is. This is the dream because Telos has to wake up--

Then the door slid open and the Emperor himself walked in, possessing Zepth with his eyes glowing red as blood. "Mekel. Good. You're awake."

"Master." Mekel ducked his head, trying to play it cool, like the sight of those red eyes didn't remind him of that fracking nightmare--and like another part of him wasn't so relieved to see His Luminance that he could've kissed him. "I'm glad to see you, my Lord."

There was a pause as the Zabrak froze, in which time Mekel realized his mistake.

"Master?" the Zabrak scoffed, eyebrows shooting up. "Really, Mekel? You call Tenebrae your 'master'?"

"He is the Emperor of the Sith." Mekel wasn't stupid. "Uh... hey, Cousin Revan. Good to see you… kind of see you. How's… how're things?"

"Hey, Mekel." Zepth's glowing eyes squinted. "You look like shit."
"Feel like it, too." He tried to laugh. "So… uh, where is Lord Valkorion?"

"Valkorion? You call him that?" She made Zepth's voice sound surprised.

"His Luminance asked me to. It's the name He has chosen for his next ascent--"

"The hell? His Luminance is not your master, Mekel. He's a body-stealing schutta who's killed billions."

Right. That's why he's the master. Didn't Revan get that? She did the same thing?

Cousin Revan had stopped in front of Telos's cot. "What happened to Dustil?"

"Dunno. Woke up and he was like that. Looks like he got burned. Maybe our ships got hit in the fight?"

"No. He's space-seared. From the vacuum. He wasn't wearing proper gear when Millifar pulled him out… knew that, but he's still not healing." Revan shook the Zabrak's head. "Dar will take a look when we get to you--looks bad if the kolto isn't making a dent. Are the burns why he's unconscious?"

Mekel shrugged. "Dunno. I woke up and he was like this."

"You can't tell why he won't wake up?"

"The Force bond broke, remember?"

"Hrmm…" She sounded like she didn't believe him. "At least you're awake. Third time I've checked on you. You were both out yesterday." She glanced toward the window lowering her voice slightly. "I'm trying to keep a low profile. Don't want to get Zepth locked up or shot if someone thinks I'm the Emperor."

Yesterday… how long had they been here? Mekel refused to panic. "Where are we?"

"Oas. It's a moon orbiting the Degriass planet. A lot of the survivors landed here, too. After the fighting."

"Oh. Hey, how's the war going?"

"It's done." Her voice was flat and disinterested. "For half a day, now. My real body is in the Rekkiad System--about to turn around and come back. I see Canderous is--" her words made the Zabrak's voice a whisper. "Must've made it here over the last cycle. Glad he's still alive. Glad to see so many made it off the Aleema. They evacuated everyone they could."

Mekel nodded. Evacuated? "Yeah, but somebody died. Milli shaved her head again."

His cousin turned and glared at him with her borrowed face. "A lot of people died, Mekel. Aleema was lost with all hands."

"Lost?" It didn't make sense. "How--"

"I felt them die. Little lights winking out. That's what it feels like." She walked to the window and looked out. "They took out more than half of the Sleeper fleet. You and Dustil… you were there when we took out a third more. Do you remember?"

"I remember we were linked to my--linked to the Emperor. And you were there." He swallowed.
"We could've finished the Sleepers off. The Aleema wasn't gone then."

"Don't you think I know that?" Her voice was too high-pitched to be in Zepth's throat. She made the words squeak in a way that should have been comical, but even without the Force Mekel could see how pissed off she was. "That power would have killed you--you and Dustil both."

"Oh." He didn't know what to say to that. It couldn't be true--His Luminance valued Mekel too much--but Revan didn't look like she wanted to argue, pacing back and forth on Zepth's muscular legs, and peering out that window from time to time, like she was hiding from all those Mandalorians and the Jedi that still lived.

"I don't know what to say to Canderous," she added, softer now. "Or his daughter. Rensha's established an official channel going through those Jedi so they'll know I'm coming... I just don't know what to say."

Zabrak's giant head blocked most of Mekel's view, so he looked at Telos again. The Aleema--gone. That ship had been too big to fracking die--and the closest thing to a place Mekel wanted to be since...

Since Korriban.

"I've been out of it." He tried to sound careless. "Did you send the Jedi down to help?"

"No." She shook the Zabrak's head, still staring at the window. "That lot was here when I checked in at sunrise yesterday. Recognize any of 'em?"

"No. But one's a Wookiee." Mekel had never heard of a Jedi Wookiee. "Maybe they're from another enclave. My dads said there were other Jedi in hiding, and everyone on Katarr scattered--"

"Maybe. But the nets say that one with the star on her cheek is Meetra Surik, the Jedi Exile. And... there's something off about all of this." She glanced at the window and then back to Mekel. "Something off with Tenebrae, too. Maybe he's weakened, but it feels like he's... hiding from me. You really haven't seen him?"

"Uh, no. Just you. I just woke up." The world felt flat and empty now. Hadn't been His Luminance using them. It had been her, Mekel thought, channeling all of their power. "You were there, too, Revan--before. When we wrecked those ships... we were a part of something."

"A part that Tenebrae was using." She made Zepth's handsome face look like it was sucking on a lemma. "You called him 'master' before. Mekel, you don't have to serve him. You're not his stars-kissed errand boy!"

"Frack you!" Later, Mekel would have time to think that maybe words had different meanings outside of the Underground, in places where not everyone was for sale. Maybe in some places 'errand boy' wasn't a fancy term for whore. But right then, his anger came fast as a mark renting by the minute. "I'm not anyone's errand boy, cousin." Came out mean, like words had the first time they'd met--when he thought she was just another prospie who'd starve to death because she was weak. "Not Valkorion's--and not yours."

"I know that." She didn't, though.

"Get the frack out." He felt like he was gonna be sick, facing down the former Dark Lord of the Sith. "Get out of Zepht and out of this ship. Get out!"

She made Zepth's body take a step back, toward the door that led to the ship's corridor. "Mekel. I promise, we're coming to help. Watch those Jedi--something's wrong--."

"You possessing my fracking friend is what's wrong! You were there with us. You were the one burning those ships and you liked it! I saw you! I felt it--"

Those glowing red eyes narrowed. "Careful, Mekel." Scarcely more than a whisper. "I mean it."

"Get out!" He pointed to the door.

She blinked. And then the glow around Zepth's face faded and the Zabrak collapsed on the floor.

Typical. Wasn't that just like her, dropping Zepth like an old pair of shoes when she didn't need him anymore? Same way she'd dropped the Aleema--

"Guess I showed her, Telos, huh?" Mekel tried to laugh.

Dustil, being unconscious, said nothing. Mekel dragged the Zabrak onto the cot he had vacated, an effort that left him sweaty and sick.

"Move over, fockda." He climbed on top of Telos, rolling the man onto his side to make room, and then wrapped his arms around him. It was a tight fit but they'd slept on worse.

But it took a long time for Mekel to fall asleep, even next to Dustil's solid warmth. And when he woke up again, things were even more complicated.

Xxx

Dalia Yuvik: “This is Dalia from the Alderaan LiveWire, courtesy of Rist Broadcasting here on special assignment. I’ve been quite fortunate to snag the first interview with a woman who needs no introduction to most of the free galaxy--especially in the last Standard year.

Joining me now on the Oas moon is Jedi Meetra Surik, the former Exile. Exiled no more, she has returned to give aid to these refugees from the Machine Wars, many of whom are her former enemies! Meetra, in the time we’ve been setting this up, we’ve seen both Mandalorian and Sith uniforms walk by our booth. Is it strange giving succor to old foes?"

Meetra Surik: “Broadcaster Yuvik. If we don’t help the less fortunate we are no better than they were when they burned our planets and killed innocent civilians.”

Dalia: “Well… yes, but still. I’m sure this can’t be easy for you.”

Meetra: “Honestly, it’s not easy. But it’s the right thing to do. There are so few remaining Jedi, and the ones I’ve found need to be guided along the right path.”

Dalia: "And you think you should do the guiding?"

Meetra: (Sincerely) "I am the only one who can."

--Interview with Meetra Surik, Alderaan LiveWire, 3966 BBY

--compiled by Archivist Lanna T’so.

Xxx

Millifar Ordo was Mekel’s next visitor, shaking him awake and looming over his head. She was pale-faced and red-eyed, smelling like smoke. There were scratches on her skull where the razor-edge she'd used to cut her hair had scraped flesh.

"Mekel!" She looked startled when he jumped off the cot and scrambled to his feet, backing up before he could hug her. "Mydia will be pleased that you're conscious. Sinae and I told her your vitals were stable, but she was worried--" she frowned, glancing at Dustil. "Mydia keeps saying you're both going to die, but she has been hysterical ever since the Jedi came. I didn't take her seriously."

"That's Mydia." Mekel blinked, trying to sort out the dream he'd been having from reality.

Dream had been better. Telos had been there. They'd been together, part of a warmth that felt as powerful as the sun.

Milli indicated Zepth, still passed out in Mekel's old bed. "Did the Zabrak wake up? We had him in the isolation room down the hall before. The door was locked."

"Just for a sec," Mekel lied. He sat up on the edge of the bed. "He… uh, guess he got lonely in there."

"Hrm…" she frowned. "Father says we should put him out of his misery now that we don't need the arusuum'la Emperor."

"It's just Zepth," Mekel lied again. "And he's unconscious. You can't shoot him."

"I do not see the honor in it. But my father is heart-bitter and wishes to be gone from this place. We are leaving soon."

"Good." He reached for her hand. "That's snow outside, right? Frack this place. I hate snow. Where are we going?"

"Dxun." She squeezed his hand back. "I wasn't sure you would come."

"Nothing keeping me on this rock." He tried to make a joke of it. "What's with the HoloNet crews?"

"They came right after the Jedi did. I think Deathbringer Surik summoned them." Milli rolled her eyes. "She's giving us ships for her blood price. Father wants to leave before the rest of the Republics get here."

"Uh, when is that?" Revan had said something about tomorrow. But Mekel had to play dumb.

"Soon," Milli repeated. "We will leave this Medix shuttle. We've already relocated the genebanks. Sinae doesn't think Dustil should be moved." She glanced at the unconscious Zabruk. "The arusum'la can be the Jettise's problem."

"Right." Later, he would realize how stupid he'd been. But in that moment, it didn't occur to Mekel that making a choice meant leaving Telos. "You said Mydia was worried. You weren't? Not even a little?"

His game was off because she didn't smile back. "I knew your vitals were stable." Her stubborn chin jerked in Telos's direction. "His vacillate wildly. Sinae can't explain it."

"You had us hooked up, sharing each other's blood."

"He has internal injuries. You're a perfect match. You disconnected the feed--" for the first time she seemed to noticed the tubes on the floor, the blood spatter on the sterile white floor. Her disgusted expression made Mekel notice it too.

"Sorry…" he offered.

"He is stable, now." Milli pulled a sani out of the wall cabinet and started cleaning up the mess.
"How long ago did you disconnect the line?"

"I don't know." She kept scrubbing. Suddenly, Mekel felt that funny feeling in his gut again. "Milli, I'm sorry. I... I heard about Aemelie."

"From who? You've been unconscious. You both almost died. I saved your lives. She saved us.
Everyone on the Aleema died to save us." She was on her knees, scrubbing at the floor. Even on Korriban, they'd had mouse-droids for that crap.

"Uh... Revan. She was just here... possessing Zepth ... she said they're coming."

“You lied to me? You said it was only the Zabrak!”

“For a second it was her.” His girlfriend had her hand on her blaster. “Don’t shoot Zepth. It's not his fault.”

“I would not. I am not my father.” Her face looked up at his. The shaved head made her nose too big and her jaw too strong, but she was still beautiful. "Revan and the Emperor, back and forth in that Zabrak's body. If it were honorable I would put him out of his misery!"

"But you can’t." Mekel had shivved more than one knocked-out sent in his time, but none that he’d liked. Zepth was a good guy and he was Lydie’s brother.

"I know." She drew a ragged breath. "The Jettise brought a wideband receiver. It summoned the reporters--and gave us news of the war. We won."

"Yeah. Revan told me." Didn't feel like victory, this empty flat feeling. "Uh, where did the Jettise come from?"

His girlfriend spat on the ground. "The Deathbringer said they were all in hiding before. On Malachor Five."

"Deathbringer? Who's that?"

Millifar gave him that look that said he was ignorant and then began to explain.

Xxx

Dalia: "You were just speaking about guiding the Jedi along the right path, Jedi Surik. Pardon my informality, but you don’t look any older than some of your students! I guess we’re all used to seeing Jedi Masters who are old and wizened... what makes you the leader of this group?"

Meetra: “Nothing, really. Except they asked me to be the leader. Most of my followers never had proper training. They were passed over by the Order, or relegated to the Service Corps, or tempted by the Sith. With the Purges, there aren’t very many Jedi left.”

Dalia: “We have all wondered where the Jedi went.”

Meetra: “Into hiding, or killed by the Emperor’s assassins, I’m afraid. Now my followers and I stand in the footprints of behemoths, merely trying to find our humble way.”
Dalia: “And General Revan Starfire? General Sheris Darkstar? Have you spoken to them?”

Meetra: “General Sheris was a dear friend of mine during the war. I am looking forward to our reunion.”

Dalia: “Some say you and Revan had a less amicable relationship.”

Meetra: “My master always told me that gossip is the work of idle minds, Dalia. If you’ll excuse me, we still have so much work to do....”

--Interview with Meetra Surik, Alderaan LiveWire, 3966 BBY

--compiled by Archivist Lanna T’so.

Xxx

It took a while before Mekel ran out of questions, mostly ones Millifar didn't have answers for. In that time he realized he hadn't wondered about Mydia Blais--even when Milli had mentioned her--except that he'd never thought she was dead. Somehow, even back then, he'd known that bint was too tough to die.

Turned out she hadn't been on the Aleema at all. And--

"We needed the tank space." Milli's voice was hoarse from all of the death hymns she'd been singing--all night she said. She brought him water, which made Mekel remember he was supposed to offer tea. When he did, she shook her head. "We needed the tank space so Sinae had to decant them early. The boy's fine, but some of the Jettise healers have been working on the girl--"

"The babies." Maybe Mekel had lost the thread of the conversation, somehow. "Dustil's babies are born?"

"That's what I just said." Her hand was cool on his forehead. "Are you fevered?"

Telos looked like a dead statue lying there on the cot. If it hadn't been for the monitors beeping green, Mekel might have thought he was already dead.

"I'm okay." Mekel tried to laugh, but it was more of a cough. "Can't wait to see them."

"You like children?" She sounded startled.

"Sure. Kids are okay." He tried to think of the last time he'd been around one. "Dustil and me hung out with Revan's kid, once. And that smuggler, she had that baby--I saw the baby at my moms's brothel--"

Millifar made a face.

"No! They were just hiding out there.. it wasn't like--"

"The smuggler is here, too. Polla Organa." She sighed like Mekel had disappointed her again. "Aemelie was very fond."

"Polla Organa's here?" That didn't make any sense. "But Revan's not--not either of the Revans--"

"They are coming." She reached for his hand. "I told you that already, Jin of Lin."

Maybe she had, but the way Milli told stories went too deep into space math for Mekel's taste. Her version had their attack vectors, the rates of drift for his and Dustil's ships, the physics of what had actually happened to the Aleema--

We coulda been on that ship. Later, maybe Mekel would feel sad for Dessa and Aemelie and everyone who had died. Now he just felt… drained. Like that power the Emperor had put into him had all leaked out.

"--that's why I don't want to wait," Millifar continued. "Sinae has all the necessary components. She extracted them from you during your last physical. When you were still healthy."

"I'm healthy now." Did she think he wasn't? Mekel grabbed her arm and kissed her, just to prove the point. It wasn't a passionate kiss--not at first--but something stirred inside of him and it became one, open-mouthed and hot--maybe even hotter for Telos being there--even unconscious.

"Is that a yes?" Milli asked, when they broke apart. "You'll be a father to her?"

Babies. She was talking about babies. Mekel knew that--knew what she was asking. Later, he'd try and laugh it off, pretend that he didn't understand--say she'd tricked him. But there was no deceit in Milli. Her heart shone in her eyes. She asked him and he knew.

"Or him," he said. "Maybe twins. Or triplets. What's the word for four?"

"It is safer just to have one inside my body." She took his hand, then, and brought it to the hard place on her beskar, the place where her belly would grow. "I want to have a girl first."

"Can Sinae do that?" Later--later, he'd tell himself it was a joke. In the now, Mekel kissed her cheek. She tasted like salt.

"Sinae will select the best embryo. Now that we have your consent to make them."

"Good."

Later, he'd deny it. But in this now, Mekel wanted the kid--the kid and Millifar of Ordo. In this now, the idea that saying yes was making a choice didn’t occur to him.

It would take over a decade for him to realize what he’d done--and in the ensuing years, losing Millifar and her daughter would become just two of Mekel’s many regrets.

Xxx

Dalia: “If Revan--or Sheris--are watching this broadcast now, do you have any words for them?”

Meetra: “I have been told that Revan has no memories of her past.”

Dalia: “That is the claim, but in light of her victory, I wonder. I suppose, knowing her as well as you once did, you will be able to tell.”

Meetra (shrugs modestly): “My words are for Sheris, for she was my friend, once. I look forward to seeing her again. We will have so much to discuss. And, I must admit, I am hoping… a mutual friend of ours suggested she might be up for a game of chess?”

--Interview with Meetra Surik, Alderaan LiveWire, 3966 BBY

--compiled by Archivist Lanna T’so.

Xxx
Mekel’s third visitor scared the crap out of him. By that time, another half-day had passed and Mekel had tottered outside on legs that felt too stiff--had stumbled into another Mandalorian mourning circle, been poked and prodded at--first by Sinae and then by an earnest blonde Jedi who'd be hot if she wasn't so cold. He'd even met the one Milli called 'the Deathbringer,' and she seemed pretty fracking normal for someone with a title like that. The Balmorran Star was tattooed on her cheek. Her name was Meeta Surik and she was the Jedi Exile the newsvids had been gushing about when the real Jedi had all been dying on Katarr.

Holocams followed Master Meeta Surik everywhere. She was a healer. Did a bunch of work on the injured, always looking serious and sweet for the cams.

But when she came alone to see him and Telos--her face turned cold, almost angry.

"There is nothing wrong with his body," she said, staring through Mekel as if he were invisible. "Except dark side corruption. When it permeates the flesh like this there is nothing we can do. The most notable example of this phenomenon is Malak D'Reev and his rotting jaw. I assume you've heard the tale…"

"Yeah. Darth Malak was my sponsor," Mekel was trying to be polite because she could probably kill him. "And Revan's my cousin. Master Vrook was my dads. He's dead now."

The Last Jedi's eyes were dark brown--warm color--but nothing warm in them. She made prickles run up Mekel's spine. "I know who you are, Mekel Jin."

I'm famous. The Last Jedi knows my name. The thought made his mouth twist up, even if it wasn't much of a laugh.

"Your friend's suffering is something I cannot mend," Surik continued. "I am sorry."

"Don't worry about it." Mekel wanted to put himself between her and Dustil. He didn't like her stance, didn't like the way she kept turning and looking at an empty corner of the room, either, lips moving as if she were talking to someone who wasn't there.

The famous Jedi Exile, Mekel thought, might be fracking nuts.

"Odd, in the Force… yes." She was still talking--to thin air. "I had my connection severed in the same manner. But it did return. Perhaps Mekel's will, too, given time."

"Some fracking asshole stole it from me. Killed my father."

"Misfortune comes to everyone from time to time. It makes us stronger, for having endured."

Meeta was staring at the corner again. That empty corner, staring like someone was there. "Your father's death was a mistake."

"The asshole who killed him was already dead."

"The asshole is Oerin Lin. My brother." She raised her eyebrows.

"Yeah… really see the family resemblance." Her skin was a few shades darker than caff. Lin had been pale as sand, even before he died.

Later, Mekel would realize he'd entirely missed her use of the present tense.

The Last Jedi raised her eyebrows. "We had different fathers. But our mother was--"

"Telos." She nodded. "And they called you Coru, didn't they? Lashowe Devry was Taris. Kel Algwin, Alderaan. And Thalia May was Ziost."

"Are you in my head?" A weapon wouldn't do any good, but he reached for one anyway--coming up empty. "Get the frack out of my head!"

"No." The Last Jedi blinked. "I have no need to read your thoughts. They are as simple and predictable as your urges. But I am truly sorry I cannot help your friend." Her lips pursed in thought. "The Force is strong in him. And entirely gone from you. Curious. I have seen something almost like this before...."

"Yeah?"

Her head turned to the corner again. "This is the shatterpoint, then? These two--barely into manhood--"

Barely? "Frack you! Revan's gonna help Dustil! My cousin! She's on her way--"

"Revan?" The choked laugh could have been incredulous. "She has no healing talents."

"The other one does. That Sheris bint! She's Revan too."

Surik's amused expression faded. "I had... heard she possessed Sheris's abilities." She glanced at the corner again. "My Seer thinks she might help us, as well."

"Right. With Dustil." It was then that Mekel started to get it--what his fracked-up head hadn't let him see before. "Except... I'm gonna be gone. I'm going with the Mandalorians. They're cutting out at dusk. Can't you do something for him before that? Make him wake up so I can say goodbye-..."

"You will leave your bondmate behind?" She sounded surprised. "Willingly?"

"Sure. He's pissed at me... doesn't want me around anymore... he's got a new family, now...." Mekel barely knew this schutta, but something in her eyes made him start babbling like she'd hit him with truth serum.

Later, he was never sure exactly what he'd said--what he'd confessed--only that it ended with her sitting on the empty cot next to Dustil’s with her hand on her chin and her dark eyes wide and watchful.

(Mekel and Milli had moved Zepth’s unconscious body back to the secured room and resealed the lock. If the Exile sensed Zepth--or cared--she never brought it up with Mekel.)

"The Force is the only thing keeping your lover alive," Meetra Surik said. "Your Bezal-bond has been unbalanced, but not broken. Dustil Onasi is still your bondmate. My Seer did not think you would leave him."

"Frack your Seer," Mekel told her.

"She told me you tried." From anyone else that might have been a joke, but the Jedi Exile was deadly serious. "Thalia May she says you cannot leave Dustil, Mekel Jin. You will go down together. Thalia has told me that the fate of the galaxy depends upon it."
And that was how Mekel found out that Thalia Fracking May was one of Surik’s padawans.

"We go down together all the time," he snarled back at her. "Frack you!"

Xxx

My master never wanted a eulogy and this is not one. Meetra Surik rebuilt the Jedi Order and helped restore peace to the galaxy, but she was no saint. She was sometimes petty and always manipulative. She was, in more ways than one, her mother's daughter--righteous and self-aggrandizing, filled with a zealot's fire for a singular truth. By her very nature, her gift in the Force inspired others to bend to her will--whether she willed them to or not.

Imagine, if you can, being a child that no one could ever deny, being the ringleader of every mischief, the director of every adventure. And then imagine that child grown with a woman's strength, subjected to the horrors of war… and then severed from every bond she had ever known.

Imagine her being pulled from afar by the puppet-strings of a true Sith Master. Imagine her being forged to hunt Force-sensitives, to twist her former bonds of affection to make echoes of her own emptiness.

Imagine a Jedi so numbed by broken bonds that she came to the dark from a place of indifference.

Indifference is a crueler knife than hunger. A more brutal instrument than pain. My master was the Lord of Apathy before her mother's death shattered her chains--and, once free, she had to learn like a child all over again.

How to feel. What her purpose was for.

What the Order would be.

It goes without saying she made mistakes.

Upon her return to civilization, my master was starving, though she knew it not. We followers were the meat between her teeth, the plia-bread in her hands. Our love sustained and fed her, and in return, she strengthened our own gifts, gave us a cause, and formed ties of affection between us all.

The kindest thing she could do for her disciples was to send us away, far across the stars to form enclaves of our own--to train others away from her influence--and in doing so find our own agency. But that took time, and in the first days of the New Jedi Order if my master erred on the side of the autocrat who could blame her? She knew nothing else.

None of us were blameless in that time. I have my own smuggler's cache of lies to atone for.

--Thalia May, to her padawan, Personal Journal

[Note: unlike her prophecies, this document is undated. Her padawan is also unnamed.]

--compiled by Archivist Lanna T'so.

Xxx

If there’d been any justice in the galaxy, the fourth visitor would have been Thalia May and Mekel could’ve told her what orifice she could shove her prophecies up… but instead, the fourth visitor was Mydia Blais, accompanied by a battered protocol droid carrying two bundles of joy.

One bundle was half the size of the other one.
For some reason, both bundles had green hair and started screaming the second they were carried into the room.

Later, when Mekel tried to remember what they'd looked like at that age, all he could see was that hair and those wide-open mouths. The wailing of them.

"This is Ganesh and Myleah," Mydia told Mekel, raising her voice over the screaming. She flopped down on his cot with an exaggerated sigh. "Do you think Dustil will live? He looks awful." She frowned, folding her arms. "I don't want him to die."

"He's not dying." He sat down beside her. The monitors around Telos were still green and steady.

Mekel was leaving soon. Because, seriously, frack this. Frack the Force. Frack Dustil. Frack fate. Dxun was a moon above Onderon and Mekel had always wanted to see the Iziz on Onderon, to see drexl. No Force? Fine. He could still be a Mandalorian. "Dustil's not dying. He's gonna be fine. I'm going to Dxun. You guys can be one happy fracking family without me."

Mydia Blais rolled her eyes. “Don’t be silly! We can't be a family! I’m going to be a Jedi. Master Surik says I would be a very powerful force for good if I apply myself to her teachings. We’re going to Coruscant after this. I think Inse is there.” She smiled dreamily. "I’m going to have her killed."

“Yeah? You’re doing a great job with the Jedi thing.”

“Thank you.” She beamed at him, missing the sarcasm by a parsec. “Have you seen the blue-eyed Seer yet? She won’t speak to me. Peasants from Ziost always have such a superstitious fear about our family--we didn’t really grow up bathing in their blood, you know. Maybe Mother did, but she was so old-fashioned. Personally, I think it would be disgusting--”

Mekel only knew one way to shut her up--and maybe piss off Telos if he ever heard about it, too. “Myd.” He tugged at the buckle of his pants. “Come here.” With his other hand, he switched the privacy settings on the empty cot on. A field shimmered into existence around them, blocking out unconscious Telos and his crying kids and the droid--not to mention Thalia May and fate--along with the rest of the kriffing moon.

At least... in theory.

XXX

You possess the gift of Force-sight, Padawan, which is different from foresight, being as it denies wisdom and experience, showing only the cruelest of futures--the ones carved by error and mischance.

Sometimes the path to good does not come from good. This is the hardest lesson you must learn. It was easier for me, being raised on blood sacrifice, but even I nearly faltered the day I spoke to Mekel Jin on the cold moon of Oas....

--Thalia May, to her padawan, Personal Journal

--compiled by Archivist Lanna T'so.

XXX

The fifth visitor was Thalia May.
She came in about an hour after Mydia left after not coming... because it turned out Mekel wasn't in the mood after all. He'd kept thinking of Telos and those kids on the other side of the privacy screen and that distraction, as Master Uther used to say about being a Sith and grading term papers, had killed all the joy.

Thalia May came alone and was so serious that Mekel couldn't even make that phrase into a dirty joke.

“My Master says you’re going to Onderon, Coru.” Thalia's eyes were even bluer than Mekel remembered, like lakes in her brown face.

“Your Master gives me the creeps,” he told her. "How the hell are you even here, Ziest?"

“I came with the others.” She shrugged. “Master Surik and her brother Oerin Lin.”

Mekel’s blood froze. “Oerin? That asshole is here? Now?”

“You haven’t seen him. Of course.” She smiled. “He hides—and even when he does appear, he rarely chooses his real form.” She laughed. She’d always had a beautiful laugh, even on Korriban when there was nothing beautiful to laugh about. "If I'm not mistaken, he's doing interviews as Meetra Surik right now while our master meditates in her quarters."

“Lin should be dead.” For what he had done to Mekel’s father and Kex and Milli. For what he had taken from Mekel before that. "Did you come here to tell me how to fracking kill him?"

"Oerin is dead.” Her head tilted. “I thought you understood.” She looked at Dustil. “The Force is the only thing binding Oerin to this plane. Not so different from Telos, by the looks of things.”

“Banthashit! You’re saying Dustil’s gonna turn into a walking corpse?”

Thalia blinked. “If I said you were the only one who could save him, would you do it?”

In the now, Mekel was too pissed to notice she hasn't answered the question. “There's no way I could. I saved him tons already. Wasn’t for me, you’d both have died on Korriban.”

“Yes.” Thalia nodded. “I thanked you on Korriban, too. Remember?”

“Yeah. Before I’d even done it.” But back then, Thally hadn’t seemed so sure of herself. Back then she’d been weak.

The woman standing before him wearing gray robes had new scars on her face and hands. Her soft blue eyes were the only soft thing about her. She wasn't weak now--he was.

“I don’t have to listen to you!” Mekel snapped. That quiet stillness of hers used to infuriate challengers back on Dresh’d. Keep 'em raging 'til the last second, when she’d finally strike. Seeing all possible futures was fracking handy in combat. After the second week, everyone wanted Good Old Reliable on their team.

“You have never listened to anyone.” Her voice raised, and if Mekel had a saber on him he'd have drawn it. "I could say that you and Millifar would be happy until the end of your days. That you would find the peace you seek on the Dxun moon--peace without the Force--peace like Ulic sought in vain. I could tell you the names of six children born to Millifar and Clan Ordo--and it would still leave you wanting. Or, in another fate, I could recount the Jedi hero you could be--the noble and principled man, at ease with peace and battle. I could tell you tales of your half-Zabrak son, Ollivair Korr, and his mother--tales of your loyalty to one woman, or one man, or one cause--but it would still never be enough for you…” Her voice had an edge now. "Would it, Coruscant?"

“Huh?” He could never tell when she was putting him on. Old Faithful, they used to call her--but sometimes, Thalia was wrong--or Thalia just flat-out lied. “Wait. Ollivair Korr? Zabrak? Like Lydie? You’re saying Lydie and me are gonna have a kid?”

Thalia sighed. “No.” She walked to Dustil’s cot and sat down, reaching for the unconscious man’s hand. It dwarfed her own. Mekel had a weird flash of memory--of the time he’d caught Thally in the sonic back on Dreshdae. Plan had been to kill her, split the prestige with Shaardan but she’d been so naked and then she’d looked at him and just shook her head.

“You won’t,” she’d said while he’d stared slack-jawed at her tits. And she’d been right. He’d cold-cocked Shaardan instead--was right after Selene died, thanks to Shaardan, (thanks to Mekel--who could have stopped it and hadn’t.. because he wanted Telos to need him and not Selene, who was gonna wash out anyway--)

“They will haunt you all of your days, those memories of Korriban.” Thalia looked up at him like she knew his thoughts, and patted the cot beside her. “You need to make peace with them in every future. So sit down, Mekel. Try.”

“Yeah, okay.” He did, while she peered at Dustil’s waxy hand like she was some kind of palm-scryer.

“You do love him,” she murmured, wrinkling her forehead and stroking the lines in Dustil’s hand with one of her delicate, breakable fingers. “You have always loved him, Mekel--as much as you are capable of loving anyone other than yourself.”

“I loved a lot of sents.” He leered at her. “Shame you’ll never know what you’ve missed out on.”

“Oh, I know.” Trace of a real smile there--something about it made him think that studied expression she was putting on before was fake. “I see futures in my dreams, Mekel. I’ve dreamed of you--of you and me.”

“Oh, yeah?” He leaned closer. “What were we like?”

“Damned.” Ziost raised an eyebrow. “Strung out on deathsticks and starving on a bombed-out planet. I’ve never been sure which planet. Perhaps one we destroyed.”

“Yeah, well…” Mekel looked down at Telos instead of meeting those blue pools she had for eyes. He tried to memorize the sharp curves of his bondmate's face: full lips, stubborn jaw, soft stubble on his cheeks and chin. “Never liked deathsticks, so that’s banthashit.”

Thalia May sighed. “What do you want, Coru?”

“Don’t you know?” He was trying to flirt, making his voice hoarse in the way that Telos had always dropped trou for, but the directness of her gaze blocked him--even when he wasn't looking at her. “Everything I can get, Zio. What else is there?”

"Is that why you're going to Dxun with the Mandalorians?"

"It's a start. It's something." Better than sitting here waiting for Telos to die.

Her voice softened. “You know… you won’t find the Force on Onderon. Or Dxun.”

“No shit. I'm not looking for the impossible--"
"Anything is possible with the Force."

Mekel looked up. Those blue eyes were staring directly into his. His heart clenched and seem to skip a beat. “Wait. You mean I can get it back? You’re serious?”

But suddenly all of his pipe-dreams about joining the Mandalorians and living without the Force seemed as appealing as living the rest of his days in the Underground.

Just as trapped. Just as dry and colorless.

“Dustil will help me get the Force back? How?”

“With trust. You need to trust, Mekel. Trust in Him, even when your heart warns you otherwise.”

“Are you nuts? Of course I trust Telos! He’s gonna be okay? He’s gonna wake up?”

“He will.” Her voice seemed sure of it. "But you need to trust Valkorion, Mekel--not Dustil. Dustil may not understand. Make him understand. Then trust His Luminance to guide you both." She paused and Mekel looked up at her. Those pools of eyes she had were liquid, now, and he thought she was about to cry. "The Emperor will save you both, Mekel Jin. He is the only one who can."

XXX

I spoke of lies before, but I never told you the cost.

The night before I spoke with Mekel, I dreamed of a future where the two Revans combined their strength and cleansed Dustil Onasi's body of the dark side taint.

With Valkorion's hold on Dustil and Mekel broken, their bond recovered.

They were happy.

Mekel regained the Force. They both became respected Jedi.

In that future, my friends were happy.

But in that future, Valkorion's rise was never checked, and his Empire returned in less than one lifetime. Dustil and Mekel's happiness brought fifty years of prosperity--but also--

A thousand years of war with the Sith, war that drenched the Core in blood--

--all for the fate of two men.

You must only lie for the greater good, my Padawan, but you will have to lie. Often.

--Thalia May, to her padawan, Personal Journal

--compiled by Archivist Lanna T’so.

Xxx

The last visitor came in the middle of the night, but Mekel was ready for him.

Now that he knew what to expect it was obvious that the wide smile on Zepth's face was Tenebrae's, not Revan's.

Valkorion, he reminded himself. His Luminance likes to be called Valkorion.

"Oh!" The Sith Emperor said, smiling. "I rather thought you'd be asleep."

"I was." Mekel untangled himself from Telos, who'd rolled over half-crushing him. Maybe it was good, that Telos was rolling over, even if he still didn't wake. "But you tripped the sensor alarm, my Lord."

He'd found it and set it just in case Mydia decided to come back for round two. Not that he didn't trust her… but he didn't trust her. Milli hadn't come back from the fire circle--which Mekel guessed meant she'd spent the night out there.

He hoped she had someone to keep her warm.

"Clever," the Sith Lord chuckled. "You're so clever."

"Yeah." Mekel shrugged. "Was expecting you, my Lord. Did you want to do another ceremony, now?"

"Oh, ho! Yes." The Emperor beamed. "But not here, my dear boy. No! Keep your shirt on! Not here, dear boy!"

"I'll follow you," Mekel vowed, snapping his shirt shut again. "Anywhere."

"Anywhere…" the Zabrak frowned. "I must say, I had expected I'd need to convince you. Forgive me, but a thousand years can make one a bit… mistrustful. You will truly follow me? Anywhere? Of your own free will?"

"Thalia May said that you'll get me the Force back. And save Dustil."

Later, there would be too much time to remember the order of those words, how eager he'd been, like a trained kath.

"Oh, ho! And who is Thalia May?"

"Thalia was trained on Zioist. She sees the future--"

"A Seer." The wide Zabrak mouth stretched open. "I lost so many at Zioist, you know. To the bombs. So many gone I hardly know the future myself! How fortuitous this Thalia survived! Thalia May… May… that seems almost familiar….

"We're friends from Korriban, my Lord. She was a student there."

"A rare gift indeed, friendship!" His Luminance lowered his voice theatrically. "Well, if Seer Thalia says you must follow, then follow you must! We'll need to bring Dustil, of course, if I am to heal him. And the first thing we'll need is a ship….

"I have an idea about that." Always scout your escape routes. Mekel had already spotted the best ship half-buried under a blanket of snow: disc-shaped, with the parts of its hull that peeked out as blue as Thalia's (or Lydie's) eyes.

Xxx

Wiskit Thy: "Exile, I'm hoping you can tell our viewers on Corulag more about the Sith Lords and how you beat them.”

Meetra: "There is much I can't say and, of course, the Fleet were a great help destroying their Machine Ships."

Wiskit: "Of course! But these Sith lurk in the shadows? They could be among us now? They could be anyone at all?"

Meetra: "Fortunately for the Republic, I have an acute sense of Sith corruption."

Wisket: "Uh, okay. Let's try a different approach. There are Mandalorians on Oas. Do you hate them?"

Meetra: "Why would I? I'd sooner hate the sun itself. Or a flower. Mandalorians are free sentients who just want to return to their lands. They are a peaceful people, who mean us no harm."

Wisket: "The Mandalorians are a peaceful people who mean us no harm."

--Holovid interview, Mantellian Inquirer, by Wisket Lee, BBY 3966.

[Note: An analysis of Meetra Surik’s interviews from her time on Oas indicate a variation in idiom and expression that could indicate a split personality—or an imposter. One of the more half-cocked theories put forth by my colleagues is that half of her interviews were performed by an impersonator, perhaps a master of illusions…]

--Holovid clip Excerpted from "An Historian's Introduction to the Machine Wars: Lecture by Kree Usam Racharn for the Revan: Fact or Fiction Symposium, SHWL," University of Coruscant Press. 3653 BBY

--compiled by Archivist Lanna T’so.

Xxx

Dustil woke up because someone was pounding on metal, right by his head. They'd been doing it for some time, because his dreams had been full of marching sents, and someone (probably Mekk) dropping rocks off cliffs as if for nonsence.

When he woke up he had no fricking idea where he was—at first.

The pounding continued, adding in some yelling. He stared at the wall, noting its familiar durasteel curve, the distinctive hexagonal grid in the plates as his brain connected the dots.

When it finished connecting, he flopped out of the bed like a newborn nerf, taking in the double bunk, the scattered crates, the random pieces of machinery and clothing strewn all over the room.

"What the... hell?"

He was in Dad and Revan's room. Aboard the Ebon Hawk. And, from the hum beneath his feet, they were in hyperspace.

The banging and the yelling went on from the other side of the wall. Dustil slammed his own arm into it. "Shut up!"

There was a pause like he'd scared whoever into silence. But then the banging began again. He thought he heard a few words, maybe cries for help.
"Stop it! I'm coming, okay?" But when he tried to walk, his legs buckled. He felt so weak. And funny, like parts of him had fallen asleep.

More banging.

"I'm coming!"

"Hey! Dustil." Mekel appeared in the doorway, out of breath like he'd run from the front of the ship. "You're awake?" His brows beetled together. "Sure you should be up? You look like hell."

"Frack you, too." Dustil flipped him off.

"I'm just worried." Mekel moved in with the instincts of a hunter-killer droid, managing to catch Dustil a few seconds before his knees buckled.

"This is my dad's room," Dustil objected. "You can tell me why we're here and who've you got locked up--but after you find us another bunk. We can't stay here."

"But it's the biggest room." Mekel frowned. "We're almost there anyway so it doesn't matter. Just relax." His mouth twitched and he shifted his hips with more grace than Mydia had ever shown, but Dustil wasn't amused. "Come on, Telos. Enjoy it. I'm really glad you're awake."

You're impossible. But Mekk couldn't hear him. "You're a pain in my ass, Jin."

Mekel snickered. "Seriously. I'm glad you're alright." He caught Dustil's arm and pulled him back down, half-sprawled on his own lap. The banging on the wall went on, and Dustil wondered if he was the only one hearing because Mekk didn't seem to notice.

"I feel like hell."

"Trust me when I say you shouldn't look in a mirror." Mekel rolled on his side and Dustil rolled to face him. "But ask… ask anything you want. His Luminance told me he could wake you up, but I thought he was just being an optimist."

"His Lum--" Oh, no. "Mekk, do you have the Sith Emperor locked in the bunk next door?"

"Of course not! He's flying the ship!" Mekel paused. "That's Polla Organa locked next door. Didn't know she was on Hawk til--well, we should've run checks before we stole this rig, but I didn't think--"

"What?" The Sith Emperor was flying the ship. Same Sith Emperor who'd been using them up like some kind of battery. Didn't Mekel remember that? "Mekk, why are we on the Hawk with the fracking Sith Emperor?"

"Because he can save you, Telos. He promised." Mekk's eyes glittered with sincerity. Something about his conviction made Dustil's hackles rise.

"Save me? From what?"

"You're dying, I think." His former bondmate swallowed. "Told you before not to look in a mirror. It's bad."

Mekk didn't look so hot himself. He was pale and sweaty, and the Force made Dustil too aware of how fast the man's heart was beating in his chest.

"What are you talking about? I feel fine--" Dustil's voice broke off when he waved his own hand in front of his face and caught a glimpse of it.

White-purple, ringing to gray. All of the veins visible and black. And the skin looked like it was flaking in places.

He looked at his other hand, rolled up the sleeves to see his arms. The same. His skin felt too hard in places and too mushy in others. Bile welled in his throat and he felt like he was going to be sick. "What the hell is wrong with me?"

"I don't know. Milli said she had to pull you out of your Stinger in vacuum. You got burned, but that doesn't explain why you're not healing. You've been packed in kolto--Jedi healers came, even--but you just--nothing worked." his voice faltered. Mekk's dark eyes were suddenly enormous and in Dustil's face, blinking back tears as if Dustil was one of his marks. "I didn't want to lose you. I didn't think you'd ever wake up again--"

"But I feel fine." He did. Mostly. A little wobbly. And parts of his body seemed numb in a way that might not be good. He couldn't feel his guts at all. But it didn't hurt. Nothing hurt. "Cut the banthashit, Mekk. I'm fine. Don't tell me you trust that asshole--"

The ship jerked, hyperspace engines ticking down.

"We're coming out of hyperspace." Mekel blinked and turned paler like he always did coming out of hyperspace, and then an actual fracking tear snaked its way down his cheek. Later, Dustil would wonder at that tear--what it meant. "We have to get you better, fockda."

"Where are we?"

"Dromund Kaas." Mekk wiped his face with his sleeve. "His Luminance has a plan--"

"Stop calling him that!" Dustil had had enough. He pushed past the other man and stumbled into the corridor. He felt fine… just… just parts of him were numb. The banging to the right of him seemed to increase and he punched the lock open. Door slid open and there was Polla Organa, knuckles bloody and skull shaved bald, yelling. She barrelled into him like a bull bantha, still screaming, her hands scraping his belt like she was looking for a weapon. It took Dustil a second to remember he was bigger and stronger than her, and in that second she almost knocked him over.

In the next, he nearly backhanded her into the wall, the Force welling up inside him with a heady power that felt like a spice rush. In the last second, he managed to check it, and she only staggered back a few steps, eyes wide and shocked. Something wrong with her eyes. They'd been a bright, fake green before. Now the color looked like it was melting into brown--like the dye that'd made them green was wearing off.

"Get off me," she hissed, those twisted eyes narrowing into slits of pure hate.

"No thanks for letting you out?" Dustil scoffed. "I'm not the one who locked you up in the fracking first place. They kidnapped me, too!"

"Not kidnapped," Mekel said from behind them. "Rescued. I told you already, Meez Organa, I didn't know you were in here--"

"--Yeah, yeah. Just wanted the ship. I got that." The Hawk jerked again and her eyes widened. "If you're down here, who the hell is flying?"

"The Sith Emperor," Dustil told her. "Mekk says. He says we're going to Dromund Kaas."
"Great." She let out a sigh. "The old homestead. What the hell happened to you, Dustil? You look like the walking dead."

"I don't know--"

"Vacuum burns--" Mekk said at the same time.

"Don't look like vacuum burns to me. And how are we at Kaas already? Hasn't even been a day--"

"His Luminance knows the hyperspace routes--the new ones that the Machine Ships made."

"Really." Polla's skeptical tone didn't match that spark of sudden interest in her eyes. "Does he know all of them--"

"Attention Unknown Vessel," a voice broke in, blasting through the comm speakers. "This is the Acting Port Authority of the planet Dromund Kaas, under the guardianship of the Republic Fleet. State your business and your command code. Unauthorized deliveries are not accepted at this time. This world is interdicted. State your business and--"

"Shit," Polla muttered. "You mean high-and-mighty Tenny-Bro didn't bother to grab a simple freighter auth before you started this jaunt?"

"I don't know--" Mekk began, but Polla was already heading for the bridge, with Dustil right on her heels.

Xxx

Panning shot, establishing location.

Great Hunt in the sky above. Snow on the ground on a flat plain.

An assembly of robed Jedi watches a shuttle descend. The Ssyrian pan flute plays a march, increasing tempo until the shuttle doors open.

(music stops.)

Trandoshan Admiral Aridoma Rensha emerges from the shuttle, weak sunlight glinting from the medals on her chest. She is followed by two white-clad Human women.

From a distance, the only distinguishing feature the Revans possess is that one has a golden arm.

The Jedi Exile steps forward from the lines of robed Jedi. (Casting note: Meetra Surik needs to project an aura of emotional distance, mixed with vulnerability. NOT SEXY. Please don't send me Seriina Starr in another holomask!)

Meetra: "Welcome to Oas."

Admiral Rensha: "Knight Surik."

Sheris: "Meetra."

Meetra: "Thank you for saving the galaxy from the Sith machines. We Jedi have done our humble best to give succor to the injured--if you have more injured upon your ship, our healers can--"

Sheris: "I'm a healer, Meetra." (Giggles) "Have you forgotten?"
Meetra: "Of course you are. My friend Sheris. It's been too long. Truly."

Revan (interrupting): "Why the hell are you here?"

Meetra: "My padawans and I came to help--"

Revan: "Why?"

Sheris (hums): "Decorum, Revan!"

Revan: "Where's Canderous? I know he's alive. And the other Mandalorians? They were here yesterday--"

Meetra: "What Mandalorians remained after you used them to fight your war left at dawn. We gave them salvage ships and bid them farewell."

Rensha: "You gave them ships?"

Meetra: "Transport ships." (Pause.) "I have a message. For Revan."

Revan: "From Canderous?"

Meetra: "No. From another, who admires you both. The message is this. The Mandalorians are free. That was the bargain. It was broken once. Do not break it again."

Sheris: "Ah."

Revan (whispered, furious): "What?"

Sheris: "Later--"

Revan: "What bargain?"

Sheris: "Whikii heemtesh. Ayren Len, na dhesti?"

Revan: "Khaleen! Ni'istak! Agrusulk leem...."

(Note: since no translator has even been able to make sense of the language used, the actors should feel free to improvise during this sequence, adjusting for length with the percussion section, until the electro-harp begins.

"Should Old Acquaintance Be Forgot," Starfire 2! The Mandalorian Cycle! written by Senator See'raa Wen, 3940 BBY.

--compiled by Archivist Lanna T'so, University of Coruscant.

Xxx

"Unknown vessel," the broadcast began again. "Respond now or we will be forced to take hostile action."

After a quick, muttered exchange with the Emperor, which seemed to involve the smuggler bargaining with the immortal chivhole, Polla Organa just flat-out grabbed the comm from Zepth's hand. "This is Captain Desidirata Tran. Running Freighter Blue Ghost with relief supplies from Hakis Six. Got... vitamins from the charity op 'Blue Milk of Human Kindness.' You guys got a landing pad for me in Kaas City?"
She was good, Dustil noted, a little numbly because he'd just noticed his own reflection in the Hawk's mirrored cockpit door.

Mekk was right. He did look dead.

_But I feel fine._ Dustil had to keep telling himself that or he'd panic. When was the last time he'd eaten, or taken a piss? He couldn't feel anything in his core--like parts of his body had just switched off. And when he pressed his hand to his chest--

His heart was slow. Too slow.

The Emperor sat in Zepth's body in the co-pilot's chair, chuckling softly to himself. "We need to land near the Dark Temple," he told Polla Organa. "Even if they've rebuilt the landing pads in the spaceport, why waste half a day's journey?"

"When did the Republic come back to this system?" Polla waved the Sith asshole off. "I was just here like a week ago!"

"Only a few days. Their claim on my planet is tenuous. They have only the one capital ship--and I believe we have more loyalists incoming…"

The comm beeped. "Request denied. We have reason to believe that the Blue Ghost is a smuggling ship."

"Of course she's a smuggling ship--! Who else would be insane enough to come into a warzone?" Polla made a face and leaned over the deck, unceremoniously shoving Mekk's new best friend the Emperor out of the way, and grabbing the yoke.

"We can run their gauntlet," she added, nodding at the gunner chair. "Probably. If one of you kidnapping schuttas wants to handle defense."

Mekk looked suspicious. "Still don't get why you're helping us."

"Do I have another choice? Hell if I'm going to die for you." She angled the yoke down hard.

"You'd better be right about saving Dustil's damn life."

"I feel fine--"

"You're not," Polla Organa snapped. "I've seen mummified remains smuggled out of dig sites in better shape than you."

"Blue Ghost! Any further incursion into the atmosphere of this planet will be taken as a hostile measure. We are launching fighters now--"

"Frack." Polla pointed at Mekel. "Aren't you supposed to be some kind of gunner? Get to it!"

"I'm a better shot than he is--" Dustil spoke before he thought. For a weird second, it was like arguing with Dustil's dad.

"Maybe. You're dying." Her expression was almost feral. "You'd better be dying. We'd better not be here just because Tenny-Bro got homesick!"

"Oh, ho," the Emperor murmured. "I will leave you all to your tasks. Do get us down in one piece. There is so much to prepare for the ceremony--I have most elements in place but assembling the sacrifices--" Zepth's head hit the command deck with a think, horns scraping a lever that made them pitch wildly.

"@@@@@@-S2-1-$&&@&," Dustil said in Ancient Sith and then shoved the unconscious Zabrak out of the way. It was the gyros. He knew this one. His dad had shown him exactly what to do.

"Blue Ghost-- we will have no choice but to shoot--"

"They're not shooting, though," Mekk said. He'd stumbled to the turret chair, strapped himself in. "Why are they stalling?"

"They're not sure what to do with us," Polla answered. "I'd bet anything--"

"This is General Jiya Sand." A new voice, now. "I know exactly which ship this is. Tell me--immediately--who is on board and what your business is on Kaas. I'm launching three full squadrons to escort you to ground, and you're going to follow them. Are we clear?"

"--they recognize this ship," Polla finished smugly. She reached for the comm-switch.

"Oh, frack," Mekel whispered.

"Shhh." She waved him off and flipped it back on.

"We understand. Perfectly." Polla's voice shifted, developed a crisp edge. "This is Revan Onasi Starfire.... we can dispense with the rest of my surnames… this is Revan. I have returned. I have returned bringing three extremely dangerous and powerful Sith Lords with me that I have captured. I intend to lock them up in the Dark Temple… and... if you try and interfere they might escape, so… keep your distance!"

Mekel shouldn't be making that face because Dustil was gonna laugh and the comm was still open.

"Are we clear?" Polla growled into the mic.

There was a pause.

"Still giving you an escort," the general said. "If this is one of your tricks, Revan--"

"Don't be a fool." Polla rolled her eyes. "Proceeding to the Dark Temple. Recommend you don't try and stop me. Did you hear what I did to those ships above Rekkiad? I'll do it again."

Mekk was shaking his head. He didn't think this was gonna work.

On the floor, the Emperor of the Sith let out a snore and rolled over on his belly. It didn't occur to Dustil until later that the smart thing would've been to Force-fry the asshole and surrender to General Sand.

General Sand coughed. "Usually, you call me Jiya. I suppose you don't remember. I'm watching footage now from Degriass, General Revan. If you're here now... why are there two of you landing on Oas?"

"Holomask." Polla didn't blink, but her hands were white-knuckled on the yoke. "One of em's an imposter in a holomask. Just some grunt I paid off. Maybe arrest her. I don't care, okay?" She gunned the accelerator, dropping them a few thousand meters in a few seconds, causing Mekk, who'd already looked green, to gag and nearly lose his lunch.
For a null she was good at this, Dustil realized. Good at pretending to be Revan. Good at piloting. Their ship swerved past a loose squad of snubs, flipping between their blockade like it was nothing.

No one fired on them.

Mekk started retching. Dustil laughed.

"I'm watching you," the general warned.

"Good. Here." Polla back-jetted neatly, diving through the cross-winds like she was slicing through water, and setting the Hawk down flat on a landing pad. The Dark Temple loomed in front of them. Someone had blasted the front doors open since the last time Dustil had seen it.

Their escort lit up the sensors on every side of them. Snubs came down, ringing them in a circle, guns all aimed to the center. Dustil had seen this scenario on fighter sims. If they tried to take off they'd be blasted from all directions.

"Thanks for the escort, Jiya," the Deralian drawled. "Now tell your men to back off."

"We can't do that, General Revan," one of them said. "Sorry."

Polla made a disgusted face and switched the comm off. "We're here," she snapped. "Maybe one of you should lock up the Sith Emperor while I figure out how to get us out of this. Zaalbar told me before there's a tunnel to the lower level--if we run into the Temple, we might be able to make it out to the jungle--"

"Thought we were here to save me," Dustil said.

"You don't really look like Revan, Polla," Mekel said. "No offense, but you're not gonna fool them walking out of here."

"You want me to save your friend or not, Mekel Jin?" She made an exasperated noise.

"We're good from here," Mekel shrugged. "You can go."

"I feel fine," Dustil added. Better than fine, now. The energy coming off that Temple was really something.

"Fine. In that case… Tenny-Bro and I had a bargain." Polla was rummaging through drawers in the cabinet wall now, pulling out a half-dismantled blaster that Dustil was pretty sure didn't work. "I drop you off here, he gives me the ship with all the nav points programmed in. All the Sleeper hyper routes in the galaxy." Her voice sounded tired. "I got you here. Take your damn passed-out Sith Lord and get off my fracking ship."

"It's my father's ship, and if you try and lift off now, you'll get blown out of the sky."

"Maybe. But you're father's not here. He's getting court-martialed on Kuat… or, Coruscant or something. Last we heard anyway. Canderous thought it was just the Republic saving face. They're not gonna do anything to Carth. He's too popular. Same goes for her, I bet. The real Revan."

"My father's not with Revan?" He left me? He left both of us? So typical that Dustil wanted to laugh.

"Guess you were too unconscious to watch the news. Carth didn't have a choice. Brought as much of the Sith Fleet as he could to surrender. But a bunch mutinied--jumped off to frack knows where. Here, probably. Bet that's why General Sand is so suspicious…" She toed the Emperor's unconscious body, frowning. "This Sand guy doesn't know if Revan's with the Republic or not. I can use that. Now, get your Sith Lord off my sh--"

The Zabrak groaned, eyes fluttering, sparking red. He sat up. "There," he chuckled softly. "Preparations are complete. Some of the guardians in Kaas City were suspicious before I removed their will."

"Try that with me," Polla planted the gun in his face. "You'll be sorry."

"Nonsense! I like the galaxy better with you in it. So much more fun with all of your vague threats." Vitiate batted the blaster away, almost playfully.

Polla shoved it back. "Whatever this crazy stunt is, you'd better save Carth's kid, or I'll get the real Revan back here and have her deal with you."

"Oh, ho." The madman chuckled as he stood up. "I quite believe you would." He smiled, like a serpent unraveling its coils. Like something ancient. His voice deepened, thickened, until it seemed to resonate within the Force. Echo in Dustil's head. "You would, wouldn't you? Fetch her for me? To save these two?"

It was really something, Dustil thought, the way evil assholes laughed exactly like holovillains in the vids.

"I-I…" something sparked in those half-dyed eyes, the irises twisting between green and brown. Polla's entire body shuddered. "I--will."

"Yes. My will." The Emperor lifted his arm and crooked his finger. "My will is that you do this one thing. Such a little thing, smuggler. Bring Revan to me. Then you may have your ship and go."

Polla Organa knelt, face growing wooden and cold. "Yes." Her jaw was clenched. Her lip was bleeding.

"Good." The Zabrak's head to Dustil. "Shall we begin?"

Dustil felt the Force rising like a fire inside of him, dark whispers echoing. His vision blurred until all he could see was the Deralian's face. And in that moment, his eyes weren't his own--he was looking out through the Zabrak's--through Mekk's, through a thousand others and somewhere--somewhere across the Force he felt a strand tug like a web.

He felt Her turn, Her power molten in their hands and She turned and She reached and She saw--She saw--

--his own body, glowing, Mekk glowing next to him. And Polla kneeling, head bent, face blank and empty like she was already gone, like she was nothing, too--

No. No! What have you done, Vitiate?

Revan's dismay was so comical that Dustil heard himself laugh.

"Dust?" A hand grabbed at his chest, a weight there, Mekel--trying to pull him--face right there--sour breath and stubble. Wide eyes. Frightened. "Are you okay?"

Even now, Mekk didn't get it.
"You're an idiot." Their foreheads touched and the Force expanded around them, amplified by the pulse of the Temple nearby. You led us right into a trap, fockda.

"Thalia--she said--"

"She's Sith, asshole! Just like Vitiate. You keep trusting fracking Sith! What the hell is wrong with you?"

Dustil was laughing because it didn't matter. The darkness surged between them and it didn't matter. Mekel was there, he wasn't alone and everything he felt--this passion was power --was theirs.

"You were dying." The bond flared between them as the world went white. Dustil couldn't tell if they were standing up or not. Somewhere, he thought he heard chanting and smelled incense. Heard flames crackling--and screams. Time spanned both centuries and seconds. Sparks flickered and went out. "I didn't want you to die. I just wanted the Force again."

"Which one is it Mekk? Me alive or the fracking Force?" But Dustil already knew. It was never one thing with Mekk. It never could be.

Elsewhere, She was running down a hall, shoving open a door, interrupting an impossible scene. Her own body. Revan's own face--

"Something's wrong, Dar! she said. "*Something's wrong! We have to go--""

Elsewhere, he saw the Ebon Hawk take off like a shot slung from hell, wobbling in the cross-winds like her pilot had the jitters, streaking past the burned-out wreckage of at least two squads of snubs. The damage around the Temple radiated out in a perfect circle, extending from the eldritch fire that flickered through their body--

Which body? Where's my fracking body?

Dustil glanced back.

His body and Mekk's floated, frozen like statues. Both of their mouths were open in screams, eyes closed, hands crossed over their chests. Dark energy licked out from their skin, leeching color away. Mekk was as gray as he was, now.

The Emperor was humming something under his breath. He turned Zepth’s body toward the blasted Temple doors.

--and in the ruins of Kaas CIty a procession of red-robed supplicants began their journey to the Temple--

--thought we'd killed all of them, guess he found more--

My dear boy, there are always more.

--dust. Mekk's voice. Just a whisper as their thoughts interwove, shrinking until there was almost nothing left. i did want to to save you i love--

yeah.

Dustil knew everything. They both did. They were everywhere, a conduit of power funneling directly into-- Come, the Emperor whispered, but not to them. Come now, Starfire. Save them.

His face. His true face. Deathless and infinite, beaming down upon them from on high.

Xxx

Judge Advocate Qwill: "In your own words, again, General Sand, what happened at the Dark Temple on Dromund Kaas?"

General Jiya Sand: "I was cloaked in orbit aboard the Grim Redoubt when a Corellian disc-freighter attempted to run our blockade. You've already heard my deposition."

Judge Advocate Qwill: "Why did you not immediately proceed to the Dark Temple when someone claiming to be Revan Starfire informed you she was escorting powerful Sith to that location?"

General Jiya Sand: "Because I was trying to figure out what the hells was going on! I pinged Rensha and Cein--even checked with Onasi. My shuttle was ten minutes behind those snubs, but by the time we landed--"

Judge Advocate Qwill: "The Dark Temple was sealed. Seems suspicious. Satellite images clearly show the main doorway had been smashed open."

General Jiya Sand: "When I got there with my shock troops it was closed. Sealed. I don't know what to tell you. All our men were dead and the entire structure was glowing. There was a... a strange hum. Some of my men complained they heard voices... saw things. I thought I saw...." (Inaudible.) "It doesn't matter. There was nothing we could do. And then the prox alarms sounded that the Imperial capitals were coming out of orbit--"

Judge Advocate Qwill: "We'll deal with those capital ships in a moment. Let's retrench. What did you think you saw, General Sand?"

General Jiya Sand: "It doesn't matter."

Judge Advocate Qwill: "Again, this is part of Carth Onasi's trial, not yours. This is a confidential transcript. Force illusion is well-documented. Your competence is not questioned."

Judge Advocate Qwill: "Did they say anything?"

General Jiya Sand: "Bastila Shan told me not to stop her."

Judge Advocate Qwill: "Not to... stop... her? That was all?"

General Jiya Sand: "I knew what she meant. She meant Revan. Don't ask me how I knew. Revan wasn't even there yet. But I just knew."

Judge Advocate Qwill: "And that's when you ordered the retreat? When you surrendered the system back to the Sith? When a corrupted Jedi ghost told you to do it?"

General Jiya Sand: "Yes, but--"

Judge Advocate Qwill: "I think we're done here."
General Jiya Sand: "Don't ask me how I knew. I don't know how I knew. The Jedi ghost wasn't corrupted. She was bright and shining with light. She told me to let Revan come because Revan could save us all."

--Fleet Judge Advocate Inquiry into the Actions of Carth Onasi at the End of the Machine Wars, as a Precursor to His Court-Martial

--compiled by Archivist Lanna T'so, University of Coruscant.

Xxx

Whatever fracked-up thing the Emperor had done to Polla's head wore off just as the Hawk made the leap back into the Degriass System. Consciousness returned like a sledgehammer, to yet another patrol ship demanding her business. Polla heard herself whimper and forced it into a laugh. Her lip was swollen where she'd bitten it, trying to use the pain to keep those sickly fingers out of her mind.

"I'm here to see Revan," she snapped at the Republic scouts trailing her. "Either let me land or shoot me down. I don't give a damn."

That worked because they didn't bug her again. The massive bulk of the Great Hunt let her pass to the surface.

In the half-day she'd been gone, Oas had changed. The bonfire where Millifar and Freya had run the razor-knife over Polla's scalp and scalded her throat with their firewhiskey was naught but a blacked circle. Three lone shuttles were parked where the Mandalorian ships had been.

A red-headed figure cloaked in a banthahide jacket was a waving speck as she descended.

For a black second, Polla considered the turret gun--wondering if wiping Revan Starfire off the damned moon might work. Probably not. And she already felt sick, like she could still hear the explosions as all of those Republic ships had burst into flames around them, with a twist of Tenny-Bro's Zabrak hand.

I just stood and watched. He made me kneel to him and watch--

The Hawk's thrusters banked as she landed, landing gear slipping a little as exhaust slicked the snow beneath into ice. A creaking noise alerted Polla that someone was trying to drag the hatch open. Using the Force to break a perfectly good hinge.

Her bitten lip twinged. "Hold your hessi," she told the outer speakers and let down the landing ramp.

Revan appeared in the doorway of the cockpit three seconds later. The fracking Force.

"Your face." The other woman's eyes went wide.

"It's nothing." Polla had already admired the bitten lip and the bruise she didn't remember getting on her cheek. "What'd you do to your hair?"

"Cut the topknot off."

"Obviously." Polla drew a breath. Her knuckles were scabbed over from where she'd beaten them on the door and throat was raw from yelling. "Me too. Millifar Ordo did it for me. Mourning. Because my friends in the Aleema died."
"I know." Revan had shaved off the brown, but not the red. It made her look just like Bossypants.

"Did you do it? Did you kill them?"

"Destroy the Aleema?" The woman shook her head. "No. But I could have… stopped it. I had the power to destroy the entire Fleet myself, but I--"

"You had a good reason not to?"

"Yes." The woman's face was frozen. "The same reason I'm coming with you now. Dustil and Mekel. What did that asshole do to you?"

"Told me to come get you." Force compulsion was funny, Polla thought. Because she was pretty sure she'd have come anyway. But how could she know?

Maybe I'd have run. Navboard full of routes I could sell or just seize monopolies--

A hundred trade routes across the galaxy, suddenly obsolete.

"I don't want you to go back to Kaas." Revan paced to the nav-board, peering down at it. "Get off the ship."

"No." Polla didn't think it was Force compulsion. Just logic. "Someone needs to fly it, Revan."

Revan glanced up toward the sky. "Zaalbar will. Or Mission. They're on the Hunt. You don't have to do this--"

"She's right." The other one was slower, maybe because she'd thought to bring supplies with her. She had a pack of something strapped to her back, and two crates levitating behind her. "This is our battle, Polla Organa, not yours."

"Wrong. It's mine." The real Revan, the one Polla had gotten out of carbonite, practically growled the words. "My battle. My problem. You both can jet off now. Tenebrae wants me on that planet, I'm not going to hand him more hostages."

"You don't have that luxury," Bossypants said. "You can't keep us safe from him. You can't keep anyone we love safe from him."

"That's why I want to watch you kill him." Polla was still strapped in her seat. She put an end to their conversation by shifting the yoke straight up, sending the ship spinning off the planet and back up into the black. The Revans' protests fizzled out like dying embers on a bonfire as they both slammed against the bulkhead when the gees kicked into overdrive.

They didn't argue again. They knew she was right. Someone did have to fly the fracking ship.

Da, Polla thought as they shot by the Great Hunt. She didn't know if he was still alive. She turned to ask Revan, but the woman was turning green and running for the fresher, even before Polla punched them back into hyperspace.

Xxx

Judge Advocate Qwill: "High Admiral Rensha, by your own admission, the Ebon Hawk returned to Degriass and landed on the Oas moon, for a period of approximately five minutes before departing again. In that time, you did nothing."

High Admiral Aridoma Rensha: "There wasn't time."
Judge Advocate Qwill: "You had the sky above the moon blockaded. Yet you allowed the Mandalorians to leave. And the Hawk to leave and return--then leave again."

High Admiral Aridoma Rensha: "I cannot explain this." (Pause.) "I felt that the Mandalorians should be free. I cannot explain why."

Judge Advocate Qwill: "And Revan?"

(Silence)

Judge Advocate Qwill: "And Revan?"

High Admiral Aridoma Rensha: "I am submitting my resignation and my request for honorable retirement. I believe my will was compromised. And then the possessed Toydarian Lieutenant C'Tannis laughed and told me not to stop the Hawk--"

--Fleet Judge Advocate Inquiry into the Actions of Carth Onasi at the End of the Machine Wars, as a Precursor to His Court-Martial

--compiled by Archivist Lanna T'so, University of Coruscant.

Xxx

When Revan didn't come back from the fresher, Polla went to check. The woman was sprawled against the wall, glowing. Her eyes were staring at nothing.

"She is with him."

Polla did not jump out of her skin because, at this point, she was used to Force-users sneaking up on her. "Him?" Like Polla didn't already know.

"In one of Tenebrae's other bodies. They've grown closer."

"That's sweet." Polla willed her voice to sound normal. "Doesn't she have enough husbands already?"

"Amusing, but this isn't the time. You need to understand what it is she must do--and what we must do to help her." Bossypants grabbed Polla's arm and tugged her away, leading her down the hall to one of the smaller bunks. At least it wasn't the one Polla had just been locked in before.

The explaining took most of their sweet, single hyperspace jump. Polla didn't like one second of it. "You're just going to let her sacrifice herself? Become part of that monster? To save two kids you don't even like?"

The Jedi's eyes shifted away from hers and she looked uncomfortable. "Mekel Jin is my cousin. It is unfair to say I don't like him; I don't know him."

"Did you even try to know him?" Not that Polla could recall.

Bossypants's gaze shifted to the floor. "I thought we'd have more time."

"Everyone always thinks that." Da, Polla thought. She didn't even know if he was alive or if he was dead. "It's never true."

"After Kaas…" Bossypants's voice crisped again. Polla had a pretty good sense of her by that point. Bossypants sounded the most like a Coruscanti muckity-muck who didn't wipe her own piss was when she was trying not to show any emotion—which meant the opposite. "After Kaas, I need you to take me to Nar Shaddaa. There is an obelisk there that can stop the Emperor--"

"I remember the box. We tore apart this ship looking for it." Right before freezing the other one in carbonite. Another one of Bossypants's stellar ideas. "Let me guess. We find the box and it'll free Revan from that tomb-thing?"

"That is possible." Again, classic Bossypants. That calm noncommittal tone meant, 'no, you moron.' "The device will stop Tenebrae. That is the objective."

"How?"

"The Rakatan mind prison will entrap his mind."

"And his bodies? They'll just go back to being regular people."

"Yes." The yes came too quick. That was another tell.

"You're not sure of that. You only know it's a prison. 'The Rakatan Mind Prison.' You only know it traps people."

"I know it was used to trap a Rakatan prince who rebelled against the established order, approximately twenty-five thousand years ago." After that mouthful, Bossypants took a breath. "The account of T'chrrrrnak'tahk'leânjśwrrrrnak'tahk'leânjsēw. I discovered said that he was a cruel, immortal tyrant who enslaved billions."

"Uh-huh. But isn't that, like, every Sith?"

"The Rakatan Empire predates the Sith. And no. Not at all. Some Sith Lords had policies that were almost… reasonable."

"Uh-huh."

"Immortality is extremely rare. Vitiate relies upon an endless stream of vessels to maintain his essence."

"Fine. But even if all of Tenny-Bro's bodies are connected, how do you know capturing one will take all of him?"

"Because he is one." Bossypants glanced toward the cockpit fresher. Maybe she sensed Revan stirring. "One essence. He cannot be divided."

"Once Revan joins with him neither can she?"

The Jedi exhaled. "It is possible they will be trapped in the mind-prison together."

"Is it also possible that every other sent he's possessed might stick to him and not their bodies? Like some kind of… Force-magnet?" The Grass Priests had a story about something like that. About following false prophets to hell and getting stuck there.

Green eyes blinked. The pointed chin that was almost like Polla's jerked in a nod. "I… have hypothesized that could be one of the possibilities."

"I see. So…" Polla held up a finger. "It's possible that your box might just trap one of him." She held up a second finger. "It's possible that it might trap Revan and him for all eternity." She held up a third finger. "And it's possible that your mind prison might trap everyone he's ever possessed."
You said there's billions. If their souls are in the box their bodies--"

"--would die. Yes." This time Bossypants wouldn't meet her eyes. "But it wouldn't be everyone he'd ever possessed. The ones who were already dead would still be dead."

"They'd all be dead," Polla pointed out. "So what's the difference?"

"I only meant his possession only extends to the physical plane. Ghosts, for example, are freed from his influence."

"So after the billions die, they might not be trapped in the box, they'd just be dead. Dead ghosts."

"This is all hypothetical."

"So is your space-damned box!" Polla had only meant to attempt to come up with a better plan than 'give the asshole Emperor exactly what he wants.' Now Bossypants was just giving her a headache. "If this mind prison is the one thing that can stop Tenny-Bro, how come he hasn't found it? Does he know about it?"

The Jedi looked uncomfortable. "I think he… he tried to find it."

"Or, maybe he knows what you don't. Maybe he knows it won't work."

"It must. I have to stop him."

"No, Bossypants." Polla shook her head. "Seems more to me like she does."

Xxx

Dear Jin of Lin,

I trust this missive finds you well. I waited for you until the last transport off Oas, at which time one of the Jettise informed me that the Ebon Hawk had departed and that you had been seen transporting an unconscious Dustil Onasi up its loading ramp shortly before its departure.

It has been clear to me for some time that your affection for him supersedes your affection for me.

But I thought we had an agreement. I thought we were Clan.

I am on my way to Dxun. The matter we discussed was taken care of before your abandonment--I ran to Sinae immediately after leaving you and she prepared the materials. It took most of the night or I would have returned to you.

Now, as the most promising embryo splits and spins on her dish I am faced with a choice.

Should I add your genetic material to our clan, or should I cast her into the bio shredder?

It is sentimental and foolish of me, but I have already given her a name. Faene. Faene was a planet that Aemelie always wanted to sack. I wanted to bear this child for her as much as for us.

But I can always find her another father, Jin of Lin. That is the Way.

I am sending this correspondence to your mother's place of business, as you neglected to leave me a comm-link number, or a forwarding address.

[Scrawled across the top in a different hand: Goyle, hunny u can't show this 2 mekelkins they just want credits. Hire agent 2 do DNA check. Use Minta she's on retainer.]

[Note: This datapad was found in a Coruscanti midden, along with an undated holostill of a dark-eyed blonde infant who some historians believe is Queen Faene Starshine of Dxun. If true, it sheds a very interesting light on Queen Faene’s parentage. Scholars have noted a six-year gap between the end of the Machine Wars and the time of Queen Faene’s birth, but Mandalorian science perfected embryo storage centuries before the Redeemed Age of Revan. --Tazikex Vizla, Manda’lor, BBY 1921.]

--compiled by Archivist Lanna T’so.

Xxx

In some ways, Revan thought, it was already done. She was already with the immortal Emperor. The power from the Temple on Kaas gave everything an unreal quality; even the connection to Dustil and Mekel that ran through Tenebrae, amplified and expanded every time she stretched her virtual hand. The faceted beams of more lives than she could count were reflected in the stars. They contained her. She was multitudes.

So many lives suspended in the Force and all of them so, so beautiful--

Yes, her enemy murmured. Our union is nearly complete. Merely one final step. Shed your mortal carapace and join me.

First promise, she thundered into the void. Let them go.

Free them yourself, dear one. The dark voice burned in her skull, through her bones. Dimly, she felt her flesh body twitch as power licked through her synapses. They lie on my altars in the Dark Temple's High Chamber. Free them, then come to your tomb below. Or… his nonchalance was amused. Or, leave them and enjoy your immortal shell. With prudence, those two might last us both another thirty years. It could have been longer, had you not been so profligate with their essence, but I can hardly blame you for that. You used them to destroy our enemies!

I'm coming. There was no other choice. Dar kept babbling about her Rakatan Mind Prison, but if Mekel and Dustil were linked when Valkorion went into the box--

They could be trapped, too.

Acceptable risk, a cold part of her brain murmured, while the rest of it told the cold part to frack off.

I'm coming, she promised Valkorion. They'd better be unharmed or I will use our power to crack Kaas in half.

I do enjoy your threats. The mental equivalent of a shrug. I have other planets. Other installations. Do you think it mattered to my essence when the mainframe on Nathema failed? I was already in the stars, my dear. As you soon will be. Once you leave your shell behind, it is gone forever. Nothing but dust.

I'm coming, she repeated. For you.

Best say your goodbyes. Another chuckle. Of course, they don't have to be goodbyes. You can visit your loved ones as often as you like. I did. I watched children being born and grow. From time to time, I watched you--

You can go straight to hell!

Shall I show you how it can be? This is no time to be squeamish, Revan, not when I've watched you stroll through my collection of Blinds these last few days like a child lifting candy-samples at market. Did you think I wouldn't notice your stolen pleasures? Catching a fish? Baking a pie? Watching a child toddle across a floor....

I was only in them to keep them from you!

A lie, the cold voice inside whispered.

Tenebrae thundered in her head. Go to him. Go where you've wanted to be all along. There is no shame, Starfire. Not between us--

An ineffable wave enveloped her, shrinking the universe to a pin-point. It picked her up and rocked her and then shoved her--

And then Revan was--

--watching her husband sleep in a black and red room.

She gasped a breath and felt it fill unfamiliar lungs. Something moved when her head shook. Heavy weight of hair on the back of her neck. The murmur of sublights whispered they were drydocked. The decor told her Carth was still on the Captive Arm. The lack of guards indicated he hadn't been arrested. She wondered if that would last.

A faint buzz in her ears was irritating. Revan frowned and shook her head again. The Force collar around the body's neck cracked off, clattering across the floor.

Carth sat up at the noise, one hand already pulling out a blaster from the sheets.

"Don't panic, Flyboy." The body's voice was deeper than Revan expected. She'd been in this body before--on the bridge of the Arm--but its baritone startled her, still and deep in the silence of the room. "It's just me."

He gestured with the gun. "Tell me something to be sure."

"Carth. It's about Dustil."

"Oh." He drew his knees to his bare chest. He'd shaved again. It brought out the new hollows in his cheeks. "You're not... Yuthura told me that disruptor would hold."

"Were you trying to keep me out?" She wasn't sure any Force restraint would ever work on her again.

Flash of dark humor in his smile. "I was trying to keep Lord Nondik from murdering me in my sleep."

She stood up to walk to him--only to find her legs shackled as well as her hands. Revan blinked and the chains opened. Her body walked free. No mass of blubber like that last one. This was a man in the prime of health, strong in the Force. His mind seethed as she sank into it, fueling her own
"No closer! You've got my attention." Carth still had the gun. Revan was proud of him for that. "What… what about Dustil? Is he okay?"

"Dustil's going to be fine."

"But he's not fine now." It wasn't a question. "Where?"

"Dromund Kaas. I'm here, too." Almost.

His face shuttered up tight. "H-he went back to the Sith?"

"I don't… I don't think so. Not like you mean." If Revan let her concentration slip she could be there. She could know precisely what had transpired. At that moment, Dustil and Mekel were as much a part of her as the Emperor. As this body. Their minds would be just as open--

--she shied away from that.

"The Emperor doesn't want them, Carth. He took them as bait. He wants me."

Her husband shook his head. "You can't go. We stopped the Sleepers. We stopped him from making more bodies! Without you, he'll fade away and die. You said that's how this works! Yuthura said that's how this works!"

"Not fast enough. And now he has them. H-he took them--" right from under my nose. Should have noticed, but I was too busy walking in the lives of a hundred other sents, too busy on Nar Shaddaa, watching for a glimpse of my son--too greedy, too drunk with this power, this sweet power, even now--

Even now it called to her.

And she heard the Emperor's laughter echo in her head.

Now you see. Quickly! Say you will save his sons and then come to him again. In another body, if this one does not please you--

"You're going to have to kill this body, Carth."

Would you both prefer a female--

"What?" His voice cracked.

"Tenebrae can use it to get close to you. He'll use you like he did before. Anyone I care about."

I will not! I merely want to give you what you asked for, Starfire. Your husband. His child. More children, if that is your wish--I will locate a female. I must have a few close to his location--

Revan bit down so hard on the Sith's tongue she tasted blood. Shut. Up!

Carth's face was pale, but as she watched, that warm mouth twisted in a wry smile. "That bastard already has everything I love, Freckles. Let him do his worst. There's nothing more he can take."

"When I'm in him I can fight him. I think. Maybe I can stop him from… doing worse. Maybe I can You can. You can use our power for your greater good all that you like! It makes no difference to me. I spent generations helping my people. Freeing commoners from the Sith aristocrats. An amusing time it was, too! Although... his amusement bubbled in her head. In a few centuries, you will learn there is no difference between help and harm.

"Help?" Carth shook his head. "You can't ask me to choose between you and Dustil."

"I'm not. I wouldn't." It's not your choice to make. It's mine. Either I leave your son to be drained by Tenebrae or I join him as an equal. I walk the stars.

Poor creature. So unlike your original. You hunger for what she took for granted, value what she discarded. Those little lives, ones you never lived--

And then I will see all the lives that were always denied me--

Yes. Yes! Give me a conscience! A fair trade. I will give you life, Revan. Any one that you choose. Even let you sleep in ignorance, grow as a child--

A part of her wanted it--

I never had a life. I have memories of someone I am not, a family that was never mine--

He lies, the cold voice inside whispered. Vitiate always lies.

"Revan." Carth's voice drew her back from the stars. "Are you... you still there?"

She nodded the Sith's head. "He's calling to me. He's promising me... things."

"Things like getting Dustil out safe." Her husband nodded as if that was the only thing she could possibly mean.

"It's not all... it's not all bad." The deep voice of her vessel mocked her, made her words weaker.

"The tomb." Carth's jaw worked. "I saw what was in there. After all this, you're telling me he's won. That's going to happen to you... that thing in the tomb is gonna be you."

"Yes." Something swung from Revan's chin when she moved her head to stare at Carth's face. Her hand reached out and touched tendrils of flesh, hanging down like a beard.

Her husband laughed raggedly. "And you want me to shoot you goodbye."

She felt the strange mouth twist, even as the Sith in this body seethed. "You could kiss me first."

Carth choked. "No. No. " He got up, one hand still holding the gun. The other reached for her hand and led Revan back to her chair like she was a kid being tucked into bed.

"I didn't mean it. About the kiss." She let him lead her. The body was taller than Carth. The hand larger than his. His hand felt fragile in hers.

"Force collar." Carth dropped her hand and picked it up from the floor. "If I put this on Nondik are you gonna disappear on me?"

"No." For some, it might. But she was sunk too deep into the man's mind for it to matter, too strong in the Force now to be affected.

You make us both stronger, my Starfire--

The collar clicked around the Sith's neck. Her husband's hand reached out and touched her cheek. "

"Restraints too, Carth. When I leave, he will try and kill you."

"Restraints didn't stop you," he pointed out.

"Lord Nondik isn't me. He's much weaker. But he does want you dead."

The man's hatred invigorated her.

Yes. Delicious.

Carth clicked the chains around her ankles and then her wrists, fitting her hands back into the binders. "You... you can hear his thoughts."

She nodded. "I'm trying not to listen. Mostly, he just wants you dead. He's... imaginative."

"Yeah."

"Yeah." He straightened, staring at her. Hard planes of his body, the fur of his chest. Carth smiled again, that sharp smile she'd noticed first on Taris. Designed to charm. Once, she'd thought it was unconscious, but now she knew better. It was his public smile--the one he used to charm the pants off smugglers and wrangle command positions for his soldiers. That smile tightened as she watched, something underneath it brittle enough to crack.

One of his hands reached out and tugged at her chin-flesh. "Wattles."

She shook her head from side to side, felt the Sith's chin flaps flutter. "Doesn't quite have the same ring as Freckles."

"No."

"No." The smile faded. "Shame I'm not still possessed by the Emperor. Then I wouldn't have to tell you what I think. You could read my mind."

His eyes gave her a clue. They were less professional than that smile. Revan felt her breath whistle through the man's pierced teeth. "I can find another body, Carth. I can come back--"

"For what?" His jaw twitched. "You'd still be someone else. Someone who didn't want to be here."

"Right." Of course he was right. "But I can still--this doesn't have to be good-bye--we can still... talk. Like this."

"I'm sorry."

"I'm sorry."

"I'm sorry." He turned away, muscles of his back working, walking away from her. "Send Dustil back to me, Revan. Please. No matter what... give me that. But don't... I want to believe in you. I want to believe you're out there... somewhere... doing good." His voice faltered. "But if we fight Sith again, I don't want to know that they're you."

"They won't be." She felt the tug of the son's thoughts, even now, as if he knew where she was. His rage screamed across the void. "I'll get Dustil back. I promise."

"You'd better."

"You'd better."

"You'd better."

He walked back to the bed. "The investigation into my court-martial starts tomorrow. Gotta get my beauty sleep."

"They're going through with that?"
"A formality." His voice roughed, blurred as he turned away from her, pulled the covers back over his skin. "Can't promote me til they absolve me. Guess you see now why I can't be having affairs with Sith Lords. Would send the wrong message. Hell, the things they're already saying about Yuthura--"

"What about you and Yuthura?"

Her husband shook his head. He had something in his hand and she heard plasti crackle as he popped a seal. "Nothing, Wattles. It's nothing. Gossip for the vids. There's no one else for me… tried that already… after Morgana--none of it worked til I found you."

"I'm sorry we… I'm sorry we never had a chance."

Carth rubbed his chin, running his hand down his neck, resting it above his heart. "I'm not. You and me… we saved the galaxy. At least… at least twice. Save… Dustil… least twice." He rolled over and she spotted the derm he'd planted on his skin.

"Go… going back… sleep," he slurred. Her husband's eyes fluttered closed, his mouth gently opened. His breath hitched, became even and slow.

"Good-night, Carth. Sleep well."

He didn't answer her again.

Xxx

"Look, it's one hell of an honor--an honor I don't deserve, being promoted to Admiral. But I get it, you don't have anyone else who'll take the job."

(Crowd cheers.)

"What's that? Oh! Did you find someone else? Go ahead. Promote away. I bet there are some instructors from the Academy, or you could exhume Saul Karath…."(Crowd boos.)

"Just don't ask me how he died, folks. I don't want to spoil the vids. Or incriminate anyone… including me…. hey, did you hear I'm a grandpa? That's right. I come back to Coruscant and the first thing that happens is this woman calls me up and tells me someone dumped two kids off at her brothel. Then she says they're my son's kids. Said their mother packed it and ran off with some fly-by-night hotshot, gives me some story about how she thought they were her grandkids, but… turns out? They're mine."

(Beat.) "Put that in your hyperdrive and smoke it, huh? I run down to the Underground, pick them up, and… hell if she's not right. She's got the gene scans and everything."

"No, I'm serious. I'm a grandpa!" (Cheers.)

"Ganesh and Myleah. They're the best thing that's ever happened to me since… since Dustil…."

(Crowd goes silent. Then begins cheering.)

"But you're not here to hear about my son. Or my grandkids. Or even how I'm the handsomest admiral in the Republic Navy. Sorry, Denis. But you know it's true." (Cheers.)

Sents sacrifice themselves all the time in wartime, but one big send-off and suddenly, everyone wants a piece...."

(Breath.) "Sorry. Sorry. Right. This is supposed to be funny. You know, getting up before a crowd was never my thing. You want charm, you should've seen Malak." (Beat.) "Before my wife blew his ass off the Star Forge, that is. There's nothing charming about space dust."

(Cheers.) "Are we done yet? Rew, you said five minutes. Feel like I've been up here long enough to find at least one Star Map...."

(More cheers.)

--Recording of a Naval Speech given by Admiral Carth Onasi at the after-party of his promotion.

[Note: For centuries this was assumed to be a political satire. An analysis of voiceprints taken from other recordings of Carth Onasi indicates it may be genuine.]

--compiled by Archivist Lanna T'so.

Xxx

Polla brought the Hawk into atmosphere expertly while Revan stared down into a maelstrom of clouds and lightning. Miraculous, with the Machine Ships maps. They had crossed the galaxy in half a day, what would have once taken her fleet half a year.

This will change the nature of war, Revan thought, restlessly drumming her metal fingers on the communications board until Polla told her to stop.

You could have let the Deralian go, Malak chided. I could have shown you how to fly the Hawk.

"Because that worked so well when you were alive, my love?" Revan had to smile, thinking of how nervous her husband had been whenever she took the yoke.

"Huh?" Polla turned her head. "Oh, right. Talking to yourself again. Totally normal, Bossypants."

"I am speaking to Malak."

"Great. Tell him I said hi." The Deralian coasted in slowly, banking under the clouds. "Republic blockade seems to be gone...."

"He can hear you."

"Can he?" The smuggler pivoted in her seat and then made a crude gesture. "Can he see me, too? You didn't have to bomb all those planets, Malak. Or have your little war with Revan on top of my homeworld. And you both could've left Deralia out of it."

She isn't wrong. But the past is done. It's the future we can change, Red.

"He says you should look to the future."

Polla scoffed. "Which future? The one where my Da's still dying and we're giving Tenny-Bro everything he wants? The one where we won the war and we're handing it off? The Emperor wants Revan and you're just going with it! Oh, Polla, let's sacrifice the other Revan and then will you take me to Nar Shaddaa? No! I won't! I'm not your kriffing livery cruiser, Revan!"

"I never claimed you were in my service. I am hoping Fragment is strong enough to make a difference until my mind prison can work--"

Malak flickered before her eyes. Have faith, Red.

"Why?" Polla snarled. "Think the tenth time she fights him it'll be the charm?"

Revan exhaled. "No." Under the accusing eyes of the smuggler, her faith crumpled.

Have faith, Malak repeated, as stubborn in death as he always had been in life.

How can I? The Fragment failed, too. Every step we have taken is just another in a circular path.
Everything we've done has only added to Vitiate's power.

“No, my heart.” Malak enfolded her in his spectral embrace. “My Bright One.”

Revan realized that both her hands were knotted into fists--one metal and one flesh. The Force surged weakly with her frustration, dulled to distraction by the Fragment’s pain and the Deralian’s fear. I am not your Bright One! Sheris was your Bright One! Always in my shadow! If I had not placed her in your bed you wouldn’t have noticed her--I nearly had to strip her myself because you were so busy looking at me!

“No.” Malak’s voice was detached. Infuriatingly calm. “You were the sun, Red. I had to look at
you. You blinded me to everything else, cast your shadow over everyone else--”

My master died at Malachor, Sheris murmured But someone saved me. I thought they saved me for you, my love. Saved me to heal you, Malak.

“You did your best, Bright One.” It was Revan’s skin that buzzed with his sepulchral touch, but it was Sheris staring back into his ghostly eyes.

And then Revan saw what had been before her all along. “The shadow--”

“Huh?” Polla barely glanced in her direction. “Still talking to Darth Malak?” She sighed unsteadily. “How’d I know if I’d been brainwashed? I’d be able to tell, right? Am I bringing you here because Tenny-bro made me? We shouldn’t be within a million parsecs of this system!” Her hand reached for the yoke. “We should go,” she mumbled, bringing them in closer to the planet instead.

“Be quiet,” Revan told her. “I have to think.”

Words from the past echoed in her mind. “She is the shadow you hide behind. Her power deafens.
You, in your weakness, will hear as she cannot. Your weakness is your armor. She drowns out the world’s whispers but you hear all.” Vima Sunrider’s speech--what the woman had said on the day of Revan’s rebirth.

“She is the shadow you hide within.”

Revan’s breath froze in her lungs. Their ship hung in the sky and the galaxy rested on a precipice.

“She is the shadow you hide within. Your weakness is your armor, Padawan.”

Malak’s voice sounded more puzzled than hurt. “But you sent Sheris, Red. To me. Are you claiming it was someone else?”
I wanted to go, Sheris murmured. To follow him into the Dark.

Yes. Revan closed her eyes.

I knew. I could not tell you before, Sheris whispered. You would not listen to me before.

I tried once to go already. But it didn't work--

There was no sun before.

Yes. The Fragment wasn't here before.

Revan opened her eyes. She laughed. The air in the ship was stale and stank of fear. But it was sweet, too. "Vima... she was right."

"Huh?" Polla Organa had activated the landing gear. "Dunno what you're going on about, but we're here." She had coasted the Hawk in, past a charred circle of rubble. Ahead of them, the doors of the Temple appeared to have been blasted open and then melted shut--the stone warped and cracked by the Force. The malevolent energy emanating from the building was unmistakable. "What happened to the doors?" Polla flicked their engines off. "Blasted 'em open the last time I was here. Give me a sec--I'll do it again--"

"Wait." Revan put her hand on the smuggler's arm. "They're Force-sealed."

"Then how can we get in?"

"There's another set of doors below, on the back of the Temple. Keyed to us. But Dustil and Mekel are here--on the main level." They had to be, that bright knot of power she sensed could be nothing else. "And the Imperial Fleet is cloaked in the sky." Revan felt their ships appear, like sparks of light coming out from a cloud. The power of the Fragment in the ship had blinded her sense of them before.

Then Revan laughed again. Vima was right! "We may have missed a very short war. I know you have no faith in my plans, Polla, but trust in the Force."

"Just the driver," the Deralian muttered. "Just came along to say good-bye. Because the Sith Emperor made me. And to keep you from wrecking my ship."

"You need to trust me--"

If you keep saying that, she won't, Sheris chided.

There wasn't much time. "When... I'll tell you when--"

"Tell me what?"

No time to answer, as the door to the cockpit slid open.

"I think we're in time for the main event." The Fragment stood in the doorway. She looked down at her own body, making a face. "Almost dusk now, local time. Teny-Bro's babbling in my head that we should wait for dawn. He's assembling survivors to send me off--"

"We can't wait," Revan interrupted.

"Eager to get rid of me?" Revan glanced in the direction of the Temple and then back. "Don't want to wait, either... but there's no reason I have to climb into an ancient tomb sober--is there?"
"No. No reason." Revan's mind was still stumbling; logistics unraveling like a skein of tangled wire. "I'm sure you'll have time for a drink. Has Tenebrae informed you how Dustil Onasi and Mekel Jin will be freed?"

"He says I can release them when I go into the Temple. After I free them I'm not sure I can stop myself." The Fragment bit her lip. "That thing in the Temple… it's happy I'm back. It's calling to me. And I… I want to go to it." Her voice cracked. “I’ve… I’ve wanted to go to it for a while now.”

All those little lives… Revan remembered her own brief experience with the tomb. "I understand," she said. "We'll go together, Revan. Polla… Polla will wait with the ship." Her mind worried at words, trying to find the right ones. "But the… the intensity of the Force inside might incapacitate me. I'm not as strong as you are.*

"Maybe you should wait with the ship, too." Her counterpart's nose was bleeding again. Her hands were white-knuckled. "Both of you. Wait with the ship. He says when I go in, they'll be free. I'll send them out."

"Just like that?" Polla scoffed. "They were passed out on Oas for two days--Dustil was barely awake on the ship. You think they'll be walking out of there?"

The Fragment's voice was even. "Guess we'll have to see."

"You go alone," Revan told her. "We'll be here. Come out if you need us."

Polla shot her a frown.

"It calls," Malak whispered. "You remember the temptation of the Dark, Revan. With all of our training, we were broken reeds before it. It takes all of her will to resist."

Then help her. We need to finish this before the Emperor returns! There can no doubt--

"You will need the smuggler. This ship will need to leave quickly, after--"

*I know that, Mal."

"A drink first." The Fragment took a ragged breath. "Polla?"

"Sure." The Deralian shrugged. "But if you go evil in that fracking tomb I'm going to haunt your conscience for eternity. You know that?"

"You'll haunt me anyway." The Fragment blinked too hard.

"Yeah." The Deralian was smiling. "Hey, look. It's a good thing you're doing, saving those kids."

"Would you do it?" The Fragment walked to the gunnery turret and popped open a cabinet there. She extracted a half-empty bottle of what looked like fermented krill-juice and uncorked it, making a face as she swigged some of it down before passing it to Polla.

"Well, no. But I spent more time with Dustil than you did. Sulkypants is a real brat. Probably do him good to spend a few centuries hooked up like a battery." The smuggler took a careless gulp and handed the bottle to Revan.

"Thank you," Revan said.

"Dustil won't last a century." The smile that had almost been on the Fragment's mouth faded. "And I wanted to do it before. Now that I'm here....

"I remember the way it called to me." That curious feeling couldn't be envy. Perhaps it was relief. I would have sacrificed Dustil and Mekel without a thought, Revan realized. Bought another few decades and kept searching for victory.

Yes. She is not you, Red.

This still could be a trick--another one of Tenebrae's tricks. Hope. It was a dull ember in Revan's chest. She did not want to extinguish it. The drink was abominable. She handed the bottle back after one sip.

When she looked up, Malak's ghost smiled down at her with his eyes, the smooth curve of his prosthesis a graceful line against his muscular neck.

Our trick, this time, her lover said.

"Mekel said Dustil was dying. He looked like he was dying." The smuggler fidgeted, flipping open a blaster she'd had at her belt and adjusting the parts."They both looked pretty bad."

The Fragment took another gulp. "The Emperor's draining them. It's what he'll do to me, but I'll be... hardwired. Dustil and Mekel are just patched in. I can pull them out."

"And being his power source won't kill you, because you can't die?"

"Right." The Fragment grimaced, and drank still more of her concoction, finishing the bottle. "Lucky me." She wiped her bleeding nose again. "I'll be the Emperor's power source, but with luck, he'll be mine, too. I can do good, maybe. Save some sents."

"You will do some good," Revan ordered her.

She will, Malak said.

Can you see the future, my love?

Only you.

Polla Organa sighed. "Dustil Onasi's a good kid. He looked out for me and Zaalbar on Kaas. Guess Mekel's a good kid, too. Never really spent much time... but he is your family, right?"

"You're my family." The Fragment blinked too quickly, and then wiped her eyes.

"Even Bossypants?"

"Is that humor?" Revan tried to smile, to show she understood.

"You're gonna have to take care of Dar," the Fragment told Polla. "Hope you know that. I've done all I can."

"Yeah." Polla ducked her head and drank. "She's rich. Right?"

For some reason that made them both start laughing.

"Take care of them both for me, Malak." The Fragment's voice sharpened. "You didn't think I couldn't see you--almost see you--hovering? Once I'm omnipotent, I'll have my eye on you, too."

"Once you're inside the tomb, you won't see me at all, I think," Malak spoke slowly.

Oh. There was no time for a reaction, and Revan could not give one, not under her counterpart's bright green gaze. She half-expected the Fragment to crack some jape at Malak, but the woman only blinked.

"Tell Korrie I love him." The Fragment wiped her eyes. "Tell him I'm watching over him, always."

"But not in a creepy way," Polla interjected. "Don't tell him you're in someone else's brain. That'll give your kid nightmares."

Revan forced a choked laugh at almost the exact same time as the Fragment.

_Courage, Bright One_, Malak whispered. _My brave Bright One._

Always, Sheris whispered, and for once Revan did not object.

XXX

_In conclusion, there is overwhelming evidence that Talonis Revan was a fictional character, and the real Revan Starfire’s life story was reduced to Apocrypha within four generations of her sacrifice._

_The question is why?_

_Why would a woman who was dead for nearly two hundred years need to be erased from the galactic record?_

_To protect her few descendants? Protect her cousin’s (numerous) descendants?_

_Perhaps. But could it be something else?_

_On the Sith world of Korriban, they have a springtime festival each year on the day of Revan's birth. A statue of a robed figure is constructed from flowers in the Dreshdae Central Square and all of the local courtesans wear red wigs. The tradition is that this disguise will give the real Starfire’s ghost cover to walk among the living for a night and a day._

--Excerpt from "An Historian's Introduction to the Machine Wars: Lecture by Kree Usam Racharn for the Revan: Fact or Fiction Symposium, SHWL," University of Coruscant Press. 3653 BBY

Xxx

"Goodbye," the Fragment said again. She turned and walked down the _Hawk_'s landing ramp, heading for the Dark Temple as if she owned it. She had taken off that battered flight jacket, was now dressed in a patched coverall from the ship. At the halfway point she turned to face them. "Tenny-Bro's pissed," she called out. "Wanted me to wait for his party--you're gonna want to clear out if here soon as you can. He's got a dropship of Thulian priests coming. And some kinda procession from Kaas City."

"Duly noted!" Revan called back.

"Be careful." The Fragment had kept walking, now backward, still staring at both of them. "Uh, goodbye. Again."
"Don't bump into the door!" Polla yelled.

"She won't." The Force led her. Revan had been twelve before she'd noticed that most sentients needed eyes to know what lay ahead of them, that they had to walk in a straight line facing forward to see.

"We really letting her do this?" Polla dropped her voice. "Sure it's a good idea? We could've tried the carbonite again--"

"No. This was always inevitable." At the end of every path. "You need to trust me, Polla."

If you keep saying it like that she won't! Sheris's tone was gentle for all of its chiding.

“You’re making it hard,” Polla noted. “Between letting Revan run off to kill herself and you going on about trust--”

“It isn’t death, going into the tomb.” Revan took another deep breath of clean sweet air. “Not for her.”

“Easy for you to say.” Polla wiped her eyes. “We’re never gonna see her again.”

The Fragment had lifted both her arms and turned her palms up. She'd started glowing again.

The doors of the Dark Temple cracked open. The Fragment was far enough away that her features blurred, lost in a haze of light that seemed to be coming from inside the Temple as well as from her. As they watched, the glow followed her, casting shadows from the shattered door.

The shadows looked like claws, chasing her inside.

"Now, my heart," Malak whispered--just as Revan was already opening her mouth.

"Polla," she said. "I have to go help her."

"Huh?" The smuggler looked confused. "But she said she'd come back if she needed help--"

"She won't. Trust me--"

"The more you keep saying that, the worse this looks. You know that, right?"

Told you. Sheris's laughter sounded like bells.

Revan shook her head. "Listen to me. When I return we're going to leave. Quickly. You've got to get Dustil and Mekel on the ship, get the Hawk ready to go--before my return. Understand? But if the Fragment comes back before I do…"

"You just said she wouldn't."

She might, Sheris noted. If those two Bezal-bonded men can’t walk.

"If she comes back before I do, tell her I'm in the fresher." Pathetic excuse--a ten-year-old Padawan could have found one less flimsy--but there was no time.

“The lower hidden entrance,” Malak murmured. “That seems the most logical approach.”

I know, Mal.
"Tell her you're in the fresher," Polla repeated. She laughed. "Did I ever tell you your plans are all terrible, Bossypants? I don't know what you're up to, but…"

“I have to help her.” She patted the woman on the arm. “Tell her I’m in the fresher, Polla.”

Without further ado, Revan turned and ran for the hidden stairs along the side of the Temple’s wall; heading to the entrance carved into the side of the edifice by a clever T3.

A/N

This is penultimate. For serious. One more chapter to go! And that is mostly written, although some of the pieces need to be sorted.

Thanks as always, Ether, for beting another monster. I’ve probably added more typos trying to fix tings. This is the version with typos.

Please drop by the archive and comment to let the author know if you enjoyed their work!